Mably, l. iii. c. 1. Muratori. Dissert. xiv. et xv. Cæsar. de Bell. Gall. vi. 14.

Tant de servitudes volontaires ou forcées ont bientôt fait naître plusieurs classes différentes parmi les hommes qui reconnoissoient un même seigneur. Des contrats, ou des coutumes, fixèrent bientôt leur état, leurs devoirs, et leurs droits. Je passe sous silence plusieurs nuances que nous distinguons à peine, pour m'arrêter à la différence reconnue du serf serf et du vilain. Les droits du second dépendoient moins du caprice du seigneur; sa personne étoit plus sacrée, et ses enfans pouvoient sortir de leur misère, et monter à des grades supérieurs. Le vilain étoit le dernier des hommes, le serf étoit une bête de somme qui différoit peu, dans l'esprit de son maître, du bœuf son compagnon de travail.

Le maître devint bientôt juge. Intéressé à maintenir la police sur ses terres, à prévenir tous les désordres qui pouvoient survenir parmi des milliers de rustres, que leur misère rendoit encore plus féroces, il étoit peu disposé à céder au magistrat de la province l'intendance de sa famille. Ses prétensions sembloient raisonnables. Bientôt les loix les autorisèrent, et il étendoit tous les jours les droits de sa terre sous l'ombre de sa juridiction domestique. Voilà l'origine la plus naturelle des justices seigneuriales qui sont connus en France depuis le commencement du septième siècle.

On peut croire, et on le sait, qu'un grand nombre de ces malheureux qui fuyoient la violence se réfugièrent au pied des autels, et que St. Martin ou St. Denys leur parurent des maîtres dont la protection étoit assurée, et le service doux et honorable. Les églises avoient étendu partout le nombre de leurs serfs et la juridiction de leurs terres. Lorsque Charles Martel dépouilla les ecclésiastiques, ces serfs et cette juridiction passèrent entre les mains de ses vassaux, et la justice devint un des caractères les plus essentiels d'un fief.

Conclusion.

Je m'arrête: j'ai considéré le système féodal, l'hiérarchie politique, la foi et l'hommage, le service service militaire, et l'esclavage du peuple. Ce fleuve rapide, grossi de mille eaux étrangères, inondoit encore l'Europe dans le douzième siècle.

J'entrevois une nouvelle carrière plus vaste et plus utile encore : la décadence de ce système, et ceux qui se sont élevés sur ses débris, sa chute rapide et terrible en Italie, son dépérissement lent et tranquille en Angleterre et en France, et la solidité qu'il s'est procuré en Allemagne.

Rappellons seulement quelques idées de la politique des rois de France depuis Louis le Gros, jusqu'à Charles VII. Les barons étoient puissans parcequ'ils possédoient seuls toutes les richesses, l'autorité et les forces de l'état. A la richesse des terres les rois ont opposé celles du commerce et des arts ; ils ont suscité des tribunaux civils et ecclésiastiques contre les justices seigneuriales. Enfin ils ont remplacé par des troupes réglées la milice féodale.

RELATION DES NOCES DE CHARLES DUC DE BOURGOGNE, AVEC LA PRINCESSE MARGUERITE, SŒUR D'EDOUARD IV. ROI D'ANGLETERRE.

On doit une sorte de reconnoissance aux historiens qui nous ont conservé les détails souvent minutieux, mais qui nous peignent les mœurs d'un siècle, son goût pour les arts, et le genre et l'étendue de son commerce. Il y a plus de variété variété et souvent plus d'instruction dans ces objets que dans la relation d'une bataille, ou d'un traité de paix.

Olivier de la Marche nous a laissé une description fort détaillée des fêtes qui se donnèrent à l'occasion de ces noces, dans lesquelles Charles étala toutes la pompe et toute l'étiquette de la maison de Bourgogne. Olivier en étoit parfaitement instruit. Il étoit alors premier maître d'hôtel du duc; c'est à son bon ami et confrère Gilles du Mas, premier maître d'hôtel du Duc de Bretagne, qu'il adresse sa relation dont je choisirai les traits qui me paroissent les plus curieux.

Après une longue négociation dans laquelle le Roi d'Angleterre et le Duc de Bourgogne ne sacrifièrent qu'avec beaucoup de peine leur inclination à leur politique, ils conclurent enfin un traité d'alliance et de commerce, et le confirmèrent par le mariage de Charles avec la sœur d'Edouard. 1467.

La Princesse Marguerite arriva au port de l'Ecluse auprès de Bruges, le 25 Juin, 1468. Pendant les huit jours qu'elle y passa, elle reçut les visites du duc son époux futur, de la Duchesse douarière, de la Princesse Marie, et des principaux personnages de la cour. Lorsque tout fut préparé pour sa réception, elle partit de l'Ecluse. Le duc alla au devant d'elle jusqu'à Dam, petite ville sur le chemin de Bruges, où il l'épousa, après quoi il retira dans son hôtel, et croy que tandis que les autres cérémonies se firent, il fit provision de dormir, comme s'il eust à faire aucun guet ou escouade pour la nuict avenir. La princesse continua sa route et 1468.

fit

fit son entrée solemnelle dans Bruges. Elle avoit amené un cortège nombreux de la cour d'Angleterre: on y voyoit la Duchesse de Norfolk, l'Evêque de Winchester, le Lord Scales, frère de la Reine d'Angleterre, et sa femme; quarante ou cinquante dames et demoiselles; quatre-vingt à cent gentilshommes; et plus de dix-huit cens personnes de leur suite: la cour nombreuse du Duc de Bourgogne, les gens d'église qui portoient les reliques, et les magistrats de la ville augmentèrent l'éclat de cette procession, qui étala encore un genre de magnificence propre à la première ville commerçante de l'Europe, c'étoient les compagnies de négocians étrangers qui renchérissoient les unes sur les autres par la richesse de leurs équipages, les Vénétiens, les Génois, les Florentins, et les villes Hanséatiques. Marguerite étoit portée dans une litière qu'accompagnoient à pied les premiers seigneurs des deux cours. De ses dames les unes étoient montées sur des haquenées blanches; les autres la suivoient dans cinq chariots. La procession finit à l'hôtel du Duc de Bourgogne.

Pendant les dix jours que durèrent les fêtes, on ne vit à Bruges qu'un enchainement de luxe et de plaisir. Les banquets et les tournois sont ce qui nous intéresse le plus.

Je passe sous silence la maison ouverte que le duc tint pendant tout ce tems là avec une magnificence digne des plus grands rois. Des fontaines de vin couloient dans les rues, les étrangers étoient servis en vaisselle d'argent à sept tables différentes, dont les seigneurs de la cour leur faisoient les honneurs.

neurs. Plus de six cens personnes travailloient dans les différens offices du palais.*

On avoit élevé une très grande salle de bois, tendue d'une belle tapisserie en soie et en or qui représentoit l'histoire des Argonautes; sujet que l'ordre de la toison d'or mettoit fort à la mode à la cour de Bourgogne. Elle étoit éclairée par un grand nombre de candélabres de bois peints en blanc, mais surtout par deux grands chandeliers suspendus vers les deux bouts de la salle. C'étoient des châteaux placés sur des rochers et des montagnes, parmi les sentiers desquelles on voyoit des hommes et des bêtes, qui montoient ou qui descendoient. Le fond étoit composé de sept miroirs qui renvoyoient l'image de tout ce qui se passoit dans la salle. Ces chandeliers étoient l'ouvrage d'un chanoine de Lisle; qui y avoit ménagé au-dedans une place pour le machiniste qui faisoit tourner le chandelier en faisant sortir du château des dragons qui vomissoient des flammes. Le buffet étoit dressé en forme de losange au milieu de la salle. La riche vaisselle d'or et d'argent enrichie de pierreries y étoit disposée avec goût. Elle passoit le poids de soixante mille marcs. La grande table, qui occupoit en forme de potence le fond da la salle, étoit toujours couverte de trois services magnifiques, dont la décoration présentoit des coups d'œil aussi variés qu'agréables. Au premier souper l'on y vit trente vaisseaux

* A la cuisine 300; à la saulserie 80; à l'eschansonerie et panneterie, pour chacune 60; à l'espicerie quinze; et généralement tous les offices étoient fort fournis de gens.

vaisseaux qui représentoient autant de seigneuries de la maison de Bourgogne, et qui en portoient les armoiries. Ils étoient enrichis de peinture et de dorure; leur cordages étoient d'or et leurs bannières de soye. Quatre chaloupes, qui portoient le fruit et les épiceries, accompagnoient chacun des vaisseaux; trente gros pâtés en forme de châteaux, annonçoient le même nombre de grandes villes qui obéissoient au Duc Charles. Une autre fois la table représentoit un camp composé d'un grand nombre de pavillons et de tentes qui couvroient tous les plats; ou bien un jardin dont les arbres, les fruits, et les feuilles, étoient travaillés très artistement.

CRITICAL RESEARCHES CONCERNING THE TITLE OF CHARLES VIII. TO THE CROWN OF NAPLES.*

Uncertainty of the rights of succession.

NATURAL and civil law has, each of them, its principle; but by what maxim shall we regulate the succession to states? The rules of private succession cannot apply to them, their object being so

* I meditate a history of the expedition of Charles VIII. into Italy; an event which changed the face of Europe. Should I ever undertake such a work, these researches will find their place in it, but written with more care and precision. At present, both leisure and books are wanting; for which reason, being unable to cite the original historians, I think it better to trust to the notoriety of the transactions, than to refer the reader to compilations.

different.

different. Public agreements are rarely sufficiently determinate; treaties are liable to chicane; examples are wanting; and each party rejects those examples which are not favourable to his cause.

Quarrels of the houses of Anjou and Arragon.

The kingdom of Naples, and Europe itself, were often distracted by the quarrels between the houses of Anjou and Arragon. Victory remained long doubtful. I am going to examine by which of the contending parties it was merited. The contest is at an end. In the treaties of Madrid and of Cambray, the house of France solemnly renounced its pretensions; and even Father Daniel* was not obliged to maintain them.

The Emperor Frederic II. was lawful King of Naples.

Let us first discover some proposition acknowledged by both parties. Before the council of Lyons, the Emperor Frederic II. was lawful king of Naples; regarded as such by the pope his liege lord or superior, by his own subjects, and by all the princes of Europe. Through his mother he inherited all the rights of the Norman family. The Greek emperors, who would have been his only competitors, were no more.

The family of Arragon descended from him. Their rights.

Ferdinand, whose title was called in question by Charles VIII. descended from the house of Arragon. He asserted the right of inheritance. Peter I. of Arragon, his ancestor, had married Constance, the daughter of Mainfroy, the grandchild of the Emperor Frederic II. and the sole heiress of the house of Swabia: a title incontrovertible, had it

* V. la Grande Histoire du P. Daniel, tome v. p. 196, et p. 259.

been

been pure; but Ferdinand's blood was defiled by two bastardies, that of Mainfroy, and his own.

Reasons why bastards are deprived of the right of succession.

The institution of marriage is necessary in civilised countries. Hereditary property in land implies the appropriation of women: since the best means of transmitting property is by proximity of blood; which must therefore be ascertained by marriage, the public engagement of one man with one woman, whose children are regarded as his successors. Whoever violates this law ought to be punished in his descendant, whose birth being an outrage to society, he cannot be considered as its child, nor participate in the property of which it secures the succession. Such are the laws which reason has dictated to all nations. Manners, often more powerful than laws, here corroborate and confirm them; condemning to perpetual ignominy the unhappy bastard, whose father must ever be uncertain, and who knows his mother only by her crime: a cruel, but salutary punishment, since on it depend the chastity of women, the education of children, and the peace of the community. If then both laws and manners declare bastards incapable of inheriting private estates, on what principle ought they to succeed to kingdoms? The title of a sovereign cannot be too clear, nor his birth too much respected.

Their disgrace in the public opinion.

They cannot succeed to kingdoms.

Laws are deaf to every voice but that of justice and the public good. But it belongs to princes to judge, according to circumstances, whether they ought to soften, or rigorously to enforce the laws. When the repentance of his mother, or his own merit, merit, have efficaciously pleaded for an illegitimate son, the clemency of a prince may remove the stain from his birth, and thus restore him to society and his rights.

Difficulties concerning the right of legitimation.

But in applying this maxim to the house of Arragon a multitude of difficulties occur, of which it is impossible not to feel the force. 1. By what means is legitimation by a prince to be ascertained? Ferdinand was legitimated by a solemn act; but I know not whether that was the case with Mainfroy: his father indeed bequeathed to him the principality of Salerno, and even the inheritance of the kingdom. It remains to determine, whether a prince, entitled to perform an act of favour and mercy, actually does so by conferring an office of dignity, which cannot be enjoyed unless the act of mercy has previously been obtained; that is to say, whether the substance ought to prevail over the form, or the form over the substance.* 2. Can a prince legitimate his own children? Being subject to the laws, he cannot violate them without being amenable to justice; though the public good requires that his person should not be liable to punishment. But, in the supposed case, his violation of the laws may be punished in the persons of those who are most dear to him; it cannot surely be said, that he is obliged to submit to a punishment which his own pardon can forgive. 3. Does this legitimation extend to the right of succession to the crown?* 4. Do legitimated children recover completely the rights of lawful offspring, and of the nearest heirs to the crown; or rather, ought they not to be the last in the order of succession after all the collateral branches? It is not fit that we should be bountiful before we have been just. Even Lewis XIV. when he trampled on the rights of the nation, still respected those of the princes of the blood.

Can a prince legitimate his children,

* The following is an example where the same reasoning occurred. Sir Walter Raleigh was condemned to death for treason. After a confinement of many years in prison, he received from James I. the command of a fleet to be employed in discovering a gold mine in South America. The enterprise failed; and, at Sir Walter's return home, James ordered his head to be cut off, according to the sentence formerly passed against him. The nation murmured loudly, asserting that the commission of admiral was equivalent to a formal pardon, since it was impossible to bestow that authority and confidence on a traitor condemned to death.†

† Voyez Rapin, Hist. d'Angleterre, tome vii. page 122; et Hume, History of the Stuarts, vol. i. page 74. Howell's Letters, vol. i. s. 1, letter iv.

and call them to the succession, before collateral heirs?

This last question is extremely important. Alphonzo, the father of Ferdinand, left a brother named John, who succeeded to him in the kingdom of Arragon. John did not indeed dispute his nephew's right of succession to the kingdom of Naples, but could his renunciation bind his posterity? This is a question, with the decision of which we shall not now meddle, since it was formerly the occasion of so many disputes.†

John the uncle of Ferdinand.

Can a prince renounce for his posterity?

* This question depends on the same principles with that of adoption, which I shall shortly examine.

† This question was much agitated half a century ago, in the business of the Spanish succession, which Lewis XIV. renounced by the treaty of the Pyrenees, but which his family afterwards claimed and vindicated.

These

These reflections create just suspicions concerning the title of the house of Arragon, particularly of Ferdinand: but in the ages of iron when this contest arose, the prevalent customs of the times were more favourable to their claim. In those ages, as wicked as they were ignorant, princes disgraced themselves by a life of profligacy; and when they had not any legitimate children, their barons were easily prevailed on to acknowledge the rights of their bastards. How could the barons despise an appellation which they often prided themselves in bearing,* or disavow a right which was often their own? A partisan of the house of Anjou could not attack the title of his rivals, without challenging the rights of the kings of England, Castile, and Portugal.† In matters merely conventional, examples are more powerful than principles. Amidst the light of the XVIIIth century, the pretensions of the house of Arragon may appear extremely unjustifiable; but might have worn a very different aspect during the ignorance of the XVth.

In the middle ages, bastards often inherited crowns;

in England, Castile, and Portugal.

I am not sensible of omitting any of the arguments either for or against the title of that house. Mainfroy indeed usurped the crown, to the preju-

Mainfroy's posterity not usurpers, though he himself was one.

* We sometimes read in old charters, Ego ——— bastardus. The appellative became a surname. In the time of Philip Comines, there was little distinction made in Italy between natural and legitimate children.

† In the XIth century, William the Conqueror; and in the XIVth, Henry of Trastamare, and John, Grand Master of the Order of Avis, were all bastards.

dice of his nephew Conradin; but as Conradin died childless, Mainfroy's crime was merely personal, and extended not to his posterity.

The rights of Charles VIII.

The rights of Charles VIII. were far more complicated. The deposition of Frederick II. by the pope, and the investiture of Naples granted by him to Charles I. formed the title of the first house of Anjou. The adoption of Lewis of Anjou by queen Joan transmitted this title to the second branch, from which Charles VIII. received it by the testament of Charles, the last count of Provence, and titular king of Naples. These are the three links of the chain, which must be separately examined.

The deposition of Frederick II. by the pope. A. D. 1245.

The deposition of Frederick II. by pope Innocent IV. stirred up Europe against that unhappy prince. The multitude commenced a salutary severity, which did not spare even sovereigns themselves, when they became the enemies of the church. A very few only condemned the pope's sentence, not as unjust, but as too harsh: they thought that his holiness took away crowns with too little ceremony, but they acknowledged that he had the right of taking them away.*

Principles of philosophy.

Sound philosophy would teach us to smile at this pretended right, had it not been productive of too melancholy consequences. The most numerous portion of every community determines the prevailing

* Observe the equivocal conduct of Lewis IX. He blamed the pope's severity; he endeavoured to make peace; but the council of Lyons he always considered as a tribunal from which Frederick was not entitled to appeal.

prevailing religion: the sovereign establishes ministers to practise its rules, and to teach its precepts to the people: the sovereign also regulates its functions, hierarchy, and appointments; ecclesiastics being not less subject to his authority than judges and soldiers. But without recurring to principles which would not be universally admitted, the maxims of the Gallican church afford a sufficient answer to those transalpine pretensions. According to these maxims, the church, it is true, is not bound in obedience to the state; but neither has the former any controul over the latter. They are two independent, but allied, powers; which ought always to contribute their mutual assistance, without ever infringing their reciprocal rights. The pope can no more depose the emperor, than the emperor can pass decisions of faith. Excommunication is of a nature entirely spiritual; and the person excommunicated, though no longer a Christian, ceases not to be a father, a master, or a king. The emperor Frederick II. was not less king of Naples after the council of Lyons than before; and whatever was done on the supposition that he and his family were divested of the rights of sovereignty, was completely null.

The church subject to the state.

Maxims of the Gallican church.

The clergy's authority entirely spiritual.

The pope cannot depose a sovereign.

But if Innocent could not, as sovereign pontiff, depose Frederick; yet, as lord paramount of the kingdom of Naples, he could deprive a rebellious vassal of his fief. This right is far more specious. The Norman conquerors, through devotion or policy, had consented to hold their Italian possessions as fiefs of the Holy See; which conferred their investiture vestiture on those princes, and on the Swabian emperors, their successors.

The pope could depose Frederick, as his lord paramount.

Answers of Frederick's partisans.

Yet in examining this right of sovereignty by the principles of the feudal law, I know not whether Frederick's partisans needed to have given up the cause. They might have said, 1. It belonged to the pope to show by his conduct, whether he really acted as lord paramount. Is it by a solemn excommunication, in a general council of bishops, and by absolving subjects from their oaths of fidelity, that a superior condemns his vassal? In such condemnations is it usual to join with the crime of felony, the accusations of perfidy, sacrilege, and heresy? An assembly of peers, and of all the great vassals of the Holy See, with a king of England at their head, was the only tribunal to which Frederick was amenable; and felony was the only crime of which that tribunal could take cognizance. But in the council of Lyons, Innocent IV. appears under no other character than that of sovereign pontiff. 2. Never did any court of justice less deserve the name. It heard neither the accusation nor the defence; and refused to grant to the person accused the smallest delay, although his ministers, entrusted with full powers, hastened to Lyons. Sentence was pronounced before their arrival; a sentence founded neither on acknowledged law, nor on judicial evidence, but on a pretended notoriety of facts, vague reports, and public rumours. 3. The substance was not less defective than the form. Frederick had not deserved to be stripped of his fief. Though a vassal of

1. Innocent acted merely in his character of pope.

2. The sentence was irregular,

3. and unjust.

Duties of a vassal.

of the Holy See, he was not its subject. The vassal of a great fief reigned over it with absolute sovereignty; owing nothing to his paramount but homage, military service, and the negative duty of not bearing arms against his liege lord. These duties, besides, were defined so loosely, that it was difficult to convict him of their violation. If his superior refused to do him justice, he might assert it by force of arms; and his own immediate vassals were bound to follow him into the field against a prince, of whom they were themselves the rear-vassals.* By still stronger cogency of reason, the vassal, when attacked by his lord, was entitled to defend himself by arms. But the pope surely was the aggressor; if this appellation could be merited by excommunicating Frederick, by offering his states to all the princes of Europe, and by openly exciting the revolt of his subjects in the Milanese, Ravenna, and the Trevisan march. 4. If the pope could at pleasure assume the character of sovereign pontiff, or of prince paramount of the kingdom of Naples, Frederick also was justified in using the same right of option between his titles. As king of the two Sicilies, he held of the court of Rome; but as emperor of the Romans, he was subject to God only; and in a quarrel between the church and empire about Sardinia, he had not any account to give of the employment of his arms. He was even entitled, consistently with his duty, to make

Frederick had only defended himself.

4. Frederick, though a vassal of the pope, could make war on him, as emperor.

* Hainault, Abrégé Chronol. de l'Hist. de France, p. 617.

use of the forces of Naples itself, when that kingdom was not the object of dispute. These distinctions appear to be too subtle; and even contradictory. They may really be so; but they are deducible from that work of barbarism and chance, the feudal system, which admitted that a sovereign might be the vassal of his own subject. Without supposing this, let it be explained, how the kings of England since William I. to Edward III. could levy war against France. As dukes of Normandy or Aquitaine, they were vassals of that kingdom; yet these wars were acknowledged as lawful, since in the treaties of peace which followed them, there is not any mention of pardon or amnesty.

Example of the kings of England dukes of Normandy.

On the justness of Frederick's deposition depends that of the investiture of Charles of Anjou. The kingdom of Naples was then indeed possessed by an usurper; but if Conradin could not lose his title by the crime of his grandfather, the authority of the pontiff could not be lawfully exerted but in restoring his inheritance to that young prince. 2. Charles acquired the kingdom of Naples, and left it to his posterity. He was ancestor, the fourth in ascent, to Joan, so well known by her infamous debaucheries. This princess, when ready to be overwhelmed by the arms of her cousin Charles de la Paix, and dissatisfied with her nearest relations, applied for assistance to Lewis Duke of Anjou, brother to Charles V. king of France; and by letters patent, dated from the castle of Oeuf at Naples, the 29th June, 1380, adopted him for her son,

The investiture of Charles of Anjou dependant on the deposition of Frederick in 1265.

son, and appointed him heir to all her possessions.*

May I be permitted, however, to inquire, whether an European prince is entitled to make so fair a present; and whether he enjoys the right of choosing for himself a son and a successor? The name of king is universally used; but in different countries it is taken in very different acceptations. Among the natives of the East, a king is the vicegerent of Heaven, invested with despotic power over the lives and properties of his subjects. Under such governments a king can dispose of his people for the same reason that a shepherd can dispose of his flock. They are his property. But there are other nations, more deserving the name of men, who see in a sovereign nothing more than the first magistrate, appointed by the people for the purpose of promoting public happiness, and responsible to the people for his administration. Such a magistrate cannot transfer to another, a power with which he is entrusted only for his own life. At his demise, this power, if the government be elective, returns to the people; if the government be hereditary, the same power devolves on the nearest heir, according to the law of the land; and should the royal family be extinct, the people would resume all their rights. These maxims, surely, prevailed among the northern nations, who founded

Can a prince give away his dominions?

An Asiatic despot may. Why?

A European prince cannot.

* In my compilation the consent of the states to this adoption is not mentioned. This, however, was a very essential circumstance. But I have since found, that the accurate Giannone is also silent respecting it.

almost

almost all the kingdoms of Europe. Observe the steps by which they rendered their kings, though always subject to the laws, hereditary. These kings were originally only temporary and occasional chiefs. By degrees they came to hold their offices for life. Gratitude confined the sphere of election to some distinguished family; the son commonly succeeded to the father, but the solemnity of an election was still requisite; silence and obedience were finally thought to imply the consent of the nation; which always, however, resumed to itself the right of changing the order of succession, when the public good demanded an alteration.

These princes became hereditary by degrees.

I perceive a glimpse of this liberty even among people languishing in the vilest servitude. The monarchs of the East, who name their successors, must choose him from the royal family; and their subjects would not obey a stranger, though invested with authority by their late king. They have a confused perception that the law ought to be above the prince. Yet (for I am in search only of the truth) it may be observed on the other side, that the authority of European princes has been acknowledged to extend to the power of transferring their dominions. Charles II. of Spain, believing himself entitled to appoint his successor, named Philip of Bourbon. France accepted the testament; Spain submitted to it, and the allies felt the necessity of calling its authenticity in question. Without acknowledging a power of this kind in princes, I know not how we can justify

The power of transferring kingdoms among the most slavish nations.

Yet the nations of Europe seem to acknowledge this power.

The testament of Charles II. of Spain.

The authority of treaties of cession.

tify those treaties, in which a king transfers, not to a kinsman or friend, but to a stranger or enemy, the obedience of a portion of his subjects. The public law of Europe considers those subjects as rebels, when they refuse to submit to their new prince. The famous distinction between domain and frontier, when examined to the bottom, will be found to contain more sound than sense.

Testament of René and Charles IV. of Anjou.

3. By the adoption of Joan I. the second branch of the house of Anjou obtained only the county of Provence. After contending with the eldest branch of their family about the crown of Naples, they found themselves unable to defend it against the house of Arragon. They fled into France, making from thence various expeditions that were unsuccessful. René, the grandson of Lewis I. had no other choice to make than that of Charles his brother's son, or that of René of Vaudemont, duke of Lorraine, the son of his daughter. He preferred the former; and this Charles, titular king of Naples, and count of Provence, dying without children, bequeathed all his rights to Lewis XI. king of France, and father of Charles VIII.

Charles VIII. their heir.

An attentive perusal of a chapter of Philip Comines (Mem. L. viii. c. 1.) suggests the following propositions, which appear to me incontestible. 1. René of Anjou appointed his nephew Charles, and Charles appointed Lewis XI. heirs to all their rights. 2. The king of France acknowledged that these princes were not entitled to alter the order of succession by their testaments. 3. Lewis XI. and Charles VIII. took possession of Provence only only because it was a male fief; and that the male line being extinct, René of Vaudemont could not have any legitimate claim. 4. Instead of disputing the title of the duke of Lorraine to the kingdom of Naples, where the Salique law was unknown, the court of France ordered its ambassadors to espouse his cause, and permitted him to lead his company of an hundred lances in the expedition against that country. 5. A discovery is made of ancient testaments of Charles I. and other princes of the house of Anjou, by which they irrevocably unite the kingdom of Naples and the county of Provence; but the authenticity of these testaments was never clearly ascertained. 6. Charles VIII. concluded, that because he was count of Provence by the testament of Charles IV. of Anjou, failing his male issue, he therefore also became lawful king of Naples. From this time, there was no longer any mention of the rights of the duke of Lorraine. Yet this duke, so much despised, might surely have asked, since the two states were to be subject to the same law of succession, why the county ought to serve as a rule for the kingdom, rather than the kingdom for the county? Would it not have been more consistent with justice to reject the Salique law in ascertaining the succession to Provence, because that law was unknown in Naples, than to introduce a new law at Naples because it was admitted in Provence?

René duke of Lorraine, his pretensions to the crown of Naples.

The court of France at first acknowledges their.

The subsequent dispute founded on old testaments.

Whether the Salique law ought to have been rejected in Provence, or introduced at Naples.

Maxim of Father Daniel

But we need only adopt a maxim of Father Daniel, to terminate the controversy at once. The duke

duke of Lorraine had not force to maintain his right; the king of France had; and this force entitled him to a preference. Yet I know not whether we can justly adopt a maxim, which may be thus expressed in general terms. "If a lawful heir cannot maintain his pretensions, they become of course extinct; and the next person in the order of succession may assume his place, assert and obtain the inheritance for himself and his posterity." explained.

Such are the principal titles of the houses of Anjou and Arragon to the crown of Naples. It belongs to the reader to pronounce sentence; after first casting his eye on some other rights of both parties, too weak or uncertain to merit a long discussion. Other titles of both houses.

1. The house of France might assert that by the pope's investiture of Charles I. the rights of that prince devolved to the family of Anjou. I pretend not to decide. The monk who prepared that act with scholastic formality, succeeded so well in perplexing it, that I cannot perceive whether those rights returned thereby to the pope, or descended to the family of Bourbon or to that of Valois. The act of investiture of Charles I.

2. The right of conquest, an odious right, fit only to make illustrious criminals; which alternately favoured both parties. Right of conquest.

3. The right of adoption by queen Joan II. But as she successively adopted Lewis of Anjou and Alphonzo of Arragon, the one of those quantities, to speak in the language of algebra, destroys the other. Right of adoption by queen Joan II.

4. The Right of possession.

4. The right of possession. The house of Arragon enjoyed it sixty years. Yet the house of Anjou had never relinquished its pretensions; but, on the contrary, seized every opportunity of asserting them.

Title arising from the people's consent.

6. The consent of the subjects, the fairest of all titles. The princes of the house of Arragon might allege the universal obedience paid to their authority; but, according to the opposite party, the cruelties exercised by that house, and the murmurs of the people, clearly proved their obedience to be involuntary.

The only title not liable to objection.

The right of conquest is only made for wild beasts. The laws of succession, though well contrived in themselves, are destitute of fixed principles. The only title not liable to objection, is the consenting voice of a free people.

AN ACCOUNT OF A LETTER ADDRESSED TO COCCHI, BY CHEVALIER L. G. ARETINO, Respecting some Transactions in the Cisalpine Gallic War, A. U. C. 529.

Florence, 5th August, 1764.

I HAVE been reading a little work, intitled, A Critical Letter of the Chevalier Lorenzo Guazzesi Aretino, to Doctor Anthony Cocchi, Physician and Antiquary of his Catholic Majesty; respecting some some transactions in the Cisalpine Gallic War, in the year of Rome 529; Arezzo, 1752; in 12*mo. pp.* 103. I find in this little work, erudition, good sense, sound criticism, with much local knowledge. Its chief fault is that of the Chevalier's country, an Asiatic style, prejudicial to strength, precision, and brevity. I shall unite, under one point of view, what I have learned from him on the subject, and the additions which my own reflections have made to it. This sketch would be less imperfect, had I a Polybius at hand.

1. I cannot imagine any event that would have more endangered the greatness of Rome than the union of the Gauls and Carthaginians in the first Punic war. Both these nations were formidable to that ambitious republic; and in both the projects of vengeance would have been directed by the wisest policy. Each would have brought with it the advantages in which its ally was deficient. Carthage was powerful in wealth, shipping, and military discipline. The populousness, valour, and advantageous situation of the Gauls made the Romans always consider a Gallic war as an event big with alarm and danger. Had the allies succeeded, the difference of their views and character would have facilitated the friendly division of their conquests, and cemented their union. But the cautious and narrow policy of the Carthaginians, and the lazy insensibility natural to improvident Barbarians, delivered the Romans from the danger of this alliance. The republic, I imagine, who knew how to dissemble her hatred as well as her ambition, ambition, was careful to keep on good terms with the Gauls; and, before provoking their resentment, patiently waited until they should have no other resource than in themselves.

In the year of Rome 470, the Galli Senones were almost extirpated. The colonies of Castrum and Sena were sent into the country extending from the Æsis to the Ufens; and the whole of their territory, the Ager Gallicus, was added to the dominions of the state. Fifty-eight years afterwards, a tribune, ambitious of popularity, obtained a law for dividing this public property among the citizens. It is difficult to perceive why this distribution of lands, which had ceased to belong to the Gauls, should at once provoke a war as fierce as it was general: all that I understand is, that the neighbouring Boii enjoyed the right of public pasturage, on paying a small quit-rent called Scriptura; and that the lands were perhaps subfarmed by individuals. The avarice of the new proprietors may be supposed to have expelled the feeble remnant of the Senones, which the wise moderation of government had left unmolested. The neighbourhood of the Romans would grow more formidable to the Gauls, in proportion as that frontier was fortified and peopled by a rival and warlike colony. Whatever were the reasons, it is certain that this law spread dismay and fury through the whole of Cisalpine Gaul. These nations flew to arms, and invited into Italy numerous mercenaries from beyond the Alps. The Romans prepared for resisting the storm. By an enumeration of their forces forces in Italy, they found they could send into the field 700,000 foot and 70,000 horse. The consul Æmilius, at the head of a numerous army, took post at Ariminum, to defend the Ager Gallicus, the object of the war; and one of the prætors was entrusted with the defence of Tuscany. Atilius, the other consul, had sailed to Sardinia, with a view of conquering the barbarians of that island.

It is not material to determine by what route the barbarians penetrated into Etruria, which they thought fit to render the first theatre of the war. The prætor had naturally posted himself near to Arezzo, the principal fortress of the Romans in Tuscany. If they marched by the sea-side, the Gauls might have deceived his vigilance; if they pursued the road of Bologna and Valdimugello,* the general must have been too weak to resist them, and therefore felt the necessity of allowing them to ravage with impunity the rich Tuscan pastures.† They got possession of an immense booty in cattle and slaves. Proud of following the footsteps of their ancestors, they advanced to Clusium, on the straight road to the capital. There they heard that the prætor, who had perhaps received a reinforcement, pursued them by forced marches. They changed their direction, in order to meet him; and on the evening of the first day's march, the two armies were in sight of each other. Both sides fortified their camp. If we examine the road by Clusium to Arezzo in the Valdichiana,

* Littera Crit. p. 37. † Id. p. 39.

we shall find the villages of Lucignana and Sinalunga situated at a convenient distance.* The Romans had occupied an excellent camp; and the barbarians, notwithstanding their impetuosity, thought it wiser to withdraw them from it by stratagem, than to dislodge them by force. They marched with their whole infantry, left their fires burning to deceive the Romans, as well as their cavalry, who might continually harass them until they were drawn to the place to which they wished to decoy them. The prætor fell into the snare, and was punished for his credulity by a bloody defeat. He with much difficulty retired to an eminence, and defended himself till the arrival of the consul Æmilius, who by forced marches had passed the Appennines. His arrival saved the prætor; and the Gauls now thought only of securing their booty and making their retreat along the sea coast. The narrative of Polybius is clear; and if Casaubon had taken the sense of the passage as well as Mr. Guazzesi, the text of this great historian would no longer contain any geographical difficulties. He says of the retreat of the Gauls, Ποιησαμενοι την ὑποχωρησιν ὡς επι πολιν φαισολαν. If we translate the words Fæsulas tendunt we suppose the Gauls to perform a march almost incredible, and to make a movement altogether absurd, since it implies that the Romans pursued their cavalry sixty miles without putting them to the rout. These difficulties are increased when we follow the Gauls to Fæsulæ and to the foot of the Appennines; and as it is impossible to understand how they can retreat to Telamon, we adopt the opinion of Cluverius, in preferring on this occasion the authority of Orosius to that of Polybius, and supposing that the last battle was fought near to Arezzo. Why should not the words ὡς επι φαισολαν versus Fæsulas be translated in the direction of Fæsulæ, according to the most natural signification and the easiest construction? The Gauls then pursued the road from Clusium to Fæsulæ, but had scarcely concealed themselves behind the chain of hills which separates the duchy of Tuscany from the district of Sienna, when they were obliged to come to an engagement. Thanks to the happy discovery of Mr. Guazzesi, the whole plan of the campaign is unravelled.* The Romans retired to one of those hills; and by dispatching couriers across the thick woods by which they were covered, communicated the news of their situation to the consul.

* Littera Crit. p. 54.

foot

Why did the Barbarians prefer the road by the coast to that of Valdimugello, which is far shorter? Why did they not traverse the country in a right line, in order to arrive at the mouth of the Arno, and then follow the coast to the openings of the hills of Valdimagra? We are sure that Port Telamon is nearer than the mountains of Sienna to Rome. Mr. Guazzesi well explains these difficulties, by the changes which time has effected in the nature of the country, and by our ignorance whether this route was not the only one practicable for an army; by the preference given by the Gauls to the plain country, where they could avail themselves of their numerous cavalry, and by the hope of meeting with piratical vessels belonging to their own nation or the Ligurians, in which they might transport their booty without difficulty or danger. But I believe it will be necessary to penetrate into the motives by which the Barbarians were actuated, before we can fairly appreciate their conduct in passing from fury to dismay; and in marching up to their enemies, merely that they might fly before them, especially after they had just tasted the sweets of victory. The Gallic army was governed by two principles extremely different. The Cisalpine nations perceived that such a war could only terminate in their own destruction or that of the Romans. They fought like men, who had their dearest interests at stake; but their allies the Gesatæ were not animated by a similar spirit. These troops were not a nation, but rather an assemblage from different nations, who had passed the Alps merely for the sake of plunder, and who wished to secure their booty by a speedy retreat, without longer exposing their persons in a war which did not concern them. Their leader Anocrestes was the first who proposed this measure; and as the age was ignorant of the principles of geography, and the Barbarians were unacquainted both with the country and the language, they could only shape their route by the course of those rivers which, swelled to torrents, had forced their passage through the least obstructed vallies. They were then near the source of the Umbro; and as that river flows from the south-west, they must have approached Rome, as they came to its mouth near Port Telamon. If the Cisalpine Gauls, who were better acquainted with the country, were loath to leave it, there is reason to think that they would with pleasure avail themselves of this circumstance.

* V. particularly Littera Crit. p. 41—58.

had

I say that they followed the course of the Umbro till they came to its mouth, although Port Telamon be eighteen miles nearer to Rome. But we learn from a passage of Frontinus's Stratagems, that they entered the plain at Colonia; and that the Boii posted ten thousand men in a wood in that neighbourhood. The consul Æmilius discovered the ambush, and cut the enemy in pieces. Critics, to whom the name of Colonia was unknown, have endeavoured in their usual way to explain or correct it. This place, now Colonna, was called Columnata in the middle ages; it is a village in the territory of Grossetto, between the mouth of the Umbro and Lake Castiglione, or Aprilis;* and was the scene of the battle, which derives its name from Port Telamon, a place far better known.

History informs us, that the consul Æmilius continued to follow the army of the Barbarians without venturing to provoke them to a battle; and that, by a singular chance, his colleague

* Littera Crit. p. 77—87.

Atilius, who had disembarked his army at Pisa, unexpectedly fell in with their vanguard; that a battle ensued, in which that consul was slain; while Æmilius, on his side, having also attacked the enemy, obtained a complete victory, destroyed the whole Barbarian army, and gave the mortal wound to the liberty of the Cisalpine Gauls. Of all those circumstances, I find most difficulty in understanding the surprise of Atilius. He could not have left his province of Sardinia without the orders of the senate. His instructions must have required him to gain information, both of the motions of the enemy and of those of his colleagues, in concert with whom he was to act. This duty was easily performed in a friendly country, where the consternation of the people and the flight of the peasants loudly proclaimed the approach of the Barbarians. In whatever manner this may be explained, the Gallic army, attacked in front and rear by two Roman consuls, advancing in contrary directions, will always, in my opinion, wear the aspect of a well-combined project, rather than of a military neglect, hardly conceivable. * * * *

Mr. Guazzesi* is of opinion that Tuscany formerly abounded in forests; and that the districts of Cortona, Arezzo, and Fæsulæ were entirely covered with them. The extent of the Ciminian wood is well known. In the year of the city 444, Livy tells us, that there was a forest near Clusium. During the Punic wars, the Romans brought their timber

* Littera Crit. p. 59—64.

timber for ship-building from Rusellæ, Perugia, and Clusium; and wood abounded in the territories of Sienna, Volaterra, and Populonium, whose inhabitants wrought the iron from the island of Elba. Flavius Vopiscus observes, that in the time of Aurelian there was a great quantity of wood near the Aurelian way; and Strabo extends the remark to all Tuscany. By digging into the Valdichiana, even near the surface, the workmen still find trees of a prodigious size, which are now petrified. Need we appeal to the ancient names and epithets of the country, la Farneta, Alberoso, Frassinetto, Cereto, la Selve; or to the obligations imposed on the communities in those parts, as late as the eleventh century, of furnishing yearly to their lords a certain number of wild boars?

AN EXAMINATION OF MALLET'S INTRODUCTION TO THE HISTORY OF DENMARK.

July 14, 1764.]—I read Mr. Mallet's Introduction to the History of Denmark, with a Translation of the Edda, the sacred book of the ancient Celts. We have now half a dozen of bibles, if we include our own. A valuable work might be written, giving a philosophical picture of religions, their genius, reasonings and influence on the manners, government, philosophy, and poetry of their respective votaries. Mr. Mallet is a man of sense and candour; he has carefully examined his subject, but treats it with more perspicuity than elegance. His great principle, that the religion of Odin formed that character of the northern nations, whose effects are still perceptible among ourselves, is judicious, in many respects well founded, and perfectly well illustrated. He makes excellent observations on the populousness of the North; tending to shew that the numerous swarms which issued from it in ancient times do not prove it to have been more populous than it is at present. The Edda supplied him with copious materials on the subject of religion and morals. In treating of government, he has not a voucher equally authentic, and is obliged to have recourse to Tacitus and analogy. These guides are not always to be trusted. Tacitus indeed comprehended Scandinavia under the name of Germany; but in his general description of the Germanic institutions, he had chiefly in view the nations with which he was best acquainted, those situate near the Rhine and the Danube. Besides, it is not certain that the religion of Odin is as old as the time of Tacitus. When that historian takes it for a truth certain and incontrovertible, that the Germans were indigenous, and that the purity of their blood was never corrupted by any foreign admixture, there is some difficulty in conceiving how he could be ignorant that a great Scythian colony had conquered Scandinavia one hundred and fifty years before his own times. I would rather suppose with Dalin, that Odin's migration happened in the reign of Trajan. That conqueror's design must have been greatly facilitated by the weakness of the Cimbri, and the slavery of the Sinones, sufficiently indicated in Tacitus. This æra tends to shew that the poverty of human invention, as well as the policy of prophets, always obliges them to enrich new religions at the expense of the old, and to mould them conformably to the national character. A religion inculcating the fear of death would have met with a very unfavourable reception among the Celts. The genius of Odin's superstition and morals prevailed among the Cimbri, who were long anterior to that legislator; and among the Celtiberians, who probably never heard of his name. As to the country from which the author of the Edda came, I would adopt the common tradition which fixes his ancient seat in the neighbourhood of the Tanais and the Palus Mæotis. I am not frightened at the greatness of the distance. Great journies are accomplished by savage nations; and their scanty geographical knowledge is often extended by accident. A Scythian of the tribe of Asæ, taken prisoner by his neighbours, may have passed through successive masters to the shore of the Baltic. At his return, he would describe the advantageous situation of the country, and the facility with which its conquest might be effected. Odin (we must suppose him a man of genius) would perceive, that the nations bordering on the empire were less ignorant, and more warlike, than those removed at a greater distance; and that the leader of a small tribe, who wished to found a great kingdom, must march against the northern extremity. The intermediate nations would gladly deliver themselves from a dangerous invader by granting to him a free passage; a favour which, in an age little skilled in the art of fortification, is of small importance; and which the heroical sincerity of barbarians seldom permitted them to abuse. The courses of the great rivers must have much facilitated his journey. He would sail up the Tanais and the Volga, to descend with the stream of the Dina to the neighbourhood of Riga. The sources of those rivers are not widely distant from each other; and when the land was less elevated by seventy-eight feet than it is at present, there may have been communications, now lost, between neighbouring seas. Odin established his worship in Scandinavia. Thence it spread among the northern nations of Germany called Saxons, by whom it was carried into England in the fifth century. In those countries only, I think, we ought to look for it: Mr. Mallet's system supposes it too extensive. I do not find in the Edda that Odin the conqueror of the North, and the priest of a god also named Odin, wished ever to pass himself for a divinity; nor that the Scandinavians ever worshipped deified men; a worship much rarer than is commonly imagined. Odin the conqueror boasted of being a magician; a pretension altogether inconsistent with that of his divinity.

reign

wished

July 16.]—I did not wish to proceed with Mr. Mallet's large history, which followed his introduction;

tion; this would have diverted me too much from my present pursuits; but I could not deny myself the pleasure of reading a detached part, relative to the conversion of Scandinavia, in order to see the downfall of Odin's superstition, of which I had beheld the establishment, and examined the principles. This subject is treated dryly, and without taste. An important question occurs, why the inhabitants of the North should have so obstinately rejected Christianity, while their countrymen established in the empire embraced it with the utmost readiness. Mr. Mallet will answer, that the latter consisted only of unsteady young men who had left their native country before they were thoroughly confirmed in the prejudices of their ancestors. Yet he well knows that several of those migrations were made by communities at large; and that the young men were accompanied by men far advanced in years, whose hearts and principles were no longer susceptible of change; by women whose weakness and timidity render them peculiarly prone to superstition; as well as by bards, priests, and prophetesses, who combated the new worship by every weapon that either custom, fear, or honour could supply. This explanation, therefore, will not answer the purpose. Neither do I think it probable that the leaders of the Barbarians embraced Christianity through policy, and ventured to provoke the conquerors, in order to ingratiate themselves with the conquered, whom they despised. Besides, those leaders of the Vandals and Burgundians embraced Arianism. Policy would would not have taught them to adopt the sentiments of the smallest portion of their subjects. I believe the true reason for the difference arose merely from this circumstance, that the one class left their country, whereas the other remained at home. I speak not here of the Saxons, who knew Christianity only by baptism and punishment; and whose love of liberty rejected that religion as a badge of the imperious laws imposed by Charlemagne. I have in view only those nations among whom Christianity appeared not as a conqueror or persecutor, but as a supplicant. All religions depend in some degree on local circumstances. The least superstitious Christian would feel more devotion on Mount Calvary than in London. Among learned nations reading and reflection, and among the nations of the East a natural warmth of fancy, supply, in some measure, the real presence of objects, and give to them in all times and in all places a mental existence. But mental representations are too subtile to make an impression on the phlegmatic insensibility of Scandinavians; and a missionary must have combated their faith with great disadvantage in their native country. The temple of Upsal in which they had purchased the favour of Odin by thousands of human victims; those rocks which the ancient Scaldi had covered with Runic characters, the more venerable because unintelligible; those mounts which religion had raised to the glory of their ancestors, and by which they hoped that their own would be perpetuated:—all these these objects kept possession of their minds, because they were continually striking their senses. But the nations of Germany, when transported into southern countries, lost hold of the firmest foundation of their faith. Temples, altars, tombs, and consecrated places were all on the side of a new religion, which naturally insinuated itself into the void of credulity left craving in their minds. They first wondered, and then believed. The changes produced by a new climate in their modes of life, and in the education of their children, tended to estrange them from a superstition better adapted to the banks of the Elbe than to those of the Tagus, and to forests than to cities. A barbarian, who had tasted the wine of Falernum, would not feel much desire of intoxicating himself with hydromel at Odin's festival; and when he panted under an African sun, a hell open to the north wind would not greatly excite his terror. His understanding would be improved, and his heart softened, in his perpetual intercourse with the vanquished; and every cause would concur to make him quit a mode of worship founded on ignorance and barbarism, and to substitute in its stead a religion connected with a science which he began to relish, and inculcating the virtues of humanity which he began to value. He was besides surrounded by a nation of missionaries, whose zeal was animated by a personal interest in the conversion of their masters, that those fierce tigers might be confined in the chains of religion. Bishops, priests, and women, who mingled caresses with con-controversy, were sedulous to convert the princes and great men, whose example was easily followed by that of the careless multitude. Such means of conversion are far more efficacious than those with which a few Benedictines are furnished, who travel into the woods of Sweden to preach patience, humility, and faith to numerous bands of pirates. These warriors either massacred the priests, or spared them through mere contempt. An apparent exception to this theory tends really to confirm it: the Saxons, who settled in England, were not converted till one hundred and fifty years after their establishment in that country. This happened, because they drove the ancient inhabitants into Wales; because the climate of England was not widely different from their own; and because this kingdom was the least polished of all the Roman provinces. But the same causes operated on the Saxons, though more slowly; and when they began to enjoy tranquillity at home, they readily embraced Christianity as taught them by the Roman missionaries.

A Protestant would also observe, that the Christianity of the tenth century is of far more difficult digestion than that of the fifth. It certainly is so to a man who reasons.

IN-

INTRODUCTION À L'HISTOIRE GÉNÉRALE DE LA RÉPUBLIQUE DES SUISSES.

Chapitre I.

Etat de l'Allemagne et de la Suisse—La Maison d'Autriche —La Noblesse—Le Clergé—Les Villes libres—Les trois Cantons populaires—Ambition d'Albert I.—Tyrannie de ses Gouverneurs—Conjuration—Soulèvement des Suisses—Mort d'Albert I.—Henri VII.—Fréderic d'Autriche et Louis de Bavière—Bataille de Morgarten —Alliance perpétuelle des trois Cantons—Fondation du Corps Helvétique.

La Suisse est située au milieu de l'Europe, entre la France, l'Italie, et l'Allemagne. Sa largeur, depuis Basle jusqu'au mont St. Bernard, est d'environ quarante-deux lieues, et sa plus grande étendue de Genève jusqu'au lac de Constance ne surpasse point soixante-dix lieues. Toute la partie méridionale et orientale de cette province est couverte par la masse énorme des Alpes, et compose le sommet de cette chaine de montagnes qui s'étend de la mer Adriatique jusqu'à la Méditerranée. C'est dans le sein de ces montagnes que les eaux du ciel se sont creusées mille réservoirs inépuisables, dont les canaux vont porter l'abondance jusques dans les extrémités de l'Europe. D'un côté, le Rhin, Rhin, qui sort du pied du mont St. Godard, embrasse dans les replis de son cours tranquille une grande partie du contour de la Suisse qu'il sépare aujourdhui de l'Allemagne. Sorti du lac de Constance il reçoit le tribut de l'Aar, de la Reuss, et du Limmat, qui se réunissent après avoir arrosé l'intérieur des terres. Il se tourne enfin du côté du Nord, et se perd dans les sables de la Hollande. Au midi le Rhone se précipite avec fureur de la même montagne, et court, à travers le lac de Genève, joindre sous les murs de Lyon ses eaux rapides aux eaux lentes de la Saône. Les Alpes s'abaissant insensiblement forment des côteaux moins ingrats, fertilisés par des mains libres et industrieuses. Ces montagnes se relèvent enfin de nouveau pour former cette chaine qui s'étend sous le nom de Jura depuis le Rhone jusqu'au Rhin, et qui sert de rempart à la Suisse contre la Bourgogne.

Vers la fin du treizième siècle, la Suisse étoit encore une province de l'empire d'Allemagne. Ce grand corps sortoit de l'anarchie, et sa constitution politique prenoit dès lors la forme singulière qu'elle a conservée jusqu'à nos jours. L'autorité impériale fut la victime d'une révolution que les événemens préparoient depuis longtems. Fréderic II. étoit digne d'un autre siècle et d'un sort plus heureux, mais il combattit avec plus de constance que de bonheur contre l'ambition des grands, le fanatisme des peuples, et la politique de la cour de Rome. Les villes Italiennes, devenues riches de leur commerce, et fières de leurs richesses, se rangeoient geoient avec ardeur sous l'étendard des pontifes qui étoit pour eux celui de la liberté. Pendant que l'empereur poursuivoit en Italie un fantôme de puissance qui lui échappoit toujours; les princes d'Allemagne brisèrent les foibles liens qui les attachoient encore à leur souverain, usurpèrent ses droits, ses domaines, et ses revenus; et s'arrogèrent dans leurs provinces respectives une autorité indépendante et héréditaire. La mort de Fréderic mit le comble aux désordres publics; et l'empire sembla rentrer dans cet état de nature, dans lequel chacun, libre du frein des loix, est l'ennemi de son semblable.

Après un interrègne de vingt-cinq ans les electeurs* cédèrent avec répugnance au cri de la nation qui leur demandoit un chef. Ils s'assemblèrent enfin à Francfort, et ce fut Rodolphe, Comte de Habsbourg, qui réunit les suffrages d'une assemblée dont il méritoit l'estime et dont il n'excitoit point la jalousie. Ses vertus justifièrent leur choix. Son administration, à la fois douce et ferme, rendit bientôt la paix à l'empire, et la vigueur aux loix. Il ne se laissa jamais séduire par la vaine ambition de faire valoir sur l'Italie les droits d'un empire Romain qui n'existoit plus. Il respecta toujours les droits et même les usurpations des princes, et 1272.

Struv. Corpus Hist. German. p. 513. Guilliman. Habsburgica, l. vi. c. iv.

* Les empereurs étoient anciennement choisis par le corps entier de la noblesse Allemande. Vers ce tems-ci les sept grands officiers de la maison impériale, qui avoient toujours eu une part distinguée dans les élections, commençoient à y prétendre un droit exclusif. La prétension leur réussit et fut enfin confirmée par la bulle d'or.

préféra sagement son repos et celui de la patrie, aux prétensions ambitieuses d'une dignité, qui alloit peut-être passer en des mains étrangères. Il borna tous ses projets à l'établissement de sa maison : les empereurs conservoient encore le droit de conférer de nouveau l'investiture des fiefs toutes les fois qu'ils étoient dévolus à l'empire. Les malheurs de ce siècle offrirent à Rodolphe les plus heureuses occasions pour exercer ce droit en faveur de ses enfans. Lorsqu'il eut affermi son autorité par dix ans de victoire, il assembla tous les ordres de l'état dans la diette d'Augsbourg ; sous les yeux de cette assemblée, Albert et Rodolphe,* ses deux fils, reçurent de leur père les duchés d'Autriche et de Suabe ; deux provinces qui n'avoient plus de maître depuis la mort de Fréderic et de Conradin, que leur malheureux destin avoit conduits à Naples pour y périr sur un échafaud. Ces jeunes princes étoient les derniers rejetons des anciennes maisons de Suabe et d'Autriche.

V. Struvii Syntagma Hist. Germanicæ, p. 525. not. 90.

Giannone, Hist. Civile di Napoli, tom. ii. p. 537.

Le duché d'Autriche étoit un des plus beaux fiefs de l'empire. Ses plaines fertiles étoient couvertes d'un peuple nombreux, accoutumé aux armes par les guerres continuelles qu'il avoit à soutenir contre les Hongrois et les Bohémiens. La libéralité de Fréderic Barberousse avoit affranchi les souverains d'Autriche de tous les devoirs onéreux d'un membre de l'empire ; pendant qu'ils en conservoient les honneurs et tous les avantages.

Æneæ Sylvii. Hist. Frederic. III. p. 2, &c. Edit. Boecleri.

Diplom. ad calcem Æneæ Sylv. p. 1.

* Le Duc Rodolphe mourut avant son père.

Le

Le duché de Suabe ou d'Allemannie étoit d'une grande étendue ; puisqu'il comprenoit les pays dans lesquels les anciens Allemans s'étoient établis ; le cercle de Suabe, l'Alsace, et la plus grande partie de la Suisse. Ses ducs donnèrent souvent la couronne impériale, et la portèrent eux-mêmes pendant plus d'un siècle. L'Empereur Philippe de Suabe acheta le premier la fidélité de ses vassaux au prix de ses droits et de ses domaines qu'il leur abandonnoit. Fréderic II. se vit attaqué par une foule d'ennemis qui vouloient mériter le ciel en déchirant le patrimoine d'un tyran condamné par l'église. Le parti des pontifes se croyoit en droit de lui tout arracher ; ses amis se contentoient de lui tout demander. L'interrègne anéantit les débris de l'autorité des ducs de Suabe ; et lorsque les fils de Rodolphe furent revêtus de ce vain titre, ils ne reçurent qu'un domaine difficile à retrouver et une souveraineté qu'on ne reconnoissoit plus. Une seule circonstance rendoit cet établissement d'un grand prix aux yeux des comtes de Habsbourg. Ils y étoient situés au sein de leur patrie. Vers le concours de l'Aar et de la Reuss, s'élevoit un ancien château bâti sur les masures de Vindonisse plus ancienne encore.* Par la foible lueur qui Guilliman. de Rebus Helveticis, l. i. c. 8.

Struv. Syntagma Hist. Germ. p. 433.

Guilliman. de Reb. Helvet. l iii. Simler, de Republic. Helvet. l. i.

V. Guillimanni Habsburgica.

* Une assez petite enceinte contient des monumens de tous les siècles. On peut tracer encore les ruines de Vindonisse, ville Romaine, ruinée au quatrième siècle par les Allemans contre lesquels elle avoit servi de rempart. Elle étoit le siège de la vingt-unième légion, et des premiers évêques de Constance. Un peu plus loin le donjon de Habsbourg nous offre l'image de la tyrannie féodale

V. Guilliman. de Rebus Helvetiorum, l. i. c. iii. Etat et Délices de la Suisse. tom. ii. p. 174-186.

qui éclaire ces tems ténébreux, on peut y découvrir les ayeux de Rodolphe vers le commencement du onzième siècle, et suivre sans interruption les progrès d'une noblesse qui se démontre par les preuves ordinaires, par les croisades, les tournois, les brigandages, et les fondations pieuses. Au bien de ses pères,* Rodolphe avoit ajouté le riche héritage de sa mère, fille unique du dernier des anciens comtes de Kybourg. Un domaine qui s'étendoit sur la plus belle partie de la Suisse, l'éclat de la dignité impériale, et des conjonctures heureuses lui permirent d'espérer qu'il pourroit un jour faire reconnoître les loix de la maison d'Autriche depuis le lac de Constance jusqu'à celui de Genève.† Trente féodale et le berceau de vingt empereurs. Les débris encore plus considérables de l'abbaye de Konigsfeld nous montrent les trophées abattus de la superstition. Enfin la petite ville de Bruck, qui termine le paysage, nous présente dans son industrie et sa propreté un objet de comparaison assez favorable au siècle dans lequel nous vivons.

Guilliman. Habsburgica, l. vi. c. 4.

V. Tschudi, p. i. p. 222.

* Rodolphe possédoit cinq des plus beaux comtés de la haute Allemagne; savoir, ceux de Habsbourg, de Kybourg, de Lentzbourg, de Bade, et de Frobourg, avec les villes de Bremgarten, Mellingen, Siersée et Sempach; celles de Zoffinguen, Arau et Bruck dans l'Argew, les villes de Winterthur, de Frowenfeld, et de Diessenhofen dans la Turgovie, avec les pays de Gastern et de Zug, et beaucoup d'autres bourgs et villages. Le comté de Bade et le canton de Zug ont toujours conservé leurs anciennes limites; l'Argew et la Turgovie sont assez connues. Il est difficile de désigner avec clarté les autres territoires qui sont engloutis dans les cantons de Zurich et de Lucerne dont ils comprenoient presque tout le plat pays.

V. Guilliman. de Rebus Helvetiorum, l. ii. iii.

† Les Allemands et les Bourguignons partagèrent la Suisse, depuis le cinquième siècle, en deux portions assez inégales, mais qui Trente ans d'intrigues et de combats lui avoient développé cette variété confuse de mœurs, d'intérêts, et de préjugés, qu'on n'éprouve que parmi les peuples libres ; et lui avoient enseigné l'art de les ramener toujours à un seul point qu'il ne perdoit jamais de vue. Il conserva sur le trône impérial l'humble simplicité de son premier état. Maître des esprits, il les subjuguoit également par l'amour et par la terreur ; et son ambition artificieuse étoit d'autant plus redoutable qu'elle ne se montroit jamais que sous les dehors de la franchise et de la modération. La conquête importante qu'il méditoit ne pouvoit être le fruit que du tems et de la patience. L'Empereur Rodolphe ne travailla point sans succès ; la mort enfin l'obligea de laisser à son fils Albert ses desseins imparfaits, son exemple, et ses maximes. Mais la politique dépend moins de la raison que du caractère. De celui de son père, Albert n'avoit hérité que l'ambition et la valeur. Un naturel dur et féroce, qui se développa en lui dès sa plus tendre jeunesse, effraya tous les électeurs et donna la préférence à son rival Adolphe, comte de Nassau ; mais la conduite imprudente du nouvel qui furent toujours distinguées par les loix et le langage ; la Reuss et ensuite l'Aar marquoient leurs frontières. L'Allemannie fit toujours partie du royaume d'Austrasie, et ensuite de l'empire. La Bourgogne Transjurane, (c'est ainsi qu'elle se nommoit,) conquise par les François, eut ensuite ses rois particuliers, dont le dernier le laissa par testament à l'Empereur Conrad le Salique en 1032. Les ducs de Zeringen la gouvernèrent longtems au nom de l'empire. Dans l'anarchie qui suivit la mort de Berchtold V. dernier duc de Zeringen, ces divisions de la Suisse commençoient insensiblement à se confondre.

V. la Chronique de Jean de Winterthur, auteur presque contemporain, p. 7—11.

1291

V. Struv. Syntagma Hist. Germ. p. 536-544.

De Watteville, Hist. de la Confédération Helvet. tom. i. p. 18.

1032.

1218.

empereur les fit bientôt repentir du choix qu'ils venoient de faire. Albert sut profiter du mécontentement général pour soulever toute l'Allemagne contre un prince qu'elle méprisoit. Une guerre civile décida de leurs droits, et le malheureux Adolphe périt par la main du duc d'Autriche qui fut reconnu par toute l'empire pour son souverain légitime. Mais il apporta sur le trône l'orgueil d'un vainqueur et tous les préjugés d'un chef de parti, et sa conduite se ressentit souvent de l'influence de ces passions.

Une noblesse aussi nombreuse qu'indépendante formoit le premier obstacle aux desseins ambitieux de Rodolphe et de son fils. Cinquante comtes, cent cinquante barons, et près de mille gentilshommes, écrasoient du poids de leurs châteaux la terre qui les portoit, et ils se faisoient tous une gloire de ne relever que de l'empire et de leur épée. Il étoit plus aisé de flatter que de dompter l'orgueil de cet ordre guerrier, tour à tour esclave et rival de ses princes, mais toujours ennemi du peuple, des loix, et de la liberté.* Les ducs d'Autriche se plaisoient à le rassembler souvent à leur cour dans des tournois brillans, à adoucir la grossièreté de ses mœurs par les institutions vertueuses de la chevalerie, à le conduire aux combats et à la victoire.† Comblés d'honneurs et de richesses, ces fiers

Leu, Dictionnaire Historique de la Suisse, au mot Adel.

V. Tschudi, Leu, Guilliman. Simler, Chronic. Joan. Vitoduran. &c.

* Je dois bientôt parler d'une exception rare et peut-être unique à cette maxime générale.

† Dès son berceau la maison d'Autriche a adopté la maxime des tyrans, de gagner les militaires et de mépriser le peuple. Werner, évêque de Strasbourg, avoit donné, vers l'an 1026, une somme très fiers gentilshommes revoyoient enfin leurs foyers domestiques; pleins d'attachement pour leur bienfaiteur, et de mépris pour leur triste indépendance, dont les avantages ne subsistoient que par le malheur public. Les châteaux étoient les asyles de l'injustice, et le commerce étoit interrompu par un brigandage honteux. Rodolphe et son fils arrêtèrent bientôt ce désordre par la destruction d'un grand nombre des forteresses des plus coupables. Tout l'empire applaudit à leur punition, et l'autorité des ducs d'Autriche se confondoit avec celle des loix. Tout fléchit sous leur joug, et se reconnut vassal de la maison de Habsbourg, à l'exception d'un très petit nombre de comtes parmi lesquels nous devons distinguer les comtes de Savoye, qui s'étoient rendus maîtres du pays de Vaud, et qui jettoient dans le silence les fondemens de leur grandeur future.

Guilliman. Habsburgica, l. iv. c. 3.

Les Mémoires sur la Chevalerie par M. de St. Palaye.

L'ordre ecclésiastique avoit plus acquis par la politique que la noblesse n'avoit arraché par la violence. Les évêques de Basle et de Constance étoient au rang des plus grands princes; plusieurs abbés leur cédoient à peine, et la Suisse étoit remplie de maisons religieuses sur lesquelles la sainte très considérable à son frère Ratbot pour construire le château de Habsbourg. Lorsqu'il le visita peu de tems après il se montra peu content de la diligence de son frère. Attendez, lui dit Ratbot, à demain. Le lendemain matin, l'évêque vit avec effroi une troupe nombreuse et armée qui entouroit le château. Cette troupe, lui dit son frère, est composée de toute la noblesse des environs que mes largesses ont attaché à notre maison. Voilà les fortifications que vous désiriez. En connoissez vous de plus fortes?

profusion des fidèles avoit versé les biens de la terre. Ces ecclésiastiques méprisoient tous les arts auxquels leurs prédécesseurs avoient dû leur grandeur; et le peuple ne les distinguoit des laïques que par la supériorité de leur faste et de leur orgueil. Il auroit été cependant dangereux de les dépouiller de ces biens consacrés par la superstition, s'ils n'avoient pas eux-mêmes consenti à les remettre aux ducs d'Autriche. Les uns leur vendirent le patrimoine de l'église pour enrichir leurs familles aux dépens de l'ordre. Les autres les reçurent pour maîtres sous le nom d'Avoués ou Ministres.* L'évêque de Basle, l'abbé de St. Gall et l'abbesse de Zurich, eurent cependant le courage de résister aux menaces et aux insinuations de Rodolphe et de son fils.

Si l'église possédoit des richesses immenses, l'histoire, qui juge les hommes sans faveur et sans malignité, doit avouer que leur source n'a pas toujours été impure, et que leur emploi a souvent été utile aux hommes. Dans le tems qu'une noblesse

V. Muratori, Dissertationi sopra le Antichità Italiane, lvi—lxxiv.

* Pour se former une idée des causes de la grandeur ecclésiastique et de sa décadence, j'ose renvoyer mes lecteurs aux dissertations du savant Muratori sur les Antiquités Italiennes. Ils y trouveront une érudition profonde, une bonne critique, et une sage hardiesse. Il a écrit pour l'Italie, mais ses grands principes et même la plûpart de ses détails sont communs à tous les pays qui ont composé l'empire de Charlemagne. Il sembleroit que dans ces siècles barbares deux passions opposées régnoient à la fois: l'une de tout donner à l'église; et l'autre de lui tout arracher. Le même homme éprouvoit souvent toutes les deux; et la vieillesse n'étoit occupée qu'à restituer les sacrilèges de la jeunesse.

barbare

barbare ne se livroit qu'aux travaux destructeurs de la guerre et de la chasse, le flambeau sacré des arts se conservoit entre les mains des prêtres. Des terres considérables, quelquefois des provinces entières, devenoient la récompense de leurs arts pieux, mais c'étoient, pour la plûpart, des marais à dessécher, des forêts à défricher, des déserts qu'il falloit cultiver. La terre changea bientôt de face; des milliers d'esclaves qui fuyoient de toutes parts la tyrannie de leurs maîtres, se réfugioient au pied des autels et se consacroient eux et leur postérité au service du saint, protecteur de l'église. Des communautés nombreuses se formoient autour de ces églises. On vit naître des citoyens, des loix, et des remparts. La plûpart des villes de l'Allemagne et de la Suisse n'ont point d'autre origine. L'humanité dirai-je, ou la politique, de leurs maîtres les affranchit bientôt de la servitude à laquelle elles s'étoient condamnées, et l'industrie, qui marche à la suite de la liberté, leur fournit le moyen de se racheter des devoirs les plus onéreux. Leurs privilèges n'étoient point les mêmes. Les unes, décorées du titre imposant de villes impériales, paroissoient libres et souveraines. Les autres dépendoient presqu'en tout de leur évêque ou de leur abbé; mais elles avoient toutes un conseil qui rendoit la justice, et une bannière qui rassembloit la bourgeoisie lorsqu'elle vouloit prendre les armes. Convaincues des avantages de leur situation, plusieurs de ces communautés avoient stipulé que leur prince ne les céderoit jamais à de nouveaux maîtres; mais cette condition n'empêcha point l'abbé de Murbach bach de vendre à l'Empereur Albert la ville de Lucerne ; et ce fut au mépris de ses sermens que l'abbesse de Seckingen reçut ce prince et ses descendans pour ses avoués perpétuels dans le pays de Glaris. Basle, Zurich, Soleure, St. Gall, Schaffhausen, et plusieurs autres villes de la Suisse, ne subirent point le même joug. Elles en furent sauvées par leurs propres forces ou par la fidélité des prélats qui les gouvernoient.

1179. 1191. Les deux villes de Berne et de Fribourg jouissoient d'une liberté encore plus entière, et dont l'origine commune remontoit à leur fondateur Berchtold V. duc de Zeringen. Ce prince, dans le dessein de s'en faire un rempart contre la noblesse de ses états, leur donna une situation avantageuse, des privilèges sans bornes, et une constitution toute militaire. Il mourut après leur avoir recommandé de s'aimer toujours et de ne jamais pardonner à ces barons qui avoient fait périr la maison de leur bienfaiteur. Fribourg, la moins puissante des deux villes, oublia bientôt un conseil aussi dangereux, et chercha le repos et la sureté dans la soumission à la maison d'Autriche. Berne soutint son indépendance avec plus de fermeté, se choisit plus d'une fois des protecteurs, mais ne voulut jamais de maître, s'exerça aux vertus militaires et politiques, remporta des victoires sur les seigneurs qui l'entouroient, osa résister même à l'Empereur Rodolphe, et vit échouer au pied de ses remparts la fortune de ce monarque.

Leu, Dictionnaire Historique, aux mots Berne et Fribourg. Guilliman. de Reb. Helvetiorum, l. iii. c. 8 et 9. Simler de Repub. Helvet. p. 20.

Toutes ces villes étoient le fruit lent du tems et des des travaux humains; mais il existoit dans le fond des Alpes, des sociétés obscures, dont la liberté mâle et vigoureuse sembloit être l'ouvrage de la seule nature. Les trois cantons d'Uri, de Schwitz, et d'Underwald, formoient un pays qui s'étendoit près de seize lieues du nord au midi, et dont la plus grande largeur d'orient en occident étoit de douze lieues. Le Mont St. Godard, borne méridionale de ce territoire, parmi les eaux qu'il verse sur l'Europe entière, laisse échapper un torrent qui traverse, sous le nom de Reuss, le long et étroit vallon d'Uri, et se jette enfin dans un lac qui sépare le canton de Schwitz de ceux d'Underwald et de Lucerne. Tout ce pays est couvert de montagnes, dont les sommets ne découvrent à la vue que des rochers escarpés et des forêts de sapins toujours courbés sous le poids des neiges. Leurs côtes offrent cependant en été une nourriture abondante aux troupeaux de bétail qui font la richesse du paysan, et une branche assez lucrative de son commerce rustique.* On a porté l'industrie jusqu'à semer du bled dans les vallons les moins stériles; mais leur récolte foible et incertaine trompe souvent l'espérance du laboureur, et

V. Leu, Simler, Guilliman. Etat et Délices de la Suisse.

* Oswald Myconius, de Lucerne, nous a donné, au commencement du seizième siècle, un commentaire fort utile sur un très mauvais poëme de son ami Henri Glareanus. Il s'extasie sur le grand commerce de beurre et de fromage que font ses compatriotes en Bourgogne, en Suabe et en Italie. Suivant son calcul un troupeau de vingt vaches rapporte à son propriétaire une somme claire et nette de cent écus par an. Ce trait est bien fort pour le seizième siècle.

V. le Poëme et Commentaire dans le Thesaurus Historiæ Helveticæ, à Zurich, 1735.

le

le contraint de recourir aux secours étrangers. Un air vif, une terre ingrate, une vie dure avoient formé le caractère de ce peuple. Il leur devoit un corps grand et robuste, des passions impétueuses, des appétits grossiers mais vigoureux, des mœurs simples et vertueuses. La Suisse chérissoit sa famille et ses compagnons, respectoit la religion et les loix, méprisoit la fatigue, bravoit la mort, et ne craignoit que l'infamie. La liberté lui étoit chère, et cette indépendance qui nait de l'égalité des fortunes et du sentiment de ses forces, étoit le premier ressort de son âme. Le gouvernement des trois cantons étoit celui de la nature, et ce gouvernement s'est perpétué jusques à nos jours. Le pouvoir législatif se conservoit dans l'assemblée générale des citoyens. Tous les rangs y étoient confondus, tous les suffrages y étoient égaux, et ce peuple roi, jaloux de sa dignité, ne confioit à ses magistrats annuels que l'autorité nécessaire au maintien des loix et de l'ordre. Le noble et le paysan, confondus dans ces assemblées, apprenoient à se respecter mutuellement, et s'accoutumoient à penser que la première distinction parmi les hommes est celle des talens utiles à la société.

Tschudi, tom i. p. 236.

Je pardonne aux historiens Suisses les fables dont ils ont cru embellir les premiers tems de l'histoire de leur nation, mais je dois épargner à un siècle philosophe les Taurisques, les Huns, les Goths, parmi lesquels ils leur ont cherché des ancêtres. Ce n'est qu'au commencement du douzième siècle que j'apperçois les cantons d'Uri, de Schwitz, et d'Underwald, distingués en trois communautés 1114.

munautés libres et alliées, indépendantes mais soumises à l'empire, et à son chef, qui leur envoyoit quelquefois des juges pour décider en dernier ressort des affaires criminelles. Un arrêt que l'Empereur Conrad III. rendit contre eux, leur parut un acte d'injustice qu'ils ne devoient point supporter; ils lui annonçèrent par une déclaration publique, " Qu'ils s'étoient mis volontairement sous la protection de l'empire; qu'ils l'avoient mérité, cette protection, par des services importans; qu'elle leur devenoit inutile et dangereuse; et qu'ils y renonçoient à jamais pour eux et pour leur posterité." Ils persistèrent plus d'un siècle dans cette résolution qui bravoit l'autorité impériale. Othon IV. et Fréderic II. les engagèrent enfin à recevoir de leurs mains des juges et baillifs. Ce fut alors qu'ils obtinrent ce diplome célèbre qui reconnoît leur indépendance, reçoit leur libre hommage et promet de ne les jamais séparer du corps de l'empire. Pendant le grand interrègne ils prirent Rodolphe de Habsbourg pour leur défenseur, et ce prince, lorsqu'il fut monté sur le trône impérial, leur continua sa protection, et n'attenta jamais à leurs privilèges.

Leu, Dictionnaire Historique, au mot Schwitz.

1144.

Tschudi, tom. i. p. 73.

1249. Guilliman, l. ii. c. 16.

Simler, de Repub. Helvet. l. i. p. 4. inter Scriptores Thesauri.

Son fils Albert avoit conçu des desseins bien différens. Il voyoit d'un œil d'indignation qu'au milieu même de ses états une poignée de montagnards osât encore se nommer libre. Il résolut d'employer à la fois toutes les forces de sa maison et toute l'autorité de sa place pour les réduire sous le joug Autrichien. Il étoit assez injuste pour les reprocher la fidélité qu'ils avoient gardée à l'Empereur reur Adolphe, et dans sa colère il lui étoit échappé une menace de les punir aussi bien que de les soumettre. Ce fut en vain que les trois cantons travaillèrent à regagner sa bienveillance et à obtenir la confirmation de leurs privilèges qu'ils lui demandèrent par des députations réitérées. Pendant qu'il renvoyoit cet acte de justice, sous les prétextes les plus frivoles, il traitoit secrètement avec les corps ecclésiastiques qui possédoient des droits ou des terres dans ces pays. Le collège de Munster lui remit toutes ses prétensions dans le canton d'Underwald, et l'abbaye de Wettingen lui vendit tous les services qu'une partie des habitans de Schwitz devoit à son église. La préfecture du val d'Urseren, dont il conféra en même tems le fief à son fils, le rendoit maître du passage des monts et de tout le commerce du canton d'Uri. Il se flattoit encore que les Suisses, accoutumés à passer souvent sur ses terres, puiseroient dans la conversation de ses sujets des idées plus favorables à l'autorité souveraine.

1298. Tschudi, tom. i. p. 217. &c.

Guilliman. l. ii. c. 16.

1300. Tschudi, tom. i. p. 225.

Ces projets auroient peut-être réussi, si le caractère impatient d'Albert lui eut permis d'en attendre le fruit. Déjà persuadé que tous les obstacles étoient levés, et que les trois cantons étoient disposés à le reconnoître pour leur souverain, il leur envoya une ambassade composée des ministres les plus distingués de sa cour, et chargée de recevoir leur hommage et leurs sermens. Ils étoient instruits de toutes les raisons qu'ils devoient employer; les forces de la maison d'Autriche, la foiblesse de l'empire Germanique, tous les avantages d'une soumission mission volontaire, et les droits affreux d'une conquête, à laquelle ils étoient hors d'état de s'opposer. Ils devoient ajouter que les droits dont l'empereur avoit fait l'acquisition embrassoient dans leur totalité le pays entier, et lui deviendroient plus incommodes que les services qu'un grand roi exige de ses vassaux. On entendit les ministres impériaux dans les assemblées générales de chaque canton. La réponse qu'on leur fit, fut la même partout, et partout unanime: " Que les Suisses acceptoient avec plaisir l'amitié de la maison d'Autriche, qu'ils révéroient la majesté impériale, mais qu'ils n'étoient soumis qu'à l'empire, dont ils avoient tant de fois soutenu la gloire et les intérêts. Qu'il ne leur étoit pas permis de délibérer sur les propositions d'Albert. Qu'ils en appelloient aux constitutions de l'empire, aux diplômes de ses prédécesseurs, à la mémoire de son père, et à ses propres devoirs. Qu'ils étoient prêts à rendre aux maisons religieuses tous les services auxquels la piété de leurs ayeux les avoit assujettis, mais qu'ils ne permettroient point qu'on vendît la liberté des hommes et ne sacrifieroient jamais celle de leur postérité."

Albert fut vivement irrité d'un refus aussi naturel, mais qu'il n'attendoit point: cependant la prudence l'engagea à dissimuler son indignation. Les Suisses avoient fait valoir le titre de membres libres de l'empire, titre autrefois méprisable à leurs yeux, mais que la puissance Autrichienne leur rendoit maintenant très précieux. En attaquant un peuple reconnu libre et qui invoquoit ce nom sacré, il risquoit d'alarmer la jalousie de toute l'Allemagne.

Tschudi, tom. i. p. 231. V. Simler et Guilliman.

magne. Le feu de la discorde couvoit sous sa cendre et le sort d'Adolphe étoit une leçon effrayante pour son successeur. Sans perdre de vue ses desseins sur les trois cantons, ce prince orgueilleux ne dédaigna point de substituer l'art à la force. Après avoir vainement essayé de soumettre les Suisses à ses tribunaux de Lucerne et de Zug, et de confondre la juridiction Autrichienne avec celle de l'empire, il leur accorda enfin ce que leurs instances 1304. réitérées lui demandoient depuis six ans,—des gouverneurs qui décidassent leurs causes criminelles au nom de l'empire. Il leur en donna effectivement, mais qui ne ressembloient que par le nom à ceux que ses prédécesseurs leur avoient envoyés. Ceux-ci étoient tirés de la première noblesse des provinces voisines et ne visitoient jamais le pays des Suisses que lorsqu'ils y étoient appellés pour tenir leurs assises générales. A la place de ces ministres bienfaisans de la paix et de l'ordre, les Suisses virent arriver avec effroi deux satellites du tyran; gentilshommes à la vérité, mais encore plus disposés, par cette qualité, à écraser un peuple qu'ils méprisoient. Gesler, l'un de ces gouverneurs, avoit le département d'Uri et de Schwitz. Landenberg, son collègue, devoit contenir le canton d'Underwald. Ils s'établirent dans les plus forts châteaux du pays dont la maison d'Autriche avoit 1304, &c. fait l'acquisition, travaillèrent à rétablir leurs fortifications, et les assurèrent par de bonnes garnisons de troupes mercénaires.

On voit avec surprise que les Suisses se soient soumis, sans la moindre résistance, à un joug qui ne leur leur laissoit qu'un vain nom de liberté. Mais il y a des occasions où les nations semblent oublier leur caractère. L'autorité de l'empire, les forces de l'Autriche, et la hardiesse adroite avec laquelle Albert se servoit de l'un et de l'autre étonnèrent leur courage et ne leur laissèrent que le sentiment de leur misère. 1304, &c. Guilliman. de Reb. Hel. l. iii. c. 16. Simler, de Repub. Helvet. p. 5. Tschudi, tom. i. p. 231.

Les premières démarches des gouverneurs paroissoient dictées par un esprit d'humanité et de clémence; mais lorsqu'ils virent que leurs artifices ne captivoient point l'esprit grossièrement libre de ces montagnards, ils se livrèrent avec plaisir à leur dureté naturelle et aux instructions de leurs maîtres. Un despotisme militaire succéda aux loix douces et égales que les Suisses avoient reçues de leurs ancêtres. On violoit journellement tous leurs anciens privilèges; des fautes légères ou supposées étoient punies par des amendes excessives et arbitraires; les citoyens, arrachés du sein de leurs familles, gémissoient au fond des cachots, pendant que leurs compatriotes, accablés sous le poids des impôts et des corvées, étoient contraints à travailler aux forteresses qui montroient et confirmoient leur esclavage. A l'oppression, que le peuple peut quelquefois pardonner, les ministres de la tyrannie Autrichienne ajoutèrent encore le mépris qu'il ne pardonne jamais. Sur la place publique d'Altorf, bourg principal du canton d'Uri, Gesler fit dresser une perche sur laquelle on posa son chapeau. Il prétendoit que tous les passans rendissent à ce chapeau les mêmes honneurs qu'ils eussent rendus à la personne de l'empereur ou à celle de son représentant.

1304, &c. présentant. Cette cérémonie humiliante servoit à la fois à satisfaire l'orgueil ridicule d'un tyran et à découvrir ces âmes libres qui conservoient encore les sentimens et la fierté de leur premier état.

Tschud. tom. i. p. 234. On s'attachoit surtout à connoître ceux dont les conseils avoient détourné leurs concitoyens de se soumettre à l'empereur, et qui jouissoient parmi eux de la considération que leurs vertus avoient méritée. L'estime publique dénonça au gouverneur d'Underwald, Henri de Melchtal pour sa première victime. Ce paysan respectable cultivoit en paix le champ de ses pères, lorsqu'un ministre de Landenberg lui déclara qu'il venoit enlever les bœufs de sa charrue, comme l'amende imposée à une faute qu'avoit commis son fils ainé. Cet officier s'acquitta de sa commission avec tout l'orgueil de la servitude, et menaça les paysans de leur faire traîner eux-mêmes la charrue. Le sage vieillard soupira et se tut; mais son fils, excité par l'ardeur aveugle de la jeunesse, résista à l'officier qui alloit emmener les bœufs, lui cassa le doigt d'un coup de bâton, et se réfugia par une fuite précipité dans le canton d'Uri. Il fut assez puni en laissant son malheureux père exposé à toute la cruauté de Landenberg. Le gouverneur le fit arrêter dans le vain espoir de découvrir la retraite de son fils, mais enfin furieux de voir qu'il ne pouvoit lui arracher ce secret, il confisqua son bien et lui fit crever les yeux.

Tschudi, tom. i. p. 231, 232, 233.

L'honneur des femmes tient aux sentimens les plus délicats du cœur humain; et les attentats qui portent le trouble et l'amertume dans le sein des familles familles ont donné naissance à plus d'une révolu- 1304, &c.

tion. Le jeune Wolfenscheissen de Rotzberg, sous les ordres de Landenberg, traversoit le pays suivi seulement de deux domestiques, lorsqu'il apperçut la femme d'un paysan qui travailloit dans un pré. Il s'arrêta un moment pour la considérer, et ne vit point sans émotion une beauté modeste, embellie par la joie, la santé, et la pudeur. Il commença l'entretien par lui demander des nouvelles de son mari. Le bon Boumgarten ne travailloit que dans le bois voisin, mais son épouse craintive, qui voyoit dans le baillif un ministre de vengeance plutôt que de graces, supposa un voyage dont elle ignoroit, disoit-elle, et l'objet et la durée. Charmé d'une occasion aussi heureuse, le gouverneur la pria de le conduire chez elle pour lui donner quelque rafraichissement dont il avoit besoin. Ce fut là qu'il lui déclara les désirs qu'elle lui avoit inspirés, la pressa de les satisfaire, la félicita de se voir associée aux plaisirs de son maître, et lui laissa entrevoir le danger d'un refus imprudent. Elle le sentoit elle-même, et son effroi, qui avoit changé d'objet, étoit l'unique sentiment de son âme. Elle étoit seule, elle connoissoit la puissance du gouverneur, elle n'ignoroit point son caractère, et se crut enfin perdue lorsqu'il lui commanda de lui préparer un bain et d'y entrer avec lui. L'art est naturel aux femmes; heureuses qui ne la font servir qu'aux intérêts de la vertu! Seigneur, lui répondit-elle, en baissant les yeux, épargnez la pudeur d'une femme qui vous aime. C'est ma première foiblesse—nous ne sommes pas seuls—vos domes-1304, &c. tiques——Je vais les renvoyer, lui dit le gouverneur transporté. Dès qu'elle les vit partis elle ne vouloit se déshabiller que dans une chambre voisine du bain. Elle obtint sans peine cette grace d'un amant qui ménageoit une pudeur dont il alloit triompher. Elle en profita pour s'échapper de la maison et pour courir du côté du bois, lorsqu'elle vit son mari qui quittoit son travail pour revenir à la maison. Le désordre de sa femme, ses soupirs, et ses mots entrecoupés, lui apprirent le danger auquel elle s'étoit dérobé. Dieu soit béni, lui dit-il, ma chère épouse! aujourdhui il t'a conservé l'honneur et à moi le repos. L'insolent—mais la vengeance est juste et je cours l'achever. Il trouve le gouverneur déjà au bain, nud et sans armes, et lui fend la tête d'un coup de sa hache. Le canton d'Uri devint son asyle et le cacha aux yeux de ses ennemis. Le gouverneur de Landenberg voulut persuader aux autres seigneurs de Wolfenscheissen de poursuivre le meurtrier de leur frère, mais ils lui répondirent que leur frère avoit mérité son sort, et le courroux d'un mari irrité, condamné par les loix, fut justifié par les sentimens d'un peuple vertueux.

Tschudi, tom. i. p. 232. La mort de Wolfenscheissen avoit délivré le pays d'un tyran; mais il gémissoit toujours sous le poids de la tyrannie. Les trois cantons prirent enfin la résolution de faire un dernier effort auprès de l'empereur. Leurs députés étoient chargés de repré-

1307. senter l'excés de leur maux, et de supplier Albert de rappeller ses ministres, et de ne plus mettre sa gloire à opprimer un peuple qui le respectoit toujours. Ce prince orgueilleux ne daigna point les voir;

voir; mais il les renvoya à son conseil dont le ton dur et inflexible n'annonçoit que trop clairement les dispositions de leur maître. On leur dit sans détour, que pour mériter les bienfaits de l'empereur il falloit reconnoître son autorité, mais qu'ils éprouveroient son indignation, aussi longtems qu'ils oseroient reclamer leur liberté prétendue. 1307

Le retour des deputés répandit le désespoir dans tout le pays; mais le désespoir d'un peuple guerrier est voisin de la fureur. On entendoit partout les cris d'une indignation qu'on ne daignoit plus dissimuler. " Pourquoi fléchir plus longtems sous le joug d'un maître dont l'orgueil s'accroît avec notre lâche patience? On viole nos privilèges; on nous dépouille de nos biens, mais il nous reste des armes; nous sommes libres dès que nous voulons l'être." Les malheurs de la patrie faisoient l'entretien de tous les bons citoyens. Ils pleuroient ces malheurs, mais ils craignoient la puissance Autrichienne. Tous les esprits étoient disposés à la révolte, mais il leur manquoit encore un esprit supérieur qui donnât le mouvement à cette grande entreprise.

Werner de Stauffacher sortoit d'une des premières familles du pays de Schwitz, qui respectoit encore la mémoire de son père, à qui la communauté devoit un traité avantageux conclu par ses soins avec la ville de Zurich. Son fils avoit hérité de lui une fortune assez considérable, l'estime publique, et l'amour de la patrie. Ce sentiment étoit devenu triste et amère pour un citoyen qui ne pouvoit lui donner que des regrets impuissans. Un jour, assis devant sa maison, il vit passer le Gouverneur Gesler

Leu, Dictionnaire Historique, au mot Stauffacher.

1307. Tschudi, tom.i.p.235. qui s'arrêta pour lui demander d'un ton fier le nom du propriétaire. Une réponse pleine de respect et de sagesse ne lui fournit point le prétexte qu'il cherchoit pour perdre un homme vertueux qu'il détestoit: mais il s'emporta vivement contre lui, et lui dit que l'empereur ou son représentant étoit l'unique propriétaire du pays, et qu'on sauroit bien réduire l'orgueil et l'opulence de ces paysans qui se prétendoient nobles.

Ces discours remplirent le cœur de Werner de honte et d'indignation. Il versa ses chagrins dans le sein de son épouse, dont il connoissoit la tendresse, la prudence et le courage. Il n'hésita point à lui communiquer le dessein qu'il avoit conçu de sonder les esprits, et d'éprouver si la liberté n'avoit pas encore des ressources dans les cœurs des Suisses. "Oui, cher époux," lui répondit cette femme vertueuse, "tes jours me sont chers, ta gloire me l'est davantage. Un vrai citoyen ne doit jamais survivre à sa patrie: venge-la, ou péris avec elle. Nos tyrans ont des ennemis partout où il existe de la vertu. Tu trouverez parmi eux des amis dignes d'être associés à tes desseins généreux. Vous aurez pour vous le témoignage de la conscience, l'approbation de l'Etre Suprême, les vœux de tous les gens de bien, et la reconnoissance de la postérité." Elle le conseilla ensuite de concerter ses mesures avec ses amis d'Uri. Il suivit son conseil, et fit bientôt après ce voyage sans exciter la défiance de ses maîtres.

Il examina d'un œil attentif les dispositions de ce pays, et vit sans peine que le nom Autrichien y étoit en horreur. Il entendit le Baron d'Attinghausen, premier magistrat du canton, qui se plaignoit de l'insolence de Gesler; il fut témoin de l'indignation de son propre néveu le seigneur de Rudentz. Il craignoit cependant de leur communiquer des projets aussi dangereux que les siens. Il ne s'en ouvrit qu'à son ancien ami Walter Furst, qui justifia sa confiance, et lui proposa d'y associer le jeune Arnold de Melchtal, ennemi juré de leurs tyrans, et dont le crédit leur seroit utile pour attirer dans leur parti le canton d'Underwald. Ces trois hommes s'engagèrent par un serment assez inutile, à tout souffrir et à tout entreprendre pour briser leurs fers, mais à s'acquitter toujours des devoirs que la justice exigeoit d'eux. 1307.

Tschudi, tom. i. p. 236. Guilliman. de Reb. Helvet. l. iii. c. 16.

Les trois conjurés se séparèrent après avoir formé ces liens. Chacun d'eux se rendit dans son pays pour y jetter les fondemens de leur alliance. Le noble et le roturier, unis par leurs malheurs communs, gémissoient sous le même joug et le détestoient également; mais il falloit une prudence extrême pour distinguer parmi ces mécontens le petit nombre de ceux dont la fidélité et le courage les rendoient dignes de cette confiance. Il les amenèrent sans bruit au rendez-vous général qu'ils avoient choisi à Rutlin, lieu écarté sur les bords du lac, et très propre à tromper la vigilance de leurs ennemis. Là on leur découvrit ce secret important, dépôt sacré de la vie de leurs amis et l'espérance future de la Suisse. Ils se devouèrent par les mêmes sermens aux principes généreux de leur l'alliance, et à leur retour ils travaillèrent avec la même précaution

1307. à les répandre. Leur nombre croissoit à chaque assemblée ; et cette société, unie par les nœuds de la vertu et de l'amitié, devenoit tous les jours plus redoutable.* Ils sentirent enfin que leurs forces étoient suffisantes et qu'il ne s'agissoit plus que de les employer. Ils s'assemblèrent pour la dernière fois au nombre de 112 citoyens pour fixer le moment de leur entreprise et pour en choisir les moyens. Les uns vouloient prendre les armes sur le champ, et commençoient déjà à rougir de leur patience, mais cette impétuosité céda aux sages conseils de leurs chefs, dont le courage plus rare et plus tranquille voyoit sans s'étonner toute l'étendue du danger. Ils représentèrent à l'assemblée qu'une telle entreprise n'avoit qu'un instant, et que cet instant précieux devoit embraser le pays entier d'un même feu ; qu'il falloit surtout enlever aux tyrans ces asyles odieux qu'ils avoient fortifiés avec tant de soins, mais qu'au lieu d'un siège dangereux et incertain, l'on devoit profiter des premiers

Tschudi, tom. i. p. 237. 7 Novembre.

* Ils se donnoient le nom d'Eidgenossen, qui signifie alliés par serment; terme dont on s'est ensuite servi pour désigner la nation entière. L'on doit effectivement regarder cette conjuration comme le germe de la confédération Helvétique. Les écrivains étrangers ont reproché aux Suisses la bassesse de leurs premiers conjurés, qui n'étoient, disent-ils, que des paysans obscurs. Le reproche est à la fois ridicule et injuste. Un assez grand nombre de noblesse eut l'honneur d'être admis parmi ces hommes respectables, les Barons d'Attinghausen, d'Utzingen et de Schwintzberg, les Seigneurs de Rudentz, d'Iberg, de Stauffacher, et plusieurs autres dont le lecteur me dispensera de rapporter les noms barbares. Il ne me pardonneroit point si j'oubliois le bon Boumgarten, qui fut associé aux premiers conjurés.

Guilliman. de Reb. Helvet. l. iii. c. 16.

momens

momens de la surprise pour s'en rendre maîtres. 1307.
Ils conseillèrent surtout à leurs amis d'Underwald de songer aux moyens les plus propres pour y réussir;* et pour leur en donner le tems ils convinrent de renvoyer l'entreprise au premier jour de l'an; et pendant l'intervalle, de n'opposer aux injustices de leurs maîtres que le respect et la soumission. Cet intervalle étoit encore de deux mois, mais ils ne craignirent point de confier à la discrétion de plus de cent personnes le poids importun d'un secret aussi dangereux.

Un seul des conjurés risqua, dit-on, par son orgueil le salut de tous ses compagnons; mais son imprudence, soutenue par la hardiesse et couronnée par le succès, est devenue la source de sa gloire, et par une injustice assez bisarre, le nom de Guillaume Tell a obscurci les noms des vrais fondateurs de la liberté Helvétique. Je ne rappellerai point toutes les circonstances d'une aventure aussi singulière qu'elle me paroît douteuse. Personne n'ignore que par la cruauté du gouverneur Autrichien, Tell fut exposé à une épreuve terrible pour l'amour paternel, que son adresse l'en tira heureusement, mais qu'une réponse intrépide plutôt que sage le rejetta dans de nouveaux dangers. L'on sait assez que le baillif le conduisoit au château de Kusnacht, lorsqu'un orage, qui s'éleva sur le lac, l'obligea à lui confier le gouvernail du bateau. Le bonheur de Tell, sa fuite, et sa vengeance sont assez célèbres. Mais notre siècle, qui substitue un doute éclairé à la crédulité de nos ancêtres, semble reprouver une fable qui n'a pas même le mérite de l'invention ; et ne voit dans Guillaume Tell que l'imitation assez grossière d'un héros Danois aussi fabuleux peut-être que lui. Quoiqu'il en soit, l'aventure de ce citoyen n'a point influé sur la révolution générale. Tous les conjurés attendirent dans le silence le commencement d'une année qui devoit servir de signal à leur entreprise et d'époque à la liberté des Suisses.

* Les deux châteaux de Sarnen et de Rotzberg étoient situés dans leur territoire.

la

1308. 1 Janvier. Tschudi, tom. i, p. 239, 240. Guilliman. de Reb. Helvet. l. iii. c. 16. Simler de Repub. Helvet. l. i. Leu, Dictionnaire Hist. de la Suisse au mots Schwitz, Uri, Underwald, Sarnen, Rotzberg, &c.

Enfin ce jour arriva ; tous les associés, fidèles à leurs sermens, prirent les armes à la fois dans les trois cantons. Ils trouvèrent partout des ennemis endormis par le luxe et par l'orgueil ; et qui ne s'attendoient point à des efforts aussi hardis d'une troupe de paysans qu'ils osoient mépriser. Les deux forteresses de Rotzberg et de Sarnen, qui contenoient le pays d'Underwald, furent surprises sans difficulté. La première fut trahie par l'amour. Une fille du château avoit donné rendez-vous à son amant pour la nuit du premier de Janvier, mais cet amant étoit l'un des conjurés. Il monta sans bruit à la faveur d'une corde qu'elle lui tendit de la fenêtre. Vingt de ses compagnons se servirent du même moyen pour le suivre, se répandirent dans la forteresse sans perdre un instant, désarmèrent la garnison, et se saisirent de la personne du baillif. Ils donnèrent aussitôt avis de leur succès à leurs amis qui les imitèrent à Sarnen, château plus considérable encore par la force de la garnison et par la résidence du gouverneur principal. Trente conjurés jurés se postèrent dans un petit bois auprès de Sarnen, pendant que vingt autres saisirent le moment où le baillif, suivi d'une garde nombreuse, étoit sorti pour aller à l'église. Ils se présentèrent à la porte du château chargés de ces présens rustiques que la tyrannie des Autrichiens exigeoit au premier jour de l'an. Les sentinelles leur permirent de passer sans la moindre défiance; mais jetter leurs fardeaux, armer leurs gros bâtons des pointes de fer qu'ils tiroient de leur sein, attaquer la garde avec fureur, et sonner du cor pour appeller leurs compagnons, ne fut pour ces braves paysans que l'ouvrage d'un moment. Leurs compagnons accoururent au signal, et la forteresse fut prise. Le gouverneur se sauva du côté de Lucerne le long de la montagne et au milieu des neiges. Sa fuite fut apperçue des Suisses sans en être inquiétée. Le soulèvement des citoyens d'Uri et de Schwitz ne fut pas moins heureux. Ils s'emparèrent sans peine des forts qui s'élevoient dans leur pays, et sur le champ ils rasèrent avec transport ces monumens odieux de leur servitude. La modération fait rarement entendre sa voix dans les fureurs d'une révolution populaire; mais les Suisses s'étoient promis de respecter les personnes de leurs tyrans, dans l'instant même qu'ils puniroient leur tyrannie. On se contenta de les renvoyer avec les domestiques et les soldats qui les avoient accompagnés; et pour démontrer qu'une justice désintéressée étoit le principe de la conjuration, ils ne touchèrent point à leurs trésors dépouillés du pays et fruit de l'oppression. 1308.

1308. l'oppression. Quelques auteurs ont ajouté qu'ils exigèrent d'eux le serment de ne jamais rentrer sur les terres des Suisses, mais ce serment supposoit une estime qu'ils avoient assez peu méritée. Peu de jours après la révolution les trois cantons s'envoyèrent des députés pour se féliciter mutuellement, et pour jurer une alliance de dix ans. La conjuration devint un traité solemnel, mais les conditions en étoient toujours les mêmes.

8me Janvier.

Un prince du caractère d'Albert dut être vivement irrité d'une révolte qui blessoit également son orgueil et son ambition. Il se consoloit cependant par l'idée d'une vengeance terrible; et cette vengeance lui étoit trop chère pour la confier à des mains étrangères. Il se rendit lui-même à Bade, ville principale de ses états Helvétiques. Là dans une assemblée très nombreuse de sa noblesse il exagéra le crime des paysans qui avoient indignement chassés les officiers de leur prince, la nécessité de châtier leur audace, et les secours qu'il attendoit de la fidélité de ses vassaux. Il leur ordonna à tous de rassembler leurs troupes et de le suivre dans une expédition qui intéressoit les droits de tous les seigneurs. Les Suisses virent avec inquiétude mais sans effroi l'orage qui se formoit contre eux dans toute l'étendue des pays Autrichiens; ils exercèrent leur jeunesse aux armes, fortifièrent par de bonnes lignes les endroits les plus exposés de leur frontière, et se préparèrent à vivre ou à mourir libres. Un événement imprévu sauva leur république naissante de la destruction qui la menaçoit. L'empereur fut assassiné par son neveu Jean, duc duc de Suabe, dans le tems qu'il alloit porter le fer et le feu sur les terres des Suisses. Injuste envers les siens comme envers les étrangers, Albert retenoit depuis longtems l'héritage de son neveu sous le nom de tutelle, et lui refusoit toujours, avec un mépris plus dur que le refus, la restitution d'un bien qu'il étoit encore trop foible pour gouverner. La conduite du jeune prince justifia ce mépris d'une manière fatale à tous les deux. Il se livra aux conseils pernicieux et intéressés de quelques favoris; il saisit le moment où l'empereur, qui avoit passé la Reuss, se trouvoit séparé de son armée, et le fit poignarder dans le champ de Konigsfeld. Telle fut la fin malheureuse d'Albert I. dont l'ambition avoit inquiété l'empire pendant plus de dix ans. 1308, 1 Mai.

Avril. Tschudi, tom. i. Joan. Vitoduran. p.15.

Ses projets périrent avec lui. La famille impériale, qui étoit rassemblée auprès de son chef, le vit massacrer sous ses yeux sans pouvoir le secourir. Dans les premiers momens de consternation et de défiance qui suivirent un pareil attentat, elle ne songea qu'à conserver ses amis et qu'à ménager ses ennemis. L'Impératrice Elizabeth fit partir un ministre pour assurer les trois cantons de sa bienveillance, et pour les prier de se joindre à la maison d'Autriche pour punir les assassins du premier des souverains. La réponse des Suisses fut celle d'un peuple qui connoissoit à la fois ses intérêts et ceux de la justice: " Qu'ils étoient bien éloignés d'approuver le crime du Duc de Suabe, qu'ils plaignoient le triste sort de l'empereur, et qu'ils le plaignoient surtout de l'avoir mérité: mais que ce n'étoit Tschudi, tom. i. p. 243.

1308. n'étoit point à eux à venger la mort d'un prince qu'ils n'avoient jamais connu que par ses injustices." Ils dissipèrent cependant les soupçons auxquels cette réponse donnoit lieu, en rejettant avec mépris toutes les propositions avantageuses que leur faisoit le Duc Jean. On se contenta de lui faire dire qu'une république libre ne seroit jamais l'asyle des meurtriers. Ce prince, malheureux autant que coupable, qui n'avoit de hardiesse que pour le crime, se trouva seul, sans appui, sans ressource, abandonné à lui-même et à ses remords. Il se retira en Italie et finit ses tristes jours dans le fond d'un cloître.

Joan. Vitodur. p. 17.

La mort d'Albert fut vengée par sa veuve et par ses enfans avec une cruauté qui effraya même ce siècle barbare. Ils imputèrent à toute la noblesse Helvétique le crime d'un très petit nombre; et firent également périr dans les supplices, les coupables et les innocens. Quarante-cinq gentilshommes furent exécutés dans le château d'Alburen par l'ordre du Duc Leopold. Soixante-trois autres, pris dans la forteresse de Arwangen, furent décapités malgré la foi des capitulations; et la Reine Agnès, fille de l'empereur, témoigna une joie affreuse à voir couler sous ses yeux le sang le plus pur de la Suisse. Cette princesse acquit dans la suite une haute réputation de sainteté pour avoir fondé l'abbaye de Konigsfeld. L'ambition approuvoit ces horreurs dont les sentimens même de la nature ne justifioient pas l'excès. Tant de châteaux rasés partout la Suisse confirmoient la puissance de la maison d'Autriche, pendant que les Leu, Dictionnaire Historique aux Mots Adel et Agnès.

terres

terres de leurs anciens propriétaires augmentoient son domaine. Les Suisses, à qui leurs ennemis ont toujours reproché la destruction de la noblesse Helvétique, savent répondre que toutes leurs guerres lui ont été moins funestes que la vengeance sanguinaire des enfans d'Albert.

Henri, comte de Luxembourg, fut élu Empereur après la mort d'Albert. Les auteurs contemporains attribuent ce choix aux intrigues du Pape Clement V. qui craignoit de voir passer la couronne impériale dans la maison de France. Ce pontife connoissoit mal les hommes; cet empereur qu'il avoit fait, ne travailla qu'à rétablir les anciens droits de l'empire sur Rome et l'Italie.

Les Suisses se hâtèrent de féliciter leur nouveau souverain. Ils lui envoyèrent une députation solemnelle pour exposer leurs droits, justifier leur conduite, et implorer sa justice et sa protection. Henri VII. les écouta avec bonté et leur accorda par un diplome semblable à celui de Fréderic II. la confirmation de tous leurs privilèges. Cependant la prudence lui dictoit de grands ménagemens pour les ducs d'Autriche, dont la puissance orgueilleuse bravoit son maître et menaçoit l'empire d'une guerre civile. Dans une dispute qui survint à l'occasion de leur investiture ils osèrent rappeller à l'empereur que l'Autriche avoit déjà coûté la vie à six rois. Henri se rendit à cette menace, et conclut un traité avec le Duc Leopold qui le suivit en Italie à la tête de deux cens chevaux. Trois cens Suisses furent aussi de l'expédition Romaine qui procura à leur république naissante un calme précieux précieux de cinq ans. Ce calme resserra les nœuds de leur union, les accoutuma à jouir de la liberté, leur en fit sentir le prix, et les disposa à tout risquer pour la conserver.

1309. Tschudi, tom. i. p. 245, &c.

Struv. Corp. Hist. Germ. p. 558.

1314. La mort de Henri VII. empoisonné, dit-on, en Italie, fut suivie d'une guerre civile. Louis, duc de Bavière, et Fréderic le beau, duc d'Autriche, disputèrent par les armes la couronne impériale qu'ils prétendoient avoir obtenue par les suffrages des électeurs. L'Allemagne fut divisée et déchirée par ces deux princes; les succès se balançoient, et leur foiblesse respective, qui les empêchoit de faire des efforts décisifs, sembloit éterniser les malheurs de l'empire.* Leopold, frère de Fréderic d'Autriche, étoit le plus fort appui de son parti. Un corps petit et mal fait, qu'il ne relevoit point par la parure, cachoit une âme cruelle et intrépide. Il avoit acquis le nom d'un guerrier distingué; il justifia sa réputation en traversant l'Allemagne à la tête de 20,000 hommes pour fair reconnoître l'autorité de Fréderic. Louis de Bavière n'avoit pas osé tenir la campagne contre lui, et il vit brûler sous ses yeux, Landsberg et plusieurs autres villes

Joan. Vitorudan. Chronic. in Thesaur. p. 18.

1315.

* M. de Voltaire nous a tracé d'un pinceau léger le tableau de l'histoire générale de l'Europe. Le coloris en est toujours brillant, mais le dessein est souvent très incorrect. Ce Leopold, dit-il, est le même qui viola si lâchement le droit de l'hospitalité dans la personne de Richard Cœur de Lion. Dois-je m'arrêter à prouver qu'un duc d'Autriche qui regnoit en 1193 ne fut point battu à Morgarten en 1315, cent vingt-deux ans après? L'imagination de M. de Voltaire l'a emporté. Nous serions pourtant fâchés qu'il en eut moins.

Oeuvres de Voltaire, tom. xii. p. 67.

de ses pays héréditaires. Leopold alloit peut-être triompher du rival de sa maison, lorsqu'un courroux indiscret lui fit tourner ses armes contre les Suisses, qui avoient assez naturellement embrassé le parti des ennemis de l'Autriche. 1315.

Les moines de l'abbaye d'Einsidlen* étoient les anciens ennemis du canton de Schwitz, et leur nouvelle liaison avec les princes Autrichiens qui les avoient pris sous leur protection, les rendoit plus implacables que jamais. Ces religieux, qui ne l'étoient que de nom, insultoient tous les Suisses qui passoient sur leurs terres, les battoient, et les dépouilloient. Ces bonnes gens souffrirent longtems sans se plaindre, se plaignirent enfin, n'obtinrent point la justice qu'ils demandoient, et résolu-

Tschudi, tom. i. p. 260. Felix Malleolus, Dialog. de Suitensibus, p. 3. in Thesauro H. Helv.

* Cette abbaye, riche plutôt que puissante, subsista avec éclat depuis huit siècles. Le contraste de ses bâtimens magnifiques avec le pays affreux qui les entoure fait naître l'idée des palais enchantés qui paroissoient tout à coup au milieu des déserts. La magie d'Einsidlen est celle de la superstition qui lui attire encore de toutes les provinces voisines une foule de pélerins et d'offrandes. Ce que Valentin Compar, secrétaire d'état du canton d'Uri, écrivit au Réformateur Zuingle, peut nous donner quelque idée de ses richesses ; richesses qu'elle avoit rassemblées dans le pays le plus pauvre de l'Europe. Je connois (dit il) une abbaye (Einsidlen) à laquelle on a donné plus d'un million d'or ; et qui possède tant de bijoux et de choses précieuses qu'il n'y a point de prince qui put en payer la dixième partie. Il est assez singulier que ces religieux ayent pu goûter la doctrine des Réformateurs qui prêchoit l'inutilité des pélerinages. Mais il ne l'est point qu'ils ayent renoncé bientôt à une erreur aussi détestable. L'abbaye d'Einsidlen est à présent une des neuf maisons de la Congrégation Bénédictine Helvétique. Pour le temporel elle reconnoît la protection du canton de Schwitz.

Etat et Délices de la Suisse, tom. ii. p. 415. Histoire de la Réformation de la Suisse par Ruchat, tom. i. p. 10. 42, 43. 402. Hist. de la Réformation de la Suisse, tom. i. p. 293. 7,000,000 de francs. Histoire des Ordres Religieux par Helyot. tom. vi. p. 267.

1315. rent de se la faire eux-mêmes. Ils entrèrent dans le couvent à main armée, y commirent de grands désordres, et emmenèrent avec eux beaucoup de bétails, aussi bien que six moines, auxquels ils ne rendirent la liberté qu'assez longtems après. L'on conçoit assez qui l'église d'Einsidlen lança contre ces sacrilèges les anathèmes les plus effrayans; mais l'usage trop fréquent de ces foudres leur avoit fait perdre leur force dans l'esprit même des peuples, et les moines furent obligés de recourir à leur protecteur. Leopold écouta avec plaisir des plaintes qui l'autorisoient à confondre les injures de sa famille avec celles de la religion. Il marcha contre les Suisses plein de fureur et de confiance, résolu de consommer la vengeance que la mort avoit enlevé à son père. Il alloit, disoit-il, à la chasse de ses paysans rebelles, et se faisoit suivre par un grand nombre de charettes chargées de cordes pour emmener les captifs et le bétail, seuls trésors du pays pauvre et agreste qu'il alloit subjuguer.* Tant de présomption n'étoit point extraordinaire. Il se voyoit à la tête de plus de 1300 cavaliers couverts de fer, accoutumés à la victoire et tirés de la première noblesse de la Suisse, de l'Alsace, Joan. Vitoduran. p. 25, 26. Tschudi, tom. i. p 271, 272. Simler de Repub. Helvet. l. i. Leu, Dictionnaire au mot Morgarten. Tschudi.

* Suivant l'étiquette des cours barbares Leopold se faisoit accompagner de son astrologue et de son bouffon. La folie du premier se paroit toujours des dehors de la sagesse. Le masque comique du second cachoit assez souvent l'esprit et la raison. L'un annonça à son maître les succès les plus éclatans; l'autre témoigna de l'inquiétude de ce qu'il ne voyoit point les préparatifs nécessaires pour sortir des montagnes de Schwitz aussi bien que pour y entrer.

et

et de la Suabe. 20,000 fantassins bien disciplinés composoient le reste d'une armée à laquelle l'Allemagne avoit pu à peine opposer des forces égales. 1315.

La perte des Suisses paroissoit inévitable. Le Duc d'Autriche avoit fait ses dispositions pour les attaquer à la fois par tous les côtés accessibles. Le Comte de Strasberg étoit chargé de rassembler les troupes de Hasli, de Frulingen, et du Sibenthal, au nombre de 4000 hommes, pour entrer à la pointe du jour dans le canton d'Underwald, tandis que 1000 Lucernois, traversant le lac sur des bateaux, se joindroient à lui dans le cœur du pays. Leopold lui-même marchoit du côté de Zug pour attaquer le canton de Schwitz, et il tâchoit par des manœuvres assez adroites de faire abandonner aux Suisses le village de Morgarten. C'étoit le défilé par lequel il comptoit déboucher comme le moins difficile de ceux qui couvroient les terres de la République. Le Comte de Toggenbourg, serviteur du duc, fut touché du triste sort de ces hommes libres et vertueux dont le malheur et l'innocence leur avoit acquis des amis dans l'armée Autrichienne. Il se jetta aux pieds de Leopold pour lui demander la permission de leur représenter leur danger et de leur offrir le pardon et la paix. Ce prince, longtems inflexible, consentit enfin à leur accorder la vie et les biens à condition qu'ils reconnussent Fréderic son frère pour légitime Empereur, et eux-mêmes pour sujets de la maison d'Autriche. Chargé de ces pouvoirs le Comte de Toggenbourg se rendit au camp des Suisses. Ce peuple généreux le remercia avec une vive reconnoissance 1315. noissance des efforts qu'il faisoit en sa faveur ; mais il lui déclara qu'ils étoient inutiles, et que les Suisses périroient jusqu'au dernier d'entr'eux plutôt que d'accepter des conditions aussi honteuses. Qu'il s'avance, (s'écrièrent-ils,) ce fier ennemi, il apprendra peut-être ce que peuvent le désespoir et la liberté contre ses armées formidables. Le comte les plaignit et se retira. On croit même que la pitié lui fit oublier le devoir, et qu'il leur communiqua tout le plan des attaques. Il est sûr que les citoyens de Schwitz, instruits du lieu et du moment de leur danger, commandèrent 600 hommes pour se joindre sur le champ aux 700 qui occupoient déjà le poste important de Morgarten. Ils son espoir que dans sa valeur et dans la protection de cet Etre qui aime la justice, et qui punit l'orgueil. 1315.

14 Novembre. envoyèrent en même tems avertir leurs alliés du besoin qu'ils avoient de leur secours. Ceux d'Uri leur envoyèrent 400 hommes qui arrivèrent vers l'entrée de la nuit. Les habitans d'Underwald, attaqués dans leurs propres foyers, ne purent leur donner que 300 hommes qui parvinrent vers le minuit au camp de Morgarten. Cette petite troupe ainsi réunie* passa la nuit dans le jeune et la prière, occupa toutes les hauteurs, et ne mit

* On voit qu'elle étoit composée de deux mille hommes, malgré les efforts de ceux qui ont cherché à diminuer ce nombre pour augmenter le merveilleux de l'action. Il faut y ajouter encore cinquante citoyens bannis pour leurs offenses; à qui l'on refusa l'honneur de mourir pour la patrie, mais qui méritèrent leur grace par leur valeur. Pour peu qu'on réfléchisse sur les circonstances de cette guerre on se persuadera sans peine que ces deux mille hommes faisoient près de la moitié de ceux qui étoient en état de porter les armes, et que par conséquent les trois cantons ne renfermoient pas vingt mille âmes du tems de la révolution.

Leopold étoit parti de Zug vers le milieu de la nuit. Il se flattoit d'occuper sans résistance le défilé de Morgarten qui ne perçoit qu'avec difficulté entre le lac Ægré et le pied d'une montagne escarpée. Il marchoit à la tête de sa gendarmerie. Une colonne profonde d'infanterie la suivoit de près, et les uns et les autres se promettoient une victoire facile si les paysans osoient se présenter à leur rencontre. Ils étoient à peine entrés dans un chemin rude et étroit, et qui ne permettoit qu'à trois ou quatre de marcher de front, qu'ils se sentirent accablés d'une grêle de pierres et de traits. Rodolphe de Reding, landamman de Schwitz et général des confédérés, n'avoit oublié aucun des avantages que lui offroit la situation des lieux. Il avoit fait couper des rochers énormes, qui en s'ébranlant dès qu'on retiroit les foibles appuis qui les soutenoient encore, se détachoient du sommet de la montagne et se précipitoient avec un bruit affreux sur les bataillons serrés des Autrichiens.* Déjà les chevaux s'effrayoient, les rangs se confondoient, et le désordre égaroit le courage et le rendoit inutile, lorsque les Suisses descendirent de la montagne en poussant de grands cris. Accoutumés à poursuivre le chamois sur les bords glissans des

* Les habitans de l'Engadine employèrent un semblable artifice dans la guerre de Suabe. Bilibandus Pirckheimer le décrit assez joliment. V. de Bello Helvet. p. 20. in Thesauro.

1315. précipices, ils couroient d'un pas assuré au milieu des neiges. Ils étoient armés de ces grosses et pesantes hallebardes auxquelles le fer le mieux trempé ne resistoit point. Les soldats de Leopold, chancelans et découragés, cédèrent bientôt aux efforts désespérés d'une troupe qui combattoit pour tout ce qu'il y a de plus cher aux hommes. L'abbé d'Einsidlen, premier auteur de cette guerre malheureuse, et le comte Henri de Montfort, donnèrent les premiers l'exemple de la fuite. Le désordre devint général, le carnage fut affreux, et les Suisses se livroient au plaisir de la vengeance. A neuf heures du matin la bataille étoit gagnée. Un grand nombre d'Autrichiens se précipitant les uns sur les autres, cherchèrent vainement dans le lac un asyle contre la fureur de leurs ennemis. Ils y périrent presque tous. Quinze cens hommes restèrent sur le champ de bataille. Ils étoient pour la plûpart de la gendarmerie qu'une valeur malheureuse et une armure pesante arrêtoient dans un lieu où l'un et l'autre leur étoient inutiles. Longtems après l'on s'appercevoit dans toutes les provinces voisines que l'élite de la noblesse avoit péri dans cette fatale journée.* L'infanterie, beaucoup moins engagée dans le défilé, vit en tremblant la défaite des chevaliers qui passoient

Joan. Vitodurudan. p. 26. Tschudi, tom. i. p. 273.

* Un historien contemporain assure que longtems après, la gendarmerie noble (militia) étoit rare dans les provinces voisines. On vit périr dans cette journée le Comte Rodolphe de Habsbourg, trois barons de Bonsletten, deux seigneurs de Halevil, deux Gesler, et beaucoup d'autre noblesse de l'Argau, de la Turgovie, et de l'Alsace.

pour

pour invincibles, et dont les escadrons effrayés se renversoient sur elle. Elle s'arrêta, voulut se retirer, et dans l'instant cette retraite devint une fuite honteuse. Sa perte fut assez peu considérable, mais les historiens de la nation ont conservé la mémoire de cinquante braves Zuriquois dont on trouva les rangs couchés morts sur la place. Leopold lui-même fut entraîné par la foule qui le portoit du côté de Zug. On le vit rentrer dans sa ville de Winterthur. La frayeur, la honte, et l'indignation étoient encore peintes sur son front. Dès que la victoire se fut déclarée en faveur des Suisses, ils s'assemblèrent sur le champ de bataille, s'embrassèrent en versant des larmes d'allegresse, et remercièrent Dieu de la grace qu'il venoit de leur faire et qui ne leur avoit coûté que quatorze de leurs compagnons. 1315. Joan. Vitoduran. p. 26.

Au milieu de la joie commune les citoyens d'Underwald songeoient au danger de leur patrie. Ils ne perdirent pas un moment pour marcher à son secours. Bientôt ils apprirent qu'elle étoit livrée à toute la fureur des détachemens Autrichiens. Animés par cette nouvelle, ils précipitèrent leur marche, traversèrent le lac, joignirent les Lucernois, les repoussèrent jusques dans leurs bateaux, et s'avancèrent dans la partie supérieure du pays pour s'unir avec ceux de leurs compatriotes qui faisoient tête au Comte de Strasberg. Les deux bannières que ce général apperçut parmi les troupes ennemies le remplirent d'un juste effroi. Il comprit que l'une de ces bannières avoit combattu à Morgarten : il trembla pour son maître et Tschudi, tom. i. p. 273, 274.

1315. pour lui-même; et se retira avec la perte de 300 hommes et celle de tout son butin. Le même jour suffit à ces trois victoires.

Tschudi, tom.i.p.275. Simler. de Rep. Helv. p. 1.

La Suisse étoit sauvée par les mains de la victoire. Il ne s'agissoit plus que de la rendre utile et que d'assurer à jamais la liberté pour laquelle l'on avoit combattu. Les sentimens de la nation et la situation des affaires demandoient également que les trois cantons formassent une union étroite et indissoluble. Lorsqu'un traité est dicté par l'amité et la bonne foi il est facile d'en rédiger les conditions. L'acte solemnel de cette alliance fut confirmé par une assemblée générale des Suisses un peu plus de trois semaines après la bataille. Je dois donner une idée juste d'une pièce qui a toujours fait la base de la Confédération Helvétique.

9 Décembre.

Tous les hommes d'Uri, de Schwitz, et d'Underwald se promettent une amitié à l'épreuve du tems et des malheurs. Ils unissent à jamais pour le bonheur général leurs forces et leurs conseils. L'on peut découvrir ici la première ébauche de la société civile, et ce contrat social, que tant d'écrivains, mieux instruits des droits de l'homme que de son histoire, ont vainement cherché dans les grands états. Ils jurent de se soutenir mutuellement envers et contre tous. Ils s'engagent à sacrifier leurs vies pour la défense commune, à ne jamais permettre qu'un Suisse soit mal-traité ou opprimé, à le secourir ou à le venger. Ils consentent à soumettre à des arbitres impartiaux tous les différens qui pourroient un jour troubler cette harmonie; et ils établissent le troisième canton juge naturel de tout tout ce qui pourroit diviser les deux autres. Convaincus que l'amitié ne peut subsister parmi l'injustice et les crimes, ils décernent la peine de mort contre les homicides volontaires, et celle d'un exil perpétuel contre les voleurs. Ils s'assujettissent à tous les devoirs qu'on avoit droit d'exiger d'eux avant la révolution, mais ils ne reconnoissent plus ceux que la tyrannie a anéanti et qu'une paix équitable peut seule restituer à la maison d'Autriche.* Ces devoirs onéreux, et qui blessoient l'indépendance d'un état libre, leur étoient cependant odieux. Ils ne veulent point en contracter de nouveaux, et ils défendent à chacun d'engager son hommage, sa parole ou ses biens, sans le consentement de tous les autres confédérés. Ils finissent par dénoncer à tous les contrevenans, la honte du parjure, un exil perpétuel, et la confiscation de leurs biens. 1315.

La première démarche de la nouvelle république fut d'instruire l'Empereur Louis de Bavière de tout ce qui s'étoit passé parmi eux. Ce prince, par goût et par politique, étoit l'ami des Suisses. Il leur avoit déjà écrit pour les plaindre, pour les consoler, et pour leur faire espérer un avenir plus favorable. Trop foible lui-même pour les secourir d'une manière efficace, il les fit du moins relever par l'autorité supérieure de l'archevêque de Mayence de toutes les censures ecclésiastiques qu'ils avoient encourues. Simler, de Rep. Helv. l. i. Guilliman. de Reb. Helveticis, l. iii. c. 16.

Il apprit avec joie que son ennemi le plus re-

* L'on peut trouver dans le dictionnaire de Leu, les exemples de plusieurs servitudes dont les cantons se rachetèrent longtems après la révolution.

doutable

1316. doutable avoit perdu sa gloire et l'élite de ses troupes dans la journée de Morgarten. Il se hâte de confirmer tous les privilèges des trois cantons, d'approuver leur alliance, et de confisquer en leur faveur tout ce que la maison d'Autriche possédoit encore au milieu d'eux. Les Suisses reçurent sans difficulté de sa main un préfet impérial qui jura de respecter leurs droits et de les défendre contre tous leurs ennemis. Cette magistrature, l'ombre d'une autorité révérée, disparut insensiblement, et les empereurs suivans accordèrent aux Suisses le privilège de choisir des magistrats qui fussent en même tems les ministres du peuple et de l'empire.

Je viens de tracer d'une plume foible mais impartiale l'histoire d'une révolution obscure qui a changé le sort de quelques paysans des Alpes. Elle mérite néanmoins l'attention du philosophe qui cherche l'homme dans la chaumière plutôt que dans les palais. Il sait que le nom sacré de liberté a presque toujours désigné les prérogatives injustes d'un petit nombre de citoyens, et que les nations séduites ou entraînées par leurs chefs ont mille fois combattu avec fureur pour des intérêts qui leur étoient étrangers. Il parcourt d'un œil attentif le tableau de l'Europe dans les siècles barbares de l'anarchie féodale. Qu'il est triste, ce tableau, pour un ami des hommes! Des barons et des évêques qui disputent à leur roi la dépouille sanglante des communes; ces communes malheureuses qui s'arment quelquefois de leurs fers, mais dont la fureur incertaine et aveugle déshonore par ses excès une

une liberté dont elles ne savent point jouir;* quelques républiques populaires au fond de l'Italie, déchirées par une discorde toujours renaissante, et qui se livrent avec la même ardeur à leurs tribuns et leurs tyrans. Qu'il reconnoisse ici un spectacle plus rare et plus digne de la nature humaine; un peuple vertueux, qui a défendu les droits les plus saints par les moyens les plus légitimes; qui a eu de la fermeté dans le péril et de la modération après la victoire.

Chapitre II.

Alliance de Lucerne—Guerre de Lauppen—Origine de Zurich—Révolution dans son Gouvernement—Rodolphe Brun, bourguemestre—Conjuration des Exilés—Guerre avec l'Autriche—Combat de Tatwyl—Alliance de Glaris—Alliance de Zug—Siège de Zurich par l'Empereur Charles IV—Trève—Alliance de Berne.

La bataille de Morgarten humilioit l'orgueil Autrichien; les forces de cette maison n'étoient cependant point épuisées, et les Suisses avoient tout à craindre d'un ressentiment irrité par la honte et

* Les communes attroupées en Angleterre sous Richard II. y commirent de grands désordres. L'humanité frémit au récit des cruautés de la Jacquerie à qui le désespoir mit les armes à la main après la bataille de Poitiers. Mais les paysans qui désolèrent de l'Allemagne sous le nom d'Anabaptistes surpassèrent les horreurs des uns et des autres. Ils établissoient le royaume du seigneur. Chronique de Froissart, P. I. p.189. P.II. p. 129, &c. Mosheim's Ecclesiastical Hist. vol. ii. p.232, &c.

par

par le malheur. Mais ces forces étoient divisées, et ce ressentiment se tournoit contre le Duc de Bavière qui disputoit l'empire à Fréderic et ses frères. Après avoir vaincu cet ennemi qui paroissoit le plus redoutable, ils se proposoient de punir les Suisses de leur première révolte et de la victoire qu'ils avoient osé remporter sur leurs maîtres. Le 1322. succès ne répondit point à leur attente. Fréderic le beau perdit enfin la liberté avec la bataille de Mulhdorf, et ne sortit de prison qu'après avoir signé un traité qui lui accordoit des avantages assez considérables à la place d'un empire auquel il renonçoit à jamais. L'inflexible Leopold soutint son parti encore quelque tems avec plus d'opiniâtreté que de gloire, mais sa mort et celle de 1325. Fréderic assurèrent le repos de l'Allemagne. Othon et Albert héritèrent des états de leurs frères, sans hériter de leurs talens et de leur ambition. Louis de Bavière fut reconnu par tout le corps Germanique malgré les anathèmes du Pape Jean XXII. qui s'indignoit que l'Allemagne n'eût point attendu le consentement du Saint Siège pour se donner un souverain.

Cette guerre malheureuse et l'état de foiblesse auquel elle réduisit la maison d'Autriche ne leur permit point de se venger des Suisses. Elle se contentoit de les inquiéter dans la jouissance de cette liberté qu'elle ne pouvoit pas leur arracher. Elle défendit à ses sujets, qui habitoient les riches campagnes de l'Argau et de la Turgovie, de fournir à ce peuple rebelle le bled, le vin, les étoffes, et tout ce que lui refusoit la nature du pays et son ignorance ignorance des arts. Les Suisses sentirent la triste vérité, que l'homme est esclave par ses besoins; mais ils deployèrent en même tems les ressources presqu'infinies de la patience et de la modération. La faim les obligea quelquefois à sortir de leurs retraites les armes à la main, et dans ces courses qu'ils faisoient sur les terres de l'Autriche, ils enlevoient les moissons, détruisoient tout ce qu'ils ne pouvoient emporter, et poussoient la désolation et l'effroi jusques aux portes de Zug et de Lucerne. La gendarmerie que l'on avoit jetté dans ces places importantes se joignoit aux milices du pays pour arrêter ces montagnards, et mille petits combats plus sanglans que décisifs ne servoient qu'à accroître leur haine mutuelle. Un historien Suisse contemporain, mais dévoué à la maison d'Autriche, gémit des cruautés qui signaloient cette malheureuse guerre dans laquelle l'on n'épargnoit jamais les prisonniers. La tyrannie des Autrichiens, la dureté grossière des Suisses, et le droit affreux des représailles me persuadent que ses plaintes n'étoient que trop légitimes. Ces malheurs étoient communs aux deux partis, mais leurs sentimens étoient bien différens. Les Suisses payoient sans regret le prix de leur liberté. Les Autrichiens s'indignoient d'être les victimes d'une ambition aussi pernicieuse à eux-mêmes qu'à leurs voisins.

Nous avons déjà vu que la ville de Lucerne, située sur le bord occidental du lac de ce nom, avoit appartenue à l'abbaye de Murbach en Alsace, et qu'au mépris de leurs sermens, ces maîtres, éloignés

et

1325. et indifférens, l'avoient vendue à l'Empereur Albert. Les citoyens s'opposèrent longtems à cette transaction, mais ils se rendirent enfin à la crainte de la puissance Autrichienne, et aux assurances qu'on leur donnoit qu'ils ne connoîtroient jamais cette puissance que par la protection et les bienfaits. Ils ne la connurent jamais que par leurs malheurs. A ceux dont j'ai déjà parlé, il faut ajouter l'interruption totale d'un commerce qui avoit fondé Lucerne et qui la faisoit encore subsister avec éclat. Placée entre l'Italie et l'Allemagne sa situation avantageuse la rendoit l'entre-1332. pôt de ces deux pays. La Reuss, qui coule au pied de ses murs, recevoit toutes les marchandises qu'on avoit voituré sur le Mont St. Godard et les versoit dans le Rhin; mais depuis le commencement de cette guerre destructive les habitans d'Uri avoient fermé ce passage dont ils étoient les maîtres. Les Autrichiens ne furent point touché du triste sort d'un peuple dont la foi donnée à regret ne s'étoit cependant jamais démentie; au fléau de la guerre ils ajoutèrent celui de la tyrannie. La ville jouissoit des plus beaux privilèges que lui avoient accordé les abbés de Murbach. Le gouvernement étoit entre les mains d'un sénat qui se tiroit de la noblesse, et l'officier du prince qui y assistoit écoutoit leurs délibérations, mais il ne les dirigeoit point. Sous les ducs d'Autriche le sénat ne fut plus qu'un vain simulacre, et l'officier du prince devint un gouverneur armé de toutes les terreurs du despotisme et soutenu par la garnison nombreuse du château de Rottembourg. Au poids d'une d'une guerre qui désoloit leur pays depuis vingt-quatre ans, les Lucernois avoient eu la complaisance d'ajouter celui d'une expédition éloignée. Séduits par les promesses qu'on leur prodiguoit ils avoient rendu les plus grands services à la maison d'Autriche dans la guerre de Colmar: mais à leur retour ils sollicitèrent vainement la récompense de leurs travaux. Ils ne reçurent pas même la solde qu'on leur devoit. La mauvaise monnoie, que les ducs d'Autriche répandoient dans leurs états, acheva de les épuiser. Ces princes ne rougirent point d'employer un artifice aussi vil qu'il est commun, et de tromper la confiance publique dont le dépôt sacré leur étoit remis entre les mains. Les Lucernois souffrirent longtems sans se permettre d'autres armes que la patience et les plaintes les plus respectueuses. Las enfin d'un joug qui s'appesantissoit tous les jours sur leurs têtes, ils osèrent se servir de leurs droits pour interdire la monnoie Autrichienne, et pour conclurre avec les trois cantons une trève de vingt ans qui ranimoit leur commerce, et qui leur procuroit du moins un calme passager. 1332.

Mais ils sentirent bientôt que par une démarche aussi mesurée ils avoient fait trop et trop peu. Ils se virent exposés à toute l'indignation de leur souverain, sans être assurés de l'appui des Suisses. Dans une situation aussi critique ils jettèrent les yeux sur cette république qu'ils avoient si longtems combattu parcequ'elle avoit su briser les fers qu'eux-mêmes portoient à regret. Pleins d'admiration pour leur courage, les Lucernois voulurent partager le sort heureux qu'il leur avoit mérité. Ils firent aux trois cantons la proposition de les recevoir 1332. cevoir comme un quatrième membre de leur alliance perpétuelle, pour défendre leur liberté commune contre ceux qui oseroient l'attaquer. La négociation éprouva peu de difficultés. Le sentiment de leurs avantages réciproques ramena bientôt les esprits des deux partis qui s'étoient toujours estimés; ils se jurèrent une amitié éternelle avec une joie qui paroissoit sincère et unanime.

Le même esprit qui avoit inspiré la première confédération dicta dans celle-ci les mêmes conditions; l'union perpétuelle, le secours mutuel, l'obéissance aux magistrats, la haine des tyrans. L'on employoit les mêmes précautions pour prévenir les différens ou pour les terminer. Le corps Helvétique semble déjà avoir pris de la consistence. On le reconnoît au style de ce traité. Ce ne sont plus des hommes libres qui s'unissent par un engagement volontaire, ce sont des états indépendans qui s'allient par un acte politique, et dont les loix et les privilèges séparés ne sont point confondus dans un mélange aussi intime. La politique juste et respectueuse des Lucernois conserva encore à la maison d'Autriche tous ses droits légitimes en laissant au tems et à la fortune l'interprétation de ces droits.

Cette maison redoutable avoit encore à Lucerne un parti nombreux. Ceux qui possédoient des fiefs dans les états Autrichiens préféroient cet intérêt personnel au bien général; une jeunesse aveugle et imprudente regrettoit encore la cour d'un maître, ses honneurs et ses bienfaits, l'égalité d'une république et la sévérité sourde et inflexible des loix paroissoient à leurs yeux le plus rude es- 1332.

des

clavage. Cette partie méprisable du peuple toujours indigne de la liberté, incapable d'obéir, joignoit ses clameurs à leurs murmures. Mais leurs vains efforts n'effrayèrent point le parti plus nombreux encore des bons citoyens. Aux entreprises dont ils prévoyoient l'objet sans démêler les moyens, ils opposèrent la barrière d'une loi nouvelle, qui dénonçoit l'exil perpétuel et une amende de vingt marcs contre quiconque seroit cause que la république reçut du dommage;—loi singulière et dangereuse, qui permet au magistrat le choix des crimes et des victimes: un gouvernement libre y peut trouver son salut, mais elle deviendroit entre les mains d'un tyran l'instrument le plus terrible du despotisme.

Cette loi n'intimida point les partisans de l'Autriche; ils se ménagèrent des intelligences avec les gouverneurs des garnisons dont l'enceinte resserroit la ville. Ils convinrent d'une nuit dans laquelle ils ouvriroient les portes aux troupes, qui s'approcheroient sans bruit, tandis qu'ils prendroient les armes dans la ville et qu'ils feroient périr, par un massacre général, tous les amis des Suisses et de la liberté. L'indiscrétion trahit ce projet affreux peu de momens avant son exécution; un citoyen entendit par hasard la conversation de quelques conjurés qui se croyoient seuls, il la communiqua sur le champ au magistrat, qui assembla la bourgeoisie, s'assura des portes, et fit arrêter tous les conjurés, qui n'étoient point préparés à la résistance. Les manches rouges, signal dont ils s'étoient 1333. convenus pour se distinguer dans la confusion d'un tumulte nocturne, servoient à les découvrir à leurs ennemis. Après avoir fortifié la république par un secours de trois cens Suisses que leurs nouveaux alliés leur envoyèrent à la première réquisition, les Lucernois jugèrent les criminels dont leurs prisons étoient remplies. Partagés entre l'horreur du crime, et la compassion qu'inspiroient le nombre et la qualité des coupables, ils craignoient également de les punir ou de leur pardonner. Ils accordèrent leur grace aux députés des trois cantons qui les prioient de ne point souiller les commencemens de la liberté par le sang même des plus criminels. De tous ces conjurés qui avoient juré la ruine de la patrie, aucun ne perdit la vie. On se contenta d'exiger d'eux une amende considérable et un serment solemnel de mériter la clémence qu'ils avoient éprouvée. On défendit en même tems, par une loi de l'état, toutes les assemblées secrettes, et il fut ordonné qu'un citoyen n'engageroit sa fidélité qu'à la communauté, et que tout serment particulier seroit puni comme un crime. Cette sainte et salutaire jalousie des loix auroit épargné les guerres civiles à plus d'un pays.

Les ducs d'Autriche, indignés de la révolte des Lucernois, étoient cependant trop foibles pour les réduire. L'orgueil leur fit pendant quelque tems soutenir contre eux une guerre languissante. Les succès étoient balancés, jusqu'à ce qu'enfin ces princes, humiliés au point de rechercher l'appui nouvelle confédération avoit commis contre leur autorité. Louis de Bavière se souvenoit encore que les Suisses étoient ses plus fermes amis, et que les Autrichiens étoient des ennemis à peine réconciliés. Il associa les Bernois, les Zuriquois, et les Baslois au jugement qu'il prononça, et qui paroît d'abord assez favorable à l'Autriche; il confirme sa monnoye, lui restitue les biens qu'elle possédoit dans les pays des Suisses, et lui laisse toutes ses prétensions légitimes; mais en confirmant l'alliance perpétuelle des quatre cantons, il lui enlève tout ce qu'il sembloit lui donner, et conserve à la république des Suisses tous les avantages réels qu'ils sollicitoient. Cette sentence arbitrale n'établissoit entre les deux partis qu'une trève de trente mois. Souvent renouvellée, elle ne fut jamais qu'un calme perfide et mal-assuré.
1334. des loix, portèrent devant le tribunal de l'Empereur leurs plaintes amères de tous les attentats que cette nouvelle

Les Suisses, tranquilles et victorieux, commençoient à sortir de leur obscurité, et à jouir de la gloire qu'ils avoient méritée. L'Helvétie entière, divisée et déchirée depuis tant de siècles, cherchoit à se réunir avec eux sous l'étendard de la liberté. Tous les malheureux qui gémissoient sous l'oppression ou qui la craignoient, demandèrent la protection de la république, et après avoir senti le prix de son alliance, ils se crurent heureux de former avec elle les nœuds étroits d'une confédération perpétuelle. C'est ainsi que les villes de Berne et de Zurich sont devenues membres d'un corps dont elles sont aujourd'hui le plus ferme appui.

Toujours fidèle aux volontés de son fondateur, Berne poursuivoit depuis cent vingt ans la ven- 1337.

1337. geance qu'il leur avoit commandée et qui se concilioit si bien avec les intérêts de son ambition. La noblesse de la Bourgogne Transjuranée voyoit avec étonnement cette ville ennemie qui s'élevoit au milieu d'eux, qui bravoit déjà leur puissance, et 1338. menaçoit de leur donner un jour des loix. La crainte qui succède au mépris est toujours accompagnée de la haine. Celle des seigneurs fut le ciment d'une ligue redoutable qui se proposoit pour objet l'anéantissement du pouvoir Bernois. Parmi le grand nombre de comtes, de barons, et de gentilshommes qui formèrent cette alliance, l'on distinguoit les comtes de Neufchatel, d'Arberg, de Nidau, de Gruyère et de Kybourg; ce dernier, d'une branche cadette de la maison de Habsbourg, maître de Berthoud et de Thun, tenoit la ville de Berne comme assiégée au milieu de ses terres, et prétendoit que le fonds même sur lequel elle avoit été bâtie n'étoit qu'une usurpation de son domaine. Fribourg, qui jouissoit d'une assez grande indépendance sous la protection de l'Autriche, eut la foiblesse trop naturelle à une rivale malheureuse; elle écouta la voix de la jalousie plutôt que celle de la raison, et joignit ses forces à celles d'une noblesse dont les intérêts n'avoient rien de commun avec les siens. La maison d'Autriche, toujours ennemie des villes libres, envoya ordre à son gouverneur de l'Argau de faire marcher ses troupes au secours des confédéres pendant qu'on voyoit par une fatalité assez singulière l'Empereur Louis de Bavière qui appuyoit le même parti. Il étoit mécontent des Bernois, dont la politique dirai-je, ou la superstition perstition lui refusoit le respect qu'on devoit au chef de l'empire, et déféroit aux anathèmes du pontife Romain plutôt qu'au choix de l'Allemagne. Une négociation inutile ne fut qu'un prélude de la guerre. Les Bernois cherchoient à conjurer l'orage qui les menaçoit, mais il leur étoit impossible de souscrire aux conditions dures et humiliantes qu'on exigeoit d'eux. Chacun des alliés leur redemandoit des droits hypothéqués, des terres acquises depuis longtems, et une foule de sujets qu'ils avoient dérobés à la tyrannie féodale pour les recevoir au nombre de leurs citoyens. Après avoir justifié leur conduite par cette démarche, les princes rassemblèrent leurs troupes qui étoient déjà prêtes, et parurent devant Lauppen, dont ils formèrent le siège avec une armée de 3000 chevaux et de plus de 15,000 fantassins. 1338. 1339.

Les Bernois ne voyoient autour d'eux que des ennemis déclarés ou des amis foibles et peu sûrs. La ville de Soleure eut cependant le courage de leur envoyer un secours de 80 gendarmes; 300 paysans des montagnes de Hasli accoururent à la bannière des maîtres qu'ils s'étoient choisis, et le Baron de Weissembourg se signala par une fidélité encore plus singulière. Ennemi des Bernois, il avoit éprouvé depuis peu leur valeur et leur clémence; après l'avoir vaincu ils le reçurent parmi leurs citoyens; ils se montra digne de ce titre et servit sa nouvelle patrie à la tête de 150 de ses vassaux. Ces ressources étoient encore foibles et en petit nombre; et les Bernois, étonnés de la force de leurs ennemis, s'addressèrent enfin aux cantons

1339. Suisses avec lesquels ils n'avoient point d'autre liaison que celle de l'humanité. Cette liaison leur suffit, et les trois cantons d'Uri, de Schwitz, et d'Underwald leur accordèrent sur le champ 900 hommes, secours moins considérable par le nombre que par la qualité des troupes qui le composoient. Je suis surpris que les Suisses, toujours attachés à leur protecteur Louis de Bavière, ayent embrassé avec chaleur le parti de ses ennemis. Mais les états populaires se gouvernent autant par passion que par politique; et la passion des Suisses étoit la haine de l'Autriche, des nobles, et de l'injustice. Ils se mirent en marche, traversèrent une assez grande étendue des terres des confédérés, sans qu'on osât les attaquer, et arrivèrent à Berne où ils furent reçus comme des dieux tutélaires. On les en fit aussitôt sortir pour profiter du premier feu de leur courage et pour éviter les désordres qu'auroient pu commettre des hommes peu accoutumés au séjour des villes. Après avoir confié aux vieillards la garde de la capitale, la jeunesse Bernoise avec ses auxiliaires, au nombre de 5200 hommes, marcha à l'ennemi encore occupé au siège de Lauppen, dont la garnison se défendoit avec une constance intrépide. Les chefs de la république avoient employé tout ce que la raison et la superstition peuvent contribuer au salut de la patrie. Ils avoient remis toute l'autorité de l'état à Rodolphe d'Erlach sous le nom de dictateur. Il méritoit ce dépôt important par ses talens militaires, par la réputation qu'il avoit acquise dans six batailles, et par le le sacrifice qu'il venoit de faire de tous les avantages dont il jouissoit au service du comte de Nidau.* Après avoir examiné sa situation et celle des ennemis il résolut de les attaquer sur le champ sans leur donner le tems de recevoir les secours Autrichiens qu'ils attendoient de l'Argau. A coté du dictateur marchoit le doyen de l'église collégiale; il portoit l'eucharistie à la main; il harangua les soldats, les remplit de cet enthousiasme qui élève l'homme au-dessus de lui-même et leur donna sa bénédiction pour le signal du combat. Les Bernois étoient opposés aux Fribourgeois et à l'infanterie des alliés; ce fut à regret qu'ils se contentèrent de ce poste, mais ils n'avoient pu refuser aux vives instances des Suisses l'honneur dangereux de combattre la gendarmerie; dont ils étoient accoutumés, disoient-ils, à abattre l'orgueil. Leur fermeté ne résista cependant point au premier choc de ces escadrons hérissés de lances et montés sur de grands chevaux de bataille; leurs rangs en furent ébranlés; mais ils se rétablirent dans l'instant et renouvellèrent le combat avec fureur. Les Bernois de leur côté poussèrent vivement l'infanterie des confédérés et la mirent en déroute. La sage valeur du dictateur ne leur permit point de s'égarer dans une poursuite vaine; il les remena au secours 1339.

* Cette maison, qui subsiste encore à Berne, y jouit d'une considération, que la naissance et la richesse ne sauroient lui procurer. Elle fait preuve d'une noblesse reconnue dans les tournois du douzième siècle, mais elle y ajoute une gloire plus rare et plus véritable, celle d'avoir deux fois sauvé sa patrie et de lui avoir rendu en tout tems les services les plus distingués.

1339. de leurs amis. Ils étoient déjà victorieux, et la noblesse de la Bourgogne fuyoit de toutes parts devant les Suisses. Quatorze comtes et quatre-vingt chevaliers qui portoient les casques couronnés, perdirent la vie dans cette journée décisive. Les Bernois profitèrent de leur victoire, et les Suisses retournèrent dans leur patrie contens de la gloire qu'ils avoient acquise et de la reconnoissance de leurs amis qu'ils avoient sauvés. L'Europe apprit pour la première fois qu'une infanterie de paysans avoit battu en rase campagne la gendarmerie plus formidable encore par son courage que par l'armure pesante dont elle étoit couverte.

Ce fut dans cette guerre de Lauppen que les Suisses et les Bernois apprirent à se connoître. L'estime mutuelle, et les services qu'ils avoient rendus et reçus, les préparoient insensiblement à l'alliance perpétuelle qu'ils contractèrent bientôt après; mais avant que de la voir il faut arrêter les yeux sur une révolution qui changea par ses conséquences la face de l'Helvétie. Pour cet effet je dois remonter jusqu'à l'origine de Zurich, et parcourir l'histoire de cette ville, qui devint la première de la confédération Helvétique.

La ville de Zurich est située à la tête du lac de ce nom, au milieu d'un pays fertile et délicieux. On prétend que les anciens Helvétiens avoient remarqué les avantages d'un lieu que la nature semble avoir formé pour le séjour de l'homme, et qu'ils y avoient bâti une de leurs bourgades qui fut brûlée lorsqu'ils sortirent de leur patrie pour chercher de nouvelles habitations, rétablie ensuite par ce peuple ple après son retour, embellie par les Romains, et détruite par les Allemans vers le commencement du quatrième siècle. Elle demeura quelque tems déserte et ruinée, jusqu'à ce que la superstition fit sortir de ses masures une autre ville plus considérable que la première. Il s'étoit répandu une opinion que quelques soldats de la légion Thébienne avoient souffert le martyre à Zurich. On y découvrit bientôt leurs tombeaux; ces tombeaux devinrent des églises célèbres, et le bruit des prodiges dont elles étoient le théâtre, attira des habitans de toute la contrée voisine, qui se fixèrent sous la protection immédiate des saints Felix et Regula. Charlemagne paya aux préjugés de son siècle, et peut-être aux siens, le tribut d'une église de chanoines qu'il consacra avec les plus beaux privilèges au service de ces martyres. Louis, Roi de Germanie, son petit fils, les honora encore davantage par une abbaye de religieuses qu'il fonda en faveur de sa fille 853.

Hildegarde. Il accorda aux Saints Martyrs, et aux religieuses qui les représentoient, le domaine utile de Zurich, aussi bien que du pays d'Uri, et leur céda à perpétuité ces terres avec tous les serfs qui leur étoient attachés, et tous les droits et revenus que le souverain en retiroit. D'une donation aussi libérale il semble n'avoir excepté que la suzeraineté même. Les ducs de Suabe n'avoient rien à prétendre sur une ville enclavée dans leur gouvernement, mais qui ne dépendoit que d'un préfet impérial préposé pour veiller à la fois aux droits de l'empire et à ceux de l'église. Les empereurs eux-mêmes y tenoient souvent leur cour, et c'étoit là qu'ils

355. qu'ils établissoient leur tribunal toutes les fois qu'ils évoquoient les causes des Italiens en deçà des Alpes. Tant d'honneurs et de privilèges avoient fait de Zurich une des plus belles villes de la haute Allemagne. Les historiens du douzième siècle ont rendu témoignage à sa grandeur, sa beauté, et à l'abondance qui y régnoit. Cependant dans les diplomes des princes Carlovingiens elle n'est dé-1218. signée que par le nom de bourg et même de village. Elle ne fut entourée de murailles que sous le règne de Fréderic II et son territoire fut toujours borné à l'enceinte de ces murailles. Le principe de ses richesses étoit en elle-même et dans l'industrie d'un peuple nombreux et infatigable. Je ne sais si je dois assurer que Zurich a possédé une des premières manufactures de soie qu'on ait vu en Europe, manufacture que ses guerres civiles lui enlevèrent pour la transporter à Come dans le Milanois; mais il est constant que la plûpart des travaux utiles y fleurissoient depuis les premiers tems, et qu'elle s'enrichissoient en répandant sur les contrées voisines le fruit de son industrie. Cette industrie étoit à la vérité très inférieure à celle des Italiens. Les Zuriquois, simples et grossiers, se contentoient d'un nécessaire assez abondant et ne connurent point le besoin et les agrémens des beaux arts.

Les objets les plus généraux n'existent pour les hommes que relativement à leurs idées particulières. C'est ainsi que chaque ordre porte dans la société les mœurs et les préjugés de son état. Le noble ne daigne daigne jetter les yeux que sur un petit nombre d'hommes destinés par le droit de la naissance à régner sur la multitude. Pour le militaire la société politique n'est qu'un camp toujours armé contre ses voisins et qui ne reconnoît d'autres loix que les volontés de son chef. Le prêtre apperçoit partout des institutions divines et le don de la terre que Dieu a fait à ses élus. Le négociant sent que des hommes libres par leur nature sont unis par leurs besoins réciproques. L'esprit du commerce est celui de la liberté, et le commerce ne peut fleurir qu'à l'ombre des loix. Celui de Zurich s'accrut avec les privilèges qui se multiplioient tous les jours sous la douce administration des abbesses. L'Empereur Fréderic II. mit enfin le sceau à sa liberté en confirmant tous ses droits et en la déclarant ville impériale et inaliénable.

Dans l'obscurité répandue sur le premier age de l'histoire l'on entrevoit assez confusément la forme de la république Zuriquoise: elle étoit gouvernée, selon l'opinion la plus probable, par un conseil de trente-six personnes, choisies à la vérité par le corps de la bourgeoisie, mais dont les places étoient perpétuelles et l'autorité à peu près souveraine. Ils étoient partagés en trois chambres, qui se succédoient; et chaque chambre se voyoit à la tête de l'état pendant quatre mois de l'année. Dans les affaires difficiles elle s'associoit les lumières de ses collègues, et dans celles qui sembloient intéresser la communauté entière elle s'autorisoit par le suffrage d'un nombre considérable des bourgeois. Cette aristocratie gouverna longtems avec une justice 1335. tice et une tranquillité qui fournit peu d'événemens à l'histoire; mais enfin elle fut corrompue par le vice de son institution. Ces conseillers, abusant de leur pouvoir, se crurent les maîtres d'un peuple dont ils n'étoient que les ministres. Les graces et même la justice n'étoit que pour ceux dont les bassesses briguoient leur faveur et flattoient leur orgueil. Leur avarice et leur profusion épuisoient le trésor public, et le peuple n'étoit instruit de leur infidélité que par les nouveaux impôts qu'elle exigeoit de lui. Il sentit le triste état auquel ses magistrats l'avoient réduit, et n'espéroit point un avenir plus heureux. L'esprit du conseil se perpétuoit dans tous ses membres, et les Zuriquois, qui changeoient leurs tyrans trois fois par an, éprouvoient toujours la même tyrannie.

Un seul citoyen aspira à la gloire de libérateur de sa patrie. Il s'appelloit Rodolphe Brun, nom consacré par la reconnoissance de la postérité. Sa naissance et son mérite lui avoit donné une place dans le conseil; mais sa prudence et peut-être sa vertu lui dicta des maximes très opposées à celles de ses collègues. Il prévit que cette puissance fondée sur l'injustice alloit bientôt s'écrouler, et qu'en se déclarant le vengeur de leurs crimes il ne lui seroit pas difficile de s'élever sur leur chute au lieu de la partager. Des mœurs populaires et une réputation sans tâche prévenoient déjà ses concitoyens en sa faveur, et il employoit, pour gagner leur confiance, tous les arts de l'ambition qui s'humilie. Il s'intéressoit à toutes leurs affaires, écoutoit leurs plaintes avec une bonté attentive, s'attendrissoit s'attendrissoit sur leurs maux, leur rappelloit leurs droits et le bonheur de leurs ancêtres, exagéroit la dureté du conseil et ne leur laissoit d'espérance qu'en eux-mêmes. " Ami du peuple, et des loix, j'ai souvent élevé, leur disoit-il, ma foible voix contre l'oppression qu'on déguise ici sous le nom de justice. Mes efforts ont été inutiles à mes citoyens et pernicieux à moi-même. J'ai tout à craindre de l'inimitié des mes collègues. Je l'ai mérité pour avoir défendu un peuple qui ne sait se défendre lui-même." Ses discours découvroient aux Zuriquois le secret de leurs forces et de la foiblesse du conseil. Leur mépris pour ces maîtres qu'ils avoient si longtems révérés, s'augmentoit tous les jours avec leur admiration pour ce grand homme qui avoit ranimé leur courage. Guidés par ses avis, les citoyens refusèrent à la chambre qui entroit en office au commencement du mois de Mai, le serment de fidélité qu'elle exigeoit d'eux. Avant que de reconnoître son autorité, ils prétendoient qu'elle rendît un compte de sa dernière administration, et de tous les revenus publics qui lui étoient passés par les mains; ils déclaroient hautement qu'ils préparoient le même examen pour les deux autres chambres, et qu'ils ne souffriroient plus les excès honteux qui ne leur laissoient qu'un vain nom de république. Les conseillers, étonnés d'une audace à laquelle ils étoient si peu accoutumés, essayèrent encore de se soutenir par la hauteur, et commençèrent, sans égard aux remontrances des bourgeois, à s'acquitter des fonctions de leurs emplois; mais la hauteur irrite toutes les fois qu'elle n'intimide 1335.

1335. n'intimide point; leurs menaces de punir Brun et les autres conjurés ne servirent qu'à les convaincre de la nécessité où ils étoient de prendre un parti décisif. Ils le prirent enfin; la bourgeoisie s'assembla, courut aux armes, investit la maison de ville, dissipa sans répandre de sang le conseil qui y siégeoit, et anéantit dans un instant la vaine puissance de l'aristocratie. Les magistrats qui se sentoient les plus criminels se sauvèrent de la ville. Quelques uns osèrent se confier à la justice ou à la clémence de leurs concitoyens. Ceux-ci n'étoient qu'au nombre de sept. Brun lui-même se trouvoit parmi eux, mais sa justification fut à chaque moment interrompue par les applaudissemens d'un peuple entier qui le nommoit son chef, son ami et son sauveur. En attendant la tranquillité nécessaire pour les soins importans d'une nouvelle législation, ce peuple lui remit l'administration souveraine de l'état. Brun se chargea de ce fardeau glorieux avec une répugnance qu'il ne dissimuloit point. Il connoissoit la multitude et l'envie, et se hâta de donner à sa puissance des bornes qui la rendissent moins odieuse et plus assurée.

Peu de tems après, la bourgeoisie s'assembla pour donner son consentement à un corps de loix qui établissoit une nouvelle république sur les ruines de l'ancien conseil. Treize conseillers représentoient encore la partie aristocratique de la constitution, mais leur emploi passager expiroit à la fin de six mois, et ne pouvoit se renouveller en leur faveur qu'après un pareil intervalle. Ils étoient tirés de la classe des nobles auxquels on laissa l'honneur l'honneur d'être le premier ordre de l'état, mais en associant à leurs privilèges la partie la plus riche et la plus considérée de la bourgeoisie. Quinze jours avant le changement du conseil, le Bourguemestre, déclaré chef de la république par ce nouveau règlement, étoit tenu à nommer les deux chevaliers et les quatre bourgeois qu'il estimoit le plus, et à consulter avec eux sur le choix des sénateurs. Leur puissance étoit balancée par celles des tribuns qui siégeoient avec eux, et qui par le nombre, la durée, et l'autorité ne différoient point des sénateurs eux-mêmes. Ces tribuns étoient à la fois l'organe et les protecteurs du peuple qui les élisoit. La bourgeoisie de Zurich fut partagée en treize tribus ou corps de métiers. Chaque tribu composoit une partie intégrante de l'état, elle avoit ses privilèges, ses revenus, ses assemblées, et son représentant dans le conseil souverain. Toutes les puissances de la république s'anéantissoient et se renouvelloient deux fois par an, à l'exception de l'autorité du Bourguemestre, qui étoit fixe et perpétuelle. Il étoit chef du sénat, et son pouvoir s'étendoit également sur la guerre, les négociations étrangères, la justice, et la police intérieure. Le serment de fidélité qu'il avoit droit d'exiger de tous les citoyens étoit regardé par les loix comme le premier des sermens. Les Zuriquois avoient cru qu'une ville mal-affermie dans sa liberté et pleine de mécontens demandoit un dictateur, et ils ne craignèrent point l'ambition d'un citoyen qui avoit acquis toute leur confiance. Rodolphe Brun fut nommé Bourguemestre par une acclamation 1336.

1336. acclamation générale, et gouverna vingt-quatre ans plus encore par la considération personnelle que par la dignité de sa place. Mais ses successeurs, qui n'avoient que cette dignité, ne purent conserver des prérogatives aussi excessives, qui n'étoient plus nécessaires au salut de l'état et qui menaçoient sa liberté. On partagea bientôt l'autorité en établissant deux bourguemestres, qui se succédoient de la même manière que les autres officiers de la république; ils furent dépouillés de la nomination du sénat, et l'on dispensa les citoyens du serment de fidélité. L'esprit populaire, qui se fortifioit tous les jours, épargna aussi peu les privilèges de la noblesse que les droits de bourguemestre. Les tribus se plaignoient qu'un sénat trop peu nombreux ramenoit les tems de leur ancienne aristocratie. Elles voulurent régner; mais sensibles encore aux défauts d'une multitude qui ne sait ni délibérer ni agir, elles se contentèrent d'établir un conseil de deux cens personnes choisies dans toutes regarder le conseil des deux cens comme le véritable souverain de la république,* qui fait la nuance entre les états populaires de la Suisse et ceux dont les sénats aristocratiques se renouvellent eux-mêmes par une succession qui ne dépend point du choix de la communauté. 1393.
1393. les tribus par les suffrages des bourgeois. Ils se reposèrent sur ce conseil, la créature et l'image du peuple, des soins d'une autorité qu'ils ne savoient exercer eux-mêmes. Ils lui confièrent le choix des bourguemestres et du sénat, et toute la puissance exécutrice. De la puissance législative ils n'exceptèrent que les affaires qui intéressoient la religion, l'empire, et la confédération Helvétique, dont la connoissance étoit réservée aux assemblées générales du peuple. Tous les grands traits de cette constitution subsistent encore à Zurich, mais l'exception est oubliée ou abolie, et l'on doit regarder

Le législateur de Zurich, après avoir donné ces loix, crut devoir obtenir la confirmation de tous ceux dont les droits étoient encore reconnus par les citoyens. L'Empereur (c'étoit toujours Louis de Bavière) approuva la forme de gouvernement qu'ils avoient établi. L'abbesse du couvent de Zurich les affranchit de sa dépendance avec une facile bonté qui ne lui laissa que le titre de prince dont elle se pare avec complaisance dans le diplome qui existe encore de cette transaction. Le chapitre des chanoines suivit son exemple, et remit à la ville la plûpart des anciens droits qui lui restoient

* Les propositions générales sont rarement exactes par la raison même qu'elles sont générales. J'ai tâché de bien voir mon objet, mais cet objet assez vaste renferme dans ses détails mille exceptions que la nature de mon plan ne m'a point permis de suivre. C'est ainsi que je semble confondre les sénateurs et les tribuns de la nouvelle constitution actuelle. Ceux-ci, qui sont à la tête des représentans de chaque tribu, entrent au sénat par l'élection immédiate du peuple, pendant que les premiers, avec les bourguemestres et les autres magistrats, sont tirés du nombre des deux cens par le choix même de ce conseil. Je me suis vu forcé à ne donner qu'une idée très légère de la classe des nobles, (en Allemand Constoffil,) qui a perdu quelques unes de ces prérogatives et qui en conserve plusieurs autres. J'attends d'ailleurs de l'indulgence ou plutôt de l'équité des Suisses qu'ils n'oublient jamais qu'étranger moi-même, j'écris principalement pour les étrangers.

1336. encore, et qui n'étoient plus qu'un témoignage honteux de la première servitude des bourgeois.

Occupés de cette révolution, nous avons perdu de vue le sort des mauvais citoyens qui l'occasionnèrent. On les jugea avec rigueur, mais leurs arrêts portent le caractère de la justice dans l'exactitude scrupuleuse avec laquelle on y proportionne les punitions aux crimes. Les uns sont punis par les amendes. On impose aux autres un exil plus ou moins long; on flétrit le nom des plus coupables en interdisant à eux et à leurs enfans l'entrée des charges publiques. Quelques conseillers, qui préféroient un repos assuré à une vengeance incertaine, se soumirent à leur sentence, reconnurent la nouvelle république, et s'étudièrent à mieux obéir qu'ils n'avoient commandé. Tous les autres se retirèrent auprès du Comte de Raperschwyl, qui se trouvoit par la situation de ses états ami très utile ou ennemi dangereux des Zuriquois, dont la politique avoit eu soin de ménager peu auparavant avec lui une alliance étroite. Mais ce prince, sorti de la maison d'Autriche, étoit trop sensible au plaisir d'affoiblir une ville libre et puissante pour ne pas accueillir tant de ses citoyens mécontens qui la déchiroient de leurs propres mains. Il leur accorda le château de Raperschwyl pour retraite, et leur permit de travailler à la ruine de leur patrie. Aussitôt que la nouvelle de leur révolte fut portée à Zurich, le sénat confisqua tous leurs biens, et leur dénonça un exil perpétuel. Irrité enfin par la mauvaise foi du comte et par la protection qu'il accordoit toujours à leurs sujets rebelles, il voulut l'en l'en punir. Les citoyens, rassemblés sous la ban- 1337.

nière de la ville, montèrent sur leurs bateaux, et voguèrent sur le lac de Zurich du côté de Raperschwyl. Les exilés joignirent leur désespoir au courage des habitans; les assaillans furent repoussés, et le Comte de Toggenbourg, qu'une querelle particulière avoit engagé à joindre ses armes à celles des Zuriquois, demeura prisonnier entre les mains des ennemis. Le Comte de Habsbourg assiégeoit alors la petite ville de Grynau située à l'extrémité du lac, et les Zuriquois s'avançèrent jusques là pour se venger sur sa personne de l'échoc qu'ils avoient reçu devant sa capitale. L'entreprise fut heureuse; le comte fut tué après un combat opiniâtre qui fit périr la plûpart des siens. Les Zuriquois rentrèrent dans leur ville contens et victorieux, mais leur joie fut troublée par le triste sort de leur allié. Il fut la victime de la fureur de ceux de Raperschwyl, qui croyoient signaler leur amour pour leur prince, en sacrifiant à ses manes ce prisonnier malheureux, qui fut coupé en mille morceaux: la république de Zurich profita de la première terreur qu'inspirèrent ses succès pour détruire plusieurs châteaux qui l'incommodoient, et fit des alliances avec l'abbé et la ville de St. Gall, et les villes de Basle, de Schaffouse, et de Constance. Elle réussit aussi à attirer dans son parti un grand nombre de maisons des chevaliers de Rhodes, aujourd'hui de Malte, dont la foi et la valeur ont été les mêmes dans tous les siècles.

Zurich jouit d'une assez grande tranquillité 1350.
pendant l'enfance du jeune Comte de Habsbourg,

1350. fils de celui qui avoit été tué au combat de Grynau, mais sa jeunesse fut empoisonnée sans peine par les conseils intéressés des exilés qui lui répétoient toujours qu'il avoit à la fois son père et sa gloire à venger. Trop foible cependant pour prendre les armes il choisit une vengeance lâche et perfide. Les exilés avoient toujours entretenu des intelligences secrettes dans leur ancienne patrie. Toutes les républiques renferment des mécontens à qui les magistrats sont odieux, des coupables qui craignent les loix, des hommes ruinés qui n'espèrent que dans la confusion générale, et des esprits ambitieux qui travaillent à fonder leur grandeur sur cette confusion. Ils se réunirent tous par les intrigues des exilés, se devouèrent à leurs intérêts, et promirent de les ramener dans Zurich embrasé et inondé du sang de tous les partisans du bourguemestre et du sénat. Huit cens soldats du comte se glissèrent dans la ville à la faveur de leurs déguisemens et se dispersèrent dans les maisons de leurs partisans. Une cavalerie choisie s'approchoit de toutes les portes, pendant que plusieurs chaloupes armées se préparoient à entrer dans le port à la faveur de la nuit. Le Comte de Habsbourg avoit communiqué ses desseins à un grand nombre de gentilshommes qui ne rougirent point d'être les complices des assassins. Il gardoit encore quelques dehors de bienséance avec les citoyens de Zurich, et l'on ne fut point surpris de le voir arriver dans la ville avec une suite très nombreuse de nobles et de militaires. Quelques uns des exilés eurent la hardiesse de le suivre, le sénat ne voulut pas les voir, et le peuple s'imagina qu'ils venoient pour faire leur soumission et pour recevoir la grace que leur protecteur avoit tant de fois sollicitée pour eux. Le complot se tramoit avec un secret qui déroboit aux yeux vigilans du bourguemestre les manœuvres des conjurés, dont aucun ne fut ébranlé ni par la crainte ni par les remords. Un jeune garçon fut le sauveur de l'état. Le hasard lui fit entendre les discours de quelques soldats du Comte de Habsbourg, qui se communiquoient mutuellement les ordres qu'ils avoient reçus de prendre les armes à une heure après minuit, de s'emparer de la maison de ville, et de massacrer Rodolphe Brun et toute sa faction. Il apprit jusqu'au mot de ralliement qui servoit à distinguer les séditieux. Déjà l'heure approche, le tems presse, et le danger croit à chaque instant. Ce jeune homme court chez le bourguemestre, le fait lever, et lui apprend que dans peu de momens, la liberté et les amis de la liberté vont perir. Brun prend son parti avec ce courage tranquille qui voit le danger et ne s'en étonne point. Il change d'habit avec son valet, traverse les flots séditieux, qui remplissent déjà les rues et qui n'attendent que le signal du carnage, perce jusqu'à l'hôtel de ville, s'enferme dans le clocher, et sonne le tocsin. Réveillés par ce bruit terrible, les citoyens effrayés s'arment, sortent de leurs maisons, et volent au secours de leur chef qui se défendoit dans la maison de ville, dont les conjurés travailloient à enfoncer les portes. L'allarme se répandit dans tous les quartiers de la ville, et l'on combattoit dans les ténèbres de la nuit, sans trop connoître son 1350. 24 Fevrier.

le

1350. danger ni ses ennemis. Les bouchers terrassoient avec leurs grandes haches tout ce qui se présentoit devant eux. Les prêtres de la cathédrale interrompirent l'office pour courir au secours de la patrie avec les armes qu'ils trouvèrent dans la sacristie. Bientôt la voix du bourguemestre fit connoître aux citoyens les objets de leur juste terreur. Mille flambeaux s'allumoient dans toutes les rues, les conjurés furent accablés du haut des maisons d'une grêle de pierres et de traits. Le jour parut enfin et découvrit le spectacle affreux du carnage d'un combat nocturne. Mais les Zuriquois victorieux virent avec transport leurs ennemis étendus à leurs pieds, le petit nombre qui restoit encore, chargé de fers, les campagnes remplies d'une cavalerie qui fuyoit avec précipitation, et le lac couvert des débris des bateaux qui s'étoient brisés dans la confusion de leur retraite. Les corps morts des conjurés demeurèrent sans sépulture, abandonnés à la fureur et aux insultes de la populace. Les prisonniers ne furent épargnés que pour éprouver le supplice qu'ils avoient si bien mérité. Dix-sept d'entre eux furent exposés sur la roue devant leurs maisons; dix-huit furent décapités devant l'hôtel de ville. Le Comte de Toggenbourg avoit péri dans le lac. Le Baron de Mazingen et un Seigneur de Landenberg furent tués les armes à la main. Le Comte de Habsbourg lui-même avec le Baron de Bonstetten étoient du nombre des prisonniers, mais on respecta encore en eux la naissance qu'ils avoient déshonorée, et l'on se contenta de les garder étroitement.

Le

Le Bourguemestre Brun ne laissa point à refroidir l'indignation publique. Il profita de sa première fureur pour conduire la bannière de Zurich devant la ville de Raperschwyl dont le voisinage lui avoit toujours été incommode. Les Zuriquois la prirent par capitulation, détruisirent ses murs et sa citadelle, dévastèrent toutes les terres du Comte de Habsbourg, et obligèrent tous ses sujets à leur prêter serment de fidélité. 1350. 2 Mars.

Des succès aussi rapides élevèrent la gloire de Zurich: le peuple, qui passe avec tant de facilité de la consternation à la fierté, fut ébloui de cette gloire, pendant que son sage magistrat n'en voyoit que les périls. Il savoit que le sang ou l'intérêt unissoient le Comte de Habsbourg à la maison d'Autriche et à toute la noblesse Helvétique. Pour soutenir le choc de tant d'ennemis, que l'indignation, la honte, et la jalousie alloient armer contre sa patrie, il lui cherche un nouveau rempart. La foi et la valeur des Suisses lui étoient connues; pour les intéresser en sa faveur, il proposa aux quatre cantons de recevoir Zurich dans leur confédération perpétuelle. Les Suisses eurent la sage hardiesse de mépriser le danger actuel et de le sacrifier aux avantages futurs et à l'honneur que leur promettoit une pareille alliance. Ils l'acceptèrent sans hésiter, et pour témoigner leur respect à la première ville de l'Helvétie, ils lui accordèrent cette primauté dont elle jouit encore dans la confédération.

Le fond de cette alliance est le même que dans les traités précédens, mais on s'apperçoit que les liens de l'amitié se relachent en s'étendant. Au lieu d'une 1351. Mai.

1351. obligation simple de marcher avec toutes ses forces à la première réquisition d'un allié, une diette générale doit juger de l'objet, du péril, et du secours qu'il exige, et le canton qui a reçu les avantages de ce secours doit fournir aux frais de l'expédition. Les alliés ne se dépouillent point du droit de prendre des engagemens avec les puissances étrangères; mais ils jurent que ces engagemens n'auront jamais rien de contraire à ceux qu'ils viennent de contracter. Les quatre cantons, attachés à leurs premiers nœuds, déclarent qu'ils auront toujours la préférence sur cette alliance plus récente et moins étroite.* Elle porte cependant les caractères sacrés d'une union intime, égale et perpétuelle, qui distingue la Confédération Helvétique de tous les autres traités, tristes monumens de l'ambition et de la perfidie de l'homme.

Les craintes des Zuriquois n'avoient point été sans fondement. Le Duc d'Autriche se déclara leur ennemi; c'étoit Albert, surnommé le boiteux, seul fils qui restoit encore de l'Empereur Albert. Etranger à la Suisse, qu'il ne visitoit que très rarement, il méconnut, aussi bien que les autres princes de sa maison, la force et la foiblesse de ses états éloignés. Il témoigna son indignation de V. Tschudi, ad loc. De Watteville, Hist. de la Confédération Helvétique, tom. i. p. 262.

* C'est dans ce traité qu'il faut chercher la première idée de ce qu'on a ensuite nommé droit Helvétique, auquel chaque canton et chaque individu étoit tenu à soumettre ses différens. Les deux partis nommoient quatre arbitres tirés du corps Helvétique. Ces juges assermentés prononçoient leur arrêt. S'ils se trouvoient partagés ils choisissoient un sur-arbitre qui n'avoit que le droit d'opter entre les deux avis. Lorsque la patrie des arbitres s'y trouvoit intéressée, on avoit la précaution de les dispenser du serment de fidelité qu'ils lui avoient prêté.

l'at-

l'attentat que les Zuriquois avoient osé commettre ; 1351.
il réclama hautement la personne et les droits du Comte de Habsbourg, son parent et son vassal, et il exigea encore qu'après lui avoir rendu la liberté, ils expiassent, par une amende considérable, les outrages qu'il avoit soufferts. Les Zuriquois représentèrent vainement qu'ils avoient suivi la première des loix; qu'ils n'étoient coupables que d'avoir détourné le glaive de l'assassin ; et que le Comte de Habsbourg, cet assassin, leur devoit la vie qu'il avoit mérité de perdre. On leur répondit qu'il falloit choisir de la soumission ou de la guerre. Ils choisirent la guerre, et se préparèrent à la soutenir. Les Suisses, leurs nouveaux alliés, leur envoyèrent un secours de quinze cens hommes qui ne démentirent point la gloire de la nation. D'un autre côté, la noblesse Helvétique, qui se prêtoit avec une sorte d'enthousiasme au ressentiment de leur duc, le mit bientôt en état de lever une armée nombreuse et de marcher en personne contre la ville de Zurich.

Ce fut dans cette guerre que le Duc Albert assiégea deux fois cette capitale. C'est ainsi du moins que les historiens de la nation ont désigné des opérations militaires qui ressemblent assez peu à nos sièges. L'armée Autrichienne s'approchoit de la place pour l'investir, ceux qui cherchoient à signaler leur bravoure s'avançoient jusqu'aux portes pour défier les habitans au combat. Les Zuriquois, tranquilles sur leur foibles remparts, rioient des efforts impuissans d'un ennemi destitué de tout ce que l'art a inventé pour les attaquer. Quelquefois irrités 1351. irrités de leurs insultes ils y répondoient avec audace. Ils ouvroient les portes pour inviter l'approche des Autrichiens, et la prévenoient par des sorties fréquentes, qui ne produisoient que des combats sanglans et inutiles. Le courage de cette noblesse indépendante s'animoit dans le péril et cédoit assez facilement aux difficultés. Elle se dégoûtoit bientôt d'un siège qui ne lui annonçoit que l'ennui et la fatigue, se retiroit et entraînoit dans sa retraite le Duc d'Autriche, dont les forces principales consistoient dans le service volontaire de ses vassaux. Ce duc, trop foible pour vaincre, étoit néanmoins assez fort pour nuire. Les habitans de cette triste contrée distinguoient leur marche et leur retraite par leurs villages embrasés, leurs moissons enlevées, leurs vignes arrachées, et par les cris des malheureux qui éprouvoient la fureur du soldat livré à lui-même. Le Duc Albert avoit amené de l'Autriche quinze cens Hongrois, dont la férocité naturelle ignoroit également les loix de la discipline et celles de l'humanité. Je ne m'appesanterai point sur le détail de ces horreurs qui effrayent sans instruire. L'objet de l'histoire, c'est l'homme; on doit l'étudier jusques dans les excès qui déshonorent sa nature; mais ces excès renouvellés dans tous les siècles nous ont déjà depuis longtems appris combien il est foible et méchant.

Les Zuriquois souffroient beaucoup d'un ennemi qui poussoit ses ravages jusqu'aux pieds de leurs murs, mais ils goûtèrent quelquefois le triste plaisir d'une vengeance qui ne s'exerçoit à la vérité que sur les sujets innocens d'un prince coupable envers eux.

Dans

Dans une de ces courses que fit le bourguemestre à la tête de 1200 hommes, il brûla les bains de Bade et dévasta tout le pays des environs. Chargé du butin, il avoit repris le chemin de Zurich lorsqu'il s'engagea dans le défilé de Tatwyl sans avoir reconnu les hauteurs qui le dominoient. Elles étoient occupées par les Autrichiens, qui l'attaquèrent dans le même instant de tous côtés avec une confiance et une impétuosité qui sembloient annoncer et assurer la victoire. Rodolphe Brun fit voir dans cette occasion, qu'il y a des momens de surprise et de terreur dans lesquels l'âme la plus ferme est trahie par les sens. Il oublia le dépôt important que lui avoit confié la patrie, et pour se dérober à un péril incertain il se condamna à l'infamie qui poursuit toujours la lâcheté. Les Zuriquois, découragés par la fuite de leur chef, se crurent perdus. Ils l'étoient en effet, si son Lieutenant, Roger de Mannes, n'eut rétabli l'ordre et la confiance par un artifice heureux. " La grande bannière de la république, s'écria-t-il, s'avance pour nous dégager. Notre bourguemestre nous a quitté pour précipiter sa marche. Mais si vous m'en croyez, notre salut et la gloire de cette journée ne seront l'ouvrage que de nos mains." Aussitôt il vole par tous les rangs, il donne au bataillon Zuriquois la forme serrée et pointue d'un coin, pousse les Autrichiens, ébranlés d'un effort aussi imprévu, les enfonce et se fait un chemin sanglant pour sortir du défilé. Le combat recommença dans la plaine avec une nouvelle opiniâtreté, mais avec plus d'égalité, lorsqu'une circonstance heureuse seconda la valeur 1351.

des

des Suisses. Une petite troupe de cent cinquante hommes parut tout à coup et donne sur le flanc des Autrichiens. L'imagination trompée fit voir aux deux partis la grande armée de Zurich, dont cette troupe ne formoit que l'avant-garde. Les Autrichiens cédèrent le champ de bataille qu'ils avoient si bien disputé. Sept cens morts y demeurèrent, et les vainqueurs recueillirent soixante-cinq casques couronnés, avec les bannières de Bremgarten, Mellingen, &c. Roger de Mannes rentra dans Zurich parmi les acclamations des citoyens qui apprirent en même tems son danger et sa victoire.

Au milieu de la joie publique le malheureux bourguemestre, caché dans une maison de campagne, fuyoit la lumière et les hommes. Mais la reconnoissance de ses compatriotes leur fit oublier une faute que les peuples guerriers ne savent pardonner. Toute la bourgeoisie, assemblée sous la bannière, alla le chercher avec une compassion respectueuse, et le ramena dans une ville qu'il avoit sauvé deux fois. On le remercia de n'avoir pas exposé l'état en sa personne. La politique des Zuriquois, remplie de justice et d'humanité, pardonna sa foiblesse à ses services, et lui conserva l'estime publique dont il avoit besoin pour réparer cette foiblesse, et pour être toujours utile à la république.

Les combats les plus célèbres sont bientôt oubliés, ce sont de petits traits qui se confondent avec mille traits semblables dans le grand tableau des misères humaines. Mais on ne doit point oublier que de la confusion de cette guerre sortirent deux états libres qui furent ajoutés à la confédération Helvétique par les victoires et par la modération des Suisses.

deux

Le pays de Glaris a de grands rapports avec les cantons de Schwitz et d'Uri, dont il n'est séparé que par de hautes montagnes. Le ciel et la terre sont les mêmes; et l'on sait assez combien l'homme est esclave du climat. Dans le tems que la haute Allemagne n'étoit qu'un vaste désert parsemé d'un petit nombre de bourgs et de villages, un de ses ducs donna le territoire de Glaris avec tous ses serfs à St. Fridelin, et ce moine transporta ce présent assez peu considérable aux religieuses de Seckingen sur le Rhin, dont il étoit le directeur. Les abbesses ne firent jamais sentir à leurs nouveaux sujets le poids de la servitude. Elles ne se reservèrent que la haute justice et des redevances assez modiques. La liberté de Glaris se formoit entre leurs mains, et ses habitans établirent, sous la protection de l'abbaye, une république populaire. Nous avons déjà vu que ces bons paysans, contens d'une liberté obscure, avoient obtenu de leur souveraine la promesse de ne les jamais aliéner, et qu'au mépris de ses sermens elle les céda aux ducs d'Autriche, en nommant ces princes avocats héréditaires ou protecteurs de l'abbaye dans le pays de Glaris. Les citoyens, qui préféroient l'exil aux fers, se retirèrent les uns à Zurich, les autres dans les cantons populaires. L'on arracha à ceux qui restèrent dans le pays un serment de fidélité qu'ils ne violèrent jamais, et la maison d'Autriche trouvoit parmi eux le secours utile d'une infanterie impénétrable.

1351. ble.* Cette maison paya leurs services avec la reconnoissance ordinaire des princes:—le mépris, l'oppression et les injustices. Les impôts et les corvées se multiplièrent. L'on enleva aux habitans le choix de leur premier magistrat qui fut remplacé par un gouverneur étranger. Le feu qui prit au dépôt des archives avoit détruit un grand nombre des anciens diplomes sur lesquels se fondoit la liberté de Glaris. Ses nouveaux maîtres leur refusèrent la permission qu'ils sollicitoient de les faire rétablir, et ne cachèrent plus le dessein qu'ils avoient formé d'éteindre jusqu'à la mémoire de leurs anciens privilèges. Leurs voisins les Suisses, instruits de l'esclavage sous lequel ils gémissoient, prirent la résolution d'affoiblir leur ennemi, en lui enlevant des sujets qu'il n'étoit pas digne de gouverner. Ils entrèrent dans le pays de Glaris avec des forces assez considérables. Les officiers du duc s'enfuirent à leur approche, le peuple vint au devant de ses libérateurs, renonça aux nœuds qu'avoit brisé la tyrannie, et prêta avec transport le serment de fidélité qu'on exigeoit de lui au nom des quatre premiers cantons. Assurés de leur obéissance, les Suisses ne commandèrent aux vaincus que de reprendre leur liberté et de la mériter. Bientôt ils les élevèrent au rang de leurs alliés par un traité Chron. Joan. Vitoduran. p. 29.

* En 1330 le Duc Othon assiégeoit la ville de Colmar en Alsace. Voici les paroles d'un historien contemporain: "Rex Bohemiæ pertransiens per circuitum castrorum Ducis, et perveniens ad aciem virorum de Glarus, vidensque illorum instrumenta bellica, et vasa interfectionis dicta Gesa, in vulgari Helnbarton; admirans ait, O quam terribilis est aspectus istius cunei, cum suis instrumentis horribilibus et non modicum metuendis!"

qui

qui fit de Glaris un des cantons du corps Helvétique. 1351.
On reconnoît cependant dans ce traité, des conditions inégales qui ne furent dictées que par une juste crainte des partisans cachés de la maison d'Autriche, et qui disparurent dès que cette crainte ne subsistoit plus. Les quatre cantons se réservent l'interprétation de toutes les difficultés, et s'attribuent jusqu'au pouvoir de changer par leur consentement unanime les articles de cette alliance. Ils dépouillent le canton de Glaris du droit de prendre des engagemens avec les puissances étrangères, mais ils assujettissent ce canton à toutes les obligations qu'ils trouveront à propos de contracter eux-mêmes. On retrouve dans ce traité l'exception de tous les droits de la maison d'Autriche, et l'exception plus sincère des services que le pays devoit à l'abbaye de Seckingen et dont il se racheta enfin quelques années après.

Enhardis par ce premier succès, les Suisses ne 1352.
songèrent qu'à pousser leurs avantages contre un ennemi qui ne savoit supporter ni la paix ni la guerre. Ils s'avançèrent dans le territoire de Zug et mirent le siège devant cette ville, dont la situation et la force l'avoient rendue une place d'armes très importante qui menaçoit la frontière des Suisses, et qui ne leur laissoit qu'une communication assez difficile avec leurs nouveaux alliés de Zurich. Le pays de Zug est une plaine favorisée par la nature, mais il n'avoit jamais connu les douceurs de la liberté. Ce patrimoine des anciens comtes de Lentzbourg, étoit entré dans la maison d'Autriche avec la succession des comtes de Kybourg ; et le peuple soumis 1352. soumis au joug respectoit ses princes par devoir et par habitude. La patience et le devouement qui font l'héroisme de la servitude lui tenoient lieu de l'amour d'une patrie qui n'existoit point pour lui. Rempli de cet esprit, il résista avec courage aux Suisses et supporta sans murmures tous les maux d'un siège opiniâtre. Lorsque les habitans se virent enfin prêts à succomber aux efforts des assiégeans ils leur demandèrent une trève de trois jours pour instruire leur souverain de leur danger. Le Duc Albert se promenoit dans les cloîtres de Konigsfeld lorsque les députés de Zug l'abordèrent. Au lieu de l'accueil qu'il devoit à de pareils sujets, il se plaisoit à leur marquer un mépris qui ne déshonoroit que lui-même. Il écouta leurs plaintes d'un air distrait, les interrompit pour donner des ordres à ses fauconniers, et leur dit, avec une indifférence hautaine, qu'ils n'avoient qu'à se rendre, et qu'il sauroit bien les reprendre. Les citoyens de Zug ne profitèrent qu'à regret des droits que leur prince leur avoit rendus : mais il fallut céder à la nécessité et traiter avec les Suisses, qui leur proposèrent de signer, au lieu d'une capitulation humiliante, une alliance perpétuelle. La modération de cette république naissante n'étoit point encore corrompue par le goût des conquêtes ; éclairée sur ses vrais intérêts, elle préféra l'amitié d'un peuple brave et libre au triste soin de garder des esclaves ; Zug devint un nouveau canton du corps Helvétique. Les peuples de son territoire établirent un gouvernement populaire, que l'union du bourg principal tempéra d'un mélange d'aristocratie, cratie, qui laissoit dans sa constitution le germe de la discorde civile. 1352.

J'ai rassemblé les traits principaux d'une guerre qui fut plus d'une fois suspendue par les négociations et interrompue par les trèves. Albert se voyoit dépouiller de ses états héréditaires par les Suisses; pendant que Zurich opposoit toujours à sa fureur un rempart impénétrable. Ce prince foible et inquiet traitoit avec un ennemi qu'il ne savoit vaincre, violoit les traités qu'il venoit de signer, et achetoit la guerre et la paix aux dépens de sa gloire. J'entrevois dans une de ces négociations une scène assez singulière mais que les historiens ont mal su développer. Le duc d'Autriche et les Suisses ne pouvant pas s'accorder au sujet de leurs prétensions mutuelles convinrent de s'en rapporter au jugement des arbitres. Agnès, Reine de Hongrie, sœur du Duc d'Autriche et fille de l'Empereur Albert premier, fut choisie pour décider entre sa famille et une nation ennemie. Cet honneur fut déféré à quarante ans de retraite et à sa réputation de sainteté; mais elle montra par sa conduite que cette sainteté n'avoit rien de commun avec la justice. Les intérêts de son frère dictèrent la sentence qui lui accorda tout ce qu'il avoit demandé, et qui exigea des Zuriquois seize de leurs premiers citoyens pour lui répondre de l'exécution du traité. La confiance excessive des Suisses ne paroît aujourd'hui qu'une imprudence assez ridicule, mais ce ridicule est celui d'un peuple qui croit à la vertu dans un siècle corrompu. Ils se préparoient à remplir les conditions dures et injustes qu'on leur avoit 1352. imposées, lorsque le Duc se rappella que, par un oubli des plus étranges, l'article le plus essentiel avoit été négligé, et qu'on n'avoit rien stipulé en faveur du Comte de Habsbourg pour qui l'on avoit entrepris la guerre. Furieux de ce que les Suisses lui refusoient la liberté de son parent, il reprit les armes, et renonça, par sa perfidie, à tous les avantages qu'il trouvoit dans la sentence arbitrale. Bientôt il fallut négocier de nouveau; un arbitre moins intéressé prononça un arrêt plus impartial; c'étoit Louis, Margrave de Brandenbourg, et fils du feu Empereur Louis de Bavière. Il rendit la liberté au Comte de Habsbourg sans rançon, mais aussi sans dédommagement, il confirma toutes les alliances des Suisses, mais il n'affranchit point les sujets de la maison d'Autriche de l'obéissance à leur souverain. Il devoit prévoir et sans doute il prévoyoit que les deux partis ne s'accorderoient jamais sur l'interprétation des derniers articles qui semblent se contredire. Le sort de Zug et de Glaris devint une source de difficultés qui se terminèrent bientôt par une nouvelle guerre.

1353. Toutes ces tentatives inutiles d'Albert lui apprirent enfin qu'il étoit trop foible pour réussir dans une entreprise qu'il ne pouvoit ni exécuter ni abandonner. Il s'adressa à l'Empereur, lui représenta le danger de ces alliances particulières qui se formoient dans le sein de l'empire sans le consentement de son chef, et lui fit entrevoir avec terreur, cette indépendance féroce qui s'étoit formée dans les montagnes de la Suisse, qui descendoit déjà dans la plaine, et qui s'insinuoit avec impunité

dans

dans toutes les provinces de l'Allemagne. Cet Empereur n'étoit plus Louis de Bavière. Charles, Roi de Bohème et petit-fils de Henri VII. occupoit depuis six ans un trône qu'il devoit à ses profusions et à la faveur des prêtres. Il avoit acheté cette faveur par des bassesses qui avilirent sa dignité, et la comparaison de son caractère timide et artificieux avec la franchise intrépide de son prédécesseur l'exposa au mépris des peuples. La postérité reconnoît qu'avec un esprit éclairé il avoit l'âme petite et foible. Il écouta avec trop de complaisance les plaintes du Duc d'Autriche, partit du fond de la Bohème, et se rendit à Zurich dans le dessein de briser les nœuds d'une confédération qu'il voyoit d'un œil d'inquiétude et de jalousie. Mais avant que de se déclarer l'ennemi ouvert des Suisses il commença par des moyens plus assortis à son caractère. Il se para de l'impartialité d'un Médiateur qui ne cherchoit qu'à terminer une guerre si funeste aux provinces de la haute Allemagne, et proposa aux Suisses de soumettre à sa décision tous leurs différens avec l'Autriche. Ce peuple, à qui les artifices de son ennemi avoient enfin inspiré la défiance, pénétra sans peine les desseins de l'Empereur, qui ne les avoit pas assez bien dissimulés. Ils lui répondirent avec une fermeté respectueuse " qu'ils consentoient à le rendre juge de cette triste et longue querelle, mais qu'ils exceptoient la question de leurs alliances. Que ces alliances, justifiées par leurs privilèges et par les loix de l'Empire, étoient le fondement de leur sureté et de leur liberté, et qu'ils n'exposeroient 1353.

jamais au jugement des hommes ces nœuds chers et indissolubles qui ne pouvoient déplaire qu'à leurs ennemis et ceux de la justice." Les insinuations de l'Empereur ni ses menaces ne purent jamais les faire départir de cette réponse.

1354. Une résistance aussi opiniâtre irrita enfin l'orgueil de l'empereur. Il voulut parler en vainqueur aux peuples qui avoient refusé de l'écouter comme juge et comme médiateur. Le Duc d'Autriche, charmé d'une résolution aussi conforme à ses intérêts, se préparoit à joindre les drapeaux de Charles avec toutes les forces de sa maison. L'on voyoit sous les mêmes drapeaux les troupes Bohémiennes qui suivoient leur roi, et les corps auxiliaires que les princes et les villes libres de l'empire ne pouvoient refuser à la réquisition de leur chef. L'exagération a porté cette armée formidable jusqu'au nombre de cent mille hommes, mais les historiens les plus exacts nous assurent qu'elle étoit composée de quatre mille cavaliers et de quarante mille fantassins. Elle s'approcha de Zurich et investit la ville par deux camps séparés, dont l'un fut composé des troupes des princes et l'autre de celles des villes. Les Zuriquois, étonnés de voir fondre sur eux toutes les forces de l'Allemagne avec l'empereur à leur tête, ne songèrent cependant qu'à se défendre avec fermeté. Le bourguemestre encouragea, par sa conduite et par ses discours, un peuple aguerri qui combattoit pour sa liberté et pour ses foyers. Quinze cens Suisses augmentèrent cette petite troupe qui se croyoit invincible. Brun profita de cet enthousiasme, fit ouvrir toutes les portes, et se campa fièrement sous les remparts à la vue d'un ennemi étonné de son audace, qui n'étoit point une imprudence téméraire. Il savoit que cette armée nombreuse cachoit dans son sein le principe de sa foiblesse et de sa destruction; qu'elle étoit sans union et sans obéissance, et que ce souverain de la Chrétienté ne traînoit à sa suite tant de princes puissans que pour éprouver à chaque instant leur discorde et leur indocilité. L'événement ne trompa pas les espérances de ce sage magistrat. Le point d'honneur, ce principe utile et dangereux, qui sacrifie l'intérêt général à la gloire de l'individu, fit naître une mésintelligence entre les nations différentes de l'armée de l'empire, qui se disputoient l'honneur et le danger de la première attaque. Les Bohémiens demandoient à se signaler sous les yeux de leur prince; l'Evêque de Constance déclaroit au nom des Suabes qu'ils ne céderoient jamais le privilège que Charlemagne avoit accordé à leurs ayeux. Les Autrichiens insistoient que c'étoit à eux de venger leurs injures et celles de leur souverain. L'assaut ne se donna point et Zurich fut sauvé. Les troupes des villes ne firent de leur côté que des efforts assez foibles. La vue de l'étendard de l'empire, que le bourguemestre avoit arboré sur les murs, les fit rougir de la lâche complaisance avec laquelle elles avoient suivi les drapeaux d'une foule de princes, ennemis de la liberté et de toute ville impériale. Elles se retirèrent malgré les remontrances de l'Empereur et du Duc d'Autriche. L'Empereur lui-même suivit bientôt leur exemple; il reprit le chemin de la Bo- 1354.

les

1354. hème, et laissa sans gloire une entreprise sur laquelle l'Allemagne avoit les yeux ouverts. Le Duc Albert s'opiniâtra encore, mais ses efforts impuissans ne servirent qu'à redoubler sa honte.

Charles sentit bientôt qu'il avoit déshonoré la majesté impériale par une démarche assez contraire à ses vrais intérêts. Peu content de lui-même, il cherchoit à haïr le Duc d'Autriche, l'auteur de sa faute et de son repentir. L'ancienne jalousie de leurs deux maisons s'aigrissoit par leurs reproches mutuels, et la haine ne succède que trop facilement à la vaine amitié des grands. L'Empereur, mécontent d'Albert, vit d'un œil moins sévère cette confédération ennemie de l'Autriche. Il s'offrit de nouveau pour médiateur avec une sincérité qui persuada aux Suisses de lui rendre une partie de leur confiance. Mais ce prince, ami timide et ennemi peu redoutable, ménagea toujours le Duc d'Autriche qu'il n'aimoit plus, et n'osa jamais prononcer l'arrêt clair et définitif qu'on lui demandoit. Toutes ses sentences portoient le caractère de la foiblesse et de l'obscurité, et la variété d'interprétations dont elles étoient susceptibles sembloit faite pour éterniser les négociations et la discorde. Les ministres Autrichiens mirent dans ces négociations toute la subtilité qu'on nomme prudence dans les cours; mais leurs arts insidieux se brisèrent contre la franchise ferme et simple des Suisses. Je n'engagerai point mon lecteur dans les sombres labyrinthes d'une politique inutile; il lui suffira de savoir qu'Albert, accablé d'age et d'infirmité, quitta enfin les rênes du gouvernement, et que ses deux fils Rodolphe et Leopold, qui avoient moins de préjugés à vaincre que leur père, conclurent avec les cantons une trève de onze ans qui fut renouvellée plusieurs fois dans la suite. Zug et Glaris y conservent leur alliance avec le corps Helvétique, sans renoncer aux services qu'ils doivent à la maison d'Autriche, et cette maison pourra nommer parmi les citoyens le premier magistrat du pays. Ces deux républiques avoient brisé leurs fers; mais il leur restoit encore des nœuds qui ne furent déliés que par les mains de la victoire. 1354.

que

Il y avoit longtems que les Bernois connoissoient les Suisses, et qu'ils sentoient tout le prix de leur amitié, mais ce ne fut qu'au milieu de cette guerre qu'ils recherchèrent leur alliance. Elle fut préparée par un événement qui n'annonçoit que la discorde. Quelques paysans, sujets des Bernois, se plaignirent de leurs injustices, et sollicitèrent la protection de leurs voisins du canton d'Underwald, un appui que la générosité plutôt que la politique leur accorda assez facilement. Les Bernois marchèrent en force pour réduire ces peuples révoltés, et les trouvèrent campés aux environs du lac de Brientz avec un secours assez considérable qu'ils avoient reçu du pays d'Underwald. Après un combat opiniâtre l'avantage se déclara in faveur de ceux de Berne; les rebelles se soumirent, les Suisses se retirèrent dans leurs montagnes, et portèrent leurs plaintes devant la diette générale de leurs compatriotes des trois premiers cantons. Les Bernois parurent dans cette assemblée. Ils parlèrent en vainqueurs mais en 1352. vainqueurs qui ne cherchoient que la paix et la justice. Leur ton de raison et de franchise désarma le courroux des Suisses: " Ils ne rougirent point de rappeller toutes les obligations qu'ils leur avoient, et ne refusèrent point de prendre pour médiateur et pour juge un peuple dont ils connoissoient l'équité." Les esprits se rapprochèrent, on vit renaître l'amitié et la confiance. L'on avoit commencé par les plaintes, on finit par une alliance étroite et perpétuelle qui associa Berne à la confédération Helvétique. Je ne rappellerai point les conditions de ce traité, il ne différoit des premiers engagemens des Suisses que par une circonstance qui fut dictée par l'éloignement des lieux. C'est la solde d'un sous par jour que les confédérés promettoient aux troupes de leurs alliés dont ils demanderoient le secours. Les Bernois ne contractent cette alliance qu'avec les trois premiers cantons, mais ces cantons deviennent un point de réunion qui joint les intérêts de Berne à ceux de Lucerne et de Zurich; ils s'engagent les uns et les autres à se fournir des secours mutuels sur la réquisition de leurs amis communs. L'exécution de ce dernier article fut néanmoins suspendue, et la bannière de Berne suivit à regret les drapeaux de l'Empereur et de l'Autriche jusques sous les murs de Zurich.

L'alliance des Bernois ajouta un grand poids à la confédération, dont les racines profondes s'étendoient depuis le lac de Constance jusqu'à celui de Neufchâtel, et qui se trouvoit composée de cinq communautés populaires et de trois villes des plus considérables considérables de l'Helvétie. Celle de Berne étoit déjà la plus puissante des trois ; mais cette puissance bornée et mal-assurée n'annonçoit qu'assez foiblement sa grandeur future. Elle ne consistoit alors que dans une bourgeoisie aguerrie plutôt que nombreuse, dans la possession des deux petites villes d'Arberg et de Lauppen, et dans les services auxquels les paysans de Hasli et du Bas Sibental, avec leur Seigneur le Baron de Weissembourg, s'étoient obligés envers eux. Mais elle avoit droit de tout espérer de la sagesse de ses magistrats et de l'esprit de son peuple. L'amour de la patrie régnoit au fond de tous les cœurs, et par une illusion qui fait la vertu des républiques le citoyen confondoit ses intérêts avec la gloire et le bien de l'état. Berne apporta dans les conseils des Suisses une politique plus ferme, plus réfléchie et plus éclairée; mais elle y apporta en même tems ses desseins intéressés, le goût des conquêtes, et une ambition moins soumise aux loix de la justice qu'à celles de la prudence.

On the passage relating to William Tell, Mr. Gibbon in the original manuscript marked an intention of introducing a Note respecting a Publication by M. Téophile Emanuel de Haller, eldest son of M. Albert de Haller, which however he omitted, or neglected to insert. M. de Haller, the son of Téophile Emanuel, has favoured me with the following account: That his father published a speech, which he made as orator of an assembly of young patricians of Berne, called L'Etat Extérieur: an institution well calculated to prepare and bring forward in eloquence those who from their hereditary rank might aspire to the principal offices of state. In the speech, M. de Haller disputed the the authenticity of the story of William Tell, more for the purpose of exercising his talent for discussion, than because he doubted the fact, of which so many testimonials and chapels erected at the time on the spot, and other documents, left little doubt. It was usual for the speakers to embrace either side of a question according as they thought they could best distinguish themselves. The Canton of Uri, however, was highly offended, and demanded satisfaction from the Canton of Berne. M. de Haller absented himself from Berne for some time, and afterwards wrote another tract to prove the authenticity of the story; which satisfied the Canton of Uri, and the affair was forgotten. M. de Haller adds, concerning the suggestion that the story of William Tell was taken from the Danish history, that it is very improbable, even if such a circumstance had occurred in a very remote period in Denmark, that it should have been known in Switzerland at the time of Tell, in 1307, when that country had no connexion whatever with distant nations.

Mr. Coxe, in his interesting account of Switzerland, supports the story of William Tell, but seems to admit that the circumstance respecting the apple may be doubtful, and that it may have been borrowed from the probably fabulous story of Toko, mentioned by Saxo Grammaticus, and said to have happened in 965. But the most intelligent, and those best acquainted with the affairs of Switzerland, and the two late and most enlightened historians of that country, Muller and Planta, seem to be in general satisfied of the authenticity of the story of the man who has been for ages universally considered throughout the cantons as their great deliverer from Austrian tyranny. Mr. Planta observes that the popular tale of the apple, which Tell was ordered to shoot at on the head of his infant son, is wholly omitted by Muller.

The story of Toko, as related by Saxo Grammaticus, is not exactly the same as that of William Tell; and the opinion of M. de Haller seems well founded, that at that early period, the Swiss had not the slightest intercourse with, nor probably any knowledge of, the most northern nations of Europe; and as it was before the invention of printing, such communication of Danish history was still more improbable. S.

DOUTES

DOUTES HISTORIQUES SUR LA VIE ET LE RÈGNE DU ROI RICHARD III. PAR M. HORACE WALPOLE.*

M. Walpole est fils cadet du célèbre ministre de ce nom. Sa naissance et ses talens lui ouvroient la route des premiers emplois; mais il a préféré, aux vaines poursuites de l'ambition, les plaisirs plus surs et plus doux de la société et des lettres. Ses ouvrages d'imagination sont marqués par le goût, la légèreté, et par le ton d'un homme de condition qui semble badiner avec les muses. Mais il s'est distingué par deux ouvrages plus considérables, et d'un genre nouveau qu'il a créé lui-même. Avant lui l'histoire littéraire, abandonnée aux manœuvres de la littérature, n'avoit présenté que des nomenclatures sèches, ou des recherches minutieuses et puériles. La noblesse savante de M. Walpole a amusé les gens du monde, et a mérité l'attention des philosophes. Des traits intéressans mais ignorés, des vues fines et nouvelles sont embellies par le plus séduisant coloris. Les grands noms de Bacon, de Clarendon, et de Shaftesbury, y sont dignement célèbres, et une foule d'écrivains oubliés dès longtems, reçoit des mains de son historien une immortalité qu'elle se promettoit vainement de ses propres travaux. A cet ouvrage M. Walpole en a fait succéder un second, c'est l'histoire des artistes Anglois, sujet très ingrat pour tout

* This was written by Mr. Gibbon, in the year 1768, for the Mémoires Britanniques, a periodical work.

autre

autre que pour lui. L'Angleterre, qui adopte Holbein et Vandyck, n'a jamais eu une école de peinture, et les efforts qu'elle fait encore annoncent ses vœux plutôt que ses succès. Un antiquaire laborieux (M. Vertue) avoit employé un travail de trente ans à l'histoire des arts de son pays, et ses recueils, dont M. Walpole fit l'acquisition, lui inspirèrent l'idée de les mettre en œuvre. C'est l'aimable Fontenelle qui devient l'interprète du savant Vandale. Aux éloges qui conviennent également aux deux ouvrages de notre auteur, il faut ajouter pour celui-ci l'amour et la connoissance des beaux arts qu'il a toujours aimés et protégés. Avec tant de mérite, il est permis d'avoir quelques défauts, et ce sont précisément les défauts d'un homme d'esprit que les Anglois ont réproché à M. Walpole, des pensées trop recherchées, un style coupé et épigrammatique, des antithèses un peu trop fréquentes.

Ces critiques peuvent avoir quelquefois raison. L'imagination d'Ovide l'a trahi assez souvent. Le pinceau du Guide n'est pas toujours correct; mais l'homme de goût, frappé des graces vives et touchantes qui brillent dans leurs productions, oublie sans peine leurs défauts ménus.

Pour donner à nos lecteurs une idée juste de la manière de cet agréable écrivain, nous lui communiquons en entier la préface de son ouvrage. Elle renferme d'ailleurs des réflexions ingénieuses, sur l'histoire en général, réflexions plus intéressantes pour les étrangers, que les discussions particulières sur l'histoire d'Angleterre.*

* For the preface see Mr. Walpole's original work.

M. Wal-

M. Walpole s'est proposé un dessein digne du'n antiquaire curieux et d'un ami de la justice. Il veut justifier Richard III. Roi d'Angleterre, des accusations affreuses, dont la postérité a chargé sa mémoire. Des historiens, selon notre critique, trop crédules ou trop prévenus, lui ont imputé le meurtre de Henri VI. du jeune Prince de Galles, de son propre frère le Duc de Clarence, de ses neveux le Roi Edouard V. et le Duc d'Yorc, et enfin celui de sa femme la Reine Anne. Ils comptent encore parmi les assassinats les exécutions de Hastings, de Rivers, de Vaughan, et de Grey, dans lesquels ce tyran négligea jusqu'aux apparences de la justice. Pour achever ce noir portrait, ils associent en sa personne toutes les difformités du corps avec tous les vices de l'âme. Shakespeare a ajouté de nouveaux traits à ce caractère effrayant, et les crimes de Richard, représentés sur nos théâtres depuis un siècle et demi, se sont établis dans tous les esprits avec une autorité que l'histoire seule ne leur auroit donné. Un seul critique (Buck) s'est élevé contre le sentiment général; mais son ton de panégyriste a révolté tous les esprits. M. Walpole défend la même cause avec plus de modération et plus d'habileté.

Il remarque d'abord qu'il n'y a que trois historiens de Richard qui puissent mériter le nom de contemporains; Jean Fabian, l'auteur de la Chronique de Croyland, et le fameux Thomas More. Les deux premiers n'ont que le seul mérite de l'être. C'étoient un moine et un bourgeois, l'un et l'autre ramassoient tous les bruits populaires sans examen et sans choix. Après avoir témoigné un juste mépris pour des autorités aussi minces, M. Walpole essaye de ruiner celle de More. Il veut nous faire regarder son histoire du règne d'Edouard V. comme le pendant de son Utopie, comme la première tentative d'un jeune homme qui essayoit ses forces, imitoit les historiens de l'antiquité, dont il s'étoit nourri, et qui s'attachoit à l'élégance bien plus qu'à l'exactitude. Notre critique remarque que l'Archevêque Morton, qui protégea la jeunesse de More, mourut lorsque celui-ci n'avoit que vingt ans, et qu'enfin ce prélat étoit intéressé à noircir le caractère du prince malheureux que ses intrigues avoient perdu.

examen

Ces soupçons sont très ingénieux; peut-être le sont-ils un peu trop. Si l'on rejette le témoignage des auteurs parcequ'ils sont intéressés, et celui des spectateurs parcequ'ils sont peu exacts, toute l'histoire deviendra un problême, ou plutôt un roman. Grafton, Hollinshed, Stowe, &c. ne sont que des copistes, dont chacun a cependant ajouté quelques nouveaux traits à ceux qu'il a trouvés dans l'original.

Nous ne suivrons point M. Walpole dans son examen de la plûpart des crimes de Richard; examen qui montre avec avantage toute la variété de ses connoissances et les ressources de son esprit. Des crimes imputés à Richard, les uns étoient inutiles aux intérêts de son ambition; les autres y étoient même contraires. Il y en a qui sont en contradiction avec les dates les mieux établies. Il résulte enfin de cet examen que nous sommes très-peu autorisés à regarder Richard comme le meurtrier trier de Henry VI. du Prince de Galles, du Duc de Clarence, et de la Reine Anne. L'assassinat de ses jeunes neveux, crime plus atroce en lui-même, mieux établi et suivi des conséquences les plus importantes, mérite de nous arrêter plus longtems. Dans le tableau historique de la conduite de Richard que nous allons tracer, M. Walpole, bien loin de reconnoître l'assassin, veut à peine y appercevoir l'usurpateur.

Edouard IV. Roi d'Angleterre, mourut le 9 April, 1483. De ses deux fils, Edouard l'ainé avoit treize ans ; Richard Duc d'Yorc le cadet n'en avoit que neuf. Deux partis puissans prétendoient au gouvernement du jeune roi et du royaume. La Reine Mère avoit joui d'un crédit immense sous le règne d'un époux qui l'avoit tirée de l'obscurité pour la placer sur le trône. Elle avoit profité de sa faveur pour enrichir sa famille ; mais ce crédit et ces richesses avoient révolté l'ancienne noblesse, qui envioit à la fois et qui méprisoit ces hommes nouveaux. Elle se réunit auprès de Richard Duc de Glocester. Ce prince rusé et ambitieux n'eut pas beaucoup de difficulté à tromper la Reine Mère. Il l'engagea à congédier les troupes assemblées pour escorter le jeune roi dans son voyage de Ludlow Castle à Londres, l'accompagne lui-même avec de grandes démonstrations de respect, se rend bientôt maître de sa personne ; et fait arrêter le Comte de Rivers et les autres parens de la Reine. Justement effrayée des dangers qui la menacent, cette princesse se réfugie dans l'église de Westminster avec son fils cadet. Mais toujours foible foible et irrésolue, elle renonce aux privilèges qu'on n'auroit jamais osé violer, et les remet entre les mains du Protecteur; c'est ainsi qu'il faut désormais nommer le Duc de Glocester, qui prit ce titre et l'administration de l'état avec le consentement du conseil privé. Les exécutions du Comte de Rivers, de Vaughan, et de Grey, servirent à cimenter sa nouvelle puissance, mais tout le monde fut étonné de la mort du Lord Hastings, l'ami du Protecteur, qui l'avoit associé à ses desseins. Tout étoit violent, subit et irrégulier dans cette exécution.

Jusques ici notre critique est assez content de la conduite de Richard. Sa naissance lui donnoit un juste titre à la régence, et l'autorisoit à employer les moyens les plus violens contre ceux qui vouloient la lui disputer. L'exécution des parens de la reine est excusée par la nécessité et par les mœurs d'un siècle barbare. Quant à celle de Hastings, M. Walpole suppose avec un peu trop d'indulgence, que Richard n'auroit jamais sacrifié le meilleur de ses amis, si cet ami perfide n'avoit pas tramé une conjuration contre sa personne.

Cette supposition me paroît des plus gratuites, et la mort de Hastings ne peut s'expliquer que d'une manière peu favorable à Richard. Ce seigneur étoit ennemi de la reine, mais il conservoit un fort attachement pour les enfans d'Edouard. Il ne pouvoit se trouver en opposition avec l'ambition du Duc de Glocester, que lorsque ce prince, peu content de la régence, aspiroit à la couronne.

Les moyens dont il se servoit, selon More, pour y pary parvenir, sont à la fois violens, indécens et ridicules. Un prédicateur mercénaire (le Docteur Shaw) avança dans un sermon, que par l'adultère de la mère d'Edouard IV. et par un premier contrat de ce prince avec Elizabeth Lucy, le Duc de Glocester étoit le seul héritier de la maison d'Yorc; que le Duc de Buckingham harangua les bourgeois de Londres, qu'ils le reçurent très froidement; que là-dessus le maire offrit la couronne à Richard, qui fit quelques difficultés avant que de l'accepter.

Tout ce récit porte aux yeux de M. Walpole les caractères d'un roman, et d'un roman très-mal imaginé; que Richard ait voulu flétrir l'honneur de sa mère, princesse vertueuse, pour laquelle il eut dans la suite beaucoup d'égards; qu'une troupe de bourgeois ait donné la couronne d'Angleterre. D'ailleurs, More ne peut ici se concilier avec les monumens les plus assurés. Un registre du Parlement, déterré depuis peu, nous assure que le premier contrat d'Edouard ne regardoit point Elizabeth Lucy, maîtresse reconnue de ce prince; mais Lady Eléonore Butler d'une des premières familles du royaume. Ce même titre ajoute que le Protecteur accepta la couronne qui lui fut déférée par une assemblée des trois ordres de l'état. Tout se passa dans les règles, et ce grand événement ne ressemble pas mal à la révolution de 1688, qui mit le Prince d'Orange sur le trône. Telle est du moins la comparaison de M. Walpole.

Les princes déposés passent assez rapidement du trône au tombeau; tel aussi a été le sort des en-fans d'Edouard, si nous en croyons More et la foule des historiens. A leur témoignage notre ingénieux critique oppose les réflexions suivantes. 1. Dans les premiers jours de son règne, Richard témoignoit beaucoup d'égards pour son neveu ; mais de ces égards qui montroient une sévérité dédaigneuse. Un registre de la garderobe, qu'on a communiqué à M. Walpole, indique le détail des robes et autres ornemens destinés à l'usage du Seigneur Edouard, fils du feu Roi Edouard IV. pour la cérémonie du sacre de son oncle. Ce titre est effectivement des plus singuliers ; mais la conséquence qu'on en veut tirer me paroît des moins décisives. 2. Le récit de More est peu juste et peu vraisemblable. Richard confie ses inquiétudes à un page, qui lui recommande un certain Jacques Tyrell, dont l'ambition mal récompensée le rendoit propre à tout. Richard goûte l'idée, appelle ce Tyrell, le fait chevalier, et l'envoye à Londres pour assassiner ses neveux. Cependant nous savons d'ailleurs que ce Tyrell étoit déjà Chevalier et Grand Ecuyer du Roi. 3. Henri VII. si intéressé à noircir son rival, paroît peu assuré de ce crime. L'acte du Parlement qui condamne le meurtre de Richard, lui reproche seulement et en termes vagues, d'avoir répandu le sang des enfans. On ne fit point d'enquêtes alors, et celles qu'on fit dans la suite paroissent très suspectes. Cet argument a beaucoup de poids, et le silence de Henri VII. et de son Parlement est assurément très difficile à expliquer. 4. More lui-même avoue qu'on douta longtems si ces enfans périrent du tems de Richard. 5. La

5. La Chronique de Croyland suppose que ces jeunes princes vivoient encore lorsque Richard se fit sacrer de nouveau à Yorc. Le registre du Parlement semble insinuer la même chose. Selon More cette cérémonie suivit l'assassinat des enfans, et le peu d'exactitude de cet auteur doit affoiblir son témoignage. Mais la curiosité inquiete des lecteurs demandera toujours: " Si ces enfans n'ont pas été les victimes de la cruauté de leur oncle, rendez-nous compte de leur sort, que sont-ils devenus, pourquoi ont-ils disparu?" &c. Toute hypothèse qui ne satisfait point à ces questions paroîtra foible et défectueuse. M. Walpole essaye de garantir la sienne de cet inconvénient. Edouard V. a pu mourir à la Tour de mort naturelle; sa santé étoit mauvaise et chancelante, et le chagrin ne contribue à l'affermir. D'ailleurs on soupçonnoit du tems de More que ce jeune prince survécut à Richard. Si l'usurpateur Henri le trouva vivant, le caractère de ce tyran jaloux et cruel nous annonce assez clairement le sort du malheureux Edouard. Je crains qu'on ne reproche à notre Pyrrhonien, qui réduit partout ailleurs les faits à des problèmes, de convertir ici ses soupçons en certitudes. Quant à Richard Plantagenet, le lecteur instruit peut prévoir sans difficulté l'hypothèse de M. Walpole. Perkin Warbeck, ce jeune prétendant qui ébranla plus d'une fois le trône de Henri VII. est à ses yeux le vrai Duc d'Yorc. Voici les principaux titres qui ont engagé notre savant critique à le reconnoître. 1. Warbeck paroissoit tout ce que le jeune Plantagenet auroit dû être. La ressemblance avec Edouard IV. le souvenir exact de la cour Angloise, &c.; tout sembloit annoncer en lui le vrai héritier de la maison d'Yorc. 2. Il réussit partout à inspirer une confiance qu'un imposteur n'auroit jamais obtenue. Le Roi d'Ecosse lui donna en mariage une de ses parentes, la Duchesse de Bourgogne le reconnoît pour son neveu, et soutint ses intérêts avec chaleur. Le Chevalier Guillaume Stanley, qui avoit mis la couronne sur la tête de Henri, aussi bien que plusieurs autres partisans de la Rose blanche, abandonnèrent le roi pour suivre le fils de leur bienfaiteur, et périrent sur un échafaud toujours convaincus qu'il l'étoit. 3. Henri lui-même se conduisit à l'égard de Perkin (lorsqu'il fut entre ses mains) de la manière la plus propre à confirmer toutes les prétensions de ce jeune homme. Tout étoit incertain, obscur, et mystérieux dans le procédé du roi, qui sembloit craindre de découvrir la vérité. Il n'osa jamais le confronter avec la Reine mère, ses filles, et les seigneurs de la cour. C'étoit cependant le moyen le plus sûr et le plus naturel d'exposer l'imposture; c'étoit encore celui que Henri lui-même avoit employé à l'égard de Lambert Simnel dont personne n'a depuis épousé les intérêts. 4. Le conte que Henri débita enfin sous le nom de l'Histoire de Perkin Warbeck est pleine d'absurdités et de contradictions. M. Walpole en relève quelques unes avec beaucoup de force et de vivacité. Il remarque même que le Chancelier Bacon, historien fort estimé de Henri VII. en a été si peu content qu'il a bien voulu inventer un autre qui n'est pas plus vraisemblable. Tous les écrivains ont cependant adopté l'idée d'une imposture nécessaire à la gloire de Henri, et M. Carte étoit le seul qui eut encore osé s'éloigner du sentiment général.

écrivains

Il est difficile de quitter M. Walpole, mais il faut le quitter. Observons seulement qu'il réduit la difformité monstrueuse de Richard à quelques défauts assez légers. Il étoit petit de taille, son visage étoit court, et ses épaules un peu inégales. Un dessein fort ancien que M. Walpole a fait graver, et le témoignage d'un moine très passionné à l'égard de Richard, lui fournissent ces traits adoucis. La vieille Comtesse de Desmond le dépeignoit d'une manière encore plus favorable. Elle se souvenoit d'avoir dansé avec lui et se rappelloit qu'à son frère Edouard près, il étoit l'homme le mieux fait de l'assemblée. M. Walpole n'a donné ses observations que sous le titre modeste de Doutes Historiques. Cet aimable critique doit sentir mieux que personne que dans un sujet aussi obscur, la vérité, et même la vraisemblance, sont enveloppées de milles nuages, que tout y est problème, doute, objection et réponse. C'est surtout aux yeux d'un homme de génie, instruit de l'histoire de son pays, que les points de vue se multiplient à l'infini. Les argumens de M. Walpole nous avoient ébloui sans nous convaincre. Les réflexions suivantes nous ont ramené au sentiment général; elles sont de M. Hume, qui nous les a communiquées avec la permission d'en enrichir nos Mémoires.

Il règne en général une grande obscurité sur les circonstances des guerres entre les deux Roses;

mais la narration de Thomas More jette beaucoup de lumières sur toutes les transactions du règne de Richard, et sur le meurtre des deux jeunes princes ses neveux. La magnanimité, la probité, et le grand sens de cet auteur rendent son témoignage assuré; et il n'y a point d'historien ancien ou moderne qui doive avoir plus de poids. On peut aussi le regarder au juste titre comme contemporain; car quoiqu'il n'eut que cinq ans lorsque les deux princes furent massacrés, il vécut et fut élevé parmi les principaux acteurs du règne de Richard; et on voit clairement par son récit qui est souvent très circonstancié, qu'il en tenoit les particularités des témoins oculaires eux-mêmes. On ne sauroit donc se refuser à son autorité, et elle doit emporter la balance sur cent légers doutes, scrupules, et objections, car on n'a point formé contre lui d'objection solide, et on n'a pu le convaincre encore d'aucune erreur. Il dit, à la vérité, que les partisans du Protecteur, et en particulier le Docteur Shaw, répandirent le bruit d'un premier contrat d'Edouard IV. avec Elizabeth Lucy, tandis qu'il paroît par des titres que le Parlement déclara les enfans d'Edouard illégitimes, sous prétexte d'un premier contrat avec Lady Eléonore Butler. Mais il faut remarquer qu'on n'essaya pas seulement de prouver l'un ou l'autre de ces contrats; et pourquoi les flatteurs et partisans du Protecteur n'auroient-ils pas répandu tantôt un bruit, tantôt un autre? More les cite tous les deux, et les traite aussi légèrement qu'ils le méritent. M. Carte trouve incroyable que Richard ait engagé le Docteur Shaw

Shaw à calomnier la Duchesse d'Yorc sa mère, avec laquelle il étoit en très bonne intelligence. Mais si l'on trouve effectivement de la difficulté à le croire, pourquoi ne supposeroit-on pas que le Docteur Shaw ayant pris l'idée générale de son sermon du Protecteur ou de ses amis, choisit lui-même les chefs particuliers et les choisit avec fort peu de jugement? La disgrace qu'il éprouva ensuite paroît appuyer cette supposition.

2. Si l'on refuse à More la qualité de contemporain relativement au protectorat du Duc de Glocester, ou ne peut la lui disputer quant à l'imposture de Perkin; il étoit alors homme fait, et il avoit toutes les facilités nécessaires pour connoître, examiner, et se décider sur la vérité; ainsi en nous assurant que Richard fit massacrer le Duc d'Yorc, il nous assure, en effet, de la manière la plus claire, que Perkin qui prit son nom étoit un imposteur.

3. Un autre grand génie a traité avec soin ce point d'histoire; génie qui est regardé avec justice comme un de ceux qui fait le plus d'honneur à notre nation, et qui est effectivement un des génies les plus sublimes; c'est le Chancelier Bacon dont je veux parler. Il fait au long l'histoire de Perkin Warbeck, et le traite positivement d'imposteur, sans témoigner le moindre doute à cet égard. Si l'on nous objecte que Milord Bacon n'étoit pas contemporain, et que nous devons former nos jugemens, non d'après les matériaux que lui-même employa, nous répondrons qu'il paroît clairement que Bacon composa son histoire, histoire exacte et travaillée avec soin, sur plusieurs papiers et titres qui sont maintenant perdus, et qu'en conséquence en doit toujours le citer comme un écrivain original. Supposé que l'opinion de M. Carte fût fondée, il seroit bien étrange que parmi tous les papiers que M. Bacon parcourut, il n'eut pas trouvé la moindre raison de soupçonner Perkin d'être le vrai Plantagenet. On n'avoit plus d'intérêt alors à noircir Richard III. et d'ailleurs Bacon est un historien droit, qui n'est point partial pour Henri, puisque c'est de lui seul que nous tenons les détails du gouvernement tyrannique de ce prince. Tout ce que l'on peut seulement lui reprocher, c'est qu'en traçant son caractère, il ne l'a pas blamé aussi fortement que les faits qu'il rapporte paroissent l'exiger. Qu'on me permette de remarquer en passant, comme une singularité, combien l'histoire Angloise doit à quatre grands hommes qui ont possédé la première dignité de la magistrature, More, Bacon, Clarendon, et Whitlocke.

4. Mais si l'on exige des témoignages contemporains, on peut sur cet article en présenter des plus forts, et des moins suspects. La reine, son fils le Marquis de Dorset, homme d'un grand sens; le Chevalier Edouard Woodville, frère de la reine; le Chevalier Thomas St. Leger, qui avoit épousé la sœur du roi; le Chevalier Robert Willoughby; le Chevalier Giles d'Aubeney; le Chevalier Thomas Arundel; les Courteney; les Cheyney; les Talbot; les Stanley; et en un mot tous les partisans de la maison d'Yorc, parmi lesquels on compte compte les personnes les plus illustres de la nation, étoient si persuadés du meurtre des deux princes qu'ils s'adressèrent au Comte de Richmond, l'ennemi mortel de leur famille, et de leur parti. Ils formèrent le projet de le placer sur le trône; projet insensé, et qui les perdoit si le prince étoit vivant; et ils promirent de lui donner en mariage la Princesse Elizabeth, comme héritière de la couronne, qui n'y avoit de droit que par la mort de ses frères. Y a-t-il une seule de ces personnes qui, en écrivant les mémoires de son tems, n'eut assuré que Richard avoit fait mourir ses neveux? Et qu'avons nous besoin de leurs écrits?—leurs actions nous montrent, bien plus sûrement encore, leurs véritables sentimens.

5. Mais nous avons une autre autorité contemporaine plus sûre encore, et d'une personne des plus intéressées à connoître la verité, c'est celle de Richard lui-même. Il résolut d'épouser sa nièce (alliance très extraordinaire en Angleterre) pour unir par la son titre au sien propre. Il savoit donc que cette princesse avoit un droit réel à la couronne; car pour ce qui regarde sa prétendue illégitimité, comme on n'en donna jamais de preuves, et qu'on n'essaya pas même d'en donner, la nation en traita la déclaration avec le plus grand mépris, et sur le même pied que quantité d'actes parlementaires, si fréquens dans ce période, qui étoient scandaleux, et sans aucune autorité. On ne songea même pas à casser cet acte lorsque Henri et Elizabeth furent sur le trône.

6. Nous devons aussi regarder comme un témoignage gnage contemporain l'opinion généralement reçue, et dans le pays et chez l'étranger. On étoit si persuadé du meurtre des deux princes, que lorsque Richard notifia à la cour de France son avénement au trône, cette cour fut frappée d'horreur de l'abominable parricide qu'il avoit commis en faisant mourir ses neveux, ainsi que nous l'apprend Philippe de Comines; et ces sentimens se manifestèrent avec force, puisque comme nous le dit le même auteur, la cour ne voulut pas faire la moindre réponse à la notification du ministre.

7. Les mêmes raisons qui persuadèrent aux contemporains la vérité de ce parricide subsistent encore, et doivent être pour nous les preuves les plus claires. Ces deux jeunes princes, après avoir disparu tout d'un coup de la Tour, ne se montrèrent point ailleurs. Chacun disoit: " Ils n'ont pas échappé à leur oncle, puisqu'il ne fait aucune recherche; il ne les a point fait transporter ailleurs, sans quoi il le déclareroit pour se justifier de l'accusation de les avoir fait mourir. Il ne s'exposeroit pas inutilement à l'infamie, et au danger attaché au nom de meurtrier, sans acquérir la sécurité qui est le prix de ce crime; ils étoient sous sa garde, c'est à lui à en répondre; s'il ne les représente point, comme il a un intérêt bien clair à leur mort, le bon sens doit nous engager à le regarder comme leur meurtrier. Son usurpation manifeste, et ses autres actions perfides et cruelles ne nous font rien attendre de mieux de sa part. Il ne pouvoit pas dire comme Cain, 'Suis-je le garde de mes neveux?'" Ces raisonnemens, solides dès le commencement, prenoient prenoient de jour en jour une nouvelle force, par le silence soutenu de Richard, et la profonde ignorance où l'on étoit sur le séjour des princes. Il s'écoula deux ans depuis cette époque jusqu'à la fin du règne du roi, et il n'auroit pu certainement mieux renverser les projets du Comte de Richemond, et justifier son propre caractère, qu'en produisant les princes ses neveux.

8. Si après des évidences aussi lumineuses, il étoit nécessaire de produire des preuves, qui dans tout autre cas paroîtroient considérables et plus valides, je citerois les témoignages de Dighton, et de Tyrell; il n'est pas naturel surtout que ce dernier, qui étoit gentilhomme, se soit exposé lui-même aux justes reproches que lui attiroit un si grand crime, par une imposture, qui ne paroît pas même lui avoir acquis la faveur de Henri.

9. Le Duc d'Yorc ne pouvoit à l'age de neuf ans s'échapper sans l'assistance de quelques personnes plus agées que lui. N'auroient-elles pas averti sur le champ de ce grand événement la Reine Douarière sa mère, la Duchesse de Bourgogne sa tante, et tous ceux qui étoient attachés à la maison d'Yorc?

10. Le silence total qui a régné sur ceux qui avoient aidé au Duc d'Yorc dans sa fuite, et sur le lieu de sa résidence pendant neuf ans, est encore une preuve suffisante de l'imposture de Perkin.

11. Le récit même de Perkin est destitué de toute vraisemblance. Il dit que les assassins massacrèrent son frère; mais qu'ils eurent compassion de lui, et lui permirent de s'enfuir. On trouve ce récit dans tous les historiens de ce tems-là.

12. Per-

12. Perkin fit lui-même une entière confession de son imposture, et ne la fit pas moins de trois fois. La première lorsqu'il fut mis au carcan à la cité et à Westminster ; et la troisième (qui fait une preuve bien complette) au pied de la potence où il fut pendu. On ne trouve pas la moindre insinuation que ces confessions lui ayent été arrachées par la torture, et lorsqu'il fit la dernière il n'avoit certainement rien de plus à redouter.

13. Si Henri n'avoit pas été bien convaincu que Perkin étoit un ridicule imposteur, désavoué par toute la nation, il ne l'auroit pas laissé vivre une heure depuis qu'il l'eut en son pouvoir ; encore moins lui auroit-il pardonné deux fois. La manière dont il traita l'innocent Comte de Warwick, qui n'avoit aucun droit au trône, donne bien de la force à cette raison.

14. Nous trouvons bien clairement la source des impostures de Perkin dans les intrigues de la Duchesse de Bourgogne. Elle avoit reconnu et supporté auparavant Lambert Simnel, reconnu généralement pour imposteur. Nous remarquons que M. Carte, pour conserver le poids du témoignage de la duchesse en faveur de Perkin, supprime entièrement ce fait important : effet bien frappant des préjugés de parti, et preuve de l'envie qu'avoit cet auteur de noircir Henri, qui n'avoit pas un droit héréditaire à la couronne.

15. On ne produisit jamais dans le tems même la moindre preuve que Perkin fut Richard Plantagenet. Richard disparut à l'age d'environ neuf ans ; Perkin ne parut pas avant d'être homme fait ; quelqu'un quelqu'un à sa vue pouvoit-il être convaincu qu'il étoit Richard? Perkin savoit, à la vérité, quelques anecdotes sur l'enfance de Richard et la cour d'Angleterre; mais tout ce qu'un enfant de neuf ans pouvoit avoir retenu lui avoit été suggéré fort aisément par la Duchesse de Bourgogne, Frior, secrétaire de Henri, ou quiconque avoit été à la cour dans ce tems-là. Il est vrai que plusieurs personnes de distinction y furent d'abord trompées; mais le mécontentement qu'inspiroit le gouvernement de Henri, et l'enthousiasme général qu'on avoit pour la maison d'Yorc, rendent assez raison de cette illusion passagère. Tous les yeux étoient ouverts longtems avant le supplice de Perkin.

16. La circonstance de la découverte que l'on fit à la Tour de deux corps morts, sous le règne de Charles II. n'est certainement point indifférente. On les trouva dans la même place où More, Bacon, et d'autres anciens écrivains nous assurent que les deux jeunes princes furent enterrés. Les os de ces cadavres étoient d'une grosseur proportionnée à l'age des princes. La place secrette et irrégulière (puisqu'elle n'étoit pas en terre sainte) où ils furent enterrés, prouve que ces enfans avoient été assassinés secrettement. Et quels enfans, excepté ceux qui touchent de près à la couronne, pourroient être exposés, dans la Tour, à une mort violente? En comparant toutes les circonstances, nous avons raison d'inférer que ces cadavres étoient ceux d'Edouard et de son frère, et telle fut aussi l'inférence qu'on en tira dans le tems de la découverte.

ANTI-

ANTIQUITIES

OF THE

HOUSE OF BRUNSWICK.

The following Letter, from Mr. Gibbon, without any Address to it, was found with the Manuscript of the Antiquities of the House of Brunswick: there can be little doubt of its being the Copy of a Letter to M. Langer, Librarian to the Ducal Library of Wolfenbuttel; and it is here inserted as relating to them.

Mr. Gibbon to Mr. Langer.

Sir, Rolle, 12th October, 1790.

I should have acknowledged sooner your kindness in procuring for me the Origines Guelficæ, if I had not been told by our obliging bookseller, Mr. Pott, that you were on a journey, while I myself was confined with the longest and most severe fit of the gout that I ever experienced. But we are now, both of us, restored to our ordinary state; I can walk, and you no longer travel post. I suppose by this time you are thoroughly established, and deeply immured in your immense library. Your curiosity, perhaps your friendship, will desire to know what have been my amusements, labours, and projects, during the two years that have elapsed since the last publication of my great work. To indiscreet questions on this subject, with which I am often teased, I answer vaguely or peevishly; but from you I would keep nothing concealed; and to imitate the frankness in which you so much delight, will freely confess, that I more readily trust you with my secret, because I greatly need your assistance. After returning from England, the first months were spent in the enjoyment of my liberty and my library; and you will not be surprised that I should have renewed my familiar acquaintance with the Greek authors, and vowed to consecrate to them daily a portion of my leisure. I pass over in silence the sad hours employed in the care of my friend, and in lamentation for his loss. When the agitation of my mind abated, I endeavoured to find out for myself some occupation more interesting and more invigorating than mere reading can afford. But the remembrance of a servitude of twenty years frightened me from again engaging in a long undertaking, which I might probably never finish. It would be better, I thought, to select from the historical monuments of all ages, and all nations, such subjects as might be treated separately, both agreeably to their own nature, as well as to my taste. When these little works, which might be entitled Historical Excursions, amounted to a volume, I would offer it to the public; and the present might be repeated, until either the public or myself were tired; for as each volume would be complete in itself, no continuation would be requisite; and instead of being obliged to follow, like the stage coach, the high road, I would expatiate at large in the field of history, stopping to admire every beautiful prospect that opened to my view. One inconvenience, indeed, attends this design. An important subject grows and expands with the labour bestowed on it. I might thus be carried beyond my prescribed bounds; but I should be carried gently, without foresight and without constraint.

This suspicion was justified in my first excursion, sion, the subject of which will explain the reason why I was so earnest to procure the Origines Guelficæ. In my History, I had given an account of two illustrious marriages; the first, of the son of Azo, Marquis of Este, with the daughter of Robert Guiscard; and the second, of a Princess of Brunswick with the Greek Emperor. The first view of the antiquity and grandeur of the House of Brunswick excited my curiosity, and made me think that the two nations, which I esteem the most, might be entertained by the history of a family, which sprung from the one, and reigns over the other. But my researches showed me not only the beauty, but the extent and difficulty of my subject. Muratori and Leibnitz have sufficiently explained the origin of the Marquisses of Liguria, and perhaps of Tuscany: I am well acquainted with the history and monuments of Italy, during the middle ages; and I am not dissatisfied with what I have already written concerning that branch of the family of Este, which continued to reside in its hereditary possessions. I am not unacquainted with the ancient Guelphs, nor incapable of giving an account of the power and downfall of their heirs, the Dukes of Bavaria and Saxony. The succession of the House of Brunswick to the Crown of Great Britain will doubtless form the most interesting part of my narrative; but the authors on this subject are in English; and it would be unpardonable in a Briton not to have studied the modern history and present constitution of his country. But there is an interval of four hundred and fifty years between the first Duke of Brunswick and the first Elector of that family; and the design of my work compels me to follow in obscurity a rough and narrow path; where, by the division and subdivision of so many branches and so many territories, I shall be involved in the mazes of a genealogical labyrinth. The events, which are destitute of connection as well as of splendour, are confined to a single province of Germany; and I must have reached near the end of the period, before my subject will be enlivened by the reformation of religion, the war of thirty years, and the new power acquired by the Electorate. As it is my purpose, rather to sketch memoirs than to write history, my narrative must proceed with rapidity; and contain rather results than facts—rather reflexions than details; but you are aware how much particular knowledge is requisite for this general description, the author of which ought to be far more learned than his work. Unfortunately, this author resides at the distance of two hundred leagues from Saxony; he knows not the language, and has never made the history of Germany his particular study. Thus remote from the sources of information, he can think of only one channel by which they may be made to flow into his library; which is, by finding in the country itself an accurate correspondent, an enlightened guide, in one word, an oracle, whom he may consult in every difficulty. Your learning and character, as well as your abilities and situation, singularly qualify you for gratifying my wishes; wishes; and should you point out to me a substitute equally well qualified with yourself, yet I could not have equal confidence in the assistance of a person unknown to me. I would tease you with questions, and new questions would often be suggested by your answers; I would request you to ransack your vast library, and to supply me with books, extracts, translations, and information of every kind, conducive to my undertaking. But I know not how far you are inclined to sacrifice your leisure and your favourite studies to a laborious correspondence, which promises neither fame nor pleasure. I flatter myself, you would do something to oblige me; you would do more for the honour of the family with which you are connected by your employment. But what title have I to suppose that any work of mine can contribute to its honour? I expect, Sir, your answer; and request that it may be speedy and frank. Should you condescend to assist my labours, I will immediately send you some interrogatories. Your refusal, on the other hand, will make me lay aside the design, or at least oblige me to give it a new form. I venture, at the same time, to entreat that the subject of this letter may remain a profound secret. An indiscreet word would be repeated by an hundred mouths; and I should have the uneasiness of seeing in the foreign journals, and soon afterwards in the English newspapers, an account, and that, perhaps, an unfaithful one, of my literary projects, the secret of which I entrust to you alone.

ANTIQUITIES

OF THE

HOUSE OF BRUNSWICK.

CHAP. I. SECT. I.

An English subject may be prompted, by a just and liberal curiosity, to investigate the origin and story of the House of Brunswick, which, after an alliance with the daughters of our kings, has been called by the voice of a free people to the legal inheritance of the crown. From George the First and his father, the first Elector of Hanover, we ascend, in a clear and regular series, to the first Duke of Brunswick and Lunenburgh, who received his investiture from Frederick the Second, about the middle of the thirteenth century. If these ample possessions had been the gift of the Emperor to some adventurous soldier, to some faithful client, we might be content with the antiquity and lustre of a noble race, which had been enrolled nearly six hundred years among the Princes of Germany. But our ideas are raised, and our prospect is opened, by the discovery, that the first Duke of Brunswick was rather degraded than adorned by his new title, since it imposed the duties of feudal service on the free and patrimonial estate, which alone has been saved in the shipwreck of the more splendid fortunes of his House. His ancestors had been invested with the powerful duchies of Bavaria and Saxony, which extended far beyond their limits in modern geography: from the Baltic Sea to the confines of Rome they were obeyed, or respected, or feared; and in the quarrel of the Guelphs and Ghibellines, the former appellation was derived from the name of their progenitors in the female line. But the genuine masculine descent of the Princes of Brunswick must be explored beyond the Alps: the venerable tree, which has since overshadowed Germany and Britain, was planted in the Italian soil. As far as our sight can reach, we discern the first founders of the race in the Marquisses of Este, of Liguria, and perhaps of Tuscany. In the eleventh century, the primitive stem was divided into two branches; the elder migrated to the banks of the Danube and the Elbe; the younger more humbly adhered to the neighbourhood of the Adriatic: the dukes of Brunswick, and the kings of Great Britain, are the descendants of the first; the dukes of Ferrara and Modena were the offspring of the second.

This short review may explain and justify the threefold division of these Memoirs, which appropriates a separate book to—I. The Italian Descent; II. The German Reign; and III. The British Succession of the House of Brunswick. The obscure interval, from the first duke to the first elector, will be connected on either side with the more splendid scenes of their ancient and modern history. The comparative date and dignity of of their pedigree will be fixed by a fair parallel with the most illustrious families of Europe. Even the flowers of fiction, so profusely scattered over the cradle of the princes of Este, disclose a remote and decreasing light, which is finally lost in the darkness of the fabulous age. But it will be prudent, before we listen to the rude or refined tales of invention, to erect a strong and substantial edifice of truth on the learned labours of Leibnitz and Muratori.

The genius and studies of Leibnitz have ranked his name with the first philosophic names of his age and country; but his reputation, perhaps, would be more pure and permanent, if he had not ambitiously grasped the whole circle of human science. As a theologian, he successively contended with the sceptics, who believe too little, and with the papists, who believe too much, and with the heretics, who believe otherwise than is inculcated by the Lutheran confession of Augsburgh. Yet the philosopher betrayed his love of union and toleration: his faith in Revelation was accused, while he proved the Trinity by the principles of logic; and in the defence of the attributes and providence of the Deity, he was suspected of a secret correspondence with his adversary Bayle. The metaphysician expatiated in the fields of air: his pre-established harmony of the soul and body might have provoked the jealousy of Plato; and his optimism, the best of all possible worlds, seems an idea too vast for a mortal mind. He was a physician, in the large and genuine sense of the word: like his brethren, he amused himself with creating a globe;

a globe; and his Protogæa, or Primitive Earth, has not been useless to the last hypothesis of Buffon, which prefers the agency of fire to that of water. I am not worthy to praise the mathematician: but his name is mingled in all the problems and discoveries of the times; the masters of the art were his rivals or disciples; and if he borrowed from Sir Isaac Newton the sublime method of fluxions, Leibnitz was at least the Prometheus who imparted to mankind the sacred fire which he had stolen from the gods. His curiosity extended to every branch of chemistry, mechanics, and the arts; and the thirst of knowledge was always accompanied with the spirit of improvement. The vigour of his youth had been exercised in the schools of jurisprudence; and while he taught, he aspired to reform, the laws of nature and nations, of Rome and Germany. The annals of Brunswick, of the empire, of the ancient and modern world, were present to the mind of the historian; and he could turn from the solution of a problem, to the dusty parchments and barbarous style of the records of the middle age. His genius was more nobly directed to investigate the origin of languages and nations; nor could he assume the character of a grammarian, without forming the project of an universal idiom and alphabet. These various studies were often interrupted by the occasional politics of the times; and his pen was always ready in the cause of the princes and patrons to whose service he was attached: many hours were consumed in a learned correspondence with all Europe: and the philosopher amused his leisure in the composition of of French and Latin poetry. Such an example may display the extent and powers of the human understanding, but even his powers were dissipated by the multiplicity of his pursuits. He attempted more than he could finish; he designed more than he could execute: his imagination was too easily satisfied with a bold and rapid glance on the subject which he was impatient to leave; and Leibnitz may be compared to those heroes, whose empire has been lost in the ambition of universal conquest.

When he was about thirty years of age, (1676,) the merit of Leibnitz was discovered and adopted by the dukes of Hanover, at whose court he spent the last forty years of his life, in free and honourable service. In this station he soon became the author, or at least the architect of a monument, which they were ambitious of raising to the glory of their name. With the view of preparing the most authentic documents for the History of the House of Brunswick, he travelled over the provinces of Germany and Italy, their ancient seats. In this learned pilgrimage, he consulted the living and the dead, explored the libraries, the archives, the monasteries, and even the tombs, and diligently collected or copied the books, the manuscripts, and the charters of every age. As the curiosity of the historian had not been limited to the proper bounds of his subject, the various treasures which he had imported were published in several volumes, with as much speed and care as the multitude of his avocations would allow; and it may be deemed either either a praise or a reproach, that the raw materials are often less valuable than the observations and prefaces of the editor himself. In the year 1695, the nuptials of the Prince of Modena with a Princess of Hanover engaged him to dispel the errors and fables of preceding genealogists, and to restore the true connection of the kindred branches, which were thus united, after a separation of more than six hundred years. This occasional pamphlet was designed as the prelude of the great Latin work which he meditated on the Brunswick antiquities. With a genius accustomed to draw lines of communication between the most distant sciences, he traced, in his Introduction, the revolutions of the country and its inhabitants; of the country, from the natural remains of fossils and petrifactions; of the inhabitants, from the national vestiges of language and manners. The story of a province and of a family swelled, in his capacious mind, into the annals of the western empire: the origins of the Guelphs of Bavaria, and the Marquisses of Este, would have been interwoven in their proper place; and the narrative would have been deduced from the reign of Charlemagne (A. D. 769,) to the last emperor of the Saxon line (1025.) But the term of an antediluvian life would have been scarcely adequate to the labours and projects of Leibnitz: the imperfect manuscript of his annals was buried in the library of Hanover; and the impression, though long since promised, is still refused to the curiosity of the public. But the ideas and papers of that great man were freely communicated to his disciple disciple and successor Eccard, and the researches more particularly belonging to the house of Brunswick have formed the basis of the Origines Guelficæ, which were compiled by the industrious historiographer. The rashness of Eccard, who changed his service and religion, condemned his work, till envy and malevolence had subsided, to a long oblivion; nor was it till many years after his decease that the Origines Guelficæ were printed in five volumes in folio, by the care of the Electoral librarians. The hands of the several workmen are apparent; the bold and original spirit of Leibnitz, the crude erudition and hasty conjectures of Eccard, the useful annotations of Gruber, and the critical disquisitions of Scheid, the principal editor of this genealogical history.

In the construction of this domestic monument, the Elector of Hanover, ten years after the return of Leibnitz, had dispatched a second missionary (1700) to search the archives of his Italian kinsmen. Their archives were in the most deplorable state: but the princes of Este were awakened by shame and vanity, and their subject Muratori was recalled from Milan, to reform and govern the ducal library of Modena. The name of Muratori will be for ever connected with the literature of his country: above sixty years of his peaceful life were consumed in the exercises of study and devotion; his numerous writings on the subjects of history, antiquities, religion, morals, and criticism, are impressed with sense and knowledge, with moderation and candour: he moved in the narrow circle circle of an Italian priest; but a desire of freedom, a ray of philosophic light sometimes breaks through his own prejudices and those of his readers. In the cause of his prince, he was permitted, and even encouraged, to explore the foundations, and to circumscribe the limits, of the temporal power of the bishops of Rome: and his victorious arguments in the dispute for Commachio accustomed the slave to an erect posture and a bolder step. One of his antagonists, the learned Fontanini, had been provoked, in the heat of controversy, to cast some reflections on the family of Este, as if they had been no more than simple citizens of Padua, who, in the thirteenth century, were invested by the popes with the title and office of Marquis of of Anconia. Truth and honour required an answer to this invidious charge; and the firmest answer was a simple and genuine exposition of facts. The courts of Brunswick and Modena were joined in the same family interest; and their trusty librarians, Leibnitz and Muratori, corresponded with the confidence of allies and the emulation of rivals. But the speed of the German was outstripped in the race by the perseverance of the Italian: if the conjectures of Muratori were less splendid, his discoveries were more sure; and he could examine, with the leisure of a native, the monuments and records which his associate had formerly viewed with the haste of a traveller. After a diligent inquiry of three years, both at home and abroad, he gave to the world the first volume of the Antichità Estense, a model of genealogical criticism; and in the the second volume, which was delayed above twenty years, he continues the descent and series to his own times. The more strenuous labours of his life were devoted to the general and particular history of Italy. His Antiquities, both in the vulgar and the Latin tongue, exhibit a curious picture of the laws and manners of the middle age; and a correct text is justified by a copious Appendix of authentic documents. His Annals are a faithful abstract of the twenty-eight folio volumes of original historians; and whatsoever faults may be noticed in this great collection, our censure is disarmed by the remark, that it was undertaken and finished by a single man. Muratori will not aspire to the fame of historical genius: his modesty may be content with the solid, though humble praise of an impartial critic and indefatigable compiler.

With such guides, with the materials which they have provided, and with some experience of the way, I shall boldly descend into the darkness of the middle age; and while I assume the liberty of judgment, I shall not be unmindful of the duties of gratitude.

An old charter of the reign of Charlemagne and the beginning of the ninth century, has casually preserved the memory of BONIFACE the Bavarian; the count or governor of Lucca, the father of the marquisses of Tuscany, and the first probable ancestor of the house of Este and Brunswick. His name and country, his title and province, I shall separately consider: and these considerations will explain explain the state of Italy in his time, and that of his immediate descendants.

1. In the origin of human speech, a method must have been wanted, and sought, and found, of discriminating the several individuals of the same tribe, who were mingled in the daily offices, even of savage life. In every language the invention of proper and personal names must be at least as ancient as the use of appellative words. The truth of this remark is attested by the ancient continent from India to Spain, from the lakes of Canada to the hills of Chili, the same distinctions were familiar to the inhabitants of the New World; and our navigators who have recently explored the islands of the South Sea, add their testimony to the general practice of mankind. As soon as a new-born infant has enjoyed some days, and begins to promise some years of life, he is distinguished as a social being from his present and future companions: the friends of the family are convened to congratulate the parents and to welcome the stranger; and the festival has been usually connected with some religious ceremony; the sacrifices of the Greeks, Romans, and barbarians; the circumcision of the Jews, and the baptism of the Christians. The primitive choice of every word must have had a cause and a meaning: each name was derived from some accident or allusion, or quality of the mind or body; and the titles of the savage chiefs announced their wisdom in council, or their valour in the field. Such in the book of nature and antiquity are the heroes of Homer; and the happy flexibility flexibility of the Greek tongue can express in harmonious sounds all possible combinations of ideas and sentiments. But in the lapse of ages and idioms, the true signification was lost or misapplied: the qualities of a man were blindly transferred to a child, and chance or custom were the only motives that could direct this arbitrary imposition. The Christians of the Roman empire were a mixture of Jews, of Greeks, and of Latin provincials: their profane names were sanctified by baptism; those of the Bible were respectable and familiar; and the casual affinity with an apostle or martyr might encourage the pious youth to imitate his virtues. But in the three centuries which preceded the reign of Charlemagne, the western world was overwhelmed by a deluge of German conquerors. After their conversion to Christianity, they long adhered, from pride or habit, to the idiom of their fathers; and their Teutonic appellations, with a softer accent and a Latin termination, were almost exclusively used in the baptism of princes and nobles. Till the tenth or twelfth century, the Old was abandoned to the Jews, and the New Testament to the people and clergy. Adam and David, Peter and Paul, John and James, George and Francis, were neglected as unknown, or despised as plebeian; and Boniface is the only name of ecclesiastical origin which the chiefs of barbaric race condescended to assume. This honourable exception may be justly ascribed to the fame and merit of St. Boniface the First, archbishop of Mentz or Mayence, the missionary of Rome, the reformer of France, and the apostle of Germany, who lost his life in preaching the Gospel to the Frisians. He was born in England, and in his own baptism he had been styled Winfrid: but with the episcopal character the Saxon received the more Christian appellation of Boniface, which had been illustrated by a martyr and a pope. Of the Hessians, Thuringians, and Bavarians, whom he reclaimed from idolatry, many were ambitious even of a nominal conformity with their patron: and from his age and country, the count of Lucca might be one of the fortunate infants who were baptized by the apostle of Bavaria.

2. The Christian priests who subdued the conquerors of the West, had inculcated the duty of damning their idolatrous ancestors, and persecuting their dissenting subjects. But the toleration which they denied to religious prejudice, was freely extended to the institutions of civil or barbaric life. The Romans of Italy, the great body of the clergy and people, were still directed by the codes of Theodosius and Justinian. The laws of the Lombards were promulgated for their own use; after the fall of their kingdom, they still preserved their national jurisprudence; and the victorious Franks enjoyed the benefit without imposing the obligation of the Salic and Ripuarian codes. The three great nations who successively reigned in Italy, were every where mingled, and every where separate. A similar indulgence was granted to the smaller colonies of Goths, Alemanni, or Bavarians; and so perfect was the practice of civil toleration, ration, that every freeman, according to his birth or choice, might embrace the law by which he himself and his family would be tried. In the acts which have escaped to our times, Count Boniface and his descendants profess to live according to the nation and law of the Bavarians: but this profession rather defines the origin of his blood, than the place of his nativity; and it is possible that some generations of his ancestors might have already felt the milder influence of climate and religion. The name of the Bavarians first rises into notice amidst the dying agonies of the Western Empire: but the tribe or troop of adventurers which assumed that name, soon swelled to a powerful kingdom, and covered the province of Noricum from the Danube to the Alps. The vicinity of Italy provoked their desires; the alliance of the Lombards encouraged their hopes: they joined the standard of the invader; and on the confines of Modena and Tuscany the memory of their ancient settlement is not totally extinct. If we compare, however, the smallness of the colony with the numbers of the nation, it may seem more probable that Count Boniface was born in Bavaria, perhaps of noble and idolatrous parents; and that his services were rewarded by Charlemagne with the government of an Italian province. The eye of the vigilant and sagacious emperor pervaded the vast extent of his dominions; and the merit of every subject, in whatsoever country or condition he had been cast, was assigned to the station most beneficial for himself and the state. While the kingdoms of the West obeyed the same sceptre, a native Frank might command on the banks of the Tyber; the frontiers of Britanny were guarded by a loyal Lombard, and the Saxon proselyte would signalize his new zeal for Christianity against the Saracens of Spain. Charlemagne affected to consider all his subjects with the impartial love of a father: but he was not unwilling to transplant a powerful chief into a foreign soil, and he cherished a secret preference of the men and the nations whose sole dependence was on the royal favour. The Franks were jealous of the elevation of an equal; the Lombards might not easily forgive the triumph of a conqueror; but the Alemanni and Bavarians, who had been long oppressed, were devoted, by loyalty and gratitude, to the service of their benefactor.

3. I am ignorant of the parents of Boniface the Bavarian; of his character and actions I am likewise ignorant. But his official title describes him as one of the principal ministers and nobles of the kingdom of Italy. The Latin appellations of dukes and counts were transferred with the latitude of foreign words to the judges and leaders of the Barbarians: these different titles were applied to the same person or station: they varied according to the fashion of the age and country; and it was not till after the ninth century that the dukes, assuming a clear pre-eminence of dignity and power, stood foremost on the steps of the throne. In the vulgar and legal idiom, the temporal peers (I anticipate the expression of more recent times) were were styled princes, and in their families the kings and emperors of the West might solicit a wife, or bestow a daughter, without degrading the majesty of their rank. It was at once their privilege and their duty to attend the national council; nor could any law acquire validity or effect without the consent and authority of these powerful nobles. In their respective districts of ample or narrow limits, each duke or count was invested with the plenitude of civil and military power, and this union of characters must be ascribed rather to the imperfection of the arts than to the talents of the men. They presided in open courts of justice, and determined all criminal and civil causes, with the advice of their plebeian assessors, their scabini, who were somewhat less illiterate than the judge himself. At the royal summons they reared their standard, assembled their freemen and vassals, and marched at their head on every occasion of danger and honour. Such taxes as could be levied on a rude and independent people were shared between the supreme and subordinate chief, and there exists an agreement by which a Lombard duke was permitted to reserve a moiety of the revenue for his public and private use. The prerogative of appointing and recalling these provincial magistrates was esteemed a sufficient pledge of their obedience; and the servants of Charlemagne might obey without reluctance the first of mankind. But the memory of a favour was lost in the grant of an office; and the grant of an office was insensibly consolidated into the right of a freehold possession.

The counts and dukes were amenable to the circuits of the missi, or royal inquisitors: but they were more able to maintain, than willing to suffer, an act of injustice; and it was gradually admitted as a constitutional maxim, that they could not be deprived of their dignity without a charge, a trial, and a conviction of felony. The founder of the Western Empire might sometimes reward the son by the gift or the reversion of his father's province; a dangerous reward, which was often extorted from the fears, rather than from the bounty of succeeding princes. They could not despoil the legitimate heir of his lands, his followers, and his popular name, and it was deemed more prudent to secure the public peace by the indulgence of his private ambition.

4. The province entrusted to the vigilance of Count Boniface is one of the most fertile and fortunate spots of Italy. It is bounded by the rivers Magra and Arno, by the sea and the Apennine; and in the old days of independence, this tract of country had been the debateable land between the Ligurians and Etruscans, till it was finally annexed by Augustus to the region of Etruria. The harbour of Luni is capable of sheltering the navies of Europe; the circumjacent hills of Carara have supplied an inexhaustible store of white marble for the noblest works of sculpture and architecture, and Lucca itself is situate almost on the banks of the Ausar and Serchio, a river which, flowing ten miles farther to the south, is finally lost under the walls of Pisa, in the waters of the Arno. In the best best age of the commonwealth, the sixth century of Rome, an allotment of sixty thousand acres was divided among two thousand citizens, who were soon associated with the ancient natives: but the colony of Lucca finally preferred the title and privileges of a municipal town. After suffering some injury from the barbaric storm, Lucca appears to revive and flourish under the Lombards, as the seat of a royal mint, and the metropolis of the whole province of Tuscany. The republic, less extensive, as it should seem, than the command of Boniface, now contains one hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants, who are enriched by the exportation of oil and silk. But their riches are the fruits of industry, and their industry is guarded by liberty and peace. I am inclined to believe, that this small and happy community is more wealthy and populous than was formerly the Tuscany of Charlemagne; and even in its decay the state of Tuscany still possesses more inhabitants and more treasure, than could have been found in the disorderly and desolate kingdom of the Lombards.

From the interposition of Ildenrand, Count of Lucca, it may be suspected that at the time of his father's decease, Boniface the Second had not acquired sufficient strength and maturity for the vacant office: but these friends, or rivals, who had exercised the government of Lucca, were soon superseded by the establishment of the lawful heir; and the youth approved himself worthy of his name and honours. The example and impunity of treason could never tempt his loyalty; and while the empire of Lewis the Pious was relaxed by weakness, or agitated by discord, Boniface asserted the glory of the French and the Christian arms. He had been entrusted with the defence of the maritime coast and the isle of Corsica against the Mahometans of Africa, and his right to command the service of the neighbouring counts may entitle him to the appellation of Duke or Marquis of Tuscany, which was assumed by his descendants. With a small fleet he sailed from Pisa, in search of the robbers of the sea; they had vanished on his approach: he cast anchor on the friendly shores of Corsica, and after providing himself with expert pilots, he steered his intrepid course for Africa, and boldly landed on the coast between Carthage and Utica. The Aglabites, who reigned in Africa as the nominal vicegerents of the caliphs, were astonished and provoked by the insolence of the Christians, whose valour had been hitherto confined to a defensive war. Their camp was immediately surrounded by a formidable host of Arabs and Moors: five times did they mount to the assault: they were repulsed five times with slaughter and shame. The field was covered with the bodies of their slain; in the hot pursuit some adventurous Franks became the victims of their own rashness; but the more prudent chief was satisfied with victory; he embarked the troops, the captives, and the spoil, and returning in triumph to the port of Luni, or the mouth of the Arno, left an example of successful enterprise which was long remembered by the Moslems of Afric, and seldom seldom imitated by the Christians of Italy. The birth, character, and adventures of the Empress Judith, will be introduced with more propriety in the story of the Guelphs, and I shall only observe, that after his abject fall and fortunate restoration, Lewis the Pious might still tremble for the safety of a beloved wife. She was confined in a monastery of Tortona, in the power of a rebellious son; and if the ambition of Lothaire was disappointed, the blood of a step-mother might be a grateful offering to his revenge. Boniface, with some loyal subjects, perceived her danger, and flew to her relief. By their celerity and courage Judith was rescued from prison, and they guarded her passage over the Alps till she met the embraces of an impatient husband. This gallant act, which deserved the gratitude of the emperor, exposed the Count of Lucca to the displeasure of Lothaire, who was still master of the kingdom of Italy, and who denied the investiture of their fiefs to all the accomplices of the escape of Judith. Boniface retired to France, where his exile was alleviated by the most honourable employments. In the civil wars, after the death of Lewis, he might secure his pardon without forfeiting his allegiance; and there is reason to believe, that he ended his days in the government of Tuscany. The sword of chivalry was consecrated to the service of religion and the fair; and the African victor, the deliverer of the empress, had fulfilled the duties of a perfect knight.

His son and successor, Adalbert the First, has a more more unquestionable right to the appellation of Duke and Marquis of Tuscany. The title of Marquis, or rather Margrave, was introduced into Italy by the French emperors; the Teutonic etymology of the word implies the count or governor of a march of a frontier province: his station gave him at least a military command over several of his equals; and in the division of the monarchy the number and importance of these hostile limits was continually multiplied. Yet the life of Adalbert is much less pure and illustrious than that of his father: either an historian was wanted to his actions, or his actions afforded no materials for history; and it is only by the glimmering of old charters, that, during thirty years, his existence is visible. The decay of genius and power in each imperial generation, had confirmed the independence of the hereditary governors; till the failure of the eldest branch, in the person of Lewis the Second, concluded a century of domestic peace, and opened an endless series of revolutions. The election of the kings of Italy was decided by the voices and by the swords of the factious nobles: they chose the object, the measure, and the term of allegiance; and the name of the candidate whom they supported, was a sufficient apology for every act of violence and rapine. A pope of an active and ambitious spirit, John VIII., most bitterly complains of the two marquisses, or tyrants, of Lambert of Spoleto, and of Adalbert of Tuscany, who were brothers in alliance, in arms, and in sacrilege. They solicited the aid of the miscreant miscreant Saracens, invaded the ecclesiastical State, entered the city, profaned the churches, extorted an oath of fidelity from the Romans, and dared to imprison the successor of St. Peter. After the departure of these public robbers, as they are styled, without much injustice, by the pontiff, he affected to display their guilt and his own danger: the sacred relics were transported from the Vatican to the Lateran palace: the altar was clothed in sackcloth, and the doors of the temple were inhospitably shut against the devotion of the pilgrims. By the apprehension of a second insult John VIII. was driven from the apostolical seat: he fled by sea to the usual asylum of France, offered the two worlds to whosoever would avenge his quarrel, and in the Synod of Troyes proclaimed the vices and pronounced the excommunication of the two marquisses of Spoleto and Tuscany, the enemies of God and Man. Some political events gave a new turn to his interest and language; the most glorious Adalbert and his wife (so lately a robber and an adulteress) are recommended in his epistles to the love and protection of the friends of the church. From such invective and such praise it might be inferred that calumny is a venial sin, or that every sin is obliterated by a reconciliation with the Pope. A casuist less indulgent, I shall not so easily absolve the sacrilegious Marquis of Tuscany: he lived in an age of the darkest superstition, and his assault on the Vatican is truly criminal, since it was condemned by the prejudices of his own conscience.

In

In the dignity of Duke and Marquis of Tuscany he was succeeded by his son, the second Adalbert, who has been only distinguished from the first by the nice microscope of chronological criticism. Such and so great was the pre-eminence of his wealth and power, that he alone among the princes of Italy was distinguished by the epithet of the rich; an epithet of ambiguous praise, since it expresses the liberality of fortune rather than of nature. He married Berta, the daughter of Lothaire king of Austrasia or Lorraine, who was the great grandson of Charlemagne: a distinction rather honourable than singular; since many of the princes of the age were descended by the females from the Imperial stem. His independence was built on the ruins of the empire of Charlemagne: the failure of lawful heirs enlarged the scene of contention: the sceptre was alternately won and lost in a field of battle, and the Italians, from a maxim of policy, entertained the competition of two kings. The dukes of Friuli and Spoleto long disputed the crown; and while Berengarius reigned at Verona, his rivals Guido and Lambert were seated on the throne of Pavia. These princes, the father and son, were the uncle and cousin of Adalbert; but he supported or deserted their standard with licentious perfidy, and one of his attempts did not much redound to the honour or advantage of the Marquis of Tuscany. He marched to surprize Lambert, who hunted without suspicion in a forest near Placentia: but he forgot that discipline and sobriety are most essential

essential to secret enterprize. The tents of the Tuscans, who deemed themselves secure of their royal game, resounded with drunken and lascivious songs; their intemperance subsided in sleep; and at the dead of night they were surprized by the vigilant Lambert, at the head of no more than one hundred horse. The Marquis, who could neither fight nor fly, was dragged from his shelter among the mules and asses of the baggage, and his shame was embittered by the rude pleasantry of the conqueror. "Thy wife Berta," said he, "had promised that thou shouldest be either a king or an ass. A king thou art not, but thy second title I shall not dispute; and wisely hast thou chosen a place of refuge among the animals of a similar species." The death of Lambert restored the captive to liberty and dominion: but the character of Adalbert was still the same, and the state of Italy long fluctuated with the vicissitudes of his interest or passions. Berengarius, who was oppressed by his service, sometimes accused and sometimes imitated the example of his ingratitude. A new pretender, Lewis king of Arles, was defeated, and dismissed, and recalled, and again established and again dethroned as he was the friend or enemy of the Marquis of Tuscany. In a moment of seeming concord, the new sovereign visited Lucca, where he was entertained with the ostentation of expense, which vanity will often extort from avarice and hatred. As Lewis admired the numerous and well-dressed ranks of the Tuscan soldiers, the attendance of the palace, and the luxury luxury of the banquet, he softly whispered, "This Marquis is indeed a king, and it is only in a vain title that I am superior to my vassal." By the diligence of flattery or malice this whisper was re-echoed: the pride of Berta was offended, her fears were alarmed; she alienated her husband's mind; he conspired with the disaffected nobles; and a hasty, perhaps a harmless saying deprived the unfortunate king of Arles of the crown of Italy and his eyes. Adalbert the Second died at Lucca, in a mature age, and his real or imaginary virtues are inscribed on his tomb. We are solicited to believe, that he was formidable to his enemies, liberal to his soldiers, just to his subjects, and charitable to the poor; that his memory was embalmed in the tears of a grateful people; and that the public happiness was buried in his grave. An epitaph is a feeble evidence of merit; yet an epitaph on the dead may prove somewhat more than a panegyric on the living.

Adalbert the Second left behind him three children, two sons, Guido and Lambert, the eldest of whom was acknowledged as Duke and Marquis of Tuscany, and one daughter, Hermenegarda, who married and survived a prince of equal rank on the confines of Piedmont. The pride and power of Berta were not impaired by her husband's death; and to her passions I should impute an unequal contest with the emperor and king of Italy, who by fraud or force imprisoned the mother and her son in the fortress of Mantua. But her faithful clients refused to surrender the cities and castles castles committed to their trust: a treaty was negociated; the captives were released; their possessions were restored; and I must applaud the moderation, perhaps the courage, of Guido, who sincerely submitted to forgive and to be forgiven. Of the death of the emperor, Berengarius, who was stabbed in his palace by a private villain, Guido was neither the author nor the accomplice: but in the subsequent election his voice had a free and decisive weight; and the laudable motives of filial or fraternal tenderness might prompt him to gratify his mother, by supporting the claim of Hugh, or Hugo, Count of Provence, her son by a former husband. The Marquis commanded the sea-ports of Tuscany; his sister, an active and popular widow, could shut or open the passes of the Alps. A royal pretender, Rodulph of Burgundy, was chased beyond the mountains: by the unanimous choice of the nobles, Hugh was invited and proclaimed: he landed at Pisa; and the sons of Adalbert were proud to salute their brother as king of Italy. But this event, which seemed to consolidate the fortunes, was the immediate cause of the downfal of their house. The new monarch insensibly betrayed a faithless and ungrateful character: his vices were scandalous, his talents mean; and if his ambition was sometimes checked by fear, it was never restrained by humanity or justice. The death of Berta dissolved the union between the children of her first and her second nuptials. The mild and moderate Guido expired in the prime of life. The Duchy of Tuscany was was occupied by Lambert: but in a hasty and indecent marriage with Marozia, his brother's widow, the king of Italy trampled on the prejudices of mankind. Hugh was already conscious of the public hatred and contempt: he might justly dread the courage, the ambition, the popularity of the Marquis; and his avarice was stimulated by the hopes of a rich forfeiture. Regardless of a mother's fame, he invented, or encouraged the report, that the obstinate barrenness of the wife of Adalbert had tempted that impious woman to procure and substitute two male infants, whom she educated as her own: and the arbitrary sentence of the king, who disclaimed Lambert as a brother, must have denied his right to the succession of Tuscany. Had this cause been argued before a tribunal of law and reason, the advocate for the Marquis would have pleaded the long and tranquil possession of his name and state, and have deprecated the injustice of a charge, which was not advanced till after the decease of both his parents. The orator would have painted in the most lively colours, the absurdity of the supposition, the difficulty of fascinating the eyes and silencing the tongues of a jealous court, and the strong improbability that the Duchess of Tuscany should have twice risqued the danger and shame of a discovery. He would have authenticated the circumstances of her pregnancy and delivery; and after establishing his defence on argument and fact, he might have tried to awaken the tender and indignant feelings of the audience. Instead of such a tedious process, the intrepid Lambert cast down his gauntlet, and challenged to single combat the false accuser of his own and his mother's fame. The challenge was accepted; a champion arose; the lists were opened; and such was the goodness of his cause, or the vigour of his arm, that the Marquis obtained an easy victory in the judgment of God. Even this judgment was not respected by the tyrant. Instead of embracing his genuine brother, he loaded the conqueror with irons, confiscated his dominions, and deprived him of his eyes; while the nobles of Italy, who so often resisted the execution of the laws, most basely acquiesced in this act of cruelty and injustice. The unhappy prince survived his misfortune many years, but he was already dead to his enemies and the world. In a civilized society, the mind is more powerful than the body; and the influence of strength or dexterity is far less extensive than that of eloquence and wisdom. But among a people of barbarians, the blind warrior, who is no longer capable of managing a horse, or of wielding a lance, must be excluded from all the honours and offices of public life.

of

Such were the five descents in the Bavarian line of the Counts of Lucca and Marquisses or Dukes of Tuscany. The fourth generation of the posterity of Boniface coincides with the age of the Marquis d'Adalbert, who may be styled the third of that name, if we can safely rivet this intermediate link of the genealogical chain. After a long hesitation and various trials, the active curiosity of Leibnitz subsided in the opinion that Adalbert the Third, the unquestionable father of the House of Este and Brunswick, was the son of the Marquis Guido, and the grandson of Adalbert the Second: and that his right of succession to the Duchy of Tuscany, which had been superseded by his tender years, was finally lost in the calamity of his uncle. In a mind conscious of its powers, and indulgent to its productions, this idea struck a deep and permanent root. As an historian, Leibnitz was acquainted with the stubborn character of facts: as a critic, he was accustomed to balance the weight of testimony: as a mathematician, he would not prostitute the name of demonstration: but he affirmed that his opinion was probable in the highest sense; and the philosopher could not patiently tolerate a sceptic. These historical inquiries he compared to the labour of an astronomer, who frames an hypothesis, such as can explain all the known phænomena of the heavens, and then exalts his hypothesis into truth, by exposing the errors of every other possible supposition. From the library of Hanover, the discovery was transmitted to that of Modena, with an earnest desire of literary, or at least of political union, and the pedigree of Adalbert the Third was ratified by the consent of Leibnitz and Muratori. Yet in this dark and doubtful step of genealogy, impartial criticism may be allowed to pause, and even the silence of a contemporary writer may incline the scale against many loose and floating atoms of modern conjecture. The first fifty years of the tenth tenth century are illustrated by the labour and eloquence of Liutprand, bishop of Cremona, who exposes, with a free and often satirical pen, the characters and vices of the times. He relates the death of Guido, and the succession of Lambert, without insinuating that the former left any children, or that the latter was appointed guardian of their minority. He deplores the fate of Lambert, without informing the reader of the escape of his nephew; by what resources of flight or defence, of prayer or negociation, he escaped the cruelty of the tyrant, and lived to propagate the glories of his race. The Marquis Otbert, the undoubted son of Adalbert the Third, is honourably mentioned; and it might be reasonably expected, that some hint should have been given of his lineal descent from the Tuscan princes, whose names and actions had been already celebrated in the history of Liutprand. Nor can the order of time, that infallible touchstone of truth, be easily reconciled with the hypothesis of Leibnitz. Guido, Marquis of Tuscany, was the third husband of the insatiate Marozia: her second was killed in the year nine hundred and twenty-five; and ten or twelve months must be granted for the shortest widowhood, the term of pregnancy, and the birth of her son Adalbert. No more than thirty-six years after his birth, his son, the Marquis Otbert, appears in the world as a statesman and a patriot. Such a precipitate succession, which crowds two generations into one, is repugnant to the whole experience of ages: a fact so strange and improbable could only be forced on our belief by the absolute power of positive and authentic evidence.

In this inquiry, I should disdain to be influenced by any partial regard for the interest or honour of the House of Brunswick: but I can resign, without a sigh, the hypothesis of Leibnitz, which might seem to exhibit the nominal rather than the natural ancestors of the son of Guido. This doubtful expression is not founded on the absurd and malicious fable, that the two last Marquisses of Tuscany were stolen, in their infancy, from an obscure, and perhaps a plebeian origin: Berta was their genuine mother; and their pedigree would not be tainted with suspicion, if the right of the father could be ascertained with the same clearness and certainty. But in these barbarous times, the valour of the men appears to have been maintained with more high and jealous care than the chastity of the women; and such was the peculiar infelicity of the Marquis Guido, that his wife, his mother, and his two grandmothers, are all accused, in their respective generations, of a slight, or scandalous deviation from the line of virtue. In the Pontifical Epistles, the wife of Adalbert I. is branded with the opprobrious name of adulteress; and without insisting on the Pope's infallibility, it may be fairly urged, that as the character of a public robber was applied to the sacrilegious enemy of Rome, the vices of Rotilda must have afforded some ground or colour for private reproach. The mother of Berta, the famous Valdrada, long fluctuated between the state of a wife and the shame of of a concubine. She might be innocent in the judgment of conscience and reason; but her pretended marriage with Lothaire, King of Lorraine, was repeatedly annulled by the sentence of the Roman Pontiff. By an obstinate resistance, her fame might have been preserved: a false and fruitless penitence could only aggravate her sin; and she became alike guilty in the eyes of the church and of the public, when she continued to dwell in the embraces of her lover, after a lawful queen had been restored to the honours of his throne and bed. The pleasures of Berta were subservient to her ambition; and Adalbert the Second appears to have been endowed with the patient virtues of a husband. By the liberal freedom with which she imparted to the nobles of Tuscany every gift in her power to bestow, the duchess secured their grateful attachment in the hour of danger; and at the age of threescore, she might be justly vain that her favours were precious, her lovers fond, her friends and clients still mindful of their past obligations. As the infidelity of Hermenegarda could sully only the blood of another family, it is almost needless to mention that the daughter of Berta most faithfully copied the example of her mother. But the satirical eloquence of Liutprand is unable to paint the vices of Marozia, wife of the Marquis Guido: "from her early youth," (exclaims the bishop,) "she had been inflamed by all the fires of Venus; and again and again did she exact from her lovers the payment of their debts." Her family was powerful at Rome: by the corruption of Marozia, of her mother, and of her sister, the church and state were polluted and oppressed: their favourites, and their children, were successively promoted to the throne of St. Peter; and in the spiritual Babylon, the city of the Seven Hills, a more inquisitive age would have detected the scarlet whore of the Revelations. The son of Marozia, the grandson of Berta, and the great-grandson of Rotilda, might be perplexed in the discovery or the choice of his true progenitors.

The hypothesis, that Adalbert III. was the son of the Marquis Guido, will not endure the test of a critical inquiry: but I am disposed to embrace the general opinion of Leibnitz and Muratori, and to believe with them, that the families of Este and Brunswick are descended from a younger branch of the House of Tuscany. A charter commemorates the name of Boniface, son of Adalbert I. and brother of Adalbert II.: his existence is certain; his marriage probable; and, according to the custom of nations, the respectable name of a grandfather and uncle would be naturally repeated in the person of his son. In the last years of the ninth century, we may fix the birth of Adalbert III. who will stand, in the corresponding degree, as the first cousin to the Marquis Guido: the order of nature will be restored, and in the succeeding generation a sufficient space will be left for the growth and maturity of Otbert I. By this early separation from the original stem, we avoid the more scandalous vices of Berta and Marozia. The silence of Liutprand will no longer surprise or embarrass the critic:

critic: Boniface, and his son Adalbert the Third, were neither the sovereigns nor the heirs of Tuscany: their private fortunes were less splendid, and more secure, than those of the Marquisses, their elder kinsmen; and their names, not conspicuous, perhaps, by crimes or virtues, might escape the memory or the pen of the general historian. As the objections diminish, the presumptive proofs of a connection between the Houses of Tuscany and Este leave a deeper impression on the mind. The repetition of the name of Adalbert has already been noticed as a family feature. In the kingdom, the name of Adalbert was less rare, however, than the title of Marquis, of such recent use and such local application, but which was uniformly used, from the tenth to the fifteenth century, as their hereditary and proper style, by the Princes of Este. The military governors, who commanded on the Alpine or Greek limits, do not suggest any traces of conformity; and our ignorance of the province which was ruled by Adalbert III. and his immediate descendants, will be tempted to believe, that the vague appellation of Marquis, which was common to all, might be cherished by their vanity, as a perpetual attribute and memorial of the long-lost dominion of Tuscany. But the circumstance of the clearest and most substantial presumption arises from the rent-roll of their ancient estates, which were spread over the heart of Tuscany, the counties of Lucca and Luna, and even the Isle of Corsica, a remote dependance of the government of Boniface II. Tradition has preserved the name and limits of the Terra Obertenga, so often cited in old charters as the lands of the Marquis Otbert I.; and if he received them from his father, it will not be difficult to suppose that they were originally granted to Boniface III. as the portion or patrimony of a younger brother. The perfect and easy coalition of the Marquisses of Tuscany and Este is resisted only by a single obstacle; and the resistance is less insuperable than it may appear at the first glance: the former adhered to the law and nation of the Bavarians, whilst the nation and law of the Lombards was professed by the latter. But we must not forget, that in the barbaric jurisprudence of Europe, a national character might be either conveyed by descent, or adopted by choice; and that each family, each individual, might select and renounce the name and institutions of these political sects. The Bavarians, a minute colony, were almost invisible in the mighty kingdom of the Lombards: their decreasing numbers could not secure a regular supply of judges and witnesses: an Italian prince would be desirous of obliterating the remembrance of his foreign origin, and the smaller rivulets were gradually lost in the master-stream. Such a change of law and nation is agreeable to reason and practice; but in this particular instance, it may not be presumed, it cannot be proved; and the objection must be allowed to counterbalance some grains of probability in the opposite scale.

Section II.

A judicious critic may approve the Tuscan descent of the families of Este and Brunswick; but a sincere historian will pronounce, that the Marquis Adalbert is their first unquestionable ancestor; that he flourished in Lombardy or Tuscany in the beginning of the tenth century; that his character and actions are buried in oblivion; and that his name and title alone can be placed at the head of an illustrious pedigree.

This pedigree is animated by his son the Marquis Otbert I., and his life is connected with the revolutions of Italy. If the records of the times were more numerous, they might confirm the probability of his descent from the Marquisses of Tuscany, since the earliest date of his name and honours coincides with the fall of their oppressors, and the first year, or even month of a new reign. The tyrant Hugh had fled beyond the Alps, loaded with the curses and treasures of the Italians: his son Lothaire, a feeble youth, had passed away like a shadow, and after a vacancy of twenty-four days, the Marquis Berengarius, grandson to the emperor of the same name, was exalted to the throne. A grant of four castles was made to the bishop of Modena; and in the original deed of gift the new monarch is pleased to declare, that the advice and request of his trusty and well-beloved the Marquis Otbert had moved him to this act of liberality or devotion. His power at court may be ascribed to the recent recent merits of the election; and the advocate on the behalf of others would not be mute or unsuccessful in his own cause. Of the favours which he received, or of the services which he performed, I am alike ignorant: but at the end of nine years, the counsellor and favourite of Berengarius was transformed into a fugitive and a rebel, who escaped to the Saxon court, inflamed the ambition of Otho, and soon returned with an army of Germans, to dethrone a sovereign, perhaps a benefactor, of his own choice. His conduct appears, at the first glance, to be tainted with ingratitude and treason; and his guilt may be aggravated by the reflexion, that he imposed a foreign yoke on his country, and prepared the long calamities of tyranny and faction. At the distance of eight centuries, I shall not vindicate the pure and rigid patriotism of the father of the House of Brunswick. According to the experience of human nature, we may calculate a hundred, nay a thousand chances, against the public virtues of a statesman: the Marquis viewed the King of Italy, first as an equal, and afterwards as an enemy; and in the loose governments of the feudal system, the duties of allegiance were proudly violated by the members of an armed and lawless aristocracy.

Yet our imperfect view of the history of the times will afford some apology, and may allow some praise for the flight and rebellion of Marquis Otbert. 1. The patriot who, in the cause of political freedom, is false to gratitude and honour, offends against the natural feelings of mankind; but but if those feelings are violated by a tyrant, they applaud the sword of the rebel, or even the dagger of the conspirator. Berengarius was a bad subject, and a worse prince: and the most opposite vices were reconciled in the dissolute and flagitious character of his wife Villa. From the revenge or justice of his predecessor, he had been saved by the blind humanity of Lothaire the son of Hugh, who cherished the faithless enemy of his crown and life. His suspicious death was followed by the persecution of his widow Adelais, the sister of the King of Burgundy. At the age of eighteen a beautiful and innocent princess was stripped of her land, her jewels, and her apparel, exposed to the brutal repetition of blows and insults, and cast into a subterraneous dungeon, where she endured, above four months, the last extremities of distress and hunger. A pleasing and pathetic tale might be formed of her miraculous escape with a damsel and a priest; of their concealment among the rushes of the lake Benacus, where they were supported many days by the charity of a fisherman; and of her rescue by a generous knight, who conducted the princess to his impregnable fortress of Canossa, and defied the vengeance of the King of Italy. The romance would conclude with the arrival of a victorious lover, a royal deliverer: the nuptials of Otho and Adelais were celebrated at Pavia, and her singular adventures were a prelude to the future glories of the Empress and the Saint. The arms of Otho had been seconded by the revolt of the Italians; but in this revolt the name of Otbert is not mentioned; and we should rather accuse than admire the patient loyalty of the Marquis. Before he renounced his obedience and gratitude, the unrepenting tyrant had accomplished the measure of his sins; the church and state, the rich and the poor, were the indiscriminate victims of the cruelty and avarice of Berengarius. 2. In his first victorious expedition, the prudence or magnanimity of Otho had declined the rigour of absolute conquest, and was content to be styled the Protector of an injured nation. A prostrate enemy was spared and forgiven: after waiting three days before the palace gates, Berengarius was admitted to the royal presence, and the golden sceptre of the kingdom of Italy was again delivered to his hands. But he pronounced an oath of fidelity, a solemn engagement, that he would be ready, in council and in the field, to obey the commands of his sovereign, and that he would govern his people with more equity and mildness than he had hitherto displayed. By this unequal treaty, the right of Otho was established, to judge and punish the crimes of his feudatory: the Marquis Otbert is no longer a rebel, who solicits the aid of a foreign prince, and all the vassals of Italy might lawfully appeal from their immediate to their supreme lord. 3. The appeal was urged by the most respectable deputies of the church and state, and their voice was the voice of the kingdom of Italy. The Roman pontiff dispatched his apostolical legates to complain of the temporal and spiritual wrongs which St. Peter and St. Paul had long suffered from from the tyranny of Berengarius. An Archbishop of Milan stood before the King of Germany, to deliver the sentiments of the oppressed clergy. The illustrious Marquis Otbert (I copy the words of the historian) spoke in the name and in the cause of his peers; and the powers of these ambassadors were ratified by the secret letters and messengers of almost all the counts and bishops of Italy. 4. In the second, as in the first expedition, Otho yielded to the call of justice and freedom: but in the passes of the Trentine Alps, his march was stopped a day and a night by the seeming opposition of sixty thousand Italians. The suspicions of Berengarius had been appeased by their ready obedience to his summons; and in this martial assembly they were the masters of the throne and the representatives of the people. A temperate negociation was, however, proposed: the timely abdication of the father might have softened their hatred; and they had consented to acquiesce under the government of his son Adalbert. The obstinate despair of the old king provoked them to abjure his name and family: they sheathed their swords, and opened their gates: a hundred banners waved round the royal standard of Saxony: the deliverer was saluted king of Italy, and he received the Iron Crown in the cathedral of Milan. The pope confirmed the revolution; and after a vacancy of twenty-eight years, the title of Emperor of the Romans was revived in the person of Otho the Great. 5. The benefits or mischiefs which might arise from the union of Italy and Germany could be decided only by by experience; nor could the foresight of the Marquis Otbert anticipate the experience of three hundred years. It was enough for a mortal statesman to obey the wishes, and consult the happiness, of the present generation, by placing in the hands of wisdom and power the sceptre of the Italian kingdom.

is

In one of the annual odes which still adorn or disgrace the birth-days of our British King, the Laureat, with some degree of courtly, and even poetic art, has introduced the founder of the Brunswick race:

> "When Otbert left the Italian plain,
> And soft Ateste's green domain,
> Attendant on Imperial sway,
> Where Fame and Otho led the way,
> The genius of the Julian hills, > (Whose piny summits nod with snow,
> Whose Naiads pour their thousand rills
> To swell th' exulting Po,)
> An eager look prophetic cast,
> And hail'd the hero as he pass'd."

By a lofty prediction of fame and empire, this benevolent genius exalts the courage of the hero, and displays the future greatness of his posterity, from the nuptials of Azo, to the succession of British kings:

> "Proceed. Rejoice. Descend the vale,
> And bid the future monarchs hail!
> Hail, all hail, the hero cried,
> And Echo, on her airy tide,
> Pursu'd him, murmuring, down the mountain's side."

I shall

I shall not presume to inquire whether such distinct and distant views of futurity may not surpass the prescience of a mountain god: but I am compelled to vindicate my own accuracy, by observing some geographical and historical errors of the mortal bard. The possessions of Otbert were not situate in the Venetian plain, but among the mountains of Tuscany; and we shall soon discover, that the green domain of Este, or Ateste, was acquired by the marriage of his grandson. In his attendance, "where Fame and Otho led the way," he would have passed, not the Julian, but the Rhætian Alps; he must have followed the high road of Verona and Trent, the great and customary passage between Italy and Germany. The name of the Julian Alps is confined to a low range of hills, soon bounded by the north eastern extremity of the Adriatic, and which opposed, in the tenth century, a feeble barrier to the inroads of the wild Hungarians. The streams which issue from those hills are lost in the sea, or intercepted by the neighbouring rivers; and of their thousand rills, not a drop can be mingled with the waters of the Po. Even the motive and the date of the passage of Otbert are wantonly corrupted. The patriot, entrusted with the cause of Italy, is degraded into an adventurer, who seeks his fortune in the Emperor's service: and he bids an everlasting farewell to the country which he was most impatient to revisit and deliver. The poet may deviate from the truth of history, but every deviation ought to be be compensated by the superior beauties of fancy and fiction.

Among the followers of his triumphal car, the servants of his fortune, Otho could distinguish the patriot fugitives who had risqued their lives and estates to assert his rights, and the freedom of Italy. The most illustrious of these, the Marquis Otbert, was rewarded with riches and honours; and there is some reason to believe that his vague title was applied to the province of Liguria, which, according to the Roman geography, included the cities of Milan and Genoa. But the descendant of Adalbert I. might advance an equitable, though not a legal claim, to the Duchy of Tuscany: and some suspicion will taint the pedigree of a favourite, who neglects to ask, or fails to obtain, the restitution of a patrimonial dignity. Our surprise will be increased and removed by the discovery of the same fact. Hugh, King of Italy, had granted the Tuscan Duchy, first to his brother, and then to his bastard; it was inherited by the son of that bastard: and succeeding monarchs, the tyrant Berengarius, and the German Otho, respected the possession of these fallen and unpopular princes. So strange an indulgence must have been founded on some secret, but powerful motive; and the same motive, could it now be revealed, might explain either the modest indifference, or the unavailing request, of Otbert himself. But the Marquis (shall I say?) of Liguria was invested with an office far more worthy of his abilities, and far more expressive of the royal confidence. The Count of of the sacred palace was the prime minister of the kingdom of Italy; and it was observed, in classic style, that the Dukes, the Marquisses, and the Counts submitted to the pre-eminence of his consular Fasces. In an age, when every magistrate was a noble, and every noble was a soldier, the Count Palatine often assumed the command of armies; but in his proper station, he represented the judicial character of the Emperor, and pronounced a definitive sentence, as the judge of all civil and criminal appeals. The city of Pavia, and the castle of Lomello, were his ordinary residence: but he visited the provinces in frequent circuits, and all local or subordinate jurisdiction was suspended in his presence. This important office was exercised above twelve years by the Marquis Otbert: the public acts, the few that have escaped, announce the proceedings of his tribunal at Lucca, Verona, &c.; and he continued to deserve and enjoy the favour of the Emperor. If, in the decline of life, the lassitude of camps and courts had tempted him to seek a cool and independent solitude, I should praise the temper of the philosopher; but the firmest minds are enslaved by the prejudices of the times, and the retreat of Otbert was inspired by the basest superstition. Under the monastic habit, in a Benedictine abbey which he had richly endowed, the Marquis laboured to expiate the sins of his secular life. Pride and ambition are the vices of the world: humility is the first virtue of a monk; and the descendant of princes, the favourite of kings, the judge of nations, tions, was conspicuous among his brethren in the daily labour of collecting and feeding the hogs of the monastery. His sanctity was applauded: but if he listened to that applause, the penitent was entangled in a more subtle snare of the dæmon of vanity.

After the resignation of the Count Palatine, his office was given to favour or merit: but his patrimonial estates were inherited by the Marquis Otbert, who can only be distinguished by the epithet of the Second, from the similar name and title of his father. The life of the second Otbert was tranquil or obscure: he was rich in lands, in vassals, and in four valiant sons, Azo, Hugh, Adalbert, and Guido: but their valour embittered his old age, and involved the family in treason and disgrace. The reigns of the three Othos, a period of forty years, had been a transient season of prosperity and peace. But on the failure of their direct line, the Germans maintained their right of conquest, the Italians revived the claim of independence, and both were ambitious and resolute to establish a king of their own nation and choice. The princes and lords of Italy were all of barbaric origin; but as it happens, in the progress of nobility, the strangers of the second were despised by those of the third or fourth generation: and the old settlers, who could boast some ages of usurpation, esteemed themselves the ancient natives, the true proprietors of the soil. In the hostile diets of Mentz and Pavia, two hostile kings were elected, Henry the Saxon, and Arduin the Lombard; and they they disputed the Iron Crown in a civil, or rather a social war, of ten years. The German invaders were long checked, and sometimes defeated, in the passes of the Alps: but their strength and numbers finally prevailed. The fortunate Henry obtained the title of Emperor, and afterwards of Saint; Arduin was degraded and saved by the monastic habit: and his adherents were pardoned or punished, according to the measure of their guilt or power. Among these adherents, the first to erect the standard, and the last to bow the knee, were the Marquis Otbert II., his four sons, and his grandson Azo II., the immediate founder of the lines of Brunswick and Este. The distance of their fields of battle may prove the extent of their influence, and the obstinacy of their struggle; they made a vigorous stand in the neighbourhood of Pavia, they raised a dangerous insurrection at Rome, and they were vanquished and made prisoners in the plains of Apulia. A judicial act recites their crimes, and pronounces their condemnation. The six Marquisses were convicted, by the law of the Lombards, of conspiring against the king's life: and such conspiracy was punished, according to the same law, with confiscation and death. Their collateral offences, murder, rapine, and sacrilege, are the inevitable consequences of civil war: but the violation of some oath which had been extorted in the hour of distress, exposed them to the more ignominious reproach of treason and perjury. Yet their lives were spared by the clemency of the pious Emperor: the portion of their lands which had been dedicated to pious uses, he could not restore; but he generously forgave the ample forfeiture which had devolved to the state: and when they resumed their seats in the assembly of the peers, they professed themselves the grateful and loyal servants of their benefactor.

But as the Saxon Henry left neither children nor kinsmen to inherit their obedience and gratitude, the sons of Otbert II. used, or abused, their freedom, and again opposed the election of Conrad the First, emperor of the Franconian line. In the hope of foreign aid they offered the iron crown, and promised the Roman Empire, to Robert, King of France: and the Marquis Hugo, the second brother, was entrusted with this important embassy: but the son of Hugh Capet was of an inactive temper: his new kingdom was unsettled; and with his approbation, the Italian deputies transferred their offer to William of Aquitain, a vassal not less powerful than his sovereign. The Duke of Aquitain behaved, on this momentous occasion, with a just temperance of courage and discretion. He accepted the crown for his family, protesting that under his reign Italy should enjoy such days as she had never known. His foremost troops were dispatched beyond the Alps, and he visited Rome under the pretence of a pilgrimage. But on a nearer prospect of the scene, the Duke of Aquitain was satisfied that he could neither encounter his antagonist, nor confide in his party. The temporal peers were inclined to his cause, but the Archbishop Archbishop of Milan, and the most important prelates, had been promoted by the House of Saxony: they were steady to the German interest; and William rejected the sole effectual measure, that of filling their vacant seats with his own ecclesiastics. He prudently withdrew from the unequal and ruinous contest. In a farewel epistle, he acknowledges the truth and constancy of one Italian lord, and this singular expression involves the sons of Otbert in the national reproach of levity or falsehood. During his embassy in France, the Marquis Hugo had been pressed by the monks of Tours to restore some abbey lands which he had usurped in the neighbourhood of Milan. At the distance of six hundred years and six hundred miles, that superstitious rebel was subdued by the apprehension of the vengeance of St. Martin.

By such exploits the memory, or at least the names of the four sons of Otbert II. has been preserved from oblivion. Azo I. the eldest brother, propagated the race; and by his first marriage with the niece of Hugo, Marquis of Tuscany, that chief acquired a rich patrimony, and a commanding influence in the Venetian province. The character of Hugo, his power, and his long reign, had given him a respectable place among the princes of the times: but the title of Great, the title of Alexander, Pompey, and Charlemagne, becomes ridiculous when it is necessary to ask, and difficult to find, the reason of the appellation. From the upper to the lower sea, his command extended over the middle regions of Italy: with the right he grasped the Duchy of Tuscany, with the left that of Spoleto; till on the voluntary or compulsive resignation of the latter, he contracted his domain within the limits of hereditary sway. In the exercise of arms Hugo was strong and fortunate, and in the siege and chastisement of Capua he appeared with dignity as the minister of imperial justice; but the same sword might be turned against his sovereign; and Otho III. is said to have betrayed a secret satisfaction when death delivered him from so formidable a vassal. Far different were the feelings of the clergy and people of Tuscany. The former bewailed an humble votary and a liberal benefactor; a convent at Florence, in which his tomb has been long shewn, is one of the seven monasteries which he richly endowed with lands, slaves, and gold and silver plate, for the service of the altar. In the opinion of the age these virtues were more pleasing in the eye of the Deity than the justice and humanity which he displayed in his temporal administration. The Marquis of Tuscany loved praise, and hated flattery: a nice touchstone which discriminates vanity from the love of fame. In the chase, on a march, he often rode away from his attendants; visited the cottages; conversed with the peasants and passengers, to whom his person was unknown; questioned them freely concerning the character and government of their prince; and enjoyed the sincere and simple effusions of their gratitude and veneration. The birth of Hugo may at once be styled base and illustrious; since he was the doubtful offspring of the bastard son of the King

King of Italy of the same name; but his life was deemed of such importance to mankind, that the knowledge of its approaching term was communicated from heaven to earth by a special revelation. After his decease, the Duchy of Tuscany was delegated to a stranger; but a female might succeed to his private estates; and his sister had married Peter Candianus, the fourth Doge or Duke of Venice, of his name and family. In that early period of the republic the magistrates were arbitrary and feeble, and the elective Dukes were alternately the tyrants and victims of a tumultuous democracy. By this connection with the Tuscan Marquis, the pride of Candianus was elated: he assumed the manners of a feudal lord; levied a body of Italians, and insulted a free city with the arms and licentiousness of his mercenary guard. A furious multitude encompassed his palace: the gates and the soldiers resisted their assault: they fired the adjacent houses, and in the attempt to escape, the Duke and his infant son were transpierced with a thousand wounds. Such scenes were then frequent at Venice: they may reconcile our minds to the silent and rigid order of the modern aristocracy. The duties of the widow of Peter Candianus were to revenge an husband, and to educate a daughter, of the same name as her own. The daughter, Valdrada, became the wife of the Marquis Albert-Azo the First; and it is apparent, from the date of the birth of their eldest son, Albert-Azo II. that these nuptials were consummated in the lifetime, and approved by the consent of a wealthy and childless uncle, who could only hope to live in the posterity of his niece.

The north-eastern region of Italy, which began to be vivified by the rising industry and splendour of Venice, extends from the shores of the Adriatic to the foot of the Alps. Had experience confirmed the prolific virtues of the climate; did the Venetian hens lay one or two eggs every day; did the ewes drop their lambs twice or thrice in a year; were the women delivered of two or three infants at a birth, the land must soon be overstocked and exhausted. After translating the Greek fables into simple truth, we shall still acknowledge one of the most pleasant and plentiful regions of Italy, a soil productive of grass, corn, and vines, a generous breed of horses, and innumerable flocks of sheep, more precious by the fineness of their wool. Padua, the first of the fifty cities of Venetia, had been so often trampled by the passage of the barbarians, that few vestiges remained of the ancient splendour which, in the tide of human affairs, she afterwards recovered and surpassed. Fifteen miles to the south of Padua, Albert-Azo the First fixed his permanent and principal seat in the castle and town of Ateste, or Este, formerly a Roman colony of some note: and by an harmless anticipation we may apply to his descendants the title of Marquis of Este; which they did not however assume till the end of the twelfth century. From Este, their new estates, the inheritance of Hugo the Great, extended to the Adige, the Po, and the Mincius. Their farms and cattle were scattered over the plain:

plain: many of the heights, Montagnana, Monselice, &c. were occupied by their forts and garrisons; and they possessed a valuable tract of marsh land, the island (as it may be styled) of Rovigo, which almost reaches to the gates of Ferrara. The first step in the emigrations of the family was from the neighbourhood of the Tuscan to that of the Adriatic sea.

The name and character of the Marquis Albert-Azo the Second, shine conspicuous through the gloom of the eleventh century. The most remarkable features in the portrait are, 1. His Ligurian marquisate; 2. His riches; 3. His long life; 4. His marriages; 5. His rank of nobility in the public opinion. The glory of his descendants is reflected on the founder; and Azo II. claims our attention as the stem of the two great branches of the pedigree; as the common father of the Italian and German princes of the kindred lines of Este and Brunswick.

1. The fair conjecture that the two Otberts, the father and son, commanded at Milan and Genoa with the title and office of Marquis, acquires a new degree of probability for Azo I. and ascends to the level of historic truth in the person of Azo II. Before the middle of the eleventh century the ruins of Genoa had been restored; its active inhabitants excelled in the arts of navigation and trade: their arms had been felt on the African coast, and their credit was established in the ports of Egypt and Greece. Their riches increased with their industry, and their liberty with their riches. Yet they they continued to obey, or at least to revere, the majesty of the emperors. In an act, as it should seem, of the year one thousand and forty-eight, the Marquis Albert-Azo presides at Genoa in a court of justice, and his assessors, the magistrates of the city, are proud to style themselves the consuls and judges of the sacred palace. The royal dignity of Pavia was gradually eclipsed by the wealth and populousness of Milan, the first of the Italian cities that dared to erect the standard of independence. The government of Milan was divided between the two representatives of St. Ambrose and of Cæsar. The veneration of the flock for the shepherd was fortified by the temporal state and privileges of the archbishop, and his annual revenue of fourscore thousand pieces of gold supplied an ample fund for benevolence or luxury. The civil and military powers were exercised by the Duke or Marquis of Milan, (for these titles were promiscuously used,) and the voice of tradition is clear and positive that this hereditary office was vested in the ancestors of the house of Este. Some of the prerogatives which they assumed are expressive of the rigour of the feudal system: they were the heirs of all who died childless and intestate, and a fine was paid on the birth of each infant who defeated their claim: their officers levied a tax on the markets, and their minute inquisition exacted the first loaf of bread from each oven, and the first log of wood from every cart-load that entered the gates. Yet an old historian, more forcibly affected with the calamities of his own days, deplores the long long lost felicity of their golden age, which had been equally praised by the blessings of the feeble and the curses of the strong. They drew their swords for the service of the prince and people, but their reign was distinguished by long intervals of prosperity and peace. The distant possessions and various avocations of the Duke or Marquis often diverted him from the exercise of this municipal trust: his powers were devolved on the viscounts and captains of Milan; these subordinate tyrants formed an alliance, or rather conspiracy, with the valvassors, or nobles of the first class; and the people was afflicted by the discord or the union of a lawless oligarchy. A private insult exasperated the patience of the plebeians: they rose in arms, and their numbers and fury prevailed in the bloody contest. The captains and nobles retired; but they retired with a spirit of revenge; collected their vassals and peasants of the adjacent country; encompassed the city with a circumvallation of six fortresses, and in a siege or blockade of three years reduced the inhabitants to the last extremes of famine and distress. By the interposition of the Emperor and the Archbishop, the peace of Milan was restored: the factions were reconciled; they wisely refused a garrison of four thousand Germans; but they acquiesced in the civil government of the empire. The Marquis again ascended his tribunal, and that Marquis is Albert-Azo the Second. A judicial act of the year one thousand and forty-five attests his title and jurisdiction; and as the representative of the Emperor, he imposes a fine a fine of a thousand pieces of gold. The progress of Italian liberty reduced his office to the empty name of Marquis of Liguria, and such he is styled by the historians of the age. In the next century, his grandson, Obizo I. is invested by the Emperor Frederick I. with the honours of Marquis of Milan and Genoa, as his grandfather Azo held them of the empire; but this splendid grant commemorates the dignity, without reviving the power, of the House of Este.

2. Like one of his Tuscan ancestors, Azo the Second was distinguished among the princes of Italy by the epithet of the Rich. The particulars of his rent-roll cannot now be ascertained: an occasional, though authentic deed of investiture, enumerates eighty-three fiefs or manors which he held of the empire in Lombardy and Tuscany, from the marquisate of Este to the county of Luni: but to these possessions must be added the lands which he enjoyed as the vassal of the church, the ancient patrimony of Otbert (the Terra Obertenga) in the counties of Arezzo, Pisa, and Lucca, and the marriage portion of his first wife, which, according to the various readings of the manuscripts, may be computed either at twenty, or at two hundred thousand English acres. If such a mass of landed property were now accumulated on the head of an Italian nobleman, the annal revenue might satisfy the largest demands of private luxury or avarice, and the fortunate owner would be rich in the improvement of agriculture, the manufactures of industry, the refinement of taste, and the extent extent of commerce. But the barbarism of the eleventh century diminished the income, and aggravated the expense, of the Marquis of Este. In a long series of war and anarchy, man, and the works of man, had been swept away; and the introduction of each ferocious and idle stranger had been over-balanced by the loss of five or six perhaps of the peaceful industrious natives. The mischievous growth of vegetation, the frequent inundations of the rivers, were no longer checked by the vigilance of labour; the face of the country was again covered with forests and morasses; of the vast domains which acknowledged Azo for their lord, the far greater part was abandoned to the wild beasts of the field, and a much smaller portion was reduced to the state of constant and productive husbandry. An adequate rent may be obtained from the skill and substance of a free tenant, who fertilizes a grateful soil, and enjoys the security and benefit of a long lease. But faint is the hope, and scanty is the produce of those harvests, which are raised by the reluctant toil of peasants and slaves, condemned to a bare subsistence, and careless of the interests of a rapacious master. If his granaries are full, his purse is empty; and the want of cities or commerce, the difficulty of finding or reaching a market, obliges him to consume on the spot a part of his useless stock, which cannot be exchanged for merchandize or money. The member of a well-regulated society is defended from private wrongs by the laws, and from public injuries by the arms of the state; state; and the tax which he pays is a just equivalent for the protection which he receives. But the guard of his life, his honour, and his fortune was abandoned to the private sword of a feudal chief; and if his own temper had been inclined to moderation and patience, the public contempt would have roused him to deeds of violence and revenge. The entertainment of his vassals and soldiers, their pay and rewards, their arms and horses, surpassed the measure of the most oppressive tribute, and the destruction which he inflicted on his neighbours was often retaliated on his own lands. The costly elegance of palaces and gardens was superseded by the laborious and expensive construction of strong castles, on the summits of the most inaccessible rocks; and some of these, like the fortress of Canossa in the Apennine, were built and provided to sustain a three years siege against a royal army. But his defence in this world was less burthensome to a wealthy lord than his salvation in the next: the demands of his chapel, his priests, his alms, his offerings, his pilgrimages, were incessantly renewed; the monastery chosen for his sepulchre was endowed with his fairest possessions, and the naked heir might often complain, that his father's sins had been redeemed at too high a price. The Marquis Azo was not exempt from the contagion of the times: his devotion was amused and inflamed by the frequent miracles which were performed in his presence; and the monks of Vangadizza, who yielded to his request the arm of a dead saint, were ignorant of the value of that inestimable mable jewel. After satisfying the demands of war and superstition, he might appropriate the rest of his revenue to use and pleasure. But the Italians of the eleventh century were imperfectly skilled in the liberal and mechanic arts: the objects of foreign luxury were furnished at an exorbitant price by the merchants of Pisa and Venice; and the superfluous wealth, which could not purchase the real comforts of life, was idly wasted on some rare occasions of vanity and pomp. Such were the nuptials of Boniface, Duke or Marquis of Tuscany, whose family was long afterwards united with that of Azo, by the marriage of their children. These nuptials were celebrated on the banks of the Mincius, which the fancy of Virgil has decorated with a more beautiful picture. The princes and people of Italy were invited to the feast, which continued three months: the fertile meadows, which are intersected by the slow and winding course of the river, were covered with innumerable tents, and the bridegroom displayed and diversified the scenes of his proud and tasteless magnificence. All the utensils of service were of silver, and his horses were shod with plates of the same metal, loosely nailed, and carelessly dropped, to indicate his contempt of riches. An image of plenty and profusion was expressed in the banquet: the most delicious wines were drawn in buckets from the well; and the spices of the east were ground in water-mills like common flour. The dramatic and musical arts were in the rudest state; but the Marquis had summoned the most popular singers, harpers, and buffoons, buffoons, to exercise their talents on this splendid theatre. Their exhibitions were applauded, and they applauded the liberality of their patron. After this festival, I might remark a singular gift of the same Boniface to the Emperor Henry III., a chariot and oxen of solid silver, which were designed only as a vehicle for a hogshead of vinegar. If such an example should seem above the imitation of Azo himself, the Marquis of Este was at least superior in wealth and dignity to the vassals of his compeer. One of these vassals, the Viscount of Mantua, presented the German monarch with one hundred falcons, and one hundred bay horses, a grateful contribution to the pleasures of a royal sportsman. In that age, the proud distinction between the nobles and princes of Italy was guarded with jealous ceremony: the Viscount of Mantua had never been seated at the table of his immediate lord; he yielded to the invitation of the emperor; and a stag's skin, filled with pieces of gold, was graciously accepted by the Marquis of Tuscany as the fine of his presumption.

3. The temporal felicity of Azo was crowned by the long possession of honours and riches: he died in the year one thousand and ninety-seven, aged upwards of an hundred years; and the term of his mortal existence was almost commensurate with the lapse of the eleventh century. The character, as well as the situation of the Marquis of Este, rendered him an actor in the revolutions of that memorable period: but time has cast a veil over the virtues and vices of the man, and I must be content content to mark some of the æras, the mile-stones of his life, which measure the extent and intervals of the vacant way. Albert-Azo the Second was no more than seventeen when he first drew the sword of rebellion or patriotism, when he was involved with his grand-father, his father, and his three uncles, in a common proscription. In the vigour of manhood, about his fiftieth year, the Ligurian marquis governed the cities of Milan and Genoa, as the minister of imperial authority. He was upwards of seventy when he passed the Alps to vindicate the inheritance of Maine for the children of his second marriage. He became the friend and servant of Gregory VII. and in one of his epistles, that ambitious pontiff recommends the Marquis Azo as the most faithful and best beloved of the Italian princes; as the proper channel through which a king of Hungary might convey his petitions to the apostolic throne. In the mighty contest between the crown and the mitre, the Marquis Azo and the Countess Matilda led the powers of Italy, and when the standard of St. Peter was displayed, neither the age of the one, nor the sex of the other, could detain them from the field. With these two affectionate clients the Pope maintained his station in the fortress of Canossa, while the emperor, barefoot on the frozen ground, fasted and prayed three days at the foot of the rock: they were witnesses to the abject ceremony of the penance and pardon of Henry IV.; and in the triumph of the church, a patriot might foresee the deliverance of Italy from the German yoke. At the time of this event the Marquis of Este was above fourscore; but in the twenty following years he was still alive and active amidst the revolutions of peace and war. The last act which he subscribed is dated above a century after his birth; and in that act the venerable chief possesses the command of his faculties, his family, and his fortune. In this rare prerogative of longevity Albert-Azo II. stands alone; nor can I recollect in the authentic annals of mortality a single example of a king or prince, of a statesman or general, of a philosopher or poet, whose life has been extended beyond the period of an hundred years. Nor should this observation, which is justified by universal experience, be thought either strange or surprising. It has been found, that of twenty-four thousand newborn infants, seven only will survive to attain that distant term; and much smaller is the proportion of those who will be raised by fortune or genius, to govern or afflict, or enlighten, their age or country. The chance that the same individual should draw the two great prizes in the lottery of life, will not easily be defined by the powers of calculation. Three approximations, which will not hastily be matched, have distinguished the present century, Aurungzeb, Cardinal Fleury, and Fontenelle. Had a fortnight more been given to the philosopher, he might have celebrated his secular festival; but the lives and labours of the Mogul king and the French minister were terminated before they had accomplished their ninetieth year. A strong constitution may be the gift of nature; but but the few who survive their contemporaries must have been superior to the passions and appetites which urge the speedy decay and dissolution of the mind and body. The Marquis of Este may be presumed, from his riches and longevity, to have understood the economy of health and fortune.

4. I remember a Persian tale of three old men, who were successively questioned by a traveller as he met them on the road. The youngest brother, under the load of a wife and a numerous family, was sinking into the grave before his time. The second, though much older, was far less infirm and decrepid: he had been left a widower and without children. But the last and eldest of the three brothers still preserved, at an incredible age, the vigour and vivacity of the autumnal season: he had always preferred a life of celibacy. The enjoyment of domestic freedom could not however contribute to the longevity of the Marquis Azo: he married three wives; he educated three sons; and it is doubtful whether chance or prudence delayed his first nuptials till he had at least accomplished the fortieth year of his age. These nuptials were contracted with Cuniza, or Cunegonda, a German maid, whose ancestors, by their nobility and riches, were distinguished among the Suabian and Bavarian chiefs; whose brother was invested by the Emperor Henry III. with the Duchy of Carinthia, and the Marquisate of Verona, on the confines of the Venetian possessions of the House of Este. The marriage of Azo and Cunegonda was productive of a son, who received at his baptism the name of GUELPH, to revive and perpetuate the memory of his uncle, his grandfather, and his first progenitors, on the maternal side. I have already defined the ample domain which was given as a marriage-portion to the daughter of the Guelphs: but on the failure of heirs male, her fortunate son inherited the patrimonial estates of the family, obtained the dukedom of Bavaria, and became the founder of the eldest, or German branch, of the House of Este, from which the Dukes of Brunswick, the Electors of Hanover, and the Kings of Great Britain, are lineally descended. After the decease of Cunegonda, who must have departed this life in the flower of her age, the Marquis of Este solicited a second alliance beyond the Alps: but his delicacy no longer insisted on the choice of a virgin; the widower was contented with a widow; and he excused the ambiguous stain which might adhere to his bride by a divorce from her first husband. Her name was Garsenda, the daughter, and at length the heiress of the Counts of Maine. She became the mother of two sons, Hugo and Fulk, and the younger of these is the knowledged parent of the Dukes of Ferrara and Modena. The same liberal fortune which had crowned the offspring of the first, seemed to attend the children of the second nuptials of the Marquis Azo: but their fortune was hollow and fallacious, and after the loss of their Gallic inheritance, the sons of Garsenda reluctantly acquiesced in some fragments of their Italian patrimony. Matilda, the third wife of Azo, was another widow of noble birth, since she was his own cousin in the fourth degree: but this consanguinity provoked the stern and impartial justice of Gregory VII. His friend was summoned to appear before a synod at Rome: the inflexible priest pronounced a sentence of divorce, and whatsoever idea may be formed of the Marquis's vigour, at the age of seventy-eight, he might submit, without much effort, to the canons of the church. Besides his three sons, Azo had a daughter named Adelais, who was educated in the family of the Countess Matilda. But the damsel is only mentioned to attest the miraculous virtue of Anselm, Bishop of Lucca: she was relieved in the night from a violent fit of the cholic, by the local application of a pillow, on which the Saint had formerly reposed his head.

of

V. A wealthy Marquis of the eleventh century must have commanded a proud hereditary rank in civil society. In the judgment of the Pope, the Emperor, and the Public, Albert-Azo was distinguished among the princes, and the first princes, of the kingdom of Italy. His double alliance in Germany and France may prove how much he was known and esteemed among foreign nations; and he strengthened his political importance by a domestic union with the conquerors of Apulia and Sicily. I shall not repeat the story of the Norman adventurers, nor shall I again delineate the character and exploits of Robert Guiscard, which, to the readers of the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, are sufficiently familiar. But as Duke Robert had four daughters, the choice of his other three sons-in-law may serve as a test, a touchstone, of the comparative weight and value of the House of Este. Michael, Emperor of the Greeks, was the first name in the Christian world. Raymond, Count of Barcelona, was the independent sovereign of a warlike people; and the meanest of the three, a French Baron, of military renown, was the cousin of the Kings of France and Jerusalem, the brother-in-law of the King of Navarre and Arragon. Such were three of the sons, by alliance, of the Norman conqueror, who had previously rejected a proposal for the eldest son of the Emperor Henry IV.: the marriage of a fourth daughter will be most accurately represented in the words of the Apulian poet: "While the hero resided within the walls of the Trojan city, he received the visit of a certain noble Lombard Marquis, accompanied by many nobles of his country. Azo was his name. The object of his journey was to request that the Duke's daughter might be granted as a wife to Hugo, his illustrious son. The Duke convened an assembly of his chiefs, and with their consent and advice, the daughter of Robert was delivered to the son of Azo. The nuptial rites were solemnized in due form, and the festival was celebrated with gifts and banquets. After the consummation of the marriage, the Duke solicited his Counts and powerful vassals to bestow a free gift, which might grace the joyful departure of the bride and bridegroom, and he enforced his demand, by reminding them that no subsidy whatsoever soever had been given to her sister, the Greek Empress. The demand of a tribute was entertained with a murmur of surprise and discontent; but all opposition was fruitless, and they presented their sovereign with mules and horses, and various offerings. He bestowed them on the husband of his daughter, with an addition from his own treasures: a fleet was prepared, and both the father and son were transported with great honour to their native shores." This evidence of a contemporary poet, or rather historian, who had no temptation to flatter the Princes of Este, would alone be sufficient to establish the nobility and splendour of their family, the family of Brunswick, beyond the distant term of seven hundred years. If the Marquis Azo were the first of his race whose name and memory had been preserved, we might acquiesce in our ignorance, with a just persuasion of the dignity and power of his unknown ancestors. Of these illustrious ancestors, the zeal and diligence of Leibnitz and Muratori have discovered four probable, and four certain degrees. After the examination of their proofs, a scrupulous critic may suspect, that in deriving the Marquisses of Este from those of Tuscany, "the ascent of reason has been aided by the wings of imagination;" but he must confess, that since the beginning of the tenth century, the series of generations flows in a clear and unbroken stream.

Section III.

The eldest of the three sons of the Marquis

Azo, the fortunate Guelph, was transplanted from his native soil, to become the root of the German, and, in the fulness of time, of the British line, of the family of Este. By his two younger brothers, Hugo and Fulk, the Italian succession was propagated: but the race of Hugo expired in the second degree; the posterity of Fulk still survives in the twentieth generation. The ancestors of Guelph, on the father's and the mother's side, and the series of his descendants in Bavaria and Saxony, form the antiquities of the House of Brunswick, and the proper subject of this historical discourse: but our curiosity will naturally embrace the collateral branch of the Princes of Este, Ferrara, and Modena, who have not been unworthy of their first progenitors, and more powerful kinsmen. Without confining myself to the rigid servitude of annals, without resting on every step of a long pedigree, I shall concisely display the most interesting scenes of their various fortunes.

As the right of female succession began to prevail in the feudal system of France, Garsenda, the second wife of Azo, might claim the duchy or county of Maine, which had been successively possessed by her father, her brother, and her nephew. Her pretensions were legitimate; but the heiress of Maine had been married into a distant land: her arms were feeble, her vassals factious, her neighbours unjust. William, Duke of Normandy, a famous name, was tempted by the prospect of a fertile and adjacent territory: he muttered some pretence of a gift or alliance: but ambition bition was his only motive, and his only title was superior strength. Four years the Cenomani, the people of Maine, reluctantly bowed under his iron sceptre; but after the forces of Normandy had been transported beyond the sea, they were encouraged by the absence, rather than awed by the success and glory of the conqueror of England. They solicited the Marquis of Liguria to assert the rights of his wife and son. Azo listened to their call: after the expulsion or massacre of the Normans, the cities and castles were delivered into his hands, the Bishop escaped to the English court, and his new subjects admired the riches and liberality of their deliverer. But in a short time the reign of a stranger became odious and contemptible to the haughty Franks: they discovered that his treasures were exhausted; he perceived that their faith was wavering; and Azo fondly imagined that all discontents would be appeased, and that all parties would be reconciled by his own departure. In the vain hope that the Cenomani would be attached to the daughter and the heir of their ancient princes, he left Garsenda and her infant Hugo under the care of a powerful baron, the guardian of his son, and the husband, as it were, of his wife. But this suspicious or scandalous connection provoked the indignation of the people; the young prince was dismissed to Italy; Garsenda disappears; and the county of Maine was torn by domestic feuds, till the presence of the conqueror united his rebels in the calm of servitude. Azo still retained a bitter remembrance of his loss and disgrace; disgrace; and his enemy the Bishop, on a pilgrimage to Rome, was arrested by the revenge, and released by the piety, of the Ligurian Marquis. The death of King William, and the discord of his sons, revived the spirit of the Cenomani, and their deputies invited the sons of Azo to resume the peaceful possession of their lawful inheritance. Hugo again passed the Alps; but the first acclamations again degenerated into the murmurs of the people, and the anathemas of the clergy. The new Count was destitute of every resource that could reward the service, engage the esteem, or enforce the obedience, of his turbulent vassals. The honour of his alliance with the daughter of Robert Guiscard had been soon obliterated by the shame and scandal of a divorce; his countrymen exposed him, with pleasure, to the toils and dangers of a transalpine reign; and the warlike natives of Gaul despised the effeminate manners of an Italian lord. His fears were increased, and his flight was hastened, by the artful eloquence of a rival, who insinuated that his mild and moderate temper was ill-formed to struggle with the furious passions of the Barbarians. The son of Garsenda trembled at the approach or the sound of an hundred thousand Normans, sold his patrimony for a sum of ten thousand pounds, and escaped to Italy, where he soon lost a battle and an army, in the service of the Countess Matilda. A writer of the times, who has preserved the memory of this ignominious event, contrasts the treason or cowardice of the man with the nobility of his race. I must must retract the assertion, that all the Princes of Este have been worthy of their name and ancestry; Hugo is an exception; but in the space of seven hundred years Hugo is a single exception.

After the decease of his father Azo, the star of the House of Este appears "shorne of its beams;" their riches and power are visibly diminished, and the Marquisses of that name no longer stand foremost in the revolutions of Italy. In the annals of the twelfth century their actions are seldom recorded: and as this oblivion coincides with the increasing light of history, we must seek the probable causes in the division of their property, and the ascendant of the municipal republics. 1. After the acquisition of the Duchy, or rather kingdom of Bavaria, Guelph, the son of Azo, might have generously waved the right of primogeniture, and resigned to his younger brothers the Italian estates of the family, as an equivalent for the loss of their Gallic inheritance. But such generosity is seldom found in the selfish conduct of princes or brothers; and instead of offering, or accepting, an equal and equitable partition, he claimed as his own the entire property of their common parent. If Guelph were an hypocrite, he might colour his avarice by a pious attachment to the relics of his fathers: and a demand so repugnant to the maxims of natural justice, seems, however, to have been supported by the matrimonial contract of his mother Cunegonda, which had left no provision for the children of a second marriage. In that lawless age, a civil process was decided by the sword.

Hugo

Hugo and Fulk had the advantage of actual possession and personal influence, and the latter of these princes was the heir, the sole heir, of the courage of their ancestors: they armed their vassals, occupied the passes of the Alps, and opposed the descent of the Duke of Bavaria, though he was assisted by the allied powers of the Duke of Carinthia and the Patriarch of Aquileia. The sons of Garsenda yielded at length to the weight of numbers; but their resistance procured more favourable conditions. They preserved a rich domain, from the banks of the Mincius to the Adriatic sea; they resigned the ample estates of Lombardy and Tuscany to their elder kinsmen, the German Guelphs, and their supreme dominion was acknowledged by the Marquisses of Este, till the yoke was lightened and removed by time and distance, and the rapid downfall of Henry the Lion. The law of the Lombards, which was still professed in the Italian branch, disclaimed all right of primogeniture, and the portion of Hugo and Fulk was again divided into equal lots among their eight sons. In the beginning of the thirteenth century, these collateral lines were indeed united in the person of Azo VI., the great grandson of Fulk; but he was far from uniting the whole inheritance of his ancestors. Many feudal possessions had devolved on the failure of heirs male to the superior lord: many allodial estates had been conveyed, by marriage, into strange families. Much wealth had been consumed, much land had been alienated, to supply the expense of luxury and war: and and of all that had been consecrated to pious uses, not an atom could revert to the temporal successor. 2. As I am not writing the history of Italy, I shall not here attempt to delineate the rise and progress of the republics, which revived in that country the spirit of popular freedom and commercial industry. Their revolt against the Cæsars of Germany was embraced as a national cause: in the successful war against Frederic Barbarossa, their independence was maintained by the authority of the church, and the arms of the nobles; and among the nobles, the Marquisses of Este were still conspicuous in their decay. Obizo the youngest, but the last survivor of the five sons of Fulk, appeared at the congress of Venice with a retinue of an hundred and eighty A.D. 1177. followers: he had been engaged in the league of Lombardy; and such was his patriotic guilt, that when the emperor had yielded every thing in the peace of Constance, the pardon of the Marquis Obizo was one of the last acts of his clemency. A.D. 1183. As we may not suspect these feudal lords of any tender regard for the liberties of mankind, it may be fairly supposed that they acted from the passion or the interest of the moment, without discerning that they themselves would be trampled under the feet of the plebeian conquerors. Their pride was insulted, and their poverty was exposed, by the private and public luxury of trade: their subjects of the open country were encouraged to rebel, or tempted to desert; and as soon as the prejudice of rank had been dissolved, the scale of power was rudely weighed down by the last and most numerous rous class of society. Even the inhabitants of Este, his peculiar patrimony, presumed to dispute the jurisdiction of the marquis: and at the distance of fifteen miles, they found an example and a support in the populous city of Padua, which was able to levy an army, and to support a loss of eleven thousand of her sons. The institution of the university must have contributed to the wealth, and perhaps the improvement, of Padua: from the provinces of Italy, from the kingdoms of France, Spain, and England, many thousand students were annually attracted by the reputation of the various professors; and more than five hundred houses were requisite for the accommodation of the strangers. The lessons of the schools might serve only to perpetuate the reign of prejudice, but the inhabitants were enriched and enlightened by a familiar intercourse with the nations of Europe. In this city, the haughty ancestors of Obizo I. had erected their tribunal, as the lieutenants of the emperor: but Obizo himself was honoured by the choice of a free people, who elected him their podesta, or supreme magistrate. In the time of his great-grandson Aldobrandino, a dispute had arisen between the city of Padua and the Marquis of Este. The Paduans raised an army, summoned their allies of Vicenza, invaded his territory, besieged the castle of Este, battered the walls, and even the palace, with their military engines, and imposed the terms of a hard and humiliating capitulation. The marquis was reduced to adopt the name and obligations of a simple burgher, to swear that he would faithfully fully obey the laws and ordinances of the commons, and to reside some months or weeks of every year within the walls of a democracy, in which the lowest magistrate was his superior, and the poorest fellow-citizen his equal. The shame of this temporary submission could only be alleviated by the example of his equals: the Patriarch of Aquileia, with two suffragan bishops, had solicited the honour of being admitted among the citizens of Padua; and the Count of the Sacred Palace, the immediate representative of Imperial majesty, was detained as a captive and a subject, within the walls of Pavia. The popular states of Lombardy triumphed in the fall of the aristocracy; and the Marquis of Montferrat was the only noble who had strength and courage to maintain his hereditary independence.

Liberty had raised the minds of the Italians; but faction, her ugly and inseparable sister, corrupted the peace and prosperity of the growing republics. They fought against the Emperor, against their neighbours, against themselves: the necessity of order and discipline compelled them to name a foreign dictator; and the nobles, most eminent in arms, in policy, in power, often became the captains, and sometimes the tyrants, of the independent cities. The Marquisses of Este, and the Eccelins of Romano, were the two leading families of the Trevisane or Veronese March: the memory of their ancestors, and the habits of command, inspired that lofty and martial demeanour which struck the plebeian with involuntary awe; and they they were sure to gain the hearts of the multitude, when they softened their pride into artful and popular condescension. The first Eccelin was a gallant knight and a dexterous politician: in Palestine and Lombardy he was elected standard-bearer or general of the confederate armies; and in the great rebellion against Frederic I. he deserved the confidence of the cities, without forfeiting the esteem of the Emperor. The civil and military virtues of his son, Eccelin the Second, were adorned with the gifts of Eloquence: he was the public and private adversary of the House of Este; and as soon as the Marquis Azo VI. had declared himself chief of the Guelphs, the Ghibelline faction acknowledged the Count of Romano for their leader. When the Emperor Otho IV. descended into Italy, his court was attended by the rival chiefs; and their interview describes the manners of the time. Eccelin complained, that in a neutral city, in a moment of truce or friendship, his life had been treacherously attacked. "I was walking," said he, "with the Marquis of Este, on the place of St. Mark in Venice. On a sudden I was assaulted by the swords and daggers of his followers: my friends were slain or made prisoners in my sight; and it was with extreme difficulty that I could disengage my right arm from the strong grasp of my perfidious companion." The Marquis explained or denied the fact; but in these hostile altercations, Azo twice declined a challenge of single combat. He could not draw his sword against Eccelin, without violating the majesty of

of the Imperial presence; and among his vassals he had many more noble than Salinguerra. His reasons might be good; his courage was unquestionable; but—Azo twice declined a challenge of single combat. The next day, as the two leaders were riding on either side of the Emperor, he commanded them to salute each other. "Sir Eccelin, salute the Marquis; Sir Marquis, salute Eccelin;" and the command was given in the French tongue, which even in that age appears to have been the fashionable dialect. They obeyed: but the superior dignity of the Marquis was maintained, by his receiving and returning the compliment without vailing his bonnet to the humble salute of Eccelin. They soon joined in familiar converse; and before they had rode two miles, the suspicious Emperor, who had been alarmed by their discord, began to be apprehensive of their union. His apprehensions were groundless; and their deadly feuds, in council, in the field, in the cities, continued to rage, with alternate success, till they both slept in the tranquillity of the grave. Their possessions and their quarrels were inherited by their sons, Azo VII. and Eccelin the Third; but in a contest of forty years the Marquis of Este was long oppressed by the genius and fortune of his rival. The excommunication of Frederic II. exasperated and justified the hostilities of the two factions. From a sermon, a bull, or a crusade, the chief of the Guelphs, the friend of the Pope, might derive some occasional aid: but the leader of the Ghibellines was more strongly supported by the power, and often by the presence, of a warlike Prince, who filled the Trevisane March with his armies of Germans and Saracens. By the authority of the Emperor, his own arts, and the assistance of foreign troops, Eccelin became the captain and tyrant of the cities of Verona, Vicenza, Padua, Trevigi, Feltri, Belluno, Trent, and Brescia: after the loss of his patron, he maintained ten years his independent reign, and proudly boasted, that since Charlemagne, no prince had possessed such absolute sway over the Lombard states. The utmost efforts of his malice and revenge were directed against the Marquis of Este. "Strike the head of the serpent, and you are master of the body," was his frequent exhortation; from a hill near Padua, he pointed to the towers of Este, and shewed the Emperor the hostile territories which were spread over the plain. Destitute of strength and succour, Azo was compelled to solicit pardon, to swear fidelity, and to purchase a precarious respite, by the captivity, perhaps the death of Rinaldo, his only son, who was delivered as an hostage, into the hands of Frederic the Second. The town and castle of Este were at length besieged by the forces of Eccelin: his artillery consisted of fourteen great battering engines, which cast stones of twelve hundred pounds weight; and his pioneers, who were drawn from the silver mines of Carinthia, opened a subterraneous passage for the entrance of five hundred soldiers. The garrison capitulated; and instead of a total ruin, the fortifications were repaired by Eccelin, who affected to reverence the dignity of the place. He had been praised as an hero; he was gradually, and at length generally, abhorred as a tyrant. The seeming virtues of his youth were stained by the jealous and unrelenting cruelty of his old age: and whatsoever deductions may be allowed on a list of fifty thousand victims, his name will be for ever recorded with the savage monsters of Sicily and Rome. The hatred of mankind began to prevail over their fears; and after a long persecution, and a firm resistance, Azo found the moment of victory and revenge. His odious rival had been invited by one of the factions of Milan: the conspiracy was discovered, the enterprize failed: but on his return to Brescia, in the passage of the Adda, at the well-known bridge of Cassano, he was intercepted by the troops of Mantua, Cremona, and Ferrara, under the banner of the Marquis of Este. After a short combat, the valiant Eccelin (he deserves that praise) was wounded in the foot, and taken prisoner: the few remaining days of his life were embittered by the insults of the multitude, and the more insulting pity of the conqueror. Azo VII. was hailed as the saviour of Lombardy: but he derived more glory than advantage from the tyrant's fall. The cause of the Ghibellines revived under new leaders: the cities of the Trevisane March were usurped by the new families of Scala and Carrara; and instead of asserting their ancient right to the government of Milan, the rising ambition of the Visconti was promoted by the arms and alliance of the marquisses of Este.

reve-

It was in the state of Ferrara that they first established a princely dominion, on the basis, and finally on the ruins, of a popular government. The flat country, which is intersected by the branches of the Po, had formerly been a wild morass, impervious to the Roman highways. About the middle of the seventh century, twelve solitary villages coalesced into a fortified town, on the banks of the river: the safe and convenient situation attracted a crowd of settlers; their labours were rewarded by the conversion of the fens into rich and productive land; and the rising colony was distinguished by the seat of a bishop, and the privileges of a city. After the death of the Countess Matilda, Ferrara tasted the blessings and the mischiefs of liberty: the patricians and the plebeians, the Guelphs and the Ghibellines, disputed, in arms, the command of the republic: thirty-two towers of defence were erected within the walls; and in forty years the factions were ten times alternately expelled. Among the thirty-four noble families of Ferrara, the pre-eminence of wealth and power was claimed by the rival houses of the Adelardi and Taurelli. About the year one thousand one hundred and eighty, the former were reduced to an infant daughter: the proposal of a conciliatory marriage was rejected by their adherents: the heiress was delivered into the hands of Obizo I.: and his grandson Azo VI. was elected as the future husband of the maid; and the future chief of the name and party of the Adelardi. Marchesella died at the age of eight years, before nature would allow allow her to produce a child, or the law would permit her to subscribe a will: but the whole inheritance of her fathers was yielded to the Marquis of Este, and his gratitude, or ambition, distributed the fiefs among his friends and followers. By this step, he acquired a commanding influence at Ferrara: Azo VI. was declared perpetual lord and governor of the republic; and the act, which is still extant, betrays the madness of party, by the grant of absolute and unconditional power. From this power, his son was degraded to the humiliating permission of an annual visit; a popular and prosperous state was again established by the Ghibellines, and it was not till after thirty-two years of revolutions that the sovereignty of the House of Este was fixed by the valour and conduct of the seventh Azo. At the head of the confederated forces of the Pope, of Venice, and of Bologna, he marched against Ferrara: but a humane conqueror might lament that the revolution was effected by the calamities of a siege, and condemned by the retreat of fifteen hundred citizens. These evils were indeed compensated by the wisdom and justice of twenty-four years: his funeral was honoured by the tears of the opposite faction; and at the age of seventeen, his grandson, Obizo II. succeeded to the office, or rather the inheritance, of his father. The reputation of Obizo II. engaged the turbulent republics of Modena and Reggio to accept him for their prince; and at the time of his decease, three populous cities, with their ample territories, were subject to the sway of the marquisses of Este. Modena and Reggio were indeed lost by the imprudence of his son, the levity of the people, and the arts of the Ghibellines; and the separation lasted thirty years in the one, and an hundred in the other, before the rebellious children were reconciled to their parent. But the submission of Ferrara was pure and permanent, and the lapse of time insensibly erased the forms and maxims of the old republic. After the death of Azo VIII., whose last will preferred a bastard

A. D. 1208.

A. D. 1240.

A. D. 1264.

A. D. 1308. to a brother, Ferrara was oppressed by the avarice of the Venetians, the ambition of the pope, and the Catalan mercenaries of the king of Naples: but the spirit of patriotism and loyalty still lived in the hearts of the citizens, and they soon rose to the deliverance and defence of their country under the banner of the white eagle. This constant affection is at once the praise of the subject and sovereign. This praise is the more precious, as it must almost be confined to the subjects of the marquisses of Este. They were ranked among the princes of Italy at a time when the families which afterwards emerged to greatness were confounded with the meanest of the people. They were the first who after the twelfth century acquired by popular election the dominion of a free city. And they still subsist with splendour and dignity, while the tyrants more conspicuous in their day have left only a name, and for the most part an odious name, to the annals of their country.

The states of Ferrara, Modena, and Reggio were fairly won and recovered by the labour and fortune of of the Marquisses of Este. But the liberality of the popes and emperors was an easy and profitable virtue: they granted the right to those who had the actual possession, bestowed the title where the substance was lost, and confirmed their pretensions by resigning to others what they were unable to obtain or to hold for their own use. The court of Rome was informed of the merit and reputation of Azo VI.; and he accepted from the two sovereigns of Christendom, from pope Innocent III. and the emperor Otho IV. a double investiture of the marquisate of Ancona, which extended over twelve dioceses and counties between the Adriatic and the Apennine. But this splendid gift was no more than the right without the power of subduing a warlike people, in strong opposition to the church and the empire. This enterprize, which might seem above the strength of Azo, was vigorously prosecuted by his eldest son the Marquis Aldobrandino, who raised the supplies of the war by pawning his younger brother to the usurers of Florence. The war was suspended by his untimely death; the conquest was never achieved; the pledge was never redeemed, and in the third generation the vain title of Marquis of Ancona was silently dismissed. The fens of Ferrara might have been included within the limits of the exarchate, the successors of St. Peter might allege the donations of Constantine, of Pepin, of Charlemagne, and of the Countess Matilda: but in the first century after their election, the Marquisses of Este acknowledged no superior, save God and the people.

It was in a moment of distress and exile, that they accepted from Clement V. the title of Vicars of the Church: that they submitted to hold the feudatory possession of Ferrara by an annual payment of ten thousand gold florins. They regained their sovereignty without the aid, and against the efforts, of the court of Rome: the treaty was however ratified, and if the tribute suffered some occasional abatement, they could never break the chain of feudal dependence, which was at length fatal to the house of Este. After the recovery of Modena and Reggio, they obtained on more easy terms the title of vicars of the empire: and the natives of Italy, like those of India, continued to reverence the seal and subscription of their impotent king. Before the end of the fourteenth century, the German emperors, who had been accustomed to the traffic of avarice and vanity, were tempted to revive in Italy the long-forgotten
A. D. 1395. title of duke: and at the price of an hundred thousand gold florins the Visconti of Milan were exalted above the heads of their equals. Twenty-two years afterwards, the exclusive dignity of the Dukes of Milan was somewhat impaired by the
A. D. 1417. similar honours of the Dukes of Savoy. The third candidate was Borso Marquis of Este, the twelfth in lineal descent from the old Marquis Albert-Azo the Second: his reign was wise and fortunate, and the proverb which he left behind him, "This is not the time of Duke Borso," is far more glorious than all the trappings of mortal pride. In the year one thousand four hundred and fifty-two, by the Empe-

Emperor Frederic the Third, he was created Duke of Modena and Reggio. Eighteen years afterwards the ambitious imitation of Pope Paul the Second conferred on Borso the superior title of Duke of Ferrara; and the crowns, the mantles, and the sceptres used in these pompous investitures, were second only to the majesty of kings. In the sixteenth century, a Duke was imposed on the republic of Florence by the arms and authority of Charles V.; and the genius of the great Cosmo soon gave him a rank in the political system of Europe. A dispute for precedency arose between the Dukes of Ferrara and Florence; and if the Este could boast the nobility of their race, and the priority of their creation, the Medici might plead the wealth, the extent, and perhaps the independence, of the state over which they reigned. The courts of Rome and Vienna long balanced their respective claims without risking a final sentence; and the dispute could be appeased only by the invention of the new title and prerogatives of Grand Duke of Tuscany. In this frivolous contest the A. D. 1569. powers of France and Spain were interested, and had it been decided by arms, such a war would have added a chapter to the annals of human vanity.

While the honours of the House of Este were multiplied by popes and emperors, a republic insulted and almost oppressed the Dukes of Ferrara. Had Venice been prudent, Venice would have been content with the riches of commerce and the command of the sea. But this maritime empire served only only to stimulate the ambition of an Italian conquest: discipline and wealth obtained an easy victory over weakness and discord; and in the fifteenth century the provinces of Terra Firma were added to the dominion of St. Mark. Nicholas the Third, Marquis of Este, and Lord of Ferrara, made a feeble effort to assist the Carrara princes, and to

A. D. 1405. save the important barrier of Padua. The Venetians instantly filled the Po with armed vessels; his territories were ravaged; his capital was starved, till he left his allies to their fate; implored the mercy of the senate, and resigned himself to such conditions as resentment and avarice could impose. After a servitude of fourscore years, his son Hercules I. was accused of a generous, or criminal revolt: the superior forces of Venice encompassed Ferrara by sea and land, and if a league of the Italian powers protected him from total ruin, the duke was bound by the new treaty in a closer and more
A. D. 1482 —1484. weighty chain. 1. A superior title, and more ample sway, might compensate for the loss of property and command in the neighbourhood of Padua. But Este was still dear and sacred to the princes of that name: the transient recovery of the castle, the town, and the fief, had delighted
A. D. 1389. their hereditary pride, and it was not without regret that they beheld that ancient possession, the source of their title, for ever melted into the Venetian state. The Polesine, or island of Rovigo, which had once been mortgaged for sixty thousand ducats to the Venetians, was irrevocably ceded by Hercules I.; and not a vestige remained of the patri-patrimonial estates to the north of the Po, which had been acquired five hundred years before by the marriage of Albert-Azo I. 2. The goods and persons of the Venetians who descended the Po, were exempt from all tolls and duties whatsoever: every stranger was shielded under that respectable name; and even the peasants of the borders began to claim the immunities of St. Mark. The same grievance which impaired the revenue, attacked the sovereignty of the Duke of Ferrara, since he was forbidden to raise any forts or barriers, which might obstruct a free passage through his territories either by land or water. 3. With the avarice of a trading power, Venice aspired to a monopoly of salt in the Adriatic gulf. The duke was rigorously deprived of the use and profits of his salt-works of Commachio; and his subjects were compelled to purchase in a foreign market one of the necessaries of life, which nature had so profusely scattered on their own shores. 4. A citizen of Venice resided at Ferrara with the title of Vicedominus; he was the proper judge of his countrymen; but the arrogance of his behaviour insulted the prince, his daily usurpations interrupted the course of justice, and his last act was the imprisonment of a native and a priest. Peace was oppressive; but war might have been fatal to the House of Este. The three last sovereigns of Padua, a father and his two sons, had been strangled in the prisons of Venice; the remains of the Carrara and Scala families were proscribed; and the deliberate cruelty of the senate was justified by the examples of ancient Rome.

Twenty-

Twenty-five years after the last treaty of Hercules I. his son and successor Alphonso I. embraced the fairest hope of liberty and revenge. In the league of Cambray, the four great potentates of Europe united their arms against a single republic; the Pope, Julius II.; the Emperor, Maximilian of Austria; Lewis XII. King of France and Duke of Milan; and Ferdinand, King of Arragon and Naples. Each of the allies had suffered some injuries, had lost some territories, and they all considered the prosperity of Venice with the same sentiments of indignation and envy which are excited in the breast of a noble by the luxury and insolence of a wealthy merchant. While Maximilian delayed, while Ferdinand dissembled, while the Pope pronounced his excommunications, the King of France, at the head of his invincible cavalry, had passed the Alps, and on the banks of the Adda, the mercenary bands of St. Mark were trampled under their horses' feet. The firmness of Rome after a great defeat was not imitated by the senators of Venice: they despaired of the republic, evacuated in a day the conquests of an age, and abandoned to the confederates the division of the spoil. Under the wing of these confederates, Alphonso, Duke of Ferrara, had acceded to the league of Cambray, and accepted the office, or rather the title, of Standard-bearer or General of the Church. The first act of hostility was to vindicate his independence: the county of Rovigo yielded to his attack; and he received from the Emperor the investiture of Este. In this public shipwreck Venice was saved by by the zeal of her nobles, and the fidelity of her subjects: the nobles sacrificed their lives, or at least their fortunes, in their own cause; the subjects, without speculating on the theory of government, had long enjoyed, and now regretted the wisdom and justice of a parental aristocracy. The metropolis was impregnable and rich; the transmarine provinces were untouched; the navy was entire; new armies were purchased; the allies began to feel suspicion, and to affect pity; and the deliverance of Padua announced the rising fortunes of the republic. While the Venetians strove to resist or disarm their more formidable enemies, the rebel Alphonso (such was the style of the senate) was marked as the object of vengeance, to which his station exposed him on every side. Against the advice of their wisest counsellors, their admiral Angelo Trevisano, with eighteen gallies, and a train of brigantines, entered the mouth of the Po, spread desolation on either bank, and prepared with forts and bridges the passage of the army and the siege of Ferrara. But the army was called away by a seasonable diversion; and the fleet was destroyed by the valour and conduct of the Duke himself, and his brother the Cardinal Hippolito. Under the shelter of the dikes they had planted their long batteries, which supported an incessant fire; and the affrighted Venetians were suddenly oppressed by the armed vessels which issued from the city. The admiral ignominiously fled with the great standard of St. Mark; two gallies escaped, three were burnt or sunk, and the the remaining thirteen followed the triumph of the conqueror, who immediately assaulted and demolished all the works of the siege. His victory might be ascribed to his superior artillery, and that superiority was the effect of his own skill and industry. Three hundred cannons were cast in his foundery, and deposited in his arsenal; he liberally entertained the best engineers; and the well-adapted fortifications of stone, of earth, and of water, had rendered Ferrara one of the strongest places in Italy. The French, who served with their ally, celebrate the politeness, the knowledge, the magnificence of the Duke: and Alphonso expended above three hundred thousand ducats to reward the service, and to secure the friendship, of the Gallic chiefs.

But their friendship soon became dangerous to the House of Este, when the same confederates who had joined with France for the destruction of Venice, conspired with Venice for the expulsion
A.D.1510. of the French. The new league was formed and sanctified by Julius II., who secretly aspired to deliver Italy from the barbarians; and the fidelity of the Duke of Ferrara to his first engagements exasperated the fiercest and most ambitious of the successors of St. Peter. Alphonso was degraded from the rank of a vassal and a Christian: his rich forfeiture was devoured by the avarice perhaps of a papal nephew, and his sentence of condemnation was extended to both worlds. Against him the temporal and spiritual arms of Rome were equally the depth of a severe winter the presence of Julius animated the troops, and the aged father of the Christians pressed the siege of Mirandola with the vigour of a youthful soldier. Ferrara however was saved by its own strength and the Gallic succours: the army of Lewis XII. invaded the ecclesiastical state under the command of his nephew, the valiant Gaston of Foix: in the battle of Ravenna the fury of the French cavalry was encountered by the firmness of the Spanish infantry, and the success of the day might be attributed in some degree to the Duke of Ferrara, who led the vanguard, and directed the infantry. But after the loss of Gaston, the strange retreat of the victorious army, and the rapid evacuation of Italy, the solitary and humble client of France remained without defence under the hand of a merciless oppressor. While he waited as a suppliant in the Vatican, his city of Reggio was surprised and stolen; he was insulted by the proposal of yielding Ferrara for a poor and precarious exchange; and even the validity of his safe-conduct was questioned by a perfidious court. The liberty, and perhaps the life of Alphonso were rescued by the grateful friendship of the Colonna: they forced the Lateran Gate, lodged him in the castle of Marino, and watched over his escape in the various disguises of a huntsman, a servant, and a friar. A single event could suspend his ruin; and by that event was his ruin suspended. Julius II. expired: his passions were buried in his tomb; but his policy with a milder aspect still reigned in the councils of his successors. Leo X. was too generous generous to be just; and the ambition of his family was concealed by the sacred veil of the honour and interest of the church. After the victory of A.D.1515. Marignan, Francis I. might have discharged his obligations by an act of equity and power: but instead of commanding he negociated with the court of Rome. The restitution of Modena and Reggio to his long-suffering ally, was often promised, and as often eluded: the failure of a secret conspiracy provoked the Roman pontiff to thunder a new sentence of excommunication and forfeiture; and one of the medals of Alphonso attests his miraculous deliverance from the lion's paw. Adrian VI. had a conscience, a faculty long dormant in the vicars of Christ: but his scruples were removed by the Italian casuists: and he found it more easy to absolve the sins than to restore the states of the House of Este. Clement VII. an illegitimate son, adopted the politics of the Medici; and had his arts been successful, Machiavel, who was still alive, might have been proud of his disciple. After a tedious and treacherous delay, the sword of Alphonso vindicated his own rights; and his prudence seized the fortunate moments of the conclave and the captivity of Clement VII. The gates of Modena and Reggio were joyfully opened to their native prince: and on a payment to the Pope of an hundred thousand ducats, his possession was confirmed by the sentence of the Emperor Charles V. whose interest prompted him to establish the peace of Italy. During these revolutions the Duke of Ferrara concluded a truce, and finally a treaty, with with the Venetians: his patrimonial estates of Este and Rovigo were for ever lost: but he no longer felt or feared the tyranny of a republic which had been trained to moderation in the school of adversity.
A.D.1511. directed: his city of Modena was occupied: in the

A.D.1512.

A.D.1513.

Among the noble marriages of the Este, two princes, Azo VIII. and Hercules I. had been allied to the crown of Naples in the rival houses of Anjou and Arragon. But these lofty connexions had not been productive of any solid benefit, and the Venetians signified their displeasure that the Duke of Ferrara had preferred the daughter of a king, instead of choosing a senator for his father and patron. In the next generation, the House of Este was sullied by a sanguinary and incestuous race; by the nuptials of Alphonso I. with Lucretia, a bastard of Alexander VI. the Tiberius of Christian Rome. This modern Lucretia might have assumed with more propriety the name of Messalina; since the woman who can be guilty, who can even be accused, of a criminal commerce with a father and two brothers, must be abandoned to all the licentiousness of venal love. Her vices were highly coloured by a contempt for decency: at a banquet in the apostolical palace, by the side of the Pope, she beheld without a blush the naked dances and lascivious postures of fifty prostitutes: she distributed the prizes to the champions of Venus, according to the number of victories which they achieved in her presence. Hercules I. was unwilling to accept such a consort for his eldest son, but he was apprehensive of the bulls and daggers of the Borgia family: he was tempted by the sum of one hundred and twenty thousand ducats, the city and district of Cento, and the reduction of his annual tribute to a slight quit-rent of an hundred florins. The marriage articles were signed; and as the bed of Lucretia was not then vacant, her third husband, a royal bastard of Naples, was first stabbed, and afterwards strangled in the Vatican. Perhaps the youth of Lucretia had been seduced by example; perhaps she had been satiated with pleasure; perhaps she was awed by the authority of her new parent and husband: but the Duchess of Ferrara lived seventeen years without reproach, and Alphonso I. believed himself to be the father of three sons. The eldest, his successor, Hercules II. expiated this maternal stain by a nobler choice; and his fidelity was rewarded by mingling the blood of Este with that of France. By his second marriage with Anne Duchess of Britanny, Lewis XII. left only two daughters: Claude, the eldest, became the wife of his successor Francis I. and Renée her younger sister, who had once been promised to Charles V. was bestowed on Hercules II. hereditary prince, and after his father's decease, Duke of Ferrara. Her portion of two hundred and fifty thousand crowns was paid in a territorial equivalent, the dukedoms of Chartres and Montargis: but Renée was perhaps the true heiress of Britanny, since the agreement which secured the perpetual independence of the duchy might be applied with as much reason to a second daughter as

as to a second son. The French princess, whose mind was more beautiful than her person, continued above thirty years to adorn the court of Ferrara: her liberal understanding was improved by the learning of the age; nor was it her fault if in the learning of the age she discovered and studied the vain science of astrology. During a long exile she cherished a tender remembrance of her native country: every Frenchman, according to his degree, who visited Ferrara, either praised her munificence, or blessed her charity: and the relics of a Neapolitan expedition, ten thousand naked and hungry fugitives, were relieved by the profuse alms of the Duchess. When her treasurer represented the enormous expense, "they are my countrymen," Renée generously replied, "and had God given me a beard, they would be now my subjects." But these virtues were the splendid sins of a heretic. From her cradle and in her marriage, the daughter of Lewis XII. the daughter-in-law of Alphonso I. had learned to hate the tyranny of the Pope: her firm and curious understanding was not afraid of religious inquiries; and she listened to the new teachers, who professed to revive the old truths of the gospel. Clement, Marot, and John Calvin were hospitably entertained at Ferrara; in the conversion of the Duchess, the eloquence of the preacher was seconded by the wit of the poet; and the apostle of Geneva was proud to spread his conquests on the verge of the realm of Antichrist. But this spark, which might have kindled a flame in Italy, was quickly A. D. 1535.

extinguished by the diligence of the inquisitors, and Hercules II. was apprehensive of the temporal, as well as the spiritual punishment of the guilt of heresy. Calvin and Marot fled beyond the mountains: Renée heard with sullen constancy the sermons of the popish doctors; but after suffering the dismission of her French servants, and the hardships of a prison, she submitted with a sigh to wear the mask of dissimulation. A more open profession of Calvinism after her husband's death, determined and hastened her departure from Ferrara: and the last fifteen years of Renée of France were spent in her native country. In the bloody scenes of persecution and war, the Duchess maintained her dignity and protected her brethren. Her castle of Montargis, near Paris, was a sure asylum for the Huguenots; and when it was threatened with a siege, she boldly replied, "the Catholics may assault my residence, they will find me standing in the breach, and prepared to try whether they will fire on the daughter of a king of France." She was the daughter of a king; but the wife of her son Alphonso II. was the daughter and sister of two emperors, of Ferdinand I. and Maximilian II. of the House of Austria.

The five Dukes of Ferrara, Borso, Hercules I. Alphonso I. Hercules II. and Alphonso II. seem to have been magnified in the eyes of Europe, far beyond the measure of their wealth and power. Their merit was superior to their fortune; they supported with firmness the calamities of war; they improved and enjoyed the prosperity of peace.

Near

Near a century before the end of their reign, Alexander VI. in his bull of investiture, applauds the useful labours of Hercules I. which had increased the numbers and happiness of his people, which had adorned the city of Ferrara with strong fortifications and stately edifices, and which had reclaimed a large extent of unprofitable waste. The vague and spreading branches of the Po were confined in their proper channels by moles and dikes; the intermediate lands were converted to pasture and tillage; the fertile district became the granary of Venice; and the corn exports of a single year were exchanged for the value of two hundred thousand ducats. The triangular island or delta of Mesola, at the mouth of the Po, had been recovered from the waters by Alphonso II. who surrounded it with a wall nine miles in circumference: a palace, with its dependencies of stables and gardens, arose in this new creation, and it was reserved by the founder for his favourite amusements of hunting and fishing. Ferrara became one of the most flourishing of the Italian cities: the walls and buildings have survived the loss of the inhabitants, which are now reduced from fourscore thousand to a tenth part: the works of superstition were enriched by each generation: the arsenal, in a long peace, was succeeded by theatres and palaces, and if the hand of the princely architect be most conspicuous, many vacant houses are the monuments of private opulence and taste. Modena and Reggio, more favourably treated by nature, were not abandoned by the House of Este: the course of the Po opened much inland, and some foreign trade; and a colony of Flemish exiles attempted to revive the declining arts of the loom. I am not instructed to define the revenue of the Dukes of Ferrara: but it is the praise of Alphonso I. that he left a treasure, without increasing his taxes; it is the reproach of Alphonso II. that, with an increase of taxes, he left behind him a considerable debt. The court of these princes was at all times polite and splendid: on extraordinary occasions, a birth, a marriage, a journey, a festival, the passage of an illustrious stranger, they strove to surpass their equals, and to equal their superiors; and the vanity of the people was gratified at their own expense. Seven hundred horses were ranged in Borso's stables; and in the sport of hawking, the Duke was attended to the field by a hundred falconers. In his Roman expedition, to receive the ducal investiture, his train of five hundred gentlemen, his chamberlains and pages, one hundred menial servants, and one hundred and fifty mules, were clothed, according to their degree, in brocade, velvet, or fine cloth: the bells of the mules were of silver, and the dresses, liveries, and trappings, were covered with gold and silver embroidery. The martial train of Alphonso II. in his campaign in Hungary, consisted of three hundred gentlemen, each of whom was followed by an esquire and two arquebusiers on horseback; and the arms and apparel of this gallant troop were such as might provoke the envy of the Germans, and the avarice of

of the Turks. Did I possess a book, printed under the title of the Chivalries of Ferrara, I should not pretend to describe the nuptials of the same Duke with the Emperor's sister: the balls, the feasts, and tournaments of many busy days; and the final representation of the Temple of Love, which was erected in the palace garden, with a stupendous scenery of porticos and palaces, of woods and mountains. That the last shew should continue six hours, without appearing tedious to the spectators, is perhaps the most incredible circumstance. In each generation of the House of Este, a younger brother, with the rank of Cardinal, held some of the richest bishoprics and abbies in Italy and France. These noble and wealthy ecclesiastics were the patrons of every art: the Villa Estense at Tivoli, near Rome, is the work of Cardinal Hippolitus, brother to Hercules II. the palace, gardens, and water-works, exhibit, in their present decay, the spirit of a prince and the taste of the age.

A philosopher, according to his temper, may laugh or weep at this ostentatious and oppressive splendour; nor will he be disarmed by the patronage and perfection of the finer arts, which flourished in Italy in the sixteenth century. But he will approve the modest encouragement of learning and genius, an expense which can never drain the treasures of a prince. An university had been founded at Padua by the House of Este, and the scholastic rust was polished away by the revival of the literature of Greece and Rome. The studies of Ferrara were directed by skilful and eloquent professors, either natives or foreigners: the ducal library was filled with a valuable collection of manuscript and printed books; and as soon as twelve new comedies of Plautus had been found in Germany, the Marquis Lionel of Este was impatient to obtain a fair and faithful copy of that ancient poet. Nor were these elegant pleasures confined to the learned world. Under the reign of Hercules I., a wooden theatre, at the moderate cost of a thousand crowns, was constructed in the largest court of the palace: the scenery represented some houses, a sea-port, and a ship, and the Menechmi of Plautus, which had been translated into Italian by the Duke himself, was acted before a numerous and polite audience. In the same language, and with the same success, the Amphytrion of Plautus, and the Eunuch of Terence, were successively exhibited; and these classic models, which formed the taste of the spectators, excited the emulation of the poets of the age. For the use of the court and theatre of Ferrara, Ariosto composed his comedies, which were often played with applause, which are still read with pleasure: and such was the enthusiasm of the new arts, that one of the sons of Alphonso I. did not disdain to speak a prologue on the stage. In the legitimate forms of dramatic composition the Italians have not excelled: but it was in the court of Ferrara that they invented and refined the pastoral comedy, a romantic arcadia, which violates the truth of manners, and the simplicity of nature, but which commands commands our indulgence, by the elaborate luxury of eloquence and wit. The Aminta of Tasso was written for the amusement, and acted in the presence, of Alphonso II.; and his sister Leonora might apply to herself the language of a passion, which disordered the reason, without clouding the genius, of her poetical lover. Of the numerous imitations, the Pastor Fido of Guarini, which alone can vie with the fame and merit of the original, is the work of the Duke's secretary of state: it was exhibited in a private house at Ferrara: but the retreat of the author from the service of his native prince, has bestowed on Turin the honour of the first public representation. The father of the Tuscan muses, the sublime, but unequal Dante, had pronounced that Ferrara was never honoured with the name of a poet: he would have been astonished to behold the chorus of bards, of melodious swans, (their own allusion,) who now peopled the banks of the Po. In the court of Duke Borso and his successor, Boïardo, Count of Scandiano, was respected as a noble, a soldier, and a scholar: his vigorous fancy first celebrated the loves and exploits of the Paladin Orlando; and his fame has at once been preserved and eclipsed by the brighter glories of the continuation of his work. Ferrara may boast, that on her classic ground, Ariosto and Tasso lived and sung; that the lines of the Orlando Furioso, and the Gerusalemme Liberata, were inscribed in everlasting characters under the eye of the first and second Alphonso. In a period of near three thousand years, five five great epic poets have arisen in the world: and it is a singular prerogative, that two of the five should be claimed as their own, by a short age, and a petty state.

A. D. 1597. October 27. But the glory of Ferrara, and perhaps the legitimate race of the Este, expired with Alphonso II. As he left neither children nor brothers, his first cousin, Don Cæsar, the son of a younger son of Alphonso I., was the next in the lineal order of descent. His claim to the succession was ratified by the will of the late Duke, who had obtained from the Emperor, though not from the Pope, the privilege of choosing an heir in his own family. And the senate of Ferrara, which still preserved a semblance of election, presented him, with apparent loyalty, the sword of justice, and the sceptre of dominion. The people submitted to a prince, who seemed to unite the various titles of birth, donation, and of the public choice; the accession of Don Cæsar was announced to the courts of Italy and Europe; and his reign might have been peaceful and prosperous, had not the ambition of Clement VIII. revived the design of restoring Ferrara to the ecclesiastical state. In the confidence of right, or at least of power, the Roman pontiff sternly rejected the ambassador and obedience of a pretended Duke, who had not expected the approbation of the Holy See. A monitory, or summons, to appear in fifteen days, was affixed on the church doors; and the Apostolical Chamber demanded the possession of the fief, till the vassal should have cleared his birth and title in the court of

of his supreme lord. It was in vain that the Duke of Ferrara solicited a delay, that he provoked an inquiry, that he negociated a compromise, that he submitted his cause to the arbitration of a neutral judge. "The honour and interest of the Church," said the inexorable pontiff, "must not be deserted. In the vindication of St. Peter's patrimony, I will sell the last chalice of the altar; I am ready to march in person against the sacrilegious rebel; and I would die in the ditch of Ferrara, with the holy sacrament in my hands." This generous resolution was applauded by the Cardinals, and they protested, that if Clement VIII. should be taken from the world, they would impose, by a common oath, the same obligation on the future pope. Some forms of judicial proceeding were hastily dispatched; and before two months had elapsed from the death of Alphonso II., a tremendous bull of forfeiture, excommunication, and interdict, was thundered against the pretended Duke and his impious adherents. At the same time, the military preparations were urged with incessant vigour, and an army of sixteen thousand horse and foot, which fame had soon magnified to twenty-five thousand, was assembled near Faenza, under the command of Cardinal Aldobrandini, the pope's nephew and legate. The state of Europe was most favourable to the ambition of Rome, and the prospects of Don Cæsar were on all sides black and comfortless. The Emperor Rodolph II. might be a well-wisher to the House of Este, but his remote and insufficient forces were occupied by the the Turks in Hungary. If the rival monarchs of France and Spain should deign to interfere in this pigmy war, the enmity of the one would not ensure the support of the other. Henry IV. had been persuaded, by a selfish agent, to prove the sincerity of his conversion, in the sacrifice of an old and faithful ally; Philip II., the demon of the south, was now anxious to leave his son and his dominions in peace; but the revolution was consummated before he could signify his intentions; and the Spanish ministers in Italy were suspected of a secret conspiracy against the Imperial fiefs of Reggio and Modena. The Italian princes balanced between fear and envy: Venice was least desirous of the neighbourhood, and least apprehensive of the resentment, of the pope: but her words were ambiguous, and her actions were slow. Don Cæsar had been left without troops or treasures: the fortifications of Ferrara were neglected in a long peace: the people was aggrieved by taxes; the clergy was seduced by the prejudice of conscience, or the hopes of preferment; the emissaries of Rome were busy and persuasive; and the ancient loyalty to the House of Este was corrupted by the promise of a golden age.

But the instant cause of his ruin was in the character of the Duke himself. Had Don Cæsar been endowed with the spirit and constancy of his ancestors, he might have been saved by the resolution to fall. Had he listened to the advice of a veteran, a bold sally on the half-formed camp of Faenza might have dissipated the pope's soldiers, who would cease to be formidable, when they ceased to be feared. The siege of Ferrara was an arduous enterprize: courage would have given him time, time would have given him friends; the Venetians would have armed for his interest and their own; many brave adventurers of France and Italy would have drawn their swords in his quarrel; and the novelty of danger, the lassitude of war, the weight of expense, the chances of mortality, would have inclined his enemies to a safe and honourable peace. Far different were the feelings of the successor of Alphonso: he had been educated remote from the council and the field, in the bosom of luxury and devotion: his mild and timid disposition was astonished by the thunder of spiritual and temporal arms; nor could he expect from others the support which he denied to himself. When he entered the cathedral, the priests interrupted their rites, and fled from the altars; his venal ministers exaggerated the danger, and concealed the resources; he was alarmed each hour by the intelligence of secret treason; and a Jesuit persuaded him that Modena and Reggio, that his life, and even his soul, could only be saved by an immediate capitulation. The terms were dictated in the camp by the imperious legate: That Don Cæsar should deliver his eldest son as an hostage, resign the ducal sceptre in the presence of the magistrate, divide his artillery with the pope, and surrender the possession of the duchy of Ferrara, with all its dependencies; and that in return for his submission, he should be absolved from from all ecclesiastical censures, and permitted to enjoy the Diamond Palace, with the personal effects and allodial estates of the House of Este. After the conclusion of the treaty, the conqueror was eager to reign, and the exile was anxious to depart. On the twenty-eighth of January, one thousand five hundred and ninety-eight, Don Cæsar evacuated a city, in which his ancestors had reigned near four hundred years. A splendid, but mournful procession, of his family and household, passed slowly through the streets: the Duke of Modena (his remaining title) was seated in an open coach; his eyes were cast down on a letter which he seemed to read, as if desirous of escaping the view of those objects which he must see no more. The minds of the people were already changed: their curiosity was melted into pity: they had neglected the defence, they deplored the loss, of their native price; and the first evening of his departure, five thousand persons were deprived of their daily bread, which they received from the charity or munificence of the ducal court. These melancholy reflections were suspended by the triumph of the legate, and the speedy visit of Clement VIII., who was impatient to behold his new conquest. But as soon as the festival of the revolution had subsided, Ferrara was left to the solitude and poverty of a provincial town, under the government of priests: a citadel was erected, to fix the inconstancy of the inhabitants; and within seventeen years after the death of Alphonso II., a fourth of his capital was already in ruins.

who

Nor

Nor were the losses of Don Cæsar confined to the sacrifice of Ferrara: the territory, salt-works, and fishery of Commachio, an Imperial fief, were seized by the hand of power: his allodial property was diminished and disputed by the chicanery of law. Even the duchy of Chartres, and the mortgages of the House of Este in France, were withheld from the heir and creditor, under pretence that he was a foreigner. It was a just observation of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, that his brother-in law Don Cæsar might have resisted his enemies, if the million and a half of gold, which his predecessors trusted to the Most Christian King, had been safely deposited in the treasury of Ferrara.

In this singular transaction, ambition and avarice were the motives of Rome. Her forms of judicial proceeding were precipitate, and violent: without evidence or trial, she judged in her own cause, she pronounced in her own favour, and she forcibly seized, for her own use, the valuable object in dispute. But as it is possible, and barely possible, that truth and justice may be supported by the means most adverse to their nature, I shall freely examine the descent of Don Cæsar, and his right of succession, without any interest to corrupt, or any prejudice to mislead, the equity of my decree. After the decease of Lucretia Borgia, his second wife, Alphonso I., who was still in the manly vigour of life, embraced a decent mode of satisfying his passions, without injuring his family. Instead of seeking a third alliance in the courts of Europe, he purchased a maiden of Ferrara, of obscure obscure parentage and exquisite beauty. Laura was entertained several years in the state of a concubine: but this illegal union might in some degree be excused by the dignity of her lover, and her own imitation of conjugal virtue. She became the mother of two sons, Don Alphonso and Don Alphonsino, a title and a name which had been lately introduced into Italy by the prevailing influence of the Spaniards. Their birth is acknowledged to have been illegitimate. In the testament of their father, which is dated fourteen months before his death, they simply are styled the children of a free man by a free woman; nor did he add, in his last illness of several weeks, any clause or codicil to declare a change of their condition. That, according to the laws of the church and state, these bastards were legitimated by a subsequent marriage, is supposed by their advocates; but the supposition cannot be justified by the regular proof of a contract, a certificate, or a witness. In default of such evidence, Muratori produces a large body of presumptions and circumstances: with an artful suggestion, that much more would have been found by a more early scrutiny: but it was the interest as well as the duty of Laura to establish her own marriage, and the legitimacy of her sons; and if her neglect be not ascribed to conscious guilt, it must not, however, militate, as an argument in her behalf. Her faithful champion, the librarian of Modena, has collected many testimonies of poets, orators, historians, and genealogists, some of whom could not mistake the truth, and others could not have have any temptation for falsehood: and from their consent he infers the belief and tradition of the times, that the concubine of Alphonso I. was finally promoted to the rank of his wife. The same favourable conclusion may be drawn from the honours which she was permitted to enjoy near forty years, under the reigns of his successors; the appellation, dress, and attendance of his relict or widow; the guardianship of her children; the princely style of Most Excellent and Illustrious; and, above all, the family name of Este, which she subscribed on all public and private occasions. The title of Duchess of Ferrara was alone wanting; and when pride and envy were no more, that title was bestowed in the solemn pomp of her funeral, which was attended by the Duke Alphonso II. his brother the Cardinal, the court, the clergy, and the arts or corporations of the city. The five sons of Alphonso I., with the sole distinction of primogeniture, were educated as equals and companions. Don Alphonso, the first born of Laura, was treated as a prince, both at home and abroad: he was invested with the Marquisate of Montecchio, and the French order of St. Michael; and his wife, the mother of Don Cæsar, was the daughter of the reigning Duke of Urbino. The same honours were transmitted to Don Cæsar himself: he obtained an alliance still more splendid, the sister of the Grand Duke of Tuscany: and, both in his life-time and at his death, Alphonso II. acknowledged him as his cousin and successor. Could we divest our minds of a secret suspicion, arising from the indulgence which, in so many courts and countries, has been lavished on the bastards of princes, such presumptions might amount to the moral, if not the legal proof of a legitimate descent. But the interest, though not the honour, of the Dukes of Modena, reposes on a firmer basis, which would not be shaken by the quality of their female ancestor. The Popes are pleased to forget that they first granted the Duchy of Ferrara to Borso, a natural son of the Marquis Nicholas III., and that the bull of Alexander VI. extends the right of succession to all the descendants whatsoever of Hercules I. They were compelled to renounce the possession of Ferrara, but they have never ceased to assert the justice of their claim. The arguments which the court of Rome has disdained, may one day be heard in the louder tone of the Austrian cannon, and a severe account may be required of the arrears and damages of two hundred years.

The abdication of Don Cæsar is related by Muratori, a loyal servant, under the name of the Tragedy of Ferrara: and in the melancholy tale I have myself been affected by the sympathy which we so generously indulge, to the real or imaginary distresses of the great. Yet, on a cooler survey, I am inclined to doubt whether the last Duke of Ferrara was the most unfortunate of men. His life and liberty were safe: he was neither beheaded on the public scaffold, nor dragged at the chariot wheels of the conqueror, nor cast into a deep and perpetual dungeon. By the soldiers and statesmen of the age he was indeed despised, for the feeble defence defence and hasty desertion of his ancient seat. But as contempt is seldom deserved where it is felt, it is seldom felt where it is deserved: Don Cæsar was unconscious of the public reproach, and the orators of his reign reserved their panegyric for the milder virtues of discretion and patience. He had lost the most precious jewel of his family: but an easy journey of two days conveyed his court from the palace of Ferrara to that of Modena, where he lived, in prosperity and peace, above thirty years: by the Tuscan Princess he became the father of six sons and three daughters; and the reigning Duke is the fourth in descent, and the sixth in succession, from the eldest of his sons. In this last period of decline, the House of Este has still preserved the external advantages of rank, riches, and power: and these advantages were illustrated by the antiquity of their name and title. At the beginning of the seventeenth century, an Emperor and six Kings were respected as the chiefs of the Christian republic: but the Dukes of Modena maintained an honourable place in the second class of the Princes of Europe. Their pride was seldom mortified by the presence of a superior: as long as the isles of Sicily and Sardinia were attached to the Spanish monarchy, Italy was not dignified with a regal title; a profane layman was not degraded by kneeling to the Pope, or yielding the precedency to his Cardinals: nor was the native preeminence of hereditary rank disputed by the ministerial honours of a doge or a viceroy. After the loss of Ferrara, the successors of Alphonso II. continued to reign over the united duchies of Modena and Reggio; and their territory, about thirty leagues in length, about ten in breadth, was afterwards enlarged by the lordship of Corregio, and the duchy of Mirandola. Their revenue is vaguely computed at one hundred thousand pounds sterling, a sum inadequate to the extraordinary demands of war, but which might support, with decent economy, the expenses of a court and government. Perhaps the latter were sometimes sacrificed to the former. When Addison traversed the principalities of Modena and Parma, he was scandalized by the magnificence of those petty courts: he was amazed to see such a profusion of wealth laid out in coaches, trappings, tables, cabinets, and the like precious toys, in which there are few princes in Europe who equal them, while, at the same time, they have not had the generosity to make bridges over the rivers of their countries, for the convenience of their subjects as well as strangers. Yet the annals of Modena describe many public works of use as well as ornament: the plenty of gold and silver is expressed in a single coinage of Francis I., of near half a million sterling: but I am ignorant whether the two hundred and thirty thousand ducats, and the two hundred thousand Spanish doubloons, which were paid to the Emperor for the investitures of Corregio and Mirandola, should be placed to the account of treasure or of debt. In the narrow sphere of their dominions, the Este princes were absolute; nor do I find any example of resistance to their reason or passion.

passion. The vanity of the human heart is flattered by the degree, rather than by the extent, of authority: and if the sovereign was conscious of his duties, the man might tremble at accepting the trust of one hundred and fifty thousand of his equals. His equals by nature, they were many of them his superiors in merit: the natives of Modena were distinguished in the arts and sciences; and like the pastoral comedy, the mock-heroic poetry of the Italians was invented by Tassoni, a subject of the House of Este. The state of such a prince would perhaps be the most desirable in human life, if it were accompanied with that domestic security which a wealthy nobleman enjoys under the protection of a great empire. The long peace of Italy, in the seventeenth century, was interrupted only by some short and bloodless hostilities: but in the three great wars between the Austrian and Bourbon powers, the Duke of Modena has been thrice reduced to the alternative of slavery or exile. His neutrality was violated, his dominions were occupied by foreign troops, his subjects were oppressed by military contributions, and the mischievous expense of fortifications only served to expose his cities to the calamities of a siege.

I have long delayed, and I should willingly suppress, three disgraceful anecdotes, three criminal actions, which sully the honour of the name of Este: of these, the first and the third are piously dissembled by the Librarian of Modena. 1. In his descent to the infernal regions, in the ninth circle of hell, the poet Dante beheld the condemnation of sanguinary and rapacious men: they were deeply immersed in a river of blood, and their escape was prevented by the arrows of the centaurs. Among the tyrants, he distinguished the ancient forms of Alexander and Dionysius: of his own countrymen, he recognized the black Eccelin, and the fair Obizo of Este, the latter of whom was dispatched by an unnatural son to this place of torment. This Obizo can be no other than the second Marquis of that name, who died only seven years before the real or imaginary date of the Divine Comedy (A. D. 1300): his life does not afford the character of a tyrant, but he was one of the pillars of the Guelph faction; and were he not associated with a Ghibelline chief, we might impute his sentence to the prejudices, rather than the justice, of the Tuscan bard. But the parricide of his son, a crime of a much deeper dye, is attested by the commentary of Benvenuto of Imola, who observes from an old chronicle, that Azo VIII. was apprehensive of the same treatment which he had inflicted on his father. It must be added, that this commentary on Dante, which was composed only fourscore years after the event, is dedicated to Nicholas II., Marquis of Este, and great-grandson of Obizo II., who tacitly subscribes to the guilt of his ancestors. 2. Under the reign

A. D. 1425. of Nicholas III., Ferrara was polluted with a domestic tragedy. By the testimony of a maid, and his own observation, the Marquis of Este discovered the incestuous loves of his wife Parisina, and Hugo his bastard son, a beautiful and valiant youth. They

They were beheaded in the castle, by the sentence of a father and husband, who published his shame, and survived their execution. He was unfortunate, if they were guilty: if they were innocent, he was still more unfortunate: nor is there any possible situation in which I can sincerely approve the last act of the justice of a parent. 3. Guicciardini, the gravest of the Italian historians, records a bloody scene which, in his own time, had sullied the court of Ferrara; the deed might revive the memory of the Theban brothers; "and the motive was still more frivolous, if love," says he, "be a more frivolous motive than ambition." The Cardinal Hippolito was enamoured of a fair maiden of his own family: but her heart was engaged by his natural brother; and she imprudently confessed to a rival, that the beauteous eyes of Don Julio were his most powerful attraction. The deliberate cruelty of the Cardinal measured the provocation and the revenge: under a pretence of hunting, he drew the unhappy youth to a distance from the city, and there compelling him to dismount, his eyes, those hated eyes, were extinguished by the command, and in the presence of an amorous priest, who viewed with delight the agonies of a brother. It may however be suspected that the work was slightly performed by the less savage executioners, since the skill of his physicians restored Don Julio to an imperfect sight. A denial of justice provoked him to the most desperate counsels: and the revenge of Don Julio conspired with the ambition of Don Ferdinand against the life of their sove- A. D. 1505.

reign and eldest brother Alphonso I. Their designs were prevented, their persons seized, their accomplices were executed; but their sentence of death was moderated to a perpetual prison, and in their fault the Duke of Ferrara acknowledged his own. These dark shades in the annals of the House of Este must not be excused by the example of the Italian tyrants; whose courts and families were perpetually defiled with lust and blood, with incest and parricide; who mingled the cruelty of savages with the refinements of a learned and polite age. But it may be fairly observed, that single acts of virtue and of vice can seldom be weighed against each other: that it is far more easy to fall below, than to rise above, the common level of morality: that three or four guilty days have been found in a period of two hundred years: and that, in the general tenor of their lives, the Marquisses of Este were just, temperate, and humane; the friends of each other, and the fathers of their people.

In a more superstitious age, I should boldly oppose to the sins of twenty generations the monastic virtues of Alphonso III., the son and successor of Don Cæsar. Yet even these virtues were produced by the blind impulse of repentance and fear. The nature of Alphonso was impetuous and haughty, and a deep, indignant regret for the loss of Ferrara was the first sentiment of his childhood. As soon as he had released himself from the authority of a governor whom he hated, and a father whom he despised, the hereditary prince became came the slave of his passions and the terror of Modena: his appetite for blood was indulged in the chace, and the city; and he soon considered the life of a man and of a stag as of equal value. One of the most considerable private families in Italy (such is the dark language of Muratori) was provoked by some secret motive to form a design of assassinating Alphonso. Their dagger was turned aside from his breast; their chief was sacrificed to his justice; he threatened to extirpate the whole race; nor could the intercession of princes, or of the Pope himself, avert the rage of persecution and revenge. The only voice that could sooth the passions of the savage was that of an amiable and virtuous wife, the sole object of his love; the voice of Donna Isabella, the daughter of the Duke of Savoy, and the grand-daughter of Philip II. King of Spain. Her dying words sunk deep into his memory: his fierce spirit melted into tears, and after the last embrace, Alphonso retired into his chamber, to bewail his irreparable loss, and to meditate on the vanity of human life. But instead of resolving to expiate his sins, and to seek his salvation in the public felicity, he was persuaded that the habit and profession of a Capuchin were the only armour that could shield him from hell-fire. The two years from the death of his wife to the decease of his father, were dedicated to prayer and penance, and no sooner had Alphonso attained the rank of a sovereign, than he aspired to descend below the condition of a man. With the approbation and blessing of the Pope, who might possibly smile smile at this voluntary sacrifice, the Duke of Modena, after a reign of six months, resigned the sceptre to Francis his eldest son, a youth of nineteen years of age, and secretly departed to a Franciscan convent among the mountains of Trent. By a special privilege, his noviciate and profession were consummated in the same day: the austere and humble friar atoned for the pride and luxury of the prince, and it was the wish of brother John Baptist of Modena to forget the world and to be for ever forgotten. But obedience was now his first duty, and the noble captive, for the honour of the order and of religion, was exhibited to the Emperor, the Archdukes, and the people of the Austrian provinces, by whom he was contemplated with curiosity and devotion. Three years he wandered between Venice and Vienna as an itinerant preacher: he had the pleasure in one of his journies to be half drowned in a river, and half starved on a rock, and he vainly hoped to convert the heretics of the North, or to receive from their hands the crown of martyrdom. During the last twelve years he was stationed in the convent of Modena, the humble slave of the subjects of his son: the city and country were edified by his missions and sermons; and as often as he appeared in the pulpit, the contrast of his dignity and dress most eloquently preached the contempt of this world. The conversion of the Jews, the reformation of manners, the maintenance of the poor, afforded a daily exercise to the zeal of the abdicated Duke: but that zeal was always chargeable, often troublesome, some, and sometimes ridiculous: his death was a relief to the court and people; nor have the Princes of Este been ambitious of adorning their family with the name and honours of a saint. The Capuchin might behold, perhaps with pity, and perhaps with envy, the temporal prosperity of his son. In peace and war, in Italy and Spain, in the Austrian and French alliance, the Duke of Modena supported the dignity of his character: and Francis I. in a larger field, would have ranked among the generals and statesmen of an active age. A. D. 1629—1658.

A.D. 1626. August 22.

A.D. 1632. —1634.

The name of Rinaldo, a name immortalized by Tasso in epic song, had been applied to the youngest son of Duke Francis I.: he might faintly remember the last days of his father, and the short government of his brother Alphonso IV.; but he was no more than seven years of age when his infant nephew Francis II. succeeded to the ducal title. In his early youth Rinaldo was proposed as a candidate for the crown of Poland, a wild, and had it not failed, a ruinous attempt: the example of so many of his kinsmen suggested a more rational pursuit; and in the thirty-second year of his age he was promoted to the dignity of Cardinal, at the request of James II. King of Great Britain, who had married his niece. The long reign and short life of her brother Francis II. was an helpless state of minority and disease: he died without children, and had the right of female succession prevailed, the unfortunate race of the Stewarts might have found a safe and honourable refuge in the inheritance inheritance of Modena. But as the order of investiture preferred the more distant males, Cardinal Rinaldo ascended without a question the vacant throne of his nephew. The resignation of his hat was accepted by the Pope; but he might marry, without a dispensation, a princess of Brunswick, his cousin in the nineteenth degree; and this alliance was soon dignified by the nuptials of her sister with Joseph King of the Romans, the son and successor of the Emperor Leopold. The life of Rinaldo I. Duke of Modena, was extended beyond the term of eighty-three years: in the various fortunes of his long reign he supported a double exile with fortitude and patience; and in the intervals of peace the country was restored by a wise and paternal government. His son Francis III. was of a more active spirit. He signalized his valour in the wars of Hungary; followed the standard of the House of Bourbon; commanded, or seemed to command, in several battles and sieges, and extorted the confession, that, had his advice been followed, the events of the war would have been more successful. His wife was a princess of Orleans, the daughter of the regent: she was noble, beautiful, and rich; but in the true estimate of honour the meanest virgin among his subjects would have been a more worthy consort. Their son Hercules III. the reigning Duke, acquired a valuable and convenient territory with the heiress of Massa Carrara. Their only daughter, by the command of his inexorable father, was delivered to the Archduke Ferdinand, the Emperor's rör's brother; the marriage has been fruitful in children of both sexes, and the Duchies of Modena, Reggio, and Mirandola, will soon be the patrimony of a younger branch of the new family of Austria. In the decline of life, Hercules III. is the sole remaining male of the House of Este, and the long current of their blood must speedily be lost in a foreign stream.

ADALBERT OTBERT I.
OTBERT II.
AZO I.
AZO II.
GUELPH
HENRY THE BLACK
HENRY THE PROUD
HENRY THE LION
WILLIAM OTHO
ALBERT I.
ALBERT II.
MAGNUS I.
MAGNUS II.
BERNARD
FREDERIC
OTHO
HENRY
ERNEST THE CONFESSOR
HENRY
AUGUSTUS
FERDINAND ALBERT I.
FERDINAND ALBERT II.
CHARLES
CHARLES WILLIAM
WILLIAM
GEORGE
ERNEST
GEORGE I.
GEORGE II.
FREDERIC
GEORGE III.

SECTION IV.

In those happy times, when a genealogical tree could strike its root into every soil, when the luxuriant plant could flourish and fructify without a seed of truth, the ambition of the House of Este-Brunswick was easily gratified with a Roman pedigree. The name of Azo or Atto, so familiar to the Italian line, was deduced as a manifest corruption from the Latin original of Attius or Accius, or Actius: and this fanciful identity, an article of faith in the court of Ferrara, was not disputed in the sixteenth century by the rudeness of foreign criticism.

In a visit to Venice (1685) Ernest Augustus, Duke and afterwards Elector of Hanover, accepted with a gracious smile the manuscript of Theodore Damaidenus, a Belgic abbot, and the *Augusta Decora Romano-Brunsvicensia were honourably placed among the archives of his family. This splendid folio is decorated with the luxury of medals, inscriptions and classical authorities; but the historian spins from his own bowels, and from those of his blind or fallacious guides, an unbroken thread of two thousand four hundred and thirty-six years.

* I can only be acquainted with the MS. work of Damaidenus by the learned preface of Scheidius to the first volume of the Origines Guelficæ.—pp. 19—33.

years. The first of the duke's ancestors whom Damaidenus pretends to know is Actius Novus, one of the companions of Romulus, whose services were rewarded with a statue by the founder of the city. His great-grandson is the famous augur who divided a stone with a razor in the presence of the elder Tarquin. The Attii or Actii are enrolled as senators while all the senators were patricians: they continued to serve in all the wars of the republic, but their civil ambition seldom aspired above the office of Edile. In the age of the Antonines, they migrated from Rome to Ateste, their riches and merit promoted them to the honours of the colony, and about four hundred years after Christ, Caius Actius, the thirty-third in lineal descent from the companion of Romulus, was chosen by his countrymen their protector and prince. But if the prætor M. Attius Balbus, a real personage of the seventh century of Rome, could have any possible affinity with our fabulous series, the genuine lustre of the Accii would be derived from their union with the human and divine glories of the Julian race. Julia, the sister of Julius Cæsar, was the wife of the prætor Attius, and by their daughter Attia, their grandson Augustus himself might be claimed as a kinsman by the Duke of Modena, and the King of Great Britain. A prudent advocate may repeat with pleasure the verses of the Æneid that celebrate the youthful command of the Trojan Atys, the founder, according to Virgil, of the Atian family.

Alter

Alter Atys, genus unde Atii duxere Latini; Parvus Atys, pueroque puer dilectus Iülo.

But he will dissemble the reproach of Antony, and the apology of Cicero, which may leave a stain on the maternal descent of Augustus.*

From the fifth century of the Christian æra, the fables of Damaidenus are grafted on the romance, rather than the history, of Pigna,† who is content to deduce from that period the succession of the Accian family, and the princes of Este. The first of these princes, Caius Actius, was called to the glorious labour of defending Italy against the Goths, and his grandson, the more illustrious Foresto, opposed in arms the great invasion of Attila and the Huns. On the intelligence of the siege of Aquileia, he marched from Este and Padua with a chosen band of subjects and allies, cut his way through the barbaric host, and displayed the standard of the white Unicorn in every action of defence and attack till he was mortally wounded by a Scythian arrow. Eloquent in council, invincible in the field, an hero in his life, a Christian in his death, the glory of Foresto would be complete, if such a man had ever existed in the world. After the fall of Aquileia, the honour of his son Acarinus is saved by a prudent retreat; and the fugitives of Este withdraw at his command, and found a new city in the morasses of Ferrara. In the subsequent revolutions of Italy, the imaginary descendants of these ideal chiefs, are often oppressed and always emerge: in the cause of loyalty or patriotism they sometimes support and sometimes resist the kings of Lombardy, and emperors of the West; and in the light of the twelfth century, a fabulous Rinaldo is created to save Milan, and defeat the armies of Frederic Barbarossa. The lust of fiction is punished by the contempt of truth, and if some corrupt traces may be discerned of the separation of the German and Italian lines, the genealogist is ignorant of the fame and fortunes of the house of Este-Brunswick.

* Ignobilitatem objicit, says the orator, (Philippic. iii. 6,) and we may learn from Suetonius (in Octavio, c. ii.) that Antony was still more severe on the paternal ancestors of Augustus. The Emperor himself allowed that his father was the first senator of the family.

† Historia dei Principi di Este di Gio. Battista Pigna, in Vinegia, 1572, in 4to. I possess likewise a Latin Version of the same work, Ferrariæ, 1585, in folio. It extends from the fall of the Roman Empire to the year 1476. Pigna promised, but has only promised a second volume.

Yet this history, so pregnant with falsehoods, was composed by a man of learning and character, in a knowing age and a polite court, by the accomplished John Baptista Pigna, secretary of state to Alphonso II. duke of Ferrara.* But the artful courtier was disposed to shut his eyes and to follow his leaders. The imperfect papers of Count Faleti, who first discovered the Roman Attii, and explored in Germany a long-lost branch of the family,† were given into his hands, and he used with

* Pigna, the friend of Tasso, is the sage Elpino of the Aminta. See his various merits in the Italian Observations on that Pastoral Drama by Menage.—pp. 160—164.

† From Pigna's dedication I collect, that he himself signified (1560) with equal confidence the manuscript remains of Pellegrino Priscian.* The War of Attila, a Provençal romance of the fourteenth century, appeared in his eyes a genuine and contemporary work of Thomas the Scribe of Nicetas, patriarch of Aquileia.† He was probably deceived by the Lives of the Emperors which the Count Boyardo, with more than poetic licence, has imposed as an Italian version of the Latin original of Ricobaldus.‡ The spurious fragments had been gradually consolidated by the public credulity: fictions were changed into facts, traditions into truths, and conjectures into realities. The materials were prepared; and while he added the last varnish to the pleasing tale, the conscience of Pigna might applaud without much scruple his own veracity and innocence.

(1560) the Duke's orders to Count Girolamo Faleti, whose MS. annals at the time of his death had been only carried down to Azo IX. (1216—1240.)

* Pellegrino Prisciano, keeper of the archives to Hercules I. (1495) had collected and written many volumes concerning the house of Este. Muratori, who praises his fidelity, complains that the far greater part of his MSS. had been shamefully consumed in fire-works. (Antichità Estense, tom. i. c. ix. p. 69.)

† See Muratori's preface to the Antichità Estense, p. xix. I have neither the Provençal romance which is preserved in MS. in the library of Modena, nor the Italian abridgment printed in 1568. But Pigna (l. i. p. 11—30,) has extracted the most important and least improbable circumstances.

‡ After much hesitation Muratori has published in the ninth volume of his Scriptores Rerum Italicarum (p. 279—423,) this work of Ricobaldus or Boyardo. The mention of the Garter may prove that it was not composed till Hercules I. Duke of Ferrara had been invested with that order by Edward IV. King of England.

I am fatigued with the repetition of fables, but an illustrious race must always be crowned with its proper mythology. After fixing on the earth the solid foundations of the House of Este-Brunswick, I am desirous of proving that we are not less able to build in the air.

Before the name of Atys was invented by Virgil, before the Attian family was propagated to modern times, a fabulous tradition had connected the princes of Troy with the dukes of Ferrara and Brunswick. But the manufactures even of the Italians in the thirteenth century were coarse and clumsy, and they could only devise that Marthus, an unknown Trojan, besieged Milan, and founded, after his own name, a small city in the Milanese; and that, of four brothers who sprang from this chief, the eldest was the father of the future Marquisses of Este.* It was not till after the year fourteen hundred that the romances of French chivalry passed the Alps and the Pyrennees; and I am inclined to adopt the sentence of Cervantes,†

* Muratori, Antichità Estense, tom. i. c. ix. p. 67, 68. This tradition of Paulus Marrus (1280) is preserved by Gualvan de la Flamma (1320) in his great Chronicle of Milan, which Muratori (tom. xi. p. 534.) disdained to publish among his Scriptores Rerum Italicarum.

† See Don Quixote, part I. c. vi. p. 55. of the small edition of Madrid. The most grateful incense is the praise which one man of genius bestows on another; we are sure that he feels the merit that he applauds. Yet I do not clearly conceive the epithet of Christiano as it is applied to the most pleasing but least Christian of poets.

who

who wishes to forgive the lies of Archbishop Turpin, Charlemagne and his twelve Peers, from the grateful reflection that they afforded the first hints to the invention of Boyardo, from which the Christian poet Ludovico Ariosto has so finely composed his inimitable web. Such a magician as Ariosto can annihilate time and space; and he dispenses, by the prerogative of genius, with the laws of history, nature, and his own art.

According to the wild though delightful fictions of the Italian bards,* the house of Este-Brunswick is descended from the race of the Trojan kings. Astyanax, the son of Hector, was saved by an artifice from the victorious Greeks: Sicily gave him a retreat and a kingdom; and the valiant youth avenged on Argos and Corinth the injuries of his country. Polydore, the son of Astyanax, fixed his residence in Calabria, and Flovian, the grandson of Polydore, (a brief chronology!) was the first of the race of Hector who settled at Rome. By his two sons two noble branches arose from the same stem: the one is decorated by the Imperial titles of Constantine and Charlemagne; the other after a long and splendid succession is illustrated by the name of Ruggiero, or ROGER, the favourite hero of Ariosto and his readers. In the spirit of chivalry his strength and valour are his first virtues: the adverse ranks of battle are pierced by his lance or shivered by his sword; and the effects of his resistless charge are compared to the explosion of the Gran Diavolo, a thundering piece of ordnance in the arsenal of Ferrara. In more equal combat he stands invincible against the foremost paladins of France; and the two pagan champions, Mandricardo the Tartar, and Rodomonte the African, are slain after two desperate encounters by the hand of Roger. These martial terrors are softened by youth and beauty, by the generosity of his temper, his courteous manners, and the tenderness of his heart. He burns with a pure and honourable flame for the fair amazon Bradamante, and if he is seduced by the arts of Alcina, if he is fired by the naked charms of Angelica, his affections are constantly fixed on his noble spouse, the destined mother of the house of Este. Their white eagle was depicted on his shield, as the hereditary symbol of the Trojan line: the arms of Hector he possessed by the double claim of inheritance and conquest; and if his horse Frontin, and his sword Balisarda, were obtained by less worthy means, Roger was guiltless of the theft, and they became his own since he was able to defend them. But the hero disdained the use of supernatural aid; and indignantly cast into a well, the magic shield which dazzled the eyes and benumbed the senses of all beholders.

* The original pedigree is recorded, and perhaps invented by Count Matteo Boyardo, (Orlando Inamorato, l. iii. c. v.) but I cannot gravely refer to all the passages of Ariosto who should be familiar to every reader of taste.

By his mother, a Saracen princess, the unborn Roger was transported from Italy to Africa, and the helpless infant was saved and educated by the enchanter Atlas. His first arms were pointed against against the monsters of the desert, and he passed the sea under the imperial standard of Agramante, who invaded France with all the powers of the pagan or Mahometan world. The destinies of the house of Este require his conversion; but the event is artfully delayed, and the trembling balance is suspended by the master-hand of the poet. Tender of his life, and careless of his fame, the African magician presumes to oppose the decrees of heaven; secludes his pupil from the world, fascinates his eyes, sends him to wander through the air on a hippogrif, and dissolves his courage in the isle of luxury and love. The example of his Christian ancestors is a weighty argument for an illiterate soldier; and he assures his mistress that for her sake he is ready to undergo a baptism not only of water but of fire. But a man of honour, a loyal knight, is apprehensive of the reproach of deserting his benefactor and his party, an unfortunate benefactor, and a falling party. A seasonable wound allows the Christians to vanquish under the walls of Paris; but in a single combat which must determine the WORLD'S DEBATE, the lover of Bradamante is forced to encounter her brother Rinaldo, till he is delivered from the fatal conflict by the treachery and flight of the African monarch. A shipwreck, a desert island, an hermit, and a prophecy assist the operation of grace: every scruple is satisfied, every duty is accomplished, every obstacle is removed; and the poem concludes with the nuptials and last victory of the Christian hero.

But as the poet has used and abused the privilege of anticipation, he displays in a variety of pictures the fortunes of Roger and his descendants. Seven years after his baptism the Paladin will be slain by a perfidious assassin; his widow will be delivered of a son in the fruitful country between the Adige and the Brenta; and the warlike youth, after he has avenged his father, will be invested by the Emperor with the Lordship of Este, and accepted as their native prince by the remaining Trojans of the colony of Antenor. The visionary forms of her future progeny pass in rapid succession before the eyes of Bradamante, and a friendly sage fortels their names and actions in a mixed strain of history and fable. According to the popular opinion,* the establishment of the Saxon branch is ascribed to the marriage of Albert-Azo, in the tenth century, with an imaginary daughter of the Emperor Otho the Great. The Italian states of the princes of Este are described, Ferrara, amidst the waters of the Po, the soft Reggio, and the turbulent Modena; their wars against the Venetians and the Popes are discreetly announced; and the prospect is always closed by the fame, the virtues, and the fraternal union of Alphonso I. and Cardinal Ippolito. The Duke was the sovereign, the Cardinal affected to be the patron, of Ariosto: they will live in the everlasting life of their poet. "Myriads, perhaps, of heroic names, are plunged

* See Ricobaldo or rather Boyardo, (tom. ix. p. 314. Scriptor. Rerum Italic.) and Pigna, (l. i. p. 73—76.) Yet Pigna had learned from Count Faleti the true descent of the dukes of Saxony and Brunswick.

by

by time into the stream of oblivion: whilst a few are saved by the grateful and melodious swans, and honourably deposited in the temple of immortality."

According to the philosophers, who can discern an endless involution of germs or organized bodies, the future animal exists in the female parent; and the male is no more than an accidental cause which stimulates the first motion and energy of life. The genealogist who embraces this system should confine his researches to the female line—the series of mothers; and scandal may whisper that this mode of proceeding will be always the safest and most assured. But the moral connexion* of a pedigree is differently marked by the influence of law and customs: the male sex is deemed more noble than the female; the association of our idea pursues the regular descent of honours and estates from father to son; and their wives, howsoever essential, are considered only in the light of foreign auxiliaries. This rule, indeed, will be sometimes broken by an exception; the sole remaining daughter of an ancient and powerful family will assume the character of a son, and her children, who inherit the fortunes, may be assimilated to the name, of her own ancestors. The origin of her less conspicuous husband may gradually disappear; but if she be married to an equal, their common posterity will celebrate the union of two illustrious houses.

This last remark may be applied to the family

* Hume's Essays, vol. ii. p. 192, 193.

of

of Este-Brunswick which so prosperously grafted the fruits of Italy on a German stem. The antiquity and importance of the Guelphs, to whose name and possessions they succeeded, is acknowledged in the twelfth century (1152) by Otho Bishop of Frisingen.* "In the Roman empire (says that contemporary writer) two famous families have flourished till the present time on the confines of Gaul and Germany; the Henrys of Gueibelinga and the Guelphs of Altdorf, the one productive of emperors, the other of great dukes. By the contests of such men, armed with power, and ambitious of renown, has the peace of the republic been often endangered." An equal opposition to the Franconian and Swabian emperors must redound to the honour of a subject family, and the praise is the less questionable, as the historian himself was issued from the rival house. This curious passage unfolds the seeds of the two factions of the church and the empire; and it likewise appears that the name of Guelph, as well as of Henry, was no more than a personal and Christian appellation, the frequent use of which might denote, in the language of posterity, the succession of an entire dynasty. Between the ascending and descending series of the Guelphs the connexion is formed by the marriage of Cunegonde, the daughter of the first, and the mother of the second race. The nobility and riches of Azo were not inferior to those of his consort; but, after their sons and grandsons

* Otho. Frisingensis, l. ii. c. 2. in Muratori Script. Rerum Italic. tom. vi. p. 699, 700.

grandsons had been invested with the duchies of Bavaria and Saxony, the distant fame of an Italian marquis was gradually lost; and these princes, adhering to their maternal ancestors, assumed the more popular character of native Germans.

About the end of the twelfth century a short chronicle was composed by a monk of Weingarten, to immortalize in this world, as well as in the next, the Lords of Altdorf, the founders and benefactors of his convent.* After a diligent search into such chronicles and charters as were then extant, he fairly confesses that his visible horizon is bounded by the age of Charlemagne, by the well-known Welf or Guelph, the father of the Empress Judith. But he is persuaded that the ancestors of his first hero were men of valour and renown,

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona, that, for ages, before the introduction of christianity, they flourished in riches and honours; that they governed their own people, and that their name went forth into foreign lands. Such presumptions are more satisfactory to a rational mind, than his romance of a Trojan colony and descent, than an absurd marriage with Kathilina, the daughter of a Roman senator, whose name might be translated into Whelp in the German or English idioms. The conjectures of Leibnitz, or his disciple Eccard, are follies of a graver kind; they

* Chronicon Weingartense, from the Vienna MS. in Origines Guelficæ, tom. v. p. 31, 32, 33. It had been published less correctly by Canisius and Leibnitz.

build

build without materials an edifice of characters and adventures, and grasping some shadowy semblances, they forcibly derive the Guelphs from a brother of Odoacer, King of the Heruli, who extinguished the Roman empire (476) in Italy and the West. From the beginning of the historic period the chronicle of Weingarten enumerates only six generations, Guelph the father of Judith, Ethico, Henry, Rodolph, and the two last Guelphs the father and brother of Cunegonde; a number scarcely sufficient for an interval of two hundred and fifty years. The probable chasms have indeed been supplied by the industry of Leibnitz and Eccard. The names of Guelph or Welf I., Ethico I., Welf or Wolfhard II., Ethico II., Henry, Rodolph I. the brother of St. Conrad, Welf III., Rodolph II., Welf or Wolfhard IV., and Welf V. are enrolled in their list; but a descent of ten generations reverses the difficulty, and the scene is now crowded by the new actors. At the two extremities, the chain of the ancient Guelphs is strongly rivetted in truth; but the intermediate links cannot be discriminated with clearness and certainty.*

The nuptials of Azo had transplanted the Este family from Italy to Germany, from the Po to the Danube. His grandson Henry the Black, and his great-grandson Henry the Proud, acquired by marriage new and ample possessions on the Elbe and Weser; and Henry the Lion, the heir of these possessions, is the first of his race to whom the title of

* See the first and fifth books of the Origines Guelficæ.

Brunswick can be strictly appropriated. The Lion was the tenth male in lineal descent from the Marquis Adalbert: and his maternal pedigree might be derived from the dukes, the emperors, and the hero of Saxony.*

I. The genius of Henry the Fowler might govern the kingdom of Germany with one hand, and the duchy of Saxony with the other; and the arts and cities of that savage region are ascribed to his political institutions. Otho I. by a rare felicity was not inferior in personal merit to his father: but the majesty of a Roman empire appeared incompatible with the office of a provincial duke; the pursuit of Italian realms carried him far away to the south; and his ancient patrimony was left exposed to the inroads of the Slavi and the Danes. It became necessary to station a soldier on the banks of the Elbe; nor would that soldier have been obeyed by the Saxon chiefs, unless the splendour of his birth, and the extent of his property had already given him a leading influence in the country. About the middle of the ninth century the noble race of Billing, an indigenous chieftain or prince, emits the first ray of historic light: his blood was mingled with that of the French conquerors,

Francorum clarâ de stirpe potentûm, and his daughter Oda is celebrated as the grand-

* For these Saxon genealogies, see the Dissertations of Eccard, with the annotations of Scheidius, in the fourth volume of the Origines Guelficæ, and the Prolegomena of the latter especially. Tom. iii. p. 10, &c.

mother

mother of Henry the Fowler. The valiant Herman, the son of the second, and the great-grandson of the first Billing, was appointed military governor, and at length created hereditary Duke of Saxony by his cousin Otho the Great (960): and four descents, Bernard I., Bernard II., Ordulph, and Magnus, continued the lineal succession till the beginning of the twelfth century. In their wars against the northern barbarians, these dukes were seldom successful; but they asserted their own prerogatives and the liberties of the nation; their independence sometimes provoked the jealousy of the emperors; nor did the royal maids of Norway and Hungary disdain the alliance of such powerful vassals. The male line of the Billings was extinct in Duke Magnus (1106): his eldest daughter Wulfilda had been given to Henry the Black, afterwards Duke of Bavaria: the modern duchies of Luneburgh and Saxe-Lawenburgh were her princely inheritance: and her children, of the family of the Este-Guelphs, succeeded to these territories on either side of the Elbe, which are still enjoyed by the Electoral branch of the House of Brunswick.

II. From their original patrimony the five Saxon Emperors, Henry the Fowler, the three Othos, and Henry the Saint may be styled without impropriety of the ancient House of Brunswick. But their connexion with the Este-Guelphs can be found only in female alliances; and their blood may have been transfused by three streams of imperfect clearness. Their common source is derived from Henry the the Fowler, the King at least of Germany, and the son and grandson of the Dukes of Saxony, Otho (880) and Ludolph (858). Otho enjoyed the glory of refusing the crown; and of Ludolph it may be sufficient to affirm, that he was the sole hope and honour of an illustrious race, that his birth was equal to his fortune, his virtue to his birth, and his beauty to his virtue. We have reason to believe, though we have not a right to assert, that his uncle Ecbert was sanctified in the chaste embraces of St. Ida;* that his father Bruno is the founder of Brunswick (Brunonis vicus); and that his grandfather, an elder Bruno, was the friend of Witikind, with whom he fought under the standard of freedom, and with whom he yielded to the God of the Christians. In the fifth ascending degree the proselyte must be the progenitor of a Saint, of Bruno, archbishop of Cologne and brother of the Emperor Otho I. His domestic biographer thus describes the merits of this Saxon family: "As far as reaches the memory of man, the grandsires of the grandsires are all most noble: nor would it be easy to find an obscure or degenerate member in the whole series."†

I now return to the three channels of communication between the old and the new House of Brunswick, between the Saxon Emperors and the Este-Guelphs. 1. According to the monk of Weingarten, the father of Cunegonde, Guelph IV.

* The original Life of St. Ida is published by Leibnitz, Script. Brunswic. tom. i. p. 175—184.

† Ruotgerus apud Struvium, Corpus Hist. Germanicæ, p. 216.

was

was the son of Count Rodolph of Altorf, and of his wife Itha, the daughter of Richlinda, daughter of the Emperor Otho I. But the children, alas! of the great Otho are conspicuous in history; Richlinda is invisible; and her existence can only be saved by degrading her to the rank of an illegitimate daughter, whose alliance, however, might be an object of ambition to the proudest vassal of Germany. 2. The matrimonial conquest of Henry the Black had extended over Luneburgh and the Elbe; Brunswick and the Weser were embraced by those of his son Henry the Proud, whose nuptials with Gertrude, the daughter of Richenza and the Emperor Lothaire II. (1126) enriched and illustrated the Guelphic line. Richenza, the female parent of an heiress, was herself an heiress, and the daughter of an heiress. From her father, Duke Henry, she claimed the county or principality of Nordheim in the southern part of the Electorate of Hanover; from her mother, Gertrude, she derived the city and country of Brunswick, which had been enjoyed by four successive generations of her ancestors. Gertrude alone represented her childless brother Ecbert II. Margrave of Misnia and Brunswick: he was the son of Ecbert I. of Ludolph, of Bruno II., and of Bruno I.; whose pedigree would emerge into a brighter day, as the younger son of Henry, Duke of Bavaria, a younger brother of the Emperor Otho I. This highest step trembles indeed under our feet: yet the evidence of local chronicles must not be despised: inheritance is the most natural mode of possession; and in the tenth century the Margrave Bruno I. possessed the patrimonial estate of the ancient House of Brunswick. 3. Our last and best dependence is on the maternal grandfather of Henry the Lion; on Lothaire II. who was successively Count of Supplingeburgh, Duke of Saxony, King of Germany, and Emperor of the Romans. His father, Count Gebehard, fell in battle (1075), and is numbered among the slain with the first princes of the empire. It is almost certain that he was the son of Otho, Duke of Swabia: it is absolutely certain that the father of Duke Otho was Ezo, Count Palatine, a noble courtier, who obtained in marriage Matilda, the daughter of the Emperor Otho II., by the fortune, as it is fabled, of a game at dice. The slight defect in the genealogy of Lothaire II. is overbalanced by the general consent of the twelfth century that he was the heir, as well as the successor, of Otho the Great; and the three probable connexions of the ancient and new houses of Brunswick will be consolidated into one rational belief. It may not be superfluous to add that the Empress Theophano, the consort of Otho II., was a Greek princess of the Basilian or Macedonian dynasty; which held the sceptre of Constantinople, and derived a splendid and specious origin from the royal race of the Arsacides of Parthia. Reason may suspect, and fancy will pronounce, that the French colours, on the fields of Minden, were presented to the descendant of a king, who had received the Roman eagles, after the defeat of Crassus.*

is

III. After a brave resistance and a prudent submission, Witikind, the Saxon hero, ended his life in the bosom of peace and Christianity. His son Wicbert was not less eminent in the church than in the state: his grandson Walbert was educated in the manners, and promoted to the dignities of the French court. After a chasm of one or two generations, four brothers of the race of Witikind appear with the title of Count, in his native country of Westphalia. Among these Theoderic is illustrated by the temporal and spiritual honours of his daughter St. Matilda, the Queen of Henry the Fowler, and the mother of the Saxon Emperors.† By this female descent the Este-Guelphs and many other noble families participate of the blood of Witikind: but his male posterity is extinguished or lost; and in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, I cannot discover any name which is connected by the writers of the time, with the name of the hero. Yet some fabulous claims were cherished in silence, and four hundred years after his death, the chronicle of a French monk deduces from the four brothers, the father and uncles of St. Matilda, the nobility of all Saxony, Italy, Germany, Gaul, Normandy, Bavaria, Swabia, Hungary, Bohemia, hemia, Tuscany, and Poland,* a strange profusion, which much debases the value of the gift. Vanity may grasp these ideal trophies: the electors of Saxony and the Dukes of Savoy may embrace the shades of their visionary fathers, but the hundred heads of the male children of Witikind dissolve into air, as soon as they are touched by the spear of criticism.

* History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, vol. v. p. 148.

† Vita Ste Mathild. in Leibnitz. Script. Bruns. tom. i. p. 194.

Our accurate knowledge of the origin, establishment, and alliances of the Este-Guelphs may now smile at the errors and fables of a darker age. After the separation of the House of Este by the two marriages of the Marquis Azo, the two diverging branches of his posterity insensibly became strangers and aliens to each other: the intercourse of the distant nations of Europe was rare and hazardous; and the fall of the empire had separated the worlds of Italy and Germany. A tradition still survived in the court of Ferrara, that in some remote age, an hero of their blood had transported his hopes and fortune beyond the Alps: but the date, the characters, and the consequences of his emigration were soon obliterated by ignorance and supplied by fiction.† In the tenth century, the valiant Azo, an Italian noble, attended the standard and deserved the esteem of Otho the Great. Alda, a natural daughter of the Emperor, was the reward of his services: she was endowed with the imaginary fief of Fausburch or Friburgh in Saxony, and the twins, Fulk and Hugo, were the offspring of their marriage. Hugo returned to his native country, and propagated the race of the Marquisses of Este, Dukes of Ferrara and Modena; while Fulk remained in Germany, supported the falling house of Saxony, and transmitted to his descendant some great county or duchy, in the unknown regions of the north. The Dukes of Brunswick, on the other hand, preserved a faint remembrance of their Italian origin: the title of their ancestors was familiar to their ear; but they had forgotten the name of Este, and their misguided tenderness confounded the Marquisses of Montferrat or Mantua with their real kinsmen.* About the middle of the sixteenth century the mist was in some measure dispelled by the inquiries of Count Faleti, who had been sent into Germany by Hercules II. Duke of Ferrara, and the perfect connexion of the two branches was finally restored by the faithful service of Leibnitz and Muratori.

* Alberic. trium Fontium. Chron. in Leibnitz. Accessiones Historicæ, tom. ii. p. 257.

†Ricobald. in Muratori. Script. Rerum Italic. tom. ix. p. 315—317—321.

Of the first Guelph the rank is ascertained and the name is illustrated by the marriage of his daughter Judith with the Emperor Lewis the Pious, the son and successor of Charlemagne.† The magnitude of the French empire had almost excluded

* Leibnitz. Opp. tom. iv. p. ii. p. 83. Edit. Dutems.

† The Chronological and Alphabetical indexes of the sixth volume of the Historians of France, will direct the more curious reader to all the original texts which speak of the Empress Judith. The best proofs of the nobility of Guelph are the testimonies of Thegan cluded the choice of a foreign princess: nor could the leaders of a warlike nation disdain the alliance of the peers whose judgment had raised them to the throne. The father of Judith was of the noblest race of the Bavarians: the nobility of her Saxon mother was equally conspicuous; Guelph is indifferently described by the style of Count, or Duke, or Prince; and the more honourable appellation of Freeman (vir egregiæ libertatis) may be applied to the situation as well as the character of the independent chief. After the decease of his first wife, Lewis the Pious invited the fairest and most noble damsels: the heart, or rather the heart of the Emperor was disputed in these nuptial games; and the beauty of Judith was rewarded with a fond and feeble husband, whom she continued to govern till the last hour of his life. The loud praises of her wit and learning, her courage and piety, announce at least the pretensions of the Empress; and she might excuse the invectives that were pointed against the dangerous seduction of her graces and charms. During ten years (819—830) of specious prosperity, the daughter of Guelph enjoyed and embellished the feasts of an itinerant court. But the vices of the state and the calamities of the age were gradually ascribed to her influence: Bernard, Duke of Septimania, was known to be her favourite, and was believed to be her lover; she wished to provide a kingdom for her infant Charles: and the three sons of Lewis, by his first wife, conspired against the stepmother whom they had provoked. By the successful rebels she was twice torn from the palace, and immured, under the monastic veil, in the cloisters of Poitiers and Tortona (830-834). The Emperor was twice restored: he embraced his wife with the credulity of love: Judith and her favourite asserted their innocence with oaths and challenges: her days were concluded (843) in peace and honour; and the posterity of Guelph reigned in France (840—987) till the sixth generation.

Thegan (p. 79), of the Astronomer (p. 102), of the Annals of Eginhard (p. 178), of those of St. Bertin (p. 207), and of the Saxon Chronicle (p. 219).

Conrad and Rodolph, two of the sons of Guelph, had abandoned their paternal seat to share the prosperous and adverse fortunes of their sister. When she was degraded to a nun they were shaven as priests: but they stood beside the throne as princes of the blood. Conrad I. had two sons, Conrad II. and Hugh, from his ecclesiastical benefices surnamed the Abbot. Their ambitious spirit maintained their hereditary rank, and they appear conspicuous in the government of provinces, and in the annals of peace and war. According to some learned antiquaries, Conrad I. left a third son, the famous Robert the Strong, the father of the kings of France, of the third race. Their opinion will not sustain the rigour of critical inquiry: but the text of an original chronicle is alleged in its favour; and a series of an hundred kings still hangs by the various reading of a single vowel.*

Yet

* Fratres or Fratris is the question; of which the opposite sides are Yet a kingdom may be found to which the purest history will assert the title of the Guelphic line. Conrad II. and his son Rodolph were Dukes or Marquisses of the Trans-Jurane Burgundy which includes the Pays de Vaud, and the happy spot where I am now writing. In the shipwreck of the Carlovingian monarchy (888), Rodolph, with the applause of his bishops and nobles assumed a royal crown at the abbey of St. Maurice; his sceptre was the martyr's lance, enriched with a nail of the true cross, and the second kingdom of Burgundy which he founded, subsisted one hundred and forty-four years in a lineal succession of four princes. The independence of Rodolph I. (888—912) was confirmed by two victories, and finally acknowledged in a diet of the German empire. His son Rodolph II. (912—937) twice attempted the conquest of Italy, and his retreat was purchased by a fair equivalent; his dominion extended over the French or western part of Switzerland, Franche-Comté, Savoy, Dauphiné, and Provence; and the country between the Rhone and the Alps adopted the new appellation of the kingdom of Arles. The long reign (937—993) of Conrad the son of Rodolph II. was glorious and pacific, and the friendship of the great Otho was the firmest bulwark of his throne. His son Rodolph III. surnamed the Lazy, was the spectator, perhaps the cause of the decay and dissolution of his government, (993—1032). After his death, the sovereignty of the kingdom of Arles or Burgundy devolved as a fief or legacy to his nephew the Emperor Conrad the Salic; the effective power was usurped by the vassals, but the regal titles of this collateral line may reflect some dignity on the fathers of the house of Brunswick.*

are strongly argued by Foncemagne (Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xx. p. 558—567) and Scheidius (Præfat. ad Origin. Guelfic. tom. ii. p. 24—43.)

While the ancestors of the kings of Burgundy pursued the path of ambition, their kinsmen, the elder branch of the Guelphs, preferred a life of independence in the free possession of their allodial estates of Bavaria and Swabia. From Guelph the father of the Empress Judith, these estates descended to the first or second Ethico, whose lofty spirit is commemorated in a curious tale by the monk of Weingarten.† As soon as Henry, the son of Ethico, had attained the age of manhood, the aspiring youth, without his father's privity or consent, attached himself to the Emperor, obtained his favour, deserved his esteem, and attended with assiduous zeal the long circuits of the court and army. By the advice of the princes, and at the solicitation of his sovereign, the son of Ethico consented to receive a fief or benefice of four thousand

* See the fourth book of the Origines Guelficæ, (tom. ii.) and the Baron de Zurlauben, (Hist. de l'Académie, tom. xxxvi. p. 142—159.)

† In this imperfect review of the history of the Guelphs, the Chronicle of Weingarten (Origines Guelficæ, tom. v. p. 32—35) may be considered as the text, and the Origines Guelficæ (tom. ii. l. 4 and 5,) as the Commentary.

thousand mansi or measures of land, in the Upper Bavaria, and to perform the homage of a faithful client. Henry, surnamed of the golden chariot, long flourished in the wealth and dignity of the palace; but his father was deeply wounded by this sacrifice of honour to interest, by this base abdication of the nobility and freedom of the Guelphic name. After pouring a complaint into the bosom of his friends, the high-minded Ethico resolved to conceal his shame from the world. He quitted (says the monk) his regal edifices, and rich possessions, retired with only twelve companions to the solitary mansion of Ambirgo, amidst the mountains, and there ended his days without seeing or forgiving his degenerate son. The acquisition in the ninth century of such a fief as Ethico disdained, would satisfy the pride of the noblest family in Europe.

Had a rent-roll of the Guelphic possessions been preserved, an uncouth list of castles and villages which have long been tranferred to new owners, would offend the ear, without informing the mind of the English reader. The authors of the family were of Bavarian extraction; but their principal seat was in Swabia, in the neighbourhood of the lake of Constance, and the Austrian prefecture of Altorf and Ravensperg* is derived from the ancient Guelphs, who, according to the fashion of the times, had abstained from the use of any local denominations.

* See Géographie de Busching, tom. vii. p. 130—137, and tom. viii. p. 644—647.

denominations. Their various estates, as they might be acquired by donation, marriage, or purchase, were scattered over the wide extent of Bavaria and Swabia, from the mountains of Tirol to the plains of Alsace; and several free communities of the Grisons were once the slaves of these powerful landlords. In their household they displayed the pomp and pride of regal economy; and the domestic offices of stewards, butlers, marshals, chamberlains, and standard-bearers, were exercised by counts, or by nobles of an equal rank. Their first officer, the Advocate, represented their person and maintained their cause in the imperial or ducal court; and they enjoyed the singular privilege of protecting, without effusion of blood, all persons who were legally proscribed till they had answered or satisfied the demands of justice. The episcopal churches of Frisingen, Augsburgh, Constance, and Coire, and the monasteries of popular sanctity, were endowed by their devotion with liberal grants of lands and peasants. Even the humiliating tribute which the kings of Burgundy and the Guelphs of Altorf were bound to offer at the shrine of St. Othmar, was an annual commemoration of the antiquity of their house. They made atonement for the guilt of their ancestors, who, in the eighth century, had governed the Duchy of Alemannia, and had abused their power in the persecution of the saint.

The darkness of German history in the ninth and tenth centuries, has cast a veil over the lives and characters of the ancient Guelphs. But it may may be presumed that they were illiterate and valiant; that they plundered churches in their youth and restored them in their old age; that they were fond of arms, horses and hunting; and that they resisted with equal spirit the exercise of arbitrary and legal power. St. Conrad,* alone of his race (892—976) by seeking a place in heaven, has deserved a memorial on earth. After his education in the school, and his service in the chapter of Constance, he was raised by a free election to the Episcopal chair (934) which he continued to fill forty-two years. The church was enriched by his patrimony and defended by his kindred: the Bishop of Constance did not affect the austere life of an hermit, and his temperate manners were those of a German noble; but his chastity was immaculate from sin or scandal, he was assiduous in prayer, and his religious merits were crowned by the pilgrimage of Jerusalem.† The miracles of St. Conrad are fancied with some degree of taste: he voided harmless, a spider which he had bravely swallowed in the communion-cup; and he delivered two souls, who, in the form of birds, were enduring their purgatory

* The Life of St. Conrad (Leibnitz Scriptores Rerum Brunswicensium, tom. ii. p. 1—14,) may be illustrated by the Origines Guelficæ, (tom. ii. p. 206—212,) and the proofs or documents of the fifth Book (No. 7, 8, 9.)

† From the word tertio in the Life of St. Conrad, (c. vi.) it is supposed that he thrice visited Jerusalem. I am more inclined to suspect that mense has been dropt by a careless transcriber: three pilgrimages are useless and improbable.

in

in the water-fall of the Rhine. But the most marvellous scene was exhibited at the church and abbey of Einsidlen, the Loretto of Switzerland, which, under the name of our Lady of the Hermits, is annually visited by many thousand pilgrims.* The clergy, nobility, and people, had flocked to the feast of the dedication, (948); but at the midnight hour of the vigil, the Bishop of Constance was favoured with an extraordinary vision. The heavens were opened; Jesus Christ arrayed in the episcopal habit, accompanied by the Virgin Mary, and attended by a choir of angels, descended from on high to officiate at his own altar: the saints and martyrs assumed the characters of priests and deacons, and the whole consecration was performed according to the ritual of the church. In the morning the bishop arose, he related his dream; a voice from the sky or the roof, announced that the place was already holy; and this visionary act has been acknowledged by the decrees of Rome. One hundred and forty-seven years after his death, Conrad was canonized by Pope Calixtus II. (1123): the Guelphic name was honoured by this celestial kinsman, and the liberal devotion of Henry the Black, Duke of Bavaria, declared him the worthy nephew of the saint.

As soon as St. Conrad was received into heaven

* One hundred thousand according to the moderate calculation of Mr. Coxe! The English traveller lashes our Lady of the Hermits with the spirit of a protestant rather than of a philosopher; and his excellent translator corrects him with the enthusiasm, not of a bigot, but of a poet.

he

he should have secured an act of indemnity for the obsolete sins of his family. But St. Othmar was still inexorable, and the effects of his revenge were felt by the tenth generation of the Guelphs. By the grand-daughter, perhaps, of the Emperor Otho I. Rodolph II. of Altorf, had two sons, Henry and Guelph. The eldest, an impatient youth, denied the annual payment of his sin-offering; but the denial was soon followed by his untimely death. After hunting the roe-buck in the mountains, he reposed his wearied limbs under the shadow of a rock, an huge fragment fell on his head, and the vindictive saint might behold him rolling down the precipice. The submission of his brother Guelph IV. was rewarded with a longer and more glorious life. Rich in lands and potent in arms, he long tormented his neighbour the Bishop of Frisingen, attended the Emperor to his coronation at Rome, and afterwards joined against him in a successful rebellion. His nuptials with Imiza, daughter of the Count of Luxenburgh, and niece of the Empress St. Cunegonde, were productive of two children, of Guelph V. who succeeded his father, and of Cunegonde or Cuniza the future heiress of her family, who was given in marriage to the Marquis Azo, with eleven hundred or eleven thousand mansi of land* in the valley of Elisina

* From the customs and charters of Lombardy Muratori attempts to determine the usual mansus (Antichità Estense, tom. i. p. 3—5;) and his evaluation would produce two hundred, or more probably twenty thousand English acres. But he finds that Elisina in Lombardy.* The portion appears to have been worthy of a prince; but the situation, the measure, and the value of the estate, cannot now be exactly defined.

After Europe was moulded into the feudal system, an independent chieftain would have stood naked and alone; the fear of injury was stimulated by the ambition of favour, and the descendants of Ethico and Henry were more inclined to follow the example of the son, than to sympathize with the feelings of the father. Guelph V. the brother of Cunegonde, was invested with the Duchy of Carinthia, and the Marquisate of Verona (1047); an important province, which included the country of Tirol, and commanded the passage of the Rhætian Alps. But the servant of Henry III. maintained the vigour of his character, and the pride of his birth. An Italian diet was summoned according to custom in the plain of Roncaglia. Guelph, at the head of his vassals, waited three days without seeing or hearing from the Emperor: on the fourth he sounded the trumpet of retreat, and, though he met Henry on the way, neither threats, nor prayers, nor promises, could that some mansi were of more ample dimensions; and I could acquiesce in the loose definition of as much land as will maintain a peasant with his family.

* Leibnitz understands the Val d'Elsa in Tuscany, and his opinion is approved by Eccard and Fontanini; (Origines Guelficæ, tom. ii. p. 223, 224.) But Gruber dissents from his text; and Muratori wishes to read Vallis Lusina, the village and manor of Lusia in the Veronese territory, which soon afterwards appear in the possession of the Marquis Azo.

prevail

prevail on him to return. An arbitrary tax of a thousand marks had been imposed on the citizens of Verona; their Marquis in arms flew to their relief, and the concessions of the Emperor could scarcely purchase an ignominious escape. This act of patriotism or rebellion, for which he is said to have testified some remorse, concludes the story of the Duke of Carinthia. He died (1055) childless, in the prime of life, the last male of his family. Desirous of exchanging the temporal goods which he was about to lose, for an everlasting possession in heaven, Guelph endowed the Abbey of Weingarten with the rich gift of his estates and vassals. Two of his principal servants accepted the testament; but after his funeral they were resisted in the execution of this rash and unjust deed, which offended even the prejudices of the age. Imiza his mother was not ignorant that her daughter Cunegonde had left a son: she dispatched messengers into Italy, and the youth on his arrival annulled the donation, and asserted his own right, as the true and legitimate heir of the ancient Guelphs.

Two streams of noble blood, the two families of Este and the Guelphs, were united in the son of Azo and Cunegonde, who obtained the maternal name of his grandfather and uncle. By the marriage settlement, which seems to have excluded the younger children, Guelph VI. was assured of the patrimony of his father: he already possessed the inheritance of his mother (1055): his fortune was adequate to his birth, and his warlike, ambitious spirit soared above his fortune. An Italian by nature and education, he was a German by adoption; and from the age of manhood the Lord of Altorf had fixed his residence and his hopes in the country that was the seat of government. In the diet of Goslar (1071) he was invested by the Emperor Henry IV. with the duchy of Bavaria, which in that age extended to the confines of Hungary, and his nuptials were celebrated with Judith the daughter of Baldwin, count of Flanders, and the widow of a titular King of England.* These titles are illustrious: but the Brunswick princes, who are lovers of truth and freedom, will permit me to observe that they were dearly purchased by the sacrifice of virtue. His first wife was Ethelinda the daughter of Henry, duke of Bavaria: their alliance was consecrated by oaths, and while fortune smiled Guelph was a tender husband and a pious son. But after Henry, in the storms of faction, had been proscribed by the Emperor, the Lord of Altorf deserted the father, repudiated the daughter, and basely solicited the spoils of a friend with whom it was his duty to fall. Gold and silver are the idols of a venal court; the Guelphic patrimony was injured by his profuse ambition; and his ascent to one of the most eminent dignities of the republic was disgraced by the public reproach of ingratitude and perjury.† By the early and obstinate stinate revolt of the Duke of Bavaria against his imperial benefactor, these reproaches will be tinged with a blacker dye, if the defence of the church does not absolve from all moral obligations. Whatsoever were his sins they were expiated, however, by a pilgrimage to the Holy Land: the greater part of his army was buried in the plains of Asia Minor; and he died on his return, at Paphos, in the Isle of Cyprus (1101). His life had been prolonged to an advanced period; yet he survived only four years the longevity of his father the Marquis Azo. The articles of settlement were rigorously exacted by the Bavarian duke: but the sons of the second marriage, Fulk and Hugh, opposed their elder brother in the passes of the Alps, and his insatiate avarice yielded to a more equal treaty of partition.

tious

* Of Tostus, son of Earl Godwin and younger brother of Harold, against whom, with a Norwegian army he had unsuccessfully disputed the crown.

† Cunctis detestantibus, quod clarissimam et inopinatissimam in Republica

By the Queen Dowager of England, the first Guelphic duke of Bavaria had two sons, Guelph VII. and Henry, surnamed the Black. The eldest at the age of seventeen (1089) was sent into Italy, and commanded by his parents to ascend the nuptial bed of Matilda the Great Countess of Tuscany, who had attained the autumnal ripeness of forty-three years. This heroine, the spiritual daughter of Gregory VII. was twice married: but interest rather than love directed her choice, and her virginity was twice insulted by a crooked dwarf, and an impotent boy. *

Republica dignitatem tam fœdâ ambitione polluisset, says Lambert, with a sense and style far above the eleventh century.

Their conjugal union was hopeless;* but six years (1089—1095) elapsed between the marriage and the divorce; and the government of Tuscany was administered in their joint names, till the imperious temper of Matilda provoked the grandson of Azo to reveal a secret which her pride would have concealed from the world. On his father's decease Guelph VII. succeeded to the duchy of Bavaria (1101) of which he had already obtained the reversion: his power ranked him among the first princes of Germany; and when he represented the majesty of the empire, a sword of state was carried before him. The Bavarians applauded the mildness of his sway, and his paternal care in the education of the noble youth. At Rome he appeared with dignity as the mediator between the Emperor and the Pope. The French who saw him at Troyes, at the head of a great embassy, were astonished by the huge corpulence and sonorous voice, which, in his person, however, were not the attributes of manhood. After a reign of nineteen years he died (1120), most assuredly, without children; and his younger brother Henry the Black reunited all the subordinate fiefs and allodial estates of the family in Germany and Italy.†

* For more particular information see Cosmas, Dean of the church of Prague, whom I only know by the Abrégé Chronologique de l'Histoire d'Italie of the most accurate St. Marc (tom. iv. p. 1253). Some faults and fables may weaken his credit, but of the impotence of Guelph VII. I cannot entertain a doubt.

† See the two first Guelphs of Bavaria in the sixth book of the Origines Guelficæ, tom. ii.

Till

Till the beginning of the twelfth century the provincial honours of the Marquisses of Este, the Lords of Altorf, and even the Dukes of Bavaria, were those of a private though illustrious family: and the series of their names and actions must be painfully extracted from the occasional hints of charters and chronicles. During a subsequent period of an hundred years the Este-Guelphs, the princes of the Brunswick line, are the first actors in the revolutions of the empire: their lives and characters are deeply impressed on the annals of the times; and our loose memorials will assume the tone of an historical narrative.

After the death of his elder brother, Henry the Black, son of Guelph VI. and grandson of the Marquis Azo, had succeeded to the duchy of Bavaria and the estates of the family. He survived only six years (1120—1126); but his political weight on a vacancy of the throne contributed to fix the right of election in the German aristocracy. The royal funeral of Henry V. was solemnly performed; and the Duke, with the sacerdotal and noble attendants, subscribed a writ of summons which speaks the language of liberty and resentment. The diet was held in the neighbourhood of Mentz; the separate tribes, the Franks, the Swabians, the Bavarians, encamped on either side of the Rhine, and the immediate vassals with their numerous and warlike followers, composed an assembly or rather army of sixty thousand soldiers and freemen. But the archbishop, a dexterous statesman, removing the scene from the camp to the cathedral, transferred the right of voting from the many to the few, and as the comparative few were still too many in his eyes, the previous nomination of an emperor was devolved on a select committee of ten princes and prelates, the first rudiments of the electoral college. Three candidates, Leopold, Marquis of Austria, Lothaire, Duke of Saxony, and Frederic, Duke of Swabia, were unanimously named: and the two former, after a modest refusal for themselves, engaged to support the choice of the majority. The evasions of the Duke of Swabia betrayed a secret and offensive presumption of hereditary right. He was the son of Frederic of Stauffen, a soldier of fortune: but his mother Agnes was the daughter and sister of the two last emperors. He shared with his brother Conrad the rich inheritance of the Ghibelline or Franconian house, and his ambition might be coloured by the examples of the preceding reigns. These examples and this ambition the electors had resolved to crush by the free choice of Lothaire of Saxony: but the attempt was dangerous, as long as the Bavarian duke might cast into the opposite scale the votes of his dependant bishops, and the swords of his military vassals. His personal attachment, for he had given his sister to Frederic, insensibly yielded to stronger arguments of public or private interest. Henry the Black appeared in the cathedral of Mentz, and no sooner had he assented to the wishes of the majority, than the Saxon Saxon was proclaimed in triumph, and the Swabian fled in despair.

The difference of an hereditary or elective monarchy is of small moment to a dying man; nor did Henry survive many months the diet of Mentz. In his last moments (1196) the fears of superstition prevailed: but he contrived to expire in the habit of a monk, and thus disappointed the infernal spirits who might have formed some pretensions to the soul of the duke. The devotion of Conrad his eldest son is far more edifying and meritorious. The noble youth embraced the solitary life of a priest: renouncing a princely inheritance, the pride of the world, exercise of arms, and the hope of posterity. His birth and virtue must have raised him to the archbishopric of Cologne, had he not escaped from this new temptation to the Abbey of Clairvaux in France, where he pronounced the vow of a Cistercian monk, under the austere discipline of St. Bernard. Even this discipline was too soft for his increasing fervour; he undertook a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and buried himself in the cell of an hermit of the desert. The decay of his health, which had been broken by immoderate penance, compelled him to return: he found a grave at Bari on the sea coast of Italy; his memory is still revered by the people; and in the present century (1722) the relics of St. Conrad have been carried in procession to obtain from heaven the blessing of seasonable rain.

As the eldest son was dead to the world, the feudal and allodial estates were divided between the two surviving brothers, Henry the Proud and Guelph VIII.; but the right of primogeniture was considered, and Henry alone, in his twenty-fifth year, succeeded to the title and office of Duke of Bavaria. His character may be estimated by the first acts of his government in the provincial diet of Ratisbon; every complaint was heard, every wrong redressed, every crime punished; and the civil judge was protected by the military commander. In a circuit round the province he reconciled the quarrels of his vassals, and exacted the most effectual sureties of oaths and pledges for the suspension of private war; the castles of the disobedient were demolished, their persons were proscribed, and Bavaria enjoyed a respite of ten years (1126—1136) from the disorders of the feudal system. The duke had levied a tax on the citizens of Ratisbon, but the produce was surely inadequate to the expense of a stone bridge of fifteen arches, which he constructed over the deep and rapid stream of the Danube. Churches and convents are the monuments of the middle age; and a work of public use attests the sense as well as the riches of the founder.

The marriage of Gertrude, the daughter and heiress of the Emperor Lothaire, with Henry the Proud, was not accomplished till after his father's death; but it may be presumed that his desertion of a brother-in-law for a stranger was purchased by by the hope or promise of this valuable alliance. The nuptial feast was celebrated, in the summer, (1126) on the banks of a pleasant river: the spacious meadows were covered with tents and edifices of timber, and the scene might have presented a pleasing and pastoral image, if the sound of arms, the riot of intemperance, and the pride of rank could have been excluded from an assembly of German nobles. A general invitation attracted twenty or thirty thousand guests; the princes, barons, and knights, their numerous retinues, and the crowd of meaner spectators; and the festival was continued several weeks by the profuse hospitality of the bridegroom, who bore away the prize in all the tournaments of chivalry. In the rising troubles of the empire the services of the Duke of Bavaria recommended him to the confidence and gratitude of his august father (1126—1135). The Ghibelline brothers rose in arms against the successful candidate, and Conrad accepted the title of King; their adherents were numerous in Italy and Germany, and they seduced the fidelity of Albert, Archbishop of Mentz, the master-mover in the election of Lothaire. "Embrace the prelate, (says Henry in a private letter,) but trust him not. Honey is on his lips, but his heart is filled with the blackest gall." The sword of the Duke of Bavaria was not less useful than his political sagacity; and Lothaire stimulated his courage by exhorting him to march, like Judas Maccabæus, against the enemies of the Lord.

Their power extended from the Upper Danube to the Lower Rhine; the artificial strength of the province had suggested a vulgar saying, that the dukes of Swabia never moved without a castle at their horse's tail; but their best reliance was on the firm and faithful support of the cities of Spires and Ulm. The reduction of these cities may be ascribed to the valour and conduct of the Guelphic prince: he surprized and vanquished his uncle Frederic who was advancing to the relief of Spires; and the walls, even the buildings of Ulm were levelled to the ground by his irresistible assault. After a series of losses and defeats the Ghibelline brothers resigned their pretensions, and implored their pardon, and Lothaire, without a rival, was acknowledged sole monarch of the German Empire.

From Lothaire II., and his consort Richenza, the inheritance of Brunswick would legally descend to their daughter, whose husband, the Duke of Bavaria, already enjoyed in right of his mother the Saxon patrimony of the House of Billing. Before his accession their ducal office had been exercised by the emperor himself: he now wished to devolve it on some faithful client; and what client could be more faithful than his adoptive son? The Guelphs, by their female alliance, possessed a natural command on the banks of the Elbe and Weser; the genius of Henry the Proud was equal to the double administration of Saxony and Bavaria; precedents might be found of a similar lar union; and the complaint of pluralities was over-ruled by affection and silenced by authority. Few Christian kings in the twelfth century could vie with the power and dominion of the Duke of Saxony and Bavaria, Supreme Governor of the Danish, Slavic, and Hungarian borders; nor was a fair occasion neglected of restoring an Italian province to the elder branch of the Marquisses of Este, and, perhaps, of Tuscany. As the representative of the Cæsars, and the King of the Lombards, Lothaire II. contested the illegitimate donation of the Countess Matilda to the Roman Church; but he accepted, as a compromise, the investiture of her patrimony, which was widely diffused from the Adriatic and the Po to the Tiber and the Tuscan sea. An annual quit-rent of one hundred marks of silver declared the supremacy of the pope, and the reversion was granted to Henry the Proud on condition that he should swear fidelity and perform homage to the Apostolic See. The fortunate Henry was now raised above the level of a subject: he is addressed by his august father as the presumptive heir of the monarchy, and had Lothaire returned victorious from the Apulian war, a loyal diet might have gratified his wish in the election of a successor. The House of Brunswick might at this day be seated on the throne of Germany; and if the sense and spirit of the Guelphs had kept inviolate their hereditary domains, they might have rekindled the lustre of the Imperial Crown, and asserted the prerogatives of Otho and Charlemagne.

While

While Lothaire II. accomplished the indispensable pilgrimage of his Roman coronation, his son-in-law was left behind to maintain peace or to prosecute war in the Teutonic kingdom (1133). In a second expedition, the Emperor prepared to vindicate the altar and the throne from the schism of an anti-pope, and the rebellion of a King of Sicily. The powers of Germany obeyed his summons (1136); fifteen hundred knights and men at arms marched under the banner of the Duke of Saxony and Bavaria; Henry the Proud appeared as the second person in the host; the Italians beheld their future sovereign; and instead of the cold service of a vassal or mercenary, he displayed the active consciousness that he was labouring for himself. On the first descent from the Rhætian Alps the great grandson of the Marquis Azo stormed the castles of the lakes and mountains, visited the patrimony of his fathers, and granted, as the superior lord, the fief of Este to his cousins of the younger branch. From Verona to Turin, and from Turin to Ravenna, he led or followed the royal standard, oppressed the proud, interceded for the prostrate, and subscribed the feudal laws, which Lothaire promulgated in the Diet of Roncaglia. After celebrating the festival of Christmas, the Emperor (1137) divided his forces; with the main body he marched along the Adriatic coast into the heart of Apulia, while Henry the Proud passed the Apennine at the head of three thousand German horse. The bishops and magistrates who had had been expelled by popular insurrection were reinstated by his arms: Florence was besieged, Lucca was pardoned: he inflamed the territory and burst the gates of Sienna: the provinces were reduced; and to his Saxon and Bavarian honours Henry added a third title of Duke of Tuscany. As the vassal of St. Peter he conducted Pope Innocent II. from the synod of Pisa to the siege of Bari, a march of five hundred miles through a schismatic people, an hostile country, a line of fortified towns, and the garrisons of Normans and Saracens in the service of Roger, King of Sicily. The powers of Henry were inadequate to the siege of Rome; but in his progress to the south, the abbey of Mount Cassin, the principality of Capua, and the ecclesiastical province of Beneventum were compelled to acknowledge their lawful governors. In the most perilous assaults his Germans were guided, and rallied, and checked by the hand of a master, and against the pontiff himself his vassal presumed to vindicate the rights of conquest and of the empire. After the interview of Lothaire and Innocent, the Teutonic army moved from the Upper to the Lower sea; the prudent valour of the Duke was equally conspicuous in the successful sieges of Bari and Salerno, and he might claim an ample share in the glory of his father, whose epitaph proclaims that he had driven the infidels from the continent of Italy.

But these conquests were preserved only in the epitaph which was speedily to be inscribed on the sepulchre sepulchre of Lothaire. An Apulian summer had melted the strength of the hardy Germans; their retreat was spiritless and slow, and the Emperor, who felt the decay of life, had scarcely descended from the Alps when he expired (Dec. 3, 1137,) in a nameless village of Bavaria, leaving the possession of Saxony and the hope of the empire to his adoptive son. The claims of Henry were founded on the superior advantages of merit and fortune. But the epithet of the proud betrays a vice in his character most offensive to a free-born people: and his monopoly of power alarmed the jealousy of his peers who were apprehensive that the lord of so many provinces might subvert the balance of the constitution. The conspiracy of the ecclesiastical and secular princes was encouraged by the policy of Rome, alike unmindful of ancient injuries and recent services. The Guelphs, who represented the House of Saxony, were sacrificed to the heirs of the Ghibelline or Franconian line; and the ambitious Conrad, who had abdicated the royal title, again ascended the steps of the throne (1138). An hasty, irregular meeting, anticipated the summons and the forms of election, but their choice was ratified by the consent of the nation. The Empress dowager Richenza and her Saxon vassals were compelled to attend the diet, and to renounce the cause of their own candidate. Even Henry himself desisted from the fruitless contest, and the imperial ornaments which he had received from his dying father were delivered with many a sigh, sigh, after many a delay, into the hands of a rival. A barbarous people is attached to visible symbols: nor could the Germans acknowledge their lawful sovereign unless they beheld the crown and sceptre, the sword and the lance, which had been consecrated by ancient use and popular superstition.

But the pride and power of Henry could neither stoop to obey nor expect to be forgiven. The question was agitated whether two duchies could legally be vested in the same person, and it was soon decided in the negative by those who wished to oppress, and those who aspired to succeed the reigning duke. Perhaps Henry might have been allowed to retain either Saxony or Bavaria: but his spirit scorned the ignominious option: his refusal was interpreted as a crime; by the sentence of revenge, envy and avarice assembled in a diet, he was stripped of all his possessions, and the head of the rebel was proscribed with the tremendous ceremonies which accompany the ban of the empire. The duchies of Saxony and Bavaria were respectively granted to their first and most powerful vassals, to Albert the Bear, Margrave of Brandenburgh, and to Leopold, Margrave of Austria. Leopold was the half-brother of the Emperor, and as the father of Albert had married a younger daughter of Duke Magnus, he disputed with the Guelphs the inheritance of the house of Billing. Bavaria, from the impulse of fear or affection, submitted on the first approach of the Austrians, and so rapid was the revolution, so universally was he deserted, that Henry the Proud, with only four folfollowers, escaped from the banks of the Danube to those of the Weser and the Elbe. There indeed he made a vigorous and successful stand. Richenza embraced her daughter, and appealed to her fathers: the Saxons were impatient of a foreign master, the allodial estates of Brunswick and Luneburgh poured forth a swarm of soldiers; and no sooner had they recovered from their first astonishment, than the Guelphic vassals of Swabia and Bavaria resorted in crowds to the standard of their lord. The son-in-law of Lothaire found an army, and that army had a general; his pride was stimulated by shame and resentment; the Bear fled before the Lion, (I use the quaint language of the age,) and Albert of Brandenburgh sought a refuge in the court of his benefactor. Exasperated by this haughty defiance, Conrad himself marched against the rebel at the head of a royal army: but on a nearer survey of his strength the Emperor halted, doubtful of the event; a parley was sounded, a negociation was opened, a diet was announced. In a general, perhaps a more impartial assembly, Henry prepared to defend the justice of his cause by arguments as well as by arms, when, after a short illness in his thirty-seventh year (1139) his worldly contentions were terminated by the hand of death. A death thus premature, thus sudden, thus seasonable, might awaken suspicions of poison: and these suspicions have been propagated and believed by the zeal of party: but they are not justified by the character of the times, of the nation, or of the personal adversaries of the Duke

Duke of Saxony. The Germans of the twelfth century might be often cruel, but they were seldom perfidious.

After the decease of Henry the Proud, (1139) the eldest hope of the Guelphic line reposed on his only son, the third Henry, an orphan of ten years of age, who afterwards claimed the royal appellation of the LION, either from his father, his character, or his armorial ensigns. The personal resentments which had been excited by the pride of the late duke might be disarmed by the tender innocence of his successor; but political enemies, and some of them were bishops, are rarely moved by generosity or compassion, and the young Lion must have been caught in the toils had not his brave and faithful Saxons defended with persevering arms the child of the nation. His grand-mother Richenza, a woman as it should seem of sense and spirit, possessed the affection, and assumed the regency of the country: but her daughter Gertrude, a blooming and impatient widow, was too soon (1141) persuaded to form an hostile connexion, and her second marriage with Henry, Margrave of Austria, the brother and successor of Leopold, appeared to countenance the usurpation of Bavaria. Yet this alliance was productive of a truce and a treaty, and the son of Gertrude, renouncing by his mother's advice the Bavarian duchy, was acknowledged as Duke of Saxony by the Emperor and empire; a specious act, which ensured some years of domestic peace, without any material injury to the right of the minor. The education of Henry the the Lion was that of a Saxon and a soldier, to support the inclemency of the seasons, to disdain the temptations of luxury, to manage the horse and the lance, to contend with his equals in the exercise of military and even civil virtues, and to disguise the superior gifts of fortune, perhaps of nature, by the winning graces of modesty and gentleness. At eighteen (1147) the Duke of Saxony and, as he still deemed himself, of Bavaria, was introduced at the diet of Frankfort into an assembly of men and princes; and the recent institution of knighthood supplied the national custom of delivering the sword and spear to a noble youth. Europe was then agitated by the preparations of the second crusade: the Emperor Conrad and the King of France had listened to the voice of St. Bernard, and while the flame of enthusiasm was kindled in every martial bosom, the spirit of Henry would prompt him to march, and might lead him to perish in the dangerous adventure. But the northern states of Germany, with their allies of Denmark and Poland, preferred an holy warfare less remote, more beneficial, and equally meritorious, against the idolatrous Slavi of the Baltic coast; and one hundred and sixty thousand soldiers of Christ were speedily enrolled to convert or exterminate his enemies. The Duke of Saxony, with a numerous body of his vassals and subjects, unfurled the banner of the cross; and although this first campaign was neither successful nor glorious, he shewed himself on a splendid theatre to the Christians and Pagans of the North. After the the return of the Emperor from the Holy Land, Henry the Lion endeavoured, without success, to wrest Bavaria from his Austrian competitor; but while he was detained on the Danube, a messenger announced that Conrad had entered Saxony with a great army. "Command my vassals (replied the dauntless chief) to assemble at Brunswick: on Christmas-day they shall find me at their head." The term was short, the distance was long, the passes were guarded; yet the Duke was faithful to his appointment. Disguising his person, with only three attendants, he darted swift and secret through the hostile country, appeared on the fifth day in the camp of Brunswick, and forced his imperial adversary to sound a precipitate retreat. (1150.)

During the minority of Henry, a valiant uncle, Guelph VIII. asserted in arms the cause of his nephew: but if the proscription of the father and the renunciation of the son were admitted as legal acts, he claimed Bavaria as the patrimony of his ancestors. His reasons were specious; his troops were drawn from the hereditary estates of Swabia and Italy; the subsidies of the Kings of Sicily and Hungary fomented the rebellion; he often prevailed in the battles and sieges of a ten years war; and if Guelph was sometimes crushed by the weight of imperial power his invincible spirit rose more terrible from every defeat. It was at one of these battles that the contending shouts of Hye Guelph! Hye Ghibelline! produced the names of the two factions so famous afterwards and so fatal in the annals of Italy. It was in one of these sieges that a splendid example was displayed of conjugal tenderness and faith. As an offended sovereign, Conrad had refused all terms of capitulation to the garrison of Winesberg; but as a courteous knight he permitted the women to depart with such of their precious effects as they themselves could transport. The gates of the town were thrown open; and a long procession of matrons, each bearing a husband, or at least a man, on her shoulders, passed in safety through the applauding camp. This moral story, which is told (if I am not mistaken) by the spectator, may be supported, however, by ancient evidence: but the wife of Guelph, the Duchess Ita, must be excluded from the honourable list; since her husband was actually in the field, attempting with insufficient forces the relief of Winesberg. After seven campaigns, (1140—1147,) these destructive hostilities were suspended by the engagement of the rival chiefs in the second crusade; but no sooner had they reached Constantinople, than Guelph, under the pretence of sickness, deserted the service of the holy sepulchre. He returned by sea; and, after a secret conspiracy with the King of Sicily and the senators of Rome, passed through Italy, descended from the Alps, and resumed an impious war against the absent servants of the cross. In the battle of Flocberg (1150) against Henry, the son of Conrad, he strove to cover the retreat of his fainting troops; their heavy armour protected them from mortal wounds; but three hundred hundred of his knights were made prisoners; the treatment of their leader, a supposed captive, was debated in the Emperor's council, and his triumph was announced to the east and west. The captive, alas! was still free and vigorous, and obstinate. Instead of suing for pardon, he stipulated a treaty (1151); and the favours of the court were the reward of his long opposition. But the mind of Guelph was still hostile to the persecutors of his family, and he joined with his peers, who refused to attend their unpopular sovereign in his Roman pilgrimage.

After the decease of Conrad, the unanimous election of his nephew Frederic Barbarossa (1152) appeared to open a new prospect of concord and peace. The aspiring monarch, who already grasped the kingdoms of Italy, embraced the Margrave of Austria and the Guelphic princes as his friends and kinsmen, and sincerely laboured to terminate their Bavarian quarrel by an amicable compromise, or a judicial sentence. The claimant pressed a speedy decision; but the actual possessor interposed so many evasions and delays, that the final settlement was postponed till the Emperor should return from his Roman coronation. Frederic passed the Alps with a court and army not unworthy of the successor of Charlemagne (1154): the uncle and the nephew were desirous of showing their power and proving their loyalty, and the gallant squadrons that marched under the banner of the Lion were equal in number to those of the Emperor himself. From the siege of Tortona and the camp of Milan, in which the name of Henry is mentioned with honour, I hasten to the Vatican, (1155). A transient harmony prevailed between the spiritual and temporal monarchs of Christendom: but the imperial crown had scarcely been placed on the head of Frederic, when the alarm-bell rang from the Capitol, and the august rites were disturbed by an assault of the Romans from the bridge St. Angelo. The Germans stood in arms, and battle-array; after a conflict of some hours, they slew or drove into the river a thousand rebels, without losing a single man; and the glory of the day was ascribed to the Duke of Saxony, who fought in the foremost ranks. At his entreaty the Pope relaxed the strictness of ecclesiastical discipline: the Emperor declared him the firmest pillar of his throne; and as Frederic was young and brave he might express the genuine feelings of affection and esteem. On his first entrance into Italy, Henry had exercised the rights of primogeniture and dominion, in renewing the preceding grants to his cousins the Marquisses of Este. The son of Cunegonde was many years older than the children of Garsenda: and the descendant of the former was already in the fourth, while the posterity of the latter was only in the second, degree from their common parent.

Without involving Germany in a civil war, the restitution of Bavaria could no longer be delayed. The Emperor had pledged his word; the diets had pronounced their sentence; and the performance was imperiously urged by the arguments, the services, services, and the power of Henry the Lion, who had received the homage of the nobles, and the oaths and hostages of the city of Ratisbon. A fair compensation, however, was yielded to his father-in-law, the uncle of Frederic Barbarossa, as soon as he desisted from a possession of eighteen years; and the agreement, which had been discussed in many private assemblies, was consummated by a public ceremony in the plain of Ratisbon (1156). Henry, Margrave of Austria, resigned the seven banners, or symbols, of the Bavarian duchy, into the hands of the Emperor, who delivered them to Henry the Lion: but the Guelphic prince immediately returned two of these banners which were used by Frederic in the investiture of his uncle. The Margrave of Austria was created an independent duke: his territories, with the addition of three neighbouring counties, were for ever enfranchised from the dominion of Bavaria: the right of succession was extended to his female heirs, and his extraordinary privileges seemed to raise him above a subject of the empire. By this act the circle of the Duke of Bavaria was circumscribed: but the bishops of the province still attended his courts; and he stretched a real or nominal jurisdiction over the three remaining marches of Tirol, Styria, and Istria, as far as the shores of the Adriatic gulf.

After his return to allegiance, Guelph VIII. had been content with the vague appellation of Duke, till it was fixed and realized by the acquisition of the Italian provinces, in which his elder brother, his uncle, and perhaps his more distant ancestors, had formerly reigned. From the liberality of his nephew, Frederic Barbarossa, (1153,) he received the titles and possessions of Duke of Spoleto, Marquis of Tuscany, Prince of Sardinia, and Lord of the house or patrimony of the Countess Matilda, against whose donation, as the heir of her second husband, he might lawfully protest. Her allodial estates on either bank of the Po, on either side of the Apennine had been dilapidated by waste and rapine; but the power of the Emperor, and the prudence of Guelph, reduced them into the form of a well regulated and productive domain. At the head of a strong army he performed the circuit of the Duchy and the Marquisate; invested seven Counts with as many banners; garrisoned the castles with his faithful vassals, dictated his charters to his own notaries, revived in his parliaments the authority of the royal laws, and bridled, with a firm hand, the ambitious independence of the Tuscan cities. Pisa alone was a free and flourishing republic: but the Pisans, in every division, adhered to the Emperor; they respected the dignity of his Lieutenant, and it was only through the medium of their maritime conquests that Guelph could assume the title of Prince of Sardinia.

The prosperity of Henry the Lion had now reached its summit, and he might justly fear the revolution of the descending wheel. A sovereign, the most opulent and fortunate of his age, was reduced to the state of a culprit, a suppliant, an exile; and the last fifteen years of his life (1180 1195,) 1195,) exemplified the sage remark of antiquity, that no man should be pronounced happy before the hour of his death.

To the resentment, legitimate or unjust, of the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa, the cause of his ruin must be ascribed. The long union of these princes had been apparently cemented by a singular conformity: they had both passed the middle season of life without any male posterity. On both sides they entertained and encouraged a fond hope of surviving and inheriting; but amidst their professions and professions, each was tempted to hate and despise the other for indulging the same wish which he secretly cherished in his own bosom. The Duke of Saxony was first awakened from this dream of ambition, and his prospects were blasted by the birth (1165) of a royal infant, who at the age of four years was crowned King of Germany and heir apparent of the Roman Empire. Such a natural event, such a just exclusion might disappoint a presumptive successor; but he could loudly complain of the avarice and treachery of his friend, who grasped with disingenuous arts the inheritance of their common uncle. I have already enumerated the titles and possessions of Guelph VIII. who reigned in the middle provinces of Italy, and aspired to found in its native soil a second dynasty of the house of Este-Brunswick. His designs were seconded by the fair promise of a son, the ninth and last of his respectable name. The youth was educated in the arts of policy and war; during his father's absence beyond the sea or the mountains, he supported the weight of government; and his firm humanity protected the Italian subjects against the rapine and violence of the German soldiers. But this new Marcellus was only shewn to the world. The father had retired to the banks of the Danube, apprehensive of losing the merit of a pilgrimage in the guilt of a schism: the son was permitted to lead his forces and to follow the Emperor: but Guelph IX. perished in this unfortunate campaign, a premature victim not of the enemy's sword, but of the epidemical disease which swept away so many thousands at the siege of Rome. After this irreparable loss the Tuscan prince considered Henry the Lion as the sole representative of the Guelphic name: a will was drawn in favour of his nephew; but as the Cæsar of the twelfth century was always prodigal and often poor, he required, for the assurance of so many provinces, the grateful retribution of a gift, a loan, or a fine. The demand could not be refused, but the ill-timed parsimony of the new Cato so long hesitated, that the peevish old man was offended by the hesitation which bespoke a doubt of his honour or the expectation of his speedy death. So fair an opportunity of supplanting his cousin was seized by the vigilant and dexterous Frederic; he stepped forwards with an immediate offer of the money; the offer was eagerly accepted; the pride of family yielded to the impulse of passion, and Guelph VIII. surrendered to a Ghibelline heir, all his feudal and allodial estates in Italy and Swabia, reserving only the the enjoyment of them during his own life. The mortification of Henry was embittered by a tardy sense of his own folly; his wounded spirit was inflamed by fresh injuries and new suspicions, and he accused the Emperor of tampering with his servants to betray their trust and deliver his castles, as soon as they should hear of their master's death or his pilgrimage to the Holy Land.

While this deep animosity rankled in his breast, Henry the Lion was summoned (1174) to attend the Emperor beyond the Alps, and to draw his sword against the rebels of Lombardy. He disobeyed the summons, and his disobedience might be justified by the spirit of the times and of the constitution. The strict military duty of a vassal was confined to the defence of Germany, and the imperial coronation at Rome. At the coronation of Frederic, the Duke had signalized his valour and fidelity. In a second voluntary expedition he had freely exposed his person and his troops; but he could not submit to be the perpetual slave of obstinacy and ambition, to join in the oppression of an innocent and injured people, to persecute a Pope who was acknowledged by the greatest part of Christendom, and to prepare, by the conquest of Italy, the future servitude of his country. The complaint of age and infirmity may seem ill-adapted to the ripe manhood of forty-six years; but a soldier might express no dishonourable fear of the climate, the diseases, and perhaps the poison which had been fatal to the bravest of his nation and family. The government of the two great duchies of of Saxony and Bavaria, engaged the full attention of Henry the Lion, and his Slavic labours in war and peace were an ample discharge of his debt to the church and state. Such reasons are specious, such scruples might be sincere; but he debased their value by offering to accept as the reward of his military service the city of Goslar, which would have given him the exclusive command of the silver mines. Frederic disdained to pay this exorbitant price, but he soon repented of his disdain: Milan had arisen from its ashes, the league of Lombardy was powerful and united; a ruinous winter was consumed in the siege, or rather blockade of Alexandria; his Germans fainted, his Bohemians retired, and his spirit was reduced to implore the aid of an enemy who smiled at his distress. The two princes had an interview at Chiavenna, near the lake of Como. Henry was still cold and inexorable, and after trying every mode of argument and prayer, the Emperor, such is the meanness of ambition, threw himself at the feet of his vassal. The unrelenting vassal, with secret joy and apparent confusion, raised his sovereign from the ground; but he listened without displeasure to a loud whisper of one of his attendants, "Suffer, dread sir, the imperial crown to lie at your feet, speedily it must be placed on your head." Some vague professions of loyalty faintly coloured the denial and departure of the Duke, and the Empress who had been an indignant witness of the scene, addressed her husband in the vehemence of female passion, "Remember member what has passed, and God will remember it one day!" The admonition was needless, at least for the temporal monarch. All his subsequent misfortunes, the failure before Alexandria (1175), the loss of the battle of Lignano, (1176), the ignominious treaty of Venice (1177), were imputed to the desertion of Henry the Lion; and the Emperor accused him in a public assembly of an indirect conspiracy against his life and honour.

After the revolt of Italy the genius and fortune of Frederic still commanded the obedience of the Germans; and the ruin of the Guelphic house was the first aim of his policy and revenge. The pride of Henry has been arraigned for refusing an act of oblivion at the moderate price of five thousand marks of silver; but such a fine would have been a confession of guilt rather than a pledge of safety; and the artful Ghibelline, after sacrificing his private resentments, would have maintained the character of an inflexible judge.

In the portraits of the uncle and the nephew, of Guelph VIII., and Henry the Lion, a contemporary (1158) has presumed to borrow the pencil of Sallust; and Radevic observes with satisfaction, that the sublime characters of Cæsar and Cato had been revived in his own age. Such indeed was the difference of the times and the countries that the comparison could not be very perfect or precise: the Cato of the twelfth century could not be animated by the patriotism of a citizen and the philosophy of a Stoic: nor could the new Cæsar possess possess the universal genius which aspired and deserved to be the first of mankind. Yet the milder Guelph might be endowed with an amiable facility of giving and forgiving, while the more rigid Henry affected the useful virtues of patience, constancy, and justice. The tone of panegyric, the propensity of human nature, and the lives of the two heroes, will even prompt a suspicion that their dissimilar merits degenerated into the opposite faults; that the boundless indulgence of the uncle was often careless and profuse; and that the inflexible severity of the nephew was not always exempt from harshness and pride. By those who may have seen Henry the Lion, he is described with black eyes and hair, of a majestic countenance, middle stature, and muscular strength. His nobility, riches and power were extraneous accidents; but the Duke of Saxony and Bavaria stood near thirty years (1150—1180) in a lofty station, the second only in dignity and renown to one of the most illustrious of the German emperors.

In the rudeness of the middle age, the task of government required rather a strong than a skilful hand. Servile labour and blind obedience were imposed on the people: the clergy exercised a separate jurisdiction; and the nobles demanded only a judge and a leader, who himself followed the court and the standard of his supreme lord. The provinces of Henry the Lion extended to the foot of the Alps, and the shores of the Baltic; his civil and religious duties transported him beyond the the mountains and the sea: yet so rapid was his motion, so vigorous his command, that the absent prince was still present to the hopes of his subjects and the fears of his enemies. His valour had been signalized at Rome: in the second expedition of Frederic into Italy, the distress, or at least the difficulties of the Emperor, were relieved by the welcome arrival of the Guelphic troops: the Tuscans and Swabians of the uncle, the Bavarians and Saxons of the nephew, almost doubled his army: and their seasonable succour determined the success of the siege of Crema, one of the most desperate actions of the war of Lombardy. Henry visited Bavaria as often as he was called (and he was often called) to redress injuries and pacify tumults; and the foundation of Munich is a flourishing proof of his discernment and munificence. But Henry kept his principal residence in Saxony: Brunswick was his capital: the statue of a lion commemorates his name and dominion; he fortified the city with a ditch and wall; and, according to the balance of attack and defence, such fortifications might afford a respectable protection. The silver mines of the Hartz, which have been improved by his successors, were already worked by his peasants, and in the scarcity of precious metals, this singular advantage rendered him one of the richest sovereigns in Europe. Jealous or envious of his greatness, the ecclesiastic and secular princes conspired on all sides against the Saxon Duke: from Bremen and Cologne to Magdeburgh they successively fell before him; and a sentence of the diet diet pronounced the injustice of their fallen arms (1166.) A King of Denmark was expelled by two competitors: he had acknowledged the supremacy of the empire; and the eloquence of prayers or of gold prevailed on Henry to vindicate his cause. The Duke passed the wall of the limits (1156), pillaged the city of Sleswick, and advanced fourteen days march into the country: the approach of the Danes, the want of provisions, or the holy season of Lent compelled him to retreat; but the vessels of his Slavic subjects transported Sweno to the isles, and the fugitive was reinstated in a third part of his kingdom. After the reunion of the Danish monarchy, Henry contracted a public and private alliance with Waldemar I.: these ambitious princes had several personal interviews; and their confederate arms invaded by sea and land the Slavic idolaters of the Baltic coast.

The alternative of death or baptism had formerly been proposed to the Saxon ancestors of Henry the Lion. He presented the same alternative to the idolatrous Slavi, and a superstitious age applauded the triumph of the Catholic hero. At the end of ten years (1160—1170) of an holy war, interrupted however by some truces, the powerful and obstinate tribe of the Obotrites, who occupied the present duchy of Mecklenburgh, were reduced to accept the laws and religion of the conqueror. In the open field, in fair battle, they could not struggle with the arms and discipline of the Germans; and such rude bulwarks as the natives could raise were soon overthrown by the engines engines that had been used in the sieges of Italy. But they often prevailed in the surprise and stratagems of excursive hostility; and the traces of their footsteps were lost in the impervious woods and morasses which overspread the face of the country. On the sea they were dexterous and daring pirates; and unless the mouths of the rivers were carefully guarded, they manned their light brigantines, and ravaged with impunity the isles of Denmark and the adjacent coasts. To the first summons, Niclot, King or great prince of the Obotrites, returned an answer of ironical submission, that he would adore Henry, and that Henry, if he pleased, might adore his Christ; a profane mockery, since the pagans themselves reconciled the worship of idols with the belief of a supreme deity. After the failure of a sally, the barbarian upbraided the effeminacy of his two sons: it was incumbent on him to upbraid them by his own success; but he fell in the rash attempt; his head, as a grateful present, was sent to the Danish King; and a third son, who served in the Christian army, applauded with savage zeal the justice of his father's punishment. The two brothers, Pribislaus and Wertislaus, succeeded to the command, and delayed the servitude of the nation. In the siege of their most important fortress, the elder hovered round the Saxon camp, while the younger assumed the more dangerous task of defending the place. After refusing an honourable capitulation, Wertislaus threw himself on the mercy of the conqueror, who sent the royal captive to Brunswick, ignominiously bound in fetters fetters of iron. A treaty soon placed him in the more responsible situation of an hostage: the Obotrites, perhaps by his secret instigation, again rose in arms; but Wertislaus himself was the victim of rebellion, and as soon as the Duke of Saxony entered the Slavic territory, he shewed the King hanging on a gibbet. This act of cruelty may perhaps be justified by the maxims of war or policy: but if the Duke appealed to the recent massacre of Mecklenburgh, the rebels perhaps might plead the retaliation of some prior injuries. The fortune of the younger brother was less disastrous; after a brave defence of his country and his gods, Pribislaus submitted, like Witikind, to the yoke of necessity, and embraced, with apparent sincerity, the religion and manners of the victorious Germans. Henry, who esteemed his valour, restored to the Christian vassals the greatest part of the dominions which he had wrested from the pagan adversary; and the reigning family of the dukes of Mecklenburgh is lineally descended from Pribislaus, the last king of the Obotrites. The Slavic provinces beyond the Elbe were possessed by Henry the Lion, not as a portion of the Germanic empire, but as an absolute and independent conquest which he alone had been able to achieve. The Guelphic duke was styled the prince of princes, and legislator of nations, and the three new bishops of the Obotrites received from his hand their pastoral crosier, a prerogative which Rome had denied to the emperors themselves.

I observe with a mixture of pain and pleasure the the beneficial consequences of war and persecution. The improvement of agriculture and the arts alleviated in some degree the servitude of the Christian proselytes. The Saxon castles of Henry and his vassals were gradually incorporated into flourishing towns. By the institutions of churches and convents the first rays of knowledge were diffused; and from Holland, Flanders, and Westphalia, the vacant desert was replenished with industrious colonies who have almost extinguished the manners and language of the Slavic race. The foundation of Lubeck is a memorable event in the history of commerce. Near the mouth of the river Trave, that falls into the Baltic, that convenient station had been discovered and used by some Christian merchants: but their infant settlement was repeatedly destroyed by fire, and the sword of the Pagans: and its progress was discouraged by the jealousy of Henry the Lion, till he had acquired (1157) from his vassal, the Count of Holstein, the absolute and immediate property of the soil. Under the shadow of his power, Lubeck arose on a broad and permanent basis: the establishment of a mint and a custom-house declared the riches and the hopes of the sovereign: the seat of a bishop was transferred to the rising city; and the grant of a municipal government secured the personal, and prepared the political liberty of the burghers. The proclamation of the Duke of Saxony to the Danes and Norwegians, the Swedes and Russians, discovers a liberal knowledge of the advantages of trade and the methods of encouragement. They are invited to frequent his harbour of Wisby, with the assurance that the ways shall be open and secure by land and water; that they shall be hospitably entertained and may freely depart; that the imposition of duties shall be light and easy: that their persons and property shall be guarded from injury; and that in case of death the effects of a stranger shall be carefully preserved for the benefit of his heirs. The charter of Henry to the merchants of the isle of Gothland is still extant; the first outline of the maritime code of Wisby, as famous in the Baltic as the Rhodian laws had been formerly in the Mediterranean. This judicious policy was rewarded with a large and rapid increase: but the arts of cultivation have far less energy and effect than the spontaneous vigour of nature and freedom. The commerce and navigation of his favourite colony increased with her growing independence, and before the end of the thirteenth century, Lubeck became the metropolis of the sixty-four cities of the Hanseatic league. That singular republic, so widely scattered, and so loosely connected, was in possession, above two hundred years, of the respect of kings, the naval dominion of the Baltic, the Herring fishery, and the monopoly of a lucrative trade. Novogorod in Russia, Bergen in Norway, London in England, and Bruges in Flanders were their four principal factories or staples. The large ships of their numerous and annual fleets exported all the productions of the North, and sailed homewards richly laden with the precious commodities and manufactures of the southern climates. Lubeck, an imperial city, was soon enfranchised from the dominion of the House of Brunswick; but Henry the Lion was revered as a founder; and his great grandson, Duke Albert, obtained from Henry III. (1266) the first English charter of the Hanseatic towns.

The baptism, or the blood, of so many thousand pagans might have expiated the sins of the Catholic hero: but his conscience was still unsatisfied, his salvation was still doubtful, and it was in the fairest season of victory and peace (1172) that he accomplished the fashionable devotion of a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. His first attendant Pribislaus, King of the Obotrites, exhibited to the world his own faith and the fame of the conqueror: the Bishop of Worms, the imperial ambassador, accompanied him as far as Constantinople; several eminent persons of the clergy and nobility imitated his example; their followers were numerous: a train of horses and waggons transported the baggage and provisions, and the camp was guarded by twelve hundred knights or soldiers exercised in the use of arms. After leaving Ratisbon, and the confines of Bavaria, the Guelphic prince was kindly entertained by Henry, Duke of Austria, their former differences were buried in oblivion, and they mingled their tears at the tomb of a mother and a wife. Hungary was the kingdom of a Christian ally; and the journey was continued by land and water from Vienna to Belgrade: the duke preferred the more easy, though perilous, navigation of the Danube; but his progress was measured by the march of the caravan which joined him every evening on the banks of the river. From Belgrade to Nissa he painfully advanced through the woods and morasses of Servia and Bulgaria, whose wild inhabitants, the nominal subjects of Christ and the Greek emperor, were more inclined to claim the privilege of rapine, than to exercise the laws of hospitality: they attacked his camp in the night; their feeble arms were repelled by his vigilance, and his genuine piety disdained the temptation of revenge. In the journey between Nissa and Constantinople, the way-worn pilgrims enjoyed the comforts of a civilized and friendly province, and the Emperor Manuel, who had sent an embassy to Brunswick, received Henry as the equal of kings. The wealth and luxury of the Byzantine court were ostentatiously displayed, and after the pleasures of the chace and banquet, the Saxon or his chaplains disputed with the Greeks on the procession of the Holy Ghost. The friendship of the two princes was confirmed by mutual gifts, and the Russian furs were, perhaps, overbalanced by the horses and arms, the scarlet cloth and fine linen of Germany. A stout ship was provided for the duke and his peculiar retinue, and the voyage from Constantinople to St. John of Acre, on the coast of Palestine, was disturbed by a storm, and is embellished by a miracle. After a short journey by land he reached Jerusalem, and was saluted in solemn procession by the patriarch and the military orders. Henry the Lion visited the holy sepulchre and all the customary places places of devotion in the city and country: the churches were adorned with the silver of the Saxon mines; and he presented the Templars with a thousand marks for the service of their perpetual crusade. Palestine applauded his liberal and magnanimous spirit, and had he not been prevented by secret jealousies, his valour might have been felt by the Turks and Saracens.

In his return by a different way the Duke of Saxony was actuated by motives of convenience rather than of curiosity. He followed the sea coast of Syria to the northward: from the harbour of Seleucia or St. Simeon the vessels of the Prince of Antioch transplanted him over the gulf to the river of Tarsus in Cilicia; and by this short passage he escaped the territories of a faithless Emir. From Tarsus to Constantinople his march intersected in a diagonal line the extent of Asia Minor: the mountains were of laborious ascent; the sandy plain was destitute of water and provisions; the more populous country was full of danger, suspicion, and Mahometan zeal: and Henry was the only pilgrim who, as a peaceful traveller, proceeded in safety through the Turkish dominions. But the Sultan of Iconium, Kilidge Arslan II., of the race of Seljuk, watched over his safety, embraced him as a friend, praised his religion, and claimed on the mother's side a distant affinity with the House of Saxony. His presents, in the oriental style, were adapted to the accommodation and amusement of the noble stranger; a caftan or flowing robe of silk embroidery, the choice for himself and his followers of eighteen hundred horses, of whom thirty most sumptuously caparisoned were selected for his peculiar use; six tents of felt, and six camels to carry them; two well-trained leopards with the proper horses and servants for that singular mode of hunting. Such gifts might be accepted without a blush; some precious gems, more precious for the workmanship than the materials, might be honourably received from the Greek Emperor: but the duke rejected the gold and silver of the Byzantine court, declaring in a tone of lofty politeness that of such metals his own treasury was sufficiently provided. The avarice of Henry was confined to the acquisition of holy relics, and of these he imported an ample store from Palestine and Greece: but the reformation has annihilated their ideal value; the bits of wood or bone have been thrown away; and the empty cases alone are preserved for their curious and costly ornaments. The journey from Constantinople to Ratisbon and Brunswick is not marked by any accident or event. On his return home, after a year's absence (1173), the Duke of Saxony found his name illustrious, his servants faithful, his enemies silent, his dominions in a peaceful and prosperous state: and to the merits of his pilgrimage he would reasonably impute this fair prospect of public and private felicity.

Henry the Lion was twice married: but his first wife Clementia, of the ducal House of Zæringen, gave him only a daughter, who, after being long considered as an heiress, was reduced to comfort fort herself on the throne of Denmark. His desire of male posterity, the wish of vanity and ambition, at length determined Henry to solicit a divorce; some bar of remote and invisible consanguinity afforded the pretence: every defect of law or evidence was supplied by the all-sufficient oath of the emperor: the sentence was pronounced (1163) by the spiritual court of Constance: and, without any stain on her own honour or her daughter's legitimacy, Clementia found a second husband in the princely family of Savoy. The policy of Frederic Barbarossa had eagerly solicited the separation; he wished to connect himself and his friend with the most powerful and illustrious of our English kings; and the imperial ambassadors demanded Matilda, eldest daughter of Henry II., for the Duke of Saxony and Bavaria. The fame of Henry the Lion, of his birth and merit, his riches and dominion, obtained from the father an easy consent and an ample dower: the Princess Royal of England embarked for Germany with a splendid train: the marriage ceremony was performed (1168) at Minden in Westphalia; as the bride was no more than twelve years of age, the consummation was delayed, but she remained pregnant at the departure of her husband for the Holy Land. In his absence the duchess kept her court at Brunswick, and administered a nominal regency, under the guard and guidance of his most faithful servants: but her private virtues were her own; the genuine lustre of meekness, purity, and benevolence was enhanced in the popular esteem by devout prayers and frequent masses; and "she was beautified (says an historian with some elegance) by the comeliness of religion." After the return of Henry her riper age soon blessed him with a numerous progeny. Besides two, or perhaps three daughters, Matilda became the mother of four sons, Henry, Lothaire, Otho, and William, from the youngest of whom all the princes of Brunswick are lineally derived. By this alliance they number among their ancestors the Plantagenets, Counts of Anjou, the Dukes of Aquitain and Normandy, the Kings of Scotland whose origin is lost in a Highland mist, and the Kings of England, the descendants of the Saxon conquerors, who drew their fabulous pedigree from the God Woden. The male posterity of Henry II. soon withered, almost to the root: the eldest son of the Princess Matilda was the presumptive heir of his uncle King John; and after the birth of Henry III. no more than a single life, the precarious life of a boy, stood between his title and the throne of England. According to the probable order of events the children of Henry the Lion should have reigned over us five hundred years before the accession of the Hanover family.

The fair anticipation of the name of Este-Brunswick may denote the venerable stem before its separation into the German and Italian branches.

A generation of mankind, the common interval between the birth of a father and that of his son, is fixed by Herodotus at the term of about thirty-three three years, at the computation of three generations for one century. The experience of modern times has confirmed the reckoning of the Greek historian: and, though a royal marriage may be hastened for the important object of succession, yet the same rule has been verified in the families of sovereigns and subjects.* It is strictly just in the twenty-two generations and the seven hundred and sixty-six years (996—1762) which have elapsed from the birth of the Marquis Azo to that of the Prince of Wales; and if the collateral lines of Brunswick and Modena afford no more than twenty-one, and twenty generations, the difference might be explained by some peculiar circumstances of their respective history.

Twenty-two generations, seven or eight hundred years, occupy a small place even in the historical period of the world. But all greatness is relative; and there are not many pedigrees, in Europe or Asia, which can establish, by clear and contemporary proofs, a similar antiquity. If the ancestors of the Marquis Azo are lost, as they must be finally lost, in the darkness and disorder of the middle ages, it will be remembered that the use of hereditary names and armorial ensigns was unknown; that the descent of power and property was frequently violated; that few events were recorded, and that few records have been preserved. Yet human pride may draw some comfort from the reflection that the authors of the race of Este-Brunswick can never be found in a private or plebeian rank: their first appearance is with the dignity of princes; and they start at once, perfect and in arms, like Pallas from the head of Jupiter.

* See Herodotus, l. ii. c. 142. and his justification by Freret. Histoire de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xiv. p. 15—20.

flection

[The reader will probably regret, with the editor, that Mr. Gibbon did not complete this interesting disquisition—so far, at least, as to make it reach the auspicious event of the settlement of the House of Hanover on the British Throne. That the reader may not be wholly dissappointed, the editor has inserted, in this place, an Extract from Mr. Butler's Succinct History of the Geographical and Political Revolutions of the Empire of Germany, which gives some account of the House of Brunswick, from the period at which Mr. Gibbon leaves it, till the period we have mentioned, after which it is familiar to every British reader.]

"HENRY the Black was the founder of the German Principalities possessed by his family. He married Wolphidis, the sole heiress of Herman of Billung, the Duke of Saxony, and of his possessions on the Elbe. His son, Henry the Proud, married Gertrude, the heiress of the duchies of Saxony, Brunswick, and Hanover. Thus Henry the Proud,

"1st. As representing Azo, his great-grandfather,—inherited some part of the Italian possessions of the younger branch of the Estesine family: they chiefly lay on the southern side of the fall of the Po into the Adriatic:

"2d. As

" 2d. As representing Count Boniface, the father of the Princess Mechtildis—he inherited the Italian possessions of the elder branch of the Estesine family; they chiefly lay in Tuscany; some part of the possessions of the Princess Mechtildis also devolved to him:

" 3d. As representing Cunegunda, his grandmother—he inherited the possessions of the Guelphs at Altorf:

" 4th. As representing his mother, the sole heiress of Herman of Billung—he inherited the possessions of the Saxon family on the Elbe:

" 5th. And through his wife—he transmitted the duchies of Saxony, Brunswick, and Hanover.

" All these possessions descended to Henry the Lion, the son of Henry the Proud. He added to them Bavaria, on the cession of Henry Jossemargott, and Lunenburgh and Mecklenburgh by conquest. Thus he became possessed of an extensive territory,—he himself used to describe it in four German verses which have been thus translated:

" Henry the Lion is my name:
Through all the earth, I spread my fame,
For, from the Elbe, unto the Rhine,
From Hartz, unto the sea,—ALL'S MINE.

" In other words, his possessions filled a considerable portion of the territory between the Rhine, the Baltic, the Elbe, and the Tyber.

" Unfortunately for him, in the quarrels between tween the Pope and the Emperor Barbarossa, he sided with the former. The emperor confiscated his possessions, but returned him his allodial estates in Brunswick, Hanover, and Lunenburgh; he died in 1195. By his first wife he had no issue male: his second wife was Maud, the daughter of Henry the Second, King of England. By her he had several sons, all of whom died except William, called of Winchester from his being born in that city. William of Winchester had issue Otho, called Puer, or the boy.

"At the decease of Otho Puer, the partition of this illustrious house commences. The subject of these sheets leads only to the Lunenburgh branches of the Guelphic shoot of the Estesine line.

"On the death of Otho the boy, Brunswick and Lunenburgh, the only remains of the splendid possessions of his grandfather, William the Proud, were divided between his two sons, John and Albert: Lunenburgh was assigned to the former, Brunswick to the latter. Thus the former became the patriarch of, what is called, the Old House of Lunenburgh. Otho his son received Hanover as a fief from William Sigefred, the Bishop of Hildesheim. Otho had four sons; Otho his first son succeeded him, and dying without issue was succeeded by his brother William with the large feet. He died in 1369, without issue male; the two other sons of Otho the father also died without male issue.

"Thus there was a general failure of issue male of John, the patriarch of the old house of Lunenburgh.

burgh. By the influence of the Emperor Charles the Fourth, Otho, elector of Saxony, who had married Elizabeth, the daughter of William, succeeded to the duchy. He died without issue, and left it, by his will, to his uncle Winceslaus, elector of Saxony. It was contested with him by Torquatus Magnus, duke of Saxony; the contest ended in a compromise; under which Bernard, the eldest son of Torquatus Magnus, obtained it, and became the patriarch of the Middle House of Lunenburgh; he died in 1434. After several descents, it vested in Ernest of Zell, who introduced the Lutheran religion into his states.

"After his decease, his sons Henry and William for some time reigned conjointly; but William persuaded his brother to content himself with the country of Danneburgh; while he himself reigned over all the rest, and thus became the patriarch of the new House of Brunswick-Lunenburgh.

"He left seven sons; they agreed to cast lots which should marry, and to reign according to their seniority. The lot fell to George, the sixth of the sons. Frederick was the survivor of them.

"On his decease, the duchy descended to Ernest Augustus, the son of George, with whom the Electoral House of Lunenburgh commences. His reign is remarkable for two circumstances: his advancement to the electoral dignity, and his wife Sophia's being assigned, by an act of the British parliament, to be the royal stem of the Protestant succession to the throne of Great Britain and Ireland.

"On

" On the demise of Queen Ann, George his son, in virtue of this act of parliament, succeeded to the British monarchy.

" The house of Brunswick-Lunenburgh is now divided into branches, the German and the English. The former, under the title of Brunswick-Lunenburgh and Wolfenbuttel, possesses the duchies of Brunswick and Wolfenbuttel, and the countries of Blackenburgh and Reinskin, and reckons 160,000 subjects. The English, under the title of Brunswick-Lunenburgh and Hanover, possesses, with the electoral dignity, the electorate of Hanover, the duchies of Lunenburgh, Zell, Calemberg, Grubenhagen, Deepholt, Bentheim, Lawenburgh, Bremen, and Verdun, and counts 740,000 subjects."

,

UNDA.

Count H

Herman of Billung, and M[illegible]urgh, &c. on the Elbe.

—Heiress of Saxony, vick, and Hanover.

AN

ADDRESS, &c.

THAT History is a liberal and useful study, and that the History of our own country is best deserving of our attention, are propositions too clear for argument, and too simple for illustration. Nature has implanted in our breasts a lively impulse to extend the narrow span of our existence by the knowledge of the events that have happened on the soil which we inhabit, of the characters and actions of those men from whom our descent, as individuals or as a people, is probably derived. The same laudable emulation will prompt us to review, and to enrich our common treasure of national glory: and those who are best entitled to the esteem of posterity, are the most inclined to celebrate the merits of their ancestors. The origin and changes of our religion and government, of our arts and manners, afford an entertaining and often an instructive subject of speculation; and the scene is repeated and varied by the entrance of the victorious strangers, the Roman and the Saxon, the Dane and the Norman, who have successively reigned in our stormy Isle. We contemplate the gradual progress of society from the lowest ebb of primitive barbarism, to the full tide of modern civilization.

vilization. We contrast the naked Briton, who might have mistaken the sphere of Archimedes for a rational creature,* and the contemporary of Newton, in whose school Archimedes himself would have been an humble disciple. And we compare the boats of osier and hides that floated along our coasts with the formidable navies which visit and command the remotest shores of the ocean. Without indulging the fond prejudices of patriotic vanity, we may assume a conspicuous place among the inhabitants of the earth. The English will be ranked among the few nations who have cultivated with equal success the arts of war, of learning, and of commerce: and Britain perhaps is the only powerful and wealthy state which has ever possessed the inestimable secret of uniting the benefits of order with the blessings of freedom. It is a maxim of our law, and the constant practice of our courts of justice, never to accept any evidence unless it is the very best which, under the circumstances of the case, can possibly be obtained. If this wise principle be transferred from jurisprudence to criticism, the inquisitive reader of English History will soon ascend to the first witnesses of every period, from whose testimonies the moderns, however sagacious and eloquent,

* I allude to a passage in Cicero (de Naturâ Deorum, l. ii. c. 34.) Quod si in Britanniam, sphæram aliquis tulerit hanc, quam nuper familiaris noster effecit Posidonius, cujus singulæ conversiones idem efficiunt in sole, et in luna, et in quinque stellis errantibus, quod efficitur in cœlo singulis diebus et noctibus: quis in illa barbarie dubitet, quin ea sphæra sit perfecta ratione?

quent, must derive their whole confidence and credit. In the prosecution of his inquiries, he will lament that the transactions of the Middle Ages have been imperfectly recorded, and that these records have been more imperfectly preserved: that the successive conquerors of Britain have despised or destroyed the monuments of their predecessors; and that by their violence or neglect so much of our national antiquities has irretrievably perished. For the losses of history are indeed irretrievable: when the productions of fancy or science have been swept away, new poets may invent, and new philosophers may reason; but if the inscription of a single fact be once obliterated, it can never be restored by the united efforts of genius and industry. The consideration of our past losses should incite the present age to cherish and perpetuate the valuable relics which have escaped, instead of condemning the MONKISH HISTORIANS (as they are contemptuously styled) silently to moulder in the dust of our libraries; our candour, and even our justice, should learn to estimate their value, and to excuse their imperfections. Their minds were infected with the passions and errors of their times, but those times would have been involved in darkness, had not the art of writing, and the memory of events, been preserved in the peace and solitude of the cloister. Their Latin style is far removed from the eloquence and purity of Sallust and Livy; but the use of a permanent and general idiom has opened the study, and connected the series of our ancient chronicles, from the age of Bede to that of Walsingham. In the eyes of a philosophic observer, these monkish historians are even endowed with a singular though accidental merit; the unconscious simplicity with which they represent the manners and opinions of their contemporaries: a natural picture, which the most exquisite art is unable to imitate.

Books, before the invention of printing, were separately and slowly copied by the pen; and the transcripts of our old historians must have been rare; since the number would be proportioned to the number of readers capable of understanding a Latin work, and curious of the history and antiquities of England. The gross mass of the laity, from the baron to the mechanic, were more addicted to the exercises of the body than to those of the mind: the middle ranks of society were illiterate and poor, and the nobles and gentlemen, as often as they breathed from war, maintained their strength and activity in the chace or the tournament. Few among them could read, still fewer could write; none were acquainted with the Latin tongue; and if they sometimes listened to a tale of past times, their puerile love of the marvellous would prefer the romance of Sir Launcelot or Sir Tristram to the authentic narratives most honourable to their country and their ancestors. Till the period of the Reformation, the ignorance and sensuality of the clergy were continually increasing: the ambitious prelate aspired to pomp and power; the jolly monk was satisfied with idleness and pleasure; and the few students of the ecclesiastical ecclesiastical order perplexed rather than enlightened their understandings with occult science and scholastic divinity. In the monastery in which a chronicle had been composed, the original was deposited, and perhaps a copy; and some neighbouring churches might be induced, by a local or professional interest, to seek the communication of these historical memorials. Such manuscripts were not liable to suffer from the injury of use; but the casualty of a fire, or the slow progress of damp and worms, would often endanger their limited and precarious existence. The sanctuaries of religion were sometimes profaned by aristocratic oppression, popular tumult, or military licence; and although the cellar was more exposed than the library, the envy of ignorance will riot in the spoil of those treasures which it cannot enjoy.

After the discovery of printing, which has bestowed immortality on the works of man, it might be presumed that the new art would be applied without delay, to save and to multiply the remains of our national chronicles. It might be expected that the English, now waking from a long slumber, should blush at finding themselves strangers in their native country; and that our princes, after the example of Charlemagne and Maximilian I. would esteem it their duty and glory to illustrate the history of the people over whom they reigned. But these rational hopes have not been justified by the event. It was in the year 1474 that our first press was established in Westminster Abbey, by William Caxton: but in the choice of his authors, that liberal and industrious artist was reduced to comply with the vicious taste of his readers; to gratify the nobles with treatises on heraldry, hawking, and the game of chess, and to amuse the popular credulity with romances of fabulous knights, and legends of more fabulous saints. The father of printing expresses a laudable desire to elucidate the history of his country; but instead of publishing the Latin chronicle of Radulphus Higden, he could only venture on the English version by John de Trevisa; and his complaint of the difficulty of finding materials for his own continuation of that work, sufficiently attests that even the writers, which we now possess of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, had not yet emerged from the darkness of the cloister. His successors, with less skill and ability, were content to tread in the footsteps of Caxton; almost a century elapsed without producing one original edition of any old English historian; and the only exception which I recollect is the publication of Gildas (London 1526) by Polydore Virgil, an ingenious foreigner. The presses of Italy, Germany, and even France, might plead in their defence, that the minds of their scholars, and the hands of their workmen, were abundantly exercised in unlocking the treasures of Greek and Roman antiquity; but the world is not indebted to England for one first edition of a classic author. This delay of a century is the more to be lamented, as it is too probable that many authentic and valuable monuments of our history were lost in the dissolution of religious houses by Henry the Eighth.

The

The protestant and the patriot must applaud our deliverance: but the critic may deplore the rude havoc that was made in the libraries of churches and monasteries, by the zeal, the avarice, and the neglect, of unworthy reformers.

Far different from such reformers was the learned and pious Matthew Parker, the first protestant Archbishop of Canterbury, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. His apostolical virtues were not incompatible with the love of learning, and while he exercised the arduous office, not of governing, but of founding the Church of England, he strenuously applied himself to revive the study of the Saxon tongue, and of English antiquities. By the care of this respectable prelate, four of our ancient historians were successively published: the Flores of Matthew of Westminster (1570;) the Historia Major of Matthew Paris (1571;) the Vita Elfridi Regis, by Asserius; and the Historia Brevis, and Upodigma Neustriæ, by Thomas Walsingham. After Parker's death, this national duty was for some years abandoned to the diligence of foreigners. The ecclesiastical history of Bede had been printed and reprinted on the continent as the common property of the Latin church; and it was again inserted in a collection of British writers (Heidelberg 1587,) selected with such critical skill, that the romance of Jeffrey of Monmouth, and a Latin abridgment of Froissard, are placed on the same level of historical evidence. An edition of Florence of Worcester, by Howard, (1592,) may be slightly noticed; but we should gratefully commemorate the labours of Sir Henry Saville, a man distinguished among the scholars of the age by his profound knowledge of the Greek language and mathematical sciences. A just indignation against the base and plebeian authors of our English chronicles, had almost provoked him to undertake the task of a general and legitimate history: but his modest industry declining the character of an architect, was content to prepare materials for a future edifice. Some of the most valuable writers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries were rescued by his hands from dirt, and dust, and rottenness (e situ squalore et pulvere,) and his collection, under the common title of Scriptores post Bedam, was twice printed; first in London (1596,) and afterwards at Frankfort (1601.) During the whole of the seventeenth, and the beginning of the eighteenth centuries, the same studies were prosecuted with vigour and success: a miscellaneous volume of the Anglica Normanica, &c. (Frankfort 1603,) and the Historia Nova of Eadmer (London 1623,) were produced by Camden and Selden, to whom literature is indebted for more important services. The names of Wheeler and Gibson, of Watts and Warton, of Dugdale and Wilkins, should not be defrauded of their due praise: but our attention is fixed by the elaborate collections of Twysden and Gale: and their titles of Decem and Quindecim Scriptores announce that their readers possess a series of twenty-five of our old English historians. The last who has dug deep into the mine was Thomas Hearne, a clerk of Oxford, ford, poor in fortune, and indeed poor in understanding. His minute and obscure diligence, his voracious and undistinguishing appetite, and the coarse vulgarity of his taste and style, have exposed him to the ridicule of idle wits. Yet it cannot be denied that Thomas Hearne has gathered many gleanings of the harvest; but if his own prefaces are filled with crude and extraneous matter, his editions will be always recommended by their accuracy and use.

I am not called upon to inquire into the merits of foreign nations in the study of their respective histories, except as far as they may suggest a useful lesson, or a laudable emulation to ourselves. The patient Germans have addicted themselves to every species of literary labour: and the division of their vast empire into many independent states would multiply the public events of each country, and the pens, however rude, by which they have been saved from oblivion. Besides innumerable editions of particular historians, I have seen (if my memory does not fail me) a list of more than twenty of the voluminous collections of the Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum; some of these are of a vague and miscellaneous nature; others are relative to a certain period of time; and others again are circumscribed by the local limits of a principality or a province. Among the last I shall only distinguish the Scriptores Rerum Brunswicensium, compiled at Hanover in the beginning of this century by the celebrated Leibnitz. We should sympathize with a kind of domestic interest in the fortunes of a people to whom we are united by our obedience to a common sovereign; and we must explore with respect and gratitude the origin of an illustrious family, which has been the guardian near fourscore years of our liberty and happiness. The antiquarian, who blushes at his alliance with Thomas Hearne, will feel his profession ennobled by the name of Leibnitz. That extraordinary genius embraced and improved the whole circle of human science; and after wrestling with Newton and Clark in the sublime regions of geometry and metaphysics, he could descend upon earth to examine the uncouth characters and barbarous Latin of a chronicle or charter. In this, as in almost every other active pursuit, Spain has been outstripped by the industry of her neighbours. The best collection of her national historians was published in Germany: the recent attempts of her Royal Academy have been languid and irregular, and if some memorials of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries are lately printed at Madrid, her five oldest chronicles after the invasion of the Moors still sleep in the obscurity of provincial editions (Pamplona, 1615, 1634; Barcelona, 1663.) Italy has been productive in every age of revolutions and writers; and a complete series of these original writers, from the year five hundred to the year fifteen hundred, are most accurately digested in the Scriptores Rerum Italicarum of Muratori. This stupendous work, which fills twenty-eight folios, and overflows into the six volumes of the Antiquitates Italiæ Medii Ævi, was achieved in ____ years by one man;

man; and candour must excuse some defects in the plan and execution, which the discernment, and perhaps the envy of criticism has too rigorously exposed. The antiquities of France have been elucidated by a learned and ingenious people: the original historians, which Duchesne had undertaken to publish, were left imperfect by his death, yet had reached the end of the thirteenth century; and his additional volume (the sixth) comes home to ourselves, since it celebrates the exploits of the Norman Conquerors and Kings of England. About years ago the design of publishing Les Historiens des Gaules et de la France, was resumed on a larger scale, and in a more splendid form; and although the name of Dom Bouquet stands foremost, the merit must be shared among the veteran Benedictines of the Abbey of St. Germain des Prez at Paris. This noble collection may be proposed as a model for such national works: the original texts are corrected from the best manuscripts; and the curious reader is enlightened, without being oppressed, by the perspicuous brevity of the prefaces and notes. But a multitude of obstacles and delays seems to have impeded the progress of the undertaking; and the Historians of France had only attained to the twelfth century, and the thirteenth volume, when a general deluge overwhelmed the country, and its ancient inhabitants. I might here conclude this enumeration of foreign studies, if the Scriptores Rerum Danicarum of Langebek and his successors, which have lately appeared at Copenhagen, did not remind mind me of the taste and munificence of a court and country, whose scanty revenues might have apologized for their neglect.

It is long, very long indeed, since the success of our neighbours, and the knowledge of our resources, have disposed me to wish, that our Latin memorials of the Middle Age, the Scriptores Rerum Anglicarum, might be published in England, in a manner worthy of the subject and of the country. At a time when the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire has intimately connected me with the first historians of France, I acknowledged (in a note) the value of the Benedictine Collection, and expressed my hope that such a national work would provoke our own emulation. My hope has failed, the provocation was not felt, the emulation was not kindled; and I have now seen, without an attempt or a design, near thirteen years, which might have sufficed for the execution. During the greatest part of that time I have been absent from England: yet I have sometimes found opportunities of introducing this favourite topic in conversation with our literary men, and our eminent booksellers. As long as I expatiated on the merits of an undertaking, so beneficial to history, and so honourable to the nation, I was heard with attention; a general wish seemed to prevail for its success: but no sooner did we seriously consult about the best means of promoting that success, and of reducing a pleasing theory into a real action, than we were stopped, at the first step, by an insuperable difficulty—the choice of an editor. Among the the authors already known to the public, none, after a fair review, could be found, at once possessed of ability and inclination. Unknown, or at least untried abilities could not inspire much reasonable confidence: some were too poor, others too rich; some too busy, others too idle: and we knew not where to seek our English Muratori; in the tumult of the metropolis, or in the shade of the university. The age of Herculean diligence, which could devour and digest whole libraries, is passed away; and I sat down in hopeless despondency, till I should be able to find a person endowed with proper qualifications, and ready to employ several years of his life in assiduous labour, without any splendid prospect of emolument or fame.

The man is at length found, and I now renew the proposal in a higher tone of confidence. The name of this editor is Mr. John Pinkerton; but as that name may provoke some resentments, and revive some prejudices, it is incumbent on me, for his reputation, to explain my sentiments without reserve; and I have the satisfaction of knowing that he will not be displeased with the freedom and sincerity of a friend. The impulse of a vigorous mind urged him, at an early age, to write and to print, before his taste and judgment had attained to their maturity. His ignorance of the world, the love of paradox, and the warmth of his temper, betrayed him into some improprieties, and those juvenile sallies, which candour will excuse, he himself is the first to condemn, and will perhaps be be the last to forget. Repentance has long since propitiated the mild divinity of Virgil, against whom the rash youth, under a fictitious name, had darted the javelin of criticism. He smiles at his reformation of our English tongue, and is ready to confess, that in all popular institutions, the laws of custom must be obeyed by reason herself. The Goths still continue to be his chosen people, but he retains no antipathy to a Celtic savage; and without renouncing his opinions and arguments, he sincerely laments that those literary arguments have ever been embittered, and perhaps enfeebled, by an indiscreet mixture of anger and contempt. By some explosions of this kind, the volatile and fiery particles of his nature have been discharged, and there remains a pure and solid substance, endowed with many active and useful energies. His recent publications, a Treatise on Medals, and the edition of the early Scotch Poets, discover a mind replete with a variety of knowledge, and inclined to every liberal pursuit; but his decided propensity, such a propensity as made Bentley a critic, and Rennel a geographer, attracts him to the study of the History and Antiquities of Great Britain; and he is well qualified for this study, by a spirit of criticism, acute, discerning, and suspicious. His edition of the original Lives of the Scottish Saints has scattered some rays of light over the darkest age of a dark country: since there are so many circumstances in which the most daring legendary will not attempt to remove the well-known landmarks of truth. His Dissertation on the Origin of the Goths, with the Antiquities of Scotland, are, in my judgment, elaborate and satisfactory works; and were this a convenient place, I would gladly enumerate the important questions in which he has rectified my old opinions concerning the migrations of the Scythic or German nation from the neighbourhood of the Caspian and the Euxine to Scandinavia, the eastern coasts of Britain, and the shores of the Atlantic ocean. He has since undertaken to illustrate a more interesting period of the History of Scotland; his materials are chiefly drawn from papers in the British Museum, and a skilful judge has assured me, after a perusal of the manuscript, that it contains more new and authentic information than could be fairly expected from a writer of the eighteenth century. A Scotchman by birth, Mr. Pinkerton is equally disposed, and even anxious, to illustrate the History of England: he had long, without my knowledge, entertained a project similar to my own; his twelve letters, under a fictitious signature, in the Gentleman's Magazine (1788), display the zeal of a patriot, and the learning of an antiquarian. As soon as he was informed, by Mr. Nicol the bookseller, of my wishes and my choice, he advanced to meet me with the generous ardour of a volunteer, conscious of his strength, desirous of exercise, and careless of reward; we have discussed, in several conversations, every material point that relates to the general plan and arrangement of the work; and I can only complain of his excessive docility to the opinions of a man much less skilled in the subject subject than himself. Should it be objected, that such a work will surpass the powers of a single man, and that industry is best promoted by the division of labour, I must answer, that Mr. Pinkerton seems one of the children of those heroes, whose race is almost extinct; that hard assiduous study is the sole amusement of his independent leisure; that his warm inclination will be quickened by the sense of a duty resting solely on himself; and that he is now in the vigour of age and health; and that the most voluminous of our historical collections was the most speedily finished by the diligence of Muratori alone. I must add, that I know not where to seek an associate; that the operations of a society are often perplexed by the division of sentiments and characters, and often retarded by the degrees of talent and application; and that the editor will be always ready to receive the advice of judicious counsellors, and to employ the hand of subordinate workmen.

the

Two questions will immediately arise, concerning the title of our historical collection, and the period of time in which it may be circumscribed. The first of these questions, whether it should be styled the Scriptores Rerum Britannicarum, or the Scriptores Rerum Anglicarum, will be productive of more than a verbal difference: the former imposes the duty of publishing all original documents that relate to the history and antiquities of the British islands; the latter is satisfied with the spacious, though less ample, field of England. The ambition of a conqueror might prompt him to grasp grasp the whole British world, and to think, with Cæsar, that nothing was done while any thing remained undone.

Nil actum reputans dum quid superesset agendum.

But prudence soon discerns the inconvenience of increasing a labour already sufficiently arduous, and of multiplying the volumes of a work, which must unavoidably swell to a very respectable size. The extraneous appendages of Scotland, Ireland, and even Wales, would impede our progress, violate the unity of design, and introduce into a Latin text a strange mixture of savage and unknown idiom. For the sake of the Saxon Chronicle, the editor of the Scriptores Rerum Anglicarum will probably improve his knowledge of our mother tongue; nor will he be at a loss in the recent and occasional use of some French and English memorials. But if he attempts to hunt the old Britons among the islands of Scotland, in the bogs of Ireland, and over the mountains of Wales, he must devote himself to the study of the Celtic dialects, without being assured that his time and toil will be compensated by any adequate reward. It seems to be almost confessed, that the Highland Scots do not possess any writing of a remote date; and the claims of the Welsh are faint and uncertain. The Irish alone boast of whole libraries, which they sometimes hide in the fastnesses of their country, and sometimes transport to their colleges abroad: but the vain and credulous obstinacy with which, amidst the light of science, they cherish cherish the Milesian fables of their infancy, may teach us to suspect the existence, the age, and the value of these manuscripts, till they shall be fairly exposed to the eye of profane criticism. This exclusion, however, of the countries which have since been united to the crown of England must be understood with some latitude: the Chronicle of Melross is common to the borderers of both kingdoms: the Expugnatio Hiberniæ of Giraldus Cambrensis contains the interesting story of our settlement in the western isle; and it may be judged proper to insert the Latin Chronicle of Caradoc, (which is yet unpublished,) and the code of native laws which were abolished by the conqueror of Wales. Even the English transactions in peace and war with our independent neighbours, especially those of Scotland, will be best illustrated by a fair comparison of the hostile narratives. The second question, of the period of time which this Collection should embrace, admits of an easier decision; nor can we act more prudently, than by adopting the plan of Muratori, and the French Benedictines, who confine themselves within the limits of ten centuries, from the year five hundred to the year fifteen hundred of the Christian æra. The former of these dates coincides with the most ancient of our national writers; the latter approaches within nine years of the accession of Henry VIII., which Mr. Hume considers as the true and perfect æra of modern history. From that time we are enriched, and even oppressed, with such treasures of contemporary

rary and authentic documents in our own language, that the historian of the present or a future age will be only perplexed by the choice of facts, and the difficulties of arrangement. Exoriatur aliquis—a man of genius, at once eloquent and philosophic, who should accomplish, in the maturity of age, the immortal work which he had conceived in the ardour of youth.

APPENDIX

TO

AN ADDRESS, &c.

N° I.

In the Advertisement to the first edition of Mr. Gibbon's Miscellaneous Works, it is observed, that the Address, which recommends the publication of our Latin memorials of the middle ages, the Scriptores Rerum Anglicarum, in a manner worthy of the subject and of the country, was interrupted by death. It appearing to me to be highly desirable that interesting design should be promoted, I took the liberty of applying to Mr. Pinkerton for an explanation of the plan arranged by him with Mr. Gibbon: he has favoured me with the following Letter and Extract.

London, 24th October, 1814.

My Lord,

In compliance with your desire, I send the papers necessary to illustrate Mr. Gibbon's "Address," on the publication of our ancient national national historians; consisting of my Address, which was to have accompanied his, and of some of the Letters in the Gentleman's Magazine, 1788, which he said contributed to engage his attention to the subject. Your lordship will perceive that, in his letter to me, he rather objected to the appearance of his name, as he was only to lend his advice, and to write a General Introduction; which would have been a master-piece of historical criticism, a Corinthian capital to this national column, consecrated to the memory of our ancestors. But our plan was chiefly arranged in conversations; and he afterwards consented that his name should appear as conjunct editor. He seemed to regard this collection as a favourite pursuit; and said he still hoped for twenty years of existence, so that he might live to see its completion. How vain the views and hopes of man! For he died, alas! on the very day that our joint Prospectus was to have appeared.

Spirantesque crocos, et in urna perpetuum ver!

The transcendent merit of Mr. Gibbon was, that his mind always rose superior to his vast erudition, which often oppresses the mental energies, but invigorated his. The stomach was so strong, that all food became salutary. In the works of Hume or Robertson, we see that they had read what was necessary for their subject; but in those of Gibbon we are surprised with lights from every department of universal literature.

No man of extensive learning, or genuine taste, will object to the pomp and magnificence of Gibbon's historical diction. The more a reader is conversant in the diversified styles of the Greek and Roman classics, the less will he be disposed to blame a manner majestic as its subject. The grandeur of the Roman empire, in which modern kingdoms were but provinces, required a correspondent elevation of thought and language, which might be justly objectionable, if employed on a more confined topic, on the history even of the chief among European sovereignties.

That Gibbon excels in the epistolary style is allowed by all. The letters of Pope are the affected themes of a school-boy; and those of his fair antagonist, Lady M. W. Montague, are more indebted to the topics than the language: in rapid description, brilliant thought, sudden flashes of wit, effusions of the heart, intuition of human life, condensed views of characters and manners, she can never be compared with Madame de Sevigné. Our epistolary eminence is shared among a triumvirate, Gray, Gibbon, and Cowper: the last being preferred by many; though his style be more feeble and relaxed, and his topics more confined, both by his personal and chorographic situation. He had, however, an excellent heart, which gives an ineffable charm to any composition.

Your lordship will pardon this little tribute to the memory of our eminent friend. His last great plan would not have expired with him, if a war of twenty-one years had not engaged the whole attention of those distinguished characters, who could could alone promote such an expensive design. At present, it is hoped, it might be resumed with some prospect of success; and, among our monuments of triumph, this literary temple might be erected to the ancient glory of our country. Esto perpetua!

I have the honour to be, with every sentiment of respect and esteem,

Your lordship's

Most faithful servant,

J. PINKERTON.

Extract from an Address to the Eminent, the Learned, and the Lovers of the early Literature and History of England, concerning an intended Publication to be intituled "Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores;" or a Collection of the Original Historians of England, chronologically arranged; collated with the Manuscripts, illustrated with Notes, Chronological Tables, Maps, Complete Indexes, &c.—By JOHN PINKERTON, 1792.

THE GERMANS, ever to be applauded as the inventors of what is most useful in arts and sciences, instituted, it is believed, the first memorable example of assembling national historians; but, as is usual in first attempts, only in a small number.

In 1566, Schardius published at Frankfort four of the ancient German writers, collected into one volume; and in 1574 the work was enlarged to three volumes. Pistorius began his collection in 1583, but the third volume was not published till 1607. Reuber's curious assemblage appeared in 1584; that of Urstisius in 1585; of Freher in 1600; of Goldast in 1606.

ITALY being divided into numerous small states, no general collection of the writers of that country deserving notice appeared, till, in the present century, Muratori's great design was executed with singular rapidity. Some of the Spanish historians were printed at Frankfort, the great literary mart of Europe Europe in 1579, published from the library of Mr. Bell, an Englishman: but Schott's collection, commenced in 1603, is superior.

Though SPAIN has begun to publish her contemporary chronicles from the fourteenth century, yet she still neglects an accurate republication of her earlier writers: as, for instance, the Chronicles of the four Bishops, in the eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, published by Sandoval, at Pampeluna, in 1615—1634; not to mention the history of Dulcidius, written about 883, and committed to the press by Pellizer, at Barcelona, 1663.

But next to Germany, FRANCE must be regarded as claiming precedence in this department of literature. The collection of Pithou, in 1588, was confined; that of Du Chesne, in 1636—1641, was ample; and had not his death occasioned the failure of the plan, it would have been nearly complete. The grand collection by Bouquet, Historiens de France, which extends to twelve or thirteen volumes in folio, was begun in 1738; and, though objectionable in some parts of the plan, is a model of accuracy and typography.

Having thus briefly considered the progress of this study in the other chief countries of Europe,* let us proceed to watch its dawn in ENGLAND. Of Beda there are several early editions in foreign countries:† and to Polydore Virgil we are indebted for the first edition of Gildas, London, 1526, 12mo. But after this no edition of any early historian is recollected till 1571, when the able work of Mathew Paris issued from the London press, soon followed by Mathew of Westminster; and in 1574 by Walsingham and Asserius.

* The Historians of BRUNSWICK, collected by the celebrated and universal Leibnitz, and those of Denmark by Langebek, deserve especial praise.

† Argent. 1500. 1514. Hagen. 1506.

In 1587, the earliest collection of English historians appeared at Heidelberg, or, as some of the title-pages bear, at Lyons. The writers contained in it are Geofrey, Gildas, Beda, William of Newburgh, and an abstract of Froissart.

In 1592 Howard published Florence of Worcester.

At length Sir Henry Saville, in 1596, gave his valuable collection; the London edition of which is inaccurately printed, but far from being so faulty as that of Frankfort, 1601, which Spelman justly execrates; nor is Camden's Collection, Frankfort, 1602, much superior in the important typography of proper names.

During the seventeenth century many valuable editions appeared. Particular commemoration is due to Wheloc's first publication of a Saxon Chronicle, at the end of his Beda, 1643; and to the excellent collections of Twysden and Gale, the latter in particular deserving eminent praise among our learned editors of early history.

Nor has this interesting study relaxed its efforts till within these fifty years, down to which period fresh treasures have gradually accumulated. Among the editors Hearne deserves especial notice. Endued he was with singular industry; but his prefaces, faces, and articles of subsidiary compilation, violated the dignity of the useful works which he published. The insignificance, the indiscrimination of his antiquarian pursuits, justly excited the ridicule of contemporary wits: and, by a singular fatality, the editor is mentioned with neglect or contempt, while the editions, though loaded with extraneous matter, are allowed to possess every praise of exactness and utility.

It is almost unnecessary to remind the reader, that most of the valuable works, above mentioned, are now arrived at an exorbitant price; which, in a complete collection, far exceeds that proposed for this chronological and uniform compilation.

The defects of preceding editions of our historians are too well known to men of letters. In the publications of Saville and Twysden, and not rarely even in that of Gale and Fulman, the names of persons and places are so mangled, as hardly to be intelligible even to the skilful. The various readings which, when important, should have been annotated, rarely appear; and indeed few MSS., and those sometimes not the best, have been consulted. Amid similar instances of neglect shall be selected one specimen. The Saxon Chronicle (improperly so called, for there are many Saxon Chronicles) is perhaps the most important of all our historical monuments, as being the only civil history of England preceding the year 1100; not to mention that no nation can boast of so valuable a remain of ancient language. Yet in the publication of this invaluable piece the grossest inattention appears.

appears. Gibson only used the MSS. at Oxford, where he resided; and has omitted to consult the two best, in the Cotton Library, Tib. B. i. and Tib. B. iv. upon collating which near fifty pages were recovered, unknown to him, though amounting to more than a fifth part of his publication.

This neglect of our early historians is the more unpardonable, as their merits equal, if they do not exceed, those of any other modern country in Europe. And it will be difficult to name rivals to William of Malmesbury, Simeon of Durham, the Abbot of Peterburgh, Walsingham; far less to the ample and authentic Hoveden, and the undaunted truth of Mathew Paris.

It would be prolix and unnecessary to give more enlarged details concerning the plan of the new publication: but a brief view shall now be submitted to those patrons of our literature, by whose encouragement alone so large and expensive a design can proceed.

The first volume, as containing all the writers preceding the Conquest, may be regarded as complete in itself. The plan of Bouquet will not be followed, in respect to the extracting so much from each author as belongs to a reign, or a century; but every author will be given at once, with the additions made to his work, if any such occur. In this part of the plan, Bouquet's edition, though perhaps more advantageous to the modern compiler of history, presents many embarrassments to the reader, or consulter, of ancient historians; and each each production appears in such a state of mutilation, as not only to give additional labour, but some distrust that there may be a defect.

In the compilation of a work intended to be complete in itself, and to present to the reader an universal body of ancient English history, it has appeared indispensable, and is consonant to the opinion of the best judges, that those parts of the Greek and Roman writers, which relate to this island, should be extracted, as has been done with regard to Gaul in the edition of the French historians. But even this part will not be deficient in new advantages. The extracts from Cæsar shall be collated with the Editio Princeps, and others, the best editions: nor shall a similar care be wanting in regard to Strabo, Tacitus, Herodian, the Panegyrists, Ammianus Marcellinus, &c.

Of Ptolemy's Geography, the original of which was published from a bad MS. by Erasmus, valuable variations have been printed by Montfaucon in his Bibliotheca Coisleniana: and the third volume of the minor Greek geographers presents various readings of Guido of Ravenna; all of which, and in short all the latest discoveries concerning the extracts used, shall be carefully given.

To the extracts from the Greek and Roman writers succeed Gildas, Nennius, Beda, with the chronicle at the end, collated with that in the Heidelberg edition; some passages of Alcuin; Eddius, Fredegod, Asserius: extracts from ancient lives of Saints, the lives of Offa, Edward the Confessor, Emma. These are to be followed by two of the largest Saxon Chronicles, translated by skilful hands, and collated with all the others; with fac similia of the autographic Chronicle begun in 891, and continued by divers hands till 924, and after to 1075. This invaluable monument is preserved in Bennet College, Cambridge, whence it was published by Wheloc, but in a careless manner. Extracts from the Icelandic authors, but only in the Latin translations, shall next be given, with any other passages, though rare, to be found in extraneous writers concerning Britain during this period. Nor shall the Saxon laws be neglected, nor such genuine charters and coins as illustrate history.

of

In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the original historians of England are numerous and intelligent; and many of them eminent in style and ability. The fourteenth century rather declines; but after Walsingham, the last of our early Latin writers, deserving the name even of an annalist, the series closes almost in darkness, just before the dawn of the revival of letters. Hence, of the domestic transactions of the fifteenth century, during the reigns of Henry VI. Edward IV. Richard III. and a part of that of Henry VII. or from 1422 to 1500, we have but little and unsatisfactory evidence. The French contemporary writers supply a great part of the chasm. Fabian, and the other early chroniclers of the sixteenth century, must likewise be extracted; but any MS. annals of those reigns are of singular value, and every care shall be exerted to procure them, and print them in the manner that Godefroy has published lished the French historians during this, the fifteenth, century.

At the year 1500 the compilation will finally close, there being no occasion to throw further light on centuries completely luminous.

The manuscripts and editions shall all be carefully collated, and any variations of consequence annotated at the bottom of the page. Numerous chronicles and historic articles still remaining in MS. shall be inserted in their proper places, and no research shall be spared in libraries, foreign and domestic, to recover any valuable documents.

As the work is national, and can interest only a few curious foreigners, to whom the English language is known, and as many matters both important and minute, can be far more clearly conveyed to the English reader in his own speech, than in the Latin, the editor has been advised to give the prefaces, chronological tables, and illustrations, in English; but the Latin shall be preferred, if more agreeable to the favourers of the publication.*

To the first volume will be prefixed a general review of the early English historians; and a preface to each volume will present a literary notice of the authors contained in it, their lives, periods, works; editions and manuscripts consulted. A large chronological table of all the events will be prefixed to each volume: and in addition to the indexes, on the plan of Bouquet's, and which, as

* Mr. Gibbon insisted on the English.

in

in a book of consultation, shall be very ample, one will be added of manners and customs.

The names of Du Chesne, Leibnitz, Muratori, Bouquet, Langebek, editors of vast works of this nature, sufficiently indicate that the united toils of a society are so far from essential to a publication of early historians, that, on the contrary, scarce one can be named produced by a literary association. The want of unanimity, the delays incident to democracies of all kinds, the power of accident, more extensive when spread over a wide surface, present obstacles to the labours of many, which are unknown to the industry of one. Yet assistance will be called in when necessary or expedient, and the advice of the best judges will be requested and venerated.

N° II.

LETTERS

ON THE

CULTIVATION OF OUR NATIONAL HISTORY,

Extracted from the Gentleman's Magazine, 1788.

 Some of these letters are omitted as merely introductory, or as relative to Welch, Scotish, and Irish history. The two last present a proposal for the foundation of an Historical Society. The following may be considered as having chiefly engaged Mr. Gibbon's attention.

LETTER II.

If our National History be not neglected, these letters would be absurd; and it is therefore proper, in the first place, to shew that it is neglected, and to a degree capable of exciting surprise and regret in every mind at all interested in the glory of the nation.

To evince this neglect, it is proper to turn our eyes upon foreign countries. Were the neglect general, there would be no occasion to complain; but this is so far from being the case, that Britain, a country from its wealth, free government, and superior abilities of its natives, entitled to take the lead of most countries, is here about a century behind all; nay, yields to Russia, a country where literature was unknown till the present century!

That

That this is no bold assertion, will appear from a slight deduction from what has been done, and is doing, for their history, by some other countries; for to dwell upon all, would occupy more room than these letters will admit.

Let us begin with France, our great rival in sciences, arts, and arms:—but, alas! in this all rivalship ceases. Next to the glory of national arms, is that of national history; without which the greatest actions are as if they had never been. Britain, which ought to have led the example, is so far behind France in the cultivation of her history, that the utmost exertion will hardly compensate for the inglorious remission. In poetry, philosophy moral and natural, mathematics, divinity, medicine, law, the belles lettres, and the arts, Britain is, it is believed, superior to France. But so fatal is the term History to this island, that we have no Natural History anywise comparable with Buffon's. Our Gibbons and Robertsons perhaps exceed any modern French historians, though no Frenchman will allow this. But historiography is foreign to my subject, which concerns the foundations of historiography, the publication and illustration of the original writers and documents.

One would have imagined that, upon the invention of printing, the first care, in every nation, would have been to publish their historical documents. For the very nature of history demanded this attention; inasmuch as every other science can recover its materials, when lost, except history alone. If poetry perish, as good may again appear:

pear: if natural or moral philosophy, mathematics, divinity, medicine, the belles lettres, the arts, &c. were lost, they may be recovered, nay exceeded, as nature and man remain the same. BUT IF ONE HISTORICAL FACT PERISH, IT IS LOST FOR EVER. Yet this irrefragable consideration was, as usual, forced to yield to the fashionable writing of the day: and near a century elapsed, after the invention of printing, before any attention was paid to the publication of the original historians of modern nations. France distinguished herself among the first; and Du Chesne's Bibliothèque Historique de la France, published in 1619, contains a list of published historians, which England cannot exceed at present. Since that time France has been constantly proceeding in that noble pursuit; and hardly a learned man of France can be mentioned, who did not contribute somewhat to illustrate the ancient history of his own country, while our literati were lost in the antiquities of Greece, Rome, India, China; and, in short, of every country but their own.—But, not to dwell on this, it is sufficient to observe, that in the year 1738, half a century ago, that magnificent collection of all the old French historians was begun, of which twelve or thirteen large volumes in folio have now appeared; and, compared to which, all our historic labours, put together, appear as nothing. Every volume contains original writers and documents, generally for one century; and the elegance, accuracy, and completeness of the work, exceed all praise. It must also be added, that our polite scholars and men of genius, our Lowths, Wartons, Joneses, Gibbons, Jortins, Warburtons, &c. never think our history worthy notice; whereas in France, Du Bos and Montesquieu, to name no more, have deeply examined the early history of their country.

To avoid prolixity, let us pass the great labours of Leibnitz, &c. in German history; of Muratori, &c. in Italian; and let us turn our eyes upon kingdoms which in other matters of science we infinitely exceed. Yes, let us shew that Denmark, a remote and unwealthy state, and Russia, whose sciences are of yesterday, excel Britain in attention to national history! Denmark, in fact, rivals France, by the elegant edition of her ancient historians, published by Langebek and now going on. Why mention the Society appointed by the King to publish all the Icelandic monuments of Danish history? Why mention the expenses of the Princes of the Blood in Denmark upon such publications, and institute odious comparisons? For who does not know, that the whole study of the Danish nobility, gentry, and literati, is bent upon their history? And surely no stronger proof of a solid and manly mind, and of true patriotism, can be given, than this pursuit.

If we pass to Russia, we shall find the present Empress the patroness of history, as of other sciences. Let the works of Muller, the publications of Nestor's Chronicle, and that of Sylvester in 1767, under the title of Letopis Nestorova, Stritter's Memoriæ Populorum, &c. and other works, speak speak the present attention of Russia to her history.

And what is Britain doing? Nothing.—Her published historians are lost in slovenly-printed editions; and many remain unpublished. Bold assertions! But where are the proofs? The proofs are to be found in every bookseller's shop; and in the catalogues of the Bodleian, Harleian, Cottonian, and other libraries. Yet, after a prefatory remark or two, one instance shall be given, which will of itself prove, that our history is neglected to a degree exceeding all belief.

Ever since the time of Thomas Hearne, of black-letter memory, carbone notandus, the publication of our old historic writers has been discontinued. The names of Saville, Camden, Selden, Gale, are most respectable in this line; but such is the effect of weakness, that it dishonours all it touches; and surely a weaker man than Tom Hearne never existed, as his prefaces, so called, lamentably shew.

> Pox on't, quoth Time to Thomas Hearne,
> Whatever I forget you learn.

Instead of manly erudition, thought, and elegance, such as became a publisher of important works, his prefaces shew the most trifling and abject pursuits of antiquarian baubles. We are forced to despise the man to whose labours we are obliged: and it is suspected that the notorious character of Hearne has not a little contributed to the contempt into which our history has lately fallen, for great events often spring from small causes. This remark was thought necessary here, as those very publications of Hearne, which might be urged as a proof that our history is not neglected, on the contrary afford a lamentable proof that it is, and has long been. For in no other country would he have been forced to publish a few copies, by an extravagant subscription, of books important to national history, and of course interesting to all. Old plays, and dead pamphlets, are greedily fed on, perhaps in other countries as well as this; for it is not to be conceived that literary disease, and mental sickness, are confined to Britain: in other countries virtuosi and collectors of toys also abound. Yet it seems certain, that the curse foretold by Dr. Browne, in his Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times, has come to pass; that we are not vicious, but insignificant; that we are incapable of that exertion in which either vice or virtue consists; and that our taste has, as he foretold, become trifling even to childishness; and so weakened, as to be incapable of wholesome gratification. Hence our greediness for the silliest literary baubles; and our neglect of the manly and austere provinces of literature. Such, indeed, are the effects of great wealth and luxury in all countries, enervating both body and mind. Herodotus finely calls poverty, "the nurse of Greece;" and the effects of wealth on Roman literature may be seen in the dialogue on the causes of the decline of eloquence, ascribed to Tacitus, though most probably by Quintilian.

Let us now proceed to the instance formerly promised, promised, to shew at once that our history is neglected to a surprising degree. It is well known that Italy, France, and Germany, are the only countries in Europe which exceed England in the series of early historians. From Gregory of Tours, who wrote A. D. 591, France has historians of every century. England, on the contrary, has no historian after Beda, who wrote in 731, till the year 1100. For Ethelwerd certainly did not write till that time; and his work is a mere translation of the Saxon Chronicle: and Asser gives only the life of Alfred. I say, no English historians are found from 731 till 1100, EXCEPT the Saxon Chronicle. Nay, Beda, who alone precedes, is merely an ecclesiastical historian, as his title, Historia Ecclesiastica Anglorum, and his whole work, declare. So that the Saxon Chronicle is, in fact, the ONLY civil history of England preceding the year 1100: and without it we should know nothing of English history for SEVEN centuries. The English historians, who begin to be numerous after the year 1100, borrow all their intelligence of preceding times from it, as Gibson shews; who also deservedly remarks, that no nation can boast of so valuable a monument of their ancient language.

This noble monument is therefore chosen as an instance of the shameful neglect shewn in publishing our ancient historians. It was natural to expect, that our best literati should exert themselves in translating and collating this work. But how has it been done?—Gibson confesses, in his preface, that he was not much versed in the Saxon language. This may be modesty; but—if true! Supposing him qualified, how has he executed his work? He only used five manuscripts.

1. The Laudian, a fine one upon vellum.

2. The one he oddly calls Cantuariensis, also formerly belonging to Laud; on paper, and very bad in all respects.

3. One in Bennet college, Cambridge.

4. One in the Cotton library.

These two were transcripts of one another; and Gibson used them not, but tells us, he copied Wheloc, who, at the end of his Saxon Beda, published a Chronologia Saxonica from these imperfect MSS.

5. Another in the Cotton library, also never seen by Gibson, but only various readings which Junius had taken from it.

Thus we see, that Gibson, living at Oxford, publishes the most valuable monument of our history from two MSS. left by Archbishop Laud to that university; and is too lazy to go to Cambridge or London to collate MSS. but quotes them at second-hand! So much appears from the face of his book, from his own preface! But this is nothing.

There are other MSS. of the Saxon Chronicle, never seen by Gibson, though most easily accessible. In the Cotton library there are four: Tib. B. I.—Tib. B. IV.—Tib. A. VI.—Dom. A. VIII. The two last, and worst, are those he mentions. The two first he never heard of, as appears from his edition. Upon collating these two with Gibson, son, and extracting the additions they have, they were found to amount to FIFTY pages; and his book has only 244! Both were written in the eleventh century; and superior to the Laudian in antiquity. It need not be mentioned, that these fifty pages contain at least as many facts in our ancient history, either unknown, or narrated with new circumstances.

Moreover, in Corpus Christi or Bennet college at Cambridge, is the AUTOGRAPH of the Saxon Chronicle, from which all the rest are taken; begun in 891, by King Alfred's orders, as would seem, and written up to that year by one hand; continued by divers to 924; and after to 1075. See Wanley's Catalogue, (Hickes's Thesaurus.) I know not if this be the one in Bennet college published by Wheloc. But certain it is, that this invaluable autograph of the chief monument of our history should be published literatim, by itself, without any additions from other copies; and illustrated with fac-similia of every various hand-writing in it.

It need hardly be mentioned, that a precious part of the Saxon Chronicle is published in Lye's Saxon Dictionary, from Mr. Astle's library, which much illustrates the history of the eleventh century. Instead of Saxon Chronicle, we should indeed say Chronicles; for the copies are written in different places, and vary in dates and events. The two fullest copies, which vary most, should be published apart; and the differences of the others thrown into the notes. PHILISTOR.

LETTER III.

In my last it was shewn that our history is neglected, from the carelessness and inaccuracy discovered in the publication of one of its most important monuments. It shall not be asserted, that our other ancient historians are published with equal inattention, and want of literary skill. But certain it is, that all of them should be collated afresh with the MSS. several of which have come to light, and passed into public libraries, since the publications were made. The spirit of philosophy and criticism was hardly known in antiquities till the present century; and the vast superiority of the recent publications of ancient monuments over the former is universally felt in all foreign countries.

That many important remains of our history still lurk in MS. is well known, and evinced from the catalogues of great libraries. Some may also be in private hands. That every care should be exerted to recover and print such pieces, needs not be insisted on. But there is another matter which claims consideration, as a convincing proof that our history is neglected; and, after stating this, it may be presumed that the reader will be convinced that these letters are not groundless: and, of course, this preliminary being adjusted, the other parts of the plan may be considered in their order. This other proof that our history is neglected, consists in the amazing deficiency of dissertations by our literati, upon curious or intricate points of ancient English history.

by

In most foreign countries, the works of this sort, written by the most eminent writers, are very numerous. If the reader will look into the Historical Libraries, published for the several countries, he will be struck with astonishment to see that English works of this kind, compared with those of France, Germany, Italy, nay, the Northern kingdoms, are in number about as one to one hundred. Let him only take up the large Historical Catalogue, in four volumes, at the end of Lenglet Du Fresnoy's Méthode pour étudier l'Histoire, ed. 1772, 15 vols. 12mo, he will find all the works published on English history thrown into a few pages; while those on French, German, Italian, almost fill volumes. It is believed, that single works of Selden, Verstegan, Sheringham, and Langhorne, form almost the sum total of books expressly written to illustrate our history: and all of them published before criticism was introduced into antiquities, and before we had got so far up the hill of science as to discover much around us. Selden was indeed a man whose erudition, independently of his other great merits, does high honour to his country. But he was quite immersed in Oriental learning; and his works on English antiquities are by far his worst, and abound with passages which cannot stand against sound criticism. The antiquities of the middle ages were but beginning to be studied in Selden's time. No Du Cange nor Muratori had appeared. The diplomatic science, in particular, was unknown: and Dugdale, Dugdale, another very eminent antiquary, has, in his Monasticon Anglicanum, published charters, which Germon, De Re diplomatica, has evinced to be forgeries, from marks so gross as to need no investigation.

Unfortunately, we have begun quite at the wrong end of our history. We abound in general histories; but want the proper authorities and proofs, the foundations upon which they should stand. The object is, first to settle the grounds of our history; and, after that, build the fabric who will. A hundred points of the greatest consequence remain to be treated in detached dissertations, to be examined to the bottom by severe criticism, and all the authorities produced. Suppose, as parallel instances to similar dissertations of foreign writers, we had disquisitions, On the Commerce of the Phenicians and Greeks in Britain: Whether any British Nation paid Tribute to the Romans before the time of Claudius: On the ancient Languages in Britain: On the Use of the Latin Tongue in Britain; and how it comes to pass that Britain did not furnish one Latin Writer in the Roman Times, while Gaul and Spain produced many: If Severus built any Wall in Britain: What was the real Cause of the Arrival of the Iutes in Kent, Chance or Invitation: The Extent and History of each Heptarchic Kingdom: The Form of Saxon Government: Of Regal Power among the Saxons: Of the Power of the People: The Private Life of the Saxons: From what Year, and what Time of the Year, our old Historians reckon reckon the Christian Era, &c. &c. &c. These instances are only given as they flow from the pen; and the reader may easily suggest to himself other subjects more important and curious. It shall only be added, that such pieces would, in the hands of dull and illiterate writers, become insipid, as all other subjects would; but that, in foreign countries, such dissertations not only appear, but are produced by writers of the greatest learning, literary experience, and critical sagacity; often with every charm of elegant and vivacious language. The latter qualities are, indeed, more pleasing than necessary in treating subjects of instruction; and in which truth becomes suspicious if arrayed in the gorgeous dress of eloquence, so often worn by falsehood. Let this point be closed with enumerating a very few names of foreigners distinguished by the illustration of their national history, that we may consider what we have to oppose to them. The Germans boast of Cluverius, Conringius, Schard, Reineccius, Freher, Lindenbrog, Schilter, Heinack, Leibnitz, Mascou, Schœpflin, &c. The French of Vignier, Pasquier, Du Chesne, Valois, Fauchet, Mezeray, La Carry, Masson, Hottoman, Pithou, Petau, Baluze, le Duc d'Espernon, Du Cange, Montesquieu, Du Bos, Le Gendre, Labbé, &c. Italy has so numerous names for each petty state, that the difficulty lies in the choice; but let Sigonius and Muratori be selected, names equal to a thousand.

Topography may be considered as an historical de-department, which has thriven much in Britain of late, chiefly by the fostering cares of the author of the British Topography, and the editor of the Bibliotheca Topographica. It gives great pleasure to see that, in this branch at least, we are perhaps equal to other nations. But the warmest admirers of topography will not put it on a par with the general history, or even geography, of a whole kingdom. Local history, however, may contribute materials for general history; though, in the run of our topographers, the historical part be seldom profoundly treated. It is also remarkable, that while Germany has Cluverius and Cellarius; and France her Sansons, De l'Isles, and D'Anvilles; Britain cannot boast of any geographer who has obtained the smallest fame. In chronology, Usher and Simson yield to none.

As it is believed that the reader will allow, from the two grand considerations already stated, to wit, deficiency in the publication of our historical monuments, and deficiency in modern works illustrative of our ancient history, that these letters are not unfounded; but that our national history is really neglected; this preliminary shall be considered as allowed; and other parts of the little plan, laid down in the first letter, shall be entered upon.

PHILISTOR.

LET-

LETTER IV.

In considering the next part of our plan, namely, wherein the neglect of our history chiefly lies, it will be proper to point out, first, the period of our history which has been least illustrated; and, secondly, the particular provinces of historical research, which have been least cultivated among us.

The period of our history which has been least illustrated, strikes at once, as being that preceding the Norman conquest. It is, indeed, a mortifying reflection, that Englishmen should think the history of their own ancestors of no moment, in comparison with that of the Norman princes and their followers, who settled in this country; should seem to think England of no account till it became a prey to Norman ravagers! Perhaps it may be said, that the want of materials for our history, preceding the Conquest, is a sufficient excuse for our neglect of that period. Certain it is, that these materials are not large, being almost confined to the Saxon Chronicles above-mentioned; while, after the Norman settlement, our numerous historians, chiefly of Norman race, or under Norman patronage, throw a blaze of light around them, which renders even minute parts of our history conspicuous. But the attachment of these writers to the Normans made them pass the more ancient history of England with an invidious parsimony, while they regale us with every incident of Norman times in full display. This partiality of our original writers has affected our antiquaries and hishistoriographers; who, instead of running counter, as they ought, to this disposition, have been drawn into its vortex. Yet it is certainly a matter of the easiest conception, and most palpable truth, that the most obscure period of our history was exactly that which required the most illustration. So that our antiquaries, who have confined what little researches they have made to the Norman and later periods of our history, have acted in diametrical opposition to their duty, both as patriots and as antiquaries.

Another reason for neglecting the earlier parts of our history is, the difficulty arising from the heptarchic division. It is certainly a matter of some difficulty to give a clear history of six or seven small kingdoms; but, as the Greek proverb bears, all excellent things are difficult; and the greater the difficulty, there is the more merit in good execution. All modern kingdoms present the same difficulty, in their early history, and generally to a far later period than England: but their antiquaries have only been excited, by this difficulty, to exert the greater accuracy and care. Our heptarchic history is not only totally neglected; but our writers think proper to apologise for their own indolence, by informing us that it is not worth writing. Mr. Hume, sensible of the great carelessness with which he had sketched this part of English history, quotes Milton, as saying, that the wars of the heptarchic states are not more important than those of crows and kites. But this is like many of Mr. Hume's quotations; for Milton, in in that passage, speaks not of heptarchic wars, but of a paltry squabble between two noblemen of that time. Take his own words, p. 183, edit. 1671, 4to. of his history of England: "The same day Ethelmund at Kinneresford, passing over with the Worcestershire men, was met by Weolstan, another nobleman, with those of Wiltshire, between whom happened a great fray, wherein the Wiltshire men overcame, but both dukes were slain, no reason of thir quarrel writ'n; such bickerings to recount, met oft'n in these our writers, what more worth is it than to chronicle the wars of kites, or crows, flocking and fighting in the air?" The fact is, that the smallest of the heptarchic kingdoms was superior in size and power to any one of the heroic kingdoms of Greece, whose history we read with so much attention; and the whole Grecian story, till the period of Alexander, is not in itself more important or interesting than our heptarchic. The genius of the authors makes all the difference; and this genius, it is hoped, will not always be wanting in our's. Those, who think history becomes important in proportion to the size of the country concerned, should confine themselves to study the Asiatic empires, and leave real history to those who know its nature. It is in minute history that we find that picture of human society which most interests the philosopher.

It is suspected that a third reason why the period preceding the Conquest, by far the most important of our history, is neglected, originates from the writings of an English philosopher—Lord Bolingbroke.

lingbroke. In his Letters on History, this writer considers the early history of any country as quite useless, and regards the modern part, beginning at the Emperor Charles V. as alone worth study. This superficial opinion, of a once fashionable author, had perhaps great weight with those who knew not that it is impossible to have any real knowledge of the modern history of any country without beginning the study at its fountains, in ancient events and manners. One might as well think of building a house by beginning at the garrets. Nay more, the foundation is not only to be begun at the proper place; but, as every part of the superstructure ultimately rests upon the foundation, this radical part must be examined with far more care and attention than any of the rest. Mr. Hume began his history with the Stuarts, and so wrote backwards. The consequence is, that he has quite mistaken the most glaring features of our constitution, and carried the despotism of the Stuarts along with him through all our history. Nor can any problem in mathematics be more certain than that it is impossible either to write or read history properly by retrogression. The knowledge of the ancient part is not only necessary in itself, but necessary to understand the modern. To a philosopher, the ancient part is the most interesting, from the strong and uncommon views of human nature to be found in it. Nay, to a common reader, it must be the most interesting from the greatness and singularity of its events. In early history tory alone are found those great incidents, and total revolutions, which elevate and surprise. The modern history of Europe consists merely of wars which end in nothing, and in the filthy chicane of politics, so disgusting to every ingenuous mind. Since the eleventh century, the several kingdoms and states of Europe remain almost the same; and any radical revolutions which have happened might be comprised in a few pages. The period of great events begins at the fall of the Roman empire, and lasts till the eleventh century.

The History of England, excluding that of the Romans in Britain, falls into two periods; from the arrival of the Saxons to the Conquest; and from the Conquest till now. Each period contains about seven centuries. In Greek or Roman History, either period would occupy much about the same room. But the proportion in ours is, that the former part fills half a volume; the latter, seven volumes and a half! In Mezeray, the part of French history preceding the year 1066 fills two volumes and a half; that succeeding, four volumes and a half. This latter proportion is superior to ours; and we might at least allot two volumes out of eight for the period preceding the Conquest. As it is, every one may judge that the former period of our history must be miserably abridged indeed; and it is much to be wished that some able writer would give us an history of England preceding the Conquest, at due length. Materials he will find not wanting, if he brings industry to discover and to use them. PHILISTOR.

LETTER VIII.

Some other particular provinces of our history, which have been peculiarly neglected, remain to be briefly hinted at, before proceeding to another part of this subject, namely, the causes which may have contributed to the neglect of our national history, and which shall be entered upon in the next letter.

The chronology of our history may be regarded as a neglected department. Events, narrated by our ancient writers, are frequently put, with a variation of one, two, or more years. This often depends merely upon the different modes they followed in calculating the commencement of the year. Some began it in the month of March, and antedated events near a year: thus the year 1000 with them begins 25th March, 999. Others began the year in March, and yet retarded it three months; reckoning for example, the space of the year 1000, preceding 25th March, as belonging to the year 999. Others began the year 25th Dec. Others, at Easter, and varied its commencement as Easter varied. Some, who compute from 1st Jan. still reckon one or two more years from Christ's birth, than we do. Gervase of Canterbury, who lived in the thirteenth century, tells us in the Preface to his Chronicle: "Inter ipsos etiam chronicæ scriptores nonnulla dissentio est. Nam, cum omnium unica et præcipue sit intentio, annos Domini, eorumque continentias, supputatione veraci enarrare; ipsos Domini annos, diversis modis, et terminis, numerant:

rant: sicque in ecclesiam Dei multam mendaciorum confusionem inducunt. Quidam enim annos Domini incipiunt computare ab Annunciatione; alii a Nativitate; quidam a Circumcisione; quidam verò a Passione."

The industrious and exact authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates, from which work the above remarks are borrowed, have done every thing to adjust and settle, even to month and day, the events of French history. But a large and laborious work on the chronology of ancient English history is much wanted.

Another neglected province is the geography of Britain and Ireland in the middle ages. The Notitia Galliarum of Valesius, or Valois, 3 vols. folio, may be proposed as an example for such a work. Hardly a village or castle can be found in ancient French historians, but its situation is adjusted and illustrated in that great work, published last century; while to this day we have only Somner's Glossary at the end of Twysden's Decem Scriptores, and Gibson's at the end of the Saxon Chronicle; productions equally meagre and erroneous. Instead of solid and elaborate works on a subject so radically necessary to the understanding of our history, it is risible to see many of our antiquaries dealing in etymology of names; a matter of all others the most puerile, uncertain, and uninteresting. Our old writers drew all names from the Latin; Britannia, from Brutus, &c.; and though their etymologies were little better than his, who derived Seneca from se necans, because he killed himself, yet they were fully as rational as the Hebrew and Phenician etymology of names introduced by Bochart, or the Celtic etymology now in fashion. Of the Celtic dialects we have no ancient remains; and to derive ancient names from a language in its modern state seems complete absurdity. Swift, who ironically gives etymologies of Greek and Latin names from the English, may be regarded as the prophet of this new frenzy.

yet

The diplomatic line has also been neglected by our writers, though the works of Madox deserve high praise. In England, the number of ancient charters preserved is amazing; and perhaps no country in Europe can boast of equal treasures in this line. If only the most valuable and curious were published, they would fill many volumes in folio. Rymer's Collection of Historical Muniments does honour to the nation; and Prynne's compilation has its value. But a collection of those preceding the Conquest is still wanting; and special dissertations on their authenticity, &c. Of later times, many valuable and curious charters remain unpublished; which, though perhaps of little importance to our history, might, nevertheless, illustrate ancient laws and manners.

END OF VOL. III.

London: Printed by C. Roworth,
Bell-yard, Temple-Bar.

PR
3476
A173
1814
v.3

Gibbon, Edward
Miscellaneous works

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO
3 1761 00055762 9

THE

MISCELLANEOUS WORKS

OF

EDWARD GIBBON, ESQ.

WITH

MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE AND WRITINGS,

COMPOSED BY HIMSELF:

ILLUSTRATED FROM HIS LETTERS,

WITH OCCASIONAL NOTES AND NARRATIVE,

BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

JOHN, LORD SHEFFIELD.

A NEW EDITION, WITH CONSIDERABLE ADDITIONS, IN FIVE VOLUMES.

VOL. IV.
CLASSICAL AND CRITICAL.

11019
12/5/11

LONDON:
PRINTED FOR JOHN MURRAY, 50, ALBEMARLE-STREET.
By C. Roworth, Bell-yard, Temple-bar.

1814.

PR
3416
A173
1811
V.4

CONTENTS.

VOL. IV.

CLASSICAL AND CRITICAL.

	Page
Essai sur l'Etude de la Littérature. Written 1759 -	1
On the Character of Brutus. Date uncertain -	95
On Mr. Hurd's Commentary on Horace. Written Feb. 1762.	113
Nomina Gentesque Antiquæ Italiæ. Written 1763, 1764.	155
Sect. I.—Nomina - - - -	157
Sect. II.—Regiones, Aër et Solum Italiæ, et Mons Apenninus - - -	164
Sect. III.—Alpes et Gentes Inalpinæ, et Flumen Padus - - - -	171
Sect. IV.—Transpadana - - -	178
Sect. V.—Liguria - - - -	180
Sect. VI.—Etruria - - - -	183
Sect. VII.—Urbs Roma - - -	206
Sect. VIII.—Latium et Campania - -	225
Sect. IX.—Lucania et Bruttium - -	265
Sect. X.—Calabria et Apulia - - -	278
Sect. XI.—Samnium - - - -	287
Sect. XII.—Picenum - - - -	302
Sect. XIII.—Umbria - - - -	305
Sect. XIV.—Æmilia et Flaminia - -	309
Sect. XV.—Venetia et Istria - - -	315
Sect. XVI.—Itinera - - - -	322
An Inquiry whether a Catalogue of the Armies sent into the Field is an essential part of an Epic Poem. 23d Dec. 1763 - - - - - -	327

Page

An Examination of the Catalogue of Silius Italicus. 24th Dec. 1763 - - - - - 335

A Minute Examination of Horace's Journey to Brundusium and of Cicero's Journey into Cilicia. 25th Dec. 1763 346

On the Fasti of Ovid. Written 1764 - - 354

On the Triumphs of the Romans. Nov. 1764 - - 359

On the Triumphal Shows and Ceremonies. 13th Dec. 1764. 394

Remarques sur les Ouvrages et sur le Caractère de Salluste. 19th Jan. 1756 - - - - - 399

——— de Jules César - - - - 408

——— de Cornelius Nepos - - - 416

——— de Tite Live - - - - 422

Remarques Critiques sur un Passage de Plaute. 4th May, 1757 - - - - - - 435

Remarques sur quelques Endroits de Virgile. April, 1757. 441

Critical Observations on the Design of the Sixth Book of the Æneid. Written 1770 - - - - 467

Postscript to Ditto - - - - - 510

A Vindication of some Passages in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Chapters of the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. 3d Feb. 1779 - - 575

Classical and Critical.

ESSAI SUR L'ÉTUDE DE LA LITTÉRATURE.

The following is in Mr. Gibbon's hand-writing, on the back of the title-page of an interleaved copy of this Essay.

Mes amis me firent publier cet ouvrage, pour ainsi dire, malgré moi. Cette excuse banale des auteurs ne l'est point cependant pour moi. Mon père voulut me le faire publier l'hiver passé. Ma jeunesse, et un fonds d'orgueil qui me rend beaucoup plus sensible aux critiques qu'aux éloges, m'empêchèrent de goûter son projet. Mais me trouvant à la campagne avec lui au mois de Mars, il renouvella ses instances d'une manière si vive que je ne pus m'en défendre. M. Mallet me fit connoître un libraire nommé Becket, à qui je cédai mon manuscrit, moyennant quarante exemplaires pour moi. M. Maty corrigea les feuilles. L'impression de l'ouvrage, entreprise au commencement de Mai, ne fût achevée qu'à la fin de Juin, et mon livre ne se débitoit que vers le milieu du mois suivant. M. Mallet se chargea de la distribution d'une bonne partie des présens que j'avois envie d'en faire. Voici l'extrait d'une lettre qu'il m'écrivit le 9 Juillet 1761.

" DEAR SIR,

" I HAVE executed the orders you gave me, and all the books have been delivered some days. Lord Chesterfield returns you his thanks, I expect in writing, and have had Lady Hervey's in that manner. Lord Hardwicke, with his compliments for the book to himself, assured me he would send the other to his son, and recommend you to his acquaintance. Lord Egremont will be glad to know you, if ever you should think of a journey to Augsbourg. I found Lord Granville reading you, after ten at night; his single approbation, which he assures you of, will go for more than that of a hundred other readers. I have gone further, in sending one copy to the Count de Caylus, another to the Duchess d'Aiguillon, and in giving a third to M. de Bussy."

To EDWARD GIBBON, Esq.

Dear Sir,

No performance is, in my opinion, more contemptible than a Dedication of the common sort; when some great man is presented with a book, which, if Science be the subject, he is incapable of understanding; if Polite Literature, incapable of tasting: and this honour is done him as a reward for virtues which he neither does, nor desires to possess. I know but two kinds of dedications, which can do honour either to the patron or author. The first is, when an unexperienced writer addresses himself to a master of the art, in which he endeavours to excel; whose example he is ambitious of imitating; by whose advice he has been directed; or whose approbation he is anxious to deserve.

The other sort is yet more honourable. It is dictated by the heart, and offered to some person who is dear to us, because he ought to be so. It is an opportunity we embrace with pleasure of making public those sentiments of esteem, of friendship, of gratitude, or of all together, which we really feel, and which therefore we desire should be known.

I hope, dear Sir, my past conduct will easily lead you to discover to what principle you should attribute this epistle; which, if it surprises, will, I hope, not displease you. If I am capable of producing any thing worthy the attention of the public, it is to you that I owe it; to that truly paternal care which, from the first dawnings of my reason, has always watched over my education, and afforded me every opportunity of improvement. Permit me here to express my grateful sense of your tenderness to me, and to assure you, that the study of my whole life shall be to acquit myself, in some measure, of obligations I can never fully repay.

I am, dear Sir,
With the sincerest affection and regard,
Your most dutiful son, and faithful servant,
E. GIBBON, junior.

May the 28th, 1761.

AVIS

AVIS AU LECTEUR.

C'est un véritable essai que je produis au grand jour. Je souhaiterois me connoître. Ma prévention et celle de quelques amis, m'en inspireroient des idées trop avantageuses, si mon Apollon,* cette voix secrette que je ne puis faire taire, ne m'avertissoit souvent de me défier de leurs éloges. Dois-je me borner à recueillir avec reconnoissance les bienfaits de mes prédécesseurs? Puis-je espérer d'ajouter quelque chose au trésor commun des vérités ou du moins des idées? Je tâcherai d'entendre l'arrêt du public et même son silence, et je ne l'entendrai que pour m'y soumettre. Point de Philippiques contre mon siècle, point d'appel à la postérité.

L'envie de justifier une étude favorite, c'est-à-dire, l'amour-propre un peu déguisé, fit naître les réflexions suivantes. Je voulois affranchir une science estimable, du mépris où elle languit aujourd'hui. Il est vrai qu'on lit encore les anciens, mais on ne les étudie plus. On n'y apporte plus cette attention, et cet appareil de connoissances que Cicéron et Bossuet exigent de leurs lecteurs. Il est encore des gens de goût, mais il est peu de littérateurs; et ceux qui savent que les gens de lettres peuvent se passer des récompenses plus aisément que de l'estime du public, ne s'en étonneront point.

C'est un essai, je le repète encore; ce n'est point

* —— Cynthius aurem Vellit et admonuit.

un traité complet qu'on va lire. J'ai envisagé la littérature sous quelques points de vue qui m'avoient frappé. Plusieurs, sans doute, me sont échappés. J'en ai négligé quelques autres. Je ne suis point entré dans la carrière immense des beaux-arts, des beautés qu'ils empruntent de la littérature, et de celles qu'ils lui rendent. Que ne suis-je un Caylus ou un Spence!* J'éleverois un monument éternel à leur alliance. L'on y verroit l'image de Jupiter éclorre dans le cerveau d'Homère, et venir se placer sous le ciseau de Phidias. Mais je ne me suis point dit avec le Corrège; " et moi aussi je suis peintre."

Le 3 Février, 1759.

Après avoir gardé, pendant deux ans, ce petit ouvrage, l'amusement de mon loisir à la campagne, je me hasarde enfin à le donner au public. J'ai besoin de son indulgence pour le fond des choses, et pour le langage. Ma jeunesse m'y donne un juste titre pour l'un, et ma qualité d'étranger me la rend bien nécessaire pour l'autre.

Le 16 Avril, 1761.

* Auteur d'un ouvrage nommé Polymetis. La mythologie des poëtes y est combinée avec celle des sculpteurs. Cet ouvrage plein de goût et de savoir mériteroit d'être plus connu en France.

A L'AU-

À L'AUTEUR.

Je reçois, mon cher Monsieur, les feuilles de votre ouvrage, toutes mouillées au sortir de la presse. Le sentiment qui vous engagea à me les communiquer, est passé dans mon cœur. Ne me demandez plus mon jugement, il ne peut être que partial.

Mais le public aura-t-il les yeux d'un ami; cet essai de vos forces, ce germe heureux d'ouvrages plus considérables, sera-t-il accueilli, sera-t-il épargné? inquiétude naturelle à un jeune auteur! Elle l'honore, elle n'est permise qu'à lui. A Dieu ne plaise que vous perdiez de long tems cette précieuse défiance de l'approbation du public, qui vous mit en état de la mériter! Si jamais vieux écrivain vous prenez moins de peine, c'est que vous vous connoîtrez mieux et craindrez moins vos juges.

Voudrois-je ôter à la jeune beauté la modeste rougeur qui lui fait méconnoître ses charmes, et qui ne cessera que quand ils ne seront plus? Non, Monsieur, je ne vous rassure point; je veux jouir de vos allarmes; vos censeurs vont paroître; armez-vous d'intrépidité.

Avez-vous pu croire qu'on pardonneroit à un homme né pour assister aux assemblées tumultueuses du sénat, et à la destruction des renards de sa province, des discussions sur ce qu'on pensa, il y a deux mille ans, sur les divinités de la Grèce, et sur les premiers siècles de Rome? Quoi! pas la moindre allusion à ce qui se passe de nos jours! Une brochure, où il n'est question ni de la guerre ni du commerce, où l'on ne prescrit point de limites ni ne propose aucune réduction, où l'on ne fait aucun compliment au prince, ni de leçon à ses ministres! En vérité je vous admire, et qu'en dira-t-on, je vous le demande, en Hampshire?

Le Grec doit être laissé au collège et à la roture; ainsi l'a-t-on peut-être décidé chez nos voisins, et cette mode menace de devenir contagieuse. Je sais que Paris ne se croit pas encore déshonoré d'un Caylus et d'un Nivernois, et que votre île compte avec plaisir ses Lyttelton, ses Marchmont, ses Orrery, ses Bath, ses Granville. Mais vous êtes jeune, et l'on soupçonne ceux que je viens de vous nommer d'être un peu du siècle passé. Vos notes sont savantes, mais qui à Newmarket ou dans le caffé d'Arthur peut les lire?

Point d'ordre ni de liaison, dira le géomètre piqué. N'en soyez point surpris, il voit en vous un transfuge. Vous n'avez point donné la pomme à sa Venus, et il juge un écrit de goût sur le pied des élémens d'Euclide.

Parmi vos critiques je vois le littérateur lui-même. Je ne dirai pas que vous pensez, et lui laissez le soin de recueillir. Je vous respecte trop pour voler ce bon mot à Voltaire. Mais vos notes ne consistent point en corrections de passages. Quel vers d'Aristophane avez-vous restitué? De quel manuscrit vous appuyez-vous? D'ailleurs vous envisagez quelques objets sous un point de vue ou nouveau ou singulier. Votre chronologie est celle de Newton; vous justifiez l'anachronisme de Virgile; vos Dieux ne sont pas ceux de . . . Craignez sa nouvelle édition; vous aurez place dans ses notes.

vue

Je ne vous reproche point l'obscurité, dirai-je, ou la profondeur de quelques unes de vos pensées, vos phrases coupées, la hardiesse de vos figures. La nation académique sera moins facile, et frondera quiconque voudroit vous appliquer une de vos notes, et l'aveu modeste de l'orateur Romain, en relisant dans l'age de la maturité, un morceau applaudi de sa jeunesse. Quantis illa clamoribus, adolescentuli, il avoit 26 ans, *diximus de supplicio parricidarum? quæ nequaquam satis deferbuisse post aliquanto sentire cœpimus . . . Sunt enim omnia, sicut adolescentis, non tam re et maturitate, quam spe et expectatione, laudati.

J'ai gardé pour le dernier le plus grand de vos crimes. Vous êtes Anglois, et vous choisissez la langue de vos ennemis. Le vieux Caton frémit, et dans son Club Antigallican, vous dénonce, le punch à la main, un ennemi de la patrie. " Mes chers amis, dit-il, la liberté est prête d'expirer. Ce peuple, dont nous avons toujours triomphé, regagne par ses artifices plus que ne lui enlèvent nos armes. N'est-ce pas assez que nous ayons des baladins, des friseurs, des cuisiniers de Paris, qu'on boive dans notre île, qu'on boive des vins, qu'on lise des livres François; faut-il encore, grands

* Cicero. Orator. 29.

Dieux!

Dieux! est-ce dans le plus haut période de notre gloire qu'un Anglois devoit donner ce premier exemple? faut-il encore qu'on en écrive?"

Contre une attaque aussi grave quel rempart vous ferez-vous? Trouverez-vous des défenseurs où vous n'avez point de complices? Oserai-je élever ma voix moi, qui, Anglois simplement par choix sans l'être de naissance, n'ai pu, après vingt ans de séjour dans votre île, naturaliser ma langue aussi bien que mon cœur?

Dirai-je ce que Plutarque, à peu près dans le même cas que moi, auroit dit, que rien ne fut plus vain que la prophétie de l'acre censeur, que le Grec perdroit sa patrie, puisqu'au contraire elle s'éleva au comble de la gloire et du pouvoir dans le tems que les lettres Grecques et l'érudition étrangère y fleurirent le plus,* que ce peuple qui, tant qu'il fut libre, plaça sa grandeur dans ce qui seul fait la grandeur d'un peuple, fit venir ses grammairiens, mais non ses généraux de la Grèce, au lieu que Carthage y prit ses soldats et ses généraux, et en défendit la langue ;† que Flaminius, Scipion, Caton même, ... mais comme eux je parle Grec à votre homme. Il ignore également que Cicéron fut initié à Athènes, et que le nom de Chesterfield se trouve dans les registres d'une célèbre académie de Paris: il jureroit que les Edouards et les Henris ne parlèrent ou du moins ne lurent jamais de François, et si je le pressois, il me soutiendroit peut-être que le roi de Prusse se-

* Plutarch. in Cat. Major. † Justin. xx. 5.

roit

roit déjà maître de Vienne, s'il n'eût pas écrit, en style de Voltaire, les Mémoires de Brandebourg.

Mépriser sa propre langue, rien sans doute de plus honteux. Mais la méprise-t-on à moins qu'on ne donne l'exclusion à toute autre? Cicéron, qui écrivit l'histoire de son consulat en Grec, préféra donc cette langue, lui qui n'eut jamais de rival dans la sienne, qui la croyoit, peut-être par préjugé, beaucoup plus riche que la Grecque,* et qui, s'il ne la rendit pas telle, étendit les bornes de sa juridiction plus que César celles de l'empire.

S'il étoit vrai que le génie insociable des diverses langues empêche celui qui veut les concilier, d'exceller dans aucune, on auroit tort sans doute de s'exposer au risque de corrompre la pureté de celle qui nous est naturelle, sans pouvoir se flatter de réussir dans celle qui ne l'est pas. Mais tant s'en faut que l'expérience ait confirmé cette prétendue crainte des mélanges. Jamais les Romains n'écrivirent mieux en Latin qu'au sortir des écoles Grecques. Le morceau de Cicéron, dont j'ai parlé, nous a probablement valu les chef-d'œuvres Latins de Salluste, et sans l'histoire de Polybe, revue par le héros qui avoit été son disciple, nous n'aurions peut-être jamais eu ni Tite Live ni Tacite.

Toute langue, qui se suffit, est bornée. La vôtre, plus que toute autre, s'est enrichie par ses emprunts. Seroit-il impossible que l'Italien ne pût encore la rendre plus douce, l'Allemand plus com-

* De Finib. lib. iii.

pré-

préhensive, le François plus précise et plus régulière? Semblables à ces lacs dont les eaux s'épurent et s'éclaircissent par le mélange et l'agitation de celles qu'ils reçoivent des fleuves voisins, les langues modernes ne demeurent vivantes que par leur communication, et si je l'osois dire par, leur choc réciproque.

Non, ce n'est point de l'écrivain qui s'exerce à écrire avec pureté dans une langue étrangère, que la sienne a lieu de craindre qu'il ne l'altère mal à propos. Le dégré de perfection, auquel elle peut atteindre, est son objet, et l'analogie sa règle. Il connoît trop les richesses de sa langue, pour la charger de mots inutilement transplantés. Il a étudié son caractère, et ne se permet point de constructions forcées, sous prétexte de se faire lire. Respectant même ses bizarreries, il sait qu'un long usage exige de grands ménagemens, et que l'homme sensé ne se distingue jamais beaucoup, et très rarement le premier.

Qui sont donc les véritables corrupteurs des langues? Ces petits beaux-esprits qui, faute de nouvelles idées, n'ont pour se distinguer que leur néologique jargon; ces jeunes voyageurs qui, de Paris qu'ils ont mal vu, rapportent et font circuler l'expression du jour qu'ils n'ont pas comprise; et plus futiles que les uns et les autres, ces demi-savans, qui croyent donner du relief à leur paradoxes, et de la variété à leur style, par l'introduction de synomimes barbares, dont leur dictionnaire leur a, peut-être à grand'peine, indiqué le sens.

Rarement

Rarement un étranger parvient-il à écrire dans une langue, qui n'est pas la sienne, de manière à n'être pas reconnu. Mais faut-il qu'il ne le soit pas? Lucullus auroit pu se passer d'affecter des Latinismes, de peur d'être pris pour un Grec, et je ne crois pas que vous vous piquiez d'être moins facile à reconnoître pour un Anglois que Lucullus pour un Romain. Mais c'est cela même qui, aux yeux d'un François, vous donnera un nouveau mérite. Il remarquera un mot, un tour étranger à sa langue, et peut-être souhaitera qu'il ne le fût pas. Ces traits saillans, ces figures hardies, ce sacrifice de la règle au sentiment, et de la cadence à la force, lui caractériseront une nation originale, qui mérite d'être étudiée, et qui gagne toujours à l'être. L'individu ne lui échappera pas, et il saura discerner ce que vous devez à votre île, et ce que votre île vous doit.

Quand on ne sait qu'une langue, c'est par les traductions seules qu'on connoît les auteurs étrangers. Suffisent-elles pour en juger? Ferai-je la satyre des personnes qui se consacrent à la pénible tâche de traduire, en affirmant que leur moindre défaut est de nous faire perdre le caractère national et personnel de leurs auteurs? Ah! que ces auteurs n'ont-ils écrit eux-mêmes, quoique mal, dans une autre langue! Mon expression est celle qui accompagne ma pensée. Vous qui me traduisez, sentez-vous ce que j'ai senti? Montaigne seroit toujours Montaigne, s'il eut lui-même été le cuisinier Anglois de ses essais, et j'estimerois vingt fois plus un des livres de Milton écrit en François ou en Italien par Milton, que les traductions élégantes de Du Boccage et de Rolli.

ou

Que si, dans vos climats si heureusement isolés, quelques personnes jalouses de l'universalité que le François s'est acquis sur le Continent, se plaignoient que vous rompez la dernière digue qui s'oppose à l'inondation, qu'elles me permettent de ne pas regarder comme un grand malheur, qu'une langue commune lie de plus en plus les états de l'Europe, facilite les conférences des ministres, prévienne les longueurs des négociations et les équivoques des traités, fasse souhaiter la paix, et la rende plus durable et plus chère. Le premier pas qu'on doive faire pour s'accorder, c'est de travailler à s'entendre.

Vous venez, Monsieur, de donner un grand exemple. Au milieu des succès de vos armes vous avez honoré les lettres de vos ennemis. Ce dernier triomphe est le plus noble. Puisse-t-il devenir général et réciproque, et le tems venir, où les divers peuples, membres épars de la même famille, s'élevant au-dessus des distinctions partiales d'Anglois, de François, d'Allemand, et de Russe, mériteront le titre d'homme!

J'ai l'honneur d'être avec des sentimens qui ne dépendent d'aucun climat ni d'aucun siècle,

MONSIEUR,

Votre très humble et très obéïsant serviteur,

M. MATY.

Du Musée Britannique, le 16 Juin, 1761.

ESSAI

ESSAI

SUR

L'ÉTUDE DE LA LITTÉRATURE.

I. L'HISTOIRE des empires est celle de la misère des hommes. L'histoire des sciences est celle de leur grandeur et de leur bonheur. Si mille considérations doivent rendre ce dernier genre d'étude précieux aux yeux du philosophe, cette réflexion doit le rendre bien cher à tout amateur de l'humanité. Idée de l'histoire littéraire.

II. Que je voudrois qu'une vérité aussi consolante ne reçût aucune exception! Mais, hélas! l'homme ne perce que trop souvent dans le cabinet du savant. Dans cet asile de la sagesse, il est encore égaré par les préjugés, déchiré par les passions, avili par les foiblesses.

L'empire de la mode est fondé sur l'inconstance des hommes; empire dont l'origine est si frivole et dont les effets sont si funestes. L'homme de lettres n'ose secouer son joug, et si ses réflexions retardent sa défaite, elles la rendent plus honteuse.

Tous les pays, tous les siècles ont vu quelque science l'objet d'une préférence souvent injuste, pendant que les autres études languissoient dans un un mépris tout aussi peu raisonnable. La métaphysique et la dialectique sous les successeurs d'Alexandre,* la politique et l'éloquence sous la république Romaine, l'histoire, la poësie dans le siècle d'Auguste, la grammaire et la juriprudence sous le Bas-Empire, la philosophie scholastique dans le treizième siècle, les Belles-Lettres jusqu'aux jours de nos pères, ont fait, tour-à-tour, l'admiration et le mépris des hommes. La physique et les mathématiques sont à présent sur le trône. Elles voyent toutes leurs sœurs prosternées devant elles, enchainées à leur char, ou tout-au-plus occupées à

* Ce siècle fut celui des sectes philosophiques, qui combattoient pour les systêmes de leurs maîtres respectifs, avec tout l'acharnement des théologiens.

L'amour des systêmes produit nécessairement celui des principes généraux ; et celui-ci conduit d'ordinaire au mépris des connoissances de détail.

" L'amour des systêmes, (dit M. Freret,) qui s'empara des esprits après Aristote, fit abandonner aux Grecs l'étude de la nature, et arrêta le progrès de leurs découvertes philosophiques: les raisonnemens subtils prirent la place des expériences: les sciences exactes, la géométrie, l'astronomie, la vraie philosophie disparurent presqu'entièrement. On ne s'occupa plus du soin d'acquérir des connoissances nouvelles, mais de celui de ranger, et de lier les unes aux autres, celles que l'on croyoit avoir, pour en former des systêmes. C'est là ce qui forma toutes les différentes sectes: les meilleurs esprits s'évaporèrent dans les abstractions d'une métaphysique obscure, où les mots tenoient le plus souvent la place des choses, et la dialectique, nommée par Aristote l'instrument de notre esprit, devint chez ses disciples l'objet principal et presque unique de leur application. La vie entière se passoit à étudier l'art du raisonnement, et à ne raisonner jamais, ou du moins à ne raisonner que sur des objets fantastiques."— Mém. de l'Acad. des B. L. tom. vi. p. 159.

orner

orner leur triomphe. Peut-être leur chute n'est pas éloignée.

Il seroit digne d'un habile homme de suivre cette révolution dans les religions, les gouvernemens, les mœurs, qui ont successivement égaré, désolé et corrompu les hommes. Qu'il se gardât bien de chercher un système; mais qu'il se gardât bien davantage de l'éviter.

III. Si les Grecs n'avoient été esclaves, les Latins seroient encore barbares. Constantinople tomba sous le fer de Mahomet. Les Médicis accueillirent les Muses désolées: ils encouragèrent les lettres. Erasme fit plus, il les cultiva. Homère et Cicéron pénétrèrent dans des contrées inconnues à Alexandre, et invincibles pour les Romains. Ces siècles trouvoient qu'il étoit beau d'étudier les anciens et de les admirer:* le nôtre pense qu'il est plus aisé de les ignorer et de les mépriser. Je crois qu'ils ont tous les deux raison. Le guerrier les lisoit sous sa tente. L'homme d'état les étudioit dans son cabinet. Ce sexe même, qui, content des graces, nous laisse les lumières, embellissoit l'exemple d'une Délie, et souhaitoit de trouver un Tibulle dans son amant.

Renaissance des Belles-Lettres. Goût qu'on eut pour elles.

* Feuilletez la Bibliothèque Latine de Fabricius, le meilleur de tous ceux qui n'ont été que compilateurs: vous y verrez que dans l'espace de quarante ans, après la découverte de l'imprimerie, presque tous les auteurs Latins étoient imprimés, quelques uns même plus d'une fois. Le goût des éditeurs n'égala pas, il est vrai, leur zèle. Les écrivains de l'histoire Auguste parurent avant Tite Live; et l'on donna Aulu-Gelle avant de songer à Virgile.

Elizabeth (ce nom dit tout pour le Sage) apprenoit dans Hérodote à défendre les droits de l'humanité contre un nouveau Xerxes, et au sortir des combats se voyoit célébrée par Eschyle sous le nom des vainqueurs de Salamine.* †

Si Christine préféra la science au gouvernement d'un état, le politique peut la mépriser, le philosophe doit la blâmer, mais l'homme de lettres chérira sa mémoire. Cette reine étudioit les anciens : elle en considéroit les interprètes. Elle distingua ce Saumaise, qui ne mérita ni l'admiration de ses contemporains, ni le mépris dont nous nous efforçons de le combler.

On le poussa trop loin.

IV. Sans doute elle poussa trop loin l'admiration pour ces savans. Souvent leur défenseur, jamais leur zélateur, j'avouerai sans peine que leurs mœurs étoient grossières, leurs travaux quelquefois minutieux ; que leur esprit, noyé dans une érudition pédantesque, commentoit ce qu'il falloit sentir, et compiloit au lieu de raisonner. On étoit assez

* Eschyle a fait une tragédie, (les Perses,) où il a peint avec les couleurs les plus vives, la gloire des Grecs et la consternation des Perses après la journée de Salamine.—V. le Théât. des Grecs du P. Brumoy, tom. ii. p. 171, &c.

† Ecoutons le Président Hénault. " Cette princesse étoit savante. Un jour qu'elle entretenoit Calignon, qui fut depuis Chancelier de Navare, elle lui fit voir une traduction en Latin, qu'elle avoit faite, de quelques tragédies de Sophocles et de deux harangues de Démosthène. Elle lui permit de prendre une copie d'une épigramme Grecque de sa façon ; et elle lui demanda son avis sur des passages de Lycophron, qu'elle avoit alors entre les mains, et dont elle vouloit traduire quelques endroits."—Abrég. Chronolog. in Quart. Paris, 1752, p. 397.

éclairé

éclairé pour sentir l'utilité de leurs recherches; mais l'on n'étoit ni assez raisonnable ni assez poli, pour connoître qu'elles auroient pu être guidées par le flambeau de la philosophie.

V. La lumière alloit paroître. Descartes ne fut pas littérateur, mais les Belles-Lettres lui sont bien redevables. Un philosophe éclairé,* héritier de sa méthode, approfondit les vrais principes de la critique. Le Bossu, Boileau, Rapin, Brumoy apprirent aux hommes à connoître mieux le prix des trésors qu'ils possédoient. Une de ces sociétés qui ont mieux immortalisé Louis XIV. qu'une ambition souvent pernicieuse aux hommes, commençoit déjà ces recherches qui réunissent la justesse de l'esprit, l'aménité et l'érudition, où l'on voit tant de découvertes, et quelquefois, ce qui ne cède qu'à peine aux découvertes, une ignorance modeste et savante. Quand il devenoit plus raisonnable.

Si les hommes raisonnoient autant lorsqu'ils agissent que lorsqu'ils discourent, les Belles-Lettres seroient devenues l'objet de l'admiration du vulgaire et de l'estime des sages.

VI. C'est de cette époque qu'elles datent le commencement de leur décadence. Le Clerc, à qui les sciences et la liberté doivent des éloges, s'en plaignoit déjà, il y a plus de soixante ans. Mais c'est dans la fameuse dispute des anciens et des modernes qu'elles reçurent le coup mortel. Il n'y a jamais eu un combat aussi inégal. La logique Décadence des Belles-Lettres.

* M. Le Clerc, dans son excellent Ars critica, et dans plusieurs autres de ses ouvrages.

exacte de Terrasson, la philosophie déliée de Fontenelle, le style élégant et heureux de La Motte, le badinage léger de St. Hyacinte, travailloient de concert à réduire Homère au niveau de Chapelain. Leurs adversaires ne leur opposoient qu'un attachement aux minuties, je ne sais quelles prétensions à une supériorité naturelle des anciens, des préjugés, des injures et des citations. Tout le ridicule leur demeura. Il en rejaillit une partie sur ces anciens, dont ils soutenoient la querelle: et chez cette nation aimable, qui a adopté, sans y penser, le principe de Milord Shaftesbury, on ne distingue point les torts et les ridicules.

Depuis ce tems, nos philosophes se sont étonnés que des hommes pussent passer une vie entière à rassembler des faits et des mots; et à se charger la mémoire au lieu de s'éclairer l'esprit. Nos beaux-esprits ont senti quels avantages leur reviendroient de l'ignorance de leurs lecteurs. Ils ont comblé de mépris les anciens, et ceux qui les étudient encore.*†

VII.

* On a ôté à cette étude le nom de Belles-Lettres, qu'une longue prescription sembloit lui avoir consacré, pour y substituer celui d'érudition. (1) Nos littérateurs sont devenus des érudits. L'Abbé Massieu traitoit cette dernière expression de néologisme en 1721. (2) Changeroit-il de ton à présent? Il siéroit mal à un étranger de vouloir le décider. Je connois tous les droits des grands † Fontenelle dans sa digression sur les anciens et les modernes, et ailleurs.—Oeuv. de Gresset. tom ii. p. 45.

(1) V. La Motte et D'Alembert.

(2) Massieu dans sa préface aux œuvres de Toureil.

VII. Je voudrois faire succéder à ce tableau quelques réflexions, qui pourront fixer la juste valeur des Belles-Lettres.

Grands hommes littérateurs.

Les exemples des grands hommes ne prouvent rien ; Cassini, avant de régler le cours des planètes, crut y lire le destin des hommes.* Cependant, lorsqu'ils sont en grand nombre, ils préviennent avant l'examen, après l'examen ils confirment. On sent d'abord qu'un génie capable de raisonner, une imagination vive et brillante ne goûteroient jamais une science, qui ne seroit que de mémoire. De tous ces hommes qui ont éclairé la terre, plusieurs se sont livrés à l'étude des Belles-Lettres; beaucoup l'ont cultivée; aucun, ou presqu'aucun, ne l'a méprisée. Toute l'antiquité se montroit sans voile aux yeux de Grotius : éclairé par sa lumière, il développoit les oracles sacrés, il combattoit l'ignorance et la superstition, il adoucissoit les horreurs de la guerre. Si Descartes, livré tout entier à sa philosophie, méprisoit toute étude qui ne s'y rapportoit pas, Newton† ne dédaigna pas de con-grands écrivains sur la langue; mais je voudrois, qu'après avoir reconnu qu'un érudit peut avoir du goût, des vues, de la finesse dans l'esprit, (1) ils ne se servissent pas de ce terme pour désigner un servile admirateur des anciens, d'autant plus aveugle qu'il y a tout vu, hors leurs graces et leurs beautés. (2)

* Fontenelle dans son Eloge.—VOLTAIRE, tom. xvii. p. 79.

† Newton réformoit la chronologie ordinaire, et y trouvoit des erreurs de cinq à six cens ans. Voyez mes Remarques Critiques sur cette Chronologie.

(1) M. D'Alemb. dans l'art. Erudition de l'Encycl. Françoise.

(2) M. D'Alemb. dans le discours préliminaire de l'Encyclopédie, et ailleurs.

struire un système de chronologie, qui a eu des partisans et beaucoup d'admirateurs : Gassendi, le meilleur philosophe des littérateurs et le meilleur littérateur des philosophes, expliquoit Epicure en critique, et le défendoit en physicien : Leibnitz passoit de ses recherches immenses sur l'histoire aux infiniment-petits. Si son édition de Martianus Capella avoit paru, son exemple auroit justifié les littérateurs, ses lumières les auroient éclairés.* Le Dictionnaire de Bayle sera un monument éternel de la force, et de la fécondité de l'érudition combinée avec le génie.

Littérateurs grands hommes.

VIII. Si nous ne faisons attention qu'à ceux qui ont consacré presque tous leurs travaux à la littérature, les vrais connoisseurs sauront toujours distinguer et apprécier l'esprit délicat et étendu d'Erasme, l'exactitude de Casaubon et de Gerard Vossius, la vivacité de Juste-Lipse, le goût, la finesse de Taneguy-le-Febvre, les ressources, la fécondité d'Isaac Vossius, la pénétration hardie de Bentley, l'aménité de Massieu et de Fraguier, la critique solide et éclairée de Sallier, l'esprit profond et philosophique de Le Clerc et de Freret. Ils ne confondront point ces grands hommes avec de simples compilateurs, un Gruter, un Saumaise, un Masson, et tant d'autres, hommes à la vérité utiles par leurs travaux, mais qui ne méritent jamais notre admiration, qui excitent rarement notre goût, et qui quelquefois seulement exigent notre estime.

Le Gout.

IX. Les anciens auteurs ont laissé des modèles

* La vie de Leibnitz par de Neufville, à la tête de sa Théodicée.

pour

pour ceux qui oseront marcher sur leurs traces : des lectures aux autres, où ils pourront puiser les principes du bon goût, et remplir leur loisir par l'étude de ces précieuses productions, où la vérité ne se montre qu'embellie de tous les trésors de l'imagination. Les poëtes et les orateurs doivent peindre la nature. Tout l'univers peut leur fournir des couleurs ; mais parmi cette variété immense on peut ranger sous trois classes les images dont ils se servent : l'homme, la nature, et l'art. Les images de la première espèce, le tableau de l'homme, de ses grandeurs, de ses petitesses, de ses passions, de ses changemens, sont celles qui conduisent le plus sûrement un écrivain à l'immortalité. Chaque fois qu'on lit Euripide, où Térence, on y découvre de nouvelles beautés. Cependant ce n'est ni à la conduite souvent défectueuse de leurs pièces, ni aux finesses cachées de leur heureuse simplicité, que ces poëtes doivent leur renommée. Le cœur se reconnoît dans leurs tableaux vrais et naïfs, et s'y reconnoît avec plaisir.

Trois sources de beautés.

La nature, toute vaste qu'elle est, a fourni peu d'images aux poëtes. Bornés, par leur objet ou par le préjugé des hommes, à son écorce, ils n'ont pu peindre que la successive variété des saisons, une mer irritée par les tempêtes, les zéphirs du printems respirant l'amour et les plaisirs. Un petit nombre de génies ont bientôt épuisé ces tableaux.

X. L'art leur restoit. J'entends par l'art tout ce dont les hommes ont orné ou défiguré la nature, les religions, les gouvernemens, les usages. Ils s'en sont tous servis : et il faut convenir qu'ils ont tous eu raison. Leurs concitoyens et leurs contemporains les entendoient sans peine, et les lisoient avec plaisir. Ils aimoient à retrouver dans les ouvrages des grands hommes de leur nation, tout ce qui avoit rendu leurs ancêtres respectables, tout ce qu'ils regardoient comme sacré, tout ce qu'ils pratiquoient comme utile.

Images artificielles.

Les mœurs des anciens favorables à la poësie dans l'art militaire.

XI. Les mœurs des anciens étoient plus favorables à la poësie que les nôtres : c'est une forte présomption qu'ils nous y ont surpassés.

A mesure que les arts se sont perfectionnés, les ressorts se sont simplifiés. Dans la guerre, dans la politique, dans la religion, de plus grands effets ont été produits par des causes plus simples. Sans doute les Maurice et les Cumberland * entendoient mieux l'art militaire que les Achille et les Ajax :

" Tels ne parurent point aux rives du Scamandre,
" Sous ces murs tant vantés que Pyrrhus mit en cendre,
" Ces antiques héros qui montés sur un char
" Combattoient en désordre et marchoient au hasard."†

Cependant les batailles du poëte François sont-elles diversifiées comme celles du poëte Grec? Ses héros sont-ils aussi intéressans? Tous ces combats

* Je n'ai point cherché à faire un compliment à son A. R. Mgr. le Duc de Cumberland, dont je respecte infiniment la naissance et le rang, sans oser apprécier ses talens militaires. Si l'on se rappelle que les vers suivans sont tirés du poëme sur la bataille de Fontenoy, on sentira que c'est plutôt M. de Voltaire qui parle que moi. Je ne crois pas cette remarque inutile. Des gens d'esprit s'y sont trompés.

† Oeuvres de Volt. tom. ii. p. 300.

singu-

singuliers des chefs, tous ces longs discours aux mourans, toutes ces rencontres inattendues, prouvent l'enfance de l'art, mais donnent au poëte le moyen de nous faire connoître ses héros, et de nous intéresser à leur destin. Aujourd'hui les armées sont de vastes machines animées par le souffle du général. La Muse se refuse à la description de ses manœuvres : elle n'ose percer ce tourbillon de poudre et de poussière, qui cache à ses yeux le brave et le lâche, le chef et le soldat.

Dans la politique.

XII. Les anciennes républiques de la Grèce ignoroient les premiers principes d'un bon gouvernement. Le peuple s'assembloit en tumulte pour décider plutôt que pour délibérer. Leurs factions étoient furieuses et immortelles, leurs séditions fréquentes et terribles, leurs plus beaux jours remplis de méfiance, d'envie et de confusion :* leurs citoyens étoient malheureux, mais leurs écrivains, l'imagination échauffée par ces affreux objets, les peignoient comme ils les sentoient. La tranquille administration des loix, ces arrêts salutaires qui, sortis du cabinet d'un seul ou du conseil d'un petit nombre, vont répandre la félicité chez un peuple entier, n'excitent chez le poëte que l'admiration, la plus froide de toutes les passions.

Dans la religion.

XIII. La mythologie ancienne qui animoit toute la nature, étendoit son influence sur la plume du

* Voy. le iii. L. de Thucydide.

Diodore de Sicile, depuis le L. xi. jusqu'au L. xx. presque par tout.

La Préface de l'Abbé Terrasson au iii. tom. de sa Traduction de Diodore de Sicile, et Hume's Political Essays, p. 191.

poëte.

poëte. Inspiré par la muse, il chantoit les attributs, les aventures, et les malheurs des dieux. L'Etre infini, que la religion et la philosophie nous ont fait connoître, est au-dessus de ses chants : le sublime à son égard devient puérile. Le Fiat de Moïse nous frappe;* mais la raison ne sauroit suivre les travaux de la Divinité qui ébranle sans efforts et sans instrumens des millions de mondes, et l'imagination ne peut voir avec plaisir les diables de Milton, combattre pendant deux jours les armées du Tout Puissant.†

Les anciens connoissoient leurs avantages, et les employoient avec succès. Ces chef-d'œuvres que nous admirons encore en sont la meilleure preuve.

Moyens de sentir les beautés.

XIV. Mais nous, placés sous un autre ciel, nés dans un autre siècle, nous perdrions nécessairement toutes ces beautés, faute de pouvoir nous placer au même point de vue, où se trouvoient les Grecs et les Romains. Une connoissance détaillée de leur siècle est le seul moyen qui puisse nous y conduire. Quelques idées superficielles, quelques

* V. les pièces de Huet et de Despréaux, dans le iii. tom. des Oeuvres de celui-ci.

† Le compas d'or dont le Créateur mesure l'univers étonne chez Milton. Peut-être chez lui est-il puérile : chez Homère il eût été sublime. Nos idées philosophiques de la Divinité nuisent au poëte. Les mêmes ornemens qui auroient relevé le Jupiter des Grecs, la défigurent. Le beau génie de Milton lutte contre le système de sa religion, et ne paroît jamais si grand que lorsqu'il en est un peu affranchi : pendant qu'un Properce, déclamateur froid et foible, ne doit sa renommée qu'au spectacle riant de sa mythologie.

lumières

lumières puisées au besoin dans un commentaire, ne nous laisseront saisir que les beautés les plus sensibles et les plus apparentes : toutes les graces, toutes les finesses de leurs ouvrages nous échapperont ; et nous traiterons de gens sans goût leurs contemporains, pour leur avoir prodigué des éloges, dont notre ignorance nous empêchera de sentir la justesse. La connoissance de l'antiquité, voilà notre vrai commentaire : mais ce qui est plus nécessaire encore, c'est un certain esprit qui en est le résultat ; esprit qui non seulement nous fait connoître les choses, mais qui nous familiarise avec elles, et nous donne à leur égard les yeux des anciens. Le fameux exemple de Perrault peut faire sentir ce que je veux dire : la grossièreté des siècles héroïques choquoit le Parisien. En vain Boileau lui remontroit-il qu'Homère vouloit et devoit peindre les Grecs, et non point les François ; son esprit demeuroit convaincu, sans être persuadé.* Un goût antique (j'entends pour les idées de convention) l'eût éclairé plus que toutes les leçons de son adversaire.

XV. J'ai dit, il y a un moment, que la raison autorisoit ces images artificielles ; mais au tribunal de l'amour de la gloire, je ne sais si la décision seroit la même. Nous aimons tous la gloire : mais rien n'est plus différent que la nature et le dégré de cet amour. Chaque homme varie dans sa manière de l'aimer. Cet écrivain n'aime que les éloges de ses contemporains. La mort met fin à Images artificielles tiennent à l'amour de la gloire.

* V. les Remarques de M. Despréaux sur Longin.

toutes

toutes ses espérances et à toutes ses craintes. Le tombeau qui couvre son corps peut ensevelir son nom. Un tel homme peut sans scrupule employer des images familières aux seuls juges dont il recherche les applaudissemens. Cet autre lègue son nom à la postérité la plus reculée.* Il se plait à penser que, mille ans après sa mort, l'Indien des bords du Gange, et le Laponois au milieu de ses glaces, liront ses ouvrages, et porteront envie au pays et au siècle qui l'ont vû naître.

Celui qui écrit pour tous les hommes ne doit puiser que dans des sources communes à tous les hommes, dans leur cœur et dans le spectacle de la nature. Le seul orgueil peut l'engager à passer ces limites. Il peut présumer que la beauté de ses écrits lui assurera toujours des Burmans, qui travailleront à l'expliquer, et qui l'admireront encore plus, parcequ'ils l'auront expliqué.

Et à la nature du sujet.

XVI. Non-seulement le caractère de l'auteur, mais encore celui de son ouvrage, influe à cet égard sur sa conduite. La haute poësie, l'épopée, la tragédie, et l'ode emprunteront plus rarement ces images que la comédie et la satire, parcequ'elles peignent les passions, et que celles-ci crayonnent les mœurs. Horace et Plaute sont presqu'inintelligibles à quiconque n'a pas appris à vivre, et à penser comme le peuple Romain. Le rival de Plaute, l'élégant Térence, est mieux entendu, parcequ'il a sacrifié la plaisanterie au bon goût, au lieu que Plaute a immolé les bienséances à la

* Vie de Bacon par Mallet, p. 27.

plaisanterie.

plaisanterie. Térence songeoit qu'il peignoit des Athéniens; tout dans ses pièces est Grec, hormis le langage:* Plaute savoit qu'il parloit à des Romains: on retrouve chez lui à Thèbes, à Athènes, à Calydon, les mœurs, les loix et jusqu'aux bâtimens de Rome.†

XVII. Dans les poëtes héroïques, les mœurs, bien qu'elles ne fassent pas le fond de leurs tableaux, en ornent souvent le lointain. Il est impossible de sentir le plan, l'art, et les détails de Virgile, sans être instruit à fonds de l'histoire, des loix, et de la religion des Romains, de la géographie de l'Italie, du caractère d'Auguste, de la relation singulière et unique que ce Prince soutenoit avec le sénat et le peuple.‡ Rien de plus frappant, et de plus intéressant pour ce peuple, que le contraste de Rome couverte de paille, renfermant trois mille citoyens dans ses murs,§ avec cette même Rome capitale de l'univers, dont les maisons étoient des palais, les citoyens des princes, et les provinces des Contraste de l'enfance et de la grandeur de Rome.

* V. Terent. Eunuch. Act. ii. Sc. ii. Heauton. Act. i. Sc. i. Les Cupedinarii dont parle Térence ne détruisent point cette réflexion. Ce mot (quand même on n'adopteroit pas la conjecture de Saumaise) étoit devenu d'un nom propre, un nom appellatif. V. Térence Eunuch. Act. ii. Sc. ii.

† Amphytr. Act. i. Sc. i. Quid faciam nunc, si Tresviri me in carcerem compegerint, &c.

‡ V. les Dissertations de M. de la Bleterie sur le pouvoir des Empereurs. Mém de l'Acad. des Belles-Lettres, tom. xix. p. 357—457. tom. xxi. p. 299, &c. tom. xxiv. p. 261, &c. p. 279, &c.

§ Varron de Ling. Latina, L. iv. Dionys. Halycarn. L. xi. p. 76. Plutarch. in Romul.

empires.

empires. Puisque Florus a su saisir ce contraste,* on peut croire que Virgile ne l'a pas manqué. Il l'a peint des traits d'un grand maître. Evandre conduit son hôte par ce village, où tout, jusqu'au monarque, respiroit la rusticité. Il lui en explique les antiquités, et le poëte laisse habilement entrevoir à quoi ce village, ce capitole futur, caché par les ronces, étoit réservé.† Que ce tableau est

* Voyez ses paroles: " Sora (quis credat?) et Algidum terrori fuerunt. Satricum et Corniculum provinciæ. De Verulis et Bovillis pudet; sed triumphavimus. Tibur nunc suburbanum, et æstivæ Præneste, deliciæ, nuncupatis in capitolio votis petebantur. Idem tunc Fæsulæ, quod Carræ nuper. Idem nemus Aricinum, quod Hercynius saltus: Fregellæ quod Gessoriacum: Tiberis quod Euphrates. Coriolos, quoque, proh pudor! victos, adeo gloriæ fuisse ut captum oppidum C. Marcius Coriolanus, quasi Numantiam aut Africam, nomini induerit extant, et parta de Antio spolia, quos Mœnius in suggestu fori, captâ hostium classi, suffixit; si tamen illa, classis: nam sex fuere rostratæ. Sed hic numerus illis initiis navale bellum fuit." (1) Properce a entrevu cette idée, mais confusément.

" Cossus, at insequitur Veïentes cæde Tolumni Vincere dum Veïos posse, laboris erat.
Nec dum ultra Tiberim, belli sonus, ultima præda
Nomentum, et captæ jugera terna Coræ." (2)

Mais dans toute la tirade il mêle deux idées, qui par elles-mêmes et par leurs effets, sont très différentes. La comparaison de Rome florissante avec Rome naissante, pénétre l'ame d'un sentiment de grandeur et de plaisir. Au lieu que ces campagnes incultes où paroissoient à peine les débris de l'ancienne Veïes, inspirent la mélancolie et l'attendrissement.

† Virg. Æned. L. viii. v. 185—370.

Hinc ad Tarpeïam sedem et Capitolia ducit, Aurea nunc, olim sylvestribus horrida dumis.
——— armenta videbant
Romanoque foro et lautis mugire Carinis.

(1) L. Annæi Flori, L. i. c. xi. (2) Propertii Eleg. L. iv. Eleg. xi. v. 23.

vif!

vif! Que ce contraste est parlant pour un homme instruit dans l'antiquité! Qu'il est fade aux yeux de celui qui n'apporte à la lecture de Virgile, d'autre préparation qu'un goût naturel, et quelque connoissance de la langue Latine!

XVIII. Mieux on possède l'antiquité, plus on admire l'art de ce poëte. Son sujet étoit assez mince. La fuite d'une bande d'exilés, le combat de quelques villageois, l'établissement d'une bicoque, voilà les travaux tant vantés du pieux Enée. Mais le poëte les a annoblis, et il a su, en les annoblissant, les rendre encore plus intéressans. Par une illusion trop fine pour ne pas se dérober au commun des lecteurs, et trop heureuse pour déplaire aux juges, il embellit les mœurs des siècles héroïques, mais il les embellit sans les déguiser.* Le pâtre Latinus et le séditieux Turnus sont transformés en monarques puissans. Toute l'Italie craint pour sa liberté. Enée triomphe des hommes et des dieux. Virgile sait encore faire rejaillir sur les Troyens toute la gloire des Romains. Le fondateur de Rome fait disparoître celui de La- Art de Virgile.

* Rien de plus difficile pour un écrivain élevé dans le luxe, que de peindre sans bassesse des mœurs simples. Lisez l'Epitre de Penelope dans Ovide, vous vous y sentirez révolté de cette même rusticité qui vous enchante chez Homère. Lisez Mademoiselle de Scudéry, vous serez désagréablement surpris de retrouver à la cour de Tomyris la pompe de celle de Louis XIV. Il faut être fait à ces mœurs pour en saisir le ton. La réflexion a tenu lieu d'expérience à Virgile, et peut-être à Fenelon. Ils ont connu qu'il les falloit orner un peu, pour ménager la délicatesse de leurs concitoyens; mais qu'on choqueroit cette même délicatesse, si on les fardoit beaucoup.

vinium. C'est un feu qui s'allume. Bientôt il embrasera toute la terre. Enée (si j'ose hasarder l'expression) contient le germe de tous ses descendans. Assiégé dans son camp, il nous rappelle César et Alexia.* Nous ne partageons point notre admiration.

Jamais Virgile n'employe mieux cet art, que lorsque, descendu aux enfers avec son héros, son imagination en paroît affranchie. Il n'y crée point d'êtres nouveaux et fantasques. Romulus et Brutus, Scipion et César s'y montrent, tels que Rome les admira ou les craignit.

Les Georgiques.

XIX. On lit les Georgiques avec ce goût vif qu'on doit au beau, et avec ce plaisir délicieux que l'aménité de leur objet inspire à toute ame honnête et sensible. On pourroit cependant sentir croître son admiration, si l'on découvroit chez leur auteur un but aussi relevé que l'exécution en est achevée. Je puise toujours mes exemples chez Virgile. Ses beaux vers et les préceptes de son ami Horace, fixèrent le goût des Romains, et peuvent instruire la postérité la plus reculée. Mais pour développer mes idées, il faut les prendre d'un peu loin.

Les vétérans.

XX. Les premiers Romains combattoient pour la gloire et pour la patrie. Depuis le siège de Veïes† ils recevoient une paye assez modique, et

* J'aurois dû dire Alesia. Alexia est une leçon fautive de quelques éditions des commentaires; mais les plus anciens manuscrits, d'accord avec les autres écrivains, portent constamment Alesia. (1)

† Liv. L. iv. c. 59, 60.

(1) Notice de l'ancienne Gaule, par M. d'Anville, p. 49.

quelquefois

quelquefois des récompenses après les triomphes;* mais ils les recevoient comme une grace, et non comme une dette. La guerre finie, chaque soldat, devenu citoyen, se retiroit dans sa cabane et y suspendoit ses armes inutiles, prêt à les reprendre au premier signal.

Quand Sylla rendit la tranquillité à la république, les choses étoient bien changées. Plus de trois cens mille hommes, accoutumés au carnage et au luxe,† sans biens, sans patrie, sans principes, exigeoient des récompenses. Si le dictateur les leur avoit données en argent, suivant le taux établi ensuite par Auguste, elles lui auroient couté plus de trente-deux millions de notre monnoye,‡ somme immense * Liv. L. xxx. c. 45, &c. Arbuthnot's Tables, p. 181, &c.

† Sallust in Bell. Catilin. p. 22. Edit. Thysii.

‡ Ce taux étoit de trois mille drachmes, ou douze mille sesterces pour le simple légionaire,(1) du double pour le cavalier et le centenier, et du quadruple pour le tribun.(2) La légion Romaine, depuis l'augmentation de Marius,(3) étoit de six mille fantassins, et de trois cens chevaux. Ce grand corps n'avoit que soixante-six officiers, savoir soixante centeniers et six tribuns. Voilà le calcul:

	Liv. Sterl.
282,000 légionaires à 3000 drachmes ou 12,000 sesterces, ou £105 sterling chacun,	28,905,000
2,820 centeniers et 14,100 cavaliers à 6000 drachmes ou 210 livres sterling chacun,	3,468,600
282 tribuns à 12,000 drachmes ou £410 chacun,	115,620
En tout	£32,489,220

Suivant les calculs de M. Arbuthnot cette somme ne seroit que

(1) Dion. Cass. L. liv. Lips. Ex. ad. L. i. Annal. Tacit. C.
(2) Wotton's History of Rome, p. 154. (3) Rosin. Antiq. p. 964.

immense dans les tems les plus prospères, mais alors au-dessus des facultés de la république. Sylla embrassa un parti, que la nécessité et son intérêt particulier, plutôt que le bien de l'état, lui dictèrent: il donna des terres aux soldats. Quarante-sept légions furent dispersées dans l'Italie. On fonda vingt-quatre colonies militaires.* Expédient ruineux: si on les mêloit, ils quittoient leurs habitations pour se retrouver; si on les laissoit en corps, le premier séditieux y trouvoit une armée toute prête.† Ces vieux guerriers ennuyés du repos, et trouvant au-dessous d'eux d'acheter par la sueur ce qui pouvoit ne couter que du sang,‡ dissipèrent leurs nouveaux biens par la débauche, et n'espérant de salut que dans une guerre civile, servirent puissamment les desseins de Catilina.§ Auguste, pressé par les mêmes embarras, suivit le même plan, et en craide £30,705,220, la drachme valant $7\frac{3}{4}$ sous d'Angleterre.(1) Mais quelques recherches que j'aie faites, la drachme Attique des derniers tems, égale au denier Romain en poids comme en valeur, valoit $8\frac{1}{3}$ de cette monnoye.(2)

* Liv. l. lxxxix. Epitom. Freinsheim. Suppl. l. lxxxix. c. 34. Sur l'article des colonies militaires on peut consulter les Cenotaphia Pisana du Cardinal Norris. Le second chapitre de sa première dissertation contient des détails très instructifs sur cette matière.

† Tacit. Annal. xiv. p. 249. Edit. Lipsii.

‡ Tacit. de Mor. German. p. 441.

§ Sallust. in Bell. Catilin. p. 40. Cicero in Catilin. Orat. ii. c. 9.

(1) Arbuth. Tables, p. 15.

(2) V. mes Rem. MSS. sur les poids, &c. des anciens. Hooper, p. 108. et Eissenschmidt, p. 23, &c.

gnit

gnit les mêmes suites. La triste Italie fumoit encore

" Des feux qu'a rallumé sa liberté mourante."*

Les hardis vétérans n'avoient acheté leurs possessions que par une guerre sanglante, et leurs fréquens actes de violence montroient assez qu'ils se croyoient toujours les armes à la main.†

But de Virgile.

XXI. Qu'y avoit-il alors de plus assorti à la douce politique d'Auguste, que d'employer les chants harmonieux de son ami, pour les réconcilier à leur nouvel état? Aussi lui conseilla-t-il de composer cet ouvrage.

Da facilem cursum, atque audacibus annue cœptis;
Ignarosque viæ mecum miseratus agrestes,
Ingredere; et votis jam nunc assuesce vocari.‡

L'agriculture avoit cependant plus de cinquante écrivains Grecs;§ les livres de Caton et de Varron étoient des guides plus sûrs, plus minutieux, et plus exacts que ne pouvoit l'être un poëte. Mais il falloit faire goûter à des soldats le repos de la campagne plutôt que de les instruire dans les principes de l'agriculture: de là toutes ces descriptions touchantes des plaisirs innocens du campagnard, ses jeux, ses foyers, ses retraites délicieuses opposées aux amusemens frivoles des hommes, et à leurs affaires plus frivoles que leurs amusemens.

* Racin. Mithrid. Act. iii. Sc. 1.
† V. Donat. in Vit. Virgil. Virgil, Eclog. ix. v. 2, &c.
‡ Virg. Georg. l. i. v. 40. § Varro de Re Rustic. l. i. c. 1.

Il y a dans ce tableau de ces traits vifs et inattendus, de ces détours cachés et heureux, qui montrent dans Virgile, un génie pour la satire, que des vues supérieures et la bonté de son cœur l'empêchoient seules de cultiver.* Quel vétéran ne se reconnoissoit pas dans le vieillard Corycien?† Comme eux accoutumé aux armes dès sa jeunesse, il trouvoit enfin le bonheur dans une retraite sauvage, que ses travaux avoient transformée en un lieu de délices.‡

L'Italien, las de mener une vie remplie de craintes légitimes, déploroit avec Virgile les malheurs du tems, et plaignoit son prince de se voir emporté par la violence des vétérans,

Ut cum carceribus sese effudêre quadrigæ,
Addunt in spatium, et frustra retinacula tendens
Fertur equis auriga, neque audit currus habenas,§ et recommençoit ses travaux dans l'espoir d'un nouveau siècle d'or.

Son succès. XXII. Si l'on adopte mes idées, Virgile n'est plus un simple écrivain, qui décrit les travaux rustiques. C'est un nouvel Orphée, qui ne manie sa lyre, que pour faire déposer aux sauvages leur fé-

* Hic petit excidiis urbem miserosque penates,
Ut gemmâ bibat, et Sarrano dormiat ostro.
Virg. Georg. L. ii. v. 505, &c.

† Virg. Geor. L. iv. v. 125, et seq.

‡ Il étoit du nombre des pirates auxquels Pompée avoit donné des terres. V. Serv. in Loc. et Vell. Pater. L. ii. p. 56.

§ Virg. Georg. L. i. v. 512.

rocité,

rocité, et pour les réunir par les liens des mœurs et des loix.*

Ses chants produisirent cette merveille. Les vétérans s'accoutumèrent insensiblement au repos. Ils passèrent en paix les trente ans qui s'écoulèrent avant qu'Auguste eût établi, non sans beaucoup de difficulté, un trésor militaire pour les payer en argent.†

La Critique. Idée de la critique.

XXIII. Aristote, qui portoit la lumière dans les ténèbres de la nature et de l'art, est le père de la critique. Le tems, dont la justice lente, mais sûre, met enfin la vérité à la place de l'erreur, a brisé les statues du philosophe, mais a confirmé les décisions du critique. Destitué d'observations, il a donné des chimères pour des faits. Formé dans l'école de Platon, et dans les écrits d'Homère, de Sophocle, d'Euripide et de Thucydide, il a puisé ses règles dans la nature des choses et dans la connoissance du cœur humain. Il les a éclaircies par les exemples des plus grands modèles.

Deux mille ans se sont écoulés depuis Aristote. Les critiques ont perfectionné leur art. Cependant ils ne sont pas encore d'accord sur l'objet de leurs travaux. Les le Clerc, les Cousin, les Desmaiseaux, les de Sainte-Marthe,‡ nous en offrent

* Sylvestres homines sacer interpresque Deorum Cædibus et victu fædo deterruit Orpheus;
Dictus ob hoc lenire tigres rabidosque leones.
Horat. Ars Poet. v. 391.

† Tillemont. Hist. des Emper. Tacit. Annal. L. i. p. 39. Dionys. L. lv. p. 565. Sueton. in August. c. 49.

‡ Clerici Ars Crit. L. i. c. 1.

des définitions différentes. Pour moi, je les crois toutes ou trop partiales, ou trop arbitraires. La critique est, selon moi, l'art de juger des écrits et des écrivains, ce qu'ils ont dit, s'ils l'ont bien dit, s'ils ont dit vrai.* De la première de ces branches découle la grammaire, la connoissance des langues et des manuscrits, le discernement des ouvrages supposés, le rétablissement des endroits corrompus. Toute la théorie de la poësie et de l'éloquence se tire de la seconde. La troisième ouvre un champ immense, l'examen et la critique des faits. On pourroit donc distinguer la nation des critiques, en critiques grammairiens, en critiques rhéteurs et en critiques historiens. Les prétensions exclusives des premiers ont nui non seulement à leur travail, mais à celui de leurs confrères.

Matériaux du critique.

XXIV. Tout ce qu'ont été les hommes, tout ce que le génie a créé, tout ce que la raison a pesé, tout ce que le travail a recueilli, voilà le département de la critique. La justesse d'esprit, la finesse, la pénétration, sont toutes nécessaires pour l'exercer dignement. Je suis le littérateur dans son cabinet, je le vois entouré des productions de tous les siècles: sa bibliothèque en est remplie: son esprit en est éclairé, sans en être chargé. Il étend ses regards de tous côtés. L'auteur le plus éloigné du travail de l'instant, n'est pas oublié: un trait lumineux pourroit s'y rencontrer, qui confirmeroit les découvertes vertes du critique ou qui ébranleroit ses hypothèses. Le travail de l'érudit est achevé. Le philosophe de nos jours s'y arrête et loue la mémoire du compilateur. Celui-ci en est quelquefois la dupe, et prend les matériaux pour l'édifice.

* Il faut borner ce vrai au vrai historique, à la vérité de leurs témoignages, et non de leurs opinions. Cette dernière espèce de vérité est plutôt du ressort de la logique que de celui de la critique.

Opérations du critique.

XXV. Mais le vrai critique sent que sa tâche ne fait que commencer. Il pèse, il combine, il doute, il décide. Exact et impartial, il ne se rend qu'à la raison, ou à l'autorité qui est la raison des faits.* Le nom le plus respectable le cède quelquefois au témoignage d'écrivains auxquels les circonstances seules donnent un poids momentané. Prompt et fécond en ressources, mais sans fausse subtilité, il ose sacrifier l'hypothèse la plus brillante, la plus spécieuse, et ne fait point parler à ses maîtres le langage de ses conjectures. Ami de la vérité, il cherche le genre de preuves qui convient à son sujet, et il s'en contente. Il ne porte point la faux de l'analyse sur ces beautés délicates, qui se fanent sous la touche la moins rude; mais aussi, peu content d'une admiration stérile, il fouille jusques dans les principes les plus cachés du cœur humain, pour se rendre raison de ses plaisirs et de ses dégoûts. Modeste et sensé il n'étale point ses conjectures comme des vérités, ses inductions comme des faits, ses vraisemblances comme des démonstrations.

La critique une bonne logique.

XXVI. On a dit que la géométrie étoit une bonne logique, et l'on a cru lui donner un grand éloge: il est plus glorieux aux sciences de développer ou de perfectionner l'homme, que de reculer les bornes de l'univers. Mais la critique ne peut-elle pas partager ce titre? Elle a même cet avantage: la géométrie s'occupe de démonstrations qui ne se trouvent que chez elle; la critique balance les différens dégrés de vraisemblance. C'est en les comparant que nous réglons tous les jours nos actions, que nous décidons souvent de notre sort.* Balançons des vraisemblances critiques.

* C'est-à-dire, l'autorité combinée avec l'expérience.

Controverse sur l'histoire Romaine.

XXVII. Notre siècle, qui se croit destiné à changer les loix en tout genre, a enfanté un Pirrhonisme historique, utile et dangereux. M. de Pouilly, esprit brillant et superficiel, qui citoit plus qu'il ne lisoit, douta de la certitude† des cinq premiers siècles de Rome; mais son imagination peu faite pour ces recherches, céda facilement à l'érudition et à la critique de M. Freret et de l'Abbé Sallier.‡ M. de Beaufort fit revivre cette controverse, et l'histoire Romaine souffrit beaucoup des attaques d'un écrivain, qui savoit douter et qui savoit décider.

Traité entre Rome et Carthage.

XXVIII. Un traité des Romains et des Carthaginois devint entre ses mains une objection accablante.§ Ce traité se rencontre chez Polybe,

* Il s'agit principalement des élémens de la géométrie et de ceux de la critique.

† Une définition claire de cette certitude sur laquelle on se disputoit, auroit pu abréger la controverse. "C'est la certitude historique." Mais cette certitude varie de siècle en siècle. Je crois en gros à l'existence et aux actions de Charlemagne: mais la certitude que j'en ai, n'est point égale à celle des exploits de Henri quatre.

‡ V. Mém. de l'Acad. des Belles-Lettres, tom. vi. p. 14—190.

§ Dissert. sur l'Incertit. de l'Hist. Rom. p. 33—46.

historien

historien exact et éclairé.* L'original se conservoit à Rome de son tems. Cependant ce monument authentique contredit tous les historiens. L. Brutus et M. Horatius y paroissent comme exerçant le consulat ensemble, quoiqu'Horatius n'y parvint qu'après la mort de Brutus. Les Romains y ont des sujets qui n'étoient encore que leurs alliés. On entend parler de la marine d'un peuple qui ne construisit ses premiers vaisseaux que dans la première guerre Punique, deux cens cinquante ans après le consulat de Brutus. Quelles conclusions fatales ne tire-t-on pas de cette contrariété? Elles sont toutes au désavantage des historiens.

XXIX. Cette objection a fort embarrassé les adversaires de M. de Beaufort. Ils ont douté de l'authenticité de ce monument original. Ils en ont avancé la date. Tachons par une explication vraisemblable de concilier le monument et les historiens. Séparons d'abord la date d'avec le corps du traité. Celui-ci est du tems de Brutus. Celle-là est de la façon de Polybe ou de ses antiquaires Romains. Les noms des consuls ne se lisoient jamais dans les traités solemnels, dans les fœdera consacrés par toutes les cérémonies de la religion. Les seuls ministres de cette religion, les féciaux, les signoient: et cette circonstance distinguoit les fœdera et les sponsiones. Nous devons ce détail à Tite Live.† Il fait disparoître la difficulté. Les antiquaires Le traité éclairci.

Les consuls.

* Polyb. Hist. L. iii. c. 22.

† Spoponderunt consules, legati, quæstores, tribuni militum, nominaque eorum qui spoponderunt adhuc extant, ubi si ex fœdere antiquaires auront pris les féciaux pour les consuls. Mais sans songer à cette méprise, ces antiquaires, que rien n'obligeoit à la précision dans l'explication des monumens publics, ont marqué l'année du régifuge, par les noms célèbres du fondateur de la liberté et de celui du capitole. Il leur importoit peu de s'assurer s'ils exercèrent le consulat ensemble.

Les sujets des Romains.

XXX. Les peuples d'Ardée, d'Antium, de Terracine n'étoient point sujets des Romains, ou s'ils l'étoient, les historiens nous ont donné une idée très fausse de l'étendue de la république. Transportons-nous dans le siècle de Brutus, et puisons dans la politique des Romains, une définition du terme d'allié assez éloignée de la nôtre. Rome, quoique la dernière colonie des Latins, songea de bonne heure à réunir toute cette nation sous ses loix. Sa discipline, ses héros et ses victoires lui acquirent bientôt une supériorité décidée. Fiers, mais politiques, les Romains en usèrent avec une sagesse digne de leur bonheur. Ils comprirent que des cités mal-asservies arrêteroient les armes, épuiseroient les trésors, et corromproient les mœurs de la république. Sous le nom plus spécieux d'alliés, ils surent faire aimer leur joug aux vaincus. Ceux-ci consentirent avec plaisir à reconnoître Rome pour la capitale de la nation Latine, et à lui fournir un corps de troupes dans toutes ses guerres. La république ne leur devoit qu'une protection, marque de sa souveraineté et qui leur coutoit si fœdere acta res esset præterquam duorum fecialium non extarent. Tit. Liv. L. ix. c. 5.

cher.

cher. Ces peuples étoient alliés de Rome, mais ils virent bientôt eux-mêmes qu'ils en étoient esclaves.*

XXXI. Cette explication diminue la difficulté, me dira-t-on, mais ne la dissipe pas. Ὑπηκοοι, l'expression dont se sert Polybe, signifie sujet, dans le sens propre du mot. Je ne le contesterai pas. Mais nous n'avons que la traduction de ce traité; et si l'on accorde à ses copies une confiance conditionelle pour le fond des choses, il ne doit pas être permis de rien conclure de leurs expressions prises à la rigueur. Les assemblages d'idées sont si arbitraires, les nuances si légères, les langues si différentes, que le plus habile traducteur peut chercher des expressions équivalentes, mais n'en trouve guères que de semblables.† Le langage de ce traité étoit ancien. Polybe se fia aux antiquaires Romains. La vanité leur grossit les objets. Fœderati ne signifie pas des alliés égaux: rendons-le, dirent ils, par sujets.

XXXII. La marine des Romains embarrasse encore nos critiques. Polybe nous assure que la flotte de Duillius fut leur premier essai dans ce genre.‡ Eh bien, Polybe se trompe, puisqu'il se contredit; voilà toute ma conclusion. Mais en admettant même son récit, l'histoire Romaine ne s'écrouleroit cependant pas. Voici une hypothèse qui Leur marine.

* Tit. Liv. L. viii. c. 4.

Le préteur Annius appelle le gouvernement des Romains, Regnum impotens.

† V. Cleric. Ars Critic. L. ii. c. 2. § 1, 2, 3.

‡ Polyb. L. i. c. 20.

qui explique ce phénomène d'une manière raisonnable; et c'est tout ce qu'on est en droit d'exiger d'une hypothèse. Tarquin opprime le peuple et les soldats. Il s'approprie tout le butin. On se dégoûte de la milice. On équipe de petits bâtimens qui font des courses sur mer. La république naissante les protège, mais met un frein par ce traité à leurs déprédations. Des guerres continuelles, la paye qu'on accorde aux troupes de terre, font négliger la marine; et dans un siècle ou deux, on oublie qu'elle a jamais existé.* Polybe aura parlé d'une façon un peu trop générale.

XXXIII. D'ailleurs la première marine des Romains ne pouvoit être composée que de bâtimens à cinquante rames. Gelon et Hieron construisirent des vaisseaux plus grands.† Les Grecs et les Carthaginois les imitèrent; et dans la première guerre Punique, les Romains mirent en mer de ces vaisseaux à trois ou quatre rangs de rames, qui étonnent encore nos antiquaires et nos méchaniciens. Cet armement étoit bien propre à faire oublier leurs essais antiques et grossiers.‡

Réflexions sur cette dispute.

XXXIV. J'ai défendu avec plaisir une histoire

* Je ne dis rien de la flotte qui parut devant Tarente. Je crois que les vaisseaux appartenoient aux habitans de Thuricun. Voyez Freinsheim Supplem. Livian. L. xii. c. 8.

† Arbuthnot's Tables, p. 225. Hist. du commerce des anciens, par Huet. c. 221.

‡ On peut voir une autre hypothèse du célèbre M. Freret. Elle plait par sa simplicité, mais elle me paroît insoutenable.— Voy. Mémoires de l'Académ. des Belles-Lettres, tom. xviii. p. 102, &c.

utile

utile et intéressante. Mais j'ai voulu surtout montrer par ces réflexions, combien sont délicates les discussions de la critique, où il ne s'agit pas de saisir la démonstration, mais de comparer le poids des vraisemblances opposées ; et combien il faut se défier des systêmes les plus éblouissans, puisqu'il y en a si peu qui soutiennent l'épreuve d'un examen libre et attentif.

XXXV. Une nouvelle considération embarrasse la critique d'une nouvelle difficulté. Il est des sciences qui ne sont que des connoissances : leurs principes sont des vérités de spéculation et non des maximes de conduite. Il est plus facile de comprendre stérilement une proposition, que de se la rendre familière, de l'appliquer avec justesse, de s'en servir comme d'un guide dans ses études, et d'un flambeau dans ses découvertes.

La critique une pratique sans être une routine.

La marche de la critique n'est point une routine. Ses principes généraux sont vrais, mais stériles. Celui qui ne connoît qu'eux, se méprend également, qu'il veuille les suivre ou qu'il ose s'en écarter. Le génie plein de ressources, maître des règles, mais maître aussi des raisons des règles, paroît souvent les mépriser. Sa route nouvelle et hardie semble l'en éloigner : mais suivez-le jusqu'au bout, vous voyez en lui un admirateur, mais un admirateur éclairé des mêmes règles, qui sont toujours la base de ses raisonnemens et de ses découvertes. Que toutes les sciences fussent legum non hominum respublica, voilà le souhait du peuple des savans. Son accomplissement feroit son bonheur : mais on ne sait que trop que le bonheur des peuples et la gloire de ceux qui les éclairent ou qui les gouvernent, sont des objets souvent différens, et quelquefois opposés. Les savans du premier ordre ne veulent que des études semblables à la lance d'Achille : elle n'étoit faite que pour les mains du héros. Essayons de la manier.

et

Le poëte peut-il s'écarter de l'histoire?

XXXVI. Le législateur de la critique a prononcé, que le poëte doit rendre les héros tels que l'histoire nous les fait connoître :

Aut famam sequere, aut sibi convenientia finge, Scriptor ; Homereum si forte reponis Achillen,*
Impiger, iracundus, inexorabilis, acer,
Jura neget sibi nata, nihil non arroget armis, &c.†

Réduirons-nous donc le poëte au rôle d'un froid annaliste? Lui ôterons-nous ce grand pouvoir de la fiction, ce contraste, ce choc des caractères, ces situations inattendues où l'on tremble pour l'homme, où l'on admire le héros? Ou bien, plus amis des beautés que des règles, lui pardonnerons-nous plus aisément les anachronismes que l'ennui?

La loi et raison de la loi. Exemple de Virgile.

XXXVII. Charmer, attendrir, élever l'esprit, c'est-là l'objet de la poësie. Les loix partiales ne doivent jamais faire perdre de vue qu'elles ne sont que des moyens destinés à aider ses opérations, et non à les embarrasser. On a vu que la philosophie hérissée de démonstations, ose à peine entamer les idées reçues ; comment la poësie pourroit-elle espérer de plaire qu'en s'y prêtant? Nous nous

* V. Bentley et Sanadon au v. 120. de l'Art Poëtique d'Horace.

† Horat. Ars Poet. v. 119. et seq.

plaisons

plaisons à revoir les héros et les événemens de l'antiquité: paroissent-ils travestis, ils produisent la surprise, mais une surprise qui révolte contre les nouveautés. Lorsqu'un auteur veut hasarder quelque changement, il doit réfléchir s'il en naît une beauté frappante ou légère, mais toujours proportionnée à la violation des loix. Ce n'est qu'à ce prix qu'il peut racheter son attentat.

Les anachronismes d'Ovide nous déplaisent.* La vérité y est corrompue sans être embellie. Que le Mézence de Virgile est d'un caractère différent! Ce prince ne périt que par les armes d'Ascagne. †Mais quel lecteur assez glacé pour y songer un instant, lorsqu'il voit Enée, ministre des vengeances célestes, devenir le protecteur des nations opprimées, lancer la foudre sur la tête du coupable tyran, mais s'attendrir sur la victime infortunée de ses coups, le jeune et pieux Lausus digne d'un autre père, et d'un destin plus propice? Que de beautés l'histoire faisoit perdre au poëte! Encouragé par ce succès, il l'abandonne quand il eût dû la suivre. Enée arrive dans l'Italie si désirée; les Latins accourent pour défendre leurs foyers, tout menace du plus sanglant combat.

* En matière de géographie et de chronologie on doit peu compter sur l'autorité d'Ovide. Ce poëte étoit d'une ignorance grossière dans ces deux sciences. Lisez la description des voyages de Médée; Metamorph. L. vii. v. 350. à 402. et le xiv. L. des mêmes Metamorph. Celle-là est remplie d'erreurs géographiques, qui donnent la torture aux commentateurs mêmes; et celui-ci fourmille de bévues chronologiques.

† Serv. ad Virg. Æneid. L. iv. v. 620. Dion. Halycarn. Antiq. Rom. L. i.

" Déjà

" Déjà de traits en l'air s'élevoit un nuage ; Déjà couloit le sang prémices du carnage."*

Le nom d'Enée fait tomber les armes aux ennemis. Ils craignent de combattre ce guerrier, dont la gloire s'élève des cendres de sa patrie. Ils courent embrasser ce prince annoncé par tant d'oracles, qui leur apporte du fond de l'Asie, ses dieux, une race de héros, et la promesse de l'empire de l'univers. Latinus lui offre un asile et sa fille. †Quel coup de théâtre! Qu'il étoit digne de la majesté de l'épopée, et de la plume de Virgile! Qu'on lui compare, si on l'ose, l'ambassade d'Ilioneus, le palais de Latinus, et le discours du monarque.‡

Eclaircissemens et restrictions.

XXXVIII. Que le poëte, je le répète encore, ose hasarder, pourvû que le lecteur retrouve toujours dans ses fictions, ce même dégré de plaisir que la vérité et les convenances lui eussent offert. Qu'il ne bouleverse pas les annales d'un siècle pour dire une antithèse. L'invention ne trouvera pas cette loi trop sévère, si elle réfléchit que le sentiment appartient à tous les hommes, que les connoissances ne sont le partage que d'un petit nombre, et que le beau agit plus puissamment sur l'ame que le vrai sur l'esprit. Qu'elle se souvienne toutefois qu'il est des écarts que rien ne peut faire oublier. L'imagination forte de Milton, la versification harmonieuse de Voltaire, ne nous reconcilieroient jamais avec César lâche, Catilina ver-

* Racin. Iphig. Act v. Sc. dern.
† Tit. Liv. L. i. c. 1.
‡ Virg. Æneid. L. vii. v. 148. jusqu'à 285.

tueux,

tueux, Henri IV. vainqueur des Romains. Disons en rassemblant nos idées, que les caractères des grands hommes doivent être sacrés ; mais que les poëtes peuvent écrire leur histoire, moins comme elle a été, que comme elle eût dû être ; qu'une création nouvelle révolte moins que des changemens essentiels, parce que ceux-ci supposent l'erreur, et celle-là une simple ignorance ; et qu'enfin on rapproche plus aisément les tems que les lieux.

On doit sans doute de l'indulgence aux siècles reculés, où les systêmes des chronologistes sont les fictions des poëtes, à l'agrément près. Quiconque ose condamner l'épisode de Didon est plus philosophe ou moins homme de goût que moi.*

XXXIX.

* On peut douter cependant si cet épisode blesse la véritable chronologie. Dans le systême plausible du Chevalier Newton, Enée et Didon se trouvent contemporains (1). Les Romains devoient mieux connoître l'histoire de Carthage que les Grecs. Les archives de Carthage étoient passées à Rome (2). La langue Punique y étoit assez connue (3). Les Romains consultoient volontiers les Africains sur leurs origines (4). D'ailleurs (et c'est assez pour disculper notre poëte) Virgile adopte une chronologie plus conforme aux supputations de Newton qu'à celles d'Eratosthène. Peut-être on ne sera pas fâché de voir les preuves de ce sentiment.

Sept ans suffirent à peine au courroux de Junon et aux voyages d'Enée. C'est Didon qui me l'apprend ;

" ——— Nam te jam septima portat
" Omnibus errantem terris et fluctibus ætas (5)."

(1) V. Newton's Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms reformed, p. 32.
(2) Universal History, tom. xviii. p. 111, 112.
(3) Plaut. Penul. Act. v. Sec. 1.
(4) Sallust. in Bell. Jugurth. c. 17. Ammian Marcel. L. xxii. Mem. de l'Acad. des Belles Lettres, tom. iv. p. 464.
(5) Virgil. Æneid. L. i. v. 755.

Les Sciences Naturelles.

XXXIX. Plus on a approfondi les sciences, plus on a vu qu'elles étoient toutes liées. On a cru Quelques mois après il arriva au bord du Tibre. Ce fut-là que le Dieu du fleuve lui apparut, lui prédit de nouveaux combats, mais lui fit espérer une fin glorieuse à ses maux. Un prodige confirma l'oracle. Une truie couchée sur le rivage montroit, par ses trente petits qui l'environnoient, le nombre d'années qui devoient s'écouler avant que le jeune Ascagne jettât les fondemens d'Albe :

" Jamque tibi, ne vana putes hæc fingere somnum,
Littoreis ingens inventa sub ilicibus sus,
Triginta capitum fœtus enixa, jacebit;
Alba, solo recubans, albi circum ubera nati.
Hic locus urbis erit, requies ea certa laborum:
Ex quo ter denis urbem redeuntibus annis
Ascanius clari condet cognominis Albam." (1)

Cette ville demeura pendant trois cens ans le siège de l'empire et le berceau des Romains ;

" Hic jam ter centos totos regnabitur annos Gente sub Hectorea." (2)

Ce sont-là les expressions que Virgile met à la bouche de Jupiter. Nos chronologistes s'embarrassent peu de faire tenir sa parole au Maître du tonnerre. Ils font détruire la ville d'Albe par Tullus Hostilius près de cinq cens ans après sa fondation, et environ cent ans après celle de Rome (3). Mais tout s'applanit dans le systême de Newton. La prise de Troyes, placée à l'an 904, et suivie d'un intervalle de 337 ans, nous conduit à 567, 60 ans après les Palilia, époque qui quadre au mieux avec le règne du troisième successeur de Romulus (4). Une ancienne tradition conservée par Plutarque (5) y coïncide avec précision. On déterra les livres de Numa. An. ant. Chr. 181, quatre cens ans après la mort de ce roi et le commencement du règne d'Hostilius. Numa mourut donc 581 ans avant l'ère Chrétienne. Quel art

(1) Virgil. Æneid. L. viii. v. 42. (2) Idem. L. i. v. 272.
(3) V. les Tables Chronolog. d'Helvicus, à l. ann. A. C. 656, &c.
(4) Newton's Chronology, p. 52, &c. (5) V. Plutarch. in Numa.

dans cru voir un bois immense. Au premier coup d'œil tous les arbres qui le formoient paroissoient isolés, dans le poëte de saisir le moment où Enée arrive à Carthage, pour répondre à ses critiques, de la seule manière que la rapidité de sa marche et la grandeur de son sujet pouvoient le lui permettre! Il leur fait sentir que dans ses hypothèses la rencontre de Didon et d'Enée n'est point une licence poëtique. Virgile n'est point le seul qui ait revoqué en doute la chronologie vulgaire des rois Latins. Je le soupçonne même d'avoir puisé ses idées dans les ouvrages de son contemporain Trogue-Pompée. Cet historien, le rival de Tite-Live et de Salluste (1), donnoit au royaume d'Albe la même durée de trois cens ans. Si son histoire universelle ne s'étoit pas perdue, nous y verrions apparemment le détail et les preuves de cette opinion. A présent il faut nous contenter d'en lire la simple exposition chez son abbréviateur. "Albam longam condidit quæ trecentis annis caput regni fuit." (2) Tite-Live lui-même, ce père de l'histoire Romaine, qui fait paroître quelquefois tant d'attachement à la chronologie reçue (3), mais qui glisse d'ordinaire sur les endroits scabreux, d'une façon qui montre sa bonne foi et son ignorance, semble se défier de ses guides dans ces siècles reculés. Rien de plus naturel que de marquer la durée du règne de chaque roi Latin dont il rapporte le nom (4)! Or il se tait sur cet article. Rien de plus nécessaire que de fixer au moins l'intervalle entre Enée et Romulus; il ne le fait point. Ce n'est pas tout. "La destruction d'Albe, dit il, suivit de 400 ans sa fondation." (5) En retranchant cent ans pour les règnes de Romulus et de Numa, et pour la moitié de celui d'Hostilius, il nous en restera 300 au lieu de 400 que nous donneroit la chronologie d'Eratosthène. Tite-Live est donc d'accord avec Virgile à peu de chose près; et cette petite différence affermit leur union plutôt qu'elle ne l'affoiblit. Je prévois une objection, mais des plus minces. Y répondre ce seroit créer des monstres pour les combattre; ainsi, je finis cette digression déjà trop longue.

(1) Flav. Vopisc. in Proem. Aurelian. (2) Justin. L. xliii. c. 1.
(3) Tit. Liv. L. i. c. 18. et alibi passim. (4) Idem. l. i. c. 29.
(5) Tit. Liv. L. i. c. 29.

mais a-t-on percé la superficie, on a vu que toutes les racines étoient entremêlées.

Il n'y a point d'étude, pas même la plus chétive et la moins connue, qui n'offre quelquefois des faits, des ouvertures, des objections à la plus sublime et à la plus éloignée des connoissances. J'aime à peser sur cette considération. Il faut faire voir aux nations et aux professions différentes, leurs besoins réciproques. Montrez à l'Anglois les avantages du François; faites connoître au physicien les secours que la littérature lui présente; l'amour-propre supplée à ce que la discrétion vous a fait supprimer. Ainsi la philosophie s'étend: l'humanité gagne. Les hommes étoient rivaux; ils sont frères.

Liaison de la physique et de la littérature.

XL. Dans toutes les sciences nous nous appuyons sur les raisonnemens et sur les faits. Sans ceux-ci nos études seroient chimériques: privées de ceux-là elles ne sauroient être qu'aveugles. C'est ainsi que les Belles Lettres sont mélangées. Toutes les branches de l'étude de la nature, qui cache souvent sous une petitesse apparente une grandeur réelle, le sont pareillement. Si la physique a ses Buffons, elle a aussi (pour parler le langage du tems) ses érudits. La connoissance de l'antiquité leur offre aux uns et aux autres, une riche moisson de faits propres à dévoiler la nature, ou du moins à empêcher ceux qui l'étudient, de prendre un nuage pour une divinité. Quelles lumières le médecin ne puise-t-il pas dans la description de la peste qui désola Athènes? J'admire avec lui la force majes-

tueuse

tueuse de Thucydide,* l'art et l'énergie de Lucrèce;† mais il va plus loin: il étudie dans les maux des Athéniens ceux de ses concitoyens.

Je sais que les anciens s'appliquoient peu aux sciences naturelles; que destitués d'instrumens, et isolés dans leurs travaux, ils n'ont pû rassembler qu'un petit nombre d'observations mêlées d'incertitudes, diminuées par les injures du tems, et jettées au hasard dans un grand nombre de volumes:‡ mais la pauvreté doit-elle inspirer la négligence? L'activité de l'esprit humain s'excite par les difficultés. La nécessité, mère du relâchement, seroit un assemblage étrange.

XLI. Les partisans mêmes les plus zélés des modernes, ne disconviendront pas, je pense, des secours que les anciens possédoient et dont nous manquons. Je rappelle en frémissant les spectacles sanglans des Romains. Le sage Cicéron les détestoit et les méprisoit.§ La solitude et le si-

Avantages des anciens. Spectacles de l'amphithéâtre.

* Thucydid. l. i.

† Lucret. de Rer. Natur. l. vii. v. 1136, &c.

‡ M. Freret croyoit les observations philosophiques des anciens plus exactes qu'on ne le pense. Quiconque connoît le génie et les lumières de M. Freret, sent le poids de son autorité. V. Mém. de l'Académ. des Belles Lettres, tom. xviii. p. 97.

§ Cicéron envie le sort de son ami Marius qui passa à la campagne les jours des jeux magnifiques de Pompée. Il parle avec assez de mépris du reste des spectacles: mais il s'attache surtout aux combats des bêtes sauvages. "Reliquæ sunt venationes, (dit il) binæ per dies quinque; magnifice, nemo negat, sed quæ potest homini esse polito delectatio, cum aut homo imbecillus à valentissimâ bestiâ laniatur aut præclara bestia venabulo transverberatur?"

lence l'emportoient de beaucoup chez lui, sur ces chefs-d'œuvre de magnificence, d'horreur et de mauvais goût.* En effet, se plaire au carnage, n'est digne que d'une troupe de sauvages. On ne pouvoit élever des palais, pour y faire combattre des bêtes, que chez un peuple qui préféroit les décorations aux beaux vers, et les machines aux situations.† Mais tels étoient les Romains; leurs vertus, leurs vices, et jusqu'à leurs ridicules étoient tous liés à leur principe dominant, l'amour de la patrie.

Cependant ces spectacles, si affreux aux yeux du philosophe, si frivoles à ceux de l'homme de goût, devoient être bien précieux pour le naturaliste. Qu'on se représente le monde épuisé pour fournir ces jeux, les trésors des riches et le pouvoir des grands mis en œuvre pour déterrer des créatures singulières par leur figure, par leur force, ou par leur rareté, pour les amener dans l'amphithéâtre de Rome, et pour mettre en jeu l'animal entier.‡ Ce devoit être une école

* Cicero ad Famil. l. vii. Epist. 1.

† Horat. l. iii. Ep. 1. v. 187.

‡ V. Essais de Mont. vol. iii. p. 140.

Mon exemple étoit très bon, ma citation fort mauvaise. J'aurois dû recourir à l'original, (1) Vopiscus. Cet auteur rapporte à l'occasion du triomphe de Probus, qu'on amena dans l'amphithéâtre cent lions, autant de lionnes, cent léopards Libyens, le même nombre de Syriens, et trois cens ours. Je ne connois point de spectacle plus nombreux, mais les animaux que Gordien avoit assemblés, et dont se servit Philippe dans ses jeux séculaires, étoient plus curieux par leur variété et par leur rareté. Il y avoit trente-

(1) V. Vopisc. in Vit. Prob. p. 240. edit. Salmas. Paris 1620.

deux

école admirable, surtout pour cette partie la plus noble de l'histoire naturelle, qui s'applique plutôt à étudier la nature et les propriétés des animaux, qu'à décrire leurs os et leurs cartilages. Souvenons-nous que Pline a fréquenté cette école, et que l'ignorance a deux filles, l'incrédulité et la foi aveugle. Ne défendons pas moins notre liberté contre l'une que contre l'autre.

Païs où les physiciens anciens étudioient la nature.

XLII. Si l'on sort de ce théâtre, pour entrer dans un autre plus vaste, et pour examiner quelles étoient les contrées soumises aux naturalistes et aux physiciens de l'antiquité, nous ne les plaindrons pas.

Je sais que la navigation nous a ouvert un nouvel hémisphère; mais je sais aussi que la découverte d'un matelot et le voyage d'un marchand, n'éclairent pas toujours le monde, comme ils l'enrichissent. Les limites du monde connu sont plus étroites que celles du monde matériel; et les bornes du monde éclairé sont encore plus resserrées. Du tems des Pline, des Ptolomée, et des Galien, l'Europe à présent le siège des sciences, l'étoit également; mais la Grèce, l'Asie, la Syrie, l'Egypte, l'Afrique, païs fé-deux éléphans, dix élans, dix tigres, soixante lions apprivoisés, trente léopards apprivoisés, dix hyènes, un hippopotame, un rhinocéros, dix agrioleontes (1,) dix camelopardali, vingt ânes sauvages, et quarante chevaux sauvages (2.) C'est principalement dans la décadence de l'empire et du goût, qu'il faut chercher cette magnificence.

(1) On ignore ce qu'ils sont. Saumaise lit argoleontes, des lions blancs (a); Casaubon et Scaliger (b) agrioleontes, des lions sauvages.
(2) Jul. Capitolin. in Gordian. p. 164.
(a) Comment. Salmas. in Hist. Aug. 268.
(b) Comment. Casaub. in eand. Hist. p. 169.

conds en miracles, étoient remplis d'yeux dignes de les voir. Tout ce vaste corps étoit uni par la paix, par les loix et par la langue. L'Africain et le Breton, l'Espagnol et l'Arabe se rencontroient dans la capitale, et s'instruisoient tour-à-tour. Trente des premiers de Rome, souvent éclairés eux-mêmes, toujours accompagnés de ceux qui l'étoient,* partoient tous les ans de la capitale pour gouverner les provinces, et pour peu qu'ils eussent de curiosité, l'autorité applanissoit les routes de la science.

La Grande Bretagne inondée par l'océan.

XLIII. C'étoit sans doute de son beau-père Agricola, que Tacite apprît que l'océan inondoit la Grande Bretagne, et rendoit ce païs un amas de marais.† Hérodien nous confirme ce fait.‡ Cependant aujourd'hui, à quelques endroits près, le terrein de notre île est assez élevé.§ Pourroit-on ranger ce fait parmi ceux qui confirment le système de la diminution des eaux? Trouvera-t-on dans les ouvrages des hommes, de quoi affranchir le païs du joug de l'océan? Le sort du marais de Pomptine‖ et de quelques autres, nous donneroit d'assez minces

* V. Strab. L. xvii. p. 816. Edit. Casaub.

† Tacit. in Vit. Agricol. c. 10.

‡ Herodian. Hist. l. iii. c. 47.

§ Voici les paroles d'Hérodien, " Τὰ γὰρ πλεῖστα της βρεταννῶν χώρας ἐπικλύζομενα ταῖς τῆ ὠκεανῃ συνεχῶς ἀμπωτισιν ἑλώδη γίνεται.

Tacite s'exprime d'une manière encore plus forte. " Unum addiderim (dit-il), nusquam latius dominari mare; multum fluminum huc atque illuc ferri, nec littore tenus accrescere aut resorberi, sed influere penitus atque ambire; etiam jugis atque montibus influere velut in suo."

‖ Le consul Céthégus dessécha ce marais A. U. C. 592. Du tems de Jules-César il étoit derechef inondé. Ce dictateur avoit dessein minces idées de leurs travaux. Quoiqu'il en soit, content d'avoir fourni les matériaux, j'en laisse l'emploi aux physiciens. Ce n'est pas chez les anciens qu'on apprend à n'approfondir rien, à effleurer chaque chose, et à parler avec le plus de hardiesse de sujets qu'on entend le moins.

L'Esprit Philosophique. Prétensions à l'esprit philosophique.

XLIV. " Après l'esprit de discernement, ce qu'il y a de plus rare au monde (dit le judicieux la Bruyère) ce sont les perles et les diamans." Je mets sans balancer l'esprit philosophique avant celui du discernement. C'est la chose du monde la plus prônée, la plus ignorée et la plus rare. Il n'y a point d'écrivain qui n'y aspire. Il sacrifie de bonne grace la science. Pour peu que vous le pressiez, il conviendra que le jugement sévère embarrasse les opérations du génie: mais il vous assurera toujours que cet esprit philosophique qui brille dans ses écrits, fait le caractère du siècle où nous vivons. L'esprit philosophique d'un petit nombre de grands hommes, a formé, selon lui, celui du siècle. Celui-ci s'est répandu dans tous les ordres de l'état, et leur a préparé à son tour de dignes successeurs.

Ce qu'il n'est pas.

XLV. Cependant si nous jettions les yeux sur les ouvrages de nos sages, leur diversité nous laisdessein d'y faire travailler. Il paroît qu'Auguste le fit; mais je doute que ses travaux ayent mieux réussi que les premiers. Du moins Pline l'appelle encore marais. Horace l'avoit en quelque sorte prédit.

" Debemur morti nos nostraque
Sterilis ut palus dudum aptaque remis
Vicinas urbes alit et grave sensit aratrum."

Freinsheim. Supp. L. xlvi. c. 44. Sueton. L. i. c. 34. Plin. Hist. Nat. l. iii. c. 5.

seroit

seroit dans l'incertitude sur la nature de ce talent; et celle-ci pourroit nous conduire à douter s'il leur est tombé en partage. Chez les uns il consiste à se frayer des routes nouvelles, et à fronder toute opinion dominante, fut-elle de Socrate ou d'un inquisiteur Portugais, par la seule raison qu'elle est dominante. Chez les autres cet esprit s'identifie avec la géométrie, cette reine impérieuse qui, non contente de régner, proscrit ses sœurs, et déclare tout raisonnement peu digne de ce nom, s'il ne roule pas sur des lignes et sur des nombres. Rendons justice à l'esprit hardi, dont les écarts ont quelquefois conduit à la vérité, et dont les excès mêmes, comme les rébellions des peuples, inspirent une crainte salutaire au despotisme. Pénétrons-nous bien de tout ce que nous devons à l'esprit géomètre : mais cherchons pour l'esprit philosophique, un objet plus sage que celui-là, et plus universel que celui-ci.

Ce qu'il est. XLVI. Quiconque s'est familiarisé avec les écrits de Cicéron, de Tacite, de Bacon, de Leibnitz, de Fontenelle, de Montesquieu, s'en sera fait une idée aussi juste et bien plus parfaite que celle que j'essayerai de tracer.

L'esprit philosophique consiste à pouvoir remonter aux idées simples; à saisir et à combiner les premiers principes. Le coup d'œil de son possesseur est juste, mais en même tems étendu. Placé sur une hauteur, il embrasse une grande étendue de païs, dont il se forme une image nette et unique, pendant que des esprits aussi justes, mais plus bornés, n'en découvrent qu'une partie. Il peut être géomètre, mètre, antiquaire, musicien, mais il est toujours philosophe, et à force de pénétrer les premiers principes de son art, il lui devient supérieur. Il a place parmi ce petit nombre de génies qui travaillent de loin en loin à former cette première science à laquelle, si elle étoit perfectionnée, les autres seroient soumises. En ce sens cet esprit est bien peu commun. Il est assez de génies capables de recevoir avec justesse des idées particulières; il en est peu qui puissent renfermer dans une seule idée abstraite, un assemblage nombreux d'autres idées moins générales.

Le secours qu'il peut tirer de la littérature.

XLVII. Quelle étude peut former cet esprit? Je n'en connois aucune. Don du ciel, le grand nombre l'ignore ou le méprise; les sages le souhaitent; quelques-uns l'ont reçu; nul ne l'acquiert: mais je crois l'étude de la littérature, cette habitude de devenir, tour à tour, Grec, Romain, disciple de Zénon ou d'Epicure, bien propre à le développer et à l'exercer. A travers cette diversité infinie d'esprits, on remarque une conformité générale entre ceux à qui leur siècle, leur païs, leur religion ont inspiré une manière à peu près pareille d'envisager les mêmes objets. Les ames les plus exemptes de préjugés, ne sauroient s'en défaire entièrement. Leurs idées ont un air de paradoxe; et en brisant leurs chaines, vous sentez qu'elles les ont portées. Je cherche chez les Grecs des fauteurs de la démocratie; des enthousiastes de l'amour de la patrie chez les Romains; chez les sujets des Commode, des Sévère ou des Caracalla, des apologistes du pouvoir absolu; et chez l'Epicurien de l'antiquité, l'antiquité,* la condamnation de sa religion. Quel spectacle pour un esprit vraiment philosophique de voir les opinions les plus absurdes reçues chez les nations les plus éclairées, des barbares parvenus à la connoissance des plus sublimes vérités, des conséquences vraies, mais peu justes, tirées des principes les plus erronés, des principes admirables qui approchoient toujours de la vérité sans jamais y conduire, le langage formé sur les idées, et les idées justifiées par le langage, les sources de la morale partout les mêmes, les opinions de la contentieuse métaphysique partout variées, d'ordinaire extravagantes, nettes seulement pendant qu'elles furent superficielles, subtiles, obscures, incertaines, toutes les fois qu'elles prétendirent à la profondeur! Un ouvrage Iroquois, fut-il rempli d'absurdités, seroit un morceau impayable. Il offriroit une expérience unique de la nature de l'esprit humain, placé dans des circonstances que nous n'avons jamais éprouvées, et dominé par des mœurs et des opinions religieuses totalement contraires aux nôtres. Quelquefois nous serions frappés et instruits par la contrariété des idées qui en naîtroient; nous en chercherions les raisons; nous suivrions l'ame d'erreur en erreur. Quelquefois aussi nous reconnoîtrions avec plaisir nos principes, mais découverts par d'autres routes,

* Depuis qu'Epicure eut répandu sa doctrine, on commença à se déclarer assez publiquement sur la religion dominante, et à ne la regarder que comme une institution. V. Lucret. de Rer. Natur. l. i. v. 62, &c. Sallust. in Bell. Catilin. c. 51. Cicero pro Cluent. c. 61.

et

et presque toujours modifiés et altérés. Nous y apprendrions non seulement à avouer, mais à sentir la force des préjugés, à ne nous étonner jamais de ce qui nous paroît le plus absurde, et à nous défier souvent de ce qui nous semble le mieux établi.

J'aime à voir les jugemens des hommes prendre une teinture de leurs préventions, à les considérer qui n'osent pas tirer des principes qu'ils reconnoissent pour être justes, les conclusions qu'ils sentent être exactes. J'aime à les surprendre qui détestent chez le barbare, ce qu'ils admirent chez le Grec, et qui qualifient la même histoire d'impie chez le Payen, et de sacrée chez le Juif.

Sans cette connoissance philosophique de l'antiquité, nous ferions trop d'honneur à l'espèce humaine. L'empire de la coutume nous seroit peu connu. Nous confondrions à tout moment l'incroyable et l'absurde. Les Romains étoient éclairés; cependant ces mêmes Romains ne furent pas choqués de voir réunir dans la personne de César un Dieu, un prêtre et un Athée.* Il vit élever des temples à sa clémence.† Collègue de Romulus, il recevoit les vœux de la nation.‡ Sa statue étoit couchée, dans les fêtes sacrées, auprès de ce Jupiter qu'un instant après il alloit lui-même invo-

* Athée en niant sinon l'existence, du moins la providence de la divinité; car César étoit Epicurien. Ceux qui ont envie de voir comment un homme d'esprit peut rendre obscure une vérité claire, liront avec plaisir les doutes que M. Cayle a su répandre sur les sentimens de César. V. Dict. de Bayle à l'article César.

† V. Mémoires de l'Acad. des Bell. Lett. tom. i. p. 369, &c.

‡ Cicero ad Attic, l. xii. epist. 46, &c. L. xiii. epist. 28.

quer.

quer.* Fatigué de cette vaine pompe, il cherchoit Pansa et Trébatius pour se moquer avec eux de la crédulité du peuple, et de ses Dieux l'effet et l'objet de sa terreur.†

* César étoit souverain pontife, et ce sacerdoce n'étoit point pour les empereurs un vain titre. Les belles dissertations de M. de la Bastie sur le pontificat des empereurs convaincront les incrédules, s'il en est, sur cet article. Consultez surtout la troisième de ces pièces insérée dans les Mém. de l'Acad. des Belles-Lettres, tom. xv. p. 39.

† Lucrèce, né avec cet enthousiasme d'imagination, qui fait les grands poëtes et les missionnaires, voulut être l'un et l'autre. Je plaindrois le théologien qui ne feroit pas grace au dernier en faveur du premier. Lucrèce, après avoir prouvé la Divinité malgré lui-même, en rapportant les phénomènes de la nature à des causes générales, cherche comment l'erreur qu'il combat a pu s'emparer de tous les esprits. Il en trouve trois raisons: I. Nos songes; nous y voyons des êtres et des effets que nous ne rencontrons point dans ce monde; nous leur accordons aussitôt une existence réelle et une puissance immense. II. Notre ignorance de la nature, qui nous fait recourir par tout à l'action de la Divinité. III. Notre crainte, l'effet de cette ignorance; elle nous engage à fléchir devant les calamités qui ravagent la terre, et nous fait essayer d'appaiser par nos prières quelque être invisible qui nous afflige. Lucrèce exprime cette dernière raison avec une énergie et une rapidité qui nous enlève. Il ne nous accorde point le tems de l'examiner.

" Præterea cui non animus formidine Divûm, Contrahitur? cui non conrepunt membra pavore,
Fulminis horribili cum plaga torrida tellus
Contremit, et magnum percurrunt murmura cœlum?
Non populi, gentesque tremunt? Regesque superbi Conripiunt Divûm perculsi membra timore,
Ne quod ob admissum fœde dictumve superbe
Pœnarum grave sit solvendi tempus adactum."

Lucret. de Rer. Natura, l. v. ver. 1216, &c.

XLVIII. L'histoire est pour un esprit philosophique, ce qu'étoit le jeu pour le Marquis de Dangeau.* Il voyoit un système, des rapports, une suite, là, où les autres ne discernoient que les caprices de la fortune. Cette science est pour lui celle des causes et des effets. Elle mérite bien que j'essaie de poser quelques règles propres, non à faire germer le génie, mais à le garantir des écarts: peut-être que si on les avoit toujours bien pesées, on auroit pris plus rarement la subtilité pour la finesse d'esprit, l'obscurité pour la profondeur, et un air de paradoxe pour un génie créateur.

L'histoire est la science des causes et des effets.

XLIX. Parmi la multitude des faits, il y en a, et c'est le grand nombre, qui ne prouvent rien au delà de leur propre existence. Il y en a encore qui peuvent bien être cités dans une conclusion partielle, d'où le philosophe peut juger des motifs d'une action, et d'un trait dans un caractère: ils éclaircissent un chainon. Ceux qui dominent dans le système général, qui y sont liés intimément, et qui en ont fait mouvoir les ressorts, sont fort rares; et il est plus rare encore de trouver des esprits qui sachent les entrevoir dans le vaste cahos des événemens, et les en tirer purs et sans mélange.

Règles pour choisir les faits.

A ceux qui ont plus de jugement que d'érudition, il paroîtra peu nécessaire d'avertir qu'on doit toujours proportionner les causes aux effets, ne pas bâtir sur l'action d'un homme le caractère d'un siècle, ne pas chercher dans un effort unique, forcé

* Fonten. dans l'Eloge du Marq. de Dangeau.

et

et ruineux, la mesure des forces et des richesses d'un état, et se souvenir que ce n'est qu'en rassemblant qu'on peut juger, qu'un fait éclatant éblouit comme un éclair, mais qu'il instruit peu, si l'on ne le compare avec d'autres de la même espèce. Le peuple Romain fit voir en élisant Caton, qu'il aimoit mieux être corrigé que flatté.* dans ce même siècle, où il condamna la même sévérité dans la personne de Livius Salinator.†

L. Déférez plutôt aux faits qui viennent d'eux-mêmes vous former un système, qu'à ceux que vous découvrez après avoir conçu ce système. Préférez souvent les petits traits aux faits brillans. Il en est d'un siècle ou d'une nation comme d'un homme. Alexandre se dévoile mieux dans la tente de Darius‡ que dans les champs de Guagmela. Je reconnois tout autant la férocité des Romains à les voir condamner un malheureux dans l'amphithéâtre, qu'à les considérer qui étranglent un roi captif au pied du Capitole. Il n'y a point d'apparat dans les bagatelles. On se déshabille lors qu'on espère n'être pas vu; mais le curieux cherche à pénétrer dans les retraites les plus secrettes. Pour décider si la vertu triomphoit chez un peuple dans un certain siècle, j'observe plutôt ses actions que ses discours. Pour le condamner comme vicieux, je fais plus attention à ses discours qu'à ses actions. On loue la vertu sans la connoître, on la connoît sans la sentir, on la sent sans la pratiquer; mais il

* Liv. L. xxxix. c. 40. Plutarch. in Caton.

† Liv. L. xxix. c. 37.

‡ Quint. Curt. de Reb. Gest. Alexandri, L. iii. c. 32.

en

en est bien différemment du vice. On s'y porte par passion; on le justifie par raffinement. D'ailleurs, il y a toujours et partout de grands criminels; mais si la corruption n'est pas générale, ceux-ci-même respectent leur siècle. Si le siècle est vicieux, (et ils sont habiles à le discerner,) ils le méprisent, ils se montrent à découvert, ils bravent ses jugemens, ou ils espèrent de se les rendre favorables. Ils ne se trompent guères. Celui qui dans le siècle de Caton eût détesté le vice, se contente d'aimer la vertu dans celui de Tibère.

Le siècle de Tibère le plus vicieux de tous.

LI. J'ai choisi ce siècle avec réflexion. Le vice parvint alors à son comble. La cour de Tibère me l'apprend, mais un petit fait conservé par Suétone et par Tacite, m'en assure encore mieux; le voici : la vertu des Romains punissoit de mort l'incontinence chez leurs femmes.* Leur politique permettoit la débauche chez les courtisannes :† et pour

* Les Romains confioient le soin de la vertu des femmes à leur famille. Celle-ci s'assembloit, la jugeoit, si elle étoit accusée; la condamnoit à mort et exécutoit la sentence, si elle se trouvoit coupable. La loi pardonnoit aussi au courroux du mari ou du père qui tuoit le galant, surtout s'il étoit de condition servile. V. Plutarch. in Romul. Dionys. Halicarn. L. vii. Tacit. Annal. L. xiii. Valer. Maxim. L. vi. c. 3—7. Rosin. Antiq. Rom. L. viii. p. 859, &c.

† Le discours de Micio dans Térence, la manière dont Cicéron excuse les débauches de son client, et l'exhortation de Caton, peuvent nous faire connoître la morale des Romains à cet égard. Ils ne blâmoient la débauche que lorsqu'elle détournoit le citoyen de ses devoirs essentiels.

Leurs oreilles n'étoient pas plus chastes que leur conduite : peu de gens connoissent la Casina de Plaute, mais ceux qui ont lu cette misérable pièce, ne peuvent comprendre qu'il n'y ait eu pour régler le désordre même, on les forma en corps. Sous Tibère un grand nombre de femmes de condition ne rougirent point de se présenter publiquement devant leurs édiles, de se faire inscrire dans le rôle des courtisannes, et de briser par leur propre infamie, la barrière que les loix opposoient à leur prostitution.*

Parallèle de Tacite et de Tite-Live.

LII. Choisir les faits qui doivent être les principes de nos raisonnemens, on sent combien la tâche est difficile. La négligence ou le mauvais goût d'un historien peuvent nous faire perdre à jamais un trait unique, pour nous étourdir du bruit d'un combat. Si les philosophes ne sont pas toujours historiens, il seroit du moins à souhaiter que les historiens fussent philosophes.

Je ne connois que Tacite qui ait rempli mon idée de cet historien philosophe. L'intéressant Tite-Live lui-même ne sauroit en ce sens lui être comparé. L'un et l'autre ont bien su s'élever au-dessus de ces compilateurs grossiers que ne voyent dans les faits que des faits : mais l'un a écrit l'histoire en rhéteur, et l'autre en philosophe. Ce n'est pas que Tacite ait ignoré le langage des passions, ou Tite-Live celui de la raison : mais l'un, plus atque quarante à cinquante ans de cette farce à l'Andrienne. Une intrigue sale d'esclaves, n'y est relevée que par des pointes et des obscénités dignes d'eux. C'étoit cependant la comédie de Plaute qu'on voyoit avec le plus de plaisir, et qu'on redemandoit le plus souvent. Voilà les mœurs de la seconde guerre Punique, de cette vertu que la postérité des anciens Romains regrettoit et admiroit. V. Terent. Adelph. Act. i. Sc. 2. v. 38. Cicero pro Cœlio, c. 17. Horat. Satir. L. i. Sat. 2. v. 29. II. Prolog. ad Casin. Plaut.

* Sueton. L. iii. c. 35. Tacit. Annal. L. ii. c. 85.

taché

taché à plaire qu'à instruire, vous conduit pas-à-pas à la suite de ses héros, et vous fait éprouver tour-à-tour, l'horreur, l'admiration et la pitié. Tacite ne se sert de l'empire que l'éloquence a sur le cœur, que pour lier à vos yeux la chaine des événemens, et remplir votre ame des plus sages leçons. Je gravis sur les Alpes avec Annibal; mais j'assiste au conseil de Tibère. Tite-Live me peint l'abus du pouvoir, une sévérité que la nature approuve en frémissant, la vengeance et l'amour qui s'unissent à la liberté, la tyrannie qui tombe sous leurs coups:* mais les loix des décemvirs, leur caractère, leurs défauts, leurs rapports enfin avec le génie du peuple Romain, avec le parti des décemvirs, avec leurs desseins ambitieux, il les oublie totalement. Je ne vois point chez lui comment ces loix faites pour une république bornée, pauvre, à demi-sauvage, la bouleversèrent, lorsque la force de son institution l'eut portée au faîte de la grandeur. Je l'aurois trouvé dans Tacite. J'en juge, non-seulement par la trempe connue de son génie, mais encore par ce tableau énergique et varié qu'il offre des loix, ces enfans de la corruption, de la liberté, de l'équité et de la faction.†

LIII. Ne suivons point le conseil de cet écrivain qui unit, comme Fontenelle, le savoir et le goût. Je m'oppose, sans crainte du nom flétrissant d'érudit, à la sentence par laquelle ce juge éclairé, mais sévère, ordonne qu'à la fin d'un siècle on rassemble tous les faits, qu'on en choisisse quelques-uns et qu'on livre le reste aux flammes.* Conservons-les tous précieusement. Un Montesquieu démêlera dans les plus chétifs, des rapports inconnus au vulgaire. Imitons les botanistes. Toutes les plantes ne sont pas utiles dans la médecine, cependant ils ne cessent d'en découvrir de nouvelles. Ils espèrent que le génie et les travaux heureux y verront des propriétés jusqu'à présent cachées.

Remarque sur une idée de M. D'Alembert.

* Liv. L. iii. c. 44—60.

† Tacit. Annal. L. iii. p. 84. edit. Lips.

On a fait les hommes trop systématiques ou trop capricieux.

LIV. L'incertitude est pour nous un état forcé. L'esprit borné ne sauroit se fixer dans cet équilibre dont se piquoit l'école de Pyrrhon. Le génie brillant se laisse éblouïr par ses propres conjectures : il sacrifie la liberté aux hypothèses. De cette disposition naissent les systêmes. On a vu du dessein dans les actions d'un grand homme ; on a apperçu un ton dominant dans son caractère, et des spéculatifs de cabinet ont aussitôt voulu faire de tous les hommes, des êtres aussi systématiques dans la pratique que dans la spéculation. Ils ont trouvé de l'art dans leurs passions, de la politique dans leurs foiblesses, de la dissimulation dans leur inconstance ; en un mot, à force de vouloir faire honneur à l'esprit humain, ils en ont souvent fait bien peu au cœur.

Justement choqués de leur raffinement, et fâchés de voir étendre à tous les hommes, des prétensions qu'on eût dû borner à un Philippe ou à un César, des esprits plus naturels se sont jettés dans l'autre extrême. Ils ont banni l'art du monde moral, pour y substituer le hasard. Selon eux les foibles mortels n'agissent que par caprice. La fureur d'un

* D'Alemb. Mélanges de philosophie et de littérature, vol. ii. p. 1.

écervelé

écervelé établit un empire : la foiblesse d'une femme le détruit.

Causes générales, mais déterminées.

LV. L'étude des causes déterminées, mais générales, doit plaire aux uns et aux autres. Ceux-ci y voyent avec plaisir l'homme humilié, les motifs de ses actions inconnus à lui-même, lui-même le jouet des causes étrangères, et de la liberté de chacun, l'origine d'une nécessité générale. Ceux-là y retrouvent l'enchainement qu'ils aiment, et les spéculations dont leur esprit se nourrit.

Qu'une vaste carrière s'ouvre à mes réflexions! La théorie de ces causes générales seroit entre les mains d'un Montesquieu, une histoire philosophique de l'homme. Il nous les feroit voir réglant la grandeur et la chute des empires, empruntant successivement les traits de la fortune, de la prudence, du courage, et de la foiblesse, agissant sans le concours des causes particulières, et quelquefois même triomphant d'elles. Supérieur à l'amour de ses propres systêmes, dernière passion du sage, il auroit su reconnoître que, malgré l'étendue de ces causes, leur effet ne laisse pas d'être borné, et qu'il se montre principalement dans ces événemens généraux, dont l'influence lente mais sûre change la face de la terre, sans qu'on puisse s'appercevoir de l'époque de ce changement, et surtout dans les mœurs, les religions, et tout ce qui est soumis au joug de l'opinion. Voilà une partie des leçons que ce philosophe eût tirées de ce sujet. Pour moi, j'y trouve simplement une occasion de m'essayer à penser. Je vais indiquer quelques faits intéressans, et tâcherai ensuite d'en rendre raison.

Système de paganisme.

LVI. Nous connoissons le paganisme, ce système riant, mais absurde, qui peuple l'univers d'êtres fantasques, dont la puissance supérieure ne les rend que plus injustes et plus insensés que nous-mêmes. Quelle fut la nature et l'origine de ces dieux? Furent-ils des princes, des fondateurs de sociétés, des grands hommes inventeurs des arts? Une reconnoissance ingénieuse, une admiration aveugle, une adulation intéressée plaça-t-elle dans le ciel, ceux qui pendant leur vie avoient été nommés les bienfaiteurs de la terre? Ou bien faut-il reconnoître dans ces divinités, autant de parties de l'univers auxquelles l'ignorance des premiers hommes avoit accordé la vie et la pensée? Cette question est digne de notre attention; elle est curieuse, mais elle est difficile.

Difficultés de connoître une religion.

LVII. Nous ne connoissons guères le système du Paganisme que par les poëtes* et par les pères de l'église, les uns et les autres très adonnés aux fictions.† Les ennemis d'une religion ne la connoissent jamais, parcequ'ils la haïssent, et souvent la haïssent parcequ'ils ne la connoissent pas. Ils adoptent contr'elle, avec empressement, les calomnies les plus atroces. Ils imputent à leurs adversaires des dogmes qu'ils détestent, et des conséquences auxquelles ils n'ont jamais songé. Les sec-

* Il faut cependant distinguer Homère, Hésiode, Pindare, et les poëtes tragiques, qui vécurent pendant que la tradition étoit plus pure.

† Voyez sur cette article la Recherche Libre du Docteur Midleton, et l'Histoire du Manichéisme de M. de Beausobre, deux beaux monumens d'un siècle éclairé.

sectateurs d'une religion, de l'autre côté, remplis de cette foi qui se fait un crime de douter, sacrifient pour sa défense, leur raison et même leur vertu. Forger des prophéties, ou des miracles, pallier ce qu'ils ne peuvent défendre, allégoriser ce qu'ils ne peuvent pallier, et nier hardiment ce qu'ils ne peuvent allégoriser, sont des moyens que jamais dévot n'a rougi d'employer. Rappellons-nous les Chrétiens et les Juifs. Interrogez leurs ennemis sur leur compte; c'étoient des magiciens et des idolâtres,* eux, dont le culte étoit aussi épuré, que leurs mœurs étoient sévères. Jamais Musulman n'a hésité sur l'unité de Dieu.† Cependant combien de fois nos bons ayeux ne les ont-ils pas accusés d'adorer les astres?‡ Dans le sein même de ces religions, il s'est élevé cent sectes différentes, qui, s'accusant les unes les autres d'avoir corrompu leur dogmes communs, ont inspiré la fureur aux peuples et la modération aux sages. Cependant ces peuples étoient civilisés, et des livres reconnus pour être émanés de la divinité fixoient les principes de leur croyance. Mais où trouver ces principes, dans un amas confus de fables, qu'une tradition isolée, contradictoire, altérée, dictoit à quelques tribus de sauvages dans la Grèce?

* Tacit. Hist. L. v. Fleury. Hist. Eccles. tom. i. p. 369. et tom. ii. p. 5, et les Apologies de Justin Martyr et de Tertullien, qui y sont citées.

† D'Herbelot. Bibliot. Orient. Artic. Allah. p. 100, et Sale's Alcoran. Prelim. Disc. p. 71.

‡ Reland. de Rel. Mahomm. Part ii. c. 6 & 7.

Le raisonnement nous aidera peu.

LVIII. Le raisonnement nous est ici d'un foible secours. Il est absurde de consacrer des temples à ceux dont on voit les sépulcres. Qu'y a-t-il de trop absurde pour les hommes? Ne connoît-on pas des nations très éclairées, qui en appellent au témoignage des sens pour les preuves d'une religion, dont un dogme principal contredit ce témoignage? Cependant si les dieux du paganisme avoient été des hommes, le culte réciproque* que leurs adorateurs leur rendoient, eût été bien peu raisonnable, et une tolérance peu raisonnable n'est pas l'erreur du peuple.

Pensée sur le culte réciproque des sectes Payennes.

Crésus envoye à Delphes. Alexandre consulte l'oracle de Jupiter Ammon.

LIX. Crésus fait consulter l'oracle de Delphes,† Alexandre traverse les sables brûlans de la Lybie pour demander à Jupiter Ammon s'il est son fils.‡ Mais ce Jupiter Grec, ce roi de Crète, devenu le maître de la foudre, n'en eût-il pas écrasé cet Ammon, ce Lybien, ce nouveau Salmonée, qui tentoit de la lui arracher? Deux rivaux se disputent l'empire de l'univers, peut-on à la fois les reconnoître tous deux? Mais si l'un et l'autre ne furent que l'éther, le ciel, la même divinité, le Grec et l'Africain l'auront désigné par les symboles qui convenoient à leurs mœurs, et par les noms que leurs langues leur fournissoient pour exprimer ses attributs. Mais loin de nous les raisonnemens, ce sont les faits qu'il faut interroger. Ecoutons leur réponse.

* Vide Warburton's Divine Legation, tom. i. p. 270—276.

† Herodot. Lib. i.

‡ Diodor. Sic. lib. xvii. Quint. Curt. lib. iv. cap. 7. Arrian. lib. iii.

LX.

LX. Malheureux habitans des forêts, ces Grecs si orgueilleux tenoient tout des étrangers. Les Phéniciens leur apprirent l'usage des lettres ; les arts, les loix, tout ce qui élève l'homme au dessus des animaux, ils le durent aux Egyptiens. Ces derniers leur apportèrent leur religion, et les Grecs, en l'adoptant, payèrent le tribut que l'ignorance doit au savoir. Le préjugé ne fit qu'une résistance de bienséance, et se rendit sans difficulté, après avoir entendu l'oracle de Dodone, qui décida pour le nouveau culte.* Tel est le récit d'Hérodote, qui connoissoit la Grèce et l'Egypte, et dont le siècle placé entre la grossièreté de l'ignorance et les raffinemens de la philosophie rend le témoignage décisif.

La religion Grecque étoit d'origine Egyptienne.

LXI. Je vois déjà disparoître une bonne partie des légendes Grecques, l'Apollon né dans l'île de Délos, le Jupiter enseveli dans la Crète. Si ces dieux habitèrent autrefois la terre, l'Egypte et non la Grèce fut leur patrie. Mais si les prêtres de Memphis surent aussi bien leur religion que l'Abbé Banier,† jamais l'Egypte ne donna naissance à leurs dieux. A travers leur métaphysique ténébreuse, la raison luisit assez pour leur faire sentir que jamais homme ne peut devenir Dieu, ni jamais Dieu être transformé en simple homme.‡ Mystérieux dans leurs dogmes et dans leur culte, ces interprètes du ciel et de la sagesse, déguisèrent, par La religion Egyptienne allégorique.

* Herodot. Lib. ii.

† Dans sa mythologie expliquée par l'histoire.

‡ Herodot. Lib. ii.

un

un langage pompeux, les vérités de la nature, qu'un peuple grossier eût méprisées dans leur majestueuse simplicité. Les Grecs méconnurent cette religion à bien des égards. Ils l'altérèrent par des mélanges étrangers, mais le fonds demeura, et ce fonds Egyptien fut par conséquent allégorique.*

Le culte héroïque.

LXII. Le culte héroïque, si bien distingué de celui des dieux dans les premiers siècles de la Grèce, nous montre que les dieux n'étoient pas des héros.† Les anciens croyoient que les grands hommes, admis après leur mort aux festins des dieux, jouissoient de leur félicité, sans participer à leur puissance. Ils s'assembloient autour des tombeaux de leurs bienfaiteurs; leurs chants de louanges‡ célébroient leur mémoire, et faisoient naître une émulation salutaire de leurs vertus.

* Je dois beaucoup, dans ces recherches, au savant Freret de l'Académie des Belles-Lettres. Il a donné des ouvertures dans une route, qui paroissoit vue de tous côtés. Je crois cependant que ses raisonnemens valent mieux, lorsqu'il est question de faits que quand il s'agit de dogmes. Prévenu d'estime pour ce littérateur, je dévorai avidement sa réponse à la chronologie Newtonienne; mais oserai-je le dire? il ne répondit point à mon attente. Que lui reste-t-il de nouveau, si vous lui ôtez les principes d'une théologie et d'une chronologie nouvelles, que nous possédions déjà,(1) des généalogies défectueuses et très peu concluantes, quelques recherches minutieuses sur la chronologie de Sparte, une astronomie ancienne, que je n'entends pas trop bien, et la belle préface de M. Bougainville, que je relis toujours avec un goût nouveau?

† Hist. de l'Acad. des Belles-Lettres, tom. xvi. p. 28, &c.

‡ V. Mém. de Littér. tom. xii. p. 5, &c. et Ezech. Spanheim in Callim.

(1) Dans les Mém. de l'Acad. tom. v. xviii. xx. xxiii.

Leurs

Leurs ombres évoquées des enfers goûtoient avec plaisir les offrandes de la dévotion.* Il est vrai que cette dévotion devint insensiblement un culte religieux, mais ce ne fut que très tard, et lorsqu'on identifia ces héros avec des divinités anciennes, dont ils portoient le nom, ou rappelloient le caractère. Dans le siècle d'Homère, on les distinguoit encore. Hercule n'est point un de ses dieux. Il ne reconnoît Esculape que pour un médecin distingué,† et Castor et Pollux sont pour lui des guerriers morts et enterrés à Sparte.‡

Système d'Ephémère.

LXIII. La superstition avoit cependant franchi ces limites, les héros étoient devenus des dieux, et le culte qu'on rendoit aux dieux les avoit tirés du rang des hommes, lorsqu'un philosophe hardi entreprit de prouver qu'ils l'avoient été. Ephémère le Messénien avança ce paradoxe.§ Mais loin d'en appeller aux monumens authentiques de la Grèce et de l'Egypte, qui auroient dû conserver la mémoire de ces hommes célèbres, il va se perdre dans l'océan. Une Utopie méprisée de tous les anciens, une île de Panchaïe, riche, fertile, superstitieuse, et connue à lui seul, lui offre dans un

* Homer. Odyss. L. xi. † Homer Iliad, L. iv. v. 193.

‡ Id. L. v. v. 241. § Lactant. Instit. L. i. c. xi. p. 62.

" Antiquus auctor Ephemerus, qui fuit é civitate Messanâ, res gestas Jovis et cæterorum qui Dii putantur collegit, historiamque contexit ex titulis et inscriptionibus sacris, quæ in antiquissimis templis habebantur, maximeque in fano Jovis Triphyllii, ubi auream columnam positam esse ab ipso Jove, titulus indicabat, in quâ columnâ gesta sua perscripsit ut monimentum esset posteris rerum suarum." Ce récit de Lactance diffère un peu de celui de Diodore.

temple

temple magnifique de Jupiter une colonne d'or, où Mercure avoit gravé les exploits et l'apothéose des héros de sa race.* Ces fables étoient trop grossières pour les Grecs eux-mêmes. Elles ne valurent à leur auteur que le mépris général avec le nom d'Athée.†‡

LXIV. Enhardis peut-être par son exemple, les Crétois se vantèrent de posséder le tombeau de Jupiter, qui étoit mort dans leur île, après y avoir long tems régné.‖ Callimaque se montre indigné de cette fiction, et son scholiaste nous en dévoile l'origine.§ On avoit écrit sur un tombeau, Tom-

* Diodore de Sicile, L. v. p. 29. 30, et L. vi.

Il y a sur Ephémère une dissertation de M. Fourmont l'aîné, qui contient des conjectures très hardies, et des emportemens fort plaisans.(1) Il sied mal à un jeune homme de mépriser quoi que ce soit, mais je ne saurois réfuter cette pièce sérieusement. Celui qui ne voit pas que la Panchaïe décrite dans Diodore de Sicile étoit située au midi de la Gédrosie, et à l'occident peu éloignée de la péninsule des Indes, peut croire avec M. Fourmont que le Golfe Arabique est au midi de l'Arabie Heureuse, que le païs de Phank sur le continent est l'île de Panchaïe, que le désert de Pharan est le plus beau lieu du monde, et que la ville de Pierie en Syrie est la capitale d'un petit canton aux environs de Médine.

† Callim. ap. Plut. tom. ii. p. 880. Eratosth. et Polyb. ap. Strab. Georg. L. ii. p. 102, 103. et L. vii. p. 299. edit. Casaub.

‡ Gerrard Vossius de Histor. Græcis, L. i. c. xi. fait voir que non seulement les Payens lui donnoient ce nom, mais encore Théophile d'Antioche parmi les Chrétiens et Joseph parmi les Juifs; ce qui fait voir qu'Ephémère en attaquant les dieux des Grecs, n'en reconnoissoit point d'autres.

‖ Lactant. Instit. L. i. c. xi. p. 65. Lucian Timon, p. 34. et Jupit. Frag. p. 701. Cicer. de Nat. Deor. L. iii. c. 21.

§ Callimach. Hym. in Jovem. v. 8. et Scholiast. Vet. in loc. edit. Græc.

(1) Mém. de Littér. tom. xv. p. 265, &c.

beau

beau de Minos fils de Jupiter. Le tems ou le dessein fit disparoître les mots de fils et de Minos; on lut *Tombeau de Jupiter. Cependant le système d'Ephémère s'accréditoit lentement malgré ses preuves. Diodore de Sicile parcourut la terre, pour rassembler dans les traditions des divers peuples de quoi l'appuyer.† Mais les Stoïciens, dans leur mélange bizarre du Théisme le plus pur, du Spinosisme et de l'idolâtrie populaire, rapportoient ce paganisme, dont ils étoient les zélateurs, au culte de la nature brisée en autant de dieux qu'elle a de faces différentes. Cicéron, cet académicien, pour qui tout étoit objection et rien n'étoit preuve, osé à peine leur opposer le système d'Ephémère.‡

LXV. Ce ne fut que sous l'empire Romain, que les idées du Messénien prirent le dessus. Dans le tems qu'un monde esclave décernoit le titre de dieux à des monstres indignes de celui d'hommes, c'étoit faire sa cour que de confondre Jupiter et Domitien. Bienfaiteurs de la terre, ainsi les appelloit l'adulation, leur droit à la divinité étoit le même; leur nature et leur puissance étoient égales. Par politique ou par méprise, Pline lui-même ne se garantit pas de cette erreur.‖ En vain Plu-

Ne prévalut que sous l'empire Romain.

* Tel est le récit du scholiaste adopté par le Chevalier Newton. Mais Lactance rapporte l'inscription ZAN XPONOY, ce qui m'a l'air bien plus antique. Lucien, car les fables vont toujours en augmentant, nous apprend, que l'inscription portoit que Jupiter ne tonnoit plus, qu'il avoit subi le sort des mortels, δηλωσαι ως ουκετι βροντησειεν αν ο Ζευς, τεθνεως παλαι.

† Diodore de Sicile dans les cinq premiers livres, passim.

‡ Cicer. de Nat. Deor. L. iii. c. 21.

‖ Plin. Hist. Natur. L. vii. c. 51. et pass.

tarque

tarque essaya-t-il de revendiquer la foi de ses ayeux.* Ephémère régna par tout; et les pères de l'Eglise, se servant de leurs avantages, attaquèrent le paganisme du côté le plus foible. Pourroit-on les blâmer? Si les dieux prétendus ne furent pas en effet des hommes déifiés, ils l'étoient devenus, du moins dans l'opinion de leurs adorateurs; et les pères n'en vouloient qu'à leurs opinions.

Echaînement des erreurs.

LXVI. Allons plus loin; tâchons de suivre l'enchaînement non des faits, mais des idées, de sonder le cœur humain, et de démêler ce fil d'erreurs, qui du sentiment vrai, simple, et universel qu'il y a une puissance au dessus de l'homme, le conduisit par dégrés à se faire des dieux, auxquels il eût rougi de ressembler.

Sentimens confus du sauvage.

Le sentiment n'est qu'un retour sur nous-mêmes. Les idées se rapportent aux objets hors de nous. Leur nombre, en occupant l'esprit, affoiblit le sentiment. C'est donc parmi les sauvages, dont les idées sont bornées aux besoins, et les besoins simplement ceux de la nature, que le sentiment doit être le plus vif, quoiqu'en même tems le plus confus. Le sauvage ressent à tout moment des agitations, qu'il ne peut ni expliquer ni reprimer. Ignorant et foible, il craint tout, parcequ'il ne peut se défendre de rien. Il admire tout, parcequ'il ne connoît rien. Le mépris bien fondé de lui-même, car la vanité est un ouvrage de la société, lui fait sentir l'existence d'une puissance supérieure. C'est cette puissance, dont il ignore les attributs, qu'il

* Plut. de Placit. Philosoph. de Isid. et Osirid.

invoque,

invoque, et dont il demande des graces, sans savoir à quel titre il en peut espérer. Ce sentiment peu distinct produisit les dieux bons des premiers Grecs, et les divinités de la plûpart des sauvages, et les uns et les autres n'en surent régler ni le nombre, ni le caractère, ni le culte.

Il adore tout ce qu'il voit;

LXVII. Bientôt le sentiment devint idée. Le sauvage rendit son homage à tout ce qui l'entouroit. Tout devoit lui paroître plus excellent que lui-même. Ce chêne majestueux, qui le couvroit de son feuillage épais, avoit ombragé ses ayeux, depuis l'origine de sa race. Il élevoit sa tête jusqu'aux nues; le fier Aquilon se perdoit à travers ses branches. Auprès de cet arbre altier qu'étoit sa durée, sa taille, sa force? La reconnoissance se joignit à l'admiration. Cet arbre qui lui prodiguoit ses glands, cette onde claire où il se désalteroit, étoient des bienfaiteurs qui rendoient sa vie heureuse; sans eux il ne pouvoit subsister, mais quel besoin avoient-ils de lui? En effet sans les lumières qui nous apprennent combien la raison seule est supérieure à toutes ces parties nécessaires d'un système intelligent, chacune d'elles est au-dessus de l'homme. Mais privé de ces lumières, le sauvage leur accordà à chacune la vie et la puissance. Il se prosterna devant son ouvrage.

pourquoi?

Ses idées sont uniques.

LXVIII. Les idées du sauvage sont uniques, parcequ'elles sont simples. Remarquer les qualités différentes des objets, observer celles qui leur sont communes, et de cette ressemblance former une idée abstraite, qui représente le genre, sans être l'image d'aucun objet particulier; sont les ouvrages ouvrages de l'esprit, qui agit, qui se replie sur lui-même, et qui déjà surchargé d'idées, cherche à se soulager par la méthode. Dans le premier état, l'ame passive et ignorant ses forces, ne sait que recevoir les impressions étrangères: ces impressions ne lui rendent les objets qu'isolés, et comme ils sont en eux-mêmes! Le sauvage rencontroit ses dieux par tout, chaque forêt, chaque prairie en fourmilloit.

Il combine ses idées et multiplie ses dieux.

LXIX. L'expérience développa ses idées; car les nations, comme les hommes, doivent tout à l'expérience. Son esprit familiarisé avec un grand nombre d'objets étrangers s'apperçut de leur nature commune, et cette nature devint pour lui une nouvelle divinité supérieure à tous ces dieux particuliers. Mais chaque chose qui existe a son existence déterminée à un tems ou à un lieu; et c'est ce qui la distingue de toute autre chose. L'homme a dû se conduire différemment à l'égard de ces deux manières d'exister, l'une sensible et devant ses yeux, l'autre passagère, métaphysique, et qui n'est peut-être que la succession des idées. La nature commune, différentiée uniquement par le tems, a dû faire disparoître les natures particulières, pendant que celles qui sont distinguées par les lieux ont pu subsister comme parties de la nature commune. Le dieu des rivières n'a point attenté sur les droits du Tibre ou du Clitumne,* mais le vent du Sud qui souffloit hier, et celui que nous ressentons aujour-

* Hist. de l'Acad. des Belles Lettres, tom. xii. p. 36. Plin. Epist. L. viii. Epist. 8.

d'hui,

d'hui, ne sont l'un et l'autre que ce tyran furieux, qui soulève les flots de la mer Adriatique.*

LXX. Plus on s'exerce à penser, plus on fait de combinaisons. Deux genres sont différens à quelques égards, ils se ressemblent à d'autres : ils sont destinés au même usage, ils font partie du même élément. La fontaine devient rivière, la rivière se perd dans la mer. Cette mer fait partie du vaste océan qui embrasse toute l'étendue de la terre, et la terre elle-même renferme dans son sein tout ce qui subsiste par un principe de végétation. A mesure que les nations se sont éclairées, leur idolâtrie a dû se raffiner. Elles ont mieux senti combien l'univers est gouverné par des loix générales; elles se sont plus rapprochées de l'unité d'une cause efficiente. Jamais les Grecs n'ont su simplifier leurs idées au delà de l'eau, de la terre et du ciel, qui, sous les noms de Jupiter, de Neptune, et de Pluton, contenoient et régissoient toutes choses. Mais les Egyptiens, d'un génie plus propre aux spéculations abstraites, formèrent enfin leur Osiris† le premier des Dieux, le principe intelligent, qui agissoit sans cesse sur le principe matériel, connu sous le nom d'Isis sa femme et sa sœur. Suite des combinaisons.

* Hor. Carm. L. iii. Od. 3.

" ——— Neque Auster Dux inquieti turbidus Adriæ."

† Remarquez que cet Osiris et sa sœur étoient les plus jeunes des dieux. Il avoit fallu aux Egyptiens un grand nombre de siècles pour parvenir à cette simplicité. (1)

(1) Diodore de Sicile, L. i. c. 8.

Des gens, qui croyoient à l'éternité de la matière, ne pouvoient guères aller plus loin.*

Génération et hiérarchie des dieux.

LXXI. Jupiter, le Dieu de la mer et le noir Pluton étoient frères. Toutes les branches de leur postérité s'étendoient à l'infini, et renfermoient toute la nature. Telle étoit la mythologie des anciens. Pour des hommes grossiers, l'idée de génération étoit plus naturelle que celle de création. Elle étoit plus aisée à saisir, elle supposoit moins de puissance, on y étoit conduit par des liaisons sensibles; mais aussi cette génération les menoit à établir une hiérarchie, dont ces êtres libres mais bornés ne pouvoient pas se passer. Les trois grands Dieux exerçoient une puissance paternelle sur leurs enfans, habitans de la terre, des airs, et des mers; et la primogéniture de Jupiter lui donnoit une supériorité sur ses frères, qui lui mérita le titre de roi des dieux, et de père des hommes. Mais ce roi, ce père suprême, étoit trop borné à tous égards, pour nous permettre de faire honneur aux Grecs de la croyance d'un être suprême.

Dieux de la vie humaine.

LXXII. Ce système, tout mal construit qu'il étoit, rendoit raison de tous les effets de la nature. Mais le monde moral, l'homme, son sort, et ses actions étoient sans divinités. L'éther ou la terre y

* Le culte du soleil a été connu de tous les peuples. Je dirai ce qui m'en paroît la raison. C'est peut-être le seul objet de l'univers à la fois sensible et unique. Sensible à tous les peuples, de la manière la plus brillante et la plus bienfaisante, il enlevoit leurs hommages. Unique et indivjsible, les raisonneurs qui n'étoient pas trop difficiles trouvoient en lui tous les grands traits de la divinité.

eût

eût été peu propre. Du besoin de nouveaux dieux naquit une nouvelle chaine d'erreurs, qui, s'unissant avec la première, ne forma qu'un même roman théologique. Je soupçonne que ce système naquit plus tard. L'homme ne songe guères à rentrer en lui-même, qu'après avoir épuisé les objets étrangers.

LXXIII. Deux hypothèses ont toujours été, et seront toujours. Dans l'une, l'homme n'a reçu du Créateur que la raison et la volonté. C'est à lui à décider de l'usage qu'il en fera, et à régler ses actions à son gré. Dans l'autre, il ne peut agir que suivant les loix préétablies de la Divinité, dont il n'est que l'instrument. Le sentiment le trompe, et lorsqu'il croit suivre sa volonté, il ne suit en effet que celle de son maître. Ces dernières idées ont pu naître dans l'esprit d'un peuple à peine sorti de l'enfance. Peu fait aux ressorts compliqués de la machine, les grandes vertus, les crimes atroces, les inventions utiles de ce petit nombre d'ames singulières, qui ne doivent rien à leur siècle, lui parurent surpasser les forces humaines. Il vit partout des dieux agissans, qui inspiroient le vice ou la vertu aux foibles mortels, incapables de se soustraire à leurs volontés.* Ce n'est pas la prudence qui inspire à Pandare le dessein de rompre la trève, et de décocher un trait au cœur de Ménélas. C'est Mi-

Systèmes de la liberté et de la nécessité.

Les anciens suivoient le dernier.

* Je ne suis pas trop content de cet endroit. Je donne la meilleure raison que j'ai pu trouver; mais il me semble que dans ces premiers siècles, on eût dû être guidé par le sentiment, et le sentiment est tout entier du côté de la liberté.

verve qui le pousse à cet attentat.* La malheureuse Phèdre n'est point coupable. Vénus, outrée des mépris d'Hyppolite, allume dans le cœur de cette reine une flamme incestueuse, qui la précipite au crime et à la mort.† Un dieu se chargea de chaque événement de la vie, de chaque passion de l'ame, et de chaque ordre de la société.

Union des deux espèces de dieux.

LXXIV. Mais ces dieux de l'homme, ces passions et ces facultés généralisées et personnifiées de cette manière, n'avoient qu'une existence métaphysique et trop peu sensible pour les hommes. Il falloit les fondre avec les dieux de la nature, et c'est ici que l'allégorie imagina mille rapports fantasques, car l'esprit veut au moins une apparence de vérité. Il étoit naturel que le dieu de la mer le fut des matelots. L'expression figurée de cet œil qui voit tout, de ces rayons qui percent les airs, pouvoit aisément faire du soleil un habile prophète, et un archer adroit. Mais pourquoi la planète Vénus est-elle mère des amours? Pourquoi s'élève-t-elle de l'écume des flots? Laissons ces énigmes aux devins. Aussitôt que les départemens des dieux de la nature humaine furent établis, ils durent enlever tout le culte des hommes. Ils parloient au cœur et aux passions, au lieu que les dieux

* Homer. Iliad. L. iv. v. 93, &c.

† Αλλ' ετι ταυτη τον δ' ερωτα χρη πεσειν.
Δειξω δε Θησει πραγμα, κακφανησεται.
Και τον μεν ημιν πολεμιον πεφυκοτα
Κτενει πατης αραισι, ...
Η δ' ευκλεης μεν, αλλ' ομως απολυται
Φαιδρα————(1).

(1) Euripid. Hippol. Act. i. v. 40.

physiques,

physiques, qui n'avoient point acquis d'attributs moraux, rentrèrent insensiblement dans le mépris et dans l'oubli. Aussi n'est-ce que dans l'antiquité la plus reculée que je vois fumer les autels de Saturne.*

LXXV. Les dieux s'intéressent donc dans les affaires humaines. Il ne se passe rien dont ils ne soient les auteurs. Mais sont-ils les auteurs du crime? Cette conséquence nous effraye: un payen n'hésitoit point à l'admettre, et ne pouvoit en effet hésiter. Les dieux inspiroient souvent des desseins vicieux. Pour les suggérer, il falloit les vouloir, et même les aimer. Il ne leur restoit pas la ressource d'un petit mal permis dans le meilleur des mondes possibles.† Ce mal n'étoit pas seulement permis, il étoit autorisé, et d'ailleurs les différentes divinités, bornées à leurs départemens particuliers, étoient très indifférentes à un bien général qu'elles ne connoissoient point. Chacune suivoit son caractère, et n'inspiroit que les passions qu'elle ressentoit. Le dieu de la guerre étoit fier, brutal, et sanguinaire; la déesse de la prudence, sage, retenue, peu sincère; la mère des amours, aimable, voluptueuse, emportée dans ses caprices; la ruse et la souplesse convenoient au dieu des marchands; et les cris des malheureux flattoient l'oreille du tyran soupçonneux des morts, du noir monarque des enfers.

Les dieux ont des passions humaines.

* J'entends chez les Grecs; son culte se conserva long tems en Italie.

† Fontenelle dans l'Eloge de M. de Leibnitz.

Ils ont des préférences.

LXXVI. Un dieu père des hommes l'est de tous également. Il ne connoît ni la haine, ni la faveur. Mais les divinités partiales doivent avoir des favoris. Ne distingueront-elles pas ceux dont le goût est conforme au leur? Mars ne peut qu'aimer ces Thraces dont la guerre est l'unique occupation,* et ces Scythes dont la boisson la plus délicieuse est le sang de leurs ennemis.† Les mœurs d'un habitant de Cypre‡ ou de Corinthe, lieux où tout respiroit le luxe et la mollesse, devoient plaire à la déesse des amours. La reconnoissance se joignoit au goût. Des sentimens de préférence étoient dûs à des peuples dont les mœurs n'étoient qu'un culte détourné de leurs dieux tutélaires. Le culte même qu'on leur rendoit se rapportoit toujours à leur caractère. Ces victimes humaines qui expiroient sur l'autel de Mars,§ ces mille courtisanes qui se dévouoient au temple de Vénus,‖ toutes ces femmes distinguées de Babylone, qui lui immoloient leur * Herodot. L. v. c. 4, 5. Meziriac. Comm. sur les Epitr. d'Ovide, tom. i. p. 162.

† Herodot. L. iv. c. 64, 65.

‡ M. de Vaugelas m'apprend que lorsqu'il s'agit de l'antiquité il faut toujours dire Cypre, quoique le nom moderne soit Chypre. (1) Je vois que MM. de Fenelon (2) et de Vertot (3) ont fait cette distinction.

§ Herod, L. v. c. 4, 5. Minuc. Fœl. Octav. c. 25. p. 258. Luc. Phars. L. i. Lactant. L. i. c. 25.

‖ Strab. Geog. L. viii. p. 378.

(1) Rem. de M. de Vaugelas sur la Langue Françoise, tom. i. p. 102, 103.
(2) Dans le Télémaque.
(3) Dans son Hist. de Malthe.

pudeur,

pudeur,* ne pouvoient qu'attirer à ces divers peuples, la faveur la plus distinguée de leurs protecteurs. Mais comme les intérêts des nations ne sont pas moins opposés que leurs mœurs, il falloit que les dieux adoptassent les querelles de leurs adorateurs. " Quoi! voir avec patience que cette ville qui m'élève cent temples succombe sous le fer d'un conquérant? Ah! plutôt!. . . ." C'est ainsi que chez les Grecs, une guerre parmi les hommes en allumoit une parmi les dieux. Troye bouleversa le ciel. Le Scamandre vit briller l'égide de Minerve, il fut témoin de l'effet des flèches sorties du carquois d'Apollon, il sentit le redoutable trident de Neptune, qui soulevoit la terre sur ses fondemens. Quelquefois les arrêts inévitables du destin rétablissoient la paix.† Mais le plus souvent les divers dieux convenoient mutuellement de s'abandonner

Leurs querelles.

* Herod. L. i. c. 199.

Elles étoient tenues de se prostituer une fois de leur vie au premier venu, dans le temple de Venus. M. de Voltaire, qui leur impose cette obligation une fois tous les ans, la traite de fable insensée. (1) Cependant Hérodote avoit voyagé sur les lieux, et M. de Voltaire a trop lu l'histoire, pour ignorer combien de triomphes pareils la superstition a remportés sur l'humanité et sur la vertu. Que pense-t-il d'un acte de foi? Je préviens sa réponse. Au reste j'ignorois que Babylone fût la ville de l'univers la mieux policée. Quinte Curce la dépeint comme la plus licentieuse; Bérose le Babylonien se plaint lui-même que ses concitoyens, franchissant toutes les barrières de la pudeur, vivoient à la manière des bêtes, et le scholiaste de Juvenal nous fait sentir que de son tems ils n'avoient point dégénérés. (2)

† Mythol. de Banier, tom. ii. p. 487. Ovid. Metam. L. xv.

(1) Oeuvres de Voltaire, tom. vi. p. 24.

(2) Quint. Curt. Gest. Alex. L. v. c. i. et Comment. Freinsheim. in Loc.

réciproquement leurs ennemis ;* car sur l'Olympe, comme sur la terre, la haine a toujours été plus puissante que l'amitié.

Ils ont la figure humaine.

LXXVII. Un culte épuré eût été peu assorti à de telles divinités. Les peuples veulent des objets sensibles ; une figure qui décore leurs temples, et fixe leurs idées. Il falloit assurément la plus belle de toutes les figures. Mais quelle est cette figure ? Demandez-le aux hommes, c'est sans doute la leur. Peut-être un taureau répondroit-il un peu différemment.† La sculpture se perfectionne pour servir à la dévotion, et les temples se remplissent de statues de vieillards, de jeunes gens, de femmes, et d'enfans, suivant les attributs différens de chacun des dieux.

Ils éprouvent les plaisirs et les maux corporels.

LXXVIII. La beauté n'est peut-être fondée que sur l'usage. La figure humaine n'est belle que parce qu'elle se rapporte si bien aux usages auxquels elle est destinée. La figure divine est la même ; il faut que ses usages le soient aussi, et même ses défauts. De-là cette génération grossière des dieux, qui ne composent plus qu'une famille à la manière des hommes ; de-là leurs fêtes de nectar et d'ambrosie, et la nourriture qu'ils reçoivent dans les sacrifices.‡ De-là encore leur sommeil,§ et leurs douleurs.‖ Des dieux, devenus des hommes très

* Eurip. Hippolit. Act. v. ver. 1327. et Ovid. Metam. passim.

† Cic. de Nat. Deor, L. i. c. 27, 28.

‡ V. les Césars de Julien par M. Spanheim, p. 257, 258. Rom. 876. les Oiseaux d'Aristophane et Lucien presque partout.

§ Hom. Iliad. L. i. v. 609.

‖ Id. L. v. ver. 335.

puissans,

puissans, devoient souvent visiter la terre, habiter dans les temples, se plaire aux amusemens de l'homme, assister à la chasse, à la danse, et quelquefois devenir sensibles aux charmes d'une mortelle et donner naissance à une race de héros.

Evénemens généraux.

LXXIX. Dans ces grands événemens, où, du jeu d'un grand nombre d'acteurs, dont les vues, la situation et le caractère diffèrent, il naît une unité d'action, ou plutôt d'effet; c'est peut-être dans les seules causes générales qu'il faut chercher la leur.

Mélange de causes dans les événemens particuliers.

LXXX. Dans les événemens plus particuliers, le procédé de la nature est très différent de celui des philosophes. Chez elle il y a peu d'effets assez simples, pour ne devoir leur origine qu'à une seule cause; au lieu que nos sages s'attachent d'ordinaire à une cause, non seulement universelle, mais unique. Evitons cet écueil; pour peu qu'une action paroisse compliquée, admettons y les causes générales, sans rejetter le dessein et le hasard. Sylla se démet du pouvoir souverain. César le perd avec la vie: cependant leurs attentats avoient été précédés par leurs conquêtes: avant de devenir les plus puissans des Romains, ils en étoient les plus renommés. Auguste les suit de près. Tyran sanguinaire,* soupçonné de lâcheté, le plus grand des crimes dans un chef de parti,† il parvient au trône,

* Après la prise de Peruse il sacrifia trois cens des principaux citoyens sur un autel érigé à la divinité de son père. V. Suet. L. ii. c. 15.

† Sueton. L. ii. c. 16.

et et fait oublier aux républicains qu'ils eussent jamais été libres. La disposition de ces républicains diminue ma surprise. Egalement incapables de liberté sous Sylla et sous Auguste, ils ignoroient cette vérité sous celui-là : des guerres civiles et deux proscriptions plus cruelles que la guerre, leur avoient appris, du tems de celui-ci, que la république, affaissée sous le poids de sa grandeur et de sa corruption, ne pouvoit subsister sans maître. D'ailleurs Sylla, chef de la noblesse, combattoit à la tête de ces fiers patriciens, qui vouloient bien l'armer du glaive du despotisme pour les venger de leurs ennemis et des siens, mais non laisser entre ses mains le pouvoir de les détruire eux-mêmes. Ils avoient vaincu, non pour lui mais avec lui : la harangue de Lépide * et la conduite de Pompée† font assez sentir que Sylla aima mieux descendre du trône qu'en tomber. Mais Auguste, à l'exemple de César,‡ ne se servit que de ces hardis aventuriers, Agrippa, Mécène, Pollion, dont la fortune attachée à la sienne s'évanouissoit dans une aristocratie de nobles, divisés entr'eux, mais unis pour accabler tout homme nouveau.

Ses causes.

LXXXI. Des circonstances heureuses, les débauches d'Antoine, la foiblesse de Lépide, la crédulité de Cicéron travaillèrent de concert pour lui avec cette disposition générale : mais il faut avouer

* Sallust. Fragm. p. 404. Edit. Thys.

† Freinsheim. Supplem. L. lxxxix. c. 26—33.

‡ Tacit. Annal. L. iv. p. 109. Sueton. ubi infra.

aussi

aussi que, s'il ne fit pas naître ces circonstances, il les employa en grand politique. Que la variété de mes objets ne me permet-elle de faire connoître ce gouvernement raffiné, ces chaines qu'on portoit sans les sentir, ce prince confondu parmi les citoyens, ce sénat respecté par son maître!* Choisissons en un trait.

Auguste, maître des revenus de l'empire et des richesses du monde, distingua toujours son patrimoine de particulier du trésor public. Il fit ainsi paroître à peu de frais sa modération, qui laissoit à ses héritiers des biens inférieurs à ceux de plusieurs de ses sujets,† et son amour de la patrie, qui avoit abandonné au service de l'état, deux patrimoines entiers et une somme immense provenue des legs de ses amis défunts.‡

LXXXII. Une pénétration ordinaire suffit pour sentir lorsqu'une action est à la fois cause et effet. Même action cause et effet.

* J'attends avec impatience la suite des dissertations sur ce sujet, que M. de la Bleterie nous a promises. Le système d'Auguste si souvent méconnu y paroîtra dessiné jusqu'à ses moindres rameaux. Cet auteur pense avec finesse et une aimable liberté; il discute sans sécheresse, et s'exprime avec toutes les graces d'un style clair et élégant. Peut-être que, Descartes de l'histoire, il raisonne un peu trop à priori, et qu'il établit ses conclusions moins sur les autorités particulières que sur des inductions générales: mais ce défaut est celui d'un homme de beaucoup d'esprit.

† Toutes déductions faites de ses legs au peuple et aux soldats, Auguste ne laissa à Tibère et à Livie que millies quingentics, trente millions de livres. L'augure Lentulus mort sous son règne, possédoit quater millies, quatre-vingt millions. V. Sueton. L. ii. c. 101. Senec. de Benefic. L. ii.

‡ Quater decies millies, deux cens quatre vingt millions. V. Suet. Loc. citat et marmor. Ancyran.

Dans

Dans le monde moral il y en a beaucoup qui le sont ; ou plutôt, il y en a très peu qui ne tiennent plus ou moins de la nature de l'une de l'autre.

La corruption de tous les ordres des Romains vint de l'étendue de leur empire, et produisit la grandeur de la république.*

Mais il faut un jugement peu commun, lorsque deux choses existent toujours ensemble, et paroissent intimément liées, pour discerner qu'elles ne se doivent point leur origine l'une à l'autre.

Les sciences ne viennent pas du luxe.

LXXXIII. Les sciences, dit-on, naissent du luxe : un peuple éclairé sera toujours vicieux. Je ne le crois pas. Les sciences ne sont point les filles du luxe ; mais l'une et l'autre naissent de l'industrie. Les arts ébauchés satisfont aux premiers besoins de l'homme. Perfectionnés, ils lui en trouvent de nouveaux, depuis le bouclier de Minerve de Vitellius † jusqu'aux entretiens philosophiques de Cicéron. Mais à mesure que le luxe corrompt les mœurs, les sciences les adoucissent ; semblables aux prières dans Homère, qui parcourent toujours la terre à la suite de l'injustice, pour adoucir les fureurs de cette cruelle divinité.‡

* V. Montesq. Consid. sur la Grandeur des Romains.

Je distingue la grandeur de l'empire Romain d'avec celle de la république : l'une consistoit dans le nombre des provinces, l'autre dans celle des citoyens.

† Vitellius envoya des galères jusqu'aux colonnes d'Hercule, pour chercher les poissons les plus rares, dont il remplit ce plat monstrueux. Si nous en croyons M. Arbuthnot, il coûta 765,625*l.* sterling. V. Sueton. in Vitellio, c. 13. Dr. Arbuthnot's Tables, p. 138.

‡ Μετοπισθ' ατης αλιγεσι κιεσαι. Homer. Iliad. L. ix. v. 500.

Voilà

Voilà quelques réflexions qui m'ont paru solides sur les différens usages des Belles-Lettres. Heureux si je pouvois en inspirer le goût! J'aurois trop bonne opinion de moi-même, si je ne sentois pas les défauts de cet essai; j'en aurois une trop mauvaise, si je n'espérois pas que dans un age moins précoce et avec des connoissances plus étendues je pourrai me voir plus en état d'y suppléer. On pourra dire que ces réflexions sont vraies, mais usées, ou qu'elles sont nouvelles, mais paradoxales. Quel auteur aime les critiques? Cependant la première me déplairoit le moins. L'avantage de l'art m'est plus cher que la gloire de l'artiste. Conclusion.

DIGRES-

DIGRESSION ON THE CHARACTER OF BRUTUS.

THE memory of Cæsar, celebrated as it is, has not been transmitted down to posterity with such uniform and increasing applause as that of his PATRIOT ASSASSIN. Marc Antony acknowledged the rectitude of his intentions. Augustus refused to violate his statues.* All the great writers of the succeeding age enlarged on his praises,† and more than two hundred years after the establishment of the imperial government, the character of Brutus was studied as the perfect idea of Roman virtue.‡ In England as in France, in modern Italy as in ancient Rome, his name has always been mentioned with respect by the adherents of monarchy,§ and pronounced with enthusiasm by the

* Plutarch in Antonio, p. 925, in Brut. p. 1011. Among these were the statues, which the Athenians had erected to Brutus and Cassius, by the side of their own deliverers, Harmodius and Aristogiton.

† Under the jealous tyranny of Tiberius, Cremutius Cordus was arraigned before the senate for the encomiums which he bestowed in his history on Brutus and Cassius. He justified himself by the toleration of Augustus and the example of Asinius Pollio, Messala and Livy: nor was it within the tyrant's power to suppress his writings, or the general sense of mankind. Tacit. Annal. iv. 34, 35.

‡ M. Antonin. de Rebus suis, L. i.

§ Velleius Paterculus, an elegant writer, but servilely devoted to the imperial family, and most probably one of the judges who condemned Cremutius, can only say of Brutus, Corrupto animo ejus in diem quæ illi omnes virtutes unius facti temeritate abstulit. ii. 72.

friends

friends of freedom. It may seem rash and invidious to appeal from the sentence of ages; yet surely I may be permitted to inquire, in what consisted the DIVINE VIRTUE OF BRUTUS?

The few patriots who, by a bold and well-concerted enterprize, have delivered their country from foreign or domestic slavery, Timoleon, and the elder Brutus, Andrew Doria, and Gustavus Vasa, the three peasants of Switzerland,* and the four princes of Orange, excite the warmest sensations of esteem and gratitude in those breasts which feel for the interest of mankind. But the design of the younger Brutus was vast and perhaps impracticable, the execution feeble and unfortunate. Neither as a statesman nor as a general did Brutus ever approve himself equal to the arduous task he had so rashly undertaken, of restoring the commonwealth; instead of restoring it, the death of a mild and generous usurper produced only a series of civil wars, and the reign of three tyrants whose union and whose discord were alike fatal to the Roman people.

The sagacious Tully often laments that he could be pleased with nothing in the ides of March, except the ides themselves; that the deed was executed with a manly courage, but supported by childish counsels; that the tyranny survived the tyrant; as the conspirators, satisfied with fame and revenge,

* Who in the year 1308 delivered their country from the Austrian yoke. See Simlerus de Republica Helvetica; Guillimannus de Rebus Helveticis, and the great Chronicle of Tschudi.

revenge, had neglected every measure that might have restored public liberty.* Whilst Brutus and Cassius contemplated their own heroism with the most happy complacency, Marc Antony, who had preserved his life, and the first magistracy of the state, by their injudicious clemency, seized the papers and treasure of the Dictator, inflamed the people and the veterans, and drove them out of Rome and Italy, without any other opposition than some grave remonstrances which the patriots vainly addressed to the Consul.†

The eloquence of Cicero, and the dangerous aid of young Cæsar, awakened in the senate a spirit of freedom and resistance. Brutus and Cassius had time to seize on Macedonia and Syria, whilst the forces of Antony were diverted and almost destroyed in the memorable siege of Modena. The legions stationed in those provinces acknowledged them as lawful proconsuls, the wealth of the east fell into their hands, and they had collected an army of one hundred thousand men,‡ before the triumvirs had cemented their union with the noblest blood of Rome, and were prepared to lead their veteran legions against the last defenders of the public liberty. Cassius was of opinion, that they should protract their military operations into the approaching winter; but though Cassius was the older and the better soldier,* had been the first author of the conspiracy, and was the principal support of the war, he yielded, with a sigh, to the authority of Brutus, whose mind, oppressed with laborious anxiety, wished impatiently for an immediate division.† The decision was unfavourable; and both the chiefs, relinquishing all their remaining hopes, and withdrawing themselves from the calamities which they had brought on their country, put an end to their lives by a hasty act of despair. "Brutus and Cassius (says the President Montesquieu) killed themselves with a precipitancy that cannot be excused; and it is impossible to read this part of their history without pitying the republic, which was thus abandoned. The death of Cato was the catastrophe of the tragedy; but these men, in some measure, opened the tragedy by their own deaths.'‡

* See the XIVth, XVth, and XVIth Books of the Epistles to Atticus.

† See Epistol. ad Famil. xi. 2, 3. The spirit of these letters is finely tempered by the politeness with which Brutus and Cassius address the Consul. They respect the magistrate whilst they defy the tyrant.

‡ Appian. L. iv. p. 640.

The justice of the memorable ides of March has been a subject of controversy above eighteen hundred years; and will so remain, as long as the interests of the community shall be considered by different tempers in different lights. Men of high and active spirits, who deem the loss of liberty, or

* Fuit autem dux Cassius melior quanto vir Brutus. Velleius Paterculus, ii. 72.

† This anecdote was preserved by Messalla, who in the court of Augustus was always proud of remembering Cassius as his general. Plutarch. in Brut. Tacit. Annal. iv. 34.

‡ Considérations sur la Grandeur des Romains, chap. xii.

some-sometimes, in other words, the loss of power, the worst of misfortunes, will approve the use of every stratagem and every weapon in the chace of the common foe of society. They will ask how a tyrant, who has raised himself above the laws, and usurped the forces of the state, can be punished, except by an assassination; and whether the circumstance that most aggravates his crime, ought to secure his person and government. On the other hand, the lovers of order and moderation, who are swayed by the calm of reason, rather than by the impetuosity of passion, will never consent to establish every private citizen the judge and avenger of the public injury, or to purchase a temporary deliverance by the severe retaliation that will surely be exercised on those, who have first violated the laws of war. The fate of Cæsar was alleged to colour the edict of proscription;* and perhaps the generous ambition of the younger Guise would have been startled at the massacre of Paris, had it not satisfied his great revenge against the Admiral de Coligny, and other leaders of a party, whom not without reason he accused of his father's murder.† We may observe that the assassination of tyrants has been generally applauded by the ancients. The fate of a great empire is usually decided by the sword of war; but against the petty usurper of a Greek or Italian city, the dagger of conspiracy had been often found as efficacious an instrument. The same doctrine is as generally condemned by the present nations of Europe; influenced by a milder system of manners, and impressed with a deep sense of the bloody mischiefs perpetrated both by the Catholics and the Calvinists during the alliance of religious and political fanaticism.

* Appian. iv. p. 593.

† See the 34th Book of the History of Thuanus.

Whilst the merit of Brutus's GODLIKE STROKE, (for such it has been called*) is at least doubtful, we can only allow in his favour, that by acting up to the established standard of Roman virtue he is entitled to our indulgence, and in some measure to our esteem. But in these nice cases, where the esteem is bestowed on the INTENTION, rather than on the ACTION, we ought to be well assured that the intention was pure from any interested or passionate motive; that it was not the hasty suggestion of resentment or vanity, but the calm result of consistent and well grounded virtue, impatient of slavery, and tender of the rights of mankind. The praises of antiquity, and the noble spirit that breathes in the epistles of Brutus,† may indeed pre-

* Tho' Cato liv'd, tho' Tully spoke,
Tho' Brutus dealt the godlike stroke;
Yet perish'd fated Rome.

† He declares (Epist. 16, or 22, in Middleton's edition) that were his father alive again he would not suffer him to possess a power above the laws and the senate. Pity it is that this whole correspondence, and particularly this celebrated epistle should be liable to the suspicion of a forgery committed in those ages when Latin had ceased to be a living language. See Tunstal and Markland on one side of the question, and Dr. Middleton on the other.

possess

possess us in favour of his moral character; but it is the uniform tenor of his life, private as well as public, which must in a great degree acquit or condemn the conspirator.

Plutarch singles out of the whole life of Brutus, one exceptionable action; his promising the plunder of Lacedæmon and Thessalonica to his troops.* But had Plutarch been better acquainted with the epistles of Atticus, he would have seen in that faithful mirror of the times, some instances of avarice and inhumanity, which the philosophic Brutus could not have excused by the sad necessity of civil war.

When Cicero was appointed Proconsul of Cilicia, his first object was to relieve the cities of his government, almost ruined by the heavy debts which they had been obliged to contract in order to satisfy the rapaciousness of his predecessors. The case of Salamis, in Cyprus, deserved peculiar compassion. One Scaptius, a Roman money broker, strongly recommended by Brutus, claimed very large sums as due to him from that city. The deputies of Salamis acknowledged the debt, and made a tender of the money with legal interest, as it was fixed by Cicero's edict, at twelve per cent. and compound interest at the end of every year. But Scaptius demanded forty-eight per cent. according to the condition of his usurious bond; and to enforce his demand by military execution, he had obtained from the former proconsul a troop of horse, with which he kept the senate house of Salamis closely besieged, till five of the most obstinate senators were actually starved to death. This proconsul was Appius Claudius, the father-in-law of Brutus; and when the province of Cilicia devolved upon Cicero, the same Brutus recommended, with more than common earnestness, the affairs of Scaptius to the favour of the new governor. Cicero was at first surprised at finding so intimate a connexion between a man of merit and an infamous usurer, but he was still more astonished, when the shameful secret was disclosed. The wretched agent disappeared, and the virtuous Brutus, without a blush, avowed HIMSELF the creditor of the Salamians. As soon as he threw off the mask, instead of commiserating the ruin of a city under his immediate patronage, he insisted on the utmost rigour of his iniquitous demands, and requested of Cicero, in the most haughty terms, that he would send the same Scaptius into Cyprus at the head of a second troop of horse to exact the extravagant amount of the accumulated principal and interest. On this occasion the virtue of Cicero was supported by a noble firmness. "I should be desirous (he repeats it in several places) to oblige Brutus, but I cannot sacrifice to his interest, the feelings of humanity, the principles of justice, the uniformity of my character, and the approbation of all good men. I shall be concerned to lose his friendship, but I shall be still more concerned cerned to lose the esteem I have ever entertained for him."*

* Plutarch. in Brut.

The numerous crimes of Verres, exaggerated as they most probably have been, by the strongest powers of eloquence, scarcely furnish such an instance of unrelenting avarice as this transaction of Brutus, which is related by Cicero, with the candid simplicity of a private correspondence. The money due from the city of Salamis amounted to about twenty thousand pounds; a small part of the immense sums which Brutus appears to have lent out on similar securities.† We cannot forbear inquiring, by what arts a private citizen, the son of a proscribed father, and who had never commanded armies, or governed provinces, could accumulate so ample a fortune; the inquiry would lead to some suspicions severe but not unreasonable.

In the beginning of the civil war we find young Brutus in the camp of Pompey, by whose order his father had been put to death about thirty years

* "Brutus," says Cicero, "has not sent me one letter, in which there was not something singular and arrogant. His style gives me little uneasiness; but indeed he forgets what, and to whom he is writing." For this whole transaction see the Epistles to Atticus, L. v. 21. vi. 1, 2, 3.

† Brutus, by Cicero's interest, had received from Ariobarzanes, King of Cappadocia, a hundred talents upon account of a much larger sum that was due to him. The concerns of Brutus in Asia, which he recommended to the care of the proconsul, filled a whole volume of requests, or rather mandates, as they are called by Cicero.

before.* This sacrifice of filial piety to a superior and public duty has been highly applauded. But was it in Brutus's power either to remain inactive, or to enlist in the army of Cæsar? Was it in his power to refuse to follow the general of the republic, his uncle Cato, the consuls, ten consulars, the greatest part of the senate, and the flower of the equestrian order?† The defeat of Pharsalia and the death of Pompey removed the general constraint, and displayed the genuine views and characters of the principal men of his party.

There were some very respectable senators, men of an advanced age, moderate tempers, and cool penetration, who had never entertained a favourable opinion of the hopes, or even of the designs of their own party. Cicero, Marcellus, Sulpicius, Varro had been driven by a sense of honour into scenes of war and tumult, as little suited to their talents as to their inclination. They resolved to consider the decision of Pharsalia as final, and not to aggravate, by a vain resistance, the miseries of their country. When Cicero returned to Rome, he avoided the forum and the senate, and devoted his leisure and abilities to the noble design of explaining the Grecian philosophy in the Latin language. Yet his retirement was sometimes invaded

* Plutarch. in Brut. The father was one of the lieutenants of the weak and wicked Lepidus, who raised a rebellion in Italy after the death of Sylla.

† Decem fuimus consulares, &c.—Qui vero prætorii? quorum princeps M. Cato, &c.—ut magna excusatione opus iis sit, qui in illa castra non venerunt. Philipp. xiii. 13, 14.

by

by his own reproaches, and by those of the world; by the comparison of his tame acquiescence, with the glorious struggle of Cato, Scipio, Labienus, and their followers who had anew erected the standard of liberty in Africa.*

These patriots, of more active spirits and more sanguine hopes, thought it even yet a crime to despair of the republic. Fifteen months wasted by Cæsar in the arms of Cleopatra, the romantic campaign of Alexandria and the rapid conquest of Pontus, gave them time to assemble a new army of twelve legions, disciplined by misfortune, and deriving fresh courage from despair. Fertile Africa afforded every supply for carrying on the war. The alliance of Juba filled the Roman camp with an innumerable host of Moors and Numidians. Spain was in arms, and Italy expected her deliverers with a mixture of terror and impatience.† Cæsar again fought and triumphed; but the unconquered soul of Cato easily escaped from life and from the usurper. Such was the constancy of that patriot, and such the lessons which he had ever inculcated to his nephew Brutus; let us next examine what fruits they produced.

After the battle of Pharsalia, Brutus lay concealed in the marshes of Thessaly. He made the

* See the Epistles to Atticus, xi. 7; where he unbosoms himself to his friend with a very wonderful, or rather a very natural mixture of spirit and meanness, of patriotism and selfishness.

† Hist. de Bello African. 18, 40. Sueton. in Cæsar. 66. Dio. Cassius, L. xlii. p. 338. Cicero ad Attic. L. xi. p. 7.

first

first advances to the conqueror, experienced his clemency, and was immediately admitted into his confidence. The latter was obtained by revealing, I will not call it betraying, whatever he had been able to learn of Pompey's designs.* He then left Cæsar to follow the pursuit he had pointed out, and entertained himself with an agreeable tour through the cities of Greece and Asia. In a few months he returned to Rome, resigned himself to the calm studies of history and rhetoric, and passed many of his leisure hours in the society of Cicero and Atticus. Their literary conversations were sometimes interrupted by complaints of the melancholy situation of public affairs.†

At a time when Cicero was in retirement, Marcellus in voluntary exile,‡ and Cato in arms, we might at least expect that the nephew of Cato would have declined any political connexion with the usurper. When Cæsar set out for the African war, Brutus accepted at his hands the government of the Cisalpine Gaul;§ a command of

* Plutarch. in Brut. Some casuists, Spaniards and others, have attempted to justify this conduct. (See Bayle, Dictionnaire, à l'Article Brutus.) The feelings of a man of honour are the best confutation of such sophistry.

† See Cicero's two Treatises De Claris Oratoribus and De Orator. both which he dedicated to Brutus about this time. The latter gave rise to a celebrated controversy between them.

‡ He retired to Mytilene and refused to accept the victor's clemency. His letters (see ad Familiar. L. iv.) are full of noble sentiments, and his behaviour does not appear to have disgraced them.

§ Plutarch. in Brut. Appian. de B. C. L. ii. p. 477. Cicer. ad Famil. L. xiii. p. 10, &c.

infinite

infinite importance from its vicinity to the capital, and from the legions always stationed in that province to protect the frontiers of Italy from the unconquered Rhætians. The same legions gave the governor of the Cisapline Gaul an almost decisive weight in every civil commotion, as a march of a few days brought him to the gates of Rome.* Experience had already acquainted Cæsar with this advantage, and by thus appointing Brutus his Lieutenant during his absence, he shewed the most implicit confidence in his fidelity. Suppose that Rome had attempted to break her chains; suppose the sons of Pompey from Spain, or Cato from Africa, had made a diversion in Italy, what could have been the conduct of the patriot Brutus? His station must have forced him into action, and by his action he must have betrayed either his trust or his country. Into this fatal dilemma had he wantonly thrown himself.

When Cæsar, on his return from the conquest of Africa, visited a part of Gaul, his obsequious governor went out to meet him with the respectful attention of an experienced courtier, and attended him on his way to the triumph, in which a picture of Cato tearing out his own bowels was exposed to the eyes of the Roman people.† I wish not however to conceal that about the same time, Brutus gave some proofs of regard for his uncle's

* Montesquieu has already remarked the importance of that province. Considérations sur la Grandeur, &c. c. xi.

† Plutarch. in Brut. Appian, L. ii. p. 491.

memory,

memory, by marrying his cousin Portia,* and by composing a Treatise on the life and character of Cato; an honourable, rather than a dangerous undertaking; since even the prudence of Cicero permitted him to publish a work on the same subject. The dictator disdained to employ the arms of power, when those of eloquence were sufficient. He appealed to the tribunal of the public, and in a severe and masterly censure of the conduct of Cato, he treated the persons of his two literary antagonists, Cicero and Brutus, with every expression of regard and esteem.†

This polite controversy was so far from leaving any unfavourable impressions in Cæsar's mind, that a few months afterwards he named Brutus the first of the sixteen Prætors with the honourable department of the city jurisdiction, and with a promise of the consulship for one of the ensuing years.‡ Could Brutus accept, could he solicit the honours of the state from a master who had abolished the freedom, and who scarcely preserved the forms of elections?

——— Tinget solennia campi,
Et non admissæ diribet§ suffragia plebis,
Decantatque tribus, et vanâ versat in urnâ;

* Plutarch. Cicer. ad Attic. xiii. 9.

† Cicer. ad Attic. xii. 21. xiii. 46. Cæsar paid a compliment to these two pieces in favour of Cato; but his compliment is obscure and equivocal. He probably meant it should be so.

‡ Plutarch. in Brut. Velleius Paterculus, ii. 56.

§ The common editions read dirimit, which puzzles all the commentators. Diribere was a term peculiar to the comitia and signifies to poll the votes in the regular divisions.

Nec

Nec cœlum servare licet; tonat augure surdo;
Et lætæ jurantur aves, bubone sinistro.*

I have heard much of the heroic spirit of Brutus; of his glorious sacrifice of gratitude to patriotism. True patriotism would have instructed him not to cancel, but to refuse obligations of such a nature from the declared enemy of Cato and the liberty of Rome.

Nay more, by soliciting these honours, Brutus solicited a public occasion of engaging his fidelity to the person and government of Cæsar by a solemn and voluntary oath of allegiance.† "A few days before the execution of their fatal purpose, these patriots all swore fealty to Cæsar, and protesting to hold his person ever sacred, they touched the altar with those hands which they had already armed for his destruction."‡ Antiquity has not preserved the oath, but we may suppose that it was not very different from the warm but faithless professions of Cicero. "We exhort, we beseech you to guard your safety against the secret dangers, which you seem to suspect. We all promise (that I may express for others what I feel for myself) not only to watch over your precious life with the most anxious vigilance, but to oppose our own bodies, our own breasts to the impending stroke."§ Relying on these assurances the dictator

* Lucan. Pharsal. v. 391.
† Appian. L. ii. p. 494.
‡ Hume's Dialogue on the Principles of Morals.
§ Cicer. pro Marcello, c. 10.

dismissed

dismissed his Spanish guards,* and neglected every precaution. He could not persuade himself that those whom he had conquered would be brave enough, or those whom he had pardoned base enough, to shorten a life already sufficient either for nature or for glory.† By those men he was flattered and assassinated. Such solemn perjury cannot be justified except by the dangerous maxim, that no faith is to be kept with tyrants.‡

It was only for usurping the power of the people that Cæsar could deserve the epithet of tyrant. He used the power with more moderation and ability than the people was capable of exerting; and the Romans already began to experience all the happiness and glory compatible with a monarchical form of government.§ To this government Brutus had yielded his obedience and services during three years before he lifted his dagger against Cæsar's life. What new crime had Cæsar committed, which so suddenly‖ transformed his minister into an assassin? He aspired to the title of king, and that odious name called upon the

* Sueton. in Cæsar. c. 86.

† Cicero pro Marcel. c. 8.

‡ Appian. L. ii. p. 515. This maxim is introduced in a speech of Brutus to the people; but the speech is evidently manufactured by the historian.

§ See some of Cæsar's vast and beneficial designs in Suetonius, c. 44. The reformation of the calendar still remains a small specimen of them.

‖ Brutus took the oath of allegiance, about seventy-five days before the execution of the conspiracy.

descen-

descendant of Junius Brutus to assert the glories of his race? Such a regard to a word, and such insensibility to the thing itself, may be excused in the populace of Rome; but to a philosopher of an enlarged mind it was surely of little moment under what appellation public liberty was oppressed.

Such are the reflections, which an accurate examination of the character of Brutus has suggested to an enemy of tyranny, under every shape: who will neither be awed by the frown of power, nor silenced by the hoarse voice of popular applause. The monarch and the patriot are alike amenable to the severe but candid inquisition of truth.

Devizes, Feb. 8th, 1762.

Q. HORATII FLACCI EPISTOLÆ AD PISONES ET AUGUSTUM;

WITH AN ENGLISH COMMENTARY AND NOTES.

To which are added, two Dissertations; the one on the Provinces of the Drama, the other on Poetical Imitation; with a Letter to Mr. Mason: in two volumes 12*mo. The second edition. Cambridge.* 1757.

Mr. Hurd, the supposed author of this performance, is one of those valuable authors who cannot be read without improvement. To a great fund of well-digested reasoning, he adds a clearness of judgment, and a niceness of penetration, capable of taking things from their first principles, and observing their most minute differences. I know few writers more deserving of the great, though prostituted name of critic; but, like many critics, he is better qualified to instruct, than to execute. His manner appears to me harsh and affected, and his style clouded with obscure metaphors, and needlessly perplexed with expressions exotic, or technical. His excessive praises (not to give them a harsher name) of a certain living critic and divine, disgust the sensible reader, as much as the contempt affected for the same person, by many who are very unqualified to pass a judgment upon him.

Horace's Art of Poetry, generally deemed an unconnected set of precepts, without unity of design or method, appears under Mr. Hurd's hands, an attempt to reform the Roman stage, conducted with an artful plan, and carried on through the most delicate transitions. This plan is unrivalled in Mr. Hurd's Commentary. If ever those transitions appear too finely spun, the concealed art of epistolary freedom will sufficiently account for it. The least Mr. Hurd must convince us of is, that, if Horace had any plan, it was that which he has laid down. Every part of dramatic poetry is treated of, even to the satires and attellanes; its metre, subject, characters, chorus, explained and distinguished. The rest of the epistle contains those precepts of unity and design, accuracy of composition, &c. which, though not peculiar to the dramatic poet, are yet as necessary to him as to any other.

I shall say little more of the Epistle to Augustus, than that the subject matter is much plainer than in the other, but the connexion of parts far more perplexed. In the two lines from 30 to 32, a critic must be very sharp-sighted, to discover so complicated an argument as Mr. Hurd finds out there: however, his own Commentary is far superior to that on the Art of Poetry; and rises here into a very elegant paraphrase. As my business lies more with Mr. Hurd than with Horace, I shall only select one of the numerous beauties of this Epistle; it is that elegant encomium upon the modern poets, which extends from v. 113 to 139. Every one must observe that fine gradation, which, from describing the poet as a happy, inoffensive creature, creature, exalts him at last into a kind of mediator between the gods and men. But an art more refined, and nicely attentive to its object, only employs those praises, which belong equally to good and to bad poets. Every one complained of the multitude of bad poets; even these, replies Horace, are not to be despised; such poetry is an employment, which makes its possessor good and happy, by abstracting him from the cares of men; he may turn it to the useful purposes of a virtuous education; and the gods, who attend more to the piety, than the talents of the bard, will listen with pleasure to his hymns.

I shall now consider some of Mr. Hurd's notes upon these Epistles, and then pass to his larger discourses.

Upon v. 94, he starts a new train of thought upon the use of poetical expressions in tragedy. The herd of critics allow them to the hero in his calmer moments, and forbid them in his more passionate ones. On the contrary, (says Mr. Hurd, and I think with reason,) it is that very passion that calls them forth, by rouzing every faculty, and exciting images suitable to the grandeur of his situation. Anger indeed, which exalts the mind, inspires more bold and daring images; those of grief are more weak, humble, and broken: but when passion sleeps, it is fancy alone that can create figures, and fancy is a very improper guide for the severe genius of dramatic poetry. Vol. i. p 68—77.

Perhaps the natural correspondency between passion and the poetical figures, may be more exactly ascertained, by defining what is properly meant by poetical figures. It is (if I am not mistaken) a comparison, either expressed or understood, between two objects, about one of which the mind is particularly engaged, and which it perceives bears some affinity to another. The comparison, properly so called, expresses every feature of that resemblance at full length, the allusion points it out in a more slight and general manner, and the metaphor, disdaining that slow deduction of ideas, boldly substitutes to the object of the comparison, that to which it is compared. In the instance Mr. Hurd has taken from Tacitus, "Ne vestis serica viros fœdaret," we may note this difference between the three species of figures. In a comparison he might have said, "that a silken garment was so disgraceful to a man, that it was like a pollution to his body." Had he said, "that a silken garment, like a pollution, was to be avoided by a man," it would have been an allusion: but, dropping every intermediate idea, he reports the law by which no silken garment was to pollute a man. This is a metaphor, and of his own creation; but there are many where spiritual faculties, and operations, are expressed by material images, which, though figurative in their origin, are, by time and use, almost become literal. These are the figures of poetry. I am sensible there are rhetorical ones also, but those, I believe, relate rather to the expression and distribution of the former.

Let

Let us now, from these principles, investigate the workings of passion. It has been often observed, that the highest agitation of the mind is such as no language can describe; since language can only paint ideas, and not that sentimental, silent, almost stupid, excess of rage or grief, which the soul feels with such energy, that it is not master of itself enough to have any distinct perceptions; such passion baffles all description: but when this storm subsides, passion is as fertile in ideas, as it was at first barren: when some striking interest collects all our attention to one object, we consider it under every light it is susceptible of; even that rebel attention, chained down with difficulty to any range of ideas, endeavours as much as possible to enlarge the sphere of them; and as the agitation of our mind crouds them upon us, almost at the same instant, instead of presenting them slowly and singly, we cannot avoid being struck with many comparisons suitable to our situation. The past, the present, the future, our misfortunes, those of other men, our friends, our enemies, our ancestors, our posterity, form within us numberless combinations of ideas, either to assuage or irritate the reigning passion.* But those of

* When Marius, proscribed by the party of Sylla, was obliged, after a thousand dangers, to take refuge on the coast of Africa, the prætor of that province sent him an order to leave it immediately: the lictor found him plunged in thought, and sitting on some stones on the beach. When he asked him what answer he should carry back to the prætor, "Tell him, (replied Marius,) of the first species, though they strike us with force, we reject as much as in our power; and therefore the poet who expresses them in words ought rarely to go farther than an allusion, or a metaphor: those indeed are in general the darling figures of passion, as it loves to pass with rapidity from one idea to another. However, in those conjunctions of ideas which feed and irritate the passion, she will sometimes dwell with complacency upon them, and pursue them to the minutest resemblances of a simile. I appeal to the breast of every one for the evidence of these positions; and as to the last, I shall instance the noble speech with which Juno opens the Æneid, and rousing herself to vengeance, from the comparison of her behaviour with that of Pallas, collects every circumstance of it which could stimulate her more strongly to the execution of it.

Vol. i. p. 81—87.

To return to Mr. Hurd's notes. He employs several passages to prove, what I fancy no one would have disputed him; that though the words, pulchrum, beau, beautiful, are often used to express the general conception of beauty, they are sometimes made to signify that particular sort of beauty which pleases the imagination, opposed to that which affects the heart.

that thou hast seen Marius sitting upon the ruins of Carthage." This implied comparison between his fall, and that of a once powerful city, displayed on the same spot, is poetically bold. Yet passion and real misfortune, joined to the coincidency of place, could suggest it to Marius, a rough illiterate soldier. Is not this a striking illustration of Mr. Hurd's theory?

Aristotle

Aristotle had blamed the Iphigenia of Euripides, as a character ill-supported; so timid at first, afterwards so determined. The general opinion had extended the same reproach to his Electra. Mr. Hurd undertakes their vindication. If Electra feels so much remorse after the murder of her mother, though the principal author of it, we must consider that she is no where described as devoid of natural tenderness; though the thirst of revenge, supported by the maxims of her times, such as the doctrine of remunerative justice, of fate, and of the heinousness of adultery, had for a time subdued it. Besides, her hatred was chiefly pointed at Ægisthus, and her remorse is greatly exaggerated. As to Iphigenia, her timidity, when acquainted she was to be sacrificed, is easily accounted for; as she was surprised, and, at that time, ignorant of the reasons which required it. Even to the last, her constancy is yet mixed with some regret and repining.

Upon v. 148, Mr. Hurd attempts to account for, and establish one of the most important rules of Epic poetry. A poet may either tell his story in the natural historical order, or, rushing at once into the middle of his subject, he may afterwards introduce, by way of episode, the events previous to it. Which method should he observe? Homer, at least in one of his poems, has preferred the last;* and in that, as well as in most other things, has been followed by his successors; by Virgil, by Milton, by Voltaire, and (in this instance I may call him an epic poet) by Fenelon. But as many things that have stood the test of time, cannot endure that of reason, I shall venture to start some objections to this method, and to consider, in a few words, Mr. Hurd's defence of it.

Vol. i. p. 110–112.

* In the Odyssey. As to the Iliad, properly speaking, he has followed neither. The events previous to the subject, the anger of Achilles, he neither relates himself, nor throws into an episode; but as they were few and simple, he leaves the reader to collect them from occasional hints dispersed through the poem.

1st, Supposing the rule founded on reason, it is too vague to reduce to practice. Since the greatest part of the poem is to consist in a recital, where the poet himself speaks, when is that recital to begin? with the principal action? But in those great, though simple subjects, that alone are worthy of the epic muse; such, for example, as the establishment of Æneas in Italy; there are a great number of previous events, which either hasten or retard the catastrophe. Are they part of the subject? They are intimately connected with it, and no critic ever required unity of place in the epopæa. Are they not? How then can the loves of Æneas and Dido be justified? And if they can, why may not Æneas's meeting Andromache in Epirus be as much a part of the principal subject, as his meeting Dido at Carthage? I might in this manner follow the thread of the episodical story, perhaps to the beginning of the second, but certainly to the beginning of the third book of the Æneid, (and were I to take the Odyssey, or any other epic poem, it would be the same,) and ask at every pause, why the bard might not begin his invocation from thence, like Horace himself:

Demo

——— Demo unum, demo et etiam unum,
Dum cadat, elusus ratione ruentis acervi.

But enough has been said on this head.

2dly, When, without any preparation, we are thrown at once into the midst of the subject, unacquainted with the characters or situation of the hero; such a conduct can be productive only of a surprise and perplexity to the reader, which, if they are any beauties, are at least beauties of an inferior species of poetry. Nor is this all; this very ignorance and perplexity of the reader diminishes the interest of that part of the poem; for how can we love beauties we are yet ignorant of, or tremble for misfortunes of which we have a very faint idea? Nor can it be said that the nature of an epic subject preserves it from this inconveniency; since it always is, or ought to be, some story already famous. It may be so; but we are not yet acquainted with the alterations it may have suffered under the hands of the poet: nor can the similar example of dramatic poetry be alleged. It is there an unavoidable defect; but we ought not therefore voluntarily to transfer it to another species of poetry.

3dly, When this objection begins to vanish, and the reader, interested in the present misfortunes of the hero, has little or no curiosity to inquire into his past ones, it is then the poet chooses to tell them. I suppose we have read the first book of the Æneid; it is impossible to read it as it deserves, without taking the greatest part in the important scene which begins to disclose itself; so romantic a meeting of a Trojan chief and a Tyrian princess, upon the shores of Africa, and the gods themselves employing every artifice to inspire them with a mutual passion, and prevent the establishment of the Roman empire. At the instant we are impatient to know the event, and expect the poet should hasten to it, we are entertained with a long recital of the sack of Troy, and the voyages of Æneas. After this is at last ended, and we return to Dido, we have almost forgot who she was. Is this consulting the pleasure of the reader? and that pleasure ought to be the aim of every writer. I do not know whether I may not have expressed myself too strongly in saying, we have little, or no curiosity, to learn the past fortunes of the hero; but, however, let it be considered, 1st, That before they are told us in a regular narration, a thousand hints of them must have been dropped, which betray the secret; so that we only come to it with that languid curiosity, of learning the particulars of what we have already a general idea. 2dly, That we are not to consider our positive degree of curiosity, to know the events previous to the beginning of the poem, but to compare it with the desire we feel of pursuing the sequel, which must be far more ardent; for in every operation of the mind there is a much higher delight in descending from the cause to the effect, than in ascending from the effect to the cause. In the perusal of a fable, it is the event we are anxious about, and our anxiety increases, or diminishes, as that event is known or unknown to us. It is easy to apply this to the present argument.

upon

4thly,

4thly, and lastly, (for though I endeavour to be concise, I am frightened when I look back,) The style of the poet will suffer as much by this inversion as his plan. Bold figures and poetical imagery are the essence of the epopœa; but with what propriety can they be introduced in that episode, where it is the hero, not the poet, that speaks? There are two sources of these figures; strong passion, and a fine imagination. The first can operate, in any strong degree, only during the actual influence of the misfortune which gave birth to it; and though the recollection of the latter may call forth some sparks of the former, yet it will be a faint, reflected heat, very unequal to that great effect, of transporting both the speaker and the hearer. On the other hand, a fine imagination is no essential part of a hero. Homer and Achilles are very different characters; nay, should the chief personage, like Ulysses, be a celebrated orator, even that will not authorize his employing the beauties of poetical language, since his recital, to be properly introduced, must be unpremeditated, and occasional: not like the poet, who, besides the fire of natural genius, is indulged with every advantage of time, labour, and a particular inspiration of the gods.* The episodical story

* When Antenor, in the third Iliad, points out to Priam, Ulysses among the Grecian chiefs, he describes the nature of his eloquence:

Αλλ' ὁτε δὴ πολυμηλις αιταϊξειεν Οδυσσευς
Στασκεν, υπαι δε ιδεσκε καλα χθονος ομμαλα πηξας, Σκηπτρον

story must, therefore, be simple, unadorned, and far inferior, as to style, to the rest of the poem. I am sensible the Æneas of Virgil is as great a poet as Virgil himself; but either the principles I have laid down are false, or this example is a strong proof of the inconveniences of the method; since it obliged so correct a writer, to offend either the judgment, or the imagination of his readers.

I cannot pass to Mr. Hurd's arguments, without mentioning a difficulty which seems to affect my second objection, viz. this ignorance and perplexity is an objection only to the first perusal. It is true; but, if precepts are to direct the composition of the writer, it is certainly that first perusal, and the effects it may produce, that he should principally consider; especially as to what relates to the clearness of his plot: and should it be said, that in my third objection our curiosity to know the event can be likewise only balked on the first perusal, to the preceding answer I must add, that whoever con-

Σκηπτρον δε ουΐ' οπισω, ουδε προπρηνες, ενωμα, Αλλ' αμφις εχεσκεν, αϊδρει φωτι εοικως·
φαιης κεν ζακοτον τινα εμμεναι, αφρονα θ' αυτως·
Αλλ' οτε δη ρ' οπα τε μεγαλην εκ στηθεος ιει, Και επεα, νιφαδεσσιν εοικοτα χειμεριησιν,
Ουκ αν επειτ' Οδυσηϊ γ' ερισσειε βροτος αλλος.

Iliad iii. v. 216—223.

Out of the several testimonies to the eloquence of Ulysses, collected by Dr. Clarke, I shall only subjoin that of Quintilian: "Sed summam adgressus, (Homerus) ut in Ulysse, facundiam, "magnitudinem illi junxit; cui orationem nivibus hybernis, et "copiâ verborum, atque impetu, parem tribuit. Cum hoc igitur "nemo mortalium contendet."—Quintil. xii. C. 10.

siders

siders the power of imagination, will find that reply by no means exact. Although, when we can coolly reflect, we are acquainted with the event, yet the true poet, by interesting our passions, chains us down to the present moment, and prevents our seeing any thing beyond it. When I read the tragedy of Iphigenia for the twentieth time, I know Iphigenia will not be sacrificed; but the struggles of Agamemnon, the rage of Achilles, the despair of Clytemnestra, make me ignorant, and tremblingly anxious for the event.

Let us now hear Mr. Hurd, who, employing the particular example of the Æneid, justifies this common method from two reasons. 1. The nature of an epic poem; and, 2. The state and expectation of the reader.

1. The nature of an epic poem obliges the poet to relate, at full length, every event he himself relates. Now, the destruction of Troy, related in this manner, must have taken up several books. By that time it would have taken such hold of the imagination of the reader, that the remainder of the poem would have appeared little more than an appendix to it. The conclusion is certain; but on what is the principle founded? upon an assertion advanced without the least proof. I should rather think, that, as an epic poem must preserve an unity of hero, and of action, every event, instead of being related at full length, need only occupy a space proportionate with its importance and degree of connexion with the principal subject. This is at least the rule of history; and if poetry should only only deviate from it, for the sake of making the fable one, connected, marvellous, heroic, and answering to our notions of justice,* I do not see how the poet is dispensed from it in this instance. If from reason we go to authority, does not Virgil himself dispatch in sixty lines, the state of Italy at the arrival of the Trojans, with the ancestors, history, and character of Latinus?

Æneid. L. vii. v. 45—105.

2. I do not see any material difference between this and the last argument. To find any, I must suppose Mr. Hurd means that, had Virgil begun the poem with the taking of Troy, that story, however concisely told, would have engrossed too much of the reader's attention. I believe it would; but no rule can be founded upon this particular instance, where the preliminaries of the poem happen to be incomparably more important than the subject matter of it. When a poet finds himself under such a difficulty, I think the common method may be very serviceable to him.

I flatter myself I have now proved this rule never essential to the epopœa, and in general hurtful to it. But has it no advantages? The only one I can discover is, that making the hero tell part of his own story, gives the poem a more varied, and dramatic air, brings the reader more familiarly acquainted with the chief personages, and furnishes the writer with unaffected strokes, rather indeed of manners and of character than of passion. To these ends it may be serviceable. Let it however be remembered, that the poet who has obtained them the most completely, has done it, in one of his poems, without the assistance of this method.

* Lord Bacon, and Mr. Hurd himself, (vol. ii. p. 160—162) agree that poetry is an imitation of history, deviating however from it so as to answer the above-mentioned ends.

manners

Mr. Hurd, though a very rational admirer of antiquity, looks upon the chorus as essentially necessary to tragedy, and blames the moderns for having rejected it. The subject is curious, and, I think, has never been well considered; but, as such a discussion would lead me too far, I shall defer it till another opportunity, and only report here the substance of Mr. Hurd's commentary.

The chorus, rejected by us notwithstanding the authority of Aristotle and Horace, joined to the example of the ancient tragedians, and of our own Milton and Racine, has many advantages to recommend it. The principal are, 1. The chorus interposing in the action, and bearing a part of it, gives it an air of probability, and real life, and fills up that vacuity which is so sensibly felt upon the modern stage. 2. The chorus is as useful to the ethics, as to the poetry of the stage. It is a perpetual moral commentary upon the drama, enforcing every virtuous sentiment, rectifying every vicious one; and pointing out the important lessons which may be drawn from the catastrophe. Nor can it be said that the audience do not want this assistance. A sharp-sighted Athenian audience, even with the help of the chorus, could not distinguish between the real sentiments of Euripides and those he was obliged to suit to his characters. These uses of the

Vol. i. p. 116—119.

chorus

chorus naturally ascertain its laws. 1. Its songs must be animated with a spirit of virtue and morality; and 2. Their subject matter must be relative to and connected with the plot of the play and the actual situation of the personages. The Greek tragedians, who invented the chorus, have scarce ever deviated from the spirit of it. But Seneca, who seems to have endeavoured by his faults to illustrate the admonitions of Horace, has often mistaken it in the grossest manner. Mr. Hurd selects his Hippolitus, one of his best plays, and examines it act by act upon these principles. Every where his chorus bears a most idle and uninteresting part. The example of the third act, which contains the false accusation of Hippolitus, and the too easy deception of Theseus, may suffice. What had the chorus to do here, but to warn against the too great credulity, and to commiserate the case of the deluded father? Yet it declaims in general upon the unequal distribution of good and ill. Mr. Hurd traces the source of these blunders to an injudicious imitation of some passages of Euripides, without any attention to character or situation.

Vol. i. p. 120 —127.

The second law of the chorus is without exception; but several things may be said to explain or modify the first. 1. The use of modern sentences is not only necessary, but peculiar to the chorus. That is their proper place; if they were frequently put into the mouths of the speakers, it would only give the drama an air of stiffness and pedantry, very opposite to real life. If the Greeks (especially Euripides) have acted otherwise, they were only to be be justified from the manners of their age. That age was peculiarly addicted to moral sentences, from a singular mixture of simplicity and refinement. Their simplicity inspired them, as it does always, with a spirit of moralizing, expressed in short proverbial sentences: at the same time, moral philosophy was never more universal, and even fashionable. Both these causes operating upon the manners and conversation of the Greeks, could allow the poet, without offending against probability, to extend those maxims to the personages of the drama which succeeding times should confine to the chorus. Accius and Pacuvius indeed, and after them Seneca, injudiciously copied the Greeks in this instance; though writing to a nation whose manners were very different. 2. Though the chorus should always take the side of morality, it must not be so much that of a pure, philosophical morality, as of the popular system of ethics of that age and country. This restriction will be a reply to many cavils. We are shocked in the Medea, when we see a virtuous chorus not only conceal, but even abet the cruel designs of that princess against her husband, her rival, and the tyrant Creon; designs most justly repugnant to the purer lights of modern religion and philosophy: but we must consider that, in the Pagan world, the severest revenge for such injuries as the violation of the marriage-bed, so far from being a crime, was almost an act of duty; and that since positive laws allowed it to the husband, a chorus of women might very well think no natural law forbade it to the wife. 3. Great allowance must be made for bad politics, as well as bad ethics: a chorus of free citizens will be virtuous and independent; but should they (as in the Antigone) be composed of the servile ministers of a tyrant, their words, and even their thoughts, will be slavish, and the will of their masters, their only rule of right and wrong; their depravity will be the fault of the subject, not of the poet. Nay this depravity will convey a fine moral lesson of the baleful influence of arbitrary power.

Vol. i. p. 155 —163.

Vol. i. p. 131 —139.

Vol. i. p. 127—131.

Mr. Hurd thinks the verses from 202—220, which are generally considered as a censure on the corruption of the modern music, are in fact an encomium on its improvement; couched under an irony, by which he sneers at the too great austerity of those who blamed it without a sufficient attention to the alteration of manners, and the mixed company a public assembly is made up of.

The account our commentator gives of the Satyrs, Mimes, and Attellanes, is as curious as it is new. I shall only report the substance. 1. The attellanes were originally a Roman entertainment; so called from Attella, a town of the Osci, in Campania; for which reason, both the language and characters were Oscan; and the introduction of an old provincial dialect was a source of pleasantry very apposite to the unpolished taste of those ages. 2. In the seventh century of Rome, Pomponius began to write Latin attellanes; preserving however an antique cast of expression. This reformation, and a more moral turn which he gave his attellanes, procured procured him the name of inventor of them; and the honour of being imitated by the dictator Sylla. 3. Soon after, and before Horace wrote, the Oscan characters, now become absurd, had disappeared, and made way for the Greek satyrs. 4. Horace finding this entertainment established, and even necessary for the populace of Rome, undertook to regulate it, and to substitute to the gross ribaldry of the attellanes, the poignant wit of the Greek satyrs. 5. If it is asked, in what that wit consisted, it may be answered, principally in the double character of the satyrs themselves, who, though rustic and grotesque personages, were supposed in ancient mythology to be great masters of civil and moral wisdom: but should Horace be censured, as he has been, for preferring these attellanes to the elegant mimes of Laberius, it may be replied, that we rate too high the merit of these mimes. Cicero despised them, and the best ancients represent them as a confused medley of comic drollery, on a variety of subjects, without any order or design; delivered by one actor, and heightened with all the licence of obscene gesticulation.

This inelegancy (to pass to another remark of Mr. Hurd) was the general character of ancient wit, which consisted rather in a rude illiberal satire, than in a just and temperate ridicule, restrained within the bounds of decency and good manners: Cicero and Horace themselves, though masters of every other part of elegant composition, joke with a very ill-grace. A favourite topic of ancient raillery was corporal defects; a decisive proof of the coarseness of their humour; and this practice was recommended by rule, and enforced by the authority of their greatest masters. After this we must not be surprised if they preferred those authors whose wit was like their own, rough and coarse: Plautus to Terence, Aristophanes to Menander. We must follow Mr. Hurd for a few moments into his inquiry into the causes of this defect. 1. The free and popular governments of antiquity. These, by setting all the citizens on a level, took off those restraints of civility which arise from a fear of displeasing; and which can alone curb the licentiousness of ridicule. The only court to be paid was from the orators to the people. These were to be entertained with the coarse banter proper to please them; and, design passing into habit, these orators, and after them the nation, accustomed themselves to it at all times. The old comedy was therefore an excellent school for an orator, and always recommended as such: but when arbitrary power had moulded the Roman manners to more obsequiousness and decency, Terence and Menander began to receive a deserved applause; though even then, ancient wit was never thoroughly refined; for, 2. The old festal entertainments still subsisted, the Panathenæa and Dionysiæ of the Greeks, the Bacchanalia and Saturnalia of the Romans; and preserved always an image, as well of the frank libertine wit of their old stage, as of the original equality and independency of their old times. Upon this subject I agree with Mr. Hurd; but I think this influence of government

Vol. i. p. 165—184.

Cic. de Orator. L. xi. C. 59 and 66.

ment upon the manners and literature of a nation, might be the subject of a very original inquiry. I have a good many ideas myself, though, as the Abbé Trublet calls it, "Je n'ai pas achevé de les penser."

Upon v. 404, Mr. Hurd explains his author differently from his predecessors. They extended that encomium to all poetry, which Horace meant only for the lyric. In fact it is only adequate to that species which is besides so particularly pointed out by "Musa lyræ solers, et cantor Apollo." This is a delicate stroke of Horace, after his panegyric upon dramatic poetry, to shew the lyric had also its merit, and to prevent the Pisos from despising the choice he had made. Vol. i. p. 234—237.

These are the principal notes upon the Art of Poetry. On the Epistle to Augustus, I find but two worthy much notice.

The first is the explanation of a magnificent allegory, which opens the third Georgic. Virgil, after apologizing for the meanness of his subject, breaks away, with a poetical enthusiasm, to foretel his successes in the future great work of the Æneid. He shadows it under the idea of a triumph, in which he is to lead captive all the Grecian muses: the monument of the triumph is to be the usual one, a temple consecrated by games and sacrifices, and every ornament of which alluded to the tutelary divinity Augustus. Thus, under the popular authorized veil of the apotheosis of that prince, he lets us at once into the whole secret of his plan. This explanation is exquisitely fine; Vol. ii. p. 30—50. but but if my memory is good, the P. Catrou had started it before Mr. Hurd.

2dly, The other remark is to explode a practice, familiar to Ovid, and not unknown to more correct writers; that of coupling two substantives to a verb which does not strictly govern both, or which at least must be taken in two different significations. He proves very copiously, against the Professor d'Orville, that such a practice breaks the natural connexion of our ideas, and turns the attention of the reader from the subject, to a discovery and admiration of the art of the writer. He therefore pronounces it unworthy of serious poetry.

Vol. ii. p. 61—75.

As yet I have only spoken of Mr. Hurd's notes. His discourse upon the several provinces of the drama is a truly critical performance; I may even say, a truly philosophical one. From simple definitions of each species, he deduces a very extensive theory. To touch the heart by an interesting story, is the end of tragedy; to please our curiosity, and perhaps our malignity, by a faithful representation of manners, is the purpose of comedy. To excite laughter is the sole, and contemptible aim of farce.

Vol. i. p. 247—308.

These inquiries are delicate; sometimes we think we are reasoning upon things, when in fact we are only cavilling about words. It is more especially so with regard to those ideas which do not represent substances, but only modes of thinking, and moral combinations. There we can be only guided by practice and experience. They are out of the province province of reason. If Plautus and Aristophanes have given the name of comedy to a species of entertainment of which the essence was ridicule, they had a right to do it. If their successors Terence and Menander have given the same name to their more serious drama, we must either prove these definitions not incompatible, or give some other appellation to the object of the last. All that reason can do upon this head is, dropping names, to investigate the sources of our pleasures, to class them, and to see how far they agree, or interfere, with each other.

It is very natural that the contemplation of human life should be the favourite amusement of man. It is his easiest, and yet least mortifying, method of studying himself. This contemplation can be only considered in two different lights, manners and actions. We must allow, though we cannot explain it, that our humanity makes us hurt and yet pleased with the misfortunes of our fellow creatures; and that the recital of a story, terrible or pathetic, rouses every faculty in the human heart. On the other hand, daily experience convinces us that our reflections and conversations never turn upon any subject so often, and with so much pleasure, as the various characters of mankind. It is to give us these pleasures, less strongly perhaps, but through the means of fiction, more completely, that two entertainments have been invented, to the first of which we may hypothetically give the name of tragedy; and to the second, that of comedy. The laws of each species are to be deduced from their ends: but in following Mr. Hurd, I shall only mention those particular to what we have just now called comedy.

The first law of comedy must relate to the choice of character. They must be mixed ones. Human nature never deals in manners perfectly good or completely bad: but the poet is not confined to those characters only which excite contempt and ridicule; virtuous, amiable persons, who inspire us with sentiments of love and approbation, may be properly introduced, since all probable domestic manners lie within the province of comedy. These characters will not indeed occur so often as those of another kind, not only because they are less frequent in real life, but because they admit of less variety. For reason and virtue pursue a steady uniform course, while the extravagant wanderings of vice and folly are infinite: however, when properly brought upon the stage, they will occasion more pleasing sensations there than in society; whereas the ridicule of a scenical character is much weaker than that of a real one: perhaps our malignity may furnish a reason for this difference. 2dly, Another rule of comedy relates to the management of characters; they are to be displayed in a natural manner, and, as much as may be, the personages are to give their own characters; but that by undesigned actions or expressions, by which they lay themselves open without knowing it. Nor is that character always to appear, since it cannot always exist, but as the ruling passion is modified by others, or called forth by circumstances.

circumstances. A contrary method, though too common, is turning a man into a single passion; a man, such as nature never made, since those who are the most under the dominion of a ruling passion, act and talk, upon many occasions, like the rest of mankind. Actions are the province of tragedy, and manners that of comedy; this forms their distinctive difference. However, they cannot avoid running a good deal into each other. Without manners no action can be carried on, since we act according to our passions: nor could it affect us much, since our terror, or our pity, depends chiefly upon our love and hatred. On the other hand, how could manners be represented without a probable series of events, contrived to call them forth in a natural manner? We can only say, therefore, that in tragedy the action is the principal, manners an accessory circumstance; in comedy manners are the principal, action the accessory circumstance. In both the poet must take care that the end be not lost in the means. For this reason the complicated plots of the Spanish writers have been justly laid aside as contrary to the true genius of comedy. It may be worthy of some notice, in speaking of characters, that the most natural ones are comic; many highly so, are unfit for tragedy. Tragedy requires characters, good or bad, but of a power and energy equal to the greatest effects: but many passions, (the passions of weak minds,) such as vanity, can never with truth be raised to that dramatic importance; the actions produced by such passions will be always, ways, like themselves, puny and insignificant: but the energy of the stronger passions may be softened and reduced to the level of common life. Cruelty and ill-nature may disturb either a family or a nation; besides, there are other passions, the power of which, though great, is vilified by their object. The various species of avarice have produced the most tragic events; but the love of money is of so vile and groveling a nature, that it would degrade the most pathetic tragedy that turned upon it.

This difference of the two species cannot well be disputed: but it has been asked, whether they have not been distinguished by the rank, as well as the character, of the personages; or in other words, whether tragedy is confined to the public and exalted characters of kings and generals, and comedy to the humbler stations of private life? Without any regard to authority, I shall examine this question, mixing indifferently my own reasons and Mr. Hurd's.

As to tragedy, it may indeed be said, that we are the most affected by those misfortunes which might happen to ourselves; and that therefore the distresses of a private family must touch us more nearly than those of a monarch: but to counteract that advantage we may remark, that the story of those whom we are accustomed to look upon with awe and veneration, attaches us in the strongest manner, and awakes our terror and pity much more than the wretchedness of private men. These indeed are popular notions; but the poet's business ness lies in complying with those notions, not in reforming them. Besides, the misfortunes of the great, though not superior in themselves to those of the multitude, are yet far more important in their consequences, which heighten the distress, by extending the influence of it to the whole community. To these general remarks I may add a particular one, that in the noblest subjects, those founded upon ambition, love of our country, &c. the rank of the personages cannot be too exalted; since upon that depends the greatness of the prize for the one, and of the sacrifices in the other; and consequently great part of the importance of the action and strength of passion.

But cannot comedy admit of monarchs? they have their private life, and may not the ridicules of it be displayed upon the stage? I think not; but I must give my reasons.

1. The first will be taken from the spectators. We love comedy, because it offers to us a faithful representation of what we meet with in life. It must be therefore the life of the most considerable part of the audience, that the poet should represent: but what is that part? The question is easily resolved, by looking through human society, and observing that insensible gradation from the man of quality to that degree immediately above the mechanic and the labourer; every link, from the highest to the lowest, enough connected with the others to have some acquaintance with their manners; and enough improved by education, to laugh at their own follies. These then are the manners a poet should copy in their different appearances: should he touch those of the prince or peasant, they must either be the same or different. If the same, why go out of the way for them? if different, who will be found to understand or relish them? This is particularly true of the manners of princely life. With those of the lowest we are better acquainted; and the poet may find some archetypes among the spectators: but the grossness of them will disgust every one whom he can desire to please.

poet

2. But are the manners of princes different from those of their subjects? are there any qualities peculiarly royal? I know but one; that is, the thinking that there are such: in other words, I mean a fondness for flattery. That ridicule can, I confess, be no where so well represented as on the throne; since those will always receive, and love, the most extravagant adulation, who have it most in their power to reward and punish: but still I think it a better subject for satire than comedy. It would be difficult to put in action the follies of a monarch; the great theatrical resource is, the opposition and contrast of characters that display each other. The severity of Demea, and the easiness of Micio, throw a light upon one another. Should we be half so well acquainted with the misanthropy of Alceste, were it not for the fashionable, complaisant character of Philinte? But the poet would be almost destitute of this resource, if he laid his scene in courts, which offer one uniform set of manners moulded upon the example of the prince. What contrast could be found to set off off his character? None; since such a contrast supposes freedom and equality. This I take to be the true reason; not merely that politeness which in high life obliges even equals to conceal from each other their real characters. This is rather an advantage: we pursue with pleasure the various arts of concealment which it inspires, and when, as it must often happen, chance, familiarity, passion, interest, throw it off its guard, and display the man in his true colours, the long constraint gives them a new vivacity, and the discovery gives a higher relish to our entertainment.

3. But the most important objection to these characters still remains. They can have no private life. They have doubtless many things ridiculous and insignificant in themselves, hardly any thing that is so in its consequences. Every action of theirs is important by the influence it has upon the community; and if we paint their follies, those follies, rendered vices by their tragical effects, would in themselves excite contempt and indignation for their consequences; and, as the first of these passions is as repugnant to tragedy, as the second is improper for comedy, could produce only a very motley and disagreeable composition. Therefore, when M. de Fontenelle asks, whether Augustus, in his last sickness, surrounded by aruspices, who promise him a speedy recovery; by Parthian ambassadors, who restore to him standards about which he is totally indifferent; fawned upon by Livia, who is impatient for his death; whether all this would not make as good a comedy as the

Malade

Malade Imaginaire; the answer will not be difficult: No. Because the follies and weaknesses of the last, as they are innocent, divert us; while the fawning of Livia, and her power over her husband, fill us with horror and indignation; when we reflect that, by setting Tiberius on the throne, they made the world unhappy for three-and-twenty years, and finished the ruin of the liberty and nobility of the republic.

The practice of M. de Fontenelle, though very happy, is rather a confirmation of this theory. In his comedies he endeavours to reconcile us to those great personages, but he is continually reduced to shifts of lowering our idea of their importance, and divesting them of their power and majesty, before he can make them real comic characters. His common expedients are, making them of mean extraction, though raised to the throne; not putting them in possession of the crown till the end of the play; and laying his scene in Greece, in order to fill their court with simple citizens instead of with nobles.

I cannot help thinking that farce (the third species of Mr. Hurd's) is rather a corruption, than a distinct species of comedy. Is not his own definition a proof of this? That, as comedy is a faithful, so farce is an exaggerated picture of human life: if they are distinct, there is little occasion to fear any encroachments into the province of comedy from farce: but many comic writers, to please the corrupt taste of the multitude, have descended to all the extravagance of farce. There is another subject,

subject, which farce has preserved from the old comedy. This is the painting personal, individual characters: but that practice, seldom followed, and never authorized upon the modern stage, rather deserves the animadversion of the magistrate than of the critic. As to follies, not confined to a man, but to an age or country, I think Mr. Hurd too severe in banishing them into farce: he seems sensible of it himself; and, in the instance of the Alchemist, attempts to soften his sentence by a distinction rather chimerical.

I have, though without design, already so much extended this extract, that I shall abridge the other discourse of Mr. Hurd far more than its merit would otherwise justify. The subject of it is extremely curious; poetical imitation examined upon very original principles; a question in which the reputation of all the great writers since Homer is vitally concerned. It is thus stated by Mr. Hurd: "Whether that conformity of phrase or sentiment between two writers of different times which we call imitation may not, with probability enough, for the most part, be accounted for from general causes arising from our common nature; that is, from the exercise of our natural faculties upon such objects as lie common to all observers." Vol. ii. p. 105—207.

It has often been observed, with truth, that as our capacities are narrow, and the materials of observation the same to all men; it is impossible that in so great a number of those who have thought, and published their thoughts, some should not have coincided in the same opinions, without any knowledge ledge of each other. I believe that I may appeal to every man of letters, whether sometimes he has not met with things in books, which he had observed before he had ever seen those books; and things too of an uncommon and particular nature. Even in those sublimer mathematics, so different by their evidence and universality from our other speculations, the same discoveries have been made by different men, who seem rather to have coincided with, than to have followed each other. Is not that the decision of the moderate part of mankind upon the celebrated dispute of Sir Isaac Newton and Leibnitz, in the beginning of this century? If this is the case in those general abstracted branches, which contain such amazing combinations of ideas, it is surely probable that in works of imagination, which contain much fewer, this ought oftener to happen. Besides, the most original poetry is in fact imitation, imitation of nature; and in those images which are confessedly natural, it seems difficult to say why two men of genius may not have seen them without any previous knowledge of each other. From these reasons, the candid critic will readily allow that there may be similitude without imitation.

V. Fontenelle in the Eloge of Leibnitz, tom. v. p. 520—531.

But a slight glance on the history of the sciences, and a few reflections on mankind, will reduce this candour within its due limits. Let us remember that, 1. Since the time of Homer, who perhaps was without models to imitate, that author has been introduced into the earliest part of our education; that succeeding times added to his lessons those of the the other Greeks; that the Romans studied them with care; and that, since the revival of letters, we are made acquainted, as soon as possible, with the Greeks and Latins. That those impressions, engraved on our minds before we reflect, afterwards grow up with us; and when we look abroad into the moral and natural world, which these companions often prevent us from doing, we see it only with the eyes of the ancients. Authority, founded on reason, would oblige us to act in this way. The ancient compositions have stood the test of time and examination; and the veneration that is paid to them, is enough to engage a modern to endeavour to associate himself to it, by transfusing into his own writings the spirit, the thoughts, and even the expressions, of these admired models: and, 2. Inclination will direct him to the imitation of some particular model; of some writer whose soul is most congenial to his own, and whom he can read with the greatest delight, and imitate with the most ease. These reasons bring us back to our first suspicion, that where there is a striking similitude, there is imitation; since where there are two ways of accomplishing it, it is natural to prefer the easiest, especially when it is confessedly very common.

Mr. Hurd found it necessary to go further, if he intended to clear his authors from the charge of imitation; accordingly he endeavours to prove, by a very elaborate deduction, that both the ideas, and the methods, employed by the ancients, were not only natural ones, but the sole natural ones;

so that if succeeding poets, endued with judgment, looked abroad into nature, they not only might, but must meet with them; while men of irregular fancies could avoid them only by avoiding truth and probability. This theory accounts for resemblances of works, by resemblances of things; and forbids any suspicion of imitation, unless we are guided to it by particular circumstances. In a matter of such vast extent, it is as difficult to refute as to prove. There would indeed be a very short method of overthrowing at once Mr. Hurd's doctrine; could I write a work of imagination, full of beauties, formed on the model of nature, and yet different from those of the ancients, I should then demonstrate that they have not exhausted it: but such a confutation is far beyond my power. Without aspiring to genius, I shall think myself very happy, if I can frame my opinions according to the dictates of good sense.

If we examine this question à posteriori, from practice and experience of what has been done, though we shall meet with nothing very decisive, I think, however, that the advantage will not be on Mr. Hurd's side: he will, indeed, quote many striking similarities of this kind, from writers who could have had no knowledge of one another; but he will be answered, 1. That such writers can hardly be found; that the sacred writings should not be mentioned, nor compared, with Homer; since we are talking of human, not divine compositions; and that Shakespeare, the modern who appears appears freest from exception, though ignorant himself, lived in a learned age. 2. That their example can only be quoted against those who think every similarity must be an imitation, without any regard to the circumstances of the writers. That, as such a coincidence is possible, we must employ it to explain a phænomenon for which we could not otherwise account; but that when the more easy and probable one may be recurred to, we ought to employ it. On the other hand, an antagonist of Mr. Hurd's would have occasion for no great compass of reading to discover, in the most modern writers, many original images and sentiments. He would select them, particularly, from those very writers, who, from an apprehension that every thing had been already said, had cramped their natural genius, by an open, perpetual imitation of the ancients; and he would infer, with some plausibility, that had they written from their own natural feelings and observations, they would have been still more original. He would desire Mr. Hurd to reconcile this with his principles, and even press him for a precise answer, at what period of the history of letters the scene had been closed, nature exhausted, and succeeding writers reduced to the hope of imitating successfully. Wherever he chose to fix it, the critic would bring against him so many later original images, that the resource of disputing their claim, and hunting for some distant allusion, or general resemblance, would be hardly sufficient.

Without following minutely our author through his copious deductions à priori, in which he has certainly shewn great learning and ingenuity, I shall only make two or three general observations, which may give an idea, both of his method of reasoning, and of my objections to it.

He enters upon a task, in my opinion, far above human abilities. To examine the origin of our ideas is the business of metaphysics, and the greatest philosophers have failed in the attempt. But it is perhaps still more difficult to embrace them all at one view, and to class them according to their different objects, in so accurate a manner as to assure ourselves that we have suffered no material species to escape. This is, however, what Mr. Hurd undertakes. He makes three divisions of the world of ideas which can enter into poetry. 1. The vast compages of corporeal forms of which this universe is compounded. 2. The internal workings and movements of our own mind; under which the manners, sentiments, and passions are comprehended. 3. The outward operations, which are made objective to sense by the means of speech, gesture, and action. These are again by him subdivided with an exactness in which I shall not pursue him. I shall only remark, 1. That his smallest species are yet too general to prove any thing. That Milton, for instance, must, like Homer, have made use of moral, religious, and economical sentiments, and could not invent any new species, I shall readily allow; nor is it upon such general resemblances that a charge of imitation is ever founded. It is upon more particular similarities, similarities, where Mr. Hurd can never attain to shew that those ideas were the only ones. The only method Mr. Hurd can there follow, is a sort of vicious reasoning in a circle; to look for the images upon every subject he can meet with in the oldest authors, and then to conclude that they are the only ones existing.

2. Even supposing that he had exhausted the whole stock of nature, and had shewn that every image, singly, had been so obvious as to be seen and employed by the first writers, a much larger field would still remain; their different combinations, which are infinite. With regard only to human manners, the great sources of character, passion, and situation, may be combined in such a variety of ways, as no algebra could reach. Let us, for a moment, abandon fiction, and enter into historic truth. Consult the annals of any nation; observe the various effects of the modifications of those three principles upon their history, and then say whether the operations of human nature are easily classed, or circumscribed.

3. This consideration of the shifting picture of mankind, as an illustration, leads us to consider it in itself. We shall find it a most extensive and infinite range of ideas, almost sufficient of itself to preserve genius from imitation; since to the writers of every age and country it appears in a different shape. It is the manners, the government, the religion, of that age and country he is to study; and whether the nature of his subject allows him to introduce them at full length; whether he can only adorn his works with distant allusions to them; whether he can only catch the general spirit of them, they will always make him an original. I shall quote one instance of what I mean, and that from an authority Mr. Hurd will hardly dispute. When Milton conceived the glorious plan of an English epic, he soon saw the most striking subjects had been taken from him; that Homer had taken all morality for his province, and Virgil exhausted the subject of politics. Religion remained; but as Paganism, though it furnished very agreeable scenes of machinery, took too slight a hold on men's minds to build the story of the epopœa upon it, he had recourse to Christianity; and, taking his story from an article of our faith, struck out a new species of epic poetry; but he could never have done it, had not the manners of that age, attached to religion in general, and to that tenet in particular, warmed his imagination, and given it a dignity and importance, which he could never have transfused into his poem, if he had not first felt it himself. Nor is this observation repugnant to another I have made elsewhere,—that the manners of the ancients were more favourable to poetry than ours. I think so still, of their manners, as well as their languages. Yet I would have our poets employ our own, not only for the sake of variety, but because we shall make the best use of those with which we are the most intimately acquainted.

Warburton's Divine Legation.

Essai sur l'Etude de la Littérature, p. 19.

From these observations I must decline subscribing to Mr. Hurd's theory, or circumscribing the poet's poet's images within such narrow limits. It is, however, without running into the other extreme, or condemning every resemblance as a designed formal imitation. I take the exact difference between Mr. Hurd and myself to be this: I look upon imitation to be the most natural, and general, cause of any striking resemblance between two writers; and therefore assign it, without particular reasons to the contrary. Mr. Hurd, on the other hand, thinks it may generally be accounted for by a resemblance of mental operations; and therefore never suspects an imitation, without particular circumstances which lead to the detection of it.

He employs another discourse with a review of these circumstances; but as every one is accompanied with examples taken from the ancients and moderns, and criticised with great taste, I can only reduce the great number he alleges to three, drawn from the different lights in which we may consider every resemblance, and fix the probability of its happening, by chance, or by design. 1. How close is the resemblance? Is the thought exactly the same? Is it introduced upon the same occasion? Is it expressed in the same manner, the same words, or words nearly the same? Is it a short passage, or one of a considerable length? 2. What degree of acquaintance can the second poet be supposed to have had with the first? Did he live in a learned, or an ignorant age? Was he himself a man of letters, or without education? Did he affect the fame of originality, or did he modestly profess a desire and habit of imitating the ancients? Was the first author an acknowledged favourite of his? 3. What appearance is there that the idea should have naturally struck the second? Was it common, or particular; did it agree with the style and design of his work; with his own character; with the real appearance of nature; with the manners and opinions of his age, country, and profession; or at least with those he describes? Is it introduced in a general unaffected manner, or brought in without any occasion, and clothed in uncommon, obsolete language? Mr. Hurd thinks these circumsances, all or some, necessary to form a suspicion: I allow they are very useful to confirm one.

Vol. ii. p. 1 —76.

I have at last finished Mr. Hurd's performance. I reckoned upon six or seven pages; I am now writing the thirtieth. Another time I hope to confine my extracts within proper limits.

Blandford, 18th March, 1762.

NOMINA,

NOMINA, GENTESQUE

ANTIQUÆ ITALIÆ.

INTRODUCTION.

From the several passages in the Extracts from Mr. Gibbon's Journal of his Studies, it appears that previously to his Tour through Italy, he had endeavoured to make himself a complete master of its geographical and classical antiquities; and, with that view, had attentively perused the Italia Antiqua et Sicilia Antiqua of Cluvierus. The following pages seem to contain regular minutes, made by him in this course of his reading.

He begins with observations on the ancient appellations and inhabitants of Italy; its divisions, air, and soil; and on the Apennines. Then, crossing the Po, into the Cisalpine Gaul, he proceeds to Liguria, its western division, and thence descends through Etruria, Rome, Latium, Campania, and Lucania, to Brutium, the southernmost point of the part of Italy which borders on the Tuscan Sea. Then crossing into Calabria, the southernmost point on the opposite shore, he ascends through through Apulia, Samnium, Picenum, Umbria, Æmilia, and Flaminia, to Istria and Venetia, the eastern division of the Cisalpine Gaul. That completes the literary tour: and he closes it with some general observations on the number and construction of the public roads in Italy.

NOMINA,

NOMINA, GENTESQUE ANTIQUÆ ITALIÆ.

Sect. I.

NOMINA.

On sait que l'Italie s'appelloit aussi Oenotria, Saturnia, Ausonia, Hesperia, &c. et que le nom d'une tribu particulière devenoit souvent générique par les conquêtes ou le commerce. Les grammairiens anciens et les critiques modernes ont vainement tenté de percer les ténèbres de ces origines, et de trouver dans le Latin, le Grec, le Phénicien, ou le Celtique, des étymologies raisonnables pour des mots que le caprice et le hasard ont peut-être dictés à des peuples qui parloient des langues dont nous connoissons à peine les noms, l'Etrusque, l'Osque, et le Sabine. L'Hespérie seule exprime une idée connue et avérée. Les navigateurs Grecs donnoient toujours ce nom au pays le plus occidental qu'ils connoissoient; d'abord à l'Italie, ensuite à l'Espagne, et enfin aux îles Canaries, et peut-être à l'Amérique.

GEN-

GENTES.

V. Hist. de l'Académie des Belles Lettres, tom. xviii. p. 72—114.

J'EXPOSERAI le système du savant Freret sur la population de l'Italie. Je sens qu'il peut avoir ses endroits foibles, mais en général il me paroît simple, lumineux, et fondé sur les grands principes. Il suppose, 1. Que les premières peuplades se sont faites par terre. 2. Que ces peuples Nomades, peu attachés à leurs terres, cédoient sans peine aux nouvelles migrations, et qu'ainsi c'est à l'extrémité méridionale de l'Italie qu'il faut chercher ses premiers habitans. 3. Que l'Italie, entourée de hautes montagnes, doit avoir reçu ses premiers peuples par les gorges où elles sont les moins difficiles à franchir pour des sauvages, à qui de pareils obstacles devoient être très importans. Voici les colonies :

I. Colonies Illyriennes. Ces nations qui n'étoient séparées de l'Italie que par la partie la moins élevée des Alpes y passèrent bientôt. Il y avoit trois nations Illyriennes, 1. Les Liburni ; 2. Les Siculi ; et 3. Les Veneti. Les Liburni occupèrent enfin toute la côte orientale depuis Mont Garganus jusqu'au pays des Salentins. Ils étoient distingués en trois tribus. 1. Les Apuli ; 2. Les Calabri ; et 3. Les Peucetii ou Pædiculi. On voit par Strabon qu'elles avoient une langue commune, et par Pline que les Peucetii étoient d'origine Illyrienne. Il paroît que les Peligni et les Prætutii avoient aussi une origine Liburnienne. 2. Les Siculi s'établirent sur la côte occidentale. Il paroît que ce nom générique, aussi bien que ceux de Osci ou Opiques

N.B. Je ne vois point la preuve que les Siculi étoient d'origine Illyrienne.

Opiques et d'Ausones, comprenoient tous les peuples depuis le Tibre. On peut se contenter de cette idée générale, sans vouloir démêler la confusion qui règne dans les auteurs à l'égard des petites guerres et des migrations de leurs tribus particulières, dont il se forma enfin les cités des Latins, des Sabins, des Samnites, &c. Une tribu qui n'est connue que par le nom générique de Siculi le porta en Sicile 80 ans avant la guerre de Troye, 1364 ans avant J. C. selon la chronologie d'Hérodote et de Thucydide. 3. Les Heneti ou Veneti conservèrent toujours leur pays. Ils devinrent bientôt les alliés des Romains contre leurs ennemis communs les Gaulois, dont Polybe les a bien su distinguer par la langue. Ils n'étoient point Celtes; encore moins étoient ils Paphlagoniens.

II. Les Colonies Ibériennes. Ces peuples n'étoient point renfermés dans les limites de l'Espagne. Ils occupoient un territoire très étendu entre les Pyrennées et les Alpes, et ce fut en se répandant de proche en proche le long des côtes qu'ils franchirent à la fin les Alpes maritimes pour passer en Italie, qu'ils parcoururent plutôt qu'ils ne s'y établirent. Dans leur marche un détachement Ibérien passa du promontoire Populonium dans la Corse où ses mœurs et sa langue, malgré tant de mélanges, se conservèrent jusqu'au tems de Senèque qui sut les distinguer de celles des Grecs et des Liguriens. Une autre tribu Ibérienne, (les Sicani,) poussée peu à peu jusqu'au promontoire de Rhegium, passa en Sicile et se fixa dans la partie occidentale de l'île où les Siculi les trouvèrent. Cette circon-circonstance feroit croire que leur migration en Italie a dû avoir lieu près de 1500 ans avant J. C. Ne seroit-elle pas par hasard le voyage d'Hercule avec les bœufs de Geryon? Les uns et les autres traînent avec eux des troupeaux nombreux, seules richesses d'un peuple pasteur; ils partent du même point, suivent la même route, surmontent les mêmes obstacles que leur opposoient les nations de la Ligurie et du Latium, s'arrêtent au même terme, le pays d'Eryx, où ils fondent une colonie après avoir vaincu les naturels du pays. Ces conformités sont grandes, et je ne les ai point choisies.

III. Les colonies Celtiques. Les Umbri, Ambra, ou Ambrones, étoient d'origine Gauloise selon le témoignage de Bocchus, et l'on sait l'aventure des Liguriens de l'armée de Marius qui reconnurent pour leurs parens une tribu Helvétienne de leurs ennemis à leur cri commun d'Ambrones. Ces colonies peuplèrent une grande partie de l'Italie depuis les Alpes et l'Addua jusqu'au Tibre et au Nar. Mais l'invasion des Toscans leur enleva la meilleure partie de leurs établissemens, et sépara les cités qui prirent le nom de Ligures d'avec celles qui conservèrent celui d'Umbri. Je vois que l'Abbé Langlet de Fresnoy place cette migration dans les tems les plus reculés, à l'an 1912 avant J. C. J'ignore ses raisons, mais je crains qu'elles ne tiennent au roman des Titans du P. Pezron. Il ne faut pas confondre cette migration des Celtes avec celle de Bellovesus vers l'an 600 qui reprit sur les Toscans les pays entre les Alpes et l'Apennin.

IV. Les colonies Pélasgiques. Toutes les fables

bles que Denys d'Halicarnasse en a débitées ne sont propres qu'à y répandre des doutes. L'Arcadie, pays méditerrané, qui n'avoit point de vaisseaux à la guerre de Troye, fournit, dix-sept générations auparavant dans le tems qu'elle étoit sauvage, une flotte nombreuse à Oenotrus qui va peupler l'Italie. Rejettons hardiment tous les systêmes, toutes les conjectures, et tous les détails d'un historien qui évite les difficultés et qui dissimule les contradictions dans les siècles réculés où nous voyons à peine la lumière. Etendons notre idée des Pélasges à toutes les nations barbares qui habitoient la Grèce, la Macédoine et l'Epire, et qui ne quittoient ce nom générique qu'à mesure qu'elles entroient dans le corps Hellénique. Quelques-uns de ces peuples passèrent en Italie. En sacrifiant tous les accessoires de cette tradition il en faut conserver le fondement. Je voudrois aussi, malgré M. Freret, conserver la manière de leur migration et croire qu'ils sont venus en Italie par mer. Je reconnois le grand principe de cet auteur. Il est fort étendu, mais s'il étoit universel, verrions-nous des îles très éloignées du continent peuplés d'habitans les plus sauvages? L'ignorance totale de la navigation est aussi rare que son extrême perfection. N'étoit-il pas bien plus facile aux Pélasges de l'Epire de traverser un bras de mer de cinquante milles que d'entreprendre une course immense à travers cent nations féroces de l'Illyrie? Quelques canots auront suffi pour apporter le germe d'une colonie peu nombreuse dans son origine. Aussi les Pélasges ne formèrent jamais en Italie un grand corps de nation; ils se répandirent dans les cités Sicules, Umbriennes, et Toscanes, dont la langue, les mœurs, et la religion se ressentirent, jusqu'aux derniers tems, du nombre plus ou moins grand de ces étrangers qu'elles avoient reçus.

V. Les colonies Etrusques. Selon le père de l'histoire, les Etrusques étoient d'origine Lydienne. Ce peuple avoit une famine dans le pays; il inventa les jeux de dés pour occuper la moitié des citoyens les jours qu'elle ne mangeoit pas. Cet expédient réussit pendant dix-huit ans. Enfin cette moitié s'ennuya du jeu, équipa une flotte nombreuse, et alla s'établir dans l'Etrurie. Faut-il réfuter une pareille fable? Denys d'Halicarnasse s'est donné la peine de faire voir que la langue, les mœurs, et la religion de ces deux peuples éloignés n'avoient aucun rapport. Les Etrusques, dont le nom véritable étoit Rasena, n'étoient point Lydiens. On peut soupçonner qu'ils sortoient des montagnes de la Rhétie. Les historiens conviennent qu'ils avoient une ligue commune; et selon l'analogie de ces migrations, les Etrusques paroissent plutôt les descendans que les ancêtres des Rhétiens. On détermine l'époque de leur migration d'une façon assez ingénieuse. La grande année des Etrusques se mesuroit sur la durée de la vie humaine. La première s'étendoit jusqu'à la mort du dernier survivant de tous les enfans nés le jour de la fondation de la colonie. Le jour de cette mort devenoit une nouvelle époque semblable à la première. On sait que leur huitième année finissoit au premier consulat de Sylla avant J. C. 88, et que les sept premières avoient duré 781 ans.

ans. A supposer la huitième égale à la plus longue des autres elle étoit de 123 ans; elle commençoit en 211, et la première époque de la fondation de la colonie a commencé en 992. Les Rasena avoient étendu leurs établissemens dans l'Etrurie et la Campanie; mais après les conquêtes des Gaulois et des Samnites, il ne leur restoit que Mantoue, avec Atria sur le Po, et Cupra Maritima dans le Picenum. Les Tyrrhéniens étoient les Pélasges de l'Italie, mais surtout de l'Etrurie, où ils étoient très puissans. Enclavés dans ce pays, unis avec le corps Etrusque, les anciens les ont souvent confondus avec les Rasena, dont l'origine étoit si différente. Ils possédoient les quatre cités de Veii, de Falerii, de Tarquinii, et d'Agylla, où leur langue et leur religion se conservèrent jusqu'au siècle d'Auguste. On voit par les anciens monumens qu'on a déterrés dans l'Etrurie, que leurs caractères étoient les mêmes que les Ibériens. Les uns et les autres ressemblent beaucoup aux lettres Samaritaines dont les Phéniciens auront pu répandre l'usage dans les pays occidentaux de l'Europe. Le voyage de Saturne dans le Latium, qui civilisa les sauvages de ces côtes, m'a l'air très Phénicien. Ce peuple commerçant auroit naturellement apporté les arts, l'argent monnoyé, le culte de Moloch, ou Saturne, et les sacrifices humains. Je pense aussi que c'est à cette communication et peut-être à quelques colonies Tyriennes, que les Etrusques ont dû leur politesse, leur goût pour les arts, et la navigation, et ce goût oriental qui se fait sentir dans tous leurs ouvrages; leur divination et leur théologie paroissent seules originales.

Sect. II.

REGIONES, AËR, ET SOLUM ITALIÆ, ET MONS APENNINUS.

Dr. Templeman's Survey.

1. Magnitudo. L'Italie contient 75,576 milles quarrés. Si l'on veut la comparer aux autres pays, elle contient dix fois autant de terrein que le Péloponnèse, la Palestine, ou les Provinces Unies, et elle est d'un tiers plus grande que l'Angleterre, ou la Grèce (y comprise la Macédoine.)

Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 146.

L'Italie a 6000 stades de longueur depuis l'Apennin jusqu'à Tarentum, et environ 1300 de largeur.

Dionys. Hal. Rom. Antiq. l. i. p. 16.

2. Laudes. Denys d'Halicarnasse parle de l'Italie avec une espèce d'enthousiasme. En convenant que quelques pays peuvent l'emporter sur elle à certains égards, il trouve qu'il n'y en a aucun qui réunisse autant tous les avantages. 1. Les champs fertiles de la Campanie portent des moissons trois fois tous les ans. 2. Les pays des Sabins, des Messapiens et des Dauniens produisent les meilleurs olives du monde. 3. Les vignobles de la Toscane, d'Albe et de Falerne produisent des vins exquis avec très peu de culture. 4. Elle abonde en excellens pâturages que nourrissent un nombre infini de bœufs, de chevaux, de moutons, et de chèvres. 5. Les forêts qui croissent sur ses montagnes escarpées fournissent les plus beaux bois de construction; ces forêts sont remplies de gibier, et le sein des montagnes renferme des mines de toutes les espèces. 6. Les rivières navigables réunissent toutes toutes les parties de l'Italie, et ses eaux minérales offrent partout des soulagemens pour les maux. 7. L'air et le climat sont très tempérés dans toutes les saisons de l'année.

L'Italie paroît faite pour conquérir l'univers. 1. La mer et les montagnes la rendent presqu' inaccessible de toutes parts. 2. Le petit nombre de ports de mer qui s'y trouvent, sont grands et excellens. 3. La variété qui règne dans son climat et dans son terrein en met aussi dans les esprits et dans toutes les productions de la nature. Strab.Geog. l. vi. p. 197.

In toto orbe et quàcunque cœli convexitas vergit, pulcherrima est omnium, rebusque merito principatum naturæ obtinens, Italia, rectrix parensque mundi altera; viris, fœminis, ducibus, militibus, servitiis, artium præstantiâ, ingeniorum claritatibus; jam situ ac salubritate cœli atque temperie, accessû cunctarum gentium facili, litoribus portuosis, benigno ventorum afflatu, (etenim contingit recurrenter positio in partem utilissimam et inter ortus occasusque mediam,) aquarum copiâ, nemorum salubritate, montium articulis, ferorum animalium innocentiâ, soli fertilitate, pabuli ubertate. Quicquid est quo carere vita non debet, nusquam est præstantius. Fruges, vinum, olea, vellera, lina, vestes; ne equos quidem in trigariis præferri ullos vernaculis, animadverto; metallis auri, argenti, æris, ferri, quæ diu exercere libuit, nullis cessit, et nunc iis in se gravida, pro omni dote, varios succos, et frugum pomorumque sapores, fundit. Ab eâ, exceptis Indiæ fabulosis, prox- Plin. Hist. Natur. l. xxxvi. c. 13.

ime quidem duxerim Hispaniam, quàcunque ambi tur mari.

Virg.Georg. l. ii. v. 136.
Sed neque Medorum sylvæ, ditissima terra,
Nec pulcher Ganges, neque auro turbidus Hebrus
Laudibus Italiæ certent, non Bactra neque Indi, Totaque thuriferis Panchaïa pinguis arenis.

Idem. Georg. l. ii. v. 143.
—— gravidæ fruges, et Bacchi Massicus humor
Implevere: tenent oleæque armentaque læta.
Hinc bellator equus campo sese arduus infert.

Virg Georg. l. ii. 149.
Hic ver assiduum atque alienis mensibus æstas:
Bis gravidæ pecudes, bis pomis utilis arbos.
At rabidæ tigres absunt, et sæva leonum
Semina: nec miseros fallunt aconita legentes:
Nec rapit immensos orbes per humum, neque tanto
Squameus in spiram tractû se colligit anguis.
Adde tot egregias urbes operumque laborem,
Tot congesta manû præruptis oppida saxis,
Fluminaque antiquos subterlabentia muros.
An mare, quod supra, memorem, quodque alluit infra?
Anne lacus tantos?

Idem. l. ii. 165.
Hæc eadem argenti rivos, ærisque metalla
Ostendit venis, atque auro plurimo fluxit.

Plin. Hist. Nat. l. iii. 20. xxxiii. 4.
3. METALLA. Il y a beaucoup de mines en Italie, mais le sénat avoit défendu qu'on les exploitât.

Idem. xiv. 11.
4. VINA. De quatre-vingt sortes que les anciens comptoient de vins célèbres, l'Italie seule en produisoit les deux tiers.

Idem. xviii. 7.
5. FRUMENTUM. Le froment d'Italie l'emportoit sur tous les autres, pour le poids et la blancheur.

Ælian. Var. Hist. l. ix. c. 16. apud Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. i. p. 37.
6. URBES. Il y avoit autrefois en Italie (dit Elien) 1197 villes.

7. FORMA.

7. FORMA. Ab Alpibus incipit in altum excedere, atque ut procedit se media perpetuo jugo Apennini attollens montis, inter Adriacum et Tuscum, sive (ut aliter appellantur) inter superum mare et inferum, excurrit diu solida. Verum ubi longe abit in duo cornua, funditur respicitque altero Siculum pelagus, altero Ionium; tota angusta et alicubi multo quam unda cœpit angustior. Pompon. Mela de Situ Orbis, l. ii. c. 4. p. 35. Edit. Vossian.

8. APENINNUS. L'Apennin, après avoir cotoyé la Ligurie, perce dans l'intérieur du pays, et partage l'Italie par sa largeur depuis Pise jusqu'à Ancone et Ariminum. De-là il s'étend au midi et divise ce même pays par sa longueur. Il approche toujours assez de la mer Adriatique jusqu'au territoire des Lucaniens; de-là il s'incline insensiblement du côté de la mer Toscane, et va finir enfin à Leucopetra près de Rhegium. Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 146.

9. REGIONES. Auguste, après avoir étendu l'Italie jusques dans l'Istrie et la Gaule Cisalpine, partagea ce pays en onze régions, savoir, 1. Campania; 2. Lucania et Brutium; 3. Apulia; 4. Samnium; 5. Picenum; 6. Umbria; 7. Etruria; 8. Flaminia; 9. Liguria; 10. Venetia; 11. Transpadana. V. Plin. Hist. Nat. l. iii. 5-19.

Constantin, qui réforma dirai-je, ou qui confondit toutes les anciennes constitutions, fit plusieurs changemens en Italie. 1ment. Il ajouta aux anciennes limites d'Auguste, les trois îles de Sicile, de Sardaigne, et de Corse, et la Rhétie, partagée en deux provinces. 2ment. Il établit trois provinces nouvelles: les Alpes Cottiennes, qui comprenoient ces montagnes proprement dites, et une partie de la Transpadana; le Picenum Suburbicarium, qui comprenoit la partie méridionale de l'Umbrie; et la Valeria, qui cotoyoit le chemin du même nom et qui détachoit du Samnium la partie septentrionale de cette province. 3ment. Il en supprima deux, la Transpadana qui fut partagée entre les Alpes Cottiennes et l'Emilia, et l'Umbria, dont la partie septentrionale, qui seule conservoit son ancien nom, fut réunie avec la Toscane. Ainsi l'Italie, selon la distribution de Constantin, contenoit dix-sept provinces, savoir, 1. Venetia; 2. Emilia; 3. Liguria; 4. Picenum Anonarium vel Flaminia; 5. Alpes Cottiæ; 6. Rhætia prima; 7. Rhætia secunda; 8. Tuscia et Umbria; 9. Picenum Suburbicarium; 10. Campania; 11. Sicilia; 12. Apulia et Calabria; 13. Lucania et Brutium; 14. Samnium; 15. Valeria; 16. Sardinia; 17. Corsica. 4ment. La division d'Auguste étoit utile seulement aux géographes, ou peut-être aux censeurs. Celle de Constantin étoit une véritable division politique, qui établissoit dans chaque province un gouvernement et des magistrats particuliers. Sept de ces provinces, la Venetia, Emilia, Liguria, Flaminia, Tuscia, Picenum Suburbicarium et Campania, avoient des consulaires pour gouverneurs; trois d'entr'elles n'avoient que des correcteurs, la Sicile, l'Apulia, et la Lucania; les sept autres, les deux Rhéties, les Alpes Cottiennes, le Samnium, la Valérie, et les îles de Sardaigne et de Corse étoient seulement aux ordres d'autant de présidens. 5ment. Le diocèse d'Italie étoit partagée en deux vicariats; celui d'Italie proprement dite, et celui de Rome. Le vicaire d'Italie residoit à Milan et gouvernoit les sept premières provinces, provinces, qui, après avoir été anciennement hors de l'Italie, s'étoient appropriées ce nom exclusivement. Le vicaire de Rome tenoit sa cour dans cette capitale. Sa juridiction s'étendoit sur les dix autres provinces, qu'on appelloit communément les provinces suburbicaires. 6ment. Comme la police ecclésiastique s'est formée sur celle de l'Empire, l'évêque de Rome n'étoit que métropolitain des provinces suburbicaires depuis Constantin jusqu' à Valentinien III; il n'étoit pas même exarque; pour mériter ce titre il falloit gouverner un diocèse entier; mais il avoit plus d'autorité que les évêques d'Alexandrie et d'Antioche qui l'étoient: comme il n'avoit dans sa juridiction que de simples évêques, c'étoit à lui seul à leur donner l'ordination et à décider des élections litigées.

Pour cet article, V. Notit. Utriusq; Imper. cum Comm. Pancirol. L'Hist. Civ. de Naples par Giannone, tom. i. p. 96—101, et 162—167, et Berg. Grand Chemins, tom. i. p. 464.

Fines. Du côté du midi, les bornes ont toujours été déterminés par la nature. Sur la mer Adriatique, elle eut pour bornes successivement, les rivières Arsis, Rubico, Formio et Arsia, et sur la méditerranée l'Arnus et ensuite le Varus. Depuis que la Gaule Cisalpine y a été comprise, elle s'est toujours étendue jusqu'au sommet des Alpes.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. 2. p. 16—21.

Longitudo et Latitudo. Depuis la ville d'Augusta Prætoria jusqu' à celle de Rhegium, l'on comptoit 1020 milles en suivant la route de Rome et de Capoue. C'est le calcul de Pline, mais il paroît trop fort. Entre ces deux endroits à peine peut on trouver 800 milles. Cluvier, qui a senti la difficulté, y répond fort bien. 1. Il ne faut tirer une ligne droite, mais l'on doit suivre le grand chemin chemin dont la direction naturelle n'auroit point suivi celle de Pline. 2. Les milles Romains étoient plus grands que ceux dont on se sert aujourd'hui; surtout dans l'état ecclésiastique et le Royaume de Naples. Ce même Pline fixe sa plus grande largeur entre le Varus et l'Arsia à 410 milles.

AËR. L'Abbé du Bos croit que les environs de Rome sont moins froids qu'ils ne l'étoient autrefois. A. U. C. 480 l'hiver y fut se violent que les arbres moururent. Le Tibre prit dans Rome, et la neige demeura sur la terre pendant quarante jours. Le Tibre pris n'étoit pas même un événement singulier.

Juvenal. Satir. vi. 521.

Hibernum fractâ glacie descendet in amnem,
Ter matutino Tyberi mergetur, et ipsis
Vorticibus timidum caput abluet.

Du Bos. Reflex. Sur la Poësie et la Peint. tom. ii. p. 298.

Plusieurs passages d'Horace supposent les rues de Rome pleines de neiges et de glaces. Aujourd'hui le Tibre n'y gèle guères plus que le Nil, et c'est beaucoup si la neige s'y conserve pendant deux jours.

Longuerue, p. 41, 42.

Quand on dit que le climat de Rome est changé, on se trompe. Le passage d'Horace sur le Tibre gelé ne prouve rien. Il a gelé en 1709, il geloit pendant les grands hivers, et gèle encore. Dans l'Ombrie, où étoit Horace, il souffle un vent très froid qui vient des montagnes. Celui de l'Apennin y fait ressentir un grand froid à Florence.

Quel parti faut-il prendre?—celui de l'Abbé du Bos. L'Abbé de Longuerue ne produit que des exemples extraordinaires, ou qui ne regardent point Rome et ses environs.

Si

Si me vivere vis sanum recteque valentem,
Quam mihi das ægro, dabis ægrotare timenti,
Mæcenas, veniam; dum ficus prima calorque
Designatorem decorat lictoribus atris,
Dum pueris omnis pater et matercula pallet,
Officiosaque sedulitas, et opella forensis
Adducit febres, et testamenta resignat.

Horat. Epist. i. 7.

Sect. III.

ALPES ET GENTES INALPINÆ, ET FLUMEN PADUS.

Alpes. Le mot générique d'Alpe, qui signifie une hauteur en langue Celtique, leur fut appliqué par une distinction qu'elles méritoient bien. Les Grecs eux-mêmes ont été obligés de convenir que leurs montagnes tant vantées d'Olympe, d'Ossa, et de Pelion, n'étoient rien auprès de ces masses énormes. Les Pyrénées s'élèvent plus perpendiculairement, mais la grande étendue des Alpes leur donne une supériorité décidée pour la hauteur. Il y a telles montagnes dont on n'atteint le sommet qu'après une marche de cinq jours. Ces montagnes embrassent l'Italie dans la forme d'un vaste semicercle, qui ne s'ouvre que dans quelques endroits. Voici les différentes parties des Alpes et les principaux passages qu'on y trouvoit. I^ment. Les Alpes Maritimes qui commençoient dans les environs du Varus et de Nice. C'étoit à Savone (Vada Sabatia), que l'Apennin, après avoir partagé tout l'intérieur de l'Italie, venoit s'unir aux Alpes.

Clav. Ital. Ant. l. i. c. 30, 31, 32. Berg. Grands Chemins, l. ii. c. 31, 32, 33.

La

La Voie Aurélienne, qui cotoyoit toujours la mer depuis Rome jusques dans les Gaules, traversoit ces montagnes. II^ment. Les Alpes Cottiennes, qui étoient séparées de la mer par les Alpes maritimes. C'étoit le royaume de Cottius dont Segusio (Suze) étoit la capitale. Ces montagnes s'étendoient en largeur depuis cette ville jusqu' à Briançon (Brigantium). C'est auprès de la première de ces villes qu'on trouve le mont Cenis (Mons Matrona). Pompée osa le premier le passer. Cottius travailla beaucoup à rendre ce chemin plus facile et plus assuré. La nature et l'art le rendirent bientôt, ce qu'il est encore, la grande route de l'Italie dans les Gaules, le passage le plus fréquenté des empereurs, des armées et des voyageurs. Il reçut même dans la basse Latinité, le nom distingué de Strata Romana. III^ment. Les Alpes Grecques. La fable du passage d'Hercule lui valut ce nom. C'étoit le petit St. Bernard, et la Tarantaise. Il paroît qu'un Ideonnus, roi barbare assez peu connu, régnoit dans ces montagnes du tems d'Auguste. IV^ment. Les Alpes Pennines, qui s'étendoient depuis les Alpes Grecques jusqu'aux sources du Rhône et du Rhin. Il y a beaucoup d'apparence qu' Hannibal les traversa pour entrer en Italie, mais il n'y en a aucune qu'il leur ait donné le nom de sa nation (Pœninæ de Pœni). Pour y trouver ce nom, il faut corrompre celui des montagnes elles-mêmes. C'est aussi ce qu'ont fait plusieurs des anciens. La vallée un peu au-delà des Alpes Pennines, et qui est traversée par le Rhône, s'appelloit la Vallée Pennine (Vallis Pennina). Il se nomme nomme encore le Valais. Au milieu de ces montagnes, l'on trouvoit le passage célèbre, qu'on appelloit le Summus Penninus ou le Mons Sovis; c'est le grand St. Bernard. Les deux grands chemins qui traversoient les Alpes Grecques et les Alpes Pennines se réunissoient à Augusta Prætoria, (Aost) à l'entrée du pays des Salassi ou du Val d'Aost. V^ment^. Les Alpes Rhétiques ou Tridentines. Il y avoit deux grands passages, l'un qui partoit de Milan et qui passoit par Comum et Curia (Coire) jusqu'à Brigantium, (Bergent,) et l'autre qui alloit de Vérone à Tridentinum (Trente) et Augusta Vindelicorum (Augsbourg). Le fameux Mont Adula étoit parmi ces Alpes. Mais des anciens qui en ont parlé, les uns ont décrit une haute montagne auprès des sources du Rhin, et les autres une suite de montagnes dont la situation est assez incertaine. VI^ment^. Les Alpes Noriques, Carniques, Pannoniques, ou Juliennes. C'étoit ce contour qui embrassoit la Venetia. Un grand chemin partoit d'Aquileia, traversoit le mont Ocra, et s'étendoit jusqu'à Nauportum et Sirmio dans la Pannonie.

Padus. On connoît toutes les fables brillantes et absurdes dont les anciens ont orné l'histoire de ce fleuve: le téméraire Phaëthon qui y fut précipité, ses sœurs qui furent changées en peupliers et qui distilloient de l'ambre. Cette fable étoit connue depuis long tems, mais sa source ne l'étoit pas autant. Les Grecs tiroient l'ambre des bords de la mer Baltique vers l'embouchure de la Vistule, qui vient d'être augmentée par les eaux d'une rivière considérable que les gens du pays appellent Rodaune, Rodaune, Raddaune, Raddune et Reddune, selon leurs dialectes différentes. Le Po s'appelloit aussi l'Eridan. Voilà le fondement géographique de tant de fictions et de la confusion de deux fleuves aussi éloignés l'un de l'autre. Quelle ignorance! Mais ce n'est pas tout. Le nom du Rhône (Rhodanus) n'est pas fort différent de ceux-ci: c'étoit assez pour établir leur identité dans l'esprit paresseux des Grecs, pour qui tous les pays occidentaux étoient un monde inconnu ou fabuleux. On peut remarquer cependant une progression de lumière. Pour les premiers Grecs, le Po, le Rhône, et la Vistula n'étoient qu'un même fleuve. Ils connurent à la fin leurs erreurs. Ils apprirent que le premier se déchargeoit dans la Mer Adriatique, le second dans la Méditerranée, et la troisième dans la Mer Baltique. Ne pouvant nier que les embouchures ne fussent différentes, ils voulurent soutenir qu'ils partoient de la même source et qu'ils avoient les mêmes propriétés. Les Grecs se seroient cependant détrompés plutôt s'ils n'avoient pas préféré leurs poëtes à leurs historiens. Hérodote avoit des idées fort justes sur l'Eridan. Il reconnoît qu'il ne parle de ces pays éloignés que sur des ouis-dire, mais il sait fort bien que l'Eridan, le fleuve de l'ambre, ne se décharge que dans la mer du Nord.

V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiqua, l. i. c. 34.

Le Po sort de trois sources au pied du Mont Vesulus, et tombant avec fracas au bas d'un précipice, il coule pendant trois milles sans avoir de lit bien marqué, mais ayant déjà assez d'eau pour faire aller des moulins. C'est alors qu'il se perd sous terre; il paroît encore au bout de deux milles, et devient bientôt un fleuve considérable par le grand grand nombre de rivières qui s'y jettent. Pline en compte trente, mais Cluvier a poussé ce nombre jusqu'à quarante.

Padi Ostia. Voici les principales circonstances qui les regardent. 1. Il y en avoit deux bras plus considérables que les autres. Le premier s'appelloit Padusa, Eridanus et ostium Spineticum d'une ville ancienne qui y étoit située. Il paroît que les anciens le regardoient comme le véritable Po, et ils lui donnent quelquefois ce nom tout simplement. L'autre se nommoit Volana ou Bolana. 2. Il y avoit encore deux bras du Po entre ceux-là, le Sagis et le Caprasium. 3. Toutes ces embouchures étoient l'ouvrage de la nature. Mais les habitans du pays, qui étoient intéressés à retenir dans son lit cette rivière fougueuse, lui en creusèrent de nouveaux. Parmi ces canaux artificiels, qu'on attribut aux Toscans, on peut en distinguer trois : Fossa Asconis, ensuite Augusti, qui communiquoit de la Padusa à Ravenne ; Fossa Carbonuria au-delà de la Volana, et Fossæ Philistinæ qui étoient encore plus au nord. Ce dernier canal, grossi par les eaux du Tartarus, est devenu aujourd'hui le Po, et tous le pays entre ces embouchures qui étoit anciennement au nord du Po est réputé aujourd'hui au midi de ce fleuve. 4. Voilà les sept embouchures du Po. Leurs débordemens fréquens ne faisoient qu'un vaste marais de tout ce canton, marais coupé dans sa largeur par les fossés de Néron, et auquel on avoit donné le nom des Septem Maria. Ce titre s'étoit cependant étendu sur tous les environs au-delà du Po et jusqu'à Altinum ;

tinum; l'Athésis, et les deux Méduacus l'inondoient de la même manière, et pendant cent vingt milles, de Ravenne jusqu'à Altinum, l'on ne voyoit que le même marais, sur lequel l'on voyageoit avec plus de sûreté que de vîtesse.

Plin. Hist. Nat. l. ii. c. 103.

MINCIUS. Le Mincius traverse le Benacus, l'Addua le lac Larius, et le Rhône le lac Leman, sans y mêler leurs eaux parcequ' elles sont plus légères.

BENACUS.

Virgil. Georgic. l. ii. 160.

An mare, quod supra, memorem, quodque alluit infra?
Anne lacus tantos? te, Lari maxime, teque
Fluctibus et fremitû assurgens, Benace, marino?

LARIUS. Pline avoit deux maisons de campagnes auprès de ce lac. L'une, située sur une hauteur, dominoit sur tout le lac. L'autre étoit au milieu des eaux, bâtie sur une levée de terre comme les maisons de Baies. L'une et l'autre avoient des agrémens différens.

Strabon. Geog. l. iv. p. 141, 143.

SALASSI. Ce peuple remplissoit le Val d'Aost, pays étroit dans les gorges des Alpes. Ils étoient maîtres du passage du mont St. Bernard; ils n'usoient de cet avantage que pour dépouiller les voyageurs et pour harceler des armées entières en se plaçant en ambuscade dans les défilés. Ils obligèrent Decimus Brutus, qui se retiroit de Modène, de payer son passage à un denier par soldat; ils osèrent même piller quelques bagages d'Auguste. Cette témérité leur coûta cher. Ce prince fit prendre la nation entière, et la fit vendre à Eporedia, au nombre de 36,000 ames, parmi lesquelles il y avoit 8000 hommes en état de porter les armes. Il y avoit y avoit dans leur pays quelques mines d'or, dans lesquelles ils faisoient passer les eaux de la Duria, qu'ils saignoient pour cet effet, ce qui leur attiroit (aussi bien qu'aux fermiers qui les prirent ensuite) beaucoup de disputes avec les habitans du plat pays. Agrippa fit faire deux grands chemins qui partoient d'Augusta Prætoria, et qui se réunissoient à Lyon; l'une, qui passoit par les Alpes Pennines, (le grand St. Bernard,) étoit plus courte, (quant à la montagne,) mais il étoit difficile au point de n'être praticable que pour les chevaux. L'autre traversoit le pays des Centrones (la Tarantaise.) Il étoit plus long mais beaucoup plus facile.

Taurisci. Ce peuple, subjugué sans peine par Tibère, habitoit des montagnes stériles. La nécessité les força de faire des courses dans les campagnes, mais la politique leur enseignoit d'épargner les laboureurs pour ne point tarir la source de leurs brigandages. Strab. Geog. l. iv. p. 143.

Salassi. Il y a encore dans le Val d'Aost des mines d'or et des paillettes dans les rivières. A l'arsenal de Turin l'on nous a montré un morceau de marbre tiré de ces carrières, et qui contenoit beaucoup d'or. Il n'y a qu'une soixantaine d'années qu'on a recommencé à exploiter ces mines, dont on tire tous les ans environ deux cens marcs d'or.

Sect. IV.

TRANSPADANA.

V. Plin. Histor. Nat. ii. 17.

Le nom et la formation de cette province sont purement Romains. Il est difficile d'en marquer précisément les limites qui se perdoient dans les Alpes. Voici celles qu'on peut trouver dans Pline. Elle étoit composée de plusieurs nations Celtiques et Liguriennes. 1. Les Insubres, qui possédoient Milan et Laus Pompeii (Lodi). 2. Les Orobii, les habitans de Bergomum et de Comum ou Novocomum. 3. Les Lævi, ceux de Picenum (Pavie) et Novaria (Novarre). 4. Les Libici, ceux de Vercellæ et Laumillum. Ces quatre peuples étoient Celtiques; ils passèrent les Alpes vers l'an 600 avant Jésus Christ. 5. Les Taurini, nation Ligurienne, qui habitoient Augusta Taurinorum, (Turin) et Forum Vibii. 6. Les Salassi, qui occupoient le Val d'Aost. Les Romains y avoient bâti Augusta Prætoria (Aost), et Eporedia (Yvrée). Les Romains avoient encore détaché du royaume de Cottius Segusio, (Suze,) pour y envoyer une colonie. Nous avons déjà vu les Salassi parmi les habitans des Alpes. Il paroît que Pline n'a pas dû étendre la Transpadana jusqu'à Spina et l'embouchure du Po; et que M. Deslisle auroit pu laisser Bergomum à cette province.

Raudius Campus. Ces plaines sont fameuses par la défaite des Cimbres: mais on est réduit à conjecturer leur situation. Claudien compare la victoire de Stilicon sur les Goths à celle de Marius, et dit que les mêmes lieux ont été deux fois fatals aux barbares, et que la postérité confondra les ossemens des deux peuples et la gloire des deux généraux. Claudien étoit contemporain de Stilicon; on peut hardiment en conclurre que les deux champs de bataille n'étoient pas fort éloignés l'un de l'autre, mais je doute qu'il faille prendre ses expressions à la rigueur. Nous savons que les Cimbres ayant débouché dans la Lombardie par les gorges du Trentin, ont passé l'Adige, mais il ne paroît point qu'ils ayent traversé le Po. Un bourg nommé Rubio, situé entre Lomello, Novarra, et Vercelles, conviendroit assez par son nom et son emplacement aux Campi Raudii. Les Cimbres à la vérité n'auront point suivi le chemin de la capitale; mais Hannibal l'a-t-il fait? Ces barbares auront voulu subjuguer les Gaulois; ils cherchoient à les faire soulever. Les bords du Po étoient gardés avec assez de soin pour les obliger à remonter le fleuve pour y chercher un gué. Les délices de ce pays les amollissoient et les captivoient. Ce Rubio n'est pas trop éloigné de Pollentia pour contenir l'imagination d'un poëte qui débute par une proximité réelle, et qui passe, sans s'en appercevoir, à des circonstances qui supposent faussement une identité de lieux. Je pense que c'est là, la clef du passage de Claudien; ne le seroit-elle pas aussi des Philippi de Virgile?

et

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. 18. p. 139. c. 23. p. 234.

Laus Pompeii. Cette ville, qui peut avoir reçu son nom de Cn. Pompeius Strabon, s'appelloit souvent Laus tout court; c'est de son datif Laudi qu'on a formé le Lodi d'aujourd'hui. Dans le moyen age, on confondit tous les cas de la langue Latine, et rien n'étoit si commun surtout que de servir du datif au lieu du nominatif.

Idem, l. i. c. 24. p. 242.

Velleius Pat. l. i. c. 15. Cluvier. Ital. Ant. l. i. c. 13. p. 96.

EPOREDIA. Elle étoit colonie Romaine, fondée sous le sixième consulat de Marius A. U. C. 653. Velleius se montre ici aussi mauvais chronologiste que géographe peu exact. 1. Eporedia étoit dans le pays des Salassi et non point dans celui des Vagienni. 2. Il n'y avoit que dix-huit ans entre les consulats de Marcius et de Marius. Cluvier a rélevé ces bévues. J'y ajoute une troisième, qui renverse la correction de ce savant. Velleius compte 153 ans depuis le consulat de Marcius à celui de Vinicius. Il n'y en avoit que 147.

Ausonius de claris Urbibus. Il comptoit Milan pour la sixième après Rome, Constantinople, Antioche, Carthage, et Treves: pourquoi oublier Alexandrie?

MEDIOLANUM.

Et Mediolani mira omnia; copia rerum;
Innumeræ cultæque domus; fæcunda virorum
Ingenia; antiqui mores. Tum duplice muro
Amplificata loci species, populique voluptas
Circus, et inclusi moles cuneata theatri.
Templa Palatinæque arces, opulensque Moneta;
Et regio Herculei celebris sub honore lavacri,
Cunctaque marmoreis ornata peristyla signis,
Mœniaque in valli formam circumdata labro.
Omnia quæ magnis operum velut æmula formis
Excellunt, nec juncta premit vicinia Romæ.

SECT. V.

LIGURIA.

IL paroît, par un trait conservé par Plutarque et expliqué par Freret, que les Ligures étoient d'origine d'origine Ambrone ou Ombrienne. Les anciens ont nié ou reconnu leur affinité aux Celtes, selon qu'ils ont envisagé la chose sous un point de vue prochain ou éloigné. Les anciens Grecs les nommoient Λιγυες et Λιγοστικη, mais les écrivains plus récens se sont conformés au langage de leurs maîtres. La perfidie, l'adresse, et une dureté de tempérament qui tenoit du prodige, distinguoient ce peuple barbare. On y a vu des femmes, qui travailloient dans les champs, accoucher et l'instant après retourner à leur ouvrage. On peut considérer les bornes de ce peuple sous trois états différens. 1. Les premiers Grecs, qui avoient des notions très imparfaites sur la géographie de l'occident, donnoient le nom générique de Ligures à tous les peuples maritimes entre l'Etrurie et l'embouchure du Rhône; peut-être même qu'avant l'arrivée des Marseillois les Ligures s'étoient répandus dans la Gaule Narbonnoise, et qu'ils y avoient laissé des colonies. Si Florus étoit plus exact, on appuyeroit cette conjecture de son autorité, puisque cet historien nomme les Salyes, les Deceates, et les Oxybii, parmi les nations Liguriennes. 2. Quand les Romains attaquèrent les Ligures, ils étoient plus redoutables par leur bravoure que par l'étendue de leur pays. Ils occupoient seulement ces territoires qui sont entre l'Apennin, la mer, le Varus et l'Arnus, c'est à dire ceux qui composent aujourd'hui les républiques de Gènes et de Lucques et la principauté de Massa Carrara. 3. Les Romains subjuguèrent les Ligures; ils transportèrent les Apuani, habitans du pays, entre la Macra et l'Arnus, Cluvier. Ital. Antiqua, l. 1. c. 7, 8. p. 46. 61.

nus, dans le royaume de Naples, et ils ajoutèrent leur territoire à l'Etrurie. Du coté de la Gaule ils conservèrent à peu près les anciennes limites; mais ils l'agrandirent beaucoup du côté du nord en la poussant jusqu'aux bords du Po. Telle étoit la nouvelle Ligurie, l'une des onze régions du partage d'Auguste. Strabon l'a confondu un peu avec l'ancienne. On peut remarquer que la Ligurie étoit comprise dans la province de la Gaule Cisalpine.

Cluvier. l. i. c. 9. p. 63, 64.

MONŒCI PORTUS. Quelques savans ont imaginé que c'étoit Ville Franca; mais l'ancien nom, qui s'est presque conservé, la nature du port, qui n'étoit fait que pour les petits vaisseaux, et les distances marquées dans les Itinéraires, ont convaincu Cluvier que Monaco étoit le veritable Portus Herculis Monœci.

LIGURES.

Virgil. Æneid. l. x. 185.

Non ego te, Ligurum ductor, fortissime bello, Transierim Cyene, et paucis comitate, Cupavo,
Cujus olorinæ surgunt de vertice pennæ,
Crimen amor vestrum, formæque insigne paternæ.

Idem, xi. 715.

Vane Ligur, frustraque animis elate superbis,
Nequicquam patrias tentâsti lubricus artes.

Juvenal. Satir. iii. 257.

Nam si procubuit qui saxa Ligustica portat
Axis, et eversum fudit super agmina montem,
Quid superest de corporibus?————

Cicero in Rull. Orat. ii. 35.

Ligures montani, duri, atque agrestes. Docuit ager ipse nihil ferendo, nisi multâ culturâ et magno labore quæsitum.

Plin. Natur. Hist. xiv. 6.

GENUA. Le meilleur vin de toute la Ligurie croissoit dans les environs de Gènes.

DERTONA.

DERTONA. Dertona, (Tortone,) étoit une colonie Romaine. L'époque de sa fondation est incertaine. Vell. Pater. l. i. c. 14.

POLLENTIA.

——————— fuscique ferax Pollentia villi. Sil. Italic. Punic. viii. 599.

LIGURES, VAGENNI.

Tum pernix Ligus, et sparsi per saxa Vagenni, Idem. viii. 607.
In decus Hannibalis duros misere nepotes.

LIGURES. Les Ligures étoient un peuple pasteur qui ne vivoit que de lait, et d'une boisson tirée de l'orge. Leurs montagnes fournissoient beaucoup de bois de construction, et d'autres bois tachetés dont on faisoit des tables très à la mode à Rome. On voyoit des arbres que avoient huit pieds de diamètre. Ils portoient ces bois à Gènes avec leur bétail, des peaux et du miel, pour les échanger contre l'huile et les vins d'Italie. Strabo. Geo. l. iv. p. 140.

SECT. VI.

ETRURIA.

DE toutes les régions de l'Italie, celle-ci avoit le plus de rapport aux anciennes limites des peuples. L'Etrurie, avant la conquête des Romains, étoit bornée par l'Arnus et la mer; le Tibre formoit sa frontière jusqu'à Tifernum Tiberinum; depuis cette ville jusqu'aux sources de l'Arnus c'étoit l'Apennin. Auguste ajouta seulement à l'Etrurie le pays entre l'Arnus et la Macra, c'est à dire le canton qu'avoient occupé les Apuani Liguriens, et la ville de Pise avec son territoire; Cluv. Italia Antiq. l. ii. c. 1. p. 419. 455.

encore Pise étoit-elle une ancienne possession des Etrusques que les Liguriens leur avoient enlevée. La ville de Luna, à la vérité, située sur la rive Ligustique de la Macra, étoit censée dans la région d'Etrurie.

Etrusci. Voici le précis de ce qu'on peut dire des Etrusques. 1. Les Grecs les appelloient Tyrrheni, et Tyrseni; les Romains les nommoient Hetrusci, Etrusci, Thusci, et Tusci; quoique leurs poëtes se servent souvent des noms Grecs. Leur pays portoit constamment parmi les Romains le nom d'Etruria; celui de Tuscia n'est point aussi ancien. L'abbréviateur Florus est le premier qui l'employe, mais dans le moyen age il devint fort usité. 2. L'origine de cette nation célèbre est très obscure. L'opinion d'Hérodote, qui les fait venir de la Lydie, ne peut convenir qu'aux poëtes. Denys d'Halicarnasse la combat très solidement. Selon ce critique judicieux, le corps Etrusque a été formé par le mélange de deux nations, les Tyrrhéniens et les Pélasges. Nous connoissons les Pélasges: c'étoient les Grecs encore barbares et qui n'ont point fait partie du corps Hellénique, mais qui étoient les Tyrrhéniens, une nation indigène. C'est la réponse qu'on nous fait, mais elle n'est guères satisfaisante. 3. L'histoire de ce peuple seroit curieuse; on croit qu'il a inventé l'art augurale, la trompette, et les ornemens des magistrats. Leurs artisans et leurs musiciens étoient renommés, ils ont eu l'empire de la mer, et l'on a soupçonné que l'Amérique ne leur étoit pas inconnue. Sous la fin de leur grandeur leurs mœurs se sont corrompues.

rompues. Ils ont donné l'exemple d'un luxe et d'une mollesse dont on peut voir les détails dans Athénée et Diodore de Sicile. 4. Les Etrusques se sont répandus fort au-delà des bornes de leurs pays, dans la Campanie et jusqu'à l'embouchure du Po, et dans la Rhétie. Il paroît même que les Grecs ont donné le nom de Tyrrhéniens à tous les peuples de la mer inférieure depuis Pise jusqu'au détroit de Messine. Je conviens qu'il en faut rabattre quelque chose pour l'ignorance des étrangers qui ne connoissoient sur toute cette côte que la nation principale. 5. Les Etrusques étoient divisés en douze cités, qui se réunissoient toujours dans une assemblée générale et quelquefois sous un dictateur commun. Voici les cités: 1. Cære ou Agylla; 2. Veii; 3. Falerii; 4. Tarquinii; 5. Volsinii; 6. Rusellæ; 7. Vetulonii; 8. Volaterra; 9. Clusium; 10. Perusia; 11. Cortona; 12. Aretium. Aucun ancien n'a fait ce dénombrement. C'est Cluvier qui l'a formé sur les passages souvent équivoques de plusieurs écrivains.

LUNA.

Tum quos a niveis exegit Luna metallis,
Insignis portû; quo non spatiosior alter
Innumeras cepisse rates, et claudere pontum.

Sil. Italic. Punic. viii. 482.

Advehimur celeri candentia mœnia lapsû,
Nominis et auctor sole corusca soror.
Indigenis superat candentia lilia saxis,
Et levi radiat picta nitore silex.
Dives marmoribus tellus; quæ luce coloris
Provocat intactas luxuriosa nives.

Cl. Rutilii Numatiani Iter, l. ii. 63.

Le vin des environs de Luna étoit le meilleur de toute l'Etrurie. Plin. Hist. Nat. xiv. 6.

LUCUS

Cluv. Ital. Ant. l. ii. c. 2. p. 460.

LUCUS FERONIÆ. Cet endroit se trouve entre Luna et Pisa. Il y en avoit un autre du même nom auprès du mont Soracte, et un troisième dans Latium à trois milles de Terracine. Cette déesse étoit certainement Etrusque, mais son culte s'étoit bien répandu dans les pays voisins.

PISÆ, &c.

Virg. Æn. x. 175.

Tertius ille hominum divûmque interpres Asylas,
Cui pecudum fibræ, cœli cui sidera parent,
Et linguæ volucrum, et præsagi fulminis ignes,
Mille densos rapit acie, atque horrentibus hastis.
Hos parere jubent Alpheæ ab origine Pisæ
Urbs Etrusca solo ———

Cl. Rutilii Numatiani Iter, lib. i. 527.

Inde Triturritam petimus ; sic villa vocatur
Quæ latet expulsis insula pæne fretis,
Namque manû junctis procedit in æquora saxis,
Quique domum posuit, condidit ante solum.
Contiguum stupui portum, quem fama frequentat
Pisarum emporio divitiisque maris.
Mira loci facies; pelago pulsatur aperto,
Inque omnes ventos litora nuda patent;
Non ullus legitur per brachia tuta recessus
Æolias possit qui prohibere minas.
Sed procera suo prætexitur alga profundo
Molliter offensæ non nocitura rati.
Et tamen insanas cedendo interligat undas,
Nec sinit ex alto grande volumen agi.

— — —

Id. i. 559.

Puppibus ergo meis fidâ in statione relictis,
Ipse vehor Pisas, quà solet ire pedes.

— — —

Id. i. 565.

Alpheæ veterem contemplor originis urbem
Quam cingunt geminis Arnus et Auser aquis,
Conum pyramidis coeuntia flumina ducunt,
Intratur modico frons patefacta solo.

Sed

Sed proprium retinet communi in gurgite nomen,
Et pontum solus scilicet Arnus adit,
Ante diu quam Trojugena fortuna penates
Laurentinorum regibus insereret.
Elide deductas suscepit Etruria Pisas, Nominis indicio testificata genus.

Les Pisans offrirent des terres au sénat, pour y envoyer une colonie Latine. Ils souhaitoient d'avoir une garnison contre leurs voisins, les Liguriens. Le sénat les en remercia, et nomma des triumvirs pour cette commission, A. U. C. 572. Elle fut exécutée, puisque nous voyons dans la suite que Pise est traitée de colonie. Tit. Liv. xl. 43.

L'Auser tomboit autrefois dans l'Arnus à Pise. On ne sait pas le tems auquel cette rivière (Le Serchio) s'est frayé un nouveau lit qui le conduit en droiture à la mer. Le ruisseau Osari, qui coule dans le marais entre l'Arno et le Serchio, conserve un peu l'ancien nom. M. Delisle a tort de donner à l'Auser le cours moderne du Serchio. Pise est placée à la jonction de l'Arnus et de l'Auser; le choc est si violent qu'on ne peut point voir de l'un à l'autre bord. Cependant ces rivières ne se débordent point. Cluv. Ital. Ant. l. ii. c. 2. p. 462. Dans sa carte de l'ancienne Italie. Strabon. Geog. l. v. p. 154.

Les Pyliens de Pise, sujets de Nestor, furent jettés par une tempête sur les côtes de l'Etrurie à leur retour de Troye. Ils bâtirent Pise, qui devint une ville très florissante, et un grand port de mer. Du tems de Strabon elle se soutenoit encore, mais avec peine. Les Romains l'avoient fort embelli; ils avoient rempli tous ses environs d'un grand nombre de maisons de campagne qui ressembloient aux palais des rois de Perse.

LUNA.

Strabon. Geog. l. v. p. 153.

LUNA. Le port de Luna étoit magnifique; une vaste baye, qui renfermoit un grand nombre de petits golfes particuliers. Dans tous l'eau étoit profonde jusqu'au rivage. On employoit beaucoup de marbre de Luna dans les bâtimens de Rome à cause de sa beauté et de la facilité du transport. Il y en avoit de blanc et d'une couleur qui tiroit sur un verd foncé.

Strabon. Geog. l. v. p. 156.

ETRURIA. Les côtes d'Etrurie s'étendoient de Luna à Ostie, 2500 stades selon Strabon, et 1430 seulement selon Polybe. Sa largeur étoit d'environ la moitié. Elle étoit fertile selon cet auteur. Ses lacs ne contribuoient pas peu à sa richesse, par le poisson, le gibier, et le papyrus qu'on en tiroit.

Cluv. Italia Antiq. l. ii. c. ii. p. 468.

HERCULIS LIBURNI PORTUS. C'est la Livourne d'aujourd'hui: mais est-ce l'endroit dont les Liburnes, petit bâtiment armé en guerre, a pris son nom? Il paroît que Cluvier se trompe, et qu'il est plutôt question des Liburnes, nation Illyrienne qui couroit la mer Adriatique.

Strabon. Geog. l. v. p. 154.

VOLATERRA. Elle est située dans un vallon profond, mais elle est dominée par une montagne qui a quinze stades de haut, et qui est occupée par une citadelle très forte. Elle servit d'asyle à quatre cohortes des partisans de Marius, qui s'y défendirent pendant deux ans, et ne se rendirent que sous la foi publique.

Cl. Rutilii Numatian. Iter, l. i. p. 453.

VADA VOLATERRANA.

In Volaterranum, vero vada nomine, tractum Ingressus, dubii tramitis alta lego;
Despectat proræ custos, clavumque sequentem
Dirigit, et puppim voce monente regit.

Incertas

Incertas geminâ discriminat arbore fauces
Defixasque offert limes uterque sudes.

— — —

Vix tuti domibus sævos toleravimus imbres. Cl. Rutilii Numa. Iter, l. i. 465.
Albini patuit proxima villa mei.

— — —

Subjectas villæ vacat adspectare salinas, Id. i. 475.
Namque hoc censetur nomine salsa palus
Quà mare terrenis declive canalibus intrat,
Multifidosque lacus parvula fossa rigat.
Ast ubi flagrantes admovit Sirius ignes,
Cum pallent herbæ, cum sitit omnis ager,
Tum cataractarum claustris excluditur æquor.
Ut fixos latices horrida duret humus,
Concipiunt acrem nativa coagula Phœbum,
Et gravis æstivo crusta calore coit.

Populonium. Populonium fut détruit par les troupes de Sylla, après avoir soutenu un siège. Du tems de Strabon il n'en restoit que des temples et quelques maisons. Cette ville étoit située sur un promontoire très élevé, d'où ce géographe découvrit les îles de Sardaigne, de Corse, et d'Ilva. Le port des Populoniens, qui étoit au bas de la montagne, subsista toujours, et étoit fort frequenté. Strabon. Geog. l. v. p. 154.

Proxima securum reserat Populonia litus, Rutilii Iter, l. i. v. 401.
Quà naturalem ducit in arva sinum.
Non illic positas extollit in æthera moles,
Lumine nocturno conspicienda Pharos,
Sed speculam validæ rupis sortita vetustas.
Quà fluctus domitos arduus urguet apex,
Castellum geminos hominum fundavit in usus
Præsidium terris, indiciumque fretis.
Adgnosci nequeunt ævi monumenta prioris
Grandia consumpsit mœnia tempus edax;

Sola

Sola manent interceptis vestigia muris,
Ruderibus latis tecta sepulta jacent.

Virgil. Æn. x. 166.

Massicus æratâ princeps secat æquora Tigri,
Sub quo mille manus juvenum, qui mœnia Clusî
Quique urbem liquere Cosas; queis tela, sagittæ
Corytique leves humeris, et letifer arcus;
Unà torvus Abas; huic totum insignibus armis
Agmen, et aurato fulgebat Apolline puppis.
Sexcentos illi dederat Populonia mater
Expertos belli juvenes ———

Cluv. Ital. Ant. l. ii. c. 2. p. 472.

VETULONII. On voit encore de beaux restes de cette ville ancienne entre les ruines de Populonium et la tour de St. Vincent à trois milles de la mer.

Sil. Italic. Pun. l. viii. p. 485.

Mæoniæque decus quondam Vetulonia gentis,
Bis senos hæc prima dedit præcedere fasces,
Et junxit totidem tacito terrore secures.
Hæc altas eboris decoravit honore curules,
Et princeps Tyrio vestem prætexuit ostro;
Hæc eadem pugnas accendere protulit ære.

UMBRO FL.

Cl. Numatiani Rutilii Iter, l. i. 337.

Tangimus Umbronem; non est ignobile flumen,
Quod toto trepidas excipit ore rates,
Tam facilis pronis semper patet alveus undis
In pontum quoties sæva procella ruit.

FALESIA.

Id. l. i. 371.

Laxatum cohibet vicina Falesia cursum
Quanquam vix medium Phœbus haberet iter,
Et tum forte hilares per compita rustica pagi
Mulcebant sacris pectora fessa jocis,
Illo quidpe die tandem renovatus Osyris
Excitat in fruges germina læta novas.
Egressi villam petimus, lucoque vagamur,
Stagna placent septo deliciosa vado.
Ludere lascivos inter vivaria pisces
Gurgitis inclusi laxior unda sinit.

COSA, PORTUS HERCULIS ET MONS ARGENTARIUS. Cosa étoit situé sur une montagne; plus bas l'on voyoit le port d'Hercule, à côté d'un étang d'eau salée et peu éloigné d'un promontoire. Strab. Geo. l. v. p. 156. Cluv. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 2. p. 479.

Les Romains y envoyèrent une colonie sous le consulat de Fabius Vorso et de Claudius Canina, A. U. C. 480. Vell. Pater. i. 14.

Cernimus antiquas, nullo custode, ruinas,
Et desolatæ mœnia fœda Cosæ.
Ridiculam cladis pudet inter seria causam
Promere, sed risum dissimulare piget;
Dicuntur cives quondam migrare coacti
Muribus infestos deseruisse lares. Cl. Rutilii Sic. Iter, l. i. 285.

— — —

Haud procul hinc petitur signatus ab Hercule portus. Id. l. i. 293.

— — —

Tenditur in medias mox Argentarius undas, Id. l. i. 315.
Ancipitique jugo cærula curva premit:
Transversos colles bis ternis millibus artat
Circuitû ponti ter duodena patet.
Vix circumvehimur sparsæ dispendia rupis,
Nec sinuosa gravi cura labore caret,
Mutantur toties vario spiramina flexû,
Quæ modo profuerant, vela repente nocent.

CENTUMCELLÆ. Pline le jeune vit le port que Trajan y faisoit faire. Des deux grandes jettées qui devoient le composer l'une étoit achevée. L'on travailloit à l'autre. On construisoit à l'entrée du port une île artificielle, qui commençoit déjà à paroître. Cet ouvrage de Trajan étoit très utile pour toute la côte qui étoit dépourvue de ports. Il devoit porter le nom de son fondateur: mais il conserva toujours celui de Centumcellæ. Du tems de Procope, Plin. jun. Epist. vi. 31.

Procope, dans le sixième siècle, cette ville étoit grande, florissante, et très peuplée.

Claud. Rut. Iter, l. i. 237.
Ad Centumcellas forti deflexímus austro,
Tranquilla puppes in statione sedent.
Id. i. 239.
Molibus æquoreum concluditur amphitheatrum,
Angustosque aditus insula facta tegit.
Attollit geminas turres bifidoque meatû,
Faucibus artatis pandit utrumque latus.
Nec posuisse satis laxo navalia portû,
Ne vaga vel tutas ventilet aura rates.
Interior medias sinus invitatus in ædes
Instabilem fixis aëra nescit aquis.

CASTRUM NOVUM.

Id. i. 227.
Stringimus absumtum fluctûque et tempore castrum;
Index semiruti porta vetusta loci.
Præsidet exigui formatus imagine saxi,
Qui pastorali nomina fronte gerit,
Multa licet priscum nomen deleverit ætas;
Hoc Inui Castrum fama fuisse putat.

Serv. ad Æneid. l. v. 775.
Servius est du même sentiment que Rutilius. Mais il y a un autre Castrum auprès d'Ardea, qui paroît aux yeux de Cluvier le véritable Castrum Inui. La question est obscure; mais comme elle l'étoit un peu moins au quinzième siècle, j'aime mieux m'en rapporter à ces deux auteurs. Les vers de Virgile sur lesquels Cluvier se fonde sont très obscurs. On ne voit point pourquoi le poëte a donné la préférence à des lieux peu considérables et presqu'ignorés. D'ailleurs, Fidènes et Nomentum sont dans le pays des Sabins, au-delà des limites de l'ancien Latium. Si le poëte a voulu insinuer que les rois d'Albes pousseroient plus loin leurs conquêtes; quêtes; leurs armes n'auroient-elles pas pu pénétrer dans l'Etrurie?

Cluv. Ital. Ant. l. ii. c. 2. p. 488.

GRAVISCÆ. Graviscæ est situé au bord de la mer. Il ne peut donc pas être Corneto. Les Romains y envoyèrent une colonie la même année qu'à Aquileia A. U. C. 571. Cluv. Ital. Ant. p. 484. Vell. Pater. i. 15.

——— Intempestæque Graviscæ. Virg. Æn. x. 184.

——— Veteres misere Graviscæ. C. Sil. Ital. Punic. viii. 475.

Paulisper litus fugimus Minione vadosum,
Suspecto trepidant ostia parva solo.
Inde Graviscarum fastigia rara videmus,
Quas premit æstivæ sæpe paludis odor;
Sed nemorosa viret densis vicinia lucis,
Pineaque extremis fluctuat unda fretis. Cl. Rutilii Iter, i. 279.

CÆRE, SEU AGYLLA. Cette ville (une des douze cités) étoit anciennement très puissante. Elle jouissoit d'un éloge peu commun parmi les Grecs, de n'avoir point fait le métier de corsaire, quoiqu'elle eut une marine formidable. Elle accueillit les prêtres et les Vestales pendant le siège de Rome. Les Romains récompensèrent assez mal ce trait d'amitié. Ils accordèrent aux citoyens de Cære une espèce de bourgeoisie qui ne leur étoit qu'à charge. Du tems de Strabon il ne restoit que les ruines de Cære, et les bains chauds du voisinage qui attiroient beaucoup de monde. Strab. Geo. l. v. p. 152.

Jam Cæretanos demonstrat navita fines;
Ævo deposuit nomen Agylla vetus. Cl. Rutilii Iter, i. 225.

Haud procul hinc saxo incolitur fundata vetusto
Urbis Agyllinæ sedes; ubi Lydia quondam
Gens bello præclara, jugis insedit Etruscis. Virgil. Æn. viii. 478.

Diodor. Sicul. l. xv.

PYRGI, ALSIUM, ET FREGENÆ. Pyrgi étoit le port de Cære. Denys l'ancien y fit une descente et le prit sans difficulté.

Virginius Rufus avoit une maison de campagne à Alsium où ce grand homme passa les dernières années de sa vie.

Cl. Rutilii Iter, i. 223.

Alsia prælegitur tellus, Pyrgique recessunt,
Nunc villæ grandes, oppida parva prius.

Sil. Ital. Punic. viii. 476.

Nec non Argolico dilectum litus Aleso
Alsium, et obsessæ campo squalente Fregenæ.

Virgil. Æneid. vii. 723.

La mythologie de Silius est plus exacte ici que sa géographie. Halesus, fils d'Agamemnon, vint en Italie; mais ce fut dans la Campanie qu'il régna et non dans l'Etrurie. Silius avoit mal lu son favori Virgile. Rien de plus clair que les paroles de ce poëte.

IGILIUM.

Cl. Rutil. Iter, l. i. 325.

Eminus Igilii silvosa cacumina miror.

CAPRARIA.

Idem. l. i. 439.

Processû pelagi jam se Capraria tollit:
Squalet lucifugis insula plena viris;
Ipsi se monachos Graio cognomine dicunt,
Quod soli nullo vivere teste volunt.

Strabon. Geog. l. v. p. 155.

ILVA, SEU ÆTHALIA. Cette île est fameuse dans les fables des Grecs par l'abord des Argonautes, de qui le Portus Argous avoit reçu son nom. Elle est éloignée de 300 stades du promontoire de Populonium et de la Corse. Elle étoit riche par ses mines de fer qui se reproduisoient à mesure qu'on les épuisoit. Mais on travailloit toujours ce métail à Populonium. On ne pouvoit pas le fondre dans l'île même. Fides penes auctorem.

Occurrit

Occurrit chalybum memorabilis Ilva metallis; Cl. Rutilii Iter, i. 351.
Qua nihil uberius Norica gleba tulit.
Non Biturix largo potior strictura camino,
Nec quæ Sardoo cespite massa fluit.
Plus confert populis ferri fœcunda creatrix Quam Tartessiaci glarea fulva Tagi.

——————— Ast Ilva trecentos Virgil. Æneid. x. 173.
Insula, inexhaustis chalybum generosa metallis.

Non totidem Ilva viros, sed lectos cingere ferro C. Silius Ital. Punic. viii. 616.
Armarat patrio, quo nutrit bella, metallo.

Florentia et Fæsulæ. La conséquence la plus naturelle qu'on puisse tirer des passages rassemblés par Cluvier, c'est que Florence étoit déjà considérable du tems de Sylla; que pour s'être opposée au parti du dictateur elle perdit sa liberté et ses terres; que sur ses débris le vainqueur fonda sa colonie favorite de Fæsulæ, qui n'en étoit qu'à trois milles; mais que dans la suite, Jules César, vrai partisan de Marius, établit une colonie à Florence, qui engloutit à la fin sa rivale. Cluv. Ital. Ant. l. ii. c. 3. p. 508.

Affuit et sacris interpres fulminis alis Sil. Ital. viii. 478.
Fæsulæ ———————

Tarquinii. Ce fut dans le territoire de Tarquinii, un peu avant la guerre civile de Pompée, que Fulvius Lippinus établit des pépinières de toutes sortes de plantes, et même d'animaux. Plin. Hist. Nat. viii. 52. 56.

Lacus Sabatinus. Les Romains en tiroient des revenus considérables par le poisson qu'on y prenoit, et par le papyrus qui croissoit sur ses bords. Plusieurs autres lacs de l'Etrurie avoient les mêmes avantages. Strab. Geograph. v. p. 157.

Falerii. Les peuples de Falerii s'appelloient Cluvier. Ital. Ant. l. ii. c. p. 542

Falisci et Æqui Falisci. Ils n'étoient point Tyrrhéniens, mais Pélasges. La ressemblance du nom y a fait conduire l'aventurier Halesus fils d'Agamemnon. On reconnoît que la dialecte Eolienne substituoit volontiers le F, qui leur étoit particulier, à l'aspiration des autres Grecs, et qu'elle changeoit facilement le s en r.

Spanheim, de Præstant. Numismatum Dissert. ii. p. 59.

Les Falisci conservèrent long-tems les usages des Pélasges, leurs boucliers, leurs javelots, et leur façon de déclarer la guerre. Junon étoit adorée à Falerii comme à Argos. On y voyoit pareillement des prêtresses gardiennes du temple, et des chœurs de vierges qui chantoient les louanges de la déesse dans la langue de la patrie.

Dionys. Hal. l. 1. p. 9. Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 156.

Venerat Atridae fatis agitatus Halesus
A quo se dictam terra Falisca putat.
Colla, rudes operum, præbent ferienda juvenci,
Quos aluit campis herba Falisca suis.

Ovid. Fast. l. iv. p. 567. Edit. ad usum Delphin.

Hi Fescenninas acies, æquosque Faliscos,
Hi Soractis habent arces, Flavinaque arva,
Et Cimini cum monte lacum, lucosque Capenos.

Ovid. Fast. l. i. p. 427.

Hos juxta Nepesina cohors, æquique Falisci,
Quique tuos, Flavina, focos, Sabatia quique
Stagna tenent, Ciminique lacum, qui Sutria tecta
Haud procul, et Phœbo sacrum Soracte frequentant.

Virgil. Æneid. vii. 695.

Sil. Italic. viii. 491.

SORACTE.

Vides ut alta stet nive candidum
Soracte.

Il se faisoit tous les ans un sacrifice à Apollon sur cette montagne. On y voyoit des hommes qui marchoient sans se brûler sur un bucher embrasé. Ce privilège étoit borné à un petit nombre de familles qu'on appelloit Hirpi. Le sénat les avoit avoit exemptés de la milice et des autres charges publiques.

Strab. Geog. v. p. 156. Plin. Hist. Natur. vii. 2.

FERONIA. Le temple et le bois de Feronia peu éloignés du mont Soracte étoient remplis des riches offrandes de tout le pays. Il y avoit beaucoup d'or et d'argent. Hannibal les pilla après avoir échoué dans sa tentative sur Rome. T. Liv. xxvi. ii.

VADIMONIUM. C'est un lac peu éloigné du Castellum Amerinum qui est vis-à-vis d'Ameria. Il est parfaitement rond, et ses bords sont très unis. Ses eaux sont très blanches. Elles ont une odeur de souffre et des usages dans la médecine. Nul vaisseau ne souille ses eaux sacrées, mais on y voit surnager plusieurs petites îles de différente grandeur couvertes de verdure et qui flottent çà et là au gré des vents. Pline le jeune n'avoit jamais entendu parler de ce prodige. Il admiroit donc les ouvrages de son oncle plus qu'il ne les lisoit. Plin. Secund. Epistol. vii. 20. Plin. Hist. Nat. ii. 95, 103.

FERENTINUM.

Si te grata quies et primam somnus in horam,
Delectat; si te pulvis strepitusque rotarum,
Si lædit caupona, Ferentinum ire jubebo. Horat. Flacci, Epist. i. 17.

CLUSIUM.

——————— Antiquum Romanis mœnibus horror
Clusinum vulgus; cum, Porsena magne, jubebas Nequicquam pulsos Romæ imperitare superbos. Sil. Italicus, viii. 479.

Le mausolée de Porsenna avoit épuisé l'art et les trésors de Clusium. C'étoit un labyrinthe immense fait en quarré. Au milieu et aux quatre angles de ce bâtiment s'élevoient cinq pyramides de 150 pieds de haut, dont la base avoit 75 pieds de chaque côté. Elles étoient surmontées par un Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxvi. 13.

vaste couvercle de bronze, qui étoit environné d'une infinité de petites clochettes, et qui soutenoit quatre autres pyramides de 100 pieds de haut. Un troisième étage placé sur celles-ci portoit encore cinq pyramides dont Varron n'a pas osé rapporter la hauteur. Ces labyrinthes, ces pyramides, sentent bien un goût Egyptien, ou plutôt tout ce mausolée sent la fable, puisque du tems de Pline il n'en restoit plus de vestiges.

CORTONA. Il paroît que cette ville, une des plus anciennes de l'Etrurie, étoit aussi le Corythus des poëtes, nom qui désignoit quelquefois tout le pays.

Sil. Italic. viii. 474.

——— Lectos Cortona superbi
Tarchontis domus ———

VOLSINII.

Juvenal. Satir. iii. 191.

Positis nemorosa inter juga Volsiniis.

Plin. Secund. Epistol. v. 6.

TUSCI. Cette maison de Pline étoit auprès de Tifernum, (Citta de Castello) au-delà du Tibre, au pied de l'Apennin et sur la frontière de l'Umbrie. La situation n'avoit rien du commun avec les marais de l'Etrurie. On y trouvoit un bel amphithéâtre environné de beaux bois et de hautes montagnes, et partagé par le Tibre déjà navigable. Il y avoit beaucoup d'eau, le sol étoit fort et riche, et le climat des plus sains.

V. Cluv. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 3. p. 378, &c.

THRASYMENUS LACUS. Hannibal attira les Romains dans une plaine, située entre les montagnes à l'orient et le lac à l'occident. Elle n'avoit que deux débouchés, par deux defilés, fort étroits, entre le lac et la montagne. Il paroît par l'inspection du local que le premier (en venant d'Arezzo) s'appelle Ossariæ, Ossariæ, Osaia, ou Orsaia. Ce nom conserve la mémoire du carnage. L'autre défilé est au bourg de Passiniano.

TIBERIS. C'est dans l'Etrurie qu'il faut parler de ce fleuve célèbre. C'est dans cette province qu'il prend sa source; il la cotoye jusqu'à son embouchure, et les poëtes lui donnent à chaque instant l'épithète de Tuscus amnis ou de Lydius amnis. V. Cluv. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 10.

Tum reges, asperque immani corpore Tybris,
A quo post Itali fluvium cognomine Tybrim Diximus. Amisit verum vetus Albula nomen. Virgil. Æneid. l. viii. 330.

Et quem nunc gentes Tiberim noruntque timentque,
Tunc etiam pecori despiciendus eram.
Arcadis Evandri nomen tibi sæpe refertur;
Ille meas remis advena torsit aquas;
Venit et Alcides turbâ comitatus Achivâ; Albula, si memini, tunc mihi nomen erat. Ovid. Fast. l. v. p. 642.

Sed pater ingenti medios illabitur amne Albula, et immotâ perstringit mœnia ripâ. Sil. Ital. viii. 456.

—— Ego sum, pleno quem flumine cernis
Stringentem ripas et pinguia culta secantem, Cæruleus Tiberis, cælo gratissimus amnis. Virgil. Æneid. viii. 62.

Ipse triumphali redimitus arundine Tybris
Romuleis famulas classibus aptet aquas,
Atque opulenta tibi placidis commercia ripis
Devehat hinc ruris, subvehat inde maris. Cl. Rutil. Numatian. Iter, i. 151.

Le Tibre commence à être navigable à Trusiamnum dans le territoire de Perusia, et ce n'est qu'après une course de 150 milles qu'il se décharge dans la mer grossi de quarante-deux autres rivières. Il servoit à la navigation intérieure de l'Italie; on y amenoit même par terre des marchandises de Berg. Grands Chemins, l. iii. c. 44, 45, p. 786—792, et l. v. c. 4, p. 828.

l'Adriatique auxquelles on avoit fait remonter le Pisaurus. Auguste avoit fait élargir et nettoyer le lit du Tibre pour arrêter les débordemens auxquels il étoit fort sujet.

Plin. Secund. Epist. viii. 17.

Malgré le fossé par lequel Trajan avoit voulu saigner le Tibre, ce fleuve se déborda aussi bien que l'Anio. Ils inondèrent tout le plat pays et causèrent des maux affreux.

Horat. Carmin. i. 2.

Vidimus flavum Tiberim, retortis
Litore Etrusco violenter undis,
Ire dejectum monumenta regis Templaque Vestæ.

V. Cluvier. Ital. Ant. l. ii. c. 10.

Quand Pline a compté quarante-deux rivières qui se jettoient dans le Tibre, il a un peu exagéré pour justifier la supériorité de ce fleuve sur tous les autres de l'Italie; c'est par un pareil principe qu'il a diminué le nombre de celles qui se jettent dans le Po. Au lieu de quarante-deux on auroit peine à en compter treize. Les voici: la Tinia, le Clanis, le Nar, la Himella, le Farfarus, l'Allia, la Cremera, la Turia, l'Anio, Aqua Crabra, l'Almo, Aqua Ferentina. Le Clitumnus se jette dans la Tinia, comme le Velinus et le Telonius dans le Nar. L'Aqua Crabra, l'Aqua Ferentina, et la Juturna sont moins des rivières que des aqueducs et des canaux souterrains. En remontant l'Anio on trouve auprès de Tibur les sources chaudes d'Albunea, et vingt milles plus haut les trois lacs Simbrivii. Après les avoir traversé la rivière se précipite en bas une chute pour arriver à Sublaqueum, où les empereurs avoient un beau palais. De toutes ces rivières il n'y a que le Clanis, la Cremera, et la Turia qui qui appartiennent à l'Etrurie. Toutes les autres parcourent l'Umbrie, le pays des Sabins ou le Latium pour se rendre au Tibre; mais il ne faut pas les séparer.

Une inondation qui arriva l'an de Rome 768, fit penser sérieusement au sénat des moyens de les empêcher, en détournant une partie de la masse des eaux qui grossissoit le Tibre au-delà de l'étendue de son lit. Mais les représentations de plusieurs villes d'Italie, animées par leurs intérêts, et armées des superstitions populaires, firent résoudre le sénat de ne point attenter aux loix de la nature, ni aux honneurs du Tibre. On avoit proposé trois partis: 1. De détourner le cours du Clanis du Tibre dans l'Arnus. Les Florentins représentèrent que ce changement leur seroit très pernicieux. 2. De saigner le Nar par un nombre de canaux, et de laisser perdre ses eaux dans les campagnes. Les habitans d'Interamna firent sentir que ce seroit changer en marais, le canton le plus fertile de l'Italie. 3. De boucher la sortie du lac Velinus et de l'empêcher de se décharger dans le Nar. Ce lac ainsi gêné auroit inondé tout le voisinage, le peuple de Réate étoit intéressé à faire valoir cette raison. Tacit. Annal. i. 79.

—— lavat ingentem perfundens flumine sacro
Clitumnus taurum, Narque albescentibus undis
In Tybrim properans, Tiniæque inglorius humor, Et Clanis. Sil. Italic. viii. 452.

Clitumnus. Le Clitumnus sort d'une petite colline couverte d'un bois de cyprès. Sa course devient bientôt assez rapide pour se creuser un lit sur Plin. Secund. Epist. viii. 8.

sur un terrein sans pente, et pour porter des barques qui le descendent sans le secours des rames mais qui le remontent avec beaucoup de difficulté. Ses eaux claires renvoyent vivement l'image des bois qui couvrent ses bords. Un pont distingue la partie profanée d'avec les eaux sacrées. Au dessus de ce pont on peut naviguer mais on ne doit pas se baigner. On voit auprès le temple du dieu du fleuve, un bain public, et un grand nombre de beaux châteaux.

Virgil. Georg. ii. 146.

Hinc albi Clitumni greges, et maxima taurus
Victima; sæpe tuo perfusi flumine sacro
Romanos ad templa Deum duxere triumphos.

Juvenal. Satir. xii. 11.

Si res ampla domi similisque adfectibus esset;
Pinguior Hispellâ traheratur taurus, et ipsâ
Mole piger, nec finitimâ nutritus in herbâ,
Læta sed ostendens Clitumni pascua sanguis
Iret, et a grandi cervix ferienda ministro.

ANIO.

Sil. Ital. xii. 639.

Sulfureis gelidus quà serpit leniter undis
Ad genitorem Anio labens sine murmure Tybrim.

Virgil. Æneid. vii. 673.

——— Gelidumque Anienem et roscida rivis
Hernica saxa colunt.

Plin. Secund. Epist. viii. 17.

Anio, delicatissimus amnium, ideoque adjacentibus villis veluti invitatus retentusque, magnâ ex parte nemora, quibus inumbratur, et fregit et rapuit.

Horat. Carm. i. 7.

——— Domus Albuneæ resonantis,
Et præceps Anio, et Tiburni lucus, et uda Mobilibus pomaria ripis.

Virgil. Æneid. vii. 82.

——————— lucosque sub altâ
Consulit Albunea; nemorum quæ maxima, sacro

Fonte

Fonte sonat, sævamque exhalat opaca Mephitim;
Hinc Italæ gentes omnisque Oenotria tellus
In dubiis responsa petunt.

ALMO.

Est locus, in Tiberim quà lubricus influit Almo,
Et nomen magno perdit in amne minor,
Illic purpureâ canus cum veste sacerdos
Almonis, Dominam sacraque lavat aquis.

Ovid. Fast. iv. p. 580.

JUTURNA. Les anciens ont souvent confondu cette source avec le Numicus. Mais il paroît que c'étoit proprement un ruisseau qui sort du Mont Alban, qui est d'abord assez fort pour tourner des moulins, qui forme un petit lac, et qui se jette dans le Tibre sept milles plus bas que Rome.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. x. p. 722.

FERENTINUM. Voici une inscription que j'ai copiée sur une table de bronze conservée dans la Gallerie de Florence. J'y ajouterai quelques observations. J'ignore si ce monument a été publié.

L. ARRUNTIO

L. Arruntio Stella } Cos. (1)
L. Julio Marino }

XIIII K. Nov.

M. Acilius Placidus, L. Petronius Fronto IIII Vir id S. C. Ferentini (2) in Curia Ædis Mercuri scribundo adfuerunt (3), Q. Segiarnus Maecianus, T. Munnius Nomanlinus.

Quod universi V.F.T.Pomponium Bassum Clarissimum Virum (4) demandatam sibi curam ab indulgentissimo Imp. Caesare Nerva Trajano Augusto Germanico, quâ aeternati Italiae suae prospexit (5) secundum liberalitatem ejus, ita ordinare, ut omnis aetas curae ejus merito gratias agere debeat, futurumque ut tantae virtutis vir auxilio sit futurus municipio nostro. Q. O. E. R. F. P. D. E. R. I. C. Placere Conscriptis (6) legatos ex hoc ordine mitti ad T. Pomponium Bassum, clarissimum Virum, qui ab eo impetrent in clientelam amplissimae domus suae municipium nostrum recipere dignetur. (7) Patronumque se cooptari tabula hospitali incisa hoc decreto in domo suâ posita permittat, censuere.

Egerunt Legati
A. Caecilius, A. F. Quirinalis et Quirinalis F (8).

(1) Ces deux noms ne se trouvent point parmi les consuls ordinaires, sous le règne de Trajan ; ils n'étoient donc que suffecti ; mais il paroît que les villes d'Italie ne se servoient pas de la magistrature des consuls ordinaires pour désigner l'année entière. On peut peut croire que ce monument doit se placer entre l'an 97 et l'an 103 ou 104, époque où Trajan reçut le titre de Dacicus qui ne se trouve point ici.

(2) Je ne puis rien découvrir qui indique si c'est au Ferentinum de l'Etrurie ou à celui du pays des Herniques qu'il faut rapporter ce monument. Le nôtre est appellé à la vérité municipium, et je vois que M. Deslisle donne le nom de Colonie à celui qui est en Etrurie. Mais je sais en même tems qu'après que la loi Julia eut rendu inutiles toutes les distinctions de l'ancien droit Romain, ces termes sont devenus presque synonymes. Dans la Tabula de l'Italia Antiqua.

(3) Je n'ai pas besoin de remarquer combien cet usage d'assembler le sénat dans une curia consacrée auprès d'un temple, et celui de souscrire les noms des principaux qui étoient présens à un décret, étoient tous les deux empruntés de ceux du sénat Romain.

(4) Si ce Pomponius Bassus est celui de Pline, un témoignage bien plus respectable que celui du sénat de Ferentinum m'apprend qu'il étoit vraiment un homme illustre, et qu'après avoir consacré sa jeunesse à l'état dans l'exercice des premières magistratures, et dans le commandement des armées, il a su jouir de la vieillesse dans une retraite savante et tranquille. Plin. Secund. Epist. iv. 23.

(5) On peut demander quel étoit ce soin dont Bassus s'étoit si bien acquitté, mais qui est ici désigné si obscurement? Quelle étoit la prévoyance par laquelle Trajan avoit assuré l'éternité de l'Italie? Je ne vois pas à quoi ce terme pourroit se rapporter, si- non à l'encouragement du mariage ou à l'éducation des enfans. L'un ou l'autre peuvent seuls éterniser une nation. Nous savons que Trajan fut le fondateur d'un grand établissement de la dernière espèce par toute l'Italie. Bassus aura été chargé du département de Ferentinum ou peut-être de l'Etrurie, et ce détail étoit à la fois pénible et délicat. V. Muratori della Tavola Trajana di Velleia.

(6) Encore une mauvaise imitation du sénat Romain, d'autant plus mauvaise même que cette épithète n'étoit fondée que sur une circonstance arbitraire. Horace, qui s'est si bien amusé du sot orgueil du Prêteur de Fundi, auroit été assez surpris de ces airs de grandeur dans ce petit Ferentinum, le séjour du silence et de l'oubli; si toutefois c'est ce même Ferentinum. Horat. Epist. i. 17.

(7) Les relations du patron et du client sont assez connues. On sait sait que d'un côté elles supposoient la protection et l'appui et qu'elles exigeoient de l'autre le respect et la reconnoissance. L'exemple de la famille Claudia, et de leurs cliens les Lacédémoniens, fait sentir entre autres que les peuples aussi bien que les particuliers recherchoient cet appui. Mais j'ignorois qu'ils le recherchassent encore sous les empereurs; et quand je songe à la jalousie de ces princes, je suis surpris qu'ils ayent laissé aux grands de Rome des honneurs qui paroissoient leur donner un lustre et un état indépendant de leurs bienfaits.

Sueton. in Tiberio. c. 6.

(8) Au style emporté et hyperbolique de cette inscription on la croiroit du quatrième siècle, dont la manière lui ressemble mieux que celle du premier; mais l'adulation d'une bourgade est toujours exprimée d'une façon plus excessive que celle de la capitale. Le goût survit à la liberté, et l'on sent qu'un pareil style est ridicule autant qu'il est bas.

FESCENNINUM.

Horat. Epist. ii. 1.

Fescennina post hunc invecta licentia morem,
Versibus alternis opprobria rustica fudit.

SECT. VII.

URBS ROMA.

Nardini Roma Vetus, l. i. passim.

AMBITUS, MŒNIA, ET PORTÆ. On peut distinguer trois villes de Rome, dont on connoît assez précisément les limites; celle de Romulus, celle de Servius Tullius, et celle d'Aurélien. I. La ville de Romulus ne comprenoit que le mont Palatin. Sa figure quadrangulaire lui fit donner le nom d'Urbs quadrata, dont les anciens se servent quelquefois pour la désigner. Elle n'avoit que trois portes: Porta Romanula, placée vis à vis du Forum, du Capitole et de l'Asylum; Porta Mugonia, très utile à ses pasteurs, pour mener leur bétail aux aux pâturages de l'Esquilin, du Cælius, et des vallons qui les séparoient. Porta Trigonia, située à cet angle de la ville qui étoit tourné du côté de l'Aventin et du Latium. Romulus environna encore de murs le Capitole, sa forteresse, et son Asylum. On ne connoît que deux portes à cette enceinte: Porta Carmentalis, entre les rochers Tarpéïens et le Tibre. Porta Janualis, changée dans la suite en un temple de Janus. Elle étoit dans le Forum, et faisoit face à la rivière. II. La ville de Servius Tullius, qui est celle des beaux jours de la république et de l'empire. Elle comprenoit les sept collines fameuses, et s'étendoit au-delà du Tibre pour embrasser le Janiculum. On peut partager cet espace en quatre portions. 1. Une muraille qui, partant de la rivière, passoit sous les rochers escarpés du Capitole, et du mont Quirinal. Dans l'intervalle entre le fleuve et le Capitole on avoit substitué Porta Flumentana à Porta Carmentalis devenue infame et inutile depuis le malheur des Fabii. Dans celui entre le Capitole et le Quirinal, il y avoit Porta Triumphalis qui, s'ouvrant au Forum de Trajan, conduisoit les vainqueurs au Capitole. Sous le mont Quirinal, on croit pouvoir trouver Porta Catularia et Porta Salutaris. 2. Les monts Quirinal, Viminal, et Esquilin s'abaissent du côté de la campagne, avec une pente douce et presqu'insensible. Servius Tullius, voulant garantir la ville des insultes de ses voisins, fit tirer dans cette étendue, (elle étoit de sept stades,) un fossé large de cent pieds qu'il fortifia d'un bon rempart. On le traversoit par plusieurs portes, Collina, lina, Nomentana, Viminalis, Tiburtina, Esquilina, Prænestina. 3. La muraille qui joignoit l'autre extrémité du rempart à la rivière, et qui embrassoit les monts Cælius et Aventin. J'y vois, Portæ Cælimontana, Asinaria, Latina, Capena, et Tergemina. 4. La partie de l'enceinte au-delà du Tibre, qui n'embrassoit point le Vatican. Il y avoit les portes Portuensis, Janiculensis, et Septimiana. Je viens de compter dix-neuf portes. Il y avoit plusieurs dont la situation est incertaine, et d'autres dont on ignore jusqu'au nom. Pline, qui vivoit sous cette époque, en connoissoit trente-sept, sans parler de sept qui n'étoient plus en usage. Des trente-sept, douze avoient deux Jani ou arcades. III. Aurélien fit une nouvelle enceinte, pour y comprendre le Champ de Mars et quelques autres endroits. On est assez en état de la suivre pour pouvoir s'étonner de l'hyperbole extravagante de Vopiscus qui lui donne cinquante milles d'étendue. A peine peut-on recevoir le témoignage d'Olympiodorus, qui en compte vingt-et-un. Il paroît clairement que Rome n'a jamais été plus étendue qu'elle ne l'est aujourd'hui. Dans cet agrandissement on vit paroître plusieurs portes nouvelles: Aurelia, au pont Aurélien, et Porta Pinciana, sous le Collis hortulorum. Les portes Latina et Capena furent reculées, mais elles gardèrent leurs anciens noms. Tergemina devint Ostiensis; Flumentana devint Flaminia, et Collina, Salaria. Cependant comme on se voyoit quelquefois obligé de songer à la défense de la capitale, on boucha plusieurs des portes. Du tems de Procope il n'en restoit plus de qua-

torze

torze ou quinze un peu considérables. Ceux qui examinent avec attention les murailles de Rome distinguent encore les pierres informes des premiers Romains, les marbres bien travaillés dont on les construisoit sous les empereurs, et les briques malcuites dont on les réparoit dans les siècles barbares.

Pline le naturaliste avoit dit que la ville avoit trente-sept portes, et qu'en comptant douze de ces portes, chacune une fois, on trouvoit 30,765 pas à mesurer depuis le milliaire d'or dans le Forum. L'enceinte des murs de Rome étoit de 13,200 pas selon le même auteur. Comme ce passage n'est point clair il a ouvert un vaste champ aux explications, aux conjectures, et aux corrections des critiques. Une condition essentielle de toute hypothèse doit être de concilier l'incertain, les 30,765 pas, avec les 13,200. Le système du savant Freret, très naturel d'ailleurs, remplit très bien cette condition. Il envisage la ville de Rome comme un cercle dont le milliaire étoit le centre. Douze grandes rues, qui vont aboutir à autant de portes, nous donnent pour leur mesure réunis 30,765 pas. Chaque rue ou le rayon du cercle avoit donc 2,562 pas de longueur, et le diamètre étoit de 5,124 pas. Les 13,200 pas qu'on nous a donnés pour circonférence du cercle produiroient un diamètre de 4,200 pas. La différence est de 924 pas, différence peu importante et occasionnée par le grand nombre de sinuosités qu'on trouvoit dans les rues de Rome. On peut encore justifier cette hypothèse par un autre calcul. Nous connoissons la superficie de chaque région de la ville; il est aisé de tirer, de ces élémens, d'abord la superficie et ensuite la circonférence de Rome. Celle-ci se trouveroit de 13,549 pas Romains. Telle étoit l'enceinte des murs. Mais les fauxbourgs s'étendoient bien plus loin. Leur étendue étoit de 70,000 pas depuis le milliare. En continuant le même calcul nous trouverons que les grandes rues, les six diamètres, avoient chacun 11,500 pas d'étendue. Il faut croire cependant que tous ces fauxbourgs n'étoient point remplis de bâtimens, mais que les villages, les jardins, les maisons qui y étoient parsemées, faisoient douter aux étrangers s'ils étoient en ville ou à la campagne. Voilà le système de Freret; celui de M. Hume est fondé sur les mêmes principes.

Mémoires de l'Académie des Belles Lettres, tom. xxiv. p. 528—532.

Miranda. Strabon admiroit dans Rome trois choses que les Grecs avoient négligées, les grands chemins, les aqueducs, et les cloaques. Ces fleuves, qu'on avoit fait venir dans la ville, balayoient continuellement les cloaques et dégorgeoient dans le Tibre toutes les ordures de la capitale. Ces eaux, dispersées dans une infinité de canaux et de réservoirs, fournissoient aux besoins de chaque maison. Rome est redevable de ce bienfait au grand Agrippa. Le Champ de Mars, rempli de tant de beaux monumens de Pompée, de César, d'Auguste, de sa famille et de ses courtisans, offroit un contraste frappant avec d'autres endroits du même champ, toujours couverts de verdure et réservés aux exercices militaires de la jeunesse. Le Campus Minor, à côté, étoit orné de trois théâtres, d'un amphithéâtre, phithéâtre, de plusieurs portiques, d'un temple et du mausolée d'Auguste bâti d'une pierre blanche, et dont les étages différens soutenoient des terrasses plantées d'arbres. Cependant lorsqu'un voyageur sortoit de ce fauxbourg pour entrer dans la ville, les basiliques, les portiques, les temples, et surtout le Capitole, lui faisoient oublier tout ce qu'il avoit déjà vu.

Strabon. Geog. l. v. p. 163.

Voici les observations les plus intéressantes que j'ai trouvées dans un mémoire de l'Abbé Barthelemy sur les anciens monumens de Rome. 1. Le Colisée. Il est bâti de grosses pierres Tiburtines, unies par des crampons de fer scellés, pour l'ordinaire, dans une des pierres. La seule enceinte extérieure, par un calcul établi sur la réduction du mur entier en pieds cubiques, et sur les détails de la main d'œuvre, nous coûteroit aujourd'hui plus de dix-sept millions. Ce monument a plus souffert des Romains que des barbares: on voit dans un traité original entre les factions de la ville dans le quatorzieme siècle, qu'il est stipulé qu'il sera libre aux deux partis d'arracher des pierres du Colisée. 2. Les Obélisques. Les hiéroglyphes sont travaillées d'une façon singulière sur ces monumens de granite. Le plan des figures est en creux; mais dans ce creux les figures ont un relief léger, et garni tout autour pas la vive arrête du granite: c'est comme l'empreinte d'un cachet dans la cire. 3. La Colonne de Trajan. Entre le Quirinal et le Capitole, étoit une vallée étroite où Trajan voulut construire un Forum. Il fallut aplanir le terrein, et pour marquer jusqu'à quelle profondeur la mon-tagne s'étoit abaissée, on éleva en forme de témon, une colonne dont la hauteur est d'environ 110 pieds, sans y comprendre la figure de Trajan, dont elle étoit surmontée. Le fût de la colonne, qui, dans sa partie inférieure, a dix à onze pieds de diamètre, est formé de vingt-trois blocs de marbre placés horizontalement l'un sur l'autre. Dans l'intérieur on a pratiqué un escalier de 183 marches, éclairé par quarante-un fenêtres. Les victoires de Trajan sur les Daces sont représentées autour de ce monument, dont celle de M. Aurèle n'est que la copie. 4. Les Mausolées. A Paltozolo, sur le lac d'Albani, on voit, sur la face d'un rocher, douze faisceaux, une chaire curule, un sceptre surmonté d'un aigle, et une inscription, qu'on ne peut pas lire, au pied du rocher. Au-dessus plusieurs marches s'élèvent en pyramide; à côté des marches un petit corridor conduit à une chambre qui a onze pieds deux pouces de long sur neuf pieds six pouces de largeur; le tout est taillé, sculpté, et creusé dans le roc. Les urnes sont quelquefois quarrées et faites en maisons. On y distingue le toit avec ses divisions, et la porte tantôt fermée et tantôt à demi ouverte, et quelquefois occupée par le Génie de la mort. 5. Les Mosaïques. Les Romains avoient des marbres d'une grande variété de couleurs. Quand une couleur manquoit aux artistes en marbres, ils y suppléoient par des émaux et des briques. Il y a peu de mosaïques à Rome qui répondent à l'idée qu'on s'en fait. Quant à celle de Préneste, l'Abbé Barthelemy croit qu'elle représente l'arrivée d'Hadrien dans la haute Egypte.

V. Mém. de l'Académie des Belles Lettres, tom. xxviii. p. 579-599.

6. Les

6. Les Statues. Les antiquaires en comptent près de 70,000 dans la ville et les environs. Avant le tems d'Hadrien on n'y traçoit point les prunelles des yeux. Elles ont subi bien des révolutions. Les empereurs les déplaçoient souvent, et elles ont été restaurées par les ouvriers Romains aussi bien que par les nôtres.

Voici les objets que Pline admiroit le plus. 1. Le Circus Maximus construit par Jules César. Il avoit trois stades de long, et un de largeur; mais si l'on comprend les bâtimens, la largeur étoit de quatre jugera. 2. La Basilique de Paulus, dont les colonnes étoient du plus beau marbre de Phrygie. 3. Le Forum d'Auguste. 4. Le Temple de Paix par Vespasien. 5. Le Panthéon, dedié par Agrippa à Mars le Vengeur. 6. Le Forum de César, dont le terrein seul coûta au dictateur cent millions de sesterces (vingt millions de France.) 7. Les maisons particulières. L'an de Rome 676, la maison du Consul Lépidus étoit la plus belle de la ville pour la dépense, les tableaux, et la quantité de marbre. Trente-cinq ans après l'année de la mort de César, elle n'étoit pas la centième, et ces cent maisons furent bientôt surpassées à leur tour par une infinité d'autres encore plus belles. 8. Les Cloaques. Cet ouvrage de Tarquin l'ancien, avoit déjà bravé les efforts de sept cens ans. Rome, minée sous ses montagnes, étoit soutenue partout sur des arcades de la hauteur d'un char de foin, et d'une telle solidité qu'elles soutinrent le transport des 360 colonnes de marbre de Scaurus dont chacune avoit 38 pieds de long. 9. Les Aqueducs. Q.

Plin. Hist. Natur. xxxvi. 15.

Marcius Rex y travailla beaucoup pendant sa préture; mais l'Edile Agrippa, non content d'avoir purgé et embelli tous les anciens aqueducs, ajouta un nouveau ruisseau, l'Aqua Virgo. Faire 700 réservoirs, 105 fontaines, 130 castella, et les orner de 300 statues de marbre ou de bronze, aussi bien que 400 colonnes de marbre, ne fut que l'ouvrage d'une année. L'aqueduc commencé par Caligula et achevé par Claude surpassoit tous les autres. On prit les eaux à 40 milles sur un terrein très élevé, on les conduisit à Rome, et on les dispersa sur les sept montagnes. Rome étoit alors placée sur sept fleuves qui emportoient toutes ses ordures dans le Tibre. 10. Le Capitole. Il respira pendant long-tems la simplicité. Du tems de Pline les lambris des maisons étoient couverts de plaques d'or massif; on se contenta de dorer ceux du Capitole après la destruction de Carthage sous la censure de Mummius. On doroit jusqu'aux murs des maisons; mais son siècle avoit critiqué Catulus d'avoir couvert le Capitole de tuiles de bronze. Sylla y placa les colonnes destinées à soutenir le temple de Jupiter Olympien à Athènes. Elles étoient très simples et peut-être seulement de pierre. 11. Les Obélisques. Il y en avoit trois, taillés dans les carrières de la Thébaïde par les anciens rois, et amenés à Rome par les empereurs. Le premier, qui avoit plus de 125 pieds de hauteur sans compter la base, étoit dans le grand Cirque. Le second, placé dans le Champ de Mars, où il servit long tems de gnomon, avoit 116 pieds. Auguste les transporta d'Egypte à Rome; le troisième, placé Plin. Hist. Natur. xxxiii. 3. et xxxvi. 6.

Idem. xxxvi. 9, 10 11.

placé dans le cirque du Vatican, s'étoit cassé quand on l'a élevé. 12. Les Colosses, et les autres Statues. Il n'étoit pas possible de les compter. On voyoit dans le Capitole un Apollon que Lucullus avoit apporté du Pont, haut de 30 coudées, il avoit coûté 150 talens; et le Jupiter que Sp. Carvilius avoit fait jetter en fonte des cuirasses des Samnites vaincus: on le distinguoit du sommet du mont Albain. Le colosse de Néron avoit 110 pieds. Un Alexandre par Lysippe que Néron fit dorer, &c. &c. C'étoient des ouvrages de fonte (signa). En fait de statues proprement dites, il y avoit, parmi une infinité d'autres, une Vénus dans le temple de la Paix qui ne le cédoit point aux anciens, et un Nil avec seize enfans, dans le même endroit, fait de basaltes, pierre Ethiopienne, qui ressembloit au fer par sa couleur et sa dureté. Metellus Macedonicus (vers le commencement du septième siècle de Rome) bâtit une portique et deux temples qui furent renfermés ensuite dans l'enceinte de la portique d'Octavia. Il avoit apporté de la Macédoine cette troupe de statues équestres qu'il plaça vis-à-vis des temples, et qui en faisoit le grand ornement. C'étoit Lysippe qui avoit ainsi immortalisé les amis d'Alexandre, qui périrent à la bataille du Granique. Les figures étoient ressemblantes, et le roi étoit à leur tête. " Hic idem primus omnium, Romæ ædem, ex marmore in iis ipsis monumentis molitus, vel magnificentiæ vel luxuriæ princeps fuit." Les critiques ne sont point d'accord sur le sens de ces paroles, si Métellus bâtit une maison particulière, un temple de Rome Déese, ou simplement un temple dans la ville. Les deux premiers sens me paroissent peu conformes à l'esprit du tems. J'adopte le troisième qui est aussi le plus littéral. Si M. Burman pense qu'on n'auroit jamais blâmé la magnificence à l'égard des dieux, je le renvoye seulement à Juvenal et à Ovide.* Près d'un siècle plus tard Mamurra bâtit une maison sur le mont Cælius qu'il incrusta de marbre. Ce parvenu, qui avoit pillé les Gaules sous le gouvernement de César, n'avoit pas une seule colonne dans ce palais qui ne fut de marbre de Lune ou de Caryste. Enfin M. Lepidus osa faire les seuils de ses portes du marbre de Numidie. Selon Pline, ce Lepidus, qui renchérit sur le luxe de Mamurra, étoit le collègue de Catulus en 676. Cependant quand je vois que la fortune de Mamurra n'a pu commencer qu'en 695, j'aimerois mieux l'entendre de Lepidus le triumvir. L'an 628, les censeurs citèrent l'augure Æmilius Lepidus pour avoir loué une maison à six mille sesterces par an (1200 livres.) Un sénateur auroit osé à peine habiter une maison d'un aussi bas prix du tems de Tibère. Cette maison de Lepidus n'a-t-elle jamais donné que de mauvais exemples à la république? Encore une conjecture sur Lepidus et Mamurra. Quand je réfléchis sur le luxe de ces personnages, il me paroît que c'est Marmurra qui a renchéri sur Lepidus. Il faut tout autrement de marbre et de Juvenal. Satir. xi. 111, &c. Ovid. Fast. i. p. 441. Plin Hist. Nat. xxxvi. 6.

Plin. Hist. Natur. xxxiv. 7. 8.

Idem. xxxvi. 5. 7.

Vell. Paterc. l. i. c. xi.

Vell. Paterc. l. iii. c. 10.

Rutil. Iter, l. i. 295—312.

* En 662 L. Crassus mit en œuvre six colonnes de marbre d'Hymette de douze pieds de long, dans sa maison Palatine. V. Plin. Hist. Natur. xxxvi. 3.

dépense

dépense pour couvrir une maison entière de plaques de marbre, que pour en orner les portes de quelques apartemens. C'est sur ce calcul que Pline auroit dû apprécier le dégré de leur luxe, et non point sur une vaine idée du marbre prodigué aux vils usages puisqu'on le fouloit aux pieds. Cette pensée sent bien le rhéteur, et elle n'est pas seul de son espèce dans l'histoire naturelle de cet auteur. L'indignation que Cornelius Nepos exprimoit contre Mamurra aura encore pu lui faire prendre le change. Il n'auroit peut-être pas vu que cette indignation se portoit plutôt sur la hardiesse de la personne que sur la nouveauté de la chose, et que les Romains, observateurs scrupuleux des bienséances, étoient révoltés du luxe du parvenu, quoiqu'ils eussent pardonné à celui du consul.

Lorsqu' Auguste eut rétabli la paix dans l'état il songea à rétablir l'ordre dans la ville, qui changea bientôt de face. Il nettoya le lit du Tibre, il forma un guet nombreux destiné à veiller à la sureté publique et à prévenir les vols et les incendies. Il partagea la ville en quartiers, et ceux-ci en Vici: les uns et les autres avoient leurs chefs particuliers. Il construisit beaucoup d'ouvrages publics: 1. Un forum, devenu nécessaire par la multitude des personnes et des affaires, à laquelle les deux autres fora ne suffisoient plus. Dans les deux portiques de ce forum, il plaça les statues de tous les grands hommes qui avoient agrandi l'état, chacune dans son habit de triomphe. 2. Le Temple de Mars le Vengeur; c'est au vengeur de la mort de César. Ce temple devoit être celui des triomphes omphes et des dépouilles. 3. Le temple d'Apollon Palatin, dans l'enceinte même du palais impérial. Auguste y ajouta une portique avec une bibliothèque Grecque et Latine. 4. Le temple de Jupiter Tonnant dans l'enceinte du Capitole. Il dédia plusieurs autres ouvrages sous le nom de sa femme, de sa sœur, de son neveu, et de ses petits-fils; les portiques de Livie et d'Octavie, la portique et la basilique de Caius et Lucius, et le théâtre de Marcellus. Il encouragea les sénateurs à suivre son exemple. Marcius Philippus bâtit le temple d'Hercule et des Muses; L. Cornificius celui de Diane; Asinius Pollio le palais de la liberté; Munatius Plancus le temple de Saturne; Cornelius Balbus, un théâtre; Statilius Taurus, un amphithéâtre; Agrippa beaucoup de grands ouvrages. Tant de beaux monumens, construits ou rétablis sous le règne d'Auguste, justifient bien son propos,—qu'il avoit trouvé une ville de brique, et qu'il en laissoit une de marbre. Auguste donna une fois au Capitole seize mille livres d'or, et cinquante millions de sesterces de pierreries.

Sueton. in August. c. 29, 30, 31.

Cl. Rutil. Iter. i. 47.

Exaudi, Regina tui pulcherrima mundi,
Inter sidereos Roma recepta polos.
Exaudi, genitrix hominum, genitrixque Deorum,
Non procul a cœlo per tua templa sumus.

— — —

i. 93.

Percensere labor densis decora alta tropæis,
Ut si quis stellas pernumerare velit,
Confunduntque vagos delubra micantia visus.
Ipsos crediderim sic habitare Deos.
Quid loquar aerio pendentes fornice rivos
Quà vix imbriferas tolleret Iris aquas?

Hos

Hos potius dicas crevisse in sidera montes:
Tale Giganteum Græcia laudat opus,
Intercepta tuis conduntur flumina muris,
Consumunt totos celsa lavacra lacus.
Nec minus et propriis celebrantur roscida venis
Totaque nativo mœnia fonte sonant;
Frigidus æstivas hinc temperat halitus auras,
Innocuamque levat purior unda sitim.

— — —

Quid loquar inclusas inter laquearia sylvas, Cl. Rutil. i. 111.
Vernula quà vario carmine ludit avis?
Vere tuo nunquam mulceri desinit annus,
Deliciasque tuas victa tuetur hyems.
Erige crinales lauros seniumque sacrati
Verticis, in virides Roma recinge comas,
Aurea turrigero radient diademata cono
Perpetuosque ignes aureus umbo vomat.

L'empereur Constance vint à Rome en 356. Tout l'étonnoit dans cette capitale. Il reconnut que la vérité surpassoit la renommée. Dans la visite qu'il fit des objets curieux de la ville et des environs, il admiroit surtout, 1. Le Capitole, digne du Dieu qu'on y servoit. 2. Des bains grands comme des provinces entières. 3. L'amphithéâtre construit de grandes pierres Tiburtines, et d'une hauteur où l'œil avoit peine à atteindre. 4. Le Panthéon, qui paroissoit un quartier entier, et dont les arcades étoient très élevées. 5. Les colonnes creusées en escalier et portant les statues des princes. 6. Le Temple de Rome. 7. Le Forum de la Paix. 8. Le Théâtre de Pompée. 9. L'Odeum et le Stade. 10. Mais surtout le Forum de Trajan, ouvrage dont la grandeur et le singulier frap- Ammian. Marcellin. xvi. 10. p. 102, 103. Edit. Gronov.

frappoient également et excluoient à la fois la description et l'imitation. Constantin et le prince Hormisdas admirèrent surtout la statue colossale de Trajan à cheval placée au milieu de la superbe basilique.

V. Berg. Grands Chemins de l'Empire. l. v. c. 2-7.

ÆTATES. On peut distinguer quatre ages de cette ville. 1. Du tems des premiers rois, elle ressembloit plutôt à un camp de Tartares, qu'à une ville Européenne; un assemblage confus de cabanes qui ne renfermoient qu'une troupe de pâtres dirai-je, ou de brigands. Le palais de Romulus s'est conservé long tems. Elle n'étoit qu'une petite chaumière. 2. L'an de Rome 138, Avant Christ 616, Tarquin l'ancien fut élu roi; il apporta dans l'état naissant le goût des arts. Quand je songe au goût Etrusque qu'on apperçevoit dans tous les premiers monumens de Rome, et que je le compare avec l'attachement exclusif des Grecs pour leurs artistes, l'origine Corinthienne de Tarquin me paroît très suspecte. Quoiqu'il en soit, cet étranger construisit beaucoup d'ouvrages publics, le grand Cirque, et les Cloaques; il commença le Capitole et des murailles de pierre autour de la ville, et ses successeurs n'eurent que la gloire d'exécuter ses idées. Les anciens parlent avec étonnement de la grandeur de ces monumens; des cloaques surtout, qui auroient fait honneur au siècle d'Auguste, et qui paroissoient bien au-dessus des forces d'un petit roitelet. Mais ne seroit-il pas permis de croire que la gloire du fondateur a obscurci celle des consuls et des censeurs qui ont rétabli, agrandi, et perfectionné tous ces ouvrages?

Dionys. Halicarn. Antiquit. Rom. l. iii. p. 106. Tit. Liv. i. 35, 36.

ges? Je vois que les censeurs donnèrent une fois mille talens pour nettoyer et pour rétablir ces cloaques qui s'étoient bouchées. Les premiers consuls contribuèrent peu à l'embellissement de la ville. Le magistrat d'une année ne pouvoit guères dédier l'ouvrage qu'il auroit commencé, pendant que la gloire plus brillante d'un triomphe ne coûtoit alors qu'une campagne heureuse de quinze jours. Les Gaulois ont dû trouver dans Rome une ville assez pauvre et mal-bâtie. Je pense qu'on se fait une idée trop outrée des ravages de ces barbares, et que de quelques expressions un peu hyperboliques de Tite Live, on a conclu un peu légèrement que toute la ville avoit périe dans l'incendie des Gaulois. Mais sans me servir du fameux passage de Polybe, qui soutient qui la ville s'étoit rachetée du feu et même du pillage, sans m'appuyer d'une expression de Tite Live, douteuse à la vérité et qui peut ne regarder que le premier jour, je dirai seulement, 1. Que dans l'incendie de Néron on vit périr le temple de la Lune, l'ouvrage de Servius Tullius, et le temple de Jupiter Stator construit par Romulus, le temple de Vesta et le palais de Numa; et l'autel et le temple d'Hercule qu'on attribuoit à Evandre, et qui n'étoit certainement pas moins ancien que la ville même. 2. Que d'abord après la défaite des Gaulois, avant qu'on eût pris la résolution de rétablir la ville, le sénat s'assembla dans la Curia Hostilia, qui a dû s'être trouvée au milieu des quartiers Gaulois. Je conviens que les Gaulois firent beaucoup de mal à Rome, et qu'un très grand nombre de monumens publics

V. Tit. Liv. v. 42,3.

Tacit. Annal. xv. 41.

Tit. Liv. v. 55.

publics et de maisons particulières furent embrasées. 3. Les Romains rebâtirent bientôt la ville, mais avec une telle précipitation qu'on ne tiroit point les rues au cordeau, et que les cloaques, qui devoient être toujours sous les lieux publics, se trouvèrent dans beaucoup d'endroits sous les maisons. La ville se ressentit longtems de cette circonstance. Les rues étoient toujours remplies de sinuosités, et fort étroites, et les maisons d'une hauteur extraordinaire. Il n'y avoit que les fauxbourgs, le champ de Mars, &c. bâtis dans un tems plus heureux, qui n'avoient point ces désagrémens. Les embellissemens de la ville ne commencèrent que vers le milieu du cinquième siècle, sous la censure d'Appius Claudius, qui construisit un aqueduc et un grand chemin pavé jusqu'à Capoue. Ces ouvrages étoient originaux dans leur espèce. Rome s'enrichit bientôt. La dévotion de ses généraux la remplit de temples. Chaque victoire fournissoit l'occasion du vœu, les richesses pour bâtir le temple, et les ouvrages d'art pour l'orner. Quand on songe que Volsinii, petite ville de l'Etrurie, a fourni deux milles statues, il est difficile de calculer ce que les généraux ont dû tirer de Tarentum, Syracuse, Carthage, Corinthe, Athènes, Pelta, et Alexandrie. Pompée, César, Auguste, et Agrippa, l'avarice des gouverneurs, et le luxe des particuliers, tout contribua à remplir Rome des plus beaux édifices. Enfin le 18 Juillet, l'an de Rome 817, et de l'ère Chrétienne 64, le hasard, et peut-être la vanité de Néron, alluma une incendie affreuse, qui dura six jours et sept nuits, et qui Cicero de Leg. Agrar. contra Rullum. ii. 35.

Tit. Liv. ix. 29.

Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxiv. 7.

Tacit. Annal. xv. 38—43.

Sueton. in Neron. 38.

qui réduisit en cendres un nombre infini de maisons et de temples, les dépouilles des guerres Celtiques et Puniques, et les plus beaux ouvrages de la Grèce. Des quatorze régions, trois furent ruinées de fond en comble, sept souffrirent au point qu'il n'en resta que peu de bâtimens; il n'y en eut que quatre où le feu ne parvint pas. 4. Rome renaquit bientôt de ses cendres plus belle que jamais. Les règlemens de Néron seroient dignes du plus sage des princes. On distribua les quartiers d'une façon régulière, on tira les rues au cordeau, on leur donna une largeur convenable; on les orna partout de portiques, on devoit employer les débris des édifices à remplir les marais d'Ostie. Les propriétaires étoient obligés de rebâtir de pierre de Tibur ou de Gabii, à l'épreuve du feu, et sans murs mitoyens. Cet édit, appuyé de l'autorité, des récompenses, et de l'exemple du prince, aussi bien que de son successeur Vespasien, produisit un tel effet, que malgré les horreurs de trois guerres civiles et de trois fantômes d'empereurs, tout se retrouvoit sur un pied bien supérieur à l'ancienne ville dans le tems que Pline acheva son histoire naturelle en 831. Les fléaux physiques sont bientôt réparés dans une capitale dont les ressources sont celles d'un empire entier. Depuis Vespasien jusqu'à Marc Aurèle, tous les empereurs se sont piqués de contribuer à l'embellissement de Rome, et si la décadence des arts empêcha Sévère, Alexandre, Aurélien, et Dioclétien d'y mettre autant de goût, ils tâchèrent au moins d'y suppléer, par la magnificence. La fondation de Constantinople affoiblit Rome, les barbares

Mon Journal, le 20 Septemb. 1763.

Plin. in præfat. Hist. Natur. passim. xxxvi. 25.

Mon Journal, le 6 Octobre, 1763.

bares y firent quelque dégat, mais c'est au zèle des papes, qui ruinèrent les temples, et à la misère des siècles suivans, qu'il faut attribuer la ruine de la plûpart des édifices de l'ancienne Rome. Grégoire le Grand et le laps du tems y ont fait plus de mal qu'Atila.

Tacit. Annal. iv. 56.

ROMA DEA. Le peuple de Smyrne, pour faire sa cour aux Romains, bâtit un temple à Rome Déesse. Cet exemple d'adulation et de superstition fut bientôt imité dans toutes les provinces; mais ce ne fut qu'en 874, 315 ans après la fondation du temple de Smyrne, que l'Empereur Hadrien introduisit le culte de la capitale dans la capitale même. Il y bâtit un temple magnifique, et ordonna que la fête des Palilia ne seroit plus appellée que l'anniversaire de la naissance de Rome. Lorsque la Déesse est représentée sur les médailles, on la voit en habit militaire, une partie de son sein découverte, l'exposition de Romulus gravée sur son bouclier.

V. Valesium ad Ammian. Marcell. xvi. 10. p. 103. Addison's Dialogues upon Medals, p. 127.

Plinii Collatio.

On voit, dans la belle bibliothèque du Marquis Riccardi, à Florence, un excellent manuscrit qui contient toute l'Histoire Naturelle de Pline l'ancien et les Epitres de Pline le jeune. M. Folkes, qui est mort Président de la Société Royale, a prononcé qu'il étoit le manuscrit le plus ancien de ces écrivains que nous ayons; et le Docteur Lami, garde de la bibliothèque, le croit au moins du neuvième siècle. Il est écrit dans cette petite écriture courante qui est aussi ancienne que les lettres Onciales et beaucoup plus commune. Il est cependant assez net et très bien conservé. Sans avoir eu le tems de l'examiner en détail, j'ai remarqué que l'ordre des livres n'est pas toujours conforme aux éditions dont la méthode paroît néanmoins plus naturelle. Ce MS. fourniroit beaucoup à un nouvel éditeur de Pline. Il n'a pas même été collationé pour l'édition du P. Hardouin. Voici quelques différences que j'ai observées dans des endroits intéressans. 1. Dans le fameux passage sur l'étendue de Rome on y lit Censoribus Imperatoribus Vespasianis A. U. C. 926. M. P. 13,200: ita ut XII. praetereanturque ex veteribus VII. quae esse desierunt efficit passuum per directum $\overline{\text{XX}}$ M. DCCLXV*..... per vicos omnium viarum mensura colligit paullo amplius $\overline{\text{XX}}$ P. 2. L. xxxiii. c. 1. on y lit A. U. C. 448, et CCCIV. ann. post Capitolinam, en parlant du temple de la Concorde de Flavius. 3. En parlant du Circus Maximus, on y trouve CCL. écrit en figures, sans que mille soit ou exprimé ou désigné par un trait.

miner

Sect. VIII.

LATIUM ET CAMPANIA.

Campaniæ Regio. Ce petit pays, qui n'a guères plus de 180 milles Romains dans son étendue depuis le Tibre jusqu'au Silarus, et qui en a à peine 50 dans sa plus grande largeur de Sora au promontoire Circeii, existera toujours dans la mémoire des hommes, et attirera l'attention de tous V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iii. et iv.

* La leçon ordinaire est suppléée à la marge d'une main plus récente et tout à fait moderne.

Plin. Hist. Natur. iii. 5.

les siècles. Nous le connoissons dans tous ses états, le pays de la barbarie et des fables; rempli de vingt nations libres, vertueuses, et féroces; le siège de l'empire, du luxe, et des arts; avili aujourd'hui par la superstition et la misère. Dans chacun de ses états à peine y a-t-il un village, une montagne, une rivière qui ne soit fameuse dans l'histoire ou la poësie. Il se divise naturellement en I. LATIUM, II. CAMPANIA, et III. le pays les PICENTINS. Je suis surpris qu'Auguste les ait réunis dans une seule région. Constantin en confia le gouvernement au consulaire de la Campanie, un des principaux officiers du Bas Empire. Je voudrois savoir comment les loix concilioient sa juridiction avec celle du préfet de Rome dont l'autorité, qui n'étoit bornée que par le centième milliaire, devoit enlever au consulaire plus de la moitié de sa province. Ses bornes sont connues; la Mer, le Tibre, le Silarus, l'Anio, et le pays des Marsi, des Samnites, et des Hirpini.

La Carte de l'Italie ancienne, par M. Deslisle.

Giannone, Hist. Civile de Naples, tom. i. l. ii. c. 3.

V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iii.

I. LATIUM. Dans le sens nouveau et étendu où l'on peut considérer le Latium, ses limites s'étendoient bien plus loin que celles du Latium ancien et propre. Il étoit renfermé entre la mer, le Tibre, l'Anio, et le Liris. Ce sont-là les bornes générales que les anciens lui ont données; mais on voit le Latium se resserroit en deçà de l'Anio pour faire place au pays des Æqui, et qu'il se débordoit au-delà du Liris, jusqu'au mont Massique. C'est aux Romains qu'on doit l'extension du nom Latin. A mesure qu'ils subjuguoient les cités de cette côte, ils les recevoient dans la ligue qu'ils avoient formée ancienne-

La Carte du Milieu de l'Italie de Deslisle.

anciennement avec la cité des Latins, et ces peuples acquéroient par adoption le nom générique des Latins. C'est au moyen de ces cités qu'il faut faire un nouveau partage. J'y trouve les cités suivantes: 1. Les Latins ou le Latium ancien et propre; 2. Les Rutuli; 3. Les Hernici; 4. Les Volsci; et 5. Les Aurunci ou Ausones. Je suis étonné que les Romains n'ayent pas étendu cette dénomination aux Sabins, leurs premiers alliés, mais surtout aux Æqui dont le pays étoit presqu'enclavé dans le Latium. Ce pays est riche et fertile, à l'exception de quelques endroits maritimes, tels que le territoire d'Ardée, le pays entre Antium et Lavinium jusqu'à Pometia, avec une partie des environs de Circeii, de Terracine, et de Setia. Ces endroits sont marécageux et mal-sains. On trouve encore des cantons pierreux et remplis de montagnes, mais encore y trouve-t-on des fruits, des bois, et des pâturages.

I. 1. LATIUM VETUS SEU PROPRIUM. Ce petit pays sera mieux désigné par le dénombrement de ses villes que par des bornes que ne sauroient qu'être un peu vagues. Les anciens ont voulu l'étendre depuis l'embouchure du Tibre jusqu'au promontoire de Circeii sur une côte de cinquante milles. V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. 3, 4.

Je conviens que Circeii étoit une ville Latine aussi bien que plusieurs autres étrangères à l'ancienne cité, quoique les rois de Rome les eussent fait entrer dans l'alliance. Une grande partie des terres intermédiaires appartenoit toujours aux Rutuli et aux Volsques. Dans ce Latium propre, je trouve entre la Voie Appienne et la mer, 1. Ostia; 2.

Laurentum ou Laurolavinium; 3. Lavinium et le Numicius; 4. Lanuvium, le Champ Solonius; 5. Politorium; 6. Tellene; et 7. Ficana, sur les bords du Tibre. Entre les Voies Appienne et Latine, y compris les deux chemins, j'apperçois, 1. Bovillæ; 2. Aricia; 3. Alba Longa. Entre la Voie Latine et l'Anio je vois presque toutes les bonnes villes du Latium: 1. Tusculum; 2. Ortona; 3. Labicum et le lac Regillus; 4. Gabii; 5. Præneste; 6. Scaptia; 7. Pedum; 8. Æsula; 9. Tibur.

Sil. Ital. Punic. viii. 358.

Faunigenæ Socio bella invasere Sicano.
— — — —
Laurentique domo gaudent et fonte Numici.
— — — —
Quos celsa devexa jugo Junonia sedes
Lanuvium; atque altrix casti Collatia Bruti, Quique immite nemus Triviæ, atque ostia Tusci
Amnis amant, tepidoque fovent Almone Cybelen:
Hinc Tibur, Catille, tuum, sacrisque dicatum
Fortunæ Præneste jugis: Antemnaque prisco Crustumiò prior, atque habiles ad aratra Labici, Necnon sceptriferi qui potant Tybridis undam.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. 3. p. 879.

I. 1. Ostia. L'île sacrée, que les deux bras du Tibre formoient auprès d'Ostia, étoit couverte de verdure dans toutes les saisons.

Cl. Rutil. Iter, l. i. 179.

Tum demum ad naves gradior, quà fronte bicorni
Dividuus Tiberis dexteriora secat,
Lævus inaccessis fluvius vitatur arenis;
Hospitis Æneæ gloria sola manet.

Strab. Geog. v. p. 159.

I. 1. Lavinium. Cette ville, autrefois considérable, n'étoit plus qu'un petit village du tems de Strabon.

Strabon. Fidenæ, Antemnæ, et Collatia, avoient subi le même sort.

Il est difficile de demêler la confusion qui règne parmi les anciens au sujet de Lanuvium, Lavinium, et Laurentum ou Laurolavinium. Comme les noms se ressembloient, on les a quelquefois pris pour un seul endroit, et quelquefois on a attribué à l'un ce qui n'appartenoit qu'aux autres. Cluvier sue sang et eau pour les concilier. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. 3. p. 888.

I. 1. Alba Longa. On ne connoît Albe que par sa renommée; encore une partie de cette renommée pourroit bien être fabuleuse puisqu'elle fut détruite, à l'aurore des tems historiques, par Tullus Hostilius qui n'en laissa subsister que les temples, dont le principal étoit celui de Jupiter Latialis situé hors de la ville et au sommet du mont Albain. C'étoit-là qu'on offroit tous les ans ce sacrifice commun pour toutes les cités Latines, qui y assistoient par leurs députés. Les consuls y présidoient comme chefs de l'alliance. On conçoit sans peine qu'une pareille cérémonie, qui attiroit un monde infini, devoit faire rebâtir quelques maisons pour les loger. Aussi se forma-t-il bientôt autour du temple un petit bourg nommé Forum Populi. On voyoit aussi sur le mont Albain, et dans les environs, un grand nombre d'autels, de chapelles, et de tombeaux consacrés; aussi bien que de maisons de plaisance, telles que celles de Pompée et de Clodius. Albe étoit placée au bord orientale du lac qui baignoit ses murs sur une hauteur, entre le lac et la montagne; elle étoit au même éloignement de Rome qu'Ardée, c'est à dire Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. 4. p. 900-915.

à vingt milles. Aucune de ces caractères ne convient à Albano à douze milles de Rome, et à deux du lac d'Albe sur la Voie Appienne. Il paroît que ce bourg a pris son origine d'un camp des soldats prétoriens fameux dans l'antiquité, et qui faisoit la garde des empereurs quand ils étoient dans le château d'Albe, l'arx Albana, si redoutable sous Domitien. Ce bourg devint si considérable qu'au commencement du cinquième siècle Eutrope et Orose l'ont pris pour l'ancienne Albe. Cette tradition s'est perpétuée dans le pays. Les environs du mont Albain étoient charmans. Ils produisoient des fruits exquis, et un vin qui ne cédoit qu'à celui de Falerne.

Diony. Hal. l. iv. p. 30.

Cicero in Philip. iii. 6.

I. 1. ARICIA. Quod autem municipium non contemnit qui Aricinum tantopere despicit; vetustate antiquissimum, jure fœderatum, propinquitate pæne finitimum, splendore municipium honestissimum.

Strabon. Geog. v. p. 165.

Aricie étoit dans un fond; cependant sa citadelle étoit fortifiée par la nature.

Cluvier. Ital. Ant. l. iii. c. 4. p. 920-935.

Diane étoit adorée à Aricie d'une façon barbare et Scythique. Les légendes Grecques ne conviennent point si ce fut Oreste qui apporta son culte et sa statue de la Tauride en Italie, ou si l'on en est redevable à Hippolite, fils de Thésée, que Diane elle-même y transporta après lui avoir rendu la vie. Le temple est hors de la ville du côté gauche de la Voie Appienne pour ceux qui vont à Rome. Une chaine de collines, très escarpée et presque aussi haute que le mont Albain, renferme dans son sein un vallon, où l'on voit le bois sacré, le temple

a

au milieu du bois, et un grand lac devant le temple, dont les sources sont aussi sacrées. Le Clivus Virbius, et la fontaine avec le bois d'Egérie, n'étoient pas éloignés de ces endroits. Toute l'enceinte s'appelloit Nemùs, aussi bien qu'un bourg qui s'y étoit formé, et le grand prêtre se nommoit Rex Nemorensis. Cet emploi, par sa dignité et sa richesse, étoit aussi beau que la manière de l'acquérir étoit singulière. Il y avoit dans le temple un rameau sacré ; tout fugitif qui pouvoit l'enlever, avoit droit de se battre avec le grand prêtre, et de le remplacer s'il le tuoit. Ce sacrifice, qui tenoit lieu des victimes humaines, m'étonne. Les ecclésiastiques qui font les institutions ne sont guères d'humeur de se faire immoler eux-mêmes. Je pense au moins que le rameau sacré se gardoit avec beaucoup de soin, et que le combat que Caligula fit faire n'avoit pas d'exemple depuis longtems.

Sueton. in Calig. c. xxxv.

Vallis Aricinæ sylvâ præcinctus opacâ
Est lacus ; antiquâ religione sacer ;
Regna tenent manibus fortes pedibusque fugaces,
Et perit exemplo postmodo quisque suo.

Ovid. Fast. l. iii. p. 529.

I. 1. TUSCULUM. Tusculum, fondé par Telegonus, le fils et le meurtrier d'Ulysse, étoit fort considérable du tems de Strabon. Il étoit placé sur le dos d'une colline. Tous ses environs (mais surtout ce côté qui regardoit la capitale) étoient très ornés. Tout auprès l'on voyoit une montagne qui communiquoit à celles d'Albe. La bonté de l'air et des eaux l'avoit rempli de palais magnifiques qui formoient un amphithéâtre. La maison de Cicéron étoit au bas de la montagne entre Tusculum et Albe.

Strab. Geo. v. p. 165. Cluv. Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. 4. p. 944.

Horat. Car. Epod. i.
Nec ut superni villa candens Tusculi
Circæa tangat mœnia.

Id. iii. 9.
Telegoni juga parricidæ ———

Strab. Geo. V. p. 165.
I. 1. PRÆNESTE. Préneste étoit une des villes les plus fortes de l'Italie. Sa citadelle étoit placée sur un rocher escarpé qui avoit deux stades de hauteur perpendiculaire, et la ville entière étoit percée de toutes parts par des souterrains. Sa force fit enfin son malheur. La première démarche de chaque chef de parti étoit de s'emparer de Préneste; et la ville innocente éprouva plus d'une fois toutes les horreurs des sièges et des proscriptions. Les sorts de Préneste étoient fameux parmi le petit nombre d'oracles qu'il y avoit en Italie, Horat. Car. iii. 4.

——— Frigidum
Præneste ———

Strab. Geo. l. v. p. 164.
I. 1. TIBUR. Cette ville, située sur les deux rives de l'Anio, étoit fameuse pour son temple d'Hercule. L'Anio formoit une grande chute en se précipitant d'un rocher escarpé près de la ville, après quoi, il passoit auprès des carrières de Tibur, d'où l'on tiroit beaucoup de pierre pour les bâtimens de la capitale. On voyoit aussi les sources froides de l'Albula qui étoient très salutaires en bain ou en boisson.

Horat. Car. iii. 29.
Ne semper udum Tibur, et Æsulæ
Declive contempleris arvum ——

Idem, i. 7.
——— Densa tenebit
Tiburis umbra tui.

Idem, iii. 4.
——— Tibur supinum.

Idem, ii. 6.
Tibur Argeo positum colono,
Sit meæ sedes utinam senectæ;
Sit modus lasso maris et viarum Militiæque.

Ipse

Ipse Anien (miranda fides) infraque superque
Saxeus; heic tumidam rabiem spumosaque ponit
Murmura ————————
Heic æterna quies; nullis heic jura procellis,
Nusquam fervor aquis.

Statii Sylv. l. 3. de villa Tiburtinâ Manlii Vopisci.

I. 2. Rutuli. Cette petite cité habitoit un territoire enclavé dans ceux des Volsques et des Latins, qui la resserroient du côté des terres. Elle ne possédoit pas non plus une côte de mer fort étendue, puisque Lavinium et Antium étoient au delà de ses deux extrémités. Les poëtes, qui confondent les Rutuli avec les Latins, pendant que les historiens les en distinguent, me font soupçonner que cette petite cité s'étoit détachée du corps Latin dans les tems de la fable. Je vois dans le pays des Rutuli trois villes, 1. Ardea; 2. Castrum Inui; et 3. Aphrodisium.

Cluv. Ital. Ant. l. iii. c. 5.

Qui Volusi antiquo derivat stemmate nomen,
Et reges Rutulos, teste Marone, refert.

Cl. Rutilii Iter, l. i. 169.

Cette généalogie de 1200 ans auroit été belle au commencement du cinquième siècle, mais les critiques ont déjà vu que Rutilius s'étoit trompé et que Volusus n'étoit qu'un simple trompette.

I. 2. Ardea. La légende fait voyager d'Argos au pays des Rutuli, Danaë, mère de Persée, que son père avoit jettée dans la mer enfermée dans un tonneau. Elle bâtit Ardée. On connoit assez ce jugement inique, où les Romains, pris pour arbitres entre les Ardeates et les Aricini, se donnèrent à eux-mêmes les terres en litige. Tout peuple auroit pu faire cette injustice, mais tout peuple auroit-il eu la justice dirai-je, ou la politique, de la réparer?

Strab. Geog. l. x. p. 160. Tit. Liv. iii. 71. iv. 11.

réparer? Le sénat le fit d'une façon très sage: il envoya sur ces mêmes terres une colonie d'Ardeates. Les environs d'Ardée souffrirent beaucoup dans la suite des courses des Samnites.

Virg. Æn. vii. 371.

Et Turno, si prima domûs repetatur origo, Inachus Acrisiusque patres, mediæque Mycenæ.

Sil. Ital. viii. 359.

Sacra manus, Rutuli, servant qui Daunia regna.
— — —
Quos Castrum, Phrygibusque gravis quondam Ardea misit.

Virgil. Æn. vii. 408.

Protinus hinc fuscis tristis Dea tollitur alis
Audacis Rutuli ad muros; quam dicitur urbem
Acrisionæis Danaë fundasse colonis,
Præcipiti delata Noto; locus Ardea quondam
Dictus avis, et nunc magnum manet Ardea nomen.
Sed fortuna fuit.

Cluv. Ital. Ant. l. iii. c. 6.

I. 3. HERNICI. Cette cité, enclavée dans celles des Volsques, des Marses, des Æqui, et des Latins, et placée aux sources de l'Anio, du Liris et du Trerus, occupoit un petit canton rude et rempli de montagnes. Les seules villes étoient celles de 1. Anagnia, le chef lieu de la cité; 2. Alatrium; 3. Verulæ; et 4. Ferentinum.

Sil. Italic. viii. 394.

Hernicaque impresso raduntur vomere saxa,
Queis putri pinguis sulcari Anagnia glebâ.
Sylla Ferentinis Privernatumque maniplis
Ducebat simul excitis ——

Id. xii.

—— surgit suspensa tumenti
Dorso, frugiferis Cerealis Anagnia glebis.

I. 3. FERENTINUM. Lorsque Silius Italicus associe ce peuple à ceux de Privernum, faut-il penser qu'il savoit que cette ville avoit appartenu aux Volsques, et que les Romains, après l'avoir prise, la don-donnèrent aux Herniques? Il avoit lu sans doute Tite Live. Il pouvoit lui être resté une idée confuse de ce passage; mais elle étoit bien confuse puisque ce démembrement s'est fait deux ou trois siècles avant les guerres Puniques. Le joug Romain s'appesantit beaucoup sur Ferentinum. Un préteur eut l'insolence de faire enlever les deux questeurs. L'un fut précipité du haut d'un mur, et l'autre fut battu de verges. C. Gracchus avoit bien raison de se plaindre au peuple d'une tyrannie qui blessoit la politique autant que la justice; de pareils traits ont du aigrir des alliés et amener la guerre sociale.

Tit. Liv. iv.

V. Aul. Gel. x. 3. apud. Cluv. Ital. Antiq. iii. 6. p. 984.

I. 4. Volsci. Les Volsques étoient d'une origine très différente des Latins puisqu'ils ne parlèrent pas la même langue. Ils formoient une nation nombreuse et brave, mais qui mettoit dans ses guerres plus d'impétuosité et de légèreté que de constance. On les trouve toujours unis avec leurs voisins, mais surtout avec les Æqui, contre la république naissante, jusqu'au commencement du cinquième siècle de Rome. Après leur défaite totale on les comprit d'abord dans les alliés du nom Latin, dont ils embrassèrent le parti dans le soulèvement des cités Latines. Leur pays étoit très étendu. La mer le bornoit depuis Antium jusqu'à Terracine. Ses autres voisins étoient les Rutuli, les Latins, les Æqui, les Hernici, les Marsi, les Samnites, la Campanie et le Mont Massique, et les Ausones. La nature en a fait le partage en canton des marais Pomptins, et canton des montagnes; le premier étoit fertile, mais mal-sain. J'y trouve, Cluv. Ital. Antiqua, l. iii. 7, 8.

1. An-

1. Antium; 2. Astura; 3. Circeii, son promontoire, et l'Amasenus, le bois de Feronie, l'Ufens; 4. Anxur, ou Terracine, les Lautulæ. Voilà la côte. 5. Corioli; 6. Longula; 7. Polusca; 8. Suessa Pometia; 9. Latricum entre la Voie Appienne et la mer; mais ces cinq villes paroissent avoir été détruites du tems des rois ou du commencement de la république; 10. Ulubræ; 11. Velitræ; 12. Ecetra; 13. Cora; 14. Norba; 15. Signia; 16. Setia; 17. Privernum entre la Voie Appienne et les montagnes sur la Voie Appienne; 18. Tres Tabernæ, et 19. Forum Appii. Le pays des montagnes n'étoit qu'un grand bassin, formé par une partie de l'Apennin, le mont Massique, et une chaine de hauteurs qui communiquoit des monts Albain et Algide au mont Massique. Ce bassin étoit fertilisé par le Liris et les branches différentes, le Trerus, la Cosa, le Fibrène, et le Melfes. J'y trouve, 1. Fabrateria sur le Trerus; 2. Frusino sur la Cosa; 3. Interamna à la jonction du Liris et du Melfes; 4. Fregellæ; et 5. Sora sur le Liris; 6. Aquinum; 7. Arpinum; 8. Alina; 9. Casinum, ville frontière du côté de la Campanie.

Sil. Italic. viii. 378.

At quos ipsius mensis seposta Lyæi
Sitia, et incelebri miserunt valle Velitræ;
Quos Cora, quos spumans immiti Signia musto,
Et quos pestiferâ Pomptini uligine campi:
Quà Saturæ nebulosa palus restagnat, et atro
Liventes cæno per squalida turbidus arva
Cogit aquas Ufens, atque inficit æquora limo.

— — —

Id. viii. 398.

Queis Circæa juga et scopulosi verticis Anxur Soræque

——————————— Soræque juventus Sil. Ital. viii. 396
Addita, fulgebat telis ; hìc Scaptia pubes,
Hìc Fabrateriæ vulgus ; nec monte nivoso
Descendens Atina aberat, detritaque bello
Suessa ; atque a duro Frusino haud imbellis aratro,
At qui Fibreno miscentem flumina Lirim
Sulfureum, tacitisque vadis ad litora lapsum
Accolit Arpinas, accità pube Venafro,
Et Larinatum dextris, socia hispidus arma
Commovet, atque viris ingens exhaurit Aquinum.

I. 4. ANTIUM. Les Antiates ont eu une marine, dont ils firent un mauvais usage, en courant toutes les mers de la Grèce du tems d'Alexandre, qui s'en plaignit aux Romains, dont ils dépendoient déjà. Du tems de Strabon, Antium n'étoit qu'un lieu délicieux, une retraite favorite des seigneurs Romains qui y avoient bâti des palais magnifiques. Hadrien préféroit le sien à toutes ses autres maisons de campagne. Antium étoit si mal peuplé du tems de Néron, que ce prince, qui s'intéressoit pour une ville où il avoit vu le jour, y envoya une colonie de vétérans ; mais qui ne s'y fixa point. La plûpart de ces nouveaux habitans se dispersèrent dans les provinces où ils avoient servi, et les autres ne laissèrent point de postérité. Strab. Geog. v. p. 160. Philostrat. in Vitâ Apollonii. viii. 8. Sueton. in Neron. c. 6. Tacit. Annal. xiv. 27.

O Diva gratum quæ regis Antium. Horat. Carm. i. 35.

I. 4. ASTURA. Cicéron avoit une maison de campagne dans cette petite île où tout respiroit la solitude et la méditation. Il y passoit les momens sombres de sa vie.

I. 4. CIRCEII. Cette habitation des enchantemens étoit un promontoire très élevé, que la mer et Strab. Geog. v. p. 160.

et les marais rendoient presqu'une île. La tradition se conservoit si bien dans le pays jusqu'au tems de Strabon qu'on montroit encore la coupe d'Ulysse.

Strab.Geog. v. p. 165.

I. 5. FREGELLÆ. Fregellæ avoit été conquis par les Samnites sur les Volsques. Les Romains l'enlevèrent à ceux-là, et y envoyèrent une colonie qui devint bientôt si considérable, qu'elle étoit une des plus belles villes de l'Italie, et qu'elle avoit une juridiction très étendue, A. U. C. 628. Cette cité se souleva; le consul Opimius la rasa de fond en comble. Du tems de Strabon, ce n'étoit qu'un méchant bourg, où les peuples voisins tenoient encore leurs assemblées civiles et religieuses.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. 8. p. 1035.

Tacit. Liv. Epitom. lx.

I. 5. AQUINUM.

Sit. Italic. 528.

——— Mox et vicinus Aquinas,
Et quæ fumantem texere giganta Fregellæ.

Strabon. Geog. v. p. 164.

C'étoit une grande ville du tems de Strabon.

I. 4. ARPINUM. Cette ville n'est célèbre que pour avoir donné à Rome Marius et Cicéron. Ce dernier a immortalisé la maison de campagne que ses pères lui avoient laissée dans une petite île du Fibrenus. Tout lui plaisoit dans ce séjour; un air sain, un beau paysage, et les vestiges de ses ancêtres. Son père avoit rebâti le château d'une façon élégante; mais du tems de son grand-père, ce n'étoit qu'une maison rustique semblable à celles des premiers Romains.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. 8. p. 1045.

Cicero de Leg. l. ii.

Juvenal. viii. 237.

Hic novus Arpinas ignobilis, et modo Romæ
Municipalis eques, galeatum ponit ubique
Præsidium attonitis, et in omni gente laborat.

— — —

Arpina

Arpinas alius, Volscorum in monte solebat Poscere mercedes alieno lassus aratro. Juvenal. viii. 245.

— — —

Hic tamen et Cimbros et summa pericula rerum
Excipit, et solus trepidantem protegit urbem. Idem, 249.

I. 4. CASINUM. Au-dessus de San Germano s'élève une haute montagne ; c'est à son sommet que St. Benoit, après avoir renversé un temple d'Apollon, fonda, l'an 523, ce couvent célèbre qui est devenu la capitale d'un grand empire religieux. L'ancien Casinum étoit sur le côteau de cette montagne. Varro avoit une maison de campagne sous la ville de Casinum, dont il a laissé une description qui montre assez combien il s'y plaisoit. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. 8. p. 1041. Varro de Re Rustic. iii. 5.

I. 5. AUSONES. Malgré la confusion qui règne dans les origines de l'Italie, on voit assez que les Ausones, ou Aurunci, étoient une cité Opique, et un des plus anciens peuples de l'Italie. Ils occupoient un petit pays enclavé dans celui des Volsques, et borné par ce territoire, le mont Massique, et la mer. On y trouve, 1. Amyclæ, colonie des Lacédémoniens qui ne subsista pas longtems ; les vignobles de Cecube ; 2. Caiété, avec son promontoire ; 3. Formiæ ; 4. Minturnæ et le Liris ; 5. Sinuessa. Ces villes étoient sur la côte. Il y avoit eu dans l'intérieur des terres, 1. Ausona ; et 2. Vescia. Après la destruction de ces villes par les Romains, il paroît que Vescia seule se rétablit. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iii. 9. Tit. Liv. ix. 25.

I. 5. FORMIÆ. Quelques auteurs ont placé les Lestrigones en Sicile, mais la Géographie des Voyages d'Ulysse, et la tradition constante du pays, font voir que ceux d'Homère étoient situés auprès de de Formiæ. Cicéron périt dans son Formianum.

Sil. Italic. viii. 531.

Horat. Carm. iii. 17.

——————— Domusque
Antiphatæ compressa freto—
Auctore ab illo ducis originem
Qui Formiarum mœnia dicitur
Princeps et innantem Maricæ
Litoribus tenuisse Lirim
Late tyrannus.———

Horat. Serm. i. 5.

In Mamurrarum lassi deinde urbe manemus.

Horat. Carm. i. 31.

——————— rura quæ Liris quietâ
Mordet aquâ, taciturnus amnis.

I. 5. LIRIS, FL.

Sil. Italic. iv. 349.

Vitiferi sacro generatus vertice montis, (Massici scil.)
Et Liris nutritus aquis; qui fonte quieto
Dissimulat cursum; ac nullo mutabilis imbre
Perstringit tacitas gemmanti gurgite ripas.

Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 165.

I. 5. PONTIA ET PANDATARIA. Ces deux îles étoient vis-à-vis de l'embouchure du Liris, à deux cens cinquante stades du continent et très proches l'une de l'autre; elles étoient petites mais très peuplées. Les empereurs y mettoient bon ordre par les colonies nombreuses d'exilés qu'ils y envoyoient.

Idem, v. p. 165.

I. 5. SINUESSA. Elle étoit célèbre pour les sources chaudes qu'elle avoit dans ses environs.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 1. Strabon. Geog. v. p. 167. Plin. Hist. Nat. iii. 5. Flor. Hist. Rom. i. 16.

II. CAMPANIA. Il paroît que les plus anciens habitans du pays étoient les Osques ou Opiques, nation Sicule, qui s'est vue réduite à la fin à la seule ville d'Atella, où sa langue et ses arts se sont conservés très longtems. Le reste du pays passa successivement sous la puissance des Etrusques, des

Sam

Samnites, et des Romains ; sans compter les Grecs, qui établirent plusieurs colonies sur les côtes. La Campanie, pays heureux, méritoit bien l'expression énergique de Pline qu'on y voyoit la nature satisfaite et s'applaudissant de son ouvrage. Le climat étoit doux et sain, les côtes offroient cent ports excellens, la mer fournissoit une profusion de poissons les plus exquis. La terre voyoit renouveller deux fois tous les ans ses fruits et ses fleurs. Les vins des côteaux de Massique, de Gaurus, et de Falerne ; les bleds des campagnes fertiles de Capoue, de Stella, et de Cales ; les oliviers de Venafrum, fournissoient à la nourriture et au luxe de la capitale. L'art et la richesse avoient perfectionné tous ces bienfaits de la nature, et cette côte de la baye de Naples offroit, avant l'incendie du Vésuve, un spectacle unique par sa beauté. Les bornes de ce pays étoient la mer depuis Sinuesse jusqu'au promontoire de Minerve, les pays des Picentins, et des Hirpini ; le Samnium avec le Vulturnus depuis sa source jusqu'à la rencontre du Sabbatus ; et la Campanie avec les hauteurs du mont Massique. Dans cette étendue, je découvre, 1. Vulturnum, et le Vulturnus ; 2. Liternum et le Liternus ou Clanis ; 3. Cumes ; le lac Acherusia ; 4. Misenum et le promontoire ; 4. Baiæ ; 5. Bauli ; les lacs Lucrin et Averne ; 6. Puteoli ; 7. Naples et le Vésuve ; 8. Herculaneum ; 9. Pompeii ; 10. Stabiæ ; 11. Surrentum ; voilà la côte maritime. Je trouve en deça du Vulturnus, 1. Venafrum ; 2. Teanum Sidicium ; 3. Suessa Aurunca ; 4. Calatia ; 5. Cales ;

Cales; 6. Casilinum; 7. Forum Popilii. Je vois au-delà du Vulturnus, 1. Capoue; 2. Saticula; 3. Trebula; 4. Acerræ; 5. Suessula; 6. Atella; 7. Avella; 8. Nola; 9. Nuceria. Les principales rivières sont le Vulturnus, le Savo, le Clanis, le Sebethus et le Sarnus.

Sil. Ital. viii. 526.

Jam vero quos dives opûm, quos dives avorum,
E toto dabat ad bellum Campânia tractu,
Ductorum adventû vicinis sedibus Osci
Servabant; Sinuessa tepens, fluctûque sonorum Vulturnum ——————————,

Idem. viii. 532.

—————— Stagnisque palustre
Liternum, et quondam fatorum conscia Cyme;
Illic Nuceria et Gaurus navalibus acta,
Prole Dicarcheâ, multo cum milite, Graia;
Illic Parthenope ac Pœno non pervia Nola;
Allifæ, et Clanio contemptæ semper Acerræ.
Sarrastes etiam populos, totasque videres
Sarni mitis opes; illic quos sulfure pingues
Phlegrei legere sinus; Misenus et ardens
Ore giganteo, sedes Ithacesia Baii;
Non Prochyte, non ardentem sortita Typhœa
Inarime, non antiqui saxosa Telonis
Insula, nec parvis aberat Calatia muris, Surrentum, et pauper sulci Cerealis Abella.

Senec. Epist. 86.

II. LITERNUM. Sénèque y possédoit la maison où Scipion l'ancien passa les dernières années de sa vie. Elle étoit bâtie de pierre de taille, avec une muraille et des tours dans le goût d'une forteresse. Elle étoit située au milieu d'un bois d'oliviers et de myrtes; on voyoit de ceux-là du tems de Pline, qui avoient été plantés de la main de Scipion deux cens cinquante ans auparavant. On y voyoit Plin. Hist. Natur. xvi. 44.

un

un beau réservoir capable d'abreuver une armée, et un petit bain étroit et ténébreux à la mode des anciens.

II. HERCULANEUM. L'extrémité de la ville s'avançoit dans la mer. Le vent Africus, en la rafraichissant, la rendoit très saine. Strabon. Geog. l. v. p. 170.

II. MONS VESUVIUS. Le sommet de la montagne, plein de fentes et de cavernes, montroit assez, du tems de Strabon, qu'elle avoit autrefois jetté des flammes. On croyoit que le souffre et les cendres contribuoient beaucoup à fertiliser les campagnes voisines. Strab. Geog. v. p. 170.

II. FALERNUS. Je vois que les anciens confondoient souvent les noms de Massicus, Falernus, Faustianus, Gauranus, et Amineus. Je sens que tous ces vignobles étoient dans le voisinage les uns des autres, mais je voudrois pouvoir les distinguer. V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 5. p. 1172.

II. CAPUA. Les Etrusques fondèrent cette ville vers l'an 800 avant l'ère Chrétienne. C'est le sentiment de Velleius Paterculus; et je pense avec lui que celui de Caton, qui ne place cette fondation qu'en 470, resserre trop de révolutions dans des limites trop étroites. Capoue, nommée par les Etrusques Vulturnum ou Alturnum, est à peine connue des anciens dans cette première époque, jusqu'à celle où les Samnites s'en emparèrent par trahison, A. U. C. 423. Le luxe et la douceur du climat produisirent bientôt son effet. Les petits-fils de ces montagnards féroces étoient à peine des hommes, et cela pendant que leurs compatriotes se distinguoient par leur valeur dans le Brutium et la Sicile. Lorsqu'en 343 ils implorèrent le secours Vell. Paterc. l. i. c. 7. Tit. Liv. iv. 37. V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 1. p. 1089.

Diodor. Sicul. l. xiii. xiv. xv.

des Romains contre les cités Samnites, ils paroissoient avoir oublier leur origine; ils ne regardoient ce peuple que comme un ennemi étranger. Cette circonstance, et le nom inconnu de Campani qu'ils s'étoient donnés, me feroit conjecturer que la colonie Samnite étoit peu nombreuse, et que dans la formation de la nouvelle cité, on fut obligé de conserver quelques-uns des anciens habitans, et peut-

Tit. Liv. vii. 30.

être même d'appeller les peuples voisins. Les Romains prirent la défense de Capoue, sujette de son propre aveu, alliée par la grace et la politique de la république. Après la bataille de Cannes, elle préféra l'alliance du vainqueur, qui la vit prendre sous ses yeux par les Consuls, A. U. C. 543, A C. 211. Les Romains usèrent durement de la victoire. On fit périr tout le sénat par la main du bourreau, on relégua les foibles restes de la nation, on détruisit la cité de Capoue. On délibéra longtems sur le sort de la ville. On la conserva enfin pour servir de retraite aux paysans qui faisoient valoir le domaine de la république, ces riches campagnes autour de la ville. Rullus le Tribun proposa une loi agrarienne pour distribuer aux citoyens ce revenue le plus assuré de l'état. Sans les lumières et l'éloquence de Cicéron il eut peut-être réussi, comme César le fit pendant son consulat, Sueton. in Jul. Cæsar. c. 21.

V. Tit. Liv. xxiii. xxvi. xxvii.

V. Cicero. de Leg. Agrar. cont. Rull. ii. 27 —36.

A. U. C. 694. Il partagea les champs de Capoue et Stellatin parmi vingt mille citoyens; à qui il donna dix jugera par tête en celui-là et douze dans celui-ci. Il envoya en même tems une colonie à Capoue, qui devint assez considérable, le siège du consulaire de la Campanie, et la huitième ville

ville de l'empire. Capoue étoit située au milieu d'une belle plaine au pied du mont Tifata, et à trois milles de la rive gauche du Vulturnus. Mais entre 851 et 856, le comte et l'évêque, voyant que les incendies et les courses des Arabes l'avoient presque ruinée, la rebâtirent sous le même nom, et la placèrent auprès du Vulturnus et sur les masures de l'ancien Casilinum. Les auteurs qui parlent du luxe de ces anciens Campani corrompus par leur commerce, leur richesse, et la fertilité de leurs terres, font à peine mention de leur goût pour les arts. Je vois qu'Albana et Seplasia étoient deux places remplies de tous les instrumens des plaisirs; je ne vois aucun de ces ouvrages qui immortalisent un peuple. Tarentum remplit la capitale de ses tableaux et de ses statues, mais il ne paroît pas que Capoue rendit beaucoup, quoiqu'assurément on ne l'épargnat pas.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 5, p. 1177.

Talem dives arat Capua, et vicina Vesevo
Ora jugo ———————————

Virgil. Georg. l. ii. 224.

In primis Capua, heu! rebus servare serenis
Inconsulta modum, et pravo peritura tumore.

Sil. Italic. viii. 546.

Nec Capuam pelago, cultûque penûque potentem,
Deliciis, opibus, famâque priore, silebo,
Fortunâ variante vices, quæ freta secundis
Nescivit servare modum; nunc subdita Romæ,
Æmula tunc ———————————
Illa potens opibusque valens, Roma altera quondam
Comere quæ paribus potuit fastigia conis,
Octavum rejecta locum vix pone tuetur.

Auson. de claris Urbibus.

Les Romains pensoient qu'il n'y avoit que trois villes, Carthage, Corinthe, et Capoue, en état de soutenir dignement le fardeau d'un grand empire.

Cicer. de Leg. Agrar. ii. 32.

Cluv. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 5, p. 1178.

Le mont Tifata étoit cette chaine de collines qui s'étend du Vulturnus au-dessus des ruines de Capoue, de la ville de Caserta, et des bourgs de Matalone et d'Arvenzo. Elle dominoit Capoue; mais il y avoit entre le pied de la montagne et la ville une plaine assez grande pour y mettre en bataille une troupe nombreuse.

Tit. Liv. iv. 37.

Sil. Italic. xii. 486.

——————— Arduus ipse
Tifata invadit propior, quà mœnibus instat
Collis, et e tumulis subjectam despicit urbem.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 5.

III. PICENTINI. Ce peuple étoit une colonie que les Romains avoient tirée des Piceni de la mer Adriatique. Les Picentini ne leur demeurèrent pas attachés pendant la guerre d'Hannibal; et le sénat les en punit en détruisant leurs villes pour ne leur plus permettre de demeurer que dans des bourgs ouverts. Leur pays s'étendoit du promontoire de Minerve au Silarus. J'y trouve, 1. Picentia, chef lieu de la cité; 2. Salernum dans les montagnes, (celui d'aujourd'hui est sur les bords de la mer); les Romains y envoyèrent une colonie, la septième année après la seconde guerre Punique; 3. Marcina.

Strabon. Geog. v. p. 173.

Sil. Italic. viii. 584.

Ille et pugnacis laudavit tela Salerni,
Falcatos enses ———————

II. BAIÆ.

Horat. Epist. i. 1.

Nullus in orbe sinus Baiis prælucet amœnis,
Si dixit Dives; lacus et mare sensit amorem Festinantis heri ——————— ——————— locuples quem ducit priva triremis.

I. 1. PEDANA REGIO.

Horat. Epist. i. 4.

Quid nunc te dicam facere in regione Pedanâ?

I. 1. ALBA.

I. 1. ALBA.

Quod si bruma nives Albanis illinet agris, Horat. Epist. i. 7.
Ad mare descendet vates tuus, et sibi parcet.

I. 5. SINUESSA.

Vina bibes, iterum Tauro, diffusa palustres Idem. i. 5.
Inter Minturnas Sinuessanumque petrinum.

I. 4. AQUINUM.

—— qui Sidonio contendere callidus ostro Horat. Epist. i. 10.
Nescit Aquinatem potantia vellera fucum.

I. 5. GABII ET FIDENÆ.

Scis Lebedus quid sit; Gabiis desertior atque Horat. Epist. i. 11.
Fidenis vicus ——————————.

III. SALERNUM.

Quæ sit hiems Veliæ, quod cœlum, Vala, Salerni; Horat. Epistol. l. i. 15.
Quorum hominum regio, et qualis via; ————
Major utrum populum frumenti copia pascat,
Collectosne bibant imbres, puteosne perennes Dulcis aquæ: (nam vina nihil moror illius oræ.
— — — — —
Tractus uter plures lepores, uter educet apros;
Utra magis pisces et echinos æquora celent;
Pinguis ut inde domum possim Phæaxque reverti.

1. FERONIA. On n'élevoit plus de tours entre Feronia et Terracina parcequ'elles étoient toutes frappées de la foudre. Plin. Hist. Natur. l. ii. 55.

2. PITHECUSÆ INSULÆ. On dit que les îles de Pithecusa et de Prochyte étoient sorties de la mer par un tremblement de terre. Idem. ii. 88.

3. PUTEOLI ET SINUESSA. Les exhalaisons de ces endroits étoient mortels pour les animaux, et quelquefois pour les hommes. Idem. ii. 93.

4. BAIÆ. Il y a des sources chaudes, dans la mer même. Idem. ii. 103.

Plin. Hist. Natur. ii. 107. 5. ARICIA. Il y a des auteurs qui disent que la terre y est si remplie de chaleur, qu'un charbon qui tombe s'enflamme tout de suite.

Idem, xiv. 2. Cineas, ambassadeur de Pyrrhus, remarqua que les vignes s'y élevoient à une grande hauteur, mais que le vin avoit un goût dur et désagréable.

Idem, xiv. 2. 6. CAMPANIA. Ses habitans attachoient toujours leurs vignes à des peupliers.

Idem, xiv. 6. 7. SETIA ET CÆCUBUM. Auguste préféroit le vin de Setia à tous les autres. Celui de Cæcubum avoit auparavant la grande réputation; mais du tems de Pline il étoit tout à fait tombé, plutôt par la négligence des cultivateurs que par le canal que Néron avoit fait tirer à travers leurs marais.

Idem, xiv. 6. 8. FALERNUM (Vinum). Le vin de Falernum étoit le second en dignité. Le raisin n'en étoit point agréable non plus que celui des deux autres. Le Gaurum et le Faustinum en étoient des crus différens. On le gâta à la fin, à force d'en vouloir trop avoir.

Idem, xiv. 6. 9. ALBANUM (Vinum). Le vin d'Alba tenoit le troisième rang. Il étoit fort doux.

Idem, xiv. 6. 10. SURRENTINUM (Vinum). L'Empereur Tibère le trouvoit plutôt sain qu'agréable.

Idem, xiv. 6. 11. MASSICUM (Vinum). Ce vin, aussi bien que ceux de Fundi et de Calenum, avoit beaucoup de réputation.

Idem, xiv. 6. 12. SIGNIUM (Vinum). Ce vin est fort astringent. Le souper du triomphe de Jules César leur donna le quatrième rang dans les repas.

Idem, xviii. 6. 13. LUCULLI ET SCÆVOLÆ VILLÆ. Le fonds de Scævola

Scævola étoit trop grand pour sa maison ; le fonds de Lucullus trop petit pour la sienne.

14. Marii Villa. Sylla louoit la situation de la maison de Marius. Il y trouvoit la science d'un homme de guerre, qui savoit bien asseoir son camp. Plin. Hist. Natur. l. xviii. 6.

15. Puteoli. Auguste fit venir d'Alexandrie une obélisque, qu'il consacra dans les chantiers de Puteoli ; une incendie l'y consuma. Idem, xxxvi. 9.

16. Campania. Sa plaine, de quarante milles, au pied des montagnes, est le canton le plus fertile de l'Italie : cette partie surtout que les Grecs appellent Phlegræus. Idem, xviii. 11.

17. Naples. La colline entre Naples et Puteoli, appellée Leucogea, produit une certaine craie dont on mélange le pain. Auguste en donna vingt mille sesterces par an aux Napolitains, pour l'usage de sa colonie de Capoue. Idem, xviii. 11.

18. Appia (Via.) La Voie Appia étoit la plus belle comme la plus ancienne de toutes. Elle étoit de grandes pierres de taille. Le censeur Appius Claudius l'avoit faite A. U. C. 442, et elle s'est très bien conservée jusqu'au tems de Procope. Appius ne l'avoit conduite que jusqu'à Capoue ; on croit que ce fut Jules César qui la continua jusqu'à Brundusium. Il paroît que c'étoit des carrières de Sinuesse, et du Mont Misenus qu'on tira les pierres pour la construire. Bergier. Hist. des Grands Chemins de l'Empire Romain, l. i. c. 8. p. 23. et l. ii. c. 26. p. 221–228.

19. Domitiana (Via). L'Empereur Domitien tira de Sinuesse sur la Voie Appia, jusqu'à Puteoli, un magnifique chemin, pour l'agrément des voyageurs, qui étoient auparavant obligés de traverser des Idem, l. ii. c. 27. p. 228-234.

des marais et des sables fort incommodes. Dans plusieurs endroits il étoit pavé de grands carreaux de marbre. Il passoit sur le fleuve Vulturne, que Domitien rendit navagable en nettoyant son lit, et en empêchant ses débordemens. Le poëte Stace fait une belle description de cette route.

Bergier, Grands Chemins, l. i. c. 17. p. 57.

Pomptinæ (Paludes). Trajan construisit une chaussée depuis Forum Appii jusqu'à Terracina, à travers les marais Pomptins, qu'on traversoit auparavant sur un canal. Trajan fit aussi dessécher ces marais, qui avoient inondé un terrein si considérable qu'il y avoit autrefois vingt-trois villes.

Idem, l. xi. c. 4. p. 134.

21. Tibur. La pierre de Tibur étoit du genre tempéré. Elle résistoit aux poids, à l'humidité, et à la gelée. Mais le feu lui étoit fatal.

Idem, l. xi. c. 16. p. 167.

22. Privernas. Les chemins du territoire des Privernates étoient creux et profonds. Ils formoient des défilés très dangereux pour la marche des troupes.

Idem, l. xi. c. 16. p. 168.

23. Terracina. Le censeur Appius en travaillant à son chemin fit percer un rocher près de Terracina. L'ouverture est de cent pieds de long sur quinze de large, avec des trottoirs de chaque côté larges de deux pieds. Les murailles, taillées dans le roc, sont chargées d'inscriptions, de dix pieds en dix pieds sur sa hauteur, qui vous paroissent toutes égales, parceque leur grandeur augmente à proportion qu'elles s'éloignent de l'œil.

Idem, l. xi. c. 21. p. 200.

24. Preneste. Sylla fit connoître le premier en Italie, les pavés à la Mosaïque. Il en plaça un dans le temple de la Fortune à Préneste.

Idem, l. xi. c. 41. p. 308.

La famille des Gordiens avoit une très belle mai-

son

son de campagne auprès de Prénéste. Sans parler des basiliques, des bains et des jardins, il y avoit un péristyle, soutenu de deux cens colonnes de marbre, dont cinquante étoient de Caryste, cinquante de Syene en Egypte, et cinquante de la Numidie.

Nec Prænestinæ fundator defuit urbis,
Volcano genitum, pecora inter agrestia regem,
Inventumque focis, omnis quem credidit ætas,
Cæculus. Hunc legio comitatur agrestis,
Quique altum Præneste viri.— Virgil. Æn. l. vii. 678.

Après la défaite générale des Latins, on ôta aux Prénestins une partie de leur territoire pour les punir d'avoir fait alliance avec les Gaulois. Malgré la loi Cornelia, le territoire de Préneste étoit, au tems de Cicéron, entre les mains d'un petit nombre de grands seigneurs. T. Liv. viii. 14. Cicero in Rull. Orat. ii. 28.

25. Sinuessa. Le sénat et le peuple érigèrent un arc de triomphe à Domitien, à l'endroit où sa nouvelle route de Puteoli à Sinuessa se joignoit à la Via Appia. Bergier. GrandsChemins, l. xi. c. 40. p. 300.

26. Tibur. L'Empereur Hadrien y avoit une maison de campagne, qui rassembloit les différentes parties de l'univers. Athènes, Tempe, Canope et jusqu'aux Enfers, tout s'y trouvoit imité avec le plus grand soin. Idem, l. xi. c. 41. p. 309.

Tum gemini fratres Tiburtia mœnia linquunt,
Fratris Tiburtis dictam cognomine gentem, Catillusque, Acerque Coras, Argiva juventus. Virgil. Æn. l. vii. 670.

——————— domus Albuneæ resonantis,
Et præceps Anio, et Tiburni lucus, et uda Mobilibus pomaria rivis. Horat. Carm. l. i. Od. vii. 12.

——————— proni Tiburis arce. Juv. Satir. iii. 192.

L'alliance

T. Liv. viii. 14. L'alliance de ceux de Tibur avec les Gaulois leur coûta une partie de leurs terres.

Idem, vi. 25, 26. viii. 14. 27. TUSCULUM. Les Tusculans ayant eu quelque part dans une révolte, on envoya Camille contre eux. Ils surent désarmer ce général, en lui ouvrant leurs portes et en refusant de faire la guerre. Ce procédé toucha le sénat. On leur accorda la paix, et bientôt après, la bourgeoisie, qui ne fut pas même ôtée après la guerre des Latins.

28. ANAGNIA.

Virgil. Æn. vii. 684. ———— quos dives Anagnia pascit.

29. GABII.

Idem, vii. 682. ———— quique arva Gabinæ Junonis.

30. HERNICA (Sara).

Idem, vii. 683. ———— gelidumque Anienem, et roscida rivis
Hernica saxa colunt.

31. VULTURNUS.

Idem, vii. 728. ———— amnisque vadosi
Accola Vulturni.

32. ARICIA.

Idem, vii. 762-778. ———— mater Aricia misit,
Eductum Egeriæ lucis, Hymettia circum
Litora, pinguis ubi et placabilis ara Dianæ.
———— templo Triviæ lucisque sacratis
Cornipedes arcentur equi.

Juvenal. Sat. iv. 117. Dignus Aricinos qui mendicaret ad axes.

33. ANXUR, vel TERRACINA.

Idem, vii. 800. ———— Anxurus Jupiter arvis Præsidet.
———— subimus
Impositum saxis latis candentibus Anxur.

Horat. Serm. i. 5.

34. FERONIA.

Virgil. Æn. vii. 801. ———— viridi gaudens Feronia luco.

Horat. Serm. i. 5. Ora manusque tuâ lavimus, Feronia, lymphâ.

35.

35. ARDEA. Il y avoit des levées de terre qui formoient un port, et que les empereurs Héliogabale et Alexandre Sévère firent réparer. Bergier. Grands Chemins, l. iv. c. 48. p. 804.

36. GABII.

Simplicibus Gabiis,———— Juvenal. Satir. iii. 192.

———— Vivat Gabiis, ut vixit in agro: Idem, vi. 56.
Vivat Fidenis, et agro cedo paterno.

———— noti celebresque poetæ Idem, vii. 3.
Balneolum Gabiis, Romæ conducere furnos Tentarent.

37. SORA.

———— optima Soræ, Idem, iii. 223.
Aut Fabrateriæ domus, aut Frusinone paratur;
Quanti nunc tenebras unum conducis in annum.

38. AQUINUM.

———————— Quoties te Idem, iii. 313.
Roma tuo refici properantem, reddet Aquino,
Me quoque ad Helvinam Cererem, vestramque Dianam
Convelle à Cumis. Satyrarum ego, ni pudet illas, Adjutor gelidos veniam caligatus in agros.

39. VIA LATINA.

Clivosæ veheris dum per monumenta Latinæ. Idem, v. 55.

40. ALBA.

—— lacus suberant, ubi quanquam diruta, servat Idem, iv. 60.
Ignem Trojanum, et Vestam colit Alba minorem.

———————— cominus ursos Idem, iv. 99.
Figebat Numidas, Albanâ nudus arena.

Cras bibet Albanis aliquid de montibus, aut de Idem, v. 33.
Setinis, cujus patriam, titulumque senectus
Delevit, multâ veteris fuligine testæ.

41. PRÆNESTE.

Quis timet aut timuit gelida Præneste ruinam? Idem, iii. 190.

42. POMPTINA

Juvenal. Satir. iii. 305.

42. POMPTINA (Palus.)

Interdum et ferro subito grassator agit rem,
Armato quoties tutæ custode tenentur
Et Pomptina palus et Gallinaria sylva.

Virgil. Æn. vii. 803.

43. VOLSCI ET PRIVERNUM.

Hos super advenit Volscâ de gente Camilla
Agmen agens equitum et florentes ære catervas.

Idem, xi. 540.

Pulsus ob invidiam regno, viresque superbas,
Priverno antiquâ Metabus cum excederet urbe.
Ecce fugæ medio summis Amasenus abundans
Spumabat ripis, tantus se nubibus imber Ruperat.

T. Liv. viii. 20, 21.

Après la guerre des Latins, la réponse hardie d'un citoyen de Privernum valut à ses compatriotes la paix et la bourgeoisie de Rome.

Idem, viii. 14.

44. LANUVIUM. Dans ce même tems on donna la bourgeoisie aux Lanuviens, à condition que les Romains participassent au temple et au bois sacré de Junon Sospita.

Idem, viii. 14.

45. VELITRÆ. Comme ceux de Velitræ s'étoient souvent révoltés, on les transporta au-delà du Tibre, leur défendant de se jamais trouver de l'autre côté de la rivière sous la peine de mille livres d'airain, ou de la prison, jusqu'à ce que l'amende fut payée. On envoya une colonie sur les terres de leurs sénateurs.

46. FORUM APPII.

Horat. Serm. l. i. 5.

——————— inde forum Appî
Differtum nautis, cauponibus atque malignis.

47. ANTIUM. Après la guerre des Latins, on envoya une nouvelle colonie à Antium, avec droit de bourgeoisie. Mais on emmena les galères des Antiates et on leur interdit la navigation.

48. SETIA.

48. Setia. On y envoya une colonie, A.U.C. 372. Pour ces colonies v. Vell. Pat. l. i. c. 14, 15.
49. Aricia. . . . . A.U.C. 413.
50. Cales. . . . . A.U.C. 433.
51. Fundi. . . . . A.U.C. 436.
52. Formiæ. . . . . A.U.C. 436.
53. Acerræ. . . . . A.U.C. 437.
54. Terracina. . . . . A.U.C. 440.
55. Luceria . . . . . A.U.C. 444.
56. Suessa Aurunca. . . . . A.U.C. 447.
57. Saticula. . . . . A.U.C. 447.
58. Sora. . . . . A.U.C. 459.
59. Minturnæ. . . . . A.U.C. 459.
60. Sinuessa. . . . . A.U.C. 459.
61. Puteoli. . . . . A.U.C. 575.
62. Salernum. . . . . A.U.C. 575.
63. Fabrateria. . . . . A.U.C. 630.
64. Fregellæ. . . . . A.U.C. 514.

Le calcul de Velleius paroît un peu embrouillé pour qui voudroit l'éplucher un peu soigneusement. Dans cette réduction je me suis particulièrement attaché aux consulats qu'il a indiqués comme aux dates les mieux constatées.

65. Ostia. Le Tibre, avant que de se jetter dans la mer, se partage en deux bras qui forment l'île sacrée. La ville d'Ostie est située à l'une des embouchures sur le continent, et le fameux port du même nom à l'embouchure septentrionale aussi sur le continent. Comme le limon, qui remplissoit ces embouchures, empêchoit les grands vaisseaux de s'approcher des côtes, Jules César conçut le dessein de ce port, mais ce fut Claude qui l'exécuta avec des dépenses prodigieuses. Il fit creuser un grand port, Berg. Grands Chemins, l. iii. c. 27. p. 447, 449, et l. iv. c. 49. p. 812-814.

port, bâtit deux grandes levées de terre et de maçonnerie, pour en embrasser le contour, et construisit à l'entrée une île artificielle, dont on appuya les fondemens sur le fameux navire qui avoit apporté l'obélisque d'Alexandrie. Sur cette île il éleva un phare. Dans la suite Trajan répara cet ouvrage. Comme le chemin du port étoit très fréquenté on l'avoit partagé en deux parties, l'une pour ceux qui alloient à Rome, l'autre pour ceux qui en revenoient.

Plin. Epist. ii. 17.

66. LAURENS. La maison de campagne de Pline étoit à dix-sept milles de Rome. Pour y aller on suivoit le chemin de Laurentinum, jusqu'au quatorzième milliaire, ou celui d'Ostie, jusqu'au onzième. La route est en partie sablonneuse, et fatigante pour les voitures, mais très agréable lorsqu'on la fait à cheval. La variété du pays, les prés, les pâturages, et les troupeaux nombreux de bœufs et de chevaux qui descendent des montagnes pour y jouir du soleil du printems, tout contribuoit à embellir ce canton. On y manque d'eaux courantes, mais on creuse partout des puits, et l'on trouve toujours très près de la surface une excellente eau, que le voisinage de la mer n'a point corrompu. On a beaucoup de bois et de lait, mais la mer n'est pas poissonneuse. Il y a beaucoup de maisons de campagne le long de cette côte.

67. ALBA.

Juvenal. Satir. xii. 70.

——————— gratus Iülo,
Atque novercali sedes prælata Lavino,
Conspicitur sublimis apex: cui candida nomen
Scrofa dedit, lætis Phrygibus mirabile sumen,
Et nunquam visis triginta clara mamillis.

68. OSTIA.

68. Ostia.

Tandem intrat positas inclusa per æquora moles, Juvenal. Satir. xii. 75.
Tyrrhenamque Pharon, porrectaque brachia rursum
Quæ Pelago currunt medio, longeque relinquunt
Italiam; non sic igitur mirabere portus,
Quos natura dedit: ——

69. Circeium.

Proxima Circææ raduntur litora terræ; Virg. Æneid. vii. 10—21.
Dives inaccessos ubi Solis filia lucos
Assiduo resonat cantû, tectisque superbis
Urit odoratam nocturna in lumina cedrum,
Arguto tenues percurrens pectine telas.
Hinc exaudiri gemitus, iræque leonum
Vincla recusantum, et serâ sub nocte rudentum:
Setigerique sues, atque in præsepibus ursi
Sævire, et formæ magnorum ululare luporum:
Quos hominum ex facie Dea sæva potentibus herbis
Induerat Circe in vultus et terga ferarum.

70. Cajeta.

Tu quoque litoribus nostris, Æneïa nutrix, Idem. vii. 1.
Æternam moriens famam, Cajeta, dedisti:
Et nunc servat honos sedem tuus; ossaque nomen
Hesperiâ in magnâ (si qua est ea gloria) signant.

71. Luculli Villæ. Lucullus tira de quelques îles du Nil un beau marbre noir, dont il se servit beaucoup dans ses bâtimens. Il fut le seul particulier qui donna son nom à une espèce de marbre. Berg. Grands Chemins, l. v. c. 4. p. 327.

72. Cumæ. La ville de Cumes, la plus ancienne de toutes les colonies Grecques en Italie, fut fondée par ceux de la ville du Cumes en Asie, et ceux de la ville de Chalcis dans l'île d'Eubée. Les commencemens de la colonie furent brillans. Elle étendit bientôt sa domination sur les champs fertiles qu'on nommoit Phlégréens; mais les Campa- Strab. l. v. p. 168.

niens la soumirent enfin, et traitèrent ses habitans avec beaucoup de tyrannie et d'indignité. Il reste encore quelques vestiges des mœurs et des usages Grecs. Auprès de la ville il y a un assez grand bois dont le terrein est sablonneux et sans eau. Ce fut là que Sexte Pompée rassembla sa flotte de corsaires. Un endroit qui manquoit d'eau me paroît un singulier rendez-vous pour une escadre.

Virg. Æneid. l. vi. 2.
—— tandem Euboïcis Cumarum adlabitur oris.
— — — — —

Id. vi. 9.
At pius Æneas arces quibus altus Apollo
Præsidet, horrendæque procul secreta Sibyllæ,
Antrum immane, petit; magnam cui mentem animumque
Delius inspirat vates, aperitque futura.
Jam subeunt Triviæ lucos, atque aurea tecta.
Dædalus, ——

— — — — —

Id. vi. 17.
Chalcidicâque levis tandem super adstitit arce.
Redditus hic primum terris, tibi, Phœbe, sacravit
Remigium alarum, posuitque immania templa.

Id. vi. 41.
———— vocat alta in templa sacerdos.
Excisum Euboïcæ latus ingens rupis in antrum,
Quo lati ducunt aditus centum, ostia centum:
Unde ruunt totidem voces, responsa Sibyllæ.

Juvenal. Satir. iii. 1—5.
Quamvis digressû veteris confusus amici,
Laudo tamen vacuis quod sedem figere Cumis
Destinet, atque unum civem donare Sibyllæ.
Janua Bajarum est, et gratum litus amœni
Secessûs, ————

Vell. Paterc. Hist. Roman. l. i. 4. Edit. Burman.
Peu de tems après la guerre de Troie les habitans de Chalcis fondèrent la ville de Cumes. Hippocles et Megasthènes y conduisirent une flotte dont le cours étoit dirigé (dit-on) par une colombe qui les les précédoit toujours; ou selon d'autres, par des sons d'airain semblables à ceux dont on se sert dans les rits de Cerès, et qu'ils entendoient pendant la nuit. Cumes envoya bientôt une colonie qui fonda Naples. La belle situation de Cumes et sa fidélité aux Romains l'ont fait fleurir, mais le voisinage des Osci lui a fait perdre les mœurs Grecques en bonne partie. La grandeur des murailles montre quelle a dû être l'ancienne splendeur de cette ville.

Selon Eusèbe, Cumes ne fut fondée que 311 ans après la guerre de Troie.

NAPLES. Naples est une colonie des Cuméens. Comme elle s'est distinguée par sa fidélité aux Romains elle a mieux conservé les mœurs Grecques. Son ancienne grandeur se prouve également par l'étendue de ses murailles. Naples, fondée originairement par les Cuméens, fut obligée de recevoir dans la suite une colonie de Campaniens, ce qui a un peu mélangé les mœurs. Celles des Grecs l'emportent cependant de beaucoup. On y voit des confrairies religieuses, des lieux d'exercice pour la jeunesse, des combats gymniques célébrés par l'ordre d'un oracle, auprès du tombeau de Parthenope, une des Sirènes. La beauté du lieu, les bains chauds qui sont très ornés, et les usages Grecs qui y règnent, en font une retraite charmante pour ces Romains que l'age, les infirmités, ou le caractère ont dégoûté du tracas des affaires, et de la capitale. Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 170.

Illo Virgilium me tempore dulcis alebat
Parthenope, studiis florentem ignobilis otî. Virg. Georg. l. iv. 562.

Tacit. Ann. xv. 33. Sueton. in Neron. c. 20, 25.

Néron la choisit comme une ville Grecque, pour y faire le premier essai des théâtres publics. Il y chanta à une assemblée très nombreuse, avec tant d'ardeur, qu'un tremblement de terre, qui ébranla le théâtre, put à peine l'interrompre. A son retour des jeux de la Grèce, il suivit tous les usages des vainqueurs. Il fit son entrée dans Naples par une brèche faite exprès, et dans un char de triomphe, attelé de chevaux blancs.

Hist. Civile de Naples par Giannone, v. i p. 20—31.

Elle étoit ville libre et alliée; du tems des Romains, se gouvernant par ses propres loix, et ne devant pour tout tribut que le secours de ses vaisseaux en tems de guerre. Elle refusa même la bourgeoisie de Rome. Enfin sous les empereurs, elle devint colonie. Parmi ses confrairies, les plus connues étoient celles d'Eumelus, d'Hebon, de Castor, et d'Aristée.

MISENUM.

Virg. Æneid. vi. 232.

At pius Æneas ingenti mole sepulchrum
Imponit, suaque arma viro, remumque, tubamque,
Monte sub aërio, qui nunc Misenus ab illo
Dicitur, æternumque tenet per secula nomen.

Berg. Grands Chemins, l. iv. c. 49. p. 811.

Auguste fit faire un beau port à Misenum capable de recevoir un grand nombre de vaisseaux; ce fut là qu'il établit la flotte destinée à la garde de la mer Toscane.

Néron ayant ordonné à ses galères de revenir en Campanie, à un jour précis ils partirent de Formies, mais ayant rencontré une tempête furieuse, elles ne purent point doubler le promontoire de Misenum, mais elles échouèrent sur la côte de Cumes.

Cluver. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. p. 1137.

PUTEOLI. Cette ville est appellée Puteoli par les les Latins, et Dicæarchia par les Grecs. Ce n'est pas que les poëtes Romains ne se servent quelquefois du nom de Dicæarchia, et que les historiens Grecs qui ont vécu sous l'empire Romain, ne la nomment quelquefois Puteoli. Elle fut bâtie par les Samiens la quatrième année de la soixante-quatrième Olympiade, 521 ans avant Jesus Christ.

Elle n'étoit dans le commencement que le port de Cumes, située sur le bord du rivage. Dans la seconde guerre Punique, ses habitans la placèrent là où elle est actuellement dans un terrein rempli de souffre, de volcans, et de sources minérales. Elle est très commerçante; ses ports et ses moles sont construits avec beaucoup d'art. Un sable dont on fait un ciment qui se durcit dans l'eau, leur donne une grande facilité à faire toute sorte d'ouvrages dans la mer. Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 169.

Du tems de Cicéron Puteoli étoit ville libre et autonome. Cicero. in Rul. de Leg. Agrar. Orat. ii. 31.

Néron donna à l'ancienne ville de Puteoli, les droits d'une colonie et son propre nom. Tacit. Ann. xiv. 27.

Les habitans de Puteoli érigèrent à Antonin le pieux, un arc de triomphe, pour avoir réparé le port et les moles de leur ville. Un golfe de trois mille six cens pas Romains de largeur sépare les villes de Puteoli et de Baïes. Ce fut là que Caligula fit construire son fameux pont. Il le composa de navires ronds, accouplés deux à deux, et arrêtés à leurs ancres. Il les couvrit ensuite d'une levée de terre, qu'il fit paver de grands carreaux de pierre. Il passa en triomphe sur ce pont deux jours consécutifs. Le premier jour à cheval portant Berg. Grands Chemins, l. ii. c. 40. p. 300. Idem, l. iv. c. 36, p. 738. Sueton. in Caligul. c. 19.

tant la cuirasse d'Alexandre, et le lendemain dans un char attelé de deux chevaux célèbres, toujours environné d'un grands corps de cavalerie et d'infanterie, qu'il harangua sur le pont, et à qui il fit une distribution d'argent.

Berg. Grands Chemins, l. ii. c. 16. p. 170–175. Tacit. Ann. iv. 58. vi. 26.

Dans le chemin de Puteoli à Naples se trouve la montagne de Pausilipus qui s'étend jusqu'à la mer. On l'a percé à jour pour y faire un passage souterrain où deux voitures peuvent passer de front. Il a environ un mille de longueur, sur douze à quinze pieds de largeur et de hauteur. Il ne reçoit l'air et le jour que par plusieurs soupirails. Strabon attribue ce grand ouvrage à un certain Cocceius, (celui peut-être dont Tacite fait mention,) mais la tradition du pays le donne à Lucullus. Quoiqu'il en soit, le roi Alphonse d'Arragon le répara, et le viceroi Don Pierre de Tolède l'acheva.

Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 168 —170.

BAJÆ. Le luxe et la santé attirèrent les Romains à Baïes, dont la situation étoit charmante, et les eaux minérales très salutaires. Des maisons de campagne couvroient tous ses environs. Les bains sont nombreux et magnifiques, et l'on a construit autour d'eux une ville nouvelle aussi grande que Puteoli.

Horat. Carm. l. ii. 18.

Tu secanda marmora
Locas sub ipsum funus, ac sepulchri
Immemor struis domos;
Marisque Baiis obstrepentis urges
Summovere litora,
Parum locuples continente ripâ.

Juv. Sat. xi. 49.

Qui vertêre solum Bajas et ad Ostia currunt.

LUCRINUS ET AVERNUS LACUS.

Virg. Geog. l. ii. 161—165.

An memorem portus Lucrinoque addita claustra,

Atque

Atque indignatum magnis stridoribus æquor:
Julia quà ponto longe mugit unda refuso,
Tyrrhenusque fretis immittitur æstus Avernis?

Ce fut Agrippa qui fit tous ces ouvrages. Voici l'idée qu'on peut s'en faire en combinant les récits de Strabon et de Servius. 1. Le lac Lucrin étoit proprement un golfe long et étroit; mais comme l'idée d'en faire un port s'étoit présentée aux anciens habitans du canton, Agrippa trouva une levée de terre qui traversoit son embouchure, et qui étoit assez large pour porter un chariot; il la fit rétablir dans toute sa longueur qui étoit d'un mille; y laissant une ouverture (apparemment au moyen d'un pont-levis) pour les vaisseaux. Ce port n'a jamais cependant pu servir que pour les plus petits vaisseaux, mais la pèche des huitres y est très considérable. 2. Il fit couper une communication entre le lac Lucrin, et celui d'Averne qui n'en étoit séparé que par une petite langue, et fit entrer la mer dans ce dernier, qui étoit situé plus dans l'intérieur des terres. Agrippa en fit un port très magnifique et très commode pour la réception des vaisseaux. 3. Le lac Averne étoit dans un emplacement singulier. Des montagnes escarpées, couvertes de forêts anciennes et sombres l'environnoient de toutes parts, et ses eaux étoient très profondes même tout près des bords. Il étoit devenu le théâtre des fables. C'étoit le lac infernal d'Homère; on voyoit tout auprès la fontaine de Styx; jamais oiseau n'avoit pu traverser l'Averne sans y tomber mort. Ses rivages étoient remplies des habitations des Cimmeriens; c'étoient des mortels

Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 168—169.
Serv. ad loc. Virgil.

(dirai-je ou des ombres) qui demeuroient dans des maisons souterraines où ils ne voyoient jamais le soleil. Agrippa fit couper ces bois, les environs du lac se défrichèrent et se peuplèrent bientôt, et toutes ces fables disparurent.

Strabon. Idem. l. v. p. 171.

PROCHYTA ET PITHECUSÆ. Ces îles (le sépulchre fabuleux de Typhon) paroissent assises sur des feux souterrains, qui percent très souvent par les volcans et les tremblemens de terre, et toujours par les eaux chaudes. Un tremblement de terre détacha Prochyta des autres îles.

Idem. l. v. p. 172.

CAPREÆ. Il y avoit auparavant deux bourgs. Du tems de Strabon il n'en restoit qu'un seul. Auguste rendit les îles Pitecuses aux Napolitains en échange pour celle-ci, qu'il s'appropria, et où il fit beaucoup de bâtimens.

Tacit. Ann. iv. 67. Sueton. in Tiber. c. 41 —43—72.

Tibère goûta beaucoup cette île; la beauté de la vue, (de cette côte de Campanie si belle avant l'éruption du mont Vésuve,) la douceur du climat, le promontoire de Surrentinum dont elle n'étoit éloignée que de trois milles; tout en faisoit une retraite délicieuse: pendant qu'une mer orageuse, des rochers qui l'entouroient et qu'on ne pouvoit grâvir que par un seul endroit, la rendoient une solitude digne du caractère sauvage et soupçonneux de ce tyran. Il y bâtit douze maisons de campagne pour les différentes saisons; toutes dignes de la magnificence et de la débauche du maître. Les bois étoient remplis de lieux de prostitution, et des satyres et des nymphes ne les laissoient point oisifs. Tibère se fixa à Caprées A. U. C. 780, et dans dans dix ans, jusqu'à sa mort, il n'en sortit que deux fois.

Sect. IX.

LUCANIA ET BRUTTIUM.

Lucania. Le sang unissoit les Lucaniens et les Bruttiens avant que les Romains en formassent une province. L'un et l'autre peuple sortoient des Samnites, dont les colonies successives se poussoient peu à peu jusqu'à l'extrémité de l'Italie. On ignore l'époque où les Lucaniens se détachèrent du corps des Samnites, mais on sait que vers l'an 356 avant J. C. une grande multitude de bergers Lucaniens se jettèrent sur les débris de la monarchie de Syracuse et prirent la forme d'une nation et le nom de Bruttiens. Quelques uns ont cru que c'étoit un sobriquet injurieux d'esclaves fugitifs que leurs voisins leur donnoient. Cette région étoit la seule qui s'étendit aux deux mers, jusqu'au Silarus sur la mer Toscane qui la séparoit de la Campanie, et jusqu'au Bradanus sur le golfe de Tarente qui la divisoit de l'Apulie. Ces deux nations demeurèrent toujours fidèles à leurs ayeux Samnites et souffrirent avec eux. Des revers perpétuels les avoient tellement abattus que du tems de Strabon ils vivoient épars dans quelques bourgades obscures et foibles, ayant perdu leurs usages, leur langue, et tout ce qui peut distinguer un corps politique. On ne peut suivre une autre méthode, en parlant de cette province, que celle-ci, 1. La Lucanie propre, et 2. Le Bruttium.

V. l'Italia Antiqua de Delisle. Cluv. l. iv. c. 14, et Strab. Geog. vi. p. 175.

Lucania.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 14.

LUCANIA PROPRIA. Les bornes de la Lucanie sont faciles à marquer. Du côté des terres c'étoient celles de la région. Le Laus sur la mer Toscane et le Crathis sur le golfe de Tarente la séparoient du Bruttium. L'Apennin la coupoit du nord au midi, et formoit ainsi deux parties, dont celle du golfe de Tarente étoit une grande et belle plaine arrosée de vingt rivières. J'y trouve, 1. Sybaris, ou Thurium; 2. Zagarina; 3. Heraclea entre le Siris et l'Aciris; 4. Metapontum; 5. Grumentum; et 6. Acalandra. L'autre côté de l'Apennin n'offroit qu'un pays plus étroit et en général sablonneux et peu fertile. J'y vois, 1. Pæstum ou Posidonium; 2. Elæa ou Velia; 3. Pyxus ou Buxentum. Je ne parle pas de quelques bourgades dont nous ne connoissons que les noms.

V. Cluvier. ItaliaAntiq. l. iv. c. 14. p. 1263—1271. Strab.Geog. vi. p. 182.

SYBARIS. Cette ville Grecque, située entre les deux rivières Sybaris et Crathis, et qui s'étendoit de l'une à l'autre dans un espace de cinquante stades, devint puissante bientôt. Elle avoit rangé sous ses loix quatre nations barbares; vingt-cinq villes lui obéissoient. Elle mettoit sur pied trois cens milles hommes. Il y a surement de l'hyperbole; quand ce nombre seroit celui de tous ses citoyens et sujets en age viril, il nous donneroit encore pour cet état près de 900,000 ames. On peut s'en contenter. Son luxe égaloit sa puissance. Ses festins se préparoient une année à l'avance, et lorsque les citoyens voyageoient ils effaçoient la magnificence des plus grands rois. Les Crotoniates détruisirent Sybaris et sa puissance 510 ans avant avant J. C. Ses malheureux citoyens, dispersés par toute la Grèce, engagèrent les Athéniens à rétablir leur ville l'an 452. Thessalus, à la tête d'une colonie nombreuse, la rebâtit avec beaucoup de régularité, ayant tiré au cordeau trois grandes rues, coupées par quatre autres. Bientôt la discorde se mit dans l'état à l'occasion du partage des terres. Les nouveaux citoyens exterminèrent les anciens, et demeurèrent maîtres de la ville sous le nom de Thurium. Elle fleurit pendant quelque tems. Rivale malheureuse de Tarente, elle se mit sous la protection des Romains qui lui envoyèrent une colonie. Elle prit alors le nom de Copiæ, mais elle ne regagna plus son ancienne splendeur.

LAGARIA, colonie des Phocéens; son vin étoit doux, et très estimé par les médecins. Strab.Geog. l. vi. p. 182. Plin. Hist. Nat. xiv. 6.

HERACLEA, colonie des Phocéens. On y montroit un Palladium, relique fameuse qu'on se vantoit aussi de posséder à Rome, à Lavinium, et dans plusieurs autres endroits. Strab.Geog. l. vi. p. 182.

METAPONTUM. La tradition veut qu'un capitaine Pylien, séparé par une tempête de Nestor son chef dans leur retour de Troie, ait fondé Metapontum; mais l'histoire en fait une colonie des Achéens que les Lacédémoniens avoient chassé de leur pays: aussi furent-ils toujours les ennemis implacables de ceux de Tarente. Strab.Geog. l. vi. p. 183. Vell.Paterc. l. i. c. 1.

La vigne est quelquefois très grande; il y en avoit des colonnes dans le temple de Junon à Metapontum. Plin. Hist. Natur. xiv. 1.

PÆSTUM. Cette ville, nommée par les Grecs Posido- Strab.Geog. l. v. p. 173.

Posidonium, et qui a donné son nom au golfe où elle est située, est une colonie Dorienne, qui a passé successivement aux Sybarites, aux Lucaniens, et aux Romains. Elle est située auprès du Silarus.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 14. p. 1255.

On voit auprès de Pæstum, un étang salé, d'où sort une rivière de la même qualité, qui, après un cours de deux milles, se perd dans les marais, et rend le climat de Pæstum assez mal sain. Ce fut auprès de cet étang, Stagnum Salsum, que Crassus remporta un avantage sur les gladiateurs,

Sil. Italic. viii. 480.

——————— quem Picentia Pæsto
Misit, ———————————

Virg. Georg. iv. 118.

Forsitan et pingues hortos quæ cura colendi
Ornaret, canerem, biferique rosaria Pæsti.

Vell. Paterc. i. 14.

Les Romains envoyèrent une colonie à Pæstum A. U. C. 480.

Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 173.

Fluvius Silarus. Le Silarus, qui reçoit le Tanagrus, a la propriété de changer en pierre le bois qu'on y jette sans lui faire perdre sa couleur ni sa figure.

Virg. Georg. iii. 146.

Est lucos Silari circa, ilicibusque virentem
Plurimus Alburnum volitans, cui nomen Asilo
Romanum est œstron Graii vertere vocantes:
Asper, acerbà sonans: quo tota exterrita sylvis
Diffugiunt armenta, furit mugitibus æther
Concussus, sylvæque, et sicci ripa Tanagri.

Sil. Italic. viii. 582.

Nunc Silarus quos nutrit aquis, quo gurgite tradunt
Duritiem lapidum mersis inolescere ramis.

Strab. Geog. l. vi. p. 174.

Velia. Cette ville, appellée par les Grecs Elæa, est une colonie des Phociens. Ce peuple s'y retira après après la prise de sa ville par les Perses. Un territoire borné et stérile l'obligea de s'attacher à la mer. Une marine puissante et de sages loix le mirent bientôt en état de se défendre avec avantage contre les Lucaniens et le peuple de Pæstum quoiqu'ils lui fussent très supérieurs en forces.

PRO. PALINURUS.

—— tua finitimi longe lateque per urbes
Prodigiis acti cœlestibus ossa piabunt,
Et statuent tumulum, et tumulo solemnia mittent:
Æternumque locus Palinuri nomen habebit.
His dictis curæ emotæ, pulsusque parumper
Corde dolor tristi: gaudet cognomine terra.

Virg. Æneid. vi. 378.

BUXENTUM. Buxentum, ou Pyxus, est à la fois le nom du promontoire, de la rivière, et de la ville. Ceux de Messana y envoyèrent une colonie, qui se dispersa bientôt. Les Romains y en établirent une l'an de Rome 558.

Strab. Geog. l. vi. p. 174. Vel. Paterc. l. i. c. 15.

—————— quæ Buxentia pubes
Aptabat dextris, irrasæ robora clavæ.

Sil. Italic. viii. 585.

———————— seu sunt Buxentia cordi
Rura magis, centum Cereri fruticantia culmis.

Idem. ix. 204.

Comme Buxentum étoit un pays stérile, Cluvier conjecturé qu'il faut lire Byzacia, la partie la plus fertile de l'Afrique. L'idée est ingénieuse; et depuis Cluvier, Byzacia, appuyé de l'autorité d'un MS. est entré dans le texte de Silius Italicus. Il ne paroît cependant qu' Hannibal ne peut guères offrir à ses soldats que le choix des campagnes Italiques, le prix de leur victoire; selon l'usage ancien Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 14. p. 1261. Silius Italicus publié par Drakenborch à Utrecht, cien d'envoyer des colonies sur les terres dont on dépouilloit des peuples vaincus.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 15. Strab. Geog. l. vi.

II. BRUTTIUM. Comme il n'étoit point soudivisé par la politique il faut suivre la méthode que nous fournit la nature. Sur la côte Toscane je trouve, 1. Cerillæ; 2. Clampetia; 3. Terina; 4. Tempsa; 5. Lamelia; 6. Vibo Valentia; 7. Medama; 8. Taurianum; 9. Scyllæum, avec son promontoire, le promontoire Cænis, la colonne de Rhegium; 10. Rhegium, et le promontoire Leucopetra, la pointe la plus méridionale de l'Italie. Du promontoire Leucopetra à celui d'Hercule, la côte suit la direction de l'occident à l'orient. Après avoir tourné celui-ci, on se porte au nord. J'y vois le promontoire Zephyrium, 1. Locri, la Sagra; 2. Caulonia, le promontoire Cocinthum; 3. Scyllaceum; 4. Le Camp d'Hannibal; 5. Petilia, les trois promontoires Iapygiens et l'entrée du golfe de Tarente; le temple de Junon Lacinienne; 6. Croton, le Næthus; 7. Crimisa, avec sa rivière et son promontoire; 8. Ruscianum, et un peu plus loin, le Crathis. Presque toutes ces villes étoient des colonies Grecques qui s'étoient emparées des côtes en laissant aux barbares l'intérieur du pays. Celui-ci étoit sauvage et mal peuplé, couvert de montagnes qui étoient une suite de l'Apennin, et d'une forêt immense nommée Sila qui fournissoit de la poix excellente. J'y vois, 1. Pandosia; 2. Consentia; 3. Volcentum; et 4. Mamertum.

CERILLÆ.

Sil. Italic. viii. 581.

——— Et exhaustæ mox Pæno Marte, Cerillæ.

TEMPSA.

TEMPSA. Cette ville, nommée anciennement Temesa, étoit fameuse du tems d'Homère pour ses mines de cuivre dont Strabon a vu les traces. Les marchands y venoient de la Grèce.

Εις Τεμεσην μετα χαλκον ————————

On observoit à Tempsa un usage assez commun parmi les Payens, d'offrir tous les ans une jeune fille pour appaiser un génie irrité qui devoit être Ulysse. Un jeune Grec eut la hardiesse de se battre avec le génie, qui s'enfuit et qui se jetta à la mer. La superstition finit, mais la fable continua toujours de faire partie du symbole des Tempsains. Pausanias y vit un ancien tableau où cette aventure étoit représentée.

Homer. Odyss. i. v. 184.

VIBO VALENTIA. Cette ville, nommée par les Grecs Hipponium, étoit une colonie des Locriens. Les Bruttiens l'enlevèrent à ce peuple, et les Romains y envoyèrent, A. U. C. 509, une colonie qui devint très florissante. Agathocle, Roi de Syracuse, s'étant rendu maître de la ville, y construisit un port. La ville est située au milieu de riches prairies ornées de fleurs de toutes les espèces. La tradition se saisit de cette circonstance pour y transporter la scène de l'enlèvement de Proserpine.

Strab. Geog. l. vi. p. 176. Vell. Paterc. l. i. c. 14.

RHEGIUM. Cette ville fut fondée par ceux de Chalcis. Une colonie de Messéniens échappée à la fureur des Lacédémoniens vint s'y établir et acquit bientôt l'autorité souveraine. Elle se distingua bientôt par sa puissance, ses colonies, et par les grands hommes qu'elle a produits. Denys l'ancien l'ancien la prit et la détruisit de fond en comble; mais son fils la rétablit en partie, et lui donna le nom de Phœbea qu'elle ne conserva pas. Elle souffrit beaucoup par la trahison de sa garnison Campanienne qui égorgea tous les anciens habitans, et par un tremblement de terre. Peu avant la guerre sociale Rhegium étoit du nombre de ces dix-huit villes malheureuses que la beauté de leurs édifices, et la richesse de leurs terres avoient fait choisir aux Triumvirs pour assouvir la cupidité de leurs vétérans. Cependant César accorda sa grace à Rhegium; mais voyant que la ville étoit dépeuplée il y envoya une colonie de ses troupes de la marine, et lui donna le nom de Julium Rhegium. Sa situation avantageuse l'a soutenu dans toutes les révolutions. C'est le lien de l'Italie et de la Sicile, dont il n'est séparé que par un détroit de douze milles de longueur, et dont la largeur à la Colonne Rhegine n'est que d'un mille et demi.

V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 15. p. 1296.

Strabon. Geog. l. vi. p. 178.

Appian. de Bell. Civil. l. iv. p. 590. 638. Edit. Hen. Stephan.

Plin. Hist. Nat. iii. 8.

Virgil. Æneid. iii. 414.

> Hæc loca, vi quondam et vastâ convulsa ruinâ
> (Tantum ævi longinqua valet mutare vetustas)
> Dissiluisse ferunt; quum protinus utraque tellus
> Una foret, venit medio vi pontus, et undis
> Hesperium Siculo latus abscidit; arvaque et urbes > Litore diductas angusto interluit æstû.

Strabon. Geog. vi. p. 178. Plin. Hist. Nat. iii. 8.

Il paroît que Virgile n'a fait que suivre une ancienne tradition adoptée par Eschyle, Strabon et Pline le Naturaliste.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 15. p. 1301. Strab. Geog. l. vi. p. 179.

Locri Epizephyrii. C'est la troisième tribu des Locriens. Les auteurs ne sont pas d'accord de laquelle des deux autres elle est sortie, des Ozolæ auprès de l'Etolie ou des Epicnemedii auprès de l'île l'île d'Eubée, mais on convient que cette migration s'est faite Olymp. xxiii. 2. avant J. C. 683. Locri, favorite de la nature, ne ressentoit jamais des horreurs de la peste, mais elle jouissoit d'un bonheur encore plus grand dans les sages loix que Zaleucus lui donna; loix formées sur l'étude réfléchie de celles de la Crète, de Sparte, et de l'Aréopage; loix dont la clarté et la simplicité surpassoient de beaucoup les raffinemens ingénieux de celles de Thurium. Dans la bataille de la Sagra Locri avoit 100,000 combattans; en prenant ce nombre pour celui des citoyens en age viril la colonie entière étoit composée d'environ 300,000 ames. Denys, Roi de Syracuse et maître de Locri, le traita avec une cruauté et une insolence que ce peuple ne rendit que trop bien à la famille innocente et infortunée de ce prince. Les Locriens étoient les bons amis des Rhégiens, ils passoient librement sur les terres les uns des autres, mais leurs cigales plus réservées ne traversoient jamais la rivière qui faisoit la borne. De ces cigales il n'y avoit que celles de Rhegium qui chantassent. L'aridité d'un terrein sans ombre quelconque leur donnoit ce talent.

——— cuncta malis habitantur mœnia Græcis.
Hîc et Narycii posuerunt mœnia Locri. Virgil. Æneid, iii. 398.

Scyllaceum. C'est à Scyllaceum, colonie des Athéniens, que l'Italie est la plus étroite. La traversée d'une mer à l'autre n'est que de vingt milles. Denys de Syracuse s'étoit proposé d'y construire une muraille pour séparer ses sujets de l'Isthme du commerce et des incursions des Lucaniens. Mais il ne put exécuter ce dessein.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 15. p. 1310. Strab. Geog. l. vi. p. 262. T. Liv. xxiv. 2. 3.

CROTON. Cette ville, éloignée de Thurium de deux cens stades, étoit colonie des Achéens, fondée dans le même tems que Syracuse. Elle se distinguoit par la bonté de l'air et la bravoure de ses citoyens qui s'adonnèrent avec tant de succès à la gymnastique que sept Crotoniates remportèrent une fois les sept prix des jeux Olympiques. Milon, leur fameux athlète, commandoit en même tems l'armée qui remporta cette victoire signalée sur les Sybarites. Mais à la journée de la Sagra, Crotone succomba à son tour sous les armes des Locriens et des Rhégiens. Ce combat, où il est question de 130,000 Crotoniates, me fait juger que la république avoit environ 400,000 citoyens. Depuis ce moment Crotone n'éprouva que des revers. Denys s'en rendit maître, et cette ville, dont les murs avoient douze milles de circonférence, étoit à peine à moitié habitée du tems d'Hannibal.

Tit. Liv. xxiv. 3.

JUNONIS LACINIÆ TEMPLUM. A six milles de Crotone, on voyoit ce temple respecté de toutes les nations voisines. Il étoit au milieu d'un grand bois sacré qui renfermoit des pâturages fertiles où paissoient les troupeaux de la déese sans craindre ni les hommes ni les animaux féroces. Le soir chaque espèce se séparoit d'elle-même des autres pour regagner tranquillement son écurie. Les troupeaux ne contribuoient pas moins aux richesses du temple que les offrandes mêmes. Les prêtres avoient employé ce revenu à faire faire une colonne d'or massif. Hannibal n'osa jamais piller ce temple.

Mais

Mais le Censeur Fulvius Flaccus fit enlever la moitié des tuiles, qui étoient de marbre, pour couvrir son temple de la fortune des Chevaliers. Sa mort subite fut attribuée à la vengeance de Junon et le Sénat fit remporter les tuiles. La légende porte qu'un autel placé devant le temple ne voyoit jamais ses cendres ébranlées le moins du monde par les vents. Plin. Hist. Nat. ii. 107.

Pandosia. Cette ancienne ville des Oenotriens et ensuite des Bruttiens étoit placée sur trois collines. L'Acheron couloit sous ses murs. Ce fut là que périt Alexandre, Roi d'Epire. Elle étoit sur la frontière du Bruttium et de la Lucanie. Strab.Geog. vi. p. 176.

Consentia. Elle étoit le chef lieu des Bruttiens. Idem. vi. p. 176.

Petilia. Fondée par Philoctète, elle demeura fidèle aux Romains, pour qui elle soutint un siège opiniâtre contre Hannibal. Je ne conçois pas comment cette ville Grecque au fond du Bruttium pouvoit être du tems de Strabon la capitale des Lucaniens; elle étoit alors assez considérable. Strab.Geog. vi. p. 175. Tit. Liv. xxiii. 30.

——————— Hîc illa ducis Melibæi
Parva Philoctetæ, subnixa Petilia muro. Virgil. Æneid. l.iii. 401.

Magna Græcia. Lorsque les Grecs traversèrent la mer Ionienne pour chercher de nouvelles terres, frappés de l'immensité de ce continent dont ils ignoroient les bornes, ils lui donnèrent le nom de la Grande Grèce. Dans les premiers tems on donnoit hardiment ce nom générique à tous les pays à l'occident de la Grèce où la nation avoit des colonies, la Sicile, l'Italie, la Gaule, et l'Espagne. Semblables aux Européens en Amérique ils ne V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 16. Strab.Geog. l. v. et vi.

comptoient les barbares pour rien; ils croyoient qu'un établissement sur les côtes leur donnoit des droits sur un pays immense peuplé de cent nations dont ils connoissoient à peine les noms. Dans un sens plus précis ces colonies mêmes étoient la Grande Grèce; mais dispersées sur une grande étendue de côte dont elles n'occupoient que des portions détachées, on ne peut en fixer les bornes qu'en en faisant le dénombrement. Depuis Cumes cependant jusqu'à Tarentum, toute la côte (aussi bien que celles de la Sicile) étoit couverte de colonies Grecques dont les territoires se touchoient. Cette circonstance détermina enfin le nom de la Grande Grèce à ces pays exclusivement. Les malheurs de la nation, plusieurs villes détruites, et d'autres qui devinrent barbares, resserrèrent encore la Grande Grèce, qui ne s'étendoit plus que de Tarentum au promontoire Leucopetra; c'est à dire dans le canton qu'on appelloit le front de l'Italie. Dans cette description de la Lucanie aussi bien que dans les autres régions, j'ai marqué la plûpart des colonies Grecques. Du tems de Strabon, Tarentum, Rhegium, et Naples étoient les seules qui conservoient encore les mœurs Grecques. Quant à l'époque de ces migrations il y a du fabuleux et de l'historique. C'est dans la première classe que je mets les Oenotriens, les Arcadiens, Evandre, Philoctète, Epée, Diomède, et tant d'autres chevaliers errans qui se sont établis en Italie avant la première Olympiade. Pesons mes deux raisons. 1. J'ose assurer que du tems d'Homère la côte occidentale de l'Italie n'avoit point reçu de colonies Grecques;

Grecques; et par conséquent Cumes est beaucoup moins ancienne qu'on ne l'a dit. Ce n'est pas dans un pays rempli de Grecs qui soutenoient des relations les plus étroites avec leur pays, que ce pöete auroit placé des géans, des enchantemens, et le sejour même des morts, prodiges qui ne conviennent qu'à un monde nouveau à peine découvert et qu'on ne connoissoit encore que par les hyperboles mal interprétées des voyageurs Phéniciens. 2. Il y a peu de villes de la Grande Grèce qui n'ayent une double origine. L'une qui remonte aux dieux et aux héros de la mythologie; l'autre plus historique et plus récente. Peut-on balancer? Qui ne supposera pas avec raison que les fondateurs réels ont voulu se donner des ayeux imaginaires pour relever l'antiquité et la noblesse de la colonie? Il me paroît que les migrations commencèrent un peu après la première Olympiade, et qu'elles durèrent environ 300 ans. On voit (surtout par Strabon) que leurs discordes civiles et les courses des barbares les livrèrent enfin à la tyrannie des Syracusains, et que les guerres des Samnites, de Pyrrhus, et d'Hannibal les ruinèrent si totalement, que la Grande Grèce paroissoit détruite du tems de Cicéron.

Cicero. in Lælio.

Ovid. Fastor. l. iv. p. 567.

Nec tibi sit mirum Græco rem nomine dici,
Itala nam tellus, Græcia major erat.
Venerat Evander plenâ cum classe suorum,
Venerat Alcides; Graius uterque genus.
Hospes Aventinis armenta pavit in herbis
Claviger; et tanto est Albula pota Deo.
Dux quoque Narycius; testes Læstrigones exstant.
Et quod adhuc Circes nomina litus habet,

Et jam Telegoni, jam mœnia Tiburis udi
Stabant; Argolicæ quæ posuere manus.
Venerat Atridæ fatis agitatus Halesus;
A quo se dictam terra Falisca putat;
Adjice Trojanæ suasorem Antenora pacis,
Et generum Oeniden, Apule Daune, tuum.
Serus ab Iliacis et post Antenora flammis
Abstulit Æneas in loca nostra Deos.

Horat. Epist. i. 2.

——————— Quidve Calabris
Saltibus adjecti Lucani ——

Sect. X.

CALABRIA ET APULIA.

Apulia. Cette région, qui comprenoit une des cornes de l'Italie, étoit bornée par la Lucanie, la Campanie, et le Samnium. Sur la mer Adriatique elle s'étendoit jusqu'au Frento, et sur le golfe de Tarente jusqu'à Metapontum. Le mont Vultur et le Bradanus la séparoient de la Lucanie, et le fleuve Sabbatus du Samnium et de la Campanie. On peut la partager en trois provinces, 1. Le pays des Hirpini; 2. L'Apulie propre; et 3. La Calabre. La Daunie paroît n'être que la seconde des provinces. L'Iapygie n'étoit qu'un nom générique et un peu vague que les Grecs donnoient à toute cette côte. On voit confusément que la Messapie et les Salentini n'étoient que l'extrémité de la corne, et que les Peucetii ou Pædiculi formoient une cité ancienne, d'origine Illyrienne, qui étoit placée dans les environs de Tarentum.

V. la Carte de Deslisle, et Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 10.

I. HIRPINI. Je suis surpris que les Romains ayent enlevé ce peuple aux Samnites pour le donner mer aux Apuli. Il étoit d'origine Samnite, et sa liaison avec cette nation étoit si étroite que les historiens de la guerre Samnite les ont presque toujours confondus. Cette cité s'étendoit des deux côtés de l'Apennin depuis le Sabbatus jusqu'à l'Aufidus. Je trouve en-deça des montagnes, 1. Equus Tuticus; 2. Callifæ, colonie; 3. Æculanum; 4. Romula; 5. Taurasium; 6. Avillinum, colonie. Au-delà des montagnes, 1. Aquilonia; 2. Herdonia; 3. Rufæ, ou Rufræ, ou Rufrum; 4. Compsa.

Cluvier Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 8.

TAURASIUM. On voyoit une nation Ligurienne dans les environs de Taurasium. Les Romains, ennuyés des courses des Apuani, prirent la résolution de les transporter dans un pays fort éloigné du leur. Les Consuls Bæbius et Cornelius, les ayant poussé dans les montagnes, les obligèrent de se rendre au nombre de douze milles hommes. Cette petite armée fournit, avec les femmes et les enfans, quarante mille ames, que le sénat fit passer dans le pays des Hirpini, où on leur distribua des terres avec un présent de 150,000 sesterces (dix mille écus) pour les y établir. Du tems de Pline ils conservoient encore les noms de Corneliani et de Bæbiani. Peu de tems après, le Préteur Fulvius y conduisit par mer encore sept mille hommes. Cette migration se fit A. U. C. 573. T. Liv. xl. 38.

AMSANCTI LACUS. Ce lac rendoit des exhalaisons très dangereuses pour ceux qui s'en approchoient. On avoit mêlé beaucoup de fables à la description de ce phénomène. Pline lui-même n'en est point exempt. Il n'étoit pas loin de Taurasium. Plin. Hist. Natur. ii. 93.

Virg. Æn. vii. 563.

Est locus Italiæ in medio, sub montibus altis,
Nobilis, et famâ multis veneratus in oris,
Amsancti valles; densis hunc frondibus atrum
Urget utrinque latus nemoris: medioque fragosus
Dat sonitum saxis et torto vertice torrens.
Hìc specus horrendum sævi spiracula Ditis
Monstratur; ruptoque ingens Acheronte vorago
Pestiferas aperit fauces. ———

II. APULIA PROPRIA. Cette province, qui ne paroît pas avoir jamais formé un corps politique et national, étoit la plus grande des trois. La mer, le Frento, les Hirpini, le Bradanus, et une ligne de Tarentum à Brundisium en-deça de ces villes,— voilà ses bornes. Dans la Daunie propre, ou le pays entre le Frento et l'Aufide, je trouve, 1. Apenesta au pied du mont Garganus; 2. Uria; 3. Sipus ou Sipontum; 4. Salepia avec la Palus Salapina; ces quatre villes étoient sur les bords de la mer; 5. Teanum Apulum sur le Frento; 6. Gerion ou Gerunium; 7. Luceria; et 8. Arpi, Argos Hippium, ou Argyrippa. Dans la portion de l'Apulie qui est entre l'Aufide et le mont Vultur, portion plus longue, mais plus étroite que la première, je trouve, 1. Venusia; 2. Canusium; 3. Cannæ; 4. Barium; et 5. Gnatiæ. Dans le petit canton entre le Vultur et le Bradanus, je ne vois que, 1. Bantia; 2. Forentum; 3. Acherontia; et 4. Genusium.

Cicero. de Leg. Agrar. in Rull. Orat. ii. 27.

SIPUS ET SALAPIA. Quand Cicéron veut donner une idée des endroits les moins désirables de l'Italie, il choisit le territoire aride de Sipus, et les marais pestiférés de Salapia.

Strab. Geog. vi. p. 198.

ARPI. On voit que les colonies Grecques en Italie ont agi comme les Européens dans le nouveau nouveau monde, et qu'ils ont saisi avidement les vraisemblances les moins décisives pour y trouver des traces de leurs ancêtres. C'est ainsi que Diomède doit avoir régné sur les bords de l'Adriatique. On y voit les insulæ Diomedeæ, et les présens que ce héros offrit à Minerve dans son temple à Lucerie. Mais ces traditions sont aussi contradictoires qu'elles sont fabuleuses. Le judicieux Strabon a su remarquer qu'on racontoit les aventures de Diomède de quatre façons essentiellement différentes.

Et Venulus, dicto parens, sic farier infit: Virg. Æn. xi.
Vidimus, O cives, Diomeden Argivaque castra;
Atque iter emensi casus superavimus omnes,
Contigimusque manum quâ concidit Ilia tellus.
Ille urbem Argyripam, patriæ cognomine gentis, Victor Gargani condebat Japygis agris.

Non seulement Arpi, mais encore Beneventum, et Equus Tuticus reconnoissoient Diomède pour leur fondateur.

Mons Garganus, &c.

Nutantique ruens prostravit vertice silvas Sil. Ital. viii. 630.
Garganus; fundoque imo mugivit anhelans
Aufidus; et magno late distantia ponto
Terruerunt pavidos accensâ ceraunià nautas.
Quæsivit Calaber, subductâ luce repente
Immensis tenebris, et terram et litora Sipûs.

Canusium. Cette ville, fameuse par la journée de Cannes qui arriva dans son voisinage, étoit située au milieu des plaines de Diomède toujours couvertes de troupeaux nombreux, dont la laine courte, et d'une couleur foncée, servoit à faire des manteaux, et alloit de pair d'avec celle de Tarentum V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiqua, l. iv, c. 12. Strab. Geog. vi. p. 199. Plin. Hist. Nat. c. 8. p 48.

Tarentum la plus estimée de l'Italie. Ce canton, aussi bien que le reste de l'Apulie, avoit été très florissant; mais la guerre d'Hannibal, et celles qui la suivirent, le réduisirent dans l'état de désolation où Strabon le voyoit. Peut-être que Canusium se rétablit un peu sous Adrien après qu'Hérode eut guéri le vice radical de sa situation en y faisant conduire de l'eau.

Hor. Serm. i. 10.

——— Canusini more bilinguis.

Strab. Geog. v. p. 172.

VENUSIA. Venusia étoit considérable du tems de Tibère. C'est à tort que Strabon l'a placé dans le Samnium.

Vell. Pater. i. 14.

Les Romains y envoyèrent une colonie A. U. C. 460, pendant le plus fort de la guerre Samnite.

VENUSIA.

Hor. Serm. ii. 1.

——— Sequor hunc, Lucanus an Apulus anceps:
Nam Venusinus arat finem sub utrumque colonus,
Missus ad hoc, pulsis (vetus ut est fama) Sabellis,
Quò ne per vacuum Romano incurreret hostis;
Sive quod Apula gens, sive quod Lucania bellum
Incuteret violenta ———

GNATIÆ, SEU EGNATIA.

Idem, i. 5.

——— Dehinc Gnatia, lymphis
Iratis extracta, dedit risusque jocosque,
Dum flammâ sine thura liquescere limine sacro
Persuadere cupit: credat Judæus Apella,
Non ego ———

Plin. Hist. Nat. ii. 107.

Pline assure qu'à Egnatia le bois placé sur une certaine pierre sacrée s'allumoit de lui-même.

Strab. Geog. l. vi. p. 194. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 13.

III. CALABRIA. Cette corne de l'Italie étoit un pays excellent. Il manquoit d'eaux, mais le sol étoit fort et riche, et ses bois et ses pâturages étoient d'un grand rapport. Il étoit très peuplé anciennement; on on y comptoit treize villes; mais du tems de Strabon, on n'y voyoit plus que celles de Tarentum et de Brundisium. Voici les noms des endroits principaux de la province: 1. Tarentum; 2. Callipolis, le promontoire Japygien ou Salentin; 3. Leuca: 4. Castrum Minervæ; 5. Hydrus, ou Hydruntum; 6. Lupia; 7. Valetium; 8. Brundisium: c'étoient les villes maritimes. Dans l'intérieur des terres j'apperçois, 9. Veretum; 10. Uxentum; 11. Neretum; 12. Manduria; 13. Rhudia, la patrie d'Ennius. Je vois que l'extrémité de la corne étoit connue sous le nom de pays des Salentini, colonie Crétoise; mais je ne découvre aucun vestige de Salente, ville d'Idoménée, ou plutôt de Fenelon.

Pecusve Calabris ante sidus fervidum Lucana mutuet pascuis. Hor. Carm. Epod. i.

Les bergers Calabrois menoient leurs troupeaux paître dans la Lucanie au mois de Juillet pour éviter les chaleurs de la canicule. Ils les ramenoient en Calabre avant les froids de l'hiver. Vet. Com. ad Locum.

TARENTUM. Les Lacédémoniens fondèrent Tarentum. On sait que pendant le siège d'Ithome, ils renvoyèrent leurs jeunes gens à Sparte et leur abandonnèrent leurs femmes pour conserver la nation sans violer leur serment. N'auroit-il pas eté plus naturel de faire venir leurs femmes au camp d'Ithome? Et ces vingt ans perdus pour la génération! je conçois à peine qu'un peuple ait pu se relever d'une calamité cent fois plus affreuse que la guerre ou la peste. J'avoue bien qui l'dée est très Spartiate, d'un peuple qui badinoit sur les adultères et V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 13. et Strab. Geog. vi. p. 191—194.

et qui méprisoit les doux penchans de la nature. Il eut beau les mépriser ici. Les enfans de ce commerce vague ignoroient leurs pères, ne tenoient point à l'état, et n'excitoient que des séditions pour obtenir ces héritages que les loix leur refusoient. La république fut charmée de s'en délivrer en les envoyant avec Phalanthus leur chef chercher des établissemens. Ils bâtirent Tarente environ 700 ans avant Jesus Christ. Cette république devint très puissante. Elle eut une marine très supérieure à tous ses voisins, avec une armée de trente milles hommes d'infanterie et trois de cavalerie, sans compter mille cavaliers d'élite qu'on nommoit Hipparques. La philosophie Pythagoricienne y fleurit beaucoup, et Tarente eut, pendant longtems, le bonheur de voir à sa tête le philosophe Archytas. Enfin le luxe vint à la suite de l'abondance et tout fut perdu. La mollesse de Tarente ne pouvoit se comparer qu'avec celle de Capoue et de Sybaris. Leurs jours de fêtes étoient en plus grand nombre que les jours ouvriers. Ils avoient inventé une toile presque transparente qui pâroit les charmes plutôt qu'elle ne les cachoit. Quand les Tarentins étoient obligés de se défendre contre leurs voisins belliqueux, ils ne savoient qu'appeller des généraux étrangers, Alexandre contre les Lucaniens, et Pyrrhus contre les Romains, dont ils s'étoient attirés les armes par leur folle présomption. Rome les soumit. Ils se livrèrent pendant la guerre Punique aux Carthaginois. Fabius ne reprit Tarentum qu'au bout de cinq ans. On y envoya une colonie l'an de Rome 629,

Vell. Paterc. l. i. c. 15.

629, qui se soutint avec splendeur jusqu'à la décadence de l'Empire. Tarente jouissoit d'un beau port dans un golfe qui n'en avoit presqu' aucun. Le sien, qui entroit fort avant dans les terres, avoit cent stades de circonférence. L'embouchure en étoit si étroite qu'on y avoit jetté un pont. Cette circonstance rendoit la citadelle bâtie à l'extrémité de la pointe, maîtresse absolue du port. Construite sur une péninsule qui étoit environnée de rochers très hauts du côté de la mer, elle n'étoit jointe à la ville que par une petite langue de terre fortifiée d'un mur et d'un fossé très profond. La ville étoit située dans la plaine depuis l'intérieur du port jusqu'à la mer. Cet espace étoit percé en tout sens par des rues larges et droites dont Hannibal se servit pour faire sortir les vaisseaux du port, pendant que les Romains étoient maîtres de la citadelle. Du tems de Strabon, on voyoit les anciens murs de Tarentum, qui ne les remplissoit plus, mais qui s'étoit retirée du côté de la citadelle et de l'entrée du port. Elle avoit encore un beau gymnase, et un grand forum, au milieu duquel il y avoit une statue colossale de Jupiter qui ne le cédoit qu'à celle de Rhodes. De tant d'autres monumens des beaux arts qu'elle avoit possédés la plûpart étoient passés à Carthage et à Rome. Tarentum et ses environs avoient le nom de Saturum, ou d'abondant. Il le meritoit bien.

Tit. Liv. xxv. 9, 10.

Dulce pellitis ovibus, Galesi
Flumen, et regnata petam Laconi
Rura Phalantho.
Ille terrarum mihi præter omnes
Angulus ridet, ubi non Hymetto

Horat. Carm. ii. 6.

Mella

Mella decedunt, viridique certat
Bacca Venafro.
Ver ubi longum, tepidasque præbet
Jupiter brumas, et amicus Aulon
Fertili Baccho minimum Falernis
Invidet uvis.
Ille te mecum locus, et beatæ
Postulant arces; ibi tu calentem
Debitâ sparges lacrymâ favillam
Vatis amici.

Horat. Epist. i. 7.
——————Imbelle Tarentum.

Juvenal. Satyr. vi. 296.
— — — —
Atque coronatum et petulans, madidumque Tarentum.

Virgil. Georgic. ii. 195.
Sin armenta magis studium, vitulosque tueri,
Aut fœtus ovium, aut urentes culta capellas
Saltus et saturi petito longinqua Tarenti.

CASTRUM MINERVÆ.

Virgil. Æneid. iii. 506. 521. 530.
Prevehimur pelago vicina Ceraunia juxta,
Unde iter Italiam, cursusque brevissimus undis.
Jamque rubescebat stellis Aurora fugatis:
Quum procul obscuros colles, humilemque videmus
Italiam.——————————
Crebescunt optatæ auræ: portusque patescit
Jam propior, templumque apparet in arce Minervæ.
Vela legunt socii, et proras ad litora torquent.
Portus ab Eoo fluctu curvatur in arcum,
Objectæ salsa spumant aspergine cautes.
Ipse latet: gemino demittunt brachia muro
Turriti scopuli, refugitque a litore templum.

Strab. Geog. vi. 195. BRUNDISIUM. Le port de Brundisium, très fréquenté par les Romains pour passer en Grèce, étoit excellent en lui-même. On la comparoit à une corne de cerf qui pousse beaucoup de branches différentes. Comme elle il renfermoit plusieurs ports dans dans un seul. Partout à l'abri des vents et d'une profondeur suffisante, il n'avoit aucun des défauts de celui de Tarentum.

Les Romains envoyèrent une colonie à Brundisium A. U. C. 509. Vell. Pater. l. i. c. 14.

Nec non Brundisium quò desinit Itala tellus. Sil. Italic. viii. 576.

SALLENTINI.

——Sallentinos obsedit milite campos
Lyctius Idomeneus—————— Virgil. Æneid. iii. 400.

TARENTUM.

Lana Tarentino violas imitata veneno. Horat. Epist. ii. 1.

M. GARGANUS.

Garganum mugire putes memus, aut mare Tuscum.

SECT. XI.

SAMNIUM.

CETTE région, une des plus étendues de l'Italie, mais des plus reculées dans l'intérieur des terres, touchoit à cinq autres régions. Le Marrinus et l'Apennin la séparoient du Picenum; le Nar de l'Umbrie; le Tibre de l'Etrurie; l'Anio et une ligne de ses sources à Beneventum la divisoient de la Campanie; Telesia, Herculaneum, Larinum, et le Tifernus formoient sa frontière avec l'Apulie. Sa côte maritime ne s'étendoit que depuis l'embouchure du Tifernus, jusqu'à celle du Matrinus. Elle comprenoit (outre les Samnites) un grand nombre de cités que les Romains avoient réuni dans une seule province. J'en compte huit principales: V. la Carte de l'Italie par Delisle, et Plin. Hist. Natur. l. iii. c. 4.

principales : 1. Les Sabins ; 2. Les Mansi ; 3. Les Æqui ; 4. Les Peligni ; 5. Les Vestini ; 6. Les Marrucini ; 7. Les Frentani ; et 8. Les Samnites.

V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 8 et 9. Cicer. ad Familiares, xv. 14.

I. SABINI. Ce peuple indigène de l'Italie, ou sorti des Lacédémoniens, s'est toujours distingué par son courage, par sa probité, et par des mœurs vertueuses et grossières qui ne sont jamais ressenties du voisinage de la capitale. Son pays étoit borné par le Nar, le Tibre, et les montagnes du côté de l'Umbrie, de l'Etrurie, et du territoire des Marses. Il pénétroit au nord entre l'Umbrie et le Picenum, et aboutissoit en pointe au Mont Fiscellus. Une autre langue, formée par le voisinage du Tibre et de l'Anio et terminée par leur jonction, l'approchoit de Rome. Il paroît même que dans les tems les plus reculés les Sabins s'étoient répandus au-delà de l'Anio, mais que dans la suite les Latins repassèrent cette rivière à leur tour. Voici les principales villes des Sabins dans le canton le plus voisin de Rome, c'est à dire dans la partie qui est entre le Tibre, l'Anio, le Velinus et le Nar : 1. Collatia au-delà de l'Anio ; 2. Antemnæ aux portes de Rome ; 3. Fidenæ ; 4. Crustumerium ; 5. Ficulea ; 6. Corniculum ; 7. Nomentum sur l'Allva ; 8. Eretum ; 9. Regillum, la patrie des Claudii ; 10. Cures, la capitale de Tatius ; 11 Casperia sur l'Himella, un peu plus haut que Cures. Dans ce canton riche, qui est auprès du lac et du fleuve Velinus et qu'on nous donne pour la première patrie des Aborigines, je trouve, 1. Reate ; 2. Lista ; 3. Tiora ; 4. Trebula Mutusca ; et 5. Cutiliæ, avec les eaux du même nom qu'on appelloit le nombril ou ou le centre de l'Italie. Parmi les montagnes je vois, 1. Falacrinum; 2. Amiternum; 3. Foruli. 4. Interocrea; 5. Forum Decii; 6. Vespasiæ; 7. Nursia; 8. Corsula. Entre les montagnes je remarque nommément, Severus, Tetrica et Gurgures.

Le pays des Sabins est long mais étroit. Il produit de l'huile et du vin, et nourrit beaucoup de bétail. Les guerres avoient détruit la plûpart de leurs villes. Du tems d'Auguste, Cures, autrefois si considérable, n'étoit plus qu'une bourgade, Eretum et Trebula n'étoient que de mauvais villages. Strab. Geog. v. p. 158.

Ecce inter primos Therapnæó a sanguine Clausi
Exultat rapidis Nero non imitabilis ausis;
Hunc Amiterna cohors, et Bactris nomina ducens
Casperia; hunc Foruli, magnæque Reate dicatum
Cœlicolum matri; nec non habitata pruinis
Nursia, et a Tetrica comitantur rupe cohortes:
Cunctis hasta decus, clipeusque refertur in orbem,
Conique implumes, ac lævo tegmina crure.
Ibant, et læti pars Sancum voce canebant,
Auctorem gentis; pars laudes ore ferebant,
Sabe, tuas, qui de proprio cognomine primus
Dixisti populos magnâ ditione Sabinos. Sil. Ital. viii. 414.

Ecce, Sabinorum prisco de sanguine, magnum
Agmen agens Clausus, magnique ipse agminis instar:
Claudia nunc a quo diffunditur et tribus et gens
Per Latium, postquam in partem data Roma Sabinis:
Unà ingens Amiterna cohors, priscique Quirites, Ereti manus omnis, oliviferæque Mutuscæ:
Qui Nomentum urbem, qui rosea rura Velini;
Qui Tetricæ horrentes rupes, montemque Severum, Casperiamque colunt, Forulosque et flumen Himellæ.
Qui Tiberim, Fabarimque bibunt: quos frigida misit Virgil. Æneid. vii. 706.

Nursia, et Hortinæ classes, populique Latini :
Quosque secans infaustum interluit Allia nomen.

Virgil. Æneid. vii. 629.

Quinque adeo magnæ positis incudibus urbes
Tela novant, Atina potens, Tiburque superbum, Ardea, Crustumerique, et turrigeræ Antemnæ.

V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 9. p. 670, 1, 2.

Horatii Villa. Ce poëte avoit une maison nommée Ustica dans le pays des Sabins ; le mons Lucretilis, le canton de Mandela, le ruisseau Digentia, et la fontaine Blandusia, tout en détermine la situation à Monte Libretto entre Cures et Regillum, et à vingt milles du mont Soracte que le poëte appercevoit de loin. Je sais cependant qu'il y a une petite dispute sur la situation de cette maison.

Horat. Epist. i. 16.

Scribetur tibi forma loquaciter, et situs agri.
Continui montes ; ni dissocientur opacâ
Valle, sed ut veniens dextrum latus aspiciat sol,
Lævum decedens currû fugiente vaporet.
Temperiem laudes. Quid, si rubicunda benigne
Corna vepres et pruna ferunt ? si quercus et ilex
Multâ fruge pecus, multâ dominum juvat umbrâ ?
Dicas adductum propius frondere Tarentum.
Fons etiam rivo dare nomen idoneus ut nec
Frigidior Thracam, nec purior ambiat Hebrus,
Infirmo capiti fluit utilis, utilis alvo.
Hæ latebræ dulces, etiam (si credis) amœnæ,
Incolumem tibi me præstant Septembribus horis.

Varro de Re Rustica, l. ii. c. 1. et 6.

Reate. Le territoire de Reate étoit tout en pâturages. On y voyoit les anes de l'Italie les plus grands et les plus beaux. Ils se vendoient quelquefois de soixante à cent mille sesterces. On a donné jusqu'à trois ou quatre cens mille sesterces pour pour des étalons de cette race. La corne de leurs pieds s'endurcissoit si on les envoyoit à la montagne pendant l'été.

Les environs de Réate et du lac Velinus s'appelloient Rosea Rura. L'herbe croissoit si bien et si vîte dans ses beaux pâturages que si on y laissoit une perche le soir, le lendemain matin on ne la retrouvoit plus. Quelques commentateurs l'ont entendu plaisamment de la hauteur et non de l'épaisseur d'une perche, mais la dernière étoit bien assez pour faire donner à ces champs le nom de graisse de l'Italie. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 9. p. 677, 678.

> Et quantum longis carpent armenta diebus
> Exiguâ tantum gelidus ros nocte reponet. Virgil. Georg. ii. 200.

II. Marsi. Ce nom leur donna d'abord une origine Phrygienne et les fit descendre dans l'esprit des Grecs du célèbre Marsyas. Leur pays, que les exploits de ses habitans et surtout la Guerre Sociale ou Marsique* a rendu si fameux, étoit petit et rempli de montagnes. La grande chaine de l'Apennin le séparoit des Piceni, des Vestini, et des Peligni. Il ne partageoit qu'avec les Sabins tout le pays qui est entre ces montagnes, le Nar, le Tibre, et l'Anio. Je n'y trouve que peu de villes autour du lac Fucinus. 1. Alba Fucentia, ou Fucetia, colonie au nord du lac; 2. Cerfennia, à l'orient; 3. Marubium, au midi; 4. Anxantia; et 5. Lucus Angitiæ, à l'occident. Dans les montagnes je ne vois que quelques bourgades sans nom dont la situation est mal connue. V. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 15.

* Mon Journal le 1 Novembre, 1763.

Virgil. Æneid. vii. 750.

Quin et Marubiâ venit de gente sacerdos,
Fronde super galeam et felici comptus olivâ,
Archippi regis missû, fortissimus Umbro :
Vipereo generi et graviter spirantibus hydris
Spargere qui somnos cantuque manuque solebat,
Mulcebatque iras, et morsus arte levabat.
Sed non Dardaniæ medicari cuspidis ictum
Evaluit ; neque eum juvêre in vulnera cantus
Somniferi, et Marsis quæsitæ in montibus herbæ.
Te nemus Angitiæ, vitreâ te Fucinus undâ,
Te liquidi flevêre lacus.———

Sil. Italic. viii. 497.

Hæ bellare acies norant; at Marsica pubes
Et bellare manû et chelydris cantare soporem,
Vipereumque herbis hebetare et carmine dentem.
Acetæ prolem Angitiam mala gramina primam
Monstravisse ferunt ; tactûque domare venena,
Et lunam excussisse polo, stridoribus amnes
Frænantem, et silvis montes nudasse vocatis,
Seu populis nomen posuit metuentior hospes
Cum fugeret Phrygios trans æquora Marsya Crenos Mygdoniam Phæbo superatus pectine loton.

MARUBIUM.

Idem. viii. 507.

Marruvium veteris celebratum nomine Marri,
Urbibus est illis caput.———

ALBA FUCENTIA.

Idem. viii. 509.

———— Interiorque per udos
Alba sedet campos, pomisque rependit aristas.
Cætera in obscuro famæ, et sine nomine vulgi,
Sed numero castella valent.———

Vell. Pater. l. i. 14.

Les Romains y envoyèrent une colonie, l'an de Rome 459.

Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 166.

Comme elle étoit dans l'intérieur des terres, et très bien fortifiée, le Sénat y envoyoit souvent des prisonniers d'importance.

Le

Le Sénat ordonna à Q. Cassius d'y conduire son captif le Roi Persée, avec son fils Alexandre, de lui faire une maison, et de lui fournir de l'argent et des meubles. Le Roi Syphax avoit déjà été traité de la même manière. Tit. Liv. xlv. 42.

Après avoir demeuré quatre ans à Albe, Persée y mourut, aussi bien que son fils Alexandre. Vell. Pater. l. i. c. xi.

Lacus Fucinus. Ce lac, nommé aujourd'hui Lago de Celano, a environ trente milles Romains de circonférence, quand il est dans son état naturel; mais souvent il se débordoit dans les campagnes voisines. Tout le terrein jusqu'aux montagnes étoit quelquefois sous les eaux et quelquefois des champs fertiles et cultivés. L'an de Rome 616, le lac Fucin inonda tout le pays circonvoisin à cinq milles alentour. Strabon attribue ces phénomènes aux sources dans le lac même et qui sont plus ou moins abondantes. Jules César, qui voyoit tout en grand, vouloit creuser un canal qui déchargeroit ce lac de ses eaux superflues. La mort arrêta l'exécution de ce projet qu'Auguste, plus sage ou plus timide, n'osa jamais entreprendre, quoiqu'il y fut souvent sollicité par les Marses. Claude enfin eut le courage de la tenter. Il falloit creuser ce canal depuis le lac jusqu'au Liris. L'intervalle n'étoit que de trois milles; mais on ne pouvoit éviter une montagne haute et pierreuse. On la coupa dans une partie de son étendue; dans le reste on se contenta de la percer. Enfin au bout de onze ans et par le travail assidu de trente mille hommes, ce canal se trouva achevé A. U. C. 805 et de l'ére Chrètienne 52.

Jul. Obsequius de Prodigiis. Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 166. Sueton. in Jul. Cæsar. xliv.

Tacit. Annal. xii. 56, 57. Sueton. in Claud. xx. Plin. Hist. Natur. xxxvi. 15. Dion. Hist. Rom. l. ix. Berger, Grands Chemins, l. iv. c. 46. p. 794.

52. L'empereur, pour étaler aux yeux de la capitale la grandeur de son ouvrage, y attira tout le peuple par une superbe naumachie qu'il leur donna. Deux flottes, qui représentoient les Rhodiens et les Siciliens, y combattirent à toute outrance. Chaque escadre étoit composée de douze galères à trois rangs de rames, et à leur donner trois cens hommes par galère, il y auroit eu plus de sept milles combattans. Le nombre me plairoit bien mieux que les dix-neuf mille de Tacite. Un Triton d'argent s'élevoit du fond des eaux pour sonner la charge, et une flotte encore plus nombreuse environnoit ces malheureux condamnés et les obligeoit de verser leur sang pour l'amusement du peuple Romain. Après ce spectacle on ouvrit le canal, mais on s'apperçut bientôt combien l'ouvrage étoit imparfait, et que l'ignorance ou la négligence des ouvriers ne lui avoit pas donné la profondeur nécessaire. On chercha à y remédier, on crut avoir réussi, mais une inondation montra bientôt que le principe du mal subistoit toujours. Faut-il donc s'étonner si Néron et Hadrien ont été obligés de rétablir cet ouvrage, et que malgré leurs travaux il n'en reste plus de vestiges? Pour les faciliter et les perfectionner il falloit l'art des écluses que les anciens n'avoient point.

Ælius Spartian. in Hadrian. V. Cluvier Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 15. p. 763-767.

III. Æqui. Les Æqui, qu'on appelloit aussi les Æquiculi, ces anciens ennemis de Rome naissante, habitoient les deux rives de l'Anio depuis Varia jusqu'à ses sources. Leur pays perçoit d'un côté entre les Sabins et les Marses; d'un autre côté il s'étendoit jusqu'à Algidum entre Alba, Tusculum, Cluvier. l. ii. c. 16.

culum, et Preneste. Je crois que dans la suite on ajouta au Latium tout ce qu'il falloit pour le pousser jusqu'à l'Anio, mais il ne vaut pas la peine de partager les Æqui. Je trouve dans leur pays, 1. Algidum, avec sa montagne et sa forêt; c'étoit la place forte des Æqui et leur poste avancée; 2. Corbio; 3. Vitellia; 4. Bolæ; en-deçà de l'Anio. Au-delà de l'Anio, 1. Varia; 2. Sublaqueum; et 3. Treba sur la rivière; 4. Carseoli dans les montagnes.

Et te montosæ misere in prælia Nursæ, Ufens, insignem famâ et felicibus armis: Horrida præcipue cui gens, assuetaque multo Venatû nemorum, duris Æquicula glebis: Armati terram exercent, semperque recentes Convectare juvat prædas, et vivere rapto. — Virgil. Æn. vii. 743.

Quique Anienis habent ripas, gelidoque rigantur Simbrivio, rastrisque domant Æquicula rura. — Sil. Italic. viii. 370.

ALGIDUM.

Scilicet hìc olim Volscos Æquosque fugatos Viderat in campis Algida terra tuis. — Ovid. Fast. vi. p. 682.

Duris ut ilex tonsa bipennibus Nigræ feraci frondis in Algido, &c. — Hor. Carm. iv. 4.

——— Nec amœna retentant Algida. — Sil. Ital. xii. 536.

CARSEOLI.

Frigida Carseolis; nec olivis apta ferendis Terra; sed ad segetes ingeniosus ager. — Ovid. Fast. iv. p. 598.

On y envoya une colonie A. U. C. 461. — Vell. Pater. l. i. c. 14.

IV. PELIGNI. Cette nation, qui étoit Illyrienne d'origine, occupoit un petit canton entre l'Apennin, le Sagrus, et l'Aternus. Il étoit tout dans l'intérieur des terres. Les Marucini et les — Cluv. Ital. Antiq. l. ii c. 14.

Frentani l'empêchoient de s'étendre jusqu'à la mer. Je n'y trouve que, 1. Sulmo; 2. Corfinium plus près de l'Apennin et de l'Aternus; et 3. Super Equum.

Flor. iii. 21. SULMO. Sylla fit raser cette ville après sa victoire, mais il paroît qu'elle se rétablit bientôt après.

Ovid. Fast. iv. p. 567.

Serus ab Iliacis et post Antenora flammis
Attulit Æneas in loca nostra Deos.
Hujus erat Solymus Phrygiâ comes unus ab Idâ
A quo Sulmonis mœnia nomen habent.
Sulmonis gelidi patriæ Germanice nostræ
Me miserum Scythico quam procul illa solo est!

Ovid. Amor. ii. Eleg. 16.

Me pars Sulmo tenet, Peligni tertia ruris.
Parva, sed irriguis ora salubris aquis.

Sil. Italic. viii. 511.

——————— Conjungitur acer Pelignus, gelidoque rapit Sulmone cohortes.

Diodor. Sic. l. xxxvii. in Excerpt. Legat.

CORFINIUM. Les alliés de la ligue Italique choisirent cette ville pour leur nouvelle capitale. Ils l'embellirent beaucoup et construisirent un forum avec une très belle Curia. Toute cette grandeur tomba avec la ligue.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 12.

V. VESTINI. Il est aussi difficile qu'il seroit inutile de marquer avec précision les bornes de ces petites cités qui se confondoient les unes dans les autres. Il paroît que les Vestini étoient renfermés entre le Picenum, la mer, et la rive gauche de l'Aternus. J'y trouve, 1. Aternum sur les bords de cette rivière; 2. Pinna, le chef-lieu du canton; 3. Peltuinum; 4. Aufina; et 5. Avia, la plus éloignée de la mer. Elle s'appelloit aussi Aveia et Avilla.

Haud

Haud illo levior bellis Vestina juventus Sil. Italic. viii. 517.
Agmina densavit: venatû dura ferarum.
Quæ, Fiscelle, tuas arces, Pinnamque virentem, Pascuaque haud tarde redeuntia tondet Avillæ.

VI. MARRUCINI. Ce petit peuple occupoit le canton entre l'Aternus et le Forum. On ne trouve parmi eux que la seule ville de Teate qui paroît à la vérité avoir été très considérable. Cluv. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 13.

Marrucina simul Frentanis æmula pubes, Sil. Italic. viii. 521.
Corfini populos magnumque Teate trahebat.

Silius se trompe à la vérité par rapport à Corfinium.

Ce fut du vivant même de Pline, la dernière année de Néron, qu'il arriva un prodige dans ce pays, et sur les terres de Vectius Marcellus, chevalier Romain. Une vigne et un terrein planté d'oliviers traversèrent réciproquement le chemin public qui les séparoit et changèrent de place. Ce fut apparemment un tremblement de terre. Plin. Hist. Nat. ii. 83.

VII. FRENTANI. Ce peuple, avec moins de réputation peut-être que ses voisins, occupoit plus de territoire. Il s'étendoit sur une côte maritime de quatre-vingt milles depuis l'embouchure du Forum jusqu'à celle du Frento et au commencement du promontoire du Mont Garganus. Voici ses endroits principaux, 1. Ortona, le Sagrus; 2. Histonium; 3. Buca, le Tifernus; 4. Anxanum; 5. Larinum, ville considérable, le chef-lieu des Larinates qui avoient un territoire étendu, et qui formoient une cité presque indépendante du corps des Frentani. Cluv. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. 9.

VIII. SAMNITES. Ce peuple célèbre a donné son Id. l. iv. c. 7. Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 172.

son nom à la région entière qui n'étoit remplie en effet que de ses alliés. Il descendoit des Sabins, (avec qui on l'a souvent confondu,) et les autres cités de la province paroissent avoir été ses colonies, ses confédérés, ou ses sujets. Les Samnites habitoient un pays assez étendu, rempli de forêts et de montagnes, et renfermé entre les Frentani, les Peligni, le Latium, la Campanie, les Hirpini et l'Apulie, et, pour parler plus précisément, entre le Sagrus, le Vulturnus, le Sabbatus, et le Frento. Mais cette cité belliqueuse, qui mettoit sur pied 80,000 fantassins et 8,000 cavaliers, se répandoit souvent au-delà de ses frontières. Elle avoit subjugué les Campaniens, les Marses, et plusieurs cités du Latium; ses troupes couvroient l'Apulie et la Lucanie. Elles faisoient quelquefois des courses jusqu'à Ardea dans le pays des Rutuli. C'est une remarque qu'il faut faire quand on lit Tite Live, que le théâtre de la guerre Samnite est rarement dans le Samnium même. Le peu que nous savons de leurs loix me paroît digne de Lycurgue. On donnoit tous les ans les dix plus belles filles aux dix jeunes guerriers qui s'étoient le plus signalés. Dans leurs dangers extrêmes ils offroient un sacrifice public dans un pavillon immense. Ils y faisoient entrer leurs braves les uns après les autres pour les engager à leurs drapeaux et à la bravoure par les sermens les plus atroces. Ils se choisissoient ensuite mutuellement jusqu'à la concurrence de 16,000 hommes. Cette phalange redoutable se nommoit Legio Linteata, non pas de leurs cuirasses puisqu'elles étoient d'or et d'argent, mais des toiles qui qui avoient couvert le pavillon sacré. Cette institution toute belliqueuse leur avoit valu beaucoup de victoires. Elle fit longtems balancer la fortune entr'eux et les Romains. La république ne les subjugua qu'après six guerres sanglantes, ou plutôt après une guerre continue de soixante-dix ans, où leurs généraux méritèrent vingt-quatre triomphes, et essuyèrent presqu' autant de revers. Les Samnites demeurèrent soumis pendant quelque tems qu'ils ne signalèrent leur valeur que contre leurs ennemis du nom Romain; on les regardoit avec raison comme les meilleures troupes de la république. Ils reprirent les armes à la fin, et on voit qu'ils étoient les chefs de la guerre sociale. Leur révolte leur coûta cher. Après quelques avantages les légions Romaines victorieuses par tout portèrent le fer et le feu dans leur pays, détruisirent jusqu'aux vestiges de leurs villes, et exterminèrent leurs habitans.* Sylla les massacra partout, il en fit égorger quatre ou cinq mille dans l'Ovile, et il défendit qu'on leur fit jamais quartier; moins par cruauté que pour assurer le salut des Romains qui étoit incompatible avec celui de ses rivaux. L'entreprise de Pontius Telesinus ne le justifie que trop. Le peu qui restoit des Samnites se sauva de l'Italie, et le pays n'étoit qu'un désert du tems de Tibère: la plûpart des villes étoient détruites. Celles qui subsistoient encore n'étoient plus que des villages. Voici les endroits princi-

T. Liv. x. 38.

* Plutarque dit 6,000, Samnites et Lucaniens. C'étoient les restes de l'armée de Telesinus, (in Sylla.)

paux

paux du Samnium, 1. Æsernia, colonie près des sources du Vulturnus; 2. Allifæ, sur la même rivière; 3. Telesia, colonie sur le Sabbatus; 4. Beneventum, colonie; 5. Caudium, entre Beneventum et Capoue; 6. Sæpinum, colonie; 7. Tifernum; 8. Triventinum sur les frontières des Frentani; 9. Bovianum, colonie vers la source du Tifernus et dans le centre du pays; 10. Aufidena, colonie endeça du Vulturnus et sur les frontières du Latium. Il y a encore beaucoup d'endroits dont on ignore la situation.

Virgil. Georgic. l. ii. 167.

Hæc genus acre virûm, Marsos pubemque Sabellam Extulit.

Sil. Ital. viii. 564.

Affuit et Samnis, nondum vergente favore
Ad Pœnos; sed nec veteri purgatus ab irâ:
Qui Batulum, Nucrasque metunt, Boviania quique
Exagitant lustra, aut Caudinis faucibus hærent;
Et quos aut Rufræ, quos aut Æsernia, quosve
Obscura incultis Herdonia misit ab agris.

Beneventum. Tous les anciens ont placé Beneventum dans le Samnium. Pourquoi dans la carte de l'Italie ancienne de M. Delisle le trouve-t-on dans le pays des Hirpini et dans la région d'Apulia?

Mémoires sur la Suisse, tom. iii. p. 106–116. apud Bibliothèque Raisonnée, tom. xlvii. p. 41–42.

On sait qu'il s'appelloit auparavant Maleventum. M. de Bochat, savant Suisse, qui a très fort approfondi les origines Celtiques, trouve que ces deux mots ont la même signification. Ben-even-tun tout comme Mal-vend-tun, vouloit dire ville sur une colline de la campagne d'eau. Cette ville étoit en effet sur une hauteur au milieu d'une belle plaine arrosée d'un grand nombre de ruisseaux.

Dans

Dans le moyen age Beneventum devint la capitale d'un grand état. L'an 571 les Lombards, l'ayant conquis, l'érigèrent en duché qui l'emporta bientôt sur ceux de Spolète et de Frioul, et qui s'étendit sur toutes les provinces du royaume de Naples à l'exception de la Calabre et de quelques lieux maritimes. On l'appelloit l'Italie Cistiberine et la petite Lombardie. Ses ducs, en effet de gouverneurs devenus souverains héréditaires, étoient aussi puissans que les rois dont ils étoient feudataires. Ils s'affranchirent même de cette dépendance après la ruine des Lombards. Au lieu de reconnoître le vainqueur François pour son seigneur suzerain, Arechis duc de Beneventum, prit le titre de prince, s'arrogea tous les droits régaliens, et soutint l'effort des armes de Charlemagne. Ce fut sous ce prince et son successeur Grimoald qu'on vit fleurir cet état. Beneventum s'embellissoit; on y avoit ajouté une nouvelle ville, les sciences y régnoient. Au commencement du neuvième siècle, on y comptoit jusqu'à trente-deux philosophes, c'est à dire professeurs des arts libéraux. Cette splendeur passa bientôt. Beneventum devint tributaire des François: Capoue et Salerne, qui n'étoient que du nombre de ses comtés ou Castaldes, devinrent des principautés indépendantes. Les Arabes désolèrent cette souveraineté mourante, et à la fin en 891 les Grecs s'en rendirent maîtres.

V. Histoire Civile de Naples, par Giannone, tom. i. l. v, vi. vii. et viii.

SABINI.

Impositus mannis, arvum cœlumque Sabinum
Non cessat laudare. ———— Hor. Epist. i. 7.

1. HORATII

Hor. Epist. i. 10.

HORATII VILLA.

Hæc tibi dictabam fanum post putre Vacunæ—

Idem, i. 14.

Villice, sylvarum et mihi me reddentis agelli,
Quem tu fastidis, habitatum quinque focis, et Quinque bonos solitum Bariam dimittere patres.

Hor. Carm. i. 17.

Velox amœnum sæpe Lucretilem
Mutat Lyæo Faunus; et igneam
Defendit æstatem capellis
Usque meis, pluviosque ventos.

— — — —

Utcunque dulci, Tyndari, fistulâ
Valles, et Usticæ cubantis,
Lævia personuere saxa.

Idem, iii. 13.

O fons Blandusia, splendidior vitro,
Dulci digne mero, non sine floribus
Cras donaberis hædo.

— — — —

Te flagrantis atrox hora caniculæ
Nescit tangere; tu frigus amabile
Fessis vomere tauris
Præbes et precori vago.

Hor. Epist. i. 18.

Me quoties reficit gelidus Digentia rivus
Quem Mandela bibit, rugosus frigore pagus. ——

VIII. SAMNITES.

Idem, ii. 2.

Cædimur, ac totidem plagis consumimus hostem,
Lento Samnites ad lumina prima duello.

SECT. XII.

PICENUM.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. xi.

CETTE province s'étendoit sur l'Adriatique depuis l'embouchure de l'Æsis jusqu'à celle du Matrinus

La

La première de ces rivières la séparoit de l'Umbrie, l'autre formoit sa frontière avec le pays des Vestini. Dans l'intérieur des terres elle s'étendoit jusqu'au pied de l'Apennin qui la divisoit du pays des Sabins. On peut la partager dans deux cantons. 1. Le Picenum Propre, ou l'Ager Picenus; et, 2. le pays des Pretutii, avec le territoire d'Hadrie; le premier prenoit depuis l'Æsis jusqu'à l'Helvinus, et le second de l'Helvinus jusqu'au Matrinus.

Les Piceni, descendans des Sabins, habitent un pays plutôt long que large, qui fournit abondamment toutes les choses nécessaires à la vie, mais les arbres fruitiers y viennent mieux que le bled. Strabon. Geog. l. v. p. 166.

Cette dernière remarque me fait voir avec surprise que dans la division de l'empire par Constantin on ait donné à cette province le nom de Picenum Anonarium.

Le Picenum étoit très peuplé quand ils se soumirent à la république, les Romains y gagnèrent 360,000 sujets: cet événement arriva A. U. C. 485, trois ans avant la première guerre Punique. Plin. Hist. Nat. iii. 13. Flor. Epit. i. 19.

I. Ager Picenus. Voici les lieux maritimes de la province depuis l'Æsis: 1. Ancone, colonie; 2. Numana; 3. Potentia, colonie; 4. Truentum, la rivière Truentum, la Tinna; 5. Firmum, colonie; 6. Cluana; 7. Cupra Maritima, célèbre par le temple de Cupra, la Junon des Etrusques. On voyoit dans l'intérieur des terres, 1. Auximum, qui a été la métropole du pays; 2. Cingulum; 3. Septempeda; 4. Asculum la capitale, colonie; 5. Cupra Montana; 6. Novana; 7. Pollentia. Cluver. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. xi. p. 728–743.

Quid

Sil. Italic. viii. 426.

Quid qui Picenæ stimulat telluris alumnos
Horridus et squamis et equinâ Curio cristâ
Pars belli quam magna venit. ——
Hic et quos pascunt scopulosæ rura Numanæ,
Et quîs litoreæ fumant altaria Cupræ;
Quique Truentinas servant cum flumine turres
Cernere erat: clipeata procul sub sole corusco Agmina sanguineâ vibrant in nubila luce.

—————— inclemens hirsuti signifer Ascli.

Strab. Geog. l. v. p. 166.

Ancona. Cette ville doit sa fondation aux réfugiés de Syracuse qui avoient échappé au tyran Denys. Elle étoit située sur un promontoire qui se recourboit au nord pour former le port. Il croissoit dans ces environs beaucoup de bled et de vin.

Berger, Grands Chemins, l. i. c. 25. p. 94. L. iv. c. 49. p. 812. L. v. c. 14. p. 883.

Trajan avoit construit à Ancone un grand et magnifique port. Pour célébrer cet ouvrage le sénat frappa non seulement une médaille, mais il lui érigea encore sur les lieux un arc de triomphe. Il avoit de beaux ornemens qui ne subsistent plus, tels qu'une statue du prince dans un char à quatre chevaux, mais c'est toujours un beau monument. Il est composé du marbre blanc de Paros, dont les grands carreaux sont si bien unis qu'on apperçoit à peine les jointures. Les membres extérieurs, les chapiteaux, corniches, architraves, &c. aussi bien que les moulures, ne sont point des pièces de rapport qu'on y a apposé; l'architecte les a taillés dans le marbre même. Dans l'inscription de l'arc, Ancone est appellée l'abord de l'Italie.

Sil. Ital. viii. 438.

Stat fucare colus nec Sidone vilior Ancon,
Murice nec Lybico.——

Incidit

Incidit Adriaci spatium admirabile rhombi
Ante domum Veneris, quam Dorica sustinet Ancon. Juvenal. Satyr. iv. 39.

AGER PRÆTUTIANUS. Ce petit pays est traversé par le Vomanus. Je n'y trouve que, 1. Hadria, qui partage avec celle du Po l'honneur de nommer la mer Adriatique; elle étoit colonie des Syracusiens et ensuite des Romains; 2. Castrum Novum, colonie; 3. Interamna. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. xi.

HADRIA.

——— Statque humectata Vomano
Hadria ——— Sil. Ital. viii. 439.

SECT. XIII.

UMBRIA.

VOICI les bornes de cette province sous les Romains: le Rubicon et le Sapis la séparoient des Gaulois Lingones; l'Apennin et le Tibre de l'Etrurie; l'Æsis du Picenum; et le Nar, des Sabins. Un petit canton se débordoit au-delà du Nar, jusqu'à Ocriculum; et dans l'intérieur des terres une autre portion, un peu plus considérable, s'étendoit au-delà de l'Æsis jusqu'à Camerinum. Les Gaulois Senones leur avoient enlevé toute la côte maritime du Rubicon, ou plutôt de l'Utens jusqu'à l'Æsis, mais après la destruction de cette cité les Romains rendirent à l'Umbrie leur pays, qui porta pendant assez longtems le nom d'Ager Gallicus. Il s'étoit assurément étendu dans le pays, mais comme nous ignorons ses bornes, je ne l'envisagerai que comme la côte maritime de l'Umbrie et la 1re division de la province. La nature fournit les deux autres. L'Apennin coupe cette province V. Cluvier. Ital. Ant. l. ii. c. 4. p. 599—603.

dans toute sa largeur depuis les sources du Tibre jusqu'à celles du Nar. La 2me division sera l'Umbrie au-delà de l'Apennin, et la 3me l'Umbrie en deça de l'Apennin toujours par rapport à la capitale.

Strab. Geog. v. p. 157. L'Umbrie est une province fertile mais remplie de montagnes.

I. FLUMINA.

Sil. Italic. viii. 448.

Sed non Ruricolæ firmarunt robore castra
Deteriore, cavis venientes montibus Umbri;
Hos Æsis Sapisque lavant, rapidasque sonanti Vertice contorquens undas per saxa Metaurus.
—— et Rubico, et Senonum de nomine Sena.

V. Cluv. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 5. Voici les lieux de l'Umbrie maritime dans l'ordre de leur situation, 1. L'Ariminum, colonie, l'Ariminus; 2. Pisaurum, colonie, le Crustumius, ruisseau très rapide; 3. Fanum Fortunæ, colonie et ville ancienne; le Metaurus; 4. Sena Gallica ou Senogallia, colonie; la Sena, l'Æsis.

Vell. Paterc. l. 1. c. 14, 15. Berger, Grands. Chemins, l. 1. c. 25. p. 93. ARIMINUM. Le sénat y envoya une colonie A. U. C. 487, et à Pisaurum A. U. C. 568. Auguste avoit fait réparer la Voie Flaminienne. Le sénat lui fit ériger deux arcs de triomphe aux deux extrémités de son ouvrage, l'un sur le pont du Tibre, l'autre à Ariminum.

Idem, l. iv. c. 36, p. 736. Le pont d'Ariminum, entrepris par Auguste, et achevé par Tibère A. U. C. 779, avoit deux cens pieds de long. Il avoit cinq arcades, les trois du milieu avoient 25 pieds de largeur, et les deux autres 20 pieds chacune. Il étoit orné d'accoudoirs de marbre, de colonnes Doriques, et de statues des empereurs.

Auguste

Auguste y avoit aussi construit un beau port, de grandes pierres de marbre, dont Sigismond Malatesta, seigneur de Rimini, se servit dans la suite pour la superbe église de St. François. Idem, l. iv. c. 49, p. 812.

II. UMBRIA TRANS APENNINUM. Depuis la montagne jusqu'à Ariminum on trouvoit sur la Voie Flaminienne, 1. Suillum Helvillum; 2. Cales; 3. Petra Pertusa; 4. Forum Sempronii. A l'orient de la Voie, 1. Æsis, ou Æsium; 2. Camerinum, allié libre, et égal des Romains; 3. Attidium; et 4. Busta Gallorum, fameux par la défaite des Gaulois en 459, et non point par celle de Camille comme les Grecs modernes l'ont cru. A l'occident de la Voie, 1. Tifernum Metaurense; 2. Urbinum Hortense; et 3. Urbinum Metaurense; on y voit l'origine du duché d'Urbin; 4. Sassina, près du Sapis et au milieu de la tribu Sapinienne. Cluvier. Ital. l. ii. c.

——————————— armis
Vel rastris laudande Camers, his Sassina dives Lactis—— Sil. Italic. viii. p. 463.

PETRA PERTUSA. Une haute montagne s'avançoit jusqu'au Metaurus à six milles de Forum Sempronii. Pour y faire passer la Voie Flaminienne, les Romains furent obligés de creuser dans le roc une ouverture qui avoit 35 pas ordinaires de longueur, 5 de largeur, et autant de hauteur. Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 6. p. 619.

III. UMBRIA CIS APENNINUM. En descendant le Tibre l'on apperçoit, 1. Tifernum Tiberinum; 2. Arna; 3. Vettona; 4. Tuder; 5. Ameria; 6. Ocriculum. Entre l'Apennin et la Tinia, l'on voit, 1, Iguvium; 2. Assisium; 3. Hispellum; 4. Mevania; 5. Fulginium; 6. Forum Sempronii; 7. Nuceria Camellaria. Entre la Tinia et le Nar, ou sur Cluver. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 7.

cette derniere rivière, 1. Carsulæ; 2. Spoletium; 3. Interamna; et 4. Narnia. Entre la Voie Flaminienne et l'Apennin je ne vois qu'un terrein désert sans vestiges d'habitations.

Sil. Italic. viii. 458.

His urbes Arna et latis Mevania pratis,
Hispellum, et duro monti per saxa recumbens
Narnia, et infestum nebulis humentibus olim
Iguvium, patulo jacens sine mœnibus arvo
Fulginium; his populi fortes, Amerinus, —— —— et haud parci Martem coluisse Tudertes.

Vell. Paterc. l. 1. c. 14.

SPOLETIUM. Les Romains envoyèrent une colonie à Spoletium A. U. C. 518.

V. L'Histoire Civile de Naples, par Giannone, tom. i. livr. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

Il devint sous les Lombards la capitale de l'Umbrie et du duché de Spolète, qui alloit toujours de pair avec ceux de Bénévente et de Frioul. Ces gouverneurs amovibles, qu'on appelloit ducs, eurent l'art de se rendre des princes héréditaires et presqu'indépendans. Charlemagne les laissa subsister, et je les vois très puissans encore au commencement du dixième siècle.

Berger, Grands Chemins, l. iv. c. 36. p. 735.

NARNIA. On traversoit le Nar pour entrer dans Narnia, sur un pont qui joignoit deux montagnes très hautes. On voit encore le reste des arcades. On n'en connoît aucunes d'aussi élevées.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. 7. p. 635.

INTERAMNA. A en croire l'auteur anonyme des Olympiades et une inscription ancienne trouvée sur les lieux, cette ville fut bâtie 704 ans avant la 19me année de Tibère. C'est à dire, Olym. xxvi. 4. A. U. C. 81, et 673 ans avant l'ère Chrétienne.

Plin. Hist. Nat. iii. 14.

AMERIA. Selon Caton l'ancien Ameria fut bâtie 964 ans avant la guerre de Persée, c'est à dire 1137 avant Jesus-Christ, et 47 ans après la guerre de Troye.

SECT.

Sect. XIV.

ÆMILIA ET FLAMINIA.

Æmilia. Cette province avoit été occupée par quatre peuples Gaulois. 1. Les Ananes, ou Anamani, qui possédoient le duché de Plaisance; 2. Les Boii étoient répandus dans les duchés de Parme, de Modène, et de Reggio, et dans une partie du Bologne; 3. Les Lingones habitoient dans une partie du Bologne et du Ferrarois, et dans la Romagne; 4. Les Senones s'emparèrent du duché d'Urbin jusqu'à Ancone, mais les Romains bouleversèrent toutes ces divisions. Ils exterminèrent les Senones, ajoutèrent leur pays à l'Umbrie, et fixèrent le Rubico pour la borne nouvelle de la Gaule Cisalpine. Ils chassèrent de leurs territoires les Boii; les deux autres peuples furent épargnés; il paroît cependant qu'ils perdirent bientôt leurs loix, leurs mœurs, leurs noms, et tout ce qui peut distinguer un corps politique. Cette province, bornée par le Po, la Mer, le Rubicon, l'Apennin, et la Ligurie fut remplie de colonies Romaines. Un grand chemin militaire la traversoit d'Ariminum à Placentia, qui étoient éloignées l'une de l'autre de 184 milles Romains. Ce chemin, qui reçut son nom de son fondateur Æmilius, le donne à cette région. On y trouvoit les villes de Placentia, Florentia, Fidentia (Julia), Parma, Tanetum, Regium Lepidi, Mutina, Forum Gallorum, Bononia (Felsina), Claterna, Forum Cornelii, Faventia, Forum Livii, Forum Popilii, et Cæsena. Au nord du Cluvier. Ital. Antiqua, l. i. c. 27, 28, 29. Berger, Grands Chemins, l. i. c. 8. p. 23.

chemin, on ne voyoit que Brixillum, colonie Romaine, et au midi quelques bourgades Gauloises, telles que Solsona, Aquinum et Saltus Gallicus. La province n'étoit proprement que la Voie Emilienne.

Cluv. Italia Antiq. l. i. c. xxviii. p. 286.

FORUM GALLORUM. Ce bourg, à huit milles de Modène et à dix-sept de Bologne, est célèbre par une bataille qui s'y donna pendant les guerres civiles. Marc Antoine assiégeoit Modène dont Hirtius tâchoit de faire lever le siège. Pansa, l'autre consul, lui amenoit des secours de l'Italie par la Voie Emilienne. Marc Antoine alla au devant de Pansa, l'attaqua un peu au-delà du Forum Gallorum, et l'obligea de se retirer dans son camp fortifié à la hâte, mais que les ennemis ne purent cependant pas forcer. Hirtius arriva bientôt au secours de son collègue, rencontra dans le bourg les troupes d'Antoine, qui se retiroient du côté de Modène, et les défit entièrement.

Idem, l. i. c. xxviii. p. 287.

RHENI INSULA. Les anciens ont parlé avec beaucoup de confusion de l'île de la conférence des Triumvirs. Il faut cependant en trouver une qui réunisse les trois conditions suivantes, 1. De n'être pas éloignée de Bologne; 2. D'être formée par les deux bras d'une petite rivière qui se divise dans cet endroit; 3. D'être assez grande pour que les Triumvirs, assis à la vue des deux armées, pussent s'entretenir néanmoins en secret sans être entendus de leurs amis qui gardoient les ponts de chaque côté. Le Rheno forme sur la Voie Emilienne et à deux milles de Bologne, une petite île qui répond très bien à ces conditions. Le Lavinius, qui est pourtant tant nommé par Appien pour être la rivière en question, est très proche de Modène.

RUBICO. On voit encore auprès de Césène une colonne d'un beau marbre, mais dont l'inscription n'est pas si bien gravée. Elle porte défense à tout général officier ou soldat de passer le Rubicon à main armée pour entrer en Italie; mais elle paroît supposée. Son langage barbare et le silence de tous les ennemis de César, pour qui elle auroit été une pièce victorieuse, le prouve assez. Cependant n'a-t-elle pas pu être dressée après l'expédition de ce dictateur? Cluv. Ital. Ant. l. i. c. xxviii. p. 296, 297.

RAVENNA. Jusqu'au règne de Dioclétien et de ses collègues, les empereurs demeuroient à Rome, et ne se transportoient sur les frontières que lorsqu'une guerre étrangère les y appeloit. Mais quand les barbares menaçoient l'empire de tout côté, ces princes, toujours à la tête des armées, voloient de province en province, et établissoient leur quartier-général plutôt que leur cour dans les grandes villes qui étoient les plus à portée des barbares, dans Trèves, Sirmio, Nicomédie, Antioche, et Milan. Cette dernière ville devint leur séjour ordinaire en Italie, et les Empereurs Chrétiens trouvèrent dans leur haine pour Rome une nouvelle raison pour la préférer. Mais l'Italie elle-même fut bientôt ouverte aux barbares, et une ville immense au milieu des terres exposoit trop la personne du prince. Ravenne obtint alors la préférence. Située au milieu des eaux, elle étoit entourée d'un rempart naturel qui la rendoit presque inaccessible. Le souverain s'y trouvoit à portée de Idem, l. i. c. xxviii. p. 302-307 de recevoir les secours qui pouvoient lui venir de l'orient; et la flotte, dont elle étoit la station constante, assuroit toujours sa retraite. Depuis Honorius, tous les empereurs y établirent leur cour: les rois Goths suivirent cet exemple, et pendant plus d'un siècle et demi Ravenne étoit la capitale de l'Italie. On se piquoit de l'égaler à Rome; Apone étoit ses Baiæ, et la province d'Istrie, d'où elle tiroit ses bleds, lui tenoit lieu de la Campanie. Lorsque les Lombards envahirent l'Italie, cette ville, demeurée sous le pouvoir des empereurs, ne fut plus que le siège d'un gouvernement qu'on démembroit tous les jours. La situation de Ravenne étoit singulière: c'étoit la Venise de l'Italie ancienne. Sidonius en fait une description qui seroit jolie, si elle n'étoit point aussi remplie d'antithèses.

Plin. Hist. Nat. xiv. 2.

Il y a une espèce de raisins qui se nourrit de brouillards; c'est pourquoi, elle est particulière au territoire de Ravenne.

Berger, Grands Chemins, l. iv. c. 49. p. 811.

Lorsqu'Auguste stationna une partie de sa flotte à Ravenne, il y fit construire un beau port, avec un phare, et un camp pour les matelots bien fortifié, entouré de hautes murailles.

Plin. Hist. Nat. ii. 83.

MUTINA. Sous le consulat de L. Marcius et de Sextus Julius, on vit un prodige inoui dans le territoire de Modène; deux montagnes qui s'entrechoquoient avec violence, en jettant du feu et de la fumée. Des animaux, des maisons, tout ce qui se trouva entr'elles fut écrasé. Des chevaliers Romains qui voyageoient sur la Voie Emilienne furent témoins de ce prodige, qui parut annoncer la guerre sociale. N'étoit-ce point un tremblement de terre?

PLA-

PLACENTIA. Cette ville fut fondée comme une colonie Romaine, peu avant la seconde guerre Punique. Vell. Pater. l. i. c. 15.

BONONIA. Les Romains envoyèrent une colonie à Bologne sous le consulat de Manlius Volso et de Fulvius Nobilior, A. U. C. 565. Idem. Ibid.

——— Parvique Bononia Rheni. C. Sil. Italic. Punic. viii. 601.

RAVENNA.

Quique gravi remo, limosis segniter undis, Idem. viii. 602.
Lenta paludosæ proscindunt stagna Ravennæ.

MUTINA, &c.

Vos etiam accisæ desolatæque virorum Idem, viii. 590.
Eridani gentes; nullo attendente Deorum
Votis tunc vestris, casura ruistis in arma.
Certavit Mutinæ, quassata Placentia bello.

GALLIA CISALPINA. Il n'y avoit point de région en Italie que l'emportât sur la Gaule Cisalpine, pour la bonté des terres, le nombre des habitans, et la grandeur et la richesse des villes. Voici quelques avantages qui la distinguoient. 1. Leurs forêts, dont le gland nourrissoit des troupeaux si nombreux de cochons, que la capitale n'avoit presque pas d'autres provisions. 2. Le pays très bien arrosé produisoit beaucoup de millet qu'on recueilloit en abondance dans les années même que les autres espèces de bled manquoient. 3. Le vin étoit excellent. On le conservoit dans des tonneaux de bois, qu'on faisoit quelquefois plus grands qu'une maison. 4. Les laines: la plus molle et la meilleure étoit celle de Modène. Le pays des Ligures en fournissoit une espèce forte et rude, dont le peuple s'habilloit. Celle de Padoue étoit d'une qualité moyenne. On en faisoit des tapis très Strabon. Geog. v. p. 150—151.

beaux.

beaux. 5. Il y avoit même quelques mines d'or que celles de l'Espagne firent négliger. On en trouvoit à Vercelles, et à Ictomulum dans le voisinage de Plaisance.

PLACENTIA.

P. Aufidius L. F. |-|-|-| Vir. |-| Vir.
Tr. Milit. Praef. Fab. sibi et
L. Aufidio C. N. F. Patri et Fadianae P. F. Matri et
L. Aufidio L. F. fratri |-|-|-| Vir et Salviae Cilae fratris uxori et Liburniae L. F. Consobrinae
Factum ex testamento H-S. CIↃ arbitratû
C. Annisidi C. F. Rufi.

J'ai copié cette inscription dans le couvent des Roquelins attenant à l'Eglise de St. Augustin à Plaisance le 13 Juin, 1764. La pierre peut avoir cinq pieds de long sur trois et demi de largeur. Les lettres, qui sont très bien taillées, ont environ trois pouces de hauteur chacune.

SECT. XV.

VENETIA ET ISTRIA.

VENETI. Il y a trois opinions sur l'origine des Veneti. 1. Celle de Tite Live et des poëtes qui content l'histoire d'Antenor échappé de la prise de Troye, chef des Heneti de Paphlagonie, et fondateur de Padoue. 2. Celle de Polybe, qui en fait une colonie des Illyriens. 3. Celle de Strabon qui les tire des Veneti, peuple Gaulois. La première est une fable sans vraisemblance, mais on peut se partager entre les deux deux autres. J'étois fort prévenu en faveur de l'origine Gauloise, établie sur le témoignage de Strabon, l'identité du nom, et la certitude de la migration Celtique. Mais la différence reconnue du langage et la haine que ce peuple a toujours témoigné pour ses voisins les peuples Gaulois forment des barrières invincibles. L'Illyrie d'ailleurs étoit si proche et le passage du mont Ocra si facile qu'il est difficile de se refuser au sentiment de Polybe, qui a reçu la sanction du grand Freret.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. 17. p. 125-133.

Marcian. Heracleensis in Perigesi.

Τον κολπον ισορθσι τον Αδρια τικο ν
Των βαρβαρων πληθος τι περιοικειν κοκλω,
Εκατον χεδον μυριασι πεντηκοντα τε
Χωραν αρισην νεμομενων και καρτισην.
Διδυμο τοκειν γαρ φασι και τα θρεμματα
. . . . . Ἐνετων εισι πεντηκοντα πθ
Πολεις εν αυτω κειμεναι προς τω μυχω.

Venetia. La région qui portoit ce nom étoit composée de quatre pays ou peuples différens: 1. Celui des Veneti, qui étoient bornés d'un côté par les Carni et le Tilavemptus, et de l'autre par les Cenomani et l'Athesis. 2. On y ajouta dans la suite les Cenomani, nation Gauloise, qui s'étendoient depuis l'Athesis jusqu'au Po et l'Addua; et 3. Les Carni qui occupoient le pays entre le Tilavemptus et le Formio: c'étoit proprement le fond de la mer Adriatique. 4. Auguste enfin donna à l'Italie et à la Venetia, l'Istrie entière entre le Formio et l'Arsia. Telle étoit la Venetia dont les bornes étoient l'Arsia, les Alpes Noriques et Rhétiques, l'Addua, le Po, et la mer. Les anciens, et surtout les poëtes, se servent souvent des mots de Rhæti et d'Euganei en parlant de cette province. Il paroît que que ces peuples y avoient anciennement des établissemens, avant que les Gaulois et les Veneti les obligèrent de se retirer dans les montagnes, dans le pays des Grisons et dans le Trentin.

Juvenal. Satir. viii. 15.

EUGANEI.

——— Euganeâ quantumvis mollior aquâ.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. 18. p. 135.

SPINA. Au moyen d'une belle correction dans Pline (l. iii. c. 17.) Cluvier a découvert que l'ancienne ville de Spina fut détruite par les Gaulois, le même jour que Camille prit celle de Veii, A. U. C. 360. Il s'agit seulement de lire olim oppidum au lieu de item Melpum, nom qui nous est totalement inconnu.

Id. l. i. c. 18. p. 149–154.

APONUM. Apone, bourg à quatre milles de Padoue, fameux par la naissance de Tite-Live, l'étoit encore par ses eaux minérales. Voici les principales circonstances qu'on peut tirer de Cassiodore, Claudien, et plusieurs autres qui en ont parlé : 1. Au milieu de la plaine s'élevoit une hauteur médiocre dont le sommet étoit presque rempli par un lac d'eaux chaudes, dont la force étoit telle qu'on ne pouvoit ni s'y baigner ni en boire. On voyoit avec surprise que ce lac toujours plein ne débordoit jamais, et que ses rivages creusés de toute part par les eaux ne s'enfonçoient point. 2. Une fumée épaisse couvroit la surface du lac. Le vent la chassoit-il pour un moment? on contemploit le fonds où l'on voyoit les offrandes qu'on y avoit jettées; car ce lac étoit un oracle qu'on consultoit en y jettant des dés. 3. On avoit conduit ces eaux par des tuyaux jusqu'à la plaine où l'on avoit construit struit des réservoirs et des Thermes de plusieurs dégrés de chaleur à proportion de leur éloignement du lac. Ces eaux étoient très salutaires : elles rendoient Apona les Baiæ de ces provinces. 4. Il y avoit auprès d'Apona un temple de Geryon. Il faut bien que ce nom soit ou moderne ou corrompu de celui de quelque divinité Illyrienne.

AQUILEIA. Le Natiso couloit sous ses murs ; il embrassoit une partie de la ville, et lui servoit de fossé. Le Lontius en étoit éloigné de seize milles. En hiver ce n'étoit qu'un torrent; la fonte des neiges le rendoient une rivière considérable pendant l'hiver. Les empereurs y avoient fait construire un beau pont de pierres de tailles. Le pays entre ces rivières étoit très orné, rempli de maisons de campagne et planté de vignes dont les habitans avoient fait partout des berceaux.

Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. 20. p. 185–187.

Les Romains envoyèrent une colonie à Aquileia A. U. C. 573.

Vell. Paterc. l. i. c. 15.

Le sénat, après avoir obligé les Gaulois de quitter le territoire d'Aquileia, y envoya une colonie Latine. Peu d'années après, il augmenta cette colonie d'une nouvelle recrue de quinze cens familles.

Tit. Liv. xxxix. 55. et xliii. 17.

Non erat iste locus : merito tamen aucta recenti
Nona inter claras Aquileia cieberis urbes,
Itala ad Illyricos objecta colonia montes,
Mœnibus et portû celeberrima ; sed tamen illud
Eminet ; extremo quòd te sub tempore legit
Solveret cui justa exacto piacula lustro Maximus.

Ausonius de Claris Urbibus.

TIMAVUS,

TIMAVUS.

Virgil. Æneid. i. 246.

Antenor potuit, mediis elapsus Achivis,
Illyricos penetrare sinus, atque intima tutus
Regna Liburnorum, et fontem superare Timavi;
Unde per ora novem vasto cum murmure montis
It mare proruptum et pelago premit arva sonanti.

Virg Eclog. viii. 6.

Tu mihi, seu magni superas jam saxa Timavi,
Sive oram Illyrici legis litoris.

Cluv. Ital. Ant. l. i. c. 20. p. 189—195.

Cluvier a traité ce sujet avec beaucoup de justesse et de goût. Voici ce qu'il en dit. 1. La plûpart des poëtes ont paru confondre les fontaines du Timavus et Padoue, qui étoient néanmoins séparées par une distance de plus de cent milles. Ce qui peut n'avoir été chez Virgile qu'une expression négligée, ou une licence poëtique un peu hardie, étoit chez les autres l'effet de leur ignorance. 2. Dans le Frioul, auprès d'un bourg nommé St. Canzan, on voit plusieurs sources qui sortent avec violence du pied d'une montagne, qui s'enterrent un instant après pour ne reparoître qu'au bout de quatorze milles. Ces sources nouvelles (car il y en a plusieurs) se réunissent bientôt en une rivière assez large qui se précipite dans la mer à douze milles d'Aquileia. Toutes ces circonstances conviennent assez bien au Timavus des anciens. 3. Combien voyoit-on de ces sources? Polybe, Strabon, et Martial n'en ont su voir que sept, mais Virgile et Mela en ont compté jusqu'à neuf. Les uns et les autres avoient raison, mais les premiers en ont parlé plus exactement. C'est au bourg nommé St. Giovanni de Cherso ou di Duina, qu'on voit les sept sources de ces écrivains. La première, et la la plus considérable, forme aussitôt un torrent séparé. Les deux suivantes en forment un second, et les quatres dernières en font un troisième : mais ces trois torrens se réunissent à peu près au milieu de l'intervalle dès sources à la mer. Mais ce fleuve, digne par la réunion de tant d'eaux du nom de Timavus, reçoit encore, avant que de se jetter dans la mer, une autre rivière qui avoit elle-même été grossie par la jonction d'un autre ruisseau. Cette rivière sortoit d'un lac (Lago de la Pietra Rossa) éloigné seulement de la mer de quatre milles, auquel Tite Live donne le nom de Lacus Timavi. Voilà les neuf sources de Virgile. 4. Le terrein, entre les sources et la mer, n'est qu'un roc creusé de mille canaux souterrains qui établissent une communication entr'elles. C'est pourquoi six de ces sources sont salées et que la septième ne l'est pas. C'est pourquoi, lorsque la marée est haute, les sources rejettent leurs eaux avec la violence d'une inondation, et que dans les autres tems elles coulent lentement et sans effort. Ces phénomènes n'ont pas été inconnus aux anciens.

Brixia. Brixia, ex illâ nostrâ Italiâ, quæ multum adhuc verecundiæ, frugalitatis, atque etiam rusticitatis antiquæ retinet et servat. Plin. Jun. Epist. i. 14.

Cremona. Les Romains fondèrent la colonie de Cremone d'abord avant le commencement de la seconde guerre Punique. Vell. Paterc. l. i. c. 15.

Mantua. Cette ville, située au milieu des marais que formoient les inondations du Mincius, étoit une ancienne colonie des Etrusques. Cluv. Ital. Ant. l. i. c. 26. p. 256.

Primus

Virgil. Georgic. iii. 12.

Primus Idumæas referam tibi, Mantua, palmas:
Et viridi in campo templum de marmore ponam
Propter aquam, tardis ingens ubi flexibus errat
Mincius, et tenerâ prætexit arundine ripas.

Virgil. Eclog. ix. 28.

Mantua, væ miseræ nimium vicina Cremonæ!

Virgil. Georg. ii. 198.

Et qualem infelix amisit Mantua campum,
Pascentem niveos herboso flumine cycnos.
Non liquidi gregibus fontes, non gramina desunt:
Et quantum longis carpent armenta diebus,
Exiguâ tantum gelidus ros nocte reponet.

Cluv. Ital. Ant. l. i. c. 16. p. 115.

Verona. L'Athesis ou l'Adige partage aujourd'hui cette ville. Il l'environnoit autrefois. La situation de la ville ou le cours de la rivière a changé.

Plin. Hist. Nat. l. 14. c. 6. Sueton. in Aug. lxxvii.

Le vin Rhétique croissoit dans les environs de Verone. Auguste l'aimoit beaucoup, et Virgile ne lui préféroit que celui de Falerne.

Virgil. Georg. ii. 95.

——————— Quo te carmine dicam Rhætica? Ne cellis ideo contende Falernis.

Berger, Grands Chemins, l. ii. c. 40. p. 300.

Les citoyens de Verone avoient érigé un arc de triomphe à l'Empereur Gallien. L'arc est détruit mais l'inscription subsiste. Elle conservoit la mémoire de la construction des murs de Verone par l'ordre de ce prince; ouvrage commencé le 3 Avril et dedié le 4 Decembre l'an 265.

Mantua.

Virgil. Æneid. x. 198.

Ille etiam patriis agmen ciet Ocnus ab oris
Fatidicæ Mantûs et Tusci filius amnis,
Qui muros matrisque dedit tibi, Mantua, nomen:
Mantua dives avis; sed non genus omnibus unum:
Gens illi triplex, populi sub gente quaterni,
Ipsa caput populis: Tusco de sanguine vires.

Hinc

Hinc quoque quingentos in se Mezentius armat,
Quos patre Benaco, velatus arundine glaucâ
Mincius infestâ ducebat in æquora pinû.

Mantua mittendâ certavit pube Cremonæ, C. Sil. Italic. Punic. l. viii. v. 594.
Mantua musarum domus, atque ad sidera cantû
Evecta Aonio, et Smyrnæis æmula plectris.

VERONA.

——Verona Athesi circumflua.—— Idem. viii. 597.

VENETI.

Tum Trojana manus, tellure antiquitus orti Idem. viii. 604.
Euganeâ, profugique sacris Antenoris oris.
Nec non cum Venetis Aquileia superfluit armis.

PATAVIUM. On comptoit, au dernier recensement d'Auguste, 500 citoyens de Padoue qui avoient la fortune d'un chevalier Romain, 400,000 sesterces, (80,000 livres.) On disoit qu'autrefois cette ville pouvoit armer vingt mille hommes. C'étoit dans ses environs, ou du moins dans la Venetia, qu'on voyoit ces races de chevaux si fameux aux jeux de la Grèce. Denys de Syracuse y avoit un haras. Strabon. Geog. l. v. p. 147.

VERONA. Elle étoit très grande du tems de Strabon. Brixia, Mantua, Regium, Comum lui étoient fort inférieures.

CREMONA. Pendant la guerre civile de Vespasien et de Vitellius, Cremone fut prise d'assaut par les troupes du premier après leur victoire de Bedriacum. Le hasard ou la cruauté d'Antonius la livra au feu et au pillage, et cette ville ruinée de fond en comble périt après une incendie de quatre jours. On cria au miracle parceque le temple de Mephitis, situé auprés des murs, avoit Tacit. Hist. iii. 17—53. et sur-tout 33 et 34.

échappé seul à la fureur des flammes. La ville avoit été fondée deux cens quatre-vingt-six ans auparavant, comme une place forte qui couvrît la frontière Romaine du côté des Alpes. Le nombre des habitans qu'on y envoya, la commodité du Po, la richesse de son territoire, et les alliances des peuples voisins qu'elle sut attirer, la rendirent bientôt très florissante. Elle se rétablit bientôt de son malheur par les secours de ses voisins, et les soins de Vespasien. On voit par divers traits qu'elle étoit très forte quoique située dans une plaine, qu'elle avoit des murailles et des tours, des temples très riches, et des foires publiques qui attiroient tout le commerce de ces provinces.

Sect. XVI.

ITINERA.

V. Berger, Grands Chemins, l. iii. c. 6. 7. 8. 9. p. 354–360. et Wesseling præfat. ad Itinerar. Antonin. et Hierosol.

Itineraria et Tabulæ. On peut poser en fait que les hommes ne négligent guères les choses dont l'acquisition est aussi utile qu'aisée. Pour la guerre, les voyages, et l'administration d'un état étendu, il est presque nécessaire d'avoir des Itinéraires et des cartes géographiques, et dès qu'on a construit des grands chemins il est très facile de se procurer ces secours. Je conviens qu'ils n'étoient point aussi communs qu'à présent. Les mêmes monumens qui nous assurent de leur existence nous font sentir qu'ils étoient rares et qu'ils ne se trouvoient qu'entre les mains des généraux et et des hommes d'état, ou tout au plus des géographes de profession et de quelques curieux, dont le commun des hommes empruntoit les lumières dans le besoin. Croiroit-on qu'un Galen n'ait appris que par l'expérience le chemin qu'il falloit tenir pour aller d'Alexandrie en Troade à l'île de Lemnos, et qu'à son retour il ait dressé un itinéraire de cette route pourqu'on ne s'égarât point comme il avoit fait lui-même? Quand Domitien fit mourir Metius Pomposianus, il fit une action de tyran, mais quand on compare les chefs d'accusation les uns avec les autres on sent que l'acquisition d'une mappe-monde étoit une curiosité singulière dans ce siècle. Agrippa exposa aux yeux du public un itinéraire général de la terre, mais si chaque particulier en avoit eu de pareils chez lui, ce monument d'Agrippa auroit peu mérité l'attention de Pline. On voit cependant, sans recourir aux fables d'un Æthicus, qu'il s'étoit faite du tems d'Auguste un itinéraire de l'Empire. Il nous en reste un très curieux qu'on a attribué à Jules César, à Marc Antoine, à l'Empereur Antonin, à Ammien Marcellin, et à Æthicus lui même. Sans vouloir décider une question aussi obscure qu'elle est peu intéressante, on peut dire qu'un pareil ouvrage destiné à l'utilité publique à dû subir un grand nombre de changemens dans des siècles assez éloignés. Les noms de Constantinople, &c. et l'usage d'appeller les capitales des cités Gauloises par le nom de la cité même, annonceroient assez que le fond de l'ouvrage est du quatrième siècle, et qu'il a pu être dressé sous les enfans du grand Galen. l. ix. Simplic. Medic. Facult. p. 117. Edit. Basil. apud Wesseling. p. 538. Itiner. Suetton. in Domitian. c. 10 Plin. His Natur. iii. 2.

Constantin. L'Itinéraire de Bourdeaux à Jerusalem avec le retour par un chemin différent est une pièce très curieuse, et qui est à peu près du même tems. C'est dommage qu'elle soit corrompue au point que les détails ne s'accordent presque jamais avec les sommes totales. Les Tables de Peutinger, (qu'on nomme aussi Tables Théodosiennes) paroissent au premier coup une carte géographique; les villes, les rivières et les mers y sont désignées; mais qu'on pense que la but d'une carte est de faire sentir la forme d'un pays, la situation de ses parties, et le rapport mutuel des lieux, et qu'on se rappelle que dans cette table il n'y a ni ordre ni proportion, on sentira qu'on a voulu peindre sur un des longs rouleaux des anciens, une tables des chemins et nullement une carte de l'Empire.

V. Berger, Grands Chemins de l'Empire, l. ii. c. 1-31, et l. iii. c. 34

Viæ Militares. Je ne dirai rien ici d'une infinité de digressions aussi belles que savantes dont M. Berger a rempli son histoire des Grands Chemins de l'Empire Romain, et qui ont un rapport plus ou moins éloigné avec son objet principal; les dépenses qu'ont coûté ces voies militaires qui partoient de la capitale pour s'étendre jusqu'aux frontières les plus reculées, les milliaires, les tombeaux, les maisons, les ponts, dont elles étoient ornées, et l'ordre qui s'observoit à l'égard des postes qui n'ont jamais appartenues qu'à l'état et dont la permission gratuite se communiquoit aux particuliers par les diplomes des princes et des magistrats. Je ne parlerai que de la construction des chemins. Les ouvriers commençoient par tracer au cordeau deux sillons profonds. Ils creusoient ensuite un fossé

de

de l'un à l'autre qu'ils remplissoient de sable et de bonne terre pour donner au chemin une assiette ferme. Dans un terrein uni et solide, cette levée, qu'on nommoit Agger, ne s'élevoit qu'à fleur de terre, en lui donnant toujours une pente suffisante pour l'écoulement des eaux. Mais dans la plûpart des endroits on lui donnoit jusqu'à dix, quinze et même vingt pieds de hauteur au-dessus des champs voisins, et puisqu'on n'a certainement pas voulu les dépouiller de leurs meilleures terres, il a fallu beaucoup de dépense pour les charier de loin. Sur cet Agger on plaçoit quatre couches différentes de matériaux. 1. Le Statumen. C'étoient des pierres larges et plattes, couchées les unes sur les autres et assises dans un ciment de chaux nouvelle; cette couche avoit dix pouces d'épaisseur. 2. La Ruderatia. C'étoient des pierrailles, des pots cassés, des tuiles, des briques répandues avec la pêle, et affermies à grands coups de barre. Elle avoit dix pouces d'épaisseur. 3. Le Nucleus. C'étoit une craie grasse et gluante, qui servoit de ciment et qui unissoit tout l'ouvrage. Il avoit un pied d'épaisseur. 4. La Summa Crusta. Elle avoit six pouces d'épaisseur, et par conséquent l'ouvrage entier avoit trois pieds. Cette surface étoit ordinairement composée de pierres d'une grandeur inégale et médiocre, (Glarea); quelquefois à la vérité c'étoient de gros cailloux (Silex), et quelquefois même on y a vu des carreaux taillés d'une façon régulière. Domitien alla jusqu'à paver son chemin de carreaux de marbre. On choisissoit surtout ces pierres un peu raboteuses, (qu'on nommoit Fistulosæ) parcequ'elles donnoient plus de prise aux pieds des chevaux, et on observoit de les coucher toujours tout de leur long et jamais sur les côtés. La largeur ordinaire du pavé étoit de vingt pieds, mais lorsque l'Agger s'élevoit au-dessus du niveau de la terre, chacun des côtés occupoit à peu près le même espace, et le chemin entier avoit soixante pieds de largeur. Le règlement qui défendoit de donner aux chemins plus de huit pieds ne pouvoit point regarder les voies militaires.

23d December, 1763.

An INQUIRY whether a Catalogue of the ARMIES sent into the Field is an essential part of an EPIC POEM.

ALL epic poets seem to consider an exact catalogue of the armies which they send into the field, and of the heroes by whom they are commanded, as a necessary and essential part of their poems. A commentator is obliged to justify this practice; but to what reader did it ever give pleasure? Such catalogues destroy the interest and retard the progress of the action, when our attention to it is most alive. All the beauties of detail, and all the ornaments of poetry, scarcely suffice to amuse our weariness; a weariness produced by such enumerations even in historical works, but which are pardoned in them, because necessary. In history, the victory commonly depends on the number and quality of the troops; but in epic poetry, it is always decided by the protection of the gods and the marvellous valour of the hero. Achilles is invincible; his Myrmidons are scarcely known. Homer has indeed given a catalogue; yet this perhaps was not right in Homer, or right only in him. Ought his particular example to make a general law? In that case, the subject of every epic poem ought to be a siege, and the poem ought to conclude before either the place is taken or the siege raised. Poets themselves afford a convincing proof that they were sensible of following custom rather than reason, by treating those catalogues merely as episodes, and by introducing into them heroes, who are rarely those of history; and who, after shining a moment in those reviews, totally disappear, in order to make room for characters more essential to the action. An epic poet stands not in need of so dull and vulgar an expedient for making the reader acquainted with his true heroes.

A critic may condemn those poetical catalogues; but woe to the critic, if he is insensible to all the beauties by which that of Virgil is adorned; the brightness of his colouring, the number and variety of his pictures, and that sweet and well-sustained harmony, which always charms the ear and the soul. The army of the Tuscans is not inferior to that of Turnus; being also composed of the flower of many warlike nations assembled under the standards of heroes and demigods. But it enjoys over the Rutuli an advantage which it was natural should belong to the allies of Æneas; having justice and the gods on its side. Every reader, while he detests the crimes of Mezentius, must applaud the exertions of a free and generous people, who have ventured to dethrone their tyrant, and are eager to punish him. I have always wondered that the courtier of Augustus should have introduced an episode which would have been more properly treated by the friend of Brutus. Every line breathes republican sentiments, the boldest, and perhaps the most extravagant. Mezentius was the lawful and hereditary sovereign of a country, of which he rendered himself the tyrant. His subjects subjects hurled him from the throne, and thenceforth regard themselves as free, without once considering the rights of his unfortunate and virtuous son. Mezentius finds an asylum among the Rutuli; but his furious subjects implore the assistance of their allies. All Etruria in arms determine to tear their king from the hands of his defenders, in order to subject him to punishment; and this fury of the Tuscans is approved by the gods and the poet:

Ergo omnis furiis surrexit Etruria justis,
Regem ad supplicium præsenti Marte reposcunt.

If I wished to establish it as a general and unlimited principle, that subjects have a right to punish the crimes of their sovereigns, I would prefer this example, which admits of neither modification nor restriction. Among the ancients themselves, it appears to me to have been as singular in theory as the death of Agis was in practice. Augustus must have read both with terror; and had Virgil continued to recite the eighth book of the Æneid, I suspect that he would not have been so well rewarded for the story of Mezentius as he was for the panegyric of Marcellus.

My surprise increases when I consider that the story of Mezentius is entirely Virgil's invention; that it entered not into the general plan of his poem; and that he himself had not thought of it when he composed his seventh book. It appears that Virgil, after forming a general idea of his design, trusted to his genius for supplying him with the means of carrying it into execution; and that entering entering into the character and situation of his hero, he prepared for him difficulties to encounter, without knowing exactly how he would surmount them: in one word, when he landed Æneas on the banks of the Tiber, that he knew not the whole series of events which should lead to the death of Turnus. I say the whole series of events; for the part of Mezentius depends on the introduction of Evander and Pallas, and the death of Pallas is intimately connected with that of Turnus. This manner of writing is not destitute of its advantages. It is applauded in Richardson, who has only imitated Virgil. The truth and boldness by which it is characterised far surpass the timid perplexity of a writer, who, while he forms his plot, is at the same time considering how he shall unravel it. Virgil's example is surely more worthy of imitation than that of Chapelain, who wrote the whole of his Pucelle in prose, before he translated it into poetry. I am sensible that had Virgil lived to revise his work, he would have given to it uniformity and unity; and carefully effaced all those marks by which an attentive reader may perceive in it detached parts, not originally written the one for the other. Of these take the following examples:

1. Mezentius appears at the head of the warriors who follow Turnus, but appears as a king completely master of his dominions. He arrives from the Tyrrhenian coasts with numerous troops, and his son, the valiant Lausus, follows him with a thousand warriors from the city of Cære. 2. Messapus,

Messapus, king of the Falisci, is a Tuscan. Fescennium, Soracte, the Ciminian forest, are among the most celebrated places of Etruria. This Tuscan prince, would he have forsaken the whole body of his nation united by the crimes of Mezentius? Is it to be expected that he should be found in the camp of the enemy; or that he would have brought, as auxiliaries to Turnus, a people sunk in effeminacy, and who knew war only by their detestation of it? The poet would have coloured so extraordinary a measure, by assuming for it some probable motive. Would he have said that all Etruria was in insurrection against Mezentius? 3. Aventinus, of Mount Aventine, the son of Hercules, makes a striking figure in the catalogue; but his part is inconsistent with that of Evander. They reigned at the same time, and over the same place. It will be said that one of those princes occupied the Palatine, while the other reigned over the Aventine Mount. This is impossible; for Evander shews the Aventine to Æneas, which was a barren rock,* situate in his little kingdom, which had no other boundaries than the Tiber, and the territory of the Rutuli.†

I believe that Virgil would also have corrected some faults, which it is painful to see in his enumeration of the Tuscan warriors. He well knew that when a poet speaks of a science, he ought to do it with precision; and he could not forget that accurate geography is not incompatible with poetry.

* Virgil, Æneid. viii. 190. † Idem, 473.

Of

Of the twelve cities which composed the confederacy of Etruria, he would have named more than Cære and Clusium, and he would not have dwelt on the crowd of secondary towns, which could not do otherwise than follow the standards of their respective capitals. 2. He would not have thought that seven or eight beautiful verses compensated for introducing the Ligurians, a foreign and hostile nation, into the civil wars of the Tuscans, which could only be interesting to the members of their own confederacy. 3. I see the camp of the Tuscans on the sea-shore near to Cære; I see their vessels, and all the preparations for a distant expedition. They embark, but it is only for a voyage of thirty miles. They prefer this navigation to an easy march of two days, which would have brought them to the country of their ally Evander. There they would have passed the Tiber, and found themselves on the frontiers of the Rutuli. 4. This naval expedition affords matter of surprise; but that of the troops of Mantua is totally incredible. Five hundred warriors, embarking on the Mincius, could not arrive in the Tuscan sea without making the circumnavigation of the whole Italian coast. Virgil loved the place of his birth; but he might easily have discovered the means of bringing its ancient inhabitants to the assistance of Æneas, without offending against probability and geography.

AN

Lausanne, 24th December, 1763.

AN EXAMINATION OF THE CATALOGUE OF SILIUS ITALICUS.

I PROCEED to say a few words on the catalogue of Silius Italicus. 1. It would ill become me to speak of the general plan of a poem, of which I have read only a detached passage: yet this passage is sufficient to convince me that Pliny well knew his contemporary, when he pronounced that Silius owed more to art than to nature. This art is less apparent in the style, which is easy and flowing, than in the thoughts, which are those of a man who is continually striving to be sublime, and continually struggling against his own genius in favour of his subject. I am persuaded that Silius would have judged better in taking Ovid than Virgil for his model. Wherever he does not offer violence to his genius, his fancy is rich, easy, and natural. With such a character, it is surprising that he did not prefer the elegiac to the epic. The greatest part of those who have failed in this last species of poetry are distinguished by a severity of character, and a wild irregularity of fancy; and, as they had as little taste as talent, they easily mistook those qualities for strength, elevation, and originality of genius. Faults were confounded with excellencies, to which they bore some bastard resemblance. 2. Virgil was free, Silius in fetters. The former might choose among all the nations of Italy those who most suited his design: the the latter could not omit any of those nations without being guilty of a fault. He was under the hard necessity of writing a poetical geography of the whole country between the Strait of Rhegium and the Alps; and this constraint is but too visible in his performance. 3. Silius followed his model with a respect bordering on superstition. Italy no longer contained in her bosom a multitude of different nations, whose arms, manners, and even languages, diffused a pleasing variety over the subject, while the story of their chiefs and founders invited the writer to agreeable excursions in the region of fancy. All those nations were become strictly Roman, and had exactly conformed to the laws, ensigns, and discipline of the republic; a vast but uniform object, which was better fitted for suggesting reflections to a philosopher, than for animating the descriptions of a poet. Silius, after seeking for characteristic differences which no longer prevailed among the nations whom he describes, is continually introducing those of the countries which they inhabited. His pictures have life and variety; but they are not in their proper place. The character of the people who were to fight was of importance in deciding the issue of the battle; the nature of the countries which they left behind them was entirely foreign to the subject. 4. Silius ought to have remembered that Aquilina was not in existence during the second Punic war;* and that we knew

* Silius Ital. viii. 606.

nothing

nothing of this place till it became the seat of a Latin colony, sent thither to check the incursions of the Gauls, thirty years after the battle of Cannæ.*

A MINUTE EXAMINATION OF HORACE'S JOURNEY TO BRUNDUSIUM, AND OF CICERO'S JOURNEY INTO CILICIA.

25th December, 1763. Lausanne.

An useful chapter might be added to the History of the great Roads of the Roman Empire, by Berger, explaining the uses to which the Romans applied them. He has indeed mentioned posts, which afforded conveniency to a small number of persons; but has omitted many important particulars that still remain to be told. A critical examination of the ordinary journies of travellers would afford important information concerning the private life of the Romans, and even throw light on geography and chronology. I am sensible that the differences of age, condition, and circumstances, must render our general conclusions uncertain; but as the means were universally the same, these uncertainties will be reduced within certain limits.

Augustus travelled with an extraordinary slowness in the neighbourhood of Rome. A journey

* Tit. Liv. xxxix. 55. Vell. Patercul. l. i. c. 15.

to

to Tibur (20 Roman miles*), or to Preneste (25 miles †), consumed two days, or rather two nights.‡ But the situation of Augustus was as singular as his taste. The weakness of his health from his youth upwards compelled him to the strictest regimen; and by his own temper he would be inclined to carry the dictates of prudence to an extreme. It appears from his faithful biographer that this prince was soon tired of debauchery; and that he always despised luxury, though much addicted to effeminacy. We may add to these circumstances, that he travelled in a litter carried by slaves; and proceeded with great slowness, that his attention might not be withdrawn a moment from his usual occupations. The gentle motion of his carriage allowed him to read, write, and attend to the same affairs which employed him in his cabinet.§ From such an example, no general consequence can be deduced.

The same may be said of those rapid and extraordinary journies of which the ancients sometimes make mention. How wide is the difference between the mode of travelling of Augustus and that of his son Tiberius, who accomplished a journey of two hundred miles in twenty-four hours, when he hastened to close the eyes of his brother Drusus;‖ or that of Cæsar the dictator, who posted * Itineraria Antiq. Edit. Wesseling, p. 309.

† Idem, p. 302.

‡ Sueton. in August. lxxviii.

§ Plin. Epist. iii. 5. Juvenal. Satir. iii. 239.

‖ Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 20.

one

one hundred miles a-day with hired carriages.* Statius speaks of a rapidity as extraordinary, when he says that a traveller might set out from Rome in the morning, and sleep at Baiæ or Puteoli; an expeditious journey indeed, since the distance is 141 Roman,† or 127 English miles.

> Nil obstat cupidis; nihil moratur
> Qui primo Tiberim reliquit ortu
> Primo vespere naviget Lucrinum.‡

I know that the poet wished to celebrate the fine road which Domitian had made from Sinuessa to Cumæ; which had fixed the sands of Liternum, and restrained the inundations of the Vulturnus. The thirty miles which he had passed, and which used to be the work of a day, now scarcely consumed two hours. Perhaps we must make some allowance for the flattery of a poet, who wished to pay his court. Yet the possibility of the journey must be admitted, since falsehoods are not to be risked in matters so simple, public, and precise.

We may perceive how much the Roman roads must have facilitated travelling, when we call to mind the journey of the courier, who brought to Rome the first news of the defeat of Perseus. The date of the battle is precisely fixed by an eclipse of the moon, which happened the day preceding the nones of September, that is, the 21st of June of the Julian year.* The courier arrived in the Circus the second day of the Roman games, and the thirteenth after the defeat.† These two circumstances shew, that to get the thirteen days we must reckon both the day of his departure and that of his arrival, which will bring us to the 16th of the calends of October,‡ the 4th of July. We may therefore reckon twelve complete days; two of which might be employed in sailing from Dyrrhachium to Brundusium, since the distance is 1300 stadia, or 225 miles;§ and Ptolemy estimates an ordinary ship's way at 1000 stadia each day.‖ The ten remaining days were consumed in the journey from Pella to Dyrrhachium, 253 miles;¶ and in that from Brundusium to Rome, 368 miles; in all, 621; which gives no more than sixty miles a-day. We are to remember that this journey was performed by one courier, in the finest season of the year, and bringing the news of a great victory. He therefore anticipated, by several days, the deputies of the consul, although they likewise travelled with the greatest expedition. The Egnatian road was not yet made; the Appian extended

* Sueton. in Cæsar. lvii.

† Vetera Itiner. p. 107, 108, 122.

‡ Stat. Sylvar. 14. Carm. iii.

* Isac. Bulliad. Epist. ad Calcem. tom. iii. Tit. Liv. ex Edit. Gronov.

† Tit. Liv. xliv. 37. xlv. 1.

‡ Rosin. Antiq. L. iv. c. 13.

§ Itineraria, p. 317. et Not. Wesseling. Plin. Hist. Nat. iii. 2.

‖ Ptolemæi Geog. c. ix.

¶ Itineraria, p. 319.

 Itineraria Ant. p. 307. iii. 117.

no

no further than to Capua; and the Greeks never applied themselves to the making of highways.*

Among the ordinary journies of the Romans, who travelled neither like invalids nor couriers, there are two which we know with some degree of accuracy: the journey of Horace to Brundusium, by the way of Canusium; and that of Cicero to the same place, by the way of Venusia and Tarentum: I shall speak of both, beginning with that of Horace.

1. Horace's aim was not to inform, but to amuse us: his days' journies are described confusedly, and we rather guess at, than ascertain them. He dwells on the places in his route, in proportion to the objects which they presented to his fancy, rather than to the time during which he remained in them. Commentators would persuade us that Horace was fifteen or seventeen days on the road;† but the foundation of this opinion, namely, that the poet slept at all the places of which he makes mention, appears to me to be an exceedingly weak one. Our conjectures will be more natural, if we attend to the characteristic circumstances of the evening, morning, the hour of repast, &c. circumstances which are scattered through the satire. The following is the journal with which this consideration will furnish us. The first day Horace left Rome, with the rhetorician Heliodorus, to take up his night's abode at Aricia, sixteen miles distant.

* Strabon. Geog. v. p. 162.

† Horat. L. i. Sat. 5. v. 134. Edit. ad usum Delphini.

Egressum magnâ me accepit Aricia Româ, Hospitio modico.*

The second day he arrived at the Forum Appii, towards the evening; twenty-seven miles.

——— Jam nox inducere terris
Umbras, et cœlo diffundere signa parabat.

He sailed along the canal in the night, and landed at the fourth hour (ten o'clock A.M. of the third day.) After a light breakfast at Feronia, he travelled three miles towards Terracina, which is eighteen miles distant from the Forum Appii. I do not perceive that he halted either at Terracina or at Fundi; so that he was much fatigued when he arrived at Formiæ, which is thirty-two miles from Feronia.

In Mamurrarum lassi deinde urbe manemus,
Murenâ præbente domum, Capitone culinam.

The fourth day, Mecænas and his suite arrive early at Sinuessa, eighteen miles from Formiæ.

Postera lux oritur multo gratissima: namque
Plotius et Varius Sinuessæ Virgiliúsque Occurrunt.

The commentators have themselves observed that our travellers only dined at Sinuessa, and then proceeded to the bridge of Campania, Pons Campanius, on the Savo, eighteen miles from Sinuessa, and sixteen from Capua.†

* The whole journey is described in the fifth Satire of the first book of Horace.

† Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. L. iv. c. v. p. 1077. Itiner. Hierosolytanum. Edit. Wessel. p. 611.

Proxima

Proxima Campano ponti quæ villula tectum
Præbuit; et parochi quæ debent ligna salemque.

The fifth day, the mules brought them early to Capua.

Hinc muli Capuæ clitellas tempore ponunt.

The poets went to sleep, while Mecænas diverted himself at tennis; which shews that it was the time for exercise, which ended before two o'clock P. M. Horace says nothing of the bath and supper which commonly followed. I conclude, therefore, that instead of sitting down to table, they again entered into their carriage, and proceeded twenty-one miles, to sup and sleep at the house of Cocceius, one of the company, which was situate on the heights of Caudium.

Hinc nos Cocceii recipit plenissima villa,
Quæ super est Caudî cauponas.———
* * * * * * * * *
Prorsus jucunde cœnam produximus illam.

The sixth day, they performed only a very short journey from the castle of Cocceius to Beneventum: it was no more than eight miles. It is probable that the gaiety and good cheer of the house of Cocceius made them sit up late, and that he did not allow them to depart next day till after dinner; for which reason I shall reckon this but half a day's journey. In the whole, therefore, we have 164 Roman miles to divide by five days and a half, which gives 30 Roman, or 27 English miles, a-day. But I am of opinion that we ought to divide by four days and an half. Horace travelled with the laziness of a man of letters, until he met the ambassadors at Terracina. He employed two days between Rome and the Forum Appii; but he confesses that more expeditious travellers would have performed that journey in one day.

> Hoc iter ignavi divisimus, altius ac nos > Præcinctis unum. Minùs est gravis Appia tardis.

The ambassadors were embarrassed with a more numerous suite, but they travelled with more conveniencies and greater expedition. Yet we ought to be better informed than we are of the object of their negociation, to determine whether they were bent on reaching Brundusium with all possible haste. An ambassador wishes to accelerate or retard his journey as the business of his mission may require. These four days and an half to which I would reduce the journey of Horace from Rome to Beneventum will give 36½ Roman, near 33 English miles, for the progress of each day.

While we travel to Beneventum, we traverse a well-known country. But, after quitting this city, Horace is lost among the mountains of Apulia, until he re-appear at Canusium. We meet with little but obscurity in this part of his route; and the glimmerings of light are so well fitted to deceive us, that Father Sanadon suspects Horace of having lost his way among his native mountains.* Yet why should we suppose that the villa Trivici must must mean Trivicum, or that Equotutium must be the name of the place that cannot be introduced into an hexameter verse? These conjectures are inconsistent with geography. Why should we persist in fixing with accuracy the situation of a country-house, and of a village (oppidulum), belonging to the most desert and least known district of all Italy? Let us be contented with knowing that these two undiscovered places stood on the high road from Beneventum to Canusium; and all difficulties will be removed. Yet this general knowledge will not allow us to ascertain the days' journies as above. Our poet, however, though he speak in obscure terms of the places, is exact with respect to time. We may continue, therefore, his journal, and then compare it with the well-known distance between Beneventum and Brundusium. The seventh day, he left Beneventum, clambered with difficulty over the mountains which separate the territory of the Hirpini from Apulia, and rested in the castle of Trivicus,

* Horace de Sanadon, tom. v. p. 138.

——— Quos
Nunquam erepsemus; nisi nos vicina Trivici
Villa recepisset, lacrymoso non sine fumo.

The eighth, our travellers proceeded twenty-four miles, and slept at a small village, whose grotesque name could not enter into a verse.

Mansuri oppidulo quod versu dicere non est.

The ninth day I find them at Canusium, but I imagine they proceeded to Rubi; at least they arrived there much fatigued with a long journey.

This appellation could not have been given to twenty-three miles.

> Inde Rubos fessi pervenimus, utpote longum
> Carpentes iter.————

The tenth day, they proceeded to Bari; the eleventh, to Gnatia; and the twelfth at length brought them to Brundusium. It is true that these three last days are not accurately distinguished; but it is certain there were no more: and without obliging our travellers to make one day's journey of sixty miles, it is impossible to reduce their number. From Beneventum to Brundusium we have 205 miles; which gives the rate of 34 Roman, nearly 31 English, each day. They travelled faster the first days, not being then retarded by the Apulian mountains, and by roads, bad in themselves, and then rendered worse by the rain. Their repeated complaints on this subject give reason for suspecting that the Appian way then reached only to Capua, and that it was not Julius Cæsar that carried it to Brundusium.* Raised causeways, formed of three layers of materials, and paved with flint stones, have resisted the impressions of time. Is it credible, that in twenty years after they were made, they should have been spoiled by a shower of rain?

With the eyes of a commentator, I should see nothing but excellence in this satire, and call it, with Father Sanadon, a model of the narrative style.

* Berg. Grands Chemins, l. ii. c. 26. p. 226.

style.* It is true that I observe in it with pleasure two well-applied strokes of satire; one against the stupid pride of the pretor of Fundi, and another against the more stupid superstition of the people of Gnatia: but I would not hesitate to pronounce that the almost unknown journey of Rutilius is superior to that of Horace in point of description, poetry, and especially in the choice of incidents. The gross language of a boatman, and the ribaldry of two buffoons, surely belong only to the lowest species of comedy. They might divert travellers in a humour to be pleased with every thing; but how could a man of taste reflect on them the day after? They are less offensive, however, than the infirmities of the poet, which occur more than once; the plasters which he applies to his eyes, and the nasty accident which befel him in the night. The maxim, that every thing in great men is interesting, applies only to their minds, and ought not to be extended to their bodies. What unworthy objects for the attention of Horace, when the face of the country and the manners of its inhabitants in vain offered to him a field of instruction and pleasure! Perhaps this journey, which our poet made in company with Mecænas, creating much envy against him,† he wrote this piece to convince his enemies, that his thoughts and occupations on the road were far from being of a serious or political nature.

* Horace de Sanadon, tom. v. p. 119. Paris, 1756.

† V. Horat. Serm. ii. 6. v. 20—60.

2. In

2. In the year of Rome 702, a decree of the senate entrusted Cicero with the government of Cilicia. In compliance with the decree, he quitted a city the theatre of his glory, and went to gather laurels on Mount Amanus. Atticus and his other friends were requested to attend to his interests, and to shorten as much as possible the term of his banishment. It was with difficulty that he could tear himself from the delightful neighbourhood of the capital. He travelled from one villa to another, before he could seriously set out on his journey. He left Rome the first of May;* the tenth of the same month, I find him at his villa near Pompeii. The following is the most natural division of these nine days. The 1st. Cicero went no further than to his house near Tusculum. He mentions the conversation he had there with Atticus, who probably accompanied him to that charming villa; where he would certainly sleep that night. The 2d May: Tusculum is sixty-three miles from Arpinum. This would have been too great a journey for a man who did not travel with the speed of a courier. I therefore divide it into two, and suppose that Cicero stopt short at Terentinum. 3d May: in that case he had but twenty miles to travel to his villa at Arpinum. The pleasure of seeing his fellow-citizens, and receiving the compliments of a people who considered his glory

* For the detail of this voyage it is proper to peruse the epistles to Atticus, l. v. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10; the History of Cicero, by Fabricus, and by Middleton, the year of Rome 702.

as

as their own, would detain him there the remainder of that day. The 4th May: this day, which was less agreeable than the preceding, is marked very distinctly. Cicero dined at the villa of his brother Quintus at Arcanum, not far from Arpinum; and witnessed a domestic scene, in which the bad humour of Quintus's wife disturbed the pleasure of the entertainment, and tired the patience of her husband and brother-in-law. Cicero slept that night at Aquinum, only fifteen miles from Arpinum. The 5th and 6th of May: from Aquinum to Cumæ the distance is sixty-five miles.* The journey would have been rather too long. Besides, in passing from Aquinum, which is on the Latin way, to Minturnæ, which is on the Appian, it was necessary to cross the country; since the highway extended in that direction only nine miles. It was necessary to quit it again at Sinuessa, to wade through the marshes of Vulturnus and the sands of Liturnum. I imagine that Cicero slept at one of these places, and proceeded next day to his house at Cumæ. The 7th of May must have been spent entirely at Cumæ. I know that the whole bay of Naples was adorned by country-houses contiguous to each other; but it must have required at least one day to assemble a little Rome in the house of Cicero. The 8th of May, he went to his villa at Pompeii. The distance was thirty-nine miles by land, through Puteoli, Naples, and Her-

* All the distances not noticed in the Itineraries, I have measured on the chart of M. Delisle.

culaneum.

culaneum. He might have much shortened it by crossing the bay: yet one day must be allowed for this journey. The 9th day was surely spent at Pompeii. Some motive of business or pleasure must have carried Cicero so far out of his road.

In this journey, we see a great man travelling in the neighbourhood of the capital, making great journies without being in haste, and every where enjoying his conveniencies. Among the ancients, these conveniencies could only be enjoyed by the great; because it was necessary to procure them for one's self, to supply the want of posts by relays, and the want of good inns by private houses. In modern times, the interest of individuals supplies to the public all these conveniencies, which each man may purchase whenever he stands in need of them. On the 10th of May, Cicero left Pompeii; and went to sleep in a country-house which one of his friends had at Trebula; thirty miles. He began to travel seriously; and writes to Atticus that he purposed in future to make good journies, justa itinera. The 11th of May brought him to Beneventum, thirty miles. The 12th of May, he seems to have stopped there, since he speaks of a letter received early, and one which came later. The 15th of May, he left Venusia to climb Mount Vultur, and thence descend into the plain of Lucania. He arrived at Tarentum on the 18th of May: this place is 155 miles from Beneventum. He spent three days with the great Pompey, employed in fortifying the good principles of a man who yet held, or believed that he held, the balance of

of the republic. On the 22d of May, Cicero proceeded to Brundusium, forty-three miles from Tarentum.* Contrary winds and business detained him several days in that harbour. He at length sailed the 15th of June, and arrived at Actium. He again set out, crossed the Achelous and the Evenus, passed through the cities of Delphi, Thespiæ, Megara and Eleusis, and arrived at Athens on the 25th of June, after travelling 205 miles from Actium.† I shall not dwell longer on this journey of Cicero; but only remark, that from Pompeii to Athens he travelled 463 Roman, about 417 English miles, in nineteen days: which gives 24½ Roman miles for each day's journey.

This slowness is surprising, since Cicero did not travel in a day farther than a Roman soldier, loaded with his arms and so many other burdens, advanced in five hours of summer (about six equinoctial hours). My surprise is, however, diminished by the following considerations. Cicero left his country without knowing precisely how long his absence from it was to continue. A multitude of preparations were necessary for a governor who was going to establish a great household in a distant and barbarous province. He had to wait for a number of conveniencies which were collecting for him at Beneventum, Tarentum, and Brundusium, and which could not but retard his journey. It is possible that I may be mistaken; but I think * Itinerar. p. 119. Pliny says 35 miles. Nat. Hist. iii. 16.

† Itinerar. p. 325—326.

it

it apparent in all our orator's letters, that such economical arrangements were by no means suited to his genius. 2. The family of a proconsul was too numerous to admit of dispatch in travelling. A questor, four lieutenants, twelve tribunes, accompanied Cicero to execute their respective functions under his government. A crowd of young Romans of high rank followed the proconsul, to learn under his auspices the art of war, or rather that of politics. To this illustrious band we must add one, far more numerous, of officers, lictors, clerks, freed men, and slaves, belonging to the proconsul himself, or to the companions of his journey. This little army was embarrassed with too many wants to allow him to proceed with the expedition of an ordinary traveller. He would have preferred going by sea from Actium to Patras: but in that case he must have made use of the little barks of the country; and the passage would not have been performed with the dignity of a public minister, who wished to surprise the Greeks as much by the magnificence of his equipage, as by the moderation of his conduct. 3. The roads must have been very bad between Actium and Athens. The motive of the Romans in making roads was neither the benefit of the provinces, which those conquerors always despised, nor the convenience of commercial intercourse, of which they never knew how to estimate the value; but merely to facilitate the marches of their troops. Greece, which early became an interior and submissive province, was not in any of the direct lines which united united Rome with the frontiers; and had but only one road, while the other parts of the empire were intersected by military ways, in all possible directions. The proconsul might have followed this road, if it was then made; but as we are ignorant of its era, we ought rather to think that it was not so early. Most of the Roman roads are works of the emperors.* 4. Greece attracted but weakly the attention of the Roman government; but how well did it deserve that of Cicero! How could he rapidly traverse a country, each village of which was illustrious in history or fable? The man of letters, who admired the Greeks in proportion as he was eager to surpass them; the curious antiquary, who had discovered with such transports the tomb of Archimedes; the enlightened philosopher, who had unveiled the frauds of Delphi; must have been arrested at every step by an hundred objects unknown and indifferent to vulgar eyes. With what pleasure would I follow such a guide in such a journey!

In uniting the 369 Roman miles which Horace travelled in ten days, with the 463 which Cicero travelled in nineteen, we shall have the middle term of 30 Roman miles for an ordinary day's journey. I should prefer, however, extending it to 33 Roman, or 30 English miles; the slowness of Cicero being better ascertained than the supposed rapidity of Horace.

I shall not expatiate on the posts, the inns, or

* Bergier Hist. des Grands Chemins de l'Empire, l. i. c. 9. p. 27.

the

the carriages of the Romans. The last, if we may judge of them by subsisting monuments, were small, open, and inconvenient. They had two or four wheels; but, not being suspended, must have been very fatiguing to travellers on the paved military roads. These carriages were of various kinds; and what is extraordinary, almost all the different kinds had been borrowed from the Gauls. The Romans adorned them with silver, gold, and sometimes with precious stones; a barbarous and misplaced luxury, indicating more riches than taste. It was reserved for modern times to invent those soft and elegant machines which gratify at once the effeminacy, laziness, and impatience of travellers.*

I shall speak briefly of another kind of travelling, the march of troops. These marches, I am inclined to think, both by the exercises (of which I have made mention) and by my general opinion on the subject, were longer than ours; but, previously to making the researches necessary for determining this matter with precision, I shall cast a glance on the longest and boldest march which I have ever met with in history, either ancient or modern.

The fortune of the Carthaginians was sustained in Italy by the exertions of Hannibal, when Asdrubal crossed the Alps with a numerous army. The republic was in danger of sinking under their united efforts. Nero the consul observed the motions

* Voyez l'Antiquité expliquée du P. Monfaucon.

tions of Hannibal, who exhausted the whole science of marching and countermarching. The Roman general perceived that a bold stroke only could ward off the dangers which threatened his country. With a chosen body of a thousand horse, and six thousand foot, he marched from his camp, deceived the vigilance of the Carthaginians, effected a junction with his colleague in Umbria, saved the republic at the battle of Metaurus, and returned with the same celerity, announcing to Hannibal the death of his brother, and finding that general himself still astonished and inactive.* He had left Hannibal in the neighbourhood of Canusium; he found the consul Livius in that of Sena Gallica. His route through the territories of the Larinates, Frentani, Marrucini, Prætutii, and Picenum, into Umbria, was about 270 Roman miles.† I know not how many days he employed in marching thither; but I know that only six were spent in his return.‡ Expedition became daily more necessary; and it is not a small stain on the glory of Hannibal that he remained ignorant for twelve days of the departure of the Roman general. I think this would not have escaped the vigilance of Asdrubal; and that he would have destroyed an army weakened by the absence of its general, and by a powerful detachment.§ 270 Roman miles in

* Tit. Liv. xxvii. 43—51.

† Itineraria Auton. p. 312, 313, 314, 315. I have measured on the chart of Delisle the distance from Canusium to Larinum.

‡ Tit. Liv. xxvii. 50. xxviii. 9.

§ Tit. Liv. xxvii. 46.

six days give 45 Roman, or 40½ English miles for each daily march. The fact is scarcely credible. Nero's forces, indeed, were selected from the whole army; he marched night and day; and the zeal of the allies co-operated with the attentions of the general in procuring for them in abundance every comfort and assistance proper for softening their fatigues and reviving their strength. With all these advantages, it would be impossible for modern troops to make such a march. To accomplish it required Romans, and Romans of the age of Scipio. As soldiers, their bodies were patient of fatigue and toil; as citizens, they had a country for which to fight. Their exertions were quite different from those of a herd of mercenaries, whose only hope is that of pay, and whose only fear is that of punishment.

This is a sketch of the chapter which I said was wanting;—but still, how imperfect have I left it!

ON THE FASTI OF OVID.

Lausanne, 1764.

Much philosophical and much theological knowledge may be derived from Ovid's Fasti. The religion of the Romans, the points in which it agrees with or differs from that of the Greeks, is a subject as curious as it is new. I reckon for nothing the researches of a Coyer.

The

The poetry of the Fasti appears to me more liable to blame than worthy of praise. I acknowledge with pleasure all the merit of Ovid; his astonishing fancy, a perpetual elegance, and the most agreeable turn of mind. I principally admire his variety, suppleness, and (if I may say so) his flexibility of genius, which rapidly embraces the most opposite subjects, assumes the true style of each, and presents them all under the most pleasing forms of which they are susceptible. The thought almost always suits the subject; and the expression rarely fails in being suitable to the thought. In the Fasti, the same ideas are perpetually recurring; but the images under which they are represented are continually different. The passages of the Fasti which have given me most pleasure are, 1. The origin of sacrifices: 2. The adventure of Lucretia: 3. The festival of Anna Perenna: 4. The origin of the name of May: 5. The dispute of the goddesses for that of June.

The following are some of the faults in the character either of the poet or of his subject; which it is painful to perceive. Ovid appears to me defective in point of strength and elevation; and his genius loses in depth what it gains in surface. In painting nature, his strokes are vague, and without character. His expression of the passions is rarely just; he is sometimes weak, sometimes extravagant, always too diffuse; and though he continually seeks the road to the heart, is seldom fortunate enough to find it. His light and tender character, softened by pleasure, and rendered more interesting by misfortune, made him acquainted with the tones of sadness and joy. He knows how to lament the misery of a forsaken mistress, or to celebrate the triumphs of a successful lover. But the great passions are above his reach; fury, vengeance, the fortitude or ferocity of the soul, which either subdues its most impetuous movements, or precipitates their unbridled career. His heroes think more of the reader than of themselves; and the poet, who ought to remain concealed, is always ready to come forward, and to praise, blame, or pity them. Ovid wrote a tragedy; but, notwithstanding the judgment of Quintilian, I cannot much regret its loss. 2. He was ignorant of the rules of proportion, rules so necessary to a writer who would give to each sentiment its due extent, and arrange it in its proper place, agreeably to its own nature, and the end for which he employs it. In Ovid, you may perceive thoughts the most interesting, and narratives closely connected with the very essence of his subject, pass away lightly without leaving a trace behind; while he dwells with complacence on parts merely ornamental, frivolous, or superfluous. Can it be believed that the rape of Proserpine should be described in two verses, when the enumeration of the flowers which she gathered in the garden of Eden had just filled sixteen?* I acknowledge that the subject of the Fasti exposed him to faults in proportioning the parts of his work. That subject is connected with the whole of the Greek mythology; it contains, also, much of the Roman history. It was sometimes necessary to relate the whole fable; at other times, to hint at or even to suppose it, was sufficient. It was requisite for him to decide how far each story was likely to be known by an ordinary reader, and how much the knowledge of it contributed to that of his subject: but the principles of such decisions are extremely delicate. 3. Some writers have praised Ovid for the artfulness of his transitions in a work so various as that of the Metamorphoses. Yet this subject, without possessing the unity of epic poetry, supplied him with very natural principles of connection. But the Fasti is a subject totally disjointed. Each ceremony, and each festival, is altogether distinct from that which follows it, and which follows it only by an imaginary chronology. The poet always traces the æra of their institution, which falls, if you will, on the month of January; but they are Januaries of different years, or rather of different centuries. Ovid was so sensible of this defect in his subject, that he endeavours to associate festivals on the earth with the phenomena of the heavens, in order to give a connection more real, but extremely uninteresting, to his calendar. 4. Ovid heard from the mouth of the gods the laws of their worship, the origin and principle of each fable, and of each ceremony. Such is the nature of the human mind; even in fiction we require the appearance of truth. We cannot bear to see the poet's invention at work. But Ovid shews to us too plainly,

* Ovid Fast. l. iv. p. 583.

the

plainly, that all his ingenious conversations with the gods are the work of his own brain. When he speaks seriously, as he once does in mentioning Vesta, it is to overturn the whole fanciful fabric at one blow. I acknowledge, that a Roman poet must have been perplexed by the perpetual mixture of the serious with the fantastic, and by a poetical religion which was also that of the state. Among the early Greeks, the inspiration of Homer did not differ from that of Calchas. His works and those of his successors were the scriptures of the nation. With us, on the other hand, the inspiration of poets is merely a transient and voluntary illusion to which we submit ourselves. But among the Romans, who alternately believed in and laughed at their gods, but who had no faith whatever in their poets, the part of these last was very difficult to act. 5. I ought not to reckon the employment of elegiac verse as a particular fault, though heroic measure would have been well adapted to the subject of the Fasti. Elegiac verse has always tired me. The pause constantly recurs on the middle of the third foot of the pentameter; and the sense must always be included in a couplet. This monotony fatigues the ear; and causes the introduction of many useless words merely for the sake of the measure. There is far more variety, liberty, and true harmony in the flow of heroic verse.

ON

ON THE TRIUMPHS OF THE ROMANS.

Rome, 28th November, 1764.

ROMULUS was soon obliged to take arms against the little cities of the Sabines, whom the rape of their daughters had justly provoked against his rising state. Acron, king of the Ceninians, was the first victim of Roman valour. He fell by the hand of Romulus; and his subjects had the good fortune to be allowed to unite with the new colony. The conqueror was eager to reap the first fruits of his glory. Driving before him herds and prisoners, and attended by the companions of his victory, he entered the city amidst public acclamation, and ascended the Capitoline hill, in order to deposit his trophies and his gratitude in the temple which he had dedicated to Jupiter Feretrius. By this ceremony, military virtue was for ever associated with religion in the imagination of the Romans. Such was the origin of the triumph, *an institution which proved the principal cause of the greatness of Rome. Three hundred and twenty triumphs† raised her to that exaltation, which she had attained under the reign of Vespasian. I venture to submit the following reflections on the right of triumph, the road through which it proceeded, and the show itself.

* Montesquieu on the Greatness and Decline of the Romans.

† Onuphr. Panvin. on Triumphs. The number is taken from Orosius.

The right of triumph may be considered under three aspects. 1. The authority by which it was conferred; 2. the persons upon whom; and, 3. the reasons for which it was granted.

1. Under the royal government, I should suppose that the kings, whose authority was as independent in military as it was limited in civil affairs, entered the city in triumph, whenever they thought themselves entitled to that honour; and thus dispensed in their own favour the benefits of an institution which had been established by their predecessor. After the expulsion of Tarquin, the senate, which had been the council of the prince, and was now that of the nation, naturally assumed the power of dispensing military rewards.* The senate conferred on Valerius Publicola the honour of a triumph for having defeated the Tarquins in that battle in which Brutus was slain. From this æra, the triumph possessed a real value in the opinion of all acquainted with true glory. This ceremony was no longer a vain show, fitted merely to dazzle the populace; but a solemnity in which a meritorious consul found the best of all panegyrics; the praise of his equals and of his rivals. Some senators had attained, many of them aspired to, the triumph; and as all of them felt an interest in keeping untarnished an honour which was in some measure their own, they judged the candidate with a severity as salutary for the state as glorious for himself. The senate considered this right as its most

* Tit. Liv. L. ii. Dionys. Halicarn. L. v.

most precious prerogative; preserved it in reality to the last days of the republic; and affected to preserve it to the latest times of the empire. It once had the pain to see itself divested of this right, and to feel that it justly merited the punishment. In the year of Rome 305, Valerius and Horatius, the two consuls who had abolished the Decemvirate, gained two complete victories over the Volsci, the Equi, and the Sabines; but their conduct too partial to the populace, and their eagerness in prosecuting the Decemvirs, drew on them the hatred of the leaders of the senate, who pitied their unfortunate kinsmen, at the same time that they detested their crimes. The senate refused to these consuls the honour of a triumph;* affording therein an example highly pernicious in a free state, of being influenced in the distribution of military favours by the party which the generals take in politics. In consequence of this injustice, a tribune appealed to the people, who seized with pleasure the opportunity of at once rewarding their favourites, and of extending their own power. Valerius and Horatius triumphed without the consent of the senate; to which, however, the people restored a prerogative, which they themselves had usurped on this particular occasion. I am not ignorant that this politic council, which had ages of wisdom and only moments of passion, endeavoured, by the impartiality and prudence of its decrees, to confirm its precarious authority;

* Tit. Liv. L. iii. Dionys. Harlicarn. L. xi.

and

and that the public at large profited by its fears. It could not indeed but fear the decision of a delicate question respecting its own constitution. Since the decrees of the people superseded the best established rights of the senate, in what other light could that senate be regarded, but as a commission delegated by the people, for the purpose of exercising rights, which those who had conferred them might at pleasure resume? The patrician party were glad to have the senate considered as the representatives of their own order, as the comitia tributa represented the plebeians. Agreeably to this principle, these two bodies united composed the commonwealth; but each of them apart enjoyed its sacred and inviolable rights. The consent of the senate opened the gates to the triumphal car; but the people were entitled to stop its career. Upon entering the Pomœrium, all military command ceased; and the consuls, who were generals abroad, became simple magistrates in Rome; which acknowledged no other authority than that of the laws. Yet the triumphant general returned at the head of his legions, and continued to appear in a military character. To reconcile respect for the laws with the glory due to conquerors, the senate always proposed continuing the general in his command during the day of his triumph. The people usually acceded to this proposal; which they were entitled, however, to reject; and which they had nearly rejected, in order to hinder the triumph of Paulus Emilius.

2. Those only could demand a triumph who had had been invested with supreme command. The discipline of the Romans would never have allowed a tribune or a lieutenant, to apply to the senate for the reward of his services. What reward could a subaltern deserve, whose only virtues were those of valour and obedience; virtues which it was the duty of his general to remunerate? The principle of military subordination was carried so far, that a commander in chief appropriated the glory of his most distant lieutenants,* who were considered as indebted for their success merely to the orders which he had given to them.† The emperors therefore, as sole heads of the army, were alone entitled to triumph for the victories which their genius had obtained, at the same time, on the Rhine and the Euphrates. On this occasion, also, we may perceive the perpetual connection, among the Romans, of religion and policy. The people, in conferring the supreme command, conferred with it the right of taking the auspices, and of interrogating the gods, concerning the fortune of the state. This sacred prerogative established a peculiar connection between the general and the gods of his country. He alone could interrogate them, and solicit their favour by vows, which the state was bound to perform. When his prayers were heard, it belonged, therefore, to him in particular, to demonstrate the public gratitude to the gods; and to lay at their feet hostile spoils and victorious trophies.

* Cicer. in Pison, C. xxiii.

† See the Abbé Bleterie's Dissertation on the title Imperator. Mém. de l'Académ. des Belles Lettres, tome xxi.

trophies. To the martial superstition of the Romans, no offerings could appear more acceptable.

In the first ages of the republic, it was easy for the consuls and prætors to unite with their civil functions the management of campaigns, which consisted only in marches of a few days, immediately followed by a battle. But when Rome was obliged to act, both offensively and defensively, in all the provinces of Italy; in Sicily, Spain, and Africa; it became necessary to increase the number of generals, and to extend the military command of the consuls and prætors beyond the term assigned for their civil authority. These proconsuls and proprætors finally became the only generals of the state; and in consequence of the weight of affairs which increased with the extent of the empire, although the same persons continued to exercise both civil and military functions, yet they ceased to exercise them simultaneously. These extraordinary magistrates, who enjoyed the same sacred prerogatives as when they were consuls and prætors, were entitled also to demand a triumph, when their exploits merited that honour. It would have been unjust indeed to debar them from this reward, and to blast their laurels, because the distance of the province and the difficulty of the war had prevented them from terminating it in a single campaign. During the second Punic war, young Scipio demanded a triumph, which he had fairly earned, by avenging the death of his uncles, and by recovering for the republic the great province of Spain. His situation was as singular a hi

his services. His own boldness and the favour of the people had raised him to supreme command at the age of twenty-four. He became a general without having ever been a magistrate. It appeared dangerous to accustom the favourites of the people to despise civil employments, and to open for themselves shorter roads to power. By refusing a triumph to Scipio, the Romans protested in favour of maxims which themselves had violated: the people were taught to understand that their authority was subordinate to the laws; and that rash ambition was suppressed, which might too probably have been inflamed by the success of Scipio in separating the reward of military glory from the honours of civil magistracy. The senate maintained the cause of wisdom and of discipline; and the conqueror submitted to their refusal. This decree, which was founded on reasons of state, rather felt than expressed, came to be considered as the law of triumphs; which the people never granted to any but magistrates: the precedent in the case of Scipio was thenceforth decisive. The strict sense of this decree allowed a triumph only to those consuls and prætors whose magistracies had been prolonged by the people; but both reason and custom extended this honour to citizens invested by public authority with the power belonging to offices* which they had formerly filled; the indulgence of the senate obliterating, as it were, the years which had elapsed since the term

* I can only cite the authority of Livy and the Fasti of the sixth and seventh centuries of Rome.

of

of their employment, and considering them as still bearing a character which they had once honourably sustained. I know not how far the senate extended this indulgence; and whether it allowed, for example, the triumph to a prætor of a former year, when invested with proconsular authority. I am inclined to think that this wise council never anticipated the decisions of cases which had not actually happened; and that according to circumstances it would have extended the right of triumph even to a proconsul, who had never held any other magistracy than the ædileship. The ædile having attained at least the age of thirty-eight, must have been known for twenty years in the army and in the city. His talents and his character might have been appreciated by his behaviour in the quæstorship, and his political principles could not fail of being discovered in the senate. But both the letter and the spirit of this decree excluded from triumphal honours the simple citizen or knight, that the laws might not be suspended even in favour of the most distinguished merit. The authority of these laws became so thoroughly established, that the people no longer sought to dispense their favours, but agreeably to the order which they prescribed. I know that young Pompey, while yet a simple knight, forced the dictator Sylla to grant him a triumph, at that unhappy crisis when the laws were overwhelmed by the power of individuals.* Although the senate

* Appian de Bell. Civil. L. i. Cicer. pro leg. Marcil.

afterwards

afterwards bestowed on him a similar power, the authority of Pompey, and the enthusiastic admiration of the multitude, justified an indulgence which would not be construed into a precedent.

3. It is well known that the victorious general, at his return to Rome, assembled the senators in a temple without the walls, and explained to them his just pretensions to a triumph, by supplying them with a written narrative of his victory, confirmed by a solemn oath. The form by which Claudius Nero and Livius Salinator demanded a triumph for their victory at Metaurus was that employed by the subsequent generals. They requested that thanks might be rendered to the gods; and that they themselves might be allowed to enter the city in triumph, for their faithful and courageous management of the affairs of the republic.* I am of opinion that this condition, which admitted of great latitude of interpretation from the prudence and equity of the judges, was the only one essential, although several writers suppose a variety of particular laws, which controlled the deliberations of the senate, and compelled them either to admit or to reject the pretensions of those who demanded a triumph.† Yet those writers have not been able to bring forward, on this subject, any thing deserving the sacred name of a law. The particulars which they mention are inferred from a few examples, the force of which is destroyed

* Tit. Liv. xxviii.

† V. Onuphr. Panvin. de Triumphis, et Appian in Lybicis.

stroyed by others directly opposite; and they cannot but perceive that he who maintains the negative against them, overturns, by a single fact, all the probabilities which they can accumulate.

They lay it down as a law of the triumph, that a general could not claim that honour, who had not in a pitched battle killed five thousand of the enemy; and suppose that he was entitled to demand it, upon fulfilling this single condition, as the due recompense of his merit. Yet it is not easy to believe that in appreciating military services, the senate should have been guided by a circumstance so exceedingly uncertain as the number of the slain. On how many occasions might a general deserve the warmest gratitude of the republic, without contenting those nice arithmeticians who calculated the quantity of human blood with such scrupulous accuracy? If he carried on war against the effeminate nations of the East, whose cowardice was alarmed even by the war-shouts of the legions, a victory almost bloodless might put him in possession of a whole kingdom. A commander, sparing of the blood of his fellow-citizens, might think military talents more honourably displayed in the skill and success of a campaign, than in the blind fortune and havoc of a day of battle. His well-contrived and well-executed movements might deprive the enemy of every resource, without excepting that of an engagement; and compel them to surrender their arms and their persons, a prize undiminished by any loss in the field. Towns strongly fortified by art art or nature, and defended by garrisons more obstinate than numerous, might oppose obstacles worthy of exercising all the skill and perseverance of a general; who, by carrying such places, might often terminate wars as burdensome to the republic as pernicious to the provinces. I shall exemplify only the second of those cases; and my example shall be that of the younger Scipio, whose glory equalled that of his uncle, though he had never conquered an Hannibal; and who triumphed twice, without having ever fought a single pitched battle. By taking Carthage and Numantium, he obtained those triumphs, and two surnames, still more glorious. Yet, in the course of those sieges, it is impossible to find an action in which five thousand of the enemy perished; and there are authors who affirm, that those brave Numantines who resisted with such perseverance and success the forces of the republic, never exceeded four thousand men, whose numbers were multiplied only by their valour.*

Another regulation is mentioned, not less wise, and just as well founded as that already stated. A triumph, it is said, could be obtained only by the conquerors of nations, who had never previously acknowledged the authority of the Romans; the reduction of a revolted province did not suffice; the senate made no account of victories which did not extend the frontiers of the empire. In this supposed regulation, it seems to me as if the heroism of romance were substituted instead of the dictates of prudence and true honour. Was a province the less valuable to the Romans because it had been long in their possession, peopled by their numerous colonies, and enriched by their attention in improving its natural and artificial advantages? Was the honour of the republic more concerned in subduing free nations, who had scarcely ever heard of the name of Rome, than in suppressing the rebellion of a revolted province, which upbraided her injustice, defied her power, and seduced by a dangerous example the allegiance of her other subjects? Was a less obstinate resistance to be expected from a people who had no other choice than victory or death, whose generals and even soldiers had learned war under the Roman standard, than from those barbarous nations, whose slightest submissions were readily accepted by a senate, always content with merely imposing the yoke at first, that its weight might afterwards be more severely felt? In one word; were the wars against revolted provinces regarded as too unimportant to merit the only reward worthy of a victorious general? The existence of such a regulation could be proved only by the most decisive facts; but the facts on record are directly against it. I will not avail myself of the numerous triumphs over communities, an hundred times conquered, to which the Romans granted very unequal conditions of peace, and treated rather as subjects

* V. Flori Epitom. Orosius, T. Liv. lv. Auctor de Vir. illustriss.

subjects than allies;* but when Titus and his father triumphed over the Jews, and when the senate commemorated their victories by medals and that triumphal arch which has subsisted to the present day, they did nothing more than triumph over a revolted province, which had been subdued by the arms of Pompey, and governed by Roman magistrates for the space of fifty years. I agree with Onuphrius Panvinius, that Fulvius did not obtain a triumph for the important conquest of Capua. Of the reasons which made the senate refuse it to him, I am ignorant; it is uncertain whether justice or intrigue defeated the prospects of this proconsul; but I know that nearly about the same time, Fabius Maximus triumphed for the conquest of Tarentum,† a city which had acknowledged the sovereignty of Rome ever since the war against Pyrrhus. I go farther; and observe, that Rome more than once experienced those disasters, which made it her duty to bestow the highest marks of her gratitude on those generals who had saved their country, without adding a foot of ground to its territory. Neither Scipio nor Pompey, but Camillus and Marius, were associated with Romulus, in the honourable appellation of Founders of Rome. These great men repressed the inundations of the Barbarians, and destroyed their armies; but never thought of pursuing them into their own wilds, with the situation of which they were

* V. Joseph. Antiq. Judaic. et de Bell. Judaico.

† Tit. Liv. xxvii.

scarcely acquainted. What must have been the absurdity of a law, which denied to such men the triumph, while it lavished that honour on propræ-tors, whose names are known only by the Capito line records?

Hic tamen et Cimbros, et summa pericula rerum
Excipit, et solus trepidantem protegit urbem.
Atque ideo postquam ad Cimbros, stragemque volabant,
Qui nunquam attigerant majora cadavera corvi,
Nobilis ornatur lauro collega secundâ.*

It may be asked with greater probability, whether the senate was satisfied with a single victory? or whether, to have a right to demand the triumph, it was not necessary to terminate the war by subduing the enemy, or at least by making a treaty advantageous to the republic. In such a regulation, I should perceive nothing but the wisdom of the senate, which was careful not to debase its honours by too lavish a prodigality; and which itself, always sovereign and free, knew how to refuse to a presumptuous general, who courted the triumph by inglorious conquests over unworthy enemies. But in deciding according to facts, and by facts we ought to decide, I perceive that the conduct of the senate varied in different ages of the republic; and that the cause of this variation depended on a circumstance altogether distinct from the merit of the general. It was customary that the brave citizens who had shared his dangers should also partake of the glory of his triumph.

* Juvenal Satyr. viii. 249, et seq.

triumph. The soldiers followed his chariot, crowned with laurel, and decorated with the military ornaments, which their valour had merited.* They appropriated to themselves the honours conferred on their commander; and this commander derived his sweetest reward from the praises of his soldiers, and still more from their coarse raillery, the surest mark of their frankness and esteem. During the first wars of the republic, while Rome contended against enemies in her neighbourhood, and unprovided with regular troops, the victorious consul brought back his legions to the capital, and the troops needed no other winter-quarters than their respective homes. I perceive that in ages the most observant of discipline, the senate granted triumphs for victories which decided the fortune of a campaign, without terminating the war. Fabius Rullianus was allowed to triumph over the Tuscans, Umbrians, Samnites, and Gauls.† The senate well knew that the confederacy of those nations was conquered without being subdued; and that the victory of Fabius had given neither possessions nor peace to his country. In the war against Hannibal, the senate indeed varied its conduct, but its principles were unalterable. Rome was obliged to act on the defensive in all the provinces of Italy at once. Whenever a considerable victory allowed her to withdraw the army employed in one of those provinces, she granted a triumph to its general, that he might not be separated from his troops. When the senate decreed a triumph to Livius Salinator,* his colleague Nero followed his car on horseback, and swelled the train of him whom he had enabled to conquer. One reason for this was, that the army of Livius had returned to Rome, and that the troops commanded by Nero could not be recalled because they then opposed Hannibal. When Rome attacked the great powers of Greece, the East, and Africa, her legions did not recross the sea until they had subdued the countries which they invaded. Triumphs in those wars were purchased only by conquests; and, in consequence of the excellence of those laws whose execution varies with the nature of things, rather than with the passions of men, the increasing majesty of the triumph kept pace with the growing greatness of the state. But from the time that Marius polluted the legions by a mixture of the vilest populace, war became a trade instead of a duty; the troops remained in the provinces; and, in disbanding or calling home the legions, the senate obeyed the maxims of policy rather than those of justice. It became the custom to crown generals, who, after once conquering an enemy, left it for their successors to subdue him, and who conducted back to Rome only a small band of officers and soldiers who were peculiarly attached to them, and who were best qualified to grace their triumph. I shall cite only the example of Lucul-

* See the Oration of M. Servillius. Tit. Liv. xlv.

† T. Liv. x.

* T. Liv. xxviii.

lus.

lus. He triumphed for his victories over the great Mithridates, so often conquered, yet always so formidable. A glance at Cicero's oration in favour of the Manilian law, will convince us that the Romans were far from thinking this war concluded.

These observations are sufficient to prove that there never existed a code of triumphal laws, such as the fancies of Appian of Alexandria and Onuphrius Panvinius have thought fit to compile. The Egyptian rhetorician and Augustine hermit, being alike unqualified for sounding the profound policy of the senate, have considered as general laws what were only particular examples. The spirit of this wise tribunal, which knew so well how to unite prudence with justice, formed to itself a living law, which comprehended all that variety of cases, concerning many of which the dead letter of written laws must ever be silent, imperfect, or contradictory. The senate compared the abilities of the general with the character of the enemy, the importance of the acquisition with the wisdom or good fortune with which it had been obtained, and the facility of the conquest with the means employed in effecting it. The aged senators, whose authority guided the votes of their assessors, had grown old in military command; and granted rewards whose value they could estimate, to generals whose worth they were capable of appreciating. I perceive also, that they were not less attentive to the safety of the citizens than to the glory of the state; and more than once refused triumphs to victorious consuls, who had purchased their advantages by an unnecessary or useless prodigality of Roman blood.* They thought it their duty to repress the cruel ambition of leaders, by refusing to them a triumphant return into a city which their exploits had filled with mourning.

There was, as far as I can discover, but one precise condition always required by the senate, namely, the rank and quality of the enemy. The triumph would have been disgraced by granting it for victories over slaves or pirates; their blood too vile, and that of the citizens too precious, equally blasted the laurels of a victorious general.

It belongs to the civil magistrate, rather than to the military commander, to curb the audacity of malefactors, who set at defiance justice and the laws. When bands of robbers become so numerous that they must be opposed by a military force, such wars have always been regarded as more necessary than difficult, and more difficult than glorious. The weakness and tyranny of masters made the slaves in Sicily twice shake off the yoke. The Romans were ashamed to employ their legions against such ignoble adversaries; but their shame was greater to see those legions defeated; and when their generals finally succeeded in repressing the insurrection, the senate was sensible that it had often decreed a triumph for less meritorious exploits. Yet the name of slave was not to be got over; the senate feared lest the triumph should be profaned; to deny it seemed

* Tit. Liv. x.

not

not pregnant with very evil consequences. The victorious generals, therefore, were honoured only with an ovation; which gave to them crowns of myrtle, instead of those of laurel; and entitled them to be attended with a train of peaceful citizens, not by a military procession. The Romans reasonably expected that the dreadful discipline thenceforth established respecting slaves would in future prevent similar revolts. But, by a strange combination of circumstances, the republic was obliged in the same age to carry on two obstinate wars against pirates and gladiators; the one of which endangered the commerce and dignity of the empire, and the other threatened the destruction of the Roman name. Could the senate foresee such events, or uniformly decree the triumph according to rules previously established? But when Crassus had ruined the army of Spartacus, the wisdom of the senate perceived that the public disgrace would be commemorated rather than the glory of the general, by granting to him a triumph for terminating a servile war. The partisans of Pompey would naturally employ on this occasion the eloquence of Cicero; and would be themselves heard with pleasure by the people, when they ascribed to their favourite almost the whole merit of this exploit. Afterwards, when the same Pompey subdued the pirates, the pride of two triumphs, and the laurels which he expected to reap in the Mithridatic war, made him disdain the honour of an ovation, which Crassus had accepted: and which hence-henceforth became, in the estimation of the Romans, the natural reward for such victories.

Pride, opposite as it is to contempt, produced in the present case precisely the same effects; the Romans refused to triumph over slaves, the objects of their contempt; and over citizens who were the objects of their esteem. The conquerors in the civil wars might have extorted from the senate the rewards most flattering to their vanity; but, though masters of the laws, they still respected the public opinion, and the prejudices of their country, from which they themselves were not perhaps totally exempted. They were afraid of degrading the dignity of the Roman name by treating their fellow-citizens like conquered kings; and even Sylla, who ventured to kill by his proscriptions so many senators and knights, would have been ashamed to drag them after his triumphal chariot, and to have thanked the gods of the Capitol for melancholy victories, which it was his duty to wish buried in eternal oblivion. I am persuaded that those tyrants of their country, Sylla, Cæsar, and Augustus, who knew the dignity of the laws which they violated, and the disposition of the people whom they oppressed, dreaded to provoke their despair, by presenting to the public eye, in an offensive show, the picture of lost liberty, and the illustrious victims sacrificed to ambition. Cæsar himself was mortified at hearing the lamentations of public sorrow when the images of Scipio, Cato, and Petreius passed passed in the train of his African triumph.* If the image of the great Pompey had not been cautiously concealed, what was grief might have become fury in a people, whose only consolation for slavery was, that it was artfully disguised. But if, on one hand, satiated ambition could still retain the justice of feeling itself undeserving of the rewards of virtue, avenged liberty might surely decree to its restorers the laurel as well as the civic crown. During the short joy inspired into the senate by the news of the battle of Modena, Cicero † proposed a resolution to which Cato would have been happy to have acceded. He granted, in honour of the consuls and young Octavius, a supplication or thanksgiving of fifty days; and the name of Imperator. He could not have refused them the triumph which usually followed these honours; and it appears that he foresaw the consequence without alarm. "Shall we grant," he observed in the senate, "rewards to those who have killed a thousand Barbarians, which we deny to the saviour of the republic? Let us forget in Antony and his adherents the character of citizens, justly lost by their violation of all its duties. Rome ought to see in them nothing but enemies equally cruel, and an hundred times more deserving of punishment than Hannibal himself." The only objection that could have been made to Cicero was the defeat of Catiline, whose conqueror had not obtained a triumph. But that conqueror was the feeble-minded Antonius, who had not

* Appian de Bell. Civil. l. ii.

† Cicer. Philippic xiv. pass. 5.

not spirit to act the part either of a conspirator or of a citizen, and who tamely submitted to behold the destruction of his ancient friends by the arms of his lieutenant Petreius. Cicero would have been pleased to add, that Catiline had been conquered by himself in the senate; and that this conspirator, who was formidable only in Rome, became, from the moment of his flight from the capital, no better than the leader of a miserable band of robbers.

The subverters of liberty, who were unwilling that their exploits should be forgotten in fighting against their country, endeavoured, like the great Condé, to contrive means for immortalizing their glory without perpetuating the memory of their crimes. 1. For the ostentation of a triumph, they substituted the more modest ceremony of an ovation, in which the victors were honoured, and the vanquished were not insulted. It was thus that Augustus returned to Rome after the defeat of Brutus and Cassius; and after the war in Sicily, and his victory over young Pompey. 2. As the civil wars involved the whole Roman world, and each factious leader had kings and nations for his allies, the triumph openly exposed only those foreign allies, and left to the imagination of the Romans the supplying of the domestic victims which the conqueror had the address to appear willing to conceal. Augustus triumphed for the defeat of the Egyptian fleet at Actium, and the conquest of Egypt. He suppressed the name of Antony and his lieutenants; but who did not recollect them at hearing hearing that of Cleopatra? This artifice was employed so late as the reign of Vespasian,* when the name of the Sarmatians was used to justify the triumphal honours decreed by the senate to Mucianus for his services in the civil war.

There remain many observations to be made on the right of triumphs; the title of Imperator; the triumphs on Mount Alba; and the triumphal ornaments. But we have already detained our generals too long at the gates of Rome. It is time to conduct them into the city, and to examine the road which they followed in ascending the Capitol.

CONCERNING THE TRIUMPHAL ROAD.

I AT first thought that the triumphs did not follow any particular road; and that the gate through which they entered into the city, as well as the streets through which they passed to the foot of the Capitol, depended on the situation of the country which had been the theatre of the war. The triumphs, I considered, were nothing but a picture of the general's return. Amidst all the artificial decorations of pride and magnificence, there must have been an inclination to confine them within the bounds of nature and probability. When Paulus Emilius returned from the conquest of Macedon, he must have pursued the Appian way to the Porta Capena; and the conquerors of the northern provinces must have entered Rome

* Tacit. Hist. iv. 4.

through through the gates distinguished by the names Flaminia and Collina. A passage of Cicero first made me change this opinion. In his bloody invective against Piso, the orator sets before his eyes his shameful return to Rome, a return truly worthy of his scandalous administration. To the numerous train, the acclamations, and the public joy by which victorious proconsuls were constantly attended, and which already gave them a foretaste of their triumph, he sets in opposition the contempt or obscurity with which Piso had returned from a province, that would have afforded laurels to every man but himself:* "Dreading," he observes, "to meet the light and the eyes of men, you dismissed your lictors at the Cœlimontane gate." Piso foolishly enough interrupted him, "You are mistaken; I entered by the Esquiline." "What matters that," rejoined the orator, "provided you did not enter by the porta triumphalis, a gate always open to your predecessors?" The consequence naturally follows; that triumphant generals entered by a gate which was open for them alone. This custom raised the dignity of the triumph by clearly distinguishing it from an ordinary return; and was worthy of the policy of the Romans, who regarded no circumstance as unimportant which had a tendency to affect the imagination of the multitude. Cicero's authority proves that such an institution prevailed in his time; and the nature of the thing persuades me that it was still more an

* Cicer. in Pison. c. 23.

cient

cient. In enlightened ages, men seldom venture to establish customs which are respectable only in their end and purpose. The people, who respectfully follow the wisdom of their ancestors, would despise that of their contemporaries; and would regard such establishments merely in that point of view which laid them open to ridicule. Romulus, besides, when he instituted the triumph, fixed by his example, not only the place where the trophies were to be deposited, but the road which the procession was to follow. Conformably to this example, all those who afterwards entered in triumph came to adore the Jupiter of the Capitol. I am persuaded they also came by the same road which Romulus had traced; and which, in the eyes of posterity, must have acquired the character of sanctity. Who would have been the first to venture to change the route of this ancient procession, to despise an authority fortified by time, and to forsake the footsteps of the founder of Rome and of the triumph? What could be the motive for such an innovation, since the example of Romulus was surely sufficient to determine a choice totally indifferent in itself? Had there been any of the triumphant generals of so very extraordinary a temper as to despise ancient ceremonies which were highly flattering to their own personal glory, would the wisdom of the senate have indulged so very unreasonable a caprice; and have substituted, for the revered institution of their ancestors, an innovation proceeding from no warrantable motive,

and

and terminating in no useful end? Romulus chose the Capitoline Mount as a place

Religione patrum, et sævâ formidine sacrum;

and doubtless pursued the shortest and most convenient road in his return from Cenina. Amidst the different accounts of authors concerning this city, we may form a general notion of its situation. Some place it in the territory of the Sabines, others in that of the Latins; which makes me believe that it stood in that slip of ground on the banks of the Anio, where the colonies of the two nations were mixed and confounded with each other.* The different lines which may be drawn from this district to Rome meet in the Campus Martius. The side of the Capitoline hill which faces the Campus Martius is rude and almost inaccessible. Romulus therefore was under the necessity of making a circuit, either by the valley between the Quirinal and Capitoline hills, or by the plain which lies between the latter and the Tiber. The gate of which we are in quest ought to be found within these limits. A chain of conjectural evidence leads me to this conclusion, which facts alone can substantiate.† Among the extraordinary honours designed for the memory of Augustus, it was proposed that his funeral procession should pass through the triumphal gate. The place of his sepulchre was already fixed. The citi-

* Plutarch and Stephanus, Tit. Liv. Dionys. Halicarn. and Festus.

† Tacit. Annal. i. 8. Sueton. in Aug. c. 100.

zens

zens constantly beheld before their eyes that lofty mausoleum which already entombed a part of his family. It stood in the Campus Martius. The triumphal gate therefore could not be far distant from it.

Guided by such preliminary notions, we may easily follow the triumphal processions, particularly those of Paulus Emilius and Vespasian. The latter, after spending the night in the temple of Isis, met the senate, which waited for him in the Octavian Portico. These two circumstances bring us to the Field of Mars, and even to the vicinity of the theatre of Marcellus. At the triumph of Paulus Emilius, the people raised scaffoldings in the two circuses to see the procession pass. It proceeded therefore by the circus of Flaminius, as well as by that distinguished by the epithet of Maximus. Horace, moreover, indulged the hope of one day seeing the Britons in chains descend the Via Sacra. This word "descend," combined with the supposition that the triumphal gate was near to the Campus Martius, enables us to trace the whole progress of the procession. On this subject, I could only follow and abridge Father Donati,* a skilful antiquary, who has treated this question with a degree of taste and erudition, which fully removes all difficulties.

It may be supposed, therefore, with much probability, that the triumphal train having assembled in an open space, such as the Equiria, or that properly called the Campus Martius, immediately under the mausoleum of Augustus, passed through the circus of Flaminius, entered the city by the triumphal gate between the Capitol and the Tiber, traversed the place called the Velabrum, as well as the whole length of the Circus Maximus, and completed the circuit of the Palatine Mount by descending through the Via Sacra into the Forum, in order again to mount to the Capitol by the Clivus Capitolinus, which begins at the arch of Septimius Severus. This hypothesis, which is supported by the direct testimony of ancient authors, also corresponds with all the circumstances known respecting the triumph. Romulus (to resume our first conjecture) not being able to traverse his new colony, which then occupied only the craggy top of Mount Palatine, naturally resolved to make a circuit round it, in order to display before the citizens the monuments of his first victory. When Rome afterwards extended over the seven hills, the procession would naturally advance along the most considerable and best peopled parts of the city. A numerous crowd of people, seated at their ease in the circuses and porticoes of the Forum, beheld it pass under their eyes; and there were few of the inhabitants of the Palatine, or of one side of the Esquiline and Aventine, who might not perceive it at a distance from the tops of their houses and temples. We still find triumphal arches of several of the emperors, Constantine, Titus, and Septimius; all of whom really triumphed. It is difficult to determine how the senate proceeded in raising them. I am inclined to think, that after adorning the triumphal road by temporary wooden arches, arches, more solid ones were afterwards erected of stone or marble, in such places as were least crowded with those monuments. As to the arches of those emperors who never actually triumphed, it should seem that their own will, the choice of the senate, or some particular circumstance, determined the site of those eternal proofs of imperial vanity and Roman meanness.

* Donat. Roma Vetus, L. i. C. 22. p. 79—88.

On this subject I am not afraid to oppose the united authority of Nardini and Donati.* They differ from each other with respect to the situation of the triumphal gate. Nardini places it between the Capitol and the Tiber; Donati, between the Quirinal and the Capitol; and both of them remove it to a part of the city far distant from the Porta Flaminia; whereas its proximity to that gate seems to me essentially connected with every probable hypothesis on the subject. I might content myself with allowing these antiquaries to dispute with each other; and listen to Nardini, while he proves that the Porta Flaminia was the same with the Flumentana, and therefore near to the river; and to Donati, while he maintains that the triumphal gate stood between the Capitol and the Tiber; and from the particular facts which they prove, might infer a general conclusion. But instead of displaying vain erudition, I choose rather to appeal to the following plain and convincing reflections: 1. There must have been an easy access to one of the roads most frequented, and communicating with the principal streets and buildings of the city. 2. The triumphal procession must also have entered Rome by one of the broadest roads, and through the midst of the most distinguished buildings. This supposition may be overturned without affecting my inference. If the triumphal road was that followed by Romulus, the vanity of the censors would spare no pains to adorn it in a manner suited to its high destination. 3. As the triumphal gate was open only to the conqueror and his train, another was requisite for admitting the vast crowds of people who flocked to Rome by the triumphal road, which I consider with Martial to have been the same with the Flaminian.* Let us examine, according to these principles, the two most probable sites of the Triumphal and Flaminian gates. In the one, I find the most ancient edifices of the Campus Martius, and the beginning of the suburbs, which, as early as the sixth century of Rome, extended beyond the Carmentale gate; I find also the theatre of Marcellus; several temples, particularly that of Bellona, where the general convened the senate to solicit his triumph; the Octavian portico, and the Flaminian circus in which last Lucullus distributed a donative to his troops. In the other of those sites, I scarcely discover any thing more ancient than the age of Trajan, when that prince dug through part of the Quirinal, extended the valley

* Donat. loc. citat. L. i. C. 21. p. 72. Nardini Roma Antica, L. i. C. 9. p. 38; et C. 10. p. 47—50.

* Martial Epig. x. 6.

between

between that mountain and the Capitol, and at the same time adorned it with a magnificent forum. It was extremely natural that a new road called the Broad-way should soon afterwards be made between the Flaminian road and the city. Why should I here conceal a conjecture respecting the triumphal gate, which appears to me characterised by several marks of probability? I think that this gate was really no other than the famous Janus Geminus, called often the Temple of Janus, the gates of which, as they were open or shut, were appointed by Numa to denote respectively the condition of war and peace. The following are some of the circumstances which persuade me of the truth of a supposition that may at first sight appear paradoxical. Among the real or pretended obscurities of the accounts of the ancients on the subject of Janus, I shall choose for my guide the learned Varro, who deserved from the Roman contemporaries of Cicero the praise of introducing them to the knowledge of their own city. That antiquary thus describes Janus, in speaking of the gates of Rome, in the time of Romulus: Tertia Janualis dicta ab Jano, et ideo ibi positum Jani signum, et ejus institutum a Numa Pompilio, ut scribit in annalibus L. Piso, ut sit clausa semper, nisi cum bellum sit.—It is known that the wall built by Romulus, though it was extended in all other directions, remained always the same on the side of the Capitol and the Tiber: and the expressions of Varro clearly refer to a gate which existed in his own time, or at least in that of Piso. The same sense may be extracted from the most correct writers of antiquity. I too well know the danger of exclusive propositions to affirm, that the phrase "Temple of Janus" is not to be found in any writer of pure Latinity; but I perceive that Livy, Horace, Suetonius, and Pliny* always employ the proper expression of Janus Geminus, or Janus Quirini, or Quirinus. Virgil, who describes ancient customs with the fire of a poet, and the accuracy of an antiquary, makes mention of this institution among the ancient Latins; but never introduces the word "temple" in speaking of the gates of war.

> Sunt geminæ belli portæ, (sic nomine dicunt,) > Religione sacræ et sævi formidine Martis;
> Centum ærei claudunt vectes, æternaque ferri
> Robora: nec custos absistit limine Janus.†

In this description, every word indicates an arcade, such as that of the gates of cities, shut on both sides by doors of bronze, and consecrated by a statue of Janus, placed perhaps in a niche in the wall. Although modern writers have endeavoured to convert the Janus Geminus into a celebrated temple, their want of accuracy needs not hinder me from giving to the words their primitive sense, which perfectly accords with the expressions of Varro. The triumphal gate and that of Janus belonged, therefore, to the same wall. I may

* Tit. Liv. L. i. Sueton in August. xxii. et in Neron. xiii. Horat. Carm. iv. 15. Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxiv. 7.

† Virgil. Æneid. L. vii. 608.

thence

thence venture to conclude that their identity is possible. 2. But, to render the thing probable, we must endeavour to fix more accurately the situation of the Janus Geminus.* According to Livy, Numa Pompilius erected it at the lower extremity of the Argiletum, to serve as the index to war and peace. We know that the Argiletum, though its etymology is uncertain, was situate near the foot of the Tarpeian rock not far from the Tiber;† and Servius fixes its site still more precisely, by saying it was within the vicinity of the Temple of Marcellus. The triumphal gate and that of Janus must also have stood within the limits of this small portion of the wall, extending from the Tarpeian rock to the river. Within the same limits, therefore, we are obliged to place three gates, the Flumentana or Flaminia near to the river, the Carmentalis at the foot of the rock, and the Triumphal in the middle between the two others. In an extent of only an hundred fathoms‡ of a wall crowded with towers, is it natural to suppose a fourth gate; or is it not more probable that this supposed fourth gate was merely a different name from one of the others? The placing of Janus in the Argiletum, which is done expressly by Livy and Servius, and which is quite consistent with the terms of Varro, is opposed by no other authority than that of Pro-

* Tit. Liv. L. i. Serv. ad Æneid. VII. Nardini Roma Antica, L. vii. C. 4. p. 439.

† Donati Roma Vetus, L. ii. C. 26. p. 212.

‡ I measured the distance on Nolli's great map of Rome.

copius,* who says, that the Temple of Janus stood opposite to the Capitol, and in the middle of the Forum. But Procopius does not say that this temple was the Janus Geminus; and whatever he might say, I should be inclined rather to reject the authority of a soldier of the sixth century, who spoke of a monument no longer in existence, than to suppose with Nardini† that there were two Januses, employed as tokens of war and peace; one of which was the ancient Porta Janualis, which Numa converted into a temple; and the other a temple which he afterwards built in the Argiletum. These two Januses are totally unknown to ancient authors; and Varro directly says, what Livy plainly insinuates, that Numa instituted a new ceremony without building a new edifice. 3. The gates of war and triumph were therefore so near to each other, that it is difficult to distinguish them; and a peculiarity which they possessed in common makes me inclined to consider them as the same. Both these gates were consecrated by public opinion and the ceremonies of religion. According to the institutions of the Tuscans,‡ walls were sacred, but gates were profane; and when they traced the sacred site of the Pomœrium, it was customary at times to interrupt the action of the plough, that spaces might be left free for † Nardini Roma Antica, L. i. C. iii. p. 13. et L. v. C. vii. p. 256—257.

* Procopius de Bell. Gothic. L. i.

‡ Plutarch in Romul.

these

these necessary outlets, which, for the conveniency of the city, must often be defiled by impurities. But the triumphal gate, which was destined solely for admitting into the city a most venerable religious procession, needed not to be included under this law; and that it certainly was not, appeared from what happened respecting the honours which it was proposed to bestow on the memory of Augustus.* Tiberius rejected these, however, as offensive to religion; to which the proposition of making a dead body pass through the triumphal gate was reckoned as contrary as that of collecting the bones of Augustus by the hands of priests, and of determining the age or century by the length of his life. It belonged to the gods alone to mark by prodigies the duration of each period. 4. The supposed identity of the two gates, whose resemblance is very striking, perfectly explains the institution of Numa, and the reason why Janus was open in war and shut in peace. The contrary symbols might appear more natural. A free and open access to a city bespeaks the security of peace. Amidst the fear and distrust occasioned by war against neighbouring enemies, the shutting of the gates is employed as the most natural means of defence. But by the institution of Numa, the gates of war were opened, because they were the gates of glory; and they continued open, to admit the small number of great men, who were entitled to pass through them. They were, on the other hand,

* Sueton. in Aug. C. 100. Tacit. Annal. I. 8.

hand, shut when the return of peace shut up the triumphal road. Among the Romans, indeed, this road was rarely interrupted. For the ceremony of shutting Janus required not merely an actual peace, which the Romans often enjoyed, but an inclination also in the senate to render that peace lasting; an inclination which that body testified only during the tranquil reigns of Numa and Augustus, and during that period of national weakness which was occasioned by the first Punic war.

ON THE TRIUMPHAL SHOWS AND CEREMONIES.

It is here necessary to pause. This chapter might become a volume. We may commit to antiquaries the care of describing the triumphal show; the victims, sacrifices, vases of gold and silver, and crowns. I shall dwell on one circumstance alone, more deserving the attention of a philosopher, because by it this institution is honourably distinguished from those vain and fatiguing solemnities which create nothing but weariness or contempt. The triumph converted the spectators into actors, by shewing to them objects great, real, and which could not fail to move their affections.

The most brilliant shows in courts, the carousals of Lewis XIV. or the festivities of the Duke of Wurtemberg, attested the wealth, and sometimes the taste, of princes. We may throw a glance on them, them, to remark the state of arts and manners in a certain age or country; but our eyes are soon tired or disgusted by perceiving that these immense expenses are consumed in relieving the languor or gratifying the vanity of one man. I perceive crowds of courtiers indifferent, or yawning, or wretchedly occupied in concealing, under the mask of pleasure, their inward uneasiness. I hear the loud complaints of a whole people; who have felt, in an expensive hunting-match, the desolation of a province; and can trace, in a gilded dome, the marks of an hundred cottages, overwhelmed by the weight of taxes. From such objects I remove my attention with horror. The ceremonies of religion, when presented to mankind in a venerable garb, ought powerfully to interest their affections; but their influence cannot be completely felt, unless the spectators have a firm faith in the theological system on which they are founded; and unless they also feel in themselves that particular disposition of mind which lays it open to religious terrors. Such ceremonies, when they are not viewed with respect, are beheld with the contempt excited by the most ridiculous pantomime.

In the triumph, every circumstance was great and interesting. To receive its full impression, it was enough to be a man and a Roman. With the eyes of citizens, the spectators saw the image, or rather the reality of the public glory. The treasures which were carried in procession, the most precious monuments of art, the bloody spoils of the enemy, exhibited a faithful picture of the war, and and illustrated the importance of the conquest. A silent but forcible language instructed the Romans in the exploits and valour of their countrymen: symbols chosen with taste shewed to them the cities, rivers, mountains, the scenes of their national enterprize, and even the gods of their prostrate enemies, subdued under the majesty of Capitoline Jupiter. Under the impression of recent and manifest favours, pride, curiosity, and devotion warmed into one strong and prevailing passion of enthusiasm. Sometimes sentiments more tender penetrated the citizen's heart, when he beheld a son, a brother, or a friend, escaped from the dangers of war, following the triumphal chariot, and crowned with the rewards of his valour. The general's glory was not confined within the narrow sphere of his own family and friends. It redounded to the honour of every citizen, who rejoiced at the new dignity thereby acquired to the Roman name; and who remembered, perhaps, that his own vote had helped to raise to the consulship the great man, whose merit he had the discernment to perceive, and whom he had the disinterestedness to prefer to all his rivals.

When the citizen cast his eye on the vanquished kings dragged in triumph, his own pride triumphed at once over them and insulted humanity. But if a sentiment of compassion overcame his stern prejudices, and he melted at the sight of a fallen monarch, and his innocent children still unconscious of their misfortune, his tenderness must have been rewarded rewarded with that delightful pleasure with which nature repays such tears.

The lot of those unfortunate princes is but too well known. Victims of state-policy and Roman pride, they ended a shameful captivity by an ignominious death, which had been delayed only by their disgrace of being led in triumph. In the conduct of the Romans towards them, there was however a singular capriciousness, which it is not easy to explain. Of this, the following is a memorable example. After the triumph of Paulus Emilius for the conquest of Macedon, the senate banished Perseus to Alba Facetia, in the territory of the Marsi, supplied him with every comfort that can be enjoyed without liberty, and honoured his remains with the pomp of a public funeral. This treatment was totally the reverse of that experienced by the unhappy Jugurtha, who expired in a dungeon, after enduring the torments of hunger and despair; torments the more horrible in his forlorn and solitary state, unrelieved by the hope of glory, the presence of spectators, or the show of a public execution, which, while it frightens, fortifies the mind. What was the reason for making this difference? Both princes were sworn enemies of the Roman name, and each was stained with the blood of a brother who had been a friend to the Romans. To these crimes Perseus had added the assassination of a king allied to the senate, and an attempt to poison the Roman ambassadors. But Perseus was a monument of the virtue of the republic. With him was associated the idea of a glorious glorious war; but, with Jugurtha, the Romans must have wished to bury for ever the memory of their own disgrace; their legions made to pass under the yoke; consuls, ambassadors, the whole senate, corrupted by the bribes of that prince; the concealed baseness of the republic unveiled to the whole world. Such were the crimes of Jugurtha, crimes for which the Romans could never possibly forgive him.

Rome, 13th December, 1764.

REMARQUE

REMARQUES SUR LES OUVRAGES ET SUR LE CARACTÈRE DE SALLUSTE, JULES CÉSAR, CORNELIUS NEPOS, ET TITE LIVE.

Janvier le 19, de l'An 1756.

J'ai pris la résolution de lire de suite tous les classiques Latins, les partageant, suivant les matières qu'ils ont traitées, en I. Les Historiens ; II. Les Poetes ; III. Les Orateurs ; dans laquelle classe, je renfermerai tous les autres auteurs qui ont écrit en prose sans être ni philosophes, ni historiens ; IV. Les Philosophes.

I. Classe.

LES HISTORIENS.

C. Crispi Sallustii Opera quæ extant omnia, cum selectissimis variorum Observationibus. Ex accuratâ Recensione Ant. Thysii. Lugd. Batav. 1649.

J'ai eu aussi sous la main

C. Crispi Sallustii quæ extant Opera. Lutet. Paris. 1744.

C. Crispus Sallustius, qui nous est connu sous nom de l'historien Salluste, naquit à Amiternum au Janvier 19.

au pays des Sabins A. U. C. 669. Après avoir rempli l'emploi de tribun du peuple, il fut chassé du sénat par les censeurs à cause de l'infamie de ses mœurs; il y rentra par le moyen de César qui le fit questeur, préteur, et ensuite gouverneur de la Numidie. Ce fut dans ce dernier emploi qu'ayant amassé de grandes richesses par la concussion, il se trouva en état d'acheter ces fameux jardins de Salluste qui ont toujours été si célèbres à Rome. Nous ne savons rien de lui depuis cette époque jusques à celle de sa mort qui arriva quatre ans avant la bataille d'Actium, A. U. C. 718. (1) Ce fut apparemment dans cette période qu'il écrivit les ouvrages que nous avons de lui. M. Philippe paroît en douter, puisqu'il met la composition de la guerre de Jugurthe, et ses autres ouvrages, comme des suites immédiates de son tribunat, quoiqu'avec un air peu assuré. Pour ce qui est des passages de Salluste où il dit expressément (2) qu'il avoit déjà abandonné la poursuite des honneurs publiques, et qui ne peuvent se rapporter à aucun tems antérieur à sa préture, ils ne lui paroissent pas décisifs, puisqu'il conclut en disant qu'on il n'espéroit plus d'honneurs, ou qu'il cachoit bien finement son ambition. J'avoue que Salluste, homme très capable de dissimuler ses véritables sentimens ailleurs, étoit bien capable de le faire dans cet article. Mais il me paroît que dans une chose de fait aussi publique il ne l'auroit guères osé, et que ce passage se rapporte bien plus naturellement à la vie et tranquillité qu'il menoit dans ces jardins délicieux après son retour d'Afrique. Et je crois que si on fa

(1) Vie Latine de Salluste par M. Philippe prémise à l'édition de Paris que je viens d'indiquer.

(2) Bell. Catilin. c. 3. 4.

fait attention à deux chapitres de ses ouvrages. (1) On y verra une réfutation formelle des accusations qu'on lui intentoit sur cette vie de mollesse; accusations qui ne sauroient convenir qu'aux dernières années de sa vie. Outre que, suivant la remarque de M. Philippe, ses histoires ne sentent point le jeune homme, mais paroissent bien plutôt le fruit de l'age et de la maturité, j'aurai même deux raisons particulières pour le croire de chacun de ses ouvrages qui nous restent en entier: I. Si vous considérez le caractère qu'il nous donne de Caton dans sa guerre Catilinaire et le parallèle qu'il en fait avec César, vous verrez qu'elle ne pourroit point avoir été écrite qu'après la mort de ce dernier. Salluste l'auroit-il mis au niveau de César et lui donné même en quelque façon l'avantage, lui qui, dévoué à la fortune de César, savoit qu'on ne pouvoit pas lui déplaire davantage qu'en encensant les vertus d'un homme qu'il haïssoit personnellement, et contre qui il composa deux invectives même après sa mort? Qu'on prenne garde toujours que je me fonde bien plus sur le caractère de Salluste que sur celui de César. Un Cicéron, qui portoit la dignité dans le sein même de l'adulation, (2) pouvoit défendre Caton sans que César y répondit autrement qu'en homme de lettres; mais notre historien, le flatteur le plus effronté, n'auroit jamais risqué sa faveur afin de pouvoir contredire ce qu'il avoit lui-même dit de Caton en écrivant à César; (3) où il ne lui donne pour tout mérite qu'un génie rusé et harangueur. II. La raison que j'ai pour croire que la guerre Jugurthine n'est point un ouvrage antérieur à sa pré-

(1) Bellum Catilin. c. 3. 4. Bell. Jug. c. 4.

(2) Voyez surtout sa harangue pour Ligarius.

(3) I. Epis. ad Cæsar.

ture est tirée de la matière qui le compose. Dans quel tems peut-il avoir mieux conçu le dessein d'écrire l'histoire d'une guerre particulière qu'alors lorsqu'il étoit gouverneur de la province qui en avoit été le théâtre? La circonstance qu'on nous a conservé de son voyage pour examiner les lieux célèbres, (1) et les citations qu'il fait des livres Puniques, ne sauroient être conciliées avec une autre période.

(1) De la Mothe le Vayer, Jugement des Historiens, tom. i. p. 356, 361.

Quoique Salluste fut un homme des mœurs les plus déréglées, et qu'à cause de cela il avoit été (comme je l'ai déjà dit) chassé du sénat par les censeurs, il ne laisse pas de prendre le ton dans ses ouvrages d'un vieux Fabricius. Aucun des historiens Latins ne fait d'aussi fréquentes ni d'aussi vives plaintes sur la corruption de son temps. A tout propos de ces actions de débauche, d'avarice, de cruauté, et d'injustice, dont les annales de ce siècle n'étoient que trop remplies, il prend occasion de les censurer en les mettant en opposition avec les mœurs des anciens. Les préfaces à ces deux histoires ne sont autre chose. Bien plus, très peu de tems après son expulsion du sénat, écrivant deux lettres publiques à César sur la manière dont on pouvoit rémédier aux désordres de l'état, il ne s'en prend qu'à la corruption des Romains qu'il falloit extirper. (2)

(2) II. Ep. ad Cæsar.

Nous n'avons aujourd'hui que deux ouvrages de Salluste dans l'état où il les a publiés: 1. La Conjuration de Catilina, et 2. La Guerre de Jugurthe; deux morceaux dit-il lui-même des plus curieux, et des plus intéressans de toute l'histoire Romaine.

Il

Il avoit fait outre cela une histoire de son tems depuis A. U. C. 663, jusques à A. U. C. 681. Il ne nous en reste plus que quelques harangues et un assez grand nombre de fragmens détachés, dont la plûpart nous ont été conservés par les vieux grammairiens. Tout le monde sait que Salluste s'est distingué dans le genre concis, mais peut-être tous n'ont pas fait la remarque que l'usage fréquent qu'il fait des infinitifs absolus y contribue beaucoup. La plûpart de ses lecteurs peuvent y avoir trouvé quelquefois de l'obscurité, toujours une certaine dureté; mais malgré tout cela ce style a bien ses beautés, et me paroît même assez propre pour l'histoire, puisqu'il cache en quelque façon les circonstances peu intéressantes qui pèsent de tems à autre sur la plume de l'historien; en ne laissant point reposer le lecteur, mais l'entrainant avec une rapidité égale à travers les jardins et les bruyères. Il faut pourtant faire attention à une fort bonne chose que dit là-dessus De la Mothe le Vayer:(1) Que quoiqu'on puisse dire que Salluste et Tacite sont tous les deux des auteurs concis, c'est d'une façon bien différente, puisque celui-ci l'est autant pour les choses que pour les mots, au lieu que l'autre écrit pour le fonds des matières d'une façon aussi diffuse que Tite Live lui-même; quoique je ne sois pas de l'avis de ce savant, qui entend de cette façon-là le bon mot de Servilius Nonianus, qeu Salluste et Tite Live " Pares magis esse quam similes." Il semble que s'il avoit bien considéré le passage de Quintilien,(2) où il se trouve, il auroit vu qu'il ne falloit point le prendre d'une façon aussi particulière, et que son auteur ne vouloit parler par là que de l'égalité de mérite de ces deux grands écrivains quoique leur talens fussent aussi différens. Pour ce qui est du fonds de l'histoire, Salluste n'est pas tout à fait exempt du reproche d'avoir fait paroître de la passion dans ce qu'il a écrit au sujet de Cicéron et de César. On l'accuse d'avoir caché plusieurs faits assez considérables, par haine pour l'un et par flatterie pour l'autre. Il est au moins certain que, quoiqu'il donne à ce premier le titre d'Optimus Consul et qu'il ne lui attribue rien qui en soit indigne, les nones de Décembre font une bien autre figure dans les ouvrages de Cicéron lui-même que dans la conjuration de Catilina. Comme Salluste avoit été tribun du peuple, et qu'il étoit créature de César qui ne faisoit que faire revivre le parti de Marius, il n'est point étonnant qu'il ne se montre aucunement favorable à celui du sénat, qu'il regardoit comme une oligarchie toute pure. Aussi quoiqu'il n'entreprenne point de justifier tous les procédés du peuple, l'on voit assez ce qu'il pensoit là-dessus. Il est charmé, par exemple, de pouvoir attribuer à Sulla, chef des Optimates, toutes ces cruautés abominables qui le rendoient si odieux,(1) mais il n'a garde de dire mot des horreurs dont les deux Marius, Cinna, Carbo, Damasippus, remplirent Rome pendant qu'ils avoient le dessus.

(1) De la Mothe le Vayer, Jugem. des Hist. tom. i. p. 356.

(2) Quintil. l. x. c. 1.

(1) Prim. Epist. ad Cæsar.

Je ferai deux petites remarques sur un couple d'endroits de Salluste, qui me paroissent en demander. 1. Parlant de la corruption des Romains, il dit " Igitur primo pecuniæ, dein imperii, cupido crevit."

crevit."(1) Un moment après il dit " Sed primo magis ambitio quam avaritia animos hominum exercebat;" et il en donne une raison toute naturelle, que l'avarice n'a rien que de sordide, au lieu que la vertu et le vice se proposent les mêmes objets d'ambition, et ne diffèrent que dans les moyens qu'ils employent pour y parvenir.(2) Cette contrariété, qui paroît si marquée, n'a point arrêté les commentateurs que j'ai: ils n'en ont rien dit. Pour moi je ne saurois mieux résoudre ce nœud Gordien qu'en le coupant, et je rectifierois sans balancer le second passage sur le premier. Ce qui m'y détermine, outre le témoignage de l'histoire, c'est le raisonnement qu'il y fait, au lieu que le premier n'est qu'une simple affirmation. 2. Nous décrivant le caractère des compagnons de Catilina, Salluste dit, " Quicunque impudicus, adulter, ganeo, aleâ, manû, ventre, pene, bona patria laceraverat."(3) L'expression pene est si forte, que bien loin de la souffrir dans une histoire grave, nous en serions choqués dans un roman; comment donc comprendre que Salluste, dont les écrits ne respirent que la sévérité et la vertu, se soit servi d'une expression qui les choquoit autant que celle-là? car penis n'étoit point de ces mots que la bienséance permet pour nommer les choses qui lui sont contraires. Cette réponse, qui est assez naturelle, m'est d'abord venue dans l'ésprit, mais un passage de Cicéron prouve qu'elle ne vaut rien, le voici: " Caudam antiqui penem vocabant; ex quo est, propter similitudinem, penicillus. At hodie penis est in obscenis. At vero Frugi-ille

(1) Bell. Catilin. c. 10.

(2) Idem. c. 11.

(3) Idem. c. 14.

Piso in annalibus suis queritur adolescentes peni deditos esse. Quod tu in epistolâ appellas suo nomine, ille tectius penem. Sed quia multi, factum est tam obscœnum, quam id verbum quo tu usus es."(1) Vous voyez par là que le mot penis, innocent dans son origine, étoit devenu si obscène qu'il parle avec surprise de Pison qui s'étoit servi d'un terme qui n'auroit point été permis de son tems qui étoit néanmoins celui de Salluste. Si j'osois hasarder une conjecture au sujet de cette difficulté, je dirois que peut-être Salluste étoit Stoicien, secte qui avoit pour maxime fondamentale d'appeller un chat un chat.(2) Nous savons que cette doctrine avoit fait beaucoup de partisans à Rome dans ce siècle-là, et le caractère de sévérité qu'il se donnoit tant de peine pour affecter y convient fort bien.

(1) Cicer. Epistolæ Familiar. l. ix. c. 26.

(2) A Paris, 1730.

J'ai consulté quelquefois une traduction Françoise de Salluste par M. l'Abbé Thyon. Ne l'ayant point lu je n'en dirois rien, si non que si elle est fidèle pour le fonds elle ne l'est point pour la forme, puisque le style concis de ses deux petits ouvrages se trouve noyé dans deux grands in-douze. Elle est accompagnée d'un assez grand nombre de notes historiques et critiques qui m'ont paru bonnes; j'en rapporterai une au sujet d'une correction du texte. Notre auteur, dans sa seconde lettre à César, en faisant une énumeration des cruautés que la faction des nobles avoient exercées après leur victoire sur leurs ennemis, à dessein de les rendre odieux, dit, selon toutes les éditions, " At hercule nunc cum Catone L. Domitio." Quoiqu'il Quoiqu'il y ait quelque difficulté sur le prænomen du Domitius que Pompée vainquit en Afrique pendant la dictature de Sylla, on peut pourtant croire que Salluste vouloit parler de celui-là. Mais pour le Caton on ne trouve aucun à qui on puisse le rapporter: M. Thyon voudroit(1) donc qu'on lut, "At hinc cum Carbone, L. Domitio." Tout le monde connoît le fameux Carbon qui périt en Italie après la victoire de Sylla, et par là même notre auteur aura blamé non seulement la cruauté de tout le parti mais encore de Pompée en particulier, lequel en effet est accusé d'avoir servi les sanglans sacrifices du dictateur avec un peu trop d'empressement.

(1) Tom. ii. p. 114—123.

Au reste M. Thyon se trompe lorsqu'il nous dit que le père de Pompée mourut pendant son consulat.(2) Il n'y a rien de plus certain que qu'il ne mourut que dans le consulat de Cinna et d'Octavius, deux ans après le sien.(3)

(2) Idem. p. 38.

(3) V. Vell. Patercul. l. ii. c. 20.

On a beaucoup attaqué Salluste sur ce que, par une affectation blâmable, il vouloit toujours préférer les mots et les manières d'écrire surannées à celles usitées de son tems. Une des choses qui choque le plus un lecteur moderne c'est de le voir préférer continuellement les u aux i dans des mots tels que lacrymæ, maximus, &c. Mais quoique la dernière façon d'écrire gagna le dessus dans la suite, la première étoit encore fort en usage dans son siècle: car Varro assuroit, au rapport de Cassiodore,(4) que ce n'étoit que l'autorité du premier César, qui la recommandoit tant par ses préceptes que par son exemple, qui donna la vogue à l'y.

(4) V. les Fragmens de César, dans l'Edition de ses Ouvrages, par Arn. Montanus, p. 881.

C. Julii Cæsaris Opera quæ extant, ex Recensione Jos. Scaligeri. Ludg. Batav. Ex Officinâ Elzeiv. 1635. 12°.

J'ai eu sous la main et je l'ai consulté dans quelques endroits,

C. Julii Cæsaris Opera quæ extant, cum selectis variorum Commentariis, quorum plerique novi, Operâ et Studio Arnoldi Montani. Amstelod. Ex Officinâ Elzeiv. 1670. 8°.

" On parle beaucoup de la fortune de César ; mais cet homme extraordinaire avoit tant de grandes qualités sans pas un défaut, quoiqu'il eut bien des vices, qu'il eût été bien difficile, que quelque armée qu'il eût commandé il n'eût été vainqueur, et qu'en quelque république qu'il fût né qu'il ne l'eût gouverné."(1) En effet on ne peut que souscrire au jugement de M. de Montesquieu. Ses talens pour la politique ne demandent pas d'autre preuve que de dire que, né sujet, ses intrigues le firent souverain. Du côté de la guerre il est reconnu de tous comme le plus grand général que nous connoissons. Malgré sa courte vie,(2) et la multitude de ses occupations, il ne se distingua guères moins du côté des lettres. Sa réputation dans ce genre étoit assez bien établie dans un siècle aussi éclairé que l'étoit celui de Cicéron, puisque Quintilien ne craint point de dire,(3) que la force de son génie ne se montroit pas avec moins d'éclat par ses écrits que par ses victoires. Non seulement il s'étoit beaucoup appliqué à l'éloquence, qui lui étoit absolument

(1) Montesquieu. Considérat. sur les Causes de la Grandeur et la Décadence des Romains, p. 125. Lausanne. 1750.

(2) Il mourut agé de 56 ans.

(3) Quintil. l. 10.

ment nécessaire dans une république comme celle de Rome, mais il y eut peu de sciences, qu'il ne posséda:—il étoit à la fois, historien, poëte, théologien, grammairien, astronome; et les écrits qu'il laissa sur tous ces sujets sont cités avec éloge par tous les anciens qui ont eu occasion d'en parler.(1)

(1) V. ses fragmens à la fin de ses ouvrages.

De tant d'ouvrages le seul qui reste ce sont les Mémoires qu'il écrivit de ses guerres avec les Gaulois, et des guerres civiles. Les premiers sont de sept livres, les autres n'en contiennent que trois. Un de ses amis (on ignore si c'étoit Hirtius ou Oppius) y a ajouté un huitième livre des guerres Gauloises, et a fait en entier celles d'Alexandrie, et d'Afrique: car il ne faut point lui attribuer (à Hirtius), un livre ou plutôt un journal qui marque, selon l'ordre des jours, les événemens d'une partie de cette guerre que César soutint en Espagne contre les fils de Pompée. Les barbarismes qu'on y trouve à tout moment en sont les moindres défauts. Il y a une quantité d'endroits qu'on ne peut absolument point entendre. Par bonheur on voit qu'on n'y perd pas grande chose. Voici un échantillon de cette belle histoire. Après un long siège Cordoue est prise par César.(2) Vous lisez encore quelques pages, et vous êtes tout surpris(3) de voir César venir l'attaquer tout de nouveau, sans qu'on ait dit un mot de sa révolte. Quelques critiques attribuent cet ouvrage à un centurion de l'armée de César qui notoit grossièrement jour par jour ce qui s'étoit passé. J'avoue que j'ai de la peine à comprendre que cette pièce soit du tems de la belle latinité; toutefois si elle l'est, elle peut

(2) Comment. de Bell. Hisp. p. 841.
(3) Idem, p. 856.

confirmer

confirmer une vérité que nous ne savions déjà que trop; que le même siècle peut produire des de Thous et des Parivals. Pour ceux qui sont de César lui-même, ils ont toujours été regardé comme des modèles en fait de mémoires. Les plus grandes choses contées avec la dernière simplicité, quoiqu'en langage très elegant,—ce sont là les commentaires de César. On y admire surtout une grande modestie; car on peut remarquer, fort à l'honneur de César, que pendant que Hirtius l'encense en plus d'un endroit,(1) le héros lui-même ne se loue que par le récit de ses actions. Quelques personnes pourtant croyent que l'amour-propre l'a quelquefois emporté sur la sincérité de l'historien, comme par exemple de sa guerre avec les Usipetes et les Tencteri, son expédition en Angleterre, et le commencement de la guerre civile. Malheureux sort de l'histoire! les spectateurs sont trop peu instruits, et les acteurs trop intéressés, pour que nous puissions compter entièrement sur les récits des uns ou des autres! Quoiqu'une des plus grandes beautés de César soit la clarté il ne laisse pas d'avoir bien des endroits obscurs pour les lecteurs qui ne sont pas guerriers. Je voudrois que M. le Chevalier de Folard nous eût donné un commentaire militaire sur cet auteur qui en a bien plus besoin que Polybe. S'il n'y avoit que César qui fut digne de nous donner sa propre histoire, il n'y avoit guères que M. de Folard qui eût dû commenter César. Il y a, outre cela, beaucoup d'autres passages qui ont bien donné de la torture aux critiques qui finissent pour l'ordinaire après dix raisonnemens, sonnemens, et vingt conjectures, par avouer qu'ils n'y entendent rien. N'auroient-ils pas pu nous le dire au commencement? Ces sortes de passages se trouvent néanmoins en bien plus grand nombre dans les Guerres Civiles que dans celles des Gaules; apparemment parceque César avoit eu plus de tems pour revoir et pour corriger celles-ci. Toutefois si nous considérons que ces mémoires ne pouvoient guères être le fruit que de quelques soirées dans ses quartiers d'hiver nous trouverons plutôt étonnant qu'il n'y en a pas davantage. En effet ce qui fait un des plus grands mérites de l'écrivain de ces Mémoires c'est cette même promptitude. Tite Live fut vingt ans à écrire son histoire.(1) Isocrate en mit dix pour faire son panégyrique, (2) mais César ne mettoit pas plus de tems à écrire ses victoires qu'à les remporter, et c'est tout dire par rapport à César. Aussi Hirtius remarque-t-il fort bien, Cæteri enim quam bene et emendate, nos etiam quam facile et celeriter eos confecerit, scimus.(3)

(1) Comment. de Bell. Gallic. l. viii. p. 401, et alia loca.

(1) Dodwell. Annal. Velleian. s. 3. p. 662. ad calcem Velleii. Burman.

(2) Longin. Traité du Sublime. c. iii. Trad. de Boileau. tom. iii. de ses Ouvrages. p. 31. Edit. de Dresde. 1746.

(3) Comm. de Bell. Galliæ. l. viii. p. 369.

J'ai dit que cette promptitude faisoit un grand mérite de l'écrivain de ces Mémoires, et non des Mémoires mêmes, et je me suis servi de cette expression à dessein. Je distingue très fort d'entre le mérite d'un écrivain et celui de son livre. Le mérite de celui-ci consiste à m'apprendre des choses que je ne savois pas, ou à m'en dire de celles que je savois déjà d'une façon juste et élégante. Dans cet examen il faut faire abstraction de l'auteur pour ne faire attention qu'à ce que je viens de dire. Tel livre qui étoit de peu d'utilité autrefois, peut être aujourd'hui d'un grand prix à cause

à cause que tous les autres sur le même sujet sont perdus. Des plagiats peuvent bien faire le mérite d'un livre, quoique jamais de son auteur. Car son mérite doit être apprécié d'une toute autre façon. Comme c'est le génie de quoi il s'agit, pour pouvoir décider là-dessus, il faudroit examiner tous les secours qu'il peut avoir eu, de son siècle, de son pays, de son éducation, de ses devanciers, et de mille circonstances. Souvent un rien, un mot lâché par quelqu'un qui n'en sentoit point toute l'importance, une lecture, met quelquefois sur les voies des plus grandes découvertes. Newton conçut le système de l'attraction en voyant tomber des pommes dans son verger. Il faudroit encore combiner tous les préjugés qu'il a eu à combattre, le tems qu'il a mis à son ouvrage, les distractions qu'il a eu, &c. de façon que si nous pouvions découvrir tous ces accessoires nous trouverions souvent que tel autre, dont nous méprisons avec raison les ouvrages, avoit un génie bien supérieur à tel autre que nous lisons avec admiration. Mauvaise réflexion pour l'amour-propre des auteurs! le prix de ce dont nous pouvons juger ne leur appartient quelquefois pas, et le seul mérite qui soit réellement à eux il est presque impossible que nous puissions l'apprécier avec certitude! Mais revenons à nos chèvres.

Pour suivre ce que je disois toute à l'heure de cette distinction, on peut remarquer un autre mérite de ces Mémoires, indépendamment de celui de son auteur; c'est d'être les premières relations que nous ayons tant soit peu détaillées de notre continent; j'entends par là l'Angleterre, la France, la la Suisse, l'Allemagne, les Pays Bas. C'est là où il faut aller puiser le gouvernement, la religion, les mœurs, &c. de nos ancêtres, et voir au moins en partie la façon dont ils sont passé sous le joug des Romains. Le morceau surtout où César nous décrit les mœurs des Gaulois et des Germains (1) est admirable, celui sur ceux des Bretons ne l'est pas moins.(2)

(1) Cesar. Comment. de Bell. Gall. l. vi. p. 222-249.
(2) Idem. l. v. p. 166.

Je ferai deux remarques sur un couple d'endroits de César. 1. César, en parlant de sa guerre avec les Usipetes et les Tencteri, paroît déguiser un peu les choses. Il assure (3) que quand il fit saisir les chefs des ennemis qui étoient venus dans son camp sur la foi d'une tréve. On pensoit bien de cela à Rome, puisque Caton opinat en plein sénat pour qu'on le renvoyât lié et garotté aux Germains, comme un homme qui avoit déshonoré la foi de la république, par une perfidie insigne. En tout cas, n'auroit-il pas mieux fait de se souvenir de ce qu'il avoit dit en sénat quelques années auparavant? "Bellis Punicis omnibus cum sæpe Carthaginienses et in pace et per inducias, multa nefanda facinora fecissent, nunquam ipsi par occasionem talia fecere, magis quod se dignum, quam quod in illos jure fieri posset, quærebant."(4) Mais on peut bien dire par rapport à tous les discours publics ce que Cicéron disoit de ceux du barreau. "Sed errat vehementer si quis in orationibus nostris auctoritates nostras consignat se habere arbitratur." (5) Car, continue-t-il, ces harangues sont celles des causes et des tems, et non pas des hommes ni des advocats. 2. La description que César donne des (3) Cesar. Comm. de Bell. Gall. l. iv. p. 134.

(4) Sallust. Bell. Catilin. c. 51.
(5) Cicero pro Cluent. c. 50.

Druides

Druides Gaulois ressemble si parfaitement à celle du clergé catholique qu'on seroit presque tenté de croire que ceux-ci avoient formé leur conduite sur celle de leurs prédécesseurs payens. Mais comme on ne lisoit guères César dans le onzième siècle, contentons-nous de dire que les clergés de tous les siècles et les peuples de tous les siècles se ressemblent assez, * * * * * * * * * * * * * *. Rassemblons les traits principaux de cette description des Druides.

(1) Cesar. de Bell. Gall. l. v. p. 224.

(1) 1. Ils avoient entre leurs mains l'éducation de la jeunesse qui ne sortoit jamais de leurs écoles que remplis d'une profonde vénération pour leurs maîtres. 2. Ils s'étoient rendus juges de presque tous les procés civils et criminels. 3. Ils se servoient de l'excommunication envers les contravenans, laquelle inspiroit au peuple une si grande horreur pour le coupable, qu'il se voyoit séparé de tout commerce civil. 4. Ils avoient un chef qui avoit une grande autorité. A sa mort on lui choisissoit un successeur entre les Druides les plus distingués. 5. Ils étoient exempts du service militaire. 6. Ils ne payoient point d'impôts et jouissoient de toute sorte d'immunités. Je m'étonne que le Père Hardouin n'ait point allégué cette description comme une preuve de son système.(2) Le rusé Archontius Severus (3) auroit bien pu fabriquer un César, pour y insérer ce passage, qui représente, d'une façon bien odieuse, le système de l'hiérarchie Romaine enveloppée sous le nom de Druides Gaulois. Ce père a bien fait d'objections qui ne valoient pas celle-là.

(2) De la Supposition de tous les anciens auteurs.

(3) L'Empereur Frederic II.

Voic

Voici deux remarques de Lipsius. 1. Hirtius, en parlant des Bellovaci, (1) dit qu'ils prirent leurs fascines, " ubi consederant, nam in acie sedere Gallos consuesse, superioribus commentariis declaratum est." La difficulté est bien forte; comment concevoir une armée rangée en ordre de bataille, chacun assis sur sa fascine? Cela devoit être impossible aussi bien que ridicule. Lipsius voudroit donc (2) que par acies on n'entendit pas l'armée rangée en bataille, selon la signification usitée de ce mot, mais seulement le tems de la guerre en général, et il apporte deux passages l'un de Tacite,(3) l'autre de Strabon,(4) pour prouver que c'étoit là une chose qui distinguoit les Romains des barbares, ceux-ci étant presque toujours assis dans leurs camps, au lieu que les premiers s'y promenoient beaucoup. Il croit pourtant que pour in on pourroit lire ante aciem. 2. Dans ce que César dit des machines qu'il employoit pour prendre Marseilles, il parle d'un musculus ou galerie destinée à protéger ceux qui devoient sapper les murailles de la ville, laquelle devoit avoir eu, suivant la lection ordinaire, soixante pieds de longueur.(5) Lipsius trouve cela beaucoup trop, et rapporte plusieurs raisons tirées du nom, des proportions et de l'usage de cette pièce pour autoriser le changement qu'il a fait de LX. en IX.(6) César,(7) parlant de Metellus Scipio, dit qu'il prit le titre d'empereur: " Detrimentis quibuslam circa montem Amanum acceptis sese imperatorem appellaverat." Cela paroît manquer de sens, puisque les généraux ne prenoient jamais ce titre qu'a-

(1) De Bell. Gall. l. viii. p. 368.

(2) Epist. Cent. 1. Epist. 3.

(3) Tacitus in Germ. Morib.

(4) Strabo. in Lib. iii.

(5) Cesar. de Bell. Civ. l. ii. p. 534.

(6) Cité par Montanus ad loc.

(7) Cesar. de Bell. Civ. l. iii. p. 609.

qu'après quelques avantages considérables. Ursinus voudroit qu'au lieu de detrimentis on lut emolumentis,(1) qui s'y trouve opposé en Cicéron.(2)

(1) Ursinus ad locum.
(2) Lib. iii. de Finibus.

CORNELII NEPOTIS Vitæ Excellentium Imperatorum, Observationibus et Notis Commentatorum. Lugduni Batavorum. 1728.

Nous savons très peu de chose de la personne de cet écrivain, sinon qu'il étoit de la Gaule Cisalpine, (de Verone selon quelques uns,) et qu'il a vécu du tems de Jules César et au commencement du règne d'Auguste. Il paroît que c'étoit un auteur fort fertile. Les anciens nous parlent d'un assez grand nombre de livres de sa façon qui avoient la plûpart l'histoire pour objet. Mais de tout cela il ne nous reste plus que les vies de vingt fameux généraux Grecs, de deux Carthaginois, du premier Caton, et de T. Pomponius Atticus. Elles sont toutes très peu détaillées, quoiqu'on y trouve des particularités très curieuses qui ne se rencontrent nulle part ailleurs, et que leur auteur sache fort bien l'art de renfermer bien des choses en peu de place, de façon qu'on est quelquefois tenté de lui appliquer ce qu'il dit lui-même des inscriptions d'Atticus: "vix credendum esse tantas res tam breviter potuisse declarari."(1) Il excelle dans cet art, la difficulté duquel rend les bons abrégés si peu communs, celui de saisir les traits qui peignent les hommes et les événemens, et de savoir laisser

(1) In Attic. cap. 18.

laisser à l'écart toutes les circonstances qui ne font qu'embarrasser une narration et détourner l'attention du lecteur du principal sur l'accessoire. Le caractère d'Alciabade (1) est réellement tel que Tite Live n'en auroit pas honte. Pour son style, sans être beau, (ce qui n'auroit pas convenu à son ouvrage,) il ne laisse pas de marquer un écrivain du siècle de la belle latinité, et de le rendre (à n'envisager que cela) très propre à être mis entre les mains des jeunes gens. On ne peut guères décider de sa fidélité, comme tout ce que nous avons de lui ne roule que sur des tems dont l'éloignement à tout égard ne lui donnoit point de préjugés, et n'ayant qu'à travailler avec un esprit de critique sur les mémoires des auteurs plus anciens, ce qu'il paroît qu'il a assez eu soin de faire. Une chose qu'il faut dire à sa louange c'est qu'il paroît avoir été fort bien intentionné pour la république. Il prend occasion plus d'une fois de faire, à l'occasion des faits qu'il rapporte, (et c'étoit là tout ce que son sujet lui permettoit,) des réflexions qui décèlent assez clairement ses véritables sentimens. Une fois, (2) en rapportant la soumission qu' Agésilaus témoigna aux ordres des Ephores Spartiates, en s'arrêtant au milieu de ses conquêtes pour revenir chez lui, il souhaite que les généraux de son tems eussent suivi ce bel exemple. César avoit donné assez lieu à ce souhait. Dans un autre endroit (3) il compare l'insolence du phalange Macédonien après la mort d'Alexandre, à celle des vétérans de son tems, qui fut, comme on sait, une des principales causes de la ruine de la républi-

(1) In Alcibiad. cap. 11.

(2) In Ages. c. 4.

(3) In Eumen. c. 8.

que. Si dans la vie d'Atticus il se trouve obligé une fois de louer Auguste, c'est en quatre mots qu'il le fait: encore y ajoute-t-il une modification qui ne devoit guères être du goût de ce prince: en parlant de sa fortune il dit qu'elle lui avoit donné tout à ce quoi un citoyen Romain pouvoit parvenir. (1) N'étoit-ce pas le reprocher tacitement de son ambition? Cette vie d'Atticus, où se trouve cette louange, est beaucoup plus longue que toutes les autres, et comme avec cela il n'avoit à décrire que les événemens peu variés d'une vie privée, il pouvoit entrer dans un assez grand détail sur le caractère et les mœurs de cet homme singulier, qui à su si bien se rendre célèbre sans le secours d'aucune action éclatante. Aussi l'a-t-il fait jusqu'à nous apprendre la dépense journalière de sa maison. Elle montoit (2) à quatre mille cinq cens livres argent de Suisse; (3) somme très petite, considérée en elle-même, puisque son domestique étoit fort nombreux, mais qui nous donne une bien grande idée de sa modération si nous nous souvenons qu'il étoit de la même ville et du même siècle que ce Lucullus qui mangea à un seul repas plus de cinq fois autant. (4) Atticus démentit, par sa conduite, les calomnies de ceux qui accusoient les Epicuréens de placer leur souverain bonheur dans la jouissance des plaisirs sensuels. Il leur fit voir qu'un vrai philosophe de cette secte regardoit une volupté délicate et un loisir studieux comme seuls capables de rendre heureux un homme raisonnable. Ce n'est point ici la place d'entreprendre la justification d'Atticus contre les sanglantes accusations

(1) In Attic. c. 19.

(2) Ibid. c. 13.

(3) 3000 asses par mois.

(4) 50,000 denarii.

tions de l'Abbé de St. Real, (1) et dans lesquelles il paroît avoir eu bien des sectateurs. Aussi je ne le ferai pas. Je dirai seulement (après avoir remarqué qu'il étoit bien difficile pour un honnête homme de prendre un parti quand il n'y en avoit aucun qui pensa au bien public) que s'il est difficile de justifier sa conduite en tout, il ne l'est pas moins de s'empêcher d'aimer son caractère. Il en est tout autrement des Catons; en lisant leur vie nous devenons plus aisément leurs admirateurs que leurs imitateurs. Le danger est plutôt de l'autre côté ici.

(1) Dans son Cæsarion, au second tome de ses Oeuvres.

Dans les derniers siècles notre auteur a eu un sort bien différent de celui de bien d'autres. Nous avons regardé beaucoup de fictions modernes comme des pièces authentiques de l'antiquité, ici un écrivain a risqué de se voir enlever son propre ouvrage. Plusieurs critiques, trompés par les titres des anciens manuscrits, ont cru que ces vies des fameux généraux étoient, non pas de Cornelius Nepos, mais d'un certain Æmilius Probus qui doit avoir vécu sous l'empire de Théodose et lui avoir présenté son livre. Mais aujourd'hui on est généralement revenu de cette opinion, et on rend à Nepos ce qui est à Nepos. La seule latinité de son livre seroit bien assez pour nous convaincre qu'il ne pouvoit jamais être écrivain du siècle de Théodose. Elle suffit pour prouver l'antiquité de Quinte Curce, et avec raison, car il est très sûr qu'il y a quinze cens ans qu'on n'écrit plus comme cela en Latin. Mais nous en avons bien d'autres raisons. Supposons pour un moment qu' Æmilius

Probus soit l'auteur de ce livre, que lui fait-on faire? On le fait se vanter d'avoir été lié fort familièrement avec Atticus, qui vécut cinquante ans avant l'ère Chrétienne, dans le même ouvrage qu'il présente à l'Empereur Théodose, qui mourut près de quatre cens ans après cette ère. Certainement ou Æmilius Probus ou nos critiques avoient un coup de marteau. Je ne dis rien de ces passages des vies que j'ai déjà cités par rapport aux généraux Romains, aux vétérans, à Auguste, tous très convenables au siècle de Nepos, mais ridicules dans celui de Probus. Les vers de Probus, qui se trouvent dans tous les anciens manuscrits, aussi bien que le titre qui l'appelle auteur de l'ouvrage, font bien voir comment il faut expliquer ce titre. Comme je ne sais point s'ils se trouvent dans toutes les éditions, les voici :

Vade, liber noster, fato meliore memento,
Cum leget hæc Dominus, te sciat esse meum.
Ne timeas fulvo strictos diedemate crines,
Ridentes blanduni vel pietate oculos ;
Communis cunctis : hominem se regna tenere
Sed meminit ; vincit hinc magis ille homines.
Ornentur steriles : facilis tectura libelli
Theodosio, et doctis carmina nuda placent.
Si rogat auctorem, paullatim detege nostrum
Tunc domino nomen, me sciat esse Probum.
Corpore in hoc manus est genetricis, avique, meaque
Felices domini qui meruere manus.

Je ferai deux ou trois réflexions sur ces vers. 1. Que veut dire le " fato meliore memento?" Il me paroît ne pouvoir convenir qu'à un livre qui avoit avoit déjà vu le jour, mais qui comptoit paroître alors avec un éclat que lui donnoient quelques circonstances particulières qui accompagnoient sa publication d'alors. Ce seroit justement le ton que prendroit un éditeur qui publieroit une édition de quelque auteur déjà connu, bien supérieure à toutes les autres, et qui la présenteroit à quelque grand prince. Je n'appuie pourtant pas trop sur cet argument, quoique je le croie bon, parceque je sais qu'on peut me répondre, qu'un homme qui auroit présenté un exemplaire de son propre ouvrage à ce prince auroit pu s'être servi des mêmes expressions, par rapport seulement aux autres exemplaires du même ouvrage qui n'avoient pas eu le bonheur de tomber dans des mains aussi respectables. 2. Un auteur (surtout parlant à un empereur) auroit-il loué son propre ouvrage comme il fait dans ce vers, Ornentur steriles? 3. Mais ce qui, selon moi, est la raison la plus forte de toutes, c'est ce qu'il dit dans le onzieme vers, " Corpore in hoc manus est genitricis, avique, meaque." A-t-on jamais entendu parler d'ouvrage bien écrit aux frais communs de l'auteur, de sa mère et de son grand-père? Le ridicule de cela saute aux yeux. Concluons donc de tout cela que Cornelius Nepos est le véritable auteur des vies des fameux généraux, et que Probus n'avoit fait que de faire une copie exacte de l'ouvrage, laquelle il présenta à l'Empereur Theodose.

TITI LIVII Patavini Historiarum ab Urbe Conditâ Tomi Tres. L'Edition de Gronovius. Amstelodami. Apud D. Elzevir. 1678.

TITE LIVE est un de ce petit nombre de grands hommes dont le nom seul fait le plus bel éloge qu'il est possible de faire d'eux. Son propre siècle lui a accordé la gloire d'avoir été parmi les historiens ce que Virgile a été pour les poëtes, et Cicéron pour les orateurs. Seize siècles la lui ont confirmé, et ce seroit en vain que quelqu'un penseroit à la lui ravir aujourd'hui. On convient que la majesté de son histoire égaloit celle du peuple de qui elle traitoit. Soit qu'on le considère du côté des choses qu'il raconte, ou de sa façon de les raconter, de sa fidélité ou de son style, les plus grands maîtres de l'art devroient l'avoir continuellement entre les mains, et tous ses lecteurs, de quelque ordre qu'ils soient, peuvent toujours trouver de quoi se plaire et s'instruire. Comme je compte que l'article de son histoire, que je vais commencer à présent, me mènera un peu plus loin que les autres, je partagerai ce que j'ai à dire dans quelques portions; j'en ferai quatre: I. Dans la première, je dirai quelque chose de la personne et de l'ouvrage de Tite Live. II. Dans la seconde, je donnerai quelques des qualités qui distinguent son histoire de la plûpart des autres. III. Dans la troisième, je considererai les objections et les accusations qu'on fait contre lui; et IV. Dans la dernière, nière, je ferai quelques remarques détachées sur quelques endroits de cet historien.

I. Tite Live naquit à Padoue, alors Patavium, l'an de Rome 694 ; des autres veulent qu'il ait été né à Apone, bourg dans le territoire de cette ville, qu'il n'ait été appellé de Padoue que comme Virgile a été appellé de Mantoue quoique né à Andes. Nous ignorons totalement la vie de Tite Live jusqu'au tems qu'il se mit à écrire l'histoire des affaires Romaines. Il s'y prit d'assez bonne heure. Car quoique nous ne sachions pas précisément l'année qu'il l'a entreprise, nous pouvons toujours être assurés qu'il avoit commencée le premier livre avant l'an de Rome 730 ; car il dit que jusqu'à son tems le Temple de Janus n'avoit été fermé depuis le commencement de la ville que deux fois. Or nous n'ignorons que cette année-là Auguste le ferma pour la troisième fois. Dodwell, savant Anglois, croit que Tite Live avoit commencé son grand ouvrage l'an 725, et qu'il y mit la dernière main en 745. En effet, quand on considère d'un côté la grandeur de la tache et de l'autre les soins prodigieux que Tite Live a dû y avoir apportés pour le rendre aussi parfait qu'il est, on ne trouvera point vingt ans mal employés, mais au contraire on admirera presque autant l'application que le génie de cet auteur. La publication de son livre lui attira certainement une grande et bien juste réputation ; quoique les livres, avant l'invention de l'imprimerie, ne se répandissent point avec la même rapidité. Néanmoins (et c'est encore ce qui ajoute à sa gloire) un citoyen de Gades, ville que les anciens regardoient comme l'extrémité de la terre du côté de l'occident, fut si frappé de ce qu'il avoit oui dire de Tite Live, et de l'idée que la lecture de son histoire lui en avoit peut-être donnée, fit un voyage exprès à Rome pour le connoître de plus près, et aussitôt qu'il l'eut vu, il quitta la capitale comme s'il n'y avoit plus rien qui méritât l'attention d'un homme raisonnable. Il est vrai que quelques uns disent que de son vivant on faisoit plus de cas à Rome d'un historien fort méprisable que de lui. Quelques critiques se sont pourtant inscrit en faux contre ce fait, et cela à cause qu'on ne peut point l'accorder avec la chronologie, qui nous apprend, que cet historien ne vécut que du tems de l'Empereur Néron, au lieu que le nôtre mourut dans la cinquième année de l'Empereur Tibère. Ils conjecturent que c'étoit du fils de Tite Live et non de lui-même qu'il s'agit dans ce passage. Cela se peut, quoique je ne sache point que le fils de Tite Live se soit distingué du côté de l'histoire. Mais je ne trouve point admissible l'autre raison qu'ils allèguent pour détruire cette circonstance, je veux dire le voyage de ce citoyen de Gades comme prouvant que Tite Live avoit une grande réputation de son vivant. Du tems que Montesquieu étoit le législateur des nations, on se déchaînoit contre lui à Paris. Et qu'on ne pense pas à me fermer la bouche en me vantant le goût du siècle des Cicérons et des Virgiles. Celui des Newton et des Pope le vaut bien. Quoiqu'il en soit, Tite Live survécut long-tems à cette publication, et ce qui pourroit nous faire juger favorablement de l'effet qu'elle avoit produit, c'est qu'Auguste, guste, qui se connoissoit admirablement en mérite, le choisit pour former l'esprit de son petit-fils Claude, celui qui parvint ensuite à l'empire, et il paroît que ce prince ne profita pas mal sous ses instructions, puisqu'étant encore fort jeune il entreprit une histoire des affaires Romaines qu'il exécuta assez bien. Aussi étoit-ce un génie plus propre à raconter les grandes actions qu'à les faire. Tite Live mourut, comme nous l'avons déjà dit, la cinquième année du règne de l'Empereur Tibère. Il doit avoir laissé un fils qui ne nous est connu que par le conseil que son père lui adressa par rapport à ses études: " de lire Cicéron et Démosthène, et ensuite les autres auteurs, à mesure qu'ils approchoient de ces deux-là." Tous ceux qui ont rapporté ce trait l'ont loué comme sa modestie le méritoit. En effet c'étoit beaucoup de n'avoir point indiqué ses propres écrits en une semblable occasion. Il falloit là être plus que bel esprit, ou même que grand génie, il falloit être grand homme. Il eut aussi une fille qu'il maria à un nommé Lucius Magius, froid orateur, dont les déclamations n'étoient souffertes, que comme étant du fils de Tite Live.

Il faut à présent, après avoir ramassé le petit nombre de traits que l'antiquité, bien peu soigneuse de nous faire connoître les hommes qui l'ont illustré, nous a fourni par rapport à sa personne, dire quelque chose de ses ouvrages. Il en a laissé plusieurs sur divers sujets; mais son histoire est tout ce qui est échappé aux ravages qui nous ont fait perdre une si bonne partie des précieux trésors

des

des Grecs et des Romains. Originairement elle contenoit cent quarante livres, et elle s'étendoit depuis la fondation de la république jusqu'à la mort de Drusus Nero, fils adoptif d'Auguste, par une suite de sept siècles et demi; c'est à dire, qu'on y voyoit Rome naissant, s'étendant ses bras sur l'Italie, subjuguant toute la terre, et s'affaissant sous son propre poids. Je ne sais point pourquoi quelques critiques ont voulu qu'au lieu de cent quarante livres, elle en ait contenu cent quarante-deux. Les abrégés de tous les livres, lesquels nous avons, prouvent (ce me semble) qu'il n'y avoit que le nombre indiqué d'abord. Si nous avions cette histoire en son entier nous ne pourrions pas souhaiter quelque chose de plus parfait pour les tems qu'elle embrasse, mais par un malheur affreux, et peut-être à jamais irréparable, nous en avons perdu la plus grande partie. Il ne nous reste encore que, I. Les dix premiers livres, dont la perte auroit été la moins considérable de toutes, tant à cause que les siècles dont ils contiennent l'histoire sont ceux qui nous intéressent le moins, à cause de leur éloignement et de la petite figure les Romains faisoient alors, que parceque ces mêmes siècles ont été traités (à l'aveu de tous les critiques) d'une manière beaucoup plus détaillée et plus exacte. II. Dix autres, depuis le vingtième exclusivement jusqu'au trentième exclusivement, et ils contiennent seulement les dix-sept ans que dura la seconde guerre Punique, où Hannibal, après avoir fait trembler les Romains pour leurs autels et leurs foyers, fut obligé de conseiller, comme nécessaire, un traité qui fit passer l'empire l'empire du monde de Carthage à Rome. C'étoit-là un morceau digne de la plume de Tite Live, aussi paroît-il y avoir travaillé avec un goût tout particulier. III. Dix autres livres qui contiennent l'abaissement de Philippe et d'Antiochus, et le changement des chaînes des Grecs, changement que ces François de l'antiquité appelloient. IV. Cinq autres livres, qui commencent où ceux-ci finissent, et qui vont jusqu'au quarante cinquième inclusivement, et qui renferment la chûte de Perse, et la grandeur Romaine (si on fait attention aussi bien au dedans qu'au dehors) à son faîte. Ces derniers cinq livres n'ont point été trouvés ni publiés en même tems que le reste. Aussi, pendant que les trente autres livres sont sans la moindre lacune, ceux-ci sont coupés et tronqués dans cent endroits, et cela non de quelques mots ou de quelques lignes, mais souvent de pages entières qui renfermernt les événemens les plus intéressans; et là même où il ne manque rien par rapport à la narration, le texte est fort corrupt et a souvent besoin de la main d'un bon critique. Il est facile par ce petit tableau de voir combien grande est notre perte, puisqu'on y voit que des cent quarante livres qui formoient autrefois ce beau corps d'histoire nous n'en avons plus de nonante cinq. Il me semble avoir lu quelque part dans les ouvrages de milord Bolingbroke, que ce grand homme faisoit bien plus de cas des livres de Tite Live qui sont perdu que de ceux qui nous restent encore, et que (sans faire attention à la quantité de l'un ou de l'autre) il auroit volontiers donné ce que nous avons pour recouvrer ce que nous n'avons plus. Je trouve que milord Bolingbroke avoit assez raison de le dire; mais je crois que, quand on en viendroit à l'épreuve, lui, et tout homme de goût, auroit bien de la peine à se défaire d'aucune partie d'un trésor aussi inestimable. On seroit dans le cas de Philippe V. lorsqu'il falloit opter entre la couronne d'Espagne, et la succession de celle de France; le choix étoit facile, mais la difficulté d'en laisser une d'elles. J'avoue pourtant qu'il y auroit bien des auteurs de l'antiquité que je sacrifierois pour avoir seulement les livres de Tite Live qui contiennent l'histoire des 60 ans depuis l'an de Rome 663 jusqu'à 723; on ne peut guères concevoir un point de vue plus magnifique que celui-là, où toute la terre connue étoit le théâtre, et une foule de grands hommes, que la nature pour l'ordinaire ne produit qu'à l'éloignement de quelques siècles, mais qu'elle avoit alors fait contemporains, étoient les acteurs; tels que Marius, Sylla, Metellus, Catulus, Pompée, César, Crassus, Lucullus, Cicéron, Hortensius, M. Antoine, Auguste, et tant d'autres hommes capables de faire le bonheur des hommes ou leur malheur. Un pinceau tel que le sien, sans se jetter, comme Salluste, dans des déclamations continuelles contre les mœurs de son tems, et sans donner, comme Tacite, à l'esprit des hommes ce qui étoit à leur cœur, auroit décrit les mœurs du siècle de Lucullus avec le même sangfroid qu'il l'a fait de ceux de celui de Fabricius, voyant que les unes et les autres étoient des états différens de la république, et que vouloir qu'un peuple maître du monde fût animé du même esprit que les habitans de Rome naissante, sante, étoit vouloir une république de Platon. Semblable aux observateurs de la nature il auroit reconnu que les expériences valoient mieux que les systèmes, et en conséquence de ce principe il auroit expliqué le caractère de l'homme par ses actions, (encore s'y seroit-il pris avec bien des précautions,) non point les actions suivant l'idée qu'on s'étoit formé d'avance du caractère. Il auroit vu que bien loin que le caractère qu'on pose à la base de la narration soit uniforme, que bien loin, dis-je, qu'il puisse nous rendre raison de la conduite d'une vie entière, rien n'est plus dissemblable à l'homme de hier que l'homme d'aujourd'hui. Les messieurs qui croyent pouvoir nous développer ainsi tous les motifs des actions des hommes (qui très souvent ne les connoissent pas eux-mêmes) ont à la fois bien bonne opinion et de la constance des hommes et de leur propre pénétration; mais qu'ils se souviennent que,

que

In vain the sage, with retrospective eye,
Would from the apparent what conclude the why,
Infer the motive from the deed, and shew
That what we chanced, was what we meant to do.
Behold! if Fortune or a mistress frowns,
Some plunge in business, others shave their crowns:
To ease the soul of one oppressive weight,
This quits an empire, that embroils a state:
The same adust complexion has impell'd
Charles to the convent, Philip to the field!

En réfléchissant à cette immense perte que nous avons fait d'un si bel ouvrage, nous ne pouvons guères pardonner à nos barbares ancêtres d'avoir si cruellement détruit ou au moins estropié presque tout ce que les anciens avoient fait de beau. Encore patience

patience pour que dans les mille ans que leur règne a duré ils n'ayent point avancé les sciences, s'ils nous avoient au moins laissé dans le même état où se trouvoit le monde littéraire vers l'an 400, quand ils ont commencé tout de bon leurs inondations, et qu'ils n'eussent pas ruiné, s'ils ne pouvoient bâtir. Ils nous ont à la vérité conservé quelque chose de ces hasards si on peut appeller conserver, laisser quelques ouvrages à l'oubli que le hasard, bien plus que leurs soins, a amené jusqu'au rétablissement des sciences en Europe. Le sort de ce petit nombre, dont presque tous ont été trouvés, fourniroit bien de la matière à des réflexions sur le bizarre sort que quelques uns ont subi. Mais ce ne seroit pas ici un lieu convenable de s'y livrer, de parcourir tout ce qui nous reste de tant d'ouvrages dignes de l'immortalité, et de montrer pourquoi les uns plutôt que les autres sont échappé au grand naufrage des lettres. Tout ce que je dirai ici c'est de remarquer qu'en gros les poëtes se sont beaucoup mieux conservés que les historiens. Mettons en parallèle Salluste, Tite Live, et Tacite, les plus illustres des derniers, avec Virgile, Horace et Ovide les plus célèbres d'entre les premiers. Salluste est presque entièrement perdu, à la réserve de deux petits morceaux. A peine nous reste-t-il un tiers de Tite Live. Nous n'avons pas la moitié de Tacite. Par contre, Virgile et Horace se sont conservés en leur entier, et il ne nous manque que la moitié d'un seul ouvrage, celui encore qui tient le plus de l'histoire. Si on vouloit rechercher les raisons de ce phénomène peut-être ne seroit-elles bien difficile difficiles à trouver. I. Cæteris paribus, l'ouvrage d'un poëte doit se conserver plus naturellement que celui d'un historien, parcequ'il intéressse davantage tous les tems et tous les pays. Nous ne pouvons guères nous dispenser de savoir ce qui est arrivé à notre patrie pendant le siècle dans lequel nous vivons. Tout nous y rappelle. Les livres donc qui en traitent sont entre les mains de tout le monde. L'éloignement de quelques siècles diminue de beaucoup la vivacité de cet intérêt. Ces ouvrages disparoissent de chez les cabinets des gens du monde, pour se réfugier dans ceux des savans. Cependant c'est toujours l'histoire de la patrie, et cette considération fait que bien des gens ne la négligent pas entièrement. L'origine des familles illustres, celles de tant de coutumes anciennes, la rende encore intéressante pour l'homme curieux, et les principes de la constitution civile et ecclésiastique la rendent souvent necéssaire pour l'homme d'état. Mais lorsqu'à l'éloignement du tems on ajoute encore celui des lieux, on trouvera qu'ils ont perdu presque tout leur mérite, excepté celui que leur auteur a su leur donner par la manière dont il a traité son sujet. Ils ne sont plus guères intéressans qu'aux érudits, à qui tout plait qui est ancien, peu utile, et inconnu de presque tout le monde, et qu'à quelques philosophes qui aiment à considérer l'homme dans toutes ses différentes modifications. Faut-il donc s'étonner si l'on apporte beaucoup moins de soin à leur conservation qu'à celle des poëtes, dont les beautés peuvent être senties à Paris aussi bien qu'à Rome, dans le siècle

siècle de Louis XV. aussi bien que dans celui d'Auguste? II. Quelques circonstances particulières peuvent encore fonder si non une raison du moins une conjecture: la voici. Dans les tems où les auteurs étoient encore en leur entier, c'est à dire dans les deux ou trois premiers siècles qui ont suivi la chûte de l'empire d'occident, les pays où la langue Latine se conservoit se trouvoient possédés par des nations différentes entre elles mais toutes ennemis jurés du nom Romain. Ces peuples devoient-ils voir avec plaisir des ouvrages se multiplier et se perpétuer qui faisoient voir leurs propres ancêtres dans l'état de la plus grande humiliation, et ceux de leurs esclaves au comble de la grandeur? Ne devoient-ils pas craindre que la lecture de ces mêmes auteurs n'inspirassent aux Romains des sentimens peu convenables à leur condition actuelle, et que s'ils ne les faisoient pas entreprendre de secouer le joug, que du moins ils ne le leur fissent supporter impatiemment? Je ne pense pas qu'on ait publié d'ordres sur ce sujet. Mais il faut bien peu connoître les moines (alors seuls dépositaires du savoir) pour croire qu'ils ne sentoient pas les idées de leurs maîtres; et bien peu leur avarice si l'on s'imagine qu'ils ne se soucioient bien plus de gagner quelques arpens que leur complaisance pouvoient attirer à leur couvent, que de conserver tous les plus beaux morceaux des anciens. D'un autre côté ils ne devoient pas être bien gracieux pour les vaincus de rappeller les triomphes de leurs ancêtres. Dégénérés comme ils étoient ils devoient dire, avec l'affranchi de Terence, " Ista commemoratio quasi exproexprobratio est." Or ces considérations n'existoient point, ou n'existoient que très foiblement par rapport aux poëtes. Je n'appuye cependant pas sur cette raison, elle vaudra ce qu'elle pourra.

Dans les siècles depuis la renaissance des lettres on a souvent espéré de recouvrer ce qui nous manque des cent quarante livres de Tite Live. Pendant longtems on les a cru dans le sérail du Grand Seigneur; mais toutes les tentatives infructueuses qu'on a faites pour les en retirer et les grandes sommes qu'on a offertes sans effet, ont à la fin convaincu tout le monde qu'ils ne pouvoient pas y être. Monsieur Des Cloires, un homme qui a beaucoup de connoissances dans tout ce qui regarde les belles lettres, et qui connoît parfaitement la Grèce pour avoir été longtems dans ces pays-là, m'a dit que si le manuscrit entier de Tite Live existoit encore il croyoit qu'il devoit se trouver dans le célèbre monastère d'Athos, où, avant la prise de Constantinople, on avoit transporté tout ce que la ville possédoit de considérable en fait d'anciens manuscrits. Il ajouta que sous le ministère du grand Colbert on avoit formé le dessein d'envoyer à Athos deux bonnes frégates sous pavillon Maltois pour enlever tout ce qu'on pouvoit trouver en ce genre; mais qu'on abandonna ce projet, par la crainte de se compromettre avec la Porte, qui n'auroit pas manqué de découvrir la feinte; qu'on se contenta de le faire visiter par quelques gens de lettres déguisés en marchands, mais que leur recherche fut sans fruits; les moines ou n'ayant rien, ou cachant soigneusement ce qu'ils avoient. Cette dernière circonstance m'a fait presque croire qu'ils n'étoient pas en état de le produire en manuscrit. Les Grecs modernes sont à la fois si ignorans et si pauvres, qu'on ne peut se persuader, qu'avec bien de la peine, qu'ils eussent pu faire plus de cas de quelques vieilles paperasses dont ils ne connoissoient point le prix, que des sommes considérables qu'elles leur auroient valu auprès des Latins.

Un auteur incertain (quelques uns croyent que c'est Florus) a voulu suppléer en quelque façon à la perte des cent cinq livres de Tite Live que nous n'avons plus, pendant qu'ils existoient encore. Il nous fit des sommaires de chaque livre, où dans peu de mots il fait connoître les matières qui y sont contenues. Quoiqu'on voit que ce petit ouvrage doit avoir nécessairement toute la sécheresse d'un abrégé, cependant s'il étoit encore exact et qu'on pût compter que, par rapport aux faits, c'est Tite Live lui-même, il pourroit être encore d'une certaine utilité; mais voici deux exemples pris du même livre qui montrent combien il est éloigné de cette exactitude. 1. Parlant du second Scipion, qu'on fit consul plusieurs années avant qu'il eut l'age requis par les loix, le * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *.

RE-

Lausanne, 4 Mai, 1757.

REMARQUES CRITIQUES SUR UN PASSAGE DE PLAUTE.

Il y a un passage du Pœnulus de Plaute, Act. III. s. 3. v. 50. que je n'entends point suivant la lection ordinaire. Les commentateurs que j'ai vus n'y trouvent cependant point de difficulté, pas même M. de Saumaise.

Un domestique, déguisé en soldat pour tromper un marchand d'esclaves, paroît sur le théâtre. On lui demande qui il est, une personne au fait de la fourberie répond,

——————— Hic latro in Spartâ fuit,
Ut quidem ipse nobis dixit, apud regem Attalum,
Inde nunc aufugit quoniam capitur oppidum.

Je crois pouvoir établir comme premier principe, que, comme on vouloit tromper le marchand d'une manière plausible, la vraisemblance exigeoit qu'on prît, pour bâtir là-dessus leur invention, un événement réel, récent, et connu de tout le monde. M. l'Abbé Sevin a bien considéré les choses comme moi, puisque dans ses curieuses recherches sur l'Histoire de Pergame (V. Mémoires de l'Académie des Belles Lettres, tom. xii. p. 219.) il s'est bien servi de ce passage comme une preuve qu'Attale avoit des troupes Grecques à sa solde.

Cela étant, il est question de trouver une époque où Sparte fut prise pendant qu'un roi Attale commandoit dans ses murs. Si l'histoire n'en fournit point pour expliquer ce passage, il faut avoir recours à la critique pour la rétablir. On peut encore remarquer qu'il faut la trouver entre l'an Av. Ch. 241, première année du premier roi Attalus, et l'an 184, tems de la mort de Plaute.

Sparte fut prise par Antigonus Doson en 221. V. Plutarch. in Cleomen. p. 819. Polyb. l. ii. p. 155. Justin. l. xxviii. c. 4. Rollin, Hist. Ancienne, tom. iv. p. 239. Petav. Ration. Tempor. t. i. l. iv. c. 4. p. 127. Un Attalus régnoit alors ; cependant plusieurs raisons m'empêchent de croire, qu'il ait été question de ce fait. En voici quelques unes. I. Tous les auteurs se taisent sur cette circonstance. Cependant, un secours conduit par le roi de Pergame en personne, ne devoit guères échapper à l'exactitude d'un Plutarque et d'un Polybe, qui nous ont décrit toutes les plus petites particularités de cette guerre avec un si grand détail. II. L'an 221 Attalus étoit bien loin de pouvoir sortir de ses états pour aller secourir ses alliés. Achæus, gouverneur et ensuite roi d'Asie, l'attaquoit, l'avoit déjà dépouillé d'une partie de son royaume, et le pressoit vivement dans le reste. Attalus, qui prenoit lui-même des Gaulois à sa solde, pouvoit-il se dessaisir de ses propres troupes en une telle conjoncture, et surtout pouvoit-il aller en personne en Grèce? Environ le tems dont nous parlons, les Byzantins, ses anciens amis, lui demandèrent du secours contre les Rhodiens ; il ne put leur en donner. V. ubi supra, Sevin. p. 217. III. Quand même rien d'autre ne s'y opposeroit, la seule circonstance d'un Antiochus alors sur le trône suffiroit pour faire voir que nous n'y sommes pas pas encore. Pœn. Act. III. s. 3. v. 31. L'an 223 Seleucus Callinicus étoit assis sur le trône des Seleucides. V. Prideaux Hist. des Juifs, à l'an 223. La réponse que je connois à cette preuve c'est de dire que c'étoit un des traits que l'imitateur Latin avoit conservé de son modèle Grec, du tems de qui un Antiochus régnoit peut-être. Mais suivant toutes les apparences, Plaute prit son Pœnulus du Χαρχηδονιος de Ménandre. V. Menand. et Philers. Reliq. Amstel. 1709. p. 96. Or Ménandre mourut l'an A. C. 292, douze ans avant le premier Antiochus. Petav. Ration. Temp. p. 1. l. iii. c. 18. p. 114.

Sparte fut assiégée en 195 par les Romains et leurs alliés, (Liv. l. xxxiv. c. 34, &c. Just. l. xxxi. c. 3) mais elle ne fut pas prise. Cependant comme le cas suivant roule sur les mêmes principes j'examinerai celui-ci. I. L'an 197, Eumenes étoit roi de Pergame, son frère Attalus n'étoit point associé à la couronne. Sevin. ubi supra, p. 270. Liv. l. xlii. c. 16. II. Ce même Attalus, aussi bien que son frère, bien loin de commander dans Sparte, étoit actuellement dans l'armée Romaine.

Dans ce petit raisonnement j'ai suivi la ponctuation la plus naturelle du passage qui rapporte l'apud Regem Attalum à hic latro in Spartâ fuit, et non à inde non aufugit. Ceux qui adoptent la dernière ponctuation, toute dure qu'elle rend la construction, feront bien de réfléchir; I. Que la difficulté de trouver une prise et même un siège de Sparte pendant qu'un Attale et qu'un Antiochus régnoient subsiste en son entier; et II. Qu'il auroit été ridicule à Plaute de faire venir en Ætolie un homme fuyant de Sparte à Pergame.

Quelle est donc la correction que je propose? la voici; au lieu de regem Attalum je lirai regem Aetolûm. Expliquons-nous. L'an 191, les Ætoliens, voulant s'emparer de Lacédémone, envoyèrent Alexamène avec mille fantassins et trente cavaliers d'élite, en apparence pour secourir le tyran Nabis, mais en effet pour le tuer, ce qu'Alexamène fit par un coup de main fort hardi; mais s'amusant trop long tems à piller les trésors du palais, les Spartiates reprirent courage et massacrèrent les Ætoliens. Philopœmen vint à Sparte avec l'armée Achæenne, s'en rendit maître, et l'ajouta à la ligue du Péloponnèse. Liv. l. xxxv. c. 35, &c. On feignoit donc que ce soldat avoit été latro ou garde du corps, (Pitiscus. Lexic. sub voce Latro. Serv. ad Æneid. xii. v. 7,) d'Alexamène, et qu'après la prise de la ville par Philopœmen il avoit évité par la fuite le sort de ses compagnons. Comme les faits viennent toujours au secours des systèmes bien fondés, toutes les circonstances qui embarrassoient ci-devant viennent ici se placer d'elles-mêmes. I. L'Antiochus en question est le Grand Antiochus bien connu aux Romains, qui régnoit depuis une trentaine d'années. Bien plus, à l'époque en question il étoit actuellement à Chalcis, où, au lieu de s'occuper des préparatifs de la guerre, il passoit l'hiver dans la débauche et dans les plaisirs, Liv. l. xxxvi. c. 11; Justin. l. xxxi. c. 6; conduite qui pouvoit bien faire naître chez ses ennemis l'expression, " Mollius quam regi Antiocho oculi oculi curari solent," Plaut. Pœnul. Act. III. s. 3. v. 81, pour désigner une mollesse poussée à l'excès. II. Quantité de circonstances de la pièce conviennent beaucoup mieux aux tems qui ont suivi la seconde guerre Punique, époque de la mort de Nabis, qu'à l'intervalle de la première à la seconde où tomba la prise de Sparte par Antigonus. En voici deux assez frappantes. Hannon le Carthaginois de la pièce, lorsqu'on lui dit qu'un jeune enfant avoit été enlevé de Carthage, s'écria, " Proh Dii immortales! plurimi ad hunc modum periere pueri liberi Carthagine." Pœnul. Act. V. s. 2. v. 28. De tels enlèvemens conviennent mal au tems où les Carthaginois, malgré leurs pertes, maîtres de la mer, étoient sans ennemi en Afrique, mais fort à celui où Massanissa, même avant la venue de Scipion en Afrique, faisoit des incursions sur leurs terres et vendoit ses captifs aux marchands étrangers, Liv. l. xxix. c. 31; et encore mieux à celui où les Carthaginois, privés de leurs armes et de leurs vaisseaux, étoient en proie à quiconque vouloit les attaquer. Tout le monde connoît la fameuse scène en langue Punique qui a coûté tant de veilles aux savans. Quelle apparence que Plaute eut su lui-même, qu'il eut osé présenter à ses compatriotes cette langue, quand la génération qui avoit combattu et connu les Carthaginois étoit éteinte, au lieu que dix-sept ans de guerre, qu'une armée Punique au milieu de l'Italie devoit la leur avoir fait connoître? Quand même on supposeroit qu'il l'avoit trouvé en Ménandre ne l'auroit-il pas rejetté comme un jargon barbare et inintelligible?

Je ne connois que deux objections qu'on pourroit me faire. I. On me dira que je suppose le soldat avoir été Ætolien, au lieu que la pièce, dont la scène est en Ætolie, le dit étranger. Mais Plaute explique lui-même ce qu'il entend par étranger, " ex alio oppido." Pœnul. Act. III. s. 1. v. 57. ce qu'il pouvoit être sans cesser d'être Ætolien. II. Je donne le titre de roi à Alexamène quoiqu'il ne fût que général. Mais il faut être peu instruit des usages de l'antiquité pour ignorer que les anciens attachoient au mot de roi une idée bien plus étendue que nous : on appelloit ainsi tous ceux que leur rang ou leurs richesses élevoient au-dessus des autres ; V. Donat. ad Terent. Eunuch. Act. I. s. 2. v. 88.* et Plaute lui-même y a donné autre part, (Rudens, Act. IV. s. 2. v. 26.) une signification encore plus étendue qu'ici ; car si jamais sujet pouvoit mériter ce titre c'étoit Alexamène. La commission des Ætoliens lui donnoit une autorité sur ses troupes qui étoit sans bornes et au-dessus de celle de bien des rois. Ils ordonnoient aux soldats, " Quicquid Alexamenum res monuisset subiti consilii capere, ad id quamvis inopinatum, temerarium, audax, obedienter exsequendum parati essent ; ac pro eo acciperent tanquam ad id unum agendum missos ab domo se scirent."

Au lieu donc de la leçon reçue, je lis

——————— Hic latro in Spartâ fuit,
Ut quidem ipse nobis dixit, apud regem Ætolûm ;
Inde nunc aufugit quoniam capitur oppidum.

* Voyez aussi le Horace de Dacier, tom. i. p. 9, 10. Paris, 1709.

Je

Je n'ai pas besoin, je crois, d'avertir combien ce changement étoit facile et aisé à faire.

Cependant si l'on me disoit qu'il y a à la vérité ici une faute contre l'histoire, mais qu'il faut s'en prendre à l'ignorance de Plaute et non à la négligence de ses copistes, il ne trouvera pas beaucoup d'opposition de ma part. Plaute étoit ignorant; on ne sauroit en douter. Il n'y a qu'à comparer ses Mænechmes, Act. III. s. 2. v. 56, &c. avec les livres xxii. et xxiii. de Justin, pour sentir combien ses idées étoient confuses sur l'histoire de la Sicile; comme le plan de ses Captifs, où il fait aller et revenir un homme de l'Ætolie en Elide dans l'espace de quelques heures, fait sentir quelles étoient ses connoissances sur la géographie de la Grèce. Cependant j'aimerois mieux dénouer le nœud que de le couper.

Lausanne, 1 Avril, 1757.

REMARQUES SUR QUELQUES ENDROITS DE VIRGILE.

——————— Et te, maxime Cæsar,
Qui nunc extremis Asiæ jam victor in oris Imbellem avertis Romanis arcibus Indum.
VIRG. Georg. lib. ii. v. 161.

LES savans sont fort partagés sur les peuples qu'il faut ici entendre par Indiens. Les uns veulent que ce soient les Æthiopiens, les autres prétendent qu'ils ne peuvent être que les habitans de l'Hindostan. Le père Catrou prend ce dernier parti; il croit y trouver un appui à son système que Virgile

Virgile revit et corrigea ses Bucoliques la pénultième année avant sa mort. En effet l'ambassade du roi Porus, de laquelle, suivant lui, il s'agit ici, tomba sur l'an de Rome 734, dix ans après la première publication des Georgiques. Pour moi je ne saurois adopter son idée. Tout me paroît naturel si vous l'entendez des Æthiopiens, tout révolte si vous l'entendez des Indiens orientaux. Je n'aurois point de dispute avec le Rev. Père pour lui faire avouer que les anciens donnoient souvent aux Æthiopiens le nom d'Indiens, il l'avoue lui-même formellement. Tom. II. du Virgile de Catrou, p. 248, 487. Mais comme quelque autre pourroit en douter et que je ne veux pas ici traiter la matière ex professo, je le renverrai à la belle dissertation de M. Freret sur la géographie de Xenophon, Mémoir. de l'Acad. des Belles Lettres, tom. iv. p. 588, edit. Paris, où il prouve, à n'en laisser aucun doute, la vérité que j'avance. Si l'on demandoit pourquoi on les confondoit, je dirois que leur origine commune, leur couleur basanée, et l'or qui se trouve dans les deux pays suffisoient bien pour induire en erreur d'aussi petits géographes que les anciens. Il ne s'agit plus que d'examiner si les paroles de Virgile conviennent mieux aux Indiens occidentaux ou à ceux de l'orient. Virgile lui-même sera son meilleur interprète. Il faut trouver I^ment^ un peuple distingué assez par sa mollesse, pour que Virgile fût obligé de leur donner une épithète qui est bien loin de renfermer un compliment à son maître; et voilà justement ce que je trouve au sujet des Æthiopiens. Strabon nous dit d'eux d'eux qu'ils n'étoient propres ni à la guerre ni à aucun emploi de la vie. Οιαν προειπομεν εδε παρασκευασμενην προς πολεμον ουτε προς αλλον βιον. Strab. Geog. l. xvii. p. 563. Edit. Casaub. Il appuye extrêmement sur cette inaptitude à la guerre, et il semble même que c'est pour la démontrer qu'il fait le récit d'une guerre dont je parlerai dans un moment. En effet toute cette guerre nous les représente comme les plus foibles des hommes; ils surprennent à la vérité trois cohortes Romaines, mais dès que le préfet de l'Egypte marche contr'eux avec dix mille hommes, trente mille Æthiopiens, la moitié à peine armée, fuyent en confusion, et le laissent pénétrer sans obstacle au cœur de leur pays: voilà bien l'imbellem Indum. Mais je doute qu'on puisse parler de la sorte des vrais Indiens. Quoiqu'ils ne se soient jamais distingués par leurs conquêtes, ils ne l'ont jamais été par leur foiblesse. Alexandre les subjugua, mais ils lui avoient opposé auparavant une résistance infiniment supérieure à celle qu'il avoit éprouvée des autres peuples de l'Asie. Voyez Q. Curt. l. ix. c. 4, s. 16, qui donne à des nations Indiennes le titre de ferocissimæ. II. Il faut encore trouver un peuple voisin de l'empire Romain qui pouvoit y faire des incursions, et qui pouvoit être empêchés d'attaquer les forteresses des Romains: avertis Romanis ab arcibus. L'on sent, à la simple vue de la carte, combien un tel voisinage convenoit aux Æthiopiens. Ils étoient limitrophes de l'Egypte devenu province Romaine depuis la mort de Cléopatre. Voyez Suet. in Cæsar. August. c. 18. Vell. Paterc. l. ii. c. 39, s. 2.

Les

Les Indiens au contraire étoient séparés des Romains par des pays immenses, par tout l'empire des Parthes. J'aimerois autant que Boileau eut loué Louis XIV. d'avoir garanti la France des invasions des Siamois, après qu'il eut reçu une ambassade de ce dernier peuple. III. Il faudroit que ce peuple en question eût eu quelque démêlé avec les Romains, mais que la réputation et les victoires d'Auguste les eût obligés de se tenir en repos.* Tout cela paroît être exactement vrai des Æthiopiens. Candace, leur reine, fit une invasion en Ægypte quelques années après pendant que les troupes Romaines étoient engagées dans une expédition en Arabie. Plin. Hist. Nat. l. vi. c. 29. Strab. Geog. l. xvii. 564. Prideaux Histoire des Juifs sous l'an avant Christ . L'on donne même à comprendre que les Æthiopiens avoient voulu remuer pendant peut-être qu'Auguste étoit en Ægypte, puisque le prétexte qu'ils alléguoient (savoir certains torts qu'ils avoient reçus des anciens monarques du pays, λεγοντων δε ως αδικοιντο υπο των Μοναρχων) subsistoit déjà; mais effrayés apparemment du bruit de ses expoloits ils renvoyèrent leur entreprise à des tems plus favorables. Il n'y a rien de pareil dans le cas des Indiens. Jamais ils n'ont eu de démêlé avec les Romains. Ils envoyèrent à la vérité une ambassade à ce prince, mais ce fut uniquement pour demander sa protection et rendre hommage à ses vertus, (Strab. Geog. l. xv. 495. Flori Histor. Roman. l. iv. c. 12.) circonstance qui me confirme dans l'idée qu'il n'est point question ici des Indiens orientaux, ni de leur ambassade. Virgile, habile adulateur, auroit-il jamais exposé des lecteurs à confondre un événement aussi unique, aussi flatteur pour son héros, que celui d'un peuple libre qui vient de l'extrémité de la terre rendre hommage à ses vertus, à le confondre, dis-je, avec ces avantages qu'on obtenoit si souvent sur les barbares limitrophes de l'empire?

* Jam victor .....avertis.

stance

Une autre raison, qui ne me permet pas d'adopter le système du Père Catrou, c'est le phrase Asiæ extremis in oris. Quelque tour que le Rev. Père tache de lui donner, on ne peut pas se dispenser d'avouer, que la seconde ligne de celles que j'ai rapportées n'indique l'endroit où César étoit lorsqu'il s'occupoit à ce qui est décrit dans la troisième. Or César reçut l'ambassade des Indiens à Samos. V. Dion. Hist. Roman. l. lv. p. 626. Quelque licence que les anciens se soient donnés dans l'application du mot d'Asie aussi bien que ceux d'Inde, de Syrie, de Scythie, &c. on ne me persuadera jamais qu'ils ayent appellé les frontières les plus reculées de l'Asie une île qui en forme l'entrée. Au lieu que l'Egypte, où César étoit, séparoit en effet l'Asie des pays lointains et inconnus de l'Afrique, suivant un système fort reçu du tems de Virgile, qui donnoit l'Egypte à l'Asie. V. Notit. Orb. Ant. Cellar. tom. ii. l. iv. p. 3. et Sallust. in Jugurth. c. 18.

Voilà les raisons qui m'engagent à rejetter le système du Père Catrou, et à croire que notre poëte ne vouloit parler dans cet endroit que des Æthiopiens.

piens. Il ne reste qu'à examiner deux de ses objections contre mon opinion, lesquelles me paroissent assez foibles. I^ment. Les Æthiopiens, dit-il, étoient-ils assez considérables dans la bataille d'Actium pour ne la représenter que par là? tom. 2. p. 249; peut-être que non. En tout cas c'est à ceux qui le croyent à le soutenir. Cette objection ne me regarde pas, moi qui ne parle point des Æthiopiens auxiliaires d'Antoine, mais comme voulant faire la guerre en leur propre nom. II. Virgile devoit avoir fini son second livre avant la bataille d'Actium: soit, quoique Donat n'ait beaucoup de poids dans mon esprit. Mais il ne publia les Georgiques que l'année après, et je crois bien qu'il les retouchoit jusqu'au jour de leur publication.

A Lausanne, 13 Mai, 1757.

REMARQUES CRITIQUES SUR UN PASSAGE DE VIRGILE.

Nam quà Pellæi gens fortunata Canopi
Accolit effuso stagnantem flumine Nilum,
Et circum pictis vehitur sua rura phaselis;
Quàque Pharetratæ vicinia Persidis urget,
Et viridem Ægyptum nigrâ fæcundat arenâ,
Et diversa ruens septem discurrit in ora
Usque coloratis amnis devexus ab Indis.
Omnis in hac certam regio jacit arte salutem.

VIRG. Georg. iv. v. 287.

Ce passage a bien coûté des veilles aux savans. C'est proprement la quatrième ligne qui en fai[t] tout[e] toute la difficulté. Le voisinage du Nil et de la Perse choque les premiers principes de la géographie et paroît inconcevable, sur tout se trouvant dans Virgile qui réunissoit les connoissances du savant aux talens du bel-esprit. On s'est pris diversement pour s'en tirer. Les uns ont cru le texte corrompu; les autres ont voulu l'expliquer. Encore ceux-ci ont-ils suivi des routes différentes; on a rapproché la Perse du Nil; on a reculé le Nil jusqu'à la Perse. Voyons quel sentiment il nous convient le mieux d'embrasser.

Je ne fais qu'indiquer la correction de M. de Segrais qui transposoit réciproquement les vers Quàque Pharetratæ, &c. Et viridem, &c. de manière que les quatre premières lignes se rapportoient au Nil et à l'Egypte, et les quatre dernières à l'Indus, fleuve limitrophe de la Perse. (1) M. Huet a si bien réfuté cette émendation (2) qu'à moins d'avoir perdu l'esprit on ne sauroit l'admettre: aussi quoique M. de Segrais fût très bel-esprit (3) il n'avoit ni la pénétration ni l'érudition nécessaire pour faire un bon critique. (4)

L'opinion qui trouve des Perses sur les bords du Nil est celle du Père Catrou. Il la propose avec sa confiance ordinaire, et il faut convenir que son système est joli. Il fait venir un passage de Salluste pour nous apprendre que les Perses passèrent en Afrique après la mort de leur général Hercule, qu'ils y prirent le nom de Nomades ou Numides, et qu'ils s'étendirent dans la plus grande partie de l'Afrique intérieure. " Voici donc un grand empire établi en Afrique par les Persans qui bordent l'Egypte,

(1) V. Recueil de Dissertations de Philologie, &c. publ. par l'Abbé Tilladet; les Dissert. de M. de Segrais et de M. Huet. sont au vol. ii. p. 22—68.
(2) Ibid. p. 54.
(3) Siècle de Louis XIV. tom. iii. p. 312.
(4) Huetii Comment. p. 264.

l'Egypte, et qui la serrent du côté occidental, mais sur tout la Haute Egypte." (1) Il essaye ensuite de répondre à quelques objections qu'on pouvoit lui faire, mais il n'a point prévenu les miennes. Il faut convenir avec lui que, quoique Salluste ne nous donne cette tradition que d'un air peu assuré, (fides ejus rei penes auctoris erit,) (2) il nous la donne pourtant, et ce qui étoit bon pour l'historien l'étoit sûrement pour le poëte; comme on ne peut lui disputer que Virgile ne se soit plu à désigner les colonies du nom des pays dont elle venoient: mais je dis, I^ment. que la tradition en question (quand même elle conviendroit au sens de Virgile) n'étoit pas de nature à pouvoir en être employée, et II^ment. qu'elle n'y convient pas.

(1) Virgile de Catrou, tom. ii. p. 481.

(2) Sallust. in Bell. Jugurth. c. 17.

I^ment. Il y a de certains traits d'histoire ancienne, vrais ou faux, qui vont bien dans un poëme; ils délassent le lecteur et ils donnent bonne idée du savoir du poëte, mais dès qu'on les y fait entrer (surtout quand ce n'est qu'en allusion) on les suppose déjà connus de tout le monde, et ils doivent l'être en effet. Mais cette colonie des Persans ne peut point avoir place dans cette classe. Salluste, qui le premier l'avoit tiré des livres Puniques du roi Hiempsal, avoue, que c'étoit ab eâ famâ quæ plerosque obtinet diversum. En effet un Hercule, général des Mèdes, des Perses, et des Arméniens, mort en Espagne, est si totalement opposé aux notions communes, qu'il faudroit qu'un lecteur fût averti d'avance de ce qu'on vouloit lui dire, pour pouvoir y comprendre quelque chose. Il eut eut pu donner lieu à une épisode, à une description, mais pour une allusion aussi courte, autant sans préparation, non seulement Virgile, mais même le pédant Properce l'auroit sûrement exclu. Les traits les plus fabuleux, mais dans la bouche de tout le monde, les Gorgones, les Jardins des Hespérides, avec tous leurs prodiges, pouvoient être reçus plutôt que cette tradition, vraie peut-être, mais heurtant de front toutes les idées du vulgaire. De plus elle étoit nouvelle, autre circonstance fâcheuse. Virgile doit avoir écrit les lignes en question au plus tard d'abord après la mort de Cornelius Gallus, (1) l'an de Rome 726. (2) Salluste avoit écrit la Guerre Jugurthine dans sa retraite, (3) environ l'an 711 ou 712. Or Salluste étoit le premier qui fit connoître à ses compatriotes l'opinion des Numides sur leur propre origine, en traduisant les morceaux de la langue Punique qui en traitoient. Quinze ans, qui s'étoient écoulés depuis la publication de cet ouvrage, bien loin de l'avoir mis entre les mains de tout le monde, ne devoient (vu la rareté des livres et les troubles des tems) l'avoir fait connoître qu'à un petit nombre de curieux, de gens particulièrement adonnés à l'étude des antiquités de leur patrie. Peut-être que Virgile ne l'avoit pas encore vu, mais à coup sûr de mille de ses lecteurs (et un poëte n'écrit pas seulement pour les savans) à peine s'en trouvoit un qui l'eut eu entre les mains. Virgile seroit-il allé rechercher dans un tel écrivain, des idées aussi singulières que leur auteur étoit nouveau? Et où les est-il allé chercher? Dans le Latium peut-être ou tout au

(1) Serv. ad Eclog. x. v. 1.
(2) Sueton, in Aug. c. 66. Crevier. Histoire des Empereurs, tom. i. p. 72.
(3) Sallust. in Jug. c. 4. (V. p. 400.)

plus dans l'enceinte de l'Italie. Un certain nombre de personnes connoît toujours bien l'histoire de sa patrie. Point du tout: à toutes les autres circonstances propres à embarrasser ses lecteurs, il auroit joint l'éloignement des lieux, il seroit allé en Perse pour en faire venir une colonie en Afrique afin de pouvoir dire qu'ils habitoient près des bords du Nil. Les exemples que le Père Catrou apporte comme semblables à celui-ci ne le sont point. Il n'y a jamais eu qu'une voix sur le pays d'où sortoient les Toscans, ni sur les ancêtres de ceux de Cumes. Depuis qu'Hérodote avoit parlé de la première migration (1) il a été suivi par une foule d'autres, (2) et Varron, (3) aussi bien que Caton, (4) avoient si bien éclairci la fondation des principales villes de l'Italie qu'il n'y restoit que peu ou point de difficultés. Aussi Velleius Paterculus du même siècle que Virgile (5) n'a point hésité d'affirmer la même chose que lui sur la fondation de Cumes. (6)

(1) Herodot. l. i. c. 72. p. 45. Edit. H. Steph.
(2) Justin, ou plutôt Trogus Pompeius, l. xx. c. 1. Virgile lui-même Æneid. viii. v. 479, &c.
(3) V. Cicero. in Quæst. Academ. l. i. c. 3.
(4) Corn. Nepos. in Caton. c. 8. Serv. ad Æneid. vii. v. 678. Vell. Paterc. l. i. c. 7.
(5) Vell. Paterc. Hist. l. ii. c. 36. Dodwell. Annal. Velleiani. s. 8.
(6) Vell. Patercul. l. i. c. 4.

II. Mais en second lieu je dis que cette tradition, vraie ou fabuleuse, ancienne ou moderne, connue ou obscure, ne convient nullement au sens de Virgile. Suivant le P. Catrou lui-même il falloit que le peuple en question touchât les bords du Nil; or a suivre la narration de Salluste nous trouverons que les Numides Persans n'étoient point dans ce cas, et que leur pays étoit très éloigné du Nil et de l'Egypte. Il est difficile de fixer au juste les bornes des divers peuples de l'Afrique, c'est parcequ'ils n'en avoient point de bien déterminées, et qu'ils changeoient (comme nous le dit Virgile lui-même)

leurs

(1) leurs habitations lorsqu'ils ne trouvoient plus de pâturage là où ils étoient. Cependant comme toute l'Afrique étoit peuplée, leurs erreurs ne pouvoient pas s'étendre bien loin, et on a cru pouvoir leur assigner de certaines limites qu'ils ne passoient guères. De cette manière on a donné la rivière Tusca pour borne orientale de la Numidie. (2) Cette rivière, située plus à l'occident que Carthage, étoit éloignée de plus de la moitié de la largeur de l'Afrique du Nil, avec lequel ces peuples n'avoient aucun commerce, de sorte que j'aimerois autant parler du voisinage du Portugal et de la Pologne que de celui de ces deux nations. Si l'on me répondoit que telles à la vérité pouvoient être les bornes de la Numidie du tems de Salluste et de Pline, mais que dans les anciens tems, dont il s'agit ici, elles s'étendoient bien plus loin, ma réplique seroit facile; je lui dirois qu'il fonde son objection sur un fait qu'il suppose mais dont il n'apporte point de preuve; que Salluste n'insinue nulle part rien de pareil; qu'au contraire il dit expressément que tous les peuples vaincus reçurent le nom des Numides leurs vainqueurs. Je sais bien qu'après Juba, la Numidie se rétrécit, et qu'une bonne partie de ce royaume prit le nom de Mauritanie; (3) mais cela arriva dans un tems bien postérieur non seulement à l'établissement des Perses en Afrique mais même au tems de Salluste: à la vérité le Père Catrou, pour accabler ses adversaires, nous cite un passage de Salluste, "Africæ interior pars pleraque ab Numidis possessa est," d'où il conclut que leur empire (puisqu'il renfermoit la plus grande partie de l'Afrique

(1) Omnia secum armentarius Afer agit, tectumque Laremque. Virgil. Georg. l. iii. v. 343.

(2) Plin. Hist. Nat. l. v. c. 3. Cellar. Notit. Orb. Antiq. tom. ii. pars 2. p. 111.

(3) Cellar. Notit. Orb. Antiq. tom. ii. pars 2. p. 125.

rique intérieure) alloit jusqu'au Nil et la Haute Egypte. Mais je lui nie son principe et sa conséquence. Dans deux éditions assez bonnes (1) que j'ai de Salluste, au lieu d'interior on a inferior, ce qui fait un sens bien différent, sans qu'il soit fait mention de différente leçon. Interior, par rapport à l'Afrique, ne sauroit signifier que la partie située fort avant dans les terres. Mais, sans nous arrêter au sentiment de Soldus qui y donne un sens, dont on ne pourroit trouver d'exemple, Glareanus (2) en offre deux pour le mot inferior. Il peut signifier la partie de l'Afrique la plus près de la mer et de l'embouchure des rivières, ou bien la partie occidentale de cette région. Sans m'arrêter à examiner ces différentes explications, puisqu'elles me sont également favorables, je ne dirai qu'un mot sur la hardiesse du Père Catrou, qui ose ainsi falsifier un auteur entre les mains de tout le monde pour le plier à ses systèmes. Etoit-ce excès d'inattention? Etoit-ce manque de bonne foi? Je n'ai garde de décider: mais le caractère de confrère du Père Hardouin est bien loin de fournir un préjugé en sa faveur. Je lui nie aussi sa conséquence. Admettons son interior, donnons-lui toute l'étendue possible, n'y mettons d'autres bornes que la longitude de Catabaltomus, borne de l'Afrique même suivant Salluste, (3) il restera toujours une immense étendue de pays avant que d'arriver en Egypte, les Garamantes, les Blemmyes, et les déserts de la Lybie. Sans compter que l'urget de Virgile indique ce qui est, non ce qui étoit, un poëte de nos jours diroit-il que la Toscane toucha à la

(1) L'une de Thysius, Lugd. Bat. 1649, cum notis variorum, l'autre de Philippe, Paris, 1744.

(2) In edit. Thysii ad c. 18. Bell. Jugurth.

(3) Sallustii Bell. Jugurth. c. 17. Cellar. ubi supra, p. 66.

la Sicile parceque les Toscans d'autrefois possédoient toute l'Italie jusqu'au détroit de Messine?(1)

Les Persans de l'autre côté du Nil ne sont pas plus réels. Sénèque nous parle bien d'une nation vers les cataractes qui avoit été placée là par les Persans, mais il ne nous dit point qu'elle étoit Persanne elle-même. Au contraire, à en juger par les coutumes de la nation des Perses, c'étoit une de ces nations sujettes à son empire, mais différente d'elle-même, qu'elle transportoit hors de son pays par diverses raisons de politique, comme elle avoit fait à l'égard des Branchides,(2) des Egyptiens,(3) des Hyrcaniens,(4) des Eretriens,(5) des Barcæens,(6) &c. Il n'est pas même naturel de croire que les Persans s'éloignassent volontiers de leurs pays; eux qui y jouissoient de si grands privilèges(7) et qui méprisoient ou estimoient les autres peuples à proportion qu'ils étoient éloignés ou voisins de la Perse.(8)

En voici assez, et peut-être trop, sur le système du Jésuite. Il nous reste à examiner celui de M. Huet, nom cher aux savans, et qui conservera à jamais sa place dans les fastes de la littérature à côté de ceux de ses amis les Sirmonds, les Petaus, et les Bochards. Il a fait une dissertation sur cette question, mais je crains qu'elle ne soit de ces productions qui peuvent nuire à une réputation naissante, sans pouvoir ajouter à une réputation établie. Il y verse l'érudition à pleines mains, mais ce n'est pas ce que j'y trouve à rédire. Son sujet la comportoit, il la demandoit même. Mais j'y aurois voulu plus de choix dans ses citations, plus de net-

(1) T. Liv. l. i. c. 2.

(2) Q. Curt. Hist. de Reb. Alex. l. vii. c. 5.

(3) Xenophon. Cyropæd. l. vi. p. 106. Edit. Hen. Steph.

(4) V. La Dissert. de M. Freret. tom. iv. des Mém. de l'Acad. des Belles Lettres, p. 588.

(5) Crevier. Hist. des Empereurs, tom. vii. p. 234.

(6) Herodot. l. iv. p. 129.

(7) V. passim. Xenophon. Cyropæd. sed præcipue, l. i.

(8) Herodot. l. i. p. 64.

teté dans ses idées, plus de méthode dans son plan; j'y cherchois l'esprit philosophique qui rassemble, je n'y ai trouvé que l'esprit compilateur qui ramasse.

Le fonds de son système revient à ceci. Les anciens, petits géographes, croyoient que la mer Indienne et Persanne n'étoit qu'un grand lac derrière lequel étoit une grande étendue de terre qui joignoit l'Inde à l'Æthiopie, pays que les anciens confondoient souvent; que le Nil, dont la source étoit en Asie, traversoit ces terres par un grand détour pour arriver en Æthiopie; et qu'ainsi, comme il traversoit l'Inde et que l'Inde touche à la Perse, on pouvoit l'appeller voisin de la Perse. Quarante à cinquante citations viennent prouver tout ceci. Il me seroit ennuyeux de les éplucher toutes les unes après les autres quand même j'aurois tous les auteurs allégués. Trois remarques générales que je ferai en retrancheront la plus grande partie; quatre ou cinq qui vont plus au fait que les autres me resteront, lesquelles j'examinerai à part.

I^ment. Une bonne partie des autorités de M. Huet tombent d'elles-mêmes comme trop vagues ou trop obscures. Je ne fais point de difficulté d'avouer que je n'entends point Vibius Sequester, quand il dit que le Gange est la seule rivière qui coule vers le levant avec le midi, non plus que Solin (malgré l'explication de M. Huet) lorsqu'il veut que le Nil et l'Euphrate soient situés " ad modum ejusdem perpendiculi;" ni Héliodore, qui prétend que le Nil a sa source là où le climat de l'orient finit et celui du midi commence. Lorsque l'Egyptien Nonnus me dit dit que la mer Arabique retentit des coups des combats de Bacchus je le regarde comme la ridicule amplification d'un poëte oriental, et je ne pense pas à l'appliquer à la géographie. Quand l'agréable Ovide rassemble à la cour de Cepheus tant de différentes nations, je n'y fais pas attention, puisqu'outre que les poëtes, aussi bien que les romanciers, ont coutume de faire trouver à la cour de leurs rois les gens des pays les plus éloignés, il n'est pas plus favorable (à l'examiner à la rigueur) à M. Huet qu'à moi. Il n'est pas plus naturel de trouver des Nabothæans et des habitans de la Palestine à la cour du roi des Indes, qu'il ne l'est de faire venir des Bactriens et des Indiens en Æthiopie. Je fais le même jugement des passages d'Æschyle et de Stace. L'Æthiopie étoit en effet orientale pour des Grecs et des Romains qui ne faisoient attention qu'aux points cardinaux.

II^ment. Il y en a beaucoup qui rapprochent à la vérité l'Inde et l'Æthiopie; mais quand on considère la chose de plus près on voit que ce n'est uniquement qu'une méprise et une confusion de nom. On connoissoit bien l'Æthiopie mais on l'appelloit l'Inde; l'on ne se méprenoit point sur la situation de l'Inde mais on lui donnoit le nom d'Æthiopie. Ainsi on pouvoit dire que le Nil avoit sa source dans l'Inde, non dans l'Inde Asiatique mais dans l'Africaine, et l'on pouvoit assurer qu'un tel faisoit un voyage aux Indes lorsqu'en effet il n'alloit qu'en Æthiopie. Parmi d'autres causes voici la principale raison de cette réciprocité de nom. Les Æthiopiens (déjà nommés ainsi) habitoient sur les bords de l'Indus, d'où ils allèrent dans le pays au dessus de l'Ægypte conservant leur ancien nom, en même tems qu'ils donnèrent celui d'Inde à leur nouvelle patrie.(1) Une telle explication débrouille bien la difficulté, mais fait tomber les armes à M. Huet. Une erreur de nom ne lui suffisoit point, il lui en falloit un de fait qui établît l'existence de son continent imaginaire, qui s'étendoit depuis le pays des Garamantes jusqu'à celui des Seres, et auquel les anciens donnoient indifféremment le nom d'Inde et celui d'Æthiopie. M. Huet sent combien cette différence lui est essentielle, puisqu'après avoir avoué tout ce que je viens de dire(2) sur les Æthiopiens dans le Levant et les Indiens dans le midi il se contredit quelques pages après, (3) et s'échauffe beaucoup contre les critiques qui veulent que l'Æthiopie se soit appellée autrefois l'Inde. Après cette explication on voit à quoi servent ses citations d'Hérodote, d'Agalarchide, d'Hygin, de Sénèque, de St. Chrysostome, de Nonnus, de Théophylacte, d'Euménius, de Sidonius Apollinaris, et de Procope.

(1) V. La Dissert. de M. Freret. Mémoires de l'Académ. des Belles Lettres, tom. vi. p. 588. Marsham. Canon Chronic. p. 335. Scriptoresque, ibi citatos. Euseb. p. 402. Strab. l. ii. p. 103. Philostrat. l. iii. c. 6.

(2) Recueil de Dissertations, tom. ii. p. 40.

(3) Idem, p. 48.

III^ment. Dans quelques autres autorités, plus pressantes peut-être, M. Huet n'observe point une précaution très nécessaire à prendre. Il cite indifféremment tous ceux qui paroissent contenir quelque chose de favorable à sa cause, sans faire attention au tems où ils ont vécu, comme si c'étoit rendre vraisemblable l'erreur de Virgile en déterrant quelque chose de pareil dans un écrivain qui a vécu six cens ans avant ou après lui. Les connoissances géographiques encore plus qu'aucunes autres autres sont dans un flux et reflux continuel. Les voyages, les conquêtes, le commerce, les étendent: les transmigrations, le partage des états, la barbarie, les rétrécissent. Les occidentaux ont eu là-dessus leur aurore, leur midi, et leur couchant. Du tems des premiers Grecs on se bornoit à la Grèce et à l'Asie mineure. L'occident n'étoit pas connu,(1) l'orient ne l'étoit que par des fables. Les voyages de leurs sages et les conquêtes de leurs héros leur ouvrirent celui-ci. Ils connurent et devinrent esclaves des Romains presqu'en même tems. Pendant quelques siècles ces deux peuples connoissoient la terre beaucoup moins que nous, mais beaucoup plus que leurs ancêtres. Pendant cette période les Strabons et les Plines écrivirent; c'étoit le grand jour des connoissances. Les Arabes vinrent, subjuguèrent tout, et obscurcirent tout. L'orient se referma aux occidentaux et la nuit fut longue. M. Huet, voulant expliquer les opinions et les connoissances du siècle d'Auguste, (et Virgile étoit plutôt au-dessus qu'au-dessous de son siècle,) n'auroit dû citer que des auteurs de la seconde période. Il me dispensera donc d'examiner les témoignages de Pindare, d'Æschyle, de Cedrenus, de Benjamin de Tudèle, d'Aben Ezra, de Vincent, de Beauvais, de Marc Paule, et de Cocceius Sabellicus.

(1) Joseph. l. i. contr. Appion. p. 1038.

Exécutons à présent notre promesse et examinons un peu plus particulièrement quelques autorités qui méritent d'être tirées de la foule.

I^ment. Polybe nous dit, à ce que M. Huet assure, que l'Asie et l'Afrique se touchoient par l'Æthiopie, d'où d'où il conclut pour l'existence de son continent derrière la mer Indienne. Mais quoique ce passage paroisse plausible au premier abord il se réduit presqu'à rien. 1. Polybe ne nous le dit point de la manière que M. Huet suppose. Il ne le donne point comme sa propre opinion, ni comme celle des gens de lettres de son tems; il raconte seulement, à propos de l'ignorance de ses contemporains sur la géographie, qu'on ignoroit presque tout ce qui étoit au septentrion de Narbonne, et qu'on ne savoit pas bien si l'Asie et l'Afrique étoient contigues, ou si elles étoient séparées par la mer, tout comme Varron a traité de fabuleux toute l'histoire Grecque avant les Olympiades,(1) sans que ni l'un ni l'autre ayent voulu traiter de faux tout ce qu'on rapportoit et qui étoit antérieur à leurs époques ou au-delà de leurs bornes. 2. Polybe, quand même il diroit tout ce qu'on lui fait dire, n'affirme rien du tout de l'origine du Nil, article non moins essentiel que la jonction des deux continens. 3. Depuis le tems de Polybe à celui de Virgile on avoit acquis de nouvelles lumières sur cette matière. Eudoxe, fuyant Ptolémée Lathyrus, avoit fait le tour de l'Afrique.(2) Des Indiens avoient été jettés par les tempêtes sur les côtes d'Allemagne.(3) Le Roi des Suèves les donna au proconsul Metellus Celer.(4) Strabon, à la vérité,(5) révoque en doute le voyage d'Eudoxus, mais lorsque Virgile écrivit il passoit pour sûrement vrai, et Strabon lui-même, quoiqu'il rejette cette preuve, regardoit bien l'Afrique comme une péninsule.(6)

(1) Censorin. de Die Natali. c. 21.
(2) Plin. Hist. Natur. l. ii. c. 67. Cornel. Nepot. Fragm. p. 731.
(3) Plin. ubi supra. Cornel. Nepot. p. 732.
(4) Si l'on veut savoir qui étoit ce Metellus, V. Life of Cicero by Middleton, tom. i. p. 234. Cicero. Orat. pro Cælio. c. 24. et Epist. ad Fam. l. v. Ep. 2. Cicéron étoit ami de Metellus aussi bien que de Nepos. V. Seuton. in Julio, c. 55. Voss. de Histor. Latin. l. i. c. 24.
(5) Strab. l. ii. p. 67.
(6) Idem, l. xv. p. 567.

II^mert. Alexandre

II^ment. Alexandre s'imagina, sur quelques ressemblances qu'il trouva de l'Inde au Nil, que c'étoit une seule et même rivière. J'en conviens, et j'avoue même que, comme " regis ad exemplum totus componitur orbis," ce pouvoit bien être l'opinion favorite de la cour pendant quelque tems; mais par la même raison comme il découvrit son erreur bientôt après,(1) elle devoit avoir perdu tout son crédit, d'autant plus que l'intervalle n'étoit pas assez grand pour qu'elle eût pu prendre racine dans les esprits. Après une telle expérience on devoit même être devenu plus réservé à admettre les relations et les conjectures qui joignoient les deux continens, et qui trouvoient le Nil dans quelque rivière des Indes.

(1) Arrian. Expedit. Alexand. l. vi. p. 236.

III^ment. Josephe (dit-on) place la source du Nil, qu'il appelle Geon, à l'orient. Cela est vrai dans un certain sens. Mais en même tems il est facile de voir qu'il parloit de ce qu'étoit ce fleuve du tems qu'il arrosoit le Paradis terrestre, et non de ce qu'il étoit de son tems, étant apparemment dans l'idée de ceux qui croyent que la chute d'Adam et ensuite le déluge avoient apporté un grand changement à la terre primitive. Je ne demande d'autres preuves de ce que j'avance que les paroles mêmes de Josephe. Il dit que le jardin d'Eden étoit arrosé par un fleuve qui environnoit toute la terre, et qui se partageoit dans quatre branches, le Ganges, l'Euphrate, le Tigris, et le Nil. " Ἀρδεται δε ὑπο ενος ποταμὸ πασαν εν κυκλῳ την γην περιῤῥεοντος, ος εις τεθαρα μερη χιζεται.(2) Il faut être soi-même de la plus crasse ignorance pour ignorer que que tout ceci n'est point vrai de l'état présent des choses, et imaginer que Josephe l'a été pour supposer qu'il l'ait cru tel.

(2) Joseph. Antiq. Jud. l. i. c. 2.

IV^ment. La fable de Memnon, fils de Tithone et d'Aurore, est toute fondée sur la supposition que l'Æthiopie étoit en orient. Voilà (je m'imagine) pourquoi. Il étoit supposé fils de l'Aurore, c'est à dire qu'il étoit né en orient ; (1) mais d'un autre côté on le supposoit Æthiopien ou au moins Haut Ægyptien ; on trouvoit de ses monumens dans la Thébaïde, (2) comment arranger tout cela sans le système de M. Huet ? très facilement. Il y avoit ici deux traditions différentes qu'il ne faut point songer à concilier ensemble, d'autant plus que, suivant toutes les apparences, il étoit question de deux hommes très différens. (3) Il y avoit un roi Ægyptien nommé Memnon, ou plutôt Amenophis, autrement dit Ismandas ou Osymandas. (4) Les savans se sont donné bien des peines pour fixer l'époque de son règne. (5) Il y avoit encore le fils de Tithone, son père alla en Perse fort à l'orient de Troye. Le roi d'Assyrie lui donna le gouvernement de Suse, et lors du siège de Troye il envoya Memnon avec une armée au secours de son parent Priam. (6) Il y vint, mais fut tué d'abord par Achille. (7)

(1) Virgil. Æneid. i. v. 755. et alios.
(2) Strab. l. xvii. p.
(3) On peut voir cette matière assez développée dans la mythologie de l'Abbé Banier, tom. iii. p. 496.
(4) Strab. l. xvii. p. 561. Tacit. Annal. ii. c. 61.
(5) Marsham. Canon Chronicus. p. 424, &c. Perizonzius, Reineccius, &c.
(6) Diod. Sicul. l. i. p. 106. Traduct. Rhodoman.
(7) La Mythologie de l'Abbé Banier. tom. iii. p. 500.

V^ment. Je viens à présent à la preuve qu'on tire de quelques lignes de Lucain et que j'avoue être très plausible. Le poëte y fait connoître la source du Nil ; voici ce qu'il en dit:

——————— Tua flumina prodam
Quà Deus undarum regnator, Nile, tuarum

Te

Te mihi nosse dedit; mundi nam surgit ab axe,
Ausus in ardentem ripas attollere Cancrum:
In Borean is rectus aquis, mediumque Booten,
Cursus in occasum flexu torquetur et ortum.
Nunc Arabum populis, Lybicis nunc æquus arenis,
Teque vident primi, quærunt tamen hi quoque Seres
Æthiopumque feris alieno gurgite campos. (1)

(1) Lucan. Pharsal. l. x. v. 285.

Il paroît que le poëte dit expressément que le Nil commence au-delà du pays des Seres. Or tout le monde sait que les Seres étoient les Chinois septentrionaux. (2). La conséquence est facile à tirer. Il faut avouer de bonne foi que Lucain a fait ici une bévue; à la vérité je crois que M. Huet se trompe sur le genre de la bévue, quoique ce soit de ce genre que dépend la force ou la foiblesse de son argument. Je crois que Lucain se trompe non sur la source du Nil, mais sur la situation des Seres, (ce qui ne me fait rien,) qu'il place ceux-ci en Afrique et non celle-là en Asie. Ma thèse est aisée à prouver par le reste de ce même passage. 1. Le Nil (suivant Lucain) s'élève sous le tropique de Cancer. La seule inspection de la carte peut faire voir que cela est très vrai de l'Æthiopie, mais qu'il ne sauroit point l'être d'une région au-delà du pays des Seres. 2. Lucain dit que, quoiqu'il se courbe quelquefois un peu à droite et à gauche, cependant sa course est toujours constamment au Nord, In Borean is rectus aquis. Je ne suis point obligé de rendre raison de cette méprise de Lucain dès qu'elle n'affecte plus mon sentiment; cependant je crois qu'il ne seroit pas difficile si non de le justifier au moins de l'excuser. On pourroit

(2) Cellar. Notit. Orb. Antiq. tom. ii. 543.

dire

dire que comme les anciens appelloient les Seres primi hominum, (1) Lucain vouloit seulement faire connoître par là que le Nil venoit des extrémités du monde sans avoir en vue la situation particulière des Seres Asiatiques. Ou bien on pourroit conjecturer, non sans vraisemblance, que comme les Indiens donnèrent leur nom à l'Æthiopie pour se rappeller toujours le souvenir de leur pays, de même ils s'étoient fait un Hydaspe et des Seres. Cette pratique, fondée sur la nature, étoit fort commune aux anciens. (2)

(1) Plin. Hist. Natur. L. vi. c. 17.

(2) Virgil. Æneid. iii. v. 349.

Je crois avoir assez fait voir que ce vaste amas d'érudition que M. Huet nous présente ne n'éclaircit point la question. Mais j'aurois pu m'épargner cette peine ; j'avois une voie plus courte, c'étoit de prouver que le système du savant Prélat, quand même il seroit vrai, ne lève point les difficultés. Accordons-lui pour un moment que le Nil coule dans les Indes, par où y passe-t-il? ce n'est sûrement pas en deça de l'Indus, puisque les anciens depuis Alexandre connoissoient toute la mer jusqu'à l'embouchure de ce fleuve. Par la même raison ce ne pouvoit pas être non plus en-deça du Ganges. Il faut que les anciens ayent cru que la jonction des deux continens se faisoit à la Chine ou aux extrémités des Indes. Mais depuis les frontières de la Perse jusqu'à cette contrée il y a encore plus loin que depuis cette même Perse jusqu'à l'Egypte: et cette distance devient encore bien plus grande si, avec M. Huet, vous entendez par la Perse, la Persis proprement dite. (3) Valoit-

(3) Recueil de Dissert. tom. ii. p. 61.

loit-il la peine de faire faire tant de courses au Nil pour le laisser en plus piteux état qu'auparavant?

Mais n'y a-t-il donc aucun moyen d'expliquer ce passage? ou faut-il se condamner pour jamais à l'ignorance? J'en ai un, que je proposerai, non avec la présomption du Père Catrou, mais avec la timidité d'un critique qui sait quels obstacles les ténèbres de l'antiquité, le défaut des monumens, et surtout sa propre insuffisance, ne peuvent qu'apporter dans la recherche de la vérité.

Le mot urget signifie bien presse, avoisine, mais il veut dire aussi incommode, comme les significations figurées urgeri fame et tant d'autres montrent suffisamment. Je pose aussi en fait que le quàque indique une région distinguée de celle où étoit située Canope mais comprise dans l'Egypte, dont le P. Catrou a bien fait voir qu'il est uniquement question dans ce passage. (1) Si donc on peut trouver une contrée de l'Egypte qui étoit particulièrement sujette aux incursions des Perses nous pouvons espérer d'avoir saisi le sens de Virgile.

(1) Virgile de Catrou. tom. ii. p. 489.

La partie orientale de l'Egypte, le long de la branche Bubastique du Nil, où étoit situé Pelusium, la clef du pays, étoit toujours la plus exposée aux incursions de tous les peuples qui étoient puissans en orient. Comme les déserts de l'Arabie n'étoient proprement à personne, vu le genre de vie peu stable de leurs habitans, ils étoient un excellent canal pour toutes les nations guerrières de harceler l'Egypte. Les Assyriens, les Syriens, les Juifs, Juifs, les Iduméens, les Chaldéens, les Perses en profitèrent tour à tour. Les rois pasteurs, dès qu'ils étoient maîtres de l'Egypte, sentirent cet inconvénient de sa situation, et laissant des garnisons dans les lieux convenables, ils firent fortifier surtout la partie orientale, prévoyant qu'il prendroit en envie aux Assyriens de l'attaquer de ce côté-là : (1) "Φρουραν εν τοις επι τηδειατατοις καταλειπων τοποις, μαλιστα δε καιτα προς την Ανατολην ησφαλισατο, προορωμενος αθυριων ποτε μειζον ισχυοντων εσομενην επιθυμιαν της αυτης βασιλειας Εφοδον." Quelques siècles après Sesostris fit tirer un canal et bâtir un mur pour défendre l'Egypte des Arabes et des Syriens. (2) En un mot cette partie a toujours été tellement envisagée comme l'endroit foible que c'étoit la désigner suffisamment de dire, Quàque pharetratæ vicinia Persidis urget. Restent seulement à prouver deux choses : Que les écrivains du siècle d'Auguste appelloient les Parthes, alors maîtres de l'orient, du nom de Perses, et que ces mêmes Perses faisoient quelquefois des incursions jusqu'au Nil et en Ægypte.

(1) Joseph. contra Apion. l. i. p. 1039.

(2) Diod. Sicul l. i. p. 51.

I. Le premier point saute aux yeux à quiconque a quelque lecture des auteurs de ce beau siècle. Tous les passages d'Horace, (3) où il parle des Perses comme d'un ennemi formidable à l'empire qu'il les compte avec les Bretons, &c. ne peuvent s'entendre que des Parthes, dont l'empire avoit pris la place de celui des Perses éteint depuis Alexandre. Les véritables Persans du tems d'Auguste, bien loin d'être conquérans, étoient esclaves. Rétrécis

(3) Horat. Od. l. i. Od. 2. l. i. Od. v. 22. v. 15. l. iv. Od. 15. v. 23.

trécis dans leurs anciennes limites ils avoient bien conservé une espèce de roi, mais ce roi n'étoit au fonds qu'un satrape tributaire et sujet du grand roi des Parthes. (1) Cette méprise étoit facile à faire; les mœurs, le gouvernement, la religion des deux peuples avoient beaucoup de rapport, et un empereur Romain, qui avoit eu des avantages sur les vainqueurs de Crassus, étoit charmé, qu'on les appellât Perses, pour pouvoir lui-même être comparé à Alexandre que plusieurs empereurs admiroient et copioient particulièrement. (2) Ce n'est donc faire aucune violence aux paroles de Virgile, de les entendre des Parthes. L'épithète phare-tratæ nous y conduit naturellement. Personne n'ignore l'habileté des Parthes à se servir de l'arc.

(1) Strab. l. xv. p. 501.

(2) Les Césars de Julien, traduits par M. de Spanheim. p. 126. Rem. 404. Sueton. in Jul. c. 7. Idem, in August. c. 18.

II. Mais faisoient-ils quelquefois des incursions jusqu'en Egypte? Souvent après la mort de Crassus, vingt-cinq ans avant Virgile, ils passèrent l'Euphrate, ravagèrent toute la Syrie, (3) mirent le siège devant Antioche, et n'épargnèrent pas vraisemblablement les frontières de l'Egypte qui étoient sans défence, et qui se remettoit à peine de ses guerres civiles. (4) Une douzaine d'années après, le roi Orodes envoya son fils Pacore * en deça de l'Euphrate avec une grande armée, lui ordonnant de porter la guerre en Syrie et jusqu'aux portes d'Alexandrie. (5) Pacore exécuta ses ordres, conquit la Syrie, et ne

(3) V. le xv. Livres des Epîtres de Cicéron ad Familiares, Justin. l. xlii. c.

(4) V. Prideaux à l'an 55.

(5) Appian in Bell. Parth. p. 156. Justin. ubi supra.

* Jam bis Monæses, et Pacori manus
Non auspicatos contudit impetus Nostros, et adjecisse prædam
Torquibus exiguis renidet.
HORAT. Od. l. iii. Od. 6. c. 9.

s'en tint pas là, car après avoir ravagé la Palestine, (1) " Emanabat latius malum, "dit Florus. (2) L'Egypte devoit assez se ressentir de ces maux pour que la désignation du poëte ne renfermât point d'obscurité.

(1) Joseph. Antiq. Jud. l. xiv. c. 24. p. 494.
(2) Flor. l. iv. c. 9.

Voici mon idée sur ce passage, peut-être est-elle aussi défectueuse qu'aucune de celles que j'ai examinés. Mais dans ces sortes de recherches ce n'est qu'en tout tentant, qu'on parvient à quelque chose d'un peu assuré.

CRITI-

CRITICAL OBSERVATIONS

ON THE DESIGN

OF THE

SIXTH BOOK OF THE ÆNEID.

THE allegorical interpretation which the Bishop of Gloucester has given of the sixth book of the Æneid, seems to have been very favourably received by the public. Many writers, both at home and abroad, have mentioned it with approbation, or at least with esteem; and I have more than once heard it alleged, in the conversation of scholars, as an ingenious improvement on the plain and obvious sense of Virgil. As such, it is not undeserving of the notice of a candid critic; nor can the inquiry be void of entertainment, whilst Virgil is our constant theme. Whatever may be the fortune of the chace, we are sure it will lead us through pleasant prospects and a fine country.

That I may escape the imputation as well as the danger of misrepresenting his lordship's hypothesis, I shall expose it in his own words. "The purpose of this discourse is to shew that Æneas's adventure to the INFERNAL SHADES, is no other than a figurative description of his INITIATION

INTO THE MYSTERIES; and particularly a very exact one of the SPECTACLES of the ELEUSINIAN."* This general notion is supported with singular ingenuity, dressed up with an easy yet pompous display of learning, and delivered in a style much fitter for the Hierophant of Eleusis, than for a modern critic, who is observing a remote object through the medium of a glimmering and doubtful light:

Ibant obscuri, solâ sub nocte, per umbram.

His lordship naturally enough pursues two different methods, which unite, as he apprehends, in the same conclusion. From general principles peculiar to himself, he infers the propriety and even necessity of such a description of the mysteries; and from a comparison of particular circumstances, he labours to prove that Virgil has actually introduced it into the Æneid. Each of these methods shall be considered separately.

As the learned Prelate's opinions branch themselves out into luxuriant systems, it is not easy to resume them in a few words. I shall, however, attempt to give a short idea of those general principles, which occupy, I know not how, so great a share of the Divine Legation of Moses demonstrated.

"The whole system of Paganism, of which the mysteries were an essential part, was instituted by

* See Warburton's Dissertation, &c. in the third volume of Mr. Warton's Virgil. I shall quote indifferently that Dissertation or the Divine Legation itself.

the

the ancient lawgivers for the support and benefit of society. The mysteries themselves were a school of morality and religion, in which the vanity of Polytheism,* and the unity of the First Cause, were revealed to the initiated. Virgil, who intended his immortal poem for a republic in action, as those of Plato and Tully were in precept, could not avoid displaying this first and noblest art of government. His perfect lawgiver must be initiated, as the ancient founders of states had been before him; and as Augustus himself was many ages afterwards."

What a crowd of natural reflections must occur to an unbiassed mind! Was the civil magistrate the mover of the whole machine; the sole contriver, or at least the sole support of religion? Were ancient laws ALWAYS designed for the benefit of the people, and NEVER for the private interest of the lawgiver? Could the first fathers of rude societies instruct their new-made subjects in philosophy as well as in agriculture? Did they all agree, in Britain as in Egypt, in Persia as in Greece, to found these secret schools on the same common principle; which subsisted nearly eighteen hundred years at Eleusis† in its primæval purity? Can these things be? Yes, replies the learned Prelate, they are: "Egypt was the mysterious mother of Religion and Policy; and the arts of Egypt were diffused with her colonies over the ancient world. Inachus carried the mysteries into Greece, Zoroaster into Persia,* &c. &c."—I retire from so wide a field, in which it would be easy for me to lose both myself and my adversary. The ANCIENT WORLD, EIGHTEEN CENTURIES, and FOUR HUNDRED AUTHORS GENUINE AND APOCRYPHAL,† would, under tolerable management, fur-

* At least of the vulgar polytheism, by revealing that the dii majorum gentium had been mere mortals.

† From their institution, 1399 years before the Christian æra, (Marm. Arundel. Ep. 14.) till their suppression, towards the end of the fourth century.

* Though I hate to be positive, yet I would almost venture to affirm, that Zoroaster's connection with Egypt is no where to be found, except in the D. L.

† See a list of four hundred authors, quoted, &c. in the D. L. from St. Austin and Aristotle down to Scarron and Rabelais. Amongst these authors we may observe Sanchoniatho, Orpheus, Zaleucus, Charondas, the Oracles of Porphyry, and the History of Jeffrey of Monmouth.

The bishop has entered the lists with the tremendous Bentley, who treated the laws of Zaleucus and Charondas as the forgeries of a sophist. A whole section of mistakes or misrepresentations is devoted to this controversy: but Bentley is no more, and W——n may sleep in peace.

I shall, however, disturb his repose, by asking him on what authority he supposes that the old language of the Twelve Tables was altered for the convenience of succeeding ages. The fragments of those laws, collected by Lipsius, Sylburgius, &c. bear the stamp of the most remote antiquity. Lipsius himself (tom. i. p. 206) was highly delighted with those antiquissima verba: but what is much more decisive, Horace (L. ii. Ep. i. ver. 23), Seneca (Epistol. 114), and Aulus Gellius (XX. 1), rank those laws amongst the oldest remains of the Latin tongue. Their obsolete language was admired by the lawyers, ridiculed by the wits, and pleaded by the friends of antiquity as an excuse for the frequent obscurities of that code.

Had an adversary to the Divine Legation been guilty of this mistake, I am afraid it would have been styled an egregious blunder.

nish

nish some volumes of controversy; and since I have perused the two thousand and fourteen pages of the unfinished Legation, I have less inclination than ever to spin out volumes of laborious trifles.

I shall, however, venture to point out a fact, not very agreeable to the favourite notion, that Paganism was entirely the religion of the magistrate. The oracles were not less ancient, nor less venerable than the mysteries. Every difficulty, religious or civil, was submitted to the decision of those infallible tribunals. During several ages no war could be undertaken, no colony founded, without the sanction of the Delphic oracle; the first and most celebrated among several hundred others.* Here then we might expect to perceive the directing hand of the magistrate. Yet when we study their history with attention, instead of the alliance between church and state, we can discover only the ancient alliance between the avarice of the priest and the credulity of the people.

For my own part, I am very apt to consider the mysteries in the same light as the oracles. An intimate connection subsisted between them:†

* See Vandale de Oraculis, p. 559. That valuable book contains whatever can now be known of oracles. I have borrowed his facts; and could with great ease have borrowed his quotations.

† The prophet Alexander, whose arts are so admirably laid open by Lucian, instituted his oracle and his mysteries as regular parts of the same plan. It is here we may say, with the learned catholic, "Les nouveaux Saints me font douter des anciens."

Both were preceded and accompanied with fasts, sacrifices, and lustrations; with mystic sights and preternatural sounds: But the most essential preparation for the ASPIRANT, was a general confession of his past life, which was exacted of him by the priest. In return for this implicit confidence, the Hierophant conferred on the initiated a sacred character; and promised them a peculiar place of happiness in the Elysian fields, whilst the souls of the profane (however virtuous they had been) were wallowing in the mire.* Nor did the priests of the mysteries neglect to recommend to the brethren a spirit of friendship, and the love of virtue; so pleasing even to the most corrupt minds, and so requisite to render any society respectable in its own eyes. Of all these religious societies, that of Eleusis was the most illustrious. From being peculiar to the inhabitants of Attica, it became at last common to the whole Pagan world. Indeed, I should suspect that it was much indebted to the genius of the Athenian writers, who bestowed fame and dignity on whatever had the least connection with their country; nor am I surprised that Cicero and Atticus, who were both initiated, should express themselves with enthusiasm, when they speak of the sacred rites of their beloved Athens.

But our curiosity is yet unsatisfied; we would press forwards into the sanctuary; and are eager to learn WHAT was the SECRET which was revealed to the initiated, and to them alone. Many of the profane, possessed of leisure and ingenuity, have tried to guess, what has been so religiously concealed. The SECRET of each is curious and philosophical; for as soon as we attempt this inquiry, the honour of the mysteries becomes our own.* I too could frame an hypothesis, as plausible perhaps, and as uncertain as any of theirs, did I not feel myself checked by the apprehension of discovering what never existed.† I admire the discretion of the initiated; but the best security for discretion is, the vanity of concealing that we have nothing to reveal.

* See Diogen. Laert. vi. 39. and Menag. ad loc.

to

* I shall sum them up in a curious passage of the celebrated Freret. " Les sectes philosophiques cherchoient à deviner le dogme caché sous le voile des cérémonies; et tachoient de le ramener chacune à leur doctrine. Dans l'hypothèse des Epicuriens, adoptée de nos jours par MM. Leclerc et Warburton," (Leclerc adopted it in the year 1687; Mr. Warburton invented it in the year 1738,) " tout ce qu'on révéloit aux adeptes après tant de préparatifs et d'épreuves, c'est que les dieux adorés du vulgaire, avoient été des hommes, &c. Les Stoiciens et les Hylozoistes supposoient qu'on enseignoit aux Initiés, qu'il n'y avoit d'autres dieux que les élémens et les parties de l'univers matériel. Enfin suivant les nouveaux Platoniciens, ces symboles servoient à couvrir les dogmes d'une théologie et d'une philosophie sublimes, enseignées autrefois par les Egyptiens et les Chaldéens." M. Freret inclines, though with great diffidence, to the last opinion. Mém. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, &c. tom. xxi. p. 12. Hist.

† Je ne suis pas si convaincu de notre ignorance par les choses qui sont, et dont la raison nous est inconnue, que par celles qui ne sont point, et dont nous trouvons la raison. Oeuvres de Fontenelle, tom. xi. p. 229.

The

The examples of great men, when they cannot serve as models, may serve as warnings to us. I should be very sorry to have discovered, that an ATHEISTICAL HISTORY* was used in the celebration of the mysteries, to prove the unity of the First Cause, and that an ANCIENT HYMN† was sung, for the edification of the devout Athenians, which was most probably a MODERN FORGERY of some Jewish or Christian Impostor. Had I delivered THESE TWO DISCOVERIES, with an air of confidence and triumph, I should be still more mortified.

After all, as I am not apt to give the name of Demonstration to what is mere conjecture, his lordship may take advantage of my scepticism, and still affirm, that his favourite mysteries were schools of theism, instituted by the lawgiver. Yet unless Æneas is the lawgiver of Virgil's republic, he has no more business with the mysteries of

* The Fragment of Sanchoniatho's Phœnician History. Eusebius and Bishop Cumberland have already observed, that the formation of the world is there attributed to the blind powers of matter, without the least mention of an intelligent cause.

† Orpheus's Hymn to Musæus, quoted by Justin Martyr, and several other fathers, but rejected as spurious by Cudworth, (Intellectual System, p. 300,) by Leclerc, (Hist. Eccl. p. 692), and by Dr. Jortin (Remarks on Ecclesiastical Hist. vol. i. p. 199). The first of these, the immortal Cudworth, is often celebrated by the Bishop of Gloucester; Leclerc's literary character is established; and with respect to Dr. Jortin, I will venture to call him a learned and moderate critic. The few who may not choose to confess, that their objections are unanswerable, will allow that they deserve to be answered.

Athens.

Athens, than with the laws of Sparta. We will, therefore, reflect a moment on the true nature and plan of the Æneid.

An epic fable must be important as well as interesting: great actions, great virtues, and great distresses, are the peculiar province of heroic poetry. This rule seems to have been dictated by nature and experience, and is very different from those chains in which genius has been bound by artificial criticism. The importance I speak of, is not indeed always dependant on the rank or names of the personages. Columbus, exploring a new world with three sloops and ninety sailors, is a hero worthy of the epic muse; yet our imagination would be much more strongly affected by the image of a virtuous prince saved from the ruins of his country, and conducting his faithful followers through unknown seas and through hostile lands. Such is the hero of the Æneid. But his peculiar situation suggested other beauties to the Poet, who had an opportunity of adorning his subject with whatever was most pleasing in Grecian fable, or most illustrious in Roman history. Æneas had fought under the walls of Ilium; and conducted to the banks of the Tiber a colony from which Rome claimed her origin.

The character of the hero is expressed by one of his friends in a few words; and though drawn by a friend, does not seem to be flattered:

> Rex erat Æneas nobis; quo justior alter
> Nec pietate fuit, nec bello major et armis.*

* Æneid, i. 548.

These

These three virtues, of JUSTICE, of PIETY, of VALOUR, are finely supported throughout the poem.*

1. I shall here mention one instance of the hero's justice, which has been less noticed than its singularity seems to deserve.

After Evander had entertained his guests, with a sublime simplicity, he lamented, that his age and want of power made him a very useless ally. However, he points out auxiliaries, and a cause worthy of a hero. The Etruscans, tired out with the repeated tyrannies of Mezentius, had driven that monarch from his throne, and reduced him to implore the protection of Turnus. Unsatisfied with freedom, the Etruscans called loudly for revenge; and in the poet's opinion, revenge was justice.

> Ergo omnis furiis surrexit Etruria justis:
> Regem ad Supplicium presenti Marte reposcunt.†

Æneas, with the approbation of gods and men, accepts the command of these brave rebels, and punishes the tyrant with the death he so well deserved. The conduct of Æneas and the Etruscans may, in point of justice, seem doubtful to

* M. de Voltaire condemns the latter part of the Æneid, as far inferior in fire and spirit to the former. As quoted in the Legation, he thinks that Virgil > —— s'épuise avec Didon et rate à la fin Lavinie;

a pretty odd quotation for a Bishop; but I most sincerely hope, that neither his lordship nor Mrs. W———n are acquainted with the true meaning of the word rater.

† Æneid, viii. 495.

many;

many; the sentiments of the poet cannot appear equivocal to any one. Milton himself, I mean the Milton of the commonwealth, could not have asserted with more energy the daring pretensions of the people, to punish as well as to resist a tyrant. Such opinions, published by a writer whom we are taught to consider as the creature of Augustus, have a right to surprise us; yet they are strongly expressive of the temper of the times; the republic was subverted, but the minds of the Romans were still republican.

2. Æneas's piety has been more generally confessed than admired. St. Evremond laughs at it as unsuitable to his own temper. The Bishop of Gloucester defends it, as agreeable to his own system of the lawgiver's religion. The French wit was too superficial, the English scholar too profound, to attend to the plain narration of the Poet, and the peculiar circumstances of ancient heroes. We believe from faith and reason: THEY believed from the report of their senses. Æneas had seen the Grecian divinities overturning the foundations of fated Troy. He was personally acquainted with his mother Venus, and with his persecutor Juno. Mercury, who commanded him to leave Carthage, was as present to his eyes as Dido, who strove to detain him. Such a knowledge of religion, founded on sense and experience, must insinuate itself into every instant of our lives, and determine every action. All this is, indeed, fiction; but it is fiction in which we choose to acquiesce, and which we justly consider as the charm of poetry. If we allow, allow, that Æneas lived in an intimate commerce with superior beings, we must likewise allow his love or his fear, his confidence or his gratitude, towards those beings, to display themselves on every proper occasion. Far from thinking Æneas too pious, I am sometimes surprised at his want of faith. Forgetful of the Fates, which had so often and so clearly pointed out the destined shores of Latium, he deliberates whether he shall not sit down quietly in the fields of Sicily. An apparition of his father is necessary to divert him from this impious and ungenerous design.

3. A hero's valour will not bear the rude breath of suspicion; yet has the courage of Æneas suffered from an unguarded expression of the Poet:

> Extemplò Æneæ solvuntur frigore membra; > Ingemit.*

On every other occasion the Trojan chief is daring without rashness, and prudent without timidity. In that dreadful night, when Troy was delivered up to her hostile gods, he performed every duty of a soldier, a patriot, and a son.

> —— Moriamur, et in media arma ruamus.
> Una salus victis, nullam sperare salutem.†

> Iliaci cineres, et flamma extrema meorum,
> Testor, in occasu vestro, nec tela, nec ullas
> Vitavisse vices Danaûm; et, si fata fuissent
> Ut caderem, meruisse manu.‡

To quote other proofs of the same nature would be to copy the six last books of the Æneid. I can-

* Æneid, i. 96. † Idem, ii. 353. ‡ Idem, ii. 431.

not,

not, however, forbear mentioning the calm and superior intrepidity of the hero, when, after the perfidy of the Rutuli, and his wound, he rushed again to the field, and restored victory by his presence alone.

> Ipse neque aversos dignatur sternere morti;
> Nec pede congressos æquo, nec tela ferentes
> Insequitur: solum densa in caligine Turnum > Vestigat lustrans, solum in certamina poscit.*

At length, indignant that his victim has escaped, his contempt gives way to fury:

> Jam tandem invadit medios, et Marte secundo
> Terribilis, sævam nullo discrimine cædem
> Suscitat, irarumque omnes effundit habenas.†

The heroic character of Æneas has been understood and admired by every attentive reader. But to discover the LAWGIVER in Æneas, and A SYSTEM OF POLITICS in the Æneid, required the CRITICAL TELESCOPE‡ of the great W——n. The naked eye of common sense cannot reach so far. I revolve

* Æneid, xii. 464. † Idem. xii. 497.

‡ Others are furnished by criticism with a telescope. They see with great clearness whatever is too remote to be discovered by the rest of mankind; but are totally blind to all that lies immediately before them. They discover in every passage some secret meaning, some remote allusion, some artful allegory, or some occult imitation, which no other reader ever suspected: but they have no perception of the cogency of arguments, the contexture of narration, the various colours of diction, or the flowery embellishments of fancy. Of all that engages the attention of others they are totally insensible; while they pry into the worlds of conjecture, and amuse themselves with phantoms in the clouds. Rambler.

in

in my memory the harmonious sense of Virgil: Virgil seems as ignorant as myself of his political character. I return to the less pleasing pages of the Legation: so far from condescending to proofs, the Author of the Legation is even sparing of conjectures.

"Many political instructions may be drawn from the Æneid." And from what book which treats of MAN, and the adventures of human life, may they not be drawn? His Lordship's chemistry (did his hypothesis require it) would extract a SYSTEM OF POLICY from the ARABIAN NIGHTS ENTERTAINMENTS.

"A system of policy delivered in the example of a great prince must show him in every public occurrence of life. Hence, Æneas was of necessity to be found voyaging with Ulysses, and fighting with Achilles."*

There is another public occurrence, at least as much in the character of a LAWGIVER, as either voyaging or fighting; I mean GIVING LAWS. Except in a single line,† Æneas never appears in that occupation. In Sicily, he compliments Acestes with the honour of giving laws to the colony, which he himself had founded:

> Interea Æneas urbem designat aratro,
> Sortiturque domos: hoc Ilium, et hæc loca Trojæ
> Esse jubet. Gaudet regno Trojanus Acestes,
> Indicitque forum, et patribus dat jura vocatis.‡

In the solemn treaty, which is to fix the fate of

* D. L. vol. i. p. 212. † Æneid, iii. 137. ‡ Idem, v. 755.

his his posterity, he disclaims any design of innovating the laws of Latium. On the contrary, he only demands a hospitable seat for his gods and his Trojans; and professes to leave the whole authority to King Latinus:

> Non ego, nec Teucris Italos parere jubebo,
> Nec mihi regna peto: paribus se legibus ambæ
> Invictæ gentes æterna in fœdera mittant.
> Sacra deosque dabo: socer arma Latinus habeto,
> Imperium solemne socer: mihi mœnia Teucri > Constituent, urbique dabit Lavinia nomen.*

"But, after all, is not the fable of the Æneid the establishment of an empire?" Yes, in one sense, I grant it is. Æneas had many external difficulties to struggle with. When the Latins were defeated, Turnus slain, and Juno appeased, these difficulties were removed. The hero's labour was over, the lawgiver's commenced from that moment; and, as if Virgil had a design against the bishop's system, at that very moment the Æneid ends. Virgil, who corrected with judgment and felt with enthusiasm, thought perhaps, that the sober arts of peace could never interest a reader, whose mind had been so long agitated with scenes of distress and slaughter. He might perhaps say, like the Sylla of Montesquieu, "J'aime à remporter des victoires, à fonder ou détruire des états, à faire des ligues, à punir un usurpateur; mais pour ces minces détails de gouvernement, où les génies médiocres ont tant d'avantages, cette lente

* Æneid, xii. 189.

exécution des loix, cette discipline d'une milice tranquille, mon ame ne sçauroit s'en occuper."*

Had Virgil designed to compose a POLITICAL INSTITUTE, the example of Fenelon, his elegant imitator, may give us some notion of the manner in which he would have proceeded. The preceptor of the Duke of Burgundy professedly designed to educate a prince for the happiness of the people. Every incident in his pleasing romance is subservient to that great end. The goddess of wisdom, in a human shape, conducts her pupil through a varied series of instructive adventure; and every adventure is a lesson or a warning for Telemachus. The pride of Sesostris, the tyranny of Pygmalion, the perfidy of Adrastus, and the imprudence of Idomeneus, are displayed in their true light. The innocence of the inhabitants of Bœtica, the commerce of Tyre, and the wise laws of Crete and Salentum, instructed the prince of the various means by which a people may be made happy. From the Telemachus of Fenelon, I could pass with pleasure to the Cyropœdia of Xenophon. But I should be led too far from my subject, were I to attempt to lay open the true nature and design of that philosophical history. We must return from Fenelon and Xenophon to the Bishop of Gloucester.

His Lordship props the legislative character of Æneas with an additional support: "Augustus, who was shadowed in the person of Æneas, was initiated initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries.* Ergo, &c." This doctrine of types and shadows, though true in general, has on this, as well as on graver occasions, produced a great abuse of reason, or at least of reasoning. To confine myself to Virgil, I shall only say, that he was too judicious to compliment the emperor at the expense of good sense and probability. Every age has its manners; and the poet must suit his hero to the age, and not the age to his hero. It is easy to give instances of this truth. Marc Antony, when defeated and besieged in Alexandria, challenged his competitor to decide their quarrel by a single combat. This was rejected by Augustus with contempt and derision, as the last effort of a desperate man;† and the world applauded the prudence of Augustus, who preferred the part of a general to that of a gladiator. The temper and good sense of Virgil must have made him view things in the same light; yet, when Virgil introduces Æneas in similar circumstances, he gives him a quite different conduct. The hero wishes to spare the innocent people, provokes Turnus to a single combat, and, even after the perfidy and last defeat of the Rutuli, is still ready to risk his person and victory, against the unhappy life and desperate fortunes of his rival. The laws of honour are different in different ages; and a behaviour which in Augustus was decent, would have covered Æneas with infamy.

* Oeuvres de Montesquieu, tom. iii. p. 555.

* D. L. vol. i. p. 228.

† Plutarch, in Vit. M. Anton. tom. i. 950. edit. Wechel.

We may apply this observation to the very case of the Eleusinian mysteries. Augustus was initiated into them, at a time when Eleusis was become the COMMON TEMPLE OF THE UNIVERSE. The Trojan hero could not, with the smallest propriety, set him that example; as the Trojan hero lived in an age when those rites were confined to the natives of Greece, and even of Attica.*

I have now wandered through the scientific maze in which the Bishop of Gloucester has concealed his first and general argument. It appears (when resumed) to amount to this irrefragable demonstration, "THAT IF THE MYSTERIES WERE INSTITUTED BY LEGISLATORS, (which they probably were not,) ÆNEAS (who was no legislator) MUST OF COURSE BE INITIATED INTO THEM BY THE POET."

And here I shall mention a collateral reason assigned by his Lordship, which might engage Virgil to introduce a description of the mysteries: the PRACTICE OF OTHER POETS. This proof is so exceedingly brittle, that I fear to handle it; and shall report it faithfully in the words of our ingenious critic:†

"Had the old poem under the name of Orpheus been now extant, it would perhaps have shewn us, that no more was meant than Orpheus's initia-

* Plutarch, in Vit. Thesei, tom. i. p. 16. Herodot. viii. 65. Cicero de Nat. Deor. i. 42. The gradation of Athenians, Greeks, and mankind at large, may be traced in these passages.

† D. L. vol. i. p. 233.

tion;

tion; and that the hint of this Sixth Book was taken from thence."

As nothing now remains of that old poem, except the title, it is not altogether so easy to guess what it would or would not have shewn us.

" But farther, it was customary for the poets of the Augustan age to exercise themselves on the subject of the mysteries, as appears from Cicero, who desires Atticus, then at Athens, and initiated, to send to Chilius, a poet of eminence, on account of the Eleusinian mysteries; in order, as it should seem, to insert them in some poem he was then writing."

The Eleusinian mysteries are not mentioned in the original passage. Cicero using the obscure brevity of familiar letters, desires that Atticus would send their friend Chilius, ΕΥΜΟΛΠΙΔΩΝ ΠΑΤΡΙΑ,* which may signify twenty different things, relative either to the worship of Ceres in particular, or to the Athenian institutions in general; but which can hardly be applied to the Eleusinian mysteries.†

* Chilius te rogat, et ego ejus rogatû, ευμολπιδων πατρια. Cicero ad Attic, i. 9.

† As the Bishop of Gloucester alleges the authority of Victorius, I shall shelter myself under the names and reasons of Grœvius and the Abbé Mongault, and even transcribe the words of the former. " Non est ut hic intelligentur ritus illi secretiores, qui tantùm mystis noti erant, et sine capitis periculo vulgari non poterant, sed illa sacra et ceremoniæ, quibus in Eleusiniis celebrandis utebantur in omnium oculis Eumolpidæ; quasque poetæ et prisci scriptores alii commemorant passim: aut fortè per Eumolpidas intelligit tectè ipsos Athenienses: ut petierit Chilius, Atheniensium leges et disciplinam sibi describi et mitti."

"Thus it appears that both the ancient and modern poets afforded Virgil a pattern for thi famous episode."

How does this appear? From an old poem, of whose contents the critic is totally ignorant, and from an obscure passage, the meaning of which he has most probably mistaken.

Instead of conjecturing what Virgil might or ought to do, it would seem far more natural to examine what he has done. The Bishop of Gloucester attempts to prove, that the descent to hell is properly an initiation; since the Sixth Book of the Æneid really contains the secret doctrine as well as the ceremonies of the Eleusinian mysteries.

What was this SECRET DOCTRINE? As I profess my ignorance, we must consult the oracle. "The secret doctrine of the mysteries revealed to the initiated, that JUPITER . . . . AND THE WHOLE RABBLE OF LICENTIOUS DEITIES WERE ONLY DEAD MORTALS."* Is any thing like this laid open in the Sixth Book of Virgil? Not the remotest hint of it can be discovered throughout the whole book; and thus, to use his Lordship's own words, SOMETHING (I had almost written EVERY THING) is still wanting "to complete the IDENTIFICATION."†

Notwithstanding this disappointment, which is cautiously concealed from the reader, the learned Bishop still courses round the Elysian Fields in quest

* D. L. vol. i. p. 154. † Idem, p. 277.

quest of a secret. Once he is so lucky as to find Æneas talking with the poet Musæus, whom tradition has reckoned among the founders of the Eleusinian mysteries. The critic listens to their conversation; but, alas! Æneas is only inquiring, in what part of the garden he may find his father's shade; to which Musæus returns a very polite answer. Anchises himself is our last hope. As that venerable shade explains to his son some mysterious doctrines, concerning the universal mind and the transmigration of souls, his Lordship is pleased to assure us, that these are THE HIDDEN DOCTRINES OF PERFECTION revealed only to the initiated. Let us for a moment lay aside hypothesis, and read Virgil.

It is observable, that the three great poets of Rome were all addicted to the Epicurean philosophy; a system, however, the least suited to a poet; since it banishes all the genial and active powers of nature, to substitute in their room a dreary void, blind atoms, and indolent gods. A description of the infernal shades was incompatible with the ideas of a philosopher whose disciples boasted, that he had rescued the captive world from the tyranny of religion, and the fear of a future state. These ideas Virgil was obliged to reject: but he does still more; he abandons not only the CHANCE of Epicurus, but even these gods, whom he so nobly employs in the rest of his poem, that he may offer to the reader's imagination a far more specious and splendid set of ideas:

Principio cœlum, ac terras, camposque liquentes,
Lucentemque globum lunæ, Titaniaque astra
Spiritus intus alit, totamque infusa per artus
Mens agitat molem, et magno se corpore miscet.*

The more we examine these lines, the more we shall feel the sublime poetry of them. But they have likewise an air of philosophy, and even of religion, which goes off on a nearer approach. The mind which is INFUSED† into the several parts of matter, and which MINGLES ITSELF with the mighty mass, scarcely retains any property of a spiritual substance; and bears too near an affinity to the principles, which the impious Spinoza revived rather than invented.

I am not insensible, that we should be slow to suspect, and still slower to condemn. The poverty of human language, and the obscurity of human ideas, make it difficult to speak worthily of THE GREAT FIRST CAUSE. Our most religious poets, in striving to express the presence and energy of the Deity, in every part of the universe, deviate unwarily into images, which are scarcely distinguished from materialism. Thus our Ethic Poet:

All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body Nature is, and God the soul;‡

and several passages of Thomson require a like favourable

* Æneid, vi. 724.

† Quomodo porro Deus iste si nihil esset nisi animus, aut infixus aut infusus esset in mundo. Cicero de Naturâ Deor. L. i. c. 11.

‡ Pope's Essay on Man, Epist. i. ver. 367.

vourable construction. But these writers deserve that favour, by the sublime manner in which they celebrate the great Father of the Universe, and by those effusions of love and gratitude, which are inconsistent with the materialist's system. Virgil has no such claim to our indulgence. THE MIND of the UNIVERSE is rather a metaphysical than a theological being. His intellectual qualities are faintly distinguished from the powers of matter, and his moral attributes, the source of all religious worship, form no part of Virgil's creed.

Yet is this creed approved* by our orthodox prelate, as free from any mixture of Spinozism. I congratulate his Lordship on his indulgent and moderate temper. His brethren (I mean those of former times) had much sharper eyes for spying out a latent heresy. Yet I cannot easily persuade myself, that Virgil's notions were ever the creed of a religious society, like that of the mysteries. Luckily, indeed, I have no occasion to persuade myself of it; unless I should prefer his Lordship's mere authority to the voice of antiquity, which assures me, that this system was either invented or imported into Greece by Pythagoras; from the writings of whose disciples Virgil might so very naturally borrow it.

Anchises then proceeds to inform his son, that the souls both of men and of animals were of celestial origin, and (as I understand him) parts of the universal mind; but that by their union with earthly bodies they contracted such impurities as even death could not purge away. Many expiations, continues the venerable shade, are requisite, before the soul, restored to its original simplicity, is capable of a place in Elysium. The far greater part are obliged to revisit the upper world, in other characters and in other bodies; and thus, by gradual steps, to reascend towards their first perfection.

* D. L. vol. i. p. 278.

This moral transmigration was undoubtedly taught in the mysteries. As the Bishop asserts this from the best authority, we are surprised at a sort of diffidence, unusual to his Lordship, when he advances things from his own intuitive knowledge. In one place, this transmigration is part of the hidden doctrine of perfection;* in another, it is one of those principles which were promiscuously communicated to all.† The truth seems to be, that his Lordship was afraid to rank among the secrets of the mysteries, what was professed and believed by so many nations and philosophers. The pre-existence of the human soul is a very natural idea; and from that idea speculations and fables of its successive revolution through various bodies will arise. From Japan to Egypt, the transmigration has been part of the popular and religious creed.‡ Pythagoras § and Plato ‖ have endeavoured

* D. L. vol. i. p. 279. † Idem, p. 142.

‡ See our modern relations of Japan, China, India, &c. and for Egypt, Herodotus, L. ii.

§ Ovid. Metamorph. xv. 69, &c. 158, &c.

‖ Plato in Phædro and in Republic. L. x.

to

to demonstrate the truth of it, by facts, as well as by arguments.

Of all these visions (which should have been confined to the poets) none is more pleasing and sublime, than that which Virgil has invented. Æneas sees before him his posterity, the heroes of ancient Rome; a long series of airy forms

Demanding life, impatient for the skies, and prepared to assume, with their new bodies, the little passions and transient glories of their destined lives.

Having * thus revealed the secret doctrine of the mysteries, the learned Prelate examines the ceremonies. With the assistance of Meursius,† he pours out a torrent of erudition to convince us, that the scenes through which Æneas passed in his descent to the shades, were the same as were represented to the aspirants in the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries. From thence his Lordship draws his great conclusion, that the descent is no more than an emblem of the hero's initiation.

A staunch polemic will feed a dispute, by dwelling on every accessary circumstance, whilst a candid critic will confine himself to the more essential points of it. I shall, therefore, readily allow, what I believe may in general be true, that the mysteries exhibited a theatrical representation of all that

* I shall mention here, once for all, that I do not always confine myself to the ORDER of his Lordship's PROOFS.

† Meursii Eleusinia, sive de Cereris Eleusinæ sacro.

was

was believed or imagined of the lower world; that the aspirant was conducted through the mimic scenes of Erebus, Tartarus, and Elysium; and that a warm enthusiast in describing these awful spectacles, might express himself as if he had actually visited the infernal regions.* All this I can allow, and yet allow nothing to the Bishop of Gloucester's hypothesis. It is not surprising that the COPY was like the ORIGINAL; but it still remains undetermined, WHETHER VIRGIL INTENDED TO DESCRIBE THE ORIGINAL OR THE COPY.

Lear and Garrick, when on the stage, are the same; nor is it possible to distinguish the player from the monarch. In the green-room, or after the representation, we easily perceive, what the warmth of fancy and the justness of imitation had concealed from us. In the same manner it is from extrinsical circumstances, that we may expect the discovery of Virgil's allegory. Every one of those circumstances persuades me, that Virgil described a real, not a mimic world, and that the scene lay in the infernal shades, and not in the temple of Ceres.

The singularity of the Cumæan shores must be present to every traveller who has once seen them. To a superstitious mind, the thin crust, vast cavities, sulphureous steams, poisonous exhalations, and fiery torrents, may seem to trace out the narrow confines of the two worlds. The lake Avernus was the chief object of religious horror; the black woods

* See D. L. vol. i. particularly p. 280.

woods which surrounded it, when Virgil first came to Naples, were perfectly suited to feed the superstition of the people.* It was generally believed, that this deadly flood was the entrance of hell;† and an oracle was once established on its banks, which pretended, by magic rites, to call up the departed spirits.‡ Æneas, who revolved a more daring enterprise, addresses himself to the priestess of those dark regions. Their conversation may perhaps inform us, whether an initiation, or a descent to the shades, was the object of this enterprise. She endeavours to deter the hero, by setting before him all the dangers of his rash undertaking:

——— Facilis descensus Averni:
Noctes atque dies patet atri janua Ditis;
Sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad auras,
Hoc opus, hic labor est.§

These particulars are absolutely irreconcileable with the idea of initiation, but perfectly agreeable to that of a real descent. That every step, and every instant, may lead us to the grave is a melancholy truth. The mysteries were only open at stated times, a few days at most in the course of the year. The mimic descent of the mysteries was laborious and dangerous, the return to light

* Strabo, L. v. p. 168.
† Silius Italicus, L. xii.
‡ Diod. Sicul. L. iv. p. 267. edit. Wesseling.
§ Æneid, vi. 126.

easy

easy and certain. In real death, this order is inverted:

> ——— Pauci, quos æquus amavit
> Jupiter, aut ardens evexit ad æthera virtus, > Diis geniti, potuere.*

These heroes, as we learn from the speech of Æneas, were Hercules, Orpheus, Castor and Pollux, Theseus, and Pirithous. Of all these, antiquity believed, that before their death they had seen the habitations of the dead; nor, indeed, will any of the circumstances tally with a supposed initiation. The adventure of Eurydice, the alternate life of the brothers, and the forcible intrusion of Alcides, Theseus, and Pirithous, would mock the endeavours of the most subtle critic, who should try to melt them down into his favourite mysteries. The exploits of Hercules, who triumphed over the king of terrors, > Tartareum ille manu custodem in vincla petivit, > Ipsius à solio regis traxitque trementem;†

was a wild imagination of the Greeks.‡ But it was the duty of ancient poets to adopt and embellish these popular traditions; and it is the interest of every man of taste, to acquiesce in THEIR POETICAL FICTIONS.

After this, we may leave ingenious men to search out what, or whether any thing gave rise to those

* Æneid, vi. 129. † Idem, vi. 395.
‡ Homer, Odyss. L. xi. ver. 623. Apoll. Biblioth. L. ii. c. 5.

idle

idle stories. Diodorus Siculus represents Pluto as a kind of undertaker, who made great improvements in the useful art of funerals.* Some have sought for the poetic hell in the mines of Epirus,† and others in the mysteries of Egypt. As this last notion was published in French,‡ six years before it was invented in English,§ the learned author of the D. L. has been severely treated by some ungenerous adversaries.‖ Appearances, it must be confessed, wear a very suspicious aspect: but what are appearances, when weighed against his lordship's declaration, "That this is a point of honour in which he is particularly delicate; and that he may venture to boast, that he believes no author was ever more averse to take to himself what belonged to another."¶ Besides, he has enriched this mysterious discovery with many collateral arguments, which would for ever have

* Diodor. Sicul. L. v. p. 386. Edit. Wesseling.

† Leclerc Biblioth. Universelle, tom. vi. p. 55.

‡ By the Abbé Terasson, in his philosophical romance of Sethos, printed at Amsterdam in the year 1732. See the third book, from beginning to end. The author was a scholar and a philosopher. His book has far more variety and originality than Telemachus. Yet Sethos is forgotten, and Telemachus will be immortal. That harmony of style, and the great talent of speaking to the heart and passions, which Fenelon possessed, was unknown to Terasson. I am not surprised that Homer was admired by the one, and criticized by the other.

§ See D. L. vol. i. p. 228, &c. The first edition was printed in London, in the year 1738.

‖ Cowper's Life of Socrates, p. 102.

¶ Letter from a late professor of Oxford, &c. p. 133.

escaped

escaped all inferior critics. In the case of Hercules, for instance, he demonstrates, that the initiation and the descent to the shades were the same thing, because an ancient has affirmed that they were different;* and that Alcides was initiated at Eleusis, before he set out for Tænarus, in order to descend to the infernal regions.

There is, however, a single circumstance, in the narration of Virgil, which has justly surprised critics, unacquainted with any but the obvious sense of the poet; I mean the IVORY GATE. The Bishop of Gloucester seizes this, as the secret mark of allegory, and becomes eloquent in the exultation of triumph.† I could, however, represent to him, that in a work which was deprived of the author's last revision, Virgil might too hastily employ what Homer had invented, and at last unwarily slide into an Epicurean idea.‡ Let this be as it may, an obscure expression is a weak basis for an elaborate system; and whatever his lordship may choose to do, I had much rather reproach my favourite poet with want of care in one line, than with want of taste throughout a whole book.§

Virgil

* D. L. vol. iii. p. 277.

† Idem, vol. i. p. 229.

‡ Idem, vol. i. p. 283.

§ Horace seems to have used as unguarded an expression:

——— Et adscribi quietis
Ordinibus patiar deorum.—Od. L. iii. 3.

The word and idea of Quietus are perfectly Epicurean; but rather clash

Virgil has borrowed, as usual, from Homer his episode of the infernal shades, and, as usual, has infinitely improved what the Grecian had invented. If, among a profusion of beauties, I durst venture to point out the most striking beauties of the Sixth Book, I should perhaps observe, 1. That after accompanying the hero through the silent realms of night and chaos, we see with astonishment and pleasure a new creation bursting upon us; 2. That we examine, with a delight which springs from the love of virtue, the just empire of Minos; in which the apparent irregularities of the present system are corrected; and where the patriot who died for his country is happy, and the tyrant who oppressed it is miserable. 3. As we interest ourselves in the hero's fortunes, we share his feelings: the melancholy Palinurus, the wretched Deiphobus, the indignant Dido; the Grecian kings who tremble at his presence, and the venerable Anchises who embraces his pious son, and displays to his sight the future glories of his race; all these objects affect us with a variety of pleasing sensations.

Let us for a moment obey the mandate of our great critic, and consider these awful scenes as a mimic shew, exhibited in the temple of Ceres, by clash with the active passions displayed in the rest of Juno's speech.

His lordship (D. L. vol. II. p. 140.) accuses Virgil himself of a like inattention; which, with his usual gentleness, he calls an absurdity.

the contrivance of the priest, or, if he pleases, of the legislator. Whatever was animated, (I appeal to every reader of taste,) whatever was terrible, or whatever was pathetic, evaporates into lifeless allegory:

——————— tenuem sine viribus umbram.

Dat inania verba,
Dat sine mente sonum, gressusque effingit euntis.

The end of philosophy is truth; the end of poetry is pleasure. I willingly adopt any interpretation which adds new beauties to the original; I assist in persuading myself, that it is just; and could almost shew the same indulgence to the critic's as to the poet's fiction. But should a grave doctor lay out fourscore pages in explaining away the sense and spirit of Virgil, I should have every inducement to believe, that Virgil's soul was very different from the doctor's.

I have almost exhausted my own, and probably my reader's patience, whilst I have obsequiously waited on his lordship, through the several stages of an intricate hypothesis. He must now permit me to allege two very simple reasons, which persuade me, that Virgil has not revealed the secret of the Eleusinian mysteries; the first is HIS IGNORANCE, and the second HIS DISCRETION.

1. As his lordship has not made the smallest attempt to prove that Virgil was himself initiated, it is plain that he supposed it, as a thing of course. Had he any right to suppose it? By no means: that ceremony might naturally enough finish the education education of a young Athenian; but a barbarian, a Roman, would most probably pass through life without directing his devotion to the foreign rites of Eleusis.

The philosophical sentiments of Virgil were still more unlikely to inspire him with that kind of devotion. It is well known that he was a determined Epicurean;* and a very natural antipathy subsisted between the Epicureans and the managers of the mysteries. The celebration opened with a solemn excommunication of those atheistical philosophers, who were commanded to retire, and to leave that holy place for pious believers;† the zeal of the people was ready to enforce this admonition. I will not deny, that curiosity might sometimes tempt an Epicurean to pry into these secret rites; and that gratitude, fear, or other motives, might engage the Athenians to admit so irreligious an aspirant. Atticus was initiated at Eleusis; but Atticus was the friend and benefactor of Athens.‡ These extraordinary exceptions may be proved, but must not be supposed.

Nay, more; I am strongly inclined to think that Virgil was never out of Italy till the last year of his life. I am sensible, that it is not easy to prove a negative proposition, more especially when the materials of our knowledge are so very few and so very defective;* and yet by glancing our eye over the several periods of Virgil's life, we may perhaps attain a sort of probability, which ought to have some weight, since nothing can be thrown into the opposite scale.

* See the Life of Virgil by Donatus, the Sixth Eclogue, and Second Georgic, v. 490.

† Lucian in Alexandro, p. 489.

‡ Cornel. Nepos, in Vit. Attici, c. 2, 3, 4.

Although Virgil's father was hardly of a lower rank than Horace's, yet the peculiar character of the latter afforded his son a much superior education: Virgil did not enjoy the same opportunities of observing mankind on the great theatre of Rome, or of pursuing philosophy, in her favourite shades of the academy.

> Adjecêre bonæ paulò plus artis Athenæ:
> Scilicet ut possem curvo dignoscere rectum,
> Atque inter sylvas academi quærere verum.†

The sphere of Virgil's education did not extend beyond Mantua, Cremona, Milan, and Naples.‡

After the accidents of civil war had introduced Virgil to the knowledge of the great, he passed a few years at Rome, in a state of dependance, the Juvenum Nobilium Cliens.§ It was during that

* The life of Virgil, attributed to Donatus, contains many characteristic particulars; but which are lost in confusion, and disgraced with a mixture of absurd stories, such as none but a monk of the darker ages could either invent or believe. I always considered them as the interpolations of some more recent writer; and am confirmed in that opinion by the life of Virgil, pure from those additions which Mr. Spence lately published, from a Florence MS. at the beginning of Mr. Holdsworth's valuable observations on Virgil.

† Horat. L. II. Ep. ii. ver. 43.

‡ Donat. in Virgil.

§ Horat. L. IV. Od. xii.

time

time that he composed his Eclogues, the hasty productions of a muse capable of far greater things.*

By the liberality of Augustus and his courtiers, Virgil soon became possessed of an affluent fortune.† He composed the Georgics and the Æneid in his elegant villas of Campania and Sicily; and seldom quitted those pleasing retreats even to come to Rome.‡

After he had finished the Æneid, he resolved on a journey into Greece and Asia, to employ three years in revising and perfecting that poem, and to devote the remainder of his life to the study of philosophy.§ He was at Athens, with Augustus, in the summer of A.U.C. 735; and whilst Augustus was at Athens, the Eleusinian mysteries were celebrated.‖ It is not impossible, that Virgil might then be initiated, as well as the Indian philosopher;¶ but the Æneid could receive no improvement from his newly acquired knowledge. He was taken ill at Megara. The journey increased

* Donat. in Virgil.

† Prope Centies Sestertium, about eighty thousand pounds.

‡ Donat. in Virgil.

§ Id. ibid.

‖ They always began the fifteenth of the Attic month Boedromion, and lasted nine days. Those who take the trouble of calculating the Athenian calendar, on the principles laid down by Mr. Dodwell (de Cyclis Antiquis) and by Dr. Halley, will find, that A.U.C. Varr. 735, the 15th of Boedromion coincided with the 24th of August of the Julian year. But if we may believe Dion Cassius, the celebration was this year anticipated, on account of Augustus and the Indian philosopher. L. LIV. p. 739. edit. Reimar.

¶ Strabo, L. xv. p. 720.

his disorder, and he expired at Brundusium, the twenty-second of September of the same year 735.*

Should it then appear probable, that Virgil had no opportunity of learning the SECRET of the mysteries, it will be something more than probable that he has not revealed what he never knew.

His Lordship will perhaps tell me, that Virgil might be initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries without making a journey to Athens: since those mysteries had been brought to Rome long before.† Here indeed I should be apt to suspect some mistake, or, at least, a want of precision in his Lordship's ideas; as Salmasius‡ and Casaubon,§ men tolerably versed in antiquity, assure me, that indeed some Grecian ceremonies of Ceres had been practised at Rome from the earliest ages; but that the mysteries of Eleusis were never introduced into that capital, either by the emperor Hadrian, or by any other: and I am the more induced to believe, that these rites were not imported in Virgil's time, as the accurate Suetonius speaks of an unsuccessful attempt for that purpose, made by the emperor Claudius, above threescore years after Virgil's death.‖

II. None but the initiated COULD reveal the secret of the mysteries; and THE INITIATED COULD NOT REVEAL IT, WITHOUT VIOLATING THE LAWS,

* Donat. in Virgil. † D. L. vol. i. p. 118.
‡ Salmasius ad Sriptores Hist. August. p. 55.
§ Casaubon ad Scriptor. Hist. August. p. 25.
‖ Sueton. in Claud. c. 25.

AS

AS WELL OF HONOUR AS OF RELIGION. I sincerely acquit the Bishop of Gloucester of any design; yet so unfortunate is his system, that it represents a most virtuous and elegant poet, as equally devoid of taste, and of common honesty.

His Lordship acknowledges, that the initiated were bound to secrecy by the most solemn obligations;* that Virgil was conscious of the imputed impiety of his design; that at Athens he never durst have ventured on it; that even at Rome such a discovery was esteemed not only IMPIOUS but INFAMOUS: and yet his Lordship maintains, that after the compliment of a formal apology,

Sit mihi fas, audita loqui.†

Virgil lays open the whole SECRET of the mysteries under the thin veil of an allegory, which could deceive none but the most careless readers.‡

An apology! an allegory! Such artifices might perhaps have saved him from the sentence of the Areopagus, had some zealous or interested priest denounced him to that court, as guilty of publishing A BLASPHEMOUS POEM. But the laws of honour are more rigid, and yet more liberal than those of civil tribunals. Sense, not words, is considered; and guilt is aggravated, not protected, by artful evasions. Virgil would still have incurred the severe censure of a contemporary, who was himself a man of very little religion.

Vetabo, qui Cereris sacrum
Vulgârit arcanæ, sub iisdem

* D. L. vol. i. p. 147. † Idem, p. 240. ‡ Idem, p. 277.

Sit trabibus, fragilemque mecum Solvat phaselum.*

Nor can I easily persuade myself, that the ingenuous mind of Virgil could have deserved this excommunication.

These lines belong to an ode of Horace, which has every merit except that of order. That death in our country's cause is pleasant and honourable; that virtue does not depend on the caprice of a popular election; and that the mysteries of Ceres ought not to be disclosed, are ideas which have no apparent connection. The beautiful disorder of lyric poetry, is the usual apology made by professed critics on these occasions:

Son style impétueux, souvent marche au hasard;
Chez elle, un beau désordre est un effet de l'art;†

An insufficient apology for the few, who dare judge from their own feelings. I shall not deny, that the irregular notes of an untutored muse have sometimes delighted me. We can very seldom be displeased with the unconstrained workings of nature. But the liberty of an outlaw is very different from that of a savage. It is a mighty disagreeable sight, to observe a lyric writer of taste and reflexion striving to forget the laws of composition, disjointing the order of his ideas, and working himself up into artificial madness:

Ut cum ratione insaniat.

I had once succeeded (as I thought) in removing this defect, by the help of an hypothesis which

* Horat. L. III. Od. ii. † Boileau, Art Poétique, L. ii. v. 72.

con-

connected the several parts of Horace's ode with each other. My ideas appeared (I mean to myself) most ingeniously conceived. I read the ode once more, and burnt my hypothesis. But to return to our principal subject.

The date of this ode may be of use to us; and the date may be fixed with tolerable certainty, from the mention of the PARTHIANS, who are described as the enemies against whom a brave youth should signalize his valour.

Parthos feroces
Vexet eques metuendus hastâ, &c.

Those who are used to the LABOURED HAPPINESS of all Horace's expressions* will readily allow, that if the Parthians are mentioned rather than the Britons or Cantabrians, the Gauls or the Dalmatians, it could be only at a time when the PARTHIAN WAR engaged the public attention. This reflection confines us between the years of Rome 729 and 735. Of these six years, that of 734 has a superior claim to the composition of the ode.

Julius Cæsar was prevented by death from revenging the defeat of Crassus.† This glorious task, unsuccessfully attempted by Marc Antony,‡

* Curiosa Felicitas. The ingenious Dr. Warton has a very strong dislike to this celebrated character of Horace. I suspect that I am in the wrong, since, in a point of criticism, I differ from Dr. Warton. I cannot, however, forbear thinking that the expression is itself what Petronius wished to describe; the happy union of such ease as seems the gift of fortune, with such justness as can only be the result of care and labour.

† Sueton: in Cæsar, c. 44.

‡ Plut. in Vit. Anton. Julian in Cæsar, p. 324. edit. Spanheim.

seemed seemed to be reserved for the prudence and felicity of Augustus; who became sole master of the Roman world in the year 724; but it was not till the year 729, that, having changed the civil administration and pacified the Western provinces, he had leisure to turn his views towards the East. From that time, Horace, in compliance with the public wish, began to animate both prince and people to revenge the manes of Crassus.* The cautious policy of Augustus, still averse to war, was at length roused in the year 734, by some disturbances in Armenia. He passed over into Asia, and sent the young Tiberius with an army beyond the Euphrates. Every appearance promised a glorious war. But the Parthian monarch, Phrahates, alarmed at the approach of the Roman legions, and diffident of the fidelity of his subjects, diverted the storm, by a timely and humble submission:

——— Jus, imperiumque Phrahates
Cæsaris accepit genibus minor.†

Cæsar returned in triumph to Rome, with the Parthian hostages, and the Roman ensigns, which had been taken from Crassus.

These busy scenes, which engage the attention of contemporaries, are far less interesting to posterity, than the silent labours, or even amusements of a man of genius.

* Horat. L. I. Od. ii. L. III. Od. v. L. II. Serm. i. v. 15, &c.

† Horat. L. i. Epist. xii. Vell. Pater. L. ii. c. xciv. Tacit. Annal. L. ii. c. i. Sueton. in Octav. c. xxi. and in Tiber. c. xiv. Justin, L. xlii. c. v. Dion Cassius, L. liv. p. 736. edit. Reimar. Joseph. Ant. L. v. c. v. Ovid. Fast. v. ver. 551. &c.

Cæsar

——— Cæsar dum magnus ad altum
Fulminat Euphraten bello, victorque volentes
Per populos dat jura, viamque adfectat Olympo.
Illo Virgilium me tempore dulcis alebat
Parthenope, studiis florentem ignobilis otî.

Whilst Cæsar humbled the Parthians, Virgil was composing the Æneid. It is well known, that this noble poem occupied the author, without being able to satisfy him, during the last twelve years of his life, from the year 723 to the year 735.* The public expectation was soon raised, and the modest Virgil was sometimes obliged to gratify the impatient curiosity of his friends. Soon after the death of young Marcellus,† he recited the second, fourth, and SIXTH books of the Æneid, in the presence of Augustus and Octavia.‡ He even sometimes read parts of his work to more numerous companies; with a desire of obtaining their judgment, rather than their applause. In this manner, Propertius seems to have heard the SHIELD OF ÆNEAS, and from that specimen he ventures to foretell the approaching birth of a poem which will surpass the Iliad.

Actia Virgilium custodis litora Phœbi,
Cæsaris et fortes dicere posse rates.
Qui nunc Æneæ Trojani suscitat arma,
Jactaque Lavinis mœnia litoribus.

* Donat. in Virgil.

† Marcellus died in the latter end of the year 731. Usserii Annales, p. 555.

‡ Donat. in Virgil.

Cedite

Cedite Romani scriptores, cedite Graii, Nescio quid majus nascitur Iliade.*

As a friend and as a critic, Horace was entitled to all Virgil's confidence, and was probably acquainted with the whole progress of the Æneid, from the first rude sketch, which Virgil drew up in prose, to that harmonious poetry, which the author alone thought unworthy of posterity.

To resume my idea, which depended on this long deduction of circumstances; when Horace composed the second ode of his third book, the Æneid, and particularly the sixth book, were already known to the public. The detestation of the wretch who reveals the mysteries of Ceres, though expressed in general terms, must be applied by all Rome to the author of the sixth book of the Æneid. Can we seriously suppose, THAT HORACE WOULD HAVE BRANDED WITH SUCH WANTON INFAMY, ONE OF THE MEN IN THE WORLD WHOM HE LOVED AND HONOURED THE MOST?†

Nothing remains to say, except that Horace was himself ignorant of his friend's allegorical meaning, which the Bishop of Gloucester has since revealed to the world. It may be so; yet, for my own part, I should be very well satisfied with understanding Virgil no better than Horace did.

It is perhaps some such foolish fondness for antiquity which inclines me to doubt, whether the BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER has really united the severe

* Propert. L. ii. El. xxv. v. 66.

† Horat. L. i. Od. iii. L. i. Serm. v. ver. 39, &c.

vere sense of ARISTOTLE with the sublime imagination of LONGINUS. Yet a judicious critic (who is now, I believe, ARCHDEACON OF GLOUCESTER) assures the public, that his patron's mere amusements have done much more than the joint labours of the two Grecians. I shall conclude these Observations with a remarkable passage from the Archdeacon's Dedication:* "It was not enough, in YOUR ENLARGED VIEW OF THINGS, to restore either of these models (ARISTOTLE or LONGINUS) to their original splendour. They were both to be revived; or rather A NEW ORIGINAL PLAN OF CRITICISM to be struck out, WHICH SHOULD UNITE THE VIRTUES OF EACH OF THEM. This experiment was made on the two greatest of our own poets, (Shakspeare and Pope,) and by reflecting all the LIGHTS OF THE IMAGINATION ON THE SEVEREST REASON, every thing was effected which the warmest admirer of ancient art could promise himself from such a union. BUT YOU WENT FARTHER: by joining to these powers A PERFECT INSIGHT INTO HUMAN NATURE; and so ennobling the exercise of literary, by the justest moral censure, YOU HAVE NOW AT LENGTH ADVANCED CRITICISM TO ITS FULL GLORY."

* See the Dedication of Horace's Epistle to Augustus, with an English commentary and notes.

POST-

POSTSCRIPT.

I was not ignorant, that several years since, the Rev. Dr. Jortin had favoured the Public with a Dissertation on the State of the Dead, as described by Homer and Virgil:* but the book is now grown so scarce, that I was not able to procure a sight of it till after these papers had been already sent to the press. I found Dr. Jortin's performance, as I expected, moderate, learned, and critical. Among a variety of ingenious observations, there are two or three which are very closely connected with my present subject.

I had passed over in silence one argument of the Bishop of Gloucester, or rather of Scarron and the Bishop of Gloucester; since the former found the remark, and the latter furnished the inference.

Discite justitiam moniti, et non temnere divos, cries the unfortunate Phlegyas. In the midst of his torments, he preaches justice and piety, like Ixion in Pindar. A very useful piece of advice, says the French buffoon, for those who were already damned to all eternity:

Cette sentence est bonne et belle:
Mais en enfer, de quoi sert-elle?

From this judicious piece of criticism his lordship argues, that Phlegyas was preaching not to

* Six Dissertations on different Subjects, published in a volume in octavo, in the year 1755. It is the Sixth Dissertation, p. 207—324.

the

the dead, but to the living; and that Virgil is only describing the mimic Tartarus, which was exhibited at Eleusis for the instruction of the initiated.

I shall transcribe one or two of the reasons, which Dr. Jortin condescends to oppose to Scarron's criticism.

"To preach to the damned, says he, is labour in vain. And what if it is? It might be part of his punishment, to exhort himself and others, when exhortations were too late. This admonition as far as it relates to himself and his companions in misery, is to be looked upon not so much as an admonition to mend, but as a bitter sarcasm, and reproaching of past iniquities.

"It is labour in vain. But in the poetical system, it seems to have been the occupation of the damned to labour in vain, to catch at meat and drink that fled from them, &c.

"His instruction, like that of Ixion in Pindar, might be for the use of the living. You will say, how can that be? Surely nothing is more easy and intelligible. The Muses hear him—The Muses reveal it to the poet, and the inspired poet reveals it to mankind. And so much for Phlegyas and Monsieur Scarron."

It is prettily observed by Dr. Jortin, "That Virgil, after having shone out with full splendour through the sixth book, sets at last in a cloud." The IVORY GATE puzzles every commentator, and grieves every lover of Virgil: yet it affords no advantages to the Bishop of Gloucester. The objection presses as hard on the notion of an initiation, tion, as on that of a real descent to the shades. "The troublesome conclusion still remains as it was; and from the manner in which the hero is dismissed after the ceremonies, we learn, that in those initiations, the machinery, and the whole show, was (in the Poet's opinion) a representation of things, which had no truth or reality.

Altera candenti perfecta nitens elephanto:
Sed FALSA ad cœlum mittunt INSOMNIA manes.

"Dreams in general may be called vain and deceitful, somnia vana, or somnia falsa, if you will, as they are opposed to the real objects which present themselves to us when we are awake. But when false dreams are opposed to true ones, there the epithet falsa has another meaning. True dreams represent what is real, and shew what is true; false dreams represent things which are not, or which are not true. Thus Homer and Virgil, and many other poets, and indeed the nature of the thing, distinguish them."

Dr. Jortin, though with reluctance, acquiesces in the common opinion, that by six unlucky lines, Virgil is destroying the beautiful system, which it has cost him eight hundred to raise. He explains too this preposterous conduct, by the usual expedient of the Poet's epicurism. I only differ from him in attributing to haste and indiscretion, what he considers as the result of design.

Another reason, both new and ingenious, is assigned by Dr. Jortin, for Virgil explaining away his hero's descent into an idle dream. "All communication with the dead, the infernal powers, &c.

&c. belonged to the art of magic, and magic was held in abomination by the Romans. Yet if it was held in ABOMINATION, it was supposed to be real. A writer would not have made his court to James the First, by representing the stories of witchcraft as the phantoms of an over-heated imagination.

Whilst I am writing, a sudden thought occurs to me, which, rude and imperfect as it is, I shall venture to throw out to the public. It is this. After Virgil, in imitation of Homer, had described the two gates of sleep, the horn, and the ivory, he again takes up the first in a different sense:

—— QUA VERIS FACILIS DATUR EXITUS UMBRIS.

The TRUE SHADES, VERÆ UMBRÆ, were those airy forms which were continually sent to animate new bodies, such light and almost immaterial natures as could without difficulty pass through a thin transparent substance. In this new sense, Æneas and the Sybil, who were still encumbered with a load of flesh, could not pretend to the prerogative of TRUE SHADES. In their passage over the Styx, they had almost sunk Charon's boat.

——— Gemuit sub pondere cymba Sutilis, et multam accepit rimosa paludem.

Some other expedient was requisite for their return; and since the horn gate would not afford them an easy dismission, the other passage, which was adorned with polished ivory, was the only one that remained either for them, or for the poet.

By this explanation, we save Virgil's judgment and religion, though I must own, at the expense of an uncommon harshness and ambiguity of expression. Let it only be remembered, that those, who in desperate cases conjecture with modesty, have a right to be heard with indulgence.*

* It appears from the Memoirs that this work was sent to the press early in 1770.

A VIN-

A

VINDICATION

OF

SOME PASSAGES IN THE XVTH AND XVITH CHAPTERS

OF THE

HISTORY OF THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

PERHAPS it may be necessary to inform the public, that not long since an Examination of the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Chapters of the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire was published by Mr. Davis. He styles himself a Bachelor of Arts, and a Member of Baliol College in the university of Oxford. His title-page is a declaration of war; and in the prosecution of his religious crusade, he assumes a privilege of disregarding the ordinary laws which are respected in the most hostile transactions between civilized men or civilized nations. Some of the harshest epithets in the English language are repeatedly applied to the historian, a part of whose work Mr. Davis has chosen for the object of his criticism. To this author Mr. Davis imputes the crime of betraying

betraying the confidence and seducing the faith of those readers, who may heedlessly stray in the flowery paths of his diction, without perceiving the poisonous snake that lurks concealed in the grass—Latet anguis in herbâ. The Examiner has assumed the province of reminding them of " the unfair proceedings of such an insidious friend, who offers the deadly draught in a golden cup, that they may be less sensible of the danger.* In order to which Mr. Davis has selected several of the more notorious instances of his misrepresentations and errors; reducing them to their respective heads, and subjoining a long list of almost incredible inaccuracies: and such striking proofs of servile plagiarism, as the world will be surprised to meet with in an author who puts in so bold a claim to originality and extensive reading."† Mr. Davis prosecutes this attack through an octavo volume of not less than two hundred and eighty-four pages with the same implacable spirit; perpetually charges his adversary with perverting the ancients, and transcribing the moderns; and, inconsistently enough, imputes to him the opposite crimes of art and carelessness, of gross ignorance and of wilful falsehood. The Examiner closes his work‡ with a severe reproof of those feeble critics who have allowed any share of knowledge to an odious antagonist. He presumes to pity and to condemn the first historian of the present age, for

* Davis, Preface, p. ii. † Idem, Preface, p. iii.
‡ Idem, p. 282, 283.

the

the generous approbation which he had bestowed on a writer, who is content that Mr. Davis should be his enemy, whilst he has a right to name Dr. Robertson for his friend.

When I delivered to the world the First Volume of an important History, in which I had been obliged to connect the progress of Christianity with the civil state and revolutions of the Roman Empire, I could not be ignorant that the result of my inquiries might offend the interest of some and the opinions of others. If the whole work was favourably received by the public, I had the more reason to expect that this obnoxious part would provoke the zeal of those who consider themselves as the Watchmen of the Holy City. These expectations were not disappointed; and a fruitful crop of Answers, Apologies, Remarks, Examinations, &c. sprung up with all convenient speed. As soon as I saw the advertisement, I generally sent for them; for I have never affected, indeed I have never understood, the stoical apathy, the proud contempt of criticism, which some authors have publicly professed. Fame is the motive, it is the reward, of our labours; nor can I easily comprehend how it is possible that we should remain cold and indifferent with regard to the attempts which are made to deprive us of the most valuable object of our possessions, or at least of our hopes. Besides this strong and natural impulse of curiosity, I was prompted by the more laudable desire of applying to my own, and the public benefit, the well-grounded censures of a learned adversary; and of correcting those faults which the indulgence of vanity and friendship had suffered to escape without observation. I read with attention several criticisms which were published against the two last chapters of my History, and unless I much deceived myself, I weighed them in my own mind without prejudice and without resentment. After I was clearly satisfied that their principal objections were founded on misrepresentation or mistake, I declined, with sincere and disinterested reluctance, the odious task of controversy, and almost formed a tacit resolution of committing my intentions, my writings, and my adversaries to the judgment of the public, of whose favourable disposition I had received the most flattering proofs.

The reasons which justified my silence were obvious and forcible: the respectable nature of the subject itself, which ought not to be rashly violated by the rude hand of controversy; the inevitable tendency of dispute, which soon degenerates into minute and personal altercation; the indifference of the public for the discussion of such questions as neither relate to the business nor the amusement of the present age. I calculated the possible loss of temper and the certain loss of time, and considered, that while I was laboriously engaged in a humiliating task, which could add nothing to my own reputation, or to the entertainment of my readers, I must interrupt the prosecution of a work which claimed my whole attention, and which the public, or at least my friends, seemed to require with with some impatience at my hands. The judicious lines of Dr. Young sometimes offered themselves to my memory, and I felt the truth of his observation, That every author lives or dies by his own pen, and that the unerring sentence of Time assigns its proper rank to every composition and to every criticism, which it preserves from oblivion.

I should have consulted my own ease, and perhaps I should have acted in stricter conformity to the rules of prudence, if I had still persevered in patient silence. But Mr. Davis may, if he pleases, assume the merit of extorting from me the notice which I had refused to more honourable foes. I had declined the consideration of their literary Objections; but he has compelled me to give an answer to his criminal Accusations. Had he confined himself to the ordinary, and indeed obsolete charges of impious principles, and mischievous intentions, I should have acknowledged with readiness and pleasure that the religion of Mr. Davis appeared to be very different from mine. Had he contented himself with the use of that style which decency and politeness have banished from the more liberal part of mankind, I should have smiled, perhaps with some contempt, but without the least mixture of anger or resentment. Every animal employs the note, or cry, or howl, which is peculiar to its species; every man expresses himself in the dialect the most congenial to his temper and inclination, the most familiar to the company in which he has lived, and to the authors with whom he is conversant; and while I was disposed to allow that Mr. Davis had made some proficiency in ecclesiastical studies, I should have considered the difference of our language and manners as an unsurmountable bar of separation between us. Mr. Davis has overleaped that bar, and forces me to contend with him on the very dirty ground which he has chosen for the scene of our combat. He has judged, I know not with how much propriety, that the support of a cause, which would disclaim such unworthy assistance, depended on the ruin of my moral and literary character. The different misrepresentations, of which he has drawn out the ignominious catalogue, would materially affect my credit as an historian, my reputation as a scholar and even my honour and veracity as a gentleman. If I am indeed incapable of understanding what I read, I can no longer claim a place among those writers who merit the esteem and confidence of the public. If I am capable of wilfully perverting what I understand, I no longer deserve to live in the society of those men, who consider a strict and inviolable adherence to truth as the foundation of every thing that is virtuous or honourable in human nature. At the same time, I am not insensible that his mode of attack has given a transient pleasure to my enemies, and a transient uneasiness to my friends. The size of his volume, the boldness of his assertions, the acrimony of his style, are contrived with tolerable skill to confound the ignorance and candour of his readers. There are few who will examine the truth or justice of his accusations; and of those persons who have been directed by their education to the study of ecclesiastical astical antiquity, many will believe, or will affect to believe, that the success of their champion has been equal to his zeal, and that the serpent pierced with an hundred wounds lies expiring at his feet. Mr. Davis's book will cease to be read (perhaps the grammarians may already reproach me for the use of an improper tense); but the oblivion towards which it seems to be hastening, will afford the more ample scope for the artful practices of those, who may not scruple to affirm, or rather to insinuate, that Mr. Gibbon was publicly convicted of falsehood and misrepresentation; that the evidence produced against him was unanswerable; and that his silence was the effect and the proof of conscious guilt. Under the hands of a malicious surgeon, the sting of a wasp may continue to fester and inflame, long after the vexatious little insect has left its venom and its life in the wound.

The defence of my honour is undoubtedly the first and prevailing motive which urges me to repel with vigour an unjust and unprovoked attack; and to undertake a tedious vindication, which, after the perpetual repetition of the vainest and most disgusting of the pronouns, will only prove that I am innocent, and that Mr. Davis, in his charge, has very frequently subscribed his own condemnation. And yet I may presume to affirm, that the public have some interest in this controversy. They have some interest to know, whether the writer whom they have honoured with their favour is deserving of their confidence; whether they must content themselves with reading the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire as a tale amusing enough, or whether they may venture to receive it as a fair and authentic history. The general persuasion of mankind, that where much has been positively asserted, something must be true, may contribute to encourage a secret suspicion, which would naturally diffuse itself over the whole body of the work. Some of those friends who may now tax me with imprudence for taking this public notice of Mr. Davis's book, have perhaps already condemned me for silently acquiescing under the weight of such serious, such direct, and such circumstantial imputations.

tale

Mr. Davis, who in the last page of his work* appears to have recollected that modesty is an amiable and useful qualification, affirms, that his plan required only that he should consult the authors to whom he was directed by my references; and that the judgment of riper years was not so necessary to enable him to execute with success the pious labour to which he had devoted his pen. Perhaps, before we separate, a moment to which I most fervently aspire, Mr. Davis may find that a mature judgment is indispensably requisite for the successful execution of any work of literature, and more especially of criticism. Perhaps he will discover, that a young student, who hastily consults an unknown author, on a subject with which he is unacquainted, cannot always be guided by the most accurate reference to the knowledge of the sense, as well as to the sight of the passage which has been quoted by his adversary. Abundant proofs

* Davis, p. 284.

proofs of these maxims will hereafter be suggested. For the present, I shall only remark, that it is my intention to pursue, in my defence, the order, or rather the course, which Mr. Davis has marked out in his Examination; and that I have numbered the several articles of my impeachment according to the most natural division of the subject. And now let me proceed on this hostile march over a dreary and barren desert, where thirst, hunger, and intolerable weariness, are much more to be dreaded than the arrows of the enemy.

I.

QUOTATIONS IN GENERAL.

"The remarkable mode of quotation which Mr. Gibbon adopts, must immediately strike every one who turns to his notes. He sometimes only mentions the author, perhaps the book; and often leaves the reader the toil of finding out, or rather guessing at the passage. The policy, however, is not without its design and use. By endeavouring to deprive us of the means of comparing him with the authorities he cites, he flattered himself, no doubt, that he might safely have recourse to misrepresentation."* Such is the style of Mr. Davis; who in another place† mentions this mode of quotation "as a good artifice to escape detection;" and applauds, with an agreeable irony, his own labours in turning over a few pages of the Theodosian code.

I shall not descend to animadvert on the rude and illiberal strain of this passage, and I will

* Davis, Preface, p. ii. † Id. p. 230.

frankly

frankly own that my indignation is lost in astonishment. The Fifteenth and Sixteenth Chapters of my History are illustrated by three hundred and eighty-three Notes; and the nakedness of a few Notes, which are not accompanied by any quotation, is amply compensated by a much greater number, which contain two, three, or perhaps four distinct references; so that upon the whole my stock of quotations, which support and justify my facts, cannot amount to less than eight hundred or a thousand. As I had often felt the inconvenience of the loose and general method of quoting which is so falsely imputed to me, I have carefully distinguished the books, the chapters, the sections, the pages of the authors to whom I referred, with a degree of accuracy and attention, which might claim some gratitude, as it has seldom been so regularly practised by any historical writers. And here I must confess some obligation to Mr. Davis, who, by staking my credit and his own on a circumstance so obvious and palpable, has given me this early opportunity of submitting the merits of our cause, or at least of our characters, to the judgment of the public. Hereafter, when I am summoned to defend myself against the imputation of misquoting the text, or misrepresenting the sense of a Greek or Latin author, it will not be in my power to communicate the knowledge of the languages, or the possession of the books, to those readers who may be destitute either of one or of the other; and the part which they are obliged to take between assertions equally strong and peremptory, tory, may sometimes be attended with doubt and hesitation. But, in the present instance, every reader who will give himself the trouble of consulting the first volume of my History, is a competent judge of the question. I exhort, I solicit him to run his eye down the columns of Notes, and to count how many of the quotations are minute and particular, how few are vague and general. When he has satisfied himself by this easy computation, there is a word which may naturally suggest itself; an epithet, which I should be sorry either to deserve or use; the boldness of Mr. Davis's assertion, and the confidence of my appeal, will tempt, nay, perhaps, will force him to apply that epithet either to one or to the other of the adverse parties.

I have confessed that a critical eye may discover some loose and general references; but as they bear a very inconsiderable proportion to the whole mass, they cannot support, or even excuse, a false and ungenerous accusation, which must reflect dishonour either on the object or on the author of it. If the examples in which I have occasionally deviated from my ordinary practice were specified and examined, I am persuaded that they might always be fairly attributed to one of the following reasons. 1. In some rare instances, which I have never attempted to conceal, I have been obliged to adopt quotations, which were expressed with less accuracy than I could have wished. 2. I may have accidentally recollected the sense of a passage which I had formerly read, without being able to find the place, or even to transcribe from memory the precise words. 3. The whole tract (as in a remarkable markable instance of the second apology of Justin Martyr) was so short, that a more particular description was not required. 4. The form of the composition supplied the want of a local reference; the preceding mention of the year fixed the passage of the annalist; and the reader was guided to the proper spot in the commentaries of Grotius, Valesius, or Godefroy, by the more accurate citation of their original author. 5. The idea which I was desirous of communicating to the reader, was sometimes the general result of the author or treatise that I had quoted; nor was it possible to confine, within the narrow limits of a particular reference, the sense or spirit which was mingled with the whole mass. These motives are either laudable, or at least innocent. In two of these exceptions, my ordinary mode of citation was superfluous; in the other three, it was impracticable.

In quoting a comparison which Tertullian had used to express the rapid increase of the Marcionites, I expressly declared that I was obliged to quote it from memory.* If I have been guilty of comparing them to bees instead of wasps, I can however most sincerely disclaim the sagacious suspicion of Mr. Davis,† who imagines that I was tempted to amend the simile of Tertullian, from an improper partiality for those odious heretics.

A rescript of Diocletian, which declared the old law (not an old law‡) had been alleged by me on

* Gibbon's History, p. 551. I shall usually refer to the third edition, unless there are any various readings.

† Davis, p. 144. ‡ Gibbon, p. 593.

the

the respectable authority of Fra-Paolo. The Examiner, who thinks that he has turned over the pages of the Theodosian code, informs * his reader that it may be found, l. vi. tit. xxiv. leg. 8.; he will be surprised to learn that this rescript could not be found in a code where it does not exist, but that it may distinctly be read in the same number, the same title, and the same book of the CODE of JUSTINIAN. He who is severe should at least be just: yet I should probably have disdained this minute animadversion, unless it had served to display the general ignorance of the critic in the history of the Roman jurisprudence. If Mr. Davis had not been an absolute stranger, the most treacherous guide could not have persuaded him that a rescript of Diocletian was to be found in the Theodosian code, which was designed only to preserve the laws of Constantine and his successors. "Compendiosam (says Theodosius himself) Divalium Constitutionum scientiam, ex D. Constantini temporibus roboramus." (Novell. ad calcem Cod. Theod. L. i. tit. i. leg. 1.)

ERRORS OF THE PRESS.

II. Few objects are below the notice of Mr. Davis, and his criticism is never so formidable as when it is directed against the guilty corrector of the press, who on some occasions has shewn himself negligent of my fame and of his own. Some errors have arisen from the omission of letters; from the confusion of ciphers, which perhaps were not very distinctly marked in the original manuscript. The two of the Roman, and the eleven of

* Davis, p. 230.

the

the Arabic numerals, have been unfortunately mistaken for each other; the similar forms of a 2 and a 3, a 5 and a 6, a 3 and an 8, have improperly been transposed; A*n*tolycus for A*u*tolycus, Idolatria for Ido*lo*latria, Holste*r*ius for Holste*n*ius, had escaped my own observation, as well as the diligence of the person who was employed to revise the sheets of my History. These important errors, from the indulgence of a deluded public, have been multiplied in the numerous impressions of three different editions; and for the present I can only lament my own defects, while I deprecate the wrath of Mr. Davis, who seems ready to infer that I cannot either read or write. I sincerely admire his patient industry, which I despair of being able to imitate; but if a future edition should ever be required, I could wish to obtain on any reasonable terms, the services of so useful a corrector.

DIFFERENCE OF EDITIONS.

III. Mr. Davis had been directed by my references to several passages of Optatus Milevitanus,* and of the Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique of M. Dupin.† He eagerly consults those places, is unsuccessful, and is happy. Sometimes the place which I have quoted does not offer any of the circumstances which I had alleged, sometimes only a few; and sometimes the same passages exhibit a sense totally adverse and repugnant to mine. These shameful misrepresentations incline Mr. Davis to suspect that I have never consulted the original, (not even of a common French book!) and he as-

* Davis, p. 73. † Id. p. 132—136.

serts

serts his right to censure my presumption. These important charges form two distinct articles in the list of misrepresentations; but Mr. Davis has amused himself with adding to the slips of the pen or of the press, some complaints of his ill success, when he attempted to verify my quotations from Cyprian and from Shaw's Travels.*

The success of Mr. Davis would indeed have been somewhat extraordinary, unless he had consulted the same editions, as well as the same places. I shall content myself with mentioning the editions which I have used, and with assuring him, that if he renews his search, he will not, or rather that he will, be disappointed.

Mr. Gibbon's Editions.	Mr. Davis's Editions.
Optatus Milevitanus, by Dupin, fol. Paris, 1700.	Fol. Antwerp, 1702.
Dupin. Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique, 4to. Paris, 1690.	8vo. Paris, 1687.
Cypriani Opera, Edit. Fell. fol. Amsterdam, 1700.	Most probably Oxon, 1682.
Shaw's Travels, 4to. London, 1757.	The folio Edition.

IV. The nature of my subject had led me to mention, not the real origin of the Jews, but their first appearance to the eyes of other nations; and I cannot avoid transcribing the short passage in which I had introduced them. "The Jews, who under the Assyrian and Persian monarchies had languished for many ages the most despised por- JEWISH HISTORY, TACITUS.

* Davis, p. 151—155.

tion of their slaves, emerged from their obscurity under the successors of Alexander. And as they multiplied to a surprising degree in the east, and afterwards in the west, they soon excited the curiosity and wonder of other nations."* This simple abridgment seems in its turn to have excited the wonder of Mr. Davis, whose surprise almost renders him eloquent. "What a strange assemblage," says he, "is here? It is like Milton's chaos, without bound, without dimension, where time and place are lost. In short, what does this display afford us, but a deal of boyish colouring to the prejudice of much good history?"† If I rightly understand Mr. Davis's language, he censures, as a piece of confused declamation, the passage which he has produced from my History; and if I collect the angry criticisms which he has scattered over twenty pages of controversy,‡ I think I can discover that there is hardly a period, or even a word, in this unfortunate passage, which has obtained the approbation of the Examiner.

As nothing can escape his vigilance, he censures me for including the twelve tribes of Israel under the common appellation of JEWS,§ and for extending the name of ASSYRIANS to the subjects of the kings of Babylon;‖ and again censures me, because some facts which are affirmed or insinuated in my text, do not agree with the strict and proper limits which he has assigned to those national

* Gibbon, p. 537.
† Davis, p. 5.
‡ Davis, p. 2—23.
§ Id. p. 3.
‖ Id. p. 2.

deno-

denominations. The name of Jews has indeed been established by the sceptre of the tribe of Judah, and, in the times which precede the captivity, it is used in the more general sense with some sort of impropriety; but surely I am not peculiarly charged with a fault which has been consecrated with the consent of twenty centuries, the practice of the best writers, ancient as well as modern, (see Josephus and Prideaux, even in the titles of their respective works,) and by the usage of modern languages, of the Latin, the Greek, and if I may credit Reland, of the Hebrew itself (see Palestin, L. i. c. 6). With regard to the other word, that of Assyrians, most assuredly I will not lose myself in the labyrinth of the Asiatic monarchies before the age of Cyrus; nor indeed is any more required for my justification, than to prove that Babylon was considered as the capital and royal seat of Assyria. If Mr. Davis were a man of learning, I might be morose enough to censure his ignorance of ancient geography, and to overwhelm him under a load of quotations, which might be collected and transcribed with very little trouble: but as I must suppose that he has received a classical education, I might have expected him to have read the first book of Herodotus, where that historian describes, in the clearest and most elegant terms, the situation and greatness of Babylon: Της δε Ασσυριης τα μεν κου και αλλα πολισματα μεγαλα πολλα, το δε ονομαστοτατον και ισχυροτατον και ενθα σφι, Νινου αναστατου γενομενης, τα βασιληια κατεστηκες, ην Βαβυλων. (Clio. c. 178.) I may be surprised that he should be so little conversant with the Cyropædia of Xenophon, in the whole course of which the king of Babylon, the adversary of the Medes and Persians, is repeatedly mentioned by the style and title of THE ASSYRIAN, Ὁ δὲ Ασσυριος, ὁ Βαβυλωνα τε εχων και την αλλην Ασσυριαν. (L. ii. p. 102, 103, edit. Hutchinson.) But there remains something more: and Mr. Davis must apply the same reproaches of inaccuracy, if not ignorance, to the prophet Isaiah, who, in the name of Jehovah, announcing the downfall of Babylon and the deliverance of Israel, declares with an oath, "And as I have purposed the thing shall stand: to crush the ASSYRIAN in my land, and to trample him on my mountains. Then shall his yoke depart from off them; and his burthen shall be removed from off their shoulders." (Isaiah, xiv. 24, 25. Lowth's new translation. See likewise the Bishop's note, p. 98.). Our old translation expresses, with less elegance, the same meaning; but I mention with pleasure the labours of a respectable prelate, who in this, as well as in a former work, has very happily united the most critical judgment, with the taste and spirit of poetry.

The jealousy which Mr. Davis affects for the honour of the Jewish people will not suffer him to allow that they were slaves to the conquerors of the East: and while he acknowledges that they were tributary and dependant, he seems desirous of introducing, or even inventing, some milder expression of the state of vassalage and *subservience; from whence Tacitus assumed the words of despectissima pars servientium. Has Mr. Davis never heard of the distinction of civil and political slavery? Is he ignorant that even the natural and victorious subjects of an Asiatic despot have been deservedly marked with the opprobrious epithet of slaves by every writer acquainted with the name and advantage of freedom? Does he not know that, under such a government, the yoke is imposed with double weight on the necks of the vanquished, as the rigour of tyranny is aggravated by the abuse of conquest? From the first invasion of Judæa by the arms of the Assyrians, to the subversion of the Persian monarchy by Alexander, there elapsed a period of above four hundred years, which included about twelve ages or generations of the human race. As long as the Jews asserted their independence, they repeatedly suffered every calamity which the rage and insolence of a victorious enemy could inflict: the throne of David was overturned, the temple and city were reduced to ashes, and the whole land, a circumstance perhaps unparalleled in history, remained threescore and ten years without inhabitants, and without cultivation. (2 Chronicles, xxxvi. 21.) According to an institution which has long prevailed in Asia, and particularly in the Turkish government, the most beautiful and ingenious youths were carefully educated in the palace, where superior merit sometimes introduced these fortunate slaves to the favour of the conqueror, and to the honours of the state. (See the book and example of Daniel.) The rest of the unhappy Jews experienced the hard ships of captivity and exile in distant lands; and while individuals were oppressed, the nation seemed to be dissolved or annihilated. The gracious edict of Cyrus was offered to all those who worshipped the God of Israel in the temple of Jerusalem; but it was accepted by no more than forty-two thousand persons of either sex and of every age, and of these about thirty thousand derived their origin from the tribes of Judah, of Benjamin, and of Levi. (See Ezra, i. Nehemiah, vii. and Prideaux's Connections, vol. i. p. 107, fol. edit. London, 1718.) The inconsiderable band of exiles, who returned to inhabit the land of their fathers, cannot be computed as the hundred and fiftieth part of the mighty people that had been numbered by the impious rashness of David. After a survey, which did not comprehend the tribes of Levi and Benjamin, the monarch was assured that he reigned over one million five hundred and seventy thousand men that drew sword, (1 Chronicles, xxi. 1—6), and the country of Judæa must have contained near seven millions of free inhabitants. The progress of restoration is always less rapid than that of destruction; Jerusalem, which had been ruined in a few months, was rebuilt by the slow and interrupted labours of a whole century; and the Jews, who gradually multiplied in their native seats, enjoyed a servile and precarious existence, which depended on the capricious will of their master. The books of Ezra and Nehemiah do not afford a very pleasing view of their situation under the Persian empire; and the book of Esther exhibits a most

* Davis, p. 6.

of

a most extraordinary instance of the degree of estimation in which they were held at the court of Susa. A minister addressed his king in the following words, which may be considered as a commentary on the despectissima pars servientium of the Roman historian: "And Haman said to King Ahasuerus, There is a certain people scattered abroad, and dispersed among the people in all the provinces of thy kingdom; and their laws are diverse from all people, neither keep they the King's laws; therefore it is not for the King's profit to suffer them. If it please the King, let it be written that they may be destroyed; and I will pay ten thousand talents of silver to the hands of those that have the charge of the business, to bring it to the King's treasuries. And the King took his ring from his hand, and gave it to Haman, the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, the Jews' enemy. And the King said unto Haman, The silver is given unto thee; the people also, to do with them as it seemeth good to thee." (Esther, iii. 8—11.) This trifling favour was asked by the Minister, and granted by the Monarch, with an easy indifference, which expressed their contempt for the lives and fortunes of the Jews; the business passed without difficulty through the forms of office; and had Esther been less lovely, or less beloved, a single day would have consummated the universal slaughter of a submissive people, to whom no legal defence was allowed, and from whom no resistance seems to have been dreaded. I am a stranger to Mr. Davis's political principles; but I should think that the epithet of slaves, and of despised slaves, may, without injustice, be applied to a captive nation, over whose head the sword of tyranny was suspended by so slender a thread.

The policy of the Macedonians was very different from that of the Persians; and yet Mr. Davis, who reluctantly confesses that the Jews were oppressed by the former, does not understand how long they were favoured and protected by the latter.* In the shock of those revolutions which divided the empire of Alexander, Judæa, like the other provinces, experienced the transient ravages of an advancing or retreating enemy, who led away a multitude of captives. But, in the age of Josephus, the Jews still enjoyed the privileges granted by the kings of Asia and Egypt, who had fixed numerous colonies of that nation in the new cities of Alexandria, Antioch, &c. and placed them in the same honourable condition (ισοπολιτας, ισοτιμους) as the Greeks and Macedonians themselves. (Joseph. Antiquitat. l. xii. c. 1. 3. p. 585. 596. vol. i. edit. Havercamp.) Had they been treated with less indulgence, their settlement in those celebrated cities, the seats of commerce and learning, was enough to introduce them to the knowledge of the world, and to justify my absurd proposition, that they emerged from obscurity under the successors of Alexander.

The Jews remained and flourished under the mild dominion of the Macedonian princes, till they were were compelled to assert their civil and religious rights against Antiochus Epiphanes, who had adopted new maxims of tyranny; and the age of the Maccabees is perhaps the most glorious period of the Hebrew annals. Mr. Davis, who on this occasion is bewildered by the subtlety of Tacitus, does not comprehend why the historian should ascribe the independence of the Jews to three negative causes, "Macedonibus invalidis, Parthis nondum adultis, et Romani procul aberant." To the understanding of the critic, Tacitus might as well have observed, that the Jews were not destroyed by a plague, a famine, or an earthquake; and Mr. Davis cannot see, for his own part, any reason why they may not have elected kings of their own two or three hundred years before.* Such indeed was not the reason of Tacitus; he probably considered that every nation, depressed by the weight of a foreign power, naturally rises towards the surface, as soon as the pressure is removed; and he might think that, in a short and rapid history of the independence of the Jews, it was sufficient for him to shew that the obstacles did not exist, which, in an earlier or in a later period, would have checked their efforts. The curious reader, who has leisure to study the Jewish and Syrian history, will discover, that the throne of the Asmonæan princes was confirmed by the two great victories of the Parthians over Demetrius Nicator, and Antiochus Sidetes (see Joseph.

* Davis, page 4.

* Davis, page 8.

Antiquitat.

Antiquitat. Jud. l. xiii. c. 5, 6. 8, 9. Justin, xxxvi. 1. xxxviii. 10. with Usher and Prideaux, before Christ 141 and 130;) and the expression of Tacitus, the more closely it is examined, will be the more rationally admired.

My quotations* are the object of Mr. Davis's criticism,† as well as the text of this short, but obnoxious passage. He corrects the error of my memory, which had suggested servitutis instead of servientium; and so natural is the alliance between truth and moderation, that on this occasion he forgets his character, and candidly acquits me of any malicious design to misrepresent the words of Tacitus. The other references, which are contained in the first and second Notes of my Fifteenth Chapter are connected with each other, and can only be mistaken after they have been forcibly separated. The silence of Herodotus is a fair evidence of the obscurity of the Jews, who had escaped the eyes of so curious a traveller. The Jews are first mentioned by Justin, when he relates the siege of Jerusalem by Antiochus Sidetes; and the conquest of Judæa, by the arms of Pompey, engaged Diodorus and Dion to introduce that singular nation to the acquaintance of their readers. These epochs, which are within seventy years of each other, mark the age in which the Jewish people, emerging from their obscurity, began to act a part in the society of nations, and to excite the curiosity of the Greek and Roman historians.

* Gibbon, p. 537. Note 1, 2. † Davis, p. 10, 11. 20.

For

For that purpose only, I had appealed to the authority of Diodorus Siculus, of Justin, or rather of Trogus Pompeius, and of Dion Cassius. If I had designed to investigate the Jewish antiquities, reason, as well as faith, must have directed my inquiries to the Sacred Books, which, even as human productions, would deserve to be studied as one of the most curious and original monuments of the East.

I stand accused, though not indeed by Mr. Davis, for profanely depreciating the promised Land, as well as the chosen People. The Gentleman without a name has placed this charge in the front of his battle,* and if my memory does not deceive me, it is one of the few remarks in Mr. Apthorpe's book, which have any immediate relation to my History. They seem to consider in the light of a reproach, and of an unjust reproach, the idea which I had given of Palestine, as of a territory scarcely superior to Wales in extent and fertility;† and they strangely convert a geographical observation into a theological error. When I recollect that the imputation of a similar error was employed by the implacable Calvin, to precipitate and to justify the execution of Servetus, I must applaud the felicity of this country, and of this age, which has disarmed, if it could not mollify, the fierceness of ecclesiastical criticism. (See Dictionnaire Critique de Chauffepie, tom. iv. p. 223.)

As I had compared the narrow extent of Phœni-

* Remarks, p. 1. † Gibbon, p. 30.

cia

cia and Palestine with the important blessings which those celebrated countries had diffused over the rest of the earth, their minute size became an object not of censure but of praise.

Ingentes animos angusto in pectore versant.

The precise measure of Palestine was taken from Templeman's Survey of the Globe; he allows to Wales 7011 square English miles, to the Morea or Peloponnesus 7220, to the Seven United Provinces 7546, and to Judæa or Palestine 7600. The difference is not very considerable, and if any of these countries has been magnified beyond its real size, Asia is more liable than Europe to have been affected by the inaccuracy of Mr. Templeman's maps. To the authority of this modern survey, I shall only add the ancient and weighty testimony of Jerom, who passed in Palestine above thirty years of his life. From Dan to Bershebah, the two fixed and proverbial boundaries of the Holy Land, he reckons no more than one hundred and sixty miles (Hieronym. ad Dardanum. tom. iii. p. 66), and the breadth of Palestine cannot by any expedient be stretched to one half of its length. (See Reland, Palestin. L. ii. c. 5. p. 421.)

The degrees and limits of fertility cannot be ascertained with the strict simplicity of geographical measures. Whenever we speak of the productions of the earth, in different climates, our ideas must be relative, our expressions vague and doubtful; nor can we always distinguish between the gifts of Nature and the rewards of industry. The emperor Frederick II., the enemy and the victim of the the clergy, is accused of saying, after his return from his Crusade, that the God of the Jews would have despised his promised land, if he had once seen the fruitful realms of Sicily and Naples. (See Giannone Istoria Civile del Regno di Napoli, tom. ii. p. 245.) This raillery, which malice has perhaps falsely imputed to Frederick, is inconsistent with truth and piety; yet it must be confessed, that the soil of Palestine does not contain that inexhaustible, and as it were spontaneous principle of fecundity, which, under the most unfavourable circumstances, has covered with rich harvests the banks of the Nile, the fields of Sicily, or the plains of Poland. The Jordan is the only navigable river of Palestine: a considerable part of the narrow space is occupied, or rather lost, in the Dead Sea, whose horrid aspect inspires every sensation of disgust, and countenances every tale of horror. The districts which border on Arabia partake of the sandy quality of the adjacent desert. The face of the country, except the sea-coast and the valley of the Jordan, is covered with mountains, which appear for the most part as naked and barren rocks; and in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem there is a real scarcity of the two elements of earth and water. (See Maundrel's Travels, p. 65, and Reland Palestin. tom. i. p. 238—395.) These disadvantages, which now operate in their fullest extent, were formerly corrected by the labours of a numerous people, and the active protection of a wise government. The hills were clothed with rich beds of artificial mould, the rain was collected in in vast cisterns, a supply of fresh water was conveyed by pipes and aqueducts to the dry lands, the breed of cattle was encouraged in those parts which were not adapted for tillage, and almost every spot was compelled to yield some production for the use of the inhabitants. (See the same testimonies and observations of Maundrel and Reland.)

——————— Pater ipse colendi
Haud facilem esse viam voluit, primusque per artem
Movit agros; curis acuens mortalia corda
Nec torpere gravi passus SUA REGNA veterno.

Such are the useful victories which have been achieved by MAN on the lofty mountains of Switzerland, along the rocky coast of Genoa, and upon the barren hills of Palestine; and since Wales has flourished under the influence of English freedom, that rugged country has surely acquired some share of the same industrious merit and the same artificial fertility. Those critics who interpret the comparison of Palestine and Wales as a tacit libel on the former, are themselves guilty of an unjust satire against the latter of those countries. Such is the injustice of Mr. Apthorpe and of the anonymous Gentleman: but if Mr. Davis (as we may suspect from his name) is himself of Cambrian origin, his patriotism on this occasion has protected me from his zeal.

V. I shall begin this article by the confession of an error which candour might perhaps excuse, but which my Adversary magnifies by a pathetic interrogation. "When he tells us, that he has carefully fully examined all the original materials, are we to believe him? or is it his design to try how far the credulity and easy disposition of the age will suffer him to proceed unsuspected and undiscovered?"* Quousque tandem abuteris Catilina patientiâ nostrâ?

In speaking of the danger of idolatry, I had quoted the picturesque expression of Tertullian, "Recogita sylvam et quantæ latitant spinæ," and finding it marked c. 10. in my Notes, I hastily, though naturally, added de Idololatria, instead of de Corona Militis, and referred to one Treatise of Tertullian instead of another.† And now let me ask in my turn, whether Mr. Davis had any real knowledge of the passage which I had misplaced, or whether he made an ungenerous use of his advantage, to insinuate that I had invented or perverted the words of Tertullian? Ignorance is less criminal than malice, and I shall be satisfied if he will plead guilty to the milder charge.

The same observation may be extended to a passage of Le Clerc, which asserts, in the clearest terms, the ignorance of the more ancient Jews with regard to a future state. Le Clerc lay open before me, but while my eye moved from the book to the paper, I transcribed the reference c. 1. sect. 8. instead of sect. 1. c. 8. from the natural, but erroneous persuasion, that Chapter expressed the larger, and Section the smaller division:‡ and this difference, difference, of such trifling moment and so easily rectified, holds a distinguished place in the list of Misrepresentations which adorn Mr. Davis's Table of Contents.* But to return to Tertullian.

* Davis, p. 25. † Gibbon, p. 553. Note 40.
‡ Gibbon, p. 560. Note 58.

The infernal picture, which I had produced† from that vehement writer, which excited the horror of every humane reader, and which even Mr. Davis will not explicitly defend, has furnished him with a few critical cavils.‡ Happy should I think myself, if the materials of my History could be always exposed to the Examination of the Public; and I shall be content with appealing to the impartial Reader, whether my Version of this Passage is not as fair and as faithful, as the more literal translation which Mr. Davis has exhibited in an opposite column. I shall only justify two expressions which have provoked his indignation. 1. I had observed that the zealous African pursues the infernal description in a long variety of affected and unfeeling witticisms; the instances of Gods, of Kings, of Magistrates, of Philosophers, of Poets, of Tragedians, were introduced into my Translation. Those which I had omitted, relate to the Dancers, the Charioteers, and the Wrestlers; and it is almost impossible to express those conceits which are connected with the language and manners of the Romans. But the reader will be sufficiently shocked, when he is informed that Tertullian alludes to the improvement which the agility

* Davis, p. 19. † Gibbon, p. 566.
‡ Davis, p. 29—33.

of

of the Dancers, the red livery of the Charioteers, and the attitudes of the Wrestlers, would derive from the effects of fire. "Tunc histriones cognoscendi solutiores multo per ignem; tunc spectandus Auriga in flammea rota totus ruber. Tunc Xystici contemplandi, non in Gymnasiis, sed in igne jaculati." 2. I cannot refuse to answer Mr. Davis's very particular question, Why I appeal to Tertullian for the condemnation of the wisest and most virtuous of the Pagans? Because I am inclined to bestow that epithet on Trajan and the Antonines, Homer and Euripides, Plato and Aristotle, who are all manifestly included within the fiery description which I had produced.

I am accused of misquoting Tertullian ad Scapulam,* as an evidence that Martyrdoms were lately introduced into Africa.† Besides Tertullian, I had quoted from Ruinart (Acta Sincera, p. 84.) the Acts of the Scyllitan Martyrs; and a very moderate knowledge of Ecclesiastical History would have informed Mr. Davis, that the two authorities thus connected establish the proposition asserted in my Text. Tertullian, in the above-mentioned Chapter, speaks of one of the Proconsuls of Africa, Vigellius Saturninus, "qui primus hic gladium in nos egit;" the Acta Sincera represent the same Magistrate as the Judge of the Scyllitan Martyrs; and Ruinart, with the consent of the best critics, ascribes their sufferings to the persecution of Severus. Was it my fault if Mr. Davis was incapable of supplying the intermediate ideas?

* Davis, p. 35, 36.

† Gibbon, p. 609. N. 172.

Is it likewise necessary that I should justify the frequent use which I have made of Tertullian? His copious writings display a lively and interesting picture of the primitive Church, and the scantiness of original materials scarcely left me the liberty of choice. Yet as I was sensible, that the Montanism of Tertullian is the convenient screen which our orthodox Divines have placed before his errors, I have, with peculiar caution, confined myself to those works which were composed in the more early and sounder part of his life.

As a collateral justification of my frequent appeals to this African presbyter, I had introduced, in the third edition of my History, two passages of Jerom and Prudentius, which prove that Tertullian was the master of Cyprian, and that Cyprian was the master of the Latin Church.* Mr. Davis assures me, however, that I should have done better not to have "added this note,† as I have only accumulated my inaccuracies." One inaccuracy he has indeed detected, an error of the press, Hieronym. de Viris illustribus, c. 53 for 63; but this advantage is dearly purchased by Mr. Davis. Επισος τον διδασκαλον, which he produces as the original words of Cyprian, has a braver and more learned sound, than Da magistrum; but the quoting in Greek, a sentence which was pronounced,

* Gibbon, p. 566. N. 72.

† Davis, p. 145.

and

and is recorded, in Latin, seems to bear the mark of the most ridiculous pedantry; unless Mr. Davis, consulting for the first time the Works of Jerom, mistook the Version of Sophronius, which is printed in the opposite column, for the Text of his original Author. My reference to Prudentius, Hymn. xiii. 100. cannot so easily be justified, as I presumptuously believed that my critics would continue to read till they came to a full stop. I shall now place before them, not the first verse only, but the entire period, which they will find full, express, and satisfactory. The Poet says of St. Cyprian, whom he places in Heaven,

> Nec minus involitat terris, nec ab hoc recedit orbe:
> Disserit, eloquitur, tractat, docet, instruit, prophetat;
> Nec Libyæ populos tantum reget, exit usque in ortum
> Solis, et usque obitum; Gallos fovet, imbuit Britannos, > Presidet Hesperiæ, Christum serit ultimis Hibernis.

VI. On the subject of the imminent dangers which the Apocalypse has so narrowly escaped,* Mr. Davis accuses me of misrepresenting the sentiments of Sulpicius Severus and Fra-Paolo,† with this difference, however, that I was incapable of reading or understanding the text of the Latin author; but that I wilfully perverted the sense of the Italian historian. These imputations I shall easily wipe away, by shewing that, in the first instance, I am probably in the right; and that, in the second, he is certainly in the wrong.

SULPICIUS SEVERUS AND FRA-PAOLO.

* Gibbon, p. 563, 564. N. 67.
† Davis, p. 40—44.

1. The concise and elegant Sulpicius, who has been justly styled the Christian Sallust, afterm entioning the exile and revelations of St. John in the isle of Patmos, observes (and surely the observation is in the language of complaint,) "Librum sacræ Apocalypsis, qui quidem a plerisque aut stulte aut impie non recipitur, conscriptum edidit." I am found guilty of supposing plerique to signify the greater number; whereas Mr. Davis, with Stephens's Dictionary in his hand, is able to prove that plerique has not always that extensive meaning, and that a classic of good authority has used the word in a much more limited and qualified sense. Let the Examiner therefore try to apply his exception to this particular case. For my part, I stand under the protection of the general usage of the Latin language, and with a strong presumption in favour of the justice of my cause, or at least of the innocence and fairness of my intentions; since I have translated a familiar word, according to its acknowledged and ordinary acceptation.

But, "if I had looked into the passage, and found that Sulpicius Severus, there expressly tells us, that the Apocalypse was the work of St. John, I could not have committed so unfortunate a blunder, as to cite this Father as saying, That the greater number of Christians denied its Canonical authority."* Unfortunate indeed would have been my blunder, had I asserted that the same Christians who denied its Canonical authority, admitted it to be the work of an Apostle. Such indeed was the opinion of Severus himself, and his opinion has obtained the sanction of the Church; but the Christians whom he taxes with folly or impiety for rejecting this sacred book, must have supported their error by attributing the Apocalypse to some uninspired writer; to John the Presbyter, or to Cerinthus the Heretic.

* Davis, p. 270.

tians

If the rules of grammar and of logic authorise, or at least allow me to translate plerique by the greater number, the Ecclesiastical History of the fourth century illustrates and justifies this obvious interpretation. From a fair comparison of the populousness and learning of the Greek and Latin Churches, may I not conclude that the former contained the greater number of Christians qualified to pass sentence on a mysterious prophecy composed in the Greek language? May I not affirm, on the authority of St. Jerom, that the Apocalypse was generally rejected by the Greek Churches? "Quod si eam (the Epistle to the Hebrews) Latinorum consuetudo non recipit inter Scripturas Canonicas; nec Græcorum Ecclesiæ Apocalypsim Johannis eadem libertate suscipiunt. Et tamen nos utramque suscipimus, nequaquam hujus temporis consuetudinem, sed veterum auctoritatem sequentes." Epistol. ad Dardanum, tom. iii. p. 68.

It is not my design to enter any farther into the controverted history of that famous book; but I am called upon* to defend my Remark that the Apocalypse was tacitly excluded from the sacred canon by the council of Laodicea. (Canon LX.) To defend my Remark, I need only state the fact in a simple but more particular manner. The assembled Bishops of Asia, after enumerating all the books of the Old and New Testament which should be read in churches, omit the Apocalypse, and the Apocalypse alone; at a time when it was rejected or questioned by many pious and learned Christians, who might deduce a very plausible argument from the silence of the Synod.

2. When the Council of Trent resolved to pronounce sentence on the Canon of Scripture, the opinion which prevailed, after some debate, was to declare the Latin Vulgate authentic and almost infallible; and this sentence, which was guarded by formidable anathemas, secured all the books of the Old and New Testament which composed that ancient version, "che si dichiarassero tutti in tutte le parte come si trovano nella Biblia Latina, esser di Divina è ugual autorità." (Istoria del Concilio Tridentino, L. ii. p. 147. Helmstadt (Vicenza) 1761.) When the merit of that version was discussed, the majority of the theologians urged, with confidence and success, that it was absolutely necessary to receive the Vulgate as authentic and inspired, unless they wished to abandon the victory to the Lutherans, and the honours of the church

* By Mr. Davis, p. 41. and by Dr. Chelsum, Remarks, p. 57.

church to the Grammarians. "In contrario della maggior parte de' teologi era detto . . . che questi nuovi Grammatici confonderanno ogni cosa, e sarà fargli giudici e arbitri della fede; e in luogo de' teologi e canonisti, converrà tener il pri moconto nell' assumere a Vescovati e Cardinalati de' pedanti." (Istoria del Concilio Tridentino, L. ii. p. 149.) The sagacious historian, who had studied the Council, and the judicious Le Courayer, who had studied his author (Histoire du Concile de Trente, tom. i. p. 245. Londres 1736), consider this ridiculous reason as the most powerful argument which influenced the debates of the Council: but Mr. Davis, jealous of the honour of a synod which placed tradition on a level with the Bible, affirms that Fra-Paolo has given another more substantial reason on which these Popish bishops built their determination, That after dividing the books under their consideration into three classes; of those which had been always held for divine; of those whose authenticity had formerly been doubted, but which by use and custom had acquired canonical authority; and of those which had never been properly certified; the Apocalypse was judiciously placed by the Fathers of the Council in the second of these classes.

The Italian passage, which, for that purpose, Mr. Davis has alleged at the bottom of his page, is indeed taken from the text of Fra-Paolo; but the reader, who will give himself the trouble, or rather the pleasure, of perusing that incomparable historian, will discover that Mr. Davis has only mistaken a motion of the opposition, for a measure of the administration. He will find, that this critical division, which is so erroneously ascribed to the public reason of the council, was no more than the ineffectual proposal of a temperate minority, which was soon over-ruled by a majority of artful statesmen, bigotted monks, and dependent bishops.

"We have here an evident proof that Mr. Gibbon is equally expert in misrepresenting a modern as an ancient writer, or that he wilfully conceals the most material reason, with a design, no doubt, to instil into his reader a notion, that the authenticity of the Apocalypse is built on the slightest foundation."*

CLEMENS. VII. I had cautiously observed (for I was apprized of the obscurity of the subject) that the Epistle of Clemens does not lead us to discover any traces of Episcopacy either at Corinth or Rome.† In this observation I particularly alluded to the republican form of salutation, "The church of God inhabiting Rome, to the church of God inhabiting Corinth;" without the least mention of a bishop or president in either of those ecclesiastical assemblies.

Yet the piercing eye of Mr. Davis ‡ can discover not only traces, but evident proofs, of Episcopacy, in this Epistle of Clemens; and he actually quotes two passages, in which he distinguishes by capital

* Davis, p. 44. † Gibbon, p. 592. N. 110.
‡ Davis, p. 44, 45.

letters

letters the word BISHOPS, whose institution Clemens refers to the Apostles themselves. But can Mr. Davis hope to gain credit by such egregious trifling? While we are searching for the origin of bishops, not merely as an ecclesiastical title, but as the peculiar name of an order distinct from that of presbyters, he idly produces a passage, which, by declaring that the apostles established in every place bishops and deacons, evidently confounds the presbyters with one or other of those two ranks. I have neither inclination nor interest to engage in a controversy which I had considered only in an historical light; but I have already said enough to shew, that there are more traces of a disingenuous mind in Mr. Davis, than of an episcopal order in the Epistle of Clemens.

VIII. Perhaps, on some future occasion, I may examine the historical character of Eusebius; perhaps I may inquire, how far it appears from his words and actions, that the learned bishop of Cæsarea was averse to the use of fraud, when it was employed in the service of religion. At present, I am only concerned to defend my own truth and honour, from the reproach of misrepresenting the sense of the ecclesiastical historian. Some of the charges of Mr. Davis on this head are so strong, so pointed, so vehemently urged, that he seems to have staked, on the event of the trial, the merits of our respective characters. If his assertions are true, I deserve the contempt of learned, and the abhorrence of good men. If they are false, * * * * * * * * * *

EUSEBIUS.

1. I had

1. I had remarked, without any malicious intention, that one of the seventeen Christians who suffered at Alexandria was likewise accused of robbery.* Mr. Davis † seems enraged because I did not add that he was falsely accused, takes some unnecessary pains to convince me that the Greek word εσυκοφαντηθη signifies falso accusatus, and "can hardly think that any one who had looked into the original, would dare thus absolutely to contradict the plain testimony of the author he pretends to follow." A simple narrative of this fact, in the relation of which Mr. Davis has really suppressed several material circumstances, will afford the clearest justification.

Eusebius has preserved an original letter from Dionysius bishop of Alexandria to Fabius bishop of Antioch, in which the former relates the circumstances of the persecution which had lately afflicted the capital of Egypt. He allows a rank among the martyrs to one Nemesion, an Egyptian, who was falsely or maliciously accused as a companion of robbers. Before the centurion he justified himself from this calumny, which did not relate to him; but being charged as a Christian, he was brought in chains before the governor. That unjust magistrate, after inflicting on Nemesion a

* Gibbon, p. 654. N. 75.

† Davis, p. 61, 62, 63. This ridiculous charge is repeated by another sycophant, (in the Greek sense of the word,) and forms one of the valuable communications, which the learning of a Randolph suggested to the candour of a Chelsum. See Remarks, p. 209.

double double measure of stripes and tortures, gave orders that he should be burnt with the robbers. (Dionys. apud Euseb. L. vi. c. 41.)

It is evident that Dionysius represents the religious sufferer as innocent of the criminal accusation which had been falsely brought against him. It is no less evident, that whatever might be the opinion of the Centurion, the supreme magistrate considered Nemesion as guilty, and that he affected to shew, by the measure of his tortures, and by the companions of his execution, that he punished him, not only as a Christian, but as a robber. The evidence against Nemesion, and that which might be produced in his favour, are equally lost; and the question (which fortunately is of little moment) of his guilt or innocence rests solely on the opposite judgments of his ecclesiastical and civil superiors. I could easily perceive that both the bishop and the governor were actuated by different passions and prejudices towards the unhappy sufferer; but it was impossible for me to decide which of the two was most likely to indulge his prejudices and passions at the expense of truth. In this doubtful situation I conceived that I had acted with the most unexceptionable caution, when I contented myself with observing that Nemesion was accused; a circumstance of a public and authentic nature, in which both parties were agreed.

Mr. Davis will no longer ask, "What possible evasion then can Mr. Gibbon have recourse to, to convince convince the world that I have falsely accused him of a gross misrepresentation of Eusebius?"

2. Mr. Davis* charges me with falsifying (falsifying is a very serious word) the testimony of Eusebius; because it suited my purpose to magnify the humanity and even kindness of Maxentius towards the afflicted Christians.† To support this charge, he produces some part of a chapter of Eusebius, the English in his text, the Greek in his notes, and makes the ecclesiastical historian express himself in the following terms: "Although Maxentius at first favoured the Christians with a view of popularity, yet afterwards, being addicted to magic, and every other impiety, HE exerted himself in persecuting the Christians, in a more severe and destructive manner than his predecessors had done before him."

If it were in my power to place the volume and chapter of Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. L. viii. c. 14.) before the eyes of every reader, I should be satisfied and silent. I should not be under the necessity of protesting, that in the passage quoted, or rather abridged, by my adversary, the second member of the period, which alone contradicts my account of Maxentius, has not the most distant reference to that odious tyrant. After distinguishing the mild conduct which he affected towards the Christians, Eusebius proceeds to animadvert with becoming severity on the general vices of his reign; the rapes, the murders, the oppression, the promiscuous massacres, which I had faithfully related in their proper place, and in which the Christians, not in their religious, but in their civil capacity, must occasionally have shared with the rest of his unhappy subjects. The ecclesiastical historian then makes a transition to another tyrant, the cruel Maximin, who carried away from his friend and ally Maxentius the prize of superior wickedness; for HE was addicted to magic arts, and was a cruel persecutor of the Christians. The evidence of words and facts, the plain meaning of Eusebius, the concurring testimony of Cæcilius or Lactantius, and the superfluous authority of versions and commentators, establish beyond the reach of doubt or cavil, that Maximin, and not Maxentius, is stigmatized as a persecutor, and that Mr. Davis alone has deserved the reproach of falsifying the testimony of Eusebius.

* Davis, p. 64, 65. † Gibbon, p. 693. N. 168.

his

Let him examine the chapter on which he founds his accusation. If in that moment his feelings are not of the most painful and humiliating kind, he must indeed be an object of pity!

3. A gross blunder is imputed to me by this polite antagonist,* for quoting, under the name of Jerom, the Chronicle which I ought to have described as the work and property of Eusebius;† and Mr. Davis kindly points out the occasion of my blunder, That it was the consequence of my looking

* Davis, p. 66. † Gibbon, p. 673. N. 125.

looking no farther than Dodwell for this remark, and of not rightly understanding his reference. Perhaps the Historian of the Roman Empire may be credited, when he affirms that he frequently consulted a Latin Chronicle of the affairs of that empire; and he may the sooner be credited, if he shews that he knows something more of this Chronicle besides the name and the title-page.

Mr. Davis, who talks so familiarly of the Chronicle of Eusebius, will be surprised to hear that the Greek original no longer exists. Some chronological fragments, which had successively passed through the hands of Africanus and Eusebius, are still extant, though in a very corrupt and mutilated state, in the compilations of Syncellus and Cedrenus. They have been collected, and disposed by the labour and ingenuity of Joseph Scaliger; but that proud critic, always ready to applaud his own success, did not flatter himself that he had restored the hundredth part of the genuine Chronicle of Eusebius. "Ex eo (Syncello) omnia Eusebiana excerpsimus quæ quidem deprehendere potuimus; quæ, quanquam ne centesima quidem pars eorum esse videtur quæ ab Eusebio relicta sunt, aliquod tamen justum volumen explere possunt."—(Jos. Scaliger. Animadversiones in Græca Eusebii in Thesauro Temporum, p. 401. Amstelod. 1658.) While the Chronicle of Eusebius was perfect and entire, the second book was translated into Latin by Jerom, with the freedom, or rather licence, which that voluminous author, as well as his friend or enemy Rufinus, always assumed. "Plurima in vertendo vertendo mutat, infulcit, præterit," says Scaliger himself, in the Prolegomena, p. 22. In the persecution of Aurelian, which has so much offended Mr. Davis, we are able to distinguish the work of Eusebius from that of Jerom, by comparing the expressions of the Ecclesiastical History with those of the Chronicle. The former affirms, that towards the end of his reign, Aurelian was moved by some councils to excite a persecution against the Christians; that his design occasioned a great and general rumour; but that when the letters were prepared, and as it were signed, divine justice dismissed him from the world. Ηδη τισι εξελαις ως αν διωγμον καθ' ἡμων εγειρειεν ανεκινειτο. πολυς τε ην ὁ παρα πασι περι τουτε λογος. μελλοντα δε ηδη και σχεδον ειπειν τοις καθ' ἡμων γραμμασιν υποσημειωμενον, θεια μετεισιν δικη. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. L. vii. c. 30. Whereas the Chronicle relates, that Aurelian was killed after he had excited or moved a persecution against the Christians, "cum adversum nos persecutionem movisset."

From this manifest difference I assume a right to assert; first, that the expression of the Chronicle of Jerom, which is always proper, became in this instance necessary; and secondly, that the language of the fathers is so ambiguous and incorrect, that we are at a loss to determine how far Aurelian had carried his intention before he was assassinated. I have neither perverted the fact, nor have I been guilty of a gross blunder.

IX. "The persons accused of Christianity had a con- JUSTIN MARTYR.

a convenient time allowed them to settle their domestic concerns, and to prepare their answer."* This observation had been suggested, partly by a general expression of Cyprian (de Lapsis, p. 88. Edit. Fell. Amstelod. 1700.) and more especially by the second Apology of Justin Martyr, who gives a particular and curious example of this legal delay.

The expressions of Cyprian, " dies negantibus præstitutus, &c." which Mr. Davis most prudently suppresses, are illustrated by Mosheim in the following words: " Primum qui delati erant aut suspecti, illis certum dierum spatium judex definiebat, quo decurrente, secum deliberare poterant, utrum profiteri Christum an negare mallent; explorandæ fidei præfiniebantur dies, per hoc tempus liberi manebant in domibus suis; nec impediebat aliquis quod ex consequentibus apparet, ne fugâ sibi consulerent. Satis hoc erat humanum." (De Rebus Christianis ante Constantinum, p. 480.) The practice of Egypt was sometimes more expeditious and severe; but this humane indulgence was still allowed in Africa during the persecution of Decius.

But my appeal to Justin Martyr is encountered by Mr. Davis with the following declaration:† " The reader will observe, that Mr. Gibbon does not make any reference to any section or division of this part of Justin's work; with what view we may shrewdly suspect, when I tell him, that after an

* Gibbon, p. 663. † Davis, p. 71, 72.

an accurate perusal of the whole second Apology, I can boldly affirm, that the following instance is the only one that bears the most distant similitude to what Mr. Gibbon relates as above on the authority of Justin. What I find in Justin is as follows: "A woman being converted to Christianity, is afraid to associate with her husband, because he is an abandoned reprobate, lest she should partake of his sins. Her husband, not being able to accuse her, vents his rage in this manner on one Ptolemæus, a teacher of Christianity, and who had converted her, &c." Mr. Davis then proceeds to relate the severities inflicted on Ptolemæus, who made a frank and instant profession of his faith; and he sternly exclaims, that if I take every opportunity of passing encomiums on the humanity of Roman magistrates, it is incumbent on me to produce better evidence than this.

His demand may be easily satisfied, and I need only for that purpose transcribe and translate the words of Justin, which immediately precede the Greek quotation alleged at the bottom of my adversary's page. I am possessed of two editions of Justin Martyr, that of Cambridge, 1768, in 8vo. by Dr. Ashton, who only published the two Apologies; and that of all his works, published in folio, Paris, 1742, by the Benedictines of the Congregation of St. Maar: the following curious passage may be found, p. 164, of the former, and p. 89, of the latter edition: Κατηγοριαν πεποιηται, λεγων αυτην χριστιανην ειναι, και ἡ μεν βιβλιδιον σοι τω αυτοκρατορι αναδεδωκε, προτερον συνχωρηθηναι αυτη διοικησασθαι τα εαυτης αξιωσα. επειτα απολογησασθαι περι τε κατηγορματος, μετα την των πραγματων αυτης διοικησιν. και συνεχωρησας τουτο.

"He brought an accusation against her, saying, that she was a christian. But she presented a petition to the emperor, praying that she might first be allowed to settle her domestic concerns; and promising, that after she had settled them, she would then put in her answer to the accusation. This you granted."

I disdain to add a single reflection; nor shall I qualify the conduct of my adversary with any of those harsh epithets, which might be interpreted as the expressions of resentment, though I should be constrained to use them as the only words in the English language which could accurately represent my cool and unprejudiced sentiments.

LACTANTIUS. X. In stating the toleration of Christianity during the greatest part of the reign of Diocletian, I had observed,* that the principal officers of the palace, whose names and functions were particularly specified, enjoyed, with their wives and children, the free exercise of the Christian religion. Mr. Davis twice affirms,† in the most deliberate manner, that this pretended fact, which is asserted on the sole authority, is contradicted by the positive evidence, of Lactantius. In both these affirmations Mr. Davis is inexcusably mistaken.

1. When the storms of persecution arose, the priests, who were offended by the sign of the

* Gibbon, p. 676. N. 133, 134.

† Davis, p. 75, 76.

Cross,

Cross, obtained an order from the Emperor, that the profane, the Christians, who accompanied him to the Temple, should be compelled to offer sacrifice; and this incident is mentioned by the rhetorician, to whom I shall not at present refuse the name of Lactantius. The act of idolatry, which, at the expiration of eighteen years, was required of the officers of Diocletian, is a manifest proof that their religious freedom had hitherto been inviolate, except in the single instance of waiting on their master to the Temple; a service less criminal than the profane compliance for which the minister of the King of Syria solicited the permission of the prophet of Israel.

2. The reference which I made to Lactantius expressly pointed out this exception to their freedom. But the proof of the toleration was built on a different testimony, which my disingenuous adversary has concealed; an ancient and curious instruction composed by Bishop Theonas, for the use of Lucian, and the other Christian eunuchs of the palace of Diocletian. This authentic piece was published in the Spicilegium of Dom Luc d'Acheri; as I had not the opportunity of consulting the original, I was contented with quoting it on the faith of Tillemont, and the reference to it immediately precedes (ch. xvi. note 133.) the citation of Lactantius (note 134.)

Mr. Davis may now answer his own question, "What apology can be made for thus asserting, on the sole authority of Lactantius, facts which Lactantius so expressly denies?"

Dion Cassius.

XI. "I have already given a curious instance of our author's asserting, on the authority of Dion Cassius, a fact not mentioned by that historian. I shall now produce a very singular proof of his endeavouring to conceal from us a passage really contained in him."* Nothing but the angry vehemence with which these charges are urged, could engage me to take the least notice of them. In themselves they are doubly contemptible; they are trifling, and they are false.

1. Mr. Davis† had imputed to me as a crime, that I had mentioned, on the sole testimony of Dion, (L. lxviii. p. 1145,) the spirit of rebellion which inflamed the Jews, from the reign of Nero to that of Antoninus Pius,‡ whilst the passage of that historian is confined to an insurrection in Cyprus and Cyrene, which broke out within that period. The reader who will cast his eye on the note (ch. xvi. note 1.) which is supported by that quotation from Dion, will discover that it related only to this particular fact. The general position, which is indeed too notorious to require any proof, I had carefully justified in the course of the same paragraph; partly by another reference to Dion Cassius, partly by an allusion to the well-known history of Josephus, and partly by several quotations from the learned and judicious Basnage, who has explained, in the most satisfactory manner, the principles and conduct of the rebellious Jews.

2. The passage of Dion, which I am accused of

* Davis, p. 83. † Idem, p. 11. ‡ Gibbon, p. 622.

endea-

endeavouring to conceal, might perhaps have remained invisible, even to the piercing eye of Mr. Davis, if I had not carefully reported it in its proper place:* and it was in my power to report it, without being guilty of any inconsiderate contradiction. I had observed, that, in the large history of Dion Cassius, Xiphilin had not been able to discover the name of Christians: yet I afterwards quote a passage, in which Marcia, the favourite concubine of Commodus, is celebrated as the patroness of the Christians. Mr. Davis has transcribed my quotation, but he has concealed the important words which I now distinguish by Italics. (Ch. xvi. note 106. Dion Cassius or rather his abbreviator Xiphilin, L. lxxii. p. 1206.) The reference is fairly made and cautiously qualified: I am already secure from the imputations of fraud or inconsistency; and the opinion which attributes the last-mentioned passage to the abbreviator, rather than to the original historian, may be supported by the most unexceptionable authorities. I shall protect myself by those of Reimar (in his edition of Dion Cassius, tom. ii. p. 1207. note 34) and of Dr. Lardner: and shall only transcribe the words of the latter, in his Collection of Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, vol. iii. p. 57.

"This paragraph I rather think to be Xiphilin's than Dion's. The style at least is Xiphilin's. In the other passages before quoted, Dion speaks of impiety, or atheism, or Judaism; but never useth the word Christians. Another thing that may make us doubt whether this observation be entirely Dion's is the phrase, 'it is related (ἱστορεῖται).' For at the beginning of the reign of Commodus, he says, 'These things, and what follows, I write not from the report of others, but from my own knowledge and observation.' However, the sense may be Dion's; but I wish we had also his style, without any adulteration." For my own part, I must, in my private opinion, ascribe even the sense of this passage to Xiphilin. The Monk might eagerly collect and insert an anecdote which related to the domestic history of the church; but the religion of a courtezan must have appeared an object of very little moment in the eyes of a Roman consul, who, at least in every other part of his history, disdained or neglected to mention the name of the Christians.

* Gibbon, p. 667. N. 107.

"What shall we say now? Do we not discover the name of Christians in the history of Dion? With what assurance then can Mr. Gibbon, after asserting a fact manifestly untrue, lay claim to the merits of diligence and accuracy, the indispensable duty of an historian? Or can he expect us to credit his assertion, that he has carefully examined all the original materials?"*

Mr. Gibbon may still maintain the character of an historian; but it is difficult to conceive how Mr. Davis will support his pretensions, if he aspires to that of a gentleman.

* Davis, p. 83.

I almost

I almost hesitate whether I should take any notice of another ridiculous charge which Mr. Davis includes in the article of Dion Cassius. My adversary owns, that I have occasionally produced the several passages of the Augustan History which relate to the Christians; but he fiercely contends that they amount to more than six lines.* I really have not measured them: nor did I mean that loose expression as a precise and definite number. If, on a nicer survey, those short hints, when they are brought together, should be found to exceed six of the long lines of my folio edition, I am content that my critical antagonist should substitute eight, or ten, or twelve lines; nor shall I think either my learning or veracity much interested in this important alteration.

XII. After a short description of the unworthy conduct of those Apostates who, in a time of persecution, deserted the Faith of Christ, I produced the evidence of a Pagan Proconsul,† and of two Christian Bishops, Pliny, Dionysius of Alexandria, and Cyprian. And here the unforgiving Critic remarks, "That Pliny has not particularized that difference of conduct (in the different apostates) which Mr. Gibbon here describes: yet his name stands at the head of those authors whom he has cited on the occasion. It is allowed indeed that this distinction is made by the other authors; but as Pliny, the first referred to by Mr. Gibbon, PLINY, &c.

* Gibbon, p. 634. N. 24. † Idem, p. 664. N. 102.

gives him no cause or reason to use them," (I cannot help Mr. Davis's bad English,) it is certainly very reprehensible in our author, thus to confound their testimony, and to make a needless and improper reference."*

A criticism of this sort can only tend to expose Mr. Davis's total ignorance of historical composition. The writer who aspires to the name of historian, is obliged to consult a variety of original testimonies, each of which, taken separately, is perhaps imperfect and partial. By a judicious reunion and arrangement of these dispersed materials, he endeavours to form a consistent and interesting narrative. Nothing ought to be inserted which is not proved by some of the witnesses; but their evidence must be so intimately blended together, that as it is unreasonable to expect that each of them should vouch for the whole, so it would be impossible to define the boundaries of their respective property. Neither Pliny, nor Dionysius, nor Cyprian, mention all the circumstances and distinctions of the conduct of the Christian apostates; but if any of them was withdrawn, the account which I have given would, in some instance, be defective.

Thus much I thought necessary to say, as several of the subsequent misrepresentations of Orosius, of Bayle, of Fabricius, of Gregory of Tours, &c.,† which provoked the fury of Mr. Davis, are derived only

* Davis, p. 87, 88. † Davis, p. 88. 90. 137.

only from the ignorance of this common historical principle.

Another class of misrepresentations, which my adversary urges with the same degree of vehemence, (see in particular those of Justin, Diodorus Siculus, and even Tacitus,) requires the support of another principle, which has not yet been introduced into the art of criticism; that when a modern historian appeals to the authority of the ancients for the truth of any particular fact, he makes himself answerable, I know not to what extent, for all the circumjacent errors or inconsistencies of the authors whom he has quoted.

XIII. I am accused of throwing out a false accusation against this Father,* because I had observed† that Ignatius, defending against the Gnostics the resurrection of Christ, employs a vague and doubtful tradition, instead of quoting the certain testimony of the Evangelists: and this observation was justified by a remarkable passage of Ignatius, in his Epistle to the Smyrnæans, which I cited according to the volume and the page of the best edition of the Apostolical Fathers, published at Amsterdam, 1724, in two volumes in folio. The criticism of Mr. Davis is announced by one of those solemn declarations which leave not any refuge, if they are convicted of falsehood. "I cannot find any passage that bears the least affinity to what Mr. Gibbon observes, in the whole Epistle, which I have read over more than once." IGNATIUS.

* Davis, p. 100, 101. † Gibbon, p. 551. N. 35.

I had

I had already marked the situation, nor is it in my power to prove the existence of this passage, by any other means than by producing the words of the original. Εγω γαρ και μετα την αναστασιν εν σαρκι αυτον οιδα και πιστευω οντα, και οτε προς τους περι Πετρον ηλθεν, εφη αυτοις, λαβετε, ψυλαφησατε με, και ιδετε οτι ουκ' ειμι δαιμονιον ασωματον. και ευθυς αυτω ἡψαντο, και επιστευσαν· "I have known, and I believe, that after his resurrection likewise he existed in the flesh: And when he came to Peter, and to the rest, he said unto them, Take, handle me, and see that I am not an incorporeal dæmon or spirit. And they touched him, and believed." The faith of the Apostles confuted the impious error of the Gnostics, which attributed only the appearances of a human body to the Son of God: and it was the great object of Ignatius, in the last moments of his life, to secure the Christians of Asia from the snares of those dangerous Heretics. According to the tradition of the modern Greeks, Ignatius was the child whom Jesus received into his arms (see Tillemont Mem. Eccles. tom. ii. part ii. p. 43.); yet as he could scarcely be old enough to remember the resurrection of the Son of God, he must have derived his knowledge either from our present Evangelists, or from some apocryphal Gospel, or from some unwritten tradition.

1. The Gospels of St. Luke and St. John would undoubtedly have supplied Ignatius with the most invincible proofs of the reality of the body of Christ, when he appeared to the Apostles after his resurrection; but neither of those Gospels contain the the characteristic words of ἐκ δαιμονίου ἀσωμάτου, and the important circumstance that either Peter, or those who were with Peter, touched the body of Christ and believed. Had the saint designed to quote the Evangelist on a very nice subject of controversy, he would not surely have exposed himself, by an inaccurate, or rather by a false, reference, to the just reproaches of the Gnostics. On this occasion, therefore, Ignatius did not employ, as he might have done, against the Heretics, the certain testimony of the Evangelists.

2. Jerom, who cites this remarkable passage from the Epistle of Ignatius to the Smyrnæans (see Catalog. Script. Eccles. in Ignatio, tom. i. p. 273. edit. Erasm. Basil, 1537.), is of opinion that it was taken from the Gospel which he himself had lately translated: and this, from the comparison of two other passages in the same work (in Jacob. et in Matthæo, p. 264.), appears to have been the Hebrew Gospel, which was used by the Nazarenes of Beræa, as the genuine composition of St. Matthew. Yet Jerom mentions another Copy of this Hebrew Gospel, (so different from the Greek Text,) which was extant in the library formed at Cæsarea, by the care of Pamphilus: whilst the learned Eusebius, the friend of Pamphilus and the Bishop of Cæsarea, very frankly declares (His. Eccles. L. iii. c. 36.), that he is ignorant from whence Ignatius borrowed those words, which are the subject of the present inquiry.

3. The doubt which remains, is only whether he took them from an Apocryphal Book, or from unwritten unwritten tradition: and I thought myself safe from every species of critics, when I embraced the rational sentiment of Casaubon and Pearson. I shall produce the words of the Bishop: "Præterea iterum observandum est, quod de hac re scripsit Isaacus Casaubonus, Quinetiam fortasse verius, non ex Evangelio Hebraico, Ignatium illa verba descripsisse, verum traditionem allegasse non scriptam, quæ postea in literas fuerit relata, et Hebraico Evangelio, quod Matthæo tribuebant, inserta. Et hoc quidem mihi multo verisimilius videtur." (Pearson. Vindiciæ Ignatianæ, part ii. c. ix. p. 396. in tom. ii. Patr. Apostol.)

I may now submit to the judgment of the Public, whether I have looked into the Epistle which I cite with such a parade of learning, and how profitably Mr. Davis has read it over more than once.

Mosheim. XIV. The learning and judgment of Mosheim had been of frequent use in the course of my Historical Inquiry, and I had not been wanting in proper expressions of gratitude. My vexatious adversary is always ready to start from his ambuscade, and to harass my march by a mode of attack which cannot easily be reconciled with the laws of honourable war. The greatest part of the Misrepresentations of Mosheim, which Mr. Davis has imputed to me,* are of such a nature, that I must indeed be humble, if I could persuade myself to bestow a moment of serious attention on them. Whether Mosheim could prove that an absolute community

* Davis, p. 95—97. 104—107. 114—132.

community of goods was not established among the first Christians of Jerusalem; whether he suspected the purity of the Epistles of Ignatius; whether he censured Dr. Middleton with temper or indignation (in this cause I must challenge Mr. Davis as an incompetent judge); whether he corroborates the whole of my description of the prophetic office; whether he speaks with approbation of the humanity of Pliny; and whether he attributed the same sense to the malefica of Suetonius, and the exitiabilis of Tacitus? These questions, even as Mr. Davis has stated them, lie open to the judgment of every reader, and the superfluous observations which I could make, would be an abuse of their time and of my own. As little shall I think of consuming their patience, by examining whether Le Clerc and Mosheim labour in the interpretation of some texts of the Fathers, and particularly of a passage of Irenæus, which seem to favour the pretensions of the Roman Bishop. The material part of the passage of Irenæus consists of about four lines; and in order to shew that the interpretations of Le Clerc and Mosheim are not laboured, Mr. Davis abridges them as much as possible in the space of twelve pages. I know not whether the perusal of my History will justify the suspicion of Mr. Davis, that I am secretly inclined to the interest of the Pope: but I cannot discover how the Protestant cause can be affected, if Irenæus in the second, or Palavicini in the seventeenth century, were tempted, by any private views, to countenance in their writings the system of ecclesiastical tical dominion, which has been pursued in every age by the aspiring Bishops of the Imperial city. Their conduct was adapted to the revolutions of the Christian Republic, but the same spirit animated the haughty breasts of Victor the First, and of Paul the Fifth.

There still remain one or two of these imputed Misrepresentations, which appear, and indeed only appear, to merit a little more attention. In stating the opinion of Mosheim with regard to the progress of the Gospel, Mr. Davis boldly declares, "that I have altered the truth of Mosheim's history, that I might have an opportunity of contradicting the belief and wishes of the Fathers."* In other words, I have been guilty of uttering a malicious falsehood.

I had endeavoured to mitigate the sanguine expression of the Fathers of the second century, who had too hastily diffused the light of Christianity over every part of the globe, by observing, as an undoubted fact, "that the barbarians of Scythia and Germany, who subverted the Roman Monarchy, were involved in the errors of Paganism; and that even the conquest of Iberia, of Armenia, or of Æthiopia, was not attempted with any degree of success, till the sceptre was in the hands of an orthodox Emperor."† I had referred the curious reader to the fourth century of Mosheim's General History of the Church: now Mr. Davis has discovered, and can prove, from that excellent work,

* Davis, p. 127. † Gibbon, p. 611, 612.

work, "that Christianity, not long after its first rise, had been introduced into the less as well as greater Armenia; that part of the Goths, who inhabited Thracia, Mœsia, and Dacia, had received the Christian religion long before this century; and that Theophilus, their Bishop, was present at the Council of Nice."*

On this occasion, the reference was made to a popular work of Mosheim, for the satisfaction of the reader, that he might obtain the general view of the progress of Christianity in the fourth century, which I had gradually acquired by studying with some care the Ecclesiastical Antiquities of the Nations beyond the limits of the Roman Empire. If I had reasonably supposed that the result of our common inquiries must be the same, should I have deserved a very harsh censure for my unsuspecting confidence? Or if I had declined the invidious task of separating a few immaterial errors, from a just and judicious representation, might not my respect for the name and merit of Mosheim have claimed some indulgence? But I disdain those excuses, which only a candid adversary would allow. I can meet Mr. Davis on the hard ground of controversy, and retort on his own head the charge of concealing a part of the truth. He himself has dared to suppress the words of my text, which immediately followed his quotation. "Before that time the various accidents of war and commerce might indeed diffuse an imperfect

* Davis, p. 126, 127.

knowledge

knowledge of the Gospel among the tribes of Caledonia, and among the borderers of the Rhine, the Danube, and the Euphrates;" and Mr. Davis has likewise suppressed one of the justificatory Notes on this passage, which expressly points out the time and circumstances of the first Gothic conversions. These exceptions, which I had cautiously inserted, and Mr. Davis has cautiously concealed, are superfluous for the provinces of Thrace, Mœsia, and the Lesser Armenia, which were contained within the precincts of the Roman Empire. They allow an ample scope for the more early conversion of some independent districts of Dacia and the Greater Armenia, which bordered on the Danube and Euphrates; and the entire sense of this passage, which Mr. Davis first mutilates and then attacks, is perfectly consistent with the original text of the learned Mosheim.

And yet I will fairly confess that, after a nicer inquiry into the epoch of the Armenian Church, I am not satisfied with the accuracy of my own expression. The assurance that the first Christian King, and the first Archbishop, Tiridates, and St. Gregory the Illuminator, were still alive several years after the death of Constantine, inclined me to believe, that the conversion of Armenia was posterior to the auspicious Revolution, which had given the sceptre of Rome to the hands of an orthodox Emperor. But I had not enough considered the two following circumstances. 1. I might have recollected the dates assigned by Moses of Chorene, who, on this occasion, may be regarded as

as a competent witness. Tiridates ascended the throne of Armenia in the third year of Diocletian, (Hist. Armeniæ, L. ii. c. 79. p. 207,) and St. Gregory, who was invested with the Episcopal character in the seventeenth year of Tiridates, governed almost thirty years the Church of Armenia, and disappeared from the world in the forty-sixth year of the reign of the same Prince. (Hist. Armeniæ, L. ii. c. 88. p. 224, 225.) The consecration of St. Gregory must therefore be placed A. D. 303, and the conversion of the King and kingdom was soon achieved by that successful missionary. 2. The unjust and inglorious war which Maximin undertook against the Armenians, the ancient faithful allies of the Republic, was evidently derived from a motive of superstitious zeal. The historian Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. L. ix. c. 8. p. 448. edit. Cantab.) considers the pious Armenians as a nation of Christians, who bravely defended themselves from the hostile oppression of an idolatrous tyrant. Instead of maintaining "that the conversion of Armenia was not attempted with any degree of success till the sceptre was in the hands of an orthodox Emperor," I ought to have observed, that the seeds of the faith were deeply sown during the season of the last and greatest persecution, that many Roman exiles might assist the labours of Gregory, and that the renowned Tiridates, the hero of the East, may dispute with Constantine the honour of being the first Sovereign who embraced the Christian religion.

In a future edition, I shall rectify an expression which, in strictness, can only be applied to the kingdoms of Iberia and Æthiopia. Had the error been exposed by Mr. Davis himself, I should not have been ashamed to correct it; but I am ashamed at being reduced to contend with an adversary who is unable to discover, or to improve, his own advantages.

But, instead of prosecuting any inquiry from whence the Public might have gained instruction, and himself credit, Mr. Davis chooses to perplex his readers with some angry cavils about the progress of the Gospel in the second century. What does he mean to establish or to refute? Have I denied, that before the end of that period Christianity was very widely diffused both in the East and in the West? Has not Justin Martyr affirmed, without exception or limitation, that it was already preached to every nation on the face of the earth? Is that proposition true at present? Could it be true in the time of Justin? Does not Mosheim acknowledge the exaggeration? "Demus, nec enim quæ in oculos incurrunt infitiari audemus, esse in his verbis exaggerationis nonnihil. Certum enim est diu post Justini ætatem, multas orbis terrarum gentes cognitione Christi caruisse." (Mosheim de Rebus Christianis, p. 203.) Does he not expose (p. 205), with becoming scorn and indignation, the falsehood and vanity of the hyperboles of Tertullian? "bonum hominem æstu imaginationis elatum non satis adtendisse ad ea quæ literis consignabat."

The high esteem which Mr. Davis expresses for the the writings of Mosheim, would alone convince me how little he has read them, since he must have been perpetually offended and disgusted by a train of thinking, the most repugnant to his own. His jealousy, however, for the honour of Mosheim, provokes him to arraign the boldness of Mr. Gibbon, who presumes falsely to charge such an eminent man with unjustifiable assertions.* I might observe, that my style, which on this occasion was more modest and moderate, has acquired, perhaps undesignedly, an illiberal cast from the rough hand of Mr. Davis. But as my veracity is impeached, I may be less solicitous about my politeness; and though I have repeatedly declined the fairest opportunities of correcting the errors of my predecessors, yet, as long as I have truth on my side, I am not easily daunted by the names of the most eminent men.

The assertion of Mosheim, which did not seem to be justified† by the authority of Lactantius, was, that the wife and daughter of Diocletian, Prisca and Valeria, had been privately baptized. Mr. Davis is sure that the words of Mosheim, "Christianis sacris clam initiata," need not be confined to the rite of baptism; and he is equally sure, that the reference to Mosheim does not lead us to discover even the name of Valeria. In both these assurances he is grossly mistaken; but it is the misfortune of controversy, that an error may be committed

* Davis, p. 131. † Gibbon, p. 676. N. 132.

committed in three or four words, which cannot be rectified in less than thirty or forty lines.

1. The true and the sole meaning of the Christian initiation, one of the familiar and favourite allusions of the Fathers of the fourth century, is clearly explained by the exact and laborious Bingham. "The baptized were also styled οἱ μεμυημενοι, which the Latins call initiati, the initiated, that is, admitted to the use of the sacred offices, and knowledge of the sacred mysteries of the Christian Religion. Hence came that form of speaking so frequently used by St. Chrysostom, and other ancient writers, when they touched upon any doctrines or mysteries which the Catechumens understood not, ισασιν οἱ μεμυημενοι, the initiated know what is spoken. St. Ambrose writes a book to these initiati; Isidore of Pelusium and Hesychius call them μυσται and μυσταγωγητοι. Whence the Catechumens have the contrary names, Αμυστοι, Αμυητοι, Αμυσταγωγητοι, the uninitiated or unbaptized." (Antiquities of the Christian Church, L. i. c. 4. No. 2. vol. i. p. 11. fol. edit.) Had I presumed to suppose that Mosheim was capable of employing a technical expression in a loose and equivocal sense, I should indeed have violated the respect which I have always entertained for his learning and abilities.

2. But Mr. Davis cannot discover in the text of Mosheim the name of Valeria. In that case Mosheim would have suffered another slight innaccuracy to drop from his pen, as the passage of Lactantius, "sacrificio pollui coëgit," on which he founds his assertion, includes the names both of Prisca Prisca and Valeria. But I am not reduced to the necessity of accusing another in my own defence. Mosheim has properly and expressly declared that Valeria imitated the pious example of her mother Prisca, "Gener Diocletiani uxorem habebat Valeriam matris exemplum pietate erga Deum imitantem et a cultu fictorum Numinum alienam." (Mosheim, p. 913.) Mr. Davis has a bad habit of greedily snapping at the first words of a reference, without giving himself the trouble of going to the end of the page or paragraph.

These trifling and peevish cavils would, perhaps, have been confounded with some criticisms of the same stamp, on which I had bestowed a slight, though sufficient notice, in the beginning of this article of Mosheim; had not my attention been awakened by a peroration worthy of Tertullian himself, if Tertullian had been devoid of eloquence as well as of moderation—"Much less does the Christian Mosheim give our infidel Historian any pretext for inserting that illiberal malignant insinuation, 'That Christianity has, in every age, acknowledged its important obligations to FEMALE devotion;' the remark is truly contemptible."*

It is not my design to fill whole pages with a tedious enumeration of the many illustrious examples of female Saints, who, in every age, and almost in every country, have promoted the interest of Christianity. Such instances will readily offer themselves to those who have the slightest knowledge of Ecclesiastical History; nor is it necessary that I should remind them how much the charms, the influence, the devotion of Clotilda, and of her great-grand-daughter Bertha, contributed to the conversion of France and England. Religion may accept, without a blush, the services of the purest and most gentle portion of the human species: but there are some advocates who would disgrace Christianity, if Christianity could be disgraced, by the manner in which they defend her cause.

* Davis, p. 132.

TILLEMONT. XV. As I could not readily procure the works of Gregory of Nyssa, I borrowed* from the accurate and indefatigable Tillemont, a passage in the life of Gregory Thaumaturgus, or the Wonder-worker, which affirmed, that when the Saint took possession of his episcopal see, he found only SEVENTEEN Christians in the city of Neo-Cæsarea, and the adjacent country, "Les environs, la campagne, le pays d'alentour." (Mem. Eccles. tom. iv. p. 677. 691. Edit. Brusselles, 1706.) These expressions of Tillemont, to whom I explicitly acknowledged my obligation, appeared synonymous to the word diocese, the whole territory entrusted to the pastoral care of the Wonder-worker, and I added the epithet of extensive; because I was apprised that Neo-Cæsarea was the capital of the Polemoniac Pontus, and that the whole kingdom of Pontus, which stretched above five hundred miles along the coast of the Euxine, was divided between sixteen or seventeen bishops. (See the Geographia Ecclesiastica of Charles de St. Paul, and Lucas Holstenius, p. 249, 250, 251.) Thus far I may not be thought to have deserved any censure; but the omission of the subsequent part of the same passage, which imports, that at his death the Wonder-worker left no more than seventeen Pagans, may seem to wear a partial and suspicious aspect.

* Gibbon, p. 605. N. 156.

between

Let me therefore first observe, as some evidence of an impartial disposition, that I easily admitted, as the cool observation of the philosophic Lucian, the angry and interested complaint of the false prophet Alexander, that Pontus was filled with Christians. This complaint was made under the reigns of Marcus or of Commodus, with whom the impostor so admirably exposed by Lucian was contemporary: and I had contented myself with remarking, that the numbers of Christians must have been very unequally distributed in the several parts of Pontus, since the diocese of Neo-Cæsarea contained, above sixty years afterwards, only seventeen Christians. Such was the inconsiderable flock which Gregory began to feed about the year two hundred and forty; and the real or fabulous conversions ascribed to that Wonder-working Bishop, during a reign of thirty years, are totally foreign to the state of Christianity in the preceding century. This obvious reflection may serve to answer the objection of Mr. Davis,* and of another adversary,* who on this occasion is more liberal than Mr. Davis of those harsh epithets so familiar to the tribe of polemics.

* Davis, p. 136, 137.

PAGI. XVI. "Mr. Gibbon says,† 'Pliny was sent into Bithynia (according to Pagi) in the year 110.'

"Now that accurate chronologer places it in the year 102. See the fact recorded in his Critico-Historico Chronologica in Annales C. Baronii, A. D. 102. p. 99. sæc. 2. § 3."

"I appeal to my reader, whether this anachronism does not plainly prove that our historian never looked into Pagi's Chronology, though he has not hesitated to make a pompous reference to him in his note?"‡

I cannot help observing that either Mr. Davis's dictionary is extremely confined, or that in his philosophy all sins are of equal magnitude. Every error of fact or language, every instance where he does not know how to reconcile the original and the reference, he expresses by the gentle word of misrepresentation. An inaccurate appeal to the sentiment of Pagi, on a subject where I must have been perfectly disinterested, might have been styled a lapse of memory, instead of being censured as the effect of vanity and ignorance. Pagi is neither a difficult nor an uncommon writer, nor could I hope to derive much additional fame from

* Dr. Randolph, in Chelsum's Remarks, p. 159, 160.

† Gibbon, p. 605. N. 157.

‡ Davis, p. 140.

a pom-

a pompous quotation of his writings, which I had never seen.

The words employed by Mr. Davis, of fact, of record, of anachronism, are unskilfully chosen, and so unhappily applied, as to betray a very shameful ignorance, either of the English language, or of the nature of this chronological question. The date of Pliny's government of Bithynia is not a fact recorded by any ancient writer, but an opinion which modern critics have variously formed, from the consideration of presumptive and collateral evidence. Cardinal Baronius placed the consulship of Pliny one year too late; and, as he was persuaded that the old practice of the republic still subsisted, he naturally supposed that Pliny obtained his province immediately after the expiration of his consulship. He therefore sends him into Bithynia in the year which, according to his erroneous computation, coincided with the year one hundred and four (Baron. Annal. Eccles. A. D. 103. No. 1. 104. No. 1.), or, according to the true chronology, with the year one hundred and two, of the Christian æra. This mistake of Baronius, Pagi, with the assistance of his friend Cardinal Noris, undertakes to correct. From an accurate parallel of the Annals of Trajan and the Epistles of Pliny, he deduces his proofs that Pliny remained at Rome several years after his consulship, by his own ingenious, though sometimes fanciful theory, of the imperial Quinquennalia, &c. Pagi at last discovers that Pliny made his entrance into Bithynia in the year one hundred and ten.

" Plinius

"Plinius igitur anno Christi CENTESIMO DECIMO Bithyniam intravit." Pagi, tom. i. p. 100.

I will be more indulgent to my adversary than he has been to me: I will admit that he has looked into Pagi; but I must add, that he has only looked into that accurate chronologer. To rectify the errors, which, in the course of a laborious and original work, had escaped the diligence of the Cardinal, was the arduous task which Pagi proposed to execute: and for the sake of perspicuity, he distributes his criticisms according to the particular dates, whether just or faulty, of the Chronology of Baronius himself. Under the year 102, Mr. Davis confusedly saw a long argument about Pliny and Bithynia, and without condescending to read the author whom he pompously quotes, this hasty critic imputes to him the opinion which he had so laboriously destroyed.

My readers, if any readers have accompanied me thus far, must be satisfied, and indeed satiated, with the repeated proofs which I have made of the weight and temper of my adversary's weapons. They have, in every assault, fallen dead and lifeless to the ground: they have more than once recoiled, and dangerously wounded the unskilful hand that had presumed to use them. I have now examined all the misrepresentations and inaccuracies, which even for a moment could perplex the ignorant or deceive the credulous: the few imputations which I have neglected are still more palpably false, or still more evidently trifling, and even

even the friends of Mr. Davis will scarcely continue to ascribe my contempt to my fear.

The first part of his critical volume might admit, though it did not deserve, any particular reply. But the easy, though tedious compilation, which fills the remainder,* and which Mr. Davis has produced as the evidence of my shameful plagiarisms, may be set in its true light by three or four short and general reflections. PLAGIARISMS.

I. Mr. Davis has disposed, in two columns, the passages which he thinks proper to select from my two last chapters, and the corresponding passages from Middleton, Barbeyrac, Beausobre, Dodwell, &c. to the most important of which he had been regularly guided by my own quotations. According to the opinion which he has conceived of literary property, to agree is to follow, and to follow is to steal. He celebrates his own sagacity with loud and reiterated applause, and declares, with infinite facetiousness, that if he restored to every author the passages which Mr. Gibbon has purloined, he would appear as naked as the proud and gaudy daw in the fable, when each bird had plucked away its own plumes. Instead of being angry with Mr. Davis for the parallel which he has extended to so great a length, I am under some obligation to his industry for the copious proofs which he has furnished the reader, that my representation of some of the most important facts of ecclesiastical antiquity is supported by the authority or opinion of the most ingenious and learned of the modern writers. The public may not, perhaps, be very eager to assist Mr. Davis in his favourite amusement of depluming me. They may think, that if the materials which compose my two last chapters are curious and valuable, it is of little moment to whom they properly belong. If my readers are satisfied with the form, the colours, the new arrangement which I have given to the labours of my predecessors, they may perhaps consider me not as a contemptible thief, but as an honest and industrious manufacturer, who has fairly procured the raw materials, and worked them up with a laudable degree of skill and success.

* Davis, p. 168—274.

rity

II. About two hundred years ago, the court of Rome discovered that the system which had been erected by ignorance must be defended and countenanced by the aid, or at least by the abuse, of science. The grosser legends of the middle ages were abandoned to contempt, but the supremacy and infallibility of two hundred Popes, the virtues of many thousand Saints, and the miracles which they either performed or related, have been laboriously consecrated in the Ecclesiastical Annals of Cardinal Baronius. A theological barometer might be formed, of which the Cardinal and our countryman Dr. Middleton should constitute the opposite and remote extremities, as the former sunk to the lowest degree of credulity, which was compatible with learning, and the latter rose to the highest pitch of scepticism, in anywise consistent with religion. The intermediate gradations would be filled filled by a line of ecclesiastical critics, whose rank has been fixed by the circumstances of their temper and studies, as well as by the spirit of the church or society to which they were attached. It would be amusing enough to calculate the weight of prejudice in the air of Rome, of Oxford, of Paris, and of Holland; and sometimes to observe the irregular tendency of papists towards freedom, sometimes to remark the unnatural gravitation of protestants towards slavery. But it is useful to borrow the assistance of so many learned and ingenious men, who have viewed the first ages of the church in every light, and from every situation. If we skilfully combine the passions and prejudices, the hostile motives and intentions, of the several theologians, we may frequently extract knowledge from credulity, moderation from zeal, and impartial truth from the most disingenuous controversy. It is the right, it is the duty of a critical historian to collect, to weigh, to select the opinions of his predecessors; and the more diligence he has exerted in the search, the more rationally he may hope to add some improvement to the stock of knowledge, the use of which has been common to all.

III. Besides the ideas which may be suggested by the study of the most learned and ingenious of the moderns, the historian may be indebted to them for the occasional communication of some passages of the ancients, which might otherwise have escaped his knowledge or his memory. In the consideration of any extensive subject, none will pretend tend to have read all that has been written, or to recollect all that they have read; nor is there any disgrace in recurring to the writers who have professedly treated any questions, which, in the course of a long narrative, we are called upon to mention in a slight and incidental manner. If I touch upon the obscure and fanciful theology of the Gnostics, I can accept without a blush the assistance of the candid Beausobre; and when, amidst the fury of contending parties, I trace the progress of ecclesiastical dominion, I am not ashamed to confess myself the grateful disciple of the impartial Mosheim. In the next volume of my history, the reader and the critic must prepare themselves to see me make a still more liberal use of the labours of those indefatigable workmen who have dug deep into the mine of antiquity. The Fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries are far more voluminous than their predecessors; the writings of Jerom, of Augustin, of Chrysostom, &c. cover the walls of our libraries. The smallest part is of the historical kind: yet the treatises which seem the least to invite the curiosity of the reader, frequently conceal very useful hints, or very valuable facts. The polemic, who involves himself and his antagonists in a cloud of argumentation, sometimes relates the origin and progress of the heresy which he confutes; and the preacher who declaims against the luxury, describes the manners of the age; and seasonably introduces the mention of some public calamity, that he may ascribe it to the justice of offended heaven. It would surely be unreasonable to expect pect that the historian should peruse enormous volumes, with the uncertain hope of extracting a few interesting lines, or that he should sacrifice whole days to the momentary amusement of his reader. Fortunately for us both, the diligence of ecclesiastical critics has facilitated our inquiries: the compilations of Tillemont might alone be considered as an immense repertory of truth and fable, of almost all that the fathers have preserved or invented, or believed; and if we equally avail ourselves of the labours of contending sectaries, we shall often discover, that the same passages which the prudence of one of the disputants would have suppressed or disguised, are placed in the most conspicuous light by the active and interested zeal of his adversary. On these occasions, what is the duty of a faithful historian, who derives from some modern writer the knowledge of some ancient testimony, which he is desirous of introducing into his own narrative? It is his duty, and it has been my invariable practice, to consult the original; to study with attention the words, the design, the spirit, the context, the situation of the passage to which I had been referred; and before I appropriated it to my own use, to justify my own declaration, "that I had carefully examined all the original materials that could illustrate the subject which I had undertaken to treat." If this important obligation has sometimes been imperfectly fulfilled, I have only omitted what it would have been impracticable for me to perform. The greatest city in the world is still destitute of that useful institution, tion, a public library; and the writer who has undertaken to treat any large historical subject, is reduced to the necessity of purchasing, for his private use, a numerous and valuable collection of the books which must form the basis of his work. The diligence of his booksellers will not always prove successful; and the candour of his readers will not always expect, that, for the sake of verifying an accidental quotation of ten lines, he should load himself with an useless and expensive series of ten volumes. In a very few instances, where I had not the opportunity of consulting the originals, I have adopted their testimony on the faith of modern guides, of whose fidelity I was satisfied; but on these occasions,* instead of decking myself with the borrowed plumes of Tillemont or Lardner, I have been most scrupulously exact in marking the extent of my reading, and the source of my information. This distinction, which a sense of truth and modesty had engaged me to express, is ungenerously abused by Mr. Davis, who seems happy to inform his readers, that "in ONE instance (chap. xvi. 164, or in the first edition, 163) I have, by an unaccountable oversight, unfortunately for myself, forgot to drop the modern, and that I modestly disclaim all knowledge of Athanasius, but what I had picked up from Tillemont."† Without animadverting on the decency of these expressions, which are now grown familiar to me, I shall content

* Gibbon, p. 605, N. 156; p. 606, N. 161; p. 690, N. 164; p. 699, N. 178.

† Davis, p. 273.

tent myself with observing, that as I had frequently quoted Eusebius, or Cyprian, or Tertullian, because I had read them; so, in this instance, I only made my reference to Tillemont, because I had not read, and did not possess the works of Athanasius. The progress of my undertaking has since directed me to peruse the Historical Apologies of the Archbishop of Alexandria, whose life is a very interesting part of the age in which he lived; and if Mr. Davis should have the curiosity to look into my Second Volume, he will find that I make a free and frequent appeal to the writings of Athanasius. Whatever may be the opinion or practice of my adversary, this I apprehend to be the dealing of a fair and honourable man.

IV. The historical monuments of the three first centuries of ecclesiastical antiquities are neither very numerous nor very prolix. From the end of the Acts of the Apostles, to the time when the first apology of Justin Martyr was presented, there intervened a dark and doubtful period of fourscore years; and, even if the Epistles of Ignatius should be approved by the critic, they could not be very serviceable to the historian. From the middle of the second to the beginning of the fourth century, we gain our knowledge of the state and progress of Christianity, from the successive apologies which were occasionally composed by Justin, Athenagoras, Tertullian, Origen, &c. from the Epistles of Cyprian; from a few sincere acts of the Martyrs; from some moral or controversial tracts, which indirectly explain the events and manners of the times; from the rare and accidental notice which profane writers have taken of the Christian sect; from the declamatory narrative which celebrates the deaths of the persecutors; and from the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, who has preserved some valuable fragments of more early writers. Since the revival of letters, these original materials have been the common fund of critics and historians; nor has it ever been imagined, that the absolute and exclusive property of a passage in Eusebius or Tertullian was acquired by the first who had an opportunity of quoting it. The learned work of Mosheim, de Rebus Christianis ante Constantinum, was printed in the year 1753; and if I were possessed of the patience and disingenuity of Mr. Davis, I would engage to find all the ancient testimonies that he has alleged, in the writings of Dodwell or Tillemont, which were published before the end of the last century. But if I were animated by any malevolent intentions against Dodwell or Tillemont, I could as easily, and as unfairly, fix on them the guilt of plagiarism, by producing the same passages transcribed or translated at full length in the Annals of Cardinal Baronius. Let not criticism be any longer disgraced by the practice of such unworthy arts. Instead of admitting suspicions as false as they are ungenerous, candour will acknowledge, that Mosheim or Dodwell, Tillemont or Baronius, enjoyed the same right, and often were under the same obligation, of quoting the passages which they had read, and which were indispensably requisite to confirm the the truth and substance of their similar narratives. Mr. Davis is so far from allowing me the benefit of this common indulgence, or rather of this common right, that he stigmatises with the name of plagiarism a close and literal agreement with Dodwell in the account of some parts of the persecution of Diocletian, where a few chapters of Eusebius and Lactantius, perhaps of Lactantius alone, are the sole materials from whence our knowledge could be derived, and where, if I had not transcribed, I must have invented. He is even bold enough (bold is not the proper word) to conceive some hopes of persuading his readers, that an historian who has employed several years of his life, and several hundred pages, on the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, had never read Orosius, or the Augustin History; and that he was forced to borrow, at second-hand, his quotations from the Theodosian code. I cannot profess myself very desirous of Mr. Davis's acquaintance; but if he will take the trouble of calling at my house any afternoon when I am not at home, my servant shall shew him my library, which he will find tolerably well furnished with the useful authors, ancient as well as modern, ecclesiastical as well as profane, who have directly supplied me with the materials of my History.

The peculiar reasons, and they are not of the most flattering kind, which urged me to repel the furious and feeble attack of Mr. Davis, have been already mentioned. But since I am drawn thus reluctantly into the lists of controversy, I shall not retire till I have saluted, either with stern defiance or gentle courtesy, the theological champions who have signalized their ardour to break a lance against the shield of a Pagan adversary. The Fifteenth and Sixteenth Chapters have been honoured with the notice of several writers, whose names and characters seemed to promise more maturity of judgment and learning than could reasonably be expected from the unfinished studies of a Bachelor of Arts. The Reverend Mr. Apthorpe, Dr. Watson, the Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, Dr. Chelsum of Christ Church, and his associate Dr. Randolph, President of Corpus Christi College, and the Lady Margaret's Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford, have given me a fair right, which, however, I shall not abuse, of freely declaring my opinion on the subject of their respective criticisms.

Mr. Apthorpe.

If I am not mistaken, Mr. Apthorpe was the first who announced to the public his intention of examining the interesting subject which I had treated in the Two last Chapters of my History. The multitude of collateral and accessary ideas which presented themselves to the author, insensibly swelled the bulk of his papers to the size of a large volume in octavo; the publication was delayed many months beyond the time of the first advertisement; and when Mr. Apthorpe's Letters appeared, I was surprised to find, that I had scarcely any interest or concern in their contents. They are filled with general observations on the Study of History, with a large and useful catalogue logue of Historians, and with a variety of reflexions, moral and religious, all preparatory to the direct and formal consideration of my Two last Chapters, which Mr. Apthorpe seems to reserve for the subject of a Second Volume. I sincerely respect the learning, the piety, and the candour of this gentleman, and must consider it as a mark of his esteem, that he has thought proper to begin his approaches at so great a distance from the fortifications which he designed to attack.

When Dr. Watson gave to the public his Apology for Christianity, in a Series of Letters, he addressed them to the Author of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, with a just confidence that he had considered this important object in a manner not unworthy of his antagonist or of himself. Dr. Watson's mode of thinking bears a liberal and a philosophic cast; his thoughts are expressed with spirit, and that spirit is always tempered by politeness and moderation. Such is the man whom I should be happy to call my friend, and whom I should not blush to call my antagonist. But the same motives which might tempt me to accept, or even to solicit, a private and amicable conference, dissuaded me from entering into a public controversy with a writer of so respectable a character; and I embraced the earliest opportunity of expressing to Dr. Watson himself, how sincerely I agreed with him in thinking, "That as the world is now possessed of the opinion of us both upon the subject in question, it may be per- DR. WATSON.

haps as proper for us both to leave it in this state."* The nature of the ingenious Professor's Apology contributed to strengthen the insuperable reluctance to engage in hostile altercation which was common to us both, by convincing me, that such an altercation was unnecessary as well as unpleasant. He very justly and politely declares, that a considerable part, near seventy pages, of his small volume are not directed to me,† but to a set of men whom he places in an odious and contemptible light. He leaves to other hands the defence of the leading Ecclesiastics, even of the primitive church; and without being very anxious, either to soften their vices and indiscretion, or to aggravate the cruelty of the Heathen persecutors, he passes over in silence the greatest part of my Sixteenth Chapter. It is not so much the purpose of the Apologist to examine the facts which have been advanced by the Historian, as to remove the impressions which may have been formed by many of his readers; and the Remarks of Dr. Watson consist more properly of general argumentation than of particular criticism. He fairly owns, that I have expressly allowed the full and irresistible weight of the first great cause of the success of Christianity;‡ and he is too candid to deny that the five secondary causes, which I had attempted to explain, operated with some degree of active energy

* Watson's Apology for Christianity, p. 200.
† Id. p. 202—268. ‡ Id. p. 5.

energy towards the accomplishment of that great event. The only question which remains between us, relates to the degree of the weight and effect of those secondary causes; and as I am persuaded that our philosophy is not of the dogmatic kind, we should soon acknowledge that this precise degree cannot be ascertained by reasoning, nor perhaps be expressed by words. In the course of this inquiry, some incidental difficulties have arisen, which I had stated with impartiality, and which Dr. Watson resolves with ingenuity and temper. If in some instances he seems to have misapprehended my sentiments, I may hesitate whether I should impute the fault to my own want of clearness or to his want of attention, but I can never entertain a suspicion that Dr. Watson would descend to employ the disingenuous arts of vulgar controversy.

There is, however, one passage, and one passage only, which must not pass without some explanation; and I shall the more eagerly embrace this occasion to illustrate what I had said, as the misconstruction of my true meaning seems to have made an involuntary, but unfavourable impression on the liberal mind of Dr. Watson. As I endeavour not to palliate the severity, but to discover the motives, of the Roman magistrates, I had remarked, "it was in vain that the oppressed believer asserted the unalienable rights of conscience and private judgment. Though his situation might excite the pity, his arguments could never reach the understanding, either of the philosophic or of the believing part of the Pagan world."* The humanity of Dr. Watson takes fire on the supposed provocation, and he asks me with unusual quickness, "How, Sir, are the arguments for liberty of conscience so exceedingly inconclusive, that you think them incapable of reaching the understanding even of philosophers?"† He continues to observe, that a captious adversary would embrace with avidity the opportunity this passage affords, of blotting my character with the odious stain of being a persecutor; a stain which no learning can wipe out, which no genius or ability can render amiable; and though he himself does not entertain such an opinion of my principles, his ingenuity tries in vain to provide me with the means of escape.

I must lament that I have not been successful in the explanation of a very simple notion of the spirit both of Philosophy and of Polytheism, which I have repeatedly inculcated. The arguments which assert the rights of conscience are not inconclusive in themselves, but the understanding of the Greeks and Romans was fortified against their evidence by an invincible prejudice. When we listen to the voice of Bayle, of Locke, and of genuine reason, in favour of religious toleration, we shall easily perceive that our most forcible appeal is made to our mutual feelings. If the Jew were allowed to argue with the Inquisitor, he would request that for a moment they might exchange

* Gibbon, p. 625. † Watson, p. 185.

change their different situations, and might safely ask his Catholic Tyrant, whether the fear of death would compel him to enter the synagogue, to receive the mark of circumcision, and to partake of the paschal lamb. As soon as the case of persecution was brought home to the breast of the Inquisitor, he must have found some difficulty in suppressing the dictates of natural equity, which would insinuate to his conscience, that he could have no right to inflict those punishments which under similar circumstances, he would esteem it as his duty to encounter. But this argument could not reach the understanding of a Polytheist, or of an ancient Philosopher. The former was ready, whenever he was summoned, or indeed without being summoned, to fall prostrate before the altars of any Gods who were adored in any part of the world, and to admit a vague persuasion of the truth and divinity of the most different modes of religion. The philosopher, who considered them, at least in their literal sense, as equally false and absurd, was not ashamed to disguise his sentiments, and to frame his actions according to the laws of his country, which imposed the same obligation on the philosophers and the people. When Pliny declared, that whatever was the opinion of the Christians, their obstinacy deserved punishment, the absurd cruelty of Pliny was excused in his own eye, by the consciousness that, in the situation of the Christians, he would not have refused the religious compliance which he exacted. I shall not repeat, that the Pagan worship was a matter, not

of

of opinion, but of custom; that the toleration of the Romans was confined to nations or families who followed the practice of their ancestors; and that in the first ages of Christianity their persecution of the individuals who departed from the established religion was neither moderated by pure reason, nor inflamed by exclusive zeal. But I only desire to appeal, from the hasty apprehension, to the more deliberate judgment, of Dr. Watson himself. Should there still remain any difference of opinion between us, I shall be satisfied, if he will consider me as a sincere though perhaps unsuccessful lover of truth and as a firm friend to civil and ecclesiastical freedom.

Dr. Chelsum and Dr. Randolph.

Far be it from me, or from any faithful historian, to impute to respectable societies the faults of some individual members. Our two Universities most undoubtedly contain the same mixture, and most probably the same proportions, of zeal and moderation, of reason and superstition. Yet there is much less difference between the smoothness of the Ionic, and the roughness of the Doric dialect, than may be found between the polished style of Dr. Watson, and the coarse language of Mr. Davis, Dr. Chelsum, or Dr. Randolph. The second of these critics, Dr. Chelsum of Christ Church, is unwilling that the world should forget that he was the first who sounded to arms, that he was the first who furnished the antidote to the poison, and who, as early as the month of October of the year 1776, published his Strictures on the two last Chapters of Mr. Gibbon's History. The success of a pamphlet, which which he modestly styles imperfect and ill-digested, encouraged him to resume the controversy. In the beginning of the present year, his Remarks made their second appearance, with some alteration of form, and a large increase of bulk; and the author who seems to fight under the protection of two episcopal banners, has prefixed, in the front of his volume, his name and titles, which in the former edition he had less honourably suppressed. His confidence is fortified by the alliance and communications of a distinguished writer, Dr. Randolph, &c. who, on a proper occasion, would, no doubt, be ready to bear as honourable testimony to the merit and reputation of Dr. Chelsum. The two friends are indeed so happily united by art and nature, that if the author of the Remarks had not pointed out the valuable communications of the Margaret Professor, it would have been impossible to separate their respective property. Writers who possess any freedom of mind, may be known from each other by the peculiar character of their style and sentiments; but the champions who are inlisted in the service of Authority, commonly wear the uniform of the regiment. Oppressed with the same yoke, covered with the same trappings, they heavily move along, perhaps not with an equal pace, in the same beaten track of prejudice and preferment. Yet I should expose my own injustice, were I absolutely to confound with Mr. Davis the two Doctors in Divinity, who are joined in one volume. The three critics appear to be animated by the same implacable resentment against against the historian of the Roman Empire; they are alike disposed to support the same opinions by the same arts; and if in the language of the two latter, the disregard of politeness is somewhat less gross and indecent, the difference is not of such a magnitude as to excite in my breast any lively sensations of gratitude. It was the misfortune of Mr. Davis that he undertook to write before he had read. He set out with the stock of authorities which he found in my quotations, and boldly ventured to play his reputation against mine. Perhaps he may now repent of a loss which is not easily recovered; but if I had not surmounted my almost insuperable reluctance to a public dispute, many a reader might still be dazzled by the vehemence of his assertions, and might still believe that Mr. Davis had detected several wilful and important misrepresentations in my two last chapters. But the confederate doctors appear to be scholars of a higher form and longer experience; they enjoy a certain rank in their academical world; and as their zeal is enlightened by some rays of knowledge, so their desire to ruin the credit of their adversary is occasionally checked by the apprehension of injuring their own. These restraints, to which Mr. Davis was a stranger, have confined them to a very narrow and humble path of historical criticism; and if I were to correct, according to their wishes, all the particular facts against which they have advanced any objections, these corrections, admitted in their fullest extent, would would hardly furnish materials for a decent list of errata.

The dogmatical part of their work, which in every sense of the word deserves that appellation, is ill adapted to engage my attention. I had declined the consideration of theological arguments, when they were managed by a candid and liberal adversary; and it would be inconsistent enough, if I should have refused to draw my sword in honourable combat against the keen and well-tempered weapon of Dr. Watson, for the sole purpose of encountering the rustic cudgel of two staunch and sturdy polemics.

I shall not enter any farther into the character and conduct of Cyprian, as I am sensible that, if the opinion of Le Clerc, Mosheim, and myself, is reprobated by Dr. Chelsum and his ally, the difference must subsist, till we shall entertain the same notions of moral virtue and ecclesiastical power.* If Dr. Randolph will allow that the primitive clergy received, managed, and distributed the tithes, and other charitable donations of the faithful, the dispute between us will be a dispute of words.† I shall not amuse myself with proving that the learned Origen must have derived from the inspired authority of the church his knowledge, not indeed of the authenticity, but of the inspiration of the four Evangelists, two of whom are not in the rank of the Apostles.‡ I shall shall submit to the judgment of the public, whether the Athanasian Creed is not read and received in the Church of England, and whether the wisest and most virtuous of the Pagans* believed the Catholic faith, which is declared in the Athanasian Creed to be absolutely necessary for salvation. As little shall I think myself interested in the elaborate disquisitions with which the author of the Remarks has filled a great number of pages, concerning the famous testimony of Josephus, the passages of Irenæus and Theophilus, which relate to the gift of miracles, and the origin of circumcision in Palestine or in Egypt.† If I have rejected, and rejected with some contempt, the interpolation which pious fraud has very aukwardly inserted in the text of Josephus, I may deem myself secure behind the shield of learned and pious critics (see in particular Le Clerc, in his Ars Critica, part iii. sect. i. c. 15. and Lardner's Testimonies, vol. i. p. 150, &c.), who have condemned this passage: and I think it very natural that Dr. Chelsum should embrace the contrary opinion, which is not destitute of able advocates. The passages of Irenæus and Theophilus were thoroughly sifted in the controversy about the duration of miracles; and as the works of Dr. Middleton may be found in every library, so it is not impossible that a diligent search may still discover some remains of the writings of his adversaries. In mentioning the confession

* Gibbon, p. 558, 559. Chelsum, p. 132—139.

† Gibbon, p. 592. Randolph in Chelsum, p. 122.

‡ Gibbon, p. 551, N. 33. Chelsum, p. 39.

* Gibbon, p. 563, N. 70. Chelsum, p. 66.

† Chelsum's Remarks, p. 13—19. 67—91. 180—185.

confession of the Syrians of Palestine, that they had received from Egypt the rite of circumcision, I had simply alleged the testimony of Herodotus, without expressly adopting the sentiment of Marsham. But I had always imagined, that in these doubtful and indifferent questions, which have been solemnly argued before the tribunal of the public, every scholar was at liberty to choose his side, without assigning his reasons; nor can I yet persuade myself, that either Dr. Chelsum, or myself, are likely to enforce, by any new arguments, the opinions which we have respectively followed. The only novelty for which I can perceive myself indebted to Dr. Chelsum, is the very extraordinary scepticism which he insinuates concerning the time of Herodotus, who, according to the chronology of some, flourished during the time of the Jewish captivity.* Can it be necessary to inform a divine, that the captivity which lasted seventy years, according to the prophecy of Jeremiah, was terminated in the year 536 before Christ, by the edict which Cyrus published in the first year of his reign? (Jeremiah, xxv. 11, 12, xxix. 10. Ezra, i. 1. &c. Usher and Prideaux, under the years 606 and 536.) Can it be necessary to inform a man of letters, that Herodotus was fifty-three years old at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war (Aulus Gellius, Noct. Attic. xv. 23. from the commentaries of Pamphila), and consequently that he was born in the year before

* Chelsum, p. 15.

Christ

Christ 484, fifty-two years after the end of the Jewish captivity? As this well attested fact is not exposed to the slightest doubt or difficulty, I am somewhat curious to learn the names of those unknown authors, whose chronology Dr. Chelsum has allowed as the specious foundation of a probable hypothesis. The author of the Remarks does not seem indeed to have cultivated, with much care or success, the province of literary history; as a very moderate acquaintance with that useful branch of knowledge would have saved him from a positive mistake, much less excusable than the doubt which he entertains about the time of Herodotus. He styles Suidas "a Heathen writer, who lived about the end of the tenth century."* I admit the period which he assigns to Suidas; and which is well ascertained by Dr. Bentley. (See his Reply to Boyle, p. 22, 23.) We are led to fix this epoch, by the chronology which this Heathen writer has deduced from Adam, to the death of the emperor John Zimisces, A. D. 975: and a crowd of passages might be produced, as the unanswerable evidence of his Christianity. But the most unanswerable of all is the very date, which is not disputed between us. The philosophers who flourished under Justinian (see Agathias, L. ii. p. 65, 66.) appear to have been the last of the Heathen writers: and the ancient religion of the Greeks was annihilated almost four hundred years before the birth of Suidas.

* Chelsum, p. 73.

After

After this animadversion, which is not intended either to insult the failings of my Adversary, or to provide a convenient excuse for my own errors, I shall proceed to select two important parts of Dr. Chelsum's Remarks, from which the candid reader may form some opinion of the whole. They relate to the military service of the first Christians, and to the historical character of Eusebius, and I shall review them with the less reluctance, as it may not be impossible to pick up something curious and useful even in the barren waste of controversy.

MILITARY SERVICE OF THE FIRST CHRISTIANS.

I. In representing the errors of the primitive Christians, which flowed from an excess of virtue, I had observed, that they exposed themselves to the reproaches of the Pagans, by their obstinate refusal to take an active part in the civil administration, or military defence of the empire; that the objections of Celsus appear to have been mutilated by his adversary Origen; and that the Apologists, to whom the public dangers were urged, returned obscure and ambiguous answers, as they were unwilling to disclose the true ground of their security, their opinion of the approaching end of the world.* In another place I had related, from the acts of Ruinart, the action and punishment of the Centurion Marcellus, who was put to death for renouncing the service in a public and seditious manner.†

On this occasion Dr. Chelsum is extremely alert. He denies my facts, controverts my opinions, and, with a politeness worthy of Mr. Davis himself, insinuates that I borrowed the story of Marcellus, not from Ruinart, but from Voltaire. My learned adversary thinks it highly improbable that Origen should dare to mutilate the objections of Celsus, "whose work was, in all probability, extant at the time he made this reply. In such case, had he even been inclined to treat his adversary unfairly, he must yet surely have been withheld from the attempt, through the fear of detection."* The experience both of ancient and modern controversy has indeed convinced me that this reasoning, just and natural as it may seem, is totally inconclusive, and that the generality of disputants, especially in religious contests, are of a much more daring and intrepid spirit. For the truth of this remark, I shall content myself with producing a recent and very singular example, in which Dr. Chelsum himself is personally interested. He charges† me with passing over in "silence the important and unsuspected testimony of a heathen historian (Dion Cassius) to the persecution of Domitian; and he affirms, that I have produced that testimony so far only as it relates to Clemens and Domitilla; yet in the very same passage follows immediately, that on a like accusation MANY OTHERS were also condemned. Some of them were put to death, others suffered the confiscation of their goods."‡ Although I should not be ashamed to undertake the apology of Nero or Domitian, if I thought them innocent of any particular crime with which zeal or malice had unjustly branded their memory; yet I should indeed blush, if, in favour of tyranny, or even in favour of virtue, I had suppressed the truth and evidence of historical facts. But the Reader will feel some surprise, when he has convinced himself that, in the three editions of my First Volume, after relating the death of Clemens, and the exile of Domitilla, I continue to allege the ENTIRE TESTIMONY of Dion, in the following words: "and sentences either of death, or of confiscation, were pronounced against a GREAT NUMBER OF PERSONS who were involved in the same accusation. The guilt imputed to their charge, was that of Atheism and Jewish manners; a singular association of ideas which cannot with any propriety be applied except to the Christians, as they were obscurely and imperfectly viewed by the magistrates and writers of that period." Dr. Chelsum has not been deterred by the fear of detection, from this scandalous mutilation of the popular work of a living adversary. But Celsus had been dead above fifty years before Origen published his Apology; and the copies of an ancient work, instead of being instantaneously multiplied by the operation of the press, were separately and slowly transcribed by the labour of the hand.

* Gibbon, p. 580, 581. † Idem, p. 680.

* Chelsum, p. 118, 119. † Id. p. 188. ‡ Gibbon, p. 645.

though

If any modern divine should still maintain that the fidelity of Origen was secured by motives more honourable than the fear of detection, he may learn from Jerom the difference of the gymnastic and dogmatic styles. Truth is the object of the one, victory of the other; and the same arts which would disgrace the sincerity of the teacher, serve only to display the skill of the disputant. After justifying his own practice by that of the orators and philosophers, Jerom defends himself by the more respectable authority of Christian apologists. "How many thousand lines, says he, have been composed against Celsus and Porphyry, by Origen, Methodius, Eusebius, Apollinaris? Consider with what arguments, with what slippery problems, they elude the inventions of the Devil; and how, in their controversy with the Gentiles, they are sometimes obliged to speak, not what they really think, but what is most advantageous for the cause they defend." "Origenes, &c. multis versuum millibus scribunt adversus Celsum et Porphyrium. Considerate quibus argumentis et quam lubricis problematibus diaboli spiritu contexta subvertunt: et quia interdum coguntur loqui, non quod sentiunt, sed quod necesse est dicunt adversus ea quæ dicunt Gentiles." (Pro Libris advers. Jovinian. Apolog. tom. ii. p. 135.)

Yet Dr. Chelsum may still ask, and he has a right to ask, why in this particular instance I suspect the pious Origen of mutilating the objections of his adversary. From a very obvious, and, in my opinion, a very decisive circumstance. Celsus was a Greek philosopher, the friend of Lucian; and I thought that, although he might support error by sophistry, he would not write nonsense in his own language. I renounce my suspicion, if the most attentive reader is able to understand the design and purport of a passage which is given as a formal quotation from Celsus, and which begins with the following words: "Ου μην αδε εκεινο ανεκτον σε λεγοντος, ως, &c. (Origen contr. Celsum, L. viii. p. 425. edit. Spencer, Cantab. 1677.) I have carefully inspected the original, and I have availed myself of the learning of Spencer, and even Bouhereau, (for I shall always disclaim the absurd and affected pedantry of using without scruple a Latin version, but of despising the aid of a French translation,) and the ill success of my efforts has countenanced the suspicion to which I still adhere, with a just mixture of doubt and hesitation. Origen very boldly denies, that any of the Christians have affirmed what is imputed to them by Celsus, in this unintelligible quotation; and it may easily be credited, that none had maintained what none can comprehend. Dr. Chelsum has produced the words of Origen; but on this occasion there is a strange ambiguity in the language of the modern divine,* as if he wished to insinuate what he dared not affirm; and every reader must conclude, from his state of the question, that Origen expressly denied the truth of the accusation of Celsus, who had accused the Christians of declining to assist their fellow-subjects in the military defence of the empire, assailed on every side by the arms of the Barbarians.

in

* Chelsum, p. 118.

Will Dr. Chelsum justify to the world, can he justify to his own feelings, the abuse which he has made even of the privileges of the Gymnastic style? Careless and hasty indeed must have been his perusal of Origen, if he did not perceive that the ancient apologist, who makes a stand on some incidental question, admits the accusation of his adversary, that the Christians refused to bear arms even at the command of their sovereign. "Και ε συστρατευομεθα μην αυτῳ, καν επειγη." (Origen, L. viii. p. 427.) He endeavours to palliate this undutiful refusal, by representing that the Christians had their peculiar camps, in which they incessantly combated for the safety of the emperor and the empire, by lifting up their right hands—in prayer. The apologist seems to hope that his country will be satisfied with this spiritual aid, and dexterously confounding the colleges of Roman priests with the multitudes which swelled the Catholic church, he claims for his brethren, in all the provinces, the exemption from military service, which was enjoyed by the sacerdotal order. But as this excuse might not readily be allowed, Origen looks forwards with a lively faith to that auspicious revolution, which Celsus had rejected as impossible, when all the nations of the habitable earth, renouncing their passions and their arms, should embrace the pure doctrines of the Gospel, and lead a life of peace and innocence under the immediate protection of Heaven. The faith of Origen seems to be principally founded on the predictions of the Prophet Zephaniah (See iii. 9, 10.;) and he prudently observes, observes, that the prophets often speak secret things (εν αποῤῥητω λεγεσι p. 426,) which may be understood by those who can understand them; and that if this stupendous change cannot be effected while we retain our bodies, it may be accomplished as soon as we shall be released from them. Such is the reasoning of Origen: though I have not followed the order, I have faithfully preserved the substance of it; which fully justifies the truth and propriety of my observations.

The execution of Marcellus, the Centurion, is naturally connected with the Apology of Origen, as the former declared by his actions, what the latter had affirmed in his writings, that the conscience of a devout Christian would not allow him to bear arms, even at the command of his sovereign. I had represented this religious scruple as one of the motives which provoked Marcellus, on the day of a public festival, to throw away the ensigns of his office; and I presumed to observe, that such an act of desertion would have been punished in any government according to martial or even civil law. Dr. Chelsum* very bluntly accuses me of misrepresenting the story, and of suppressing those circumstances which would have defended the Centurion from the unjust imputation thrown by me upon his conduct. The dispute between the advocate for Marcellus and myself lies in a very narrow compass; as the whole evidence is comprised in a short, simple, and, I believe, authentic narrative.

* Chelsum, p. 114—117.

1. In another place I observed, and even pressed the observation, "that the innumerable deities and rites of Polytheism were closely interwoven with every circumstance of business or pleasure, of public or of private life;" and I had particularly specified how much the Roman discipline was connected with the national superstition. A solemn oath of fidelity was repeated every year in the name of the gods and of the genius of the Emperor, public and daily sacrifices were performed at the head of the camp, the legionary was continually tempted or rather compelled, to join in the idolatrous worship of his fellow-soldiers; and had not any scruples been entertained of the lawfulness of war, it is not easy to understand how any serious Christian could enlist under a banner which has been justly termed the rival of the Cross. "Vexilla æmula Christi." (Tertullian de Corona Militis, c. xi.) With regard to the soldiers, who before their conversion were already engaged in the military life, fear, habit, ignorance, necessity, might bend them to some acts of occasional conformity; and as long as they abstained from absolute and intentional idolatry, their behaviour was excused by the indulgent, and censured by the more rigid casuists. (See the whole Treatise de Corona Militis.) We are ignorant of the adventures and character of the Centurion Marcellus, how long he had conciliated the profession of arms and and of the Gospel, whether he was only a Catechumen, or whether he was initiated by the sacrament of baptism. We are likewise at a loss to ascertain the particular act of idolatry which so suddenly and so forcibly provoked his pious indignation. As he declared his faith in the midst of a public entertainment given on the birth-day of Galerius, he must have been startled by some of the sacred and convivial rites (Convivia ista profana reputans) of prayers, or vows, or libations, or, perhaps, by the offensive circumstance of eating the meats which had been offered to the idols. But the scruples of Marcellus were not confined to these accidental impurities; they evidently reached the essential duties of his profession; and when, before the tribunal of the magistrates, he avowed his faith at the hazard of his life, the Centurion declared, as his cool and determined persuasion, that it does not become a Christian man, who is the soldier of the Lord Christ, to bear arms for any object of earthly concern. "Non enim decebat Christianum hominem molestiis secularibus militare, qui Christo Domino militat:" a formal declaration, which clearly disengages from each other the different questions of war and idolatry. With regard to both these questions, as they were understood by the primitive Christians, I wish to refer the reader to the sentiments and authorities of Mr. Moyle, a bold and ingenious critic, who read the Fathers as their judge, and not as their slave, and who has refuted, with the most patient candour, all that learned prejudice could suggest in favour of the silly story of the Thundering Legion. (See Moyle's Works, Vol. ii. p. 84—88. 111—116. 163—212. 298—302. 327—341.) And here let me add, that the passage of Origen, who in the name of his brethren disclaims the duty of military service, is understood by Mr. Moyle in its true and obvious signification.

in

2. I know not where Dr. Chelsum has imbibed the principles of logic or morality which teach him to approve the conduct of Marcellus, who threw down his rod, his belt, and his arms, at the head of the legion, and publicly renounced the military service, at the very time when he found himself obliged to offer sacrifice. Yet surely this is a very false notion of the condition and duties of a Roman Centurion. Marcellus was bound, by a solemn oath, to serve with fidelity till he should be regularly discharged; and according to the sentiments which Dr. Chelsum ascribes to him, he was not released from his oath by any mistaken opinion of the unlawfulness of war. I would propose it as a case of conscience to any philosopher, or even to any casuist in Europe, Whether a particular order which cannot be reconciled with virtue or piety, dissolves the ties of a general and lawful obligation? And whether, if they had been consulted by the Christian Centurion, they would not have directed him to increase his diligence in the execution of his military functions, to refuse to yield to any act of idolatry, and patiently to expect the consequences of such a refusal? But, instead of obeying the mild and moderate dictates of religion, religion, instead of distinguishing between the duties of the soldier and of the Christian, Marcellus, with imprudent zeal, rushed forwards to seize the crown of martyrdom. He might have privately confessed himself guilty to the tribune or præfect under whom he served: he chose on the day of a public festival to disturb the order of the camp. He insulted, without necessity, the religion of his sovereign and of his country, by the epithets of contempt which he bestowed on the Roman gods. "Deos vestros ligneos et lapideos adorare contemno, quæ sunt idola surda et muta." Nay more; at the head of the legion, and in the face of the standards, the Centurion Marcellus openly renounced his allegiance to the Emperors. "Ex hoc militare IMPERATORIBUS VESTRIS desisto." From this moment I no longer serve YOUR EMPERORS, are the important words of Marcellus, which his advocate has not thought proper to translate. I again make my appeal to any lawyer, to any military man, Whether, under such circumstances, the pronoun your has not a seditious, and even treasonable import? And whether the officer who should make this declaration, and at the same time throw away his sword at the head of the regiment, would not be condemned for mutiny and desertion by any court-martial in Europe? I am the rather disposed to judge favourably of the conduct of the Roman government, as I cannot discover any desire to take advantage of the indiscretion of Marcellus. The commander of the legion seemed to lament that it was not in his power to dissemble this this rash action. After a delay of more than three months, the Centurion was examined before the Vice-præfect, his superior judge, who offered him the fairest opportunities of explaining or qualifying his seditious expressions, and at last condemned him to lose his head; not simply because he was a Christian, but because he had violated his military oath, thrown away his belt, and publicly blasphemed the Gods and the Emperors. Perhaps the impartial reader will confirm the sentence of the Vice-præfect Agricolanus, "Ita se habent facta Marcelli, ut hæc disciplinâ debeant vindicari."

Notwithstanding the plainest evidence, Dr. Chelsum will not believe that either Origen in theory, or Marcellus in practice, could seriously object to the use of arms; "because it is well known, that, far from declining the business of war altogether, whole legions of Christians served in the Imperial armies."* I have not yet discovered, in the author or authors of the Remarks, many traces of a clear and enlightened understanding, yet I cannot suppose them so destitute of every reasoning principle, as to imagine that they here allude to the conduct of the Christians who embraced the profession of arms after their religion had obtained a public establishment. Whole legions of Christians served under the banners of Constantine and Justinian, as whole regiments of Christians are now enlisted in the service of France or or England. The representation which I had given, was confined to the principles and practice of the church of which Origen and Marcellus were members, before the sense of public and private interest had reduced the lofty standard of evangelical perfection to the ordinary level of human nature. In those primitive times, where are the Christian legions that served in the imperial armies? Our ecclesiastical Pompeys may stamp with their foot, but no armed men will arise out of the earth, except the ghosts of the Thundering and the Thebæan legions; the former renowned for a miracle, and the latter for a martyrdom. Either the two Protestant Doctors must acquiesce under some imputations which are better understood than expressed, or they must prepare, in the full light and freedom of the eighteenth century, to undertake the defence of two obsolete legions, the least absurd of which staggered the well-disciplined credulity of a Franciscan Friar. (See Pagi Critic. ad Annal. Baronii, A. D. 174. tom. i. p. 168.) Very different was the spirit and taste of the learned and ingenuous Dr. Jortin, who, after treating the silly story of the Thundering legion with the contempt it deserved, continues in the following words: "Moyle wishes no greater penance to the believers of the Thundering Legion, than that they may also believe the Martyrdom of the Thebæan Legion (Moyle's Works, vol. ii. p. 103.): to which good wish, I say with Le Clerc (Bibliothèque A. et M. tom. xxvii. p. 193.) AMEN.

* Chelsum, p. 113.

"Qui

"Qui Bavium non odit, amet tua carmina, Mævi."

(Jortin's Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 367. 2d Edition, London, 1767.)

Yet I shall not attempt to conceal a formidable army of Christians and even of Martyrs, which is ready to enlist under the banners of the confederate Doctors, if they will accept their service. As a specimen of the extravagant legends of the middle age, I had produced the instance of ten thousand Christian soldiers supposed to have been crucified on Mount Ararat, by the order either of Trajan or Hadrian.* For the mention and for the confutation of this story, I had appealed to a papist and a protestant, to the learned Tillemont (Mem. Ecclesiast. tom. ii. part ii. p. 438.), and to the diligent Geddes (Miscellanies, vol. ii. p. 203.), and when Tillemont was not afraid to say that there are few histories which appear more fabulous, I was not ashamed of dismissing the fable with silent contempt. We may trace the degrees of fiction as well as those of credibility, and the impartial critic will not place on the same level the baptism of Philip and the donation of Constantine. But in considering the crucifixion of the ten thousand Christian soldiers, we are not reduced to the necessity of weighing any internal probabilities, or of disproving any external testimonies. This legend, the absurdity of which must strike every rational mind, stands naked and unsupported by

* Gibbon, p. 654. N. 74.

the

the authority of any writer who lived within a thousand years of the age of Trajan, and has not been able to obtain the poor sanction of the uncorrupted martyrologies which were framed in the most credulous period of ecclesiastical history. The two Protestant Doctors will probably reject the unsubstantial present which has been offered them; yet there is one of my adversaries, the anonymous Gentleman, who boldly declares himself the votary of the ten thousand martyrs, and challenges me "to discredit a FACT which hitherto by many has been looked upon as well established."* It is pity that a prudent confessor did not whisper in his ear, that, although the martyrdom of these military Saints, like that of the eleven thousand virgins, may contribute to the edification of the faithful, these wonderful tales should not be rashly exposed to the jealous and inquisitive eye of those profane critics, whose examination always precedes, and sometimes checks, their religious assent.

CHARACTER AND CREDIT OF EUSEBIUS.

II. A grave and pathetic complaint is introduced by Dr. Chelsum, into his preface,† that Mr. Gibbon, who has often referred to the Fathers of the Church, seems to have entertained a general distrust of those respectable witnesses. The critic is scandalized at the epithets of scanty and suspicious, which are applied to the materials of ecclesiastical history; and if he cannot impeach the truth of the former, he censures in the most angry terms the

* Remarks, p. 65, 66, 67. † P. ii. iii.

injus-

injustice of the latter. He assumes, with peculiar zeal, the defence of Eusebius, the venerable parent of Ecclesiastical History, and labours to rescue his character from the gross misrepresentation on which Mr. Gibbon has openly insisted.* He observes, as if he sagaciously foresaw the objection, "That it will not be sufficient here to allege a few instances of apparent credulity in some of the Fathers, in order to fix a general charge of suspicion on all." But it may be sufficient to allege a clear and fundamental principle of historical as well as legal Criticism, that whenever we are destitute of the means of comparing the testimonies of the opposite parties, the evidence of any witness, however illustrious by his rank and titles, is justly to be suspected in his own cause. It is unfortunate enough, that I should be engaged with adversaries, whom their habits of study and conversation appear to have left in total ignorance of the principles which universally regulate the opinions and practice of mankind.

As the ancient world was not distracted by the fierce conflicts of hostile sects, the free and eloquent writers of Greece and Rome had few opportunities of indulging their passions, or of exercising their impartiality in the relation of religious events. Since the origin of Theological Factions, some historians, Ammianus Marcellinus, Fra-Paolo, Thuanus, Hume, and perhaps a few others, have deserved the singular praise of holding the balance

* Chelsum and Randolph, p. 220—238.

with

with a steady and equal hand. Independent and unconnected, they contemplated with the same indifference, the opinions and interests of the contending parties; or, if they were seriously attached to a particular system, they were armed with a firm and moderate temper, which enabled them to suppress their affections, and to sacrifice their resentments. In this small, but venerable Synod of historians, Eusebius cannot claim a seat. I had acknowledged, and I still think, that his character was less tinctured with credulity than that of most of his contemporaries; but as his enemies must admit, that he was sincere and earnest in the profession of Christianity, so the warmest of his admirers, or at least of his readers, must discern, and will probably applaud, the religious zeal which disgraces or adorns every page of his Ecclesiastical History. This laborious and useful work was published at a time, between the defeat of Licinius and the Council of Nice, when the resentment of the Christians was still warm, and when the Pagans were astonished and dismayed by the recent victory and conversion of the great Constantine. The materials, I shall dare to repeat the invidious epithets of scanty and suspicious, were extracted from the accounts which the Christians themselves had given of their own sufferings, and of the cruelty of their enemies. The Pagans had so long and so contemptuously neglected the rising greatness of the Church, that the Bishop of Cæsarea had little either to hope or to fear from the writers of the opposite party; almost all of that little which did exist, has been accidentally lost, or purposely destroyed; and the candid inquirer may vainly wish to compare with the History of Eusebius, some Heathen narrative of the persecutions of Decius and Diocletian. Under these circumstances, it is the duty of an impartial judge to be counsel for the prisoner, who is incapable of making any defence for himself; and it is the first office of a counsel to examine with distrust and suspicion the interested evidence of the accuser. Reason justifies the suspicion, and it is confirmed by the constant experience of modern History, in almost every instance where we have an opportunity of comparing the mutual complaints and apologies of the religious factions, who have disturbed each other's happiness in this world, for the sake of securing it in the next.

As we are deprived of the means of contrasting the adverse relations of the Christians and Pagans; it is the more incumbent on us to improve the opportunities of trying the narratives of Eusebius, by the original, and sometimes occasional, testimonies of the more ancient writers of his own party. Dr. Chelsum * has observed, that the celebrated passage of Origen, which has so much thinned the ranks of the army of Martyrs, must be confined to the persecutions that had already happened. I cannot dispute this sagacious remark, but I shall venture to add, that this passage more immediately relates to the religious tempests which had been excited

* Gibbon, p. 653. Chelsum, p. 204—207.

excited in the time and country of Origen; and still more particularly to the city of Alexandria, and to the persecution of Severus, in which young Origen successfully exhorted his father to sacrifice his life and fortune for the cause of Christ. From such unquestionable evidence, I am authorised to conclude, that the number of holy victims who sealed their faith with their blood, was not, on this occasion, very considerable: but I cannot reconcile this fair conclusion with the positive declaration of Eusebius (L. vi. c. 2. p. 258.), that at Alexandria, in the persecution of Severus, an innumerable, at least an indefinite multitude (μυριοι) of Christians were honoured with the crown of martyrdom. The advocates for Eusebius may exert their critical skill in proving that μυριοι and ολιγοι many and few, are synonimous and convertible terms, but they will hardly succeed in diminishing so palpable a contradiction, or in removing the suspicion which deeply fixes itself on the historical character of the Bishop of Cæsarea. This unfortunate experiment taught me to read, with becoming caution, the loose and declamatory style which seems to magnify the multitude of martyrs and confessors, and to aggravate the nature of their sufferings. From the same motives I selected, with careful observation, the more certain account of the number of persons who actually suffered death in the province of Palestine, during the whole eight years of the last and most rigorous persecution.

Besides the reasonable grounds of suspicion, which suggest themselves to every liberal mind, against the credibility of the Ecclesiastical Historians, and of Eusebius, their venerable leader, I had taken notice of two very remarkable passages of the Bishop of Cæsarea. He frankly, or at least indirectly, declares, that in treating of the last persecution, "he has related whatever might redound to the glory, and suppressed all that could tend to the disgrace, of Religion."* Dr. Chelsum, who, on this occasion, most lamentably exclaims that we should hear Eusebius, before we utterly condemn him, has provided, with the assistance of his worthy colleague, an elaborate defence for their common patron; and as if he were secretly conscious of the weakness of the cause, he has contrived the resource of intrenching himself in a very muddy soil, behind three several fortifications, which do not exactly support each other. The advocate for the sincerity of Eusebius maintains: 1st, That he never made such a declaration: 2dly, That he had a right to make it: and, 3dly, That he did not observe it. These separate and almost inconsistent apologies, I shall separately consider.

1. Dr. Chelsum is at a loss how to reconcile, ——I beg pardon for weakening the force of his dogmatic style; he declares, that "It was plainly impossible to reconcile the express words of the charge exhibited, with any part of either of the passages appealed to in support of it."† If he means, as I think he must, that the express words of my my text cannot be found in that of Eusebius, I congratulate the importance of the discovery. But was it possible? Could it be my design to quote the words of Eusebius, when I reduced into one sentence the spirit and substance of two diffuse and distinct passages? If I have given the true sense and meaning of the Ecclesiastical Historian, I have discharged the duties of a fair Interpreter; nor shall I refuse to rest the proof of my fidelity on the translation of those two passages of Eusebius, which Dr. Chelsum produces in his favour.* "But it is not our part to describe the sad calamities which at last befel them (the Christians), since it does not agree with our plan to relate their dissensions and wickedness before the persecution; on which account we have determined to relate nothing more concerning them than may serve to justify the Divine Judgment. We therefore have not been induced to make mention either of those who were tempted in the persecution, or of those who made utter shipwreck of their salvation, and who were sunk of their own accord into the depths of the storm; but shall only add those things to our General History, which may in the first place be profitable to ourselves, and afterwards to posterity." In the other passage, Eusebius, after mentioning the dissensions of the Confessors among themselves, again declares that it is his intention to pass over all these things. "Whatsoever things, (continues the Historian, in the words of the Apostle, who was recommending the practice of virtue,) whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise; these things Eusebius thinks most suitable to a History of Martyrs;" of wonderful Martyrs, is the splendid epithet which Dr. Chelsum had not thought proper to translate. I should betray a very mean opinion of the judgment and candour of my readers, if I added a single reflection on the clear and obvious tendency of the two passages of the Ecclesiastical Historian. I shall only observe, that the Bishop of Cæsarea seems to have claimed a privilege of a still more dangerous and extensive nature. In one of the most learned and elaborate works that antiquity has left us, the Thirty-second Chapter of the Twelfth Book of his Evangelical Preparation bears for its title this scandalous Proposition, " How it may be lawful and fitting to use falsehood as a medicine, and for the benefit of those who want to be deceived." Οτι δεησει ποτε τῳ ψευδει αντι φαρμακε χρησθαι επι ωφελεια των δεομενων τε τοιετε τροπε. (P. 356, Edit. Græc. Rob. Stephani, Paris, 1544.) In this chapter he alleges a passage of Plato, which approves the occasional practice of pious and salutary frauds; nor is Eusebius ashamed to justify the sentiments of the Athenian philosopher by the example of the sacred writers of the Old Testament.

* Gibbon, p. 699. † Chelsum, p. 232.

* Chelsum, p. 228. 231.

2. I had contented myself with observing, that Eusebius had violated one of the fundamental laws of history, Ne quid veri dicere non audeat; nor could I imagine, if the fact was allowed, that any question question could possibly arise upon the matter of right. I was indeed mistaken; and I now begin to understand why I have given so little satisfaction to Dr. Chelsum, and to other critics of the same complexion, as our ideas of the duties and the privileges of an historian appear to be so widely different. It is alleged, that "every writer has a right to choose his subject, for the particular benefit of his reader; that he has explained his own plan consistently; that he considers himself, according to it, not as a complete historian of the times, but rather as a didactic writer, whose main object is to make his work, like the Scriptures themselves, PROFITABLE FOR DOCTRINE; that, as he treats only of the affairs of the Church, the plan is at least excusable, perhaps peculiarly proper; and that he has conformed himself to the principal duty of an historian, while, according to his immediate design, he has not particularly related any of the transactions which could tend to the disgrace of religion."* The historian must indeed be generous, who will conceal, by his own disgrace, that of his country, or of his religion. Whatever subject he has chosen, whatever persons he introduces, he owes to himself, to the present age, and to posterity, a just and perfect delineation of all that may be praised, of all that may be excused, and of all that must be censured. If he fails in the discharge of his important office, he partially violates the sacred obligations of truth, and disappoints his readers of the instruction which they might have derived from a fair parallel of the vices and virtues of the most illustrious characters. Herodotus might range without controul in the spacious walks of the Greek and Barbaric domain, and Thucydides might confine his steps to the narrow path of the Peloponnesian war; but those historians would never have deserved the esteem of posterity, if they had designedly suppressed or transiently mentioned those facts which could tend to the disgrace of Greece or of Athens. These unalterable dictates of conscience and reason have been seldom questioned, though they have been seldom observed; and we must sincerely join in the honest complaint of Melchior Canus, "that the lives of the philosophers have been composed by Laertius, and those of the Cæsars by Suetonius, with a much stricter and more severe regard for historic truth, than can be found in the lives of saints and martyrs, as they are described by Catholic writers." (See Loci Communes, L. xi. p. 650, apud Clericum. Epistol. Critic. v. p. 136.) And yet the partial representation of truth is of far more pernicious consequence in ecclesiastical, than in civil history. If Laertius had concealed the defects of Plato, or if Suetonius had disguised the vices of Augustus, we should have been deprived of the knowledge of some curious, and perhaps instructive, facts, and our idea of those celebrated men might have been more favourable than they deserved; but I cannot discover any practical inconveniencies which could have been the result of our

* Chelsum, p. 229, 230, 231.

our ignorance. But if Eusebius had fairly and circumstantially related the scandalous dissensions of the Confessors; if he had shewn that their virtues were tinctured with pride and obstinacy, and that their lively faith was not exempt from some mixture of enthusiasm; he would have armed his readers against the excessive veneration for those holy men, which imperceptibly degenerated into religious worship. The success of these didactic histories, by concealing or palliating every circumstance of human infirmity, was one of the most efficacious means of consecrating the memory, the bones, and the writings of the saints of the prevailing party; and a great part of the errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome may fairly be ascribed to this criminal dissimulation of the ecclesiastical historians. As a Protestant Divine, Dr. Chelsum must abhor these corruptions; but as a Christian, he should be careful lest his apology for the prudent choice of Eusebius should fix an indirect censure on the unreserved sincerity of the four Evangelists. Instead of confining their narrative to those things which are virtuous and of good report, instead of following the plan which is here recommended as peculiarly proper for the affairs of the Church, the inspired writers have thought it their duty to relate the most minute circumstances of the fall of St. Peter, without considering whether the behaviour of an Apostle, who thrice denied his Divine Master, might redound to the honour, or to the disgrace of Christianity. If Dr. Chelsum should be frightened by this unexpected pected consequence, if he should be desirous of saving his faith from utter shipwreck, by throwing overboard the useless lumber of memory and reflection, I am not enough his enemy to impede the success of his honest endeavours.

The didactic method of writing history was still more profitably exercised by Eusebius in another work, which he has intitled, The Life of Constantine, his gracious patron and benefactor. Priests and poets have enjoyed in every age a privilege of flattery; but if the actions of Constantine are compared with the perfect idea of a royal saint, which, under his name, has been delineated by the zeal and gratitude of Eusebius, the most indulgent reader will confess, that when I styled him a courtly Bishop,* I could only be restrained by my respect for the episcopal character from the use of a much harsher epithet. The other appellation of a passionate declaimer, which seems to have sounded still more offensive in the tender ears of Dr. Chelsum,† was not applied by me to Eusebius, but to Lactantius, or rather to the author of the historical declamation, De Mortibus Persecutorum; and indeed it is much more properly adapted to the rhetorician, than to the bishop. Each of those authors was alike studious of the glory of Constantine; but each of them directed the torrent of his invectives against the tyrant, whether Maxentius or Licinius, whose recent defeat was the actual theme of popular and Christian applause. This simple

* Gibbon, p. 704. † Chelsum, p. 234.

simple observation may serve to extinguish a very trifling objection of my critic, That Eusebius has not represented the tyrant Maxentius under the character of a persecutor.

Without scrutinizing the considerations of interest which might support the integrity of Baronius and Tillemont, I may fairly observe, that both those learned Catholics have acknowledged and condemned the dissimulation of Eusebius, which is partly denied, and partly justified, by my adversary. The honourable reflection of Baronius well deserves to be transcribed. "Hæc (the passages already quoted) de suo in conscribendâ persecutionis historia Eusebius; parum explens numeros sui muneris; dum perinde ac si panegyrim scriberet non historiam, triumphos dumtaxat martyrum atque victorias, non autem lapsus jacturamque fidelium posteris scripturæ monumentis curaret." (Baron. Annal. Ecclesiast. A. D. 302, No. 11. See likewise Tillemont, Mem. Eccles. tom. v. p. 62. 156; tom. vii. p. 130). In a former instance, Dr. Chelsum appeared to be more credulous than a Monk: on the present occasion, he has shewn himself less sincere than a Cardinal, and more obstinate than a Jansenist.

3. Yet the advocate for Eusebius has still another expedient in reserve. Perhaps he made the unfortunate declaration of his partial design, perhaps he had a right to make it; but at least his accuser must admit, that he has saved his honour by not keeping his word; since I myself have taken notice of THE CORRUPTION OF MANNERS

AND

AND PRINCIPLES among the Christians so FORCIBLY LAMENTED by Eusebius.* He has indeed indulged himself in a strain of loose and indefinite censure, which may generally be just, and which cannot be personally offensive, which is alike incapable of wounding or of correcting, as it seems to have no fixed object or certain aim. Juvenal might have read his satire against women in a circle of Roman ladies, and each of them might have listened with pleasure to the amusing description of the various vices and follies, from which she herself was so perfectly free. The moralist, the preacher, the ecclesiastical historian, enjoy a still more ample latitude of invective; and as long as they abstain from any particular censure, they may securely expose, and even exaggerate, the sins of the multitude. The precepts of Christianity seem to inculcate a style of mortification, of abasement, of self-contempt; and the hypocrite who aspires to the reputation of a saint, often finds it convenient to affect the language of a penitent. I should doubt whether Dr. Chelsum is much acquainted with the comedies of Molière. If he has ever read that inimitable master of human life, he may recollect whether Tartuffe was very much inclined to confess his real guilt, when he exclaimed,

> Oui, mon frère, je suis un méchant, un coupable;
> Un malheureux pécheur, tout plein d'iniquité;
> Le plus grand scélérat qui ait jamais été.

* Chelsum, p. 226, 227.

Chaque

Chaque instant de ma vie est chargé de souillures,
Elle n'est qu'un amas de crimes et d'ordures.
* * * * * * * *
Oui, mon cher fils, parlez, traitez-moi de perfide,
D'infame, de perdu, de voleur, d'homicide;
Accablez-moi de noms encore plus détestés:
Je n'y contredis point, je les ai mérités,
Et j'en veux à genoux souffrir l'ignominie,
Comme une honte due aux crimes de ma vie.

It is not my intention to compare the character of Tartuffe with that of Eusebius; the former pointed his invectives against himself, the latter directed them against the times in which he had lived: but as the prudent Bishop of Cæsarea did not specify any place or person for the object of his censure, he cannot justly be accused, even by his friends, of violating the profitable plan of his didactic history.

The extreme caution of Eusebius who declines any mention of those who were tempted and who fell during the persecution, has countenanced a suspicion that he himself was one of those unhappy victims, and that his tenderness for the wounded fame of his brethren arose from a just apprehension of his own disgrace. In one of my notes,* I had observed, that he was charged with the guilt of some criminal compliances, in his own presence, and in the Council of Tyre. I am therefore accountable for the reality only, and not for the truth of the accusation: but as the two doctors, who on this occasion unite their forces, are angry

* Gibbon, p. 699. N. 178.

and

and clamorous in asserting the innocence of the Ecclesiastical Historian,* I shall advance one step farther, and shall maintain, that the charge against Eusebius, though not legally proved, is supported by a reasonable share of presumptive evidence.

I have often wondered why our orthodox divines should be so earnest and zealous in the defence of Eusebius; whose moral character cannot be preserved, unless by the sacrifice of a more illustrious, and, as I really believe, of a more innocent victim. Either the Bishop of Cæsarea, on a very important occasion, violated the laws of Christian charity and civil justice, or we must fix a charge of calumny, almost of forgery, on the head of the great Athanasius, the standard-bearer of the Homoousian cause, and the firmest pillar of the Catholic faith. In the Council of Tyre, he was accused of murdering, or at least of mutilating a bishop, whom he produced at Tyre alive and unhurt (Athanas. tom. i. p. 783. 786.); and of sacrilegiously breaking a consecrated chalice, in a village where neither church, nor altar, nor chalice, could possibly have existed. (Athanas. tom. i. p. 731, 732. 802). Notwithstanding the clearest proofs of his innocence, Athanasius was oppressed by the Arian faction; and Eusebius of Cæsarea, the venerable father of Ecclesiastical history, conducted this iniquitous prosecution from a motive of personal enmity. (Athanas. tom. i. p. 728. 795. 797). Four years afterwards, a national council of the Bishops of

* Chelsum and Randolph, p. 236, 237, 238.

Egypt,

Egypt, forty-nine of whom had been present at the Synod of Tyre, addressed an epistle or manifesto in favour of Athanasius to all the bishops of the Christian world. In this epistle they assert, that some of the confessors, who accompanied them to Tyre, had accused Eusebius of Cæsarea of an act relative to idolatrous sacrifice. κκ Ευσεβιος ὁ εν Καισερειᾳ της Παλαισ῎ινης επι θυσιᾳ κατηγορειτο ὑπο των συν ἡμιν ὁμολογητων. (Athanas. tom. i. p. 728). Besides this short and authentic memorial, which escaped the knowledge or the candour of our confederate doctors, a consonant but more circumstantial narrative of the accusation of Eusebius may be found in the writings of Epiphanius (Hæres. lxviii. p. 723, 724.), the learned Bishop of Salamis, who was born about the time of the Synod of Tyre. He relates that, in one of the sessions of the council, Potamon, Bishop of Heraclea in Egypt, addressed Eusebius in the following words: "How now, Eusebius, can this be borne, that you should be seated as a judge, while the innocent Athanasius is left standing as a criminal? Tell me, continued Potamon, were we not in prison together during the persecution? For my own part, I lost an eye for the sake of the truth; but I cannot discern that you have lost any one of your members. You bear not any marks of your sufferings for Jesus Christ; but here you are, full of life, and with all the parts of your body sound and entire. How could you contrive to escape from prison, unless you stained your conscience, either by actual guilt or by a criminal promise to our persecutors?"

Eusebius

Eusebius immediately broke up the meeting, and discovered, by his anger, that he was confounded or provoked by the reproaches of the Confessor Potamon.

I should despise myself, if I were capable of magnifying, for a present occasion, the authority of the witness whom I have produced. Potamon was most assuredly actuated by a strong prejudice against the personal enemy of his Primate; and if the transaction to which he alluded had been of a private and doubtful kind, I would not take any ungenerous advantage of the respect which my reverend adversaries must entertain for the character of a confessor. But I cannot distrust the veracity of Potamon, when he confined himself to the assertion of a fact, which lay within the compass of his personal knowledge: and collateral testimony (see Photius, p. 296, 297) attests, that Eusebius was long enough in prison to assist his friend, the Martyr Pamphilus, in composing the first five books of his Apology for Origen. If we admit that Eusebius was imprisoned, he must have been discharged, and his discharge must have been either honourable, or criminal, or innocent. If his patience vanquished the cruelty of the tyrant's ministers, a short relation of his own confession and sufferings would have formed an useful and edifying chapter in his Didactic History of the persecution of Palestine; and the reader would have been satisfied of the veracity of an historian who valued truth above his life. If it had been in his power to justify, or even to excuse, cuse, the manner of his discharge from prison, it was his interest, it was his duty, to prevent the doubts and suspicions which must arise from his silence under these delicate circumstances. Notwithstanding these urgent reasons, Eusebius has observed a profound, and perhaps a prudent silence: though he frequently celebrates the merit and martyrdom of his friend Pamphilus (p. 371. 394. 419. 427. Edit. Cantab.), he never insinuates that he was his companion in prison; and while he copiously describes the eight years persecution in Palestine, he never represents himself in any other light than that of a spectator. Such a conduct in a writer, who relates with a visible satisfaction the honourable events of his own life, if it be not absolutely considered as an evidence of conscious guilt, must excite, and may justify, the suspicions of the most candid critic.

Yet the firmness of Dr. Randolph is not shaken by these rational suspicions; and he condescends, in a magisterial tone, to inform me, "That it is highly improbable, from the general well-known decision of the Church in such cases, that had his apostacy been known, he would have risen to those high honours which he attained, or been admitted at all indeed to any other than lay-communion." This weighty objection did not surprise me, as I had already seen the substance of it in the Prolegomena of Valesius; but I safely disregarded a difficulty which had not appeared of any moment to the national council of Egypt; and I still think that an hundred bishops, with Athanasius at their head, were as competent judges of the discipline of the fourth century, as even the Lady Margaret's Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford. As a work of supererogation, I have consulted, however, the Antiquities of Bingham (See L. iv. c. iii. s. 6, 7. vol. i. p. 144, &c. fol. edit.) and found, as I expected, that much real learning had made him cautious and modest. After a careful examination of the facts and authorities already known to me, and of those with which I was supplied by the diligent antiquarian, I am persuaded that the theory and the practice of discipline were not invariably the same, that particular examples cannot always be reconciled with general rules, and that the stern laws of justice often yielded to motives of policy and convenience. The temper of Jerom towards those whom he considered as heretics, was fierce and unforgiving; yet the Dialogue of Jerom against the Luciferians, which I have read with infinite pleasure, (tom. ii. p. 135—147. Edit. Basil. 1536,) is the seasonable and dexterous performance of a statesman, who felt the expediency of soothing and reconciling a numerous party of offenders. The most rigid discipline, with regard to the ecclesiastics who had fallen in time of persecution, is expressed in the 10th Canon of the Council of Nice; the most remarkable indulgence was shewn by the Fathers of the same Council to the lapsed, the degraded, the schismatic bishop of Lycopolis. Of the penitent sinners, some might escape the shame of a public conviction or confession, and others might be exempted from the rigour rigour of clerical punishment. If Eusebius incurred the guilt of a sacrilegious promise, (for we are free to accept the milder alternative of Potamon,) the proofs of this criminal transaction might be suppressed by the influence of money or favour; a seasonable journey into Egypt might allow time for the popular rumours to subside. The crime of Eusebius might be protected by the impunity of many Episcopal Apostates (See Philostorg. L. ii. c. 15. p. 21. Edit. Gothofred.); and the governors of the Church very reasonably desired to retain in their service the most learned Christian of the age.

Before I return these sheets to the press, I must not forget an anonymous pamphlet, which, under the title of A Few Remarks, &c. was published against my History in the course of the last summer. The unknown writer has thought proper to distinguish himself by the emphatic, yet vague, appellation of A GENTLEMAN: but I must lament that he has not considered, with becoming attention, the duties of that respectable character. I am ignorant of the motives which can urge a man of a liberal mind, and liberal manners, to attack without provocation, and without tenderness, any work which may have contributed to the information, or even to the amusement, of the public. But I am well convinced that the author of such a work, who boldly gives his name and his labours to the world, imposes on his adversaries the fair and honourable obligation of encountering him in open daylight, and of supporting the weight of their assertions by the credit of their names. The effusions of wit, or the productions of reason, may be accepted from a secret and unknown hand. The critic who attempts to injure the reputation of another, by strong imputations which may possibly be false, should renounce the ungenerous hope of concealing behind a mask the vexation of disappointment, and the guilty blush of detection.

After this remark, which I cannot make without some degree of concern, I shall frankly declare, that it is not my wish or my intention to prosecute with this Gentleman a literary altercation. There lies between us a broad and unfathomable gulph; and the heavy mist of prejudice and superstition, which has in a great measure been dispelled by the free inquiries of the present age, still continues to involve the mind of my adversary. He fondly embraces those phantoms (for instance, an imaginary Pilate,*) which can scarcely find a shelter in the gloom of an Italian convent; and the resentment which he points against me, might frequently be extended to the most enlightened of the PROTESTANT, or, in his opinion, of the HERETICAL critics. His observations are divided into a number of unconnected paragraphs, each of which contains some quotation from my History, and the angry, yet commonly trifling, expression of his disapprobation and displeasure. Those sentiments I cannot hope to remove; and as the religious opinions of this Gentleman are principally founded on the infallibility of the Church,† they are not calculated to make a very deep impression on the mind of an English reader. The view of facts will be materially affected by the contagious influence of doctrines. The man who refuses to judge of the conduct of Lewis XIV. and Charles V. towards their Protestant subjects,* declares himself incapable of distinguishing the limits of persecution and toleration. The devout Papist, who has implored on his knees the intercession of St. Cyprian, will seldom presume to examine the actions of the Saint by the rules of historical evidence and of moral propriety. Instead of the homely likeness which I had exhibited of the Bishop of Carthage, my adversary has substituted a life of Cyprian,† full of what the French call onction, and the English, canting (See Jortin's Remarks, Vol. ii. p. 239.): to which I can only reply, that those who are dissatisfied with the principles of Mosheim and Le Clerc, must view with eyes very different from mine, the Ecclesiastical History of the third century.

* Remarks, p. 100. † Id. p. 15.

culated

It would be an endless discussion (endless in every sense of the word) were I to examine the cavils which start up and expire in every page of this criticism, on the inexhaustible topic of opinions, characters, and intentions. Most of the instances which are here produced are of so brittle a substance, that they fall in pieces as soon as they are touched: and I searched for some time before I was able to discover an example of some moment

* Remarks, p. 111. † Id. p. 72—88.

where

where the Gentleman had fairly staked his veracity against some positive fact asserted in the Two last Chapters of my History. At last I perceived that he has absolutely denied * that any thing can be gathered from the Epistles of St. Cyprian, or from his treatise De Unitate Ecclesiæ, to which I had referred, to justify my account of the spiritual pride and licentious manners of some of the Confessors.† As the numbers of the Epistles are not the same in the edition of Pamelius as in that of Fel, the critic may be excused for mistaking my quotations, if he will acknowledge that he was ignorant of ecclesiastical history, and that he never heard of the troubles excited by the spiritual pride of the Confessors, who usurped the privilege of giving letters of communion to penitent sinners. But my reference to the treatise De Unitate Ecclesiæ was clear and direct; the treatise itself contains only ten pages, and the following words might be distinctly read by any person who understood the Latin language. "Nec quisquam miretur, dilectissimi fratres, etiam de confessoribus quosdam ad ista procedere, inde quoque aliquos tam nefanda tam gravia peccare. Neque enim confessio immunem facit ab insidiis diaboli; aut contra tentationes, et pericula, et incursus atque impetus seculares adhuc in seculo positum perpetuâ securitate defendit; ceterum nunquam in confessoribus, fraudes, et stupra, et adulteria postmodum videremus, quæ nunc in quibusdam viden-

* Remarks, p. 90, 91. † Gibbon, p. 661. Note 91.

tes

tes ingemiscimus et dolemus." This formal declaration of Cyprian, which is followed by several long periods of admonition and censure, is alone sufficient to expose the scandalous vices of some of the Confessors, and the disingenuous behaviour of my concealed adversary.

After this example, which I have fairly chosen as one of the most specious and important of his objections, the candid Reader would excuse me, if from this moment I declined the Gentleman's acquaintance. But as two topics have occurred, which are intimately connected with the subject of the preceding sheets, I have inserted each of them in its proper place, as the conclusion of the fourth article of my answers to Mr. Davis, and of the first article of my reply to the confederate Doctors, Chelsum and Randolph.

It is not without some mixture of mortification and regret, that I now look back on the number of hours which I have consumed, and the number of pages which I have filled, in vindicating my literary and moral character from the charge of wilful misrepresentations, gross errors, and servile plagiarisms. I cannot derive any triumph or consolation from the occasional advantages which I may have gained over three adversaries, whom it is impossible for me to consider as objects either of terror or of esteem. The spirit of resentment, and every other lively sensation, have long since been extinguished; and the pen would long since have dropped from my weary hand, had I not been supported in the execution of this ungrateful task, by the the consciousness, or at least by the opinion, that I was discharging a debt of honour to the public and to myself. I am impatient to dismiss, and to dismiss FOR EVER, this odious controversy, with the success of which I cannot surely be elated; and I have only to request, that, as soon as my readers are convinced of my innocence, they would forget my Vindication.

BENTINCK-STREET,
February 3, 1779.

END OF THE FOURTH VOLUME.

London: Printed by C. Roworth,
Bell-yard, Temple-bar.

155

511

ROBARTS LIBRARY
DUE DATE
NOV 20 1988

ET

RY

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO
3 1761 00055761 1

Goldwin Smith.

THE

MISCELLANEOUS

WORKS

OF

EDWARD GIBBON, ESQ.

WITH

MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE AND WRITINGS,

COMPOSED BY HIMSELF:

ILLUSTRATED FROM HIS LETTERS,

WITH OCCASIONAL NOTES AND NARRATIVE,

BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

JOHN, LORD SHEFFIELD.

A NEW EDITION, WITH CONSIDERABLE ADDITIONS,

IN FIVE VOLUMES.

VOL. V.

MISCELLANEOUS.

11/8/93
12/J-/11

LONDON:

PRINTED FOR JOHN MURRAY, 50, ALBEMARLE-STREET,

By C. Roworth, Bell-yard, Temple-bar.

1814.

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

PR
3476
A143
1814 v.5

CONTENTS.

VOL. V.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Page

MÉMOIRE Justificatif pour servir de Réponse, &c. Written 1778 - - - - - 1

A Dissertation on the Allegorical Beings found on the reverses of Medals. Lausanne, 1764 - - 35

An Account of a MS. by the Abbé G. V. Gravina, del Governo Civile di Roma. Rome, 1764 - - 39

A Dissertation on the subject of l'Homme au Masque de Fer. Written 1774 - - - 41

Observations sur les Mémoires Posthumes de M. de Chéseaux. Lausanne, 1756 - - - 48

Remarques sur quelques Prodiges. Lausanne, 1757 53

Remarques Critiques sur les Dignités Sacerdotales de Jules César. Written 1757 - - - 61

Principes des Poids, des Monnoies, et des Mesures des Anciens, avec des Tables construites sur ces Principes. Written 1759 - - - - 66

Dissertation sur les Anciennes Mesures, &c. du Bas Empire jusqu'à la Prise de Constantinople par les Turcs; la France et les Pays Bas; l'Allemagne, la Suisse, et les Pays du Nord; l'Italie et l'Espagne; l'Orient, les Indes, et l'Afrique; also Remarques sur " An Inquiry into the State of the Ancient Measures, the Attic, the Roman, and particularly Jewish, by Dr. Hooper, Bishop of Bath and Wells." Written 1759 - - - 120

Page

On the Position of the Meridional Line and the supposed Circumnavigation of Africa by the Ancients. Written in the year 1790 or 1791 - - - 170

Selections from Mr. Gibbon's Extraits Raisonnés de mes Lectures, from the Journal, from the Recueil de mes Observations, et Pièces Détachées, Common-Place Books, and Memoranda. From 1754 to 1764 - - 209

Remarks on Blackstone's Commentaries. Written 1770 545

Index Expurgatorius. About 1768 or 1769 - 548

Observations on Augerii Gislenii Busbequii Omnia quæ extant - - - - 580

Notes and Additions to Harewood's View of the various Editions of the Greek and Roman Classics. 1793 - 581

Appendix to the Treatise on the Position of the Meridional Line and the supposed Circumnavigation of Africa by the Ancients—a Letter and Annotations by Dr. Vincent, Dean of Westminster - - - - 590

MEMOIRS

Miscellaneous.

MÉMOIRE JUSTIFICATIF

POUR SERVIR DE

*Réponse à l'Exposé des Motifs de la Conduite du Roi de France relativement à l'Angleterre.

L'AMBITION d'une puissance, toujours ennemie du repos public, a obligé enfin le roi de la Grande Bretagne à employer dans une guerre juste et légitime ces forces que Dieu et son peuple lui ont confiées.—C'est en vain que la France essaye de justifier ou plutôt de déguiser sa politique aux yeux de l'Europe par son dernier manifeste, que l'orgueil et l'artifice semblent avoir dicté, mais qui ne peut se concilier avec la vérité des faits et les droits des nations. L'équité, la modération, l'amour de la paix, qui ont toujours réglé les démarches du roi, l'engagent maintenant à soumettre sa conduite et celle de ses ennemis au jugement du tribunal libre et respectable, qui prononce sans crainte et sans flatterie l'arrêt de l'Europe, du siècle présent et de la posterité. Ce tribunal, composé des hommes éclairés et désintéressés de toutes les nations, ne s'arrête jamais aux professions, et c'est par les actions des princes qu'il doit juger des motifs de leurs procédés et des sentimens de leurs cœurs.

* Mentioned in the Memoirs, as written at the request of the Lord Chancellor Thurlow and of Lord Weymouth, then Secretary of State, in 1778.

Lorsque le roi monta sur le trône, il jouissoit du succès de ses armes dans les quatre parties du monde. Sa modération rétablit la tranquillité publique, dans le même instant qu'il soutenoit avec fermeté la gloire de sa couronne, et qu'il procuroit à ses sujets les avantages les plus solides. L'expérience lui avoit fait connoître combien les fruits de la victoire même sont tristes et amers; combien les guerres heureuses ou malheureuses épuisent les peuples sans agrandir les princes. Ses actions prouvoient à l'univers, qu'il sentoit tout le prix de la paix, et il étoit au moins à présumer que la raison qui l'avoit éclairé sur les malheurs inévitables de la guerre, et la dangereuse vanité des conquêtes, lui inspireroit la résolution sincère et inébranlable de maintenir la tranquillité publique, dont il étoit lui-même l'auteur et le garant. Ces principes ont servi de base à la conduite invariable de sa majesté pendant les quinze années qui ont suivi la paix conclue à Paris en 1763: époque heureuse de repos et de félicité, dont la mémoire sera long tems conservée par le souvenir et peut-être par les regrets des nations de l'Europe.—Les instructions du roi à tous ses ministres portoient l'empreinte de son caractère et de ses maximes. Il leur recommandoit, comme le plus important de leurs devoirs, d'écouter avec une attention scrupuleuse les plaintes et les représentations des puissances, ses alliés ou ses voisins, de prévenir, dans leur origine, tous les sujets de querelle relle qui pourroient aigrir ou aliéner les esprits, de détourner le fléau de la guerre par tous les expédiens compatibles avec la dignité du souverain d'une nation respectable, et d'inspirer à tous les peuples une juste confiance dans le système politique d'une cour qui détestoit la guerre sans la craindre, qui n'employoit pour ses moyens que la raison et la bonne foi, et qui n'avoit pour objet que la tranquillité générale. Au milieu de cette tranquillité les premières étincelles de la discorde s'allumèrent en Amérique. Les intrigues d'un petit nombre de chefs audacieux et criminels, qui abusèrent de la simplicité crédule de leurs compatriotes, séduisirent insensiblement la plus grande partie des colonies Angloises à lever l'étendart de la révolte contre la mère-patrie, à qui elles étoient redevables de leur existence et de leur bonheur. La cour de Versailles oublia sans peine la foi des traités, les devoirs des alliés, et les droits des souverains, pour essayer de profiter des circonstances qui paroissoient favorables à ses desseins ambitieux. Elle ne rougit point d'avilir sa dignité par les liaisons secrettes qu'elle forma avec des sujets rebelles, et après avoir épuisé toutes les ressources honteuses de la perfidie et de la dissimulation, elle osa avouer à la face de l'Europe, indignée de sa conduite, le traité solemnel que les ministres du roi très Chrétien avoient signé avec les agens ténébreux des colonies Angloises, qui ne fondoient leur indépendance prétendue que sur la hardiesse de leur révolte. La déclaration offensante que le Marquis de Noailles fut chargé de faire à la cour de Londres, le 13 Mars de l'année dernière, autorisa sa majesté à repousser par les armes l'insulte inouie qu'on venoit d'offrir à l'honneur de sa couronne; et le roi n'oublia pas dans cette occasion importante ce qu'il devoit à ses sujets et à lui-même. Le même esprit de fausseté et d'ambition régnoit toujours dans les conseils de la France. L'Espagne, qui s'est repentie plus d'une fois d'avoir négligé ses vrais intérêts pour servir aveuglément les projets destructeurs de la branche aînée de la maison de Bourbon, fut engagée à changer le rôle de médiateur pour celui d'ennemi de la Grande Bretagne. Les calamités de la guerre se sont multipliées; mais la cour de Versailles ne doit pas jusqu'à présent se vanter du succès de ses opérations militaires; et l'Europe sait apprécier ces victoires navales, qui n'existent que dans les Gazettes et dans les manifestes des vainqueurs prétendus.

Puisque la guerre et la paix imposent aux nations des devoirs entièrement différens et même opposés, il est indispensable de distinguer ces deux états dans le raisonnement aussi bien que dans la conduite; mais dans le dernier manifeste que la France vient de publier ces deux états sont perpétuellement confondus. Elle prétend justifier sa conduite en faisant valoir tour-à-tour et presqu'au même instant, ces droits qu'il n'est permis qu'à un ennemi de reclamer, et ces maximes qui règlent les obligations et les procédés de l'amitié nationale. L'addresse de la cour de Versailles à brouiller sans cesse deux suppositions qui n'ont rien de commun, est la conséquence naturelle d'une politique fausse et et insidieuse, incapable de soutenir la lumière du grand jour. Les sentimens et les démarches du roi, qui n'ont point à redouter l'examen le plus sévère, l'invitent au contraire à distinguer clairement ce que ses ennemis ont confondu avec tant d'artifice. Il n'appartient qu'à la justice de parler sans crainte le langage de la raison et de la vérité.

La pleine justification de sa majesté et la condamnation indélébile de la France, se réduit donc à la preuve de deux propositions simples et presqu'évidentes; premièrement, Qu'une paix profonde, permanente, et de la part de l'Angleterre sincère et véritable, subsistoit entre les deux nations, lorsque la France forma des liaisons d'abord secrettes, et ensuite publiques et avouées, avec les colonies révoltées de l'Amérique: secondement, Que suivant les maximes les mieux reconnues du droit des gens, et selon la teneur même des traités actuellement subsistans entre les deux couronnes, ces liaisons pouvoient être regardées comme une infraction de la paix, et que l'aveu public de ces liaisons équivaloit à une déclaration de guerre de la part du roi très Chrétien. C'est peut-être la première fois qu'une nation respectable ait eu besoin de prouver deux vérités aussi incontestables, et la justice de la cause du roi est déjà reconnue par tous les hommes qui jugent sans intérêt et sans prévention.

" Lorsque la Providence appella le roi au trône la France jouissoit de la paix la plus profonde." Telles sont les expressions du dernier manifeste de la cour de Versailles, qui reconnoît sans peine les assurances solemnelles d'une amitié sincère et des dispositions les plus pacifiques qu'elle reçut dans cette occasion de la part de sa majesté Britannique, et qui furent souvent renouvellées par l'entremise des ambassadeurs aux deux cours, pendant quatre ans, jusqu'au moment fatal et décisif de la déclaration du marquis de Noailles. Il s'agit donc de prouver que dans ces tems heureux de la tranquillité générale, l'Angleterre cachoit une guerre secrette sous les apparences de la paix, et que ses procédés injustes et arbitraires étoient portés au point de légitimer du côté de la France les démarches les plus fortes, et qui ne seroient permises qu'à un ennemi déclaré. Pour remplir cet objet il faudroit porter devant le tribunal de l'Europe des griefs clairement articulés et solidement établis. Ce grand tribunal exigeroit des preuves formelles et peut-être réitérées de l'injure et de la plainte, le refus d'une satisfaction convenable, et la protestation de la partie souffrante qu'elle se tenoit hautement offensée par ce refus, et qu'elle se regardoit désormais comme affranchie des devoirs de l'amitié et du lien des traités. Les nations qui respectent la sainteté des sermens et les avantages de la paix, sont les moins promptes à saisir les occasions qui semblent les dispenser d'une obligation sacrée et solemnelle, et ce n'est qu'en tremblant qu'elles osent renoncer à l'amitié des puissances dont elles ont long tems essuyé l'injustice et les insultes.

Mais la cour de Versailles a ignoré ou a méprisé ces principes sages et salutaires, et au lieu de poser les fondemens d'une guerre juste et légitime, elle se contente de semer dans tous les pages de son manifeste des plaintes vagues et générales, exprimées dans un style de métaphore et d'exagération. Elle remonte plus de soixante ans pour accuser le peu de soin de l'Angleterre à ratifier quelques réglemens de commerce, quelques articles du traité d'Utrecht. Elle se permet de reprocher aux ministres du roi d'employer le langage de la hauteur et de l'ambition, sans s'abaisser jusqu'au devoir de prouver des imputations aussi peu vraisemblables qu'elles sont odieuses. Les suppositions gratuites de la mauvaise foi et de l'ambition de la cour de Londres sont confusément entassées, comme si l'on craignoit de s'y arrêter. L'on insinue d'une manière très obscure les insultes prétendues qu'ont essuyées le commerce, le pavillon et même le territoire François, " et on laisse échapper enfin l'aveu des engagemens que le roi très Chrétien avoit déjà formés avec l'Espagne, pour venger leurs griefs respectifs et pour mettre un terme à l'empire tyrannique que l'Angleterre a usurpé et prétend conserver sur toutes les mers."

son

Il est difficile de combattre des fantômes, ou de répondre d'une manière nette et précise au langage de la déclamation. La juste confiance du roi desireroit sans doute de se livrer à l'examen le plus approfondi de ces plaintes vagues, de ces griefs prétendus, sur lesquels la cour de Versailles a si prudemment évité de s'expliquer avec la clarté et le détail qui pourroient seuls appuyer ses raisons et faire excuser ses procédés. Pendant une paix de quinze ans les intérêts de deux nations puissantes et peut-être jalouses, qui se touchent par tant d'endroits différens dans l'ancien et dans le nouveau monde, fournissent inévitablement des sujets de plainte et de discussion, que la modération réciproque sauroit toujours assoupir, mais qui ne sont que trop facilement aigris et empoisonnés par la haine réelle et les soupçons affectés d'un ennemi secret et ambitieux : et les malheurs de l'Amérique étoient très propres à multiplier les espérances, les prétextes et les prétensions injustes de la France. Cependant telle a été la conduite toujours uniforme et toujours pacifique du roi et de ses ministres, qu'elle a souvent réduit ses ennemis au silence, et s'il est permis d'appercevoir le vrai sens de ces accusations vagues et équivoques, dont l'obscurité étudiée décèle les traits de la honte et de l'artifice, s'il est permis de démêler des objets qui n'ont point d'existence, on peut assurer avec la hardiesse de la vérité qu'il est plusieurs de ces griefs prétendus qui sont annoncés pour la première fois dans une déclaration de guerre, sans avoir jamais été proposés à la cour de Londres dans le tems qu'elle auroit pu les écouter avec l'attention sérieuse et favorable de l'amitié. A l'égard des plaintes que l'ambassadeur de sa majesté très Chrétienne communiquoit de tems en tems aux ministres du roi, il seroit aisé de donner ou plutôt de renouveller les réponses satisfaisantes qui prouvèrent aux yeux de la France elle-même la modération du roi, son amour de la justice, et la sincérité de ses dispositions à conserver la tranquillité générale de l'Europe. Ces représentations, dont la cour de Versailles pourroit se dispenser de rappeller le souvenir, étoient rare-

ment

ment marquées au coin de la raison et de la vérité, et il se trouvoit le plus souvent que les personnes en Europe, en Amérique, ou sur les mers, desquelles elle tenoit son intelligence suspecte et malfondée, n'avoient pas craint d'abuser de sa confiance, pour mieux servir ses intentions secrettes. Si les faits que la France faisoit valoir comme le sujet de ses plaintes étoient appuyés quelquefois sur une base moins fragile, les ministres du roi les éclaircissoient sur le champ par la justification la plus nette et la plus entière des motifs et des droits de leur souverain, qui pouvoit sans blesser le repos public punir la contrebande qui se faisoit sur ses côtes, et à qui les loix des nations accordoient le droit légitime d'arrêter tous les vaisseaux qui portoient des armes et des munitions de guerre à ses ennemis ou à ses sujets rebelles. Les tribunaux étoient toujours ouverts aux particuliers de toutes les nations, et il faut bien peu connoître la constitution Britannique pour supposer que la puissance royale eût été capable de les exclure des moyens d'appel. Dans le théâtre vaste et éloigné des opérations d'une guerre navale, la vigilance la plus active, l'autorité la plus ferme sont incapables de découvrir ou de réprimer tous les désordres ; mais toutes les fois que la cour de Versailles a pu établir des torts réels que ses sujets avoient éprouvés sans la connoissance ou l'approbation du roi, sa majesté a donné les ordres les plus prompts et les plus efficaces pour arrêter les abus qui blessoient sa dignité, autant que les intérêts de ses voisins, qui avoient été enveloppés dans les malheurs de la guerre.

L'objet

L'objet et l'importance de cette guerre suffiroient pour démontrer à l'Europe les principes qui ont dû régler les démarches politiques de l'Angleterre. Dans le tems qu'elle employoit ses forces pour ramener à leur devoir les colonies révoltées de l'Amérique, est-il vraisemblable qu'elle eût choisi ce moment pour irriter par l'injustice ou l'insolence de ses procédés les puissances les plus respectables de l'Europe?—L'équité a toujours prescrit les sentimens et la conduite du roi, mais dans cette occasion importante sa prudence même est le garant de sa sincérité et de sa modération.

Mais pour établir clairement le système pacifique qui subsistoit entre les deux nations, il ne faudroit qu'en appeller au témoignage même de la cour de Versailles. A l'époque où elle ne rougit pas de placer toutes ces infractions prétendues de la tranquillité publique, qui auroient engagé " un prince moins avare du sang de ses sujets, à user sans hésiter de représailles, et à repousser l'insulte par la force de ses armes," les ministres du roi très Chrétien parloient le langage de la confiance et de l'amitié. Au lieu d'annoncer les desseins de la vengeance avec ce ton de hauteur qui épargne du moins à l'injustice les reproches de perfidie et de dissimulation, la cour de Versailles cachoit la conduite la plus insidieuse sous les professions les plus séduisantes; mais ces professions mêmes servent aujourd'hui à démentir ses déclarations, et à rappeller les sentimens qui auroient dû faire la règle de sa conduite.—Si la cour de Versailles ne veut pas s'accuser de la dissimulation la moins digne de sa grandeur, elle sera forcée de convenir que jusqu'au moment qu'elle dicta au marquis de Noailles la déclaration qui a été reçue comme le signal de la guerre, elle ne connoissoit pas des sujets de plainte assez réels ou assez importans pour l'autoriser à violer les obligations de la paix, et la foi des traités qu'elle avoit jurés à la face de Dieu et de l'univers, et à se dispenser de l'amitié nationale dont elle avoit réitéré jusqu'au dernier instant les assurances les plus vives et les plus solemnelles.

sa

Lorsqu'un adversaire est incapable de justifier sa violence dans l'opinion publique, ou même à ses propres yeux, par les injures qu'il prétend avoir essuyées, il a recours au danger chimérique auquel sa patience auroit pu l'exposer; et à la place des faits solides dont il est dépourvu, il essaye de substituer un vain tableau qui n'existe que dans son imagination, ou peut-être dans son cœur.—Les ministres du roi très Chrétien, qui paroissent avoir senti la foiblesse des moyens qu'ils ont été réduits à employer, font encore des efforts impuissans pour ajouter à ces moyens l'appui des soupçons les plus odieux, et les plus étranges, " La cour de Londres faisoit dans ses ports des préparatifs et des armemens qui ne pouvoient avoir l'Amérique pour objet: leur but étoit par conséquent trop déterminé pour que le roi pût s'y méprendre, et dès lors il devint un devoir rigoureux de faire des dispositions capables de prévenir les mauvais desseins de son ennemi, &c. Dans cet état des choses le roi sentit qu'il n'y avoit pas un moment à perdre."

Tel

Tel est le langage de la France: nous allons faire entendre celui de la vérité.

Pendant les disputes qui s'allumoient entre la Grande Bretagne et ses colonies, la cour de Versailles s'étoit appliquée avec l'ardeur la plus vive et la plus opiniâtre à l'augmentation de sa marine. Le roi ne prétend pas régner en tyran sur toutes les mers, mais il sait que les forces maritimes ont fait dans tous les siècles la sûreté et la gloire de ses états; et qu'elles ont souvent contribué à protéger la liberté de l'Europe contre la puissance ambitieuse qui a si longtems travaillé à l'asservir.

Le sentiment de sa dignité et la juste connoissance de ses devoirs et de ses intérêts engageoient sa majesté à veiller d'un œil attentif sur les démarches de la France, dont la politique dangereuse, sans motif et sans ennemi, précipitoit dans tous ses ports la construction et l'armement des vaisseaux, et qui détournoit une partie considérable de ses revenus, pour subvenir aux frais de ces préparatifs militaires, dont il étoit impossible d'annoncer la nécessité ou l'objet.—Dans cette conjoncture le roi n'a pu se dispenser de suivre les conseils de sa prudence, et l'exemple de ses voisins; l'augmentation successive de leur marine a servi de règle à la sienne; et sans blesser les égards qu'elle devoit aux puissances amies, sa majesté a publiquement déclaré à son parlement assemblé, qu'il convenoit dans la situation actuelle des affaires, que la défense de l'Angleterre se trouvât dans un état respectable. Les forces navales qu'elle fortifioit avec avec tant de soin n'étoient destinées qu'à maintenir la tranquillité générale de l'Europe, et pendant que le témoignage de sa conscience disposoit le roi à ajouter foi aux professions de la cour de Versailles, il se préparoit à ne point craindre les desseins perfides de son ambition.—Elle ose maintenant supposer qu'au lieu de se borner aux droits d'une défense légitime, le roi s'étoit livré à l'espérance des conquêtes, et que la "Reconciliation de la Grande Bretagne avec ses colonies annonçoit de sa part un projet formé de les rallier à sa couronne pour les armer contre la France." Puisque la cour de Versailles ne peut excuser ses démarches qu'à la faveur d'une supposition destituée de vérité et de vraisemblance, le roi est en droit de la sommer à la face de l'Europe, de montrer la preuve d'une assertion aussi odieuse qu'elle est hasardeuse, et de développer ces opérations publiques, ou ces intrigues secrettes qui puissent autoriser les soupçons de la France, que la Grande Bretagne après un combat long et pénible n'a offert la paix à ses sujets que dans le dessein d'entreprendre une guerre nouvelle contre une puissance respectable avec laquelle elle conservoit tous les dehors de l'amitié.

Après avoir fidèlement exposé les motifs frivoles et les griefs prétendus de la France, on rappelle, avec une assurance justifiée par la raison et par les faits, cette première proposition si simple et si importante, qu'un état de paix subsistoit entre les deux nations, et que la France étoit liée par toutes les obligations de l'amitié et des traités envers le roi, roi, qui n'avoit jamais manqué à ses engagemens légitimes.

Le premier article du traité, signé à Paris le 10 Février 1763, entre leurs majestés Britannique, très Chrétienne, Catholique, et très Fidèle, confirme de la manière la plus précise et la plus solemnelle les obligations que le droit naturel impose à toutes les nations, qui se reconnoissent mutuellement pour amies, mais ces obligations sont détaillées et stipulées dans ce traité par des expressions aussi vives qu'elles sont justes.—Après avoir renfermé dans une formule générale tous les états et tous les sujets des hautes parties contractantes, elles annoncent leur résolution non-seulement à ne jamais permettre des hostilités quelconques par terre ou par mer, mais encore à se procurer réciproquement dans toute occasion tout ce qui pourroit contribuer à leur gloire, intérêts, ou avantages mutuels, sans donner aucun secours ou protection directement ou indirectement à ceux qui voudroient porter quelque préjudice à l'une ou à l'autre des hautes parties contractantes.—Tel fut l'engagement sacré que la France contracta avec la Grande Bretagne, et on ne sauroit se dissimuler qu'une semblable promesse doit s'appliquer avec plus de force encore et d'énergie aux rebelles domestiques qu'aux ennemis étrangers des deux couronnes.—La révolte des Américains a mis à l'épreuve la fidélité de la cour de Versailles, et malgré les exemples fréquens que l'Europe a déjà vus de son peu de respect pour la foi des traités, sa conduite dans ces circonstances a étonné et indigné toutes les les nations, qui ne sont pas aveuglément dévouées aux intérêts et même aux caprices de son ambition. Si la France s'étoit proposée de remplir ses devoirs, il lui étoit impossible de les méconnoître; l'esprit aussi bien que la lettre du traité de Paris lui imposoit l'obligation de fermer ses ports aux vaisseaux des Américains, d'interdire à ses sujets tout commerce avec ce peuple rebelle, et de ne point accorder son secours ni sa protection aux ennemis domestiques d'une couronne à laquelle elle avoit juré une amitié sincère et inviolable. Mais l'expérience avoit trop bien éclairé le roi sur le système politique de ses anciens adversaires pour lui faire espérer qu'ils se conformeroient exactement aux principes justes et raisonnables qui assurent la tranquillité générale.

Aussitôt que les colonies révoltées eurent consommé leurs attentats criminels, par la déclaration ouverte de leur indépendance prétendue, elles songèrent à former des liaisons secrettes avec les puissances les moins favorables aux intérêts de la mère-patrie, et à tirer de l'Europe les secours militaires, sans lesquels il leur auroit été impossible de soutenir la guerre qu'elles avoient entreprise. Leurs agens essayèrent de pénétrer et de se fixer dans les différens états de l'Europe; mais ce ne fut qu'en France qu'ils trouvèrent un asyle, des espérances et des secours. Il ne convient pas à la dignité du roi de vouloir rechercher l'époque ou la nature de la correspondence qu'ils eurent l'addresse de lier avec les ministres de la cour de Versailles, et dont on vit bientôt les effets publics dans la liberté générale, ou plutôt dans la licence effrénée d'un d'un commerce illégitime. On sait assez que la vigilance des loix ne peut pas toujours prévenir la contrebande habile, qui se reproduit sous mille formes différentes, et à qui l'avidité du gain fait braver tous les dangers, et éluder toutes les précautions; mais la conduite des négocians François, qui faisoient passer en Amérique non-seulement les marchandises utiles ou nécessaires, mais encore le salpêtre, la poudre à canon, les munitions de guerre, les armes, l'artillerie, annonçoit hautement qu'ils étoient assurés non-seulement de l'impunité, mais de la protection même et de la faveur des ministres de la cour de Versailles.

On ne tentoit point une entreprise aussi vaine et aussi difficile que celle de cacher aux yeux de la Grande Bretagne et de l'Europe entière les démarches d'une compagnie de commerce, qui s'étoit associée pour fournir aux Américains tout ce qui pouvoit nourrir et entretenir le feu de la révolte. Le public instruit nommoit le chef de l'entreprise dont la maison étoit établie à Paris: ses correspondans à Dunkerque, à Nantes, à Bordeaux étoient également connus. Les magasins immenses qu'ils formoient et qu'ils renouvelloient tous les jours, furent chargés successivement sur les vaisseaux qu'ils construisoient ou qu'ils achetoient, et dont on essayoit à peine de dissimuler l'objet et la destination. Ces vaisseaux prenoient ordinairement de fausses lettres de mer pour les îles Françoises de l'Amérique, mais les marchandises dont leurs cargaisons étoient composées suffisoient avant le moment de leur départ pour laisser entrevoir la fraude et l'artifice: ces soupçons étoient étoient bientôt confirmés par la direction du cours de ces vaisseaux; et au bout de quelques semaines l'on apprenoit sans surprise qu'ils étoient tombés entre les mains des officiers du roi qui croisoient dans les mers de l'Amérique, et qui les arrêtoient à la vue même des côtes des colonies révoltées. Cette vigilance n'étoit que trop bien justifiée par la conduite de ceux qui eurent la fortune ou l'addresse de s'y dérober; puisqu'ils n'abordèrent en Amérique que pour livrer aux rebelles les armes et les munitions de guerre dont ils étoient chargés pour leur service.—Les indices de ces faits, qui ne pouvoient être considérés que comme une infraction manifeste de la foi des traités, se multiplioient toujours, et la diligence de l'ambassadeur du roi à communiquer à la cour de Versailles ses plaintes et ses preuves, ne lui laissoit pas même la ressource honteuse et humiliante de paroître ignorer ce qui se passoit et se répétoit continuellement au cœur de ses états. Il indiquoit les noms, le nombre et la qualité des vaisseaux, que les agens du commerce de l'Amérique faisoient équiper dans les ports de la France, pour porter aux rebelles des armes, des munitions de guerre, et même des officiers François qu'on avoit engagés dans les services des colonies révoltées. Les dates, les lieux, les personnes, étoient toujours désignées avec une précision qui offroit aux ministres de sa majesté très Chrétienne les plus grandes facilités pour s'assurer de la vérité de ces rapports, et pour arrêter, pendant qu'il en étoit tems, le progrès de ces armemens illicites. Parmi une foule d'exemples qui accusent le peu d'attention de la cour de Versailles à remplir les conditions de la paix, ou plutôt son attention constante et soutenue à nourrir la discorde et la guerre, il est impossible de tout dire, et il est très difficile de choisir les objets les plus frappans. Les neuf gros vaisseaux équipés et frétés par le Sieur de Beaumarchais et ses associés, au mois de Janvier de l'an 1777, ne sont point confondus avec le vaisseau l'Amphitrite, qui porta vers le même tems une grande quantité de munitions de guerre, et trente officiers François, qui passèrent impunément au service des rebelles. Chaque mois et presque tous les jours fournissoient de nouveaux sujets de plainte; et une courte notice du mémoire que le Vicomte de Stormont, ambassadeur du roi, communiqua au Comte de Vergennes au mois de Novembre de la même année, donnera une idée juste, mais très imparfaite, de l'espèce de torts que la Grande Bretagne avoit si souvent essuyés. " Il y a à Rochfort un vaisseau de soixante pièces de canon, et à l'Orient un vaisseau des Indes percé pour soixante canons. Ces deux vaisseaux sont destinés pour l'usage des rebelles. Ils seront chargés de différentes marchandises, et frétés par Messieurs Chaumont, Holken, et Sabatier. Le vaisseau l'Heureux est parti de Marseilles, sous un autre nom, le vingt-six de Septembre. Il va en droiture à la Nouvelle Hampshire, quoiqu'il prétend aller aux Iles. On y a permis l'embarquement de trois mille fusils, et de deux mille cinq cens livres de souffre, marchandise aussi nécessaire aux Américains qu'elle est inutile dans les Iles. Ce vaisseau est commandé par M. Lundi, officier François, officier de distinction, ci-devant lieutenant de M. de Bou-

Bougainville.—L'Hippopotame, appartenant au Sieur Beaumarchais, doit avoir à son bord quatorze mille fusils, et beaucoup de munitions de guerre, pour l'usage des rebelles.—Il y a environ cinquante vaisseaux François, qui se préparent à partir pour l'Amérique Septentrionale, chargés de munitions de guerre et de différentes marchandises pour l'usage des rebelles. Ils partiront de Nantes, de l'Orient, de St. Malo, du Havre, de Bordeaux, de Bayonne, et de différens autres ports. Voici les noms de quelques uns des principaux intéressés: M. Chaumont, M. Mention, et ses associés, &c. &c."

Dans un royaume où la volonté du prince ne trouve point d'obstacle, des secours si considérables, si publics, si long tems soutenus, si nécessaires enfin à l'entretien de la guerre en Amérique, annonçoient assez clairement les intentions secrettes des ministres du roi très Chrétien. Mais ils portèrent bien plus loin l'oubli et le mépris des engagemens les plus solemnels, et ce ne fut point sans leur permission qu'une guerre sourde et dangereuse sortoit des ports de la France, sous le masque trompeur de la paix, et le pavillon prétendu des colonies Américaines. L'accueil favorable que leurs agens trouvèrent auprès des ministres de la cour de Versailles, les encouragea bientôt à former et à exécuter le projet audacieux d'établir une place d'armes dans le pays qui leur avoit servi d'asyle. Ils avoient apporté, ou ils sçurent fabriquer, des lettres de marque au nom du Congrès Américain, qui a eu la hardiesse d'usurper tous les droits de la souveraineté. Les associés, dont les vues intéressées se prêtoient sans peine à tous leurs desseins, firent équiper des vaisseaux qu'ils avoient construits ou achetés. On les arma pour aller en course dans les mers de l'Europe, et même sur les côtes de la Grande Bretagne. Pour sauver les apparences, les capitaines de ces corsaires arboroient le pavillon prétendu de l'Amérique; mais leurs équipages étoient toujours composés d'un grand nombre de François, qu'on enrôloit avec impunité sous les yeux même des gouverneurs, et des officiers des provinces maritimes. Un essaim nombreux de ces corsaires, animé par l'esprit de rapine, sortoit des ports de la France, et après avoir couru les mers Britanniques, ils rentroient, ou ils se réfugioient dans ces mêmes ports. Ils y ramenoient leurs prises, et à la faveur de l'artifice grossier et foible, qu'on daignoit quelquefois employer, la vente de ces prises se faisoit assez publiquement, et assez commodément sous les yeux des officiers royaux, toujours disposés à protéger le commerce de ces négocians qui violoient les loix, pour se conformer aux intentions du ministère François. Les corsaires s'enrichissoient des dépouilles des sujets du roi, et après avoir profité d'une liberté entière de réparer leurs pertes, de pourvoir à leurs besoins, et de se procurer toutes les munitions de guerre, la poudre, les canons, les agrêts qui pouvoient servir à de nouvelles entreprises, ils resortoient librement des mêmes ports, pour se remettre en mer et en course. L'histoire du corsaire le Reprisal peut se citer parmi une foule d'exemples, qui montrent au jour la conduite injuste mais à peine artificieuse de la cour de Versailles. Ce vaisseau, qui avoit amené en Europe le Sieur Franklin, agent des colonies révoltées, fut reçu avec ses deux prises qu'il avoit faites en route ; il resta dans le port de Nantes aussi long tems qu'il convenoit à ses vues, se remit deux fois en mer pour piller les sujets du roi, et se retira tranquillement à l'Orient avec de nouvelles prises qu'il venoit de faire. Malgré les représentations les plus fortes de l'ambassadeur du roi et les assurances les plus solemnelles des ministres François, on permit au capitaine de ce corsaire de demeurer à l'Orient tout le tems dont il avoit besoin pour radouber son vaisseau, de se pourvoir de cinquante barriques de poudre à canon, et de recevoir sur son bord tous les matelots François qui vouloient bien s'engager avec lui. Muni de ces renforts, le Reprisal sortit pour la troisième fois des ports de ses nouveaux alliés, et forma bientôt une petite escadre de pirates, par la jonction concertée du Lexington et du Dolphin, deux armateurs, dont le premier avoit déjà conduit plus d'une prise à la rivière de Bordeaux, et dont le second, armé à Nantes, et monté par un équipage entièrement François, n'avoit rien d'Américain que le nom et son commandant.—Ces trois vaisseaux, qui jouissoient si publiquement de la protection de la cour de Versailles, s'emparèrent en très peu de tems de quinze navires Anglois, dont la plûpart furent ramenés et secrettement vendus dans les ports de France.—De pareils faits, qu'il seroit aisé de multiplier, tiennent lieu de raisonnemens et de reproches, et l'on peut se dispenser de réclamer dans cette occasion la foi des traités ; et il n'est point nécessaire de démontrer qu'une puissance alliée, ou même neutre, ne peut jamais permettre la guerre sans violer la paix.—Les principes du droit des gens refuseroient sans doute à l'ambassadeur de la couronne la plus respectable ce privilège d'armer des corsaires, que la cour de Versailles accordoit sourdement aux agens des rebelles dans le sein de la France. Dans ses îles la tranquillité publique fut violée d'une manière encore plus audacieuse, et malgré le changement du gouverneur, les ports de la Martinique servoient toujours d'asyle aux corsaires qui couroient les mers sous un pavillon Américain, mais avec un équipage François. Le Sieur Bingham, agent des rebelles, qui jouissoit de la faveur et de la confiance des deux gouverneurs successifs de la Martinique, dirigeoit l'armement des corsaires, et la vente publique de leurs prises. Deux vaisseaux marchands, le Lancashire Hero, et l'Irish Gimblet, qui devinrent la proie du Revenge, assurent que sur cent vingt-cinq hommes d'équipage il n'y avoit que deux Américains, et que le propriétaire, qui l'étoit en même tems de onze autres corsaires, se reconnoissoit pour habitant de la Martinique, où il étoit respecté comme le favori et l'agent secret du gouverneur lui-même.

en

Au milieu de tous ces actes d'hostilité, qu'il est impossible de qualifier d'un autre nom, la cour de Versailles continuoit toujours de parler le langage de la paix et de l'amitié, et ses ministres épuisèrent toutes les ressources de l'artifice et de la dissimulation pour assoupir les justes plaintes de la Grande Bretagne, pour tromper ses soupçons et pour pour arrêter les effets de son ressentiment. Depuis la première époque des troubles de l'Amérique jusqu'au moment de la déclaration de guerre par le marquis de Noailles, les ministres du roi très Chrétien ne cessoient de renouveller les protestations les plus fortes et les plus expresses de leurs dispositions pacifiques; et si la conduite ordinaire de la cour de Versailles étoit propre à inspirer une juste défiance, le cœur de sa majesté lui fournissoit des motifs puissans pour croire que la France avoit enfin adopté un système de modération et de paix, qui perpétueroit le bonheur solide et réciproque des deux nations. Les ministres de la cour de Versailles tachèrent d'excuser l'arrivée et le séjour des agens des rebelles, par l'assurance la plus forte qu'ils ne trouveroient en France qu'un simple asyle sans distinction et sans encouragement.

La liberté du commerce et l'avidité du gain servirent quelquefois de prétexte pour couvrir les entreprises illégitimes des sujets François, et dans le moment qu'on alléguoit vainement l'impuissance des loix, pour prévenir des abus que des états voisins savoient si bien réprimer, on condamna, avec toutes les apparences de la sincérité, le transport des armes et des munitions de guerre, qui se permettoit impunément, pour le service des rebelles. Aux premières représentations de l'ambassadeur du roi, au sujet des corsaires qui s'armoient sous le pavillon de l'Amérique, mais dans les ports de France, les ministres de sa majesté très Chrétienne répondirent par des expressions de surprise et d'indignation, et par la déclaration positive, qu'on ne souffriroit jamais des entreprises aussi contraires à la foi des traités et à la tranquillité publique. La suite des événemens, dont on a déjà vu un petit nombre, montra bientôt l'inconstance ou plutôt la fausseté de la cour de Versailles; et l'ambassadeur du roi fut chargé de mettre devant les yeux des ministres François les conséquences sérieuses mais inévitables de leur politique. Il remplit sa commission avec tous les égards qui sont dûs à une puissance respectable, dont on desireroit de conserver l'amitié, mais avec la fermeté digne d'un souverain, et d'une nation, peu accoutumés à faire ou à supporter des injustices. La cour de Versailles fut sommée de s'expliquer, sans délai et sans détour, sur sa conduite et sur ses intentions, et le roi lui proposa l'alternative de la paix ou de la guerre.—Elle choisit la paix, mais ce ne fut que pour blesser ses ennemis d'une manière sûre et secrette, sans avoir rien à craindre de leur justice. Elle condamna sévèrement ces secours et ces armemens, que les principes du droit public ne lui permettoient pas de justifier. Elle déclara à l'ambassadeur du roi, qu'elle étoit résolue à faire sortir sur le champ les corsaires Américains de tous les ports de France, pour n'y jamais rentrer, et qu'on prendroit désormais les précautions les plus rigoureuses pour arrêter la vente des prises qu'ils auroient faites sur les sujets de la Grande Bretagne. Les ordres qui furent donnés pour cet effet étonnèrent les partisans des rebelles, et semblèrent arrêter le progrès du mal: mais les sujets de plainte renaissoient tous les jours, et la manière manière dont ces ordres furent d'abord éludés, violés ensuite, et enfin tout-à-fait oubliés par les négocians, les corsaires, et même par les officiers royaux, n'étoit point excusée par les protestations d'amitié dont la cour de Versailles accompagna ces infractions de la paix, jusqu'à ce moment qu'elle annonça, par son ambassadeur à Londres, le traité d'alliance qu'elle venoit de signer avec les agens des colonies révoltées de l'Amérique.

Si un ennemi étranger, reconnu parmi les puissances de l'Europe, avoit fait la conquête des états du roi dans l'Amérique, et que la France eût confirmé, par un traité solemnel, un acte de violence qui dépouilloit, au milieu d'une paix profonde, le voisin respectable dont elle se disoit l'amie et l'alliée, l'Europe entière se seroit soulevée contre l'injustice d'un procédé qui violoit sans pudeur tout ce qu'il y a de plus saint parmi les hommes. La première découverte, la possession non interrompue de deux cens ans et le consentement de toutes les nations, auroient suffi pour constater les droits de la Grande Bretagne aux terres de l'Amérique Septentrionale, et sa souveraineté sur le peuple qui y avoit formé des établissemens avec la permission et sous le gouvernement des prédécesseurs du roi. Si ce peuple même a osé secouer le joug de l'autorité ou plutôt des loix, s'il a usurpé les provinces et les prérogatives de son souverain, et s'il a recherché l'alliance des étrangers pour appuyer son indépendance prétendue ; ces étrangers ne peuvent accepter son alliance, ratifier ses usurpations, et reconnoître son indépendance, sans supposer supposer que la révolte a des droits plus étendus que ceux de la guerre, et sans accorder aux sujets rebelles un titre légitime aux conquêtes qu'ils n'avoient pu faire qu'au mépris de la justice et des loix. Les ennemis secrets de la paix, de la Grande Bretagne et peut-être de la France même, eurent cependant l'addresse criminelle de persuader à sa majesté très Chrétienne qu'elle pouvoit, sans violer la foi des traités, déclarer publiquement qu'elle recevoit au nombre de ses alliés les sujets révoltés d'un roi, son voisin et son allié. Les professions d'amitié, dont on accompagna cette déclaration que le marquis de Noailles fut chargé de faire à la cour de Londres, ne servoient qu'à aggraver l'injure par l'insulte, et il étoit réservé pour la France de se vanter de ses dispositions pacifiques dans l'instant même que son ambition lui inspira d'exécuter et d'avouer un acte de perfidie sans exemple dans l'histoire des nations. " Cependant, (tel est le langage que la cour de Versailles ose encore se permettre,) Cependant ce seroit s'abuser de croire que c'est la reconnoissance que le roi a fait de l'indépendance des treize états unis de l'Amérique Septentrionale qui a irrité le roi d'Angleterre: ce prince n'ignore pas sans doute tous les exemples de ce genre que fournissent les annales Britanniques et même son propre règne."— Jamais ces exemples prétendus n'ont existé.—Jamais le roi n'a reconnu l'indépendance d'un peuple qui avoit secoué le joug de son prince légitime; et il est triste, sans doute, que les ministres de sa majesté très Chrétienne aient surpris la religion de leur leur souverain pour couvrir d'un nom aussi respectable des assertions sans fondement et sans vraisemblance, qui sont démenties par le souvenir de l'Europe entière.

Au commencement des disputes qui s'élevoient entre la Grande Bretagne et ses colonies, la cour de Versailles déclara qu'elle ne prétendoit point être juge de la querelle; et son ignorance des principes de la constitution Britannique, aussi bien que des privilèges et des obligations des colonies, auroit dû l'engager à persister toujours dans une déclaration aussi sage et modeste. Elle se seroit épargné la honte de transcrire les manifestes du Congrès Américain, et de prononcer aujourd'hui, " Que les procédés de la cour de Londres forcèrent ses anciennes colonies de recourir à la voie des armes pour maintenir leurs droits, leurs privilèges et leur liberté." Ces vains prétextes ont déjà été réfutés de la manière la plus convaincante, et les droits de la Grande Bretagne sur ce peuple révolté, ses bienfaits et sa longue patience, ont été déjà prouvés par la raison et par les faits. Il suffit ici de remarquer, que la France ne peut se prévaloir de l'injustice qu'elle reproche à la cour de Londres sans introduire dans la jurisprudence de l'Europe des maximes aussi nouvelles qu'elles seroient fausses et dangereuses; sans supposer que les disputes qui s'élèvent au sein d'un état indépendant et souverain sont soumises à la juridiction d'un prince étranger, et que ce prince peut évoquer à son tribunal ses alliés et leurs sujets révoltés, pour justifier fier la conduite du peuple qui s'est affranchi des devoirs de l'obéïssance légitime. Les ministres du roi très Chrétienne s'appercevront peut-être un jour que l'ambition les a fait oublier les intérêts et les droits de tous les souverains. L'approbation que la cour de Versailles vient de donner à la révolte des colonies Angloises ne lui permettroit pas de blâmer le soulèvement de ses propres sujets dans le nouveau monde ou de ceux de l'Espagne, qui auroient des motifs bien plus puissans pour suivre le même exemple, s'ils n'en étoient point détournés par la vue des calamités dans lesquelles ces malheureuses colonies se sont précipitées.

Mais la France elle-même paroît sentir la foiblesse, le danger et l'indécence de ces prétensions, et se relâchant dans la déclaration du marquis de Noailles, aussi bien que dans le dernier manifeste, sur le droit de l'indépendance, elle se contente de soutenir que ces colonies révoltées jouissoient dans le fait de cette indépendance qu'elles s'étoient donnée; que l'Angleterre même l'avoit en quelque sorte reconnue elle-même en laissant subsister des actes qui tiennent à la souveraineté, et qu'ainsi la France, sans violer la paix, pouvoit conclure un traité d'amitié et de commerce avec les états unis de l'Amérique Septentrionale.—Voici de quelle manière la Grande Bretagne avoit reconnu cette indépendance également imaginaire dans le droit et dans le fait. Deux ans ne s'étoient pas encore passés depuis le jour que les rebelles avoient déclaré leur résolution criminelle de secouer le joug de la mère-patrie, et ce terme avoit été rempli par les événemens d'une guerre sanglante et opiniâtre. Les succès avoient été balancés, mais l'armée du roi, qui occupoit les plus importantes des villes maritimes, continuoit toujours de menacer les provinces intérieures; le pavillon Anglois régnoit sur toutes les mers de l'Amérique; et le rétablissement de sa dépendance légitime étoit posé comme la condition indispensable de la paix que la Grande Bretagne offroit à des sujets révoltés, dont elle respectoit les droits, les intérêts, et même les préjugés. La cour de Versailles qui annonce avec tant " de franchise et de simplicité" le traité signé avec ces prétendus états de l'Amérique, qu'elle trouvoit dans une situation indépendante, avoit seule contribué par ses secours clandestins à nourrir le feu de la révolte, et ce fut la crainte de la paix qui engagea la France à se servir du bruit de cette alliance comme du moyen le plus efficace pour enflammer les esprits des peuples qui commençoient déjà à ouvrir les yeux sur les suites malheureuses de la révolte, la tyrannie de leurs nouveaux chefs, et les dispositions paternelles de leur souverain légitime.

de

Dans ces circonstances il est impossible de nier sans insulter trop grossièrement à la raison et à la vérité, que la déclaration du marquis de Noailles du 13 Mars de l'année dernière ne dût être reçue comme une véritable déclaration de guerre de la part du roi très Chrétien ; et les assurances " qu'il avoit pris des mesures éventuelles avec les états unis de l'Amérique, pour soutenir la liberté d'un commerce," qui avoit tant de fois excité les plaintes légitimes légitimes de la Grande Bretagne, autorisoient le roi à considérer dès ce moment la France au nombre de ses ennemis. La cour de Versailles ne peut pas s'empêcher de reconnoître que le roi d'Angleterre après avoir rappellé " son ambassadeur, dénonça à son parlement la démarche de sa majesté comme un acte d'hostilité, comme une aggression formelle et préméditée." Telle fut, il est vrai, la déclaration que l'honneur et la justice exigèrent du roi, et qu'il communiqua sans délai à tous ses ministres dans les différentes cours de l'Europe, pour justifier d'avance les effets d'un ressentiment légitime. Dès lors il est assez inutile de rechercher les ordres qui furent envoyés aux Indes Orientales, de marquer le jour précis auquel les flottes d'Angleterre ou de France sortirent de leurs ports respectifs, ou d'examiner les circonstances du combat avec la Belle Poule, et de la prise des deux frégates qui furent effectivement enlevées à la vue même des côtes de la France. Dès lors le reproche qu'on se permet de faire au roi d'avoir si long tems suspendu la déclaration formelle de la guerre, s'évanouit de lui-même. Ces déclarations ne sont que des moyens dont les nations sont réciproquement convenues pour éviter la trahison et la surprise; mais les cérémonies qui annoncent ce changement terrible de la paix à la guerre, les hérauts, les proclamations, les manifestes, ne sont jamais nécessaires, et ne sont pas toujours les mêmes. La déclaration du marquis de Noailles fut le signal de l'infraction publique de la paix: le roi proclama sur le champ à toutes les nations qu'il acceptoit la guerre que la France

France lui offroit; les démarches ultérieures de sa majesté étoient du ressort de sa prudence plutôt que de sa justice, et l'Europe peut juger maintenant si la cour de Londres manquoit de " moyens pour justifier une déclaration de guerre, et si elle n'osoit pas acouser publiquement la France d'être l'aggresseur."

Puisque l'alliance de la France avec les colonies révoltées de l'Amérique avoit été une infraction manifeste de la paix et le motif légitime de la guerre, la cour de Versailles devoit naturellement s'attendre qu'à la première proposition d'un accommodement entre les deux couronnes, le Roi exigeroit de sa part qu'on lui accordât une juste satisfaction sur un objet aussi important, et que la France renonçât à ces liaisons qui avoient forcé sa majesté à prendre les armes. La surprise affectée que les ministres du roi très Chrétien font paroître aujourd'hui de la fermeté de la cour de Londres est assez conforme à l'orgueil qui leur dicta des conditions de paix que les plus grands succès auroient à peine justifiées; et la proposition qu'ils hasardèrent pour engager le roi à retirer ses troupes de l'Amérique, et à reconnoître l'indépendance de ses sujets révoltés, ne pouvoit qu'exciter l'étonnement et l'indignation de sa majesté. Le peu d'ouverture que la cour de Versailles trouva à une espérance aussi vaine, l'obligea bientôt à se replier d'une autre manière; elle a proposé, par l'entremise de la cour de Madrid, un projet d'accommodement moins offensant peut-être dans la forme, mais aussi peu admissible par le fonds. Le roi Catholique, avec avec le consentement de la France, communiqua aux ministres du roi la proposition d'une trève à longues années, ou bien d'une suspension générale et indéfinie de toutes hostilités, pendant laquelle les colonies révoltées, les prétendus états unis de l'Amérique Septentrionale, seroient traités comme indépendans de fait. La réflexion la plus simple suffit pour découvrir l'artifice de ce projet insidieux, et pour justifier aux yeux de l'Europe le refus du roi. Entre les souverains qui se reconnoissent mais qui se combattent, les trèves à longues années, les suspensions d'hostilités sont les moyens doux et salutaires pour applanir les difficultés qui s'opposent à l'entière conclusion d'une paix qu'on renvoye sans disgrace et sans danger à un moment plus favorable. Mais dans la querelle domestique de la Grande Bretagne et ses colonies, la souveraineté même, l'indépendance de droit ou de fait, est l'objet de la dispute; et la dignité du roi ne lui permettoit point d'accepter ses propositions qui accordoient dès l'entrée de la négociation tout ce qui pouvoit contenter l'ambition des Américains rebelles, pendant qu'elles exigèrent de sa majesté que sans aucune stipulation en sa faveur, elle se désistât pendant un terme long ou indéfini des prétentions les plus légitimes. La cour de Versailles daignoit, il est vrai, consentir que celle de Londres traitât avec le Congrès soit directement, soit par l'entremise du roi d'Espagne. Sa majesté assurément ne s'abaissera point jusqu'à se plaindre de cet orgueil, qui semble lui accorder comme une grace la permission de traiter directement avec ses sujets rebelles.

rebelles. Mais si les Américains eux-mêmes ne sont pas aveuglés par la passion et la prévention, ils verront clairement dans le procédé de la France que leurs nouveaux alliés deviendroient bientôt leurs tyrans; et que cette indépendance prétendue, achetée par tant de malheurs et tant de sang, seroit soumise à la volonté despotique d'une cour étrangère.

Si la France pouvoit vérifier cet empressement qu'elle attribue à la cour de Londres à rechercher la médiation de l'Espagne, un pareil empressement serviroit à prouver la juste confiance du roi dans la bonté de sa cause, et son estime pour une nation généreuse qui a toujours méprisé la fraude et la perfidie. Mais la cour de Londres est forcée à convenir que la médiation lui fut offerte par les ministres du roi Catholique, et qu'elle n'a d'autre mérite que celui d'avoir fait paroître dans toutes les occasions une inclination vive et sincère de délivrer ses sujets et mêmes ses ennemis du fléau de la guerre. La conduite de la cour de Madrid pendant cette négociation fit bientôt connoître au roi qu'un médiateur qui oublioit ses intérêts les plus chers pour se livrer à l'ambition et au ressentiment d'une puissance étrangère, seroit incapable de proposer un accommodement sûr ou honorable. L'expérience confirma ses soupçons: le projet injuste et inadmissible qu'on vient d'exposer fut le seul fruit de la médiation. Et à l'instant même que les ministres du roi Catholique offroient, avec les professions les plus désintéressées, sa capitale, ses bons offices, sa garantie pour faciliter la conclusion du traité, ils laissè-rent entrevoir dans le fond de l'obscurité, de nouveaux sujets de discussion qui regardoient particulièrement l'Espagne, mais sur lesquels ils refusèrent toujours de s'expliquer. Le refus de sa majesté d'accéder à l'ultimatum de la cour de Madrid fut accompagné de tous les ménagemens et de tous les égards convenables; et à moins que cette cour ne s'arrogeât le droit de dicter les conditions de paix à un voisin indépendant et respectable, il ne se passa rien dans cette conjoncture qui dût altérer l'harmonie des deux couronnes. Mais les démarches offensives de l'Espagne, qu'elle n'a jamais pu revêtir des plus foibles apparences de l'équité, montrèrent bientôt que sa résolution étoit déjà prise, et que cette résolution lui avoit été inspirée par le ministère François, qui n'avoit retardé la déclaration de la cour de Madrid que dans l'espérance de porter sous le masque de l'amitié un coup mortel à l'honneur et aux intérêts de la Grande Bretagne.

Tels sont les ennemis injustes et ambitieux qui ont méprisé la foi des traités pour violer la tranquillité publique, et contre lesquels le roi défend maintenant les droits de sa couronne et de son peuple. L'événement est encore dans la main du Tout-puissant; mais sa majesté, qui se confie avec une assurance ferme mais humble dans la protection Divine, se persuade que les vœux de l'Europe appuyeront la justice de sa cause, et applaudiront au succès de ses armes, qui n'ont point d'autre objet que de rétablir le repos des nations sur une base solide et inébranlable.

A DIS-

Lausanne, 1764.

A DISSERTATION ON THE ALLEGORICAL BEINGS FOUND ON THE REVERSES OF MEDALS.

In consequence of reading Addison's treatise, the following remarks have occurred to me on the allegorical beings which we find on the reverses of medals. How limited is the human mind! its boldest inventions are mere copies.

1. All those beings are represented under the human figure. Our eyes, accustomed to behold the exercise of reason, only under this shape, required such a sacrifice. Yet, by our inability of separating from the idea of the human figure the circumstances which commonly accompany it, our fancy requires, also, that the sex should be determined. The circumstance of sex, however, implies gross images, which ill correspond with the purity of the virtues, or the spirituality of metaphysical beings. After having made those two sacrifices to the mind and the eyes, a third was still required by the ear. The distinction of sex was not marked by characteristic attributes appropriated to the male and female. This method might have furnished some tolerable allegories. But the genders of their names were injudiciously chosen as the only foundation of distinction, since in all languages those genders have been determined by the caprice and ignorance of the first persons who spoke them. In Greek and Latin, most of those names are feminine. The beings whom they express are therefore, for the most part, represented by female figures. I say for the most part, for they are sometimes unfortunately masculine: and at other times we have two synonymous words of different genders; and the same being assumes the male or female form, according to the word employed as its name. I shall mention only the example of Gloria and Honos. In consequence of so faulty an arrangement, the character of the being is often at variance with that of its sex. True virtue is consistent; and we cannot conceive the truth, justice, or humanity of a woman exercised at the expense of chastity and decency. Yet when the attributes of an allegorical being require that it should be represented naked, we see Valour, Justice, and Hope exhibited, in a manner in which a modest woman would blush to appear. It is useless to tell me, these are not women, but female figures. My understanding perceives the difference; but the imitative arts must speak to the fancy.

2. Whatever symbols we invent, human qualities alone can be represented under human figures. Piety is only a pious woman; and Courage, a courageous one, &c. Much is done when the soul is purged of all passions but one, which occupies it entirely, and shews itself manifestly in air, action, demeanour, and even dress. This abstraction has been realized, though rarely; it may be conceived by the fancy, and may therefore be represented. But those symbols are always most srik-

ing

ing which quit the region of chimeras, and give us ideas that are precise and conformable to the nature of things. One of the most interesting is that of Piety under the form of a Roman vestal. The senate carried this principle too far, when it represented the virtues under the portraits of its princes. Of human qualities, those that are fixed and permanent are marked with more force than those that are uncertain and transient. The latter are expressed alone by the air and attitude; in the representation of the former, one may add to these characteristics, the features, figure, and dress. The symbols of Virtue or Chastity may be far more distinctly characterised than those of Hope or Fear.

The other abstractions which have been represented by human figures, Victory, Eternity, Abundance, &c. are recognised only by some of their perceptible effects, or by some real object whose idea is associated with their own. We should have much difficulty in inventing them, when wanted, if history and fable did not supply a number of arbitrary signs, which receive their meaning merely from convention. In the symbolic representation, the woman is merely an accessory. Eternity is very well represented by a globe and a phœnix: in the thirteenth medal of the first series, a woman sitting holds them in her hand. In the fifteenth medal there is no woman, though the idea is still the same; and if we examine all the other medals, we shall find that women are there merely to make a figure, but never answer the purpose of symbols.

The provinces are of a middle kind; they are never symbols of countries, but are often so of the genius and manners of their inhabitants.

3. Mr. Addison proposes an explanation of the thirty-fifth ode of the first book of Horace, in speaking of a medal which represents Security resting on a pillar.*

> Regumque matres barbarorum, et > Purpurei metuunt tyranni
> Injurioso ne pede proruas
> Stantem columnam. ———

They feared lest Fortune might overturn the pillar of their security. But fear and security are inconsistent. Besides, Horace would not probably have made use of so subtle and far-fetched an allusion without giving warning of it, at least, by some epithet. Why may not these words be applied literally to those statues and pillars which flattery erects to tyrants, and which are commonly the first victims of popular fury at the time of a revolution? I conjecture that the poet might allude to the king of the Parthians, the most powerful monarch of the East. Fortune might justly be dreaded by the murderer of his father, and of his whole family. The Romans had seen proofs of his anxiety. He had given to Augustus several of his nearest relations as hostages, whom that emperor caused to be educated at Rome. The haughty Phrahates intended less to flatter the

* Dialogues upon Medals, Dial. ii. p. 47.

Romans

Romans by this humiliating measure, than to deprive his discontented subjects of men fit to head their revolt.*

Rome, 29th December, 1764.

AN ACCOUNT OF A MS. BY THE ABBÉ G. V. GRAVINA, Del Governo Civile di Roma.

I HAVE been reading a MS. of the Abbé Geo. Vicenzo Gravina, which belongs to Mr. Lumsden, a Scotch gentleman, and a friend of Mr. Byers, through whose means I procured it. The title of it is, Del Governo Civile di Roma; in 4to. pp. 76: and its principal subject, the revolutions of the city after the fall of the empire; a subject which interests me much. This performance is an excellent abridgment, but merely an abridgment; the author not having sounded the depths of his subject, nor ransacked archives. His citations are few; and those only of well-known authors, such as Baronius, Blondus, or Sigonius. It may, however, be worth while to extract, without order or method, the particulars which I have learned from this work.

After the foundation of Constantinople, New Rome yielded in all matters of ceremony to her elder sister. The consul of the West preceded the consul of the East.—Procopius's Secret History. P. 7.

Mr. Gravina believes in the donations of Pepin and Charlemagne. But, according to him, these P. 8.

* Tacit. Annal. ii. 1.

princes gave the duchy of Rome and the exarchate of Ravenna to the popes, as chiefs of the senate and Roman republic during the vacancy of the empire.

P. 13, 14. In the insurrection of the Romans against King Hugh and Marozia, they established their ancient government by two annual consuls and tribunes. Young Alberic was one of the first consuls. Gravina cites Blondus; but Muratori, who places this event in the year 932 instead of 928, does not speak of consuls. I am inclined however to believe Gravina. The consuls were certainly re-established about that time.

P. 21. Mr. Gravina thinks that Otho III. abolished the consulship in 995, after the death of Crescentius. The observation seems probable; yet he does not give his authority; and it is proved that the office of consul subsisted immediately afterwards, as well as in the following age.

P. 43, 44. Innocent III. received the homage of the prefect of Rome, and granted to him the investiture of his office. Sigon. de Regn. Ital.—At the request of the people, he created fifty senators to govern the city; but as they exceedingly abused their power, he reduced them to one only, appointed to distribute justice. Cantilius de Romana Historia à Carolo Magno.

P. 55, 56. Under the pontificate of Martin IV. the Orsini, to avenge the affront which they had received from the Annibaldesi (who had driven them from Viterbo after the death of their uncle Nicholas III.), entered with an armed force into Rome, which they they ravaged with fire and sword. At that time were burnt the ancient edifices whose ruins are still visible on the declivity of the Capitoline hill.

A DISSERTATION ON THE SUBJECT OF L'HOMME AU MASQUE DE FER.

The mysterious history of the famous French prisoner, known by the appellation of l'Homme au Masque de Fer, is related by M. Voltaire, in the Siècle de Louis XIV., and in the Questions sur l'Encyclopédie. That writer, the most sceptical and lively of his age, never attempts either to contest the truth, or to reveal the secret of that wonderful affair. Je ne connois point de fait ni plus extraordinaire ni mieux constaté is the just conclusion of his first account. In his subsequent additions, he refutes with force and contempt the idle suppositions that this unknown prisoner was the Duc de Beaufort, the Count de Vermandois, or the Duke of Monmouth. At length, breaking off abruptly, he throws out a dark intimation, qu'il en sait peut-être plus que le Père Grifet, et qu'il n'en dira pas davantage.

If we are disposed to exercise our curiosity and conjectures upon this historical anecdote, we must steadily remember, that no hypothesis can deserve the least credit, unless it corresponds with and explains the following circumstances:

1. The prisoner who passed his melancholy life in in the isles de St. Marguerite and the Bastile was called Marchiali. As the name was most assuredly fictitious, this circumstance seems, and indeed is, of small importance. However, in case an Italian was either the author of his birth, or the guardian of his infancy, a name drawn from that language would most naturally present itself.

2. Marchiali was buried secretly and by night, in the parish church of St. Paul's, on the third day of March in the year 1703, as is proved by the journal of the Père Grifet, who was entrusted with the very delicate employment of confessor to the Bastile. A few days before his death, the unknown prisoner told his physician that he believed himself about sixty years of age. If he reckoned with precision, he was born in the spring of the year 1643, about the time of the death of Louis the Thirteenth. But the dreary hours of a prison move slowly, and the infirmities of age are hastened by grief and solitude. Marchiali could speak only from conjecture; nor is it unlikely that he might be somewhat younger than he supposed himself.

3. He was conducted to the Isles de St. Marguerite on the coast of Provence, some months after the death of Cardinal Mazarin; that is to say, about the end of the year 1661, or the beginning of 1662. This is the first among the few events of his life. M. de Voltaire mentions, in one place, a previous confinement at Pignerol; but without being perfectly clear, or even consistent, on that head.

4. Mar-

4. Marchiali, whoever he was, had never acted any distinguished part on the public theatre of the world. The sudden absence of such a person, in any part of Europe, would infallibly have occasioned much wonder and inquiry, some traces of which must have reached our knowledge. But in this instance, using the amplest latitude of time, we cannot even discover any one important death, that leaves the minutest opening for our most licentious suspicions.

5. An illustrious birth was therefore the only advantage by which the prisoner could be distinguished; and his birth must indeed have been illustrious, since, when Monsieur de Louvois made him a visit, he spoke to him standing, and avec une considération qui tenoit du respect. We must ascend very high ere we can attain a rank which that proud and powerful minister of the French monarchy could think it his duty to respect.

6. The most extraordinary precautions were employed, not only to secure, but to conceal, this mysterious captive; and his guards were ordered to kill him, if he made the least attempt to discover himself. That order, as well as the silver plate which he threw out of the prison window, after writing something upon it, and which fell into the hands of an illiterate fisherman, sufficiently prove that he was acquainted with his own name and condition. The mask, which he never was permitted to lay aside, shews the apprehension of the discovery of some very striking resemblance.

7. Pri-

7. Prisoners of such alarming importance are seldom suffered to live. Of all precautions, the dagger or the bowl are undoubtedly the surest. Nothing but the most powerful motives, or, indeed, the tenderest ties, could have stopped the monarch's hand, and induced him rather to risk a discovery, than to spill the blood of this unfortunate man. He was lodged in the best apartment of the Bastille, his table was served in the most delicate manner, he was allowed to play on the guitar, and supplied with the finest laces and linen, of which he was passionately fond. Every kind attention was studiously practised, that could in any wise alleviate the irksomeness of his perpetual imprisonment.

8. When Monsieur de Chamillard, in the year 1721, was on his death-bed, his son-in-law, the Marechal de la Feuillade, begged on his knees, that he would disclose to him that mysterious transaction. The dying minister refused to gratify this unseasonable curiosity. "It was the secret of the state, (he said,) and he had taken an oath never to divulge it." The prisoner had then been dead eighteen years, and Louis the Fourteenth almost six. It must have been a secret of no common magnitude that could still affect the peace and welfare of future generations.

Before we proceed to a probable solution of these strange circumstances, let us try to connect them with some facts of a more public and general nature.

1. The doubtful birth of Louis XIV. often occurs, curs, in conversation, as the subject of historical scepticism. The first grounds of the suspicion are obvious. He was born after a sterile union of twenty-three years between Louis the Thirteenth and Anne of Austria. But as such an event, however unfrequent, is neither destitute of possibility, nor even of example, the scandalous rumour would long since have died away in oblivion, had it not derived additional strength from the character and situation of the royal pair.

2. Though Louis XIII. wanted not either parts or courage, his character was degraded by a coldness and debility, both of mind and body, which had little affinity with his heroic father. Had his indifference towards the sex been confined to the queen, it might have been considered as the mere effect of personal dislike; but his chaste amours with his female favourites betrayed to the laughing court, that the king was less than a man.

3. Without reviving all the obsolete scandal of the fronde, we may respectfully insinuate that Anne of Austria's reputation of chastity was never so firmly established as that of her husband. To the coquetry of France, the queen united the warm passions of a Spaniard. Her friends acknowledge that she was gay, indiscreet, vain of her charms, and strongly addicted at least to romantic gallantry. It is well known that she permitted some distinguished favourites to entertain her with soft tales of her beauty, and their love; and thus removed the distant ceremony, which is perhaps the surest defence of royal virtue. Anne of of Austria passed twenty-eight years with a husband alike incapable of gratifying her tender or her sensual inclinations. At the age of forty-three, she was left an independent widow, mistress of herself, and of the kingdom.

4. The civil wars which raged during the minority of Louis XIV. arose from the blind and unaccountable attachment of the queen to Cardinal Mazarin, whom she obstinately supported against the universal clamour of the French nation. The Austrian pride, perhaps, and the useful merit of the minister, might determine the queen to brave an insolent opposition; but a connection, formed by policy, might very easily terminate in love. The necessity of business would engage that princess in many a secret and midnight conference with an Italian of an agreeable person, vigorous constitution, loose morals, and artful address. The amazing anecdote hinted at in the honest memoirs of La Porte, sufficiently proves that Mazarin was capable of employing every expedient to insinuate himself into every part of the royal family.

5. If Anne of Austria yielded to such opportunities, and to so artful a lover; if she became a mother after her husband's death, her weakness, and the consequences of it, would have been carefully screened from the eye of curious malignity. When Louis XIV. succeeded to the possession of the kingdom, and of the fatal secret, he was deeply interested in the guard of his own, and of his mother's honour. Had her frailty been revealed to the world, the living proof would have awakened and confirmed all the latent suspicions, diffused a spirit of distrust and division among the people, and shaken the hereditary claim of the monarch. If the strong grasp of Louis XIV. retained the French sceptre, the doubt and the danger were entailed on future ages. In some feeble, or infant reign, an ambitious Condé might embrace the fair pretence to assert the right to his genuine branch, and to exclude from the succession the spurious posterity of Louis XIII.

and

In a word, the child of Anne of Austria and of Cardinal Mazarin would have been at once the brother and the most dangerous enemy of his sovereign. The humanity of Louis XIV. might have declined a brother's murder; but pride, policy, and even patriotism, must have compelled that prince to hide his face and his existence with an iron mask and the walls of the Bastille.

It is scarcely necessary to add, that I suppose the unfortunate Marchiali to have been that child. If the several facts which I have drawn together blend themselves, without constraint, into a consistent and natural system, it is surely no weak argument in favour of the truth, or at least of the probability of my opinion.

May 27th, 1774.

ME-

Lausanne, 10 Décembre, 1756.

MÉMOIRES POSTHUMES DE M. DE CHESEAUX.

Je n'ai lu qu'une très petite partie de cet ouvrage. Les calculs dont il est rempli, en interdisent l'entrée à quiconque n'est pas mathématicien achevé. Cependant la partie chronologique que j'ai lu m'a fait bien du plaisir. Un grand astronome est en état d'y répandre bien de la lumière, mais il n'y a guères que M. Newton et M. de Cheseaux qui l'ayent tenté.

Il fait une remarque assez curieuse sur le verset 12. ch. vii. de Daniel, où il est dit que la domination fut enlevée aux autres bêtes après que leur vie eut été prolongée à un tems et un tems. Il le paraphrase de cette manière. La domination (app. des Babyloniens) des Perses et des Grecs fut aussi détruite après qu'elle eut durée 720 ans, entendant par ces deux tems, deux années prophétiques de 360 ans chacune; et en effet ces trois empires durèrent 720 ans, depuis le commencement de Nabonassar en 747 A. C. jusqu'au tems qu'Octavien reçut le nom d'Auguste du sénat Romain, et qu'il devint le premier empereur en 27 A. C. Quoiqu'on pourroit faire quelques objections contre ce sentiment, cependant on doit au moins avouer que si non vero e ben trovato. On pourroit dire par exemple que si Daniel avoit voulu parler de l'empire Babylonien il n'auroit dû commencer qu'à Nabuchodonosor, ou tout au plus à Nabopolassar son père, ce qui ne fait que 598 ans, les rois précédens de Babylone ne faisant faisant pas plus à l'empire Babylonien que les rois de Macédoine depuis Caranus jusqu'à Alexandre ne faisoient à l'empire Macédonien.* Et si pour obvier à cet inconvénient on dit que la première domination, dont parle Daniel, n'étoit point celle des Babyloniens, mais celle des Assyriens, ce sera bien pis; le sentiment d'Hérodote, le plus modéré sur la durée de leur empire, plaçant son commencement dans un tems éloigné de 1240 ans de celui d'Auguste. Voy. Herodot. lib. i. p. 66. Edit. Henr. Steph. Usser. ad A. M. 2737.

Il croit aussi avoir fait une découverte sur la vision du huitième chapitre: il prétend que les 2300 soirs et matins, dont il est parlé au v. 14, signifient les sacrifices du soir et du matin du temple: 2300 de ces sacrifices font 1150 jours; mais il croit que ces 1150 jours de sacrifices se rapportoient seulement aux trois grandes fêtes des Juifs; ainsi 1150 faisoient 383 ans et une fête de l'année

* Les princes de Perse depuis Achæmenes jusqu'à Cyrus le Persan, ou les rois et les consuls depuis Romulus jusqu'à Auguste à celui de Rome. Il ne s'agit point ici de leur existence comme petit état, mais comme monarchie assez puissante pour l'emporter de beaucoup sur toutes les autres, et pour mériter les noms des quatre grands empires. Pour ce qui regarde la foiblesse du royaume de Babylone jusqu'à Nabopolassar, voici ce qu'en dit le Père Pétau: "Quod regnum (Babylonicum, scilicet) victis tenue et Assyriis obnoxium ab Nabopolassaro ejusque filio Nabuchodonosoro amplificatum est, ut et Medos ipsos et Assyrios sibi subjiceret." Petavii Ration. Temp. p. ii. 3. c. 3. p. 80; sans compter qu'il seroit pour le moins aussi naturel de placer la fin de l'empire de Macédoine à la destruction du royaume de Macédoine qu'à celle du royaume d'Egypte.

suivante. Il établit ensuite que le dernier sacrifice avant la persécution d'Antiochus fut celui de Pâques 168 ans avant notre Seigneur. De la fête de Pâques d'168 inclusivement jusqu'à celle des Tabernacles de 552 exclusivement, se trouvent justement 383 ans plus une fête. Il s'agit donc de prouver que Daniel eut cette vision dans le tems marqué. Il nous dit lui-même qu'il l'eut dans la troisième année du règne du roi Balsatsar. On suppose avec Prideaux que ce Balsatsar est le Nabonadius de Ptolémée. Nabonadius commença à régner 555 ans avant notre Seigneur. La question est, dans quel tems de l'année. Si c'étoit dans l'automne, l'époque que nous cherchons tombe dans la troisième année du règne de Balsatsar, et le système de M. de Cheseaux est bien lié ; mais s'il commença plutôt, cette même époque se trouve dans son quatrième an. M. de Cheseaux allègue quelques argumens en faveur du premier sentiment.

Mais une seule observation suffit pour les détruire, c'est qu'il ne faut point aller chercher en Ptolémée, la durée précise du règne de chaque roi. M. de Cheseaux en convient lui-même. Ainsi quand même on auroit prouvé que Cyrus prit Babylone en automme on n'auroit point prouvé, que Nabonadius monta sur le trône dans la même saison, et quand vous auriez fait voir qu'Evil-Mérodach monta sur le trône au commencement de l'année vous n'auriez encore point fixé le commencement quant au mois du règne de Nabonadius. Le règne de Tibère dura 22 ans suivant le canon. Or Tibère mourut au mois de Mars de l'an 37. Vous croyez croyez pouvoir inférer de-là que Tibère commença à régner au mois de Mars de l'an 15. Point du tout : il avoit commencé au mois d'Août de l'an 14. Mais Ptolémée ne comptoit que les années révolues qui n'étoient en effet que 22.

M. de Cheseaux apporte encore un argument en faveur de son hypothèse. C'est le règne de Laborosoarchod de neuf mois qu'il prétend que Ptolémée avoit renfermé dans celui de Nabonadius. Evil-Mérodach, dit-il, commença à régner à peu près avec l'année 561 ; ôtez-en 23 ans et neuf mois (comptant apart les neuf mois de Laborosoarchod) vous allez à l'automne de 538, dans laquelle Babylone aura été pris par Cyrus. Mais sans parler de ma première remarque, ce calcul me semble fondé sur une supposition qu'on aura peine à admettre, que Ptolémée avoit renfermé les neuf mois de Laborosoarchod dans le règne de Balsatsar, et qu'alors, pour ôter à Balsatsar ce qu'il lui avoit donné de trop, il avoit ajouté au règne de Cyrus, neuf mois de celui de son prédécesseur. Sans cette supposition on voit clairement que le commencement d'Evil-Mérodach, bien loin d'être avantageux à Mons. de Cheseaux lui seroit très nuisible, puisqu'il s'en ensuivroit que Nabonadius commença à gouverner au mois de Janvier environ de 535. Mais deux raisons me font rejetter cette supposition, et me font croire que le court règne de Laborosoarchod étoit plutôt contenu dans celui de son père Nériglissar. I. Nériglissar fut tué dans une grande bataille que Cyrus, à la tête des Mèdes et des Perses, gagna sur les Assyriens. Ce fait est certain, Prideaux en convient, et on ne sauroit le révoquer en doute sans renverser entièrement l'histoire de Xénophon que M. de Cheseaux reconnoît lui-même. Or quelle apparence y a-t-il qu'une telle battaille se soit donné au plus fort de l'hiver? II. Nous voyons que la coutume ordinaire de Ptolémée, à l'égard des princes qu'il passoit sous silence, étoit de renfermer leurs règnes plutôt dans ceux de leurs prédécesseurs que dans ceux de leurs successeurs. L'usurpation des Mages est contenue dans les huit ans de Cambyses, les règnes de Galba, d'Othon, et de Vitellius dans les 14 de Néron. M. de Cheseaux sent le poids d'une pareille induction, veut s'en servir aussi à son tour, et pour cet effet il prétend que Ptolémée renferma dans le règne d'Artaxerxe Longimanus sept mois que régna son prédécesseur Artapan. Je connois cet Artapan, mais je ne crois pas qu'il régna jamais en Perse. Voici ce que je trouve sur son compte en Ctesias, médecin de Darius, fils de cet Artaxerxes. Ἀρτάπανος δὲ, μέγα παρὰ Ξέρξῃ δυνάμενος μετὰ Σπαμίτρου του Ἡμιάβρεος. καὶ αὐτὸ μέγα δυναμένω βαλεύονται ἀνελεῖν Ξέρξην καὶ ἀναιροῦσι . . . . καὶ βασιλεύει Ἀρταξέρξης. σπουδῇ Ἀρταπάνω καὶ επιβαλεύεται πάλιν ὑπ' αὐτὸ . . . . καὶ Ἀναιρεῖται Ἀρταπάνος. . . . Ctesiæ Fragm. ad Calc. Herod. edit. Hen. Steph. p. 666, 667. Justin dit à peu près les mêmes choses, Hist. l. 3. c. 1. aussi bien que Diodore de Sicile, Bibliot. Histor. lib. xi. c. 69. p. 391, 92. Traduct. Rhod. et les chronologistes modernes les plus habiles ne se sont pas écartés de ce sentiment. Voy. Petav. Ration. Tempor. l. 1. l. 3. c. 6. p. 80. Edit. Lugd.

Lugd. Batav. et Prideaux, Histoire des Juifs à l'an avant N. S. 465.

Ce seroit bien pis si on alloit contester la vérité de l'histoire de Xénophon que M. de Cheseaux suppose toujours démontrée. Je sais que tous les systèmes qu'on a formé pour expliquer les premiers temps de l'empire des Perses auront leurs difficultés. Toutefois après avoir lu la belle dissertation de M. Freret, (juge impartial, puisqu'en condamnant Xénophon d'un côté il le défend d'un autre,) on aura bien de la peine peut-être à se refuser au sien qui paroît plausible, lié, et débarrassé des plus grandes objections. V. Mém. de l'Acad. des Belles Lettres, tom. iv. p. 588, tom. x. p. 778. Un tel système ne laisse plus d'espérance à celui de M. de Cheseaux. La troisième année de Balsatsar (alors Evil-Mérodach) sera avancée de sept ans, tombera sur l'an A. C. 559.

Fait environ le 10 Décembre, 1756.

Lausanne, 10 Novembre, 1757.

REMARQUES SUR QUELQUES PRODIGES.

Le philosophe ouvre les yeux. Il considère la terre et ses habitans. Il croit voir un palais bâti par les mains des fées. Partout il ne voit que des prodiges, les histoires en sont pleines, * * * * * * * * * * * *. Tantôt c'est un dogme obscur prouvé par un miracle puérile; tantôt c'est le ciel qui ordonne le massacre des mécréans, ou qui prône avec éclat les vertus d'un tyran. Le philosophe dépouille ces prodiges de ce qu'ils peuvent avoir d'imposant pour les considérer en eux-mêmes. Aussitôt les fantômes s'évanouissent. Il n'apperçoit plus que de tristes vestiges de la politique des grands, de la crédulité des petits, de l'adulation des historiens, et de l'imposture des prêtres.

L'examen de deux événemens miraculeux tirés d'un historien aussi exact que peu élégant, servira de preuve à ces réflexions. Nous verrons que de pareilles recherches produiront l'incrédulité, mais une incrédulité sage et éclairée, dont plus d'un saint et plus d'un père de l'église auroit souvent eu besoin.

I. Un jour qu'on agitoit en sénat l'affaire de la conjuration de Catilina, Octavius, père d'Auguste, y arriva un peu tard. Nigidius Figulus, ami de Cicéron,(1) et comme lui politique et savant,(2) lui demanda la raison de son délai. Octave allégua sa femme qui venoit dans ce moment d'accoucher. Sur quoi Nigidius, ayant rêvé un moment, lui répondit: Votre femme vient de mettre au jour le maître de la terre.(3) On sait de quelle façon Auguste remplit sa destinée. Voilà un édifice pompeux, faisons-le disparoître. Nous y réussirons précisément à l'aide de ces circonstances de tems et de lieu qui sembloient en assurer la durée.

(1) Cicero. pro Sullâ. c. 14. Epist. ad. Fam. l. iv. Ep. 13.

(2) Serv. ad Virgil. l. x. v. 175.

(3) Suet. l. ii. c. 94.

Lorsqu'Octave vint en sénat le jour de la naissance de son fils, on y traitoit de l'affaire de Catilina. Or Auguste naquit le vingt-trois de Septembre sous le consulat de M. Tullius Cicero et de C. Antonius,

C. Antonius, A. U. C. Varron, 691. C'est une vérité si connue que je pourrois me dispenser de la prouver.(1) Cicéron prononça sa première Catilinaire en sénat, le 8 Novembre de la même année.(2) Il y dit que c'étoit le vingtième jour depuis que le sénat eût armé les mains des consuls par le fameux décret, " Darent operam consules, ne quid Respublica capiat detrementi."(3) On leur conféra donc ce pouvoir le 20 Octobre. Mais nous apprenons de Salluste, écrivain contemporain, que ce décret se passa immédiatement après la première indication que Cicéron fit de la conjuration au sénat. " Rem ad senatum refert jam antea volgi rumoribus exagitatam. Itaque quod plerumque in atroci negotio solet senatus decrevit, &c."(4) Comment dont le sénat pouvoit-il délibérer de la conjuration de Catilina le 23 Septembre de l'an 691, puisqu'il l'ignora lui-même jusqu'au 20 Octobre de la même année?

(1) Suet. l. ii. c. 5.
(2) Middleton's Life of Cicero, vol. i, p. 185. Ciceron. Hist. par Fabric. ad Calcem. edit. Verbugg. p. 16.
(3) Cicero in Catilin. c. 2.
(4) Sallust. Hist. Catil. Bell. c. 29.

II. Q. Lutatius Catulus, (magnæ spes altera Romæ,)(5) que Sulla appelloit le meilleur citoyen de la République, et qui justifia ce titre en repoussant les desseins séditieux de Lepidus,(6) après avoir dédié le temple de Jupiter Capitolin eut deux songes remarquables. Il crut voir dans le premier ce Dieu qui remettoit dans le sein d'un jeune garçon " signum reipublicæ,"* et dans le second, voulant ôter ce même garçon des bras de Jupiter, il reçut ordre de l'y laisser parceque la divinité l'élevoit pour être un jour le protecteur de

(5) Cicero pro Leg. Manil. c. 20.
(6) Sallust. Fragm. Hist. l. i. Flori Breviar. l. iii. c. 23. L. Ampel. Lil. Memorial. p. 322. ad Calc. Flori.

* Je ne le traduis pas, parcequ'on ne sait pas bien ce que c'est. Torrentius et Casaubon sont d'un avis différent là-dessus.

(1) Sueton. l. ii. c. 94.

la république.(1) Le lendemain il vit Auguste alors enfant, et qui ne lui étoit pas connu. Il le reconnut pour être celui qu'il avoit vu en songe. Suivant d'autres relations, il avoit vu une troupe d'enfans qui demandoit à Jupiter un de leur bande pour la gouverner. Il leur indiqua le jeune Auguste. Cette fable, encore plus éblouissante que la première, ne soutiendra pas mieux l'épreuve de l'examen.

Lorsque Suétone nous dit que Catulus eut ces songes " post dedicatum Capitolium," la bonne critique veut qu'on l'entende d'abord après cette consécration, le soir même qui la suivit, ou du moins les premiers jours après, pendant que la mémoire de cet événement étoit encore fraiche. Sans cela rien de plus vague et de moins déterminé que cette désignation du tems. Or Catulus consacra le Capitole A. U. C. Varr. 684,(2)* sept ans avant la naissance d'Auguste. Mais prenons ces paroles dans le sens le plus favorable, et supposons que Suétone n'a songé parler qu'à désigner le Catulus dont il vouloit parler pour être celui qui dédia le Capitole; en ce cas même nous

(2) Cicero in Verrem. l. iv. c. 31. T. Livii Epitom. l. xcviii.

* J'ai rencontré depuis un endroit de Suétone qui pourroit faire croire que le Capitole n'étoit pas encore achevé du tems de la préture de César A. U. C. 691. Le voici: " Primo præturæ die, Q. Catulum de refectione Capitolii ad disquisitionem populi vocavit, rogatione promulgatâ quâ curationem eam in alium transferebat."(3) Que le lecteur pèse l'évidence qui résulte de ce passage avec celle qui nait du témoignage combiné de Cicéron et de Tite Live. Son choix ne sera pas difficile, mais quel qu'il soit il m'intéresse peu. Je fais voir dans un moment que Catulus n'étoit plus quand ce songe a dû avoir lieu.

(3) Sueton. in Jul. Cæsar. c. 15.

ne

ne manquerons pas de moyens pour réfuter cette fable. Catulus étoit déjà fort vieux l'année de la naissance d'Auguste, " extremâ ætate," dit Salluste.(1) Il étoit mort quand Cicéron défendit Sextius: car cet orateur, faisant le tableau d'un vrai citoyen, après avoir parlé de quelques autres, il dit, " Neve eorum aliquem qui vivunt nominem qualis nuper fuit Q. Catulus."(2) Or Cicéron prononça cette harangue A. U. C. Varron, 698.(3) D'un autre côté quand Catulus rencontra Auguste il avoit déjà pris la prætexta.(4) Anciennement les jeunes gens ne la portoient que depuis l'age de quatorze ans.(5) Cependant je veux bien supposer que l'on avance cette prise à proportion de celle de la robe virile; anciennement on la prenoit à l'age de dix-sept ans.(6) Auguste la prit à celui de seize(7) ou bien de quatorze ans.(8) Ainsi il prit la prætexta étant agé de onze ou de treize ans, savoir en 702, on en 704. On vient de voir que Catulus étoit mort plus de six ans auparavant.

(1) Sallust. Bell. Catilin. c. 49.

(2) Cicero pro Sextio, c. 47.

(3) Fabr. Ciceron. Hist. p. 22.

(4) Sueton. loc. citat.

(5) V. Pitisc. Lexicon. tom. iii. p. 163. sub voc. Prætexta. Macrob. Saturn. l. i. c. 6.

(6) Middleton's Life of Cicero, tom. i. p. 13.

(7) Sueton. l. ii. c. 3.

(8) V. Notas Grævii in locum supra laudatum.

Puisqu'on détruit si facilement des événemens miraculeux supposés être arrivés dans un tems éclairé, rapportés par un historien très exact et voisin de ce tems-là,* qu'en doit-on conclure de mille de leurs pareils nés au milieu de l'ignorance, enveloppés dans l'éloignement des tems, et adoptés par des légendaires?

* C. Suetonius étoit contemporain de Tacite, puisque Pline le jeune étoit ami de tous les deux. Or Tacite avoit vu des viellards qui avoient assisté au jugement de Pison et qui par conséquent avoient vécu avec bien des personnes du siècle même d'Auguste. V. Tacit Annal. iii. c. 16.

J'avouerois

J'avouerois franchement que je ne saurois venir à bout avec la même facilité d'une prophétie qui avoit cours parmi les Véliternes, concitoyens d'Auguste. Je souhaite que quelqu'autre puisse être plus heureux que moi. Le mur de leur ville avoit été touché de la foudre. Ils consultent les augures. On leur répond qu'il est annoncé par là, qu'ils doivent un jour donner un maître au monde. En conséquent de cette espérance ils soutinrent la guerre contre les Romains avec opiniâtreté, jusqu'à en être presque exterminés. Ils virent à la fin que la prédiction avoit regardé Auguste. (1). Je n'aurois point fait attention à cette prophétie, et je l'aurois rangé sur le champ parmi mille autres fables que la flatterie inventa pour relever la naissance et les vertus d'Auguste, si un passage singulier de Tite Live n'avoit pas frappé ma mémoire. Le voici: les Romains, après avoir subjugé les diverses cités de Latium, en agirent envers eux avec assez de douceur. Ils accordèrent même la bourgeoisie de leur ville à plusieurs d'entr'elles ; mais ils distinguèrent ceux de Velitræ par une sévérité toute particulière. Ils divisèrent les terres des sénateurs à une colonie qu'ils y envoyèrent. Ils bannirent tous les citoyens de Velitræ de l'autre côté du Tibre, leur ordonnant d'y rester sous peine d'une grande amende, ou de la prison, pour quiconque contreviendroit à leurs ordres.* (2.) Ce passage en lui-même est singulier,

(1) Sueton. l. ii. c. 94.

(2) Tit. Liv. l. viii. c. 14.

* Tite Live ajouta qu'on les traita avec cette sévérité, " quod toties rebellassent," jusqu'à massacrer une colonie Romaine qu'on avoit envoyée chez eux.

et et le devient bien davantage en le combinant avec celui de Suétone. 1. Cette obstination des Veliternes est tout à fait surprenante. Pourquoi cette petite ville de Latium s'est-elle distinguée à vouloir lutter contre les Romains plutôt que plusieurs autres de ses voisines plus puissantes qu'elle? L'étourderie d'une populace effrénée auroit bien pu produire une seule rebellion, mais pour rendre raison de si fréquentes récidives, on a besoin d'un principe répandu parmi le peuple qui leur donnoit l'espérance de pouvoir réussir. Suétone nous le fournit, ce principe. Et en effet je ne connois qu'un motif de religion capable de réchauffer tout un peuple, et de le faire persister dans le mépris des plus grands dangers. 2. Cette conduite sévère des Romains est aussi singulière. Leur politique et peut-être aussi leur orgueil les engageoit à traiter les vaincus avec bonté quelque opiniâtre qu'eût été leur résistance: " parcere subjectis et debellare superbos." Parmi tous les autres peuples de l'Italie je ne connois guères que ceux de Capoue qu'ils ayent traité avec une pareille rigueur. (1) Or les Capouens étoient encore pour eux non seulement un objet de haine mais de crainte. (2) Ainsi il est presque nécessaire de supposer quelque chose de pareil au sujet des Véliternes. Mais on ne conçoit guères comment ce petit peuple pouvoit leur inspirer de l'effroi qu'à l'aide de leur propre fanatisme, et de la superstition des Romains, qui craignoient cette prédiction, et qui cherchoient à en empêcher l'accomplissement.

(1) Tit. Liv. l. xxvi. c. 34.

(2) Cicero de Leg. Agrar. contr. Rullum. ii. c. 32.

Cependant elle s'est accomplie. Velitræ à donné au au monde un maître dans la personne d'Auguste dont la famille étoit de cette ville. (1) Quelle conséquence faut-il en tirer? Nous pouvons y puiser une leçon non moins utile que les précédentes.* Bien des peuples ont eu leurs prédictions d'un roi qui devoit gouverner le monde. Le hasard ou quelquefois l'envie qu'on a eu de les accomplir en a fait réussir, sans qu'une puissance surnaturelle s'en soit mêlé (car personne je crois ne la fera intervenir dans celle d'Auguste). Apprenons par-là à peser long tems les prophéties avant que d'en conclure quelque chose, et souvenons que plusieurs toutes humaines ont pu réussir quoique très peu vraisemblables dans le tems qu'on les a faites.

(1) Sueton. l. xi. c. 1.

* Bien des prédictions ont fait espérer à bien des peuples de donner un roi à la terre. Parmi un nombre infini d'événemens possibles, il y en a qui n'arriveront pas moins pour avoir été prédits, surtout lorsque les hommes, après s'être laissés subjuguer par les préjugés, règlent leurs actions par ces mêmes préjugés et deviennent les ministres d'un destin dont ils avoient été les auteurs. Souvenons-nous surtout, c'est ici qu'on ne peut trop souvent inculquer cette leçon de la réponse de Diagoras au superstitieux de son tems: il lui montroit les monumens de la reconnoissance de ceux que Neptune avoit conservé des tempêtes: Que te faut-il encore, impie, lui disoit-il, pour te convaincre de la providence des Dieux? Rien, répliqua-t-il, si ce n'est de me faire voir les portraits de ceux qui ont invoqué Neptune, et qui sont péris en l'invoquant.

RE-

REMARQUES CRITIQUES SUR LES DIGNITÉS SACERDOTALES DE JULES CÉSAR.

Assez d'historiens et de critiques ont considéré César à la tête des armées. Envisageons-le un moment au pied des autels, et discutons, en peu de mots, ce que les anciens nous ont laissé au sujet de ses dignités sacerdotales.

César perdit son père, dit Suétone, (1) à l'age de seize ans. Dans sa première jeunesse il avoit épousé une certaine Cossutia, fille des plus riches, mais dont la famille n'étoit que de l'ordre des chevaliers. Cinna, alors maître et seul maître depuis la mort de Marius, voyant que la naissance attachoit César à son parti,* et qu'il étoit capable d'en être un jour le soutien, résolut de l'y attacher encore davantage en lui donnant sa fille Cornelia en mariage: il falloit pour cela répudier Cossutia: César le fit, et la dignité de flamen Dialis, la troisième de l'hiérarchie Romaine, fut le prix de sa complaisance. Sylla revient en Italie; son caractère lui inspiroit des désirs ardens de vengeance, sa victoire le mettoit en état de les assouvir. Soit amour, soit fierté, César ne voulut jamais abandonner sa Cornelia; son refus lui coûta son pontificat, ses biens de famille, et risqua de lui coûter la vie. Dans ce petit récit je n'ai point fait attention à Plutarque, qui veut que César ne briguât le flaminiat qu'après le retour de Sylla, qui le fit échouer pour se venger. (2) L'autorité de Plutarque,

(1) Sueton. L. i. c. 1. Vell. Pater. Hist. Rom. L. ii. c. 43.

(2) Plutarq. Viesd'Hom. Illustr. traduct de Dacier. Tom. vi. p. 184.

* Marius avoit épousé Julia, la tante de César.

tarque, surtout dans l'histoire Romaine, n'est pas faite pour balancer un moment celle de Suétone et de Velleius Paterculus.

J'ai dégagé ce récit d'une petite difficulté de chronologie. Il faut y revenir un moment. Velleius prétend que César fut nommé au flaminiat, " creatus," par Marius et Cinna. Or il est clair par le passage de Suétone que César n'eut l'assurance de cette dignité que dans le quatrième consulat de Cinna, savoir, A. U. C. Varr. 670. Fort bien. Mais malheureusement il se trouve que Marius étoit mort au commencement de A. U. C. 668. On pourroit affecter de mépriser la difficulté en disant qu'elle se trouve dans un passage manifestement corrompu. Mais il n'y auroit pas là de l'équité. On pourroit avoir recours au système du Cardinal Norris que César fut fait flamen avant la première victoire de Sylla, à l'age de douze ans; mais le célèbre Burman a fait voir son peu d'accord avec les anciens monumens. En voici un autre: Marius s'empara de Rome en 667, et le flamen Merula se donna la mort. La place de flamen ne devoit pas rester longtems vuide, vu le grand besoin qu'on en avoit toujours. Marius et Cinna le remplacèrent aussitôt par le jeune César; mais comme il n'avoit pas encore pris la toge virile, on fit faire ses fonctions à quelque autre. César enfin la prit à la fin de sa seizième année, savoir au commencement de l'an 670, et du quatrième consulat de Cinna. On prit aussitôt de nouvelles mesures pour lui assurer cette dignité, mais la mort de Cinna, qui fut tué cette même année, année, dans une sédition de ses soldats, les rompit toutes avant sa consécration, et la guerre civile qui survint l'année suivante en fit perdre toute espérance. Peut-être si nous étions plus au fait du droit pontifical des Romains sentirions-nous une différence entre le creatus de Velleius et le destinatus de Suétone, qui confirmeroit ce que je viens de dire; peut-être se détruiroit-elle. Aussi l'ai-je donné moins comme un système que je m'engage de défendre que comme une hypothèse qui résout assez naturellement la difficulté.

On peut voir assez par l'exemple de César qu'il n'y avoit point d'age fixe pour la dignité de flamen Dialis, puisqu'à ne nous en tenir qu'à ce que nous savons bien sûrement César la posséda avant l'age de dix-sept ans. Je crois que cette réflexion peut s'étendre à toutes les autres dignités sacerdotales chez les Romains. Pour le pontificat, nous croyons que le jeune Octavien étoit pontife avant vingt ans, et nous savons d'ailleurs qu'il fut nommé à cet emploi à la place de Cn. Domitius tué à la bataille de Pharsale A.U.C. 706 ; et qu'il en prit possession le jour même qu'il quitta la prætexta pour la toge virile à l'entrée de sa seizième année. On auroit même mauvaise grace de dire que le pouvoir absolu du dictateur son oncle le dispensa des loix. César n'étoit pas encore absolu, et dans ce tems-là le petit-fils de sa sœur lui étoit peu cher. Quant aux augures, Cicéron pria Brutus de laisser venir à Rome son fils alors à l'armée, afin qu'il pût prétendre à l'augurat. Ce fils couroit alors sa vingtvingt-unième année; et cet exemple est d'autant plus considérable que l'on voit par le reste de la lettre l'attention et le soin qu'avoit Cicéron de ne point manquer aux loix. J'avoue naturellement ma surprise que Numa n'ait pas songé à fixer un age plus convenable pour les ministres de la religion. Encore en Egypte ou dans la Judée, où les prêtres faisoient un corps dont tous les membres succoient l'esprit de leur état avec le lait, les abus n'auroient pas été aussi grands; mais à Rome, où leur état ne les engageoit à rien, l'age en auroit tenu la place. Mais quel frein avoient les jeunes gens?

On a dit que depuis la mort de Merula, (car César ne fut point consacré,) la place de flamen Dialis resta vuide pendant soixante et douze ans. Est-il vrai? On me cite les autorités accablantes de Suétone, de Dion, de Tacite. La première est la plus considérable, puisque le nom de Suétone réveille l'idée d'un historien assez hardi pour ne pas taire les plus grandes vérités, assez instruit pour n'en pas oublier les plus petites. Mais Suétone se contente de dire qu'Auguste rétablit plusieurs anciennes cérémonies, et entr'autres l'emploi de flamen Dialis. Dion et Tacite disent positivement qu'il n'y eut point de flamen Dialis entre Merula et celui qu'Auguste fit élire. Mais on peut leur opposer le témoignage positif de Cicéron qui parloit d'un fait qu'il ne pouvoit ignorer. "Est ergo flamen," dit-il au sénat assemblé, "ut Jovi, ut Marti, ut Quirino, sic divo Julio M. Antonius." On voit qu'il qu'il parle d'un flamen actuel et non point d'une dignité presque tombée dans l'oubli. On auroit tort d'opposer Cicéron à lui-même, et dire que Cicéron, dans le dénombrement qu'il fait du collège des pontifes, ne parle point du flamen Dialis. On auroit tort de fixer une cause particulière à une omission qui pouvoit en avoir cent autres.

PRINCIPES

DES POIDS, DES MONNOIES, ET DES MESURES DES ANCIENS, AVEC DES TABLES CONSTRUITES SUR CES PRINCIPES.

I.

Il est des études qui n'augmentent point les connoissances, ou du moins ne les augmentent, qu'en écartant ces obstacles dont la bizarrerie des hommes en a hérissés la route de toutes parts. Telle est l'étude des langues, utile si on la méprise, dangereuse si on l'admire. La différence des poids et des mesures est un nouveau langage, aussi barbare et plus ridicule que les autres. Les idées décident des mots. Mais pour ces signes d'institution les idées sont ou seroient facilement les mêmes. Cependant puisqu'il est établi, apprenons-la (cette langue) en murmurant. Elle nous servira d'interprète dans la géographie, le commerce, et l'économique des anciens, objets intéressans dont la connoissance nous empêchera de voir dans les anciens des sauvages ou des demi-dieux.

J'écris en François, parcequ'on y a assez besoin de quelque chose sur ce sujet, pour ne pas me chicaner sur sa bonté. Je me sers sans façon des idées qui m'ont plues chez mes devanciers. Je les ai enchassées dans les miennes. On n'aura pas de peine à les reconnoître. Voici les principaux auteurs chez qui j'ai puisé.

M. Greaves

M. Greaves sur le Pied et Denier Romain, en Anglois. Petit livre mais excellent. M. Greaves possédoit les talens d'un bon faiseur d'expériences. Exact jusqu'à la superstition, patient, laborieux, habile, et sincère, il croyoit n'avoir rien vu dans un objet qu'il n'y eut tout vu. On peut cependant faire plus de fonds sur son témoignage que sur sa critique. Liste des auteurs. GREAVES.

M. Eisenschidt de Ponderibus et Mensuris Veterum. La première partie est fort bonne. Les poids y sont traités avec une exactitude qui ne laissent rien à désirer. Mais l'auteur s'y est épuisé. Il a croqué les mesures en apprenti. Rien de plus abrégé et de plus vague que ce qu'il en dit. L'ouvrage est pourtant estimable par la comparaison de toutes les mesures et les poids de nos jours. EISENSCHIDT.

M. Freret, Essai sur les Mesures longues des Anciens. Voici un nom qu'on ne doit proférer qu'avec respect. M. Freret ne dément point sa réputation par cet ouvrage. On y voit une érudition sûre qui embrasse toute l'antiquité, une sagacité qui sait concilier les apparences les plus contradictoires, et un esprit systématique qui réunit tant de particules éparses dans un corps bien lié et bien soutenu. FRERET.

*M. de la Barre, sur la Livre Romaine, et sur les Mesures anciennes. Le rival et le contre-part de M. Freret. Il avoit plus d'affectation que d'art, et plus d'obscurité que de profondeur. Son grand DE LA BARRE.

* Mém. de l'Académie des Belles-Lettres, tom. viii. p. 372. et tom. xix. p. 512.

défaut est une méthode des plus embarrassées; son grand mérite consiste en quelques idées neuves et hardies.

ARBUTHNOT. *M. Arbuthnot, Table des Poids, des Mesures, et des Monnoies des Anciens, en Anglois. Auteur sans prétensions mais non sans mérite. Il ne veut point donner les principes, mais son livre peut fournir des détails fort utiles.

HOOPER. M. l'Evêque Hooper. Inquiry into the State of the Ancient Measures, particularly the Jewish, en Anglois. L'ouvrage de cet habile homme répand de grandes lumières sur le sujet qu'il traite. Quelquefois trop subtil dans ses recherches il prête aux anciens sa propre exactitude. De la cube d'une mesure longue mal définie, il déduit, souvent sans autorités et par les calculs les plus délicats, leurs poids et leurs mesures creuses. Je lui reprocherois aussi d'avoir corrigé ses auteurs pour se fonder sur ses changemens comme sur leurs propres paroles. Il est singulier que les esprits du premier ordre ayent paru ignorer cette règle fondamentale de la critique.

II.

Nous avons trois choses à rechercher afin de fixer nos idées. 1. Le rapport des mesures anciennes avec celles de notre pays; 2. La proportion de celles de chaque peuple de l'antiquité entr'elles; et 3. Leurs parties aliquottes. Il n'y a que nos yeux et nos instrumens qui puissent nous instruire du premier rapport. Il leur faut des objets sensibles qui

* In 4to. London. 1727.

portent

portent encore l'empreinte des poids ou des mesures anciennes. Alors le parallèle devient facile et assuré. Si ces monumens étoient assez nombreux pour nous faire connoître toutes ces mesures et tous ces poids, leur proportion réciproque en découleroit d'elle-même. Ce n'est que notre disette qui nous oblige de recourir aux auteurs, et en partant de quelque monument ancien, comme d'un point fixe, de calculer leur valeur positive par leurs rapports mutuels. En suivant cette méthode nous n'avons point à craindre des erreurs grossières, mais il faut aussi renoncer à une exactitude bien poussée. Ces proportions étoient rarement l'ouvrage d'une recherche attentive et éclairée. Etablies par les besoins de la vie, adoptées par l'ignorance, consacrées par le tems, elles se ressentoient de la grossièreté de leur origine. D'ailleurs les anciens (disons-le sans façon) étoient moins exacts que nous. Peu rompus dans le calcul, gênés par la forme incommode de leurs caractères numéraux, ils négligeoient les fractions, et ne rendoient que les nombres entiers. On ne doit pas cependant les confondre dans une même classe. L'imagination enflammée du poëte se refroidera-t-elle par une attention à des objets bas, stériles, et pour elle inutiles. Elle n'en parle jamais, ou si elle en parle, les idées populaires sont les siennes. Les orateurs, et les historiens (plus orateurs que les nôtres) méritent un peu plus d'égard. Leur but les a souvent engagés à s'instruire plus à fond dans ces sujets sans lesquels les affaires publiques et l'histoire ne sont qu'un chaos. Mais ce sont ceux, à qui leur intérêt ou leur curiosité ont rendu nécessaires des idées plus approfondies : les arpenteurs, les architectes, les médecins, les mathématiciens, qui ont les droits les plus décidées sur notre confiance. Cependant ceux-ci mêmes doivent s'évanouir à l'approche d'un monument original. Ces auteurs n'avoient que des yeux, nous en avons aussi, et il vaut mieux nous fier aux nôtres qu'aux leurs.

Les parties aliquottes ne peuvent guères souffrir de difficulté. L'autorité les établit, la nation les connoît, et les écrivains ne sauroient varier à leur égard. On ne les verra ordinairement que dans les tables.

III.

Il semble qu'on devroit fixer sans peine les poids des Grecs et des Romains. Ces poids étoient les monnoies. C'étoient autant de divisions exactes de la mine et de l'once.

M. Greaves, qui avoit examiné plusieurs centaines des deniers qui sont encore conservés dans les cabinets d'Italie, les trouvoit généralement du poids de 67 grains Anglois ($74\frac{1}{2}$). Le Père Bouteroue en pesa depuis qui alloient à 75 grains, et puisque le tems et la cupidité des hommes diminue le poids des monnoies plutôt qu'ils n'y ajoutent, on doit toujours s'en tenir à la plus forte évaluation comme à celle qui nous est parvenue avec la moindre altération.

L'once Romaine étoit composée de sept deniers. Les Les Romains les plus éclairés, Celse, qui vivoit du tems de Tibère,* Pline, pour qui l'antiquité Romaine n'avoit rien d'inconnue, sont ceux qui nous en assurent. L'once doit donc peser 525 grains.

On a voulu conjecturer que le premier denier Consulaire n'étoit que la sixième partie de l'once. Lorsqu'on m'en produira de nouvelles preuves, l'on m'y trouvera docile ; car les passages dont on a voulu s'appuyer me paroissent des plus vagues et des plus équivoques.

Mais quoiqu'il en soit de ce grand denier, il est constant qu'il y en a eu de plus légers que le septième de l'once. Pline nous apprend qu'on commençoit à diminuer ce poids.† On s'y prenoit insensiblement et comme à la dérobée. Peu-à-peu le denier n'étoit plus que la huitième partie de l'once. Le consentement des anciens ne permet pas d'en douter.

On a conclu avec beaucoup de vraisemblance que les Romains, à l'imitation des Grecs, avoient fait leur monnoie d'or, leur aureus, le double du denier quant à son poids. Comme il s'est conservé beaucoup de ces aurei, nous en tirerons des inductions fort utiles. Le premier établissement des aurei étoit de quarante à la livre. Les plus pesans que nous connoissons sont de 124¼ grains Anglois (147$\frac{3}{4}$.) On prévient ma conclusion ; ces aurei étoient le double des deniers les septièmes de l'once. Du tems de Vespasien et de ses successeurs, nous trouvons des aurei de 108, 110, et 114 grains Anglois. Les deniers doivent être alors de 54, 55, et 57 grains. Le premier de ces nombres nous donne le huitième de l'once. Depuis le règne de Gordien, les empereurs, ou plutôt les tyrans ses successeurs, avilirent de plus en plus la gloire et les monnoies des Romains. Probus, qui paroît comme restaurateur de l'empire dans les historiens aussi bien que sur les médailles, voulut les relever. Elles retombèrent après sa mort. Si nous prenons le poids moyen des aurei depuis Gallus à Heraclius nous aurons 68 grains Anglois. Celui du denier seroit de 34 (40$\frac{1}{2}$) un peu plus de la moitié de l'ancien denier, et pas la troizième partie de l'once. J'ai peine à croire cependant que le denier, comme poids, ait suivi toute la bizarrerie de ces révolutions. Les auteurs paroissent n'en avoir connu que deux. Il étoit le septième de l'once. Il en fut ensuite le huitième. Il perdit peu après son égalité avec le denier monnoie, demeurant fixe pendant que celui-ci changeoit d'un jour à l'autre. Il en a été ainsi dans tous les pays de l'Europe. Du tems de Charlemagne une livre de compte valoit une livre pesante d'argent, aujourd'hui elle n'en vaut pas la centième partie.

* Sed et antea sciri volo in unciâ pondus denariorum esse septem. Cels. l. xv. c. 17.

† Miscuit denario triumvir Antonius ferrum; alii e pondere substrahunt cum sit justum octoginta quatuor e libris signari.— Plin. Hist. Natur. l. xxxiii. c. 9.

Douze onces faisoient la livre Romaine. La belle occasion d'étaler de l'érudition, puisque la chose est des plus claires et des mieux connues. Un savant du siècle passé ne l'eût pas négligée.

Je

Je me contenterai de dire qu'une telle livre seroit de 6300 grains, ou de 10 onces 540 grains.

Le talent étoit composé de soixante mines. Tous les talens, très différens les uns des autres, gardoient cependant la même proportion entr'eux. Le talent pesera cinquante-deux livres et 528 grains.

Les historiens nous ont conservé ce traité orgueilleux que les Romains firent signer à Antiochus. On lui impose un grand tribut qu'il doit payer en talens Attiques. On stipule que le talent pesera 80 livres Romaines. Nous aurons un talent de 54 livres onze onces. La différence est d'une livre et environ dix onces. Je conçois que les Romains, aussi éclairés sur leurs intérêts que les Germains, préférèrent les vieilles espèces comme les plus pesantes, mais la hauteur, la franchise de leur conduite envers Antiochus n'auroit jamais pu descendre à une supercherie de banquier. Il a donc dû exister un talent Attique du poids de quatre-vingt livres Romaines. Sa drachme de 84 grains me paroît même la drachme de Solon, quoiqu'elle perdit un peu de son poids dans les tems les plus reculés.

Le commerce et l'empire d'Athènes donna un grand cours à ses poids et monnoies, et l'on convient que lorsqu'il est parlé de talens ou de drachmes, sans autre désignation exprimée ou impliquée, c'est toujours de celles de l'Attique qu'il faut l'entendre. Elles n'étoient cependant pas les plus anciennes. Trois cens ans avant Solon, Phidon, tyran d'Egine et d'Argos, de la postérité d'Hercule, régla les poids du Péloponnèse et le premier fit battre de la monnoie.* Comme elle étoit unique alors, elle eut beaucoup de réputation. Les Athéniens mêmes s'en servoient en la méprisant. La drachme d'Egine étoit la paye qu'on donnoit par jour à un cavalier. Elle valoit dix de ces oboles dont la drachme Attique contenoit six. Le talent d'Egine pesoit quatre-vingt cinq livres, onze onces et 304 grains, et sa drachme 131⅔ grains. Le poids des tetradrachmes qu'on frappoit dans cette île sera de 526⅔. Voici pourquoi j'ai rapporté cette dernière valeur. Il n'est guères possible de s'amuser beaucoup à ces discussions, sans sacrifier quelquefois à ce goût de conjecture, la plus douce récompense de ses travaux. En considérant les poids Romains, leur état isolé me surprit; est-il possible, me dis-je à moi-même, que ce peuple, ramas de cent autres peuples, n'ait emprunté les mesures d'aucun que nous connoissons? Les nations dont le sang toujours pûr a coulé sans mélange étranger n'ont pas dédaigné ce commerce, si propre à fixer leurs idées chancelantes qui ne savoient où s'arrêter. La connoissance de la tetradrachme d'Egine me les rappela ces réflexions plus vivement. Son égalité avec l'once Romaine à un trois centième près, me

fit

* Φειδωνος τε Αργειων τυραννε, τε τα μετρα ποιησαντος Πελοποννησιοισι και υβρισαντος μεγιστα δη Ελληνων απαντων, ος εξαναγησας τες Ηλειων αγωνοθετας, αυτος τ' εν Ολυμπιη αγανα εθηκε. Herodot. l. vi. c. 127.

Φειδων Αργος κρατων μετρα μαι ςαθμα προτος εφευρεν. Euseb. n. 1217.

Φειδων ο Αργειος νομισμα αργυρεν εν τη Αιγινη εποιησεν. Marmora Arundel.

Mensuras et pondera Phidon Argivus, aut Palamedes, ut maluit Gellius. Plin. l. vii. c. 56.

parut

parut trop précise pour la rejetter sur le hasard. Je me confirmerois dans cette idée, en examinant les canaux par lesquels ce poids a pu pénétrer jusqu'à Rome. Ils sont tout ouverts. Quelques années après que Phidon eut reglé les poids du Pélopon nèse, une colonie de Lacedémoniens passa dans le pays des Sabins. Rien ne relève autant nos idées de la discipline de Lycurgue que cette migration. Ces exilés aimèrent mieux s'expatrier que de s'y soumettre, et cependant s'il parut des Sybarites à Sparta ils semblèrent des Spartiates à Cures. Les mœurs dures et austères qu'ils communiquèrent aux Sabins furent longtems l'admiration des Romains. L'union de ces deux derniers peuples fut étroite dès le commencement. Tatius et ses Sabins s'encorporèrent aux Romains de Romulus. Si l'on trouve ce règne trop guerrier pour des arrangemens de police, Numa, son successeur, prince pacifique et Sabin, doit avoir réglé les poids, et s'il l'a fait, quel modèle a-t-il pu suivre que celui de sa patrie?

Passons à la Palestine, petit pays, mais plus connu que les vastes contrées de la Tartarie. Cette course paroît un écart, mais il ne l'est point. Le premier peuple que nous trouvons sur ses côtes, ce sont les Phéniciens, dont le commerce et les colonies remplissoient toutes les mers depuis les Indes jusqu'au delà des colonnes d'Hercule, et rendoient Tyr et Sidon les entrepôts de l'univers. Nous devons nous attendre à trouver partout les vestiges de leurs poids. Un peuple de guerriers peut mépriser ces détails, mais une nation de commerçans en sentira le prix, et travaillera à les établir partout.

Le

Le talent Tyrien étoit ou double ou simple, celui-là composé de 12,000 drachmes, celui-ci de 6000. Hiéron, auteur estimé, et qui mérite de l'être, égale le talent Attique à celui de Tyr, et nous donne à connoître que c'étoit au simple; la drachme de la Phénicie aura le même poids que celui d'Athènes. Il est assez vraisemblable que Solon, lui-même négociant, avoit cherché dans sa réforme des poids la plus grande facilité du commerce.

Il n'y a point de difficulté à supposer que Solon reçut ses poids des Phéniciens, dont il voyoit les vaisseaux tous les jours dans le port d'Athènes. Mais si l'on trouve ce trajet encore trop long, on peut croire qu'il les reçut en droiture de l'île d'Eubée, voisine de l'Attique, et dont elle tiroit beaucoup de bled. Tout au moins nous engage à croire que le talent d'Athènes, celui de l'Eubée, et le talent simple de Tyr, étoient tous les trois égaux. Car premièrement, lorsque Darius changea les dons gratuits de ses sujets en tributs réglés, il statua qu'ils payeroient l'argent en talens Babyloniens, et l'or en talens de l'île d'Eubée.* Pourquoi ce choix singulier? Un roi de France a-t-il jamais fait payer la taille en argent de Suisse? L'Eubée étoit peu connue dans le monde; bien loin d'être sujette à Darius, elle lui étoit ennemie. Encore une fois, pourquoi ce choix? Ce ne peut être que le talent de quelque province de l'empire de Darius, talent célèbre, mais qu'Hérodote a mieux aimé exprimer par un talent Grec qui lui étoit égal.

* Herodot. l. iii. c. 95.

égal. Cette province ne pouvoit être la Babylone. L'Egypte commerçoit trop peu avec l'étranger pour qu'on préférât ses poids. La Lydie auroit de grandes prétensions. Le Pactole rendoit son or célèbre; c'étoit même l'or du darique. Mais Hérodote avoit trop bien fait connoître la Lydie pour craindre l'obscurité en la nommant ici. D'ailleurs qu'elle liaison entre la Lydie et l'Eubée? Il y en avoit beaucoup entre cette île et la Phénicie. Cadmus l'avoit côtoyé et s'étoit établi dans son voisinage. Palamède, dont les inventions valurent plus à la Grèce, que la valeur de cet écervelé Achille, étoit natif de cette île. Il emprunta ses lettres de la Phénicie, pourquoi pas ses poids? II^ment. Les anciens ne frappoient de monnoies, surtout celles d'or, qui ne fussent quelque partie aliquotte de la livre du talent. Le darique, égal à l'aureus d'Athènes, étoit la trois millième partie d'un talent d'or Attique. Cependant les rois de Perse n'ont jamais emprunté leur monnoie favorite d'une petite république. Si le talent d'Athènes étoit celui de Tyr, il n'y a plus de difficulté. Ce n'est pas une preuve, mais c'est au moins un préjugé favorable. III^ment. Le talent d'Athènes étoit égal à celui de Tyr. Nous venons de le voir chez Hiéron. Soixante-dix mines Attiques faisoient le talent Babylonien. Pollux nous l'apprend. Soixante-dix mines Euboïques faisoient le même talent Babylonien suivant Hérodote; la conséquence est toute simple.

On seroit surpris que les Juifs eussent d'autres poids que ceux de leurs voisins, ceux de la Phénicie nicie surtout. Grossiers et ignorans ils devoient tout aux autres peuples, et ne leur rendoient qu'un vrai mépris de barbares. Josèphe, Philon, et les Septante, tous instruits dans les usages de leur nation, et plus en état que leurs concitoyens d'en faire la comparaison avec ceux des étrangers, égalent tous le shekel des Hébreux à la tetradrachme Attique, ou à la didrachme d'Alexandrie. Trois mille shekels faisoient le talent Juif, qui ainsi étoit égal à 12,000 drachmes Attiques ou Tyriennes, c'est à dire au talent double de Tyr. M. Hooper, toujours profond, a voulu examiner l'évaluation de Maimonides, il l'a trouvée n'être pas fort éloignée de celle de Josèphe; et même il est parvenu à rendre raison de cette différence. Mais il faut voir tout ce morceau, qui est un chef-d'œuvre de la critique, dans l'ouvrage du savant évêque.

Ces poids ont-ils toujours été les mêmes? Les rabbins prétendent que pendant la captivité, ils empruntèrent ceux des Babyloniens plus pesans que les leurs d'un sixième. Cette adoption paroît naturelle, nous verrons qu'elle a eu lieu pour les mesures. Mais comme Josèphe, Philon et les Septante, ne l'ont point connue, le témoignage de quelques rabbins postérieurs de cinq ou six cens ans, et justement décriés pour leurs critiques, ne peut point leur être opposé.

Tout ce qu'on peut alléguer en faveur du sentiment des rabbins, ce sont quelques shekels conservés, dont le poids est égal à 219 grains Anglois (258½), un peu moins d'une demie-once Romaine. Mais ces pièces sont renvoyées par les savans aux der-derniers tems de la nation Juive. Alors comme leur tribut aux Romains se payoit en shekels, il étoit de leur intérêt d'en baisser le poids, et rien ne seroit autant la pillule aux yeux de leurs maîtres, que de leur faire croire qu'ils rétablissoient le shekel de leurs anciens rois, shekel dont le poids étoit précisément la demie-once Romaine. Il n'en falloit pas davantage à un antiquaire pour faire sortir les deux nations d'une même souche. Telle est la conjecture de M. Hooper. Elle est ingénieuse. Mais je doute que les Romains se fussent si fort enorgueillis de cette parenté.*

Lorsqu'Alexandre jetta les fondemens d'Alexandrie il se proposoit d'y transporter tout le commerce du monde. Il vouloit la mettre à la place de Tyr qu'il venoit de détruire. Pour que les nations ne s'apperçussent d'autre changement que de celui du lieu, il étoit naturel qu'il n'altérât point les poids de l'ancien entrepôt. Il ne le fit point. Le talent d'Alexandrie contenoit deux fois celui d'Athènes et étoit égal au double talent de Tyr.

On verra dans les tables quelques autres talens moins connus, le Corinthien, le Rhodien, le Syrien, &c. Je ne parlerai pas encore des talens d'Homère.

* Ecoutons Cicéron ; que cet orateur nous instruise des sentimens des Romains à l'égard de ce peuple choisi. " Stantibus Hierosolymis, pacatisque Judæis, tamen istorum religio sacrorum a splendore hujus imperii, gravitate nominis nostri, majorum institutis, abhorrebat. Nunc vero hoc magis, quod illa gens, quid de imperio nostro sentiret, ostendit armis: quam cara Diis immortalibus esset ostendit armis, quòd est victa, quòd elocata, quòd servata." Cicero pro Flacco, c. 28.

Peut-

Peut-être ne seroit-il pas difficile d'étendre ses conquêtes, et en rassemblant les passages épars des voyageurs et des missionnaires, de fixer les poids des Turcs, des Arabes, des Persans, des Indiens, des Chinois, des Japponois, &c. mais à quoi aboutiroit cette connoissance ? Attendons que les travaux de nos savans ayent enrichi la littérature des écrits de ces peuples. Alors cette connoissance deviendra nécessaire. Aujourd'hui elle seroit pénible et sans fruit.

Arrêtons-nous un moment. Quelques centaines de monumens, et deux proportions des plus simples, nous ont conduits à la connoissance de la livre Romaine. Comparons-la avec quelques livres de fer qui nous sont demeurées. La plûpart sont fort endommagées. Des deux les plus entières on déduiroit une livre de 10 onces 408 grains. La différence est de 132 grains. Elle ne m'étonne point. Ces livres, quoique les moins rongées, devoient néanmoins avoir perdu de leur poids.

Le conge Farnèse est célèbre parmi les antiquaires. Je ne le suis point assez pour croire qu'une providence toute particulière a veillé à sa conservation ; je sais seulement qu'il existe à Rome dans le palais des Ducs de Parme. Une inscription gravée sur le dehors nous apprend qu'il contenoit le poids de dix livres, et les anciens sont d'accord que c'étoit dix livres d'eau ou de vin pur. M. Auzout de l'Académie des Sciences l'ayant rempli d'eau de fontaine, trouva pour le poids de sa capacité, 62,760 grains. La livre Romaine en aura aura 6276 et l'once 523. Cet accord, $\frac{1}{200}$ à près, avec la livre trouvée par les deniers, doit faire évanouir le moindre soupçon. S'il valoit la peine de choisir entre les deux livres, je préférerois celle des deniers. L'opération est plus simple.

On vient de voir un système clair et suivi. Il n'est fondé que sur les monumens, combinés avec les écrivains du bon tems. Ceux du Bas Empire, Fannius, Dioscorides, Galien, &c. nous égareroient, si nous les prenions pour nos guides. Ils établissent pour fondement de leurs hypothèses, l'égalité du denier non-seulement avec la drachme de leurs jours mais encore avec celle du tems de Solon. Il est de fait que ces deux poids différoient au moins d'un treizième. D'ailleurs ces auteurs, moitié Grecs moitié Romains, altèrent les coutumes des deux nations en tachant de les concilier, et se plaignent alors des ténèbres dont ils se sont enveloppées.* A tout moment ils se répètent, ils se contredisent les uns les autres, et eux-mêmes; et vous sentez à chaque ligne qu'ils n'ont jamais consulté les meilleurs de tous les livres, les étalons des poids. On a été assez bon pour chercher les raisons de leur égarement, et pour leur prêter des interprétations qu'ils ne méritent point, et dont ils sont assez peu susceptibles.†

IV.

* Dioscorides dit que le conge pesoit sept cens vingt drachmes. Nous savons qu'il tenoit au moins huit cens quarante deniers; cependant un moment auparavant il avoit égalé la drachme au denier.

† M. Hooper adopte une idée de M. Greaves qui pense que lorsque ces écrivains parlent de la drachme comme le huitième

IV.

Les Grecs furent longtems un peuple sans commerce et sans police; occupés de leurs guerres, ou plutôt de leurs brigandages, ils négligeoient tous les arts. Un tel peuple devoit se soucier assez peu de précision dans les poids qui ne sont que les moyens du commerce. Aussi seroit-il difficile de les apprécier au juste.

Solon, le premier des législateurs en grand, car Lycurgue ne fit attention qu'à un seul objet, la discipline militaire; ce Solon, dis-je, trouvant l'état d'Athènes obéré de dettes, baissa les poids et les espèces d'un quart. Cette raison a pu l'y engager; mais je ferai voir dans la suite qu'elle n'a pas dû être la seule.

Il n'existe qu'une seule drachme, le poids de la Grèce sur laquelle tous les autres se régloient; M. Greaves l'avoit trouvée dans la Mer Noir: elle pesoit 66 grains Anglois (78½).

Nos principes cependant seroient mal-appuyés, si nous n'avions qu'une seule ressource. Dans la critique comme dans la physique, une seule expérience ne doit jamais suffire. Mille causes étrangères peuvent s'y mêler, dont la moindre, en corrompant sa pureté, nous égareroit dans notre recherche.

de l'onçe, ils n'entendent point l'once Romaine, mais une once que les Athéniens composèrent à l'imitation de leurs maîtres. Mais ce système ne les sauve point. Si la drachme suivit les révolutions du denier, pourquoi l'ont-ils ignorée? Si elle ne les a pas suivies, pourquoi les égaler?

Heureusement

Heureusement pour nous les Grecs frappoient des tetradrachmes, ou des pièces de quatre drachmes. M. Greaves en vit beaucoup dans son voyage de l'orient. Il s'attachoit sur-tout à ceux qu'il déterroit dans des lieux écartés où la curiosité des Européens n'avoit pas encore enseigné la mauvaise foi et l'imposture.* Ceux qui paroissoient les plus parfaits s'accordoient à lui donner 268 grains Anglois (316). Nous avons donc une drachme de 67 grains Anglois (79). Une demie-drachme et un obole ne font qu'appuyer ce résultat.

Nous avons soupçonné que la monnoie d'or des Romains pesoit deux de leurs deniers. Nous savons que chez les Grecs elles pesoient deux drachmes Attiques. Polluxt et Hesychius‡ en sont mes garans. Je ne dis rien des dariques. M. Greaves n'en avoit jamais vu, et quoique M. l'Abbé Barthelemi m'apprend le titre d'une de ces monnoies conservée dans le cabinet du roi, il ne dit rien du poids. Une monnoie d'or de Philippe pèse, suivant Snellius, 134½ grains Anglois, (159) et une autre d'Alexandre 133½ grains Anglois (158.) La drachme de celli-ci est de 79 grains, de celle-là d'environ 79½. Qu'un Anglois donc se tienne assuré que la drachme de Solon étoit de 67 grains; qu'un François l'appreçie à 73 grains.§

* Greaves's Miscellanies. Tom. i. p. 261.

† ὁ δε χρυσους στατηρ δυο εισι δραχμας Αττικας. L. iv. c. 24.

‡ Πολεμαρχος φησι δυνασθαι τον χρυσουν παρα τοις Αττικοις δραχμας δυο. την δε του χρυσου δραχμην, νομισματος αργυριου δραχμας δεκα. Hesych. in voce Χρυσους.

§ Histoire de l'Académie des Belles Lettres. Tom. xxi. p. 24.

Dans les tems postérieurs les drachmes perdirent de leur poids. Ils devinrent égales aux deniers. Il n'éxiste point de ces drachmes nouvelles qu'on à pu commencer à frapper vers l'an deux cent cinquante avant Jésus Christ, et cette perte, qui n'étoit point singulière, vu le petit nombre de ces espèces qui nous est parvenu, a fait soupçonner à MM. Greaves et Eisenschidt* que cette égalité n'existoit point, ou du moins qu'elle n'étoit qu'une égalité arbitraire et d'échange.† Les témoignages qui l'établissent me paroissent néanmoins des plus décisifs. Celse, dont on connoît l'habileté, la donne d'une manière à faire voir qu'il les avoit comparés avec toute cette exactitude si nécessaire et si peu commune, dans les opérations délicates de la médecine.‡ Pline§ et Galien‖ l'appuyent sans paroître le suivre. Je ne parle point de tous les histori-

* M. Eisenschidt produit une tétradrachme de 333 grains. La drachme en auroit 83¼. Mais cette évaluation s'écarte trop de toutes les autres. Peut-être qu'à l'occasion de quelque grand événement on avoit frappé des drachmes plus pesantes. Peut-être aussi qu'on vouloit les ramener à leur ancien poids. V. Eisenschidt, p. 42.

† V. Greaves's Miscellanies, tom. i. p. 285. Eisenschidt de Ponderibus Veterum, p. 44.

‡ Unius inde denarii pondus dividi a me in partes sex (sciri volo), ut idem in uncia denarii habeam, quod Græci habeant in eo quem Οβολον appellant, id autem ad nostra pondera relatum paullo plus dimidio scrupulo facit. Cels. L. v. c. 15.

§ Drachma Attica denarii argentei habet pondus. Plin. L. xxi. c. 34.

‖ Προδηλον οτι δραχμην λεγομεν νυν εν τοις τοιουτοις απαντες, οπερ Ρωμαιοι δηναριον ονομαζουσιν. Galen. L. viii. de Composit. Medicament.

ens.

ens. Leur noms grossiroient la nuée des témoins, sous y ajouter beaucoup d'évidence. Nous pouvons conclure aussi que la drachme Attique a suivi le sort du denier Romain, et qu'il est devenu la huitième partie de l'once Romaine vers le tems de Vespasien. Nous pouvons le conclure puisque les écrivains tiennent toujours le même langage par rapport à leur égalité.

Cent drachmes faisoient la mine. Elle pesoit donc treize onces et 412 grains. Le savant M. Hooper prétend deviner la mine par une voie assez détournée. La cube de la spithame Grecque lui a donné une mine assez peu éloignée de la nôtre.* Mais de qui a-t-il appris la liaison de la spithame et de la mine? De personne.

V.

Jusqu'ici nos idées ont été simples: des objets matériels jugés sur le rapport de nos sens. A présent il nous faut suivre et décomposer toutes ces combinaisons que l'imagination des hommes, guidée par leur intérêt, leur a suggérées. "Etablissez," leur a-t-elle dit, " un instrument commun du commerce. N'échangez plus le bled contre la laine; mais échangez le bled et la laine contre cet instrument qui devra son prix à votre consentement mutuel. Un seul de ces instrumens ne vous suffira point. Celui du commerce en gros seroit peu susceptible de division dans les menus détails; et la mesure de ceux-ci rebuteroit le commerçant en gros par son poids incommode. Fouillez dans les entrailles de la terre. Elles vous fourniront des minéraux assez maniables, assez rares et assez durables pour devenir cet instrument que vous cherchez." De là est née la valeur de l'or et de l'argent, valeur d'institution que Pline a eu tort d'envisager comme la racine de tous les vices. L'avarice, l'injustice, l'usure n'ont jamais plus désolé la société que parmi les premiers Romains. L'objet de leur cupidité étoit dix livres d'airain ou un troupeau de bœufs: celui de leur postérité mille livres d'or. Voilà toute la différence.

* 6840 grains Anglois, (8080). V. Hooper, p. 49.

Le prix de toute marchandise dépend de deux choses; de sa rareté, et du besoin réel ou imaginaire qu'on en a. La dernière de ces causes n'a jamais pu influer sur le prix de l'or et de l'argent. Avides de ces métaux précieux, les hommes se sont toujours persuadés que l'abondance, les plaisirs, et les arts marchoient à leur suite. C'est pourquoi, comme je ne pourrois attribuer la pauvreté d'un peuple à sa philosophie, je conclurois hardiment, qu'il étoit destitué d'industrie, qu'il ne savoit ni travailler ses mines, ni s'ouvrir des mines encore plus intarissables par son commerce et ses manufactures. Cependant quoique cette erreur populaire nous serve de guide dans l'histoire, c'est toujours une erreur. Si la quantité d'or et d'argent dans un pays augmente de dix fois, toutes les commodités de la vie hausseront d'autant, et ce peuple se trouvera dans le même état qu'auparavant. Ce n'est pas que les princes ayent tort de s'intéresser un peu à cette richesse numéraire. Un particulier

particulier est riche par la proportion de ses revenus avec ceux de ses concitoyens. Une société s'est comparée à ses voisins, et dans les conjonctures où leurs intérêts réciproques les unissent ou les divisent, les trésors tiendront souvent lieu de forces. Ils soudoyeront les troupes des nations plus belliqueuses et plus pauvres. Leurs possesseurs s'en serviront dans leurs guerres et dans leurs négociations. Ces dépenses, il est vrai, feront sortir cet argent de leur pays, et les réduiront bientôt au niveau de leurs voisins: mais aussi s'ils ont su profiter du moment de leur supériorité ils sont devenus leurs maîtres. Je ne connois que la Chine qui ait fermée ses mines d'argent. La raison en est sensible, et fait l'éloge de ce peuple de législateurs. Isolée dans l'univers, la Chine ignore la richesse relative et le commerce étranger. L'augmentation ou la diminution des métaux n'intéressent nullement le commerce intérieur et les arts.

On compare l'or et l'argent avec les objets de sa dépense. On les compare encore entr'eux, pour fixer leur valeur proportionnelle. En Angleterre et en Espagne, cette proportion est d'un à quinze. En France et dans le reste de l'Europe d'un à quatorze et demi. Parmi les anciens la proportion la plus commune étoit celle d'un à un. Ces variations arrêtent, dès le premier pas, quiconque veut fixer les monnoies des anciens d'une manière raisonnée. Nous exprimons le prix de toutes les marchandises par une quantité déterminée d'or ou d'argent. Comment exprimerons-nous la valeur de ces minéraux? La déduire de leur proportion, n'est qu'un cercle vicieux qui n'instruit point. Prendrons-nous l'expression de cette valeur comme elle est fixée parmi nous? Ce seront au moins des idées connues. Mais alors de quel point doit-on partir? Si nous prenons l'or, l'argent calculé en proportion décimale vaudra plus que chez nous. Si c'est l'argent, l'or vaudra moins. En un mot l'argent étoit-il plus rare chez les anciens, ou l'or étoit-il plus commun que chez nous? Dans l'incertitude il faudroit se déterminer pour l'argent; et le compter au taux qui a lieu parmi nous. Ce métal a toujours entré dans le commerce comme moyen principal, pendant que l'or n'a souvent été considéré que comme une marchandise précieuse. Mais j'aimerois encore mieux embrasser ce parti par raison que par nécessité. Le champ est vaste, nos connoissances légères; la comparaison ne peut être que vague; cependant, je ne crains pas de l'ébaucher. 1. L'Afrique doit renfermer dans son sein des trésors immenses. Le pays le plus fécond en or que nous connoissons, c'est la Guinée. Mais enfin la jalousie des natifs nous a interdit l'approche des mines; nous recueillons dans les rivières et sur le bord de la mer les paillettes d'or que les torrens des montagnes ont entrainées dans leur course. Nous y puisons des richesses immenses. Les anciens ignoroient cette côte, mais sur celle de Sofala à l'orient de l'Afrique, ils avoient des mines aujourd'hui perdues ou épuisées. Salomon, roi des Juifs, en tira dans une seule année 666 talens d'or. Un poëte eût dit de l'ancienne Arabie qu'elle n'étoit qu'un morceau d'or massif. Un historien exact nous nous apprend que l'or y étoit commun à un tel point, qu'il étoit à l'argent comme deux à un, et comme trois à un au fer. Mais l'Amérique—ne devons-nous pas nos vices et nos richesses à Colomb? Il est vrai: tous les autres pays doivent le céder au nouveau monde pour les mines d'argent; mais pour celles d'or l'Afrique l'emporte de beaucoup. Tel est au moins le sentiment d'Acoste, observateur savant et laborieux. Acoste vécut avant la découverte des mines du Brésil, mais celles-ci l'ont été depuis trop peu de tems, pour avoir encore changé le système des espèces en Europe. Si nous arrêtons la vue sur les extrémités de l'orient nous verrons que l'Inde enrichissoit les anciens, autant qu'elle nous appauvrit. Les Persans et les Grecs de la Bactriane, par les conquêtes et par le commerce, s'attiroient les trésors que la nature avoit prodigués à ses foibles habitans. Ces nations voisines avoient des besoins mutuels, et les espèces passoient chez la plus industrieuse. Ce commerce maritime si lucratif à quelques uns, mais si fatal à nos richesses, n'a commencé que sous les Ptolémées; les Romains en ont senti les effets; mais les poisons lents ne détruisent le tempérament que peu-à-peu; le nôtre le seroit déjà, si le midi et l'occident ne réparoient pas en partie ce que l'orient engloutit.

A juger sur cet exposé, les avantages paroissent balancés; on décideroit volontiers que nous recevons plus d'or et que les anciens dépensoient moins. Mais nous avons oublié une circonstance qui fait pencher la balance de leur côté. Dans le travail ingrat et difficile des mines, ce n'est point

la

la même chose de les aller chercher sous un ciel étranger ou chez un peuple barbare, et de les posséder au cœur de sa patrie. Nos climats étoient autrefois remplis d'or. La terre, les rivières nous en prodiguoient à pleines mains. A présent nous n'en avons point. Le Tage n'est plus un fleuve d'or que pour les poëtes. Nous chercherions vainement en Espagne et en France ces mines dont les Lusitaniens et les Astures tiroient chaque année vingt mille livres d'or, et qui remplirent le trésor sacré de Thoulouse de cent mille livres d'or. Une seule mine dans la Dalmatie rendoit jour par jour cinquante livres d'or, ou par année dix-huit mille deux cens cinquante. Le seul travail de quelques mines en Lydie avoit valu à Pythias quatre millions de dariques. La magnificence des anciens en ouvrages d'or est encore une preuve de leur richesse. Je n'en donnerai qu'un exemple; je le puise chez Diodore de Sicile, dont on n'a jamais soupçonné ni le jugement ni la fidélité. Dans une tour du temple de Belus à Babylone, l'on voyoit les statues de Jupiter, de Junon, et de Rhéé avec un grand attirail, le tout d'or massif, et du poids de 6360 talens Babyloniens, ou de trois cens quatre-vingt-un mille six cens livres pesantes.* Ces trésors, et tant d'autres enfouis depuis dans ce

* Voyez la description détaillée de ces trésors chez Diodore de Sicile, l. ii. c. 9. Les 6360 talens d'or font, suivant la proportion ancienne, 16,204,900*l.* monnoie d'Angleterre, ou 381,600,000*l.* argent de France. Suivant les proportions modernes ce seroit 24,307,350*l.* de celle-là, et 553,320,000*l.* de celui-ci.

temple

temple depuis bien des siècles, sortirent enfin pour animer la circulation. Xerxes, à son retour de la Grèce, enleva toutes ces offrandes, et par un revers moins étrange chez les anciens que chez nous, la société s'enrichit au dépens de la superstition : car les anciens, peu conséquens dans leurs dévotions, élevoient des temples d'une main et les pilloient de l'autre. Plus d'un riche dans l'antiquité eût pu répondre avec le vétéran d'Auguste, " Seigneur, vous voyez ma fortune, elle étoit autrefois la jambe de la Déesse Anaitis."

II. Envisageons les richesses des anciens sous un autre point de vue, nous nous affermirons dans nos premiers sentimens. Si la différence de la proportion venoit de la rareté d'argent parmi eux, nous sommes plus riches d'or d'un tiers ; si la grande quantité d'or y donnoit lieu, les anciens l'étoient d'autant. Un homme instruit dans l'antiquité adoptera sans balancer la dernière des alternatives, et c'est avec plaisir que je vois les idées du savant Prideaux si conformes aux miennes.* Parcourons

* Peut-être que quelqu'un, frappé des sommes dont je vais parler, croira que sans choix et sans critique, j'ai ramassé tout ce qui pouvoit rélever les richesses de l'antiquité : il se tromperoit. Lorsque dans les grands empires, dans les pays riches par le commerce ou par les mines, je vois des trésors immenses, j'aime mieux expliquer mes auteurs que de les contredire. Mais le trésorier même de David ne me persuaderoit jamais que son maître enleva des villages des Philistins et des Moabites cent mille talens d'or et un million de talens d'argent (870,000,000 livres sterling) ; et l'autorité d'un Zonare, Grec du Bas Empire, ne m'engageroit jamais à croire que le trésor de Constantinople renfermoit 200,000 talens d'or (502,600,000 livres sterling.)

quelquelques exemples qui nous fassent sentir combien il avoit raison. Les richesses que Kouli-Khan trouva dans les Indes, ce gouffre de notre argent, n'approchoient point de celles que Cyrus, vainqueur de l'Asie et le prince le plus généreux de son tems, emporta des pays conquis; celles-ci montoient à trente-trois mille livres d'or et à cinq cens mille talens d'argent, sans compter des pierreries et des meubles précieux d'une valeur immense. Ses successeurs imitèrent sa magnificence mieux que ses vertus. Alexandre trouva dans les trésors de la Perse cent quatre-vingt mille talens. Son père avoit joui d'un revenu de mille talens; lui, à sa mort, en tiroit de son empire trois cens mille. Avant les conquêtes de Pompée, il y avoit dans le trésor de Rome, un million neuf cens vingt mille huit cens vingt-neuf livres pesantes d'or. Antoine tira dans une seule année deux cens mille talens de cette Asie déjà épuisée par les exactions de Brutus et de Cassius. Je ne m'arrêterois point aux fortunes des particuliers. L'argent peut être plus rassemblé sans être plus commun. Mais le prix des marchandises est plus décisif. Les instrumens du luxe étoient fort chers. Les Rhodiens achetèrent d'Appelle un portrait d'Alexandre peint en Jupiter pour vingt talens d'or. Un autre peintre refusa soixante talens pour un de ses tableaux. Le cheval Bucéphale en coûta treize à Philippe, et Daphnis le grammairien fut vendu pour sept cens mille sesterces. Mais il vaut mieux aller droit à la plus sûre épreuve, au prix du bled, denrée également nécessaire à tous les hommes. M. Arbuthnot, not, par une induction claire mais ingénieuse, l'a trouvé considérablement plus cher à Rome du tems de Pline qu'il n'est aujourd'hui à Londres.

III. Posons un rapport établi. Les deux membres de la proportion s'approchent quand le plus haut descend ou que le plus bas monte; ils s'éloignent quand le plus haut monte ou que le plus bas descend. Rendez l'or plus commun ou l'argent plus rare, vous diminuez leur proportion; multipliez l'argent, ou rendez l'or plus rare, vous l'augmentez cette proportion. La proportion étoit changée sous le règne de Justinien au cinquième siècle après Jésus Christ. Son époque nous dévoilera le motif qui la produisit, et la raison de cette révolution nous instruira de la constitution primitive. Le rapport de deux métaux passa d'un à dix à un à quatorze et deux-tiers, rapport qui subsista jusqu'à notre tems avec peu de variation. Ce changement n'a point découlé de l'augmentation d'argent dans l'empire. Les barbares du nord et de l'orient, depuis un siècle, désoloient les provinces, éteignoient le commerce et l'industrie, et laissoient perdre les mines. Celles d'Espagne, les plus riches de toutes, disparurent à la conquête des Visigoths. Nous découvrons donc que la disette d'or a dû faire naître ce changement. Il n'y a point de troisième parti. L'or étoit donc plus commun avant l'établissement de ce rapport, qui subsiste encore, qu'il ne l'est aujourd'hui.

Nos recherches sont assez exactes; cependant toutes, mais surtout la dernière, n'excluent point l'hypothèse. L'or étoit plus commun autrefois, mais mais l'étoit-il précisément d'un tiers? Les causes délicates qui peuvent agir à notre insçu m'empêchent de répondre.

VI.

Nous venons de voir des métaux tirés du sein de la terre, pour acquérir une valeur qu'ils n'avoient point auparavant. Les combinaisons de cette valeur avec leurs proportions mutuelles sont des idées trop déliées pour ne pas souvent nous échapper. Des arrangemens ordonnés pour le bien de la société viennent encore épaisser le nuage. On a craint que dans ce commerce difficile la bonne-foi ne fût à tout moment la dupe de la supercherie. C'est pourquoi dans tous les pays on a confié aux chefs de la société le soin des monnoies. Frappées par leur ordre, et portant l'empreinte de leur autorité, la communauté se rend garant de leur valeur, et le plus ignorant les reçoit sans scrupule et sans examen.

Le travail des mines dégage l'or et l'argent de tout mélange étranger: celui de la monnoie leur en rend. On a vu que ces métaux, dans leur pureté, étoient trop maniables et trop foibles pour résister long-tems aux injures auxquelles leur destination les exposoit. Mais quoique cette réflexion ait agi sur tous les peuples qui ont battu de la monnoie, elle n'a pas cependant agi d'une manière semblable. Le titre des espèces (c'est ainsi qu'on appelle le dégré de leur pureté) varie à chaque souveraineté. Ce n'est point donc assez de connoître le poids d'une monnoie ancienne. Si l'on ignore son titre on n'aura que des idées bien imparfaites de sa valeur. C'est aussi à quoi il faut se borner pour les espèces des anciens. Les auteurs nous instruisent peu, et soit disette de monumens soit faute de s'en servir, les antiquaires de notre siècle ne nous donnent pas assez de lumières pour nous empêcher de regretter ce silence. On sait en général que les monnoies d'or étoient d'une plus grande pureté que les nôtres, et les monnoies d'argent d'un plus bas titre. Les médailles Grecques d'Alexandre sont de vingt-trois carats seize grains, les dariques de vingt-trois carats. Dans un aureus de l'empereur Vespasien les orfèvres de Paris n'ont trouvé qu'un 788^{me} d'alloi. Les affineurs préfèrent cet or à l'or du ducat, et pensent que c'est le moindre alliage avec lequel on puisse battre la monnoie. Sous le Bas Empire les médailles d'or se ressentent de leur siècle. Les Romains ont quelquefois fait frapper des espèces d'argent assez fines. Le Père Bouteroue examina un denier d'un si haut titre que le marc n'auroit eu que 5 grains ou un 921^{me} d'alloi. Mais aussi nous savons que le tribun Drusus, ce charlatan politique qui perdit la république et lui-même parcequ'il promettoit tout et ne pouvoit rien tenir, que ce Drusus mêla un huitième d'alloi avec l'argent. Ce sont deux extrêmes, mais où trouver le milieu? et quand nous le trouverions, comment régler les monnoies d'argent des Grecs et des Orientaux? Nous ignorons entièrement leur titre. Dans cette incertitude, nous ne pouvons que supposer les monnoies des anciens du même titre que les nôtres.

ignore

tres. Mais cette supposition, toute nécessaire qu'elle est, peut être éloignée de la vérité. Tout ce que nous pouvons faire c'est de calculer au moins les monnoies d'or suivant leur titre. J'en ai fait deux tables, l'une où je suis autant qu'il m'est possible cette méthode. Les curieux m'en sauront gré. J'en ai construites autres suivant le premier principe. Une petite erreur vaut mieux qu'une totale ignorance.

Le sceau de l'autorité publique, qui détermine le prix d'une monnoie, ne peut jamais s'étendre plus loin que cette autorité elle-même. En deça de la frontière, on l'échange sans difficulté pour des marchandises ou pour d'autres monnoies avec lesquelles on connoît sa proportion. Au delà de la frontière, elle n'est plus qu'une pièce d'or ou d'argent, dont il faut éprouver le poids et le titre pour déterminer sa proportion avec les monnoies courantes de cet autre état, et la raison veut que, dans un pays où, destituée du sceau de l'autorité, il est libre à chacun de la rejetter, elle soit appréciée un peu plus bas que sa valeur réelle. Les banquiers, qui se sont appropriés ce genre de commerce, ont senti combien il leur importoit de baisser la valeur des monnoies étrangères, et cette règle, poussée jusqu'aux finesses les plus recherchées, les conduit à de gros profits. Le langage de l'échange a pu donc égaler des espèces que les monnoyeurs avoient frappé très inégales, et ce langage, vrai pour les auteurs qui s'en sont servis, mais trompeur pour nous, nous tend un piège dont il est difficile de se démêler. Eclairé cependant par un foible rayon de lumière, j'entrevois que dans les pays éloignés l'un de l'autre, qui n'ont que peu de communication, tout est permis aux banquiers. L'éloignement annéantit ce reste de confiance, que l'empreinte du prince ne peut qu'inspirer, et les peuples s'inquiètent peu d'une perte sensible mais rare. Le shekel, égal à l'ancienne tétradrachme de Solon, pesoit 316 grains; cependant du tems de Josèphe, il ne valoit que la tétradrachme nouvelle de 300 grains. Mais c'est avec regret que je vois expliquer l'égalité de la drachme et du denier de la même manière. Les tributs portoient tous les ans à Rome des sommes immenses. Des chevaliers affermissoient ces tributs, et leurs oppressions faisoient détester aux nations l'empire des Romains.* S'ils égaloient la drachme au denier, ils y gagnoient un seizième. Les banquiers de Rome, dont le négoce étoit lié intimément avec le leur, en s'unissant aux fermiers, travailloient à la fois pour eux-

de

* Pompée comptoit que l'Asie propre, ou celle que les Romains possédoient avant ses conquêtes, rendoit toutes les années à la république, cinq mille myriades de drachmes (1,708,333 liv. st. 13*s.* 4*d.*) Les partisans l'avoient affermi à ce prix. Mais ces peuples, foulés par leurs exactions, demandèrent à Jules César la grace de pouvoir payer un tribut réglé de vingt-mille talens (4,100,000 liv. sterl.) Cependant, sans parler de la différence énorme des deux sommes, un tribut réglé qu'il faut payer à tout événement est toujours plus onéreux que des dîmes sur le bled et les pâturages, des droits d'entrée et de sortie, qui ne peuvent croitre qu'avec les richesses du peuple. Tout un plaidoyer de Cicéron ne concluroit pas autant contre les maltôtiers Romains que ce petit fait. V. Lips. de Magnitud. Roman. L. ii. c. 2. p. 42, 43, 44.

mêmes et pour l'ordre.* Il est donc très possible que les Grecs ayent pu gémir quelque peu de tems sous ce fardeau ; mais plus il étoit onéreux, moins il put subsister. Les Grecs avoient entre les mains un remède sûr et aisé : parmi quelques autres vestiges de leur antique liberté, ils possédoient encore le droit de battre la monnoie, privilège dont les anciens n'étoient pas aussi jaloux que nous. Les cabinets des curieux sont remplis de médailles d'Athènes, de Sparte, &c. frappées sous les empereurs. Il faudroit supposer à ces peuples spirituels une stupidité sans exemple, si nous ne pensions pas qu'ils réduisirent alors le poids de leur drachme et la rendirent en effet égale au denier qu'ils n'abandonnèrent pas, même quand les princes n'en battoient plus que des huitièmes de l'once Romaine.†

Voilà des difficultés qui nous embarrassent, mais dont nous aurions tort de nous plaindre. L'intérêt de la société doit l'emporter sur celui de notre curiosité. Mais l'usage de donner aux monnoies

* Hæc fides atque hæc ratio pecuniarum, quæ Romæ, quæ in foro versatur, implicita est cum illis pecuniis Asiaticis, et cohæret. Ruere illa non possunt, ut hæc non eodem labefactatu motû concidant. Cicero. pro Lege Maniliâ, c. 9.

† Je m'en tiendrois volontiers à cette explication. Cependant si quelqu'un me diroit que ce ne fut pas les Grecs qui imitèrent les Romains, mais ceux-ci qui suivirent l'exemple des Grecs, je n'aurois rien à lui répliquer. Les Romains empruntèrent tant des Grecs, que si la drachme Attique avoit perdu de son poids dès la mort d'Alexandre, il étoit très naturel de battre les deniers après ce modèle.

des

des noms différens de leur poids, produit un embarras racheté par nulle utilité. Pourquoi ne pas dire tant d'onces d'or ou d'argent, au lieu de tant de guinées ou d'écus? La difficulté de ces noms se fait surtout sentir dans les réductions des monnoies anciennes aux nôtres. Comme celles-ci varient continuellement, la plus grande attention suffit à peine pour nous garantir de l'erreur. Un savant du siècle passé me dit que le talent vaut trois mille livres; si je ne me rappelle pas en quelle année il a écrit, et que par une recherche très difficile je ne m'instruise pas combien la livre valoit alors, je risquerai de la confondre avec celle d'aujourd'hui. C'est aussi ce qu'on a souvent fait. M. de Voltaire reproche avec raison à quelques auteurs d'avoir par cette bévue diminué les espèces anciennes de la moitié. Je ne m'en étonne pas beaucoup. C'étoient des savans, qui connoissoient à fonds les usages de tous les pays, hormis les leurs. Mais que M. l'Abbé d'Olivet, précepteur d'un grand prince, dans un ouvrage destiné pour les gens du monde, ait ignoré que les espèces avoient haussé de valeur depuis le tems de Gassendi!—il me paroît vraiment singulier. Dans un pays aussi inconstant que la France, il faudroit réformer ses calculs huit ou dix fois dans un siècle. C'est un avantage des gouvernemens moins despotiques, de n'être pas aussi sujets à ces changemens, toujours pernicieux quand ils ne sont pas absolument nécessaires. La Reine Elizabeth fixa la livre d'argent à soixante-deux chelins; ce fut au commencement de son règne.* Vers ce tems le marc valoit en France quinze livres. La livre Angloise n'a point changé de valeur numéraire. Le marc vaut aujourd'hui cinquante livres de compte.

Dans les tables qu'on verra à la fin, on a calculé les monnoies suivant ces principes. On connoît leurs poids, on sait ce que vaut parmi nous un tel poids d'or ou d'argent. Dès lors l'opération ne souffre plus de difficulté. Mais on auroit tort de regarder les deux derniers chapitres comme un hors-d'oeuvre, parcequ'on les chercheroit vainement dans les autres traités sur ce sujet. Ce n'a été qu'à l'aide des ces principes que nous sommes parvenus à des connoissances raisonnées, les seules dignes de ceux qui ne pensent pas que l'étude de l'antiquité ne consiste qu'à entasser des citations sans bornes et sans critique.

VII.

Dans la plûpart des pays, nous n'avons besoin de faire attention qu'à l'or et à l'argent. Ces deux métaux constituent seuls le revenu des états et la fortune des particuliers. Si le cuivre est quelquefois employé, c'est dans ces détails nécessaires

* V. Hume's History of England, tom. ii. Sous Edouard I. la livre d'argent étoit égale à la livre de compte et valoit 20 chelins; sous Edouard III. elle en valoit 22½ et ensuite 25; sous Henri V. 30; sous Henri VI. 37; sous Richard III. et Henri VII. 37½; sous Henri VIII. 45 et ensuite 48; sous Edouard VI. 72; sous la Reine Marie 60; sous Elizabeth 60 et peu après 62. V. le Chronicon Pretiosum de Fleetwood, en Anglois, p. 41, 42, 43.

mais

mais méprisables, dont on doit s'occuper dans le moment, et les oublier pour toujours. Ce n'est que dans l'enfance de la république Romaine, que ces espèces méritent quelques égards. Elle n'en connoissoit point d'autres; et comme toutes les dépenses publiques se calculoient en monnoie de cuivre, il nous importe de la connoître. A l'an de Rome 485, lorsqu'on frappa sa première monnoie d'argent, le denier valoit dix as. On a vu que le denier pesoit un septième d'once ou un quatre-vingt-quatrième de la livre Romaine. L'as étoit alors la livre Romaine elle-même. L'argent étoit au cuivre comme 840 à un. Cette proportion, huit fois aussi grande que celle qui a été établie depuis plusieurs siècles, nous fait renouveller notre question, D'où venoit-elle? L'argent étoit-il huit fois plus rare ou le cuivre huit fois plus commun que de notre tems? Duquel ferons-nous la base de nos calculs? La plûpart des auteurs ont préféré l'argent. Cependant le plus léger examen nous fera sentir que cette singulière proportion découloit de la disette de l'argent, plutôt que de l'abondance du cuivre. Quels vestiges de ces mines de cuivre qui rendoient l'Italie huit fois plus riche en ce métal que ne le sont l'Allemagne ou la Suède? Leur mémoire seroit-elle périe avec elles? Mais si même on le supposoit assez commun en Italie, une petite partie passoit à la monnoie. Le cuivre servoit alors à mille usages, auxquels on a depuis employé le fer et l'acier. Les armes étoient de cuivre dans les premiers siècles, et quoique les Dactyles eussent trouvé d'assez bonneheure l'art de travailler le fer, tous les héros d'Homère combattent revêtus de cuivre; les instrumens d'agriculture, les ornemens des temples n'étoient que de ce métal. De l'autre côté, la seule circonstance que les Romains n'ont pas frappé de l'argent pendant près de cinq siècles, prouve assez qu'ils en avoient fort peu. En effet leurs bons auteurs nous apprennent que l'or et l'argent n'étoient pour ces premiers Romains que des marchandises étrangères que le luxe naissant achetoit à un haut prix. C'est pourquoi quand nous trouvons chez ce peuple une livre de cuivre évitons l'écueil commun de l'évaluer comme la 840^{me} partie d'une livre d'argent, mais apprécions cette livre d'argent comme huit cens quarante livres de cuivre. Quand l'argent des provinces commençoit à effacer dans Rome tous les vestiges de l'ancienne pauvreté, le denier valoit seize onces de cuivre. La proportion étoit de cent douze à un, proportion peu différente de la nôtre. Calculons donc la livre de cuivre comme égale en valeur aux trois quarts d'un denier ou à 56¼ grains d'argent. Dans le cens qu'établit Servius Tullius, cent mille livres de cuivre donnoient au citoyen qui les possédoit une place parmi les premiers de la république. Ces cent mille livres de cuivre font, suivant l'évaluation ordinaire, huit mille cent quarante livres Tournoises, mais suivant la nôtre soixante-un mille cinquante. Je crains ici que la conclusion ne fasse rejetter le principe par ceux qui ne connoissent l'histoire Romaine que dans les abrégés. Ils ne croiront point sans doute qu'il y eut alors à Rome des particuliers aussi riches.

riches. Mais j'ai toujours pensé qu'on abaissoit trop les premiers siècles de Rome, pour rehausser l'éclat des derniers. Mon soupçon est appuyé par les monumens publics, les plus sûrs indices de la richesse d'une nation. Dans le siècle d'Auguste on contemploit avec plaisir tous les ouvrages de ce règne glorieux, mais c'étoient vers les cloaques de Servius Tullius, vers l'aqueduc et le chemin du censeur Appius, que les yeux se tournoient qui cherchoient à connoître la puissance et l'industrie des Romains. Quoiqu'il en soit, il faut réformer nos idées sur les faits et non point les faits sur nos idées. Un exemple nous fera sentir la nécessité de sortir du sentier battu. Supposons l'Angleterre riche en argent, comme elle est aujourd'hui, mais épuisée de la plus grande partie de son or, le peu de celui-ci qui y restât ou qu'on transportât des autres pays, hausseroit aussitôt de prix, et au lieu de quinze à un, deviendroit peut-être cent à un. Qu'un François dans ces circonstances dise, l'or dans mon pays vaut tant, l'argent en Angleterre vaut cent fois moins que l'or, donc je dois compter tout cet argent à raison d'un centième de l'or; qu'il le dise, et il dira mal. L'argent des Anglois porté hors de leur pays conservera son égalité avec la même quantité d'argent chez un autre peuple. Sa valeur proportionnelle disparoîtra; les Anglois ne sentiront leur infériorité que par le commerce de l'or qu'on leur apporte, ou la balance ne sera pas pour eux. Cet exemple conclu plus que la plûpart, parceque les objets qu'on a comparés sont précisément semblables.

En luttant avec les nations pauvres qui les entouroient, les Romains se préparoient à des triomphes plus brillans. Les Grecs, les Gaulois, les Carthaginois apportoient leurs trésors aux pieds du sénat. L'ancienne proportion de l'argent au cuivre devenoit vicieuse, mais au lieu de baisser la valeur de l'argent on haussa celle du cuivre. La nécessité avoit plus de part à cette démarche que la raison. La première guerre Punique, où il falloit entretenir des armées hors de l'Italie, avoit endetté l'état. On respectoit la foi publique, dont il falloit remplir les obligations, mais l'on respectoit aussi les droits d'un peuple épuisé, qu'on ne pouvoit pas accabler d'impôts. Le sénat aima mieux diminuer le poids de la monnoie. L'as étoit la livre de cuivre. Il le réduisit à deux onces; et par cette opération violente mais nécessaire, les créanciers de la république perdirent cinq parties sur six de l'argent qu'ils lui avoient prêté; mais bien différens de leurs neveux, dont Horace célèbre l'arithmétique, ces vieux guerriers ne s'apperçurent pas peut-être du changement. Ils avoient reçu leur dette en as; comment examiner si la valeur étoit la même?

Quarante-sept ans après, Hannibal fit sentir aux Romains qu'il n'y avoit plus d'Alpes. Soudoyer à la fois cent mille hommes en Italie, en Sicile, et en Espagne, c'étoit un effort que le zèle des citoyens rendoit plus facile, mais qui entraîna bientôt une nouvelle réduction de l'as. On ne le frappa plus que du poids d'une once. Mais le denier, qui ne valoit que dix as, tomboit alors trop bas, et l'augmentation mentation de l'argent toute grande qu'elle étoit n'y suffisoit plus. En réduisant donc l'as à une once de cuivre, on augmenta la valeur numéraire du denier à seize as. Ce denier valoit seize once de cuivre au lieu de vingt, et pendant qu'on diminuoit de la moitié la monnoie de cuivre, celle d'argent ne perdit qu'un cinquième de sa valeur.

Un grand nom m'arrête ici. Quand M. de Montesquieu me dépeint cette double opération, comme rétablissant la fortune de l'état, sans bouleverser celle des citoyens, il m'est aussi impossible de souscrire à son sentiment, qu'il m'est doux d'admirer ses talens. Toute réduction des monnoies est un soulagement pour les débiteurs et une perte pour les créanciers. Dans celle-ci, ceux qui prêtoient du cuivre pour en recevoir, perdoient la moitié, ceux qui devoient recevoir l'argent pour du cuivre ne perdoient qu'un cinquième. Mais rien ne les eût pu faire penser à cette stipulation que la connoissance du changement qu'on alloit faire. De tels secrets ne se confient pas au corps d'un peuple.

L'an de Rome 587, on réduisit l'as au poids d'une demie-once. Le motif et le détail de cette opération nous sont inconnus. Ce ne fut point la nécessité. Paul Emile venoit de conquérir la Macédoine, et les richesses qu'il y trouva avoient affranchi les Romains de la capitation. Mais le poids d'une monnoie dès lors reléguée aux plus bas détails paroissoit encore incommode, et on le méprisa trop pour changer sa proportion avec le denier qui valoit toujours seize as. J'imiterai l'exemple des Romains ; et quoique la valeur de l'as tomboit avec avec son poids, je calculerai ceux d'une demie-once sur le même pied que ceux d'une once. Nous craindrions de faire des opérations aussi brusques que celles dont j'ai parlé, mais aussi dans la situation de la république tout l'invitoit aux entreprises les plus hardies. Ce peuple-roi vouloit régner ou périr. Point de milieu. Si Carthage succomboit, l'or et l'argent faisoient disparoître le cuivre. Il importoit peu qu'on eût diminué cette monnoie. Si les Africains l'emportoient; privés d'empire et de liberté tout devenoit indifférent aux Romains, la plûpart n'auroient pas survécu à leur humiliation, ou auroient couru la cacher dans quelque pays encore libre.

Je ne saurois finir sans remarquer l'esprit citoyen des sénateurs Romains. Ils se prêtèrent sans difficulté à ces arrangemens si destructeurs à leurs intérêts. Presque les seuls créanciers, ils subissoient toute la perte de ces réductions. D'ailleurs elles détruisoient peu à peu la constitution aristocratique des comices. Comme la fortune requise pour la première classe demeuroit toujours fixée à cent mille as, on dut y voir parvenir un grand nombre, qui, si les espèces s'étoient soutenus sur l'ancien pied, auroient encore rampé au dernier rang des derniers citoyens.

VIII.

Des empreintes sur les monnoies.

Le poids et le titre d'une monnoie en constituent la valeur; mais c'est l'empreinte que le magistrat y fait graver qui fait connoître aux peuples cette valeur, qui en est la preuve et le gage. Les rois y ont mis leurs têtes, les républiques ont choisi les têtes têtes des divinités qu'elles honoroient plus particulièrement, ou quelque symbole relatif à leur situation et à leurs exploits. La science des médailles ne s'occupe que de cette connoissance. Là, c'est l'objet principal et remplit des volumes entiers; ici, elle n'est qu'un accessoire qui mérite cependant que j'en dise quelques mots.

Les Persans gravoient sur leurs dariques un archer; ce peuple guerrier, qui dut ses conquêtes à sa simplicité, et son luxe à ses conquêtes, n'apprenoit dans sa jeunesse que trois choses, à monter à cheval, à tirer de l'arc, et à dire la vérité. Les rhéteurs Grecs se sont fort égayés de cette empreinte, et dans le tems que le grand roi achetoit les républiques qu'il ne pouvoit vaincre, ils nous ont décrit ces archers comme le corps le plus redoutable de l'armée Persanne. Les Persans.

Minerve, avec tous ses attributs, l'égide, l'olivier, et la chouette, ornoit les médailles Athéniennes. La chouette surtout en faisoit la marque distinctive. Jupiter y étoit quelquefois associé avec Minerve; et le bœuf, vestige des richesses primitives, n'en disparut que fort tard. Les Athéniens perdirent leur liberté longtems avant leur fierté. Ils étoient les esclaves les plus soumis des Romains, cependant ils ne voulurent jamais graver sur leurs monnoies la tête de l'empereur. Les Athéniens.

Les Spartiates témoignèrent sur les médailles combien ils se croyoient honorés d'avoir eu pour citoyens, Castor and Pollux. Alcide, le père de leurs rois, armé de sa massue et revêtu de sa peau de lion, nous épouvante encore sur le bronze. Les Lacédémoniens.

Comme

Comme la vertu étoit plus considérée à Sparte que les titres, nous trouvons sur leurs monnoies Lycurgue, mais pas un de leurs rois.

Les Béotiens mirent sur leurs monnoies la coupe de Bacchus ; les habitans de Chios la tête d'Homère ; les Corcyriens une galère à trois rangs de rames dont ils étoient les inventeurs. Les Carthaginois y gravèrent la tête de Didon, et ce cheval dont la tête déterrée dans les fondemens de Carthage annonçoit sa grandeur future. Philippe et Alexandre choisirent pour l'empreinte de leurs monnoies, un char à quatre chevaux, et pour le revers eux-mêmes assis sur le trône et tenant un oiseau à la main. Les habitans de l'île de Ténédos y gravèrent deux têtes accolées, et sur le revers une hache. En voici l'origine. Ténès, roi de l'île, avoit permis à ses sujets de tuer les adultères à coups de hache. On vint lui annoncer qu'on avoit surpris son fils coupable de ce crime : Qu'on exécute ma sentence, répondit-il ; pendant que j'ai des sujets il me reste assez d'enfans. Son peuple sur les monnoies, et dans ses temples, immortalisèrent ce père qui avoit fait céder la nature à la justice.

Sous la république Romaine la tête de Janus paroissoit sur la monnoie de cuivre : l'on avoit peut-être choisi cette divinité comme inventeur reconnu de la monnoie, peut-être aussi ne devoit-il ce titre qu'à l'ancienne coutume de frapper la monnoie à son empreinte. La proue d'un vaisseau distinguoit le revers de l'as. Les deniers étoient chargés d'un char à deux ou à quatre chevaux ; les plus anciens avoient les bords dentelés : les demidemi-deniers d'une victoire, d'où ils tiroient leurs noms de victoriati. Les particuliers n'osoient jamais graver leurs têtes sur la monnoie ; mais on ne défendoit pas aux monnoyeurs, jeunes gens de famille, d'y insérer les exploits de leurs ancêtres. Le mérite des vivans est odieux dans les républiques. Elles ne savent chérir la vertu que lorsqu'elle n'est plus à craindre. On pourroit appliquer la même réflexion aux princes, s'il est vrai qu'Auguste fit graver sur ses monnoies de cuivre la tête de ce Cicéron dont la mort le couvre d'un opprobre éternel. Le trait est singulier, mais pas plus que ces consécrations de princes que leurs assassins mettoient du nombre des dieux après les avoir ôtés de celui des hommes.

Les empereurs Romains jouissoient de tous les droits régaliens. Leurs monnoies étoient chargées de leurs têtes couronnées de lauriers, et ceintes de tous leurs titres, d'empereur, de consul, de pontife, de père de la patrie, de revêtu de la puissance tribunitienne, de vainqueur des Germains, des Parthes, &c. Le revers et l'inscription représentoit quelque action brillante du prince ; des nations subjuguées, des villes fondées, des édifices construits, des impôts remis. Ces médailles, dispersées par toute la terre, annonçoient aux peuples les vertus de l'empereur, ou l'adulation du sénat.

IX.

Ce n'étoit pas assez d'imposer aux monnoies des noms différens des poids et différens les uns des autres : on a inventé des monnoies de compte qui qui n'existoient que dans l'imagination de ceux qui s'en sont servis et l'on a employé ces combinaisons arbitraires presqu'à l'exclusion des espèces réelles.

Rien de plus simple que la manière de compter des Grecs. Leurs mines de cent drachmes, et leurs talens de soixante mines la forment presque toute entière. Ils avoient, il est vrai, leur calcul de myriades qui n'étoient point des multiples du talent; c'étoient des sommes de dix mille drachmes. Ainsi mille myriades étoient équivalentes à dix millions de drachmes.

Les anciens nous parlent d'un talent d'or en usage dans les siècles héroïques, mais qui ne paroît avoir aucun rapport avec les autres talens. Il ne valoit que trois pièces d'or, et au lieu de peser au moins treize livres, poids du moindre des talens, il ne pesoit guères plus d'une demie-once. Je serois tenté de croire que ce talent n'étoit que le talent de cuivre exprimé en or. Il valoit trois aurei ou six drachmes d'or, soixante drachmes d'argent suivant la proportion reconnue des anciens, et six mille drachmes de cuivre, comme l'argent a été assez généralement à ce dernier métal en raison de cent à un.

Trouvons-nous des vestiges de ce talent dans les écrits d'Homère. Tous les antiquaires s'offenseront de ce doute; ils les ont déjà vus. Je crois les avoir vus aussi bien qu'eux, mais j'ai vu aussi le vrai talent d'or. De petits esprits critiqueront Homère d'avoir employé le même mot pour rendre deux idées aussi différentes, mais je les renvoye aux commentateurs qui ont déjà fait sentir la beauté de de cette harangue de Nestor que ses soldats pouvoient prendre de quatre manières opposées.

I. Quand Achille propose des récompenses aux vainqueurs dans ses jeux, il étale un chaudron luisant, comme un prix supérieur à deux talens d'or, et ne met un demi-talent d'or qu'après un bœuf gras : un bœuf qui vaut plus de mille livres sterling ! Il est clair qu'Achille parle du petit talent dont la moitié est environ une guinée. Ici le raisonnement seroit déplacé, il seroit ridicule.

II. Mais quand les ambassadeurs d'Agamemnon cherchent à appaiser le courroux du fils de Pelée, qu'ils lui offrent des esclaves, de beaux chevaux, &c. ils y ajoutent dix talens d'or. Eustathius aura peine à me faire croire que ce beau présent du roi des rois consistoit en vingt-deux livres sterling. Achille se plaignoit qu'on lui avoit enlevé les dépouilles de vingt-trois villes qu'avoit soumi son bras. Ces villes étoient riches, car on voit que le luxe régnoit déjà en Asie. Avec quel mépris, avec quelle indignation n'eût il pas rejetté ce dédommagement ! Il est vrai qu'il le rejette, mais c'est en faisant céder son avarice à sa colère. Si le présent étoit de vingt-un mille sept cens cinquante livres sterling, la victoire en effet devoit lui coûter.

Les sesterces des Romains embarrassent toujours un commerçant. Effrayés de ce calcul où les quantités les plus éloignées ne sont distinguées que par la suppression d'un mot, ou par la légère différence d'une terminaison, il n'y voit que des paroles vuides de sens. Je sais que cette manière de compter ter est un peu composée, mais je crois qu'on ne doit pas imputer la plûpart de ses épines à ceux qui s'en sont servis mais à ceux qui l'ont expliqué. Quelques principes simples le mettront à la portée de tout le monde. De tant de secours que le jugement emprunte de la mémoire, il peut et il doit lui en rendre quelques uns. On se souvient toujours bien de ce qu'on a connu nettement.

I. Les Grecs, sans être algébristes, employoient un langage peu différent de celui de l'algèbre. Au lieu de deux talens et demi, ils disoient trois talens moins un demi, Δευτερον Ημιταλαντον ; au lieu de six talens et demi, sept talens moins un demi, et ainsi de suite. Les Romains adoptèrent cette coutume de bonne-heure, mais la bornèrent à un seul cas. Leur trois moins un demi s'exprimoit par tertius semis ou semis tertius, dont on fit bientôt par abbréviation sestertius. Ce sestertius se disoit de tout. Libra sestertia signifioit deux livres et demie, pes sestertius deux pieds et demi.

II. Dans le commencement de la république Romaine nous avons vu que le denier valoit dix as. Le quart du denier étoit donc de deux as et demi ou deux livres et demie de cuivre, voilà pourquoi on l'appelloit sestertuis, ou sestertius nummus, ou simplement nummus. Il valut dans la suite quatre as, mais le nom subsista comme à l'ordinaire, plus longtems que la raison du nom. L'abus fut moins grand, comme c'étoit l'as qu'on avoit diminué et non le sesterce. On exprimoit un nombre de ces sesterces par le pluriel sestertii, ou bien par sestertiûm en sous-entendant corpora ou capita.

III.

III. Outre la livre pondérale des Romains, ils avoient une livre de compte qu'ils appelloient pondo. Pour n'avoir pas fait cette distinction Budéé s'est imaginé que la livre Romaine contenoit cent deniers. Le pondo les contenoit en effet, et son égalité avec la mine nous fait croire que les Romains l'avoient composé pour rendre avec facilité les monnoies étrangères. Quand Plutarque parle du cartel établi dans la seconde guerre Punique, il fixe la rançon des prisonniers à deux cens cinquante drachmes ou deniers. Tite Live lui avoit appris qu'elle étoit deux pondo et demi d'argent. Ces deux pondo et demi faisoient en argent la libra sestertia, ou par excellence le sestertium. Comme il contenoit deux cens cinquante deniers, il étoit équivalent à mille sestertii, ou deux mille cinq cens livres de cuivre. Les Romains comptoient indifféremment par livres sesterces de cuivre et livres sesterces d'argent. Celle-ci valoit mille de celle-là. Le genre masculin distingue la première, nous reconnoissons la seconde au neutre.

IV. Les mots sont relatifs aux idées, et les idées aux besoins. On a connu des sauvages qui ne pouvoient compter que jusqu'à vingt. Leur langue ne leur fournissoit point d'expressions pour les nombres plus grands, mais c'étoit parceque celui-là suffiroit pour la chasse, la pèche, et leur manière de faire la guerre. La première classe des Romains ne possédoit que cent mille as: aussi les idées et les expressions de ce peuple se bornoient à ce nombre. Lorsque devenu plus riche il parvint à connoître et à posséder des sommes bien au delà, il ne savoit les exprimer qu'en multipliant des cens mille par un autre nombre, auquel il donnoit une terminaison adverbiale; decies centena millia sestertiûm signifioit un million de sesterces.

Il ne me reste que d'expliquer quelques marques et quelques abbréviations trop arbitraires pour se lier facilement avec ces principes.

I. LLS. II. HS H-S. sont les marques auxquelles nous reconnoissons le sestertius. Le sestertium est distingué dans les bons manuscrits par une ligne transversale, $\overline{\text{HS}}$. Quand vous trouvez un nombre quelconque avec cette ligne, sousentendez cent mille: $\overline{\text{DC}}$. HS. font sexcenties centena millia sestertiûm. Quand les nombres sont distingués dans plusieurs divisions, celle à la main droite signifie des nombres simples, la suivante des milliers, et la troisième autant de cent milles.

II. Notre langue, qui veut la clarté, condamne les suppressions de mots que les Romains, qui cherchoient la brièveté, admettoient sans scrupule. Ici il y en avoit deux. On omettoit le mot sestertii, parcequ'ils ne comptoient presque que de cette manière. Ils supprimoient centena millia, dont les nombres excédens n'étoient que les multiplications. Cherchons un exemple un peu compliqué: LXII. LXXV. CCCC. est équivalent à bis et sexagies centena millia, septuaginta et quinque millia, quadringenti sestertiûm, ou à six millions deux cens soixante-quinze mille quatre cens sesterces.

X. Le

X.

Le prodigue dissipe ses richesses, l'avare les enfouit, l'économe vit sans excéder le revenu de ses biens. C'est ce revenu que je veux examiner. Celui qui met son argent au six pour cent, est une fois plus riche que celui qui n'en tire que le trois. Cependant le fonds de tous les deux est le même. Voyons donc quel pouvoit être le revenu et la dépense d'un Romain, car je me bornerai à ce peuple, qui possédoit une telle somme. Ce n'est pas que nous puissions jamais apprécier au juste leur capital. Nous voyons parmi nous qu'il n'y a rien de plus vague que ces évaluations. En gros celles de la république me paroissent plus forts que la vérité, celles du tems des empereurs, plus foibles. Tout chef de parti doit être riche: mais souvent l'opinion de sa richesse lui suffit. Quelques largesses et des promesses immenses éblouissent ses partisans, et parmi les hommes corrompus l'espoir agit plus puissamment que la reconnoissance. Mais sous les meilleurs princes les richesses étoient un motif de soupçon, sous les tyrans un arrêt de mort. On s'en cachoit alors comme d'un crime.

L'intérêt se payoit, parmi les Romains, tous les mois. Un pour cent par mois, ou douze pour cent par année étoient l'intérêt qu'ils appelloient centesima. Cet un par mois se divisoit en fractions. Au lieu de dire six pour cent, on disoit un demi pour cent, usuræ semisses, &c. Les tribuns Duillius et Menenius déterminèrent l'intérêt légitime à douze pour cent; c'étoit à l'an 398: mais on le réduisit bientôt à la moitié, et l'an 413 on l'abolit entièrement. Depuis ce tems l'usure demeuroit condamnée et pratiquée à Rome; et comme les mœurs suppléent quelquefois aux loix l'intérêt de six pour cent passoit pour honnête et modique, pendant qu'on prodiguoit le nom odieux d'usuriers, à ceux qui, ne se contentant pas de ce profit, bravoient l'infamie pour le gain. Cette défense du prêt sur usure ne s'étendoit point toutefois aux provinces. Cicéron et Pline m'apprennent que dans la Bithynie et la Cilicie l'intérêt au douze pour cent étoit permis par les arrêts des proconsuls et des empereurs. Cependant cette usure, toute forte qu'elle étoit, n'assouvissoit pas l'avarice Romaine. Brutus avoit prêté deux millions cinq cens mille sesterces à la ville de Salamine en Cypre à quarante-huit pour cent; et cette malheureuse cité se trouvant dans l'impuissance de les payer, Scaptius, son fidèle émissaire, environna l'hôtel de ville d'un corps de cavalerie, et le tint assiégé jusqu'à faire périr de faim cinq de leurs sénateurs. Ce Stoïcien Brutus, qui assassina son bienfaiteur, le meilleur des maîtres, pour avoir osé gouverner une république qui ne pouvoit plus se gouverner elle-même, exerçoit sur les peuples le despotisme le plus dur et le plus injuste.

La grandeur de l'usure à Rome ne peut surprendre que ceux qui ne connoissent ni les hommes, ni les Romains. L'argent étoit englouti dans un petit nombre de mains. Ce peuple méprisoit le commerce, les revenus étoient affermis par des compagnies qui avoient un commun intérêt. Les dépouilles dépouilles des provinces enrichissoient quelques familles consulaires. Les esclaves des tyrans, monstres plus méprisables que les maltôtiers, et plus destructeurs que les conquérans, ne pouvoient souffrir des rivaux. Ainsi il y avoit peu de prêteurs à Rome. De-là, ceux qui avoient le monopole de ce commerce, étoient les maîtres de le faire aussi lucratif qu'ils vouloient. Les loix mêmes les engageoient à se dédommager, par le plus gros gain, du danger et de l'infamie qu'elles y attachoient. Le danger étoit grand, surtout dans les premiers tems, où leurs créanciers, c'est à dire le peuple, par un seul décret pouvoit rayer à jamais et l'intérêt et le principal.

L'intérêt de l'argent et le prix des terres gardent toujours un certain équilibre. Si l'intérêt est bas, il est plus avantageux d'acheter des fonds ; ceux-ci haussent de valeur. Si l'intérêt est fort, il est plus commode d'avoir des rentes; on réalise peu et les terres se donnent à vil prix. L'intérêt commun à Rome étoit de six pour cent;* un passage de Pline me fait voir que le prix d'achat pour les terres étoit au revenu comme cent à six. Ce bienfaiteur éclairé autant que généreux, voulant donner cinq cens mille sesterces à la ville de Como, aima mieux charger une de ses terres d'une rente perpétuelle de trente mille sesterces.

* Quelquefois l'on en tiroit beaucoup plus; mais aussi comme il n'y avoit point à Rome de fonds publics, il n'étoit pas toujours possible de faire travailler tout son argent. Il faut compenser l'un par l'autre.

Cependant sur ces six pour cent, j'aimerois assez diminuer un sixième; les palais, les meubles, les esclaves emportoient aux grands des sommes immenses qui ne rendoient rien.

XI.

Une carrière toute différente nous attend, et nous pourrions encore une fois simplifier nos idées. La connoissance des mesures a pour objet, aussi bien que la géométrie, les lignes droites. Mais dans la géométrie leurs propriétés abstraites nous intéressent. Ici la seule considération est celle de leur longueur.

Cette longueur n'est point arbitraire comme les poids. Les hommes sont assez généralement convenus de former leur mesures longues sur quelque division naturelle du corps humain. Quelques uns ont choisi le pied; d'autres ont préféré la coudée, et l'on ne doit imputer les légères différences des poids et des coudées respectives qu'à la manière dont on les a prises; ici on a cherché des hommes d'une taille demesurée, là on s'est attaché plutôt à la grandeur commune de l'espèce humaine. D'ailleurs la nature, en dispensant ses dons, n'a point accordé à tous les peuples la même taille. Le climat et les alimens agissent d'une manière lente mais puissante. Que les peuples du nord surpassent en grandeur ceux du midi, est une maxime mieux fondée que la plûpart des maximes générales. Les nations Celtiques ont toujours paru des géans aux peuples de la Grèce et de l'Italie, et nous, les descendans scendans de ces Celtes, citons avec admiration les Suèdes et les Norvégiens.

En recherchant les mesures des anciens je distinguerai avec soin les preuves dont la certitude n'est point égale. J'éviterai de confondre les démonstrations et les conjectures. Deux monumens précieux, échappés au naufrage des tems, serviront d'appui à mes raisonnemens. Les inductions, les proportions qui peuvent nous aider à découvrir les autres mesures paroîtront à leur place.

DISSERTATION

SUR LES POIDS, LES MONNOIES, ET LES MESURES DES ANCIENS, &c.

AVANT-PROPOS.

Depuis qu'on étudie l'histoire des hommes plutôt que celle des rois, on s'est attaché avec raison à la connoissance de leur économie politique et domestique. Dans cette étude on se trouve chaque moment arrêté par l'ignorance de ces signes arbitraires dont chaque peuple s'est servi pour exprimer les différens rapports de nombre, d'étendue, et de quantité, je veux parler des mesures, des poids et des monnoies.

Ce seroit un ouvrage utile, mais immense, qu'un dictionnaire complet de cette langue économique, et un recueil étendu de tous les faits intéressans auxquels il nous serviroit d'interprète, c'est à dire, en d'autres mots, une histoire de l'industrie et du luxe. Un pareil ouvrage demanderoit les soins attentifs et soutenus d'une société de savans dispersée dans les différentes parties de l'Europe. Je voudrois qu'elle se formât; mais en attendant un événement aussi peu vraisemblable, je rassemblerai dans ce recueil tout ce que mes lectures historiques me fourniront sur un objet aussi curieux qu'utile. Cet ouvrage se grossira sans dessein et sans effort, et s'enrichira insensiblement du fruit de toutes mes études.

Je

Je m'attacherai surtout, 1. Aux revenus publics et aux impôts; 2. Au prix du bled et à celui des autres denrées nécessaires à la vie; 3. Au prix du travail militaire, civil ou domestique, et par une liaison naturelle au nombre de ceux de qui l'on exigeoit ou de qui l'on pouvoit exiger un semblable service; 4. Au prix de l'argent, c'est à dire au revenu annuel, et au taux d'intérêt d'une somme quelconque; 5. A l'emploi de l'argent, et par conséquent aux mœurs, au luxe et aux arts.

J'écrirai en François, mais je ferai mes réductions à l'Angloise. Commençons par établir le rapport de l'argent des deux pays.

L'once Angloise d'argent monnoyé vaut cinq chelins et deux sous sterling. Depuis l'an 1726 on taille au marc d'argent de huit onces de Paris, huit écus $\frac{3}{8}$ chacun de six livres; ce marc vaut par conséquent 50*l.* 5*s.* Tournois. En supposant l'identité précise du poids et du titre, ce marc vaudroit 41 chelins 4 sous; mais si nous rabattons $\frac{1}{60}=7\frac{1}{2}s.$ pour le premier et $\frac{1}{111}=4\frac{1}{2}$ pour le second, il nous restera 40 chelins 4 sous pour la valeur du marc: la livre Tournois voudroit $9\frac{1}{2}$ sous sterling, et la livre sterling sera égale à peu près de 25 livres Tournois.

Cependant si nous consultons l'échange ordinaire entre Londres et Paris nous trouverons la livre sterling à $22\frac{1}{2}$ livres Tournois chacune de $10\frac{1}{2}$. On s'est plaint depuis longtems de ce mal dont on connoît la source et le remède. L'or du Brésil a changé, depuis quelques années, la proportion établie entre les deux métaux précieux. La monnoie de France

France a suivi très sagement les révolutions du commerce. Elle a fixé la proportion comme 14 à 1; chez nous elle est comme 15 à 1 : l'once d'argent ne vaut que 5c. 2s. à la monnoie; son prix chez les orfèvres est souvent 5c. 7s. On devine sans peine les suites de cette inégalité chez une nation qui calcule. Elle diminue le prix courant de nos espèces d'argent, pour augmenter celui des monnoies étrangères. Personne ne veut porter son argent à la monnoie à des conditions aussi dures. La source est tarie, et ce fleuve rapide dans son cours appauvrit sans cesse l'Angleterre pour enrichir ses voisins. Le banquier ne peut que suivre le torrent; mais dans ce recueil je dois oublier ces proportions accidentelles et injustes pour n'envisager que la valeur intrinsèque des espèces, c'est à dire leur poids et leur titre.

J'aurai souvent occasion d'apprécier des monnoies dont j'ignore le titre. J'y substituerai toujours celui de ce pays. C'est une vérité hypothétique dont il faut se contenter à la place de la vérité absolue.

Lorsqu'il m'arrive de ne point connoître la proportion établie entre l'or et l'argent, je la supposerai toujours comme 10 à 1 jusqu'au tems d'Auguste, comme 12 à 1 jusqu'à la découverte de l'Amérique, et comme 15 à 1 jusqu'à nos jours. Je sais que cette progression n'est pas sans exceptions, mais elles sont en petit nombre, et j'aurai soin de les indiquer.

Je partage mon recueil en sept colonnes qui s'accompagneront toujours. I. Mes notices générales rales de livres extraits, observations, &c. qui appartiennent à plusieurs classes à la fois ; II. L'antiquité : cette partie renfermera encore le Bas Empire jusqu'à la prise de Constantinople par les Turcs ; III. La Grande Bretagne avec l'Irlande ; IV. La France et les Pays Bas ; V. L'Allemagne, la Suisse et les Pays du Nord ; VI. L'Italie et l'Espagne ; VII. L'Orient, les Indes, et l'Afrique ; en un mot, tout ce qui est hors de l'Europe.

I.

NOTICES GÉNÉRALES.

1. An Inquiry into the State of the Ancient Measures ; the Attic, the Roman, and particularly the Jewish ; by Dr. John Hooper, Bishop of Bath and Wells, livre vraiment admirable dans son genre. L'esprit le plus systématique éclaire partout la plus profonde érudition. On peut perfectionner quelques détails, mais je crois qu'il faudra toujours bâtir sur les principes de ce savant évêque. C'est pourquoi je vais en donner une idée abrégée.

On ne peut s'arrêter qu'à ces poids qui existent encore et qui peuvent se comparer avec les nôtres. La drachme Attique bien connue nous donnera par ses rapports tous les autres poids de l'antiquité. On sait que lorsqu'il est question de poids et surtout de monnoies il en faut toujours choisir les plus pesantes. Le tems, la rouille, l'avidité des hommes leur ôtent toujours une partie de leur volume que rien ne peut augmenter. L'exact Greaves, le père des expériences de ce genre, avoit pesé beaucoup de tétradrachmes Attiques. Les mieux conservées lui donnoient un poids de 268 grains ou de 67 pour la drachme. Deux didrachmes d'or de Philippe et d'Alexandre lui indiquoient une drachme de 67,25 grains. M. Eisenschmidt avoit dans sa possession une tétradrachme de 4×83½ grains de Paris; 68,36 des nôtres. La mine Attique de 100 de ces dernières drachmes aura pesé 6836 grains.

pesé

Les hommes se conduisent rarement par cette liberté d'indifférence qu'ils s'arrogent si souvent: dans les institutions les plus arbitraires il leur faut quelque motif. C'est ainsi qu'ils ont fixé les mesures longues sur les parties du corps humain, la coudée, le pied, la palme, ou le doigt; qu'ils en ont employé les cubes pour des mesures de capacité, et qu'ils ont déterminé leurs poids par celui d'une de ces cubes remplie de eau ou de vin. Parmi ces mesures la cube palmique, (terme moyen entre les autres,) a pu paroître la plus généralement utile. On sait par expérience qu'une cube d'eau de 12 pouces doit peser 76 livres, la cube de la palme nous donnera par conséquent 6840 grains. Un rapport aussi précis (car le pied Grec ne différoit presque point du nôtre) nous persuade que nous avons trouvé la mine Attique construite sur les mêmes principes hydrostatiques que cette livre palme que nous venons de supposer.

Les Grecs reconnoissent, malgré leur vanité, qu'ils doivent à la colonie Phénicienne de Cadmus leurs poids et leurs mesures dont ce peuple à été l'inventeur. Une nation commerçante et industrieuse a dû trouver de bonne heure des proportions tions réfléchies qui méritent seules à cet égard le nom d'invention. L'ésprit humain fait des progrès rapides lorsque l'intérêt se joint à la curiosité. Le commerce des Phéniciens a porté leurs arts sur toutes les côtes de la Méditerrannée. On leur attribueroit avec plaisir la construction de la livre palme, et l'égalité du talent Attique avec celui de Tyr, formellement énoncée par un des anciens, nous permet de le faire.

Si nous balançons à admettre cette égalité sur la foi de Heron, nous pouvons nous en assurer par l'égalité qui a toujours subsisté à cet égard entre deux peuples très éloignés qui se connoissoient à peine l'une l'autre, mais qui ont toujours eu des liaisons très intimes avec les Phéniciens, je veux parler des Juifs et des Athéniens. Josèphe, Philon, les Septante ont égalisé le shekel de Jerusalem et la tétradrachme d'Athènes, et l'on ne doit pas seulement écouter les rabbins* lorsqu'ils sont opposés à des écrivains aussi anciens et aussi instruits. Qu'on me rende raison d'un accord aussi singulier sans supposer que les deux nations ont eu un modèle commun; et quel modèle oseroit le disputer avec celui de Tyr?

On ne doit pas oublier que les Phéniciens, après avoir formé leur livre palme ou mine, et leur talent, qui en contenoit 60, ont compté, je ne sais par quelle raison, un autre talent le double du premier, mais qu'en conservant toujours les mêmes divisions, sa mine n'étoit plus la livre palme. Les Juifs ont adopté tous les deux; le premier est leur talent profane; celui-ci leur talent sacré mais le

* M. Hooper les écoute un peu longuement.

plus

plus usité, parceque les prêtres ont toujours rédigé leurs annales. Les Athéniens n'ont connu que le premier. Le second à passé enfin en Egypte sous le nom de talent d'Alexandrie.

Cette mine Attique ou livre palme a toujours été la livre pondérale des Athéniens. Au commencement elle en déterminoit aussi la monnoie. Mais enfin on a frappé des drachmes plus légères, et la distinction d'une livre de poids et d'une livre de compte s'est introduite dans la Grèce comme chez nous. Sous les empereurs Romains, la drachme monnoie ne pesoit que 54,75 grains ou la huitième partie de l'once Romaine. Comme poids elle étoit toujours de 68,40 grains. Cette distinction, autorisée par l'analogie et prouvée par les faits, répand un nouveau jour sur les endroits les plus obscurs de l'antiquité numismatique.

Les systèmes les mieux construits ont toujours leur endroit foible. M. Hooper l'a senti. Après avoir vu un poids formé sur des principes hydrostatiques on s'attendroit du moins à voir que sa mesure étoit une des mesures creuses des Athéniens. Point du tout. La cotyle (mesure du creux des deux mains jointes ensemble) pesoit 60 drachmes, et le dicotylon, au lieu de peser une mine, pesoit 1,2 mine. On se sauve pourtant par la distinction reconnue chez les Juifs et supposée chez les Athéniens, d'une mine pondérale plus grosse d'un cinquième que la mine ordinaire, et dont le dicotylon étoit la cube. On se servoit (dit-on) de cette mine pour peser les corps d'un grand volume et de peu de valeur. Il y a effectivement peu de nations chez qui l'on ne trouve ces livres différentes. Cependant j'aimerois mieux remonter à la formation de la cotyle, et supposer que les Athéniens l'ont déterminée par le seul modèle d'une mesure creuse que la nature leur offroit. J'ai dit les Athéniens; mais il faudroit dire plutôt les Phéniciens qui ont transmis aux Juifs et aux Grecs leurs mesures, aussi bien que leurs poids.

la

Les Romains se sont conduits avec beaucoup plus d'art. L'amphore étoit la cube de leur pied et pesoit 80 livres d'eau ou de vin. Le conge étoit la cube du demi-pied et pesoit 10 livres. M. Hooper est néanmoins peu disposé à faire honneur aux pâtres de Romulus d'une invention aussi subtile. Il pense que les Romains, qui tenoient leurs loix des Athéniens, en avoient aussi reçu les élémens de leurs mesures; et qu'après avoir formé une livre, les trois quarts de la mine, et un pied, les deux tiers de la coudée, ils ont choisi le poids de dix livres pour obtenir une certaine égalité de leur conge avec le chous d'Athènes. Les cubes qui en ont résulté n'ont été qu'un effet singulier du hasard. Du tems de Platon les Grecs eux-mêmes entendoient à peine la duplicature de la cube.

Ce poids du conge ou de 10 livres s'appelloit denarius. Lorsqu'on frappa la première monnoie d'argent, le denier d'argent, qui valoit 10 livres de cuivre, ne pesoit que la septième partie de l'once. Les deniers les plus forts qui nous restent sont de 62½ grains; ils nous donneroient une once de 437½ grains. Cette once répond avec une justice singulière à celle que Villalpandus et Gassendi ont trouvé par leur expérience sur le conge Farnèse. Elle est encore l'once Romaine de nos jours. Sous les empereurs le denier n'étoit plus que la huitième partie de l'once ; la livre et l'once étoient toujours les mêmes, pendant que leurs divisions devenoient moins fortes et plus nombreuses.

les

Lorsque les Romains avoient soumis la Grèce, la drachme Attique tomba de 68,40 grains à 62,50 et devint égale au denier Romain. C'est cette égalité, clairement annoncée dans tous les auteurs depuis Polybe jusqu'à Plutarque, et qui ne peut s'expliquer que dans le système de M. Hooper. Chaque nation inventa bientôt des expédiens pour applanir toutes les difficultés du commerce. Les Romains inventèrent une livre de compte (pondo auri vel argenti) de 100 deniers, égale par conséquent à la mine Attique ; et d'un autre côté la drachme monnoie accompagna le denier dans toutes ses variations, et devint, comme lui, la huitième partie de l'once Romaine, 54,75 grains.

Les vaincus poussèrent encore plus loin leur complaisance. Avant le tems de Constantin les Athéniens s'étoient formé une livre pondérale partagée, comme celle de leurs maîtres, en 12 onces et 96 drachmes. La drachme étoit la drachme de poids de 68,40 grains, et cette livre, qu'ils nommèrent litra, étoit à la mine comme 24 à 25. On se souvient que la mine étoit à la livre Romaine en raison de 4 à 3. Cette livre Attique, qui n'a point pu se dérober aux yeux pénétrans de M. Hooper, explique sans peine les fragmens obscurs et corrompus de Fannius, de Cleopatras, de Dioscorides, et de St. Epiphane. On comprend sans peine qu'il se forma dans l'orient plusieurs de ces litres dont le poids étoit différent selon leur drachme primitive.

Le

Le ratel de Cairo est connu dans tout l'orient. Les Arabes l'ont toujours regardé comme la mine Attique. Son poids les justifie. Il est de 6886 grains, divisé en 12 onces, 144 dirhems, et 1728 kirats, ou carats. Nous y reconnoissons une litra dont les auteurs ont quitté la drachme pour continuer la progression Romaine. Cette drachme est cependant la huitième partie de leur once, sous le nom de drachma Attica, ou de darchemy. On peut observer une légère différence entre la litra d'Athènes et le ratel de Cairo. Les uns ont multiplié la drachme, les autres ont partagé la mine. Mais les Egyptiens ont rendu témoignage au procédé Attique par le poids étranger de 68,32 grains qu'ils ont conservé sous le nom de mitheale.

Le ratel de Cairo s'est répandu dans l'occident avec les conquêtes et le commerce des Arabes. Ce ratel se retrouve avec peu de changement dans la livre d'Espagne, et dans celle que nous nommons avoirdupoids. Nous avons adopté, aussi bien que les François, un ratel de 10 dirhems, qui différoit moins de la livre Romaine. Les Arabes (en un mot) sont les fameux Esterlins, qui ont fixé le poids sterling de ces pays.

II.

L'ANTIQUITÉ.

Section I.

J'aime beaucoup les tables décimales. Elles ont le double mérite de la précision et de la facilité.

J'en donnerai ici quatre sur les principes de M. Hooper calculées pour les quatre différens états que nous connoissons de la drachme Attique. 1. Le premier commence au règlement de Solon vers l'an 600 avant Jésus Christ, et pourroit s'étendre jusqu'à la mort d'Alexandre. La drachme égale à celle de poids étoit toujours à 68,40 grains. 2. Depuis la mort d'Alexandre jusqu'à la conquête de la Grèce par les Romains, elle étoit à 65,5 grains. 3. Elle devint égale au denier Romain de 62,57 grains. 4. Cette égalité subsistoit encore sous Tibère et sous Vespasien. Celse et Pline l'ancien en sont nos garans : mais Galien, qui vivoit sous les Antonins, reconnoît que le denier et la drachme n'étoient plus que le huitième de l'once Romaine, c'est à dire 54,75 grains. On pourroit fixer ce changement au règne d'Adrien.

Corn. Cels. l. v. c. 17. Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxiii. 9. Galen. Ed. Basil. Gr. tom. ii. p. 380.

I.

Table des Drachmes Attiques de 68,40 Grains en Parties Décimales de la Livre Sterling.

1	00368124998
2	00736249996
3	01104374994
4	01472499992
5	01840624990
6	02208749988
7	02576874986
8	02944999984
9	03313124982

II.

II.

Table des Drachmes Attiques de 65,5 Grains.

N. B. J'ai copié la table de M. Hooper; mais elle me paroît assez peu utile. L'expérience nous assure qu'il y a beaucoup de drachmes de ce poids. Les successeurs d'Alexandre commencèrent de bonne heure à altérer, mais on voit par le traité d'Antiochus que l'ancienne drachme de 75 à la livre Romaine étoit toujours considérée comme le poids légitime.

1	00352517360
2	00705034720
3	01057552080
4	01410069440
5	01762586800
6	02115104160
7	02467621520
8	02820138880
9	03172656240

III.

Table des Drachmes Attiques et des Deniers Romains de 62,57 Grains.

J'ai corrigé quelques erreurs de la table de Hooper.

1	00336755952
2	00673511904
3	01010267856
4	01347023808
5	01683779770
6	02020535712
7	02357291664
8	02694047616
9	03030803568

IV.

Cette table n'est point dans Hooper.

Table des Drachmes Attiques et des Deniers Romains de 54,75 Grains.

1	00294661456
2	00589322912
3	00883984368
4	01178645824
5	01473307280
6	01767968736
7	02062630192
8	02357291648
9	02651953104

Lorsque les Romains frappèrent les premiers deniers d'argent, ces deniers valoient dix as, ou livres de cuivre. Ils le partagèrent en moitiés et en quarts de deniers. La moitié s'appelloit quinarius, ou cinq livres de cuivre. Le quart du denier valoit deux livres et demie de cuivre, et s'appelloit sestertius, mot corrompu de semistertius trois moins un demi. Cette façon de compter étoit fort utile parmi les anciens. Le sestertius, sestertius nummus, ou par abbréviation nummus, devint la racine du calcul mystérieux des Romains dont je vais éclaircir les difficultés.

1. De 1 à 1000, les Romains comptoient simplement duo, tres, &c. ducenti, trecenti, &c. sestertii.

2. Par-

2. Parvenus à 1000, ils changeoient de méthode pour compter désormais au genitif au lieu du nominatif duo millia sestertiûm, en sousentendant corpora; ou bien rassemblant 1000 sestertii sous le nom collectif de sestertium, ils parloient ainsi, duo, tria, &c. sestertia. Une raison particulière les engageoit de s'arrêter au nombre de 1000. Nous avons vu qu'à l'imitation de la mine Attique, ils s'étoient fait une livre d'argent de compte de 100 deniers. Le sestertium (250 deniers) étoit par conséquent la livre sesterce d'argent, comme le sestertius l'étoit de cuivre.

3. L'arithmétique Romaine ne passoit point les centaines de mille. Ils ne pouvoient exprimer un million de sestertii qu'en disant dix cent mille. Pour rendre la distinction encore plus nette ils commençoient alors à se servir de l'adverbe decies, centies, millies, supprimant centena millia qu'ils se contentoient de supposer. M. Hooper pense que ce million de sestertii étoit la livre sesterce d'or. Dans la pauvreté de Rome naissante l'or pouvoit bien être à l'argent comme 100 à 1.

Le sesterce, toujours le quart du denier, s'est vu réduit de $\frac{1}{28}$ à $\frac{1}{32}$ de l'once Romaine.

I.

Table des Sesterces de 28 à l'Once en Parties Décimales de la Livre Sterling.

1	0	0	0	8	4	1	8	8	9	8	8
2	0	0	1	6	8	3	7	7	9	7	6
3	0	0	2	5	2	5	6	6	9	6	4
4	0	0	3	3	6	7	5	5	9	5	2
5	0	0	4	2	0	9	4	4	9	4	0
6	0	0	5	0	5	1	3	3	9	2	8
7	0	0	5	8	9	3	2	2	9	1	6
8	0	0	6	7	3	5	1	1	9	0	4
9	0	0	7	5	7	7	0	0	8	9	2

1 Sestertius.
10 Sestertii.
100 Sestertii.
1 Sestertium.
10 Sestertia.
100 Sestertia.
Decies C. M. S.
Centies C. M. S.
Millies.
Decies Millies.
Centies Millies.

II.

Table des Sesterces de 32 à l'Once.

1	00073665364
2	00147330728
3	00220996092
4	00294661456
5	00368326820
6	00441993184
7	00515657548
8	00589322912
9	00662988276

M. Hooper

M. Hooper veut dérober aux Romains la construction artificieuse de leurs mesures creuses pour ne faire d'eux que des imitateurs serviles des Athéniens. Je ne saurois être de son avis. 1. La correspondance ancienne de ces deux peuples célèbres est assez mal prouvée. 2. Tout est différent dans les mesures des deux peuples, la valeur, les noms, et les proportions respectives. Le rapport même qu'on veut nous y faire voir est trop imparfait pour me persuader que les inventeurs l'ont connu. 3. L'amphore, cube d'un pied, et le conge sa huitième partie, cube du demi-pied, sont construits avec une précision peu connue dans les effets du hasard. 4. Je conviens sans peine que les Romains ignoroient la duplicature de la cube dans le tems que les Grecs la connoissoient assez confusément, mais les Romains tenoient leurs arts des Etrusques; et nous ignorons jusqu'à quel point cette nation ingénieuse avoit pu porter ses connoissances géométriques. Si les Romains ont suivi sans réflexion des institutions dont ils n'entendoient point les principes, nous comprenons encore pourquoi le fameux décret du peuple a réglé les mesures par leur poids plutôt que les poids par leurs mesures.

Hooper, p. iii. c. 6. p. 152—175.

Cyrus et son fils Cambyse ne levoient point d'impôts sur leurs sujets. Darius, fils d'Hystaspe, partagea son vaste empire en vingt grands gouvernemens ou satrapies. Il fixa le tribut que chaque province devoit payer au trésor royal. Les Perses, qui comparoient la bonté de Cyrus et la sévérité de Cambyse avec l'humeur avare de Darius, Herodot. Hist. iii. 89—97. Edit. Gronov. Ludg. Bat. 1715.

donnèrent au premier le nom de père, au second celui de maître, et au troisième celui de marchand, Καπηλος. Je copierai le dénombrement des provinces et des tributs qu'Hérodote nous a laissé, et j'y ajouterai quelques observations.

Section II.

Table des Provinces de l'Empire de Darius et du Tribut qu'elles payoient.

Herodot. l. iii. c. 89—98. Ce règlement subsistoit lorsqu'il écrivoit. Il lut la première ébauche de son histoire à Athènes en 445 avant J. C. mais il s'en occupoit encore l'an 412. V. Prideaux's Connection, t. i. 291, 292. Fol. London. 1713.

Satrapies.	Talens Babyloniens.	Livres Sterl.
1. L'Ionie, l'Eolie, la Carie, la Lycie, et la Pamphylie - - - - - - - -	400	103,072
2. La Mysie, la Lydie, &c. - - -	500	128,840
3. Les deux Phrygies, la Paphlagonie, le pays des Thraces Asiatiques (la Bithynie) et celui des Syriens, (une partie de la Cappadocie) - N. B. Ces trois satrapies composoient le royaume de Crésus, roi de Lydie.	360	92,765
4. La Cilicie. Je soupçonne qu'elle comprenoit une partie de la Cappadocie et peut-être de la Haute Syrie - - - - - -	500	128,840
5. La Syrie depuis la ville de Posideion* jusqu'aux frontières de l'Egypte. La Phénicie, la Palestine, et l'île de Cypre y étoient comprises, mais l'Arabie étoit exempte de tout tribut	350	90,189
6. L'Egypte, avec la province de Cyrène -	700	180,378
7. Les Satgagydæ, Gandarii, Dadicæ, et Aparytæ - - - - - - - - - Je n'ai pas la moindre connoissance de ces quatre nations.	170	43,805
8. Suse et le reste du pays des Cissiens, c'est à dire de la Susiane - - - - -	300	77,304
9. Babylone et le reste de l'Assyrie - - N. B. Il faut y comprendre la Mésopotamie.	1000	257,680

* Je ne connois point ce Posideion.

10. Ecbatane,

Satrapies.	Talens Babyloniens.	Livres Sterl.
10. Ecbatane, et le reste de la Médie, &c. -	450	115,956
11. Les Caspii, Pausicæ, Pantimathi et Daritæ. N. B. Je crois que ce sont les habitans de la rive occidentale de la mer Caspienne.	200	51,536
12. La Bactriane - - - - - -	360	92,765
13. L'Arménie jusqu'au Pont Euxin - -	400	103,072
14. Les Sargatii, Sarangæi, Thamanæi, Utii, et Meci, (Μηκοι) et les îles de la mer Rouge - N. B. Je connois la ville de Saranga dans la Gédrosie. Mais je voudrois reconnoître ici Thaman, capitale de l'Idumée, le pays d'Uz, patrie de Job, et peut-être la Mecque. Il y a beaucoup de petites îles dans la mer Rouge.	600	154,608	V. Cellar. Notit. orb. Antiquæ Amstel. 1706, t. ii. p. 416, 429, 520.
15. Les Sacæ et les Caspii - - - - N. B. Ce doit être l'Hyrcanie.	250	64,420
16. La Parthie, la Chorasmie, la Sogdiane et l'Ariane - - - - - - -	300	77,304
17. Les Paricanii et les Ethiopiens d'Asie - Ces Ethiopiens n'avoient que le nom de commun avec ceux d'Afrique; leur taille, leur armure et leur situation, tout les confondoit avec les Indiens. Je pense qu'ils s'étendoient dans la Caramanie et la Gédrosie jusqu'à l'Indus.	400	103,072	V. Herod. vii. 69, 70.
18. La Mantiene, &c. C'est une portion de la Médie et de l'Adiabene - - - -	200	51,536
19. Les Moschi, Mosynæci, Tibareni, &c. Ces peuples s'étendoient au Nord Ouest, de l'Arménie jusqu'au Pont Euxin - -	300	77,304
	7740	1,994,446
20. Les Indiens. Cette nouvelle conquête de Darius pouvoit embrasser les pays arrosés par l'Inde, et par les fleuves qui s'y jettent. Ce peuple riche et nombreux payoit par an 360 talens Euboïques d'or - - - -	Talens Euboïques. 4680	1,033,671

1. Ce dénombrement d'Hérodote porte les caractères tères les plus frappans de l'authenticité. Ses détails, sa précision, les noms des provinces, leurs divisions, si différentes de la géographie Grecque, tout annonce une pièce originale. On croiroit qu'Hérodote ne nous a donné qu'un extrait du fameux édit de Darius* connu dans tout l'empire; mais un extrait enrichi de ce que ses voyages lui avoient appris sur l'état des provinces aussi bien que sur les motifs de Darius et l'opinion publique à l'egard de sa nouvelle institution. 2. Pour connoître les sommes de ce tribut, il ne s'agit que de connoître le talent Euboïque, auquel Hérodote a réduit lui-même celui de Babylone. Celui-ci contenoit 70 mines Euboïques. Selon Julius Pollux ce même talent contenoit 70 mines Attiques. La mine (et par conséquent le talent) de l'île d'Eubée étoit égale à celle d'Athènes, aussi bien qu'a celle de Tyr. On croit avec raison que Darius aura exprimé cette somme par le talent Phénicien que le commerce de ce peuple industrieux rendoit familier à tous les peuples de son empire. Mais pourquoi notre historien ne l'a-t-il pas traduit par le talent Attique, la monnoie reçue dans la ville qui méritoit à tant d'égards le nom de capitale de la Grèce, et de fondatrice de ses plus belles colonies? 3. Darius permettoit aux tributaires le choix de l'or ou de l'argent. Il exigeoit le talent d'argent Babylonien, mais il se contentoit du talent d'or Euboïque qui pesoit un septième de moins. Cet avantage ac-

Polluc. Onom. l. ix.

Hooper, p. 288–297.

* M. Hooper, p. 297—303, compare la mine Euboïque avec celle d'Alexandrie. Il est clair qu'il se trompe.

cordé

cordé à l'or produisit la proportion assez singulière de 1 à 13, suivant laquelle Hérodote calcule à 4680 talens Euboïques d'argent les 360 talens Euboïques d'or que les Indiens payoient au roi. Mais elle est purement hypothétique. En supposant celle de 11 à 1 les Indiens auroient dû payer 3960 talens d'argent, mais des talens Babyloniens égaux à 4620 talens Euboïques. Ce fleuve d'or, qui couloit sans cesse de l'orient en occident, avoit déjà établi la proportion décuple du tems de la bataille de Cunaxe. 4. Si nous réduisons en talens Euboïques les 7740 talens Babyloniens, nous en aurons 9030 de ceux-là. Hérodote a calculé ce total à 9540 talens, mais il nous avertit lui-même qu'il a passé sous silence plusieurs petits articles. Cette explication, qui justifie à la fois ses détails et son arithmétique, me persuade qu'il a eu sous les yeux un tableau des revenus Persans bien plus étendu que celui qu'il nous a laissé. Mais lorsqu'il nous donne 14,560 talens d'argent Euboïques pour le grand total, au lieu de 14,220, on ne sauroit excuser la faute de l'historien ou de son copiste. 5. Ces 14,220 talens Euboïques, le véritable résultat du calcul, nous donnoit 3,246,859 l. s. Un pareil revenu paroît mal assorti avec la magnificence des rois de Perse, et avec la grandeur d'un empire qui s'étendoit de l'Hellespont jusqu'au fond des Indes, et du Mont Caucase aux frontières de l'Ethiopie. Cependant tout modique qu'il étoit, les Perses regrettoient encore les règnes heureux de Cyrus et de Cambyse qui ne soutenoient leur grandeur que par les dons gratuits de leurs sujets. Mais se persuadera-t-on qu'un

V. Hooper, p. 305–309.

qu'un grand prince, qu'un législateur, qu'un Cyrus n'ait pas compris, que les besoins d'un grand royaume demandoient des secours généraux, et que toutes les nations étoient accoutumées à remplir ce devoir légitime envers l'autorité qui les protégeoit? Veut-on qu'il ait réalisé une idée qui n'éblouit qu'un Néron dans l'accès passager d'une folle bonté? Ces difficultés redoublent notre embarras, mais elles pourroient l'éclaircir. Xénophon, qui dans son roman philosophique a conservé beaucoup de mœurs vraies et de faits curieux, pourroit adoucir la rigueur de cette expression d'Hérodote. Cyrus se contentoit d'exiger les tributs nécessaires pour soutenir les charges publiques. Bien loin d'amasser des trésors, il prodiguoit à ses soldats ceux de Sardis et de Babylone; et lorsqu'un besoin imprévu demandoit des secours extraordinaires, Crésus apprit de lui que la bourse de nos amis est le coffre fort le plus assuré. Darius changea de méthode. Il eut peut-être raison. Cette indulgence de Cyrus devenoit un nouveau moyen d'oppression dans un état despotique trop accoutumé déjà à ne voir que des volontés particulières à la place des loix générales. Ce revenu d'Hérodote n'est que l'excédent de la dépense publique, une somme destinée à former le trésor royal qui ne s'ouvroit que pour les besoins extraordinaires de la monarchie. Avant que de l'envoyer à Suse les satrapes avoient déjà pourvu aux appointemens des officiers, à l'entretien des troupes, et à tous les travaux publics. 6. Un autre endroit de notre historien m'a permis de conjecturer à combien la masse entière des revenus pouvoit Xenophon. Cyropæ. l. viii. p. 583. 638–642.

Herodot. l. i. c. 192.

pouvoit se monter. Il s'étend avec complaisance sur les richesses du grand gouvernement de Babylone qui rendoit chaque jour à son satrape une artabe d'argent. Il s'explique. Une artabe étoit une mesure creuse de ce pays-là égale au medimnus Athénien et à trois chenices $\frac{1}{16}$ du medimnus. Nous savons que le medimnus contenoit 72 grosses mines. L'artabe contenoit $76\frac{1}{2}$ grosses mines égales à 91,8 mines de Solon. Dans la construction du poids on n'a rempli cette mesure que d'eau pure. L'argent pèse dix fois et demie autant que le même volume d'eau. L'artabe de Babylone remplie d'argent valoit 16 talens 3 mines et 90 drachmes. Si nous multiplions ce revenu journalier par 360, nous aurons un résultat de 5783 talens Attiques, = 4957 talens Babyloniens, par an. Tel étoit le tribut que la province de Babylone payoit à son satrape; mais le roi n'en retiroit que 1000 talens, c'est à dire la cinquième partie. Si nous établissons cette proportion dans tout l'empire nous lui donnerons un revenu de plus de seize millions de livres sterling. Je crois que Babylone nous offre un terme moyen assez heureux. Au centre de l'empire, mais habité par un peuple toujours porté à la révolte, les dépenses publiques y auront été bien supérieure à celles de quelques cantons riches et pacifiques, mais très inférieures à l'entretien de ces armées nombreuses qui défendoient les provinces frontières. 7. Tel étoit le revenu que ces monarques recevoient en argent, mais ils jouissoient encore de plusieurs droits très lucratifs. Chaque province étoit obligée de leur envoyer tous les ans ce

ce qu'elle produisoit de plus précieux. Leur maison nombreuse, femmes, eunuques, et gardes, vivoient aux frais du pays où ils faisoient leur résidence. La satrapie de Babylone avoit l'honneur d'entretenir le roi pendant quatre mois de l'année, et de lui nourrir un haras de huit cens chevaux, de seize mille jumens, aussi bien qu'un très grand nombre de ses chiens Indiens. Quatre villages n'étoient chargés que de leur entretien.

Section III.

La province de Babylone donnoit aussi 500 beaux eunuques tous les ans. La Cilicie lui envoyoit 360 chevaux blancs. Les Ethiopiens apportoient à ses pieds de l'or, de l'ivoire et de l'ébène: les Arabes lui envoyoient de l'encens. Le tribut de ceux de Colchos consistoit en 100 garçons et 100 filles qu'ils amenoient tous les cinq ans au sérail du grand roi. Les beautés Circassiennes ont toujours été renommées dans l'orient. Je passe sous silence toutes les corvées des peuples, le service militaire, les chevaux, les vaisseaux, &c. qu'ils devoient au roi. 8. Les Perses eux-mêmes n'étoient point tributaires. Il semble que Cyrus avoit employé les armes d'une nation libre pour subjuguer l'Asie; mais qu'il n'osa jamais confondre les vaincus avec les vainqueurs. Ce phénomène, si rare dans l'orient, s'accorde très bien avec cette république Persanne que Xénophon nous a décrite. 9. Les Egyptiens donnoient pour l'entretien des 120,000 Persans qui étoient en garnison Herodot. l. iii. p. 90. 92. 97.

Idem. 97. V. Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. i. p. 7-18. edit. Hutchins. Oxon. 1727.

Herodot. l. iii. c. 9.

garnison à Memphis, 700 talens de bled. J'ignore pourquoi on a voulu apprécier le bled plutôt que le mesurer. Mais assurément c'étoit le prix commun. Si nous donnons à chaque soldat un quartier et demi par an,* nous aurons 180,000 quartiers de bled et 180,350 livres sterling. Le quartier étoit au prix d'une livre sterling. C'est la moitié du prix actuel.

Dans le commencement les Romains tailloient 40 pièces d'or à la livre. Comme il ne nous en reste aucune qui approche de ce poids, j'approuverois assez la conjecture de Snellius et d'Agricola qui lisent 42 au lieu de quarante : peu à peu les princes en diminuoient le poids jusqu'à 48 à la livre. Telle est la leçon d'un excellent MS. du Collège de Baliol, au lieu de 48. Les Romains avoient adopté la proportion élégante des Grecs. L'aureus pesoit 2 drachmes, et flottoit entre 42 et 48, comme la drachme ou denier flottoit entre 84 et 96. Il nous reste effectivement des aurei de Jules César de 124½ grains, et d'autres de Néron de 108¼ grains. Dans le siècle suivant le denier prit un état plus assuré de 8 à l'once, mais l'aureus se soutenoit un peu mieux et différoit peu de celui des premiers empereurs. Gallième et les tyrans ses contemporains le réduisirent à 75 grains. Il ne s'en est jamais relevé. Il semble qu'on a toujours compté 25 deniers à la didrachme d'or. La proportion de l'or à l'argent étoit de 12½ à 1. On ne risque pas beaucoup en appréciant cet aureus du Haut Empire à 0,9 d'une livre sterling, c'est à dire 18 chelins.

Greaves, tom. i. p. 132, 313. Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxiii. 3.

Greaves, tom. i. p. 320, 321.

Id. p. 329, 330.

* Les Grecs ne donnoient qu'un chœnix par jour ; les Romains quatre modii par mois.

Con-

Constantin voulut fonder un nouvel empire. Partout il changea les choses et jusqu'aux noms. Au mois de Juillet de l'an 325, il établit un nouveau système dans les monnoies. On tailloit 72 aurei à la livre d'or, 60 milliaresions à la livre d'argent, et douze follis à la livre de cuivre. L'aureus ou solidus valoit douze milliaresions, et le milliaresion 24 follis. L'or étoit par conséquent à l'argent comme 1 à $14\frac{2}{5}$, et l'argent au cuivre comme 1 à 120. Le follis de cuivre se partageoit en quatre petites pièces, nommées assarion, lepton, et quadrans; c'étoit le fameux as qui ne valoit plus que le quart de l'once de cuivre.

V. les Mém. de M. Dupuis dans le xxviii^me^ tome de l'Académie des Belles Lettres.

			s.	d.
L'aureus, ou sous d'or	= 73 grains	= 055487	= 11	1
Le milliaresion d'argent	= 88 grains	= 00466	= 0	11
Le follis de cuivre	= 438 grains	= 000193	= 0	$0\frac{11}{24}$
L'assarion de cuivre	= $109\frac{1}{2}$ grains	= 000038	= 0	$0\frac{11}{96}$

La livre d'or étoit une monnoie de compte fort usitée sous les successeurs de Constantin : on peut l'apprécier à 40 liv. sterling.

V. Hooper, p. 147. Dupuis, Mém. de l'Acad. tom. xxviii. p. 704. Æl. Lampid. in Alex. Sever. c. 22. Fl. Vopisc. in Aurelian. c. 9. et Commentar. Salmasii.

Le période qui s'est écoulé depuis les Gordiens jusqu'à Constantin est rempli de difficultés. On voit en général que le denier, qui remonta au poids de l'ancienne drachme Attique (68 grains), avoit reçu le nom de lepton ou de minutus, par contradistinction avec le denier encore plus pesant qu'on donnoit aux soldats, et qui pesoit les $\frac{4}{5}$ du milliaresion de Constantin, c'est à dire 77 grains. On s'est beaucoup disputé sur les leptons de cuivre. Je pense que depuis le commencement du huitième siècle ce nom général a toujours désigné l'as ou assarion. Je ne fais qu'indiquer deux autres sens du mot follis. Il désignoit, 1. Un poids de

250 deniers, c'est à dire la nouvelle libre sesterce ou deux argyres et demi. 2. Une bourse de 125 milliaresions ; c'étoit la donative ordinaire des soldats. Il a même un troisième sens ; 3. ce qu'on nommoit aussi gleba senatoria ; la capitation de chaque sénateur. Les plus riches payoient huit livres d'or par an (320 l. s.), les moins aisés quatre (160 l. s.), et les plus pauvres deux (80 l. s.)

L'établissement de Constantin se soutint (du moins de l'Orient) pendant plus de six siècles et demi : et lorsque Nicéphore Phocas monta sur le trône, l'aureus pesoit encore une sextule ou la sixième partie de l'once. Ce prince avare fit frapper des τεταρτηρον, quartarii, d'un poids plus léger et dont il se servoit pour payer ses troupes, &c. pendant que dans les tributs il exigeoit toujours l'aureus de Constantin. Ce récit de Zonare est un peu obscur. On a pris le mot de τεταρτηρον en trois sens différens : 1. Que Nicéphore ne changea rien au poids, mais que ces quatre aurei en valoient autant que six, c'est à dire d'une once d'or. 2. Que l'aureus de Nicéphore ne pesoit que le quart de celui de Constantin, 18¼ grains. 3. Que Nicéphore ne diminua que d'un quart l'ancien aureus qui pesoit 73 grains. Le sien n'en pesoit que 54¾ ou la huitième partie de l'once Romaine. Ce dernier sentiment, qui est celui de Saumaise, me paroît le seul vraisemblable. Il semble que l'aureus de Nicéphore (connu par les Latins sous le nom du bezant d'or, c'est à dire aureus Byzantinus) a subsisté sans beaucoup d'altération jusqu'à la chute de l'empire de Constantinople.

V. Salmas. Comment. in Hist. August. Lutet. 1620. p. 217.

Lips. de Magnit. Roman. l. ii. c. 7. p. 63. Edit. Plant. 1598.

Zonare nous apprend que l'empereur Basile (dans le neuvième siècle) avoit rassemblé un trésor immense, puis qu'on y comptoit 200,000 talens d'or, sans compter des richesses incroyables en argent et en pierreries. Cet endroit est trop favorable à la grandeur Romaine pour ne pas plaire à Juste Lipse. Mais voyons de quoi il est question. A n'employer que le plus petit talent, et la proportion la moins forte, nous trouverons en or seulement, 352,000,000 l. s. Plutôt que de recuser l'autorité de Zonare, pensons que (par un purisme de rhéteur et qui rehaussoit encore son pays aux yeux des étrangers) il a employé le mot de talent, au lieu de ce terme à demi barbare de litra, livre d'or. Les 200,000 livres d'or sont égales à 8,000,000 l. s. Ce trésor est grand sans être incroyable.

Id. p. 64.

Benjamin de Tudèle, qui visita Constantinople vers la fin du douzième siècle, parle avec étonnement des trésors qui la rendoient la ville la plus riche de l'univers. Le seul revenu que le prince en tiroit se montoit à 20,000 aurei par jour, environ 3,000,000 l. s. par an. Je méprise, comme je le dois, l'autorité de Benjamin, mais je croirois sans peine qu'il y a un grand fond de vérité dans ces exagérations.

Vie de Julien, par l'Abbé de la Bleterie, à Paris, 1746. p. 131–140.

Lorsque Julien parut dans les Gaules en qualité de César il trouva cette grande province ruinée par les barbares et encore plus par les traitans. La capitation se montoit à 25 aurei par tête, et quoiqu'elle suffit pour tous les besoins de la guerre, les officiers de l'empereur vouloient encore l'augmenter. Ce dernier coup, que Julien sut parer, eût accablé cablé ce malheureux peuple. Julien, devenu empereur, réduisit la capitation de 25 aurei par tête (13 l. s. 17*s.*) à sept aurei (3 l. s. 17*s.* 7*d.*). Cet impôt, sur le pied même de la réduction, nous paroît énorme. Il n'y avoit que les chefs de familles qui le payassent. De ceux-ci il y en a 4,000,000 dans la France moderne, beaucoup plus petite que la Gaule ancienne. Ce dénombrement nous donneroit une somme impossible (100,000,000 aurei, 55,400,000 l. s.). Mais lorsqu'on excluoit tous ceux qui en étoient exempts, et surtout cette nation d'esclaves bien plus nombreuse que celle des hommes libres, il ne restoit peut-être pas 500,000 contribuables. Je me sers de ce calcul de l'Abbé du Bos. Il ne peut pêcher que par sa foiblesse, et je me ménage volontiers une occasion de céder quelque chose sur la population peut-être excessive qu'on attribue à ce pays dans le quatrième siècle. L'impôt de Constance nous donnera 12,500,000 aurei, près de 7,000,000 l. s. celui de Julien 3,500,000 aurei, près de 2,000,000 l. s. Ajoutons à ce calcul quelques réflexions.

Annales Politiq. de l'Abbé de St. Pierre, tom. i. p. 17.

1. Depuis les conquêtes des Romains jusqu'au règne de Caracalla, on distinguoit entre les citoyens Romains et les provinciaux. Ceux-ci, qu'on nommoit tributaires, payoient la capitation. Le citoyen en étoit exempt, mais cette même qualité l'assujettissoit à quelques impositions dont le provincial étoit déchargé, et surtout aux deux vingtièmes, l'un sur les héritages et l'autre sur l'affranchissement des esclaves. Les douanes étoient

V. Burman. de Vectigal. Pop. Romani. Leyd. 1734. passim: et Just. Lips. de Magnitud. Rom. l. ii. c. 1—7. Burman. c.x. xi. Dion. Cass. Excer. Burman., p. 174.

communes à Rome et aux provinces. 2. Caracalla étendit la bourgeoisie Romaine dans le dessein d'augmenter ses revenus; mais par une injustice digne de ce tyran et de ses successeurs, la capitation passa en Italie, les deux vingtièmes dans les provinces, et chaque sujet soutenoit le fardeau redoublé de provincial et de Romain. 3. La capitation devint bientôt l'impôt favori des empereurs. Le despotisme se complaît dans un genre d'imposition qui ne connoît de bornes que celles de l'impuissance absolue. Mais M. Hume se trompe lorsqu'il dit que Constantin supprima la plûpart des impôts pour établir à leur place une capitation universelle. Les douanes, les deux vingtièmes, la gabelle, &c. subsistoient encore. 4. Il paroît que dans le commencement on fixoit une capitation inégale par son égalité apparente. Les Juifs payoient deux drachmes par tête. Les pères et les maîtres payoient pour leur famille entière. Dans la suite on chercha à apprécier la naissance, le rang, et la fortune, surtout en fonds de terre: ce qui rendoit la taille à la fois réelle et personnelle. Je crois entrevoir la méthode qu'on suivoit. Les ministres avoient sous les yeux le recensement de tous les contribuables d'une province. Ils imposoient cette capitation générale et hypothèque de tant d'aurei par tête. Les officiers de l'empereur, ou les décurions des villes, en faisoient la répartition dans la proportion qu'exigeoient les facultés de chacun. Lorsque Constantin remit aux citoyens d'Autun 6000 contribuables il leur remit effectivement près du quart de la capitation. Si l'on ajoute aux sept millions Philosophical Essays.

V. Tillemont, Hist. des Emper. tom. iv. P. i. p. 187.

millions de Constance les autres charges dont j'ai supprimé la moitié on sera peu surpris de ces fréquentes remises de tribut.

It appears from the Author's arrangement of the subject, that he proposed to have given a statistic account of the several countries in the following order:

La Grande Bretagne,
La France et les Pays Bas,
L'Allemagne, la Suisse et le Nord,
L'Italie et l'Espagne,
L'Orient, les Indes, &c. &c.

The first article, viz. Great Britain, Mr. Gibbon seems to have postponed, and only a few notes respecting it have been found among his papers. Indeed the remainder of this division appears incomplete; and the accounts of the respective countries seem to have been kept open for the insertion of any information or observations that might occur.

IV.

LA FRANCE ET LES PAYS BAS.

Je suis fâché de ne pouvoir pas donner une table chronologique des variations de la livre Tournois depuis Charlemagne jusqu'au Régent. Je n'attendrai qu'à la première occasion. Je sais cependant que pendant la dernière moitié du quinzième siècle le marc, qui vaut cinquante livres, n'en valoit que dix. Aujourd'hui le change varie, mais en général on peut évaluer la livre sterling à 22*l.* 10*s.* Tournois, et en gros 100*l.* Tournois à 4*l.* 10*s.* sterling.

Ph. de Com. tom. v. p. 19. Charles VII. n'a jamais levé sur ses peuples que 1,800,000 l. de tailles (9,000,000 l. T. 405,000 l. s.) Louis XI. à la fin de son règne en levoit 4,700,000 sans compter l'artillerie et choses semblables (23,500,000 l. T. 1,045,000 l. s.). Après sa mort les états les réduisirent à 2,500,000 livres (12,500,000 l. T. 562,500 l. s.). C'étoit encore beaucoup et plutôt trop que trop peu. On ne les augmenta point Id. viii. 25. sous Charles VIII. Ce prince avoit même formé le dessein de les réduire à 1,200,000 l. pour la défénse du royaume (6,000,000 l. T. 270,000 l. s.) et de vivre, à l'exemple de ses prédécesseurs, de son domaine. Ce domaine bien administré (y compris la gabelle et quelques aides) pouvoit rendre jusques Hist. Gen. t. ii. p. 250. 1,000,000*l.* (5,000,000 l. T. 225,000 l. s.). Sur cet exposé on voit combien Voltaire s'est trompé lorsqu'il voulut donner cet effort tyrannique et passager de Louis XI. comme la règle constante des revenus de France à la fin du quinzième siècle.

Id. vi. 7. Louis XI. établit un camp de 20,000 fantassins (il y avoit 6000 Suisses et 2,500 pionniers) et de 1,500 gens d'armes. Ce camp coûtoit 1,500,000 l. (7,500,000 l. T. 337,500 l. s.) par an. A sa mort il avoit en tout 4 à 5000 gens d'armes et 25,000 fantassins, tant pour le camp que les mortes-payes. Charles VII. n'avoit jamais eu que 1,700 hommes d'armes d'ordonnance.

Ce dernier détail paroît étranger à ce recueil. Il ne l'est point. Il y a toujours trois choses à considérer:

considérer: 1. La valeur intrinsèque de l'argent, son poids, et son titre. 2. Sa valeur proportionnelle à celle des denrées. 3. Sa valeur relative. C'est le rapport des personnes plutôt que celui des choses. Dans l'économie politique l'argent ne sert qu'à acheter des denrées; les denrées qu'à nourrir des hommes; et les hommes qu'à soutenir la grandeur et la puissance des états. Si Louis XI. étoit aussi redoutable à son peuple et à ses voisins avec une armée de 30,000 hommes que Louis XV. peut l'être avec 150,000, celui-là étoit (sous ce point de vue) cinq fois plus riche que son successeur. Selon une ordonnance de Louis XI. le taux de l'argent qui devoit avoir cours en France étoit fixé de la manière qui s'ensuit: Ph. de C. tom. iv. p. 429.

	Sous.	D.
Ecus de France (de 118½, plutôt 115½, au marc d'or)	33
Ecus, ou Lyons de Flandre	38	9
Ecus de Bretagne	30	6
Nobles d'Angleterre	73	4

L'écu de Flandre (par lequel il faut compter les revenus du Duc de Bourgogne) valoit donc 9*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.*

En 1470, Charles Duc de Bourgogne n'avoit que des milices qu'on nommoit gens à gages mesnagers; mais les états du pays, jaloux de son autorité, lui accordèrent cependant 120,000 par an pour entretenir 800 lances (1,162,500 l. T. 52,312 l. s. 10*s.*). Dans la suite il augmenta cette somme à 500,000 écus (4,843,750 l. T. 215,969 l. s. 2*s.* 6*d.*). Philippe le Bon tenoit une cour magnifique Id. iii. 1. Id. iii. 3. Id. iv. 13.

et laissa beaucoup de choses de prix, avec 300,000 écus (2,898,750 l. T. 130,781 l. s. 5*s.*) Charles en leva d'abord 350,000 (3,381,875 l. T. 152,478 l. s.). Enfin il leva jusqu'à 650,000 écus par an, sans y comprendre la Bourgogne (6,380,625 l. T. 283,229 l. s. 10*s.*)

Ph. de C. tom. i. 13.

Du tems de Louis XI. la Normandie a payé jusqu'à 950,000 francs par an (4,750,000 l. T. 213,750 l. s.)

Table abrégée des Monnoies de France, depuis Charlemagne jusqu'à Louis XIV, tirée du Livre de M. le Blanc, p. 313 et suiv.

Règnes.	Années.	Prix du Marc d'argent. £.	s.	d.	Valeur de la Livre en argent d'Angleterre. £.	s.	d.
Charlemagne -	800	⅔ d'une livre			3	6	7½
Louis VI. - -	1144	2 livres			1	2	2½
	1158	2	14	0	0	16	6
Philippe le Bel -	1293	3	0	0	0	14	9⅗
	1303	6	0	0	0	7	4⅘
	1305	8	10	0
	1313	2	14	0
	1322	4	0	0
	1326	5	0	0
	1328	6	0	0
	1330	2	18	0
	1338	5	0	0
	1339	6	15	0
	1340	7	0	0
	1342	13	10	0
	1360	6	0	0
	1417	8	0	0
	1447	8	10	0
	1473	10	0	0

1488

Années.	£.	s.	d.
1488	11	0	0
1513	12	10	0
1540	14	5	0
1561	15	10	0
1573	17	0	0
1580	19	0	0
1602	20	5	4
1636	25	0	0
1641	26	10	0
1679	29	7	0

V.

L'ALLEMAGNE, LA SUISSE ET LE NORD.

La livre de Strasbourg contient environ quinze onces et demie de la livre de Paris, proprement comme 8804 à 9216.

La livre de Nuremberg est à celle de Paris comme 4797 à 4608.

Le marc ou demie livre de Cologne contient 8 onces, 16 lots, et 4864 grains; il est à celui de Paris comme 2201 à 2304. On se sert généralement dans l'empire de ce marc lorsqu'il s'agit des monnoies, et particulièrement des anciens goulden ou florins du Rhin. M. Eisenschmidt, qui a examiné cette affaire avec beaucoup d'exactitude, nous rapporte à cet effet une résolution de diette de l'an 1559. Aussi les Allemands l'appellent par excellence le marc d'argent. Notre auteur pense qu'anciennement toutes les villes du Rhin avoient convenu d'un poids commun qui ne s'est conservé qu'à Cologne, pendant qu'il s'altéroit partout ailleurs.

En

Tschudi, P. ii. l. x. p. 157.

En 1425, le corps Helvétique (à la réserve des Bernois) fit une ordonnance générale sur les monnoies dont on remit la fabrication à Zurich et Lucerne. Ce règlement devoit subsister cinquante ans. Ce qu'il y a de plus important est heureusement ce qu'il y a de plus clair. Le marc d'argent valoit 7 florins du Rhin: selon la proportion du marc de Paris à celui de Cologne nous avons 23 50 l.T. :: 22 48 l.T. environ; le marc de Cologne valoit donc à peu près 42 chelins sterling. C'est à raison de 6 chelins au florin du Rhin.

De Watteville, tom. ii. p. 56.

Il y a quelques difficultés dans les détails, surtout à l'égard du marc de Zurich qui doit avoir été très foible. Cependant on y voit qu'un florin contenoit 30 schillings de Stebler pfenning, et 360 de ces Stebler pfennings, petite monnoie de cuivre fort usitée en Suisse. C'étoient le schilling et le pfenning les plus communs; mais il y en avoit de ceux-ci qu'on nommoit Angster ou Antlit pfenning. Il y en avoit 45 au florin, et leur schilling n'en contenoit que trois. Nous connoissons aussi les plaphart dont 24 faisoient un florin.

Voici en général le taux des monnoies:

	Schillings Stebler pfenning.
Un florin du Rhin	30
Un écu de France, ducat ou florin Hongrois	38
Un florin d'or de Gènes, de Florence, ou de la Chambre Apostolique	37

Tschudi, P. ii. l. xii. p. 473.

On voit par un autre endroit que la livre de compte usitée en Suisse dans le quinzième siècle valoit 10¾ plapharts, environ 2*s.* 8*d.* d'Angleterre.

En

En 1384 la ville de Berne étoit accablie de dettes, elles montoient à 100,000 florins, 30,000 l. s.; pour lesquelles elle payoit en général le 10 pour cent. Ses projets ambitieux, ses troupes, et ses acquisitions l'avoient plongé dans ces difficultés. Elle venoit de payer la comté de Berthou 30,800 florins, 9240 l. s. Déjà les intérêts s'accumuloient et le crédit public commençoit à chanceler, lorsque la bourgeoisie prit une résolution vigoureuse, déposa les conseillers qui avoient mal-régi les finances, et s'imposa une taxe par serment de la quarantième partie de leurs biens. La république fut bientôt libérée. Tschudi, P. ii. l. xii. p. 510, 511.

En 1414 l'empereur Sigismond vint à Berne où il fut très bien reçu. Toute la bourgeoisie alla à sa rencontre; on lui offrit les clefs de la ville; on meubla pour sa réception le couvent des Dominicains; et on le régala magnifiquement pendant deux jours aux frais de la ville; lui et toute sa suite, au nombre de 800 chevaux, aussi bien que celle du comté de Savoye qui en avoit 600. Cette réception coûta 2000 florins aux Bernois, 600 l. et leur fit beaucoup d'honneur. On y voit que la ville avoit déjà sa vaisselle d'argent, et des tapisseries brodies en or et en argent. Quelques années après, les prélats de la cour de Martin V. qui comparoient l'abondance de Berne avec la lésine des Genevois, disoient souvent, " Non sumus Bernæ sed Gehennæ."

VI.

VI.

L'ITALIE ET L'ESPAGNE.

Selon Greaves l'once Espagnole est égale à 540½ grains de Paris=450 grains Anglois. On y compte 16 onces à la livre.

Hooper, p. 15, 16. Villalpandus, Espagnol de naissance, qui connoissoit très bien les poids Romains, nous assure que l'once d'Espagne est égale à celle de Rome qui a toujours subsisté sans altération. Toutes les deux seroient égales à 438 grains Anglois=525 grains de Paris. Les Romains ont introduits leurs poids en Espagne avec leurs loix et leur langue. Lorsque les Arabes ont subjugué ce pays les Espagnols, toujours soumis à leurs vainqueurs, ont conservé l'once Romaine, mais en substituant à la livre de 12 onces une autre livre de 16 onces=7008 grains Angl. et qui ne représentoit pas mal le ratel du Caire ou la mine Attique, puisqu'elle nous rend la proportion connue de 4 à 3.

V. British Negociator, p. 181. Dans les lieux de commerce en Espagne on tient les livres en piastres ou dollars, reals et maravedis.

34 maravedis	=	1 real.
8 reaux	=	1 piastre.
11 reaux, 1 maravedi	=	1 ducat.

Le maravedi et le ducat d'échange ne sont que des monnoies de compte. Voici la valeur de leur monnoie.

En

En cuivre.		l.	s.	d.
Le maravedi	=	0	0	$0\frac{43}{272}$
Le quartillo ou ochavo	=	0	0	$0\frac{43}{136}$
Le quarto	=	0	0	$0\frac{11}{34}$
En argent.
Le real	=	0	0	$5\frac{1}{2}$
Le piastre, dollar	=	0	3	7
Le dollar de Seville	=	0	4	6
En or.
Le ducat	=	0	4	$11\frac{77}{272}$
Le pistole	=	0	17	11

Il y a encore des pistoles doubles et quadruples, des moitiés, quarts, &c. des dollars du Pérou de 4*s.* 5*d.*, des dollars au pilier de 4*s.* $6\frac{3}{4}$d., et des dollars à la croix de 4*s.* $4\frac{3}{4}$d.

Cet état actuel des espèces en Espagne, ne peut s'appliquer qu'aux derniers siècles. Je vais rapporter quelques faits, j'espère un jour d'y ajouter les calculs.

En 1576, la cour d'Espagne travailloit toujours à la conversion des Maures, qui n'étoient encore chrétiens que par le baptême forcé qu'ils avoient reçu plus de 50 ans auparavant. Grégoire XIII. imposa sur toutes les églises d'Espagne une pension générale pour bonnifier les cures des villages Morisques. L'Archevêque de Valence fut taxé à 3600 ducats par an. L'événement fut des plus simples. Tout le clergé décida qu'il ne falloit pas espérer de convertir les Maures, et l'archevêque proposa, V. History of the Expulsion of the Moriscoes, Geddes's Tracts, vol. i. p. 51—143—161.

proposa, avec le zèle le plus désintéressé, de les chasser. On suivit son conseil, (malgré toute l'opposition des barons,) et ce conseil coûta 140,000 habitans au royaume de Valence et 600,000 sujets pour le moins à la monarchie d'Espagne.

V. View of two Castilian Cortes, Geddes's Tracts, vol. i. p. 317—343.

Les Goths ont porté en Espagne le gouvernement de leur patrie et ces principes de liberté qui ont toujours distingué les nations du nord. L'assemblée de la nation se nommoit Cortes. Elle étoit composée vers la fin du quatrième siècle des prélats, des barons, des ricoshombes ou gentilshommes, et des deputés des villes qu'on appelloit procurateurs; ceux-ci (dans le royaume de Castille) consistoient en 124 députés de 48 villes; Burgos et Salamanca en avoient 8; Toledo et Leon, 5; Zamora, Valladolid, &c. 4; Seville et Cordoue, 3; Madrid, 2. Je soupçonne néanmoins qu'à bien des égards cette proportion a bientôt cessé d'être juste. Tout ce Cortes ne formoit qu'une chambre, et le premier noble (le Seigneur de Lara) y portoit ordinairement la parole. Je ne veux pas m'étendre sur ses droits: elle avoit celui de mettre des impôts; droit qui renferme tous les autres.

En 1390, les Cortes obligèrent la régence (qu'ils donnèrent à leur jeune roi Henri II.) de remettre la monnoie à son ancienne valeur que le feu roi avoit augmentée. Ils fixèrent le nombre des troupes réglées à 4000 soldats de garnison et à 1,500 genets ou chevaux.

En 1406, Henri II. de Castille voulut faire la guerre au roi de Grenade. Il demanda à son Cortes de quoi entretenir 4000 genets, 10,000 lances et 50,000 50,000 fantassins, avec une flotte de 30 galères et 50 vaisseaux, et un train d'artillerie qui comprenoit 6 gros canons, douze beliers de fer, 6000 chariots, &c. On supputa que cet armement demanderoit, pour six mois, 100,200,000 maravedis: on trouva cette somme trop forte. Le Cortes ne voulut ajouter qu'un tiers aux deux autres que le Roi pourroit trouver dans le revenu de son domaine et dans le trésor d'Oviedo. Le roi allégua vainement qu'il les employoit déjà à soudoyer des étrangers. Il fut obligé de céder à l'inflexibilité des Cortes, qui ne virent cependant pas le danger d'une concession qu'ils firent. Ils autorisèrent le roi à completter cette somme par des levées arbitraires, si la taxe n'y suffisoit pas. On ne lui donna ce droit que pour une année, mais ses successeurs ont souvent abusé de cet exemple dangereux.

Lorsque Charles V. parvint à la couronne d'Espagne, les ministres Flamans qui la gouvernoient excitèrent bientôt les murmures des Castillans. Ils se plaignoient qu'en moins d'une année les étrangers avoient fait dans les Pays-Bas plus de 1,100,000 ducats. V. History of the Wars of the Commons of Castile, Geddes's Tracts, tom. i. p. 215.

La cour de ce prince étoit très magnifique. Dans neuf mois qu'il passa en Catalogne il dépensa plus de 1,000,000 ducats de Castille qui étoient plus fortes que les livres Catalanes. Id. p. 220.

Toute cette conduite produisit une guerre civile où les peuples de Castille essayèrent sans succès de soutenir leurs droits. Charles Quint vainqueur assembla les cortes à Valladolid en 1522. Cette assemblée lui accorda un subside de 4,000,000 ducats Id. p. 318.

cats qu'on devoit acquitter dans le terme de trois ans. Elle se désista même enfin du plus beau de ses privilèges, de celui de faire marcher toujours les plaintes des peuples avant les demandes du prince.

V. History of the Wars of the Commons of Castile, Geddes's Tracts, tom. i. p. 290.

Les peuples se plaignoient pendant la guerre, que les rois avoient fait de si grandes aliénations de leur domaine en faveur des nobles que dans une étendue de 100 lieues entre Valladolid et Compostelle il ne leur restoit que trois villes en propre. Leur pauvreté les obligeoit à demander chaque jours de nouveaux subsides.

Eisenschmidt, p. 15.

Voici les poids principaux usités dans ce pays:

	Grains.
L'once de Paris	576
——— de Londres . . .	585½
——— de Venise	562½
——— de Naples	503
——— de Florence et Pise .	537
——— de Sienne	526
——— de Gènes	494
——— d'Espagne	540⅓

Muratori Diss. xxvii. et xxviii.

La livre est partout de 12 onces, hormis en Espagne.

M. Muratori a traité les monnoies d'Italie plutôt pour la partie numismatique, que pour l'économique. Voici cependant ce que j'en ai recueilli: 1. Il nous reste encore des pièces des rois Goths et Lombards, et des Ducs de Naples et de Beneventum. Les Papes commencèrent à avoir leur monnoie du temps de Charlemagne, pendant le douzième et le treizème siècle ils n'en ont point battu.

battu. Le droit des Vénétiens remonta au moins jusqu'au dixième siècle. Peu à peu les empereurs l'accordèrent aux princes et aux villes libres. On en compte plus de cinquante qui ont joui de ce privilège. 2. Quant aux monnoies d'or nous trouvons avant et depuis Charlemagne le sous d'or qui valoit la vingtième partie d'une livre, i. e. 1 l. s. 16 s. Je pense qu'ils étoient fort rares; et le maneusus, dont 20 valoient, en 1014, cinquante sous (d'argent), c'est à dire le maneusus pouvoit valoir 7*s.* 6*d.* Malgré toutes les fables qu'on s'est plu à débiter, on sait que le premier florin d'or n'a été battu qu'à Florence en 1252. Sa finesse et le commerce des Florentins, le répandirent bientôt, et plusieurs princes songèrent à l'imiter, en conservant le nom, et même l'impression de Florence. Le Pape Jean XXII. se distingua en excommuniant les faux monnoyeurs, dont il étoit lui-même le premier. On tailloit 8 florins à l'once d'or, qui étoit à celle d'argent comme 12 à 1. Le florin de Florence valoit à peu près 7 chelins d'Angleterre. Le ducat, ou sequin de Venise, et le marabotino d'Espagne, en différoient peu. La byzantine en valoit les deux tiers 4*s.* 8*d.* Mais il nous faudroit un bon commentaire sur ce tableaux curieux mais obscur que le Nonce Cabrospini nous a laissé des monnoies du quatorzième siècle. 3. Un passage de Matthieu Paris nous apprend qu'en 1249 la livre impériale, égale à la livre sterling et à la livre d'argent, avoit conservé sa première valeur de 3 l. s. Voici quelques rapports que M. Muratori m'a fournis.

1212. La livre impériale=3 livres de Boulogne, de Parme ou de Ferrare=$\frac{3}{4}$ livres de Boulogne, &c.=1*l. s.*

1292. Un florin d'or=livre d'Aste=7*s.*

1295. 866$\frac{2}{3}$ florins=650 livres Provisionorum (de Rome)=livre Provisionorum=9*s.* 4*d.*

1270. 600 livres de Bresse=1000 florins.
livre de Bresse =10*s.* 10*d.*

1300, &c. 100,000 livres de Gènes=125,000 florins.
livre de Gènes =8*s.* 9*d.*

Giovanni Musso apud Muratori Diss. xxiii.

En 1388, 480 livres impériales ne valurent plus en Italie que 300 florins. Cette livre valoit ainsi 4*s.* 4$\frac{1}{2}$d. à peu près la quatorzième partie d'une livre. Cette chute paroîtroit étonnante à qui ne se rappelleroit pas les troubles d'Italie, et les besoins continuels des empereurs. Entre l'an 1320—1388 le luxe s'étoit plutôt augmenté à Plaisance que les moyens de le soutenir. Selon la relation d'un citoyen contemporain, il étoit effectivement poussé assez loin, mais suivant le gôut Italien, plus pour la parure que pour la table. Les hommes et les femmes portoient des robes de drap de soie, de camelot, de velours, et même de drap d'or; des colliers et des brasselets d'or, et des ceintures enrichies de perles dont l'once valoit 10 florins d'or (3*l.* 10*s.*). Une robe (ils les appellent cabanus, barillottus, ou pelarda) coûtoit souvent de 25 à 60 florins (8*l.* 15*s.*—21*l.*). Telle dame portoit une ceinture de 25 florins (8*l.* 15*s.*) et autant de bagues qu'elles en valoient 50 (17*l.* 10*s.*). Toutes ces robes étoient larges et traînantes. L'auteur blame l'indécence de ces habits de femmes qu'on appelloit Cyprianæ, qui ne cachoient point leur sein, et encore plus courts et trop justes des hommes qui ostendunt formam naticarum ticarum genitalium et membri. Les carosses étoient inconnus, mais depuis quelque temps l'usage du vin s'étoit répandu, et celui des cheminées s'étoit introduit. 400, 500, ou 600 florins (120*l.* 150*l.* 180*l.*) étoit la dot commune d'une fille. Mais le mari y gagnoit peu. Il étoit obligé à la dépenser, et même à y ajouter une centaine de florins (30*l.*) pour équiper sa femme, et pour faire les noces. La dépense d'un homme qui avoit deux chevaux et neuf bouches dans sa famille pouvoit aller à 300 florins (90*l.*). Les gages d'un domestique nourri, mais point habillé, étoient 12 florins (4*l.* 4*s.*) pour un homme, et 7 (2*l.* 9*s.*) pour une femme. L'auteur de ce tableau curieux s'appelloit Giovanni Musso. Muratori a donné sa chronique de Plaisance parmi les Scriptores Rerum Italicarum.

VI.

L'ORIENT, LES INDES, &c.

La rupée est une monnoie d'argent du Grand Mogol et très commune dans tout l'Hindostan. Son poids est de 7*dw.* 10½*gr.* à 7*dw.* 11*gr.* Son titre est fort bon; sur cent parties il n'y en a qu'une ou deux de remède. On peut évaluer la rupée à 2*s.* 6*d.* sterling. La rupée d'or vaut 1*l.* 10*s.* La proportion de l'or à l'argent est 12½ à un. Frazer, p. 25, 26.

		Livres Sterling.
Un lack de rupées	=100,000 rupées =	12,500	Idem, p. 50.
Une crore de rupées	=100 lacks =	1,250,000
Un arrib de rupées	=100 crores =	125,000,000

Un dam est une monnoie idéale qui vaut la quarantième partie d'une rupée, ¾ d'un sous d'Angleterre. On s'en sert pour exprimer les revenus des fonds de terre.

Frazer, p. 26. Du tems de l'Empereur Shah Jehan, en 1647, l'empire comprenoit vingt-trois grandes provinces, dont je vais donner les noms et les revenus annuels comme M. Frazer les a trouvé dans les mémoires les plus authentiques de ce pays-là.

	Crores de Dams.	Livres Sterling.
1. Dehli	100	3,125,000
2. Agra	90	2,812,500
3. Lahor	90	2,812,500
4. Ajmir	60	1,875,000
5. Dowlatabad	55	1,718,750
6. Berar	55	1,718,750
7. Guzarat	53	1,651,250	leg. 1,646,250
8. Bengal	50	1,562,500
9. Alehabad	40	1,250,000
10. Bahar	40	1,250,000
11. Maloa	40	1,250,000
12. Khandeish	40	1,250,000
13. Audih	30	937,500
14. Mûltan	28	875,000
15. Odissea	20	625,000
16. Cabul	15	468,750
17. Cashmir	15	468,750
18. Tatta	8	250,000
19. Balk	8	250,000
20. Kandahar	7	218,750
21. Biduckshan	4	125,000
22. Tillingana	30	937,500
23. Buglana	2	62,500
TOTAL	880	27,500,000

Ce même prince entretenoit une armée de 911,400 hommes, cavalerie et infanterie, payés sur le trésor royal.

Les

Les provinces de Balk, Biduckshan, et Kandahar furent ensuite perdues: mais Auringzebe conquit les deux grands royaumes de Visapore et d'Hyderabad, ou Golconde. Le premier lui rendoit par an 1,078,305,000 dams (3,369,700 l. s.), et le second 1,113,360,000 dams (3,479,250 l. s.). Cet empereur partagea l'empire en 19 grands provinces dont les vicerois s'appellent soubahs. A sa mort en 1707 il laissa un revenu annuel de 12,071,876,840 dams (37,724,615 l. s. 2s. 6d.). Son empire est bien déchu depuis sa mort. Frazer, p. 34.

On a apprécié le total de ce que souffrit l'Hindostan dans l'expédition de Nadir Shah à un arrib de rupées, 125,000,000 l. s.; vingt crores, 25,000,000 l. s. des pertes, incendies, dévastations, &c.; dix crores du butin qu'y firent les troupes Persannes (12,500,000 l. s.), et soixante-dix crores des trésors que le vainqueur enleva (87,500,000 l. s.) En voici le détail, Idem, p. 220, 221.

	Crores.	Livres Sterling.
En pierreries de l'empereur et des Omras	25	31,250,000
Le trône du Paon et 9 autres, &c. . . .	9	11,250,000
En argent monnoyé	25	31,250,000
En vaisselle d'or et d'argent	5	6,250,000
En étoffes, meubles, &c.	5	6,250,000
En canons, munitions de guerre, &c. . .	1	1,250,000
TOTAL . .	70	87,500,000

Dans l'Hindostan le seer de bled pèse environ deux livres et demie; on compte que notre quartier en pèse 544. Arbuthnot, p. 34.

Pendant l'expédition de Nadir Shah, la disette regnoit à un tel point dans le camp des Indiens Frazer, p. 168.

qu'un seer ou 1½ seer se vendoient pour une rupée ; c'est à raison de 18*l.* ou 27*l.* par quartier. Les Persans se procuroient l'abondance par les fourrages qu'ils faisoient dans le pays. Le froment se vendoit chez eux à raison de 12 seers 30 livres par rupée ; c'est 2l. 5s. par quartier. Un prix très commun en Angleterre.

Il y a deux cosses en Hindostan. La première réglée par l'autorité publique, et dont on se sert pour mesurer les chemins du royaume, est de 4000 verges Angloises (1875 toises). L'espèce de cosse usitée dans plusieurs provinces varie de 2000 à 2500 verges, c'est à dire 937½ à 1171⅞ toises.

Frazer, p. 122. mais voyez aussi, p. 202.

Nadir Shah s'empara de toutes les terres d'église en Perse. Elles se montoient à 1,000,000 tomans par an, 2,500,000 l. s.

Hanway, t. i. p. 250, &c,

Nadir Shah avoit une armée de 200,000 hommes, la plûpart Tartares ; elle lui coûtoit cinq millions de livres sterling par an, à raison de 100 écus par soldat : chacun étoit lui-même obligé de se pourvoir d'armes et d'habits. Pour soudoyer cette armée le tyran ruinoit la Perse sans vouloir toucher à son trésor Indien qu'il regardoit comme sa dernière ressource ; mais qui a été dispersé après sa mort.

Mém. de Litt. tom. xxviii. p. 487—502.

On peut prendre une idée très exacte des mesures Chinoises dans un Mémoire de M. d'Anville : en voici le résultat :

10 grains de mil	=	1 fuen
10 fuens	=	1 créun ou doigt
10 créuns ou doigts	=	1 ché ou pied
6 pieds	=	1 pun ou toise
10 pieds	=	1 chan ou canne
1800 pieds	=	1 li ou mille Chinois.

Comme

Comme les voyageurs ne sont point d'accord sur la mesure du pied Chinois M. d'Anville consulta le P. Gaubil, missionnaire à Pekin. Ce Père s'assura que le pied impérial étoit au pied de roi comme 500 à 508, c'est à dire onze pouces neuf lignes et sept dixièmes de lignes, et par conséquent douze pouces sept lignes et deux dixièmes de lignes du pied Anglois.

	T.F.	P.	Poa.		Verg.Angl.	P.	Pouc.
Le li, mesure itinéraire=	295	1	3	=	629	2	4

193 li sont égaux à un dégré du grand cercle ; cependant les mathématiciens Chinois y comptent unanimement 200 li. On pourroit attribuer cette différence à leur peu d'habileté, ou au désir de n'employer qu'un nombre rond ; si l'on ne savoit que telle fut la décision de l'empereur Cam-hi et que personne n'osa y contredire ni la rectifier.

Telle est la mesure des li actuels; mais M. D'Anville croit en avoir trouvé de plus petits dans les siècles reculés. Un rapport des parasanges au li dans le quinzième siècle lui en donne de ceux-ci de 272 au dégré. La mensuration même d'un dégré dans le huitième lui en fournit de 338 ; et la distance de Pekin à une ville Tartare lui en fait, du troisième siècle avant J. C. de 405 au dégré. Tout cela est fort ingénieux et paroît même assez vraisemblable. Je voudrois avoir eu les mêmes secours sur les poids qui sont en même tems la seule monnoie d'or ou d'argent que connoissent les Chinois. Les réponses vagues et obscures des missionnaires m'ont engagé à consulter les voyages d'un négociant qui a passé six mois à Canton. Il n'a pu connoître que les objets du commerce, mais il doit être assez instruit là-dessus. Selon lui,

Voyage to the E. I. p. 316—321.

10 li, (les Européens les appellent cash)	=1 candarin
10 foan ou candarins	=1 mace
10 tsean ou maces	=1 tael. Les Chinois le nomment leang
10 leang ou taels	=12 oz. 2 dwt. 4 gr. poids Anglois =12 onces environ de Paris
16 taels	=1 cattie ou livre Chinoise

L'écu d'Angleterre (5 chelins) 5 l. T. 12½*s*, passe à la Chine pour 8 maces ; par conséquent, un tael =10 maces=6*s*. 3*d*.=en gros 7 l. T. 0*s*.

Mémoires, p. 249, &c.

Le Père le Comte me paroît le mieux instruit, sur les revenus de la Chine. Ce que la cour reçoit en argent ne passe pas 22 millions de taels, 6,875,000*l.s.* Mais il faut ajouter une somme bien plus considérable pour toutes les denrées que les provinces sont obligées de fournir en ris, en bled, en draps, en soies, en sel, en vernis, &c. &c. qu'on peut évaluer à cinquante de taels 15,625,000 l. s. Le total du revenu peut monter à 72 millions de taels 22,500,000 l. s. L'Hindostan, moins peuplé et moins commerçant, a rendu bien davantage à son prince ; mais le commerce des Indes engloutit les trésors de l'Amérique, et l'avarice tyrannique des Mogols ne laisse au commerçant que les richesses qu'il peut leur cacher. Le P. du Halde avoit évalué ce revenu à 200,000,000 taels, 62,500,000 l. s. après une exagération pareille j'ai peine à le croire. Il dit cependant que l'empereur entretient 160,000 hommes auprès de sa personne, et plus de 770,000

Description Gen. t. ii. p. 21.

770,000 pour la défense de la grande muraille et des provinces, en tout 930,000 hommes ; avec 565,000 chevaux pour remonter sa cavalerie. La Chine, dans un dénombrement fait au commencement du règne de Cam-hi, contenoit 11,052,872 familles, et 59,788,364 hommes en état de porter les armes, sans y comprendre les lettrés, les bonze, les mariniers, &c. Un pareil calcul nous donneroit pour le moins 200,000,000 d'habitans.

Les détails qu'il donne sur les denrées que les provinces envoyoient en cour ont un air d'authenticité. Entr'autres j'y trouve en bled et ris 40,155,490 sacs, chaque sac du poids de 120 livres. Cette quantité énorme reviendroit à 15,494,722 quartiers d'Angleterre, et vaudroit ici plus de 30,000,000 livres sterling. Je sais que les denrées sont à meilleur marché à la Chine, mais cette somme me paroît aussi incroyable que peu nécessaire. Vanité Chinoise !

ON THE POSITION OF THE MERIDIONAL LINE, AND AN INQUIRY INTO THE SUPPOSED CIRCUMNAVIGATION OF AFRICA BY THE ANCIENTS.

By the Greek* and Arabian cosmographers the first meridian was loosely placed at the Fortunate or Canary islands: the true position of the isle of Ferro has been determined by modern observation, and the degrees of longitude proceed with singular propriety from the western limit of the old hemisphere. The absurd vanity of the Spaniards and Dutch, the French and English, has variously transported this ideal line from a common and familiar term: the longitudes of Madrid and Amsterdam, of Paris and Greenwich, must now be compared, and the national diversity of speech and measure is aggravated by a new source of perplexity and confusion. The prince of geographers,

* The ignorance of Ptolemy, (l. iv. c. 7, in Bertii Theatrum Geographiæ Antiquæ, tom. i. p. 127) has ranged the six Fortunate islands under the same meridian line, the most northern point of which is sunk as low as the latitude of the Cape de Verd islands.

the

the celebrated d'Anville, has shewn his judgment and impartiality by adhering to the old style.

It was the duty of the Greek poets, who described the residence and rewards of departed heroes, to adorn their fortunate islands with the gifts of perpetual spring and spontaneous plenty. A remote and hospitable land has often been praised above its merits by the gratitude of storm-beaten mariners. But the real scene of the Canaries affords, like the rest of the world, a mixture of good and evil, nay even of indigenous ills and of foreign improvements. Yet, in sober truth, the small islands of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans may be esteemed as some of the most agreeable spots on the globe. The sky is serene, the air is pure and salubrious: the meridian heat of the sun is tempered by the sea-breeze: the groves and vallies, at least in the Canaries, are enlivened by the melody of their native birds, and a new climate may be found, at every step, from the shore to the summit, of a mountainous ascent.

In the Atlantic or Fortunate islands of Plutarch* we acknowledge, with some hesitation, the first features of the Canaries to which Sertorius was desirous of escaping from the horrors of civil war. The description of Pliny† is more accurate and distinct;

* Plutarch in Sertorio, tom. iii. p. 312, Edit. Bryan. Yet some circumstances are fabulous, and others would more easily adapt themselves to the Madeiras. If we prefer the Canaries, Lancerota and Fuerteventura, the nearest to the African shore, must be the two islands of Plutarch.

† Pliny (Hist. Natur. vi. 37) had likewise consulted the Periplus tinct; and his knowledge was derived from the discoveries and writings of Juba,* the most learned king that ever reigned over the Moors. The names of the Canary islands, their number of six or seven, and their respective distance are marked, though with some uncertainty. The plenty of the Orchilla weed, so useful to the dyers, will justify the appellation of the Purple Isles, and the use of a manufacture which Juba intended to establish. A multitude of dogs and goats, with the ruins of some stone buildings, announced the more early visits, perhaps, of the Phœnicians: but these islands appear to have been destitute of inhabitants, and I must assign to a later age the arrival of the Getulian emigrants who preserved their idiom, and soon lost the imperfect art which had conveyed them over a narrow sea. The kingdom of Juba was reduced into a province: but the Romans were satiated with empire, and they disdained, or feared, to plant a colony in the Atlantic ocean. It is less easy to account for the neglect of the Mahometans: they were conquerors, fanatics, and merchants; nor could the Great Desert protect from their ambition the black nations of plus of Statius Sebosus. The geographer will be satisfied with d'Anville (Géographie Ancienne, tom. iii. p. 116.) and Cellarius (Geographia Antiqua, tom. ii. P. ii. p. 141.): but the idle scholar may consult the texts of Mela, Ælian, and Solinus, with the Commentaries of Isaac Vossius, Perizonius, and Salmasius.

* See the Life and Writings of Juba, King of Mauritania, by the Abbé Sevin, in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. iv. p. 457.

the

the Niger. Yet the Arabian geographers are content to repeat the fables of Ptolemy; and Abulfeda's ignorance* is betrayed by the wild supposition that the Fortunate islands had been overwhelmed by the waves.

While Abulfeda deplored their loss they were given by Pope Clement VI.† (1344), with the title of kingdom, to Lewis de la Cerda, the rightful though banished heir of Castille. The title was vain, the grant ineffectual: the Canaries, which had been recently discovered by the Genoese,‡ were infested by some roving pirates from Catalonia and Biscay, but the first serious idea of conquest was entertained and executed by William de Bethancourt, a gentleman of Normandy, who sailed from la Rochelle in search of these fortunate islands. Deserted by his country, which was unwilling, or unable, to support a naval enterprise, he implored the aid and acknowledged the sovereignty of the King of Castille; his hopes and possessions were transferred by sale and inheritance to the Spaniards, and their blood and language soon predominated in the new settlements. In

* Abulfed. Geograph. Tabula. v. p. 230. Vers. Reisk.

† Vie de Pétrarque, tom. i. p. 199—205. I have disdained a silly and groundless story that the English ambassadors at Avignon were alarmed by the grant of the Fortunate islands, a title which, according to their prejudice, could belong only to those of Britain.

‡ Petrarch de Vitâ Solitariâ, l. ii. sect. vi. c. 3. p. 277. Edit. Basil. The Abbate Tiraboschi (Istoria della Letteratura Italiana, tom. iv. p. 111) maintains this national discovery against the national jealousy of a Spanish critic.

the

the space of eight years (1400—1408) William de Bethancourt had completely reduced and imperfectly planted the four smaller Canaries, Lancerota, Fuerteventura, Gomera, and Ferro:* but the natives of the three larger islands of Canaria, Palma, and Teneriff, resisted above seventy years the private adventurers of Spain: nor was it till the close of the fifteenth century that they finally yielded (1495) to the fleets and armies, the artillery and the missionaries of Ferdinand and Isabella.† Their weapons were unequal, but they used the advantage of the ground; their generosity could spare a suppliant enemy, and they reserved for their own defeat the precipice of despair. The remains of the old inhabitants are now incorporated with the conquerors: the population of the Canaries may amount to near two hundred thousand souls who enjoy, under the yoke of civil and ecclesiastical tyranny, the blessings of peace and the arts of commerce, which were unknown to the savage liberty of their predecessors.

* See a small but valuable treatise of Pierre Bergeron de la Navigation, &c. (c. 6, 7—29—35) which introduces the Voyages principalement en Asie, &c. La Haye, 1735. 2 vols. in 4to.

† The History and Description of the Canary Islands, by George Glass (London, 1764), are drawn partly from a Spanish MS. composed at Palma, and partly from the reading and experience of the author. But he had not, nor have I, seen the copious work of a native of the Canaries (Josephi de Viera y Clavijo Noticias de la Historia General de les Isles de Canaria. Madrid, 1762, &c. 4 vols. in 4to.). Clavijo is the unfortunate man who has been dishonoured, perhaps unjustly, by the wit and malice of Beaumarchais.

"In

" In the time of our grandfathers (it was said in the reign of Claudius) a certain Eudoxus, flying from the wrath of Ptolemy Lathyrus, King of Egypt, embarked on the Red Sea, and sailed round to Cadiz in Spain." This passage is extracted by Pomponius Mela* from the writings of Cornelius Nepos, who lived in the time of the said Ptolemy, and deserved the friendship of Cicero and Atticus.† A witness of a respectable character, who affirms a recent and notorious fact, will naturally engage the public confidence: this African circumnavigation has been unanimously admitted, and I must conceal my suspicions could I not produce from the philosopher Posidonius, a writer of equal age and authority, the true and accurate state of the voyages of Eudoxus.‡ His eye might be deceived by the unnatural distortions and monstrous dresses of the southern savages, he might find some tribes ignorant of the use of language and fire: but that he returned by a new road to the northern hemisphere, Ignotum per iter, gelidas enavit ad Arctos,

I positively deny.

Under the reign of the second Euergetes, who died one hundred and seventeen years before the

* Mela de Sitû Orbis, lib. iii. c. 9. p. 402, 403, 405. Edit. Voss. The same passage of Cornelius Nepos is quoted by Pliny. (Hist. Natur. lib. ii. c. 67.)

† See Aulus Gellius, Noctes Atticæ, lib. xv. c. 28. We have some fragments of the Letters of Cicero to Cornelius Nepos, who has composed a life of Atticus, which is still extant.

‡ Posidonius, apud Strabon. Geograph. l. ii. p. 155—160.

Christian

Christian era, Eudoxus of Cyzicus, a priest, a linguist, and a mariner, arrived in Egypt and gained the favour of the prince and people. A new field of riches and knowledge was opened to the Ptolemies by the shipwreck of an Indian on the Red Sea. With this guide, who had soon learned the Egyptian tongue, Eudoxus sailed to India on his first voyage of discovery, but the cargo of spices and precious stones with which he returned exposed him to the avarice of the tyrant. After his death, under the regency of his widow Cleopatra, Eudoxus was again employed. In his second voyage he was driven on the coast of Æthiopia; among the hospitable natives he distributed the unknown blessings of corn, wine, and dry figs, while his own curiosity was gratified with a catalogue of their barbarous words; and the prow of a foreign ship, inscribed with horses, which had been cast on their shore by the western winds.* In the port of Alexandria this fragment was recognised by the merchants of Cadiz, who even named the ship, a fishing vessel, which some years before was supposed to be lost beyond the river Lixus, on the western coast of Africa. Eudoxus now held the thread of discovery, but fear or indignation urged him to leave the unworthy court of Ptolemy Lathyrus, the son of Cleopatra. I slightly mention

* According to Pliny a similar wreck was found by Caius Cæsar, the grandson of Augustus, in the Red Sea. Such stories could not have been entertained had the ancients formed any just idea of the size of Africa; of the Cape which advances near thirty-five degrees into the southern hemisphere.

his

his return home, the sale of his estate, his visit to Italy and Marseilles, and his final departure from Cadiz with a great ship and two brigantines to explore the Atlantic ocean. Fired with the hope of reaching India, he supported the murmurs of his crew, and the loss of his vessels, built a small galley of fifty oars, and continued his route till he heard on the western, the same language which he had found on the eastern, side of the continent of Africa. On his return to the river Lixus he offered himself and his discoveries to the Moorish king, but the timid Bogud was apprehensive of opening his dominions to unknown enemies, and had not Eudoxus escaped to the Roman province of Spain, the dangerous secret might have been extinguished with his life. His second voyage from Cadiz was prepared with more prudence and skill: the form of his vessels was adapted to the seas and shores; and instead of an useless train of singing-girls and physicians, he enlisted a laborious company of husbandmen and artificers, resolving to winter on a verdant island which he had discovered in the ocean. It is here, at this critical moment, that Posidonius disappoints our curiosity, referring his readers to the Spaniards of Cadiz, as the most likely to be informed of the failure or success of the voyage of Eudoxus, against the reality of which the geographer Strabo has raised some idle and envious objections.

Of the four circumnavigations of Africa, three have been disproved, and the overthrow of Sataspes, Hanno, and Eudoxus must disturb the easy and early triumph of the Phœnicians of Nechus. Nor are these doubtful or fabulous expeditions attested by the consent of ages. The spirit and perhaps the records of naval enterprise were lost in the destruction of Tyre and Carthage; and their conquerors were unwilling to believe even the real achievements, which they were unable to imitate. The world of the Greeks, the Romans, and the Arabians was circumscribed within a narrow outline. Some geographers, accidentally stumbling on the truth, affirm or rather suspect that Africa, except in the isthmus of Suez, is encompassed by an open and navigable sea. But a large majority, in weight as well as in number, represent the climates beyond the equator as unknown or impervious; a torrid zone in which no mortals can breathe, a shallow and muddy ocean, in which no vessels can move, or an interposing tract of land, which joins in a southern latitude the continents of Æthiopia and India. By all who raised such insuperable barriers, the possibility of a circumnavigation was denied; but the few who admitted that it was possible might doubt or disbelieve that it had ever been actually performed.

Arrian,* or the nameless author who under the reign of Adrian has composed a description of the Red Sea, embraces, according to the style of antiquity, the Persian and Arabian Gulphs with a part of the ocean between India and Africa. He runs

* Arrian, Periplus Maris Erythræi, p. 150. Edit. Blancard.

the

the African coast to the city and promontory of Rhapta, which is placed by Ptolemy in the eighth degree of southern latitude. From thence, continues Arrian, the land turns to the west, and the surrounding ocean, WHICH HAS NEVER BEEN EXPLORED, at length mingles with the waters of the Atlantic. Under a Roman emperor the task of discovery might have been shortened, if his subjects had sailed in friendly correspondence from his ports of Egypt and Spain. But Adrian was not ambitious of conquest, his curiosity did not grasp the knowledge of the globe; and the endless promontory of the south would have soon exhausted the skill and patience of his mariners.

Above the crowd of vulgar geographers, Eratosthenes and Ptolemy exalt their heads, as the great masters of celestial and terrestrial science. Eratosthenes* was the first who dared to measure and delineate the earth: but in his erroneous system, a burning and desolate zone extends twelve degrees on either side of the equinoctial line. The land of cinnamon, on the eastern coast of Africa, is situate within the twelfth degree: it might be superfluous to add that none had ever penetrated beyond this term of our habitable world; but the sentence is of damning weight, from an universal scholar to whom Herodotus was familiar, and who commanded the treasures of the Alexandrian library.* The geographical sphere of Ptolemy† was enlarged by the Roman discoveries, and his own propensity to magnify space and distance beyond their real proportions. His promontory of Prasum, a Cape Verd on the eastern coast of Africa, is forced as low as the fifteenth degree of southern latitude: but he draws, from the neighbourhood of this cape, the line of an unknown continent, which is finally united with the country of the Asiatic Sinæ. Ptolemy reigned near fourteen centuries on earth, as well as in heaven; nor was the Greek oracle ever confuted by the experience of the Arabians.

* Eratosthenes Geographicorum Fragmenta, lib. ii. p. 63, &c. l. iii. p. 193. Gotting. 1789.

In the sublime fiction of Camoens,‡ the spirit of the Cape, arising from his stormy waves, at once accuses and applauds the Portuguese, the first of men who had explored their way round the southern promontory of Africa.

> Nor Roman prow, nor daring Tyrian oar,
> Ere dashed the white wave foaming to my shore:
> Nor Greece, nor Carthage, ever spread the sail
> On these my seas to catch the trading gale,
> You, you alone, have dared to plough my main,
> And with the human voice disturb my lonesome reign.

* It is generally agreed among scholars that Eratosthenes was styled βητα, not from being the second in every science, but as the second keeper (239—194 years before Christ) of the Alexandrian library. Fabricius, Bibliot. Græc. tom. ii. p. 471.

† Claud. Ptolemæus, l. iv. c. 9, l. vii. c. 4, in Bertii Theatrum Geographiæ Veteris, tom. i. p. 131—212.

‡ Mickle's Lusiad, p. 211, 212. An Englishman must praise the versification; the Portuguese acknowledge the fidelity of this elegant translation.

I WILL TAKE THE GHOST'S WORD FOR A THOUSAND POUNDS!

Nechus, King or Pharaoh of Egypt, who reigned six hundred years before the Christian era, is mentioned in the Hebrew Chronicles,* as well as by the father of Grecian history.† The mind of Nechus was susceptible of every kind of ambition: the Jews and Syrians fell before his arms; he entered Jerusalem in triumph; his empire was bounded by the Euphrates; and the ships of war which he built commanded the Mediterranean and the Red Sea. The execution of his canal from the Nile to the last mentioned sea might have changed the commerce of the world, but after expending the lives of an hundred and twenty thousand of his subjects, the King of Egypt was alarmed by an oracle, and turned his thoughts to the fame and advantage of naval discoveries. At his command, and in his vessels, a chosen band of Phœnicians penetrated from the Arabian gulf into the southern ocean, returned in the third year by the Straits of

* These Chronicles, the reign of Pharaoh-Necho, and the contemporary history of the east, are illustrated in the learned writings of the Christian chronologists, in the Animadversions of Scaliger, in the Annals of Archbishop Usher, in Prideaux's Connections, in Sir John Marsham's Canon Chronicus, in an Essai sur l'Histoire Orientale, in the Monde Primitif of M. Court de Gebelin. By these, and by many more, the Phœnician voyage round Africa is reported without a shadow of suspicion.

† Herodot. l. ii. c. 158, 159, p. 181, 182, l. iv. c. 42, p. 298. In every quotation of Herodotus I use the Greek edition of Wesseling, with his learned notes, and those of M. Larcher, the French translator, a scholar and a critic.

Gibraltar, and proved for the first time, that, except in the isthmus of Suez, the continent of Africa is on all sides encompassed by the sea. In the autumn of the first and second year, these bold navigators landed on some convenient spot, committed their seeds to the ground, patiently waited the returns of the next harvest, and resumed their voyage with a fresh supply of provisions. The Phœnicians reported that, in sailing round Africa, they had seen the sun on their right hand, "a phenomenon (says Herodotus) which to some may seem less incredible than it does to me."

Since the modern discoveries of the Portuguese, we know the possibility, and we suppose the reality of an ancient circumnavigation of Africa. The reign of Nechus is accurately fixed in the last and most authentic period of the history of Egypt: his father Psammetichus had opened the country to the Greeks, and his death did not happen more than one hundred and sixty years before the travels of Herodotus. An inquisitive spirit forms the character of the historian whose authority has been fortified by the improvement of criticism and science: he had visited Egypt before the chain of tradition was buried in the ruins of the temples and sacerdotal colleges: he investigated the remains of the docks or arsenals which Nechus had built; and the Pharaoh, after the example of Solomon, might reasonably entrust his vessels to the most skilful navigators of the east. The ignorance of the Greek might tempt him to deny, but his impartiality forbade him to dissemble, the astronomical cal fact, which, in our eyes, is the surest pledge of his veracity. As soon as they had passed the line, the sun would appear on the right hand of the Phœnicians.

I have allowed full weight to these specious probabilities, but I must object, with equal fairness, that Herodotus was a stranger in Egypt, who saw with his own eyes, but who heard with the ears of his careless or credulous interpreters. The priests were ambitious of impressing the minds of strangers with a splendid idea of their celestial and terrestrial science; and in the observatories of Thebes and Heliopolis, the astronomers could safely calculate the motions and aspects of the planets. A journal of the voyage of the Phœnicians, which Herodotus had never seen, must have demonstrated its truth or falsehood: their adventures would be measured by the standard of probability, and the seas and lands, the winds and seasons, the plants and animals, would be compared with the genuine and unalterable face of nature. But a southern communication between the Indian and Atlantic ocean might be affirmed or denied: the chance was equal; and a lucky guess may have usurped the honours of actual discovery. My surprise and suspicion are excited by the successful agriculture of the strangers in unknown climates and new soils; by the seeds of the temperate zone which yield their increase between the tropics: nor can I persuade myself that these infant navigators sailed round Africa in three summers to amuse the curiosity of a king of Egypt. The compass was in the hands of the Portuguese: they were stimulated by the spirit of chivalry, fanaticism, and avarice; yet after seventy years of labour and danger, their fruitless efforts were still repelled by THE CAPE OF TEMPESTS.

By the command of the Senate of Carthage, two admirals, Himilco and Hanno, were sent at the same time to navigate the northern and southern parts of the Atlantic ocean. HANNO sailed from Carthage with a fleet of sixty large ships, carrying a multitude of men, women, and children, which has been magnified to the incredible number of thirty thousand persons. In twelve days from the Straits of Gibraltar he reached the small island of Cerne or Arguin: planted seven cities or colonies for the benefit of trade, and fixed his last station at Cerne itself, which has since been occupied, disputed, and abandoned by the modern powers. As he advanced, he discovered a large river, most probably the Senegal, well-peopled with hippopotami and crocodiles; and his course was directed first to the south and afterwards to the east along the coast of Guinea. A chain of mountains, the Sierra-Leone, overlooked the ocean; and burning volcanos poured into its waves their torrents of liquid fire. In the heat of day all was silent; but the forests blazed with nocturnal lights, and re-echoed with the joyous sound of flutes, cimbals, and drums. In some slight encounters, the arms of the Carthaginians must prevail over the wandering natives, who spoke a language unknown to the Moorish interpreters. By their speed of foot the savages escaped; escaped; but the hairy skins of three female captives were exhibited as trophies at Carthage; and though Hanno mistook for women these mute and perverse animals, it is more probable that they were Pongos, the large monkey of human shape. The cape of Tres Puntas in Guinea, five degrees north of the equator, appears to have been the term of this whole Atlantic navigation of thirty-eight days: the scarcity of provisions compelled Hanno to return; nor does he seem to have detached any light vessels to prosecute the line of southern discovery. The date of his voyage rests, or rather floats on a period of four centuries (700 to 300 years before Christ;) but, for various reasons, I am inclined to sink it as low as the prosperity of the republic of Carthage will permit.

The journal or Periplus of Hanno* is still extant in a Greek version, nor can I agree with the idle suspicions of Dodwell that it has been changed or corrupted since its first appearance soon after the age of Aristotle.† This concise narrative was translated or abstracted from a Punic inscription on

* See the Periplus of Hanno in the first volume of Hudson's Geographi Minores, with Dodwell's Dissertation. Mariana. Hist. Hispan. tom. i. l. i. c. 22. p. 32, 33. Pomponius Mela, l. iii. c. 9. p. 401. cum Observat. Isaac Vossii. Bougainville sur le Voyage d'Hannon in Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xxvi. p. 10—46. tom. xxviii. p. 260—318.

† Aristot. περι θαυμασιων ακουσματων. c. xxxv. p. 77. Edit. Beckman. Gotting. 1786. This collection of wonderful stories is drawn from the writings of Aristotle, and may be ascribed to one of his first disciples.

a plate

a plate of brass or marble in the temple of Saturn at Carthage: the practice of these ancient records is acknowledged; and most of the proper names may be reasonably derived from the Hebrew or Phœnician idiom.* The Libyc books, the wanderings of Hanno, were indeed exposed on the Athenian stage as notorious fables; but the Greeks were at once credulous and sceptical; and even the ridicule attests the existence of the books and the fame of the voyage.† The trade and colonies of Carthage along the shores of the Atlantic and the Libyan deserts are firmly established: yet it must be allowed that one of our best witnesses, the geographer Scylax, denies the possibility of navigating beyond Cerne in a shallow and muddy ocean.‡

A much longer voyage of Hanno, the entire circumnavigation of Africa from the Straits of Gibraltar to the Red Sea, will not be supported by the single and hasty assertion of the elder Pliny. In the course of a work as extensive and various as Nature itself, his critical attention is often bewildered; and while he believes the most singular, he rejects the most simple circumstances of the Periplus of Hanno.§

While the liberality of Gelo and his brother Hiero attracted every stranger who could amuse or

* Bochart, Canaan. l. i. c. 37. in Opp. tom. i. p. 639—644.

† Athen. Deipnosophist. l. iii. c. 7. p. 83. Aristides in Oratione Ægyptiaca, in Opp. tom. ii. p. 356. Edit. Jebb.

‡ Scylacis Caryandensis Periplus, p. 53. in Geograph. Min. tom. i.

§ Plin Hist. Natur. ii. 67. v. 1. vi. 36.

instruct instruct the court of Syracuse, a Persian Mage related to the former of those princes that he himself had circumnavigated the whole continent of Africa.* An event of such magnitude cannot be lightly received on the single credit of a wandering priest, whose religion and country afford the fairest grounds of suspicion. The Magi abhorred the art of navigation, which tended to sully the purity of one of the sacred elements;† the Persians never aspired to the fame of a maritime people, and a voyage of distant discovery, though not incredible, must be deemed in their character a very singular adventure. It is certain however that in the time of Gelo and Xerxes,‡ they once attempted the circumnavigation of Africa, and the exaggerated tale of the Mage of Syracuse must be tried and reduced by the authentic relation of Herodotus, who derived his intelligence from the report of the Carthaginians.§

* This Mage had been introduced in one of the Dialogues of Heraclides Ponticus, a disciple of Plato and Aristotle, (Vossius de Historicis Græcis, l. i. c. 8, 9.) But his voluminous writings are now lost, as well as those of Posidonius, by whom this passage had been quoted, and we are now reduced to the testimony of Strabo. (Geograph. l. ii. p. 155. 158.)

† Plin. Hist. Natur. xxx. 7.

‡ This synchronism lasted seven years, 485—478, before Christ: but the Egyptian rebellion will not permit us to place the voyage of Sataspes before the third year (482) of the reign of Xerxes. (Herodot. l. vii. Diodor. Sicul. l. xi.)

§ See Herodot. l. iv. c. 48. p. 398, 299. Edit. Wesseling, and the excellent French version of M. Larcher, with his learned notes, tom. iii. p. 156. 405.

Under

Under the reign, and in the court of Xerxes, his kinsman Sataspes was condemned to be impaled for the crime of ravishing a noble virgin. But a mother, the sister of Darius, interceded for the guilty youth, on whom she promised to inflict a punishment not less terrible than death itself; and he accepted as the condition of his pardon the task of sailing round Libya, and returning home by the Red Sea. After preparing his ship and mariners in Egypt, Sataspes sailed beyond the columns of Hercules, and coasted along the African shore to the promontory of Soloe, (Cape Boyador,) from whence he steered his southern course in the Atlantic ocean. The natives whom he saw were of a diminutive stature: their garments were composed of the leaves of the palm tree: they were affrighted by the aspect of a naval monster, and wheresoever he landed, they fled into the country, abandoning their villages and cattle to the rapacious strangers. But Sataspes, who was not endowed with the spirit of discovery, beheld with anxious despair the prospect of an endless sea, and his complaint that his ship was stopped, that it would advance no farther, may be imputed to the dead calms that prevail in the neighbourhood of the line. The dangers and fatigues of his expedition and return might have expiated the crime of love: but the justice or revenge of Xerxes was inexorable: Sataspes was impaled according to the rigour of his first sentence; and his misfortunes, though not his character, may afford a faint similitude of our countryman Sir Walter Raleigh.

After

After the death of Sataspes, one of his eunuchs escaped to the isle of Samos with a large sum of money, of which he was defrauded by the perfidy of a Samian, whose name is forgotten by the tenderness of the father of history. The Asiatic Greeks maintained a free and frequent intercourse with Sicily: and a Mage, who had served as chaplain in the Libyan voyage, might accompany the eunuch's flight, and abuse the privilege of a traveller.

Before the arrival of the Portuguese, before the age of Mahomet, under the reign of Adrian,* the commerce and even the dominion of the Arabs was spread along the eastern shores of Africa on either side of the Equinoctial line. After a long and lucrative traffic, the Mahometans of Arabia were tempted by the nakedness of the people and the richness of the land; but in the ninth century, Zanguebar, the coast of the Zenghis, was still savage and idolatrous. The northern position of Magadoxo and Brava points them out as the most ancient settlements (A. H. 320, A. D. 932); the kingdom of Quiloa was founded (A. H. 400, A. D. 1009) by a Persian prince of the race of the Sultans of Shiraz; Melinda, Monbaza, and Sofala flourished in the twelfth century; these maritime colonies were increased by vagrant Bedoweens and Negro proselytes, and the reign of Islam extended to the isle of Madagascar and the tropic of Capricorn.†

The

* Arrian, in his Periplus of the Red Sea, is illustrated by d'Anville. Mémoires de l'Académie, tom. xxx. p. 88, &c.

† See the Arabians (Geograph. Nubiensis, p. 27, 28, Abulfeda, Geograph.

The contrast of the savage Africans may have embellished the portrait of the Arabians of Zanguebar, but the features of a rich and civilized people are not easily mistaken. According to the heat of the climate, and the fashion of the east, they were clothed in loose garments of silk or cotton; their turbans were of fine linen; nor did they neglect the elegant luxury of gold and gems. These ornaments might be brought from a distance, but the state of the colonies marked an high degree of wealth and improvement. The cities were populous and regular, the public and private buildings were of hewn stone or painted wood, the gardens were filled with the plants of India, the adjacent lands were cultivated with skill and care, and the inhabitants possessed great numbers of cattle and domestic animals. The iron-works of Melinda, the gold mines of Sofala were at once the monuments of their art, and the sources of their opulence. In war they employed the arms of antiquity, bows and arrows, scimetars and lances; the horsemen of Monbaza, and the archers of Melinda were renowned: but they were ignorant of the invention of gunpowder and the use of canon. These maritime colonies could not forget the art of navigation: they traded with Aden and Ormuz, with Cambaye and Calicut, but their Geograph. Tab. xxvii. p. 355, 356, and Yakouti in the Notices des MSS. de la Bibliothèque du Roi, tom. ii. p 395.) whose knowledge seems to have decayed with time. The Abbé Renaudot (Anciennes Relations des Indes, p. 303—308.) is most instructive.

course

course was directed by the monsoons, and they never ventured beyond the Cape of Currents in the twenty-fourth degree of southern latitude. The government of their petty states was loosely balanced by the Royal and Aristocratical powers: the Koran was the bond of union, but the rival sects of Omar and Ali excommunicated each other on this lonesome coast. The Arabians had introduced their language, and the rudiments of letters; but they were ill-provided with books, and it is only in the Lusiad, that a King of Melinda could be familiarized to the names of Homer and Ulysses.*

From the Senegal to the Cape of Currents, Vasco de Gama had seen no vessels on the ocean except his own. After passing that cape, the canoes of the negroes, their artificial trinkets, and their vague reports denounced his approach to a civilized, perhaps to an Indian world. The first interview of the two nations was in the isle of Mozambique; the thundering arms of the Portuguese astonished the Arabians, and applauded the hero who had emerged from the storms and darkness of the south. But Gama could not long dissemble that he was a Christian, the enemy of their faith, and the invader of their commerce: he abhorred the Moors, and the belief that all Mahometans were Moors has propagated the African name to the extremities of Asia. The open or secret enmity

* The English translator of Camoens justifies this impropriety by an old Syriac version of Homer; but the fact is doubtful, and the inference ridiculous. (Mickle's Introduction.)

which

which laboured to destroy his ships, and intercept his return, is more easily explained than the hospitable welcome, and important aid which he received from the Princes of Melinda. In twenty-three days he traversed without care or danger, an ocean of seven hundred leagues, from Melinda to Calicut. His trusty pilot, an Indian of Guzarat, steered the well-known course by a compass, a quadrant, and a marine chart, and his experience or prejudice despised the astronomical instruments of Europe.

According to the most liberal computation, Vasco de Gama discovered no more than twenty degrees of southern latitude from the Cape of Good Hope to Mozambique. But a thin veil separated Lisbon and India, and the last adventurer, by whom it was removed, has usurped the sole honours of the circumnavigation of Africa. Yet Gama might boast that by him alone the equinoctial line had been crossed four times, and that he had achieved in two years the longest voyage which had been performed by the sons of men.*

The African trade of the Portuguese, as it is described by Mosto, may afford some glimpses into the inland geography of that vast continent, an obscure scene which has been less invisible to the Arabian Moors† than to any other nation of the ancient or modern world.

By

* Osorius de Rebus Lusitanicis, l. i. Mariana, Hist. Hispan. l. xxvi. c. 17—20. tom. iii. p. 217—228. Hist. Générale des Voyages, tom. i.

† I have before me the Latin Version of the Sherif al Edrisi, so

By the care of Prince Henry the little island of Arguin, near Cape Blanco, was settled and fortified: but he gave a monopoly of ten years to his own exclusive company. After some hostilities against the Azenaghis, the last shade between the whites and blacks, their alliance was found to be more conducive to the interest of trade, and even of religion. They pitched their tents from Mount Atlas to the Senegal: their hard and wandering life qualified them to be the carriers of the desert; and Hoden, a station in their country, was in the road of the Moorish caravans. Six days journey from Hoden, Teggazza possessed a mine of rock-salt, which was greedily purchased and used by the natives of the torrid zone to preserve, as they believed, their blood from putrefaction. The camels laden with salt travelled in forty days from Teggazza to Tombuto, in thirty more from Tombuto to Melli, a city and kingdom whose place our ignorance cannot ascertain:* but such were the difficulties of the way, that of an hundred camels not more than twenty-five were expected to return. Melli was frequented by the Mahometans of Egypt and Barbary; and the silk of Grenada was often so foolishly styled the Geographia Nubiensis, by the Maronites (Paris, 1619, in 4to.), and the Italian original of Leo Africanus, first published by Ramusio (tom. 1. fol. 1—104). The English translations from these writers, in Moore's Travels into Africa (Appendix, p. 1—79), are executed by no vulgar hand.

* D'Anville's Great Map of Africa affords not any traces of Melli, which is however described by Leo (P. vii. fol. 84.), and which seems to be the Malel of Edrisi. (Geograph. Nubiens. Clim. i. P. ii. p. 10.)

exchanged for the gold and slaves of the most inward Africa. This valuable cargo was distributed in three different channels. The Eastern caravan, the merchants of Grand Cairo, repassed an unknown desert from the Niger to the Nile. The western caravan, after moving in a body from Melli to Tombuto, was separated in the two streams of Tunis and Morocco. The latter approached the sea coast of Arguin: the manufactures of Europe intercepted some portion of the gold-dust, and seven or eight hundred blacks were annually exported for the use of the Portuguese. Ramusio, whose views of commerce are just and enlarged, exhorts the nations to invade the monopoly of salt; to lade their ships at the islands of Cape Verd, and to penetrate by the Senegal, and the Gambia, into the golden regions of Africa. But the negligence of the Europeans, or the invincible obstacles of nature, have hitherto prevented the execution of this splendid design.

But the exchange, with an invisible people, of salt for gold is described by Cadamosta on the faith of the itinerant Arabs. From Melli the salt was transported on men's shoulders to a great lake or river of fresh water where it was left without a guard on the shore. The merchants of Melli, and some unknown strangers who arrived in large boats, had their respective hours for visiting this solitary market: the heaps of gold-dust which the purchasers deposited were proportioned to the value of the salt; and as soon as the scales were equal, the price was accepted, the merchandize was removed, removed, and the whole transaction was concluded without seeing each other's faces, but without a suspicion of fraud or violence. It is added that a King of Melli indulged his curiosity to know these mysterious traders: but that a captive who had been surprised in an ambuscade, obstinately rejected all food, and died on the fourth day without having shewn the power or inclination to speak. The singularity of the transaction, some circumstances of gross fable, and the silence of Leo Africanus* may provoke a legitimate doubt: but this mode of invisible traffic is reported by Herodotus,† whom the Venetian had never read, and by the Moors of Barbary who had never heard of the Venetian.‡

A question naturally arises whether Prince Henry explored the Atlantic, the sea of darkness as it was styled by the Arabs, in search of a southern passage to the spicy regions of India. The views of Cadamosta do not seem to reach beyond the fame and profit of his immediate discoveries: but the views of a soldier are not those of his general, and the largest designs are most worthy of a hero who was deeply skilled in the cos-

* Yet we may prove from Leo or Edrisi the scarcity of salt, the plenty of gold, and the fresh-water lakes in the midst of Africa.

† Herodot. l. iv. c. 196. He gives, indeed, this trade to the Carthaginians and places the invisibles on the sea-coast.

‡ Shaw's Travels, p. 239. This learned traveller appears himself unacquainted with the original passage of Herodotus, or the narrative of Cadamosta.

mography of the age. I can admit that he cherished a secret and distant hope of circumnavigating Africa: nor shall I arraign the gratitude of posterity, which has placed on his head the naval crowns of his successful disciples. Their ardour was chilled, about twenty years, under the reign of his nephew Alphonso V. a reign of foreign and domestic war; but the African voyage was prosecuted by the industry of John II. and finally achieved by the fortune of Emanuel. Their royal efforts directly pointed to India and the spicy trade; the spirit of the court encouraged the Portuguese to press forwards on the ocean, with a brave disdain of prejudice at home and danger abroad. The genius of Columbus tormented Europe, and awakened Spain: but Vasco de Gama was a chosen servant who executed with prudence and resolution the commands of his sovereign.

The thirty-seven years (1460—1497) between the decease of Henry, and the voyage of Gama, had opened a more extensive sphere of theory and practice. The study of the ancients had been revived: the copies of their writings were multiplied; and before the accession of John II. (1481), the original text of Pliny, and the Latin versions of Herodotus and Strabo had been repeatedly printed at Rome and Venice.* The circumnavigation of Africa by the Phœnicians and Persians, by Hanno and Eudoxus, became the favourite

* See the Greek and Latin Bibliothecæ of Fabricius and the Annales Typographici of Mattaire.

theme

theme of discourse; and the fabulous or doubtful tales of antiquity rekindled the courage and promoted the discoveries of the modern Argonauts. A planisphere, or map of the world,* was delineated in the Convent of Murano at Venice: the kings of Portugal employed and rewarded the ingenious monk; and the most perfect edition of his work was long exhibited in a Benedictine Abbey in the neighbourhood of Lisbon. Marine charts, such as may be still extant in our libraries, were drawn by Italian artists and distributed to Portuguese commanders; and the outline of old knowledge, and recent conquest, announced the subject or, at least, the field of inquiry. The mathematicians of John II., two physicians of Jewish names, and a German cosmographer, the famous Martin Behaim of Nuremberg, invented the astrolabe and calculated tables of declination;† the art of navigation was improved, and instead of creeping along the shore, the mariners of Europe gave themselves to the deep. The eastern direction of the coast of Guinea seemed to open a speedy prospect of India: but when the African continent again pointed to the south, the hopes of the Portuguese were blasted; they viewed with astonishment the stars of a * Tiraboschi, Istoria della Letteratura Italiana, tom. vi. P. i. 216. Modena, 1790. For the planisphere of Murano he quotes the Annales Camal. (of the Camaldoli) tom. vii. p. 252. Mr. Senebier, p. 211, describes some maps of the 15th century in the library of Geneva.

† Geddes's Church History of Æthiopia, p. 39.

new hemisphere, and long hesitated on the verge of the equator. The thirty-five degrees of southern latitude from the line to the southern promontory were discovered in two successive voyages by the captains of John II.: the promontory was turned; and a just confidence in the powers of man imposed on the Cape of Tempests the more auspicious name of CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

I am told, but I do not believe, that the King of Portugal received from Congo the first intelligence of the Christian Empire of Abyssinia: the unknown space between the Nile and the Zayre is occupied by deserts and savages; and a more easy mode of intercourse may be found in the common pilgrimage of Jerusalem. The curiosity of John II. was imperfectly gratified: his first messengers returned after a feeble and fruitless effort: his second ambassadors were more worthy of their trust, but Payva died in Abyssinia, and his associate Covigliam was detained a perpetual exile in that solitary land. Yet, before his captivity, the intrepid Covigliam had transmitted home an account of his first labours. From the Red Sea, he had visited the coasts of the ocean as far as Calicut on the Indian and Sofala on the African side. At Calicut he had seen the great market of oriental spices; at Sofala he had learned from the Arabian mariners, that the southern ocean is boundless and navigable; and he justly concluded that the Caravels which traded to Guinea might explore their way to the isle of Madagascar and the shores of Malabar.

bar.* Columbus plunged into the sea of darkness: but the merit of Gama is somewhat abated by the previous inspiration of hope and knowledge.

From the designs of Prince Henry to their final accomplishment by Vasco de Gama, the Portuguese discoveries of Africa and India have been the theme of many historians: but the copious stream which uniformly flows in the same channel is derived from a muddy and penurious source. The inquisitive Ramusio (1550) deplores the negligence of the kings of Portugal, who should have required and preserved the fresh memorials of each successful expedition. That no more than four persons had survived to commemorate the acts of their countrymen is the complaint of Castaneda (1553), a laborious historian, who might converse with Gama himself, and who had exhausted the original archives of Lisbon and Goa. The narrative of the two African voyages of Cadamosta the Venetian is the only composition of the fifteenth century which has reached my knowledge:† that

* Covigliam himself related his adventures to Francesco Alvares, who was found in Abyssinia (1520), after an exile of thirty years. Viaggio della Ethiopia, c. 103. in Ramusio, tom. i. fol. 254.

† See the Italian original of the narrative of M. Aluise da Cadamosta in the Collection of Ramusio, tom. i. folio 104—121; a Latin version in the Novus Orbis of Grynæus, and a French abstract in the Histoire Générale des Voyages, tom. ii. p. 285—321. Cadamosta left Venice August the 8th, A. D. 1454, at the age of twenty-two; he performed his two voyages in the years 1455 and 1456, and he finally quitted Portugal the 1st of February, 1463.

curious navigator describes the scenes in which he was personally engaged; his fancy was not inflamed by patriotism; nor could his judgment be affected by any subsequent events. From this contemporary monument, I shall extract the purest idea of the primitive designs and discoveries of Prince Henry and his associates.

From his castle on the shores of the Atlantic, near Cape Lagos in Portugal, Prince Henry encouraged and improved the art of navigation, without trusting his person to the ocean. The trade between Italy and Flanders passed before him, and Cadamosta himself is an example how liberally he engaged the service of the most skilful seamen, and the bravest spirit of the age. His original motives were religion and chivalry: the master of the order of Christ was bound by the injunction of a dying father to pursue the Moors on the sea as well as on the land: but his zeal was soon directed by curiosity, and his curiosity was rewarded with the first fruits of commerce. His Caravels, which annually infested the coast of Azafi and Messa, were urged by his powerful voice beyond the tremendous capes of Non and Boyador; they slowly moved along a sandy desert of a thousand miles, which drinks the waters of the Atlantic, and explored the Senegal and the Gambia, that separate the countries of the whites and the blacks. From the fertile and populous banks of these rivers they still advanced to the south; but the Sierra Leone appears to be the most remote discovery of Prince Henry,

Henry, who in the labour of forty years did not attain the term of the navigation of Hanno. But the Canaries, or Fortunate Islands, had emerged from the darkness of the middle age, and the vessels of Portugal were driven by the winds, or guided by the compass, to the more distant isles of Madeira and Cape Verd. The commercial profits of Prince Henry and his associates, which sometimes exceeded one thousand per cent. were derived from various sources. The settlement of Madeira had been rapid and useful; and the four colonies of the island consisted of eight hundred Christians, of whom one hundred were qualified to serve on horseback. A large quantity of cedar and rose-wood was annually exported, the sugar-canes which Prince Henry introduced surpassed in their produce those of Cyprus and Sicily, and the vines of Candia derived a new flavour from the soil and climate. A plentiful fishery atoned in some degree for the barrenness of the desert. Arguin was enriched by the inland trade; and the land of the Negroes afforded a fair promise of gold-dust, ivory and slaves.

It is curious to observe how strongly in this first interview the superiority of the whites was felt and acknowledged by the blacks. The Portuguese sails as they swelled to the wind were mistaken by the Azenaghis for enormous birds: when the ships lay at anchor near the shore they assumed the form of sea-monsters, and in their rapid motions they were likened to the spirits of the air and deep. The Negroes trembled at the sound and effect of the muskets muskets and cannon, one of which, as it was said, could destroy an hundred enemies at a single blast. They admired the dress and music, the arts, the luxury, the riches of the Europeans, who enjoyed their paradise in this world, and who surpassed in power and knowledge the magicians and perhaps the deities of Africa. But an opinion prevailed on the banks of the Gambia, that the black slaves, who were embarked in the foreign vessels, supplied with a grateful food the polite cannibals of Europe. If we follow the fate of these unhappy men, this false suspicion is rather favourable than injurious to Christian humanity.

Of the maritime nations of Europe the French have had the smallest share in the fame and benefits of the great naval discoveries. Yet their authors pretend, that they were the first, after the fall of the Roman empire, who sailed along the coast of Africa beyond the southern limit of the world. Before the year 1364, the ships of Normandy had penetrated as far as Cape Verd, the river Senegal, and the mountains of Sierra Leone; and in the month of September, 1365, an act of association was signed between the merchant adventurers of Dieppe and Rouen. The joint efforts of this trading company produced a rapid increase of wealth and knowledge: the domestic names of Paris and Dieppe were applied to the new factories on the coast of Guinea; and a French title is maintained to the original foundation (1383—1386) of the well known fort and settlement of St. George de la Mina. But the civil confusions of France were soon renewed by the insanity of Charles VI. (1392); the spirit of commerce and navigation evaporated; the sons of opulent traders aspired to the rank of gentlemen and soldiers; their African colonies were deserted or destroyed, and this French discovery vanished like a dream from the coast of Guinea and the memory of men.*

soon

It is indeed a dream.—I will not deny that the Normans of the fourteenth century frequented the Atlantic Ocean, that their ships, returning with a cargo of Spanish wines, might be driven far away to the southward, and that the conquest of the Canary islands was first undertaken by a private gentleman of Normandy. But this offspring of national vanity, this fable of a Senegal and Guinea Company may be annihilated by some short and simple reflections. 1. Less than thirty years (1334—1364) cannot decently be assigned for the first and most laborious steps of the Atlantic navigation, and these years must fall on the calamitous reigns of Philip of Valois and his son John. The military strength of the kingdom was lost in the fields of Creçy and Poitiers: two hundred and thirty ships and thirty thousand seamen were destroyed in a naval engagement: Normandy was invaded by the English, Caen was pillaged; the miseries of war and faction aggravated each other; the wealth of France was drained for a king's ransom; and the great great plague swept away the third part of the human race. And was this a time?——2. The writers of the age are ignorant (and they could not have been ignorant) of these African discoveries. Such exploits would have been enrolled by the historians of Charles V. among the peaceful triumphs of his reign. Would not the archives of France and England afford some acts of regulation or favour to the Norman Company? Must not the new commodities of Guinea, gold-dust, ivory, and Negroes, have been soon noticed in the market of Bruges? Could the curious and vagrant Froissard never meet a talkative mariner who had sailed beyond the tropic? The fourteenth century might be inattentive to the benefits of trade; the genuine or specious miracles of an Atlantic voyage would have been transcribed and read as eagerly as a romance of chivalry or the legend of a saint. 3. The Portuguese may assert the faith of their own historians, but the Venetian Cadamosta was a contemporary and a stranger: and Cadamosta affirms that their discoveries were long checked by the supposed impossibility of passing Cape Boyador. Could such an impossibility have been supposed, if the French vessels had been seen within the memory of man steering an annual course to their Guinea settlements above twenty degrees southward of the impassable cape? 4. This pile of improbabilities is raised on an airy basis. I might peruse with attention the original act of association in the archives of Dieppe: but, alas! these archives have been consumed by fire (1694). I will smile at the reference to some anonymous manuscripts in the library of a town lawyer, whose name is discreetly suppressed. Nor shall I deign to examine the collateral proofs, a vague appellation, a broken date, and the old attachment of the Negroes for the French nation. 5. The motive of this idle fiction may be easily detected. In the beginning of the seventeenth century, the Senegal and Guinea trade was actually exercised by the African Company of Dieppe and Rouen. These merchant adventurers were prompted by interest as well as pride to magnify the antiquity of their house, to claim the inheritance of the golden coast, and to urge, against the Portuguese, a prior right of discovery and possession.

* See two works of Père Labat, L'Afrique Occidentale, tom. i. p. 6—16. and Voyage en Guinée, tom. i. p. 133. 238, &c. and likewise l'Histoire Générale des Voyages, tom. ii. p. 424. tom. iv. p. 2, &c.

to

SELECTIONS

FROM

MR. GIBBON'S

EXTRAITS RAISONNÉS DE MES LECTURES,

FROM

THE JOURNAL,

FROM

THE RECUEIL DE MES OBSERVATIONS ET PIÈCES DÉTACHÉES,

COMMON-PLACE BOOKS AND MEMORANDA.

SELECTIONS, &c.

EXTRAITS RAISONNÉS DE MES LECTURES.

Dover, 14th March, 1761.

"LA lecture est à l'esprit ce que vos perdrix sont à mes joues," said the Duke of Vivonne to Lewis XIV. It is, in fact, the nourishment of the mind; for by reading, we know our Creator, his works, ourselves chiefly, and our fellow-creatures. But this nourishment is easily converted into poison. Salmasius had read as much as Grotius, perhaps more. But their different modes of reading made the one an enlightened philosopher; and the other, to speak plainly, a pedant puffed up with an useless erudition.

Let us read with method, and propose to ourselves an end to which all our studies may point. Through neglect of this rule, gross ignorance often disgraces great readers; who, by skipping hastily and irregularly from one subject to another, render themselves incapable of combining their ideas. So many detached parcels of knowledge cannot form a whole. This inconstancy weakens the energies of the mind, creates in it a dislike to application, and even robs it of the advantages of natural good sense.

Yet, let us avoid the contrary extreme; and respect method, without rendering ourselves its slaves. While we propose an end in our reading, let not this end be too remote; and when once we have attained it, let our attention be directed to a different subject. Inconstancy weakens the understanding: a long and exclusive application to a single object hardens and contracts it. Our ideas no longer change easily into a different channel, and the course of reading to which we have too long accustomed ourselves, is the only one that we can pursue with pleasure.

We ought besides, to be careful, not to make the order of our thoughts subservient to that of our subjects; this would be to sacrifice the principal to the accessory. The use of our reading is to aid us in thinking. The perusal of a particular work gives birth, perhaps, to ideas unconnected with the subject of which it treats. I wish to pursue these ideas; they withdraw me from my proposed plan of reading, and throw me into a new track, and from thence, perhaps, into a second, and a third. At length I begin to perceive whither my researches tend. Their result, perhaps, may be profitable; it is worth while to try: whereas, had I followed the high road, I should not have been able, at the end of my long journey, to retrace the progress of my thoughts.

This plan of reading is not applicable to our early studies, since the severest method is scarcely sufficient to make us conceive objects altogether new. Neither can it be adopted by those who read in order to write; and who ought to dwell on their subject till they have sounded its depths. These reflections, flections, however, I do not absolutely warrant. On the supposition that they are just, they may be so, perhaps, for myself only. The constitution of minds differs like that of bodies. The same regimen will not suit all. Each individual ought to study his own.

To read with attention, exactly to define the expressions of our author, never to admit a conclusion without comprehending its reason, often to pause, reflect, and interrogate ourselves; these are so many advices which it is easy to give, but difficult to follow. The same may be said of that almost evangelical maxim of forgetting friends, country, religion, of giving merit its due praise, and embracing truth wherever it is to be found.

But what ought we to read? Each individual must answer this question for himself, agreeably to the object of his studies. The only general precept that I would venture to give, is that of Pliny,* "to read much, rather than many things;" to make a careful selection of the best works, and to render them familiar to us by attentive and repeated perusals. Without expatiating on the authors so generally known and approved, I would simply observe, that in matters of reasoning, the best are those who have augmented the number of useful truths; who have discovered truths, of whatever nature they may be: in one word, those bold spirits, who quitting the beaten tract, prefer being in the wrong alone, to being in the right with the multitude. Such authors increase the number of our ideas, and even their mistakes are useful to their successors. With all the respect due to Mr. Locke, I would not, however, neglect the works of those academicians, who destroy errors without hoping to substitute truth in their stead. In works of fancy, invention ought to bear away the palm; chiefly that invention which creates a new kind of writing; and next, that which displays the charms of novelty, in its subject, characters, situations, pictures, thoughts, and sentiments. Yet this invention will miss its effect, unless it be accompanied with a genius, capable of adapting itself to every variety of the subject; successively sublime, pathetic, flowery, majestic, and playful; and with a judgment which admits nothing indecorous, and a style which expresses well whatever ought to be said. As to compilations, which are intended merely to treasure up the thoughts of others, I ask whether they are written with perspicuity, whether superfluities are lopped off, and dispersed observations skilfully collected; and agreeably to my answers to those questions, I estimate the merit of such performances.

* Plinii Secundi Epist. lib. vii. epist. ix.

When we have read with attention, there is nothing more useful to the memory than extracts. I speak not of those collections, or adversaria, which may be serviceable in their own way, but of extracts made with reflection, such as those of Photius, and of several of our modern journalists. I purpose in this manner to give an account to myself of my reading. My method will vary with the subject. In works of reasoning, I will trace their general plan, explain the principles established, and examine the consequences deduced from them.

them. A philosopher is unworthy of the name, whose work is not most advantageously viewed as a whole. After carefully meditating my subject, the only liberty I shall take, is that of exhibiting it under an arrangement different perhaps from that of my author. Works of fancy contain beauties, both of plan and of execution: I shall be attentive to both. History, if little known, deserves an abridgment. I shall extract such particulars as are new. Throughout, I shall give my opinion with becoming modesty, but with the courage of a man unwilling to betray the rights of reason. In this compilement, I shall collect my scattered thoughts, with the reflections of every sort that occur in my search for truth. For I shall continue to search for the truth, though hitherto I have found nothing but probability.

Aug. 24th, 1761.]—I read Mr. Bonamy's Reflections upon the Geographical Errors occasioned by Alexander's Historians, Mem. xxv. p. 40—54; very solid: and M. de la Bleterie's Mem. upon the Tribunitian Power of the Emperors, Mem. xxv. p. 392—440; much inferior to his former dissertations.

25th.]—I read M. de la Nauze's Dissertation upon the ancient Roman Calendar, Mem. xxvi. p. 219—257; most excellent: I never understood the Roman Calendar before.

26th.]—I read M. de la Nauze a second time, and meditated him thoroughly.

Aug. 28th.]—I read M. de Guigner's Memoir upon the Destruction of the Greek Monarchy in Bactriana, Mem. xxv. p. 17—34; singular: and M. d'Anville's upon the Nation and Religion of the Getæ, ib. p. 34—47; judicious.

Sept. 1st.]—I read the first Dissertation of the Count de Caylus, upon ancient Painting.

2d.]—I read the Count de Caylus's second Dissertation.

3d.]—I began M. de la Nauze's Memoir upon the Manner Pliny has treated of ancient Painting.

4th.]—I finished it.

5th.]—I read M. de Caylus's third Dissertation. Though Caylus has a much higher reputation, I should myself prefer De la Nauze; in French I should say, Celui-ci a écrit en homme de lettres amateur, celui-là en amateur homme de lettres. De la Nauze is learned, methodical, full of taste, perhaps sometimes not precise enough. Caylus's observations are without any plan, too minute, and sometimes, when stripped of their technical dress, injudicious. However, his comparison of the ancient and modern painters shews a knowledge of the beauties and masters of the art. They are both contained in tom. xxv. Mem. p. 149—302. I read the first Memoir of M. de Caylus upon ancient Sculpture.

6th.]—I read the second Memoir upon Sculpture, tom. xxv. p. 302—368. They are much superior to those upon painting; as the author probably never practised sculpture, he attaches himself less to the manual exercise of the art.

Sept.

Sept. 7th.]—I read M. de Caylus upon the Mausoleum, tom. xxvi. p. 321—335.

8th.]—I read four parts of the Bibliothèque des Sciences et des Beaux Arts, from July, 60, to July, 61; a plain, sensible journal.

11th.]—I read M. Freret's Observations upon the Marble of Paros, tom. xxvi. p. 157—219: the general remarks, interesting; the inquiry into the date of the death of Darius, ingenious and satisfactory; the whole very profound: and M. de Belley's Explanation of a Camayeu in the Duke of Orleans cabinet; very probable: tom. xxvi. p. 475—486.

12th.]—I read Belley's Explanation of an Agate in the Duke of Orleans' cabinet; like the former: tom. xxvi. p. 486—504: and M. d'Anville's Inquiry into the Source of the Nile; tom. xxvi. p. 34—46; leaves it as obscure as ever.

Oct. 2d.]—I ran over M. de la Beau's Memoir upon the Roman Legion, in tom. xxvi. of the Academy: one or two Epistles of Horace; with Dacier and Sanadon; and Soame Jenyns's Inquiry into the Origin of Evil; and perused for the second time, with infinite pleasure, M. de la Nauze's fine Memoir upon ancient Painting.

Feb. 8th, 1762.]—Having finished Hurd's Horace, given a second perusal to two principal discourses, and thoroughly meditated the whole subject, I began to make an Extrait raisonné of it. At the same time I employed my leisure moments in going through the famous Argenis of Barclay, with which I was much entertained; and, with a view to Homer, perused for the second time a very considerable part of Mezeriac's Ovid.

March 18th.]—I finished at last my abstract of Mr. Hurd, which consists of thirty pages in folio: though it took me up much more time than I imagined, by running into so unexpected a length, yet I do not regret it, as it started a new train of ideas upon many curious points of criticism. To get a little nearer to Homer, of whom I have never lost sight, I read the Inquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer.

27th.]—At last I returned to Homer, and beginning where I had left off, read L. v. V. 1—404.

28th.]—Read of the Iliad L. v. V. 405—606. At the same time I resolved every day to learn, and write down, a certain number of the Racines Grecques; and to-day went through the four first.

29th.]—Learnt and wrote the Racines Grecques, Stang. 4—8. Read of the Iliad, L. v. V. 606—909; and beginning, for the second time, the Inquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer, read page 1—56.

30th.]—Went through the Racines Grecques, from 8—12; but read no Homer.

31st.]—I read the Inquiry, page 56—80: went through Racines Grecques, 12—16; and reviewed the first three hundred lines of the fifth book of the Iliad.

April 1st.]—Went through Racines Grecques, 16—20; and reviewed the remaining six hundred lines of the fifth Iliad. I likewise read v. 215—295, of the eleventh Æneid, in relation to Æneas and Diomede.

April

April 2d.]—Went through Racines Grecques, 20—24. The method I pursue is this: after reading them attentively, I write them down from my memory, looking in the book as seldom as I can. I then repeat them twice; first mentioning the French word that answers to the Greek; then the Greek word that answers to the French. At last I repeat the French of every Greek root of the present, and two preceding days. I find this method, though dry, helps me very much.

3d.]—Went through Racines Grecques, 24—28. Read the sixth book of the Iliad, from v. 325—529, the end.

6th.]—I only went through Racines Grecques, 32—36; and read the seventh book of the Iliad, v. 123—199.

7th.]—I went through Racines Grecques, 36—40; and read the seventh book of the Iliad, v. 199—482.

8th.]—I went through Racines Grecques, 40—44; reviewed the whole seventh book of the Iliad, and read the eighth, v. 1—40.

9th.]—I went through Racines Grecques, 44—48; but read no Homer.

13th.]—I read the eighth book of the Iliad, v. 401—561, the end.

14th.]—In the morning I reviewed the whole eighth book of the Iliad; went through the Racines Grecques, 48—52, and finished the Inquiry, p. 216—335.

26th.]—I read great part of the second volume of D'Alembert's Mélanges; very sensible, and well written.

April

April 29th]—Read the Bibliothèques des Sciences et des Beaux Arts, for October, November, and December, 1761. I found in it an extract of my Essay: they speak very highly of it, and promise great things of me, p. 368—380.

30th.]—I read the ninth book of the Iliad, v. 1—306.

May 2d.]—I read the ninth book of the Iliad, v. 306—542.

3d.]—I read of the Iliad, Lib. ix. v. 542—709, the end; and reviewed the first hundred lines of it.

5th.]—I read the tenth book of the Iliad, v. 70—879, and reviewed the whole book.

6th.]—I read the Æneid, L. ix. v. 126—502, in order to compare the story of Nisus and Euryalus related in it, with the night adventure in the Iliad. They have both beauties, but of a different kind. By his strong characters, and lively descriptions, Homer speaks powerfully to the curiosity and imagination of the reader. The amiable manners, tender friendship, and unhappy fate of Virgil's heroes, are truly pathetic, and make the deepest impression on the heart. I likewise read the eleventh book of the Iliad, v. 1—542. As I go on with Homer, he becomes much easier to me: I am master of a greater stock of words; the turn of his style, his dialects, and his poetical licences, are become more familiar to me.

8th.]—I reviewed the first four hundred and fifty lines of the eleventh book of the Iliad.

9th.]—I reviewed the remaining four hundred lines lines of the eleventh book of the Iliad; and read the twelfth, v. 1—309. I likewise consulted Mezeriac's Ovid, tom. i. p. 171—179, in relation to the omens from the flight of birds, in order to understand the speech of Hector to Polydamus. From the materials which Mezeriac laid before me, I conceived a much clearer notion of the subject than he had himself.

May 10th.]—I received a letter from Mr. Scott, in which, according to his promise, he lays down for me a course of studies, both in the pure and mixed mathematics; pointing out the merit and defects of the principal writers in every branch of them. I can hardly put any of his directions in practice before next winter. I read, to-day, of the Iliad, L. xii. v. 309—471, the end, reviewing the whole twelfth book; and read L. xii. v. 1—273.

11th.]—Read the Iliad, L. xiii. v. 273—837, the end, and reviewed the first five hundred lines of that book.

12th.]—I reviewed the remaining three hundred and forty lines of the thirteenth book of the Iliad; and read the fourteenth, v. 1—108. My diligence to-day was much inferior to the preceding ones.

14th.]—I received from London two volumes of Mémoires Militaires sur les Grecs et sur les Romains, par M. Guichardt. The author, who was in the Dutch, and is now, I believe, in the Prussian service, proposes to correct the numerous mistakes of the Chevalier de Folard, and to explain the principal military actions of the ancients according to their best historians, and the true principles ciples of their tactics. This book drew me away for some time from Homer; I read, but in a cursory manner, the first volume.

May 15th.]—I read, but in the same cursory manner, the second volume of Guichardt's Mémoires.

16th.]—I began to read the Mémoires Militaires a second time; but with more attention. I read the preface, which is very judicious, and the four first chapters. The first is on the blockade of Agrigentum by the Romans in the first Punic war; and gives a clear idea of the superior advantages of the Roman intrenchments above our modern lines. The second is the battle of Tunis, between Regulus and Xantippus. Folard, explaining Polybius, blames Regulus for the only thing for which his author had commended him. The third is the battle of Macar, where the amazing manœuvres of Amilcar are displayed with great precision. The fourth, on the battle of the Adda, is a complete treatise on the Roman legion, very satisfactory as to the times of Polybius; very little so as to those of Cæsar.

17th.]—I read the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth chapters of the Mémoires. The fifth is the combat of the Ticinum; many good remarks on the ancient cavalry: the sixth is the battle of Trebia; the author illustrates still further the way of drawing up the legion, and explains the several manœuvres of the two armies very clearly: the seventh is a very insignificant affair at Germinem; but the eighth is the battle of Cannæ, the masterpiece of Hannibal, of Polybius, and, perhaps, of M. Guichardt. The columns of Folard, and the impracticable manœuvres of the Gauls disappear, and the art of Hannibal appears refined, but rational.

piece

May 18th.]—I read the ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth chapters of the Mémoires. Ninth, a very insignificant affair at Caphyæ, between the weak Aratus and some Æolian freebooters. Tenth, the battle of Mantinea, between Machanidas and Philopœmen: small numbers and refined art on both sides. Eleventh, the battle between Scipio and Asdrubal in Spain. M. Folard's columns, generally ideal, were really employed by Scipio in a superior manner. Twelfth, the battle of Zama; the merit of the generals, though great, being equal, left the victory to the bravest troops.

19th.]—I read the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth chapters of the Mémoires. Thirteenth, the battle of Cynocephala. Philip had formed a good plan, but did not know how to alter it, though he might have gained the victory. Fourteenth, the battle of the Granicus: Alexander's impetuosity seems directed by more military skill than is commonly thought. Fifteenth, the battle of Arbela, a complete practical lecture on the art of war; but are we indebted for that lecture to Alexander or to Arrian? The sixteenth, the blockade of Alisia: M. Guichardt does honour to Cæsar by diminishing the extent and number of his works: we can now both understand and believe them.

May

May 20th.]—I began the second volume of the Mémoires, and read the dissertation upon the attack and defence of places by the ancients; very clear and accurate. Their real methods are well described, and M. Guichardt proves, against the Chevalier de Folard, that they knew nothing of the modern trenches.

21st.]—I read in the Mémoires the translation of the military institutions of Onozander, full of that common-place sense which every one can write, and no one can deny.

22d.]—I read the Tactics of Arrian, translated in the Mémoires. They are very curious and exact, and give a very clear notion of the nature, arms, and discipline of the phalanx; but it is very odd Arrian should rather compile these Tactics from Greek writers, than write from his own knowledge an account of the Roman legions, which he had himself seen and commanded.

23d.]—I read the Analysis of Cæsar's Campaign in Africa. Every motion of that great general is laid open with a critical sagacity. A complete military history of his campaigns would do almost as much honour to M. Guichardt as to Cæsar. This finished the Mémoires, which gave me a much clearer notion of ancient tactics than I ever had before. Indeed, my own military knowledge was of some service to me, as I am well acquainted with the modern discipline and exercise of a battalion. So that though much inferior to M. Folard and M. Guichardt, who had seen service, I am a much better judge than Salmasius, Casaubon, or Lipsius;

Lipsius; mere scholars, who perhaps had never seen a battalion under arms.

May 26th.]—I read the Chevalier de Folard's Supplement to his Polybius, vide Le Polybe de Folard, tom. vii. p. 1—42. It shews the man of genius in every line; it consists chiefly of curious anecdotes, mistaken quotations, and whimsically ingenious observations. I likewise read the third letter of Les Sentimens d'un Homme de Guerre, in the same volume, p. 208—235. This Homme de Guerre was M. de Savornin, major-general in the Dutch service. He is certainly in the right in observing, that the Romans in general, and Cæsar at Pharsalia in particular, drew up their troops in three lines; but he has a most minute, heavy, and perplexed way of writing. I discovered a passage in Cæsar's Commentaries, l. i. c. 83, which is the key of the tactics of his age. Had M. Guichardt known of it, he might have avoided several mistakes.

31st.]—Before I left Blandford I finished the first six volumes of Fontenelle, which contain "toute la force et toute la fleur de son esprit." I read them at my leisure hours with great pleasure, particularly Entretiens sur la Pluralité des Mondes, Histoire du Théâtre François, &c. and the Eloges des Académiciens. The Histoire des Oracles, though excellent, is somewhat superficial. The Dialogues of the Dead are (if I may speak French) une débauche de raisonnement, as the Lettres du Chevalier d'Her . . . . une débauche d'esprit et de galanterie. I acknowledge all the defects of the Eclogues, but some of them are charming. I resolved resolved to substitute for my leisure hours the Bibliothèque of Le Clerc, as an inexhaustible source of amusement and instruction, and accordingly began with the first volume of the Bibliothèque Universelle.

June 6th.]—I formed a design, (but I doubt whether I shall find time to execute it,) to give part of my day to Homer and part to Quintilian; that is, to unite the example with the precept. Accordingly I began with Quintilian, in Burman's edition, read his article in Bayle's Dictionary, the preface of Burman; Burman was a mere critic, without being (in my opinion) a good one, since a good critic must reason well; and Burman never could reason at all. I began likewise the Annales Quintilianæi of Dodwell, and read c. 1—3.

7th.]—I continued the Annals, and read c. 3—20.

8th.]—I read the Annals, c. 20—47, which (including the Synopsis Chronologica) finished the Treatise. Dodwell's learning was immense; in this part of history especially, (that of the Upper Empire,) the most minute fact or passage could not escape him; and his skill in employing them is equal to his learning. The worst of this author is his method and style; the one perplexed beyond imagination, the other negligent to a degree of barbarism.

9th.]—I read of the Iliad, l. xiv. v. 1—522, the end. It required all the éclat of Homer's poetry to reconcile us to Jupiter's being deceived and laid asleep.

June

June 10th.]—I reviewed the fourteenth book of the Iliad, and read the fifteenth, v. 1—220. The scene of Jupiter and Neptune pleases me infinitely; besides the natural greatness of the action and actors, heightened by a most spirited narration, it gives a clearer idea of the Greek polytheism than the laborious researches of half our modern critics and divines.

11th.]—I read the fifteenth book of the Iliad, v. 220—746, the end. The remainder of this book is a continued and not very interesting battle. What chiefly distinguishes it, are some of the finest similies I have yet met with in the Iliad; and a variety of short speeches, of a truly spirited and military eloquence.

13th.]—I read the sixteenth book of the Iliad, v. 1—113.

14th.]—I wrote a note on page 30 of my Essai sur l'Etude de la Littérature, containing a passage of Florus, and another of Propertius; with observations on the latter.

17th.]—I finished the first volume of Le Clerc's Bibliothèque Universelle. I shall just mention the most curious books that are abstracted in it. Hugonis Grotii Epistolæ, Amsterdam, 1696, p. 1—29, and 121—166, curious and instructive. Temporum Mythicorum Historia, p. 245—280. I believe Le Clerc himself is the author. It is an ingenious application of a common principle; viz. that the heroic fables are only the Phœnician history corrupted, and their language misunderstood. Clementis Galani Historia Armena Coloniæ, 1686, a true missionary's account, full of curious facts and religious prejudices. Lightfooti Opera omnia, Roterodami, 1686. A classical author on a subject very little so. Lightfoot, by constant reading of the Rabbies, was almost become a Rabbin himself.

June 19th.]—I read the sixteenth book of the Iliad, v. 113—367, the end, and wrote a note on p. 79 of my Essai, containing some instances of the number, rarity, and variety of the animals produced in the amphitheatre of Rome; and taken from the writers of the Augustan history, with the remarks of Casaubon and Salmasius.

21st.—I reviewed the first hundred lines of the sixteenth book of the Iliad: the fierceness and anger of Achilles softened by friendship. The mild, amiable, and yet spirited character of Patroclus are admirably described and contrasted. Homer never shines more than in these moral pictures.

22d.]—I reviewed the remaining seven hundred and fifty lines of the sixteenth book of the Iliad. The description of the arms, leaders, &c. Achilles's speech to them, and his prayer, are solemn, and fill the mind with great ideas and expectations. They are fulfilled. Of all the heroes that fall throughout the Iliad, I pity none so much as Sarpedon; he was as amiable a character as Patroclus, and a much greater one. I read the seventeenth book, v. 1—105. I likewise, to understand the sixteenth, v. 234, consulted Strabo, l. vii. p. 327, 328; a Mémoire of M. de la Nauze, Mém. de Littérature, tom vii. p. 154—147; and one of M. Hardion, Hardion, Mém. de Littérature, tom. iii. p. 138—141. Strabo is far from intelligible; the two Frenchmen treat their subject only incidentally, and were misled by their erroneous, confined notion of the Pelasgi. However, from these and my own reflections, I formed a pretty clear idea of Dodona and the Selli.

June 23d.]—I read the seventeenth book of the Iliad, v. 105---505.

24th.]—I finished the second volume of the Bibliothèque Universelle. This volume contains, p. 20—51, P. Limborchi Theologia Christiana, Amstelod. 1686. Moderate and judicious, the general character of the Arminian divines.—Petri Petiti de Sybillâ, Libri tres, Lips. 1686. A strange mixture of learning and credulity.—P. 154—184, Historia Genevrina, par Gregorio Leti. Leti is a most agreeable historian; a little more regard to truth and exactness would have made him an instructive one.—Life and Letters of Archbishop Usher, London, 1686, p. 220—262. Accurate, as written by his chaplain; but this chaplain is both too long and too short.—Méthode de dresser des Recueils, par M. Locke, p. 315—340.—The exactness and perspicuity of that great man are seen in that trifle.—Description de l'Afrique traduite du Flamand, par M. Dapper, p. 340—386. Very curious.—Contra Aristeæ Historiam de LXX Interpretibus Dissertatio, par Hum. Hody. Oxon 1685; and Isaac Vossii Observationum in Pomponium Melam Appendix, Lond. 1686, p. 386—416. I think, after having read these two disputants, that the question is far more perplexed that before.

June 26th.]—I read the seventeenth book of the Iliad, v. 505—761, the end, and reviewed the first two hundred and fifty lines of it. The amiable character of Patroclus had made every reader his friend whilst alive, and we interest ourselves in the fate of his remains, which are so obstinately disputed.

28th.]—I finished the Bibliothèque des Sciences et des Beaux Arts, for January, February, and March 1762. It contains Œuvres du Cancelier d'Aguesseau, Paris, 1761, p. 1—20. They breathe a noble spirit of eloquence and virtue.—Eutropii Breviarium Historiæ Romanæ, cum Notis varior. par Henric. Verheyk. Lugd. Bat. 1762, p. 88—100. Superior to all other editions, even to that of Havercamp.—Zimmermanni Opera Theologica et Philosophica, p. 154—181. Moderate and sensible.

29th.]— I reviewed the remaining five hundred lines of the seventeenth book of the Iliad. It is a continued battle, but is yet very interesting, from the unity and importance of the action, the various turns of fortune, and the equality of the two parties; the one depending on their natural courage, the other on the protection of Jupiter. I am particularly pleased with the sorrow of Achilles's horses, and the reflection of Jupiter, v. 426, &c. I likewise read the eighteenth book, v. 1—238, and consulted some remarks of M. Galland, Hist. de l'Académ. des Belles Lettres, tom. i. p. 104—108, on the trumpets of the ancients in relation to v. 219 of this book.

on

June 30th.]—I read the eighteenth book of the Iliad, v. 238—478.

July 1st.]—I read the eighteenth book of the Iliad, v. 478—616, the end.

2d.]—I reviewed the whole eighteenth book of the Iliad. Homer is never more thoroughly awake: the first part of it shews him to be a perfect master of the tender passions. Achilles receives the news of the death of Patroclus, with a mixture of fury and tenderness suitable to his character. We begin to love him; and the very excess of his rage, though terrible, pleases us, because it is directed only against the murderer of his friend. The second part, or the description of the shield, is a fine landscape. I read the description of the shield of Æneas in Virgil, l. viii. v. 369—454, and 597—731. Virgil's description is the finer piece of poetry; Homer's, the juster representation of a work of art. I read, with the same view, some remarks of the Abbé Fraguier on the origin of painting. Hist. de l'Académie des Belles Lettres, tom. i. p. 75—89. Elegant and instructive, but somewhat vague. I likewise read the whole nineteenth book of the Iliad, v. 1—424, the end, and consulted Potter's Archæologia Greca, vol. i. p. 246—261, in relation to the ceremonies observed by the ancients in their oaths. I also finished, today, the Journal des Savans, and the Mémoires de Trevoux for December, 1761. They contain little more than de Inscriptione quâdam Egyptiacâ

Taurini inventâ Decembre, p. 334—345. Mr. Needham pretended that these Egyptian letters were the same as the old Chinese characters. The similitude is here contested.—Observations sur les Systèmes des P. P. Hardouin et Berruyer. The object is to prove, the society always disapproved the visions of these two writers. There is much artifice, and some curious anecdotes, in these observations. I believe that the Jesuits were innocent in this respect.

July 7th.]—I finished the Mémoires de Trevoux, and the Journal des Savans for Januury, 1762. The Journal contains Tragédies de Sophocle, traduites, par M. Dupuy de l'A. R. des I. et B. L. p. 3—15. Elegant, exact, and a great addition to French literature.—L'Antro Eleusino, &c. par M. Bartoli, p. 49—58. Ingenious, but very doubtful.—The Memoirs Anniæ Senecæ de Brevitate Vitæ, p. 149—163. One of the best extracts I ever read.—Le Pitture Antiche d'Hercolano, p. 216—225. Ancient, and therefore curious.

8th.]—I reviewed the first hundred and fifty lines of the nineteenth book of the Iliad. The generous character of Achilles raises him every moment higher in the esteem of the reader; his care for the dead body, the spirited frankness of his reconciliation, and his impatience for the combat. I finished the Journal des Savans and Mémoires de Trevoux for February, 1762. The Journal contains Thom. Hyde de Religione veterum Persarum, p. 289—301; a new edition, with long and trifling notes on an excellent book. Idylles de Gesner traduites de l'Allemand, p. 380—397. Un Allemand ne peut-il pas être bel esprit? The Memoirs contain Explication d'un Passage d'Hérodote, 405—427. A happy solution of a difficult passage in l. ii. c. 142, only by explaining the word Ηλιος, an annual revolution of the sun.

de

July 9th.]—I finished the Mém. de Trevoux for March. They contain little more than la Bibliomanie, p. 167—176; severe and spirited; and Dissertation sur l'Ecriture Hiéroglyphique. Original. He pretends that there never were any; but I think his proofs too weak for such a paradox.

11th.]—I reviewed the remaining two hundred and seventy lines of the nineteenth book of the Iliad, and think the long debate between Achilles and Ulysses might have been shortened, though the speeches of the first are highly characteristical; nothing can surpass the sublime description of his arming himself for battle. I likewise read the twentieth book of the Iliad, v. 1—258; and when I was at church, followed the second lesson with my Greek Testament in my hand; it was the 23d chapter of St. Luke. I find this method both useful and agreeable, and intend to keep it up whenever I go to church. I finished the Journal des Savans, and Mémoires de Trevoux for April, 1762. The first contains Aristophanis Comœdiæ à P. Burmanno; good, but inferior to Kuster's: and the Grammaire Françoise Philosophique de M. d'Acarq, truly deserving of that name; the second République de Platon. The translation appears good; I am sure the extract is so.

July 12th.]—I read the twentieth book of the Iliad, v. 258—503, the end.

13th.]—I reviewed the whole twentieth book of the Iliad. The battle of the gods is worthy of every thing Longinus says of it. It would be difficult to find another example which reunites so thoroughly every part of the sublime, both as to thoughts and language. The combat of Achilles and Æneas is very animated and picturesque; and the long speech of Æneas, though faulty, and even ridiculous upon the whole, does honour in its details both to the poet and the historian. I finished the Journal des Savans, et Mém. de Trevoux for May, 1762, part the first. The Mem. contain nothing: in the Journal there is Callimachi Hymni ab Ernesti. Lugd. Bat. The text is exactly reviewed, and the version is a new one.—Vie de M. Bossuet par M. de Burigny. Exact and judicious.

14th.]—The twentieth book of Homer, and particularly the speech of Æneas, drew on a variety of discussions. In order to understand the genealogy of Dardanus, I read Apollodori Biblioth. l. iii. c. 11. p. 205—215, in Greek; I then consulted Strabo, l. xiii. p. 607—608; and some difficulties arising about the word υπωρεια, as Plato explained it, the lower part of the hills, which were inhabited after the deluge, before men dared venture down into the plain, I read a dissertation upon the deluges of Ogyges and Deucalion, by the learned Freret, Mém. de l'Académie des Belles Lettres, tom. xxiii. p. 129—148, who, from a chain of authorities, thorities, shews, incontestibly, that a deluge was unknown to Homer, Hesiod, and Herodotus; that the first who speak of it (Plato himself, Pindar, and Apollodorus) expressly confined it to Greece, and intimate that a great number were saved; that afterwards, the Greeks mixing their traditions with those of the Jews and the Chaldeans, swelled the deluge of Deucalion into an universal one; but that it never obtained general credit before the time of Plutarch and Lucian. Afterwards, to be well acquainted with Æneas, I read Strabo, l. xiii. p. 692—693; Mezeriac's Ovid, vol. ii. p. 142—146, and 153—168; and a Dissertation upon the Julian family, by the Abbé Vatry, Mém. de l'Académie, vol. xvi. p. 414—424. Mezeriac, as usual, compiles without a thought of reasoning; but from the sensible criticisms of the others, it appears that Æneas's posterity probably reigned in Phrygia in the time of Homer, and that his voyage to Italy is a fable invented by the Greeks about the time of Alexander. N. B. The Greek authors whom I consulted, I read in Greek. I likewise read the twenty-first book of the Iliad, v. 1—135, and finished the second part of May, Journal des Savans, and Mém. de Trevoux. The first contains a better extract of the Dissertations sur l'Ecriture Hiéroglyphique than the Memoirs had given. I now see that the new system is absolutely indefensible. The second speaks of Histoire du Siècle d'Alexandre, par M. Linguet: I suspect that they speak too slightly of the book. However that may be, the

the author is certainly a man of genius, whom I should like to know.

July 15th.]—I read only that most contemptible performance the Vie du Maréchal Duc de Belleisle, par M. de C . . . . .

16th.]—I read the twenty-first book of the Iliad, v. 136—611, the end.

18th.]—I did nothing but go to church. The lessons were the 12th of 2 Samuel, and the 5th of St. John's Gospel, both of which I read in Greek.

23d.]—I finished the third volume of Le Clerc's Bibliothèque Universelle, which concludes the year 1686. It contains Explication Historique de la Fable d'Adonis. He thinks that Adonis, or Osiris, was the son of Hammon or Cham, and grandson of Cinyras, or Noah; and that the incest of Myrrah with her father, was the discovery of Noah's nakedness by his children. But this interpretation is very far-fetched, and can only suit the followers of Ephemerus.—Bibliothèque Universelle des Auteurs Ecclésiastiques, par Dupin. Curious and impartial. —Life of Hai Ebn Yokhdan. A fine, though irregular, production of Arabian genius and philosophy.—The Works of Dr. Barrow. Barrow was as much of a philosopher as a divine could well be.—Commentaire Philosophique. The most useful work Bayle ever wrote, and the least sceptical.—Puffendorfii Commentarius de Rebus Suecicis. Exact, heavy, and partial.

24th.]—In order to get a clear idea of those oracles so often mentioned by Homer, and so essential a part of the Grecian religion, I read three dissertations tations of M. Hardion, inserted in the third volume of the Memoirs of the Academy upon the Oracle of Delphi, p. 137—191; and some observations of M. de Valois, tom. iii. historical part, p. 73—79; and, drawn away by the affinity of the subject, I likewise read two dissertations of the same M. de Valois, upon the Amphictyons, the guardians of this temple, tom. iii. p. 191—228, and tom. v. p. 405—415.

July 25th.]—I read the history which M. de la Valois has given us of the two sacred wars, which the Amphyctions decreed to avenge the sacrileges committed at Delphi, tom. vii. p. 201—239; tom. ix. p. 97—113, and tom. xii. p. 177—204. Besides the light that these pieces throw on the Greek religion, they are valuable for the knowledge they give us of that civil and religious bond of union in the Hellenic body, which for some ages rendered it invincible.

28th.]—I read the articles of Jupiter and Juno, in Bayle's Dictionary. That of Jupiter is very superficial. Juno takes up seventeen pages; but great part of it, as usual, very foreign to the purpose. A long inquiry when horns began to be an emblem of cuckoldom; numberless reflections, some original, and others very trivial; and a learning chiefly confined to the Latin writers. When he doubted if Juno was really worshipped at Carthage, why did not he quote Minucius Felix? V. octav. p. 259, edit. Gronov. Upon the whole, I believe that Bayle had more of a certain multifarious reading, than real erudition. Le Clerc, his great great antagonist, was as far superior to him in that respect, as inferior in every other. I reviewed the first two hundred lines of the twenty-first book of the Iliad. There is great dignity of sentiment, and a calm sternness, in the answer of Achilles to the moving prayers of the unfortunate Lycaon.

July 29th.]—I reviewed the remaining four hundred lines of the twenty-first book of the Iliad. The combat of Achilles and the Scamander is finely described. If Homer, when he speaks of the Gods, does not rise in his sentiments, at least he does in his language and poetry. I likewise read some very sensible and curious observations of the Abbé de Fonterne, Sur le Culte des Divinités des Eaux; Histoire de l'Académie des Belles Lettres, tom. xii. p. 27—49.

30th.]—I read the twenty-second book of the Iliad, v. 1—515, the end.

August 1st.]—I read the lessons at church in Greek, viz. the thirteenth chapter of the first book of Kings, and the twenty-first of St. John's Gospel. How very free a version the Septuagint is! for I imagine ours is a very literal one.

2d.]—I reviewed the whole twenty-second book of the Iliad, in which the whole interest of the preceding books is wound up in the lives of Hector and Achilles. Notwithstanding the reasons given by Mr. Pope, every reader of taste must be disgusted with Hector's flight. The true grounds of courage were not well understood, and poetry had not learnt the art of raising an hero without debasing his enemies. The fears and lamentations of Hector's family are beautifully pathetic; but I think that Andromache is rather too much the mother, and too little the wife. As I am now entering upon the twenty-third book, which contains the funeral of Patroclus, I read the eight first chapters of the fourth book of Archbishop Potter's Grecian Antiquities, vol. ii. p. 160—241, upon the Grecian Funerals. They contain a great fund of learning, without any useless digressions.

of

August 3d.]—I began M. de Burette's set of Dissertations in the Memoirs of the Academy, on the Gymnastics of the Ancients: they are learned and judicious, but too full of fruitless, and therefore frivolous, inquiries into the origin and etymology of every art. I read to-day, only Observations générales sur la Gymnastique, Hist. tom. i. p. 89—104; and first Mémoire sur la Danse, Mém. tom. i. p. 93—117.

4th.]—I read second Mémoire sur la Danse, tom. i. Mem. p. 117—136; Mémoire sur la Sphæristique, p. 117—153; and first Mémoire sur les Athlètes, p. 211—237.

5th.]—I read second and third Mémoires sur les Athlètes, p. 237—291; and Mémoire sur la Lutte, tom. iii. Mém. p. 228—255.

6th.]—I read the several Mémoires of M. de Burette, sur le Pugilat, la Course, le Pentathle, et le Disque, tom. iii. Mém. p. 255—343. Having finished these, I read three Dissertations of the Abbé Gedoyn, sur les Courses des Chevaux et des Chars, surtout au Jeux Olympiques, tom. viii. p. 314—330; and 330—341; and tom. ix. Mém. p. 360

360—376; and a Mémoire of M. de la Barre, on the same subject; tom. ix. Mem. p. 376—397. Gedoyn is polite and curious, but somewhat pert and superficial. De la Barre is difficult to be understood, but is worth studying, for he is very ingenious as well as learned. There is a great dispute what was the length of the Olympic course for chariots. Burette makes it twenty-four stadia, or twelve revolutions of one stadium: Gedoyn, eight stadia, or one revolution of four stadia: De la Barre, forty-eight stadia, or six revolutions of four stadia: Mr. West, (v. West's Pindar, vol. ii. p. 135.) forty-eight stadia, or twelve revolutions of two stadia. I have not room for their reasons; but I am of De la Barre's opinion. When one reads these Dissertations, one admires the active spirit of the Greeks, sensible to every species of entertainment and glory; who could at the same time, and with the same application, bring to perfection, dancing and philosophy, boxing and poetry.

August 7th.]—I read the twenty-third book of the Iliad, v. 1—257.

8th.]—I read the twenty-third book of the Iliad, v. 257—897; and the articles of Lemnos, Hercules, and the greatest part of Helena, in Bayle. If Bayle wrote his dictionary to empty the various collections he had made, without any particular design, he could not have chosen a better plan. It permitted him every thing, and obliged him to nothing. By the double freedom of a dictionary and of notes, he could pitch on what articles he pleased, and say what he pleased on those articles. When I con-

I consider all that Homer says of the isle of Lemnos, and the extensive trade it carried on, both with Phœnicia, (Iliad, xxiii. v. 743.) and with the Greek army before Troy, (v. Iliad, l. vii. v. 467—475, and l. xxi. v. 40.), I am amazed to see the more modern poets represent that habitation of the unfortunate Philoctetes as an island totally desolate and uninhabited.

Aug. 10th.]—I reviewed only the first hundred lines of the twenty-third book of the Iliad. The sullen grief into which Achilles sinks, is not less expressive of his character, than his violent rage in the preceding books. The apparition of Patroclus is the opening of a new world, of Homer's creation.

11th.]—I reviewed the next two hundred lines of the twenty-third book of the Iliad. This day I finished the Mémoires d'Anne d'Autriche, par Madame de Motteville, one of her greatest favourites. They are written in a natural, unaffected style; and it is a proof of the author's sincerity, that though she had a very high opinion of her mistress, the candour with which she relates facts shews us Anne of Austria as she really was; a proud and silly woman, who abandoned herself to a favourite out of indolence, supported him through obstinacy, and began at last to hate him, when he began to affect an independence. There is perhaps no period of history for which we have better materials than for the minority of Lewis XIV. The fashion of memoir-writing was very prevalent, and many of all ranks and all parties have left us accounts, both of those troubles and of their secret springs.

springs. The character of the French nation, neither soured by religion nor constrained by slavery, appears with freedom and boldness; brave and inconstant; obsequious to the ladies; treating the greatest events with a careless gaiety; running into civil wars without principle, and supporting them without rancour or cruelty. None of these wars ever were founded on any settled plan of liberty; the princes and the noblesse made it only in hopes of obtaining (as they commonly did) advantageous conditions in the treaty of peace. The honest part of the parliament were affected only by present evils, and thought only of temporary reliefs. They inveighed against a new tax, and demanded the removal of a disagreeable minister. The only law of a durable kind which they ever planned, was in the nature of a Habeas Corpus bill; that every prisoner, in twenty-four hours after his confinement, should be interrogated by the parliament as to the nature of his crime. But they supported this salutary proposal very feebly; suffered the ministry to extend the term to six months, and at last neglected it so far as not to have it ratified by the peace of Ruel. V. Mémoires, tom. ii. p. 139. 337. 363. and tom. iii. p. 51, &c. These Mémoires are printed at Amsterdam, 1723, in five volumes 12mo.

August 12th.]—I reviewed the remaining six hundred lines of the twenty-third book of the Iliad. It is a fine picture of the manners of the heroic ages: the games celebrated at the funeral of Patroclus contain a great variety of both their civil and religious customs, related with a clearness and a cir-cumcumstantialness very disagreeable to the taste of a true commentator. Indeed, the more I read the ancients, the more I am persuaded that the originals are our best commentators. In this article of ancient gymnastics (for instance), when I have read with care Homer, Pausanias, and some few more ancients, M. Burette has little to teach me, excepting perhaps what he may have picked up from some obscure passages of some obscure lexicographer. What I say is not, however, to proscribe the use, but to re train the abuse, of modern critics. As to the poetical beauties of the twenty-third book, they are great and various. I know of few better proofs of the fertility of Homer's invention, than the variety of natural incidents which he has introduced into the chariot-race. That of Menelaus and Antilochus is beautiful in the manners. I wish that I could say as much of the quarrel of Idomeneus and Ajax. I think, however, that the chariot-race bears no proportion to the rest, which indeed appears to a disadvantage, both by being placed after it and a little étranglé.

Aug. 13th.]—I read the twenty-fourth book of the Iliad, v. i—361. We returned to Beriton. I read the reign of King James I. in Hume's first volume of the Stuarts, with a view to Raleigh; and afterwards perused the sixth book of Virgil, and the system of Warburton upon it, in the first volume of his Divine Legation, and found many things to say, to explain the one and destroy the other.

14th.]—I think it was pretty well to read the twenty-fourth book of the Iliad, v. 361—457, considering I was out from seven in the morning to ten at night.

Aug. 15th.]—I read the twenty-fourth book of the Iliad, v. 467—805, the end; and reviewed the first hundred and fifty lines of it. The saving Hector's body, and the appeasing Achilles's wrath, seems to be the great object both of heaven and earth, excepting of the implacable Juno. Indeed, the great attention of the gods towards Achilles, seems rather a fear of offending, than a desire of favouring him. The last sentiment would exalt the hero, the first would debase the gods, and be highly ridiculous even in the Pagan mythology. I likewise read in Bayle the articles of Achillea, Achilles, Ajax Telamon, Ajax Oïleus, Alcinous, Andromache, Amphitryon, and Alcmena; all, excepting Achilles, very short ones. Bayle is as exactly circumstantial in these important trifles, as Mezeriac himself. How could such a genius employ three or four pages, and a great apparatus of learning, to examine whether Achilles was fed with marrow only; whether it was the marrow of lions and stags, or that of lions only, &c.? Bayle does not, in my opinion, sufficiently esteem Homer.

16th.]—I reviewed the remaining six hundred lines of the twenty-fourth and last book of the Iliad. The interview of Achilles and Priam is (in my opinion) superior to any part of the Iliad. It is at once the coup de théâtre and the tableau of Diderot. Nothing can be a more striking coup de théâtre than the unhappy monarch, who appears at once in the enemy's camp and at the feet of the mur-murderer of his son. At the same time the various passions and the fine philosophy that distinguishes the conversation between them, form a most beautiful tableau.

I have at last finished the Iliad. As I undertook it to improve myself in the Greek language, which I had totally neglected for some years past, and to which I never applied myself with a proper attention, I must give a reason why I begun with Homer, and that contrary to Le Clerc's advice. I had two, 1st, As Homer is the most ancient Greek author (excepting perhaps Hesiod) who is now extant; and as he was not only the poet, but the lawgiver, the theologian, the historian, and the philosopher, of the ancients, every succeeding writer is full of quotations from, or allusions to, his writings, which it would be difficult to understand, without a previous knowledge of them. In this situation, was it not natural to follow the ancients themselves, who always begun their studies by the perusal of Homer? 2dly, No writer ever treated such a variety of subjects. As every part of civil, military, or economical life is introduced into his poems, and as the simplicity of his age allowed him to call every thing by its proper name, almost the whole compass of the Greek tongue is comprised in Homer. I have so far met with the success I hoped for, that I have acquired a great facility in reading the language, and treasured up a very great stock of words. What I have rather neglected is, the grammatical construction of them, and especially the many various inflexions of the verbs. In order to acquire that dry, but necessary branch of knowledge, I propose bestowing some time every morning on the perusal of the Greek Grammar of Port Royal, as one of the best extant. I believe that I read nearly one half of Homer like a mere schoolboy, not enough master of the words to elevate myself to the poetry. The remainder I read with a good deal of care and criticism, and made many observations on them. Some I have inserted here, for the rest I shall find a proper place. Upon the whole, I think that Homer's few faults (for some he certainly has) are lost in the variety of his beauties. I expected to have finished him long before. The delay was owing partly to the circumstances of my way of life and avocations, and partly to my own fault; for while every one looks on me as a prodigy of application, I know myself how strong a propensity I have to indolence.

About the 26th or 33d Olympiad, Terpander of Lesbos composed the νομοι, the airs or tunes proper for singing to the cithara the verses of Homer in the public games. See the Treatise of Plutarch on Music, with the Remarks of Burette, in the Mémoires de l'Académie, tom. x. p. 116, 213—224.

Aug. 19th.]—As my books were not come, and Madame de Motteville had left my head full of Louis the XIVth and his court, I took in hand my friend Voltaire's Siècle de Louis XIV. It will employ some few leisure hours, and will afford me great entertainment.

Once more in possession of some necessary books, books, I returned to my present great object, the study of Homer; but before I proceed to the Odyssey, I determined to read several things which might conduce to the better understanding him. I read this morning, Sir John Marsham's Canon Chronicus, &c. p. 433—446, edit. Franquer, 1696; where he treats of Homer and Hesiod; and in speaking of the first, explains, in a few words, all that is to be found in the ancients concerning his country, age, fate of his writings, and progress of his reputation. I cannot help wondering at the blind deference which he pays to the oracular authority of the Parian marble: "De eâ re agitur (the age of Homer) non est amplius ambigendum." I respect that monument, as an useful, as an uncorrupt monument of antiquity; but why should I prefer its authority to that of Herodotus, for instance? It is more modern, its author is uncertain. We know not from what sources he drew his chronology, nor how far he was qualified to draw it properly. However, as to the age of Homer, I abide by his decision; because I can (whatever diversity appeared to Sir John) reconcile it with several of the most approved authors. That learned writer did not consider, that in fixing the time when a great man flourished, several historians may differ from one another, without differing from truth; because they fixed it from different eras of his life. In that of Fontenelle, the fixing his date either from his birth (1657), or from his writing the Worlds (1686); from his reception into the French Academy (1691); from his being made Secretary to that of Sciences (1699); from his resigning that post (1740); from his death (1757), would produce the difference of a century; so that we may establish for a rule of criticism, that when these diversities do not exceed the natural term of human life, we ought to think of reconciling, and not of opposing them. In this instance, five of the most respectable authorities may be confined within the small period of sixty-eight years. The eldest Apollodorus, who places Homer 250 years after the Trojan war, A. C. 934, must be naturally understood to speak of his birth: Cornelius Nepos, the second, whose date is 160 years before the foundation of Rome, A. C. 914, of the time when Homer, then twenty, was arrived at the years of manhood: the era of the marbles (643 years before the archontat of Diognetus) A. C. 907, of the time when Homer, then twenty-seven, began to distinguish himself; perhaps when, according to the Colophonian tradition, he wrote the Margites, his first poetical work. When Herodotus places Homer 400 years before his own birth, A. C. 884, he may mean, that, being then fifty, he was arrived at the highest pitch of his reputation, and perhaps wrote the Iliad. Lastly, if Socibius, the Laconian, brings him down to the last year before the first Olympiad, Homer might then die aged sixty-eight years, A. C. 866. This calculation agrees very well with the vague reckoning of Pliny and Juvenal, and pretty nearly with the more precise one of Velleius Paterculus. There are, indeed, many writers, whom it is impossible to conciliate, since since they take in so enormous a period as 416 years, from the return of Heraclides, A. C. 1104, to the twenty-third Olympiad, A. C. 688. But besides that they are of inferior note, the great difference amongst them leaves the authority of each to stand singly by itself.

I likewise began to-day a Greek life of Homer, or rather a dissertation upon his writings, by an anonymous writer, inserted in the Opuscula Mythologica, Physica, et Ethica, published at Amsterdam 1688, by Mr. Gale. It takes up p. 283—404 of those Opuscula. As I intend to make an abstract of it, I shall only say here that I read p. 283—303.

Aug. 20th.]—I read the Life of Homer, 304—314. The Greek is easy, though I met with many words of the only species (perhaps) not to be found in Homer,—grammatical and metaphysical terms, which are the more difficult at first, because, as they are all metaphorical, it is the literal meaning which presents itself to an unexperienced reader.

21st.]—In order to save some part of this day for study, I passed the evening in my lodging, and read the Life of Homer, p. 314—341.

24th.]—I read the Life of Homer, p. 341—357.

27th.]—I read the Life of Homer, p. 387—394.

28th.]—I finished the Siècle de Louis XIV. I believe that Voltaire had for this work an advantage which he has seldom enjoyed. When he treats of a distant period, he is not a man to turn over musty monkish writers to instruct himself. He follows some compilation, varnishes it over with the magic of his style, and produces a most agreeable, superficial, inaccurate performance. But there the information, both written and oral, lay within his reach, and he seems to have taken great pains to consult it. Without any thing of the majesty of the great historians, he has comprised, in two small volumes, a variety of facts, told in an easy, clear, and lively style. To this merit, he has added that of throwing aside all trivial circumstances, and choosing no events, but such as are either useful or entertaining. His method of treating every article in a distinct chapter I think vicious: as they are all connected in human affairs, and as they are often the cause of each other, why separate them in history? The first volume is much less interesting than the second; arts and manners were a subject almost untouched; but so many writers had exhausted the battles and sieges of Lewis the XIVth's reign, that it was impossible to add any thing new, especially in so confined an abridgment. Besides, those detached particulars wanted less that art of narrating, which Voltaire never possessed, with all his other talents: I mean in prose, for there are some very fine narrations in his tragedies. That of Ismene, in the last act of Merope, is equal to the famous ones of Racine. As to his hero, I think that he performed great actions without being a great man. France, notwithstanding his wars and persecutions, ought never to forget him. But when Condé, Turenne, Vauban, Louvois, Colbert, &c. have claimed their share of fame, little more will remain remain to the monarch, than the having chosen and employed those great men: I can hardly add that of persisting in his choice. A prince, diffident or inconstant, may claim great merit for having persisted in a good choice. A monarch, proud, vain, or obstinate, is only to be praised if he renounces a bad one. And every one must know to what a degree Lewis carried those last-mentioned qualities.

Sept. 3d.]—I returned to the Life of Homer, and read p. 394—404, the end.

4th.]—I reviewed, but in a cursory manner, the Life of Homer, without having so exalted an idea of it as Mr. Gale, who, like a true editor, calls it Liber Aureus. I think it a valuable piece, written with art, and containing many ingenious, and some useful observations upon Homer. I then began to look into the Greek Grammar of Port Royal, that learned society which contributed so much to establish in France a taste for just reasoning, simplicity of style, and philosophical method. I began, contrary to the general method, with the verbs, and read with attention the first chapter of the third book, which treats of the nature and proprieties of the verb. I think that method the most natural and philosophical which begins with the operations of the mind, or the action or passion of the body, and thence passes to foreign objects.

5th.]—I read the second chapter of the third book, which treats of the characteristic letter, and the termination of verbs; and to impress the several modifications of the active verb upon my memory, mory, I copied them out. I finished to-day every thing in the Bibliothèque Choisie, relative to Erasmus, viz. tom. iv. p. 379—397; tom. v. p. 145—283; tom. vi. p. 1—238; tom. xii. p. 1—57. The first and last are very good reflections, and exact judgments, upon Erasmus's works, but are too short: the others are long extracts of his epistles, which, translated in a very bad style, and unconnected method, have neither the agrémens of original letters, nor the merit of a complete life. When I had finished them, (according to a maxim I have laid down elsewhere,) I began Vie d'Erasme, par M. de Burigny; and so preferred the suite of my ideas to that of my books.

Sept. 6th.]—I read the Grammar, l. iii. c. 3. which treats of the augmentation, both syllabic and temporal.

7th.]—I read the Grammar, l. iii. c. 4—14. I saw the various forms into which every verb changes itself, from the indicative to the participle, and from the present to the second perfect. Indeed, I think the chain has too many links, as well as groundless exceptions without number; but this last is the vice of all languages, none of which have been the work of reason.

8th.]—In the evening I found means to look over, in a cursory manner, the passive and middle moods of the barytone verbs in ω. They depend so much upon the active, that when one has a clear idea of it, the genealogy is very easy to follow. I now see clearly the advantage of paying little attention to the Grammar, till you have made some some progress in the language. Instead of having both precepts and examples to learn, I need attend only to the general rules of what I have already seen in a variety of particular instances. It is examining the map of a country through which I have before travelled.

Sept. 9th.]—I looked more closely into the passive and middle moods of the barytones in ω. If the vox media is not very useful and ingenious, it is highly ridiculous.

10th.]—I read the Greek Grammar, l. iii. c. 21—27, containing a very clear account of the circumflex verbs in ω, and of the rules by which they contract themselves.

11th.]—I read the Greek Grammar, l. iv. c. 1—5, which treats of the regular verbs in μι. I approve extremely of the intention of M. M. de Port Royal, who, to simplify things as much as possible, have reduced the thirteen conjugations of the Greek grammar to two, or rather to three. But the variety of these conjugations is so great, and the differences so real, that the ancient division was, perhaps, clearer, in having many rules with few exceptions, than the modern ones of few rules and many exceptions. For instance, in explaining the barytone conjugations in ω, there is hardly a tense without exceptions for the peculiar formation of the liquids. At least I would have a separate conjugation for them. Another defect I have observed is, the example they have fixed on for the barytone conjugation. 1. They pitch upon the verb τιω, and make use of it in their table; but when when they come to the detail of the moods and tenses, they then employ τυπτω. This alteration destroys the unity of their plan, and must breed some confusion; especially in a young head. 2. They boast in their preface of having chosen (with Sanctius) τιω as a very simple verb; but I own I think the choice ill judged. The great object should have been to have chosen a verb perfectly regular, every one of whose different modifications should have been the example of the general rule, which they laid down for that mood or tense. Τιω does not answer that character. In the first future passive (for instance), according to the general rule * of changing the ω of the first future active, into ησωμαι, τισω would make τισθησομαι. However, by a common exception of the verbs in ω pure,† it drops the σ and makes only τιθησομαι.

To-day I began the small but valuable treatise of Longinus, περι ΥΨΟΥΣ in the variorum edition of Tollius, printed at Utrecht, 1694, in 4*to.* The edition appears to be a very complete one. It contains the Greek text of the author, with a Latin version by Tollius, and a French one by Boileau, with the notes of Robortellus, Petra, Portus, Langbænius, le Fèvre, and Tollius himself; and the French ones of Boileau and Dacier. I read the dedication of Tollius to the Electoral Prince of Brandenburg, afterwards king of Prussia, and father of the present monarch; the prefaces of Tol-

Dr. Langbaine.

* V. Nouvelle Méthode, l. iii. c. 16. Reg. 52. p. 182.

† V. Nouvelle Méthode, l. iii. c. 16. Except. 3. p. 183.

lius, lius, de Petra, Langbænius, and Boileau, with the list of Testimonia, and the greatest part of the first chapter of Longinus himself. Tollius, though a commentator, was a man of taste and genius; though the style of his dedication is somewhat timid, yet there are pretty thoughts in it. He quibbles a little about Victoria Elata, and Fama Pinnigera, when he speaks of the great Elector; but his compliment upon the battle of Ferbelin is just, and well expressed. When I reflect on the age in which Longinus lived, an age which produced scarcely any other writer worthy of the attention of posterity; when real learning was almost extinct, philosophy sunk down to the quibbles of grammarians and the tricks of mountebanks, and the empire desolated by every calamity, I am amazed that at such a period, in the heart of Syria, and at the court of an Eastern monarch, Longinus should produce a work worthy of the best and freest days of Athens. I read with the sincerest regret the titles of the other works which are now lost; but none more than his Odenathus. I should have seen, though probably with some partiality, the character and actions of that great man, and of the greater Zenobia, who both (contrary to the other tyrants) proposed less making themselves Roman emperors, than detaching the East from the empire, and erecting a new monarchy upon quite different foundations.

Sept. 12th.]—I finished the first chapter of Longinus, with Boileau's translation, and all the notes. The Greek is, from the figurative style, and bold metametaphors, extremely difficult: I am afraid that it is rather too difficult for me; but now I have entered upon it, jacta est alea; and I have nothing to do but to redouble my application to understand him correctly. Is it vexation at those difficulties, or reason, which makes me wish, that in the room of those poetical figures, he had given us a definition of the sublime? Though this had been done by Cæcilius, yet it was still necessary, and would have taken him but a few lines. I then read a dissertation of M. le Clerc, inserted in the Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne, tom. v. p. 237—290, sur les Verbs moyens des Grecs. As it is (which I did not know at first) in opposition to another of M. Kuster, I can decide nothing about the dispute till I have seen that, which I will do as soon as possible, for his idea is a very ingenious one. He thinks that those verbs, as distinct from the active and passive ones, are made use of by the pure Attic writers to signify, 1. An action which passes entirely within the agent, such as thinking, willing, &c. 2. An action which, though exterior, has the agent himself for the object; such as, I feed myself, I undress myself, &c. M. le Clerc, on the other hand, not only denies their use, but even disputes the existence of the vox media; which he treats as a corruption only of the active and passive. As to the pretended difference of sound and sense, he says, that the first are not greater than many occasioned by the dialects, or by poetical licences, for which the grammarians have never established new voices or moods: that by M. Kuster's ter's own confession, the deponents in Latin, and many verbs in Greek, have an active signification, with a passive termination, without belonging to any vox media; that this mystery is unknown to the best Greeks, and that many of them express those actions by an active verb; nay, sometimes in the same period employ an active and middle verb. This he illustrates by a variety of examples.

I began to-day my Extract of the Life of Homer, in French, and wrote the first folio page, with a long note.

Sept. 14.]—I read the second chapter of Longinus, with the versions and notes as usual. As yet I read my author more as a man of genius, than as a man of taste: I am pleased and astonished rather than instructed. I observed in this chapter a licence more than poetical, into which the fire of his imagination hurried him, that of leaving the reader to supply one part of a first comparison, whilst he hastens to a second. There was an hiatus at the end of the chapter, which Tollius supplied from a manuscript in the Vatican. It is amusing to peruse the conjectural supplements of the critics; how various, how ingenious, and how distant from the truth. They are probably often as much so, though we have it not in our power to confute them in the same manner.

15th.]—I went through the whole series of the irregular verbs in Greek. Some of them are defective by the want of some particular tenses or persons; and others are irregular, as forming their tenses not from their own natural theme, but from some some other which bears some affinity with it, and is commonly either derived or contracted from it. These irregularities are necessary to be known; but we should be cautious of erecting them too hastily into general rules, the first sort especially; where the supposed defect may arise only from the Greek authors now extant not having had occasion to employ that particular modification of the verb.

Sept. 27th.]—I have not, almost this fortnight, set down any thing in the literary way. Indeed, I was very idle. In that time, I went through only the Life of Erasmus; which ought only to have been an amusement, and not to have broken in upon Longinus. To-day I finished the Life of Erasmus. It is a work of great reading. As M. de Burigny proposed connecting with his history, a general account of the sciences and religion during his time, he has very deeply considered his subject. His style and reflexions are suited to a man of sense and modesty, who neither pretends to, nor possesses the least share of genius. Upon the whole, the book is a perfect contrast to most fashionable French ones, since it is useful without being brilliant. If we consider the character of Erasmus, we shall be immediately struck with his extensive erudition; and that heightened by two circumstances: 1. That he was scarcely ever fixed six months in a place (excepting at Basil); that to this wandering life, which deprived him both of books and leisure, must be added, a continued bad state of health, and the constant avocation of a vast correspondence. 2. That his learning was all real, real, and founded on the accurate perusal of the ancient authors. The numerous editions he published sufficiently evince it; and besides, those convenient compilations of all sorts, where a modern author can learn to be a profound scholar at a very small expense, did not then exist; every thing was to be sought for in the originals themselves. But besides this learning, which was common to many, Erasmus possessed a genius without which no writer will ever descend to posterity; a genius which could see through the vain subtleties of the schools, revive the laws of criticism, treat every subject with eloquence and delicacy; sometimes emulate the ancients, often imitate them, and never copy them. As to his morals, they had the poor merit of being regular. In the nobler part of his character I find him very deficient. Delicacy of sentiment he had none. A parasite of all the great men of his time, he was neither ashamed to magnify their characters, by the lowest adulation, nor to debase his own by the most impudent solicitations to obtain presents which very often he did not want. The adventure of Eppendorf is another proof how much dearer his money was to him than his character. Notwithstanding these faults, never man enjoyed a greater personal consideration. All the scholars, and all the princes of Europe, looked upon him as an oracle. Even Charles V. and Francis I. agreed in this. If we inquire why this happened to him rather than to some other great men, of a merit equal, and perhaps superior to Erasmus, we must say that it was owing to the time when he lived; when the world awaking from a sleep of a thousand years, all orders of men applied themselves to letters with an enthusiasm which produced in them the highest esteem and veneration for one of their principal restorers. Besides, as the general attention, from piety, from curiosity, from vanity, and from interest, was directed towards the religious disputes, a great divine was the fashionable character; and all parties endeavoured to attract or to preserve him. But to which of those parties did Erasmus adhere? His writings, and even his conduct, were often equivocal. The Catholics claim him, though they acknowledge that he was often indiscreet. Le Clerc challenges him for the Protestants, though he blames him for not professing what he knew to be the truth; and attributes his reserve solely to timidity and self-interest. Erasmus had certainly exposed all the grosser superstitions of the Romish worship to the ridicule of the public; and had his free opinion been taken, I believe that he was a Protestant upon most of the contested points. But many other motives might restrain him from a declaration. He was always persuaded, that any speculative truths were dearly purchased at the expense of practical virtue and public peace. Besides, many considerations might often make him balance as to those truths; prejudices of education, the authority of the fathers, and a natural inclination to scepticism. Add to all this, that really disapproving many things in the Protestant communion, though more in the Romish, by remaining

ing

ing in the loose situation of a man who was unwilling to quit the religion of his ancestors, he could blame many things in it with freedom; whereas, had he deserted it, he must either have set up a standard himself, or else have enlisted blindly under that of Luther or Æcolampodius. It is surprising that Erasmus, who could see through much more plausible fables, believed firmly in witchcraft.

Sept. 30th.]—I began the Ciceronianus, and read p. 1—80.

Oct. 1st.]—I read Ciceronianus, p. 80—230, which finished it; and perused 47 pages of Extracts from Erasmus's Letters, which related to it; and which turn principally upon the great scandal which the comparison between Ascensius Badius and the great Budæus had given in France. The object of this dialogue is to attack some blind admirers and copiers of Tully's style; who, at the revival of letters, formed, especially in Italy, a very considerable sect, of which the principal leaders were Bembo, Sadolet, and Julius Scaliger. In this attack he employed every arm both of argument and pleasantry. It may be divided into three parts; in the first, Nosoponus the Ciceronian is introduced; and with that exquisite species of humour, of which the Lettres Provinciales offer so fine a specimen, ridicules his own party by a bare exposition of those maxims which he himself venerated and practised. His exclusive devotion to Cicero, his three Indices, his never writing but in the dead silence of the night, his employing months upon a few lines, his religious caution about the words, and his total indifference about the sense, are truly and highly comic. In the second, Erasmus himself appears under the name of Boulephorus; and entering into a great detail, establishes, victoriously, that Cicero, though worthy of our attention and imitation, is not the only one worthy of it; that so servile an attachment to any author, destroys all freedom and originality of genius, and produces only a set of tame writers, who, perhaps, will copy only the faults, but who will surely never attain to the perfections of their great model; and that finally, we should rather endeavour to speak as Cicero would do if he lived at present, than as he did in his time; that since words are made for ideas, and not ideas for words, it is infinitely more reasonable to coin new words to express a variety of things unknown to Cicero, than, out of a vain ambition for purity, to call excommunication, interdictio aquæ et ignis, and to express all the objects of Christianity by the terms of the Pagan rituals. It must be confessed, that the Ciceronians laid themselves very open to ridicule, were it only by their looking on Tully not only as the best but as the sole model, and that of language as well as of eloquence. In a polite age, in which a language is thoroughly cultivated, every writer who is a man of education, of letters, and of taste, speaks nearly the same language; and very often, genius and eloquence, instead of being companions to purity, are enemies to it, by diverting the attention to nobler aims. Bouhours is much purer than either Corneille

Corneille or Bayle. Why therefore should we exclude all other writers of the Augustan age, and confine our imitation to Tully alone; who was not a native of Rome, and who, from the fire of his imagination, the variety of his occupations, and the multiplicity of his writings, could not always attend nicely to his expression. Why is not Cæsar (for example) as safe a model? A Ciceronian must believe Cicero's own account of him. Cæsar autem rationem adhibens, consuetudinem vitiosam et corruptam purâ et incorruptâ consuetudine emendat. Itaque . . ad hanc elegantiam verborum Latinorum . . . . . adjungit illa oratoria ornamenta dicendi. But the same Ciceronian, if he would condescend to admit the other Latin writers of that age into a partnership with Tully, would be much more formidable than Nosoponus. He would observe, that in all languages, rules and analogies are very treacherous guides; that in modern tongues, we see them give way every day to custom. That in the dead ones, that custom is to be met with only in the most correct writers; and that whenever we deviate from them, we risk offending against the idiom of the language. That the boldest moderns did not carry their privilege of making new terms so far as they ought, to have made it really useful, since they express many modern ones by very loose periphrases. That as they are themselves still fond of copying and alluding to the ancients, the writings of Erasmus himself are an incoherent mixture of Roman manners and expressions with Batavian ones; a mixture not less ridiculous than their scrupulous antique idiom. Perhaps the natural conclusion from these various difficulties, where either freedom or correctness must be sacrificed, was, that instead of that ungrateful labour upon a dead language, it would be better to improve and cultivate the living ones. But this conclusion was too much for the age of Erasmus. The third part of the Dialogue, which contains Erasmus's opinion of the style of the principal Latin authors, both ancient and modern, shews great learning; but his judgments are too superficial, and not so much varied as the nature of the subject required. The style of the Ciceronianus itself is lively and easy; but the spirit of the Dialogue is but indifferently kept up. Nosoponus makes no defence, and Hypologus is quite a useless personage.

Oct. 2d.]—After a long absence, I returned at last to Longinus, and read the third and fourth chapters, περι ΥΨΟΥΣ. After Longinus had, in the two former chapters, opened his design, and shewn that though the true sublime is a gift of nature, yet nature may, as in other things, be assisted by art; he treats of two vices different from each other, but equally opposite to it; the one a turgid style and inflated figures, springing from an exuberance of genius or a vain ambition: the other a frigid poor labour after puns and little affected beauties. I approve very much of this inverted method of shewing first what a thing is not, and then what it is. In these refined inquiries nothing contributes more to assist our imagination and dispel prejudices.

dices. I likewise admire that noble freedom with which he discovers the faults of those heroes themselves,* Plato and Xenophon.

Oct. 3d.]—I employed my morning very well, since I read the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth chapters of Longinus. The two first are inconsiderable; the seventh, in which he points out the way to discover the true sublime, is the work of a man of strong feelings rather than of a clear head; the eighth begins to enter more deeply into the subject, and points out five sources of the sublime. The ninth chapter, which treats of the first of these, (the elevation of the ideas,) is one of the finest monuments of antiquity. Till now, I was acquainted only with two ways of criticising a beautiful passage: the one, to shew, by an exact anatomy of it, the distinct beauties of it, and whence they sprung; the other, an idle exclamation, or a general encomium, which leaves nothing behind it. Longinus has shewn me that there is a third. He tells me his own feelings upon reading it; and tells them with such energy, that he communicates them. I almost doubt which is most sublime, Homer's Battle of the Gods, or Longinus's Apostrophe to Terentianus upon it. The chapter concludes with some very ingenious observations upon the different character of the Iliad and of the Odyssey. I am sorry to criticise such a chapter, but what would Longinus have said, had another made his observation upon that passage of Homer, where the celestial horses leap at one bound the extent of the visible horizon? One would think, says he, the world could not have afforded space for such another leap. To what faculty does the visible horizon appear above half the world? To the eyes it appears the whole; to the understanding, and even to the imagination, a very small part.

* Οι πρωτοι εχιπιον. Longin. Περι Υψους, p. 32. Edit. Toll.

Oct. 4th.]—I read the tenth chapter of Longinus, p. 72—88. Its subject is but obscurely marked, and appears at first to run into the former. The distinction however appears to be, the first treats of those great and simple ideas, which require only to be fully conceived and expressed; the second, of such ideas as though not sublime in themselves, may be rendered so by the artful introduction of accessory circumstances. But I hardly think that the Ode of Sappho was a proper example. It may be beautiful, it may be passionate; but surely there is nothing in it which elevates the mind? Longinus's own characteristic of the sublime. This morning Mr. M . . . . returned my visit, and stayed nearly two hours with me. I have not yet seen any great proofs of his taste or genius, but he is certainly a scholar, and a very communicative one. Observing I had only Hederici Lexicon, he offered me Scapula as much better, and sent it to me in the evening. It is in fact infinitely more copious; and I like much the disposition of it by roots. It gives you a much clearer idea of the language, by reducing it to a small number of primitives; which, by their various compositions, produce all the riches of that copious tongue.

Oct.

Oct. 5th.]—I read the eleventh and twelfth chapters of Longinus, p. 88—94. They treat of Amplification; of that art in poetry and rhetoric by which things are made to appear greater than they really are. Perhaps, had he known the magnifying glasses, he would have said that the merit of that art was, like those glasses, to increase the magnitude, but preserve the proportions. He then draws a comparison between Cicero (who excelled peculiarly in it) and Demosthenes; a comparison framed with his usual eloquence, and with a candour for the Roman's merit very uncommon in a Greek.

11th.]—I read the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth chapters of Longinus, p. 94—118. The two first, which treat of imitation, are true pictures of the impetuous genius of the author. He enters on his subject by a quotation from Plato, which is very remotely connected with it. Then, though he recommends as a road to the sublime, the imitation of the great ancients; yet imitation is too lame a practice to be agreeable to him. He first extends it to an advice to us to consider how Homer or Demosthenes would have expressed such an idea, not how they would express any one: then to think how they would approve of the manner in which we ourselves are going to express it; that is, to make them not our models, but our judges; and at last, disclaiming all particular imitation, he advises us only to catch their fire, and to imitate the noble confidence with which they looked forward to the latest posterity. The fifteenth chapter contains some fine examples of poetical figures, distinguishes distinguishes them from rhetorical ones, and observes, that the mistaken taste of his age makes them be often confounded.

Oct. 12th.]—I read the sixteenth chapter of Longinus, p. 118—126. He speaks of the phrase and elocution. This is his third source of the sublime. The pathos, which was the second, he has almost totally forgotten. This chapter is taken up chiefly by the example of the famous oath of Demosthenes; by the heroes of Marathon and Plateæ. He examines it very nicely, discovers all the art and energy of it, and shews how much it differs from a similar expression of the comic Eupolis. If the ninth chapter shews Longinus the most as a man of genius, he no where appears a more excellent critic than in this.

14th.]—I began the Colloquia of Erasmus, and as far as I have gone, think them full of entertainment.

16th.]—I read several chapters of M. de Tillemont's Histoire des Empereurs, in relation to Longinus's Patrons Odenathus and Zenobia, tom. iii. p. 3; 947—952; 976, 977; 983—988; 1039—1062; and 1078—1082. It is much better to read this part of the Augustan history in so learned and exact a compilation than in the originals, who have neither method, accuracy, eloquence, nor chronology. I think them below the worst monkish chroniclers we have extant. We may observe that Odenathus, who was an Arab, began to shew the superiority of his brave barbarians over the corrupted Romans; a superiority which Mahomet improved proved by the additional spur of religion, but which he did not create.

Oct. 18th.—I read the seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-third, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, and twenty-sixth chapters of Longinus, p. 126—154. He continues to treat of the various kinds of figures, which, when properly employed, give force and beauty to the discourse: the interrogation, the omission of copulatives, the mixture of figures, the transpositions of ideas, and the alterations of number and tense. This is perhaps the least shining part of his book; as it is the more mechanical part of criticism. However, Longinus enlivens the dulness of it, by the magic of his style; and corrects the dryness by the clearness of his reasons, and the accuracy of his distinctions. I shall give an instance of each. Speaking of that rhetorical figure by which a writer, addressing himself to his reader, employs the second person, he himself makes use of it in a most beautiful manner, in animadverting to Terentianus upon a passage of Herodotus.* The second is, where treating of the change of the singular into the plural he distinguishes, with great justness, between those words which, singular by their termination, by their sense may be considered as plural, without any effort of, or effect upon, the imagination; and those which, in themselves strictly singular, are magnified and multiplied,

* Longinus, c. xxvi. p. 152.

plied, when, upon certain occasions, they are spoken of as plural.* I must just mention a mistake of Tollius. Herodotus makes use of the words Δικλοις δρεπτέῃσι. Tollius owns that it signifies servis fugitivis; but thinks it not elegant enough, and therefore renders it by the vague expression of servitutem acerbissimam.† However, the other has certainly more elegance, as well as truth and propriety. The Ionians had revolted from the Persians; if they were again subdued, they would not only be, as before, oppressed like slaves, but punished as fugitives.

Oct. 19th.]—I read Longinus, chapters twenty-seven, twenty-eight, twenty-nine, and thirty, p. 154—168. He continues his enumeration of figurative expressions, and mentions their sudden transition from one person to another, of which the poets and orators have left us some fine examples. It may, however, be remarked, that as this figure is infinitely violent and abrupt, it is suitable only to the strongest passions, and therefore commonly suits better the poet's heroes than himself. Longinus then proceeds to the periphrasis, and gives some very sensible rules about it. However, he has forgotten to observe, that though, when well employed, this figure gives light and grace to a discourse; yet in itself it is an enemy to the sublime, of which a concise expression is always the best vehicle. If we inquire into the reason of it,

* Longinus, c. xxiii. p. 144.

† Ibid. c. xxii. p. 142, notasque Toll. in loco.

we

we must say, that it presents the idea at once, gives as little as possible to the tediousness and deficiencies of language, and comes the nearest to the operations of thought. In the thirtieth chapter, he enters upon the choice of words, which he has laid down as the fourth source of the sublime. There appears to be here a considerable chasm.

Oct. 20th.]—I read Longinus, chapters thirty-one, thirty-two, and thirty-three, p. 168—186. The thirty-first seems to be very defective; however we see that he proves that the common expressions, when introduced properly, have often more strength and meaning than more elaborate ones. I believe his position just, and his examples from Herodotus explain his meaning very well; but I think that from Demosthenes ill chosen. The idea is indeed very idiotic, but it is expressed by a very uncommon and metaphorical word. The thirty-second chapter treats of the multiplicity of metaphors, for which Longinus is a great advocate, and admires very much a laboured description of the human body by Plato. I wish I could admire it too. However, as Plato has certainly faults, our critic examines in the twenty-third chapter, which is preferable, a sublimity often faulty, or an unblameable mediocrity. He treats his subject with an eloquent and becoming enthusiasm. His decision is that of a man of taste. I likewise read a Letter of Pliny on the same subject, L. ix. Ep. 26; which is full of very pretty thoughts and expressions. I am of the same opinion with both these great writers; but think neither of them has gone deep enough. I take the reason to be, not that we are more strongly affected with beauties, but that we are longer so: the pleasure we feel in the sensation prolongs it, by making us dwell upon it with satisfaction; whereas the disgust we conceive from faults shortens the sensation, by causing us to call off our attention immediately. There are, besides, two other collateral reasons, but I take this to be the principal, and I must not write dissertations in my journal.

gone

Oct. 21st.]—Last night, when in bed, I was thinking of a dissertation of M. de la Nauze, upon the Roman calendar; which I read last year.* This led me to consider what was the Greek, and finding myself very ignorant of it, I determined to read a short, but very excellent abstract of Mr. Dodwell's book De Cyclis, by the famous Dr. Halley.† It is only twenty-five pages; but as I meditated it thoroughly, and verified all the calculations, it was a very good morning's work. The cycle of Meton had for its object, to reconcile the course of the sun with that of the moon, which it accomplishes in a cycle of 19 solar years, 235 lunar months, and 6940 days. The years should be regularly twelve months, and the months thirty days; but as the first would not be enough, it is necessary to add seven menses embolimi in the third, fifth, eighth, eleventh, thirteenth, sixteenth, and nineteenth years of the cycle; and as the second would be too much, much, 110 months are cavi, or of 29 days only, which is determined by leaving out every sixty-fourth day. The first cycle begins with July 15th, Ant. Chr. 432.* To reduce them to the Julian account, you must observe the following rule. Collect the number of months elapsed since the beginning of the period; multiply them by 30; add the number of days elapsed in the current month; divide the whole number by 64; subtract the quotient from it; add as many times 6940 as there have been complete cycles, with the constant number 196, and you have the whole number of days elapsed since the 1st January, Ant. Chr. 434; which number you may easily reduce into Julian years, months, and days. This dissertation gives me a very clear, and, I believe, a very true notion of Meton's Attic year. As to that of Calippus, it was only a reformation of that of Meton, who had reckoned the solar year too long by about one seventy-sixth of a day; to obviate which, he added another dies exemptilis; but as it is at the end of his period of 76 years, we need pay no attention to it in our calculations: otherwise it is the same months regular and embolimi, and the same dies exemptilis. We must only observe two differences in our reductions of it. 1. That instead of 196 days to be added, there are 552 always to be subtracted, being the number of days between the 1st July, Ant. Chr. 330, when the cycle begins, and January 1st, 328, being the first after Bissextile.

* Vide Journal, August 25th and 26th, 1761.

† At the end of the second volume of the Life of Mr. Dodwell. London, 1715.

* It was the first after the Bissextile.

In-

Indeed, to perform the reductions exactly, we ought to have all our dates in olympiads or archontats, compared with years of the cycles; but if we meet with any modern author who reckons by Julian years anticipated, we may venture (after subtracting his number from 432*) to look upon the last year of it as complete, if the date fall into the six first Attic months, or as commenced only into one of the last six. Should we be mistaken, which may happen, our calculation itself will discover our error. I say the same of the cycle of Calippus. 2. In the last mentioned cycle we need attend only to the current one, and pay no attention to those that are complete, as every cycle answers exactly to 76 Julian years. I cannot say I received the same satisfaction as to the Macedonian calendar. Far from being supported by the necessary proofs, Mr. Dodwell's opinion is not even clearly laid down. Dr. Halley owns himself, that there are great disputes about the order of their months, and the time when their year began. I know, besides, that there is another very prevalent system of Archbishop Usher, who makes the Macedonian year not luni-solar, but solar. I must, therefore, suspend my judgment tlll I have seen Mr. Dodwell de Cyclis, and Usher de veteri Anno Macedonum et Asianorum solari. As to the Roman year, M. de la Nauze is still my master.

* If he reckons by years before Christ, the reduction would be very easy.

Oct. 23d.]—Continuing my study and meditation of the Greek calendar, I resolved to verify some remarkable date. I immediately recollected the battle of Arbela, which, according to Plutarch, was fought eleven days after a total eclipse of the moon, that happened on the 14th of the month Bædremion. This eclipse answers to the 20th of September, Ant. Chr. 331. The battle was fought, therefore, the 1st of October. Now, according to Mr. Dodwell's system, the 25th of Bædremion answers exactly to that day. This is a strong presumption in its favour. The calculation, though sure, is however so tedious, that I wish some way could be thought of to shorten it. I could construct a table, in which, marking the olympiads, the archontats, the years of the cycle, and the month and day of the Julian, the beginning of each answers to * * * *. The dies exemptilis would be the most troublesome, as being not fixed to any months or years, but running regularly through the cycle. However, by some trials I made, I found I could manage them.

24th.]—I read Longinus, chapters thirty-four, thirty-five, thirty-six, thirty-seven, thirty-eight, thirty-nine, forty, and forty-one, p. 186—222. Our author continues his comparison of the sublime often faulty, and the mediocrity always irreprehensible, in the three first. His characters of Hyperides and Demosthenes are finely marked. He expatiates with pleasure on the various merits of Hyperides, and distinguishes them by epithets always just and always different, which display both his own penetration, and the accurate fertility of the language in which he wrote; but all these encomiums are only garlands, which make him a victim worthier the object of his divinity, Demosthenes; who, inferior in every other respect to Hyperides, surpasses him infinitely by those sublime and terrible beauties with which his writings abound. This chapter gives perhaps a clearer idea of the sublime than any other in Longinus; since it is not only distinguished from the faults which are contrary to, but likewise from the beauties which are different from it. But still this is not enough. I wish that I had time to explain the fine poetical comparisons of the thirty-fifth chapter, and to give a better reason than Longinus does, why the rule, that greatness is preferable to exactness, does not hold good in sculpture as well as in poetry. In the thirty-seventh I agree with Le Fèvre and Dacier, that the common reading of Herodotus is highly absurd; but if Longinus could praise that absurdity, why might not Herodotus write it? In the thirty-eight chapter he enters upon his fifth source of the sublime, the arrangement of words. We see something, though a small part, of the attention which the Greeks paid to the harmony of their periods. That not satisfied with the judgment of the ear, they had established for prose a measure of dactyles and spondees, less exact, but more varied than in verse; by which, without confining themselves to the precise form of feet, they could render the whole period abrupt or flowing, slow or precipitate. In the fortieth and forty-

first

first he blames the affectation of giving every period the same cadence; or of making the periods too short, and disjointed from each other

October 25th.]---I read Cicero in Orator. C. 63 —66, in relation to the harmony of prose. Although the Latin tongue was not perhaps so susceptible of it as the Greek, yet we may discover how attentive the Romans were to it. The end was to give to prose an harmony equivalent, but not similar to verse. The means employed were, 1. To consider syllables abstracted from feet, and to make long or short ones prevail in a period in the degree and manner they chose. Thus, in the famous passage of Demosthenes, we hear the sound of dactyles, or of something still more rapid; since out of twenty-nine syllables, twenty-one are short. 2. The ancient metre has this advantage over ours, that in modern tongues the harmony consists only in the composition of a verse, or at least of a hemistich; whereas, if you take an ancient verse to pieces, the feet of which it is composed give you, by their peculiar and distinct harmony, disjecta membra poetæ. The great variety of these feet furnished the orators with innumerable ways of harmonizing their periods, without ever deviating into verse. I likewise read Longinus, chapters forty-two and forty-three, which finished him. The forty-second contains some examples of fine descriptions, degraded by one or two low words. In the last chapter of this small, but valuable treatise, Longinus examines the reason why no sublime writers were to be found in his age.

He treats this question (which, taken in the utmost latitude, is perhaps a Gordian knot) with more eloquence than accuracy. It is, however, worth remarking, that he still continues to enforce his precept by his example. He appears pretty plainly to have been of opinion, that the true sublime, especially in eloquence, could never belong to slaves; and that it could be found only in geniuses nursed under a popular government, whose writings breathed the same liberty as their actions. These ideas are noble, and perhaps true; but they were too harsh for the court of Palmyra. Longinus was forced to enervate them, not only by the term Δικαιοτατη, which he takes care to apply twice to the present despotism; but by employing the stale pretence of putting his own thoughts into the mouth of a nameless philosopher. I read on the same question Seneca, Epist. cxiv. p. 646—651; Edit. Lips. apud Plantin. He considers it in another, and, I think, a better light than Longinus. Both attribute the decay of taste to luxury and its attendant vices; but the Greek, considering them almost as passive, thinks that they only extinguish all emulation and application; while the Roman looks upon them as very active, by accustoming our taste to relish only the tricks of novelty and affectation, and to despise genuine and simple eloquence. The character of Mæcenas is a fine caricature. How different is he from the Mæcenas of Virgil and Horace! As to Longinus in general, after what I have observed upon almost every chapter, I have little left to say. It is certainly a fine a fine performance; the style is faulty only by being rather too poetical for a didactic work. In general, I should adopt most of his decisions; only I think that for want of having a clear idea of the sublime, he has sometimes blamed passages for being deficient in that respect, or praised them for excelling in it, whose nature and design neither had, nor required, that kind of beauty. I could likewise have wished that Longinus had not always confined himself to single passages, but had pointed out that sublime which results from the choice and general disposition of a subject. I think that Longinus shews real taste and genius, by his indulgence in the sallies of a warm imagination, and by his severity to the prettinesses of the art; though, like most men of genius who possess more force and elevation than delicacy, he may sometimes have confounded refinement and affectation. As to his commentators, Langbænius is ostentatiously pedantic, and learnedly absurd; Le Fèvre is, as usual, vain, bold, and ingenious; the notes of Tollius are full of taste, good criticism, and real erudition. There are a number of corrupted passages in Longinus, which, by the help of manuscripts, or from his own conjectures, he has restored extremely well.

October 26th.]—I intended to have composed a long abstract of that Greek Life of Homer, which I finished September the fourth, and actually wrote a page of it; but other things intervening, I went no further. As it is now too late, I shall take this occasion of giving a short account of it. Its title is improper enough; after an history of Homer, comprised in a few lines, and full of blunders, the author proceeds to his main design, which was to shew that there was no art or science of which Homer was not the father and laid the foundations; a design which proves the excessive veneration of the Greeks still better than the temples they erected to him. To support so vain an argument, much sophistry and false reasoning was necessary. The following are some specimens of them which struck me. 1. It is almost impossible to follow him through his innumerable divisions and subdivisions, which, instead of easing our attention, and fixing our memory, perplex the one, and overburthen the other. This is a sufficient inconvenience in this method, but another infinitely greater results from it. Those divisions, by treating every minute part of a subject separately, often pass over the most essential notions of it, because they are common to the whole. Nay, as they are commonly the work of a trifling genius, they are sometimes founded only upon some very trivial and accessory ideas, without ever reaching the fundamental principles. Thus, when our critic wants to prove Homer an historian, he accurately divides the requisites of history into the mention of person, cause, place, time, instrument, passion, action, and manner; proves that in some part of his works the poet mentions each of these, and then very accurately concludes that he was an historian. What a minute division of history, which forgets all the most important parts of it, accuracy, impartiality, and and an hundred more!* 2. To prove Homer's knowledge universal, he is forced, in several sciences, to instance things hardly above the rank of self-evident ideas, with which no peasant in a civilized country is unacquainted. Thus he is the father of arithmetic, because by saying that fifty men guarded each of the thousand Trojan fires, he does not compute himself, but furnishes the occasion of computing the Trojan army at fifty thousand men.† 3. One would think it sufficient for Homer's honour, to have been the father of all known truth; and that it was rather lowering, than raising his character, to make him acquainted with all the opinions of latter ages, however extravagant or contradictory to one another. The system of Thales, who makes water the universal principle; that of Xenophanes, who to water adds earth; and the general opinion which acknowledges four elements, are all borrowed from Homer;‡ though to have aserted all these opposite principles, implies more learning than judgment. Indeed, when he speaks of the Stoics and Peripatetics, he saves the contradiction very ingeniously. Homer was acquainted with both systems; but he looked upon the first as more exalted and conformable to reason; on the latter, as more practicable, and conformable to experience.§ 4. When the plain text of Homer appears absurd, or at least furnishes no proofs of science, he has recourse to the alle-

* Vit. Homer. p. 315—318. † Vit. Homer. p. 360.
‡ ———— p. 324. § ———— p. 352—354.

gorical sense, where he discovers a thousand mysteries.* I cannot here explain my sentiments on that head, nor illustrate and enforce a distinction which has not been enough attended to, viz. of what was allegory to Homer, and what was indeed allegory in its origin, but, through various mixtures and length of time, appeared then in a quite different shape. I have the less occasion to do it here, as my author is much soberer on this head, than many others of the ancients; some of whom (Heraclides for instance) have written whole books upon Homer's allegories. 5. My author, like many of the ancients, is very fond of drawing philosophical conclusions from a resemblance of words and fanciful etymologies; a method, which, with reason, would give one a poor opinion of their logic. Thus our author, from the resemblance of Δεμας and Δεσμος, would infer that Homer looked upon the soul as shackled and imprisoned by the body,† without ever considering that such grammatical conjectures want proof themselves, instead of being able to furnish it to other positions. Indeed it is more excusable to employ such arguments for the existence, than for the truth of an opinion. 6. These two last faults are common to him with many; his reasonings about numbers are more peculiar to him. He runs, and carries Homer with him, into all the Pythagorean whimsies,‡ the perfections of the monade and odd numbers, and

* Vit. Homer. p. 325—330. † Vit. Homer. p. 342.
‡ ———— p. 358—360.

the

the imperfections of the duade and even ones. He quotes several passages of Homer where the monade is praised, such as the Εις κοιρανος εσω, without once inquiring whether it is praised for an absolute or for a relative merit. Notwithstanding these criticisms, I am far from despising this life of Homer. The author was a man of much subtility and ingenuity; so that you are often pleased with the imagination, though you despise the reasoning. Nay, the reasoning is often more the vice of his subject than his own. When he treats of those arts of which Homer was really a master, language, rhetoric, and morality, he is very solid and instructive. You find many nice observations concerning Homer's style, his use of the various Greek dialects, his deviations from the common rules of grammar, and the different figures he employs. One that struck me relates to the genders. He often, for the sake either of metre, or energy, employs a masculine epithet to a feminine substantive; but it is only speaking of those qualities of the mind which are of no sex, or if of any, which appertain rather to the male, such as κλυτος Ιπποδαμεια.* In treating of Homer's rhetoric, he explains very well the artifice of the speeches of the second Iliad; the various eloquence of the ambassadors to Achilles, and the gradations by which he gave way to them.†. So much for the original. The editor was mighty negligent in not distinguishing properly Homer's verses from the prose, which is full * Vit. Homer. p. 303. † Vit. Homer. p. 371—377.

of

of them, and not referring us to the places where they are to be found. The translator, whom I can scarcely believe to be Dr. Gale, has committed numberless blunders. I shall mention a curious one. He translates this verse of Homer, Ἀρνειόν, ταῦρόν τε, συῶν τ' ἐπιβήλορα κάπρον, Odyss. Λ. 130.

by *Arietem porcorum custodem. Besides the nonsense of the expression, and the absurdity of making one animal only, where grammar and the sense of his author required three; need I quote Constantine and Pollux to shew that Ἐπιβήλορα signifies ascensorem, and is metaphorically applied to the copulation of animals?† Why not translate it at once,

Agnum, et taurum, suisque ascensorem aprum?

Oct. 29th.]—I read Tollius's Gustus Animadversionum Criticarum, at the end of Longinus, p. 348—360. I cannot say that they any ways answered my expectation. Tollius was not equal to such critical parallels as they are designed for, between some of the ancient writers. The first is between a passage of Pindar and another of Horace. It results from his laborious inquiry, that the Greek tongue is more harmonious than the Latin. The second, between Theocritus and Virgil, teaches me, 1. That among the ancients, presenting or throwing apples was customary between lovers. 2. That Virgil is far inferior to the Greek poet,

* Vit. Homer. p. 359.

† Constant. in Voc. Jul. Poll. Onomastic. l. v. c. 15. p. 92.

since

since his Polyphemus boasts of having only milk all the year, whereas the Cyclop of Theocritus boasts that he has both milk and cheese. The third is between Apollonius and Ovid. As the Greeks are always to have the advantage, and Ovid is very open to criticism, Tollius talks rather more to the purpose.

Oct. 30th.]—I read Tollius, p. 360—371. A comparison between Virgil and a little poem of Petronius. Very bad indeed. However, I must now go through these comparisons.

31st.]—I went to church, heard a pretty good sermon from Mr. L, and read the second lesson, the fourth chapter of St. Luke, in Greek.

November 1st.]—I read Tollius, p. 371—381, the end. He compares Homer and Virgil as to the manner of Turnus' and Hector's deaths. He reasons better than usual, but did not consider that Hector's not asking for mercy like Turnus, is no proof of his superior courage. Turnus was slightly wounded; Hector mortally. I began to-day, as a natural supplement to Longinus, a philosophical inquiry into the nature of our ideas of the sublime and beautiful, and read the Introduction upon Taste, p. 1—40, which, like all other researches into our primary ideas, is rather loose and unsatisfactory. The division, however, of the passive impression which is common to all men, and relates chiefly to positive beauty or faultiness, and the active judgment which is founded on knowledge, and exercised mostly on comparison, pleased me; me; perhaps because very like an idea of my own.

Oct. 2d.]—I read the Inquiry, p. 40—95, which comprises the first part. The author's object is to class our various passions and sensations, and to investigate our affections, in order to discover how we are and ought to be affected. All those of the mind he refers to two classes;—self-preservation and society. The former renders us sensible of pain and terror; the latter in their various branches, (of sympathy, imitation, and terror,) of pleasure, love, and joy. Their nature is eternally distinct; and they never can run into one another. This naturally leads Mr. Burke to deny that the priva tion of pleasure ever produces positive pain; and vice versâ, the sensation produced by the absence of pain he calls delight, a solemn, awful feeling, very different from positive pleasure.

Nov. 4th.]—I finished the Inquiry, which contains in all 342 pages. The author writes with ingenuity, perspicuity, and candour. His reigning principles are, that pain, when absent, and moderated to terror, is productive of that solemn delight which forms the beauty of the sublime; this idea he pursues through its various shapes of immensity either of time or place, power, darkness, &c. It is surprising how much Longinus and Mr. Burke differ as to their idea of the operations of the sublime in our minds. The one considers it as exalting us with a conscious pride and courage, and the other as astonishing every faculty, and depressing the soul itself with terror and amazement.

ment. If it should be found that the sublime produces this double, and seemingly contrary effect; we must look out for some more general principles which may account for it, though we may adopt still many particular materials and observations of both writers in the investigation of it. Such is Mr. Burke's system of the sublime: his notion of the beautiful is, that it is produced by whatever gives us pleasure. Perhaps his idea, confined as it is to the pleasures of sense, (heightened indeed by the imagination,) is yet too general. What connexion can he discover between the pleasures of the taste and the idea of beautiful? However, he thinks, (and I believe with reason,) that any thing, to appear beautiful either to the sight or touch, must convey to the sense an idea of softness and gradual variation, and to the imagination those of gentleness, delicacy, and even fragility. The ideas of beauty being in the least founded on those of order, proportion, or utility, he entirely explodes. I cannot help observing here, that in speaking of any thing beautiful, we consider the figure as so essential to it as not to be altered without changing the nature of it; and the colour as an accessory quality which may be varied at pleasure;—a proof that sometimes common feelings are conformable to philosophical speculations, where we should the least suspect it. Mr. Burke employs his last part in considering words as the signs of ideas. He remarks that they do not commonly, when pronounced, call up in the mind a picture of the idea for which they stand; and that consequently quently in poetry or eloquence we are as often affected by the words themselves, as by clear images of what they are designed to represent. I began to-day Ubbo Emmius' Geographical Description of Greece, (which will be very useful for all my Greek authors, but particularly for the Odyssey,) and read p. 1—18.

Nov. 5th.]—I read Emmius, p. 18—40.

6th.]—I read Emmius, p. 40—45.

7th.]—I read Emmius, p. 45—54.

8th.]—I read Emmius, p. 54—194, the end. It is a short, and consequently a dry abridgment; but it is concise, clear, and exact. It contributed a good deal to confirm me in the contemptible idea I always entertained of Cellarius. 1. In comparing this abridgment with the single map of Grecia Propria, I found above 130 places omitted in Cellarius, and among them some of such note as Tiryns, Helos, Ithome, Pisa, the province of Acarnania, and the valley of Tempe. What would it have been had I entered into the minute detail of any one region?

17th.]—I read Les Observations de l'Abbé de Mably sur les Grecs. They are not ill written; but I think a capital fault of them is, attributing more consequences to the particular characters of men, often ill drawn, than to the general manners, character, and situation of nations.

30th.]—I began the Odyssey of Homer, and read l. i. p. 444, the end.

Dec. 1st.]—I read the Odyssey, l. ii. v. 1—128.

Dec.

Dec. 2d.]—I read the Odyssey, l. ii. v. 128—434, the end.

3d.]—I read Potter's Greek Antiquities, v. ii. p. 120—160, where he treats of the naval affairs of the Greeks, in order to understand the voyages of Telemachus. As, while I was reading, I saw from my window some of the finest ships in the world, I could not very much admire the small barks, with a mast occasionally set up and taken down, which they run ashore every night.

5th.]—I read the Odyssey, L. iii. v. 1—497, the end, and finished some new Journals, the Bibliothèque des Sciences et Belles Lettres, from April to September, 1762, and the Journal des Savans combiné avec les Mémoires de Trévoux, from June to September. There is a curious Dissertation of Mr. Beyer upon the Atlantic Island of Plato. He pretends it is Judea. Some circumstances and etymologies are as usual favourable to him, others totally opposite. However, calling in allegory and romance to support allegory and romance, he seems to think he has entirely confounded the Infidels. The other is the Voyage of M. Anquetil du Perron to the East Indies, with the sole view of studying the language and religion of the ancient Persees. He is just returned to France, with a prodigious number of manuscripts, which may perhaps throw some light upon one of the most obscure but most curious branches of ancient history.

6th.]—I read Potter's Antiquities, vol. ii. p. 209—237, —237, in relation to the sacrifice offered by Nestor, and so exactly described by Homer.

Dec. 12th.]—I had borrowed of M. B. . . a French Moral and Political Romance of the Abbé Terasson, called Sethos. The beginning is fine, the description of the manners of the court of Memphis is worthy of Tacitus; and the system of the Egyptian initiation is a very happy thought; but, unluckily, the interest of the piece gradually diminishes in every book, till you arrive at the catastrophe, which is very cold and unnatural. As to the style, it is pure and elegant, scarcely ever elevated, and never animated. The Abbé Terasson had too mathematical a head to excel in the language of description, and too stoic a heart to shine in that of the passions. His feelings, however, are just, though not warm: the whole work breathes a spirit of virtue and humanity which renders it very amiable.

EXTRAITS

EXTRAITS DE MON JOURNAL.

I MUST renounce the design of a regular and minute journal, of which I flattered myself with the plan, but of which I should find the constraint too great on my natural laziness to continue the execution. I had interrupted my labours for a few days; this little negligence might be so easily repaired! but these days have imperceptibly become weeks. The more I had to do, I was the more reluctant to begin the work. The time still left to me was spent in useless regret; and now that I ought to write my history for six months, reason tells me that I must no longer think of the undertaking.

But the same reason enjoins me not entirely to neglect the most curious occurrences, perhaps, of my whole life. I shall collect, therefore, not in the order of time, but according to the distribution of subjects, the new ideas which I acquired during my residence in Paris. These subjects may be arranged under the following heads: 1. My own personal concerns; expenses, connexions, friends. 2. The state of literature in France, the men of letters, academies, theatres. 3. Detached observations; military, political, and moral. 4. The public buildings and works of art.—I will allow, however, some pages of my journal, which were written at the time, to remain in their original state;—a vain undertaking, forsaken almost as soon as begun.

Lausanne, August 17th, 1763.]—I wrote a small part of my discourse on the ancient nations of Italy; small indeed, for a whole morning spent in the country. But of late I scarcely do any thing. My trifling avocations in town, the continual bustle at Mesery, and the frequent removals from the one to the other, produce greater distraction at Lausanne, than I ever experienced in London or Paris. I must seriously resume my labours.

Aug. 18th.]—I read the third Satire of Juvenal, consisting of three hundred and twenty-two verses. How judiciously does it set out! The honest Umbricius stops in the wood of Egeria, a sacred monument of the primitive Romans, but then inhabited by wretched Jews, to complain to Numa of the luxury of foreign manners, which had overflowed a nation whom he had instructed in laws and religion. The awkward meanness of the Romans, opposed to the address and suppleness of the Greeks, who made themselves slaves to become masters, forms a striking contrast. After such a beautiful picture, Juvenal, I think, would have done better not to have dwelt so long on the little inconveniences and disorders common to all great cities, and which are unworthy of exciting the serious indignation which he expresses against them.

20th.]—I read, for the first time, the fourth Satire of Juvenal.

24th.]—I read the fourth Satire of Juvenal, consisting of one hundred and fifty-four verses, for the second time. The council of Domitian is, perhaps, the most striking passage of satire to be met with in any ancient author. This subject perfectly suited our poet's genius; that seriousness of of indignation, and that energy of expression, of which he is sometimes too lavish, are here in their proper place; and they forcibly impress on the reader's mind that detestation for the tyrant, and contempt for the Romans, which both so richly merited. Unfortunately this piece is left unfinished. After having described the principal counsellors with the pen of Sallust, the very moment they ought to begin their deliberation, the principal personage disappears, the poet's fire extinguishes, and the end of the piece is mangled. I also read, twice, the fifth satire, consisting of one hundred and seventy-three verses. How gross were the manners of the Romans amidst all their luxury! The most insolent financier would not now venture to make such humiliating distinctions among his guests. At Rome, the elegant Pliny considers his being disgusted with them almost as a merit in himself.* How different were the characters of Horace and Juvenal, although both sons of freedmen! The latter disdained to bend to the pride of the great; and the former, while he cured them of that pride, lived with them not as a parasite, but as a friend.

Aug. 25th.]—I read, for the first time, the sixth Satire of Juvenal, consisting of six hundred and sixty verses; and finished the thirteenth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains extracts from many excellent works; such as Cudworth's Intellectual System, translated by Mosheim;†

* Vide Plin. Epist. L. ii. Ep. 6.

† The translation appears to be superior to the original.

Sale's Alcoran, &c. Critical Histories of Manicheism, and of the French Monarchy, by Mr. Beausobre and the Abbé Dubos. These extracts are rather superficial; but the History of the Roman Laws, by Heineccius, is highly interesting; for those who consider jurisprudence only in its relations to general literature.

Aug. 26th.]—I read over again the first hundred and sixty verses of the sixth Satire of Juvenal. After breakfast I went to the library, to consult Mr. Bochat's Treatise on the Worship of the Egyptian Divinities at Rome, so often mentioned by Juvenal. It is to be found in the Neufchatel Mercury for the year 1742. This treatise is merely a hypothesis, and that very chimerical; namely, that the worship of these divinities was brought from Egypt to Greece, and from Greece to Italy, by colonies established in that country long before the age of Romulus. I consulted the first volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres, p. 140, concerning the signification of the word "Attonitæ" in the fourth Satire of Juvenal, v. 77. Mr. Valois applies it to the astonishment which prevailed in the capital, in consequence of the revolt of L. Antonius in Lower Germany. This conjecture is possible, which is all that can be said of it. But I am surprised that he has not drawn from it the only conclusion that could render it interesting. Antonius's revolt happened in the year of Rome 840.* The excessive tyranny of Domitian had then reached its meridian; yet the baseness of the Romans endured this monster still nine years longer. I read the fourteenth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Syntagma Dissertationum, &c. Leipsic, 1733: a good collection, by Mosheim, which, however, savours too much of the Theologian, and even of the Lutheran. Plinii Epistolæ, a Cortio, cum notis variorum; Amstel. 1734: a very good edition. Itineraria Vetera a Wesselingio; Amstel. 1735: a most excellent edition of one of the most useful works we have, on the Geography of the Roman Empire.

* V. M. de Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. ii. p. 39.—edit. fol.

of

Aug. 27th.]—I read, for the second time, the sixth Satire of Juvenal,—the source of all the invectives that have for sixteen centuries been accumulated against the sex. Nothing can be added to its force, richness, and variety; but some things perhaps might be retrenched from those too faithful descriptions, which, while they condemn vice, are apt to inspire vicious passions. Yet those wretches —are they entitled to escape infamy through the excess of their guilt? Ought their profligacy to be concealed from posterity, because they carried it to an immeasurable height? Juvenal has even been reproached with gratifying, in such descriptions, the pruriency of his own fancy. Yet the horror which he uniformly testifies at the disorders which he describes, will always persuade me, that his warmth proceeds, not from the flames of voluptuousness, but from the fire of indignation and genius. Instead of a licentiousness of morals, which inclined him to pardon vice, I would rather reproach him with a malignity of heart, which made him think the corruption general. He perpetually confounds invective with satire. All women are guilty, and guilty of the most enormous crimes. You may find a Clytemnestra in every street.* I know that there never, perhaps, was an age more profligate than that of Juvenal; in which morals were enervated by luxury; the heart hardened by the institutions of domestic slavery and the amphitheatre; sentiments debased by the tyranny of government; and every characteristic and manly principle subverted, by the mixture and confusion of nations in one great city. Yet, there still remained many vestiges of the ancient virtues; and women, as well as men, worthy of living in a better age. If we consult Pliny's Epistles, a contemporary monument, we shall find in the circle of that amiable Roman, humanity, morals, the love of talents and of merit. Juvenal never allows himself to bestow the smallest praise on virtuous characters,† even with the view of rendering the vicious more ugly by the contrast. All the other satirists, Horace, Boileau, Pope, have taken care to recommend themselves to their readers as the friends of virtue and of man; and as such, have perhaps, of all poets, most gained our love. But Juvenal seems to have a rooted hatred to his species; and, having declared against them open war, is totally regard-

* Juvenal, Satir. vi. v. 655.

† I mean those of his own times.

less

less of their friendship. This misanthropy, indeed, must render his works peculiarly acceptable to human malignity.

Aug. 28th.]—I read twice the seventh Satire of Juvenal; in which the poet describes, with his ordinary spirit, the poverty and contempt attending the men of letters of his times. The subject is always a disagreeable one; since it is more easy to render a character amiable, which happens to be the object of public hatred, than to render those respectable, who are the objects of a general, though unjust, contempt: besides, those continual complaints respecting the bad state of their fortune, come with peculiar disadvantage from men of letters. We acknowledge their murmurs to be just, but they always strike us with an idea of avidity and meanness, extremely inconsistent with the elevation which we expect from their characters. If wit consists in finding between ideas, relations that are natural without being obvious, the contrast of the poet and the lion surely deserves that name; it is one of the wittiest possible. I finished the fifteenth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains a second extract from Heineccius, explaining the history of the German law; a subject less interesting, indeed, than that of the Roman law, but equally well treated. Réflexions Critiques; Critical Reflexions on Ancient Nations, by Mr. Fourmont the elder. Because a man understands the Chinese, is he, therefore, entitled to tell us absurdities, with the authority of an oracle? Saturn the same with Abraham! The great divinity of the Pagans the same with a wandering patriarch: and adored after his death almost by the whole world, except his own posterity; and that posterity an object of abhorrence and contempt to all his adorers! The life of Julian, written by my friend the Abbé de la Bleterie. The journalists are insensible to the merit, both of the hero and the historian; and even indulge themselves in making very unbecoming reflexions with respect to both. In general, the bitterness of zeal and controversy prevails too much in this Bibliothèque. When a father Colonia invites the faithful to the jubilee of Lyons, he is best answered with silent contempt; yet ridicule may be used against him without blame. But in giving the analysis of a work of literature or history, to bring forward opinions and reasonings suitable merely to the country of the reader, with a view to refute them tediously and ill-naturedly, is surely to mistake the business of a critical journal.—I wrote two pages of my collection on the ancient geography of Italy.

Aug. 29th.]—I read, for the first time, the eighth Satire of Juvenal, containing 275 verses.

30th.]—I did nothing but write a page and a half for my collection.

31st.]—I read over again the eighth Satire of Juvenal. I also twice read the ninth, containing 150 verses, and, for the first time, the first hundred verses of the tenth. How humiliating it is for mankind, that they must be taught, almost in all countries, that they are more respectable for their own virtues, than for those of their ancestors!

The

The origin and establishment of this prejudice is scarcely conceivable. Nature draws an indelible distinction between those to whom she has given talents, and those from whom she has withheld them. The subordination of citizens to their magistrates is founded on fear and reason; but what was the principle that originally established the distinction of noble and plebeian? I think it was religion. This question would require to be examined at great length, and the examination of it would be curious. I shall be contented with making a single observation on this satire. 1. Juvenal speaks, from one end of it to the other, the language of an ancient Roman. We perceive throughout, not only the dignity of a true censor, who arraigns vice, exposes folly, and appals guilt, but the soul of a republican, reluctantly bending under the new constitution, the sworn enemy of tyranny, and the friend of a mild and equitable monarchy rather through necessity than inclination. This love of liberty, and loftiness of mind, distinguishes Juvenal from all the poets who lived after the establishment of the monarchy. Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Lucan, Martial, Statius, Valerius Flaccus, all sing the ruin of their country, and the triumph of its oppressors. The vices of a Nero and a Domitian are commemorated in as lofty notes of praise, as the virtues of Augustus and Vespasian. Juvenal alone never prostitutes his muse. In his works, there is but one example of praise bestowed on the emperor; a praise perhaps just, expressed with the greatest simplicity, and included in a single verse. But he never never loses an opportunity of arraigning the folly and tyranny of those masters of the world and their deputies. He does more; he teaches how the evils inflicted by them may be cured.

Tollas licet, omne quod usquam est
Auri atque argenti, scutum gladiumque relinques Et jaculum et galeam; spoliatis arma supersunt—is an advice addressed fully as much to the Romans as to the Africans. Juvenal's liberty of speech fixes the time in which he lived far better than the uncertain and contradictory reports of an old scholiast. He lived under a good prince, a Nerva or a Trajan, at a happy period when his sentiments might be expressed without disguise. Tyrants had the nicest sensibility; they easily knew their own pictures in those of their predecessors. Domitian reasonably concluded, that an enemy to Nero could not be his friend; an informer would have silenced Juvenal after his first satire. But I suspect that he never run that risk. Men, distinguished by vigour of mind and elevation of genius, found no other means of escaping the fatal suspicion of tyrants, than by concealing themselves in silence and obscurity, confining their application to innocent and frivolous pursuits.—The ninth Satire of Juvenal is disgusting by its subject. The vice which the poet condemns is exhibited without disguise. The ridicule of the satire appears to me to arise from the character of Nævolus, a miserable catamite, whose principles are so much debased by his way of life, that he has lost all sense of its infamy, and relates his services with the same air of indifference indifference that a soldier would describe his campaigns. This gravity, which the reader perceives to be so much out of place, and which Nævolus does not, produces, in my opinion, the whole humour of the piece.

Sept. 1st.]—I read a second time the tenth Satire of Juvenal, v. 100—365, the end; and the eleventh, consisting of 208 verses, for the first time. In the tenth, Juvenal treats a subject worthy of himself; the vanity of human wishes, a misfortune consistent with the greatest virtues, and intimately connected with the most natural sentiments of the heart. The poet every where employs a refined and accurate philosophy, founded on the strictest principles of moral science. His genius rises with his subject: he shews the nothingness of false grandeur, and weighs, with the sublime indifference of a superior being, the virtues, talents, and destiny, of the greatest men. He here neglects, and seems even to disdain, the beauty of versification, and that sweet and charming harmony of which he was so great a master. His style, precise, energetic, lofty, and enriched with images, flows in a rougher stream than in his other pieces. Taking experience for his guide, his reasonings are mixed with examples, of which the greater part are chosen with exquisite judgment. That of Sejanus is a masterpiece: never was any elevation more extraordinary than his, nor any fall more dreadful. The levity of the people, who were in haste to break his statues, which they had just worshipped, is a finished picture of popular inconstancy. The example of the the death of Alexander seems to me to be chosen with less discernment than the rest. His misfortune consisted in being cut off in the midst of his success and glory. Yet had Marius died as he descended from his triumphal car, he would have been deemed the happiest of mortals. The reasoning in this satire would have been clearer, had Juvenal distinguished between those wishes, the accomplishment of which could not fail to make us miserable, and those whose accomplishment might fail to make us happy. Absolute power is of the first kind; long life of the second. The latter we may safely commit to the providence of the gods; but our own reason may teach us to pray, that they would refuse to us the former. With regard to the gods, I remark that inconstancy of opinion in Juvenal, which is so frequent among the ancients. At one moment nothing can be more pious than his faith, or more philosophical than his submission. The next, our own wisdom suffices, and prudence usurps the thrones of all the divinities. In the following verse his devotion again gets the ascendency: he limits his general assertion to fortune only, and replaces all the other gods in Olympus.

Sept. 2d.]—I finished the fourteenth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Foster's Sermons. Wonderful! a divine preferring reason to faith, and more afraid of vice than of heresy. Scriptores Rei Rusticæ à Gesnero. These authors may be useful for instructing us in the language and rural economy of the Romans; but where where is the student that reads, or the farmer who puts in practice, their lessons? Notitia Hungariæ, vol. i. per Math. Ball: an immense work, but too minutely circumstantial for any but Hungarians. The Panegyric of Mr. Le Clerc; a dry but accurate work of the Reviewer. The Council of Trent, by Father Paul, translated by Father Courayer; first extract. We might wish the translator more vigour of understanding; but in his preface he displays all the candour, impartiality, and toleration, that can possibly be desired.

Sept. 3d.]—I read a second time the eleventh Satire of Juvenal: I read the first hundred verses a third time: and also the twelfth Satire, consisting of 130 verses. In the eleventh, Juvenal takes an opportunity, in inviting his friend to supper, to contrast, with much sprightliness, the extravagant luxury of his contemporaries with the simple and coarse fare of ancient dictators. He makes us clearly perceive, without formally expressing it, how universal, and almost necessary, the elegance of the table was become in his time, since a poor philosopher like himself prepared for his friend a supper, very inferior indeed to the feasts of Ventidius, but far superior to those of Curius. This entertainment was to be graced by simplicity, neatness, and decent amusements only. Juvenal possessed justness of understanding, and honesty of heart; but his character was deficient in point of sweetness and sensibility. He has neglected an opportunity of expressing those sentiments, which one friend, when he feels them, is always ready to pour pour into the bosom of another. The free and philosophical conversation which the confidence of friendship inspires and warrants, is but ill supplied at his supper by the reading of Homer. Horace took care not to forget, in his charming picture of an entertainment distant and uncertain, those amiable feelings with which the near reality of a similar repast does not inspire Juvenal. Here, however, I would make a distinction between this satirist and Boileau. Neither of them were endowed with tenderness of sentiment. But this defect in Boileau proceeded from a coldness of heart and fancy, which rendered him but little susceptible of any passion whatever. Juvenal's heart and fancy were both of them ardent; but their warmth exhausted itself in passions strong, dark, and elevated, not in affections which are amiable and tender.

Sept. 4th.]—I did nothing but finish the twelfth Satire of Juvenal, v. 100—130, the end. This performance shews the author's genius for satire, but also that it was the only kind of genius with which he was endowed. In this piece, he certainly did not at first intend writing a satire, but only to congratulate one of his friends, who had been saved from a dreadful shipwreck. After employing, on this subject, two-thirds of the poem, he is at once diverted from it, by recollecting that his friend, for whose safety he is to offer so many sacrifices, has three children. This conduct in himself strikes him as totally opposite to that of the testament-hunters, with whom Rome abounded, and whose attentions were solely bestowed on rich people who were childless. He forgets his friend, for the pleasure of exposing those knaves. The lively picture which he draws of them, is far superior to his description of the tempest, which is tedious, languid, confused, disgraced by declamation, and even by puerility.

and

I finished the seventeenth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains the second and third extract from Father Paul's Council of Trent, translated by Father Courayer. It should seem as if the soul of the illustrious Servite animated the regular Canon: the same talents, virtues, and even weaknesses, are common to both. This work is a beautiful monument of the history of religion, the most curious part of the history of the human mind, for those who can soar above the prejudices of sects and parties. De Verbis ambiguis, a Reitzio: good design, ill executed. A Dissertation on Suicide, by Robeck. The author threw himself into the Elbe. It is impossible to doubt his sincerity, which far surpassed his understanding.

Sept. 5th.]—I wrote above a page of my collection, and read the thirteenth Satire of Juvenal, consisting of 249 verses.

6th.]—I read a second time, the thirteenth Satire of Juvenal, and the fourteenth, consisting of 331 verses, for the first time. In the first, the poet offers consolation to a friend, who had been defrauded of ten thousand sesterces, by a knave, who denied the deposit of that sum. In this satire, a divine might find new proofs of the uncertainty tainty of the Pagans respecting a Providence and a future state. The poet speaks almost divinely of the torments of a guilty conscience; of its horrid remorse for having violated the laws of justice; and of the dreadful sufferings of him who bears his punishment always in his own heart. His dreams appal him with the most frightful images; and the pain of every calamity that befalls him is heightened by his regarding it as a punishment. But he does not decide whether these terrors rest on any solid foundation. Wickedness and misery are associated in the fancy; but does reason prove that there is a necessary connexion between them? Juvenal does not consider this question, any more than the punishment of the wicked in another life. He mentions this but once, and then contemptuously. Having exhausted his whole eloquence in describing the punishments of vice, he thinks none so powerful and efficacious as that inflicted by the magistrates, with which he concludes. Yet Juvenal had never imbibed the impious philosophy of the Greeks; he was an old Roman, who hearkened to Cato rather than to Chrysippus; and who sincerely venerated the divinity, though he was inclined to laugh at the polytheism of his fellow-citizens.

Sept. 7th.]—I finished the eighteenth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains the letters of Leibnitz. This universal genius here appears as a theologian. As a philosopher, could Leibnitz really hope that an union might be effected among religions? Vitæ Servii Sulpicii et P. Al-

P. Alpheni. The life of the first of these lawyers is as interesting, as that of the second is the reverse. It is written by Everard Otto. Heineccii Opuscula. Among these dissertations, that concerning the dress of the first Christians is learned and curious. Catonis Disticha. After having read the proofs brought by M. Carnegzieter, it is impossible to doubt that Dionysius Cato was a Pagan who lived before the age of Constantine. It was not necessary, surely, to be a Christian, to be able to retail, in the lowest style, maxims of the plainest common sense.

Sept. 8th.]—I wrote two pages of my collection, and read over again the fourteenth Satire of Juvenal, v. 1—106.

9th.]—The first volume of the Letters of Baron Bielfeld having accidentally fallen into my hands, engaged and amused me. I was pleased with his description of Berlin, Potsdam, and Hanover. The life led by the King of Prussia, in his retreat, is well sketched. We behold the morning of a beautiful day; but as there are no presages of the tempest, the picture is a little too flattering. As to Homer and England, the Baron is just as well acquainted with the one as with the other.

13th.]—I finished the nineteenth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée: it contains the fourteenth and last extract from Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent, translated by Courayer. The refined policy of the House of Austria has always known how to avail itself of that superstition of which other nations have been the victims. Austria, in particular, rejected the authority of the Council of Trent, which she had appeared to admit most respectfully. Cæsar's Commentaries, by Oudendorp: a good and bulky edition. Thoughts and Theological Dissertations, by Alphonso Turretin: a weak reasoner, but a good writer. The Miracles of Abbé Paris, by Montgeron. This fanaticism of the Jansenists is one of those epidemic maladies of the human mind, which deserves much attention.

Sept. 16th.]—I had a little neglected Juvenal. To-day I read, for the second time, the fourteenth Satire, v. 106—331, the end; and, for the first time, the fifteenth Satire, v. 1—174. There are satires more agreeable than the fourteenth; there are others in which the poet takes a loftier flight; but there are none in which he so much displays his genius for philosophy, the art of connecting his ideas, his precision, and brevity. His brevity resembles not that so common among writers of the present age, who often strangle a thought in hopes of strengthening it; and who applaud their own skill, when they have shewn to us, in a few absurd words, the fourth part of an idea: it is the brevity of Tacitus and Montesquieu, which, after retrenching whatever is superfluous or unnecessary, includes the principal thought in a precise and vigorous expression. By selecting the most characteristic circumstances, the poet sets before your eyes, in five lines, (v. 166—171), the simplicity of the ancient Romans, their love of labour, their domestic happiness, the fruitfruitfulness of their wives, their sober diet, and their aversion to being served by a multitude of foreign slaves. Throughout the whole of this satire, the texture is skilfully combined; the thoughts either rising immediately the one from the other, or the transitions being so natural, that they are almost imperceptible. How justly and artfully does the poet describe the progress of avarice in the human heart? tracing it from its origin, in sordid parsimony, to mean contrivances for gain; and from thence to injustice, violence, and the greatest crimes. The father who first inspired into his son this miserable passion, vainly struggles to check his flagitious career; and after being long the astonished spectator of his crimes, sometimes becomes their victim.

Trepidumque Magistrum
In cavea magno fremitû, leo tollet alumnus; is an image equally bold and impressive. This master of the lion had exasperated his natural ferocity, in order to render him more deserving the attention of the amphitheatre.

Sept. 17th.]---I read the fifteenth Satire of Juvenal, v. 1—174, the second time; and also read the sixteenth and last Satire. In the first of these Juvenal expresses, undisguised, his hatred against the Egyptian nation and religion. This does not at all surprise me. As a man of good sense, Juvenal despised the absurdities of this worship; he saw how much its introduction into Rome had corrupted the morals of his fellow-citizens; and perceived that those crowded assemblies, in which the distinctions of age, rank, and sex were concealed and confounded, under the veil of night and mystery, opened a door to the most abominable debauchery, at the same time that the Egyptian prophets and fortune-tellers taught women and children to calculate, and sometimes to hasten, the deaths of their fathers and husbands. His own banishment into a country which was the object of his contempt or detestation, naturally sharpened his animosity, and carried his resentment to the utmost pitch. I only wish that he had restrained it within the bounds of justice. In a tumult excited by superstition, the Egyptians devoured the flesh of one of their fallen enemies. From this horrid action it was not fair to conclude, that the Egyptians equalled in barbarity the Cyclops and the Lestrigons. The French treated with equal brutality Mareshal d'Ancre, and the Dutch Pensionary de Witt. The fixed and permanent character of a people ought never to be inferred from moments of madness and fury. The poet also too much indulges his talent for declamation. Instead of aggravating the crime of the Egyptians, he in reality lessens it by his unseasonable reasonings, his example of the Vascones, &c. He who violates the principles of Zeno may be worthy of blame; but the monster who insults the dictates of nature can alone excite horror. The genius of our poet is clearly displayed in the witty description of the worship which the Egyptians paid to animals;* in the origin of society, founded on

* Sat. xv. v. 1—14.

those

those principles of benevolence, which are implanted by nature in the heart of man only;* and in that dreadful, though beautiful picture of the ferocity of an Egyptian.

The sixteenth Satire is not clearly proved to be Juvenal's. It is written weakly, and negligently; but I think we may recognize the master's hand in v. 55. This satire, however, is of considerable importance in history. It has not been sufficiently remarked to what extent the privileges of soldiers were carried under the emperors. In moments of sedition, it was manifest, they overturned their thrones; but it was not known that in time of peace they shared their sovereignty. I know not of a bolder enterprise, in any small portion of a community, than that of withdrawing itself from the jurisdiction of the ordinary magistrates, and insisting that its differences, even with the other classes of citizens, should be decided by its own judges. The clergy obtained these privileges in the dark ages; but such pretensions seem to have been more excusable in a body, which was believed to possess all the virtue, and which really possessed all the learning of the times, than they could possibly be in the Roman soldiers, whose ignorance, grossness of manners, despotic and military maxims, removed them to so great a distance from the character belonging to a judge.

I finished Juvenal, whom I regret not being earlier acquainted with; and who, in future, will be one of my favourite authors. Having written my observations on him, as they occurred in reading his Satires, I have but little to add on the subject; and shall confine myself to two remarks: the first, as to the time in which he lived; the second, concerning his versification. 1st. There is not any Latin poet concerning whom we have so little information; whether from pride or modesty, he has neglected to tell us either the time of his birth, or the circumstances of his life. None of his works were written in commemoration of any great event, which might have ascertained their date. It seems as if he had taken a pleasure in perplexing us, by often speaking of many persons as his contemporaries who lived at very different periods of time. There remain but a few words of an old life of Juvenal, written by an unknown author; which life augments our uncertainty, by its opposition to the clearest inferences from the poet's own works. According to that biographer and his scholiast, Juvenal lived under Nero, who banished him to Egypt, where he died soon afterwards. Yet it is certain that he survived Domitian; that he witnessed the condemnation of Marius Priscus; that Martial, who did not retire into Spain until the reign of Trajan, left him at Rome; and from the date of a consulship, there is reason to suspect, that he was in Egypt in the third year of the reign of Adrian. All the æras perfectly correspond with the system of the learned Dodwell, who thinks that our poet was banished by the last named emperor. Some time ago, I read Dodwell's Dodwell's work, the Quintilian Annals. I have not the book at hand, and cannot recollect the proofs which he brings; but I can see several probabilities tending to support his opinion. 2. Juvenal's versification appears to me to be superior to that of most of the Latin poets. Managed by him, the Roman language loses all its roughness. His verses are flowing, harmonious, and animated; although he never sacrifices the sense to the sound. I should fancy that the lines flowed spontaneously from his pen, did I not perceive, amidst a multitude of fine ones, some few that are disgusting, by their rudeness or their languor. To have allowed them to pass uncorrected, a poet must have been extremely inattentive to his versification; since they might have been mended so easily. I remark also, that his poetry is more sparing of ornament in his last satires. If they are placed in the chronological order, this difference may be easily accounted for.

* Sat. xv. 129—158.

As the Satire of Sulpitia, on the banishment of the philosophers, is printed with the Satires of Juvenal, I had an inclination to examine it; and therefore read it twice over, v. 1—70. The praises bestowed by Martial had prepossessed me in favour of this lady; but, in my opinion, those praises were not her due. Her genius, perhaps, was too feeble to support her in this lofty flight; but was better adapted to subjects that required only taste, spirit, and sensibility. The epigrammatist, perhaps, had as little delicacy in his praise as in his satire; and was carelessly prodigal of his flattery to a woman of fashion, whose house was the resort of men of letters. 1. The work is without method or plan; and the beauty of the subject is destroyed by her manner of treating it. Instead of lamenting that the throne of ignorance should be established on the ruins of philosophy and the arts, twenty-three lines of a poem consisting of seventy are consumed in an invocation and conclusion, which informs us of nothing, except that Sulpitia was a woman of great vanity and affectation: and were it not for eight verses casually inserted in the middle of the satire,* I should not be able to guess its subject, as I still am at a loss to discover the meaning and use of the digression, where she examines whether prosperity or adversity were most useful to the republic. 2. As to the style and poetry, it is the misfortune of Sulpitia, that she has not left room for criticising faults, that proceed from genius or fancy. Her work is characterised by coldness, hardness, poverty of invention, rudeness of harmony, and a versification that gratifies neither the ear nor the mind. 3. Women have been accused of want of precision. In this respect Sulpitia does not belie her sex. Without mentioning that she confounds science with wisdom, as if those two things had never been distinguished, I shall only give an example of the most incongruous and absurd simile that I ever remember to have met with. The philosophers banished by Domitian are compared with the Gauls expelled

* Bello fecunda secundo.

by

by Camillus. It is needless to point out the absurdity of comparing a body of men of letters with a nation of barbarians, and a legal banishment with the defeat of an army; and Sulpitia ought to have remembered that the Gauls had burnt the city, besieged the capitol, and that their conqueror, Camillus, merited the title of second founder of Rome. 4. Justice, however, must be done to Sulpitia. Her satire is adorned by one striking image. Rome, after all her victories, is represented under the figure of the wrestler Milo, who remained alone in the lists, vainly expecting an antagonist. This image is happily conceived; and clearly, though not forcibly, expressed.

Sept. 7th.]—I this day began the description of ancient Rome, by Fabiano Nardini, translated into Latin by Tollius, and inserted in the fourth volume of Grævius's Roman Antiquities, which Mr. Pavillard borrowed for me from the public library of Geneva. This work is much valued by the learned; though I perceive that the Abbé l'Anglet de Fresnoy speaks lightly of its translation. I read l. i. c. i, ii. p. 881—897. Nardini vindicates the account commonly given of the origin of Rome, by arguments very generally known. This is the subject of the first chapter. The second is very interesting, since it examines the extent of the first city, built by Romulus, which comprehended only the Palatine Mount; and when the Sabines took the Capitol, this meant the citadel.

Sept. 18.]—I read Nardini, l. i. c. iii, iv, v, vi, vii, viii, ix, x. p. 897—945, which terminates the first book. A variety of subjects are treated with great learn-learning, considerable judgment, and a minute accuracy; which is commonly instructive, but sometimes tiresome. Having finished his description of the city built by Romulus, he examines the addition made to it by Tatius, the ally of that king, on the Capitoline Hill; and then proceeds to consider the form given to it by Servius Tullius, (the least celebrated, but perhaps the greatest of all its legislators,) and the wall which bounded the extent of Rome to the reign of Aurelian. This wall he traces with great attention, directed by an exact local knowledge. It results from the whole of his observations, that the circuit of ancient Rome was scarcely so considerable as that of the modern: a fact which totally overturns the systems of Lipsius and Vossius. Nardini is very happy in explaining the famous passage of Pliny, which treats of the twelve gates; and which ought not to be reckoned more, since we learn from two passages of Cicero and Livy, that several of the Roman gates had two arches, called Jani; which are still distinguishable on ancient monuments. Nardini is not equally successful in explaining the Pomœrium. In spite of all his hypotheses, there are still three propositions on this subject, which rest on equally good authority, and are yet contradictory to each other. 1. That the Pomœrium was a consecrated slip of ground on both sides of the walls. 2. That the walls of Rome had the same extent from Servius Tullius to Aurelian. 3. That Sylla, Julius Cæsar, and the emperor Claudius, extended the Pomœrium.

I this day finished the twentieth volume of the Biblio-

Bibliothèque Raisonnée; which contains the translation of Diodorus Siculus, by the Abbé Terasson. It is remarkable that a man, who despised the finest writers of antiquity, should have condescended to become the translator of an historian, whose accidental utility far surpasses his real merit. Though this translation be esteemed, the critic here exposes many of its errors. Two editions of Titus Livius, with his supplements; one by Drakenborch, and the other by Crevier. In the first, the text of Livy is buried under a weight of the commentaries, good or bad, that have been written on that author. The second contains a sensible life of the historian, a judicious selection of the best remarks on his work, and displays as much intelligence as taste on the part of the editor. He includes the first fifteen books, together with his own prolegomena, in 828 pages; whereas the Dutch editor bestows 2159 pages on the first nineteen books, cum notis variorum. The latter edition, however, may be considered as a good repertory. Syntagma Dissertationum ad Historiam Ecclesiasticam pertinentium a Moshemio. His ecclesiastical dissertations seem to me to have more merit than his theological ones. The Truth of the Miracles of Mr. Paris; second and third Extract. The journalist carefully sifts the cure of young Alphonso of Palacios: if none of the miracles was better than this, the Jesuits needed not to have ascribed them to the devil. La Friponnerie Laïque, Lay Fraud, by Dr. Bentley. An answer to the famous book of Collins, full of learning and scurrility; in the latter of which the author is outdone by his translator and critic.

Sept.

Sept. 19.]—I read Nardini, l. ii. c. i, ii, iii. p. 949—961. After fixing the limits of the city, he describes the seven hills which they included. The reverse of this method would perhaps have been more natural. He explains very clearly the different divisions of the people and of the city, the tribes and curiæ of Romulus, the tribes instituted by Servius, the fourteen regions of Augustus, and the seven regions of the first popes. I wish he had inquired into the distribution of the curiæ after the reign of Servius, and determined whether they were again divided among the tribes instituted by that prince; whether the division of the tribes by Romulus continued to subsist merely for the purpose of the comitia curiata; or whether, after the time of Servius, the division of the people by curiæ, had no longer any relation to their division by tribes. The latter opinion appears to me the more probable.

20th.]—I finished the second book of Nardini, chapters fourth and fifth. I also read the third book, c. i, ii, iii, iv, v, vi, vii. p. 961—1005. He speaks of the authors who have given us descriptions of Rome; such as Publius Victor, Sextus Rufus, Onuphrius, Panvinius, and the Notitia Imperii. Their chief utility arises from their having had before their eyes many monuments which are now known only by books. Yet notwithstanding this advantage, their descriptions are so inferior in point of accuracy to those of modern critics, (Nardini for example,) that the latter are continually obliged to correct their mistakes, to supply their defects, and sometimes even to point out their contradictions.

tradictions. After these preliminary matters, Nardini proceeds to describe the fourteen regions of the city; treating minutely in this part of his work, the first region, or that of the Porta Capena; and the second, or that of the Mons Cælius. We may pronounce his researches in general to be successful. By combining a multitude of passages scattered in ancient authors, both with each other, and with his local knowledge of Rome, he is enabled to ascertain the situation of the greater part of its monuments. His account of the valley of Egeria, which lies on the left of the Porta Capena, between the Latin and Appian ways, illustrated, much to my satisfaction, several passages in Juvenal. He employs the half of a chapter in investigating the true meaning of the words domus and insula, and in confuting Lipsius's opinion on that subject. Grævius is equally dissatisfied with the explications of Lipsius and his antagonist. If these antiquaries, who were better critics than logicians, had been at as much pains to acquire an exact idea of their subject, as to heap up citations, I am persuaded they would easily have perceived, 1. That the word insula, which in its application to the houses of Rome, was at first metaphorical, denoted every edifice that was entirely insulated, and whose walls were completely separated from those of the neighbouring buildings. This primitive signification of the word is supported both by the nature of the thing and the authority of Festus; and we ought not to mix with this essential characteristic, any accessory ideas. 2. Without disputing that, in the first ages of Rome, the number of such edifices was great,

we

we may boldly affirm that it became much greater after the conflagration in the reign of Nero; and that in the age of Constantine, buildings called insulæ filled the whole extent of the city. Tacitus informs us of a wise regulation made by Nero, forbidding the use of walls common to two contiguous houses, and requiring that the walls of each house should be distinct and separate from those of the houses nearest to it. The insulæ cannot be more accurately defined than by this description; and we cannot doubt whether the edict was carried into execution, when we read in Publius Victor, that in the fourth century there were 46,000 insulæ in the capital; and that, with the exception of not more than 1800 domus, all the dwellings of Rome were comprehended under that name. Since the fact is ascertained, it is our business not to contest, but to explain it. I will not therefore allege that the whole city could not have been rebuilt agreeably to Nero's edict, because there was only a part of it consumed by the conflagration under his reign. As the edict was a wise one, it would naturally be perpetuated by his successors; and in the space of three hundred years from Nero to Victor, there was time for rebuilding the whole city according to the new plan. The unpleasing effect of so many separate houses to the eye, ought not to create any difficulty: safety is to be preferred to beauty; especially to a beauty dependent on fashion; so that, provided the streets were straight and spacious, the eye would be abundantly gratified. 3. This edict regulated only the situation of houses, but left their size and shape to the discretion of each each proprietor. Nero's palace and the house of an artificer were equally entitled to the appellation of insulæ, provided they had the specific character of standing detached and separate from all other buildings. The number of such insulæ could not be considerable. The great form but a small proportion of any community; and the expense, together with the inconvenience and danger attending a separate dwelling, incline me to believe that the lower classes at Rome were contented with lodgings; which appears really to have been the case, both from Juvenal and Martial. The avaricious industry of man will serve better to convince us than all the passages in ancient authors, that there would be a number of builders, who promoted the beauty of the city and the convenience of its inhabitants by erecting large edifices, of which the separate apartments were let to different families. This practice, which became general, greatly extended the signification of the word insulæ, by connecting with it a new meaning. It began to denote a multitude of families living under the same roof, and therefore a house hired to the lower classes of the people: and in this sense it is taken by Petronius and the writers on the Roman law. 4. From the number of the insulæ would it be possible to ascertain that of the inhabitants of Rome? Victor and the Notitia Imperii fix the former at 46,602. We learn from Juvenal, that the houses of the Romans consisted commonly of four stories;* and if we suppose each story

* Juvenal Satir. iii. 197—202.

story to have lodged a family of six persons, each of the insulæ would contain twenty-four inhabitants. Those which were let to hire could not have fewer, and the palaces of the rich would contain a far greater number.* This surplus may be divided among the small insulæ not let to hire, but belonging to those who inhabited them: so that by multiplying the number of insulæ by twenty-four, we shall have 1,118,448 for the inhabitants of Rome. I am pleased with this number, which, without passing the bounds of credibility, corresponds with the great extent of the city, and with all that we are told of its populousness. It might be clearly proved that Nardini's system would give but 360,000 inhabitants to the capital of the world; whereas Grævius's hypothesis would require four or five millions: both which numbers seem to me highly improbable. 5. As to the 1800 houses, domus, which in all the descriptions of Rome are reckoned separately, their name, their numbers, and a passage of Suetonius concur in making me believe that they were the principal buildings, or palaces of Rome. I think, however, they need not be distinguished from the insulæ; since if they are removed from this class by their greatness, they may be again reduced to it by their detached situation, which was the original and specific meaning of the word.†

Sept.

* We must remember that the slaves were numerous in great families.

† See concerning the whole question, Lips. ad Tacit. Annal. xv.

Sept. 22d.]—The second volume of Baron Bielfeld's Letters withdrew my attention from Nardini. I am interested in the Baron's character; his letters give a lively picture of the German courts. I should have preferred indeed some account of the character and history of the king of Prussia, and the suppers at Potsdam, to the description of all those galas and marriages. But fear or discretion impose rigorous laws on a German author.

23d.]—I read Nardini, l. iii. the remainder of c. vii. and c. viii, ix, x, xi, xii. p. 1005—1039. He finishes the description of the second region, and proceeds to that of the third (Isis and Moneta,) which he also concludes; and then commences the description of the fourth (Templum Pacis.) As he draws near to the centre of the city, his materials become more abundant, from the greater quantity of ancient monuments in that neighbourhood. He traces distinctly the Via Sacra; whose situation, indeed, is ascertained by a variety of sure limits. This famous street is bounded, on one side, by the Fabian arch, which led to the Roman Forum; and, on the other, it terminates at the Colosseum, by which it was separated from the street called Suburra; which some antiquaries vainly endeavoured to place elsewhere; but whose position is fixed by Nardini with much learning and accuracy. The ceremony practised in the Regia, bears, xv. Nardini Roma Vetus, l. iii. c. iv. p. 985, 986, 987: et Græv. in Præfat. ad tom. iv. Thesaur. Antiq. Roman. I have availed myself of all their quotations.

in my opinion, all the marks of the highest antiquity: a people, desirous of representing the God of War, but who were incapable or unwilling to imitate the human figure, and therefore adored him under the form of a spear; a horse sacrificed in the field, whose bloody head was carried in procession, and fixed to the wall of the Regia; every thing in these rites points to a Scythian origin, and indicates the manners of wandering barbarians. Even the military sports of the inhabitants of the Via Sacra and Suburra date their origin from a period when society was yet in its infancy. The Via Sacra leads to the Temple of Peace and the Colosseum, two of the finest monuments of Rome, which that city owes to the most avaricious of its princes. Happy the people, whose princes, by habitual economy, are capable of executing great undertakings!

Sept. 24th.]—I read Nardini, l. iii. c. xiii, xiv, xv. and l. iv. c. i.—x. p. 1039—1125. He continues and concludes the description of the fourth region, and proceeds to the fifth, (Esquilinus,) the sixth, (Alta Semita,) and the seventh (Via Lata.) He sets clearly before our eyes the infernal action of Tullia. She ascended the Vicus Cyprius, and had already reached the extremity of that street, where it divides into two branches: that on the right led to the Esquiline Mount and the palace of Servius Tullius; that on the left (Vicus Patricius) joined the Esquiline and the Viminal, forming a street where the Patricians lived under the eyes of their king. It was here that the bloody body of her father could not stop the chariot of Tullia. The horror horror excited by her deed, separated this place from the Vicus Cyprius, and gave to it the name of Vicus Sceleratus. In the eighth satire of the third book of Horace, a difficulty occurs respecting the Esquiline Mount. The gardens of Mecænas stood on a ground formerly employed as a public burying place. There is not any doubt of the fact; but it is uncertain when this change took place. Nardini thinks that it was in the reign of Servius. But it seems to me, that a glance at this satire is sufficient to show that the passage in Horace is not a cold and far-fetched allusion to an event that happened five hundred years before his own time; but that he speaks of a change operated under his own eyes, and by the direction of his patron. But Mount Esquilin, I shall be told, was ever since the time of Servius within the walls of Rome: and can it be believed that slaves should have been interred in a city, which scarcely granted that honour to emperors? I feel the whole weight of this objection; yet I would ask, whether the Esquiline, though within the walls, was therefore within the Pomœrium? This cannot be determined. Mount Aventine was within the circuit traced by Servius, and the emperor Claudius surrounded it with walls six centuries afterwards. The prohibition of interring in cities proceeded from the pontifical law; and the college of priests regulated, at pleasure, the limits of the Pomœrium. This is but an hypothesis, yet it is the only solution I can give of the difficulty. We still see on Mount Aventine a triumphal arch, which a private citizen raised in honour of the emperor Gallienus. The rudeness of the work is surpassed by the coarse flattery of the inscription. A prince, who left his father a prisoner among the Persians, and the empire a prey to its enemies, is extolled for his valour, which is only exceeded by his piety. It is allowable to transform the defects of princes into kindred excellencies; to call their ambition magnanimity; their severity justice; and their cowardice moderation. This does not offend us, because it is the custom. But when Gallienus is flattered for virtues most opposite to his character, we are almost tempted to believe that, under the flattery, a severe satire is concealed. This inscription is still more impudent than the pax ubique, which Mr. Addison read on a medal of the same Gallienus.

Sept. 25th.]—I read Nardini, l. v. c. i, ii, iii, iv. p. 1125—1149. He has now reached the centre of the city, where it was impossible to advance a step without finding some monument of the religion, greatness, or policy of Rome, but unfortunately the greater part of those monuments no longer exist, except in ancient authors. They speak of a little chapel dedicated to Concord, concerning which I shall say a few words. This chapel was the work rather of hatred than of piety; it was built by C. Flavius, that sworn enemy of the nobles, with a view to mortify their pride. How did he accomplish this purpose? 1. By performing the ceremony of dedication himself. The senate beheld with indignation an edile arrogating to himself the functions hitherto reserved for dictators and and consuls.* 2. In a manner less direct indeed, but still more offensive, which but few readers have perceived in a passage of Pliny.† In the midst of sedition, Flavius vowed to consecrate a temple to the goddess Concord, on condition that she re-established harmony among the different orders of citizens. The chapel was consecrated, and the æra of its dedication fixed by an inscription, at the distance of 104 years from that of the Concord of the Capitol,‡ which had been built by Camillus, in consequence of a similar vow. It may easily be imagined how much the patricians were mortified at seeing this plebeian Concord, the work of an edile, standing in the neighbourhood of the patrician Concord of their dictator. In this interesting passage, the date only is erroneous. The first dedication was in the year of Rome 386; the second, in the year 448. Instead of the number 104, we must therefore read 62.

I finished the twenty-first volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains the panegyric of Alphonso Turretin, by Mr. Vernet; in which the beauty of the style exceeds that of the subject. This piece owes its fame to its excellent latinity; to ideas borrowed from England, and then new on the continent: and to a degree of candour not usual with theologians of that age. Its celebrity is now in the wane. Dissertations of the Academy of Cortona: the subjects are well treated, but ill chosen. Letters of Mr. Mayans, and the Life of Dean Marti prefixed to his Letters, published by the same Mr. Mayans. The barbarism of their country, which these two Spaniards continually deplore, entitles them to an indulgence, of which they stand in much need. The Critical History of Philosophy, by Mr. Deslandes: a lively, but light performance. Hesiod, by Mr. Robinson: the preface is elaborate. First Extract from Mr. Wesseling's Discourse on the famous Inscription of Berenice, which has so much exercised the ingenuity of the learned. He considers it only in relation to the Jews.

* T. Liv. ix. 46.

† Post Capitolinam, according to the edition of Delcampius. I should like to consult that of Hardouin. Nardini erroneously reads post Capitolium. Plin. Hist. Natur. l. xxxiii. 1.

‡ Plutarch. in Camill.

Sept. 26th.]—I read Nardini, l. v. c. v, vi, vii, viii, ix, x, xi, xii. p. 1149—1216. After having exhausted the subject of the Roman Forum, he passes to the surrounding monuments, particularly the Forum of Cæsar, that of Augustus, and that of Trajan. A Forum was properly a place adorned on all sides with temples and porticos; but whose essential characteristic consisted in a Basilica, or court of justice. As the Roman judges anciently sat in the open air, authors have been led to confound the Forum with the Basilica, and to mention it sometimes as an open square, and at other times as a covered building. Trajan's pillar, which stands in the middle of his Forum, is a beautiful monument, and highly dignified by its description. To preserve by one great work the memory of a work still greater; to raise a pillar one one hundred and twenty-six feet high, in order to celebrate the levelling of a mountain of equal altitude, is worthy of that sublime architecture which speaks to the mind as much as to the eyes, and which the Romans understood better than any people on earth. In crossing the Forum of Augustus, you perceive the temple of Mars the Avenger; where, in consequence of an edict of that prince, the senate assembled for the purpose of decreeing triumphs. This edict, which seemed merely a regulation of police, was essentially connected with the great changes introduced by Augustus, and with his whole system of policy. The senate formerly assembled in the temple of Mars or Bellona, which stood without the walls; the general not being allowed to hold his military rank in the city. But when Augustus was invested with the extraordinary character of Imperator, this new generalissimo remained for life in the midst of the Forum, and held the sword always raised over the heads of the citizens.

Sept. 27th.]—I read Nardini, l. v. c. iii, xiv, xv, xvi. p. 1237—1297, which concludes the book; of which I found it very difficult to form a distinct idea. He treats of several objects, and those so complicated, that it is scarcely possible to paint them in the mind without seeing them delineated on paper. A good topographical chart of the Capitoline Mount would have been extremely useful; but if such a chart was made by Nardini,* it is here omitted by his editor. That of D'Anville exhibits accurately the general outline; but does not represent particulars. Nardini's style, or that of his translator, is also exceedingly puzzling; and his arrangement faulty in the extreme; since the thirteenth chapter supposes the reader acquainted with the fourteenth, and the eleventh and twelfth chapters cannot be understood without a previous acquaintance with the thirteenth. By repeated perusals, and attentive meditations, I at length surmounted these obstacles, which have served perhaps to engrave more deeply in my mind the image of the Capitoline Mount. It had two summits, quite distinct from each other, though often confounded by the ancients, and mistaken by the moderns. The southern summit, which overlooked the Tiber, was almost contiguous to the rude Tarpeian rocks, which are now scarcely perceptible; and was called Arx, the citadel. The northern summit properly formed the Capitol. It was the scite of the temple of Jupiter. The valley separating the two mountains was called Intermontium, and covered with a thick forest; where Romulus established the famous Asylum, which was the nursery of his colony. Afterwards the forest disappeared, to make room for magnificent edifices. The valley and both mountains were inclosed with a strong wall. Three roads led to the Capitol from the Forum. 1. The Centum Gradus, which began a little beyond the temple of Concord, and terminated at the temple of Juno Moneta in the citadel. 2. The road belonging to the Asylum, which was that that through which conquerors passed in triumph. 3. The Clivus Capitolinus, whose situation is less accurately determined than that of the two others. After carefully weighing the arguments of Marlianus and Nardini, I am obliged to say, that neither party supports his opinion with much force. I adopt, however, that of the former; if one of the roads had the name of Clivus Capitolinus, it is natural to think that it led to the Capitol, properly so called; and on this supposition each summit must have had its particular road, besides that common to both.

* He refers to it himself, V. l. v. c. x. p. 1028.

Sept. 28th.]—I read Nardini, l. vi. c. i, ii, iii, iv, v, vi, vii, viii. p. 1237—1297. Having described the eighth region, comprehending the Forum and the Capitol, he proceeds through the Porta Carmentalis, to examine the ninth, or Campus Martius, which was without the city till enclosed by Aurelian's wall. The Romans, after expelling the Tarquins, consecrated to Mars a field which had belonged to that family; and which afterwards served for the place of military exercises and the assemblies of the people. The legacy of Tarutia, consisting of a field between the Campus Martius and the Tiber, and that of Flaminius, consisting of some meadows beyond the Porta Carmentalis, speedily enlarged the bounds of the public property; which still continued a bare and smooth plain, except that the sight was interrupted by an ancient prison; by a temple of Bellona, built in the year of Rome 457; and by the Equiria and Septa, which resembled rather inclosures for sheep than than public edifices. In the changes which the Campus Martius gradually underwent, we may distinguish three principal æras. 1. Towards the year of Rome 535, and a little before the second Punic war, the same Flaminius, who afterwards perished in the battle near the lake Thrasymenus, built a circus on the ground which had formerly belonged to his ancestors. This circus was soon surrounded by the temple of Hercules Musagetes, by that of Juno, and by the portico of Octavius, &c. and a small suburb began to be built without the Porta Carmentalis, towards the middle of the seventh century of Rome. 2. Towards the end of that century, the great Pompey, at his return from his eastern conquests, spoliis orientis onustus, wished to distinguish himself by some public edifices; but there not being room within the walls, he extended the bounds of this suburb towards the Campus Martius; and built there his magnificent theatre, the first that had been seen at Rome. This theatre was surrounded by a temple of Venus, a curia, a portico, a fine garden, and a temple consecrated to the fortune of the knights. 3. Amidst his other great designs for embellishing the city, Augustus did not forget the Campus Martius. He adorned it with beautiful buildings, and encouraged the grandees of Rome to follow his example. None imitated him more eagerly than his son-in-law Agrippa, of whose magnificence the Septa, baths, gardens, lake or bason, and above all the pantheon, were conspicuous proofs. In the time of Strabo, the suburb of the Campus Martius was but but little inferior to the city itself. Its populousness, however, was never proportional to its extent; the public gardens occupied much ground; and there was still left an empty space for the military exercises of the Roman youth. As early as the time of Cicero,* there was mention of taking the Campus Martius within the walls, that it might be filled with buildings, while a field belonging to the Vatican should be set apart for the purposes in which the Field of Mars had formerly been employed. But this project was never carried into execution. How many reflections does this slight sketch naturally excite! That people of kings, who so well deserve this appellation, enjoyed collectively all the rights of sovereignty, and all the pleasures of grandeur; a citizen never stirred from his house but he walked under a beautiful portico; or took his seat with 80,000 of his countrymen in a magnificent theatre, which exhibited the greatest curiosities on earth; or reposed himself in those thermæ, or baths, in which were united all the pleasures of the mind and senses, with the pomp befitting the greatest monarchs. Ambitious generals lavished their wealth on the people, first to obtain preferment, and afterwards to make them forget that it had been bestowed. But it will always be matter of surprise, how the grandees of Rome, a Pompey or an Agrippa, could so easily accomplish such vast undertakings. What sources could supply their extraordinary expenses? War

* Cic. ad Attic. xiii. 33.

and

and the Provinces. Unprincipled generals robbed the subjects of the state; those who had any remains of virtue, were satisfied with plundering the public enemy. What vast wealth was necessary for supporting the magnificence of Pompey! Yet the moderation and disinterestedness, by which he was honourably distinguished from other generals, was praised publicly in the presence of the Roman people.* His triumph displayed in the streets of Rome the wealth of the subjugated east; although, during the ages when the army really belonged to the republic, that wealth would have increased the treasury of the state; but the generals had been long accustomed to appropriate the spoils of war,† and to expect gratitude from the people, for the ostentatious employment of the people's riches. The citizens must have felt indignation against the pride of Lucullus, when they beheld that selfish voluptuary making houses and gardens which bade defiance to the elements, and brought together the seasons, without raising a single monument for the honour of the gods, or the accommodation of his fellow-citizens. Among the works of Agrippa, there is one which shews how much that virtuous citizen still loved the republic, and how honestly he served a master, of whose artful policy his own simplicity was the dupe. This work is the Septa. A man who adorned the place of assembly for the † Bergier Hist. des Grands Chemins de l'Empire, l. i. c. xxi. p. 77—80.

* Cicero pro Lege Manilia, c. xxii, xxiii.

Roman

Roman people, must have been ignorant that Augustus was gradually undermining their authority, and bringing their assemblies into such contempt, that his successor could without fear totally abolish them.

I finished the twenty-second volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. I find the second extract of Wesseling's Treatise on the famous passage of Victor Tunnunensis, of which Infidels have so much availed themselves. He beats all their works in pieces, and far more effectually than Bentley. Foster's Sermons: always moderate and judicious. A work on Foreign Service, by Mr. Bochat. Were reason convinced, yet the heart would always rebel against this barbarous custom of the Swiss: but reason is far from being convinced of the utility of this practice. Marti's Letters, second extract. Mr. Marti is merely a scholar of the fifteenth century, and still at the dawn of science: much ill-chosen erudition, a profound veneration for the ancients, and that servile imitation of their manners, which is its surest mark. Many designs left imperfect for want of assistance; and many observations, good and bad, but already made in all the countries of Europe. The Learning of the Apostles: a very curious performance, by Mr. Lami of Florence. The History of Ancient Treaties, by Barbeyrac: accurate and useful. The Natural History of Languedoc, by Mr. Astruc: curious and well written. The first extract contains the article Geography, which is his first class; where he enters into a very interesting account of the Narbonnese Narbonnese province of Septimania, of which he gives a very forced etymology; and especially of the ancient authors who speak of Languedoc.

Sept. 29th.]—I read Nardini, l. vi. c. ix, x, xi, xii, xiii, xiv, xv. p. 1297—1347. He describes the remainder of the ninth region, the most extensive, and also one of the most ornamented of the whole city. From thence he proceeds to the tenth, Mons Palatinus; small in itself, but famous both as the cradle of the nation and the seat of its empire. Augustus fixed his residence there, in the house of the orator Hortensius, affecting the modesty of a citizen, rather than the magnificence of a prince. Tiberius enlarged this residence on the side next to the Forum; and Caius extended it to the temple of Castor. Nero seemed to wish comprehending in it the whole city. He covered the mount Palatine with buildings that reached to the circus; and, on the other side, filled with edifices the plain bounded by the Palatine, the Esquiline, and mount Cælius, even to the neighbourhood of Mecænas's gardens. The ascent to his palace, the Domus Aurea, led through the Via Sacra, in the middle of which street stood the Vestibulum, or great court, which was afterwards the scite of the Temple of Peace. Farther on stood the great hall, or Atrium, which led to his gardens, immense porticos, and the lake or pool which afterwards became the scite of Titus's amphitheatre. Vespasian destroyed the greatest part of those buildings, and confined his palace to the Palatine Mount, the greater part of which he continued to occupy. Domitian added many many embellishments, which were increased by almost all his successors, until the Palatine palace, being forsaken by the emperors, perished of decay, in the reign of Theodoric. The Farnese palace now stands on its ruins. The imperial residence astonished every beholder by its vast extent, the magnificence of its furniture, the richness of its ornaments, and the multitude of its temples; from which last it derived an august and sacred appearance. I think it doubtful, whether the elegance of the architecture corresponded to all this grandeur. Since it was the work of fifty successive princes, it must have been built without any fixed plan, and therefore deficient in the principal merit of proportion and harmony. Unfortunately too, it must have lost in point of taste, in proportion as it gained in magnificence. Simplicity was the aim of Augustus, in an age when art flourished; and ornaments were added by the feeble and languishing taste of his successors. This palace therefore has never been numbered among the beautiful edifices of Rome.

Sept. 30th.]—I read Nardini, l. vii. c. i, ii, iii, iv, v, vi, vii, viii, ix. p. 1347—1402. He describes the eleventh region, or Circus Maximus; the twelfth, or Piscina Publica; and the thirteenth, or Mons Aventinus. He enters into many particulars concerning the circus, the largest perhaps of all the edifices destined for the exhibition of shows. Tarquinius Priscus, by whom it was built, seems not to have adapted it to the smallness of the state in his own time, but to the greatness which fortune had had in store for Rome. Every particular tends to convince us, that the circus was fitted for containing a vast number of people. Dionysius of Halicarnassus says, 150,000; Pliny, 260,000; Victor, 380,000; the modern Victor, 385,000; and the Notitia Imperii, 405,000. In this great diversity of authorities, how ought we to form our judgment? By consulting facts, places, and experience. We know the situation and the bounds of the circus. They always remained the same; and the alterations which took place, regarded only the interior arrangement of the edifice, since those who have examined its ruins are scarcely able to trace the three stadia and a half in length, which were assigned to it by the first founder.* Dionysius of Halicarnassus gives it four jugera, or 960 Roman feet in breadth; Pliny makes it three stadia long, and one stadium, or 625 Roman feet, broad. This apparent contradiction Nardini considers as a source of much information.† According to his explanation, Dionysius spoke of the exterior circumference, and Pliny of the interior. The intermediate buildings exhausted the difference; and as these were filled with spectators their extent is an object of importance. To find their breadth, we have only to subtract 625 feet from 960; the remainder is 335 feet; the half of which, 168 feet, multiplied by three stadia, 1875 feet, will give the space allotted for the spectators on both sides.

* Traité des Mesures Itinéraires, par M. d'Anville, p. 59.

† As to the breadth of the circus, Pliny himself expressly confirms this explanation.

The

The covered buildings, which formed the exterior circumference, were made of wood, two stories high, and surrounded by a portico. The seats were of stone, and arranged like those of the amphitheatre, descending on all sides from the covered building to the Euripus and the Arena. The exterior portico must have been double: it therefore occupied thirty feet. Of the 138 which remain, I would allow 48 for the covered seats, and 90 for those of stone. Every thing considered, this proportion appears to me the most probable; although the 138 feet may be otherwise distributed without injuring our calculations. When we reflect on the smallness of the Roman foot,* and the great attention bestowed in procuring every sort of convenience for the spectators, less than two feet and a half can scarcely be allowed for each person, and three feet in depth for the benches, as well as for the intervals between them. The first bench then, extending three stadia, contained 750 persons, since the stone seats rose to the height of 90 feet. The spectators ascended by thirty steps, which served

* The Roman, English, and Paris foot, are in the proportion of 1306, 1351$\frac{1}{2}$, and 1440. The first contains nearly 11$\frac{3}{5}$ inches of English, and 10$\frac{7}{8}$ of French measure. Traité des Mesures, &c. p. 164. After attentively reflecting on the subject, I prefer allowing to each person 2$\frac{1}{4}$ feet. This will give 120,000 persons who were seated, and 30,000 who stood in the porticos. There is still something to be said concerning Mr. D'Anville's measurement of the circus; but this will be better deferred, until I have visited Rome.

Florence, 11th July, 1764.

also for seats. They contained 22,500 persons. Each story of the covered buildings, being of the same length, divided the 48 feet which it occupied into sixteen benches; the two stories, comprehending thirty-two benches, therefore, contained 24,000 persons; the whole spectators seated on either side amounted to 46,500; and the total, on both sides together, to 93,000. There still remains one of the ends of the circus, for the other was occupied by the Carceres. It was as long as the circus was broad; that is, a stadium, or 625 feet; so that if we allow to it the same depth as to the sides, and calculate on the same principles, it must have contained 15,500, or a third part of those contained by each of the sides. This number, added to 93,000, gives 108,500 for the whole spectators seated in the circus. It may well be imagined, that at the great games, the passionate love for those amusements would crowd the porticos with spectators, who sacrificed their ease to their curiosity. But I think they could not well exceed 40 or 50,000. More are not required for completing the number of 150,000, assigned by Dionysius of Halicarnassus. To explain the prodigious multitude mentioned by the two Victors,* and the Notitia Imperii, I require but one supposition, which is, that those writers of the Lower Empire had but little judgment, and still less taste. Those who are best

* The most judicious edition of the modern Victor is that published by Pavinius. The numerous additions are justly despised as the work of an impostor. Nardini Roma Vetus, l. ii. c. v. p. 965.

acquainted acquainted with them will not dispute the point. Compilers of their class might mistake for historic truth a poetical licence, or the exaggeration of a flattering inscription. When Juvenal, giving way to the warmth of his indignation, cries out

Totam hodie Romam circus capit;*

when an inscription in honour of Trajan says, that this prince rendered the circus capable of containing the whole people of Rome,† these abridgers might explain such passages literally, and thus express the number of spectators in the circus by that of Roman citizens. If we consider the passage of the ancient Victor, the least erroneous of the three, and add to the number mentioned in it, that of the Roman slaves, according to the proportion which the Athenian slaves bore to the citizens, we shall find that the whole inhabitants of Rome amounted to 1,140,000. My conjecture is strengthened by observing, that this number nearly agrees to that ascertained by a more exact calculation.‡ But if this explanation be rejected, we must pronounce that those writers have most grossly deceived themselves. I am unwilling to say as much of Pliny; yet there is no alternative; the naturalist declares that he speaks of the circus as embellished and enlarged by Julius Cæsar. Dionysius of Halicarnassus was contemporary with the Dictator, and published his work under his successor. We might cut the Gordian knot by reading 160,000 instead

* Juvenal, Satir. xi. 195.

† Dio. Cass. apud Nardini, l. vii. c. ii. p. 1355.

‡ Journal, 20th September, p. 316—320.

of 260,000. But what becomes of the manuscripts!

Oct. 1.]—I read Nardini, l. vii. c. x, xi, xii, xiii. and l. viii. c. i, ii, iii. p. 1402—1446. The author at length crosses the Tiber, and examines the fourteenth and last region, called Transtiberina. and the Mount Vatican, which never was enclosed within the walls of ancient Rome. The eighth book begins by a general recapitulation of the edifices of the city; from thence he proceeds to some general topics; such as the Tiber and its bridges. I shall venture to make some reflections on the depth of that river. On this subject we can derive nothing from experience; for though we may easily measure the present depth of the Tiber, this will not ascertain what it was anciently. The ruined edifices which have raised the vallies almost to the height of the mountains, must have produced a similar change in the bed of the river. It becomes necessary, therefore, to have recourse to the ancients; and our difficulty is much increased by an apparent contradiction between two authorities of the first rank. Pliny every where mentions the Tiber as navigable for the largest ships.* The prodigious vessel which carried the obelisk of the Vatican from Alexandria to Rome, sailed up the Tiber as easily as it had sailed down the Nile.† Strabo,‡ on the contrary, assures us, that the vast heaps of mud which were washed down by the current, and deposited at the mouth

* Plin. Hist. Natur. l. ii. 5. † Idem, l. xvi. 40. l. xxxvi. 9.
‡ Strabon. Geograph. l. v. p. 60.

mouth of the river, rendered it necessary for large ships to unload a part of their cargo, before they could arrive at the city. If this contradiction is as strong as it at first sight appears, it will be difficult to conceive how such accurate writers could be deceived in a matter so generally known; and scarcely possible to determine which of the two is chargeable with the fault. The difference between them may perhaps be diminished, if not totally removed, by the following reflections: 1. In the narration of Pliny I perceive much prepossession; a desire to exaggerate the advantages of the Tiber, and to magnify it by a comparison with the greatest rivers. Nothing short of such a design could have made him compare it with the Nile, to which it is so much inferior. Both rivers had carried the vessel containing the obelisk. The Tiber, therefore, is equal to the Nile. A giant lifts a weight of ten pounds, so does a dwarf; the dwarf therefore is as strong as the giant. Such is Pliny's reasoning. The transportation of the obelisk must be allowed; but no conclusion can be drawn from it concerning the equality of depth in the two rivers. 2. Experience teaches us, that rivers which carry down much slime and sand, are not thereby rendered more shallow, except near to their mouths, where the strength of their streams is commonly much abated. There great accumulations are formed; but as currents much prevail at the mouths of rivers, the accumulations naturally follow their direction, and throw themselves on the neighbouring coast. In this manner the Rhine discharges its obstructions on the coast of Languedoc, whose harbours are thereby blocked up. The Tiber, likewise, discharged its mud on the coast of Latium, by which the harbour of Ostia became inaccessible. Some sand-banks, doubtless, remained in particular places of the river in consequence of local circumstances: but these obstacles might be surmounted or shunned; and, from Strabo's narrative well considered, we can only infer that a vessel drawing much water, could not sail up the Tiber without exertions of skill and courage. 3. The latter is not inspired by commerce. We can easily, therefore, believe with Strabo, that foreign merchants were glad to unload part of their cargoes, and to put them on board of lighters, which were ready for their service; and whose masters, from motives of interest, would not fail to exaggerate the dangers of the voyage. I can believe also with Pliny, that a Caligula, who sported equally with his treasures and the lives of his subjects, and who valued himself on setting reason and the elements at defiance, could do every thing not impossible. Every exertion would second his enterprise. The bed of the river would be previously cleared; sluices would be skilfully distributed; and the strength of men and horses would impel to Rome the vessel carrying the obelisk of the Vatican. I doubt not that the success of this trial would convince mariners that part of the obstacles were imaginary; and that, by improving their art, even those which were real might be much diminished. Whatever was the case with ships, it is certain that gallies, which indeed draw much less water, easily sailed up the Tiber to Rome. Cato performed this voyage in a galley with seven tire of oars, and landed at the Navalia, near the foot of the Mount Aventine. Rome therefore was a maritime city, and open to the insults of a hostile fleet, notwithstanding the opinion of Camillus, or rather of Titus Livius,* to the contrary. Why did not the Carthaginians, who were often masters of the sea, attempt such an enterprise? Had they embarked on the river towards evening, they might before daybreak have landed at the foot of the Capitol.† They had not courage for the undertaking, and their ships were not so well fitted for war as for commerce.

was

Oct. 2.]—I read Nardini, l. viii. c. iv, v. p. 1446—1460; which concludes the whole work; the excellence of which, its accuracy, judgment, and learning, must leave but small gleanings for subsequent writers. Perhaps he is chargeable with being too diffuse, and sometimes with want of perspicuity. I am inclined also to accuse him of raising up difficulties, and of employing whole pages on what might be ascertained by one just and clear observation. I am satisfied with my diligence with respect to this work, which I have read in sixteen days, with much attention and reflection.

I finished the twenty-third volume of the Bib-

* T. Liv. V. 54.

† The navigation was only sixteen Roman miles.

liothèque Raisonnée; which contains the second extract of Mr. Astruc's Natural History of Languedoc. In the article respecting manners, we find striking vestiges of Paganism still remaining in that province; I speak not of those general characters of superstition which are common to all men, because they are men; but of some practices so singular and arbitrary, that it is impossible to mistake the origin. How difficult is it to abolish the religion and language of a nation! The Satires of Sectanus, with Cosellius's Answer: a literary war, which dishonoured almost all the learned in Italy, without procuring much fame for their talents. Those of the Jesuit Sectanus were the most distinguished; but the names of his adversaries incline me to think that his cause was not good. A Library of Manuscripts, by Father Montfaucon: this work is learned and useful, but is not complete except as to France. It is almost necessary for every man of letters. Orosius, by Mr. Havercamp: a good edition, which was much wanted, of a very bad author, whose sole value arises from the loss of his fellow-labourers, who were far superior to himself.

Oct. 3.]—I looked into the fourth volume of Grævius Thesaurus, which contains several other treatises, besides Nardini's, on the antiquities of Rome. I began by reading the whole of the short but famous Dissertation of Isaac Vossius on the magnitude of that city. His paradoxes are well known. He assigns upwards of thirty miles for the circuit of Rome, independently of the suburbs; suburbs; and upwards of seventy miles when the suburbs are included. He fills that vast extent with more than fourteen millions of inhabitants;* and being as niggardly towards the moderns, as prodigal with respect to the ancients, he assures us that this number of subjects is not to be found in the three most flourishing kingdoms of Europe. These strange novelties could not fail to provoke the indignation of many adversaries, by whom they were ably and learnedly refuted. There are but two authorities for Vossius, and these merely fitted to dazzle and bewilder; a passage of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, which he misconstrues, and a passage of Pliny, which he has corrupted. For the first, I would refer to Nardini, who proves clearly that when Dionysius compares the size of Rome with that of Athens, he does not include the harbour of the Piræus.† For the passage of Pliny, I would refer to the learned Freret, who explains it very naturally in connexion with the context.‡ I do not say that his hypothesis is without its difficulties; but of the two parts of a passage, when one is clear and another obscure, I say that the latter must be explained by the former, and not the reverse. I shall consider but one argument adduced by Vossius. It is ingenious, and ever since I first read it in the Nouvelles de la Répub-

* Vossius, p. 1514—1515. His calculations are, as usual, somewhat confused; but I give the result as stated by himself.

† Nardini Roma Vetus, l. i. c. vi. p. 912—916.

‡ Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, par Bayle; mois de Janvier, 1685.

lique

lique des Lettres, it has left on my mind a strong impression. The wood of Egeria, he says, was at the gates of Rome in the first ages of the republic; but in the age of Roman greatness, this wood was in the neighbourhood of Aricia, and fifteen miles from the Forum. It may be supposed, he adds, that in proportion as the city was enlarged, this wood was gradually cut down, so that it might still continue to keep its former situation with regard to the suburbs, and stand a little beyond the Porta Capena. The same thing happened as to the Clivus Virbius and the lake of Juturna, which are in the neighbourhood of Aricia now but were in the center of the city formerly.* This idea is doubtless ingenious; but many reasons convince me that it is false. It is founded entirely on hypothesis. All writers mention the Porta Capena, the wood of Egeria, and that of Aricia; but none suppose any connexion between them, or that the latter was merely a continuation of the former. Servius, indeed, and he alone, says that the nymph Egeria of the wood Aricia, was the same goddess with whom Numa was familiar.† But the identity of the goddess does not prove that of the sacred wood. I know that rural divinities were not the gods of whole nations, and that their worship was often confined to the district which had experienced their kindness; but I know also, that in the mythological, as well as in the natural world,

* Vossius de Rom. Magnitud. c. iv. p. 906, 907.

† Nympha in Aricino nemore, quam amicam suam Numa esse fingebat. Serv. ad Æneid. l. vii. v. 762.

there there is a perpetual chain of beings rising above each other by almost imperceptible degrees, from the lowly Dryad to Jupiter armed with the thunder. The Dryad, destitute of power, knowledge, and almost of sensation, existed in her native tree, from which she was scarcely distinguishable. But Egeria was of a higher order, and not inferior to Faunus, who frequently came from Arcadia to the territory of the Sabines;* so that though the ancient wood near to Aricia was her proper habitation, this needed not to hinder Numa from consecrating to her another, at the gates of Rome; or from persuading the people that she frequently honoured him there with her presence. It is a natural supposition that the whole country between Rome and Aricia was a continued forest, at each extremity of which there was a chapel consecrated to the Nymph; and that when the country was cleared, the trees were allowed to stand at both extremities from respect to Egeria. 2. The wood of Aricia is so far from being of a later date than the Porta Capena, that if we can have any dependence on the chronology of the fabulous ages, that wood was more ancient than the city of Rome. Hippolitus came into Italy 400 years before the birth of Romulus; and the former prince is connected with all the traditions which prevailed in the country about Aricia. The name Virbius indicated his new life; the nymph Egeria received him in her grotto, and tenderly compassionated his misfortunes.

* Horat. Carm. l. i. Ode xvii.

tunes.* These traditions, I well know, are fables; but such fables are not the work of a day. They were piously believed by the whole district, in which they had taken deep root; the sacred wood, which was their scene, must have been more ancient than themselves; and though fictions, they destroy the still more improbable fiction of the consecration of the wood of Aricia in the age of Roman greatness, and the enlargement of the city, that is, in the time of Augustus, or, at least, of the latest consuls. 3. The supposition that sacred places changed their site, and retreated as it were before the greatness of Rome, is contrary to the spirit of all local superstitions. The Pagans revered a place honoured by the presence and miracles of a god, where he had displayed his power, and conferred his benefits; but they did not associate with their reverence for this place, a veneration for all the adjacent country, which had not any connexion with the divinity. Their worship was attached, as it were, to the soil, and the one could not be changed without abolishing the other. The temple of Jupiter Elicius, the Lupercal, the house of Romulus, always remained in their original sites. The arguments drawn from the gates is not conclusive. New walls necessarily require new gates, which naturally retain the names of those which they replace, and which are demolished as useless. 4. On what principle was it necessary to preserve

* Virgil. Æneid. vii. 761—781; et Serv. ad locum. Ovid. Metamorph. l. xv.

the

the relative situation of the wood of Egeria with regard to the Porta Capena? In the time of Numa this gate was not in existence; since it belonged to the walls built around the city by Servius Tullius.* 5. Of the three examples given by Vossius, the wood of Egeria was without the Porta Capena, the lake of Juturna was in the Forum, and the Clivus Virbius was at the foot of Mount Esquiline. Had these monuments changed their sites, care would have been taken to preserve their relative situation with regard to each other. But a line drawn from the center of the Forum, and passing through each of those places, while it removed them from the city, must also have removed them from each other, instead of collecting them all into one spot in the neighbourhood of Aricia. 6. According to Vossius, the walls of Rome advanced to the 10th mile-stone on the Appian way. Yet Aricia was anciently, as it is at present, sixteen miles distant from the capital. All authors agree in this point; and the greater distance assigned by Strabo has been shewn to proceed from his measuring by a stadium shorter than the Olympic.† I foresee that it will be answered that since the miles were counted not from the gates of Rome, but from the golden pillar, Aricia might be sixteen miles from this pillar and the Forum, and no more than six miles from the

* Nardini Roma Vetus, l. i. c. iv. p. 902, 903, 904.

† Cluver. Ital. Antiq. tom. ii. p. 920; et sequent. Strabon. Geograph. lib. v. p. 165. Mesures Itinéraires de M. d'Anville, p. 15.

Porta

Porta Capena. The answer indeed would be good, had the distance been reckoned by a maker of itineraries; but it is not supposable that a geographer like Strabo, or a poet like Lucan, would have said that Aricia was sixteen miles from Rome, had the suburbs filled up the intermediate space, without making that remark. The distances then were always reckoned from the mile-stone erected by Augustus. I would ask whether the Aqua Claudia rose in the city, although its source is said to have been at the sixth and the eighth mile-stone on the road to Prenesté? The system of Vossius requires the affirmative. Yet we find the source of this water at an estate (Prædium) belonging to Lucullus.* The walls of Rome therefore never extended to that distance. This observation, which bears against the whole of Vossius's system, appears to me decisive.

What a singular character was this Vossius! He had much reading, vivacity, and invention; but his understanding had a wrong bias; he was prone to exaggeration in his opinions, and incapable of resisting the temptation of a brilliant chimera. He was besides a very bad man. Some parts of his conduct betrayed a total want of probity.

Oct. 4th.]—I read a Dissertation by Octavio Falconieri, on the Pyramid of C. Cestius, p. 1461—1482. This monument, which stood at the Porta Ostiensis, and which is now fixed in the city wall,

* Sext. Frontin. de Aquæduct. Rom. l. i. p. 1635. iv. vol. Grævii Thesaurus.

is

is entirely covered with a beautiful white marble. It is 165½ Roman palms high, and the sides of its base are each 130 palms long. There is a room in the middle of the pyramid twenty-six palms long, eighteen broad, and nineteen high. This is properly the sepulchre. The walls were covered with a multitude of figures, some of which still remain in a very good taste. It appears from the inscription of the monument and the explanations given of it by Falconieri, that Cestius was a man of distinction in the time of Augustus, and that the paintings relate to his employment of Epulo, or manager of the sacred festivals. None of the ancients make mention of this beautiful pyramid; a reflexion which creates regret for the loss of those monuments, whose beauty they highly celebrate. Falconieri's Dissertation is well written.

I read also a performance of Father Ciaconius on the Columna Rostrata of Duillius. Taking the whole inscription for original, I began to draw from it many important consequences. Happily I discovered that the original had suffered so much from the injuries of time, that it was rendered unintelligible, and that the critic had successfully restored it by his conjectures. I this day read p. 1809—1817.

Oct. 5th.]—Athough the Columna Rostrata disappointed me, I read to the end of the treatise. It contains some very ingenious restorations of the original, and excellent observations on the Latin orthography, which, as happens in all languages, gradually lost sight of etymology, and came to be regulated regulated by pronunciation. Unhappily the inscription on the pillar of Duillius has not the merit of originality. We see clearly by the example of Maximus, written with an i, that the old spelling had been altered for the new, which prevailed from the time of Julius Cæsar.

I finished Ciaconius's Dissertation, p. 1817—1831. I read also a small Treatise by Joseph Castalio, on the temples of Peace and Janus, p. 1849—1856. It is a poor performance.

Oct. 6th.]—I read a Dissertation of Peter Bargæus, De Eversoribus Ædificiorum Urbis Romæ, p. 1869—1892. By a common prejudice we consider the northern barbarians as equally hostile to the arts and to the Romans; ascribing the ruins of the finest monuments of the city to an Alaric, a Genseric, or a Totila. Bargæus regards this opinion as totally unfounded. Alaric scarcely exercised the rights of war. Genseric was satisfied with pillaging Rome. Totila destroyed part of the walls in his fury, and repaired them when he recovered his reason. The most of the public edifices were standing in the reign of Theodoric, who was more careful to preserve them than had been the last emperors of the east. The zeal of the Popes, and particularly of Gregory the Great, beheld nothing in a temple but the idol to whom it was consecrated: he established religion on the ruin of the fine arts. This account of the matter is explained by Bargæus with much learning and argument, and is far better than his attempt to justify this conduct in the Popes, which was surely more becoming the Alcoran Alcoran than the Gospel. Our notions are as false as unfavourable concerning the nations which over-ran the Roman empire in the fifth century. We look on them as savages just issued from the woods to break the boundaries which divided them from the civilised world. This opinion indeed may be applicable to the people of Scandinavia, to the Scythians, and the Arabs. The Arabs were actuated by enthusiasm; the Danes by vengeance; the Scythians by ferocity, common among wandering nations of shepherds. But the inhabitants of Germany, the Goths,* Vandals, and Franks, had devested themselves of much of their barbarism before they invaded the dominions of the Roman empire. For more than a century preceding that event, numerous bodies of their countrymen had served in the Roman armies. They learned the Latin language; they adopted civilised manners; and if they were not Christians, they at least revered Christianity. The contempt which they sometimes testified for the vanquished, was not mixed with hatred. The soldier was sometimes cruel, but the general was seldom barbarous, and the legislator never. I cast but a rapid glance on objects, which would deserve to be surveyed attentively.

I read also a Dissertation of the same author on the Obelisks in Rome, p. 1905—1934. It is learned; but if superfluities were lopped off, might be reduced to six pages.

* He decides not the famous question concerning the origin of the Goths.

Oct. 7th.]—I began the work of Olaus Borrichius, De Antiqua Facie Urbis Romæ, and read p. 1521—1546.

8th.]—I read Borrichius, p. 1546—1576. I finished the twenty-fourth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains the History of the Heavens, by the Abbé Pluche. This author, who is a bad philosopher and a superficial scholar, builds ingenious systems, which dazzle but for a moment. He draws Egyptian etymologies from the Hebrew, because he supposes that the Hebrew had much affinity with the Phenician; and that the Phenician was not very remote from the Egyptian! The signs of the seasons and of agriculture are changed into gods. But I would ask whether it was possible that mankind should so much mistake those signs which returned annually, bringing with them their own explication. Such an extraordinary metamorphosis must have required at least many more ages than the Abbé Pluche would be willing to allow.—The History of Charles XII. by Mr. Aderfeld. The Alexander of the North had already his Quintus Curtius. He still wanted an Arrian. Mr. Aderfeld supplies the defect rather by his accuracy than his eloquence.—Lebanius's Letters, by Mr. Welf: a valuable present. We had only 250 of these letters. This learned man gives us 1600, recovered from the dust of all the libraries of Europe.—Ammonius de Differentia Verborum, &c. by Mr. Valkenaer: a small collection of some Greek grammarians, not without merit.—

rit.—The History of King David: a learned, singular, and laughable performance.

Oct. 9th.]—I read Olaus Borrichius, De Antiqua Facie Urbis Romæ, p. 1576—1600.

10th.]—I finished Olaus Borrichius, p. 1600—1623; and am much pleased with this little work. It is curious and learned. Borrichius examines the quarters of the city with order and perspicuity; and, regardless of minute objects, fixes on the principal monuments, which he explains in a very entertaining manner, and in an easy flow of style. His work must be useful to those who wish to form only a general, but just notion of ancient Rome; who are afraid of the large volumes of Donatus and Nardini, or who wish to digest methodically in their minds the knowledge which they have acquired from them. In one word, Borrichius is an excellent abridgment of Nardini, whom he closely follows. I could have wished this learned Dane had been satisfied with this merit, without aspiring to that of an original author; yet it must be allowed that he makes some curious observations, and corrects Nardini judiciously; of which the two following are examples. 1. He proves in a very satisfactory manner, that the emperors were never honoured with the title of Divus in their life-time, and consequently that all the monuments in which this title is found, must have been raised to them after their deaths. 2. He shows, in opposition to Nardini, that all the games of the goddess Flora were celebrated in her Circus; and that by mistaking a passage of Ovid, that antiquary has made two festivals of Flora out of one, which was held the last day of April, or the first of May. Borrichius was a Dane, and professor at Copenhagen. It appears from different passages of his book, that he travelled in Italy, France, and England towards the year 1665; and published this little treatise about twenty years after his return home. Without his telling us that he was a Dane, we should easily perceive it, from his manner of speaking concerning the triumph of Marius on Mount Esquiline. At beholding this monument of the defeat of the Cimbri, his patriotism is inflamed, a noble indignation seizes his soul. He ascribes the victory of the Romans to the sun, the winds, and fortune; to every cause rather than the valour of Marius.

Oct. 12th.]—An appearance of philosophy, with real ignorance; thoughts trivial or false; affectation of style; exaggeration or vulgarity of description; such is the new work intituled Amusements of Reason, which was lent to me by Mr. C; and in which I find neither reason nor amusement. The author's preface to his translation of the "Wise Man's Recreations," is impertinent in the extreme. Of what use is it to know an author's name? What has that name to do with his work? A great deal with his design, his allusions, &c. but nothing with the sentence that we ought to pass on his philosophical opinions.

13th.]—I this day began a very considerable task; which was to read Cluverius' Italia Antiqua, in two volumes in folio: Leyden, 1624, Elzevirs.

The

The author did not live to see its publication; but had completely finished it before his death. His editor tells us that he had in contemplation to write an universal geography on the same plan; and that after describing Germany, Italy, and Sicily, he meant to treat of Gaul, Greece, and all the other countries known to the ancients. Strabo comprehended the same subject in seventeen books; of which the countries described by Cluverius, in four volumes in folio, occupy nearly three. The whole design of that learned man would have extended to twenty-three volumes in folio. Had he lived a few years longer, he would perhaps have executed this vast undertaking. We should then have had an immense repertory on the subject of ancient geography, treated indeed with a degree of circumstantial minuteness, which no other countries perhaps deserve but Greece and Italy. A man of letters is desirous to know every corner of those celebrated countries, the smallest villages of which are distinguished in history or poetry. I begin to read Cluverius with the same views that I read Nardini, both to prepare me for my journey into Italy, and to assist me in my future studies. These two authors, studied with care and reflexion, will serve me as a perpetual commentary; so that I shall not be a stranger in any part of Rome or Italy, to which my inquiries may lead me. I this day read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. i, ii, iii, iv, v, vi, p. 1—46. These six chapters are preparatory to his particular description. He examines in them the different names of Italy, its limits, extent, figure, Mount Apennine, which divides the country; its soil, climate, inhabitants, and languages. He every where cites his authorities in their own words, and speaks only occasionally himself, to reconcile, explain, or correct them. Mr. D'Anville accuses him too hastily of confounding the Roman mile with that of the modern Italians.* Cluverius does not confound them; he knew that of modern Italy to be the longest of the two, and has explained himself very clearly on that subject.† This knowledge indeed was not of much use to him, since he was ignorant of the exact proportion which the one mile bore to the other.

Oct. 14.]—I read Cluverius, l. i. c. vii, viii, ix, x, xi. p. 46—90. He travels along the coast of Liguria from the Varus, which separated that district from Gaul, to the Macra, by which it was bounded on the side of Tuscany. This coast is rocky and barren; and, by denying all other advantages to its inhabitants, tended to increase their strength and courage. It is extraordinary that this enterprising people should never have thought of crossing the Apennines, in order to settle in the beautiful plain which lies between those mountains and the Po: and that they should have finally been indebted for this acquisition to a political arrangement of the Romans. I was amused by the article Pollentia. There Stilico fought the army of the Goths. The Christian writers represent

* D'Anville, Mesures Itinéraires, p. 7, 8.

† Cluvier. Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. iii. p. 25.

sent this transaction as a scandalous piece of unsuccessful treachery, from which nothing but shame accrued to the Romans. Claudian, on the contrary, a Pagan poet, considers Stilico's battle as equal to Marius's victory over the Cimbri, and extols the conqueror as a hero who avenged the cause of his country, and delivered all Italy from the tyranny of barbarians.

Oct. 16th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. xii, xiii, xiv. p. 90—102. He sets before us the policy of Augustus, who in all his transactions preferred slow and gentle measures. Julius Cæsar had subdued the Gauls, but his conquest was precarious while the Alps were peopled by fierce nations, who commanded all the passes. Augustus was under the necessity of reducing some of them by arms; but he persuaded Cottius, who reigned over the mountains which bore his name, to civilize his subjects, to receive a Roman garrison, and to open the roads through his country. It would be curious to know the circumstances of the negociation. I imagine that Augustus so much flattered Cottius with empty honours, as to make him forget that he was surrendering his independence and power. This at least would have been in the usual style of his policy.

17th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. xv, xvi, xvii, p. 102—133. The article of the Rhæti and the Euganei is somewhat puzzling. Verona was a Rhætian colony. The thing is possible; but for a long time its inhabitants, assuming the character of Gauls, considered Brixia as their mother country. Verona would have been placed more naturally among the Cenomani; and the Rhæti ought to have been confined to their native mountains, as they were in fact. In treating of these mountains as connected with Italy, I would also have taken notice that my observations related to only one portion of the Rhætians. This remark would have contributed to the perspicuity of the whole of the description.

Oct. 18th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. xviii. p. 133—169. The author conducts us through the province called Venetia. He dwells on Padua, and its famous fountain Apona. In speaking of the Portus Venetus, near to Altinum, where Venice now stands, he treats at considerable length of the æra of its foundation, from which he cuts off a century with much probability; since in the time of Theodoric and Cassiodorus, the Venetian isles contained nothing but huts of fishermen. The people on the neighbouring coast of Italy sought refuge there, rather against the fury of the Lombards, than against that of the Huns. The community which these emigrants established, must have long continued weak and dependant, an object of pity or contempt to neighbouring princes, especially to conquerors. Without pretending to have deeply examined the subject, I am convinced that the liberty of Venice ought to be dated from the downfal of the empire of the Franks. This empire, we may observe, contributed far more than the Crusades to make the Orientals extend the name of Franks or Frenchmen men to all the nations of the West. It is not surprising that the Mahommedans should be so ignorant of the distinctions among the nations of Europe, when a Greek emperor* gives the name of France to the province of Venetia, which Charlemagne conquered with the rest of Lombardy. In using this name, the emperor's mistake is still more glaring; since he is guilty of an anachronism of three centuries. Cluverius indeed gives a different interpretation to Constantine's words; but the above meaning appears to me to be the most natural.

Oct. 19th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. xix, xx. p. 169—204. He treats of the Carni. Augustus assigned this people to Venetia, and contracted the boundary of Italy within the river Arsia. He speaks at length of Aquileia, the first city in the province, and the ninth in the whole empire. Its fortifications, built after the fashion of the ancients, and its natural strength, enabled it to cover the frontier of Italy most exposed to invasion from the Illyrians. Its intermediate situation between polished and barbarous nations, became the source of opulence, acquired by its commerce with both. If traffic consisted merely in the mutual exchange of commodities, an industrious nation ought to wish for neighbours as industrious as itself. This principle of my friend Mr. Mirabeau appears to me incontrovertible. He who wishes

* Constantine Porphyrogenitus. V. Cluver. Italia Antiqua, l. i. c. xviii. p. 138.

wishes to sell his goods, seeks for those who need, and can purchase them. Such purchasers are only to be found in rich and industrious countries. But this mutual exchange is only one part of an extensive and enterprising commerce. Another, still more profitable, is carried on by bold and adventurous, but judicious mariners, who sail in quest of the productions of foreign countries, to carry them to the nations to whom they are objects of desire: and when countries have emerged from that state of barbarism which renders them totally inaccessible to strangers, the more ignorant their inhabitants are, the profit of trading with them will be the greater; because their articles of exportation will be sold far below their real value, and in that rude state of nature, which will leave the whole advantage of manufacturing them to their purchasers. Aquileia was placed in most favourable circumstances for carrying on traffic with barbarians. 1. This trade was secured not merely by unjust and precarious treaties, but by the laws of nature, and local situation. It was carried on by land across the Julian Alps, the passage through which was naturally commanded by Aquileia. Padua and Milan would have had great disadvantage in the competition. Maritime commerce is quite different, the sea being always open to those who have industry and boldness. 2. This trade was easy. The merchandize was conveyed on waggons to Nauportus, distant from Aquileia only fifty miles; and the passage by Mount Albius was the easiest in the Alps. It was then transported by by navigable rivers from Nauportus to the Danube. 3. The merchants of Aquileia must have been great gainers by dealing in slaves, whom they purchased at a cheap rate. They had cost nothing but blood to their barbarous masters; to keep them in whose hands would have been not only useless, but expensive and dangerous. But they were valuable articles of trade with polished nations. Italy alone demanded a constant and large supply, for the purposes of domestic service, the shows, and agriculture. Slaves who had only bodily strength were sure of selling well; but when they shewed any disposition for the arts and sciences, their new masters were careful to cultivate it; and then sold at a high price that mind and ingenuity which they had not purchased. That principle of improvement, which has place only in man, became a gainful object of commerce. The slave trade, it may be remarked, can be supported only by barbarians; for civilized nations purchase slaves, but do not produce them. 4. The merchants of Aquileia bought slaves with wine and oil, the produce of their country; so that both the exports and imports were much in their favour.

Oct. 20.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. xxi, xxii, xxiii, p. 204—337. After speaking of Istria, where the Greek fables vainly placed the mouth of the Danube, he returns backwards to examine Cisalpine Gaul. He begins by giving a general notion of the country, and the colonies which went from Celtic Gaul. The first particulars which he mentions relate to the Lævi and Libici, who inhabited habited the frontiers of Piedmont and the Milanese, and who depended on the powerful nation of the Insubres.

I went to the public library, of which my friend Pavillard had given me the key, to consult some books. 1. A Dissertation, by Mr. Freret, treating of the famous passage in Pliny concerning the circuit of Rome. I read and abridged his explanation, with a view to Nardini. 2. The Gauls, whom I just mentioned, made me curious to know the fate of the other colony, which penetrated at the same time into Germany. For this purpose, I consulted Cluverius's Germania Antiqua. 3. I also consulted Pitiscus's Dictionary of Antiquities, for clearing up some difficulties in Juvenal. The articles Abella, Mandra, Bardaicus, Lectica, Carpentum, Rheda, Essedum, and Cisium, furnished me with agreeable occupation. That of Lectica is particularly well treated.

I finished the twenty-fifth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. I had not neglected that work, but was obliged to wait for the continuation. It contains Quintilian, by Gesner : a good edition of an excellent author.—The Voyage of the Legate Mezzabarba to China, by Father Viani. It treats of the idle controversy respecting the Chinese ceremonies. It appears from the narrative that the emperor had diverted himself at the expense of the good legate, and with the intrigues of the Jesuits, whom he despised as missionaries, though he esteemed them as men of letters.—Strictura Juris Romani, a Jensio. This writer alleges strong argu-arguments for proving that Justinian's Code was written in Greek, and that the Latin text, which has come down to us, is only a translation.—Anti Machiavel. Reinsberg and Potsdam inspire very different ideas; the one produced the Anti Machiavel, and the other, the Military Instructions. When the king of Prussia composed a work on justice and clemency, it was fit that Voltaire should be at the expense of publishing it.—The History of Denmark, by Cragius; first Extract. It contains only the author's life, who flourished towards the sixteenth century.—Corpus Juris Germanici: a work published under the eyes of Heineccius, containing a collection of the laws of the ancient nations of Germany, equally interesting to the philosopher and the lawyer. Mr. Heineccius, in a learned preface, proves clearly, that the Franks made the famous Salic laws, when they were yet Pagans, and still remained in Franconia, a little before the election of their first king; in one word, towards the year 400; and that they wrote them in Latin, as they still remain, except that the first Christian kings made some alterations.

Oct. 21.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. xxiv, xxv, xxvi, xxvii. He treats of the Insubres, Orobii, Cenomani, Ananes, or Animani. The difference of names does not always infer that of nations; and this last difference is often grounded on political rather than physical reasons; for of the nine Gallic nations established in Italy, the names of four only are to be found in their native country; and the Boii, scarcely known in Gaul, formed both in Germany and in Italy the most numerous and formidable of all the Gallic colonies. I reckoned the Insubres among the Gauls, on the authority of all the ancients; but was surprised to see Mr. Freret classing them with the Ombri. Polybius indeed calls them Isombri, which in Celtic signifies the Lower Ombri.* But Polybius acknowledges them for Gauls;† and even did he maintain the contrary, his authority, great as it is, ought not to prevail over the united testimony of antiquity. Accuracy and probity shine in his writings. He was a soldier, a statesman, and a philosopher: but I doubt whether he was a good grammarian, or a profound antiquary.

in

Oct. 22.]—Before returning Nardini, which was wanted for the public library of Geneva, I this morning again went over it carefully, endeavouring to impress its principal contents on my memory. Human infirmity always loses a part; but I see with pleasure that much remains, and will continue to remain with me.

I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. xxviii, xxix. p. 271—316. This was a good deal, considering that I spent the day abroad, and had only the evening, before and after supper, for study. These two chapters comprise the rest of Cispadane Gaul. The Boii, Lingones, and Senones, inhabited the duchies of Parma and Modena, of Ferrara, and Ur-

* See The Origin of the Nations of Italy, in the eighteenth volume of the History of the Academy of Belles Lettres.

† Polybius, l. ii. apud Cluver. Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. xxii. p. 228, 229.

bino;

bino; as well as the particular districts of the Romagna and Bolognese. The Gauls therefore extended to the river Æsis, which separated them from Italy. But speedily the Romans expelled the Senones, and added their country to Umbria, establishing the Rubicon for the boundary of Italy. As they were persuaded that the Gallic nations on their side of the Po could always be formidable neighbours, they compelled the Boii to quit their country. They new-modelled, in fine, the whole province, which they filled with Roman fortresses; a necessary but ruinous policy, which, in order to preserve the dominion of countries, rendered them desolate; for a few cities, built and peopled by the conquerors, ill compensated for the loss of the numerous tribes of barbarians formerly inhabiting the plains, forests, and mountains. This province was crossed by the Emilian road from Pollentia to Ariminum, which on both sides shewed many flourishing towns. But at a little distance from the road nothing was to be seen but deserts: the rest was the work of artifice and ostentation. In the latter times of the republic, the Transpadane region was the scene of many important transactions. 1. The war of Modena, between Mark Antony and the Consuls. 2. The interview of the Triumvirs in the little island of Renus, near Bologna. 3. The passage of the Rubicon by Julius Cæsar. The events and places are well ascertained by Cluverius. The passage of the Rubicon might be the subject of a good political and military commentary. Cæsar had always fixed his winter quarters at Lucca, when he wished only to communicate more easily with his friends at Rome, without leaving his province. But at the approach of war, he established his quarters at Ravenna. Let us endeavour to explain his motives for this alteration. 1. He wished to get possession of Picenum, a rich and populous country, and thus deprive Pompey of the resources which he might have found in a province extremely devoted to his family, and from which that general might have made legions spring up merely by striking the ground with his foot. 2. He wished to turn the capital with his army. Had he attempted to march straight to Rome, Pompey would have made himself master of the difficult passes, and stopped his progress; and Italy would have become the theatre of war. But by marching towards Ariminum, Asculum, Corfinium, and Sulma, he made it seem to be his design to cut off the retreat of his enemies; and his boldness threw them into such consternation, that they hastened to embark at Brundusium. 3. He wished to make sure of Ariminum. This important place was distant from the Rubicon eighteen miles by the Emilian road, and only eleven by that of Ravenna. Cæsar could send forward bodies of troops to the river under twenty different pretences, but the moment he passed it, his designs were unmasked. Ariminum, therefore, was to be surprised by a forced march; and it is not necessary to be Cæsar, to perceive how much that enterprise might be facilitated by diminishing the distance by seven miles, or a march of two hours.

at

Oct.

Oct. 23d.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. xxx, xxxi, xxxii, p. 316—355; which contains a general description of the Alps, as well as of their particular branches, distinguished by the epithets Maritime, Cottian, Greek, Pennine, Rhetian, Tridentine, Noric, Carnic, Julian, Pannonian; and also a description of some particular mountains, as Vesulus, Matrona, Adula, and Ocra.

I read the sixteenth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains the Orations of Lysias, by Doctor Taylor: a good and beautiful edition of a languid orator. The oration, which is inserted entire, gives a very accurate idea of the economy of an Athenian family.—The History of French Poetry, by the Abbé Massieu. The work is imperfect; but it sufficiently indicates the taste and amenity of its author. He speaks of the verses of the Emperor Adrian to his soul, and of those made by the Princess Margaret before her shipwreck; but those of Villon, after his condemnation to an infamous death, are still more extraordinary.—The Theology of Water, by Mr. Fabricius: a good philosophical composition.—Cortesi's Dialogues on the learned Men of Italy, after the Revival of Letters. Cortesi had talents; but he is liable to all the ridicule of a hyperbolical Ciceronian.—Letters on Rousseau and Saurin. These letters are unconnected: the first is by the Abbé d'Olivet; the second by an anonymous writer of Lausanne. This writer only attacks Saurin; but the Abbé undertakes to defend Rousseau. To how many pleadings has this endless process given birth!—

History of Denmark, by Cragius; second Extract. Meursius much availed himself of Cragius's manuscript.

Oct. 24th.]---I finished the first book of Cluverius, c. xxxiii, xxxiv. p. 355—418. He treats of the passages of the Alps, and of the first who crossed them; Hercules, the Gauls, Hannibal, Hasdrubal, and Pompey. The discussion concerning Hannibal's march, and the road which he followed into Italy, is learned and curious. The following is the result of my reading and careful reflexion on the subject. 1. By heaping together passages, and collecting all the authorities furnished by antiquity and the middle ages, it is easy to conceal our real poverty under the ostentation of riches; but when these authorities are weighed in the balance of sound criticism, we shall find but two authors deserving the name of originals, who have been servilely copied by all their followers. These two are Livy and Polybius. Did their accounts correspond, nothing would remain but to study and follow them; but unfortunately their sentiments are so different, that this is impossible, and we must make an option. Livy carries Hannibal over the Cottian Alps, properly Mount Genevre, near Turin, and makes him descend by this passage into the country of the Taurini, now the plain of Piedmont. Polybius leads him by the Summus Penninus, or Great St. Bernard, in the country of the Salassi, now the valley of Aoust. 2. To decide judiciously between these opposite authorities, we must weigh the character of the witnesses, witnesses, and consider the nature of their testimony. Nobody admires more than I do, the historical merit of Livy, the majestic flow of his narrative; in which events follow each other with rapidity, yet without hurry or confusion; and the continual beauty and energy of his style, which transports his readers from their closets to the scene of action. But here we have to do, not with the orator, but with the witness. Considered in this view, Livy appears merely as a man of letters covered with the dust of his library, little acquainted with the art of war, careless in point of geography, and who lived two centuries after Hannibal's expedition. In the whole of his recital, we may perceive rather a romantic picture, calculated to please the fancy, than a faithful and judicious history, capable of satisfying the understanding. The god who appeared to the Carthaginian general,* the mountains accessible to him alone, the vinegar with which he split the rocks,† are fables which Livy relates without criticism as without suspicion. We seem to read Homer describing the exploits of Achilles. In Polybius, on the other hand, we meet with nothing but unadorned simplicity and plain reason. A justness of thinking rare in his age and country, united with a sterility of fancy still more rare, made him prefer the truth, which he thoroughly knew, to ornaments which he was perhaps the more inclined to despise, because he felt himself incapable of attaining them. He had examined, attentively and skilfully, with his own eyes, the country between the Po and the Ebro: where he might collect the precious remains of tradition which the period of sixty years had not been able to efface; and where he might converse with some of the old men of the country, who had in their youth either resisted Hannibal's invasion, or followed his standard. His journey to those parts was undertaken with the express purpose of gaining information in the country itself, and of substituting, instead of the fables which already overflowed the public, a plain and authentic history of this famous expedition of the Carthaginians.* The work which has come down to us, is the fruit of this design. To finish the parallel, I must add that Livy's narrative cannot be reconciled with itself any more than with that of Polybius. His obscurities and contradictions baffle the ablest geographers;† whereas the account of Polybius is clear and well connected. The valley, being divided by the Rhone, ascertains the country through which Hannibal made his approach to the Alps; from which he emerged into the territory of the Insubres.‡ Both these circumstances clearly indicate the passage of the Great St. Bernard. 3. Livy, in the Augustan age, could not describe the events of the second Punic war but from ancient authorities. A passage in

* Tit. Liv. xxi. 22. † Id. ibid. 37.

* Polyb. Hist. l. iii. Cluver. Ital. Antiq. l. i. c. xxxiii. p. 363.

† Cluver. l. i. c. xxxiii. p. 370—375.

‡ Polyb. Hist. l. iii. Cluver. l. i. p. 365.

this this historian informs us who was his voucher for the particulars of Hannibal's march. It was Hannibal himself. Is not this authority better than that of Polybius? or rather, what can be said in opposition to the testimony of a general giving an account of the country through which he passed? This interesting circumstance deserves to be explained, and the explanation, curious in itself, will throw much light on the whole question. L. Cintius Alimintus, one of the most ancient annalists of the republic, was taken prisoner in the second Punic war. His captivity gave him an opportunity of one night hearing the conversation of Hannibal, in which that general confessed, that from the time when he passed the Rhone, to that of his entering the country of the Taurini in Italy, he had lost 36,000 men, and a great number of horses.* This conversation, which was preserved by Cintius in his history, was sufficient to turn the balance, and to make Livy reject the received account, which brought Hannibal into Italy by the country of the Salassi, and not that of the Taurini. The following are the words of the original: Ex ipso autem audiisse Hannibale, postquam Rhodanum transierit, triginta sex millia hominum, ingentemque numerum equorum, et aliorum jumentorum amisisse in Taurinis, quæ Gallis proxima gens est, in Italiam digresso. Before examining whether this conversation be as decisive as it at first sight appears, it may be asked whether it actually took place. Vanity is so strong a principle, and the notion of deriving our intelligence from the mouth of a hero, and an enemy, is so flattering to the mind, that this Hannibal perhaps was no other than some very ill-informed soldier belonging to the Carthaginian camp. I acknowledge, however, that bare possibility is not sufficient to justify this suspicion, unless we could support it by proofs which are now wanting, namely, the personal character of Cintius, the opinion formed by contemporaries of his history, and the time of its publication before or after Hannibal's death. I give up therefore this conjecture; and, taking the conversation for authentic, shall make some remarks on its purport. 1. Is it possible without temerity to reject the authority of Hannibal for that of Polybius? A geographer studies countries in the names or arbitrary signs by which they are known. A general studies the countries themselves. He ascends an eminence to learn the general outline, and mounts on horseback to examine the detail; conversing with the inhabitants to discover circumstances which would otherwise escape his observation. Having acquired this real knowledge of the places themselves, he is careless of the names by which they are called. These names are easily effaced from his memory, especially in barbarous countries, where their number is small. His multiplied occupations rapidly succeed to each other; and his old ideas are gradually obliterated to make room for others which are more important, because more connected with the actual state of his affairs. In what what a perpetual storm did Hannibal live after passing the Alps till he won the battle of Cannæ? Cintius, I am persuaded, was not taken prisoner before that memorable engagement; previously to which Hannibal was too much exasperated against the Romans to talk familiarly with his captives.* May it not therefore be suspected that at the end of two years he had lost an accurate recollection of those barbarous names? In the famous retreat of the 10,000, the general has recorded his own exploits. His narrative, however, is not exempt from errors and geographical difficulties. The negligence of Xenophon in an elaborate composition, will remove our surprise at that of Hannibal in a simple conversation. 2. These doubts appear to me well founded; yet I perceive that they have the appearance of too much refinement, and that the great name of Hannibal will be sufficient to make them vanish. Let us give full credit, then, to his accuracy, and only inquire whether the same be due to his sincerity. According to the barbarous maxims of antiquity, a prisoner of war was treated as a criminal. He was loaded with irons, cast into a dungeon, delivered over sometimes to the cruelty of an executioner, without the smallest regard to his rank, birth, or merit. In this pretended conversation, Hannibal lays aside ordinary maxims, and talks with a Roman prisoner with not only mildness, but confidence. Cintius could not have had this interview with Hannibal, unless the

* Tit. Liv. xxi. 38.

* Tit. Liv. xxii. 58.

Carthaginian had taken the trouble to bring it about; and with what view could that be, except to deceive him? Perhaps this general, who excelled as much in artifice as in valour, wished to conceal from the Romans the road by which he had entered into Italy, and to cover the march of the reinforcements which he yet expected. The Romans had never fought among the Alps, the ferocity of whose inhabitants had involved them in such obscurity, that Hannibal might make the prisoner believe what fables he pleased concerning the countries which he had traversed. 3. A way of arguing still more natural and milder remains, which is to explain Hannibal's conversation, instead of calling in question either its reality or sincerity. He wished to give an idea of the losses which he had sustained in passing the mountains, in consequence of battles, cold, and fatigue. He begins therefore from his crossing the Rhone, and ends at his arrival in the territory of the Taurini; since it was really in their country, and by taking their capital, that he began his operations in Italy.* Their territory, therefore, formed the limit between two things totally distinct; his losses in Italy and those in the Alps. It was not necessary that the country of the Taurini should be the first place of Italy into which he descended from the Alps; it sufficed that it was the first where he fought a battle. The former explication is adopted by Livy, but the latter appears to me very capable of being being defended. It deprives the Latin historian of what appears to him a decisive proof. It even turns this alleged proof against himself, by laying open the source of his mistake. The argument on which Livy builds, is not only refuted, but destroyed; and the authority of Polybius subsists alone and unrivalled. I confess indeed that the sense of this famous passage is rather guessed at, than explained; so perplexed, defective, and faulty is its construction. Critics have endeavoured to correct it; but it should seem more natural to say that Livy copied Cintius, and that the latter had preserved the very words of the Carthaginian general, who spoke Latin like a foreigner. 4. In our search after historic truth, we must pay a regard to authority and probability: to the character of the author, and to the nature of the facts which he records. Although the first is entirely on the side of Polybius, yet the second offers some circumstances which it is difficult to explain on his hypothesis, and which appear even contrary to probability. 1. When we cast our eyes on the map, we must be surprised that a general of Hannibal's abilities should have followed so circuitous a road as that of St. Bernard, which was long, difficult, and surrounded by barbarians, who were rather Germans than Gauls. It is of no weight to say, that he wished to keep clear of the sea, and of the army of Scipio. The observation is just; but to see whether it applies to the present question, we must make ourselves acquainted with Hannibal's situation and views. After he had passed the Rhone, his Numidians met met with a little check from Scipio's cavalry. The Romans wished to come to a general engagement, which Hannibal desired to avoid, being convinced that they were only to be subdued in Italy itself. He therefore silently raised his camp, gained a march of three days on the enemy, and on the fourth day arrived, without being pursued, at the conflux of the Rhone and the Isere.* The Romans could not overtake him. The loss of three days is not to be recovered in contending with a general, active and vigilant; and who, by the superiority of his light-armed cavalry, was able to conceal his own movements, and to make himself acquainted with those of the enemy. Hannibal was not therefore afraid of being pursued; he soon learned that such fear would have been groundless; that Scipio's army continued its march into Spain; and that the consul himself returned into Italy, to take the command of the army on the banks of the Po. Hannibal being delivered from all uneasiness on this subject, made a halt in the country of the Allobroges, decided a contest between the heirs of the crown, and prepared his troops for the fatigues which they were going to undertake. In choosing his route into Italy, he could be determined by no other consideration but that of preferring the shortest and the most convenient. But the passage by St. Bernard is certainly not the shortest. 2. Neither is it the most convenient. In the reign of

* Tit. Liv. xxi. 39. Polyb. Hist. l. iii.

* Strabon. Geog. l. iv. p. 141. Berger Histoire des Grands Chemins, l. iii. c. 31. p. 471.

Augustus,

Augustus, when Roman policy had levelled the Alps, that prince made two military ways, which, diverging from Augusta Prætoria, again united at Lyons. One of those roads, which crossed the Pennine Alps, was still so difficult that it could not be passed by carriages.* When we consider how much more difficult it must have been in the time of Hannibal, it is not credible that that general should have been either willing, or able, to cross it with his great numbers of horses and elephants. 3. Hannibal consumed fifteen days in passing the Alps, from which four days must be deducted, two of which were spent on the top of the mountains, and two employed in clearing the road from the snow. The breadth of the Alps, according to Polybius, is 1200 stadia (150 Roman miles†). This calculation agrees with the geography of the country; but is the march consistent with probability? Is it possible for a numerous army to proceed fourteen miles a-day, across mountains where the soldiers were obliged continually to struggle against the difficulties of the road, and often to repel the attacks of the mountaineers? I have great respect for Polybius's authority, but cannot help doubting the fact. These are some of the difficulties which occur in his narrative, and which are not to be despised. 4. Our researches have brought us back to our first uncertainty, how are we to form an opinion?

* The passage by the Pennine Alps was, however, the shortest; here the mountains are much narrowed.

† Polyb. l. iii. Cluveri. c. 33. p. 382.

opinion? Polybius's narrative has all the external evidence that can be desired; but that of his rival seems more consistent with other circumstances that are well ascertained. One reflexion may suffice to regulate our decision. It is more probable that we should be deceived, than that the above circumstances should have escaped the notice of Polybius. These circumstances are indeed important; but they are not decisive. The first and most considerable depends on many suppositions; that the text both of Livy and Polybius is corrupt; that instead of the unknown word Scaras, and of Arar, which is misplaced, we should read on both occasions Isara. I acknowledge that this correction is extremely probable, but probabilities which result from other probabilities, continually grow weaker as they recede from their source. If I suppose on my side; 1. that the Allobroges then occupied a part of the territory of the Ambarri; 2. that the word triduo in Livy is corrupt; 3. that Hannibal passed the Rhone higher than is supposed, the first objection totally disappears. Hannibal, at the confluence of the Rhone and Saône, followed the shortest route into Italy, when he crossed the Great St. Bernard. Let us conclude then, though with some remainder of scepticism, that though Livy's narrative has more of probability, yet that of Polybius has more of truth.* There is

* I have copied nothing from Cluverius, except his general conclusion, very differently modified. I have cited but few authorities. The only important citations, which supersede all others, are the twenty-first book of Livy, the third book of Polybius, and the thirty-third chapter of the first book of Cluverius.

one

one perplexing consideration behind. In Mr. D'Anville's map of Hannibal's expedition, that accurate geographer, whose positions are always chosen on reflexion, makes the Carthaginians pass by the Cottian Alps. I am stopped and silenced by the authority of this learned man, which in this case is the greater, because he conceals the reasons on which his opinion is founded.*

Oct. 25th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. i. p. 418—433. The author treats of the name and origin of the Tuscans. He rejects, with Dionysius of Halicarnassus, their pretended Lydian descent, and believes with that historian that they were indigenes. But as Cluverius was a good Christian, what idea could he affix to that word? There is, however, one, which I doubt whether he was sensible of: it is that of a nation formed by the re-union of different families, settled in the country at different times, and independently of each other. The nation and body politic is indigenous, but not the individuals.

I finished the Bibliothèque Raisonnée, volume the twenty-seventh. It contains the Jubilee of Printing, by Mr. Seiz. He supports the pretensions of Haarlem, and endeavours to prove that Laurence

* Since these observations were written, viz. Oct. 1763, Mr. Whitaker published the Course of Hannibal over the Alps, in 2 vols. 8vo. in 1794; but in 1795, A. F. Tytler, Lord Woodhouselee, a Lord of Sessions, published a Critical Examination of Mr. Whitaker's Course of Hannibal, which is deservedly deemed more satisfactory than any thing that has been published on the subject. Perhaps it was best understood by the late General Melville. S.

Costar,

Costar, a citizen of that place, discovered in 1440 that beautiful art, which the dishonesty of his servant Faustus carried with him to Mentz. The narrative appears clear, well connected, and free from difficulties; yet if printing was invented at Haarlem, it appears extraordinary that all the countries of Europe should have received it, or believe they received it, from Mentz. Could so many daughters agree in mistaking their mother? I am not ignorant of Corselis's voyage to England; but after Dr. Middleton's refutation, it is no longer allowable to cite that fable.—A Collection of some small Works on the Pronunciation of Greek, by Mr. Havercamp. In this famous dispute, Erasmus, with his ordinary prudence, used the ancient pronunciation, though he seemed to approve the new. When we consider the storms excited by this ridiculous question in the beginning of the sixteenth century, particularly at Cambridge, his caution will not appear blamable.—Arretin's Letters. The beginning of a great collection of letters between the learned men of the fifteenth century, which is publishing in Italy. It may be useful in literary history.—The History of Denmark, by Cragius. It appears to me well executed. We see in it the beginning of the reformation in that country, and the dishonesty of Henry VIII. of England.—The Czar Peter I. in France: a philosophical romance, the work of a lively and fruitful imagination, but destitute of taste or method. Such works dazzle for a moment, and are forgotten.

Oct. 26th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. i. p.

i. p. 434—455. The arts, the luxury, and the riches of the Tuscans, are matter of astonishment. I can scarcely believe with Cluverius, that Cisalpine Gaul was the original seat of that nation. It appears to me on the contrary from ancient writers, that the Tuscans, from the remotest times, inhabited Etruria, properly so called, and sent forth two great colonies, each of which was like the mother-country, divided into twelve communities: one of which colonies expelled the Ombri from the whole of that tract which lies between the Alps and the Apennines; while the other formed settlements in Campania. It might have been said in that age, almost without exaggeration, that the Tuscans were masters of Italy. The first of those colonies was subdued by the Gauls, eight centuries before the Christian æra, when it was already rich and powerful, but softened by luxury. The mother-country exhibited the same character in still stronger colours. It verged towards its ruin. How many ages must have been required for this slow, but sure progression, by which nations proceed from barbarism to industry, arts, luxury, and effeminacy? We cannot doubt the fact; the Tuscans are certainly one of the most ancient nations with which we are acquainted.

Oct. 27th.]—I read Cluverius, l. ii. c. ii, iii. p. 455—518. He describes with much accuracy the coast of Tuscany, with the opposite islands, from Luna to the mouth of the Tiber. We meet every where with Greek fables. With respect to the greatest part of Greek writers before Polybius, space may be divided, as Varro divided time, into the the historical, fabulous, and unknown. The historical ground was confined to Greece, Sicily, Africa, Egypt, and Lower Asia. In the fabulous, I would place Italy, with the countries between Greece and the Danube, and those between the Caspian sea and the Euphrates. The countries beyond those limits were altogether unknown. Homer might have satisfied the lovers of the marvellous; yet his fables form but the smallest and most probable part of the Greek mythology.

Oct. 28th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. iii. p. 518—537. The author treats of Tarquinii and Veii, the two cities of Tuscany that were nearest to Rome. Tarquinii was celebrated for the science of augury, to which it had given birth. The origin of this deceitful art need not be sought elsewhere: it began in Tuscany. The ridiculous fable concerning Tages, teaches us that he was a native of the country: his success in contriving such an extraordinary system, and in making it be adopted by his countrymen, proves him to have been a man of genius. Tages sprung from a furrow; he was not a foreigner. The Chaldean fish Oannes sprung from the sea; this symbolic language explains itself.

The ancients themselves found it difficult to ascertain the situation of Veii. In the time of Lucan, this famous city had already been destroyed; and the ruins of a place which had been as large as Rome could scarcely be discovered. Its site could only be known by its distance from the capital; but with respect to this distance, authors are not agreed. Their opinions may be reduced to the the two following: 1. Livy, speaking of the siege of Veii, says, that it was carried on within the twentieth mile-stone.* Eutropius tells us that Veii was eighteen miles distant from Rome. 2. The Roman itineraries make the distance twelve miles;† and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, an hundred stadia, or twelve miles and a half.‡ There are two ways of reconciling those opinions. 1. Faleria, as well as Veii, was situate on an eminence. The former was destroyed by the Romans, and a town of the same name rebuilt on the plain. If a similar change took place with respect to Veii, Dionysius of Halicarnassus would only be guilty of the small mistake of supposing Veii to have always had the same site. I am well pleased with this explanation. The interval of eighteen miles answers better than that of twelve, considering the many wars carried on within those narrow limits, between the two rival republics. 2. All differences may be reconciled by giving up the authority of Eutropius, one of the most contemptible authors that ever wrote. The Romans had surrounded Veii with walls and intrenchments. Not satisfied with fortifying themselves on the side of the city, they had also raised bulwarks to intercept the succours that might be sent to the besieged, from the other cities of Tuscany.§ Veii was therefore twelve miles and a half from Rome, since the diameter of a city as extensive as Athens must

* Tit. Liv. l. iv.
† V. Tabul. Pentinger.
‡ Dionys. Halicarn. l. ii.
§ Tit. Liv. l. v.

have been two miles and a half. If the most advanced forts on the side of Etruria were four miles beyond the city, we have the distance of nineteen miles, which sufficiently justifies the expression of Appius Claudius.

Oct. 29th.]—I read Cluverius, l. ii. c. iii. p. 537—550. That chapter contains a good description of Faleria, the capital of the Falisci; a city which preserved to the age of Augustus clear marks of its Grecian origin.

I went to the public library. In the great collection of Italian historians, by Grævius, vol. viii. p. 3, I found a performance of the learned Mazzocchi, pretending to prove that Civita Castellana, thirty miles from Rome, was the ancient Veii; and a refutation of that work by my friend Nardini. Mazzocchi must have been strangely blinded by his prepossession in favour of his native city. He has not the shadow of a proof.

I finished the first volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Schedius, de Diis Germanis: an immense compilation, without taste, criticism, or discernment.—Henry Ditton's Demonstration of the Christian Religion. How grossly have those two words been abused!—Letters of an Ex-Jesuit, on the Paradoxes of Father Hardouin. This learned man is here allowed to speak for himself. His zeal for tradition, and his hatred towards the Jansenists and the philosophers, involved him in all his absurdities. Finding in the fathers, and particularly in St. Augustin, many things favourable to the cause of his enemies, he was willing to oppose oppose facts to opinions, and boldly declared Augustine's impious works to be spurious. The fall of Augustine's work, de Libero Arbitrio, brought down with it the other fathers by whom it was quoted. The ruin of the fathers involved that of profane writers: the whole edifice fell in pieces. This was what he called unstringing the beads from the rosary of antiquity. He might have drawn many good thoughts from M. Barbeyrac, who wrote an excellent treatise on the morality of the fathers. How ill did those doctors of the church understand the most valuable of all sciences. They prohibited the most innocent pleasures, and the most lawful occupations, as savouring of the world, and nearly connected with idolatry. They would have destroyed mankind in order to sanctify them. But on the other hand, regarding it as a principle that every action related in the Old Testament, and not therein condemned, was by this silence approved, they justified and praised adultery, falsehood, incest, and cruelty.

Oct. 30th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. iii, iv, v, vi. p. 550—624. The author describes the other cities of Tuscany, situate inland; Volsinii, Clusium, Aretium, Perugia, and Cortona. The passages which he has collected, respecting the lake Thrasymenus, afford a very natural picture of this famous spot, which was bounded on one side by the lake itself, and on the other by a range of high mountains, which opened only by two narrow defiles. Thither Hannibal had the address to decoy the army of Flaminius, that it might be taken, as it were, in a net. Cluverius afterwards passes into Umbria, and treats of the origin of its inhabitants, who, notwithstanding his opinion to the contrary, appear to have been Celts. He describes their territory, which was divided in one direction by the Apennines, and in another by the Flaminian Way. That portion of it which lies between the sea, Etruria, and the Apennines, is the subject of his fifth and sixth chapters.

Oct. 31st.]—I remained all day at home, by which Cluverius was a gainer. I read Ital. Antiq. l. ii. c. vi, vii. viii, ix, x. p. 624—722. Nearly an hundred pages daily would greatly quicken my progress; but such efforts are seldom made. In those four chapters, the author concludes his account of Umbria by describing that portion of it which extends between the Apennines and the territory of the Sabines. That territory itself forms the next object of his research. He treats finally of the Tiber, and of the rivers which fall into it. This chapter, with that on the Po, includes almost all the rivers in Italy. The river Tiberis was, by a poetical licence, spelt Tybris. The god of the river was called Tiberinus. All good writers have attended to this distinction, which is pointed out by Servius.

Nov. 1st.]—I read Cluverius, l. ii. c. xi, xii, xiii, xiv, xv. p. 722—762. The author describes Picenum, one of the most fertile and best peopled districts in Italy. He then proceeds to several communities, inconsiderable in point of their numbers, but highly distinguished by their valour; the Marrucini, cini, Marsi, Vestini, and Peligni. Corfinium was one of the principal cities belonging to the last. This place was once in hopes of being highly distinguished. Had the social war been prosperous, Rome must have yielded to Corfinium; which, under the name of Italica, was to have been the head of the new confederacy. I shall venture to make some reflexions on this extraordinary war, the principal circumstances of which have been somewhat misrepresented by the Abbé Vertot: an author whose works are read with the same pleasure as romances, to which in other respects they bear too much resemblance. 1. The Abbé Vertot introduces the Latins very unseasonably. "The Latins, those inhabitants of Latium who enjoyed the Latin law, and to whom Drusus gave hopes of acquiring the citizenship of Rome, rose in arms, when assassination had robbed them of their protector."* Yet it is certain that the people of Latium had no share in this rebellion. They are mentioned but once in the war; and, on that occasion, as sending auxiliaries to the army of the republic.† They did not think of renewing an ancient quarrel, which the fortune of war had, more than two hundred and fifty years before, decided against them. Previously to their subjugation, they had more than once made Rome to tremble. All that Vertot copies from Livy respecting that similarity of language, manners, and military discipline, which gave to the social, the appearance of a civil war, must be referred to the former æra.* In the time of the social war, Rome was too great to be an object of jealousy to the little cities of Latium, which were continually converted into villages and villas in the vicinity of the capital. Perpetual communication, and numerous alliances, had cemented the bands of their common origin. Many places had acquired the rights of citizenship; in others, the Latin law gave that right to two families annually. All the cities of Latium enjoyed many advantages, which must have naturally inspired them with affection for Rome, and hatred towards her more recent allies. 2. The author of the History of the Revolutions of Rome, so much exaggerates the strength of the Italian confederacy, that an air of romance is thereby thrown on his whole narrative, though it may not be perceptible to the greater part of his readers. According to his account, not only the Latins, but all the nations of Italy, signed this alliance, and sent a common embassy to Rome, demanding the rights of the city. It is a matter of astonishment that a single city should have been able to make a defence against the united force of so many allies, whom it had found so much difficulty in subduing successively. Happily this wonderf l circumstance contains as little truth as probability. The abridger of Livy has preserved the names of all the communities which composed this confederacy.

* Vertot. Revolut. Romaines, tom. iii. p. 26—30.

† T. Liv. Epitom. l. lxxii.

* T. Liv. viii. 6.

racy. They were, the Samnites, Lucani, Picentes, Marsi, Peligni, Vestini, and Marrucini.* With regard to this fact, Livy's authority is better than any other; and in such an enumeration, an abridger having nothing to do but to copy, it is to be supposed that he does it correctly. The Samnites then were at the head of this league, into which they had prevailed on six other communities to enter, who were their neighbours, allies, or colonies. They were afterwards joined by several other cities, but not until the Romans, recovering from their consternation, had recalled their armies from abroad, fortified the passes into their territory, and even gained several victories over the allies. Livy informs us in general of those subsequent revolts,† but the particulars are to be found in Appian‡ and Strabo.§ They number among the rebels, the Frentani, Hirpini, Peucetii, with some cities of Apulia and Umbria. Of the former, Appian names Canusium and Venusia; speaking only in general of the Umbrii. I was surprised to find this historian also name the Pompeiani.‖ These could only be the inhabitants of Pompeii, a maritime city of Campania, near Naples.¶ Did Pompeii exist in the time of the social war? It cannot be of an earlier date than the family from which it derived its

* Tit. Liv. Epitom. l. lxxii.
† Tit. Liv. Epitom. l. lxxiii.
‡ Appian de Bell. Civil. l. i. p. 374. 376. 379.
§ Strab. Geograph. l. v. p. 166, 167.
‖ Appian de Bell. Civil. l. i. p. 374.
¶ Cluv. Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. iii. p. 1154.

name; and this family was unknown until the time of the great Pompey's father, that Cneius Pompeius Strabo, who was consul in the 665th year of Rome, and the second year of the social war. But supposing the antiquity of Pompeii, can it be imagined that a single city, and that a small one, should have ventured to revolt against the republic, though situate in the midst of so many more important places, which faithfully maintained their allegiance? I know that the scene of the war was changed to Campania, and am willing to believe that a party of the allies, having taken possession of Pompeii, there stood a siege:* but this explanation tends rather to extenuate, than to justify Appian's mistake. I am inclined to seek the names of the states which entered into the confederacy against Rome, in the narrative which Livy and other historians give of the war, rather than content myself with Appian's general description, when he says that the confederacy comprehended all the nations between the Liris, or Liturnus, and the Ionian sea.† Of this description, one of the clauses is false, and the other inaccurate. The Ionian sea is taken in so many different meanings, that it denotes any thing you will.‡ The Liris and Liturnus were quite different rivers, and had only one cir-

* I have since discovered that the etymology of Pompeii is uncertain, and that I was right in my conjecture of its having been besieged. V. Vell. Patercul. l. ii.

† Appian de Bell. Civil. l. i. p. 374.

‡ Vide Cluv. Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. x. p. 1075; et l. iv. c. xvii. p. 1334.

cumstance

cumstance in common, that both were sometimes called Clanis, or Clanius. Such then were the allies. They surely were formidable; but fear or affection still collected many Italian nations around the standard of the republic; the whole of Latium, Campania, Brutium, Calabria, the Sabines, all Etruria, a part of Umbria and Apulia, and the whole of the colonies of Magna Græcia. The cities of Tuscany prepared for joining the allies; but the senate warded off this danger, by granting, of its own accord, the rights of the city to that important province.* A great number of colonies spread over all the districts of Italy, whose fidelity being secured by interest as well as gratitude, supplied the Romans with magazines, and with the protection of their fortresses. In those republics which declared against Rome, the citizens were not unanimous. The Romans had their creatures in each of those communities, whose avowed opposition, or secret intrigues, disturbed the measures of the prevailing party.† Each individual sided with the senate or the league, which became the watchword of faction, like the names of Guelphs and Ghibelines, which divided and desolated the same countries thirteen centuries afterwards. The Abbé Vertot, when he explained the difficulties with which the Romans had to contend, should also

* Appian de Bell. Civil. l. i. p. 374.

† Vell. Paterculus, l. ii. c. 16. The Minatius Magius there spoken of, belonged to the very city which began the war, by the murder of a prætor and a legate.

have have mentioned the resources by which they were enabled to surmount them. 3. The nation of the Marsi, though formidable by its valour, was inferior in strength to the Samnites and the Picentes. Yet it had the honour of giving its name to the war, which is as well known by the appellation of the Marsic, as the Social. The Marsi were the only people on the Roman side of the Apennines, who ventured to declare against the republic. Their country became the first theatre of the war, and when the senate assigned armies to the consuls, it was by granting them the Marsi for their province. This is not the first example of the least considerable portion of a league giving its name to the whole. We know the ancient Scythians by the general denomination of Tartars, because the small tribe so called always formed the van of the Mogul armies during the extensive conquests of Zenghis Khan and his successors.* 4. The allies, though finally defeated in the war, obtained the rights of Roman citizens, which they had so eagerly desired. But they obtained this honour only to participate with Rome in all the calamities of which their own revolt had been the principal cause; and to ruin that republic and themselves. Generals commanding armies in the heart of Italy, and Italy converted into one city, whose inhabitants were citizens only by a kind of fiction, were circumstances

* See Reflexions on Ancient Nations, by Mr. Freret, in the eighteenth volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres.

cumstances which too plainly prepared the way for slavery. How much must the allies have regretted that tranquillity and happy obscurity, which they had long enjoyed without knowing its value! During the period of an hundred and twenty years that elapsed from the second Punic, to the Social war, the nations of Italy flourished under the mildest of all governments. They had lost that unhappy right of making war on each other, which was no longer necessary for their defence. Secure under the protection of the Romans, they had nothing to fear from invaders. Their domestic disputes were settled by the senate, who beheld them all with the same paternal eye, and whose interposition liberated them from the miserable necessity of having recourse to arms. In return for these benefits, the whole of Italy supplied a body of infantry equal to that drawn from the single city of Rome, and double the number of cavalry;* a light contribution in itself, and which, by giving a military turn to their youth, tended to render them respectable to the Romans. Their authority was sovereign as to all other matters which contribute to the happiness of nations, namely, the affairs of justice, police, and political economy. They had not to endure the tyranny of governors, as insolent as rapacious; their law-suits were not carried carried by appeal to the capital; and a wall of brass did not form an insurmountable barrier between the citizen and the subject. They were debarred indeed collectively from the rights of Roman citizens; but whenever an individual proved that his ambition was justified by his merit, Rome was too attentive to her interests not to acknowledge him for her own.* I write in the Pays de Vaud. Its inhabitants ought to be contented with their condition; yet it will not gain by a comparison with that of the people of Italy. I know that some advantages were withholden from that people by the pride of the Romans, as to the concerns of private life, marriages, testaments, &c. I perceive also that they had reason to complain of some acts of violence, especially in latter times; and I am sensible that such things are more striking to the fancy, than all the general advantages derived from the operation of good laws, which pass almost unobserved. 5. In undertaking this war, the allies were guilty of imprudence; were they also unjust? Could they justify their refusal to observe their former treaties, and the insurrection which their refusal produced? I do not mean completely to discuss a question as extensive as it is difficult. I will endeavour, however, to establish the following principles. 1. The treaties entered into by the general assemblies of two nations ought to bind their heirs and successors; because it is not to be presumed that either party has agreed to submit to any

* T. Livius, l. xxii. c. 36. It appears from several passages of this author, that this was the ordinary proportion. Velleius Paterculus exaggerates a little, when he speaks of double the number of troops. L. ii. c. 15.

* Tacit. Annal. xi. 24.

any inconvenience without obtaining some advantage in return; and he who reaps the benefit of one part of a contract, ought to bear the burden contained in the other. The same principle does not apply to treaties entered into between nations and their leaders. These treaties hardly deserve the name, being destitute of a condition essential to the validity of every contract; namely, the mutual independence of the parties, and their power to provide for their respective advantages. They deserve the name rather of general resolutions than of treaties, and derive their force merely from the will of those by whom they were embraced. 2. The validity of a treaty is founded on the will of the contracting parties. That will ought to be free. It will be granted that every kind of violence, affecting the body, renders a contract null; for such violence does not merely constrain, but annihilates the will. But there is a milder violence which we daily experience, that acts on the will by presenting it with the almost necessary alternative of happiness or misery. It rarely happens that individuals or nations undertake engagements, unless when they are impelled by this universal motive. The law of nature must either allow that this violence is consistent with liberty, or fidelity to our engagements will be reduced to an empty name. On the other hand, if fear does not nullify a promise, honesty must be its own victim, and robbers will acquire a right to all the goods of the earth. These difficulties may be removed by the following easy and simple distinction.

tion. Promises are binding only with respect to those who were entitled to inflict the evils with which they threatened us. These evils not being inflicted, change their nature, and become real goods bestowed on us, which serve as a sufficient basis to treaties; being a proper compensation for the burdens to which we engage to submit. 3. Society reuniting in the body politic the rights and wills of individuals, the community at large enjoy all the rights which were enjoyed by individuals in a state of nature. The right of self-preservation holds the first place. It necessarily includes the right of self-defence, of repelling force by force, and of subjecting the unjust aggressor to all the evils with which he threatens us, even to death itself. This right therefore still subsists in communities; the magistrate is entrusted with the national force to make war, not against individuals, but against the members of a foreign community, of which individuals are merely the instruments. He attacks the community only. If his cause is just, and the hatred and violence of his antagonist renders his death necessary to his own safety, he then exercises the rights of nature, and takes away his life; that is, his civil life, by subduing and destroying the constitution of his country. On this principle the right of conquest is founded. If the conqueror exercise his right in all its rigour, and the conquered acknowledge him for their master, I think they are bound to maintain inviolate an engagement by which they have acquired the benefit of public tranquillity. But

But from this point, which is perhaps the feeblest bond of human probity, two kinds of treaties gradually diverge, and gradually gain strength as they remove from their source. The first is that, where, in proportion as the conquest is less complete, the necessity of contracting the obligation is indeed diminished, but the equality between the parties is increased to that perfect independence, which leaves them at full liberty in their respective engagements. If the conqueror, on the other hand, having it in his power to destroy his enemies, has thought proper to save them, the contract acquires a degree of force proportional to the advantages which he might have taken away, but which he has been pleased to leave. The observations formerly made concerning the happy state of the people of Italy, sufficiently show how much validity the wisdom of the Roman conquerors had given to their treaties with the vanquished. 4. But, it will be asked, had these treaties the most essential of all conditions? The right of conquest ought to be founded on justice; a virtue to which those robbers of the earth were strangers. I wish not to enter into historical discussions, because I am in quest, not of facts, but of principles. In our present state of error, vice, or weakness, we are often obliged to give up absolute truths, for those that are merely conventional, because the only truths within our reach. It is thus that, with regard both to individuals and societies, reason allows us to examine the foundation of their authority, but not to find fault fault with the manner in which they are pleased to exercise it. Both the right, and the exercise of that right, ought to be founded on justice; but as our reason is not always able to distinguish wherein that justice consists, we are obliged to suppose it on the side of those whose power we are unable to resist.

I have endeavoured to be as concise as possible, avoiding reflections merely accessory, consequences, and, above all, applications. On the whole, I am forced to give sentence against the allies.

But on every supposition, Velleius Paterculus is blamable. After acknowledging the just pretensions of the allies,* he has the impudence to praise the conduct of Minatius Magius, one of his own ancestors, who, maintaining his fidelity to the Romans, raised a legion for their service, and distinguished his valour in the sieges of Herculaneum, Pompeii, and Casa.† But this Minatius, who, according to Velleius, was the defender of tyrants, could not approve his fidelity to Rome, without being a traitor to Asculum. It is plain, that the flatterer of Sejanus was not a fit judge of the great principles concerning the law of nations.

Nov. 2d.]—I read the continuation of an extract in the eleventh volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée, containing the history of Servetus, written by Mr. Alevoerde, under the eyes of the famous Mosheim. The journalist (perhaps Mr. de la Chapelle) has many observations and researches concerning this extraordinary transaction, which are far

* Vell. Patercul. l. ii. c. 15. † Ibid. c. 16.

far more valuable than the book itself. The two authors had treated Calvin with great severity. The reviewer repels their attacks, which he ascribes to the rancour of Lutheran zeal against the patriarch of the Calvinists. The punishment of Servetus cannot indeed be justified; but, in this business, Calvin was not actuated by worldly motives, but by a mistaken religious zeal, and a respect for maxims which, though cruel and sanguinary, were acknowledged and avowed by all Christian churches. But many observations still remain to be made. 1. The examples of churches and theologians who declare in favour of the punishment of heretics, are nothing to the present question. Men's actions are never less guided by their principles, than when those principles run counter to the natural sentiments of humanity. The heart here corrects the errors of the understanding. A man of a humane character, under the influence of a false zeal, will in his closet condemn a heretic to death; but will he drag him to the stake? Not to shudder at the shedding of innocent blood, requires a heart totally insensible to pity. 2. I acknowledge the power of false zeal and an erroneous conscience. It is sufficient to silence the voice of pity; but can it stifle its murmurs? Will not the unhappy theologian feel a combat in his own breast between religion and humanity? Will not the outward expressions of sorrow indicate how deeply he is afflicted to shed his brother's blood? Brutus saw that the death of his sons was necessary to save the liberty of Rome. He pronounced the fatal sentence; but had he sent them to punishment without any emotions of grief, it might have been justly said that his natural ferocity hindered him from perceiving the magnitude of the sacrifice that he made, and even that he had sacrificed them rather to his own hatred and vengeance than to the safety of his country. In Calvin's behaviour, I can see nothing but the most abominable cruelty. He loads Servetus with invectives; he fears lest his victim should escape from his hands; and, in a tone of triumph, passes on him the sentence of condemnation. But Servetus did not spare the divine of Geneva. I know it. But the one loaded with reproaches a wretch whom he had confined in irons; the other only breathed out too loudly his agonies of suffering. Hard must be the heart which does not feel the difference! 3. A few years before, Servetus had communicated to Calvin all his religious opinions. Their epistolary correspondence was of considerable duration. But when Servetus was seized at Vienna, Calvin sent all his letters to the magistrates. In this instance, he may justly be reproached with having violated the tacit promise which is always supposed in such a correspondence, and which an honest man would have held sacred, instead of availing himself of the frankness of the Spaniard, for the purpose of destroying him. 4. We must recollect Calvin's situation in Geneva. He was the legislator of a new republic, and experienced the difficulties incident to innovators. A numerous faction, headed by the first first syndic, pressed on him with rancour, and espoused the cause of Servetus because Calvin was his enemy. The latter was sensible that the process of Servetus was his own: and the reviewer ingenuously confesses, that unless Servetus perished, Calvin was ruined. Calvin's friends acknowledge that he was opinionated, haughty, and jealous of his authority. Let themselves draw the consequence. It was necessary that the throne of the reformer should be cemented with the blood of Servetus. 5. In a letter written to an intimate friend, Calvin does not dissemble his hopes that Servetus would be soon condemned to death. He wishes, however, that he may escape the utmost rigour of that punishment; probably, that he might not be burnt alive. Yet this very rigour was afterwards approved by himself; and that at a time when he was all-powerful at Geneva. Either this reformer concealed his real sentiments under dark hypocrisy and inquisitorial mildness, or motives very different from those of religion hindered him from soliciting from the magistrates a favour, which his conscience obliged him to demand, and which he was sure would not have been refused. 6. When we collect and combine all these circumstances with the acknowledged character of the reformer, can we doubt that a hard and cruel heart, an ambitious soul, and hatred towards the man who despised his instructions, and impeached his opinions, united with religious zeal in impelling Calvin to persecute the unfortunate Servetus? Voltaire therefore is right, when he says, that Calvin had an enlightened mind, but an atrocious soul.

Nov. 3d.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. lib. ii. c. xv, xvi. p. 762—786; where the first volume ends. He concludes his account of the Marsi, and then describes the rude and mountainous country of the Æqui, whom it cost the Romans, in the infancy of their state, so much trouble to conquer. Alba Fucentia was a Roman colony in the territory of the Marsi, on the banks of the lake Fucinus. The pleasantness of the country, and the security of its inland situation, made the Romans often send thither prisoners of state, conquered and dethroned kings, to whom they wished to give, instead of a prison, a soft and comfortable retreat. Perseus, King of Macedon, died there, and was honoured with a public funeral; a treatment very different from that of the unfortunate Jugurtha, who was thrown into the Carcer Tullianus, to die of cold and hunger. The reason of this difference will be explained elsewhere.*

Nov. 4th.]—I read Cluverius, l. iii. c. i. p. 787—820. He comes at length to the most interesting part of Italy; Latium, and the neighbourhood of the capital; not however without leading us through the tiresome round of the Oenotri, Siculi, Pelasgi, and Aborigines; in which obscure researches the thread of connexion is always slipping through our hands. Cluverius had not that clearness and criticism necessary for unravelling the perplexities of those remote antiquities; the difficulties of which Freret has eluded, because he was not able to resolve them.

* See vol. iv. p. 397.

of

I finished the eighteenth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains the History of the Jesuits: an idle rhapsody of well-known stories, the belief of which supposes, perhaps with good reason, unbounded wickedness in the Jesuits, and unbounded credulity in the public. This work, besides, is ill-written; without method, and deformed by digressions.—Defence of the Translation of the History of the Council of Trent, by Father Courayer. The reviewer is angry at this amiable writer for accepting of the degree of Doctor from the university of Oxford, although he was not a Protestant. Yet, without coming to a perfect identity of opinions, the two religions nearly meet: the university carrying to the utmost length the opinions of the Anglican church, and the Father Courayer softening as much as possible those of the church of Rome.—Pontoppidan's Gesta Danorum extra Daniam: a curious collection of truths and fables to raise the glory of a nation, which required only the former.—Hardouin's Commentary on the New Testament. He pretends that the Vulgate is the true original, of which the Greek text is only the translation.—Machiavel a Republican. The author makes use of the vulgar argument, viz. that Machiavel wrote his Prince to inspire the Medicis with maxims that must render them universally odious; but this argument is destroyed by proving that treatise to have been written before their usurpation.—Antiquities of the French Nation, by Mr. Le Gendre: learned, but without criticism. The simplicity of the good Le Gendre discovers the Scythians to be the ancestors of the French, from their polite behaviour to the Amazons.—Political Discourses, by Mr. Gordon; and a Parallel of the French with the Romans, by the Abbé Mably. These two writers have gained a great reputation; the one by boldness and enthusiasm, the other by his appearance of honesty and calm reasoning. Yet I have never been able to discover in their works any thing but common-place. I have been in company with the latter, and can answer for it, that his admiration of monarchy has much cooled in the space of twenty years.

Nov. 5th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. ii. p. 820—870. He is here rather the critic and antiquary than the geographer, which last character becomes him far the best. With an incredulity beyond that of Pouilly and Beaufort, he regards the whole history of the first ages of Rome as fabulous. He dethrones the Roman, as well as the Alban kings; and has no more belief in Romulus than in Æneas; using learned arguments, weakly urged, drawn from the contradictory accounts of writers concerning the origin of Rome, the gross ignorance of the first Romans, and the improbable circumstances told of the birth and education of their founder. Having overturned the received system, he proceeds to explain his own. When the Aborigines left the country of the Sabines to invade invade the Siculi, they were in alliance with a Pelasgic colony from Arcadia. The Siculi were conquered; and the leader of the Pelasgi took possession of Valencia, one of their towns on the banks of the Tiber, and gave it the name of Rome. The Pelasgi afterwards separated; and mixing with the Aborigines, formed with them the nation called Latins. This event happened fifteen centuries before the Christian æra; and to this Pelasgic chief, the true founder of Rome, ought to be referred the few facts on the basis of which so many fables have been built concerning the supposed personages—Saturn, Janus, Evander, Æneas, and Romulus. This system is new, and in some parts specious: but it is so weak, that two reflexions are sufficient to overturn it. 1. Can it be imagined that the Romans, having lost all memory of eight hundred years of their history, and not being able to go higher than the eighth century before Christ, should have been obliged to conceal their ignorance under the absurd fable which they gave out concerning their pretended founder? Many cities have invented fictions for the purpose of magnifying their antiquity and nobility. But the fable fabricated by the Romans, abridges their history by the period of 760 years, and substitutes for their ancient Pelasgic origin, a pretended descent from shepherds and robbers. The Romans knew, at least they believed, the settlement of Evander on Mount Palatine; and if they were ignorant of the transactions of the intermediate centuries, would not this space have been filled up by names, genealogies, and fables such as were interposed to form the chain between Æneas and Romulus? These suppositions are necessary for Cluverius's system, but cannot be made without supposing in the first Romans a degree of gross ignorance, inconceivable in a nation inhabiting cities, and enjoying the use of letters. 2. But these suppositions, if granted, would militate against the system which they are meant to establish. The same ignorance which obliterated the history of the Romans, must also have destroyed that of the Pelasgi, their remote ancestors. How extraordinary is the privilege granted to the latter nation, whose ancient migrations are supposed to be undoubted facts that admit not of dispute, and that ought to be employed for dissipating all the clouds that obscure the history of their more recent posterity!

The hypothesis of the learned geographer must fall to the ground; but the falsity of that hypothesis does not prove the Roman history to be true. I readily give up to historical scepticism, or rather to contempt and oblivion, the high exploits of Æneas, the Trojan colony, the kings of Alba, and the wolf of Romulus. But what degree of credit ought to be given to the first decad of Livy? To discuss fully such a question would require knowledge and leisure. I have neither. Yet merely to break new ground on a question almost exhausted, I would observe; 1. that it requires greater precision of ideas, than has hitherto been aimed at. Cluverius would allow that some truths may be discovered amidst the the heap of fables; and the Abbé Sallier would acknowledge that the Roman has shared the fate of all histories, whose purity has been corrupted by some fictions. Before entering upon the controversy, I shall give my own articles of faith; and not to expatiate in too wide a field, shall confine myself to the transactions related in the abridgment of the first books of Livy. I would venture to maintain that these transactions happened, without giving up some of the more probable circumstances with which they are said to have been accompanied. 2. The subject of the external proofs is exhausted. Concerning the great annals, the domestic memoirs, &c. nothing can be added to the arguments of Messrs. Sallier and Freret on one side, and the objections of Messrs. Pouilly and Beaufort on the other. I would change the mode of attack, and make use of the proofs which divines call internal. My argument would be, that the first Roman historians having lived in the days of Hannibal, the fables which, according to my adversaries, they refuted, must have gained possession of the public fifty years before that period. I would combine the nature of those fables with the condition of the Romans, and examine whether it is likely that, under such circumstances, similar fables should either have been invented or believed.

Nov. 6th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. iii. p. 870—900. He treats of the maritime places of Latium. They were few in number; we meet, however, with the celebrated names of the river river Numicus, Ostia, Laurentum, and Lavinium, often confounded with Lanuvium. I am surprised he should omit to speak of Pliny the younger's Villa Laurentina, which is so well described by its master. He might easily have ascertained its situation, and have very properly inserted those passages of Pliny, which exhibit so lively a picture of the circumjacent country. I perceive that Virgil makes the Trojans sail up the Tiber, and places Æneas's first camp on the banks of the river; whereas the greater part of writers, relying on the story of the sow, and some very vague expressions indeed of the poet himself, suppose that hero to have landed at the mouth of the Numicus, near to the place where he built shortly afterwards the city of Lavinium.

Nov. 7th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. iv. p. 900—950. The author continues to describe Latium; the inland country contained Lanuvium, Aricia, Alba, Tusculum, and Gabii; places famous during the first ages of Rome on account of their resistance to its arms; and afterwards, on account of the beautiful villas with which the great men of the republic, and the emperors, crowded the neighbourhood of the capital. Continually Greek fables; there is scarcely one of those cities which has not a supposed founder belonging to that nation. Of all those fables, often very ill-contrived by the Greeks, concerning western nations, especially Italy, there are some few that stand apart, but the greater number are connected with one or other of those three celebrated brated events; the return of Hercules from his Iberian expedition, the voyages of the Argonauts, and those of Ulysses.

I finished the twenty-ninth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains De Traditione Principiorum Legis Naturalis, by Ausaldus. The primitive revelation, whether preserved by tradition, or by principles which each individual may discover by the exercise of his own reason, will be attended with the same consequences; but the latter hypothesis is more simple, and more consonant with the attributes of the Creator.—The Universal History, by a Society of Men of Letters: first and second Extract. The excellence of the first part of this great work is well known. The reviewer shows clearly that the hail-stones which completed the defeat of the inhabitants of Canaan, was only a storm of ordinary hail, and refutes the credulity of those historians who think that it consisted of large stones, formed and supported in the air till the moment of their fall.—A methodical Catalogue of the Plants found in Switzerland, by Albert Haller. I am little interested in a work on botany, but very much in Mr. Haller. This universal genius unites the fire of poetry with the sagacity and discernment of the philosopher: his natural abilities are equal to his acquired knowledge. His memory is retentive to a degree almost miraculous. A few years ago he supped with Mr. de G. whose memory is also surprising. The conversation turned on the affairs of Sweden, and the antiquities of Rome; and the scholar always cor-corrected the traveller. With all his admirers, Haller has but few friends. Wherever he has happened to reside, at Gottingen, Berne, or the Pays de Vaud, his harsh, haughty, and ambitious character has offended all his acquaintances.—The History of William the Conqueror, by the Abbé Prevôt. I found in it some quotations from an old chronicle, the natural simplicity of which gave me great pleasure.—The History of Mount Vesuvius, by the Academy of Naples: very curious. The heat of the lava, even after its first violence has abated, is far greater than that of red-hot iron.

Nov. 8th.]—Being unwell, I did nothing but read a small work which Mr. Pavillard had lent to me. It is entitled, Letters written from the Country, and relates to the troubles of Geneva; concerning which I know nothing more than the public at large. These letters are written by a man of abilities, who affects too much however the style of Montesquieu. He is an advocate for the magistrates, and considers as a salutary check the previous approbation of the little council, before any bill can be proposed to the general assembly. This regulation he compares with the king's negative in the constitution of England. But there is a wide difference between a negative before, and after deliberation.

11th.]—I finished the thirtieth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Cuper's Letters; which give as favourable an impression of the heart as of the understanding of this learned Dutchman.—The Civil History of the Kingdom of Naples,

Naples, by Mr. Giannone. The candour, penetration, and freedom, of this excellent lawyer, will ever ensure to this work the esteem of all wise men. Churchmen are not always of the number.—Poems, by the King of Navarre: highly valuable, on account of the rank of the author, their antiquity, and their own real beauties.—Taylor's Dissertation on the Law of the Decemvirs against Insolvent Debtors. His conclusion is not new. He thinks the debtor was sold as a slave, and the price received for him divided amongst his creditors, and not the slave himself. As this journal begins to grow too fashionable, the reviewer does not venture to insert the Latin, which cannot however easily be dispensed with in this discussion.—Universal History; third Extract. The reviewer collects a great number of curious examples on the power of music.—Natural History of Fishes, by Klein; curious.—The Count d'Estrade's Letters lay open the springs of the French policy, and all the ambition of Louis XIV.—A Treatise on the Number of Inhabitants in Holland and West Friesland, by Mr. Kerseboom. As this curious work is in Dutch, I shall speak of it at some length. The result of his observations is; 1. The number of children born yearly amount to 28,000. 2. The total of the inhabitants to 980,000; that is, in the proportion of 35 to 1, of the births. 3. The number of married couples is 169,000. After subtracting the bastards, it turns out that of thirteen married couples of all ages, two produce children yearly. 4. Mr. Kerseboom finds by his calculations, tions, that of two persons that enter into wedlock between the ages of 20 and 50, it is 13 to 7 that one will die before the lapse of twenty years. 5. Of 1400 new-born children, the probable number of those who will remain alive at each of the assigned ages, is as follows:

Age.	Alive.	Age.	Alive.
1	1125	60	382
10	895	70	245
20	817	80	100
30	711	90	10
40	605	95	1
50	507

Nov. 12th.]—I read a small new work, a poem in prose, entitled, Olivier. The style is easy and flowing, but rarely elevated to a pitch deserving the name of poetry. The story is interesting; we are pleased with the adventures of this Olivier, who subdues the Count's hatred by good offices. The characters of Enguerrand and his squire are amusing. His adventure in the village of the Limousin is a counterpart to that of Gil Blas with the archbishop of Grenada. The travels of Fleur d'Epine are throughout too extravagant. The isle of musicians is not a bad fancy; but the whole pleasantry is founded on a pun, the double meaning of the word air. The arrangement of the poem is detestable. I am provoked to find the narrative continually broken into cantos; and those parts of it resumed which had been almost forgotten. The author has imitated Ariosto. That is true; but Ariosto's arrangement is good for nothing. Besides, we ought not to confound the natural natural wanderings of a great genius unacquainted with rules, and the studied disorder of a writer who is extravagant by design, and who gives himself much trouble to violate those laws of composition with which he is acquainted.

Nov. 14th.]—I read Cluverius, l. iii. c. iv, v. p. 950—979. The author treats of the other inland cities of Latium; Tibur, Præneste, Gabii, &c. He thence proceeds to the Rutuli, who inhabited a small district between the sea, the Latins, and the Volsci. This little community must have separated itself from the political confederacy of the Latins, since it did not participate in the sacrifices on Mount Alba, which the members of that confederacy annually met to celebrate. The poets, however, often confound those two nations; which were indeed nearly united by the situation of their territories and their common origin. Ardea, the capital of the Rutuli, was taken and burnt by Æneas; the poets feign that a bird flew from its ashes; a strange fable, as shocking to the fancy as to reason. But the dogma of the metempsychosis was extremely metaphysical; and of that kind of metaphysics, of which the consequences became the more refined in proportion to the absurdity of the fictions on which they were founded. Our religion assures us of the soul's immortality, and even immateriality; but the doctrine of the resurrection makes us consider the body as an essential part of the man, and tends to persuade us that without the assistance of organs, the soul would not be capable of action. The metempsychosis, on the contrary, separate the soul and body without depriving the former of any of its faculties. These faculties it owes only to itself: man is still a man; and in the body of another animal can think and reflect as well as in his own. When this opinion is adopted, though we may dispute concerning the nature of this soul, we must allow that it has nothing in common with the body which it inhabits.

on

Nov. 15th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. iii, c. vi, vii, viii. p. 979—1048. He casts a glance on the little country of the Hernici, inclosed in the mountains; and describes at length the extensive territories of the Volsci, of which Antium was the capital. This nation had a marine, consisting of light vessels, with which they infested the seas of Greece and Italy. Alexander sent ambassadors, complaining to the Romans of their depredations; and the Romans endeavoured to repress their piracy. Who was this Alexander? I think he was that king of Epirus, who made war in Italy, and whom the Greek colonies there chose for their general and protector against the barbarians. This office naturally connected him with the Romans. When some writers speak of an embassy sent by the senate to Alexander the Great, they confound the uncle with the nephew. The authority of the ancients, as well as the improbability of the thing itself, convinces me that the Romans never had any communication with the conqueror of Asia.

16th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. iii. c. ix. p. 1048—1062. He speaks of that confusion sion of the names of nations and tribes, which it is so difficult to unravel. The Opici, the Osci; the Ausones, and Aurunci, are so continually confounded, that there must have been different names for the same people, or their territories must have been strangely intermingled.

Nov. 17th.]—I read Cluverius, l. iii. c. x. l. iv. c. i, ii. p. 1062—1102. The author enters into particulars concerning the country of the Ausones, which became afterwards a part of New Latium. Formiæ was distinguished by the infamous honour of being the capital of the Læstrigones, at the time when Italy was to the Greeks what the inland parts of America are to us. Homer has rendered this fable interesting. The discovery of an unknown country, where every object surprises and affects us, where curiosity is continually excited, and continually gratified, affords a pleasure similar to that felt in our travels. Yet the poet may be reproached with two incorrect touches, which somewhat disfigure his picture. The Læstrigones are either too refined, or too barbarous. They inhabit cities, they have chariots, and hired shepherds. Yet they are men-eaters. Happily for human nature, this ferocity never existed but in nations totally devoid of culture; and even among them man does not devour his fellow-creatures unless driven to this madness by famine or vengeance. 2. The Læstrigones were giants. Every thing belonging to them ought to be in due proportion; their children, houses, and cities. Yet Ulysses's spies travel through the country, converse with the king's daughter, and follow her without distrust to her father's palace. Their fears are not mentioned, till they see the queen of the Læstrigones. Gulliver was a better observer of proportions.

Nov. 18th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. ii. p. 1102—1115. After having determined the situation and bounds of Campania, he describes the sea-coast from Sinuessa, viz. Vulturnum, Liternum, Sylva Gallinaria, and Cumæ. This last place is described at great length. Its foundation and power, above all its Sibyl, immortalized by Virgil, furnish the geographer with an abundant crop. This last article is well treated, without confusion, but with his natural copiousness.

20th.]—I read Cluverius, l. iv. c. ii. p. 1115—1146. In pursuance of his design, he describes the coast of Campania, from Cumæ to Naples: a small district, famous in all ages. Misenum, Baiæ, Puteoli, with the lakes Avernus and Lucrinus, the terror of the early Greeks, and the delight of the Romans, will always render this coast highly interesting.

21st.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. iii. p. 1146—1164. He continues and concludes his account of the coasts of Campania and Naples, to the promontory of Minerva, which separated them from the territory of the Picentini. Herculaneum, Pompeii, Stabiæ, and Surrentum, are the principal places described in his route.

There are different opinions concerning the place of Virgil's tomb. St. Jerome and Donatus appear on one side; but Cluverius, followed by Mr. Addison, dison, on the other, rejects without ceremony their evidence; and, upon the authority of Statius, transports this monument to the other side of the city, and the foot of Mount Vesuvius. I should with them prefer Statius's information, were it conveyed in precise terms. But this poet speaks in general only of the Chalcidic shores, places which experienced the rage of Vesuvius; and such vague language seems merely to indicate the neighbourhood of Naples. St. Jerome and Donatus, on the other hand, tell us, that Virgil was buried at the distance of two miles from that city, and on the high road to Puteoli; this account is so clear, that it cannot be mistaken. It may be reconciled with that of Statius, and is justified by the tradition of the country. Why should it be rejected?

Nov. 22d.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. iv. p. 1164—1171. He treats of the isles lying opposite to the coast of Campania. The two largest appear like advanced works, intended to guard the two promontories of the Bay of Naples. The one is called Ænaria or Pithecusa; the other is the famous Capreæ.

24th.]—I read Cluverius, l. iv. c. v. p. 1171—1179. After having treated of the coast and islands of Campania, he proceeds to the inland country. We behold the fertile fields of Falernum and Capua, whose corn and wine formed the surest revenue of the republic, and nourished a vast multitude of citizens. The district of Falernum was bounded by the vineyards of Mount Massicus. The ancients often confounded these two growths.

Capua appears next; that proud city, whose inhabitants foolishly thought that their riches would enable them to contend with Rome. The Romans destroyed the republic, but spared the city: and in never re-establishing its political constitution, an event which they always feared, they were guided rather by a concern for the safety of their own government, than by maxims of external policy. Cicero artfully confounds these two objects in his pleadings against Rullus; he had good reasons for so doing.

Nov. 25th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. vi, vii, viii, p. 1179—1205. The author describes the remainder of Campania, and the territories of the Picentini, Hirpini, and Samnites. These two nations inhabited mountains of little fertility, which were almost deserts, under the Romans; who had conquered the Samnites only by extirpating them. Florus is right. It is impossible to find in these districts objects worthy of twenty-four triumphs. Mr. Addison is again in my way. Why would he place in Umbria lake Ampsanctus, which Virgil has so well described? Was he ignorant of, or did he despise, the passages of Cicero and Pliny, which place that lake in the country of the Hirpini? The Fury could not make a choice more worthy of her character, than that of plunging into a lake whose waters proved fatal to all who approached them.

I finished the thirty-first volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Lucian, by Messrs. Hempsterhuis and Gesner; accompanied with every help that can render an edition valuable: manuscripts scripts collated, a new translation, and remarks of many of the learned. In speaking of the Philopatris, the editors prove that it must have been written under an emperor of Constantinople, who allowed the Christians to be insulted. This æra, being applicable only to Julian, destroys all the consequences which have been deduced from this work. —Account of a Mission into Greenland, by Mr. Egede, in Danish. All here is curious: the design of the voyage, uncommon among Protestants; the country; and its inhabitants. Nature is clad in terror; the animals are small and few. No other plants can thrive, excepting those which ripen in a summer of two months, and can bear a winter of ten. Corn will not grow beyond the sixty-fourth degree; beyond the sixty-fifth spirits of wine freeze. There is not even snow; all is hard ice, whose sparkling colours gladden this scene of horror. Yes; man is naturally good; I appeal to these Greenlanders, who are no strangers to love in the midst of their frozen regions, but are strangers to war excepting against the brute creation. They are lazy, inconstant; exempt from ill-nature, but destitute of great virtues. The Iroquois, who eat their prisoners, have also laws, ideas, and arts; with which last the Greenlanders are unacquainted. Compared with the Greenlanders, the Iroquois are a civilized nation. How delightful is the contemplation of nature!—Theology of Insects; by Mr. Lesner; very curious.—Letters of Count d'Estrades; highly useful for the history of negociations, a kind of history almost unknown to antiquity.—Fourmont's Chinese Grammar. A striking proof of the superiority of the Europeans. Chinese Grammars are written in Paris: will French grammars ever be written in Pekin? I am doubtful whether the Mandarins themselves know the principles of their own language as well as Mr. Fourmont.—A Treatise on the Senses, by Mr. Le Cat. The knowledge of the senses approaches nearly to that of the soul, of which they are the organs. Mr. Le Cat explains their anatomy, functions, and objects, with penetration always guided by experience. His work has given me a pleasure not to be described.—The Universal History, by a Society of Men of Letters. This extract relates to the history of the Persians, according to oriental writers; whom the editors boldly prefer to the Greek. Many learned men have entertained the same opinion, which appears to me indefensible. 1. In the oriental writers, the characteristics of the fabulous are predominant; there is no attention to chronology; geographical errors abound; and the marvellous forms the essential part of the narrative, instead of being merely an accessory. 2. In the history of Persia, there are many transactions concerning which the Greeks could not be mistaken; such as the time of the establishment of Cyrus's empire, and the wars between the Persians and themselves. But the Persian accounts differ as widely from the Greek, with respect to those matters, as they do with respect to all others. 3. I know that the Greeks only shewed themselves in Persia, and that their eastern subjects jects lived quietly under their transitory reign. But their successors, the Parthians, a Scythian nation who hated the Persians, whose effeminacy they despised, kept them during five centuries under a yoke of iron. A conflagration, or other transient calamity, rarely destroys the whole monuments of a country; but, under a cruel government, which renders each generation more stupid than the preceding, they crumble into dust, and become a prey to worms; and truth is soon stifled under a weight of fabulous tradition. The history of the dynasty of the Sassanides is less liable to objection. It is better connected, more probable in itself, as well as more conformable to the narratives of European writers. Yet a considerable time elapsed from the Arabian conquest, before the Persians endeavoured to collect their historical monuments.

Nov. 27th.]—I read Saurin's famous pleading against Rousseau. How singular a business is this! While wars and negociations are almost forgotten, this dispute between two private individuals is still remembered, and after the lapse of sixty years, still foments party passions. All I can decide is, that this performance of Saurin's is a fine exhibition of taste and eloquence.

28th.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. ix, x, xi, xii, xiii. p. 1205—1242. He proceeds to the coast of the Adriatic, and speaks shortly of the Frentani. He then treats of the country called Japygia by the Greeks, and Apulia by the Romans: giving its general division and limits. In page 1210 the editor apprises us, that Cluverius did not proceed farther in revising his work; and that the remainder will appear less polished, less elaborate, and perhaps less accurate. Heinsius's delicacy in giving this information is commendable; but I have not yet discovered its necessity. All the towns of Apulia and Calabria here pass in review; Arpi, Canusium, Luceria, Brundusium, and last of all Tarentum, which is treated with a copiousness proportional to its importance.

Nov. 29th.]—I finished the thirty-second volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Philosophical Researches of St. Hyacinthe: a small performance, by a man who has more talent for ridicule than for reasoning.—Cumberland's Treatise on the Laws of Nature, translated and commented on by Barbeyrac. A learned refutation of Hobbes. This philosopher had degraded man to the condition of a beast; the bishop exalts him to that of an angel. Man, Cumberland tells us, is made for society; he is the only animal that laughs and weeps. Hobbes maintains that man is not made for society, because children and idiots, though participating of human nature, do not know what society means.—Calvin's Letters to Jacques de Bourgogne. Here we find you, harsh and intractable spirit! quarrelling with a respectable friend, because he wishes to snatch a victim from your theological zeal. On the subject of these letters, the librarian of Geneva writes one to the reviewers, containing a curious investigation of the whole business. This librarian had already supplied them with with several other pieces; which treat indeed merely of literary trifles, but these trifles are written agreeably and elegantly.—Conformities between Jesus Christ and St. Francis of Assise. Bartholemy of Pisa discovered only 40, but this author carries the number to 4000, most of them trivial, or too subtile. The absurdity of this book gives it a kind of value.—Philo, by Mangey. Philo, in the first century, always quotes the Old Testament in Aquila's version, who lived in the second: a perplexing difficulty for critics.—Missions to Tranquebar. This is the counterpart of the Voyage into Greenland; all is opposite in these voyages, excepting the design for which they were undertaken. The ancients went too far in their assertions; but if the frozen and torrid zones are inhabited, is it by men? I doubt whether these regions will ever be civilized like the temperate zones. The scarcity and weakness of animals, and the want of corn, wine, and iron, will always form natural obstacles of great importance. But I intend to read the book itself, and therefore leave the subject at present.

Nov. 30th.]—I read Cluverius, l. iv. c. xiii, xiv. p. 1242—1282. After finishing the subject of Calabria, he proceeds to Lucania, the only province which commanded a view of both seas. There were many Greek cities on the coast, and a numerous and fierce people inhabited the inland country. These dissensions were abolished by the Roman conquests. The few inhabitants who escaped the effects of their fury, lost all remembrance of of their former condition. The geographer perhaps sees better than the historian, how dearly it cost the world to become Roman.

Dec. 3d.]—I read Cluverius Ital. Antiq. l. iv. c. xvi, xvii. p. 1320—1338; which concludes the fourth book, and the whole work; a truly laborious task; undertaken by me with more ardour than it was continued with perseverance. But intervals of relaxation were pardonable. His materials are immense; his method perplexed, and his style a motley mixture of quotations from authors of all ages. My undertaking is now accomplished; and I have derived from it much useful knowledge, which will not be easily forgotten. I have already remarked his prodigious mass of materials. In speaking of the meanest village, all the learning of antiquity and the middle ages occurs to his memory: and a passage is not more concealed from his keen eye in a legend of the tenth century, than if it stood at the head of the Æneid. Throughout, his authorities are produced, and sifted, and compared with each other; and the result of the comparison is not always to their honour. The ancients quoted often from memory. Books were scarce; maps still scarcer; and in a science where the mind is so liable to wander without the direction of the eye, error was unavoidable. Servius the commentator is often exposed to Cluverius's criticism. This pretended scholar is here stripped of his mask of counterfeit erudition. His absurd mistakes are only to be equalled by those of Appian the historian. But our author's censure spares not not the greatest names of ancient geography; Ptolemy, who knew the east better than the west; Strabo, who is sometimes an historian, politician, or philosopher, rather than a geographer; and Pliny, who undertakes to describe the world in thirty-seven small books; whose brevity is often obscurity, and who frequently sees by other men's eyes, and those not always to be depended upon. After so much experience of their inaccuracy, it could hardly be expected that Cluverius should maintain the infallibility of the ancients. But we may perceive in his work the same superstitious veneration for the great names of antiquity, which prevailed among his contemporaries. When no other excuse for them remains, he is sure to throw the blame on transcribers. This principle, that the true text needs only be restored, in order to restore its propriety, he applies with unwearied diligence. The great number of his corrections is only equalled by their boldness; the greater part are rash or useless; but some of them are extremely happy. The change of Athesis and Ufens into Æsis and Aufens, rescued the text of Livy from an absurdity almost inconceivable; substituted two obscure but fit names, instead of two far more illustrious, but totally misplaced; and restored the Galli Senones to their proper habitation. This correction has been adopted by Livy's editors, and admitted into the text.

Dec. 5th.]—I finished the thirty-third volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains the Life of Richard of Cornwall, Emperor of Germany, ny, by Mr. Gebauer, Professor at Gottingen. Had not this German been a subject of the king of Great Britain as Elector of Hanover, would he ever have disturbed the ashes of this obscure prince, whose weak and ignorant reign was as pernicious to England as useless to Germany? Would he ever have preferred this prince to the wise king of Castile?—Universal History, by a Society of Men of Letters. This extract treats of the history of the Macedonians. It is executed with much erudition, taste, and judgment. This Universal History would be invaluable, were all its parts of the same merit. I remember with pleasure that I formed the same opinion of this article when I read it at Bath in 1751. I was then fourteen years old.—Dissertation on the Medal of Smyrna, by M. de Boze: replete with erudition and taste; containing curious researches on the pre-eminence of the cities of Asia.—Researches on the Polypus, by Mr. Trembley. A new world! throwing light on physics, but darkening metaphysics.—Vegetius's Institutions. This writer on tactics has good general notions; but his particular account of the Roman discipline is deformed by confusion and anachronisms.—Theological Faults. Who does not know them?—Conformity between the Pagan and Catholic Rites of Worship. Messrs. Warburton and Middleton are divided on this question. The latter thinks that the Christians copied after the Pagans. The former thinks that both followed the natural impulse of human sentiment, always prone to superstition. These two opinions are not materially materially different. The will must always be actuated by some motive. These rites were familiar and suitable to the Romans of the fourth century. They had renounced them with reluctance; they resumed them with pleasure.

Dec. 7th.]—I returned to my geographical collection on Italy, which had been a short time interrupted. I divide the country according to the regions of Augustus, introducing under each region the most interesting particulars that occur in the course of my reading. This collection cannot fail being much augmented by my travels in Italy; and on my return to England, I hope to be able to give a description of ancient Italy, which will be the joint result of my studies, reflexions, and observations. Such a work still remains to be written; that of Cluverius by no means supplying its place. 1. Cluverius is too diffuse. We live not in that age of industry, when studies were valued in proportion to their extent and difficulty. Our men of letters are afraid to encounter two volumes in folio. Yet those who have curiosity, cannot be contented with such meagre abridgments as enrich neither the understanding nor memory. A book holding the middle place between Cluverius and Cellarius would suit the public taste. 2. An abridgment of the former would not answer the purpose. In abridgments the proportions of the original must be preserved; and those of Cluverius are not always accurate. Without reproaching him with excessive diffuseness in some parts, and contraction even to torture in others, three objects are totally omitted, which which surely merited his attention: the division of the provinces by Augustus, and his successors; the great roads of Italy, and the topography of the city of Rome. Cluverius is scarcely sensible of these omissions. He was not indeed obliged to anticipate the discoveries of the present age; but it happens fortunately for a more modern writer, that it is in his power to avail himself of a more accurate knowledge of itinerary measures, and to enrich his work with the first fruits of two new discoveries, the Tuscan monuments and those of Herculaneum. 3. Latin is no longer the language even of learning, and Cluverius's Latin was never the language of taste. The public would be pleased to see his broken chain of quotations melted down by a good writer into a clear, methodical, and interesting narrative. Sometimes I would preserve, however, the very words of my authorities, when they happened to be poets whose style often forms their principal merit, and whose smiling images would enliven the dryness of geographical description. 4. I would follow Strabo rather than Pliny. To my general divisions and tables I would endeavour to give all the neatness and perspicuity possible; while I examined with the eye of a philosopher the interior of the country and the manners of its inhabitants; the productions of art and nature, as far as they were known to the ancients; the migration of tribes, their laws and character. Amidst so many interesting objects, I would seize every opportunity of investigating how far public transactions and manners were affected by local situation and climate. 5. Arrangements are arbitrary.

trary. The method which I should follow, appears to me natural and luminous. I would place myself with Romulus on the Palatine Mount, and thus proceed to the different quarters of Rome, from the cradle of the nation to the first pomœrium of the city. In describing Italy, I would follow the progress of Roman conquests, and pay particular attention to its division by Augustus into regions; with this one exception, that I would separate the territory of the Sabines from Samnium, and put it at the head of Latium. By this small alteration I should reconcile the two principles of my arrangement; and the reader would easily follow the progress of Roman arms, and Livy's history. A work of this kind, well executed, would be favourably received by the public. It might enrich a bookseller, pass through ten editions, and become a classical book with students in colleges, travellers, and even men of letters. The author, however, would do wrong to value himself on a performance, which owed its whole success to the nature of the subject, industry, and method. To speak only of my own essay, the production of my youth, written in two months, and forgotten in four, yet it shews more originality of genius, than would be required for such a geographical performance. Of the two sources of literary fame, difficulty and utility, the second is the surest, though the least flattering to vanity.

Dec. 9th.]—I read the Bibliothèque Raisonnée, volume thirty-four, part first. It contains three treatises of Mr. Harris, on the subjects of art, music sic and painting, and happiness. He is a great admirer of Plato and Aristotle, from whom he has learned to express common-place thoughts in technical language; and an enthusiasm for the beautiful, the true, and the virtuous, which are often substituted with him for precision of ideas. These faults chiefly prevail in the first and third of those essays. The second, containing many just observations and nice distinctions, is more conformable with the taste of modern philosophy.—Natural History of Bees, extracted from the Works of Mr. Réaumur: written in the best taste; the choice of the subject, the refinement, copiousness, and singularity of the observations, the beauties of style and arrangement, all contribute to raise the value of this little performance.

Dec. 11th.]—I read the thirty-fifth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains An Extract from the Universal History, concerning the Life of Alexander. A good compiler would not have expatiated on a life so well known. A few sections would have sufficed. These compilers commit the same fault with regard to Crevier's Roman History. This practice multiplies useless books, disgusts their readers, and enriches none but booksellers.—Sermons on the Social Duties, by Doctor Delany. This historian of David savours much of the enthusiast; but he says excellent things. His discourse against the common vice of not paying our debts, is a performance as excellent as it is new.—Bibliothèque Françoise, by the Abbé Goujet; volumes seventh and eighth: the continuation of of a curious work.—A Letter of the Librarian of Geneva, concerning John Faustus. This excellent correspondent of the Review clearly proves that the inventor of printing died at Paris of the plague.—A Voyage to the North, by Mr. Outhier. He was one of the companions of Mr. Maupertuis. This voyage, or journey, was surely useful to astronomy; but geography gained little by it.—Dissertation on David's Curses. The author attempts to prove that David might wish for the destruction of his enemies, and rejoice in their calamities, without offending against charity. The task is difficult, any man would fail in performing it; by a man of sense it would not have been undertaken.

Dec. 17th.]—I employed myself very ill for some days, with the Memoirs of Abbé Montgon, in eight volumes large 12mo. small letter, and very thick volumes. The decided patience of a German would be tired with eight large volumes which, with the greatest facility, might be reduced to an hundred pages. Whatever concerns the Abbé Montgon appears to himself to deserve the attention of all Europe. Fifty pages are consumed in a conversation with the Archbishop of Amida; one hundred pages in an intrigue between the Duchess of St. Pierre and Count Rottembourg; the other parts are in due proportion. The Abbé's enemies, I perceive, accuse him of two faults; a boundless ambition, and a suspicious temper, which was always haunting him with imaginary enemies. I am inclined to think the accusations just; and that Cardinal Fleury's cabal was as chimerical as that of Jurieu. Why should the Cardinal have been the Abbé's enemy? Montgon did not deserve to be the object of his vengeance, still less of his hatred or jealousy. Yet to hurt this man, the Cardinal during five years employs concealed and almost invisible instruments, and transforms into rogues or cowards the Archbishop of Amida, the Duchess of St. Pierre, the Marquis of Brancas, and the Count of Rottembourg; who, according to the Abbé, had all of them formerly been very honest people. His ambition appears very manifest. A holy ecclesiastic does not think of quitting his retreat, but with a view to become the attendant of a great king. This was an inclination which he ought to have distrusted. Before his departure, this prince remounts his throne. What had the good Abbé to do at his court? Yet he goes there, plunges into worldly affairs, and the only signs of devotion that I can discover in the sequel of his work, consist in some passages of scripture, which he applies to his enemies. I acknowledge that our Abbé followed his natural vocation. He had a turn for business; and, though too fond of minutiæ, was not deficient in address, prudence, and persuasion. The two most interesting parts of his work are, 1. The curious picture of Spain after the treaty of Vienna, which united in the closest amity two princes, who had disputed a crown with the fiercest animosity. The court of Madrid was the dupe of that of Vienna. By means of a chimerical marriage shewn in distant tant prospect, Austria drew vast sums from Spain, at the same time that she gained real advantages for her commerce. The Austrian ambassador, Count Konigseck, governed Spain with the authority of a first minister. His weight was so great, that he caused the council of Castile to confirm the letters patent which Charles VI. had granted to some Spaniards, creating them Grandees, in reward of their services in resisting the tyranny of the Duke of Anjou. 2. The commission granted to the Abbé shews clearly, how little dependance there can be on the renunciation made by the house of Anjou of its rights to the crown of France; and that these rights would be enforced on the first favourable opportunity. It is true that such an opportunity is much less likely to occur now than it was then. The Abbé Montgon's style is inaccurate and uninteresting; that of a man unacquainted with the beauties and rules of his own language. What strange words are Despoticité, Stoïcité!

Dec. 19th.]—I read Claudii Rutilii Numantiani Iter, l. i. v. 1—664; and l. ii. v. 1—68. This is all that remains of a work that contained two complete books. I read it in Burman's Edition of the Poëtæ Latini Minores, Leyden, 1731: one of those Dutch editions, cum notis Variorum, in which the text only peeps out amidst a heavy mass of commentary. The 700 verses of Rutilius are spread over 200 4to. pages, crowded with the remarks of Simler, Castalio, Pithæus, Sitzmanus, and Barthius. Yet Rutilius is not a difficult author; once or twice only I should have been glad of an explanatory note; I looked for it in vain, but knew commentators too well to be surprised at the disappointment. The author of this little poem lived under the Emperor Honorius, by whom he had been raised to the first employments. He was Consul, Præfectus Prætorio, or Governor of Rome: being a Gaul by birth, he embarked at Ostia the 9th of October 416, A.U.C. 1169,* to return to his native country. The account which he has left us of his voyage along the coasts of Etruria and Liguria is imperfect, concluding at the town of Luna. His work may be considered in relation, 1. to its subject; 2. its style and poetry; 3. the personal character of its author. 1. If Rutilius had lopped off the first 180 verses of his poem, the reader would not have been a loser. After briefly mentioning the object of his voyage, and his sorrow at leaving Rome, his adopted country, and the scene of his honours, he expatiates on the glory of the capital, that eternal city, to whose empire Jupiter had not assigned any limits, and which was destined to reign over all nations, and during all ages. Such a subject required a truly poetical genius; and Rutilius is only a cold declaimer, who strains his faculties to string common-place thoughts, without finding in nature and himself colours fitted to adorn his theme. This theme indeed would not have been chosen by a judicious writer; for the reign of Honorius was not a proper period for describing the greatness of Rome; a greatness long long since fallen to decay. A veneration, and even terror, for her name, had been supported by her antiquity and extent of empire. But the illusion was now over. The barbarians gradually knew, despised, and destroyed her. Great Britain separated from the empire; the Goths, Vandals, and Suevi overflowed the finest provinces of Spain and Gaul; and when Rutilius wrote, Alaric had already been for six years master of Rome. I acknowledge that our poet, who was sensible of these calamities, endeavours ingeniously to dissemble their disgrace; comparing them with the defeats of Allia and Cannæ, to show that Rome never suffered a reverse of fortune without rising more vigorous from the shock. But the comparison is feeble and false. Since the Punic wars, circumstances were totally changed. In the time of Rutilius, the springs of government were worn out; the national character, religion, laws, military discipline, even the seat of the empire, and the language itself, had been altered or destroyed, under the impression of time and accident. It would have been difficult to revive the empire; but even could that have been effected, it would have been the empire of Constantinople or Ravenna, rather than that of Rome. Rutilius might have felt how destitute his panegyric was of truth or probability, from the false and confused ideas excited by his personification of Rome. In the time of Virgil, this figure would have been natural. Rome, regarded as a goddess, and invoked in temples, had an existence in the opinion of the multitude as well as in the fancy of poets. As the mother of the citizens, and the mistress of the provinces, her name recalled the image of her empire: but when this empire consisted in an assemblage of nations, subject to the same prince, Rome was no longer its sovereign; and this city, reduced to an idea merely physical, represented no longer any thing but walls, temples, and houses, built on seven hills and on the banks of the Tiber. The remainder of Rutilius's voyage is stamped with a higher value. The objects which he describes have not only more simplicity, but also more reality; and as they were observed with attention, they are painted with those colours of truth and nature, which always distinguish the result of experience from the fruit of study and invention. By a distinct and easy road he conducts us along the coast of Etruria, which was become almost a desert; he points out the ruins of cities, the beauties of the landscape, and all those places which were distinguished either by art or nature. Our traveller forgets not the neighbouring isles; and his curiosity leads him more than once into the interior of the country. The dryness of a didactic poem is occasionally enlivened by digressions either immediately, or not too remotely connected with the subject;* such as the character of the Lepidi, the discovery of the use of iron, the Jewish religion, and the Christian monks. He is worthy of commendation for not giving to his narrative, serious as it is, too much of the marvellous; which never becomes a poem,

* Cl. Rutilii Iter. l. i. 183. 205.

* I except his invective against Stilico, l. ii. v. 41.

where

where the author is his own hero. The marvellous is pleasing to our fancy, but is rejected by our reason. When we consider that conditional faith and imperfect delusion with which we are affected in works of fiction, it should seem as if there was a conflict of two hostile powers, by which the mind is kept in a state of suspense, that can only be maintained by distance and obscurity, and an air of mystery hanging over either the actor or the author. When the poet unites both characters in his own person, we are disposed to examine his narrative by the maxims of experience; and our voluntary delusion cannot, without the greatest difficulty, be supported.

2. Rutilius's voyage is read with pleasure; it is interesting and useful; but why was it written in verse? Poetry seems equally to misbecome the subject and the genius of the author. The narrative of a voyage comes very properly from a philopher, a man of parts, or a fine writer, but has no connexion with verse. When we attempt to adorn with numbers a subject plain and simple, it is scarcely possible that our style should not be either unpoetical or improper. The subject requires ease, perspicuity, precision, and some ornaments introduced seasonably, and with a sparing hand. But the poet, in order to affect his reader with enthusiasm, must first feel it himself; he must aim at energy of expression and harmony of numbers; and be willing to sacrifice to them all beauties of an inferior order. The language of poetry suits only those strong passions of the soul, by which it was originally produced; and he who attempts to employ this language on topics which leave the mind in tranquillity, will find himself between two rocks, on one of which he must be shipwrecked; the brilliancy of his expression will either misbecome the simplicity of his thoughts, or the tameness of his words and phrases will disgrace the dignity of verse. All these reflexions are applicable to Rutilius's voyage. His thoughts are ingenious, artfully arranged, and expressed with clearness, precision, and taste. But his poetry is mean and creeping, destitute of strength, and devoid of harmony. We see that he distrusts his natural vigour, and has recourse to contrivances of art; contrivances weak and common, scarcely pardonable in great authors, and for which they seldom stand in need of pardon. 1. Rutilius seems to have thought that swelling words, which best filled the mouth, were also most pleasing to the ear. But I wish such words were resigned to Oriental poets, of whom only they are not unworthy. I doubt whether *Bellerophonteis sollicitudinibus be ever quoted, except on account of the singularity that two words should compose a pentameter verse. 2. He is bold even to licentiousness in forming new words, or giving new combinations to the old. What can be more forced than using connubium for consilium?† I am pleased however with his epithet legiferi, applied to the Roman triumphs. Laws, order, and civilitywere produced by those triumphs, and were their ordinary fruits. 3. I thought

* Rutil. Iter. l. i. 450. † Idem, l. i. 18.

thought that I had discovered some rhymes,* but they are too few to enable us to determine whether they ought to be ascribed to negligence, or were the effect of that bad taste, which the corruption of language and connexion with the barbarians, who were fond of rhyme, gradually introduced among the Romans.

3. Authors describe themselves in their works: a maxim as true as it is ancient. We may add that the shades which appear in the picture, certainly were to be found in the original. The character of Rutilius appears to me to have been amiable. I perceive a love for his country, especially in its adversity; a heart susceptible of friendship, and a tender and respectful regard for the memory of his father. Are so many good qualities to suffer a total eclipse from a little too much va nity? Rutilius reviews the stages of his greatness with complacence; his country, his friends, and his father, are endeared to him by their connexion with his own honours. His vanity is contemptible. Cicero boasted not of being consul, but of saving the republic in his consulship. Men may be more easily pardoned for being proud of their actions and talents, than for valuing themselves on their employments and titles, the vain and frivolous distinctions of society. Rutilius detested the Jews, and despised the monks. Was this in him a crime? I could wish indeed that his feelings had been expressed with more philosophical moderation, and

* Rutil. Iter. l. i. 39. 107, &c.

had

had rested on a better principle. But he was a Pagan who beheld his religion sinking under the weight of years, and involving the empire in its fall. The Christians insulted the decline of his sect, which they endeavoured to hasten by persecution. A little bad humour was excusable. Nothing can be more animated than his description of the monks in the isle of Capraria, or more judicious than the reflexions with which it is accompanied. The folly of these monks is extreme, in thinking that God took pleasure in the sufferings of his creatures: but their conduct was conformable with their principles. Had Rutilius lived in the twelfth century, what would he have said of their successors, who availed themselves of their voluntary poverty and humility, to acquire the esteem of the multitude, and of that esteem to appropriate to themselves temporal power, and half the riches of Europe?

Dec. 20th.]—I read the Journal des Savans, for the months of January, February, and March, 1763. I can hardly express how much I am delighted with this Journal; its characteristics are erudition, precision, and taste; but what I most admire is that impartiality and candour which distinguish the beauties and defects of a work, giving to the former due and hearty praise, and calmly and tenderly pointing out the latter. This Journal, the father of all the rest, is still their superior: of late it must have acquired the help of some new labourers. I should like to know the author of an excellent piece, an analysis and criticism of the new tragedy of Zelmire. There is nothing to be wished wished for in this Journal but a little more boldness and philosophy; but it is published under the Chancellor's eye.

Dec. 23d.]—I read two detached pieces of Virgil, of great importance in geography. The first is the review of Turnus's army, l. vii. v. 641—817: the second, an account of the succours which Æneas received from Etruria, lib. x. v. 163—214.*

24th.]—I read with the same design the review of the Roman army by Silius Italicus, before the battle of Cannæ; Bell. Punic. lib. vii. v. 334—623. I read it over again, rather to engrave it on my memory, than to please my fancy.†

25th.]—I read the fifth Satire of the first Book of Horace, containing his journey to Brundusium. Geography rather than poetry was my object. This satire gave occasion to some reflexions on the journies of the ancients in general, which I have collected,‡ and from which the reader will see with how little foundation Mr. Addison estimates the ordinary day's journey of a Roman nobleman at fourteen miles.

26th.]—I read several dissertations in the twenty-sixth Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres, relative to my present pursuit.—Memoirs of Mr. d'Anville on the Roman Mile, p. 346—362. The result is drawn by this learned man from a number of particular miles measured on the Æmilian way, and in the neighbourhood of Milan. He makes the Roman mile 756 fathoms

* See vol. iv. p. 327, &c. † Ib. p. 333.

‡ These reflexions will be found in vol. iv. p. 335, &c.

long.

long.—Remarks on some Points of Ancient Geography, by Mr. de la Nauze, p. 362—397. He treats, 1. Of the distance between Rome and Aricia: it was certainly 16 Roman miles, or 128 stadia. Though Strabo makes it 160 stadia, this must be imputed either to his ignorance, or the fault of his transcribers, and by no means to his reckoning by a particular stadium in the neighbourhood of Rome. 2. Pliny agrees with Strabo in making the distance from Hydruntum to the coast of Epirus 50 Roman miles. 3. There were two kinds of stadia; the ancient of ten, and the modern of eight, to a Roman mile. This distinction is a necessary one, but unfortunately it only substitutes uncertainty for difficulty. 4. Until the time of Augustus, the miles were reckoned from the gates of Rome; and the first mile-stone only denoted the commencement of a mile; but when that prince erected the gilt pillar in the Forum, the mile-stone at the gates denoted the end of a mile; but that mile depended on the distance of the Forum from the several gates, and contained two or three miles.

Dec. 27th.]—I read the Abbé Barthelemy's Memoir on the Ancient Monuments of Rome, in the twenty-sixth volume, p. 579—611, of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres. It is replete with taste, erudition, and good sense; worthy of this amiable scholar, whom I knew well at Paris. I was present last year at the public meeting of the Academy, after the Easter holidays. The Abbé was to read a discourse on the Coptic. This was was known beforehand; and every body blamed the choice of so thorny a subject, that was fitter to be discussed at the Academy's private meetings. But our pleasure was heightened by surprise, when we perceived that the Abbé rendered his subject interesting to his audience of people of fashion and women, by the beauties of his style, the delicacy of his criticisms, and his principles of reasoning as perspicuous as they were solid.

Dec. 30th.]—There remained for me nothing to read concerning the ancient geography of Italy, except the books of Strabo on that subject. I read l. iv. p. 139—144, and l. v. p. 145—157, in Xylander's Latin translation revised by Casaubon. Strabo there treats of Venetia, Cisalpine Gaul, the Alps, Liguria, Etruria, and Umbria.

31st.]—I read Strabo's Geography, l. iv. p. 157—173, and l. vi. p. 174—199; having skipped over that part which relates to Sicily. I have always been an admirer of Strabo's good sense, and variety of knowledge. Antiquity has left us more brilliant performances than his; but I know of none more solid and more useful.

Jan. 1st, 1764.]—In the month of January I began to read Ovid's Fasti, in the Dauphin edition. Purposing to add the study of medals and antiquities to that of geography, I thought this didactic poem, containing the whole Roman mythology, would be a good introduction to those pursuits. As a poem, this work by no means corresponds to the favourable opinion which I had conceived of it, from the commendations of ancient and modern critics; critics; but this is not the place for considering it in that light. The edition is that of Crispin, a Swiss, in the service of the Dauphin. Bishop Huet had good reason to complain of negligence in selecting competent persons for executing M. de Montausier's excellent design. This edition is handsome, well-printed, and carefully corrected. The bookseller has done his part well; but this is far from being the case with the editor. His notes are below criticism. They are fit only for a school boy, who would often be bewildered by their absurdity. To render them completely ridiculous, they wanted only a copious apparatus of morality, and even of theology, as a fit appendage to the poem of a Pagan and a libertine. The author has taken care to supply that defect. His explanation might have been useful, had he substituted common for uncommon words; and simple for poetical phrases. But Crispin's interpretation is at once swollen and prosaic; equally unfit for displaying Ovid's beauties, and for making his meaning understood. It has been justly remarked, that those enormous indexes, which commonly make a fourth part of the Dauphin editions, ought to have been employed in pointing out the delicacies and idioms of the language or author, and not in enumerating how many times he uses et and qui in their common signification. Mr. Crispin has prefixed an ancient calendar to the Fasti: he confesses that it does not agree with Ovid's; he had not time to reconcile them. Every thing disgusts us in this edition, even to the mode of reference; which is to the page, and not to the book; which prevents the possibility of verifying the quotations.

to

I read four volumes of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée; the 36th, 37th, 38th, and 39th. Not having the 36th at hand, and retaining but a confused notion of its contents, I shall speak only of one article with which I was highly pleased. This is a learned and curious Dissertation concerning the pretended Martyrdom of the Thebæan Legion. The author insists with great force on the improbability of the fact, and the silence of contemporary writers. He investigates the origin of a fable, so useful to the church of St. Maurice in the Valley, and traces it back to Eucher, Bishop of Lyons, who lived a century and a half after Diocletian, and who first related it on the authority of a vague and obscure report. It appears that some legionary soldiers with their officer had, about that time, suffered martyrdom in Syria. But Fame, in bringing this transaction to the West, magnified them into a complete legion entirely composed of Christians.

The 37th volume contains a Letter concerning the food of the first men. The question is as idle as it is vague and obscure. I do not see the necessity of making them leave off vegetables so soon. The earth must have been slowly peopled with men and animals; and for a long time must have supplied all living tribes with such abundant nourishment as precluded the necessity of their devouring each other. At length, animals became formidable to man, who was in danger of starving.

But

But nothing short of urgent danger could overcome his natural repugnance to the shedding of blood. Are five or six generations sufficient for producing all these revolutions?—Description of the East, by Mr. Pocock: learned and curious. The houses of the first inhabitants of Egypt are still to be seen in the Thebaid, in the hollows of rocks. Magnificence improved the works of necessity. The arts of the Egyptians bore no relation to those of Greece. The latter, harmonised by proportions, were bold and liberal; the former, enslaved by caprice, were extravagant rather than original.—Epistolary Correspondence between Leibnitz and John Bernouilli. It is a pleasure to contemplate these two vigorous minds: the force and depth of the one; the variety, extent, and penetration of the other.—The History of New France, by Father Charlevoix: well written, curious, and unfaithful.—History of Lewis XI. by Mr. Duclos. Lewis XI. is an uninteresting object; his age quite the reverse. But Mr. Duclos has shewn us only the prince, and neglected the history of his age. Virgil's Georgicks, translated into English by Martyn: useful for its knowledge of the plants mentioned by Virgil.

The 38th volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée contains the Harleian Miscellany, vol. iii. We meet with the Process of Nicholas Antony, burnt at Geneva in 1632, not for inventing a new heresy, but for preferring the Jewish religion to the Christian. It forms the counterpart to the history of Servetus.—Description of Iceland, by Mr. Anderson.

derson. The country and the manners of its inhabitants are equally strange: Death only can make them quit this wretched island.—The Necessity of Public Worship, by Mr. de la Chapelle, in answer to an anonymous Letter. Mr. de la Chapelle's adversary is a minister in the Pays de Vaud, of the name of Allamand, and never did I know a man of a finer genius. His mind embraced all kinds of learning, but philosophy was his principal study. On all questions, he had contrived systems, at least arguments, equally new and ingenious. His ideas were refined and perspicuous; his expression natural and happy. He was justly reproached with too much subtilty of thought, with pride, ambition, and excessive warmth of temper. This man, qualified to enlighten or disturb a nation, lived and died in obscurity. He left nothing in writing, excepting a few short performances in answer to questions put to him.—Travels into Egypt, by Mr. Granger: bold, but superficial. The canals of the ancient kings carried the waters of the Nile and fertility into all the provinces of Egypt. These canals are not kept in repair by the Turks. The country has lost its fruitfulness; and Mr. Granger gives the lie to all ancient writers, who declare that it formerly was fruitful.—A Poem of Peter Ebuto, on the Troubles of Sicily in the Reign of the Emperor Henry VI. published from the library of Berne by Mr. Engel. The work is curious: poetry is the history of barbarous ages; and has then all the circumstantial minuteness which history requires.—" Letters of a Frenchman," true;

true; " on the English," false. Poor Abbé le Blanc!

The 39th volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée contains a letter of the librarian of Geneva, on a singular bull of Clement VI. Singular indeed! This bull is a permission, granted in 1354, to all the confessors of all the kings of France, to grant dispensations to their sovereigns from the obligation of oaths which it might be inconvenient for them to observe. The librarian's reflexions and researches throw much light on the authenticity, the character, the object, and the style of this bull. This letter is written with moderation and taste.—Amintor and Theodora, by Mr. Mallet. If my friend should ever attain poetic fame, it will be acquired by this work. Mr. Maty furnished the extract, which pleased Mallet so much that he requested his friendship. This anecdote I learned from both parties.—Travels into Western Gothland, by Mr. Linnæus; and into Siberia, by Mr. Gimelin. These two works, the latter especially, which opens to us an unknown world, do much honour to the sovereigns of the North.—The Works of Virgil, with the Commentaries of Heinsius and Peter Burman. As this is the latest, so it is the best edition of Virgil and Servius.—Haller's Poems, translated from the German: distinguished by a rich imagination, energy of style, and an air of philosophy, which he has thought fit to lay aside. —Theory of agreeable Sentiments, by Mr. de Pouilly. Unity and variety are the sources of our pleasures. The idea seems to be just; but it has not not enough either of novelty or precision to deserve being expanded into a book. I read also Lady Mary Wortley Montague's Letters, just published. They contain an account of a journey in which she accompanied her husband in his embassy to Constantinople; and are lively and entertaining. I am most pleased with what she says concerning those inner apartments into which men are not allowed to penetrate. She maintains that the Turkish women enjoy a great deal of liberty, and walk out alone veiled, as often as they please, on pretence of going to the bath or the mosque. The Turks marry only one wife: and though some use the permission of concubinage with slaves, they are regarded as libertines, and forsaken by their wives. She studied the Turkish language; and speaks in high terms of the Turkish music and poetry. The manners, customs, and genius of the Greeks seem to her to have undergone little change since the days of Homer.

Feb. 1st.]—I read Ovid's Fasti, l. iv. p. 599—610. The festival of Palilia is an object of much attention; it is different from that of the foundation of Rome, though both happened on the same day, the 21st of April. To what extravagances is not the human mind liable! Purify a nation! and that too with the blood of a horse, the husk of a bean, and the ashes of the bowels of a calf killed in the belly of its mother, and burnt on the altar of Vesta. Ovid clearly justifies the founder of Rome from the guilt of killing his brother. Remus was put to death in consequence of a wise law made by his brother, and which this prince unintentionally violated. If Romulus did not shew grief for his death, this was to maintain the inviolable sanctity of his laws, a thing necessary in his infant kingdom.

Feb. 2d.]—I read Ovid's Fasti, l. v. p. 610—620. His account of the different etymologies of the month of May is curious, and well expressed. We may distinguish in it an Oriental allegory, a Greek fable, and a Roman tradition. The issuing of the gods from chaos, and the majesty of Olympus arranging the celestial hierarchy, is sublimely extravagant. The picture of the Muses is well delineated; but Ovid should have remembered that these infallible divinities were always of one mind.

3d.]—I read Ovid's Fasti, l. v. p. 620—630. He explains the origin of the Floral games in a manner less dishonourable for his religion. It is not credible that any people should have erected altars to a harlot. It was enough for them to celebrate the festival of a goddess, in whom they already believed, by the dances of naked girls. All the ceremonies of this goddess savoured of debauchery; but the season productive of flowers too naturally inspires those with licentious sentiments who have never heard of the courtesan Flora. Why have recourse to fable for what may be found in nature?

I read Ovid's Fasti, l. v. p. 630—643. The poet's genius ennobles every object; even nine black beans thrown behind the back, to which he gives an air of solemnity, and even of sublimity. He chiefly employs that doubtful and faint colouring ing which renders objects more terrible, by shewing them partially and confusedly; silence, obscurity, the shadow which follows us with light steps, and which we dare not look behind us to see; all these touches belong to that kind of sublimity which is well pointed out by Mr. Burke.* The temple of Jupiter the Avenger must have been magnificent. The worship of the Pagans had at least more consistency than that of the Catholics. Mars the Avenger punishes the murderers of a great warrior, his descendant. This is more natural than the interference of an apostle or hermit in wars and victories; and wars often undertaken merely for worldly interests.

Feb. 6th.]—I went to the library to consult the article Flora in Bayle's Dictionary. Lactantius too well imitates the fathers of his age. The Floral games, founded A. U. C. 514, first celebrated occasionally, afterwards rendered annual in 580, by an order of the senate, and their expense defrayed by money levied in fines; all this has not any resemblance to the testamentary arrangement of a courtesan.

7th.]—I read Ovid's Fasti, l. vi. p. 648—687, the conclusion of the book, and of all that part of the work which has come down to us. The six other books, which completed the Roman calendar, have perished. The beginning of the sixth book is beautiful. The dispute of the three goddesses is more pleasing, because borrowed from that of Paris and Mount Ida. Juno's speech is also cast in the same mould with that in the first book of the Æneid; but the amiable Hebe expresses herself with those graces that are peculiar to Ovid.

* Upon the Sublime and Beautiful.

Feb. 8th.]—I read a little pamphlet of thirty-eight pages, by John James Rousseau. It contains an abstract of Plato's arguments against imitative poetry, especially the drama. I was astonished at the weakness and falseness of the whole first part, which treats of the imperfection of imitation. Towards the conclusion, his reasonings are more specious. I acknowledge that the theatre, and especially that of Athens, sometimes paints its heroes too weak and too much alive to their misfortunes. But some indulgence must be granted to humanity, which groans in secret, or pours its grief into the bosom of a friend. The spectators are indeed confidents of the poet, but not of his characters.

9th.]—While I waited for the sequel of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée, I read an excellent work on the Method and Choice of our Studies, by the Abbé Fleury; Paris, 1753, in 12*mo. pp.* 364. The whole breathes a spirit of truth and virtue, together with that clearness and strength of reason, and that superior good sense, which is more uncommon than wit, and almost as rare as genius. The author was a Roman Catholic and a priest; but this fault is perceived by those only who are neither the one nor the other. He begins by the history of education in different countries, of which he gives us a beautiful picture. That of the Greeks alone was philosophical and national. The want of an accurate education among the Romans was supplied by virtue and natural good sense. The studies of the barbarians of the North were as barbarous as themselves. To ages of ignorance succeeded those of the pretended philosophy of Aristotle, the Arabs and scholastics. The humanists of the fifteenth century revived the knowledge of the ancients. From all these united, is composed that chaos of learning taught in our universities and colleges, alike destitute of system, order, and utility. The Abbé Fleury, who wishes to bring down science from the heavens to the earth, proposes a plan equally short and reasonable, the care of the body and the mind, with the knowledge of economy and laws. A Frenchman justly reckons history and politics among those studies which are rather curious than useful. The citizen of a free country regards them as indispensable. To this treatise the Abbé Fleury has added a Discourse on Plato. He despises both his physics and metaphysics; but sets the highest value on his logic, morals, style, and method.

rate

Feb. 10th.]—I read over with care the six books of Ovid's Fasti; and have written the reflexions, which occurred to me in the perusal. See Vol. IV. p. 354.

11th.]—I began to read Mr. Addison's charming little Treatise on ancient Medals, in the third volume of his Works, London, 1746. I read p. 1—113. He considers the different advantages that may be derived from the study of medals; and dwells on the striking connexion between their reverses and the descriptions of Latin poets. In this view, he examines two series of medals; the one containing allegorical personages, and the other enigmatic symbols. Each class furnishes him with twenty examples. The passages of the poets are selected with taste; and the author's reflexions are replete with judgment and sagacity. No man ever benefited more than Mr. Addison by the study of the Belles Lettres. His works have much contributed to improve the English language and literature.

Feb. 12th.]—I finished Addison's work, Dialogues upon the Usefulness of ancient Medals; p. 113—167: besides which, the plates take up sixty-eight pages. The third series of examples contains the representation of countries on medals: it is curious. Mr. Addison has a third dialogue, in which the parallel is drawn between ancient and modern medals; rather flattering for the ancients. In the first dialogue, the author sets out well; his characters are well marked; and the whole has the air of a free conversation among polite and learned friends: but the two following dialogues might as well have been called letters or essays. Pope's epistle is worthy of himself; but the inscription on his imaginary medal of Craggs, filling six verses, would not have been relished by Addison.* It is a bad compliment to a didactic work, to violate, in commending it, the most important precept which it contains.

* V. Dialog. iii. p. 154—156.

I began

I began Spanheim's noble work de Præstantia et Usu Numismatum, in two volumes, 4to. Amsterdam. This is not the best edition; but I make use of it till I receive that of London, 1708, from Geneva. I read the Preface and Dissertation I. p. 1—49, on the beauty and entertainment of medallic knowledge: and Dissertation II. p. 49—68, on the assistance which it may afford to grammarians in ascertaining the letters and orthography of ancient languages. I finished some reflexions on Ovid's Fasti. See Vol. IV. p. 354.

Feb. 13th.]—I wrote some remarks concerning the allegorical personages on medals. See Vol. V. p. 35.

I read Spanheim, de Usu et Præstantia Numismatum, Dissert. II. p. 68—93. It contains the sequel of his grammatical observations. They are curious, but rather dry. Spanheim forgets his politeness in refuting Tristan. The latter's mistake indeed was a most absurd one.

I finished the fortieth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Dr. Middleton's Treatise on the Roman Senate. The question concerning the mode of entering into the Roman senate appears to me capable of an easy answer. The nomination belonged successively to the kings, consuls, and censors. But as they always named the questors, their right of naming gradually became of less value as the questors became more numerous, and was reduced to a mere formality, when their number became sufficient to supply that of the senate.

nate.—History of Sweden, by Mr. Dalin, in Swedish. This is a new country. Two thousand years ago the mountains of Sweden, as well as those of Denmark, stood in an archipelago of little islands intersected by canals and straits. The sea retired, and still continues to retire, the space of fifty inches, each century. It is thought also that the ocean, which covered a far greater surface towards the beginning of the Roman empire, opened a communication with the Caspian Sea. This circumstance, and a climate milder than the present, facilitated the emigrations of the Scythians. Their most celebrated colony travelled to the North in the year of J. C. 100, under the conduct of Odin, a Scythian from the banks of the Tanais. This legislator of the North resided at Upsal, the seat of his religion and empire. His successors, both kings and priests, were masters of a fine country, and respected by the other kings of the nation. They reigned at Upsal till A. C. 870. Their family was not extinct in Norway till 1060.

Feb. 15th.]—I read Spanheim, de Præstantia et Usu Numismatum, Dissert. II. p. 93—112: and found it a tiresome declamation on the morality and policy to be learned from medals; in which the author has contrived to introduce all the technical medallic terms. Why does he justify the senate for removing the only check that remained on the tyranny of the emperors? They praised them, he says, to shew to them the road of virtue and glory. This excuse was good in the first year of Domitian's reign; but was good for nothing in the the fifteenth. Besides, what new praise was kept in reserve for Trajan?

Feb. 16th.]—I read Spanheim, de Præstantia Numismatum, Dissert. II. p. 112—122. He describes the advantages which natural history may derive from medals. I saw with pleasure the proof of what I had said in my Essay on the subjects of the Circus and Amphitheatre.

I finished the forty-first volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Anson's Voyage, first and second Extract. I know few books that are more amusing; but the hero is painted in too flattering colours. When afterwards raised to the first employments of state, he was unable to support the weight of his renown. One praise indeed belongs to him, that of choosing and employing merit. Brett, Saunders, Rodney, and Keppel are among those whom he brought forward and educated.—Mr. le Moine's Treatise on Miracles. Such a work tends to injure the cause of religion which it endeavours to support. How ill qualified are we to ascertain the powers of nature, and of angels! Do we know exactly the extent of those belonging to our fellow-creatures?—Morals. The enemies of Revelation can no longer be accused of hostility to natural religion. Poor Toussaint is now the editor of the Brussels Gazette. Strange employment for a philosopher!—Penelope's Web, or Machiavel Physician, by Mr. de la Metrie: a severe, ingenious, and learned satire against the faculty in Paris, particularly Astruc, Sylva, Chirac, and Winslow.

Feb.

Feb. 17th.]—This morning was lost, except that I found time to read Spanheim, de Præstantia Numismatum, Dissert. III. p. 166—196. He continues the same subject; panthers, serpents, dolphins. The part respecting serpents, those ministers of oracles, and tutelary genii, is particularly curious.

18th.]—In the evening I read a tale in verse, which was lent to me, just published by Voltaire. What most pleases Women? Command. The design is borrowed from Pope's Wife of Bath. The narrative is rather diffuse, and the verses have not that natural ease and briskness which is an essential requisite. I borrowed at the same time the Panegyric of the Duke of Sully, by Mr. Thomas: a performance which gained the prize proposed by the French Academy.

19th.]—Instead of continuing Spanheim, I resumed my Geographical Collection on Italy, which I wish to put out of hand. I wrote two pages and an half of it, on Etruria.

I finished Sully's Panegyric. Mr. Thomas is a great orator. What strength of thought, what rapidity of style! He has the soul of a citizen, the sense of a philosopher, and the pencil of a great painter. His manner is that of Demosthenes, but of Demosthenes who has sacrificed to the graces. United with the pomp of eloquence, we find an accurate detail of particulars, which are never minute when they are well chosen and well expressed; and that historical truth which always embellishes the panegyric of every man entitled to public praise.

praise. The parallel of Sully with Colbert is not drawn with flattery, scarcely with equity, towards the former. Mr. Thomas dwells too long on the comparison of the difficulties which these two ministers had respectively to encounter. The horrors of the League, forty years of civil war, enthusiasm and independence in the public mind, and eight hundred millions of debt; these were difficulties incomparably greater than the caprices of the Fronde, some extortions on the part of Cardinal Mazarine, a nation destitute of either principles or leaders of rebellion, and long weary of domestic disturbances. Mr. Thomas does not always remember that a panegyric ought to hold the middle place between a history and a funeral oration. Perhaps the strength and sublimity of his style, replete with images as bold as they are natural, might have enabled him to dispense with comparisons, apostrophes, and all those figures, which more properly belong to poetry. I am certain he would have done well to omit his comparison of Sully's operations with those of eternal wisdom; a species of false sublime which can only tend to degrade both the compared objects.

Feb. 20th.]—I wrote a page and a half of my Geographical Collection on the Tiber, and the rivers which flow into it.

I finished the forty-second volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. If we consider only Mr. Ellis's Voyage to Hudson's Bay, the existence of a north-west passage will appear very doubtful. Be that as it may, the Company will always endeavour to prevent prevent its discovery.—An Essay, by Mr. Deslandes, on the Marine of the Ancients. The ancients never made use of any but trireme gallies, that is, vessels with three tire of oars of different lengths. The quadriremes, &c. had decks above these barns of oars, provided with machines of war; but they had only three tire of oars.—Maclaurin's Account of Sir Isaac Newton's Discoveries. A work admired by all mathematicians. I hope to be able at some future time to bestow on it enlightened approbation.—Narrative of a Voyage to Peru, by Mr. Boucher. The Cordilleras form the highest chain of mountains in the world. The top of Chimboraco is 3217 fathoms above the sea: at the height of 2400 the snow never melts. The province of Quito, though a valley in the Cordilleras, is the highest inhabited country known. Subsisting monuments still attest the former greatness of the Incas. We yet behold the vestiges of the causeway extending 400 leagues from Cusco to Quito.—The Harleian Miscellany, vol. vi. contains the sequel of a work distinguished by the spirit of sound philosophy. From the axiom that the Eternal Being is all-sufficient in himself, a religion is deduced, free from superstition, contradictions, and eternal punishments.—Travels in Turkey and Persia, by Mr. Otter: curious, but dry.—The Happy Life, by Mr. de la Metrie: the work of a fool, whose laughter is poisonous.—Remarks on Bayle's Dictionary. Intolerant superstition is more dangerous than impiety.

Feb. 24th.]—I wrote a page and an half of my Geo-

Geographical Collection, on the subject of Umbria. I begin to put the materials in order, belonging to each region of Italy, which will be of much use to me. I finished the forty-third volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Leibnizii Protogea: a posthumous work of this great man, on the original structure of the earth. Chaos first reigned; a conflagration melted the mass; and different substances acquired different degrees of hardness from fluid water to vitrified gems, in proportion to the time they were in cooling.—The History of the Office of Stadtholder, and of the Parliament of England, by the Abbé Raynal. The pictures which he draws are filled with pretty antitheses.—The History of Jovian, and the Translation of some Works of Julian, by the Abbé de la Bleterie: admirable, in point of erudition, taste, elegance, and I will add, moderation. Julian was a Pagan, but the Abbé hates only the Jesuits.—The Spirit of Laws. What occasion was there to speak of it here?—Lord Bolingbroke's Patriot King. This lord had strength and elevation of mind; but he was a sorry philosopher.—Middleton's Free Inquiry into the Miracles, &c. This man was endowed with penetration and accuracy. He saw where his principles led; but he did not think proper to draw the consequences.

Feb. 26th.]—I wrote three pages of my Geographical Collection, on the subject of Samnium. I have now finished the country of the Sabines, and a part of the territories of the Marsi.

27th.]—I wrote two pages of the chapter Samnium nium in my Geographical Collection, describing the lake Fucinus, and the countries of the Equi and Peligni.

I also read Spanheim, de Usu et Præstantia Numismatum, Dissert. III. p. 196—245. He treats of fabulous animals, the sphinx, hydra, sirenes, the birds of Stymphalus, the phœnix, &c. We may perceive that the genius of the Greeks, romantic as it was, employed itself rather in embellishment than invention. The sphinx was originally an Ethiopian ape, which the inhabitants of Thebais chose for the symbol of mystery, and placed at the gates of their temples.

Feb. 28th.]—I read in Spanheim only Dissert. III. p. 245—253. He treats of monsters and hieroglyphics, whose names are unknown.

I finished the forty-fourth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Bower's Lives of the Popes; first and second Extract. The beginnings of Christian Rome are at least as obscure and fabulous as those of the Pagan. The author is reproached with making a partial and ill-digested compilation of papal biography. He is a rogue unmasked, who enjoyed, for twenty years, the favour of the public, because he had quitted a sect to which he still secretly adhered; and because he had been a counsellor of the inquisition in the town of Macerata, where an inquisition never existed.—The free Voice of a Citizen. When a king of Poland writes on the constitution of his country, we should not expect to find the trite topics of a rhetorician, or the speculative dreams of a pedant.

—A

—A Treatise on Systems, by the Abbé Condillac: judicious, and abounding with fine thoughts; but the Abbé sometimes confounds theory and truths flowing from a few general principles, with those practical arts which require talents and experience, and which from their nature are liable to great uncertainty.—The Toleration of the Asiatics: truths common and important, expressed with much boldness.—The Art of hatching Eggs, &c. by Mr. Réaumur. That proposed is sure and easy. This author will make me in love with natural history. How extraordinary an instinct is that of the chicken, which employs itself half a day in the difficult work of its own birth!—Essay on Moral Philosophy, by Mr. Maupertuis. No; you are not able to make me hate life.

The Eloge of Mr. Schultens. This learned man preferred the Jews too much to the Arabians.

March 1st.]—I read Spanheim, Dissert. IV. p. 253—265. From animals, he proceeds to plants, and particularly the lotus, with which the Egyptian medals often crown their kings, gods, and sacred animals.

2d.]—I read Spanheim, Dissert. IV. p. 265—310. He still treats of the plants represented on medals.

I finished the forty-fifth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Edmond's Negotiations, published by Dr. Birch: curious, in as far as it relates to the character, last years, and death of Queen Elizabeth.—Memoirs of Brandenburgh. They are well written; but the memoirs of the author himself—how impatiently do I expect them!—Treatise on Ice, by Mr. Mairan: judicious and profound. I perceived, as well as the journal-writer, that causes ought not to be multiplied without necessity; and that fire set in motion is sufficient without the subtile matter.—Natural History, by Mr. de Buffon: a great painter, and an original genius. The reviewer endeavours to defend the deluge; but confesses that shells are found in the mountains only at the elevation of six hundred feet.—A Collection of Pieces of Eloquence of the French Academy: vox et præterea nihil.—The History of Sweden, by Mr. Dalin, in Swedish, Vol. ii. Superstition and clerical power reached the highest pitch in Sweden. At the time of their conversion, the Swedes adopted the whole papal system, and became Christians after the fashion of the twelfth century. They could not plead the authority of any ancient traditions; their history furnished them not with any argument against the Roman faith, and their ignorance hindered them from seeking such arguments in the history of other nations, in reason, or in scripture.—Parallel of the Arundelian Marbles with the Egyptian Chronicles. I perceive that the author, the Abbé Richer du Bouchet, has a great contempt for these marbles; and that he is deep in Manethon. All his discoveries are connected with a general system of chronology, which he does not explain. I do not expect much from it.

March 3d.]—I read Spanheim, Dissert. IV. p. 310—340; and Dissert. V. p. 340—344. He concludes cludes the article of plants; I am glad of it; they are but little connected with medals: Spanheim was not a botanist, nor do I wish to become one. I have now finished the most interesting part of his work. The second dissertation is dry, but useful: his declamations on morals and politics might be reduced to ten pages; and from the two last dissertations I would select only a few facts, cleared from all circumstances foreign to the subject.

March 4th.]—I read Spanheim, Dissert. V. p. 344—373. This part is replete with erudition, and enters into many curious particulars concerning the horns which adorn the head of Ammon, Juno, Bacchus, Rivers, Alexander, and his successors.

5th.]—I glanced over the New Aretin. Gross ignorance, blackguard buffoonery, and impertinent reasonings, which have not even the merit of novelty, disgrace this wretched performance, which would be thrown by with disgust, did it not attack religion with the most shocking indecency.

6th.]—I finished the forty-sixth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Suetonius, by Oudendorp. The edition is good, but unnecessary after that of Grævius. Why are the excellent commentaries of Torrentius and Casaubon omitted? —Memoirs of Queen Christina: a curious work, and of immense industry.—Memoirs of the Academy of Petersburgh. All the institutions of the Russians ought to be well contrived, and skilfully proportioned. They may be made at one cast, from models highly improved among their neighbours.—A New Historical and Critical Dictionary, by Mr. de Chaufepié: the learning and accuracy of Bayle, without his philosophy and genius.

March 9th.]—I wrote three pages and an half of my Geographical Collection. I have now finished the chapter on Samnium, by a complete abridgment of what concerns the Samnites and the Duchy of Beneventum. I have also begun the chapter on Apulia; and finished the first division, viz. the territory of the Hirpini.

10th.]—I wrote nearly four pages of my Geographical Collection; containing the remainder of Apulia. There is a pretty extensive article on Tarentum.

I finished the forty-seventh volume of Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Critical Memoirs on the Swiss, by Mr. de Bochart; turning on the vain and futile science of etymology.—Wetstein's New Testament. The Alexandrian manuscript appears to have been written in Egypt towards the end of the fifth century.—Letters on Jubilees, by Mr. Le Chais: learned and philosophical.—Monogamy, by Mr. de Premontval. Why should religion be introduced into a question depending on calculation and circumstances?—Defence of Christianity, by Dr. Stebbing. He is a good polemic, but embraces too wide a field; the outermost works should be relinquished.—Moses defended against Appian, by the Abbé Richer du Bouchet. He still throws an air of mystery over his chronological system. I speak speak not decidedly, but to me he appears a little of a visionary. 1. He speaks of the Egyptian dynasties as he would of the court of Lewis XIV.; shewing too much confidence and certainty on a subject, which admits only of probability and conjecture. 2. When he investigates the key to Manethon's historical fragment, he quits the road of criticism, but gives us to understand that this knot can be unravelled only by geometrical analysis. Does not this savour of madness? 3. Esau and Osiris! Their identity, I see, is the foundation of his system. How easily might it be refuted! No two princes, if Osiris was really a prince, had ever less resemblance.

March 11th.]—I wrote two pages of the chapter on Lucania in my Geographical Collection; comprehending almost the whole of Lucania properly so called.

12th.]—I wrote two pages on the chapter of Lucania, comprehending the rest of proper Lucania and a part of Bruttium.

13th.]—I wrote only three quarters of a page of my chapter on Lucania, being a continuation of Bruttium.

14th.]—I read a new work by Voltaire; Treatise on Toleration. The end is commendable; to awaken in the soul the feelings of humanity, and display the dreadful consequences of superstition. But in point of execution this work is a trifling collection of common-place remarks, in which the author expatiates rather on every other topic than the great principles belonging to his subject. I am diverted with his false and contradictory conclusions concerning ancient history. This history, he says, is filled with prodigies. They cannot be true; therefore ancient history consists merely of fables and conjectures.* Again, this history is filled with prodigies: we are obliged to believe them; therefore the principles of nature, as well as of men, were quite different then from what they are at present.† He calls in question the infamous debaucheries of Tiberius in the island of Capreæ. Yet Tacitus and Suetonius were almost the contemporaries of that prince. I perceive not any marks of hatred in their works. They often justify Tiberius, and distinguish with as much penetration as honesty the different stages of the dissimulation, cruelty, and public debaucheries of that emperor. The abominable licentiousness of those times is well known; and it is not matter of surprise that Tiberius should refuse nothing to his appetites, when he had the unbounded power of gratifying them with impunity, especially when they were concealed by his retirement from the public eye, which is the only restraint on the behaviour of a despot. As for those refinements in debauchery which astonish Voltaire, it is precisely in an old profligate of seventy that I should expect to meet with them.‡

March 15th.]—I finished the forty-eighth volume

* Traité sur la Tolérance, c. ix. N. c. p. 71—75.

† Idem, c. xii. p. 127—129.

‡ Idem, c. viii. p. 59—63.

of

of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains the Discoveries made at Herculaneum, by the Marquis Venuti. This ancient city, which deserved to be examined more accurately and faithfully, was found at the depth of seventy-three feet under many successive beds of earth and vitrified stone. Herculaneum was but an obscure place; yet it was adorned by a theatre three hundred feet in circumference, raised on brick pilasters, covered with a beautiful varnish, and ornamented with cornices of marble.—Letters on Jubilees. It is difficult to distinguish with theologians between the defilement of sin and its punishment. In the church of the Feuillans at Paris, indulgences may be procured, in the space of one Lent, for 150,000 years.—Essay on Spirit. This work of the Bishop of Clogher contains a metaphysical Arianism.—Dissertation on the Chronology of Usher. The Abbé Richer again. This man is a fool. Wherefore so much rage against the Jews and Protestants in treating a question of criticism? He rejects the chronology of the Jews, because it came from the school of Tiberias, and is approved by a Protestant bishop.

March 16th.]—I wrote a page of the chapter of Lucania in my Geographical Collection; it is the continuation of Bruttium.

17th.]—I wrote a page and an half of my chapter on Lucania, concerning Magna Græcia: after which I went to the library to read Freret's learned researches on the first inhabitants of Italy; Me- moirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres, vol. xviii, p. 72—114.

March 18th.]—I wrote a page and an half of the chapter entitled "Nations," in my Geographical Collection; it treats of the first communities in Italy.

19th.]—I wrote a page and an half on the chapter "Nations," concerning the first communities in Italy.

I finished the forty-ninth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains Letters on the Use of the Pronoun Thou, by Mr. Vernet: I am inclined to think both thou and you ought to be used.—Considerations on Morals, by Mr. Du Clos. The work is in general good: some chapters treating of the connexion of genius with character are excellent. Du Clos, before he was secretary of the academy, had been that of the coffee-house; where he carefully treasured up the conversations of men of wit.—The Roman History of Dion Cassius, by Messrs. Fabricius and Raimar; an excellent edition. Maupertuis's Works; and Appeal to the Public, by Mr. Kenig. In his own works, Maupertuis appears only as an extravagant visionary, whose fame rests not on any solid basis. In his dispute with Kenig he is a cowardly persecutor, who employs the secular arm to crush one of his colleagues.—The Spirit of Nations: a wretched imitation.—The Treasury of Imperial Medals, by Morel, with the Commentaries of Gori and Havercamp: what riches!—Wetstein's New Testament.

In

In a dispute which the Franciscans had with John XXII. they first gave that explanation of the Revelations, which makes the Pope Antichrist. Numerous swarms of those monks left their convents, and embraced Luther's reformation. They spread this Capuchin notion among the Protestants.

March 20th.]—I wrote a page and an half of my Geographical Collection, which finishes the chapter on the Nations of Italy.

21st.]—I wrote four pages of the chapter Campania in my Geographical Collection. They treat of the Division of that Country and Latium proper.

I finished the fiftieth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. It contains, Essay on the Nature and Office of Sacrificer. The Christian clergy have perhaps succeeded only to the philosophers and prophets, who taught morality; and not to the priests, who performed sacrifices and other parts of the ceremonial law.—Scarron's Works. His comic Romance alone will live: in other parts of his works, the wit is rather in the style than in the thought. At best, it results from the contrast between his character and situation.—St. Clement's two Epistles, in Syriac and Latin. Dissertation on two Epistles, &c. Dr. Lardner disputes Mr. Wetstein's discovery of this monument of the first Christians. Sub judice lis est. St. Clement's ideas on celibacy are carried, I perceive, to great extravagance. But even they are natural to the enthusiasm of a rising and persecuted sect! If these epistles are authentic, St. John must have written his his Gospel a long time before the old age of Clement, who was only in his thirtieth year in A. D. 60.

It is a great convenience to have always at hand some book containing easy and interesting productions, that may be read by snatches, at moments which would otherwise be lost. Nothing answers this end better than a good journal; which title the Bibliothèque Raisonnée certainly merits. It may be divided however into two parts, of nearly equal extent, but of completely different characters. The first part is adapted to the taste for true learning which prevailed in the seventeenth century; containing a great deal of theology, jurisprudence, and Belles Lettres; erudition drawn from the source, and mixed with sound criticism. The spirit of religious controversy is rather too prevalent; and we are disgusted with too much minuteness, or provoked at too much asperity. The second part of the journal has more affinity with the taste at present; uniting much indifference about theology, with superficiality of learning, and boldness in philosophy; its tone is dogmatical, and its style more broken into short sentences and more metaphorical.

March 22d.]—I wrote a page and an half of my Geographical Collection, containing A Description of the Countries of the Rutuli and Hernici, comprehended in the chapter on Campania.

23d.]—I wrote near three pages of my Geographical Collection, on the countries of the Volsci and and Ausones, comprehended in the chapter on Campania.

March 24th.]—I wrote a page of my chapter on Campania, which is the beginning of Campania proper.

25th.]—I wrote about three pages, finishing the chapter on Campania, and inserting some detached materials into other chapters.

26th.]—I wrote nearly three pages of my chapter on Rome.

27th.]—I wrote more than a page and an half of my chapter on Rome.

28th.]—I wrote more than two pages of the chapter on Rome.

29th.]—I wrote two pages on the Itineraries and high Roads of the Romans: and stop short at present with a rich fund of ninety-two folio pages closely written. My travels in Italy, with my future studies, will swell this collection to such a magnitude, that it will be necessary for me only to arrange my materials to have a complete description of Italy.

30th.]—I resumed the perusal of Spanheim, de Usu et Præstantia Numismatum; of which I read Dissert. V. p. 373—436. He treats of the medals of kings, particularly the successors of Alexander, and the epithets bestowed on them—friends to the Romans or Greeks; victorious; thunderers; great kings; king of kings; autocrator, or possessor of independent power; the name of God in general; and the particular names of Bacchus, of God the Saviour, or Soter; and of God manifested on earth,

Epi-

Epiphanes, which is not fully translated by "illustrious."—All these medals are Greek. We have not any other medals of Barbarian kings, but those struck by the Greek cities in their dominions.

I read Piron's Comedy, Metromanie, which there was an intention of acting at Mon Repos. The versification is beautiful, and many of the sentiments correct and well expressed. This applies to the whole scene between Mr. Ballivau and Damis. But I never read any thing worse contrived than the plot. There is much confusion in that part which regards the lovers Dorante and Lucile. The part of Damis is diverting, but unnatural. Where is it possible to find a poet that will resign a rich and handsome mistress for another that has no existence but in Mercury? What an extravagant attempt is it, to endeavour to render the character of this poet at once heroical and ridiculous! Compare together his scene with his uncle and that with his valet. I know that in Molière's masterpiece, the Misanthrope is at once ridiculous and respectable. But this happens because his faults consist in virtues carried to excess; which, though ridiculous in their effects, are respectable in their principle. There is no connexion in the part of Damis. The bad poet is one character; the just and generous man who pardons his friend's faults, and answers his insults only by good offices, is quite a different one. If probability is not violated, unity at least is not maintained. But how improbable is the reception which Damis gives to the last declaration of Dorante. His transports cannot be be conceived as natural, without supposing him domineered by the Metromanie in its utmost force. Yet he receives an account of the fall of his tragedy with indifference, calling this a trifling matter. Had he pardoned Dorante for attempting to put him to death, but remained inexorable to the crime of hissing his play, the character would have appeared to me to be better supported.

March 31st.]—I read Spanheim, Dissert. V. p. 476—494; and Dissert. VI. p. 494—553. He proceeds to the consular medals; the names and surnames of the Romans, and their different offices represented on medals. I expected to have found more novelty in this part of his work.

I went to the library to read Mr. de la Condamine's Journal of his Travels in Italy, in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences for 1757, p. 386—411. I was pleased to find the heights of several mountains in fathoms measured by the barometer. They are as follow:

Level of the sea	0
The Rhone, and Lake of Geneva and Canigon the top of the Pyrenees	1410
Quito in Peru	1430
The road over Mount Cenis	1460
The highest point of Mount Cenis	1510
Pic of Teneriffe	2150
Mont Blanc, 14 or 15 leagues to the south-east of Geneva, and visible at 60 leagues off, at Langres	2676
Chimboraco, the highest mountain of the Cordilleras of the Andes, and perhaps of the world	3220

Mr. de la Condamine remarks, that in the Roman highways, the joinings of the stones are never placed in

in the same direction with that of the motion of the carriages that travelled over them; and that the bed of the Tiber must have acquired ten or twelve feet in height, because the ancient pavement of the pantheon is overflowed to that height every winter. The emerald of Genoa is only a piece of glass.

April 1st.]—I read Spanheim, Dissert. VI. p. 533—589; and Dissert. VII. p. 589—633. He continues the chapter concerning offices, particularly those of legates and proprætors, whom the emperors sent into the provinces, and who were distinguished by the epithet "Consular" towards the time of the Antonines. He then proceeds to the medals of emperors and empresses. I have met with nothing more curious than the article concerning those princesses. I should not be a stranger at their courts, since I could distinguish the two Faustinas by their respective head-dresses.

2d.]—I read Spanheim, Dissert. VII. p. 633—660. He continues to speak of women, and the relations of the Cæsars.

3d.]—I read Spanheim, Dissert. VIII. p. 660—737. This part is very curious; containing an account of the different titles, which, by their union, formed the imperial authority: Cæsar, Augustus, Imperator, High Priest, Father of the Country, Proconsul, Tribune—all these taken together rendered the emperors far greater than kings. This last title was also given to them as early as the time of Domitian by Greek historians and Latin poets, though those princes themselves did not venture to to assume it, till the time of Constantine and the lower empire, when all republican maxims had been effaced from the minds of their subjects.

I went to the library to re-examine Mr. de la Condamine's Journal, which I had read too hastily. I met with the two following particulars concerning the height of mountains. 1. The 1460 fathoms given for the altitude of Mount Cenis are not applicable to the road, but to a station far more elevated, which Mr. de la Condamine reached with the utmost difficulty. The Pilgrim's Hospital is five hundred fathoms lower. 2. Falio de Duillier made the Lake of Geneva 426 fathoms above the level of the sea, and Mont Blanc 2000 fathoms higher: in all 2426 fathoms. But of the two elements of this calculation, the one is taken too high, and the other too low. Mr. de Cheseaux, measuring a larger base, found Mont Blanc to be 2250 fathoms above the level of the lake; but the height given to the lake above the sea, corrected by barometrical observations at Geneva, Turin, and Genoa, appears to be only 188, instead of 426 fathoms: so that the true height of Mont Blanc is 2438 fathoms. Mr. de la Condamine thus rectifies, in the History of the Academy, the notions which he had not sufficiently examined when he published his journal.

April 4th.]—I read Spanheim, de Usu Numismatum, Dissert. VIII. p. 737—757. After discussing the honorary titles of princes, he proceeds to the medals called the Spintriæ of Tiberius: he believes them to have been pieces of money that were were scattered among the common people at the obscene games of Flora. He then treats of colonies; sacred, free, and independent cities; the bounties of the emperors; the vehiculatio Italiæ; the arrear of imposts; the whole forming a classic book on the subject of medals.

I finished Bayle's General Criticism on Maimbourg's History of Calvinism; in 12*mo. Villa Franca,* 1684, third edition. The fashion of the age made the philosopher Bayle enter the lists of controversy; into which he brought with him a measure of knowledge, precision, and candour, as well as entertainment, seldom exhibited there. In his reasonings concerning infallibility, and the rights of an erroneous conscience, you see the accurate and enlightened dialectician; but he is rather too diffuse. No man was ever better qualified than Bayle for assuming the character of his adversary, shewing his system in a new garb, and for availing himself of all places open to assault; which is one of the greatest advantages of the sceptical philosophy. His chapters on the marriage of the clergy are full of pleasantry, learning, and knowledge of human nature; and his two letters on the love of parents towards their children, and on jealousy, contain a profound philosophy; in which he unfolds a chain of prejudices connected with our existence, necessary for our happiness, and intended by the Supreme Being to supply the place of a reason too exalted for the bulk of mankind, and too weak to be a principle of action.

action. The new letters appear to me far superior to the two first volumes.

April 5th.]—I read only the ninth Dissert. of Spanheim, p. 813—834. He treats of kings appointed by the Romans.

7th.]—I spent the whole morning in the library, reading very extensive articles in the second part of the third volume of Monfaucon's Explanation of Antiquities. He treats of the theatres and amphitheatres of the Romans.

9th.]—I read a considerable part of Keysler, in order to extract from him whatever might be useful in my travels in Italy; on which I set out in a few days with Guise. I am much pleased with Keysler; his work is useful, curious, and learned without affectation. When I consider how well he examined Italy in nine months, I am sensible that time is long, when we know how to make a good use of it.

10th.]—I read Spanheim, Dissert. IX. p. 834—860. He treats of the victories of the emperors, their public works, and the speeches which they only had a right to make to the soldiers. The heads of accusation against Metius Volusianus were not so ridiculous according to Roman, as they would be according to modern manners. Montesquieu and Spanheim think alike on this subject; the suggestions of genius are confirmed by erudition.

11th.]—I read Spanheim, Dissert. IX. p. 860—914; which concludes the work. He treats of the assistance which chronology and geography may derive from medals. Mr. d'Alembert's ignorance on this subject is pardonable.

April 12th.]—I re-examined Spanheim's work which is a real treasury of medallic erudition, a classic book on this science.

14th.]—I read hastily Vaillant's book on the medals of colonies, with a reference to the article of Julius Cæsar. I much wish that I had time to examine it more deeply.

16th.]—I found leisure, amidst multiplied occupations, to read Vaillant down to the reign of Claudius. I wish he had mentioned the cabinets in which his medals are to be found.

Genoa, June 11th.]—I have done nothing in the way of study but read the first seven epistles of the first book of Horace; a delightful philosopher and an excellent poet. At leisure moments I translated into English some parts of my Collection, which suggested to me various observations concerning the different idioms of the two languages, and the extreme difficulty of writing in both, without injuring the purity of either. One morning I gave way to reflexions which had often occurred to me, on ancient coins; and was so well disposed for diligence, that, with the assistance of a few books, I might have made great progress in the subject. I believe that the pound Troy was the ancient Roman pound. Until more accurate researches are made, which however have hitherto been neglected, I would propose the following table. The denarius should be ascertained by a mean proportional between the estimate of Greaves and and Arbuthnot, and the conclusion resulting from the Farnese Congius; deducting a sixth part for alloy.

The Roman denarius, or Greek drachma, will make 7½ English pence, about 14 French sous.

The Attic talent 187*l.* 10*s.*; about 4280 French livres.

The sestertium, or great sesterce, 7*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* or 180 French livres.

Florence, June 24th.]—All the English dined at Sir Horace Mann's. I have already mentioned their names, except that of Consul Dick, who is come from Leghorn with his wife in order to be present at the arrival of the Duke of York, who is expected against the festival of St. Peter. The knight gave us an excellent dinner, but it was not very lively. * * * * * * * * * engrossed the conversation and talked poetry, politics, and chemistry with an astonishing volubility. This man is certainly not without genius or knowledge; but his self-sufficiency, his affectation, and an eccentricity, bordering on folly, render him very unpleasing. He associates but little with the other English.

25th.]—I procured two volumes of Mr. Gori's Symbolæ Florentinæ, in order to read Mr. Muratori's dissertation on the brazen table found near Velleia, which he has prefixed to an accurate plate of the table itself. See Symbolæ, Vol. v. p. 1---56, and seven sheets for the table itself. It is written with as much precision and perspicuity as learning. Mr. Muratori is not a mere antiquary. He proves clearly that Trajan first instituted the Pueri Alimentárii in Italy, A. D. 103; and that this institution was supported by his successors to the time of Pertinax, who entirely abolished it. He thinks that this inscription, far longer than any other, may throw much light on the history, geography, and economy of that age. I quite agree with him; but, after maturely considering the inscription, do not think that he has seen all the consequences which ought to be drawn from it.

July 2d.]—I carefully re-examined Muratori's dissertation. I take the trouble of extracting from the bronze table the rents which a vast number of citizens of Velleia covenanted to pay, and the funds from which they were to raise them. The task is dry and unpleasant; but, before building an edifice, it is necessary to lay the foundation; there must be bricklayers as well as architects. I hope to benefit by this enumeration.

4th.]—I finished the volume of Statues, with Gori's observations.

7th.]—We were forced to dine with  who courts us as assiduously as we avoid him. During the repast he amused us much by his airs of greatness, and his ideas of economy, which are extravagant to a degree. There is a good deal of gasconade in them, I know, but he certainly realises them in some measure. He has much vanity and ambition, and endeavours to unite the two characters of philosopher and voluptuary. I do not think he professes the least taste for the arts or antiquities which attract so many travellers. According cording to him, a person may see Rome in twenty days. This trait is enough for me.

July 25th.]—Lord Palmerston, whom we saw at Lausanne, is arrived here from Padua. He has completed his travels, and I think to his satisfaction. Sir Horace Mann took us to his house to dinner. After dinner there was a boat-race on the Arno, which we, and the rest of the English, saw from the windows of our apartment. It is one of those things (there are so many of them) of which the description may be better than the reality. The boats were so little ornamented, and the race so short, that we merely saw that the Florentines have some idea of public spectacles, but know not how to execute them. We passed the evening in an assembly at the Countess Accaioli's.

August 23d.]—The two Damers dined with us. They are really good young men; and though extremely wild, are by no means devoid of abilities and good sense. The youngest was in the Guards, which he left, because Lord Tyrawley had refused him permission to travel. I suspect that there was some political motive for this.

26th.]—* * * * * * * * * is returned from his tour. He distinguished himself at Lucca by his declared contempt of the city and the state, by his misplaced hauteur, and by his many sarcasms. The republic, which has always prided itself on its attentions to the English, adopted with regret the resolution of making him quit Lucca, which it communicated to Sir Horace Mann. When this was intimated to* * * * * * * * * he requested leave to see an Opera, and to obtain it, made very unseasonable submissions. An officer of the Guards attended him all the day, and in the evening conducted him to the theatre without his sword. He departed the next day. Must this madman always be getting into scrapes? He has made himself many enemies; what will he do in England?

Sept. 2d.]—I have begun to form an inclination. It is for a certain Madame Gianni, a princess if you please, since she is a Medici by birth, and whose branch ought to have succeeded to the Grand Duchy on the extinction of that of Cosmo I. if violence had permitted them to claim the constitution of Charles V.

HINTS

Camp, near Winchester, 26th July, 1761.

HINTS OF SOME SUBJECTS FOR HISTORY.

I would despise an author regardless of the benefit of his readers: I would admire him who, solely attentive to this benefit, should be totally indifferent to his own fame. I stand in neither of these predicaments. My own inclination as well as the taste of the present age, have made me decide in favour of history. Convinced of its merit, my reason cannot blush at the choice. But this is not all. Am I worthy of pursuing a walk of literature, which Tacitus thought worthy of him, and of which Pliny doubted whether he was himself worthy?* The part of an historian is as honourable as that of a mere chronicler or compiler of gazettes is contemptible. For which task I am fit, it is impossible to know, until I have tried my strength; and to make the experiment, I ought soon to choose some subject of history, which may do me credit, if well treated; and whose importance, even though my work should be unsuccessful, may console me for employing too much time in a species of composition for which I was not well qualified. I proceed, therefore, to review some subjects for history; to indicate their advantages and defects; and to point out that subject which I may think fit to prefer.

* Vide Plin. Secund. Epist. Lib. v. Ep. viii.

The history of Richard I. of England's crusade against the Saracens.

The history of Richard I. of England, and his crusade against the Saracens, is alluring by the marvellous. A king of England fighting at the head of an allied army of English and French under the walls of Ascalon! There are good materials for executing such an undertaking. Without speaking of the general chronicles, we know two contemporary and accurate historians; and what is of great importance to a lover of the truth, the one a Christian, and the other a Mahomedan; I mean William of Tyre, and the Arabian, whose history of Saladin is translated by Mr. Schultens. Two monkish authors, at least, have left particular descriptions of this crusade; and two other monks have celebrated it in historical poems. But, on the other hand, this Richard was a fit hero only for monks. With the ferocity of a gladiator, he united the cruelty of a tyrant; and both were unsuccessfully employed in a cause where superstition silenced religion, justice, and policy; and against one of the most accomplished princes in history. How little are we interested in the exploits of Richard! Besides, this transaction is too remote, and too deeply buried in the darkness of the middle ages, to attract much notice at present.

EXTRACTS

EXTRACTS FROM MR. GIBBON'S COMMON-PLACE BOOKS, MEMORANDA, &c.

THERE is some philosophical amusement in tracing the birth and progress of error. Till the beginning of the ninth century, the two Dionysii of Athens, and of Paris, however adorned with imaginary trophies, were carefully distinguished from each other in the Greek and in the Latin churches. Under the reign of Lewis, the son of Charlemagne, about the year 824, Hilduia, abbot of St. Denys, resolved to confound them, and to dignify the Gallican church, by assigning its origin, not to an obscure bishop of the third century, but to a celebrated philosopher of Athens, who received his mission from the Apostles themselves. As the genuine writers of antiquity refused to countenance this opinion, Hilduia, though he sometimes quoted and corrupted them, found it necessary to create the works of Aristarchus, of Visbius, &c. which existed only in his fancy, or, at the most, in the suspicious archives of his convent. The zeal and correspondence of the Benedictine monks spread the tale as far as Rome and Constantinople. It was published by Anastasius in the Latin, and by Methodius in the Greek tongue. From the east, it was reverberated back into France with such an increase of sound, it was so grateful to the ear of national vanity, that as early as the year 876, the famous Hincmar, Archbishop bishop of Rheims, could scarcely persuade himself that there still existed any remains of incredulity. In the seventeenth century, Sirmond the Jesuit, and the indefatigable Launoy, ventured to restore the long-lost distinction of the two Dionysii; and the bigots, after some struggle, were reduced to silence. See Varia de duobus Dionysiis Opuscula, in 8vo. Paris, 1660.

The two extraordinary circumstances in the legend of George of Cappadocia are his gradual transformations from a heretic to a saint, and from a saint to a knight-errant. 1. It clearly appears from Epiphanius (Hæres. lxxvi.) that some persons revered George as a martyr, because he had been massacred by the fury of the Pagans. But as Epiphanius observes, with truth, that his vices, not his faith, had been the cause of his death; the Arians disguised the object of their veneration by changing the time and place of his martyrdom, stigmatised his adversary Athanasius under the title of Athanasius the Magician, and when they returned to the Catholic church, they brought with them a new saint of whose real character they had insensibly lost the remembrance. At first, he was received with coldness and distrust; and in the year 494, the Council of Rome, held under Pope Gelasius, mentions his acts as composed by the heretics, and his person as better known to God than to men. But in the succeeding century his glory broke out with sudden lustre, both in the east and in the west. See the contemporary testimonies timonies of Procopius (de Edificiis, l. iii); of Venantius Fortunatus (l. ii. carm. 13); of Gregory of Tours (de Gloriâ Martyrum, l. i. c. 101); and of Gregory of Rome (in Libro Sacrament.) New legends were invented by the lively fancy of the Greeks, which described the stupendous miracles and sufferings of the great martyr: and from Lydda in Palestine, (see Glaber, l. iii. c. 7. Wilhelm. Tyr. l. 8. (22),) the supposed place of his burial, devout pilgrims transported the suspicious relics which adorned the temples erected to his honour in all the countries of Europe and Asia. 2. The genius of chivalry and romance mistook the symbolical representations which were common to St. George of Cappadocia, and to several other saints, the dragon painted under their feet was designed for the devil, whom the martyr transpierced with the spiritual lance of faith, and thus delivered the church, described under the figure of a woman. But in the time of the crusades the dragon, so common in eastern romance, was considered as a real monster slain near the city of Silena, in Libya, by the Christian hero, who (like another Perseus) delivered from his fury a beautiful and royal damsel named St. Margaret. In the great battle of Antioch, St. George fought on the side of the Christians, at the head of an innumerable host, whose shields, banners, &c. were perfectly white: and the truth of this prodigy, so analagous to his character, is attested by contemporaries and eye-witnesses. (Robert. Hist. Hierosolym. l. v. et vii. Petrus Tudebrod. ap. Duchesne, tom. iv.). The name of St. George,

George, who on other occasions, in Spain and Italy, is said to have lent a similar aid, was invoked by princes and warriors as that of their peculiar patron. Cities and kingdoms, Malta, Genoa, Barcelona, Valencia, Arragon, England, &c. adopted him as their tutelary saint; and even the Turks have vied with the Christians in celebrating the martial prowess of their celestial enemy, whom they style the knight of the white horse. (Cotobii. in Itinerar. Cantacuzen in Apol. iii. contra Mahametanos.) An ample collection of whatever relates to St. George may be found in the Bollandists. Acta Sanctorum, mens. April. Jan. iii. p. 100—163. The first who discovered the Arian persecutor under the mask of sanctity was Isaac Pontanus de Rebus Amstelod. l. ii. c. 4. and although Father Papebroch (Acta S. S. Boll. p. 112.) is extremely angry with him, the more candid Abbé de Longuerne (Longuewand) embraces the opinion of Pontanus with pleasure, and assurance. Perhaps our knights of the garter would be somewhat astonished at reading this short history of their patron.

It would be absurd to quote, or even to refute the recent forgeries of Flavius Dexter, Marcus Maximus, Julian Peter, or Liutprand, by which the Spaniards have endeavoured to support their favourite tradition, that they received the Gospel from the Apostle St. James, in the fifteen years which elapsed between the death of Christ and his own martyrdom. If we except the ambiguous passage passage of St. Jerome, (Comment. ad Isaiam, c. 38. 42.) the earliest testimonies which can be produced are those of two Spanish bishops, Isidore of Seville and Julian of Toledo, who both flourished in the seventh century. In the ancient liturgy, which after the conquest of the Arabs acquired the title of Mozarabic, St. James is celebrated as the Apostle of Spain. His pretensions were peaceably admitted into the offices of most of the Latin churches, and when with the other arts, the art of criticism was restored, he could already boast an uninterrupted possession of 900 years. When the Roman Breviary was corrected under Clement VIII. a serious attention was paid to the doubts of Cardinal Baronius, and the positive assertion of the mission of St. James into Spain was exchanged for the qualified expression of "mox Hispaniam adiisse, et aliquos discipulos ad fidem convertisse ecclesiarum illius provinciæ traditio est." This national disgrace was obliterated in the year 1635, after forty years negociation; but by the anxious policy of the court of Rome the new form was composed in such a manner as to guard the pre-eminence of St. Peter from the interference of any other Apostle in the West. From that time the Spaniards have triumphed; the French critics Noël, Alexandre, and Tillemont, have been obliged to offer their difficulties with diffidence and respect; and it is pleasant enough to see them stigmatised as free-thinkers by the Bollandists. Acta Sanctorum, mens. Julii, tom. vi. p. 69—114.

About

About the year 814, one hundred years after the conquest of Spain by the Arabs, Theodeorier, Bishop of Iria Flavia, in Gallicia, guided by some nocturnal and præternatural lights, had the good fortune to discover in the adjacent forest of Compostella, an ancient tomb overgrown with brambles, which contained the body of the patron and Apostle of Spain. A rude and hasty chapel, suitable to the poverty of the Christians, was immediately built by Alphonso the Chaste, King of Leon; and in the year 876, his successor Alphonso the Third erected on that spot a temple more worthy of the majesty of the saint. By the verses of Walafridus Strabo, (Cænis. Antiq. Lecteon. tom. vi. p. 661.) who died in 849, and by the martyrologies of Ado and Usward, it is evident that before the end of the ninth century, the tomb of St. James was celebrated throughout Europe; nor was it difficult to frame a legend which accounted for the conveyance of his body from the country where he had suffered martyrdom to the country where he had preached the Gospel. The solitude of Compostella was insensibly changed into a flourishing city, which acquired the episcopal and even the metropolitan honours of the deserted sees of Iria Flavia, and Merida. During the tenth and the succeeding centuries, the Spaniards, the French, the Germans, and the Flemings, resorted in pilgrimage to the shrine of St. James of Compostella; and such was the ardour of their zeal, that quarrels, and even murders, very frequently happened while the several nations contended for the privilege lege of watching before the altar. (Innocent. III. Epistol. Edit. Baluz. l. x. p. 43.) On this new theatre the Apostle of Spain soon displayed his miraculous powers for the relief of his friends and the punishment of his enemies. The former experienced his aid in the most imminent dangers and the most desperate diseases; and the Arabian general Almanzar, who had dared to violate the sanctuary of Compostella, lost the greatest part of his army by the effects of the dysentery (Sampirus Asturicensis, in Edit. Sandoonl. p. 70. Roderic Toletan. l. v. c. 16.) In the wars between the Christians and the Moors, it was impossible that St. James could remain an indifferent spectator; and the Spanish soldiers, particularly the military order which under his patronage was founded in the 12th century, devoutly invoked his aid as that of a good and valiant knight; strange as that title might appear for a Saint who had probably never been on horseback in his life, (see Monachus Siliensis apud Francisc. de Berganza Antiquit. Hispan. p. 543.) it was soon justified by nocturnal visions, which prepared the minds of the Spaniards for the belief of a more public and visible apparition. At first it seems probable that they contented themselves with celebrating the miraculous aid which he had given to their ancestors, and we may observe that his exploits in the battle of Clavigium so pompously described by Mariana (l. vii. c. 13) and Roderic of Toledo (l. iv. c. 13) are unnoticed by the more ancient writers. But as the habits of faith were insensibly confirmed by time, time, and by repeated acts of credibility, the warriors of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries could persuade themselves and their contemporaries that, with their own eyes, they had seen their heroic apostle, mounted on a white horse, leading them to battle and to victory. (See Lucas Tudensis ad Ann. 1230, tom. iv. Hispania Illustrat. p. 114). In succeeding ages St. James displayed his prowess in Italy, Flanders, India, and America, (see a curious circumstance in Robertson's History of America, vol. ii. p. 448.) and his influence was felt, even when his presence was invisible. The day of his festival was auspicious to the arms of Spain, according to the admirable observation of Grotius, "Diem quem Hispani felicem sibi credunt, et credendo sæpe faciunt." Charles the Fifth chose for the invasion of Provence that holy day which in the preceding year had been crowned by the conquest of Tunis; but on this occasion St. James and the Emperor were obliged to retire with disgrace. (See a fine passage in the Mémoires de du Bellay, quoted by the Abbé d'Artigny, Mélanges d'Histoire, &c. tom. ii. p. 290.)

The Bollandists, by whom I have been guided, have laboured the article of St. James with indefatigable diligence. Act. Sanctor. Mensis Jul. tom. vi. p. 1—124.

Tacitus describes the site of Jerusalem with his accustomed brevity and precision; "duos colles immensum editos claudebant muri per artem obliqui (Hist. v. ii. See likewise Josephus de B. J. l. vi.

l. vi. c. 6). The hill situated to the south was called Sion, and originally constituted the ancient or upper city. The northern hill called Acra was gradually covered by the Temple, by the buildings of the new or lower city, and in modern times by those which surround the modern sepulchre. Jerusalem has insensibly moved toward the north, and the hill of Sion is long since deserted.

By the comparison of the measures taken on the spot by Des Haies and Maundrell, it appears that the actual circumference of Jerusalem amounts to 2000 or 1960 French toises.

According to the measurement of a Syrian engineer (Euseb. Prep. Evangel. l. ix. c. 36.) the circumference of ancient Jerusalem was twenty-seven stadia, which gives us 2550 toises, and agrees perfectly with the nature of the ground as represented in Des Haies's plan.

It results from the best authorities, and the most accurate measures, that the enclosure of the great Mosque of Jerusalem (supposed to contain the whole ground of the ancient temple) is about 215 toises in length and 172 in breadth, and consequently about one Roman mile, or eight stadia in circumference. But if we deduct the waste ground allotted for the court of the Gentiles, the temple itself formed a square, each side of which was equal to 500 Hebrew cubits, or 142 French toises.

(A curious dissertation of M. d'Anville Sur l'Ancienne Jérusalem. Paris, 1747. pp. 75. It is now out of print and was lent me by that geographer himself.)

PLINY JUNIOR.—Le traducteur François des Lettres de Pline a fait quelques méprises que je relèverai. Il dit dans sa vie de Pline " que le royaume de Bithynie avoit été légué aux Romains par Attalus fils de Prusias, un de ses rois, et qui se disoit affranchi du peuple Romain."(1) I^ment. Le prince qui légua la Bithynie aux Romains ne s'appela point Attalus; son nom étoit Nicomède. II^ment. Il n'étoit point le fils de Prusias.(2) III^ment. Faut-il entendre les mots " qui se disoit affranchi du peuple Romain" de cet Attale, ou de Prusias? c'étoit seulement du dernier qu'on pouvoit le dire avec vérité. Ce même traducteur dans un autre endroit(3) traduit le mot Forojulii par celui de Frioul. Mais il est certain que l'endroit en question étoit une ville en Provence, près de Marseilles.(4) On l'appèle à présent Fréjus.

(1) Lettres de Pline, tom. ii. p. 41 de la Vie de l'Auteur.
(2) Appian. in Bell. Mithrid. p. 175. 215. Edit. Hen. Steph. Vell. Pater. lib. ii. p. 4. 39. Tit. Liv. Epit. lib. 93.
(3) C. Plin. Epist. lib. v. Ep. 19.
(4) Cellar. Notit. Orbis Antiquæ, tom. i. p. 150. Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Brandenbourg, tom. i. p. 153.

CROMWELL.—L'Europe avoit accordé le titre de grand alors à trois princes: à Louis Quatorze, à Cromwell, et à Fréderic Guillaume. A Cromwell pour avoir sacrifié tous les devoirs d'un bon citoyen à la gloire de régner sur l'Angleterre; pour avoir perverti ses talens, qui, au lieu de devenir utiles à sa patrie, ne servirent qu'à son ambition; pour avoir caché ses impostures sous le masque du fanatisme; assujetti sa nation à sa tyrannie en combattant pour ses libertés; pour être devenu le meurtrier de son roi, qu'il immola à ses fureurs; pour être hardi, artificieux, passionné, violent, injuste, et non vertueux; pour avoir des grandes qualités, et manquer des bonnes.

BOCHART.

Bochart.—Je relèverai deux petites méprises dans lesquelles M. de Bochart est tombé. I^ment. Il cite, pour prouver que l'empereur Conrad II. n'avoit jamais pris le titre de Roi de Bourgogne, une charte de l'empereur Henri III. son fils et successeur, qui finit ainsi; Signum Domini Henrici Regis Invic. Teutonicom Tertii, Secundi Romanorum Imperatoris Invictissimi, et Burgundionum Primi. Se seroit-il dit le premier (dit M. de Bochart), si Conrad son père avoit porté en quelque façon le titre de Roi de Bourgogne? Mais comment ne voyoit-il pas lui-même que le Primus ne disoit rien, sinon que ce prince étoit le premier Roi de Bourgogne du nom de Henri? Pouvoit-il s'appeler le troisième Roi des Teutones, ou le second empereur? Au lieu qu'il étoit bien Henri II. comme empereur, et III. comme Roi d'Allemagne; Henri l'Oiseleur n'étant considéré que comme Roi d'Allemagne, parcequ'il n'avoit point reçu la couronne impériale des mains du Pape.(1)

II^ment. Il dit que les Tigurini étoient les seuls, excepté Hannibal et les Samnites, qui eussent fait passer les Romains sous le joug.(2) Sans rechercher des exemples bien loin, les Numantines(3) et Jugurtha(4) firent subir cette ignominie à des armées Romaines dans le même siècle que les Tigurini. Je ne blâme point M. de Bochart d'avoir traduit le mot Interpres(5) d'un passage de Cicéron(6) par celui d'interprète. Je sais bien que Interpres le signifie, mais il me semble qu'il auroit été plus conforme aux fonctions des légats dont Cicéron parle s'il l'avoit rendu par celui d'entremetteur;

(1) M. de Bochart, Mémoires sur la Suisse Ancienne, tom. ii. p. 263.
(2) Idem. tom. ii. p. 342.
(3) Vell. Paterc. Hist. Rom. lib. ii. c. 1. Plut. in Tib. Graccho.
(4) Sallust. in Bell. Jug. c. 38.
(5) M. de Bochart, Mémoires sur la Suisse Ancienne, tom. i. p. 461.
(6) Cicer. in Vat. c. 15.

d'une personne qui est employée dans la médiation de quelque affaire. C'est dans ce sens que les meilleurs auteurs s'en servent.(7)

(7) Virgil. Æneid. lib. iv. v. 608. Cicer. Epist. ad Famil. lib. x. Ep. 15. 17. V. aussi les Remarques de M. Ross, l'editeur Anglois, là-dessus. Tit. Liv. Hist. lib. ii. c. 33.

Ambrones.—M. de Bochart(1) croit ne devoir pas admettre les Ambrones entre les quatre peuples qui formoient la cité Helvétienne du temps de César. Sa meilleure raison pour cela est le témoignage de César lui-même, qui dit que les Tigurini furent les seuls des cantons Helvétiens qui joignoient l'armée des Cimbres et des Teutons dans leur guerre contre les Romains.(2) Or il est certain que les Ambrones furent de cette expédition. Il acquiesce assez dans l'idée du P. Oudin,(3) qui les plaçoit dans le pays qu'occupoient depuis les Sébusiens, qui étoient resserrés entre les confins des Séquanois, le Rhone, et l'Ains. Aussi trouve-t-on dans ces quartiers-là beaucoup de noms qui ressemblent fort au leur, comme Ambournay, petite ville de Bugey, &c. Il faut convenir qu'Ambro, qui signifioit en Celtique pays d'eau, convient assez bien à celui-ci. Car les terres du bord du Rhone depuis l'Ecluse jusqu'à Lyon étoient pour la plûpart des marais. C'est ce qui fit dire à Ammien Marcellin que le Rhone, en sortant du Lac Léman, passe par de vastes marais, par immensa paludum, dans le pays des Séquanois, le Bugey. Il croit néanmoins que le P. Oudin à trop resserré les limites, et tant à cause de la ressemblance du nom, que parceque cette nation paroît avoir été fort nombreuse, il veut qu'elle s'étendoit jusqu'à Ambrun, en Dauphiné.

(1) M. de Bochart, Mémoires sur l'Ancienne Suisse, tom. ii. p. 586, &c.
(2) Cæsar de Bello Gall. lib. i. c. 12.
(3) V. la Dissert. du P. Oudin dans le Recueil de Pièces d'Hist. et de Littérat., tom. iv. p. 1.

Cid.

CID.—Après l'Illusion Comique, M. Corneille se releva plus grand et plus fort que jamais, et fit le Cid. Jamais pièce de théâtre n'eut un si grand succès. Je me souviens d'avoir vu en ma vie un homme de guerre et un mathématicien qui, de toutes les comédies du monde, ne connoissoient que le Cid. L'horrible barbarie où ils vivoient n'avoit pu empêcher le nom du Cid d'aller jusqu'à eux. M. Corneille avoit dans son cabinet cette pièce traduite dans toutes les langues de l'Europe, hors l'Esclavonne, et la Turque. Elle étoit en Allemand, en Anglois, en Flamand, et par une exactitude Flamande on l'avoit rendue vers pour vers. Elle étoit en Italien, et, ce qui est plus étonnant, en Espagnol. Les Espagnols avoient bien voulu copier eux-mêmes une pièce dont l'original leur appartenoit. M. Pelisson dit dans son Histoire de l'Académie qu'en plusieurs provinces de France il étoit passé en proverbe de dire, "Cela est beau comme le Cid." Si ce proverbe a péri il faut s'en prendre aux auteurs, qui ne le goûtoient pas; et à la cour, où c'eût été très mal parler, que de s'en servir dans le ministère du Cardinal Richelieu.

Vie de Corneille, p. 72. mise devant l'édition de ses ouvrages de la Haye. 1740.

BERNE.—M. de Bochart n'est point dans l'idée générale au sujet du nom de la ville de Berne. On croit que Berchtold, Duc de Zaringue, son fondateur, le lui donna à l'occasion d'un ours qu'on avoit pris dans l'endroit où est à présent la ville, Bar signifiant en Allemand un Ours. M. de Bochart veut le tirer de Bern, qui dans la langue Celtique veut dire une Colline; nom assez fréquent dans les pays Celtiques, et qui convient fort bien à la situation de Berne. Voici les remarques qu'il fait sur le sentiment commun.

Bochart, Mémoires sur la Suisse Ancienne, tom. iii. p. 118–127.

I^ment. Que quoiqu'il y eût quelque conformité entre Bar et Bern, ces deux mots ne se confondoient point, et n'étoient point synonymes dans l'idiome Allemand en usage au douzième siècle. Ce n'est que dans l'ancienne langue de Scanie qu'on voit une dans le nom de l'Ours.

II^ment. Parceque cette histoire suppose que Berchtold étoit dans le pays au printems de l'an 1191. Or il est certain que ce prince étoit à la Terre Sainte avec l'empereur Fréderic I. l'automne de 1190, et il est vraisemblable qu'il n'en revint que l'an 1193.

III^ment. Il remarque que de toutes les chroniques qui en parlent il n'y en a aucune plus ancienne que 1420, près de 230 ans après la fondation de la ville.

IV^ment. Que tous les monumens qu'on cite sont postérieurs à la première des chroniques, et que par conséquence, ils ne prouvent rien, sinon que cette tradition étoit répandue alors.

V^ment. Que les armes de Berne, qui sont un Ours, ne décident de rien, mille autres raisons pouvant y avoir donné lieu aussi bien que la prétendue chasse de l'ours.

M. de Watteville, Hist. de la Confédér. Helvét. tom. i. p. 94. Berne, 1754.

Si j'osois combattre une opinion si généralement reçue (l'étymologie et l'origine du nom de Berne) je hasarderois bien de dire que je crois l'histoire de cette dénomination une pure tradition, qu'on peut pardonner au siècle qui vit paroître la première hishistoire de Berne. Ce ne fut qu'en l'an 1420 que le Chancelier Conrad Justinger reçut l'ordre d'y travailler. V. Kettler, tom. i. p. 122. Je n'ai qu'une conjecture à opposer à cette tradition. Elle est fondée sur la signification Celtique du mot Bern, qui vouloit dire l'endroit où l'on s'assembloit pour rendre la justice. V. Wachter, Glossar. German. Voce Bar. Le château de Nideck, près duquel la ville à été bâtie, étoit vraisemblablement un de ces lieux de justice, dont le Duc aura voulu renouveller et conserver la mémoire; c'est pourquoi il aura donné le nom de Berne à sa nouvelle ville.

SATURNALES.—L'opinion commune est, que durant cette fête, les valets changeoient non seulement d'équipage, mais de condition avec leurs maîtres, et en étoient servis à table. Je trouve néanmoins sur ce dernier article, que Sénèque, (1) Stace, (2) Plutarque, (3) Justin, (4) Lucien, (5) et Macrobe, (6) parlant de cette fête, se contentoient de dire que les valets mangeoient avec leurs maîtres, et des mêmes viandes, et là-dessus rapportent l'origine de cette coutume à l'égalité qui étoit sous le règne de Saturne sans aucune distinction de maîtres ou de valets. Servius en parle aussi. (7) Athénée en parle un peu autrement, (8) et comme les Romains ne traitoient pas seulement leurs valets, mais les servoient, ne laisse pas de reconnoître que c'étoit une coutume Grecque. Lucius Accius, ancien poëte Latin, dit que les Romains avoient reçu cette fête des Grecs, et sur-

Les Césars de l'empereur Julien, traduits par M. Spanheim, p. 3. 6. Rem. 3. Amsterdam, 1728.

(1) Senecs, Epist. 47.
(2) Stace, in Sylvis Kal. Decem.
(3) Plut. in Numa.
(4) Just. lib. xliii. c. 1.
(5) Lucien in Satur.
(6) Macrob. in Satur. l. i. c. 7.
(7) Serv. ad Æneid. 8.
(8) Athen. lib. xiv.

tout des Athéniens, qui l'aimoient beaucoup. (9) On voit des traces de cette institution parmi les Egyptiens, les Babyloniens, et les Perses. M. Bochart (10) en attribue l'origine à la malice des descendans de Cham, qui vouloient tourner en ridicule la prophétie de Noé contr'eux; M. Huet au Jubilé des Hébreux, où on voyoit quelques-uns des mêmes usages. (11)

(9) Macrob. in Satur. l. i. c. 7.

(10) Boch. in Phal. l. i. c. 1.

(11) Huet. Dem. Evan. p. 136.

GIANTS.—Monsieur l'Abbé Banier nous donne le précis de ce qu'on a dit pour et contre l'existence des Géans. M. l'Abbé Zilladet prétend qu'il y a eu des villes et des peuples tous entiers de Géans. M. Henrion va encore plus loin, et nous donne une espèce d'échelle chronologique sur la différence de la taille des hommes jusques Jésus Christ. Adam selon lui avoit 123 pieds 9 pouces de haut, et Eve 118 pieds 9 pouces; d'où il établit une règle de proportion entre les hommes et les femmes à raison de 25 à 24. Il donne 20 pieds de moins à Noé qu'à Adam, 28 à Abraham, 13 à Moïse, 10 à Hercule, et ainsi des autres.

Mém. de l'Académie des Belles Lettres, tom. i. p. 125. Tostatus in Deutr. l. xxvii. Theod. Ryckius Orat. de Gigant. Numbers, xiii. 33. 34 Odyss. i. vers 576. Eusebius Prep. Evan. lib. ix. c. 13. Phlégon de Tralles de Mirac. ch. 14. Pausanias in Attic. c. 25, et in Arcad. ch. 29. Philostrat. in Heroi. Plutarch in Sertorio. Plin. Hist. l. vii. c. 16.

Ceux qui soutiennent l'existence des Géans, se fondent, I^ment. sur l'autorité de l'Ecriture qui parle des Géans, des fils d'Enac, et du lit d'Og, roi de Basan; II^ment. sur le témoignage des auteurs profanes; et III^ment. sur les os monstrueux qu'on a trouvés dans plusieurs endroits. Leurs adversaires leur ont répondu que les Géans de l'Ecriture étoient des gens remarquables plutôt par l'énormité de leur conduite, que par celle de leur taille; et que d'ailleurs leur taille, quoique au-dessus de l'ordinaire, naire, n'approchoit pas à la grandeur que ces messieurs leur attribuent. A l'égard des os énormes une grande partie de ces histoires sont fabuleuses, ou du moins exagérées; et le reste des os sont supposés d'avoir été les os des éléphans, ou de quelques autres bêtes fort grandes. Au reste, selon eux, à juger de l'exacte proportion de la nature, il paroît que des hommes de notre taille ont été faits pour cultiver cette terre.

GIANNONE.—Je marquerai quelques erreurs dont l'exactitude de M. Giannone dans son Histoire de Naples ne l'a point garanti.

I^ment. (1) Il fait une faute d'omission en prouvant que Naples étoit une ville Grecque par un passage de Tacite seulement. N'avoit-il jamais lu Velleius Paterculus, qui dit formellement, (2) que Naples a été bâti par les Cuméens; que Cumes étoit une colonie des Chalcidiens; et que ceux-ci descendoient des Athéniens?

(1) Giannone, Hist. du Royaume de Naples, tom. i. p. 20.
(2) Vell. Paterc. Hist. l. i. c. 4.

II^ment. L'empereur Fréderic I., Barberousse, n'étoit point le fils (3), mais bien le neveu de l'empereur Conrad II (III).

(3) Giannone, Hist. de Naples, tom. ii. p. 440.

III^ment. Il dit (4) que la France est le seul état Chrétien où le clergé fait un ordre du royaume; en Suède et en Danemarc le clergé en fait un.

(4) Idem, tom. iii. p. 13.

IV^ment. Robert, Cardinal de Genève, n'étoit point Allemand. (5) Il étoit, comme notre auteur dit lui-même, de la famille des comtes du Genevois. Or je n'ai jamais entendu compter le Genevois pour une partie de l'Allemagne.

(5) Idem, tom. iv. p. 327.

CURA-

M. de Bochart, Mémoires sur l'Ancienne Suisse, tom. ii. p. 312–340.

CURATORS.—Les Curateurs (à prendre l'idée que M. de Bochart nous donne sur ce sujet) étoient les magistrats des villes municipales du tems de l'empire Romain. Il est difficile de prononcer d'une façon bien exacte sur leurs fonctions, et leur pouvoir; cela varioit selon la constitution des endroits différens. Dans quelques villes ils avoient de la juridiction, dans des autres ils n'en avoient point. Ici, c'étoient les magistrats principaux; là, ils n'étoient que subordonnés. Les décurions, ou les conseillers des municipes, les élirent, aussi bien que tous leurs autres magistrats. Pour que l'élection fût dans les règles, il falloit deux tiers des voix du conseil, et la confirmation du gouverneur de la province. Quelquefois le peuple demandoit au conseil les magistrats qu'il souhaitoit, mais c'étoit sans effet de droit, si le conseil n'approuvoit cette réquisition par un décret. L'emploi de curateur étoit pour une année. Comme ceux qui en étoient revêtus étoient obligés à donner des spectacles au peuple, et à plusieurs autres dépenses considérables, on se soucioit assez peu de s'en charger. Aussi les empereurs furent-ils obligés de faire des loix fort sévères là-dessus. Ils n'étoient obligés pourtant d'entrer en charge que trois mois après leur élection, afin qu'ils eussent le tems de porter leur appel devant les gouverneurs des provinces au cas qu'ils voulussent en faire. On ne pouvoit point les obliger de l'avoir plus d'une année; et les citoyens qui l'avoient accepté plus d'une fois avoient grand soin de le mettre parmi leurs titres sur les monu-monumens publics. (1) Quelques savans ont cru qu'il falloit être citoyen Romain pour y parvenir ; mais M. de Bochart rend fort vraisemblable, tant par des autorités que par des raisonnemens, que les provinciaux en jouissoient également.

(1) Gruter. cccIv. 3. Reines. Cl. vi. 114.

SELDEN.—Le petit traité de Selden de Diis Syriis est un chef-d'œuvre d'érudition. Tout ce que les recherches les plus singulières peuvent fournir de curieux sur cette matière, ce savant homme l'a mis en œuvre. S. Bochart, excellent juge en cette matière, l'appèle libellum aureum; et le célèbre Vossius l'a presqu'entièrement copié dans son traité de l'idolâtrie, qui est aussi dans son genre ce que nous avons de plus achevé. Scædius, à l'imitation de Selden, a fait aussi un traité des divinités Germaines. Mais excepté ce qu'il puise dans l'auteur Anglois, il n'a rien de fort curieux ; ce sont des recherches vagues, des conjectures souvent sans fondement, et qui apprennent peu de chose. On a fait plusieurs éditions du traité de Selden. Je me suis cependant toujours servi de celle de Leyde, 1629, qui est assez correcte.

Vigneul Marville, Mél. d'Hist. et de Litt. tom. iii. p. 56.

BAYLE.—Je marquerai une petite faute de cet illustre savant. Il dit (1) que Charles II. roi de Naples, de la maison d'Anjou, n'eut que quatre fils :—Charles Martel, qui fut roi d'Hongrie ; Robert, qui succéda à son père dans celui de Naples ; Jean, fondateur de la branche des ducs de Duraz ; et Philippe, fondateur de celle des princes d'Achaie. Or il est certain qu'outre ces quatre fils il en eut encore

(1) Bayle, Dict. Hist. et Critique. Article de Jeanne, reine de Naples. Rem. A.

encore quatre dont l'un nommé Louis fut canonisé par Pape Jean XXII.(2)

(2) Giannone, Hist. Civ. du Royaume de Naples, tom. iii. p. 195. Anderson, Tables Genealogical, p. 691.

VELLEIUS PATERCULUS.—G. Vossius, dans cette vie de Velleius Paterculus qu'il a tiré de son grand ouvrage de Historicis Latinis, et qu'il a mis devant l'Elzivir édition de cet auteur de l'an 1639, rapporte (1) un fragment de son Histoire Gauloise que Wolfgangius Lazius dit avoir trouvé. Il contient la description d'une grande défaite des Romains par les peuples de la Norique, et de la Rhætie. Gerard Vossius ajoute que Marcus Velserus avoit prouvé avec un grand soin qu'il étoit supposé. N'ayant jamais vu les ouvrages de Velserus, je ne sais pas de quels argumens il s'est servi, mais en voici quatre qui en démontrent la fausseté. I^ment. On y fait les Macédoniens alliés des Romains; ils avoient été leurs sujets depuis que la Macédoine eut été conquise par Paule Emilie, l'an de Rome 535. II^ment. On y dit que C. Verres étoit tribun dans cette guerre, et qu'il n'évita la mort, qu'en se cachant dans les marais. Si cela étoit, est-il croyable que Cicéron, qui dans ses plaidoyers contre Verres nous trace une espèce de tableau de toute sa vie infame, (2) qu'il eût (dis-je) passé en silence un trait qui ouvroit un si beau champ à ses invectives? III^ment. Il n'est point vrai que Verres étoit proconsul de la Sicile; il n'y a qu'ouvrir les Verrines de Cicéron pour voir qu'il n'en étoit que le Préteur. IV^ment. Il est faux que Verres étoit puni de mort pour son administration de la Sicile; il étoit banni, et sa mort n'arriva que près de trente ans après,

(1) Gerard Vossius in illa Vita, p. 3, 4, 5. Wolfgangius Lazius, l. i. Commentariorum Reip. Roman. c. 3. l. v. c. 5. &c. M. Velserus in Rer. Augustan. Vindelic. Libris.

(2) Cicero in Verrem, l. i. passim.

après, Marc Antoine l'ayant fait mourir pour avoir ses statues, et sa vaisselle Corinthienne.(3) Peut-on s'imaginer que Vell. Paterculus eût fait des bévues si grossières sur des événemens qui touchoient de si près à son tems ?(4)

(3) Plin. Nat. Hist. l. xxxiv. c. 2.
(4) De 100 ans seulement. Car Verres fut jugé l'an 683. Vell. Pater. écrivit son Hist. l'an 783 de Rome.

Vertot (Abbé de.)—Je relèverai deux ou trois bévues de ce célèbre historien. I^ment. Il dit que dans la Guerre Sociale C. Marius, Q. Catulus, Cn. Pompeius, et L. Sylla ne se firent point de peine de servir sous les consuls en qualité de lieutenans, quoiqu'ils eussent tous commandé des armées auparavant comme consuls, et généraux. (1) Je l'avoue bien de Marius et de Catulus, mais non pas des autres. Je ne comprends pas comment M. de Vertot ait pu laisser passer une faute si frappante. Sans parler du témoignage exprès de Velleius Paterculus, (2) (son auteur favori,) ni de Cicéron, (3) il n'avoit qu'à jetter les yeux sur les Fastes Consulaires pour voir que la Guerre Sociale éclata sous le consulat de Julius César et de P. Rutilius Lupus A. U. C. 663 ; au lieu que Cn. Pompée ne fut consul que A. U. C. 664, et L. Sylla que l'année suivante. II^ment. Il dit (4) que le Pompée, qui se ménagea si adroitement entre les deux partis de Marius et de Sylla pendant le siège de Rome, s'appeloit Quintus, et avoit été consul avec Sylla. Il se trompe ; celui-ci s'appeloit Cn. Pompeius Strabon, et avoit été consul l'année auparavant. (5) III^ment. M. de Vertot dit que Cicéron prononça sa seconde Philippique contre Marc Antoine en plein sénat,

(1) Vertot, Révol. de la République Romaine, tom. iii. p. 32. LaHaye, 1722.
(2) Vell. Pat. l. ii. c. 15. du moins pour Sulla.
(3) Cicer. pro Fonteio, c. 13. du moins aussi pour Sulla.
(4) Vertot, Rév. Rom. tom. iii. 61.
(5) V. les Fastes Consulaires sur cette année. Fabricius de Vita Cicer. ad eund. annum, &c.

sénat, (6) que voyant Antoine prêt d'envahir la Gaule Cisalpine il persuada au sénat de lui opposer les troupes du jeune César. Voilà deux, ou plutôt trois fautes. 1. Tout écolier doit savoir que Cicéron ne prononça point sa seconde Philippique en sénat. (7) Il l'a composa en réponse à une invective que Marc Antoine avoit prononcé contre lui dans cette assemblée, le 19 de Septembre A. U. C. 709, mais que, ne pouvant pas y venir sans danger, il se contenta de la publier. 2. Cicéron ne craignoit pas qu'Antoine ne se jettât dans la Gaule Cisalpine. Il n'y a qu'à lire sa troisième Philippique pour voir que ce consul assiégeoit déjà D. Brutus dans Modène avant que Cicéron eut fait cette proposition au sénat. 3. Il paroît que M. de Vertot croyoit que ce fut dans la seconde Philippique qu'il l'a fit. Il se trompe: ce ne fut que dans la troisième.(8) IV^ment. Il dit que les consuls Hirtius et Pansa ne joignirent Decimus Brutus qu'après le retour des ambassadeurs du sénat.(9) Je sais bien que Pansa ne s'approchoit de Brutus qu'environ le 15 d'Avril, (10) mais pour Hirtius il y étoit avant même que les députés fussent revenus de Modène, (11) ce qu'ils ne firent qu'au commencement de Février. V^ment. Il rapporte d'une façon tout à fait contraire à la vérité. Il dit (12) que Marc Antoine répondit aux députés, que puisque le sénat voulut lui arracher une province que les souffrages du peuple lui avoit donnée, il n'auroit plus d'égard à l'amnestie qu'il avoit accordée aux conjurateurs, mais qu'il les poursuivroit sans en épargner aucun. Bien loin de répondre ainsi, Velleius Paterculus, Hist. Rom. l. ii. c. 20.

(6) Révolut. Romaines, tom. iii. p. 565.

(7) Voyez Manutium in Argument. Philip. 2.

(8) Voyez toute la troisième Philippique.

(9) Rév. Rom. tom. iii. p. 368.

(10) Epist. ad Famil. l. x. Epist. 32. Edit. Ross.

(11) Philip. v. c. 4.

(12) Révol. Romaines, tom. iii. p. 361.

ainsi, il dit (13) qu'il vouloit bien abandonner la Gaule Cisalpine, pourvu qu'en échange on lui donnât la Gaule Transalpine pour cinq ans; qu'on confirmât tous ses actes; qu'on rappellât tous ses partisans, et quelques autres conditions semblables.

(13) Philipp. viii. c. 8, 9.

Depuis que j'avois écrit ces remarques, on m'a attaqué sur la première d'entr'elles, se fondant pour cela sur une équivoque dans le texte de M. de Vertot. Il dit que tous les chefs dont il s'agit, avoient commandé des armées en qualité de consuls, et généraux. On conclut de là que s'ils avoient commandé des armées en qualité de généraux, bien qu'ils n'eussent pas encore été consuls, que j'avois tort de le blâmer. Je pourrois dire, que pour rendre cette excuse de beaucoup de force, il auroit fallu s'être servi d'un ou au lieu d'un et. Mais venons à l'essentiel. Il est sûr que, pour parler à la Romaine, on ne pouvoit donner le titre de général qu'à ceux qui combattoient sous leurs propres auspices, ce qui au tems de la république n'étoit accordé qu'aux consuls, proconsuls, et aux préteurs lorsqu'ils recevoient une province au sortir de leur emploi. Il faudroit donc rechercher l'époque de la préture de Sulla, et de Cn. Pompée. Celle du premier tomba sur l'année avant la Guerre Sociale; c'est à dire, A.U.C. 662. Il n'y avoit donc point de place entre deux pour sa province, ni pour son commandement militaire. Pour ce qui est de Pompée, le cas (je l'avoue) n'est point le même. Outre un mot de Cicéron sur sa quæsture, aucun ancien ne nous a rien dit sur ces honneurs antéantérieurs au consulat. Je conviens même que comme Pompée précéda Sulla dans le consulat il est assez vraisemblable qu'ils suivirent le même ordre dans leur préture. Mais de la vraisemblance d'une chose à son existence il y a du chemin, et je ne saurois pardonner à M. de Vertot d'avoir avancé ce fait sans témoignage, puisque ouvent des circonstances faisoient qu'on ne prit point de province après sa préture. La réflexion là-dessus n'a guère plus de fondement, viz. que l'amour de la patrie leur avoit fait consentir à prendre ces emplois, puisque, selon son propre aveu, ces lieutenans commandoient des armées à part, et avoient le titre de proconsul. Vraiment le grand effort pour ceux qui ne faisoient que sortir de la préture pour accepter un titre qui ne se donnoit qu'à ceux qui avoient été consuls!

Giannone, Hist. Civ. du Royaume de Naples, i. p. 29. tom. Cicero in Orat. ii. de Lege Agrar. contra Rullum, c. 31.

NAPLES.—M. Giannone asserts that Naples did not become a Roman colony before the reign of Vespasian, or at most before that of Augustus: a passage of Cicero well considered will convince us that Naples lost the state of an allied city before the consulate of Cicero, or A. U. C. 690. Cicero, speaking against the Agrarian law of Rullus, says that "Lege permitti (to the decemvirs of that law) ut quæ velint municipia, quas velint veteres colonias, suis colonis occupent. Calenum municipium complebunt: Theanum oppriment; Atellam, Cumas, NEAPOLIN, Pompeios, Nuceriam suis præsidiis devincient. Puteolos vero, qui nunc in sua potestate sunt, suo jure libertateque utuntur. Totos novo populo et adventitiis copiis occupabunt." By this passage we see that as that power was only granted to the decemvirs over the municipal towns, and the colonies, that Naples was one of the two; but we know that Naples was never a municipal city; she must then have been a colony at that time.

novo

Scholiast (on Cicero.)—Le vieux Scholiaste, qui nous a donné quelques commentaires sur diverses harangues de Cicéron, fait quelques fautes que je ne laisserai pas passer en silence. I^ment. Cicéron, en énumérant toutes les féries qui pouvoient renvoyer le jugement de Verres jusques à l'année de Rome 684, parle de quelques jeux votifs de Pompée.(1) Asconius nous apprend dans une note,(2) que c'étoient des jeux que Pompée avoit voué pendant la guerre avec Sertoire, en cas qu'il y remportât la victoire. Si le Scholiaste s'étoit contenté de nous dire la même chose tout simplement, tout alloit bien; mais il ajoute une doute si c'étoit dans cette guerre, dans celle contre les pirates, on dans celle de Mithridate que Pompée les voua.(3) Pouvoit-il ignorer que des loix Gabinia et Manilia (qui lui confièrent successivement la conduite de ces deux guerres) la première ne fut faite que A.U.C. 686, et l'autre que l'année suivante? II^ment. Il dit(4) que le royaume de Bithynie parvint au peuple Romain par la mort de Nicomède qui mourut intestat. Il est faux. Nicomède fit un testament par lequel il fit le peuple Romain

(1) Cicero in Verrem, Actio i. c. 10.
(2) Asconius ad eum locum.
(3) Vet. Schol. ad eund.
(4) Idem, ad Orat. pro Lege Manil. c. 2.

son héritier.(5) III^ment. Il n'est pas vrai qu'Ariobarzanes fut envoyé par les Romains en Bithynie. Il ne fut jamais roi de Bithynie, mais bien de la Cappadoce.(6) IV^ment. Il parle d'un consul Milienus (7) qui fut fait prisonnier par les pirates. Je n'en trouve aucun de ce nom dans les Fastes Consulaires. S'il m'étoit permis de hasarder une conjecture, je dirois que le Milienus du Scholiaste pourroit bien être le C. Bilienus de Cicéron. Il en parle avec éloge, et dit qu'il auroit sûrement obtenu le consulat, si sa prétension n'eût pas tombé justement dans les tems turbulens de Marius.(8) Le Scholiaste auroit bien pu croire qu'il avoit été fait consul en effet.

(5) Appian. de Bell. Mithrid. p. 184. 218. Edit. Steph.

(6) V. eundem, p. 209. aliosque scriptores qui bellum illud narraverunt.

(7) Vet. Schol. ad Orat. pro Lege Manil. c. 12.

(8) Cicero. in Bruto, sive de Clar. Orator. c. 47.

Rapin (Thoyras.)—M. Rapin de Thoyras se trompe quand il dit que l'empereur Fréderic II. laissa par son testament le royaume de Sicile à son fils Henri.(1) On voit par le testament de ce prince qu'il ne démembra pas ses états en Italie. Il les laissa tous entiers à son ainé Conrad; léguant seulement à Henri ou le royaume d'Arles, ou celui de Jérusalem, à l'option du même Conrad. M. Giannone a corrigé Inveges pour la même faute.(2)

N. B. Je me sers de la copie du testament de Fréderic qu'a inséré M. Gianonne, et laquelle il assure, après d'Afflitto, être conforme à celle qu'on conservoit ci-devant dans les archives royales.(3) L'auteur du recueil des actes publics jusqu'à l'an 1700 le rapporte aussi, mais fort en abrégé; et omet même une circonstance fort essentielle, puisque omettant

(1) Rapin, Hist. d'Angleterre, tom. ii. p. 441.

(2) Giannone, Hist. Civ. du Royaume de Naples, tom. ii. p. 615.

(3) Idem, p. 617-620.

omettant l'option de Conrad, il fait léguer à Henri par son père le royaume de Jérusalem purement et simplement.(4) (4)Recueil des Actes Publics, tom. i. p.69. La Haye, 1700.

Fresnoy (Lenglot de.)—Monsieur l'Abbé Lenglot de Fresnoy se trompe lorsqu'il nous dit, (1) que Maximilien I. reçut de sa femme Marie les provinces de Groningue, d'Overissel, et de Frize. Il ne les posséda jamais non plus que son fils Philippe. Ce fut son petit-fils Charles Quint qui s'en rendit maître par des achats.(2)

(1)Méthode pour étud. l'Hist. tom. iv. p. 51. Paris, 1735.

(2) Anderson's Royal Genealogical Tables, p. 603.

Habits.—Les habits à fleurs passoient chez les anciens non seulement pour un habillement de femme mais même de courtisanes, qui seules avoient droit d'en porter à Sparte, à Athènes, à Syracuse, et chez les Locriens; ou en tout cas c'étoit la parure des gens de plaisir, ou efféminés, comme des eunuques, des maqueraux, des bacchantes, des gens qui montent sur le théâtre—ou tout au plus c'étoit l'équipage des prêtres, ou des femmes en des processions publiques; ou, enfin, celui des épouses. Par la loi Oppia ces habits à fleurs, ou de diverses couleurs, furent défendus aux dames Romaines, et elles n'eurent la permission d'en porter que depuis qu'on leur ôta les habits de pourpre. Cet habillement passoit encore chez les Grecs pour celui des Barbares, comme, entre autres, des rois de Perse. Ces habillemens de femmes, et particulièrement à fleurs, étoient défendus aux hommes par les anciens canons de l'église, comme aux femmes les habits d'homme. Tertullien re-marque qu'il ne trouve point d'habillement maudit par Dieu que celui de femme en homme. " Nullum denique cultum a Deo interdictum invenio nisi muliebris in viro." D'où vient aussi que Maimonides dans son traité de l'idolâtrie, défend que l'homme ne se pare des ornemens de femme, et surtout de ces habits de diverses couleurs, et bigarrés? Après tout il y a quelques pères de l'église (pour le dire en passant) qui prétendent que la robe du Seigneur sans couture étoit versicolor. Clément Alexandrin tache de rendre raison de cela.

Les Césars de Julien, par M. Spanheim, p. 276, 277—Rem. 947.

Cependant il y auroit un passage de Donat qui feroit croire que ces habits de diverses couleurs étoient en usage parmi les jeunes gens. En parlant de la manière dont les acteurs doivent être habillés convenablement aux différens originaux qu'ils représentent, il dit—

(1) Donat. Fragmen. quod in capita Comed. Terent. apparet.

" Adolescentibus discolor attribuitur." (1)*

AVENTICUM.—Aussitôt que j'ai compris qu'il falloit chercher les fondateurs d'Aventicum dans les parties méridionales des Gaules, je me suis rappelé qu'il y avoit un peuple dont Pline appèle une des villes Maritima Avaticorum, et que dans le même chapitre cet auteur dit que les Avantici furent joints par l'empereur Galba au département de la Gaule Narbonnoise. M. de Bochart, qui est

M. de Bochart, Mém. sur l'ancienne Suisse, tom. i. p 87, 8, 9.

* The Adelphi of Terence was acted by the sons and daughters of Hercules II. before Paul III. and the Roman court, at Ferrara. Cynthii J. Baptist. Gyraldi, in Thesaur. Antiquitat. Italiæ. tom. vii, p. 62.

dans dans l'idée que l'Helvétie fut peuplée par de colonies des Gaulois méridionaux, croit que les Avantici (car selon lui il faut corriger le premier passage de Pline par le second) furent les fondateurs d'Aventicum. Il dérive ce nom d'Arvent, qui signifie en Celte, eau dont le cours est rapide.

Cicéron, dans sa harangue pour Cornelius Balbus, après avoir allégué les exemples de plusieurs illustres Romains, qui avoit donné la bourgeoisie de Rome à des particuliers des villes alliées de la république, termine cette énumération par celui de M. Crassus qui conféra ce droit à un allié Aventicien. (1) Il est vrai que toutes les éditions de Cicéron font ce particulier bourgeois d'Alatre. Mais comme les manuscrits contredisent cette leçon, Cluvier et Gronovius en doutoient de la bonté. Ce dernier (2) vouloit qu'on lût Aventicensem, au lieu d'Alatrinensem, parceque les noms qu'on trouve dans les manuscrits n'en sont pas fort éloignés, et qu'Alatri, ville fort près de Rome, n'auroit guère été mise par Cicéron dans la même classe que les autres dont il venoit de parler, qui en étoient très éloignées. Mais cette remarque est plus spécieuse que solide. Il n'y a qu'avoir lu ce même plaidoyer de Cicéron avec quelque attention pour sentir qu'un exemple, tiré d'Aventicum, seroit allé directement contre le but de l'orateur. Il veut prouver que les généraux Romains pour pouvoir donner la bourgeoisie de Rome à des particuliers des villes alliées n'avoient pas le soin du consentement des villes mêmes, à moins que la nécessité de ce consentement ne fût stipulée par leurs alli-

(1) Cicer. pro Balbo, c. 22.

(2) Gronovius ad illum locum, Edit. Cic. Verbug.

ances. Auroit-il apporté, pour justifier sa thèse, un exemple tiré d'une ville des Helvétiens après nous avoir dit un moment auparavant (3) que les Helvétiens étoient du nombre de ces peuples dont les alliances le portoient? Auroit-il accusé M. Crassus présent d'avoir violé de la sorte une alliance des plus sacrées? Cette remarque est de M. de Bochart (4), mais j'en avois fait la première partie avant d'avoir lu son ouvrage.

(3) Cicer. pro Balbo, c. 13.

(4) M. de Bochart, Mémoires sur la Suisse Ancienne, tom. i. p. 469.

Holommanus.—Je relèverai une petite faute de ce savant. Cicéron dit (1) qu'un certain Q. Lollius, qui avoit quitté la Sicile pour éviter la tyrannie du Préteur Verres, fut tué en chemin, et qu'on le fit passer pour avoir été tué par les fugitifs. Holommanus, dans sa note à cet endroit, explique le mot fugitif, par ceux "qui in Siciliâ Athenione duce grassabantur:" s'il eut dit "in Italiâ Spartaco duce vel aliquo Spartacano," il auroit parlé plus juste. La rebellion des esclaves en Sicile sous la conduite d'Athénion et de Tryphon, fut finie par la mort de leurs chefs, par M. Aquillius, alors collègue de Marius dans son cinquième consulat. (2) Or ces personnages furent consuls A. U. C. 652. Mais ce meurtre n'auroit pas pu arriver avant A. U. C. 680: la première année du gouvernement de Verres.

(1) Cicero in Verrem, l. iii. c. 25.

(2) Diodor. Siculus in Eclog. lib. xxxvi.

Irish Language.—On croit que l'Irlandois étoit l'ancien langage des Scythes. C'est ce qu'affirment les auteurs même du pays. (1) Brerewood étoit apparemment dans cette idée, puisqu'il met cette

M. de Bochart, Mémoires sur la Suisse Ancienne, tom. ii. p. 18. (1) V. la Préface du cette langue au nombre des quatorze langues mères, que lui et d'autres ont comptées, qui subsistent en Europe sans la Latine. (2) Il faut convenir que l'Irlandois diffère fort du Gallois, du Bas Breton, et du Basque ; mais il n'est pas moins certain qu'on y trouve quantité de mots, qui, s'ils ne sont pas tirés du Latin, viennent de la même source, c'est-à-dire, du Celtique. J'ai rencontré dans l'Irlandois plusieurs termes du langage du peuple du Pays de Vaud ; lesquels je n'ai pas trouvé dans les dictionnaires des trois autres dialectes, ni du Germanique. Une preuve de l'antiquité de l'Irlandois est que ses caractères sont purement des lettres Grecques ; et que n'en ayant que dix-sept il faut qu'il les ait reçu avant la guerre de Troye, puisqu'il ne fut que pendant ce fameux siège que Palamède ajouta à l'alphabet Grec les quatre lettres qu'on lui attribue ; et que de ces quatre l'alphabet Irlandois n'en a aucune, non plus que des quatre dont Simonide fut l'auteur. De sorte que c'est l'alphabet de Cadmus que reçurent les habitans de l'Irlande, et non pas l'alphabet Ionien adopté par toute la Grèce. (3) Les Irlandois n'y ont ajouté que l'F, et comme ils l'écrivent à la Latine et non par φ, il est probable qu'ils ne s'en sont servis que depuis que l'empereur Claude l'eut fait ajouter à l'alphabet Latin. Une langue où ne paroît que celle de Cadmus est assurément de la plus haute antiquité, et s'est conservée plus entière qu'aucune autre qu'on connoisse. A l'égard de son abondance l'auteur du Dictionnaire pose en fait dans sa préface, que de toutes les langues mortes, ou vivantes, au-seul Dictionnaire Irlandois que nous ayons. Paris, 1732, chez Guerin.

(2) Brerewood Scrutin. Linguar. c. 4.

(3) Plin. Hist. Nat. l. x. c. 57.

cune n'est plus riche en mots, ni plus élégante en expressions que l'Irlandoise.

De Watteville, Histoire de la Confédération Helv. tom. i. p. 169–174.

Coucy (Enguerrand de.)—Le Duc Léopold d'Autriche, mort en 1326, avoit laissé une fille unique, qui fut mariée au sire de Coucy, un des plus gros seigneurs de France. La dot de cette dame avoit été assurée sur plusieurs villes et châteaux de l'Alsace et de l'Argeu. Le sire de Coucy ne se mit jamais en possession de ces domaines. Son fils Enguerrand, qui s'étoit marié à une princesse d'Angleterre, les réclama. Les ducs d'Autriche, ayant refusé de les lui remettre, De Coucy profita de la trève qui venoit de se conclure entre la France et l'Angleterre, et se fit suivre de 40,000 hommes de cette nation, résolu de maintenir ses droits par les armes. Léopold se fortifia de l'alliance des Suisses, et se prépara à opposer ses forces à celles de ses ennemis. Ceux-ci s'approchèrent des frontières de l'Helvétie environ la St. Martin de l'année 1375. Ils firent d'horribles dégâts dans les parties septentrionales de la Suisse, prirent Walenbourg, Balstal, Buren, Altreu, Aarwargen, Fridau, &c. Une partie de leur armée passa la Reus, et la Limmat, et mit tout le pays jusqu'à Wettinger à feu et à sang. Mais un corps considérable de ces troupes fut surpris et défait par les Bernois dans le couvent de Fraubennen, entre Berne et Soleure, la nuit du 26 ou 27 de Décembre, avec la perte de 800 hommes. Le sire de Coucy, voyant que son armée étoit affoiblie, et qu'elle ne pouvoit subsister dans un pays ruiné, prit

prit le parti de se retirer par l'Alsace. On appèle en Suisse cette armée étrangère du nom de Guglers, à cause des petits chapeaux qu'ils portoient: eugelhut signifiant un chapeau en Allemand.

On voit encore de nos jours (1) une colonne de pierre, monument (érigé si je m'en souviens en 1648) de cette mémorable action près de Fraubennen. D'un côté il y a une inscription Allemande, et de l'autre ces vers Latins.

(1) Je le vis Oct. 15, 1755.

Uxoris dotem repetens Cussinus amatæ
Dux Anglus, frater quam dabat Austriacus;
Per mare trajecit validarum signa cohortum,
Miles ubique premens arva aliena jugo.
Hoc rupere loco Bernates hostica castra,
Multos et cum justo Marte dedêre neci.
Sic Deus Omnipotens ab apertis protegat Ursum, (2)
Protegat occultis hostis ab insidiis.

(2) Les armes de Berne sont un Ours.

Néanmoins, si l'on s'en rapporte à M. de Wattewille, il y a deux méprises dans cette courte inscription. I^meut. Cussinus, ou le sire de Coucy, n'étoit point un général Anglois; il avoit épousé, à la vérité, une princesse d'Angleterre, et son armée étoit principalement composée de troupes non autorisées de cette nation; mais pour Cussinus lui-même, il étoit seigneur François. Sa famille, une des plus illustres de la Picardie, s'éteignit au quinzième siècle. II ^me. La femme de ce de Coucy n'étoit point Autrichienne; je viens de dire qu'elle étoit Angloise. La femme de son père étoit Autrichienne, et c'étoit sa dot qu'il redemandoit. J'omets la petite faute de parler d'un duc d'Autriche triche son frère quoiqu'elle fut fille unique de Léopold archiduc d'Autriche.*

Primum Westmonasteriensi postmodum Oxoniensi studio traditus eram. Ingulphi Historia, p. 73. in tom. 1. Rerum Anglicarum Script. a Fell et Gale. Oxon. 1684. Some have doubted, but the editors have found this passage in all MSS. (Gibson's Cambden, Vol. I. p. 305.) Ingulphus boasts of his proficiency in Aristotle and Tully's Rhetoric, yet in 1048 Aristotle was unknown; Oxford lay in ruins, had neither cathedral nor monastery to which the studies were confined. The Divinity Lectures of Robert Pulein in the abbey of Oseney (1129—1135) I consider as the punctum saliens of the University. Cambden, ubi supra. Nicholson, (English Library, p. 150—152.) is free, learned, and lively.

Matthew Paris, Hist. Major, Lond. 1684, gives the first historic titles of the Oxford studies.

In 1209 the clerks applied to artes liberales; they lodged three or four together in hospitia hired. Provoked by an act of injustice recesserunt ab Oxoniâ ad tria millia clericorum, quam magistri, quam discipuli, ita quod nec unus ex omni Universitate remansit. Some went to Cambridge, others to Reading: villani Oxoniæ vacuam reliquerunt, p. 191.

In 1252, convocatâ scholarium universitate quæ de diversis mundi partibus illic studuit, &c. p. 740.

* The Common-place Book from which the preceding articles are taken is dated March, 1755.

In

In 1257, statuta Universitatis antiqua et approbata. Oxon. Univers. schola secund. Ecclesiæ. p. 811.

The series of Chancellors of the University begins in 1233. Ayliffe's Hist. of Oxford. Vol. II. p. 278.

The first charter of Henry III. is in 1244, (Appendix, p. 6,) but it supposes the previous state of the University.

In 1109 Joffrid, Abbot of Croyland, sent a colony of Monks, who opened public schools at Cambridge of Grammar, Logic, Rhetoric, and Theology after the manner studii Aurelianensis. Ex isto fonte videmus totam Angliam factam frugiferam per plurimos magistros et doctores de Cantabrigiâ exeuntes. (Petri Blesenis Continuatio Ingulphi in Script. Rerum Anglicar. tom. i. p. 114, 115. He died circa 1200.) Curious but spurious: Frater Terricus (frater is probably a mendicant friar) acutissimus sophista, logicam Aristotelis juxta Porphyrii et Averoiz isagogas et commenta, adolescentioribus tradidit. But Averroes was not born till 1131. He interpreted Aristotle 1187—1192, and died after 1200. D'Herbelot, p. 715. Bayle, tom. i. p. 384—91. Saxius places him at 1198.

Επιζητητος δε τινος τινα δει μανθανειν τους παιδας ταυτ' (ειπεν) οις δε ανδρες γενομενοι χρησονται. Agesilaus, Apothegmata Græc. Hen. Steph. 1568. p. 306.

Henry, a Protestant, an Anabaptist, an apostate Monk,

Monk, a wandering preacher, speciem pietatis habens cujus virtutem penitus abnegavit. His gains were spent ludendo aleis, aut in usus turpiores. Frequenter siquidem post diurnum populi plausum, nocte insecutâ cum meretricibus inventus est, et interdum etiam cum conjugatis. Inquire, si placet, vir nobilis quomodo de Lausanâ civitate exierit, &c. St. Bernard. Epist. 242, tom. i. p. 239. Edit. Mabillon. Venet. 1750.

Juxta lacum etiam LAUSANENSEM totius diei itinere pergens penitus non attendit aut se videre non videt. Cum enim vespere facto de eodem lacû socii colloquerentur, interrogabat eos, ubi lacus ille esset, et mirati sunt universi. S. Bernardi Vita secunda, Auctore Alano (a Monk and Bishop of Auxerre. He died at Clairvaux A. D. 1383) c. 16, No. 45. Opera, tom. vi. p. 1383. 1^mo. Vet. iii. tom. i. p. 1232.

DEMETRIUS SOTER.—Excerpta quædam (ex antiquissimo MS. codice nuper in Ambrosianâ Bibliothecâ reperto) nunc primum in lucem edita, Mediolani (c'est à dire à Rome) MDCCXLIV. v idus Januarias. Horis antilucanis, superiorum permissu.

Argumentum.—Demetrius, Seleuci filius, Soter postea dictus, clam ex urbe ad patriam liberandam proficiscitur.

> Heroum soboles, sceptri Demetrius hæres
> Antiqui, Romæ lentos inglorius annos
>
> Degebat

Degebat, non sponte suâ, tristemque juventam
Mulcebat, sylvis captus studiisque Dianæ.
Longa sed interea patrium trans æquora regnum
Vastabat, populis et Dîs invisa, potestas, Captivique Lares Dominum clamore ciebant.
Haud paucis cultus, sed plurimus observatus,
Quid faceret juvenis? Venatum ad littora Circes
Fingit iter de more, canes, solitamque cohortem
Præmittit comitum, vigilem sic decipit urbem,
Ignotasque vias, ignotus et ipse, capessit.

Demetrius ante discessum amicis mentem aperit.

Sit satis; audivi: jam me nec vester, amici,
Fallit amor, pietasque meæ studiosa juventæ,
Nec generosa fides; et qua sapientia nullam
Horret inire viam, qua ducit ad ardua virtus,
Hac capienda mihi est. Hanc olim numina legem
Nascenti posuere, lubens mea fata capessam.
Non me degenerem, non pulchræ laudis egentem
Arguat aut præsens, aut postera nesciat ætas,
Nec proavis quæ terra meis regnata superbum
Nomen et imperium late diffundit in oras
Sordeat ulterius, dominis calcata protervis,
Sed servatorem norint in principe cives.

Le Cardinal Monti fit ces vers à l'occasion du voyage du jeune Chevalier de St. George en France, qui partit de Rome, le 5 des Ides, ou le 9 de Janvier, 1744.

Since the year 1756 Russia has been engaged almost without interruption in the Prussian, the Polish, and the Turkish wars. During the last mentioned war the Empress at the same time employed seven armies, (on the Danube, in Crim Tartary, tary, in Georgia, in Greece, in Poland, in Ingria, and against the rebel Pugascheff,) and four fleets, on the Baltic, the Archipelago, the Black Sea, and the Danube. Whilst she was making these extraordinary efforts she supported the splendour of her court, encouraged the arts of England, France, and Italy, by her expensive orders, which were most punctually paid; and increased one third the salaries of almost all her officers. As soon as the war was at an end she suppressed some taxes (about seven or eight millions of French livres); and she is now paying off about ten millions which she borrowed in Holland, and which forms the whole national debt of Russia.

The army at present consists of four regiments of Guards, one cavalry and three infantry, that compose the formidable body of about 10,000 men which has so often disposed of the throne; of one hundred and five regiments of infantry (1600 men each) making about 170,000 men. To these we must add the artillery between 20 and 30,000, and the cavalry, dragoons, &c. between 40 and 50,000. Upon the whole we may compute the establishment of regular forces at about 250,000; and had the Turkish war continued, both men and money were provided for an augmentation of 50,000 more. To this establishment we must add the stationary garrisons of the remote provinces, and the numerous bodies of irregulars, Cossacks, Calmucks, &c. which are always ready to obey the commands of the Russian monarch.

There is not any direct land-tax in Russia, and the revenue revenue arises from the capitation, the consumption, and the customs. 1. The clergy and nobility are exempt from the capitation, which is assessed chiefly on the peasants; but as these are all villains the tax ultimately falls on their masters, and must be tolerably proportioned to their landed property. The master, who enjoys the fruit of his slave's labour, is obliged to give him a piece of land to cultivate, sufficient not only for his own subsistence, but likewise for the payment of the tax which is estimated at about four livres on the head of every male, from the moment of his birth to the age of sixty. Not less than ten millions of persons are rated to the capitation, which consequently must amount to about forty millions. 2. The nobles have the exclusive privilege of making salt, and distilling spirituous liquors, on their estates, but they can dispose of them only to the empress. On the other hand the licensed venders of those necessary articles can purchase them only in the imperial magazines. By this double monopoly the crown gains two or three hundred per cent. and raises an indirect excise. 3. The customs, both on exports and imports, are excessively high; but they are exacted only on the frontiers of the empire, and the interior commerce is entirely free. To these great articles we must add the mines, the tribute of furs, &c., which in the whole form a revenue of one hundred and fifty millions of French livres. The population of Russia, without including the savages of the north, north, or the wandering Tartars, whose allegiance is voluntary and precarious, has been computed at twenty-two millions.

From the Prince Bariatinski, Minister from Russia, at Paris.

Peter III. was poisoned in a glass of brandy. On his refusing a second glass he was forcibly thrown down and strangled with a handkerchief by Orlof le Balafré, Teplow, Potemkin, and the youngest of the Princes Baratinski. When the body was exposed the marks of violence on the neck, &c. were evident. Orlof instantly returned to Petersburg and appeared at the Empress's dinner in the disorder of a murderer. She caught his eye, rose from table, called him into her closet, sent for Count Panin, to whom she imparted the news, and returned to dinner with her usual ease and cheerfulness.

These particulars are taken from a history of the Revolution in 1762 composed by M. Rulhière, a French officer, who was an attentive spectator, and who afterwards conversed with the principal actors. Prudence prevents him from publishing, but he reads his Narrative to large companies, and I have already heard it twice. It is an entertaining spirited piece of historical composition not unworthy of being compared with Vertot's Conspiracy of Portugal. But I find that Rulhière's fidelity is impeached by persons perhaps partial, but certainly well-informed; by the Baron de Goltz

Goltz the Prussian minister, by the Count de Swaloff, Elizabeth's favourite, and by the Princess d'Askoff herself.

The deaths of religious persons of both sexes is about 1800 per annum; and as there is some reason to believe that about one out of thirty die every year, the whole number of persons in France, engaged in the monastic life, is about 54,000, of whom we may reckon 24,000 men and 30,000 women.

M. Garnier, and the originals of the Controle Général.

MEXICO.—The ancient empire was said to contain ten millions of souls: at present about one.(1) (1) Hist. Philosophique des deux Indes, tom. iii. p. 75.

The city once 200,000, now 50,000,—afflicted by inundation. Los Angelos, near Tlascala, has gained by its loss. Id. p. 117.

From the mines 65,000,000 (of livres) are annually coined at Mexico. The king has a fifth on the silver, a tenth on the gold, as those mines are more casual. The gold coined is about a fifth of the silver. Id. p. 108. 109.

Mexico is highly taxed, yet the net revenue returned to Europe is only 6,300,800*l.* Las Casas persuaded the Court of Spain to restore liberty, but not property, to the Mexican Indians. They are no where so happy, noble, and ingenious as in his diocese of Chiapa. Id. p. 114. Id. p. 77.

1. Immortality of the soul rejected only by the barbarous Otomites, believed by the Mexicans.

Clavigero, Storia Antica del Messico, tom. ii. p. 4. —2. Mictlanteuchlti, God of Hell and his wife—a subterraneous dwelling, black priests, nocturnal sacrifices, &c. p. 17.—3. The Hades in the centre of the earth; gate of Paradise, perilous journey, pleasant abode with the God of Waters—the Supreme Heaven in the sun, p. 4, 5, 6—94.—4. The souls of those who died in war or child-bearing held the first place; the second for the drowned, the dropsical, the thunderstruck, infants, &c.; vulgar deaths in the third, p. 5.—5. Noble Tlascalans. —6. A similar life and body? Utensils, arms, gold deposited in sepulchres. Their Techichi slain to accompany them (p. 94—99). The same as the Alco, a mute melancholy sort of dog, now extinct. (Tom. i. p. 73.) False criticism on Pope. (Warton, vol. ii. p. 129.)—7. Transmigration of plebeian souls into vile animals, of noble into the humming bird. (p. 5) Beautiful image—Buffon's fine description of 43 species of Oiseaux-Mouches and Colibris. (tom. xxi. p. 1—64, in 4to.)

Hist. Philosophique des deux Indes, tom. iii. p. 392. Id. p. 418.

Spain contained thirteen or fourteen millions before the discovery of America.

In the year 1747 only 7,423,590 souls, including 180,046 head of clergy.

Id. p. 338.

Her manufactures flourished till the expulsion of the Moors. Segovia cloths the best in Europe.

Id. p. 401.

60,000 silk looms at Seville. About fifty millions (French) of merchandizes are sent annually from Cadiz to America. About an eighth part is Spanish property.

About

About seventeen millions of piasters (89,250,000*l.*) arrive annually at Cadiz from America in gold and silver. The account seems particular and exact. Hist. Philosophique des deux Indes, tom. iii. p. 431.

Portugal.—The number of its inhabitants has sunk from 3,000,000 to 1,800,000. Id.

Brasil.—Its gold mines (under the tropic of Capricorn) were discovered about the year 1730. The Portuguese content themselves with the quantity which the torrents wash down into the vallies. It amounts annually to about 45,000,000*l.* The king has one fifth. The importation diminishes the proportion of gold to silver. Id. p. 528.

The mine of diamonds was discovered about the year 1730—given to an exclusive company, and the country round it dispeopled—the government—who is the agent in Europe—under articles to sell no more annually than 1,250,000*l.*—bought and cut by the Dutch and English, chiefly sold in France—are 10 per cent inferior to East India diamonds. Id. p. 534.

	Carats.
Great Mogul's . . .	279 1/16
The Great Duke's . .	139
The Sancy	106
The Pitt	136
The King of Portugal's (inestimable if not a topaz.)	1280

Russia.—To what causes may we ascribe the abject slavery of the Russians, the brethren of those hardy Poles and Bohemians, who so long asserted and abused the right of freedom? Perhaps to the following causes. 1. The Russians derived the knowledge of Christianity and the rudiments of a civil education from a servile and superstitious people, the Greeks of Constantinople. 2. The Tartar conquerors broke and degraded the spirit of the Russian nation. 3. After the Russians had lost all communication with the Euxine and the Baltic, they were wholly separated and in a great measure secluded from the rest of Europe, and the civilized part of the human race. 4. The accidental advantage of fire-arms enabled the Czars to extend their empire over the north of Asia; and the power of prejudice was enforced by that of the sword.

HERCULES.

——— Qualemque vagæ post crimina noctis
Thestius obstupuit toties socer.
Statius in Sylv. l. iii. Ep. i. v. 42.

The question is therefore quoties, and according to the three different tales which prevailed among the Greeks, the amorous prowess of Hercules will excite the idea of a man, of a hero, or of a god.

I. When young Hercules was six feet high and only eighteen years of age, he hunted the lion on Mount Cithæron in Bœotia, and was hospitably entertained by Thestius, prince of Thespiæ. Every night, by the command of their father, one of the fifty daughters of Thestius shared the bed of Hercules; and the young hero embraced all these virgins with with such undistinguishing and irresistible vigour, that at the expiration of fifty prolific nights he was still persuaded of the identity of his companion. Such is the modest and perhaps the original account of the first of the labours of Hercules, as it is given by Apollodorus.(1)

(1) Hist. Poet. l. ii. c. 4. p. 96.

II. According to another relation the conversion of the fifty virgins into wives and mothers was effected by the indefatigable Hercules within the space of seven days. Athenæus(2) has extracted this anecdote from the writings of Herodotus, or rather Herodotus the Lycian, who, as it appears by another quotation,(3) had composed at least seventeen books on the actions of Hercules.

(2) Deipnosophist. l. xiii. p. 556.

(3) Id. l. ix. p. 410.

III. But the popular opinion which at length prevailed ascribed to Hercules the singular honour of consummating in one and the same night his fifty, or at least his forty-nine marriages. This miracle, which seems to be insinuated by Diodorus Siculus,(4) is positively affirmed by Pausanias,(5) and that diligent traveller has recorded the virtue of one of the daughters of Thestius, who refusing to submit to the common fate of her sisters, was invested by Hercules with the sacerdotal dignity, and condemned to a life of perpetual celibacy. The Christian apologists have adopted this third account, which according to their ideas of merit, was the least honourable to the son of Jupiter. "Hercules, sanctus deus, natas quinquaginta de Thestio, nocte unâ perdocuit, et nomen virginitatis exponere et genetricum pondera sustinere."(6)

(4) Id. l. iv. p. 274. Edit. Wess.

(5) Id. l. ix. p. 763. Edit. Kuhr.

(6) Arnobius, l. iv. p. 145. His Commentator Elmenhorst, p. 144, quotes several of the fathers on this interesting topic.

The vigour of a demigod can be matched only by that of a prophet. In the space of a single hour each of the eleven wives of Mahomet successively acknowledged him as a tender and active husband. This anecdote is related by Belon on the faith of an Arabic book entitled "Des Bonnes Coutumes de Mahomet."(7) (7) Observations dans ses Voyages, l. iii. c. x. p. 179.

See Le Clerc (Gorlus)'s Edition. Amsterdam, 1703.

Severus (Cornelius).—The poem of Ætna, though its author is praised by Ovid and Quintilian, discovers very little taste or invention. The philosophy is narrow, and probably erroneous (see the long descant on the virtues of the millstone); the style languid, harsh, and perplexed. Instead of the ornaments of nature and propriety, the barren writer consumes a fourth of his poem in mythological stories which he affects to despise. The prettiest passages are the complaint of the preference given to the lucrative over the curious arts (v. 250—283), and the power of fire (533—561).

Παιδεραστια.—Herodotus observes with the most placid indifference that the Persians were fond of adopting new customs and new pleasures. From the Medes they borrowed their dress, from the Egyptians their breast plates By the Greeks they were taught to forget the distinction of sexes, απ' Ελληνων μαθοντες παισι μισγονται.(1)

(1) L. i. c. 135.

Noue (de la).—The situation and behaviour of de la Noue at the siege of La Rochelle is perhaps without parallel in history. 1. Such was his established reputation for honour and virtue, that in the the heat of the civil wars of France immediately after the massacre of St. Bartholomew, Catherine of Medicis and her son entrusted this zealous Protestant to negociate with the Rochellois. 2. By the election of the people, and with the consent of the court, he accepted the military command in the revolted city. 3. During the siege of La Rochelle, he performed with admirable courage and conduct all the duties of a soldier and a mediator. 4. When the fanaticism of the Rochellois had rejected equitable conditions of peace, he obeyed the summons of the Duke of Anjou, repaired to the royal standard, and afterwards retired to his own house, with the esteem and confidence of both parties.

Such wonders require much stronger evidence than the partial authority of a biographer: and it is almost as singular that they are attested in all the material circumstances, by D'Aubigny, a violent protestant, (1) by Thuanus, a moderate philosopher, (2) and by Davila, a bigotted catholic. (3) The testimony of Davila is the more valuable as he betrays some inclination to suspect the intentions of de la Noue, in his return to the royal camp.

(1) Hist. Universelle, tom. ii. p. 34—45.
(2) Hist. sui Temporis, liii. 12. lvi. 5.
(3) Istoria delleGuerre Civile di Francia, tom. i. p. 326–330. Edit. Lond.

Shoes.—The practice of nailing shoes to the hoofs of horses, &c. was unknown to the ancients; who occasionally tied them with strings round the feet of those animals. (1)

(1) Gesner, Lexicon ad Script. de Re Rustica, p. 132, 133.

HINTS.

HISTORIANS, friends to virtue?

Yes,—with exceptions.

1. Allow great latitude in the means.

2. Incline more to personal than to social virtues.

Difference of the civil wars in France and England.

1. The English caused by riches and long peace. The French by long wars and impatience of ease. Union of the House of Commons. Power and discords of the Guises, Bourbons, &c.

---

2. The English chiefly used the axe; the French the dagger.—Contrast, Mary Queen of Scots beheaded,—the Marshal d'Ancre murdered. Cause of this difference,—the superior corruption of the French?—Equity of the English? Fanaticism? Independence of the French nobles?—The custom borrowed from the Italians and communicated to the Scotch.

3. The English left to themselves. The Pope, Spain,

Spain, England, &c. took part in the French wars. The Duke of Mayenne preferred to the Admiral de Coligny.

Davila's general Errors.

1. The election and even existence of Pharamund doubtful. The assembly and resolution of the Franks chimerical.

2. The stability of their government ridiculous. It varied every age.*

3. The Salic Law not fundamental: established by accidents in the 14th century.

4. The first prince had no inherent right to the Regency. The point is yet undetermined.

Henry III. studied politics with an Italian abbé. Vanity of that science. Ignorance why we have acted—how we shall act—how others will act. Our sense, eloquence, secrecy, &c. the only principles assisted by the confidence of others.—Example of Henry III. his inactivity, his violence. Of Henry IV. The proper time for changing his religion; how very nice. If too soon the Catholics would be suspicious; if too late grown desperate.

The effect of civil wars on the minds of men. A general ferment of fanaticism, discord, and faction. Two singular exceptions. Montaigne in his retirement.

* See Mably's Observations sur l'Histoire de France, &c.

ment. Henry IV. on the throne. He loved and trusted mankind.—How different from Charles II.!

France little altered by 40 years civil war. The same limits. The succession attacked but preserved. The regal authority unimpaired. Violent principles detested and forgotten.

Power of the governors of provinces, direct and absolute over the military. Their levies, expeditions, disposal of offices, strong places, gentlemen and guards—indirect over the finances and justice; only checked by the Parliaments.

The Duke of Mayenne, &c. wanted to make them hereditary.—The followers of Henry IV. made the same demand; had he consented, the feudal system was again established.

---

1. French cavalry famous in the 16th century—All noblesse, 5000 gentlemen at once in the army of Henry IV. Brave but impatient of labour and fatigue. Laid aside their lances, and fought with pistols and carbines. The custom blamed but at last adopted.

2. The Spanish infantry well disciplined. Walloons, Italians. The Duke of Parma. Retreat from before Amiens. Saying of Henry IV.

3. Swiss phalanx. March from Meaux.

4. English and Germans, brave but undisciplined.

Religious wars.

1. Persecution inspires union, obstinacy, and at last last resentment.—A sect becomes a party. Why Christianity suffered so long.—Greeks and Asiatics—Objection from martyrs—Difference of active and passive courage.—Chinese.

2. Connexion of religion and politics. The leaders seldom free from enthusiasm, or the followers from ambition.

3. Other passions mix with these. Massacre of Paris owing to revenge—of Charles IX.—of Guise—of the Parisians.

The ruling passion? very rare. Most passions confined to times, place, persons, circumstances.—Love, hatred, revenge, jealousy, vanity, &c.—Patriotism seldom even a passion.—Ambition generally mixed with other passions,—often subservient to them—when pure, as in Cæsar, Richelieu, must succeed or perish—Avarice perhaps the only ruling permanent passion.

"Search then the ruling passion, there alone
"The fools are constant, and the wise are known," &c.
POPE.

Bobinet in the Comtesse d'Escarbagnes, and Sir Hugh in the Merry Wives of Windsor—ridiculous resemblance without probability of imitation.

The Popish worship like the Pagan? Certainly. Huetius's Ode will serve for either Mary or Diana—But this resemblance probably without imitation—Reasons. 1. Images, ornaments, garlands, lights, odours, music, affect the senses of all men—are —are found in the worship of the Indians, Chinese, Americans, &c.

2. Images opposed whilst the Pagans subsisted, received as soon as they were extinct.

3. The jubilee invented by Priests who had scarcely heard of the secular games.

4. Monks and relics of Martyrs, the favourite superstitions of the 4th century, detested by the Pagans.

Middleton, elegant and just (in facts), carries his parallel too far—the sacerdotal order on quite different principles from that of old Rome—Warburton dogmatic, just in his inference, weak in his argument.

See Huetii Commentarius, p. 258—262.

Freedom of Thought.

1. Infallible authority allows not the faculties of the mind fair play—May be just and happy, but is a yoke—Faith of the Pagan light and easy,—of the Christian binding and comprehensive—of the Papist variable—Plutarch, Tillotson, and Bellarmin.

2. Authority of Doctors,—a voluntary slavery under the name of reason—how common!—the ancient sects—professed philosophers how bigotted—Romans, &c. more liberal, heard several before they chose—obstinate in their choice, yet sometimes changed.

3. Authority of our own systems. Men of imagination dogmatic.—Bolingbroke.—True freedom and and scepticism—ease and pleasantry—Bayle and a student of Salamanca.

A free-thinker may be rational or wild, superficial or profound—however, the road is open before him and his sight clear.

Freedom of individual relative to general slavery—an Englishman may reject with contempt what an Italian examines with caution—yet the Italian the free-thinker—il voto sanguinario of Muratori—the tenets of Atterbury and Courayer nearly the same, their manner of thinking how different—the one tended to slavery, the other to liberty.

Maxim of La Bruyère of governments; when quiet how ever disturbed! when disturbed how ever quiet! very just.—Supported by the interest of a few, courtiers, priests, soldiers—real power of the latter—honour and attachment—despotic government more secure in large states—indolence, prejudices, &c. of the multitude—chain of imitation—power of habit—necessity of order—every conspiracy a new society—danger of each individual—extreme danger of strong passions and great talents—when the charm is once broken, every man feels his real strength, and despises the idol.—hopes succeed to fears—the bond of faction grows stronger, that of government weaker—vicissitude.

Character and conduct of Brutus—obstinate patriotism of Scipio and Cato after the battle of Pharsalia—salia—collect a formidable force in Africa(1)—second civil war—Brutus the nephew and disciple of Cato—remained quiet in Italy—studied eloquence with Cicero—their panegyrics on Cato(2)—attended with no danger.

The more moderate patriots had submitted to Cæsar—Cicero, Varro, Marcellus, &c.—their motives, horror of civil war, despair of success, cruelty of the Pompeian party, Cæsar's mildness, hopes that he would restore the Republic—their private life, melancholy complaints. Cicero's boldness. (3)

Brutus submitted immediately after the battle—made the first advances—revealed Pompey's designs, (4) was admitted into friendship and confidence—Proconsul of the Cisalpine Gaul(5)—his equity and mildness (6)—importance of the province, military force (7)—had the war been trans-

(1) Lucan. Pharsal. ix. 18, &c.

——— Magni post funera, partes Libertatis erunt.

Hist. de Bello Afric. c. 1, 2, &c. &c.—M. Guichardt's Military Comment.

(2) Cic. Orator. c. 10.—Ad Attic. xiii. 46; xii. 21.

(3) See Cicero to Atticus, Varro, Papirius, Pætus, Cecinna, &c.—Pro Mariell. 8, 9. pro Ligario 3, et passim.

(4) Plut. in Brut. Bayle au mot Brutus.

(5) Plut. Aurel. Victor de V. J. C. 82. Cic. ad Fam. vi. 6. xiii. 10, &c.

(6) Cic. Orator. c. 10.—Plut.

(7) Montesquieu, Grandeur des Romains, c. xi. Ac. Philippic. iii. c. 5.

ferred

ferred to Italy, Brutus must have betrayed Cæsar or the republic.

His further honours, first prætor and consul elect (1)—preferred to Cassius—no freedom of election (2)—voluntary engagements—to obey the decree (3)—to defend the person of Cæsar (4)—no faith with tyrants (5)—excuse rather than motive.

Respect for Brutus (6)—tyrannicide, hatred of kings—greatness of Rome—fame of Cæsar, humanity of Brutus.

> In scelus it Pharium, Romani pœna tyranni;
> Exemplumque perit. (7)
>
> L'exemple, que tu dois, périroit avec toi. (8)

Fine imitation—the sentiment itself truly Roman—great in Lucan's mouth—far greater in Pompey's widow—has a sublime effect in the tragedy, as it engages Cornelia to discover the conspiracy, and save the life of her enemy.

Thucydides and Guicciardini in the true station for historians of their own times—mistake of Mr.

(1) Vell. Pat. l. ii. c. 56. 58. Plut.

(2) Sueton. in Cæsar. c. 41. 76.—Lucan. v. 381, &c.

> ——— Finget solemnia campi
> Et non admissæ dirimit suffragia plebis.

Leg. diribet, meo periculo.

(3) Appian de Bell. Civ. l. ii. p. 494.

(4) Cic. pro Marcell. c. 10.

(5) Appian de B. C. l. ii. p. 515.

(6) Vell. Pat. l. ii. c. 72. M. Auton. et August. apud Plut. in Brut.

(7) Lucan, x. 343.

(8) Le Pompée de Corneille, acte iv. scèn. 4.

Wharton

Wharton as to the latter (1)—both acquainted with the business of peace and war—their characters procured them every information—had studied the greatest men of their times—better acquainted with them all, than each of them was with the others—personal knowledge of great men, the chief advantage of their personal memoirs—Disappointed in those of Cæsar—we perceive the scholar and the soldier, we lose the man—except in the simplicity with which he relates his greatest actions—the memoirs of Xenophon much more characteristic—those of De Retz still more so—pity the events are so little interesting.

(1) Adventurer, No. 123.

RE-

REMARKS

ON

BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES,

REFERRED TO IN MR. GIBBON'S MEMOIRS.

This excellent work, which Mr. Blackstone read as Vinerian Professor, may be considered as a rational System of the English Jurisprudence, digested into a natural method, and cleared of the pedantry, the obscurity, and the superfluities which rendered it the unknown horror of all men of taste.

Unfortunately for this useful science, the foreign clergy, who poured in shoals into England after the Norman conquest, had little relish for the old common law of this country; they had formed the design of erecting upon its ruins the new system of civil and canon law which had just begun to revive in the court of Rome and the Italian Universities. The artful designs of these ecclesiastics were however constantly disappointed by the steady opposition of the nobility and laity, who supported the municipal law of England against these innovations; till at last, despairing of success, the clergy affected to despise what they were unable to destroy, and withdrew almost entirely from the secular tribunals. The Court of Chancery, of which they retained the direction, adopted many of the forms of the civil law, and as they were the sole masters of the two universities, they easily proscribed a science which they abhorred, and reduced the students of the common law to the necessity of erecting peculiar schools in London, and within the neighbourhood of the courts of justice. Although two hundred years have now elapsed since the Reformation, yet the reverence for established customs will easily account for so material a defect in our academical character not having been sooner corrected.

I have entirely omitted a metaphysical inquiry upon the nature of laws in general, eternal and positive laws, and a number of sublime terms, which I admire as much as I can without understanding them. Instead of following this high priori road, would it not be better humbly to investigate the desires, fears, passions, and opinions of the human being; and to discover from thence what means an able legislator can employ to connect the private happiness of each individual with the observance of those laws which secure the well-being of the whole.

Mr. Blackstone speaks with uncommon respect of the old common law, which the generality of lawyers highly prefer to the statute law. He will find it however difficult to persuade an impartial reader that old customs (begun in barbarous ages, and since continued from a blind reverence to antiquity) deserve more respect than the positive decrees of the legislative power. I can indeed suspect suspect that a general rule which is gathered only from a rude and prodigious mass of particular examples and opinions will easily acquire a prolixity and an uncertainty which will at last render the priests of Themis the sole interpreters of her oracles.

I wish Mr. Blackstone had talked a little less of Egbert, and of a right suspended from Edward the Confessor to James I. Such a suspension must be equivalent to a total extinction.*

* The remainder, being principally extracts, is omitted.

INDEX EXPURGATORIUS.

1. Mr. Hurd (English Commentary on Horace, tom. ii. p. 38, &c.) represents himself as the first discoverer of the Allegory in the third Georgic; and as such receives the compliments of his friend Warburton. (Divine Legation, vol. i. p. 295.) The Jesuit Catrou had however explained it upon the same principle many years before. (Virgile de Catrou, tom. ii. p. 452, &c.)

---

2. M. Dacier (V. Horace de Dacier, sur le v. 67 de la première Satire du l. ii.) is doubly mistaken in supposing that the Metellus of Lucilius was the Metellus Numidicus; between whom and Scipio Africanus, some jealousy had arisen from their several African exploits. 1. The sense of Horace supposes that Scipio was an impartial judge; consequently no adversary of Metellus. 2. Scipio had never an opportunity of being jealous of the other's African glory. Scipio died in the consulship of M. Aquilius and C. Sempronius. (Vell. Patercul. l. ii. c. 4.) A.U.C. 624. (V. Pigh. Annal. ad ann.) Metellus was consul with the province of Numidia in 644. (Pigh. ad ann.) M. Dacier might also have considered that the intimacy which the satirist enjoyed with Scipio, supposes him much older than than twenty when that hero died, and consequently that Eusebius brings his birth too low (to the 158th Olympiad.) M. Bayle (Dictionnaire au mot Lucilius, Not. G.) drew the same conclusion, though from less decisive circumstances.

---

3. Mr. Hume would infer from the list of the Belgic army in Cæsar, (de Bell. Gallico, l. ii. c. 4.) the number of inhabitants in all Gaul. He justly enough considers Belgium (more properly the Belgic Gaul) as one fourth of the whole; at least with regard to population: but he forgot that not above half the Belgic nations entered into the alliance; which circumstance must double the calculation. (V. Hume's Essays, in 4to. 1758. p. 247.) It is wonderful that Mr. Wallace (Numbers of Mankind, p. 71, &c. Appendix, p. 312, &c.) should rather choose to refute him by the most improbable conjectures, than by so plain a fact. In the same place Mr. Hume observes, that the numbers in Cæsar are to be depended upon; as the Greek translation checks the original. Mr. Hume must know that this version (which is a very indifferent one) is attributed by the learned to Gaza or Planudes; and consequently not older than our most recent MSS.

---

4. In the Notitia of the Western Empire, we meet among the officers of the city of Rome with the Consularis Aquarum. I believe that this employ no longer subsisted in the Theodosian age. 1. Because it appears here out of its rank, and amongst the subalterns. 2. Because we find no commission for it among the formulæ of Cassiodorus. 3. Because the functions of this place are exactly the same with the Comes Formarum, who is very well known in those times. I therefore suspect that the Consularis Aquarum was lost in the Comes Formarum about the age of Constantine.

---

5. Abbé Mongault had decided, that the Nice, where Brutus pleaded before Cæsar for King Dejotarus, was the Italian and not the Bithynian city of that name. (Epîtres de Cicéron à Atticus, l. xiv. 1.) Dr. Middleton (Life of Cicero, v. ii. p. 407.) has echoed it from him, with a severe censure upon the Jesuits Catrou and Rouillé. Both leader and follower are mistaken. 1. Nice in Italy was a wretched town among the Alps, where Cæsar upon his return from Spain would never have stopped to try a cause which he could so easily try a few days afterwards at Rome. Nice in Bithynia was a great city, (in the neighbourhood of Galatia,) through which Cæsar must have passed in his progress, when "Jura in tetrarchas, reges, civitates distribuit;" (Hist. de Bell. Alex. c. 78.) nay, we are told in the same chapter that he actually decided a cause against Dejotarus. Brutus appears to have been in Asia about that time. 2. Cicero's Dialogue de Claris Oratoribus was written after Brutus's oration for Dejotarus. (V. c. 3.) It was likewise written before the death of Marcellus, (c. 71.) who was killed A.U.C. 707. (V. Fabric. in Vit. Ciceron. ad ann.) Therefore the oration was in in 706, when Cæsar was in Asia, not in 708 when he was returning from Spain. Although the dialogue of Cicero may be feigned, yet we know how very attentive the ancients were in preserving the chronology of these kind of fictions. (C. 60.) The only foundation of Mongault's opinion seems to be some obscure places (Epist. ad Attic. l. xiii. 39, 40.) where Cicero hints at a journey Brutus made to meet Cæsar, but without any relation either to Nice or Dejotarus.

---

6. Cicero (pro Lege Manilia, c. 4) speaks of Ecbatana, as the royal seat of Mithridates. I suppose it is not necessary to prove that Ecbatana was the capital of Media, or that Media was never a part of that prince's empire. Tully was probably but an indifferent geographer, and the celebrated name of Ecbatana sounded extremely well. A lesson for critics!

---

7. Mr. Guthrie (English Translation of Cicero's Letters to Atticus, l. ix. 10.) translates Getæ by Goths; a barbarous name which was first heard of 250 years after Cicero's death. V. Cluverii German. l. iii.

---

8. Hirtius must be mistaken when he says (De Bell. Gall. l. viii. c. 46.) that Q. Cicero was sent into winter quarters in Belgium, when it appears that he was serving under his brother in Cilicia the 13th of October (Cicer. ad Attic. l. v. 20.) of the same year, A. U. C. 702. (V. Pigh. ad annum.)

---

9. M. Guichardt (Mémoires Militaires sur les Grecs et les Romains, tom. ii. p. 220.) attributes the stay of Cæsar in Egypt not to Cleopatra, but to the Etesian winds, which Hirtius seems to confirm. But this reason or pretence could only relate to a very inconsiderable part of the nine months (Appian de Bell. Civil. l. ii. p. 484.) which he spent there; since the season of the Etesian winds is over some time before the autumnal equinox (V. Plin. Hist. Natur. l. ii. c. 47) and Cæsar did not land in Egypt before the middle of August. The proof of this depends upon an accurate survey of the then irregular Roman Calendar. I adopt the system of M. de la Nauze (V. Mémoires de Littérature, tom. xxvi.) as it appears to me far more probable than that of Archbishop Usher. In general some light may be thrown upon Cæsar's transactions in Egypt.

---

10. Sallust is no very correct historian. I blame, 1. His Chronology. Let any one consider the context of his history from the siege of Numantia to the Consulship of Calphurnius Bestia. (V. Bell. Jugurth. c. 5—29.) A fair reader can never imagine a space of more than five or six years. There were really twenty-two. (V. Pigh. ad ann. U. C. 620 et 642.) 2. His Geography. Notwithstanding his laboured description of Africa, nothing can be more confused than his Geography, without either either division of provinces or fixing of towns. We scarce perceive any distance between Capsa and the river Mulucha (Bell. Jugurthin. c. 94—97, &c.) situated at the two extremities of Numidia, perhaps 500 miles from each other. 3. Having undertaken a particular history of the Jugurthine war, he neither informs us of the fall of the conquered province nor of the captive king.

---

11. M. de Montesquieu quotes the famous inscription of the Rubicon as ancient and authentic. (Considérations sur la Grandeur des Romains, c. xi. p. 123.) We may excuse Blondus, and Leander Alberti, for having been deceived by so very gross an imposition, which carries its own condemnation along with it; has been regularly confuted by Cluverius (Ital. Antiq. l. 1. c. 28. p. 297.) and must be rejected by every scholar in Europe.

---

12. M. Muratori is grossly mistaken in the interpretation of a passage of Olympiodorus preserved by Photius. (V. Annali d'Italia, tom. iv. p. 83.) The historian speaks of several rich senators who enjoyed an annual income of forty centenaries of gold, others of fifteen, others of ten, &c. The annalist understands by a centenary of gold 100,000 pieces of gold, which he supposes nearly equivalent to the crowns or ducats of our time. But the real signification of centenary, κεντηνάριον, means only one hundred pounds weight of gold (which was the general and legal computation under the lower empire). I owe Salmasius the justice of observing, serving, that he has given the true explanation of this word. (V. Comment. ad Script. Hist. August, p. 418.) Muratori's erroneous reckoning would increase the fortunes of these wealthy senators in the enormous proportion of at least seven to one.

---

13. M. Freret justifies the common reading of Pliny the Naturalist (l. iii. 5) which allows 13,200 paces for the circuit of Rome; by an ingenious calculation drawn from the measure of the surfaces of the fourteen regions as set down in the Notitia. The circumference deduced from them is 13,549 paces. This seeming agreement is a real contradiction. Pliny only speaks of the narrower boundaries of Servius Tullius. The Rome of the Notitia (the fourteen regions) comprized all that was contained within the more extensive walls of the Emperor Aurelian. (V. Mém. de Littérature, tom. xxiv. p. 531, &c.

---

14. Sir William Temple (V. his Works in folio, tom. i. p. 223) has discovered a fundamental law in the Mamluk empire, which the Mamluks themselves were totally unacquainted with. "The son of a Sultan might inherit his father's private fortune, but he was for ever excluded from the succession. The throne was elective, and the election confined to the native Circassians, who had been brought slaves into Egypt, and had served as private soldiers in the Mamluk bands." The throne was indeed elective like the Roman empire in the third century; but the army elected, deposed, or murdered murdered their sovereigns according to their own wild caprices, which were unrestrained by either law or principle. As prosperity is seldom the school of manly virtue it is not surprising, that a soldier of fortune was often preferred by his fellow soldiers to the son of a monarch, or a hardy Scythian to the native of that effeminate country, where every race of animals is observed to degenerate. (V. Maillet, Description de l'Egypte, tom. ii. p. 222.) Sir William Temple's notion is as contrary to fact as to reason. The sceptre of the Mamluks was above a century in the hands of the same family. Kelaoun was elected Sultan of Egypt in the year 1279, and was succeeded (with only two or three temporary usurpations) by fourteen of his descendants, two in the first generation, eight in the second, two in the third, and two in the fourth. (V. Pocock, Supplem. ad Abulpharag. dynast. p. 6—32. Hist. Générale des Huns, &c. par M. de Guignes, tom. i. p. 266, 267, tom. v. p. 155—246.) It is unfortunate for letters that the knowledge of facts, and the art of making use of them, are very seldom united. I pass over several other mistakes of Sir William Temple's that I may not seem to treat a polite scholar with the critical severity which he justly enough complained of (tom. i. p. 299); but I can scarce refrain from smiling at his Almanzor, the most accomplished of the western Caliphs, who reigned over Arabia, Egypt, Africa, and Spain; but in fact an imaginary hero of an imaginary empire. Sir William Temple was deceived by some Spanish romances, which he took took for Arabian history. (V. Ockley's Preface to the Second Volume of his History of the Saracens, p. xxiii.)

---

15. M. Maillet (author of the Description de l'Egypte, in 2 vol. 12mo. A la Haye, 1740) seems to have been a curious and accurate observer of whatever fell within his reach during a sixteen years consulship in that country. His account of the physical, moral, commercial and political state of Egypt is clear, copious, and entertaining. But his book has some considerable defects. 1. Though a sensible man the consul was no scholar; he affects to despise the ancients; seldom quotes them, and often mistakes them. This ignorance betrays him into many very gross errors and deprives us of all the lights which he might have extracted from, or reflected upon the writings of those ingenious nations who were so long masters of Egypt. It would be endless to enumerate particulars. Let any one compare his sixth letter with the Pyramidographia of the learned Mr. Greaves. (V. his Works, vol. i. p. 1—164.) 2. He was well versed in Arabian literature, and follows as his oracles those writers, even in respect to those earlier ages, which were to them (as they truly styled it) the time of ignorance, and upon which indeed they can offer us nothing better than traditions, fables, or conjectures. He is even far from accurate in his use of them. His considering the Mamluk princes till the conquest of the Turks as so many descendants of the great Saladin (V. tom. ii. p. 287, and elsewhere) where) may serve as a specimen. 3. The consul entrusted his materials to a French Abbé (Mascrier) to be revised and fitted for the press. The editor (who, though an affected, is no contemptible writer) seems to have considered amusement as the only end of writing, and idle tales and ambitious ornaments as the only source of amusement. Nay, I am well assured that he has improved, or rather spoiled, the honest consul's memoirs by many additions drawn from his own imagination; and what is unfortunate for us, that it is impossible to clear the native soil from these noxious weeds.

---

16. M. de Voltaire accuses the author of the Lettres Provinciales of having imputed to the Jesuits " un dessein formé de corrompre les mœurs des hommes." Compare this accusation with the fifth letter and you will be astonished that any man could advance it. " Sachez donc que leur objet n'est pas de corrompre les mœurs; ce n'est pas leur dessein." (Vol. ii. p. 5.) When I meet Voltaire upon Grecian, Roman, or Asiatic ground, I treat him with the indulgence he has so much occasion for; but we might have expected to have found him better acquainted with one of the finest writers of his own country. (V. Oeuvres de Voltaire, tom. xvi. p. 322, et Lettres Provinciales, tom. ii. p. 1—36, in 12mo. à Leyde, 1767.)

---

17. M. de Voltaire, speaking of the many instances which seemed to justify Mademoiselle's marriage with a private gentleman, alleges the examples examples of the daughters of the Roman emperors, and those of the sovereigns of Asia. (Oeuvres de Voltaire, tom. xvi. p. 124.) Both are very unhappily chosen, as the circumstances are totally different. The only kings in the time of the Roman empire were vassals or enemies to it; all barbarians, and all considered with reason as very inferior to a Roman senator. The eastern maxims of domestic government make those unequal alliances the most suitable and the most eligible for a sultan's daughter. She must marry a slave to avoid the being one herself.

---

18. The example of Quadratus may give us an idea of the blind or perhaps artful credulity with which Mr. Addison composed his admired little treatise of the Christian Religion. He describes this apologist as a famous philosopher, a convert, and a martyr. (Addison's Works, vol. iii. p. 290.) Dr. Cave was not half so well acquainted with him. (V. Hist. Litterar. p. 32, 33.) I do not find the least trace of his conversion; his martyrdom is founded only upon the modern martyrology of the Greeks, and I see no other proof of his philosophy than his being an Athenian, and that Mr. Addison might suppose that every Athenian was of course a famous philosopher. There is scarce a prejudice or a legend, that this popular writer has not condescended to adopt as the strongest argument.

---

19. Pope's verses to Addison upon his Treatise of Medals

Medals have certainly great beauties; but I think I discover two faults in them. 1. I scarce know a more complete piece of tautology than the verses 6, 7, and 8. There cannot be any the most minute difference between hostile fury, barbarian blindness and Gothic fire: religious rage, Christian zeal, and Papal piety, express one and the same idea. 2. I hardly know a stronger impropriety than complimenting the author of a didactic work by transgressing one of his principal rules. If Mr. Pope had considered how severely his friend condemned all inscriptions in verse, especially when they run into any length, he would never have given a legend of six heroic verses for Mr. Cragg's medal. (V. Addison's Works, vol. III. p. 155, 156.)

> And round the orb in lasting notes be read > Statesman, yet friend to truth, &c.

---

20. Mr. Addison boldly asserts that there never was a single martyr amongst the primitive heretics; and even draws inferences from this undoubted fact, in favour of the truth of pure, orthodox Christianity. (Vol. III. p. 301.) To connect different degrees of persuasion with different modes of opinion, appeared to me highly unphilosophical; however, I consulted my ingenious friend Dr. Middleton who (I recollected) had placed the Christian martyrs in a very new and curious light. (See Free Inquiry, &c. in his works, Vol. I. p. 162—173.) He immediately informed me from the authority of all history, and particularly that of Eusebius, Eusebius, (Hist. Ecclesiast. v. 16) that the heretics had their martyrs, as well as the orthodox: upon verifying the quotation, I even found that the sectaries boasted of the great number of their martyrs, and that their antagonists did not pretend to deny the fact.

---

21. Dr. Lardner (Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, Vol. II. p. 18. 28. 63.) and the celebrated Mosheim, (Ecclesiastical History, translated by Maclaine, Vol. I. p. 76) have both imagined, that as all Domitian's laws had been repealed by the senate, Pliny the younger was at loss what rule of conduct to observe in respect to the Christians. (V. Epist. X. 97.) It may be allowed from the authority of Suetonius (in Domit. c. 23) and Lactantius (de Mortib. Persec. c. 2) that the senate in the first fury of a just revenge, attempted to abolish every memorial of the tyrant; but it should have been recollected, from a still better authority, (Plin. Epist. x. 66,) that his prudent successor soon settled the general administration of the empire, by restoring the constitutions and rescripts of Domitian to their former validity: "Epistolis etiam Domitiani standum est." It is evident from thence, that Domitian enacted no laws relative to the Christians; and that till Pliny thought it necessary to consult the emperor upon a case which grew daily more important, the governors of the provinces had no rule of conduct but their own discretion. This observation might lead to some important important consequences in regard to the history of the first age of Christianity.

---

22. M. de Voltaire has given us, among many other ingenious trifles, a dialogue between Marcus Aurelius and a Recolet friar. The latter accuses the former of having persecuted the Christians to whom he had such obligations. The emperor assures him, that he never persecuted any one. (V. Oeuvres de Voltaire, tom. iv. p. 384.) The poet forgot the characters of his speakers. 1. It is very natural that the friar, a friend to miracles and legends, should adopt the story of the Thundering Legion; but he would likewise have adopted the catastrophe of the fable, which exalts to the highest degree the gratitude of Marcus towards his benefactors. (Tertull. Apolog. c. 5. Lardner's Jewish and Heathen Testimonies. Vol. II. p. 226, &c.) 2. The emperor was too sincere to deny that many martyrs suffered during his reign, and that he himself added to the severity of the laws already in force against the Christians. (V. Lardner, vol. ii. p 179—221; and Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 78.)

---

23. M. de Voltaire rejects with a magisterial haughtiness the famous Chinese inscription, which relates the origin of Christianity in that country, and asserts with as decisive a confidence that Christianity was absolutely unknown in China in the time of Charlemagne. If he will take the trouble of reading a very curious dissertation in the Estratto della Letteratura Europea, per l'anno, 1761, p. 1, 2, 4, and which is perfectly agreeable to the principles of M. de Guignes, (V. Mém. de l'Acad. tom. 30.) he may see the two following positions established upon the most convincing proofs. 1. It is certain from the Chinese historians, the Nestorian writers, and the Arabian and European travellers, that a very considerable Christian church subsisted in China from the 7th to the 14th century, which at first flourished very much under the peculiar protection of the emperors. 2. That the inscription carries every mark of authenticity, and is perfectly agreeable to the history of those times and even to the character and doctrines of the Nestorian sect. I am not insensible that before this question was so accurately examined, some learned men have had doubts concerning the inscription; but where they doubted, Voltaire decided. Though his objections are very contemptible, yet I am still more offended at the haughtiness of his unbelief, than at his unbelief itself.

---

24. M. de Fontenelle, in that elegant piece of history and philosophy which he has extracted from the learned rubbish of Vandale, discovers many ingenious reasons which account for Porphyry's producing or even inventing oracles that were favourable to the Christians. (Oeuvres de Fontenelle, tom. ii. p. 239, &c.) Perhaps if he had attended to the well grounded suspicions of his own author, he might have concluded with still more reason, that Porphyry never did produce them; them; and that the work in question is spurious. Is not this a little too like the story of the golden tooth?

---

25. M. de Fontenelle (tom. ii. p. 383) is mistaken when he thinks the Romans prohibited the Carthaginians by treaty, from offering any more human sacrifices. The original treaties between those powerful republics are still extant in Polybius and Livy. I need only refer to them. Gelon, tyrant of Syracuse, is indeed reported (though not upon the very best authority) to have imposed that humane condition after the battle of Himera. (V. Diodor. Sicul. l. xi. 21; et Wesseling ad loc.) M. de Fontenelle is pleased to accuse the Romans of contradicting their own practice; since they sacrificed a man every year to Jupiter Latiates. But I shall not believe upon the words only of Porphyry, Lactantius, and Prudentius, that human sacrifices were ever a regular part of the Roman worship.

---

26. I think M. de Fontenelle has very injudiciously called Homer and Hesiod the first Grecian philosophers. Reason and inspiration are widely different. The first poets were the prophets and theologians of their time; not the philosophers. Several great sects of philosophy, who, from either inclination or policy, chose to connect their system with the established theology, were obliged to consult the most approved interpreters of it; which scheme of conciliation has often betrayed them into absurdities. Thus in more modern ages the great Descartes has attempted to explain transubstantiation; and the greater Newton to expound the Revelations. Fontenelle might have spared his satirical exclamation, "Voilà les raisonnemens de cette antiquité si vantée." (Oeuvres de Fontenelle, tom. ii. p. 251.)

---

27. Lord Shaftesbury has observed that after despotism was fully established at Rome, not a statue, picture, or medal, not a tolerable piece of architecture afterwards appeared. Mr. Addison adopted this remark with great complacency, and Mr. Warton received it too easily. (Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope, p. 176.) However, if we take the period of the reigns of Vespasian and Commodus, which is certainly a very fair one, we must confine this observation to painting alone. For the state of architecture, I need only appeal to the Coliseum and Trajan's column; the statues of Antinous and Marcus Aurelius will give us an idea of the taste of sculpture. Every connoisseur knows that the highest perfection of the Roman medals is to be sought for in the times of Trajan and Hadrian.

---

28. The Epistles of Phalaris have been pronounced spurious after a much fuller hearing than they deserved. (See the Controversy between Boyle and Bentley.) Let me however discover another mark of their being so. Phalaris enlarges very much (see Epistle lxx. &c.) upon the glory, the the honours, and the rewards that awaited the murderers of tyrants. This was, I acknowledge, a general law of nations amongst the Grecian republics; but I think it highly improbable that it could have been so ancient as the age of Phalaris, who (if he was not, as Pliny reports, the first tyrant in the world) may be proved to have flourished about 600 years before Christ. (Bentley against Boyle, p. 29—91.) Such a custom supposes many revolutions of freedom and servitude in the several Grecian republics; who were willing to intimidate future tyrants, by arming and encouraging every private citizen to destroy them. Such was the conduct of the Athenians when they recovered their liberty in 512; and the honours which were paid to the memory of Harmodius and Aristogiton became a model for the rest of Greece.

---

29. I am surprised that during that long and sharp controversy concerning the Epistles of Phalaris, neither party should have paid the least attention to the time of the foundation of Agrigentum; since the tyrant could have no existence before his city. This last was built according to the authentic accounts of Thucydides, (lib. vi. sub init.) 153 years later than Syracuse, founded, according to the Chronicle of Eusebius, in the second year of the XIVth Olympiad, (Ant. Ch. 735,) or, according to the more accurate computation, which Sir John Marsham has formed upon the Arundel marbles, A. C. 769. (Canon. Chron. p. 490. 495.) These two epochas will give us 582, or 616: either of them is sufficient to refute the earlier date, which Eusebius himself has given us for the age of Phalaris; and to reduce that controversy within narrower bounds.

---

30. The author of the Adventurer, No. 127, (Mr. Joseph Warton, concealed under the signature of Z.) concludes his ingenious parallel of the ancients and moderns by the following remark: "That age will never again return; when a Pericles, after walking with Plato in a portico built by Phidias, and painted by Apelles, might repair to hear a pleading of Demosthenes, or a tragedy of Sophocles." It will never return, because it never existed. Pericles (who died in the fourth year of the LXXXIXth Olympiad. Ant. Ch. 429. Dio. Sic. l. xii. 46.) was confessedly the patron of Phidias, and the contemporary of Sophocles; but he could enjoy no very great pleasure in the conversation of Plato, who was born the same year that he himself died. (Diogenes Laertius in Platone, v. Stanley's History of Philosophy, p. 154.) The error is still more extraordinary with regard to Apelles and Demosthenes, since both the painter and the orator survived Alexander the Great, whose death is above a century posterior to that of Pericles, (in 323.) And indeed though Athens was the seat of every liberal art, from the days of Themistocles to those of Demetrius Phalareus, yet no particular era will afford Mr. Warton the complete synchronism he seems to wish for; as tragedy was deprived of her famous triumvirate, before the arts of philosophy phy and eloquence had attained the perfection which they soon after received from the hands of Plato, Aristotle, and Demosthenes.

---

31. Dr. Mosheim supposes that the Koran, collected by the successors of Mahomet, and which is now extant, was different from the law, which the Prophet gave the Arabians during his life-time, because in the former he appeals to and extols the latter. This fact, or rather conjecture, is founded only on a reason evidently groundless. The 114 chapters which compose that extraordinary book were brought down by the angel Gabriel upon as many different occasions; and it is no ways absurd that in his later revelations, Mahomet should appeal to those he had already received. Mr. Sale, whom Dr. Mosheim in the same place (Ecclesiastical History, v. i. p. 314) celebrates with reason as the ablest expositor of the Koran would have informed him of that particularity. (See Preliminary Discourse to the English Translation of the Koran, p. 63, 64.)

---

32. Dr. Mosheim represents the Norman pirates as absolutely devoid of any religion whatsoever. (Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 432.) It is however certain that these pirates, who were the bravest and the noblest adventurers of the Scandinavian nations, worshipped the gods of their fathers, believed in the immortality of the soul, and received with religious faith the system of doctrine laid down in their Edda, which book M. Mallet (see Introduction à l'Histoire du Danemarc) has since introduced to the general acquaintance of the public, but which was even then accessible to the curiosity of a German scholar. Dr. Mosheim's proposition is at once groundless and dangerous.

---

33. Mr. Christopher Smart, a new and very indifferent translator of Horace, (see Monthly Review, August, 1767,) conjectures, that the first lines of the art of poetry not only condemn an affected and vitiated taste in writing, but are particularly levelled against the Metamorphoses of Ovid, which are so often infected by it. The conjecture is ingenious and supported by some appearances; but it is totally repugnant to Ovid's own chronology of his works. Horace died A. U. C. Cap. 745; Ovid was banished A. U. C. 761. At that very time he was writing the Metamorphoses, and as he was leaving Rome he attempted to commit them to the flames as a rude and imperfect work: paternal love prevailed: Ovid finished the poem at Tomi and sent it to a friend at Rome with a short elegy which may be considered as a preface to it. (Trist. l. 1. Eleg. 7.) It is therefore impossible that Horace could satirise a work which still remained unfinished and in the author's hands sixteen years after Horace's death. Even in the Augustan age there was more than one poet who had occasion for the critic's advice, and the satirist's correction.

---

34. M. de Buffon speaks of complete vessels being found in the heart of mountains at a great distance distance from the sea. A fact, indeed, of a very extraordinary nature, which shews us a lively glimpse of a former world, and of arts cultivated by men who inhabited some country now overwhelmed by the sea, in ages when the modern Alps were buried under the waters; it ought therefore to be supported by some better authority than Gordon's Geographical Grammar, or an obscure commentator of Ovid's Metamorphoses. It is often to be lamented that natural philosophers are too little acquainted with history or the laws of historical evidence. Their ignorance of them sometimes deprives them of the knowledge of facts highly essential to their systems, and at other times deceives them by fables in the dress of truth. Facts either moral or natural are related by men. The value of the evidence must be determined by the character of the witness, and yet all M. de Buffon's witnesses appear levelled by an undiscriminated equality. (Buffon, Histoire Naturelle, tom. i. p. 592.)

---

35. Angora is famous for the long, beautiful, and silky hair of several sorts of animals, and particularly of its goats. M. de Buffon, as the general historian of all those animals, has often occasion to speak of so curious a distinction; but he as constantly supposes Angora to be a city of Syria, and even deduces consequences after his method, from the happy climate of that country, so congenial to those animals. (V. Histoire Naturelle, aux Articles de la Chèvre, du Chat, et du Lapin, tom. v. et vi.)

This

This supposed Syrian city is, however, in reality one of the most considerable towns of Asia Minor, which at present contains 100,000 souls, and is the seat of a Turkish pasha, and which was formerly, under the name of Ancyra, the capital of the province of Galatia. This breed of goats is even confined to about thirty miles round Ancyra, and easily degenerates when carried to any distance. (V. Pococke's Description of the East, vol. ii. p. ii. p. 86—90.) M. de Buffon was not betrayed into this error by any preconceived system. On the contrary, the latitude of Spain agrees still more strictly with Asia Minor than with Syria.

---

36. M. de Voltaire (V. Le Corneille de Voltaire, tom. ix. p. 153.) praises Racine and Corneille for having, both of them, very judiciously avoided shewing the contempt which the Romans and indeed all mankind entertained for the Jewish nation. Berenice was the heroine of their tragedy, and the reader might possibly have thought too much like a Roman. Voltaire might have added, that those poets were equally in the right in representing her as a young princess, although at the time of her separation from Titus she was above fifty. History must receive and can only explain the most improbable facts when they are properly averred. Poetry ought always to prefer agreeable probabilities to harsh and unlikely truths. The proof of Berenice's age is clear and easy. Her father Agrippa died A. C. 44. She was then sixteen and already married to her uncle Herod, King of Chalcis.

cis. Titus succeeded his father Vespasian in the year 79, 35 years after the death of Agrippa. (V. Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, tom. i. p. 839, de l'édit. in 12mo. et toutes les autorités qu'il cite.)

---

37. That ingenious trifler, Mr. Horace Walpole, has given us (Royal and Noble Authors, vol. i. p. 67—81.) a very curious article of the brave and learned Earl Rivers. He is, however, inaccurate in the account of a tournament in Smithfield between the Earl and the great Bastard of Burgundy. 1. The tournament which was held just before the death of Philip, Duke of Burgundy, that is to say in the beginning of the summer 1467 (V. Mémoires d'Olivier de la Marche, p. 489, &c. in 4to. à Gand, 1566, et Chronique de Bourgogne dans le second volume de Philippe de Comines, p. 189.) could have no relation with the nuptials of Duke Charles and the Princess of England, which were celebrated in July, 1468. From this mistaken date Mr. Walpole extracts a very puerile reflexion. The hero and the virago might think the combat of their near relation a proper compliment to their union; but the brother of Edward the Fourth's wife can scarcely be deemed a near relation of Edward's sister. 2. Mr. Walpole draws his account of the combat from an Englishman who thought that when the champions were parted the superiority was clearly on Earl Rivers's side. Olivier de la Marche was of a different opinion; but he viewed the whole affair with the partial eyes of a subject of Burgundy. Mr. Walpole shews at least an equal equal partiality to the English knight, when he extols Earl Rivers's generosity, for disdaining the first day to make use of the advantage he had gained by killing the Bastard's horse. The advantage itself was a contravention of the laws of chivalry; the Earl was forced to excuse himself both to the king, who expressed great anger, and to his adversary who readily accepted his excuses and his assurances that the blow was purely accidental. (V. Oliv. de la Marche, p. 91. Mémoires sur la Chevalerie par M. de St. Palaye, &c.) I am sorry Mr. Walpole never met with Olivier de la Marche. He might have added to his article of Earl Rivers a multitude of those little anecdotes he is so fond of.

---

38. M. de Buffon often sacrifices truth to eloquence, and consistency to variety. In the fourth volume of his Natural History, (V. Discours sur la Nature des Animaux, p. 13—34.) the brain is the general sensorium of the animal; and the center of the whole nervous system, with which it communicates by an universal action and reaction; in a word the seat of sentiment and the spring of action in every creature destitute of an intellectual soul. Such is the basis of M. de Buffon's profound though obscure metaphysics. But in the seventh volume (Discours sur les Animaux Carnassiers, p. 13. 16, &c.) this basis is entirely overturned. The brain is degraded into dead matter, insensible, and scarcely organized, which serves only to transmit to the nerves the nourishment it had received from the the arteries. The diaphragma succeeds to all the former powers of the brain, at least to many of them; for M. de Buffon disdains to acquaint us either with the defects he discovered in his old system, or with the parts of it he still chuses to retain, and the manner he connects them with his new principles. Instead of a candid confession that he had been seduced by a delusive though brilliant hypothesis, he endeavours to make the world forget it, by observing a profound silence on that head, in the copious and curious index he has drawn up himself for his great work.

---

39. M. de Buffon seems to be a very poor classical scholar. He always cites Aristotle in Latin, and most of his quotations from the ancients appear borrowed from Gesner and Aldrovandus. It is a great pity, as this ignorance has deprived him of many curious materials. His admirable history of the elephant (Histoire Naturelle, tom. xii. p. 1—93.) might have been still more curious and equally authentic; since I think the testimony of a Pliny, &c. who appeal to the whole Roman people as to what they saw in the amphitheatre, deserves as much credit as the stories a traveller brings back from Congo or Siam. M. de Buffon might perhaps have determined with less confidence that the climate of Europe is too cold for elepants. (V. p. 30---47.) I am sensible that there are no examples of that animal's multiplying or even subsisting in a state of nature beyond the limits of Asia and Africa. But there are many of the elephant's being being employed in war in Spain, Sicily, and the southern parts of Italy, of their going through all the fatigues of a campaign, &c. Those of Hannibal perished indeed in the severe winter marches that general made over the Alps and Apennines. A curious passage of Juvenal (Sat. xii. 102.) informs us that droves of elephants belonging to the emperor were kept in the fields round Ardea. They were probably maintained for the public shews; and it is to other droves of the same nature that we are to refer the elephant's bones found in Tuscany and other parts of Italy. (V. Dissertazioni del Cavalier Guazzeri, p. 68, &c.)

---

40. Father Pagi, to whom good letters have many obligations, shews (in his Dissertatio Hypatica, p. 368.) that he read history like a monk. A writer or two of his own complexion had made use of the words consulatus, fasces, &c. in speaking of the Saracen kings of Corduba, the (khalifs of Spain of the house of Ommiyah.) Now as the kings of France, Italy, &c. of those ages, really took the title of consul, Father Pagi very sagaciously concludes that the Arab khalifs imitated their example, without ever reflecting on the enormous difference there was between them. The northern chiefs had adopted the religion and manners of the conquered nations, and still revered the power they had overturned. The Musulmans detested that religion, were strangers to those manners, and despised that power. The successors of the Prophet would have disdained a title which levelled levelled them with the servants of the Christian dog. In them the imitation of the Roman style would have been absurd; in the authors of those times it was easy and natural. Sallust was a more correct writer than Eulogius or the Abbot Samson of Cordova; yet Sallust (Bell. Jugurth. c. 12.) speaks of the Lictor proxumus of a Numidian prince, who had guards and officess, but who certainly had no lictors. This translation of ideas is common in all languages.

---

41. Olearius, as quoted by M. de Buffon, (Histoire Naturelle, tom. xi. p. 241.) rejects with scorn the antipathy which the ancients have supposed between the horse and the camel, and of which they have related such celebrated instances. Every caravan, and every stable in Persia is, according to Olearius, a proof of the contrary. But this reasoning is very fallacious. The instances mentioned by the ancients suppose those animals unacquainted with each other, meeting for the first time, and left entirely to their natural impressions. But it is not the least proof of the empire of man over the animals, that by habit and education he can subdue those impressions, and can establish a degree of harmony and even of familiarity between the most discordant natures. The dog and the cat are domestic evidences of this assertion.

---

42. Pliny, speaking of an animal, (Machlis,) supposed to be the rein-deer, says the creature was only to be found in Scandinavia. Cæsar describes the the same animal as a native of the Hercynian forest in Germany. M. de Buffon is struck with this contradiction, (Histoire Naturelle, tom. xii. p. 82.) which is indeed only apparent. Our author, who is a better naturalist than an antiquarian, did not know that the vast island or peninsula of Scandinavia was considered by most of the ancients as a part of Germany; (V. Cluver. German. Antiq. l. iii. p. 159, &c.) that the ocean was the northern boundary of Germany; (Tacit. de Morib. German. c. 1, &c.) that the Hercynian forest lost itself in the most remote parts of that unknown country. (Cæsar de Bell. Gallic. l. vi. c. 25.)

---

43. M. de Buffon asserts (Hist. Natur. tom. xi. p. 229.) that the camel has been so completely subdued by man, that there remains no individuals of the species in a state of nature and freedom. This may be true enough in our times, but it was not so in those of Diodorus Siculus. That curious traveller says there were wild camels in Arabia. (Bibliot. l. iii. c. 44. Edit. Wesseling.) The fact seems probable in itself, and it confirms M. de Buffon's opinion, that the camel was originally a native of Arabia, for whose sandy deserts he and he alone seems formed.

---

44. M. Marmontel has made a singular mistake in his elegant translation of Lucan. That poet had said of the Gallic Druids, (Lucan. Pharsal. l. i. v. 452.)

> Solis nosse Deos, et cœli numina vobis
> Aut solis nescire datum.——

In

In the French version of the Pharsalia, this exclamation is turned into a panegyric of the doctrine of the Gallican church: "Vous seuls avez le privilège de choisir entre tous les dieux, ceux qu'on doit adorer, ceux qu'on doit méconnoître." But the poet was admiring not the truth but the singularity of the Druidical system of theology. Observing how much it disagreed with that of other nations, he cries out, "The knowledge of the Gods has been granted or has been refused to you alone." (V. le Lucan de Marmontel, tom. i. p. 32.)

---

45. The King of Prussia appears throughout his writings an enemy to the English. His description of the battle of Blenheim is a glaring instance of his partiality. (V. l'Art de la Guerre, chant vi.)

> Ainsi le grand Eugène, à ce fameux village
> Où Tallard et Marsin s'étoient très mal postés, > D'un effort général donna de tous côtés, &c.

The history contained in these lines is as erroneous as the poetry of them is indifferent. The great Eugene, to whom the sole glory of the day is ascribed, commanded the right wing of the allied army, and was so well opposed by Marsin and the Elector of Bavaria, that his repeated attacks made no impression on them. It was his colleague, the Duke of Marlborough, who improved the many blunders of Tallard, passed the rivulet, broke the centre of the French army, took the flower of their troops in the village of Blenheim, and, in a word, obtained a complete victory.

(V. Mémoires de Feuquières, tom. iii. p. 357—387. Kane's Campaigns, p. 57—61. Histoire Générale par Voltaire, tom. v. p. 277.)

---

46. The translator of M. de Haller's poems has inserted a note which is to me incomprehensible. The poet (p. 112.) had exclaimed with indignation, "Où coule aujourd'hui le sang des Muhleren et des Bubenberg? Bubenberg, (adds the translator,) "famille d'une ancienne noblesse à Berne..... Muhleren, un officier de cette famille, qui étoit aussi d'une ancienne noblesse, fit paroître son courage dans la défense de Morat contre Charles le Hardi en 1476." 1. If the family was noble, as it certainly was, it seems superfluous to add that each individual of it was so likewise. 2. I am perfectly well acquainted with the Bubenberg who defended Morat so gallantly against Charles the Hardy. His name was Adrian; and neither Schilling, a contemporary historian, nor that indefatigable collector, M. Leu, (in his Helvetic Dictionary,) makes the least mention of that extraordinary name of Muhleren, which I never heard of, but which M. de Haller himself seems clearly to separate from that of Bubenberg. This passage is more singular, as I have some reason to believe that the translator is M. de Tscharner, of one of the best families of Berne; and who has written with applause a history of his own country in the German language. (V. Choix des Poësies Allemandes, par M. Huber. tom. iii. p. 242.)

ALPHABETICAL LIST.

	Nos.
1. Addison	18, 20.
2. Boyle and Bentley	28.
3. Buffon	34, 35, 38, 39, 42, 43.
4. Cicero	6.
5. Corneille and Racine	36.
6. Dacier	2.
7. Fontenelle	24, 25, 26.
8. Freret	13.
9. Guichardt	9.
10. Guthrie	7.
11. Hirtius	8.
12. Hume	3.
13. Hurd	1.
14. Lardner and Mosheim	21.
15. Maillet	15.
16. Marmontel	44.
17. Mongault and Middleton	5.
18. Montesquieu	11.
19. Mosheim	31, 32.
20. Muratori	12.
21. Notitia W. I.	4.
22. Olearius	41.
23. Pagi	40.
24. Phalaris	29.
25. Pope	19.
26. Prussia (King of)	45.
27. Sallust	10.
28. Shaftesbury, &c.	27.
29. Smart	33.
30. Temple (Sir William)	14.
31. Tscharner	46.
32. Voltaire	16, 17. 22, 23. 36
33. Walpole	37.
34. Warton	30.

AUGERII GISLENII BUSBEQUII OMNIA QUÆ EXTANT. Lugd. Batavorum, ex Officinâ Elzevirianâ in 1633, in 12*mo.*

THE Travels of Busbequius consist of four epistles, and contain the narrative of his two embassies from Ferdinand, king of the Romans, and afterwards emperor, to the Ottoman Porte. (November 1554—November 1562.) In the first, he describes his journey from Vienna to Amasia; the second includes the events and observations of a seven years' residence, or rather imprisonment, at C. P. It was his duty and his amusement to study the characters of Soliman II. and his ministers, the policy of the governmenment, the discipline of the camp, and the virtues and vices of the most formidable enemies of Christendom. The tragic adventures of Mustapha and Bajazet are told with the spirit and dignity of an historian. His ears, or those of his interpreters, were always open to the reports of foreign countries, of Crim Tartary, Mingrelia, and Carthay. We are indebted to his curiosity for the first copy of the marbles of Ancyra, and the most ancient MS. of Dioscorides; and he viewed, with the eyes of a naturalist, the numerous collection of animals that enlivened his solitude. Busbequius is my old and familiar acquaintance; a frequent companion in my post-chaise. His latinity is eloquent, his manner is lively, his remarks are judicious.

THE

THE following Notes were written by Mr. Gibbon the summer before his death, at Sheffield-Place, in an interleaved fourth edition of Harwood's View of the various editions of the Greek and Roman Classics. It is to be regretted that he did not go through the whole work as he intended; but these perhaps may be interesting to collectors of books.

HOMER, B. C. 850. The positive age of Homer is of less moment than the relative distance between the author and his work. After three or four centuries he might expatiate in the fields of fiction: but if Homer lived within fourscore years of the Trojan war (Mitford's History of Greece, vol. i. p. 166, &c.) he might converse with the last companions of Ulysses and Æneas, and the probable human part of his narrative may be almost read as the history of his own times.

HOMERI OPERA inter Poetas Græcos Heroici Carminis ab Henr. Stephano.

HOMERI ILIAS, Gr. cum veteribus Scholiast. a Johan. Baptist. Gaspar d'Anse de Villoison. Venet. 1788, in folio.—The vain man had promised a standard Homer, an ancient variorum from the editions of Alexandria, Athens, Marseilles, &c. but—parturiunt montes!

VITA HOMERI, inter Opuscula a Gale, p. 118. A loose Essay on his Universal Knowledge.

VITA HOMERI, ad calcem Herodoti. Some genuine traditions are perhaps mingled with the low tales of a grammarian.

APOTHEOSIS HOMERI, a Gisberto Cupero, Amstel. 1683, in 4to. A curious and learned interpretation of an ancient monument.

ANTIQUITATES HOMERICÆ, ab Everhard. Feilhio Argentorat. 1743, in 12mo. A poor sketch of a noble subject.

GNOMOLOGIA HOMERI, a Jacob. Duport. Cantab. 1660, in 4to.

The moral sentences of Homer, with a copious and entertaining collection of imitations, allusions, applications, parodies, &c. The Abbé de Longuerve, a tasteless pedant, valued Feilhius and Duport more than Homer himself.

GEOGRAPHIA HOMERI, ab H. Schlichthorst. Gotting. 1787, in 12mo.

GEOGRAPHIA HOMERI, ab Aug. Gul. Schlegel. Hanover, 1788, in 12mo.—The tasks of two German students.

AN INQUIRY INTO THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF HOMER. London, 1735, in 8vo, by Blackwall of Aberdeen, or rather by Bishop Berkley. A fine though sometimes fanciful effort of genius and learning.

AN ESSAY ON THE ORIGINAL GENIUS AND WRITINGS OF HOMER, by Robert Wood, Esq. London, 1775, in 4to. Pompous and superficial, the the scholar, the traveller, and politician! Yet not without taste and merit.

THE ILIAD AND ODYSSEY OF HOMER, BY ALEXANDER POPE. London, 1771, 9 volumes in crown 8vo. The most splendid poetical version that any language has produced.

AN ESSAY ON POPE'S ODYSSEY, BY SPENCE. London, 1747, in 12mo. Pleased Pope, and can please none else; dry and narrow!

ILIAS ET ODYSSEA, BY BARNES, 2 vols. 4to. 2l. 2s. Cantab. 1711.

When BARNES's HOMER appeared at Cambridge, Dr. Bentley expressed his contempt for the edition and the editor, who understood (he said) as much Greek as a Greek cobbler. Barnes is indeed a vulgar critic, and surely much inferior to Lucian's Micyllus.

ILIAS ET ODYSSEA, Gr. 2 vols. fol. Glasg. 1758.

As the eye is the organ of fancy, I read Homer with more pleasure in the Glasgow folio. Through that fine medium the poet's sense appears more beautiful and transparent. Bishop Louth has said that he could discover only one error in that accurate edition, the omission of an iota subscribed to a dative. Yet how could a man of taste read Homer with such literal attention?

HOMERI OPERA, A BERGLERO. 2 VOLS. 12MO. 5s. AMST. 1707.

DR. CLARKE'S EDITION. 2 VOLS. 4TO. ILIAS, LONDON, 1729; ODYSSEY, 1740.

Though not a Bentley, Dr. Clarke was a scholar and a critic. Even his metaphysical genius was usefully employed on the nice distinctions of grammar and language. His edition of Homer deserves much esteem.

ERNESTI'S EDITION OF HOMER. 5 VOLS. 8VO. LIPS. 1759.

Ernesti's Homer is a republication of Clarke's edition, with some improvements of his own. But the more original labours of Heyne of Gottingen have raised, and will doubtless answer the public expectation.

A HYMN TO CERES, attributed to HOMER, has very lately been discovered by a German, in a Library at Moscow, and published by Rhunkenius in Holland. Lugd. Bat. 1780, in 8*vo.*

I am by no means ungrateful for the discovery of this mythological hymn; yet I should be far more delighted with the resurrection of the Margites of Homer, the picture of private life, and the model of ancient comedy. What an universal genius! We may think indeed of Shakespeare and Voltaire.

HESIOD, B. C. 870. If Hesiod, according to Velleius Paterculus, lived about the first Olympiad, 120 years after Homer, his rustic simplicity will only mark the different state of Bœotian and Ionic civilisation.

HESIODI OPERA ET DIES inter Poetas Gnomicos, BRUNCK. His only genuine work (without the Invocation to the Muses) according to his countrymen near Mount Helicon. (Pausanias, l. ix. p. 771, p. 771, Edit. Kuhn.) In the Theogony I can discern a more recent age; yet it passed for Hesiod's in the time of Herodotus.

The GNOMICA, or Moral Poems of Theognis, Phocylides and Solon in the Poetæ Heroici of Henry Stephens, and the Analecta and Poetæ Gnomici of Brunck.

PINDAR, inter Poetas Græcos Lectii.

THE ODES OF PINDAR, translated into English Verse, with a Dissertation on the Olympic Games, &c. by Gilbert West. London, 1750. 2 vols. in 12mo. West has learning, good sense, and a tolerable style of versification; but Gray and Dryden alone should have translated the Odes of Pindar, and they did much better than translate.

In the Greek Poets of Henry Stephens and Lectius, and in the Analecta and Poetæ Gnomici of Brunck, we may read the fragments yet extant of CALLINUS, ARCHILOCHUS, ALCMAN, MELANIPPIDES, IBYCUS, TELESTES, MIMNERMUS, ALCÆUS, SAPPHO, ERINNA, STESICHORUS, SIMONIDES, PANYASIS, BACCHYLIDES. The shipwreck of lyric poetry is the heaviest loss the Grecian literature has sustained. How delightful would it be to glow with the free-born ardour of Alcæus, and to melt with the amorous passions of Sappho! Yet Pindar still survives, the last, but, according to the ancients, the greatest of the lyric choir. The dearest objects of my regret are the better Iambics of Archi-Archilochus, (whose inventive genius has been compared with that of Homer himself,) and the pathetic elegies of Simonides, of which such an exquisite specimen has escaped the injuries of time.

The fragments of the martial Tyrtæus, (and they are indeed martial,) which are contained in the Analecta et Poetæ Gnomici of Brunck, have been published in separate editions.

SPARTAN LESSONS, or the praise of valour, by TYRTÆUS, in Greek. Glasgow, 1759, in 8vo.

TYRTÆUS, Greek and Latin; a Christian. Adolpho Klotzio. Altenburg, 1767, in 8vo.

LE THÉATRE DES GRECS, PAR LE PÈRE BRUMOY; Amsterdam, 1732. 6 vols. in 12mo. and the last improved edition, Paris, 1785—89. 12 vols. in 8vo. Like most of the Jesuits, Brumoy was a literary bigot, and a superficial scholar. Instead of studying the original, he uses and abuses the Latin version (μυριοι, sexcenti, six cent.) Yet on the faith of this worthy interpreter, many a French critic has talked about the Greek theatre.

L'ŒDIPE DE SOPHOCLE, et les OISEAUX D'ARISTOPHANE, traduites par Boivin le Cadet: one of the best scholars that France ever produced. Paris, 1729.

HISTOIRE D'HÉRODOTE TRADUITE DU GREC, PAR M. LARCHER, avec des Notes, &c. Paris, 1786. 7 vols in 8vo.

The

The version is clear and correct; the notes are learned and judicious; and a scholar will only regret that Larcher has not published an improved edition of the Greek text. Yet this is the man whom Voltaire made the object of his ridicule.

RECHERCHES ET DISSERTATIONS SUR HÉRODOTE, par le Président Bouhier. Dijon, 1746, in 4to.

THE SPEECHES OF ISÆUS, translated, with notes, by William Jones. London, 1778, in 4to.

XENOPHONTIS MEMORABILIA SOCRATIS, ab Ernesti, Gr. Lipsiæ, 1755, in 12mo.

XENOPHON'S EXPEDITION OF CYRUS, by Edward Spelman. London, 1747. 2 vols. 8vo.

One of the most accurate and elegant prose translations that any language has produced. It is enriched with many notes, and Forster's Geographical dissertation.

L'EXPÉDITION DE CYRUS, traduite par LARCHER. Paris, 1778, 2 vols. in 12mo.

Histoire des Animaux, par ARISTOTE, en Grec et en François, par Camus. Paris, 1783. 2 vols. in 4to. Camus is a scholar and a naturalist. The first volume contains a pure text; the second is an elaborate parallel between Aristotle's knowledge and the discoveries of the moderns.

Aristoteles de Mirabilibus Auscultationibus, Gr. et Lat. Gotting. 1786, in 4to. This collection of strange stories, which may be drawn from Aristotle's totle's works, is illustrated by the copious and curious notes of John Beekman, the editor.

Apollodori Atheniensis Bibliotheca, Greek et Lat. cum notis Chr. G. Heyne. Gotting. 1782, 1783. 4 vols. in 12mo. The text is comprised in the first volume: the three last are a mine of mythological erudition.

Polybii Megalopolitani Historiarum quicquid superest, Gr. et Lat. recensuit, digessit, illustravit Johannes Schleighæuser. Lipsiæ, 1789—1793. 6 vols. (yet unfinished) in 8vo. This accomplished edition, both for the text and notes, will soon extinguish the preceding ones. The fragments are disposed in such lucid order, that we seem to have recovered the forty books of the history of Polybius.

The General History of Polybius, translated from the Greek, by Hampton. London, 1772, 1773. 4 vols. in 8vo. The English translator has preserved the admirable sense, and improved the coarse style of his Arcadian original. A grammarian, like Dionysius, might despise Polybius for not understanding the structure of words; and Lord Monboddo might wish for a version into Attic Greek.

L'Histoire de Polybe traduite du Grec par le Père Vincent Thuillier, avec un Commentaire Militaire par le Chevalier de Folard, Amsterdam, 1753—1759, 7 vols. in 4to. The mixed offspring of a monk ignorant of tactics, and a soldier ignorant rant of Greek. Language and history are tortured to support the column; but in his modern anecdotes and observations, Folard is lively, interesting, and authentic.

Diodorus Siculus.—Histoire Universelle de Diodore de Sicile, traduite par l'Abbé Terasson, Paris, 1756. 7 vols. in 12mo. The execution is tolerable, but the design was singular for a mathematician, who despised history and the ancients.

Apollonii Sophistæ Lexicon, Iliad et Odyss. ab Hieronym. Tollio, Lugd. Bat. 1788, 2 vols. 8vo.

Novum Lexicon Græcum in Pindarum et Homerum a Christ. Tobia Damm. Berolini, 1774. 4to. If we compare these two Lexicons, the Greek in his long language must veil his bonnet to the German, a most useful interpreter of Homer.

AP-

APPENDIX

TO THE TREATISE ON THE POSITION OF THE MERIDIONAL LINE,

AND

INQUIRY INTO THE SUPPOSED CIRCUMNAVIGATION OF AFRICA BY THE ANCIENTS.

Dr. VINCENT, Dean of Westminster, to Lord SHEFFIELD.

MY LORD, Deanry, Westminster, Nov. 6th, 1814.

HAD proof been wanting of Mr. Gibbon's indefatigable spirit of research, his Dissertation, which you have put into my hands, would have shewn that he was as highly qualified for the great work which he accomplished, by patient industry, as by his learning, penetration, and discernment.

I have sometimes, by way of amusement, traced Mr. Gibbon through his authorities in several detached portions of his History, and on every subject but one I have found the extent of his acquisitions, the adjustment of his evidences, the accuracy of his deductions, and the comprehensive view of his subject, such as to place him in the very first rank of historians.

It is evident that in the earlier part of his life, before before his pursuits were concentred in one great object of his ambition, he had exercised his talents in various speculations of curious inquiry, as his inclination, or perhaps accident directed. Of these your lordship has given an ample specimen already in the two volumes of his miscellaneous research; but his dissertation on Geography, Navigation and Commerce, which you now propose to communicate to the public, as it is in itself of a superior cast, so it is to me, individually, of greater interest, as it embraces a subject upon which the labour of my life has been employed, and fortunately ratifies my decision of the question by deducing the same conclusions from the same premises.

Our mutual correspondence on this subject is so similar, that, unless plagiarism were demonstrably impracticable, it might be imputed to either party with every appearance of probability to support the charge. The proof, however, to the contrary, is unequivocal, for Mr. Gibbon died in January, 1794, and my first edition of the Periplûs of the Erythrêan Sea was not published till 1800. Neither was it possible for me to have seen Mr. Gibbon's memoir, as it was in your lordship's custody till October, 1814. If, then, we have both used the same materials, and applied them to the same purpose, without communication, it is but reasonable to allow that the sole object of both must have been the investigation of truth.

That I am proud of this coincidence of opinion, may naturally be supposed, for it will appear from the the Dissertation itself that Mr. Gibbon had examined this subject with the utmost attention, and formed his judgment upon mature deliberation. My own arguments, and the conclusions deduced from them, are stated at large in the Periplûs, at p. 186, Part the first; and at p. 661, Part the second, there is an express dissertation on the Venetian planisphere of Fra Mauro, which exhibits a southern termination of Africa, thirty-nine years previous to the voyage of Gama. My work has probably not come under your lordship's contemplation, but I recommend you to consult the second edition as far more correct than the former one. It was published in 1807, comprising the Voyage of Nearchus and the Periplûs, under the general title of the Navigation of the Ancients in the Indian Ocean, and completed in 1809, with a translation of the two original voyages, and the Greek text.

I am sensible that I had given offence to many eminent persons in the republic of letters, by questioning the authority of Herodotus in regard to the Phenician voyage round Africa in the reign of Neko; and it must be confessed, that it stands on very different grounds from similar voyages imputed to Hanno, Eudoxus, and Antipater; but by comparing it with the voyage of Nearchus it was easy to shew what ancient navigators could, or could not do; and by contemplating the reiterated attempts of the Portuguese for almost a century before they succeeded, it was natural to conclude that the Phenician voyage performed in three years, years, must be a fiction of the Egyptian priests, without impeaching the veracity of Herodotus.

The Phenicians directed their course by the stars without instruments, and the navigators in the Indian ocean, as late as the time of Ptolemy, sailed by the Canóbus, as the southern polar star. But that star is in latitude 37° from the pole, by which we may judge of the danger of adopting it for the direction of a course in the southern hemisphere. The currents, it is true, round the Cape, favour an attempt from the east, but again the currents for twenty degrees in the neighbourhood of Cape Verd, are as directly adverse. Could they double such a Cape by rowing near the coast? or durst they stand out to sea to double it as modern navigators do? These are my grand objections to the Phenician voyage, and with all the respect I bear to the Father of History, the authority of his Egyptian priests is directly contradicted by Polybius, Strabo, Ptolemy, and Scylax; and equally rejected by Purchas, D'Anville, Gossellin, and Robertson, among the moderns; to this list let me add the name of Horsley, who personally expressed to me his conviction, and the testimony of Gibbon, whose evidence I value as highly as any that has been given by the ancients or the moderns. Very happy should I have been, if I could have included the illustrious names of Larcher and Rennell in the number; but I respect them both too much, to give offence by entering into a consideration of their arguments.

I conclude, my lord, that there are several other

Tracts to be inserted in the volume which ouy are now publishing, that will be equally acceptable to the learned world; but this immediate disquisition is more interesting to me, as it corroborates all the arguments which I have advanced, and all the opinions I had formed; and give me leave to add, that if my judgment is of weight, a more masterly treatise than this never came from the pen of Gibbon.

I have the honour to subscribe myself,
Your lordship's most obedient and faithful servant,
W. VINCENT.

NOTES

NOTES

ON MR. GIBBON'S TREATISE

ON

THE POSITION OF THE MERIDIONAL LINE, AND INQUIRY INTO THE SUPPOSED CIRCUMNAVIGATION OF AFRICA BY THE ANCIENTS,

By THE REV. DR. VINCENT,

DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

P. 170. Note. "The ignorance of Ptolemy."

The inaccuracy of Ptolemy in placing all islands, except those of the Mediterranean, is universally conspicuous. V.

P. 172. "A multitude of dogs and goats."

Ptolemy and Pliny give the name of Canaria to one of these islands, from the multitude of dogs, and Ptolemy places them on the coast of Mauritania.

The number and position of the isles when again visited by navigators, whether Spanish, French, or Genoese, made them readily cognizable as the Canaries of the ancients.

As the pike of Teneriffe is visible from the continent, these islands, when re-discovered, were found to be inhabited. Madeira, which is not visible, was found without inhabitants. V.

P. 178. "Arrian, or the nameless author who under the "reign of Adrian has composed a description of the "Red Sea."

Ptolemy wrote in the reign of Adrian, but it is clear from nternal evidence that the Periplûs is prior to Ptolemy, and to Marinus, cited by Ptolemy, The latter part of the reign of Claudius, or beginning of Nero's, suits best with the date of the Periplûs. V.

P. 181. "The ships of war which he (Nechus, or Neko) "built commanded the Mediterranean and the Red "Sea."

Psammitichus, the predecessor of Neko, was the first sovereign of Egypt who permitted the Greeks to trade in his ports, and why Neko should on a sudden wish to become a maritime power, it is not very evident; for, according to Jablonski, the Egyptians held the sea and seafaring men in abomination, neither do Egyptian fleets nor ships appear in history till Egypt became subject to Persia. It is true that Herodotus assigns a fleet on the Mediterranean to Neko, but I do not recollect any expedition of the Egyptians in the Mediterranean, even in a later period, except the conquest of Cyprus by Amasis. And if Neko employed Phenicians on the Red Sea, it is a proof that the Egyptians were not navigators in his reign. V.

P. 182. "The Phenicians reported that, in sailing "round Africa, they had seen the sun on their right "hand."

If the great triangle of Africa were cut off, as it appears in the map of Bertius, and this continent bounded by a vast line running north and south, this phenomenon would be verified for a great part of the voyage; but Africa ending in a point, as it does strictly speaking, it would be visible only at the apex of the triangle. It seems probable that in the contemplation of Herodotus, Africa was similar in form to the Africa of Bertius, and this is correspondent to the opinion of Juba, Manilius, Pomponius Mela, Macrobius, and Virgil.

See the map of Bertius in Vincent's Ancient Commerce, vol. ii. p. 562. Second Edition. V.

P.

P. 183. "But a southern communication between the "Indian and Atlantic ocean might be affirmed or de- "nied."

The two circumstances mentioned by Herodotus afford ground for argument; but the voyages of Scylax, Eudoxus, Antipater, &c. contain no particulars; they announce the fact, but never consider how it was accomplished. In the voyage of Nearchus and the Periplûs we have the full detail; and by considering the difficulties which occurred, it is easy to determine what ancient navigators could or could not do. V.

Ib. "My surprise and suspicion are excited by the suc- "cessful agriculture of the strangers in unknown cli- "mates and new soils; by the seeds of the temperate "zone which yield their increase between the tro- "pics."

Gossellin contends that the seasons of the southern hemi sphere do not answer to the harvests of the northern, or the seed time; and Larcher, forced to concede this, supposes that on this point Herodotus gives only his own misconceived opinion, without reference to the Egyptian records. V.

P. 184. "In twelve days from the Straits of Gibraltar "he (Hanno) reached the small island of Cerné or "Arguin."

The voyage of Hanno, brief as it is, contains circumstances and particulars sufficient to establish its veracity; and the assumption of Arguin for Cerné is the more probable from its offering convenience for a Portuguese settlement, as it had done to a Carthaginian colony. It answers likewise to the local circumstances given by Hanno. Campomanes has wildly carried Cerné to St. Thomas's, under the equator, while Arguin lies in latitude 21° north.

See Major Rennell's Dissertation, Geography of Herodotus, p. 719. V.

P. 186. " The geographer Scylax denies the possibi" lity of navigating beyond Cerné in a shallow and
" muddy ocean."

Scylax agrees with Aristotle in supposing that the Atlantic communicates with the Indian Ocean, but says the navigation to the south was impracticable on account of the weedy sea, through which a ship could not make her way. This is an illustrious truth, for the weed called salgasso does occur about Cape Blanco for many degrees, though moveable in bulk; and this proves that the ancients did navigate the Atlantic as low or lower than 20° north latitude. V.

P. 186. " The single and hasty assertion of the elder " Pliny."

It is strange that Mickle should have been misled by the authority of Pliny. But he asserts, in contradiction to his own genius of the Cape, " It is certain that Hanno doubled the Cape of Good Hope." Lusiad, p. 2. V.

P. 191. " The English translator of Camoens justifies
" this impropriety by an old Syriac version of Homer."

Asserted by Abulpharage. V.

P. 192. " According to the most liberal computation,
" Vasco de Gama discovered no more than twenty " degrees of southern latitude from the Cape of " Good Hope to Mozambique."

Gama went as high as Melinda. V.

Ib. " The African trade of the Portuguese, as it is described " by Mosto."

The voyage of Cadamosto in Ramusio gives the particulars of Prince Henry's contracts with the navigators he employed, and is equally honourable to his integrity and his wisdom. He drew much of his information from Venice,

and

and was rejoiced to tempt a Venetian mariner into his service

Cadamosto is a Venetian abbreviation of Casa di Mosto: this man was of the house, or family, of Mosto. V.

P. 194. " But the exchange, with an invisible people, " of salt for gold is described by Cadamosto on the " faith of the itinerant Arabs."

Gold was first met with by Henry's navigators at Rio d'Ouro, under the tropic of Cancer; and the sight of a few ounces brought home by them was the immediate cause of establishing an African Company at Lagos. The spirit of adventure was roused, and the prosecution of discovery ensued, which never ceased till the circumnavigation of Africa and the voyage to India were accomplished. V.

P. 195. " But the views of a soldier are not those of his " general."

That the views of Prince Henry were directed to India, is evident from his exertions to procure maps and information from Venice, at that time the great mart of oriental commerce. V.

P. 197. " A planisphere, or map of the world, was de- " lineated in the Convent of Murano at Venice."

A fac simile copy of this map is now placed in the British Museum, procured from Venice at the suggestion of W. V. and obtained by a subscription of £ 200 and upwards. The subscribers were the

India Company,
Earl of Buckinghamshire,
Earl Spencer,
Earl Macartney,
The Bishop of Durham,
Mr. Strahan,
W. Vincent.

It is a splendid performance, and contains a termination of Africa in 1459, thirty-nine years previous to the voyage of Gama. V.

P. 199. "Castaneda (1553), a laborious historian, who "might converse with Gama himself."

It may be justly supposed that Castaneda wrote from the Journal of Gama, for the narrative often adopts the first person. It has nothing of the marvellous of Osorio. V.

END OF VOL. V.

GENERAL

GENERAL INDEX.

A.

Abassides, extent of the empire of, in the ninth century, iii. 1—In the tenth, 7.
Abbey, of our Lady of the Hermits, magnificence of, i. 99.
Abdoubrahman the Third, revenue of, in the tenth century, iii. 6.
Abradates, account of, iii. 146.
Academy of Inscriptions, Memoirs of, joy of our author on purchasing the first twenty volumes of it, i. 119—His opinion of the work, ibid.
Accaioli, countess, v. 485.
Acland, colonel, killed, ii. 217.
Acton, family of, related to Mr. Gibbon, i. 23, 195, note.
Adalbert the First, account of, iii. 377—The Second, 381—The Third, 385.
Addison, style of his writings, i. 122—His explanation of the 35th Ode of the 1st book of Horace, v. 38—Mistaken in estimating the ordinary day's journey of a Roman nobleman at fourteen miles, 442—His Dialogues on the usefulness of Ancient Medals, 455—His credulity in composing his Treatise of the Christian Religion, 558.
Address on the revival of learning, iii. 559.
Adelais, adventures of, iii. 395.
Aderfield, his History of Charles the Twelfth, v. 354.
Adrian, his bust in the Florence Gallery described, i. 189, note.
Africa, inquiry into the supposed circumnavigation of it by the ancients, v. 170.—Its four supposed circumnavigations unfounded, 177—The Portuguese the first who explored their way round its southern promontory, 180—The circumnavigation by the Phenicians examined, 182.
Agnes, daughter of Albert the First, instance of her cruelty and sanctity, iii. 270—Made umpire between her brother and the Swiss, 321.
Agrippa, his bust in the Florence Gallery described, i. 187, note.
Alamintus, account of his conversation with Hannibal, v. 373.
Alba Fucentia, iv. 292. v. 404.
Alba Longa, iv. 229.
Albert the First, puts his brother Robert to death, iii. 246—His conduct towards the Swiss, 253—Assassinated by his nephew, 268—Cruel executions in revenge of his death, 270.
Albert, son of the preceding, declares against Zurich, iii. 313—Defeated, 316—Loses Zug by his haughtiness, 320—Breaks his treaty with the Swiss, 322—Excites the emperor, Charles the Fourth, against them, ibid.—Yields the reins of government to his sons, 327.
Albert Azo the First, mentioned, iii. 405—Fixes his residence at Ateste or Este, 408.
Albert Azo the Second, his character and conduct considered, iii. 409—The common father of the Italian and German princes of the kindred line of Este and Brunswick, ibid.—Distinguished by the title of Rich, 411—Advanced age to which he lived, 416, 418.
Albert Azo the Seventh, his character, and success, iii. 437.
Albinus Clodius, his bust in the Florence Gallery, i. 190, note.
Alembert. See D'Alembert.
Alevoerde, his life of Servetus, v. 400.
Alexander, beautiful supposed bust of, when dying, i. 190, note—His wealth, v. 92.
Alfred, character of, iii. 3.
Algidum, iv. 295.
Allamand, Mr. his character, i. 101—Letter by, 436.
Alphonso the First, account of, iii. 445.
Alphonso the Second, iii. 458—Splendour of his nuptials, 454.
Alphonso the Third, his character, iii. 472—Relinquishment of his power, 474.
Alps described, iv. 171.
Alsium, place of residence of Virginius Rufus, iv. 194.
Ambrones, question of their country, v. 500.
Ameria, iv. 308.
America, war with, popular at first, why unpopular afterwards, i. 243—Committee mittee appointed to inquire into the state of, ii. 118—Necessity of decided measures in the dispute with, 131—Ten thousand men sent out against, under Howe, Burgoyne, and Clinton, 132—Conciliatory motion respecting, 133—Further decided measures respecting, resolved on, 137—A body of Russian mercenaries intended to be employed against, 140—Petitions for conciliatory measures with, 130, 141—Beginning despondency relative to the war with, 142—Large draught of Guards, to act against, 143—Despondency changed to assurance of success, 166—News from the Lakes of a naval combat, in which the English are the victors, 182—Favourable aspect of affairs, 192—Further change to despondency, 209—Burgoyne's army defeated, and ten thousand men made prisoners, 219—Declaratory act, that Britain never intended to tax America, 221—Another act, empowering the crown to name commissioners, authorised to suspend hostilities, ibid.—Treaty of commerce with America signed by France, ibid.—Peace with, 319.

American mother, affecting story of, ii. 257.

Ammon, inquiry as to the age in which he lived, iii. 161.

Ammonius, edited by Valcknaer, v. 354.

Amphitheatre of the Romans, utility of the spectacles exhibited there, iv. 53.

Amphora, Roman measure, v. 127.

Amsancti Lacus, exhalations of dangerous, iv. 279.

Amusements of Reason, described as a work without either reason or amusement, v. 356.

Anabaptists, horrors committed by, in Germany, iii. 283, note.

Anatomy, course of, studied by Mr. Gibbon, i. 228.

Ancestors, desire of knowing and recording them, the effect of a common principle in the human mind, i. 2.

Ancona, account of, iv. 304.

Anderson, Mr., his description of Iceland, v. 448.

Anglicarum Rerum Scriptores, new edition of, recommended, iii. 570—Proper editor for the purpose mentioned, 571—Nature and extent of the design, 574.

Anjou and Arragon, quarrels between the houses of, iii. 207.

Annales Quintilianæi, by Dodwell, v. 55.

Anne of Austria, licentiousness of her character, v. 45—Her attachment to Cardinal Mazarin, 46—Memoirs of, by Madame de Motteville, 239.

Anquetil du Perron, his Voyage to the East Indies, v. 287.

Anson's Voyage, v. 459.

Anticipation, pamphlet, characterised as an excellent piece of humour, ii. 225.

Anti-Machiavel, v. 365.

Antinous, his bust in the Florence Gallery described, i. 189, note.

Antiquities, British, several pointed out as omissions in Mr. Gibbon's historical work, ii. 150.

Antony, Nicolas, burnt at Geneva, process of, v. 448.

Antium, iv. 237.

Anville. See D'Anville.

Apennine Mountain described, iv. 167.

Apherasiab, account of, iii. 120.

Apollodorus, edition of his Bibliotheca by Heyne, v. 588.

Aponum, famous for its mineral waters and as the birth place of Livy, iv. 316.

Apostles, learning of, by Mr. Lami, v. 333.

Appian Road, iv. 249.

Apthorpe, Mr., his censure of Mr. Gibbon's description of the promised land, iv. 539—Account of his work, 596—Raised by it to an archiepiscopal living, i. 231.

Apulia, account of, iv. 280.

Aquileia, iv. 238. v. 361.

Arabian Nights' Entertainments commended, i. 35.

Arabic, Mr. Gibbon discouraged from the study of, by his tutor, i. 56—Curious map in that language, ii. 427—Arabian Code, a genuine work, 480—Arabic MS. ibid.

Arabs, their situation in the ninth century, iii. 4—Subjugate Persia, 75, 82.

Aranda, count and countess of, ii. 480—Privilege in the house of the countess's father, of creating a grandee of Spain, 481.

Araspes, account of, iii. 147.

Arbuthnot, his conduct on the invasion of Jersey commended, ii. 230.

Arbuthnot, Mr., his table of the weights, money and measures of the ancients, v. 68.

Ardea, iv. 233.

Argenis of Barclay, commended, v. 215.

Argout, count, his fortune lost and brother murdered at St. Domingo, i. 342.

Arguin, island of, settled and fortified by prince Henry of Portugal, v. 193.

Arian controversy, Mr. Gibbon supposes himself to have dived too deep in the mud of, i. 229.

Aricia, iv. 230—Its land said to be so hot, that that a coal thrown on it would instantly take fire, 248.

Ariminum, iv. 306.
Aristomenes, account of, iii. 115.
Aristotle, character of, as a critic, iv. 37—His History of Animals in French and Greek, by Camus, 587.
Arles, archbishop of, his cruel death, i. 374, note.
Army of France, picture of one, i. 366.
Arpi, account of, iv. 281.
Arpinum, iv. 238.
Arretin's Letters, v. 382.
Arrian, ancient geographer, v. 178—Tactics of, 222.
As. Roman weight and coin, fluctuations in the value of, v. 101, 104, 105.
Ashmole, Mr. i. 12.
Assassination of tyrants, different opinions respecting, iv. 98.
Assyria, extent of its empire, iii. 62—Effeminacy of its kings, 64—Period of its overthrow, 70—Question, if known to Homer, investigated, 86.
Astrolabe, who invented by, v. 197.
Astruc's History of Languedoc, v. 364.
Astura, iv. 237.
Astyages, iii. 122, 140.
Atkins, captain, assists the king of Sardinia in his marine establishment, i. 180.
Atheism less pernicious than superstition, paradox of Plutarch, i. 69.
Atlantic, or Fortunate Islands, historical account of, v. 171.
Attitude, that of Mr. Gibbon when conversing, ii. 58.
Aventicum, inquiry respecting, v. 516.
Avernus Lacus, iv. 262.
Augustus, meaning of the title, iii. 178.
Augustus, should never have been born or never have died, ii. 471—His elevation considered and the causes of it pointed out, iv. 89—His mode of travelling, 335.
Aukland, lord, letter to, ii. 495—His lady, why compared to Eve, ibid.
Aurelius, Marcus, three busts of, in the Florence Gallery, i. 190, note.
Aureus, ancient coin, weight of, v. 71—Fluctuations of, 143.
Ausaldus de Traditione, v. 411.
Ausones, iv. 239.
Austin, St. i. 6.
Austria, present emperor of, designated as the enemy of peace, without daring to make war, ii. 386.
Austria, house of, iii. 242.
Authors, complaints of, as to happiness, reprehended, i. 272—Hopes by which they should be animated, 273—Authors, actors and managers, good company to know, but not to live with, ii. 115.
Azenaghis, African people, account of, v. 193—Their terror at the ships and guns of the Portuguese, 201.
Azo, fanciful etymology of the name, iii. 479—Pedigree of, as connected with the house of Guelph, 499, 511.

B.

Babylon, becomes an independent kingdom, iii. 101—Flourishing state of the arts and sciences there, 102.
Baden, excellence of the regiment of, ii. 27.
Bacon, lord, considered Perkin Warbeck as an impostor, iii. 340.
Bagniouski, famous adventurer, some account of, ii. 203, 205.
Baiæ, iv. 247, 262.
Bailiffs, power of, in the constitution of Berne, ii. 27.
Barbeyrac, his History of ancient Treaties, v. 333.
Barclay's Argenis, v. 215.
Bargeus, his Dissertation de Eversoribus, &c. examined, v. 352—His Dissertation on the Obelisks of Rome, 353.
Baronius, contrasted with Dr. Middleton, iv. 588.
Barré, colonel, ii. 73.
Barré, Mr. de la, character of his work on the ancient measures, v. 67—His dissertations compared with Gedoyne's, 238.
Barrow, Dr. as much a philosopher as a divine could well be, v. 234.
Basil, emperor, immense revenue of, v. 146.
Bastards, disadvantages attending them, iii. 208—In the middle ages, crowns often inherited by them, 211.
Barthelemy, characterised as amiable in manners and a learned antiquary, i. 163—Ambassador to the Helvetic body, 384, 394—His Memoir on the Monuments of Rome, v. 444.
Bartoli, Mr. his civilities to Mr. Gibbon at Turin, ii. 58.
Bath, intended by Mr. Gibbon as his last retreat, 308.
Bath Guide, i. 207.
Batt, Mr., mention of, ii. 97, 116, 218, 220, 385, 421.
Bayle, progress of his sentiments on the subject of religion, i. 68—His Commentaire Philosophique the best book he ever wrote, v. 234—Compared with Le Clerc, 235—His Dictionary, 69, 238, 242—Remark on, 462—His criticism on ou Maimbourg's History of Calvinism, 480—Mistake by, respecting the number of children of Charles the Second of Naples, v. 507.

Beau, his Memoir on the Roman Legion, v. 215.
Beauchamp, ii. 285.
Beaufort, Mr. de, a learned critic, visited by Mr. Gibbon, at Maestricht, i. 110—His opinions respecting the five first ages of Rome, iv. 40.
Beausodre, his Histoire Critique du Manichéisme, i. 146.
Beauvais, bishop of, massacred, i. 375, note.
Beauveau, princess of, ii. 202, 212.
Bees, Natural History of, from Reaumur, v. 432.
Béhmen, Jacob, i. 20.
Belesus, concerned in the revolt of Arbaces, iii. 65—Rewarded with the place of satrap of Babylon, 72.
Belley, his explanation of a camayeu, and an agate, v. 215.
Belleisle, Vie du Maréchal Duc de, most contemptible performance, v. 234.
Belus, temple of, its immense golden treasures, v. 90.
Beneventum, account of, iv. 300.
Bercham, Van, family of, banished, i. 394.
Berengarius, account of his conduct, iii. 393.
Berenice, bust of, in the Florence Gallery, i. 189, note.
Bergier, his History of the Great Roads of the Roman Empire, i. 177.
Beriton, family estate of Mr. Gibbon, account of, i. 116—Sale of, 287, ii. 361—Difficulties as to the title, i. 291, 294, 300.
Bernouilli's correspondence with Leibnitz, v. 448.
Berne, aristocracy and revenue of, i. 270—Commission of, to prevent the introduction of the French revolutionary principles, 336, note—Strictures on the government of, ii. 1—Defective in its liberty, 3—In its legislative power, 7—In its executive, 8, 22—In the public administration, 15—In its taxation, 29—The office of British minister at, solicited by Mr. Gibbon, 330—State of, in the fourteenth century, iii. 291—Its contest with the emperor of Germany and the house of Austria, 292—Its alliance with the Swiss confederation, 296—Etymology of the word, v. 501.
Berta, her vices, iii. 388.
Beyer, his Dissertation on the Atlantic Island of Plato, v. 287.
Bibliothèque Raisonnée, volume the first, 386—The eleventh, 400—Thirteenth, 291—Fourteenth, 293, 300—Fifteenth, 295—Sixteenth, 369—Seventeenth, 303—Eighteenth, 304, 405—Nineteenth, 305—Twentieth, 314—Twenty-first, 325—Twenty-second, 333—Twenty-third, 343—Twenty-fourth, 354—Twenty-fifth, 364—Twenty-seventh, 381—Twenty-ninth, 411—Thirtieth, 412—Thirty-first, 420—Thirty-second, 424—Thirty-third, 427—Thirty-fourth, 431—Thirty-fifth, 432—Thirty-sixth, 447—Thirty-seventh, ibid.—Thirty-eighth, 448—Thirty-ninth, 450—Fortieth, 457—Forty-first, 459—Forty-second, 461—Forty-third, 463—Forty-fourth, 464—Forty-fifth, 465—Forty-sixth, 467—Forty-seventh, 468—Forty-eighth, 470—Forty-ninth, 472—Fiftieth, 473—Character of the work, 474.
Bibliothèque des Sciences et des Beaux Arts, commended, v. 215—Review in, of Mr. Gibbon's Essay on Literature, 218.
Bibliothèque Universelle, v. 224.
Bielfield's Letters, v. 305, 321.
Billing, race of, iii. 493.
Biography, projected work of, which Mr. Gibbon intended to execute, i. 391.
Birch, Dr., his collection of lord Bacon's papers, i. 151.
Biron, Madame de, i. 368. ii. 441.
Birth, distinction of, what ought to be its effect, i. 3.
Blacksmith, Persian, heads an insurrection, and frees his country from the yoke of the Arabs, iii. 85.
Blackstone's Commentaries, read by Mr. Gibbon three times, i. 214—Extract from, relating to the registry of land purchases in Yorkshire, 301—Remarks on, v. 543.
Blair, sentiments of, respecting Ossian's Poems, ii. 102.
Blandford, designated as a pleasant and hospitable town, i. 135.
Blanc, abbé de, his Letters on the English, v. 449.
Bleterie, abbé de, Mr. Gibbon's acquaintance with, i. 162—His Memoirs on the Succession of the Roman Emperors, and the Prenomen of Augustus, iii. 169—His Memoir on the Tribunitian Powers of the Emperors, v. 213—His Life of Julian, 296—His History of Jovian, 463.
Blood, discovery of the circulation of, ii. 266.

Board of Trade, characterised by Mr. Burke, i. 235—Abolished and revived, 238—Abolished again, 245.
Boat-race at Florence, v. 485.
Bocage, Madame du, i. 162. ii. 54.
Bochart, his Treatise on the Egyptian Divinities at Rome, v. 292—His Remarks on Foreign Service, 333—His Critical Memoirs on the Swiss, 468—His mistake on the subject of Conrad the Second, 499—On the nations who had made the Romans pass under the yoke, ibid.
Boileau, compared with Juvenal, v. 302.
Bolingbroke, favourable mention by, of Mr. Gibbon's grandfather, i. 15—His reputation as a writer in the French language, i. 132—His Patriot King, v. 463.
Bolton, duke of, his tyranny, as lord lieutenant, mentioned, i. 135.
Bolton, Theophilus, his illness and death, ii. 64, note.
Bonani's Reflections on Geographical Errors, commended, v. 213.
Bonfoy, Mrs., ii. 125.
Boniface the Bavarian, account of, iii. 367—Considerations respecting his name, 369—His country, 370—His title, 372—Province entrusted to his care, 374.
Boniface the Second, account of, iii. 375.
Boniface, marquis of Tuscany, splendour of his nuptials, iii. 415.
Bononia, iv. 313.
Books, state of, previously to printing, iii. 562.
Boromean Islands, their happy situation described, i. 184. ii. 59.
Borrichius, his work De Antiqua Facie Urbis Romæ, commended, v. 355.
Borso, created duke of Modena, iii. 441.
Boston Port bill, ii. 118.
Bossuet, Mr. Gibbon converted to Popery by reading his Exposition of the Catholic Doctrine, and his History of the Protestant Variations, i. 62.
Botta, maréchal, character of, i. 194, note.
Boucher's Narrative of a Voyage to Peru, v. 462.
Boufflers, chevalier de, honourable mention of, i. 336.
Bougainville, his Traité du Calcul Intégral, ii. 46—His researches into Assyrian history, iii. 57.
Bouillon, Godefroi de, his refusing a golden crown where his God wore a crown of thorns, confirmed, i. 194, note.
Bouillon, Madame de, i. 368. ii. 475.
Boumgarten, Swiss peasant, beheads a young nobleman with an axe, for attempting to seduce his wife, iii. 259.
Bower's Lives of the Popes, v. 464.
Boyd, governor of Gibraltar, account of, at the age of ninety-two, ii. 477.
Boydell, Mr., i. 391.
Boyish years, vaunted happiness of, disputed, i. 43.
Boyle, afterwards earl of Ossory, principal actor in Ignoramus at Westminster school, ii. 490.
Boze, M. de, his Dissertation on the Medal of Smyrna, v. 428.
Brandenburgh, Memoirs of, v. 465.
Brazen Nose College, discipline of, under Dr. Cleaver, commended, i. 71, note.
Brazil, its gold and diamond mines, v. 531.
Breitinger, Mr. Gibbon, in his youth, corresponds with him in Latin, i. 101—Letters by, 456, 477.
Bretorme, Retif de la, printed a work as he composed it in his mind, without committing it to paper, i. 256.
Bribe, Persian, immense value of one, iii. 96, note.
Bridgewater, duke of, ii. 52.
Bristol, returns lord Sheffield to Parliament free of expense, i. 312—Disturbances at, 409.
Britain, inundation of, by the sea, mentioned by Tacitus, iv. 56—Inference to be drawn from it, ibid.
Brixia, iv. 319.
Brun, Rodolphus, his heroic conduct in the revolution of Zurich, iii. 300—Made burgomaster of that town, 302—His self-possession on discovering the conspiracy of the exiles, 309—His contrary conduct when surprised by the Austrians, 315.
Brundusium, iv. 286—Horace's journey to, examined, 339.
Brunswicensium Rerum Scriptores, edited by Leibnitz, iii. 567.
Brunswick, antiquities of the house of, considered, iii. 359—Division of the subject, 360—Genealogical tree of, 478—Supposed descent of, from one of the companions of Romulus, 400—From the race of the Trojan kings, 485—Five Saxon kings belonging to the old house of, 494—Name of, whence derived, 495—Connections between the old and new house of, ibid.—Prospect of obtaining the throne of Germany, how lost to the house of, 521—Lineal descent of the dukes of, 552—Account of the descent of, from Henry the Black to the British monarch, 554.
Brutus, digression on the character of, iv, 95—Veneration of his memory by posterity considered, ibid.—His assassination of Cæsar productive of no benefit to the com-commonwealth, 95—Accused of avarice, 101—Of revealing the designs of Pompey, 106—Of obsequiousness to Cæsar, 107—Of engaging his fidelity to Cæsar by a voluntary oath, 109—Farther statement of his character and conduct, v. 541.

Buffon, Mr. Gibbon's acquaintance with, i. 227—Calculation by, respecting our disregard of death, 274—His opinion as to the period of life that is most happy, 275—Letter by, ii. 212—His Natural History, v. 466—His account of complete vessels being found in the heart of mountains, not supported by good authority, 568—Mistakes the geography of Angora, famous for the long, beautiful, and silky hair of animals, 569—Contradicts himself respecting the brain, 572—His history of the elephant might have been better, if he had been a better classical scholar, ibid.—His surprise at the rein-deer of Scandinavia being found by Cæsar in Germany, the result of his ignorance as an antiquarian, 576.
Burette, Mr. de, his Dissertation in the Mémoires de l'Académie, v. 237.
Burgoyne, general, makes some spirited motions in parliament on the subject of India, iii. 100—Sent against the Americans, ii. 132—His army taken and himself wounded, 217.
Burgundy, Charles, duke of, particulars of his marriage with the sister of Edward the Fourth, iii. 202.
Buriton. See Beriton.
Burigny, his Life of Erasmus, v. 256.
Burke, Mr., delight with which he was heard in the house of commons, i. 235, note—Correctness of his printed speeches, ibid.—His book on the French revolution, 269, 312. ii. 433—Denominated, in his quarrel with Mr. Fox in the house of commons, an eloquent and rational madman, i. 323—His Inquiry into the Sublime and Beautiful considered, v. 283.
Burman, character of, as a critic, v. 224.
Busbequius's Travels, account of, v. 580.
Buxentium, iv. 269.
Byers, Mr., Scotch antiquary, our author's guide in examining the curiosities of Rome, i. 196.
Byng, admiral, ii. 35.

C.

Cadamosta, Venetian, his voyages, v. 194, 199.
Cade, Jack, speech of, i. 9.
Cadell, Mr., literary dinner at his house on the publication of the last volume of Mr. Gibbon's History, i. 262.
Cadiz, account of, ii. 473.
Cæsar, Don, his surrender of Ferrara to the Pope, iii. 458—Inquiry into his birth, 463.
Cæsar, Julius, description of his bust in the Florence Gallery, i. 187, note—Remarks on his assassination, iv. 95—On his character and writings, 408—His detention in Egypt ascribed to the Etesian winds, 552—On his sacerdotal dignities, v. 63.
Caille, abbé, his book on Perspective recommended, ii. 50.
Calabria, account of, iv. 278, 282.
Caligula, his bust in the Florence Gallery, i. 188, note.
Calonne, wild projects entertained by, of a counter-revolution in France, i. 311.
Calvin, his character as a theologian, ii. 20—His conduct to Servetus examined, v. 401—His Letters to Jacques de Bourgoyne, 424.
Cambis, Madame de, ii. 208.
Cambridge. See Universities.
Camel, none of the species remaining in a state of nature, v. 576—Originally a native of Arabia, ibid.
Camden, lord, his opinion of Mr. Gibbon's History, ii. 152.
Campania, account of, iv. 225, 240.
Canada, revolt of, apprehended, ii. 140.
Canaries, the Fortunate Islands of Plutarch, v. 171—Conquest of, by William de Bethancourt, 173.
Candianus, his conduct and death, iii. 407.
Canusium, iv. 281.
Capet, Hugo, state of the feudal government under, iii. 198.
Caplin, Mr. Gibbon's valet, ii. 331.
Capreæ, licentious seat of Augustus, iv. 264.
Capua, iv. 243.
Caracalla, his bust in the Florence Gallery, i. 191, note.
Caroline de Lichfield, novel of, ii. 400.
Carleton, general, resolves never to capitulate with rebels, ii. 142—Made knight of the Bath, 168.
Carmarthen, lord, ii. 212.
Carré, his Méthode pour la Mesure des Surfaces, ii. 47.
Carter, Miss, ii. 318.
Casinum, iv. 239.
Cassini, his Elémens d'Astronomie recommended, ii. 49.
Cassock, etymology of the word, ii. 109.
Castalio on the Temples of Peace and Janus, v. 352.
Castrum Minervæ, iv. 286.

Castrum Novum, ancient town of Italy, doubts respecting, iv. 192.
Cat, Mr. le, his Treatise on the Senses, v. 422.
Catalogue of armies, why considered by epic poets as essential, iv. 327.
Catrou on Virgil, i. 90.
Catullus, inquiry respecting the time of his death, i. 494, 513, 530.
Caylus, count, character of, i. 163, note—Letter by, ii. 43—His seeming neglect of Mr. Gibbon, 55—His Memoir on the Ruins of Persepolis, iii. 77—His Dissertation on Painting compared with that of M. de la Nauze, v. 214—His Memoirs on Sculpture, ibid.—On the Mausoleum, 215.
Caxton, obliged to comply with the bad taste of the times in the books he printed, iii. 564.
Celesia, Madame, daughter of Mallet the poet, i. 108, note.
Cellarius compared with Emmius, v. 286.
Cellini, Benvenuto, i. 6.
Celtic colonies, account of, iv. 160.
Centenary of gold, true meaning of, v. 553.
Centumcellæ, iv. 191.
Cere, or Agylla, account of, iv. 193.
Cervantes, exact observer of geography, ii. 479.
Chablais, duke of, i 179, note.
Chais, Mr. la, his Letters on Jubilees, v. 468.
Chapelle, Mr., his Necessity of Public Worship, v. 449.
Charles the Bald, state of the feudal government under, iii. 196.
Charles the Fourth, besieges Zurich, iii. 324—Result of this proceeding, 325.
Charles the Eighth, chosen by Mr. Gibbon as a subject of historical composition, and afterwards rejected, i. 149—Critical Remarks on his Title to the Crown of Naples, iii. 205—His investiture depended on the justice of Frederick's deposition, 216.
Charles the Simple, iii. 198.
Charlemagne, character of, iii. 194.
Charlevoix, his History of New France, v. 448.
Chateauneuf, Mr. de, French resident at Geneva, his haughtiness on taking leave, i. 360—His address to the Genevese respecting the conduct of their magistrates, ii. 448.
Chatham, lord, funeral of, ii. 224.
Chaufepie's Dictionary, v. 468.
Chelsum, Dr., correspondence of with Mr. Gibbon, ii. 217, 218—Contrasted with Mr. Davis, iv. 602—with Dr. Watson, 605—His opinion respecting the military service of the first Christians, examined, 609—Examination of his opinion of the conduct of Marcellus the centurion, 615—of his remarks on Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, 623—of his opinion of Eusebius's moral character, 636.
Chemistry, studied by Mr. Gibbon, i. 229.
Chéseaux, Mr. de, remarks by, on the dominion of the beasts in Daniel, v. 48—On Daniel's vision, 49.
Chesterfield, lord, his use of the French language, i. 132—First acquaintance of Mr. Gibbon with, 208—His Letters, ii. 114.
Chillingworth, account of his religious opinions, i. 66—His History of Protestants commended, ii. 37.
China, policy of, in not working its silver mines, v. 87.
Chivalry, question of the origin of, ii. 104.
Choiseul, duke of, ii. 208.
Christianity, history of, in the first three centuries, very imperfect, iv. 593.
Christina, encouragement she gave to, and advance she made in, literature, iv. 18—Memoirs of, v. 467, Chronology, new, of sir Isaac Newton, compared, as to the Greek and Egyptian history, with the common chronology, iii. 150—Critical remarks on this new chronology, 152.
Chorus, ancient, advantage of, v. 127.
Church of England, triumph of, in parliament, ii. 74.
Ciaconius, on the Columna Rostrata of Duillius, v. 551.
Cibber, Colley, i. 6.
Cicero, best editions of, i. 89—Advantages, moral and literary, derived from reading his works, ibid.—Description of his bust in the Florence Gallery, 187, note—His country-houses, iv. 231, 238—His mode of travelling from Rome to Cilicia, minutely examined, 446—His treatise De Oratore, v. 275—Mistaken, in making Ecbatana the royal seat of Mithridates, 551.
Cid, of Corneille, account of, v. 501.
Circeii, iv. 237.
Cisalpine Gallic war, some transactions respecting, iii. 222, et seq.
Citizen of the world, the title condemned, ii. 1—Good citizen characterised, 31—Free voice of a citizen, v. 464.
Civil wars in France and England, difference of, v. 536—Effect of on the minds of men, 537.
Clairon, French actress, preferred by Mr. Gibbon to Dumesnil, i. 164.
Clarendon, profits of his History, how applied at Oxford, i. 72.

Clarke,

Clarke, Mr., sudden death of, i. 200. ii. 120.
Clarke, Godfrey, member for Derbyshire, ii. 72, 110, 117, 120.
Claviere, exiled citizen of Geneva, one of the six ministers of the French republic, i. 357.
Clemens, observations on his Epistles regarding Bishops, iv. 552.
Clement, Saint, authenticity of his two Epistles, v. 473.
Clement the Sixth, Letter on a bull of, dispensing sovereigns from the obligation of oaths, v. 450.
Clerc, Mr. le, his Bibliothèque Universelle, Vol. 1st, v. 224—Vol. 2d, 227—Vol. 3d, 234—Compared with Bayle, 235—His Dissertation on the Greek Middle Verb, examined, and compared with Kuster's, 254—Quotation from, rectified, iv. 543.
Clergy, ignorance of, till the period of the Reformation, iii. 562.
Clermont Tonnerre, M. de, victim of the French revolution, ii. 457.
Clitumnus, river, described, iv. 201.
Clogher, bishop of, his Essay on Spirit, v. 471.
Clos, Mr. de, his History of Lewis the Eleventh, v. 448—His Considerations on Morals, v. 472.
Club, Cocoa-tree, i. 154, note — Roman, 200—Literary, 217.
Clusium, iv. 197.
Cluverius, his Antiqua Italia, i. 177—The work examined, v. 356—Gives the different names, limits, extent, and figure of the country, 357—Travels along the coast of Liguria from the Varus, 358—Represents the policy of Augustus, 359—His account of the Rhæti and Euganei, ibid.—Proceeds through the province of Venetia, 360—Treats of the Carni and of Aquileia, 361—Examines Cisalpine Gaul, 363—Treats of the Insubres, Orobii, Cenomani, &c. 365—Of the Boii, Lingones, and Senones, 366—Of the passages of the Alps, and those who first crossed them, 370—Of the name and origin of the Tuscans, 381—Of Tarquinii and Veii, 384—Gives an account of Umbria, 388—Describes Picenum, and several communities distinguished by their valour, 389, 404—Regards the whole history of the first ages of Rome as fabulous, 406—Describes Latium, 409, 415—Treats of the extensive territories of the Volsci, 416—Of the Ausones, and Læstrigones, 417—Of Campania, 418—Of Apulia, 423—Of Lucania, 425—Conclusion and character of his work, 426—Farther observations on, 429.
Coalition, political, of lord North and Mr. Fox, i. 247. ii. 346—Administration of, dismissed, 350—Proposed one of all parties, i. 355, 382.
Coalition, of princes, against France, fears respecting, i. 324, 395.
Cobourg, prince of, ii. 484.
Cocoa-Tree. See Club.
Colman, his Man of Business, ii. 115.
Comala of Ossian, remarks on, ii. 101.
Commerce, state of, in the fourteenth century, iii. 39.
Commonalty, instances of great disorders committed by, iii. 283.
Common-place book, the practice of keeping one not recommended, i. 97.
Comedy and tragedy, observations on, iv. 134, et seq.
Concord, account of a temple to, v. 325.
Condamine, his Travels, v. 477.
Condillac, his Treatise on Systems, v. 465.
Confucius, family of, the most illustrious in the world, i. 4.
Congium, ancient measure, v. 127.
Conjugal faith, splendid example of, iii. 530.
Conquest, right of, odious, iii. 221—Made only for wild beasts, 222.
Conrad, son of Henry the Black, embraces a devotional life, iii. 517—After abdicating the royal title, ascends the throne, 524.
Conrad, St., character of, iii. 507.
Constantinople, wealth of, in the twelfth century, v. 146.
Consularis Aquarum, when this office ceased to exist in Rome, v. 549.
Conway, governor of Jersey, ii. 230.
Cooke, Dr., Letters by, to lord Sheffield, ii. 496, 498.
Copper, originally the only money of the Romans, v. 101—Its abundance with the Romans compared with silver and gold, ibid.—Instances of the reduction, in weight and value, of this money, 104.
Corfinium, iv. 296.
Cornelius Nepos, excellence of, as a school-book, i. 32—Remarks on the character and writings of, iv. 416.
Cornwall, rural sketch of, ii. 113.
Cornwallis, lord, ii. 230.
Correspondence, familiar, sentiments respecting, i. 377. ii. 33, 355.
Correspondance Secrète, by Mirabeau, characterised as diabolically good, i. 287.
Cortes of Spain, when, and of what persons, composed, v. 158.
Cortesi's Dialogues, v. 369.
Cosa, ancient town, iv. 191.
Couci, Enguerrand de, his war with the dukes dukes of Austria for the recovery of his maternal estates, v. 520.

Coventry, lord Sheffield returned for, i. 251—Not returned for, 309.
Coviglian, his voyages, v. 198.
Courayer, his translation of Father Paul's Council of Trent, v. 301—His Defence, 405.
Cowper, the poet, victim to melancholy, ii. 502.
Coxheath, ii. 224.
Cragius's History of Denmark, v. 365, 370, 382.
Craufurd, Mr., i. 421, 422.
Cremona, iv. 319, 321.
Crevier, adopts an emendation, suggested by Mr. Gibbon, which clears an obscure passage of Livy, i. 100—Letter by, on this subject, 432.
Crillon, duke de, ii. 478.
Criticism, those who apply themselves to, should be cautious of conjectural emendations, i. 466—Reflections upon, iv. 36—Its materials and employment, 38, 39—Farther reflections on, 45.
Cromwell, observation respecting, that he should never have been born, or never have died, ii. 471—His claim to the title of Great, examined, v. 498.
Cromwell, Mr., solicitor, only male descendant of the Protector, ii. 325.
Croton, ancient town of Italy, account of, iv. 174.
Crown Point, burnt and abandoned by the Americans, ii. 182.
Crousaz, de, his book on Logic commended, i. 88, note, 89.
Crousaz, Madame de. See Montolieu.
Crusades, Dr. Robertson differs from Mr. Gibbon respecting, ii. 425—The first, in the eleventh century, iii. 13—Advantages derived from it, ibid.—Account of the second crusade, 17—Crusades in the thirteenth century, 27 — Crusade of Richard the First against the Saracens, v. 488.
Ctesias, his character as a writer, iii. 58—Instance of his inaccuracy, 70.
Cumberland's Treatise on the Laws of Nature, translated and commented by Barbeyrac, v. 424.
Cumæ, account of, iv. 257.
Cuper's Letters, v. 412.
Curators, question of their functions and power, v. 506.
Curchod, Mademoiselle, afterwards Madame Necker. See Necker.
Cyaxares, account of, iii. 116, 136.
Cyrus, Xenophon's account of, iii. 122—Real character of, 132—Examined in his conduct towards his enemies, 133—Towards Cyaxares and the Medes, 136—Towards his subjects, 142—Nature of his death, 145—Further particulars of his character, 146—Immense treasures which he brought from Asia, v. 92.

D.

Dacier, Mr., his book on Horace, i. 90—Mistaken in supposing the Metellus of Lucilius was the Metellus Numidicus, v. 548.
D'Agaisseau, Madame, ii. 475.
D'Aiguillon, duchess, i. 127. ii. 54.
D'Alembert, anecdote by, of the king of Prussia, i. 273, note—His Mélanges, v. 217.
Dalin's History of Sweden, v. 458, 466.
Dalrymple, sir David, antagonist of Mr. Gibbon, i. 232.
Damaidenus, Theodore, account of his MS. entitled, Augusta Decora Romano-Brunswicensia, iii. 479.
Damers, sons of lord Milton, i. 193. ii. 72. v. 485.
Damien, supposed accomplice of, ii. 56.
Daniel, antiquity and authenticity of the book of, defended, ii. 83—Fragment on the subject, 94.
Daniel, father, sentiment of, iii. 220.
D'Anville, engages to construct four maps of Roman geography for Mr. Gibbon's History, but fails in his engagement, ii. 201—His map of the Euphrates and Tigris erroneous, 427—His Memoir on the Getæ, v. 214—His remarks on the Roman mile, 443.
Darius, name of merchant given to him by the Persians, v. 136—Table of the provinces of his empire, and the tribute paid by them, ibid.
Darrel, Mr., i. 24, note 291, 422.
Datch, nickname given to one of lord Sheffield's sons, ii. 73, 75.
D'Augny, Mr., son of Mrs. Mallet, favourable mention of, ii. 55.
Davel, persecution in Berne put a stop to by his boldness, ii. 21.
David, king, history of, v. 355—Dissertation on his curses, v. 433.
Davis, Mr., receives a royal pension for his examination of Mr. Gibbon's history, i. 231—Mr. Walpole's opinion of this pensioned work, ii. 156—The examiner's objections answered, iv. 515—Reasons for the answer, 519—His notice of errors of the press, 527—His charge of misrepresentation accounted for, by the different editions consulted, 528 — His mention of the Jewish history, 529 — His charge of plagiarism examined, 587.

Death, different views of, in serious and gay moments, ii. 66—Number of deaths of religious persons in France annually, v. 529.
Deane, Silas, sent by America to the court of Vienna, ii. 223—His character, 319, note.
Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. See Roman Empire.
Dedications, account of, iv. 3—One from the author to his father, ibid.
Deffand, Madame du, characterised as an agreeable young lady of eighty-two years, ii. 207—Letter by, 212.
Degrees, whence borrowed, and how might be rendered meritorious, i. 49.
Dejoces, king of the Medes, account of, iii. 108.
Delany's Sermons, v. 432.
Delme, Mr., returned to Parliament for Southampton, i. 25.
Demetrius Soter, v. 524.
Democratical principles, described as leading by a path of flowers to the abyss of hell, i. 354.
Denier, copper coin, weight of, v. 70, 482 —Silver denier, 127.
Denmark, court of, anecdotes respecting, ii. 72,73,76—Mallet's History of, examined, 111, 231—Cragius's History of, v. 365, 370.
Deslandes, his History of Philosophy, v. 326—His Essay on the Marine of the Ancients, 462.
D'Estaing's fleet, ii. 224.
Devizes, town of, designated as popular and disorderly, i. 135.
Devonshire, duchess of, Mr. Gibbon's apprehensions for, during her journey from France to Switzerland, i. 352—Disapproves of a proposed coalition of parties, 355—Winters at Pisa, 372.
Deyverdun, Mr., the early friend of Mr. Gibbon, i. 77—Companion of his studies, 91—Some particulars of, 199—Obtains a situation in the office of the Secretary of State, 296—Engages in a periodical work, 207—Undertakes the office of travelling tutor, 208—Settles at Lausanne, and receives Mr. Gibbon as an inmate in his house, 248 — Interesting correspondence between him and Mr. Gibbon on the subject of this arrangement, ii. 274—303, 307, 313, 320—Harmony in which they lived together, 341, 359—Particulars of his illness and death, i. 267, 281, 282—His loss estimated by Mr. Gibbon as irreparable, ii. 432.
Dictionary of human economy, desirable, v. 120.
Diodorus, charged with inaccuracy, ii. 69, 106—Character of his Universal History translated by Abbé Terasson, v. 589.
Dion Cassius, edited by Reimar, v. 472 —References to, supported, iv. 564.
Dionysius of Athens, and Dionysius of Paris, confusion respecting, v. 489.
Disappointed, no word in the French language corresponding with, i. 454.
Dissenters, violent and active against the war with America, ii. 141.
Ditton's Demonstration of the Christian Religion, v. 386, Dive Downs, Dr. ii. 117.
Dodwell, character of, v. 224—His book De Cyclis, 270.
Domitian, his bust in the Florence Gallery, i. 189, note — Road made by him, iv. 249, 337—The supposition of his having enacted laws against the Christians, a mistake, v. 560.
Douglas, Mr., i. 405.
Drachm, or drachma, Attic, value of, v. 74, 82, 123, 128—Decimal tables of, 130.
Dragoon, and philosopher, compared, ii. 261.
Dress, particoloured, of the Greeks and Romans, account of, v. 515.
Dryden's Virgil, less interesting to Mr. Gibbon in his youth than Ovid's Metamorphoses, i. 35.
Dubois de France, compared to Cerberus, ii. 459.
Duchesne, his publication of Les Historiens des Gaules et de la France, iii. 569.
Dugdale, sir William, i. 12.
Dummer, Mr., unsuccessful candidate for Southampton, i. 25.
Dumourier, styled a heaven-born general, i. 363 — Characterised as a dragon, ii. 484.
Dunning, motion by, on the influence of the Crown, i. 238—against a dissolution of Parliament in 1780, ii. 348.

E.

East India Affairs, In 1773, ii. 99, 100—In 1774, 120—In 1777, 197—In 1779, 233—In 1782, 263—In 1783, 339—Statistic account of the East Indies, particularly its money, weights and measures, v. 163.
Ebuto, his poem on the Troubles of Sicily, v. 449.
Eccard, account of his Guelphicæ Origines, iii. 365.
Eccelin the First, character of, iii. 432—The Second, ibid.—The Third, 434.

Echard's Roman History, delight with which it was read by Mr. Gibbon in his youth, i. 42.
Edgar, sir Gregory, i. 11.
Edmond's Negociations, v. 465.
Education, every man receives two, one from his teacher, the other from himself, i. 88.
Edwards, Dr., his attack on Mr. Gibbon, i. 233.
Egaliseurs, democratic party at Geneva, conduct of, i. 385.
Egeria, wood of, in the neighbourhood of Rome, discussion respecting, v. 346.
Egerton, sir John, candidate for the county of Lancaster, ii. 75.
Eggs, art of hatching, v. 465.
Egide, Mr., his account of a mission into Greenland, v. 42.
Einsidlen, monks and abbey of, iii. 273.
Eisenschidt, Mr., character of his book on Ancient Weights and Measures, v. 67.
Elections, contested, in 1272, ii. 75.
Electoral college, first rudiments of, iii. 514.
Eleusis, the most illustrious of the religious societies of the ancients, iv. 472.
Elgin, lord, i. 402.
Elliot, Mr., afterwards lord, Mr. Gibbon how related to, i. 20—Mr. Gibbon by his advice sent to Lausanne, 73—Obtains for Mr. Gibbon a seat in the House of Commons, i. 120. ii. 128—Mr. Gibbon's letter to, justifying himself for accepting the office of one of the commissioners of trade, i. 236, note—Deprives Mr. Gibbon of his seat in parliament for Leskeard, 289.
Ellis, his Voyage to Hudson's Bay, v. 461.
Ellis of the Rolliad, i. 285.
Elliston, Mr. Edward, i. 20.
Elmsley, i. 408, 411.
Emmius, his Geographical Description of Greece, v. 286—Compared with Cellarius, ibid.
England, atmosphere of, pernicious to the gout, ii. 358—Conduct of, on the execution of Lewis the Sixteenth, commended, 484—State of, in the ninth century, iii. 3—In the tenth, 7—In the eleventh, 10—In the twelfth, 15—In the thirteenth, 25—In the fourteenth, 35—In the fifteenth, 45.
Ephemeris, his system, iv. 75—Did not prevail till the time of the emperors, 77.
Eporedia, Roman colony, geographical and chronological mistake respecting, iv. 180.
Era, Christian, abolished by the French, i. 409.
Erasmus, the encouragement he gave to literature, iv. 18—His Life by Burigny, examined, v. 256—His Ciceronianus, 259—His Colloquia, 266.
Eratosthenes, first who measured the earth, geographical errors of, v. 179—Why styled Beta, 180, note.
Ernesti, his edition of Cicero commended, i. 89.
Este, connection of the family of, with the marquis of Tuscany, iii. 386—Decline of the family of, 427—Castle of Este taken, 434—Account of their marriages, 449—Extinction of the legitimate race, 458—Power of the princes, 468—Their characters, 469. See farther, Guelph.
Estrade, count of, his letters, v. 413, 421.
Ethico, resentful conduct of, towards his son, for abdicating the Guelphic name, iii. 505.
Etruscan colonies, account of, iv. 162.
Etruria, its extent, iv. 183, 188—Its inhabitants, 184.
Eudoxus, ancient circumnavigator, account of, v. 175.
Europe, supposed design of reducing it to three great empires, i. 454.
Eusebius, passage from, respecting the persecution in Egypt, iv. 574—Another respecting Maxentius, 556—Account of the Chronicle attributed to him and Jerom, 557—His Ecclesiastical History considered, 623—Examination of his moral character, 637.
Ezo, obtained the daughter of the Emperor Otho by a game at dice, iii. 497.

F.

Fables, their utility, i. 32.
Fabricius on the Theology of Water, v. 369.
Faction, the inseparable sister of liberty, iii. 431.
Fairy Queen, the most precious jewel in the coronet of the Spencers, i. 4.
Falconieri, his Dissertation on the Pyramid of Cestius, v. 351.
Falerii, account of, and its inhabitants, iv. 195.
Falernus, iv. 243.
Farce, observations on, iv. 142.
Farquar, Mr., i. 143.
Fashion, influence of, upon particular sciences, at particular periods, iv. 15.
Fasti of Ovid, observations on, iv. 354—Dauphin edition of, censured, v. 445—Book the fourth, 451—The fifth, 452—Sixth, 453.

Fathers of the Church, ignorance of, in the most valuable of all sciences, v. 387.
Fatimite Caliph, dynasty of, in the tenth century, iii. 6.
Fauquier, Mr., ii. 82.
Faustus, John, inventor of printing, died of the plague, v. 433.
Fayette, marquis de la, some account of, ii. 197.
Fealty and homage, nature of, in the feudal system, iii. 184,
Ferdinand, descended from the House of Arragon, iii. 207—Legitimated by a solemn act, 209—His title to the crown doubtful, 210.
Ferdoussi, Persian poet, account of, iii, 75.
Ferentinum, curious inscription in which this word occurs, iv. 204—Town of, 234.
Ferguson, Adam, letters by, ii. 160, 162.
Feronia, temple and grove of, iv. 197—Town of, 247.
Ferrara, literary pleasures of, iii, 455—Distinguished by the birth of Ariosto and Tasso, 457—Surrender of, by Don Cæsar, to the pope, 458.
Fielding, Henry, his descent, i. 4—High commendation of his novel of Tom Jones, v. 273, note.
Fiens, baron Say and Seale, ancestor of Mr. Gibbon, some account of, i. 9.
Fishes, natural history of, v. 413.
Flattery, prolific parent of falsehood, i. 57.
Flatus, character of, drawn by Mr. Law, supposed to be that of Mr. Gibbon's father, i. 216.
Fleury, Abbé, his work on the Method of Study, v. 454.
Floral games, v. 453.
Florence, history of the republic of, under the House of Medicis, a desirable subject for composition, i. 154—Festival of its patron saint, 184, note—Its gallery of arts, 186, note—Ancient state of, iv. 195.
Florida Blanca, prisoner in Spain, character of, ii. 481.
Folard, compared with Guichardt, v. 222—His Translation of Polybius, 223.
Foncemagne, Mr. de, his evening conversations, i. 163—Dispute at his house between the Abbé Mably and Mr. Gibbon, 227.
Fontenelle, his opinion as to the period of life that is most happy, i. 274—His comedies examined, iv. 142—Character of his works, v. 223—Mistaken in supposing Porphyry to have produced oracles favourable to the Christians, 562—Mistaken in supposing the Romans to have prohibited the Carthaginians from offering any more human sacrifices, 563—Mistaken in calling Homer and Hesiod the first Grecian philosophers, ibid.
Fonterne, Abbé de, his work Sur le Culte des Divinités des Eaux, v. 236.
Food of the first men, letter concerning, v. 447.
Foote, his Bankrupt, ii. 112—Mr. Gibbon a frequenter of his theatre, 136—Representation of one of his pieces stopped by the duchess of Kingston, ii. 137.
Formiæ, iv. 239.
Fortunate Islands. See Atlantic.
Forum Gallorum, battle of, between Marc Antony and Pansa, iv. 310.
Foster, lady Elizabeth, Mr. Gibbon's anxiety for her safety, in her journey from Florence to Switzerland, i. 352—Executes a drawing of his house, 371—Passes a winter at Pisa, 372—Spends a month at Lausanne, ii. 335—Letters to, 471, 483.
Foster's Sermons, v. 300.
Foster, Mr., chosen speaker of the Irish House of Commons, i. 386.
Fourmont, his Réflexions Critiques examined, v. 295—His Chinese Grammar, 422.
Fowler, Mr., i. 376.
Fox, Mr., defends the church in parliament, ii. 74—Loses a large sum at hazard, 75—Resigns his office at the Admiralty, under lord North, and commences patriot, 77—His debts, 114—Witticism by, 115—Character of, as a speaker and leader of a party, i. 222—Talents displayed by in the American question, ii. 132—Madame Necker's character of him, 194—Mr. Gibbon in a foreign country proud of his fame, 339—On the death of lord Rockingham resigns, i. 259—His union with Mr. Pitt desirable, ii. 347—Joins lord North, i. 246—Spends two days with Mr. Gibbon at Lausanne, 252—His rupture with Mr. Burke, 323—His democratical principles lamented, 286— Mr. Gibbon's love of him in spite of his politics, 392.
Fox, Stephen, brother of the preceding, ii. 115.
France, signs a treaty of commerce with America, ii. 221—Recalls its ambassador from London, 222—Its fleet, under D'Estaing, master of the sea, 225—Peace with, proclaimed, 319—English commercial treaty with, 399—Statistic account of, in the fifteenth century, v. 151—

151—Abridged table of the money of, from Charlemagne to Lewis the Fourteenth, 152.
Fragmenta Regalia, by sir Robert Naunton, i. 151.
Franklin, Dr. ii. 199, 208.
Fraser, general, killed, with two thousand of his men, ii. 217.
Fraser, honourable Mrs., ii. 368.
Fraser, honourable Simon, denominated the Mountaineer, ii. 192.
Frederic, duke of Austria, contends for the imperial crown, iii. 272—Renounces his claim, 284.
Frederic the Second, lawful king of Naples, iii. 207—Sentence of Innocent the Fourth respecting him, irregular, 213.
Freedom of thought, hints respecting, v. 540.
French, have had the smallest share in the fame and benefits of great naval discoveries, v. 202—Their Senegal and Guinea Company, a fiction, 203.
French empire, ruin of, in the ninth century, iii. 2—State of, in the tenth, 5—in the twelfth, 15—In the thirteenth, 24—In the fourteenth, 33—In the fifteenth, 48.
French language, by what means diffused in Europe, i. 132—Englishmen the least conversant with it, ibid.
French noblesse, origin of, iii. 187.
French revolution, sentiments and reflections of Mr. Gibbon respecting, i. 269, 304, 327, 347, 368, 433. ii. 469, 474——Of Madame Necker, 457.
Frentani, iv. 297.
Freret, his character as a writer, iii. 56—Quotation from, respecting fondness for systems, iv. 16, note—His Dissertation on the Marble of Paros, 215—His Dissertation on the Deluge of Ogyges and Deucalion, 232—Quotation from, respecting the secret of mysteries, 473—His Essay on the the Ancient Measures, v. 67—His Dissertation on the passage in Pliny, respecting the circuit of Rome, 364.
Fresnoy, mistaken in supposing Maximilian the First to have possessed Groningen, Overyssel, and Frize, v. 515.
Frey, Mr., i. 73, 169, note.
Friendship, Hurd's Essay on, characterised as base and malignant, i. 209.
Froulay, countess de, ii. 54, 227.
Fuller, Rose, ii. 119.
Fullerton, Mr., secretary of embassy, ii. 206.
Funds, unfavourable opinion respecting, i. 344—Favourable opinion, ii. 388.

G

Gale, his Opuscula Mythologica, i. 148—His Collection of Monkish Historians, iii. 566.
Gallia Cisalpina, valuable productions of, iv. 313.
Gallienus, false honours attributed to, v. 324.
Gallo, countess de, i. 192, note.
Gama, Vasco de, his Voyages, v. 191.
Gaming, reflections on, i 171, note.
Garganus Mons, iv. 281.
Garrick, Mr., i. 114, 155. ii. 34—Letter by, 153.
Gebauer, his Life of Richard of Cornwall, emperor of Germany, v. 428.
Gedoyn, his Dissertations compared with those of Mr. de la Barré, v. 238.
Gendre, Mr. le, his Antiquities of the French Nation, v. 406.
Generation, number of years that constitute one, iii. 553.
Geneva, society of, i. 345—Defensive proceedings of, against a French invasion, 357—Convention between and France, 362, 365. ii. 440—Revolution of, i. 344. ii. 468—Its new constitution, 394—Noble conduct of its magistrates, ii. 448—Farther political account of, 473.
Genlis, countess de, letters by, ii. 284.
Genoa, some particulars of, i. 181, note—Curious description of its chief magistrate, 182, note.
Geoffrin, Madame de, her parties, i. 162. ii. 54.
George of Cappadocia, particulars of, v. 490.
Georgia, returns to its loyalty, ii. 192.
Germaine, lord George, ii. 114, 176.
German mercenaries, eighteen thousand hired by England to act against America, ii. 142.
Germans, their situation in the tenth century, iii. 5—In the eleventh, 9—In the twelfth, 15—In the thirteenth, 23, 240—In the fourteenth, 32—In the fifteenth, 45—Manners of the ancient Germans, 184.
Germany, Mr. de, brother of Mr. Necker, short character of, i. 345.
Germany, present emperor of, i. 346—Statistic account of, particularly its money, v. 152.
Gesner, instance of his vanity, i. 101—Letters between him and Mr. Gibbon, 486, 502, 515.
Geta, his bust in the Florence Gallery, i. 191, note.
Giaconius, on the Columna Rostrata of Duilius, considered, v. 351.

Giannone's History of Naples, its utility in forming the historical turn of mind of Mr. Gibbon, i. 97—Character of the work, v. 413—Errors in, 505.
Giants, authorities for and against the existence of, v. 504.
Gibbon, Edward, grandfather of our author, some account of, i. 14.
Gibbon, Edward, our author's father, account of, i. 20, 25, 216.
Gibbon, Edward, author of the present work, his motives for undertaking the Memoirs of his Life, i. 1.—His ancestry, 6—One branch of his family of gigantic stature, 15—His grandfather arbitrarily treated as a South Sea director, 16—Some particulars of his father, 22—Place of our author's birth, 24—His attachment to his sister, 25—Weakness of his early constitution, 27—Affectionate care taken of him by his aunt Porten, ibid.—His early skill in arithmetic, 28—Is placed under the care of a private tutor, ibid.—Is removed to a school at Kingston upon Thames, 31—His sensations on entering it, ibid.—Is taken from thence in consequence of the death of his mother, 33—Grief of his father on that melancholy event, ibid.—His aunt Porten the true mother of his mind as well as his health, 34—Books first read by him, 35—Enters Westminster school, 36—Date of his entrance into that school ascertained, ii. 488, 489—Quits Westminster for Bath, on account of his health, i. 38—Is placed at Esher, under Mr. Francis, the translator of Horace, 39—His admission at Oxford, 40—His taste for history, how acquired, 41—His stock of learning previous to his introduction to the university, 41—His feelings on his admission, 45—The time he passed there, the most idle and unprofitable of his whole life, 47—His academical tutor, 54—His studies under him, 55—His irregular conduct at, and elopements from, college, 58—His first principles of religion favourable to the church of Rome, 60—Becomes a convert and is admitted into the pale of that church, 64—Expelled from the university in consequence, 65—To cure his spiritual malady, is sent to Lausanne, under the tuition of a Calvinist minister, 73—His studies under that tutor, 80—Retracts the errors of popery, 82—His extraordinary diligence and progress in learning, 87—Excellent method adopted by him of improving in French and Latin, 88—Benefit derived by him from reading the works of Cicero, 89—Resumes the study of the Greek language, 91—Applies to the mathematics, but makes no proficiency in that science, 94—Studies the law of nature and nations, 95—Books to which he remotely owed his writing the History of the Roman Empire, 96—Makes the Tour of Switzerland with his Lausanne tutor, 97—Corresponds with learned men of different nations, 100—His introduction to Voltaire, 103—His first experience of love, 105—Effects produced on his character by his residence at Lausanne, 108—Is recalled home, 109—His affectionate reception, 112—The profession of the law recommended to him, but rejected, 113—His occupations in London, 114—His pursuits during his residence at his father's house in Hampshire, 116—Begins to form a library, 119—His joy at exchanging a twenty pound note for the first twenty volumes of the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions, ibid.—Useful practice observed by him in reading, 121—Effect produced on his mind by the perusal of the historical works of Hume and Robertson, 122—His account of the writing and publishing of his first work, the Essai sur la Littérature, 122—His own critique of this performance, 129—Embraces the military profession, as captain in the Hampshire regiment of militia, 133—Account of his employments, professional and literary, while a soldier, 134, et seq.—His self-examination on his birth-day, 147, note—His difficulties in choosing a subject for historical composition, 149—Revisits the continent, 155—Men of letters with whom he became acquainted at Paris, 161—Visits again his favourite town of Lausanne, 164—Takes up his abode in the elegant establishment of Mr. de Mesery, 168—His first acquaintance with Mr. Holroyd, afterwards lord Sheffield, 169—His disappointment at not obtaining the vacant office of Directeur des Etrangers, at Lausanne, ibid. note—His reflections on some losses he met with at cards, 171, note—Prevents a duel between one of his Lausanne friends and a Dutchman, 175, note—His readings while at Lausanne, 176—His departure from, and description of the place, 178, note—His journey to Italy, 179—Introduced at Turin to his Sardinian Majesty, 183—His stay at Florence, 184—His sensations on entering Rome, 196—His 196—His route from Rome to Lyons, 197—When and where the idea was first formed of his writing the Decline and Fall, 198—Arrives in England, 199—Attends the monthly meetings of the militia, and is promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, ibid.—Comforts of his home, at Beriton, the country-seat of his father, ibid.—Forms a weekly convivial club in London, 200—Withdraws from the militia, 201—His reflections on not having embraced any lucrative profession, 202—Writes an historical Essay on the Liberty of the Swiss, 204—From the disapprobation of his friends, commits it, as he supposes, to the flames, 205—Engages in a periodical work, entitled, Mémoires Littéraires de la Grande Bretagne, 207—Further particulars of this work, ii. 68—Publishes his Critical Observations on the Sixth Book of the Æneid, i. 208—Laments his treatment of bishop Warburton in this essay, 211—His studies preparatory to his beginning his Rise and Fall, 212—Reflections on his domestic circumstances, 215—Death and character of his father, 216—Settles in London and begins his History, 219—His account of his difficulties as to style, 220. ii. 136—Becomes a member of the House of Commons, i. 220—Wishes to be a speaker, but always fails in courage, 221. ii. 130, 132, 133, 134—Publishes the first volume of his History, i. 222—Its flattering reception, 223—Makes a second visit to Paris, 226—Involved in a dispute there with the Abbé Mably, 227—Farther account of the manner of passing his time there, ii. 207, 211—Studies anatomy and chemistry, i. 229—Enters into the Arian controversy, ibid.—Destroys fifty sheets of the continuation of his History, 230—Publishes his Vindication, ibid.—Enumerates and characterises the authors who wrote against his fifteenth and sixteenth chapters, 231—By desire of ministry, writes the Mémoire Justificatif, in reply to the French Manifesto, 234—Appointed one of the Lords of Trade and Plantations, 235. ii. 233—Unjustly accused of deserting a party, by accepting that office, i. 236—Publishes the second and third volumes of his History, 239—Returned to parliament for the Borough of Lymington, 244—Loses his place as Commissioner of the Board of Trade, by the abolition of that Board, 245—His further course of readings for the continuation of his History, ibid.—Writes to lord Thurlow offering his services to government, ii. 272—Question of his being sent as Secretary of Embassy to Paris, i. 247. ii. 317, 321—Leaves London and settles in the house of his friend Deyverdun at Lausanne, i. 248—Previous correspondence with Mr. Deyverdun on this subject, ii. 274—303—Makes known his plan and assigns his reasons to Lord Sheffield, 304, 354—Account of his journey 327—Events on his arrival, 328—Manner of passing his time, contrasted with that of lord Sheffield as a politician, 334—Seeming mortification at his political talents not having been more highly appreciated by government, 340—Farther particulars of the manner in which he passes his time at Lausanne, 341, 349, 359—Resigns all political views, 350—His feelings of satisfaction after a year's retirement at Lausanne, 368—Talks, playfully, of marrying, 370—His indifference to politics, 376, 385—Facetious letter on the report of his death, 379—His satisfaction with Lausanne after a residence of two years, 382—After a residence of three years, 396—His reflections after a trial of seven years, i. 249—His sentiments on quitting it, ii. 404—Account of his intercourse at Lausanne with Mr. Fox, i. 252, 282—Proceeds with and concludes his history, 255—His emotions of joy at that event, ibid.—Pays a visit to lord Sheffield in England, 256. ii. 403—Publishes the concluding volumes of his History, 260—Dinner in celebration of that event, ibid.—His reflections on returning to Lausanne, 266—His studious ardour damped by the death of his friend Deyverdun, 267—His sentiments of the French revolution, 269—Expresses his satisfaction at his lot in life, 271—Farther account of his journey to, and arrival at, Lausanne, 279—Purchases a life interest in Deyverdun's house, 290, 298—Is seized with a fit of the gout, 308—Account of his visits to Mr. Necker, 311, 345—Wishes a declaration to be signed by all parties in England in favour of the constitution, 312, 343—His reflections on his own situation at Lausanne, 314—Gives a public ball, 318—Urges lord Sheffield and his family to visit him, 319—Particulars of this visit, 327—His account of the proceedings of the French towards Geneva, 356—His fears of being driven from Lausanne, 358, 364—His apprehensions for his native country, 396—His reflections on receiving intelligence of the death of lady Sheffield, 397—Hastens to England on account of that melancholy event, 398—Grateful mention by lord Sheffield of this testimony of his friendship, 404—Attractive power of his conversation, 406—Visits his father's widow at Bath, 409—Visits lord Spencer at Althorp, 410—On his return to London is taken ill, 411—Nature of his disorder, 412—His last visit to Sheffield-place, 419—His death, 423—Appearance of his body when opened, 424—His will, 426—His epitaph, 428—His usual attitude when conversing, ii. 58.

Gibbon, John, ancestor of our author, some account of, i. 11—Work by, on heraldry, 13.

Gibbon, Mrs., second wife of Mr. Gibbon's father, i. 112—Mr. Gibbon's dislike of her converted into confidence and friendship, 113, 119—Mr. Gibbon visits her at Bath, 410—Letters to, ii. 52, 79, 81, 124, 131, 134, 135, 239, 240, 241, 244, 257, 355, 431, 469.

Gibbon, Mrs., of Northamptonshire, i. 20—Her singular character, ii. 126—Further mention of, 345—Leaves her estate in Sussex to Mr. Gibbon, 432.

Gibbon, Robert, ancestor of our author, account of, i. 10.

Gibbon, Thomas, dean of Carlisle, i. 14.

Gibraltar, grandeur of its excavations and batteries, ii. 477.

Gift, singular one of a chariot and oxen of solid silver, iii. 416.

Gimelin, his Travels into Siberia, v. 450.

Glaris, account of, iii. 317—Allies itself to the Swiss confederation, 319.

Gnatiæ, or Egnatia, wood placed on a sacred stone there, is said to kindle of itself, iv. 282.

Gods. See Religion.

Gold and Silver. Mines of gold formerly in Italy, iv. 176—Effect of gold and silver as the medium of commerce, v. 85—Value of, to a state, 87—Gold and silver mines of the old and new world compared, 88—Ancient gold of coins superior to modern, ancient silver inferior, 95—Difficulty of ascertaining the value of gold and silver money, 96—Impressions made on money by different nations, to determine its value, 106—Price of silver in England and France, 121—Proportionate price of silver to gold in England and France, 122—First silver money of the Romans, 132.

Goldoni, memoirs of, i. 6.

Goldsmith, ii. 110.

Golofskin, count de, his family and fortunes, i. 165, note.

Gordon, lord George, disturbances occasioned by, ii. 240.

Gordon's Tacitus, i. 41—His Political Discourses, v. 406.

Gori's Symbolæ Florentinæ, v. 483.

Gospel, tradition of the Spaniards respecting, refuted, v. 492.

Government, feudal, particularly in France, essay on, iii. 183—Fealty and homage required by it, 184—Its military service, 188—Its hierarchy, 193—Slavery of the people under it, 199—Its termination, 202—Maxim of La Bruyère respecting governments, v. 54.

Goujet, his Bibliothèque Françoise, v. 432.

Gout, Mr. Gibbon subject to, i. 308. ii. 97, 215, 239, 329.

Grævii Thesaurus, v. 344.

Grainger's Travels into Egypt, v. 449.

Grammont, count de, Memoirs of, highly commended, i. 10.

Grandison, Sir Charles, novel of, preferred to Clarissa, ii. 36.

Gravina, manuscript, del Governo Civile di Roma, examined, v. 39.

Graviscæ, ancient town of Italy, iv. 193.

Greaves, character of his work on the Foot and Denier of the Romans, v. 67.

Greece, ancient, elucidations of its history, iii. 86.

Greek roots, method of learning them pointed out, v. 217.

Greenland, account of a mission to, v. 42.

Greeks, simplicity of their method of reckoning, v. 110—Their weights and measures derived from the Phenicians, 124.

Grew, Dr. Nehemiah, i. 12.

Grey, Mr., parliamentary motion by, stigmatized, i. 349.

Grimstone, Mrs., i. 372.

Grotius, his character contrasted with that of Salmasius.

Guards, large draught of, for America, ii. 143.

Guazzesi's letter to Cocchi, on the Cisalpine Gallic war, iii. 222.

Guelph, the root of the German and British line of the family of Este, iii. 424—The first Guelph allied to the family of Este, 492—Continuation of the Guelphic line after six generations, 503—Guelphic possessions, 505—Guelph the Third, 509—The Fourth, ibid.—The Fifth, 510—The Sixth, 511—The Seventh, 518—The Eighth, 518, 529—The Ninth and last, 535—The rights of the Guelphs Guelphs surrendered to a Ghibelline heir, 536.

Guelphs and Ghibellines, some account of, iii. 22, 432, 490—Names of, how first occasioned, 529.
Guichardt, his Mémoires Militaires sur les Grecs, v. 219.
Guido, Marquis of Tuscany, account of, iii. 352.
Guilford, lord, i. 383.
Guigner, his Memoir on the destruction of the Greek Monarchy in Bactriana, v. 214.
Guthrie, in his Cicero s Letters, erroneously translates Getæ by Gothe, v. 55.

H.

Habsburg, Rodolph, Count of, character of his reign, iii. 241—Killed in the battle of Grynau, 307.
Habsburg, son of the preceding, heads a conspiracy against Zurich, iii. 308—Taken prisoner, 310—Set at liberty, 322.
Hai Ebn Yokbdan, life of, i. 30—Fine production of Arabian genius, v. 234.
Haller, speech delivered by, doubting the authenticity of the story of Tell, iii. 329, note—His catalogue of plants in Switzerland, v. 411—His character, ibid.—His poems translated, 450—Unintelligible note by the translator of his poems respecting the family of Muhleren and Bubenberg, 578.
Halley, Dr., his abstract of Dodwell's book, de Cyclis, examined, v 220.
Hamilton, Gerard, ii. 263—Condemns government for suffering Mr. Gibbon to leave England, 339.
Hamilton, sir William, envoy of Naples, i. 196.
Hampton Court, ii 260.
Hannibal, some particulars in his war, elucidated, v. 370.
Hanno, account of his voyage, v. 184—Journal of it in Greek still extant, 185—Pliny's opinion of his voyage, 186.
Hardion, his dissertation on the Oracle at Delphi, v. 235.
Hardouin, letters of an Ex-Jesuit on his Paradoxes, v. 386—His Commentary on the New Testament, 405.
Hardwicke, lord, letter by, ii. 254.
Harleian Miscellany, v. 462.
Harris's three Treatises examined, v. 431.
Harvey, Mrs., i. 410.
Harwich Packet, taken, ii. 199.
Havercamp's collection respecting the pronunciation of the Greek, v. 382.
Hastings's trial, i. 253. ii. 422—Mr. Gibbon dines with Mr. Hastings, 421.
Hawkins, surgeon, i. 414.
Hayley, Mr., his opinion of Mr. Gibbon's observations on the sixth book of the Æneid, i. 211—Stanzas by, complimentary of Mr. Gibbon's historical work, 260—Visited by Mr. Gibbon at his house near Chichester, 262. ii. 251, 257—Character of his Essay on History, 256, 259.
Hearne, his character as an editor, i. 41. iii. 566.
Heineccius, his History of the German Law, v. 365.
Helrard, Mr., ii. 433.
Helvetius, Mr. Gibbon's acquaintance with, and character of, i. 163, ii. 53.
Henin, princess of, i. 368.
Henly, Mr., afterwards earl of Northington, unsuccessful candidate for Southampton, i. 25.
Henry the Black, by his influence fixed the right of inheritance in the German Aristocracy, iii. 515. His superstitious end, 518.
Henry the Fourth of France, character of, iii. 132.
Henry the Fowler, account of, iii. 493, 495.
Henry of the Golden Chariot, renounces the Guelphic name, iii. 505.
Henry the Lion, his pedigree as allied to the House of Brunswick, iii. 492—Illustrious exploits of, 528—His pilgrimage to the Holy Land, 547—His marriages, 550.
Henry the Proud, account of, iii. 519.
Henry, prince of Portugal, voyages patronized by him, v. 193, 195—Improvement in the art of navigation effected by him, 200.
Henry the Seventh, of Germany, said to have been poisoned, iii. 272.
Henry, son of Rodolph the Second, account of, iii. 509.
Heraldry, whimsical anecdote respecting, i. 9.
Hercules, his matrimonial prowess, v. 532—Mahomet compared with him in this respect, 533.
Herculis Liburni Portus, ancient name of Leghorn, iv. 188.
Herculaneum, iv. 243.
Hernici, iv. 234.
Herodotus, his account of the Medes, iii. 107—Of the circumnavigation of the Phenicians, v. 182—Translation of his History by Larcher, 586.
Hervey, lady, i. 115, 157.
Hervey, lord, his memorial, i. 408.

Hesiod, edited by Robinson, v. 326—Time in which he lived, 584.
Hesse, prince of, i. 366. ii. 449.
Heyne, professor, his opinion of Mr. Gibbon's observations on the sixth book of the Æneid, i. 211—Letter by, ii. 438.
Higgins, Mr., Lectures on Chemistry by, i. 229.
Hints of subjects proper for history, v. 487—Miscellaneous, 536.
Hirpini, iv. 279.
Historian, should feel himself as a witness giving oath, ii. 250—Is apt to infuse the character of his own mind into his work, iii. 126—Will choose such facts as agree best with his principles and views, 128—The sources of his information pointed out, iv. 588—Value of monkish historians, iii. 561—Are historians friends to virtue? v. 536.
History, our author's taste for, how acquired, i. 41—History of England, four persons holding the highest offices of magistracy contributors to it, iii. 344—The desire to know the history of our own country a natural impulse, iii. 559—History the knowledge of causes and effects, iv. 63—Rules for the choice of facts in writing history, ibid.—Slight circumstances frequently of importance, 64—Universal History, v. 411, 413, 422, 428, 432—Hints of subjects proper for history, 487.
Hoadley, bishop, the object of Whig idolatry and Tory abhorrence, i. 21.
Hoare, Mr., i. 42.
Holland, moisture of, injurious to gouty constitutions, ii. 358—Number of its inhabitants, v. 413.
Holland, lord, statement of his property, ii. 115.
Holme, Miss, letters to, ii. 144.
Holommanus, mistake by, respecting the murder of Q. Lollius, corrected, v. 518.
Holroyd, Miss, letters to, i. 333, 369.
Holroyd, J. B., Esq. now lord Sheffield. See Sheffield, lord.
Homer, styled the father of poetry and bible of the ancients, i. 148—Time spent in reading his Iliad by Scaliger and Mr. Gibbon, ibid.—Chronology of his birth, iii. 162—Inquiry into his life and writings, v. 216—The night adventure in the Iliad compared with the Nisus and Euryalus of Virgil, 218—Continuation of the Iliad, 226—Shield of Achilles compared with the description of the shield in Virgil, 229—Examination of the games celebrated at the funeral of Patroclus, 240—Reasons for reading Homer before any other Greek poet, 243—His life in Greek, published by Gale, examined, 247, 249, 277—His Odyssey, 287—Various editions of Homer, and works relating to him, 582.
Hooper, his Inquiry into the State of the Ancient Measures, v. 68.
Hôpital, marquis de l', his Conic Sections, i. 96.
Horace, favourite author of Mr. Gibbon, i. 149—Inquiry into his true design in the third Ode of his Third Book, 489, 505, 522—Explanation of the thirty-fifth ode of the first book, by Mr. Addison, v. 38—The fifth Satire of the first book examined, 339, v. 443—Compared with Juvenal as a satirist, 291—First seven Epistles of the first book, 482—See farther, Hurd.
Horse and Camel, supposed antipathy between considered, v. 575.
Horse-races, at Florence, i. 185, note.
Howard, his edition of Florence of Worcester, iii. 565.
Howe, lord, i. 417. ii. 262, 420.
Howe, sir William, ii. 166, 173, 230.
Howell's History of the World, i. 42.
Hugo, marquis of Tuscany, character of, iii. 405.
Hugonin, mentioned, ii. 116, 129, 226.
Hume, feelings of Mr. Gibbon on reading his historical work, i. 122—Early part of his History, to the reign of Henry the Seventh, characterised as ingenious but superficial, 139—Letter by, to Mr. Gibbon, on his Essay upon the Liberty of the Swiss, 204, note—Writes in the Mémoires Littéraires, a reply to Mr. Warburton's Doubts, 208—Letter by, to Mr. Gibbon, on his publishing the first volume of his Decline and Fall, 224—His indolence humorously characterised, ii. 110—Letter by, to Mr. Strahan, 161—Account of, a few months before his death, ii. 126—His death, i. 226. ii. 174—Friendship which subsisted between him and Dr. Robertson, 202, 204—Mistaken in his estimate of the number of inhabitants in all Gaul, v. 549.
Hunter, Dr., i. 229.
Hurd, letter by, on the authenticity of the book of Daniel, ii. 83—His Commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry, examined, iv. 113—His character of Iphigenia and Electra, considered, 119—His Rules for Epic Poetry, ibid.—His sentiments on the ancient chorus, examined, 127—His account of the Satyrs, Attellanes and Mimes, 130—His notes on the Epistle to Augustus, 133—His Discourse Discourse on the Province of the Drama, 134—His Discourse on Poetical Imitation, 143—Mistaken in supposing himself the first discoverer of the allegory in the third Georgic, v. 548.

Hyacinthé, Saint, Philosophical Researches by, v. 424.
Hyde, Dr., his investigation of the Roman Calendar, iii. 83.

I.

Iberian Colonies, account of, iv. 159.
Ice, Treatise on, v. 466.
Ignatius, account of, given by Mr. Gibbon, justified, iv. 569.
Illyrian Colonies, iv. 158.
Ilva, or Æthalia, island of Italy, iv. 194.
Imperator, meaning of the title, iii. 176.
Index Expurgatorius, v. 543.
India, Historical Disquisition concerning, ii. 434.
Innate ideas, observations on Mr. Locke's theory of, i. 436, 447.
Innovation, political or religious, spirit of, dangerous, i. 269, 382.
Insects, theology of, v. 421.
Interamna, iv. 308.
Ireland, affairs of, ii. 377, 386.
Irish language, inquiry respecting, v. 418.
Iroquois and Greenlanders compared, v. 421.
Italia Antiqua, of Cluverius, its extreme accuracy, i. 76.
Italy, elaborate readings of our author previously to his visiting it, i. 177—Letter to his father on the subject of visiting it, ii. 38—State of, in the thirteenth century, iii. 23—In the fourteenth, 31—In the fifteenth, 43, 54.
Italy, ancient, names of, iv. 155—People of, 158—Regions, atmosphere and soil of, 164—Its itineraries and tables, 322—Its military roads, 324—Statistic account of, particularly its weights and measures, v. 160—Description of ancient Italy much wanted, 429.
Itineraria Vetera, edited by Wesseling, v. 293.

J.

Jekyl, Mr., i. 405.
Jensius, his Stricturæ Juris Romani, v. 364.
Jenyns, Soame, his Inquiry into the Origin of Evil, v. 215.
Jersey, island of, invaded, ii. 230.
Jerusalem, essay by Mr. Gibbon on the miracle which stopped the rebuilding of the temple of, i. 97—Site and extent of, described, v. 496.
Jews, account of, in answer to Mr. Davis, iv. 529.
Jockey Club, pamphlets written against, i. 349.
John, St., patron of Florence, festival of described, i. 184, note.
Johnson, sir William, ii. 76.
Jones, sir William, letter by, ii. 252—Wishes for the appointment of chief justice of Bengal, 253.
Journal des Savans, character of, v. 442.
Journals, the manufacture of on the continent miserably debased, i. 133.
Jubilees, Letters on, v. 471.
Judith, empress, account of, iii. 377, 501.
Julian, Life of, its utility in forming the historical turn of mind of Mr. Gibbon, i. 96—His immense revenues, v. 147.
Junius's Letters, ii. 98.
Junonis Laciniæ Templum, account of, iv. 274.
Justin, difficult passages of, explained, i. 456, 477, 492, 507—Passage from, quoted by Mr. Gibbon in his history, examined and justified, iv. 560.
Juvenal, his Third Satire examined, v. 290—His Fourth, ibid.—His Sixth, 291—His Seventh, 295—His Eighth, 296—His Ninth, 298—His Tenth and Eleventh, 299—His Twelfth, 302—His Thirteenth, 303—His Fourteenth, 306—His Fifteenth, 307—His Sixteenth, 309—Compared with Horace, 291, 302—With Boileau, ibid.—General observations on, 310.

K.

Keene, colonel, ii. 196.
Kellerman, general, i. 382.
Kenig, his Appeal to the Public, v. 472.
Keppel, admiral, ii. 225.
Kerseboom, his Treatise on the Inhabitants of Holland, v. 413.
King's illness, i. 284—Debts, ii. 199.
Kingston, duchess of, stops one of Foote's plays, ii. 137.
Kirkby, Mr. John, tutor to Mr. Gibbon, some account of, i. 28—character of his Automathes, 30.
Klein, his Natural History of Fishes, v. 413.
Knowell, Dr., anecdote respecting a sermon preached by him before the House of Commons, ii. 78.

L.

Lactantius, quotation from, iv. 562.
Lacus Sabatinus, iv. 195.
Lally, count de, i. 305—Escapes from France

France and finds a generous refuge in the house of lord Sheffield, 355, 372, note—Short character of, 380.
Lambelle, madame de, i. 355.
Lambert, marquis of Tuscany, account of, iii. 380.
Lami's Learning of the Apostles, v. 333.
Lamotte, confined in the castle of Chillon on account of his revolutionary principles, i. 336—Condemned to fine and twenty years imprisonment, 347—Escapes from prison, 365.
Langebec, his edition of the Scriptores Rerum Anglicarum, iii. 659.
Langer, Mr., furnishes Mr. Gibbon with some intelligence of his family, i. 13—Letter to, on the subject of the Memoirs of the House of Brunswick, iii. 353.
Larius, lake, iv. 176.
Larpen, battle of, iii. 293.
Latins, chronology of their history, iii. 165.
Latium, towns of, iv. 226.
Lauhdoun, general, ii. 80.
Lavinium, iv. 228.
Laurence, Henry, president of Congress, sails in the same vessel with Mr. Gibbon from Dover to Boulogne, ii. 326.
Laureus, beautiful villa of Pliny, iii. 293.
Laus Pompeii, town of, iv. 179.
Law, Mr., died in the house of Mr. Gibbon's aunt, i. 20—His character and writings, ibid.
Lausanne, our author's first residence at, i. 73—Revisited by him, 164—Singular society instituted there, of his young friends, male and female, 167—Mr. Gibbon settles there, 248—Nature of its society, 251. ii. 361, 365—Effects of the French revolution on, i. 269, 299, 347—Supineness of the inhabitants of, on the event of Lewis the Sixteenth's death, 395—Inquisitorial spirit of, in matters of faith, ii. 22—Expense of living at and in London compared, 376—Influx of Englishmen to, 383—Crowded with exiles, 433.
Lee, Arthur, sent by Congress to the court of Madrid, ii. 233.
Lee, general, particulars of his being taken prisoner, ii. 196.
Legarde, family of, mentioned, i. 372.
Legge, Mr., returned to Parliament for Southampton, i. 118.
Legislative power, in whom it ought to be vested, ii. 7—That and the executive should never be united in the same person, 8.
Legitimation, difficulties respecting the right of, iii. 209.
Leibnitz, his character and pursuits, iii. 361, 568—Correspondence between him and Bernouilli, v. 448—His Protogia, 463.
Lenborough estate, ii. 78, 79—Sale of, 99—Difficulties respecting, 123, 125—Mr. Gibbon's feelings on parting with it, 361—Sold for three-fourths of its value, 374.
Leopold, brother of Frederic of Austria, his character, iii. 272—Defeated by the Swiss, 277.
Lesner, his Theology of Insects, v. 421.
Lessart, Mr. de, i. 346.
Letters on Rousseau and Saurin, v. 369—From the country, 412.
Levade, family of, mentioned, i. 372.
Lew, his Dictionary, i. 204.
Lewis, catholic bookseller, summoned before the Privy Council respecting Mr. Gibbon's conversion to popery, i. 64, note.
Lewis the Débonnaire, state of the feudal system under, iii. 197.
Lewis, duke of Bavaria, contends for the empire, iii. 272—Favourable conduct of, to the Swiss, 281—Chosen emperor, notwithstanding the anathema of the pope, 284.
Lewis the Pious, account of, iii. 377, 501.
Lewis the Ninth, character of, iii. 25.
Lewis the Eleventh, History of, by Duclos, v. 448.
Lewis the Thirteenth, question of his impotency, v. 45.
Lewis the Fourteenth, doubts as to his birth, v. 45.
Lewis the Sixteenth, offended with a passage in Mr. Gibbon's History, i. 244—His flight, 325—Mr. Necker's defence of him, 368—Declaration of the English Parliament in his favour, 392—His death, 395—Compared in his fate to Charles the First, ii. 484.
Lexicon, that of Robert Constantine, the next best to that of Thesaurus, i. 144.
Libanius, his Letters by Welf, v. 354.
Life, what period of, the most happy, i. 274—By what standard its duration should be measured, 275—Private and political life compared, ii. 350—The busiest season of life the most happy, 435—The life of the ancients longer than that of the moderns, iii. 159—The life of princes shorter than that of literary men, 160—Calculation of the chance of living to a hundred years, 418.
Ligne, prince and princess of, travel from Brussels to Lausanne to act a comedy, ii. 336.
Ligures, ancient people of Italy, account of, iv. 180.

Linguet, his History of the Age of Alexander, v. 233.
Linnæus, his Travels into Western Gothland, v. 450.
Literature, Essay on. See Essay.—State of, in the fourteenth century, iii. 40—Encouragement it met with at different periods, iv. 15—Its decline, to what owing, 19—Great men attached to it, 21.
Littlebury's Herodotus, i. 41.
Liturnum, house of Seneca at, described, iv. 242.
Liutprand, bishop of Cremona, some account of his history, iii. 387.
Livy, emendation of an obscure passage of, suggested, i. 434—Parallel between and Tacitus, iv. 66—Remarks on his character and writings, 422—Compared with Polybius, as to Hannibal's passage over the Alps, v. 370.
Locke, Mr., expelled from the University of Oxford, i. 47—His Essay on the Human Understanding, 96—Observations on his theory of innate ideas, 436, 447.
Locri Epizephyrii, account of, iv. 272.
London, its attractions, i. 114—Introduction there less easy than at Paris, 163, note—Seat of philosophy, ii. 3.
Longinus, commended, i. 148—His Treatise on the Sublime in the edition of Tollius considered, v. 252.
Lothaire the Second, iii. 496, 497.
Love, political events, and the destiny of great men in the East, seldom influenced by, iii. 106.
Low Countries, statistic account of, particularly its monies, v. 150.
Lowth, bishop, interesting picture of his academical life, i. 46—His Prælectiones on the Poetry of the Hebrews, 51—His victory over Warburton, 210—His Translation of Isaiah mentioned with praise, iv. 532.
Lucan, lord, i. 411.
Lucania, connection of the inhabitants of, and the Bruttians, iv. 265—Towns of, 266.
Lucca, description of, iii. 374.
Lucerne, joins the confederation of the Swiss, iii. 287—Conspiracy of its discontented inhabitants, 289.
Lucian, edited by Hemsterhuis and Gesner, v. 420.
Lucretia, her character, iii. 449.
Lucullus, and Scævola, villas of, iv. 248, 257.
Ludolph, character of himself and his ancestors, iii. 495.
Luna, town of, famous for its wines, iv. 185—Bay of, famous for its marble, 188.
Lutterel, colonel, ii. 73, 131.
Lysias, edited by Taylor, v. 369.

M.

Mabillon's Diplomatica, i. 173.
Mably, his dispute with Mr. Gibbon on the subject of republics and monarchies, i. 227—Character of, and his works, 228, note — His Observations sur les Grecs, v. 286—His parallel of the French with the Romans, v. 406.
Mac Carthy, Mrs., i. 180, note.
Machiavel, a republican, v. 405.
Mackenzie, Mr., his sentiments of the posthumous works of Mr. Gibbon, ii. 503.
Maclaurin, his book on Fluctions recommended, ii. 46—His account of Newton's Discoveries, 50. v. 462.
Macpherson, Mr., his translation of Ossian, ii. 103.
Macpherson, sir John, letter by, describing his tour through Spain, ii. 477.
Madeira, pipe of, seized at Berne, but released to Mr. Gibbon by the government, i. 286.
Madrid, some account of, ii. 479.
Madyes, account of, iii. 119, 120.
Magdalen college, i. 50.
Magi, Persian, supposed circumnavigation by one, v. 187.
Magliabecchi, account of, his library, and his correspondence with more than three thousand persons, i. 193.
Mahmud of Gasna, the first prince who assumed the title of Sultan, iii. 8.
Mairan, his Treatise on Ice, v. 466.
Malaga, account of, ii. 477.
Maillet, Mr., his Description of Egypt examined, v. 556.
Mallet, Mr., our author's early intimacy with, i. 115—First representation of his play of Elvira, 155 note, 157 note—Letter by, ii. 42—His Introduction to the History of Denmark, with a translation of the Edda, iii. 231—His poem of Aminta and Theodora, v. 450.
Malmsbury, lord, i. 282—Playfully called the audacieux Harris, 352.
Man in the Iron Mask. See Marchiali.
Manchester, town of, takes a decided part against the Americans, ii. 145 — Whitaker's History of, 146—Parliamentary bill respecting, 147.
Manetho's History of Egypt, i. 57.
Mann, sir Horace, British envoy at Florence, i. 192. v. 483.
Mannes, Roger de, happy manœuvre of, in the the war between Zurich and Austria, iii. 315.

Mantua, iv. 319.
Marcellus, the centurion, his conduct considered, iv. 618.
Marchiali, or Man in the Iron Mask, conjectures respecting, v. 41.
Marius, his sitting on the ruins of Carthage, iv. 117—his villa, 249.
Marmontel, mistakes a passage in Lucan relating to the Gallic Druids, v. 576.
Marolles, Michael de, i. 6.
Marozia, her vices, iii. 389.
Marquis, or Margrave, origin of the title, iii. 378.
Marriage, preferable to celibacy, ii. 65—Early marriages the most happy, 450—Necessity of the institution in civilized countries, iii. 208.
Marriage Act, relating to the royal family, ii. 73, 76.
Marrusini, singular proceedings in the country of, iv. 297.
Mars, inquiry as to the time in which he lived, iii. 162.
Marsi, iv. 291.
Marsham, his Canon Chronicus, i. 57. v. 245—Grounds of his deference for the Parian marble disputed, ibid.
Martel, Charles, account of, iii. 190.
Marti's Letters, v. 333.
Martyn's Translation of Virgil's Georgics, v. 448.
Masquerade, Boodle's, ii. 119, 121, 122, 123.
Massachusetts Bay, declared in a state of rebellion, ii. 132.
Massacre aux Carmes, horrid details of, i. 373, note.
Massieu, his History of French Poetry, v. 369.
Matilda, countess of Tuscany, account of, iii. 513.
Matilda, daughter of Henry the Second, her marriage, iii. 551—All the princes of Brunswick lineally derived from one of her sons, 552.
Mathematical studies, detailed course of, ii. 44.
Maty, Dr., some account of, i. 123—His concern in Mr. Gibbon's first publication, 126—His Letter to Mr. Gibbon on his Essay on the Study of Literature, iv. 7—Wrote a review of Mallet's Aminta and Theodora in the Bibliothèque Raisonnée, v. 450.
Maupertuis, his Essay on Moral Philosophy, v. 465—His works, 472.
Mayence, siege of, i. 400.
Mazarin, Cardinal, attachment of Anne of Austria to, v. 46.
Measures, ancient, taken from parts of the human body, v. 118—Particulars respecting, 224.
Medals, Dissertation on the allegorical beings found on, v. 35. See farther, Addison.
Medes, Dissertation on the Monarchy of, iii. 56—First kings of, but little known, 73—Reign of Arteus the sixth king, 90—State of under Astibaras, 105—under Aspadas, 106—Herodotus's account of, 108—Difficulties respecting, elucidated, 110—Chronology of, 113.
Mediterranean and Indus, maps of the country between, ii. 426.
Melli, city and kingdom, mysterious traders of, v. 194.
Medici, encouragement given by the family of, to literature, iv. 17.
Mémoir Justificatif, in answer to the French Manifesto, account of, i. 234—The Memoir itself, v. 1.
Mémoires Littéraires de la Grand Bretagne, a periodical work edited by Mr. Gibbon and his friend Deyverdun, i. 207—Contents of the first number of, ii. 69.
Mémoires Militaires, of Quintus Icilius, studied by Mr. Gibbon when in the Militia, i. 137.
Mémoires Militaires sur les Grecs et les Romains, account of, v. 219.
Memnon, fable of, iii. 87.
Merchants, mysterious, description of, v. 194.
Mercier, author of the Tableau de Paris, ii. 338.
Meridional Line, on the Position of, v. 170.
Mesery, Mr. de, account of his house, his wife, and himself, i. 168.
Metapontum, iv. 267.
Metempsychosis, doctrine of, v. 415.
Metrie, Mr. de la, his Penelope's Web, v. 459—His Happy Life, 462.
Metromanie, Piron's Comedy of, critique on, v. 476.
Mexico, population, mines, revenue, and religion of, v. 529.
Meuzelius, German critic, editor of the Bibliotheca Historica, his character of Mr. Gibbon as an Historian, i. 264.
Mezeriac's Ovid, v. 216, 219.
Mickle's Lusiad characterised, v. 180, note.
Middlesex election, Mr. Gibbon votes on the popular side respecting, ii. 133, 135.
Middleton, Dr., his Free Inquiry into the Miracles, i. 60—Contrasted with Baronius, iv. 588—His Treatise on the Roman Senate, v. 457.
Middleton, lord, ii. 123.

Milan, ii. 59.
Military service, nature of, under the feudal system, iii. 188.
Militia, English prejudice in favour of, i. 134—Mr. Gibbon holds a commission in a regiment of, ibid.—Benefits derived to him from this employment, 136, 145, note—Regiments of reviewed at Portsmouth, 142, note—Bill respecting, in consequence of the war with America, ii. 233.
Milner, the methodist, antagonist of Mr. Gibbon, characterised, i. 231, note.
Milton, his archangels described, ii. 476.
Mincius, river, iv. 176.
Minerva, question as to the time in which she lived, iii. 162.
Mirabeau, marquis de, singularity of his character, i. 163, note—Stigmatised as a demon, 252—His Prussian Monarchy, and Secret Correspondence, 287 — Denominated the worst of men, 304.
Micenum, iv. 260.
Modesty, false, the meanest species of pride, ii. 39.
Moine, Mr. le, his Treatise on Miracles censured, v. 459.
Molesworth, lord, his vehement speech against the South-Sea directors, i. 16.
Molesworth, Mr., fellow collegian of Mr. Gibbon, and believer with him in the Catholic religion, i. 62.
Money, usurious interest charged on, by the Romans, v. 117 — Rate of interest of, and the price of land, compared, 117 —New system of, established by Constantine, 144. See farther, Copper and Gold.
Monier, his Institutions Astronomiques, ii. 49.
Monson's Naval Tracts, i. 151.
Montagny, Mr. de, i. 290, 292.
Montague, lady Mary, her Letters, v. 451.
Montagu, Mrs., her visit to Paris, ii. 178.
Montesquieu, his paradox, that modern Italy is a desert, refuted, i. 197.
Montesquiou, general of the French army destined to act against Geneva, 356—His conduct characterised as polite, moderate, and sincere, 366—Account of his flight from his revolutionary pursuers, 381—Farther commendation of, ii. 459, 472.
Montfaucon, his Palæographia, i. 174—His library of Manuscripts, v. 344—His Antiquities, 481.
Montgon, abbé de, his Memoirs, v. 433.
Montmorin, Mr. de, victim of the French revolution, ii. 457.
Montolieu, Madame, Caroline of Lichfield written by, ii. 400.
Montucla's History of Mathematics recommended, ii. 51.
More, sir Thomas, his History of the Reign of Edward the Fifth censured by Horace Walpole, iii. 334—Vindicated by Mr. Gibbon, 342.
Morell's Treasury of Imperial Medals. v. 472.
Morgarten, battle of, iii. 276.
Moshiem, his Syntagma Dissertationum mentioned with praise, iv. 572—Charge of misquoting him resisted, 574—Erroneously supposes the present Koran different from the laws given by the prophet in his life-time, v. 567—Mistaken in representing the Norman pirates as devoid of all religion, ibid.
Motteville, Madame de, her Memoirs of Anne of Austria characterised, v. 239.
Mounier, Mr., president of the National Assembly, characterised as a serious, dry politician, i. 305.
Mountains, height of several of the principal ones, v. 477, 479.
Moyle, Mr., refutes the story of the Thundering Legion, iv. 617.
Muratori, character of, and account of his productions, iii. 365 — His Dissertation on the Brazen Table found near Velleia, v. 483.
Mutina, singular prodigy at, of two burning mountains contending with each other, iv. 312.

N.

Names, personal, as ancient as the use of words, iii. 368—Originally every name had a distinct meaning, ibid.
Nanybrus, story of, as connected with that of Parsondas, iii. 91.
Naples, title of Charles the Eighth to, i. 50. iii. 207—Situation of curiously defined, i. 126—Account of ancient Naples, iv. 259—Question when it became a Roman colony, v. 512.
Nardini, his account of Rome, v. 313—Meaning he attributes to the words Insula and Domus, examined, 317—Traces the Via Sacra, 321—Depicts the infernal action of Tullia, 322—Situation of Mount Esquilin questioned, 323—Gives an account of a Chapel dedicated to Concord, 324—Mentions the different Forums, 326—The Capitoline Mount, 328—The Campus Martius, 329—The Mons Palatinus, 334—The Circus, 335—The Tiber and its bridges, 340—Conclusion and character of his work, 343.
Narnia, iv. 308.

Nauze, Mr. de la, his Dissertation on the Roman Calendar, v. 213, 270—His Dissertation on Pliny's book on Painting, 214—Compared with Count Caylus, ibid.—His Remarks on ancient Geography, 444.
Necker, Madame, previous to her marriage the object of our Author's affection, i. 123—Further account of, 127. ii. 64, 165—Her correspondence with Mr. Gibbon, 169, 176, 186, 193, 245, 440 to 468.
Necker, Mr., account of Mr. Gibbon's acquaintance with and several visits to, i. 226, 311, 323, 345, 359. ii. 207, 367—His defence of the King, i. 368, 395—His book on the Finances, ii. 371—His Religious Opinions, 443, 454—Pure, though unsuccessful, in his political conduct, 486—His Du Pouvoir Exécutif, a testimony of his esteem for the English constitution, 488—Letter by, to Mr. Gibbon, after receiving an account of his having undergone the operation of tapping, 495.
Nebuchadnezzar, iii. 121.
Nechus, King of Egypt, his character and exploits, v. 181.
Nemesion, account of his condemnation, iv. 554.
Neptune, inquiry as to the time in which he lived, iii. 162.
Nero, his bust in the Florence Gallery, i. 188, note—Revolting nature of his character, ibid.
Neville, Mr., ii. 52.
New Aretin, v. 467.
Newton, Bishop, his fortune as a Churchman contrasted with that of Whiston, i. 6—Animadversions on his censure of Mr. Gibbon, 241.
Newton, sir Isaac, his Principia, ii. 48—Mistaken respecting the dynasty of the Piscadians, iii. 77—Mistaken in point of modern history, 114—His Chronology of the Greeks and Egyptians compared with the common chronology, 150—Critical Remarks on his new System of Chronology, 152.
Nice, Italian city of that name mistaken by the Abbé Mongault and Dr. Middleton for Bythinium, v. 550.
Nicholls, Mr. John, charged with remissness in not answering a letter, i. 352, 364.
Nicholls, Rev. Norton, letter by, ii. 500.
Nicol, Mr. George, i. 391.
Nicoll, Dr. John, master of Westminster School, i. 36.
Nineveh, mistakes, as to its situation, rectified, iii. 69—Its rising greatness, 102.
Ninus, doubts about the period in which he lived, iii. 62.
Nivernois, Duke of, Mr. Gibbon introduced to, i. 157, note.
Normans, their character in the eleventh century, iii. 11.
North, Frederick, i. 405.
North, lord, sketch of his party and his opposers in parliament, i. 221. ii. 133—His retirement from office, i. 245—Loses his sight, 258—His cheerfulness in retreat contrasted with the melancholy of Mr. Necker, 311—His death lamented as a grievous loss, 354—Characterised as one of the best companions in the kingdom, ii. 135—Letter by, 418.
Noue, de la, situation and conduct of, at the siege of Rochelle, v. 534.

O.

Octavianus, basely surnamed Augustus, hatred expressed to, for the death of Cicero, ii. 252.
Odin, religion of, iii. 232—His country, 233.
Oedipus of Sophocles, and Birds of Aristophanes, translated by Bowin, v. 536.
Oguz Khan, account of, iii. 119.
Olbach, baron de, i. 162, note.
Olivet, his edition of Cicero commended, i. 89.
Olivier, poem, character of, v. 414.
Opposition, History of, imputed to Macpherson, ii. 235.
O'Reilly, count, character of, ii. 481.
Orford, lord, i. 26.
Oriel college, discipline of, under Dr. Evelcigh, commended, i. 71, note.
Orleans, duke of, the Massacre aux Carmes concerted at his house, i. 376.
Orosius, edited by Havercamp, v. 344.
Orpheus, opinions respecting his Hymn to Musæus, iv. 474.
Osiris, inquiry as to the age in which he lived, iii. 161.
Ossian's Poems, question of their authenticity, i. 225. ii. 101.
Ossory, lord, i. 411.
Ostia, iv. 228, 255.
Otbert the First, account of, iii. 393—Otbert the Second, 403.
Otho the Great, his conduct considered, iii. 396, 493.
Otter's Travels in Turkey, v. 462.
Ouchy, residence in Switzerland of the duchess of Devonshire and lady Elizabeth Foster, ii. 472.
Ounce, Roman, weight of, v. 70.
Outhier, his Voyage to the North, v. 433.

Ovid, anachronisms of, disgusting, iv. 47—Minute account of his merits and defects, 354—Dauphin edition of, censured, v. 445—His Fasti examined, ibid. 451.
Oxford. See University.

P.

Padua, its university compared to a dying taper, i. 197.
Padus, river, iv. 174.
Paganism, system of, iv. 70—Oracles of the Pagans not more ancient and venerable than their mysteries, 471—Their oracles consulted upon all occasions, ibid.—Examination of their mysteries, 472.
Pagi, father, mistake of, respecting the Arab khalifs, v. 574.
Palestine, measure and extent of, iv. 540.
Paliser, sir Hugh,
Palmerston, lord, ii. 165. v. 485.
Pandæmonium, name given to the House of Commons, ii. 345, 351.
Pandataria, island, iv. 240.
Pandosia, iv. 275.
Panthea, story of, iii. 147.
Pantheon, scrupulous delicacy of the proprietors of, ii. 74.
Paoli, compared to Cromwell, i. 181, note.
Paolo, Fra, quotation from, supported, iv. 551.
Paris, why superior to London in the treasures of art, learning, and luxury, i. 159 — Introduction to society there more easy than in London, 163, note —Denominated the centre of polished society, ii. 3—Account of its dinner and supper parties, 52—Its superiority to London in conversation, 53—Farther account of, 54, 207, 210.
Parker, archbishop, his character, iii. 565—Account of the books he published, ibid.
Parliament, danger of tampering with its representation, i. 386—Mr. Gibbon's reasons for deeming himself unqualified for a seat in, ii. 39—Dissolution of, in 1780, 243—Short sketch of a parliamentary life, 338, 351.
Parma, ruins of an ancient town discovered at, i. 183.
Parr, Dr., his opinion of Mr. Gibbon's observations on the sixth Æneid of Virgil, i. 211, note.
Parsondas, his character and history, iii. 91—Overturns the throne of Arteus, 99.
Parties, political, respective strength of, on the accession of lord Shelburne to the premiership, ii. 262.
Pascal, utility of his Provincial Letters, in forming the historical turn of mind of Mr. Gibbon, i. 96.
Passion, workings of, investigated, iv. 117.
Patavium, iv. 321.
Paterculus, Velleius, emendation of an obscure passage of, suggested, i. 527.
Patriots, list of, who have deserved well of mankind, iv. 95.
Pavilliard, Mr., of Lausanne, Mr. Gibbon placed under his tuition, i. 73—His character, 78—Reclaims his pupil from popery, 82.
Payne, lady, ii. 212.
Payne, sir Ralph, i. 421.
Pelasgian colonies, account of, iv. 160.
Pelham administration, i. 26.
Peligni, iv. 295.
Pembroke, lady, on the death of her daughter, settles at Lausanne, ii. 354.
Perkin Warbeck, reasons for believing him to be the duke of York, iii. 339—Reasons for believing him to be an impostor, 343.
Persepolis, critical inquiries respecting, iii. 77.
Persia, elucidations of its history, iii. 74—Virtuous customs of its kings, 84.
Persian cycle, iii. 83—Tale, 419—Revenue, v. 139.
Persians, preference of, to the Greeks, examined, v. 422—Fondness of, for new customs and new pleasures, 534.
Perspective, best writers on, ii. 50.
Peter the First in France, philosophical Romance, character of, v. 382.
Peter the Third, Rulhière's account of his death by poison, v. 528.
Petersburgh, Memoirs of the Academy of, v. 467.
Petilla, iv. 275.
Petra Pertusa, iv. 307.
Phædrus, excellence of, as a school book, i. 32.
Phalaris's Epistles, new reason for pronouncing them spurious, v. 564.
Philo, by Mangey, v. 425.
Philosophy, of a genius for, iv. 57—What it is not and what it is, 58—Assistance it derives from literature, 59.
Photius, extracts from, commended, v. 212.
Phraortes, account of, iii. 114.
Physics, advantages of the ancients over the moderns in the study and cultivation of, iv. 53.

Picentini, iv. 246.
Piceuum, iv. 302.
Pierson, general, ii. 245.
Pigot, lord, ii. 198, 233.
Pindar, Translation of his Odes, by West, v. 584.
Pinkerton, Mr. John, his character, iii. 571—Recommended as a proper person to edite the Scriptores Rerum Anglicarum, ibid.—His letter to Mr. Gibbon on this subject, ii. 492—Mr. Gibbon's answer, 492.
Pisæ, town of, iv. 186.
Pischadians, dynasty of, iii. 77.
Piron, his comedy of Métromanie, examined, v. 476.
Piso, to whom Horace addressed his Art of Poetry, inquiry respecting, i. 487, 502, 518.
Pithecusæ Insulæ, said to have been formed out of the sea by an earthquake, iv. 247, 264.
Pithou, Peter, first editor of Phædrus, i. 32.
Pitiscus, his Dictionary of Antiquities, v. 364.
Pitt, first lord Chatham, illegal proceeding respecting the militia sanctioned by, i. 134.
Pitt, William, son of the preceding, honourable mention of by Mr. Fox, i. 283—His conduct in going to war with Russia blamed, 321. ii. 433—Styled a virtuous and excellent minister, i. 344—Mr. Gibbon but little acquainted with him, 418—Chancellor at the age of twenty-three, ii. 260—His moderation and character favourable to political success, 348, 376—Blamed for withdrawing the Irish propositions, 384.
Placentia, iv. 313—Inscription in a convent at, 314.
Plagiarism, mistaken notions of, ii. 157.
Platonic love, that between a brother and sister, the only kind that can be indulged without danger, i. 25.
Plautus, critical remarks on a passage of, iv. 435.
Pliny, the younger, disputed reference to, iv. 566—Date of his consulship, examined, 585—His advice with respect to reading, v. 211—His Epistles edited by Cortius, 293—Mistakes in the French translation respecting him, v. 498.
Pluche, abbé, his History of the Heavens, considered, v. 364.
Pococke's Description of the East, v. 448.
Pœstum, iv. 267.
Poetry, its province and sources, iv. 23—Manners of the ancients more favourable to its cultivation than those of the moderns, 24—Means of perceiving its beauties, 26—Whether it should confine itself to the truth of history, 46, 48.
Poland, contest for between Austria and Prussia, ii. 80.
Polier, Swiss colonel, in danger of banishment, i. 394.
Polier de Rollens, account of, as a preacher, i. 170.
Policy, measures repugnant to, no longer just, i. 35.
Pope's Homer, character of, i. 35.
Polybius, character of, v. 366—Compared with Livy in his account of Hannibal's march over the Alps, 370—Editions and Translations of his History, 588.
Polytheism, spread of, in Italy, in the fifteenth century, iii. 55.
Pomeranian dog, present of, to Mr. Gibbon, ii. 135.
Pondo, pound weight, of the Romans, v. 72, 80, 113, 128, 482.
Pontia, island, iv. 240.
Pontoppidan's Gesta Danorum, v. 405.
Popery, Mr. Gibbon a proselyte to, i. 63—Penalties to which proselytes and priests of this religion are subject, 64—Errors of, retracted by Mr. Gibbon, 82.
Popes, their struggles with the princes of Germany in the eleventh century, iii. 10—In the twelfth, 14—Their power in the thirteenth century, 24—Their removal to Avignon, and its consequences, 29—Their conduct in the fifteenth century, 42—Cannot depose kings, 213.
Populonium, ancient town, iv. 189.
Porsenna, his stupendous mausoleum described, iv. 197.
Porson, Mr., his answer to archdeacon Travis, i. 240—His encomium of Mr. Gibbon's History, 264.
Port Royal Greek Grammer, merits of, v. 244.
Porten, James, account of his family, i. 24, note.
Porten, Mrs., aunt to Mr. Gibbon, her care of his infancy, i. 27—Her character, 34—Takes a house near Westminster school on his account, 36—Accompanies him to Bath for his health, 38—Letters to, 85, 97. ii. 33, 124, 324, 336, 340—Affecting letters on her death, 388, 392.
Porten, Sir Stanier, on his death Mr. Gibbon proposes to adopt one of his daughters, i. 297, 315—Account of his being in love, ii. 125—Consolatory letter to his lady on his death, 429.

Porteus, Dr., supposed intention of, to write against the two last chapters of the Decline and Fall, ii. 166.
Portraits of Mr. Gibbon, i. 309. ii. 232, 363, 385.
Portsmouth, concourse of visitors on occasion of a review there, ii. 99.
Portugal, reduced state of its population, v. 531.
Portuguese, African trade of, v. 192.
Potter, archbishop, his Grecian Antiquities, v. 237, 287.
Pouilly, Mr. de, his opinion respecting the first five ages, iv. 40—His Theory of Agreeable Sentiments, v. 450.
Pound, ancient. See Pondo.
Pouskin, ii. 127.
Powel, Mr., lord Holland's agent, ii. 115.
Preachers, the philosophical of the English, and rhetorical of the French compared, i. 140, note.
Præneste, iv. 332—Its Mosaic pavements, 250.
Prætutianus, iv. 305.
Preston, Mrs., i. 410.
Price, Dr., characterised as a visionary, i. 304.
Priestley, Dr., as an antagonist of Mr. Gibbon, characterised, i. 232—His correspondence with Mr. Gibbon, ii. 265.
Premontval's Monogamy, v. 468.
Prevot's History of William the Conqueror, v. 412.
Prideaux, dean, fears exposing to profane eyes the doctrine of the Incarnation, i. 253.
Princes, their interests can never be separated from those of their people, ii. 6—Should never interfere in theological minutiæ, 21—To be admired must be viewed as we view pictures, 62—Their power of disposing of their kingdoms considered, iii. 217—The consent of the subjects, their fairest title, 222.
Printing, curious fact of a volume committed to the press, without having been written by a pen, i. 257—Period of the invention of printing, iii. 563—Jubilee of Printing, by Seiz, v. 381.
Pritchard, Mrs., surprising vesatility of her talents, i. 155, note.
Privernum, by the bold answer of a citizen, obtained the privileges of Rome, iv. 254.
Prochyta, ancient island, subject to earthquakes, iv. 264.
Procopius, Anecdotes of, deemed spurious, ii. 255.
Prodigies, remarks on several, relating to Augustus, v. 54, 55, 58.
Prudentius, quotation from, iv. 546.
Prussia, Frederic king of, traits of his character, i. 195, note—Described as the champion of public tranquillity, and of the independence of the German states, ii. 386—Appears throughout his writings the enemy of the English, v. 577—Instance of this in his description of the battle of Blenheim, ibid.
Prussia, Prince Henry of, favourable mention of, i. 252—Invited, with his declared mistress, to pass the winter at Vienna, ii. 251.
Ptolemy, character of, as a geographer, v. 179.

Q.

Quintilian, edited by Gesner, v. 364.
Quotations, Mr. Gibbon's mode of making them, as represented by Mr. Davis, iv. 523.

R.

Racine, charged with credulity, iii. 178.
Raleigh, sir Walter, his life chosen by Mr. Gibbon as a subject of historical composition, but afterwards relinquished, i. 150—Character of Oldys's Life of, 151—Remarks on his death, iii. 209.
Randolph, Dr., contrasted with Mr. Davis, iv. 602—With Dr. Watson, 605.
Rapin, falsely supposes that Frederic the Second bequeathed Sicily to his son Henry, v. 514.
Ratel, Persian weight, v. 129.
Ravenna, why the chosen residence of the emperors, iv. 211—Why Cæsar established his winter-quarters there, v. 368.
Raynal, abbé, character of, ii. 330—His History of the Office of Stadtholder, v. 463.
Reading, mode of doing it with advantage, v. 209.
Reate, famous for its asses and the quick growth of its herbage, iv. 291.
Reaumur, his Natural History of Bees, v. 432—His Art of Hatching Eggs, 465.
Rebellion of 1745, i. 26.
Reform, club of, reprobated, i. 348—Danger of, evinced from its effect in France, 269, 349, 383.
Religion, how far the chief magistrate might interfere in it, ii. 21—Etymology of the word, 481—Determined by the majority of a community, iii. 214—Difficulty of arriving at the knowledge of it, iv. 70—Reason but of little use in the inquiry, 72—The Greek and Egyptian religion, 73—Of the worship of heroes, 74—Opinions of savages upon the subject confused, 76—Generation and hierarchy of the gods, 82—Gods of human life, ibid.—Systems of liberty and necessity, 83—The latter adopted by the ancients, ibid.—Union of the two species of divinity, 84—Gods subject to human passions, 85—Had their partialities, 86—And their contests, 87—Assumed the human form, 88—Were subject to bodily pains and pleasures, ibid.—See farther, Paganism.

Religious Opinions, by Necker, ii. 443, 454.
Religious war, effects of, v. 538.
Renée, her character, iii. 450.
Rennell, major, letter by, ii. 426.
Reputation, value of, ii. 422.
Reynolds, Sir Joshua, his speech on viewing in after-life some portraits painted in his youth, i. 130—Natural propensity of the mind to any one art or science rather than another, denied by him, 149—Portraits of Mr. Gibbon by, 309. ii. 232, 363—His death a grievous loss to Mr. Gibbon, i. 354.
Rhegium, account of, iv. 271.
Rheni Insula, described, iv. 310.
Rhine, happy comparison of, i. 370.
Richard the First, account of, v. 488.
Richard the Third, some particulars of his life and reign examined, iii. 333.
Richecourt, count de, character of, i. 195, note.
Richer, his Parallel of the Arundelian marbles, v. 466—His Moses defended against Appian, 468—His Dissertation on Usher's Chronology, 471.
Richmond, duke of, ii. 207—On the death of Lord Rockingham keeps his situation of lord lieutenant of Ireland, 260.
Ridley, son of sir Matthew, served in the seven years war under prince Ferdinand, ii. 65, note.
Rinaldo the First, account of, iii. 475.
Robertson, character of, as an historian, i. 122—Not equal to Hume, ii. 10—Letter by, to Mr. Strahan, 159—Sends Mr. Gibbon a copy of his History of America, 200—Complimentary letter to, by Mr. Gibbon in return, 201—Reply to that letter, 204—Further letters by, 416, 425, 434.
Rochefoucault, duke de, victim of the French revolution, ii. 457.
Rockingham, lord, death of, ii. 258—Resignations in consequence of that event, 259.
Rodolph. See Habsburgh.
Rolle, federation dinner at, i. 394.
Roman Empire, History of the Decline and Fall of, books to which the author remotely owed the writing it, i. 96—When and where the idea of writing it first struck him, 198—Books read by him preparatory to its commencement, 212—The first chapters of it several times recomposed, 220. ii. 136—Publication and reception of the first volume, i. 222, 223—Attacks on the fifteenth and sixteenth chapters of that volume, 230—Answer to the attacks, iii. 515—Letters commendatory of the first volume, by Mr. Hume, i. 224—by Mr. Strahan, ii. 138—By Mr. George Scott, 141—By Mr. Whitaker, with some defects pointed out, 146, 149—By Dr. Warton, 152—By Mr. Garrick, 153—By Mr. Horace Walpole, 154—By Dr. Robertson, 155, 249—By Mr. Adam Ferguson, 160—By professor Campbell, 168—By Madame Necker, 172, 177—By Mr. Suard of Paris, 183—Improvements in the manner of printing it suggested, 162—Expense and profit of the third edition of the first volume stated, 167, note—Fifty sheets of the continuation of the work committed to the flames, i. 230—Publication of the second and third volumes, 239—Farther prosecution of the work, 245—Feelings of the author on the day of its conclusion, 255—Statement of the time employed on each of the last three volumes, 256, note—Concluding volumes published, 263—Foreign translations of the work, 239, 265. ii. 183, 190.
Roman empire, proof of its being neither patrimonial nor hereditary, iii. 170—Slowest in its rise, and longest in its duration, why, Roman Republic, History of by Ferguson, ii. 163.
Romans, chronology of their history, iii. 165—Controversy respecting the first five centuries, iv. 40—Reflections on that controversy, 44—Their roads and highways, 335—Marches of their armies, 352—Their triumphs minutely examined, 359—Their right of triumph, 360—Authority by which it was conferred, ibid.—Persons on whom it was conferred, 362—Reasons for which it was granted, 367—Gate through which they passed, 381—Conduct of the Romans to Perseus and Jugurtha contrasted, 397—Their money, weights and measures, v. 70—Their method of computation, iii. 112, 113, 132—Usury practised by, 116—Their first silver money, 132—Their hollow measures not derived from the Athenians, 135.

Romans in Great Britain, projected work on the military history of, ii. 144.
Romanzow, ii. 127.
Rome, ancient city of, its boundaries, walls, and gates, iv. 206—Its wonders, 210—Its four ages, 220—Its goddess, 224—Farther account of Rome, v. 313.
Rose, Samuel, letter by, ii. 502.
Rosset, confined in the castle of Chillon for his revolutionary principles, i. 336—Condemned to fine, and twenty years imprisonment, 347—Escapes from prison, 365.
Rotzberg, fortress of, manœuvre by which it was surprised and taken, iii. 266.
Rousseau, his Confessions, i. 6.
Rozzonico, pope Clement the Thirteenth, i. 196.
Rubicon, prohibitory statue erected on the banks of, iv. 311—Supposed by Montesquieu as authentic, v. 553.
Ruling passion, v. 539.
Rumford, count, variously denominated, ii. 326.
Russel, sir John, ii. 110, 117, 124, 127—His unseasonable death, 318.
Russia, war with, by Mr. Pitt, reprehended, i. 321—Statistic account of, v. 527.
Russians, body of, intended to be employed against the Americans, ii. 140—Causes to which the abject state of slavery of the Russians is to be ascribed, v. 531.
Rutilius Numantianus, his Voyage, i. 177—His Poem minutely examined, v. 435.
Rutuli, iv. 233.

S.

Sabini, account of, iv. 288.
Sacrificer, Essay on the Nature and Office of, v. 473.
Sage, le, exact observer of geography, ii. 479.
Saint Alban's Tavern, meeting of the country gentlemen at, ii. 349.
Saint James, patron and apostle of Spain, account of, v. 494.
Saladin, some account of, iii. 18.
Salapia, iv. 280.
Salassi, ancient people of Italy, account of, iv. 176.
Salmasius, his character contrasted with that of Grotius, v. 209.
Sallust, remarks on his character and writings, iv. 399—Few's translation of, 406—Blamed both as a chronologist and geographer, v. 552.
Samnites, account of, iv. 297.
Samnium, iv. 287.
Sappho, her bust in the Florence Gallery, i. 188, note.
Sardanapalus, his courageous defence of his empire in a revolt, iii. 66—Burns himself in his palace with his eunuchs, concubines, and treasure, 68—Supposed fate of his children, 71, note.
Sardinia, king of, short account of him, i. 179, note.
Sarpedon, as amiable a character as Patroclus, and a much greater one, v. 226.
Sarnen, fortress of, manœuvre by which it was surprised and taken, iii. 266.
Sataspes, story of, iv. 188.
Saturnalia, observations respecting the festivals of that name, v. 503.
Saurin, his pleading against Rousseau, v. 423.
Saussure, Mr. de, letter by, ii. 436.
Saville, sir Henry, his edition of Scriptores post Bedam, iii. 566.
Savornin, Mr. de, his Sentimens d'un Homme de Guerre, v. 223.
Savoy, princess of, i. 179—Duke of, ibid.—Invasion of Savoy by the French, 356—Its change of name, 385.
Saxon kings and clergy, ii. 106.
Scarron's Works, v. 473.
Scholiast, mistakes pointed out, of one who wrote commentaries on Cicero, v. 513.
Schedius de Diis Germanis, v. 386.
Schomberg, count de, our author's intimacy with, i. 317.
Schools, public, best adapted to the genius and constitution of the English, i. 37.
Sculteus, Eloge of, v. 465.
Sciences, their connection with one another pointed out, iv. 50—Not indebted to luxury for their existence, 93.
Scott, Mr. George, commended as a mathematician, i. 147—Letter by, on mathematical studies, ii. 44—Invited to contribute to the Mémoires Littéraires de la Grande Bretagne, 68—Letter by, on Mr. Gibbon's historical work, 141. v. 219.
Scott, sir William, formerly tutor in University College, Oxford, i. 70—The publication of his lectures on history desirable, ibid.
Scyllaceum, situated in the narrowest part of Italy, iv. 273.
Scythians, account of, iii. 118.
Sectanus, his Satires, v. 344.
Seiz, Mr., his Jubilee of Printing, v. 381.
Selden, his work de Diis Syriis commended, v. 507.
Seneca, description of his bust in the Florence Gallery, i. 188, note.
Septchênes, Mr. Leclerc de, undertakes the translation into French of Mr. Gibbon's History, ii. 190.
Septennial act, though vicious in its origin, beneficial in its effects, i. 18.

Septimus Severus, his bust in the Florence Gallery, i. 191, note.
Serious Call, by Law, character of, i. 21.
Sesostris, age of, chosen as the subject for Mr. Gibbon's first attempt as an author, i. 56—Fate of this composition, 58.
Sestertium, nature and value of, v. 112, 483—Decimal tables of, 134.
Servetus, his works lost in oblivion, ii. 266—Calvin's cruel treatment of him, v. 401.
Severy, Mr. Wilhelm de, protégé of Mr. Gibbon, i. 267—Some account of, and his family, 268, 279, 294—Ill health of his father, 378, 384—His father's death, 392 — Accompanies Mr. Gibbon to Frankfort, 399 — Letters from Mr. Gibbon to his mother, ii. 364, 404, 413—Another, to his father, 409, 422.
Sévigné, Madame de, commended, ii. 37.
Sexes, respective value of, iii. 489.
Shaftsbury, mistaken as to the state of the arts in Rome, after despotism was established, v. 564.
Sheffield, lord, his Prefaces as editor of the present publication, i. 1—His first acquaintance with our author, 169—His marriage, ii. 65—Captain in the regiment of Royal Foresters, 67, note—Death of his first son, 80—Makes a tour to Ireland and Scotland, 109—Deemed by Mr. Gibbon calculated to act in the place of Lord George Germaine in America, 143—His stedfast opposition to America in her dissensions with England, 216—Major of the Sussex Militia, 232—Defends Mr. Gibbon's accepting a place under lord North, i. 236—Raises a regiment of Light Dragoons, ii. 234, note—Returned to parliament for Coventry, i. 256. ii. 238—His eager and persevering zeal in Parliamentary affairs, 240—His activity in quelling the disturbances occasioned by lord George Gordon, 241—Created lord Sheffield, i. 256. ii. 243—Ordered to Canterbury and Deal to suppress disturbances, 257—Character of his writings, i. 257. ii. 327, 337—Leaves the army, 262—Loses his seat for Coventry, 351, 355—Returned to parliament for the city of Bristol, free of expence, i. 312—His lady esteemed by Mr. Gibbon above every other woman in the world, 317—His observations on the Corn Laws, 324—His visit to Mr. Gibbon at Lausanne, 327—His hospitable reception of the French emigrants, 354, 358, 365—Abjures all political connection with Mr. Fox, 392—Adapted, in Mr. Gibbon's estimation, for an active seat in the government, 396—Death of his lady, 397—His account of Mr. Gibbon's return to England in consequence of that event, 404—His narrative of Mr. Gibbon's illness and death, 414, 418, 420, 423—His reasons for publishing Mr. Gibbon's letters, 431—New edition of his works, ii. 363, 378—Further account of his writings, 386, 394—Complimentary letters to, as editor of the present volumes, 496—503.
Shekel of the Hebrews, value of, v. 78.
Shelburne, lord, succeeds lord Rockingham as prime minister, i. 246. ii. 528—Resigns, i. 157.
Sheridan, Mr., his eloquence on the trial of Mr. Hastings, i. 258. ii. 422.
Shoes, nailing them to the feet of horses not known to the ancients, v. 535.
Silarus, river, had the property of changing wood into stone, iv. 268.
Silius Italicus, his Catalogue examined, iv. 333.
Silva, Madame de, i. 337.
Simpson, Dr. Robert, his Euclid, ii. 45.
Simpson, Thomas, his Algebra, Trigonometry and Fluxions recommended, ii. 48.
Sinner, l'Avoyer de, letter to, ii. 427—Letter in reply, 428.
Sinuessa, iv. 240—Its exhalations said to be fatal to animals, and sometimes to men, iv. 247.
Sipus, territory of, the worst of ancient Italy, iv. 280.
Sirmond, father, his advice to a young friend not to appear as an author till the mature age of fifty, exemplified in himself, i. 125.
Sivrac, duchess of, ii. 361.
Smart, Christopher, mistaken in supposing the first lines of Horace's Art of Poetry levelled at Ovid, v. 568.
Smith, Dr., his Harmonics recommended, ii. 50.
Smith, Dr. Adam, commendation of his Wealth of Nations, ii. 162—His opinion of Mr. Gibbon's History, 255—Letter by, on that subject, 429—Extract of his Wealth of Nations published in Spain by permission of the court, and the work itself condemned by the Inquisition, 479.
Smuggling, Mr. Pitt's restraints on, ruinous to the East India companies of Antwerp and Sweden, ii. 377.
Social contract, ties of, never dissolved by revolutions, iii. 110—Happy instance of this contract in the Swiss confederation, 280.
Soracte, ancient mountain, iv. 196.
South-Sea scheme, violent and arbitrary treatment of its directors, i. 16.

Spain, rumour of a war with, ii. 122—Contest of with the Algerines, 137—Account of a tour through, 477—Its roads and climate, 478—Its language and literature, 479—Its court, 480—State of, in the tenth century, iii. 6—In the eleventh, 12—In the twelfth, 17—In the thirteenth, 26—In the fourteenth, 36 — In the fifteenth, 52 — Statistic account of, particularly its weights and money, v. 156 — Its population and manufactures, 530.
Spanheim, his De Præstantia et Usu Numismatum examined, v. 457, 458, 460, 467, 475, 477, 478, 479, 481.
Spear, God of war adored by the Romans under the form of, v. 322.
Spelman's Xenophon, i. 41.
Spencer, the Fairy Queen the most precious jewel in the coronet of, i. 4—Character of lord and lady Spencer, ii. 384.
Spina, admirable correction of Pliny by Cluvier respecting, iv. 316.
Spire, taken by Custine, ii. 459.
Spoletium, iv. 308.
Spring, name given to an association of young persons, male and female, at Lausanne, i. 167. ii. 60.
Stael, Madame de, leaves France to take up her abode with her father, i. 347—Arrives after many miraculous escapes, 355. ii. 458—Is brought to bed of a second son, i. 383—Described as a pleasant little woman, ibid.—Character of, when Mademoiselle Necker, ii. 367.
Stanyan, his calculation of the wealth of the republic of Berne, ii. 29.
Stebbing's Defence of Christianity, v. 468.
Stewart, Mr. Simeon, unsuccessful candidate for the borough of Southampton, i. 118.
Stilico, his battle with the Goths, v. 258.
Stockings, witticism respecting, ii. 116.
Stormont, lord, ambassador at Paris, i. 203—Recalled, 222.
Strabo, character of his book on Geography, v. 445.
Strahan, William, letter by, on the subject of Mr. Gibbon's History, ii. 138—Letter to, suggesting improvements in the manner of printing it, 161—Farther letter to, commendatory of the History, 168—Letter to, on the death of Hume, 174.
Stratton, Mr., ii. 233.
Strozzi, duke, i. 192, note.
Stuart, Andrew, applies to the pope on the subject of Arabic manuscripts in the Vatican, ii. 479.
Stuart, cardinal, his person and manners, i. 192, note.
Succession, uncertainty of the rights of, iii. 206.
Suer, le, his History of the Church and Empire, i. 77.
Suetonius by Oudendorp, v. 467.
Suja Dowla, ii. 120.
Sulmo, iv. 296.
Sulpitius Severus, translation of a passage of, justified, iv. 547.
Sulpitia, Satire written by her examined, v. 311.
Superstition, catholic, enemy of reason, and parent of the arts, i. 159—Resources of superstition inexhaustible, iii. 66.
Susa, supposed to have been the capital of an empire, iii. 90.
Swiss and Switzerland, slight sketch of Switzerland, i. 98—History of the liberty of the Swiss a desirable subject for an author, 153—Innocent freedom of the Swiss manners exemplified, 167—Unworthy treatment of a Swiss regiment by the French, 347, 355—Farther conduct of the French towards the Swiss, 357—ii. 460, 461—Pure air of Switzerland favourable to a gouty constitution, ii. 158—Establishment of its government in the fourteenth century, iii. 32—General history of the Swiss Republic, 239—Geographical description of Switzerland, ibid.—Account of Switzerland while a province of Germany, 240—Its beginning independence, 250—Arbitrary conduct of Albert the First towards the Swiss, 253—Despotism of the governors which he placed over them, 257—Particulars of a conspiracy, the result of that despotism, 261—Number of Swiss nobility sacrificed to avenge the death of Albert, who was assassinated by his nephew, 270—Conduct of the Swiss to his successor, 271—Their courageous opposition to, and defeat of, Leopold, 275—Confederation of the Swiss states, 280—Disquieted in their liberty by the house of Austria, 284—Their confederation augmented by the alliance of Lucerne, 287—By that of Berne, 296—By that of Zurich, 311—By that of Glaris, 319—By that of Zug, 320—Enter into a treaty with Rodolphus and Leopold, sons of duke Albert, 327—Farther particulars of the alliance of Berne to the confederation, 327—Statistic account of Switzerland, particularly its money, v. 153. See farther, Berne, Geneva, and Zurich.
Sybaris, city of, critical remarks on the number of its inhabitants, iii. 178—Account of ancient Sybaris, iv. 266.

Sylva, Madame de, i. 408, 422.

T.

Tacitus, parallel between, and Livy, iv. 66.
Talent, Roman, weight and value of, v. 73—Attic, 74, 483—Tyrian, 76—Babylonian, 77—Jewish, 78—Alexandrian, 79—One in use in the heroic ages, 110.
Tamerlane, account of, iii. 38, 40—His policy in conquests commended, 141.
Tarentum, iv. 283.
Tarquinii, nursery established there of all sorts of plants and animals, iv, 195.
Tartar conquerors, some account of, in the thirteenth century, iii. 20.
Tatwyl, battle of, iii. 313.
Taurasium, iv. 279.
Taurisci, ancient people of Italy, iv. 177.
Taylor, his Dissertation on the Laws of the Decemvirs against insolvent Debtors, v. 413.
Taylor, the Arian, character of his book on the fifteenth and sixteenth chapters of Mr. Gibbon's History, i. 231, note.
Telemachus, character of, iv. 482—Compared with Sethos, 495, note.
Tell, William, Swiss revolution unjustly ascribed to him, iii. 265—Authenticity of the story of, examined, ii. 329, note.
Temple, sir William, his use of the French language, i. 132—Mistaken as to the law of succession in the empire of the Mamluks, v. 554—Mistakes Amanzor, an imaginary hero, for one of the Western caliphs, 555.
Tempsa, singular Pagan custom observed at, iv. 271.
Terrasson, his Sethos compared with Telemachus, iv. 495, note—Character of his Sethos, v. 288.
Tertullian, passage from, and the name of the Treatise from which it is taken, rectified, iv. 54—Mr. Gibbon's reason for the frequent use of this author, 545.
Test Act, ii. 74.
Tetradrachma, value of, v. 74, 83, 97.
Texier's Readings, ii. 142.
Theatre, English, Mr. Gibbon an assiduous frequenter of, i. 114.
Theatre, Greek, by Brumoy, v. 586.
Theban Legion, dissertation on the martyrdom of, v. 447.
Theological Faults, v. 428.
Thomas, his Eloge of the duke of Sully highly commended, v. 460.
Thou, pronoun, Letters on the use of, v. 472.
Thrasymenus Lacus, iv. 198. v. 387.
Thuanus, i. 5.
Thurlow, lord, letter to, by Mr. Gibbon, offering his services to government, ii. 272—Lord Thurlow's answer, 274.
Tiber, river, described, iv. 199—Observations on its depth, v. 340.
Tiberius, his age the most vicious of antiquity, iv. 65—His debaucheries at the island of Capreæ questioned, v. 47.
Tibur, town of, iv. 232—Singular country-house of Adrian there, 251.
Ticonderoga, besieged, ii. 182.
Tillemont, his compilations mentioned with praise, iv. 591—His History of the Emperors, v. 266.
Timavus, account of its streams and fountains, iv. 318.
Timur. See Tamerlane.
Tithes, divinity of, ii. 107.
Toggenbourg, count de, his generous conduct to the Swiss, iii. 275—Taken prisoner, and cut afterwards into a thousand pieces, 307.
Toledo, archbishop of; some account of, ii. 481.
Toleration of the Asiatics, v. 465.
Tollius, his edition of Longinus, v. 252—His Gustus Animadversionum Criticarum, 282.
Tom Jones, novel of, highly commended, i. 5.
Torrington, lord, himself pitied, and his uncle reprobated, ii. 34.
Townley, colonel, candidate for the county of Lancaster, ii. 75.
Townshend, Mr., characterised as an acute traveller, but a bad mineralogist, ii. 478.
Townshend, Tommy, motion by, that a sermon preached before the house of commons be burned by the common hangman, ii. 78.
Trabaud, his Principes du Movement et de l'Equilibre, ii. 49.
Trade, gentility not degraded by, i. 8—Principles of, v. 361.
Trajan, his bust in the Florence Gallery described, i. 189.
Tranquebar, missions to, v. 425.
Translations, French and Latin, method respecting, adopted by Mr. Gibbon, i. 87.
Transpadana, province of, iv. 178.
Traveller, qualifications essential to, described, i. 198.
Travis, Mr., one of the antagonists of Mr. Gibbon, characterised, i. 239.
Traytorrens, Mr., his lectures on Algebra and Geometry attended by Mr. Gibbon, i. 93.

Tree,

Tree, genealogical, from Adalbert to George the Third, iii. 478.
Trembley, Mr., his Researches on the Polypus, v. 428.
Trevor, Mrs., i. 336.
Turin, account of, and its reigning family, i. 178, note.
Turks, their conquests in the fourteenth century, iii. 37—Their conduct in the fifteenth, 41.
Turretin Alphonso, his Eloge by Vernet, v. 325.
Tusci, villa of Pliny, described, iv. 198.
Tusculum, iv. 231—Proceeding of the inhabitants of, to Camillus, 252.
Tyger Roch, escapes from the Cape to the Mauritius, ii. 130.

V.

Vabre, Mr. la, ii. 36.
Vadimonium, lake, described, iv. 197.
Vaillant, his book on medals, v. 482.
Valois, his Dissertation on the Amphictyons, v. 235.
Varignon, his Eclaircissemens des Infiniment Petits, ii. 45.
Vassal, duties of, under the feudal system, iii. 214.
Vegetius's Institutions, v. 428.
Veii, situation of examined, v. 384.
Velia, ancient Greek town, account of, iv. 268.
Velleius Paterculus, mistake in Vossius's Life of, respecting a defeat of the Romans, v. 508.
Veneti, their origin, iv. 314.
Venetia, account of, iv. 314.
Venice, league of Cambray against, iii. 444.
Venusia, iv. 282.
Venuti, his Discoveries of Herculaneum, v. 471.
Vernet, his Eloge on Alphonso Turretin, v. 325—His Letters on the pronoun Thou, 472.
Verona, iv. 320.
Vertot, his sentiments on the Social War combated, v. 389—Historical errors committed by him pointed out, 509.
Verus, Annius, his bust in the Florence Gallery, i. 190, note.
Vespasian, his bust in the Florence Gallery described, i. 188, note.
Vestini, iv. 296.
Vesuvius, iv. 243—History of, by the Academy of Naples, v. 412.
Vetulonii, ancient town of Italy, iv. 190.
Viani, his account of Mezzabarba's Voyage to China, v. 364.

Vibo, ancient town of Italy, account of, iv. 271.
Vicat, civilian professor at Lausanne, commended, i. 95.
Vincent, Dr., letters by, respecting the period of Mr. Gibbon's entering Westminster School, ii. 488, 489.
Vindication of the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Chapters of Mr. Gibbon's History, reception of, i. 231—Commendation of, by Horace Walpole, ii. 158—By Dr. Robertson, 229—The work itself, iv. 515.
Vinerian professorship at Oxford, excellence of, i. 73.
Virgil, chronology of his Æneid, iii. 165—Necessity of being acquainted with the state of Rome, its infancy and splendour, to understand his beauties, iv. 29—His address in the conduct of the Æneid, 31—His Georgics, 32—Purpose for which they were written, 35—His anachronisms compensated by his beauties, 47—The instance of Mezentius slain by Ascanius, ibid.—The Episode of Dido examined and justified, 49—His Æneid examined by Hurd, 125. v. 216—His catalogue praised, iv. 328—His story of Mezentius examined, 329—His description of the temple of Janus, 390—Remarks on several passages of the Æneid, 441, 446—The interpretation of the Sixth Æneid by Warburton, examined and censured, 467—Account of that interpretation, 468—Nature and plan of the Æneid considered, 475—The character of Æneas examined, ibid.—His discourse with Anchises in the infernal regions, 487—His account of Æneas's descent, 491—The episode of the infernal shades borrowed from Homer, 497—Beauties of the episode, ibid.—Reason why Virgil has not recorded in his Sixth Æneid, the secret of the Eleusinian mysteries, 498—His Life, prefixed to Holdsworth's Remarks, mentioned with praise, 500—To prove that he did not reveal the secret of the mysteries, a passage from Horace quoted, 503—Ivory gate in the Sixth Æneid attempted to be explained, 513—Story of Nisus and Euryalus compared with the night adventure in the Iliad, v. 218—Description of the shield in the Eighth Æneid compared with that in the Iliad, 229.
Vitellius, his bust in the Florence Gallery, i. 188, note.
Vivonnes, duke of, his observation to Lewis the Fourteenth, v. 209.
Volaterra, iv. 188.
Volkel, professor, wishes Mr. Gibbon to recommend him as travelling tutor, ii. 438.

Volsci, iv. 235.
Voltaire, some particulars of, during his residence at Lausanne, i. 103—Acts in a theatre at Lausanne, built for the representation of his own plays, 104, 167—Mistaken in a point of history, iii. 272—His Age of Lewis the Fourteenth characterised, v. 247—His poem, entitled, What best pleases Women? examined, 460—His Treatise on Toleration considered, 469—His defence of the marriage of Mademoiselle, from the examples of Roman emperors, refuted, v. 558—His Dialogue between Marcus Aurelius, and a Recolet friar, 561—Erroneous in rejecting the famous incription respecting the date of Christianity in China, ibid.—Commends Racine and Corneille for not showing contempt for the Jewish nation, 570.
Vossius, Isaac, his Dissertation on the magnitude of Rome, v. 344—His character, 350.

U.

Umbria, province of, iv. 305.
Umbria cis Apenninum, iv. 307.
Umbria trans Apenninum, iv. 307.
Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, some account of, i. 44, 48—Indolence of their professors, 50—Their tutors, 54—Remissness of, in inculcating religious principles, 59—Clamour raised against the University of Oxford, on account of the popish principles of some of her sons, 64—Improvements, as to academical discipline, supposed to have been recently made in some of the colleges of Oxford, 70—Early state of Oxford, v. 522—Schools at Cambridge in the twelfth century, 523.
Ursel, duke and duchess of, make a journey from Brussels to Lausanne, to act a comedy, ii. 336.

W.

Wainfleet, bishop, Magdalen college founded by, i. 51.
Waistcoats, English ladies occupied in making them for the army in Flanders, i. 413.
Waldegrave, Dr., academical tutor to Mr. Gibbon, i. 54—Letter by, ii. 37.
Wales, princess of, ii. 74.
Wallace, Mr., letter by, on the death of Mr. Hume, ii. 174.
Walpole, Horace, letters by, i. 153—158—His Historical Doubts respecting the Life and Reign of Richard the Third examined, iii. 331—Hume's reply to his Historical Doubts, 341—Inaccurate in his account of the tournament between earl Rivers and the great Bastard of Burgundy, v. 571.
Walpole, sir Robert, events that followed on his resignation, i. 25.
War, has its rights as well as peace, iii 131.
Warburton, bishop, his arbitrary disposition as a critic, i. 209—Character of his Divine Legation of Moses, 211, note—His Interpretation of Virgil's Sixth Æneid minutely examined, iv. 467.
Warton, Dr. Joseph, letter by, ii. 152——Errors of, pointed out, as to the time in which Pericles and Apelles lived, v. 566.
Warren, sir George, diamond star cut from his coat, at court, two birth days following, ii. 193.
Washington, ii. 168.
Water, Theology of, by Fabricius, v. 369.
Watson, Dr., characterised by Mr. Gibbon as a prelate of a large mind and liberal spirit, i. 231—Letters of civility from one to the other, ii. 180, 227—Account of the difference of opinion between him and Mr. Gibbon on the subject of the fifteenth and sixteenth chapters of the Decline and Fall, iv. 597—One passage in the chapters particularly reprehended by him, 599.
Watteville, Mr. de, a Swiss, spirited resolution of, i. 358.
Way, Mr. and Mrs., ii. 79.
Way, Gregory Lewis, letter by, to lord Sheffield, ii. 501.
Webster, lady, i. 408.
Wedderburne, Mr., afterwards lord Loughborough, procures for our author a place at the Board of Trade, 235—Confidence of Mr. Gibbon in his political talents, 396. ii. 263—Visits Ireland, ibid.—Letter by, 322—Letter to, on his being appointed Lord High Chancellor, 486.
Werner, a young Swiss, his heroic conduct in a conspiracy to obtain freedom for his country, iii. 261.
Weingarten, monk of, his Chronicle of the Lords of Altdorf, iii. 491.
Weights, Measures, and Money of the Ancients, Dissertation on the Principles of, v. 66.
Wesseling, his Itineraria Vetera, v. 293—His discourse on the Inscription of Berenice, cording to him, a person may see Rome in twenty days. This trait is enough for me.

July 25th.]—Lord Palmerston, whom we saw at Lausanne, is arrived here from Padua. He has completed his travels, and I think to his satisfaction. Sir Horace Mann took us to his house to dinner. After dinner there was a boat-race on the Arno, which we, and the rest of the English, saw from the windows of our apartment. It is one of those things (there are so many of them) of which the description may be better than the reality. The boats were so little ornamented, and the race so short, that we merely saw that the Florentines have some idea of public spectacles, but know not how to execute them. We passed the evening in an assembly at the Countess Accaioli's.

August 23d.]—The two Damers dined with us. They are really good young men; and though extremely wild, are by no means devoid of abilities and good sense. The youngest was in the Guards, which he left, because Lord Tyrawley had refused him permission to travel. I suspect that there was some political motive for this.

26th.]—* is returned from his tour. He distinguished himself at Lucca by his declared contempt of the city and the state, by his misplaced hauteur, and by his many sarcasms. The republic, which has always prided itself on its attentions to the English, adopted with regret the resolution of making him quit Lucca, which it communicated to Sir Horace Mann. When this was intimated to * he requested leave to see an Opera, and to obtain it, made very unseasonable submissions. An officer of the Guards attended him all the day, and in the evening conducted him to the theatre without his sword. He departed the next day.

HINTS

ERRATA to VOL. IV.

Page 155, line 7 from top, for Cluvierus read Cluverius.
—— 157, line 6 from bottom, for Le Sabine read La Sabine.
—— 166, line 3 from top, for neque auro read atque auro.
—— —— line 8, for oleaeque read oleae.
—— —— line 21 from top, for plurimo read plurima.
—— 167, line 8 from top, for unda cæpit read unde cæpit.
—— 169, line 2 from bottom, for faut tirer read faut pas tirer.
—— 173, line 3 from top, for Mons Sovis read Mons Jovis.
—— 182, line 13 from bot. for Transierim Cyene read Transierim, Cinyra.
—— 185, line 7 from bottom, for nominis et read nominis est.
—— —— line 22, for Tum read Tunc.
—— 186, line 11 from top, for densos rapit read rapit densos.
—— 190, line 3, for Tigri read tigri.
—— —— line 6 from bottom, for quidpe read quippe.
—— 197, line 9 from bottom, for antiquum read antiquus.
—— 202, line 15 from top, for traheratur read traheretur.
—— 203, in margin, for Ovid Fast. p. 580, read Ovid. Fast. l. 340.
—— —— line 8 from top, for lavat read lavit.
—— 204, line 11 from top, for æternati read æternitati.
—— 206, line 17 from top, for post hunc read per hunc.
—— 228, line 15 from top, for quos celsa read quos celso.
—— 234, line 9 from bottom, for sulcari read sulcaris.
—— 236, last line, for VIII. 398 read VIII. 392.
—— 238, in margin, for Sil. Italic. 528 read Sil. Italic. XII. 528.
—— 252, line 4 from bottom, for latis read late.
—— 253, line 7 from top, for agro read agello.
—— 263, line 2 from top, for mugit read sonat.
—— 277, line 4 from bottom, for armenta read armentum.
—— 281, line 13 from top, for Diomeden read Diomedem.
—— —— line 25 from top, for accensâ ceraunîâ read accensa ceraunia.
—— 282 line 18 from top, for vetus ut est read vetus est ut.
—— —— line 20 from top, for gens, sive, read gens, seu.
—— 283 line 17 from top, for mutuet read mutet.
—— 292, line 15, for Acctæ read Ætæ.
—— 302, line 13, for fons Blandusia read fons Blandusiæ.
—— —— line 21 from top, for precori read pecori.
—— 308 line 8 from top, for patulo read patuloque.
—— —— line 9, for Fulginium read Fulginia.
—— 316 line 6 from top, for mollior aquâ read mollior agnâ.
—— 317 line 2 from bottom, for solveret cui justa exacto read solveret exacto cui sera.
—— 318 line 8 from top, for litoris read æquoris.

renice, 326—His Treatise on a passage of Victor Tunnunensis, 333.
Wetstein's edition of the New Testament, v. 468, 472.
Whig and Tory, absurdity of the present use of the appellations of, i. 314.
Whitaker, Mr., his strictures on Mr. Gibbon's History characterized as malignant and illiberal, i. 243, note—His motive for writing them, ibid.—Letters by, to Mr. Gibbon, ii. 100, 144, 145—Bigotted adversary of Dr. Robertson, 417.
White, Dr., antagonist of Mr. Gibbon, i. 232—His sermons commended, 233.
Whist, favourite game at Lausanne, i. 171, note.
Whitshed, Mr., mentions a curious question asked by a young member of parliament respecting the speaker's chair, ii. 129.
Wilbraham, George, ii. 72.
Wilkes, John, character of, i. 142, note.
Wines, ancient, of Italy, iv. 248, 320.
Witikind, alliance of the Este Guelphs with, iii. 498.
Women, read more than men, but less profitably, i. 371—Old women, a term suitable to judges, bishops, and generals, ii.
Wood, Antony, i. 6.
Wooddeson, Dr., schoolmaster, Mr. Gibbon of his scholars, i. 31.
Woodfall, Mr., his Narrative of Parliamentary Debates commended, ii. 346.
Words, number of, that might be pronounced by a rapid orator in an hour, i. 259.
World, Outlines of the History of, iii. 1.
Worship, conformity between the Pagan and Catholic rites of, v. 428—The Pagan, more consistent than that of the Catholic, 453—Farther statement of the conformity between, 539.
Worsley, sir Thomas, his contest with the duke of Bolton, i. 134—His intemperance in drinking, 141, 142, note—Deyverdun, the friend of Mr. Gibbon, travelling tutor to his son, 208.
Wynne, sir Watkin, candidate for the county of Salop, ii. 143.

X.

Xenophon, recommended to a young scholar as the best Greek author, i. 89—Essay on his Cyropædia, 215—Account of the Cyropædia and the author, iii. 122—Spelman's Translation of the Cyropædia, v. 537.

Y.

Yezdegerd, era of his reign, iii. 82.
York, duke of, i. 127.

Z.

Zaintes, bishop of, revolutionary murder of, i. 375, note.
Zanguebar, Arabians of, their flourishing state, v. 190.
Zarina, queen of the Saques, account of, iii. 105.
Zingis Khan, account of, iii. 20.
Zug, account of, iii. 319—Joins the Swiss confederation, 320.
Zurich, its origin, iii. 296—Revolution in its government, 300—Conspiracy of its exiles, 308—Joins the Swiss confederation, 311—Wars with Austria, 312.

THE END.

LONDON: Printed by C. Roworth, 38, Bell-yard, Temple-bar.

PR
3476
A173
1814
v.5

Gibbon, Edward
...llaneous works

Author Gibbon, Edward
Title Miscellaneous works; ed. by S...
Vol. 5:

DATE.

NAME O...