"Mr. Secretary Harley wrote a letter, in answer to one from Mr. Ponchartrain, thanking him for his civility to one Middleton. In transcribing it, Gregg found it so ill turned, and the French so bad, that he acquainted the Secretary with it at 11 a clock at night, in October last. This letter was stopped, and lay a month in the office; but after, Mr. Lewis sent it away as it was wrote at first.—The rough draught of the Queen's Letter to the Emperor, as it was altered by the Lord Treasurer, was left in the public book of the office to be entered the same night it was to be sent away; there, Gregg said, he found it, and transcribed it; and any other clerk of the office might have done it as well as he. All the books in the office lie in a press; the key is always in the door, and not only the clerks, but the chamber-keepers, may have access. All letters, except those wrote to the duke of Marlborough, are entered in the books; but those are only copied in loose sheets. Gregg said, he had copied many of those.—The draught of the Queen's Letter to the Emperor was prepared by Mr. Lewis; it was then written in the hand of Mr. Thomas, Mr. Harley's domestic clerk; the addition was in the Lord Treasurer's own hand; Mr. Mann saw it as well as Gregg. Mann said to Gregg, 'That what was added by the Lord Treasurer, was much the brightest part of the letter.' Gregg said, He sent all his letters to France, under the cover, to Mr. Robineau. He owned he sent the copy of the Queen's Letter to M. Chamillard, the same night the Queen's Letter was dispatched to the Emperor. He said further, That the Letter in the Queen's own hand was given to Gregg by Mr. Secretary himself, about one a clock at night; and he was solely entrusted to put it up in sir Philip Meadows packet, after every body had left the office.

"Robineau, in his Letter to Gregg, took notice, 'That he had delivered his Letters to Mr. Chamillard, and that Mr. Chamillard sent to advise with Mareschal Tallard upon Gregg's proposal.' Upon this, Gregg wrote a Letter to Mr. Tallard, of which, he said, he had no copy; but pretended to repeat the words of the Letter to the Lords Committees.

"The Lords Committees told Gregg, 'It would be expected by the House, that he should be very clear and particular, in declaring by what advice or encouragement he first began such a correspondence.' He said, 'By none at all; he was tempted to it by the devil, and the hopes of getting money.' He said, 'That upon bearing a French periwig-maker was committed to Newgate for High Treason, he had desired to be admitted again to the Lords of the cabinet council.' But he would not own, that he knew the man: but said, 'He had since heard his name was Valiere, or Clark; he was told so by a gentlewoman, who came to see him since his condemnation.'—He said, 'He held no correspondence in England, but only in sending the common Letter of the office, with other printed news-papers, to some gentlemen.'—Gregg said, 'He had been long acquainted with one Crookshanks; who promised him, 'That, if he would procure a French pass, he should have 300 guineas;' and Gregg undertook to procure the pass. The first time he wrote to Mr. Chamillard was the 24th of Oct. last.—Brown a merchant, father in law to Crookshanks, and one Bollinger, a merchant, were acquainted with this agreement about the pass; and they dined together at Brown's house; and Brown undertook for the money, if the pass could be procured.

"Gregg said, 'He acquainted Bollinger of his having sent a copy of the queen's letter to Mr. Chamillard, at the Cross Keys Tavern, in Covent Garden; and shewed him extracts of Mareschal Tallard's and Robineau's letters.'

He said also, 'That he read the extracts of their letters, at another time, in English to Brown and Crookshanks.'

"The Lords Committees asked him, 'To what end he told Bollinger of what he had done in sending the queen's letter to Mr. Chamillard?', he only said, 'It was downright madness.' They asked him, 'If any body came to him?' he said, 'One Mr. Arbuthnot came to him, and nobody else; and his business was to bring him charity.' They asked Mr. Gregg, 'If he had no more to acquaint their lordships with?' he said, 'No.' And being told by them, 'That it concerned him very much to consider of it; that the Lords observed, he had told them nothing but what he knew they had means in their hands to be fully informed of, without his saying any thing; and how hard it would be for the House of Lords to believe, that he would venture upon such a correspondence without some support or encouragement;' he persisted in it, 'That he had no more to say.'

"As the Lords Committees were risen up and had called for the keeper to take Mr. Gregg away, he took a brown paper out of his pocket which was sealed up, and took out of it a paper, which he said he had prepared against the queen's birth day, and desired the Lords to read it; it purported to be a Petition to the House of Commons; he pretended he knew not how to get it delivered, because he concluded all the papers sent by him would be delivered to Mr. Secretary Harley.—The Lords finding the paper to be addressed to the House of Commons, told him, 'It was not proper for them to receive it;' and delivered it immediately back to him again.

"The Lords Committees, as they went away told Gregg, 'That if he would recollect himself, and set down in writing any thing that he thought might be for his own service, or of use to the queen and her government, he might send it to them; and the keeper should have directions to convey it safely.'

"The next morning, Gregg sent a letter to the Lords Committees; which, as soon as they had perused, they returned to him again, by a gentleman, with the following Message, 'The Lords of the Committee have ordered me to return this Paper to you; they being of opinion, that it is not material to the Examination for which they were sent to you by the House.'

"The Lords Committees think themselves obliged to acquaint the House, that they did not observe Gregg to be under any disorder, or terror from the apprehension or sense of his danger.

"The Indictment of Gregg, for his Treasonable Correspondence with her majesty's enemies, was brought before the Lords Committees; which indictment he confessed upon his trial, and judgment was thereupon given against him.

"The Lords Committees do think it their duty to acquaint the House, That they having been informed, by means of the keeper of Newgate, That one William Gregg had been formerly in Newgate, and indicted for counterfeiting the coin of the kingdom; and that it was talked, amongst the turnkeys in the prison, that this was the same man; they sent to search the books in Newgate and found there, that in May 1697, William Gregg and Elizabeth Gregg were indicted, for counterfeiting the coin. Thereupon they sent for Mr. Tanner, who has the custody of those records; he brought the indictment before them; and it appeared that Elizabeth Gregg was found guilty and executed, but that William Gregg was acquitted and that Thomas Holloway and Simon Newport were the witnesses at the trial, who, as was said, are both dead since that time.

"But one Thomas Kinserley and James Biddle declaring, 'That they both knew that Gregg, who was then indicted, very well, and believed they should know him again, if they saw him;' the Lords Committees sent them severally to see William Gregg, now in Newgate, and they both of them did declare, 'That they believed, and were confident, that the same person, now in Newgate, was the same William Gregg who was then indicted, and whose supposed wife was then found guilty, and burnt;' and they did both of them voluntarily make oath to this effect; and James Biddle swore, 'That, after the Trial the discourse in the neighbourhood was, that Elizabeth Gregg took the whole matter upon herself at the trial.' Their two Affidavits are laid before your lordships. After one of these persons had been to see Gregg, Gregg wrote a letter directed to the Lords of the Committee; in which he did very positively deny that he was the person who had been tried for coining, in May, 1697."

"May it please your majesty; We being also informed, That one Alexander Valiere, otherwise called John Clark, was in custody, for holding correspondence with your majesty's enemies; we thought ourselves in like manner, obliged in duty to direct the said Committee to examine Valiere, and to inquire into the particulars and circumstances of his offence. This being accordingly performed by the said Committee, it was reported to us; but, the said Report consisting of very many Examinations, we thought it would be of use to appoint a Committee to digest and put the same into some method, to the intent we might be able to form a clearer and more distinct judgment of the whole affair; and that Report being made and approved by us, we conceive it will be of importance to your majesty's service for us to present the same to your majesty. And for your majesty's more entire satisfaction, we beg leave to annex all the said Examinations at large to this our humble Address to your majesty."

"Your lordships having been pleased to appoint this Committee to take into their consideration several Examinations, Letters, and Papers, referred to them and to direct them to reduce the same into such method as they should think most proper for the service of the House; the Lords Committees, have in obedience to your lordships order, endeavoured to put the many Examinations and Papers relating to Alexander Valiere and John Bara into a natural and proper method; and they do humbly lay the same before the House.

“Alexander Valiere of late years commonly called John Clark, is a native of France, and went over into Ireland in the French troops sent to assist king James; he deserted or was taken prisoner, about the time of the Battle of the Boyne; he was not taken into the regiment, but was a footman to Mr. Doge, an ensign in captain Rochfort's company in Belcastel's regiment, where he continued about two years, and then got a discharge from his master, but refused to list himself as a soldier.—He came over into England, and served some time as a drawer in a tavern, and was afterwards a servant to several persons; and at last bound himself apprentice to one Guyon a periwigmaker; and when his time was out, worked as a journeyman in the city, and married a midwife's daughter behind the Exchange, and got his living by making of periwigs. He was looked upon to be a papist, and his discourse was generally for France and that interest; and he talked against the government in so insolent and public a manner, that, for that reason, at Jacob's coffee house, one Manteau threw a glass of beer in his face.

“Barbier says, That, on May day last he met Valiere in the street; who told him, ‘He had now got a better trade than periwig-making.’

“Clark himself pretends, ‘That during the peace, he entered into some sort of merchandizing; and that upon the breaking out of the war, having some share in a ship that was stopped in France upon that account, he applied to Mr. Secretary Hedges, to get a pass for Holland, but was refused.

“One Wilmot, of Doctors' Commons, being employed to negotiate the exchange of M. D'Alegre, Galissioniere, and some other French prisoners, made use of Valiere as an interpreter; and afterwards Valiere gave some account to the Secretaries of a fraudulent trade carried on between Ireland and France, by one Hannum, which might make Mr. Secretary Harley first think of employing him to get intelligence. Mr. Harley proposed this to him in the year 1704-5. Valiere said, ‘He thought he might be able to procure intelligence by the means of one Bara, who was then in France, and was acquainted with M. Chateaufneuf, the commissary at Calais.’ In order to settle this correspondence, Mr. Harley furnished him with 150*l.* in about a month's time, out of which Valiere pretended he gave Bara 70*l.* and made a present to the commissary.

“Valiere says, ‘All the service Bara did as to come over twice from France; first in a French boat, with the news of the prince of Darnstadt's being killed; and next in Bland's boat, (which Valiere had sent to Calais), with the news of Barcelona's being taken.’

“Bara went back to France, in three or four days, in the same boat with Bland's boy, and carried from Valiere to Chateaufneuf saunette for a bed, a watch, scarlet stockings, and some toys, which was the present abovementioned. In a short time after, Bara came back to England again, and brought with him a Frenchman, who had been a sea-officer: Valiere acquainted his secretary Harley with this, who granted his warrant for apprehending them both; but they made their escape.

“In the spring following, Valiere saw Bara at Deal, when he was just come out of the custody of a messenger; having been first apprehended by the magistrates of Dover, for coming out of France. At that time, he was informed, Bara had a pass from the secretary of state; though he had before told Mr. Harley, ‘he knew Mr. Bara had 500 livres given him, in France, for service to the king.’ Valiere said, ‘He was sure this was fact.’

Bara's Examination.

“John Bara gives the following Account of himself, and of his transaction with Valiere and with Mr. Secretary Harley: he says, He is a native of France, and was surgeon major to Dubart, during the late war, till the two last years; when he left him, upon a dispute between them concerning a prize. At Dunkirk, he had opportunity of assisting several officers and soldiers in the English service, who were prisoners there; and they promised to help him in his profession, if he would come into England; which he did, as soon as the peace was made. He became first acquainted with Valiere by means of the master of a ship of St. Valery; and this acquaintance was continued by one Dormicour's coming into England from Dunkirk, upon account of debts he owed, who was known to both of them. Dormicour, being about to return to France, told Bara, ‘That Valiere proposed to him the sending over the Paris Gazette sooner than by the way of Holland;’ which Dormicour had promised to do, if he might have leave on the other side. Afterwards Valiere made the same proposal to Bara; who said, ‘he would do it, if he had protection for his person.’ Valiere said, ‘He had a sufficient authority for sending him to France;’ and produced a paper, sealed, with Mr. Harley's name to it; and Valiere went with Bara to the secretary's office, and procured a pass for him, to go to Holland. Valiere gave him a note for 3*l.* which he never received; and also a hook and chain for a watch, which was to be a token to one Nerinx, a merchant, at Rotterdam, to pay him 50*l.*; and the money was answered accordingly. From Rotterdam he got to Dunkirk, and from thence to Calais; between which places he continued till Oct. 1705, at which time he had 30*l.* more remitted him by Nerinx. He wrote constantly to Valiere, by the way of Holland, such news as he could pick up; till, about the 4th of October, he came over to England, in a boat he had bought, and brought with him a Paris Gazette, which he delivered to Valiere. In nine or ten days Valiere sent him back to Calais, in Bland's boat (who had been sent over by Valiere with two packs of wool, consigned to Chateaufeuf, while Bara was at Calais); but at this time Bland carried over no goods, but only an open letter to Chateaufeuf for 17 ankers of brandy. They stayed at Calais three weeks, and the commissary bore the whole expence.

“Bara returned to England, and stayed at Margate about a week; and then went back for France, with Bland's boy only: in their passage they were driven to Newport, and made prisoners: but Bara sending a letter to Chateaufeuf, upon his writing to the governor of Newport they were released, and proceeded to Calais: At this time Bara carried over with him 36 yards of satin, 2 pieces of stuff, 2 pair of stockings, and 2 cases of knives: the stockings only were a present to M. Chateaufeuf; the rest was for Bara's subsistence, Valiere (as he then said) having no money to give him.—Bara staid at Calais two months, and then came to Margate, and brought with him one Corselli, a merchant; with whom he went to London, and acquainted Valiere with their being come over, and that Corselli was then at London. Valiere (as Bara has been since informed by Bland) sent this Corselli back to France, by the way of Holland.—Bara durst not stay in London, finding there were messengers out from Mr. Harley to seize him, which were procured by Valiere; and he then charged Valiere with it.—Bara went to Deal, where he stayed seven weeks, and at Dover nine or 10 days; from whence he found means, by an exchanged prisoner, to convey a letter to Chateaufeuf, desiring a boat might be sent over for him; which was done accordingly, and he went over in it to Calais.—Bara, drinking one night with Chateaufeuf, complained of his usage from Valiere: the commissary advised him to return to England; saying, ‘He was sure Valiere had a protection from Mr. Secretary Harley; and Bara acting by Valiere's orders, it was impossible he should suffer by the government; and that Valiere must be a great rogue, if he did not protect him.’—Bara returned about the 27th of April, and, upon his landing, wrote to Mr. Harley; but, before an answer came, he was seized at Dover, and brought before the mayor.”

“This was done by the means of captain Whitehall; who gives the following Account of the matter: In April 1706, Carter informed him, That Bara was returned; whereupon he seized him, and had him examined before the mayor of Dover, who took affidavits of the matter. Mr. Whitehall sent an account of this to the Commissioners of Customs, with copies of the affidavits, by a letter of the 29th of April. This Letter follows:

“Custom-house, Deal, April 29, 1706.
 “Honourable; It is now about a year since I laid before you the depositions of Cook and others, relating to a correspondence carried on by some French refugees with France; in which one Carter, a butcher of this town, had a considerable hand; but withdrew himself from his family, to avoid being apprehended, as I acquainted you by my letter of the 19th of April, 1705. About two months ago, Carter sent me word, ‘That, if I would permit him to return to his family, and suffer him to be quiet at home, and obtain for him the pardon of the government for his past faults, he would soon make a discovery of some practices of very dangerous consequences to the government.’ and accordingly, about a month ago, he gave me an account, ‘That one Bara, a Frenchman, was lurking about these parts, waiting the opportunity of a French boat, to come to fetch him to France;’ and, in pursuit of that information, he discovered to me where the said Bara was concealed; but before I could get to the place, he had got his passage, by a French boat for France, about half an hour.—On Friday last Carter came to me again, and told me, ‘That Bara's return was every day expected.’ And was so diligent in the prosecution of his information, that yesterday morning he acquainted me where Bara, one Beverton a shopkeeper of Canterbury, and the rest of Bara's accomplices, were. Whereupon, with the assistance of Mr. Forster (your surveyor of Dover), I apprehended Bara, alias Renew, alias Barrault, alias Monminion, alias Julian, by all which names he is known, to several persons who appeared against him. For the rest, I humbly refer you to the copy of the several depositions sent you herewith, which will give you further information in this matter: but I am sorry I must tell you, that though I have got the man, yet he had time to convey away the packet, which I presume was letters, before I could apprehend him; all the rest of the goods that he brought over with him being only two ankers and a few bottles of brandy, which I seized at St. Margaret's, and have brought to the Custom-house at Dover, where also Bara is now in gaol. Wherefore I humbly beseech your favourable presentation of this matter to the secretaries of state, that Carter may be pardoned for his past crimes; and that he may have such fitting encouragement as may enable him to do further services, which I believe he is capable of; for he is not yet discovered to be the informer in this case. I am, &c.
 To the Hon. Commis- L. WHITEHALL. sioners of Customs.”

“This gave occasion to Mr. Secretary Harley to send a Letter to Mr. Whitehall, dated the 29th of May, 1706; which follows:

“ Sir; I am very well satisfied of your care and vigilance for her majesty's service, and the performance of the duty of your office; and I both have already and shall also continue to commend your diligence, where it may be of use to you, in the affair of seizing Bara: and I am willing to take it only for inadvertency, when you saw or heard of a warrant under my hand, that you presumed to send notice of it to any one but myself: I am willing to impute it to nothing but want of attention; because, I am sure, had you thought of it, you must consider, that, in this juncture, it is of great consequence to have intelligence of what they are doing in France. I will not suppose you think yourself proper to judge who is to be employed upon such occasions, nor to know what their business is. As to the business of duties, or customs, that certainly belongs to you to take care of; and when any of those things fall within your notice, you will certainly do your best for the queen's interest. Therefore I must now inform you, that the man named Clarke, and the other called Bara, are made use of, upon a sudden exigence, on behalf of the public: they were formerly friends, but since fallen out, and therefore fit to watch each other; and I shall be glad you will have an eye upon them both, and give me directly notice of their motions, whenever they appear there. I am, &c. RO. HARLEY.”

“ P. S. It is very unfortunate, that none are taken but those who are to serve the government; when, at the same time, it is known that scarce a week passes but the enemies of the government have their emissaries land, without observation; and it is more unfortunate that the stopping Clarke, some weeks since, has hindered the discovery of those ships which took the Holland convoy. You will acquaint Mr. Carter, that he need not apprehend any thing from the impertinence of Bara's threatenings.”

“ To this Letter, Mr. Whitehall wrote an Answer, of the 31st of May, 1706: of which the copy followeth:

“ Sir; May 31st, 1706.

“ I cannot but think myself unfortunate, that the first letter I have the honour to receive from you should indicate any doubt of my real intentions to serve the government.—I am sorry that you can tell me, ‘ That there are many emissaries of France who can land without observation.’ I hope it is not within the district where I have to do. And as it is not easy for me to know what persons have the honour of your countenance for the public service (especially when I am well informed, that they are wafted over, between England and France, at the expence of the French); so I most humbly crave leave to observe to you, that I can never make any distinction of persons coming from France, without the directions of the government (or from you) so to do. And therefore I do, with all submission, pray, That you will be pleased to put a good construction upon what I have or may do, on the like occasions; and (that I may not, for the future, do any thing which may cause ill consequences to the public) that I may have your instructions (if you think it fit for me) to stop or take up strangers and suspected persons (lurking in these parts), of whom I may have information, since you are pleased to acquaint me, ‘ That, by stopping Clarke, some weeks past, has hindered the discovery of those ships which took the Holland convoy.’—I beseech your pardon, for writing to captain Baker, and not directly to yourself. But the Commissioners of the Customs having acquainted me, ‘ That they had directed captain Baker to lay those papers relating to Bara before you, and that I was to correspond, with him in such cases;’ led me to do it, not knowing then that it was any fault in me. And therefore, since you are pleased to pass it off as inadvertency, and to give me liberty of writing to you; I dare, with all respect, assure you, that I will behave myself with more caution for the future.—In obedience to your commands, I take this occasion to acquaint you, that I have of late had a very watchful eye on both Clarke and Bara; but cannot find that there is any disagreement between them; for they have, within this week, been frequently together at Deal, in a friendly corresponding manner (particularly last Sunday and Monday, as also yesterday, when Clark rid from Deal); and seem to be very well acquainted with each other's purposes, according to the information I have received of them, which I have good reason to give credit to. I am, &c.’

“ The same day, after he had sent away his Letter, Bara applied to Whitehall, to help him to a boat to go for France; which he refused to do without an order from the Secretary; and thereupon, the same day, Mr. Whitehall sent away another Letter to Mr. Secretary Harley; of which this is a copy:

“ I think it my duty to acquaint you, that, since the dispatch of my letter of this date, Mr. Bara came to me at Deal, and told me, ‘ That he could not carry on his purposes he was sent hither for, without I would assist him in getting a boat to carry him to France;’ which, I confess, startled me, that he should make so free application to me, who had so lately taken him up: but, persisting in his desires, I was obliged to let him know, that I could not give him any aid of that sort without your authority for so doing; which, he said, he wanted; but would write to you this post for it. So, waiting your commands, which I shall endeavour to execute with the greatest diligence, fidelity, and secrecy, I am, &c.’

“ Sir, Whitehall, June 1st, 1706.

“ I have this day received two letters from you which give me fresh instances of your great care in every thing that may be for her majesty's service. You will easily believe, it is of the greatest consequence to have early advice of what the enemy is doing; and, in order to it, I should be very glad you would furnish Bara with what he wants, provided you can do it without giving any cause of suspicion, or being observed by any body. I am, Sir, &c.

“ But Mr. Whitehall did nothing upon the Letter, not thinking it contained orders which were full and clear enough to justify him.

“ But Bara says, ‘ That, four days after his examination before the mayor of Dover, he was carried to London by Mr. Harley's warrant; and owned to the secretary, he had been in France; and that he had been sent thither by Valiere.’ Bara continued in custody 21 days; after which, Mr. Harley sent for him, and told him, ‘ He had prevailed with the queen to pardon him; but he must go away immediately to Dunkirk, and see what naval preparations were there; and bid him say nothing, and he would make use of him.’ Bara performed this voyage in an open boat, and returned in seven days; and brought word, ‘ That there were but two men of war, both unrigged; and that Fourbia was gone northwards, after the Russia fleet.’

“ This was the time he was carried over by William Mason, waterman; who says, ‘ That, as soon as they landed, Bara and he went directly to the governor's house: Mason stayed below till Bara came down to him. Bara was well known and well received in that town. They stayed these two days, and then returned. Bara was set ashore near Sanddown castle: he was very fearful of being seen, being well known on the coast.’

“ It appears, by the Examination of Isaac Howard, ‘ That this year he carried Bara over to Calais; that, when they landed, a file of musketeers took them into custody; and, as they were going along, a man speaking to Bara, he struck him a blow upon the face with his hand: That they were carried before the commissary, where Bara was kindly entertained. He stayed with the commissary two hours; was entirely at liberty, during two days that he stayed: After which, Howard brought him back to the Downs.’

“ Bara says, ‘ He was arrested at Deal, which he thought was by Valiere's means, who hindered him to have a boat. He sent word of this to Mr. Secretary Harley; who wrote to captain Whitehall, to help Bara to a boat, but he would not do it; so Bara went back to London, and complained to the Secretary of him.’

“ Bara says, ‘ He was at Calais, with Cha-

teaneuf, about six weeks before the Hampton-Court and Grafton were taken.’ The Commissary told him, ‘ There was a great fleet in the Downs, which were to be convoyed by some men of war; and that they were equipping at Dunkirk nine men of war, to intercept that convoy; and he had received most pressing orders to speed away the seamen to man those ships.’ He said, ‘ He hoped this year they should have their revenge, and ships should not go out of the Downs so easily as they had done.’ At this time Chateaneuf told him, ‘ Valiere played him a trick;’ and shewed him part of a letter from Valiere (but would not let him read the whole), wherein Valiere bid Chateaneuf ‘ have a care of Bara; for that he was employed by the government in England.’

“ Bara stayed but three days at Calais; and came directly to Mr. Harley, and told him what he had heard about the Dunkirk squadron, but did not then mention what had been shewn him in Valiere's Letter; having several times before acquainted Mr. Secretary, ‘ That he trusted Valiere too much; and that he was not the man he took him to be.’ But Mr. Harley never answered him any thing to that matter.—When Bara told Mr. Harley about the Dunkirk squadron, he seemed not to believe it; but when those ships were taken, Bara went to him, and asked him, ‘ If he did not believe it now? To which he replied, ‘ He did remember Bara had told him of it.’

“ John Carter says, ‘ That about the 27th of March, 1706, he came first acquainted with Bara, who used to go over from England to Calais, and return in French boats. He was seized at Dover by Mr. Whitehall, which Bara suspected to be by Carter's means: he was examined before the magistrates; but was soon after sent for to London, by Mr. Harley's orders; and in a short time after returned to Deal, and, pulling out of his pocket a handful of guineas, shewed them to Carter, and told him, ‘ See what I have got, by being seized at Dover, by your means.’

“ Valiere spoke very ill of Bara to Carter; and persuaded him not to have any thing more to do with him: but though both of them railed at each other, when asunder; yet, when they met, they appeared to be very good friends.

“ Bara doing little service for Valiere, as he pretends, he broke with him; and then sent one Green, of Gravesend, to M. Chateaneuf, but he also did little service, and was no more employed. He after engaged one Stephen Barry, a druggist, in London, who was then lately broke. He was sent over to Calais, by the way of Holland; and was directed to tell Chateaneuf, ‘ That Valiere's meaning was, only to get such news as he thought fit to send and to desire him to convey it to Valiere.’ The first boat which Valiere owns to have sent over to France was Bland's, a waterman, of St. Catherine's, near the Tower.

Valiere, telling him he had a sufficient authority to protect him from any mischief might arise upon account of his going to France, sent him to Calais, with some wool, consigned to Chateaufneuf, and a letter. As soon as he landed at Calais, he was seized, and carried to the governor, and after to the commissary, to whom he delivered the letter: then he was carried to an inn, and provision made for him; and, falling sick there, a physician was sent to take care of him. He was used with much civility, and the commissary defrayed all charges; and also, his boat being much out of repair, the commissary took care of having it put in very good order, out of the king's stores, without any expence to him. He brought back brandy, and a letter for Valiere, which Bland delivered to him. In September following, he made a second voyage, upon Clark's account, when he carried over Bara. Clark wrote a letter, which he gave to Bara when they landed. Bara left him, and went directly into the town. Bland was carried to the former inn, and his charges were paid, as before. He went often to the commissary's house, and was much made of; and, after about ten days stay brought back Bara, and 17 ankers of brandy, and a letter from the commissary, which he delivered to Valiere.

"About Midsummer 1706, Valiere employed John Carter to buy wool, and procure men to go over for him to France. Carter brought John Weaver and Philip Wathing to Valiere, who told them, 'He would bear them out for going to France; for he was employed by Mr. Secretary Harley;' and shewed them a paper, with his name and a seal; which they the rather gave credit to, because Valiere had before been examined by the magistrates, and set at liberty: and thereupon Weaver, Wathing, and John Hartley (apprentice to Weaver), went over to Calais, with some wool, and a letter to the commissary, and another to one Camus a merchant. They were all seized, at their landing, by a guard, and carried before the governor; who enquired of them, 'What news in England, and what ships there were in the Downs, and whither bound, and what strength the English had in the Streights?' They told the governor, 'They had a letter for the commissary.' The governor sent them to him, and they delivered him the letter. After three or four days, the commissary himself came to them, and brought them a packet for Valiere; upon which, they returned for England, and delivered the packet to him; who thereupon went immediately to London.

"Soon after, the same crew went over again, with wool, and a letter to the commissary. In their passage they met with a small French privateer, who inquired of them what men of war and merchantmen were then in the Downs. And, as Hartley says, Weaver and Wathing told them all they knew of the men of war and merchant ships, whither they were designed, and when they were to sail; and, having given this account, the privateer suffered them to go on. As soon as they landed, they were seized, and carried first to the governor, and afterwards by the guard to the commissary, to whom they delivered their letter, and then were carried to the inn; where they were kept 10 or 12 days under a guard, and not suffered to go out, because the Dunkirk galleys were then in the road. When the galleys were sailed, the commissary gave them a packet for Valiere; and they returned, and delivered it to him. At this time Valiere told them, 'He could have other men to go for, less money;' but they refused to take less, and so they parted.

"In July 1706, Valiere proposed to Daniel Morrillion and Joseph Verge to go to France; and bid them take in what goods they pleased, and he would give them a letter which should protect them. Upon the credit of this, they provided wool, and had two letters from Valiere; one to the commissary, and the other to Camus, a merchant, who was to furnish them with brandy for their wool; and then they two, together with one Bailly, went over to Calais; where, upon their arrival, they were seized by the guard, and carried to the governor; who examined them about the number and rates of the men of war in the Downs, and particularly about the Dutch transports, and if they knew to what place they were bound, and if they were intended for a descent upon any part of France; what frigates were cruising off of Beachy, Dungeness, and the North Foreland, and what merchant ships there were in the Downs. They shewed the governor the letter they had for the commissary; and he returned it to them, to carry to him. The commissary sent them to Marvell's house; and told them, 'They must not stir from Calais till they had his packet;' which in two or three days after he sent to them; directed, 'To John Clarke, merchant in Bristol,' together with a pass to secure them against privateers; and they brought back brandy with them.—In August they went over again; and upon their landing were carried to the governor, and were again examined about what ships were in the Downs. They told them, 'The Dutch transports were sailed.' They brought back brandy, and a packet for Valiere from the commissary; and the custom-house boat coming up with them, they threw the packet overboard."

"Valiere's general directions to those he employed to go over to France were, 'That, if they thought themselves in danger of being taken by the English or Dutch vessels, they were to throw their letters overboard; but if they met with French ships, they should shew their letters, which would help them to get to France.'

"Morrillion and Verge, upon their return, were brought before the mayor of Deal. Verge denied he had been in France, but Morrillion confessed it: soon after both of them were sent for by messengers to London, and carried before the two secretaries of state; where, being examined, they acquainted them with all that passed at Calais, and with their throwing the packet into the sea, according to Valiere's orders. Upon this, they were remanded into the custody of the messengers, where they remained four months, and then were discharged without any farther examination.

"Verge says, 'That, whilst he was in prison at Deal, Valiere came to him, and bid him not fear, he would take care he should come to no harm.' And says, 'That, the very same night he came out of custody, Valiere came to him, and proposed to him to go over again to France; but he refused to go, being sick at that time.'

"In August 1706, Valiere employed Thomas Gosby and — Steed, both of Walmer, and Thomas Hatton, who carried over wool, and a packet for the commissary. Upon their landing, they were immediately carried to the governor, who received them very well; and asked them, 'What news in England? and what ships of war, or merchants, were then in the Downs?' The commissary shewed his letter to the governor, and then carried them to Marvel's house, the inn; and they had not leave to return in five or six days, till letters came from Paris; and then were dispatched with brandy, and a letter to Valiere, which were delivered to him.

"Gosby and Steed refused to go a second time, because, as they told Carter, they were examined very strictly by the commissary, what news was in England, and what ships were in the Downs? And the commissary took notes of all they said; and detained them there till they sent to Paris, and had a return: and for these reasons, they were afraid to go any more.

"In September 1706, Valiere sent over Ralph and Thomas Hatton. He pressed them to go over immediately, though they had no goods; which they refused to do; whereupon some wool was provided, which the two Hattons carried to Calais, with a letter to the commissary. R. Hatton believes the letter did not relate to trade, because the wool was sold to another person. They were seized upon landing, and carried with the letter to the commissary; who went with them to the governor, and did not open his letter till he came to the governor's house.—They were received very kindly by the governor, who made them drink, a thing very unusual. The governor opened the letter, and shewed it to several gentlemen who were there, who all seemed very well pleased with it. The commissary carried them, by the governor's orders, to the best inn in Calais, where they were very well treated at his costs.—The next day the commissary brought a French gentleman to them, and said, 'The governor had ordered that they should carry him to England;' which they did. They brought no letters or goods; and apprehending they should be forced to land in the day time, they desired the gentleman, 'If he had any papers, he would throw them over board;' but he replied, 'He carried all in his head.' The gentleman spoke good English. The Hattons brought him to Valiere, at Mrs. Riches's house, at midnight; who procured a horse for him; and he went away to London that night, without a guide; and Valiere followed the next morning."

"Valiere says, in his examination, 'This man was Stephen Barry, who brought the news of the relief of Turin.' But Mrs. Riches says, 'He told her, that it was his brother in law, who lived at Calais.' And she also says, 'He brought divers papers with him, which he gave to Valiere to read.—About a week after, Valiere returned to Deal; and within a week after that, the French gentleman came back, and brought with him three other Frenchmen, who were shut up privately with Valiere for some time. Afterward they all rode out with Valiere; who, by some means or other, got them over to France. Mrs. Riches says, 'That Valiere told her, that the father of one of those three Frenchmen was as great a man as any in France.'

"In October 1706, Valiere sent the two Hattons, and William Reven, over to Calais, with wool, and a letter to Chateauf. Upon landing, they were seized, and carried before the governor: after that, they were taken before a judge, and were accused of having carried a spy into England.

"Marvelles desired them, by order of the commissary, to deny they carried any body; which they did. They were kept in custody 14 or 15 days, till orders came from court to discharge them; and then the commissary sent them away to England, with one letter to Valiere.

"About a month after, Valiere employed Reven, Tho. Fennes, and Francis Baker, of Dover, to go over to Calais, with some wool, and a sack, in which was a box and other things; but their boat was seized at Sandwich by the custom house officers, who took away the wool, but over-looked the sack, which they brought back to Valiere. And about a week after, he sent Reven, Barker, and R. Hatton, with the same sack, some wool, and a letter to the commissary at Calais, together with a young man whom they carried to France. They were seized and taken to the governor's house, as usual; and the commissary came to them, and opened his letters there. They were in a short time dismissed, with brandy, and a letter from the commissary to Valiere.

"Hitherto Valiere had employed other people to go to France upon his account; but, about June 1707, he went himself to Boulogne, with Weaver and Wathing, and they carried over one pack of wool. They went off from Hyth. As soon as they landed, they were all seized, and kept in custody, with a sentinel upon them. But Valiere had leave to speak, with one Strike, a merchant; who in two days got him released. Valiere told Strike, 'His business was to get news, in order to lay wagers; and that he had a friend at Paris, who would send the news, if Strike would receive it, and transmit it to him.' He pretends he neither wrote nor spoke to the commissary, or governor of Boulogne, at this time; but was only encouraged by Strike; and that he then discovered the Duukirk squadron was ready to sail, and sent the news of it to Mr. Secretary Harley.

“But Wathing, in his account of this voyage, says, ‘That Valiere, upon writing to the governor, was set at liberty;’ and that he afterwards told them, ‘He had waited upon the governor, and done the business.’ This is confirmed by R. Hatton; who says, ‘That Valiere, upon his return, told him, ‘He had been the longer, because he was kept under a guard till he could get a letter delivered to the governor; and then he was set at liberty, and waited upon the governor.’

“Valiere went over a second time in July, with Weaver, Wathing, and Le More, and one pack of wool. The duke D’Aumont was then at Boulogne. He pretends, that at their landing they were more strictly confined than before; but, after some days, the duke sent for them all before him, and asked them many questions concerning their business; and how they ventured over with so small a quantity of wool? Valiere said, ‘He was employed by merchants concerned in wagers; and his chief business was, to get the Gazette early over.’ The duke was satisfied with this, and promised he should have intelligence; so he did not attempt to get it but from the commissary Collanson. The duke said, ‘He was going to Paris; and would take care Collanson should have intelligence, to furnish Valiere with it.’—There were several gentlemen in company with the duke when this was talked of. The duke said, ‘It would do no hurt to them, to have the public news sent; for their government was so wise, as to suffer no news to come abroad that would hurt them, whereas they could have intelligence of the greatest matters of importance from England; and gave for an instance, that they had lately certain advice from thence, that the duke of Savoy’s design was against Toulon.’—When Valiere told this to Mr. Harley, he seemed to start, and said, ‘He wondered they should talk so.’ The duke D’Aumont proposed to Valiere, to buy a couple of horses for him, and upon that condition he should have liberty to come when he would: Valiere agreed to do it; and the duke sent his groom along with him. These horses were to be sent by the Boulogne sloop, which was to come to a certain place for that purpose.

“Valiere said, ‘He acquainted Mr. Secretary afterwards with this, who approved it, and gave him a pass for the groom, by the name of Tho. Strick.’ Valiere adds, ‘That, while he was at Boulogne, Mr. Strike gave him privately a letter from his friend at Paris, which told him that monsieur Fourbiu, with his squadron of 9 men of war, had orders to pursue the Russia fleet, though never so far Northward or Eastward, and to fall on them if possible; and advised Valiere to insure upon them.’ He told this news to Mr. Harley as soon as possible he could; who answered thereupon, ‘We have twelve men of war; we fear them not.’

“This is Valiere’s account of his second voyage to Boulogne; but Weaver and Wathing say, ‘That, when they were all carried to the governor, he took Valiere aside, and had him in private several hours: When they returned for England, Valiere put on-board brandy and champagne; and a man whom they did not know was sent back with them; who, upon landing, went with Valiere to London. Le More was left behind, lest he should betray the groom when he came to England; but le More was put on-board a French sloop afterwards, and set on shore in England.’

“Mr. Jordan says, ‘That, when Valiere was sick at Folkestone, in September 1707, he told him, ‘That the governor of Boulogne was very rough with them at first, and told them, ‘They came over for something else than to bring such a small parcel of wool, which would not bear their charges; threatening them unless they told the truth.’ Then Valiere desired to speak with the duke privately; and told him, ‘He came to learn news;’ which expression much surprized the duke: But Valiere told him, ‘That, if he could serve his excellency in England, he would serve him faithfully.’ Valiere told Jordan, ‘That Le More was threatened with death, being a Frenchman, and one who formerly had a commission in an English privateer; so he fell upon his knees, and begged for his life; and upon Valiere’s interest and pleading for him, he was pardoned.’ Le More told Jordan, ‘That he verily believed Valiere shewed Mr. Harley’s pass to the duke at that time.’

“Tho. Hatton says, ‘That he lay about 14 days to watch the Boulogne sloop, by Valiere’s orders, to put on board two horses, to be carried to Boulogne.’ The signal whereby he was to know the sloop, was her hoisting Dutch colours on her maintop. Valiere gave him a letter, which was to be delivered to the captain of the sloop; but she not coming, he returned the letter to Valiere.

“Valiere gives the following account of his third voyage to Boulogne: ‘That then he took over no wool; that the duke was then at Paris; but he told the commissary, ‘The horses were bought.’ He was then supplied with the news without trouble; which at his return, he told Mr. Harley; who was pleased with it, and ordered him money; and directed him to go away immediately, and, at his return, to come to him at Windsor.

“Wathing and Verge, who went with him this voyage, give this account: ‘That they were seized at landing; but Valiere was at liberty, and went into the town for two or three hours; and then came to them, and told them, 'They must get ready to go away that night.' He was in very good humour, and said, 'He had now caught the old one.' By which they understood, he had heard some good news. They brought back brandy; and landed Valiere at Dimchurch, who immediately went to London.

"The next voyage, which (as Valiere says) was at the latter end of August, Valiere did not go over himself; but sent Verge, Wathing, and Weaver, who brought him the news of the raising the siege of Toulon, and a packet to Caille, the merchant, in Aldermay Church-yard, which Valiere pretends he burnt, without opening it.

"Wathing, Wenver, and Verge, speak of this voyage in this manner: They say, 'They carried letters from Valiere to the commissary at Boulogne, and some wool. When they landed, they were seized, and carried to the governor, and examined about the ships in the Downs, and were asked several questions as usual. The commissary took them to his own house, and they dined at his own table: The captain of the Boulogne sloop dined with them; and boasted of his having robbed some English gentlemen in Kent. They brought back letters to Valiere, which they delivered to him.'

"Joseph Verge says, 'He believes Valiere to be disaffected to the government; and gave this reason for it: 'That, being about to go over to Boulogne, he said to Valiere, 'Master, if we should bring back the good news that Toulon was taken, he hoped Valiere would give them a guinea or two.' He made answer, 'That, if he would bring the news that the siege was raised, he should be better pleased, and would give them 10 guineas.'

"In September 1707, Valiere sent over Le More, Wathing, and Verge, with a letter to Col-lanston; but, they being seized as they came back, what they brought did not come to his hands.—Say, 'They were taken by an Ostender in their passage to Boulogne, who took their letters and every thing from them. They came almost naked to Boulogne; and the commissary being absent, his clerk refused to give them credit; but Le More got credit for about 5*l*. After about 14 days stay, the commissary's clerk gave them two letters for Valiere. They landed at Dover, where their boat was seized; and in their going to Deal, they were taken by messengers, to whom they delivered the letters directed to Valiere.'

"Valiere says, 'That what letters he had, he used to send to Mr. Harley; and that, in the three years time he has been employed, he believes he has sent him half a score.' He also says, 'That one Fitzgerald made a proposition to him, to join with him and two other persons, to carry off M. Huguetau.' He did not acquaint Mr. Harley with this; the reason whereof was, that Mr. Harley told him, 'He was not to meddle with any business but what he employed him in.' He says, 'That one Pope and Charles Coxill, both of Lid, received and returned letters to and from France; and he saw Coxill at Boulogne, and that he bought horses for the duke; that Pope was employed to supply the Boulogne sloop with wool and intelligence.' He told Mr. Hurley of it; who bid him mind the business he employed him in, and not trouble himself with other matters.

"Johanna Riches says, 'That, towards the latter end of April last, Valiere came to her house at Deal, in the night, and desired a private lodging; and soon after sent her out, to learn what men of war were then in the Downs. She went to the packet-master; who told her, 'There were only three men of war there,' and named them to her. She brought the account to Valiere presently: She has forgot the names of two of them; but verily believes the Royal Oak was one of them; because a midshipman belonging to the Royal Oak was at that time at her house, and borrowed a bottle of sal armoniac of her for his wife, who was then on board the Royal Oak. Upon her naming the ships to Valiere, he set down the names of them in his book; and soon after went out, and stayed so late that no lodgings could be got for him; so she sat up all night, and he lay in her bed. She further says, 'That she believes Bland went over to France about that time.' For which she gives this reason: That Bland and Mrs. Atwood being together at her house, Bland said, 'He hoped he should soon bring them better liquor; and desired her to buy for him some casks for brandy.' She says, 'That Bland went into the Downs, and went aboard several ships there.' Bland told her, 'It was only to get some of the ships to take off his brandy when he came back;' but she looked on that as a pretence only; and that his true business was, to observe what ships were there, and of what value they were. The same thing is affirmed by Mr. Bowles, who gives a very particular account what an impudent and dangerous fellow this Bland is. Mrs. Riches says, 'Bland owned to her, he had been four times in France since the beginning of the war.' Whereas Bland denies that he has been there more than twice.

"Carter says, 'That he was intimately acquainted with Clarke, and always took him to be in the French interest; he believed him to be a papist, for he would never go to church, and always talked favourably of the papists.' Carter often advised Clarke to be more cautious in managing his corresponding with France; for, if he continued to act in so public a manner, the mob would knock him on the head. Carter said, 'The mob had several times come about them, and called them French dogs and rogues, and reproached them for betraying our ships, and giving intelligence to the enemy.'—Valiere would often speak contemptuously of the great men above; and said, 'It was easier to put upon them, than upon such men as Carter.' He said, 'He knew his master Harley very well, and almost any thing would serve him.' Once, as Carter and Clarke were riding together upon the beach, they saw 18 ships at sea. Thereupon Clarke said, 'Here is news for my master Harley: I will send him word, here is seen a squadron of French ships.' Carter said, 'What! before you know whether they are so or no?' To which Clarke replied, 'It is all one for that; it will serve my turn as well.'

"In the latter end of 1706, Carter brought to Mr. Whitehall three letters, which he had received from Valiere, with directions to put them into the hands of the men who were going to France; One of the letters was directed to Camus, a merchant at Calais; the second, to the commissary at Calais; the third, to the governor or commissary of Boulogne, he is not certain to which of them. Upon this, he wrote to Secretary Harley, and gave him an account of those three letters; telling him, 'That the wind being now out of the way, he had opportunity, if he pleased, of seeing them, and judging if Valiere dealt honestly or not.' But to this letter he never received any answer. Mr. Whitehall did neither open nor stop these letters, having been before reprimanded by Mr. Secretary for what he had done.

"Mr. Whitehall says, 'That Valiere and Bara were generally known upon the coast by the distinction of Mr. Harley's spies; especially Valiere, who bragged of his being employed, on all occasions, and in all companies. Bara was more cautious, and seldom appeared by day.' Mr. Whitehall said, 'It was his opinion, and the general opinion upon the coast, that they carried more intelligence to France, than they brought from thence.' He says, 'The trade to France was much suppressed, till this encouragement was given by employing so great a number of men; for Clarke did not confine himself to certain persons, but employed every body he could get; by which practice the whole coast is corrupted: So that now a much greater number of officers will be wanting, to prevent the pernicious intercourse with France, than has ever yet been employed.'

"Mr. Bowles gives several reasons, which made him think it necessary to examine Valiere; as, his public boasting of his power to protect any one for going to France; his declaring in coffee-houses, before the magistrates, 'That it was not treason to trade with France, unless one carried warlike stores thither;' and his sending over boats, when his license to remain unmolested on the coast was expired. These and many other reasons made Mr. Bowles conclude, That Valiere was indeed a spy upon us; and that by his means, for these two years last past, France has had intelligence to their advantage, and are like still to have so: For Clark having sent over so many sets of boats, the same gangs will be like to continue to go over on their own accounts. And he believes that this may have been the principal occasion of the loss of several of our frigates upon their cruising stations; as also of the loss of the Hampton Court and Grafton, and so many of our merchant ships.'

"May it please your most excellent majesty; We, your majesty's most dutiful subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, having entered into a serious consideration of the said several Reports, have unanimously come to the following Resolutions thereupon: That it is our opinion, That the crime of which William Gregg stands attainted is of so heinous a nature, and attended with such extraordinary circumstances, that it may prove of very pernicious consequence if he should not be made an example. And also, That it does plainly appear to us, as well by what Alexander Valiere and John Bara have informed against each other, as by the many examinations taken concerning them, that they were both in the French interest, and unfit to be trusted or employed by any persons in your majesty's service: And that the open and public manner of the correspondence managed by them with the governors and commissaries of Calais and Boulogne, could tend only to carry on an intelligence to the advantage of your majesty's enemies; and that it is highly probable thereby the stations of our cruisers, the strength of our convoys, and the times of sailing of our merchant ships, have been betrayed to the French.

"May it please your majesty; It is your majesty's glory, and the happiness of Europe, that you are at the head of one of the greatest confederacies that ever was known in history; and it is the common concern of the whole alliance, that your councils should be kept with the strictest secrecy: But, in the papers now laid before you, your majesty will be pleased to observe, that some of your resolutions of the greatest moment, and that required the utmost secrecy, have been sent to your enemies by the same post they were dispatched to the allies; that all the papers in Mr. Secretary Harley's office have, for a considerable time, been exposed to the view even of the meanest clerks in that office; and that the perusal of all the letters to and from the French prisoners was chiefly trusted to Gregg, a person of a very suspicious character, and known to be extremely indigent. It is not easily to be known what ill consequences may have attended such negligence. But we depend upon it, that these matters being thus plainly laid open to your majesty, we shall be secured against any dangers of this nature for the future.—We are further in duty bound to beseech your majesty, that all possible methods may be used to put a stop to that dangerous, and which may soon prove fatal intercourse between your majesty's subjects and France, which has of late received so great an encouragement by the countenance and protection given to Valiere and Bara; since, unless that be effectually done, your majesty's enemies will continue to have what "intelligence they please, your majesty's men of war and merchant ships will be in danger of being betrayed to the French, and that most destructive trade of sending wool to France, which has been with much charge and trouble interrupted, and in good measure suppressed, will be revived to a greater degree than ever."

"Alexander Valiere, alias John Clark, being examined, saith, 'That he is a native of France, and came over into Ireland in the French regiments sent thither with king James.' He pretends he deserted 14 days before the battle of the Boyne; he was hired as a servant by an ensign in Belcastel's regiment. After the war of Ireland was over, he came into England; and, after having served several persons, he bound himself apprentice to a peruke-maker; and when his time was out, he went to live in the city, and followed that trade. He pretended that he entered into merchandizing while the peace lasted, and that he had a part in a ship that was stopped in France; and upon that account he applied to Secretary Hedges, to get a pass for Holland; but it was refused. One Witnot of Doctors Commons was employed upon occasion of treating about the exchange of prisoners, he named D'Allegre, Gallisioniere, &c.; and Valiere said, 'He was made use of as an interpreter on those occasions.'—He said, 'He gave some account about one Hanam, who carried on a fraudulent trade between Ireland and France; and he does not know but that might be the occasion that Mr. Secretary Harley might first think of him to procure intelligence.' That, in the year 1703-5, Mr. Secretary Harley proposed to him to be employed in getting intelligence. Valiere said, 'He could do it, by the means of one John Bara, who was then in France, and was acquainted with M. Chateauf, Commissary at Calais.'—He had about 150*l.* from Mr. Harley in about a month's time, upon account of settling this correspondence, which enabled him to furnish Bara with about 70*l.* and to make a present to Chateauf. All the service Bara did was to come over from Calais twice, once in a French boat which Bara hired, and brought only the news of the prince of D'Armstadt's being killed; and once in Bland's boat, which Valiere hired, and then brought the news of Barcelona's being taken.—Bara went back to France, in 3 or 4 days, in the same boat, with only Bland's boy, and (as Valiere pretended) carried from him to Chateauf, sattimette for making a bed, a watch, scarlet stockings, and several toys, which was the present afore-mentioned. Bara doing little service, Valiere soon broke with him.—In a short time after, Bara came to England again, and brought over with him a Frenchman, who had been a sea officer. Valiere acquainted the Secretary with this, in September, or October, 1706; who granted his warrant for apprehending of them, but they both made their escape.—In the spring following, Valiere saw Bara at Deal, when he was just come out of the custody of a messenger, having been first apprehended by the magistrates of Dover for coming from France. At that time, he was informed, Bara had got a pass from the Secretary of State.—Valiere sent one Green, of Gravesend, over to M. Chateauf; but he also did little service, and was no more employed.—Valiere said, 'He then engaged one Stephen Barry, a druggist in London, who had lately broke; he was sent over to Calais by the way of Holland: he was directed to tell Mr. Chateauf, 'That Valiere's meaning was only to get such news as he thought fit to send, and desire him to convey it to him.'—Once, at the beginning of the year 1706, there was some news sent to Valiere by a French boat; but they sent him word, 'That, if he expected any more, he must send a boat for it, for they would not be at the trouble or charge of sending it over.' Thereupon, about Midsummer, 1706, Valiere employed one John Carter, of Deal, to buy some wool, in order to send an English boat; and then P. Wathing, J. Weaver, and Weaver's apprentice, were sent over, with a pack of wool and a letter, and returned with news, 'That Philip was like to lose Spaid.' This he sent to Mr. Secretary.

"About a fortnight after, the same boat went over again, with the like quantity of wool, and a letter to the commissary of Calais.—The next time, Valiere sent Thomas Gosby, Tho. Hatton, and one Steed of Walmer, with wool, and a letter to the commissary; but the commissary stopped out of their cargo 100 livres, for the charge of settling the intelligence.—Then Valiere sent over the two Hattons, with 80 pounds of wool, and a letter to Chateauf. They brought over Stephen Barry, who came express to Valiere, with the news of the relief of Turin, and this express caused rejoicings in London the same day. Next he sent over William Reven, with the two Hattons, and some wool, with a letter; but they were detained prisoners, and Chateauf stopped Valiere's wool, and he had nothing for it.—Valiere sent once more to Calais, F. Baker, W. Reven, and R. Hatton; but they brought no news, only an order from Chateauf, 'That he should send thither no more.'

"About Midsummer, 1707, he went himself to Botolgne, with Weaver and Wathing, and one pack of wool. They were all seized at landing, and all kept in a room, and a centinel upon them; but Valiere had leave to speak with his merchant, Mr. Strike, who in two days time got Valiere released. Valiere told Strike of his business in getting news, in order to lay wagers, and 'that he had a friend at Paris, would send the news to Strike, if he would transmit it to England.' Valiere pretended he did not write or speak either to the commissary or governor this time, but had only encouragement from Strike. Valiere said, 'That he then discovered that the Dunkirk squadron was ready to sail, and sent the news to Mr. Harley.'

“Valiere went over a second time to Boulogne, with Weaver, Wathing, and Le More, and one pack of wool. The duke D'Aumont was then at Boulogne. At their landing, they were then more strictly confined than before; but after some days the duke sent for them all before him, and asked them many questions concerning their business, and how Valiere ventured over with so small a quantity of wool. Valiere told him, ‘He was employed by merchants concerned in wagers, and his chief business was to get the Gazette early over.’ The duke was satisfied with it, and promised he should have intelligence; so he did not attempt to get any but from the commissary Collanson.—The duke said, ‘He was going to Paris, but would take care that Collanson should have the intelligence, to furnish Valiere with the same.’ There were several gentlemen in company with the duke D'Aumont, when this was talked of. The duke said, ‘It would do no hurt to them to have the public news sent; for their government was so wise, as to suffer no news to come abroad that would do them hurt;’ whereas they have intelligence of matters of the greatest importance from England; for instance, ‘That they had lately certain advice from England, that the duke of Savoy’s design was upon Toulon.’ When Valiere told this to Mr. Harley, he seemed to start, and said, ‘He wondered they should talk so.’—The duke D'Aumont proposed to him, ‘That he should buy a couple of fine horses for him; and upon that condition, Valiere should have liberty to come when he would.’—Valiere agreed to do it; and the Duke sent his groom along with him. These horses were to be sent by the Boulogne sloop, which was to come to a certain place for that purpose. Valiere said, ‘He acquainted Mr. Secretary afterwards with this; who approved it, and gave him a pass for the groom by the name of Thomas Strick.’—Valiere said, ‘That Mr. Strike gave him privately a letter from his friend at Paris, which told him, ‘That Monsieur Fourbin, with his squadron of 9 men of war, had orders to pursue the Russia fleet, though never so far northward or eastward, and to fall on them if possible; and advised Valiere to insure upon them.’ He said, ‘He told Mr. Harley this news as soon as possible he could;’ who made answer thereupon, ‘We have twelve men of war; we fear them not.’—The horses being bought, Valiere went over the next time without wool, with Verge and Wathing. The Duke was then gone to Paris; but Valiere told the commissary, ‘The horses were bought.’ He was then supplied with the news without any trouble; which he told Mr. Harley at his return; who was pleased with it, and ordered him money; and directed him to go away immediately, and upon his return to come to him at Windsor.—Towards the latter end of August last, he sent over Verge, Wathing, and Weaver; and they brought him the news of the raising the siege of Toulon, and a packet to one Caille, a merchant in Aldermay church-yard. Valiere pretended he burnt the packet without opening it. In September last, he sent over Le More, Wathing and Verge, with a letter to M. Collanson; but, they being seized as they came back, what they brought for him did not come to his hands.—Valiere said, ‘What letters he had he used to send to the Secretary; and that he believes he has sent half a score in the three years time he has been employed.’—Valiere said, ‘There is one Fitzgerald, who made a proposition to him to join with him and two other persons to carry off Hugueton.’ He did not acquaint Mr. Secretary Harley with this. The reason, he said, was, that Mr. Secretary told him, ‘He was not to meddle with any business but what he employed him in.’—Valiere says, ‘When he was at Boulogne the second-time, he saw two letters at the commissary’s, one directed to sir John Parsons, the other to Mr. Caille; and Strike told him, ‘The duke D'Aumont held a constant correspondence with them.’ He acquainted Mr. Secretary, ‘That Caille had a correspondence with France, and paid money by orders from thence.’ He said, ‘That one Pope and Charles Coxhill, both of Lydd, received and returned their letters.’ He said, ‘he had seen Coxhill at Boulogne; and that he brought horses for the duke, that Pope was employed to supply the Boulogne sloop with wool and intelligence.’ He says, ‘he told Mr. Secretary Harley of it, who bid him mind the business he employed him in, and not trouble himself with other matters.’—Valiere said, ‘that he told Mr. Harley, that he knew that Bara had 500 livres given him in France for service to the king.’ He said, ‘he knew this to be fact.’”

Barbier's Examination.

“Daniel Barbier, living at the Mug-house in Long Acre, being examined, saith, ‘That he has known Alexander Valiere, now commonly called John Clerk, ever since the year 1690; he deserted from the French about the time of the battle of the Boyne, or was then taken prisoner, he knows not which. He had on his French regimental cloaths, when the examinant first saw him; he came over with the 7,000 men sent from France to assist king James; he was not taken into the regiment, but was a servant to Mr. Doge, an ensign in captain Rochfort’s company in Belcastel’s regiment, where he continued about two years. After Ireland was reduced, he came over with the examinant’s brother into England, and served some time as a drawer in a tavern, and afterwards served several persons, and at last put himself apprentice to one Guyon, a peruke-maker in Long Acre; and after his time was out, worked as a journeyman in the city, and married a midwife’s daughter behind the Exchange, and there lived by making periwigs. He was looked upon as a papist, and, in his discourse with this examinant and others, he always seemed to talk for France and that interest. The last time the examinant saw him was the last thanksgiving-day, when the queen went to St. Paul's. He told the examinant, 'he was just come out of the messenger's hands, and that he had now got a better trade than peruke-making.' The examinant said to him, 'have a care; you have not been in custody for your good deeds. Beware of Tyburn.'

Guerrier's Examination.

"Matthew Guerrier, peruke-maker in Birchian Lane, being examined, saith 'that he first came to know Alexander Valiere immediately after the battle at the Boyse, at which time Valiere deserted from the French service; he did not list himself, but was footman to Mr. Doge, an ensign in captain Rochefort's company in Belcastel's regiment.' After the war was ended, the regiment quartered at Kingsale; and Mr. Doge, at his request, gave him leave to quit his service; at which time the lieutenant colonel of the same regiment offered to take him into his company, and proffered him 5 or 6 guineas; but Valiere refused it, by which the examinant and others were more confirmed in their opinion, that he was a coward. The examinant did not see Valiere any more till about twelve years ago; and some while after that they lodged and worked together at Jacob's Coffee-house in Threadneedle street, for about two months; and then parted, upon a suspicion that the said Valiere was a papist, and not an honest man either in his dealings or conversation; and one Dubellier, who is a Roman Catholic himself, did since tell him, that Valiere is a papist; for which reasons, the examinant has not kept up any acquaintance with him ever since.

"After Valiere was taken into custody, one Montau, a weaver in Spitalfields, told the examinant, 'That the said Valiere was by all his acquaintance suspected to be a person disaffected to the government, and would be often talking against it in public company; upon which account he once quarrelled with Valiere, at Jacob's Coffee-house, some time ago, and threw a glass of beer in his face.'

Bara's Examination.

"John Barn, of Stepney, in the county of Middlesex, surgeon, saith, 'That he is a native of France, was surgeon-major to Du Bart during the last war, except the two last years, when he left Du Bart upon a dispute between them concerning a prize.—He came back to Dunkirk; and upon examination of the quarrel between him and Du Bart, he was acquitted; and while he continued at Dunkirk, had the opportunity of assisting several French officers and soldiers in the English service, who were brought prisoners to Dunkirk, who promised to help him in his profession, if he would come over to England, which he did as soon as the peace was made. He became first acquainted with Valiere by the means of a master of a ship belonging to St. Valery. This acquaintance was continued by the means of one Dormicour, who was come over from Dunkirk for debt, and was a friend to both of them. Dormicour being about to return to France, Valiere proposed to him (as he told Bara) the sending over the Paris Gazette sooner than by the way of Holland; which Dormicour promised, if he could have leave on the other side. Afterwards Valiere made the same proposal to Bara; and Bara answered, 'That, if he could get a protection for his person, he would do it.' Valiere told him, 'He had a sufficient authority for him to go to France;' and he produced a paper, sealed, with secretary Harley's name to it; and he and Bara went to Mr. Secretary Harley's office, where Valiere obtained a pass for him to go to Holland. He likewise gave him a note for 3*l.* which was never paid, and also a hook and chain for a watch, which was to be a token to Nerinx at Rotterdam, to pay him 30*l.* which he paid him. From Rotterdam he found means to get to Dunkirk, and from thence to Calais, and continued between those two places till October 1705. He wrote constantly to Valiere, by the name of Clerk, by the way of Holland, during this time.—Being asked, 'What news he sent?' He answered, 'What he could pick up.' He received 30*l.* more about the 4th of October. While he was at Calais, Bland came over, with two packs of wool consigned to Chateaufneuf, from Valiere; he stayed there nine or ten days. About the 4th of October, Bara came over in the boat he had bought, and brought with him a Paris Gazette, which he delivered to Valiere. In 9 or 10 days, Valiere sent Bara back to Calais, with Bland and his boy, without any goods, only with an open letter to Chateaufneuf, for 17 ankers of brandy; they staid there 3 weeks, and the commissary bore their whole expence.—He continued at Margate about a week, and went back with Bland's boy, and they were driven to Newport; where being taken into custody, they were released upon Bara's writing to Chateaufneuf, and his writing to the governor of Newport in their behalf.—At this time Bara carried with him 36 yards of sattin, 2 pieces of stuff, 2 pair of stockings, and 2 cases of knives; the stockings only were a present to Mr. Chateaufneuf; the rest of the things were for Bara's subsistence, Valiere having, as he then said, no money to give him. He stayed at Calais 2 months; and then came to Margate, and brought with him one Corselli, a merchant, with whom he went to London, and told Valiere, 'That he was come over with him;' and he has been since informed by Bland, that Corselli was sent back by Valiere by the way of Holland. Bara durst not stay in London, finding there were messengers out from Mr. Harley to seize him, which were procured by Valiere, and with which he charged Valiere. He stayed at Deal 7 weeks, and at Dover 9 or 10 days; from whence he found means, by an exchanged prisoner, to send a letter to Chateaufneuf, to desire him to send over a boat for him; which he did accordingly, and he went to Calais. Bara drinking one night with Chateaufneuf, and complaining of his usage from Valiere; the commissary advised him to return to England, telling him, 'He was sure Valiere had a protection from Mr. Harley; and therefore, Bara acting by Valiere's orders, it was impossible he should suffer by the government; and Valiere was a great rogue, if he did not protect him. Bara returned about the 27th of April, and wrote to Mr. Harley; but, before he had an answer, he was seized at Dover by the magistrates; but after four days he was carried to London by Mr. Harley's warrant; and Bara owned to him, that he had been in France, and that he was sent by Valiere. He continued in custody 31 days. After that time, Mr. Harley sent for him, and told him, 'That he had prevailed with the queen to pardon him; but that he must go immediately to Dunkirk, and see what naval preparations were there; and bid him say nothing, and he should make use of him.—He performed this voyage in an open boat from London, and returned in 7 days; and brought word, 'there were but two men of war, and they both unrigged; and that Fourbin was gone after the Russia fleet northwards.' He called to mind also, that, in October 1706, he was sent by Mr. Harley for the Paris Gazette; and he brought it accordingly. Bara says, 'He was arrested at Deal (as he thought) by Valiere's means, who hindered him to have a boat. He sent word of this to secretary Harley who wrote to captain Whitehall, desiring him to help Bara to a boat; but Mr. Whitehall would not do it: so Bara came back, and complained to the Secretary of it.—Bara said, 'He was at Calais, with Chateaufneuf, about six weeks before the Hampton Court and Graf-ton were taken.' The Commissary told him, 'There was a great fleet in the Downs, which were to be convoyed by some men of war; and that they were equipping at Dunkirk nine men of war to intercept that convoy; and that he had received the most pressing orders to speed away the seamen to Dunkirk.' Chateaufneuf said, 'He hoped this year they should have their revenge, and that the ships should not get out of the Downs so easily as they had done.'

"At this time Chateaufneuf told him, 'Valiere had played him a trick;' And then shewed him a letter of Valiere's; part of which he read (but he would not let him see it all), wherein Valiere told Chateaufneuf, 'That he should have a care of Bara, for that he was employed by the government in England.' He stayed but three days at Calais, and came directly to Mr. Harley, and told him what he had heard about the Dunkirk squadron; but did not at that time take any notice to him of what had been shewed him in Valiere's letter; having several times before acquainted him, 'That he trusted Valiere too much, and that Valiere was not the man he took him to be;' but Mr. Harley never answered him any thing to that matter.—When he told Mr. Harley about the Dunkirk squadron, he seemed not to believe it; but when those ships were taken, Bara went to Mr. Harley, and asked him, 'If he did not believe it now?' To which Mr.

Harley replied, 'He remembered Bara had told him of it.'

Bland's Examination.

"William Bland, of St. Katherines near the Tower, waterman, saith, that in August 1705, being at Margate, he met with one Clerk (whose true name he has been since informed is Valiere); and after some time drinking together, Clark proposed to him to go to France: and told him 'He need not fear; for he had a sufficient authority to protect him from any mischief might arise from his going over.'—Bland agreed with him to go over for 15*l.* to Calais; which he did. He carried over two bags of wool, which was consigned to Chateaufneuf, the commissary at Calais, and a letter to him. When he landed at Calais, he was seized, and carried to the governor and also to the commissary, to whom he gave the letter.—He was after carried to the inn, and had a dinner provided for him and the boy he had with him; and falling sick there, a doctor was sent to him, and care taken of him, and used with much civility, and the commissary paid all the charges. He returned, and took with him 8 or 10 ankers of brandy and a letter for Clerke, and delivered the letter and brandy to Clerk.—He said further, 'That when he came to Calais, his boat was much out of repair; and the commissary took care to have it put in very good repair, out of the king's stores, without any expence to him.'—The next time, which was the September following, he went over to Calais, which was also upon Clark's account. He carried nothing over, but Bara, and a small parcel which belonged to Bara. Clark wrote a letter, which he gave to Bara. When they landed, Bara left him and went directly into the town. Bland went to the former inn; his charges were paid as before. He went often to the commissary's house, and was made much of. After about a week or ten days stay he brought back Bara, and 17 ankers of brandy, and a letter from the commissary for Clark, which he delivered to Clark at Margate.—Bland went himself to London, leaving his boat and his boy at Margate; and Bara took the boat and boy and went to Ostend. He pretended that he was not at Mrs. Riches in April last, but was there the latter end of May. He denied also that he went into France at any other times since the two voyages above-mentioned. He appeared to be a man of a very ill repute."

Morillon's Examination.

"Daniel Morillon, of Deal, being examined saith, That he first became acquainted with Clark at one Baillie's house in Deal, about July 1706. Clark then proposed to him to go to France, and bid him take in what goods he pleased to carry thither; and Clark would give him a letter which should protect him. Upon the credit of this, he and one Verge went over, and carried with them about 114lb. of combed wool; and also a letter directed to Mr. Chateaufort the commissary of Calais, and another to one Camus a merchant there, who was to furnish them with brandy in exchange for the wool. Upon their arrival at Calais, they were seized by the guard and carried to the governor, who examined them about the Dutch transport ships, and to what place they were bound. The governor returned them the letter, to carry to the commissary; who sent them to Marville's house, an inn; and told them, 'They must not depart from Calais till they had his packet;' which he afterwards sent to them, directed, 'To John Clark, merchant, of Bristol;' together with a pass, to secure them against privateers.—Upon their return, and delivery of the packet to Clark, he bid them get more goods as fast as they could, and go over as often as they could, though he should be out of the way, so that they could not have letters from him. Accordingly, in August, they went over the second time with wool; but had no letter. When they came to Calais they were carried to the governor who asked them several questions, and in particular, 'How they durst venture without a letter?' the commissary gave them a packet for Clark; but the custom-house boat meeting them in their return they threw the packet over-board, accordingly to Clark's general direction; which was, 'Whenever they thought themselves in danger of being taken by any English vessels, they should throw their letters over-board.' When they saw Clerk, they told him, 'They had thrown the packet into the sea.' He said 'He was sorry they were forced to do it.'—Morillon upon his return discovered all those particulars to the mayor of Deal; and soon after he and Verge were sent for by messengers, and carried before the two secretaries of state, where, being examined, they acquainted them with all the particulars that passed at Calais, and of their throwing the packet into the sea according to Clerk's order. Upon this they were remanded to the custody of the messengers, where they remained four months, and at last were discharged out of custody without any further examination. Clark used to brag, in all companies, 'That he feared no man; and talked very boastingly of his protection and power from Mr. Secretary Harley.'

Verge's Examination.

"Joseph Verge, of Deal, being examined, saith that he became first acquainted with John Clark at one Baylie's house at Deal.' He told them, 'That they might go to France as often as they could get goods; and he would give them a letter which would protect them. Verge went to Canterbury to buy goods; and then he, Morillon, and Bayly, went to Calais in July 1706. As soon as they landed they were carried to the governor, who asked them, 'What men of war and merchant ships were in the Downs;' and particularly inquired about the Dutch transport ships, if they knew to what place they were bound, and if they were intended for a descent upon any part of France.—The governor sent them, with the letter from Clark (which they had shewed to him), to the commissary, to whom it was directed; who stopped them two or three days, and then sent them back with a packet, directed, 'to John Clerk merchant of Bristol.' They sold their goods to one Camus, to whom they brought a letter from Clark, but had no letter from him for Clerk. They landed the goods near Birchington, about midnight, and carried the packet to Clerk, at Margate. Clerk asked them, 'If they would go again?' they said, 'they could not till their goods were sold.' Upon that, Clerk disposed of the goods for them, and gave them the money in ten days. Then they went to Calais again, without any letter; but with such goods as they could get upon their own account. They were carried to the governor, and examined as to what ships were in the Downs; and the commissary asked them, 'If they brought a letter from Clark?' They said, 'The Dutch transports were sailed, and that they had no letter.' They said, 'Clerk told them, they might go, though they had no letter.' They brought back brandy, and a packet for Clerk from the commissary; and the custom house boat coming up with them, they threw their packet over board.—Verge was carried before the mayor of Deal, where he denied he had been in France, but Morillon confessed it. The examinant and Morillon were both sent for, by messengers, and examined by the two secretaries of state, and told them the whole matter. The examinant was remanded to the messengers, where he lay 4 months, and then, without further examination, was discharged.—When he was in prison at Deal, Clark came to him and bid him not fear, he would take care he should come to no harm.—The very same night he came home to Deal, Clark came to him, and proposed to him to go over to France again; but he refused to go, being sick at that time.—In July, or August, 1707, Clerk sent for him again, and proposed to him to go to France; and shewed him, at several times, letters subscribed R. Harley. The same night John Clark himself, Pb. Whatton, and Verge the examinant, went off from Deal beach, and landed at Boulogne the next morning. They were seized when they landed; but Clark went to the governor, and about two hours after returned, and bid the men refresh themselves, for he would go back that night. They brought back brandy, and landed Clark at Dimchurch; and he went away immediately for London.—In September they went over again from Hyth to Boulogne, with about 240lb. of wool, and a very large packet of letters, directed to the commissary; upon their arrival, they were seized, and carried to the governor, and examined about the ships in the Downs. The commissary took them to his own house, and treated them at his own table, where the captain of the Boulogne sloop dined with them, and boasted of his having robbed some English gentlemen in Kent.—They brought back letters for Clark, and landed at Dunchurch, and gave the packet to Clerk.—Some time after, Clerk sent for Verge and Watton to Dover, and there they took in Le More and about 30lb. of wool, and had letters from Clerk, and intended to go for Boulogne: but were taken by an Ostender, who took from them all their clothes, and all they had. In Verge's hat was Clerk's packet, which the Ostenders took from him. They could not get back to England, because of the wind. They went to Boulogne in a manner naked; but, the commissary being gone to Paris, they could not get credit from his clerk; but Le More prevailed with one Mr. Strick, a merchant, to give him credit for 5*l*. The commissary's clerk delivered two letters to them for Clerk. They put into Dover pier, where their boat was taken; and they being taken by messengers, delivered to them the two letters directed to Clerk, which they had from the commissary's servant.—He said, 'he believed Clerk to be disaffected to the government, and gave this reason for it; that, being about to go over to Boulogne, he said to Clerk, 'If we should bring back the good news that Toulon was taken, he hoped he would give them a guinea or two.' Clerk made answer, 'That if he would bring news that the siege was raised, he would be better pleased and would give them 10 guineas.'

Weaver's Examination.

'John Weaver, of Deal, mariner, being examined, said, 'That John Carter, of Deal, brought him first acquainted with John Clark, about June, or July, 1706.' Clark shewed him a paper, with a seal, and the name of Mr. Secretary Harley, and said, 'he was employed by him;' which Weaver believed the rather because Clark had been before examined by the magistrates, and was set at liberty.—Clark proposed to him to go to France; and Philip Watton and he went in a small Deal yawl to Calais, with a parcel of wool, and letters to the commissary M. Chateaneuf, and one Camus, a merchant. As they landed, they were seized by a guard, and carried immediately to the governor; from thence to a house, whither the commissary of Calais came to them, to whom they gave the letter which they brought from Clark. They stayed there 4 or 5 days, and then came back, and brought with them brandy, and a letter from the commissary to Clerk; which, upon their return they delivered to him.—In a few days after, they were sent over again to Calais, with a letter to the commissary, and also some wool; and they were treated as before. And when they returned, were charged with letters to Clark which they delivered to him. After this, Clark and they disagreed for some time.—But, in June 1707, Clark proposed to Weaver and Watton to go over again into France; and Clark and they went over to Boulogne. Upon their landing, they were all three made prisoners; Clark had his liberty in two days, the others were detained prisoners 8 or 9 days; and then they all returned for England.—In six weeks after, Weaver, Watton, Clark, and Le More, went over again to Boulogne. They were confined all, except Clark; afterwards they were all carried to the governor, who treated them civilly; Clark was taken by the governor into another room, and stayed with him privately about two hours. When they returned for England, Clark put on board brandy and Champagne wine; and a man whom they did not know was sent back with them.—In Sept. 1707, Weaver, Watton, and Verge, made another voyage to Boulogne, and carried wool, consigned to the commissary.—They were not made prisoners at this time, but were carried to the commissary's house, and dined with him; and that afternoon they returned, with a packet of letters from the commissary to Clark, and lauded at Hythe."

Wathing's Examination.

'Philip Wathing, of Deal, mariner, being examined, saith, 'That, in June 1706, he became first acquainted with John Clark; the said Wathing being then lately returned from France, where he had been a prisoner. Clark proposed to him to go to France again; and said, 'he had authority to bear him out; for he was used to send people to France, upon the account of the government.'—After taking some time for consideration, the examinant and one John Weaver agreed to go over; whereupon Clark and John Carter met them at an ale-house, Clark was to give them 5*l*. a-piece. Weaver desired to know, 'What they were to carry?' Clark said, 'Some small matter of wool, and such letters as he should send to the commissary of Calais, and to bring back whatever the commissary should deliver to them.'—The examinant saith, 'That Clark and Carter put two bags of wool on board a small Deal yawl, and Clark gave him a letter to Chateaneuf; and they went from Hythe, and they arrived at Calais in about four hours. They were seized at their landing, and carried before the governor, who inquired, what news in England, and about the ships in the Downs; and asked several questions, what strength the English had in the Streights. They told the governor, 'They had a letter for the commissary;' the governor sent them to him, and they delivered the letter; and about three or four days after, the commissary came to them himself and brought them a packet of letters to be delivered to Clerk; which Weaver delivered to Clerk upon their return, and he went away immediately to London.—In July Clark told the examinant, 'they must go again;' and ordered them to Hythe, where they took in three packs of wool, and had a letter to the commissary. They were seized at landing, and carried first to the governor, and after, by a guard, to the commissary's, to whom they delivered the letter. But the Dunkirk galleys being then in the road, they were kept under a guard for 10 or 12 days, and not suffered to return till they were gone: then they returned to Margate, and gave the packet to Clark.—The examinant saith, that Clark told them, 'he could have other men for less money'; and they refusing to go for less, Clark and they parted for that time.—The examinant said farther, 'That about June 1707, he and Weaver went to Clark, for some money he owed them; and they agreed with Clark to go for France again, and Clark went with them himself.' They went off from Hythe, and sailed to Boulogne, where they were all taken into custody. But Clark upon writing to the governor, was immediately set at liberty, and afterwards told them, 'That he had waited on the governor, and had done the business;' and then they were all set at liberty, and returned to Margate, and brought with them 7 or 8 ankers of brandy. Philip Wathing saith, 'That, in July following, he and Weaver went over again from Hythe, and carried Clark and one Le More.' When they arrived at Boulogne, they were seized; but Clark writing to the commissary, he was released; and afterwards all of them were carried to the governor, who took Clark from them, and was alone with Clark 3 or 4 hours. The next day they came away and brought one James, a Scottishman, with them, and landed them at Hythe. They scrupled to take in this man; but Clark said, 'he would hear them out.'—In August, Clark went with the examinant and one Verge from Deal to Boulogne; they then carried with them nothing but provisions. When they landed, Clark was at liberty, and went into the town for 2 or 3 hours; and then came to them, and told them, 'They must get ready to go away that night.' He was in very good humour and said, 'he had now caught the old one;' by which the examinant and Verge understood he had heard some good news. They landed at Hythe the same night.—The examinant says, 'That in September, he Weaver, and Verge, went again, by Clark's order, and carried letters to the commissary of Boulogne, and four bags of wool.' When they landed they were carried to the governor and being asked several questions, as usual, they were sent to the commissary's, and dined with him at his own table. In 3 or 4 days after, they were dispatched with letters to Clark, which they delivered to him.—Clark's general directions to them was, 'That if they met with English or Dutch ships, they were to throw their letters over-board; but if they met French ships, they might shew their letters.'—The examinant farther says, 'That, in the latter end of September, he, and Verge, and Le More went over again; but near the French coast, they were taken by an Ostender, who stripped them, and plundered them of every thing. However, they went on to Boulogne, but the commissary being gone to Paris, his clerk would give them no credit; but Le More got some credit in the town. They were kept at Boulogne about 14 days; and then the commissary's clerk brought them two packets for

Clark, with which they set out, and landed at Dover: but, in their going from thence to Deal, they were seized by the messengers, and their letters taken. Whilst they were at Boulogne, they were shewed an Englishman, who came from Rumney Marsh.—The examinant farther says, that the second time he went to Calais, their boat was taken by the Boulogne sloop, and carried before the governor; who released them as soon as they told him they were employed by Clark. The examinant farther says, that the first time they carried Le More over, they did not bring him back with them, because (as Clark said) he might not see the said James."

"Ralph Hatton, of the port of Hythe, says, he was first brought acquainted with one John Clark by the means of John Carter, of Deal; who told him, Clark was employed by the government to get news, which he was to have from the commissary of Calais.—The first voyage he made upon Clark's account was about September 1706, when Clark pressed him to go over immediately, though he had at that time no goods; but Ralph Hatton refused to go without goods; whereupon, about eighty pounds of wool was provided, which he and his brother Tho. Hatton carried to Calais, together with a letter for the commissary of Calais, Monsieur Chateaufort: he believes the letter did not relate to trade, because the wool was sold to another person. He landed at Calais, and was seized by the soldiers, and after carried to the commissary, to whom he delivered the letter. The commissary carried Hatton to the governor, and he did not open his letter till he came to the governor. Hatton was received very kindly by the governor, who made him drink, which was a thing very unusual. The governor opened the letter, and shewed it to several gentlemen then present, who seemed pleased with it. The governor ordered the commissary to carry him to Merveille's the Golden Lyon, the best inn in Calais; where the commissary treated his brother and him very well all the while they stayed, at his own cost. The next morning the commissary brought a French gentleman to them, and said, 'the governor had ordered, that he should be carried over to England in their boat.' They did accordingly take on board the gentleman; but no letter or goods were sent by them. The gentleman spoke good English; he did not own what his name was. During the blowing weather, Hatton said to him, 'If he had any papers about him that would do himself or them hurt, it was best to throw them over-board, because they might be forced on shore in the day-time.' The gentleman said, 'he had none, but what he had was in his head.' They carried the gentleman to Clark, who was then at Mrs. Riches', not well; and Clark sent him to London that night, and followed himself the next day. This gentleman came back to Deal in three weeks, and would have had Hatton carry him over, to France; but he refused. This gentleman said, 'he came in 14 hours from Paris to Boulogne, and went aboard the Boulogne sloop; but the sloop was forced to Calais by the weather, and so he came in Hatton's boat.'—About the middle of October, Clark sent to Calais Ralph Hatton, Tho. Hatton, and William Reven, with one pack of wool, and a letter directed to the commissary Chateauf. When they came to Calais, they were seized, and taken before a judge, and were accused for having carried over to England a spy. Merveille, by order of the commissary, desired them to deny the fact; which they did. They were kept in custody ten days, or more, till they could hear from court, and by order from thence they were discharged; but forbid to carry over any persons whatsoever. At this time, they brought over from the commissary letters for Clark, which they delivered to him. About the middle of December, he, and William Reven, and one Francis Baker, were sent over to Calais by Clark, with a pack of wool and a letter to the commissary. They were received there as usual, and carried to the governor; and the commissary did not open his letter till they came to the governor. Upon their return, they brought a packet of letters for Clark, which was carried to him by Reven. Hatton had no further dealings with Clark, till about June last, when Clark hired a boat of Hatton; and Clark, Weaver, and Warphin, went over in that boat to Boulogne with wool, and returned about ten days after.—Upon his return, Clark told Hatton, 'He had been out the longer, because he was kept under a guard till he could get a letter delivered to the governor, and then he was set at liberty; and then waited on the governor.'—When Clark came from Boulogne, he brought papers along with him, and went away immediately for London.—In July, Clark came to Hythe and lay private there till the boat came. As soon as the boat came, Clark, Warphin, and Weaver, and William Le More, went on board for Boulogne; they returned in about a week's time, and brought with them a man, called James, who, they said, was the duke at Boulogne's groom, who went away with Clark to London.—Before Clark went, he gave a letter to Hatton, with orders to watch at a certain place on the coast for the Boulogne sloop, which he was to know by the signal of hoisting Dutch colours on her main-top; and he was to give the letter to the captain of the sloop. But the sloop did not come; so when Clark came from London, in August, he had his letter.—He sent his boat twice (he believes) to Boulogne, to inquire after the sloop, there being two horses kept privately to be put on board her.—This examinant further saith, 'That, when the groom was brought over in July, Le More was left behind.' Clark told the examinant, 'he had him detained there, lest he should betray the groom when he came to England.'

Tho. Hatton's Examination.

'Thomas Hatton, being examined, declared 'That he had been acquainted with John Clarke about a year and a half, Clark said, 'He was employed by the government, and might send to France when he pleased.' In June 1706, he helped to get wool into the boat. He said, Clark made his business very public. In August 1706, he was employed by Clark and sent over to Calais with Steed and Gosby; and carried 200lb. weight of wool, together with a letter for M. Chateauf. Upon landing, they were carried to the governor, and well received. He asked them, 'What news in England; and what ships of war and merchant-men were in the Downs?' The commissary shewed his letter to the governor, and then carried them to Merveille's house. They had not leave to go till letters from Paris came (as he was told), so their stay there was about 5 or 6 days. They brought back brandy, and a packet of letters for Clark.—Thomas Hatton said further, 'That in September, at Clark's request, he and his brother made a second voyage to Calais, and carried letters for the commissary; and they were carried to the governor as before; and when they came away the commissary gave them a letter for Clark; and Merveille told them, 'That the commissary said, they must take a gentleman aboard and carry him to England;' which they did accordingly.—The examinant further says, 'That, in October 1706, he went over with Reven and his brother Ralph Hatton to Calais, where they were seized, and carried before a Judge, upon account of a man brought from France to England, in a former voyage, by his brother and himself.—Merveilles told them, as from the commissary, that they must deny to the Judge, that they carried over any body, though the man was put on board by the commissary's order.—After an imprisonment of several days, they were discharged, and sent away for England with a letter to Clark only. This examinant says, 'He helped about 8 several times to put wool on board divers boats for Clark; and he lay about 14 days to watch for the Boulogne sloop, in order to put two horses on board to be sent thither.'

Reven's Examination.

'William Reven, of Deal, mariner, being examined, declared, 'That, in October 1706, when John Clark lay at Mrs. Riches' house, she engaged him to go over to France for Clark. Clark shewed him the secretary's pass, and said, 'he had a license to send any body to France.' The examinant went over first with the two Hattons. When they landed, they were seized, and carried before the governor; and after that, they were examined before the admiral, or the judge, at Calais, for having carried over a man for England. They were kept in custody 14 or 15 days, till orders came from Paris to discharge them. Then the commissary dispatched them away; without any thing but one letter to Clark, which they sent to him. The examinant further says, 'That, about a month after, Mr. Clark ordered him, Thomas Finnis, and Francis Baker, of Dover, to bring their boat to him to Margate; which they did; and there they took in some wool, and a sack with some things in it. They were seized at Sandwich by the custom-house officers, and their wool taken; but they did not meddle with the sack, which they brought back to Clark at Deal. And about a week after, the examinant, Baker, and Ralph Hatton, were ordered to take in some wool, the same sack, and a letter, and to carry them to Calais; which they did, and delivered the sack and letter to the commissary. At the same time they took in their wool, they also took in a young man, whom they carried to France. In a short time they were dismissed from Calais, with brandy, and a packet of letters from the commissary to Clark. The examinant says, 'They were usually carried first to the governor's house, and the commissary came to them there.'

"Johanna Riches, of Deal, victualler, being examined, declared, 'That John Clark did much frequent her house;' he lodged there about six months. The first time he came to her was, to enquire how he might vend his brandy to the best advantage; he proposed to her, to make a venture with him; and told her, 'That, for 50s. laid out in wool, she could have 4l. in brandy, without any risk; for the government, by whom he was employed, had agreed to pay the prime costs.' She ventured once with him; but never had any return from him.—There was a Frenchman brought to Clark at her house, late in the night, who had divers papers with him; and he gave them to Clark to read. Clark pretended it was his sister's husband; and that he lived at Calais. Clark sent the examinant to get a horse for the Frenchman immediately; and, about 1 o'clock, the Frenchman began his journey for London, without a guide. Next morning Clark went after him.—Johanna Riches further said, 'That about a week afterward Clark returned to her house; and about a week after that, the Frenchman returned to her house, and brought a box with him, which Clark opened; and after he had viewed and perused what was in it, being three or four papers and a parchment with a seal to it, and other things, he fastened the box, and sealing it in several places with his own seal, then gave it her to lock up in some safe place. Some time after, the said Clark sent one Revens and another with some wool, and with this box, for France; but the boat was taken, and the wool was seized by the custom-house officers: but, the boatmen having put their victuals into the same sack where the box was, no notice was taken of the box; and Revens brought it back again to Clark; who gave it to the examinant, requiring her to lock herself up, that nobody might see what she did; and then to open the box, and dry what was in it: which she did; and afterwards Clark sent Revens to Calais, and gave him the box: and, upon his return, he told the examinant, 'He had delivered it at Calais.' When the Frenchman was at her house, he brought thither three other Frenchmen; and they were some time together privately with Clark in his chamber; and afterwards they rode out altogether; and the next day Clark came back. But she never saw the Frenchmen after. Clark was often in drink, and was then very foolish; and used to boast, 'He had the heads of the nation on his side; and that nobody was capable of the business he was engaged in but himself; and nobody durst meddle with him.'—Johanna Riches further says, 'That, about three quarters of a year ago, towards the latter end of April (the same night he agreed with Weaver and Waffin to go to Calais), he came to her house in the night, and desired a private lodging; and then sent her out, to learn what men of war were in the Downs. And she went to the packet-master, who told her, 'There were only three men of war there,' and named them to her. She brought this account to Clark presently. She has forgot the other names; but she verily believes the Royal Oak was one of the ships; because a midshipman belonging to that ship was at that time in her house, who borrowed a bottle of sal armoniac of her for his wife, who was then on board the Royal Oak.—Upon her naming the ships to Clark, he set them down immediately in his book; and soon after went out, and stayed so late, that he could get no lodging, but lay in her bed, and she sat up all night. The examinant said, 'She believed that one Bland went over to France about that time: For, Bland and one Mrs. Atwood being together at the examinant's house, he said, 'He hoped he should soon bring them better liquor;' and then ordered the examinant to buy for him two half ankers and three runlets. She says, 'That Bland told her, he had been four times in France since the war.' The examinant said further, 'That Bland went into the Downs, and went aboard several ships in the Downs. He told the examinant, 'It was only to get some of the ships to take off his brandy when he came back;' But she looked upon that as a pretence only; and that his true business was, to observe what ships were there, and of what value they were. The examinant further says, 'That Clark told her, 'That the father of one of the three Frenchmen, which he brought to her house, was as great a man as any in France.'

Hartley's Examination.

"John Hartley, about 15 years old, apprentice to John Weaver, being examined, saith, 'That he went over twice, with his master and one Waffin, to Calais, upon Clark's account. When they brought them to the governor of Calais, he asked them, 'What ships were in the Downs; and whither they were bound?' In the second voyage, they met with a small French privateer; who inquired of them, 'What men of war and merchant ships were in the Downs?' And Watling and Weaver (as the examinant believes) told them, as well as they could, all they knew of the men of war and merchant ships, where they were designed, and when they were to sail; and, having given this account to the privateer, he suffered them to go on for Calais."

Carter's Examination.

"John Carter, of Deal, butcher, being examined, declared, 'That he became acquainted with one John Bara about the 27th of March 1706, who did use to go over from England to Calais, and return in French boats. About that time he was desired to provide a boat to carry over Bara; but afterwards, the French sloop coming, Bara went over in that. Bara stayed about a month, and then returned in a French boat (as Carter believed;) and, as Weller told the examinant, brought brandy and letters over with him. He was seized at Dover by Mr. Whitehall, and examined before the magistrates: but soon after was sent for to London by Mr. Secretary Harley's order (as the examinant was informed;) and in about 4 or 5 days Bara returned to Deal; and, pulling out of his pocket a handful of guineas, shewed them to the examinant, and told him, 'See what I have got by being seized at Dover, which was by your means.' Clark spoke very ill of Bara to the examinant; and persuaded him not to have more to do with him, but only with Clark himself. The said Carter declared, 'That he acquainted Mr. Whitehall with Clark's proceedings: who bid him take notice of all that Clark did, and for that purpose to go on with him. After that, he assisted Clark in getting wool for him, and procuring men for him to go over to France; and also received Clark's letters for him.'—The said Carter declared, 'He saw a packet of letters, that came from London, directed to Clark; and saw Clark open the packet, which, Clark said, came from secretary Harley; and he shewed him the name of R. Harley at the bottom of the letter. In the packet were several letters sealed up.'—This examinant said, 'He procured Jo. Weaver and Wm. Watton, who went twice to Calais for Clark; and carried letters from him, and brought back packets of letters from the commissary of Calais for Clark. He said also, 'That Clark employed one Gosby and one Steed, both of Walmer, to go for him to Calais; but they would not go a second time, because, as they told the said Carter, they were examined very strictly by the commissary of Calais, what ships were in the Downs; and what other news was in England. And the commissary took notes of all they said; and detained them at Calais, whilst they sent to Paris, and had a return. And for these reasons, they were afraid to go any more.'—The examinant Carter further said, 'That, in the next voyage which was made by the two Huttons, in the beginning of Sept. 1706, they brought with them a Frenchman from Calais; who, immediately upon his landing, went with Clark for London. When Clark returned to Deal, he brought with him three Frenchmen, who by some means or other got over to France. The said Carter further said, 'That he often advised Clark to be more private than he had used to be, in managing his correspondence with France; for, if he continued to act in so public a manner, the mob would knock him on the head.' Carter said, He told Clark, 'He wondered how such great persons as Clark said employed him, could be so put upon by him.' Clark replied, 'He knew what he had to do; for, said Clark, it is easier dealing with them than with you,' meaning the said Carter. Clark said, 'He knew his master Harley very well, and almost any thing would serve him.' The said Carter further said, 'That, he and Clark being riding together upon the beach, they saw 18 ships at sea. Thereupon Clark said, 'Here is news for my master Harley: I will send him word, here is seen a squadron of French ships.' Carter said, 'What! before you know whether they are French?' To which Clark replied, 'It is all one for that; it will serve my turn as well.' Clark would often speak contemptuously of the great men above. Carter further says, 'That Clark's manner was, to give orders to the men who went over, 'That, if they were taken by the French, they would shew their letters, and they would help them to get to France; but if they met with Englishmen, they were then ordered to throw their letters overboard.' The said Carter also said, 'That at last he broke off correspondence with Clark. He had known him drunk and sober; and always thought him to be in the French interest. He would several times send over boats without goods. Clark pretended he was a protestant; but Carter said, 'He never believed it.' He would never go to church, and always talked favourably of the papists: He was a lewd, drunken fellow, and talked very extravagantly and foolishly.—This examinant being asked, 'Why he gave Clark warning of the danger he ran, in keeping this correspondence so openly?' He said, 'That the mob had several times come about them, and called them French dogs and rogues; and reproached them, for betraying our ships, and giving intelligence to the enemy.' And he further says, That though Clark railed at Bara, yet he seemed very great with him when they met."

Jordan's Examination.

"Captain John Jordan, a riding officer of her majesty's customs at Folkestone, in Kent, saith, 'That, for some time last past, he hath heard of one Clark on their coast, who held a correspondence with France; but had no personal knowledge of him till the 24th December last was 12 months, at which time he seized his boat, as it came from France, at Dimchurch. On the 30th Dec. following, the said Clark came to him from Hythe, and demanded the reason why he seized the said boat? And captain Jordan replied, 'For carrying wool to France.' Then Clark told him, 'He was employed by the government, to learn news from France; and he could not go over unless he carried some wool, and that he had done several times.' Whereupon the said captain Jordan laid his hand on Clark's shoulder, and said, 'I have therefore a great mind to seize you.' Then the said Clark seemed concerned, saying, 'If you do, I shall and will deny all I have said; (there being nobody but them two in the room).—Then the said Clark took out of his pocket a paper writing, signed Harley, with a great seal at one side; which the said captain Jordan read; and it was a pass for him and his servant, &c. And the said Jordan having heard that this said Clark had been took up at Dover and Deal for the like practices, and again discharged, he let him go.—And he further told the said Jordan, 'That he should have an order from the Secretary of State to have his boat returned.' Who answered him, 'That, when he saw such an order, he knew how to obey it.' But, no such order being ever produced to him, he condemned his said boat the following term.—And the said Jordan further saith, 'That Clark soon after procured another boat, which went to and from France as before; which, he saith, landed at Dover about the 23d of July last, and part of the goods seized that she brought from France. August 2d, 1707, Clark's boat came from France, and landed at Shoren Cliff, near Hythe. August 14th, she came from Boulogne, and landed at Ditchurch. August 28th, Clark's boat went off for Boulogne, from Hyth Stade. September 20th, Clark's boat went over again, and returned to Dover on the 5th of October, where it was seized. October 4, the said captain Jordan, by order of Mr. Baker, seized two fine horses at Hythe, belonging to the duke * at Boulogne, under the care of Mr. Clark, and one James Gordin the duke's groom: Which groom then got away; and he has not heard of him since. On the 6th of Oct., the said Clark sent a letter to the said Jordan, telling him, 'He was informed he had took away his horses out of Monger's stable; that the horses were his, and for his own use; and if he pleased to return them in the said stable, it would oblige him; otherwise he must take his measures in London.' Signed John Clark, and ready to produce.—On the 17th Sept., 1707, Clark was sick at the King's Arms, at Folkestone, where the said Jordan sometimes visited him. And the said Clark did then tell the said Jordan, 'That the 1st time he went over to Boulogne, having then but a small parcel of wool with him, the king's commissary Collanson met him at the water side, and asked him, 'What he came there for?' and looked very sour upon him; and then carried him and one Le More (one of the boatmen) up to the governor; who was very rough with them, telling them, 'They came there for something else than to bring such a small parcel of wool, which would not bear their charges, threatening them to tell the truth.' Then Clark desired to speak with the duke privately. Then Clark told the duke, 'He came to learn news; which expression much surpris'd him.' But Clark told him (as he the said Clark informed the said Jordan), 'That if he could serve his excellency on the other side (meaning England), he would serve him faithfully.'—But the said Le More was threatened with death, as being a Frenchman, and had had formerly a commission in an English privateer against hiving; so he fell on his knees, and begged for his life; and Clark told Jordan, 'That, upon his interest and pleading for him, he was pardoned.—And Le More himself has told the said Jordan, 'That the duke at Boulogne asked them, 'Whether the English were not under some apprehension of fear, when their gallees appeared off the Kentish coast?' Clark replied, 'He believed they were.' The duke answered, 'They need not; for that coast is under my protection.' Clark asked his excellency, 'Whether or not he might have the liberty to mention it when he came home?' He answered him, 'That he might.' Then Clark asked the duke, 'When he came over to Boulogne again, what if his excellency should be at Paris?' He replied, 'That he would give directions that he should be well used.' And that the said Le More was not permitted to come over in Clark's boat; but was put on board one of their shallops, and so set on shore by them in England.' And Le More further told the said Jordan, 'That he verily believed, that the said Clark shewed the Secretary of State's pass to the duke at Boulogne.'

Whitehall's Examination.

"Lancelot Whitehall, collector of the customs at Deal, being examined, said, That about Christmas 1705, he had notice of some persons lurking to carry on the French trade. In order to discover them, he thought at last of one Carter, who had been an offender; who, in hopes of pardon, might be willing to help to discover them. John Carter said, 'If he might have time, he would undertake to do it.' About March, Carter discovered Clark; but, he being out of his district, he gave notice to the officers of Sandwich, who took him: And afterwards he was sent for by messengers, to London; and in a little time was discharged, as Mr. Whitehall has been informed. Some time after, Carter informed him of one Bura, who was lying concealed, in order to go over to France; and he had liked to have surpris'd him; but a French sloop came in the mean while and carried him off, about a quarter of an hour before the persons employed by him came. Mr. Whitehall said, That in April Carter informed him, 'That Bura was returned; and he seized him at Dover, and had him examined before the mayor of Dover, who took affidavits of the matter. Mr. Whitehall sent an account of this to the commissioners of the customs (with copies of the said affidavits, now in the hands of Mr. Baker), by his letter dated the 29th of April, 1706, now produced, and to which Mr. Whitehall refers. This gave occasion to Mr. Secretary Harley to send a letter to Mr. Whitehall, dated the 29th May, 1706. The original letter being produced by Mr. Whitehall, he refers to it. To this letter he wrote an answer, of the 31st May, 1706; he produced a copy of that letter, which he transcribed from a foul draught, and therefore could not be positive as to every word in the same; but he is sure it was to the effect and sense of the letter. After he had sent that letter away, the same day, Bara applied to Mr. Whitehall, to help him to a boat, to go to France. Mr. Whitehall said, 'He would not do it, without an order from the Secretary.' And thereupon he sent away another letter to Mr. Secretary Harley the same day: to the copy of which he likewise refers. Mr. Secretary Harley returned an answer to this last letter, by a letter dated the 1st of June, 1706, to which he refers: But Mr. Whitehall did nothing upon the letter: not thinking this letter to contain orders which were full and clear enough. Some time after, Carter brought to Mr. Whitehall three letters, which he had received from Clark, with directions to put them into the hands of the men who were going for France. One of the letters was directed to Canue (or such like name), a merchant at Calais; the second to the commissary at Calais; and the third to the governor or commissary of Boulogne; he is not certain to which of them. Upon which, he wrote to Mr. Secretary Harley, to give him an account of these three letters; and told him, 'That, the wind being now out of the way, he had now an opportunity, if he pleased, of seeing them, and judging if Clark dealt honestly or not.' To this letter he never received any answer. Mr. Whitehall had no copy of this letter with him; his clerk who kept his books, being here in town when Mr. Whitehall came to the Lords Committees upon the summons. Mr. Whitehall being asked 'Why he did not open those letters or stop them?' He said, 'He would not do it, having been reprimanded for what he had done before.' Clark and Bara were generally known on the coast by the distinction of Mr. Harley's spies, especially Clark, who bragged of his being employed on all occasions, and in all companies; but Bara was more cautious, and seldom appeared by day. Mr. Whitehall said, 'That it was his opinion, and the general opinion of people upon the coast, that they carried more intelligence to France than they brought from thence.' He said, 'The trade of France was much suppressed till this encouragement was given by employing so great a number of men. Clark did not confine himself to particular people; but employed any body he could get, by which practice the whole coast is corrupted; so that now a much greater number of officers will be wanting, to prevent the pernicious intercourse with France, than have ever yet been employed."

"Reasons for apprehending Jos. Verge and Daniel Morillion, and examining Valiere, alias Clark, together with some Remarks, and my Opinion thereon, and my Letter.

"The cause of my writing to sir Charles Hedges, 22nd August, 1706, was grounded, 1. Upon Clark's corrupting so many seamen on our coast, in going for France, as appears by first paragraph of said letter. 2. Clark's voluntary boasting of his power, and shewing his licence to Ste. Colledge and Ball, and frequently to many others. 3. His presumption in expressing himself at Walmer Castle to Jos. Wildbore, and others then in company, saying, 'He would protect any one's going to France for 5s.'—About a day after, I saying in a coffee-house, 'How pernicious it might prove for a boat's crew going to Calais, at a time the Dutch transports was at sail:' Clark answers, in the mayor's and my presence, 'That that was not treason: That treason was only to those that carried warlike stores and implements, and such as held traitorous correspondence, and not such men as went over to trade on their own accounts.' Considering said expressions, and finding by Morillion's affidavit, &c. 'That said Clark had the first voyage, in July 1706, sent him with Bayly and Verge, with a letter to the commissary of Calais, who asked him, 'Concerning the Dutch transports in the Downs; the number of men of war, rates; what merchant ships? when they were to sail? Likewise, what frigates cruising off Beachy, Dungeness, North Foreland and Margate, &c.?' And then brought Clark an answer of same letter at return: Said reasons did cause me to examine Clark, who shewed me two licences for his being on our coast of Deal and Dover un molested, under the hand of Mr. Secretary Harley, the one dated in May, the other in June, 1706, for fourteen days; and I observing at the time of his sending over the first boat, the last licence was expired some weeks. What gave me the further jealousy was, in observing that Clark lodged and frequented little houses of ill fame, and kept scandalous and frippery company, and frequently was disguised with strong drink; at which times he was full of talk and of his power, whereby he was known by the name of Clark the spy, by men, women and children, from Margate all along the sea-coast to Rumney Marsh. And as it was generally said, he was a person poor and needy, and but a journeyman wig-maker; and wital be seeming, to my opinion, an open, leeky fellow, and of a shallow capacity; it was not consistent with my reason to believe, that such a person should come at the secrets or knowledge of the councils of France, so as to gather from thence any point of importance by corresponding with the governor or commissary of Calais; but I concluded the contrary, and I believed him a spy upon us: And it is my opinion, through his means, the seamen of our coast for two years last past has been so corrupted, that France has had intelligence to their advantage thereby. As also it appears to me to believe, through Clark's sending over so many sets of boats and men to France, the same gangs has, on their own accounts, and will, gone afterwards so oft as they please; by which means it is my thoughts, France has had often intelligence from said persons, all they knew or was capable of telling, and very possible, through said means, may have been the cause of not only the taking the sundry frigates as was cruising off Dungeness, &c. about them times as they was cruising off their stations; but I fear also might since be the occasion of the loss of the Grafton and Hampton Court, with 20 sail of merchant ships in May last."

Rasbury's Examination.

"James Rasbury, waterman, being examined, says, 'That, about June last was twelve months, a man, whose name he knew afterwards to be Bara, came to him at Whitehall stairs, and asked for a large boat, pretending he was to go to look after a ship that was fallen down the river. The examinant made some difficulty at first, not knowing whither he was to go; but afterwards he was prevailed upon; and did provide a boat, and carried him as far as Margate; into which place he was in a manner forced by the weather; but positively refused to go any further with him.'"

Howard's Examination.

"Isaac Howard, then servant to the said Rasbury, being examined, saith, 'That he went over to Calais with the said Bara, in the boat provided by James Rasbury, from Margate: That, when they landed at Calais, a file of musqueteers took them into custody; and as they were going along, a man speaking something to Bara, Bara struck him a blow in the face with his hand: That they were carried before the commissary of Calais, where he was kindly entertained, and stayed with him about two hours; and, after that, Bara was at liberty all the while he stayed there; and, after two days, the examinant brought Bara back to the Downs.' The examinant further says, 'That, about a month or six weeks after, Bara asked the examinant to go over with him again to France; but he refused.'"

"William Mason, waterman, being examined, says, 'That, at the same time when Isaac Howard refused to go with Bara, the examinant agreed with him, and carried him to Dunkirk. As soon as they landed, Bara went directly to the governor's house; and the examinant stayed below, till Bara came down to him. He found Bara to be well known, and well received there. He stayed there two days; and then the examinant took him into his boat, and set him down near Sanddown castle. This was in the latter end of July or beginning of August last was 12 months.' The examinant farther saith, 'That Bara was very fearful of being seen any where upon the coast, because he was known every where.'"

"This informant saith, 'That, upon Thursday the 20th of this instant February, about six in the evening, being passing into the Park, a gentleman, that he had often seen at Mr. Baker's office, who, he has been since told, is called Mr. Hind, came to him and invited him to drink; which he refused. Then Hind asked him, 'if he would take a walk in the Park;' and he agreed to it: And then Hind asked him, 'What the Lords did with Bara and Clark?' he replied, 'he did not know what.' Then Hind said, 'he heard Bara had squeaked;' and he answered, 'he believed he had.' Then he asked, 'What captain Whitehall, Mr. Bowles, and Jordain, could say in the matter?' he replied, 'he could not tell; but believed they knew a great deal relating to that affair.' Then said Hind, 'I suppose they have got Mr. Harley's letters to shew.' And further enquired, 'If any letters were or could be produced, relating to the ships that were taken: and bid him learn that, if possible.' Carter replied, 'he knew not.' Then the said Hind told him, 'That, if he would discover what he knew, and pick out and learn what others had said, relating to these matters now depending before the Lords Committees (with words to that effect), and go with him to Mr. Harley to inform him the same, he said he should have 100 guineas.' Then further said, 'He should have 200 guineas; out of which he would give said Hind a good pair of gloves: And, for the the said Carter's further encouragement, the said Mr. Harley would give him a good ship: and then bid the said Carter spend what money he pleased, and that freely, where he could get intelligence; and particularly amongst those people now under examination before the Lords.'—And Hind further said, 'That captain Baker was the chief promoter of those matters; and that he should be turned out of his business, when Mr. Harley's trouble was over.' And further said, 'That captain Whitehall was a great rogue;' and was very inquisitive who Mr. Bowles was: Carter replied, 'A gentleman of a good estate, and a great merchant in their country.' After this discourse, they parted, with a promise to meet again in the morning, which they did in Whitehall; and then the said Hind and he went aside; and Hind then told him, 'he had been with Mr. Harley; and that he directed him not to bring the said Carter to him yet; for the matter was to go before the queen as this day; and would see him again to-morrow; and he should go before Mr. Harley.' And then told him also, 'That Mr. Harley enquired if he was an honest man, and thought he might confide in him; fur otherwise, said he, it might do me a mischief.' To which Hind replied to the secretary Harley (as he told Carter) 'He verily believed he might.' And afterwards spoke some reflecting and unbecoming words of the lord Sunderland, and others."

Mr. Bowles' Account of Bland.

"About October last, Bland, a waterman of London, had been hovering about the Downs, to and fro, for near three weeks, in a large wherry, with the addition of a streak higher built, to make her the more bold in the sea. And, after he had been about said time on our coast, in the night, at high water, he, with his two other crew, put his wherry to the shore, and took in the same five bags wool. At which time came to the boat four persons, that got hold of the land-rope, and hauled her in; on which, Bland comes forward with a knife in his hand, in order to cut the rope. But one of the four persons up with a club, and said, 'If he offered to cut the rope, he would knock him down;' Whereupon Bland stept aft; then hope heave out the five bags wool in the sea. Soon after, the boat fell along the shore; out jumps Bland, and runs away: soon he and his two fellows were seized by the constables. Next morning I had both parties before me.—On examination, the four persons, Bland and his two watermen, all proved Bland in the boat. At same time that he went forward with a knife to cut the land-rope, he hove the wool out the boat; then jumped out of her, and run away. He denied the whole, and all; and said, 'he was at another place.'—It appearing plain he was in the boat also by other evidence, I set him by, and examined again his two watermen: the oldest of which said, 'They designed to cross the water, which he reckoned Ostend:' The other said, 'They were bound to the other side, with the wool; and that Bland said, he would make of it as short a trip of it as he could.'—Then I asked Bland his business on board the merchant ships in the Downs the two days past, and particularly on board of five ships last afternoon: he owned that part; and said, 'It was to ask if they would buy of him some brandy, if he should bring them some on board.'—Bland denied ever being at Calais; saying, 'was never there in his life.'—I orders him to prison, where he remained about nine days. Then he was sent to Dover prison: soon after, I heard he was bailed thence. My opinion, on the foregoing reasons, is, That Bland designed for Calais; that his going on board the several merchant ships in the Downs, I believe, was in order to take notice, and give account thereof, and their value: as also, whatsoever intelligence he knew, or was sensible of giving, to our enemies at Calais, &c."

Admiralty-office, 2d Jan. 1707-8.

"Gentlemen; By command of the Prince,

I send you the enclosed copy of a Petition of John Barker, giving an account of one Bland's corresponding with France, to be laid before the right honourable the earl of Sunderland, her majesty's principal secretary of state. I am, &c.

J. BURCHET."

"Secretary to the Earl of Sunderland."

"To his Royal Highness Prince George of Denmark, Lord High Admiral of Great Britain, &c. The humble Representation of John Barker, of Kingston upon Hull, late Master of the Ship Isabella:

"Sheweth; That, on or about the month of August 1705, your petitioner was taken prisoner into France, in the said ship, and confined in Calais prison till the month of August 1706; in the course of which time, one James Fauset, servant to Mr. Bland, a waterman at Billingsgate, came often to see your petitioner; and (amongst other discourse) told your petitioner, 'That his said master Bland had brought him thither, and caused him to be confined in that town, for fear he should lay open to the ministry of this government his illegal practices, of carrying and conveying the news, and other secret affairs and transactions of his own nation, to the French court.' And the said James Fauset did then also declare to your petitioner, 'That to his certain knowledge, his said master held a constant correspondence with several merchants in Calais, and from time to time brought them the newspapers, and other private intelligence, to the detriment of this nation.' And the said Fauset, as his mother (who lives in Weaver Lane, in Southwark) alleges, made his escape from Calais by swimming to the packet-boat, who is since gone a voyage to the West Indies, for fear of harm from his said master. Your petitioner therefore thought it is his duty, humbly to acquaint your Highness of this matter, for the service of the nation, and the better to prevent further disappointments; which will unavoidably happen, whilst such persons remain undetected.

"JOHN BARKER."

To the above Address* the queen gave this Answer:

* "After the presenting of this Address Gregg was respited about a month longer, but still refusing to make any farther discoveries he was executed at Tyburn on the 28th of April, 1708. He left a Paper with the steris wherein he entirely cleared Mr. Harley; though some suspected that gentleman to be the contriver of that Paper, and ascribed the composedness, which appeared in Gregg's countenance, till he came to the place of execution to a firm expectation, which he was made to entertain, of a reprieve; and others gave out that he complained, That there was no trust in man; while, on the other hand, the several Lords of the Committee, appointed to examine

"My Lords; I am sorry that any who have been employed by those in my service should have proved false to their trust, and injurious to the public.—The examples you lay before me will, I do not doubt, be a sufficient warning to keep all matters of importance as secret as may be; and to employ such only, as there shall be good grounds to believe will be faithful."

Address of both Houses on the Invasion intended by the Pretender.] March 4. Mr. Secretary Boyle acquainted the Commons, "That her majesty had commanded him to lay before the House, several Advices received the night before, and that morning, of great preparations at Dunkirk for an immediate Invasion upon England by the French,* and of him, were afterwards reproached, with having endeavoured to suborn Gregg, and engage him, by a promise of pardon, to accuse Mr. Harley.

"Swift, in his Examiners, has several passages to this purpose. In No. 32, for March 15, 1710-11, he writes thus: "And here it may be worth observing, how unanimous a concurrence there is between some persons, once great in power, and a French papist [Guiscard] both agreeing in the great end of taking away Mr. Harley's life, though differing in their methods; the first proceeding by subornation, the other by violence; wherein Guiscard seems to have the advantage, as aiming no further than his life, while the other designed to destroy, at once, both that and his reputation. The malice of both against this gentleman seems to have risen from the same cause, his discovering designs against the government. It was Mr. Harley, who detected the treasonable correspondence of Gregg, and secured him betimes, when a certain great man, who shall be nameless, had, out of the depth of his politics, sent him a caution to make his escape, which would certainly have fixed the appearance of guilt upon Mr. Harley; but, when that was prevented, they would have enticed the condemned criminal with the promise of a pardon, to write and sign an accusation against the secretary. But, to use Gregg's own expression, his death was nothing near so ignominious, as would have been such a life, that must have been saved by prostituting his conscience." Dr. Swift repeats the same charge in the Examiner, No. 33, and was answered in the Medley, No. 26, and in a pamphlet printed in 1711 in 8vo, intitled, A Letter to the Seven Lords of the Committee appointed to examine Gregg. Tindal.

* "A few days after this breach at court," [See the note at p. 662.] "the nation was suddenly alarmed with the news of an Invasion. The French king, to retaliate the late attempt upon Toulon, resolved to carry the war into Great Britain, by sending the pretended prince of Wales to Scotland with a fleet and army, to possess himself of that kingdom, being induced thereto by the hope given him, that the pretended prince of Wales being come to Dunkirk for that purpose." The Letters and Extracts relating thereunto, being read, it was unanimously resolved to present an Address to her majesty, to which they desired the House of Lords to give their concurrence, and both Houses waited the next day on the queen with it, as follows:

"We your majesty's most faithful and obedient subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, do beg leave to return out most hearty thanks to your majesty, for being the Scots were so highly discontented on account of the Union, as to be ripe for a revolt, and ready to join him on his arrival amongst them. The necessary preparations for the expedition were carried on at Dunkirk with all imaginable diligence, and with such secrecy, that the design was rather guessed at than known, till the Pretender himself set out from St. Germain's, when it was no longer a mystery, that he intended to make a descent upon Scotland. The day before his departure, the French king went to St. Germain's to take his leave of him, and wish him success; presented him with a sword enriched with diamonds of a considerable value, and desired him always to remember that it was a French sword. The chevalier de St. George (for this was the name the Pretender assumed in this adventure) answered the compliment with assuring him, That, if it was his good fortune to get possession of the throne of his ancestors, he would not content himself with returning him thanks by letters and ambassadors, but would shew his gratitude by deeds: Nay, he would come in person to acknowledge his majesty's protection and assistance. To which the French king replied, He hoped never to see him again. Upon his arrival at Dunkirk, the Pretender was furnished with very fine tents, a large set of gold and silver plate of curious workmanship, cloaths for his future life-guards, liveries for his household, and other necessaries; towards the charge of which, and of this armament, the pope was said to have contributed a considerable sum of money. The Pretender's motto upon the colours and standards were, 'Dieu et mon droit,' 'God and my right:' 'Nil desperandum Christo, duce et auspice Christo,' 'I ought not to despair, since Christ is my guide and helper:' And 'Cui ventus et mare obediunt, impera, Domine, et fac tranquillitatem;' 'Thou, Lord, whom the winds and sea obey, command, that it be calm.' The preparations of the French at Dunkirk gave great uneasiness to the States General, who concerted with the British ministers the necessary measures for dispelling the storm, which seemed to threaten her Britannic majesty's dominions, of which they gave timely information to the queen; as did likewise her envoy, major-general Cadogan, who had early intelligence of the design from a Jew residing at Dunkirk." Tindal.

graciously pleased to communicate to your parliament, the intelligence you have received of an intended Invasion of this kingdom, by the pretended prince of Wales, supported by a French power.—We are so sensible of the happiness we enjoy under your majesty, and are so affected with the dangerous consequences of such an attempt, both to your person and government, that with hearts full of concern for your majesty's safety, we beseech your majesty, that you will be pleased to take particular care of your royal person; and we, on our parts, are fully and unanimously resolved, to stand by, and assist your majesty with our lives and fortunes, in maintenance of your undoubted right and title to the crown of these realms, against the pretended prince of Wales, and all other your enemies both at home and abroad.—The care your majesty has taken for the defence of your dominions, and particularly in fitting out so great a fleet in so short a time, gives satisfaction and encouragement to all your good subjects, who are likewise very sensible of the zeal the States-general have shewn upon this occasion.—As a farther instance of our duty, we humbly desire, That you will be pleased to order that the laws against papists and nonjurors be put in execution; and, that directions be given to seize and secure such persons, with their horses and arms, as your majesty shall have cause to suspect are disaffected to your person and government.—And as we doubt not but, by the blessing of God upon the continuance of your majesty's care, your enemies will be put to confusion, so we readily embrace this opportunity, to shew your majesty and the whole world, that no attempts of this kind shall deter us from supporting your majesty in a vigorous prosecution of the present war against France, till the monarchy of Spain be restored to the house of Austria, and your majesty have the glory to compleat the recovery of the liberties of Europe."

"My Lords and Gentlemen: I have such entire dependence on the providence of God, and so much trust in the faithful services of my good subjects, that I hope this attempt will prove dangerous only to those who undertake it.—I am extremely sensible of your concern and affection for me and my government, and shall have a very particular regard to the advice you give me upon this occasion.—I am also very well pleased with the justice which you have done the States-general, in taking notice of their timely care for our safety, and their readiness to give us all possible assistance.—The firm resolution which you express upon all occasions of supporting me in bringing this war to a safe and happy conclusion: as it is most essentially obliging to me, so I assure myself, it will mightily dishearten our common enemies, and give the greatest advantage to all our allies."

intended Invasion.] March 11. Her majesty came to the House of Peers and made the Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords, and Gentlemen; I think it necessary to acquaint you, That I have received advices this morning from Ostend, that the French fleet sailed from Dunkirk, Tuesday at three in the morning, northward, with the Pretender on board; as also that sir George Byng had notice of it the same day at ten: and he being very much superior to the enemy both in number and strength, I make no question but, by God's blessing, he will soon be able to give a good account of them. I have also adviced, that ten battalions of my troops were embarked at Ostend, ready to sail with their convoy as there shall be occasion: And I shall continue to take all proper measures for disappointing the enemy's designs."

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and obedient subjects the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, return our most humble thanks to your majesty, for communicating to your parliament the intelligence received of the designs of the Pretender to your crown, assisted by the French king, and for what you have already done towards frustrating this attempt.—We humbly beg your majesty to pursue the most vigorous methods for the total disappointment of this design; in which we firmly assure your majesty of our most hearty and unanimous concurrence. We doubt not but your majesty will soon see such a spirit, and so dutiful a zeal, amongst your subjects, as will entirely dash the hopes of the Pretender, without diminishing the generous assistance you have so long given to your allies for support of the common liberty of Europe. It is with concern, and with just indignation, we hear of a purpose to invade your dominions with so considerable a force. This, as it must depend upon some invitation and encouragement from hence; so it is an undeniable proof, that neither your majesty's piety, nor the mildness of your government, nor the successes of your reign, can reconcile some men to the present establishment, the only sure foundation of our liberties, and the protestant religion: We hope your majesty will always have a just detestation of those persons, who, at a time when this hellish attempt was a-foot, and so near breaking out, were using their endeavours to misrepresent the actions of your best subjects, and create jealousies in your majesty of those who had always served you most eminently and faithfully. And we beseech your majesty not to give so just a cause of uneasiness to your people, as to suffer any such hereafter to have access to your royal person.—We hope for this good effect from so unhappy an occasion, that the universal zeal, which will appear, for the preservation of your majesty's government and the Protestant Succession, will unite us to one another, and cure our mistakes and misappreensions, which have been so industriously and maliciously improved: But, nevertheless, we most humbly offer it to your majesty, as our opinion, that your majesty should principally depend upon and encourage those who have been ever since the Revolution most steady and firm to the interest of the late king, and of your majesty during your happy reign."

The Queen's Answer.] The queen gave this Answer:

"My Lords; I am extremely sensible of your zeal and concern for the safety of my person and government; and very well pleased, to find your thoughts agree so exactly with mine, that no attempt of our enemies against us at home should divert us from prosecuting the war abroad with the greatest vigour; the hopes of which has probably been one of their principal motives to so presumptuous an undertaking.—As I cannot but wish there were not the least occasion of distinction among my subjects; so I must always place my chief dependance upon those who have given such repeated proofs of the greatest warmth and concern for the support of the Revolution*, security of my person, and of the Protestant Succession."

"Most gracious Sovereign; We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, humbly wait on your majesty, to express the great sense we have of your grace and favour, in communicating to us from the throne, the account of the French king's persisting to invade your dominions, and to impose a Pretender upon these realms, over which your majesty is rightful and lawful sovereign.—The small number of ships and troops with which this project is prosecuted, notwithstanding the great naval force your majesty has fitted out with so much expedition, as it ought to be regarded with contempt on the one side, so on the other it gives us just cause to believe, that their chief

* "The queen being much alarmed with the danger of this invasion, saw with what falsehoods she had been abused by those who pretended to assure her there was not now a Jacobite in the nation. For this reason she was observed to make a remarkable variation in her stile. She had never in any speech mentioned the Revolution, or those who had been concerned in it. And many of those, who made a considerable figure about her, studied, though against all sense and reason, to distinguish her title from the Revolution, on which it was plainly founded, and on nothing else. But in this answer and another speech she named the Revolution twice, and said, she would look on those concerned in it as the surest to her interests. She also fixed a new designation on the pretended prince of Wales, and called him the Pretender (particularly in her speech at the close of this session) and he was so called in a new set of Addresses, which, upon this occasion, were made to the queen." Tiqdal.

dependence is upon some of your subjects, whose restless passions and arbitrary principles have, for some years, engaged them in forming designs to undermine and destroy the most happy establishment that the government of this Island was ever founded upon.—The defence of your majesty's person and government, and the support of the Protestant Succession, are things so sacred to us and your people, that as a demonstration of our unfeigned zeal to assist and support your majesty to the utmost of our power, we do, in the name of the Commons of Great Britain, give this assurance, that whatsoever charge you shall be at by augmenting your troops at home, and replacing those you have recalled from abroad, or for such other services as your majesty shall judge necessary upon this extraordinary occasion, shall be effectually made good. And we humbly recommend it to your majesty, that the severest punishments may be inflicted upon such as shall assist in so unnatural a design, as that of betraying your majesty and their country, so we do not doubt but you will give suitable encouragement to all those who shall shew their fidelity by opposing the invader and his accomplices in Scotland, or wherever the descent shall be.—Your majesty wants no incitement to a steady prosecution of the war in which you are engaged for the common cause; yet permit us to take this opportunity to entreat your majesty, that this enterprize may no ways divert your constant vigour, that all the world may see that both your majesty and your people are determined to support your allies in all parts, whatever attempts are made at home.

"May it please your majesty. There can be nothing so dangerous or fatal to the safety of your royal person, and the security of the present happy establishment, as those persons who endeavour to create divisions and animosities among your faithful subjects, or by any artful methods lessen the just esteem your majesty has for those who have so eminently and in so distinguishing a manner commanded your armies and managed your treasure, to the honour and glory of your majesty abroad, and the entire satisfaction of your people at home: We therefore humbly beg leave to beseech your majesty to discountenance all such persons and designs, in the most remarkable manner."

The Queen's Answer.] The queen's Answer was:

"Gentlemen; I give you my hearty thanks for this repeated assurance and certain proof of your zeal for me, and for the Protestant Succession. I am glad your thoughts of the war abroad, so perfectly agree with my firm resolution upon that subject. You may depend that no apprehensions (farther than are reasonable) shall have any influence on my measures while the cause of religion and liberty, with the good affections of my people, are on my side.—I think all who endeavour to make divisions among my faithful subjects, must be mine and the kingdom's enemies; and I shall never counttenance any persons who would go about to lessen the just esteem which I have for those who have done, and continue to do me the most eminent services."

March 19. The Commons having addressed the Queen for the payment of the Arrears due to the French regiments that served in the late war, next day unanimously resolved, "That whoever designedly endeavoured to destroy or lessen the public Credit, especially at a time when the kingdom was threatened with an invasion, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour, and an enemy to her majesty and her kingdom."

The Queen's Speech at the Close of the Session.] April 1. The queen came to the House of Peers, and after giving the royal assent to 16 public and 17 private Acts, made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I cannot conclude this Session, without acknowledging the wise and speedy provisions which you have made for the public security.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; I am also to thank you in particular, for the large and timely supplies which you have provided for the effectual prosecution of the war. I assure you, they shall be carefully and punctually applied for the uses for which they are appointed.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen; I take these (especially at this juncture) to be such undeniable proofs of your zeal and affection to my service, as must fully convince every body of your doing me the justice to believe, that all which is dear to you is perfectly safe under my government, and must be irrecoverably lost, if ever the designs of a Popish Pretender, bred up in the principles of the most arbitrary government, should take place.—I am satisfied, that very false representations of the true inclinations and interests of my people, must have been made by some of my subjects, who have given encouragement to this desperate attempt; since, without something of that nature, it seems very little consisting with the usual precautions of our enemies, to hazard the expence and disappointment of so vain and ill-grounded an undertaking.—However, it is certain, we must be all inexcusable, if we do not take warning from this attempt, to complete what may be necessary for our security at home, and the discouraging the like for the future; to which, by God's blessing, nothing shall be wanting on my part.—And, to the same end, I must recommend to you, at your return into your several counties, to use your utmost care and diligence in putting the laws in execution against papists, and all others disaffected to my government, and in making them pay towards the public taxes to the full of what the law requires from them: Nothing being more reasonable, than that they, who by their principles and practices encourage, if not actually foment, such disturbances, should doubly contribute to the charge of quieting them, and securing the kingdom's peace, and should know

Then the Lord Chancellor, by her majesty's command, said, "My Lords and Gentlemen, Her majesty's royal will and pleasure is, That this parliament shall be prorogued to Tuesday the 13th day of this instant April; and this parliament is prorogued accordingly."

"Then the parliament was prorogued to the 13th of April; and, two days after, was dissolved by proclamation, and writs were issued out for the elections of a new parliament. On the 26th of April, a proclamation was published, commanding all the peers of North-Britain to assemble at Holyrood house in Edinburgh, the 17th of June, to nominate and chuse, by open election, the sixteen peers, who were to sit and vote in the House of Peers, in the ensuing parliament of Great-Britain, pursuant to the twenty-second Article of the Treaty of Union; and accordingly the dukes of Hamilton, Montrose, and Roxburgh; the marquis of Lothian; and the earls of Orkney, Crawford, Rothes, Leven, Mar, Loudoun, Wemyss, Roseberry, Glasgow, Northesk, Seafield, and Illy; some of whom were justly suspected of disaffection to the present settlement. But in England, the just fears and visible dangers, to which the attempt of the invasion had exposed the nation, had so good an effect, that the elections, for the most part, fell on men well-affected to the government, and zealously set against the Pretender.

"Four days after the dissolution of the parliament, Edward Griffin, late lord Griffin, John lord Clermont, and Charles Middleton, two sons of the earl of Middleton, and colonel Francis Wauchope, who had been taken on board the Salisbury, were brought up to London; and, having been examined by a committee of the privy-council, were committed prisoners to the Tower for high-treason, by warrant of the earl of Sunderland, secretary of state; and, two days after, the Irish officers, taken also on board the same ship, were, for the same crime, committed to Newgate. Several persons were likewise seized in Scotland, and sent up to London.

"The removal of Mr. Secretary Harley having occasioned some other vacancies, Robert Walpole,* a gentleman of quick parts and masterly eloquence, was, in Mr. St. John's room, made secretary at war: and the place of secretary to the marines, which had been likewise held by Mr. St. John, was given to Mr. Josiah Burchet. Some time after, the queen delivered to the earl of Cholmondeley the staff of comptroller of her household; and, about the middle of April, her majesty made a promotion of general officers, by which the earl of Rivers was advanced to the post of general of the horse.—Some time before, orders and commissions were delivered for new-raising the regiments of Montjoy, Gorges, Almut, Mordaunt, Wade, Maccartney, and lord Mark Kerr, which suffered most at the battle of Almanza; and their officers, who were prisoners in France, were supplied by others. About the same time, the earl of Wemys and sir John Leake were added to the lord high-admiral's council. On the 22d of April, her majesty nominated Dr. William Fleetwood to the bishopric of St.

his private secretary; and the subsequent nomination of lord Somers to the presidentship of the council, completed the triumph of the party. Walpole himself was not overlooked in the change. He was selected by Marlborough as the most proper person to succeed his favourite, St. John, in the delicate office of Secretary at War; an office which required a person of no less prudence than ability. During the absence of Marlborough, the Secretary at War transacted the business of the department personally with the queen; he was to correspond officially and confidentially with the commander in chief; and had the difficult task to conciliate the capricious temper of the duchess of Marlborough, who interfered in all business, governed her husband with the most absolute sway, and who now treated the queen with those marks of disrespect, which finally occasioned her own disgrace, and the fall of the Whig administration.—On the decease of sir Thomas Littleton, Walpole was appointed Treasurer of the Navy, which office he held for a short time, with that of Secretary at War. In addition to his parliamentary abilities, Walpole endeared himself to Godolphin by activity and punctuality in business, order and precision in accounts, great knowledge of finance, and the most engaging manners. The treasurer admitted him into his most secret councils, entrusted him with the delicate office of composing the speeches from the throne, and from the time of Harley's resignation, committed to him the management of the House of Commons. Nothing will place the prudent and conciliating character of the young senator in a stronger light, than that Godolphin and Marlborough, who never cordially coalesced with the Whigs, should take into their confidence, one who had proved himself, and still continued to prove himself, so ardently attached to that party; at the same time he was so far from forfeiting the favour of the Whigs, that he was equally beloved and trusted by their leaders." Coxe's Walpole.

Asaph, vacant by the death of Dr. Beveridge, and sir William Giffard was appointed governor of Greenwich hospital; and Hugh Boscawen warden of the stannaries.

"The Scotch privy-council being dissolved by virtue of the late act, entitled, 'An Act for rendering the Union of the two kingdoms more intire and complete,' the queen, on the 10th of May, appointed the first Privy-Council of Great-Britain; consisting of, The archbishop of Canterbury; William, lord Cowper, lord-chancellor of Great-Britain; Sidney, earl of Godolphin, lord-high-treasurer; Thomas, earl of Pembroke, lord-president; John, duke of Newcastle, lord-privy-seal; William, duke of Devonshire, lord-steward; James, duke of Ormond, Henry, marquis of Kent, lord-chamberlain; James, earl of Derby, Thomas, earl of Stamford, Charles, earl of Sunderland, principal secretary of state; Charles Bodvile, earl of Radnor, Charles, earl of Berkeley, Francis, earl of Bradford, Hugh, earl of Cholmondeley, Henry, lord bishop of London, William, lord Dartmouth, Henry Boyle, principal secretary of state; Thomas Coke, vice-chamberlain; sir John Trevor, master of the rolls; sir Thomas Trevor, lord-chief-justice; sir Charles Hedges, James Vernon, John Howe, Thomas Erle. At the same time John Povey, Edward Southwell, and Christopher Musgrave were sworn clerks of the council.

"On the 15th of May, the lord Griffin, one of the prisoners taken on board the Salisbury, being attainted, by outlawry for high-treason, committed in the reign of king William, was brought to the bar of the queen's bench, and, after reading of the outlawry, being asked, What he had to say, why execution should not be awarded against him? He said, in his defence, 'That he was neither in arms, nor in council with the enemy; but was forced by the French court upon the expedition, intirely against his judgment and inclination, notwithstanding he had expressed his dislike of it, as a rash and foolish attempt;' adding, 'That he threw himself at the queen's feet for mercy, and hoped the favour of the court.' His defence being judged intirely foreign to the outlawry upon which he was brought to the bar, the court made a rule for his execution, as is usual in such cases: But though the queen was prevailed with to sign the warrant for sentence to pass upon him, a reprieve, however, for a fortnight, was sent the night before to the Tower; and that, expiring the last day of June, was then renewed, and afterwards continued from month to month, till he died a natural death in the Tower, about two years after.

"On the 20th of May, Meinhard, duke of Schomberg, and John Smith, late Speaker of the House of Commons, who, about this time, was constituted Under-Treasurer and Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the room of Mr. Secretary Boyle, were sworn of the privy-council, as was the duke of Somerset a week after; and, towards the latter end of the same month, the duke of Queensberry was made a peer of

"In the month of July, an ambassador from the emperor of Fez and Morocco arrived in Great-Britain with a present of six lions for the queen; but upon his coming to Hammersmith near London, he was put under an easy confinement by way of reprisal for the restraint put upon captain Delaval, the queen's envoy in that country, before he reached that court; which happened upon a false report, that some ill usage had been offered to Hamet Ben Hamet Cardenas, the late Morocco ambassador here. But, upon better information, the captain was released, as was also the Morocco ambassador. However the British envoy did not think fit to go in person to the court of Morocco, and only sent thither, with her majesty's letter and present, Mr. Corbiere, his secretary, who was received with great demonstration of respect.

"About this time an indignity offered in London to count de Matucof, the Muscovite ambassador, was highly resented, not only by himself, but also by all concerned in the preservation of the rights and privileges of public ministers. Thomas Morton, a laceman in King-street, Covent-Garden, and some other tradesmen, to whom the ambassador owed several sums of money, amounting in the whole to about 300*l.*, finding he had taken his audience of leave, and being apprehensive, that he would leave the kingdom without paying his debts, though a merchant in the city, trading to Muscovy, had set a day for satisfying most of them, held several consultations together, and at last resolved to arrest him; which was done accordingly, on the 21st of July, in the open street, with several aggravating circumstances. For the ambassador, not knowing at first the reason of his being seized, imagining he was set upon by villains, struggled in his own defence, and was ill-used and overpowered by the bailiffs, who carried him to a spunging-house at the sign of the Black Raven, where he was detained till the earl of Feversham and a merchant of the city had bailed him. The ambassador, incensed at this insult, in violation of the laws of nations, applied himself for redress to the government; and the next day wrote a letter to Mr. Secretary Boyle, wherein he urged, "That the queen, who was so jealous of the respect due to the ambassadors of crowned heads, and had so gloriously vindicated the honour of the earl of Manchester, her ambassador at Venice, and caused a rigorous punishment to be inflicted on the officers of the custom-house, some of whom were set in the pillory, and others condemned to the galleys, only for insulting the gentlemen of his retinue, could not but most justly revenge the affront lately put upon him by a corporal punishment. That count Zobor, who was delivered up to the discretion of the king of Sweden for picking a quarrel with his envoy, likewise afforded an instance of the satisfaction he re-

greater earnest, than to avoid all the ill consequences of this affair. For in case the criminals were connived at, under any colour whatsoever, he should be obliged to take other measures, and retire without recreditentials, leaving the whole matter to the management of his Czarish majesty, his master, as the protector of his injured honour, and of his abused minister."

"At the same time count Gallas, the emperor's envoy, the baron Spanheim, ambassador from the king of Prussia, and several other foreign ministers, thinking themselves concerned in the affront put upon their character, demanded a due reparation for the same: all which having been laid before the queen, who still continued at Windsor, she expressed a very great resentment for the indignity offered to the Muscovite ambassador, and commanded an extraordinary council to be summoned on the 25th of July on that occasion. Mr. Morton, and some other creditors, with the attorney, bailiffs, and other persons concerned in the arrest of the ambassador, having been examined, were committed to the custody of several messengers, and ordered to be prosecuted with the utmost severity, according to law. The next day, before Mr. Boyle was returned from Windsor, the Muscovite ambassador wrote to him another letter, importing, "That, as he had not received any testimony of concern, or regret, either from the queen, or any of her ministers, since he had sent him his complaints in writing, he found himself obliged to press for his departure; and therefore intreated Mr. Secretary to get a passport for him as soon as possible." Mr. Boyle acquainted the ambassador, "That seven of the principal accomplices, in the desperate attempt upon his person, were committed to prison, and under prosecution, by order of the privy-council, who were to meet again about that affair as soon as possible." But the ambassador, being impatient to leave the kingdom, wrote a third letter on the 27th of July to Mr. Secretary, for a passport for himself and family. Mr. Boyle wrote, two days after, a letter to the ambassador, acquainting him, "That he had that morning sent him the passport he desired: that orders had been issued out to the officers of the custom-house to wait on him, to cause his equipages to be transported without any molestation; and he hoped, they had already done that to his satisfaction: that an extraordinary meeting of the queen's privy-council was to be held that day, to enquire further into the circumstances of that dismal affair; that they had made a strict search after those, who were any ways concerned therein; and had caused ten others to be apprehended: that express orders had been given again to the attorney-general, to prosecute the seventeen persons now confined, with the utmost rigour; and to omit nothing, that might contribute towards the making him the most signal reparation, that could be, according to our law." Notwithstanding these assurances, the ambassador refused the ordinary presents made to ministers of his character, which were offered him by the queen, and retired in disgust into Holland, from whence he transmitted a memorial, with a letter from the czar of Muscovy to the queen, dated the 17th of September, wherein that prince demanded no less than "that a capital punishment, according to the rigour of the law, be inflicted on all the accomplices of the indignity put upon the person of his ambassador; or, at least, such a one, as was adequate to the nature of the affront, which every particular person put upon the ambassador." Such a punishment being altogether inconsistent with the laws of England, this unlucky affair gave no small uneasiness to the queen and ministers*.

"On the 28th of October, about ten in the forenoon, died prince George of Denmark, in the 56th year of his age, after he had been twenty-five years and some months married to the queen. He had, for many years, been troubled with an asthma, and sometimes spitting of blood, which often endangered his life; and, about three months before, a dropsical humour, with which he had been formerly afflicted, seized his legs and most parts of his body. This was attended with a sleepiness, cough, and an increase of the asthma; and, on Saturday the 23d of October, the violence of the cough produced a spitting of blood, and an increase of the sleepiness, with an addition of convulsive motions of the tendons; which symptoms not yielding to the remedies administered by his own and several other physicians, he fell into a suffocation, and which neither bleeding, nor a vomit, could relieve him, so that he soon after expired. The queen, who, during the whole course of her marriage, had been a most tender and affectionate wife to him, in his last illness, which lasted some years, would never leave his bed, but sat up, sometimes half the night in the bed by him, with such care and concern that she was looked on very deservedly as a pattern in this respect. The prince was duke of Cumberland, Lord High-Admiral of Great Britain and Ireland, generalissimo of all her majesty's forces both by sea and land, and warden of the Cinque-ports. He had shewed himself brave in the wars both in Denmark and in Ireland. His temper was mild and gentle. He had made a good progress in mathematics. He had travelled through France, Italy, and Germany, and knew much more than he could well express; for he spoke acquired languages ill and ungracefully. He was free from all vice. He meddled little in business, even after the queen's accession to the crown. He was so gained by the Tories by the act which they carried in his favour, that he was much in their interest. He was unhappily prevailed with to take on him the post of Lord High-Admiral, of which he understood little, but was fatally led by those, that had credit with him, who had not all of them his good qualities, but had both an ill temper and bad principles. His being bred to the sea gained him some credit in those matters. In the conduct of our affairs, as great errors were committed, so great misfortunes had followed on them. As soon as the prince had resigned his last breath, the queen came from Kensington to her palace at St. James's, where she resided the whole winter. On the 11th of November, the body of his royal highness was carried from Kensington, to the Painted Chamber, within the palace of Westminster, where having lain in state till the 13th, it was that night interred in the Abbey-church, with all the pomp consistent with a private funeral.

* Mr. Addison gave the following account of this affair, in a letter to the earl of Manchester, dated at the Cock-pit, July 23, 1708, O. S. and published in Cole's Memoirs of Affairs of State, p. 546. "We had an unlucky business about two days ago, that befel the Muscovite ambassador, who was arrested going out of his house and rudely treated by the bailiffs. He was then upon his departure for his own country, and the sum under an hundred pounds that stopped him; and, what makes the business worse, he has been punctual in his payments, and had given order, that this very sum should be paid the day after. However, as he is very well convinced, that the government entirely disapproves such a proceeding, there are no ill consequences apprehended from it. Your lordship knows, that the privileges of ambassadors are under very little regulation in England; and I believe, that a bill will be promoted in the next parliament for setting them upon a certain foot; at least it is what we talk of in both offices on this occasion."

"The death of prince George occasioned some alterations at court; for the earl of Pembroke was, on the 25th of November, advanced to the post of Lord High-Admiral, which he entered on with great uneasiness, and a just apprehension of the difficulty of maintaining it well in a time of war. He was at that time both lord-president of the council, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The earl of Wharton had the government of Ireland, who made Mr. Addison his secretary, and the lord Somers was made lord-president of the council. The great capacity and inflexible integrity of the Lord Somers would have made his promotion to this post very acceptable to the Whigs; at any juncture, but it was most particularly so at this time; for it was expected, that propositions for a general peace would be quickly made: and so they reckoned, that the management of that, upon which not only the safety of the nation, but of all Europe depending, was in sure hands, when he was set at the head of the counsels, upon whom neither ill practices nor false colours were like to make any impression. Thus the minds of all those, who were truly zealous for the present constitution, were much quieted by this promotion, though their jealousies had a deep root, and were not easily removed.

ing the duke of Marlborough's successes this year, and the queen's kind letter to him on occasion of his victory at Oudenard,* his interest

“I want words to express the joy I have, that you are well after your glorious success; for which, next to God Almighty, my thanks are due to you. And indeed I can never say enough for all the great and faithful services you have ever done me. But be so just as to believe, I am as truly sensible of them as a grateful heart can be, and shall be ready to shew it upon all occasions. I hope you cannot doubt of my esteem and friendship for you, nor think, that, because I differ with you in some things, it is for want of either. No, I do assure you, if you were here; I am sure you would not think me so much in the wrong in some things, as I fear you do now. I am afraid my letter should come too late to London, and therefore dare say no more, but that I pray God Almighty to continue his protection over you, and send you safe home again, and be assured I shall ever be sincerely

“I have the honour of your majesty's letter of the 6th, and am very thankful for all your goodness to me. And I am sure, it will be always my intention, as well as my duty, to be ready to venture my life for your service.

“As I had formerly told your majesty, that I am desirous to serve you in the army, but not as a minister, I am every day more and more confirmed in that opinion. And I think myself obliged upon all accounts on this occasion to speak my mind freely to you. The circumstances in this last battle, I think, shew the hand of God; for we were obliged, not only to march five leagues that morning, but to pass a river before the enemy, and to engage them before the whole army was passed, which was a visible mark of the favour of heaven to you and your arms.

“Your majesty shall be convinced from this time, that I have no ambition, or any thing to ask for myself or family. But I will end the few years, which I have to live, in endeavouring to serve you, and to give God Almighty thanks for his infinite goodness to me. But, as I have taken this resolution to myself, give me leave to say, that I think you are obliged in conscience, and as a good Christian, to forgive, and to have no more resentments to any particular person or party, but to make use of such as will carry on this just war with vigour; which is the only way to preserve our religion and liberties, and the crown on your head. Which that you may long enjoy, and be a blessing to your people, shall be the constant wish and prayer of him, that is with the greatest truth and duty, Madam, &c.”

with her began greatly to decline, through the intrigues of Mrs. Masham and Mr. Harley, all the summer*.

* The Duchess of Marlborough, in the Account of her Conduct, p. 206, observes, that the duke was perfectly sensible of the change in her majesty towards him; and, having complained of it in a letter to the duchess, she sent that letter to the queen, inclosed in the following one from herself:

“I cannot help sending your majesty this letter, to shew how exactly lord Marlborough agree with me in my opinion, that he has now no interest with you; though when I said so in the church on Thursday (August 19, 1708), you were pleased to say it was untrue. And yet I think he will be surprized to hear, that when I had taken so much pain to put your jewels in a way, that I thought you would like, Mrs. Masham could make you refuse to wear them in so unkind a manner; because that was a power she had not thought fit to exercise before. I will make no reflections upon it; only that I must needs observe, that your majesty chose a very wrong day to mortify me, when you were just going to return thanks for a victory obtained by lord Marlborough.”

In answer to this, the queen wrote the duchess these few words:

“Sunday.

“After the commands you gave me on the Thanksgiving-day of not answering you, I should not have troubled you with these lines, but to return the duke of Marlborough's letter safe into your hands, and for the same reason do not say any thing to that, nor to yours, which inclosed it.”

Upon receiving this Letter, the duchess wrote again as follows:

“I should not trouble your majesty, with any answer to your last short letter, but to explain what you seem to mistake in what I said at church. I desired you not to answer me there, for fear of being overheard. And this you interpret, as if I had desired you not to answer me at all, which was far from my intention. For the whole end of my writing to you so often, was to get your answer to several things, in which we differed, that, if I was in the wrong, you might convince me of it, and I should very readily have owned my mistakes. But since you have not been pleased to shew them to me, I flatter myself, that I have said several things to you that are unanswerable. And, I hope some time or other you will find leisure to reflect upon them, and will convince lord Marlborough, that he is mistaken in thinking, that he has no credit with you, by hearkening sometimes to his advice; and then, I hope, you will never more be troubled with disagreeable letters from me: for I should be much better pleased to say and do every thing you like. But I should think myself wanting in my duty to you, if I saw you so much in the wrong, as without prejudice or passion I really think you are in several particulars I have mentioned, and did not tell you of it: and the rather because nobody else cares to speak out upon so ungrateful a subject. The word 'command,' which you use at the beginning of your letter, is very unfitly supposed to come from me. For though I have always writ to you as a friend, and lived with you as such for so many years with all the truth and honesty and zeal for your service, that was possible; yet I shall never forget, that I am your subject, nor cease to be a faithful one."

"Through the whole summer after Mr. Harley's dismissal, the queen continued to have secret correspondence with him. And, that this might be the better managed, she staid all the sultry season, even when the prince was panting for breath, in that small house she had formerly purchased at Windsor, which, though as hot as an oven, was then said to be cold, because from the park such persons, as Mrs. Masham had a mind to bring to her majesty, could be let in privately by the garden. "And when," (continues the duchess of Marlborough) "upon the death of the prince, one would have thought, that her majesty's real grief would have made her avoid every place and every object, that might sensibly revive the remembrance of her loss, she chose for her place of retirement his closet, and for some weeks spent many hours in it every day. I was amazed at this; and, when I spoke to her of it, she seemed surpris'd, just like a person who on a sudden become sensible of her having done something she would not have done, had she duly considered. But the true reason of her majesty's chusing this closet to sit in, was, that the backstairs belonging to it came from Mrs. Masham's lodgings, who by that means could secretly bring to her whom she pleased. And that a correspondence was thus carried on with Mr. Harley, became every day more and more manifest by the difficulties and objections, which her majesty had learnt to raise against almost every thing proposed by her ministers. Nay, it is well known that Mr. Harley and his associates, when at length they had compassed their designs, and got into the management of affairs, did often (both in their cups and out of them) boast, that they, while the queen's ministers were asleep, were frequently at court, giving advice in secret, how to perplex them in all their measures.

"But they were much mistaken, if they imagined, that their proceedings at the time I am speaking of were so entirely covered. The ministers were fully convinced of the truth, and frequently represented to her majesty, what a discouragement it was to them in their endeavours for her service, to find, that she had no confidence in them, but was influenced by the counsel of others, who counter-worked the earls of Loudon, Rivers and Essex; the lord Ferrers and Mr. Peregrine Bertie, were sworn of the privy-council; as, a little before, were

them in every instance. Upon this subject I myself wrote and spoke a great deal to her with my usual plainness and zeal. But finding, not only that I could make no impression on her in this respect, but that her change towards me in particular was every day more and more apparent, I at length went to her, and begged to know what my crime was, that had wrought in her so great an alteration. This drew from the queen a letter, dated October 26, 1709, wherein she charges me with inveteracy (as her word is) against poor Masham; and with having nothing so much at heart as the ruin of my cousin. In speaking of the misunderstanding betwixt her majesty and me, she says, they are for nothing, that she knows of, but because she cannot see with my eyes, and hear with my ears. And adds, that it is impossible for me to recover her former kindness, but that she shall behave herself to me, as the duke of Marlborough's wife, and her groom of the stole. This declaration so plain and express of her majesty's thorough change towards me was the more extraordinary, as in this same letter are these words: 'you have asked me once or twice, if you had committed any fault, that I was so changed; and I told you, no, because I do not think it a crime in any one not to be of my mind.' Upon the receipt of letter, I immediately set myself to draw up a long narrative of a series of faithful services for about 26 years past; of the great sense, the queen formerly had of my services; of the great favour I had been honoured with on account of them; of the use I had made of that favour; and of my losing it now by the artifice of my enemies, and particularly of one whom I had raised out of the dust. And, knowing how great a respect her majesty had for the writings of certain eminent divines, I added to my narrative the directions given by the author of the whole Duty of Man with relation to friendship; the directions in the Common Prayer-book before the Communion with regard to reconciliation, together with the rules laid down by bishop Taylor upon the same head: and I concluded with giving my word to her majesty, that, if after reading these, she would please only to answer in two words, that she was still of the same opinion, as when she wrote that harsh letter, which occasioned her this trouble, I would never more give her the least trouble upon any subject, but the business of my office, as long as I should have the honour to continue her servant; assuring her, that, however she might be changed towards me, and how much soever we might still differ in opinion, I should ever remember, that she was my mistress and my queen, and should always pay her the respect due from a faithful servant and dutiful subject. I sent from St. Albans this narrative, which she promised to read and answer. And, ten days after, writing to me upon chief-justice Holt, the duke of Queensbury, the earls of Seafield, Scarborough, and Rapelagh, and lord Coningsby. The earl of Cholmondeley was made treasurer of the household in the room of the earl of Bradford, deceased, sir Thomas Felton comptroller, and Mr. Edmund Dunch master of the household. Sir James Montague attorney general, and Mr. Robert Eyre solicitor-general. The duke of Dorset was appointed the 3d of December, constable of Dover, and warden of the Cinque Ports.*

This summer was, abroad, distinguished by the victory obtained at Oudenarde, which though both glorious and advantageous to the allies, was not so decisive as either that of Blenheim or Ramillies, the French making good their retreat and repelling all the attempts that were made to put them into confusion.—The siege of Lisle, one of the strongest places in the world, was next undertaken by the confederate generals, in the sight of an army superior to their own; which had posted themselves so advantageously, as to cut off all communication between the besiegers and Brussels; whereby ammunition of all sorts began to fail; and the consequences might have been greatly calamitous, if general Webb had not, with incredible conduct and bravery, both covered the grand convoy committed to his charge, and with a party of but 6,000, defeated an army of between 23, and 24,000, which had been detached to make sure of a supply which was of such immediate importance to the confederates. But the merit of this gallant action was by Mr. Cardonnel, the duke of Marlborough's secretary, ascribed solely to lieutenant general Cadogan, who did not come up till it was entirely over, and the enemy retreating in disorder; without the least mention of Mr. Webb, who thereupon quitted the army in disgust, and very frankly set forth the injury which had been done him, both to the queen and the whole nation.—In this interval the elector of Bavaria invested Brussels, but was kept at bay by the governor and garrison till the confederates passed the Scheldt to their relief: Upon which he abandoned the siege in confusion leaving his artillery and wounded men behind him.—The town of Lisle had already capitulated, and now the citadel did the same. And the reduction of Ghent, which had been before betrayed to the French, finished another occasion, she said she had not leisure yet to read all my papers, but, when she had, she would send me some answer. But none ever came, nor had my papers any apparent effect of her majesty, except that, after my coming to town, as she was passing by me, in order to receive the Communion, she looked with much good nature, and very graciously smiled upon me. But the smile and pleasant look, I had reason afterwards, to think, were given to bishop Taylor and the Common-Prayer-book, and not to me."

the campaign on that side.—In Spain the duke of Orleans reduced Tortosa, Denin and Alicant: but to countervail these advantages sir John Leake conquered Sardinia, and general Stanhope Minorca: and in the West Indies Commodore Wager had an engagement with the Spanish galleons, in which the admiral blew up, another galleon was run ashore, and the rear-admiral was taken; being mounted with 54 brass guns, and her lading of an immense value.

FIRST SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Meeting of the New Parliament.] November 16, 1708. The New Parliament met this day with great advantage; for the present ministry was now wholly such as gave an entire content to all, who wished well to the public affairs; and the great successes abroad silenced those who were otherwise disposed to find fault and complaint. The queen did not think it decent to come to parliament during this whole session; and therefore, having granted a Commission under the great seal, appointed the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, the lord treasurer, the lord-steward, and the master of the horse, to represent her royal person, the Commons were desired to come up to the House of Peers, and hear the commission read. Which done, the lord chancellor signified to the Commons, that they should immediately proceed to the choice of a Speaker, and present him the Thursday following.

Sir Richard Onslow chosen Speaker.] The Commons being returned to their House, the lord William Powlet moved to chuse for their Speaker sir Richard Onslow, a worthy man, entirely zealous for the government, and very acceptable to the Whigs. He was seconded by sir William Strickland. But major general Mordaunt, by way of irony, proposed, that they should chuse Mr. Joddrel, the clerk of the House, 'who, having been assistant to good Speakers, to indifferent ones, and to the worst, seemed to be as well qualified for that station as any body.' But at last, general Mordaunt supported the lord Powlet's motion, commended sir Richard Onslow's experience and integrity; and added, 'That, being possessed of a good estate, he did not lie open to the temptations, that might bias persons, who had their fortunes to make against the interest of their country.'

And the House generally calling upon him to the chair: sir Richard Onslow, in his place, desired, that the House would please to excuse him, in respect of the many difficulties, that attended the discharge of so great a trust; declaring that his intercession to them proceeded from a real sense of his own inability, lest the service of the public might receive any prejudice by his incapacity; withal giving the House his humble thanks, for the great honour they had done in proposing him. Upon which the House unanimously calling upon him to the chair; the lord Wm. Powlett and sir Wm. Strickland conducted him from his place to the chair: but upon the first step he again said, that he was obliged to give them the trouble of a second request, that they would be pleased to excuse him, and out of the great many present to elect a more able person for so great a service; assuring them, that it proceeded not so much from form, as the sense of his own inabilities; and that it would be an insupportable trouble to him, if the public should suffer by any defects of his; and therefore again most earnestly desired to be excused. But the House cried, 'No, No.' And thereupon he sat down in the chair and the Sergeant at Arms came up, and laid the mace upon the table.* After this both Houses adjourned to the 18th.

Indeed, the Tories perceived they had so little strength in this parliament, that they resolved to lie silent, and to wait for such advantages, as the circumstances of the affairs might afford them. Sir R. Onslow, Speaker.

The New Speaker presented, and approved of.] Nov. 18. The Lords Commissioners, in their robes, being seated on a form placed between the throne and the woolsock; commanded the deputy gentleman usher of the Black Rod to go to the House of Commons, and desire their attendance in the House of Peers. Who being come;

Sir Richard Onslow said, "My lords, The Commons of Great Britain, assembled by virtue of the queen's royal writ, and in obedience to commands, have elected their Speaker. Being made the unworthy subject of that choice, I am obliged to tender myself for approbation. May my most humble intercession to your lordships to disapprove this choice obtain pardon; proceeding not so much from form, as a sense of my own inabilities; lest the service of the crown, and that of Great Britain, should suffer by any defects of mine; a misfortune of that nature being much too great for me to support myself under."

Then the Lord Chancellor (Cowper) said,

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; By virtue of her majesty's commission to us (among other lords) directed, we do, in her majesty's name, approve of the choice you have made, of so worthy a person to be your Speaker: and do allow of, and confirm you, sir Richard Onslow, to be their Speaker."

The Speaker's Speech thereon.] Then Mr. Speaker said, "It is my duty, to submit most humbly to acknowledge this honour conferred on me; to give assurances of my utmost endeavours to deserve the continuance of the queen's favours; and to supply my inabilities by a faithful and diligent application to the dispatch of those great and arduous affairs for which this parliament is convened. In discharge of my duty to the Commons; I demand Liberty of Speech; that their Debates may be free, the better to enable them to make suitable provisions for the support of the common cause. That nothing may interrupt the attendance of the members, freedom from arrest for themselves and servants; and that their properties may not be disturbed. And, that the queen may have a true state of their proceedings, access to her royal person, so often as the service of the public represents it necessary.—My lords; I presume to ask as ample a grant of these privileges as ever were made to any preceding Commons; believing, no prince ever had any more loyal, or more deserving so great a trust.—My lords; The very melancholy and unhappy occasion for opening this parliament by commission obliges my intercession to your lordships, for such a favourable representation to the queen, as may incline her majesty to pardon my involuntary errors, and that such only be imputed to the unfortunate author; believing, no consideration can ever prevail with me, intentionally, to do any act contrary to the true interest of the crown, which, undeniably, is that of my country; to which service, as I always have, I now entirely resign myself, without any other consideration whatsoever."

Then the Lord Chancellor said, "Mr. Speaker; We have it in command from her majesty to let you know, that her majesty is fully assured of the discretion and temper, as well as the good affections, of the House of Commons: and as to the suit you have made in their name; that her majesty is pleased to grant to them all their privileges, in as full a manner as they were at any time granted or allowed by any of her royal predecessors: and as to what you have prayed in relation to yourself; you may be assured, her majesty will put the most favourable construction on your words and actions, in the execution of your duty of Speaker of the House of Commons, if ever you should stand in need of it; whose loyalty, integrity, great experience, and abilities in the business and usages of parliament, are so well known."

The Queen's Speech, by Commissioners, on opening the Session.] Then the Lord Chancellor opened the session with the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords, and Gentlemen; In pursuance of the authority given us by her majesty's commission under the great seal, among other things, to declare the causes of her majesty's calling this parliament;—we are, by her majesty's command, in the first place, to observe to you, that the extraordinary length of this year's campaign hath obliged her majesty to defer your meeting longer than otherwise she would have done; that you might be informed with the greater certainty of the state and posture of the war, in order to your resolutions for the ensuing year.—This necessary delay hath now so far shewn us the success of affairs abroad, as that, whether you consider the places acquired by the allies, or the farther and continued proofs given this last year of their superior courage and conduct, (which, as to the future part of the war, is equal to all other advantages,) we may, with thanks to God, and justice to those he hath been pleased to use as instruments in this great work, conclude, that, upon the whole, we are brought much nearer than we were the last session, to the end of our undertaking this war, the reducing the dangerous power of France, and settling such a peace as may secure itself from being violated.—Her majesty therefore commands us to assure you, she hath not the least doubt, but that this parliament will be of the same opinion with her last, as to the vigorous prosecution of the war, and the ends of it; believing it impossible, the representative of the British nation can endure to think of losing the fruits of all our past endeavours, and the great advantages we have gained (particularly in this present year,) by submitting at last to an insecure peace.—And therefore, since probably nothing can hinder our success abroad, for the time to come, but misunderstandings among ourselves at home, we have it in command, to conjure you, by your duty to God and to her majesty, your zeal for the Protestant religion, your love for your country, and the regard you cannot but have for the liberty of Europe in general, to avoid all occasion of divisions, which are ever hurtful to the public; but will more especially be so at this juncture, when the eyes of all our neighbours are upon you with a very particular concern; and your unanimity and good agreement will be the greatest satisfaction and encouragement to all our allies.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; You cannot but be convinced, that the several parts of the war, which were provided for by the last parliament, will require your support, at least in the same degree; but in Flanders the nature of the war is much altered, by the great advances made there towards entering into France; which hath so far alarmed our enemies, that they are drawing more troops daily to that side, for the defence of their own country; and therefore her majesty hopes you will have so right a sense of our present advantages, as to enable her majesty to make a considerable augmentation for preserving and improving them, which, by the continuance of God's blessing on our arms, must soon put a glorious period to this long and expensive war.—As to the condition of the fleet, we have it in command from her majesty to acquaint you, that the constant and remote services in which the ships have been employed have made a greater sum than usual requisite, as well for the extraordinary repairs, as the building of new ships. And the taking of Port Mahon, as it hath afforded the means of having a part of the fleet operate with more readiness and effect on the enemy, or wherever it may be useful to the common cause in those parts; so the making such provisions, at so great a distance as will be proper for that service, must of necessity cause some extraordinary expences. All which her majesty recommends to your serious consideration; desiring you to provide timely and effectual supplies for those ends, and likewise for the carrying on such fortifications, for the security of our ports, and extinguishing the enemy's hopes of profiting by disturbances in Scotland, as you shall think fit.

"My Lords and Gentlemen; The Union is esteemed by her majesty to be so happy and great a part of the successes of her reign, and her majesty hath so much at heart the confirming and improving it, that she is pleased to command you to remind you of preparing such bills as shall be thought conducing to that end; and particularly, to make the laws of both parts of Great Britain agree, as near as may be, for the common interest of both people, especially as to those laws which relate to criminal cases and proceedings, and settling the militia on the same foot throughout the United Kingdom.—Her majesty is graciously pleased, we should also assure you, that, if you can propose any means for the improvement of our trade or manufactures, or better employment of the poor, her majesty will take the greatest satisfaction in enacting such provisions; there being nothing she so earnestly desires, as that God would bless her with more and more opportunities of doing all possible good to so well deserving a people, so firm and affectionate to her interests.—And as her majesty doth not doubt, by God's blessing, and your good affections, to continue to defeat the designs of the Pretender, and his open or secret abettors: so her majesty will always endeavour, on her part to make her people happy, to such a degree, as that none (except of desperate fortunes) shall enter into measures for the disturbance of her government, the Union, or the Protestant Succession as by law established; without acting, at the same time, manifestly against their own true and lasting interest, as well as their duty."

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, cannot forbear condoling with your majesty, upon your great loss sustained in the person of the Prince, whose eminent virtues must render his memory ever dear to us, and to the whole kingdom.—But we are at the same time bound in duty to beseech your majesty, that you would moderate your grief, and take care of your health, upon which the hopes and comfort of your people, and the safety of Europe, doth so much depend.—We congratulate your majesty upon the happy and glorious progress of your arms, which, we hope, by the blessing of God, will be carried yet farther before the end of this campaign: And we humbly assure your majesty, that we will give our utmost assistance in every thing for the prosecuting of this just and necessary war; being more and more convinced, that no peace can be safe and honourable, until the whole monarchy of Spain be restored to the House of Austria.—And we most earnestly desire, that, at a time when your own subjects are making such extraordinary efforts for supporting the common cause, your majesty would use your most pressing instances with your allies, to shew a suitable vigour; and particularly with those the interest of whose family is more nearly concerned in this present war.—It is a great pleasure to find the satisfaction your majesty expresses for having accomplished the Union. And as we were very early in declaring our desires for beginning a treaty, and very zealous in our endeavours to bring it to a happy conclusion; so we shall never be wanting to do all that is possible on our parts, to make it perfect, and a blessing to the whole island.—We think ourselves obliged, in duty, to declare to your majesty, that we will, at the expence of our lives and estates, support and defend your majesty's royal person and government, and the Protestant Succession as by law established, against all pretenders, and all your enemies whatsoever."

The Queen's Answer.] The marquis of Dorchester reported her majesty's most gracious Answer: "That her majesty thanked the House of Lords very kindly for their Address, as well as for the manner of sending it to her on this occasion."

The Commons resolved, nem. con., That an humble Address should be presented to her majesty, to condole with her upon the death of his royal highness prince George of Denmark, and desire her majesty to take care of her royal person (upon whose health the happiness of the kingdom, and the liberties of Europe so much depends) and to assure her majesty, that the Commons of Great Britain would support her against all her enemies, both at home and abroad.

On the same day, they came to a Resolution upon another Address to the queen, to congratulate her on the glorious success of her arms, and those of her Allies in this present war; and to assure her majesty of their utmost endeavours, to enable her to carry on a vigorous war against the common enemy, until the liberties of Europe might be secured by a safe and honourable peace, and also to support and defend her majesty, and the Succession as by law established in the Protestant line, against the Pretender and all his open and secret abettors. The first of these Addresses being reported to the House on the 23d, by Mr. Bromley, and the other the same day by sir William Strickland; the House ordered, that such members of that House as were of the privy-council, should attend the queen, and humbly know her majesty's pleasure, when and in what manner she would be pleased to be attended with the said Addresses. Those gentlemen attending accordingly, Mr. Secretary Boyle reported, that her majesty was graciously pleased to answer: "That she took very kindly the application of the House to her in that manner; and that it was her majesty's pleasure, that such Addresses as the House of Commons desired at that time to present to her majesty, should be delivered to her by such members of that house, as were of her majesty's most honourable privy-council."

"Most gracious Sovereign; We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons in parliament assembled, take this first opportunity of expressing to your majesty, the deep sense we have of the great loss your majesty and this kingdom have sustained in the death of his royal highness prince George of Denmark, whose tender affection to your majesty, and love to our country, had gained him the hearts of all your good subjects, and will render his memory ever dear to them.—We humbly beseech your majesty to moderate the grief so justly due on this sad occasion, since it cannot be indulged without endangering the health of your royal person, on whose safety the happiness of Great Britain, and the liberties of Europe do (under God) depend.—Your faithful Commons think themselves obliged more particularly at this time, to assure your majesty of their inviolable fidelity to your person and government, and of their firm resolution effectually to support your majesty against all your enemies both at home and abroad."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's most gracious Answer: "That her majesty thanks you very kindly for this Address; and, that the concern which the House has expressed for her affliction, is very acceptable to her majesty."

The Commons' Address of Congratulation for the Success of her Arms.] The Address of Congratulation ran thus:

"Most gracious Sovereign: We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, beg leave to congratulate the glorious successes of this year, gained by the arms of your majesty, and those of your Allies.—The great and signal advantages that have been so wonderfully obtained, so vigorously prosecuted and improved, and upon all occasions so happily accomplished, are repeated instances that no difficulties are insuperable to your great commanders, and no force of the enemy able to obstruct the progress of your victorious arms; which give us good grounds to hope for further success, before the conclusion of this long and active campaign.—Your majesty's good subjects, through the whole course of this war, have most cheerfully granted the necessary supplies, for supporting and carrying it on with vigour; and have seen such good fruits of their former zeal, that your majesty may be assured this House will never be wanting in their duty to your majesty, or the interest of those they represent; but are determined to give such supplies, as, by the blessing of God, may be the most effectual for reducing the power of the common enemy, and forcing him to accept such a peace, as your majesty, in conjunction with our allies, shall think honourable and lasting.—The Union is so great a glory to your majesty, and advantage to all your people, that we shall do every thing on our part, to strengthen and improve it; but above all, it shall be our utmost care, to defend your majesty's sacred person, to support your undoubted title to the crown, to disappoint the hopes and designs of the Pretender and all his open and secret abettors, and to maintain the Protestant Succession as by law established."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's most gracious Answer:

"That her majesty returns you many thanks for all this hearty assurances you have given her in this Address, particularly for those of assisting her, in bringing the war to a safe and happy conclusion, which her majesty does very much desire, for the ease and security of her people; and as she does entirely depend upon your dispatch of the supplies necessary to that end, so she hopes God Almighty will still continue to bless the endeavours of her majesty and her subjects, for the good of the common cause."

"* The proceedings in both Houses this session were agreeable to the directions given at court; for, the court being now joined with the

The Peers of Scotland's eldest Sons incapacitated to sit in Parliament.] Dec. 3. The Commons took into consideration that part of the Act for uniting the two kingdoms, which relates to the election of members to serve in that House, for that part of Great Britain called Scotland; and having heard counsel, and the petitions and representations relating to the incapacity of the eldest sons of Scots peers, to represent the Commons of Scotland in the parliament of Great Britain, being read, the substance, both of the counsel's arguments, and of those representations, was, That by an act of the Scots parliament, intitled, 'An act for settling the manner of electing sixteen peers, and forty-five commoners,' to represent Scotland, in the parliament of Great Britain; which act was ratified by the 'Act for uniting the two kingdoms,' it was declared, 'That none shall be capable to elect, or be elected, to represent a Shire or Burgh in the parliament of Great Britain, for that part of the united kingdom, except such as were then capable to elect or be elected, as commissioners for Shires or Burghs to the parliament of Scotland.' That from hence it evidently followed that the Scots peers eldest sons could not sit in the House of Commons of Great Britain, unless it did appear, that they were capable to be elected, and to sit as members of the parliament of Scotland: but, as a proof of the contrary, several instances were alledged of their being always rejected by the parliament of Scotland; and, in particular, the viscount Tarbat's eldest son, in the year 1689. That the fundamental law of the Union had most expressly reserved to the Commons of Scotland, that valuable privilege of electing their representatives in parliament, from among the best qualified gentlemen of their own number and state, in the same manner as they had formerly used to do. That in electing members of parliament, the choice of the electors ought to be made as free as is possible from the influence either of bribes or threats; and in justice, should only be determined by the honesty and candour of the person to be chosen; that his character be such as promises a faithful discharge of so great a trust: and that his inclination be accompanied with a sufficient capacity to serve the particular interest of his constituents, as well as the general interest of his country. But that few in Scotland could be supposed to be in a condition to maintain this character, the Commons there being surrounded with a numerous and powerful peerage; who, like so many sovereigns, judge and determine, within their respective bounds, in criminal as well as civil matters, being vested with vast superiorities and heretable jurisdictions; so that no commoner holding any part of his lands of a peer, or indeed being in his neighbourhood, could be reckoned at liberty to make a free election of his representative: so that the Commons of Scotland, whereof the majority of their parliament consisted, had invincible arguments for preserving entire to themselves, that necessary privilege of excluding their peers' eldest sons, from being members of that House. That if the parliament of Scotland, which consisted of peers and commoners sitting together in the same house, enjoying the same liberty of speech, and the same common privilege, and judicative capacity, being also restricted to the same rules and forms, had so many weighty reasons for excluding their peers' eldest sons, how many more arguments, of greater moment, might be urged in the House of Commons of Great Britain, who subsisted a separate and distinct House from the peers; enjoying by themselves, so many valuable privileges and immunities, which could not be encroached upon, or subjected to a House of Peers, without endangering the whole constitution of the House of Commons? and, in the last place, that England and Scotland being now united, and their interests inseparably joined, it ought to be a maxim with all true Britons, that the liberty of the Commons of Scotland, will always be an advantage to those of England; and that the slavery of the first cannot fail ending in the destruction of the latter. Little was offered, on the other side, against these arguments; so that the question being put, "That the eldest sons of the peers of Scotland were capable by the laws of Scotland at the time of the Union, to elect or be elected, to represent any shire or borough in Scotland, to sit in the House of Commons of Great Britain," it passed in the negative.—In pursuance of which, three days after, the Commons ordered their Speaker to issue out his warrants to the clerk of the crown, to make out new writs for the electing commissioners to serve in this present parliament for the shire of Aberdeen, in the room of William lord Had-do son of the earl of Aberdeen; and for the shire of Linlithgow, in the room of James lord Johnstown, son of the marquis of Annandale; who being eldest sons of peers of Scotland, were declared to be incapable to sit in that House.

Whigs they had a clear majority in every thing; all elections were judged in favour of Whigs and Courtiers, but with so much partiality, that those, who had formerly made loud complaints of the injustice of the Tories, in determining elections, when they were a majority, were not so much as out of countenance, when they were reproached for the same thing: they pretended they were in a state of war with the Tories, so that it was reasonable to retaliate this to them, on the account of their former proceedings: but this did not satisfy just and upright men, who would not do to others that which they had complained of, when it was done to them, or to their friends." Tindal.

Debate concerning the Election of the Peers of Scotland.] A petition of a new nature was likewise brought before the Lords, with relation to the election of the peers from Scotland. There was a return made in due form; but a petition was laid before the House in the name of four Lords, who pretended, that they ought to have been returned. The duke of Queensberry had been created a duke of Great Britain by the title of duke of Dover; yet he thought he had still a right to vote as a peer of Scotland. He had likewise a proxy; so that two votes depended on this point, whether the Scots peerage did sink into the peerage of Great Britain. Some Lords, who were prisoners in the castle of Edinburgh on suspicion, as favouring the Pretender, had sent for the Sheriff of Lothian to the castle, and had taken the oaths before him; and upon that were reckoned to be qualified to vote or make a proxy. Now it was pretended, that the castle of Edinburgh was a constabulary, and was out of the Sheriff's jurisdiction; and that therefore he could not legally tender them the oaths. Some proxies were signed without subscribing witnesses, a form necessary by their law. Other exceptions were also taken from some rules of the law of Scotland, which had not been observed. The clerks being also complained of, they were sent for, and were ordered to bring up with them all instruments or documents relating to the election. When they came up, and every thing was laid before the House of Lords, the whole matter was long and well debated.—As to the duke of Queensberry's voting among the Scots Lords, it was said, that if a peer of Scotland, being made a peer of Great Britain, did still retain the interest in electing the sixteen from Scotland, this would create a great inequality among peers, some having a vote by representation, as well as in person: the precedent was mischievous, since, by creating some of the chief families in Scotland peers of Great Britain, they would be able to carry the whole election of the sixteen as they pleased. It was objected, that, by a clause in the act passed since the Union, the peers of England, who were likewise peers of Scotland, had a right to vote in the election of Scotland still reserved to them; so there seemed to be a parity in this case with that. But it was answered, That a peer of England, and a peer of Scotland, held their dignity under two different crowns, and by two different Great-seals: but, Great Britain including Scotland as well as England, the Scots peerage must now sink into that of Great Britain. Besides, that there were but five, who were peers of both kingdoms before the Union; and therefore, as it might be reasonable to make provision for them, so it was of no great consequence; but, if this precedent were allowed, it might go much farther, and have very ill consequences. Upon a division of the House, the matter was determined against the duke of Queensberry.—A great deal was said both at the bar by the lawyers, and in the debate in the House, upon the point of jurisdiction, and of the exemption of a constabulary. It was said, that the Sheriff's court ought to be, as all courts were, open and free, and so could not be held within a castle or prison. But no express decision had ever been made in this matter. The prisoners had taken the oaths, which was the chief intent of the law, in the best manner they could; so that it seemed not reasonable to cut them off from the main privilege of peerage, which was reserved to them, because they could not go abroad to the Sheriff's court. After a long debate it was carried, that the oaths were duly tendered to them. Some other exceptions were proved and admitted; the returns of some, certifying that they had taken the oaths, were not sealed; and some had signed these without subscribing witnesses. Other exceptions were offered from provisions, which the law of Scotland had made, with relation to bonds and other deeds, which had not been observed in making of proxies. But the House of Lords did not think these were of that importance, as to vacate the proxies on that account. After a full hearing, and a debate, which lasted many days, there was but one of the peers, who were returned, that was found not duly elected, and only one of the petitioning Lords was brought into the House; the marquis of Annandale was received, and the marquis of Lothian was set aside.*

Major General Webb thanked by the Commons. Dec. 13. The Commons resolved, non. con. "That the Thanks of this House be given to major general Webb, for the great and eminent services performed by him at the battle of Wynnendale." And major general Webb being then in the House; Mr. Speaker gave him (in his place) the Thanks of the House accordingly, as followeth:

"Major general Webb; It is with pleasure, sir, I receive the commands of the House to return you their Thanks, for the great and eminent services performed by you at the battle of Wynnendale. We are all sensible, how much

* "The Scots members in both Houses were divided into factions. The duke of Queensberry had his party still depending upon him. He was in such credit with the lord-treasurer and the queen, that all the posts in Scotland were given to persons recommended by him. The chief ministers at court seemed to have laid it down for a maxim not to be departed from, to look carefully to elections in Scotland; that the members returned from thence might be in an intire dependence on them, and be either Whigs or Tories, as they should shift sides. The duke of Queensberry was made third Secretary of State: he had no foreign province assigned him, but Scotland was left to his management. The dukes of Hamilton, Montross, and Roxburgh had set themselves in an opposition to his power, and had carried many elections against him. The lord Sommers and the earl of Sunderland supported them, but could not prevail with the lord-treasurer to bring them into an equal share of the Administration. This had almost occasioned a breach; for the Whigs, though they went on in a conjunction with the lord-treasurer, yet continued still to be jealous of him." Tindal.

the reducing the fortress of Lisle is owing to your courage and conduct. I wish a more early notice than the motion now made, had been given me, that I might have expressed myself more suitably to the occasion; though at the same time I am very sensible, I should then have wanted expressions. One of the greatest honours we are capable of conferring, is due to your merit; and as such, in obedience to command, I now give you the unanimous Thanks of the House, for your great services performed."

Upon which, major general Webb said,

"Mr. Speaker; I return my hearty thanks to this honourable House, for the great honour they have been pleased to do me. The success I had at Wynnendale, is owing to the great courage and resolution which the officers and soldiers shewed in that action. I have always endeavoured to deserve the good opinion of the House; and it is the greatest pleasure to me imaginable, that I have served my queen and my country to their satisfaction."

Address of both Houses, on the Reduction of Ghent.] Dec. 23. Both Houses agreed upon the following Address:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in parliament assembled, do most humbly congratulate your majesty upon the reduction of Ghent, the last great effort of this glorious year; a year that will be ever famous in history, as well for the entire disappointment of all the attempts and hopes of the enemies, as for the many wonderful successes with which God has blessed the arms of your majesty and the allies; the unusual length of the campaign, the variety of events, and the difficulty and importance of the actions, having given many opportunities to your majesty's general the duke of Marlborough, to shew his consummate ability, and all the great qualities necessary for so high a trust; whereby, in conjunction with the renowned prince Eugene of Savoy, such considerable progress has been made, and the conquests so far advanced, that we have reason to hope, the enemy, in spite of all their presump-

"This gave Mr. Bromley occasion to say, That he did not disapprove the custom, which of late years had been introduced, of returning thanks to such generals, as had performed eminent services; especially when they received those compliments as modestly as the worthy member, to whom they were now given, had done. But it was with grief, he observed, that a certain commander, on whom not only the thanks of the House, but also great rewards had been bestowed, appeared yet to be unsatisfied. This reflection was visibly levelled at the duke of Marlborough, who, about that very time, was attacked in two pieces, which were printed and industriously spread about, the one intitled, 'A Speech of Caius Memmius, Tribune to the people of Rome, translated from Sallust;' the other intitled, 'An Account of a Dream at Harwich.'" tion, will soon find themselves under an absolute necessity of submitting to a safe and honourable peace."

The Queen's Answer.] The Lord Chancellor, and the Speaker of the House of Commons, attending her majesty with this Address, the Queen made Answer:

"I give you many thanks for this Address, and am extremely sensible of the loyalty and affection of both Houses of Parliament upon all occasions."

Debate in the Lords on the State of the Nation, in relation to the intended Invasion of Scotland.] January 12, 1709. The House of Peers having summoned their members to attend, took into consideration the State of the Nation in relation to the late intended Invasion of Scotland; and

"My Lords; I have a greater respect for your lordships than to keep you in any expectation; there is nothing I can say, I am sure, can in the least deserve it.—My Lords; When the campaign was at an end, when a land-tax lay on your table, when the due respect had been paid to that sorrow, in which we all bear a part, when the session of parliament was so greatly advanced, and a long recess so near at hand, I thought it might be a proper time to put your lordships in mind of the late intended Invasion; and the rather, because an enquiry into this seemed to me to be what the nation expected, and what I have observed, even those who have differed in their thoughts about it, yet unanimously desired; but above all, because it is a matter, in which not only our welfare and happiness, but our very being itself, the security of the nation, and safety of her majesty are so highly concerned.—I did endeavour to prove the first of these to your lordships, when I made you this motion, by reasons taken from the flourishing of your trade, the support of your credit, the nature of your victories, and the quieting of men's minds at home; and shall now, with your lordships leave, say a few words to the other part, and shew your lordships how much this enquiry concerns us all in point of safety.—Some perhaps may think, that after such wonderful successes abroad, as we have had the last year, after the French king has lost Lisle, and been forced to abandon Ghent and Bruges: to speak to your lordships of any dangers at home, or to have the least apprehension from such a baffled enemy, were to expose the weakness of a man's own judgment; but I shall endeavour to shew your lordships how dangerous a mistake this is, from example, reason, and authority, the three best arguments I know to prove any truth.—My lords; Were not Hochstet and Ramillies as glorious victories, and as great mortifications to the French king, as our taking of Lisle, or reducing of Ghent? and yet after such entire victories, such repeated defeats, had not this haughty neighbour of ours, the presumption, the last year, to attempt the setting a Pretender upon her majesty's throne? And can we reasonably promise ourselves any security whenever he is in a condition to give us the least disturbance? And is he not in a condition? Is he not as near us this year as he was the last, notwithstanding all our conquests? That is an advantage our allies only have by them, to have their enemies at a greater distance. Has he not as many ships, and as many friends too, except one, as I mentioned to your lordships? Nay, my lords, has he not as great encouragement to renew his attempt as he had to undertake it, as I shall presently shew your lordships; from whence then does our great security arise? Besides, my lords, what is yet further, every body is convinced by the inconsiderable force, the small number of ships and troops, the French king employed in the late attempt upon us the last year, that his chief dependence was upon the encouragement and promises of assistance he had from hence; and yet, notwithstanding all our enquiries, is it not as great a mystery to this day as it was, who the persons amongst us are, who were concerned in this black and unnatural treason?—It is true, my lords, several persons of great quality and interest have been taken up upon suspicion, brought from their own homes and country, whilst others thereby have had the opportunity of supplanting them in their interest there: It is not for me to say, whether this proceeded from ill-will to some, or favour to others; but, has any thing been proved against them? Does not the bail that has been given for them, and their sitting in this House, convince every body of their innocence? So that this way of proceeding has rather proved vexatious to the subject, than any real security to the government, and I hope will make us for the future set a greater value upon our Habeas Corpus Act, which was the right of every subject before by common-law.—Nor has the characters that have been made of persons to be suspected had any better effect. There are two I shall mention to your lordships, and I think greater mistakes than both of them can scarce be put into words; the first is, that men of arbitrary principles are the persons who ought to be suspected; this argument has been very much labour'd, and great pains has been taken to persuade the world from men's practices in former reigns, that they are still of arbitrary principles, and from thence it is inferred they ought to be suspected. I shall not trouble your lordships, or myself, at present, to shew the weakness of this argument; I will take it as they that have use of it would have it, for a strong and undeniable consequence, and then I ask, what, my Lords, is the nation to suspect any, who are at the head of your ministry, of giving this encouragement to your enemies? For I will be bold to say in this place, if this be a good argument, it is as strong against some who are at the head of your ministry, as against any man I know of who is out of it.—There is another character of suspicious persons, which I cannot but take notice of, because I take it to be very fatal to the freedom of parliament, for it is impossible for any man to take notice, either in parliament, or to the queen herself, of any wrong measure, or false steps in the management of public affairs, without so far reflecting on the ministry; and if this is to be interpreted as an artful method of lessening her majesty's just esteem of her ministers; and those who do so are to be marked as dangerous to the safety of her majesty's person, and the present establishment, I am afraid her majesty, for the future, may have several things concealed from her, which might be for her service to know, and one of the great ends and uses of parliaments, the redressing of grievances, and keeping great men in awe, will be quickly laid aside. But, my lords, we have a very visible instance, that this is a great mistake; for do we not see those lords, who the last year espoused the case and complaint of the merchants in parliament, now advanced to the greatest places of trust and power? So that these two methods have rather shewed us, who ought not, than who are to be suspected.—My Lords; I shall now take leave to say one word to the positive part; and if we would apply an observation of the schools to the case in hand, I believe it would set this matter in the truest light. They tell us there is great difference to be made between a division and a distinction: Every division is a distinction, but every distinction is not a division; the soul and the body are distinct, but they are not divided, for that would be a state of death; it is so in this case, the Papist, Jacobite, and Nonjuror, are a party of men divided from the rest of the nation; they want that forma informans, as they call it, that vital spirit of love and loyalty that animates every good subject: But as for others, however they may be distinguished, and differ among themselves in their notions relating either to ecclesiastical or civil policy, yet they seem all to have the same regard and concern for the honour and safety of her majesty and government. I would not be misunderstood, as if I did not think some of all persuasions may be faulty; I know, that even among the Apostles themselves, he that bore the bag proved the traitor.* My meaning

* "The House of Peers having ordered their members to attend on the 18th of January, they took into consideration the State of the Nation, in relation to the late intended Invasion of Scotland; and the lord Haversham opened the debate with his annual speech, which seemed to be prepared for that occasion, and was not without some strokes in it, levelled against the ministry, which were the strokes that gained attention from some, who were by no means admirers of his lordship's principles or faculties; As this, 'He among the Apostles, who bore the bag, proved the traitor' Though there was no more likeness in the allusion, than would be between Judas and Scanderbeg, yet every one knew whom it was levelled at; and because bags hold treasure sometimes, therefore the Treasurer is a traitor: Such

only is, that those who have taken the Test to the government, may at least pretend to an equal degree of your charity with those who never yet owned it; and it is these persons who never swore to the government, that her majesty directly points at in her last speech to her last parliament; for after she had been pleased to say, "It is certain we must be all inexcusable, if we do not take warning, from this attempt, to complete what may be necessary for our security at home, and the discouraging the like for the future; to which, by God's blessing, there shall be nothing wanting on my part." In the following paragraph she is pleased to add, "I must recommend to you, at your return into your several counties, to use your utmost care and diligence in putting the laws in execution against papists, and all others disaffected to my government, and in making them pay towards the public taxes to the full of what the law requires from them: Nothing being more reasonable than that they, who by their principles and practices encourage (if not actually foment) such disturbances, should dolefully contribute to the charge of quieting them, and securing the kingdom's peace, and should know themselves, on all such occasions, to be responsible for the many inconveniences that may ensue." Which two paragraphs, will, I hope, justify what I have taken notice of to your lordships.—My lords; I do not forget the obligation I am under to a noble lord, and therefore shall now shew your lordships, that notwithstanding the French king failed in his late attempt upon us, yet he has more encouragement to renew it, than he had at first to undertake it: And, my lords, I think a great deal that I have said to your lordships proves it. Is it not a great encouragement to him, to see, notwithstanding so many friends that he has amongst us, all the methods that we have hitherto taken, have signified so little to discover any of them? And that those methods have not been taken, that might perhaps have signified more towards a discovery, and have been made use of at other times; I mean promises both of pardon and reward. Does he not see how easily he can shake the main pillar that supports all our wretched quibbles as this, are often the best arguments to support a bad cause? What follows was aimed at the earl of Wharton; "Do we not see those Lords, who the last year espoused the case and complaint of the Merchants in parliament, now advanced to the greatest places of trust and power." Having intimated several particulars of encouragement to the late intended Invasion, he strings a set of Interrogatories, exactly like the heads of the late opposition to the present government, "What, my Lords, will no alarm awaken us? Will the scales never fall off from our eyes? Must some men's mighty services prevent our looking into other's great miscarriages? And must this poor nation be eternally sawn asunder by the struggles of contending parties? &c." Oldmixon.

commerce, I mean the Bank? Was it not in danger of breaking? And has it recovered the blow to this day that he gave it? For, my lords, if men cannot be masters of their own money, which they trust with any body, upon no other reason, but that they may command it again in any case of necessity, without being looked upon as suspected persons, I believe men will be so wise as to secure both their money and themselves too, from any such danger. There is another encouragement, which he has, my lords, and that is, the weak and defenceless condition of Scotland, the deficiency of force, and ill state of your garrisons there, at the time of the Invasion, notwithstanding the certain accounts and knowledge we had of it. What, my lords, will no alarm awaken us? Will the scales never fall off from our eyes? Must some men's mighty services prevent our looking into other's great miscarriages? And must this poor nation be eternally sawn asunder by the struggles of contending parties? My lords, I hope it is not thought that I have been thus urgent with your lordships from any fears of personal danger: I am content to take my lot with others as it falls, whatever it be; but I am afraid lest her majesty should be dethroned whilst she lives, and that the destruction of popery or slavery, whilst we are speaking peace to ourselves, should suddenly, like a flood, break in upon us.—My Lords; If your lordships have any intention of looking into this matter, I shall make your lordships a motion, which perhaps may give us some light; it is indeed a complex one, and rather a schedule of papers; it is, That her majesty will please to order, that there may be laid before this House, at what time her majesty received the first account of the intended invasion: What orders were thereupon issued into Scotland, with relation either to forces or garrisons? What was the number of regular troops and forces there, at the time of this intelligence? What was the state of the garrisons there at that time? What augmentation was made, or forces sent thither, from the time of the intelligence, to the time of the Invasion? What orders have been given with relation to the garrisons, and when, both before and since the Invasion, from the time of the first intelligence?"

Several other peers spoke to the same purpose; whereupon the House appointed a Committee, to enquire into the State of the Nation, in relation to the intended Invasion; and ordered an Address to be presented to her majesty, to desire that the Papers, concerning this affair, might be laid before them: Which her majesty was pleased to direct accordingly.

Lord Haversham opens the Account of the Scots Invasion.] On the 25th of February, the Lord Haversham opened, in the House of Lords, the account of the Scots Invasion, in the following Speech:

"My Lords; The temper of this House, with relation to your enquiry into the intended Invasion, since your Address to her majesty to have the Papers laid before you, and since they have been upon your table, is so very visible, I need not take notice of it, but ought rather to ask forgiveness for myself, that I should dare so much as mention that matter once more to your lordships; nor should I do it, were it not from an absolute necessity and justice, which I think is due to myself, and those lords who did me the honour to second the motion I made for addressing her majesty for those Papers; for to me it seems too much like fear or guilt, to sit down tamely under any reflection a man has in his power to wipe off, and there are some which we, perhaps, hereafter may be reproached with: One is, that these lords who made you this motion, never so much as looked into the Papers they called for, or have thought on, or mentioned that matter since; perhaps they will say so too, that they never intended it should come to any thing; that it was only a cover to some design they had under it; nay, I do not know but they may go so far as to say, that, under-hand, they were trying how an act of grace would relish: Should such a thing be offered, I know myself so innocent, as, in our present circumstances, I should not give my consent to it, for I shall always think, that, when horses are skittish, vicious, and headstrong, let who will be upon their back, it is fit they should never be without a good strong curb in their mouths: And, as to these Papers, my lords, I have looked into them, and those who have done so, cannot, in my opinion, but think of them: But that your lordships may not have my word for this, I will, with your lordship's leave, take notice of some particulars that are in them; and that you may be certain of the truth of what I observe, I beg your clerk may read, for vouchers, the Papers themselves, as they shall be called for.—It will not, I presume, be denied me, that, upon the 23rd of February, Mr. Boyle received certain intelligence, that the intended armament at Dunkirk was designed for Scotland; there had been several advices before of great preparations making, and, by the great quantity of fire-arms, it was judged to be for some land design. The States were apprehensive, and acquainted her majesty, by their minister, with it; and Scotland had been, in several intelligences, named, but I do not find there was a certain account till that of the 23d of February, to Mr. Boyle.—The queen, in her letter of the 25th of February, to the council of Scotland, thinks it necessary to acquaint them with it; and, that she does expect they should do their utmost for the protection of her subjects, and preservation of the public peace; that nothing on her part should be wanting; that she had given orders, that some of her troops in Flanders should be ready to embark, in case the embarkation at Dunkirk should go on; and that her troops in England and Ireland were so disposed as to give what assistance might be necessary, and, in the mean time, authorizes and empower them, the privy council, to give such orders as were proper to put her forces, forts and garrisons there, in the best order.—This then being allowed, the first question is, What number of forces, effective, regular troops, I mean, were in Scotland at this time, that is, the 23d or 25th of February, 1708? I cannot but observe to your lordships, that there has been a great deal of care taken to conceal this from us, although this very account was particularly asked for by your Address; yet, in all that great bundle, there is not one Paper from whence we can learn the number: I was therefore forced to get the best light and intelligence I could elsewhere; and have very good authority for what I am going to say, and do affirm to your lordships, that the regular forces in Scotland, upon the 25th of February, 1708, were not above 1,500 men. If I am mistaken, I hope some lord here will set me right, and take upon him to say what the real number was at that time.—And, since there were but 1,500 men, it is certain that was not a number or strength, that could be thought by any man sufficient to secure and protect the kingdom against the Invasion that threatened it; and the ferment that was then in the nation was such, that I do not find they durst so much as trust their militia with their own defence. We are therefore, in the next place, to consider what additional strength or augmentation this handful of men had, or what assistance, either from the forces from Ostend, or those from Ireland, or English troops from hence.—As to augmentations or additions, I find there was little or nothing done as to that part: The parliament indeed had, on the 20th of Dec. 1707, raised the establishment of the forces in Scotland from 2,834 to 5,932; but, it appears by a letter from the earl of Leven to the earl of Marr, of the 7th of March, that little notice had as yet been taken of what the parliament had done; for, in that letter to the earl of Marr, he intreats him again to mind the establishment, and let him know if he shall give encouragement to any who should be willing to take arms to join them; and says, further, he hopes, at least, that so much of the levy-money as is due since the 24th of December, will be given now; for that would buy some horses, and levy some men: So that by this letter it appears there was no money given to levy men, or increase the forces in Scotland, though there were 3,600 men wanting at that time, and had been so ever since the parliament had voted the establishment in December, and, though our danger, at that time, from the want of them was so very great and evident; which seems very astonishing. Nor does it appear that any directions, or money for this or any other service, till the Invasion was over, was ordered here till the 12th of March; and then, indeed, on the 13th, the earl of Marr writes from hence to the earl of Leven, That my Lord Treasurer had ordered the people of the customs and excise, to answer the earl of Leven with money for provisions, and other necessary charges; and further says, That my lord Marlborough told him that very morning, which was the 13th, that the Scots establishments would be ended that day; he knows not how they have made it, or if they have altered any thing that we had concerted with St. John, or if any thing be omitted; but we hope they have not.—It is very true, her majesty, in her second letter of the 8th of March to the council of Scotland, recommends to them, to give present directions to put her forts, garrisons, and magazines there, in a good posture of defence, and says, That what shall be expended towards those ends by their warrants shall be repaid, for which she has already given orders: What those orders were, or to whom given, are not to be found among the papers; but it is very evident, that there was no order for one farthing of money, to answer either the orders of the council, or the earl of Leven's necessary charges, out of any branch of the revenue, or otherwise; for in a letter of the earl of Leven to the earl of Marr, of the 13th of March, he has these words, which will likewise shew the condition of the nation at that time: "My lord, says he, I leave it to your lordship to consider my circumstances, here I am, not one farthing of money to provide provision, or for contingencies, or intelligence, none of the commissions yet sent down, few troops, and those almost naked; it vexes me sadly to think I must retire towards Berwick, if the French land on this side the Forth." And that you may not have his lordship's single word for it, the Lord Advocate confirms very much the truth of this, in his letter of the 11th of March to the earl of Marr; for after he had said that, he was ordered to lay before her majesty the inclosed information for the castle of Edinburgh, and a particular account of what it wants to put it in a case of defence: and also the castles of Sterling, Dumbarton, and Blackness, to shew their present condition, and want they are in, and that he had formerly sent a memorial of Mr. Slezer's for a train of artillery; all which he hopes will be considered: He adds, I believe (says he) there was never a country more destitute and defenceless than we are, nor have we so much as a Treasury, or any money for incident charges; so that I must again, by the council's order, lay these things before your lordships, and that at least some order may be given, whereby necessary expences may be defrayed. And the earl of Marr's letter of the 13th from hence, is the first account we have of any money that was ordered for Scotland: By all which it plainly appears, that, notwithstanding the orders the queen mentions in her letter of the 8th of March, the council had not a shilling for necessary expences on the 11th, nay, not so much as one penny ordered till the 13th; and as to the establishment, notwithstanding all the pressing instances, that was not settled till after the invasion, as appears by the earl of Marr's letters of the 12th and 13th of March.—This, my lord, is the true state, as appears from the papers themselves given in, relating to the force of that, I had almost said deserted, but I may say defenceless nation; few men, and those almost naked, 3,600 men wanting of the establishment voted by the parliament for the year 1707-8, near three months before: no levy-money, no establishment settled, no commissions sent down, not a shilling ordered by the ministry out of any branch of the revenue, or otherwise, to the privy council or earl of Leven for necessary expences, or to buy provision, or for contingencies or intelligence, and all this in a time of the utmost danger.—In the next place I shall shew your lordships, when Scotland was in this defenceless condition, what assistance they had from Ostend, England and Ireland. As to the transports that were to come from Ostend, though all the dispatch was made that could be made, they did not arrive at Tinnmouth Bar, till ten days after the enemy were seen upon the Scotch coast, so that the dispute, if there had been any, would have been over, and the enemy in all human probability, would have been masters both of Edinburgh, the castle, and all that was in it, before they could come up to their assistance. And the very order to (rear admiral) Baker is so extraordinary, a man cannot but take notice of it, for after that he is required and directed to make the best of his way to Tinnmouth bar, with her majesty's ships under his command, and the transport ships with troops which he brought with him from Ostend, &c. there is a further order in these words, 'but in regard there are several dismounted troopers on board the transports, you are to send a vessel with them to Harwich, if you can conveniently, their horses being now in Essex;' so that instead of taking the horses to Tynmouth, the dismounted troopers are first to be sent to Harwich to their horses, and from thence to proceed to Scotland, which, one would think, were a very round about way.—And as to our troops from hence which were to assist them, the several regiments of horse, dragoons and foot, had not their orders to hold themselves in readiness to march till the 11th of March. The next day orders were given for them to augment, and on the 14th they were ordered to march northward, which was certainly too long a delay, considering what a march it is from hence to Edinburgh; yet this was all the readiness they were in to assist them.

"But there is one thing which is most amazing, and I must again desire, if I am wrong in fact, that some lord here, who I am sure can, will set me right. The queen, as I shewed to your lordships in her letter of the 8th of March, which your clerk just now read, told the council of Scotland, our troops from Ireland, which we mentioned in our last, are ready to embark in transport-ships provided in those places with all necessaries for that service: And yet it does appear plainly, that there were no transports provided at that time here; nor were any transport-ships ordered in Ireland; nay, the very orders to provide transports were not given by my lord Sunderland till the 12th of March here; nor by my Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, for the troops to be in a readiness to be transported till the 13th, and then my lord Sunderland sends an order to the Commissioners of Transports, telling them, That it is her majesty's pleasure that they forthwith take up shipping for the transportation of 600 horse, that are to embark at the White House between Carrickfergus and Belfast: And it is left, says he, to your discretion to hire these ships either at Whitehaven, Liverpool or Chester, as you can do it with most expedition and conveniency. And upon the 13th his lordship sends another letter, acquainting them, that they are to provide aboard those ships, hay and oats sufficient to serve 600 horse for a fortnight, and as many water casks as may be necessary to carry water; particulars that were it seems forgot in the first orders: And in an extract of the earl of Pembroke's letter to the Lords Justices of Ireland, of the 13th, he tells them, 'I did not in the least doubt but that your lordships will issue proper orders for one regiment of horse, and two of dragoons, to embark whenever there shall be occasion for them: And it is her majesty's opinion, that the regiment under the command of lieutenant-general Langston, major-general Echlyn, and lord Tunbridge, should be on this service; and I am of opinion that it will be for the service of the queen, to have these three regiments move with all convenient speed, and take their quarters in and about Belfast and Carrickfergus, that they may be in a readiness to embark; I desire your lordships to give directions to the proper officers to provide and get ready hay, oats and water, for at least a fortnight.' And here, if we consider that these letters were dated March 12 and 13, from hence, that they were to go to the Commissioners of Transports here, and to the Lords Justices in Ireland, that after these transports were to be agreed for, and hay, oats and water to be provided, and the three regiments ordered to march, what time this would take up, it seems very evident, that her majesty was not truly acquainted with the danger she was in; that she thought these things were in a readiness which were not; and that the orders she had given had not been observed, as she concluded they were; and, in the last place, that these three regiments must arrive in Scotland very late.

"But there is one thing more so very new, and without precedent, that it cannot but be very astonishing; which is that in the earl of Leven's Instructions of the 4th of March, in that part where he is ordered to Ireland for assistance, there is a blank left as to the person to whom he is to write; the words are these: 'You are, upon the first appearance of any squadron of French ships upon the coast, to send to Ireland to _____ to advertise him thereof, who has orders to send troops to your assistance;' and yet, as was just now proved, both from my lord Sunderland's letter to the Commissioners of Transports, and from my Lord Lieutenant's to the Lords Justices, there were not so much as orders given for any transports here till the 14th, nor any ever in Ireland, nor were the three regiments directed to move, in order to embarking, till the 13th. I confess, when I read this, I thought it was a mistake of the transcriber, till I saw these words in the earl of Leven's own letter, of the 7th of March, to the earl of Marr. 'I desire you,' says the earl of Leven, 'to send down the name of the person I am to write to in Ireland, if there be occasion; and must still entreat your lordship that orders be sent for some horse and dragoons to embark.' And again in his letter of the 13th, where he has these words to the earl of Marr, he repeats the same thing; 'Pray endeavour to get orders sent straight to Ireland for the officers there to embark, for you know I have no person's name to whom I should write.' This convinces me beyond what any man can say, that his lordship did not know to whom to write, for sure his lordship would not repeatedly affirm what was not fact; and whoever considers that there were no orders lodged any where for any person from Ireland, upon advice from the earl of Leven of the appearance of the enemy, to follow his direction, and hasten to his assistance; nor any orders at all for transports there; nor any direction here for transports till the 12th, must, I think be convinced that this blank in the instructions did not happen by chance, but was a premeditated and designed omission.—I would not forget any care that was taken, and therefore must take notice, that on the 27th of February there were an hundred barrels of powder ordered to be sent from Berwick to Edinburgh: but the earl of Leven was not writ to about it till the 2nd of March, which was four days delay. And the order itself was so very preposterous, I had almost said ridiculous, (much like that of Baker's) that it had full as well been omitted; for, instead of ordering the store keeper of Berwick immediately to carry a hundred barrels of powder to Edinburgh, they send an order to one Mr. James Robb, deputy store keeper of Edinburgh, to get carts and go with them to Berwick, and take 300 barrels of powder and bring it to Edinburgh. And Mr. Griegue, store keeper of Berwick to the board of the ordnance, writes a letter, dated March the 10th, 1707-8, hither, that Robb was come to Berwick, and the carts would be there that night. And I appeal to a lord, who cannot but know whether the powder came to Edinburgh before the danger was past, and the French off our coast? And whoever will reflect, that the earl of Leven's letter, dated here the 2nd of March, was to go to Edinburgh; that then at Edinburgh carriages are to be taken up for the powder, then they are to go to Berwick, and from Berwick they are to return again to Edinburgh, will find it could hardly be there sooner.

"The next thing I shall take notice of to your lordships, is the State of the Garrisons. The parliament had given, the 20th of Dec. the sum of 13,098*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.* for the Garrisons of North Britain for the year 1708. But I cannot but think your lordships will be greatly surprized, when you find in what a wretched condition they were. I will give your lordships but an instance or two, the rest are much in the same state :

“Sterling-Castle.—This is a very considerable post, a place of great importance ; and yet what an account is there of the arms and ammunition in that place? One barrel of powder. 550 firelocks, of which, about 100 for service, and some of that 100 want ram-rods, and some nails, all the rest unserviceable. 780 muskets, which may be for service, when furnished with ram-rods ; some nails, and some shattered in the stocks. 380 muskets, with broken stocks and locks, and many wanting locks, and all unserviceable. 150 bundles of match, all damnified with lying in rain. 300 bayonets, with most of them broken and spoiled, altogether unserviceable. 300 cartridge boxes, all broken and unserviceable. 200 pikes, damnified by long lying. 40 cannon-balls, 18 pounders. 70 cannon-balls, 12 pounders. 1,200 balls, 9 pounders. 3,400 four pounders. 90 small bomb-shells without mortars. 1,200 hand grenado shells. 50 stands back and breast :

“Dumbarton Castle.—There are several breaches in the wall : there are 12 brass-guns, none of them mounted, all of them want carriages : there is no powder in the garrison, and but few flints ; all the lodgings in a ruinous condition ; no coals in the garrison, nor any other provision ; the firelocks, being long since they were gotten, are very ill fixed. Edinburgh, March 9, 1707-8. The abovementioned is the true condition of the castle of Dumbarton at present.

“I need not, my lords, I think, make any observations upon the Castles, after your lordships have seen the wretched state of them : and therefore, in the last place, shall only take notice to your lordship, that, after the Invasion was over, there were estimates made, what it would cost to put the fortifications of Scotland in good repair. The total, as appears by your Schedule, amounts to 23,156*l.* of which there could be but 3,000*l.* laid out this year ; and yet there has been but poor 1,500*l.* expended upon that service this year, as appears by your paper.

“I will not trouble you farther, I think this matter is now very plain before your lordships ; I could wish I had not said one word of truth in what I have said to you ; but the vouchers shew it to be so, and if all this be true, it is a very strange, a very surprizing, and a very astonishing truth.—I shall not move any thing to your lordships farther in this matter, I believe there has been enough now said, to justify those Lords for moving this enquiry, and shall add but this word, that if there be no greater care taken for the future, than there was at this time of such imminent danger, it will be the greatest miracle in the world, if, without a miracle, the Pretender be not placed upon that throne.”

This is the substance of what was observed by the lord Haversham, though there happened some interlocutories between him and another Lord : and the observations were made upon the Papers as they were read. The duke of Buckingham and several others spoke to the same effect : upon which it was ordered, that that important affair should be considered the Tuesday following in a full House. But all ended in a joint Address of both Houses, as will presently be seen.

The Commons' Proceedings concerning the Invasion.] During these debates in the House of Lords, the Commons had also taken the affair of the Invasion into consideration. Pursuant to an Address they had presented to the queen, Mr. Boyle laid before the House a state of the whole matter of the designed Invasion of North Britain ; the proceedings against the late lord Griffin, and others taken in open rebellion, and also an account of the names of all those that were taken up, and the proceedings against them ; and, in what posture of defence the castles and garrisons of North Britain were at that time, and now are. Not long after the Commons resolved to present another Address to the queen, “That there might be laid before them a list of the ships of war employed on account of the late Invasion, under vice admiral Byng and rear admiral Baker, and of the names of the captains, who were employed in that expedition, and what journals had been delivered in, relating to the same.” But, after all these Addresses, when the papers, relating to this affair, came to be considered, the House at length resolved, ‘First, That orders were not issued for the marching of the troops in England until the 14th day of March, it being necessary for the security of her majesty’s person and government, that the troops in this part of the kingdom should not march into Scotland, till there was certain intelligence that the enemy intended to land in that part of the United Kingdom. Secondly, That timely and effectual care was taken by those employed under her majesty, at the time of the intended Invasion of Scotland, to disappoint the designs of her majesty’s enemies both at home and abroad, by fitting out a sufficient number of men of war, ordering a competent number of troops from Flanders, giving directions for the forces in Ireland to be ready for the assistance of the nation, and by making the necessary and proper dispositions of the forces in England."<sup>o</sup>

The Commons vote their Thanks to the Duke of Marlborough, though absent.] Jan. 22. The Commons unanimously resolved, "That the Commons of Great Britain being truly sensible, not only of the great and eminent services performed by his grace the duke of Marlborough, the last successful campaign, so much to the honour of Great Britain, and advantage of all Europe; but also the indefatigable zeal he persevered in, for the service of the common cause abroad, while he might, with reason, expect to be received with all the marks of honour and satisfaction at home, do with a just

* However, the author of a piece, supposed to be written by the lord Haversham himself, and published in 1709, in 4to, under the title of 'An Account of the late Invasion, as it was opened by lord Haversham, in the House of Lords, on Friday the 25th of February, 1708-9: with some Observations that were made in the House of Commons, and true copies of authentic Papers, in a Letter from a gentleman in South Britain, to his friend in North Britain,' observes, p. 20, &c. "That the same papers being laid before the House of Commons, pursuant to their Address, produced the like observations there, and that the Scots gentlemen concurred with the English, in blaming the conduct of the ministry; affirming it was such as gave great encouragement to the enemies of the government; while its friends look on their country to be perfectly given up. This, they said, was their general sense. In the House of Commons, some observations were also made upon the imprisoning many persons in Scotland at that time; several lords and gentlemen of the best quality and estates were apprehended and seized, by virtue of warrants sent from hence for suspicion of treason and treasonable practices; though it does not appear from the papers, that there was any cause to suspect; nor that any of their countrymen (who were the properest persons to be advised with on this occasion) were consulted in it. For the earl of Mar, in his letter to the earl of Leven, March 9, writes, That he, with the dukes of Queensberry and Montross, the earls of Loudon and Seafield, were summoned to the cabinet, and were told there, that since both Houses had, for securing suspected persons, suspended the Habeas Corpus act, it was fit persons in Scotland should be apprehended; and a list was read to them, which they took down in writing, and warrants were ready drawn. This was certainly a very extraordinary way of proceeding, and the more extraordinary, because the greatest part of the lords and gentlemen, taken up by these warrants, had given undoubted testimonies ever since the Revolution (in which some of them had been very active and instrumental) of their fidelity and good affection to the government; they had taken all oaths that have been enjoined for regard to his glorious actions, return him the thanks of the House;" And ordered their Speaker to transmit the same to his grace.

The Duke's Answer.] Which being done accordingly, the duke of Marlborough was pleased to return the following answer:

"Sir; Brussels, Feb. 13, 1709.

"I am extremely sensible of the great honour which the House of Commons have done me, in the Vote you have been pleased to transmit me by their order; Nothing can give me more satisfaction, than to find the services, I endeavoured to do the queen and my country, so acceptable to the House of Commons: And I beg the favour of you to assure them, I shall their security; they had sat in parliament; and some of them had been in offices and employments of great trust in the reign of king William and of her majesty. Others, under the like circumstances, were taken up by warrants, bearing date the 29th of March, when the danger was over; which made the Scots gentlemen very free in declaring, that the taking them up could be for no other reason, than to influence the approaching elections to parliament; and for their disaffection to the interests some courtiers then promoted, rather than for their disaffection to her majesty's person and government; in which they were the more confirmed, because they saw there was no evidence in the papers against any of them. There was indeed some evidence of high treason pretended against five gentlemen, taken up by warrants from the privy council of Scotland; but that was such, as the lord advocate writes; neither he, nor the other advocates employed for her majesty, did think would convict them; and therefore, humbly offered it as their opinion, that it would be more for the honor and service of her majesty, and of her government, that they should not be prosecuted. The earl of Sunderland, in his answer, acquainted him, he had laid his memorial before her majesty, who was well satisfied with what he had done, in procuring evidence against the prisoners; and though possibly, upon their trial, the evidence might not be sufficient to convict them by the law of Scotland, yet, considering all the circumstances of that affair, and the noise it has made in the world, her majesty thought it absolutely necessary for her service, that it be carried as far as it will bear. Accordingly, they were brought upon their trials, and acquitted. After all the observations made upon the papers, the consideration of them ended in the House of Commons, in the Resolution above mentioned. The gentlemen that were against this Resolution, desired that all the papers laid before the House, relating to the intended Invasion of Scotland, might be printed, that the world might see and judge, how well-grounded it was. But those, who had justified the ministry in their debates, and voted for the Resolution, would not suffer the papers to be printed, so that the question was carried in the negative."

never think any pains or perseverance too great, if I may (by God's blessing) be instrumental in procuring a safe and honourable peace for her majesty, and my fellow-subjects. I am with truth, Sir, Your, &c.

“MARLBOROUGH.”

Address of both Houses, desiring her Majesty would not decline the Thoughts of a Second Marriage.] An Order having been made by her majesty's privy council, in pursuance of her majesty's pleasure to them signified, “That in the Form of Prayer with Thanksgiving to Almighty God, to be used in all churches and chapels within this realm, every year upon the 8th day of March, (being the day on which her majesty began her happy reign) in the Prayer at the Communion-service, immediately before the reading of the Epistle for the Queen, as supreme governor of this church, these words following be left out, ‘And that these blessings may continue to after-ages, make the queen, we pray thee, an happy mother of children, who, being educated in thy true faith and fear, may happily succeed her in the government of these kingdoms;’ And that no edition of the book of Common-Prayer, with the above mentioned Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving, be printed but with this amendment.”

Mr. Watson, son to the lord Rockingham, moved, “That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, that she would not suffer her just grief so far to prevail, but would have such indulgence to the hearty desires of her subjects, as to entertain Thoughts of a Second Marriage.” This motion being seconded by several other members, was unanimously carried, and a committee appointed to draw up the said Address: which being agreed to by the House, and the Lords having given their concurrence to the same, was on the 28th of January presented to her majesty, by the Lord Chancellor, on the part of the House of Peers, and by the Speaker of the Commons, on the part of their House, being as follows:

“We your majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in parliament assembled, being truly and deeply sensible of the many and great blessings we have enjoyed during the whole course of your majesty's most glorious reign, do most humbly conceive we should be inexcusably wanting to ourselves and the whole kingdom, if we should neglect to use our most zealous endeavours, that those blessings may be derived down to future ages: and therefore, with hearts full of the most profound respect and duty to your royal person, we most humbly beseech your majesty graciously to consider the universal desires and most humble supplications of your faithful subjects, that your majesty would not so far indulge your just grief, as to decline the Thoughts of a second Marriage.—This would be an unspeakable joy to your people, who would join their most fervent prayers to Almighty God to bless your ma-

esty with royal issue; All of them concurring in this opinion, That no greater happiness can be desired for your kingdoms, than that they and their children may long continue under the gentle and gracious government of your majesty and your posterity.

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's Answer to this Address was,

“The frequent marks of duty and affection to my person and government, which I receive from both Houses of Parliament, must needs be very acceptable to me. The provision I have made for the Protestant Succession, will always be a proof, how much I have at my heart the future happiness of the kingdom. The subject of this Address is of such a nature, that I am persuaded you do not expect a particular Answer.”

Mr. Speaker having reported this Answer to the House of Commons, they resolved to present another Address to return her their Thanks for the same.

Sir Simon Harcourt's Speech on the Abington Election.] Sir Simon Harcourt having been returned for Abington, and John Hucks, esq. having lodged a Petition against him towards the latter end of this month, the merits of the cause were argued, counsel heard on both sides; and the debates continued till two in the morning, when Mr. Hucks carried it by a considerable majority, sir Simon having first taken leave of the House with the following Speech:

“Whatever the determination of this House may be, this I am sure of, and it must be admitted, that I am duly elected for the borough of Abington, as ever any man was.—Had it been the pleasure of this House to have construed the charter, under which this election is made, according to the natural and plain words of it, as the inhabitants have always understood it; in such a sense all former parliaments have frequently expounded it: had you declared the right of Election to be in those persons, who have, without any interruption, exercised it for 150 years, you could not have heard it insisted, that I had not the majority. Even as you have determined the right, my majority is still unquestionable. No gentleman, with reason, can disprove my assertion, whatever reason he may have to refuse me his vote.—You have been truly informed, the petitioner, on closing the poll, declared he did not come thither with any prospect or hopes of success.—So stupid then was I, as not to comprehend the meaning of those words, ‘I would do him justice;’ I really believe he himself was not at that time let into the secret. Any opposition may give a handle to a petition, no matter for the justice of it, power will maintain it. Whoever sent him on such an errand; what mean and contemptible notions must he entertain of the then ensuing parliament? he must suppose them capable of the basest action, of being awed and influenced by menaces or promises, and to prostitute their consciences at the word of command. Had there been such a parliament elected, and I declared not duly elected, I should then have left my place with a compassion for the unfortunate friends that staid behind me; whoever could have framed such a project to himself must undoubtedly have wished for, perhaps have wanted such a parliament. He must have been a person, the most abandoned wretch in the world, who had long quitted all notions of right and wrong, all sense of truth and justice, of honour and conscience. Whatever his dark purposes were, it is our happiness and the nation's, that they were entirely disappointed in the choice of this parliament. I cannot directly point him out, but whoever he was, I have so much charity, as sincerely to wish he may feel, and be truly sensible of the honour and impartial justice of a British parliament." [Here he summed up the Poll on both sides, and demonstrated, That the counsel for the Petition had left him the majority of two votes, and had added several unquestionable votes to his own Poll.] "The Petition charges me personally with many indirect practices; but no attempt has been made to prove any thing of that kind. As for the indirect practices charged on my agents, I had no agents; I knew of no opposition till the morning of the election, nor had the least apprehension of any. I thought no agent necessary to promote my interest, nor had I employed any person whatsoever to solicit for me: but what solicitations, what menaces and promises, have been used against me, and by whom, are but too well known to too many."

Resolutions of Supply.] Feb. 4. The Commons in a grand Committee went upon the further consideration of the Supply, and resolved; 1. "That 540,235*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.*  $\frac{1}{2}$ , be granted to her majesty, to defray the charge of maintaining guards and garrisons in Great Britain, and for payment of invalids for the service of the year 1709, including 5,000 men to serve on board the fleet. 2. That 180,000*l.* be granted for the charge of the office of her majesty's ordinance, for 1709. 3. That 49,310*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* be granted for the payment of one year's interest of the unsatisfied debentures charged upon the Irish forfeitures. 4. That 3,500*l.* be granted for the charge of circulating the old Exchequer Bills for another year. 5. That a Supply be granted to her majesty for carrying on the coinage of the gold and silver of this kingdom." These Resolutions being on the 8th reported, were agreed to by the House, and a bill ordered to be brought in, for continuing the former acts for the encouragement of the coinage.

A Committee appointed to consider of Methods to put the Laws in force against Pensioners and Place-men sitting in the House.] The same day, the Commons unanimously resolved, "That a Committee should be appointed to consider of methods for the effectual execution of the several laws now in force, for excluding from the House of Commons, officers and such as receive pensions during pleasure, and to report their opinion therein to the House;" which committee was appointed accordingly.

Mr. Wortley Montagu's Bill for Naturalizing Foreign Protestants.] Mr. Wortley Montagu made a motion for the bringing in A Bill for the naturalizing foreign Protestants, and, in a set speech, shewed the advantages that would accrue to the nation, by such an act; alledging among other particulars, "The example of the king of Prussia, who had not only invited, but furnished abundance of French refugees, with means to settle in his dominions; where he had fertilized an almost barren country, improved trade and vastly increased his revenue: adding, that if foreigners were induced to settle under a despotic government, where they found protection and encouragement, they would undoubtedly be the more inclined to bring their efforts, at least their industry, into Great Britain, where they would share the privileges of a free nation."

Mr. Compton and several other members backed Mr. Wortley's motion; and Mr. Campton saying only, "That if such a Bill were brought in, there should be a clause inserted in it for obliging such foreigners, as should be willing to enjoy the benefit of it, to receive the sacrament according to the usage of the church of England;" the House ordered the said Bill to be brought in.

Whilst this Bill was depending, a paper was printed, and industriously dispersed, importing, 1. That the confux of aliens, as would probably be the effect of such a law, might prove dangerous to our constitution; for these would owe allegiance to their respective princes, and retain a fondness for their native countries; and therefore, whensoever a war should break out, might prove so many spies and enemies. And, besides this pretence, the professed enemies of our established church and religion might flock over, with design to effect its overthrow. 2. That a general naturalization might undoubtedly spread an universal disgust and jealousy throughout the nation; there having been many complaints and commotions in London, and elsewhere, on occasion of foreigners. 3. That the design of inviting multitudes of aliens to settle here, might prove in time a further mischief; for they would not only be capable of voting at elections, but also of being chosen members of parliament; have admission into places of trust and authority, which, in process of time, might endanger our ancient polity and government, and, by frequent intermarriages, go a great way to blot out and extinguish the English race. 4. That anciently naturalizations by act of parliament were seldom or never made, but upon special reasons, and for particular occasions. And though some have given encouragement to foreign merchants and weavers to settle here; it was when our weaving-trade, and other manufactures, were inconsiderable to the advancement they have since attained: and, that from the settlement of the great customs in Edward the First's time, in all acts of parliament for subsidies since passed, aliens had always been charged with an increase of customs above natives, and a discrimination kept up between them; as was particularly remarked by the learned Lord-Chief-Justice Hale, in a tract against a general naturalization. 5. That it was more than probable, that the greatest number that would come over, would be of poor people, which would be of fatal consequence with respect to the many poor industrious families, who would thereby be reduced to the uttermost straits; it being evident, that no hands were wanted to carry on our manufactures, from the great quantities that lay on hand, their cheapness, and the lowness of wages now given. What then would be the effect of such an addition? For these aliens would altogether settle in places of manufacture; there being no instances of any of the late refugees betaking themselves to the spade, plough, or flail. And it would be a very great charge to those parishes wherein they should settle; there being now great numbers of French, who, for want of work, were relieved; and, in a great measure, maintained by the queen's bounty and charity of their churches and other well-disposed persons, who, when naturalized, would have recourse to their own respective parishes for an allowance. 6. That a general naturalization would, in effect, defeat the patent of the act of navigation, which had always been esteemed to conduce to the interest of the nation, by the encouragement and increase of English mariners, and advance of trade. 7. Hereby, in process of time, aliens would be advanced in riches, and her majesty's subjects impoverished; for those beneficial trades, buying and selling by commissions, remittances, and exchanges of money, would, in a great measure, be ingrossed by foreigners, by reason of their many friends and relations abroad. Besides, such aliens living in lodgings, and at little charge, frequently escaping public taxes and parish duties, would be able to undersell and undermine the native merchants. 8. That hereby the treasure of the nation would be exhausted and remitted into foreign parts; for it might well be supposed, that those aliens, that have valuable estates, could not or would not transport the greatest part thereof hither; and, leaving children, and their nearest relations behind them, they would come hither only a design of getting riches, and to return home again therewith, particularly upon a prospect of war; an instance of which we have in the practice of our merchants, who, when they have got estates abroad, constantly return home to enjoy the same. 9. That the queen's customs would hereby be considerably diminished; for many statutes, which lay a greater duty on aliens than on natives, would, as to this, be repealed. 10. That opportunity would hereby be given to merchants to colour the goods and merchandizes of other strangers beyond sea, their correspondents, friends, or relations, to the great detriment of her majesty's customs, and trade of the native subjects; a practice which was offered to be proved before their late majesties and the lords of the treasury; which reasons did influence the judgments of our ancestors, as appears by the statutes of 1 Hen. 7, c. 11, 11 Hen. 7, c. 14. 22 Hen. 8, c. 8. 11. That the duties of package and scavage of the goods of all merchants, as well denizens as aliens, were the indispensable right and inheritance of the commonalty and citizens of London, let to farm by lease (wherein were about 18 years to come) for a fine of 1,000*l.*, and the yearly rent of 950*l.*; and, among other things, were, by act of parliament, charged towards the raising of 8,000*l.* per annum for ever to the orphans, and other creditors of the said city; which duties would be wholly lost, to the great prejudice of the said city, and would render them incapable to support the government of the same. 12. And, in the last place, That, the nation being now engaged in an expensive, though necessary war, taxes high, trade obstructed, great quantities of woollen, and other manufactures, lay unsold; and, as an effect hereof, the several prices of making them very small, many families destitute of work throughout the kingdom. What then, at such a time as this, must be the consequence of inviting hither by a general naturalization, multitudes of poor foreigners, who would only employ themselves in trade and manufactures?

On the other hand, the City of London having petitioned the Commons on the 18th, that they might be heard by their counsel against the said bill; and their request being granted, their lawyers chiefly insisted on the 11th of the before-mentioned Reasons; but, upon examination, it was found, that the duties of package and scavage did not, of late, yield above 20*l.* per annum, most of the foreign merchants being already naturalized. The majority of the House easily discerned the captiousness of the other popular arguments, being thoroughly convinced, both by their own observation, and the reasons alledged, both within and without the walls, 'That' (as the preamble of the bill sets it forth) 'the increase of people is a means of advancing the wealth and strength of a nation.' Which maxim, the fundamental of sound politics, was abundantly verified, not only in Prussia, Holland, and other Protestant countries, which had vastly increased in riches by the French refugees settling there; but principally in Great Britain, where, by the industry of the said refugees, several new manufactures had been set up, and others improved, to the great advancement of trade, and the total turning the balance thereof, to the prejudice of France, and benefit of this nation. That, besides the improvement of commerce, the French refugees had greatly contributed towards the support of the Revolution settlement, by putting the best part of their own substance, and of their friends and relations abroad, into the public funds: (Of which they had a fresh instance in their subscribing near 500,000*l.* into the bank of England) inasmuch, that, by a modest computation, the refugees were reckoned to have above two millions sterling in the government. That as they could not be supposed to have brought one half of that money into England, so it was prudence to divert the thoughts they might have, upon the conclusion of the war, to carry their vast gains abroad, (which would very much lessen the current cash and credit of Great Britain,) by granting them the advantages and privileges enjoyed by her majesty's natural-born subjects; which would not only invite them to settle here, but likewise bring over such of their friends and relations as might hope to inherit their estates. That the French refugees had, at all times, in their several stations and callings, given signal proofs of their love for our happy constitution, and of their zeal and affection for the government: and in particular, such of them as had military employments, which they had discharged, both in the late and present war, with distinguished bravery and conduct. That this war had already consumed such a vast number of men, that it was highly necessary to supply that loss by inviting foreigners to come over, whether the war continued, which would still increase the scarcity of men; or whether it was drawing to a period, in which case a great number of hands would be requisite to carry on the manufactures. And in short, that all the objections against a naturalization were grounded upon this false supposition, 'That foreigners would ever continue, and be looked upon as such;' which was sufficiently confuted by past and daily experience.

When those who were against the Bill perceived they should have no strength, if they set themselves directly to oppose it, they studied to limit strangers in the receiving the Sacrament, to the way of the church of England. This probably would not have hindered many, who were otherwise disposed to come among us: for the much greater part of the French came into the way of our church. But it was thought best to cast the door as wide open as possible, for encouraging of strangers; and therefore since, upon their first coming over, some might chuse the way to which they had been accustomed beyond sea, it seemed the more inviting method to admit of all who were in any Protestant Communion. Accordingly, the Bill was carried in the House of Commons by a great majority, for naturalizing all Foreign Protestants, upon their taking the oaths to the government, and receiving the Sacrament in any Protestant church. All those that appeared for this comprehensive way, were reproached for their coldness and indifference in the concerns of the church. Of this the bishop of Sarum had a large share; for, when the Bill was brought up to the Lords, he spoke copiously for it; whilst the bishop of Chester spoke as zealously against it, who seemed resolved to distinguish himself as a zealot for that which was called High Church. The Bill passed with very little opposition, though it was protested against by several lords, as prejudicial to trade and manufactures, and of ill consequence to our liberties and religion.

Resolutions of Supply.] Feb. 7. The Commons in a grand Committee, considered further of the Supply, and resolved, "To grant, 1st, 1,081,063*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.* for maintaining the forces in her majesty's pay, to serve in Spain and Portugal for the service of the year 1709. And 2ndly, 144,000*l.* towards defraying the charge of transporting land forces." Which Resolutions were agreed to the next day.—On the 11th, in a Committee of the whole House, it was resolved to grant to her majesty, first, 553,855*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.* for her majesty's proportion of the Subsidies payable to her allies, pursuant to the treaties, for the service of the year 1709. And 2ndly, 310,748*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.* to defray the extraordinary charges of the war already incurred, and not already provided for by parliament: which Resolutions were likewise agreed to by the House the next day.

Proposals of the Bank of England to the Commons.] The Funds already found out scarcely answering one half of the necessary sums for the service of the year, and the Commons being somewhat puzzled about Ways and Means to raise the rest, the Ministry bethought themselves of encouraging the Bank of England, to lay the following Proposition before that House:

"The Governor and Company of the Bank of England humbly propose, That their present fund of 100,000*l.* per annum, payable out of the 5-7ths of the 9*d.* per barrel excise, being continued to them unto the 1st of August, 1711, they are contented after that time to accept 6*l.* per cent. per annum, for their original stock of 1,200,000*l.* together with 4,000*l.* per annum, towards their charges of management (hitherto paid them) out of the said fund. After which payments there being a remainder of 24,000*l.* per annum, on the said fund, they are ready to advance 400,000*l.* at such times as shall be agreed upon, at 6*l.* per cent. per ann. being allowed a discount at 6*l.* per cent. per ann. for such money, from the respective times of its advance, until the said 1st of August, 1711. And they humbly annex to this Article, That they be continued a corporation, with the said fund preserved entire to them, for the term of 21 years, from the said 1st of August, 1711, with all the grants, privileges, and immunities, they now enjoy, by virtue or in pursuance of any act or acts of parliament, redeemable afterwards by parliament on a year's notice, and repayment of the 120,000*l.* first advanced, and likewise of the 400,000*l.* now to be advanced, and all monies then due upon tallies, exchequer orders, or other parliamentary securities.

"They are content to take an annuity of 6*l.* per cent. per annum payable to them out of the duties on Houses, for all the exchequer bills that have been made out of them; and which, for any arrears of interest to be due the 25th of March next, are to be made out to them in pursuance of the act of parliament in that behalf (redeemable by parliament on a year's notice) and to deliver up the said bills, as fast as they can get them into their custody, to be cancelled, so as sufficient provision be made for the payment of the said annuity weekly, for the intermediate time between the said 25th of March next, and the 1st of August, 1710, when the said duties on houses are first to become payable, by the act last mentioned; or, that they be allowed interest upon the whole, by way of rebate, for the said intermediate time: And so that their Fund of 100,000*l.* per annum and corporation, have the prolongation desired by the first article.

“That a sufficient fund or funds be appropriated for the payment of 150,000*l.* yearly, (being 6*l.* per cent. per annum, upon the said 2,500,000*l.*) to be thus applied, viz. 75,000*l.* one moiety thereof, for the payment of interest on the bills, to run at 3*l.* per cent. per annum, or 2*d.* a day for each 100*l.* and in proportion for lesser sums; and 75,000*l.* or 3*l.* per cent. per annum, to be paid quarterly to the Bank, for the circulation of the said bills, as money, after they have passed through the revenue, and re-issued from the exchequer, in proportion to what they are standing out) till the whole sum be paid off, or cancelled. That the interest of such Exchequer-Bills be paid off and cleared at the Exchequer, before re-issued from thence. That such bills be first issued at convenient distances of times, with regard to the public services. That the bills so made out be received in all taxes, loans, and payments whatsoever, upon any aids and duties, granted, or to be granted to her majesty, till the full cancelling or paying of all of them; and that, until the said time, they may be locked up as money in her majesty's Exchequer. That the Bank be no longer obliged to such circulation or contract, than that the said premium of 3*l.* per cent. per annum be duly paid them, and the said bills be accepted in all payments, as aforesaid. That the Bank be not obliged to answer them as money till the bills are re-issued from the Exchequer. That the bearers of such bills may have right to demand the payment of them, from any receiver or collector of her majesty's revenue throughout Great Britain, out of the public money in his hands. That no more Exchequer-Bills be issued or made out by authority of parliament, or otherwise, without the consent of the Bank. That such agreement made with the Bank, be continued till the said bills are paid off and cancelled. That no member of the Bank, for, or by reason only of his acting in the said circulation, be disabled from being a member of parliament. That the Bank have all other privileges and exemptions in relation to the said Exchequer-bills, as they are entitled to by the act of parliament for the bills they now circulate, with such further privileges as the parliament in their wisdom shall think fit, for the better enabling them to perform the contract proposed.”

The Proposal of the Bank accepted.] These Proposals having been referred to a committee of the whole House, upon a report from the said committee, the House on the 16th came to these Resolutions:

1. “That towards the raising the Supply granted to her majesty, the Proposition of the governor and company of the Bank of England, for raising of several sums, amounting to 2,000,000*l.* upon such terms and conditions, and with such discount, and by such subscription, as are therein mentioned, be accepted. 2. That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, That she will be graciously pleased to issue a Commission under the Great Seal of Great Britain, for taking subscriptions, for enlarging the capital stock of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, for the better enabling them to comply with the Proposition of the said Governor and Company, agreed to by the House.”

* “The books were opened at Mercers' hall on the 22nd of February about nine in the morning, and by one o'clock in the afternoon the whole sum was subscribed. Such was the crowd of people, that brought their money to this new fund, that it was believed a million more would have been subscribed before night if there had been room. This shewed both the wealth of the nation and their entire confidence in the government. It was observable, at this very juncture, the French court had a project for erecting a royal bank for circulating their mint bills, but the design was soon found to be impracticable, because of the great scarcity of money in that kingdom and the almost entire ruin of their public credit. By this subscription, and by a further prolongation of the general mortgage of the revenue, the Commons created good funds for answering all the money they had voted in the beginning of the session. The two third subsidy was appropriated for the interest of the money raised by the bank-scheme.” Tindal.

of Great Britain, dated the 6th of February, constituted and appointed sir Thomas Abney, sir Jonathan Andrews, and divers other persons therein named, or any seven or more of them, to be Commissioners for taking the Voluntary Subscriptions that should be made by, or for any person or persons, natives or foreigners, bodies politic or corporate, of any sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole, the sum of 2,201,171*l.* 10*s.* to be added to, and engrafted upon the like sum (being the present Stock paid in of the said Governor and Company) for the doubling thereof: and who should pay down at the time of the said Subscription, one fifth part of the sums by them respectively subscribed; and be willing to pay the remaining four fifth parts thereof, together with 15*l.* per cent. more (being in all 115*l.* for every 100*l.* subscribed) in the manner, and at such times as should be appointed either by act of parliament, or by the Court and the Governor and Company of the Bank of England.

On the 26th, the House resolved to address her majesty, "That she would give directions that there might be laid before them, an Account of what Public Debts had been compounded; what had been received upon such compositions; and what receivers had compounded."

This day, John duke of Marlborough took the oaths, and made and subscribed the declaration, and also took and subscribed the oath of abjuration, pursuant to the statutes.

Thanks of the Lords to the Duke of Marlborough for his eminent Services.] March 2. The Lord Chancellor, pursuant to order, gave the duke of Marlborough the Thanks of the House, for his great and eminent services during the last campaign in Flanders; viz.

"My lord duke of Marlborough; I have the honour to be again commanded by this House, to give your grace their most hearty and unanimous thanks for the great and eminent services you have performed this last campaign, particularly to her majesty and her kingdoms, and in general to all the Allies.—When I last obeyed the like commands, I could not but infer, from your grace's former successes, we had still most reasonable expectations you could not fail to improve them.—I beg leave to congratulate your grace that the observation then made has proved, as it was indeed intended, perfectly true.—I hope I shall not be thought to exceed my present commission if, being thus led to contemplate the mighty things your grace has done for us, I cannot conclude without acknowledging, with all gratitude, the providence of God, in raising you up, to be an instrument of so much good, in so critical a juncture when it was so much wanted."

"My Lords; I hope you will do me the justice to believe there are very few things, could give me more satisfaction, than the favourable approbation of my services by this House. And I beg leave to assure your lordships it shall be the constant endeavour of my life to deserve the continuance of your good opinion."

Motion for the Demolition of Dunkirk.] The talk of a Treaty being about this time become general, the lord Somers moved in the House of Peers, "That an Address be presented to her majesty, that she would be pleased to take care, at the conclusion of the War, that the French king might be obliged to own her majesty's title, and the Protestant Succession, and that the Pretender might be removed out of the French dominions," which was unanimously approved.

The Committee appointed by the Lords to draw up the Address moved by lord Somers, having prepared it, and their lordships having approved it, it was sent down to the Commons, where Mr. Secretary Boyle represented, "That the British nation having been at a vast expence of blood and treasure for the prosecution of this necessary war, it was but just they should reap some benefit by the peace: and the town of Dunkirk being a nest of pirates, that infested the ocean, and did infinite mischief to trade, he therefore moved, "That the demolishing of its fortifications and harbour be insisted upon in the ensuing treaty of peace, and inserted in the Address:" which, with that amendment, was unanimously approved, and carried back to their lordships by Mr. Secretary Boyle.

Address of both Houses for the Preservation of the Repose and Quiet of Europe, by establishing a firm Friendship among the Allies, &c.] The queen having appointed the 3d, at six of the clock, for receiving the said Address, the Lord Chancellor, on the part of the Peers, and the Speaker of the Commons, on the part of the Commons, attended her majesty with it, being as follows:

"Most Gracious Sovereign; We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in parliament assembled, considering the great expence of blood and treasure that your majesty and your allies have been at, in prosecuting this long war, for securing the liberties of Europe, do most humbly beseech your majesty, That, for preserving the repose and quiet of Europe, and preventing the ambitious designs of France for the future, your majesty would be pleased to take care, at the conclusion of the war, to continue and establish a good and firm friendship among the allies; and that the French king may be obliged to own your majesty's title and the Protestant Succession, as it is established by the laws of Great Britain; and that your allies be engaged to become guaranteees for the same.—And that your majesty would take effectual methods, that the Pretender shall be removed out of the French dominions, and not suffered to return to disturb your majesty, your heirs or successors, in the Protestant line.—And for the Security of your majesty's dominions, and the preservation of Trade, and the general benefit of the allies, your majesty will be graciously pleased, that care may be taken that the fortifications and harbour of Dunkirk may be demolished and destroyed."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's Answer to this Address was this:

"I am of the same opinion with my two Houses of Parliament in the several particulars of this Address; as I have also been in all the other which they have made on the same subject. I assure you no care shall be wanting on my part to attain the ends they have desired."

Resolutions of Supply.] This Answer being reported to the Commons, they ordered an Address of Thanks to be presented to her majesty; and the same day, in a committee of the whole House, considered farther of ways and means for raising the Supply, and came to these Resolutions: "First, That, in further part of the yearly fund to be settled pursuant to the proposition of the governor and company of the bank of England, for raising part of the supply granted to her majesty, for the service of the year 1709, the duties on coffee, chocolate, tea, spices and pictures, and the 15 per cent. on muslins, which were continued, and the new additional duties on coffee, tea, spices, pictures, drugs, china-wares and callicoes, which were granted (amongst other things) by the act of the third year of her majesty's reign, entitled, 'An Act for continuing duties on low wines, and upon coffee, tea, chocolate, spices and pictures, and upon hawkers, pedlars and petty chapmen, and upon muslin; and for granting new duties upon several of the said commodities, and also upon callicoes, china-wares and drugs, until the 24th day of June 1710;' and which, by an act of the 6th year of her majesty's reign, were continued from the 23rd of June 1710, for the term of 4 years from thence next ensuing, shall be further continued from the expiration of the said term of 4 years, and be payable to her majesty, her heirs and successors for ever. 2dly, That, immediately from and after the time that the sum now remaining unsatisfied of the loans not exceeding 700,000*l.* secured by the said acts of the 3d and 6th years of her majesty's reign, upon the said duties on coffee and other commodities therein respectively mentioned, and the interest thereof shall be duly paid off and discharged, or that sufficient money shall be reserved in the Exchequer for that purpose; all the moneys which shall, or may from thenceforth arise by the duties of coffee, tea, chocolate, spices and pictures, muslins, drugs, china-wares and callicoes therein continued or granted until the 24th day of June 1714, shall be subjected and made liable towards making good the said yearly fund to be settled as aforesaid. 3dly, That, immediately from and after the time that the sum now remaining unsatisfied of the loans, not exceeding 636,957*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* secured by several acts of the 3rd and 6th years of her majesty's reign, upon the two thirds of the Subsidies therein mentioned, and the interest thereof shall be fully paid off and discharged, or that sufficient money shall be reserved in the Exchequer for that purpose, all the moneys which shall or may from henceforth arise by the said two thirds of the said subsidies, until the 7th of March 1711, shall also be subjected and made liable, towards making good the said yearly fund, to be settled as aforesaid. 4thly, That, towards raising the supply to be granted to her majesty, the impositions upon wines, vinegar, and tobacco, which were first granted to king James 2d, in the first year of his reign; and the impositions upon the East-India goods, and other goods charged therewith, which were first granted to their late majesties king William and queen Mary, in the 2nd year of their reign, and the additional impositions upon several goods and merchandizes which were at first granted to king William and queen Mary, in the 4th year of their reign; and the several duties on whale-fins imported, which were granted to king William in the 9th year of his reign; all which duties have continuance by several subsequent acts, until Aug. 1, 1714, shall be farther continued to her majesty, her heirs and successors, from the last day of July 1714, to the 1st day of August 1716, and no longer. 5thly, That, from and after the time that all the principal and interest, which by former acts of parliament are charged upon the said impositions upon wines, vinegar, tobacco, and East-India goods, and upon the said additional impositions, and upon the same duties upon whale-fins, or upon them or any of them, jointly with other duties, shall be paid off and satisfied; or that sufficient money shall be reserved in the Exchequer for that purpose, all the monies which shall from thenceforth arise by the said impositions upon wine, vinegar, tobacco, and East-India goods, and by the said additional imposition and duties upon whale-fins, shall be appropriated towards raising the supply granted to her majesty. 6thly, That all tobacco to be used or consumed on board any of her majesty's ships of war in any part of Europe (which shall be sold by the commander or purser) be stampd. 7thly, That a duty be laid upon the said stamps. 8thly, That the said duty be one penny for every stamp to be affixed to every four pound weight of such tobacco, the same to be paid by the manufacturer thereof." Which Resolutions being the next day reported were agreed to by the House.

March 7. The House considered farther of Ways and Means, and resolved, 1st, "That for making good the allowance of 3*l.* per cent. per ann. for circulation of the Exchequer-Bills, to be circulated by the governor and company of the Bank of England, from the time the said Exchequer-Bills shall begin to be issued, and the interest of 2*d.* per diem for every 100*l.* to be borne upon the said bills, until the funds which are to be made liable to the said allowances for interest and circulation shall take effect, and be sufficient for that purpose, a power and direction be given for issuing like Exchequer-bills, quarterly for so much as the said allowances for interest and circulation shall amount unto; and that the said quarterly bills have also the like allowances as to the interest and circulation from the respective times of their being made forth, and have the same currency in the public revenues, and be also chargeable upon the same cancelling funds, and be in all respects circulated upon the same terms and conditions as the other Exchequer bills, to be made forth in pursuance of the proposition of the said governor and company. 2dly, That towards raising a sufficient fund or funds for the paying off and cancelling, in some certain time, the Exchequer bills to be circulated by the governor and company of the Bank of England in order to her majesty's supply for the service of the year 1709, that moiety or half part of the subsidy of tonnage and poundage, and other duties and sums of money payable upon wines, goods and merchandizes imported, which were granted to his late majesty king Charles 2, for his life by an act of parliament in the 12th year of his reign, and which by several subsequent acts have been granted to continue till the first day of August 1714, shall be further continued from the last day of July 1714, and be payable to her majesty, her heirs and successors for ever: and that the same and all arrears thereof (not already appropriated by any former act or acts of parliament in that behalf) shall be made subject and liable for, or towards the payment of 200,000*l.* per ann. to be appropriated and applied for, and towards the paying off and cancelling the said Exchequer-Bills until they shall be wholly discharged; the said 200,000*l.* per ann. to commence from the time that the loans made, or to be made upon an act of the 6th year of her majesty's reign, and charged on the said half subsidy, and other duties therein mentioned and all the interest thereof shall be satisfied. 3dly, That the excess or surplus which shall, from time to time arise, of and from the other moiety or half part of the subsidies of tonnage and poundage and other duties and sums of money payable upon wines, goods and merchandizes imported, which were first granted in the 12th year of the reign of king Charles 2, and which, by several subsequent acts, had continuance until the 1st of August 1712, for the purposes therein mentioned: And by an act of the 6th year of her majesty's reign, were further continued for the term of 96 years from the last day of July 1712, for payment of annuities, not exceeding 80,000*l.* per ann. (which excess or surplus, by a clause in the said act of the 6th year of her majesty's reign was reserved to be disposed for the public use and service, and not otherwise) and all arrears of the said half subsidies and duties not already appropriated, or to be applied by any act or acts of parliament in that behalf, shall also be made subject and liable for or towards the payment of the said 200,000*l.* per ann. for cancelling and discharging the said Exchequer-Bills as aforesaid. 4thly, That the excess or surplus which shall from time to time arise, as well by the duties of coffee, tea, chocolate, spices, pictures, muslins, drugs, chinawares and calicoes, as by the two third parts of the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, made liable to the payment of the allowances amounting to 6 per cent. per ann. or thereabouts for interest and circulation of the said Exchequer-Bills, after the same duties and revenues shall commence and take effect for that purpose (which excess or surplus shall remain from time to time,) after discharging or leaving sufficient to discharge the said allowances, amounting to 6 per cent. per ann. or thereabouts, shall likewise be made subject and liable for, or towards the payment and making good of the said 200,000*l.* per ann. for cancelling the said Exchequer-Bills aforesaid. 5thly, That, in case at the end of any year, after the time when the said 200,000*l.* per ann. is to commence as aforesaid it shall appear that the funds intended as aforesaid for making good the same shall be deficient for that purpose. Then, and so often every such deficiency shall and may be made up out of the produce of these funds in any subsequent year or years, in which shall appear to be an overplus, to be applied for, or towards making good of such deficiency. And 6thly, That the duty upon the exportation of copper of the produce of Great Britain, and all brass wise made here be taken off." Which Resolutions being the next day reported, were agreed to by the House, and a bill ordered to be brought in upon these, and the other resolutions agreed to three days before.

A Bill for exchanging Tobacco for French Wines dropped.] Some time before a Bill had been brought into the House of Commons, "For the Exportation of Tobacco and other commodities, and manufactures of the growth and product of Great Britain," the design of which was, to exchange Tobacco for French Wines: But the Portuguese Ambassador having by a Memorial represented to her majesty, and by word of mouth, to several members without doors, That the bill was contrary to the alliance between her majesty and the king his master; and it being considered besides, that the said exchange would redound to the advantage of France, and to the benefit of five or six persons in Great Britain only: After the bill had been twice read, and committed to a Committee of the whole House, the question was put on the 9th, that the whole House should then resolve itself into the said Committee; which being then carried in the negative, the bill was dismissed, by putting off the consideration of it for a month. And on the other hand, a bill was ordered to be brought in, "For the more effectual prohibiting the importation of French wines, and all other commodities of the growth and product of France."

Bill for preserving the Privileges of Ambassadors.] The deficiency of the laws to punish insults, in the cases of Foreign Ministers, being apparent in the case of the Muscovite Ambassador, a Bill was brought into the House of Commons, "For preserving the Privileges of Ambassadors and other Foreign Ministers." Count Gallas, the Imperial and Spanish envoy, having got a copy of it, communicated it to baron Spanheim, the Prussian Ambassador, at whose house there was a meeting of Foreign Ministers, who resolved to lay before the secretaries of state their observations on the Bill, in a Memorial, importing, "That the preamble of the bill mentioned only the particular indignity offered to the Muscovite Ambassador, and his being arrested and taken out of his coach by violence, &c. in contempt of the protection granted by her majesty, without taking notice of the law of nations, on which the privileges of ambassadors are founded, and which is superior and antecedent to all municipal laws: and therefore they insisted, that in the preamble these words should be added, 'Contrary to the law of nations, and in prejudice of the rights and privileges, which ambassadors, and other public ministers, authorized and received as such, have at all times been thereby possessed of, and which ought to be kept sacred and inviolable.' 2. That, in the Clause for preventing for the future the seizing, arresting, or imprisoning of Public Ministers, it should be made criminal to offer them any insult or ill treatment. 3. That their equipages, goods, and other effects, of what nature soever, ought likewise to enjoy the same protection, with their persons and servants, and not be seized or stopped on any pretence. 4. That their houses ought to be accounted and declared sanctuaries, and no bailiffs, or other officers of justice, allowed to enter the same. 5. And that foreign ambassadors, and other ministers, ought to enjoy these privileges from their first coming into Great-Britain, till they are out of her majesty's dominions, even after they have had their audience of leave, as long as they retain their characters." The substance of this Memorial being communicated to the Committee, to whom that Bill was referred, they inserted the first Amendment in the preamble, but did not think proper to mention the other particulars: and, Mr. Compton having reported the several amendments made to the bill, the House added a clause, "That no person should be proceeded against for having arrested the servant of an ambassador, or Public Minister, by virtue of this act, unless the name of such servant be first registered in the office of one of the principal secretaries of state, and by such secretary transmitted to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, who shall hang up the same in some public place in their offices, &c." and ordered the bill to be ingrossed. The foreign ministers, having also procured a copy of this last clause, held another assembly at baron Spanheim's house, at which the earl of Sunderland assisting, they represented to him, "That the exacting lists of foreign ministers servants was a thing unpractised in other courts, and liable to several inconveniencies; and desired besides, that the lord chamberlain of her majesty's household might be added to the number of persons appointed by this bill, to take cognizance of the offences committed against the privileges of Foreign Ministers, and to inflict such punishments, as they shall judge fit." But the parliament did not think fit to make any more alterations in the bill.

Bill against Public Wagers.] The Commons being informed, that the humour of laying Wagers about the events of war was grown to such an height, that many unwary persons were ruined by it, and that the most crafty in those bargains maintained clandestine correspondences abroad, which might be of dangerous consequence to the government, a Bill was brought in, which passed both Houses, and received the royal assent, to prevent the laying of Wagers relating to the Public.

Resolutions respecting Nevis and St. Christophers.] March 14. The House of Commons, in a grand Committee, took into consideration the Report of the Lord High-Treasurer, made upon the Address to her majesty, relating to the people of Nevis and St. Christophers, and resolved, "That it did appear that the Losses they had sustained by the late invasion of the French, did amount to upwards of 300,000*l.* 2. That it would be for the advantage of the trade of Great Britain, that the inhabitants of the said islands be enabled to resettle there." These Resolutions, being on the 18th reported, were agreed to by the House; and at the same time a motion was made, that a Supply be granted for enabling the said inhabitants to resettle in those islands; which on the 21st, in a grand Committee, was carried in the affirmative. And on the 25th, likewise in a grand Committee, it was resolved, "That the sum of 103,203*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* be granted for the use of such proprietors or inhabitants only of Nevis and St. Christophers, who were sufferers by the late French invasion there, and who shall resettle, or cause to be resettled their plantations in the said islands." Which Resolution was, on the 6th of April, reported, and agreed to by the House.

Proceedings on the Bill concerning Trials of Treason in Scotland.] The consideration of the state of the nation, with respect to the late Invasion, gave occasion to a bill concerning trials of treasons in Scotland, under the title of "An Act for improving the Union of the two kingdoms." This bill caused very great and long debates, and sprang from the proceedings against the suspected persons in Scotland, and particularly from a trial of some gentlemen of that kingdom, who had left their houses, when the Pretender was on the sea, and had gone about armed and in so secret and suspicious a manner, that it gave great cause of jealousy. There was no clear evidence to convict them; but there were very strong, if not violent presumptions against them. Some forms in the trial had not been observed, which the criminal court judged were necessary, and not to be dispensed with. But the queen's advocate, sir James Stuart, was of another mind. The court thought it was necessary by their laws, that the names of the witnesses should have been signified to the prisoners 15 days before the trial. But the queen's advocate had not complied with this, as to the chief witnesses, so that the court could not hear their evidence. He did not upon that move for a delay; and therefore the trial went on, and the gentlemen were acquitted. Severe expostulations passed between the queen's advocate and the court. They complained of one another to the queen, and both sides justified their complaints in print. Upon this it appeared, that the laws in Scotland, concerning Trials in Cases of Treason, were not fixed nor certain. For which reason a bill was brought into the House of Commons to settle that matter; but it was so much opposed by the Scots members, that it was dropped in the committee. It was taken up and managed with more zeal by the Lords.

It consisted of three heads: all crimes, which were high treason by the law of England, and these only, were to be high-treason in Scotland. The manner of proceeding settled in England was to be observed in Scotland; and the pains and forfeitures were to be the same in both nations. The Scots lords opposed every branch of this act. They moved, that all things, that were high-treason by the law of England, might be enumerated in the act, for the information of the Scots nation; otherwise they must study the book of statutes, to know when they were safe, and when they were guilty. To this it was answered, that direction would be given to the judges, to publish an abstract of the laws of high-treason, which would be a sufficient information to the people of Scotland in this matter. That nation would by this means be in a much safer condition than they were now; for the laws they had, were conceived in such general words, that the judges might put such constructions on them, as should serve the ends of a bad court; but they would by this act be restrained in this matter for the future.

The second head in this Bill occasioned a much longer debate: it changed the whole method of proceedings in Scotland. The former way there was, the queen's advocate signed a citation of the persons, setting forth the special matter of high-treason, of which they were accused. This was to be delivered to them, together with the names of the witnesses, 15 days before the trial. When the jury was impanelled, no peremptory charges were allowed: reasons were to be offered with every challenge; and, if the Court allowed them, they were to be proved immediately. Then the matter of the charge, which is there called the relevancy of the libel, was to be argued by lawyers, whether the matter, suppose it should be proved, did amount to high-treason, or not. This was to be determined by a sentence of the Court, called the interloquitur; and the proof of the fact was not till then to be made. Of that the jury had the cognizance. Anciently the verdict went with the majority, the number being fifteen; but, by a late act, the verdict was to be given upon the agreement of two third parts of the jury. In the sentence, the law did not limit the judges to a certain form, but they could aggravate the punishment, or moderate it, according to the circumstances of the case. All this method was to be set aside; a grand jury was to find the bill; the judges were only to regulate proceedings, and to declare what the law was; and the whole matter of the Indictment was to be left intire to the jury, who were to be twelve, and all to agree in their verdict.—In one particular the forms of Scotland were much preferable to those in England; the depositions of the witnesses were taken indeed by word of mouth, but were writ out, and after that were signed by the witnesses; they were sent into the jury; and these were made a part of the record. This was very slow and tedious; but the jury, by this means, was more certainly possessed of the evidence, and the matter was more clearly delivered down to posterity; whereas the records in England are very defective, and give no light to an historian who peruses them.—The Scots opposed this alteration of their way of proceeding. They said, that neither the judges, the advocates, nor the clerks, would know how to manage a trial of treason. They insisted most on the having the names of the witnesses to be given to the persons some days before their trial. It seemed reasonable that a man should know who was to be brought to witness against him, that so he might examine his life, and see what credit ought to be given to him. On the other hand, it was said, this would open a door to practice, either upon the witnesses to corrupt them, or in suborning other witnesses to defame them. To this it was answered, that a guilty man knew what could be brought against him; and, without such notice, would take all the methods possible to defend himself. But provision ought to be made for innocent men, whose chief guilt might be a good estate, upon which a favourite might have an eye; and therefore such persons ought to be taken care of. This was afterwards so much softened, that it was only desired that the names of the witnesses, who had given evidence to the grand jury, should, upon their finding the bill, be signified to the prisoner five hours before his trial. Upon a division of the House on this question, the votes were equal; and therefore by the rule of the House, that in such a case the negative prevails, it was lost.

Upon the third head of the Bill the debates grew still warmer. In Scotland many families were settled by long entails and perpetuities; and therefore it was said, that since, by one of the Articles of the Union, all private rights were still preserved, no breach could be made on these settlements. Bishop Burnet carried this further: he thought that it was neither just nor reasonable to set the children on begging for their father's faults: that the Romans, during their liberty, never thought of arrying punishment so far: that it was an invention under the tyranny of the emperors, who had a particular revenue called the Fife; and all forfeitures were claimed by them, from whence they were called confiscations: that it was never the practice of free governments; that Boulogne flourished beyond any town in the pope's dominions, because they made it an article of their capitulation with the pope; that no confiscation should follow on any crime whatsoever: that in Holland the confiscation was redeemable by so very small a sum as an hundred guilders. That many instances might be brought of prosecutions only to obtain the confiscation. But in this none of the lords seconded the bishop. It was acknowledged that this was just and reasonable, and fit to be passed in good times; but, since the nation was then exposed to so much danger from abroad, it did not seem advisable to abate the severity of the law. But clauses were agreed to, by which, upon marriages, settlements might be made in Scotland as was practised in England; for no estate is forfeited for the crime of him, who is only tenant for life. By this act also tortures were condemned; and the queen was empowered to grant commissions of Oyer and Terminer, as in England, for trying treasons. The Scots insisted on this, that, the justiciary or the criminal court being preserved by an article of the Union, this broke in upon that. It was answered, that the criminal court was still to sit in the time regulated; but these commissions were granted upon special occasions. In the intervals between the terms, it might be necessary, upon some emergency, not to delay trials too long. But, to give some content, it was provided by a clause, that a judge of the criminal court should be always one of the quorum in these commissions. Thus the bill passed in the House of Lords, notwithstanding the opposition of all the Scots lords, with whom many of the Tories concurred, they being disposed to oppose the court in every thing, and to make treason as little to be dreaded as possible.

The Bill met with the same opposition in the House of Commons; yet it passed with two amendments. By one, the names of the witnesses, who had appeared before the grand jury, were ordered to be sent to the prisoner ten days before his trial. The other was, that no estate in land was to be forfeited upon a judgment of high-treason: which came up fully to the motion which bishop Burnet had made. Both these amendments were looked on as such popular things, that it was not probable that the House of Commons would recede from them. Upon that, the Whigs in the House of Lords did not think fit to oppose them, or to lose the bill; and therefore it was moved to agree to these amendments, with this proviso, moved by the lord Somers, that they should not take place till after the death of the Pretender. It was said, that, since he assumed the title of king of Great Britain, and had so lately attempted to invade the nation, it was not reasonable to lessen the punishment, and the dread of treason, as long as he lived. Others objected to this, that there would be still a Pretender after him, since so many persons stood in the lineal descent before the house of Hanover, so that this proviso seemed to be, upon the matter, the rejecting the amendment. But it was observed, that to pretend to the right of succeeding was a different thing from assuming the title, and attempting an invasion. The amendment was received with this proviso; but those, who were against the whole bill, did not agree to it. The House of Commons consented to the proviso; which the Lords had added to their amendment, with a further addition, that it should not take place till three years after the house of Hanover should succeed to the crown.

This met with great opposition; it was considered as a distinguishing character of those, who were for or against the present constitution and the succession; the Scots still opposing it on the account of their formal laws. Both parties collected their strength, and many, who had gone into the country, were brought up on this occasion; so that the bill, with all the amendments and proviso's, was carried by a small majority; the Lords agreeing to this new amendment. The Scots members in both Houses seemed to apprehend, that the bill would be very odious in their country; and therefore, to maintain their interest at home, they who were divided in every thing else, did agree in opposing this bill.

The court apprehended, from the heat with which the debates were managed, and the difficulty in carrying the bill through both Houses, that ill disposed men would endeavour to possess people with apprehensions of bad designs and severities that would be set on foot; and therefore resolved to have an Act of Grace immediately upon it. It was the first the queen had sent, though she had now reigned above seven years. The ministers, for their own sakes, took care that it should be very full. It was indeed fuller than any former Act of Grace. All treasons committed before the signing the act, which was the 19th of April, were pardoned, those only excepted that were done upon the sea. By this, they who had embarked with the Pretender, were still at mercy. This act, according to form, was read once in both Houses, and with the usual compliments of thanks.

“Dissentient We humbly beg leave to protest against the title, preamble, and body of this bill, for the reasons following: 1. We conceive the general title of this bill very improper, because it does not express the particular purposes of it, which are altering the laws of the northern part of Britain, and the method of trials in matters relating to treason; and because we apprehend, this act will be so far from answering its title, of improving the Union, that we are humbly of opinion, and sincerely persuaded, it may have a quite contrary effect. 2. The preamble of this bill may happen to give unnecessary grounds of suspicion, to mistaken people, that there is a tendency towards a total alteration of the laws of Scotland, which cannot but create great uneasiness to that people, who rested in a confidence, that their private laws were secured to them by the Articles of the Union, so as not to be altered without the evident utility of the people of Scotland. 3. It does not appear to be necessary, that new courts and jurisdictions should be created in a country where the courts of judicary were to be preserved in the exercise of their authority by the Articles of the Union, though it might be thought reasonable, that the same facts and offences might be esteemed treason and misprision of treason, and that the punishments might be likewise the same; and we do humbly conceive, that the commissions of Oyer and Terminer may be construed an impairing the authority of the courts of judicary in Scotland, and the entire alteration of the methods of trials may render it very difficult to prosecute any person for the crimes of treason, and very insecure for the people, who are to make their defence in unknown methods. 4. The general description of treason in this act, without specifying either the particular facts that shall be accounted treasonable, or the particular laws to be established in both kingdoms, is a just exception against the bill; for it would have been a great satisfaction to the people of North Britain, if these laws had been reviewed in a parliament where their representatives might have had time to have examined the reasonableness of them, and had a share in the passing them; but the enacting all the laws of England, without entering into any detail or consideration of them, may create great uneasiness. 5. The present laws of Scotland, in relation to the forfeitures, ought to have been considered as established upon most solid foundations; they were settled upon the tender of the crown to king William, and accordingly passed into the laws at that time, which the subjects might well conclude they should never be deprived of: But the proviso in this act relating to marriage settlements is only a remedy in part, and but a share of the just provisions made on behalf of the subjects in that remarkable and happy Revolution, which so much improved the constitution of both kingdoms.—Lastly, We conceive, that whereas the qualification for a jury-man to be sworn upon the panel is by this act affixed to the possession of 40s. per annum, it ought to have been kept up to what the law of England now ordains in trial, which is, that the juryman be seized of 10l. per annum in his own right, or that of his wife's. (Signed) Buckingham, Anandale, Roseberie, Seafield, Crawford, Dover, Montrose, Guilford, Denbigh, Loudoun, Orkney, Rothes, Greenwich, Roxburgh, G. Sarum, Marr, Peterborough, Wemyss, Isla, Hamilton."

of the Lord-Commissioners was delivered to both Houses by the Lord Chancellor as followeth;

"My Lords and Gentlemen; Being now, by the queen's directions, to put an end to this session, we have it in command from her majesty to assure you, her majesty is extremely sensible of the zeal and affection you have shewn for her service and the good of her people, and of the prudence and dispatch with which you have completed the important business of this session.—The vigour and firmness of your proceedings have already had a very good effect on affairs abroad; and there is ground to hope, that by God's blessing on her majesty's endeavours, this will every day appear more and more evident.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; We are to return you in particular her majesty's thanks, for your having provided so timely and effectually the supplies found necessary to the prosecution of this war, with an augmentation of those forces, which in conjunction with our allies, have, by God's assistance, procured us the present advantages over the common enemy.—Our cheerfulness in giving such large Supplies at this juncture, and the ready advances which have been made for their being effectual with so little burden to the people, shew you perfectly understand how to make a right use of our past successes, and that nothing is too difficult for so dutiful and affectionate subjects, acting in defence of so good a cause.

"My Lords and Gentlemen; her majesty, through the whole course of her reign, having been desirous to shew all possible instances of goodness and clemency to her subjects, hath now, for the strengthening the Union, and quieting the minds of all her subjects throughout the United Kingdom, thought fit to grant to them an Act of Grace and Free Pardon, in a more full and beneficial manner than hath been formerly used; not doubting but all her people will make a right use of, and suitable returns on their part for, so extraordinary an indulgence.—Her majesty, having also been graciously pleased to give the royal assent to the several bills you have presented during this session, commands us to observe to you on that occasion, that the life and benefit of all laws, how wisely soever they are framed, do chiefly consist in a due and regular execution of them; and therefore to exhort you, that when you return to your countries, you would think it indispensably your duty, to set a good example towards an impartial and steady observation of the many good laws which have been enacted (especially since the late Revolution), and which fall within your provinces to execute; it being but too evident, that the defect at present attending us, is not so much the want of new laws, as the neglect and disregarding those already made."

Then the Lord Chancellor said, "My Lords and Gentlemen; it is her majesty's royal will and pleasure, that this parliament be prorogued to Thursday the 19th day of May next: and this parliament is prorogued accordingly."

Principal Occurrences during the Recess.] Conferences, at the Hague, having been opened for a general peace, the duke of Marlborough and Lord Townsend had been appointed joint plenipotentiaries in behalf of Great Britain; and preliminaries, to the last degree mortifying on the side of France, (such as the restoring the whole Spanish monarchy to king Charles within two months, as likewise the Netherlands, except Cambray and St. Omer's, several places to the Empire, Savoy to the Duke, and Newfoundland to England, the demolishing of Dunkirk, the removing the Pretender; no suspension of arms till the article relating to the Spanish Monarchy was fulfilled, &c. &c.) were agreed upon, but not ratified, upon which it was resolved to break off the Treaty, and proceed with the war. Accordingly the campaign was opened on all sides, and once more the fate of Europe was left to the decision of the sword.—But little was done on the Rhine, as usual; the Portuguese ventured on an engagement and were beaten. The Duke of Savoy gave the French no disturbance in Dauphiny, because the Emperor refus'd to come up to the price he had set upon his services: And in Spain, when king Philip would have engaged count Staremberg, the French General, Besons, produced his master's orders to avoid a battle. Thus the grand issue was left to be determined in Flanders, and the principal strength of both parties was stationed to dispute the point accordingly.—While the French were expecting the confederates to open the campaign with the siege of Ypres, they suddenly invested Tournay; and in the beginning of September, made themselves masters of it. After which they undertook Mons; but were prevented from making any progress in their design, by the arrival of the marshals Villars and Boufflers; who possess'd themselves of a wood, and covered their camp with lines almost impenetrable, before a resolution was taken to dislodge them. Mons was, however, thought worthy so desperate an attempt; and to the amazement of all military critics, it was crowned with success. The enemy, however, retired to Valenciennes, and Mons surrendered in October; with which exploit ended the campaign.—At sea nothing was done, or thought of, though the French had left it free and open to whatever enterprises we pleased to undertake.

SECOND SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT OF GREAT BRITAIN.

The Queen's Speech on Opening the Session.] November 15. The Parliament being met, the Queen, who had not been in person there during the last session, came and made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; it is a great satisfaction to me, that I am able to give you so good an account of the progress of the war, since the last session of parliament. In the Le-ginning of this year our enemies made use of all their artifices, to amuse us with false appearances and deceitful insinuations of their desire of peace; in hopes that from thence means might be found, to create some divisions or jealousies among the Allies. But they were entirely disappointed in their expectation; and such measures were taken upon that occasion, as made it impossible for them long to disguise their insincerity. The operations of the war were not delayed; and the campaign, which, notwithstanding the backwardness of the season, immediately followed, has been at least as glorious for the allies, as any of those which have preceded it. God Almighty has been pleased to bless us with a most remarkable Victory; and with such other great and important successes, both before and after it, that France is thereby become much more exposed and open to the impression of our arms; and consequently more in need of a peace, than it was at the beginning of this campaign. However, the war still continuing, I find myself obliged again to desire you, gentlemen of the House of Commons, to grant me such supplies as you shall judge necessary, for the assisting our Allies in all parts, and the vigorous prosecution of our advantages; that we may put the last hand to this great work, of reducing that exorbitant and oppressive power, which has so long threatened the liberties of Europe. I assure you, that all you give shall be carefully applied to the uses of the war, if it continues; or to the lessening of the debts it has necessarily occasioned, in case of a peace; which, though the many wants and distresses of our enemies may naturally lead us to expect, yet our own late experience may fully convince us, is not to be depended upon any other way, than by being in a condition to compel them to such terms as may be safe and honourable for all the Allies.

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I think it proper to take notice to you, that the great dearth and scarcity under which our neighbours abroad have suffered this year, begins to affect us in some measure at home, by the temptation of profit in carrying out too much of our corn, while it bears so high a price in foreign parts. This occasions many complaints from the poor; for whose sake I earnestly recommend to you, to take this growing evil into your consideration; having not neglected any thing on my part, towards the remedying of it, that the law would allow. I cannot conclude without observing to you, of what great advantage it will be at this time, to the end we all propose to ourselves, that the greatest dispatch be given to the necessary preparations for carrying on the war."

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, cannot conceal the joy and satisfaction which filled our hearts, in seeing your majesty's royal person sitting upon your throne, after the great misfortune which deprived us of your presence during the last session of parliament: nor can we forbear to return our humble and hearty thanks for your most gracious speech; whereby it appears how readily your tenderness for your people inclined your majesty to hearken to proposals of peace; how wisely and steadily you proceeded in the first steps of the treaty, and how justly you resented the artifices and insincerity of the enemy, by the immediate and vigorous prosecution of the war. This soon made it appear, that peace was the choice of your moderation, and must prove the only refuge of your enemies. The last campaign was so very glorious, whether we consider the strength of the towns which were taken, or the difficulty and importance of the victory which was obtained, that we beg leave to congratulate your majesty upon the continued success of your arms, and those of your Allies, under your general the duke of Marlborough; whose conduct is worthy of the chief command in so just a war, and whose valour is equal to the bravery of your troops. And we beg leave to assure your majesty, that this House will, to the utmost of their power, support your majesty to carry on the war, and improve the advantages you have gained, till France is compelled to submit to the terms of a safe and lasting peace for us and all your Allies."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty gave this Answer:

"I thank you very kindly for your Address; and am extremely sensible of the constant proofs you give me of your great zeal and affection for my service and the public good."

The Commons' Address.] The Address of the Commons was as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign; We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, beg leave to return our most humble thanks to your majesty for your most gracious speech from the throne; and to congratulate your majesty upon the continued successes of the last campaign, particularly the Victory, obtained near Mons by the troops of your majesty, and those of your Allies, under the command of the duke of Marlborough.—A Victory so remarkable in all its circumstances, as must convince your enemies, that the courage and resolution of your troops, conducted by so great a general, are superior to the greatest difficulties.—And your majesty may be assured, that, since the public credit has been so well supported, since your councils have been so steady, and your Allies so firm, that no French artifices could create jealousies or divisions amongst them; and, since your arms have been so powerful, that no entrenchments or fortifications could withstand them; we your faithful Commons, under such encouragements, in duty to your majesty, and those we represent, will, by speedy and effectual supplies, enable your majesty to dispatch the necessary preparations, for carrying on the war in such a manner, as shall, by the blessing of God, oblige the common enemy to accept a peace upon such terms, as shall be a lasting security to your majesty and your Allies."

The Queen's Answer.] The Queen gave this Answer:

"I return you my hearty thanks for your Address, and the assurances, you give me, of providing speedy and effectual supplies, for carrying on the war; which, I persuade myself, will have a very good effect, for the advantage of the whole confederacy."

Thanks given to the Duke of Marlborough. Nov. 17. The Thanks of the House of Lords were given to the Duke of Marlborough, by the Lord Chancellor, as follows:

"My Lord Duke of Marlborough; I am commanded by the Lords (when you should first appear in your place) to give, as I now do, the Thanks of this House, for your continued and eminent services to her majesty, and the public, during the last campaign; of which nothing can be said greater, than her majesty, (who always speaks with the utmost certainty and exactness) has declared from the throne. 'That it has been at least as glorious as any which have preceded it.'—But this repetition of the Thanks of this august assembly has this advantage of the former, that it must be looked upon as added to, and standing on, the foundations already laid here, in the records of this House, for the preserving your memory precious to all future times: so that your grace has also the satisfaction of seeing this everlasting monument of your glory rise every year much higher.—May God continue, in a wonderful manner, to preserve so invaluable a life; that you may not only add to this structure, but finish all with the beauties and ornaments of an honourable and lasting peace!"

Then the Duke of Marlborough said; "I look upon it as the greatest mark of honour I could receive, that your lordships are pleased to take so much notice of my endeavour to serve the queen and my country.—I beg leave to do justice to all the officers and soldiers who have served with me: It is not possible for men to shew more zeal for her majesty's service, or greater bravery than they have done."

The Commons also resolved, nem. con. "That the late Victory at Blaregnies, obtained by his grace the duke of Marlborough, and the other great and important successes of the last campaign, were so remarkable, that this House thought itself obliged to express how sensible they were of the honour and advantages which the kingdom and the whole confederacy had received by his eminent services; and that a Committee, by order of the House, did give his grace their Thanks, and congratulate his grace's safety and return to Great Britain."—On the 25d, Mr. Comptroller reported, That the committee appointed had waited upon his grace the duke of Marlborough and delivered to him the Resolution of the House, and that thereupon his grace was pleased to make this Answer: "It is a very great honour and satisfaction to me, that the House of Commons is pleased to take so much notice of my endeavours to serve the queen and my country.—I cannot be just to all the officers and soldiers who have served with me, unless I take this occasion to assure you, that their zeal and affection for the service, is equal to the courage and bravery they have shewn during this whole war.

PROCEEDINGS ON THE IMPEACHMENT OF DR. SACHEVERELL.

Complaint in the Commons of Dr. Sacheverell's Sermons.] Dec. 13. A Complaint being made to the House of Commons, of two printed Books; the one intitled, "The Communication of Sin; a Sermon, preached at the Assizes, held at Derby, August 15, 1709, by Dr. Henry Sacheverell;"* and the other intitled, "The Perils of false Brethren, both in

* "He was grandson of John Sacheverell, the Presbyterian minister of Wincaunton in Somersetshire, who was bred in St. John's college Oxford, and silenced soon after the Restoration. This John, being taken at a conventicle, suffered three years imprisonment, which occasioned his death. John's eldest son, father of Dr. Henry Sacheverell, was bred in King's college, Cambridge, and entertained notions very opposite to his father's principles; and died minister of St. Peter's church in Marlborough, leaving a numerous family in very low circumstances. His son Henry was put to school at Marlborough at the charge of Edward Hearst an apothecary, who, being his godfather, adopted him for his son. Hearst's widow sent him afterwards to Oxford, where he became fellow of Maudlin college. His mother, by procurement of bishop Burnet, was admitted into the hospital for distressed widows at Salisbury. He had not been long at Oxford, before he discovered his turbulent spirit. When he came to be ordained by bishop Lloyd, he was by the bishop charged with false Latin, but he confidently defended it, till the bishop sent for books to convince him. The bishop, finding him very ignorant in divinity, refused to ordain him at that time, but did it afterwards on the bishop of Oxford's recommendation, with particular marks of favour; yet he ungenerously traduced that learned prelate in a libel, called, "The Character of a Low-Churchman." Nor was he less virulent against bishop Burnet, his mother's benefactor. Being presented to a small living in Staffordshire, he fell in, both there and at Oxford, with the most furious of the High-church and Jacobite party, made scurrilous reflections on the death of king William and the Hanover Succession, and when the queen appeared against the High-Church Memorial, he called her a waxen queen, alluding to the jest passed upon her at Oxford by those, who put her motto semper eadem upon a weather cock. He was proceeding in this manner, when his friends got him preferment in Loudon." Tindal.

Church and State; set forth in a Sermon, preached before the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of London, at the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, on the 5th of November, 1709;" preached also by the said Dr. Henry Sacheverell; and both printed for Henry Clements; which Books were delivered in at the clerk's table; where several paragraphs in the epistle dedicatory, preceding the first mentioned Book, and also several paragraphs in the latter Book, were read:

Resolution thereon.] Sir Peter King and others having made speeches against the audaciousness of the Doctor, who had advanced positions directly opposite to Revolution principles, to the present government, and to the Protestant Succession, and consequently tending to cherish factions, and stir up rebellion: those, who favoured the Doctor's cause, were surprized at this sudden attack, and, no member offering to speak in his defence, it was resolved, "That the two Sermons were malicious, scandalous, and seditious libels, highly reflecting on the queen, the late Revolution, and the Protestant Succession, tending to alienate the affections of her majesty's subjects, and to create jealousies and divisions among them."

The Doctor was ordered to attend at the bar of the House the next day, and, being examined, owned the two Sermons. He likewise told them, what encouragement he had from the lord-mayor to print "The Perils of False Brethren." Sir Samuel Garrard, being a member of the House, was asked, whether the Sermon was printed at his desire or order? if he had owned it, he would have been expelled the House: but he denied, that ever he desired, or ordered, or encouraged, the printing thereof. Though the Doctor offered to prove it, and brought witnesses for that purpose, yet the House would not enter upon that examination, but it was thought more decent to seem to give credit to their own member, though few indeed believed him.

The Doctor standing to what he had said, without expressing the least consciousness of having done amiss, he was directed to withdraw; and it was resolved, "That he should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors, and Mr. Dolben was ordered to do it at the bar of the House of Lords, in the name of all the Commons of Great Britain." At the same time, a Committee was appointed to draw up the Articles against him, and the Doctor was taken into custody of the Serjeant at Arms.

* "The great business of the session of parliament this winter related to Dr. Sacheverell. This affair not only took up most of their time, but, in conclusion, had also great effects. As it was one of the most extraordinary transactions of the time, it will deserve a particular notice. Dr. Sacheverell was a bold, insolent man, with a very small share of religion, virtue, learning, or good sense; but he resolved to Vote in favour of Mr. Hoadly.] The Commons having proceeded thus far, some members took occasion to speak in favour of Mr. Hoadly, whose principles were more agreeable to the sense of the majority of that House; and who, in several writings, had vindicated the Revolu-

force himself into popularity and preferment by the most petulant railings at dissenters, and low-churchmen, in several sermons and libels, penned without either chasteness of stile, or liveliness of expression, and full of indecent and scurrilous language. When he had pursued this method for several years without effect, he was at last brought up from the country by a popular election to St. Saviour's in Southwark, where he began to make great reflections on the ministry, representing, that the church was in danger, being neglected by those who governed, while they favoured her most inveterate enemies. At the summer assizes in Derby, where he preached before the judges, and this winter, on the 5th of November, at St. Paul's, he gave a full vent to his fury, in the most violent declamation, that he could contrive, upon these words of St. Paul, 'Perils among false brethren,' in which, after some short reflections upon popery, he let himself loose into such indecencies, that both the man and the sermon were universally condemned. He asserted the doctrine of non-resistance in the highest strain possible; and said, that to charge the Revolution with resistance, was to cast black and odious imputations on it; pretending that the late king had disowned it, and cited for proof some words in his declaration, by which he vindicated himself from a design of conquest. He poured out much scorn and scurrility on the Dissenters, and reflected severely on the Toleration; and said, the church was violently attacked by her enemies, and loosely defended by her pretended friends. He animated the people to stand up for the defence of the church, for which, he said, he sounded the trumpet, and desired them to put on the whole armour of God. After the preaching of this sermon, the lord-mayor, sir Samuel Garrard, invited the Doctor to dinner, took him in his coach, carried him to his house, gave him thanks for his good sermon, and told him, that he hoped to see it in print. The Doctor answered, 'That he was apprehensive he had spoken some bold truths, which might displease some people.' Notwithstanding which, the lord-mayor undertook to propose to the court of aldermen, that they should return the Doctor thanks for his sermon, and desire him to print it. But, though that motion was rejected by the court of aldermen, yet the Doctor, looking upon the encouragement already given him by the lord-mayor as a tacit command, ventured to publish his sermon, with a dedication to his lordship. The party, who opposed the ministry, magnified this sermon so highly, that, as was generally reckoned, about 40,000 of them were printed and dispersed over the nation. The queen seemed

Upon which it was resolved, "That the rev. Mr. Benjamin Hoadly, rector of St. Peter's Poor, London, for having often justified the principles on which her majesty and the nation proceeded in the late happy Revolution, had justly merited the favour and recommendation of this House. 2. That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, that she would be graciously pleased to bestow some dignity in the church on Mr. Hoadly, for his eminent services both to the church and state." This Address having been presented to the queen, she answered, "That she would take a proper opportunity to comply with their desires:" which, however, she never did.

When Mr. Dolben carried up the Impeachment against Dr. Sacheverell, the lord Haversham made a short speech, importing, "That it seemed somewhat strange to see a divine impeached for preaching a doctrine, for which he would heretofore have been rewarded, and might, if times changed, be made a bishop. However, added his lordship, since he is impeached, I hope a day will come for the calling to account other criminals; for, which way so ever I cast my eyes, I see matter for Impeachments."

Dr. Sacheverell having petitioned the Commons to admit him to bail, that he might have an opportunity of making his Defence, the Committee, who were to draw up the Articles of Impeachment, were ordered to search for precedents concerning the taking bail in case of persons committed for high crimes and misdemeanors, and Mr. Dolben reporting they could find none, it was put to the vote, whether he should be admitted to bail, and carried in the negative by a majority of 114 against 64.*

highly offended at it, and the ministry looked on it as an attack upon them, that was not to be despised. The lord-treasurer was so described, that it was next to the naming him. A parliamentary impeachment was resolved on; but Eyre, then solicitor-general, and others, thought the short way of burning the sermon, and keeping him in prison during the session of parliament, was the better method; but the more solemn method was unhappily chosen."

* "The Proceeding against Dr. Sacheverell occasioned great jealousies and animosities between the two parties of High Church and Low Church; the former gave it out boldly, and in all places, that a design was formed by the Whigs to pull down the Church; and that this prosecution was only set on foot to try their strength; and that, upon their success in it, they would proceed more openly. Though this was all falsehood and forgery, yet it was propagated with so much application and zeal, and the tools employed in it were so well supplied with money (from whom, was not then known) that it is scarce credible how generally it was believed.—Some things concurred to put the vulgar in an ill humour; it was a time of dearth and scarcity, so that the poor were much distressed. The coming over of the Palatines,

In the mean time the Committee sat several times at sir Joseph Jekyll's house, in order to draw up the Articles of Impeachment; so that, the parliament being met again after Christmas, Mr. Dolben reported, that the Articles were ready, which were read paragraph by paragraph. The preamble to the Articles being read, a motion was made by the doctor's friends, that the report should be recommitted, which occasioned a very warm debate, wherein Mr. Robert Harding, Mr. Bromley, Mr. Ward, and some others, made several exceptions to the matter and form of the Articles. Mr. Harley, in particular, insisted on the leaving out the word 'seditious,' alleging a precedent in the reign of king Charles the 1st in the prosecution of Pryn, Bastwick, and Burton. But all objections were answered by Mr. Secretary Boyle, Mr. Smith, Chancellor of the Exchequer, lieutenant-general Mordaunt, Mr. Lechmere, Mr. Thompson, and some others: so, the question for recommitting being put, it passed in the negative by a majority of 232 against 131; and the Articles of Impeachment were agreed to, and ordered to be carried up to the Lords. Then the last paragraph or recapitulation were also read and agreed to, and the whole ordered to be ingrossed.

Articles of Impeachment against Dr. Sacheverell. January 12, 1710. The ingrossed Articles being read, Mr. Dolben was ordered to carry the same to the Lords; which he did accordingly, accompanied by a great number of members. The said Articles were as follow:

"ARTICLES exhibited by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of Great Britain, against HENRY SACHEVERELL, Doctor in Divinity, in maintenance of their Impeachment against him, for high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

"Whereas his late majesty king William the Third, then prince of Orange, did, with an armed force, undertake a glorious enterprize, for delivering this kingdom from popery and arbitrary power; and divers subjects of this realm, well-affected to their country, joined and assisted his late majesty in the said enterprize; and it having pleased Almighty God to crown the same with success, the late happy Revolution did take effect, and was established: And whereas the said glorious enterprize is approved and the relieving of them, both by the queen, and by the voluntary contributions of private people, filled our poor likewise with indignation, who thought those charities, to which they had a better right, were thus intercepted by strangers. And all, who were ill-affected, studied to heighten these their resentments. The clergy generally espoused Dr. Sacheverell as their champion, who had stood in the breach, and reckoned his cause as their own. Many sermons were preached, both in London and other places, to provoke the people, in which they succeeded beyond expectation." Tindal.

ly several acts of parliament, and, amongst others, by an act made in the first year of the reign of king William and queen Mary, intituled, 'An Act, declaring the Rights and Liberties of the Subject, and settling the Succession of the Crown;' and also by one other act, made in the same year, intituled, 'An Act for preventing vexatious suits against such as acted in order to the bringing in their majesties, or for their service;' and also by one other act, made in the same year, intituled, 'An Act for appropriating certain duties, for paying the States General of the United Provinces their charges for his majesty's expedition into this kingdom, and for other uses;' and the actings of the said well-affected subjects, in aid and pursuance of the said enterprize, are also declared to have been necessary, and that the same ought to be justified: And whereas the happy and blessed consequences of the said Revolution are, the enjoyment of the light of God's true religion established amongst us, and of the laws and liberties of the kingdom, the uniting her majesty's Protestant subjects in interest and affection, by a legal indulgence or Toleration granted to Dissenters, the preservation of her majesty's sacred person, the many and continual benefits arising from her majesty's wise and glorious administration, and the prospect of happiness to future ages, by the settlement of the Succession of the crown in the Protestant line, and the Union of the two kingdoms: And whereas the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in Parliament assembled, did, by their Address, of the 17th of December in the year of our Lord 1705, lay before her majesty the following Vote, or Resolution; viz. 'That the Church of England, as by law established, which was rescued from the extreme danger by king William the 3rd, of glorious memory, is now, by God's blessing, under the happy reign of her majesty, in a most safe and flourishing condition; and that whoever goes about to suggest and insinuate that the church is in danger, under her majesty's administration, is an enemy to the queen, the church, and the kingdom;' and, by their said Address, did humbly beseech her majesty to take effectual measures for making the said Vote or Resolution public, and also for punishing the authors and spreaders of such seditious and scandalous Reports; and on the 20th day of the same December, her majesty was pleased to issue her royal Proclamation accordingly; yet, nevertheless, the said Henry Sacheverell preached a Sermon at the assizes held at Derby, August the 15th in the year of our Lord 1709, and afterwards published the same in print, with a dedication thereof: And the said Henry Sacheverell, also preached a Sermon at the cathedral church of St. Paul, before the lord-mayor, aldermen, and citizens of London, on the 5th day of November last, being the anniversary thanksgiving to Almighty God, for the deliverance from the Gunpowder Treason, and for beginning the late happy Revolution by giving his late majesty a safe arrival here, and for completing the same, by making all opposition fall before him, till he became our king and governor; which said Sermon, be the said Henry Sacheverell afterwards likewise published in print, with a dedication thereof to sir Samuel Garrard, bart. lord mayor of the city of London, with a wicked, malicious, and seditious intention, to undermine and subvert her majesty's government and the Protestant Succession as by law established, to defame her majesty's administration, to asperse the memory of his late majesty, to traduce and condemn the late happy Revolution, to contradict and arraign the Resolutions of both Houses of parliament, to create jealousies and divisions among her majesty's subjects, and to incite them to sedition and rebellion.

I. "He, the said Henry Sacheverell, in his said Sermon preached at St. Paul's, doth suggest and maintain, 'That the necessary means used 'to bring about the said happy Revolution, 'were odious and unjustifiable; that his late 'majesty, in his Declaration, disclaimed the 'least imputation of resistance; and that to 'impute resistance to the said Revolution, is to 'cast black and odious colours upon his late 'majesty and the said Revolution.'

II. "He, the said Henry Sacheverell, in his said Sermon preached at St. Paul's, doth suggest and maintain, 'that the aforesaid Toleration granted by law is unreasonable, and the 'allowance of it unwarrantable;' and asserts 'that he is a false brother, with relation to 'God, religion or the church, who defends 'toleration and liberty of conscience; that 'queen Elizabeth was deluded by archbishop 'Grindall, whom he scurrilously culls a false son of the church and a perfidious prelate, 'to 'the toleration of the Genevian discipline; 'and that it is the duty of superior pastors, to 'thunder out their ecclesiastical anathemas 'against persons entitled to the benefit of the 'said Toleration;' and insolently dares or defies any power on earth to reverse such sentences.

III. "He, the said Henry Sacheverell, in his said Sermon preached at St. Paul's, doth falsely and seditiously suggest and assert, 'that the 'church of England is in a condition of great 'peril and adversity under her majesty's administration;' and, in order to arraign and blacken the said Vote or Resolution of both Houses of Parliament, approved by her majesty as aforesaid, he, in opposition thereto, doth suggest the church to be in danger; and, as a parallel, mentions a Vote, that the person of king Charles the 1st was voted to be out of danger, at the same time that his murderers were conspiring his death; thereby wickedly and maliciously insinuating, that the members of both Houses, who passed the said Vote, were then conspiring the ruin of the Church.

IV. "He the said Henry Sacheverell, in his said Sermons and Books, doth falsely and maliciously suggest, 'that her majesty's administration both in ecclesiastical and civil affairs, 'tends to the destruction of the constitution;

'and that there are men of characters and stations, in church and state, who are false brethren, and do themselves weaken, undermine, and betray, and do encourage, and put it in the power of others, who are professed enemies, to overturn and destroy, the constitution and establishment;' and chargeth her majesty, and those in authority under her, both in church and state, with a general maladministration: and, as a public incendiary, he persuades her majesty's subjects to keep up a distinction of faction and parties, instils groundless jealousies, foments destructive divisions among them, and excites and stirs them up to arms and violence. And, that his said malicious and seditious suggestions may make the stronger impressions upon the minds of her majesty's subjects, he, the said Henry Sacheverell, doth wickedly wrest and pervert divers texts and passages of holy scripture.

"All which Crimes and Misdemeanors the Commons are ready to prove, not only by the general scope of the same Sermons or Books, but likewise by several clauses, sentences and expressions, in the said Sermons or Books contained; and that he, the said Henry Sacheverell, by preaching the Sermons and publishing the Books aforesaid, did abuse his holy function, and hath most grievously offended against the peace of her majesty, her crown and dignity, the rights and liberties of the subject, the laws and statutes of this kingdom, and the prosperity and good government of the same.—And the said Commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other Article or Impeachment against the said Henry Sacheverell; and also of replying to his Answers, or any of them, and of offering proofs of all the premises or any of them, or of any other Article or Impeachment that shall be exhibited by them, as the case, according to course of parliament, shall require; do pray that he, the said Henry Sacheverell, may be put to answer to all and every the premises; and that such proceeding, examination, trial, judgment, and exemplary punishment, may be thereupon had and executed, as is agreeable to law and justice."

Jan. 25. After the exhibiting of these Articles, the serjeant at arms attending, the Commons delivered Dr. Sacheverell to the deputy-usher of the black-rod; and the Lords, having read the Articles, ordered, that a copy of them should be given to the Doctor, who was admitted to bail, Dr. Lancaster, vice-chancellor of Oxford, and Dr. Bowes being his sureties; and being now at liberty, he consulted some eminent lawyers and divines, and, with their assistance, drew up the following Answer which he delivered at the bar of the House of Lords this day:

"THE ANSWER OF HENRY SACHEVERELL, Doctor in Divinity, to the Articles, exhibited by the knights, citizens, and burgesses, in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves, and of all the Commons of

“The said Henry Sacheverell, saving to himself all advantages of exception to the said Articles, for the generality, uncertainty, and insufficiency, thereof, and of not being prejudiced by any words, or want of form, in this his Answer, admits, that, at the request of George Sacheverell, esq. high sheriff of the county of Derby, he preached a Sermon at the assizes, held for that county on the 15th day of August 1709; and, at the desire of the right hon. sir Samuel Garrard, bart. lord mayor of the city of London, he also preached a Sermon at the cathedral church of St. Paul, before the said lord mayor, and the aldermen, and citizens, of London, on the 5th of November last: and that he caused the said Sermon to be printed; but denies, that he preached, or caused, the same to be printed or published, with any such wicked, malicious or seditious, intent, as in the preamble of the said Articles is affirmed.

“The said Henry Sacheverell having been induced to print the Sermon, he preached at Derby, at the request of the gentlemen of the grand jury for that county, to whom he humbly presumed to dedicate the same, as the most public acknowledgement he was capable of making, for the peculiar honour he had received, by their public approbation of that Sermon; and the said lord mayor having been pleased to express his good liking of the said Sermon, preached at St. Paul's, the said Henry Sacheverell, at his request, caused the same to be printed, with a dedication thereof to him; and, for Answer to the said Articles; humbly saith:

Answer to the first Article.

“To the first part of the first Article, the said Henry Sacheverell denies, that in his said Sermon, preached at St. Paul's, he doth suggest and maintain, that the necessary means, used to bring about the happy Revolution, were odious, or unjustifiable; nor doth he, in any part of that Sermon, affirm any thing concerning the necessary means, used to bring about the happy Revolution. The said Henry Sacheverell is so far from reflecting on his late majesty, or the happy Revolution, that he endeavours, in that Sermon, to clear the Revolution, and his late majesty, from the black and odious colours, which their greatest enemies had endeavoured to cast upon both.

“And, as to that part of the said Article, whereby the said Henry Sacheverell is charged with suggesting, and maintaining, that his late majesty, in his Declaration, disclaimed the least imputation of resistance; the said Henry Sacheverell doth acknowledge himself to have made such suggestion; and declares, that he made it, not in dishonour, but in vindication, of his said majesty; the resistance, the said Hen. Sacheverell represents the late king to have disclaimed, being such a resistance, as tended to the conquest of this realm; as plainly appears from that part of his late majesty's Declaration, which is referred to, and verbatim set forth at the bottom of the same page, in which he mentions his late majesty's disclaiming any such imputation.

“Whether the said Henry Sacheverell was mistaken, or not, in expressing himself, as if the late king had disclaimed any imputation of resistance, when he, the said Henry Sacheverell, meant thereby, that the late king disclaimed the imputation, of a design of conquest he humbly conceives, such a suggestion, by him plainly designed for the honour of the late king, cannot, in any reasonable construction, be thought a reflection on his said majesty, or deemed any crime or misdemeanor.

“For the further justification of what the said Henry Sacheverell said, in reference to his late majesty's having disclaimed any the least imputation of resistance, the said Henry Sacheverell humbly observes, that in his late majesty's Declaration the following passages are contained: ‘We have thought fit to go over to England, and to carry over with us a force, sufficient, by the blessing of God, to defend ourselves from the violence of evil counsellors.’—‘We think fit to declare, that this our expedition is intended for no other design, but to have a free and lawful parliament assembled.’

“As to the last charge in the said Article, the said Henry Sacheverell denies, that he doth in his said Sermon suggest, and maintain, that to impute resistance to the said Revolution is to cast black and odious colours upon his late majesty, and the said Revolution. The persons whom the said Henry Sacheverell, in his Sermon, describes, as casting black and odious colours upon his late majesty, and the Revolution, are not those, who impute resistance to the late Revolution, of whom the said Henry Sacheverell affirms nothing, but those new preachers, and new politicians, who teach, in contradiction to both gospel, and the laws, that the people have the power vested in them, the fountain and original of it, to cancel their allegiance at their pleasure, and to call their sovereign to account for high treason against his subjects, nay, and to dethrone, and murder him for a criminal, as they did the royal martyr, by a judiciary sentence; who are maintainers, of antimonarchical schemes, and of such damnable positions, as are by the laws of the church and state condemned for rebellion and high treason; and who urge the Revolution in defence of such principles: unless therefore those who impute resistance to the Revolution, be the same with those new preachers, and new politicians, above specified, the said Henry Sacheverell affirms nothing concerning them.

“The said Henry Sacheverell, upon the strictest search into his said Sermon, preached at St. Paul's, doth not find, that he hath given any the least colourable pretence for the accusation, exhibited against him in this first Article, but barely by his asserting the utter illegality of resistance to the supreme power, upon any pretence whatsoever; for which assertion, he humbly conceives, he hath the authority of the Church of England, which in divers passages of her homilies, too large, and too numerous, to be here specified, but by the said Henry Sacheverell ready to be produced, hath taught and inculcated this doctrine, as founded on the word of God; particularly in the second part of the Sermon of Obedience, contained in the former book of Homilies, set forth in the time of king Edward the sixth; where are these words: 'Here, good people, let us all mark diligently: it is not lawful for inferiors, and subjects, in any case to resist and stand against the superior powers: for St. Paul's words be plain, that whosoever withstandeth, shall get to themselves damnation: for whosoever withstandeth, withstandeth the ordinance of God.'

"Which said Book of Homilies is affirmed, in one of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion which concern the Confession of the true Christian Faith, to contain a godly and wholesome doctrine, and is ordered to be read in churches by the ministers diligently and distinctly, that they may be understood of the people.' And the said Henry Sacheverell, in further maintenance of the said doctrine and position contained in the Books of Homilies, and of the authority of those books, saith, that, by an act of parliament made in the thirteenth year of the reign of queen Elizabeth, intituled, 'An Act for the Ministers of the Church to be of sound Religion,' it is enacted, 'That no person should thereafter be admitted to any benefice with cure, except he should first have subscribed the said Articles, in the presence of the ordinary, and publicly read the same in the parish church of that benefice, with declaration of his unfeigned assent to the same.' And that, by an act made in 5th year of her present majesty's reign, intituled, 'An Act for securing the Church of England as by law established,' it was enacted, 'That the said act made in the 13th year of the reign of queen Elizabeth should remain and be in full force for ever, and be inserted in express terms in any act which should be made for ratifying the Union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, and therein declared to be an essential and fundamental part thereof.' And the said act was accordingly inserted, in express terms, in an Act for the Union of the two kingdoms, and thereby ratified, and declared to be an essential and fundamental part thereof.

"And the said Henry Sacheverell doth further humbly insist, and is advised, that the aforesaid assertion is agreeable to, and warranted by, the common law of England, and divers acts of parliament now remaining in full force.

"The said Henry Sacheverell doth, with all humility, aver the illegality of resistance, on any pretence whatsoever, to be the doctrine of the Church of England, and to have been the general opinion of our most orthodox and able divines, from the time of the Reformation to this day. This doctrine hath, in the most solemn manner, been taught in that university whereof he hath been for more than 20 years a member. This hath been often, with public approbation of each House of Parliament, preached and printed; and, in terms of greater force than any used by the said Henry Sacheverell, hath, by the right reverend fathers of our Church, dead and living, been avowed and maintained.

"And the said Henry Sacheverell was the rather induced to preach against the doctrine of resistance of the Supreme Power, upon the 5th day of November; because on that day the Church commemorates our deliverance from the traitorous attempts of rebellious Papists, and because the lawfulness of resisting the Supreme Power was originally a Popish doctrine; for which reasons, as he humbly conceives, the rubric of the office appointed for that day by her late majesty queen Mary (of blessed memory) directs, that, 'after the Creed, if there be no sermon, shall be read one of the six Homilies against Rebellion.'

"Whilst therefore the Church of England, as by law established, is in a safe and flourishing condition, under her majesty's happy administration; whilst Popish tenets are by all good Protestants condemned and abhorred; whilst the laws of this realm continue in their full force and vigour; the said Henry Sacheverell humbly hopes, that a dutiful son of that Church, a sincere Protestant, and a faithful subject of her majesty, shall not suffer, for asserting the doctrine of non-resistance of the Supreme Powers: But if this doctrine be declared erroneous, and it should please God that he should suffer for asserting it, he trusts that God will enable him to shew his steady belief of this doctrine, by a meek and patient resignation to whatever shall befall him on that account.

Answer to the Second Article.

"To that part of the second Article, which charges, 'that he, the said Henry Sacheverell, doth suggest and maintain, that the Toleration granted by law is unreasonable, and the allowance of it unwarrantable;' the said Henry Sacheverell saith, That, upon the most diligent inquiry, he has not been able to inform himself that a Toleration hath been granted by law; but admits, that an act did pass in the 1st year of king William and queen Mary, intituled, 'An Act for exempting their majesties Protestant subjects, dissenting from the Church of England, from the penalties of certain laws; which exemption the said Henry Sacheverell doth not any where maintain or suggest to be unreasonable, or that the allowance of it is unwarrantable; but hoped that he had prevented any such misapprehension, by declaring his sincere meaning in these words, contained in his Sermon preached at St. Paul's: 'I would not be here misunderstood, as if I intended to cast the least invidious reflection upon that indulgence which the government hath condescended to give them, which, I am sure, all those, who wish well to our Church, are ready to great to conscience truly scrupulous:'

"If there be any other expressions concerning toleration, which may seem to carry a dubious sense, in any other parts of his Sermon; he hopes that they will not be applied to the exemption granted by law, but will be interpreted agreeable to this avowed approbation of that law.

"And to such part of the said second Article as charges, 'that he the said Henry Sacheverell asserts, That he is a false brother, with relation to God, Religion, or the Church, who defends toleration and liberty of conscience;' he, the said Henry Sacheverell, saith, 'That he, having so plainly declared himself in favour of the exemption granted by law, when he blames those who, upon all occasions, defend toleration and liberty of conscience, cannot be thought to reflect on the defenders of that legal exemption or indulgence which he himself approves and defends: He doth indeed suggest it to be one part of the character of a false brother, upon all occasions, to defend toleration and liberty of conscience; and, to excuse the separation, lay the fault upon the true sons of the Church, for carrying matters too high.' Which universal defence of toleration, and excuse of separation, attended with the laying the fault of such separation upon the true sons of the Church, are by him jointly mentioned in one and the same clause of the sentence, and in one and the same branch of the character; so that this reflection doth not extend to all who defend toleration and liberty of conscience, much less to those who defend the exemption granted by law to Protestant dissenters; but to such only, who, at the same time they defend universal toleration and liberty of conscience, do also excuse the separation, and lay the fault thereof upon the true sons of the Church, for carrying matters too high; and these he did then, and still doth, with all humility, conceive to be justly blameable; and, if members of this Church, to be false brethren.

"And as to that part of the second Article, whereby the said Henry Sacheverell is charged with asserting 'That queen Elizabeth was deluded by archbishop Grindall to the toleration of the Genevian discipline;' he, the said Henry Sacheverell, saith, he humbly conceives, he hath good authority, from the histories and monuments of those times, for such assertion. But, whether he hath, or hath not, he humbly apprehends such assertion to be no proof of his maintaining, or suggesting, that the exemption of Protestant subjects, dissenting from the church of England, from the penalties of certain laws, granted by an act made in the first year of the reign of king William and queen Mary (which exemption he supposes to be intended by the legal indulgence or Toleration granted to dissenters, mentioned in the preamble of the Articles, and by the toleration granted by law, mentioned in this second Article) is unreasonable, or the allowance of it unwarrantable; for he is humbly of opinion, that there is a wide and manifest difference between a toleration of the Genevian discipline, and an exemption of Protestant dissenters from the penalties of certain laws; between a toleration allowed merely by the regal power, and an exemption granted by act of parliament; which exemption he is so far from thinking unreasonable or unwarrantable, that, from the bottom of his heart, he wisheth it, under the same restrictions and limitations, extended to all her majesty's Protestant subjects throughout the whole kingdom of Great Britain.

"And as to such part of the second Article, whereby the said Henry Sacheverell is charged with 'scurrilously calling the said archbishop Grindall a false son of the church, and a perfidious prelate;' the said Henry Sacheverell humbly hopes, that any harsh expressions he hath used, concerning that prelate, may be rather excused; because the said archbishop, having permitted innovations to be obtruded on the church, did thereby incur the high displeasure of so good and pious a princess as queen Elizabeth, by whose order he was suspended, and continued under such suspension, to the day of his death. However, the said Henry Sacheverell presumes, that no words spoken of an archbishop, above 120 years since deceased, will, in construction of law, amount to an high crime and misdemeanor.

"And as to such part of the second Article, whereby the said Henry Sacheverell is charged with maintaining, 'That it is the duty of superior pastors, to thunder out their ecclesiastical anathemas against persons entitled to the benefit of the said Toleration;' he, the said Henry Sacheverell, saith, 'That he doth not maintain, or suggest, that it is the duty of superior pastors to thunder out ecclesiastical anathemas against persons entitled to the benefit of the Toleration;' which persons, where he speaks of such anathemas, are neither by him mentioned nor intended. But if the expressions, by him unapplied to any, must be determined to any one sort of persons, he humbly conceives, that the connection of his discourse will determine them to those schismatical and factious persons, who take permission for power, and advance toleration immediately into an establishment; and such schismatical and factious persons, he humbly apprehends, are not the persons entitled to the benefit of the act of exemption, which was designed only to give some ease to scrupulous consciences, in the exercise of their religion.

"And as to the last part of the second Article, whereby the said Henry Sacheverell is charged with insolently daring or defying any power on earth to reverse such sentences; the said Henry Sacheverell saith, that the sentence, which he, the said Henry Sacheverell, dares any power on earth to reverse, is such, and such only, as is ratified in heaven; and such sentence he still affirms to be by any earthly power irreversible, and hopes, it will not be thought insolence in him to affirm, what, he conceives, would be blasphemy in any one to deny: and doth further acknowledge himself firmly to believe, that some sentences, pronounced by the pastors of the church, are ratified in heaven; and that some persons, exempted from punishment by the particular laws of the land, may yet, by the laws of Christ, be justly liable to such sentences; and that schism, or a causeless separation from a church, imposing no sinful terms of communion, is a sin, which exposes the persons, guilty thereof, to the censures of the church.

Answer to the Third Article.

“And as to so much of the third Article, as charges the said Henry Sacheverell, that he doth falsely and seditiously suggest, and assert, that the church of England is in a condition of great peril and adversity under her majesty's administration; and that, in order to arraign and blacken the said Vote and Resolution of both Houses of parliament, approved by her majesty, he, in opposition thereto, doth suggest the church to be in danger; the said Henry Sacheverell denies, that he hath either asserted, or suggested, the church of England to be in a condition of great peril and adversity under her majesty's administration; but he doth freely acknowledge, that he hath in his Sermon suggested, that, when national sins are ripened up to a full maturity, to call down vengeance from providence on a church, and kingdom, debauched in principles, and corrupted in manners, and, instead of the true faith, discipline, and worship, given over to all licentiousness, both in opinion and practice, to all sensuality, hypocrisy, lewdness, and atheism, then we (that is, evidently, all the members of such a church, or kingdom) are in danger in such deplorable circumstances: and this suggestion of danger, arising to a church, and kingdom, from vice and infidelity, he humbly presumes, is not opposite to the Vote of the two Houses, or seditious, but intirely agreeable to what is solemnly declared in an act of parliament, made the 9th and 10th of his late majesty king William the 3d, for the more effectual suppressing of blasphemy and profaneness; wherein it is affirmed, that many persons had of late years openly avowed, and published, many blasphemous and impious opinions, contrary to the doctrines and principles of the Christian religion, greatly tending to the dishonour of Almighty God, which might prove destructive to the peace and welfare of this kingdom: and he conceives, that, since the passing that act, the detestable crimes (for the effectual suppressing of which that act was intended) have greatly increased. And the said Henry Sacheverell saith, the suggestions, by him made, of dangers arising to us from vice and infidelity, he apprehends to be in no-wise more seditious, or repugnant to the Vote of the two Houses, approved by her majesty, than the like suggestions, occurring in the solemn prayers of the church, authorized by her majesty, and frequently used before each House of parliament; wherein we beseech God, that no sedition may disturb this state, nor schism distract this church; and that he would give us grace, seriously to lay to heart the great dangers we are in by our unhappy divisions.

“And as to so much of the said third Article, whereby it is charged, that the said Henry Sacheverell, as a parallel, mentions a vote, that the person of king Charles the first was voted to be out of danger, at the same time, that his murderers were conspiring his death, thereby wickedly and maliciously insinuating, that the members of both Houses, who passed the said Vote, were then conspiring the ruin of the church; he, the said Henry Sacheverell, doth say, that he doth not draw any parallel between the Vote concerning the king's person, and the late Vote of the two Houses, which he neither there, nor elsewhere, in his Sermon mentions: But had he suggested one Vote to be parallel to the other (which he hath not) yet would he not have thereby wickedly and maliciously insinuated, that the members of both Houses, who passed the late Vote, were then conspiring the ruin of the church; but would only have intimated, that, as some persons were conspiring the murder of the king, whilst others, no-ways privy to their wicked intentions, voted his person to be out of danger; so, when the two Houses voted the church of England to be in no danger, under her majesty's administration, there might be some others, who were conspiring the ruin of the church, and many others, who, by their vice, and infidelity, were drawing down God's vengeance both on church and kingdom.

“As the Vote of both Houses, made four years ago, did concern those only, who did then insinuate, the church of England to be in danger, under her majesty's administration; so it cannot, he presumes, affect those, who do now suggest, the Christian faith, which is the foundation, upon which every Christian church stands, to be endangered by those atheistical and irreligious principles, which are daily from the press propagated amongst us, notwithstanding the provision, made by the said act, for suppressing blasphemy and profaneness; So that the said Henry Sacheverell thinks, that he might with truth affirm, as he did in his Sermon, preached at Derby, that there were never such outrageous blasphemies against God, and all religion, natural, as well as revealed, vented publicly, with impunity, in any Christian church, or kingdom, in the whole world, as at present in our own; of which assertion the said Henry Sacheverell is ready to produce undeniable and ample proofs, if called thereto.

“As to the 4th Article; it contains several charges of a very high and criminal nature, of which the said Henry Sacheverell knows his heart to be intirely innocent; and he observes, with comfort, that, whereas in the former three Articles he is said to have maintained or asserted, as well as to have suggested, the doctrines and things therein laid to his charge; in this fourth Article, he is not accused of maintaining or asserting, but barely of suggesting, what is therein contained; And he humbly hopes, that bare suggestions or insinuations, could they with any colour of probability be made out, as he is fully satisfied they cannot, will not, under the most mild and gracious government (at a time when several new laws have been made for securing the liberties of the subject), by your lordships, the great guardians of our laws and liberties, be adjudged sufficient to involve an English subject in the guilt and punishment of high crimes and misdemeanors.

“To the several parts of the said fourth Article, the said Henry Sacheverell doth, in all humility, answer; as to such part thereof, whereby it is charged, ‘that the said Henry Sacheverell, in his said Sermons and Books, doth falsely and maliciously suggest, That her majesty’s administration, both in ecclesiastical and civil affairs, tends to the destruction of the constitution;’ he, the said Henry Sacheverell, saith, ‘That he hath not made any mention, in either of his Books or Sermons, of her majesty’s administration in ecclesiastical or civil affairs, or of her ministers. So far is he from suggesting, that her majesty’s administration, both in ecclesiastical and civil affairs, tends to the destruction of the constitution; that, amongst the inestimable blessings which are owing to our deliverance annually commemorated on the 5th of November, he reckons this to be one, ‘That her majesty, the good and pious relic of the royal family, sits now happily upon the throne of her ancestors: and prays, that God may long preserve her, for the comfort and support of the church;’ and professeth, that what he spoke, proceeded from a tender concern for her majesty’s person and government; And in the dedication also of his said Sermon, preached at St. Paul’s, solemnly declares, as he did before in his discourse, ‘That his only aim and intention was, earnestly to contend for the safety, rights, and establishment of her majesty, together with those of the church.’

“And as to such part of the said Fourth Article, whereby it is charged, ‘that the said Henry Sacheverell doth suggest, That there are men of characters and stations in the church, who are false brethren;’ the said Henry Sacheverell saith, That the false brethren, as described by him in his Sermon, are either those who propagate false doctrines; or who give up the discipline and worship of the church; or who are for a neutrality in religion; or who wish well to the Church of England, and are ready to sacrifice their persons and estates in her vindication, but do not shew their zeal in the Communion of the Church, as well as for it, in obeying her precepts, as well as defending her rights. These being the several sorts of false brethren enumerated by the said Henry Sacheverell; if he should have suggested, that there are men of characters and stations in Church and State (words by no means restrained to the highest characters and stations), to whom the denomination of false brethren, in some one or more senses of that word as by him interpreted, doth belong, he humbly hopes that such suggestion would not be deemed false, malicious, or highly criminal.

“And as to such other part of the said Fourth Article, whereby it is charged, ‘that the said Henry Sacheverell doth suggest, ‘That there are men of characters and stations in the Church and State, who do themselves weaken, and undermine, and betray, and discourage, and put it into the power of others, who are professed enemies, to overturn and destroy the constitution and establishment;’ the said Henry Sacheverell denieth that he suggesteth any such things concerning men of characters and stations in Church or State, where he speaks of those, ‘who weaken, undermine, and betray, and encourage, and put it in the power of our professed enemies, to overturn and destroy the constitution and establishment.’ There men of characters and stations are not mentioned by him; and where he mentions men of character and stations, twelve pages afterwards, the only place where in he mentions them, there he speaks nothing of weakening, undermining, and betraying, or of encouraging and putting it in the power of our professed enemies, to overturn and destroy the constitution and establishment; and hopes, therefore, that he shall be no ways answerable for a supposed reflection, which depends upon the conjunction of passages so widely distant from, and so little relating to, each other.

“The weakeners, underminers, and betrayers of our constitution, and the encouragers, to whom the said Henry Sacheverell doth in any part of his Sermon refer, will, he presumes, upon a candid examination, of those passages, appear to be one of these three sorts of persons; either, first, such as, by their writings, endeavour to subvert the foundations of our Church and State; or, secondly, such, whether writers or others, who are for a latitudinarian, heterogeneous mixture of all persons, of what different faith soever, uniting only in protestantcy; which would let into her bowels those, who neither believe her faith, own her mission, submit to her discipline, or comply with her liturgy, which he afterwards styles the model of an universal coalition; or, thirdly, those occasional conformists, who have so far eluded the Corporation and Test-Acts, by their abominable hypocrisy, as to have undermined the foundations, and endangered the government, by filling it (as far as they could) with its professed enemies, that is, with themselves. Of all these and their encouragers, the said Henry Sacheverell confesses himself to have suggested, that they do, in his opinion, weaken, undermine, and betray the constitution. But that either these, or their encouragers, are men of characters or stations in the Church or State, he hath not any where suggested.

“And as to such other part of the said Fourth Article, which chargeth the said Henry Sacheverell, ‘with charging her majesty, and those in authority under her, both in Church

'and State, with a general mal-administration;' the said Henry Sacheverell saith, 'That he abhors the thoughts of bringing any charge against her sacred majesty, whom he never mentions but in terms of the profoundest duty and respect; nor doth he tax those in authority with a general or with any mal-administration, which is a word he hath never used, nor, as far as he can find, any other word or words by which the thing is implied.' So far is the said Henry Sacheverell from making any undutiful reflections upon her majesty, or her administration, that, in the several writings that he has published since her happy accession to the throne, particularly in one which is an avowed defence of her title to the crown, and a justification of her entering into a war with France and Spain, he hath expressed himself with the most hearty and loyal zeal for her majesty's person, government, and administration.

"As to such other part of the said Fourth Article, whereby it is charged, 'That the said Henry Sacheverell, as a public incendiary, perverts her majesty's subjects to keep up a distinction of factions and parties;' the said Henry Sacheverell saith, 'That he is so far from being guilty of this charge, that, in his said Sermon, he invites the separatists to renounce their schism, and come sincerely into the Church; and complains of those who have villainously divided us with the knavish distinctions of High and Low Church-men, and 'wishes we might be one fold, under one shepherd, and that all those invidious distinctions, that now distract and confound us, were lost; so that we might be terrible, like an army with banners, to our enemies, who could never break in upon such an uniform and well compacted body.'

"And as to such other part of the said Fourth Article, as charges, 'That the said Henry Sacheverell instils groundless jealousies, and foment destructive divisions, among her majesty's subjects;' the said Henry Sacheverell saith, that in his said Sermon he, on the contrary, rebukes and condemns those, who by false insinuations, and raising groundless jealousies and fears, embroil the public, and bring it into confusion.

"And as to such other part of the said Fourth Article, whereby it is charged, 'that the said Henry Sacheverell excites and stirs up her majesty's subjects to arms and violence;' the said Henry Sacheverell saith, God forbid, that he should be guilty of so heinous a crime, who asserts the utter illegality of resistance to the supreme power, upon any pretence whatsoever! Which assertion he conceives to be the chief, if not only, ground of the charge, exhibited against him in the First Article.

"In confutation of this charge, he begs leave to recite one passage out of his Sermon preached at Derby, in the following words: 'We may be partakers of other men's sins, if we do not, to the uttermost of our power, endeavour to prevent, or obstruct, their commission, when they manifestly endanger the good of the public. As we are members of any government, or society, we are all obliged in point of honour, interest, and conscience, to maintain its security, promote its welfare, and guard it against factious designs, or seditious conspiracies, that may threaten its constitution, discompose its peace, or violate and subvert its laws. God and nature have invested every subject, from his cradle, with a commission to engage, discover, and disappoint, the enemies of his church, and country; and he, that is either privy to, industriously conceals, or any way abets, their schismatical, illegal, or rebellious, enterprizes, both in the eyes of human, as well as divine, laws, is an accomplice and partaker of the guilt, a traitor to God, and his prince, a patron and protector of injustice, and a common adversary to himself, as well as all mankind.'

"And the said Henry Sacheverell hopes, what he hath said in the dedication of the same Sermon, 'That there are not wanting some to preach the truth, and others to support it, at the expence of their lives and fortunes,' will not be construed as exciting her majesty's subjects to sedition and rebellion; since that truth, which he commends some for preaching, and others for supporting, is by him opposed to the attempts of those, who betray, and run down, the principles and interest of our church, and constitution; and since he there deservedly commends the high sheriff, of that county, on the account of his steady loyalty, and zeal to serve her majesty and the government, for which he hath been so remarkably distinguished.

"In the Sermon, preached at St. Paul's, he doth indeed excite Christians to put on the whole armour of God, as wrestling not only against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places; but he hath learned from the same St. Paul, that the arms of resistance, taken up by subjects against the higher powers, are no part of that spiritual armour; and principalities and powers, by him mentioned, being plainly distinguished from flesh and blood, cannot, he thinks, be so far misinterpreted, as to be understood of earthly potentates and rulers.

"And as to so much of the said Fourth Article, whereby it is charged, that he, the said Henry Sacheverell, doth wickedly wrest and pervert divers texts and passages of holy scripture, that his said malicious and seditious suggestions may take the stronger impression upon the minds of her majesty's subjects; the said Henry Sacheverell says, that, having no malicious or seditious suggestions to imprint, he could not intend to wrest any passages of the holy scripture to that wicked purpose. Hard is the lot of the ministers of the gospel, if when they cite the word of God, in their general exhortations to piety and virtue, or in their reproofs of men's transgressions, or where they are lamenting the difficulties and conflicts, with which the church of Christ, whilst militant here on earth, must always struggle, the several texts and passages, by them cited, shall be said to have been by them meant of particular persons and things, and shall be construed in the most criminal sense, and be made, by such construction, one ground of an Impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors.

"And as to all other matters and things in the said Articles contained, and not herein before particularly answered unto, the said Henry Sacheverell saith he is not guilty of them, or any of them, in manner and form, as the same are charged upon him in and by the said Articles; and humbly submits himself to your lordships' judgment.

HENRY SACHEVERELL."

*Short Account of the Trial in Westminster-hall.**] This Answer being sent from the Lords to the Commons, and referred to the committee, Mr. Dolben, in a few days, reported, That it was in many things foreign to the charge, unbecoming a person impeached, and plainly designed to reflect upon the honour of the House. A Replication being ordered to be drawn, a debate arose at the second reading, wherein the Doctor's friends insinuated, "That it was advisable to leave the offender to the ordinary course of justice." But this was rejected by a great majority; and the Replication sent up to the Lords, averring their charge, and declaring they would be ready to prove it, at such convenient time as should be appointed for that purpose.

The Lords appointed the 9th of March for the Trial at the bar of their House: and the Commons ordered, that the committee, who had drawn up the Articles, should be the managers to make good the Impeachment. These were sir John Holland, comptroller of her majesty's houshold; Mr. Secretary Boyle; Mr. Smith, chancellor of the exchequer; sir James Mountague, attorney-general; Mr. Robert Eyre, solicitor-general; Mr. Robert Walpole, treasurer of the navy; sir Joseph Jekyll; Mr. Lechmere; Mr. Dolben; sir Thomas Parker; sir Peter King, recorder of the city of London; sir John Holles; lord William Pawlet; lord Coningsby; Mr. Spencer Compton; Mr. William Thompson; lieutenant-general Stanhope; lieutenant-general Mordaunt; Mr. Spencer Cowper; sir David Dalrymple. Then it was debated, whether the House should attend in a body, or in a committee of the whole House; and it was carried for a committee by a majority of 192 against 180. This was done by the Doctor's friends, who found, that, by gaining more time, the people were still more inflamed; and therefore it was they moved, that the Trial might be public in Westminster-hall, where the whole House of Commons might be present. Accordingly, upon the Commons' request, which was brought up by Mr. Bromley, one of the Doctor's chief friends, the Lords addressed the queen for a place to be prepared in Westminster-hall for the Trial.

At length, the Lords sent a message to the Commons to acquaint them, they had appointed the 27th of February for the Trial. On that day (all things being prepared) the Lords, in their formalities, went down to the court in Westminster-hall, where vast numbers of spectators had been admitted. The managers of the Commons, and the committee of the whole house having taken their respective places, and Dr. Sacheverell, who was lodged in the Temple, and came every day with great solemnity in a coach to the Hall, being brought to the bar, the Trial began, and lasted three weeks; in which all other business was at a stand, for this took up all men's thoughts. The queen herself was present every day of the Trial in a private manner. The managers for the Commons opened the matter very solemnly. Their performances were very much and justly commended. Sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr. solicitor-general Eyre, lieutenant-general Stanhope, sir Peter King, but above all, sir Thomas Parker, distinguished themselves in a very particular manner. When his counsel, sir Simon Harcourt, Mr. Dodd, Mr. Phipps, Mr. Dee, and Dr. Henchman, came to plead for him, they very freely acknowledged the lawfulness of resistance in extreme cases, and plainly justified the Revolution and our deliverance by king William. But they said, it was not fit in a Sermon to name such an exception. That the duties of morality ought to be delivered in their full extent, without supposing an extraordinary case. And therefore the Doctor had followed precedents set by our greatest divines, ever since the Reformation, and ever since the Revolution. Upon this they opened a great field; they began with the declarations made in king Henry the 8th's time; they insisted next upon the Homilies; and from thence instanced, in a large series of bishops and divines, who had preached the duty of submission and non-resistance in very full terms, without supposing any exception; some excluding all exceptions in as positive a manner as the Doctor had done. They explained the word Revolution, as belonging to the new settlement upon king James's withdrawing; though, in the common acceptation, it was understood of the whole transaction, from the landing of the Dutch army, till the settlement made by the Convention. So that, they understanding the Revolution in that sense, there was indeed no resistance there. That if the passage quoted from the declaration of king William, while he was prince of Orange, did not come up to that, for which the Doctor quoted it, he ought not to be censured, because his quotation did not fully prove his point. As for his invective against the dissenters and toleration, they laboured to turn that off, by saying, that he did not reflect on what was allowed by law, but on the permission of, or the not punishing many, who published impious and blasphemous books.

And a collection was made of passages in books, full of crude impiety and bold opinions. This gave great offence to many, who thought that this was a solemn publishing of so much impiety to the nation, by which more mischief would be done than by the books themselves: for most of them had been neglected, and known only to a small number of those who encouraged them; and the authors of many of those books had been prosecuted and punished for them. As to those parts of the Sermon, which set out the danger the church was in, though both Houses had some years ago voted it a great offence to say it was in danger; the Doctor's counsel said it might have been in none four years ago, when these votes passed, and yet be now in danger; the greatest of all dangers was to be apprehended from the wrath of God for such impieties. They said, the reflections on the administration were not meant of those employed immediately by the queen, but of men in inferior posts. If the Doctor's words seemed capable of a bad sense, they were also capable of a more innocent one; and every man was allowed to put any construction on his words, that they could bear.

When the Doctor's counsel had ended their Defence, he concluded it himself with a speech, which he read with much bold heat; in which, with many solemn asseverations, he justified his intentions towards the queen and her government. He spoke with respect both of the Revolution and the Protestant Succession. He insisted most on condemning all resistance under any pretence whatsoever, without mentioning the exception of extreme necessity, as his counsel had done. He said, it was a doctrine of the church, in which he was educated; and added many pathetic expressions, to move the audience to compassion. This had a great effect on the weaker sort, while it possessed those, who knew the man and his ordinary discourses, with horror, when they heard him affirm so many falsehoods with such solemn appeals to God. It was very plain, that the speech was made for him by others, for the style was more correct, and far different from his own; and it was thought to be the joint work of Dr. Atterbury, Dr. Smalridge, and Dr. Friend, supervised and corrected by sir Simon Harcourt and Mr. Phipps.

During the Trial, the multitudes that followed him all the way as he came, and as he went back, shewed a great concern for him, pressing about him, and striving to kiss his hand. And when the queen went, in the afternoon of the day on which the Trial began, to the House of Lords, to give the royal assent to some bills, a great multitude of people gathered about her sedan, crying out, 'God bless your majesty' and the church: we hope your majesty is for 'Dr. Sacheverell.' The next day the mob was still more numerous and louder about Dr. Sacheverell's coach, and obliged all persons they met to pull off their hats to him, and abused those who refused to comply; among whom were some members of both Houses of Parli-

ment. The same evening the rioters went to Mr. Daniel Burgess's meeting-house, in a court near Lincoln's-inn-fields, of which they broke the windows, and committed several other outrages and disorders. Their fury increasing with their numbers, they advanced to greater enormities, and even to overt-acts of rebellion. For, after they had attended upon Dr. Sacheverell as usual, they repaired to that meeting-house again, broke it open, pulled down the pulpit, pews, benches, in short, all that was combustible; and having carried these materials into Lincoln's-inn-fields, made a bonfire of them, with repeated cries of High Church and Sacheverell. About the same time, other parties of the mob demolished and destroyed several other meeting-houses. They also battered and plundered the houses of several dissenters; threatened to pull down the houses of the Lord Chancellor, earl of Wharton, bishop of Sarum, Mr. Dolben, and other managers for the Commons against Dr. Sacheverell; and talked of destroying Mr. Hoadly's church and house, Sakers-hall, Mr. Shower's, and other meeting-houses in the city; and even of attacking the Bank of England, of which the directors being apprehensive, they took the necessary precautions for its security, and sent to Whitehall for assistance. These disorders were directed by some of better fashion, who followed the mob in hackney-coaches, and were seen sending messages to them. Upon the first notice of these tumults, the earl of Sunderland made his report to the queen, who commanded him to send her horse and foot-guards to disperse the mob; and the earl representing the danger of leaving her person unguarded at that time (it being between ten and eleven o'clock at night) she answered, 'God would be her guard.' The earl being returned to his office at the Cockpit, where were also the Lord Chancellor, the duke of Newcastle, and some other noblemen, he sent for captain Horsey, an exempt, who then commanded the guard, and ordered him to mount immediately, and disperse the mob. And as the captain was going out, the earl whispered him, and bid him send a party to the Bank. Before the horse and foot-guards could reach Lincoln's-inn-fields, the officers had notice, that the mob which had gathered there, was returned to Drury-lane, where they were making another bonfire with the furniture of Mr. Earle's meeting-house; whereupon the guards bent their march that way. At their approach most of the mob fled before them; and only one of their ring-leaders, George Purchase, a bailiff (who had before been a life-guard-man, but was dismissed for some misdemeanor) offered to make a stand, with a few of the most resolute of his followers, crying out for High Church and Dr. Sacheverell. From Drury-lane the guards marched towards the city, and met with some opposition near Fleet-ditch, from the mob that were rising the meeting-house in Black-Friars; but having wounded some of the most daring, and secured others, the rest were soon scattered; and the wards, patrolling all night, prevented any farther mischief. On the 2nd of March, the horse and foot-guards at Whitehall and St. James's were doubled: and the trained-bands of Westminster under arms, in divers posts, here they continued as long as Dr. Sacheverell's Trial was depending: which both lessened a number of the mutineers (many of the armed-band being men of low circumstances, bred by substantial housekeepers) and kept the rest in awe. The same day, the Commons resolved to address the queen, to take effectual measures to suppress the present tumults, set on foot and fomented by papists, nonjurors, and other enemies to her title and government; and to issue out a proclamation, promising a reward to such as should discover and seize those incendiaries, who had been the occasions of the late tumults and disorders. To this address the queen answered, "That she was extremely sensible of the great care and concern of the House of Commons for the public peace upon this occasion; and, as she had a just resentment at these tumultuous and violent proceedings, so she would take immediate care for suppressing them, and would lose no time in endeavouring to find out the authors and abettors, in order to bring them to punishment, according to the desire of this House." The Commons, upon this Answer, unanimously resolved to present an Address, importing, "That they begged leave to return their most hearty thanks for her most gracious Answer to their Address, and for her effectual care in suppressing those rebellious tumults, which were set on foot and fomented by papists, nonjurors, and other enemies to her title and government, in defiance of the just prosecution of the Commons against Dr. H. Sacheverell. And they humbly besought her to believe, that as this prosecution proceeded only from the indispensable obligation which her faithful Commons looked upon themselves to lie under, not to sit still, and patiently see the justice of the late happy Revolution, and the glory of their late royal deliverer reflected upon; her majesty's undoubted title struck at; her administration, by which so many blessings were derived upon them, endeavoured to be rendered odious to the people, and represented as destructive of the church and constitution; the present establishment and Protestant Succession undermined; the resolutions of the parliament treated with contempt; the governors of the church, and her majesty as supreme, dispersed and vilified; the Toleration exposed as wicked; and sedition insolently invading the empire: so the maintenance of her majesty's right, the safety of her person, the quiet of her government, the continuance of their happiness under her excellent administration, the succession in the Protestant line, the support and honour of the church of England, as established by law, with that Toleration which was by act of parliament allowed to Protestant dissenters, should be their constant care and concern. And they would, upon all occasions, venture all that was dear to them, in defence of such inestimable blessings." It was moved, that in the first paragraph it might be suggested, that the 'rebellious tumults were set on foot and fomented by republicans, as well as by papists and nonjurors;' but the motion was rejected.

The day before this Address was presented, a proclamation was published for suppressing the tumults, pursuant to which several persons, who had been active in the late riots, were apprehended, and committed to divers prisons; particularly, George Purchase the bailiff; Daniel Damaree, one of the queen's watermen; and Francis Willis, a footman; which three were some time after tried for high-treason: but, though the two first were sentenced to die, yet neither of them suffered. The remissness, in punishing so great a disorder, was looked on as the preparing and encouraging men to new tumults; and there was a secret management in the whole affair, that amazed all people.

When Dr. Sacheverell had ended his Defence, the managers for the House of Commons replied, and shewed very evidently, that the words of his Sermon could not reasonably bear any other sense but that for which they charged him. This was an easy performance, and they managed it with great strength and vivacity. But the humour of the town was turned against them, and all the clergy appeared for the Doctor. Many of the queen's chaplains stood about him, encouraging and magnifying him; and it was given out, that the queen herself favoured him, though upon bishop Burnet's first coming to town, which was after the Impeachment was brought up to the Lords, she said to him, that it was a bad Sermon, and that he deserved well to be punished for it.

Sir John Holt, lord chief justice of the Queen's-bench, died during the Trial of the Doctor, upon the 6th of March. He was very learned in the law, and had, upon great occasions, shewed an intrepid zeal in asserting its authority; for he ventured on the indignation of both Houses of parliament by turns, when he thought the law was with him. He was a man of good judgment and great integrity, and set himself with great application to the functions of that important post. Sir Thomas Parker was immediately made lord chief justice in his room. This great promotion seemed an evident demonstration of the queen's approving the prosecution; for none of the managers had treated the Doctor so severely as he had done: yet secret whispers were very confidently set about, that though the queen's affairs put her upon acting the part of one, who was pleased with this scene; yet she disliked it all, and would take the first occasion to shew it.

On the 10th of March the earl of Nottingham said, that he had something to propose; and the Lords being adjourned to their House, he started an unexpected question, "Whether in prosecutions by impeachments for high crimes and misdemeanors, by writing, or speaking, the particular words, supposed to be criminal, are necessary to be expressly specified in such impeachments?" After some debate the Lords resolved to consult the judges, who very readily delivered their unanimous opinions, "That, according to law, the grounds of an indictment or impeachment ought to be expressly mentioned in both." Those, who were for punishing Dr. Sacheverell, were not a little surprized at this unforeseen difficulty, which was of no less consequence, than to annul the whole prosecution, and to make it necessary for the Commons to begin anew, which they could not expect to have time to do. But it being suggested, that the judges had delivered their opinion according to the rules of Westminster-hall, and not according to the usage of parliament, the Lords at last resolved, "That in impeachments they were to proceed according to the laws of the land, and the law and usage of parliaments;" and, upon searching the Journals of the House for precedents, they found a parallel instance to that of Dr. Sacheverell's Impeachment, which was that of Dr. Mainwaring in king Charles 1's reign, wherein the words, for which he was impeached, were not expressly mentioned in the Articles. Whereupon it was voted after some debate, "That by the law and usage of parliaments in prosecutions by impeachments for high-crimes and misdemeanors, by writing or speaking, the particular words, supposed to be criminal, are not necessary to be expressly specified in such impeachments:" against which Resolution many lords entered their protest.

Debate in the Lords on the Articles of Impeachment.] March 16. The queen went incognito to the House of Lords, where a motion being made to declare, "That the Commons had made good the first Article against Dr. Sacheverell," a warm debate arose.

The Earl of Wharton, who spoke first, said, "There is a different strain between the Doctor's Sermon and his speech; the speech is a full confutation and condemnation of the Sermon. All he has advanced about non-resistance and unlimited obedience, is ridiculous and false; as is also his distinguishing in the affair of the Revolution, in which there was notorious resistance in the association begun at Exeter, and in the seizing of York and Oxford gates, and breaking the bridge. The doctrine of passive obedience, as pressed by the Doctor, is not reconcilable to the practice of churchmen. If the Revolution is not lawful, many in that House, and vast numbers without, were guilty of blood, murder, rapine, and injustice: and the queen herself is no lawful queen, since the best title she had to the crown, was her parliamentary-title, founded on the Revolution."

The Lord Haversham spoke as follows:

"My Lords; When I consider where this impeachment first began, I cannot but think the design of it was very good; but whatever it was, in its first intendment, it is very evident, it has already procured very mischievous effects; it has created great disturbances in private families, and raised a ferment in the nation, that will not be laid by your lordships' judgment, let that be what it will. It has been a two-edged mischief; giving the church on the one side, and the dissenters on the other, too just apprehension, that they are both in danger. Nor can this be wondered at, when your lordships have been told, by some of the managers, of a pretended divine right of the church, and when it has been more than hinted by the managers of the House of Commons, that the clergy ought to be directed by the civil power, what doctrine they should teach: nay, when they have authoritatively taken upon them to interpret Scripture, and charged it as a crime upon a minister, that he had wrested several places of it to his own wicked intentions.

"My lords; After so noble a defence made for the Doctor by his counsel, and so great and moving an apology by himself, I should not trouble your lordships upon this occasion, were it not more in justification of myself, for the judgment I shall give, than for the sake of the Doctor, whose cause, I think, now stands in very little need of it.—I was, my lords, a sufferer in the late reigns, as well as others: I was in the Convention-parliament, and in the vote of Abdication; and am, at this day, of the same principle I was then; and yet, notwithstanding this, I am not ashamed to say to your lordships, that I think myself obliged, in justice, to acquit the Doctor from the charge brought against him in this Article. And though this may seem strange to some of your lordships; yet, I hope, it will not appear so very strange, as to see bishops vote against their own doctrines, and Dissenters in the midst of a mob that are pulling down meeting-houses; especially after the reasons I shall offer to your lordships for the support of my opinion.

"I shall not trouble your lordships about the original of government, or the divers forms of it; your lordships heard that learnedly discoursed on by one of the managers of the House of Commons, below: but there is one thing, my lords, that, if my memory serves me right, that gentleman omitted; and it is a matter too, that I take to be of the greatest consequence to any government whatsoever; I mean, the Divine Appointment, or Institution of government itself: from which appointment it is, that men are obliged to obedience to the magistrate, not only for wrath, or fear of him, but for conscience sake, for dread of a future punishment; which is the greatest security the magistrate has. And I the rather mention this, because of notions that some people have of late advanced of their own, (and have found their advantage too in so doing) of a discretionary obedience only; that is, in my opinion, whilst the government is for them, they will be for it, and think themselves bound to obey no longer. It is not necessary to the proof of this Divine Authority, to fix the just time and place, when, and where, and how the knowledge of it was first communicated to mankind; it is enough, that we have it as expressly, as plainly, and as clearly declared, as can be put into words, that it is so.—There is another thing, my lords, that, in general, I would mention to your lordships, before I come to the Article itself; which may otherwise be the occasion of some mistake in this debate. We are not now judging according to our own notions of politics, or determining how far resistance, or non-resistance, is lawful: it would be a strange rule of judgment, to find any man guilty, for the sake of one's private opinion, and for the establishing a doctrine which he likes, and his neighbour does not. But the only question before your lordships, is, whether, and how far, the House of Commons have made good their charge against the Doctor? And I take the liberty to say plainly to your lordships, that in my opinion, they have been very far from making good their charge against him in this article.

“My lords; To prevent the least mistake, I shall read the words of the Article to your lordships, as they stand in the Impeachment: ‘He the said Henry Sacheverell, in his said Sermon preached at St. Pauls,’ doth suggest ‘and maintain, that the necessary means used to bring about the said happy Revolution, were odious and unjustifiable: that his late majesty, in his declaration, disclaimed the least imputation of resistance; and that to impute resistance to the said Revolution, is to cast black and odious colours upon his late majesty, and the said Revolution.’—The Doctor, in this Article, is charged with having maintained, That the necessary means used to bring about the late happy Revolution, were odious and unjustifiable. To support this, the Commons say, that having asserted the general proposition of the unlawfulness of resisting the supreme power, and not having excepted the particular case of resistance that was made use of, as a means to bring about the late happy Revolution; he does thereby reflect both upon the means, and upon the said Revolution. In answer to this, there have been two things insisted upon to your lordships, in behalf of the Doctor, by his counsel: first, that in cases of such a nature as this, the exception is always implied in the general rule: and there was a very unanswerable instance brought in proof of this, at least to most of your lordships; it was the Oath of Allegiance to king James: all those that took that oath, took it in general words; and yet, such an extraordinary case as the Revolution was excepted, though not expressed by those that took that oath. The next was, the Doctor, say they, would have been justly more blamed, had he mentioned all the cases of exception; which extraordinary cases ought to answer for themselves, whenever they fall out.—And though, my lords, these two be a full Answer, yet there are two things more, I think, with submission, may be added to it, which have not as yet been taken notice of. The first is, my lords, that the proof against the Doctor is drawn by consequences of the Commons’ own making, which he himself dis-

owns: and I appeal to that reverend and learned Bench, who are great masters of controversy; whether it is not an established rule among all learned men, that have the least spark of ingenuity, that no man ought to be charged with consequences, let them appear to his adversary never so clearly and undeniably to follow from his assertion, when he himself denies those consequences? This is so known a maxim, in all disputes between Protestants and Papists, and between Protestants themselves, that it cannot be denied. Now, the Doctor himself denying, as he does, that he had the least thought of including the Revolution under his general assertion, or that he applied his doctrine of non-resistance to that case, cannot, without the highest injustice, be charged with consequences, which he himself utterly denies.—In the next place, it is impossible, in my opinion, to prove, that resistance was made use of as a means to bring about the late happy Revolution; and consequently, is not within the Doctor’s general maxim. ‘Means,’ my lords, is a relative term, and refers to some end: and the end and design of the prince of Orange in coming hither, and of those that joined him when he was here, being to have the nation and rightful succession secured by a free parliament; it follows, that whatever force was, at that time, made use of, could not be made use of as a means to bring about an end which was never intended. Far be it from me, my lords, to lessen this great undertaking to deliver us from Popery and arbitrary power! And though the glory of that enterprize is wholly attributed to king William; it is certain, her present majesty had her share in it, however that is forgotten: for, give me leave to say, That had not her majesty countenanced the undertaking of the prince of Orange with her assistance, in my opinion, the success had been very dubious.

“Now, is it possible, my lords, to imagine, that it was ever the design of her majesty, or those that joined the prince of Orange, to take the crown off of king James’s, and put it upon king William’s head? No, my lords; the avowed great design was quite otherwise, as appears by the declaration itself, which was read below: it was to restore and secure our laws, from the invasion that had been made upon them by arbitrary power: it was to secure that right, that all the world knows, the princess had to the succession of the crown, and to have every thing settled by a free parliament; and not to make a Revolution, by de-throning king James. This the prince himself owns, when he says, in his declaration, he had no other design in coming hither, but a free parliament.

“My lords, I take it to be of most dangerous consequence, to judge any man by suggestions and innuendos: let what will be said to justify it, it shall never be the rule of my judgment. Groundless suggestions, my lords, have within my memory, been the pretence of power, to cover illegal oppression, with the shew of reason, to the public. I will give your lordships but one instance of it: it was the case of a reverend prelate, now in the House; I mean the archbishop of York: his grace was then Dr. Sharpe only. It was in the year 1686: there was an order, directed by way of letter to the protestant bishops to discharge all the inferior clergy from preaching upon controverted points in divinity: they thought it served the designs of popery then to direct ministers how they should preach; which was in effect, to forbid them to defend their religion. This precedent was taken from an order in queen Mary's time, says the printed account; when, at the same time, it was attacked by the Romish priests with all the vigor they were capable of, and the popish sermons and discourses were printed by authority. Notwithstanding this order, the Doctor took occasion, in some of his sermons, to vindicate the Church of England, in opposition to the frauds and corruptions of popery: but this, by the court emissaries, was interpreted much the same way as the Doctor's sermon is now, to be endeavouring to beget, in the minds of his hearers, an ill opinion of the king, and his government, by insinuating fears and jealousies. to dispose them to discontent and to lead them into schism, disobedience and rebellion.

"My lords, when the Homilies and Articles, when so many archbishops and bishops, and the universities, and most of the foreign divines too, (especially the Lutherans) have asserted the same doctrine of non-resistance to the supreme power, as Dr. Sacheverell has; I think it the hardest case in the world, that this unfortunate gentleman should be singled out, and made a criminal and a kind of martyr, enduring the trial of cruel mockings, yea, moreover of bonds and imprisonment, for asserting the same doctrine. It is true, Beza, and Pareus, and some others of the Calvinists, are of another opinion; but it is known that Pareus's commentary on the 13th of the Romans, was burnt at Oxford, by the order of king James 1, for asserting that doctrine.

"But there is one thing, my lords, so astonishing in this prosecution, that I cannot but take notice of it: those who were at man's estate at the Revolution know how industrious on the one side, all that were friends to king James were, to put his leaving the nation then upon the foot of force and resistance: as thinking this the strongest and best argument, to justify his withdrawing himself from his people. They racked their brains to find out arguments to convince men, that his life was manifestly in danger by staying here; and that it was for the sake of that, and his liberty, that he was forced to withdraw; and that his withdrawing was just, being an act of necessity, and not of choice.

"On the other side, those that were friends to the Revolution, made it their business to persuade the world that all this was but a colour and pretence, and that the fact was quite otherwise: that the sense and conviction king James had of what he had done, prevailed upon him rather to throw off the government than concur with a free parliament. That this was the only foot; and that it was not then put upon the foot of forfeiting the government by mal-administration; if any man denies, I appeal to the papers that were then writ, and are now in print, on this subject. This being so, it is very strange to see so great an alteration in men's notions of things; and that now, after our constitution has maintained itself upon this foot, against all designs and attempts that have been made upon it, for above 30 years, those very men, and that party, who endeavoured to place the Revolution then upon king James's voluntary desertion, which they called abdication, should now, without any reason given, be for changing that foundation, and do all they can, to put it upon king James's foot of force and resistance. What my lords, are we endeavouring, after 30 years, to make king James's title better now, than any of his friends could make it then; and not only finding out arguments they never thought of, but impeaching any that dare so much as question the truth and force of them? This, my lords, seems very strange.

"My lords, I cannot but take notice to your lordships of what was said by that noble lord who spoke last; because, to me it appears to be a matter of the last consequence to the honour of her present majesty. He told your lordships, that the best title her majesty had to the crown, was her parliamentary title. I must take the liberty to affirm the quite contrary, and that, in my opinion, the best title her majesty has, is her hereditary title; though I deny not, but that the act of parliament is a strengthening and confirmation of that title; yet I deny a parliamentary title to be the only or the best title that the queen has to the crown she wears. And in saying this, I do not fear the malicious reflections of having a squinting regard to the title of any person on the other side of the water; for, in affirming, (as I now do to your lordships) that her majesty is my rightful and lawful queen, by right of inheritance, and as she is the daughter of king James the second, I do in so many words affirm also, that there is no other person the rightful and lawful heir to king James, but herself. And if the present impeachment of Dr. Sacheverell shall have this effect, (as I hope it will) to convince the nation of the undoubted truth of her majesty's right of inheritance to the crown, (a matter now so industriously opposed) the security this will bring to her majesty's person and crown and to the Succession in the Protestant line, and the illustrious House of Hanover afterwards, shall prevail with me easily to pardon any warm and unguarded expressions, that the Doctor may here and there have dropt, and made use of in any of his discourses."

The Lord Ferrers likewise endeavoured to excuse the Doctor; alleging, That the Revolution was not mentioned in his sermon: that nothing but plain matter of fact should ground such a solemn accusation: that if the Doctor were guilty of some foolish, unguarded expressions, he ought to have been tried in Westminster-hall: but his lordship doubted, whether even in the inferior courts there would be sufficient matter to convict him. He was backed by

The Earl of Scarborough, who said, The Revolution was a nice point, and above the law; and moved, that they should adjourn the debate, and take time to consider, before they gave their judgment.

The Lord Haversham having reflected on some bishops voting contrary to their doctrines,

The Bishop of Oxford, (Dr. Talbot,) made the following Speech:*

"My lords; Some of this bench are necessarily called up, by words which fell from the noble lord who spake third in this debate, who was pleased to mention among other strange things, 'Bishops voting contrary to their doctrines.' The opinions of several of the reverend prelates have been read before your lordships in Westminster-hall: they were first quoted by the counsel for the defendant, and by their order read in such a partial and unfair manner, that if I may be allowed to use any other author after the same way, to take a naked proposition out of his book, and not consider the coherence or dependance of the words how it may be explained or limited in other places, to read just so far as may serve my purpose, and stop when any thing follows that may set the matter in a just light, I dare undertake to make any author speak on which ever side of the question I please.

"But the managers for the honourable House of Commons did justice to those reverend prelates, by obliging the clerk to read other passages in their books, which clearly explained their opinions; and so the only purpose that was eventually served by producing those quotations, was that which I fear was not intended, the vindicating those reverend prelates from the uncharitable imputation of having asserted a doctrine in their writings which they had contradicted by their practices, in relation to the Revolution and the government founded upon it.—I hope to be able to reconcile the vote which I shall give, with the opinion which I have always been of, and which having not been produced below, I stand up to give it your lordships here, being far from censuring, far from entertaining the least disrespectful thought of any that shall differ in opinion from me.—I own the subject now in debate, is a matter of great consequence, and of great nicety and tenderness; and that he, who should presume to entertain your lordships upon it, ought to be better qualified, and better prepared than I am in other respects, but I will give place to none in those that follow, viz.

in delivering myself with that respect and deference which is due to this House, that humble diffidence which becomes a just consciousness of my own weakness, and that plainness and sincerity which becomes that character, which however unworthy of it, I have the honour to bear; and then I am sure I may depend upon your lordships' known candour, honour and justice, that if any thing should fall from me less correct, or less guarded than it ought to be, it shall receive the most favourable construction that it is capable of.

"Before I deliver my opinion, I beg leave briefly to state the question, and in order to that to lay down two premises.—1. That government in general, was in its original institution, designed for the good of the whole body; men were not formed into societies, only to be the subjects of the arbitrary wills, the slavish instruments in the gratifying the ambitious or other corrupt designs, of any one or more men; but for the safety and prosperity of the whole community.—2. That in the Holy Scriptures (as far as I can find) there is no specification of any one particular form of government to which all nations and bodies of men, in all times and places, ought to be subject: nor are there such exact accounts of the extent of the power of the governor or obedience and submission of the governed, as can reach to all cases that may possibly happen.

"There are many general precepts requiring the obedience and submission of subjects to their governors: 'Let every soul be subject to the higher powers; you must needs be subject not only for wrath, but also for conscience-sake; he that resists resists the Ordinance of God; and submit yourselves to every human constitution for the Lord's sake,' &c.—But yet, these Scriptures do not tell us how far we must obey and be subject, nor do they necessarily imply that there can never be any cases where-in we may not obey and not be subject but resist; because there are other places in scripture, where other duties are required in terms as large and general as these, say in universal terms, which yet must admit of exceptions.—Some of the most zealous contenders for the absolute power of the prince, and unconditional submission of the subject, found themselves very much upon the fifth commandment, Honour thy father and mother, which they expound as comprehending political as well as natural parents, and I do not gain-say it; but then pray, my lords, let us see in what terms the duty of children to their natural parents is required in Scripture: Children, says the Apostle, obey your parents in all things; this expression is surely universal enough; and from hence according to some men's reasoning, it must follow, if children must obey their parents in all things, then they may resist in none.

"But will any body say, that notwithstanding the universality of this precept, there may not be some exceptions and limitations understood, both as to the active and passive part of the child's obedience? As to the active, no one will deny, but the command must be restrained to licita et honesta; they are not to obey in all things absolutely, but in all things that are lawful and honest.—As to the passive part of the child's obedience, the submission or non-resistance required, permit me to put a case. Suppose a parent in a phrenzy, in a fit of drunkenness or passion, draws his sword and attempts to kill his innocent son, and the son has no way to escape from him; is he obliged by this duty of not resisting, to stand still and let his father sheath his sword in his bowels? May he not, though he must still have a care of his father's life, defend his own? May he not put by the pass, grapple with his father and disarm him if he can? My lords, surely he may; that prime law of nature, of self-preservation, will justify him in it: and then why may not the same law of self-preservation justify the political child, the body of the people, in defending their political life, i. e. their constitution, against plain and avowed attempts of the political parent utterly to destroy it? And it is upon this point only that I shall state the question.

"I do allow, that in all governments whatsoever there is an absolute power lodged somewhere. With us, as I humbly conceive, that power is lodged in the legislature; for which I have the authority of a great politician and statesman, sir Thomas Smith, who was Secretary of State to two princes, king Edward 6, and queen Elizabeth, who in his book, De Republica Angl. a book seen and allowed as is said in the Title page, in that chapter where he treats of our parliaments and the authority thereof, lays down this assertion, "The most high and absolute power of the realm of England consisteth in the parliament: and giving particular instances of that power, among others mentions this, 'That the parliament gives forms of succession to the crown.'

"The executive power with us is lodged with the prince; and I do readily allow that the prince so vested with the executive power, and all others lawfully commissioned by him, acting according to their commission, and within those laws, with the execution whereof he and they are respectively trusted, are irresistible: the person of the prince is always inviolable: no personal faults in him; no injuries to particular persons, where they can have no redress by law, as in several cases they may have; no general mal-administration, whereby the public may be greatly hurt, can justify any forcible resistance of his subjects; nor any thing less than a total subversion of the constitution:

"But if in a legal monarchy, where such laws have been enacted by common consent of prince and people, as are to be the measures of his government as well as of their obedience, that limit his power as well as secure their rights and properties, the prince shall change this form of government into an absolute tyranny, set aside those laws, and set up an arbitrary will in the room of them; when the case is plain, and when all applications and attempts of other kinds prove unsuccessful; if then the nobles and commons join together in defence of their ancient constitution, government and laws, I cannot call them rebels. Allow me, my lords, to lay before you a few things in maintenance of what I have advanced. And,—1. I would humbly offer some facts, which I allow do not directly prove what I have said to be true, but they do prove it to have been the opinion of our princes, parliaments, clergy and people in the reigns of those three great princes, queen Elizabeth, king James and king Charles 1. I mean the assistances which those princes gave to the subjects of other countries that were resisting their respective princes; and to enable them to do so, they had subsidies given them in parliament and convocation, and there were prayers composed and used for the success of their arms.—Surely, my lords, if those princes, parliaments, clergy and people had been of opinion, that the resistance of subjects against their princes, was in no case lawful, but always damnable rebellion; they would never by aiding and assisting such rebels have involved themselves in the guilt, and exposed themselves to the dangerous consequences of such a sin. I mention not the particular stories, because they are better known to your lordships than to me, and because I doubt not but in the course of this debate, some lord or other will give a larger account of them; but I cannot forbear observing one thing relating to that assistance, which that pious prince, and now glorious saint in heaven, king Charles 1, gave to the Rochellers, who were surely the subjects of the king of France; he ordered a fast by proclamation, and appointed a form of prayer to be drawn up for the imploring of God's blessing. It is highly probable that bishop Laud had a great hand in composing those prayers, he being then bishop of London, and in great favour, and the archbishop of Canterbury, Abbot, at that time in disgrace. But whoever composed them, I beg leave to read part of one of the collects in that office. 'O Lord God of hosts, that givest victory in the day of battle, and deliverance in the time of trouble, we beseech thee to strengthen the hands, and encourage the hearts of thy servants in fighting thy battles, and defending thy altars that are among us, and in all the reformed churches.' It seems the reformed churches were thought to have God's altars among them then, however they have been vilified since. But that which I would observe from this passage is this, That neither that excellent king who commanded those prayers to be composed, nor the bishops who composed them, nor the clergy and people who used and joined in them, could in so solemn a manner have recommended those forces to the divine protection and favour, and as such as were fighting God's battles, if they had thought they were fighting against God in his vice-gerent, and as defending his altars if they believed they were resisting his ordinance.

"2. I could produce several authorities, in support of what I have laid down, but I shall mention but one; it is in a book written professedly on this subject, and the passage I shall quote comes home in point to the matter in hand; the book was written in queen Elizabeth's time; every one who is acquainted with the history of her reign knows what attempts were made by the pope and his party against her government and life, by excommunicating, deposing her, absolving her subjects from their allegiance, by raising tumults and insurrections, by dagger, poison and what not: And it is certain, that they were these wicked practices of the pope and his followers, and the doctrines by which they justified them, that the compilers of the Homilies which were then made, and other authors who then wrote about the power of the prince and the duty of the subject, had principally in their view: The book I mean, is intitled, The true difference between Christian Subjection and Unchristian Rebellion. It is written by way of dialogue between a Christian, whom the author calls Theophilus, and a jesuit whom he calls Philander. I beg leave to read a quotation out of it. Theophilus the Christian says, 'I busy not myself in other men's commonwealths as you (the jesuits) do, neither will I rashly pronounce all that resist, to be rebels: Cases may fall out even in Christian kingdoms, where the people may plead their right against their prince, and not be charged with rebellion. Philander the Jesuit asks, as when for example? Theophilus the Christian replies thus. If a prince should go about to subject his kingdom to a foreign realm, or change the form of the commonwealth from imperty to tyranny, or neglect the laws established by common consent of prince and people, to execute his own pleasure; in these and other cases, which might be named, if the nobles and commons join together to defend their ancient and accustomed liberty, regiment and laws, they may not well be accounted rebels.' This book is said, in the title page, to have been perused and allowed by public authority; was written by a great man, Dr. Bilson, then warden of Winchester college; printed at Oxford by the University printer, and dedicated to queen Elizabeth, and the author was afterwards made bishop of Winchester. I could offer many other authorities, not from false sons or perfidious prelates of the Church, not from men of factious and antimonarchical principles in relation to the state, but venerable names, ornaments to the ages they lived in, and such as will be remembered with honour in succeeding ones: But I am superseded in producing, and your lordships' trouble saved in bearing more particular quotations to this purpose, by what is yielded by a reverend divine of great parts and learning, far enough from the suspicion of being prejudiced against the rights of princes, or partial to those of the people, I mean the reverend dean of Carlisle, who in a Latin discourse preached and printed in this town upon the duty of submission, stating some cases of extreme necessity, and putting the question, Whether it may not be lawful for the people in such cases to resist? answers, 'Viri boni et graves, &c.' 'That good and judicious men, men that have taken great and useful pains in defending the rights of princes, and repressing popular license, have contended that it is lawful.' He adds indeed, 'whether they have done right or wrong, let others judge,' and does not give his own opinion. But since he has granted, that such men as he has described, men of probity and judgment, zealous assertors of the rights of princes, and repressers of popular license, have contended that in cases of extreme necessity it is lawful for the people to defend themselves; I may comfort myself, if I err in my opinion, that I err in good company. But I humbly conceive I do not err, and that, —3. For this plain reason, That if it be utterly unlawful to resist in any case whatsoever, even that of a total subversion of the constitution and laws; then there is no distinction of governments, of absolute, I mean, and limited; or if there be a distinction, it is a nominal one without any real difference; for what difference is there between a prince's governing arbitrarily without law, and governing arbitrarily against law? Betwixt having no laws at all, and having precarious laws that depend entirely on the will of the prince, whether he will observe one of them, or subvert them all, and if he does, the people cannot help themselves?

"But, my lords, I hope and believe that there is a real distinction of governments, and that the subjects of all governments are not in the same wretched condition that those of France and Turkey are in. I hope we have not boasted falsely or vainly of our own form of government, that we are blessed with a constitution more happy than any nation in the world enjoys, that allows and secures as great, and, I had almost said, God-like powers and prerogatives, to the crown as any wise and good prince can desire, a power of doing every thing that is good and nothing that is ill, and at the same time secures most valuable rights and privileges to the people. What wise or good prince would not rather chuse to reign over free subjects, than tyrannize over slaves? To receive a willing chearful obedience proceeding from the principles of gratitude, love, and interest as well us of duty, rather than a forced one, owing merely to a principle of fear, the principle from whence the Indians worship the evil spirits?

"My Lords, such a frame of government your lordships have received from your ancestors; and I hope and trust, that in grateful respect to their memory, and in tender regard to your posterity, (I say nothing of ourselves, my Lords; for as for us who have the happiness to live under the government of the best of Princes that ever heaven blessed a nation with; for us, I say, were our government as arbitrary as any in the East, yet I should think our rights, liberties, and properties, and whatever is most dear and valuable to us, as safe as if they depended intirely upon her majesty's gracious will, as they are now they are secured to us by our laws, or stronger fences, if they could be made) but I speak in regard to those that are to come after us; and I do hope and trust, that as your lordships have received such an inestimable treasure from your predecessors, you will transmit inviolable to your posterity.

"My Lords, I fear I tire you, but I must beg your patience a little longer, while I express my surprize and wonder that the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance, in the unlimited extent in which some explain it, is so diligently inculcated, and so zealously pressed at this time. Passive Obedience, I own, when truly stated, is a truly christian duty, a perpetual duty as to the obligation, but occasional as to the practice of it. Now preachers do not usually, neglecting the pressing of other duties of more constant practice, lay out their time and labour in filling both pages of their discourses with earnest assertions and violent exhortations to the practice of an occasional duty, unless they have some near prospect of an occasion for the exercise of it. And yet, my Lords, has this one duty been, of late, more frequently and earnestly asserted and urged both from the pulpit and press, than all the other duties of christianity: and what occasion for this does any one pretend to have in view?—Can there be a wretch so abandoned, so lost to all sense of gratitude and every thing that is good, as to be capable of admitting a thought, that our gracious queen has done, is doing, or intending to do any thing, that may give her subjects occasion for the practice of this duty? has she not ever since her happy accession to the throne, postponed, sacrificed her own repose and ease to the quiet and happiness of her subjects? has she not clearly shown that she has nothing so much at heart, as the good and prosperity of her people, the true interest and honour of her kingdom, which she has carried higher than any of her royal predecessors ever did before her? has she not approved herself a true parent of her political children, by exercising as prudent a care of, and expressing on all occasions as tender an indulgence to them, as any natural parents ever did towards theirs?—If then there be no occasion from the conduct of our prince, in there any reason from the behaviour of her people, that may justify this extraordinary and otherwise unseasonable zeal for this doctrine? do they (excepting such as the zealots for this doctrine have excited to disturb her peaceful reign at home, by rebellious and dangerous tumults and insurrections,) shew any uneasiness under her majesty's government, or inclinations to throw it off? do they not bless their glorious queen and God for her? do they not on all occasions express their grateful sense of the many inestimable blessings they enjoy through her administration? do not they constantly offer up their devout prayers to God for her long life and happy reign? do they not willingly pay their taxes for the support of her government, cheerfully expend their treasure and blood too in defence of it?—What then can be said for such a conduct, which can have no other natural tendency than to create unreasonable jealousies of her people in the head of our queen, and groundless fears of their queen in the hearts of her people. Jealousies in the queen, that her subjects are inclinable to rebel against her, when the clergy think it necessary thus to press these restraints upon them; and fears in the people, when their pastors are so industriously preparing them for sufferings?

"My Lords, I would not be thought to charge upon all that hold and assert this doctrine, the consequences which I may with too much reason charge upon some of them; I mean such as do not allow her majesty's title to the crown, but refuse to take the oaths to her, or join in prayer for her, and have upon that account formed one of the most unaccountable schisms that ever was made in the Church; some of these have engaged zealously in asserting this doctrine; and one of them in a paper written in vindication of it, has not been afraid to insinuate a parallel between the case of her majesty and the Pretender, and that of Athaliah and Joash.—Horrid suggestion that would make one tremble! What do these men mean? Any service to her majesty? No: The consequences as to them are plain. If to resist upon any occasion whatever, be unlawful, be rebellion, damnable rebellion; then the Revolution was rebellion, and all that were concerned in it are involved in that guilt; then we have continued in a rebellion ever since; then if we would avoid damnation, we must repent of that sin; but there is no true repentance without restitution, and if there must be restitution, they will tell you what that is.—I would charitably hope, that the unfortunate person now in judgment before your lordships, did not intend to carry matters so far: But I must say, his doctrine as he has stated and managed it, under his head of false brotherhood, with relation to the state, does give too great a handle for those that have such views, to improve what he has said to their purposes.—The Council for him, have laboured to defend him against the Charge in this Article, by producing a great many quotations out of the Homilies, statutes, and writings of divines dead and living where in this doctrine has been laid down generally. They all allowed that cases of extreme necessity were always excepted out of this general doctrine; and that though the exception was not expressed, yet it was always implied; and they allowed farther, that the case of the Revolution was a case of such necessity: But how did they apply this to the case of their client? Thus: they said, that those divines whom they had quoted, were never found fault with for asserting the doctrine in general terms, not expressing but tacitly implying the exception; then they asked why should the Doctor be charged for asserting the doctrine in general terms as others had done, not expressing the ception which they had not expressed? Why should not he be intitled to the favourable construction of tacitly implying the exception of cases of necessity, such a necessity as they allowed justified the Revolution?—Indeed I should readily have admitted the plea, if the Doctor had done no more than barely assert be doctrine in general terms, and his only fault had been that he had not expressed the exception which he tacitly implied: But has he done no more than this? Has he not mentioned the case of the Revolution, with no other view, as I can see, than to expose it, not as an exception out of his general position, but as an objection against it? Our adversaries, says he, but is, those that oppose his general doctrine, think they have us sure, i. e. effectually confute that doctrine, by objecting the Revolution. This objection must suppose that there was resistance at the Revolution; for to say that the general doctrine, that it is not lawful in any case to resist, is not true, because the Revolution was lawful, in which there was no resistance, would be a wonderful objection indeed: I say, resistance must be supposed in the objection, to make sense of it. How then does he solve this objection? Does he say the general doctrine always implies an exception of cases of necessity? That the Revolution was a case of such necessity, and therefore that necessity justified the resistance at the Revolution? No, but by advancing a strange position which he proves by as strange a medium) viz. That there was no resistance at the Revolution: plainly implying, that if there was resistance at the Revolution, which every body knows there was, the Revolution stands condemned by his general doctrine. So that I cannot see that his learned counsel, who wanted neither abilities nor inclinations to serve him, have at all defended him against the charge in his Article. But this they have effectually done, they have given up his general doctrine, if it admits of no exceptions; and thereby cleared the Revolution and the necessary means whereby it was brought about, from those black and odious colours which he endeavoured to cast upon them.

“After all, I can truly appeal to my own heart, and a greater than it, the Searcher of it, that I am not any ways prejudiced against the person of the unhappy prisoner, but rather in favour of him, as I am of all men in his suffering circumstances, by a natural tenderness (it may be a weakness, but such a one as I cannot help) which never suffers me, however obliged to justice to it, to do a hard thing to any one however deserving it, without doing at the same time a hard thing to myself: And if your lordships should be of opinion in the conclusion of this trial, That the Commons have made good their charge against him, I am sure I could come into as easy a sentence upon him as may be consistent with the honour and justice of your proceedings, and with that which I take to be the chief end in all punishments, not so much the hurting the offender, as the preventing the like offences, and hindering others from committing them for the future.—But still, my lords, there is surely a tenderness and compassion due to our queen, our country, and our posterity, all which I humbly apprehend are highly concerned in the issue of this affair. If clergymen may with impunity publicly in their sermons arraign and condemn the Revolution: besides the reflections they cast upon all the worthy patriots that were concerned in that great work, the commonalty, gentry, and nobility, lords upon every bench in this House besides this, it must shake, it must sap the very foundation of our present establishment as it stands upon the foot of the Revolution, and utterly destroy our future hopes in the Protestant Succession, which is founded upon that bottom only.

“My lords; I must humbly ask pardon for having trespassed so long upon your patience, and will conclude with this one word, That in my opinion, these practisings of clergymen (to use the expression of a great and eminent prelate) in state matters, are of that dangerous tendency and consequence, that if there be not some effectual stop put to these practisings, these practisings will, in time, put an effectual end to our constitution. The Commons had therefore reason to bring this matter in judgment before your lordships, and I think they have fully made good their charge in the first Article of their Impeachment against Dr. Sacheverell.”

The Bishop of Bath and Wells (Dr. Hooper) endeavoured to excuse Dr. Sacheverell; “He allowed, indeed, of what the bishop of Oxford had advanced, about the necessity and legality of resistance in some extraordinary cases; but was of opinion, that this ought to be kept from the knowledge of the people, who are naturally too apt to resist; and that the opposite doctrine ought rather to be maintained and enforced. That the Revolution was not to be boasted of, and made a precedent; but we ought to throw a mantle over it, and rather call it a Vacancy or Abdication: And the Original Compact were two very dangerous words, not to be mentioned without a great deal of caution. That they, who examined the Revolution too nicely, were no friends to it; for, at that rate, the crown would roll like a ball, and never be fixed.” He concluded, “That there seemed to be a necessity to preach up Non-resistance and Passive Obedience at that time, when resistance was justified.”

The Duke of Argyle, who spoke on the other side, said, among other things, “That the clergy, in all ages, have delivered up the rights and liberties of the people, and preached up the king’s power, in order to govern him; and therefore they ought not to be suffered to meddle with politics.”

The Earl of Anglesey answered to this, “That political sermons were sometimes necessary, and allowed on the 30th of January, and other occasions. As to the Revolution, which was the chief matter now in debate, he said, the vacancy of the Throne was properly the thing; and therefore the mentioning necessary means, was mere nonsense in the Doctor; and he would not find him guilty for nonsense; the rather, because the doctrine of resistance, which the Doctor had confuted, justifies rebellion, murder, and all manner of crimes."

The Duke of Leeds, who spoke on the same side, made a very long speech, wherein he owned, "he had a great share in the late Revolution, but said, he never thought, that things would have gone so far, as to settle the crown on the prince of Orange, whom he had often heard say, that he had no such thoughts himself. That they ought to distinguish between Resistance and Revolution; for Vacancy or Abdication was the thing they went upon, and therefore Resistance was to be forgot; for, had it not succeeded, it had certainly been rebellion; since he knew of no other but hereditary right." Upon this

The Bishop of Salisbury (Dr. Burnet) made the following Speech:

"The counsel for the prisoner did so plainly and fully yield all that any loyal subject has ever pretended to, that in cases of extreme necessity, self-defence and resistance were lawful, and that this was the case at the Revolution; that it may not be necessary to say any thing further on this head, if it had not been that the evidence they brought seemed to carry this matter much further, and that the prisoner himself allowed of no exception, in cases of necessity. And since it is grown to be a vulgar opinion, That by the doctrine of the church of England, all resistance in any case whatsoever, without exception, is condemned; I think it is incumbent on me, who have examined this matter long and carefully, to give you such a clear account of this point, as may fully satisfy you as it did myself.

"I served in the Revolution, and promoted it all I could. I served as chaplain to the late king: I had no command, and carried no arms, but I was so far engaged in it, that if I could see that I had gone out of the way in that (and the many up and downs we have gone through since, has given much occasion to reflect on that transaction) I should hold myself unworthy to appear longer, either in this habit, or in this great assembly: But should think myself bound to pass away the rest of my life in retirement or sorrow. There is nothing more certain in religion, than that we ought to repent of every sin we have committed: and that we cannot truly repent unless we repair and restore as far as it is in our power.

"I go now to give you the account of the doctrine of our church in this particular. In the times of popery it was a tenet, built upon bishops setting the crown on the heads of princes, and anointing them, that they held their crowns of the church, and at the Pope's mercy; who had for about 500 years got into the claim of deposing them, and giving their dominions to others, in case they were heretics, or the favourers of them. But the Reformation being in its first beginning protected by the princes of Germany, by the kings of the North, and then by the kings of England; they came every where in opposition to the papal notions, to say that kings had their power from God; Not that they meant, that they had any distinct authority besides the law of the land derived to them from God; but that by the laws of God, the authority of the law of the land, was secured to them. For when a different authority from that of the law came to be pretended to, and to be grounded on these general expressions, that received here a parliamentary censure, and it was then declared that the laws of religion in the scripture did only establish the several constitutions and governments that were in the different parts of the world.

"The occasion that the Apostles had to write what we find in their Epistles, with relation to government, was this; The Jews had a notion among them from a passage in Deuteronomy, that they were only to set a king over them, 'one from among their bretheren, and not a stranger.' From whence it is, That to this day they do not think they are bound in conscience to obey any magistrate, who is not one of their nation. Now the first converts to Christianity being Jews, the Apostles took care that they should not bring this dangerous notion with them into the Christian religion: But they did not meddle to determine where this authority was lodged, that was to be gathered out of the several constitutions: They did not determine how much was due to the emperor, and how much to the senate: And though not long after those Epistles were writ, the senate condemned Nero to die more majestatum, to be whipt to death; none of the Christians interposed in that matter. He prevented that infamous death by his own hands; and the primitive Christians reckoned it one of the articles of the glory of their religion, that their first persecutor came to such an end.

"Not long after that Trajan was famed for that memorable expression, when he delivered the sword to the governors of the provinces, as the emblem of their authority, he used these words, 'pro me, si merear in me;' For me, but if I deserve it, against me.' That did not weaken his authority: His good government, with that of his successors for above 80 years, being the greatest and happiest time the Romans had under their emperors. This word was put on king James the 1st's coin in Scotland: It is true, that was during his minority; but when he afterwards changed his motto, the coin was not called in, but continued current till the Union.

"The primitive Christians had no laws in their favour, but many against them; So their patient suffering so many persecutions according to the laws of the empire, under which they lived, was conform to the doctrine laid down by the Apostles. When they came afterwards to have the protection of laws, they claimed the benefit of them, not without real violence, when they thought an infraction was made on those laws: Which broke out into great tumults, in many of the chief cities of the empire, not excepting the imperial city itself.

“But to proceed with the history of our church: When the articles of religion were settled, the books of the Apocrypha were indeed declared not to be a part of the canon of the scripture, but yet to be useful for the example of life, and the instruction of manners. A great part of these are the books of the Maccabees, which contain the history of the Jews shaking off the yoke of the kings of Syria, when they were broke in upon by a total overthrow of their whole law, and an unrelenting persecution. Mattathias a private priest began the resistance, which was carried on by his children, till they shook off the Syrian yoke, and formed themselves into a free government, under the family of the Maccabees. It were easy to shew that the Jews had been for above 400 years subject, first to the Babylonian, then to the Persian, and at last to the Grecian empire: So that by a long prescription they were subjects to the kings of Syria. It were easy also to show that this resistance was foretold by Daniel, in terms of high commendation, and is also mentioned in the epistle to the Hebrews, as the work and effect of their faith. If then all resistance to illegal and barbarous persecution, is unlawful; these books contain nothing but a history of a rebellion, and all the devotion that runs through them, is but a cant, and instead of reading them as examples of life, and instruction of manners, we ought to tear them out of our bibles with detestation. I shall afterwards shew what use was made of these books, not only by private writers of our church, but by what the whole body in convocation was about to determine.

“The next step to be made, is, to consider the Homilies: The second book of Homilies, which has the Homilies in it against wilful rebellion, is generally believed to have been composed by bishop Jewell, who was by much the best writer in that time. It is certain, he understood the meaning of them well: now I will read you two passages out of his Defence of his Apology for the Church of England; from whence we may clearly gather what his notion of rebellion was, and that he thought a defence against unjust and illegal violence was not rebellion. In one place he has these words: themselves by all lawful means against oppressions, as did David against Saul, so do the nobles in France at this day, they seek not to kill, but to save their own lives.”

“These passages shew that he looked on rebellion to be a violent rising against a prince executing the laws, which was the case of the three rebellions in England that they had in view: That in king Henry the 8th’s, in king Edward’s, and in queen Elizabeth’s time, where the Papists took arms against their prince, who was executing laws made in matters of religion, and that with a great gentleness. Of the 11 passages quoted by the prisoner out of the Homilies, five plainly relate only to the coercing the person of the prince, in which David is set in opposition to those rebels now, though he indeed defended himself, yet he had a just and sacred tenderness to the person of Saul, when he had him in his power, which is certainly sacred by our constitution. Five of them relate to wicked princes. It was never pretended by any who pleaded for necessary defence, that the had life of a prince can be a just cause of resistance: yet that was then pretended; for king Henry 8 had given too much occasion to reckon him a wicked prince. So there is only one of all the passages quoted from those Homilies, that relates simply to rebellion in general: and it has appeared what bishop Jewell’s sense of the matter was. There is also a prayer at the end of every division of the Homily against wilful rebellion, (and by the by ‘wilful’ was not put in the title for nothing) for those oppressed by tyranny in other parts, that they might be relieved, and that those who were in fear of their cruelty might be comforted.

“Let us next look through queen Elizabeth’s long and glorious reign, and see what was the constant maxim of that time. The year after the queen came to the crown, the war in Scotland broke out between the queen regent that governed by commission, from her daughter then queen of France, and the lords in Scotland. She, to obtain the matrimonial crown to be sent to Francis the 2d, gave assurances for the exercise of the reformed religion; but that point being gained, she broke all her promises, and resolved to force them to return to the exercises of the Popish religion: upon which the lords of Scotland formed themselves into a body, and were called the Lords of the Congregation. Forces were sent from France to assist the queen regent; upon that queen Elizabeth entered into an agreement with the Scots lords, and sent an army to their assistance, which continued in Scotland till all matters were settled by the pacification of Leith: and in a manifesto, that I have in my hands, set forth 25 years after that, I find her reflecting on that interposition in the affairs of that nation, with great satisfaction.

“The year after this war was ended, upon Francis the 2d’s death, Charles the 9th, who was a child, succeeded in France. Edicts were granted in favour of the Protestants: these were soon after broken by the triumvirate, and upon that followed a series of wars often pacified, but always breaking out again, by reason of the violence and cruelty of the government. All these wars, till Henry the 4th was settled on the throne, were in a course of 28 years, that which some would call rebellion, being carried on against two succeeding kings. Yet the queen was in all that time still assisting them with men and money.

“In the year 1568, the provinces in the Netherlands threw off the Spanish yoke, that was become intolerably severe and cruel. The queen for some years assisted them more covertly, but when the prince of Orange was killed, and they were in danger to be over-run, she took them more openly into her protection; and by the manifesto which I have in my hands, she published the grounds upon which she proceeded. She laid down this for a foundation, that there had been an ancient league not only between the crown of England, and the princes of the Netherlands, but between the subjects of both countries, under their seals interchangeably, for all friendly offices. If this was a good reason for the queen’s giving aid to the oppressed people of the Netherlands, then if the case had been reversed, that the people of England had been illegally and cruelly oppressed, it furnished the princes of those provinces with as good a reason for assisting them. In this assistance given the States, the queen persisted till the end of her reign; nor was this only done by the court, but both parliaments and convocations granted her several aids to maintain these wars: and in the preambles of those subsidy acts, the queen’s proceedings in those particulars were highly approved and magnified. Bilson bishop of Winchester, and several other writers in that time, justified what she did; and not one that I ever heard of censured or condemned it.

“Upon king James’s coming to the crown, the first great negotiation was for a peace between Spain and the United Provinces; which lasted several years. The States insisted on a preliminary, That they should be acknowledged free, sovereign, and independent States; The Spaniards would not yield to this, nor would the States recede from it. Some here in England began to say, They were formed in rebellion, and ought not to carry their pretensions too far: Upon that king James suffered a convocation to meet; and a book of canons, with relation to the supreme authority, was prepared; in which, though the authority of the Prince, even when he becomes a tyrant, is carried very far; yet the case of the Maccabees is stated; and, it was determined, That when a new government, though begun in a revolt, is come to a thorough settlement, it may be owned as lawful. King James, who was jealous enough of the regal authority, yet did not like their carrying these matters so far: he ordered the whole matter to be let fall so entirely, that there is not a word of it in the books of convocation: But archbishop Sancroft found this collection of canons at Durham, under Dr. Overall’s hand, which he copied out, and licensed the book a few days before he fell under his suspension. I soon saw that it had a relation to the affairs in Holland: For the Dutch delighted to compare their first beginnings to that of the Jews in Antiochus’s time: They compared king Philip to Antiochus Epiphanes, and the prince of Orange to Judas Maccabæus. But I saw much clearer into the matter by an original letter of king James, which a worthy gentleman sent me. I knew his hand well, the letter is in print; but I will read some particulars out of it. It is directed to Dr. Abbot, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. It begun with censuring some positions concerning a king in possession, the same with our modern term of a king de facto: he goes on in these words: ‘My reason of calling you together, was to give your judgments, how far a Christian and a Protestant king, may concur to assist his neighbours to shake off their obedience to their own sovereign, upon the account of oppression, tyranny, or what else you like to name it. In the late queen’s time, this kingdom was very free in assisting the Hollanders, both with arms and advice; and none of your coat ever told me, that any scrupled about it in her reign. Upon my coming to England, you may know, it came from some of yourselves to raise scruples about this matter; yet I never took any notice of these scruples, till the affairs of Spain and Holland forced me to it. I called my clergy together, to satisfy not so much me, as the world about us, of the justness of my owning the Hollanders at this time. This I need not to have done, and you have forced me to say, I wish I had not.’ He reflects on those, who had a great aversion to the notion of God’s being the author of sin, which plainly points at Dr. Overall, who was the first man of note among us, that opposed the Calvinist doctrine of predestination; yet, he says, ‘They had gone to the threshold of it, by saying, that even tyranny was God’s authority, and should be reverenced as such.’ He concludes, ‘these were edged tools, and that therefore they were to let them rest.’ Here is a full account of king James’s thoughts of this matter, which was then the chief subject of discourse all Europe over. He had 12 years before this shewed, on an eminent occasion, that he owned the States, when he invited them in the year 1593, to christen his eldest son, prince Henry. They were sensible of the great honour done them by it; and though they were then but low, they sent an embassy, with a noble present of gold plate, to assist on that occasion. This negotiation stuck for several years, the Spaniards refusing to own them in express words: the temper found was, they were treated with (tamquam) as with free states; and the matter went no further at that time, than a truce for some years, which was concluded in the year 1609. This lets us see, that the words in king James’s speech that year to his parliament, were not chance words that fell carelessly from him. ‘A king leaves to be

'a king, and degenerates into a tyrant, as soon as he leaves off to govern by law: in which case the king's conscience may speak to him, as the poor woman to Philip of Macedon; Either govern by law, or cease to be a king.'

"There is another eminent instance towards the end of that reign, that shews what the sense of our best divines was in this matter: When the archbishop of York's son, and Mr. Wadsworth, had changed their religion in Spain, Wadsworth writ over a bold defence of that; and, among other things, charged the Reformation with rebellion. This was answered by one of the best books of that time, writ by Dr. Bedell, dedicated to the prince of Wales, who afterwards promoted him to a bishopric. His words on this head are full; I will read some of them. 'Do you think subjects are bound to give their throats to be cut by their fellow subjects, or to their prince, at their mere wills, against their own laws and edicts? You would know, quo jure, the Protestants' wars in France and Holland, are justified: First, The law of nature, which not only alloweth, but inclineth and enforceth every living thing, to defend itself from violence. Secondly, That of nations, which permitteth those who are in the protection of others, to whom they owe no more than an honourable acknowledgment, in case they go about to make themselves absolute sovereigns, and to usurp their liberty, to resist, and stand for the same. And if a lawful prince, who is not yet lord of his subjects' lives and goods, shall attempt to despoil them of the same, under colour of reducing them to his own religion, after all humble remonstrances, they may stand upon their own guard, and being assailed, resist force with force, as did the Maccabees under Antiochus. In which case, notwithstanding, the person of the prince himself ought always to be sacred and inviolable, as was Saul to David.' No commentary is wanted here.

"My Lords; You see how this matter stood during king James's reign. In the first year of king Charles's reign, Grotius's book, 'De Jure Belli et Pacis,' was published at Paris, dedicated to the king of France, while France was under the administration of the wisest and most jealous minister of the last age, cardinal Richelieu. In that book, in which he asserts the rights of princes with great zeal, yet he enumerates many cases, in which it is lawful to resist, particularly that of a total subversion: and that book is now, all Europe over, of the highest reputation of any book that the modern ages have produced. In the beginning of king Charles's reign, a war broke out in France, against the Protestants; upon which he sent over ambassadors, by whose mediation a peace was concluded; but that being ill kept, the war broke out again; and the king thought himself bound by his mediation, to protect the Protestants. So in the second session of parliament, 1628, in the demand of a supply that the lord keeper Coventry made, in the king's name, these words are to be found: 'France is swayed

'by the Popish faction; and though by his majesty's mediation, there were Articles of Agreement between that king and his subjects, that treaty hath been broke, and those of the reformed religion will be ruined, without present help.' Upon this the Commons petitioned the king for a fast, and desired the concurrence of the Lords, who joined with them in it. The king granted it, and an office was composed suitable to the occasion; in which, among other devotions, the nation was directed to pray for all those, who here, or elsewhere, were fighting God's battles, and defending his altars. Thus the whole body of the legislature did concur for a fast for that, which, if this doctrine is true, was no better than rebellion; and yet the whole nation, clergy and laity, were required to pray for success in it.

"But to compleat this view of the doctrine of our church, it is to be considered, that when a year before this, while the loan, or benevolence, were carried on, some officious divines made use of those expressions of kings having their power from God, importing an authority of a nature superior to the laws of the land: One of these, Dr. Manwaring, was impeached, and had a severe sentence passed on him for it. So I have now made it out, beyond, I hope, the possibility of contradiction, that, for 70 years together, from 1558, to 1628, the lawfulness of self-defence, in the case of illegal and violent cruelty, was the public and constant doctrine of this church.

"These were the best and happiest times of our church, as is often repeated by the earl of Clarendon: From these we ought to take the standard of our doctrine.

"I go next to show what was the common doctrine for the next 60 years, from 1628, to 1688. I must yield up the first 12 years: For upon the unhappy misunderstanding between the king and the parliament, there was a long discontinuance of parliaments; then the late condemned doctrine was again in vogue; and nothing was so much heard of, as the law of government that was from God, antecedent to all other human laws: out of this sprung illegal imprisonments, illegal monopolies, severe proceedings in the Star-Chamber, but above all, the Ship-money. These things put the nation in an universal disjointing and feebleness. And when an unavoidable necessity forced that king to call a parliament, the fatal effects of those counsels broke out terribly. I know many fancy, that the war is to be charged on the principles of self-defence: They are much mistaken. I had occasion to see a great way into the secret of that time, when I examined the papers relating to the two dukes of Hamilton. I knew a great deal more since, from two persons of unquestionable integrity, who knew the secrets of that time, the lord Hollis, and sir Harbottle Grimstone; but all received a full confirmation, when I found it agreed perfectly with the noble account given the earl of Clarendon.

any principles leading to it. But there was an unhappy train of accidents, that hindered matters from being brought to a settlement, even while the king was granting all they could desire. Stories were carried by persons about both the king and queen, or words let fall, that made them conclude, that there were still ill designs on foot, against the laws that were then passed. But that which brought all to a crisis, was the discovery of a negotiation, to engage the army to declare against the parliament. Whosoever compares the depositions in Rushworth with the account given of that matter by the earl of Clarendon, will see there is a great deal more in the one, than the other is willing to believe; though he acknowledges they had both Goring's evidence, and Piercy's letter with them. I will not take it upon me to determine, whether they believed too much, or the earl of Clarendon too little. It is certain they believed all that was in the depositions, and a great deal more: For Goring being continued in the government of Portsmouth, and his father being advanced from being a baron, to be an earl, and Piercy's being made a lord and master of the horse to the prince of Wales, made them conclude they had suppressed a great deal, instead of saying more than was true. This struck deep in their hearts, and at last fatally broke out in the demand of the militia, that brought on the war, which, I do own, was plainly a Rebellion, because a force was offered to the king, not to defend themselves from an unjust invasion, or illegal grievances, but to extort a new law from him.

"Thus the true occasion of the war, was a jealousy, that a conduct of 15 years had given too much ground for; and that was still unhappily kept up, by a fatal train of errors in every step that was made. The great concussion that the war gave the nation, and the barbarous effusion of so much blood, especially of the royal blood of that blessed king, had, at last, a happy, though a late conclusion in the Restoration: And it is no wonder if such a series of tragical events, begot a general horror at the occasion of them. But then it was, that had it not been for the firmness of the earl of Clarendon to his English principles, the liberties of the nation had been delivered up.

"It is to his memory, that we owe our being a free people; for he, with his two great friends, the duke of Ormond, and the earl of Southampton, checked the forwardness of some, who were desirous to load the crown with prerogative and revenue. He stopt all this, which being afterwards odiously represented, brought on him that great and lasting, but honourable disgrace. The earl of Southampton, whose death went a little before his fall, and perhaps hastened it the sooner, said to many about him, that he was a true Protestant, and an honest Englishman; and that the nation would feel the effects of his being removed, whensoever it might happen.

"That Lord, in the great settlement after the Restoration, would carry things no farther, than to repeal what had been extorted by the tumults; and in the matter of the Militia-Act, and the oaths relating to it, all was more cautiously worded, than is commonly understood. To the word 'commissioned by the king,' some, indeed, moved, that the word 'lawfully' might be added, to make all plain. That was pressed in the House of Commons by Vaughan, afterwards lord chief-justice of the Common-Pleas, The Attorney-general, afterwards Lord Chancellor Nottingham, answered, that was not necessary; for the word Commission imported it; since, if it was not lawfully issued out, to lawful persons, and for a lawful reason, it was no Commission; and the whole House assented to this; yet in the House of Lords, the same word lawfully, was pressed to be added by the earl of Southampton, who was answered by the earl of Anglesey to the same purpose, with what had been said in the House of Commons: he, indeed, insisted to have the word added, because it would clear all difficulties with many, who not having heard of the sense given in both Houses, might fancy, that any sort of Commission being granted, it would not be lawful to resist it. He did not prevail; for it was said, that this explanation being the sense of both Houses, it would be soon spread and known over the nation. In this sense, it is certain, that it is not lawful to take arms against any so commissioned by the king; for that were to take arms against the king's commission in the execution of the law, which is certainly a resisting the Ordinance of God, which whosoever do, they shall receive to themselves damnation.

"It was no wonder, if after such a war, the doctrine of Non-resistance was preached and pressed with more than ordinary warmth, and without any exceptions; yet some still kept these in view; so did both Dr. Falkner and myself; and I know many others had them always in their thoughts, though they did not think it necessary to mention them.

"I found the ill effects, that the carrying this matter so far, had on the mind of that unfortunate prince, king James; for in the year 1673, when he was pleased to admit me to much free conversation with him, among many other things, I told him, it was impossible for him to reign in quiet in this nation, being of that religion; he answered me quick, Does not the Church of England maintain the doctrine of Non-resistance and Passive Obedience? I begged of him not to depend on that; for there was a distinction in that matter, that would be found out when men thought they needed it. I now come to tell your lordships, how right I judged.

"It is true, they passed a very pompous decree at Oxford 1683, but you shall hear how long they stood to it. In summer, 1686, the prince of Orange was pleased to receive me into his service with a particular confidence. Soon after the ecclesiastical commission was set up, and upon some proceedings before that board, he was desired from England to break with king James upon that head. I opposed this, and said, I was convinced, that commission was against law, and would have ill effects, but it did not strike at the whole. This was more warmly pressed upon the proceedings against Magdalene college. I still stood up to my ground; and told both prince and princess, that if a breach should follow on these matters, I could not serve. When indeed the declaration was published a second time, with a resolution to have it carried through; and that many laws were dispensed with at pleasure; and persons who were under legal disabilities, were made judges, sheriffs and magistrates; all whose actings were so many nullities: then I thought here was a total subversion of our constitution; which from being a legal one, was made precarious, subject to mere will and pleasure. So I was ready to serve in the Revolution.

“Some days after we came to Exeter, sir Edward Seymour came thither, and he presently sent for me: when I came to him, he asked me, why were we a rope of sand, and had not an association? I said, because we had not yet a man of his weight to begin the motion: he said, if we had not one by to-morrow, he would leave us before night. I presently saw a noble duke now in my eye, and acquainted him with this; he went to the prince, who approving of it, an Association was prepared, and laid on the table next morning; and was after that signed by all who came to wait on the prince. Three days after we left Exeter, a head of a college came to the prince, to invite him to come to Oxford, assuring him, that the University would declare for him. He went as near it as Abingdon, but then the sudden turn of affairs at London obliging him to haste up, the Association was sent thither, and was signed by the heads of the colleges, and many others there; some doing it in a particular warmth of expression, and saying, that their hearts, as well as their hands went with it. Upon what disappointments or other views, I cannot tell, this contradiction to their famed decree, five years after it was made, seemed to take another turn back to it again; and the notion of a king de facto, which is but a softer word for an usurper, came in vogue.

“The parliament to prevent the ill effects of that studied to secure the government, first, by an association, and then by an abjuration. I, who was always against every thing that might break in upon conscience, was for making these only voluntary; but they were enacted, and they were generally taken. A noble lord on the earls’ bench, procured me the sight of a letter, that went about to persuade the taking the abjuration, that he had from a place where he believed it had its effect; where I found this distinction, that the abjuring any right whatsoever that the Pretender might claim, was only meant of a legal right, and that it had no relation to birth-right, or to divine right. This agreed, with a report that went then current, that a person, in a great post, sent a message to an honourable gentleman, who would not take the abjuration, that if he had an half hour’s discourse with him, he doubted not to be able to convince him, that he might take the abjuration, without departing from any of his principles. Towards the end of the last reign, a bold attempt was made on the king’s supremacy by an incendiary who is supposed to have no small share in this matter now before your lordships: but the attack on the supremacy being liable to a premonition, it was turned with much malice, and managed with great prevarication against the bishops, who adhered firmly to their duty to the king. How great a disjoining that has brought on this church, is too visible all the nation over, and it tends to carry on the wicked design of distracting the church, and undermining the government.

“By the time the queen was on the throne or soon after, the Rehearsal began to be spread over the nation, two of them a week, which continued for several years together, to be published without check or controul; it was all through one argument against the queen’s right to the crown; that, though it was diversified with incidents and digressions, was kept always in view. The clergy were in many places drawn into subscriptions for this paper. This looked like a design long connived at, to have the queen’s title undermined: besides this, we had a swarm of pamphlets every year to the same purpose and, as was believed, writ by the same hand. One sold at the door of the House, with the title of King William’s Exorbitant Grants, did plainly call him an usurper; and starting an objection against the queen’s possessing the throne, gave it this answer, that she did well to keep it till she could deliver it up to the righteous heir. At that time there was quick prosecution of a paper published, with the title of The Shortest Way with the Dissenters; and upon that, I brought that pamphlet to a great minister, and offered to shew him this passage in it, to see if there should be a prosecution of this ordered. He turned from me; so whether he heard me or not, I cannot tell: I am sure, if he says he did not I will believe him. No prosecution followed, and the Rehearsal went on. The clergy in many places, met at a coffee-house on Saturdays, to read the Rehearsals of the week, which had very ill effects in most places. I know it may be said, that the queen’s learned counsel ought to have looked after these things: but we all know that they stay till they receive orders from the ministry. The course of that treasonable paper has been now for some time stopt, so we see there is some change in the ministry.

“But to compleat the insolence of the enemies of the queen and of the protestant succession; they had the impudence to give it out that the queen secretly favoured them: and as this, we all know, has been long whispered about among us, so it was more boldly given out in Scotland, which obliged one of the queen's ministers in that parliament, in a speech that was printed, to contradict this treasonable and dishonourable suggestion. That as some divines would have it, that there was in God a secret, as well as a revealed will, and that these might be contrary to one another; so they would fasten an imputation on the queen that while she revealed her will one way, she had a secret will another way; which he solemnly affirmed to be false, and highly injurious to the queen.

"While the pamphlets and these reports were thus set about, Mr. Hoody thought that it became him to assert the queen's title by justifying the Revolution, out of which it rises. But what an outcry was raised on this, that one durst disturb the progress of a wicked opinion, that was visibly designed to overturn the government: and yet he asserted nothing, but what the counsel for the prisoner did all fully and plainly own, that in the cases of extreme necessity, an exception to the doctrine was to be admitted, and that that was the case at the Revolution.

"But as these notions have been long let run among us; so they have appeared in a most violent and unguarded manner, ever since the attempt of the Pretender, and more of late, since the preliminaries upon the overtures for a peace, seem to extinguish their hopes. What sermons on this head are preached in this city at assizes, at Bath, and at many cathedrals? Furious men fit themselves with some hot sermons, which they carry about from place to place, to poison the nation. This has not only the viable effect designed by it, of shaking many in their allegiance to the queen, and in their adhering to the Protestant Succession; but it has a cursed effect on many others, on whom this their design does not succeed.

"I am very sensible there is a great deal of impiety and infidelity now spread through the nation: this gives every good mind all possible horror; but I must tell your lordships, on what a great part of it is founded; for since my conversation with Wilmot, earl of Rochester, I have had many occasions to discourse with persons tainted with those wicked principles, and I do affirm it, that the greatest prejudice these persons have at religion, at the clergy, and at the public worship of God, is this, that they say, they see clergymen take oaths, and use all prayers, both ordinary and extraordinary, for the government, and yet in their actions, they shew visibly that they look another way; from whence they conclude they are a mercenary sort of people without conscience.

"I hope these are not many that are so corrupted and so scandalous: I am sure I know a great many that are far otherwise, who preach, speak, and act, as they swear and pray; but these who act in another way, are noisy and impudent, and so bring an imputation on the whole body; and unless an effectual stop is put to this distemper, it is not possible to foresee all the ill consequences that may follow upon it.

"I have, I am afraid, wearied your lordships; but I thought it was necessary, once for all, to enlarge copiously on this argument: and now to come close to the Article, and the Sermon, for I meddle not at all with the person of the man; whatever general expressions might very well have been used, in setting forth passive obedience and non-resistance before the Revolution, because odious cases ought not to be supposed, and therefore are not to be named; yet since resistance was used in the Revolution, and that the late king invited all the subjects to join with him, which was in them certainly resistance; and since the lawfulness of the Revolution is so much controverted, the condemning all resistance in such crude and general terms, is certainly a condemning the Revolution: and this is further aggravated from those limitations on our obedience, in an act passed soon after the Revolution, by which, in case our princes turn Papiets, or marry Papiets, the subjects are, in express words, discharged from their allegiance to them. Certainly this puts an end to the notion of non-resistance in any case, or on any pretence whatsoever: For these reasons, I think the first Article of this Impeachment, is both well grounded, and fully made out."

Several other peers, particularly the duke of Devonshire, the lord-chancellor, and the lords Somers, Halifax, and Mohun, spoke also in vindication of the late Revolution; and maintained, that in extraordinary cases resistance is necessary and lawful; and concluded, that the Commons had made good the first Article. The archbishop of York, the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Nottingham and Rochester, the lords Guernsey, North and Grey, and Carmarthen, and the bishops of London, Rochester, and Landaff, who spoke on the other side, declared, "That they never read such a piece of madness and nonsense, as Dr. Sacheverell's sermon, but did not think him guilty of a misdemeanor." After a long debate, which lasted till past nine in the evening, it was at last carried by a majority of 19, That the Commons had made good their first Article of Impeachment against Dr. Sacheverell.

March 17. The Lords took into consideration the Second Article of the Commons' Impeachment.

The Bishop of Lincoln (Dr. Wake) began the debate with the following speech:

"William Wake, an eminent prelate, born at Blandford, Dorsetshire, 1657. He was in 1672 admitted at Christ-church, and when in orders he became preacher to the Gray's-inn society. In 1689 he took his degree of D. D. and was appointed deputy clerk to the closet, and chaplain to William and Mary, and soon after canon of Christ-church, in 1694 rector of St. James's Westminster, dean of Exeter 1704,

“ My lords ; It was the misfortune of some of our bench, that in the prosecution of the foregoing Article of this Impeachment, a noble lord, who spoke very early to that point, was pleased not only to anticipate our judgment in that particular ; but to do it with this pretty hard reflection ; that in giving it, as he supposed we would, we should vote contrary to our own doctrine. It is not improbable but that, in the course of the present debate, another arrow may be drawn out of the same quiver to shoot at us ; and we may be told, that in defending of the Toleration granted by law to the dissenters, we shew ourselves to be apostates from our own order. But from both these imputations I am persuaded both our writings and our actions, will secure us in the judgment of all indifferent persons.

“ The substance of this Second Article of the Impeachment, which your lordships are now about to enter upon, is this : “ That Dr. S. in his Sermon, doth suggest and maintain, that the Toleration, granted by law, is unreasonable, and the allowance of it unwarrantable. That he is a false brother with relation to God, religion, or the church, who defends Toleration, and liberty of conscience. That queen Elizabeth was deluded by archbishop Grindal to the Toleration of the Genevian discipline : And that it is the duty of superior pastors to thunder out their ecclesiastical anathemas against persons intitled to the benefit of the Toleration ; and insolently dares, or defies, any power on earth to reverse such sentences.” This, my lords, is the sum of this part of the Commops’ charge against Dr. S. and I think the managers have fully made it out ; not by bare intendments, by unnecessary implications, and forced constructions ; not by piecing together broken sentences, and conjoining of distant, and independent passages (as he has unjustly complained ;) but by the plain words, and necessary meaning, of a very great part of his discourse.—But before I trouble your lordships bishop of Lincoln 1705, and translated to Canterbury Jan. 1715-16. He was engaged 1697 in a severe controversy with Atterbury with respect to the rights of convocation, but though several of the clergy entered the lists on both sides, the State of the Church and Clergy of England, &c. fol. by Dr. Wake, was the most masterly, luminous and satisfactory performance published on the subject. In other writings he also ably vindicated the Church against the Papists, and while he earnestly wished in his discourses, and in his correspondence, to form an union between the churches of England and France, he was indefatigable in supporting the rights and tenets of Protestants. This truly learned and virtuous man died at Lambeth 24th Jan. 1736-7, leaving several daughters. Besides his controversial works he published a translation of the epistles of the Apostolical Fathers, 8vo—Exposition of the Church Catechism, often edited—Tracts against Popery—Sermons and Charges.” Lempriere.

with the proof of this, give me leave, upon this occasion, (though it be no part of the Impeachment laid against the preacher) to observe to your lordships what a strange account he has thought fit to publish of that other popular engine, which, he says, has been made use of, to pull down the church, and which he calls by the name of ‘comprehension.’—The person who first concerted this supposed design against our church, was the late most reverend Dr. Sancroft, then archbishop of Canterbury. The time, was towards the end of that unhappy reign, of which so much was said upon the occasion of the foregoing article. Then, when we were in the height of our labours, defending the church of England against the assaults of popery, and thought of nothing else ; that wise prelate, foreseeing some such Revolution as soon after was happily brought about ; began to consider how utterly unprepared they had been at the restoration of king Charles the 2d, to settle many things to the advantage of the church ; and what a happy opportunity had been lost for want of such a previous care, as he was therefore desirous should now be taken, for the better and more perfect establishment of it. It was visible to all the nation, that the more moderate dissenters were generally so well satisfied with that stand which our divines had made against popery, and the many unanswerable treatises they had published in confutation of it, as to express an unusual readiness to come in to us. And it was therefore thought worth the while, when they were deliberating about those other matters, to consider at the same time what might be done to gain them, without doing any prejudice to ourselves.—The scheme was laid out, and the several parts of it were committed not only with the approbation, but by the direction of that great prelate, to such of our divines as were thought the most proper to be intrusted with it. His grace took one part to himself : Another was committed to a then pious and reverend dean, afterwards a bishop, of our church. [Dr. Patrick bishop of Ely.] The reviewing of the daily service of our Liturgy and the Communion book, was referred to a select number of excellent persons, two of which are at this time upon our bench [the archbishop of York, and bishop of Ely ;] and I am sure will bear witness to the truth of my relation. The design was, in short, this : To improve, and, if possible, to enforce our discipline ; to review, and enlarge our Liturgy ; by correcting of some things, by adding of others ; and, if it should be thought advisable by authority, when this matter should come to be legally considered, first in convocation, then in parliament by leaving some few ceremonies, confessed to be indifferent in their natures, as indifferent in their usage, so as not to be necessarily observed by those who made a scruple of them ; until they should be able to overcome either their weaknesses, or prejudices, and be willing to comply with them.—How far this good design was not only known to, but approved of by the other fathers of our church ; that famous petition for which seven of them were sent to the Tower, and which contributed so much to our deliverance, may suffice to shew. The 'willingness they there declared of coming to such a temper as should be thought fit with the dissenters, when that matter should be considered, and settled, in parliament and convocation;' manifestly referred to what was then known to several, if not all of the subscribers, to have been at that very time under deliberation. And that nothing more was intended than I have before said, is as evident from what was publicly declared in a treatise purposely written to recommend the design when it was brought before the two Houses of Parliament, in the beginning of the late reign; and licensed by the authority of a noble peer, now present, who was at that time Secretary of State: In the very beginning of which there is this remarkable passage, which I shall beg leave to read to your lordships*: 'No alteration that I know of, is intended, but in things declared to be alterable by the church itself. And if things alterable be altered upon the grounds of prudence and charity; and things defective be supplied; and things abused be restored to their proper use; and things of a more ordinary composition revised and improved; whilst the doctrine, government, and worship of the church remain entire, in all the substantial parts of them; we have all reason to believe that this will be so far from injuring the church, that on the contrary, it shall receive a very great benefit by it.'

"And now, my lords, let any impartial person consider, what was there in such a design that could be justly esteemed prejudicial to the constitution of our church? Wherein would our canons have suffered, if those already made, had been more strongly enforced; and some new ones had been added for the reformation of manners; for the better punishing of notorious offenders; and to render our public discipline more strict, and severe? This we have been wishing for ever since the Reformation: What harm would it have done our church had it now been effected? Or how would our excellent Liturgy have been the worse, if a few more doubtful expressions had been changed for plainer, and clearer; and a passage, or two, which however capable of a just defence, yet in many cases seem harsh to some even of our own communion, had either been wholly left at liberty in such cases, to be omitted altogether: or been so qualified as to remove all exception against them in any case. If such collects, as are not yet adapted to the festivals, or gospels, to which they belong; had been made more full, and apposite to both: If some of the occasional offices had been enlarged; and new ones added: if for example, there had been a greater variety of prayers, psalms, and lessons appointed by authority, instead of the compositions of private persons now necessarily to be used, for the visitation of the sick; and new forms composed for the use of prisoners for debt or crimes: For the greater solemnity of receiving proselytes into our church; Of reconciling penitents to it; and of casting notorious offenders out of it. These were some of the main things that were then designed: As for any favour to the dissenters, none, that I know of, was intended, but what should have been entirely consistent with our own constitution: And I hope it will not be thought any crime for the bishops, and clergy of our church, to be willing to enlarge its communion, by any methods which may be likely to gain others, and yet not injure our own establishment.

"But to satisfy your lordships that nothing could have been designed to the detriment of the church; Be pleased farther to consider, how what was thus at first projected in private, by select persons, and in a difficult time, when no countenance was to be expected from authority to any such purpose; was afterwards, if ever, to have been brought to maturity. And this being a matter of public notice, the relation of it will admit of no exception.

"No sooner were their late majesties, of glorious memory, seated in their thrones, but this design was openly espoused by them. A commission was issued out under the great seal of England, to a large number of bishops, and other eminent divines, to meet together, and to consider of these matters. What they did, having not had the honour to be one of them, I shall not presume to say. This we know, that whatever they did, it was to have been carried on from them to the two convocations of Canterbury and York: And after it should have passed their approbations, it was finally to have been laid before the two Houses of parliament, and so to have gone on to the royal assent. This, my lords, was the course through which all that was designed, or should have been done in this matter, must have passed; and I am persuaded nothing very injurious to our church's welfare, will ever be able to pass through all these.

"Having thus given your lordships a true account, of that design which Dr. S. mentions under the name of 'comprehension;' I doubt not but that your lordships will now be amazed to hear, what a false and scandalous report he has made of it. In the 16th page of his Sermon he thus speaks of it: 'The worst adversaries of our church,' says he, 'were to be let into her bowels under the holy umbrage of sons; who never believed her faith; own'd her mission; submitted to her discipline; or complied with her Liturgy. For the admitting of this Trojan horse, big with arms and ruin, into our holy city, the straight gate was to be laid quite open; Her walls and enclosures to be pulled down; and a high-road made in upon her communion. Her articles to be taught the confusion of all senses, nations and languages.'

“ This, my lords, is a very strange representation of so good a design, as that I before recounted to your lordships. Yet this representation did this bold man, as confidently, as falsely make of it in the house of God; and publish to the view of the whole nation. For thus he goes on: ‘ This pious design of making our house of prayer a den of thieves, of reforming our Church into a chaos; is well known to have been attempted several times in this kingdom, and lately within our memory; when all things seemed to favour it but that good providence which so happily interposed against the ruin of our church, and blasted the long projected scheme of these ecclesiastical Achitophels.’ To say nothing more of the design itself, of which I have given an account before. Pray my lords, who were the Achitophels that projected it; and must have concurred to the execution of it? I have already named the first, and chiefest of them, the late archbishop Sancroft. The next who openly approved of it, were the commissioners who met upon it in the Jerusalem Chamber; A set of men, whom which this church was never, at anyone time, blas’d with either wiser, or better, since it was a church; Who it was that presided in the convocation of this province, to which this project was next to be referred; and who, had it gone on, must have had a chief hand in the management of it, I need not say [The late lord bishop of London.] Every one who knows any thing at all of his character; (and I am sure your lordships are none of you strangers to it) knows him to be too good a friend to the establishment of our church; to have been capable of being engaged in such a villainous design, as Dr. S. pretends, for the subversion of it. Or had he been otherwise, yet still the major part of that venerable body must have been as great Achitophels as himself, or no harm could have been done by him. Pardon me, my lords, if the course of my argument obliges me to rise yet one degree higher, and to say that the like majority of your lordships, and of the House of Commons, together with his late majesty, must all have come into the plot against the church; or all the skill, and malice, of the inferior Achitophels, would have signified nothing. And what censure that man deserves who has the confidence to insinuate to the world, that the bishops, the other clergy, the convocations; the parliament, nay, and the late king himself, our glorious deliverer; or at least the greater part of all these, were engaged in a project so monstrous, so romantic and absurd, (for here I am content to use his own expressive) ‘ that it is hard to say whether it had more of villainy, or folly, in it.’ I shall submit it to your lordships to consider. All I design in taking notice of this part of his Sermon, is only to clear the memory of many excellent persons who are dead; to vindicate the reputation of some still living, and in the highest stations of the church; from that load of infamy which this rash man has with so much virulence of speech cast upon them: And to let your lordships see that nothing was intended in all that affair but what was both honourable to those who engaged in it; and I am persuaded would have been for the interest and peace of our church and state, had it been accomplished.

“ I come now to that which is the proper subject of the present debate; namely to offer such passages to your lordships, as I humbly conceive do plainly and fully make out the second Article of the Commons’ Impeachment against the preacher; and prove him to have spoken with more freedom than he ought, not only of the dissenters themselves, but of the Toleration, or (as he had rather we should call it) the indulgence granted by law to them.—And here, as I remember, it was not denied either by his counsel, or himself, but that he had spoken, and spoken with warmth too, against Toleration. The only question is, what the Toleration is against which he spoke? Whether it was that which has been granted by law to the dissenters? Or whether it was only against a general Toleration of Atheists, Deists, Socinians; men of no principles, perhaps of no religion? Or at most against such of the dissenters as abused the indulgence granted them by law; and made use of it to purposes not at all warranted by it. The former of these the Commons charge upon him: The latter he pretends; the better to clear himself of their charge.—To determine this point, I must in the first place beg leave to observe; that among the several sorts of false brethren, enumerated by the preacher with relation to God, religion or the church; the second kind is of those, who give up any point of the church’s discipline and worship, page 8. To this he adds, that those are false-brethren who defend Toleration, and Liberty of Conscience. And that we may the better know what Toleration, and Liberty of Conscience, he means; He specifies the very persons to whom he refers, and of whom he speaks; the dissenters: If, says he, ‘ to comply with the dissenters both in public and private affairs, as persons of tender conscience and piety, to promote their interest in elections, to sneak to them for places and preferment, to defend Toleration and liberty of conscience, and under the pretence of moderation, excuse their separation, are the criterions of a true churchman; God deliver us all from such false brethren.’ The Toleration therefore, and Liberty of Conscience, against which he speaks, must necessarily be that of the dissenters; those who separate from our church: He names no others; but carries the same persons through his whole sentence, both before and after those expressions. Either therefore it is no reflection upon the act of indulgence to say that all those who defend the Toleration of the dissenters, and are for allowing liberty of conscience to them, are false brethren with relation to God, religion, or the church, page 6, 7, and such against whom we ought to pray to God to deliver us all, page 8: Or if this cannot with any reason be either said, or supposed, then it must remain, that Dr. S.

has here said what the Commons charge him withal; and that in express terms, viz. That he is a false brother who defends the Toleration, not of Deists, Socinians, and I know not what monsters of irreligion, but of the Dissenters. Those same Dissenters who by the act of Indulgence have a right to that liberty of conscience of which this gentleman speaks so very hardly; and prays God to defend us from all such false brethren as shall presume to excuse it.

“But not to insist upon a single passage which may be supposed to have dropt unwarily from him. In the second part of his Sermon, he proceeds to shew the great perils and mischiefs of those false brethren, against whom he was before speaking, both to the church and state: pag. 15. And that these again are the same persons who have a right to the legal indulgence is so very clear, that I do not see how it is possible for any one to make the least doubt of it. p. 18. He describes them as occasional conformists to the church, pag. 19. As those who had the old leaven of their forefathers still working in them: and, in the next sentence, he expressly takes notice of the religious liberty which our gracious sovereign has indulged them. This in the very same sentence he calls their Toleration; (for the Doctor himself is not tied up to any niceties of expression; He may call it so, though others may not:) These are the persons, and the only persons, of whom he speaks in all that part of his discourse; let us see what he says of the indulgence granted by law to them.

“And first he tells us, page 18. ‘That it cannot be denied, but that though they do submit to the government, their obedience is forced, and constrained; and so treacherous, and uncertain, as never to be trusted. That they are as much occasional loyalists to the state as they are occasional conformists to the church; and will betray either whenever it is in their power, and they think it for their advantage. That nothing but a Scottish infatuation can so far blind our eyes and our judgments, as to make us believe that the same causes should not produce the same effects; that the same latitudinarian and republican notions, should not bring forth the same rebellious and pernicious consequences. That we shall be convinced to our sorrow, if we do not apprehend that the old leaven bread of their forefathers is still working in the present generation; and that this traditional poison still remains in this brood of vipers to sting us to death. That they have advanced themselves from the religious liberty which our gracious sovereign has indulged them, to claim a civil right; and to jostle the church out of her establishment, by hoisting their Toleration into its place. That to convince us what alone will satisfy them, they insolently demand the repeal of the Corporation and Test acts, which, under her majesty, is the only security the church has to depend upon: And which (if we may believe him,) they have so far eluded by

‘their abominable hypocrisy, as to have undermined her foundations, and endanger the government, by filling it with its professed enemies.’ His meaning is plainly this; that the dissenters, whom we are so foolish as to indulge, are a parcel of false and treacherous persons; enemies both to our church and state; and such as if not timely suppressed will convince us to our sorrow of the weakness and folly, of taking such vipers into our bosom, as watch only for a fair opportunity to sting us to death.

“But what then must we do to secure ourselves against these dangerous enemies? Why first, the Doctor assures us, that they are never to be gained by any favour that can be shewed to them. ‘That he must be very weak, or something worse, that thinks or pretends, that the dissenters (for of these he still speaks) are to be won over by any other grants and indulgences than giving up our whole constitution.’ This shews the folly of trying the soft way of indulgence with them: and therefore he concludes; that ‘He who recedes the least title from it (our constitution) to satisfy, or ingratiate with, these clamorous, insatiable, church-devouring malignants, knows not what spirit they are of; or he ought to shew who is the true member of our Church.’

“This I think comes fully up to what is objected against him; namely, that Doctor S. does in his Sermon suggest and maintain, ‘That the Toleration granted by law is unreasonable, and the allowance of it unwarrantable.’ For so it must needs be, if the dissenters be such men as he tells us they are; and will be satisfied with nothing less, than he assures us they will. And yet what next follows, is, if possible, still more express to the same purpose. It is objected against him by the Commons, that he had affirmed in his Sermon, that “Queen Elizabeth was deluded by arch-bishop Grindal, (whom he scurrilously calls a false-son of the Church, and a pernicious prelate;) to the toleration of the Genevian discipline.’ The fact is not denied; but the expressions are excused; and the truth of the allegation is endeavoured to be made out by historical memoirs: and it is hoped that your lordships will not account it a high crime and misdemeanor, to have spoken so hardly of a prelate who has been so many years in his grave.

“I am, my lords, very far from thinking, that the Commons ever intended to charge Dr. S. as guilty of high crimes and misdemeanours, for speaking scandalously of that good archbishop. Their concern was not for his person, what respect soever they may have had (as all true friends of the Reformation must needs have a very great one) for his memory. But the truth of the matter is this. The preacher complains, page 19, of this Sermon; that queen Elizabeth was deluded by archbishop Grindal, to the Toleration of the Genevian discipline. ‘Me

'adds, that the archbishop was a perfidious prelate, for deluding her to tolerate that discipline. That she found it such a headstrong and encroaching monster, that in eight years she saw it would endanger the monarchy as well as the hierarchy: and like a queen of true resolution, and pious zeal for both, she pronounced that such were the restless spirits of that factious people, that no quiet was to be expected from them, till they were utterly suppressed. That this therefore, like a prudent princess, she did by wholesome severities; and the effect was, that by this means the crown for many years sat easy and flourishing on her head. But that her successor king James, did not follow her wise politics: and the result was as deplorable on his side, as it had been glorious on hers. For by this means, 'His son fell a martyr to their fury: his unhappy offspring suffered such disastrous calamities, as made the royal family one continued sacrifice to their malice.' And all this for want of those wholesome severities which the wise queen his predecessor had used utterly to suppress that factious people.

"This, my lords, is the Doctor's narrative, and I have given it you in his own words. The application is plain, and home. The dissenters are now again tolerated, as they were heretofore under queen Elizabeth. There is a perfidious prelate (perhaps in his opinion a great many) who, like archbishop Grindal, help to delude another queen, into the Toleration of them. These eight years past (for the very number of years is remarkable) her majesty has borne the restless spirits of this factious people: and had no quiet from them. It is now high time for her to alter her measures, as queen Elizabeth wisely did. It is the only way to make the crown sit easy, and flourishing upon her head. And if this be not plainly to speak out what he would have done with the act of indulgence, I must despair of ever being able to know any man's meaning by his expressions. Such examples are not only the most likely to enforce, but the most proper, and lively methods to convey a man's sense, even to the dullest capacity; and make him clearly perceive, if not what he ought, yet I am sure what the preacher would have him to do.

"The truth is, so plain was his meaning, that he himself began to fear that he had gone a little too far in what he had said of this matter. And, for that reason, he added that one poor sentence which immediately follows, and of which he has made such good use since: 'That he would not be misunderstood as if he intended to cast the least invidious reflection upon that indulgence the government had condescended to give them, (the dissenters:)' but what then did he intend by all this bitter invective against them; and that very instructive piece of history with which he concluded it? He has told us that 'the Dissenters are false-brethren; destructive both of our civil

'and ecclesiastical rights. That they are occasional loyalists to the state, as well as occasional conformists to the church; and will betray both, whenever they have it in their power, and it shall be their interest to do it. That it must be a Scottish infatuation to believe that the same latitudinarian and republican notions, should not bring forth the same rebellious and pernicious consequences: that we shall be convinced to our sorrow, if we do not apprehend that the old leaven of their fore-fathers, is still working in the present generation; that they have already made dangerous encroachments upon the government; and published treasonable reflections upon her majesty: that they have advanced their indulgence into a civil right, and jostled the Church out of her establishment, by hoisting their Toleration into its place: that they have by their abominable hypocrisy undermined the foundation of the Church, and endangered the government, by filling it with its professed enemies: that they are clamorous, insatiable Church-devouring malignants; whom no other grants, or indulgencies can win over, but the giving up our whole constitution: that ever since their first unhappy plantation in this kingdom, they have improved, and rose upon their demands in the permission of the government: that queen Elizabeth, who tolerated them for eight years together, was forced at last to suppress them by wholesome severities: that this made her crown sit easy and flourishing on her head; whereas king James the first, by not pursuing the like methods ruined the whole royal family, that nothing better could be expected from such miscreants, begot in rebellion, born in sedition, and nursed up in faction: All this Dr. S. has said in these very plain, and emphatical words. If he did not intend by all this to shew the necessity of suppressing these factious people, these vipers, who are just ready to sting us all to death, I would be glad to know what it was that he did intend by it? Could he say all this, and with such a singular strain of impetuous eloquence, and yet 'not intend to cast so much as the least invidious reflections upon that indulgence which the government has thought fit to give them?' I must freely own, my lords, I could never have imagined this: nay I must be excused if I add, That notwithstanding this poor evasion, I cannot yet believe it. But the act of Indulgence stood in his way: that act the queen had declared her resolution to maintain: your lordships and the Commons had often shewn your steadiness to the same effect. Even those who pressed so violently against Occasional Communion, yet thought it necessary to say, in the very preamble of that bill, that the act of Indulgence ought inviolably to be observed; and therefore Dr. S. thought it needful to add somewhat that he knew would not take off any thing from the force of his invective: yet might serve to excuse the severity of it; and be made use of to the purpose

it now is, if he should chance to be called to account for it. This, my lords, I conceive to be the true meaning of that one single passage so utterly repugnant to all the rest of his discourse: nor can I put any other interpretation upon it. For had I the same opinion of these men, their principles and their designs, that Dr. S. has; I should be so far from thinking them fit to be indulged, that I should account it my duty, and the duty of every true friend to our Church and government; to take the same methods of wholesome severities with them that queen Elizabeth did: and I hope by God's grace that should I be questioned for it, I should not dissemble my opinion; but should have the courage honestly to own it, whatever I might chance to suffer for it.

"I have, my lords, insisted the longer upon this part of the Doctor's Sermon, because I would not willingly fall under the censure of picking out disjointed sentences, and putting them together from distant places, that so I might the better draw a sense out of them, contrary to his meaning. I shall trouble your lordships but with one part more of it, to the same effect; page 24, 25. Where he comes to consider, what should be the result of his long discourse? I shall read it to your lordships in his own words, page 25. 'Let us therefore (says he) as we are unhappy sharers of St. Paul's misfortune, to have our Church in perils amongst false-brethren, follow his example, and conduct in a parallel case. He tells us in his Epistle to the Galatians, c. 2. 'That he was obstructed, and pestered in preaching the Gospel, by false-brethren unawares brought in, who came privily to spy out his liberty which he had in Christ Jesus, that they might bring him into bondage. To whom he gave place by subjection, no not for an hour, that the truth of the Gospel might continue with the Church. Doubtless this brave and bold resolution, did the Apostle take by the peculiar command, and inspiration, of the Holy Ghost; and yet if our Dissenters had lived in those times, they would have branded him as an intemperate, hot, furious zealot; that wanted to be sweetened by the gentle spirit of charity, and moderation, forsooth.'

"Here we have again the persons of whom the preacher speaks: they are our dissenters; not the Deists, Atheists, Socinians, hypocrites of our times. And accordingly, what follows, plainly refers to them: for thus he goes on, 'schism and faction are things of impudent and encroaching natures: take permissions for power; and advance a Toleration, (for so the Doctor is still at liberty to call, what we must stile Indulgence) immediately into an establishment.' Your lordships will please to observe, by the way, that this was the very thing he had before said of these same persons, p. 19; and thereby plainly shews, that he speaks in both places of those Dissenters who have a right to the Toleration, or Indulgence, granted by law to Protestant Dissenters.

Let us now hear what he would have done with them. Why he would have them 'treated like growing mischiefs; or infectious plagues; kept at a distance, lest their deadly contagion spread.' And the method he proposes in order thereunto, is this, 'Let us 'herefore,' says he, 'have no fellowship with these works of darkness; but rather reprove them.' These works, schism and faction; for of these, and these only, he here speaks. This is the people's part; and the inferior pastors: as for the superior pastors, let them do their duty, in thundering out their ecclesiastical anathemas against them. Against whom, my lords? What works of darkness? Still the same he before mentioned: our dissenters, those are the persons: their schism and faction; those are the works of darkness to which he refers. 'And let any power on earth dare reverse a sentence ratified in heaven.'

"This, my lords, was the last part of the Commons' Impeachment upon this second Article: and it is so plainly expressed by the preacher in this passage, that I confess it amazes me to consider with what positiveness he has thought fit to deny that any such thing was meant by him. The persons whom the superior pastors are summoned to anathematize, are the same with those, whom the other pastors and people, are to have no fellowship withal, but to reprove. These, by the necessary connexion of his discourse, are our dissenters; those works of darkness, he states to be schism, and faction: those dissenters to whom the government hath granted a Toleration; as himself, in the same passage, takes notice. Which being so; I shall leave the Doctor to deny, and protest, as he pleases; but when all is done, his own words will rise up against him, and appear to every impartial person so plain, and positive, as to put it beyond the power of any artificial interpretation to perplex the meaning of them.

"And this lets us into the true application of those passages of Scripture, with which he concludes his whole discourse. In which having shewn the danger of our Church from these false-brethren, and exhorted his auditory to a steady courage and resolution in the defence of it; he thus at once both enforces his doctrine, and abuses his adversaries. That though the church (for to that he applies, what Zechariah spake of the False Prophets that seduced the people) lies bleeding of the wounds which she has received in the house of her friends: a passage first thrown at myself, for defending the prince's authority, when some of these very men engaged as vehemently on the side of liberty, against the rights of the crown, as they now pretend to stand up vigorously for it; though the ways of Zion may mourn for a time (so the Doctor glosses upon the text) and her gates be desolate; her priests sigh; and she in bitterness, because (it is the preacher's reason, the text has no such word) her adversaries are chief; he means, in the administration under her majesty; and her enemies at present prosper; (so he again improves the text; in hopes, I suppose, that it will not be long before he shall have preached them out of their places): though among all her lovers she has few, (the prophet complained, that Jerusalem had none) to comfort her; and many (Jeremiah said all) have dealt treacherously with her, and are become her enemies; (he refers to those of whom he had before spoken p. 22.) Though there are few to guide her among all the sons which she hath brought forth; neither are there many to take her by the hand of all the sons that she hath brought up; (Isaiah in both places, says none); though her enemies cry down with her, down with her, even to the ground: that is, in other words, though (the preacher, and a few of his friends, excepted) both the fathers and pastors of the church; and the men who are at present in power, and authority, in the state, are become false-brethren, and run in with those enemies of the church, our dissenters, against it; 'yet there is a God that can, and will raise her up, if we forsake her not.'—It were an easy matter to make many proper remarks upon these passages of Scripture, thus applied, or rather abused, by the preacher: but that would be besides my present business; and will fall in more properly under the last Article of this Impeachment. It is enough that I have, I hope, fully shewn your lordships how Dr. S. has treated, if not the indulgence itself, yet I am sure, those who are entitled to the benefit of it: and who if they shall have the misfortune, by this kind of reaching, to be once generally thought such wicked, false, and dangerous enemies to our Church and State as they are here represented, cannot think that their indulgence will hold long. If they have numbers to secure them, it is well for them: but otherwise I am sure, as the case is here stated, it must be our wisdom, as well as duty, to suppress them.—How criminal such an invective as this will be accounted in the eye of the law, I dare not presume to suggest: much less shall I pretend to intimate what censure it may deserve. Something I think should be done to put a stop to such preaching, as if not timely corrected may kindle such heats and animosities among us, as may truly endanger both our Church and State."

The Bishop of Norwich (Dr. Charles Trimmell)* made this Speech:

"My Lords; I am very sensible under what disadvantage in the opinion of many, a bishop must speak against a clergyman that stands accused of crimes committed by him in the seeming execution of his office; especially after having been so publicly required to be an advocate as well as a judge. And I am the more sensible of this prejudice lying against me, for having been so lately called into that order, and for being so unworthy of it. But I think myself obliged notwithstanding, under all these disadvantages, to deliver not only my judgment, but also the reasons that determine me to it: which I shall do as plainly as I can; with that deference to your lordships, which I am sure it must upon all occasions particularly become me to pay; and at the same time with that freedom which I think the importance of this cause does at this time require. Dr. Sacheverell stands impeached by the Commons of Great-Britain, of high crimes and misdemeanors expressed in the several Articles of the Charge exhibited against him: and your lordships have heard what they have said in support of that charge, as well as what has been offered in the Doctor's defence. Your lordships have also debated among yourselves the merits of the cause, as to the first of these Articles; and have come to a Resolution, that the Commons have made good that part of their Charge: in which Resolution as I did heartily concur; so I was ready to have humbly represented to your lordships my reasons for so doing, had there been either room or occasion for it.

"Your lordships are now upon the second Article; wherein the Doctor is charged for suggesting and maintaining that the Toleration granted by law, is unreasonable, and the allowance of it unwarrantable; with other particulars that have immediate relation to this general charge, and which are indeed so many proofs of it. In this view therefore, my lords, I beg leave to consider them; and the first of these instances, in support of this charge, is, that he asserts that he is a false brother with relation to God, Religion, or the Church, who defends Toleration and Liberty of Conscience; and this, my lords, the Doctor does assert in so many words. It is one of the many marks he gives whereby we may discern who is a false brother in those respects; not a small part of one general mark, as was alledged very inconclusively, I think, in his defence. For if it was to be granted, (though it cannot be fairly pretended) that the Doctor makes the defending of Toleration and Liberty of Conscience, one branch only of the character of a false brother; I do not see how it could make even a part of that character, if there was no false brotherhood in it. And I shall not trouble myself or your lordships with going about to settle the degrees of false brotherhood that are in this part of the character, because I think every degree of it is unreasonable and not warranted.—And therefore the Doctor cannot make it so much as a part of the character of a false brother to defend Toleration and Liberty of Conscience, as it is confessed that he does, but he must at the same time suggest and maintain that the Toleration is unreasonable, and the allowance of it unwarrantable. For it can never be any degree of false brotherhood, to defend what is reasonable and warrantable: nor would even the Doctor, as inconsistent a man as several of the noble lords that have spoken for him represent him to be, ever have made it one; if he had not himself condemned that which he blames others for defending.

“The second instance alledged is, that he calls archbishop Grindall a false son of the Church, and a perfidious prelate, for deluding queen Elizabeth into the toleration of the Geneva discipline. I shall not, my lords, go about to add any thing to the full and just vindication you have heard of that excellent prelate. But can any of your lordships believe, that a Presbyter of the Church of England, professing more than ordinary zeal for episcopacy and the constitution of this Church; should bestow such language on one who was the first bishop and the ornament of it so long; only for disposing that glorious queen to a mild treatment of the Puritans of that time, which is the utmost that is pretended to be laid to his charge, if he had thought Toleration a reasonable thing, or what was fit to be established by law? This, my lords, I confess can never enter into my thoughts, as ready as I am to enlarge them for the admitting of any favourable construction that will not shut out common sense.

“The third instance is his making it the duty of the superior pastors to thunder out their ecclesiastical anathemas against persons entitled to the benefits of the Toleration. And to shew that he has done this, I need only refer your lordships to that part of his Sermon where the superior pastors are called upon to do so: (viz.) the fourth and last general head, where he draws the consequence of all that he had spoken before, in the following words. ‘Now what should be the result of this long discourse, but that if we bear any true concern for the interest, honour, and safety of our church and government, we ought stedfastly to adhere to those fundamental principles, upon which both are founded, and upon which their security under God alone depends; and consequently that it highly behoves us, cautiously to watch against, to mark, and avoid all those that thus treacherously desert them. And indeed it would be both for our advantage, as well as their credit, if such men would throw off the mask, entirely quit our church of which they are no true members, and not fraudulently eat her bread, and lay wait for her ruin, purloin her revenues, and ungratefully lift up their heels against her. For then we should be one fold under one shepherd; all those invidious distinctions, that now distract and confound us, lost; and we should be terrible like an army of banners to our enemies; who could never break in upon such an uniform and well compacted body. This indeed would be a true peace, and solid union, when we should all with one mind and one mouth glorify God, and not with a confused diversity of contradictory opinions, and inconsistent jargon of worship, which the God of peace, purity, and order, cannot but abhor. As it is a maxim in politics, that all governments are best supported by the same methods and councils upon which they are founded; so it will appear undeniably true in its application to our constitution, which can be maintained by no other principles, but those on which it is built, and like their basis, the gospel, if there is any violation, or breach made in any branch of it, it shakes and endangers the whole frame and body. These things, however little they may be represented by our adversaries, will be found of the most considerable consequence. Let us therefore, as we are unhappy sharers of St. Paul’s misfortune, to have our church in perils among false brethren, follow his example and conduct in a parallel case. He tells us in his epistle to the Galatians, c. 2, that he was obstructed and pestered in his preaching the gospel, by false brethren unawares brought in, who came privily to spy out his liberty, which he had in Christ Jesus, that they might bring him into bondage; to whom he gave place by subjection, no not for an hour, that the truth of the gospel might continue with the church. Doubtless this brave and bold resolution did the apostle take by the peculiar command, and inspiration of the Holy Ghost; and yet if our Dissenters had lived in those times, they would have branded him, as an intemperate, hot, furious zealot, that wanted to be sweetened by the gentle spirit of charity and moderation forsooth. Schism, and faction, are things of impudent and encroaching natures, they thrive upon concessions, take permission for power, and advance a Toleration immediately into an establishment. And are therefore to be treated like growing mischiefs, or infectious plagues, kept at a distance, lest their deadly contagion spreads. Let us therefore have no fellowship with those works of darkness, but rather reprove them. Let our superior pastors do their duty in thundering out their ecclesiastical anathemas, and let any power on earth dare reverse a sentence ratified in heaven.’

“Can any thing, my lords, be plainer than that the Dissenters, and they only, are here spoken of; and what does the doctor say in his own defence, to avoid it? his words in his printed speech are these; ‘Schismatics, my lords, are not the only persons against whom ecclesiastical censures may be denounced; the works of darkness which I referred to as fit to be reprov’d, in that part of my Sermon where I speak of these censures, are of the same kind with those mentioned by the apostle, whose words I produced; all lewd and immoral practices, &c.’ It is very true, my lords, schismatics are not the only persons against whom ecclesiastical censures may be denounced, but I must still say they are the only persons referred to, in the paragraph I have read to your lordships; and therefore I own I am a good deal concerned, to find the Doctor

naking so vain, so insincere a defence. For it is not works of darkness in general he is cautioning against, but expressly, by a word of his own inserting, not the apostle's, those works of darkness mentioned immediately before; schism and faction, which with him go always together.—These are the sins against which he calls upon his superior pastors to thunder out their ecclesiastical anathemas; nor can the charge be avoided by that distinction which was offered in his behalf, between a censure purely spiritual, and an ecclesiastical censure. For admitting there is ground for that distinction in a scholastical consideration of the general question of christian censures; yet there is no room to make use of it in this case, because he calls expressly for ecclesiastical anathemas, which can be applied to none but such as are part of the order and discipline of this church.—And it is certain, my lords, that these censures cannot, since the act of Toleration, be inflicted upon Dissenters, how much soever their schism remains; because it is expressly provided by an act of parliament, (an act, my lords, of the whole Christian society, to which the superior pastors were personally concurring,) that they shall not be treated as schismatics in the way of those ecclesiastical censures, to which their separation would otherwise have certainly subjected them. And though I cannot undertake upon memory to be very particular, yet I dare venture to say, there have anciently been relaxations of the discipline of the church, even when the crime was thought to deserve the continuance of it; for public expedience, and better preserving the peace of the Christian world; and that in such cases any presbyter or bishop would himself have been censured, if he had not acquiesced in such relaxations.

“My lords, a presbyter of the church of England, is the more obliged to acquiesce in all such relaxations amongst us as are legally made, because he has solemnly promised at his ordination, that he will give his faithful diligence always so to minister the doctrine and sacraments, and discipline of Christ, as the Lord hath commanded, and as this church and realm hath received the same.—I have already observed to your lordships, how the discipline of the church stands at present as to the point in question. And as the relaxation of it in that particular, was agreeable to that temper which the bishops who petitioned king James gave the dissenters ground to expect: So I am verily persuaded that the church is so far from having been hurt by this indulgence, that it has received advantage as well as credit, from that moderation which gave way to it. ‘I could give several instances of this within my own observation, while I was arch-deacon, under a reverend prelate, that now sits before me; and since I have had the honour to be on this bench: In which compass of time several men of sobriety and learning bred up to be ministers amongst the dissenters, have left the Separation, and upon due trial have been admitted to orders in our church: in which they have officiated with entire conformity to our rules, and to the honour of our holy religion.—These instances have been so frequent and remarkable, since the dissenters have been exempted from the penalties of certain laws, above what had been observed before; that I think it very ill becomes any clergyman to preach against that exemption, as the Doctor (notwithstanding his reserve for consciences truly scrupulous) has done; and to call upon his superiors to act in contradiction to it. He should have forbore doing this, at least out of regard to her majesty, who had been graciously pleased to declare from the throne, that she would preserve the Toleration inviolable: A resolution I shall ever think it my duty upon all proper occasions to express my approbation of, as just and wise and charitable, and every way agreeable to the spirit and genius of the Christian religion.

“I shall not, my lords, enter into the enquiry of what sentences are ratified in heaven: But as one may venture to say, that all that have been pronounced on earth, are not ratified there, so by all that I have seen of the Doctor's spirit in these matters, I have great reason to fear, that if the power of the keys was in his hands, it would often be very sadly abused.—However he has so good an opinion of his own spirit, as to put his superiors in mind of another part of their duty, immediately after that I have mentioned; and that is, to promote men of probity, conscience and courage, without which he thinks they cannot be fit members of the church militant; in which I can as little agree with him as in the former demand. For if I may judge of the probity, conscience, and courage he thinks so deserving, by what appears in his Sermon, compared with his speech to your lordships; I cannot think them qualifications for a minister of the church of Christ in any respect; and I hope I shall be so happy as to find all the reverend prelates with whom I have the honour to sit, agreeing with me in this. But though I hope such a conduct will never recommend any person to favour; yet I do not desire that even that which I heartily blame, should be punished so much as I think it deserves. And though he who pleads so warmly for wholesome severities towards those who differ from him, has the least title to your lordships' compassion; yet I hope he will find it as far as the just concern you have for the public tranquillity will allow you to shew it.—This I say from that which I bless God is the natural temper of my mind, and not from the care that has been taken by some to intimidate as far as they could, those who were to have the cognizance of the Doctor's cause, and were not thought to be favourable to it.

“I shall not take upon me to charge the Doctor or any of his particular friends with this practice, as great a temptation as one is under to do so from several circumstances. And it is not the least, that occurs in his prayers, which he has published upon this occasion, to represent not so much to God as to the world, that he is under persecution, when he is prosecuted for offending against the law, by those who in common justice ought to be thought the fairest accusers; and before your lordships, who are justly acknowledged to be the most impartial judges. However, I will never believe, till I cannot avoid it; that any members of the Church of England who have acknowledged the government, much less any clergyman who has so often professed his obedience to it in church and state, should have been any way accessory to those threatenings that have been given out, particularly against such bishops as should happen to condemn the Doctor's proceedings.

"As far, my lords, as I have seen of this cause, I am likely to be one of those bishops; and though I do not pretend to any great share of courage, I am very free to declare to your lordships that I am in no comparison so apprehensive of what may befall myself for condemning this person, as I am of what will probably befall the public if your lordships should not condemn him. But that is in your lordships' judgment, to which I humbly submit it: And only beg pardon for having detained your lordships so long in giving my reasons why I think the Commons have made good this second part of their charge."

It was then voted, "That the Commons had made good the Second Article of Impeachment."

In relation to the Third Article, the lord Halifax made a short speech, and was answered by the lord Ferrers and the earl of Nottingham. The Fourth Article occasioned a longer debate, which was begun by the earl of Wharton, in the commendation of the present administration.

The Bishop of Salisbury seconded him, and spoke with vehemence against Dr. Sacheverell, "who, by inveighing against the Revolution, Toleration, and Union, seemed to arraign and attack the queen herself, since her majesty had so great a share in the first, and had often declared, that she would maintain the second; and that she looked upon the third as the most glorious event of her reign. That nothing could be more plain than his reflecting on her majesty's ministers; and that he had in particular so well marked out a noble peer there present, by an ugly and scurrilous epithet [Volpone] (which he would not repeat) that it was not possible to mistake him."

Upon this some of the younger peers fell a laughing, and cried out, "Name him! Name him!" But

The Lord Chancellor interposed, declaring, "That no peer was obliged to say but what he thought fit."

The Lord Ferrers said something in favour of Dr. Sacheverell, but was answered by the earl of Hlay; and then

The Lord Haverham made a short speech about that part of the Fourth Article, wherein Dr. Sacheverell was charged with wresting and pervverting divers passages of scripture. He said, "No man on earth has authority to interpret the Scripture, which, he thought, must be interpreted by itself: since the Reformation, we had contended against the Church of Rome, who pretended to that authority: and shall we (added he) allow infallibility in the Commons, which we deny to the pope of Rome?" And in conclusion he repeated his desire, that the reverend prelates there present would tell the House, "How Dr. Sacheverell could be charged with wresting the scripture?" But none of the Bishops offered to satisfy him. The duke of Hamilton, having said something in favour of the Doctor, he was answered by the lord Mohun. The duke of Buckingham, the lord Ferrers, the earls of Scarisdale and Abingdon, and the lord Caermarthen, endeavoured likewise to extenuate the Doctor's offences, but it was voted, "That the Commons had made good the Fourth Article of the Impeachment." However, 33 lords entered their dissent to the question upon the second, third, and fourth Articles.—At the close of the debate,

The Earl of Wharton said, "That since the House had resolved, that the Commons had made good their four Articles of Impeachment against Dr. Sacheverell, the Lords ought, by a necessary consequence, to resolve and declare likewise, That the Doctor was guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanors charged upon him." But the earls of Abingdon and Rochester, the lord treasurer, the lord North and Grey, and the lord Ferrers, starting some difficulties, it was proposed, that the question to be asked every lord in Westminster-hall should be as follows: "That the Commons having made good the several Articles of the Impeachment against Henry Sacheverell, doctor in divinity; the said Dr. Henry Sacheverell is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors."

Accordingly, on the 18th of March, the question being read, the earl of Rochester moved, that the Judges should be consulted; but no peer seconding that motion,

The Lord Guernsey said, "The question, as stated, was not fit to be put in Westminster-hall, because it would subvert the constitution of parliament, and preclude the peers from their right of giving their judgment, both of the fact, as well as of the law. For in this case some peers might be satisfied as to the fact, but not as to the law, and if they were to give their judgment as the question was stated, their freedom of voting would be taken away. Therefore he moved, 'That the first part of the proposed question be left out.'"

The Lord North and Grey, who spoke next, said, "There is no necessity of putting the question in Westminster-hall, but only acquainting the Commons there, that Dr. Sacheverell is guilty in general: for how can any peer, that thinks him not guilty (as for my part, I do not) say in the face of the Commons, he is not guilty, and allow at the same time, that the Commons have made good their Articles of Impeachment."

The Earl of Wharton said, "He wondered at the lord Guernsey's making that motion, after the House had come to a resolution, that the Commons had made good their Articles. The question, as stated by the lord chancellor, did not preclude any peer from his right of giving his judgment; for every lord was at liberty to protest and enter his dissent, if he would not be convinced by the majority of the House; and that the Lords, being in the nature of a jury, ought to deliver their opinions seriatim."

The Lord Ferrers supported the lord Guernsey's motion, objecting against the preamble of the question as unnecessary, and urging, that it was only the majority of the House, and not the House, that came to a resolution, "That the Commons had made good their Impeachments."

On the other hand,

The Lord Guernsey, in answer to the earl of Wharton, said, "That the Lords were not as a jury, for every lord was both a judge and a juror; that some peers might think Dr. Sacheverell guilty of one part, and innocent of the other; and yet if they were to give their judgment, as this question was stated, how could they say he was not guilty, when the preamble set forth, that the Commons had made good their Impeachment?"

The Earl of Wharton replied, "That this objection had been much more proper before the House had proceeded so far." However the earl of Rochester having moved, that the preamble be left out, the earl of Wharton and the rest agreed to it; and the lord chancellor stated the question thus: "That the question to be put to each lord in Westminster-Hall, beginning at the junior baron first, shall be, Is Dr. Henry Sacheverell guilty of High Crimes and Misdemeanors?" The earl of Nottingham moved, that the words "of high crimes and misdemeanors" be left out, and was seconded by the lord North and Grey. But the earl of Wharton said, "That what was offered was unfair; for the Commons having impeached Dr. Sacheverell of high crimes and misdemeanors, and the Lords having agreed and resolved, that the Commons had made good the Impeachment, it necessarily followed, that he was guilty of the said crimes and misdemeanors."

To moderate the matter, the Duke of Buckingham proposed, that the question be thus altered, "of the crimes and misdemeanors charged upon him by the Impeachment;" to which the earls of Wharton and Sunderland readily agreed; but the earl of Jersey excepted against the question, as being complex or complicated.

The Lord Guernsey pursued the same objection, for the reason he alledged before, viz. "That some peers might think Dr. Sacheverell guilty of some of the crimes charged upon him by the Impeachment of the Commons, and innocent of the other; and urged an instance of an indictment concerning several charges, in which case the jury is not to answer generally, but particularly to each offence, because the judge goes by the verdict, and imposes the fine accordingly." Therefore his lordship moved, "That each peer should give his judgment severally to each article." To this

The Lord Somers answered, "That the matter of fact was already settled, though every peer might protest and dissent: that the lord Guernsey's objection, grounded on the instance he brought in of indictments in the courts below, was very improper, because, as his lordship himself had suggested, the Lords are both judges and jury. That, as jury, they might, in conscience, pronounce the Doctor guilty, though they thought him guilty only of one article: but that the lords, who did not think him guilty of all the four articles, might, afterwards, as judges, moderate the punishment."

The Earl of Nottingham replied, "That, for his part, he thought Dr. Sacheverell guilty of no crime;" and moved; that the particle be left out, and the question put thus; "Is Dr. Henry Sacheverell guilty of High Crimes and Misdemeanors charged upon him by the Impeachment?" which was agreed to.

Then it being proposed to consider what answer each lord should give, the lord Halifax said, That, according to the usage of parliament, the Lords ought to answer Content, or Not Content. But the lord Ferrers alledged, "That Content, or Not Content, was not an adequate answer to the question:" and both the earl of Nottingham, and the lord Guernsey, his brother, urged, "That there were several precedents for Guilty, or Not Guilty, upon my honour; but did not remember any for Content, or Not Content."

The Lord Halifax maintained his assertion, and said, "He wondered, the lord Nottingham did not know there were precedents for Content or Not Content; and instanced in the lord Somers's trial, in which the Lords gave their judgment that way"

On the other hand, the lord Guernsey insisted upon answering Guilty or Not Guilty; and was seconded by the Lord Treasurer, who said, "That there was a difference between the lords voting in their House promiscuously, sometimes in confusion, and their giving their judgments in Westminster-hall; and that the precedent mentioned by the lord Halifax was an extraordinary one, made in an extraordinary case."

The lord Halifax moved for searching the Journals; and the earl of Wharton for following precedents. The clerk turned to, and read the precedent of the lord Somers's Impeachment, in which the peers gave their judgment by Content or Not Content. But the earl of Rochester desiring, that other precedents might be searched, and urging, that there was a difference between the lords voting in their House and in Westminster-hall;

The Duke of Buckingham answered, "That the Trial was the same in Westminster-hall, as if the Lords were in their House; that they removed to the hall only for the spaciousness of the place: and therefore the question ought to be answered, as if they were in the House, Content, or Not Content.' To this the earl of Ilay replied, 'That Content, or Not Content, was a very improper and ungrammatical answer to the question, Is Dr. Sacheverell guilty of high crimes, &c. And therefore either the question ought to be altered, or the answer be Guilty, or Not Guilty.' Then

The Lord Ferrers endeavoured to shew the inconveniences, that might attend the putting the question, as proposed, alledging, "That some of the peers there present, might hereafter be impeached, and repent too late the having made such a precedent of giving judgment generally."

The Earl of Anglesey pursued the same argument; adding, that if the question was put, and answered generally, the majority of the people would not know what the Doctor was condemned for. To which

The Lord Chancellor readily replied, "That every body would know he was either guilty, or not guilty of the crimes charged on him by the impeachment of the House of Commons." But

The Earl of Mar insisted, "That every peer ought to be at liberty to vote, guilty, or not guilty to every article; otherwise it might happen, that the majority of the House might think Dr. Sacheverell innocent upon each Article; yet, by this method of a general answer, he might be condemned of all; which seemed inconsistent with the usual method of justice in that House."

The Duke of Buckingham urged on the same side, "That, since the judgment of the House in this case ought to be a declaration of the law, the condition of the people would be most miserable, to have punishment for high-crimes and misdemeanors, and not have a probability of informing themselves, what the crimes thereby punished were, which they could not learn from this general determination: and that, this uncertainty being in the case of a clergyman for preaching, it might create some fears in good men, when they preach some doctrines of the church of England, particularly that of non-resistance."

The Earl of Sunderland calling for the question, the earl of Anglesey insisted on the inconveniences of answering generally to it. Whereupon,

The Lord Chancellor mentioned four inconveniences that might ensue: "First, That clergymen would know, that to preach against the Revolution, was a high crime and misdemeanor: 2dly, to preach against the Toleration: 3dly, against the Union: and 4thly, that to reflect on the queen's ministers, and suggest, that the church is in danger under her majesty's administration, were likewise high crimes and misdemeanors. These, said his lordship, are the only inconveniences, that I can foresee, will attend this judgment." The earl of Wharton calling then for the question,

The Duke of Shrewsbury said, "That he did not think the Doctor guilty of the first article; though he had as great a share as any man in the late Revolution, and would ever go as far as any to vindicate the memory of our late glorious deliverer. That he thought the church safe under her majesty's administration; but he would not have it made a high crime and misdemeanor to say, that the church is in danger, because times might come, when it might really be in danger." And, in conclusion, his grace insisted on his voting Article by Article. The lord Caermarthen, the earl of Anglesey, and the earl of Nottingham did the like: but, the same being opposed by some other peers, the Lord Chancellor at last proposed this question, "Whether the Answer to be given by each lord should be Guilty or Not Guilty only?" Which being resolved in the affirmative, then the main question was put, whether it should be asked, "Is Henry Sacheverell, D.D. guilty of high crimes and misdemeanor, charged upon him by the Impeachment of the House of Commons?"

This was likewise carried in the affirmative; when 34 Lords entered their protest, importing in substance, "That the obliging every lord to answer generally guilty or not guilty, to a question containing all the Articles of his impeachment, was a kind of tacking upon themselves by an unnecessary joining of matters of a different nature, and subjecting them to one and the same determination; and consequently might prejudice the right every peer had to give a free affirmative or negative; since whoever thought Dr. Sacheverell guilty of one part, and innocent of the other, would be obliged either to approve what he condemned, or condemn what he approved. 2. They conceived there was at least a possibility, that though a majority of the House was admitted to vote to the Articles separately, and might think him innocent upon each Article; yet, by this method of a general answer, he might be condemned of all; which seemed not to be consistent with the usual method of justice in this House. 3. That since the judgment of the House, in this case, ought to be a declaration of the law; the condition of the people would be most miserable, to have punishment inflicted for high crimes and misdemeanors, and not have a possibility of informing themselves, what the high crimes and misdemeanors, thereby punished, are. For the people's only guide is the law: and they can never be guided by what they can never be informed of. And that this uncertainty being in the case of a clergyman for preaching, it might create some fear in good men, when they preach some doctrines of the church of England, particularly that of non-resistance; and might be made use of by ill ones, as an excuse for the neglect of that duty, which upon some occasions is required."

five seats, and their lordships' House being resumed, the lord chancellor declared, that they had agreed upon a question to be put to each lord severally. And then his lordship having put the question, beginning at the junior baron first, 69 Lords declared Dr. Sacheverell Guilty, and 52 Not Guilty. The lord chancellor, having cast up the votes, declared Dr. Sacheverell Guilty; and the usher of the black-rod having brought the Doctor to the bar, and caused him to kneel down, the lord chancellor told him, That the Lords having, with their usual candour and equity, examined and considered the Articles exhibited against him, with the allegations to make good the same, and what had been offered by his counsel and himself in his defence, had found him Guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors charged upon him by the Commons of Great Britain. Then the Doctor, standing up, made a short speech importing, "That not having been suffered to be at their lordships' bar while their lordships were giving their votes; he hoped he might now be permitted to put in a plea, before their lordships passed sentence upon him. That he was advised by his counsel to offer, first, that, by the opinion of all the judges, the particular words, supposed to be criminal, ought to have been expressly specified in the Articles of Impeachment against him. Secondly, that, in the title of the said Articles, the same were said to be 'exhibited in the name of all the Commons of Great Britain,' and yet the commissioners of shires, who make part of the Commons of Great Britain, were not mentioned with the knights, citizens, and burghesses in parliament assembled. Both which he begged their lordships to take into consideration." The Lords, being returned to their House, considered of the Doctor's plea; and resolved, that the same was frivolous, and that they would the next day consider what censure to pass upon him.

Sentence passed upon him.] The next debate was, what Censure ought to pass upon him: And here a strange turn appeared; some seemed to apprehend the effects of a popular fury, if the Censure was severe; to others it was said, that the queen desired it might be mild; so it was proposed to suspend him from preaching for one year: others were for six years; but by a vote it was fixed to 3 years. It was next moved, that he should be incapable of all preferment for those 3 years; upon that, the House was divided, 59 were for the Vote, and 60 were against it; so that being laid aside, the Sermon was ordered to be burnt, in the presence of the Lord Mayor and sheriffs of London; and this was done, only the Lord Mayor, being a member of the House of Commons, did not think he was bound to be present. The Lords also voted, that the Decrees of the university of Oxford, passed in 1683, in which the absolute authority of princes, and the unalterableness of the hereditary right of succeeding to the crown, were asserted in a very high strain, should be burnt with Sacheverell's Sermon.

Sacheverell's Collections and other Books burnt.] The Commons also, upon a Complaint made to them of a book intitled, "Collections of Passages referred to by Dr. Sacheverell, in his Answer to the Articles of his Impeachment," ordered the same to be burnt. On the other hand, the Doctor's friends complained to the House, of a Book intitled, "The Rights of the Christian Church, &c." and a defence of it, in two parts, with a Letter from a Country-Attorney to a Country Parson, concerning the Rights of the Church; and Le Clerc's judgment of that book in his Bibliothèque Choisie. All which were condemned to the flames; as was also a Treatise of the word Person, by John Clendon of the Inner-Temple. Not content with this, the Tories moved for an Address for a Fast, to deprecate the divine vengeance, which there was just reason to fear, on account of the horrid blasphemies lately published in the kingdom. Those who supported this motion, thought not only to cast a reflection on the Whigs, as encouragers of such writings, but also to justify what the Doctor had advanced in his Sermon about the danger of the Church, which he had ascribed to the heretical and blasphemous positions lately printed. But their design was easily seen through, and therefore the majority added to the Address, "many of which blasphemies have again, in a most irregular, extraordinary, and insolent manner, been printed, published, and dispersed, throughout the kingdom, to the scandal of good christians, by Dr. Henry Sacheverell." Upon this addition the Tories would have dropped the Address, but it was presented to the queen, who, probably on that account, answered, "That a Fast having lately been observed, she did not think proper to appoint another so soon, but would consider of it at a more convenient time."—As soon as it was known what a mild sentence the Lords had passed upon Dr. Sacheverell, those, who supported him during his Trial, expressed an inconceivable gladness, as if they had got a victory; bon-fires, illuminations, and other marks of joy, appeared not only in London, but over the whole kingdom. However, much greater effects than these rejoicings were produced by it, as will hereafter be seen.*

During the Trial of Sacheverell the following Proceedings took place in the House of Commons.

Resolutions against absent Members.] January 25. The Commons taking into consideration that many of their Members, at that critical juncture, did not attend the service of the House, came to this Resolution:

Resolved, "That such Members of this House, who do absent themselves, without the leave of this House, are to be reputed deserters of their trust, and neglectors of that duty, they owe to this House, and their country."

Resolutions with regard to Public Mourning.] Feb. 2. The matter of a Petition from the cities of London and Westminster, relating to Public Mournings, which had been referred to a Committee, was reported to the House, together with the opinion of the said Committee thereon, which was contained in the following Resolutions:

"1. That it is the opinion of this Committee, that, by reason of the frequent Public Mournings, many thousands of families, employed in the silk and woollen manufactures of this kingdom, have lost their trades and employments, and are become an insupportable burthen to the parishes wherein they inhabit: and if a speedy remedy be not applied, it will endanger the loss of the silk manufacture so beneficial to this kingdom; and at last center in a foreign trade. 2. That the House be moved for leave to bring in a Bill for ascertaining and limiting the time of Public Mournings:" whereupon it was ordered, That leave be given to bring in a bill for ascertaining or limiting the time of Public Mournings. The Bill, however, was thrown out on the 11th.

A Place-Bill passed by the Commons: but rejected by the Lords.] Feb. 4. The Bill for securing the Freedom of Parliaments, by limiting the number of Officers in the House of Commons, was read, passed, and sent up to the Lords, where it was unanimously rejected.

A Speech occasioned by the said Bill.] It was upon this occasion, that the following Speech was delivered in the House of Commons:

"Mr. Speaker;
 "What I rise up for is to propose a bill, which may remedy the inconvenience, that the worthy gentleman complains of; a bill, on which the safety of the nation seems to depend, as much as on the success of the war in which we are engaged. The carrying on the war would be throwing away so much treasure, and so many lives, unless at the same time, that we secure our liberties against a foreign enemy, we cannot prevent the danger of their being undermined at home.—If every gentleman's office and employment were added to his name as it is called over, every call of the House would put us on considering, whether some new law is not wanting to lessen the number of such members as possess them? And I am afraid it would now appear to you, that they are more numerous than ever, notwithstanding the several bills, that have passed both Houses, and several others that have passed only this House; by which the sense of the Commons hath been so often declared; though perhaps, not so well as it might have been, had we observed the same order, when many members are personally concerned, that we do, when one member is, by

obliging them to withdraw. The opposers of these bills have often been so few in number, that they might be only such as were in employment; and if they had withdrawn, the bills might have passed without a single negative.— Though the civil officers should not be increased, the continuance of the war must make the military officers more numerous and more powerful. Those, who have no other fortune, depending on the war, than the command of a regiment, have nothing else to do but to make a proper disposition in the cloathing of it; by which means such an interest may be made in most of the corporations, as no gentleman in the country is able to resist. Promotions may be made every day in the old regiments, and new ones raised, and a very great share of these preferments falls to this House. The number of such members therefore is so far from being restrained, that it seems likely to increase, as long as the war lasts. The heavier the debt is upon the nation, the more of those who receive the public money will sit here, and impose the taxes, out of which they are paid.—One of the wisest and most flourishing states does not allow any town to chuse a military officer for its representative; and though there is no prerogative in that country, from which they can fear an encroachment on their liberties; yet officers are thought to be improper checks on themselves, or on those who recommend them to their employments.—The corruption of the boroughs is grown to such an height, it is so easy to procure a return, and such a latitude is left by the variety of our own determinations, that whenever any set of ministers think fit to exert themselves, they may bring in so many military officers, as, together with those who have civil employments, may make up a majority.—I hope we shall be consistent with ourselves in what we did the other day, when we came to those Resolutions for preventing the danger of arbitrary power. When a majority can be commanded here, despotic power may be established by law, and resistance be made illegal. To render it, at the same time, lawful for the subject to resist, and easy for a prince to become absolute, is bringing the nation into perpetual danger of war between the king and the people. If so many members should be gained here, as to vote a sufficient army, resistance might be impossible, though it were lawful. But admitting the people would be always able to regain their freedom, it cannot surely be thought more advisable to use the remedy of arms, than to keep our liberties safe in a quiet way. If we take care that there always be a sufficient number here to oppose the ill designs of ministers, there will be never any need of resistance by arms.—It cannot be denied, that, in ill times, places, whether civil or military, will have an influence over ill men. For a member of this House to receive a private pension hath always been esteemed a breach of trust, and a violation of our constitution; and a known pension, during pleasure, excludes a man from sitting here. That a place of little trouble, is as valuable as a pension, of the same yearly income, we see by the great crowd of candidates, on every vacancy, and the high prices that we hear are paid for them.— In a common trial, all persons concerned in interest, are not only excluded from being jurymen, but even their testimony as to matter of fact is not thought fit to be credited; and will an ill man, in ill times, gain nothing by his voting? When a place makes up a considerable part of a man's fortune, is it not plain, that, if the liberty of the subject comes in competition with the prerogative, it will be his own interest to oppose the interest of those, whom he represents? May it not easily happen, that the private advantage of almost every man in office, will be contrary to that of the public? and should a prince become absolute, would they not share amongst them the spoils of their fellow subjects? Is it not their interest more than his, that he should have no controul? But allowing that it would not be for the advantage of some, who have great fortunes of their own, to go into violent measures; yet there may be several cases, in which they may apprehend no great danger in paying a compliment. I hope every gentleman here is satisfied, that, in time of peace, we shall want no greater number of men for guards and garrisons than before the war; but since that establishment hath been increased, a vote must pass, in order to reduce it; and must not many gentlemen, in that case, vote away their own preferment? I do not at all doubt, that several will do it; but if it should be thought proper to increase the number of guards and garrisons, as hath been done in this war, and perhaps without damage to the public (because the greatest part of them have been employed abroad, though indeed the precedent seems dangerous) would any arguments be able to convince such men, as would have their subsistence from the army, that the addition of a few more troops than the last settlement would give us up into the hands of the prince? or that, without such an addition, his civil list might enable him to compass our destruction? If a proposition for granting a civil list were under debate, and the question should be, whether it should be settled for life, or even increased, would such points be properly decided by those, whose salaries were to be paid out of it? Could we depend upon it that men would deduct that part out of their calculation, which would be set aside for their own wages? When men in places are not above being governed by interest, they will certainly be directed by those who prefer them; so that it will be no security to us, that the crown can neither increase nor diminish the number of members; for, as long as it hath the power of raising regiments, and bestowing places and pensions, it may, at any time, take off from those who ought to represent the people, and add to those, who may be induced to represent the court.—But, if we could suppose, that places would never influence men; and their sitting here would raise them to more generous thoughts than we commonly see in others, I say, if we could be satisfied of this, yet we ought to take all possible care to keep ourselves from any imputation of that kind, and consider that the honour, dignity, and power of this House can only be supported by the opinion which those without doors have of its integrity; for it is not enough to be uncorrupt, unless we have the reputation of being so too. It is to the unblemished conduct and character of those, who have sat here before us, that we owe all the advantages we now enjoy by our constitution. When the good name of parliaments hath declined, their authority hath always been diminished in proportion; and what can be the weight of 500 gentlemen, who are to stand by themselves, as they always will, unless they can convince others, that they are carrying on their interest, as well as their own?—The high opinion, which we all have of the present sovereign, can be no objection to the using our endeavours for obtaining a security against this danger. Were she not entirely in the interests of her people, it would be in vain to hope for any such laws. They are never so likely to be obtained, as when they have the least effect. They are only necessary in a bad reign; and when that comes it is too late to think of them.—But I must take the liberty to say, that, notwithstanding the great confidence, which we all so justly repose in the present sovereign, there never was more reason than now, to provide for our future safety. If we had nothing else to sink us, the debt of the nation is heavier than it ever hath been, and than the nation was ever thought able to bear. The people are extremely weakened by it, and in proportion as the Commons are weakened, the crown advances in its power over them; so, that, although the number of officers here had not been increased, the debt being such as the people were never burthened with before, it imports us more than ever to provide against the danger of any encroachments from the crown.—The landed men are not only lessened in general, but every particular gentleman, the more he feels the weight of taxes, the more he loses of his interest in the country, and the more of that interest is transferred to the persons, who receive their pay out of those taxes.—If we would effectually put the Protestant Succession upon such a foot that it cannot be shaken, we ought to convince men that they will be free, when they are under it. They will always be most zealous in defence of that establishment, under which their liberties are most secure.—There are few gentlemen here, who have not, at one time or other, even since the Revolution, been sensible how necessary it is for our safety to make some provision in this matter. If every man, who hath once been of that opinion, should be so now, a bill for it would pass more unanimously than any, that was ever offered to the House; and if there be some persons, who think our constitution secure for the time to come, as well as the present, it is to be hoped, that they will have so much regard for those, who are of a different opinion, as to remove their apprehensions, and give them some convincing proof, that our great successes abroad will effectually prevent any attempts upon our liberties at home.”

Feb. 13. A Petition of several creditors and proprietors of principal money, annuities, and shares in the Mine-Adventure of England, on behalf of themselves, and several widows and orphans, members and creditors of the company of the said Mine-Adventure, was presented to the House, and read, praying, “That leave may be given to bring in a Bill to transfer the Management and Government of the Mines into such persons as should be chosen by, and represent the creditors of 125,000*l.*, and by the annuities granted in lieu thereof, and by bonds and sealed bills, subject to such constitutions and regulations, with all necessary provision for the payment of the company’s just debts: and that the respective persons having acted in the management of the Mines (as in the Petition is complained of) may be excluded from the further management thereof, and may deliver over all deeds, writings, books, papers, effects and accounts relating to the said Mines, upon oath, to the persons that should hereafter be chosen to manage the same, and might make satisfaction for their management: and that the petitioners might have such other relief (being altogether remediless in the premises elsewhere) as to the House should seem meet.” The consideration of this Petition being referred to a committee, upon their report a Bill was ordered to be brought in, for the relief of the creditors and proprietors of the company of Mine-Adventurers of England, and that the management of the Mines be put in the hands of trustees; which was brought in accordingly, and read the first time on the 18th of March.

Sir Humphry Mackworth, who, by the Report of the committee, appeared to have embezzled a considerable part of the principal money and stock of the Mine-Adventure, having petitioned to be heard by the House, he was on the 23d of March, called in, as were also the counsel for the petitioners, and in part heard, relating to the matters of the said Report. Being withdrawn, a debate arose upon what they had offered, which was adjourned to the 25th, when both sir Humphry Mackworth, and the counsel for the petitioners, were heard again; and the further hearing of them put off to the 28th, then to the next day; then again to the 30th, and so to the 31st; when the Commons came to these unanimous Resolutions: 1. “That it appears to this House, that sir Humphry Mackworth, deputy governor of the company of Mine-Adventurers of England, is guilty of many notorious and scandalous frauds, and indirect practices, in violation of the charter, granted to the said company, in breach of his trust, and to the manifest wrong and oppression of the proprietors and creditors of the said company. 2. That William Shiers, secretary to the said company, is guilty of many notorious and scandalous frauds, and indirect practices, in confederacy with the said sir Humphry Mackworth, to the wrong and oppression of the said company. 3. That Thomas Dykes, treasurer to the said company, is guilty of many notorious and scandalous frauds, and indirect practices, in confederacy with the said sir Humphry Mackworth, to the wrong and oppression of the proprietors, and creditors of the said company.*

After which it was ordered, 1. "That the Report from the committee to whom the Petition of the creditors and proprietors of principal money, annuities, and shares, in the Mine-Adventure of England, was referred, and also the said Resolutions, be printed. 2. 'That a bill be brought' in to prevent the said sir Humphry Mackworth, William Shiers, and Thomas Dykes, their leaving this kingdom, and their alienating their estates until the end of the next session of parliament."—But before this Bill could be brought to perfection, the parliament was adjourned.

Address of both Houses desiring the Duke of Marlborough may be sent into Holland.] Feb. 18. The Commons having been informed by sir Gilbert Heathcot, a member of their House, of the advances made by France, towards the renewing a negotiation of peace, and that the States General were inclined to grant passes to French plenipotentiaries to come to Holland for that purpose, resolved to present an Address to her majesty, That she would be pleased to send the duke of Marlborough forthwith into Holland. This Address being agreed to, was sent to the Lords; and their lordships having readily joined in it, both Houses presented it to her majesty, being as follows :

"Most gracious Sovereign,
 "We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in parliament assembled, having reason to believe, that the negotiations of peace will suddenly be renewed in Holland, and being justly apprehensive of the crafty insinuating designs of our enemies to create divisions among your allies, or by amusing them with deceitful expectations of peace, to retard their preparations for war, do think ourselves bound in duty, most humbly to represent to your majesty, of how great importance we conceive it is to the interest of the common cause, that the duke of Marlborough should be abroad at this juncture.—We cannot but take this opportunity to express our sense of the great and unparalleled services of the duke of Marlborough, and with all imaginable duty to applaud your majesty's great wisdom, in having honoured the same person with the great characters of general and plenipotentiary, who, in our humble opinion, is most capable of discharging two such important trusts.

"We therefore make it our request to your majesty, that you would be pleased to order the duke of Marlborough's immediate departure for Holland, where his presence will be equally necessary, to assist at the negotiations of peace, and to hasten the preparations for an early campaign, which will most effectually disappoint the artifices of our enemies, and procure a safe and honourable Peace for your majesty and your Allies."

The Queen's Answer.] To this Address the Queen returned the following Answer :

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I am so sensible of the necessity of the duke of Marlborough's presence in Holland, at this critical juncture, that I have already given the necessary directions for his immediate departure; and I am very glad to find, by this Address, that you concur with me in a just sense of the duke of Marlborough's eminent services.*"

* "The queen's resolution of changing her ministry had begun to appear very early this year; for in the beginning of January, 1709-10, upon the death of the earl of Essex, she writ to the duke of Marlborough to give his regiment to Mr. Hill, a man who had been extremely ungrateful to the duchess of Marlborough, and whose sister, Mrs. Masham, the duke well knew, was at this time undermining the interest of himself, his family and friends. The scheme of the queen's new counsellors to make her ministers quit her service, or engage her to discard them, now shewed itself without disguise. They durst not tell her at once all they designed; but, proposing to her only one thing at a time, led her, by insensible degrees, to the accomplishment of the whole. They began, as has been related, with engaging her to nominate persons to bishoprics, without consulting her ministers. And now they prevailed with her to appoint military officers, without advising with her general. And nothing could be more to their purpose, than this choice of Mr. Hill for lord Essex's regiment, because they knew, that nothing could be more disagreeable to the duke of Marlborough, or would tend more to lessen his weight and authority in the army, and consequently at home too. The new counsellors saw, that if the duke readily yielded in this matter, it would sow discontent among the officers; and that a door would be opened for his enemies to come into the army, and insult him. And on the other hand, if the duke should not comply, or should shew any reluctance in complying, this would furnish an excellent pretence for grievous complaints, that the queen was but a cypher, and would do nothing. Upon the queen's letter, the duke waited on her, and with all humility represented to her, what a prejudice it would be to her service, to have so young an officer preferred before so many others of higher rank and longer service: besides, that the shewing so extraordinary and partial favour to Mrs. Masham's brother could be interpreted no otherwise, than as a declaring against all those, who had so much reason to be uneasy with her; and that, indeed, it would be setting up a banner for all the discontented persons in the army to repair to. In short, the duke said every thing he could think of, and with all the moving concern that the nature of the affair created in him, to engage her to change her resolution. But all seemed to no purpose. He could not draw one kind expression from her, nor obtain any answer, but 'that he would do well to advise with his friends.'

"The earl of Godolphin spoke often to her upon the same subject, representing to her the duke's long, great and faithful services, and the very bad influence which her intended favour to Mr. Hill must necessarily have in the army. But neither had this so much effect as to engage her to say one favourable word about the duke. Wherefore on the 15th of January he left the town, and went to Windsor in great discontent. It was council-day. The queen did not ask where he was, nor take the least notice of his absence. His withdrawing himself made a great deal of noise in the town. Many of the nobility spoke with earnestness to the queen of the very ill consequences of mortifying a man, who had done her so long and important services. She answered, that his services were still fresh in her memory, and that she had as much kindness for him as ever she had. The noise, however, still continued and increased, and there was great discourse, not without probability, that some notice would be taken of the matter in the House of Commons, and some votes passed disagreeable to the queen and her new counsellors. This design was laid to the duchess of Marlborough's charge; but she said enough to the queen to vindicate herself. And indeed it was owing to the duke's particular friends in the House, that no such notice was taken.

"The new counsellors being alarmed with apprehensions of what the parliament might do, and believing that they should be able at a proper season, to make better use of the queen's yielding up the point, than of her insisting upon it, gave her advice accordingly; so that on the 20th of January, she ordered the earl of Godolphin to write to the duke, 'that he might dispose of the regiment as he himself thought fit;' and to desire him to come to town. But before this reached the duke, he had written the following letter to the queen:

"Madam,

"By what I hear from London, I find your majesty is pleased to think, that when I have reflected I must be of opinion, that you are in the right in giving Mr. Hill the earl of Essex's regiment. I beg your majesty will be so just to me, as not to think I can be so unreasonable as to be mortified to the degree that I am, if it proceeded only from this one thing; for I shall always be ready and glad to do every thing that is agreeable to you, after I have represented what may be a prejudice to your service. But this is only one of a great many mortifications that I have met with.

consideration, ordered a Bill for settling that Trade to be brought in, which, after the hearing of the counsel, both for the Royal African

'And as I may not have many opportunities of writing to you, let me beg of your majesty to reflect what your own people and the rest of the world must think, who have been witnesses of the love, zeal and duty with which I have served you, when they shall see that after all I have done, it has not been able to protect me against the malice of a bed-chamber woman. Your majesty will allow me on this occasion to remind you of what I writ to you the last campaign, of the certain knowledge I had of Mrs. Masham's having assured Mr. Harley, that I should receive such constant mortifications, as should make it impossible for me to continue in your service. God Almighty and the whole world are my witnesses, with what care and pains I have served you for more than twenty years; and was resolved, if possible, to have struggled with the difficulties to the end of this war. But the many instances I have had of your majesty's great change to me has so broke my spirits, that I must beg, as the greatest and last favour, that you will approve of my retiring, so that I may employ the little time I have to live, in making my just acknowledgments to God for the protection he has been pleased to give me. And your majesty may be assured, that my zeal for you and my country is so great, that in my retirement I shall daily pray for your prosperity, and that those who shall serve you as faithfully as I have done, may never feel the hard return that I have met with.'

"The queen wrote the duke an answer, expressing some concern at several parts of his letter, assuring him, without entering into particulars, that he had no ground for suspicions, and desiring him to come to town. But fearing at the same time, that some motion might be made in parliament against Mr. Masham, which might be attended with very disagreeable consequences, she sent about in much concern to many persons to stand by her, as if some great attack was going to be made upon her. This application, and the closeting some persons, who were known enemies to the Revolution, gave encouragement to the Jacobites; several of whom were now observed running to court with faces full of business and satisfaction, as if they were going to get the government into their hands. And this being represented to the queen, as a kind of victory gained by her over the Marlborough family, was doubtless one means of hindering all thoughts of a real accommodation.

"In about a month after this it was, that both Houses of Parliament addressed the queen, to order the duke of Marlborough over into Holland, to attend to the great affair of a peace, and in case that project did not take effect, to prepare for an early opening the campaign. In her Answer to this Address (as hath been said)

Company, and for the separate traders, was read a second time, and committed to a committee of the whole House; to whom an instruction was given to receive a clause or clauses, to provide 'for the instructing of the negroes in the plantations, in the knowledge of the Christian religion.' But this Bill was never brought to perfection, and the only thing the Commons did in favour either of the Company or separate traders, was the voting of an Address to her majesty, "That she would be pleased to give directions, That such ships of war be appointed for protecting the trade to Africa, as might be necessary for the preservation and security thereof."

A Supply granted.] The Commons made good their assurances to the queen, for in less than a month they granted all the necessary supplies for the next year's service, amounting to 6,184,466*l.* 7*s.* Of this sum, 1,500,000*l.* were raised by way of lottery, and the rest put on good funds.

The Queen's Speech at the Close of the Session.] April 5. The Queen came to the House of Peers, and after giving her assent to several bills, made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; It is with great satisfaction that I come hither at this time to return you my hearty thanks for the marks of duty and affection which you have given me through the whole course of this session. And I am to thank you, gentlemen of the House of Commons, in a very particular manner, for the

she used these words: 'I am very glad to find, that you concur with me in a just sense of the duke of Marlborough's eminent services.' But notwithstanding this, he had not been long gone, before she gave a signal proof how much his declared enemies were in her favour, by granting Mr. Hill a pension of 1,000*l.* a year; and in some time, she made both him and Mr. Masham, men of little or no service, general officers over the heads of many brave men, who had frequently hazarded their lives in her service, and had gone through the toils and hardships of a tedious war.

"In the mean time the duchess of Marlborough learnt, that the queen was made to believe, that she often spoke of her in company disrespectfully: upon which she desired an audience, in order to justify herself, which she obtained on the 6th of April; but could make no impression upon the queen, whom she never saw afterwards, nor ever had any correspondence with her majesty, except on two occasions relating to the public. However, notwithstanding this thorough alienation of the queen's affections from the duchess, she was not yet divested of her employments; it being, perhaps, not yet determined, who should succeed her, nor whether it were proper, that the duke of Marlborough should have that mortification, before the season was fully ripe for the execution of the new scheme; though it now was greatly advanced." Tindal, great dispatch which you have made, in providing, so early in the year, such great and effectual supplies for the public service: This cannot but make me very desirous to repeat the assurances I gave you at the opening of the session, that they should be very carefully applied to the uses for which you have designed them.—My Lords and Gentlemen; I cannot sufficiently express to you my great concern that you have had so necessary an occasion of taking up a great part of your time towards the latter end of this session.—I am confident no prince that ever sate on the throne has been more really and sincerely kind to the church than myself, nor ever had a more true and tender concern for its welfare and prosperity than I have and always shall continue to have.—The suppressing Immorality, and prophane and other wicked and malicious libels, is what I have always earnestly recommended, and shall be glad of the first opportunity to give my consent to any laws that might effectually conduce to that end: But this being an evil complained of in all times, it is very injurious to take a pretence from thence to insinuate that the church is in any danger from my administration.—I could heartily wish that men would study to be quiet, and do their own business, rather than busy themselves in reviving questions and disputes of a very high nature, and which must be with an ill intention, since they can only tend to foment, but not to heal our divisions and animosities.—For my own part, as it has pleased God to give success to my endeavours for the Union of my two kingdoms, which I must ever esteem as one of the greatest blessings of my reign, so I hope his divi. goodness will still continue favourable, and make me the happy instrument of that yet more desirable Union of the hearts of all my people in the bonds of mutual affection, that so there may remain no other contention among you, but who shall exceed the other in contributing to advance our present happiness, and secure the Protestant Succession.—Finding by the advices from abroad, that our army has not yet taken the field, and that the plenipotentiaries of France are still in Holland, I think it proper at present to make the prorogation but for a very short time*."

After which, the Lord Chancellor, by her majesty's command, prorogued the parliament

* "In the beginning of April the parliament was prorogued, and the queen in her speech thereupon, expressed her concern, that there was cause given for that, which had taken up so much of their time, wishing that all her people would be quiet, and mind their own business; adding, that in all times there was too much occasion given to complain of impiety; but that she would continue that zeal, which she had hitherto expressed for religion, and for the church: this seemed to look a different way from the whispers that had been set about. Soon after that, she made a step that revived them again." Burnet.

until Tuesday the 18th instant, when it was further prorogued.

“During this winter,” continues Burnet, “as I was encouraged by the queen, to speak more freely to her of her affairs, than I had ever ventured to do formerly, I told her what reports were secretly spread of her through the nation, as if she favoured the design of bringing the Pretender, to succeed to the crown, upon a bargain that she should hold it during her life: I was sure these reports were spread about by persons, who were in the confidence of those, that were believed to know her mind; I was well assured, that the Jacobites of Scotland had, upon her coming to the crown, sent up one Ogilby of Boyne, who was in great esteem among them, to propose the bargain to her; he, when he went back, gave the party full assurances that she accepted of it: this I had from some of the lords of Scotland, who were then in the secret with the professed Jacobites. The Earl Cromarty made a speech in parliament, as was formerly mentioned, contradicting this, and alluding to the distinction of the Calvinists, made between the secret and the revealed will of God; he assured them, the queen had no secret will, contrary to that which she declared: yet at the same time his brother gave the party assurances to the contrary. I told the queen all this: and said, if she was capable of making such a bargain for herself, by which her people were to be delivered up and sacrificed after her death, as it would darken all the glory of her reign, so it must set all her people to consider of the most proper ways of securing themselves by bringing over the Protestant Successors; in which, I told her plainly I would concur, if she did not take effectual means to extinguish those jealousies. I told her, her ministers had served her with that fidelity, and such success, that her making a change among them would amaze all the world. The glory of queen Elizabeth’s reign arose from the firmness of her counsels, and the continuance of her ministers; as the three last reigns, in which the ministry was often changed, had suffered extremely by it. I also shewed her, that if she suffered the Pretender’s party to prepare the nation, for his succeeding her, she ought not to imagine, that when they thought they had fixed that matter, they would stay for the natural end of her life; but that they would find ways to shorten it: nor did I think it was to be doubted, but that in 1703, when the Pretender was upon the sea, they had laid some assassins here who, upon the news of his landing, would have tried to dispatch her. It was certain, that their interest led them to it, as it was known that their principles did allow of it. This, with a great deal more to the same purpose, I laid before the queen; she heard me patiently; she was for the most part silent: yet, by what she said, seemed desirous to make me think, she agreed to what I laid before her; but I found after-

PRINCIPAL OCCURRENCES DURING THE RECESS—The Duke of Shrewsbury made Lord Chamberlain—The Queen’s Letter thereon to the Earl of Godolphin—The Earl’s Answer—The Earl of Sunderland dismissed—The Lord Dartmouth made Secretary of State—The Tories elated at this Change—The Whigs alarmed at it—The Bank interfere in favour of the Ministry—The Earl of Godolphin dismissed—Sacheverell’s Progress into Wales—The Parliament dissolved—Other Changes in the Ministry—The Licentenance of London changed—Progress of the Elections.

“The duke of Shrewsbury,” says Tindal, “who had voted for the acquittal of Sacheverell, was appointed Lord Chamberlain in the room of the marquis of Kent, who was made a duke. The duke of Shrewsbury had gone out of England, towards the end of the reign of king William, thinking, as he gave out, that a warmer climate was necessary for his health. He staid several years at Rome, where he became acquainted with a Roman lady; who, upon his leaving Rome to return to England, went after him to Augsburg, where she overtook him, and declared herself a Protestant; upon which he married her there, and came with her back to England in 1706. Upon his return, the Whigs lived in civilities with him; but they thought his leaving England, and his living so long out of it, while the nation was in so much danger, and his strange marriage, gave just cause of suspicion. The duke of Marlborough and the lord Godolphin lived still in friendship with him, and studied to overcome the jealousies, that the Whigs had of him; for they generally believed, that he had advised king William to the change, which he made in his ministry towards the end of his reign. He seemed not to be concerned at the distance, in which he was kept from business; but, as was observed above, in the trial of Dr. Sacheverell, he left the Whigs in every vote; and the change of his principles, which he had discovered by this, was imputed to a secret management between him and Mr. Harley with the new favourite. But, before the queen declared her intention for giving him the Lord-Chamberlain’s staff, she thought fit, for form sake, and perhaps to cover her farther designs, to communicate her resolution to the earl of Godolphin, who, being then at Newmarket, sent a letter to the queen; to which her majesty wrote with her own hand, on the 13th of April, the following answer:

“I am sorry to find by your letter, you are so very much in the spleen, as to think you cannot, for the future, contribute any thing towards my quiet but your wishes. However I will still hope you will use your endeavours. Never was there more occasion than now;

wards it had no effect upon her: yet I had great quiet in my own mind, since I had, with an honest freedom, made the best use I could of the access I had to her.”

for by all one hears and sees every day, as things are at present, I think one can expect nothing but confusion. I am sure, for my part, I shall be ready to join with all my friends in every thing, that is reasonable, to allay the heat and ferment, that is in this poor nation. Since you went to Newmarket, I have received several assurances from the duke of Shrewsbury of his readiness to serve me upon all occasions, and his willingness to come into my service; which offer I was very glad to accept of; having a very good opinion of him, and believing he may be of great use in these troublesome times. For these reasons I have resolved to part with the duke of Kent, who, I hope, will be easy in this matter by being made a duke; and, I hope, that this change will meet with your approbation, which I wish I may ever have in all my actions. I have not yet declared my intentions of giving the staff and the key to the duke of Shrewsbury, because I would be the first that should acquaint you with it."

"The Lord-Treasurer, who well understood the meaning, and foresaw the consequences of such a change, wrote to the queen the following letter:

"Newmarket, April 15, 1710.

"I have the honour of your majesty's letter of the 13th, by which I have the grief to find that what you are pleased to call spleen in my former letter, was only a true impulse and conviction of mind, that your majesty is suffering yourself to be guided to your own ruin and destruction, as fast as it is possible for them to compass it, to whom you seem so much to hearken.—I am not therefore so much surprized, as concerned at the resolution which your majesty says you have taken of bringing in the duke of Shrewsbury. For when people began to be sensible, it would be difficult to persuade your majesty to dissolve a parliament, which for two winters together had given you above six millions a year for the support of a war, upon which your crown depends; even while that war is still subsisting, they have had the cunning to contrive this proposal to your majesty, which, in its consequence, will certainly put you under a necessity of breaking the parliament, though contrary (I yet believe) to your mind and intention.—I beg your majesty to be persuaded, I do not say this out of the least prejudice to the duke of Shrewsbury, There is no man, of whose capacity I have had a better impression; nor with whom I have lived more easily and freely for above twenty years. Your majesty may please to remember that, at your first coming to the crown, I was desirous he should have had one of the chief posts in your service; and it would have been happy for your majesty and the kingdom, if he had accepted that offer. But he thought fit to decline it; and the reasons generally given at that time for his doing so, do not much recommend him to your majesty's service. But I must endeavour to let your majesty see things as they really are: and to bring him into your service and into your business at this time, just after his being in a public open conjunction in every vote with the whole body of the Tories, and in a private constant correspondence and caballing with Mr. Harley in every thing, what consequence can this possibly have, but to make every man, that is now in your cabinet council, except —, to run from it, as they would from the plague? And I leave it to your majesty to judge, what effect this intire change of your ministers will have among your allies abroad; and how well this war is like to be carried on, in their opinion, by those who have all along opposed and obstructed it, and who will like any peace the better, the more it leaves France at liberty to take their time of imposing the Pretender upon this country.—These considerations must certainly make Holland run immediately into a separate peace with France, and make your majesty lose all the honour and all the reputation your arms had acquired by the war: and make the kingdom lose all the fruits of that vast expence, which they have been at in this war, as well as all the advantage and safety, which they had so much need of, and had so fair a prospect of obtaining by it. And can any body imagine, that, after so great a disappointment to the kingdom, there will not be an inquiry into the causes of it; and who have been the occasion of so great a change in your majesty's measures and counsels, which had been so long successful, and gotten you so great a name in the world? I am very much afraid your majesty will find, when it is too late, that it will be a pretty difficult task for any body to stand against such an inquiry. I am sure, if I did not think all these consequences inevitable, I would never give your majesty the trouble and uneasiness of laying them before you. But persuaded as I am, that your majesty will find them so, it is my indispensable duty to do it out of pure faithfulness and zeal for your majesty's service and honour. Your majesty's having taken a resolution of so much consequence to all your affairs, both at home and abroad, without acquainting the duke of Marlborough or me with it till after you had taken it, is the least part of my mortification in this whole affair; though perhaps the world may think the long and faithful services we have constantly and zealously endeavoured to do your majesty, might have deserved a little more consideration. However, for my own part I most humbly beg leave to assure your majesty, I will never give the least obstruction to your measures or to any ministers you shall please to employ. And I must beg further, to make two humble requests to your majesty: the one, that you will allow me to pass the remainder of my life always out of London, where I may find most ease and quiet. The other, that you would keep this letter, and

'read it again about next Christmas, and then be pleased to make your own judgment, who hath given you the best and most faithful advice.'

"This Letter made no impression upon the queen, who, two days before she received it, being already fixed in her choice, delivered, on the 14th of April, the staff and key to the duke of Shrewsbury, who gave the ministers very positive assurances, that his principles were the same they had been during the last reign, and were in no respect altered. Upon which he desired to enter into confidences with them; but there was now too much ground given for suspicion."

"About the beginning of June, the design of turning out the earl of Sunderland* from

* "Son of Robert, second earl of Sunderland, minister to both brothers, Charles 2 and James 2. Queen Anne sent him on embassies, and made him a commissioner for the Union; and, when he was left out of the administration, she offered him a pension, which he nobly refused. George 1, to whom he was personally known before his accession, raised him successively to the highest offices in the state, and gave him the order of the garter; and he was thought to have gained the same ascendancy over the mind of George 1, as his father had possessed over that of James 2. He died April 29, 1722; it was said, fortunately for the House of Brunswick, being as treacherous to them as his father had been to the Stuarts. He had been one of the council, groom of the stole, privy seal, vice-treasurer of Ireland, secretary of state, president of the council, first commissioner of the treasury, twice lord justice of England under the king; but he retired so entirely disgusted, that nothing could have induced him to resume the great offices he had resigned. How different was this conduct to that of his mother-in-law, who interceded, by letter, to queen Anne, to restore him to his employments; that proud duchess, soliciting it, as she expressed herself, 'upon her knees.' Of the abilities of the earls of Sunderland there can be no doubt. The treachery of the one stands unrivalled. The other died, fortunately, perhaps, for his reputation. It is, however, to his honour, that, with all his opportunities, he never increased his patrimonial inheritance. His lordship loved and cherished learning, and his extensive library was selected with great judgment. His wives were, Arabella, youngest daughter and co-heir of Henry Cavendish, duke of Newcastle; Anne, daughter of John, duke of Marlborough; and Judith, daughter and co-heir of the honourable Benjamin Tichborne. By the first he had only a daughter; by the second, Robert, fourth earl of Sunderland; Charles, the fifth earl, who dying unmarried, was succeeded in that title by his brother, who became, by maternal descent, duke of Marlborough; a nobleman as good as great. The earls Spencer descend also from this marriage. By the last alliance were several children: the youngest was posthumous. Wil-

the post of secretary of state, began to be talked of. As soon as this design reached the duke of Marlborough, who was then abroad at the head of the army, he wrote a very moving letter to the queen, representing the very ill consequences it would necessarily have upon all affairs abroad, to have his son-in-law, against whose fidelity nothing could be objected, and in whom the allies had so entire a confidence, turned out of her service in the middle of a campaign; and begging it as a reward of all his past services, that she would at least delay her resolution till the campaign was ended. The duchess of Marlborough was likewise urged by some friends to try to say something, to divert, if possible, such a stroke; because it was given out, that the queen would do this chiefly on the duchess's account, that she might feel the effects of her displeasure in so sensible and tender a point. No consideration, proper to herself, could have induced the duchess to trouble the queen again after that last conversation: but she was overcome by the consideration of the duke of Marlborough, the earl of Sunderland, and the public interest, and wrote to the queen, on the 7th of June, 1710, begging, for the duke of Marlborough's sake, that her majesty would not give him such a blow, of which she dreaded the consequence; putting her majesty in mind of her letter about the duke, upon the victory at Blenheim; and adding the most solemn assurances, that she had not so much as a wish to remove Mrs.

liam, the eldest of them, dying at two years of age, only two days after the earl his father, was buried with him at Brington: his death was owing to having had 'the small-pox inoculated upon him.' Mackay describes lord Sunderland as being 'very fair complexioned, and of a middle stature.'" Noble's Granger.

"It seems to have been the earl of Sunderland's fortune to have learned his divinity from his uncle, and his politics from his tutor (Dr. Trimmell.) It may be thought a blemish in his character, that he has much fallen from the height of those republican principles, with which he began; for in his father's life time, while he was a member of the House of Commons, he would often, among his familiar friends, refuse the title of lord, (as he has done to myself) swear he would never be called otherwise than Charles Spencer, and hoped to see the day when there should not be a peer in England. His understanding, at the best, is of the middling size; neither has he much improved it, either in reality, or, which is very unfortunate, even in the opinion of the world, by an overgrown library. It is hard to decide, whether he learned that rough way of treating his sovereign, from the lady he is allied to, or whether it be the result of his own nature. The sense of the injuries he has done, renders him (as it is very natural) implacable towards those, to whom he has given greatest cause to complain; for which reason, he will never forgive either the queen or the present treasurer." Swift's Four Last Years of the Queen.

Masham; and that all the noise, which had been about an address for that purpose, had been occasioned by the duke of Marlborough's discontent at that time. To this the queen wrote a very short and harsh answer, complaining, that the duchess had broke her promise of not saying any thing of politics or of Mrs. Masham, and concluding, that it was plain from this ill usage, what she was to expect for the future. The duchess upon this wrote a second letter, in which she assured her majesty, that she should not have troubled her with the first, but that she had heard it reported, that the persecution, begun against the duke of Marlborough and his family, was chiefly occasioned by her majesty's displeasure and aversion to her, as having promoted an address against Mrs. Masham: that it was only to vindicate herself from that aspersion, that she had presumed to trouble her majesty: that she could not imagine it could be interpreted as an offence, to vindicate herself from what was now made the pretence for turning out the earl of Sunderland, and pushing the duke of Marlborough to extremities: that she had no reason to think, that the assuring her majesty, that she would never have any hand in any thing against Mrs. Masham, could have been construed as an ungrateful speaking about her, or called a continuation of ill usage: that she thought this was rather a complying with her majesty's inclination, and saying what she could not but approve: that all the politics in her letter was her concern for the duke; making it her last request, that her majesty would only defer the blow till the end of the campaign. This (she added) she begged upon her knees, and left her majesty to judge, whether, after such an expression, it was likely that she should ever enter into any thing that could displeas her.*

* "Perhaps it may be conjectured, that if on the dismissal of Sunderland, which was sure to be followed by other changes, notwithstanding the positive assurances of the queen to the contrary, Godolphin and all his friends had instantly resigned their places, and if the duke of Marlborough had given up his command of the army, so unanimous and bold a measure would have dispirited the queen, and alarmed the Tories. Under these impressions she could not have ventured to make a sudden and total change; she would probably have been checked by the apprehension of alienating the whole party of the Whigs, who then formed a large majority in parliament, and of disgusting the monied men, many of whom made the public credit personal to Godolphin, and scrupling to advance money upon the faith of the nation, offered it upon his single word. She would have dreaded the remonstrances of the Emperor and the Dutch, who justly considered the great successes of the war as principally owing to the military talents of Marlborough. Such was the opinion of matter, hastened the execution of the design, is not known; but it is certain, that it did not retard it; for lord Sunderland was, on the 14th of June, dismissed the office, and the seals given, the next day, to the lord Dartmouth, one of the lords commissioners of trade and plantations, and son-in-law to the earl of Nottingham.

"The High-Church party were much pleased and elated upon this alteration, which they looked upon as a sure forerunner of greater changes; "extolling the queen for asserting her just prerogative, and setting herself free from an arbitrary junto, who kept her in an inglorious dependence on their will and caprice." And it was said, the duke of Beaufort, being about this time come to court to pay his respects to her majesty, told her, "That he was extremely glad he could now salute her queen." On the other hand, the Whigs were the more alarmed, as the best part of their wealth was lodged in the Exchequer and public funds; and, as they rightly considered, that the removal of the earl of Sunderland was but a step to come at the lord-treasurer, in whose capacity, punctuality, and integrity, the monied men reposed an intire confidence; and they foresaw, that his being laid aside would very much affect the public credit, as it immediately did. Whereupon, sir Gilbert Heathcote, governor of the Bank of England; Nathaniel Gould, deputy-governor; Francis Eyles and sir William Scawen, two of the directors, made their application to the duke of Newcastle, lord privy-seal, to whom, having represented the dangers likely to attend the change of the ministry, the duke introduced them to the queen, who told them, "That she, for some time before, had resolved to remove the earl of Sunderland for particular reasons of state; but that she had not yet determined to make any other changes; and, whenever she should, she would take care that Walpole; and sir Richard Temple, afterwards lord Cobham, expressed his sentiments in favour of a general resignation, in a spirited letter to his friend Walpole, with whom he then acted, and by whom he had been strongly recommended to the duke of Marlborough. But, both Walpole and his brother Horace foresaw and lamented that the Whigs, instead of adopting this decisive and manly conduct, would be divided among themselves, and that several would listen to the insidious overtures of Harley. In effect, that artful minister flattered them with the hopes that the parliament would not be dissolved, and representing the danger which would threaten the constitution and religion, should their whole body desert the queen, he used the remarkable expression, 'That a Whig game was intended at the bottom,' and that his great object would be to promote the Protestant Succession. These representations and promises had a due effect, and helped to break the phalanx, which, had it remained firm and compact, must have been invincible." Coxe's Walpole.

the public credit might not be injured thereby." Upon this it was reported, the queen had declared, she designed to make no more alterations in the ministry, which immediately restored the public funds to their former value; but they soon began to fall again, and many foreigners withdrew their effects from England, upon a strong report, that not only the lord-treasurer would be laid aside, but even the parliament dissolved.

"On the 8th of August, the very day after the queen had expressed her desire to the earl of Godolphin himself, that he would continue in her service, she dismissed him; and her letter of order to him to break his staff, was sent by no worthier a messenger than a man in a livery, to be left with his lordship's porter. The queen indeed confessed to those, who expostulated with her upon this occasion, "That she was sorry for it, but could not help it." The next day it was declared, that the queen had appointed earl Paulet, Mr. Robert Harley, Mr. Henry Paget, sir Thomas Mansel, and Mr. Robert Benson, Commissioners of the Treasury. Though lord Paulet was the first in form, Mr. Harley* was the person with whom the secret was lodged; and it was visible, he was the chief minister, being at the same time made chancellor and under-treasurer of the Exchequer, in the room of Mr. Smith, who was afterwards made a Teller of the Exchequer. And now it appeared, that a total change of the ministry, and the dissolution of the parliament, were resolved on.

"In the mean while Dr. Sacheverell, being presented to a benefice in North-Wales, went down to take possession of it: as he passed through the counties, both going and coming, he was received and followed by such numbers, and entertained with such magnificence, that our princes in their progresses have not been more run after than he was. Great fury and violence appeared on many occasions, though care was taken to give his followers no sort of provocation: he was looked on as the champion of the church; and he shewed as much insolence on that occasion, as his party did folly. No notice was taken by the government of all these tumultuous proceedings; they were rather encouraged than checked. All this was like a prelude to a greater scene, which was to be acted at Court.

* "Robert Harley, esq. son of sir Edward Harley, knt. was born near Covent Garden, London, Dec. 5, 1661, and educated at Shilton, near Burford, Oxfordshire. He was first chosen member of parliament for Tregony, and afterwards for Radnor. He became Speaker of the House of Commons in 1701, which dignity he held during three successive parliaments. In April 1704 he was sworn of the privy-council, and in May following one of the principal Secretaries of State to queen Anne. In 1710 he was constituted a commissioner of the Treasury, and chancellor and under-treasurer of the Exchequer. In March 1711 he received a stab with a penknife from Antoine de Guiscard, a French refugee, while under examination of the privy-council. On his recovery he was advanced to the peerage by the stile and titles of baron Harley, earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer, and appointed Lord High-Treasurer of Great-Britain. In 1712 he was elected a knight companion of the order of the Garter, and installed at Windsor the year following. After the death of queen Anne his lordship's career of greatness received a check, and he was impeached by the House of Commons, on June 10, 1715, of high-treason, and high-crimes and misdemeanors. On July 16 he was committed to the Tower by the House of Lords, where he suffered a severe confinement till July 1, 1717, when after a public trial he was unanimously acquitted by his peers. After his lordship's decease, on May 31, 1734, a splendid character was given of him, which may be seen in Collins's Peerage; and Pope has embalmed his memory with never-dying verse, in a dedicatory epistle to Parnell's poems, which were published after lord Oxford's imprisonment in the Tower and his subsequent retreat into the country,—where he was

"Pleas'd to escape from flattery to wit:" yet in vain, said the "poet of reason," and we may add, of passion too:

"In vain to deserts thy retreat is made;
The Muse attends thee to thy silent shade:
'Tis hers, the brave man's latest steps to trace,
Rejudge his acts, and dignify disgrace.
When Interest calls off all her sneaking train,
And all th' oblig'd desert, and all the vain;
She waits, or to the scaffold, or the cell,
When the last lingering friend has bid farewell.
Ev'n now, she shades thy ev'ning walk with bays,
(No hireling she, no prostitute to praise),
Ev'n now, observant of the parting ray,
Eyes the calm sunset of thy various day,
Through fortune's cloud one truly great can see,
Nor fears to tell, that Mortimer is he."

"From such a picture of this peer, we naturally infer that he was a very great as well as good man: yet he has been represented by others as very remote from either goodness or greatness; and particularly by lord Bolingbroke in his letter to sir William Windham, where the portrait given of him is not only mean but odious. It may therefore be reasonable to suppose that lord Oxford had his alloy of infirmities, notwithstanding the fine things said for him; and it is equally reasonable not to believe all that a rival minister has said against him, especially after they had disagreed. He appears to have been a great encourager of literature; and the greatest collector in his time of all curious books in print or manuscript, especially those concerning the history of his own country. He was also a person of taste and learning, under which character we find a proposal addressed to him by Swift, for correcting, improving, and ascertaining the English tongue." Park's enlarged edition of Oxford's Noble Authors, vol. 4. p. 109.

"The queen in September came to council, and called for a proclamation to dissolve the parliament,* which sir Simon Harcourt (made Attorney-General in the room of sir James Montague, who had quitted that post) had prepared. When it was read, the lord-chancellor †

* "Mr. Harley, with whom the queen chiefly consulted about the new arrangements, was probably desirous to unite with the principal members of the Whig administration, upon the condition of their agreeing to measures for compelling the allies to a strict performance of their engagements, and of their listening to reasonable terms of peace, by which it was understood, that every possible security should be obtained for the Protestant Succession. Agreeably to this system, the queen at first dismissed only a few of the Whigs, and when those who still remained in office obstinately refused to agree to any compromise or coalition, and even put her majesty at defiance, by reporting to foreign interposition for maintaining their power, her pride and resentment were roused to make a complete change of her servants; and this necessarily led forward to a premature and unexpected dissolution of the present parliament, which probably did not enter into the original plan of her advisers. The Junto had the entire command of the House of Commons; and a reliance upon its support, still more than the patronage of the allies, inspired them with confidence of being able to render the schemes of the new ministers abortive, and of soon resuming the supreme direction of affairs. The dissolution of parliament alone could baffle their hopes; and as this was an unprecedented measure, and disapproved of by some persons lately promoted, who had the greatest influence with her majesty, they were the less apprehensive of its being carried into execution. In these expectations, however, they found themselves disappointed. Proclamations were issued for dissolving the parliament, and calling another to meet on the 25th November." Somerville.

† William Cowper, esq. soon after being called to the bar, was appointed one of king William's counsel; he succeeded sir Nathan Wright, as lord keeper of the great seal, Oct. 11, 1705; was created baron Cowper of Wingham, Nov. 9, 1706; and appointed lord chancellor, May 4, 1707; which post he held till Sept. 14, 1710. On the accession of king George, he was again appointed lord chancellor, and, on resigning the great seal, was created viscount Fordwich, and earl Cowper, March 13, 1717-18. He nobly refused to accept new-years-gifts from the counsellors at law, which had long been given to his predecessors; and what is still more to his honour, foresaw and opposed the destructive measures of the South Sea bubble in 1720. He died Oct. 10, 1723.

"Ambrose Philips composed a long ode on his death, which thus speaks of his incorrupt judicial character:

Cowper offered to speak; but the queen rising up would admit of no debate, and ordered the writs for a new parliament to be got ready.

"He the robe of justice wore Sullied not as heretofore,
When the magistrate was sought
With yearly gifts. Of what avail
Are guilty hoards? for life is frail;

And we are judged where favour is not bought.

"Collins explains this poetic encomium by informing us, that earl Cowper was the first who refused the new year's gifts which former lord-chancellors received from the council, thinking it a custom which tended to corruption; and his example has been followed by all his successors in that high station. Mr. Seward relates, that when it was requisite for Richard Cromwell to appear at Westminster-hall, respecting the manor of Horsey, the humane lord-chancellor Cowper ordered a chair for him in court, and desired him to keep on his hat: and Mr. Hayley observes, 'that knowledge, eloquence, and political importance, conspired to aggrandize the man who added the name of Cowper to the list of English nobility.'" Park's Orford, vol. 4, p. 102.

"The lord Cowper, although his merits are later than the rest, deserves a rank in this great council. He was considerable in the station of a practising lawyer: but, as he was raised to be a chancellor and a peer, without passing through any of the intermediate steps, which in late times had been the constant practice, and little skilled in the nature of government, or the true interest of princes, farther than the municipal or common law of England; his abilities, as to foreign affairs, did not equally appear in the council. Some former passages of his life were thought to disqualify him for that office, by which he was to be the guardian of the queen's conscience; but these difficulties were easily overruled by the authors of his promotion, who wanted a person that would be subservient to all their designs; wherein they were not disappointed. As to his other accomplishments, he was what we usually call a piece of a scholar, and a good logical reasoner; if this were not too often allayed, by a fallacious way of managing an argument, which made him apt to deceive the unwary, and sometimes to deceive himself." Swift's Four Last Years of the Queen.

"On his resignation, Lord Chancellor Cowper behaved with unexampled firmness and honour. He rejected with scorn, all the overtures which Harley made, in the most humble and supplicating manner, to induce him to continue in office. When he waited on the queen to resign, she strongly opposed his resolution, and returned the seals three times, after he had laid them down. At last, when she could not prevail, she commanded him to take them, adding, I beg it as a favour of you, if I may use that expression. Cowper could not refuse to obey her commands; but after a short pause, taking up the seals, he said that he would not carry them out of the palace, except on the promise, that the surrender of them would be accepted on the morrow. 'The arguments on my side,' to use the words of lord Cowper himself, 'and professions, and the repeated importunities of her majesty, drew this audience into the length of three quarters of an hour.'<sup>2</sup> On the following day, his resignation was accepted, and soon afterwards the seals were given to sir Simon Harcourt." Coxe's Walpole.

About the same time she dismissed the lord Sommers,* and, in his room, made the earl of Rochester lord-president of the council. She sent to the duke of Devonshire for the lord-steward's staff, and gave it to the duke of Buckingham. Mr. Boyle † was removed from the post of Secretary of State, and Mr. Henry St. John had the seals. The earl of Derby was dismissed from being chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and was succeeded by the lord Berkley. Upon all these removes, the Lord-Chancellor came, on the 23d of September, and delivered up the great seal. The queen did not expect this, and was surprized at it; and, not knowing how to dispose of it, she, with unusual earnestness, pressed him to keep it one day longer. The day following, having considered the matter with her favourites Mrs. Masham and Mr. Harley, she received it very readily. At first she committed it to the custody of three lords-commissioners, sir Thomas Trevor, chief-justice of the Common-pleas; Mr.

* "Sept. 20. To-day I returned my visits to the duke's daughters; the insolent drabs came up to my very mouth to salute me; then I heard the report confirmed of removals; my lord-president Somers; the duke of Devonshire, lord-steward; and Mr. Boyle, Secretary of State, are all turned out to-day. I never remember such bold steps taken by a Court: I am almost shocked at it, though I did not care if they were all hanged. We are astonished why the parliament is not yet dissolved, and why they keep a matter of that importance to the last. We shall have a strange winter here between the struggles of a cunning provoked discarded party and the triumphs of one in power; of both which I shall be an indifferent spectator, and return very peaceably to Ireland, when I have done my part in the affair I am entrusted with, whether it succeeds or no." Swift's Journal to Stella.

† Youngest son of Charles Lord Clifford. He was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer to king William in March 1701; and was much esteemed by that prince. He continued in that post till Feb. 12, 1707-8, when he was made one of the principal Secretaries of State, in which station he remained till September 20, 1710. On the accession of George 1, Mr. Boyle was created lord Carleton, and soon after made president of the council. He died unmarried, March 14, 1724-5. To the intervention of Mr. Boyle and the friendship of lord Halifax, Mr. Addison was indebted for his first introduction to lord Godolphin.

† "Walpole acted on this occasion an honourable and disinterested part. In the wreck of this great administration, Harley, desirous of retaining in power several of the Whigs, with a view to counterbalance the credit of St. John and Harcourt, who already began to give him umbrage, endeavoured to gain Walpole. He made very flattering advances; told him that he was worth half his party, and pressed him to continue in administration; but all his efforts proved ineffectual. Harley finding at last that promises and flattery were employed without avail, had recourse to threats. Hawes, one of his confidential emissaries, who was afterwards receiver of the customs, informed Walpole, that the treasurer had in his possession a note for the contract of forage, indorsed by him; this insinuation was made in such a manner, as to imply, that if Walpole would come over to the new ministry, this note should not be produced against him. But he, no less disdainful of menaces than before he was regardless of promises, rejected all overtures. In a letter written on the 19th of September he observes to his friend general Stanhope; 'I believe, in all probability, this will be the last letter I shall write from this office. We are in such a way here, as I cannot describe. But you can imagine nothing worse than you will hear. The parliament is not yet dissolved, but this week will certainly determine it. Dear Stanhope, God prosper you, and pray make haste to us, that you may see what you will not believe if it were told you.' A few days after writing this letter; he retired from the office of secretary at war.—Harley, however, was not repulsed by the first refusal of Walpole to support his administration. He had too much success with many of the Whigs not to exert every effort to gain a man whose talents and eloquence he held in the highest estimation. He suffered him to continue in his place of treasurer of the navy, several months after the Whig ministry were entirely rooted. He sent several messages, and held several conversations with him, to persuade him to moderate his opposition against the new measures; but his constant answer was 'Make a safe and honourable peace, and preserve the Protestant Succession, and you will have no opposition.' Coxe's Walpole.

Dr. Robinson, dean of Windsor, who of late had grown into great confidence with Mr. Harley, was nominated to succeed Dr. Hall, deceased, in the bishopric of Bristol; and Dr. Byse to succeed Dr. Bull, deceased, in the see of St. David's. The duke of Hamilton was appointed lord-lieutenant of the county palatine of Lancaster; the earl of Portmore was made commander in chief of her majesty's forces in Portugal, in the room of the earl of Galway; the lord Windsor advanced to the post of lieutenant-general; and general Webb made governor of the Isle of Wight.

"There never was any event in the annals of this country attended with more disgraceful consequences to England, or followed by more fatal effects to Europe in general, than the dismissal of those great men, who formed that glorious and successful administration in the reign of queen Anne, called, by way of distinction, the Whig administration.—Our regret at their fall is still further heightened from the consideration, that it was occasioned by the overbearing temper of a mistress of the robes, [duchess of Marlborough], and principally effected by the petty intrigues of a bed-chamber woman, [Abigail Hill, Mrs. and afterwards lady Masham], against her benefactress. The surprising influence which the duchess of Marlborough had acquired over the weak and irresolute mind of the good queen Anne, is well described in that extraordinary Apology of her Conduct, which the duchess gave to the public. We there find a princess of the most placid temper, fascinated by the captivating manners of an artful, but agreeable woman; a queen, imbued with high notions of regal dignity, and a most exact observer of forms, throwing off all etiquette, and corresponding with her favourite, under the fictitious names of Morley and Freeman. We find the duchess, after having engaged the affections of her mistress by the most assiduous attention, relapsing into gross neglect, and gradually sinking in favour. We find her at the same time either not perceiving, or striving to conceal from others, and even from herself, the decline of her ascendancy, and in-especially where men of great abilities had served with such zeal and success, that the administration of all affairs, both at home and abroad, in their hands, was not only without exception, but had raised the admiration of all Europe. All this rose purely from the great credit of the new favourites, and the queen's personal distaste to the old ones. The queen was much delighted with all these changes, and seemed to think she was freed from the chains, which the old ministry held her in. She spoke of it to several persons as a captivity, which she had been long under. The duke of Somerset had very much alienated the queen's mind from the old ministry; but he was so displeased with the dissolution of the parliament, and the new model of the ministry, that, though he continued some time master of the horse, he refused to sit any more in council, and complained openly of the artifices, which had been used to make him instrumental to other people's designs.

"On the 28th of September, the queen went to Hampton-court, having the same day ordered the seals to be put to a commission for renewing the lieutenancy of the city of London; in which several Whigs, who were in the former, were left out, and Tories put in their places. This new commission was chiefly designed, both to prevent sir Gilbert Heathcote, an alderman near the chair, and governor of the bank (who had given offence to the court, by his application to the queen in favour of the late ministry) from being chosen lord-mayor, and to strengthen the interest of the High-church party in the election of parliament-men for the capital city, which generally has a great influence upon other elections. But that commission was opened too late to have the intended effect; for, the election for a lord-mayor coming on the 29th of September, according to custom, the majority appeared for sir Gilbert Heathcote and sir Robert Beachcroft; and though a poll was demanded, and great interest made by the Tory party for sir Richard Hoare, yet the two first had the majority of voices; and, being, on the 5th of October, returned by the Common-hall, the court of aldermen, on the 11th, chose sir Gilbert Heathcote lord-mayor for the year ensuing, but in this point he had but common jus-creasing the disgust of the queen by her rude and intemperate behaviour. Unfortunately, the duchess of Marlborough had so much credit and power with the duke, her husband, and Godolphin, that to remove her it became necessary to remove the ministry, over whom she possessed so strong an influence. The artful and cautious manner by which Mrs. Masham supplanted the duchess of Marlborough, is also related in this Apology, which may be called a manual of court intrigues; and her cabals with Harley, are detailed in the writings of Swift, who derived his information on that subject, from the most unquestionable authorities." Coxe's Walpole.

vice done him, there having been an agreement, made some years before between the aldermen of London, to chuse him, who was next the chair, to prevent animosities and disputes. On the 10th of October the queen's commission for a new lieutenancy was opened at Guild-hall, when sir Samuel Garrard, then lord-mayor, sir Francis Child, sir John Parsons, sir Robert Bedingfield, sir William Withers, and sir Richard Hoare, were chosen colonels of the six city-regiments. About a fortnight after the new lieutenancy of London presented an Address to the queen, who took that opportunity to desire them, "as they had great fortunes of their own, that they would use their endeavours to support the public credit." It was expected, that this recommendation would have had a good effect, and engaged the Tory party in the city, either to advance money to the government, or to use their utmost endeavours to support the public funds. But neither of these happened; and so the Bank, East India, annuities, and other stocks continued sinking, which gave the ministry no small uneasiness; the rather, because some bills of exchange, drawn from Genoa for remittances into Spain, happened at this juncture to be protested. Mr. Harley, the new chancellor of the exchequer, sent his agents into the city, who found means to engage several rich merchants and bankers, particularly Mr. John Lambert, a French refugee, to supply the urgent necessities of the government.*

"By this time the election for parliament-men were over in several places; and by the first returns it appeared, that, amongst the new members, the number of the Whigs was near equal to that of the Tories; which, as was then given out, answered the expectations and desires of the new managers.† For having gained * "Oct. 5. This morning Delaval came to see me, and we went together to to Kneller's, who was not in town. In the way we met the electors for parliament-men: and the rabble came about our coach, crying 'a Colt,' 'a Stanhope,' &c. we were afraid of a dead cat, or our glasses broken, and so were always of their side." Swift's Journal.

"Oct. 6. We now hear daily of elections; and, in a list I saw yesterday of about twenty, there are seven or eight more Tories than in the last parliament; so that I believe they need not fear a majority, with the help of those who will vote as the court pleases. But I have been told, that Mr. Harley himself would not let the Tories be too numerous, for fear they should be insolent, and kick against him; and for that reason they have kept several Whigs in employments, who expected to be turned out every day: as sir John Holland the comptroller, and many others." Ibid.

† "Oct. 29. I am afraid the new ministry is at a terrible loss about money: the Whigs talk so, it would give one the spleen: and I am afraid of meeting Mr. Harley out of humour. They think he will never carry through their chief aim, which was to remove the late Lord Treasurer and his friends, it was by many believed, that they designed to carry things even between both parties, and therefore wished only for such a majority of the High Church in the House of Commons, as might countenance the new scheme; and whom, on the other hand, they might easily check by means of their own creatures, if an unseasonable zeal for the church should prompt them to make any motions against the Toleration. If this was the real intention of the new ministry, or of Mr. Harley in particular, the chief author of the late changes; it soon appeared, that they were either mistaken in their computation, or disappointed in their wishes; and the new members of the High-Church party far outnumbered those of the contrary side; which, besides the influence of the court, was owing to several other causes. For, in the first place, many of the Whig gentlemen, who either could not be induced to believe, that the last parliament would be dissolved, till the blow was given; or who, in case of a dissolution, thought themselves secure of being re-chosen, had neglected making an interest; whilst those, who designed to oppose them, had early taken all the necessary measures to carry their point. Secondly, the ferment, raised by Dr. Sacheverell's trial, was now rather increased than abated, being industriously fomented and propagated throughout the kingdom, in order to influence elections; which it did effectually, and in a more visible manner, in the cities and boroughs, through which that divine had made his triumphant progress in the summer. Thirdly, all the inferior clergy, a few excepted, thinking themselves attacked through the sides of Dr. Sacheverell, were more than ordinarily zealous and diligent in promoting the interest of such, as they thought best affected to the church; not only without any regard to the necessary qualifications of personal merit or estate in the candidates, but in several instances, in breach of the common duties of gratitude, strenuously opposing their very patrons and benefactors. Besides a course, for some months, of very inflaming sermons, they went about from house to house, pressing their people to shew, on this great occasion, their zeal for the church, and now or never to save it. They also told them, in what ill hands the queen had been kept, as well as their duty, to free her from the power, which the late ministry exercised over her. In the last place, there was a vast concourse of rude multitudes brought together, who behaved themselves in so boisterous a manner, that it was not safe, and in many places not possible, for those, who had a right to vote, to come and

give their votes for a Whig. Open violence was used in several places. This was so general through the whole kingdom, all at the same time, that it was visible, that the thing had been concerted for some time, and the proper methods and tools had been prepared for it. The influence of the mob was, in a particular manner, remarkable in the election for the city of Westminster; where Mr. Medicot and Mr. Cross being set up by the High-Church party, some of those, who offered to give their voices for their competitors, general Stanhope and sir Henry Dutton Colt, were knocked down and wounded, which obliged many of their party to return home without polling; so the two first candidates had a vast majority. The Whigs expected, that the election of the city of London would balance that of Westminster; and indeed, the first day of the poll, their candidates had a considerable advantage; but such industry was used by the then lord-mayor and the aldermen of the High-Church party, in bringing many citizens upon the livery, and engaging their votes, that upon closing the books, sir William Withers, sir Richard Hoare, sir George Newland, and Mr. John Cass, all four of that party, having the majority of votes, were declared duly elected. After the poll was ended, there were extraordinary rejoicing throughout the city, by illuminations, bon-fires, ringing of bells, &c. and the tumultuous mob were so exalted and enraged against those, who seemed not to partake in the public joy, that they broke all the windows they saw unlighted, without distinction; so that many houses of the church-party were damaged, as well as those of the Whigs, and in particular that of sir Richard Hoare, one of the four, for whose sakes these rejoicings were made. Some days before, the mob was guilty of a still greater instance of outrage; for, as sir Gilbert Heathcote, one of the Whig candidates, and lord-mayor elect, was going out of Guild-hall, they not only insulted him with reproachful language, but one of them spit in his face.

“Though the Tories had boasted, that none of the managers against Dr. Sacheverell would be rechosen members of parliament; yet, notwithstanding the utmost endeavours, that were used to prevent it, sir Joseph Jekyll, sir Peter King, Mr. Lechmere, and Mr. Walpole, were returned; as was also general Stanhope for Cocker-mouth, though he lost his election at Westminster: however, there were few Whigs returned, against whom petitions were not offered; there were in all about a hundred, and, by the first steps after the meeting of the parliament, the majority made it appear, that they intended to clear the House of all who were suspected to be of that party: As for the elections in Scotland, the 16 peers returned were the dukes of Hamilton and Athol; the marquis of Annandale; the earls of Mareschal, Eglington, Mar, Loudoun, Hume, Kinoule, Northeske, Orkney, Roseberry, Ilay; the lord viscount Kelsythe; and the lord Balmerino and Blantyre. And the elections of the Commons were much upon an equal foot between Whigs and Tories.

WM. BROMLEY, Speaker.

Mr. Bromley chosen Speaker.] The Commons went up to the House of Peers to attend her majesty, who was pleased by the Lord Keeper, sir Simon Harcourt, to command them to return to their House and chuse a Speaker. And the House being returned, sir Tho. Hanmer proposed, William Bromley<sup>s</sup>, esq. might be their Speaker; being a gentleman of undoubt-

* The sixteen Scottish peers returned to this parliament were as follow, viz. duke of Hamilton, duke of * Atholl, marquis of * Annandale, earl * Marshal, earl * Eglintoun, earl of Marr, earl of Loudoun, earl of * Hume, earl of * Kinnoule, earl of Northesk, earl of Orkney, earl of Roseberrie, earl of Isla, viscount * Kylesyth, lord * Balmerino, lord * Blantyre. The nine marked with *, were not of the last parliament, but were chosen instead of the nine following, viz. duke of Montross, duke of Roxborough, marquis of Lothian, earl of Crawford, earl of Rothes, earl of Wymess, earl of Leven, earl of Seaford, earl of Glasgow.

ed loyalty and affection to her majesty's person and government, and to all the just rights and prerogatives of the crown; eminent for his true and unaffected zeal for the Protestant Succession in the house of Hanover, and his firm adherence to the church of England as by law established; and one, who, by a long service in parliament, had acquired great experience in the rules and orders of the House, and had also given the world an equal experience of himself, that nothing could ever draw him from the true interests of his country, and was sincerely and heartily affected to the common cause of the present war.—Then Mr. George Pitt said, that Mr. Bromley was so well known to many gentlemen present, and had in former parliaments given so many testimonies of his zeal and affection for the service of the queen, and knight of the Bath. A man of great estate, and highly respected; who was chosen representative in parliament for the university of Oxford, in 1701, and in every succeeding election, till 1727 inclusive. In 1705 his friends proposed him for Speaker of the House of Commons, when party ran extremely high, and he was supported by the Tories; but Mr. Smith carried it by a majority of 44. Though he failed of success, it did not injure his interest either in or out of the House; and, on the change of the ministry, in 1710, when the Whigs were expelled from administration, he was chosen Speaker without opposition. This great leader of the Tory and Jacobite interest, died February 13, 1732, at Baggington. In the reign of queen Anne he had been highly caressed, respected, and honoured: her majesty having called him to the privy council and appointed him secretary of state. In that of George I, he retained his principles. Mr. Bromley was a most respectable character in private life, and of a grave and solemn aspect. He was well known, when a young man, by the publication of his Travels; in which his Jacobitical sentiments were strongly marked. He had the unhappiness of losing his eldest son, and his apparent, Cloberry Bromley, esq. who married Dorothy, daughter of William Bromley, esq. of Hull-castle in the county of Worcester, a family from which descend the barons Mountfort, of Horseheath in Cambridgeshire. This lady re-married John Jenyns, of Hayes in Middlesex, esq." Noble's Continuation of Granger.

"Nov. 25. I was to-day to see the parliament meet; but only saw a great crowd; and Ford and I went to see the tombs at Westminster, and sauntered so long I was forced to go to an eating-house for my dinner. Bromley is chosen Speaker nemine contradicente: Do you understand those two words? And Pompey, colonel Hill's black, designs to stand Speaker for the footmen. I am engaged to use my interest for him, and have spoken to Patrick to get him some votes. We are now all impatient for the queen's speech, what she will say about removing the ministry, &c." Swift's Journal.

country, that it would be vanity in him to pretend to say any thing of his merits; and therefore he should only humbly beg leave to second the motion. Whereupon Mr. Bromley stood up in his place, and acknowledged the great honour, that was done him, to be named for such a station; that he had received many instances of the friendship of those gentlemen, that had proposed him, and to that imputed their entertaining a better opinion of him, than he deserved; but that he was conscious of his own inabilities to execute the same, and so sensible, there were many among them fitter for the chair, that he hoped, they would consult the interest of the public, and their own honour, and chuse a more worthy person. But the House calling upon him to the chair, he was conducted to it by sir Thomas Haumer and Mr. Pitt; and being upon the lower step, repeated his request, that the House would please to excuse him, and chuse a fitter person to be their Speaker: but the House crying, No, no, he said, he hoped, they would then give him leave to intercede with her majesty to excuse him, and command them to make a better choice: And thereupon he sat down in the chair.

The Speaker's Speech on being presented to the Queen.] Nov. 27. Her majesty, being seated on the throne, commanded the gentleman usher of the black rod to let the House of Commons know, it was her pleasure, that they attend her presently, in the House of Peers. Who being come; they presented William Bromley, esq. whom they had chosen to be their Speaker, for her majesty's royal approbation.

Then Mr. Bromley spake as follows: "May it please your most excellent majesty, The knights, citizens, and burgeses of Great Britain, in Parliament assembled, in obedience to your majesty's commands to them to chuse a Speaker, have unanimously elected me to be their Speaker. They have many among them much fitter for this great trust: And therefore, that the public service may not suffer through my want of abilities to discharge it, I am an humble suitor to your majesty, that you will be pleased to excuse my undertaking it, and command the Commons to make a better choice."

Then the Lord Keeper (sir Simon Harcourt*)

* Harcourt was of a family of Norman extraction, the head of which was duc de Harcourt in France. He was son of the valiant sir Simon Harcourt, the first who died in the cause of Charles 1, in Ireland. After studying in Pembroke college, Oxford, he went to the Inner Temple. From 1690 to queen Anne's accession he was member of parliament for Abingdon. Her majesty knighted him in June 1702, and appointed him her solicitor-general; and in April 23, 1707, attorney-general; but for some unknown reason he resigned this office February 12, following, and, singular as it may be, by a voluntary surrender enrolled in court. This act is unprecedented, nor has it been imi-said, "Mr. Bromley, her majesty commands me to tell you, she well approves the choice her Commons have made of you, to be their Speaker. And that she does as little doubt of your ability, as she can of your integrity." Her majesty therefore does not think fit to admit of tated. At the Trial of Dr. Sacheverell, in 1710, he was the leading counsellor in his defence; Dod and Phipps assisted him. 'They freely acknowledged the lawfulness of resistance in extreme cases, and plainly justified the Revolution, and our deliverance by king William; but they said it was not fit in a Sermon to name such an exception; that the duties of morality ought to be delivered in their full extent, without supposing an extraordinary case; and therefore Sacheverell had followed precedents, set by our great divines, ever since the Reformation, and ever since the Revolution.' The queen, desirous of employing sir Simon, recalled him again to the post which he had resigned, made him lord keeper, October 18; and on September 3, 1711, created him baron of Stanton Harcourt, in Oxfordshire; and April 7, 1712, declared him Chancellor. Lord Harcourt being as eminent a person as ever adorned the high station he filled, George 1 prudently made him one of the lords justices until his arrival in England, though he was known to be firmly united to Bolingbroke; however, he supported his majesty and government, and was rewarded for his fidelity by the dignity of a viscount, and appointed a lord of regency, and a privy counsellor. He preserved his reputation unsullied to his death, which happened July 29, 1727, in the 67th year of his age. By the first of his three wives he had Simon, his heir apparent, who dying before his father, Simon his son succeeded to the title, who is ancestor to the earl of Harcourt. Lord Harcourt was a member of the Old Saturday Club. Lord Rivers, Mr. Secretary St. John, Mr. Harley, afterwards lord Oxford, and Swift, met, when Harley had recovered from the wound given him by Guiscard. Swift wrote in 1712; 'I take the agreement of the present ministry to consist of the agreement of three great men, Lord Keeper, Lord Treasurer, and Mr. Secretary St. John, and so I have told them, betwixt jest and earnest, and two of them separately with more seriousness; and I think they entirely love each other: their differences are not of a weight to break their union;' but enraged at lord Harcourt's after joining the Whigs, as he termed them, he afterwards called him a trimmer." Noble's Continuation of Granger.

"Was any man more eminent in his profession than the present lord keeper," [sir Simon Harcourt, afterward lord Harcourt, was made lord keeper upon the resignation of the lord chancellor Cowper], "or more distinguished by his eloquence and great abilities in the House of Commons? and will not his enemies allow him to be fully equal to the great station he now adorns? But then it must be granted, that

Then Mr. Speaker said, "Most gracious Sovereign, since your majesty has not been pleased to allow my excuse, but to approve the choice your Commons have made; it is my duty to submit, and render your majesty my most humble thanks for this great and undeserved favour.—I am very sensible, the only qualities I can pretend to, towards the discharge thereof, are a sincere and steady affection for our happy establishment in Church and State, with an unfeigned zeal and devotion for your majesty's person and government. But since your majesty commands me to this service, I shall humbly hope your majesty will pardon all my involuntary failings, and accept my faithful endeavours. I am persuaded, your majesty will find that you are not disappointed, by confiding in the assurances your good subjects had given your majesty, of their duty and affection; that they have chose such persons to represent them in parliament as will effectually support your majesty against all your enemies; that will soon defeat all artifices to destroy or distress the public credit, and enable your majesty to bring that just and necessary war, in which you are engaged, to a safe, honourable, and speedy conclusion. I do, in their names, humbly present to your majesty their accustomed petitions, for their ancient rights and privileges; particularly, That, for their better attendance on this service, they and their necessary servants may be free, in their persons and estates, from arrests and molestations. That they may have liberty and freedom of speech in their debates. That as often as there shall be occasion, your majesty will vouchsafe them access to your royal person; and, That their proceedings may at all times receive a favourable interpretation, and be free from misconstructions."

Then the Lord Keeper, by her majesty's command, further said, "Mr. Speaker; Her majesty is so fully satisfied of your dutiful affection to her service, that she is pleased to say, she will, on all occasions, make the most favourable construction of all your words and actions, in the execution of your duty. And that, as to the suit you have made in the name of the House of Commons, she is so very well assured of their temper and wisdom, as well as of their loyalty and zeal for the present establishment in church and state, that she readily grants and allows all their privileges, as fully as they have been at any time granted or allowed by any of her royal predecessors."

he is wholly ignorant in the speculative, as well as practical part of polygamy; he knows not how to metamorphose a sober man into a lunatic; he is no freethinker in religion, nor has courage to be patron of an atheistical book, while he is guardian of the queen's conscience. Although, after all, to speak my private opinion, I cannot think these such mighty objections to his character as some would pretend." Swift's Examiner, No. 27.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen; I have, by calling this parliament, made appear the confidence I place in the duty and affection of my subjects: And I meet you here with the greatest satisfaction; having no reason to doubt but that I shall find such returns as will add new life to our friends, and entirely disappoint the hopes of our enemies.—To this end, I shall recommend to you what is absolutely necessary for our common safety.—The carrying on the war in all its parts, but particularly in Spain, with the utmost vigour, is the likeliest means, with God's blessing, to procure a safe and honourable peace for us and all our allies, whose support and interest I have truly at heart.—For this purpose, I must ask from you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, the necessary Supplies for the next year's service: And let me put you in mind, that nothing will add so much to their efficacy as unanimity and dispatch.—I cannot without great concern mention to you, that the Navy and other Offices are burdened with heavy Debts, which so far affect the public service, that I most earnestly desire you to find some way to answer those demands, and to prevent the like for the time to come; the justice of parliament, in satisfying former engagements, being the certain way for preserving and establishing national credit.—I am sensibly touched with what my people suffer by this long and expensive war; to which when it shall please God to 'put an end, the flourishing condition of my subjects shall be as much my care, as their safety is at present.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen; The eyes of both friends and enemies are upon you. The way to give spirit to the one, and to defeat the restless malice of the other, is to proceed in such manner as becomes a British parliament.—I shall, in the plainest words, tell you my intentions; and I do this with the greater satisfaction, because I depend upon their being agreeable to you.—I am resolved to support and encourage the Church of England, as by law established: To preserve the British constitution, according to the Union: And to maintain the Indulgence by law allowed to scrupulous consciences. And, that all these may be transmitted to posterity, I shall employ none but such as are heartily for the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover; the interest of which family no person can be more truly concerned for than myself.—These are my resolutions; and your concurrence with me in a steady pursuit of them, will best manifest your zeal for our religion, for the interest of our country, for your own safety, and for my honour."

cious and excellent Speech on opening this parliament; and particularly for the great confidence your majesty is pleased to place in the duty and affection of your subjects.—We conceive it to be of the highest importance to carry on the war with vigour in all its parts, and particularly in Spain, in order to procure a safe and honourable peace; and, your majesty may be assured, we shall concur in all reasonable methods to that end. And, we humbly hope, your majesty's great example will engage all your allies to join with your majesty in doing their utmost to the same purpose.—We have the happiness to agree entirely with your majesty, in the several resolutions you have declared so plainly and affectionately to your parliament; and we think ourselves obliged to repeat our thanks, for your majesty's great care to transmit the blessings of your reign to posterity, by securing the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover.—We cannot also but have a particular satisfaction in the assurances your majesty has given, to maintain and encourage the church of England as by law established; which is the firmest support of the monarchy, and the strongest defence against popery.—We have no more to add,* but that we shall carefully endeavour, in all our consultations, to proceed with that unanimity and dispatch as may give the greatest weight to them: and to assure your majesty, that nothing shall be wanting on our part; to satisfy the world, that, with an unshaken zeal, we will constantly defend your majesty's royal person, honour, and dignity, on which our safety and happiness so much depend."

"My Lords; I am very glad to find I have

* "The queen, in her Speech, took no notice of the successes of this campaign, as she had always done in her former speeches; and instead of promising to maintain the Toleration, she said she would maintain the Indulgence granted by law to scrupulous consciences; this change of phrase into Sacheverell's language was much observed. The Lords made an Address of an odd composition to her, which shewed it was not drawn by those, who had penned their former Addresses: instead of promising, that they would do all that was possible, they only promised to do all that was reasonable, which seemed to import a limitation, as if they had apprehended, that unreasonable things might be asked of them: And the conclusion was in a very cold strain of rhetoric; they ended with saying, 'They had no more to add.' The Commons were more hearty in their Address; and in the end of it, they reflected on some late practices against the church and state. There were few Whigs returned, against whom petitions were not offered; there were in all about 100; and by the first steps, the majority made it appear, that they intended to clear the House of all, who were suspected to be Whigs." Burnet.

your concurrence in the resolutions I declared to you; and give you thanks for this Address, so full of affection to me, and zeal for the public good."

The Commons' Resolution for an Address.]

Nov. 29. The Speaker reported the Queen's Speech to the House, whereupon it was unanimously resolved, "That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, to return the humble thanks of the House for her majesty's most gracious Speech from the throne; and assure her majesty, that this House would heartily concur in all the particulars, which her majesty had been pleased to recommend: That this House would effectually and speedily grant the necessary supplies for a vigorous carrying on the war, till such a peace might be obtained, as her majesty should judge to be safe and honourable for her subjects, and all her allies; that this House would preserve and establish the public credit, and in all respects answer the expectation of those they represented, and show how justly her majesty had confided in the duty and affection of her people."—This Resolution being taken,

Sir Thomas Haumer moved, "That in the said Address, they should represent to her majesty, that the most effectual way to give spirit to her friends, and defeat the restless malice of her enemies, would be by discountenancing all persons of such principles, and avoiding all measures of such tendency, as might weaken her majesty's title and government:" this motion occasioned a small debate, in which

Mr. Lechmere said, "That they ought likewise humbly to caution her majesty against such measures and principles, as might weaken the settlement of the crown in the illustrious House of Hanover, and advance the hopes of the Pretender." No member offering to second Mr. Lechmere,

Mr. Harley, Chancellor of the Exchequer, stood up and said, "That though the Protestant Succession was already sufficiently established and secured by several acts of parliament, so that it seemed needless to add any thing to them; yet, since a motion was made in favour of the illustrious House of Hanover, it would look strange both at home and abroad, the same should drop." Whereupon it was resolved, That the Clause offered by Mr. Lechmere should be inserted in the Address; which was done accordingly.

The Commons' Address.] Nov. 30. Sir Thomas Haumer reported the said Address, which was as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign; We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain, in parliament assembled, do joyfully appear before your majesty, to return our most humble thanks for your most gracious Speech from the throne. We bring the thanks of your whole people, whom your majesty has made happy by that confidence, you have been pleased to place in their duty and affection; and we bring our own most solemn assurances, that we will make all such returns, as shall convince your majesty, that your confidence has not been misplaced.—We are satisfied, we lie under all possible obligations, both from our duty to your majesty, and the care we owe to our country, effectually and speedily to grant the necessary supplies, for a vigorous prosecution of the war in all its parts, and especially in Spain. This we shall study to do in such a manner, as may best answer the public service, and be most easy to those we represent; and the same we shall continue to do, till such a peace may be obtained, as your majesty, in your royal wisdom, shall judge to be safe and honourable for your subjects, and all your allies.—We have no reason to doubt of your majesty's care in every thing, that concerns the interest and welfare of your people; but we think ourselves obliged, in justice to our fellow-subjects, and in order to make them bear with greater cheerfulness the burthens, we shall find necessary to lay upon them, most humbly to beseech your majesty, that you will please to continue your powerful influences with all your Allies, that they may exert themselves in the common cause with Resolutions equal, and aids proportionable, to ours.—The burden of those heavy debts, which presses your people with so sensible a weight, is in some measure alleviated by your princely compassion. We shall endeavour to trace the source of this great evil, and to apply a remedy suitable to it. The honour and justice of parliament shall by us be inviolably maintained, and all such other measures pursued, by which the public credit may be preserved, and established.—Your faithful Commons are truly sensible of your majesty's wisdom and goodness in those resolutions, which you have declared; and do most heartily concur in all, which you have been pleased to recommend to them.—We return your majesty our most humble thanks for the firm assurances you have given, both by your words, and by your actions, of supporting and encouraging the Church of England, as by law established.—As we are true sons of that Church, we cannot but be tenderly concerned for its prosperity, and for its honour; and are by affection, and principle, inclined to secure its doctrine, discipline, and worship.—As we are fellow-Christians, and fellow-subjects, with those Protestant Dissenters, who are so unhappy to entertain scruples against conformity with our Church, we are desirous, and determined, to let them quietly enjoy that indulgence, which the law hath allowed them.—As we are Britons, it is our common interest, and shall be our joint endeavour, to preserve that Union between the parts of Great-Britain, on which the safety of the whole depends.—As we are lovers of our excellent constitution both in Church and State, and solicitous, that our posterity may be as happy in all future ages, as we hope long to continue under your majesty's most auspicious reign, we shall always steadily adhere to the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover, and be most watchful to prevent any danger, which may threaten that settlement, so necessary for the preservation of our religion, laws, and liberties.—These are ends, truly worthy your majesty's pursuit: And we do with all humility represent to your majesty, that the most effectual way to give spirit to your friends, and defeat the restless malice of your enemies, will be, by discountenancing all persons of such principles, and avoiding all measures of such tendency, as may weaken your majesty's title and government, the settlement of the crown in the illustrious House of Hanover, and advance the hopes of the Pretender, and all other principles, and measures, that have lately threatened your royal crown and dignity, and which, whenever they prevail, will prove fatal to our whole constitution both in Church and State.”

“Gentlemen; I am extremely well pleased with your Address; and I fully depend upon the assurances, you give me, of your concurring in all the particulars I have recommended to you.—You may depend upon my care to encourage those, whose principles are agreeable to our constitution in church and state.”

Controverted Elections—Bewdley Charter.] Dec. 15. The Commons spent most of the intermediate time on a great many Petitions about controverted elections, the most remarkable of which was in relation to the return of Bewdley in the county of Worcester: and previous to the hearing of the merits of that election, the Commons resolved to present an Address to the queen, That the several Papers relating to the Charter of the said borough, might be laid before the House: and to bespeak the favour of the Commons for Mr. Wainington, the following Speech made in the House near two years before, against the new Charter of Bewdley, was published and dispersed.

Sir J. Packington's Speech respecting the Bewdley-Charter.] Sir John Packington said: “Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to have troubled you this session, and I believe it will be to little purpose now: For if a gentleman stands up to complain of grievances, although this House meets in order to redress them, he is represented as a person that obstructs her majesty's business; if he finds fault with the ministry, he is said to reflect upon the queen; if he speaks against the continuance of the war, to prevent the beggary of the nation, to prevent the moneyed and military men becoming lords of us who have the lands, then he is to be no object of her majesty's favour and encouragement. This, Sir, is the passage we are brought to, and this is the freedom of speech you were pleased to ask for at the opening of this Session, and which of right belongs to every member of this House. I remember the time, when such restraints as these would not have been suffered or endured; but we are under arbitrary, ministerial power; and if ever there was an instance of it, it is in this that is now before us: But, how great soever the discouragements are to freedom of speech, I think myself obliged, as an English gentleman, who never will comply with an arbitrary ministry; as a member of this House, who have been always zealous to support the constitution of parliaments; as a neighbour to this borough in the case now before us, to speak my mind with that warmth I used to do, when the liberties of my country, or any part of it, seemed to be touched. For though the injury may be felt but by one single man, or one single society of men; yet the terror, the concern, and consequence of it, reaches unto all. We have had a fact this day of dangerous tendency laid before us, of a new Charter forced upon an ancient corporation, at the single instance of a noble lord, without a surrender of the old, contrary to law, to reason, and the right of the members thereof; which they refused to accept, as being inconsistent to their former Charter of king James the 1st, and, as they conceived, void in itself; since it is impossible for two Charters, any more than two grants, or two leases, to have a being at the same time. Ever since the Revolution, every thing has been transacted in this corporation pursuant to the Charter of king James the 1st, the right of the bailiff and burgesses, affirmed by judgment in the Queen's-bench, until this new corporation was erected by this unprecedented Charter, which the old was so far from consenting should pass, that they opposed it, by entering caveats in all the offices, and by shewing that it was contrary to her majesty's intention, expressed in the warrant.—Thus, Mr. Speaker, have you seen the prerogative enlarged and extended farther, I will be bold to say, than it was in the unhappy reign before the Revolution. Every gentleman remembers how highly things of this nature were resented in king James's time, when court-arts were used to wheedle and terrify boroughs into a surrender of their Charters; and when they found that method would not do, they endeavoured to take them away under colour of legal process, by bringing quo warranto's against them: This was then thought dangerous to the constitution; and very well it might, for the people of England could expect no other fruit from such a proceeding, but that this House would be filled with men of the army, with men of desperate fortunes, with pensioners, with vassals of the court, with slaves of the ministry, and with all those servile sort of gentlemen, that give with one hand to receive with the other, and thereby betray those they represent to arbitrary power: But this instance now before us, is more new and dangerous than taking away Charters by surrender or quo warranto's; those methods made some noise, alarmed the free people of England, and you see what came of it. But this is a quicker, a more silent method of doing it, which like white powder, destroys the liberty of the people, and subverts the constitution of this House without noise or notice. I beg, gentlemen, you would consider all the circumstances with which this Charter was attended, and I am sure, you cannot reflect upon them without grief. First, as to the time, you have heard, sir, how the Great-Seal of England was affixed to this Charter, upon the 22d of April 1708, the very same day, there was an Order made in Council to issue out writs, for calling that parliament. In this critical juncture was this corporation erected, I will not scruple saying, to serve the arbitrary designs of those who are afraid of a free election, who are afraid of a free and un-influenced parliament: such a parliament would scorn to flatter great men, would inquire into miscarriages, and punish such as were faulty; would call those ministers to an account who should prevail with the queen to turn men of ability and consideration out of place and employment for acting upon principles of honour and conscience, and doing their duty in this House. Another evil consequence with which this Charter is attended is, that so many new electors, and a new returning officer, are created by it, to the infringement of the liberty of the subject, and making all elections, in a manner, depend upon the will of the prince. I hope, gentlemen, you will seriously consider this matter, that you will lay aside all thoughts of party in this cause; for, if it be in the power of the crown to dissolve old corporations, and erect new, in so exorbitant a manner, we may bid adieu to liberty and property, and to all that has cost so much blood and treasure to maintain and defend; there will be no difference between a parliament of Great Britain and a parliament of Paris.—I hope, once more, gentlemen, you will seriously consider how much the honour and justice of this house is concerned in the determination of the case now before you. The eyes of the people have been some time opened; they will observe, they will judge of our votings in this cause; and expect from us, as we have put a stop to unjust and exorbitant power abroad, that we should neither suffer nor endure it at home."

The new Charter of Bewdley voted void and illegal.] Dec. 18. The Commons ordered the clerk of the crown to attend the next morning with the last return for the borough of Bewdley, by which Anthony Lechmere, esq. was returned, and also with the returns of Mr. Herbert, now lord Herbert, and Mr. Cornwall, to serve for the said borough; and having the next day, fully heard the merits of the election for the said borough, resolved, 1. "That Salway Winnington, esq. was duly elected. 2. That the charter dated the 20th of April 1708, attempted to be imposed upon the borough of Bewdley, against the consent of the ancient corporation, was void, illegal, and destructive of the constitution of parliament. 3. That an Address be presented to the queen, laying before her majesty the Resolution of the House, and desiring, that she would give directions to her Attorney General to take the proper methods for repealing the said Charter, and for quieting the said borough in their enjoyment of their rights and privileges."

On the 23rd both Houses adjourned to the 2nd of January, 1711; on which day, Secretary St. John acquainted the Commons "That pursuant to their Address of the 13th of December last, the queen had directed Mr. Attorney General and Mr. Solicitor-General to take the most proper and effectual measures for repealing the Charter of Bewdley, mentioned in the said Address; as also that her majesty had given directions to the proper officers to lay before the House accounts of prosecutions ordered by, or carried on at the expence of the crown, &c. according to the desire of this House in their Address of the 22d of December last."

Motion for returning Thanks to the Duke of Marlborough dropped.] On the same day the Address was voted in the Lords, the earl of Scarborough having made a motion, that the Thanks of the House be returned to the Duke, some objections were raised against it; and his grace's friends being apprehensive, that if the question were put upon it, the negative might carry it, said, it would be time enough to speak of that matter when the Duke was come home; whereupon the House was adjourned. The next day, there was a Complaint made by a noble peer, against the Lord Keeper, for taking upon him to introduce the Scotch Lords to the queen, being himself no peer by patent: but the Lord Keeper excusing his mistake, if he had committed any, with a great deal of modesty; and on the other hand, the late Lord Chancellor maintaining that he had right to act as he had done, no farther notice was taken of it.

Queen's Message concerning the War in Spain.] January 2, 1711. This day, the following Message was presented to the Lords:

"Her majesty having received notice that there has been an Action in Spain, very much to the disadvantage of king Charles's affairs; which having fallen particularly on the British forces, the queen immediately gave directions for sending and procuring troops to repair this loss.—Her majesty acquaints this House with this intelligence, and likewise with her orders given thereupon; not doubting but the parliament will approve thereof,* and concur in their assistance for remedying so great a misfortune."

The Lords' Address thereon.] Upon this their lordships presented the following Address:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, return our most humble thanks to your majesty, for your gracious message relating to the present state of affairs in Spain; and for the orders your majesty has been pleased to give for sending troops of your own, and exciting your allies to send some of theirs in due time, in order to repair this loss: and, as this misfortune may have been occa-

sioned by some preceding mismanagement, we take the liberty to assure your majesty, we will use our utmost endeavours to discover it, so as to prevent the like for the future.—And such is the confidence we have in your majesty's great prudence and care, that we humbly assure your majesty, we will, to the utmost, give all the assistance in our power, to recover the ill condition of those affairs, and to support the war against the common enemy, in all places where your majesty in your wisdom shall think it necessary, for the obtaining an honourable and lasting peace; in the concluding of which, we entirely rely upon your majesty."

The Queen's Answer.] To which Address her majesty returned this Answer:

"That her majesty took very kindly the Address of this House, and doth not doubt of the Lords hearty concurrence in supporting a War of so great importance as this is."

First Debate in the House of Lords on the War in Spain.] Jan. 4. The Lords having resolved to enquire into the Management of Affairs in Spain, their lordships, upon a motion made by the duke of Beaufort, made application to the queen to stay, for some days, the earl of Peterborough's Journey to Vienna, that they might make use of such lights and informations as he was able to give them, concerning those affairs. Accordingly, the earl of Peterborough, who designed to have set out the next day, having for that purpose sent part of his servants and his equipage to Greenwich, was countermanded; and the peers having, on the 5th, taken the Affairs of Spain into consideration, the earl of Abingdon, chairman of the committee of the whole House, put severally five Questions to the earl of Peterborough; * to

"This nobleman in his youth served under the admirals Torrington and Narborough in the Mediterranean against the state of Algiers; and distinguished himself at Tangiers, in Africa, when it was besieged by the Moors. Disliking the proceedings of the court in the which his lordship returned distinct answers, containing the substance of the facts and passages published, some years before, by Dr. Friend, a physician, who attended his lordship in Spain, in a book, entitled, "An Account of the earl of Peterborough's Conduct," &c. wherein his lordship's management is justified and highly extolled; not without some reflections on the conduct of the other generals in reign of James the second, he was among the first of the English nobility who engaged in the prince of Orange's service, and was one of those, as bishop Burnet relates, whom that prince chiefly trusted, and by whose advice he was principally directed. Being instrumental therefore in promoting the Revolution, on the accession of king William he was appointed one of the lords of the bedchamber, first lord commissioner of the treasury, and in 1689 had the additional dignity of earl of Monmouth. In 1699 he served under that monarch during the campaign in Flanders. By queen Anne in 1705, his lordship was declared general and commander in chief of the forces sent to Spain and joint admiral of the fleet with sir Cloudesley Shovel. His conduct in this expedition obtained the thanks of the House of Peers for his great and eminent services. In 1710-11 he was employed as ambassador at Turin and other Italian courts, and in 1713 was installed a knight companion of the order of the garter. In the reign of George the first he was constituted general of all the marine forces in Great Britain; and had the same commission continued by George the second. Having made a voyage to Lisbon, from the declining state of his health, he died there in Oct. 1735, aged seventy-seven.

"His lordship was a man of frolic. Richardson in his Anecdotes says, the great earl of Peterborough, who had much sense, much wit, and much whim, leaped out of his chariot one day, on seeing a dancing-master with pearl-coloured silk stockings, lightly stepping over the broad stones, and picking his way in very dirty weather, and ran after him with his sword drawn, in order to drive him into the mud, but into which he of course followed himself. This facetious nobleman was once taken by the mob for the duke of Marlborough, who was then in disgrace with them; and being about to be roughly treated by these friends to summary justice, he addressed them in these words: 'Gentlemen, I can convince you by two reasons that I am not the duke. In the first place, I have only five guineas in my pocket; and in the second, they are heartily at your service.' So throwing his purse among them, he pursued his way amid loud acclamations and huzzas.

"Dr. Freind, in his Account of lord Peterborough's Conduct in Spain, says he never ordered off a detachment of a hundred men, without going with them himself. Of his own courage his lordship used to say, that it proceeded from his not knowing his danger; agreeing in Spain and Portugal, particularly, the earl of Galway's.

After this, the Lords ordered the earl of Galway, and the lord Tyrawley, (formerly known under the name of sir Charles O'Hara) to appear before them the next day, which they did accordingly; and the first having a chair appointed for him without the bar, by reason of his infirmities, was desired by the chairman to give the Lords an Account of what he knew concerning the affairs of Spain. The earl of Galway having excused his deficiency in not expressing himself so properly as he could wish in the English Tongue, gave the Lords an ingenuous Account of his Conduct, from his first setting out for Portugal, till the time he was recalled; with which their lordships appeared to be well satisfied: and as he said, his memory might have failed him in several important particulars, he desired that he might be allowed to give in writing, what he had delivered by word of mouth, which was readily granted.

As for the lord Tyrawley, being desired to say what he knew about the same affairs, and not knowing the drift of such an enquiry, but rather suspecting his own reputation might be concerned, his lordship stood upon the reserve, and said, That when he was in the army he kept no register, and carried neither pen nor ink about him, but only a sword, which he used the best he could upon occasion; and that all he knew, in general, was, that they always acted according to the Resolutions of the Councils of War.

The lords Galway and Tyrawley being withdrawn, several peers, particularly the earls of Wharton and Godolphin, the lord Halifax and some others, spoke in favour of my lord Galway; and among the rest,

The Duke of Marlborough said, That it was somewhat strange, that generals who had acted to the best of their understandings, and had lost their limbs in the service, should be examined like offenders, about insignificant things.

After a short debate, the Lords adjourned to the Monday following, when the earl of Galway delivered his Narrative in writing, as did also the earl of Peterborough the Recapitulation of his Answers, with several other papers.

January 9. The House of Peers being sat, in order to resume the consideration of the Affairs of Spain, the duke of Devonshire moved that Dr. Friend might be summoned to attend, which was ordered. There being a great many strangers in the House, opinion with Turenne, that a coward had only one of the three faculties of the mind—apprehension. The remittances expected from England not coming to his troops when he commanded in Spain, he is said to have supplied them for some time with money from his own pocket." Park's enlarged Edition of Orford's Noble Authors, vol. 4, p. 163.

The Earl of Godolphin moved, That the House might be cleared : but

The Duke of Buckingham opposed it, saying, That he supposed those strangers were brought in by the members themselves, and therefore were under the protection of the House; that it might afterwards be moved, that the Lords eldest sons should also go out, though they had as much right to stand behind the throne, as the Lords to sit where they sat; that he had, himself, enjoyed that privilege, and wished himself to be young enough to be amongst them.—Hereupon it was carried, that the strangers that had been placed in the gallery, should be suffered to stay. The preliminary about strangers being over,

The Duke of Buckingham said, he hoped that business would not take up so much of their time as it had done two or three years before.

The Earl of Scarborough said, That the principal point which they ought to take into their consideration, and strictly examine into, were the Council of War held in Valencia, the 15th of January, 1707, N. S. and the joining of the troops brought by the earl of Rivers, with those under the command of the earl of Galway. After this the earl of Wharton moved, Whether the earl of Galway's Memorial should be read in the House, or in the Committee; and the earl Ferrers saying, It was more proper to read it in the Committee; it was agreed it should be so; and the earl of Peterborough having desired, that his Recapitulation might also be read in the Committee, the same was granted. After this the House adjourned during pleasure, and resolved into a Committee of the whole House, of which the earl of Abingdon was chosen chairman as before.

It being known that the Queen desired to hear this memorable Debate incognito, the same did not begin till her majesty was come, that is, about a quarter past two in the afternoon. Hereupon, the duke of Buckingham moved, That the earl of Galway's Paper might be read; and the chairman having ordered the clerk to read it accordingly, the earl of Peterborough renewed the instances he had made before, that the lord Galway might be asked some Questions, and that he and the lord Tyrawley might be called in: but the lord Cowper said, That it was not proper to ask the lord Galway any questions, till the earl of Peterborough's Narrative had been read in his presence, which was agreed to. Hereupon the earl of Peterborough said, that to avoid all mistakes, he desired his paper might not be called a Narrative, which might look like an accusation, for he accused nobody; but only a Recapitulation of his Answers.

THE EARL OF GALWAY'S NARRATIVE.

After this, the clerk read the earl of Galway's* Narrative, being as follows:

* "Son of the ambassador from France to Charles 2, and who also came over to England, in 1685, to solicit pardon for his great nephew

"In obedience to your lordships' commands, I present you with a short Narrative in writing, containing the most material occurrences that happened in Portugal and Spain, during the unfortunate lord Russell. On the Revolution Henry and his brother offered their services in Ireland. William wished to decline them, because their father, the old marquis of Rouvigny, dying, he was conscious that the French court would deprive him of his patrimonial inheritance; but he was so partial to the king, as a military prince, that he despised the loss of his estates. His gallantry in Ireland, where his brother fell at the battle of the Boyne, was rewarded with the title of earl of Galway. William afterwards sent him to Italy, to fight under the duke of Savoy: but that sovereign withdrawing from the confederacy, he returned, and was made commander in chief in Ireland. Queen Anne appointed him generalissimo of the British army in Spain and Portugal, where he was at first very successful: but the battle of Almanza, fought April 25, 1712, produced a reverse of fortune that rendered the Austrian cause hopeless. The duke of Berwick, James 2's illegitimate son, general of the French army, opposed to him, desirous of compelling him to fight to disadvantage, sent two Irishmen as deserters, who told Galway that the duke of Orleans was coming with 12,000 men to join Berwick to force him to fight: Galway fell into the snare, and immediately attacked the enemy, when he did all that skill and gallantry could effect; but as his soldiers were exhausted by the fatigue of marching three Spanish leagues in the heat of the day, previous to the battle, the French army obtained a complete victory. The English were greatly exasperated with the earl, who had superseded the skilful and intrepid Peterborough. Neither the inferiority of numbers, the fatigue of troops, or the gallantry he displayed, could compensate the defeat. He did not stand alone in the public indignation, but he was most blamed by the parliament. Swift says, that some friend of his published a four shilling pamphlet in his defence. The queen wished him to accept a diplomatic situation, but he declined it, as improper both from his age and the difference of his former and opposite pursuits, though it is evident he had been at Turin in the double capacity of general and plenipotentiary.

"It does great credit to the duke of Marlborough that he vindicated this unfortunate general in the House of Lords, saying, "it was somewhat strange that generals who had acted to the best of their understanding, and had lost their limbs in that service, should be examined like offenders about insignificant things." He had not only been badly wounded in the face at Almanza, but at the siege of Badajoz had lost one of his hands, after which he calmly continued to give orders for two hours. Galway deserved a better fate. The violent Swift accuses him of severity in Ireland, and for having compelled the earl of Kildare to give up be time I had the honour to command the queen's troops there.

"In June, 1704, being retired in the country, received the queen's commands to attend her majesty at Windsor, where she was pleased to order me to go and take upon me the command of her troops in Portugal. I desired to be excused from accepting an employment which I did not think myself equal to, but the queen seeming fixed in her Resolution, I obeyed.—Upon my arrival at Lisbon, I found the two kings of Spain and Portugal already marching for Abeira, and joined their rout. But the season was much advanced, and it being thought impracticable to attack the enemy there, it was soon resolved to retire into winter-quarters.—The troops being in quarters, I went to Lisbon, where I had certain advice that Gibraltar was besieged, and Mareschal Thesse gone thither; upon which, considering the importance of the place, I immediately went to the prince of Hesse (governor there) our of the best regiments of foot under my command, viz. the battalion of guards, my lord Barrimore's, lord Donnegall's, and lord Montoy's; together with a large supply of ammunition and provisions, which the garrison wanted extremely. This relief arrived in good time, and proved so successful, as not only to defend the place, but to hold out a siege that entirely tired the enemy's infantry, and prevented their being able to take the field the following spring in Alentejo.—Being informed of their condition, as likewise that there was but a very small garrison in Badajoz, I endeavoured to persuade the Portuguese to attack that place, but could not then prevail; however, they took Valencia de Alcantara by storm, and Albuquerque by capitulation, under the command of the Conde das Galveas, and afterwards retired to quarters of refreshment, as is usual in the excessive heats of the summer.

"During this interval I went to Lisbon to confer with the earl of Peterborough. I found the king of Spain designed to embark with him; and not doubting but the earl was bound upon some important expedition, though I had no orders to that purpose, and had now only one regiment of horse, two of dragoons, and five of foot left under my command in Portugal, I offered him whatever part of these troops he pleased to desire. The earl accepted of my offer, and chose the royal regiment of dragoons, and Cunningham's, taking likewise an order with him from me to the governor of Gibraltar, for such regiments from thence as he should think fit to take on board, leaving only a sufficient garrison for the defence of the his office of comptroller of the musters, granted him by Charles 2, worth 300*l.* for a pension of 300*l.* but this seems only party spleen. He was distinguished with the character of a most gallant and skilful general; possessing eminent virtue, great piety, and zeal for religion. In his manners he was simple, and unaffected in his dress."

town, and accordingly his lordship took from thence those four regiments, which I had sent thither to the relief of the place.

"After the king of Spain and my lord Peterborough were sailed, with great difficulty I prevailed upon the Portuguese to besiege Badajoz in autumn; but, instead of taking the field, as we had agreed to do, in the beginning of September, it was the 2nd of October before I could get them to invest the place, under the command of the marquis das Minas. Our cannon had already begun to play, with success, when an accident happened in a battery, which I went to repair; and, being there to give the necessary orders for that purpose, I lost my arm by a cannon-shot from the town; but it is the general opinion, that if the deposition which I put in writing the very morning the misfortune happened to me, and proposed to a council of war, where the same was agreed to, had been duly executed, Mareschal Thesse could never have relieved the place, which must necessarily have fallen into our hands in a very few days.

"Not long after the siege was raised, news came of the surrender of Barcelona to king Charles, and about a month after, that Mareschal Thesse had marched with the best part of the forces, quartered on the frontier of Portugal, in order to join the duke of Anjou and besiege Barcelona again.—Upon this I resolved to propose to the Portuguese to march to Madrid, concluding, that either the duke of Anjou would, by this means, be obliged to quit the siege of Barcelona, or else that we could meet with no opposition in our way. For this purpose I took a journey to Lisbon, even while my wound, upon the cutting off my arm, was still open, and had such success with the king of Portugal that his troops took the field the following spring, by the 26th of March, N. S. under the command of the marquis das Minas, with intention to besiege Alcantara, and march that way for Madrid. Mean time the duke of Berwick, who had been sent to command on the frontier of Portugal in Mareschal Thesse's stead, had thrown ten regiments of foot into Badajoz, and marched with seven more, and a body of 4,000 horse towards Alcantara, in order to reinforce that garrison by the addition of those seven regiments, which he accordingly left there, and then came back to Brocas with his cavalry; where we surprized him, beat his rearguard, pursued him a considerable way, and took possession of the castle of Brocas; in which place we left a garrison to cover our foragers, during the time that we should lie before Alcantara.

"After this, we continued our march to Alcantara, which surrendered to us in a very few days; we took ten good battalions prisoners of war there, and found about sixty pieces of cannon in the place, with great store of small arms and ammunition.—After the surrender of Alcantara, we crossed the Tagus there, and having taken in some places of small note upon our march and forced a pass at Massagone, where the enemy had entrenched themselves, we advanced as far as the bridge of Almaraz. —But here the Portuguese resolved unanimously to return home again, notwithstanding all the arguments the generals of the Allies could offer to the contrary, which happened very unfortunately; for had the army marched directly from thence to Madrid, in all probability we must have arrived there at the same time with the news of the duke of Anjou's being returned to France; the dutchess must have been obliged to escape alone; and the tribunals being still there, it is very likely the war would have been over.—Some of the Portuguese were willing to go back and besiege Badajoz, which was entirely laying aside all thoughts of Madrid, but others were for attacking Ciudad Rodrigo, and by joining with these, I engaged them, after the taking of that place, to go to Madrid. But the time, which was lost on this occasion, had given the duke of Anjou an opportunity of retiring from France to Madrid, from whence he withdrew the court, and all the tribunals, before our army could reach that place; so, upon our arrival there, we found Madrid an open village; and the troops having been extremely weakened by so long a march, were not above 4,000 horse and 8 or 10,000 foot.—The Portuguese generals, and those of the Allies, thought it highly necessary the king of Spain should come to Madrid, as soon as possible; for besides the advantage his presence might have been to his own affairs, it was of the last importance to us to be immediately joined by the forces with the king, and under the earl of Peterborough's command; not being strong enough, without them, to attack the duke of Anjou; who had already received some succours from France. Besides the 5,500 horse and 8,000 foot, of which the duke of Burwick's army consisted, after he had been joined by the Conde de la Torres.

“Being perfectly informed of the enemy's strength and motions, and having great reasons to believe that if we were joined in time by all the forces with the king and the earl of Peterborough, we might, in this favourable conjuncture, drive the duke of Anjou entirely out of Spain, make ourselves absolute masters of that kingdom, and put an end to an expensive war: All the while we lay at Madrid and Guadalaxara I dispatched every day one or more expresses, and the greatest part of them officers, with letters to the king of Spain, and to my lord Peterborough, representing to them both the importance of our being joined forthwith, and earnestly desiring that no time might be lost in improving so critical a juncture.

“As the next best means to advise our friends of our arrival at Madrid, the first Gazette day, after we got thither, I caused it to be published in the Gazette, that we were there, and expected, in a very few days, to be joined by the king and the earl of Peterborough, hoping that the natural curiosity of the Spaniards would give a printed newspaper a free passage. —But notwithstanding all the diligence that was used in this matter, on our part, near six weeks were elapsed at Madrid and Guadalaxara, before we received any advice that the king was upon his march to join us; and, in the mean time, the duke of Anjou's army was so much increased by daily reinforcements from several parts, that he was now become superior in number to us, even after we were joined by those forces which the king and my lord Peterborough brought along with them.—And I must say that it is the general opinion, and I do verily believe, as the Portuguese lost one fair opportunity of putting an end to the war, by not marching directly from the bridge of Almaraz to Madrid, so we now lost another, for want of being joined in time by the forces under the command of the king of Spain and the earl of Peterborough.

“And, whereas the noble lord is pleased to aver, that he never received any advice from me of my arrival at Madrid with the Portuguese: and, as an argument of my neglect of him on that subject, produces an instance of one officer, that happened to pass through his quarters with letters from me to the king, and none for his lordship; I am obliged to observe, that I gave this officer an hundred pistoles, and ordered him to go directly to the king of Spain, who then lay at Saragossa; but he was accidentally forced to go out of his way, to avoid one of the enemy's parties, which was the true occasion of his passing through the earl of Peterborough's quarters at Valencia, contrary to his first intention. But several other officers, who were dispatched by me to the earl, assured me they had the honour to deliver him those letters which I wrote to his lordship from Guadalaxara; and even taking the fact to be as the earl of Peterborough is pleased to state it himself, it is plain his lordship had, at least, some verbal informations from that very officer who passed through his lordship's quarters, and consequently could not be altogether ignorant, either of the place where the Portuguese army lay, or of the necessity of joining them, without loss of time.

“After the general had got king Charles proclaimed at Madrid, it was thought fit to advance to Guadalaxara; where he had, at last, advice, that the king was coming to join us, and at the same time were informed, that the duke of Anjou was at Guadalaxara, to which place we marched to prevent the enemy from intercepting the king. Upon our approach, the duke of Anjou repassed the river, which little advantage we contented ourselves with, for it was not thought advisable to follow, and attack him on the other side, being advantageously posted and stronger than we.—We stayed here two days, and when we thought the king was out of danger, we again retired to Guadalaxara, where we were joined by his majesty and my lord Peterborough, with two regiments of Spanish dragoons, and part of Pearce's, for his lordship had left behind him in several places, thirteen battalions of English foot, with the remainder of Pearce's, and two other earture regiments of dragoons. So soon as the armies were joined (having, upon my arrival at Madrid, sent captain Montague to give the queen an account of our march, and to desire her majesty's leave to retire) I waited upon my lord Peterborough, offering him the command of the English, and to receive his orders, till I should have the queen's leave to go home; but because the marquis das Minas would not do so too, my lord Peterborough chose not to stay with the army, and within a few days after went away.—The king resolved, by advice of the general officers, to go to Clincon, where all things necessary for the army were found in great plenty. But the season being far advanced, a council was held about taking winter quarters, where it was agreed to be by no means safe to caution on that side the Tagus, for fear of losing all communication with the sea; besides, the country was so open, the troops could not be divided without danger.

“For these reasons, after having stayed at Clincon about three weeks, though the army had forage and provisions for as many more, it was agreed forthwith to cross the Tagus, lest the approaching rains should render the fords impracticable; nor was there a possibility of taking winter quarters so commodiously as in the kingdom of Valencia, where the situation of the country rendered us secure against any attempts from a superior army.—This resolution was put in practice, and we made our retreat in good order, notwithstanding all the interruption the enemy were able to give us, and were obliged at Yniesta to cross the river in sight of all their cavalry.—Whilst the army was in quarters, my lord Peterborough came back from Italy; and whereas it has been suggested, that his lordship did demand from me 5,000 men, for some expedition on the side of Catalonia, which were refused; I must declare I do not remember that the earl ever applied himself to me, in particular, upon that subject; if he had, the answer must naturally have been, that the matter depended not upon me to grant, or refuse, but upon the king of Spain, under whose command I was.

“But I do remember the earl proposed this at some general council, or council of war, held in the king's presence, about the operations of the ensuing campaign, and joined with those that were of opinion, that it was by no means convenient to divide the troops, as may appear by a copy of that opinion signed by my lord Trawley, and by me, bearing date the 15th day of January, 1706-7. But I must beg leave to observe, that was not the decisive council for the operations of the campaign, for many subsequent councils were held in the king's presence, more important than this; and though in them there might have been some variety of opinions as to the manner, yet almost all the generals and ministers, that assisted at those councils, agreed perfectly in the substance, which was, That we should join our troops and march to Madrid: Some indeed, were for passing through the plains of the Mancha, and crossing the Tagus; but this opinion was overruled, because of the hazard in passing the river if the enemy opposed us, and of the scarcity of provisions in the Mancha, which had been exhausted by the enemy's winter quarters; for which reasons it was, after many debates, agreed, That we should take the way of Valencia and Arragon, passing the Tagus at its head, to avoid all opposition. But lest the kingdom of Valencia might, by this means, be any ways exposed, it was likewise resolved, before we should begin our march, to destroy all the enemies magazines of provisions and forage, in the country bordering upon the frontier of Valencia, to prevent them from making incursions: And I do take upon me to aver, that nothing was ever transacted during the time I had the honour to command the queen's troops, contrary to the positive resolution of any general council, or council of war, unless that resolution was afterwards repealed by some subsequent council.—So sensible was every one of our being already too weak, it was resolved to desire my lord Rivers, who was lately arrived at Lisbon, would join us with the troops that came under his command from England, which his lordship did, not long after.

“For the better execution of what had been resolved for our march through Valencia and Arragon, proper commissaries and officers were dispatched to provide bread and forage sufficient for the troops, in all places where it was designed the army should pass. I went with the marquis das Minas to the frontiers, toward the latter end of March, and we took the field the beginning of April: We ruined part of the country bordering upon the frontiers of Valencia, before the enemy could join their troops, particular Yecla, where they had their largest magazines; and judging it necessary to take in the castle of Valencia, to prevent their army from being masters of one of the most considerable inlets into the kingdom of Valencia, set down before that place; but it proved stronger than was expected, and after we had spent some days there, we had notice the enemy had assembled their troops at Almanza.

“Upon this advice, a Council of War was held, where it was unanimously resolved to fight the enemy, which we were the rather induced to, because it was judged impossible to subsist upon the defensive in the kingdom of Valencia; for the country had been already so much exhausted by our winter quarters, that there was not two days provision to be found for the army, and we could not have been able to have subsisted there so long as we did, but for the supply we found in the enemy's magazines at Yecla: Nor did we think it proper to pursue the once intended march through that kingdom and Arragon, lest provisions should be wanting, leaving the enemy so near, and in a condition to follow us; for though commissaries had been employed, there was reason to apprehend, the towns we were to pass through would shut their gates against us, whilst we were closely followed by the enemy, and persecuted by the peasants of the country, who, grown desperate by seeing themselves abandoned, would naturally be up in arms in the mountains. Besides, we had certain advice that there was already a body of French troops, consisting of 8,000 men, in Spain, and upon their march to reinforce the enemy. Thus, as the army must inevitably have perished, without fighting, it was thought reasonable to run the hazard of a battle, wherein we had an equal chance to come off victors; which was accordingly done two days after, on the 25th of April, 1707, N. S. but with ill success.

“The cavalry of the allies, with some small part of the foot that had escaped the ill fate of the day, joined again at Alcira, from whence they retired to Tortosa; and, finding the enemy had crossed the Ebro, endeavoured, by opposing their passage over the Chinca, to amuse them till the latter end of the campaign. Mean time, with great expedition, I gathered the broken remains of the foot, (out of which I formed 5 battalions, and raised four more of Catalans, with which we made a stand against a victorious enemy, and preserved the principality of Catalonia entire, excepting Lerida. After the taking of which place, the enemy thought fit to retire to winter quarters, and we did the same.

“In February following the marquis das Minas, with most of the Portuguese generals, embarked for Lisbon; and having the queen’s leave to do so too, I visited the several quarters where the troops in her majesty’s pay, were lodged; and, having left the necessary orders with major generals Carpenter and Wills, for their government in my absence, took the same opportunity of going thither.—Upon my arrival in Portugal, I found the queen’s orders there, to take upon me the characters of ambassador extraordinary, plenipotentiary, and general of her forces; which charges I accepted in obedience to her majesty; though I had nothing so much at heart, as the pleasure of returning to that retirement, from whence only the queen’s positive command could have drawn me.”

The Five QUESTIONS put to the Earl of Peterborough, and his Lordship’s ANSWERS.

After the reading of this Paper, the earl of Rochester moved, That the lord Galway should be asked, whether he had any thing to add to it? Whereupon the earl of Godolphin said, That the earl of Peterborough’s Narrative ought to be read before hand, in his presence. The earl of Galway and the lord Tyraway being called in, the clerk read the five Questions that were put the Friday before to the earl of Peterborough, with his lordship’s Answers separately.

First Question.

“That the earl of Peterborough be desired to acquaint the Committee how he was supported with men and money, during the time he commanded in Spain, and what applications he made for either, and to whom?”

Answer.

“To the first Question he was pleased to answer, That the management of the war in Spain, when under the conduct of other generals, was not only supported by great numbers of men, and vast sums of money; but also with notorious falsehoods, published in their favour, to excuse their repeated disgraces; whereas his lordship was not supported as the service required with either men or money; but had his conduct traduced, notwithstanding his constant successes, by multitudes of representations and suggestions to his prejudice; all of them detected to be false, before your lordships, on the evidence lying before the House, or in his hands to prove them so, whenever his lordship should be allowed the opportunity.—That he had no reinforcements of men till three or four days before the French raised the siege of Barcelona; that Mr. Stanhope, who came with those forces, in his letter represents them, as far short, in his opinion, of what the occasion required; and that he received no money from England, till his coming back to Valencia, after that siege, and that little sum was out of his lordship’s power to make use of, the pay-master for above a month disputing to issue it, by his lordship’s orders, it appears by proofs upon oath in this House.—That the troops he brought there did not amount to 5,000, though published in the English Gazette to amount to 25,000.—That no one regiment was provided with the least equipage; no mule, nor horse; no carriage for the troops, nor any beast of draught for the artillery; no magazines for provisions for a march. His lordship having taken and relieved Barcelona, drove 7,000 men with 3,000, out of Valencia, and 25,000 men out of Spain with the inconsiderable forces he had, before he received one penny from England. His lordship said farther, he never had any establishment ordered, nor was allowed for baggage-money, forge-money, or the train of artillery, till just about the time when the command of the forces was put into other hands. His lordship was pleased to say, he was forced to shift as well as he could with what money he had of his own, and could pick up and down the world, and was rewarded for his pains and services, with having his bills protested, which he drew from Genoa, for monies put on board her majesty’s ships; for which her captains were accountable to the paymaster, and put out of the earl’s power. That the troops received the full sum without any discount, though it was made use of by a Secretary of State, as one motive for recalling his lordship, that he had drawn the bills at 25 per cent. discount. The earl further took notice, that, though he wanted money, and all necessaries whatsoever, it was objected to him, that he did not immediately put the troops in such a condition into the field, which was utterly impossible, for the aforesaid reasons; and his lordship affirmed, that a merchant had stopped, and yet retained 3,400*l.* of his lordship's money in his hands, for the damages he pretended to have received by the protesting the bills, which the earl of Peterborough had drawn in his favour. His lordship further observed, that some lords had seemed unsatisfied upon this head, though, notwithstanding all those difficulties, it appeared by the oaths of all the officers examined in the House, that the troops sent to the siege of Requena went without baggage, which place was to be taken to make the entrance into Castile possible; and that all the regiments began their march, regiment by regiment, the moment they had their mules delivered to them for the equipage. His lordship concluded this head with observing what untrue representations were made in favour of others, when, to excuse the fatal battle of Almanza, a king was to be used at that rate, as to have it in an account printed by authority, declared, That he took numbers amounting to 4 or 5,000 men, from a battle to be fought for his crown; the very regiments of horse and foot being mentioned by name; whereas it is notoriously known to the whole world, that he took only about two hundred miserable Spanish dragoons; and that of the regiments mentioned to be taken away from the English general in Valencia, some of them were never in being; others were regiments of trained-bands in Barcelona, and none of them within 250 miles of the place.

Second Question.

"That the earl of Peterborough may acquaint the House of what he knows of the earl of Galway's proceedings during his stay with the army at Madrid, his march to Guadaluza, and his retreat to Valencia, and if he knows any thing of the opposition made by the king of Spain, the count de Noyelles, and the Spanish ministers and generals, to those measures?"

Answer.

"To the second Question the earl was pleased to answer, That from the time the earl of Galway came first into Spain as far as Almaras, and thence returned back into Portugal, the earl of Peterborough had no advices from the earl of Galway, no account of the motives of that retreat, nor any hopes given him of the return of the Portuguese into Spain. That, after the raising the siege of Barcelona, and the retreat of the French army out of Catalonia, the earl of Peterborough received no letter or message from the earl of Galway, after his second entrance into Spain; nor had he the least notice of his situation, circumstances or designs, till he saw his troops retreating from the enemy to take the strong camp of Guadaluza, though the marches of the king from Arragon, and those of the earl of Peterborough from Valencia, were well known in the Portugal camp. That two several officers, sent by my lord Galway, came to Valencia, and brought no letters to the earl of Peterborough, one of them demanding money for the pursuit of his journey.—That as to the persons who advised the king to go by the way of Arragon, and not by Valencia, he knows no further, (being at that time absent from his majesty) but that having extremely opposed it, and having writ to the Secretary of State, at his first coming to Valencia, against it, he received an answer to this purpose, That he hoped the earl of Peterborough would bear the mortification and disappointment with patience, since the king was so resolved; and a messenger by the appointed token, known to be sent by the lord Galway, had given notice, that the said earl expected the king by the way of Arragon, and had given to understand how every thing was prepared for his reception that way.

Third Question.

"That the earl of Peterborough acquaint the House, what advice his lordship received from the earl of Galway at Madrid, in order to concert any public measures, and what his lordship knows of the reasons that induced the king of Spain to go by Arragon towards Madrid, and not by Valencia?"

Answer.

"To the third Question the earl is pleased to answer, That the earl of Galway continued about 40 days at Madrid, without making any endeavours to augment his troops, or provide any magazines for the subsistence of his army; that meeting the enemy unexpected, and retreating to the camp of Guadaluza, the troops were without provisions, and in the greatest disorder; that the measures taken in that retreat, where 5,000 men were lost without a blow, and the whole cavalry ruined, were positively against the king's opinion, and that of all his officers and ministers: that the earl of Peterborough had the accounts he gives, from the king of Spain's own mouth, and several of his generals; and it will particularly appear by letters from count Noyelles, velt mareschal of the Emperor, and general to the king of Spain, and from Mr. Stanhope, which letters the earl is ready to produce: and that it is notorious to the whole world, that if the earl of Galway had pursued the enemy ten days longer towards the Ebro, all the horse under the Mareschal of Berwick had deserted to king Charles, and the French could never have returned to Spain.

Fourth Question.

"If his lordship pleases to give an account of the councils of war in Valencia, about the 15th of January, 1707, upon notice of the earl Rivers sailing into the Straights, and upon the projects of that campaign, and what number the king took from the army, and an account of his manifesto upon so doing?"

Answer.

"To the fourth Question the earl is pleased to answer, that several councils of war were held in the month of January, at Valencia (about that time that the intelligence was brought, that the forces under the earl Ri-were entered into the Mediterranean) in order to adjust the measures for the ensuing campaign; that the matters therein debated, were principally, whether the army should march towards Madrid, and seek the enemy? In the debates, the earl of Peterborough positively affirms, that the earl of Galway, Mr. Stanhope, and the lord Tyrawley supported those measures, with the Portuguese general; and that the king, the count de Noyelles, the Spanish generals and ministers, with himself argued strongly against those measures, as highly dangerous and impracticable, and this in repeated councils of war: till at last the earl of Peterborough, solicited by the king of Spain to renew the debate, desired the king, that all called to the council should bring their opinion in writing, that every body's opinion and reasons for that opinion, might appear and be known to the words, which, according to the king's commands, were put in writing and delivered at the council. That the said earl sent his opinion home, and gave the Lord Treasurer an account of the controverted points in that Council of War, by letters about that time, and after the battle of Almanza, from Genoa; which letters, attested upon oath to be true copies, he is ready to produce.—That the king's opinion, and that of all his generals and ministers, in concurrence with the earl of Peterborough, were over-ruled by a minister of her majesty, assuring that her majesty had given him orders to declare, in her name, that her positive orders were, that they should seek the enemy, march to Madrid, and not divide the forces, upon any occasion whatsoever.—That, in a subsequent Council of War, the best measures were concerted for the putting this in execution, against which the king and so many generals and foreign ministers had declared; and that it was unanimously agreed, the army should march by the head of the Tagus into Arragon, to avoid the enemy's horse in the plains, and not to have that river to pass before the enemy.—That, notwithstanding this, the earl of Galway brought the army into the plains of Valencia, the direct contrary route to that of Arragon, and into all those dangers which he was to avoid, by marching by the head of the Tagus.—That, by letters from my lord Sunderland to Mr. Stanhope and lord Galway before the House, it appears, that these lords and persons differed in opinion from the rest. The subject-matter of their opinion being inserted, and it being taken notice of in such letters that these opinions in writing were received, and agreeable to the Lord Treasurer's thoughts; and Mr. Stanhope thanked and approved, for what he had offered in the queen's name.—That the earl of Peterborough was the more of that opinion, because the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene had declared their sentiments for a defensive war at that time in Spain, and had communicated their thoughts to Charles 3, upon that subject, to the certain knowledge of the earl of Peterborough, as he can make appear by authentic papers from the king of Spain.—That the earl sent a project of the duke of

Savoy and prince Eugene, in concert with himself, to the queen, which her majesty had herself required, in which the said sentiments might appear, if the earl had the queen's leave to produce it.—That he went into Italy by the queen's commands and solicitations, with powers and authorities to negotiate and treat with the duke of Savoy, though it is true he was found fault with so doing, as if he had not the queen's orders, (which yet he is ready to produce) and was recalled upon that pretence; that those orders were communicated to the king of Spain, lord Galway, Mr. Stanhope, the generals and ministers of the army, when at Guadalaxara, and he was by them unanimously solicited to go for Italy, in pursuance of those orders, and this agreed to in a Council of War.—That an objection raised, that he went alone, when ordered to go with troops, is of no weight, since, while he was preparing to execute those orders according to that letter, a strong squadron of the ships were commanded away to the West-Indies, under admirals appointed from England, and the particular ships mentioned for that service. That those orders were founded upon the supposition that Madrid and all Spain were in the hands of king Charles; that notwithstanding the total alteration of affairs, it was not in the power of the earl of Peterborough to prevent this fatal separation of the fleet, though he proposed, and solicited the other admirals to join with him in setting aside orders so prejudicial to the public, but could not prevail; when yet they allowed it made the fleet useless for that year where they were, and that the squadron under their precise and positive orders, could be of no service in the West Indies, nor even to go out there, to pursue the galleons, had they any intelligence of them.—That the king of Spain, count Noyelles, Mr. Stanhope, and Zinzerling, by the king's order, solicited the earl of Peterborough's return into Spain, and he was ordered by his catholic majesty to solicit, in the most pressing manner, that the earl of Galway might be recalled, and the Portuguese troops removed; that, accordingly, when he had sent the project upon Toulon, and against France, to the Secretary of State, he returned, and assisted at the several councils, which are now enquired into, and of which he has given a full and true account; and that he was the more pressing and endeavouring to prevent the rash measures which brought on the battle of Almanza, because the defensive in Spain, was agreed on by the duke of Savoy, and prince Eugene, in order to the design projected against Toulon; which design against Toulon was wholly altered, and made so impracticable, that the duke of Savoy, in the most public and solemn manner, declared his unwillingness to engage in it.—That then in those councils, when the earl Rivers was arrived, and landed at Alicante, farther debates arose what advices should be given him, and what proposed to him to execute with his troops: the project approved, and offered by my lord Galway and Mr. Stanhope, was (to the best of his remembrance) that the troops should advance to some little town near the enemy, with assurance given my lord Rivers, that, in some few days, he should be sustained with a considerable body of horse, and some foot: that in this particular he refers himself to the earl Rivers, not having so perfect remembrance of it as the rest, but that he perfectly remembers that he opposed, with the utmost warmth, that any proposition should be made to the earl Rivers, it being certain (however dangerous and improper it was) that should such measures be pursued, that earl, being wholly ignorant of the situation of affairs, would not object against marching towards the enemy.—He perfectly remembers, that, at these councils, there was no account given, that could be depended upon, of the enemy's forces, who, at that time, were known to have a body of near 10,000 horse, and might soon be drawn together from their quarters; he knew that these troops could do no service, but must remain fatigued and exposed, without the forces promised in a few days to support them, which he was certain could not join them in a month, and thought himself obliged to give my lord Rivers and brigadier Gorges this account, that the earl Rivers might take the utmost cautions, and be upon his guard.—That according to the account he gave, the earl Rivers's forces were fatigued and exposed, for near a month, without any reinforcement from the earl of Galway; and, at last, orders were sent to make a retreat, which could not be executed without great hazard to the troops.—That upon the earl Rivers's arrival at Valencia, after such usage to himself and her majesty's troops, the earl of Peterborough met him just going to the king, and told him, why he was so positive in the information given him, that he should not be joined by any troops in a month's time; which was, because he knew that the new commissaries they had chosen for furnishing bread and other provisions for the troops, at a higher rate than they were furnished before, were not engaged by their contract to deliver the necessaries for their troops which were to join the earl Rivers, till a month after the time they were promised it; and the earl of Peterborough then desired the earl Rivers to ask the king, whether this matter of fact were not true? which, as he believes, might tell him the same thing.

Fifth Question.

"What the motives were of the king of Spain's leaving the army, when it was resolved to march towards Madrid and towards the enemy; and whether there were any orders pretended from England for those measures?"

Answer.

"To the fifth Question the Earl is pleased to answer, That the king of Spain, when the troops were marching into Murcia, towards the enemy, assembled a Council to no other purpose, but to send, by the hands of his Secretary of State, a protest, with his reasons why he would not march with the army, but go to protect his subjects in Catalonia; the contents of which protest, the Earl very well remembers, having had a copy of it, by the king's order. And that he had instruments under the king's hand and seal, to shew how he was over-ruled and contradicted in the matters he thought fit to propose for the public service."

After the reading the earl of Peterborough's Recapitulation, the earl of Abingdon, chairman of the Committee, asked my lord Galway, Whether he had any thing to add to his Paper; to which his lordship answered, "That his memory suggested to him nothing more at that time, but that, if the House were pleased to allow him a copy of the earl of Peterborough's Paper, he might make some remarks upon it." Which was granted.

The Chairman of the Committee asked afterwards the lord Tyrawley, Whether he was willing to communicate to the Lords, what he knew concerning the Council of War held in Valencia, the 15th of January, 1707. N. S. To which he answered, "That the reason why he was shy of speaking the Friday before, was, because he thought himself accused; and as his doubt still continued, and no body is obliged to accuse himself, he desired to know, whether he was accused or no? And if he was, he desired a Copy of the Accusation, that he might put in his Answer." Hereupon

The Duke of Argyll said, "That the lord Tyrawley's question was improper; that he was there in order to be examined by the Lords, and that he ought to answer to such questions, as should be put to him by the Chairman."—The lord Tyrawley insisting, that if he were accused, he ought to make his defence according to the forms of courts of judicature; the lord Peterborough said, "That he accused nobody; that the lord Tyrawley was a gallant man, but that, as it commonly happens, he might have been swayed by the opinion of his superiors;" whereupon the Chairman told him, he was not accused. Notwithstanding this, the lord Halifax said, "That the lord Tyrawley's question was not altogether ill-grounded. That any thing that tends to a censure, may be looked upon as an Accusation: and that the House of Peers, being the supreme court of judicature, they ought to observe the forms of justice, as well as inferior Courts."

A debate being like to ensue thereupon, the duke of Buckingham moved, "That the persons at the bar might withdraw;" which they did; and then his grace complained of the earl of Abingdon's saying to the lord Tyrawley, he was not accused.

The Lord Halifax said, "They were entered upon a large field, that this business had taken up much of their time three years before, to little purpose; that the Council in Valencia was a point of no weight or consideration; but that, if it was made to be the cause of ill measures, the lord Tyrawley was involved in the same Accusation with the lord Galway."

The Earl of Abingdon justified what he said, viz. That the lord Tyrawley was not accused; urging, it was impossible he should, because the House of Peers only judges, but never accuses: After which,

The Duke of Argyle, in answer to the lord Halifax, said, "That three years before, they enquired how Spain had been got, but now they enquired how it came to be lost; and that they were only enquiring, and not accusing." To this

The Duke of Marlborough replied, "That he could not perceive the tendency of such an enquiry; but, if they designed to censure persons, who had acted to the best of their understandings, they would have no body to serve them; and that it appeared by general Stanhope's letter to Mr. Secretary Hedges, that the Council held in Valencia was unanimous in four points, and did not debate the fifth, which they left to be determined by the subsequent Councils of War." Hereupon the earl of Peterborough desired, that Mr. Stanhope's Letter might be read, which was done accordingly. It bore date the same day the Council was held; and the most remarkable passage in it, is, "That he, the lord Galway, and the lord Tyrawley, had given their opinions for an offensive war, and that king Charles's ministers and the earl of Peterborough being of another opinion, he had protested against it, in her majesty's name; saying, "That the queen did not spend such vast sums, and send such numbers of forces, to garrison towns, but to make king Charles master of the Spanish Monarchy: But he apprehended he had committed a fault, in offering to protest in her majesty's name, against the opinion of a person of so superior a character as the earl of Peterborough."—After the reading of this Letter,

The Lord North and Grey said, "That the lords Galway and Tyrawley having been possessed with an opinion that they were accused, they ought to be let know they were not."

The Lord Cowper added, "That they ought to declare clearly and plainly, whether this was an Accusation, or no; that the reputation of men, of honour was their liberty and property, that consequently, if this enquiry tended to censure the reputation of the lords Galway and Tyrawley, by what name soever it might be called, it was an Accusation; and they might ask to have it in writing, and ought to be allowed time to make good their answers; adding, he did not speak so much in favour of those two gentlemen, as for the honour of that illustrious assembly."—To this

The Duke of Buckingham replied, "That the lord Tyrawley's question was improper: That, if all who are summoned to the bar of the House, in order to be examined, should ask the same question, they could never proceed in any enquiry, or come to the knowledge of any thing: That the lord Tyrawley was as cautious and reserved, as if he knew he was really accused. That the Friday before, he remembered nothing; and now he wanted to know, whether he was accused, or no? That the lord Galway had acted fairly, like a man of honour: That the lord Tyrawley ought to do the same; but if he refused, they could not force him to it: That the reading of letters was irregular, before they had examined him; and that the chairman ought to ask him, peremptorily, whether he would tell the Lords what he knew about the Councils held at Valencia."—Hereupon

The Duke of Marlborough moved, That the lords Galway and Tyrawley, might be told, That they were not accused, and that the council in Valencia was only to give light into the subsequent operations of the Campaign. To which

The Earl of Rochester answered, That, though it had been alledged, that reputation was as dear to them as liberty and property, yet the Lords ought not to tie their hands, by telling them whether they are accused, or no; and therefore moved, that the chairman should ask the lord Tyrawley to answer, if he pleased. The lord Peterborough said, No man can be accused for giving his opinion in a council of war.

After which, the lord Galway and Tyrawley being called in again, the earl of Abingdon told the latter, That the Lords desired to be informed of what he knew about the council of war which was held in Valencia. Thereupon the lord Tyrawley said, That being apprehensive he might be accused, he thought he ought to be upon his guard, but as he hoped that illustrious assembly would not take advantage of any thing he might say, he would frankly acquaint them with all he knew about the Council of War: That it is a hard matter to charge one's memory with things so far distant; but that he remembered, in general, that several schemes were proposed for the operations of the ensuing campaign: That an offensive war was resolved upon by a majority of voices: That besides the lord Galway, Mr. Stanhope, and himself, all the Portuguese, viz. the marquis das Minas, count d'Orpeza, the conde de Corsana, and the Portuguese ambassador, were of that opinion: That the operations of the campaign were left to the determination of subsequent councils; That as to the battle of Almanza, it was unanimously resolved upon, not one general opposing it; and that Monsieur Freishman, who commanded the Dutch, and was very jealous of any thing that regarded the service of his masters, did not speak one word against it.

The earl of Nottingham having interrupted the lord Tyrawley, telling him, He was not examined about the battle of Almanza; The duke of Buckingham said, No lord ought to speak to the lord Tyrawley but the chairman. And the lord Halifax added, "That what he had said was very proper, the battle of Almanza being a consequence, of the Council of War held at Valencia." On the other hand the earl of Peterborough saying, "That what the lord Tyrawley had said was to no purpose." The duke of Marlborough saying "He had answered fully to the question that was put to him."

The earl of Godolphin having desired that the lord Tyrawley might go on, he was called in again; and the chairman telling him he might proceed, he answered, "He had no more to say." However the lord Cowper desiring he should be asked, Whether the march to Madrid was agreed in that Council of War? And the earl of Poulett, Whether in the same Council, an offensive war was resolved upon? The chairman put those two questions to my lord Tyrawley, who answered as before; "That it was resolved to march to Madrid, but that the further operations of the campaign were reserved to the determination of subsequent councils, after they had beaten the enemy." The earl of Peterborough desiring to know by whom those resolutions were taken, the lord Tyrawley answered "By the majority of several Councils of War, which were held twice a week; and that, as far as he could remember, the king did not declare his opinion."

The earl of Peterborough having afterwards desired leave to ask the earl of Galway a question, about his negotiations in Italy; the lord Poulett said, no questions were then to be put but in relation to the Council of War held in Valencia. The earl of Abingdon having told the lords Galway and Tyrawley that they might withdraw, they withdrew accordingly; after which the lord Cowper said. "That all he could collect from the lord Tyrawley's examination, was, That the same persons who were for an offensive war, in the Council held at Valencia, were very unanimous in the subsequent Councils, and concurred in the execution of the operations agreed on."

After this the chairman ordered the clerk to read several Papers that lay upon the table, particularly the following Letter from Mr. Stanhope to Mr. Secretary Hedges;

"Sir; Valencia, Jan. 15, N. S. 1707.

"Since my last, of the 25th of December, we have received the ill news of the king of Portugal's death, and the loss of Alcantara. The same ships brought us letters from my lord Rivers and sir Cloudesly Shovel, acquainting us, they had taken the resolution of bringing the land forces to this kingdom. Upon these advices, and the arrival of the earl of Peterborough from Italy, several conferences have been held on the operations of the new campaign. Inclosed I send you the Opinions given by my lord Galway, sir Charles Hara, and myself, in writing, as the king had desired. What is mentioned therein of taking Origuella and Murcia, as soon as the forces shall land, is agreed unanimously; as likewise to solicit either succours, or a powerful diversion from Italy; and also to engage, if possible, a squadron to stay in these seas. I am sorry it is doubtful whether this latter can be compassed, sir Cloudesly Shovel having writ word, that the ships will return soon after the landing of the troops; and if the succours the French give out they are to have,

(of which my lord Peterborough will inform you more particularly) are really marching, a squadron would be necessary to hinder them from hurting us in Catalonia; which would otherwise require more troops for the defence of it than we can spare, and leave ourselves a sufficient force to go to Madrid. The main part of our votes, which relate to the design of the campaign, is not yet determined, there being many opinions, that we should not think of Madrid, but act defensively, and in several bodies. I have in most of my letters, since I came hither, either to my Lord Treasurer, or you, expressed my apprehension this would be aimed at; and therefore hope we shall soon be informed from you of her majesty's pleasure in this particular. I have, perhaps, been guilty of a fault in supporting my opinion, which is the same with my lord Galway's, too warmly at some of these conferences, having said, that her majesty did not spend such vast sums, and send such numbers of forces to garrison towns in Catalonia and Valencia, but to make king Charles master of the Spanish monarchy; and if it was insisted upon, to divide the forces, and put ourselves on the defensive, I should, in her majesty's name, protest against such measures. The fault I apprehend myself to have committed, was using the expression of protesting in her majesty's name, in presence of my lord Peterborough, who has characters from her majesty so much superior to mine, and from whom it was my fortune to differ in opinion, on this occasion. His lordship will have communicated to you, the projects he has concerted with the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene, for the execution of which a strong squadron is necessary. If the assistance of our fleet can engage those princes to march by land to Toulon, it may, on that condition, be worth our while to spare some foot from hence, for the execution of such a design, as destroying their naval strength, though we should be reduced to act defensively here; for, let us take never so good resolutions, I cannot help repeating my apprehensions to you, that we shall do no great matters while we have so many generals so little disposed to agree. Experience has so fully convinced me of my disability to procure that good understanding amongst ourselves, which is necessary for the queen's service, that I do, with the greatest earnestness, renew my application to you, that I may be recalled from a station, in which I am perfectly useless to her majesty, and am ruining myself, being forced to live at much larger expence than my allowance will bear. Your favour in this matter will be most thankfully acknowledged by him, who is, with the greatest respect, Your, &c.

"JAMES STANHOPE."

Then the clerk read also a letter from sir Charles Hara, (now lord Tyrawley) to Mr. Secretary Hedges, of the same date, viz. January 15, 1706-7. The title of a letter from the earl of Sunderland, to general Stanhope, was also read; but his lordship not being then in the House, the reading of that letter was postponed, and the Opinion which Mr. Stanhope gave, in French, in the Council of War held in Valencia for an offensive war.

Next to this the Clerk read the Opinion which the earl of Peterborough delivered in writing at the said Council, being as follows:

“An offensive war is of shew, and reputation to the generals and troops, but the defensive is often of most utility to the public.—Our circumstances require vigorous efforts in Italy or Spain. In the last, the defensive secures us the crown of Arragon, but the troops in Italy can only give the mortal blow, that is, enter France. Neither can it be doubted, if the French desist from their hopes in Italy, but that the great force in that country will be usefully employed by the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene.—No positive opinions can be given, without knowing the condition of the fleet. Without the assistance of the sea, the best dispositions in Italy are useless. If that were wanting, all must be hazarded in Spain, the war there being of an inconceivable expence to the allies, but the difficulties of subsisting armies in Castile are sufficiently apparent by the last campaign: and the dangers are evident of putting the whole upon the risque of passing to Madrid, before an army so superior in cavalry.—The Tagus must likewise be passed before the enemy, (if marching by Murcia) without pontoons, or the necessary preparations for such an attempt. The precipices of that river are natural fortifications: if there are plains near Aranjues, it is almost equally impossible to pass them before an army in battalia, without a great superiority in artillery; and nothing is more easy to a body of horse so numerous, than to cut off the necessary provisions, in a country where they are so scarce.—If the troops advance into Castile, towards Madrid, without taking the necessary precautions for the defence of Catalonia, either Madrid must fall into our power, or all is lost. It is to be doubted whether the possession of Madrid (without the defeat of the enemy's army) be decisive; but the loss of Catalonia is certain, if the places there are not better fortified and provided, and if forces are not sent into that province or those parts of Arragon, near that frontier; which may serve at the same time for the defence of the fortified places of Catalonia, and towards preventing the succours from the side of Navarre.—If we hope for a maritime force besides in these seas, which may be superior to the enemy, there does not appear the least necessity for rash measures; and the least disgrace, or great fatigues alone, may give her troops that inclination to desert, which the enemy will not fail to improve, when in a proper situation.—Above all things the defence of Catalonia, and what we have, is necessary. Our intelligences assure us, that great numbers of troops assemble in Roussillon, and that great magazines are forming there for foot and horse, and all warlike necessaries. But to conclude, what better opinions can be offered than those of the duke of Savoy and the prince Eugene? who have doubtless communicated them to the emperor, the queen, and his catholic majesty, where that duke has ministers.”

The earl of Peterborough having desired that some of his own letters might also be read, the clerk begun with one from his lordship to the duke of Marlborough, (whom the earl said he knew was not prejudiced against him) wherein amongst other particulars, his lordship said, ‘He had overcome all his enemies, but lies, and these he had papers enough with him to defeat.’ Another from the earl of Peterborough to the Lord Treasurer, (or earl of Godolphin) was read likewise, containing a justification of his lordship's conduct; exposing the rash and absurd measures that had been pursued; and acquainting the Treasurer, that his (the earl of Peterborough's) projects were approved by the duke of Savoy, prince Eugene, and M. de Belcastel, though a friend to the lord Galway; adding, that whilst he had the honour to command in Spain, not one party of 20 men were beaten, nor a vessel lost. After this the clerk read the earl of Sunderland's Letter to Mr. Stanhope, of the 14th of Feb. 1706-7, as also an extract of king Charles's Orders to my lord Peterborough, about an attempt upon the islands of Majorca and Minorca. Upon which the earl of Poulett said, ‘That the earl of Peterborough had given a fair and just Account.’

To corroborate what the earl of Peterborough had said, Dr. Friend was called in: whereupon the duke of Devonshire moved, That he might be sworn. This occasioned a debate that lasted near an hour, after which it was agreed that he should be sworn; which being done accordingly, he vouched for the authenticity of the Papers inserted in his Account of the earl of Peterborough's Conduct in Spain; the copies whereof, he said, he had received, either from the earl of Peterborough, or from his lordship's secretary. Then the earl of Abingdon read the question that had been given in by the earl of Ferrers, viz. “Resolved, That the earl of Peterborough has given a very faithful, just and honourable Account of the Councils of War in Valencia.”

The Earl of Peterborough's Account told Just, &c.] This question occasioned a debate that lasted above an hour, in which the most remarkable passage was this; The bishop of Sarum having excepted against the word ‘just,’ because the earl of Galway had declared he had some remarks to make on the earl of Peterborough's Recapitulation, but that he readily agreed to the word ‘honourable.’ The duke of Argyle took him up, saying, ‘He knew no difference between those two expressions; for all that is honourable must be just, and all that is just is honourable.’ At last, the question being put, about nine o'clock at night, the Lords divided, and tellers being appointed, 59 were for the affirmative, and 45 only for the nega-re; and the House being resumed, the Resolution of the Committee was reported, and read to.

It was afterwards moved to adjourn to the Tuesday following; but before it passed into Resolution, the earl of Paulet gave in the following Question to be debated in the next Committee of the whole House; "That the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope, insisting at a conference held at Valencia, some time in January, 1706-7, in the presence of the king of Spain, and the queen's name being used in maintenance of their opinion for an offensive war, contrary to the king of Spain's opinion, and that of all the general officers and public ministers, except the marquis das Minas; and the opinion of the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope being pursued in the operations of the following campaign, was the unhappy occasion of the battle of Almanza, and one cause of our misfortunes in Spain, and of the disappointments of the duke of Savoy's expedition before Toulon, concerted with her majesty."—The earl of Paulet desiring that this question should be entered in the Book, the same was opposed by the earl of Wharton and the lord Halifax: but it was, after a small debate, agreed, That the same should be entered: after which the House adjourned to the Thursday following.

Second Debate in the House of Lords on the War in Spain.] Accordingly, on the 11th of January, the Peers being set, three Letters from the earl of Sunderland were delivered in, viz. one to general Stanhope, of the 23rd of December, 1706; another to the earl of Galway, of the same date; and the third to the said earl, of the 27th of the same month. The order of the day being read, an officer was sent to know whether the earl of Galway attended, and the House being informed he did not,

The Earl of Paulet made a long speech, wherein he represented, "That the nation having, for many years, been engaged in an expensive war, it was necessary to give the people the satisfaction to let them know how their money had been spent, and who deserved thanks, and who to be blamed; that it appeared, the service of Spain had been very much neglected: that many officers upon that establishment looked on their employments as sinecures, being favourites of the party; and that the council held in Valencia, being the spring to all our misfortunes, the Lords ought to censure those that influenced it; concluding, that the motion he made on the Tuesday before might be read."

Hereupon the duke of Bedford delivered in a Petition of the earl of Galway, which was read, importing, that being informed that matters which very much concerned him, were inserted in the Journals of the House, he prayed their lordships to give him time to put in his Answer, before they came to a determination.—The marquis of Dorchester delivered also a Petition of the lord Tyrawley, to the same effect; which being read likewise, the earl of Orford moved for adjourning, and appointing a day to consider of these Petitions. To which

The Lord North and Grey said, "The lords Galway and Tyrawley ought to have put in their Answers to the earl of Peterborough's paper; instead of presenting Petitions for time, which looked like a delay."

The Duke of Buckingham said, on the same side, "That it must be a mistake; that the Petitioners might think themselves accused, which could not be; for the Peers never accuse, but only give orders to the Attorney General to prosecute: That although every body may have access to their Journals, because they are a court of record, yet no inquest can take notice of any thing that passes, or is depending in the House; that at this rate, any body might put a stop to their proceedings; that he did not, however, blame men that were under the apprehensions of being accused, for presenting such Petitions; but that they ought to take no notice of them, and proceed according to the order of the day, to the consideration of the state of the nation, in relation to the affairs of Spain." To this

The Duke of Devonshire answered, "That as a censure might ensue upon a motion made the Tuesday before, the lords Galway and Tyrawley had reason to petition for time to make their defence."

The Earl of Rochester replied, "That he never heard of a Petition of that nature: that the Petitioners desired, in effect, to be heard upon the debate of the Lords, which was improper: that nobody yet knew or could tell, what the question was; but that after it was known, it might then be proper for them to put in their Petitions; concluding, they ought not now to be received."

The Lord Somers said, "That the Petitions were neither improper, nor given in at any improper time; that it would be too late for the Petitioners to apply to the Lords, after they were come to a Resolution; that he hoped it would never be found in the Book of that House, that when the Lords were going to proceed to a censure, they refused to hear those that were to be affected by it; that the lords Galway and Tyrawley had a right to be heard, and clear the matters of facts as subjects of Great Britain; that the Lords ought besides to be cautious how they proceeded in enquiries of things done before the Act of Oblivion and Indemnity: concluding, it was but a natural justice, that men in danger of being censured, should have time to justify themselves."

The Duke of Argyle answered, "That he did not know what services it would do the petitioning lords to have time, and to tell the House that they differed from the House; that it had already been put to them, whether they had any thing to say to that point, and that two days had been allowed them to answer the earl of Peterborough's Recapitulation; that as to the Act of Indemnity, his grace did not care how little use was made of it; that the said Indemnity hinders not enquiries; that the people of Great Britain ought to know to whom their misfortunes are owing: but that, however, he desired nobody should be punished."

The Lord Cowper said, "That the debate about the Affairs of Spain was adjourned to that day; and therefore it was improper to take notice of the earl of Paulett's motion in the House, but that it might be considered in the Committee; that as to the two Petitioners, it was reasonable and proper to grant them time to put in their Answers, because the question tended to censure them; which they did not know before, when they were only examined: And that in things essential to justice, the ordinary forms of courts of judicature ought to be observed."

The Earl of Nottingham answered, "That they could never be too tender of the reputation of men of honour; but that in his opinion, the Petitions ought not to be granted; because this was no proper time to deliver them, and because the Petitions themselves were improper; that the Act of Indemnity ought to be sacred, but not pressed too far; that the Petitioners had already been heard, and allowed time to add any thing to their former declarations; that now the Lords were not enquiring into facts, but forming their judgments upon them; and that the admitting the lords Galway and Tyrawly to take notice of what passed in the House, would be admitting them to a co-ordination with the Lords."

The Earl of Wharton replied, "That a censure is a punishment; that to punish men without giving them an opportunity to make their defence, is equal to a banishment; that he hoped the subjects of England were not yet reduced to that; that this was the only time the Petitioners could have to make this application to the House; that the least thing the Lords could do, was to hear them before condemnation, since any other criminals might claim that privilege: concluding, he did not speak for the sake of those two lords, but for the honour and reputation of the House."

The Earl of Nottingham answered, "He did not say they could never be heard, for they might be heard, if the House should order a prosecution, but only that they could not be heard on this occasion. That they might be as innocent as any of the Lords, because they might have given their opinion according to the best of their understandings, or might have been overruled: Which might be afterwards enquired into."

The Duke of Buckingham, who spoke on the same side, said, "That he had a great respect for those two noble lords who petitioned; and was as tender of the honour and reputation of the House, as any member: That therefore he was afraid of making precedents and altering parliamentary rules: That according to the forms of inferior courts, no man has a right to be heard, or to stop proceedings on account of his reputation, as on account of his property; that he was apt to believe, that some persons who did not like this enquiry, had put those two lords upon petitioning, to gain time; but though he would not have the Petitions granted, yet he would move, that they might be called in and heard."

The Earl of Paulett said, "That they had already been heard, and had declared they had no more to say: so that the design of these petitions was only to delay."

The Duke of Strewsbury said, "That if they were ready to be heard, he consented they should, provided they delivered nothing in writing, which might occasion delays."

The Earl of Godolphin, in answer to what had been urged by the earl of Paulett, said, "It was true, they had been heard before; but that there was new matter, and an imputation, wherefore it would be hard upon them not to be heard."

The Earl of Ferrers answered, "That the question contained only a proposition to censure a council; that their lordships were yet come to no Resolution upon it; and, as a Petition to a debate of the House was never offered before, he thought it unreasonable to grant these. That, as they must not judge by success, so the declaring that the lords Galway and Tyrawley had given an ill council, was no censure."

The Lord Halifax said, "That out of an affectation of avoiding delays, and of not going fast enough, they went so fast, that they must come back: that the petitioners had, indeed, been examined, but were not heard to the question proposed by the earl of Peterborough; and that the lord Tyrawley was even interrupted when he began to speak of the battle of Almanza. Pray, my lords," added he, "proceed according to the rules of justice. When air George Rooke was called in question, he was heard for three days together. What, will you not hear these two Lords, before you pass a Resolution that touches their reputation? For my part, when I hear these arguments, I could stop my hearing."

The Earl of Paulett saying thereupon, "That if they were ready to be heard, he readily agreed they should:"

The Lord Halifax insisted, "That their demand ought to be granted;" urging besides, "That the very Paper upon which the whole debate turned, was not yet read."

The Earl of Marr answered, "He did not wonder some persons endeavoured to shuffle and prolong the debate; but if they granted these Petitions, they might afterwards be desired to postpone this enquiry, till Mr. Stanhope could be heard."

The Duke of Argyle added, "That he had, himself, asked the petitioners, whether it had been resolved to act offensively, to which they had given their answers in the affirmative; which was the material point in question."

The Duke of Devonshire insisted, "That, as the result of these debates might be put in a Representation to the queen, the petitioners ought to have an opportunity to be heard."

The Duke of Buckingham answered, "That if they debated that matter any longer, it would be the same as if they granted their petitions."

The Lord Guernsey, speaking on the same side, said, "That, if the question for rejecting the Petition, was put, and carried, they might then be heard to matter of fact; but, as to matter of opinion, they could not be heard; and so concluded, that the question, to reject the Petition, be put in the House, and the lord Paulett's question afterwards debated in the committee."

The Earl of Scarborough said, "That, if the petitioners were to be heard again, he wished they might be upon oath."

The Earl of Paulett added, "He hoped they should hear no more of the Act of Indemnity in this debate."

The Duke of Leeds said, "He thought the Petitions irregular, however, he moved that they might be laid on the table, and taken no notice of." Which motion was backed by the lord North and Grey. But

The Duke of Buckingham insisted, "That the petitions being irregular, the question for rejecting them ought to be put; and if carried, such lords as pleased might enter their Protests:" upon which

The Duke of Leeds said, "He should be sorry to see protestations made on that occasion."

The Lord Keeper having, at last, put the question, Whether the Petitions should be rejected? It was carried in the affirmative, by a majority of 57 voices, against 46, that were for the negative. Hereupon the earl of Abingdon said, "He supposed, any body that presented petitions, attended to know whether they were granted, or rejected:" and the duke of Shrewsbury moving, "That they should be called in," the duke of Argyle said, "He took it for granted that the petitioners were out of the way, and not to be found; and therefore moved, that the committee might proceed." An officer having informed the Lords, that the petitioners were not at the door; the earl of Paulett said, "All this looked like a delay." And the earl of Ferrers moving, that a message might be sent to them, the duke of Buckingham moved, for adjourning the House, during pleasure, in order to consider the earl of Paulett's question in a Committee of the whole House, into which the lords went immediately, and of which the earl of Abingdon was chosen chairman.

The Earl of Peterborough opened the debate with saying, "That, having the queen's orders to be gone, he hoped the lords would give him an opportunity to clear some heads that had been laid against him by the Secretary of State." But the duke of Buckingham said, the question ought to be read, in the first place: Whereupon the earl of Abingdon read the earl of Paulett's motion before-mentioned. Then the earl of Peterborough acquainted the Lords, "That his going out of Spain for Italy, was in order to concert measures for the siege of Toulon, according to his Instructions: being empowered to treat and negotiate with the duke of Savoy, particularly about the siege; of which he had given an Account in writing. That he had several conferences with the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene, in his royal highness's closet, the result of which he sent to the Court of England, and to the king of Spain. That he had afterwards several conferences with my lord Galway and Mr. Stanhope, to concert further measures for the carrying on the projects made in Italy: but though he had acted according to his Instructions, he was, in a Letter from the earl of Sunderland, dated the 28th Sept. 1706, O.S. recalled, for negotiating matters of so high a nature, without the queen's authority, which might be prejudicial to her majesty's service."—Hereupon the earl of Rochester said, "That the earl of Peterborough ought to apply himself to the matter in question;" and moved, That the said question might be read again; which the chairman did: after which the earl of Peterborough said, "He apprehended their lordships would enquire into the disappointment before Toulon, in order to which he thought it very proper to acquaint them, that 5,000 men, which he demanded for the reduction of that place, were denied him, to be employed about imaginary conquests. And, that he received the thanks of king Charles, for the projects he had concerted in Italy; but a public minister desired, he might not be trusted." The duke of Argyle desiring that the earl of Peterborough's Papers might be read; that, in particular, which shewed, that the duke of Savoy insisted, that there might be a defensive campaign in Spain; while the earl of Peterborough was looking for that paragraph, in his own French Letter to sir Charles Hedges, dated Sept. 10th, 1706, the earl of Godolphin moved, "That the whole Letter might be read:" whereupon the Letter was delivered to the clerk; but, the earl of Peterborough taking it from him, read it himself; and the most remarkable expressions in it, relating to the question, were these: 'La prise de Toulon me paroit praticable. On demande 5,000 hommes des troupes d'Espagne;' that is, 'The taking Toulon appears practicable to me; 5,000 men of the troops in Spain are demanded for that purpose.'

The Earl of Godolphin insisted, "That if any stress was to be laid upon this letter, the same might be translated and read by the clerk." Notwithstanding which, the earl of Peterborough continued reading; after which

The Lord Cowper backed the earl of Godolphin's motion, saying, 'He could not understand the letter as the earl of Peterborough read it; and how could their lordships proceed to a censure, without having a material paper in the language of the country?' To this

The Earl of Peterborough said, "That it being thought fit not to entrust any secretary with his project, he wrote that letter himself to Mr. Secretary Hedges; and that he could not write it in any other language, to be understood by the duke of Savoy, and prince Eugene, who kept both a copy of it, as well as himself: but if their lordships desired to have it translated, he moved they might adjourn, for he was no secretary to translate it himself."

The earl of Abingdon owned, the letter was not read regularly: but the earl of Paulett waving that matter, said, "The French could not have relieved Toulon, if the war in Spain had been defensive." And the duke of Argyle added, "That the stress of the question was, whether the duke of Savoy insisted upon a defensive war in Spain." The earl of Peterborough averring, that he insisted so firmly upon it that he desired to have 5,000 men out of Spain:

The Duke of Marlborough acquainted the lords, "That the project of an attempt upon Toulon was first proposed to the duke of Savoy, by Mr. Hill, in 1703, and afterwards negotiated there by his grace himself with his royal highness's ministers, count Brianson, and count Maffey; that 50,000*l.* were, at first, offered to the duke of Savoy, for that purpose; but it was, at last, agreed, that he should have 100,000*l.* That the year before the execution of this design, the duke of Savoy earnestly desired, that it might be kept very secret; so that it was very improbable he should speak of it to any body, and desire 5,000 men out of Spain for that purpose:" concluding, "That the attempt upon Toulon did not miscarry for want of men, since there were near 17,000 left behind in Italy; but for want of time, and other accidents." Notwithstanding this,

The Earl of Peterborough affirmed, "That, according to his instructions, he had concerted with the duke of Savoy the attempt upon Toulon." Whereupon

The Earl of Paulett said, "That in such a case, 5,000 men out of Spain might have made a strong diversion, and contributed to the reduction of that place." After this, the clerk read a Letter from the lord Godolphin to the lord Peterborough, dated Feb. 7th, 1708-9, importing, in substance, "That care had been taken of all his Bills; that they were all (upon which the earl of Peterborough cried, "protested!") satisfied, that the war in Catalonia ought to be offensive; and that this was the particular desire of prince Eugene, which ought to be complied with."

The Earl of Peterborough having often mentioned his Instructions for treating about the siege of Toulon, the lord North and Grey moved that those Instructions might be produced, but the earl of Rochester alledging, this could not be done without the queen's leave, the lord North and Grey replied, "They might present an Address to the queen for that purpose." This being waved by the duke of Buckingham, the lord North and Grey acquiesced: though it is remarkable, that the earl of Peterborough said, "That Mr. Secretary Hedges might be ordered to attend, and be examined about that matter:" and thereupon the lord Halifax desired, that the lord Peterborough's Letter to Mr. Secretary Hedges might be left upon the table: adding, "That since the duke of Savoy was for an offensive war in 1706, he wondered how it could be a crime in 1707." To this

The Earl of Nottingham answered, "That the earl of Peterborough's letter ought not to be left on the table, unless he pleased. That no inference could be more unnatural, than to say that because the duke of Savoy was for an offensive war in 1706, he must be of the same opinion in 1707. That what the duke of Marlborough had said about the overture made to the duke of Savoy, for an attempt upon Toulon in 1703, was very true; he (the said earl of Nottingham) having writ himself to Mr. Hill about it; that it appeared by general Stanhope's letter, that he was for an offensive war, unless some attempt upon France made it necessary to be on the defensive: which implied, that he knew the design upon Toulon; and that the duke of Savoy wanted troops, appeared by his waiting for the German recruits." The lord Cowper insisting upon the necessity of having the earl of Peterborough's original Instructions. the chairman put him in mind of what already had been suggested, "That there might be some secrets in them, not proper to be made public:" to which the lord Cowper replied, "That the argument upon a probability, when there might be a certainty, shewed the necessity of calling, at least, for such part of the said Instructions as related to this matter;" urging, "That Toulon might be mentioned in them; but it was material to know in what manner it was mentioned." In answer to this the duke of Argyle said, "That even supposing no mention was made of Toulon in the earl of Peterborough's Instructions, yet it appeared very plainly, that he had concerted that project, from his letter to Mr. Secretary Hedges, from Mr. Stanhope's letter, and from the earl of Galway's confession." The earl of Scarsdale complaining of the delays, and of some lords insisting on the same thing; the lord Halifax answered, "He designed to make all delay necessary to get a right information:" urging, "That the earl of Peterborough had desired that Secretary Hedges be called and examined." The earl of Peterborough explained what he had said about Sir Charles Hedges, averring he only mentioned him about the letter his lordship wrote to him in French. But nevertheless, the lord Halifax insisted on the necessity of having the Earl's Instructions laid before them: alledging, "That since new papers were daily produced towards this enquiry, why not these Instructions, which were as material as any of the rest?" The earl of Rochester waved this objection, saying, "There was no necessity to have those Instructions, since they would be of no use, for it appeared already very plainly that the design upon Toulon was known." The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Nottingham, and the earl of Isla spoke on the same side; and at last between eight and nine in the evening the earl of Paulett's main question, about the earl of Galway lord Gyrawley, and Mr. Stanhope, being put, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of 64 voices against 43; after which the Lords adjourned to the next day.

Third Debate in the House of Lords on the War in Spain.] On Friday, the 12th of January, the Lords being set, a List of the generals and officers on the establishment of Spain, which, by their lordships' order, had been laid before them, was found fault with, because the lieutenants and ensigns were not mentioned in it, and another List was ordered to be laid before the House. Then several Papers were read, particularly the following Letter from the earl of Sunderland to my lord Galway:

" My lord; This is to acknowledge the receipt of your lordship's letter by Mr. Stanhope from Valencia, of October the 29th, N. S. together with a copy of your letter to the lord Rivers, of the same date. And to acquaint you, that her majesty does approve of the resolution of my lord Rivers landing his forces in Valencia, and that she has sent him directions to go forthwith, in compliance with the desires of the king of Spain, and your lordship, notwithstanding any orders he may receive from thence to the contrary, (such having been sent some time.) I am commanded also, by her majesty, to acquaint your lordships, how concerned she is at the uneasiness you are under in the service, which makes you desire so much to retire; which request her majesty would not deny, but that she is of opinion, that, besides what relates to the command of her own troops, and an influence that is necessary to be had upon the king of Spain, there is nobody at your lordship that can possibly, in any sort, manage the Portuguese; so that, if you shall retire, that alliance will be quite useless, and consequently the whole affair of Spain irretrievable. I am confident, when you reflect upon this, you have her majesty's service, and the common cause so much at heart, that you will have patience, at least one campaign more; and your lordship may depend upon it, that there is nothing in the queen's power to do, to make you as easy as possible, and to remove the difficulties you have hitherto struggled with, that will not be done. You will see by her majesty's letter to the king of Spain, how much she takes this to heart, and how strongly she insists upon his having an entire confidence in your counsils and advice.—I will not say any more upon this subject; you will have it so much more strongly represented to you by my Lord Treasurer in his letter, and by M. de Montaudre, when you see him. I must also acquaint you, that the queen has ordered my lord Peterborough's commission of ambassador to be recalled, which, I hope, will contribute to make all that matter more easy. Since his majesty is willing to consent that the troops with the lord Rivers should join the king of Spain and the troops in Valencia, it is expected they should be kept all together in one corps, and under one general, that they may march strait to Madrid, without dividing themselves, or amusing themselves in taking inconsiderable places, and such little projects; the doing of which before, was one great reason that this last campaign you was not joined by any body of troops sufficient to keep you in possession of Madrid. This makes it yet more necessary for your lordship to stay: I am sure nobody but yourself will have influence, or credit enough to keep them together; and to enable you the better to do this, the most effectual measures will be taken to persuade the Portuguese to make the diversion they have promised by the way of Toledo; and in order to it, they will be assured, that the troops from Ireland that were to follow the lord Rivers, shall be sent as soon as possible to join them, and enter Spain that way. I must also acquaint you, that such measures are taking with the duke of Savoy, for the next year's campaign, as will effectually prevent the French sending any considerable force more into Spain. I send you here enclosed a copy of M. Cavalier's Letter to the queen; if you think what he proposes practicable, and that the circumstances of affairs do allow it, her majesty thinks it would be of great advantage to the common cause; but that must be left to your judgment. I gave you an account in my last, that all the cloathing was gone from hence, except that of eight battalions. As for the six regiments, whose officers are to be sent home to raise their men, it is her majesty's pleasure, that the cloathing of the said regiments be sent back, and that your lordship would order an account of the off-reckonings to be sent hither. I am, &c. SUNDERLAND."

The clerk having done reading, the earl of Scarsdale proposed the following question: "That it appears by the earl of Sunderland's Letter to Mr. Stanhope, that the design of an offensive War in Spain, was approved and directed by the Cabinet Council, notwithstanding the opinion of general Stanhope, in case of an attempt upon France, which they knew was then concerted with the duke of Savoy; which contributed to our misfortunes in Spain, and to the disappointment before Toulon."

Resolution thereon.] After a small debate, it was resolved to present an humble Address to the queen, "That she would be pleased to give leave to any Lord, or other, of her cabinet-council, to communicate to the House, any Paper or Letter relating to the affairs of Spain," This Address, by their lordships' order, was immediately carried up to the queen at St. James's, by the lords of the white-staves, viz. the dukes of Buckingham and Shrewsbury; Who being returned, and the House (that had adjourned during pleasure) resumed, as soon as the queen, who designed to hear the debate incognito, was come to the House, the duke of Buckingham reported, "That her majesty had graciously been pleased to grant the desire of the Lords."

Earl of Scarsdale's Second Question.] The

Lords being gone into a committee of the whole House, and the earl of Abingdon still in the chair, the earl of Scarsdale delivered the following Question, "That it appears by the earl of Sunderland's Letter, that the carrying on the war offensively in Spain, was approved and directed by the ministers, notwithstanding the design of attempting Toulon, which the ministers knew at that time was concerted with the duke of Savoy, and therefore are justly to be blamed for contributing to all our misfortunes in Spain, and to the disappointment of the expedition against Toulon."

Debate thereon.] The Lord in the Chair having read this Question,

The Duke of Devonshire excepted against the alteration that had been made in it, particularly against changing the word of 'Cabinet Council' which was in the question first proposed by the earl of Scarsdale, into that of 'Ministers.' To which

The Lord Ferrers answered, "That the earl of Scarsdale was at liberty to make what alterations he thought fit in the question, this being a new committee:" and

The Earl of Scarsdale added, "He thought fit to alter the question, because the word 'Ministers' is better known than that of a Cabinet Council." But

The Earl of Wharton insisted, "That the committee was, in effect, the same, as when the first question was proposed, and as they were adjourned to consider it, no alteration of a question that lay already before them, ought to be admitted."

This objection, which seemed to carry a great deal of weight, was, however, removed by the earl of Abingdon, who said, "This was the same committee; for the House was resumed, and then adjourned during pleasure, before he could get directions to report." And the earl of Paulet having moved the debating of the second question, the duke of Beaufort said, "He wondered any Lord in the ministry should approve and direct an offensive war in Spain, at that juncture; and in particular named the earl of Sunderland." Hereupon

The Lord Cowper, in answer to what had been alleged by the earl of Scarsdale, to justify the alterations made by his lordship in the question, said, "That in his opinion the word 'Minister' or 'Ministry,' would run into the same exception with 'Cabinet Council:' that they were both terms of an uncertain signification, that there was besides in the question the word Ministers in the plural, which implied many: And therefore he moved, That the earl of Sunderland's Letter might be read, that it might appear; whether one minister only, or more, approved and directed an offensive war." There being several Letters of the earl of Sunderland's lying on the table, the chairman of the committee desired to know, which of them their lordships would have read? To which it was answered, "That of Feb. 14th, 1706-7. Q. S. in answer to Mr. Stanhope's Letter of the 16th Jan., N. S." Upon which the clerk was directed to read that letter, importing in substance, "That he was sorry they three only (meaning the lords Galway and Tyrawley, and Mr. Stanhope) were of that opinion; that nothing but interest could incline others to the contrary; that the dividing the Army would be the ruin of all: that the queen entirely approved what he (Mr. Stanhope) had done in the Council of War, as he would see more at large in the inclosed from my Lord Treasurer. That this was so much the queen's opinion, that she had written in the most pressing terms to king Charles about it. That, as for the earl of Peterborough's projects in Italy, the less attention Mr. Stanhope gave to them the better. That he sent him a Letter for the earl Rivers, which he desired Mr. Stanhope to deliver to him, if he took upon him the command of the army, by the lord Galway's giving it up. Which, however, the earl of Sunderland hoped, he would not do: In which last case Mr. Stanhope was desired to burn that letter; concluding, that the Lord Treasurer had settled the remittances for the army, &c." After the reading of this letter, the lord Cowper said, "He could not find a connection between the premises (viz. the said Letter) and the inference in the question; And therefore if it should pass into a resolution, he would enter his protest."

The Earl of Rochester replied, with some vehemence, "That after the Message that had been sent to the queen, and her majesty's gracious Answer, he did not expect to hear of such an objection; as that there was no connection between the premises and the inference; that he knew very well the meaning of that objection; that for several years past they had been told, that the queen was to answer for every thing; but he hoped that time was over; that according to the fundamental constitution of this kingdom, the ministers are accountable for all: And therefore he hoped no body would, — nay, no body durst, name the queen in this debate."

The Lord Cowper insisted, "That the alteration made in the question ought to be explained:" urging, "That the word 'Ministers' is of an uncertain signification, and 'Cabinet Council' a word unknown in our law; that if that august assembly proceeded to a censure upon men, the world ought to know who they were; that he hoped the Lord who proposed this question, would explain himself; and hoped, at the same time, that if any body were accused, it would appear to be without ground: that he had the honour to be one of the ministry, and did not know whether it was designed to involve him in the same censure; but he protested, with the utmost sincerity, that while he was in that post, he gave his advice, and acted to the best of his understanding, and with an honest intention to serve the queen and his country."

The Earl of Scarsdale said, "He thought the word 'Ministers' very proper; and that the Lord Treasurer, that is, the lord Godolphin, was named in the earl of Sunderland's letter."

The Earl of Paulet urged, "That there is no distinction between the Ministry and the Cabinet Council; for those who were of the Cabinet were ministers."

The Duke of Beaufort said, "That the word Cabinet Council does not imply all Ministers."

The Lord Ferrers added, "That the word Ministry is more copious than Cabinet Council, but however, it was indifferent which they took."

The Earl of Godolphin replied, "That since the word Ministers was more copious, it was therefore improper in this case, because their lordships ought to be sure whom they designed to censure. And then taking notice, how late it was in the night, and that a person concerned in this debate was absent, he moved for adjourning." Hereupon

The Duke of Leeds made a pretty long speech; the most material passage in which was, "That her majesty having given leave for my Lord, or other of the Cabinet Council, to communicate what they knew about the affairs of Spain, no offence could be taken if any person cleared himself." Upon which

The Lord Cowper said, "He knew not whether he was included in the word 'Ministry.'" Hereupon

The Earl of Paulet said, "This was the first time that this nice distinction between Cabinet Council and 'Ministry' was made a dispute, which looked like a delay."

The Earl of Isle said, on the same side, "That it was irregular and improper to take notice, in this debate, either of the Address to the queen, or of the question proposed before, in both which the word 'Cabinet Council' was inserted; that it was true, this word was not commonly known in the law, neither was the word 'Ministry,' and therefore they ought to use a plain English word. That he could mention an instance at the Revolution, when a word of an uncertain signification occasioned such debate. That he wished, if the question should pass with the word 'Ministers,' they would mention two Lords that had been already named—that he should be sorry to hear, or repeat the sound—but, however, he thought it necessary to name them." To this

The Lord Halifax answered, "That the mentioning the Address and former question, was not improper; that they were stating the signification of two synonymous words of great weight and importance in this case; and therefore he desired, that the Address to the queen might be read." Thus being done accordingly, his lordship added, "He wondered at the method used on this occasion: for he understood the queen was desired to give an immediate Answer to this Address; with an intimation, That the House was sitting, expecting her majesty's Answer, which was not usual." Hereupon

The Duke of Argyle said, "He thought what the noble Lord that spoke last had said, was accusing the House of doing an uncivility to the queen." At which several Lords crying, 'Go on! Go on!' the lord Halifax said, "That if their lordships looked on their Journals, they would not find it usual."

The Earl of Paulet appealing to the Lords, "Whether the words 'immediate Answer' were ever mentioned?"

The Duke of Buckingham said, "He never heard of any such thing spoken; and if he had, he would rather have gone to the Tower than have carried such a message." Upon which

The Lord Halifax excused what he had said, alledging, "He was not in the House when the Address was sent, but had been told, that a motion for an immediate Answer was made; which he believed was without a precedent." To this

The Earl of Ferrers answered, "That no such thing had been mentioned, but if it had, it would not have been unusual; for he remembered such a Message was sent to the late king William when he lay sick. That they had been long debating about the words 'Ministers and Cabinet Council;' and that, to prevent all exceptions, both might be put in the question." Hereupon

The Earl of Peterborough said, very shrewdly, "That he thought the word 'Cabinet Council' not so proper as Ministers: That he had heard a distinction between the Cabinet Council and the Privy Council; that the Privy Counsellors were such as were thought to know every thing, and knew nothing; and those of the Cabinet Council thought nobody knew any thing but themselves: And that the same distinction might in a great measure, hold, as to Ministers and Cabinet Council. That the word Cabinet Council, was, indeed, too copious; for they disposed of all; they fingered the money; they meddled with the war; they meddled with things they did not understand: So that, sometimes, there was no Minister in the Cabinet Council."

The Lord Halifax insisting against the alteration made in the first question, and pressing their lordships to speak to the same words they had used in their Address to the queen,

The Earl of Rochester renewed his former expostulation, "That, for several years together, the queen was to answer for every thing; instancing in the time when the Memorial of the Church of England was indicted, and the church was suggested to be in danger, (which for his part his lordship thought to be so, in the hands of some men) when the Answer was ready, to stop people's mouths, What! to suspect the queen!" He added, "That the distinction between Cabinet Council and Ministers, was a mere nicety used only to delay. That he knew the lord Godolphin was in that high station." And concluded with a motion, "That the Lords would give an account of what they knew, provided they would

The Duke of Argyle said, “He thought all ministers were of the Cabinet Council, but that all the Cabinet Council were not ministers.”

The Lord Cowper urged “the ambiguity of those two terms, as an argument against using them; the rather, because of four of the Lords that were for the question, two were of one opinion, and two of another. That, however, he hoped they would drop this, and debate the main question. That for his own part, he was of opinion, that the war in Spain ought to be offensive and not defensive. That this was the sense of the whole kingdom. That he did not remember, that, when the earl of Peterborough’s letter to sir Charles Hedges, about his lordship’s project, was read, there was any difference of opinion in the Council: All being unanimous for an offensive war with Spain. That when the project against Toulon was concerted with the duke of Savoy, his royal highness never desired that the war might be defensive in that kingdom. That it was unreasonable and unprecedented to censure men for an opinion, because it had proved unsuccessful; and that, for his own part, he gave his advice with the best and most sincere intentions to serve his country.”

The Earl of Peterborough answered, “That one would be apt to think the ministry were, indeed, for a defensive war, when they suffered him to want men, money, and all necessaries. That though he had instructions to treat about the siege of Toulon, he had letters of revocation sent him on a sudden; which, however, he sent back unopened, because having appeared, in several courts, with the character of ambassador plenipotentiary, and the duke of Berwick having taken his credentials, he could not give re-credentials. That his project, as trifling as it was accounted by the ministry, would have taken Toulon, whereas the regular project proved abortive. That when he came home, he was coldly received and disregarded, but preserved himself, not only by his integrity and little services, but also by caution and patience.” After this, his lordship explained his project upon Naples, which was to have been put in execution in February: Adding, “That by the reduction of that kingdom, which was already disposed to declare for king Charles, and by the conquest of Sicily, the allies would have had 20,000 men to act against France, and plenty of provisions to supply their forces in Spain. As for Toulon, that it might have been invested in the winter; when there was no garrison to defend it.” And to prove that he had concerted the siege of that place with the duke of Savoy, his lordship produced a letter from his royal highness; but offering to read it, several Lords cried, ‘No, No.’ In answer to the Earl of Peterborough’s Speech,

The Earl of Godolphin said, “He would give their lordships an account of his thoughts and reasons, why that noble earl’s project was not approved, viz. That the very overtures of it, as transmitted hither by the earl of Peterborough, in a letter, in French, to sir Charles Hedges, read the day before, shewed, that it was impossible the duke of Savoy could be in earnest, the other project being already concerted; and his ministers here earnestly desiring, in his royal highness’s name, that it might be an absolute secret; so that even prince Eugene knew nothing of it, at the time the earl of Peterborough wrote that letter.” Hereupon

The Earl of Nottingham standing up, said, “That it was too common to judge of men by the events: But God forbid that House should follow that method. That he would give the Lords his thoughts, why he should not, at that juncture, have been for an offensive war: that he would not speak as a soldier, because he was none, but would speak only to matters of fact; and if he was wrong, he desired any lord there to rectify him: that he had no pique, no animosity against any body, and would have justice done without partiality: that it appeared by the Account, or Representation the earl of Galway gave of Affairs, towards the end of the year 1706, or beginning of 1707, that we were in so good a condition in Spain, that nothing could hurt us: and yet, notwithstanding the reinforcement which the earl Rivers brought to Spain, there were not above 14,000 men at the battle of Almanza: that in such circumstances, the advising an offensive war, was a very ill counsel: And therefore he concluded for the question.” Upon this

The Earl of Sunderland owned, “He gave his opinion for an offensive war, because, to the best of his understanding, it was the best counsel that could be followed. That it was the general opinion and desire of the nation, that the earl of Galway should march again to Madrid; that all the ministry then were unanimous in their opinions for an offensive war; and that many inconveniences might have attended the dividing of the army.”

The Duke of Marlborough said, “My lords, I had the honour of the queen’s command to treat with the duke of Savoy, about an attempt upon Toulon, which her majesty, from the beginning of this war, had looked upon as one of the most effectual means to finish it. And I can assure you, that in the whole negotiation, with his royal highness’s ministers, one of whom, count Briancon, is dead, the other, count Maffey, is now here, not one word was spoken of Spain, where the war was to be managed, upon its own bottom, as well as that of Italy; and both independently upon one another.—As for the war in Spain, it was the general opinion of England, that it should be offensive: And as to my lord Peterborough’s projects, I can assure your lordships, that one of the greatest instances that Holland and Savoy made, was, that the emperor, and we, should not insist upon an expedition to Naples, which might hinder the other design.—My lords, my intentions were always honest and sincere, to contribute all that lay in my power, to bring this heavy and expensive war to an end. God Almighty has blessed my endeavours with success: but if men are to be censured when they give their opinions to the best of their understandings, I must expect to be found fault with as well as the rest.—My lord Galway, and every body in Spain, have done their duty; and though I must own, that lord has been unhappy, and that he had no positive orders for a battle; yet I must do him the justice to say, that the whole Council of War were of his opinion, to fight the enemy before the coming up of the duke of Orleans, with a reinforcement of 9 or 10,000 men.—On the other hand, I must confess, I do not understand, how the separating of the army would have favoured the siege of Toulon.—The earl of Peterborough saying thereupon, “That there was a necessity of dividing it to go to Madrid.” The duke of Marlborough resuming his speech said, “I will not contradict that lord as to the situation of the country; but this separation of the army could not be in order to a defensive but to an offensive war; which, in my opinion, was the best way to make a diversion, and thereby hinder the French from relieving Toulon. But after all, that unhappy battle had no other effect, than to put us upon the defensive; for the French troops that were detached from Spain, never came before Toulon.”

The Duke of Argyle having answered this last part of the duke of Marlborough's speech, viz. That the battle of Almanza did but put us upon a defensive in Spain: Added, “That as for what related to the earl Rivers, it was certainly a fault to prefer an unfortunate foreigner before a peer of Great Britain.”

The Lord Comper replied, “That the answering Mr. Stanhope's Letter, by approving his advice, was certainly the wisest, the honestest, and the more popular opinion; every body in England being then for an offensive war: that he wished every member in that august assembly would lay his hand upon his heart, and say, in conscience, whether he would not have been for the same opinion? That to have advised a ling-ring, expensive, defensive war, would, no doubt, have now been made more criminal than this charge, which was heavy enough. That the raising the siege of Toulon, could not, in reason, be imputed to the offensive war in Spain, and to the loss of the battle of Almanza; but rather to the expedition to Naples; the slow march of the German recruits, through the country of Grisons, and other unforeseen accidents, which attend all human affairs: But, added his lordship, if this question should pass into a Resolution, it will be the comfort of those on whom the censure will fall, that the world will judge, that it is founded on strained deductions, and forced consequences, foreign from the premises. My lords, all Englishmen love action, it is their temper and inclination. To conclude, I repeat it again, it will be a consolation, that the conclusion is not warranted by the premises.”

The Earl of Paulett answering, “That the battle of Almanza was a necessary consequence of the opinion and directions of the ministry.”

The Duke of Devonshire replied, “He remembered that the lords themselves, that now spoke against an offensive war in Spain, were for it some years before; that among the rest, the earl of Nottingham moved for 20 battalions to be sent from Flanders to Spain, which could not be for a defensive war; that, after the battle of Almanza, no French troops were sent from Spain to relieve Toulon; and, in short, that an offensive war is always the most effectual means to procure a peace.”

The Duke of Shrewsbury answered, “That in all things the circumstances ought to be considered; that an offensive war may be proper at one time, and improper at another. That it having been urged, that no French troops were sent from Spain to relieve Toulon, it was certain, some troops were ordered, and upon their march, whose approach might have the same effect, as if they had actually arrived in Provence. That it is true, this nation is for fighting, and for an offensive war; but not for going to Madrid right or wrong, as was general Stanhope's opinion, approved by the ministry. That the lord Galway had a good reason to fight, because he could not help it. But that there was no reason for the ministers here, to give that opinion, because nothing forced them to it.”

The Duke of Devonshire taking advantage of this occasion, said, “That since the allies could not subsist without fighting, it was unreasonable to censure the generals who gave their opinions for a battle.”

The Earl of Nottingham owned, on the other side, “That he made the proposal for sending 10,000 men from Flanders to Spain; but that was after the battle of Almanza; and that only 7,000 were sent. That, as to the business of Toulon, it was certain, that, immediately after the news of the battle of Almanza, the court of France ordered detachments to be made from Spain, as appeared by the Paris gazette of the 4th of May, 1707. That he would not affirm those troops did actually march into Provence; but that, as had been observed, their approach was sufficient to contribute to the raising of the siege of Toulon.”

The Earl Rivers said, “That it had been alleged, that the battle of Almanza was fought because the allies wanted provisions; but he could assure their lordships, that there was a gentleman here in town, who brought them provisions for eight days. That, in truth, they did not design to fight, but rather to retire towards Valencia, having, for that purpose, sent general Carpenter before, with part of his dragoons: but, upon the receipt of orders from England, they suddenly resolved upon a battle, before they were joined by general Carpenter, and without communicating to the Council of War the strength of the enemy, of which they had intelligence by two deserters the night before the action."

The Earl of Ferrers said, "That it was plain, the Council of Valencia was the cause of all our misfortunes in Spain. That the resolutions taken in it, were carried against the opinion of king Charles, and his ministers. That it was certainly a fault in the ministry here to approve that council; for a secretary of state gives no direction but from the cabinet council. That it seemed as if the blame of the raising the siege of Toulon, was intended to be laid on the emperor's forces; but this enquiry would be more proper at another time: and that another thing was to be enquired into, viz. What number of forces in her majesty's pay were, at that time, in Spain? and so concluded for the question."

The Lord Mohun,* on the other side, said, "He was against it, for several reasons: 1. Because he knew not who was meant by the ministry; and he would not have a censure pass upon persons, who neither deserved, nor were intended to be censured. 2. Because the advice of an offensive war was, at that time, no ill advice. 3. Because he would be just to all of mankind, and not censure any body that gives his opinion to the best of his understanding, and with an honest intention."

The Lord Somers owned freely to their lordships, "That, had he been in the place of those that gave the council for an offensive war, he would have been of that opinion, because he should have thought himself an ill counsellor to advise any thing against the general opinion: adding, That the ill success of the battle of Almanza was no good argument against the council for an offensive war; for, if they judged of opinions by events, no man could be safe."

The Earl Rivers having owned there might be other good reasons why the Toulon business did not succeed,

The Earl of Rochester said, "That, for his own part, he must confess, that, had he, at that time, been of the cabinet council, he could not have been for an offensive war; nor would popular arguments have swayed his opinion; for he could not see the reason, that, because the people love action, we should be perpetually fighting. Concluding, upon the whole matter, that he was for the question."

of the crown upon the illustrious House of Brunswick. Toland says, 'that none of the company was more generally acceptable—that none lived with greater sobriety, nor delivered himself on all occasions with better judgment than lord Mohun; and he still continues to convince the world of his reformation, so that he is like to prove an ornament to the upper House of Parliament.' Lord Macclesfield, who died at Hanover, November 4, 1701, without issue, left him a considerable estate, which he managed with great prudence. Lord Macclesfield was succeeded by Fitton, his brother, who dying a bachelor in 1702, there was much dispute about the property. The duke of Hamilton had great claims, having married Elizabeth, sole heir of the earls of Macclesfield. It unfortunately happened that the duke, and lord Mohun, who had likewise his claims upon the estate, were present at an examination before a master in chancery respecting the matter in litigation, when the former, reflecting upon the veracity of Mr. Whitworth, who had been steward to the Macclesfield family, said, 'he had neither truth nor justice in him.' Lord Mohun instantly replied, 'he had as much as his grace.' High words ensued, and they parted in mutual anger. On the following day lieutenant-general Maccartney conveyed a challenge to Mohun from the duke, who had been appointed ambassador to France, where he was to have proceeded immediately. On Saturday, November 15, 1712, they met in Hyde Park, when each killed the other. Lord Mohun was buried in Westminster Abbey. Thus perished these unfortunate noblemen: Mohun had been most vicious, and Hamilton was very unamiable." Noble's Continuation of Granger.

Several Lords calling for the question, and the Chairman rising in order to read it,

The Bishop of Ely said, "He had only one ord. to offer, which was, that it not appearing to him that there was any premeditated ill design in the ministry, when they gave their opinion for an offensive war, he could not be for the question."

The Duke of Argyle having desired, that when the question was over, he might offer another; the same was readily agreed to: And when the Earl of Abingdon put the following question:

"That it appears by the earl of Sunderland's Letter, that the carrying on the War offensively in Spain, was approved and directed by the ministers, notwithstanding the design of attempting Toulon, which the ministers knew at that time was concerted with the duke of Savoy, and therefore are justly to be blamed for contributing to all our misfortunes in Spain, and to the disappointment of the Expedition against Toulon."

There happening a division, the Earl of Portland and Isla were appointed Tellers, and, it appeared, that there were 68 Lords Content, and 48 Not Content.

Thanks voted to the Earl of Peterborough.]

The Duke of Argyle then made a Speech, importing, in substance, "That he was informed, that the earl of Peterborough had the queen's commands to negotiate matters of great importance, and was to set out the next day. That he hoped every member of that House was convinced, that he had performed great and eminent services to his country, notwithstanding the difficulties and discouragements he laboured under; and how, with a handful of men, his grace thought he might call them a handful, since they never amounted to 10,000 men, he took the important city of Barcelona, and reduced so many provinces of Spain. That he needed not tell their lordships how he had been rewarded for those great services: but that it was his opinion, they ought to pass a compliment upon him, which was all the reward they could, at that time, bestow: and therefore it was his grace's motion, that this question be put:

"That the earl of Peterborough, during the time he had the honour of commanding the army in Spain, did perform many great and eminent services; and, if the opinion he gave in the Council of War at Valencia had been followed, it might, very probably, have prevented the misfortunes that have happened since in Spain."

This question being carried, without dividing, the House was resumed; and the earl of Abingdon having reported the two Resolutions taken in the Committee, the Lord Keeper put the same questions, severally, to the House, which were again agreed to. But before the second question was put, the earl of Wharton desired, "That the Lords, who were for the first question, might say, Agreed, and that such Lords as were against it might enter their Protestations." Which they did accordingly.

A motion for adjourning to the Monday following being made, the earl of Rochester made another motion, That such lords as pleased, might make animadversions on the Protestations of such lords as should protest; which was agreed to. Then the duke of Buckingham said, one thing more was to be done before they adjourned, and that he would propose a question which he was sure would be readily agreed to, viz. "That the earl of Peterborough have the Thanks of the House for his eminent and remarkable services; and that the Lord Keeper return him the Thanks of the House immediately."

The Lord Keeper's Speech on giving the said Thanks.] This question being unanimously agreed to, the Lord Keeper addressed himself to the earl of Peterborough, in the following Speech;

"My Lord Peterborough; I am commanded by my Lords to return their Thanks to your lordship, for your many eminent and faithful services to your queen and country, during your command in Spain.—My Lord; The thanks of this illustrious assembly is an honour which has been rarely paid to any subject; but never after a stricter enquiry into the nature of any service; upon a more mature deliberation; or with greater justice, than at this time to your lordship.—Such is your lordship's known generosity and truly noble temper, that I assure myself, the present I am now offering to your lordship, is the more acceptable, as it comes pure and unmixed, and is unattended with any other reward, which your lordship might justly think would be an alloy to it.—My Lord; had more days been allowed me than I have had minutes, to call to mind the wonderful and amazing success, which perpetually attended your lordship in Spain, (the effect of your lordship's personal bravery and conduct) I would not attempt the enumerating your particular services, since I should offend your lordship, by the mention of such as I could recollect; and give a just occasion of offence to this honourable House, by my involuntary omission of the far greater part of them.—Had your lordship's wise councils, particularly your advice at the council of Valencia, been pursued in the following campaign, the fatal battle of Almanza, and our greatest misfortunes, which have since happened in Spain, had been prevented, and the design upon Toulon might have happily succeeded.—I shall detain your lordship no longer than in obedience to the order I have received, to return your lordship, as I do, the Thanks of this House, for your eminent and remarkable services to your queen and country, during your command in Spain."

The Earl of Peterborough's Answer.] "My Lords; For the great honour and favour I have received from your lordships, I return my most humble Thanks, with a heart full of the greatest respect and gratitude. No services can deserve such a reward. It is more than a sufficient recompence for any past hardships; and to which nothing can give an addition.

I cannot reproach myself with any want of zeal for the public service: but your lordships' approbation of what I was able to do towards serving my queen and country, give me new life; and I shall endeavour, in all my future actions, not to appear unworthy of the unmerited favour I have received to-day from this great assembly."

Protests on the Vote in Favour of the Earl of Peterborough's Account.] The Protests which many of the lords entered, were as follow:

"January 9, 1710-11, Resolved, That the earl of Peterborough has given a very faithful, just, and honourable Account of the Councils of war in Valencia.

"January 11th, 1710-11. To the questions for rejecting the Petitions of the earl of Galway and lord Tyrawley:

"Dissentient' Because, that when a question was stated in the House, which seemed to us to import a censure on the conduct of the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope, the two Lords being now in town, should, we conceive, have been heard in their defence, before the question passed, though they had not petitioned to put in their answers; much less ought the said petitions to have been rejected. And, we think, that their having been before examined, only as to what they remembered concerning the Council in Valencia, (when they did not know that any, much less what censure was intended upon the opinions given at that Council) is not sufficient to satisfy what we apprehend to be the rule of natural justice, that every one should have an opportunity of answering for themselves, at least, upon these their humble petitions, before what we take to be a public censure should pass upon them. (Signed,) Bedford, Halifax, Leicester, Ashburnham, Devonshire, Haveringham, Sunderland, Wharton, Kent, Lincoln, Dorchester, Berkley, Gibb. Sarum, R. Peterborough, Rockingham, Mohun, Marlborough, J. Winter, W. Carlisle, Jo. Landaff, Joh. Litchfield and Coventry, Stamford, Orford, Somers, Cowper, W. Lincoln, Scarborough, W. Asaph, J. Bangor, Herbert, Hervey, Bridgewater, Godolphin, J. Ely, C. Norwich, Dorset."

Then it being moved, That the earl of Galway and lord Tyrawley (if without) might be called in and heard, it was ordered accordingly; and they not being present, the House, according to order, was adjourned during pleasure, and put into a Committee to take into farther consideration the present State of the War in Spain.

After long time spent therein, the House was resumed, and the earl of Abingdon reported, That the Committee had come to the following Resolution, viz. "That the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope, insisting at a Conference held at Valencia, some time in January, 1706-7, in the presence of the king of Spain, and the queen's name being used in maintenance of their opinion, for an offensive war, contrary to the king of Spain's opinion, and that of all the general officers and public ministers, except the marquis des Minas; and the opinion of the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope, being pursued in the operations of the following Campaign, was the unhappy occasion of the battle of Almanza, and one great cause of our misfortunes in Spain, and of the disappointment of the duke of Savoy's expedition before Toulon, concerted with her majesty." And the question being put, That the House agree with the Committee in the said Resolution? It was resolved in the affirmative.

"Dissentient' 1. Because we conceive, that the proofs which have been before the House were not sufficient to warrant the facts as they were stated in the question. 2. Because we conceive, that the said proofs do not support the consequences drawn from the facts stated in the question; especially the disappointment of the expedition against Toulon, which (as we humbly apprehend) was clearly occasioned by other causes, and not by the cause assigned in the question. 3. Because we conceive, it may be of dangerous consequence, if those who may have the honour to serve the queen in Spain, should from hence have reason to apprehend, that they may be censured for presuming to insist on such opinions, as shall appear to them to be most for the queen's service, and the common cause, if contrary to the king of Spain, and his ministers."

The same Lords subscribed to these Reasons, as to that of rejecting the Petitions.

January 12. The House, according to order, was adjourned during pleasure, and put into a Committee to take into farther consideration the present State of the War in Spain: After a long time spent, the House was resumed, and the earl of Abingdon reported, that the Committee had come to the following Resolutions, viz. "1st, That it appears by the earl of Sunderland's Letter, that the carrying on the war offensively in Spain, was approved, and directed by the ministers, notwithstanding the design of attempting Toulon, which the ministers, at that time, knew was concerted with the duke of Savoy, and therefore are justly to be blamed for contributing to all our misfortunes in Spain, and to the disappointment of the expedition against Toulon. 2dly, That the earl of Peterborough, during the time he had the honour of commanding the army in Spain, did perform many great and eminent services; and if the opinion he gave in the Council of War at Valencia had been followed, it might, very probably, have prevented the misfortunes that have happened since in Spain." Then the first Resolution being read by the clerk, the question was put, That the House do agree with the Committee in this Resolution? It was resolved in the Affirmative.

"Dissentient' Because that, considering the army of the allies in Spain was to receive so great an addition of troops by the supply sent under the earl Rivers, the general desire and expectation of the kingdom to have the war brought to a speedy conclusion, and all other circumstances of the war, as it then stood; we are of opinion, that an offensive war was then the best for those in her majesty's service to advise; and we do not find reason, by any thing arising on the examinations and debates, to be of another opinion; the occasion of fighting the battle of Almanza, depending, as we conceive, on causes subsequent to that advice; the success of it, as we apprehend, being justly attributed to other manifest reasons, and the great design on Toulon, as finally adjusted with the duke of Savoy, not requiring, as appears to us, the assistance of any forces from Spain. THE EARL OF GALWAY'S REPLY, OF OBSERVATIONS UPON THE EARL OF PETERBOROUGH'S ANSWERS TO THE FIVE QUESTIONS PROPOSED TO HIS LORDSHIP BY THE LORDS, ARE AS FOLLOWS:

"Your lordships having been pleased to allow me a copy of all such Papers as have been produced, to prove the truth of the earl of Peterborough's Answers to the 5 Questions that were proposed to him by this honourable House, together with a copy of those Questions and Answers, with leave to answer to any such part thereof as I might conceive myself to be concerned in, and have not already sufficiently explained in my Narrative, I do take the liberty of observing to your lordships, that,

"The earl of Peterborough, to the first Question, is pleased to say, 'The management of the War in Spain, when under the conduct of other generals, was not only supported with great numbers of men, and vast sums of money, but also with notorious falsehoods, published in their favour, to excuse their repeated disgraces.' Whereas his lordship cannot but remember, that when he sailed from Portugal with the king of Spain to Barcelona, he left only one regiment of horse, and 5 of foot, under my command in that country; I have voluntarily offered him, and he has freely accepted of two regiments of dragoons from Portugal, and four battalions of foot from Gibraltar, which I had sent to the defence of that place.—I declare, I never traduced the said Earl's conduct, either by letters or otherwise, though it seems the queen had been fully informed thereof, particularly in regard to the misunderstanding between his lordship and the king of Spain, to which his catholic majesty has attributed his delays in marching to his capital, as may appear by count Gallas's Memorial, a copy whereof lies on your lordships' table. It is well known, the first disgrace that ever happened to us in Spain, was occasioned by his lordship's not joining us in time at Madrid; and all the misfortunes that attended us afterwards, were owing to that neglect.

"His lordship is pleased to say farther in his Answer to the same question, 'That to excuse the fatal battle of Almanza, a king was to be used at that rate, as to have it, in an account, printed by authority, declared, that he took numbers amounting to 4 or 5,000 men, from a battle to be fought for his crown, the very regiments of horse and foot mentioned by name: Whereas it is notoriously known to the whole world, that he took only about 200 miserable Spanish dragoons; and that of the regiments mentioned to be taken away from the English general in Valencia, some of them were never in being: others were regiments of trained bands in Barcelona; and none of them within 250 miles of that place.' Whereupon I beg leave to observe, That, notwithstanding the Earl's reflection on that Paper published by authority, the account therein printed is so far from having been exaggerated, that there were actually some battalions of regular troops absent in Catalonia, besides those mentioned in the Gazette, June 1707; and several officers who were at Almanza can depose, that there was not one Spanish corps, either horse, foot, or dragoons, on our side, at that battle.—If part of the king's forces were at 250 miles distance, that may be a reason why they could not be at the battle; but none can be given for their being at that distance, except in the case of some few garrisons, which might, indeed, have been necessary but could not require above 6 or 7 battalions, whilst the army was then in the field; whereas his catholic majesty had, at that time, in his own pay in Spain, above 6,000 men, besides the Dutch and English that were in Arragon and Catalonia. And those regiments which the Earl is pleased to call trained bands, because they bore the name of some particular town or province that raised or subsisted them, are no more so, than the regiments of Picardy and Burgundy in France, though newly raised.

"In his lordship's Answer to the second Question he is pleased to aver, 'That, from the time the earl of Galway came first into Spain as far as Almaras, and thence returned back to Portugal, the earl of Peterborough had no advices from the earl of Galway, no account of the motives of that retreat, or any hopes given him of the return of the Portuguese into Spain.' What his lordship says upon this occasion is very true, for whilst he was at so great a distance, besieged in Barcelona, and the duke of Berwick, with a considerable body of horse, between him and us, it was to no purpose to think of sending dispatches by land; neither was it necessary to inform the enemy that way, that the Portuguese were resolved (notwithstanding the repeated instances of the foreign generals to the contrary) to return back again to their own country, after their army had advanced as far as the bridge of Almaras. But when we got to Madrid, I immediately sent so many expresses with letters, both to the earl of Peterborough, and the king of Spain, that it was morally impossible his lordship could have been ignorant, above eight days, of our arrival there: and I have since been assured, by the inhabitants of Barcelona, that they were all informed of it by that time; from whence I must conclude, that his lordship's delays in joining us were voluntary, and not occasioned by want of intelligence. I have asserted in the Narrative, which I delivered into this most honourable House, that I do verily believe, if the Portuguese army had been joined in time after their arrival at Madrid, by the forces with the king of Spain, and under the command of the earl of Peterborough, we might have been able to have driven the duke of Anjou out of Spain, and have put an end to an expensive war: nor was this my opinion only, but that of all the world, at that time. And I find his lordship thinks it so far imports him, to be clear of this imputation, that he is resolved to be rid of it at any rate. For certainly, nothing less than an apprehension of this nature could have made him ever a fact so improbable as that, where, in his farther answer to the same question, he says, 'That he received no letter, no message from the earl of Galway,—after his second entrance into Spain; nor had the least notice of his situation, circumstances or designs, till he saw his troops retreating from the enemy, to take the strong camp of Guadalaxara.'—Now what could be the design of his lordship's marching to Guadalaxara, with so small a body of troops as is mentioned in my Narrative, unless he knew he was to meet us there? Besides, his lordship forgets that he came not to Guadalaxara till some days after the Portuguese had been actually encamped there, as I can make appear by the oath of several officers; and consequently, it was impossible for him to have seen us retreating thither.—I believe it may be necessary, upon this occasion, to repeat, that when his lordship did join us, he brought no more English troops with him, than one regiment of dragoons and a detachment of another, though he had actually at that time under his command in Spain, 13 English battalions, and four regiments of dragoons; as likewise, that the officer, who (his lordship says) passed through his quarters with letters from the king of Spain, and none for him, was never designed to have gone within several leagues of his lordship, unless he had been obliged to it by a party of the enemy, as I have already explained more at large in my Narrative; and I cannot help observing, it is very improbable that officer could have occasion to apply to the earl's secretary for money, because I gave him an hundred pistoles at the time I dispatched him.

"In his lordship's Answer to the third Question, he is pleased to say, 'That the earl of Galway continued about 40 days at Madrid, without making any endeavours to augment his troops, or provide any magazines for the subsistence of his army; that meeting the enemy unexpectedly, and retreating to the

'camp of Guadalaxara, the troops were without provisions, and in the greatest disorder.' In reply to this paragraph, I do affirm, that the Portuguese staid no longer time at Madrid, than was necessary to get the king proclaimed there, which did not exceed ten days; then advanced as far as Guadalaxara, about 60 miles beyond Madrid, where we obliged part of the duke of Anjou's troops to repass the river; but were not willing to engage them, at a time when he had reason to expect we should have been joined in a few days, by the forces with the king of Spain, and earl of Peterborough, which was the only secure method left us to augment our troops; for it would have been very imprudent to have attempted to form corps of the Castilians, who were entirely devoted to the duke of Anjou's interest. But all the officers of the army know, we were so far from wanting provisions ourselves, that we sent a convoy of 8,000 loaves to meet the king and the earl of Peterborough, which, by their delay in not advancing fast enough, grew mouldy; and was afterwards pillaged by the peasants. His lordship's information of our want of intelligence of the enemy's motions, and of our disorder upon the retreat, are as great mistakes as the former; for the occasion of our advancing to Guadalaxara was purely to post ourselves in such a manner, as to prevent the enemy from marching or sending detachments to intercept the king of Spain: and when we had reason to believe him out of danger, we returned to Guadalaxara, there to be joined by the king, and earl of Peterborough; nor was it possible for his lordship to have seen our disorder had there been any, because, as I have already observed, he came not to Guadalaxara himself, till some days after we had been encamped there.—Notwithstanding, the earl of Peterborough is pleased to say, 'That we lost 5,000 men in the retreat to Valencia, without a blow, and entirely ruined our whole cavalry.' 'Tis certain, our loss upon that occasion, was not very considerable, if any, and the retreat made in so good order, that the enemy (superior as they were in number) never durst venture to attack us, after the warm reception twenty two of their squadrons met with from two battalions under the command of colonel Wade, in the town of Villa-Nova, notwithstanding we were obliged to cross plains and rivers in their view.

"And though his lordship avers in his Answer to this Question, 'That this retreat was made against the king's opinion, and that of all his officers and ministers.' It is certain, the retreat was concerted and agreed upon in a council of war: It is true, some persons about the king seemed, at first, inclinable to have taken quarters in Castile, but that was soon after found impracticable; for none of those Spaniards, who were best acquainted with the country, could make a disposition of quarters, where the troops could be secure; and therefore it was resolved immediately to cross the Tagus, before the approaching rains should have rendered the is impracticable; which being done, our next design was to have lodged ourselves beyond the river Xucar; but neither could this be done, without taking a small town with a castle upon that river, that commanded a bridge, where the enemy had a garrison; and therefore a disposition was made for attacking this town: but by the delay of the king's generals the execution of this matter was so long deferred, that the enemy had already reinforced their garrison, and were advanced so near us with a superior force, that it was not thought advisable to attempt the place. Thus the only resource left us was the kingdom of Valencia, whither we were absolutely to retreat, that we might preserve our communication with the seas, and canton with security.—Nor is it to be wondered at, that count Noyelles, in his letter to the earl of Peterborough, should seem dissatisfied with the measures that were then taken, since it is well known, that general Sed underhand to ridicule those very opinions, in councils of war, to which he had given his assent: for, being disappointed of the command of the army, (which was what he expected at his first arrival) he seemed resolved that no other general should have an army to command. It is very notorious, that a Dutch and Spanish battalion, with a detachment of English and Portuguese, amounting to above 3,000 men, were sent to Cuenca, and thrown away here (after it had been resolved to retreat to Valencia) purely to satisfy his importunity; for always foresaw it would be impossible to protect a garrison at that distance from our quarters; but what is still more extraordinary, was sending the king's troops into Arragon with part of the Dutch, who might otherwise have been at the battle of Almanza, was another fatal effect of count Noyelles's advice.

"In the earl of Peterborough's Answer to the fourth Question, he is pleased to say, 'That several councils of war were held in the month of January at Valencia, about the time that intelligence was brought that the forces under the earl Rivers were entered into the Mediterranean, in order to adjust the measures for the ensuing campaign: that the matters therein debated were principally, whether the army should march towards Madrid, or seek the enemy: In the debate, the earl of Peterborough positively assures, that the earl of Galway, Mr. Stanhope, and the lord Tyrawley, supported those measures with the Portuguese general; and that the king, the count de Noyelles, the Spanish generals and ministers, with himself, argued strongly against those measures, as highly dangerous and impracticable; and this in repeated councils of war, till, at last, the earl of Peterborough, solicited by the king of Spain to renew the debate, desired the king that he would order all called to the council, to bring their opinions in writing, that every body's opinion, and reasons for that opinion, might appear, and be known to the world; which, according to the king's commands, were put in 'writing, and delivered at the council.'—In reply to this assertion, I would beg leave to appeal to your lordships' memories, whether upon the first mention of these resolutions in this most honourable House, the earl did not as positively affirm, 'That the conclusive council for the operations of the ensuing campaign was held on the 15th of January, and whether he did not offer to depose on oath, that in that very council, no person whatever was of opinion for making an offensive war, and against dividing the troops, but the lord Tyrawley, Mr. Stanhope, and I?' Soon after, indeed, upon farther recollection, he was pleased to add the marquis das Minas to our number; and, I observe, he has since given himself a much larger latitude, both as to the time of holding that council, and as to the persons who voted for an offensive war. His lordship is now so far from confining himself to a day, that he takes in the whole month, and, by accusing us more modestly, for having opposed only the king, count Noyelles, himself, and the Spanish generals and ministers, leaves half the council on our side, for supposing all the Spanish generals and ministers to have assisted at that council, there could only have been twelve persons there, viz. prince Lichtenstein, count Oropeza, count Corsana, count Cardona, count Noyelles, my lord Peterborough, the marquis das Minas, count d'Assumar, my lord Tyrawley, Mr. Stanhope, M. Freishman, and I. The last six his lordship has plainly left on our side; but my lord Tyrawley positively affirms, count Oropeza was of the same opinion, and believes count Corsana was so too. Thus, taking the matter as the earl of Peterborough is pleased to state it, we had an equality; and, as my lord Tyrawley remembers, the greater number, of our party.

"Perhaps when my lord Peterborough contends so positively to prove that council of the 15th of January conclusive, he was led into that error, by the mistake in my lord Sunderland's letter, in an answer to one of Mr. Stanhope's of January the 15th; but he has since been pleased to allow, that the council of the 15th was not conclusive, and that many more subsequent councils were held, which determined the operations of the ensuing campaign, wherein he voted himself for marching to Madrid, by the way of Arragon, which, I should have imagined, had left no farther room to mention our opinions of the 25th; but because he is still resolved to make good his charge against my lord Tyrawley, Mr. Stanhope, and me, he affirms to your lordships, That the occasion of that change in the subsequent council was, because the opinion of the majority had been over-ruled by a minister of her majesty, assuring, that the queen had given him orders to declare in her name, that her positive orders were, that they should seek the enemy, march to Madrid, and not divide the troops, upon any account whatsoever.

"I must confess, I do not conceive that it imports me much to reply to this part of the earl's answer, nor shall I attempt to make a defence for an absent man; for if Mr. Stanhope was here, I doubt not but he would be able sufficiently to justify his own conduct in this affair: yet I cannot help saying, that even malice itself has never yet suggested, that my lord Tyraway, Mr. Stanhope, and I, did not act, on that occasion, with great integrity, according to the best of our understandings; nor (with great submission to this most honourable House) shall I ever be ashamed to own an opinion, which was then, not only the common sense of the army, but agreeable to the desires and interest of the whole kingdom of England. In the earl of Peterborough's farther Question, he is pleased to say, 'That, notwithstanding this, the earl of Galway brought the army into the plains of Valencia, the direct contrary route to that of Arragon, and into all those dangers which he was to avoid, by marching by the head of the Tagus.' In reply to this Answer, I shall only observe, that I had not the command of that army (which consisted of three separate bodies, English, Portuguese and Dutch) but the marquis das Minas, from whom I always received orders; and the battle of Almanza was fought by the unanimous approbation of a council of war; nor could the resolutions of that council have ever been executed, had there been the least difference in opinion, because each commander of a separate corps might have refused to march.—For the occasion of our moving towards Almanza, I must beg leave to refer to my Narrative, where I have mentioned more at large, that, in order to execute the resolutions of those councils of war, where it was agreed, we should march to Madrid by the way of Arragon, but first to destroy the enemy's magazines on the frontiers of Valencia, I went with the marquis das Minas, in the beginning of April, to Yecla, where the enemy's chief magazines lay, and from thence to Villena, where we had advice of their troops being assembled at Almanza, upon which that council was held, wherein the battle was unanimously resolved on. The earl of Peterborough is pleased to add a reason for his opinion,—'That the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene had declared their sentiments for a defensive war at that time in Spain, and had communicated their thoughts to Charles 3, upon that subject, to the certain knowledge of the earl of Peterborough, as he can make appear by authentic papers from the king of Spain.'—I shall not take upon me to deny a matter of fact, which his lordship so positively affirms, but I have been credibly informed that the duke of Marlborough and my lord Godolphin, did both of them assure this most honourable House, that the true project against Toulon was not concerted by the earl of Peterborough, prince Eugene, and the duke of Savoy; but first set on foot by the duke of Marlborough with count Maffey in Flanders, and finished in England, with the counts Maffey and Briançon; but did not require that any troops should be sent from Spain, nor was ever communicated to the earl of Peterborough; which, indeed, his lordship seems to be aware of, when he says, not long after, that the project against Toulon, as settled by him, had been so altered, that the duke of Savoy publicly declared his dislike of engaging in it. And yet it is most certain, that his royal highness did engage in an attempt against Toulon, pursuant to the project concerted in England; and though that attempt did not prove entirely successful, it had a very good effect, for thereby a great body of the enemy's troops were diverted from acting elsewhere; and a considerable damage was done to the fleet and magazines of France. —What his lordship says, concerning a project that was formed for the taking of Orignaga before the opening of the campaign, is very true; but that project being afterwards found impracticable, for want of provisions, and the campaign drawing near, the earl Rivers's troops, which had been quartered, after their landing at Alicant, in the nearest and most commodious towns for their reception, were ordered to remove to the Oya de Castalia: two short days march from the places where they lay before, that the enemy might not get between them and the rest of our quarters, to surprize us.

'In the earl's Answer to the fifth Question he says, 'The king of Spain, when the troops were marching into Murcia towards the enemy, assembled a council of war to no other purpose, but to send by the hands of his Secretary of State a Protest, with his reasons why he would not march with the army, but to go to protect his subjects in Catalonia: the contents of which Protest the earl very well remembers, having had a copy of it by the king's order.' His lordship's memory, as positive as he is, must have failed him extremely in this matter, for the army never did march into Murcia, nor any part of it, except a detachment of the troops under his lordship's command which returned from thence with very ill success; and whatever he may aver to have been the reason of the king of Spain's leaving the army, and going to Catalonia, it is certain his journey thither was fixed long before the army assembled, for no other reason that I ever yet heard of, but because he had a mind to redress some disorders there; and his majesty always promised to be back again by the time our army should be ready to take the field: And it is notoriously known that the reasons for that journey were thought so insufficient, that not only all the foreign generals and ministers, but even the city and kingdom of Valencia, by their deputies, protested against it.

'As to what the earl of Peterborough is pleased to say, concerning those instruments which he has to produce, as proofs of the king of Spain's having been over-ruled on many occasions, in what he proposed for the public service—I can only reply, that I do not remember to have seen any of those proofs, except a letter of the king of Spain to his lordship, where his majesty observes that the English, Portuguese and Dutch generals had refused him men to send to Majorca in councils of war held on the 17th and 19th of January; from whence I hope, I may reasonably infer, the great probability of those generals having been of opinion, but two days before, against dividing the troops; And I must say, my behaviour to the king of Spain, whilst I had the honour to serve under him, was such that he never had occasion to complain against me, by his ministers to the queen, as he did most strenuously, by the count de Gallas, against the earl of Peterborough.

GALWAY.

Question put to Lord Galway, Why he gave the right to the Portuguese in Spain? It was generally believed that the Lords would have been contented, with having passed a slight occasional censure on the earl of Galway; which seemed the more probable, because the most considerable peers, of both parties, had spoken very honourably of him in the fore-mentioned debates: But on Friday the 17th of January, he was summoned to attend their lordships the Monday following. My lord Galway being then indisposed with a rheumatism and the gout, and therefore unable to obey that order; the Lords sent him a Question in writing, viz. Why, whilst he commanded the British forces in Spain, he gave the right to the Portuguese? To this the earl of Galway sent an answer, importing, 'That by the Treaty with Portugal, the troops of that crown were to have the right in their own country; and that in order to engage them to march to Madrid he was obliged to allow them the same honour; for otherwise, they would never have stirred out of Portugal.'

His Conduct therein voted dishonourable to the British Nation. Though this reason seemed very plausible; and it is certain, that if the Portuguese had not marched into Castile, upon my lord Galway's refusing to give them the right in Spain, his lordship would certainly have been generally reflected on, for losing the vast benefit that was reasonably expected from the conjunction of the Portuguese, with king Charles's forces, on a punctilio of military honour; yet, (perhaps, lest such a condescension should be drawn into a precedent) the Lords thought fit to resolve, by a majority of 64 voices against 44, "That the earl of Galway, in yielding the post of her majesty's troops to the Portuguese in Spain, acted contrary to the honour of the imperial crown of Great Britain."

The Lords enquire into the Number of effective Men in Spain, at the time of the Battle of Almanza. Jan. 31. The Lords resumed the consideration of the State of the Nation, in relation to the affairs of Spain; and debated, why there were but about 18,700 effective men at the Battle of Almanza, when the parliament had provided for about 29,000: After which, their lordships appointed a Committee to enquire into that matter. It is observable, that in this debate, no manner of fault was found with my lord Galway; and that the whole blame was laid on the late ministry.

Protest on the Vote concerning two Regiments on the Spanish Establishment. Feb. 3. Upon report from the Committee of the whole House appointed to take into further consideration the present State of the War in Spain, that they had come to this Resolution, viz. "That the two regiments upon the Spanish establishment, twice demanded, and provided for by parliament, were not supplied as they ought to have been." And the same being read, the question was put, Whether to agree with the Committee in this resolution? It was resolved in the affirmative. Contents 62; Not Contents 46.

"Dissentient"

"Because the Estimates in which the two regiments of Hill and Hotham were twice demanded, were agreed to by parliament for the service of Portugal, as well as of Spain; and that mistake could not, in our opinion, have been more effectually or sooner supplied than from Ireland, and in the manner they were; for it appears to us, the said Estimates were not agreed till the 11th of January, 1706-7.—That the necessary order for transporting four other regiments from Ireland to Portugal were issued on the 8th of February next following; and that the money provided for the said two regiments, twice reckoned, was applied to the payment of the said four regiments from the time of their embarkation. Norwich, Orford, Cornwallis, Bedford, Carlisle, Cowper."

Protest on the Vote concerning the Deficiencies of Men on the said Establishment. Then another Resolution of the said Committee being read, viz. "That by not supplying the deficiencies of the Men given by parliament for the war in Spain, the ministers have greatly neglected that service, which was of the greatest importance." The question was put, Whether to agree with the committee in the said Resolution? It was resolved in the affirmative.

"Dissentient"

"Because the Resolution on the former particular is not, as we conceive, a sufficient ground for this general vote; and the Committee of the whole House having declined to give any opinion on the other particulars, we think it unreasonable to proceed to a censure on the ministers for not supplying the deficiency, without first resolving on the several particulars, how far that deficiency might be justly imputed to them.—And we are of opinion, that all the money given by parliament, for the service of Spain and Portugal, has been timely and punctually issued for that service.

The rest of this Protestation was expunged by Order of the 9th instant, and is not legible. (Signed) Cornwallis, Jonat. Winton, Will. Carlhol', Jo. Representation of the Lords to the Queen concerning the State of the War in Spain.] Feb. 10. In consequence of what before passed in the House, relating to the Affairs of Spain, the following Representation of the Lords was this day presented to her majesty :

" 1. We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, do, with all humility and thankfulness, acknowledge your great goodness and condescension, in ordering to be laid before us many letters and papers relating to the war in Spain, by which, and by the examination of divers persons, and by the assistance of the earl of Peterborough, who, by your majesty's permission, informed us, with great exactness, of many particulars, and gave us a very faithful, just and honourable account of the councils of war held in Valencia, we have been enabled to discover some of those many miscarriages which have disappointed the hopes your majesty, and all Europe, justly conceived from the resolutions of your parliaments; and had they been pursued with as much care by those whom your majesty entrusted, as they were taken with zeal and good affection, the success, by the blessing of God, might have answered those expectations.

" 2. When we consider how generously your majesty engaged in this war for asserting the Liberties of Europe, and the rights of the House of Austria to the Spanish monarchy, which had been wrested from them by the artifices and usurpations of the French king, when a prince of that illustrious family came to your majesty for refuge against oppression, and that your majesty had received him into your protection, moved thereunto not only by your own innate goodness, but by the voice of your people too, who were ready to sacrifice their lives and treasure for the support of your majesty in the defence of so righteous a cause; and when we further consider what would have been the happy fruits of a successful war in Spain, the honour of your majesty, the safety, wealth, and prosperity of your own dominions, and the lasting peace of Europe; we are astonished to find, that any employed by your majesty should contribute to the disappointment of so glorious a design, or so much as neglect to promote it.

" 3. We were extremely surprized to find, by all the accounts now before us, that of the 29,395 men given by parliament for the service of the war in Spain, there should be present in Spain, at the time of the battle of Almanza, only 13,759.

" 4. However the earl of Galway, who commanded your majesty's troops at that time in Spain, may have deserved to be censured in other respects, we cannot charge him with the deficiency of 1710 men, twice reckoned in the regiments of Hotham and Hill: nor of 876 men of lord Barrimore's regiment, reduced by the earl of Peterborough, and was then raising in England: nor of 1833 men, allowed for servants of the officers belonging to the regiments actually in Spain, and not reduced at the time of the battle: nor of 151 of the widows men for all the regiments in Spain at that time: nor of 3741 men of the regiments of Farrington, Hamilton, Mohun, Brudenel, Allen and Toby Caulfield, that were reduced some time before the battle: nor of the 622 non-commissioned officers and private men of Blosset's regiment that were reduced by the earl Rivers and incorporated into Sybourg's.

" 5. For whatever defects there have been, these are most of them justly to be imputed, to those who had the management of your majesty's affairs here, whose duty it was to give the necessary orders, and to require the due execution of them, for a service which the nation had so much at heart, as the recovering Spain out of the hands of the French.

" 6. And therefore, whatever the reasons may have been, for reckoning the regiments of Hotham and Hill twice in the estimate presented to the House of Commons; yet, since the number of men demanded for that year's service was readily agreed to by them, we could not but be of opinion, that the two regiments upon the Spanish establishment twice demanded, and provided for by parliament, were not supplied as they ought to have been.

" 7. And, upon consideration of the other deficiencies, we have found reason to resolve, 'That, by not supplying the deficiencies of the men given by parliament for the war in Spain, the ministers have greatly neglected that service, which was of the greatest importance.'

" 8. And yet negligence and the profusion of vast sums of money given by parliament are not the only faults we have to lay before your majesty. We beg leave to add, that unaccountable advice given at Valencia, for an offensive war at that time in Spain, and approved of here, notwithstanding it was well known how few troops we had in Spain, even with the addition of those sent with the earl Rivers; and the fatal battle of Almanza, that ensued, the steps that led to it, and the sad consequences that attended it, under which we still labour.

" 9. The earl of Galway, lord Tyrawly, and general Stanhope, insisting, in a conference held at Valencia, some time in January 1706-7, in the presence of the king of Spain, and your majesty's name being used in maintenance of their opinion, for an offensive war, contrary to the king of Spain's opinion, and that of all the general officers and public ministers there (except the marquis das Minas); and that opinion of the earl of Galway, lord Tyraway, and general Stanhope, being pursued in the operations of the following campaign, was the unhappy occasion of the battle of Almanza, and one great cause of our misfortunes in Spain, and of the disappointments of the duke of Savoy's expedition before Toulon concerted with your majesty.

"10. And it appears, by the earl of Sunderland's letters, that the carrying on the war offensively in Spain was approved and directed by the ministers, notwithstanding the design of attempting Toulon, which the ministers at that time knew was concerted with the duke of Savoy; and therefore are justly to be blamed for contributing to all our misfortunes in Spain, and to the disappointment of the expedition against Toulon.

"11. Before we conclude this humble Address to your majesty, we think ourselves obliged to acquaint your majesty, that as the earl of Galway has, in yielding the post of your majesty's troops to the Portuguese in Spain, acted contrary to the honour of the imperial crown of Great Britain; so we find the earl of Peterborough, during the time he had the honour of commanding the army in Spain, did perform many great and eminent services; and if the opinion he gave in the Council of War at Valencia had been followed, it might very probably have prevented the misfortunes that have since happened in Spain.

"12. Having laid before your majesty this faithful Representation of the mismanagements of those persons entrusted with your most important affairs, and to whose counsels and conduct the fatal miscarriages of the war in Spain are in great measure to be imputed; we have an entire confidence, that your majesty will give such orders, and take such measures, with regard to our present circumstances, as may retrieve the bad effects of that unhappy management, to the advantage of the common cause, and to the obtaining a safe and honourable peace."

"My Lords; I am satisfied with the Examination you have had into the Management of the War in Spain; and thank you for the Representation you have laid before me, on that subject.—You may be confident, I will give the best orders our present circumstances can allow of, to put the affairs of that kingdom into a better condition; and take such measures as may most effectually contribute to the advantage of the common cause."<sup>a</sup>

<sup>a</sup> "When resolutions are taken up beforehand, the debating concerning them is only a piece of form used to come at the question with some decency: and there was so little of that observed at this time, that the duke of Buckingham said in plain words, that they had the majority, and would make use of it, as he had observed done by others, when they had it on their side. So, though no examination had been made, but into that single point of the numbers at Almanza, they came to a general Vote, That the late Ministry had been negligent, in the Management of the War in Spain, to the great prejudice of the nation; and they then ordered all their proceedings and votes to be put in an Address, and laid before the queen: And though they had made no enquiry into the expence of that war, nor into the application of the money, given by the parliament for it, yet in their Address they mentioned the great profusion of money in that service. This they thought would touch the nation very sensibly; and they hoped the thing would be easily believed on their word. Protests were made against every Vote, in the whole progress of this matter: Some of these carried such reflections, on the Votes of the House, that they were expunged. I never saw any thing carried on, in the House of Lords, so little to their honour as this was; some, who voted with the rest, seemed ashamed of it: They said, somewhat was to be done, to justify the queen's change of the ministry; and every thing elsewhere had been so well conducted, as to be above all censure: So the misfortune of Almanza, being a visible thing, they resolved to lay the load there. The management of the public treasure was exact and unexceptionable; so that the single misfortune of the whole war was to be magnified; some were more easily drawn to concur in these Votes, because by the Act of Grace, all those, who had been concerned in the administration, were covered from prosecution and punishment: So this was represented to some, as a compliment that would be very acceptable to the queen, and by which no person could be hurt. They loaded singly the earl of Galway, with the loss of the battle of Almanza, though it was resolved on in a Council of War, and he had behaved himself in it, with all the bravery and conduct that could be expected from a great general, and had made a good retreat, and secured Catalonia with unexpressible diligence. They also censured him for not insisting on the point of honour, in the precedence to be given to the English troops, as soon as the Portuguese Army entered into Spain: But, by our treaty with that crown, the army was to be commanded by a Portuguese general; so it was not in his power to change the order of the army: If he had made the least struggle about it, the Portuguese, who were not easily prevailed on to enter into Spain, would have gladly enough laid hold of any occasion, which such a dispute would have given them, and have turned back upon it: And so by his insisting on such a punctilio, the whole design would have been lost. We had likewise, in our treaty with discovered in the Victualling; and that a Member of that House was named therein: upon which the Commons resolved to present an Address to the Queen, to have those Examinations laid before them: which being done accordingly, and the same referred to a Committee, Mr. Ridge, the member named therein, desired that he might attend that Committee, to make his innocency appear: of which, the consequence will be seen in its proper place.

Abuses in the Victualling-Office inquired into.] January 3. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, (Mr. Harley) acquainted the Commons, "That on Examinations relating to the Navy, taken before the Lords-Commissioners of the Treasury, some very considerable Abuses had been

Two Lotteries.] The money did not come into the treasury so readily as formerly, neither upon the act of 4s. in the pound, nor on the duty laid on Malt. So to raise a quick supply, there were two bills passed, for raising three millions and a half by two lotteries; the first of 1,500,000 l. and the second of 2,000,000 l. to be paid back in 32 years; and for a fund to answer this, duties were laid on hops, candles, leather, cards and dice, and on the postage on letters. In one branch of this, the House of Commons seemed to break in upon a rule, that that had hitherto passed for a sacred one. When the duty upon leather was first proposed it was rejected by a majority; and so, by their usual orders, it was not to be offered again during that session: but, after a little practice upon some members, the same duty was proposed, with this variation, that skins and tanned hides should be so charged; this was leather in another name. The Lotteries were soon filled up; so, by this means, money came into the treasury; and indeed this method has never yet failed of raising a speedy supply.* There was no more asked, though in the beginning of the session, the House had voted a million more than these bills amounted to; which made some conclude, there was a secret negotiation and prospect of peace.

Inquiry concerning the Palatines.] The Commons, finding the encouragement given to the Palatines was displeasing to the people, resolved to inquire into that matter. In order to this, a Petition was procured from the inhabitants of St. Olave, and other parishes, complaining of the great number of Palatines inhabiting in one house, whereby it was feared some contagious distemper might happen, and them, yielded expressly the point of the flag in those seas, for which alone, on other occasions, we have engaged in wars; so he had no reason to contest a lesser point: yet a censure was likewise laid on this. And this was the conclusion of the enquiries, made by the House of Lords this session." Burnet.

* Tindal.—The scheme of the Lottery was drawn by Mr. John Bloat, scrivener of London; who was employed by the lords of the treasury; which being approved was inserted in the Lottery-bill. When it was advertised, on the 10th of March, that the payments would begin to be taken in at Mercers-hall on the 13th, it was found, that about 266,000 l. had been subscribed at the bank of England, above the first payment of the whole sum of one million and a half.

having not wherewithal to subsist themselves, were likely to become chargeable to the parish. This Petition was immediately referred to the consideration of a committee, appointed for that purpose, with instructions to enquire, upon what invitations or encouragement the Palatines came over, and what monies were expended in bringing them into Great-Britain, and for maintaining them here, and by whom paid. As the design was now formed to load the late administration all that was possible, it was pretended, that, in the whole affair of the Palatines, there was a design against the church, and to increase the numbers and strength of the dissenters. The queen was addressed for the papers relating to the bringing over and subsisting the Palatines; and at last the House agreed to the following Resolutions of their committee, "That the inviting and bringing over into this kingdom the poor Palatines, of all religions, at the public expence, was an extravagant and unreasonable charge to the kingdom, and a scandalous misapplication of the public money, tending to the increase and oppression of the poor of this kingdom, and of dangerous consequence to the constitution in church and state. 2. That whoever advised the bringing over the poor Palatines into this kingdom, was an enemy to the queen and kingdom." And because a letter, written by the earl of Sunderland in the queen's name, to the council of trade, was laid before them, by which they were ordered to consider of the best methods of disposing of the Palatines; it was moved to lay the load of that matter on him in some severe votes. But this was put off for that time, and afterwards, by several adjournments delayed, till at last it was let fall.*

A Bill to repeal the Naturalisation Act rejected by the Lords.] While the heat, raised by this enquiry, was kept up, the Commons passed a bill to repeal the act for a general Naturalization of all Protestants, which had passed two years before, pretending that it gave the encouragement to the Palatines to come over, though none of them had made use of that act, in order to their Naturalization. This was sent up to the Lords; and the lord Guernsey, and some others, entertained them with tragical declamations on the subject; yet, upon the first reading of the bill, it was rejected, so the great joy of all the foreign Protestants. It is remarkable if the bill was designed to prevent the French refugees from enjoying the benefit of the Naturalization, it had in some measure a contrary effect: for whereas, since the passing of the act for a general Naturalization, scarce 1500 of them took the advantage of it; above 2000 were naturalized after the motion for repealing it was made, till it was rejected by the Lords. A bill that was formerly often attempted, for disabling members of the House of Commons to hold places, had also the same fate.†

† Ibid.

House of Commons.] Jan. 20. The engrossed bill, for securing the Freedom of Parliaments, by limiting the number of Officers in the House of Commons; being read a third time in that House, and the question put, whether it should pass, it occasioned a debate, wherein several members in the court-interest, endeavoured, by many arguments, to show the Inconveniency of such a bill, especially at this juncture; but the country party prevailing, the question was carried in the affirmative, and the bill sent up to the Lords.

Resolutions concerning the Abuses in the Victualling.] Feb. 15. The Commons took into consideration the Report from the committee appointed to enquire into the Abuses of the Victualling; and the said Report being read, it was unanimously resolved, "That it appears to this House, that, in the management of her majesty's Brew-house, as well as in the Contracts for furnishing the Navy with Beer, there have been many notorious Imbezilements, and scandalous Abuses, to the defrauding the public of great sums of money, to the injury and discouragement of the seamen:" and ordered, "That the Commissioners of Victualling have a copy of the said Report."

Mr. Ridge expelled the House, and an Address voted for his being prosecuted.] After this, Mr. Ridge was heard in his place to the matter of the Report relating to him, and being withdrawn, it was resolved, 1. "That it appears to this House, that Thomas Ridge, esq. a member of this House, is guilty of great Frauds and Abuses, by having contracted to furnish 5,513 tons of beer upon his own account, and 2,704 of beer in partnership with Mr. Dixon, and having received bills for the whole, although he delivered but 3,213 tons the first, and 1,269 upon the latter contract. 2. That Thomas Ridge, esq. be for the said frauds and abuses expelled this House. 3. That an humble address be presented to her majesty, that she will be pleased to give direction to her attorney-general to prosecute the said Mr. Ridge, for the said frauds and abuses*."

* "However, this gentleman was not prosecuted, but continued to serve the navy as before; for, upon examination, it appeared that in fact the public suffered no wrong. The case stood thus: the service of the fleet had of late lain for the most part in the Mediterranean, where the difference of climate rendered the beer sent from hence useless; and the seamen, being not able to drink it there, required wine and water, which is ordinarily used on board the fleet in those parts. But as the victualling-office can, in their accounts, charge beer only, it was allowed to the seamen by the office to take money of the brewer, wherewith to buy wine in the Streights. Thus, though beer was not delivered, and the seamen drank wine, yet the nation paid for no more than the allowance of beer. Many other brewers were complained of on the same account, but it was plain this was only a shew of

Further Resolutions concerning the Frauds and Abuses in the Victualling.] Feb. 22. The Commissioners of the Victualling attending the House of Commons, according to order, they were called in, and presented to the House their Representation upon the Report made by the Committee appointed to examine the Abuse complained of in the Victualling: which Representation was ordered to lie upon the table until the Report of the said Committee be taken into consideration, which was appointed to be on the Tuesday following. Accordingly, on the 27th, the House resumed the farther consideration of the Report from the Committee, appointed to enquire into the Abuses of the Victualling, and came to the following Resolutions: 1. "That it appears to this House, That Mr. Dixon, a brewer at Portsmouth, is guilty of great frauds and abuses, in having contracted to furnish 2,704 tons of beer for the last year's service, in partnership with Mr. Ridge, and receiving bills for the whole, when he had delivered but 1,269 tons. 2. That Mr. Player, another brewer at Portsmouth, is guilty of great frauds and abuses, in having contracted to furnish 7,724 tons of beer for the last year's service, and receiving bills for the whole, when he had delivered but 4,164 tons. 3. That Mr. Rolfe, a brewer at Harwich, is guilty of great frauds and abuses, in having contracted to furnish 2,782 tons of beer for the last year's service, and receiving bills for the whole, when he had delivered but 1,102 tons. 4. That Mr. Best, a brewer at Chatham, is guilty of frauds and abuses, in having contracted to furnish 455 tons of beer for the last year's service, and receiving bills for the whole, when he had delivered but 331 tons. 5. That Mr. Tyhurst, a brewer of Rochester, is guilty of great frauds and abuses, in having contracted to furnish 883 tons of beer for the last year's service, and receiving bills for the whole, when he had delivered but 126 tons. 6. That Mr. Kelley, a brewer of Deal, is guilty of great frauds and abuses, in having contracted to furnish 1,424 tons of beer for the last year's service, and receiving bills for the whole, when he had delivered but 202 tons. 7. That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, that she will be pleased to give directions to her attorney-general to prosecute the said Mr. Dixon, Mr. Player, Mr. Rolfe, Mr. Best, Mr. Tyhurst, and Mr. Kelley, for the said frauds and abuses. That: captain Whitehall, agent-victualler at Dover, is guilty of a great misdemeanour, in dispensing with Mr. Kelley's swearing to the affidavit for delivery of beer, and in being privy to the frauds and abuses committed by the said Mr. Kelley. 9. That Mr. Wilkins, agent-victualler at Portsmouth, is guilty of a great misdemeanour, in certifying the delivery of much greater quantities of beer than were delivered. 10. That Stephen Moxley, servant at Harts-horn brew-house, is guilty of a great crime, in being privy to the embezzling great quantities of beer and casks. 11. That Mr. Horsington, under-clerk at the Harts-horn brew-house, is guilty of a great misdemeanour, in giving Mr. Stibbs a certificate to defraud the queen of 25 tons of beer. 12. That Noah Overing, master-brewer, Bernard Goddard, deceased, late clerk of the brew-house, and Thomas James, clerk of the check at the Harts-horn brew-house, have been guilty of very great misdemeanours, in signing certificates for great quantities of malt and hops, which were neither answerable to the sample, nor fit for use."

Then the Representation of the Commissioners of Victualling, which they had delivered in upon the said Report, being read, it was likewise Resolved, 13. "That the Commissioners for the Victualling of her majesty's Navy, have been guilty of great negligence and remissness in their duty; and that the loss the public has sustained by the many frauds and abuses that have been committed in the victualling of her majesty's navy, has been chiefly occasioned by a notorious mismanagement in that office. 14. That the said frauds and abuses have been one great occasion of the heavy debt that lies upon the navy. 15. That the persons who have been instrumental in discovering the said frauds and abuses, have well-deserved her majesty's reward and encouragement."

After which it was ordered, That the report from the committee appointed to enquire into the Frauds and Abuses committed in the Victualling her majesty's Navy, with the Resolutions and Order of this House thereupon, be printed.

Bill for qualifying Members of the House of Commons passed both Houses.] Feb. 16. An engrossed Bill 'for securing the Freedom of Parliament, by the farther qualifying the members to sit in the House of Commons,' was read the third time, and several amendments were made, by the House, to the Bill; after which the same was passed, and sent up to the Lords, who, on the 22d, gave their concurrence to it.*

* "The design of this bill was to exclude courtiers, military men, and merchants, from sitting in the House of Commons, in hopes, that, this being settled, the land-interest would be the prevailing consideration in all their consultations. They did not extend these qualifications to Scotland; it being pretended, that, estates there being generally small, it would not be easy to find men so qualified capable to serve. This was thought to strike at an essential part of our constitution, touching the freedom of elections: and it had been, as often as it was attempted, opposed by the ministry, though it had a fair appearance of securing liberty, when all was lodged with men of estates: yet our gentry was become so ig-

Message from the Convocation relative to the want of Churches in London.] March 1. The Speaker of the House of Commons acquainted the House, That there had been with him, the day before, in the evening, the Prolocutor of the Lower House of Convocation, with Dr. Stanhope, dean of Canterbury; Dr. Stanley, archdeacon of London; Dr. Smealridge, proctor for the chapter of Litchfield; and Dr. Delaune, proctor for the diocese of Oxford; and brought him an Order and a Message, which were read, and are as follow, viz.

'Feb. 28, 1710. It was ordered by the Lower House of Convocation, that the Prolocutor, attended by Dr. Stanhope, dean of Canterbury; Dr. Stanley, archdeacon of London; Dr. Smealridge, proctor for the chapter of Litchfield; and Dr. Delaune, proctor for the diocese of Oxford, should wait upon Mr. Speaker of the honourable House of Commons, and impart him the following Message, agreed to by the said House, sen. com.

Domus Infer' Convocationis.'

'Mr. Speaker;
'The Lower House of Convocation have, with great satisfaction, taken notice of an instruction given by the honourable House of Commons to a Committee, [appointed to examine a Petition of the minister and churchwardens of Greenwich, praying relief for the rebuilding of that church] to consider what churches are wanting within the cities of London and Westminster, and suburbs thereof, and report the same to the House.—It was in our thoughts to have done what in us lay towards setting forward so pious a design; but we are glad to find ourselves happily prevented by the zeal of that honourable House, which, at the time that they placed you in the chair, gave us an earnest of their entire disposition, to do every thing that might be for the honour and advantage of the church of England.—We do, in the name of the whole clergy of this province, return our unanimous thanks to the honourable the Commons, for this instance of the affectionate regard they have shewn to the welfare of the established church, and the common interest of religion.—Mr. Speaker; I am directed by the Clergy of the Lower House of Convocation, to signify their readiness to promote the work now in view, by imparting such lights as they are able to afford, in relation to the extreme want of Churches, in and about these populous cities, under which we at present labour.

norant, and so corrupt, that many apprehended the ill effects of this: and that the interest of trade, which indeed supports that of the land, would neither be understood nor regarded. But the new ministers resolved to be popular with those who promoted it; so it passed, and was much magnified, as a main part of our security for the future." Tindal.

Resolutions of the Commons thereupon.] Hereupon, the Commons resolved; "That this House will receive all such Informations, as shall be offered to them from the Clergy of the lower House of Convocation, with relation to the want of Churches in the cities of London and Westminster, and suburbs thereof. 2. That his House will, in all matters immediately relating to Religion, and the welfare of the established Church, have a particular regard to such applications, as shall at any time, be made to them from the Clergy in Convocation assembled, according to the ancient usage, together with the parliament."

The Commons inclined to a further Resumption of King William's Grants.] The same day, the House, being somewhat perplexed how to find ways and means to raise the great supply granted to the queen, and, at the same time make provision for the deficient Funds, and national debts, bethought themselves of a further Resumption of king William's Grants: and ordered a Bill to be brought in, 'To appoint Commissioners to examine the value of all lands and other interests granted by the crown, since the 13th of February, 1688-9, and upon what considerations such Grants were made, in order to resume the same; and to apply them to the use of the public;' and Mr. Strangeways, Mr. Shippen, and Mr. Lockart were appointed to prepare and bring in that Bill.

Address of both Houses concerning Guiscard's Attempt upon Mr. Harley, at the Council Table.] March 9. The Commons resolved to present an Address to the Queen, concerning the Attempt* committed on the person of Mr. Har-

* "In the House of Commons there appeared a new combination of Tories of the highest form, who thought the court was yet in some management with the Whigs, and did not come up to their height, which they imputed to Mr. Harley; upon which account they began to form themselves in opposition to him, and expressed their jealousy of him on several occasions, sometimes publicly. But an odd accident, that had almost been fatal, proved happy to him. The marquis de Guiscard enjoyed his pay as colonel, till some time after the battle of Almanza; when that ceased, he declined to have a settled pension in the time of the late ministry: but his intimacy with some persons, who had been removed from their employments, particularly Mr. St. John, with whom he entered into a strict confidence and community of pleasures, did not at all promote his affair. When Mr. St. John, by the great change at court, was advanced to the post of Secretary of State, the marquis expected to have found a great support in him. But as all friendships, that are not grounded on virtue, are ever short-lived, the secretary, who had some time before quarrelled with the marquis about a mistress, or rather a child, which neither of them would own, was hardly prevailed ley; which being immediately drawn up and sent to the Lords, for their concurrence, their lordships readily agreed thereto. However, with to speak in his favour. However, upon his faint recommendation, the queen ordered him a pension of 500*l.* a year; but Mr. Harley, who never liked Guiscard, not only reduced his pension to 400*l.*, but declined to have it put upon a fixed establishment. The marquis endeavoured several times to apply to the queen for redress; but being denied access, and highly disgusted with the usage he received from those very persons, whom he had looked upon as his intimate friends, he tried to make his peace with the court of France, and, in order to that, wrote to M. Moreau, a banker in Paris. His letter being directed to a person in Portugal, under the cover of the earl of Portmore, his lordship, suspecting something, opened one of the packets, and, finding in it a dangerous correspondence, sent it back to his lady, the countess of Dorchester, who delivered it to Mr. Harley; and by her means another packet, which Guiscard would have transmitted to Portugal, was intercepted. It was pretended by some, that those letters contained only loose reflections on the weakness and mean capacity of the present ministry; but, whatever was the purport of them, the marquis was, on the 8th of March, apprehended in St. James's park for high-treason, by virtue of a warrant from Mr. secretary St. John. He was so surprized and disordered, that he desired the messenger, who disarmed him, to kill him; and, being brought to the Cockpit in the height of despair, he took the resolution to make his ruin fatal to those who occasioned it; and, seeing in the room where he was confined, a penknife, which lay among pens in a standish, he took it up unperceived by the messengers, who watched him. A committee of council being summoned on this extraordinary occasion, and the lord-keeper Harcourt, the earl of Rochester, the dukes of Buckingham, Newcastle, and Ormond, earl Paulet, Mr. Harley, and the three secretaries of state, the duke of Queensberry, the lord Dartmouth, and Mr. St. John, being met, the marquis was brought before them to be examined. Mr. St. John asked him several questions about his corresponding with France; to which he returned evasive answers, with an assured countenance. But when Mr. St. John asked him, Whether he knew Mr. Moreau, banker at Paris? producing, at the same time, the intercepted letters; the marquis appeared very much surprized. Finding himself discovered, and despairing of a pardon, he resolved to put his black design in execution. It was the general opinion, that his design was to make his first attempt upon Mr. St. John; which appears the more probable, because, as soon as he thought himself in a manner convicted of the crime for which he was apprehended, he desired to speak with him in private? but Mr. Secretary told him, that was the Queen being still indisposed, it was the 13th before both Houses waited upon her majesty with the following Address:

“We your Majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, have, to our great concern, been informed of a barbarous and villainous Attempt, made upon the person of Robert Harley, esq. chancellor of your majesty’s Exchequer, by the marquis de Guiscard, a French Papist, at the time when he was under examination for treasonable practices, before a committee of your majesty’s council.

“We cannot but be most deeply affected, to find such an instance of inveterate malice against one employed in your majesty’s council, and so near your royal person; and we have reason to believe, that his fidelity to your majesty, and zeal for your service, have drawn upon him the hatred of all the abettors of popery and faction.

“We think it our duty, upon this occasion, to assure your majesty, that we will effectually stand by and defend your majesty, and impracticable and unusual: that he was before the committee of the council, as a criminal; and, if he had any thing to offer, it must be said to them all. The marquis persisting in his desire to speak only to Mr. St. John, they went to ring the bell, to call in the messengers to carry him away; which he observing, said, ‘Voilà qui est dur, pas un mot.’ ‘That’s hard;’ ‘not one word.’ Being disappointed in his design against Mr. St. John, who sat out of his reach, he stepped towards the table, as if he intended to say something to Mr. Harley; and, stooping down, said, ‘J’en veux donc à toi.’ ‘Then have at thee;’ and stabbed him about the middle of the breast; but the pen-knife, lighting on the bone, broke about half an inch from the handle; which Guiscard not perceiving, redoubled the blow, and with a great force struck Mr. Harley not far from the first wound. When Mr. St. John saw Mr. Harley fall, he cried out, ‘The villain has killed Mr. Harley;’ and, drawing his sword immediately, as did also the duke of Newcastle, and some others, they gave Guiscard several wounds. But when they saw Mr. Harley get up, and heard earl Paulet cry out, not to kill Guiscard, they gave over making passes at him. Some of the privy-counsellors secured themselves with chairs against the rage of the assassin, who seemed to threaten them all. Others ran out of the room to call for help; and the messengers and door-keepers having rushed in, and offering to lay hold on Guiscard, he struggled for a while, and overthrew some of his assailants: but, at last, Wilcox, one of the queen’s messengers, a very strong man, grappled with him, and gave him several bruises, particularly one in the back, which was afterwards judged to have occasioned his death.

“Mr. Harley’s wound was presently search-

those who have the honour to be employed in your service, against all public and secret attempts of your enemies; and we most humbly beseech your majesty, that you will be pleased to take all possible care of your sacred person, on whose life the welfare and happiness of your people, as well as the liberties of Europe entirely depend.

“And we do in all humility represent to your majesty, that one effectual means, conducing to the safety of your majesty’s royal person, will be to give such directions, as, in your great wisdom, shall seem most proper, for causing papists to be removed from the cities of London and Westminster.”

The Queen’s Answer.] Her majesty’s Answer to this Address was;

“My Lords and Gentlemen, I take this Address very kindly from you, on the occasion of that barbarous attempt upon Mr. Harley, whose zeal and fidelity in my service must appear yet more eminently, by that horrid endeavour to take away his life, for no other reason that appears, but his known opposition to popery and faction.

ed, and appeared to be a very slight one, yet he was long in the surgeon’s hands. Some imputed this to an ill habit of body; others thought it was an artifice, to make it seem more dangerous than indeed it was. Guiscard’s wounds were deeper, and not easily managed; for at first he was sullen and seemed resolved to die, yet after a day he submitted himself to the surgeons; but did not complain of a wound in his back till it gangrened; and of that he died. It was not known what particulars were in his letters, nor was it known what he confessed.—This accident was of great use to Mr. Harley for the party formed against him were ashamed to push a man, who was thus assassinated by one, that was studying to recommend himself to the court of France, and who was believed to have formed a design against the queen’s person; whose health was at this time much shaken, she having had three fits of an ague, and the last a severe one; but the progress of the disease was stopped by the bark.

“The day after Mr. Harley received his wound, both houses of parliament agreed upon an Address to the queen, &c. And, when Mr. Harley came first to the House of Commons after his recovery, he was by their order congratulated upon it by Mr. Bromley, their Speaker, in a set flattering speech, wherein he prayed, ‘That the same providence, that had wonderfully preserved him from some unparalleled attempts, and had raised him up to be an instrument of great good at a very critical juncture, when it was much wanted, might continue still to preserve so invaluable a life, for the perfecting of what was so happily begun; that they might owe to his counsels, and to his conduct, the maintenance and firm establishment of our constitution and church and state.’” Tindal.

The said Answer being afterwards reported to death such villainous attempts; and Ordered, “ That leave be given to bring in a bill to make an attempt on the life of a privy-counsellor to be felony without benefit of the clergy; and that Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Cæsar, sir Gilbert Dolben, Mr. Manley and Mr. Hungerford do prepare and bring in the same.”

Report concerning the Bill for stating the Public Accounts.] March 19. Sir Simon Stuart reported from the committee of the whole House, to whom the bill ‘ For taking, examining, and stating the Public Accounts of this kingdom’ was committed, that they had left the blanks in the bill for the Commissioners Names, and for the title of the Bill, to be filled up by the House, and had made several Amendments, which he read, and afterwards delivered in at the table; where they were read and agreed to by the House. Then it was ordered, “ That the Bill with the amendments be engrossed; and resolved, 1. That the number of Commissioners be seven. 2. That no person be a Commissioner who hath any office of profit, or is accountable to her majesty. 3. That the Commissioners may be members of this House.
And 4. That the Commissioners be chose by way of balloting.” After which it was ordered, “ That the members of the House should prepare lists to be put into glasses of 7 persons names to be Commissioners for taking, examining and stating the public accounts of this kingdom.” Which being done accordingly, a Committee was appointed to examine the Lists:

On Monday, the 19th of February, Mr.
vol. VI.

Eversfield, knight of the shire for the county of Sussex, made a Complaint to the House, of a Letter, which, he was informed, had been written by sir James Mountague, member for the city of Carlisle, in order to promote his election there; and which, he conceived, reflected on her majesty's honour. Being asked, Whether he had seen the original of that letter?
He said he had not, but only a copy of it; for the truth of which he was ready to produce his voucher. Sir James Mountague denying the fact, and offering to prove the contrary, the enquiry into that matter was put off to the next day; when the House being informed, That colonel Gledhill was at the door, and had something to offer to the House; he was called in, and, at the bar, charged sir James Mountague with writing the letter before-mentioned, reflecting upon the honour of her majesty. This occasioned a long and warm debate, and sir James Mountague still denying the writing of such a letter; and desiring that the bishop of Carlisle, to whom he had, indeed, written a letter about his election, and who waited in the lobby, might be examined about it; colonel Gledhill, on the other hand, desired time to produce his witnesses, who, he said, were in the country, to prove his charge. Whereupon, by a majority of 154 voices against 151, it was ordered, That that matter be taken into consideration on that day 3 weeks.*

* “ During that interval,” (says the author of the Political State) “ I made it my business to find out the ground of this Accusation, which, if my informations be right, was only this;
when the late election for Carlisle, where sir James Mountague used to be chosen and now stood candidate, came on, the friends of his competitors, (as it is usual in such cases, to take all advantages) gave out, That sir James being removed from his place of Attorney-General, the chusing of him again might be interpreted a disrespect to the court. Sir James being informed of this suggestion, wrote to his friend, the bishop of Carlisle, ‘ That though the queen ‘ had thought fit to put another in his place, yet
‘ he was so far from having incurred her majesty's ‘ displeasure, that, on the contrary, her majes‘ ty had graciously been pleased, in considera‘ tion of his former services, to bestow on him
‘ a pension of 1,000*l.* per ann.’ This letter being communicated to some of the electors, sir James Mountague's opponents took from thence occasion to object, That since he had a place of profit, meaning the pension, he could not be chosen member: of which sir James having notice, he wrote a second letter to the bishop of Carlisle, to remove that groundless objection; intimating; ‘ That he had no place of profit, but only a pension for life, which qualified him to be chosen.’ Sir James Mounta-gue's friends having thought it necessary to have this letter dispersed, colonel Gledhill took a copy of it, and shewing his notes, afterwards, to some of his acquaintance, he was told, he had omitted the most remarkable part of the

On the 9th of March, the Commons being informed, That the queen had ordered the officers of her army in Spain, to repair to their commands there, resolved to address her majesty, That she would be pleased to give leave to colonel Gledhill to stay some days longer: which her majesty readily granted.

The Bishop of Carlisle censured for dispersing Sir James Mountague's Letters.] On the 14th, the House resumed the consideration of the Complaint; and the colonel was called in, and some witnesses were examined, as well on his part, as of sir James's: who being withdrawn, and the House being informed, That the lord bishop of Carlisle, (who had been mentioned in the evidence given at the bar, in relation to a Letter written to him by sir James Mountague, and several copies of part thereof transcribed by his lordship, and sent to several persons) desired to be admitted to be heard; he was admitted in, and heard accordingly. And his lordship being withdrawn, sir James Mountague was heard likewise. This occasioned a warm debate, that lasted till late at night: after which the Commons resolved, "That it appears to this House, That William lord bishop of Carlisle had dispersed several copies of a Letter, pretended to have been received from sir James Mountague (a member of this house) in order to procure sir James Mountague to be elected a citizen of the city of Carlisle, reflecting on the honour of her majesty; and, by concerning himself in the said election, hath highly infringed the liberties and privileges of the Commons of Great Britain." Then the question being put, That colonel Gledhill has made good his charge against sir James Mountague; it passed in the Negative. But, nevertheless, it was Resolved, That colonel Gledhill had sufficient grounds for bringing the said charge before this House.

Col. Fitz-Patrick taken into custody, for challenging Major-General Peirce, a Member of the House.] March 19. A complaint being made to the Commons, that lieutenant-colonel Fitz-Patrick had challenged major-general Peirce, (a member of this House, for words he had spoke in the debates of this House) in breach of the privilege of this House: It was ordered, That the said lieutenant-colonel Fitz-Patrick (for having challenged major-general Peirce, a member of this House, for words he had spoke in the debates of this House) was guilty of a breach of the privilege of this House; and ordered, That lieutenant-colonel Fitz-Patrick be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms.

mon, viz. That the queen had given sir James Mountague a pension, to enable him to carry 'his election.' Whereupon he reformed his notes according to his wrong information, and shewed them to some parliament men, who, out of respect to the queen, thought it their duty to lay that matter before the House of Commons, in order to wipe off the supposed scandal cast on her majesty's honour."

mons adjourn.] March 20. The House being informed, that Clobery Bromley, esq. son to the Speaker, died that morning; out of respect to the father, and to give him time, both to perform the funeral rites, and to indulge his just affliction, they thought fit to adjourn to Monday the 26th.

The Queen's Message to the Commons for the building of New Churches.] March 29. Mr. Secretary St. John acquainted the Commons, That he had a Message from her majesty; and he presented the same to the House; which was as follows:

"ANNE R.

"Her majesty having received an Address from the archbishop, bishops, and clergy of the province of Canterbury, in Convocation assembled, to recommend to the Parliament the great and necessary work of building more Churches within the bills of mortality, is graciously pleased to approve so good and pious a design: and does, accordingly, very heartily recommend the carrying on the same, to this House, particularly in and about the cities of London and Westminster; and does not doubt but effectual care will be taken in this matter, which may be so much to the advantage of the Protestant religion, and the firmer establishment of the Church of England."

Resolution of the Commons thereupon.] Whereupon the Commons resolved, "That the humble Thanks of this House be returned to her majesty, for her majesty's most gracious Message, in recommending so good and pious a design, as the building of Churches in and about the cities of London and Westminster; and to assure her majesty, that this House will enable her majesty to make an effectual provision for the carrying on so good and necessary a work:" And appointed a Committee to draw up an Address upon the said Resolution, and upon the debate of the House.

Vote of the Commons for building 50 New Churches in London and Westminster.] April 6. Mr. Annesly reported from the Committee, to whom the Petition of the minister, churchwardens, and several other inhabitants of Greenwich, in the county of Kent, and several other Petitions, were referred; and who were also to enquire what monies remain in the hands of the Commissioners for rebuilding the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's, and consider what the produce of the duties in being, appropriated for that purpose, may amount to for the time to come, and make an Estimate of what will be necessary for finishing and adorning the said Church, and other the purposes in the acts mentioned, for building the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's; and also to consider what Churches are wanting within the cities of London and Westminster, and suburbs thereof, and report the same to the House; That the Committee had considered the several matters to them referred, and had directed him to report how the same appeared in relation thereunto, and had come to a Resolution, which they had also directed him to report to the House, and he read the said Report and Resolution, and afterwards delivered the same in at the table, where the same were read, and the Resolution agreed to, viz. "That, in the several parishes in and about the suburbs of the cities of London and Westminster, 50 New Churches are necessary to be erected for the reception of all such as are of the Communion of the Church of England, computing 4,750 souls to each Church:" and then the said Report was referred to the consideration of the Committee of the whole House, who were to consider farther of the Supply.

The Commons' Address thereon.] April 9. The Speaker, with the House, waited on her Majesty, at St. James's, with the following Address:

"Most gracious Sovereign; We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, have, with the utmost satisfaction, received your majesty's gracious Message, recommending to us the great and necessary work of building new Churches, in and about the cities of London and Westminster.—We are sensible how much the want of them hath contributed to the increase of Schism and Irreligion, and shall not fail therefore to do our parts towards the supplying that defect, being entirely disposed to promote every thing that is for the interest of the established Church, and the honour of your majesty's reign.—Neither the long expensive War in which we are engaged, nor the pressure of heavy debts, under which we labour, shall hinder us from granting to your majesty whatever is necessary to accomplish so excellent a design, which, we hope, may be a means of drawing down blessings from heaven on all your majesty's other undertakings, as it adds to the number of those places, where the prayers of your devout and faithful subjects will be daily offered up to God, for the prosperity of your majesty's government at home, and the success of your arms abroad."

The Queen's Answer.] To which her majesty returned this Answer:

"Gentlemen, your Address is extremely acceptable to me, as it is a proof of your zeal for the interest of the established Church, and for the advancement of religion: I will take care that what you grant, shall in the most speedy and effectual manner, be applied to the good purpose for which it is intended."

Bill to prevent Bribery in Elections dropped.]

April 16. The Commons read the third time an engrossed Bill 'For the better preventing Bribery and Corruption, and other undue practices in Elections of Members to serve in parliament:' And the Speaker having opened the Bill, several amendments were made to it: but a great debate arising thereupon, the same was adjourned to the next day; when the question being put, that the Bill do pass, it was carried in the Negative.

Commissioners for resuming King William's Grants chosen.] April 17. The Commons proceeded to the choice of Commissioners for examining the Value of Lands, and other interests granted by the Crown, since the 15th of February, 1688-9, and upon what considerations such Grants were made, in order to resume the same, and apply them to the use of the public; and the clerk and clerk assistant went on each side the House with glasses, to receive from the members, the Lists of persons names to be Commissioners. A Committee being afterwards appointed to examine the Lists, they made their report the 18th, and it appeared that the following persons had the majority, viz. Sir Simeon Stuart, 377; Mr. Eversfield, 270; Mr. Hind Cotton, 212; Mr. Bulkeel, 167; Mr. Hewetson, 157; Mr. Blackmore, 156; Mr. Wrightson, Mr. Mackenzie, 151.—The two last having an equal number of Votes, the Commons balloted again for a Commissioner on the 21st, and upon examining the Lists, it was found, that Mr. Wrightson had the majority.

April 24. The Commons read the third time, the Bill 'For resuming the Grants made by the crown since the 15th of February, 1688,' and, having inserted in it the Commissioners Names, resolved, That the Bill do pass, and sent it to the Lords for their concurrence. But, on the 30th of April, their lordships rejected that Bill; which, by many, was thought partial, and injurious to the memory of the late king William.*

The Queen's Message to the Commons concerning the Emperor's Death, and to quicken their Proceedings.] April 20. Mr. Secretary St. John acquainted the House, That he had a Message from her majesty; and he presented the same to the House, which Mr. Speaker read, and is as follows:

ANNE R.

"Your majesty is pleased to acquaint this House with the ill news she hath received of the Emperor's death; and, being sensible of the consequence this great loss may be of to the allies; how disheartened some of them may be

* "The Tories still continued to pursue the memory of king William; they complained of the grants made by him, though these were far short of those, that had been made by king Charles the 2nd; but that they might distinguish between those, whom they intended to favour, and others, against whom they were set, they brought in a bill, empowering some persons to examine all the grants made by him, and to report both the value of them, and the considerations upon which they were made: this was the method, that had succeeded with them before, with relation to Ireland; so the bringing in this bill was looked on, as a sure step, for carrying the resumption of all the grants, that they had a mind to make void. When the bill was sent up to the Lords, the design appeared to be an unjust malice, both against the memory of king William, and against those who had best served him; and therefore, upon the first reading, the bill was rejected." on the one hand, and how diligent France will be on the other, to improve every accident to their own advantage, her majesty is desirous to let you know, that, immediately, on the first news of the Emperor's sickness, she came to a resolution to support the interest of the House of Austria, in this conjuncture, and to use her utmost endeavours to get the king of Spain made Emperor, in which the States-General have likewise concurred with her majesty; and, since that, her majesty hath taken the most proper means to engage all those who have a share in this Election, and are in the interest of the common cause, to join with her, in bringing this great work to a good issue, and she hath an entire confidence in the affection and duty of her parliament, that, with their assistance, under the protection and blessing of Almighty God, she shall be enabled to make a happy conclusion of this War, in a safe and honourable Peace.—The season of the year, and the length of time that has passed since your meeting, will make you all wish, that you may be at liberty to attend the public, as well as your own private affairs, throughout the kingdom; and therefore her majesty does recommend to you, so to hasten your consultations about all the public concerns, that her majesty may put a speedy end to this session."

Vote thereon.] Hereupon it was unanimously resolved, "That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, to return her majesty the humble thanks of this House for her majesty's most gracious Message, and to assure her majesty, that this House is truly sensible of the great loss the alliance hath sustained by the death of the Emperor, and of the early and wise care her majesty has been pleased to take, to prevent the ill consequences thereof, by resolving to support the interest of the House of Austria, and by endeavouring to get the king of Spain elected Emperor. And farther, to assure her majesty, that she may safely place an entire confidence in the duty and affection of this House, which cannot be discouraged by this misfortune, from supporting her majesty in all those measures, she in her great wisdom shall judge proper, to bring this war to an happy conclusion, by a safe and honourable Peace; and that this House will give all possible dispatch to the public business depending before them, that so her majesty may put a speedy end to this session."

Address of both Houses thereon.] A Committee being appointed to draw up an Address upon this Resolution, they withdrew immediately into the Speaker's chamber for that purpose; and soon after sir Thomas Hanmer, their chairman, reported the said Address; which, being agreed to, was sent to the Lords for their concurrence. The Lords having readily concurred, the same evening both Houses waited on the queen with the following Address:

"Most gracious Sovereign; We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, beg leave to return your majesty our most humble thanks for your majesty's most gracious Message. We are truly sensible of the great Loss the Alliance hath sustained by the death of the Emperor; and do, with all duty, acknowledge the early and wise care your majesty has been pleased to take, to prevent the ill consequences thereof, by resolving to support the interest of the House of Austria, and endeavouring to promote the election of the king of Spain to the empire,—Your majesty may safely place an entire confidence in our duty and affection, and may rest assured that we cannot be discouraged, by this, or any other misfortune, from supporting your majesty in all the measures, which your majesty in your great wisdom shall judge proper, to bring this war to a happy conclusion by a safe and honourable Peace. And being truly convinced, how necessary it is to give all possible dispatch to the public business, we will use our utmost diligence in every part of it depending before us, that your majesty may have the satisfaction of putting a speedy end to this session."

The Queen's Answer.] The Queen's Answer to this Address was,

"My lords and gentlemen, I thank you very heartily for this Address; it is of great importance, that the world shall know, that both Houses of parliament do so unanimously approve the measures, I have taken on this occasion of the Emperor's death, which will very much encourage our allies to continue united in the common cause."

Report concerning the Imprest Accounts.] On the 4th Mr. Auditor Harley had reported from the Committee to whom it was referred to enquire how far the several Imprest Accountants had passed their respective Accounts, and to consider of methods for the more effectual and speedy compelling the said accountants to pass their accounts; and to obviate all irregularities and unnecessary delays in the same, the matter as it appeared to them, which they had directed him to report to the House; and he read the same in his place, and afterwards delivered in the Report at the table.

Resolutions of the Commons thereupon.] Hereupon it was ordered, That it should be taken into consideration the Tuesday following; on which day it was further put off, first to the 17th and then to the 24th, of that month; when the Commons came to the following Resolution, "That, of the moneys granted by parliament, and issued for the public service to Christmas, 1710, there were 35,302,107*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.\ for

* "This was a vast sum; but, to make it up, some accounts in king Charles's time were thrown into the heap; the lord Ranelagh's accounts of the former reign were the greatest part; and it appeared, that in no time accounts were so regularly brought up, as in the queen's reign. Mr. Bridges's accounts, of 14 or 15 millions, were the great item, of which, not above half a million was passed; but there a great part whereof, no Accounts had been laid before the auditors, and the rest not prosecuted by the accountants, and finished.'

Then the further consideration of that Report was put off till the 28th, when, after some debate, it was resolved, "That the not com-were accounts of above 11 millions brought in, though not passed in form, through the great caution and exactness of the duke of Newcastle, at whose office they were to pass; and he was very slow, and would allow nothing, without hearing counsel on every article. The truth is, the methods of passing accounts were so sure, that they were very slow; and it was not possible, for the proper officers, to find time and leisure to pass the accounts that were already in their hands. "In the same manner he states the accounts of Atkinson, Nutting, Mason, Povey, Mickethwayte, and Savery; by which it appears, that of the thirty-five millions, above thirty millions were accounted for, though not all passed, and that the total to be accounted for, amounted only to 4,330,135*l.* which, Mr. Maynwarding observes, was much short of a year's supply. He says further on this subject, 'the several Accountants duly to pass their respective Accounts, had been a notorious breach of trust in those that, of late years, had had the management of the treasury, and an high injustice to the nation.' Then a motion being made and the question put, That the

He then exposes the partiality of the House of Commons, of which he was himself a member, in ordering so unjust a Vote to be printed: adding, "and now if I may be allowed to suppose what I think I have fully proved, that many irregularities, and unavoidable delays, attend the passing of some accounts, which no care or industry can prevent. If it happens, that the nature of the services, and the method of payment in some offices, being inconsistent with the course of the exchequer, require privy seals, and are the work of longer time than is limited for passing accounts; if it appears, that these irregularities, incident to accounts, are yet necessary for the accommodation of the service, and not to be avoided without infinite prejudice to the management; and if it appears, that the security of the public does not entirely depend upon the actual passing of accounts, provided they have been daily rendered," all which he fully makes out. "I hope people will begin to be satisfied, that the nation has not been cheated of 35 millions." Tindal.

* "April 27. I am heartily sorry to find my friend the Secretary stand a little ticklish with the rest of the ministry; there have been one or two disobliging things that have happened, too long to tell: and the other day in parliament, upon a debate of about 35 millions that have not been duly accounted for, Mr. Secretary, in his warmth of speech, and zeal for his friend Mr. Brydges, on whom part of the blame was falling, said, he did not know that either Mr. Brydges or the late ministry were at all to blame in this matter; which was very desperately spoken, and giving up the whole cause: for the chief quarrel against the late ministry was the ill management of the treasure, and was more than all the rest together. I had heard of this matter: but Mr. Foley beginning to discourse to-day at table, without naming Mr. St. John, I turned to Mr. Harley and said, if the late ministry were not to blame in that article, he (Mr. Harley) ought to lose his head for putting the queen upon changing them. He made it a jest; but by some words dropt, I easily saw that they take things ill of Mr. St. John, and by some hints given me from another hand that I deal with, I am afraid the Secretary will not stand long. This is the fate of Courts. I will, if I meet Mr. St. John alone

The Speaker congratulates Mr. Harley on his Escape and Recovery.] On the 11th of April the Commons resolved, nem. con. "That when the right hon. Robert Harley, esq. Chancellor of the Exchequer, attends the service of the House, the Speaker do, in the name of the House, congratulate the said Mr. Harley's Escape, and Recovery,* from the barbarous and villainous Attempt, made upon him by the Sieur de Guiscard." Accordingly, on the 26th. Mr. Harley being in the House:

The Speaker, pursuant to the above Resolution, did in the name of the House congratulate him as follows:

"Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer;

"When the barbarous and villainous attempt, made upon you by the Sieur De Guiscard, a French papist, was communicated to the House, they immediately declared, they were most deeply affected, to find such an instance of inveterate malice against you; and observing, how you have been treated by some persons, they concluded, they had reason to believe, that your fidelity to her majesty, and zeal for her service, had drawn upon you the hatred of all the abettors of popery and faction.—In this opinion they must be abundantly confirmed, since the lords, and the queen, have concurred with them.—Sir; If your fidelity to her majesty, and zeal for her service, could ever be doubted, and wanted any testimonials, to prove them, you have now the most honourable, the most ample, and the most undeniable, that can be given; and, after these, it would be an unpardonable presumption in me to imagine, I could add to them, by saying any thing of your faithful discharge of those great trusts, you have been honoured with, to which your eminent abilities at first recommended you, and your distinguishing merits have since justified her majesty's wise choice.—Your very enemies, Sir, acknowledge this by their unwearied and restless endeavours against your person, and reputation. God be thanked, they have been hitherto disappointed, and have not been able to accomplish, what their inveterate, but impotent, malice had designed against both. And may the same providence, that has wonderfully preserved you from some unparalleled attempts, and that has raised you up to be an instruon Sunday, tell him my opinion, and beg him to set himself right, else the consequences may be very bad; for I see not how they can well want him neither, and he would make a troublesome enemy." Swift's Journal.

* "April 10. They talk of great promotions to be made; that Mr. Harley is to be lord treasurer, and lord Poulet master of the horse, &c. but they are only conjecture. The Speaker is to make Mr. Harley a compliment the first time he comes into the House, which I hope will be in a week. He has had an ill surgeon, by the caprice of that puppy Dr. Radcliffe; which has kept him back so long; and yesterday he got a cold, but is better to-day." Ibid.

Mr. Harley's Speech thereon.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer returned the House his humble Thanks, for the great honour they had done him, as follows: viz.

“ Mr. Speaker;

“ The honour this House hath done me, which you have expressed in so obliging a manner, is a sufficient reward for the greatest merit: I am sure it so far exceeds my deserts, that all I can do, or suffer, for the public, during the whole course of my life, will still leave me in debt to your goodness.—By the acceptance you have vouchsafed my poor services, how noble an encouragement, worthy of you, has this House given all our fellow-subjects to exert themselves in the glorious cause of preserving the constitution in Church and State, and in loyalty to the best of sovereigns?—This, without doubt, was your view; and this may convince all, who are not designedly obstinate, how dear the true interest of the nation is to his honourable assembly.—Sir; The undeserved favour, I have received this day, is deeply imprinted in my heart; and whenever I look upon my breast, it will put me in mind of the thanks due to God, my duty to the Queen, and that debt of gratitude and service I must always owe to this honourable House, to you, Mr. Speaker, and to every particular member.”

Mr. Harley's Bill for the South Sea Trade.] May 2. The Commons being in a committee of the whole House on Ways and Means, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Harley* proposed a scheme he had formed, to satisfy all public

* “ April 23. I believe Mr. Harley must be Lord Treasurer; yet he makes one difficulty which is hard to answer: he must be made a peer, and his estate is not large enough, and he is too generous to make it larger; and if the ministry should change soon by any accident, he will be left in the lurch. Another difficulty is, that if he be made a peer, they will want him prodigiously in the House of Commons, of which he is the great mover, and after him the Secretary, and hardly any else of weight.

“ May 23. I met sir Thomas Mansel and Mr. Lewis in the Park. Lewis whispered me, that Mr. Harley's patent for earl of Oxford was passed in Mr. Secretary St. John's office; so to-morrow or next day I suppose he will be deand national Debts and Deficiencies, by allowing the proprietors of those Debts and Deficiencies an interest of six per cent. per ann. redeemable by parliament; and incorporating them to carry on the trade to the South-seas; which, if once settled, will yearly bring vast riches from Peru and Mexico into Great-Britain.

Resolutions of the House thereon.] This Project being received with general approbation, the Committee came to these Resolutions: 1. That a yearly sum not exceeding 140,000*l.* for 32 years out of the weekly sum of 700*l.* arising out of the Post-office, and out of the duties upon hides, skins, vellum and parchment, granted in this session of parliament, be set apart and appropriated for raising a sum not exceeding 1,500,000*l.* by contribution, for Exchequer orders payable in course, with a certain increase of principal and interest, according to several classes, with addition of chances. 2. That a Fund be granted to her majesty, her heirs and successors, for payment of the interest of 6*l.* per cent. per ann. from the 24th of December, 1711, for the several public debts and deficiencies, for which a supply was granted by the resolutions of this House the 10th of March last; and also for the interest for the said debts and deficiencies to the 25th of December, 1711; and that such Fund be made redeemable by parliament. 3. That towards the raising the said Fund, the several impositions and additional impositions, rates and duties, and sums of money, which by an act made in the eighth year of her majesty's reign, entitled (among other things) ‘ An act for continuing several impositions, additional impositions, and duties upon goods imported, to raise money by way of loan for the service of the year 1710,’ were granted and continued, or applied for the payment of the principal-money, to be lent or advanced by virtue of the said act or the interest thereof, shall be granted and continued to her majesty, her heirs and successors, from the several days and times for which, by the said act, they are so granted and continued, or applied for ever, redeemable by parliament. 4. That, in order to make the said fund the more effectual, all such tallies, and orders as have been made out by virtue of the said act, made in the eighth year of her majesty's reign, shall be engrafted into, and upon the said general fund, and that the several impositions, additional impositions, rates and duties, and sums of money by the said act granted, continued or applied for the payment of the said tallies and orders, shall be made a part of the said general fund, for paying the said princlared earl of Oxford, and have the staff. This man has grown by persecutions, turnings out, and stabbing. cial and interest-money, during all such time as the same are by the said act granted, continued, or applied as aforesaid. 5. That, towards the said fund, the duties upon candles, and rates upon money to be given with clerks and apprentices, which, by an act made in the eighth year of her majesty's reign, were granted to her majesty from the first day of May 1710, for the term of five years, he farther granted and continued to her majesty, her heirs and successors, from the last day of April 1715, for ever, redeemable by parliament. 6. That the proprietors of the said Debts and Deficiencies, be incorporated, to carry on the trade to the South Seas. 7. That what the said rates and duties before agreed to, be part of the said fund, for payment of the said interest, shall fall short of paying the said interest, such deficiency shall be annually paid out of the first aids, that shall from time to time, be granted by parliament."

These Resolutions being the next day reported were agreed to by the House; and a Bill was ordered to be brought in thereupon *.

* "The last thing settled by the parliament, was the creating a new fund for a trade with Spain. The Commons, on the 20th of January, had appointed a Committee to examine the debts of the Navy; and, about two months after they reported, that these debts amounted to above five millions. This great debt upon the navy was occasioned partly by the deficiency of the funds appointed for the service at sea, but chiefly by the necessity of applying such supplies as were given, without appropriating clauses, to the service abroad, where it was impossible to carry it on by credit, without ready money: so it was judged necessary to let the debt of the navy run on upon credit; by which means it had risen up to so many millions, and the discount on Navy-bills was very high. All this debt, with many others, were thrown into one stock, amounting in the whole to 9,471,325*l.* and a fund was formed for paying an interest or annuity of 6 per cent. till the principal should be paid, which interest amounted to the annual sum of 568,279*l.* 10*s.* For the raising of this sum, all the duties upon wines, vinegar, and tobacco, India goods, wrought silks, whale-fins, &c. were, after the year 1716, continued for ever, and till then the parliament was to make an annual provision for the interest. With this fund was also granted the monopoly, of a supposed trade to the South-sea or coast of Peru in America; the several proprietors of the Navy-bills, Debentures, and other public securities, being to be incorporated for that purpose. This grant may justly be called chimerical, since the projector knew he was entering upon a negotiation of peace, which by the cession of Spain and the West-Indies, would for ever exclude the English from the privileges of trading to Peru and Mexico. Accordingly instead of such trade, king Philip, upon the conclusion of the peace, gave the precarious licence to send a ship or two thither yearly, limiting them both as to tonnage and value of

"The flatterers of the new ministers made great use of this to magnify them, and to asperse the old ministry. But the earl of Godolphin's unblemished integrity was such, that no imputation of any sort could be fastened on him; and therefore, to keep up a clamour, they reflected on the expence he had run the nation into, upon the early successes in 1706, which were very justly acknowledged, and cleared in the succeeding session, as hath been related. But that affair was now revived, and it was said to be an invasion of the great right of the Commons in giving supplies, to enter on designs, and to engage the nation in expence not provided for by parliament. This was aggravated with many tragical expressions dispersed, entitled, "Observations on the Bill relating to the Mine-Adventurers," several paragraphs of it were read, and thereupon it was unanimously resolved, "That the said printed Paper was a false, malicious and scandalous Libel, highly reflecting on the honour and justice of this House, and the proceedings thereof," and a committee was appointed to enquire who was the Author, Printer and Publisher of the said Libel. Six days after, Mr. Carter made a Report from that committee, in which, sir Humphrey Mackworth, a member not then in the House, being named, the consideration of the said Report was put off till the next day, when sir Humphrey being in his place, owned and begged pardon for the writing of the paper.

Resolutions on the Increase of Public Debts, and diverting Money appropriated by Parliament.] May 15. Mr. Lownds, (Secretary of the Treasury) presented to the House, the Representations and Memorials made by the Commissioners of the Victualling, relating to the provisions and victualling of the land-forces, with a List of them. And the order of the day being read, for taking into farther consideration the Report from the Committee, to whom it was referred, to examine and state the Public Debts, of the Navy, and other public offices, for which no provision was made by parliament: the House proceeded to take into consideration the said Report; and the said Representations and Memorials were read, after which it was resolved, 1. "That the increasing the public expences beyond the Supplies annually granted by parliament, hath been the chief occasion of the debts of the nation, and an invasion of the rights of parliament.— 2. That it appears to this House, That the sum of 660,806*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.* hath been paid out of the moneys issued to the service of the Navy, for provisions supplied to land-forces sent to Spain and Portugal, and for the garrison of Gibraltar, for which no deductions have been made from the pay of those forces, nor any part of that sum assigned to the Victualling, notwithstanding the several letters and Representations made to the Treasury in that behalf. 3. That such diverting of moneys issued to the service of the Navy, to the land-service, hath lessened the credit of the Navy, discouraged the seamen, occasioned the paying extravagant rates on the Navy-contracts, and was a misapplication of the public money. 4. That the applying any sum of un-appropriated money, or surplusages of funds to usages not voted, or addressed for by parliament, hath been a misapplication of the public money."

Resolution for a Representation to the Queen concerning Mismanagements and Abuses.] May 24. It was Resolved, "That an humble Representation be made to her majesty upon the several Reports and Resolutions of this House relating to the Imprest-Accounts, the public Debts, the Arrears of Taxes, the Abuses in the Victualling, the bringing over the Palatines, and the charter imposed upon the corporation of Bewdley, in the county of Worcester:" and upon the debates of the House, a Committee was appointed to draw up the said Representation.

Representation of the Commons concerning Mismanagements and Abuses.] June 4. The Commons, with their Speaker, repaired to St. James's, and presented to her majesty the said Representation, as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign;

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, have, with the utmost zeal and unanimity, applied ourselves to the dispatch of those great and important affairs, which your majesty was pleased to recommend to us from the throne, and we humbly hope, that we have, in every respect, answered your majesty's expectations in calling this parliament.—In making suitable provisions for the public service, we have met with great difficulties from the Anticipation of Funds, and the large sums with which the public Revenues stand charged for long terms of years to come: however, we have not been discouraged, but have, with great diligence, carried on our endeavours to raise such supplies, as, we trust, will be effectual, not only for the service of the present year, but also for the discharge of the heavy debts, so long, and so justly complained of, And, as the absolute necessity of carrying on the war, and our Resolutions to support the public credit, and maintain the honour and justice of parliament, have obliged us to increase the burthen of taxes upon our fellow-subjects, so we are persuaded; that the same reasons will induce them to pay those taxes with cheerfulness and satisfaction.—At the same time, we have thought it another part of our duty, to enquire into the causes of the heavy debts we labour under, and to trace the source of that great evil, as what we thought would, in some degree, satisfy the minds of your people, and prevent the like mischief for the future.—This was a promise, and an assurance which we presumed to give your majesty at the beginning of this session: and now, at the conclusion of it, we beg leave to lay before your majesty the result of our enquiries, which, we hope, your majesty will not judge to be unworthy your royal consideration.

“ In examining into the State of the War, and looking back from the beginning of it, we find, that, in several years, the service has been enlarged, and the charge of it increased beyond the bounds prescribed, and the annual supplies granted by parliament: to this new and illegal practice, we must, in great measure, ascribe the rise and growth of the heavy Debts that lie upon the nation; nor does the consequence of it end there; for, we must also represent it to your majesty as a dangerous invasion of the rights of parliament. The Commons must ever assert it as their sole and undoubted privilege, to grant money, and to adjust and limit the proportions of it; and when your majesty has recommended to them, to consider of Supplies, and they have deliberated upon the several Estimates for the annual services, and considered and determined what the nation is able to bear, their proceedings would be very vain and ineffectual, if, after the respective sums are stated, and granted, those, through whose hands the disposition of them passes, are allowed, in any measure, to alter and enlarge them. This is an attempt which very little differs from levying money without consent of parliament, as will appear to your majesty from this one consideration, that a charge of that kind once incurred, and laid as a debt upon the navy, or any other public office, is so far binding upon Parliament, that, how little soever they approve of the means by which it was contracted, yet the public credit being pawned, the Commons cannot, without the ruin of that, refuse to provide for it.

“ This also has been an occasion, why great sums of unappropriated money, arising from the exceedings and surplusages of some of the funds granted by Parliament, have not been applied, as they ought to have been, in aid of the deficiencies of other funds. Had this just care been observed, the debts of the nation could not have increased to so exorbitant an height: but other uses were found out, such as were neither voted, nor addressed for, by Parliament, which, therefore, we adjudge to have been a misapplication of the public money.

“ With regard to the Debts of the Navy, we find, that one great discouragement and burthen, which that part of the service has lain under, has been from a liberty that has been used, of diverting several sums issued to that service, and transferring them to other purposes, for which they were not intended; particularly, that the sum of 660,806*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.* belonging to the navy, has been paid for provisions supplied to land forces sent to Spain and Portugal, and for the garrison of Gibraltar; for which, no deductions have been made for the pay of those forces, nor any part of that sum re-assigned to the Victualling, notwithstanding the several acts of parliament provided, and the many letters writ, and representations made to the Treasury in that behalf. This unjustifiable proceeding has been a discouragement to seamen, occasioned the paying extravagant rates upon contracts, and has very much contributed to sink the credit of the navy.

“ To this we must add the many notorious Embezzlements, and scandalous Abuses, which appear to have been practised, as well in the management of your majesty's Brew-house, as in the contracts for furnishing the navy with Beer. We have already presumed to address your majesty, that several persons whom we have discovered to have been guilty of these frauds, should be prosecuted at law for their offences; and we entirely rely upon your majesty's most gracious assurance, that those prosecutions should be effectually carried on: But we must also, upon this occasion, beg leave, farther to represent to your majesty, That the Commissioners appointed to take care of the Victualling your majesty's Navy, have been guilty of great negligence and remissness in their duty; for the instructions, which go along with that Commission, are so well adapted to the preventing those very abuses which have been committed, that nothing but a notorious mismanagement in that office, and an inexcusable neglect in pursuing those instructions, could have given way to the great loss the public has sustained in that part of the service.

“ The evil effects of this Mismanagement in public offices, and misapplication of Parliamentary Supplies, have been increased by the very methods of bringing in the public money; for it has appeared to us, that the receivers of the land tax, and of the other revenues, have not been called upon to pay in the money they had received, in due time, as the law requires. Such has been the extreme remissness, and accountable indulgence of those, whose duty it was to oblige those receivers to make due and punctual payments, that on the 8th day of December, 1710, there was an arrear of several land taxes, for 3 years, ending the 24th of March, 1709, amounting to the sum of 272,596*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.* some part of which was paid into the Exchequer after the Commons had ordered an enquiry into that matter; yet the sum standing out, at the beginning of April, 1711, was 130,439*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* From the occasions, the public remains long under the load of interest, for want of that money which lies in the hands of receivers; so that the Supplies granted to your majesty, how ever large, or well proportioned to the occasions of the war, could never prove effectual to prevent the increase of debts, whilst they were neither collected nor disbursed faithfully, according to the ends and methods designed by parliament.

“ Thus far we have proceeded in discovering some of those causes which have brought so great a weight of debts upon the nation, and we might have made a much greater progress in our enquiries, if the accounts of the public money had been regularly passed; but to our great surprize and concern, we find, that they who, of late years, had the management of your majesty's Treasury, and ought to have compelled the several accountants duly to pass their repective accounts, have been guilty of so notorious a breach of trust, and of so high an injustice to the nation, that the monies granted to parliament, and issued for the public service by Christmas, 1710, there remains unaccounted for the sum of $5,302,107*l.* for a great part of which no accounts have so much as been laid before the auditors; and for the rest, though some accounts have been brought in, yet they are not been prosecuted by the accountants, and finished. This has made it impracticable for us to arrive at so exact a knowledge of the state of the nation, with regard to the public money, as we wished and might have expected; and your majesty will please to consider, in such an immense sum unaccounted for, how many embezzlements may be concealed, and how justly it may be suspected, that so scandalous a remissness has been allowed with no other design. We humbly beseech your majesty, that you will give immediate and effectual directions for the compelling the several imprest accountants speedily to pass their accounts; and, in the mean time, we humbly hope, your majesty will approve the resolution of your Commons, 'That such of the accountants who have neglected their duty in prosecuting their accounts, ought no longer to be entrusted with receiving the public money.'

"We cannot omit taking notice to your majesty, of another extraordinary instance, in which the public money has been misapplied, by bringing over the poor Palatines to inhabit and settle themselves in this kingdom: this was not only an extravagant and unreasonable expence in itself, but many other ways uneasy and grievous to your people; for, as it was visible, that such numbers of necessitous and useless foreigners must unavoidably tend to the increase and oppression of the poor of this kingdom, so, being a mixture of people of all religions, it was evident, how dangerous they might prove to the quiet of our government, and the constitution of our established church. Upon what encouragement and invitation they came over, we have not been able to discover; but we look upon it as certain, that the calling over so many families from a country so remote could not be brought about without industry and contrivance; and those who were concerned in it, seemed to have been conscious of the evil of their own designs, by the secrecy with which they pursued them. Your majesty, in your great wisdom, will best recollect from whence this attempt and advice proceeded, and we humbly represent it as our opinion, that the authors of it were enemies to your majesty and your kingdom.

"We beg leave to offer to your majesty's consideration but one thing more, which has alarmed your people with just fears, the arbitrary attempt of new-modelling Corporations by imposing a Charter upon the borough of Bewdley; a charter void and illegal, not being accepted by the corporation then in being, destructive of the constitution of the parliament in transferring the rights of electors to others; and injurious to your majesty's subjects, in divesting them of their franchises and freeholds, even after they had been affirmed by judgments upon the rigorous prosecutions of Quo Warrantos. We return your majesty our most humble thanks for putting a stop to so pernicious a precedent, by ordering the proper methods to be taken for repealing the said charter and quieting the borough in the possession of their ancient privileges: we are truly sensible of your majesty's tender regard to the rights of all your people; and we cannot without indignation reflect upon the oppressive designs of those evil counsellors, who endeavoured to have brought a blemish of this kind upon your majesty's most just and gentle reign.

"From all these evil practices, and worse designs, of some persons, who had, by false professions of love to their country, insinuated themselves into your royal favour, irreparable mischief had accrued to the public, had not your majesty, in your great wisdom, seasonably discovered the fatal tendency of such measures; and, out of your singular goodness to your people, removed from the administration of affairs, those who had so ill answered the favourable opinion your majesty had conceived of them, and, in so many instances, grossly abused the great trust reposed in them. Your people could with greater patience have suffered the manifold injuries done to themselves by the frauds and depredations of such evil ministers, had not the same men proceeded to treat your sacred person with unbecomingly and disregard; but, as the interests of your majesty and your people are inseparable and by your majesty and your good subjects inseparably pursued, the wrongs which these men had done to the public, drew upon them your royal displeasure; and their irreverence towards your majesty justly exposed them to the indignation of your people.

"Your majesty had, from the beginning of your auspicious reign, expressed a truly Christian moderation by promises of lenity and protection to all your peaceable subjects, and of countenance and favour to those who should most recommend themselves by their zeal for the established government in church and state; but these ministers framed to themselves wild and unwarrantable schemes of balancing parties, and under a false pretence of temper and moderation, did really encourage faction by discountenancing and depressing persons zealously affected to your majesty and to the church, and by extending their favour and patronage to men of licentious and impious principles, such as shake the very foundation of all government, and all religion.

"Out of our unfeigned zeal for your majesty's honour and service, and our faithful affection to the public good, we cannot forbear with all humility and earnestness to beseech your majesty that you would avoid, as the greatest enemies to your royal dignity, and to your people's safety, all persons who shall endeavour to engage you in such pernicious measures, and thus

SECOND SESSION OF THE THIRD PARLIAMENT OF GREAT BRITAIN.

The Queen's Speech on opening the Session.] December 7, 1711. The queen went in state to the House of Peers and opened the session with the following Speech to both Houses;

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I have called you together as soon as the public affairs would permit; and I am glad that I can now tell you that, notwithstanding the arts of those who delight in war, both place and time are appointed for opening the Treaty of a general Peace.—Our allies (especially the States General,) whose interest I look upon as inseparable from my own, have, by their ready concurrence, expressed their entire confidence in me; and I have no reason to doubt, but that my own subjects are assured of my particular care of them.—My chief concern is, that the Protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of these nations, may be continued to you, by securing the Succession to the crown, as it is limited by parliament, to the house of Hanover.—I shall endeavour, that after a war which has cost so much blood and treasure, you may find your interest in trade and commerce improved and enlarged by a peace, with all other advantages which a tender and affectionate sovereign can procure for a dutiful and loyal people.—The princes and states, which have been engaged with us in this war, being by treaties entitled to have their several interests secured at a peace; I will not only do my utmost to procure every one of them all reasonable satisfaction; but I shall also unite with them in the strictest engagements for continuing the Alliance, in order to render the general peace secure and lasting.—The best way to have this Treaty effectual, will be to make early provision for the campaign: Therefore I must ask of you, gentlemen of the House of Commons, the necessary supplies for the next year's war; and I do

meet on Friday next; the Whigs will have a great majority in the House of Lords; no care is taken to prevent it; there is too much neglect; they are warned of it, and that signifies nothing: it was feared there would be some peevish Address from the Lords against a peace. It is said about the town, that several of the allies begin now to be content that a peace should be treated.

"Dec. 5. The Whig lords are doing their utmost for a majority against Friday, and design, if they can, to address the queen against the peace. Lord Nottingham, a famous Tory and speech-maker, is gone over to the Whig side: they toast him daily, and lord Wharton says, 'It is Dismal' (so they call him from his looks) 'will save England at last.'

"Dec. 6. To-morrow is the fatal day for the parliament meeting, and we are full of hopes and fears. We reckon we have a majority of 10 on our side in the House of Lords; yet I observed Mrs. Masham a little uneasy; she assures me the queen is stout." Swift's Journal.

most earnestly recommend to you, to make such dispatch therein as may convince our enemies, that, if we cannot obtain a good peace, we are prepared to carry on the war with vigour.—Whatever you give, will be still in your own power to apply; and I doubt not but, in a little time after the opening of the Treaty, we shall be able to judge of its event.

"My Lords and Gentlemen; As I have had your cheerful assistance for the carrying on this long and chargeable war; so I assure myself, that no true Protestant, or good subject, will envy Britain, or me, the glory and satisfaction of ending the same, by a just and honourable peace for us and all our allies.—Such a peace will give new life to our foreign trade, and I shall do my utmost to improve that happy opportunity to encourage our home manufactures, which will tend to the easing of my subjects in that excessive charge they now lie under in maintaining the poor, and to correct and redress such abuses as may have crept into any part of the administration during so long a war.—I cannot conclude, without earnestly recommending to you all unanimity; and that you will carefully avoid every thing which may give occasion to the enemy to think us a people divided amongst ourselves, and consequently prevent our obtaining that good peace, of which we have such reasonable hopes, and so near a view.—I pray God direct your consultations to this end, that being delivered from the hardships of war, you may become a happy and a flourishing people."

Debate on a Clause offered by the Earl of Nottingham.] As soon as the queen had ended her speech, she retired into a room, and, having taken off her robes, came back incognito to the House of Peers, both to hear the debates, and, by her presence, to moderate any heats, that might arise; which however, was by some observed to be unusual on the day the sovereign opens a session of parliament. The earl of Ferrers having made a motion for an Address of thanks to the queen for her speech,

The Earl of Nottingham rose up, and very copiously set forth "The insufficiency and captiousness of the late preliminaries; made a lively representation of the danger of treating upon so precarious a foundation; urged the express engagements, which Great-Britain had entered into with the allies, to restore the entire monarchy of Spain to the house of Austria; and the necessity of carrying on the war with vigour till those engagements were made good; adding, "That, though he had a numerous family, he would readily contribute half his income towards it, rather than acquiesce in a peace, which he thought unsafe and dishonourable to his country and all Europe." He concluded with offering a clause to be inserted in the Address of thanks, 'To represent to her majesty, as the humble opinion and advice of the House, that no Peace could be safe or honourable to Great-Britain, or Europe, if Spain and the West-Indies were allotted to any branch of the House of Bourbon.'

The Lord Guernsey, brother to the earl of Nottingham, said, "That such a clause was foreign to an Address of thanks; that, in all probability, few of the members of the House were prepared to speak to it; but that it might be debated at a more convenient time, when according to custom, the House should take into consideration the state of the nation."

He was seconded by the lord North and Grey, and another peer; and the Lord Treasurer added, "That according to the rules and orders of the House, this was not the proper time to debate such a motion." Upon this,

The Earl of Wharton appealed to the House whether there were any such order? and the duke of Buckingham, the most versed in parliamentary proceedings, having overruled the Treasurer's objection, the earl of Wharton proceeded; spoke with great zeal against the preliminary articles offered by France; and insisted upon the necessity of inserting in the Address the clause offered by the earl of Nottingham. He was supported by

The Earl of Sunderland, who answered the objection raised by some peers of the opposite side, namely, that they were not prepared to speak to that motion; "What, my lords, said he, is it possible, that any member of this illustrious house should be unprepared to debate an affair, which, for these ten years past, has been the principal subject-matter of our consultations? do not we sit in the same house? and are we not the peers who have constantly been of opinion, and have often represented to her majesty, that no safe and honourable peace can be made, unless Spain and the West-Indies be recovered from the House of Bourbon? It is true, I see some new faces among us: but even that lord, who sits on the woolsack [meaning the Lord Treasurer] may well remember, that, in the late reign, four lords were impeached for having made a Partition-treaty."

The Earl of Anglesey, (who, with the duke of Ormond, was just come into the House, having that morning travelled above 30 miles in their return from Ireland) represented "the necessity of easing the nation of the burden of this expensive war, and said, they ought to leave it to her majesty's wisdom to conclude a peace, when she thought it convenient for the good of her subjects:" adding, "that we might have enjoyed that blessing soon after the battle of Ramillies, if the same had not been put off by some persons, whose interest it was to prolong the war."

The Duke of Marlborough, who could not but perceive that this suggestion was levelled against him, made a long and pathetic speech, wherein, among other things, he said, "he thought himself happy, in having an opportunity given him of vindicating himself on so material a point, which his enemies had so loudly, and so unjustly, laid to his charge, before a person [meaning the queen, and making a bow towards the place where her majesty was] who knowing the integrity of his heart, and the uprightness of his conduct, would not fail doing him justice. That he referred himself to the queen, whether, whilst he had the honour to serve her majesty, as general and plenipotentiary, he had not constantly informed her, and her council, of all the proposals of peace, that had been made: and had not desired instructions for his conduct on that subject? That he could declare with a safe conscience, in the presence of her majesty, of that illustrious assembly, and of that Supreme Being, who is infinitely above all the powers upon earth, and before whom, according to the ordinary course of nature, he must soon appear, to give an account of his actions, that he ever was desirous of a safe, honourable, and lasting peace; and that he was always very far from any design of prolonging the war for his own private advantage, as his enemies had most falsely insinuated. That his advanced age, and the many fatigues he had undergone, made him earnestly wish for retirement and repose, to think of eternity the remainder of his days; the rather, because he had not the least motive to desire the continuance of the war, having been so generously rewarded, and had honours and riches heaped upon him, far beyond his desert and expectation, both by her majesty and her parliaments. That he thought himself bound to this public acknowledgment to her majesty and his country, that he should always be ready to serve them, if he could but crawl along, to obtain an honourable and lasting peace: but that, at the same time, he must take the liberty to declare, that he could, by no means, give into the measures that had lately been taken to enter into a negotiation of peace with France, upon the foot of the seven preliminary articles; for, he was of the same opinion with the rest of the allies, that the safety and liberties of Europe would be in imminent danger, if Spain and the West-Indies were left to the House of Bourbon; which, with all humility, and as he thought himself in duty bound, he had declared to her majesty, whom he had the honour to wait on, after his return from Holland: and, therefore, he was for inserting in the Address the Clause offered by the earl of Nottingham."

This speech, delivered with a most hearty concern, had the greater weight, as it was supported by the lord Cowper, the bishop of Sarum, the lord Halifax, and some other peers. On the other hand, the lord North and Grey and some other officious courtiers said, That, since peace and war belonged as prerogatives to the crown, it was not proper to offer any advice in those matters, until it was asked: but this was rejected with indignation, since it was a constant practice, in all sessions of parliament, to offer advices; no prerogative could be above advice: this was the end specified in the writ, by which a parliament was summoned; nor was the motion for a delay received. The eyes of all Europe were upon the present session; and this was a post-night: so it was fit they should come to a present resolution, in a matter of such importance.

The Clause is agreed to by the Lords.] This debate (in which the dukes of Shrewsbury and Buckingham were observed to say little or nothing) having lasted till near seven in the evening, the question was put, Whether the earl of Nottingham's advice should be part of the Address? and the previous question being first put, it was carried by 62 against 54: so this point was gained, though by a small majority.

It was expected that the court-party would the next day have the majority, by means of the proxies which eight Scots peers had sent to the duke of Hamilton and the earl of Mar. Wherefore, when the Address of the Lords was reported to the House, by the committee appointed to prepare it, the court tried to get the whole matter to be contested over again, pretending, that the debate was not now, upon the matter, debated the day before, but only whether they should agree to the draught, prepared by the committee: but that part of it, which contained the advice, was conceived in the very words, in which the vote had passed; and it was a standing rule, that what was once voted, could never again be brought into question during that session. This was so sacred a rule, that many of those, who voted with the court the day before, expressed their indignation against it, as subverting the very constitution of parliaments, if things might be thus voted and unvoted again, from day to day: yet even upon this a division was called for, but, the majority appearing so evidently against the motion, it was yielded, without counting the House.*

* "Dec. 7. This being the day the parliament was to meet, and the great question to be determined, I went to Dr. Freind to dine in the city, on purpose to be out of the way, and we sent our printer to see what was our fate; but he gave us a most melancholy account of things. The earl of Nottingham began, and spoke against a peace, and desired that in their Address they might put in a Clause to advise the queen not to make a peace without Spain; which was debated, and carried by the Whigs by about six voices: and this has happened entirely by my Lord Treasurer's neglect, who did not take timely care to make up all his strength, although every one of us gave him caution enough. Nottingham has certainly been bribed. The question is yet only carried in the committees of the whole house, and we hope when it is reported to the house to-morrow, we shall have a majority by some Scots lords coming to town. However, it is a mighty blow and loss of reputation to Lord Treasurer, and may end in his ruin. I bear the thing only as the printer brought it, who was at the debate; but how the ministry take it, or what their hopes and fears are, I cannot tell until I see them. I shall be early with the Secretary to-morrow, and then I will tell you more, and shall write a full account to the bishop of Clogher to-morrow, and to the archbishop of Dublin, if I have time. I am horribly down at present! I long to know how

The Lords' Address.] December 11. The Lords waited on the queen with their Address, which was as follows: "We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord Treasurer bears this, and what remedy he has.

"Dec. 8. I was early this morning with the Secretary, and talked over this matter. He hoped, that when it was reported this day in the House of Lords, they would disagree with their committee, and so the matter would go off, only with a little loss of reputation to Lord Treasurer. I dined with Dr. Cockburn, and after a Scotch member came in, and told us that the Clause was carried against the court in the House of Lords almost two to one; I went immediately to Mrs. Masham, and meeting Dr. Arbuthnot (the queen's favourite physician) we went together. She was just come from waiting at the queen's dinner, and going to her own. She had heard nothing of the thing being gone against us. It seems Lord Treasurer had been so negligent, that he was with the queen while the question was put in the house: I immediately told Mrs. Masham, that either she and Lord Treasurer had joined with the queen to betray us, or that they two were betrayed by the queen: she protested solemnly it was not the former, and I believed her; but she gave me some lights to suspect the queen is changed. For, yesterday when the queen was going from the house, where she sat to hear the debate, the duke of Shrewsbury, Lord Chamberlain, asked her, whether he or the great chamberlain Lindsay ought to lead her out; she answered short, 'Neither of you,' and gave her hand to the duke of Somerset, who was louder than any in the house for the clause against Peace. She gave me one or two more instances of this sort, which convince me that the queen is false, or at least very much wavering. Mr. Masham begged us to stay, because Lord Treasurer would call, and we were resolved to fall on him about his negligence in securing a majority. He came, and appeared in good humour as usual, but I thought his countenance was much cast down. I rallied him, and desired him to give me his staff, which he did; I told him, if he would secure it me a week, I would set all right: he asked, How? I said, I would immediately turn lord Marlborough, his two daughters, the duke and duchess of Somerset, and lord Cholmondeley out of all their employments; and I believe he had not a friend but was of my opinion. Arbuthnot asked, How he came not to secure a majority? He could answer nothing, but that he could not help it, if people would lie and forswear. A poor answer for a great minister. There fell from him a scripture expression, that 'the hearts of kings are unsearchable.' I told him, It was what I feared, and was from him the worst news he could tell me. I begged him to know what we had to trust to; he stuck a little; but at last bid me not fear, for all would be well yet. We would fain have had

Lords Spiritual and Temporal in parliament assembled, do, with hearts full of gratitude and loyalty to your sacred majesty, beg leave to him eat a bit where he was, but he would go home, it was past six; he made me go home with him. There we found his brother and Mr. Secretary. He made his son take a list of all in the House of Commons who had places, and yet voted against the Court, in such a manner as if they should lose their places: I doubt he is not able to compass it. This is a long journal, and of a day that may produce great alterations, and hazard the ruin of England. The Whigs are all in triumph; they foretold how all this would be, but we thought it boasting. Nay, they said the parliament should be dissolved before Christmas, and perhaps it may: this is all your d—d duchess of Somerset's doings. I warned them of it nine months ago, and a hundred times since: the Secretary always dreaded it. I told Lord Treasurer, I should have the advantage of him; for he would lose his head, and I should only be hanged, and so carry my body entire to the grave.

"Dec. 9. I was this morning with Mr. Secretary; we are both of opinion that the queen is false. I told him what I heard, and he confirmed it by other circumstances. I then went to my friend Lewis, who had sent to see me. He talks of nothing but retiring to his estate in Wales. He gave me reasons to believe the whole matter is settled between the queen and the Whigs; he hears that lord Somers is to be Treasurer, and believes, that sooner than turn out the duchess of Somerset, she will dissolve the parliament, and get a Whiggish one, which may be done by managing elections. Things are now in the crisis, and a day or two will determine. I have desired him to engage Lord Treasurer, that as soon as he finds the change is resolved on, he will send me abroad as queen's secretary somewhere or other, where I may remain till the new ministers recal me; and then I will be sick for five or six months till the storm has spent itself. I hope he will grant me this; for I should hardly trust myself to the mercy of my enemies while their anger is fresh. I dined to-day with the Secretary, who affects mirth, and seems to hope all will yet be well. I took him aside after dinner, told him how I had served them, and had asked no reward, but thought I might ask security; and then desired the same thing of him, to send me abroad before a change. He embraced me, and swore he would take the same care of me as himself, &c. but bid me have courage, for that in two days my Lord Treasurer's wisdom will appear greater than ever; that he suffered all that had happened on purpose, and had taken measures to turn it to advantage. I said, God send it; but I do not believe a syllable; and as far as I can judge, the game is lost. I shall know more soon, and my letters will at least be a good history to shew you the steps of this change.

return your majesty our most humble and hearty thanks and acknowledgments for your majesty's most tender and affectionate care for all your people, expressed in your majesty's most gracious speech from the throne, and for imparting to us your majesty's desires of ending this present war, by a peace advantageous to your subjects, and just and honourable for your majesty and all your allies; as also for your majesty's expressing so particular a regard for the interest of the States-General, as inseparable from your own; and that your majesty is graciously pleased to assure us, it is your chief concern, that the Protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of these nations, may be continued to your people, by securing the succession to the crown, as it is limited by parliament, to the House of Hanover; and that your majesty is pleased to shew so just a resolution to procure a satisfaction for all the allies, being by treaties entitled to have their several interests secured at a peace, and to unite them in the strictest engagements, in order to render the peace secure and lasting.—And we do beg leave to represent it to your majesty, as the humble opinion and advice of this house, that no peace can be safe or honourable to Great Britain, or Europe, if Spain and the West Indies are to be allotted to any branch of the House of Bourbon."

"My Lords; I take the thanks you give me kindly. I should be sorry any one could think I would not do my utmost to recover Spain and the West Indies from the House of Bourbon."

Protest occasioned by the Address.] On oc,

"Dec. 10. I was this morning with Lewis, who thinks they will let the parliament sit till they have given the money, and then dissolve them in Spring, and break the ministry. He spoke to Lord Treasurer about what I desired him. My lord desired him with great earnestness to assure me, that all would be well, and that I should fear nothing. I dined in the city with a friend. This day the Commons went to the queen with their Address, and all the Lords who were for Peace went with them, to shew their zeal." Swift's Journal.

* "When this Address was carried, it is not easy to describe the effects it had upon most mens passions. The partizans of the old ministry triumphed loudly, and without any reserve, as if the game were their own. The earl of Whartou was observed in the house to smile, and put his hands to his neck when any of the ministry was speaking, by which he would have it understood that some heads were in danger. Parker the chief-justice, began already with great zeal and officiousness to prosecute authors and printers of weekly and other papers, writ in defence of the administration: in short, joy and vengeance sat visible in every countenance of that party." Swift's Four Last Years.

"Dissentient. We dissent to the Address, because the nature of it is changed, by the insertion of the last clause, from that of an Address of Thanks; neither have we any thing parliamentary from the throne, or otherwise, laid before us, whereon to ground such advice as is therein contained. And we look upon it as an encroachment on the royal prerogative, in so hasty a manner to declare our opinions, and on no better grounds, in a thing so essentially belonging to the crown as making of peace and war. (Signed) Beaufort, Osborn, P. St. Davids, Stawell, Hatton, Joh. Bristol, C. P. S. Willoughby de Broke, Clarendon, Denbigh, T. Chichester, Northumberland, Yarmouth, Plymouth, Delawar, Sussex, Thaget, Berkshire, North and Grey, Scarsdale, Cardigan."

Vote of the Commons for an Address of Thanks.] The Speaker of the House of Commons having reported the Queen's Speech, the House resolved, "That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, returning her majesty the humble thanks of the House for her making the Protestant religion, the laws and liberties of these nations, and the Succession to the crown, as limited by parliament, to the House of Hanover, her chief concern, and to express the satisfaction of the House, in what her majesty had been pleased to declare, concerning the general peace her majesty had in view; and also to assure her majesty, that the House would give such dispatch to the necessary Supplies as might enable her majesty to carry on the war with vigour, if a good peace could not be obtained; and in the mean time, that this House would use their utmost endeavours to preserve such an unanimity as might give the enemy no hopes from any divisions among us." It was moved to insert in this Address a Clause importing, "That the House did not doubt but that care would be taken, that Spain and the Indies should not be left in the hands of any branch of the House of Bourbon; which might endanger the safety of her majesty's person and government: the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover, and the liberty of Europe;" but after a long debate, the said Clause was rejected by a majority of 232 voices against 106.*

* "As Walpole dignified and supported an administration prosperous at home and glorious abroad, so when it was vilified and disgraced, he made animated replies to the attacks of a powerful and irritated party. During the intervening period, from his resignation to the death of queen Anne, he persevered in his attachment to his late associates, and in harassing the new ministers, with great ability both in and out of parliament. The first instance in which he appeared the champion of the fallen party, was upon the motion of an Address to the queen. On this occasion, Walpole, whom Swift in his History of the Four Last

"Most gracious Sovereign; We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain, in parliament assembled, beg leave to return our sincere and hearty thanks for your majesty's most gracious Speech from the throne; wherein your majesty, by expressing your great care and concern in so particular a manner, for the Protestant religion, which, above all things, is most dear to us; for those laws and liberties which make us peculiarly happy above other nations; and for the Succession of the House of Hanover, as limited by parliament, upon which the future security of our religion, laws and liberties, depends; has given us a fresh demonstration, that your majesty has nothing so much at heart as the safety and happiness of your people. Having an entire confidence in your majesty's wisdom and goodness, in your honour and justice to your allies, and in your particular care of your own subjects, we cannot but express our satisfaction in what your majesty has been pleased to declare, of the just and honourable peace your majesty has in view.—This was the end for which your majesty entered into the war; and nothing can add more to the glory of your reign, than, after the many unparalleled successes in the course of this war, to have your majesty conclude it with the blessing of such a peace; which we cannot doubt, will be rendered secure and lasting, by your majesty's pursuing the wise resolution you have taken, of entering into the strictest engagements for continuing the alliance to that end.—And we presume to assure your majesty, we will take all possible care to preserve that unanimity your majesty has recommended to us, and use our utmost endeavours to disappoint, as well the arts and desires of those, who, for private views, may delight in war, as the hopes the enemies may have vainly entertained, of receiving advantage from any division among us.—We entirely concur with your majesty, that the best way to bring this treaty to good effect, is to make an early provision for the next campaign; for which purpose, notwithstanding the heavy burthens, which, during this long and expensive war, your majesty's subjects have undergone, we will, with the greatest alacrity, grant such effectual and speedy supplies, as shall enable your majesty to carry on the war with vigour, and convince your enemies, if the intended negotiations should prove ineffectual, that no amusements nor attempts whatsoever, can alter our firm and stedfast resolution of supporting the best of sovereigns in carrying on so just a war, till a safe, lasting, and honourable peace may be procured for your majesty and all your allies."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's Answer was as follows:

Years of queen Anne, calls one Mr. Robert Walpole, proposed an Amendment to the Address, &c." Coxe's Walpole,

"This very dutiful Address is what I expected from the zeal and loyalty of such an House of Commons.—I return you my hearty thanks for the confidence you have in me. I entirely rely upon your assurances, and you may depend upon my affection, and care for our interests."

Debate on the Duke of Hamilton's Case, as his Title of Duke of Brandon.] Dec. 10. The duke of Hamilton, one of the 16 peers or Scotland, having some months before been created a peer of Great Britain, by the style and title of duke of Brandon, notwithstanding a caveat entered against his patent; and now claiming a place, in that quality, in the House of Peers, many lords, who apprehended no small danger to the constitution, from the admitting into their House a greater number of Scotch peers than were agreed to by the Union, upon a due consideration of the proportion of public taxes paid by Scotland, resolved to oppose the said claim. Hereupon, a motion was made for taking that matter into consideration, which was done accordingly; but after a few speeches the debate was adjourned to the Wednesday following. Some court-lords, who were sensible that the discussing of this affair would strike at the royal prerogative, made that day a motion for adjourning, but it was carried by a majority of 3 only, that they should go on with the resumed debate about the duke of Hamilton's sitting in the House as duke of Brandon. However, after some time spent therein, the further consideration of that business was put off till the 20th.

Bill of Occasional Conformity brought in by the Earl of Nottingham.] Dec. 15. The earl of Nottingham having brought into the House of Peers a Bill for preserving the Protestant Religion, by better securing the church of England as by law established, and for confirming the Toleration granted to Protestant Dissenters, by an act entitled, 'An Act for exempting their majesty's Protestant subjects, dissenting from the church of England, from the penalties of certain laws, and for supplying the defects thereof; and for the further securing the Protestant Succession, by requiring the practisers of the law, in North Britain, to take the oaths, and subscribe the declaration therein mentioned.' His lordship was backed by the earls of Scarborough and Wharton, and several other lords: so that the Bill was received and read the first time, without any opposition. The Monday following, after the second reading of the Bill, the Lords took the same into consideration, in a grand committee, and having made some amendments to it, ordered it to be engrossed. The next day the Bill, having passed the House of Lords, was sent down to the Commons, who read it immediately the first time, and gave it a second reading the next day. On the Thursday a Petition was offered to the House on behalf of the Dutch and French Protestant churches, praying that they might be excepted from the restraints laid by this Bill on English Dissenting congregations; but the question being put, that the Petition be brought up, it passed in the negative: after which the Commons, in a committee of the whole House, (which that morning was very thin) made several amendments to the Bill. These amendments being immediately reported and agreed to, the Bill was thereupon sent back to the House of Peers; who, the same day, sent down a message to the Commons to acquaint them, that they had agreed to those amendments.

The Earl of Nottingham complains of a printed Speech, written by Dr. Swift.] Dec. 18. Complaint being made to the House of Lords, of a Paper printed and published, contrary to a standing order of this house, intituled, "The earl of Nottingham's Speech to the honourable House of Lords; London, printed by J. Tomson, near Covent-Garden, 1711." And the said title being read: a Committee was appointed, to inquire who is the author, printer, and publisher of the said paper.

On the 22nd, the duke of Devonshire reported from the said Committee, "That their lordships find the said Paper to be false and scandalous, and printed by a sham name; and that, by the oath of Sarah Vickers, it appears to have been printed by Andrew Hind, living in Peterborough-Court, near Fleet-street. And that it is the opinion of the committee, that the House be moved, That the said Andrew Hind be taken into the custody of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod attending this House." Which said Report being read, and agreed to; Hind was accordingly ordered into custody; where he remained until the 19th of January, when upon petitioning their lordships, he was discharged.*

* "Lord Nottingham, a famous Tory and Speechmaker, is gone over to the Whig side. They toast him daily, and lord Wharton says, 'It is Dissual (so they call him from his looks) 'will save England at last.' Lord Treasurer was hinting as if he wished a ballad was made on him, and I will get up one against to-morrow." Swift's Journal to Stella, Dec. 5, 1711.—"I was this morning making the ballad two degrees above Grub Street, then dined with our society. The printer came before we parted, and brought the ballad, which made them laugh very heartily a dozen times." Ibid, Dec. 6.

"There was printed a Grubsireet speech of lord Nottingham; and he was such an owl to complain of it in the House of Lords, who have taken up the printer for it. I heard at Court, that Walpole, a great Whig member, said, that I and my whimsical club writ it at one of our meetings, and that I should pay for it. He will find he lies; and I shall let him know by a third hand my thoughts of him." Ibid. Dec. 18.

The Ballad was as follows:

Debate concerning the Duke of Hamilton's Patent. Dec. 20. The Lords resumed the adjourned debate concerning the duke of Hamilton's claim to sit in that assembly, as duke of Brandon, by virtue of his late patent; the queen being, in cog. in the House. After learned counsel in the law for the queen, the House of Lords, and the duke of Hamilton, had been heard, several speeches were made on both sides, so that the debate lasted till near 8 o'clock in the evening, when the question was put, Whether the 12 Judges should be consulted with? Which being carried in the Negative by 14 voices, Proxies included, another question was put, Whether Scottish peers, created peers of Great Britain since the Union, have a right to sit in that House, which was also carried in the Negative by 5 voices, viz. Contents 57: Not Contents 52.

Protest thereon.] On which occasion was entered the following Protest:

"Dissentient." 1. Because, as we apprehend by this resolution the prerogative of the crown in granting patents of honour, with all privileges depending thereon to the peers of Great Britain who were peers of Scotland at the time of the Union, as well as the right of the duke of Brandon to sit and vote in parliament, are taken away; and this prerogative of the crown and right of the duke depending upon the construction of an act of parliament, though counsel, by order of the House, were heard at the bar, and all the judges were ordered to attend at the same time, yet the opinion of the judges was not permitted to be asked touching the construction of the said act of parliament.—2. Because the prerogative of the crown, as we conceive, in granting patents of honour, with the privileges depending thereon, ought not, on the construction of any act of parliament, to be taken away unless there be plain and express words to that purpose in the said act; and, we conceive there are no such plain and express words for that purpose in the act of Union.—3. Because, by this resolution, all the peers of Great Britain, who were peers of Scotland at the time of the Union, are supposed to be incapable of receiving any patent of honour from the crown, by virtue whereof they may be entitled to the privileges of sitting and voting in parliament, and sitting on the trial of peers; which, we conceive, is repugnant to the fourth Article of the act of Union, which declares the privileges and advantages which do or may belong to the subjects of either kingdom, except where it is otherwise expressly agreed in those Articles, in which, we apprehend there is no such provision.—4. Because the duke of Queensberry, in all respects, in the same case as the duke of Hamilton, was introduced, sat and voted in this house in matters of the highest importance in two several parliaments; as duke of Dover, by virtue of a patent passed since the Union; and in consequence of such sitting and voting, his vote in the election of peers of Scotland was rejected; and as a further consequence thereof the marquis of Lothian was removed from his seat in this House, which he had undeniable title to, if the duke of Queensberry's patent as duke of Dover

AN EXCELLENT NEW SONG.

Being the intended Speech of a famous Orator against Peace.

An Orator diſmal of Nottinghamſhire,
Who has forty years let out his conſcience to hire,
Out of zeal for his country, and want of a place,
Is come up, vi et armis, to break the queen's peace.
He has vamped an old ſpeech, and the court, to their ſorrow,

Shall hear him baragane againſt Prior to-morrow.
When once he begins, he never will finch,
But repeats the ſame note a whole day, like a Finch.

I have heard all the ſpeech repeated by Hoppy,
And, "Mistakes to prevent, I've obtained a copy."

THE SPEECH.

Whereas, notwithstanding, I am in great pain,
To hear we are making a peace without Spain;
But, most noble senators, it is a great shame,
There should be a peace, while I'm Not-in-game.
The duke show'd me all his fine house; and the duchess

From her closet brought out a full purse in her clutches:

I talk'd of a peace, and they both gave a start,
His grace swore by G—d, and her grace let a f—t:
My long old-fashion'd pocket was presently cramm'd;

And sooner than vote for a peace I'll be damn'd.
But some will cry Turncoat, and rip up old stories,

Now I always pretended to be for the Tories:

I answer; the Tories were in my good graces,
Till all my relations were put into places.
But still I'm in principle ever the same,
And will quit my best friends, while I'm Not-in- game.

When I and some others subscribed our names
To a plot for expelling my master King James;
I withdrew my subscription by help of a blot,
And so might discover or gain by the plot:
I had my advantage and stood at defiance,
For Daniel was got from the den of the lions:
I came in without danger, and was I to blame?
For, rather than hang, I would be Not-in-game.

I swore to the queen, that the prince of Hanover
During her sacred life would never come over:
I made use of a trope; that "an heir to invite Was like keeping her monument always in sight."
But, when I thought proper, I alter'd my note;
And in her own hearing I boldly did vote,
That her majesty stood in great need of a tutor,
And must have an old or a young coadjutor:
For why; I would fain have put all in a flame,
Because, for some reasons, I was Not-in-game.

Now my new benefactors have brought me about,
And I'll vote against peace, with Spain or without:
Though the court gives my nephews, and brothers, and cousins,

And all my whole family places by dozens;
Yet, since I know where a full purse may be found,
And hardly pay eighteen pence tax in the pound:
Since the Tories have thus disappointed my hopes,
And will neither regard my figures nor tropes;
I'll speech against peace while Dismal's my name,
And be a true Whig, while I'm Not-in-game."

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS FOR EXAMINING AND STATING THE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—The Duke of Marlborough's Accounts—And the Affairs of the Army.] December 21. Mr. Lockhart, from the Commissioners for taking, examining and stating, the Public Accounts of the kingdom, made a Report of some Practices, which they have discovered in their Examinations, relating to the Affairs of the Army; which he read in his place; and afterwards delivered in at the clerk's table: where the same was read, as follows:

“Your Commissioners humbly represent, That though they have used their utmost application in taking and examining the Public Accounts, yet they are unprepared to offer any perfect state of the particular branches of the Revenue to the House: but will endeavour to lay before you, after the recess, a general Account of the Receipts and Issues of her majesty's exchequer for the current year 1711; which they hope, is all will, for the present, be expected from them: as well in regard of the shortness of the time they have been engaged in this work, as of the great variety and extent of it: they beg leave also to observe, that many of the accounts are not yet completely brought before them; particularly those of the Army, which are very large and voluminous.

“But in the course of their Examinations relating to the Affairs of the Army, they have already discovered some Practices, which they conceive highly detrimental to the public, and such as they are obliged to report to you. In obedience therefore to your order, of Tuesday the 11th instant, your commissioners here present a State of several Facts; which with their circumstances and proofs, they humbly offer to the wisdom and justice of the House.

“Your commissioners having ground to believe, that there had been some Mismanagement in making the contracts for the use of the Army, summoned, and examined, Sir Solomon De Medina, the Contractor for the Bread, and Bread-Waggons, in the Low-countries, who, after expressing much uneasiness on the apprehensions he had of being thought an informer and of accusing a great man, did depose:

“That for the years 1707, 1708, 1709, 1710, and 1711, he has been solely, or in partnership, concerned in the contracts for supplying bread, and bread-waggons, to the forces in the Low countries, in the queen of Great Britain's pay; and that he gave to the duke of Marlborough, for his own use, on each contract, the several sums following; part of which was paid at the beginning, and part at the end, of each respective contract, in bills or notes delivered by the deponent into the duke's own hands; viz. for the year 1707, 66,600 guilders: for the year 1708, 62,625 guilders; for the year 1709, 69,578 guilders and 15 stivers: for the year 1710, 66,810 guilders 19 stivers and 8 pennings: Total, 265,614 guilders 14 stivers and 8 pennings: for the year 1711, 21,000 guilders; which sum is, in part of a like sum with those above-mentioned, intended to be paid at the end of the contract for this year: That he was obliged to allow yearly, during the time of his being contractor, 12 or 14 waggons, gratis, to the duke of Marlborough: That during the time of his being contractor, as aforesaid, he gave on sealing each contract, a gratuity of 500 gold ducats to Mr. Cardonnell, Secretary to the duke of Marlborough: That for the money he received of Mr. Sweet, deputy paymaster at Amsterdam, he was obliged to pay 1*l.* per cent: that the former contractor, Machado, did the same; and that he acquainted the duke of Marlborough with this deduction of 1*l.* per cent.

“He further deposed, That it appeared by the accounts of Antonio Alvarez Machado, who had been a contractor before him, and had supplied the bread, and bread-waggons, to the forces in English pay, for the years 1702, 1703, 1704, 1705, and 1706, That he, the said Machado, had paid as large yearly sums to the duke of Marlborough; during the time of his being contractor, as this deponent has since done.

“From whence it appears, that the duke of Marlborough has received, on account of the bread, and bread-wagon contracts, from sir Solomon de Medina (admitting the sum already paid, and what is intended to be paid, for this present year 1711, to be the same with that of the preceding year, 1710,) 332,425 guilders and 14 stivers. From Antonio Alvarez Machado, during the five years he was contractor, the like sums, which together make 664,851 guilders 8 stivers, and computed at 10 guilders 10 stivers to the pound sterling, amount to 63,410*l.* 3*s.* 7*d.*

“Some time after this Evidence was given by sir Solomon de Medina, your commissioners received a letter from the duke of Marlborough by the hands of James Craggs, esq. wherein the duke desires your commissioners, that when they make their Report they would lay some facts before the parliament in a true light, and this justice they think they cannot better do than in his grace's own words.

‘Gentlemen; Hague, Nov. 10, 1711.

‘Having been informed upon my arrival here yesterday, that sir Solomon Medina had acquainted you with my having received several sums of money from him, that it may make the less impression upon you, I would lose no time in letting you know, that this is no more than what has always been allowed as a perquisite to the general or commander in chief of the army in the Low-countries, both before the Revolution and since; and I do assure you, at the same time, that whatever sums I have received on that account, have constantly been applied for the service of the public, in keeping secret correspondence, and getting intelligence of the enemies motions and designs; and it has fallen so short, that I take leave to acquaint you with another article that has been applied to the same use, and which arises from her majesty's warrant whereof the inclosed is a copy, though this does not properly relate to the public accounts, being a free-gift from the foreign troops. You will have observed, by the several establishments, that, before the late king's death, when the parliament voted 40,000 men for the quota of England in the Low-countries, 21,612 were to be foreigners, and the rest English; for the last they gave 10,000*l.* a year for intelligence, and other contingencies, without account; but his majesty being sensible, by the experience of the last war, that this sum would not any way answer that service, and being unwilling to apply for any more to the parliament, he was pleased to order, that the foreign troops should contribute  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent towards it; and I being then his ambassador and commander in chief abroad, he directed me to propose it to them, with an assurance that they should have no other stoppage made from their pay; this they readily agreed to, and her majesty was afterwards pleased to confirm it by her warrant, upon my acquainting her with the use it was intended for; and it has accordingly been applied from time to time for intelligence and secret service, with such success, that, next to the blessing of God on the bravery of our troops, we may, in a great measure, attribute most of the advantages of the war in this country to the timely and good advices procured with the help of this money. And now, gentlemen, as I have laid the whole matter very fairly before you, and that I hope you will allow, I have served my queen and country with that zeal and faithfulness which becomes an honest man, the favour I am to entreat of you, is, that, when you make your report to the parliament, you will lay this part before them in its true light, so as that they may see this necessary and important part of the war has been provided for and carried on without any other expence to the public than the 10,000*l.* a year; and I flatter myself, that, when the accounts of the army in Flanders come under your consideration, you will be sensible the service on this side has been carried on with all the economy and good husbandry that was possible. I am, Gentlemen, &c. MARLBOROUGH.

ANNE R.

Right trusty, and right well-beloved cousin and counsellor, we greet you well. Whereas, pursuant to the direction you have received in that behalf, you have agreed with the persons authorised to treat with you for the taking into our service a certain number of foreign troops, to act in conjunction with the forces of our allies, that there be reserved  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. out of all moneys payable to, and for the said troops, as well for their pay and entertainment, as on any other account, towards defraying such extraordinary, contingent expences relating to them, as cannot otherwise be provided for. Now, we do hereby approve and confirm all such agreements as you have, or may hereafter make, for reserving the said  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. accordingly; and do likewise hereby authorise and direct the paymaster general of our forces for the time being, or his deputy, to make the said deduction of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. pursuant thereto, out of all moneys he shall be directed to issue, for the use of the foreign troops in our pay, and thereupon to pay over the same from time to time according to such warrants, and in such proportions as you shall direct; for which this shall be to you, and to all others whom it may concern, a sufficient warrant and direction. Given at our court at St. James's, this 6th day of July, 1702, and in the first year of our reign. By her Majesty's Command, C. HEDGES.

To our right trusty, and right well-beloved Cousin and Counsellor, John, Earl of Marlborough, our Ambassador Extraordinary, and Plenipotentiary to the States General of the United-Provinces, and Captain-General of our Land-Forces.

Your Commissioners having thought themselves obliged to recite this letter and warrant at large, humbly conceive it will be expected that they should make some observations upon them; as to what therefore relates to the evidence of sir Solomon de Medina, his grace has been pleased to admit it in general, but with this distinction, that he claims the sums received, as perquisites to the general in the Low-countries.

On which your Commissioners observe, that so far as they have hitherto been capable of informing themselves in the constitution of the army, the great sums, which appear to have been annually paid to the duke, on account of these contracts, can never be esteemed legal or warrantable perquisites.

For they do not find, by the strictest enquiry they can make, that any other English general in the Low-countries, or elsewhere, ever claimed, or received such perquisites; but if any instance should be produced, they humbly apprehend it will be no justification of it, because the public or the troops must necessarily suffer in proportion to every such perquisite; and how agreeable this practice is to that economy and good husbandry with which the service in Flanders is said to be carried on, remains yet to be explained. By the assurance his grace is pleased to give, that this money has been constantly employed for the service of the public, it must be either allowed, that he reim-ishes his right to this pretended perquisite, that he has been wanting to himself in concealing so great an instance of his own generosity to the public.

“The great caution and secrecy with which money was constantly received, gives reason to suspect that it was not thought a justifiable perquisite, for Mr. Cardonnell the duke’s secretary, and auditor of the bread-account, has deposed on oath, that he never knew or heard of any such perquisite, until the late rumour of Solomon de Medina’s evidence before your commissioners. By the contracts for bread, and bread-waggons, the general appears to be the sole check on the contractors; he is to take care that the terms of the contractors are duly performed; he is to judge of all deductions to be made from, and allowance to the contractors; and whether, in such circumstances, he can receive any gratuity, or perquisite from the contractors, without a breach of his trust, your Commissioners presume not to determine. The general may with equal reason claim a perquisite for every other contract relating to the army, as for these of the bread, and bread waggons; but his grace being silent as to this, your Commissioners ought to suppose he has not received any such allowance, unless they shall understand otherwise when they come to examine into those contracts, which hitherto they have not been able to do, by reason the contractors are foreigners, and constantly reside in Holland.

“As to what his grace is pleased to say in the second part of his letter, concerning the deduction of the 2½ per cent. from the foreign troops in her majesty’s pay, your Commissioners can only offer such remarks as occur to them, on comparing what is urged in the duke’s letter, with the tenor of the warrant, and with the method of accounting for other payments to the army. Your Commissioners in the first place take leave to observe, that this warrant has been kept dormant for 9 years, and the deduction concealed so long from the knowledge of the parliament; for which, in their humble apprehension, his grace has not assigned sufficient reasons.

“He is pleased to say, that this 2½ per cent. is a free gift from the foreign troops, and that it does not belong to the Public Accounts. But the first of these assertions seems inconsistent, not only with the words of the warrant, which supposes and expresses an agreement, but with that part of his grace’s letter which takes notice, that he being ambassador and general, stipulated for this very stoppage by the late king’s order. Your Commissioners therefore must be of opinion, that a deduction so made is public money, and ought to be accounted for in the same manner as other public money is.

prehend, for the service of the 40,000 men, without distinction. And they find it is so far from having always been thought exempt from account, that in a privy seal dated the 5th day of March, 1706, for passing Mr. Fox’s accounts, there is a clause to release and discharge the duke of Marlborough, his heirs, executors, and administrators, from a sum of 7,499*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.* part of this money, which supposes his grace would otherwise have been accountable for it. But your Commissioners do not here meet with any mention of this deduction of 2½ per cent. and must therefore presume, the reason why it has never been brought to an account, is what his grace is pleased to suggest, that he never considered it as public money.

“Your Commissioners must submit it to the House, whether the warrant produced to justify this deduction be legal, and duly countersigned; or whether admitting it to be so, either the stoppage, or the payment of it has been regularly made. The warrant directs, that it should be stopt in the hands of the paymaster or his deputy, and issued thence by the duke’s order only: But this method does not appear by the paymaster’s accounts to have been at all pursued, so far otherwise, that the payments to the foreign troops are always made complete, and their receipts always taken in full without any notice of this deduction. When any part of the above-mentioned 10,000*l.* contingent-money is drawn out of the paymasters’ hands for any secret service, the general’s warrant, and the secretary’s receipts, are the paymaster’s vouchers: But Mr. Cardonnell, as he declares on oath, never gave any receipt for any part of this 2½ per cent. nor did Mr. Bridges, as he also declares on oath, ever see any warrant for that purpose, or knew any thing, as paymaster-general, of this deduction.—If Mr. Sweet at Amsterdam, has taken upon himself to transact the disposition of this 2½ per cent. with the duke of Marlborough, your commissioners are humbly of opinion that he ought to have transmitted constant accounts of it to Mr. Bridges, whose agent he only is, and not to have negotiated so large sums of public money in so clandestine a manner.—By the Warrant this deduction is reserved for the defraying extraordinary contingent expences of the troops, from whom it is stopped: And if the whole has been employed in secret correspondence and intelligence, there must have been some neglect of the other services for which it was originally designed; and such a disposition being in no sort authorised by the warrant, is a misapplication of it. Besides, your commissioners apprehend, that the article for secret service, to which this deduction is pretended to have been applied, was always included in the 10,000*l.* above-mentioned for the contingencies of the army; and, if so, the whole remains to be accounted for; which, on a computation made from the whole sum of 11,294,659*l.* 4*s.* 1½*d.* paid per Britain to, and for all the foreign forces since the 13th Dec.

1701, (according to the Returns of the auditor and paymaster) amounts to 282,366*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.*— On a computation made from the sum of 7,107,873*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.* paid to and for the foreign forces since the time aforesaid, (exclusive of Italy, Spain, and Portugal) amounts to 177,695*l.* 17*s.* 0*d.*

“Your Commissioners humbly lay before you some facts relating to the Forage-contracts, (for the troops in North Britain) made by Robert Walpole, esq. late secretary of war, pursuant to a power given him by Sidney earl of Godolphin then Lord High Treasurer of Great-Britain.

“By the rate allowed in these contracts, it appearing that her majesty had been put to an extraordinary expence above the pay of the soldiers, your commissioners thought it their duty to enquire, whether, in this part of the service, sufficient care had been taken to procure the most advantageous terms for the public; and being informed that John Montgomery, esq. was concerned in these contracts, they examined him, and he declared upon oath, that col. George Douglas, and himself, were assumed partners with sir Samuel Macklellan, and Mr. John Campbell, in the contract made by Mr. Walpole to provide forage from the middle of May, 1709, to May, 1710, for all the troops in North Britain at 3*d.* an horse for green, and 9*d.* for dry forage, each 24 hours.

“That the said colonel George Douglas, and he the said Mr. Montgomery, were also assumed partners with Mr. John Campbell in a subsequent contract, commencing in May, 1710, and ending in May, 1711, made likewise by Mr. Walpole, and at the same rates with the former.

“That the first of these contracts was made by Mr. Walpole in London with sir Samuel Macklellan, who before he went into Scotland told the said Montgomery, that Mr. Walpole, in making the contract, reserved a share for a friend of his, who was to have the benefit of a fifth part, if not redeemed by the contractors with a sum of money; and sir Samuel soon after, on his death-bed, at Edinburgh, declared the same: Whereupon, colonel Douglas, and Mr. John Campbell, directed him, the said Mr. Montgomery, to pay 500 guineas to the said Mr. Walpole: And accordingly he delivered into Mr. Walpole's own hands a note for that sum, payable to Mr. Walpole, or order; And the said Montgomery, afterwards, paid the sum of 500 guineas to one Mr. Man, Mr. Walpole's agent; who gave him up the note, with the receipt on the back of it signed by Mr. Walpole. That the second contract was made by Mr. Walpole, with Mr. John Campbell; who, thereupon, directed the said Montgomery to give a note for 500 guineas or pounds, he could not remember which, to Mr. Walpole, which he accordingly did; and made it payable to Mr. Walpole, or order; and delivered it into his own hands. This second note was left with the said Mr. Man; of which the said Mr. Montgomery hath paid about 400*l.*

“He further declared upon oath, That 200

guineas were given by the contractors to sir David Dalrymple, in consideration, That his son-in-law, sir Alexander Murray, was proposed, but not admitted, to be a partner in the first contract: That the earl of Leven, commander in chief of her majesty's forces in North Britain, had 100 guineas each year, from the contractors, for regulating the quarters of the troops: That 100*l.* a year were paid to Mr. Merrill, deputy to Mr. How, for receiving the queen's bounty-money, and keeping an account of it between the queen and her officers: That the said Mr. Montgomery gave a note for 50*l.* to Mr. Taylor, chief clerk to Mr. Walpole; which is not yet paid.

“Your Commissioners cannot exactly state the loss the public has sustained by these contracts; but find, That if the forage had been furnished in 1709, and 1710, at the rates settled by the contract for the present year, there had been saved to the government more than 9,500*l.* which is near a fourth part of the whole charge.

“They do not apprehend, That this difference has arisen, altogether, from the scarcity of forage in the two last years: for captain William Preston, of col. Kerr's regiment, hath declared before them, on oath, That he agreed with the contractors to furnish green forage for his own troops, in those years, at 2*d.* an horse, for 24 hours, which cost the government 3*d.* with an addition only of 7*l.* each year, for providing extraordinary forage for the officers horses belonging to that troop; and that the contractors assured him, they had made the same agreement with other officers. How far these practices have been injurious to the public, is humbly submitted to the consideration of the House. (Signed) Geo. Lockhart, Hen. Bertie, S. Waddington, Fra. Annesley, Tho. Lister, Will. Shippen, H. Campion.”

Ordered, That the said Report be taken into consideration upon Thursday the 17th day of January next.

The Commons adjourn to the 14th of January.] Dec. 22. The queen being indisposed, the lord-keeper, the lord-president, and other lords, were commissioned to pass the land-tax bill for 4*s.* in the pound, which was ready for the royal assent, with the bill against Occasional Conformity. After which, the Commons adjourned to the 14th of January, which was a long recess at so critical a time.

The Lords' Address concerning the Peace.] Before the Lords adjourned, a motion was made by the duke of Devonshire, for leave to bring in a Bill to give the Electoral Prince of Hanover, as duke of Cambridge, the precedence of all peers; which was granted, and so was likely to meet with no opposition. The earl of Nottingham moved next, that, before their recess, they should make an Address to the queen, desiring, might concert the necessary measures to preserve a strict union amongst them all, the better to obtain the great end proposed by her majesty, for procuring to them all just and reasonable satisfaction, and for rendering the peace more secure and lasting, which could only be effected by a general guaranty of terms of the peace to all the allies, and of the Protestant Succession to these kingdoms, as settled by act of parliament.”*

All the opposition, which the Court made to this, was to shew that it was needless, since it was already ordered; and the Lord-Treasurer said, that the Lords might, in order to their satisfaction, send to examine their instructions. To this, it was answered, That the offering such an Address would satisfy the plenipotentiaries, in executing their instructions. The Court moved, these words might be put into the Address, “in case her majesty had not already given such orders;” which being agreed to, the Address was presented on the 27th of December, and the Lords adjourned no longer than the 2d of January, which, as well as the Address, was no small surprize to the queen and her ministers.

The Duke of Marlborough turned out of all his Employments on pretence of Bribery. During the recess it was, that the duke of Marlborough was discharged from all his employments. “In order to this,” says Tindal, “all the methods, that malice and envy could invent, were used to make him appear criminal. But the discoveries made by the Commissioners for examining the Public Accounts, were made the immediate cause of his disgrace. Sir Solomon Medina, a Jew, concerned in the contract for furnishing bread to the army in Flanders, made a present yearly to the duke of Marlborough of between 5 or 6,000*l.* The general of the States, it seems, had the like present, as a perquisite to support his dignity, and to enable him to procure intelligence. The queen ordered 10,000*l.* a year more to the duke of Marlborough for the same service. King William had also agreed, that 2½ per cent. should be deducted out of the pay of the foreign troops, which amounted to 15,000*l.* This the queen had by a warrant appointed the duke of Marlborough to receive on the same account.

“The duke having heard, while he was beyond sea, that the Commissioners had discovered the present made him by the Jew, sent them a letter, on the 10th of November, N. S. from the Hague, wherein he owned the whole matter to be true; and added, he had applied these sums to the procuring good intelligence, to which, next to the blessing of God on the bravery of the troops, their constant successes were owing. This did not satisfy the Commissioners; but, though no complaints were brought from the army of their not being constantly supplied with good bread, yet, they saw here was matter to raise a clamour against the duke, which they chiefly aimed at. Accordingly, the Commissioners reported these things to the House of Commons, on the 21st of Dec., the day before their recess, and the next day, pursuant to an order of the House, Mr. Shippen, one of the Commissioners, laid before them: First, the deposition of sir Solomon de Medina, knight, proving great sums of money taken by his grace John duke of Marlborough, Adam Cardonnel, esq., his grace’s secretary, and others, on account of the contracts for supplying Bread and Bread-waggon to her majesty’s forces in the Low-Countries. Secondly, capt. William Preston’s Deposition about forage in North-Britain. Upon this the duke of Marlborough’s Letter, which he had writ in vindication of himself to the Commissioners, was, by his order or contrivance, published in the Daily Courant of the 27th of December. This letter having made an impression in his favour on the minds of many persons, the Report of the Commissioners was, by way of Answer, printed at large two days after; and the next day, the 30th of December, the queen declared in council, “That, being informed an information against the duke of Marlborough was laid before the House of Commons, by the Commissioners of the Public Accounts, she thought fit to dismiss him from all his employments, that the matter might take an impartial examination.” This declaration was entered in the Council-Books; and the day following it was notified to the Duke, by a Letter under her own hand, “That her intention was to resume all the employments she had intrusted him with; complaining, at the same time, of the treatment she had met with.” This appears from the Duke’s Answer, which he sent by the countess of Sunderland, one of his daughters:

“Madam; I am very sensible of the honour your majesty does me, in dismissing me from your service by a letter of your own hand; though I find by it, that my enemies have been able to prevail with your majesty to do it, in the manner that is most injurious to me. And, if their malice and inveteracy against me had not been more powerful with them, than the consideration of your majesty’s honour and justice, they would not have influenced you to impute the occasion of my dismissal to a false and malicious insinuation, contrived by themselves, and made public when there was no opportunity for me to give in my answer; which, they must needs be conscious, would fully detect the falshood and malice of their aspersions, and not leave them that handle for bringing your majesty to such extremities against me.—But I am much more concerned at an expression in your majesty’s letter, which seems to complain of the treatment you had met with. I know not how to understand that word, nor what

' construction to make of it. I know I have ' always endeavoured to serve your majesty
' faithfully and zealously through a great many ' undeserved mortifications. But if your ma' jesty does intend by that expression, to find
' fault with not my coming to the cabinet coun' cil, I am very free to acknowledge, that my ' duty to your majesty and my country would ' not give me leave to join in the counsel of ' a man, who in my opinion puts your majes' ty upon all manner of extremities. And it is ' not my opinion only, but the opinion of all man' kind, that the friendship of France must needs
' be destructive to your majesty, there being
' in that court a root of enmity irreconcilable
' to your majesty's government, and the reli' gion of these kingdoms. I wish your majesty
' may never find the want of so faithful a ser' vant, as I have always endeavoured to ap' prove myself to you. I am with the greatest ' duty and submission, Madam, your majesty's
' most dutiful, and obedient subject, MARL-' BOROUGH.'

"The removal of the duke of Marlborough was thought very extraordinary, after such long and eminent services; and was so little expected, that those, who looked for precedents, could find none since the disgrace of Belisarius in Justinian's time. The only thing pretended to excuse it was, his being considered as the head of those, who opposed the peace, on which the court seemed to set their hearts."

A Resolution to remove the Duke of Somerset, put off.] The duke of Somerset continuing to oppose the schemes of the new ministers, it was also resolved, in a consultation about the middle of December, to remove him.* But the great friendship between the queen and his duchess (who was groom of the stole, and first lady of the bed-chamber) prevented that resolution from being then put in practice. The duke was not removed till the 26th of January, and, though endeavours were used to the contrary, his duchess was by the queen continued in her places, which she offered to resign.

The duke of Marlborough's disgrace was attended with other removes, and made way for several promotions. The duke of Ormond, with the first regiment of foot-guards, was appointed commander in chief of all the forces in Great-Britain, and soon after, upon the elector of Hanover's refusal to command the queen's forces in Flanders, captain-general of all her forces at home and abroad. The earl Rivers

I have broke open my letter, and tore it into the bargain; to let you know, that we are all safe; the queen has made no less than 12 lords to have a majority; nine new ones, the other three peers sons; and has turned out the duke of Somerset. She is awaked at last, and so is Lord Treasurer: I want nothing now but to see the duchess out. But we shall do without her. We are all extremely happy." Swift's Journal.

was made master-general of the ordnance, and colonel of the royal regiment of horse-guards. The duke of Beaufort was appointed captain of the band of pensioners; and brigadier Hill lieutenant of the Tower, in the room of lieutenant-general Cadogan. The countess of Sunderland and the lady Rialton, two of the duke of Marlborough's daughters, resigned their places of ladies of the bed-chamber.

Twelve new Peers created.] The ministers, finding the majority of the House of Lords could not be brought to favour their designs, resolved to make an experiment, which none of our princes had ventured on in former times. A resolution was taken up very suddenly of making twelve peers all at once, which was accordingly done on the last day of December, by calling up by writ to the House of Lords James lord Compton, eldest son to the earl of Northampton, and Charles lord Bruce, eldest son to the earl of Ailshury; and creating by patent ten new peers of Great Britain; George Hay, or lord Duplin, of the kingdom of Scotland, the lord-treasurer's son-in-law, baron Hay, of Bedwarden in the county of Hereford; the lord viscount Windsor of Ireland, baron Montjoy, of the Isle of Wight, in the county of Southampton; Henry Paget, son to the lord Paget, baron Burton, of Burton, in the county of Stafford; sir Thomas Mansel, baron Mansel, of Margam, in the county of Glamorgan; sir Thomas Willoughby, baron Middleton, of Middleton, in the county of Warwick; sir Thomas Trevor, baron Trevor, of Bromham, in the county of Bedford; George Granville, baron Lansdowne, of Biddeford, in the county of Devon; Samuel Masham, baron Masham, of Oates, in the county of Essex; Thomas Foley, baron Foley, of Kidderminster, in the county of Worcester; and Allen Bathurst, baron Bathurst, of Battlesden, in the county of Bedford. Sir Miles Wharton had been offered a peerage; but he thought it looked like the serving a turn, and that, whereas peers used to be made for services, which they had done, he should be made for services to be done by him; and therefore excused himself from accepting it; and the favourite's husband, Mr. Masham, was put in his room. And whereas formerly Jefferies had the vanity to be made a peer, while he was chief justice, which had not been practised for some ages; yet the precedent set by him was followed, and Trevor, chief-justice of the common pleas, was now advanced to be a peer. This creation of peers was looked upon as an undoubted part of the prerogative; so that there was no ground in law to oppose the receiving the new lords into the House; nor was it possible to raise in the antient peers a sense of the indignity, which was now put upon their House; since the court did by this openly declare, that they were to be kept in absolute submission and obedience.

The Queen's Message to the Lords to adjourn disputed, but obeyed.] January 2, 1712. The twelve new peers were introduced into the House of Lords without any opposition;* and, the court-party having by this reinforcement, and by the coming up of the Scots lords, got the majority, the House acquiesced in the queen's Answer to their late Address, importing, "That her majesty thought her Speech to both Houses would have given satisfaction to every body: and, that she had given instructions to her plenipotentiaries, according to the desires of that Address." This done, the Lord-Keeper delivered to the House a Message from the queen, "That, having matters of great importance to communicate to both Houses of parliament, she desired the Lords to adjourn immediately to the 14th, the same day, to which the Commons had adjourned themselves." This occasioned a very warm debate. It was said, that the queen could not send a Message to any one House to adjourn, when the like Message was not sent to both Houses: that the pleasure of the prince in convening, dissolving, proroguing, or ordering the adjournment of parliaments, was always directed to both Houses, but never to any one House, unless the same intimation was made at the same time to the other. That the consequence of this, if allowed, might be the ordering one House to adjourn, while the other was left still to sit; and this might end in a total dis-jointing of the constitution. The Resolution however was carried for adjourning by the weight of the twelve new peers. It is true, the odds were 13; but that was, because one of the peers, who had a proxy, without reflecting on it, went away when the proxies were called for.†

* "Jan. 2. This being the day the Lords meet, and the new peers to be introduced, I went to Westminster to see the sight; but the crowd was too great in the House. So I only went into the robing-room, to give my four brothers joy, and sir Thomas Mansel, and lord Windsor; the other six I am not acquainted with. It was apprehended the Whigs would have raised some difficulties, but nothing happened." Swift's Journal.

† "This Message for adjourning seems only to have been sent to try the strength of both parties, Mr. Secretary St. John having been heard to say in the Court of Requests, as soon as the debate was over, 'That, if those twelve had not been enough, they would have given them, [the Whigs] another dozen.' However, very strong reflections were made, both in print and in most conversations, on that step, many not scrupling to say, 'That, though the queen had an undoubted right to create as many peers as she pleased, yet her ministers might be called to an account for advising her to abuse that right. That peace and war were also the prerogatives of the crown; and yet the engaging in a ruinous war, or making a treacherous peace, are things, which no minister ever did, and escaped unceasured or unpunished. That the creating twelve peers, to serve a turn, was, in effect, making a house of peers a property to

The court having received no news of the opening the congress, councils were held on Saturday and Sunday the 12th and 13th of January, in which it was debated, Whether the parliament should sit, or be desired further to adjourn themselves? and, it being carried for the adjournment, a Message was on the 14th sent to both houses, importing, "That her majesty fully determined to have been personally present in parliament that day; but, being prevented by a sudden return of her gout, her majesty, in hopes she might, by the blessing of God, be able to speak to both her houses of parliament on Thursday next, the 17th of this instant January, desired them to adjourn to that day." Both houses readily complied with this Message; but, before the same was delivered by Mr. St. John to the Commons, they ordered their Speaker to issue out writs, for the electing nine members in the room of those called up to the house of peers.*

The Queen's Message to the Parliament concerning a Peace: the Scots Peers: the number of Libels, &c.] Jan. 17. The parliament being met again, a Message from the queen the Court, and taking away a negative upon the crown; which would render our liberties precarious. That it could not be denied, that the new-made peers were men of noble fortunes; and that some of them had shewn a commendable zeal for the present establishment; but who would secure us, that hereafter such a number should not be made of men of a quite different character? and, in short, that this was a precedent, which might be made use of to enslave the nation, and to introduce a popish pretender, or the popish religion. That if in the reign of such a queen this abuse of the prerogative was so much exclaimed against, how much greater would the cry have been, had it been in a suspicious reign? whereas now they have an unexceptionable instance to produce, to silence any clamour or noise. That it was impossible for men, who owed so much to her majesty for her share in the late Revolution, to oppose a prerogative, that had never been disputed, because never used in that manner: but had any prince, who had merited less of his country, began such a thing, it would, no doubt, have been opposed, and perhaps denied him. But, after all, the severest reflection upon the twelve new peers was made by the earl of Wharton, who, the same day they were introduced, when the question about adjourning was going to be put, asked one of them, 'Whether they voted by their foreman?' thereby comparing them to a petty jury." Boyer.

* "Jan. 14. The parliament was to sit to-day; and met; but were adjourned by the queen's directions till Thursday. She designs to make some important speech then. She pretended illness; but I believe they were not ready, and they expect some opposition; and the Scots lords are angry, and must be pacified." Swift's Journal.

was delivered to both Houses. That to the Commons was as follows:

"ANNE.R.

"1. Her majesty not having recovered strength enough, since the return of the gout, to be present this day in person; and being unwilling, that the public business should receive any delay, thinks fit to communicate to them the substance of what she intended to have spoke.

"2. At the opening of this session, her majesty acquainted the parliament, that both time and place were appointed for the meeting of the plenipotentiaries of all the confederates, to treat with those of the enemy concerning a General Peace; and also expressed the care, which she intended to take of all her allies, and the strict union, in which she proposed to join with them, in order to obtain a good Peace, and to guaranty and support it, when obtained.

"3. Her majesty can now tell them, that her plenipotentiaries are arrived at Utrecht, and have begun, in pursuance of their instructions, to concert the most proper ways of procuring a just satisfaction to all in alliance with her, according to their several treaties, and particularly with relation to Spain and the West-Indies.

"4. You may depend on her majesty's communicating to her parliament the terms of peace, before the same shall be concluded.

"5. The world will now see, how groundless those reports are, which have been spread abroad by men of evil intentions, to serve the worst designs, as if a Separate Peace had been treated, for which there has not been the least colour given.

"6. Her majesty's ministers have directions to propose, that a day may be fixed for the finishing, as was done for the commencement of this Treaty; and, in the mean time all the preparations are hastening for an early campaign.

"7. The zeal, which this House has already expressed, was a sure pledge, that they will proceed in giving the necessary dispatch to the supplies.

"8. Her majesty finds it necessary to observe, how great licence is taken in publishing false and scandalous Libels, such as are a reproach to any government. This evil seems to be grown too strong for the laws now in force; it is therefore recommended to you to find a remedy equal to the mischief."

The Message the queen sent to the House of Lords, was exactly the same with that sent to the Commons; except only, that instead of the seventh paragraph, about the supply, her majesty took notice of the affair relating to the Scots Peers, in the following words: "There is one thing in which her majesty's subjects of the north part of this kingdom are extremely concerned: the distinction such of them who were Peers of Scotland before the Union must lie under, if the prerogative of the crown is strictly barred against them alone. This is a matter which sensibly affects her majesty, and she therefore lays it, before this House, earnestly desiring their advice and concurrence a finding out the best method of settling the affair, to the satisfaction of the whole kingdom."

The Lords' Address thereon.] Jan. 18. The House of Lords, in a body, waited on the Queen with the following Address:

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal parliament assembled, beg leave to express our extreme concern for the continuance of your majesty's indisposition, by which we were deprived of the honour of your royal presence; and at the same time beseech your majesty to accept of the most humble thanks of this House for your most gracious Message on the 17th instant, wherein your majesty is pleased to express your just care for all your allies, and the strict union in which your majesty proposed to join with them in order to obtain a good Peace, and to guaranty and support it when obtained; and for the instructions your majesty has given to your plenipotentiaries, to concert the most proper way of procuring a just satisfaction to all in alliance with your majesty, according to their several treaties, and particularly with relation to Spain and the West Indies, which are of so great concern to the safety and commerce of your majesty's kingdoms.—We think ourselves obliged more especially to return our humblest acknowledgements for your majesty's great condescension in acquainting this House with the steps already taken in relation to the Peace, and for the assurance your majesty is pleased to give of communicating to this House the terms of the Peace before the same shall be concluded. Your majesty's declaration, that there has not been the least colour given for those false and scandalous reports that have been spread, that a Separate Peace has been treated, must be the highest satisfaction to all your people: and we readily embrace this opportunity to assure your majesty, that we entirely rely upon your great wisdom, in settling the terms of peace."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's Answer was as follows:

"My lords; I return you my most hearty thanks for this Address, and for the confidence you place in me, which will better enable me to obtain such terms as may be safe and honourable for my own subjects, and all our allies."

The Commons' Address.] The Address of the Commons was as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign;

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, appear before your majesty, with the greatest satisfaction, to return our most humble thanks for your majesty's most most gracious Message.—Your majesty has, on all occasions, shewn such a tenderness and regard to the welfare of your people; and such generous and disinterested concern for the support and advantage of your allies, in so many instances, during the prosecution of the present war; that we have no reason to doubt our majesty's care of both, in a Treaty of Peace; and that the most proper ways will be concerted of procuring a just satisfaction to all an alliance with your majesty, according to their several treaties; and particularly, with relation to Spain, and the West-Indies: however, we think ourselves obliged, with the greatest gratitude, to acknowledge your majesty's goodness and condescension, in promising to communicate to your parliament the terms for a General Peace, before the same shall be concluded: and this, if any thing can, must indirectly silence those seditious reports, that have been industriously and maliciously spread abroad, to the dishonour of your majesty, that a Separate Peace has been treated; which can have been raised only by some factious incendiaries; who, to cover their own disaffection to the present establishment and administration, and such designs as they have not dared publicly to own, endeavour to distract your subjects with unreasonable and groundless distrusts and jealousies.—Your majesty's approbation of the zeal your faithful Commons have already expressed for raising the necessary supplies, will engage them to continue their application, and to give all possible dispatch thereto.—We are very sensible how much the Liberty of the Press is abused, by turning it into such a licentiousness as is a just reproach to the nation; since not only false and scandalous libels are printed and published against your majesty's government, but the most horrid blasphemies against God and religion: and we beg leave humbly to assure your majesty, that we will do our utmost to find out a remedy equal to this mischief, and that may effectually cure it."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty gave this Answer:

"I have received so many proofs of the loyalty of this House of Commons, and of their love of our country, that the best answer which I can return to this most dutiful Address, is to give you my hearty thanks for it; and to repeat not only that good opinion which I have of my Commons, but also my assurances, that be confidence which you place in me shall be answered by my utmost endeavours to promote the safety and advantage of all my subjects."

A Bill giving Precedence to the House of Hanover.] The duke of Devonshire, pursuant to the motion he had made before the recess, having prepared a Bill for giving precedence to the duke of Cambridge, the Lord-Treasurer was resolved to prevent him, and offered, January 17, a bill, giving precedence to the whole electoral family, as the children and nephews of the crown; and it was intimated, that bills relating to honours and precedence ought to come from the crown: the duke of Devonshire would make no dispute on this head; if the thing passed, he acquiesced in the manner of passing it, only he thought it lay within the authority of the House. On this occasion, the Court seemed, even to an affection, to show a particular zeal in promoting this bill; for it passed through both Houses in two days. Notwithstanding this haste, the Court did not seem to design any such bill, till it was proposed by others, out of whose hands they thought fit to take it. The act was sent over to Hanover, by Mr. Thomas Harley, in order to raise favourable thoughts there of the ministry. But that Court saw through these thin disguises, which were contradicted by the open countenance to those who were no well-wishers to the Protestant Succession, and the discouragement to its best friends.

Debate concerning the Scots Peers.] The Lords entered upon the consideration of the paragraph in the queen's Message, relating to the Peers of Scotland. The Court proposed that an expedient might be found that the Peers of Scotland should not sit among them by election, but by descent, in case the rest of the peers of that nation should consent to it. A debate followed concerning the Articles of the Union, which of these were fundamental and not alterable; it was said, that by the Union no private right could be taken away, but by the consent of the persons concerned; therefore no alteration could be made in the right of the Peers of Scotland, unless they consented to it. It was afterwards debated, whether an alteration might be made with this condition, in case they should consent to it; or whether the first rise to any such alteration ought not to be given, by a previous desire. This was not so subject to an ill management; the Court studied to have a subsequent consent received as sufficient; but a previous desire was insisted, as visibly fairer and juster.

The Scots Lords, seeing no redress to their complaint, but that the Peers adhered to their late judgment, seemed resolved to come no more to sit in the House of Lords; but the Court was sensible, that their strength, in that House, consisted chiefly in them and the new Peers; for which reason pains were taken, and secret forcible arguments were used to them, which proved so effectual, that after a few days absence they came back, and continued, during the session, to sit in the House. They gave out, that an expedient would be found, that would be to the satisfaction of the Peers of Scotland; but, nothing of that appearing, it was concluded, that the satisfaction was private and personal. The great arrear, into which all the regular payments, both of the household and of salaries and pensions, was left to run, made it to be generally believed, that the income for the civil-list, though it exceeded the establishment very much, was applied to other payments, which the ministers durst not own. And, though secret practice on members had been for a great while too common, yet it was believed, that it was at this time managed with an extraordinary profusion.

Proceedings of the Commons against Mr. Robert Walpole.] On the 17th of January, Mr. Lockhart acquainted the House, from the Commissioners for taking, examining, and stating the Public Accounts, That Mr. Walpole* had, the Monday before, brought Mr. Man to the said Commissioners, with an Affidavit ready prepared, and desired he might be sworn to it: And that the Commissioners did swear him to the same; and afterwards examined him themselves, and took his Answer in writing; and that the Commissioners had directed him to present to the House, the Deposition of Mr. Robert Man, proving, that he is agent to Robert Walpole, esq. and that he has received several sums of money on account of two contracts, for foraging the troops in North-Britain; and also the deposition of Mr. Robert Man. And he presented the same to the House accordingly: and the titles of the said several Depositions were read.

Then the order of the day was read, for taking into consideration the Report from the said Commissioners the 21st of December last whereupon the House proceeded to take into consideration that part of the said Report which relates to the Contracts for Forage in North-Britain: and the same was read, as were also several Depositions of Mr. Man. And Mr. John Montgomery was called in, and examined: and the two notes mentioned in the Report, and several receipts for moneys paid by Mr. Montgomery to Mr. Man were delivered in, and read; and then Mr. Montgomery withdrew.

Ordered, That candles be brought in. And they were brought in accordingly.

And Mr. Walpole was heard in his place: After which, a debate arose in the House, whether Mr. Walpole should withdraw before a question was stated, or any debate had of the matter relating to him. Whereupon the * "Jan. 17. I went this morning to the duke of Ormond about some business; and he told me he could not dine with us to-day, being to dine with prince Eugene. Those of our society of the House of Commons could not be with us, the House sitting late on Walpole. I left them at nine, and they were not come. We kept some dinner for them. I hope Walpole will be sent to the Tower, and expelled the House: but, this afternoon the members I spoke with in the Court of Requests talked dubiously of it. It will be a leading card to maul the duke of Marlborough for the same crime, or at least to censure him. The queen's message was only to give them notice of the peace she is treating, and to desire they will make some law to prevent libels against the government; so farewell to Grub-street.

"Jan. 18. I heard to-day that the commoners of our society did not leave the parliament till eleven at night, then went to those I left, and stayed till three in the morning. Walpole is expelled, and sent to the Tower." Swift's Journal,

Journal relating to the lord Falkland, in the year 1693; and also the Journal relating to Mr. Ridge, in the year 1710; were read.—Whereupon Mr. Walpole withdrew before any debate was had, or any question proposed, touching the matter relating to him.

A motion being made, and the question being proposed, "That Robert Walpole, esq. a member of this House, in receiving the sum of 500 guineas, and in taking a note for 500*l.* more, on account of two contracts for Forage of her majesty's troops quartered in North Britain, made by him when Secretary at War, pursuant to a power granted to him by the late Lord Treasurer, is guilty of a high Breach of Trust, and notorious Corruption;

An Amendment was proposed to be made to the question, by leaving out these words, "and notorious corruption:" And the question being put, That those words be left out of the question; the House divided. Yeas 155. Noes 207. So it passed in the Negative.

Mr. Walpole committed to the Tower and expelled.] Then the main question being put, "That Robert Walpole, esq. a member of this House, in receiving the sum of 500 guineas, and in taking a note for 500*l.* more, on account of two contracts for Forage of her majesty's troops quartered in North Britain, made by him when Secretary at War, pursuant to a power granted to him by the late Lord Treasurer, is guilty of a high Breach of Trust, and notorious Corruption;" The House divided. Yeas 205, Noes 148.

So it was resolved in the Affirmative.

Resolved, "That the said Robert Walpole, esq. be, for the said offence, committed prisoner to the Tower of London, during the pleasure of this House: and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrants accordingly."

Then a motion being made, and the question put, That the House do now adjourn, Yeas 156, Noes 168. So it passed in the Negative.

Then a motion being made, and the question being put, "That the said Robert Walpole, esq. be, for the said offence, also expelled this House:" The House divided. Yeas 174, Noes 148. So it was resolved in the Affirmative.

Mr. Coxe's Account of the Proceedings against Mr. Walpole.] "The Tories having attempted to arraign the measures of their predecessors in office, turned their principal objections against the management of the Revenue; a topic on which it was most easy to delude the public mind, by introducing a series of complicated calculations. This attack was principally levelled against Godolphin, who was accused of having profusely lavished the public money, and not having accounted for the sums voted by parliament. When several of his former adherents in the House of Commons deserted the ex-minister, a few defended his cause, and argued that the clamours raised against him, were merely the effusions of malice and calumny. The in-us attack was masqued under the plausible appearance of appointing a Committee for examining and stating the Public Accounts. St. An employed all the powers of his eloquence to shew the necessity of taking into consideration the national expenditure; maintained it none but those who were enemies to their country, or who would themselves plunder the treasury, would be so bold as to oppose the inquiry; and supported his arguments with the most ardent affection of zeal for the church and constitution.

"No sooner had St. John ceased speaking, than Walpole rose with great spirit to vindicate the nation from the imputation of corruption and malversation. He did not, however, condescend to make any reply to the hypocritical reprobation of St. John, in regard to religion, but confined his remarks to the subject of detraction. He explained, in a calm and distinct manner, the accounts of the public expenditure, and confirmed the truth of his report, by the original receipts, and the most authentic testimonies. After having proved that the inquiry was founded on party animosity, he concluded by observing, 'If he is accused, who cannot be charged, with any crime, or any just suspicion of a crime, and whom the member who spoke last could neither fear nor hate, take heed lest the constitution should receive a wound through his sides. It is obvious, how much the multitude is under the influence of bribery, it is obvious, that the people of England are at this moment animated against each other, with a spirit of hatred and rancour. It behoves you, in the first place, to find a remedy for those distempers, which at present are predominant in the civil constitution, and unless you reject this enquiry with becoming indignation, I leave you to conjecture the situation to which this kingdom and government are likely to be exposed.' But the zeal and eloquence of Walpole had no effect; for the Committee was appointed, consisting of persons principally Tories, and two notorious Jacobites; all previously determined to arraign the proceedings of the former administration. The result of their inquiry was given in a most extraordinary Report, which was presented to the House on the 12th of April, and was presented to the queen on the same day. After stating the great arrears due from public taxes, many embezzlements and scandalous abuses, and the mismanagement in public offices, and the application of parliamentary supplies, it boldly asserted, 'That of the monies granted by parliament, and issued for the public service to Christmas, 1710, there remains unaccounted for, the sum of 35,302,107*l.* for a great part of which no accounts have so much as been laid before the auditors; and for the rest, though some accounts have been brought in, yet they have not been prosecuted by the accountants, and finished.' This unqualified reproach cast by the House of Commons on the ex-ministers, had for a short time a prodigious effect in increasing the unpopularity of the Whigs. The people conceived it to be impossible, that the Commons would advance such an assertion, without the most convincing proofs in its favour. A general belief gained ground, that the nation had been deceived and betrayed; fresh confidence was placed in the new ministers, who thus displayed their care for the people, and proved their capacity by contriving such means as might ascertain and discharge so vast a debt.

"In opposition to these recusations, Walpole again came forth as the champion of his colleagues, and published "The Debts of the Nation stated and considered," and the "Thirty-five Millions accounted for." In these publications, the author, who is called by Arthur Mainwaring 'the best master of figures of any man of his time,' gave, in a small compass, so accurate a scheme of the public debts, especially of the navy, together with the management of the revenues, the anticipations, the debts, and the reasons and necessity of them, as entirely undeceived the public, and refuted the calumnies which had been so industriously raised. He proved, in a clear and satisfactory manner, that the Debt of the Navy, which was estimated at 5,130,539*l.* did not exceed 574,000*l.*; and that of the whole 35,000,000*l.* all but 4,000,000*l.* had been accounted for.

"Walpole had distinguished himself too ably in the House of Commons, and by his publications had proved himself too warm a friend of the fallen ministry, and too powerful an adversary to the reigning administration, not to be singled out as one of the sacrifices to be made at the shrine of party vengeance. His expulsion, therefore, from the House of Commons was resolved, and a meeting held by the leaders of the opposite party for the purpose of consulting on the means of proceeding. But the injustice of this act was esteemed so flagrant, and the imputations of guilt so faint and false, that many of those who had united to overturn the late administration, declared their aversion to this malicious design. Bromley, however, removed their scruples, by declaring that the expulsion of Walpole was the unum necessarium, as they could not carry on the business, if he was suffered to continue in the House. It is no wonder, therefore, that his enemies, who could command a majority, should find a plausible pretext. The Commissioners of Public Accounts laid a charge of venality and corruption against him for Forage Contracts in Scotland while he was Secretary at War. They accused him of having taken, in two contracts, two notes of hand, one for 500 guineas, the other for 500*l.* the first of which had been paid, and a receipt given in his name, and of the other 400*l.* was paid. It appeared, from examining of the witnesses, on oath, that the contractors, rather than admit into their partnership Robert Mann, agent for Walpole, who, according to the tenor of the original agreement, reserved a share for a friend, to have a benefit of the fifth part, if not redeemed by the contractors with a sum of money, had preferred paying the 500 guineas and 500*l.*; and that Mann had received the money for the first note; and had obtained the second note as a deposit for the sum specified to be paid.

In consequence of these reports, Walpole was heard in his own defence, though no particulars of his speech are preserved in the proceedings of parliament; after he had withdrawn, a warm debate took place, which lasted till past ten at night. His friends, on this occasion, supported him with so much zeal, that the House was divided four times in the same sitting; and the ministers, who carried all political questions in this session with only a trifling opposition, gained the motions for his condemnation and expulsion by a small majority. On the first division, in which Pultney, then his intimate friend, afterwards his most bitter opponent, was teller, the amendment, to leave out the words, "and notorious corruption," was negatived by a majority of 52. The main question passed in the affirmative by 57. The motion for committing him to the Tower by only twelve; and his expulsion was decreed by 22. These small majorities sufficiently prove, either, that Walpole possessed great personal influence in the House, or that many of the Tories considered his accusation a scandalous prosecution, and would not give their votes against him. The House however resolved, 'That Robert Walpole, esquire, was guilty of a breach of trust, and notorious corruption: That he should be committed prisoner to the Tower of London;' and on a subsequent motion, which was carried only by a majority of 22 votes, 'That he should be expelled.'

On the next morning, Walpole surrendered himself a prisoner, and was committed to the Tower. It was expected; that he would have petitioned, and submitted himself to the censure of the House; but he refused making any concession which could imply a consciousness of guilt, and he therefore remained a prisoner until the prorogation of parliament. In the mean time a new Writ being issued for Lynn, he was re-chosen for that borough; but a petition being made against the return, by Samuel Taylor, the opposing candidate, the Commons resolved, 'That having been expelled this House for an high breach of trust in the execution of his office, and notorious corruption, when secretary at war, he was incapable of being re-elected a member to serve in the present parliament.'

While he remained a prisoner, he was considered as a martyr to the cause of the Whigs, and repeatedly visited by persons of the highest distinction and abilities, particularly by the duke and duchess of Marlborough, Godolphin, Sunderland, Somers and Pultney; and his apartment exhibited the appearance of a crowded levee.

During his confinement, he had sufficient leisure to compose a clear and judicious vindication of himself, which was published under the title of "The Case of Mr. Walpole, in a Letter from a Tory Member of Parliament to his friend in the Country." In this masterly defence, he fully justifies himself, and appeals to evidence, taken upon oath, against the principal charges, high breach of trust and notorious corruption. In regard to high breach of trust, he shews that he had no advantage in the contracts; that he was not the only person concerned in making them, and that they were settled on the best and most advantageous terms to be obtained at the time. In reply to the charge of notorious corruption, he proves that a share in the contract being given to his friend, Robert Mann, the contractors preferred paying him a sum of money in recompence for his share; that the contractor, who had negotiated this bargain with Mann, dying, the other not knowing his name, made the note of hand payable to Walpole or order, for the use of his friend; that the note was endorsed by himself only for form, and the money received by Mann was for his own use and benefit, and that Walpole had not the least interest directly or indirectly, in this affair.

I have been thus particular in stating the defence of Walpole, because it gives strong proofs of his innocence, and was never fairly and candidly answered; because some of the very persons who visited him in prison, and not only defended but applauded his conduct in this instance, afterwards, when in opposition, reproached him with the commission of this very crime, of which they had publicly and formally absolved him; and because some late writers of different principles, have stigmatised his memory, without having sufficiently examined his defence.

This imprisonment has been called the prelude to his rise; and lord Lansdowne, who was afterwards consigned to the same apartment, wrote these lines under Walpole's name, which he had left on the window:

'Good unexpected, evil unforeseen,
' Appear by turns, as fortune shifts the scene;
' Some rais'd aloft, come tumbling down amidst
' And fall so hard, they bound and rise again.'

The ministry having protracted the session by adjournment, instead of ending it by prorogation, merely to detain him in prison, Walpole was not released until the 8th of July. From that period till the dissolution, which took place on the 8th of August 1713, being incapacitated from serving his party in the House of Commons, he exerted himself in maintaining the union of the Whigs, in conciliating the leaders, often discordant in their opinions, jealous of each other, or lukewarm in their conduct. He was a principal director of their counsels, and the great manager of their deliberations. The magnanimity and cheerfulness with which he acted and suffered, his liberality in expending large sums in procuring intelligence, and promoting the Protestant Succession, the hospitality with which he entertained his political associates, endeared him to the party, animated their counsels, and contributed to preserve them from defection. The hearty expences incurred by these means, injured his private fortune, and involved him in pecuniary embarrassments; a circumstance which perhaps gave rise to, or at least sanctioned the report, afterwards industriously circulated by opposition, of his being a needy adventurer, who had not credit enough to raise 100*l.* on his own security. The gratitude he afterwards displayed to those persons who accommodated him with money at a considerable risk, does honour to his character.

"During this period, he ably employed his pen in the service of his party. He assisted Steele in several political pamphlets; and published an Answer to the Vote of the House of Commons, that the States General had been deficient in their proportion of troops, and that the queen had paid subsidies to the amount of three millions of crowns above the sum stipulated.

"His zeal and exertions were so conspicuous, that he received a flattering testimony of esteem, in a visit which he paid to Godolphin, while confined with his last illness at St. Alban's, in the house of the duchess of Marlborough. The dying statesman turning to the duchess, who stood by his bedside, said to her, 'If you ever forsake that young man, and if souls are permitted to return from the grave to the earth, I will appear to you and reproach you for your conduct.'

"The dissolution of the parliament at length taking place, Walpole's incapacity was removed, and he was again chosen for Lynn. While the elections were depending, it was the opinion of Somers, and the Whig Lords, that to state to the people, in a strong and perspicuous manner, the proceedings of the late parliament, with a view to expose the measures of the ministry, and to guide the electors in the choice of the new representatives, would be highly advantageous to their party. As no one seemed better calculated for this office than Walpole, he undertook a pamphlet, at their desire, on the Thursday, and published it on the Tuesday following, under the title of, A Short History of the Parliament, with the motto: Venalis Populus, venalis Curia Patrum.

"To this publication is prefixed, a dedication by Pulteney, then his coadjutor, composed in a strain of irony and humour peculiarly his own, and in which, though addressed to an anonymous peer, it was easy to perceive that the earl of Oxford was the object of allusion.

"The pamphlet tends to prove, that the proceedings of the parliament had been directly contrary to the honour and advantage of England. The author defends the measures of the late administration with great ability; and after refuting the censures passed on Marlborough and Townshend, instances his own case, and describes himself as sharing the honour of an impeachment with those illustrious men. His animadversions on the conduct of the parliament, were made with so much freedom and asperity, that it was not deemed prudent to entrust them to a common printer. Walpole himself, at a subsequent period, expresses the apprehensions of the danger he might have incurred, had the author been discovered. 'There is a noble lord in the other house, who can, if he pleases, inform gentlemen, that the author of that history was so apprehensive of the consequences of printing it, that the press was carried to his house, and the copies printed there.'"

A Speech made against Mr. Walpole. In consequence of the Resolutions, (at p. 1068.) Mr. Walpole surrendered himself next morning prisoner to the Tower; and a Speech on that occasion, was a day or two after printed as follows:

"Sir, I see how late it is, and therefore will take up but little of your time in supporting the motion that is made you, which I think in justice to ourselves, and that trust the country has reposed in us, is yet necessary to make the proceedings of this day complete, and give that satisfaction to the nation, which, I am satisfied, is expected from us in this affair.

"Sir, we have been to-day, and are yet sitting in judgment upon no less a crime than notorious corruption in the executing an office of trust; which is certainly a practice not only the most vile and detestable in itself, but the most pernicious, and (except treason) the most destructive to every constitution or government, wherever it prevails. And as the crime itself is of the worst sort that can be in any government, so I cannot help observing to you, that, in the instance you have had to-day before you, there are some circumstances which make this the worst even of that sort of any that are yet upon your journals. In every other instance that I can find there, it is plain it was the profit that tempted and prevailed upon the party to commit the crime: but this gentleman, if we would believe his own, and his evidence's confession, has done it only to gratify the prodigality of his humour, and give an extraordinary bounty to a creature of his own. Or if we take it the other way (which I own is my belief) that the profit was to himself, it is still the most extraordinary case that appears there: for, in all other instances of fraud, what the nation lost the party got: but in this, for every hundred pounds of public money, which he was to get for making this contract, it has cost the nation, as it stands computed upon your report, very near a thousand. So that I leave the fact, which being of the worst sort (except treason) that can be; and this instance, with being the worst of that sort (except what yet lies upon your table) that has ever yet appeared before this House.

* "Walpole," says Swift, in his Four Last Years; "was a person much caressed by the opposers of the queen and ministry, having been first drawn into their party by his indifference to any principles, and afterwards kept steady by the loss of his place. His hold, forward countenance, altogether a stranger to that infirmity which makes men bashful, joined to a readiness of speaking in public, hath justly intitled him, among those of his faction, to be a sort of leader of the second form. The reader must excuse me for being so particular about one, who is otherwise altogether obscure."

“ Sir, I am sorry to observe both from this instance that has been proved before you to-day, and from others that lie upon your table, besides what future discoveries we may reasonably expect from the industry and integrity, the constancy and courage of those gentlemen, you have so happily chose to be your Commissioners of Accounts; that this canker has not only taken very deep root among some, but I believe we shall find it hath spread itself almost through every part of the late administration; therefore, Sir, I hope your judgment in this case will be such, as all good judgment ought to be, wherein the punishing of the offender, whether it be more or less, is not so much to be regarded, as that it may be such, as may sufficiently deter others from daring to commit the like practices hereafter.

“ Sir, you have already sent the person that you have found guilty of this foul crime to the Tower, and some gentlemen say (though I can hardly believe them) they think it punishment sufficient: I am so far from thinking that a punishment adequate to the crime, that I am afraid that all that is in the power of this House to do, will not be sufficient to put the inveterate and radicated mischief from amongst us; and as I said before, it is the remedying of the evil, not the punishment of the man, which we ought chiefly to regard.—For Sir, it is very plain from the many instances which you have upon your journals, that abundantly less crimes have been punished both by imprisonment, and what you are now moved for, expulsion; and yet the united force of these punishments (which I think is the most this House can do) have been so far from being able to remedy the evil, that it has increased upon us.—As to what you have already done, I own, Sir, I think confinement of any sort very grievous to a generous mind: but, Sir, there are confident tempers in the world, that instead of standing corrected, can glory in their punishments, be they of what sort they will. We all know an instance, where an Hymn has been made even to the Pillory itself, by the wretch that was just come out of it. I hope your member is not so low as that fellow; but give me leave to say, I expect to see such a parade made, and such a countenance shewed him in his prison, by some sort of persons, who would be glad, for their own sakes, to screen the foulness of the crime, as well as the person convicted of it, that I am afraid that part of your judgment will not sit so heavy upon him as it ought to do. Your worthy member sir Peter King says, he as much deserves to be hanged as these two punishments; I do not much differ from that worthy gentleman; for I think a man that is in posts of near five thousand pounds a year, and cannot be content with that, but must commit such practices as these are, deserves little less; but I am sensible how late it is, therefore, &c.”

Message from the Queen relating to the 10 new Churches.] Mr. Secretary St. John delivered to the Commons the following Message from her majesty:

“ ANN. R.

“ Her majesty thinks fit to inform the House, that in pursuance of an Act, entitled, ‘ An Act for granting to her majesty several duties on coals, for building 50 new Churches in and about the cities of London and Westminster, and suburbs thereof, and other purposes therein mentioned,’ she issued out her commission under the great seal of Great Britain, authorizing several persons to execute the powers therein mentioned; that her majesty finding, by the report of the commissioners, that they have not been able, within the time limited, fully to answer the purposes of the said commission, earnestly recommends to her parliament, that the time may be enlarged for effecting this work, and such further powers may be given, as shall appear necessary to render her majesty’s pious intentions more effectual.”

A Bill ordered to be brought in thereupon.] Hereupon, a Bill was ordered to be brought in, ‘ For enlarging the time given to the Commissioners appointed by her majesty, pursuant to an Act, entitled, ‘ An Act for granting to her majesty, several duties on coals, for building 50 new Churches in, and about the cities of London and Westminster, and suburbs thereof, and other purposes therein mentioned: and also for giving the said Commissioners farther powers for better effecting the purposes in the said Act mentioned.’

PROCEEDINGS OF THE COMMONS AGAINST THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH.] JAN. 24. The Commons, in a full House, proceeded to take into consideration the Report of the Commissioners of the Public Accounts, and that part of the said Report, relating to the duke of Marlborough, * (see p. 1049.) which was not perused the Thursday before, was now read, as were also the Minutes of Mr. Cardonnell’s Deposition, about Allowances by the contractors for * “ Jan. 23. I dined again to-day with the Secretary; but could not dispatch some business I had with him, he has so much besides upon his hands at this juncture; and preparing against the great business to-morrow, which we are all top full of. The ministers’ design is, that the duke of Marlborough shall be censured as gently as possible, provided his friends will not make head to defend him: but if they do, it may end in some severer vote. A gentleman who was just now with him, tells me he is much cast down, and fallen away; but he is positive, if he has but ten friends in the House, that they shall defend him to the utmost, and endeavour to prevent the least censure upon him; which I think cannot be, since the bribery is manifest: Sir Solomon Medina paid him 6,000*l.* a year to have the employment of providing bread for the army, and the duke owns it in his letter to the Commissioners of Accounts.” Swift’s Journal.

read and Bread-waggons, taken and produced by the Commissioners of Accounts; and the translations of the Certificates of two persons beyond sea, the one of Jacob de Merchado, the other of Don Manuel Carlosa, relating to the said allowances. Upon the reading of those papers there arose a warm debate, that lasted from 3 in the afternoon, till near half an hour past 11 at night, and in which many speeches were made for and against his grace. Sir John Germain was also called in, and, being examined at the bar, said, in his grace's behalf, That the Allowances given to his grace by the Contractors for Bread and Bread-waggons, were customary perquisites of the commander in chief in Flanders; and as such formerly allowed to prince Waldeck, under whom sir John Germain had served.

Resolutions against his Grace.] But nevertheless it was resolved, by a majority of 265 to 155; 1. "That the taking several sums of money annually, by the duke of Marlborough, from the Contractors for furnishing the Bread and Bread-Waggons for the army in the Low-countries, was unwarrantable and illegal."

A motion being made, and the question put, That the House do adjourn, it passed in the negative; After which it was also resolved, by a great majority, "That the two and an half per cent. deducted from the foreign Troops in her majesty's pay, is public money, and ought to be accounted for." And, That the said Resolutions be laid before her majesty by the whole House*.

Accordingly, on the 26th, the House with their Speaker, laid the said Resolutions before the queen: who thereupon was pleased to make this Answer:

"I have a great regard for whatever is represented to me by my Commons; and will do my part to redress what you complain of."

"It is observable," says Tindal, "that though some of the foreign princes, who had troops in the queen's pay, did some time after order their ministers in London to represent, that the two and a half per cent. was their own money, but they were willing to allow it as a

* "It was observed, as very commendable and becoming the dignity of such an assembly, that this debate was managed with great temper, and with few personal reflections upon the duke of Marlborough. They seemed only desirous to come at the truth, without which they could not answer the trust reposed in them by those whom they represented, and left the rest to her majesty's prudence. The Attorney-general was ordered to commence an action against the duke for the subtracted money, which would have amounted to a great sum, enough to ruin any private person, except himself. This process is still depending, although very moderately pursued, either by the queen's indulgence to one whom she had formerly so much trusted, or perhaps to be revived or slackened, according to the future demeanor of the defendant." Swift's Four Last Years.

'free gift to the duke of Ormond, as they had 'done to the duke of Marlborough;' which representation seemed to be a full justification of the latter. The Queen however was prevailed upon to send an order to the attorney-general to prosecute the duke for the 15,000*l.* which was deducted yearly out of the pay of the foreign troops, for the receiving whereof he had her own warrant. The court espoused these Resolutions of the Commons with great zeal, and paid well for the great majority by which they were carried. Upon this many virulent writers (whether set on to it, or officiously studying to merit by it, did not appear) threw out in many defamatory libels,* a great deal of malice against the duke of Marlborough: they compared him to Cataline, to Crassus, to Antony; and studied to represent him as a robber of the nation, and as a public enemy. This gave indignation to all who had a sense of gratitude, or a regard to justice.—Secret inquiries were made, in order to the laying more load on the duke of Marlborough, and to see whether posts in the army or in the guards, were sold by him; but nothing could be found. He had suffered a Practice to go on that had been begun in the late king's time, of letting officers sell their commissions; but he had never taken any part of the price to himself. Few thought that he had been so clear in that matter; for it was the only thing in which now his enemies were confident that some discoveries would have been made to his prejudice:

* "Among the libels against the duke was published by either Prior or Swift, 'A fable of the Widow and her Cat,' the last stanza of which is as follows:

"So flagrant is thy insolence,
So vile thy breach of trust is,
That longer with thee to dispense,
Were want of power or want of sense:
Here, Towzer,—Do him justice."

"It is no wonder the duke of Marlborough was thus used, since the earl of Nottingham himself did not escape for opposing the negotiations of peace. It was not only said, that he did so because he was refused the privy-seal, but the following advertisement was inserted in the Post-Boy, of December 8, viz. 'Whereas a very tall, thin, swarthy-complected man, between sixty and seventy years of age, wearing a brown coat, with little sleeves and long pockets, has lately withdrawn himself from his friends, being seduced by wicked persons to follow ill courses: these are to give notice, that whoever shall discover him shall have 10*s.* reward; or, if he will voluntarily return, he shall be kindly received by his friends, who will not reproach him for past follies, provided he give good assurances, that, for the future he will firmly adhere to the church of England in which he was so carefully educated by his honest parents.' There were also lampoons, and other libels, both in verse and prose, published against the same peer." Tindal.

so that the endeavours used to search into those matters, producing nothing, raised the reputation of his incorrupt administration, more than all his well-wishers could have expected. In this whole transaction was seen a new scene of ingratitude, acted in a most imprudent manner; when the man, to whom the nation owed more than it had ever done, in any age, to any subject, or perhaps to any person whatever, was, for some months, pursued with so much malice. He bore all with silence and patience, appearing always calm and cheerful; and though he prepared a full Vindication of himself, yet he delayed publishing it, till the nation should return to its senses and be capable of examining those matters in a more impartial manner." The following is a copy of the said Vindication:

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH'S CASE AND VINDICATION OF HIMSELF.

The following Case was designed by the Duke of Marlborough to be presented to the Honourable House of Commons, in Vindication of himself from the Charge of the Commissioners of Accounts, in relation to the two and a half per cent. for Bread and Bread-waggons:

"When I first heard of the proceedings before the Commissioners for taking the Public Accounts, I was abroad, and in the queen's service; and though the account I gave you by letter, was not, in their opinions, so full, but they have thought themselves obliged, notwithstanding that, to lay the matter before you, I think myself however bound to own the justice they have been pleased to do me, in reporting that letter also, together with her majesty's letter.

"I am sensible the nature of the service to which the report relates, might occasion many mistakes, without any imputation to the gentlemen concerned in that commission, and I am sure that those gentlemen, every one of them, and every other gentleman here, will be glad to find himself convinced, that as I have, in some measure, deserved the good opinion of my countrymen on former occasions, so nothing will appear in this, which can draw upon me the blame of this House.

"The first Article in the Report is founded upon the deposition of sir Solomon de Medina, by which you are informed of a yearly sum paid by him and his predecessor, contractors for Bread and Bread-waggons, to myself. This payment, in my letter, I have called a perquisite of the general or commander in chief in the Low Countries; and it has been constantly applied to one of the most important parts of the service there, I mean the procuring intelligence, and other secret service.

"The commissioners are pleased to observe, that these sums cannot be esteemed legal perquisites, because they do not find them claimed or received by any other English general in the Low Countries. But I must take leave to affirm to this house, that this perquisite or payment has been allowed to the general or commander in chief, in the Low Countries, both before and ever since the Revolution, to enable him to carry on such secret services. The like allowance was made to prince Waldeck, whilst he was general of the Dutch army in Flanders; it was made during the last war as well as this; and for your further satisfaction in this matter, I am content to refer myself to sir Solomon de Medina, who cannot but own, that when he made this allowance, he knew it to be the constant practice during the former wars in the Low Countries, and particularly when prince Waldeck commanded there. And if it be a circumstance worth your notice, he must inform you also, that the allowance of waggons, which the Report takes notice of, is usual likewise; that he has allowed the hike, or near the like number, to count Tilly, though he was not velt-marschal, and that there is a proportionable allowance of the same kind to other officers. The Report may have observed very rightly, that, by the strictest inquiry the commissioners could make, they cannot find that any English general ever received this perquisite. But I presume to say, the reason is, that there was never any other English general besides myself, who was commander in chief in the Low Countries. I crave leave then to say, that this observation in the Report, was occasioned through the want of due information in the usage of the army. In receiving this as an established and known perquisite, I have followed and kept up that usage which I found in the army, when I first entered upon that service; and upon this ground alone, I hope that this House will not think that I was unwarranted in taking it.

"But that no doubt may remain with you, I will state, as well as I can, what I have learnt, and during that time I have been in the service, has been always understood to be the ground, as well as the design of this allowance. The contracts of bread being of necessity at the same rates for the whole army, and it being for the security of the service, those contracts should be in the fewest hands, the certain gain upon so large a sum as a contract for the whole, or great part of the army, even at the lowest prices, makes this yearly allowance to have been thought not unreasonable from the contractor. This being an allowance generally arising from the contracts that concern a variety of troops, under the same general, must naturally fall under the direction, and come into the hands of the commander in chief, as an allowance to enable him to carry on such designs as could not be foreseen, but yet necessary to be put in execution, and which chiefly depend upon intelligence.

"I thought it more needful to give you this account of the nature and design of this allowance, because I observe from the Report, that the objection is to the justice and reasonableness of the perquisite itself, without having regard to the application or use for which it is intended.

"But the commissioners apprehend this not to be a justifiable perquisite, because they say, be public, or the troops, necessarily suffer in proportion to every such perquisite.—If these observations were well grounded, I should think them good reasons to put an end to the allowance, and at the same time to blame those who first introduced it: but I take upon me to affirm, that this neither is, nor can be the case. I have never heard a complaint, either of public or particular injury from this allowance; nor does the Report assign any particular wherein it may be judged to be so.

"This allowance to the general, can have no influence upon the contract itself, which is actually made and signed at the Treasury, and the price regulated by what the States have agreed to pay for the bread for their forces. I appeal to all the officers who have served with me in Flanders, whether the forces in her majesty's pay have not all along had as much, and as good bread as those of the States, and at the same prices; which every body will believe to be the lowest, that considers the frugal economy of the States, and the small pay of their troops? And therefore, I may safely conclude, that if the English have had their bread as cheap as the Dutch, they have had it as cheap as was possible. Nor indeed can it be imagined to be otherwise; for the very supposition of two different prices, paid by different troops in the same army, for the same quantity of bread, would occasion a mutiny.—But this whole affair has been so regulated, and there has been so little occasion for complaint, that it is well known our army in Flanders has been duly supplied with bread during the whole war, and has received it with an exactness that will be hardly thought consistent with the secrecy, and suddenness of some of the motions that have been made.

"The Report farther says, that the general is the sole check on the contractor; and he is to take care of the performance of the contract, and to judge of all deductions to be made from, and allowances to the contractor. And from these suggestions it infers, that, under these circumstances, it is a breach of trust in him to receive the perquisite.—This observation amounts to no more than suggesting a possibility of inconveniences from an ancient usage in the army. And if by calling the general the sole check upon the contractor, is meant, that he is the person who is to receive the complaints concerning the execution of the contract, (and so far only is true,) I affirm, that upon all complaints I have given full redress; either by ordering other bread, or the value in money, at the choice of the troops: For the truth of which, I appeal to the officers of the army. And as to the general being to judge of all deductions to be made from, and allowances to the contractor, I am entirely a stranger to any such deductions and allowances, of which the general is supposed to be the judge.

"One circumstance remains upon this article, which I barely touch upon, to remove a prejudice raised by the Report, from the caution and secrecy with which it is said the money has been received. This is supported only by an allegation, that my secretary Mr. Cardunnell, had declared upon oath, that he never heard or knew of any such perquisite, until lately; which it is supposed he ought to have done as auditor of the bread account. But I take leave to say, 1st, That he never was auditor of the bread account, nor has any thing to do with it. 2dly, Though it is said in the Report, that he declared upon oath, yet I cannot obtain or hear of any such deposition; nor is it possible he could declare so. In this part of the Report, there must have happened some mistake. For I presume Mr. Cardunnell, who is a member of this House, cannot but declare that he knows of this perquisite; though he might be ignorant of the same, till notice came to the camp of what sir Solomon de Medina had sworn.

"As to the 1 per cent. said to be allowed to Mr. Sweet for prompt payment, I do aver that I knew nothing of it. And though sir Solomon de Medina has often complained to me of Mr. Sweet's payments not being regular, I do not remember he ever mentioned the 1 per cent.:

"Now, as to the second Article in the Report, allow me to observe to you, that it has arisen only from the information I myself gave the commissioners by my letter to them: This matter having relation to that part of the service to which the sums in the former article have been applied; that the Commissioners might have a true state of it, I chose to insert a short Account of it in my letter to them. If I did this voluntarily, out of duty to the public, I hope I shall be thought to have given you information upon a certain belief, and I was altogether blameless in the part I have had in it.—It will be necessary that I trouble the House with an Account of the time and occasion whence this payment of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. by the foreign troops, commenced.—During the last war, the allowances by parliament for the contingencies, of the army, of which that of secret service is the principal, was, 50,000*l.* per ann. But this allowance fell so far short of the expence on that head, that upon the prospect of this war's breaking out, the late king assured him, that this last part of the service never cost him less than 70,000*l.* per ann. However, the allowance of parliament for the whole contingent service, during this war, has been but 10,000*l.* per annum, 3,000*l.* of which, or thereabouts, has generally gone for other contingencies, than that of intelligence. The late king, being unwilling to come to parliament for more money, on that head of the service, proposed this allowance from the foreign troops, as an expedient to assist that part of the service, and commanded me to make the proposition to them; which I did accordingly, and it was readily consented to. By this means a new fund of a bout 15,000*l.* per annum was provided for carrying on the secret service, without any expence to the public, or grievance to the troops from whom the allowance was made; for, when the public pays, those troops are not at all affected, or one farthing increased, in consideration of this deduction; nor is there in any conventions for them any weight laid upon it; the hire of foreign troops being governed by settled rules and treaties, and the conventions of the States for them, being in the same terms.

"This expedient being formed in the manner I have shewn, her majesty was pleased to approve it by her warrant, which being understood as a confirmation or an agreement with the foreign troops, not negotiated by, and, by consequence, not within the care or business of the treasury, was counter-signed by the secretary of state whose province it belonged to, as the only proper officer.

"The true design of this deduction being to supply the secret service, gentlemen, I hope you will observe, that this, together with the sum on the former article of the allowance by parliament, when put together, doth fall short of the allowance given by parliament in the last war upon this head.

"I cannot suppose that I need to say how essential a part of the service this is, that no war can be conducted successfully, without early and good intelligence, and that such advices cannot be had but at a very great expence. Nobody can be ignorant of this, that knows any thing of secret correspondence, or considers the numbers of persons that must be employed in it, the great hazard they undergo, the variety of places in which the correspondence must be kept, and the constant necessity there is of supporting and feeding this service; not to mention some extraordinary expences of a higher nature, which ought only to be hinted at. And I affirm, that whatever sums have been received on this account, have been constantly employed in procuring intelligence, in keeping correspondence, and other secret service. If any gentleman should doubt this, and imagine that this expence could have been supported by the 10,000*l.* per annum, I desire them to consider, that the present war in Flanders, from the beginning of it, has been an offensive war; the campaigns early and long, the variety of actions have been very great, wherein so many battles have been fought, lines forced, and so many strong towns taken, with trenches opened; but yet, during the last war, which was of another kind, if regard be had only to what was allowed by the public, it is certain, that the charge on this head, in three campaigns of that war, came to at least as much as all the ten campaigns of this. And though the merit of our successes should be least of all attributed to the general, the many successful actions, such as have surpassed our own hopes, or the apprehensions of the enemy, in this present war in Flanders, to which our constant good intelligence has greatly contributed, must convince every gentleman, that such advices have been obtained, and consequently that this money has been rightly applied.

"Having given this full and faithful account of the rise and use of this deduction, it must, I flatter myself, appear to every body that hear me, to have been a real service, as well as saving of money to the public. And though honour is due to the memory of the late king, who formed this expedient, and to her majesty, who approved ~~of~~ it, by her warrant, I cannot, upon this ground, apprehend any imputation to myself, who have pursued this, so much to the advantage of my country.

"Before I take notice of the remarks made by the Commissioners upon this part of the letter, I make one general observation upon the nature of this deduction, which those gentlemen, throughout their Report, call public money, and to be accounted for in the same manner that other public money is usually accounted for. But the notion, I apprehend, is wholly misapplied, as will appear by shortly stating the fact itself. By the treaties with the foreign princes for the hire of their troops, the whole subsidies stipulated for, are due, and the receipt is by them given for the whole money, which is a sufficient voucher to discharge the pay-master in the Exchequer, and thereby the account, as to the public. This deduction so made, does not properly issue out of the Exchequer, but of the money of the foreign troops, for their proportion of the contingencies: and therefore I still apprehend, I speak properly when in my letter I affirm, that this two and a half per cent. does not belong to the public accounts. But as this deduction arises from the agreement set on foot by his late majesty, and confirmed by her majesty, as it comes in here as a proportion of the expence, which ought to fall upon the foreign troops, and being applied to a part of the public service, gentlemen may, if they think fit, in this sense, call it public money, to be accounted for, in such a manner as the nature of the sense admits, and as the public allowance to the same service is accounted for.

"Having thus explained this matter to you, I beg the patience of the House to go on, and consider the particular remarks that have been made upon it.

"First, It has been objected that her majesty's warrant has been kept dormant for nine years, and the deduction concealed from the knowledge of the parliament; but surely the warrant cannot be said to have been kept dormant, that has been lodged in the hands of the pay-master general's deputy in Holland, which was delivered to me out of the office of the secretary of state, signed by her majesty, and counter-signed by him as all warrants are, and which could not possibly be concealed from the commanders of so many foreign troops, nor indeed from the troops themselves, which consist of so many thousand men, without whose knowledge the deduction could not have been made; and who, if it had been the least uneasy to them, would no doubt have complained. In what sense can this be called a dormant warrant, which, from the time it was signed, had been in the hands of the proper officer, and constantly and publicly put in execution? The Report adds, that the deduction was never concealed from the parliament: for which it is said, I have not assigned sufficient reasons; but as there has been no concealment, there could be no need of assigning reasons for it; much less was it necessary to lay accounts of the money before the parliament, it being no part of the estimate for the service, nor of any influence on the money to be given by parliament: For the subsidies to the foreign troops were governed by previous treaties, and therefore must have continued the same though this deduction had never been made: Besides, that the Exchequer is discharged of this money, on the receipt from the foreign troops for the complete subsidy. I have said in my letter, that his being a free gift of the foreign troops does not properly relate to the public accounts; upon which the Commissioners observe, that his is inconsistent not only with the words of the warrant which supposes an agreement, but with that part of my letter which takes notice of this stoppage, to be stipulated for by me as ambassador; and from thence the Report concludes, that this money is to be accounted for, as other public money is: But this observation will not be grounded upon the mistaken notion of public money, which, as has been already observed, being meant of money granted by parliament, and standing in charge in the Exchequer, can never be applied to this payment; which is a contribution by the foreign troops, out of their own money, and not out of the money of Great Britain. I might say that though this deduction has been submitted to by the foreign troops during this war, yet it is so far voluntary at this day, that it depends barely upon a parole stipulation, and when umbrage shall be given, may, at any time, be receded from by them. This Report further objects, that the 10,000*l.* given for Contingencies, is not confined to the British troops, but was intended for the 40,000 men, without distinction. Now the contrary to this is evident; for, in the estimate laid yearly before this House, it is plain that this is given for the British troops only, and not for the rest of the 40,000 men; and in the estimate for the foreign troops, the article of Contingencies is omitted, for no other reason, but because by this warrant it was otherwise provided for; and therefore the words of the warrant are for defraying contingent expenses relating to them, which is plainly said in opposition to the contingent money allowed for her majesty's own troops; and the like contingent money has not only been allowed upon all other parts of the service, but it will appear, by examining what has been so allowed, that the sums have exceeded in proportion what has been ever allowed for the army in Flanders: But the Report adds, that the 10,000*l.* has not been always thought exempt from account, as appears from a privy seal bearing date in March, 1706, wherein there is a clause releasing me from a sum, part of the 10,000*l.* which the Report said, supposes it had otherwise been to be accounted for. When I say in my letter, that the 10,000*l.* given by parliament, is without account: I dare say, I cannot easily be misunderstood: The nature of the thing not admitting of a particular account, and the constant practice never requiring any. In all the accounts during the war, of that money, my receipt has been a sufficient discharge; but that not being a regular voucher for the paymaster, it has been thought necessary from time to time to grant a privy seal, to enable the paymaster to pass that part of his account; and though there be that clause inserted in the privy seal, mentioned in the report, of which, I affirm, I was unacquainted, I yet presume to say, that it was not only needless, but also contrary to all practice, both before and since; for the truth of which, I appeal to the paymaster-general, who will do me justice in it, if any gentleman can doubt it.

“As to the legality of the Warrant, which is the next objection, the Commissioners having barely touched on this, as not duly countersigned, I think it sufficient to say, that this Warrant, being principally intended for confirming an agreement with the foreign princes, was properly countersigned by the Secretary of State for that province, rather than by the lord treasurer, who could have nothing to do with it; however, I must believe, that an error of this kind, if any body should think it so, which depends upon a nicety, cannot be thought to affect the general, whose part has only been to apply the money as the warrant directs.

“But it is further remarked, that neither the stoppage nor payment of this money have been regularly made. First, not the stoppage, because the warrant directs it should be stopped in the hands of the pay-master, or his deputy. But this method does not appear, by the paymaster's account, to have been pursued; but on the contrary, it is said, that the payments to the foreign troops are always complete, and the receipt taken in full, without any notice of the deduction. But yet I presume to say, the stoppage has been regularly made, in pursuance to the warrant: The deputy pay-master is expressly authorised by the warrant, to make that stoppage; and it is of necessity he should make it, who resides abroad, where the matter must be transacted, and the stoppage applied. And it may not be amiss to observe, that the cases where deductions are intended to be accounted for, as public money, the warrant, which authorises such deductions, directs the same to be accounted for, and the manner in which it is to be done: But where deductions are made by virtue of warrants that contain no such directions in them, as in the present instance, it hath been presumed, that there was no intention such deductions should be accounted for to the public.

“Next, as to the payment, this is said to be

according to the warrant, because neither Mr. Brydges, nor Mr. Cardonnel, ever saw any warrant from me, directing the payment of it. I am not surpris'd; if the gentlemen, in this circumstance especially, might not be appriz'd of the method of issuing money for secret service, which could be only in my own knowledge. But for their information, and the satisfaction of the House, I take the liberty to acquaint you, that the method of issuing this, and the public allowance of 10,000*l.* for secret service, hath been exactly the same, and in this manner.

“ I send my letters to the deputy pay-master, requiring the payment of the sum I have occasion for, to myself; and for such sums as are received from time to time, giving my receipt. This is the order of the general, which is meant by her majesty's warrant; and which alone is practicable in this as well as in the instance of the 10,000*l.* contingent money. Nor is there any gentleman that considers the nature of secret service, but must see it is not possible, by the general's warrant, to direct the payment to the person, for whose use it is reserved.

“ But the Commissioners are of opinion, that the deputy pay-master ought to have transmitted constant accounts of this deduction, to the pay-master general. If I could expect the House could expect from me an account of a circumstance, for which the deputy pay-master alone is answerable, I should take the liberty to say, that in my opinion, if he has not transmitted such accounts, it must be, because he is neither required nor authorised, by her majesty's warrant, to do so. He is only obliged to make the stoppage, and issue the money upon my orders, which he has done. Nor can I conceive it to be of any use to the public, or the pay-master general, to have received such accounts; he not being chargeable with any such stoppage; nor are the receipts for it any part of his vouchers.

“ The last objection is, that the deduction being made for defraying Contingent Expences to the foreign troops; if the whole has been employed in secret correspondence, such a disposition, not being authorised by the warrant, is a mis-application of public money. But though it is said in the warrant, to be for defraying Contingent Expences relating to the troops, the reason it is so expressed, I take to be nothing else, but that in the establishment for the forces serving abroad, the word ‘Contingencies’ hath always comprehended secret service, that having always been what was principally meant by that article. And this is so evident, that if secret service be not included under the word ‘Contingencies,’ that important part of the service would have no allowance from the public for it, which I presume will not be thought expedient. And therefore, though the deduction be declared to be for contingencies, no stress can in justice be laid upon that word, to prove it was not designed for secret service. And indeed, this is confessed unambiguously after, in the Report itself; which says, that the article for Secret Service was always included in the 10,000*l.* given for Contingencies. But if Secret Service be meant by, or included under Contingencies, in the establishments for the British troops, how can it be supposed, that the word ‘Contingencies’ in the warrant for the foreign troops, is not to be understood in the same manner?

“ No body can doubt, but contingencies, or contingent expences mean the same in both; and therefore secret service must be included in both, or neither: But I cannot better explain this whole matter, than by supposing, that secret service being an affair that affects the whole army, the charge of it is to be laid in proportion upon the whole. But the share of the British troops is borne by the public, while the share of the foreigners is raised upon the troops themselves by the deduction, which is therefore said to be for defraying such contingent expences as relate to them; that is, for their share of the expence of secret service, which being principally, and in the first place meant by contingencies, there is no opposition between the ends directed by the warrant, and those that the money has been applied to, and consequently there has been no misapplication of it: I have nothing to add upon this Article, but to take notice of a great mistake, even in the second computation which is made in the report relating to this deduction, for it is said, that the whole stoppages from the troops in Flanders have amounted to the sum of 177,959*l.* 17*s.* 0*d.*, when, in truth, computing them from May, 1703, the time they were first made, they do not exceed 151,748*l.* taking the exchange at a medium between eleven guilders, and ten guilders, ten stivers: So that this deduction, for the ten years, comes to no more than 15,174*l.* 16*s.* a year.

“ Upon the whole matter, I cannot but hope this House will find reason to be satisfied with this part of my conduct; and I think it no ill service, that so necessary and important a part of the war, and which has turned to so good an account, has been managed with so little expence to the public: and I may, with the greatest certainty, assure them, that all other parts of the service have been carried on with all the good husbandry that was possible. And, I believe, I may venture to affirm, that I have, in the article for Secret Services, saved the government near four times the sum this deduction amounts to. Which I must reckon so much money saved to the public.”

The Barrier-Treaty laid before the Commons. Jan. 29. Mr. Secretary St. John presented to the House a copy of the Treaty between her majesty and the States-General, for securing the Succession to the crown of Great Britain, and for settling the Barrier for the States-General against France, concluded at the Hague, the 29th of October 1709, &c.

Bill to repeal the Naturalisation-Act, agreed to. Feb. 1. The Lords sent back to the Commons the Bill for repealing the ‘Act for nat-

naturalizing foreign Protestants, with some amendments to which the Commons agreed.*

* "On the 9th of February was repealed the act for naturalizing foreign Protestants, which had been under the last ministry, and, as many people thought, to very ill purposes. By this act any foreigner, who would take the oaths to the government, and profess himself a Protestant, of whatever denomination, was immediately naturalized, and had all the privileges of an English-born subject, at the expence of a shilling. Most Protestants abroad differ from us in the points of church-government; so that all the acquisitions by this act would increase the number of dissenters; and therefore the proposal, that such foreigners should be obliged to conform to the established worship was rejected. But because several persons were fond of this project, as a thing that would be of mighty advantage to the kingdom, I shall say a few words upon it. The maxim, 'That people are the riches of a nation,' hath been rudely understood by many writers and reasoners upon that subject. There are several ways by which people are brought into a country. Sometimes a nation is invaded and subdued; and the conquerors seize the lands, and make the natives their under-tenants or servants. Colonies have been always planted where the natives were driven out or destroyed, or the land uncultivated and waste. In those countries where the lord of the soil is master of the labour and liberty of his tenants, or of slaves bought by his money, men's riches are reckoned by the number of their vassals. And sometimes, in governments newly instituted, where there are not people to till the ground, many laws have been made to encourage and allure numbers from the neighbouring countries. And, in all these cases, the few comers have either lands allotted them, or are slaves to the proprietors. But to invite helpless families, by thousands, into a kingdom inhabited like ours without lands to give them; and where the laws will not allow that they should be part of the property as servants, is a wrong application of the maxim, and the same thing, in great, as when a man's goods are dropped at the doors, which are only a burden and charge to the parish. The true way of multiplying mankind to public advantage, in such a country as England, is to invite from abroad only able handicraftsmen and artificers, or such who bring over a sufficient share of property to secure them from want; to enact and enforce sumptuary laws against luxury and all excesses in cloathing, furniture, and the like; to encourage matrimony, and reward, as the Romans did, those who have a certain number of children. Whether bringing over the Palatines were a mere consequence of this law for a general naturalization; or whether, as many surmised, it had some other meaning, appeared manifestly, by the issue, that the public was a loser by every individual among them; and that a kingdom can no more be the richer by such an importation, than a man

Resolution of the Commons about the State of the War.] Feb. 4. The Commons, in a Committee of the whole House, took into consideration the State of the War, and having examined the Treaties presented to them, after a long debate, came to the following Resolutions:

"1. That the States General have been deficient in their quotas for sea-service, in proportion to the number of ships provided by her majesty, some years two thirds, and generally more than half their quota. 2. That towards the carrying on the War in Spain, in order to reduce that monarchy to the House of Austria, neither the late emperor, nor his present imperial majesty, have ever had any forces on their own account there, till the last year, and then only a regiment of foot, consisting of 2,000 men. 3. That the forces supplied and paid by her majesty for the carrying on the War in Spain, from 1705 to 1711, inclusive, amounted to 57,973 men, besides 13 battalions and 18 squadrons, for which her majesty has paid a subsidy to the emperor. 4. That the forces supplied by the States General for the service of Spain, from 1705 to 1708, both inclusive, have amounted to no more than 12,200 men, and that from the year 1708 to this present time they have sent thither no forces at all. 5. That her majesty has not only furnished her proportion of 12,000 men, according to the Treaty entered into for the service of the war in Portugal, but has taken upon her the emperor's proportion, by furnishing two thirds, when the States General only furnished one third for that service. 6. That by the Treaty with the king of Portugal, there was to be furnished 12,000 foot, and 3,000 horse, at his own expence; and, in consideration of a subsidy to be paid him, 11,000 foot and 2,000 horse more; notwithstanding which, it appears, that the king of Portugal did not furnish 13,000 men in the whole. 7. That since the year 1706, when the English and Dutch marched into Castile, and returned no more into Portugal, her majesty has replaced more than her share, according to her proportion, and the States General have not had any troops in Portugal. 8. That the first proportion of three fifths to two fifths, agreed upon between his late majesty king William and the States General, for the service of the war in Flanders, has not been observed by the States General. 9. That the States General, during the course of the war, have furnished less than their proportion in Flanders, 20,837 men. 10. That the condition for prohibiting all Trade and Correspondence between Holland and France, on which the troops of augmentation were granted in 1703, and afterwards continued, has not been observed by the States General. 11. That, at the beginning of this war, the Subsidies were paid in equal proportions by her majesty and the States General, but her majesty has since paid more than her proportion, 3,155,000 crowns."

These Resolutions were next day reported by Mr. Conyers, and agreed to by the House.

Bill to limit the Number of Officers in the House of Commons.] Feb. 8. The Commons ordered a Bill to be brought in "for securing the Freedom of Parliaments, by limiting the number of Officers sitting in the House of Commons;" and Mr. Shackerly, Mr. Heysham, and Mr. Onslow, were named to prepare and bring in the same.

Feb. 9. Mr. Wortley presented the said Bill, which was read the first time, ordered a second reading, passed, and shortly after sent up to the Lords.*

Address for the Instructions, &c. about the Barrier Treaty.] Feb. 11. The Commons resolved to address the queen that all Instructions and Orders given to the plenipotentiaries, that transacted the Barrier-Treaty, and also all Treaties mentioned and referred to in the said Treaty, might be laid before the House, except such Treaties as were already before the House: Which Address, being presented by Mr. Secretary St. John, was readily complied with.

The Commons vote to stand by the Queen; and to consider of the Licentiousness of the Press.] Feb. 12. The Commons came to an unanimous Resolution, "That this House will effectually stand by, and support her majesty in all things recommended to them in her majesty's most gracious Speech from the throne; as also, that they would upon that day se'night, in a committee of the whole House, consider of that part of her majesty's Message to the House the 17th of January last relating to the great licence taken in publishing false and scandalous Libels:" But the consideration of this matter was afterwards put off from time to time.

* "The Commons sent up a Bill for securing the freedom of parliaments, by limiting the number of members in that House who should be allowed to possess employments under the crown. Bills to the same effect, promoted by both parties, had, after making the like progress, been rejected in former parliaments; the court and ministry, who will ever be against such a law, having usually a greater influence in the House of Lords, and so it happened now. Although that influence were less, I am apt to think that such a law would be too thorough a reformation in one point, while we have so many corruptions in the rest; and perhaps the regulations, already made on that article, are sufficient, by which several employments incapacitate a man from being chosen a member, and all of them bring it to a new election. For my own part, when I consider the temper of particular persons, and by what maxims they have acted (almost without exception) in their private capacities, I cannot conceive how such a bill should obtain a majority, unless every man expected to be one of the fifty, which, I think, was the limitation intended." Swift's Four Last Years.

Resolutions against the Barrier-Treaty—The Lord Viscount Townshend voted an Enemy to his Country.] The Commons being by this time furnished with all the papers relating to the Barrier-Treaty, took the same into consideration in a full committee of the whole House, and came to the following Resolutions: *

* "The House seemed to have nothing more at heart than a strict inquiry into the state of the nation, with respect to foreign alliances. Some discourses had been published in print, about the beginning of the session, boldly complaining of certain articles in the Barrier-Treaty, concluded about three years since by the lord viscount Townsend, between Great-Britain and the States General; and shewing in many particulars, the unequal conduct of these powers in our alliance, in furnishing their quotas and supplies. It was asserted by the same writers, 'That these hardships put upon England, had been countenanced and encouraged by a party here at home in order to preserve their power, which could be no otherwise maintained than by continuing the war, as well as by her majesty's General abroad, upon account of his own peculiar interest and grandeur.' These loud accusations spreading themselves throughout the kingdom, delivered in facts directly charged, and thought, whether true or not, to be but weakly confuted, had sufficiently prepared the minds of the people; and, by putting arguments into every body's mouth, had filled the town and country with controversies, both in writing and discourse. The point appeared to be of great consequence, whether the war continued or not: for in the former case, it was necessary that the allies should be brought to a more equal regulation; and, that the States in particular, for whom her majesty had done such great things, should explain and correct those articles in the Barrier-Treaty which were prejudicial to Britain; and, in either case, it was fit the people should have at least the satisfaction of knowing by whose counsels, and for what designs, they had been so hardly treated.—In order to this great inquiry, the Barrier-Treaty, with all other treaties and agreements entered into between her majesty and her allies, during the present war, for the raising and augmenting the proportions for the service thereof, were, by the queen's directions, laid before the House.—Several Resolutions were drawn up and reported at different times, upon the deficiencies of the allies in furnishing their quotas, upon certain Articles in the Barrier-Treaty, and upon the state of the war; by all which it appeared, that whatever had been charged by public discourses in print against the late ministry and the conduct of the allies, was much less than the truth. Upon these Resolutions (by one of which the lord viscount Townsend who negotiated and signed the Barrier-Treaty, was de-

"1. That in the Treaty between her majesty and the States-General, for securing the Succession to the crown of Great-Britain, and for settling a Barrier for the States General against France, under colour of securing the Protestant succession, and providing a sufficient Barrier to the States General against France, there are several Articles destructive to the trade and interest of Great-Britain, and therefore highly dishonourable to her majesty. 2. That it appears that the lord viscount Townsend had not any orders or authority for negotiating or concluding several Articles in the said Treaty. 3. That the lord viscount Townsend, who negotiated and signed, and all those who advised the raising of the said Treaty, are enemies to the queen and kingdom:" which Resolutions were the 16th agreed to by the House.

Feb. 18. A Committee of the whole House took into consideration the State of the War, and resolved, "1. That it hath appeared to this committee, that the charge for Transport-Service, in carrying on the war in Spain and Portugal, from the year 1711, inclusive, amounted to 3,396,719*l.* 19*s.* 11*d.*—2. That there has been paid by her majesty, for contingencies, Bread, and Bread-Waggons, Forage, and all other extraordinary, both for the English and Foreign troops in Savoy, Piedmont, Italy, Spain, Portugal and Flanders, since the 24th of June 1705, so far as the same hath been returned from abroad, several sums, amounting, in the whole, to 487,000*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.*—3. That the charge of victualling the Land-forces for the service of the war has amounted to 583,770*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*—4. That the charge of her majesty's ships and vessels, employed in the service of the war in Spain and Portugal, reckoned after the rate of 1*l.* a man per month, from the time they sailed from hence till they returned, were lost, or put upon other services, amounted to 6,540,966*l.* 4*s.*—5. That an humble Representation be made to her majesty, upon the Resolutions of this House, relating to the State of the War, and the Treaty between her majesty and the States-General, for securing the Succession to the crown of Great Britain, and for settling a Barrier for the States-General against France; and also humbly to desire her majesty, that she will be pleased to order her ministers to insist with the Emperor, that the Revenues of all the territories and places restored or added to the House of Austria, during this war, (over and above what is necessary for their defence) may be applied for the carrying on the war in Spain; and to assure her majesty, that this House will enable her majesty to bear her share of any farther expence, that shall be lared an enemy to the queen and kingdom,) and upon some farther directions to the committee, a Representation was formed; and soon after the Commons in a body presented to the queen, the endeavours of the adverse party not prevailing to have it recommended." Swift's Four Last Years.

wanted by sea and land, in proportion to what the emperor, and the other allies shall actually furnish for those services; and that as to other parts of the war, to which her majesty is obliged by particular treaties to contribute, that her majesty will, for the future, only furnish troops and pay subsidies, in proportion to what her allies shall actually furnish and pay."

These Resolutions were reported on the 18th and agreed to by the House; and a committee was appointed to draw up the said Representation according to the said Resolutions, and upon the Debate of the House, another Committee was appointed to consider of the Abuses committed in Musters and Cloathing of the Army; and also the Abuses relating to the Hospitals abroad.

19. Mr. Campion, from the Commissioners of the Public Accounts, acquainted the House, that they had taken several Depositions and other Papers relating to the matters in their Report, which he presented to the House. Then the order of the next day was read, for taking into farther consideration the said Report: and the said Depositions and Papers were also read: and those parts of the said Report which related to Mr. Cardonnel,* and sir David Dalrymple therein named, were read; and Mr. Cardonnel was heard in his place; and then he withdrew. After a long debate it was resolved by a majority of 125 voices against 99. "1. That the taking a Gratuity of 500 gold ducats, annually, from the Contractors for Bread and Bread-waggons for the army in the Low Countries, by Adam Cardonnel, esq. (Secretary to the General there) a member of this House, was unwarrantable and corrupt. 2. That the said Adam Cardonnel, esq. be, for the said offence, expelled this House."

Sir David Dalrymple was heard in his place, and then that part of the said Report was read, which related to Mr. Sweet, deputy paymaster at Amsterdam, after which it was resolved, "That the one per cent. received by Mr. Sweet, deputy-pay-master at Amsterdam, upon the payments made by him to the Contractors for furnishing Bread and Bread Waggons, in the Low Countries, is public money, and ought to be accounted for," and ordered, That the said Report of the Commissioners of Accounts, together with the Examinations and Depositions relating thereto, with the Resolutions of this House thereupon, and her majesty's gracious Answer to the Resolutions laid before her, be printed.

* "Mr. Cardonnel, a member of parliament, and Secretary to the General in Flanders, was expelled the House, for the offence of receiving yearly bribes from those who had contracted to furnish bread for the army; and met with no further punishment for a practice, voted to be unwarrantable and corrupt." Swift's Four Last Years.

46. Mr. Secretary St. John acquainted the House, That he had received her majesty's command, to communicate to that House a Proposition made to her majesty by prince Eugene of Savoy, in the name of the emperor, for the support of the War in Spain; viz.

"His imperial majesty judges, that 40,000 men will be sufficient for this service, and that the whole expence of the war in Spain may amount to 4 millions of crowns, towards which his imperial majesty offers to make up the troops which he has in that country to 30,000 men, and to take one million of crowns upon himself."

Representation of the Commons to the Queen on the War in Spain, the Barrier-Treaty, and the State of the Nation.] March 1. Sir T. Hanmer* reported from the Committee, to whom it was referred to draw up a Representation to be made to her majesty, That they had drawn up the same accordingly, which they had directed him to report to the House: and he read the same in his place, and afterwards delivered it in at the table, where it was read. And a motion being made, and the question put, That the said Representation be recommitted; it passed in the negative: after which it was resolved, That the said Representation be presented to her majesty by the whole House; which was done accordingly on Tuesday the 4th; being as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign;

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great-Britain in parliament assembled, having nothing so much at heart, as to enable your majesty to bring this long and expensive war to an honourable and happy conclusion; have taken it into our most

* "Feb. 20. Sir Thomas Hanmer is chairman of the Committee for drawing up a Representation of the State of the Nation, to the queen; where all the wrong steps of the allies and late ministry about the war, will be mentioned. The Secretary, I suppose, was helping him about it to-day, I believe it will be a pepperer.—Feb. 21. I was engaged at seven to go to sir Thomas Hanmer, who desired I would see him at that hour. His business was, that I would help him to draw up the Representation, which I consented to do; but I do not know whether I shall succeed, because it is a little out of my way.—Feb. 22. I was with Hanmer this morning, and there was the Secretary and Chancellor of the Exchequer very busy with him, laying their heads together about the 'Representation.'—March 5. The 'Representation' is printed. I have not seen it yet; it is plaguy severe they say." Swift's Journal.

"This Representation (supposed to be the work of sir Thomas Hanmer's pen) is written with much energy and spirit, and will be a very useful and authentic record, for the assistance of those who, at any time, shall undertake to write the history of the present times." Swift's Four Last Years.

serious consideration, how the necessary Supplies to be provided by us, may be best applied, and how the common-cause may in the most effectual manner be carried on by the united force of the whole Confederacy; We have thought ourselves obliged, in duty to your majesty, and in discharge of the trust reposed in us, to enquire into the true state of the war in all in its parts; we have examined what stipulations have been entered into between your majesty and your allies, and how far such engagements have on each side been made good; we have considered the different interests which the confederates have in the success of this war, and the different shares they have contributed to its support; we have, with our utmost care and diligence, endeavoured to discover the nature, extent and charge of it, to the end, that, by comparing the weight thereof with our strength, we might adapt the one to the other in such measure, as neither to continue your majesty's subjects under a heavier burden than in reason and justice they ought to bear, nor deceive your majesty, your allies, and ourselves, by undertaking more than the nation, in its present circumstances, is able to perform.

"Your majesty has been graciously pleased, upon our humble applications, to order such materials to be laid before us, as have furnished us with the necessary information upon the particulars we have enquired into; and when, we shall have laid before your majesty our observations and humble advice upon this subject, we promise to ourselves this happy fruit from it. That, if your majesty's generous and good purposes for the procuring a safe and lasting peace should, through the obstinacy of the enemy, or by any other means, be unhappily defeated, a true knowledge and understanding of the past conduct of the war, will be the best foundation for a more frugal and equal management of it for the time to come.

"In order to take the more perfect view of what we proposed, and that we might be able to set the whole before your majesty in a true light, we have thought it necessary to go back to the beginning of the war, and beg leave to observe the motives and reasons upon which his late majesty king William engaged first in it. The Treaty of the Grand Alliance explains those reasons to be, for the supporting the pretensions of his imperial majesty, then actually engaged in a war with the French king, who had usurped the entire Spanish-Monarchy for his grandson the duke of Anjou; and for the assisting the States-General, who, by the loss of their Barrier against France, were then in the same or a more dangerous condition, than if they were actually invaded. As these were the just and necessary motives for undertaking this war, so the ends proposed to be obtained by it were equally wise and honourable: for, as they are set forth in the eighth article of the same Treaty, they appear to have been, the procuring an equitable and reasonable satisfaction to his imperial majesty, and sufficient curities for the dominions, provinces, navigation and commerce of the king of Great-Britain and the States-General; the making effectual provision, that the two kingdoms of France and Spain should never be united under the same government, and particularly, that the French should never get into the possession of the Spanish West-Indies, or be permitted to sail thither upon the account of traffic, under any pretence whatsoever; and lastly, by securing to the subjects of the king of Great-Britain and the States-General, all the same privileges and rights of commerce throughout the whole dominions of Spain, as they enjoyed before the death of Charles 2, king of Spain, by virtue of any Treaty, agreement, custom, or any other way whatsoever. For the obtaining these ends, the three confederated powers engaged to assist one another with their whole force, according to such proportions as should be specified in a particular Convention afterwards to be made for that purpose. We do not find that any such Convention was ever ratified; but it appears, that there was an Agreement concluded, which, by common consent, was understood to be binding upon each party respectively, and according to which the proportions of Great Britain were from the beginning regulated and founded: The terms of that Agreement were, that for the service at sea, his imperial majesty should furnish 90,000 men, the king of Great-Britain 40,000, and the States-General 102,000, of which there were 42,000 intended to supply their garrisons, and 60,000 to act against the common-enemy in the field: and with regard to the operations of the war at sea, they were agreed to be performed jointly by Great Britain and the States-General; the quota of ships to be furnished for that service, being five eighths on the part of Great-Britain, and three eighths on the part of the States-General.

“ Upon this foot the war began in 1702, at which time the whole yearly expence of it to England, amounted to 3,706,494l.; a very great charge, as it was then thought by your majesty's subjects, after the short interval of ease they had enjoyed from the burden of the former war; but yet a very moderate proportion, in comparison with the load which hath since been laid upon them; for it appears, by estimates given in to your Commons, that the sums necessary to carry on the service for his present year, amount to more than 3,960,000l. besides interest for the public debt and the deficiencies accruing the last year; which two articles require 1,143,000l. more: so that the whole demands upon your Commons, are arisen to more than 8 millions for the present annual supply. We know your majesty's tender regard for the welfare of your people, will make it uneasy to you, to hear of so great a pressure as this upon them; and as we are assured it will fully convince your majesty of the necessity of our present enquiry, so we beg leave to represent to you from what causes, and by what steps this immense charge appears to have grown upon us.

“ The service at sea, as it hath been very large and extensive in itself, so it hath been carried on through the whole course of the war, in a manner highly disadvantageous to your majesty and your kingdom; for the necessity of affairs requiring, the great fleets should be fitted out every year, as well for the maintaining a superiority in the Mediterranean, as for opposing any force, which the enemy might prepare, either at Dunkirk or in the ports of West-France, your majesty's example and readiness in fitting out your proportion of ships for all parts of that service, have been so far from prevailing with the States-General to keep pace with you, that they have been deficient every year to a greater degree in proportion to what your majesty hath furnished, sometimes no less than two-thirds, and generally more than half of their quota. From hence your majesty has been obliged, for the preventing disappointments in the most pressing service, to supply those deficiencies by additional reinforcements of your own ships; nor hath the increase of such a charge been the only ill consequence that attended it, for by this means the Debt of the Navy hath increased, so that the discounts arising upon the credit of it, have affected all other parts of the service; from the same cause, your majesty's ships of war have been forced in greater numbers to continue in remote seas, and at unseasonable times of the year, to the great damage and decay of the British Navy. This also hath been the occasion, that your majesty hath been streightened in your convoys for trade; your coasts have been exposed for want of a sufficient number of cruisers to guard them, and you have been disabled from annoying the enemy in their most beneficial commerce with the West-Indies, from whence they received those supplies of treasure, without which they could not have supported the expences of this war.

“ That part of the war, which hath been carried on in Flanders, was at first immediately necessary to the security of the States-General, and hath since brought them great acquisitions both of revenue and dominion. Yet, even there, the original proportions have been departed from, and, during the course of the war, have been sinking, by degrees, on the part of Holland; so that, in this last year, we find the number in which they fell short of their three fifths, to your majesty's two fifths, have been 20,837 men: we are not unmindful, that, in the year 1703, a Treaty was made between the two nations, for a joint augmentation of 20,000 men, wherein the proportions were varied, and England consented to take half upon itself: but it having been annexed, as an express condition to the grant of the said augmentation in parliament, that the States-General should prohibit all trade and commerce with France; and that condition having not been performed by them, the Commons think it reasonable, that the first rule of three to two ought to have taken place again, as well in that as in other subsequent augmentations: more especially when they consider, that the revenues of those rich provinces which have been conquered, would, if they were duly applied, maintain a great number of additional forces against the common enemy, notwithstanding which, the States-General have raised none upon that account, but make use of those fresh supplies of money, only to ease themselves in the charge of their first established quota.

“As, in the progress of the war in Flanders, a disproportion was soon created, to the prejudice of England; so the very beginning of the war in Portugal brought an unequal share of burden upon us. For although the emperor and the States-General were equally partners with your majesty in the treaty with the king of Portugal, yet the emperor neither furnishing his third part of the troops and subsidies stipulated for, nor the Dutch consenting to take an equal share of his imperial majesty's defect upon themselves, your majesty hath been obliged to furnish two thirds of the entire expence created by that service: nor has the inequality stopped there, for ever since the year 1706, when the English and Dutch forces marched out of Portugal into Castile, the States-General have entirely abandoned the war in Portugal, and left your majesty to prosecute it singly at your own charge, which you have accordingly done, by replacing a greater number of troops there, than even at first you took upon you to provide. At the same time, your majesty's generous endeavours for the support and defence of the king of Portugal, have been but ill seconded by that prince himself; for notwithstanding that, by his treaty, he has obliged himself to furnish 12,000 foot, and 3,000 horse, upon his own account, besides 11,000 foot and 2,000 horse more, in consideration of a subsidy paid to him; yet, according to the best information your Commons can procure, it appears, that he hath scarce at any time furnished 15,000 men in the whole.

“In Spain the war hath been yet more unequal and burdensome to your majesty, than in any other branch of it; for being commenced without any treaty whatsoever, the allies have almost wholly declined taking any part of it upon themselves. A small body of English and Dutch troops were sent thither, in the year 1705, not as being thought sufficient to support a regular war, or to make the conquest of so large a country, but with a view only of assisting the Spaniards to set king Charles upon the throne, occasioned by the great assurances which were given of their inclinations to the house of Austria: but this expectation failing, England was insensibly drawn into an established war, under all the disadvantages of the distance of the place, and the feeble efforts of the other allies. The account we have to lay before your majesty, upon this head is, that although this undertaking was entered upon at the particular and earnest request of the Imperial court, and for a cause of no less importance and concern to them, than the reducing the Spanish monarchy to the house of Austria; yet neither the late emperor, nor his present imperial majesty, have ever had any forces there on their own account, till the last year, and then only one regiment of foot, consisting of 2,000 men: though the States-General have contributed something more to this service, yet their share also hath been inconsiderable: for in the space of four years, from 1705, to 1707, both inclusive, all the forces they have sent into that country, have not exceeded 12,200 men; and from the year 1708, to this time, they have not sent any forces or recruits whatsoever. To your majesty's care and charge, the recovery of that kingdom hath been in a manner wholly left, as if none else were interested or concerned in it: and the forces your majesty hath sent into Spain, in the space of 7 years, from 1705, to 1711, both inclusive, have amounted to no less than 57,973 men, besides 13 battalions and 18 squadrons, for which your majesty hath paid a subsidy to the emperor. How great the established expence of such a number of men hath been, your majesty very well knows, and your Commons very sensibly feel: but the weight will be found much greater, when it is considered how many heavy articles of unusual and extraordinary charge have attended this remote and difficult service: all which have been entirely defrayed by your majesty, except that one of transporting the few forces which were sent by the States-General, and victualling of them, during their transportation only. The accounts delivered to your Commons shew, that the Charge of your majesty's Ships and Vessels, employed in the service of the war in Spain and Portugal, reckoned after the rate of four pounds a man per month, from the time they sailed from hence, till they returned, were lost, or put upon other service, hath amounted to 6,340,966*l.* 14*s.* The Charge of Transports, on the part of Great Britain, for carrying on the war in Spain and Portugal, from the beginning of it till this time, hath amounted to 1,336,719*l.* 19*s.* 11*d.* That of Victualling Land Forces for the same service, to 583,770*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* and that of Contingencies, and other Extraordinaries for the same service, to 1,840,353*l.*

“We should take notice to your majesty, of several sums paid upon account of Contingencies and Extraordinaries in Flanders, making together the sum of 1,107,096*l.*: but we are not able to make any comparison of them, with what the States-General have expended upon the same head, having no such state of their extraordinary charge before us. There remains, therefore, but one particular more for your majesty's observation, which arises from the Subsidies paid to foreign princes. These, at the beginning of the war, were borne in equal proportion by your majesty and the States-General; but in this instance also, the balance hath been cast in prejudice of your majesty: for it appears, That your majesty ath since advanced more than your equal proportion, 3,155,000 crowns, besides Extraordinaries paid in Italy, and not included in any of the foregoing articles, which arise to 39,553 L.

“ We have laid these several particulars before your majesty, in the shortest manner, we have been able; and, by an estimate founded on the preceding facts, it does appear, that, over and above the quotas on the part of Great-Britain, answering to those contributed by your allies, more than 19 millions have been expended by your majesty during the course of this war, by way of surplussage or exceeding; in balance of which, none of the confederates have furnished any thing whatsoever.

“ It is with great concern, that we find so much occasion given us to represent, how ill an use hath been made of your majesty's and your subjects zeal for the common cause; that the interest of that cause hath not been proportionably promoted by it, but others only have been eased at your majesty's and your subjects' cost, and have been connived at in laying their part of the burden upon this kingdom, although they have upon all accounts been equally, and, in most respects, much more nearly concerned than Britain, in the issue of the war. We are persuaded, your majesty will think it pardonable in us, with some resentment, to complain of the little regard which some of those, whom your majesty of late years entrusted, have shewn to the interests of their country, in giving way, at least, to such unreasonable impositions upon it, if not in some measure contriving them: the course of which impositions hath been so singular and extraordinary, that the more the wealth of this nation hath been exhausted, and the more your majesty's arms have been attended with success, the heavier hath been the burden laid upon us; whilst on the other hand, the more vigorous your majesty's efforts have been, and the greater advantages which have redounded thence to your allies, the more those allies have abated in their share of the expence.

“ At the first entrance into this war, the Commons were induced to exert themselves in the extraordinary manner they did, and to grant such large supplies, as had been unknown to former ages, in hopes, thereby, to prevent the mischiefs of a lingering war, and to bring that, in which they were necessarily engaged, to a speedy conclusion: but they have been very unhappy in the event, whilst they have so much reason to suspect, that what was intended to shorten the war, hath proved the very cause of its long continuance; for those to whom the profits of it have accrued, have not been disposed easily to forego them. And your majesty will from thence discern the true reason, why so many have delighted in a war, which brought in so rich a harvest yearly from Great-Britain.

your majesty will be from concluding, any peace, but upon safe and honourable terms; and we are far from intending to excuse ourselves from raising all necessary and possible supplies for an effectual prosecution of the war, till such a peace can be obtained. All that your faithful Commons aim at; all that they wish, is, an equal concurrence from the other powers engaged in alliance with your majesty, and a just application of what hath been already gained from the enemy towards promoting the common cause. Several large countries and territories have been restored to the House of Austria; such as the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, and other places in Italy: others have been conquered, and added to their dominions, as the two electorates of Bavaria and Cologn, the duchy of Mantua, and the bishopric of Liege; these having been reduced in great measure by our blood and treasure, may, we humbly conceive, with great reason be claimed to come in aid towards carrying on the war in Spain: and therefore we make it our earnest request to your majesty, that you would give instructions to your ministers to insist, with the emperor, that the revenues of those several places, excepting only such a proportion thereof as is necessary for their defence, be actually so applied. And as to the other parts of the war, to which your majesty hath obliged yourself by particular treaties to contribute, we humbly beseech your majesty, that you will be pleased to take effectual care, that your allies do perform their parts stipulated by those treaties; and that your majesty will, for the future, no otherwise furnish troops, or pay subsidies, than in proportion to what your allies shall actually furnish and pay. When this justice is done to your majesty, and to your people, there is nothing which your Commons will not cheerfully grant, towards supporting your majesty in the cause in which you are engaged. And whatever farther shall appear to be necessary for carrying on the war, either at sea or land, we will effectually enable your majesty to bear your reasonable share of any such expence, and will spare no supplies which your subjects are able with their utmost efforts, to afford.

“ After having enquired into, and considered the State of the War, in which, the part your majesty has borne, appears to have been not only superior to that of any one ally, but even equal to that of the whole confederacy; your Commons naturally inclined to hope, that they should find, care had been taken of securing some particular advantages to Britain, in the terms of a future peace; such as might afford a prospect of making the nation amends in time for that immense treasure which has been expended, and those heavy debts which have been contracted in the course of so long and burdensome a war. This reasonable expectation could no way have been better answered, than by some provision made for the farther security, and the great improvement, of the commerce of Great-Britain : but we find ourselves so very far disappointed in these hopes, that, in a Treaty not long since concluded between your majesty and the States-General, under a colour of a mutual guaranty given for two points of the greatest importance to both nations, the Succession and the Barrier, it appears, the interest of Great-Britain hath been not only neglected, but sacrificed; and that several articles in the said treaty are destructive to the trade and welfare of this kingdom, and therefore highly dishonourable to your majesty.

“Your Commons observe, in the first place, that several towns and places are, by virtue of this treaty, to be put into the hands of the States-General; particularly Newport, Dendermond, and the Castle of Ghent; which can, in no sense be looked upon as a part of a barrier against France; but, being the Keys of the Netherlands towards Britain, must make the trade of your majesty's subjects in those parts precarious; and whenever the States think fit, totally exclude them from it. The pretended necessity of putting these places into the hands of the States-General, in order to secure to them a communication with their Barrier, must appear vain and groundless: for the sovereignty of the Low-Countries being not to remain to an enemy, but to a friend and an ally, that communication must be always secure and uninterrupted: besides that, in case of a rupture, or an attack, the States have full liberty allowed them to take possession of all the Spanish Netherlands, and therefore needed no particular stipulation for the towns abovementioned.

“Having taken notice of this concession made to the States-General for seizing upon the whole ten provinces, we cannot but observe to your majesty, that, in the manner this article is framed, it is another dangerous circumstance which attends this treaty: for, had such a provision been confined to the case of an apparent attack from France only, the avowed design of this treaty had been fulfilled, and your majesty's instructions to your ambassador had been pursued: but this necessary restriction hath been omitted; and the same liberty is granted to the States to take possession of all the Netherlands, whenever they shall think themselves attacked by any other neighbouring nation, as when they shall be in danger from France; so that, if it should at any time happen (which your Commons are very unwilling to suppose) that they should quarrel even with your majesty, the riches, strength, and advantageous situation of these countries may be made use of against yourself, without whose generous and powerful assistance they had never been conquered.

“To return to those ill consequences, which relate to the trade of your kingdoms, we beg leave to observe to your majesty, that though this treaty revives and renders your majesty a party to the fourteenth and fifteenth articles of the treaty of Munster, by virtue of which, the impositions upon all goods and merchan-

dises brought into the Spanish Low Countries by the sea, are to equal those laid on goods and merchandises imported by the Scheldt, and the canals of Sass and Swyn, and other mouths of the sea adjoining; yet no care is taken to preserve that equality upon the exportation of those goods out of the Spanish Provinces, into those countries and places, which, by virtue of this treaty, are to be in the possession of the States. The consequence of which must in time be, and your Commons are informed, that in some instances it has already proved to be the case, that the impositions upon goods carried into those countries and places by the subjects of the States-General, will be taken off, whilst those upon the goods imported by your majesty's subjects remain: by which means Great-Britain will entirely lose this most beneficial branch of trade, which it has been in all ages possessed of, even from the time when those countries were governed by the House of Burgundy, one of the most ancient, as well as the most useful allies to the Crown of England.

“With regard to the other dominions and territories of Spain, your majesty's subjects have always been distinguished in their commerce with them, and, both by ancient treaties and an uninterrupted custom, have enjoyed greater privileges and immunities of trade, than either the Hollanders, or any other nation whatsoever. And that wise and excellent Treaty of the Grand Alliance provides effectually for the security and continuance of these valuable privileges to Britain, in such a manner, as that each nation might be left at the end of the war upon the same foot as it stood at the commencement of it. But this Treaty we now complain of, instead of confirming your subjects rights, surrenders and destroys them: for, although by the 16th and 17th articles of the treaty of Munster, made between his Catholic majesty and the States-General, all advantages of trade are stipulated for, and granted to the Hollanders, equal to what the English enjoyed: yet, the Crown of England not being a party to that treaty, the subjects of England have never submitted to those articles of it, nor even the Spaniards themselves ever observed them: but this treaty revives those articles in prejudice of Great-Britain, and makes your majesty a party to them, and even a guarantee to the States-General for privileges against your own people.

“In how deliberate and extraordinary a manner your majesty's ambassador consented to deprive your subjects of their ancient rights, and your majesty of the power of procuring to them any new advantage, most evidently appears from his own letters, which, by your majesty's directions, have been laid before your Commons: for, when matters of advantage to your majesty and to your kingdom had been offered, as proper to be made parts of this treaty, they were refused to be admitted by the States-General, upon this reason and principle, that nothing foreign to the guaranties of the Succession and of the Barrier, should be mingled with them; notwithstanding which, the States General had no sooner received notice of a treaty of commerce concluded between your majesty and the present emperor, but they departed from the rule proposed before, and insisted upon the article of which your Commons now complain, which article your majesty's ambassador allowed of, although equally foreign to the Succession, or the Barrier; and although he had, for that reason, departed from other articles, which would have been for the service of his own country.

"We have forbore to trouble your majesty with general observations upon this treaty, as it relates to, and affects the empire, and other parts of Europe. The mischiefs which arise from it to Great-Britain, are what only we have presumed humbly to represent to you. As they are very evident and very great, and as it appears, that the lord viscount Townsend had not any orders or authority for consulting several of those articles which are most prejudicial to your majesty's subjects, we thought we could do no less than declare your aid ambassador, who negotiated and signed, and all others who advised the ratifying of this treaty, enemies to your majesty and your kingdom.

"Upon these faithful informations and advices from your Commons, we assure ourselves, your majesty, in your great goodness to your people, will rescue them from those evils, which he private counsels of ill-designing men have exposed them to; and that, in your great wisdom, you will find some means for the explaining and amending the several articles of this treaty, so as that they may consist with the interest of Great-Britain, and with a real and lasting friendship between your majesty and the States-General."

* "Nothing could more amply justify the proceedings of the queen and her ministers, for two years past, than this famous Representation; the unbiassed wisdom of the nation, after the strictest inquiry, confirming those facts upon which her majesty's counsels were grounded; and many persons, who were before inclined to believe that the allies and the late ministry had been too much loaded by the malice, misrepresentations, or ignorance of writers, were now fully convinced of their mistake by so great an authority. Upon this occasion I cannot forbear doing justice to Mr. St. John, who had been Secretary of War, for several years, under the former administration, where he had the advantage of observing how affairs were managed both at home and abroad. He was one of those who shared in the present Treasurer's fortune, resigning up his employment at the same time; and upon that minister's being again taken into favour, this gentleman was some time after made Secretary of State. There he began afresh, by the opportunities of his situation, to look into past Miscarriages; and, by the force of an extraordinary genius, and application to public affairs, joined with an in-

"This Representation is a further instance of that dutiful affection to my service, and concern for the public interest, which this House of Commons has always shewn.—You may be assured that I will give such orders as shall effectually answer what you desire of me in every particular."

Specific Explanation of the Offers of France for a General Peace.] The French plenipotentiaries at the Congress of Utrecht, did about this time deliver their Proposals in writing, as follows:

A SPECIFIC EXPLANATION of the Offers of France for a General Peace, to the Satisfaction of all the Parties concerned in the present War.

"The king will acknowledge at the signing of the Peace, the queen of Great Britain in that quality, as also the Succession of that crown according to the present settlement, and in the manner her Britannic majesty shall please.—His majesty will cause all the fortifications of Dunkirk to be demolished immediately after the Peace, provided an equivalent be given him to his satisfaction.—The island of St. Christopher, Hudson's bay and strait of that name, shall be yielded up entire to Great Britain; and Acadia, with Port Royal and the Fort, shall be restored entire to his majesty.—As to the island of Newfoundland, the king offers to yield up that also to Great Britain, reserving only to himself the fort of Placentia, and the right of catching and drying fish, as before the war.

"It shall be agreed to make a Treaty of Commerce before or after the Peace, as England shall choose, the conditions of which shall be made as equal between the two nations as they can possibly.

"The king will consent at the signing the Peace, that the Spanish Netherlands, which are given over to the Elector of Bavaria by the king of Spain, shall serve for a Barrier to the United Provinces; and to augment it, he will join thereto Furnes and the Furner-Ambacht or district, Knock, Ypres, and the castellany of Menin, with its virge: In exchange, his majesty demands to form the Barrier of France, Aire, St. Venant, Bethune, Douay, and their dependancies.

"If the States-General are desirous to keep garrisons in the fortified towns of the Barrier so formed of the dominions transferred to his Electoral Highness, and of what France adds thereto of its own, his majesty consents, that they shall put their troops into them in as vincible eloquence, laid open the scene of Miscarriages and Corruptions through the whole course of the war, in so evident a manner, that the House of Commons seemed principally directed in their resolutions, upon this inquiry, by his information and advice." Swift's Four Last Years.

great number as they please; and besides, that they shall be maintained at the expence of the country.

“In consideration of this cession, and of this consent, the king on his side demands, as an equivalent for the demolishing of Dunkirk, the towns and citadels of Lisle and Tournay, with their castellancies and dependancies.

“The Barrier thus regulated between France and the States-General, the king will grant for augmenting the commerce of their subjects, what is stipulated by the treaty of Ryswick, and the advantageous tariff of 1664, with an exception only of six sorts of merchandize which shall be agreed on, and which shall be charged with the same duties that are paid at this time; as also the exemption of 53 sols per ton on the Dutch shipping that come into France from the United Provinces and foreign countries.

“As to the commerce of Spain and the Indies, the king will engage not only to the States-General, but likewise to her Britannic majesty, and to all the other potentates, by virtue of the power he has in this particular, that the said commerce shall be allowed exactly, and carried on in the very same manner as it was, under the reign, and till the death of Charles 2; and will promise, that the French shall submit, as all the other nations, to the ancient laws and regulations made by the kings his catholic majesty’s predecessors, with respect to the commerce and navigation in the Spanish Indies.

“His majesty further consents, that all the potentates of Europe may enter into the guaranty of this promise. His majesty promises, that the king his grandson shall renounce, for the sake of the peace, all pretensions to the kingdoms of Naples and Sardinia, as well as to the duchy of Milan; in whose name he will consent, that the part of that duchy which is made over to the duke of Savoy, shall remain to his royal highness: provided that in consideration of this cession, the House of Austria do in like manner desist from all pretensions to the other parts of the monarchy of Spain, from whence that House shall withdraw their troops immediately after the Peace.

“The frontiers on both sides upon the Rhine, shall be settled on the same condition as they were before the present war.

“In consideration of all the terms above specified, the king demands that the electors of Cologne and Bavaria shall be re-established in the full and entire possession of their dominions, dignities, prerogatives, goods moveable and immoveable, which they enjoyed before this present war: and reciprocally, his majesty will recognize in Germany and Prussia, all the titles which he has not yet acknowledged.

“The king will restore to the duke of Savoy what he has taken from him during this war; as in like manner his royal highness shall restore to him what he has taken from France; so that the limits on both sides shall be the same they were before the declaration of war.

“All things as to Portugal shall be re-established, and remain on the same foot in Europe, that they were before the present war, as well with regard to France as to Spain; and as to the dominions that crown hath in America, if there be any differences to settle, endeavours shall be used to agree them amicably.

“The king will consent freely, and bona fide, to take, in concert with the allies, all the most just measures, for hindering the crowns of France and Spain from being ever united on the same head; that is to say, that one and the same prince shall never be at once king of both.

“All preceding treaties, that is, those of Munster, and others that have been made since, shall be repeated and confirmed, to remain in their force and virtue; excepting only such articles, from which the Treaty of Peace now to be made shall derogate, or alter something. (Signed) “HUXELLES.”

These Proposals of France were entertained with so universal an indignation, that it went near to reconcile the two contending parties; both Whig and Tory suspending and silencing their inveterate feuds, and joining to exclaim against the haughtiness of the common enemy; who even when he lay gasping for life, seemed to dictate to the conquerors.

Lord Halifax’s Motion thereon.] The lord Halifax made a motion in the House of Lords, on the 15th of February, for presenting an Address to the queen, about the Specific Offers of France, which his lordship called, ‘trifling, arrogant, and injurious to her majesty and her allies.’ He was seconded by several peers of both parties, who said, in substance, “That those propositions ought to be rejected with the utmost indignation, that it plainly appeared France had no other design in view than to amuse and divide the allies; and in particular, that it was derogatory to her majesty’s honour, to enter into any negotiation with that crown, before her majesty’s just title was acknowledged.” Some endeavours were used to adjourn the debate to the Monday following, or, at least, to the next day; by suggesting, “That the Offers that were handed about, having yet no other authority than their being inserted in the Holland Gazettes, might not be genuine; and therefore the Lords ought not to take any notice of them, till such time as the queen had communicated them to the House.” But this, and other arguments were over-ruled, and it was resolved, without dividing, to address her majesty.

The Lords’ Address thereon.] A committee was thereupon appointed to draw up that Address, which, the same day, was reported and agreed to, and, by the whole House, presented next day to the queen, as follows:

“Most gracious Sovereign; We your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to represent to your majesty the just indignation of this House, at the dishonourable treatment of your majesty by France, in having proposed to acknowledge your majesty's title to these realms no sooner than when the peace shall be signed. And we cannot forbear expressing our utmost resentment at the terms of peace offered to your majesty and your allies by the plenipotentiaries of France: And we do with the greatest zeal and affection, assure your majesty, that this House will stand by, and assist your majesty with our lives and fortunes in carrying on this war, in conjunction with your allies, till a safe and honourable peace can be obtained for your majesty and your allies."<sup>29</sup>

"My Lords; I return you my hearty thanks for the zeal you express for my honour, and for the assurance you give of supporting me."

The Place Bill rejected by the Lords.] On the 29th of February, the Lords read the second time the Bill from the Commons, for securing the Freedom of Parliaments, by limiting the number of Officers sitting in the House of Commons: Which being committed to a Committee of the whole House, their lordships immediately resolved themselves into that Committee; and after a debate which lasted till nine o'clock in the evening, the question being put, Whether the said Bill should pass? It was carried in the negative, by five or six voices: Some Peers, who were said to be for the bill, being absent, and not having left their proxies.

Votes against the Election of Mr. Robert Walpole.] March 6. The Commons took into consideration the merits of the Petition of Samuel Taylor, esq. and of the freemen and burghers of the borough of King's-Lynn, in the county of Norfolk, against the election of Robert Walpole, esq. and a motion being made, and the question put, that counsel be called, it passed in the negative. Then the writ for electing a burgess for the said borough, in the room of Robert Walpole, esq. expelled the House, and also the sheriff of Norfolk's precept thereupon, and the indenture of the return between the said Sheriff and the Mayor and burgesses of the said Borough were read: After which it was resolved, "1. That Robert Walpole having been, this session of parliament, committed a prisoner to the Tower of London, and expelled this House, for an high breach of trust in the execution of his office, and notorious Corruption when Secretary at War, was, and is incapable of being elected a member to serve in parliament." 2. That Samuel Taylor is not duly elected a burgess to serve in this present parliament for the borough of King's-Lynn. 3. That the late Election for a burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the said borough of King's-Lynn is a void election." And thereupon it was ordered, "That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the clerk of the crown, to make out a new writ for the electing a burgess for King's-Lynn, in the room of Robert Walpole."

SECOND REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—Revenue of Scotland—Public Monies unaccounted for—Mr. Walpole's Accounts.]—March 17. The Second Report of the Commissioners of Public Accounts was laid before the House, as follows:

"Your Commissioners here humbly present a State of the Receipts and Issues of your majesty's Exchequer, from the feast of St. Michael 1710, to the feast of St. Michael 1711, taken from the Returns made to them by the several officers concerned in the management of the public Revenue; to which they beg leave to add their Observations on some Matters of Fact, that have appeared to them in the prosecution of their enquiries.

"They do not presume to urge any reasons for their not having made a greater progress, because they humbly hope the House will believe their utmost application hath not been wanting. But they take liberty to repeat what they formerly mentioned, that the whole Accounts of the Army (which is the greatest branch of the public expence) are not yet delivered to them; though, as they are assured by the pay-master of the forces abroad, all dispatch is used in preparing those accounts; and your Commissioners cannot effectually enquire into the Mismanagements of the Army which they have in view, till those Accounts are completely brought before them, and till they shall have compared the several facts with the particular Articles relating to them: for it is from thence they will be able to draw the best and truest observations, and to form the justest and most exact representations.

"Your Commissioners conceive it not improper to begin this Report with the Revenue of Scotland, because some Facts of consequence, and, in their opinion, highly deserving the consideration of the House, have occurred to them in the examination thereof.

"But, before they offer their Observations, they must take notice of a very material circumstance relating to this Revenue; which is, that they cannot find any Commission for constituting Lords-Commissioners of the Treasury there, from the time of her majesty's accession to the throne, till after the Union; the last commission before the Union, bearing date the 30th of January 1696.—By an act of parlia-

* "Feb. 16. The Lords have voted an Address to the queen, to tell her they are not satisfied with the king of France's Offers. The Whigs brought it in of a sudden: and the court could not prevent it, and therefore did not oppose it. The House of Lords is too strong in Whigs, notwithstanding the new creations: for they are very diligent, and the Tories are lazy; the side that is down has always most industry: The Whigs intended to have made a vote, that would reflect on the Lord Treasurer: but their project was not ripe." Swift's Journal.

ment passed in Scotland, October the 9th, 1696, it is, amongst other things, enacted, 'That no Commission civil or military, shall become void by the death of the king, but that the same shall continue in force the space of six months, unless recalled by the next successor.' On the death of king William, a Proclamation was issued, by which all officers civil and military, were authorised and required to act in all things conformable to the last commissions and instructions they had from his late majesty, till new Commissions from the queen could be prepared and sent down to them.

"Some time after this, new commissions were sent down appointing all the officers civil and military in Scotland, except only those for the Treasury, for which no commission was granted by her majesty till the 23d of June 1707. But we must observe that by the usage of Scotland, when any alteration is made in the Treasury, it is not done by renewing the commission, as here in England, but by a letter from the crown. And her majesty was pleased to make so many alterations, that the major part of the commissioners were changed within the time of her accession to the throne, and that of the Union, by letters in the form following :

"Whereas we have resolved to appoint A. B. to be one of the Commissioners of our Treasury, these are therefore to authorize and require you, to admit and receive him as one of your number ; hereby giving and granting to him the same power and authority, with all privileges and immunities whatsoever, that are or have been competent to any other Commissioner of Treasury, and declaring these presents to be for his admission, of as full force, strength and effect, as if he had been nominated and appointed in, and by our Commission granted to you under our Great Seal, whereant we have thought fit to dispense.'

"From whence it is observable, that the whole public Revenue of Scotland was for some time left without any legal direction or government. For the commission of king William could be continued by virtue of the act of parliament, no longer in force than six months, nor by the proclamation, any longer than till her majesty's signing the first letter, after the expiration of the six months : for the words, 'As if he had been nominated and appointed in and by our commission granted to you under our Great Seal,' seem to determine the effect of that proclamation, and suppose a commission granted by her majesty. But, allowing the first letter was not a total repeal of king William's commission, and only a repeal in part ; yet it must be admitted, that as soon as her majesty had added a majority of new commissioners, or so many as being joined with the lesser number of the old, would make a majority, then the old commission was superseded and the Treasury under a new (if any) administration.

"Now, your Commissioners are humbly of opinion, that these letters referring to a patent which was never in being wanted a foundation, and could by no construction of law ever have any operation or effect ; and that those, who, under colour of them, were admitted into the Treasury, have acted without authority.—But we presume not to argue how far their proceedings may be thought illegal, or whether her majesty may be said to have been deceived by this neglect or mismanagement, or how extensive the mischiefs have already been, or may hereafter be to Scotland, or how far it will involve the people there, who have been concerned in contracts, leases, purchases, or otherwise, with the Treasury.—But certain it is, that the public bath been rendered liable to many inconveniencies, and her majesty must have been deceived when she ordered loans from the Treasury of England to the Treasury of Scotland, particularly that of 20,000*l.* in the year 1706 : for the Treasury of Scotland not being then (as we observe) rightly constituted, could neither give security for money lent, nor legally make repayment of it.

"Your Commissioners therefore, with great submission, propose it to the house, whether this defect will not want the assistance of the legislature, or whether the present proceedings of the court of exchequer in Scotland, relating to any mismanagements of the revenue thereof during this suspension of the commission and legal power of the Treasury, are not void ; and consequently, whether the judgments grounded upon them will not be found ineffectual.—But having humbly mentioned this circumstance of the Treasury of Scotland, we will proceed to the Revenue, and begin with an account of the loan of 20,000*l.* in the year 1706, as it appears to us, in the manner and by the evidence following.

"We, having ground to believe, that considerable sums of public money had been sent from England to Scotland, when the act of Union was under consideration in the parliament there, enquired into the reasons of it ; and understanding that sir David Nairn had been concerned in the receipt and remittance of 20,000*l.* we examined him on oath, and he declared to the effect following : That in 1706 he received the sum of 20,000*l.* at two several payments, 10,000*l.* on the 17th of October, and 10,000*l.* more on the 26th of November following, for which he gave two receipts to Sidney, earl of Godolphin, then Lord-Treasurer of England. That this money was lent, as he declared, by her majesty to the Treasury of Scotland, upon a representation from the duke of Queensberry, earl of Seafield, earl of Marr, earl of Loudon, and earl of Glasgow, that there were deficiencies in the Civil List, and upon their promise that it should be repaid, which he thinks, was accordingly done out of the Equivalent-money : that he was empowered by a letter from the lords of the Treasury in Scotland, to receive that money here and to give a receipt for it, which he accordingly did and by their direction remitted it to the earl of Glas-

at Edinburgh; but knows nothing certain of the distributing of it, has heard only, that it is paid to the lord Twedale, and other of the queen's servants.

"All which is confirmed by the earl of Glasgow, who, in return to a Precept of your Commissioners, after giving a particular account of the distributing of the 20,000*l.* in Scotland, swears on oath, (to use his own words) That consisted with his own proper knowledge, at 12,325*l.* were paid back after the Union the earl of Godolphin, then Lord-Treasurer: "But your Commissioners finding no mention of the receipt of this sum of 12,325*l.* or of the her remaining part of the 20,000*l.* in the certificates, or books of the exchequer, were unwilling to make any representation of the fact till they had given the earl of Godolphin a opportunity of declaring what he knew of his Loan to Scotland, and on some questions proposed to his lordship relating thereunto, he made the underwritten Deposition.

"The right honourable the earl of Godolphin being sworn, deposeth, That he had the queen's commands in the year 1706, or thereabouts, when the kingdoms of England and Scotland were separate, to lend to the Treasury of Scotland, the sum (as he thinks) of 20,000*l.* that he cannot recollect whether any part of it was repaid, but that he understood it was to be employed for her majesty's secret service in Scotland. GODOLPHIN. Jurat 25 Feb. 1711-12 :

"In pursuance of what I said to you yesterday at your board, I have endeavoured to recollect myself as well as I am able upon the subject you mentioned to me, and do believe, that 12,000*l.* or thereabouts, was repaid to the queen by her servants of Scotland, and to the best of my remembrance, they prevailed with her majesty not to require the remainder of the 20,000*l.* from them. I am, &c. GODOLPHIN."

P. S. "When I said yesterday, that I understood this money was to be made use of for the queen's secret service in Scotland, I only meant that I thought so, but was not certain of it.

"Your Commissioners, after the receipt of this Letter, gave the earl of Godolphin the trouble of coming to them a second time, and then his lordship was pleased to make another Deposition in these terms :

"The right honourable the earl of Godolphin being sworn, deposed, That the 12,000*l.* or thereabouts, mentioned in his lordship's letter of the 25th of February 1711-12, to the Commissioners of Public Accounts, and said to be repaid, was not, as he remembers, repaid to his lordship, nor doth his lordship know of any account of it, nor of any warrant for the disposal of this particular sum

"since, the repayment of it, to any person whatsoever. GODOLPHIN. Jurat 3 Mar. 1711-12."

"On a view of the whole Case thus stated, your Commissioners humbly offer the following Observations :

"That it is plain by the two letters from the Lords of the Treasury in Scotland, that this sum of 20,000*l.* was not advanced to them by way of secret service, or as a gift, but as a loan on promise of repayment, and receipts were accordingly given for it by their agent here, but your Commissioners are at a loss to explain some expressions in these letters, viz. That opposers to the Union would make some noise if her majesty's letter was read in the Treasury, that they had been obliged to give promises to several persons, and, without the sum desired, they would be disappointed, which might prove of bad consequence, that they would not have it known, that her majesty lends any money, &c. —Nor will we presume to guess at the reasons of these insinuations, but humbly conceive, that, if the money had been fairly applied to the pretended purposes, there could have been no just occasion for so much caution and jealousy.

"But, whatever inducements the Lords of the Treasury in Scotland, might have for transacting this affair in so secret a manner, we are of opinion that the persons employed here by her majesty ought not to have parted with the money, till her majesty's letter had been read in the Treasury of Scotland, and till a proper security had passed there for it.—Whereas, it was paid on the receipt of a private agent, and at the request of private persons, for so we must take leave to call the noble lords who signed these two letters to the earl of Godolphin, because they could not sign them as Lords of the Treasury; for, the earl of Marr was never in this commission, and the earl of Loudon had for some time been removed from it.

"However, since the Loan was made (as appears by the Depositions on all hands) it is to be considered, whether the money was ever repaid; and this cannot be so well understood, as by comparing the evidence of the two noble lords.

"First, then, the earl of Glasgow deposes in positive and express terms, That 12,325*l.* was paid back to the earl of Godolphin; and, in a letter to your Commissioners, he affirms, that he had already accounted with the earl of Godolphin for the money remitted, from the 1st of May, 1706, to the 1st of May, 1707, from England to Scotland; which evidence, must be allowed, would at least have been sufficient to charge the earl of Godolphin, with the article of 12,325*l.* had it not (in some measure) been contradicted by the earl of Godolphin's first deposition, wherein, his lordship is so far from charging himself with the receipt of that particular sum, or with passing any account with the earl of Glasgow for the whole, that he could not recollect, that any part of it was repaid; but says, that he understood, it was to be employed for her majesty's secret service in Scotland; nor is this variation reconciled, in your Commissioners' humble opinion, either by his lordship's Letter or subsequent Deposition.

"For though his lordship recollects himself in his letter, and says, That he believes 12,000*l.* or thereabouts was repaid to the queen by her majesty's servants in Scotland, and, to the best of his remembrance, they prevailed with her majesty not to require the remainder of the 20,000*l.* and that when he said, he understood the money was for secret service in Scotland, he meant, that he thought so, but was not certain of it; yet that does, in no sort, confirm or concur with the evidence of the earl of Glasgow; but this letter being sent only on a doubtful recollection, and the facts contained in it being offered with so much uncertainty, your Commissioners forbear to make any conclusions from it.

"But the last Deposition seems to return to the first contradiction of the earl of Glasgow's evidence, for, notwithstanding his lordship does there admit the repayment of the 12,000*l.* or thereabouts, as mentioned in his letter, he denies it was repaid, as he remembers, to himself, and deposes, that he doth not know of any account of it, nor of a warrant for the disposal of it, since the repayment to any persons whatsoever; which is absolutely inconsistent with what the earl of Glasgow mentions in his letter concerning his passing an account for this money; besides the repayment is supposed by the earl of Godolphin to be made to the queen, whereas the earl of Glasgow, as it hath been said, charges it positively upon the earl of Godolphin himself.

"How far these Depositions and Letters are capable of being explained into a consistency with each other, your Commissioners must leave to the wisdom and determination of the House; but it is obvious, that there is no where any pretence of a repayment of the 7,675*l.* remainder of the 20,000*l.* nor any satisfactory account given of the 12,325*l.* since repaid.—So that no part of the money appearing to have been applied to her majesty's service, your Commissioners are humbly of opinion, that the whole remains to be accounted for to her majesty.

"As to the Revenue of Scotland, your Commissioners doubt not but the House will be pleased to consider, that they must necessarily have met with many difficulties to their enquiries into the mismanagement of it, by reason of the remoteness of the place, where all the offices and records relating to the public money, are kept; from whence, not only discoveries and informations, but witnesses, to prove and make good the same, must be brought; and this would have been attended with so much trouble and expence, that some examinations have been rendered impracticable, which in another year may be prosecuted with better effect.

"Your Commissioners therefore humbly hope, that some general Observations on the present State of the Scots Revenues will answer what is now expected from them with relation to that kingdom.

"By the state of the Crown-Rents, exhibited to your Commissioners from the barons of the exchequer, it appears that they are so burdened with Grants within these few years, and the exorbitant salaries of the several collectors and stewards, that the greatest, and by much the best, part of them is exhausted; besides, it is a worthy observation, that, of the little which still remains to the crown, very considerable arrears are suffered to continue in the vassal hands.

"The Revenues of the Bishops, which, after the subversion of episcopacy, were annexed to the crown, are in a worse state than the other Crown-Rents. For there are few signed and authentic rentals of the revenues of the said Bishoprics to be found in the Exchequer; and such as are, do differ in so many particulars from the charge the several collectors do bring upon themselves, that there appears no certain rule for making a charge upon the said collectors, not to ascertain the yearly produce of that revenue.

"There can be no controul upon many articles in the discharge of the Collectors Accounts; such as Grants to several laymen, universities and presbyterian seminaries, and Allocations by virtue of the lords of sessions decrees, for the augmentation of ministers stipends and schoolmasters salaries; because the grants and rights of the several grantees are not duly entered in the Records of the Exchequer, and the collectors cannot prevent their payment till these grants and rights are recorded, and the validity thereof considered: Many of these grantees have entered into possession, and raise the rents themselves, or refuse to pay their tithes.

"Under these difficulties it was impossible for your Commissioners, at this time, to state a certain account of the yearly produce of these Revenues, or how and on what account they are burdened.

"But, by the best estimate we can make, after deducting the Grants and Allocations claimed and retained by the several grantees, the public taxes and other allowances craved by the collectors, the whole revenue of all the Bishoprics at a medium for several years (part of the rents being paid in kind, and causing the yearly produce to vary) amounts to no more annually to the queen, than 600*l.* or thereabouts, exclusive of the revenue of the deanery of the chapel-royal, which is about 298*l.* and enjoyed by Mr. William Carstairs: From which 600*l.* above 500*l.* per annum hath, for these several years past, been deducted for the salaries of two persons employed to collect the same.

"We have enquired into the Management of the money given by England as an Equivalent to Scotland, for such part of the Scots custom and excise, as was applicable, by the article of the Union, to the payment of the English debts contracted before the Union.

and we do observe, that the first commission, created the 5th of June, 1707, appointing commissioners of the Equivalent, consisted of 25 persons, whereof 16 were members of the House of Commons, and lasted for two years; at the House of Commons having addressed the queen to reduce the number of those commissioners, because, the greatest part of the Equivalent money was issued, a new commission was appointed, dated the 26th of July 1709, consisting of 15 persons, which still continues. That each Commissioner being allowed a yearly salary of 300*l.* the salaries of the said Commissioners amounted to 7,500*l.* per ann. and the second to 4,500*l.* per ann. the whole in four years time being 24,000*l.* From whence it appears, that a great part of the money that was designed for paying the public debts of Scotland, has been expended, as your commissioners conceive, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Articles of the Union, and the subsequent acts of parliament relating to this money. For your Commissioners are of opinion, that the receiving and distributing of the Equivalent Money, was not a work of intricate a nature, nor attended with such difficulties and labour, but that it might have been sufficiently performed by a much less number of Commissioners than were appointed in either of the commissions, and thereby a large sum of money saved and applied for payment of the public debts, many of which remain still unsatisfied.

“By the 15th Article of the Union, it was agreed, that the yearly sum of 2,000*l.* should be paid for the space of 7 years out of the Equivalent money, for encouraging of the manufactories of coarse wool, the first 2,000*l.* to be paid at Martinmass, 1707, and the like sum at each Martinmass during the said 7 years. By the 16th act of the last Scots parliament, entitled, ‘An Act concerning the Public Debts,’ it is provided, that the said sum of 2,000*l.* per ann. shall be paid previous to the public debts, by both the aforesaid commissions, the commissioners are required to apply the Equivalent money in the terms, and after the manner and the uses prescribed by the aforesaid articles of the Union and acts of parliament.

“Nevertheless, in the State of the Cash of the Equivalent exhibited to us by the Commissioners, they charge themselves with 14,000*l.* appointed by the coarse wool; but in the discharge, it does not appear, that any sum has been applied or reserved for that purpose, the whole sum of 398,085*l.* 10*s.* being issued and expended for other uses. And we can’t but take notice, that though they charge themselves with the said 398,085*l.* 10*s.* specifying the particular uses to which every part thereof was appropriated; yet in the discharge of the said account, instead of applying the said sum to the aforesaid appropriated uses, they state 1,340*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.* as the salaries of 21 Commissioners, from the 5th of June 1707, to the 25th of July, 1709, being two years and 51 days, and 9,000*l.* as two years salary of the 15 present Commissioners, from the 25th of July, 1709, to the 26th of July 1711, amounting in the whole to 22,480*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.* of which they have received in money the sum of 19,698*l.* 18*s.* 10½*d.* and they state the remaining 2,781*l.* 6*s.* 6½*d.* as a balance to them.

“By the act of the 6th of the queen, entitled, ‘An Act for the further Payment of the Equivalent,’ each Commissioner of the Equivalent is allowed a yearly salary of 300*l.* but it is expressly provided, that the same shall be paid out of any sum of money, other than the sum of 398,085*l.* 10*s.* the first Equivalent Money that have, or shall become due to Scotland by way of Equivalent. From which we humbly conceive, the Commissioners have no right to demand and state the said sum of 22,480*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.* out of the said sum of 398,085*l.* 10*s.* paid to them.

“The Commissioners by the State of the Cash have overpaid the sum of 2,781*l.* 6*s.* 6½*d.* whereas we humbly conceive, that, if they be compelled to account in the terms of the articles of the Union, acts of parliament, and their own Commission, there doth remain in their hands the sum of 19,698*l.* 18*s.* 10½*d.* detained by them for the payment of their salaries, and for which they are accountable.—The Customs of Scotland before the Union, were let in lease by the Lords of the Treasury there, and your Commissioners, having reason to believe, that the farmers thereof were guilty of many illegal practices highly prejudicial to trade, and her majesty’s revenue arising from the customs, before and since the Union, have made some enquiries into that affair. But the same being a matter of great consequence, very intricate, and attended with many difficulties, your Commissioners beg leave to postpone a particular report thereof, till they shall be better prepared to set it in a true light.

“Your Commissioners being informed, that the Commissioners appointed by an act of the 6th of her majesty’s reign, entitled, ‘An Act for paying the debentures of fish and flesh, cured with foreign salt imported before the Union, and ascertaining the price of foreign salt remaining in Scotland,’ had not applied all the money given by the said act to the uses therein mentioned, and particularly that they had made several deductions from the said debentures, and price of salt allowed by law, did require the said Commissioners to exhibit a state of their accounts; in which it did not appear, that they had made any deductions whatsoever; the full value of the debentures and price of the salt delivered over to the queen’s use, being stated in their discharge.

“But having examined upon oath Mr. Gilbert Stewart, one of the said Commissioners, he deposed, the sum of 2,780*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* was proportionably deducted from the said debentures and price of salt, on account of charges in obtaining of the act of parliament, for paying the said debentures and salt. That this was done by the consent of almost all the proprietors, who by a deed under their hands did appoint a Committee of their own number, to state and allow such a deduction on this account as they should think reasonable. Which committee did agree to the said sum of 2,780*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* and directed the payment thereof in the manner, and to the persons mentioned in an act signed by them, and exhibited on oath to your Commissioners by the said Mr. Gilbert Stewart.—By an article in this account the sum of 195*l.* is stated as paid to William Cockran, esq. on the account of his charges in obtaining the act of parliament for paying the said debentures and salt.—And the said Mr. Stewart did on oath acquaint the Commissioners, that Mr. Cockran was concerned in trade with the said Stewart and others, who gave a commission to Mr. Cockran to go to London, and dispose of a quantity of goods they had sent thither, and did promise to pay him what charges and expences he should be at on that account. That afterwards, when Mr. Cockran returned from London, he charged and claimed in his account, 300*l.* as his expences, which Mr. Stewart and his partners allowed him with this proviso, that he should pay to them whatever sum should be given as a gratuity from the proprietors of the salt and debentures, on account of his services in obtaining the said act. That accordingly, when the said 195*l.* allotted to Mr. Cockran was paid, he gave his receipt for it: But the said Stewart retained the money, and afterwards divided it betwixt himself and partners in trade, conformable to the above-mentioned agreement with Mr. Cockran.

“Your Commissioners having humbly given their thoughts on our mismanagement in the public revenues of Scotland, will now proceed to such observations as have occurred to them in pursuing the accounts of that of England.

“First we have endeavoured to examine into the reason how so large sums of public money remain still unaccounted for by the persons entrusted with it; and we conceive this proceeds from the neglect of those in issuing process. For in some cases, process hath never been issued; in others, where it hath been issued, the returns were generally Nichils, or of very small issues, even where the accountants were possessed of considerable estates in land, and other valuable effects.

“And there hath not been only a neglect of issuing process against accountants, but warrants have been often granted from the treasury, to stop the execution thereof when issued. Where accounts have been many years depending, and where there was reason to suspect the circumstances of the accountants, which, grounded upon better pretences than any yet appear to your Commissioners, must be an imputation of mismanagement.

“Some attempts have been made of late towards curing this evil, for a Capias ad Computandum, which is the most essential process of the Exchequer, and which hath for many years been disused, is now revived, and an office appointed to issue it against the persons of the accountants, where a distringas is not sufficient. This hath been done with so good effect, that accounts of money, impressed many years past, have been lately delivered to the auditor.—Many instances of what is here inserted, have appeared to your Commissioners, in certificates delivered on oath by the proper officers, some of which we humbly lay before you, &c.

“But as the neglect of passing accounts, according to the rules and methods of the Exchequer, has been a great detriment and loss to the public, so it has been a great prejudice, that many accounts have been passed by privy seals, and in an extraordinary and irregular manner. For, on perusing and examining some of them, we find that they have not been desired so much to supply the want of form, (the only colourable pretence for allowing them) as to justify unreasonable and extravagant payments, such as are directly contrary to the rules of the navy; not warranted by the establishments of the army, nor grounded on any treaties or conventions with foreign princes.

“In the privy seals granted or craved, and for which warrants are obtained by the paymaster of the army, several articles are included, which, as far as we are capable of judging, ought not to have been allowed.

“As in particular for secret service, which had no relation to the army.

“For paying the foreign forces in British pay, according to the establishment, without muster rolls; which your Commissioners are of opinion was one great reason that no care was taken to keep the corps complete.

“For allowing Contingencies and Extraordinaries according to the Dutch secretary's certificates, without farther vouchers.

“For payment to the electors of Treves and Cologne, not referring to, or grounded on any treaty.

“In a privy seal for passing the accounts of Paul Methuen, esq. son of John Methuen, esq. we find the following extraordinary payments allowed: 1. The charge of embarking one, and disembarking another Dutch regiment. 2. 3,000 mill-reis on a bill drawn by the prince of Hesse on M. Schonenburgh, the Dutch plenipotentiary; which being refused by him, was paid, as is set forth in the privy seal, by the said Mr. Methuen, for the honour of that prince, and there declared it ought to be repaid by the States General. 3. 1,854 mill-reis expended in presents given to the emperor of Morocco, and in maintaining his ambassador. 4. 35,595 mill-reis for the subsisting, cloathing, and arming of Spaniards. For the payment of which, we do not find he had any authority but the king of Spain's order. 5. 1,125 mill-reis for freight of the king of Spain's coaches and horses, and powder presented to him by the king of Portugal.

“In the account delivered to us by Mr. Methuen, he charges 7,635 mill-reis, as paid on account of the Spaniards before-mentioned, which was not included in the privy seal, and owns, that for several articles allowed in that privy seal, no vouchers could be produced.

"There are great sums due on bonds for her majesty's Customs, which has occasioned a considerable loss to the government; the merchants from whom they were taken, being many of them, with their securities, become insolvent. This loss, we apprehend, might, in some measure, have been prevented, had the bonds been put in suit, as they ought to have been, immediately after they became due, and not continued so long in the remembrancer's hands without prosecution; or had care been taken not to have suffered the merchants to have engaged into new bonds, before they had discharged the principal and interest on their former bonds, according to the instructions of the Commissioners of Customs to their officers.

"By these Compositions, the public has lost 112,499*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* supposing the whole sum compounded for was paid into the Exchequer, but as there has been only 22,227*l.* 9*d.* paid, the loss to the public on this head, may be computed at 117,950*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.*

"Of the money issued for the Transport Service, there has been paid 121,125*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* to Mr. Atkinson and Mr. Roop, who, from 6th Feb. 1701, to 23rd June, 1704, transacted the whole business of this office, on the examination of whose accounts, we humbly offer the following Observations:

"That notwithstanding they are entrusted with the disposition of so large sums, no security was ever taken or demanded, either for the faithful discharge of their trust, or the due answering the sums issued to them.

"That they never received any instructions, by which they should guide themselves in the execution of their office, but being left at liberty to make their payments in what manner they pleased, they neither numbered their bills, nor paid them in course, according to the method of the Navy Office, and as they have been of late obliged to do.

"That they being no otherwise constituted than by a minute of the Treasury, and being themselves cashiers of the money appointed for that service, we humbly conceive they were not vested with sufficient authority to make any payments, or warrant their proceedings in the management of that affair. In which opinion we are confirmed by the patent bearing date the 15th of August, 1710, which we observe not only appointed them to act as Commissioners of Transports for the future, but has a retrospect to their proceedings before in the performance of that service, which are therein confirmed and made valid.

"That on the 22nd of June, 1704, when Mr. Nutin was appointed Treasurer of the Transports, there was a balance in their hands of the sum of 6,386*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* out of which they have paid to several persons 3,488*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* but kept the remainder till the 7th of December, 1710, at which time they paid to Mr. Micklewaite, the present Treasurer, 2,429*l.* and 4*d.* and still retain 473*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* on pretence of defraying the charge of passing their accounts. In excuse of their so long detaining the sum lately paid to Mr. Micklewaite, they alledge, that they knew Mr. Nutin and Mr. Mason, to be men of such circumstances and characters, as could not safely be entrusted with public money.

"We have nothing farther to observe on the accounts of Mr. Atkinson and Mr. Roop, but that they discharge themselves by payments on bills and otherwise, of the sum of 120,652*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* whereof they have paid on imprests 11,523*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* and that for these payments, they have laid some accounts before the auditors, but have passed as yet an account for one year only, notwithstanding it is now more than seven years since any money has been issued to them.

"Mr. Nutin was appointed Treasurer of the Transports, on the 22nd of June, 1704, and though he received, whilst in that employment, 108,118*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* he gave a security of 2,000*l.* only; he continued in this office till January, 1705, about which time he was dismissed for embezzling the public money. Mr. Nutin is not to be found, being, by order of the late Lord Treasurer, discharged out of prison; so that we can say nothing farther in relation to his accounts, except that those for one year have been laid before the auditors, but have not been prosecuted: Mr. Nutin having misapplied the public money, and it being thought necessary to put that office under a better regulation, the late Lord Treasurer ordered, that, for the future, the money, issued for that service, should be brought by the Treasurer into the office, to be locked up there, who should also transmit weekly certificates to the Treasury, signed by himself, and one of the Commissioners at least.

"Notwithstanding these Orders, and the complaints of the Commissioners to the late Lord Treasurer, and his repeated directions that they should be observed, Mr. Mason, who succeeded Mr. Nutin, on the 18th of January, 1705, neglected for some time to give any account of the money received, and brought none of it into the office to be locked up, till the 18th of January, 1706, and during the whole time of his continuance in that office kept some of the public money in his hands. In particular, he received at the Exchequer, on the 7th Nov. 1707, 35,778*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* and kept the whole sum in his hands till the 1st Dec. following, at which time he brought into the office, 30,000*l.* in specie, and a bank receipt for several notes of one Newell, amounting to 5,403*l.* 10*s.* which was afterwards returned to Mr. Mason, Newell failing before the bank received the money. This was represented to the Treasury by the Commissioners, in a letter on the 9th Dec. 1707, notwithstanding which, Mr. Mason was continued in his office till the 14th of April following, and considerable sums were issued to him. He is accountable for 262,813*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.* of which he discharges himself by payments of the sum of 256,927*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.* Wherefore he has paid on imprests, 23,668*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* He has had some accounts before the auditors, but none of them are yet passed.

“ Mr. Mason was succeeded by Mr. Micklewaite, on the 19th of April, 1708, between which time and the 24th of June, 1711, we find there has been issued to him from the Exchequer, 476,341*l.* 6*s.* 11*d.* and he voluntarily chargeth himself with the sum of 4,010*l.* 7*s.* 2*d.* Mr. Micklewaite has laid his accounts before the auditors, to Michaelmas, 1710, which are ready for a declaration.

“ We will conclude our Remarks on the Management of this part of the service, with observing that though the Commissioners have given certificates to the pay-master of the forces of the number of men shipped, that a deduction might be made for the victuals furnished in their passage to Flanders, and that there ought to have been deducted out of the pay of the soldiers, more than 1,300*l.* on that account, as was represented to the House last sessions, yet no part thereof has been paid over to that office.

“ Though your Commissioners are not yet possessed of all the Accounts of the Navy, they think it their duty to represent some Articles of payments in the accounts laid before them by Mr. Walpole, late Treasurer of the Navy, which being made at a time when that service was clogged with great debts, seems very extraordinary, and such as they apprehend inconsistent with the rules of the navy.

“ The first instance is, a payment of 2,000*l.* by Mr. Walpole, to the earl of Orford, out of money properly applicable to the use of the Navy, by virtue of a warrant from her majesty, bearing date the 13th of July, 1710, which was given to the said earl as her majesty's royal bounty.

“ The other instance is of two payments, amounting to 1,452*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.* made also by Mr. Walpole, to Henry Priestman, esq. pursuant to a warrant from her majesty, dated July 7, 1710, which directs that 10,000*l.* per annum should be paid during her pleasure, out of such money as then was, or should be in Mr. Walpole's hands, for the service of the navy, both which are countersigned, Godolphin.

“ How prejudicial the allowance of these Articles may be to the public, we presume not to affirm, but must acquaint you, that the Commissioners of the Navy, whose duty it is to inspect and sign the Treasurer's Account, say, that they never knew any such warrants heretofore, and that regularly all warrants should come from the Lords of the Treasury, or Lords of the Admiralty to them. We therefore humbly submit it to the House, whether these warrants ought to have been answered by the Treasurer of the Navy, though countersigned by the Lord Treasurer?

“ We find an addition to the Establishment of the Navy of four senior captains, appointed to act as commanders in chief at Chatham, Plymouth, Portsmouth and Harwich, in the absence of flag-officers, by the name of superintendants. This new office your Commissioners observe was erected at a time when some irregular promotions had been made in the fleet, and hath occasioned an increase of charge, without any advantage to the service, viz.

“ Here your Commissioners think it not improper to mention a debt of 115,014*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.* which appears to them by the return made from the Navy-Board, to have been many years due to England, from the States-General, for stores lent. We also find by the same return, that an account of this debt has been long since presented by the Commissioners of the Navy, to the Lords of the Admiralty, but without effect.

“ All which is humbly submitted to the consideration of the House.”

The Queen's Message respecting the English Episcopal Church at Rotterdam.] March 14. Mr. Secretary St. John delivered to the House the following Message, signed by her majesty:

“ ANNE R.

“ It having been certified to her majesty, by the earl of Strafford, her ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the States-General of the United Provinces, That the collection for building a Church at Rotterdam, wherein divine service is celebrated after the usage of the Church of England, for the benefit of the queen's subjects in that place, are not sufficient to compleat the charge of that work, by about 2,500*l.* her majesty thinks fit earnestly to recommend to the House, the making a provision for the same.”

The Commons' Address thereon.] Hereupon it was resolved, “ That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, to return her majesty the most humble thanks of this House, for her most gracious Message, and to assure her majesty, that this House will enable her majesty to compleat the charge of the same.”

Complaint against Mr. Buckley, for printing the Memorial of the States-General.] April 11. A complaint being made to the House of a printed Pamphlet, entitled “ The Daily Courant Monday April 7, 1712,” reflecting upon the proceedings of the House of Commons, the same was brought up to the table, and the title of the pretended Memorial there inserted, and a paragraph therein were read: After which it was resolved, “ That the pretended Memorial printed in the said Daily Courant is a false, scandalous, and malicious Libel, reflecting upon the Resolutions of this House, and the Address of this House to her majesty thereupon, in breach of the privilege of this House.” And a Committee was appointed to enquire who was the author, printer, and publisher of the said Libel, with power to send for persons, papers, and records. This day, Mr. Hungerford made his Report from that Committee, importing in substance, “ That Samuel Buckley, the writer and printer of the Daily Courant, had owned the having translated and printing the said Memorial." Whereupon, the question was put, "That it appearing to this House, that Samuel Buckley is the printer of the pretended Memorial printed in the Daily Courant of the 7th instant (which hath been adjudged by this House to be a false, scandalous and malicious Libel, reflecting upon the Resolutions of this House, and the Address to her majesty thereupon, in breach of the privilege of this House) and, for the said offence, be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House:" Upon which the House divided; but the same was carried in the affirmative by a majority of 188 voices against 57.

Resolutions relating to the Licentiousness of the Press.] Some members were so exasperated at the Dutch Memorial being published in a newspaper, that on the 12th the House being resolved into a grand committee, to consider of that part of the queen's Message to the House, the 17th of January last, which relates to the great License taken in publishing false and scandalous Libels, Sir Gilbert Dolben being the chairman, they came to these two Resolutions, 1. "That the liberty taken in printing and publishing scandalous and impious Libels, creates divisions among her majesty's subjects, tends to the disturbance of the public peace, is highly prejudicial to her majesty's government, and is occasioned for want of due regulating the Press. 2. That all printing-presses be registered, with the names of the owners, and places of abode; and that the author, printer, and publisher of every book set his name and place of abode thereto." These Resolutions were ordered to be reported the Tuesday following; but the said report was then put off till that day se'night, and afterwards further adjourned from time to time: Some members being, in the grand committee on ways and means, suggested a more effectual way for suppressing libels, viz. the laying a great duty on all news-papers and pamphlets.*

* "Among the matters of importance during this session, we may justly number the proceedings of the House of Commons with relation to the Press, since her majesty's Message to the House, of January the 17th, concludes with a paragraph, representing the great licences taken in publishing false and scandalous libels, such as are a reproach to any government; and recommending to them to find a remedy equal to the mischief. The meaning of these words in the message, seems to be confined to these weekly and daily papers and pamphlets, reflecting upon the persons and the management of the ministry. But the House of Commons in their Address, which answers this message, makes an addition of the blasphemies against God and religion; and it is certain, that nothing would be more for the honour of the legislature, than some effectual law for putting a stop to this universal mischief: but as the per-

Bolingbroke], who advised the queen in that part of her message, had only then in his thoughts the redressing of the political and factious libels, I think he ought to have taken care, by his great credit in the House, to have proposed some ways by which that evil might be removed; the law for taxing single papers having produced a quite contrary effect, as was then foreseen by many persons, and hath since been found true by experience. For the adverse party, full of rage and leisure since their fall, unanimous in defence of their cause, employ a set of writers by subscription, who are well versed in all topics of defamation, and have a style and genius levelled to the generality of readers; while those who would draw their pens on the side of their prince and country, are discouraged by this tax, which exceeds both the intrinsic value of the materials and the work; a thing, if I be not mistaken, without example.—It must be acknowledged that the bad practices of printers have been such as to deserve the severest animadversions of the public; and it is to be wished the party-quarrels of the pen were always managed with decency and truth: but in the mean time, to open the mouths of our enemies and shut our own, is a turn of politics that wants a little to be explained. Perhaps the ministry now in possession, because they are in possession, may despise such trifles as this; and it is not to be denied, that acting as they do upon a national interest, they may seem to stand in less need of such supports, or may safely fling them down as no longer necessary. But if the leaders of the other party had proceeded by this maxim, their power would have been none at all, or of very short duration: and had not some active pens fallen in to improve the good dispositions of the people, upon the late change, and continued since to overthrow the falsehood, plentifully, and sometimes not unplausibly, scattered by the adversaries, I am very much in doubt, whether those at the helm would now have reason to be pleased with their success. A particular person may, with more safety, despise the opinion of the vulgar, because it does a wise man no real harm or good, but the administration a great deal; and whatever side has the sole management of the pen, will soon find hands enough to write down their enemies as low as they please. If the people had no other idea of those whom her majesty trusts in her greatest affairs, than what is conveyed by the passions of such as would compass sea and land for their destruction, what could they expect, but to be torn in pieces by the rage of the multitude? How necessary therefore was it, that the world should, from time to time, be undeceived by true representations of persons and facts, which have kept the kingdom steady to its interest, against all the attacks of read the third time, and passed a Bill to restore Patrons to their ancient Rights in Scotland, and sent it up to the Lords for their concurrence, the agents for the Presbyterians of that part of Great Britain, resolved to follow it thither, and thereupon drew up the following Representation :

To the most honourable the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled: The humble REPRESENTATION of William Carstairs, Thomas Blackwell, and Robert Baillie, ministers of the Church of Scotland, appointed by the Commission of the late General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, to take all proper and legal methods for preserving the rights and privileges of the aforesaid Church.

“ It is with all humble duty and submission represented unto your lordships, that this de-

a cunning and virulent faction. However, the mischiefs of the Press were too exorbitant to be cured, by such a remedy as a tax upon the smaller papers; and a bill for a more effectual regulation of it was brought into the House of Commons, but so late in the session, that there was no time to pass it; for there hath hitherto always appeared, an unwillingness to cramp overmuch the Liberty of the Press, whether from the inconveniences apprehended from doing too much, or too little; or whether the benefit proposed by each party to themselves, from the service of their writers, towards recovering or preserving of power, be thought to outweigh the disadvantages. However it came about, this affair was put off from one week to another, and the bill not brought into the house till the 8th of June. It was committed three days, and then heard of no more. In this bill there was a clause inserted, (whether industriously with a design to overthrow it) that the author's name, and place of abode, should be set to every printed book, pamphlet, or paper; which I believe no man, who hath the least regard to learning, would give his consent to: for, besides the objection to this clause from the practice of pious men, who, in publishing excellent writings for the service of religion, have chosen out of an humble christian spirit, to conceal their names; it is certain, that all persons of true genius or knowledge have an invincible modesty and suspicion of themselves, upon their first sending their thoughts into the world; and that those who are dull or superficial, void of all taste and judgment, have dispositions directly contrary: so that if this clause had made part of a law, there would have been an end, in all likelihood, of any valuable production for the future, either in wit or learning: and that insufferable race of stupid people, who are now every day loading the Press, would then reign alone, in time destroy our very first principles of reason, and introduce barbarity amongst us, which is already kept out with so much difficulty by so few hands.” Swift's Four Last Years.

pending bill seems to be contrary to the present constitution of our Church, so well secured by the treaty of Union, and solemnly ratified by acts of parliament in both kingdoms. That this may be more clear, it is to be observed, that, from the first reformation from popery, the church of Scotland hath always reckoned Patronages a grievance and burden, as is declared by the first and second books of discipline, published soon after the said Reformation, since which time they were still judged a grievance, till at length they came by law to be abolished.

“ These Patronages having been restored with Episcopacy, in the year 1661 and 1662, did continue to the year 1690: That Episcopacy was abolished, and presbyterian church government again established; and though the act of parliament in 1690, resettling presbyterian church-government, was founded upon the act of parliament in 1592, which bears a relation unto Patronages, yet the said act of parliament in 1690, doth expressly except that part of the old act, and refer Patronages to be thereafter considered, which accordingly was considered in the same parliament in 1590, whereby it is plain, that the abolition of Patronages was made a part of our church-constitution, enacted by the act in 1690, and that this act in 1690, with all other acts relative thereto, being expressly ratified and forever confirmed by the act for securing the Protestant Religion and Presbyterian government, and engrossed as an essential condition of the ratifications of the treaty of Union past in the parliaments of both kingdoms; the said act abolishing Patronages must be understood to be a part of our Presbyterian constitution, secured to us by the treaty of Union for ever.

“ Yet it is to be particularly considered, that the same parliament in 1690 was so tender of the civil rights of Patrons, and so sincerely desirous only to restore the Church to its just and primitive liberty of calling ministers, in a way agreeable to the Word of God, that they only discharged the Patron's power of presenting ministers to vacant churches, but as to any thing of civil rights, did make the condition of Patrons better than before, not only by reserving unto them the right of disposal of vacant Stipends for pious uses within the Paroch, but also giving unto them the heretable rights of the Tythes, restricting the minister, who formerly had the said right to Stipends, much below the value of the said Tythes, notwithstanding which advantageous concession to the Patrons by the parliament, this bill takes back from the Church the power of presentation of ministers, without restoring the Tythes which formerly belonged to her, by which the Patrons come to enjoy both the purchase and the price.

“ This being then the true account of our legal settlement as to this matter, it appears to be evident that the restitution of Patronages, as to the point of presentation, can only gratify a few, while on the other hand it must necessarily disoblige a far greater number, that are now freed of that imposition; and indeed it cannot but seem strange, that this bill should be so much insisted upon, when there are so many patrons, and those of the most considerable in Scotland, that are against such a constitution.

"It also appears, that Presbyteries must come under many difficulties and hardships, as to their compliance with this innovation, and that many contests, disorders and differences, will probably ensue betwixt patrons, presbyters, heretors and people, besides the known abuses wherewith Patronages have been attended even in their most settled condition; whereof many instances might be given; especially, that thereby a foundation was laid forrimoniacal Factions betwixt patrons and those resented by them, and likewise ministers were imposed upon paroches by patrons who were utterly strangers to their circumstances, having neither property nor residence therein.

"It is therefore with all submission expected from your lordships' justice, and mature deliberation, that a bill, as we humbly conceive, so nearly affecting the late Union in one of its most fundamental and essential articles, respecting the preservation of the rights and privileges, which our Church at that time was possessed of by law, for the security of which the parliament of Scotland was so much concerned as not to allow their commissioners to make it any part of their Treaty, but reserved it as a thing unalterable by any judicature deriving its constitution from the said Treaty, shall not be approved by your lordships, especially while the nature of the Treaty itself shews it to be a reciprocal transaction betwixt the two nations.

The Patronage Bill passes both Houses.] It is observable, that this Representation was first printed and presented with this title, 'To the most honourable the peers of Great-Britain;' but an exception being taken to it, because it seemed either to imply that the Bishops were peers upon the same foot with the temporal lords, or to exclude them from being concerned in the Address; neither of which would be admitted; the said Representation was thereupon withdrawn, and new printed and presented as above. It is also to be observed, that notwithstanding the said mistake, which some were apt enough to construe as an intended slight on Episcopacy, yet five of the Bishops who entertained more charitable thoughts, and were apprehensive of the fatal consequences of the Bill for restoring Lay Patronages, gave their votes against it. But the majority of the House of Lords were of another opinion; and so the Bill was on the 14th of April sent back to the Commons with a small Amendment to which the Commons afterwards agreed.

The Grant-Bill tacked to the Lottery-Bill.] April 21. The Commons read a second time a Bill 'To appoint Commissioners to examine 'the Value of all lands, and other interests granted by the crown since the 13th day of February 1688-9, and upon what consideration such Grants were made,' and committed the same to the committee of the whole House, to whom the Bill 'To raise money by way of a Lottery,' was committed. It appearing by this, that the House designed to tack these two Bills notwithstanding a former Resolution of the House of Lords against such a practice; which made the court apprehensive, that the same might occasion unhappy differences between both Houses; some members of the House of Commons endeavoured to prevent it, but the majority were of a contrary opinion.

The Grant-Bill untacked from the Lottery-Bill.] May 6. It was hinted before, that some members of the House of Commons, did, on the 21st of April, endeavour to prevent the tacking of the Grant-Bill to the Lottery-Bill; but though they then failed therein; yet (as the report was then current) upon a promise made by a great minister, to several leading men, that he would use all his interest, to procure the passing of the first of these Bills single in the House of Lords, the Commons resolved, "That the Committee of the whole House be discharged from the instruction to alter and make these two into one;" which was carried by a majority of 300 voices against 81.

The Grant-Bill passes the Commons.] May 10. The Grant-Bill, with the amendments made to it, was ordered to be engrossed; after which the Commons resolved, 'That the Commissioners for putting in execution the trusts and powers in the said Bill, be seven. 1. That no person should be a Commissioner who had any office of profit, or was accountable to her majesty, or has, or holds, under any grant from the crown, since the 13th of February 1688-9. 2. That the Commissioners might be members of the House. 3. That they be chosen by ballotting:' which, according to order, was done on Tuesday, the 13th of May, and the majority of voices fell upon John Hind Cotton, esq. the hon. James Murray, esq. the right hon. Henry viscount Down, Charles Cholmondley, esq. James Bulteel, esq. W. Levinz, esq. and sir Edmund Bacon, bart. The next day the Bill was passed and sent to the Lords.

The Grant Bill dropped in the Lords.] The Bill made all its steps through the House of Lords, to the last, with a small majority of one or two. On the third reading of the Bill, a warm debate arose; in which,

The Duke of Argyle said, "That, if for the ease of the public it was found proper to resume the Grants of the crown, he would readily give his vote for it, provided they would go so far back, as the Restoration of king Charles the second. But he could never agree to limit the Bill to Grants of king William, because such an act would be injurious to the memory of the deliverer of Great-Britain, and all Europe; which ought to be had in reverence by all honest men."

The Earl of Wharton, the lord Cowper, and lord Halifax spoke, with great force and eloquence, against the partial distinction between Grants since the Revolution, and those before it; adding, that such a distinction gave too much credit to a ministry, who by the passing of the Bill would have the means in their hands to ruin and oppress those, who had not the good luck to please them.

The Earl of Nottingham, who had been absent the first two days, spoke on this occasion, and said, "He always thought those Grants were too large and very unseasonably made; but he thought there ought to be an equal way of proceeding in that matter; they ought either to resume them all, or to bring all concerned in them to an equal composition: he therefore could not approve of this Bill, which, by a very clear consequence, would put it in the power of a fellow-subject, to resume or to cover Grants, at his pleasure; and so it would put the persons, concerned in the Grants, into too great a dependence on him."

The Lord Treasurer answered, "That no one had reason to be alarmed at the Bill, since the intent of it was only to examine the value of the Grants made by king William, and upon what considerations they were given; but that as it was presumed, those, who enjoyed them had rendered very signal service to their country, so it was not to be doubted, but the parliament would confirm the same."

The Earl of Wharton replied, "That it was also to be presumed, that those, who enjoyed the Grants of king Charles the second, and king James the second, might have likewise done important service to the nation: wherefore it would be very proper to look into the motives of all those grants, in order to confirm them to those who had deserved them."

The Earl of Oxford said, "That he had been informed, that the Commons had no design absolutely to resume the Grants of king William, but only to make the possessors pay the value of four or five years rent, for which they should have the Grants confirmed to them for ever." To which,

The Earl of Wharton again replied, "That he would not call in question what a lord of such probity and sincerity had advanced; but that the resumption of all the Grants of Ireland sufficiently shewed, that the Commons had not been content with a part."

Several other speeches, that were made on both sides, prolonged the debate till between six and seven in the evening, when the question being put, that the bill do pass, it appeared upon the gathering of the votes, that there were 78 voices on each side, 53 present, and 25 proxies for the affirmative; and 52 present, and 26 proxies for the negative; so the Votes being equal, by the rule of the house, the negative carried it, to the great disappointment of the enemies of the Revolution. It was observed that the loss of this Bill was in a great measure owing to the vigilance of the late duke of Portland. He being informed, that the lord

Colepepper had sent his proxy to the earl Sunderland, who by reason of his indisposition could not produce it, immediately dispatched an express to the lord Colepepper, and he sent his proxy to another lord time enough to create part of the negative. On the other hand, many were of opinion, that had not the duke of Buckingham and the earl of Strafford absent themselves from the house, the Bill had certainly passed.*

"* Upon an occasion offered about the time, some persons, out of distrust to the Treasurer, endeavoured to obtain a point, which could not have been carried without putting us into confusion. A bill was brought into the House of Commons, appointing Commissioners to examine into the value of all lands and other interests granted by the crown since the 13th of February, 1688, and upon what considerations such Grants had been made. The united country-interest in the House was extremely set upon passing this Bill. They had conceived an opinion from former precedents, that the court would certainly oppose all steps towards a resumption of Grants; and those who were apprehensive that the Treasurer declined the same way, proposed the bill should be tacked to another, for raising a fund of duties upon soap and paper; which hath been always imputed whether justly or no, as a favourite expedient of those called the  Tory party. At the same time it was very well known that the House of Lords had made a fixed and unanimous Resolution against giving their concurrence to the passing such united bills: so that the consequences of this project must have been to bring the ministry under difficulties, to stop the necessary supplies and endanger the good correspondence between both Houses; notwithstanding all which the majority carried it for a tack; and the committee was instructed accordingly to make the two Bills into one, whereby the worst that could happen would have followed, if the Treasurer had not convinced the warm leaders in this affair, by undeniable reasons, that the means they were using would certainly disappoint the end; that neither himself, nor any other of the queen's servants were at all against this enquiry; and he promised his utmost credit to help forward the Bill in the House of Lords. He prevailed at last to have it sent up single; but their lordships gave it another kind of reception. Those who were of the side opposite to the court, withstood it to a man, as in a party case: among the rest some very personally concerned, and others by friends and relations which they supposed a sufficient excuse to be absent, or dissent. Even those whose grants were antecedent to this intended inspection began to be alarmed as men, whose neighbours houses are on fire. A shew of zeal for the late king's honour, occasioned many reflections upon the date of this enquiry, which was to commence with his reign: and the earl of Nottingham, who had

Debate on the State of the Campaign.] May 12. The queen came to the house of peers, and gave the royal assent to the Money-Bills and others. As the earl of Strafford was now in London, it was expected, the queen would have laid before the parliament a state of the Negotiations of Peace which had been carrying on at the Hague. But, some points not being yet settled between the British and French courts, he did not think fit to make a speech to both houses. However, the Speaker, at presenting the Lottery-bill, said, in his compliment to the queen, "Your faithful Commons are in hopes, that what they have so cheerfully given, for your majesty's occasions, will enable your majesty to put an end to the present war by safe and honourable peace." There being no account come of any peace, as soon as the Commons were returned to their House, Mr. Benson, now flung away the mask which he lately pulled off, like one who had no other view but that of vengeance against the queen and her friends, acted consistently enough with his design, by voting as a lord against the Bill, after he had directed his son in the House of Commons to vote for the tack.

"Thus miscarried this popular Bill for appointing Commissioners into Royal Grants; but whether those chiefly concerned did rightly consult their own interest hath been made a question, which perhaps time will resolve. It was agreed that the queen by her own authority, might have issued out a commission for such an enquiry, and every body believed that the intention of the parliament was only to tax the grants with about three years purchase, and at the same time establish the proprietors in possession of the remainder for ever; so that, upon the whole, the grantees would have been great gainers by such an act, since the titles of those lands, as they stood then, were hardly of half value with others either for sale or settlement. Besides the examples of the Irish forfeitures might have taught these precarious owners, that when the House of Commons hath once engaged in a pursuit which they think is right, although it be stopped or suspended for a while, they will be sure to renew it upon every opportunity that offers, and seldom fail of success: for instance, if the resumption should happen to be made part of a supply, which can be easily done without the objection of a tack, the grantees might possibly then have much harder conditions given them; and I do not see how they could prevent it. Whether the resuming of Royal Grants be consistent with good policy or justice would be too long a discussion: besides, the profusion of kings is not like to be a grievance for the future, because there have been laws since made to provide against that evil, of indeed rather because the crown has nothing left to give away. But the objection made against the date of the intended enquiry was invidious and trifling; for King James 2, made very few grants: he was a better manager, - and squandering was Chancellor of the Exchequer, afterwards lord Bingley, moved, that the call of the House (which had been several times put off) might be adjourned to the 4th of June, when he did not doubt but the queen would lay before them the result of the present negotiations.

Mr. Hampden complained, saying, "Notwithstanding all the promises given from time to time to the Commons, we have an unactive and lazy campaign, and a trifling negotiation of peace; so that we are amused by our ministers at home, and tricked by our enemies abroad."

Mr. Secretary St. John had too great a share in the management of affairs not to resent these insinuations; and said with some emotion, "That they highly reflected on her majesty, and her ministers. But though some members had been sent to the Tower for less none of his faults; whereas the late king, who came over here a perfect stranger to our laws and to our people, regardless of posterity, wherein he was not likely to survive, thought he could no way better strengthen a new title than by purchasing friends at the expence of every thing which was in his power to part with.

"The reasonableness of uniting to a Money Bill one of a different nature, which is usually called tacking, hath been likewise much debated and will admit of argument enough. In ancient times when a parliament was held, the Commons first proposed their grievances to be redressed, and then gave their aids; so that it was a perfect bargain between the king and the subject. This fully answered the ends of tacking. Aids were then demanded upon occasions which would hardly pass at present; such for instance, as those for making the king's son a knight, marrying his eldest daughter, and some others of the like sort. Most of the money went into the king's coffers for his private use; neither was he accountable for any part of it. Hence arose the form of the king's thanking his subjects for their benevolence, when any subsidies, tenths, or fifteenths, were given him: but the supplies now granted are of another nature and cannot be properly called a particular benefit to the crown, because they are all appropriated to their several uses: so that when the House of Commons tack to a Money-Bill what is foreign and hard to be digested, if it be not passed, they put themselves and their country in as great difficulties as the prince. On the other side, there have been several regulations made through the course of time, in parliamentary proceedings; among which it is grown a rule, that a bill once rejected shall not be brought up again the same session; whereby the Commons seem to have lost the advantage of purchasing a redress of their grievances by granting supplies, which upon some emergencies, hath put them upon this expedient of tacking: so that there is more to be said on each side of the case, than is convenient for me to trouble the reader or myself in deducing." Swift's Four Last Years.

offences, and that he, who spoke last, might be fond of that honour, yet he hoped the House would be of another opinion."

Sir Richard Onslow replied, "That to suppose her majesty, or her ministers to have any influence on the deliberations of that House, was injurious to her majesty, and a violation of the privileges of that House."

In which he was seconded by Mr. Lechmere. But the debate went no further, in consideration, as the friends of the prevailing party suggested, that, the session drawing to an end, the commitment of a member at that time would rather be a pride than a mortification to him. And so, according to the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the call of the House was put off till the 4th of June.

May 28. Mr. Pulteney moved, That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, "That her faithful Commons are justly alarmed at the intelligences received from abroad, that her general in Flanders has declined to act offensively against France, in concurrence with her Allies; and being under the deepest concern for the dangerous consequences which must arise from thence to the common cause, do with all humility beseech her majesty, that speedy instructions may be given to her General in Flanders, to prosecute the War with the utmost vigour, in conjunction with her Allies, as the best means to obtain a safe and honourable peace for her majesty, and all of them; and to quiet the minds of the people, who cannot, but be extremely apprehensive of the fatal consequences of such a division." But after a debate, in which Mr. Secretary gave assurances much to the same purpose as the Lord High-Treasurer had done in the House of Lords, the motion being formed into question, and the question put, it was carried in the negative, by a majority of 203 voices against 73.

Resolution for putting an entire Confidence in the Queen.] After which it was resolved, "That this House hath an entire confidence in her majesty's most gracious promise, to communicate to her parliament the terms of the Peace before the same shall be concluded; and that they will support her majesty in obtaining an honourable and safe Peace, against all such persons, either at home or abroad, who have endeavoured and shall endeavour to obstruct the same: And that the said Resolution be laid before her majesty by the whole House."

The Queen's Answer thereto.] The said Resolution being accordingly laid before the queen, on the 30th, her majesty was pleased to return this Answer:

"Gentlemen, I thank you most heartily for this Resolution, which is dutiful to me, honest to your country, and very seasonable at this time, when so many artifices are used to obstruct a good Peace, or to force one disadvantageous to Britain."

Debate in the Lords on the Duke of Ormond's declining to fight.] May 27. The Lord Halifax acquainted the House of Peers, "That he had matters of great importance to lay before them;" and desired, that the members might be summoned to attend the service of the House the next day. The Peers being in a full House on the 28th of May, the lord Halifax made a speech, wherein he first took notice of the strange declaration made in the army by the duke of Ormond: then shewed the ill consequences of such a proceeding, and the necessity of carrying on the war with vigour; and concluded with a motion for an Address, "humbly to desire her majesty to lay before the House the Orders she had sent to the General, and to order him to act offensively in concert with the Allies." When he had done speaking, some objections were raised as to the matter of fact; but though the lord Halifax did not want proofs, having among other a copy of prince Eugene's Letter, yet he did not think proper to produce it; and some whet Whig lords contented themselves with pressing those in the ministry to acquaint the House. Whether any orders of restraint had been sent to the duke of Ormond?

The Lord Treasurer, who was most concerned in this affair, answered, "That they, who had the honour to serve the queen, could not reveal the orders she gave to her General, without a particular direction from her majesty; and that, in his opinion, those orders were not fit to be divulged. That however, he would adventure to say, that, if the duke of Ormond had refused to act offensively, he could not doubt, but he had followed his instructions, and it was prudence not to hazard a battle upon the point of concluding a good peace, especially considering they had to deal with an enemy so apt to break his word."*

The Earl of Whartow said, "He was extremely glad to find that noble lord so candid, as to acknowledge the insincerity of France: But that, in his opinion, this was a strong reason for keeping no measures with such an enemy, but rather for pushing him with the utmost vigour, till he was reduced to the necessity of dealing honestly."

The Lord Treasurer replied, "Though the duke of Ormond might have refused to hazard a general action, yet he could be positive, he would not decline joining with the Allies in a siege, orders having been sent him for that purpose."

* "May 31. I believe the news of the duke of Ormond, producing letters in the Council of War, with orders not to fight, will surprise you in Ireland. Lord Treasurer said in the House of Lords, that in a few days the treaty of peace should be laid before them; and our court thought it wrong to hazard a battle, and sacrifice many lives in such a juncture. If the peace holds, all will do well, otherwise I know not how we shall weather it. And it was reckoned as a wrong step in politics for lord Treasurer to open himself so much. The Secretary would not go so far to satisfy the Whigs in the House of Commons; but these all went swimmingly." Swift's Journal.

The Duke of Marlborough said, "He did not know how to reconcile the orders, not to hazard a battle, and to join in a siege, to the rules of war; since it was impossible to make a siege, without either hazarding a battle, in case the enemy attempted to relieve the place, or shamefully raising the siege."

The Duke of Argyle, on the other hand excused the orders given to the duke of Ormond, and, among other things, said, "That in his opinion, since the time of Julius Cæsar, there had not been a greater captain than prince Eugene of Savoy: but that, nevertheless, considering the different interests of the house of Austria and of Great Britain, it might not consist with prudence to trust him with the management of the war, because a battle, won or lost, might intirely break off a negotiation of Peace, which, in all probability, was near being concluded. That, according to his knowledge, nothing was more uncertain than the issue of a battle, where victory was still wavering, and so often changed sides, that they, who, after five or six successful charges, thought themselves sure of gaining the day, had at last been routed and put to flight. Adding, that two years before the confederates might have taken Arras or Cambray, instead of amusing themselves with the insignificant conquests of Aire, Bethune, and St. Venant."

The Earl of Nottingham declared on the other side, "That he could not comprehend why orders had been given to our General not to fight, unless certain persons were apprehensive of weakening the French, so far as to disable them to assist them in bringing about designs, which they durst not yet own."

The Duke of Devonshire said on the same side, "That, by the proximity of blood, he was more concerned for the duke of Ormond's reputation than any other; and therefore he could not forbear declaring, he was surprised to see any one dare to make a nobleman of the first rank, and of so distinguished a character, the instrument of such a proceeding."

The Earl Pawlet answered, "That no body could doubt of the duke of Ormond's courage and bravery; but that he was not like a certain General, who led troops to the slaughter, to cause a great number of officers to be knocked on the head in a battle, or against stone walls, in order to fill his pockets, by disposing of their commissions."

This reflection, so visibly levelled at the duke of Marlborough, could not but very sensibly affect him; but he restrained his resentment for a while, and remained silent*. On the other and,

The Lord Cowper made a long speech, wherein he complained of their being kept so long in the dark about the progress of a negotiation of Peace; and some other Whig Lords having pressed the earl of Strafford to give the House an account of it, he excused himself, as not having the queen's orders for it. But,

The Lord Treasurer assured them, "That in a few days, her majesty, according to her promise, would lay before her parliament the conditions, which he doubted not would give intire satisfaction to every member of that house, and to all true Englishmen." Some Lords having declared their apprehensions of a separate peace, the Treasurer assured them, "that nothing of that nature was ever intended; and that such a Peace would be so base, so knavish, and so villainous a thing, that every one, who served the queen, knew they must answer it with their heads to the nation; but that it would appear to be a safe and a glorious peace, much more to the honour and interest of the nation, than the preliminaries that were agreed to three years before. He also affirmed, that the allies knew of it, and were satisfied with it."

The Lord Halifax, observing the disposition of the house, would have dropped his motion, without dividing: but the court-party, being sure of a majority, insisted to have the question for adjourning the debate; which being carried in the affirmative by 68 voices against 40, 26 of the latter entered their protests against the Orders given to the duke of Ormond. This point being gained, the earl of asked my lord Mohun, Whether he brought him a challenge? To which he answered, That his message wanted no explanation, and that he would accompany the duke of Marlborough. The earl Pawlet being returned home, with some emotion, and having given his lady a hint of what had passed, the earl of Dartmouth, secretary of state, was soon acquainted with it; and went immediately to the duke of Marlborough, and desired him not to stir abroad. At the same time, his lordship caused two centries to be placed at the earl Pawlet's house; and, having informed the queen of the whole affair, her majesty sent him back to the duke of Marlborough, to desire him, that this might go no further. His grace gave his word of honour, that he would comply with her majesty's commands: but, though this quarrel ended without bloodshed, yet many began to apprehend the consequences of the heats and animosities of the two parties, which daily increased. The duke of Marlborough was afterwards severely censured 'for setting the example of party-duels:' but, on the other hand, the tongues of most people were very free with the duke of Ormond; and, to this purpose, we may take notice, that, an alehouse-keeper in Westminster, having, either for a jest sake, or out of mere simplicity, set up for his sign his grace's head, with this inscription, the 'General of Peace, the government ordered the same to be taken down.' Tiadal.

* "As soon as the House was up, the lord John went to the earl Pawlet, and told him, that the duke of Marlborough desired to have an eclairsissement with his lordship, about some expressions he had used in that day's debate: and therefore desired him to go and take the air in the country. The earl, who readily understood the meaning of such an eclairsissement, Strafford suggested, "That, before the house entered upon the negotiation of Utrecht, they would do well to examine into those of the Hague and Gertruydenburg; upon which he would communicate to them two observations he had made during his residence in Holland: First, that, at the Hague the French ministers conferred only with the pensionary, who, having made his report to the States-general, communicated no more of it to the ministers of the allies, than what was judged proper to let them know; so that the Dutch were absolute masters of the secret of that negotiation, as they were afterwards of that of Gertruydenburg. Secondly, that the States-general had consented to give Naples and Sicily to king Philip; which shewed even at that time, that the recovery of the whole monarchy of Spain was looked upon as impracticable." He said he had his information from one of the two, who had been employed in those conferences; by which it was plain that he meant Buys. He concluded with a motion for addressing her majesty, "That she would be pleased to cause the Papers relating to the Negotiations of the Hague and Gertruydenburg to be laid before the House;" which was carried without dividing. But nothing followed upon this; for it was said to be designed only to amuse the House.

Protest against the Orders for not fighting.]

It was observed before, That seven Lords protested against the Orders produced by the duke of Ormond, not to act offensively against the French. Not many days after, the said Protest was published in print, containing in substance, "1. That their lordships conceived, such an order as was proposed in the question, to be absolutely necessary, because they were convinced that the duke of Ormond lay under some order of restraint from acting offensively, not only from the accounts which were public both here and in Holland, of his declaring it to prince Eugene and to the deputies of the States, at their late consultation, when both prince Eugene and those deputies earnestly pressed him to join in attacking the French army, which was then known to be much inferior to that of the allies, both in the number and condition of their troops, but also that nothing of this whole matter was denied by those lords, who had the means of knowing these facts, as undoubtedly would have been without scruple, had not the said facts been true; since no scruple was made of acquainting the house with a subsequent order very lately sent to the duke of Ormond, allowing him to join in a siege: which was a further evidence that he had before some order of restraint, for otherwise this last order would be unnecessary and absurd; it being a general, constant, and standing instruction to every Commander in Chief, by land or sea, to do his utmost endeavour to annoy the enemy. And it is manifest by this last order, that even in the opinion of the ministers, it was expedient to take off this restraint, to some degree; and the leaving the duke of Ormond still under a restraint from giving battle to the French, seemed most unaccountable, and inconsistent with the liberty indulged to him of joining in a siege, and rendered it altogether useless; for no place, when taken, could be of such advantage to the allies as Cambray, which offered a free passage for our army into the heart of France; and it was impossible to besiege that place, without dislodging the French from their encampment; and this was also impossible, if the French would keep their ground. Other attempts seemed to be of little use, but might serve to give the French time, which they did not want skill to improve.—2dly, That they conceived it would be derogatory to her majesty's honour, to public faith, and that justice which was due to her majesty's allies; and that it was a sort of imposing upon our allies a cessation of arms, without their consent, and in the most prejudicial manner, because they were not so much as acquainted with it, and so might have been led into great difficulties; besides that, it frustrated all essential advantages against the common enemy, which might be of fatal consequence to this nation and to Europe.—3dly, Because it was acknowledged that a General Peace was not concluded, as indeed it was very unlikely it should be, there having been no answer in writing given by the French to the specific demands of the allies, though the same were delivered to the French three months ago: and it was further declared, there was no Separate Peace, nay, that such a Peace would be foolish, knavish, and villainous. And, therefore, while we were in war, and having no security of a Peace, their lordships conceived that such an order of restraint was a plain neglect of all those happy opportunities which Providence might, and lately did, put into our hands, of subduing our enemy, and forcing him to a just and honourable Peace. And surely it was imprudent and dangerous to rely on the promises of France, which were so far from being any security that even a Peace would not be safe, in their opinion, unless it be such as gave so full satisfaction to the allies, that they should be willing to join with us in a mutual Guaranty of it.—That her majesty having with great wisdom declared to this parliament, That the best means of obtaining a good Peace was to make early preparations for War, and a vigorous prosecution of it: and since the parliament had with great duty and deference to her majesty, and a just zeal for the interests of their country, and of Europe, given very great supplies for that purpose. Their lordships conceived that such an order of restraint, being very different from that declaration of her majesty, must be the effect of very ill advice; by which the parliament's good intention would be defeated, and all those heavy loads of taxes, which they have for so good purposes cheerfully given, rendered fruitless and unnecessary; and might, in conclusion, after having thus trifled away our wealth and time, bring us into the necessity of accepting such a Peace, as it should please an insolent and domineering enemy to give us."

This Protest was also published abroad in French and other languages; and the names of the peers who signed it were the dukes of Devonshire, Marlborough, Rutland, Bolton, Montagu, and Somerset; the marquis of Dorchester; the earls of Wharton, Derby, Nottingham, Bridgewater, Godolphin, Carlisle, Orford, and Scarborough; the lord viscount Townshend; the lords bishops of Oxford, Sarum, Bangor, and St. Asaph; and the lords Rockingham, Cowper, Haversham, Mohun, and Halifax.

Bill to restrain the Licentiousness of the Press.] June 2. Sir Gilbert Dolben reported from the committee of the whole house, to whom it was referred to consider of that part of her majesty's Message to this house, the 17th of January last, which relates to the great Licence taken in publishing false and scandalous Libels, the Resolutions which they had directed him to report to the house: viz.

"1. That the great liberty taken in printing and publishing false, scandalous, and impious Libels, creates division among her majesty's subjects, tends to the disturbance of the public peace, to the increase of immorality, profaneness, and irreligion, and is highly prejudicial to her majesty, and her government. 2. That the want of a due regulation of the Press, is a great occasion of the said mischief. 3. That all Printing-Presses be registered with the names of the owners, and their places of abode. 4. That to every book, pamphlet, and paper which shall be printed, there be set the Name and the place of abode of the Author, Printer and Publisher thereof. 5. That no Bookseller, or other person, shall sell or disperse any book, pamphlet, or paper, to which the name and place of abode of the Author, Printer, and Publisher shall not be set." The Commons ordered a Bill to be brought in upon the said Resolutions.

The Queen's Speech containing the Plan of the Peace.] June 6. The queen came to the House of Peers with the usual solemnity, and having given the royal assent to several bills, her majesty made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The making peace and war is the undoubted prerogative of the crown; yet such is the confidence I place in you, that, at the opening of this session, I acquainted you, that a negotiation for a General Peace was begun, and afterwards, by messages, I promised to communicate to you the terms of peace, before the same should be concluded.—In pursuance of that promise, I now come to let you know, upon what terms a General Peace may be made.—I need not mention the difficulties which arise from the very nature of this affair, and it is 'but too apparent, that these difficulties might have been increased by other obstructions, artfully contrived to hinder this great and good work.—Nothing however has moved me from steadily pursuing, in the first place, the true interest of my own kingdoms, and I have not omitted any thing which might procure to all our allies what is due to them by treaties, and what is necessary for their security.—The assuring of the Protestant Succession, as by law established, in the house of Hanover, to these kingdoms, being what I have nearest at heart, particular care is taken, not only to have that acknowledged in the strongest terms, but to have an additional security, by the removal of that person out of the dominions of France, who has pretended to disturb this settlement.—The apprehension that Spain and the West Indies might be united to France, was the chief inducement to begin this war, and the effectual preventing of such an union, was the principle I laid down at the commencement of this treaty.—Former examples and the late negotiations sufficiently shew, how difficult it is to find means to accomplish this work. I would not content myself with such as are speculative; or depend on treaties only; I insisted on what is solid, and to have at hand the power of executing what should be agreed.—I can therefore now tell you, That France at last is brought to offer, that the duke of Anjou shall, for himself, and his descendants, renounce for ever all claim to the crown of France. And that this important article may be exposed to no hazard, the performance is to accompany the promise.—At the same time, the succession to the crown of France is to be declared, after the death of the present Dauphin and his sons, to be in the duke of Berry and his sons, in the duke of Orleans and his sons, and so on to the rest of the house of Bourbon.—As to Spain and the Indies, the succession to those dominions, after the duke of Anjou and his children, is to descend to such a prince as shall be agreed upon at the treaty, for ever excluding the rest of the house of Bourbon.—For confirming the renunciations and settlements before mentioned, it is further offered, That they shall be ratified in the most strong and solemn manner, both in France and Spain; and that those kingdoms, as well as all the other powers engaged in the present war, shall be guarantees to the same.—The nature of this proposal is such, that it executeth itself. The interest of Spain is to support it, and in France, the persons to whom that succession is to belong, will be ready and powerful enough to vindicate their own right. France and Spain are now more effectually divided than ever. And thus, by the blessing of God, will a real balance of power be fixed in Europe, and remain liable to as few accidents as human affairs can be exempted from.—A Treaty of Commerce between these kingdoms and France has been entered upon, but the excessive duties laid on some goods, and the prohibitions of others, make it impossible to finish this work so soon as it were to be desired. Care is however taken to establish a method of settling this matter, and in the mean time provision is made, that the same privileges and advantages as shall be granted to any other nation by France, shall be granted in like manner to us.—The division of the island of St. Christopher between us and the French, having been the cause of great inconvenience and damage to my subjects, I have demanded to have an absolute cession made to me of that whole island; and France agrees to this demand.—Our interest is so deeply concerned in the trade of North America, that I have used my utmost endeavours to adjust that article in the most beneficial manner. France consents to restore to us the whole bay and straits of Hudson; to deliver up the island of Newfoundland, with Placentia, and to make an absolute cession of Annapolis, with the rest of Nova Scotia, or Acadia.—The safety of our home trade will be better provided for by the demolition of Dunkirk.—Our Mediterranean Trade, and the British interest and influence in those parts, will be secured by the possession of Gibraltar and Port Mahon, with the whole island of Minorca, which are offered to remain in my hands.—The trade to Spain and to the West Indies, may in general be settled, as it was in the time of the late king of Spain, Charles the second, and a particular provision be made, That all advantages, rights or privileges, which have been granted, or which may hereafter be granted by Spain to any other nation shall be in like manner granted to the subjects of Great-Britain.—But the part which we have borne in prosecution of this war entitling us to some distinction in the terms of peace, I have insisted and obtained, that the assiento or contract for furnishing the Spanish West Indies with Negroes, shall be made with us for the term of 30 years, in the manner as it has been enjoy'd by the French for these 10 years past.—I have not taken upon me to determine the interests of our confederates; these must be adjusted in the congress at Utrecht, where my best endeavours shall be employed as they have hitherto been, to procure to every one of them all justice and reasonable satisfaction. In the mean time, I think it proper to acquaint you, that France offers to make the Rhine the Barrier to the Empire; to yield Brisac, the fort of Kehl, and Landau, and to raze all the fortresses, both on the other side of the Rhine, and in that river.—As to the Protestant interest in Germany, there will be, on the part of France, no objection to the resettling thereof on the foot of the treaty of Westphalia.—The Spanish Low-countries may go to his imperial majesty; the kingdoms of Naples and Sardinia, the duchy of Milan, and the places belonging to Spain on the coast of Tuscany, may likewise be yielded to the emperor by the Treaty of Peace.—As to the kingdom of Sicily, though there remains no dispute concerning the Cession of it by the duke of Anjou, yet the disposition thereof is not yet determined. The interests of the States-General, with respect to commerce, are agreed to, as they have been demanded by their own ministers, with the exception only of some very few species of merchandize, and the entire Barrier, as demanded by the States in 1709 from France, except two or three places at most.—As to these exceptions several expedients have been proposed, and I make no doubt but this Barrier may be so settled, as to render that republic perfectly secure against any enterprise on the part of France, which is the foundation of all my engagements upon this head with the States.—The demands of Portugal depending on the disposition of Spain, and that Article having been long in dispute, it has not been yet possible to make any considerable progress therein; but my plenipotentiaries will now have an opportunity to assist that king in his pretensions.—Those of the king of Prussia are such as I hope will admit of little difficulty on the part of France, and my utmost endeavours shall not be wanting to procure all I am able to so good an ally.—The difference between the Barrier demanded for the duke of Savoy in 1709 and the offers now made by France, is very inconsiderable; but, that prince having so signally distinguished himself in the service of the common cause, I am endeavouring to procure for him still further advantages.—France has consented, that the Elector Palatine shall continue his present rank among the electors, and remain in possession of the Upper Palatinate.—The electoral dignity is likewise acknowledged in the House of Hanover, according to the Article inserted, at that prince's desire, in my demands.—And as to the rest of the allies, I make no doubt of being able to secure their several interests.

“ I have now communicated to you, not only the terms of peace, which may, by the future treaty, be obtained for my own subjects: but likewise the proposals of France for satisfying our allies.—The former are such as I have reason to expect, to make my people some amends for that great and unequal burden which they have lain under through the whole course of this war: and I am willing to hope, that none of our confederates, and especially those to whom so great accessions of dominion and power are to accrue by this peace, will envy Britain her share in the glory and advantage of it.—The latter are not yet so perfectly adjusted, as a little more time might have rendered them: but the season of the year making it necessary to put an end to this session, I resolved no longer to defer communicating these matters to you.—I can make no doubt but you are all fully persuaded, that nothing will be neglected, on my part, in the progress of this negotiation, to bring the Peace to a happy and speedy issue: and I depend on your entire confidence in me, and your cheerful concurrence with me.” *

* “ This Speech occasioned a general surprize: so that the public funds, which upon, the expectation of better conditions of peace, had that morning risen four or five per cent, fell immediately to their former value. It was now easy to discern, what reasons induced some persons to keep secret the result of the negotia-

The Commons' Address of Thanks.] The Commons being returned to their House, and one or two members opening their mouths, to propose the taking the important matters mentioned in her majesty's Speech, into consideration, they were presently stopped by a general cry for an Address of thanks; Whereupon, the following Address was agreed to nem. con.

"Most gracious Sovereign:

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects the Commons of Great-Britain in parliament assembled, beg leave most humbly to acknowledge your majesty's great condescension, in communicating to us the terms upon which a General Peace may be made. Our hearts are full of gratitude for what your majesty has already done, and we want words to express the satisfaction, with which we have received all that your majesty has been pleased to impart to your Commons. We have an entire confidence in your majesty, that you will steadily pursue the true interest of your own kingdoms, and that you will endeavour to procure for all your allies what is due to them by treaties, and what is necessary for their security. These assurances are the least returns which your faithful Commons can make to so much condescension and goodness; and they humbly desire your majesty, that you will please to proceed in the present negociations, for the obtaining a speedy Peace."

The Queen's Answer.] This Address being, on the 9th, presented to her majesty, by the whole House, she was pleased to return the following Answer:

"I have the safety and interest of all my people so much at heart, that I cannot but take a great deal of pleasure in this your dutiful and prudent Address; and thank you most kindly for it. I have studied your welfare, and by this you will find the good effects of that confidence which you place in me, and which ought always to remain between so affectionate a prince, and such faithful subjects."

Proceedings of the Lords on the Queen's Speech.] Things went not so smoothly in the House of Lords. As soon as the Queen was withdrawn, a motion being made for an Address of thanks, the earl of Wharton said, "They had all the reason in the world to do it, especially for that part of her majesty's Speech, wherein she was pleased to declare, That the tion between Great-Britain and France; for if such a plan had been communicated to the parliament, before a majority had been secured in both Houses, and the minds of the people prepared by a long train of artful and plausible insinuations, it would, in all probability, have been exploded with indignation. But by the dexterity of the prime managers things were brought to such a pass, that though, in the House of Commons, one or two members proposed the taking the important matters, mentioned in her majesty's speech, into consideration, they were presently silenced by a general cry for an Address of thanks." Tindal.

assuring the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover to these kingdoms, was what she had nearest at heart. But that her majesty's Speech containing many other particulars of the greatest consequence, he was opinion, the House would do well to take it into serious consideration the next day;" which was readily agreed to. Accordingly, on the 7th of June

The Earl of Wharton* proposed, that the letter from the States-General to the queen, inserted in the supplement to the Amsterdam French Gazette, which arrived that very morning, might be read. But this was opposed, it being suggested, that the House ought not to take notice of a writing, that carried no authority with it. After this the Lords took the queen's Speech into consideration, which occasioned a warm debate. Among the rest,

The Duke of Marlborough represented, "That the measures pursued in England, for a year past, were directly contrary to her majesty's engagements with the allies, sullied the triumphs and glories of her reign, and would render the English name odious to all other nations."

The Earl of Strafford said, "That some of the allies (meaning the Dutch) would not shew such backwardness to a peace, as they had hitherto done, but for a member of that illustrious assembly (meaning the duke of Marlborough) who maintained a secret correspondence with, and endeavoured to persuade them to carry on the war; feeding them with hopes, that they should be supported by a strong party here."

The Lord Cowper answered this speech; and, because the earl of Strafford had not expressed himself with all the purity of the English tongue, he took occasion to say, "That noble Lord had been so long abroad, that he had almost forgot, not only the language, but the constitution of his own country. That, according to our laws, it could never be suggested as a crime in the meanest subject, much less in any member of that august assembly, to hold correspondence with our allies; such allies especially, whose interest her majesty had declared to be inseparable from her own, in her speech at the opening of this session; whereas it would be a hard matter to justify and reconcile, either with our laws, or the laws of honour and justice, the conduct of some persons in treating clandestinely with the common enemy, without the participation of the allies."

The Lords took afterwards into consideration the advantages offered by France to Great-

"June 17. Lord Wharton is gone out of town in a rage, and curses himself and friends for ruining themselves in defending lord Marlborough and Godolphin, and taking Nottingham into favour. He swears he will meddle no more during this reign; a pretty speech at 66, and the queen is near twenty years younger, and now in very good health." Swift's Journal.

Britain, particularly in settling the trade to Spain, and to the West Indies, as it was in the time of the late king of Spain Charles the 2d. To this purpose,

The Earl of Godolphin said, "That he did not pretend to any great knowledge in trade; but that, during the time he had the honour to be in the administration of affairs, he had observed, and he could easily make it out by the books of the Custom-house, that the single trade to Portugal brought to England, in times of war, double the wealth of the trade to Spain, in times of peace: so that, whatever might be suggested, to cast a mist before the eyes of the people, it was to be presumed that the trade to Spain would still yield less for the future, because the French had made themselves absolute masters of it."

After some other speeches, a motion was made, "That an Address be presented to her majesty, to return her the thanks of this House for her most gracious speech, and for her extraordinary condescension in communicating to her parliament the terms, upon which a General Peace might be made: and to express the intire satisfaction of that House in her great care for securing the Protestant Succession in the house of Hanover; and for her steady pursuing the true interest of her own kingdoms; and for endeavouring to procure to her allies what was due to them by treaties; and to assure her, that this House did intirely rely on her wisdom to finish this great and good work." Some exceptions were made to the words 'intirely rely;' and the House was moved, as the House of Commons had likewise been upon the same occasion, That these words might be added, "And in order to that, that her majesty would take such measures, in concert with her allies, as might induce them to join with her majesty in a mutual Guaranty." This occasioned a debate, in which the Lord-Treasurer and earl Pawlet spoke against that addition, and the earl of Nottingham and the lord Cowper for it. It was urged in opposition to this clause, that it would subject the queen and the whole treaty to the pleasure of the allies, who might prove backward and intractable: and, since England had borne the greatest share of the burthen of the war, it was reasonable that the queen should be the arbiter of the peace. On the other hand it was said, that if the allies did not enter into a guaranty, we must depend on the faith of the French, and be at their mercy, and so have nothing to trust to, but the promises of a court, noted, in a course of years, for a train of perfidy. But many had formed an obstinate resolution to get out of the war on any terms; and therefore nothing, that seemed to obstruct the arriving speedily at that end, was heard with patience, and no regard was had to the faith of treaties. The question being at last put, Whether the clause should be added? It was resolved in the negative by 81 voices against 36.

The reasons of this great majority were then said to be, 1st, Because the Próxies, of which the Anti-Court lords had more than the other side, were not called for; and 2dly, Because several Peers did not think fit, on that occasion, to vote against the Court.

The Queen's Answer to the Lords' Address. June 10. The Lords presented their Address to the Queen, which, besides the ordinary i.e.d. contained nothing but the motion before-mentioned; and to which her majesty was pleased to return this Answer:

"I most heartily thank you for this Address: The satisfaction you express in what I have laid before you, will contribute very much to remove the difficulties which have arisen in the course of this negociation. And the confidence you place in me will enable me better to finish this great work, for the advantage of my own people, and the safety and interest of my allies."

Protest against rejecting the Guaranty Clause, in the Lords' Address. Several Lords entered a Protest against the rejecting of the Guaranty Clause, offered to be added at the close of the motion for an Address, and signed their Reasons for it, which were soon after published in print as follows:

"We think it necessary to have the security propos'd of a general Guaranty, and the rather, because we conceive the terms of peace that are offer'd, have proceeded from a separate negociation, carried on by the ministers with France, without any communication thereof to the principal allies, particularly the States-General, as they say in the letter to her majesty. (whose interest her majesty was pleas'd to declare to this parliament, she look'd upon as inseparable from her own) and we conceive this negociation to be contrary to those orders which her majesty declar'd to this House, in answer to their Address, that she had given to her plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, to concert with those of her allies; and the resolution express'd in her Message, January the 17th, of a strict union, in which she propos'd to join with them, in order to obtain a good peace, and to guaranty and support the same, as she had before declar'd in her speech at the opening of this session; that she would unite with them in the strictest engagements for continuing the alliance, in order to render the General Peace secure and lasting; and contrary to the 8th Article of the Grand Alliance, which expressly obliges all the allies not to treat, unless jointly, and with the common advice of the other parties.

"And we conceive that the refusal of these words propos'd to be added, may be look'd upon by the allies, as if this House approv'd this method of transacting with France, which may seem to them to tend to a Separate Peace, of which her majesty has declar'd her dislike, and which was acknowledg'd in this House to be foolish and knavish, and would be of pernicious consequence to this kingdom, by preventing that Guaranty of Peace by the allies, which is so absolutely necessary for their mutual security, and leave us expos'd to the power of France, there being little reason to expect their future help, after such a gross breach of trust.

“And we further conceive, that such a separation proceeding may create in the allies so great a distrust, as may tempt them to take the like measures, and to give the French opportunity to break that union, which has been hitherto so useful to us, and formidable to them; any appearance whereof must encourage France, either to delay the conclusion of a peace, or to impose upon the allies in the further progress of the treaty.

“A perfect union among the allies seems to us to be more necessary in the present case, because the foundation upon which all the offers of France, relating to Great Britain, as well as to the allies, are built, viz. a renunciation of the duke of Anjou to that kingdom, is, in our opinion, so fallacious, that no reasonable man, much less whole nations, can ever look upon it as any security. Experience may sufficiently convince us, how little we ought to rely upon the renunciation of the House of Bourbon, and though the present duke of Anjou should happen to think himself bound by his own act, which his grandfather did not, yet will his descendants be at liberty to say, that no act of his could deprive them of their birth-right, and especially when it is such a right, as, in the opinion of all Frenchmen, ought inviolably to be maintained, by the fundamental constitution of the kingdom of France.

“And we humbly think it unsafe to depend upon this principal part of the treaty's executing itself, by supposing it will be the interest of France to support it, since, on the contrary, it is manifest by the French endeavours, ever since the Pyrenean Treaty, to unite the monarchies of France and Spain, they look upon that Union to be their greatest interest, and the most effectual means of establishing the universal monarchy in the House of Bourbon.

“And if it were reasonable to imagine, that the two crowns of France and Spain should remain in distinct branches of the House of Bourbon; yet this is contrary to the Grand Alliance itself, which recites the usurpation of the Spanish monarchy by the French king, for the duke of Anjou, as the principal cause of his war.

“As to Port Mahon, Gibraltar, the Asiento, and the other advantages to Britain proposed by France, (besides that they are all precarious, and in the power of France and Spain to take from us when they please) considering the situation of those kingdoms, and the vast wealth and strength which will be left to them, we conceive it impossible for any man to look on those as a compensation to Britain in any degree, for the leaving Spain and the Indies in the possession of the House of Bourbon; which, besides other manifestly fatal consequences, must be extremely prejudicial to our woollen manufacture, if it does not entirely ruin it.

“As to the demolition of Dunkirk, though

we own it will be a great safety to our home-trade, yet we have reason to apprehend, by what was said in the debate, that it is not yet agreed to be demolished, without an equivalent for it to the French king's satisfaction.

“And in all the particulars relating to the allies, though they are not perfectly adjusted, yet by what does appear concerning them, the allies are likely to be left in such a state of insecurity, as is absolutely inconsistent with our own safety.

“The Rhine is proposed for a Barrier of the empire, which leaves Strasburgh and Hunninghen in the hands of the French; the former of which has always been looked upon as the key of the empire.

“The proposals of France relating to the Barrier for the States-General, not only deprive them of all the places taken since the year 1709, but also of two or three places more, included in the demand made by the States in that year, which will render their Barrier wholly insufficient, and consequently very much weaken the security of Britain.

“Portugal seems to be wholly abandoned to the power of Spain, notwithstanding the great advantages we have received during this war by our trade with that kingdom, which might still be extremely beneficial to us.

“Upon the whole, there is so very little and inconsiderable a difference between these Offers of France, and those made at Utrecht, February the 11th, N. S. and signed Huxelles, (as appear to us upon our comparing them together) that both seem to be the effect of a secret and particular negotiation with France; and this House having unanimously concurred, in expressing to her majesty their utmost resentment at those terms offered to her majesty and her allies, by the plenipotentiaries of France; and her majesty having graciously accepted that our Address, and rewarded that duty and zeal with her hearty Thanks, we cannot, in respect to her majesty, or justice to our country, retract that opinion, nor think the terms now good for us or the allies, or give any seeming approbation of them, which then were received by this House, and all the allies, with scorn and detestation.

“For these reasons, we are of opinion, that the offers of France are fallacious and ensnaring, no ways proportioned to the advantages which her majesty (from the great successes which it has pleased God to bless her and her allies, during the whole course of this war) might justly expect for her own kingdoms, and for them, very insufficient for preserving a balance of power in Europe, for the future security of her majesty and her allies, though they should be never so exactly performed; and yet, even such as they are, there is no effectual security offered for the performance of them, which makes it absolutely necessary, as we conceive, that such measures should be taken in concert with the allies, as may induce them to join with her majesty in a mutual guaranty. The said Protest ordered to be expunged out of the Books.] The majority of peers were so offended at this Protest, that on the 13th the question being put, Whether the said Protest be expunged out of the Books of the House? it was carried in the affirmative, by a majority of 66 voices against 31 present and of 90 against 54, proxies included. The next day, upon a Complaint made in the House of Lords, that both the said Protest, and the former concerning the Orders produced by the duke of Ormond, were published in print, a Committee was appointed to enquire who were the Printers and Publishers of the same; but this Committee not being able to make any discovery in that matter, the Lords applied themselves, by Address, to the queen for that purpose.

Order of the Council for discovering the Printer and Publisher of the said Protest.] Hereupon, on the 24th of June, the queen in council at Kensington, the following Order was made:

"An Address from the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, having been presented to her majesty, that she would be graciously pleased to direct such methods to be taken, as her majesty should think most proper, in order to discover the Printers and Publishers of the Reasons for the Protestation entered in the Journal of that House the 21st of May last; and of one other malicious and scandalous Paper, entitled, 'The Protests of the Lords-upon addressing her majesty for her Speech; with the names of the Lords. Price 2d.' And of any person or persons directing the printing thereof; which having been this day read at the board, her majesty in council taking the same into consideration, was thereupon graciously pleased to order, as it is hereby ordered, That whosoever shall discover to one of her majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Printer or Printers of the said pamphlets, or either of them, within three months from the date hereof, so as he or they shall be brought to justice, shall have and receive the reward of 50*l.* and likewise, whoever shall within the said three months discover the person or persons that directed the printing thereof, or of either of them, so as he or they shall be brought to justice, shall have and receive the reward of 100*l.* and the right honourable the Lord High-Treasurer is to cause the aforesaid sums to be paid, upon the conviction of the said persons accordingly. EDWARD SOUTHWELL."

The Preface to the Bishop of St. Asaph's Four Sermons ordered to be burnt.] June 10. A Complaint being made to the House, of the Preface to a book, entitled, "Four Sermons. 1. On the death of queen Mary, 1694. 2. On the death of the duke of Gloucester, 1700. 3. On the death of king William,

"1701. 4. On the queen's Accession to the Throne, in 1702. By William, Lord Bishop of St. Asaph."* The Book was brought up, and the Preface was read as follows:

"The publishing a few Sermons whilst I live, the latest of which was preached about eight years since, and the first above 17, will make it very natural for people to enquire into the

* "Dr. William Fleetwood an English prelate, descended from the Lancashire Fleetwoods, and born in the Tower of London 1st Jan. 1656. He was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, and on taking orders, became an eloquent preacher. He was made chaplain to king William, and afterwards obtained a fellowship at Eton, and the Rectory of St. Austin's, London. He was installed canon of Windsor 1702, but in 1705, he quitted the tumults of the town, and, much to the concern of large audiences, who attended his eloquent and persuasive discourses, he retired to the privacy of Wexham rectory, in Bucks. In 1706, without any solicitation on his part, or that of his friends, he was nominated to succeed Beveridge in the see of St. Asaph, and in 1714, he was translated to Ely. He died at Tottenham, in Middlesex, where he had retired for change of air, 4th Aug. 1723, and he was buried in Ely cathedral, where his lady, who soon followed him to the grave, erected a monument over him. His only son, Dr. Charles Fleetwood, rector of Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, did not long survive him. Bishop Fleetwood's character was respectable in every point of view. Admired as a preacher, he made an exemplary life, and a benevolent heart, the noblest ornaments of his persuasive eloquence in the pulpit. As a bishop he was beloved by his clergy, and did not arrogantly assume that superiority over them which conscious merit disdains, but illiberal pride asserts. As a writer he was highly respected, his sermons and divinity tracts were widely circulated; but the firmness of his opinions, however, drew upon him the censure of the House of Commons. His Preface to his Sermons, on the deaths of Mary, of the duke of Gloucester, and of William, and on the accession of Anne, gave such offence to the ministry that the book was burned publicly, 12th May 1712; but it was more universally read, and even appeared in the Spectator, No. 304. Besides these, Fleetwood published Inscriptionum Antiquarum Sylloge, 8vo. 1691—a translation of Jurieu's Method of Devotion, 1692, the 27th edition of which appeared 1750—an Essay on Miracles, 8vo. 1701—the Reasonable Communicant, 1704—Sixteen Practical Discourses on the Relative Duties of Parents, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. 1705—the Thirteenth of Romans vindicated, 1710—the Judgment on the Church of England in Lay Baptism and Dissenters' Baptism, 1712—the Life of St. Wenefrede, 1715—Chronicon Preciosum, or Account of English Money, Price of Corn and other Commodities for the last 600 years, 1707, besides smaller works." Lempriere.

occasions of doing so; and to such I do very willingly assign these following reasons.

"1. From the observations I have been able to make for these many years last past, upon our public affairs; and from the natural tendency of several principles and practices, that have, of late, been studiously revived; and upon what has followed thereupon, I could not help both fearing and presaging, that these nations would, some time or other, if ever we should have an enterprising prince upon the throne, of more ambition than virtue, justice and true honour, fall into the way of all other nations, and lose their liberty.

"Nor could I help foreseeing, to whose charge a great deal of this dreadful mischief, whenever it should happen, would be laid; whether justly or unjustly, was not my business to determine: but I resolved, for my own particular part, to deliver myself as well as I could, from the reproaches and curses of posterity, by publicly declaring to all the world, that although, in the constant course of my ministry, I have never failed, on proper occasions, to recommend, urge, and insist upon the loving, honouring, and the reverencing the prince's person, and holding it, according to the laws, inviolable and sacred, and paying all obedience and submission to the laws, though never so hard and inconvenient to private people: yet did I never think myself at liberty, or authorized to tell the people, that either Christ, St. Peter, or St. Paul, or any other holy writer, had, by any doctrine delivered by them, subverted the laws and constitutions of the country in which they lived; or put them in a worse condition with respect to their civil liberties, than they would have been, had they not been Christians. I ever thought it a most impious blasphemy against that holy religion, to father any thing upon it, that might encourage tyranny, oppression, or injustice, in a prince, or that easily tended to make a free and happy people, slaves and miserable. No: no people may make themselves as wretched as they will: but let not God be called into that wicked party. When force and violence and hard necessity, have brought the yoke of servitude upon a people's neck, religion will supply them with a patient and submissive spirit under it, till they can innocently shake it off: but certainly religion never puts it on. This always was, and this at present is my judgment of these matters; and I would be transmitted to posterity (for the little share of time such names as mine can live) under the character of one who loved his country, and would be thought a good Englishman, as well as a good clergyman.

"This character I thought would be transmitted, by the following Sermons, which were made for, and preached in a private audience, when I could think of nothing else but doing my duty on the occasions that were then offered by God's Providence, without any manner of design of making them public: and for that reason I give them now, as they were then delivered; by which I hope to satisfy those people who have objected a change of principles to me, as if I were not now the same man I formerly was. I never had but one opinion of these matters, and that I think is so reasonable and well grounded, that I believe I never can have any other.

"Another reason of my publishing these Sermons at this time, is, that I have a mind to do myself some honour, by doing what honour I could to the memory of two most excellent princes, and who have very highly deserved at the hands of all the people of these dominions, who have any true value for the Protestant Religion and the constitution of the English government, of which they were the great deliverers and defenders. I have lived to see their illustrious names very rudely handled, and the great benefits they did this nation, treated slightly and contemptuously. I have lived to see our deliverance from arbitrary power and popery, traduced and vilified by some, who formerly thought it was their greatest merit, and made it part of their boast and glory, to have had a little hand and share in bringing it about: and others, who, without it, must have lived in exile, poverty and misery, meanly disclaiming it, and using ill the glorious instrument thereof. Who could expect such a requital of such merit? I have, I own it, an ambition of exempting myself from the number of unthankful people; and as I loved and honoured those great princes living, and lamented over them when dead, so I would gladly raise them up a monument of praise, as lasting as any thing of mine can be; and I chose to do it at this time, when it is so unfashionable a thing to speak honourably of them.

"The Sermon that was preached upon the duke of Gloucester's death, was printed quickly after, and is now, because the subject was so suitable, joined to the others. The loss of that most promising and hopeful prince was, at that time, I saw, unspeakably great: and many accidents since have convinced us, that it could not have been over-valued. That precious life, had it pleased God to have prolonged it to the usual space, had saved us many fears and jealousies, and dark distrusts, and prevented many alarms that have long kept us, and will keep us still waking and uneasy. Nothing remained to comfort and support us under this heavy stroke, but the necessity it brought the king and nation under, of settling the Succession in the House of Hanover, and giving it an hereditary right by act of parliament, as long as it continues Protestant. So much good did God, in his merciful providence, produce from a misfortune, which we could never otherwise have sufficiently deplored.

"The fourth Sermon was preached upon the queen's accession to the throne, and in the first year in which that day was solemnly observed, (for by some accident or other it had been overlooked the year before) and every one will know, without the date of it, that it was preached very early in this reign, since I was able only to promise and presage its future glories and successes, from the good appearances of things, and the happy turn our affairs began to take, and could not then count up the victories and triumphs, that, for seven years after, made it, in the prophet's language, a name and a praise among all the people of the earth. Never did seven such years together pass over the head of any English monarch, nor cover it with so much honour: the crown and scepter seemed to be the queen's least ornaments. Those other princes were in common with her: and her great personal virtues were the same before and since. But such was the fame of her administration of affairs at home; such was the reputation of her wisdom and felicity in chusing ministers; and such was then esteemed their faithfulness and zeal, their diligence and great abilities in executing her commands: to such a height of military glory did her great General and her armies carry the British name abroad: such was the harmony and concord betwixt her and her allies; and such was the blessing of God upon all her councils and undertakings, that I am as sure as history can make me, no prince of ours was ever yet so prosperous and successful, so loved, esteemed, and honoured by their subjects and their friends, nor near so formidable to their enemies. We were, as all the world imagined then, just entering on the ways that promised to lead to such a Peace, as would have answered all the prayers of our religious queen, the care and vigilance of a most able ministry, the payments of a willing and obedient people, as well as all the glorious toils and hazards of the soldiery; when God, for our sins, permitted the spirit of discord to go forth, and by troubling sore the camp, the city, and the country, (and oh that it had altogether spared the places sacred to his worship!) to spoil, for a time, this beautiful and pleasing prospect: and give us, in its stead, I know not what. Our enemies will tell the rest with pleasure. It will become me better to pray to God to restore us to the power of obtaining such a Peace as will be to his glory, the safety, honour, and the welfare of the queen and her dominions, and the general satisfaction of all her high and mighty allies."

The Complaint against this Preface was made by Mr. Hungerford, seconded by Mr. Manley, and supported by the court-party. But sir Peter King, sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr. Lechmere, and other gentlemen, were very strenuous advocates in its behalf, but to no purpose; for the Commons, by a majority of 119 to 53, resolved: 1. "That the said Preface is malicious and factious, highly reflecting upon the present administration of public affairs, under her majesty, and tending to create discord and sedition amongst her subjects. 2. That the said Preface be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, upon Thursday next, at twelve of the clock, in Palace Yard, Westminster; and that the sheriffs of London and Middlesex do assist

* "It was observed, that, when the Bishop's friends brought him the news of the Vote, far from appearing disturbed at it, he said, 'That he esteemed himself very happy to suffer with the duke of Marlborough, the earl of Godolphin, and so many other illustrious patriots, whose reputation their enviers endeavoured to blast.' On the other hand, this treatment of a prelate so universally esteemed, particularly by the queen herself, who was used to call him 'her bishop,' was highly resented even by many zealous churchmen. The Bishop wrote the following letter to bishop Burnet, upon this occasion:

"I received the favour of your lordship's letter, and took it, as I knew it was intended, very kindly. The manner of my receiving the indignity put upon my Preface was neither like a christian, nor philosopher, but like a very worldly man. I knew the whole process, and knew it to be a piece of revenge taken by a wicked party, that found themselves sorely stung; and it affected me accordingly, i. e. very little. I am not one, that love to be the talk of the town; and in this part, I confess I was uneasy, although I think the talk was very much in my favour. The complaint was made by Hungerford, and seconded by Manley (people that should indeed have been ordered to have burnt it) and thirded by what we call the court, and carried by numbers, without a wise word said against it. Sir Peter King, sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr. Lechmere and others of the party, were very strenuous advocates in its behalf; and so were other gentlemen, but to no great purpose; for the court divided one-hundred and nineteen, and my friends but fifty four. If their design was to intimidate me, they lost it utterly; or, if to suppress the book, it happened much otherwise; for every body's curiosity is awakened by the usage, and the bookseller finds his account in it above any one else. The Spectator has conveyed above four thousand of them into other people's hands, that would otherwise have never seen nor heard of it. In a word, my lord, when I consider, that these gentlemen have used me no worse, than, I think, they have used their own country, the emperor, the States, the house of Hanover, and all our allies abroad, as well as all the bravest, and wisest, and the honestest men we have at home; I am more inclined to become vain, than any ways depressed at what has befallen me, and intend to set up for a man of merit upon this very stock. But, pleasures apart, my heart is wounded within me, when I consider seriously whereabouts we are, and whether we are tending. The court party do now own publicly, that except the allies accept of the conditions, that are offered them, king Philip is not to make any renunciation; and certainly the allies cannot accept of these conditions, unless they are distressed to the last degree.

A Letter from the States-General to the Queen complained of.] The same day a Complaint being made to the House of a printed Paper entitled, "A Letter from the States-General to the Queen of Great-Britain;" the same was brought up and read as follows,

"Madam; After all the proofs which your majesty has given during the course of your glorious reign, of your great zeal for the public good, and of your adherence to the common cause of the high allies; after so many marks you have had the goodness to give us, of your tender affection, and of your friendship to our republic; and after the repeated assurances you have given us, and that very lately too, of your intentions, That your troops should act against the common enemy, until the war was concluded by a general peace: It is impossible we should not be surprised and affected by two declarations we have lately received, one after another, in the name of your majesty; the first by the duke of Ormond, your general, that he could undertake nothing without new orders from you, the other by the bishop of Bristol, your plenipotentiary to the congress at Utrecht, that your majesty perceiving that we did not answer as we ought the proposals which you had made us, and that we should not act in concert with your ministers, on the subject of peace, you would take your measures apart; and that you did not look upon yourself to be bound under any obligation whatever with respect to us.

"As soon as we had notice of those Declarations, we sent orders to our minister, who has the honour to reside at your majesty's court, to represent to you the reasons of our

We must, and shall have a Separate Peace in spite of all that can be said; and that must be without a renunciation on the part of France and without a guaranty from the allies; and what a Peace is that like to be? It is now said, that England is to constrain the king of France to content the States with a Barrier to their liking; and the rest will come in, or stand out without any danger. But I am afraid England has lost all her constraining power, and that France thinks she has us in her hands, and may use us as she pleases, which, I dare say, will be as curvily as we deserve. What a change has two years made? your lordship may now imagine you are growing young again; for we are fallen, methinks, into the very dregs of Charles the second's politics; saving, that then they were more reasonable, because our enemy was then in so full power and lustre, as might both terrify and dazzle a poor luxurious prince, but would not be disturbed, nor seemed to care much what became of England after he was gone. The present times may put you in mind of those, with this bad difference still, that now the ruinous effects of those advices seem to be taking place after an interval of five or six and twenty years; and after such an interruption, as one would have thought should have quite baffled and destroyed them." Tindal.

surprize, and the consequences of those declarations, and to request you, with that respect which we always had, and which we shall for ever entertain for your royal person, that you would give other orders to the duke of Ormond, that he may act with all possible vigour, according to the exigency of the war; and that your majesty would have the goodness to entertain other sentiments of us, than those which the bishop of Bristol has declared to our plenipotentiaries at Utrecht.

"But the more we consider those Declarations, the more important we find them, and the more we apprehend their consequences: therefore we could not forbear applying ourselves by this letter directly to your majesty, hoping, that you will consider it, as we promise ourselves you will, both from your prudence and wisdom, and from your so much famed zeal for the public welfare; particularly from your usual friendship and affection for us and our republic.

"We protest before all things, that, as we ever had a true friendship as well as the highest respect for your majesty, and a sincere affection to all your interests, with an earnest desire to live in a perfect good understanding and union with you, we have still the same sentiments, and shall always preserve them, wishing for nothing more, than to be able to give your majesty the most convincing proofs of it.

"After this, we pray your majesty to consider, according to your great penetration, whether we have not just ground to be surprized, when we see a stop put, by an order in your majesty's name, without our knowledge, to the operations of the Confederate Army, the finest and strongest, which, perhaps, has been in the field during the whole course of the war, and provided with all necessaries to act with vigour, and this, after they had marched, according to the resolution taken in concert with your majesty's General, almost up to the enemy, with a great superiority both as to the number and goodness of troops, and animated with a noble courage and zeal to acquit themselves bravely; so that, in all human appearance, and with the divine assistance, which we have experienced so visibly on so many other occasions, we should have been able either by battles or sieges, to gain great advantages over the enemy, to have bettered the affairs of the Allies and to facilitate the negotiations of Peace.

"We flatter ourselves indeed with the hopes which the duke of Ormond has given us, that in a few days he expects other orders; but in the mean time, we are sorry to see one of the finest opportunities lost, being uncertain, whether we shall have another so favourable, since the enemy have time given them to fortify themselves, and take their precautions, while the army of the allies lies still without action; and consuming the forage all round, deprive themselves of the means of subsisting for time to come in those places, where, by concert, the operations of the campaign were designed;

which may make such enterprizes impossible hereafter, as were practicable now, and consequently render the whole campaign unsuccessful, to the inestimable prejudice of the common cause of the High Allies.

“Certainly, when we consider the army as it really is, composed of the troops of your majesty and the other allies, joined together by common concert, to act for the greatest advantage and furtherance of the common cause, and the assurances which your majesty had given us by your letters, by your ministers, and last of all, by your general the duke of Ormond, of your intentions, that your troops should be ordered to act with their usual vigour, as well as the engagements into which your majesty is entered, not only with respect to us, but also separately and jointly with us, in respect to the other allies. It is very difficult for us to conjecture and conceive how an order so prejudicial to the common cause, given so suddenly, without our knowledge, and undoubtedly too without the knowledge of the other allies, can agree and consist with the nature of an alliance, and with those assurances and engagements just now mentioned. For though, according to the declaration of the bishop of Bristol, your majesty holds yourself to be disengaged from every obligation with regard to us, it is plain, that the matter now in question is not our particular interest or advantage, but that of all the allies, who will suffer by the prejudice which an order so little expected must needs bring to the common cause.

“But, madam, we cannot forbear telling your majesty, that the Declaration made by the bishop of Bristol, at Utrecht, has no less surprized us than that of the duke of Ormond in the army. It appears to us so extraordinary that we know not how to reconcile it with the great goodness and kindness which your majesty has always honoured us with; and not being able to conceive how such a sudden change could happen, with respect to us, we are not only surprized but afflicted at it. We have carefully examined our conduct, and find nothing in it that can have given ground to that dissatisfaction which your majesty expresses with us by this Declaration.

“From the very first day that your majesty ascended the throne, we testified all the deference that you could desire from a state in friendship and alliance with you. We carefully sought after your amity and affection, and, considering the happy effects which a good intelligence, harmony and union betwixt your majesty and us, and the two nations might produce and have really produced, and the advantage which resulted from thence to both, as well as to the common cause of all the allies, we made it our business heartily to cultivate them, and more and more to gain your majesty's confidence and to conform ourselves to your sentiments as much as possibly we could.

“We think that we gave a signal proof of this, particularly with regard to the negotiations of peace: since not only after we were informed of the conferences formerly held in England upon this subject, we did expect that your majesty would give us an account of them; having this firm confidence in your friendship for our republic and in your zeal for the good of the common cause, that nothing would be done to prejudice us, nor the other allies; but also when your majesty communicated to us the preliminary articles signed by M. Mesnager in England, and when you proposed to us the calling and holding a congress for a General Peace, and required of us grants for this end necessary passports for the enemy's ministers, we consented to it, though we had many reasons, which to us seemed very well grounded, not to enter into such a treaty without a better foundation, or at least, with the concurrence of the other allies: but we preferred your majesty's sentiments to our own, in order to give you a new proof of our affection.

“We did no less, with respect to the difficulties which were started on the subject of the treaty of the mutual guaranty for the succession of the protestant line to your majesty's kingdoms, and for our barrier; a treaty of such importance to the two nations, that we look upon it as the strongest tie that could be thought on to unite for ever the hearts and interests of both; concluded after the maturest deliberation and ratified on both sides in the most authentic form: for though we might have stood to the treaty as it was, yet we entered into a negotiation upon those difficulties, and particularly on the point of the assiento, concerning which we gave our plenipotentiaries such instructions, that we no longer doubted but all the difficulties would have been adjusted to mutual content, and that we should thereby have entirely regained your majesty's confidence; and so much the more because in the first place, when the meeting of a congress for a General Peace was in hand, your majesty declared to us by your ambassador, that you desired no more than our concurrence in that single point, and this only mark of our confidence, and that then you would give us strong and real proofs of your affection towards us, and of your upright intentions, with respect to the common cause of all the allies: and that afterwards, when the difficulties about the Succession and the Barrier were raised, your majesty did likewise assure us, that if we would remit something upon the most essential points, and particularly about the affair of the assiento, it would be the way to re-establish a mutual confidence; which being once restored your majesty would take particularly to heart the interests of this state, and act in conjunction with us in the whole negotiation, to obtain an honourable, good and sure Peace.

“But, we find ourselves very much out in our expectation, since at the very same time when we made the greatest advances towards your majesty, and that we did verily believe we should come to an agreement about the

into in difference, we see the earl of Strafford as without finishing that affair: we see the king stopped in the beginning of his career, and we hear a declaration, by which your majesty looks upon yourself to be disengaged in all obligations with us; for which the reasons alledged are, that we have not answered you ought the advances which your majesty made towards us, and that we would not act in concert with your ministers about the Peace.

"If your majesty would be pleased to look through a favourable and equitable eye upon our conduct, we flatter ourselves and have a firm confidence, that you will find nothing in it which can give you such disadvantageous ideas and thoughts of us; but that you will rather think, that we have performed, and do still perform all that we owe, as good and faithful allies; and particularly to your majesty.

"What we have said already, might perhaps be sufficient to persuade you of it: but we must add, that having always esteemed your majesty's affection and a good harmony betwixt the two nations, as one of the strongest supports of our state and of the protestant religion, and as one of the most effectual methods to maintain and advance our common interest and the peace of the whole confederacy; and this sincere opinion being firmly imprinted on our hearts, we were never backward to communicate and result in all confidence with your majesty and your ministers, upon the affairs of the peace, according to the foundations laid down in the Grand Alliance and other treaties. We declare, that we have always been inclinable and ready to do it, and are so still, as far as we can, without prejudice to the allies, and without departing from or acting against the engagements, treaties, and alliances which we have entered into.

"But, Madam, all the proposals hitherto made to us upon that subject, were couched in very general terms, without communicating to us the result of the negotiations betwixt your majesty's ministers and those of France; nor even your majesty's thoughts about the subject which we ought to have concerted together. It is true that in some of the last conferences, your majesty's ministers demanded to know whether ours were furnished with a full power, and authorized to draw up a plan for the peace; but it had been just, before such a thing was demanded of us, that they should have communicated the result of the negotiations so long treated of betwixt your majesty's ministers and those of the enemy; or at least they should have told us your majesty's thoughts.

"Had that plan related only to your majesty's interest and ours, we should perhaps have been in the wrong not to have forthwith come into it, though even in that case the affair would not have been without its difficulties, since the least notice of it which should have come to the enemy, must have been very prejudicial: But, as the plan in question concerned the interest of all the allies, and almost all Europe, we had very strong apprehensions, that as the particular negotiations betwixt your majesty's ministers and those of France, and the readiness with which we consented to the Congress at Utrecht, and to the giving of passports to the enemy's ministers, had already occasioned abundance of suspicions, and much uneasiness to his imperial majesty and the other allies: We say, we apprehended that his imperial majesty and the other allies coming to know, which would have been very difficult to conceal from them, the concert betwixt your majesty's ministers and ours for a plan of Peace, and that before the ministers of France had given a specific answer to the demands of the allies, their suspicions and uneasiness would have increased, and that way of proceeding might have given them ground to entertain prejudicial thoughts, as if it had been the intention of your majesty and us to abandon the Grand Alliance and the common cause, or at least, that we alone took upon us to determine the fate of all the other allies, by which his imperial majesty and the other confederates, might have been pushed on to separate measures, and to take such steps as would be no ways agreeable to your majesty's interest.

"We thought these reasons strong enough to justify our conduct to your majesty on this head, and if we did not enter with all the readiness which you might have wished for, into the concert proposed, we hope that at most your majesty will look upon our backwardness only as an excess of prudence or of scruple, and not in the least as the want of confidence in your majesty; while the allies might have considered it as a departing from the treaties, and particularly from the 8th article of the Grand Alliance. We also hope, that your majesty, for the reasons here alledged, will lay aside those hard thoughts of us, as if we had not answered, as we ought, the advances which your majesty made towards us, and that we would not act in concert with your ministers upon the subject of the peace; But, Madam, though your majesty should not acquiesce in our reasons, of which however we cannot doubt, we pray your majesty to consider, whether that be sufficient for your majesty to think, that you are disengaged from all obligations with respect to us.

"Had we acted against and contravened the engagements and treaties which we had the honour to conclude with your majesty, we might have expected from your goodness and justice, that you would have represented those contraventions to us, and not have looked upon yourself to have been disengaged, till such time as we had refused to give all necessary redress. But, as we did no ways engage to enter with your majesty into a concert to draw up a plan of Peace without the participation of the other members of the Grand Alliance, the backwardness we have shewn upon that head, cannot be looked upon as a contravention of our engagements, and therefore cannot serve to disengage your majesty from yours, with respect to us, since we are verily persuaded, that we have fully answered all our treaties and all our al-

lianees, both with your majesty, and with the high allies in general; and that we have done more in this present war, than could in justice, and equity, have been expected from us. All the difference betwixt your majesty and us in this point, is no more if rightly considered, than a disparity of sentiments.

“In truth, madam, if for such a cause betwixt potentates, allied and united together by the strongest and strictest ties of alliance, interest and religion, any one of those potentates could quit all their engagements, and disengage themselves from all their obligations, there is no tie so strong, which may not be broke at any time, and we know of no engagements that could be relied on in time to come.

“We assure ourselves, that when your majesty considers the consequences, you will not persist in the declaration which the bishop of Bristol has made: We beseech you, with all the respect and all the earnestness of which we are capable, that you would not; and also that you would be pleased to revoke the order given to the duke of Ormond, if it be not revoked already, and that you would authorize him to act according to occurrences, and as the exigency of the war, and the advancement of the common cause shall require.

“We also request you, madam, to communicate to us the result of the conferences betwixt your ministers and those of the enemy, or at least your thoughts upon the Peace, and we will endeavour to give your majesty all imaginable proofs of our deference for your sentiments, and of our sincere desire to preserve your valuable friendship as much as we can, without acting contrary to the faith of the engagements into which we have entered by treaties and alliances with your majesty and other potentates.

“We are firmly persuaded, that it is not your majesty's intention in any manner to break them, since you have always been of the same opinion with us, and the other allies, that a good union betwixt the allies, not only during the present war, but also after the peace shall be concluded, is, and always will be, the most solid, and even the only method to preserve the liberty and independency of all together, and of every one in particular, against the great power of France.

“We again renew to your majesty the assurances of our high and perfect esteem for your person and friendship, as also of our intentions and sincere desires to entertain with your majesty the same good correspondence, harmony and union, as before, and to cultivate the same betwixt the two nations, as far as it shall lie in our power: and we pray your majesty, to preserve likewise for us and our republic, your former affection. We refer for the rest, to what the Sieur Van Borselle, our envoy-extraordinary, has further to say to your majesty on this subject. And pray the Almighty, &c.”

Resolutions of the Commons thereon.] After the reading of this Letter the Commons resolved, That an humble Address be presented to her majesty assuring her majesty of the just sense this house has of the indignity offered to her majesty, by printing and publishing a Letter from the States-General to her majesty, and humbly to desire her majesty, that she will so far resent such indignities, as to give an Answer * for the future to any Letters or Memorials that shall be so printed and published: and ordered that the said Address be presented to her majesty by such members *

* But the day before the House came to these Resolutions, the Queen had thought fit to answer the Letter from the States-General, in the following manner:

“High and Mighty Lords, Friends, Allies, and Confederates,

“There is nothing dearer to us than the preservation of a good understanding and a perfect union with your State. This has been the principal object of our care; and we have a little ground to accuse ourselves of having the least contributed to the lessening of the same, that we reflect with pleasure on the pains we have taken, and on all the instances we have made, that the disputes which have happened, with relation to the interests of the nations, should be amicably determined, so as we might communicate our thoughts to each other, without reserve, upon those of the public; for in the present conjuncture of affairs, there ought to be an equal frankness on both sides, and a mutual confidence.—We suppose the alarms which you took on account of the declarations made by the duke of Ormond and the bishop of Bristol, are now over; and we repeat to you what we have so often declared. That it will be your own fault, as it has been in time past, if all our measures about War or Peace be not taken in concert with your state.—The earl of Strafford will be with you a few days, with full instructions concerning our intentions. Our ministers will be disposed and authorised to do all that is incumbent on us, to renew an entire confidence with you, and to prevent, for the future, such misunderstandings as have been fomented with so much artifice and so little foundation.—But, we cannot pass over in silence our great surprise, to see that your letter of the 5th instant, N. S. was printed and published almost as soon as it received it from the hands of your minister; a proceeding which is equally contrary to good politics and decency. It is a remonstrance instead of a representation, and an appeal to the people instead of an address to the sovereign. We hope that you will not suffer the like to be done again, for our honour will engage us to give no answer to any letters or memorials which shall be published in that manner. For the rest, we pray, &c. Your good friend.

Mr. Hampden's Motion for the Allies to be Guarantees of the Protestant Succession, rejected.] June 17. Mr. Hampden made a motion, That an humble Address be made to her majesty, humbly acquainting her, "That this House is a grateful sense of her majesty's care for her people, in the assurances she so lately made on the throne, That the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover, is nearest at her ear; and being convinced, that the safety of the Protestant Succession must, in a great measure, depend on the event of the present Treaty for a general Peace, do most humbly beseech her majesty, That she will be pleased to give particular Instructions to her plenipotentiaries, at, in the conclusion of the said Treaty, the several powers in Alliance with her majesty, may be Guarantees for the Protestant Succession to the crowns of these realms, as settled by act of parliament, in the illustrious House of Hanover." Endeavours were used to have this motion dropped, but Hampden, and some of his friends, insisting to have the question put, the same was done accordingly, and carried in the affirmative, by a majority of 133 voices against 38.

Resolution about the Protestant Succession.] After which it was resolved, 1. "That this House has such an entire confidence in the related declarations her majesty has been pleased to make, of her securing to these kingdoms the Protestant Succession, as by law established in the House of Hanover, that they never doubt of her majesty's taking the proper measures for the security thereof; and that this House will support her majesty against factions at home, and her enemies abroad; and at this House does humbly beseech her majesty, that she will be pleased to discountenance all those who shall endeavour to raise doubts between her majesty and her subjects, especially, by misrepresenting her good intentions for the welfare of her people. 2. That the said Resolution be laid before her majesty by the whole House."

The Queen's Answer thereto.] The Commons having attended the queen with the said resolution, her majesty was pleased to return the following Answer:

"Gentlemen, I return you hearty thanks for this Resolution, which is very becoming you, and truly represent all my Commons.—You have shewn yourselves honest assertors of the monarchy, zealous defenders of the constitution, and real friends to the Protestant Suc-

* "It was observed, that a censure was passed upon it merely to gratify Mr. Secretary John; though, on the other hand, several speeches were made, particularly by Mr. Lechmere, to justify the States-General; which gave occasion to some people to say, 'That a vote of the Commons was the only answer, that could be returned to their high mightinesses &c.'" Tindal.

cession.—What I have said and done, is sufficient to satisfy any person who is in earnest for the Succession, as by law established in the House of Hanover, that I need not to be put in mind of doing any thing which may contribute to render that Succession secure."

The Queen's Speech at the Adjournment.] June 21. The queen came to the House of Peers, and the Commons being sent for, her majesty, after giving the royal assent to several Bills, made the following Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"The last time I was here, I spoke so fully, and afterwards received from both Houses such satisfactory Addresses, that there remains little more for me to say at the close of this meeting of parliament, but to repeat my hearty thanks for your late solemn assurances. They will give me strength to struggle with any difficulties which may yet be raised; and I hope, that neither they who envy the making a good Peace, nor who think it their interest to continue the war, will be able to defeat our joint endeavours for the honour and advantage of Britain, and the security of all our Allies.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons;

"At the same time that I thank you most kindly for the Supplies you have cheerfully granted, I cannot but let you know my satisfaction in the near view I have of a Peace, since it will, in some measure, recompense my subjects for their vast expences, and also lighten that heavy burden they have borne during the war.

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"You have expressed how sensible you are of the advantage and security which accrue to Great-Britain, and our allies, by the terms proposed for a Peace. And I need not mention to you the mischiefs which must follow the breaking off this treaty. Our burdens will be at least continued, if not increased; the present opportunity would be irrecoverably lost, of Britain's establishing a real balance of power in Europe and improving our own commerce; and if any one of our allies should gain something by such a proceeding, the rest would suffer in the common calamity. But I hope, by God's blessing, such fatal designs will be disappointed.—You are now returning into your respective countries, and I persuade myself, you will not be wanting in your endeavours, to obviate the designs of any ill minded persons, who may attempt to sow sedition amongst my subjects, and under specious pretences, carry on designs they dare not own.—I hope, at your next meeting, there will be an opportunity of perfecting what I have recommended to you, which you have left unfinished in this Session.—I cannot conclude without assuring you, that nothing shall move me from steadily pursuing the true interest of so dutiful and affectionate a people."

Both Houses were then adjourned.

PRINCIPAL OCCURRENCES DURING THE RECESS.—Mr. Walpole set at liberty—London Ad*dress—Mr. Secretary St. John created Viscount Bolingbroke—Death and Character of the Earl of Godolphin—The Duke of Marlborough retires beyond seas—The Treaty of Peace brought over—The Parliament meets after eleven Prorogations.*] This adjournment, instead of a prorogation, occasioned various discourses; some surmising, it was intended as a further mortification to Mr. Walpole, who rather chose to continue prisoner in the Tower, than to make his submission. Others imagined, it was intended, that, at the expiration of the adjournment, the House should sit again for the dispatch of business. But, whatever ground there was for the first of these conjectures it appeared there was none for the latter; for at their next meeting, on the 8th of July, the parliament was prorogued to the 31st of the same month. Upon which Mr. Walpole, and the other persons, who were under confinement by order of the Commons, were of course set at liberty.—Though the queen in her speech said, they approved of her scheme of Peace, yet that was not in any of the Addresses; many indeed, who intended to merit by their officious zeal, had magnified it in their speeches, but both Houses observed one caution, not to express their being satisfied with the plan of the Peace, though it was covertly insinuated.

“On the 12th of June, at an assembly of the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London, a motion was made for addressing the queen about the peace; against which some objections were made by sir Gilbert Heathcote and sir Charles Peers, who alleged ‘That, the making peace or war being the prerogative of the crown, they ought not to meddle with it.’ But the majority, who knew that such a step would be very acceptable to the court, being of a contrary opinion, it was carried for an Address; which being, two days after, presented, with another from the lieutenantancy, the queen knighted John Cass and William Stuart, the sheriffs, and Samuel Clarke. Upon this a new set of Addresses were promoted every where, full of gross flattery, magnifying the present conduct, with severe reflections on the former ministry, which some carried back to king William’s reign. Some of those Addresses mentioned the Protestant Succession, and the house of Hanover, with zeal; others did it more coldly, and some made no mention at all of it. And it was universally believed, that no Addresses were so acceptable to the ministers, as those of the last sort.—But neither the number, nor the noise of Addresses, which, during the remaining part of the year, were presented to the queen, were able to suppress the murmurings of the Whigs, and even of many Tories, who did not like the terms of Peace contained in the queen’s Speech. On the other hand, the astonishment, not to say indignation with which the queen’s Speech was received in Holland, is scarce to be expressed; and exceptions against it were published both by the Dutch and Imperialists.

“A few days after the rising of the Parliament, Mr. Secretary St. John was created Viscount Bolingbroke.* The earl of Godolphin died of the stone, on the 15th of September. He had served in considerable employments under four princes of very different temperaments. Opposite opinions have been discerned of his merit and character. Great abilities and integrity have been ascribed to him by some; while others have freely censured him for notorious defects in the latter, and allowed him to have been great by the chance of place and distinction. The Treasurer’s staff was attended with the ill-will and aversion of the Tories; for his rival, the earl of Rochester, by his turbulent zeal, had gained the highest place in their favour. As he had commonly acted in opposition to the Whigs, they likewise entertained great fears and jealousies of him. His whole ministry was embarrassed with both these circumstances; and even prudence, good temper, and success, could not secure him a general good will and confidence. His deliberations were constant and determined for our prosperity at home, and our success abroad. If his difficulties and disadvantages, particularly those with the queen, were duly explained, his attention to the welfare of the nation would be the subject of great admiration. The Union of the two kingdoms was his work; and, though this transaction has been often condemned by great numbers of both parties, yet that does not lessen the merit of the performance. By means of this Union, the Protestant Succession was secured; the influence of France on the affairs of Scotland was much weakened; many occasions of feuds and animosities were removed, and the benefits resulting to the whole island were immediate and important, and likely to be perpetually increasing. Alliances, and the force of recommendations, imposed upon him in some instances; but his great concern was to employ men of capacity and integrity; and such were sure of his kindest regards. He had a true sense of the nation’s welfare, and of the proper methods of promoting it. He is said to have preserved great appearances of wisdom by silence and reserve, which are particulars of behaviour supposed to be consistent with a great and generous mind. But this was not owing to any thing in an unworthy; for in all consultations on business, he discovered a surprising greatness of conduct.

* “July 1. Mr. Secretary is said to have made a Viscount. He desired I would read the preamble of his patent: but I excused myself from a work that might lose me a great deal of reputation, and get me very little.”—Life 17. Secretary St. John is made Viscount Bolingbroke. I could hardly persuade him to take that title, because the eldest branch of his family had it in an earldom, and it was just now extinct. If he did not like it, I advised him to take the lord Pomfret, which I think is a noble title. You will hear of it often in the Chronicles. Pomfret Castle; but we believed it was among the titles of some other lords.” Swift’s Journal.

and a quick and most exact discernment. His kind, equal, and obliging temper endeared his memory to all, who had the pleasure and advantage of his conversation. His behaviour to the queen was so faultless, that, when she was influenced to dismiss him, shame and concern would not allow her to admit him into her presence; and, therefore instead of permitting him to resign into her hands the treasurer's staff, a letter was sent to order him to break it. Unbecoming instances of behaviour may be produced in the lives of great men of all ages and all employments. Had this been duly considered, such severe reproaches had not been cast upon this minister for his love of play and horse-races; by which indeed he became too much, and too frequently engaged with the most worthless of men, gamblers and cockies. But after all, when this objection is thoroughly examined, nothing will appear but a faulty choice of improper amusements; and here were no imputations upon him of any fraudulent practices, though such were then unfamiliar to persons of his rank. Nor did his love for these diversions ever draw him off from the duties of his high station. His letter to the queen just before his dismissal furnishes us with the fullest ideas of his worth and character; and time hath abundantly verified the representations, which he therein made with dignity and decency, a becoming warmth, and an honest freedom. Such a sense of affairs, and such expressions, could only proceed from a mind truly great and truly good."

"Upon his death the duke of Marlborough resolved to go and live beyond sea. He went away in the end of November, and his duchess followed him in the beginning of February following. This was variously censured; some pretended it was the giving up and abandoning the concerns of his country; and they represented it as the effect of fear, with too anxious care to secure himself. Others were glad he was safe out of ill hands; whereby, if the nation should fall into the convulsions of a civil war, he would be able to assist the elector of Hanover, as being so entirely beloved and considered in by all our military men; whereas, if he had staid in England, it was not to be doubted, but, upon the least shadow of suspicion, he would have been immediately secured; but now he would be at liberty, being beyond sea, to act as there might be occasion for it. There were two suits begun against him: the one was for the  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. which the foreign princes were content should be deducted for contingencies, of which an account has been given. The other was for arrears due to the builders of Blenheim-house. The queen had given orders for building it with great magnificence; all the bargains with the workmen were made in her name, and by authority from her; and in the preambles of the acts of parliament, which confirmed the grant of Woodstock to him and his heirs, it was said he queen built the house for him. Yet now, that the tradesmen were let run into an arrear of 30,000*l.* the queen refused to pay any more, and set them upon suing the duke of Marlborough for it, though he had never contracted with any of them. Upon his going beyond sea, both those suits were stayed, which gave occasion to people to imagine, that the ministry, being disturbed to see so much public respect paid to a man, whom they had used so ill, had set these prosecutions on foot, only to render his stay in England uneasy to him.

"On the 3d of April 1713, being Good-Friday, Mr. St. John arrived at Whitehall with the Treaties of Peace and Commerce, signed the Tuesday before, between the British and French plenipotentiaries, and the news, that the ministers of Portugal, Savoy, Prussia, and the States-General, had likewise signed their respective treaties; which was immediately notified in the evening by popular rejoicings. Four days after, the queen held a council at St. James's, in which the lord-keeper Harcourt was declared Lord High-Chancellor of Great Britain; and at the same time the duke of Athol was sworn of the privy council. This done, the queen proposed to the board the ratifying the Treaties of Peace and Commerce: to which the earl of Cholmondely objected, saying, 'This matter being of the highest importance for her majesty and her kingdoms, as well as all Europe, it required the maturest consideration; and these treaties containing several terms of the civil law, in which the least equivocation might be of great consequence, and being, besides, couched in Latin and French, it seemed very necessary to have them translated into the vulgar tongue.' He was supported by another member; but, the time agreed on for the exchanging of the ratifications not admitting of delays, their opinion was over-ruled, and so the queen ratified the Treaties. The next day the white-staff, as Treasurer of the household, and sir Richard Temple was removed from his command of the regiment of dragoons, formerly commanded by the earl of Essex. The Peace being thus signed and ratified, the queen resolved not to defer any longer the Meeting of the Parliament, which had been prorogued no fewer than eleven times."*

* "January 17. I dined to day with Lord Treasurer. After dinner he was talking to the lords about the Speech the queen must make when the parliament meets. He asked me how I would make it? I was going to be serious, because it was seriously put; but I turned it to a jest. And, because they had been speaking of the duchess of Marlborough going to Flanders after the duke, I said the Speech should begin thus: 'My Lords and Gentlemen; In order to my own quiet, and that of my subjects, I have thought fit to send the duchess of Marlborough abroad after the duke.' This took well, and turned off the discourse. I must tell you, I do not at all like the present situation of affairs, and remember

THIRD SESSION OF THE THIRD PARLIAMENT OF GREAT-BRITAIN.

The Queen's Speech on Opening the Session.] April 9, 1713. This day her majesty opened the session with the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"I ended the last Sessions with my hearty thanks for the solemn assurances you had given

I tell you so. Things must be on another foot, or we are all undone; I hate this driving to an inch."

"February 2. The parliament meets to-morrow, but will be prorogued for a fortnight; which disappointment will, I believe; vex abundance of them, though they are not Whigs: for they are forced to be in town at expence for nothing: but we want an answer from Spain, before we are sure of every thing being right for the peace; and God knows whether we can have that for this month. It is a most ticklish juncture of affairs."

"February 17. The parliament was prorogued to day, and people grumble; and the good of it is, the peace cannot be finished by the time they meet, there are so many fiddling things to do."

"February 27. The Whigs are forming great schemes against the meeting of parliament, which will be next Tuesday, I still think, without fail; and we hope to hear by then that the peace is ready to sign."

"March 3. The parliament was again prorogued for a week, and I suppose the peace will be ready by then, and the queen will be able to be brought to the House, and make her Speech."

"March 8. Lord Treasurer shewed me some of the queen's Speech, which I corrected in several places, and penned the Vote of Address of Thanks for the Speech; but I was of opinion the House should not sit on Tuesday next, unless they hear the peace is signed; that is, provided they are sure it will be signed the week after, and so have one scolding for all."

"March 15. The queen will be well enough to go to parliament on Tuesday, if the Houses meet, which is not yet certain; neither, indeed, can the ministers themselves tell; for it depends on winds and weather, and circumstances of negotiation. However, we go on as if it was certainly to meet; and I am to be at Lord Treasurer's to-morrow, upon that supposition, to do some things relating that way."

"March 21. Lord Treasurer has been at a meeting with four principal Whigs; but he is resolved to begin a Speech against them when the parliament sits, and I have begged that the ministry may have a meeting on purpose to settle that matter, and let us be the attackers; and I believe it will come to something, for the Whigs intend to attack the ministers; and if, instead of that, the ministers attack the Whigs, it will be better: and farther, I believe we shall attack them on those very points they in-me, by which I have been enabled to overcome the difficulties contrived to obstruct the General Peace.—I have deferred opening the session until now, being very desirous to communicate to you, at your first meeting, the success of this important affair: It is therefore with great pleasure I tell you the Treaty is signed, and in a few days the ratifications will be exchanged.—The negotiation has been drawn into so great a length, that all our allies have had sufficient opportunity to adjust their several interests, though the public charge has been thereby much encreased; yet I hope my people will be easy under it, since we have happily obtained the end we proposed.—What I have done for securing the Protestant Succession, and the perfect friendship there is between me and the House of Hanover, may convince such who wish well to both, and desire the quiet and safety of their country, how vain all attempts are to divide us, and those who would make a merit by separating our interests, will never attain their ill ends.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons;

"As great a progress has been made in reducing the public expence, as the circumstances of affairs would admit.—What force may be necessary for securing our commerce by sea, and for Guards and Garrisons, I leave entirely to my parliament. Make yourselves safe; and I shall be satisfied.—Next to the protection of Divine Providence, I depend upon the loyalty and affection of my people. I want no other Guaranty.—I recommend to your care those brave men, who have served well by sea or tend to attack us. The parliament will be again prorogued for a fortnight, because of Passion Week."

"April 7. The parliament will now certainly sit, and every body's expectations are ready to burst. At a council to night, the lord chief justice Parker (afterwards earl of Macclesfield) a Whig, spoke against the peace; so did lord Cholmondeley, another Whig, who is Treasurer of the Household. My Lord Keeper, Harcourt, was this night made Lord Chancellor. We hope there will soon be some removes."

"April 8. Lord Cholmondeley is this day removed from his employment, for his last night's speech; and sir Richard Temple, a lieutenant-general, the greatest Whig in the army, is turned out; and lieutenant-general Palmes will be obliged to sell his regiment. This is the first fruits of a friendship I have established between two great men. I dined with Lord Treasurer, and did the business I had for him to his satisfaction. I won't tell you what it was. The parliament sits to-morrow for certain. It will be a very important day. All the world will be at Westminster. Lord Treasurer is as easy as a lamb. They are mustering up the proxies of the absent lords; but they are not in any fear of wanting a majority, which death and accidents have increased this year." Swift's Journal.

land this war, and cannot be employed in time of Peace.—I must desire you to provide the Supplies you shall judge requisite; and to give such dispatch as may be necessary for your own ease, and the public service.

“ My Lords and Gentlemen;

“ The many advantages I have obtained for my own subjects have occasioned much opposition and long delay to this Peace.—It affords me great satisfaction, that my people will have it in their power, by degrees, to repair what they have suffered during so long and burthensome a war.—The easing our Foreign Trade, as far as is consistent with national credit, will deserve your care; and to think of proper methods for improving and encouraging our home trade and manufactures, particularly the fishery, which may be carried on to employ all our spare hands, and be a mighty benefit even to the remotest parts of this kingdom.—Several matters were laid before you last session, which the weight and multiplicity of other business would not permit you to perfect: I hope, you will take a proper opportunity to give them due consideration.—I cannot, however, but expressly mention my displeasure, at the unparalleled licentiousness in publishing seditious and scandalous Libels.—The impunity such practices have met with, has encouraged the blaspheming every thing sacred, and the propagating opinions tending to the overthrow of all religion and government.—Prosecutions have been ordered: But it will require some new law, to put a stop to this growing evil; and your best endeavours, in your respective stations, to discourage it.—The impious practice of Duelling requires some speedy and effectual remedy.—Now we are entering upon Peace abroad; let me conjure you all, to use your utmost endeavours for calming men's minds at home, that the arts of Peace may be cultivated. Let not groundless jealousies, contrived by a faction, and fomented by party rage, effect that which our foreign enemies could not. I pray God to direct all your consultations, for his glory, and the welfare of my people.”

* April 9. I was this morning with Lord Treasurer, to present to him a young son of the late earl of Jersey, at the desire of the widow. There I saw the mace and great coach for Lord Treasurer, who was going to parliament. Our society met to day; but I expected the Houses would sit longer than I cared to fast; so I dined with a friend, and never inquired how matters went till eight this evening, when I went to lord Orkney's, where I found sir Thomas Hanmer. The queen delivered her speech very well, but a little weaker in her voice. The crowd was vast. The order for an Address was moved: and opposed by lords Nottingham, Halifax, and Cowper. Lord Treasurer spoke with great spirit and resolution; lord Peterborough flirtd against the duke of Marlborough (who is in Germany you know), but it was in answer to one of lord

The Lords' Address.] The queen being retired, and the Commons gone back to their House, the duke of Beaufort made a motion for an Address of thanks, which occasioned a debate, chiefly about the expression of a General Peace. Some peers urged, that it could not be said to be general, since the emperor, the elector of Hanover, and other princes and states of the empire, were not yet come into it. But they were answered, That it might justly be called general, since the major part of the allies had signed it. After this, another motion was made, That in the Address of Thanks, a clause might be inserted, That her majesty would be pleased to lay before the House the Treaties of Peace and Commerce: but, the question being put, it was carried in the negative by a majority of 74 against 43. The Address of congratulation being agreed to, though without any approbation of the Peace, it was presented to the queen, and is as follows:

“ We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, do, with the greatest joy and satisfaction, return our humble thanks to your majesty, for your most gracious Speech from the throne; and for communicating to your parliament, that a Peace is concluded; by which we hope, by the blessing of God, that your people will, in a few years, recover themselves after so long and expensive a war: and also do congratulate your majesty upon the success of your endeavours for a General Peace. We never had the least doubt, but that your majesty, who is the great support and ornament of the Protestant religion, would continue to take, as you have always done, the wisest measures for securing the Protestant Succession: towards which, nothing can be more necessary, than the perfect friendship there is between your majesty and the House of Hanover.—And we humbly assure your majesty, that, as you express your dependence, next under God, upon the duty and affection of your people, we think ourselves bound, by the strictest ties of religion, loyalty, and gratitude, to make all the dutiful returns that can be paid by the most obedient subjects to the most indulgent sovereign.”

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty returned this Answer:

“ My Lords; I do most heartily thank you for this Address: And be assured, that I take a particular satisfaction, that you so kindly express the confidence you have in me.”

The Commons' Address.] The Commons being returned to their House, as usual; Mr. Pitts made a Motion for an Address of Thanks, which was carried nem. con. and the motion for a clause, That the Treaties of Peace and Commerce might be communicated to the House, waved. The next day, Mr. Pitts, Halifax's impertinences. The order for an Address passed by a majority of 33, and the Houses rose before six.” Swift's Journal.

Chairman of the Committee appointed to draw up the Address, reported the same to the House, and after a short debate, about the words, 'to see accomplished,' which by a great majority were voted to stand, the Address was agreed to; and on the 11th presented to the Queen as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign;

"We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great-Britain in parliament assembled, beg leave, with all humility, to approach your royal person with our unanimous acknowledgments for all the benefits we enjoy under your majesty's most auspicious reign.—The many and great successes which have attended your majesty's arms, had left nothing to be wished, but such a Peace as might be conducted by your councils, which now we have the happiness to see accomplished; and as we are truly sensible of your majesty's gracious and generous intentions, in undertaking that great work, so we have all possible reason to admire your steadiness in carrying it on, and overcoming the many difficulties contrived to obstruct it: and it is with the highest satisfaction, we congratulate your majesty upon the happy conclusion of this Treaty: for we are so much convinced of your majesty's tender regard to the public welfare; and the many instances of your wisdom have taught us to have so perfect a reliance upon it, that we cannot doubt but your majesty hath procured all reasonable satisfaction for your allies, and established the interest of your own kingdoms in such a manner, as to make us not only secure for the future, but a flourishing and a happy people.—Your majesty can give no higher proof of the care you take of posterity, than by the concern you are pleased to express for the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover, upon which the future happiness of this kingdom so much depends. We hope, and trust, that nothing will ever be able to interrupt the friendship between your majesty and that illustrious family, since the wicked designs of those who would endeavour to separate your interests, must be too plain ever to succeed.—Your faithful Commons can never enough express the grateful sense they have of the many gracious assurances contained in your majesty's Speech; and after what your majesty hath done to ease your subjects of the heavy burden which before lay upon them, and after your unparalleled goodness in demanding nothing from them for the time to come, but what they themselves shall judge requisite for their own safety; the best return they can make, will be a ready and dutiful compliance with every thing you have been pleased to recommend: and they cannot fail most cheerfully to set about providing the supplies necessary for this year's service. Your majesty's repeated condescensions must in the strongest manner engage the hearts and affections of all your subjects to your majesty, and we are satisfied we cannot more truly represent them, than by contributing our utmost endeavours to make your reign as prosperous, glorious and easy to yourself, as it is beneficial and happy to your people."

The Queen's Answer.] To this Address the Queen was pleased to answer,

"Gentlemen, This Address cannot but be very agreeable to me, as it comes from my loyal Commons; and as it is a continuation of those expressions of duty and affection which you have shewn through this whole parliament."

REPORTS OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—Remarks on the Management and Disposal of the Public Revenue—Debts due to the Army.] April 16. Mr. Shippen, from the Commissioners to examine and state the Debts due to the Army, Transport service, and Sick and Wounded, laid before the Commons, their Report, with their Remarks on the Management and Disposal of the Public Revenue, and their Report of their Proceedings in examining the Debts due to the Army. Both which Reports were soon after printed, and the substance of which is as follows:

"Your Commissioners, since their last Report, have finished a general State of the Receipts and Issues of her majesty's Exchequer, from Michaelmas 1709, to Michaelmas, 1710, and from Michaelmas 1711, to 1712, being two years more of the time allotted for their Enquiry into the Accounts of the kingdom; which they humbly offer to your consideration, with their farther Remarks on several Misapplications and unwarrantable Practices in persons concerned in the Management and Disposal of the Public Revenue.

"We begin with those relating to the economy of the Army, which, in our opinion, have greatly contributed to that exorbitant expence with which the War hath been carried on by this nation: And we hope what is here produced may answer the expectation of the House, though we are forced to omit many particulars for want of opportunity to examine the Deputy-Paymasters on oath, through whose hands most of the public money, issued for this service, hath passed.

"Mr. Sweet, Deputy-Paymaster in Holland, could only give us satisfaction to some Mismanagements there; and we, apprehending a strict Enquiry into them of importance to the public, transmitted in October last, a precept to him at Amsterdam, requiring his attendance on us, which we understood would be no impediment to the current service, he having, before that time, been dismissed from his employment: But, instead of complying with our summons, he desired an indulgence of six months stay in Holland, which being no longer than the continuance of our Commission, and a request grounded on reasons not fit otherwise to be acquiesced in, we renewed our precept, and insisted on his appearance, with books and papers as would enable him to give us an exact account of all the public money he had received and paid during the course of the war. His second answer was a repetition of is first; and no personal information is, we believe, to be expected from him, without the interposition of parliament.

“ Mr. Morrice, Deputy-Paymaster in Portugal, is lately dead, and we are totally disabled from looking into his accounts. But the Paymaster-General hath sent over a person to Lisbon, to examine and prepare them.

“ Mr. Mead, Deputy-Paymaster in Spain, is now arrived in England; but we have not been possessed of any of his papers and books, till very lately, and, for that reason, do not pretend to offer our opinions of his accounts.

“ One of the great Mismanagements of the Army, is, that of paying regiments without establishments.

“ The Paymaster-General hath returned on oath to us, That the regiments of Hogon, l'Assa and Dalzel, were paid by authority of the General's warrant only. Whereas, according to the best information we can receive, no regiment, troop, or company, ought to be paid, without being first placed on some establishment, signed by the crown, and counter-signed by the Lord High-Treasurer, or Commissioners of the Treasury, for the time being; and therefore the Generals could not regularly direct such payments, unless the crown had delivered this power upon them, which does not appear by any commission or instructions to have been done. Nor can we understand how they could charge the subsistence of several regiments, serving in Spain, with the large payments that have been made to a body of Catalans, formed there after the battle of Almanza.

“ The money given for contingencies and extraordinary of the war, is by the General's commissions subjected to their directions, because it was impossible to settle any exact establishments for those expences, especially in the distant parts of the war. But to increase the number of forces beyond what was fixed by the crown, and provided for by parliament, plainly raising men, and consequently money, without the consent of either.

“ As some regiments have been paid which were never on any establishments, so we find others paid before they were established. The regiment of Evans received 9,029*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.* from the time it was raised to the 24th of Dec. 1703; when it was first placed on the establishment for Flanders. The regiment of Pearce received pay from the 8th of January 1705-6 when made Dragoons, to the 24th of December. The regiment of Nassau, from the 12th of July 1706, to the 24th of December. The regiment of Tyrrel and Fielding, from April 1711; when they came from Ireland, to his present time. The regiment of Rochford, from the 27th of August to the 22d of Dec. 1709. The regiment of Dubourgay for the year 1709. The earl of Galway's Spanish regiment of foot for the same year. But of this last regiment we have received so very uncertain an account, that there seems to have been an unnecessary expence drawn on the public, by providing for it, as well when placed on establishment, as when not. For captain Henry Pulein hath deposed, That he had a captain's commission in it, dated the 6th of April 1709, given him by the earl of Galway; That he arrived in Portugal in June following, when he heard the regiment were taken prisoners: that he only found two or three officers there, but never saw any private men, nor never heard that any musters were taken. The Commissary and the Paymaster-General have likewise both deposed, That they never saw any muster-rolls: But there was a list of prisoners returned to the Paymaster, after this regiment was supposed to have been taken by the enemy, wherein is no more than the name of one private man inserted; which hath created a suspicion, that it was an imaginary regiment only and never actually raised.

“ Some regiments have been placed on several establishments at the same time; Farrington's was provided for by parliament in the year 1707, on three establishments (viz.) on that of the 40,000 men in Flanders; on that of the 20,000 men in Flanders; and on the additional establishment of Spain and Portugal. Mordaunt's and Maccartney's were provided for on the establishment of the 20,000 men in Flanders, and on the additional establishment for Spain and Portugal. Hill's and Hotham's were put in both the estimates for Spain and Portugal for the same year, and twice provided for by parliament. The sum of 90,954*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.* was given more for these five regiments than was applied to their use; But Mr. Bridges alledges, That so much of the sum as relates to the regiments of Mordaunt Farrington, and Maccartney, was issued for the pay of some foreign corps.

“ Other regiments have been paid different from their respective establishments; That of Elliot was placed in the years 1705 and 1706, on the establishments of the 40,000 men in Flanders, at 44*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* per diem, but paid by Mr. Bridges at the rate of 39*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.* Those of Lalo, Farrington and Maccartney were in 1705 and 1706, on the establishment of the 20,000 men in Flanders, at 42*l.* 10*s.* per diem, but paid at 39*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* That of Hamilton was on the establishments of Spain and Portugal in the years 1709 and 1710, at 42*l.* 10*s.* per diem, but paid at 39*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* That of Mordaunt, in 1707, was on the establishment at 42*l.* 10*s.* per diem, but paid at 39*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* That of Farrington in 1707, was on the establishment at 42*l.* 10*s.* per diem, but paid at 39*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* That of Maccartney, in the same year was on the establishment at 42*l.* 13*s.* per diem, but paid at 39*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* That of Blosset was on the establishment at 36*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.* per diem, but paid at 32*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.* From whence it is observable, that there was given by parliament a considerable sum, more than was applied to this service, or is yet otherwise accounted for.

“ As these regiments have received less than their establishments, so that of Carles hath received 1,819*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* more; it being placed on the establishments for the years 1708 and 1709, at 28*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* per diem only, and paid at the rate of 42*l.* 10*s.*

“A farther charge hath been occasioned by paying regiments on two establishments at the same time. The whole Scottish forces (consisting at the Union, of one troop of Horse-guards, one troop of Grenadier-guards, two regiments of Dragoons, one regiment of Foot-guards, three regiments, and three independent-companies of foot, the garrisons of Fort-William, Dunbarton, Edinburgh, Stirling, and Blackness, with the general-officers, and artillery-companies) were paid both on the English and Scottish establishments from the 24th of December 1707 inclusive, to the first of January exclusive.

“We cannot take upon us to declare, whether all or any of these payments can be accounted for otherwise than by subsequent authorities to justify what was at first irregular: Nor whether such authorities, when obtained, are warrantable and legal. But here we beg leave to state a very unusual proceeding in relation to a payment made to major-general Maccartney, who, as commander in chief of an intended expedition to Canada, was, by the establishment for that purpose, to receive 10*l.* per diem from the 1st of March 1708-9.

“But instead of issuing this pay, as it became due, a warrant was granted the 1st of April, counter-signed by Robert Walpole, esq. then Secretary at War, for the immediate payment of 3,650*l.* (being the amount of it for a whole year) to major-general Maccartney, or those claiming under him, though he should die sooner in the service.

“Pursuant to which, the paymaster, Mr. Howe, on the 7th of April paid in part 840*l.* whereof 42*l.* was deducted for poundage, and 21*l.* 10*s.* for Hospital. But soon after major-general Maccartney falling under her majesty's displeasure, and the command of the expedition being given to major-general Whetham, he refused to comply farther with this extraordinary warrant.

“By a writing, dated the 8th of April, major-general Maccartney acknowledged, that captain Robert Gardner had advanced to him and his family, several sums amounting exactly to 3,650*l.* In consideration whereof he assigned to captain Gardner, or order, all his right and title to the like sum, given him by the Warrant above mentioned; and as a farther satisfaction, promised to procure another Warrant for the same sum in Mr. Gardner's own name, and for his proper use; which was accordingly done.

“The second Warrant, counter-signed by the earl of Godolphin, Lord-Treasurer, bears date the 10th of November 1709, and is drawn in terms agreeable to major-general Maccartney's promise. But is grounded on a suggestion, that Mr. Gardner had disbursed 3,650*l.* for the extraordinary services of the war, for which, as Mr. Gardner himself hath deposed, there was not the least pretence, he having only supplied major-general Maccartney and his family, with money for their own private occasions. Besides, it is plain, by his account of this debt, that a great part of the money was lent before he, or Mr. Maccartney, had any knowledge of the expedition. However, he received the 12th of January following, 2,854*l.* 10*s.* without any deductions for Poundage or Hospital, which with the 795*l.* 10*s.* before received, made up the clear sum of 3,650*l.*

“A considerable time after these particulars had appeared to us by the Accounts and cash of Mr. Gardner, and Mr. Mirrill, we received a Letter from major-general Maccartney, &c. at the request of Mr. Gardner, which (being very circumstantial) is here transcribed at large, that the House may consider the fact & all its views.

“Gentlemen; This inclosed letter from captain Gardner, desiring me to acquaint your honourable board with the circumstances and considerations of a warrant for 3,650*l.* now under your examination, occasions you the trouble of mine, to lay before you what I remember in that proceeding.—In December 1708, my lord Godolphin proposed to me, the command of an expedition to Canada, on a scheme recommended to her majesty by the commissioners of trade, and projected by one Mr. Veich; which having, by his lordship's Orders, considered, I returned the papers to the Lords of the Cabinet-Council, with such alterations as their lordships then approving of commanded me to attend them frequently at the Cockpit: and that I should procure all possible intelligence and information of the places and necessaries, &c. for better effecting of this service, of which the expence and pains should be considered in the establishment.—The pay at first proposed to me, was 5*l.* per day, to which I made no objection in view of proceeding to the government of Jamaica, when this expedition should be ended, and of leaving my pay, as colonel at home, to subsist my family while abroad.—Some time in January, my lord Godolphin told me, that her majesty having occasion to oblige the duke of Newcastle, by giving a regiment to Mr. Sutton, it would be kindly taken if I could submit to the disposal of mine then in Flanders, but that I should propose some equivalent in writing. Accordingly, I gave his lordship a memorial, of which Mr. Gardner will present you a copy; and thereupon my pay was augmented to 10*l.* per day, and one whole year agreed to be advanced to me on the considerations therein mentioned. The warrant granted me according to agreement for 3,650*l.* I assigned to captain Gardner, who supplied me with money during my attendance and expensive preparations, and of which he received some part before I had the misfortune of being dismissed from her majesty's service.—But this first warrant admitting of deductions, and the paymaster-general making difficulty of paying the remainder: I again applied to the then Lord-Treasurer, and the then Secretary at War, for redress, and the performance of their engagements; that since I had, at their desire, given up my regiment and pay as general-officer in Flanders, and borrowed money to provide myself for this expedition, my creditors and family ought not to starve, though according to Mr. Howe's explanation of the warrant, I was not yet dead. On this application, my Lord Treasurer promised to procure a second warrant, which, though for the whole sum of 3,650*l.* should serve only to obtain the unpaid remainder of the first: And I then going a volunteer to Flanders, prayed that this warrant might be made payable to captain Gardner, to whom the whole money was then due.—If in this plain relation, I have omitted any thing, you are desirous to be informed of, or if by waiting on you in person, you think I may give your honourable board any further satisfaction, I will readily obey your orders to Gentlemen, your, &c. G. MACCARTNEY.

‘ November 11, 1712.’

“ This Letter is so far from removing the irregularity of the payment, that it adds some circumstances, which are more aggravating, than what hath yet appeared to your commissioners. But, before we proceed to any observations, we must acquaint the House, that the memorial (which Mr. Maccartney presented to the lord Godolphin, and of which he says he were to expect a copy from Mr. Gardner) is either lost or withdrawn. It is not to be found in the Treasury, nor in the office of the auditors of the imposts; and Mr. Gardner declares on oath, that he neither hath the original, nor any copy; which deprives us of the opportunity of examining into the grounds and reasons of this secret. But, from what hath been proved to us, the first warrant seems to be an indirect disposition of appropriated money, which ought not to have been paid but for services performed; and the clause ordering the advance of a year's pay, though the major-general should die sooner, is not to be justified. If then the first warrant should be thought blameable, the second perhaps will be judged more so, when it is considered, that it is as not only grounded on a false suggestion, but contained a direction to exempt this payment from the customary deduction of poundage and hospital, but was procured at a time when major-general Maccartney was under her majesty's high disfavour, and when major-general Whetham had actually a right to the pay, as succeeding into his command. By which means if the expedition had taken effect, the government had been put to a double expence. Major-general Maccartney might have reason to apply to the then Lord Treasurer, and the then secretary at war, for dress (as he calls it) and insist on the performance of their engagements to him, since he had at their desire given up his regiment, and borrowed money: But this is no argument, that they could at that juncture, consistent with their respective trusts, and without deceiving her majesty, procure him an equivalent, or undertake to pay his debts out of the public money; or that Mr. Howe had not a more strict regard to his duty, in refusing to comply with the first warrant. Nor is the advancement of the pay, from 5*l.* per diem to 10*l.* to be justified by what this letter urges. For the account there given, is rather an accusation of those concerned in it, as bartering away the public money to gratify private interests and solicitations.

“ However, when the pay was settled, he might with justice, had he continued in command, have claimed it as it became due out of the money appropriated to that service. But, as the case stood, there was no pretence whatsoever for paying the sum in question. For he could not claim it, as commander in chief, because (as has been said) he was not so, when the second warrant which took effect, was granted, and the expedition itself was totally laid aside. Nor could he claim it as an equivalent for his regiment, because any such bargain was illegal, and could by no means subject the extraordinaries of the war to the conditions of it. Now whether the person, who received the money, remains accountable to the public for it, or whether he is not, in some sort, discharged by the warrants, is a question proper only for the decision of the House.

“ Another instance of Mismanagement in the Army, is, mustering the troops complete. The deputy-commissary in Flanders, Mr. Marshal, hath declared on oath, That, in the beginning of this war, he was directed by the duke of Marlborough to muster the troops in her majesty's pay there complete when defective; that he received a pistole per troop and 10 shillings per company, as a gratuity or perquisite, on every muster from the subject troops; that he never mustered the foreigners, only some corps of them in the year 1702, without having any treaty or establishment for his guide: that he does not know of any other person employed in that service, except Mr. Armstrong, who was once sent (as he has heard) to Liege to view part of the augmentation troops; that he received gratuities on account of the Hanover and Hessian troops; that he applied to the duke of Marlborough after 1702, for a power to muster the foreigners in her majesty's pay, but never could obtain it. The deputy-commissaries in Spain have likewise declared on oath, that, by order of their respective generals, they always mustered the subject troops complete, and signed the rolls without viewing them or knowing any thing of their number or condition; but that they never mustered the foreigners. Mr. Pitt received as a gratuity or perquisite, on every muster, half a pistole per troop and company, during the whole time of his being commissary. Mr. Craggs refused all gratuities for the two first years, after he was made commissary, but the last six months received a pistole per company, and a moidore per troop.

“ This practice, we see, is grounded on the general's orders; on the duke of Marlborough's in Flanders; on the other generals in the other parts of the service, and it is justified by the pretence of applying the non-effective money to the recruiting the army; which is alledged, to have been so far from proving a disadvantage to the public, that it hath been a loss to those officers, who were obliged to recruit their respective regiments, troops and companies, and to take it in lieu of recruit money. Notwithstanding which, your commissioners think themselves obliged to take notice, that those warrants, or orders of the generals, have been a direct breach of the law, an occasion of great expence to the public, and a detriment to the service. First, they are a direct breach of the law. For by the acts of mutiny and desertion, the commissaries are joined to muster only effectives, and that in a very precise and exact manner. If the contrary practice had been thought serviceable to the public, no doubt the legislature would have prescribed it in some of those acts, which were only temporary, and every year capable of receiving any amendments. But being constantly renewed in the same strict terms as to the musters, though frequently altered as to other points, they seem to be so many repeated condemnations of this practice. Nor can your commissioners be informed that there was ever any attempt in parliament to make it legal by those who directed it; and it may therefore be presumed, that they either did not think fit to own the practice, or that they apprehended themselves under no obligations to the laws in this case, as not extending to her majesty's forces abroad. But such a construction can by no means be admitted, being inconsistent with the design and nature of laws, intended to regulate the army in time of war, and to be a rule to the Paymaster-general. For if the effect of them should be restrained to the forces at home, which are but few, then the troops in service abroad, which are the greatest part of those in her majesty's pay, would be under no discipline, the public money squandered without any method or rule of payment, and all the ends of these acts entirely defeated. A further proof of the irregularity of this practice is, that when it was judged proper to allow a man per company on the muster-rolls, for maintenance of officers poor widows; the queen was empowered by a particular clause to give such orders to the several commissaries. Which supposes the crown could not otherwise have legally done it in a case that must be confessed to be of great encouragement to the service. If then the crown could not dispense with any part of these laws, your commissioners conceive so notorious and open an infraction of them will never be indulged or justified in others, on any pretence whatsoever.

"This practice was unnecessary, as well as illegal. For all the pretended uses of it might have been effectually and regularly answered by respites, if they had been made in the manner prescribed by the acts. But that having never been done during this practice, the commissaries have so long been useless; the officers made the only checques on themselves with respect to the effectives: the crown deprived of the right of disposing of the money raised by respites, and that power transferred to the general. But it has also been an occasion of great expence to the public, and a detriment to the service. The Paymaster-general (as he urges in apology for himself) was under an obligation of paying and remitting more money, than was sufficient for carrying on the service. For the troops being mustered compleat, and the muster-rolls being his only guide, he was constrained to make his payments full, though he had reason to believe the troops were at the same time not above half compleat, particularly those in the more remote parts.

"The earl of Godolphin, when lord-treasurer, ordered him in 1707, to present the method of mustering and paying the troops compleat, as a grievance to the earl of Galway (general in Spain and Portugal) and he accordingly did it in very pressing terms, as occasioning great losses to the public.

"We are unable to explain how it came to be continued after so just a Remonstrance against it; no reason appearing to us, why those in the treasury should retract their opinion of the great losses occasioned by it. The earl of Galway's return to Mr. Bridgeman's representation, is no answer to the objection; but a confirmation of the truth of them. A little regard was afterwards had to this complaint, that in the year 1709, on raising 50 regiments of dragoons in Portugal, the earl of Galway issued warrants to the respective commanders of those regiments to reduce each troop to 31 private men; and that, having that number on the spot, they should pass as compleat, though by the establishment they were to consist of 45. On a computation of the pay for the 14 men per troop from the 24th of August 1709, (which was the time when these regiments were placed on the establishments in Portugal) to the 9th of July 1711, there appeared the sum of 25,983*l.* to have been sunk, or applied, by virtue of this warrant. After the earl of Galway left the service, this method of mustering the troops compleat, was pursued by all the succeeding generals in those parts. Her majesty, highly sensible of the evil consequence of it, and apprehending the expence of the Spanish war would thereby become insupportable to her subjects, was graciously pleased in 1711, to send instructions to the deputy paymasters there to pay none but effectives; and then the inconveniences of it, which had been so long submitted to, were owned and presented in their full light. But the whole matter will be best explained by the Letters-Answers, and Memorials of the several deputy paymasters, and we are prepared to present attested copies thereof, when the House shall be pleased to call for them; together with the most material depositions relating to the above subject in this Report. Whereby I hope you will receive satisfaction, that we have stated no fact without evidence, nor enced any observation without authority. It might be added, that this method had been a further occasion of expence, by supplying Provisions, Transports, Clothes, and other necessaries, according to the full establishments; and the troops (as is before said) being every where defective, and in some parts of the war not above half complete, the loss on these heads must be proportionable to the deficiency.

"We cannot yet form any representation of the produce of the Non-effective Money, or compare it with the expence of recruiting; because the Pay-master-General hath only exhibited to us some abstracts thereof, returned on his Deputies abroad, which he cannot test as perfect accounts. Nor can we receive any more certain information in this matter from Mr. Le Fevre, who was secretary to the General from the beginning in Portugal. For he deposes, that the book, in which he kept an exact and distinct account of all the Non-effectives in Spain and Portugal, was taken from this office some time before he left Lisbon; and that the loss of this book disables him from giving an account of the Non-effective Money, which he could otherwise very particularly have done. It cannot therefore be determined, whether the loss has fallen on the public or the recruiting officers: But on what side soever it hath fallen, the practice is equally culpable, and will avail little to the vindication of those who directed it. It is highly probable the loss hath only affected the public, otherwise it will be difficult to account for the constant contributions, which have been made to the commissaries on every muster by the subject troops, for the presents which were given occasionally to the foreigners. For we cannot imagine that they would make presents, or allow perquisites, if what they found an injury to them. However that be, the demand or even the acceptance of gratuities on musters from the troops the commissaries, if it is not to be accounted a corruption in them, it hath at least the appearance of it, and must be admitted to be some degree a breach of their duty; or, it must be granted that (as they plead in their own defence) they could be guilty of no breach, because they lay under no obligation, and receive their offices, as offices of form, and not of duty.

"What hath been hitherto said relates only to her majesty's subject troops. But the mismanagements have been yet greater and more various, with respect to the Foreign Forces in British pay; they never having been mustered at all. For neither the review made by Mr. Marsbail in conjunction with the Dutch commissary without treaty or establishment for his side, nor that reported to be made by Mr. Armstrong of a particular corps at Liegè, can be accounted musters, no lists thereof being returned to the British commissaries, or paymasters. But if it should be insisted on, that these were musters; it is extraordinary that such as they were) they should be discontinued, and that the commissaries application to the duke of Marlborough for an order to muster them in succeeding years, should be unsuccessful. The reason given to support this practice, as it concerns the subject troops, ceases with regard to the foreigners. For they, or their respective princes are always allowed both ordinary or extraordinary recruit money, besides their constant pay; as appears by the several treaties, conventions and stipulations with them; and there is not the least colour for their being mustered complete, when they were defective, nor any excuse for those who refused to give power for their being mustered at all. Because the public, paying always complete, is thereby evidently defrauded, and, in effect, pay twice for the same thing.

"Your Commissioners would not insinuate, that the restraining the commissary in Flanders from mustering the foreign troops; was an implied or secret article, in the stipulation for the deduction of two and a half per cent. from their pay. But it is very remarkable, that the warrant for the deduction bears date in 1702, and that since that year, the foreigners' in her majesty's pay only have been under no regulation, though we are informed, those in the service of the States-General were constantly mustered.

"We cannot omit observing farther, that the payments of the extraordinaries to the foreigners in the Low-Countries in the joint pay of her majesty and the States-General, have been made pursuant to the certificates of Mr. Van Slingerlandt, secretary to the council of States, without the examination or concurrence of any appointed by her majesty, till of late. Now it is in no sort evident to us how such certificates can be received as vouchers in passing the accounts of the paymaster, or how an order of the States can charge the public money of Great-Britain: And yet, since the beginning of the war, no less than the sum of 597,771*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*  $\frac{1}{2}$  hath been paid on this head only.

"This practice of mustering complete was never directed here in England: Mr. Crawford, deputy commissary-general, hath deposed, that he takes it to be illegal, and that he gave orders not only to the deputies in England, but to all the deputies abroad to muster only effectives, and the men allowed in each regiment for the support of widows and servants to officers. However, the musters have been made without due regard to the acts of mutiny and desertion, or to the instructions given to the deputy-commissaries; some instances of which were represented to the House the first sessions of this parliament by a committee appointed for that purpose; and some others have since appeared to us. Several persons who have long served in the first regiment of foot-guards, have declared on oath, that for the two last years there have not been in any one company of that regiment above 48, and sometimes but 36 men, whereas there should have been 65 besides servants, (before they were lately reduced) that the names of several persons were inserted in the rolls, who were never listed nor seen in the regiment, and others certified sick by the chirurgeon without his seeing them, or knowing any thing of the state of their health. The same irregularities have been practised in other regiments; but we are the less particular, because they are very notorious.

"There is a pretence of mustering in Scotland, but the Rolls have always been returned complete, and by the acknowledgment on oath of several officers belonging to the regiments of dragoons there, and of Mr. John Campbell, late contractor for providing forage, the troops have ever since the Union been generally six or seven less than their complements besides the officers servants, and two hautboys returned in each troop, whenever any were mustered, except a few in general Echlin's regiment, and that for a short time only. This is confirmed by the oath of Mr. Rutherford, in whose name the commission of muster-master was issued, dated the 30th of July 1709, and who executed that office; but by an agreement with one Mr. Elliot, a laceman in York-buildings, (for whose use this commission was obtained) he was to receive only 6s. 8d. out of the 20s. per day, payable to the commissary by the establishment, and was also obliged to give to Mr. Elliot the perquisites of 2 guineas per troop, and 10s. per company allowed by them on each muster. Your commissioners therefore are not surprised to find that the public hath suffered by false musters in Scotland, when the office of muster-master was given to a person unqualified for it, and he employed a deputy (for Mr. Rutherford owns he was no more, though named in the commission) on so hard terms. Besides, Mr. Elliot was at that time agent to the earl of Hindford's regiment; an office not consistent, we apprehend, with that of muster-master. The ill consequences of these false musters, appear likewise in the unnecessary expence of forage for the dragoon horses. For they were very defective, as well as the men, and the certificates from the officers to the contractors, were also complete. Mr. Cochran confesses, that when he was contractor, he received the queen's bounty-money for near 300 horses more, than he provided with forage.

"The Management of the Hospitals is another grievance of the Army, and we therefore lay before you such informations, as we have received, of the excessive charge in furnishing provisions for them, particularly those in Spain, together with the hardships the sick men there have endured, by the scarcity and unwholesomeness of the provisions, and by the great frauds of the persons, who provided beds, medicines and other contingencies for them. Dr. La Cane deposed, that he attended the hospitals in Spain for some time; that he, observing the accounts of Mr. Marks, the director, to be very extravagant, refused to sign them, which as physician he was required to do; that during the 3 years Marks continued director, each sick man cost the public 2s. 6d. a day, beside 5d. deducted from the regiments; That Marks allowed the recovering men (which were generally one half) only 5d. per day to provide for themselves, and charged to the government 2s. 6d. for each of those men; that this management continued from the year 1706 to June 1709, when Marks was dismissed. These Hospitals were, for the years 1706, 7, and 8, paid out of the poundage of the army, being principally intended for Chelsea College, a great debt and expence hath arisen on that head. In June 1709, a contract was made with Dr. La Cane at 10d. per head from the government and 5d. per head from the regiments. This contract continued above a year, during which time the men were very well supplied, as is proved to us, by the oaths of M. Durette chaplain, and Mr. Hay chirurgeon to the Hospital, though provisions were as dear as when Marks furnished them. By comparing the rates of this contract, with those allowed to Marks, it is plain, that the provisions for one half of the men cost the public more than double what it might have been furnished for, and that for the other half the public paid six parts in seven more than the sick received.

"As to the Scarcity and Unwholesomeness of the provisions furnished by Marks, not only Dr. La Cane, physician, but Mr. Chicot and Mr. Hay, chirurgeons, have sworn, that very often the beef, and other flesh, was carrion, and that all the provisions were generally so unsound, as to occasion a constant mortality. Besides, Marks did not furnish half the quantity which he ought to have done. The allowance to each sick man was fourteen Spanish ounces of bread per diem, and he seldom gave them more than six. The proportion was the same with respect to other provisions; so that on these two heads he made as great an advantage to himself, out of the allowance to the poor men, as he had in the other articles from the public. Dr. La Cane farther deposed, that Mr. Watkins (who was director before Mr. Marks, received 1,000*l.* to buy Bedding for the hospitals, of which he expended very little, that the sick men lay on the ground, till the magistrates of Valencia in compassion, supplied them with bedding at their own charge; that afterwards Mr. Marks received 300*l.* for the same purpose but never laid out any part of it. So great a mismanagement could not have continued so long, without the connivance, at least, of those persons, who were appointed by the generals to be a check on Marks's accounts; but he being now in Germany, his native country, we cannot arrive at a more particular knowledge of that matter.

"As to the Hospitals in Flanders, we have examined Mr. Cardonnel, who audited the accounts, and Mr. Etquel and Mr. Amiens, chirurgeons. The first informed us, that he left all the accounts, except those of 1711, with Mr. Sweet in Holland, and that he could not charge his memory with any particulars. The other two said, they signed the accounts only as a matter of form without examining them: Mr. Hudson, the director of these Hospitals, and Mr. Sweet, the deputy pay-master, can give the best information. But one is in Flanders, and the other (as is before observed) in Holland; for which reason, we cannot proceed in this enquiry. The same must be said with relation to the Hospitals in Portugal. For though we find in Mr. Brydges's accounts, great sums of money paid by Mr. Morris, to Mr. Bucknell, deputy commissary there, and to Mr. Keat, some time director of those Hospitals; yet Mr. Bucknell being in Portugal, Mr. Keat at Port-Mahont, and their papers not transmitted to England, we cannot know the exact distribution of those sums, or of any other issued to them for that purpose.

"But the Mismanagement in the Hospitals abroad, have not been more gross in their kind, than those in Chelsea-College. For it appears on oath, that a great many persons have been received into this hospital, who never served in the Army, as coachmen to the governor, and deputy-governor, clerks to the deputy-paymaster of the pensioners, servants to the officers of the house, and many more; others have been admitted by forged certificates, of which the instances are too numerous to be inserted here, and we will only mention two. Francis Core, messenger to the war-office in 1709, made public declarations that he could get any person into the hospital for money. Whereupon abundance of poor people, butchers, ale-house keepers, bakers and taylor, applied to him: amongst others Salathiel Humphrey gave him 6 guineas, Nicholas Taylor 11 guineas, John Smith 10 guineas, and were all accordingly admitted, though none of them qualified. Middleton and Dumster, serjeants in the hospital, took 12 guineas from Thomas Fletcher for his admission. Several persons after their admission, have been advanced in their pay, and without qualification to warrant such advancement. They are too many likewise to be mentioned; but this practice hath very much contributed to the charge of the hospital. Some persons who were fit for service, and some, who have sufficient substance to support themselves, have been admitted, as Evans, Holloway, Marks and Price, with many more; which is contrary to the intention of the foundation, and hath also created an unnecessary expense.

"Another Abuse is the defrauding the Pensioners of a great part of their provisions. It appears by the Depositions of Spencer, Grimes and Hardy, pensioners there, that each man's allowance of beef, when boiled, seldom weighed above 6 ounces, and very often but four, which according to the establishment ought to have been a pound, when raw. The same persons have sworn, that the provisions are very bad, and no ways answerable to the contracts. The contracts for furnishing provisions have been made at much higher rates than those for other hospitals, and perhaps it is, in some measure, owing to the presents the contractors thought themselves obliged to give to the governor and lieutenant-governor. William Banks, a butcher, deposed, that he furnished the governor's family with meat, to the value of 110*l.* per ann. and gave a receipt for his bill without receiving any money. Mr. Green, the brewer, also deposed, that he made a present to the governor of the hospital, of the beer spent in his family, which amounted annually to 20*l.* or more; and that about fifteen months since he was persuaded by Mr. Crispé, clerk of the hospital, to do the same to the lieutenant-governor. The present contracts are made on much worse terms, than the former.

"The State of the Invalids in North Britain is this: Mr. Walter Lockhart, intendant, by the direction of the lord Godolphin, paid the 25*l.* of Dec. 1706, 5,987*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.* in money to Mr. Archibald Douglas receiver-general, and gave him certificates for 2,978*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* more due on the equivalent; both which sums are a stock to maintain the invalids. When this direction was given, the money was placed out at an interest on good security, which would in a great measure have supported them. But, since it has been lodged in Mr. Douglas's hands, no interest has been received for it, and they are subsisted out of the capital stock, which in a short time will reduce it to nothing, and leave them without any provision. There is reason to apprehend the expense of the war has been greatly increased, by making remittances abroad, for the army and navy, on terms very disadvantageous to the government.

"As to the Remittances for the Army in Flanders, sir Henry Furness was employed by the treasury to make the best bargains he could, and to be accountable to the public for the profit. We have required these accounts, and the auditor of the imprests, who is possessed of them, hath acquainted us, that he hath not yet been able, by reason of their bulk, to go through them. But we have information on oath, of an advantage of one per cent. and sometimes more, made by receiving money at Amsterdam, and paying it in Flanders. Captain Leathes, paymaster of the train of artillery, acknowledges, he received this premium to his own private use. But whether the deputy paymasters in Flanders and Holland had the same benefit, cannot be known, unless Mr. Sweet and captain Cartwright were in England.

"The Remittances for the Forces in Spain and Portugal have chiefly been undertaken by contractors, and the contracts have always been made on conditions, much exceeding the common rates of exchange. The same method have been practised in returning money for the use of the navy and victualling in Spain, Portugal, the West-India, and other parts.

"The Mismanagements in the Cloathing are as great and oppressive as any in the army; and we have not been wanting in our endeavours to detect some instances thereof, in order to have laid them before you. But we are not yet prepared to do it so fully and clearly, as we desire to state every thing, which we presume to offer to the house.

“ We have enquired into the execution of the several acts of parliament, relating to the issuing Debentures, for what remained due to commission officers, non-commission officers, and private men, serving in the last war; and find, that the earl of Ranelagh, late paymaster-general, did, according to the powers and directions given, make out Debentures for what was due to the non-commission officers and private men, and took security from the persons appointed to receive them: that several of those persons have not regularly, and on oath, accounted for them before the said paymaster, nor returned the unissued Debentures, as is directed by the act. But we cannot come to any exact state of what hath been paid, or accounted for, by reason some of those entrusted with the payment of the private men, have declined appearing before us, though frequently summoned; and others with their securities are dead, and their executors not to be met with. What therefore we have to offer on this subject, is from a return made on oath by Mr. Sloper, who issued most of the Debentures for the earl of Ranelagh: from whence it appears, That several persons remain still accountable for above 60,000*l*.

“ That the Debentures so issued by the paymaster, carried interest; and those which are not discharged by the purchase of Irish forfeitures, have still interest at six per cent. by a parliamentary provision. That the distance of the place where the private men served might be some pretence for these persons not accounting with them within the year; but we can see no reason for their not doing it in so many years, and consequently for not passing those accounts with the paymaster in some prescribed time. That there is no ground to believe, the private men, to whom these Debentures were due, are either dead, or not likely to make any claim. And the House will best judge, whether such sums should remain in the hands of private men, receiving a constant interest for them without any right whatsoever; or whether they might not rather be applied to the public service. We also find about 508 of the Debentures, which were prepared by the earl of Ranelagh in 1702-3, pursuant to the certificates of the commissioners for stating the debts of the army as due to the commission officers, have not yet been issued, nor called for; and we may presume, after so many years, will never be claimed. They amount in the whole to 7,126*l*. 2*s*. 6*d*. which will be so much saved to the public, unless they should be taken out by virtue of fraudulent administrations; a practice we have reason to suspect has been too frequent on this occasion.

“ Soon after the commencement of our commission, we required Mr. Whitfield, late paymaster of the Marines, to lay the accounts of those regiments before us; which, after many delays, he did, but in a very imperfect manner. We insisted on a more distinct account, whereupon he (being then very ill) sent his chief clerk, Mr. Sizer, to us; who deposed, That the accounts could not be more perfect without muster-rolls, which Mr. Lynn, the commissary, had not returned. In answer to this, Mr. Lynn hath declared, that he could not make up the muster-rolls further than the 24th of December, 1709, for want of the ships books and the certificates from the agents of the Commissioners for Sick and Wounded: Which books and certificates could not be had from the distant states of the service till those employed there came to England. These difficulties prevent our stating the accounts of the Marines. But it is obvious, That the expence of the navy is increased by them. The pay of 8,000 marines, according to the establishment, amounts to 128,133*l*. 5*s*. per annum. The pay of 8,000 ordinary seamen to 98,800*l*. per annum. The extraordinary charge therefore is 29,333*l*. 5*s*. and how far it might be thought necessary to continue in time of peace, is humbly left to the judgment and determination of parliament.

“ The next great branch of Expence to the Public is that of the Navy; and we here present what hath occurred to us on this head. First, we perceive considerable balances have continued in the hands of the treasurers, and of their executors after the time of their dismission or death; which, notwithstanding the great necessities of the government, have lain long unapplied to the services for which they were intended.

“ The Reasons given for this practice are, That the Treasurers ought by their instructions to detain money in their hands, when they are displaced, for satisfying defalcations, &c. and for defraying the expence of passing their accounts. But we cannot find the first argument favoured by a reasonable interpretation of the instructions, nor is there any just pretence, why the whole balances, in the hands of the preceding treasurers, should not be immediately paid over to their successors. On the contrary, there is very good ground for doing it, to avoid the charge of keeping clerks, and other instruments, for displaced, or dead officers, and that the money might be employed towards carrying on the current service. As to the defraying the expence of their accounts, his is by no means a method proper to hasten he passing them; and that allowance, if bought necessary, might be made several ways, eas prejudicial to the public, than by the detention of so great sums as usually have rested in their hands.— For this we have the opinion of the Commissioners of the Navy, who, as they are the sole examiners, so they are in consequence the sole judges of the Treasurer's accounts, though they do not finally pass them.

“ We also find large Imprests granted in the time of each Treasurer since the Revolution, whereof there remained uncleared the 31st of Oct. 1712, the sum of 607,851*l*. For which it is alledged, That the accounts have either been brought into the comptroller's office, or not sufficiently vouched, or that the accounts, or some of them, are before the comptroller, under the examination, or that the parties are abroad, and have wages due to them, which will not be allowed till their imprests be cleared, or that when the Treasurer brings the imprests to account in his ledger, they are allowed him in part, or the whole; and the parties are set insuper in the Exchequer.

“ But these allegations cannot, we presume, be admitted as sufficient. For the accounts ought to be brought in every year, where the distance of place will permit; and the large sums, which have been imprested to the store-keepers and clerks residing in England, from 1704, should have been long since accounted for. Whereas no effectual care hath been taken to compel them to it, and they seem too much left at their own liberty, to the great damage of the public. Though they are to be set insuper in the Exchequer, when the imprests are allowed to the Treasurer; yet the Treasurer's accounts are so long generally in passing, that the parties are often dead, or insolvent, before that is done: and of those which have been set insuper, there does not appear any considerable sums to have been accounted for. There are some imprests before 1702, which have neither been accounted for, nor set insuper, nor mentioned in the Treasurer's ledger; and other sums have been very lately repaid to the Treasurer in money; which have been so long imprested, that the interest would have equalled, if not exceeded the principal; to the great loss of the public, which paid interest for that money, as well as to the disadvantage of the service.

“ We should next lay before you the Management of the Commissioners for Victualling her majesty's Navy; which, as it hath the direction of so large an Article of expence, is of great consequence. But some instances of notorious embezzlements and scandalous abuses in her majesty's Brew-house, and in the contracts for furnishing the Navy with beer, having been lately examined and censured by parliament, the House wants less information of the frauds committed in this office, than of others concerned in the disposal of the revenue of the kingdom. However, we have not neglected to enquire farther into the proceedings of this commission, and find that the pursers, in combination with the agents and store-keepers, have carried on their fraudulent practices in all other species of provision, as well as beer, to the detriment of the government, and to the injury and discouragement of the seamen.

“ James Essex, purser of the Worcester, is charged with more than the full proportion of several species of provisions for 280 men, from the 18th of Jan. 1703-4 to the 11th of April 1709. But it appears from the musters, That at a medium no more than 237 men were victualled at that time on board this ship. He owns, that he often gave receipts for more provisions than he received; that he took money for the overplus; that he sold part of what was actually delivered to him; that is a common practice among pursers; that the agents and store-keepers, employed at the out-ports, are instrumental in carrying it on, and have a share in the profit: that he is charged both at Portsmouth and Plymouth with provisions, which he neither received in kind, nor was paid for by the agents or store-keepers. This evidence is confirmed by the accounts of victualling this ship, wherein we find him charged at Plymouth with a considerable quantity of provisions on the 11th of April 1709, two days after the ship sailed from that port to Lisbon. We don't undertake to make any certain computation of the loss to the public on this head. But supposing a fifth only of the provisions to have been sold, (and Mr. Essex hath deposed, That he believed a much larger proportion of beer, and a fifth part at least, of all other species have been sold or compounded for with the agents or store-keepers) it amounts in ten years to more than 500,000*l*. For, by a medium of the prices paid for provisions during that time, the prime cost hath been 34 per cent. exclusive of the charges of management, more than is allowed to pursers, when they are creditors on their balance, which are paid by bills in course without interest. This practice is so strictly forbidden and provided against with so much caution, both in the instructions to the officers, employed in the Victualling, and on board the fleet, that it could not have continued without a combination amongst them. And we apprehend no new method can be proposed to prevent such abuses for the future, unless it should be thought advisable to make it as criminal, for pursers to sell provisions, as to embezzle any other of her majesty's stores. These frauds which have been so universally committed by the pursers and officers of the Victualling must have been detected, or in a great measure restrained, if the pursers accounts had been duly required, and well examined. But so much hath this duty been neglected, that, when we first went upon this inquiry, we found the accounts of 140 pursers out of employment, unpassed: some of them more than ten years standing: and of those now employed, a great many have passed no accounts in six or seven years. On the whole, it is submitted, whether in any case it is reasonable to entrust the same officer with the expending money, who is himself the proper check on the expence, or to allow him or appoint another to that purpose? Whether any person ought to have had the disposition of so large a sum, who was not constituted by the Commissioners of the Victualling, and who was under no security for the faithful discharge of his trust, and the answering the sums issued to him? Whether this practice be not censured and condemned by the Resolution of the House of Commons, the 27th of March 1699, That the Victualling any of her majesty's ships, by others than the Victuallers appointed for that service, or their agents, is contrary to the course of the Navy, and may be of ill consequence.

“ We have discovered some irregularities in the Commission for Sick and Wounded Seamen. Mr. Povey was made Treasurer in the beginning of the war, and continued to act as such to the time of his death, in 1705, when he left his accounts in great confusion, and they have since been under the management of executors, altogether unacquainted with the transactions of this office. In order therefore to obtain as much light as possible, we required a state of them, not only from his executors, but from the Commissioners; and comparing both returns we find them agree, as to his Receipts from sir Thomas Littleton, which amounted to 185,668*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*  $\frac{1}{2}$ . But they differ as to his payments and voluntary charge. These accounts have laid a great while before the auditor, but were not prosecuted till very lately. Besides the money issued to Mr. Povey for the service of this war, he is charged by sir T. Littleton with the sum of 51,281*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*  $\frac{1}{2}$  imprested to him for payment of the Arrears, incurred on the head of Sick and Wounded in the last war. Of this sum his executors declare themselves unable to give any account. But from that, which has been long since exhibited to the auditors and which yet remains unprosecuted, we observe, that Mr. Povey, in receiving and applying this sum, acted under the authority and direction of several minutes of the Treasury, but made a payment nevertheless of 2,000*l.* to the commissioners, their officers, and himself for salaries, &c. contrary to those minutes. That he was to obey the orders of the late commissioners of Sick and Wounded, one of whom was to attend him at every port to keep duplicates, to comptrol his payments, and to be vouchers to his accounts: but it does not appear, that such duplicates were ever kept by the Commissioners, and his accounts stand singly upon the credit of Mr. Povey, without any cheque or oath made of the truth of it. Mr. Savory succeeded Mr. Povey, and his accounts have in part been under our examination. This office hath been negligent in obliging persons to account daily for money imprested to them. Several sums are not yet accounted for, which were imprested in the time of Mr. Povey. Few of the agents abroad have cleared any imprests, and these unclesared on the 19th of September last, amounted to more than 36,000*l.*

“ What liberty the Agents may have taken in the application of the money they have been entrusted with; and what detriment the public has received, by suffering Accounts to remain so long unsettled; may in part be collected from those instances. Mr. Griffith, who was employed by the Commissioners in the year 1708, as agent at Port-Mahone, entered into a contract in April 1711, for erecting an Hospital there, without any authority but that of sir John Jennings, then commander of her majesty's fleet in the Mediterranean. Whereas, by his instructions, he was directed, if it should be thought necessary to build an Hospital, to send over a plan with an estimate of the Charge to the Commissioners, in order to be laid before the Lords of the Admiralty for their approbation. The expence of building this Hospital, as charged in Mr. Griffith's Account, and for which he craves an allowance, is 3,600*l.* It is alleged, in sir John Jennings's order, that her majesty's former Hospital in this Port was inconveniently situated. But we cannot take that to be a ground sufficient for his assuming a power to engage the public credit; especially when a more regular method had been prescribed by the agent's instructions, and when a Treaty of Peace was not actually commenced, in which it could not be known, that a cessation of this island would be made to the crown of Great-Britain. Several sums have been issued to one Stanley, a messenger belonging to this office, from the 5th of Oct. 1706, to the 19th July 1712, amounting to 6,430*l.* The account of which appearing very extraordinary and irregular in many instances, we examined him on oath, and find, that he has paid 1,949*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* for the taxes laid on the salaries of the Commissioners and other persons belonging to the office: That he charged this sum by order of the Commissioners, in his accounts of the incident expences of the office, under articles of different denominations, as postage of letters, conduct-money, &c. That, in the account of his disbursements for the half year ending at Michaelmas 1712, (which was passed by the Commissioners) he had in like manner included 104*l.* though not then paid, for the taxes of that half year. The Commissioners owned this to be true, and endeavoured to excuse it, by alleging, that they had presented a memorial to the late Treasurer to get an allowance for the taxes on their salaries, and that he had promised to represent their request to the queen. But they did not pretend, that they had obtained any warrant or authority for what they have done. Nor have we received satisfaction from them why Stanley was not required to account for any part of this sum of 6,430*l.* till July last:

or why his Accounts were then passed in so extraordinary a manner, and, as we have reason to believe, without vouchers; for he could not, when required of us, produce a voucher for any payment; and Dr. Lawrence (one of the three, whose names are subscribed to the perfect bills made out to clear these imprests) hath deposed, that his name signed to several of those bills as not writ with his own hand, that he gave away, in some cases, when he should be absent, to have his name put to papers for carrying on the business of the office, where more Commissioners hands were necessary than were present, which is contrary to the 19th Article of the instructions given to this Commission, whereby it is provided, that no payment shall be made without the authority of three Commissioners at least. The same Article directs them in making bills, to number and assign them for payment in course, according to the method of the Navy. But it appears that no such course has been observed, and that they have taken upon them a discretionary power. The ill use that has been made of this power, and the liberty that has been taken to give undue preference in payments, have so plainly appeared, that no office ought to be entrusted with the exercise of it. The Charge which the government has been put to in transporting British prisoners, is another instance of mismanagement, and the whole sum paid by virtue of the several contracts, or for extraordinaries, hath been a loss to the public. For this service might have been performed for the pay allowed to the contractors by the French for transporting their prisoners. By an account of four voyages which captain Robert Masters laid before us, and attended, it appears, that the contractors received for 1,661 French prisoners transported to France, 164,610 livres, amounting, at 15*d.* per livre, to 1,038*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* besides the pay for 2,044 English prisoners brought back, and that they paid the said masters, who performed these four voyages, but 669*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* Mr. Sikes, a merchant of Dartmouth, offered in April 1710, to bring back the British prisoners for the allowance given by the French, without any other pay or demands for extraordinaries, demurrage only excepted. But this proposal was rejected by the Commissioners, and Mr. Pearce was continued. He is still employed with an allowance of 9*s.* 6*d.* per head, notwithstanding frequent complaints have been made against him, and so fully proved to the Commissioners, that we find in the minutes of their proceedings on the 29th June 1709, a Resolution in these words, 'That it does appear there have been Negligences and Mismanagements in the service of transportation of prisoners.' After his Resolution, the Commissioners entered into a new agreement with Mr. Pearce, dated the 13th Oct. 1703, and allowed him for demurrage 50*s.* a day for 100 ton, and so, pro rata, to commence 14 days after the ship was ready to sail. Which is proved to have been an extravagant rate by a Charter-Party made between captain Masters and Mr. Pearce; for the Southampton transport, burthen 100 ton, whereby the Captain was to have but 20*s.* a day for demurrage. One great cause of the ill management in this part of the service, as also of the indulgence to Mr. Pearce, hath been in some measure lately explained to us, by the evidence of Mr. Mitchel, and of Mr. Pearce himself; wherein it appears, that Wm. Churchill, esq. when a Commissioner, procured contracts in their names from the board, and, by a secret agreement with them, was admitted into half the profit of each contract. Mr. Mitchel deposes, that, on making a contract with the Commissioners for Sick and Wounded Seamen, Wm. Churchill, esq. one of the Commissioners (who had recommended him to the board) did agree with the said Mitchel to reserve half the profit for his, or some unknown person's use; that he hath received what was due for the service performed, pursuant to the said Contract, and looks upon himself accountable, by this private, agreement for half the profit. Mr. Pearce deposes, that, when he first entered into a contract (which is still continued) with the Commissioners for Sick and Wounded Seamen, he agreed with his brother-in-law, Wm. Churchill, esq. then a Commissioner, to be a sharer in the profit and loss arising from the said contract, that he and Mr. Churchill borrowed 2,000*l.* to carry on this service, for which they are jointly bound; that the Accounts are not yet made up, but that he hath paid Mr. Churchill about 200*l.* as part of his share of the said contract.

"Both these contracts have been prejudicial to the government. Mr. Mitchel was discarded, because the terms of his were declared too high to be continued, Mr. Pearce was introduced indeed on pretence of frugality, and making a better bargain; but it is evident, by what hath been already said, that even this better bargain hath been of no advantage. For since it was made, the service hath been ill performed, and methods used to advance Mr. Pearce's profit beyond what was at first intended. On the 16th of October 1707, he made a groundless demand for losses; whereupon the Commissioners (Mr. Churchill being present) came to a resolution to increase his pay from 2*s.* 6*d.* to 5*s.* per head for English prisoners; which will never pass for an instance of frugality and good economy in this office. But what seems to concern Mr. Churchill in these contracts, may be reduced to this single question, Whether a person entrusted by her majesty to make contracts of the public, can be a private partner in such contracts, without a breach of his trust.

"We have received a complaint from captain Robert Masters, relating to Mr. Mitchel's contract, which we cannot pass over in silence. The substance of it is, that, pursuant to two orders from the Commissioners, dated the 17th of August, and 14th of October 1704, he carried French prisoners from Southampton to St. Maloes, and brought back 680 English prisoners, for whom, at the rates then allowed,

he ought to have received 340*l.* That he performed this service at his own expence, without being under agreement with any person; that, after performing it, he was refused payment by the Commissioners, being told at first that the money was issued to Mr. Churchill, one of the Commissioners; and afterwards, that it was paid to Mr. Mitchel. The Commissioners, in answer to this complaint, declared, that, notwithstanding the sailing orders were directed to captain Masters, they never contracted with him for the performance of that service; that he had been recommended to them by Mr. Churchill, or Mr. Mitchel, and that they took him to be employed by one of them. Mr. Mitchel, conformable to the opinion of the Commissioners, swears that he employed captain Masters, and received the money for the voyages performed by him. But what countenances captain Masters's pretensions in this case, is, that, at the time when he performed the service from Southampton to St. Maloes, Mr. Mitchel was not under contract for that port, but only from Dover to Calais; that no agreement hath been produced to prove him an agent to Mr. Churchill, or Mr. Mitchel, and therefore the money due on this account could not regularly be issued to either of them, unless some secret covenants have been entered into, which do not yet appear to your Commissioners.

“Since these facts were drawn up and stated, we received a letter on the 7th of March last, from Mr. Pearce, endeavouring to soften his evidence; which is here inserted, that nothing in favour of the person mentioned in the Deposition may seem to be concealed:

‘Honourable Gentlemen,

‘When I attended you under a surprize, and shocked by my weakness, I know not whether I was rightly understood in my expressions; therefore, recollecting as well as I can, what I then signed, beg leave to explain myself on some of the questions your honours were pleased to ask me, viz. Whether any person was concerned with me in the service of transporting prisoners, and in what year I made my contract? to which I answered plainly, and desired to be understood, that, when I entered on the transport business, it was entirely my own right, and under no obligation of partnership; the French, making then good payment, enabled me to carry on the service without being obliged to any person for money; but, after some years, they entirely put a stop to their payments, and I found the service wanted more money to carry it on, than I was able to raise, I having agreed for 2*s.* 6*d.* for which others had always 10*s.* I was forced to apply to my brother for assistance, who brought me first in, and voluntarily promised to reimburse him by the profits of the said service, if any such should be, or otherwise, for his kindness and assistance in this affair; and I, having formerly made use of his money, when I was under him as deputy treasurer of the Ordnance, and at that time being incapable of repaying him, designed to reimburse him in that manner; and the 200*l.* mentioned in my affidavit, though intended by me as part of such money as should arise from the said service, I never acquainted him with, there being great sums due from France on that account, and the state of the profit and loss could not possibly be made till the remittances be procured, and the debts owing on that head are paid off. I am, &c.

JOHN PEARCE

“We will not trouble the House with any reflections on this Letter, only that it is very extraordinary Mr. Pearce could not recollect his thoughts under a month's time, and that your Commissioners were so far from taking the evidence by surprize (as is suggested) that they desired him, after he had freely and voluntarily given it, to settle and adjust the deposition in his own manner, which he accordingly did, before he signed it.

“Your Commissioners further represent, That the exposing to sale offices, relating to the management of the revenue of the kingdom, is a practice against law, and done in defiance of her majesty's repeated declarations. Two instances of which have been proved to us by the oaths of the very persons concerned.

“The first is this: Henry Meriton, esq. in 1705, treated with Mr. Brydges, then Auditor of the Imprests, for the purchase of his office, and agreed to give him 4,000*l.* for it. After this agreement, he applied to the lord Godolphin, then Lord Treasurer, for his approbation. His lordship proposed to make him Commissioner of Customs, or Cashier of the Excise, in consideration of the 4,000*l.* he was to pay to Mr. Brydges. But he absolutely refused the first, and was with difficulty brought to accept the latter office, on so hard terms as he thought, because it was to be given during pleasure only. However, being persuaded by sir William Scawen, whom he had consulted and employed in this matter, to rely on the lord Godolphin's honour, and promised, that he should not be displaced, he paid 4,000*l.* to Mr. Brydges. Whereupon Mr. Maynwaring was made Auditor of the Imprests. Mr. Hall, Cashier of the Excise, removed from that employment to be Commissioner of the Customs, and Mr. Meriton made Cashier of the Excise. By which it is evident, That the lord Godolphin was not only privy to this bargain and sale, but negotiated it. However, your Commissioners examined Mr. Maynwaring himself on oath, and he deposes that his lordship transacted the whole matter without his knowledge, but that he heard a sum of money was given to Mr. Brydges, on his resigning his office. As a further confirmation of this, when Mr. Meriton was dismissed in 1710, from being Cashier of the Excise, he remonstrated to the lord Godolphin, told him he could not sit down with the loss of 4,000*l.* and insisted on his lordship's promise of continuing him in his place. His lordship apprehending himself under an obligation to reimburse him; as he was pleased to say for his own sake) means were found, on making colonel Sidney, Comptroller, and Mr. Pouncefort Cashier of the Excise, to raise 4,000*l.* for Mr. Meriton, by a gross sale of those offices.

"The second instance relates to Mr. George Hutchinson, who hath also declared on oath, that he bargained with the lord Wharton for 1,000*l.* if he could make him Register of the seizures; that his lordship did accordingly obtain that office for him from the lord Godolphin, then Lord High Treasurer; That, in consideration thereof, and pursuant to his bargain, he paid his lordship 1,000*l.* on his admission into the place, which he now enjoys. We cannot dismiss this Article, without observing in general, That the selling offices belonging to the revenue, is not only a violation of the law, and a contempt of her majesty's declarations in council, as hath been said, but it may be attended with the greatest inconveniences, and every instance of it will naturally produce some prejudice to the public. For those who sell, will have more regard to the sums they are to receive, than to the qualifications of the persons that buy. And those who buy, will prefer the ease of reimbursing themselves, to that of performing the duty of their offices. But whether either of these assertions have proved true, in the cases now mentioned, your Commissioners pretend not to affirm. The earl of Godolphin being dead since Mr. Meriton's case came before us, we would not appear too solicitous in endeavouring to prove this, or any other instance of his management, a breach of the high trust reposed in him. Which, however, we cannot apprehend a reason sufficient for us to conceal facts from the House, otherwise deserving your consideration. We likewise forbear making any particular observations on Mr. Hutchinson's case; or presuming to determine, whether it is an aggravation of it, that the lord Wharton, when he received the sum above-mentioned, was a privy counsellor, and enjoyed other places of great trust under her majesty. But we must inform the House, that Mr. Hutchinson did on the 10th of March last (near five months after the time his deposition was taken) come to your Commissioners, and presented the following Narrative: which we lay before you, being offered at his lordship's request, and therefore we must suppose thought material.

"I never had any acquaintance with, or personal knowledge of the lord Wharton, or had ever spoken to him, till I was advised by a friend to apply to him by the means of the lady Lockhart, his lordship's sister, to whom I made my proposition, and a promise of a present, if by her I could be recommended to lord Wharton her brother, and by him to the Lord Treasurer to have leave for Mr. John Earl, my predecessor, to resign his office to me; and when I was by her ladyship so recommended to lord Wharton, her ladyship told me, that his lordship was very unwilling to meddle with any thing of that kind; and that I must not expect that his lordship would 'make any steps in it, unless he found by the Lord Treasurer that I was very capable and fit for the said employment.—Whilst this affair was thus transacting, the said Mr. John Earl died, upon which I told her ladyship, I could and would make her ladyship a better present, if her ladyship could prevail that I might succeed the said Mr. John Earl; her ladyship then gave me a letter of recommendation to lord Wharton, who was then at New-Market, and when I came there, and was introduced to the Lord Treasurer, his lordship was pleased to say, that for my own sake and my father's, and upon lord Wharton's recommendation, his lordship was willing to prefer me to that employment. When I had thus obtained his lordship's promise, the lord Wharton, being afterwards returned to town, told me, that, for some reasons, he did not think proper to put the money into her ladyship's hands, nor make the bills payable to her, and directed me to put the money into a goldsmith's hands, which I did, and made the notes payable to myself, and endorsed them; and afterwards delivered them to a person his lordship (who was then gone into the country) by his letter appointed to receive them. And I always apprehended, from what my friend said, who introduced me to lady Lockhart, and likewise I had heard his lordship say, that the present I made was designed for the benefit and advantage of the lady Lockhart, and her family, to whom I first made (by my friend) the proposition and promise of it, and for whose sake his lordship undertook to do me that favour. These are, as far as I can recollect, all the circumstances of the manner of obtaining my office.

Geo. HUTCHINSON.

'Memorandum.

'That the above written paper was drawn by the direction of lord Wharton, and several passages which I had forgot, and his lordship put me in mind of, were added at his lordship's instance; particularly that relating to the lady Lockhart, that the whole thousand pounds were paid to one Mr. Lee (by two 500*l.* notes) by his lordship's order; that before his lordship did obtain the said employment for me, I did acquaint his lordship I would give a thousand pounds for it.

March 10, 1712-13. 'Geo. HUTCHINSON.'

"This Memorandum prevents our Remarks, and though the abovementioned account supplies some circumstances, yet we think the fact in no sort essentially varied from the first state of it.

"As the disposal of public Offices for money is not allowable, so neither can the exemption of any of them from the payment of taxes imposed and specified by parliament, admit of the least justification. However, a considerable instance thereof hath also occurred to us. Before the year 1705, the officers of the household within the palaces of Whitehall and St. James's were annually taxed at 10,686*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* But in that year, the parliament taking it into consideration, that this tax was too low, and that those officers ought to contribute their proportion towards carrying on the war, as well as the landed property of England, it was advanced to the sum of 30,754*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* which hath been continued every year since. Some time after, Mr. Hume, one of the commissioners for those palaces, being desired to attend the treasury, brought from thence an instruction, written in characters, which he interpreted to be a rule, whereby all persons having salaries of 100*l.* per annum, or upwards, should be rated at 3*s.* per pound; of between 100*l.* and 40*l.* per annum at 2*s.* 6*d.* per pound, of 40*l.* per annum, and under, at 1*s.* 4*d.* per pound. Pursuant to which, a draught of an assessment, amounting only to 19,403*l.* 8*s.* was prepared and laid before the Lord Treasurer; from whom it was returned to the commissioners with a minute on the back of the assessment-roll, entered by Mr. Taylor of the Treasury, by direction of his lordship, in these words, viz. The commissioners to proceed in making the assessment accordingly. An assessment was made conformable to this minute for that year, and continued for the following years, 1706, 1707, 1708, 1709, 1710. But the commissioners were threatened with process in the year 1708, for not raising the whole sum of 30,754*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* charged for the year 1705, and 1706; and they applied to the late Lord Treasurer, who ordered a stay of it. On the 25th of March 1710, the arrear was swelled to the sum of 56,754*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* and the commissioners several times urged his lordship to satisfy it. Which, however, was never done during this management of the Treasury. But this matter has been since represented there with better success. For 1,000*l.* hath been actually paid to the receiver-general in money, and a tally is struck on tin for 2,000*l.* more, towards making good the deficiency; and we have ground to believe, that in a short time, care will be taken to discharge the rest.

“The better to enable the commissioners to raise the full sum of 30,764*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* for the years 1711, and 1712, the payment of several large pensions have been transferred from the post-office to Mr. Compton's, which being assessed at 4*s.* per pound, and the other pensions payable there, rated by the same rule as the rest of the queen's family are, the assessment now completely answers the tax.

“The observations arising from this case so stated and sworn before your commissioners, are, That, of all the deficiencies, which have happened in any of the taxes since the Revolution, this we believe is the only one, that hath been openly allowed under colour of any authority, but of parliament, and that hath received a sanction from the Treasury. That this order was an attempt upon the Commons, privilege of raising money, and must either be intended to defraud the public or to deceive the Commissioners. If it was to be taken as a sufficient foundation to justify the assessment, then the government was to be defrauded by suppressing part of the tax. If it was not, then the Commissioners were deceived by being encouraged to act in obedience to a fictitious authority; whereby they subjected themselves to a prosecution, and their estates to an extent. That the Lord Treasurer was the last person, who in prudence or justice ought to have consented to such a deficiency, or to have assumed a power of comptrolling an act for levying money; since, by virtue of his office, he was to be entrusted with it, and to use all possible means, that every fund should answer the sum, for which it was given by parliament. That the directing a stay of process against the Commissioners for the arrears, due on the tax, as it was an impediment to public justice, and a vindication of this order, in itself illegal, and of dangerous consequence; so it was a continuance and an aggravation of the first mismanagement. That the care, which hath been lately taken towards satisfying the present deficiency, and to answer the full tax for the future, is a plain condemnation of this order; and a proof, that, if the same endeavours had been formerly used, there would have been no necessity (as is pretended) of complying with it. If this precedent had been allowed, the same indulgence might, with equal reason, have been extended to any other part of Great-Britain.

“Your Commissioners, in examining the accounts of her majesty's Great Wardrobe, observe, That more than two thirds of those persons, who receive constant pay on this establishment, were never bred to the trades they pretend to, nor ever did any work in the office. That the master and his deputy, who are the only checks on the accounts, did, in the names of their servants, furnish great quantities of goods at much higher prices than they might have been bought of tradesmen. That the money being received from the treasurer by the master and his agents in gross sums, and not for any particular debt or service, there is always room left for them, without controul, to postpone others, and prefer themselves, to the great prejudice of the credit of the office. That 4, 5, and sometimes 6 per cent. is paid to the deputy by the tradesmen, who are admitted to deal with this office, on the receipt of their money. Which is one reason, amongst many, why the prices are 20 or 30, and sometimes 40 per cent. dearer than those tradesmen would have furnished their goods to other customers, as is acknowledged by several of them. These practices are encouraged by the method of passing the accounts of this office, which is very different from that of any other. For, if the master be a peer, his declaration on honour, if he be not a peer, his or his deputy's oath is, without producing any voucher or receipt, an authority to the auditor. But what means are proper to be taken for the regulation thereof, is submitted by your Commissioners.

“We mentioned in our last Report, the losses then occasioned by the Insolvency of bonds taken for payment of her majesty's Customs. But finding it a growing evil, and such as, if not remedied, may in time become a great diminution of the best branch of the revenue, we think it our duty again to represent a state of them. There remained on the 31st of Jan., 1712, besides those delivered over to the Queen's remembrance;

Receivers General,	100,795	15	3 $\frac{1}{2}$
The Solicitor,	110,141	2	11 $\frac{1}{2}$

"This large Debt is supposed to be entirely due to the public. But whether it hath arisen from particular indulgencies, or from a general neglect of prosecuting the bonds when they became due, is not easy to judge. The receiver-general hath deposed, That the Commissioners of Customs have not, since the year 1710, directed him to deliver over any bonds to the solicitor; which hath some appearance of neglect. But the Commissioners alledge, that they ordered him, and their solicitor, to write quickening letters to the merchants, and to put bonds in suit as they became due. They add, it is their opinion, that rigorous prosecutions might be of more prejudice than service, and would rather have increased than lessened this debt. Besides this forbearance of prosecuting hazardous bonds, here hath been a neglect in receiving the whole money due on such as were good. The principal sum 59,990*l.* due on bonds in the receiver-general's hands, and the principal sum of 262,666*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.* due on bonds in the solicitor's hands, have been paid, but not with interest: Whereas the interest for the first was computed the 13th of September last, at 9,651*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* And for the second, the 15th of December last at 5,500*l.* There hath been no reason offered to your Commissioners, why so considerable a sum for interest should be remitted by the public. For the receiver-general hath declared on oath, that the principal was not paid within the time limited by the act for continuing the additional duty of tonnage and poundage, &c. nor upon any representation, made in favour of such debtors, by the Commissioners of the Customs to the Treasury, as he act directs. Her majesty's customs have been further prejudiced by suffering the captains of men of war, contrary to their instructions, to take merchants goods on board in the plantations, and other remote places; for her majesty's ships not being liable to the same excheques as merchant ships are, they frequently and great quantities as goods without paying any duty. This practice (which cannot be cured unless the captains be absolutely restrained from carrying any sort of merchandizes whatsoever) is a discouragement to the owners of merchant ships, a loss sometimes of those under their convoy, and often a hazard of the men of war themselves.

"Though the Land-Revenue of the crown in England, hath been extremely reduced by the sale of fee-farm rents, and by many exorbitant Grants since the Revolution; yet it is still too considerable an article to be omitted by your Commissioners; and we take leave to remark, That we find in our examination of the general incomes and issues of the exchequer, That the sums there brought to account of late years are much smaller than would have arisen even from what remains of this Revenue, if due care have been taken by those entrusted with the management of it. For all the payments which have been made on this head, for 11 years last past, in the whole amount to but 30,557*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* We are unable to offer any perfect state of this Revenue. The papers and rolls relating to it, have been kept in so little order by the auditors, and several receivers are so uncertainly charged, (some with rents, which have been lost or unknown for many years, others with such as have been sold or granted away) that nothing to be relied on can be collected from the accounts as they now stand. The methods for the regulation and collection of this Revenue are plainly laid down, in several acts of parliament, and the neglect of them hath been the cause of the confusion we find in the accounts of those concerned in it."

The Substance of the Second Report.] "Your Commissioners humbly hope, by what is offered in the preceding Report, that they will appear to have taken some pains in examining the accounts of the Army, which they have applied themselves more immediately to, not only as they were obliged to use all possible endeavours to detect any Irregularities or Mismanagements therein, but in order to enable themselves to determine the debts due from the government on this head. As soon therefore as the act passed, appointing us commissioners for that purpose, we directed the paymaster-general to lay before us, States of the several regiments under their care; and in the first place, of those which were reduced or disbanded. We likewise required the colonels and agents, to exhibit accounts of all sums of money received by them, for the use of their respective regiments. Mr. Howe, in return to our precept, brought in accounts of some regiments; but in the examination thereof, we found they had reference to other accounts, (whilst those regiments were in Mr. Brydges's pay) which are unadjusted. Mr. Brydges exhibited also to us, some time since, the state of several regiments; but alledged there were so many difficulties in their accounts, that he could not then settle the credit of any one. The colonels and agents have returned, That, till the credits of their respective regiments are fixed and ascertained by the pay-masters, they cannot pretend to offer any accounts. However, we have employed our time in hearing the Claims and Complaints of several persons relating to these accounts, which, as they have been very numerous, so they will facilitate our examinations, when the pay-master shall be prepared to lay their accounts before us, in such manner, as will be a proper foundation for us to determine upon. Mr. Brydges hath been frequently pressed to attest the credit of the regiments under his care, which are the most considerable part of the army; But, being unable to remove the difficulties first complained of, he hath lately delivered on oath a paper entitled, 'Reasons why the accounts for the regiments under the care of payment of the hon. James Brydges esq.; pay-master general of her majesty's forces, acting in conjunction with the Allies, could not be closed and attested, pursuant to the precepts of the honourable the commissioners appointed by parliament for taking, examining, and determining the debts due to the army, &c. dated March 4, 1713-13.' Now whether these Reasons are admitted as a justification of the pay-master or otherwise, your Commissioners apprehend they are a sufficient proof, that it was not in their power to proceed farther than they have done. And that if they had presumed to form any certificates on this confused and uncertain state of the accounts of the army, they must necessarily have been guilty of the highest injustice, as well as a direct breach of the act which constitutes their commission. For the House will be pleased to consider, they are tied down by that act to determine only according to the establishments. (Signed) George Lockhart, Henry Bertie, Salway Winington, Francis Annesly, Thomas Lister, William Shippen, Henry Carter."

Bill to continue the Commissioners of the Public Accounts.] Mr. Shippen having read these two Reports in his place, and presented the said Statements and Reports to the House, the House resolved to take the same into consideration the Saturday following, and ordered a bill to be brought in, 'to revive and continue the Act, for taking, examining and stating the Public Accounts of the kingdom, and also to continue the act for appointing commissioners to take, examine, and determine the debt due to the army, transport-service, and sick and wounded.'

After the Addresses of thanks for the Peace, and a vote for a Supply, the Commons, in compliance to the court, proceeded to the stigmatising of those that delighted in war. To this end, Mr. Shippen made a Report of mismanagements from the Committee, to examine the debts due to the Army. They passed a slight censure on William Churchill, a member of their House, for being, when a commissioner for sick and wounded, a partner in contracts relating to that office. They also made an attempt to fasten a misdemeanor on the earl of Wharton, for taking 1,000*l.* of one Hutchinson for procuring him the office of register of seizures in the customs, but it was dropped, because it was done before the last act of indemnity.

The Peace proclaimed.] On the 28th of April the ratifications of the Treaties of Peace and Commerce were exchanged at Utrecht between the ministers of Great-Britain and France; and, being brought to London, by Mr.

Ayerst, chaplain and secretary to the earl of Strafford, the queen on the 4th of May, the same day of the month on which the war had been proclaimed eleven years before, signed a Proclamation for publishing the Peace; which was performed the next day with the usual ceremonies. The ratifications of the Treaties between France and the States-General were also to have been exchanged on the 29th of April; but upon an unexpected difficulty about the elector of Bavaria's renunciation of the Spanish Netherlands (yielded to him by king Philip) which the Dutch ministers alleged not to be in due form, that exchange was deferred till the 12th of May,

Dr. Sacheverel desired to preach before the Commons.] May 1. The Commons ordered "That the Rev. Dr. Henry Sacheverel be desired to preach before this House, at St. Margaret's Westminster, the 29th instant (being the day on which the nation commemorates the Restoration of the royal family:)" which Vote occasioned various speculations and reflections *.

The Queen's Message to the Commons respecting the Treaties of Peace and Commerce.] May 3. The Chancellor of the Exchequer presented the following Message from her majesty:

"ANNE R.

"As it is the undoubted prerogative of the crown to make Peace and War, I have ratified the Treaties of Peace and Commerce with

* "The sentence of the House of Lords, by which Dr. Sacheverel was forbid to preach during the space of three years, expiring on the 25d of March, that day was celebrated in London, and in several parts of the kingdom, with extraordinary rejoicings. The Sunday following in the afternoon the doctor preached the first time at his church of St. Saviours, where a great multitude thronged to hear or at least to see him, expressing their joy at his returning to the exercise of his function. His subject was the duty of praying for our enemies, from St. Luke 23. 34. 'Father forgive them, for they know not what they do.' In his sermon he made a tacit but obvious parallel between his sufferings and those of Jesus Christ. Not long after, the House of Commons, to shew their dislike of his former prosecution and censure, desired him to preach before them at St. Margaret's Westminster, on the 29th of May, being the restoration day; which he did, and had the thanks of the House for his sermon. Nor was the court backward in rewarding his late service: for, the rectorship of St. Andrew's Holborn, becoming vacant, he was promoted to that rich benefice." Tindal.

"April 2. I went to Lord Treasurer's, at six; where I found Dr. Sacheverel, who told us that the bookseller had given him 100*l.* for his sermon preached last Sunday, and intended to print 30,000. I believe he will be confoundedly bit, and will hardly sell above half." Swift's Journal.

rice, which had been signed by my order, have concluded a Treaty with Spain, which be signed at Utrecht, as soon as the Spaniards are arrived there.—I determined, on the first, on this extraordinary occasion, to communicate these Treaties to my parliament, and have therefore now ordered them to read before this House.”

The Treaty of Utrecht laid before the Parliament.] Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer presented to the House (pursuant to the Message) several Treaties, with a List of them, viz. a Treaty of Peace and Friendship between Great-Britain and France; a Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Great-Britain and France; an Act declaring the particulars referred by the 9th Article of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Great-Britain and France, to the discussion of Commissioners; an Act explaining the general sense of the 9th Article of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Great-Britain and France, relating to the four species excepted out of the Tariff of 1664; a Treaty of Peace and Friendship between Great-Britain and France; and translations of the several Treaties and Acts above mentioned.

Substance of the Treaties.] By the Treaty of Peace, the French king was bound to give the other harbour nor assistance to the Pretender, to acknowledge the Queen's title and the Protestant Succession, as it was settled by several acts of parliament: Dunkirk was to be held, in a time limited, within five months, after ratifications; but that was not to be begun, till an Equivalent for it was put into the hands of France. Newfoundland, Hudson's-Bay, and Christopher's were to be given to England; Cape Breton was to be left to the French, with a liberty to dry their fish on Newfoundland; this was the main substance of the articles of Peace.* The Treaty of Commerce settled a free trade, according to the Tariff in the year 1664, excepting some commodities, which were subjected to a new Tariff in the year

* “It was observed on these articles: as to Newfoundland, it was thought that the French settling at Cape Breton, instead of Placentia, would be of great advantage to them with relation to the fishery, which is the only thing that makes settlements in those parts of any value. The English have always pretended, that, at the first discovery of Newfoundland being made in Henry the 7th's time, the right to it was in the crown of England. The French had never given them, in king Charles the 1st's time, to fish there, paying tribute, as an acknowledgment of that licence: it is true, they tried this much farther, during the civil wars; and this grew to a much greater height in the reign of king Charles the 2d: but, in king William's time, an act of parliament passed, asserting the right of the crown to Newfoundland, leaving open the trade thither to all the subjects of Great-Britain, with a positive and constant exclusion of all aliens and foreigners.” Burnet.

1699, which was so high, that it amounted to a prohibition: all the productions of France were to come into England under no other duties, but those that were laid on the same productions from other countries; and, when this was settled, then commissaries were to be sent to London, to agree and adjust all matters relating to trade; the Treaty of Commerce with Spain was not yet finished. As for the allies, Portugal and Savoy were satisfied; the emperor was to have the duchy of Milan, the kingdom of Naples, and the Spanish Netherlands: Sicily was to be given to the duke of Savoy, with the title of king; and Sardinia, with the same title, was to be given to the elector of Bavaria, in lieu of his losses: the States were to deliver up Lisle, and the little places about it: and, besides the places of which they were already possessed, they were to have Namur, Charleroy, Luxemburg, Ypres, and Newport: the king of Prussia was to have the Upper Guelder, in lieu of Orange, and the other estates, which the family had in Franche Comté. The emperor was to have time to the 1st of June, to declare his accepting it.

Debate in the Commons on the 8th and 9th Articles of the Treaty of Commerce.] The Treaties being read, a day was appointed to consider of the Treaty of Commerce, particularly the 8th and 9th Articles; by the eighth all the subjects of Great-Britain and France, were to enjoy, as to all duties and impositions whatever, the same privileges, which any other nation, the most favoured, did then, or shall hereafter enjoy. By the other Article, a law was to be made within two months in Great-Britain, that no more customs be paid for goods brought from France than what are payable for the like goods imported from any other country in Europe. These were articles very disadvantageous to England. During king Charles the 2nd's reign, our trade with France was often and loudly complained of, as very prejudicial to the nation; there was a commission appointed in 1674, to adjust the conditions of our Commerce with that nation; and then it appeared, in a scheme that was prepared by very able merchants, that we lost every year a million of money by our trade thither. This was then so well received, that the scheme was entered into the Journals of both Houses of parliament, and into the books of the Custom-House: but the court at that time favoured the interests of France so much, preferably to their own, that the trade went still on till the year 1678, when the parliament laid, upon all French commodities, such a duty, as amounted to a prohibition, and was to last for 3 years, and to the end of the next session of parliament: at the end of the 3 years, Charles called no more parliaments; and that act was repealed in James's parliament: but, during the whole last war, high duties were laid on all the productions and manufactures of France; which by this treaty were to be no higher charged, than the same productions from other countries. It was said that, if we had been as often beat by the French, as they had been by us, this would have been thought a very hard treaty; and, if the articles of our commerce had been settled, before the duke of Ormond was ordered to separate his troops from the confederates, the French could not have pretended to draw us into such terms, as they had insisted on since that time, because we put ourselves into their power. We were engaged by our treaty with Portugal, that their wines should be charged a third part lower than the French wines; but, if the duties were, according to this treaty of commerce, to be made equal, then, considering the difference of freight, which is more than double from Portugal, the French wines would be much cheaper; and, the nation generally liking them better, by this means we should not only break our treaties with Portugal, but if we did not take off their wines, we must lose their trade, which was at present the most advantageous that we drove any where: for, besides a great vent of our manufactures, we brought over yearly great returns of gold from thence; four, five and six hundred thousand pounds a year. We had brought the silk manufactures here to so great perfection, that about 300,000 people were maintained by it. For carrying this on, we brought great quantities of silk from Italy and Turkey, by which people in those countries came to take off as great quantities of our manufactures: so that our demand for silk had opened good markets for our woollen goods abroad, which must fail, if our manufacture of silk at home should be lost: which, if once we gave a free vent for silk stuffs from France among us, must soon be the case; since the cheapness of provisions and of labour in France, would enable the French to undersell us, even at our own markets. Our linen and paper manufactures would likewise be ruined by a free importation of the same goods from France.*

Notwithstanding all this, a motion was made on the day appointed, May 14, to bring in a Bill to make good the 8th and 9th Articles of the Treaty of Commerce with France. A debate arose, which lasted till ten in the evening.

Mr. Arthur Moore, one of the Commissioners of Trade, and whose skill and knowledge in commercial affairs, the British ministry had chiefly relied on in drawing up the Treaty in question, endeavoured to shew the great advantages, that would accrue to the nation from a free trade with France; and sir James Buteman, sir Thomas Hauser, sir W. Wyndham, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Ward, Mr. Shepherd, and some others, spoke on the same side.

Mr. Nicholas Lechmere† endeavoured, on the contrary, to prove, that the trade with France would be very prejudicial to our woollen, silk, and paper manufactures, and to our commerce with Portugal; and he was supported, not only by general Stanhope, Mr. John Smith, Mr. Nathaniel Gould (an eminent merchant, formerly governor of the bank of England) sir Peter King, sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr. Wortley Montague, the lord Castlecomer, and some others of the Whigs; but also by sir George Newland and Mr. Robert Haysman, who had before gone with the court.

Mr. Moore, in order to make good his assertion, having enumerated the different sorts of commodities of the growth and manufacture of Great Britain, which the French drew from hence before the two last wars, insinuating, that in all probability they would do the same again for the future, if a free trade with them were set upon an equal foot.

Mr. Gould answered him, that he begged the very thing in question; and that, in his opinion, the opening a free trade with France, would rather be highly detrimental to the nation. To make this out, Mr. Gould argued, "That since the Revolution, the state of commerce was entirely changed; and as France had set up, and very much encouraged woollen manufactures, and made shift without several goods, which they drew from hence; so England had learned to be without the product of France, by setting up silk manufactures and paper mills; encouraging the making of all manner of toys, &c. which saved and gained vast sums of money to the nation, and employed an infinite number of artificers, who would be reduced to beggary, if the importation of French goods of the same kind were allowed; because the French had their work done for less money, and consequently could sell their commodities cheaper." He added, "that the most valuable branch of our trade was that to Portugal; the increase of which, of late years, was mainly owing to the great quantities of wines that were imported from thence, and consumed in Great Britain, instead of French wines, by reason of the high duties laid on the latter. But, if these duties were, pursuant to the Treaty of Commerce in question, reduced and made equal with those on Portugal wines, the importation and consumption of the latter would infallibly decrease, and thereby our profitable commerce to Portugal be in danger of being lost." On the other hand,

Sir William Wyndham took this occasion to reflect on the late ministry, "who, in his opinion, had let slip the opportunity of making a good Peace, when they had it in their power: but that a time might come, and, he hoped, was not far off, when the mismanagement of the enemies to their country should be annulled upon. As to our Portugal trade, he said, that that kingdom would ever be an occasion for the woollen manufactures and the corn of England, and consequently be obliged to take off great quantities from hence, as they did before the year 1705, even at a time when court of Portugal had laid high duties on gish goods and merchandizes." General Stanhope made hereupon a long speech, wherein, among other things, he said, that the affair now in question was not a party business; neither did it concern the late or the present ministry, but the whole British nation, therefore, for his own part, he would freely speak his thoughts about it, with the utmost impartiality. That, the Peace being made, it is now preposterous to say any thing for or against it. But, that as no treaty could bind the Commons of Great-Britain to make any order or deed against their own interest; the point to be considered was, Whether a trade with France would be advantageous or no? And that, in order to clear that important matter, it was necessary to consult the merchants and manufacturers who had presented several petitions and representations about

This was likewise urged by Mr. John Smith, who made a motion for adjourning the debate, and taking the papers before them into consideration. But the main question being put, was carried in the affirmative by a majority of 252 voices against 150.

Speaker having resumed the chair, sir Robert Dolben made his report from the committee, and, after further debate, the arguments finding themselves over-powered by the court-party, most of them went out of the use; and so it was resolved by above 100 votes against 12 or 13, "That a Bill be brought to make effectual the eighth and ninth Articles of the Treaty of commerce and navigation between Great-Britain and France."

"The Treaties of Peace and Commerce being published in print, that of Commerce raised such a general clamour, as awakened the whole nation, which before seemed to have been sunk into a lethargy. Several gentlemen, and particularly Mr. Robert Walpole, general Stanhope, sir Theodore Janssen, exerted themselves, and published several excellent pieces, which shewed the advantages of trade with Italy, Spain, and Portugal, to which nations we constantly exported more than we imported from them, and brought the balance in money; whereas a trade with France would be destructive of our home manufactures, and of our commerce with other nations. These things came to be so well understood, that even while flattering addresses were coming to court from all parts of England, petitions were sent up from the towns and counties concerned in trade, setting forth the prejudice which they apprehended from this Treaty of Commerce. The Treaty, however, was to be carried at any rate; the persons concerned in making it, either could not, or would not, see the mistakes in it; and the nation was too much convinced, that through their great skill in trade, they had made an excellent Treaty of Commerce. To these ends Daniel de Foe was employed; though, in a weekly paper published some years before, called the Review, he Proceedings on the Malt Bill.] May 18. The Commons ordered several clauses to be inserted in the Malt-bill, and having resolved themselves into a committee of the whole house upon the said bill, made several amendments to it. In this committee, the

had very often condemned the French trade as detrimental to this kingdom. He undertook, however, the cause now, and published a paper thrice a week, by the title of 'Mercator, or Commerce retrieved; being Considerations on the state of the British trade, particularly as it respects Holland, Hanover, and the Dutch barrier; the trade to and from France; the trade to Portugal, Spain, and the West-Indies, and the fisheries of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia; with other matters and advantages accruing to Great-Britain by the Treaties of Peace and Commerce lately concluded at Utrecht.' In this paper he undertook to prove, that the trade to France, though contrary to all experience, had always been beneficial to this kingdom, and would be so again upon the foot of the treaty. And as he had the art of writing very plausibly, and those who employed him, and furnished him with materials, had the command of all public papers in the Custom-House; he had it in his power to do a great deal of mischief, especially amongst such, as were unskilled in trade, and at the same time very fond of French wines, which it was then a crime to be against. Several ingenious merchants, of long experience, and well skilled in trade, joined together to contradict the impositions of this writer: they knew he had many heads besides the advantages of public papers to help him; and therefore thought the publication of a joint weekly paper the most feasible way to confute him, and set our trade in a clear light, because they were sensible that it was impossible for any one man to be master of so much experience, as was required to furnish materials from so many different branches of our trade, as would be touched upon in this debate. The paper they published was, in opposition to Daniel de Foe's title, called 'The British Merchant, or Commerce preserved,' and was published twice a week. The person, to whom the public was chiefly obliged for this paper, and who had the greatest hand in it, was Henry Martin, who was afterwards made inspector-general of the exports and imports. He was assisted by sir Charles Cooke, merchant, afterwards made Commissioner of Trade; sir Theodore Janssen, bart. James Milner, Nathaniel Toriano, Joshua Gee, Christopher Haynes, David Martin, merchants; and Charles King, who afterwards collected and reprinted those papers. Lord Halifax and general Stanhope, had likewise a considerable share in the encouragement of this paper, which had so great an effect, that the thoughts of the Whigs about commerce, which, at first, were represented as the result of discontent, and spirit of party, appeared to be the universal sense of all traders." Tindal.

Scots members represented, That the tax of 6*d.* per bushel of malt would be an insupportable burden to their countrymen, by reason of the vast disproportion between the English and Scots malt, both in goodness and price; almost double the quantity of Scots malt, going to the making drink of equal strength with that made of English malt; and the bushel of malt which in London was sold for 2*s.* 3*d.* not bearing above the third part of that price in Scotland. Upon this and other considerations, the Committee were induced to reduce the Malt-Tax in Scotland to 3*d.* per bushel; but when this Amendment was the next day, together with the other Amendments, reported to the house, the members of the northern counties of England, and the principality of Wales, having for the same reasons alledged by the Scots, insisted on the like abatement of the duty on malt, it was ordered, that the Amendment, and the subsequent Amendments be recommitted.

May 20. The Commons in a grand committee, considered farther of the Malt-bill, made several Amendments to it; and, notwithstanding all the opposition the Scots and their friends could make, it was carried by one single vote only, That the tax on malt should be laid equally in all parts of Great-Britain. On the 21st those Amendments were reported to the house, and it was again proposed that the Scots Malt should pay but half the duty, but it was again carried by a majority of 139 voices against 104 that the Bill, with the Amendments, be engrossed.

May 22. The engrossed bill was read the 3d time, and passed by a majority of 197 against 52, to the great disappointment of the Scots.

The Scots Members of both Houses hold several private Meetings.] The endeavours of the Scots members in the House of Commons for easing their countrymen of part of the Malt-Tax, having proved ineffectual, they had several private meetings with the Scots peers sitting in parliament; and, laying aside all invidious distinctions, consulted together how to redress their Grievances. On the 26th of May they deputed four of their number, viz. the duke of Argyle, the earl of Marr, Mr. Lockhart, and Mr. Cockburn, who, by their order, attended the queen, and by word of mouth, humbly remonstrated to her majesty, That their countrymen bore with great impatience the violation of some Articles of the Act of Union, and that the laying such an insupportable burden as the Malt-Tax upon them, was like to raise their discontents to such a height, as to prompt them to declare the Union dissolved." To this unexpected verbal remonstrance, the queen answered, "This was a precipitate resolution, and she wished they might not have reason to repent it; but, however, she would endeavour to make all things easy." The Scots members being met again the next day, and their Deputies having made their report of her majesty's Answer, it was unanimously agreed, That, before they proceeded further, they should lay their Grievances before the House of Lords.

Debate in the Lords on a Motion for dissolving the Union.] Accordingly, on the 22d of May, after the Lords had adjourned the Debate about the 8th and 9th Articles of the Treaty of Commerce, the earl of Finlater made a motion in the House of Peers, That some day might be appointed to consider the State of the Nation; whereupon the Lords appointed the 1st of June, when all the lords in town were summoned. Between one and two, the debate began, opened by

The Earl of Finlater, who represented the Grievances of the Scottish nation, which he reduced to four heads, viz. 1. Their being deprived of a privy-council. 2. The laws of England, in cases of treason, extended to Scotland. 3. The Scots peers being incapable of being made peers of Great-Britain, as it was adjudged and declared in the case of the late duke of Hamilton. And 4. The Scots being subjected to the Malt-tax, which would be the more insupportable to them now, in that they never bore it during the war, and had reason to reap and enjoy the benefits of Peace: concluding, That, since the Union between the two nations had not those good effects as were expected and hoped from it, when it was made, he therefore moved, That leave might be given to bring in a Bill for dissolving the said Union, and securing the Protestant Succession in the house of Hanover, the queen's prerogative in both kingdoms, and preserving an entire unity and good correspondence between the two kingdoms.

This motion was seconded by the earl of Marr, and opposed by,

The Lord North and Grey, who in a long speech, endeavoured to shew that the complaints of the Scots were groundless, and the dissolving of the Union impracticable, not without some reflections on the poverty of the Scottish nation.

The Lord Eglington allowed the Scottish nation to be poor, and therefore unable to pay the Malt-tax.

The Lord North and Grey replied to him, insisting, That it was nothing but what was agreed by the Treaty of the Union; the 14th article of which imported, that Scotland should not be charged with any Imposition on malt during the war only, * which now was at an end.

The Earl of Isla confessed there was such a clause; but that the same Article imported, That seeing it could not be supposed, that the parliament of Great-Britain would ever lay any sorts of burdens upon the united kingdom, but what they should find of necessity, at that time, for the preservation and good of the whole, and with due regard to circumstances, and abilities of every part of the united kingdom, therefore it was agreed, that there should be no further exemption insisted on for any part of the united kingdom, but that the consideration of any exemptions beyond what was already agreed on in this treaty, should be left to the determination of the parliament of Great-Britain. He urged, that when this treaty was made, the Scots concluded, the parliament of Great-Britain would never go about to lay any imposition that they had reason to believe was burdensome; and having set forth their inability to pay the Malt-tax, concluded, for the Earl of Seafield's motion.

The Earl of Peterborough endeavoured to shew the impossibility of dissolving the Union. He said, among other things, That he had heard the Union compared to a marriage: that according to that notion, since it was made, it could not be broke, being made by the greatest power upon earth. That, though sometimes there happened a difference between man and wife, yet it did not presently break the marriage: so, in the like manner, though England, who, in this national marriage, must be supposed to be the husband, might, in some instances, have been unkind to the lady, yet he ought not presently to sue for a divorce, the better rather because she had very much mended her fortune by this match: adding, that the Union was a contract, than which nothing could be more binding.

The Earl of Isla answered, That if the Union had the same sanction as marriage, which was an ordinance of God, he should be for observing it as religiously as that, but that he thought there was a great difference.

The Earl of Peterborough replied, "He could not tell how it could be more solemn than it was, except they expected it should have come down from Heaven, like the Ten Commandments. Animadverting, in the conclusion, on the Scots, as a people that could never be satisfied; that they would have all the advantages of being united to England, but would pay nothing by their good will; and that they had more money from England than all their estates amounted to in their own country."

The Duke of Argyle replied, in a warm speech; saying, among other things, "That he was by some reflected on as if he was disgusted and had changed sides, but that he despised those persons, as much as he undervalued their judgments. That it was true he had a great hand in making the Union: That the chief reason that moved him to it was securing the Protestant Succession; but that he was satisfied that might be done as well now, if the Union were dissolved. That he spoke as a peer of England, as well as of Scotland: that he believed in his conscience, it was as much for the interest of England as of Scotland to have it dissolved; and if it were not, he did not expect long to have either property left in Scotland, or liberty in England. He urged, that the tax upon Malt in Scotland was as unequal (though the same as in England) as taxing land by the acre, which would be very unjust, the land being worth 5 or 6*l.* per acre, here about London, and not so many shillings in some parts of the country. That this was the case between the Scots and the English Malt; the latter being worth 3 or 4*s.* the bushel, the other not above 1*s.*: so that if this tax were collected in Scotland, it must be done by a regiment of dragoons."

Some other Scottish Peers said, "That the end of the Union was the cultivating an amity and friendship between the two nations, but it was so far from having that effect, that they were sure the animosities between the two nations, were much greater now than before the Union. That it might easily be proved by many instances, that some persons agreed better when they were asunder, than when together; and for that reason they believed, if the Union were dissolved again, the two nations would be like to be better friends."

The Lord Chief Justice Trevor made a vehement speech against it, as a thing hardly to be done.

The Lord Treasurer (Oxford) said, "That the Earl of Seafield's motion was no less strange than unexpected; that the Union being made by two distinct parliaments of both kingdoms, he did not see how it could be dissolved, now the two nations were in different circumstances from what they were in when it was made; because the power that made it was no more in being; and nothing could make it void, but the power that created it; concluding, that if the Scots had any grievance to complain of there might be some other method thought to redress them, without proceeding to that extraordinary way of dissolving the Union, which had been made in so solemn a manner, and brought about with so much difficulty at last, after so many fruitless attempts before."

The Earl of Nottingham represented the advantages of the Union, if the views with which it was made, had been steadily pursued. He added, "That though the two nations were now in other circumstances than when the Union was made, yet the same power that was in the two parliaments when they were separated and distinct, was lodged in them, now they were consolidated, and therefore if they had power to make it, they certainly had to dissolve it: and that he knew not anything but what the parliament could do, except destroying the present constitution, which he owned they had no power to do. That the inconveniences that had attended the Union could not be foreseen till the trial was made: and since the Scots, who were the best judges of the affairs of their kingdom, found that it did not answer the ends proposed, he was for dissolving it."

The Earl of Sunderland said to the same purpose, "That though he had a hand in making the Union, yet if it had not that good effect which was expected from it, he was likewise for dissolving it."

The Lord Viscount Townshend said, "He was of the same opinion provided, nevertheless, means could be found to secure the Protestant Succession, and therefore desired to know what security the Scots could give for that essential point, before they proceeded any further."

To this some of the Scottish Lords replied, "That would appear when the bill was brought in; that then it was a proper time to shew what security they could give;" and therefore moved that the question might be put immediately, Whether a bill should be brought in or not?

The Earl of Nottingham desired, that another day might be appointed to consider further of a matter of such consequence, that the Lords might be better apprized of it.

The Lord Halifax declared also for dissolving the Union, provided it could be made appear that the Succession could be secured; but yet desired that a further day might be appointed to consider of so important a matter.

Two Scottish Lords, the earls of Marr, and Loudoun, who were before for putting the question, immediately declared themselves better satisfied by that Lord's reasons, and so were for putting it off to another time. There were several other Speeches made both by English and Scottish Lords, particularly by the Earls of Paulet, Scarborough, and Scarsdale: and it is observable, that when one of the Lords urged the danger that England would be in from the Pretender, if the Union were dissolved, the lord Townshend answered, "He could not tell what England had to fear from that or any other incident; and that the Queen, Lords and Commons of England, if all in one interest, need fear no enemy in the world, but ought to despise the Pretender, and all his abettors." The duke of Argyle having occasion to mention the Pretender, said, "He knew not what name to call him by, his name being now as uncertain as his parents:" but the earl of Scarsdale called him the Prince, or, added he, the Pretender, which you will. Upon the whole matter the Court-Lords were all against dissolving the Union; and said, that the very moving such a thing was dangerous, and might be of ill consequence, and therefore desired that such an effectual stop might be put to it, as that none might offer at any such thing again. On the other hand, the Scottish Lords said, that if the Union were not dissolved, their country would be the most miserable under Heaven. The question being put on the Earl of Finlater's motion, the same was carried in the Negative by four voices, there being 54 Lords present on each side, and 17 proxies for the Negative, and only 13 for the Affirmative. It is observable that the Lord Treasurer having, in the course of this debate advanced, "That though the Tax were laid it might be afterwards remitted by the crown, and not levied:" The Earl of Sunderland said, "He wondered such expressions as tended to establish a despotic dispensing power, and arbitrary government, should come from that noble lord." To this the Treasurer answered, "That his family had never been for promoting and advising arbitrary measures, as others had done;" which the Earl of Sunderland taking to be a reflection on his father, he not only vindicated him, but added, "That the other Lord's family was hardly known in those days."

The Malt-Bill passed.] June 5. The Lords read a second time the Malt-Bill, and the question being put, that the same be referred to a committee of the whole House, the same occasioned a long debate; but after many speeches it was carried in the affirmative, by 85 votes against 83; that is, by 64 present and 21 proxies, against 63 present and 20 proxies. It was observed that two Scottish peers were absent without leaving their proxies, which if they had, the votes had been equal. Three days after, the Lords in a grand committee considered of the said bill, and, after a warm debate, that lasted till six o'clock in the evening, it was carried that the bill do pass, by a majority of 64 voices against 56.

Protest thereon.] On which occasion was entered the following Protest:

"Because, we apprehend, that the charging Scotland with this Malt-Tax will be a violation of the 14th Article of the Union, by which it is expressly provided, that Scotland shall not be charged with any Malt-Tax, during this war. And it was not denied; for, indeed, it is undeniable, that Peace with Spain is not yet concluded, and by construction of law and usage of parliament, this bill is to be reckoned as a grant to the crown, and a charge upon the people from the first day of this succession, at which time, even the Peace with France was not made.—2dly, Because a great part of this Malt-Tax is for the satisfying and making up the deficiency of the Malt-Tax in the year 1711, from which Scotland being entirely free, we conceive it unjust, even though the Peace were concluded, to make that part of the united kingdom pay any part of that Tax, which was expressly given (as appears by the preamble, for this present war.—3dly, Because it is by the aforesaid 14th Article expressly provided, that due consideration shall be had of the circumstances of Scotland, when any imposition or tax is laid on it; and we are fully persuaded that it is impossible for Scotland to bear so heavy a tax, by which it will be liable to pay vastly more when the Peace shall be concluded, than it did during the war; whereas England has its burdens greatly diminished. Debate in the Commons on the Bill for making effectual the 8th and 9th Articles of the Treaty of Commerce.] June 9. The Commons, in a grand committee, took this Bill

* "The matter of the greatest consequence in this session was, the Bill for settling the Commerce with France, according to the 8th and 9th Articles of the Treaty, which had been ordered by the Commons to be brought in

into consideration, sir Robert Davers being in the chair; and heard Mr. Cooke, a merchant, who, in behalf of the Levant Company, made a long speech; wherein, with great solidity of reason and argument, he shewed how detrimental the opening a trade with France, would be to the British woollen and silk manufactures, and to all the branches of our trade. The Merchants being withdrawn, the Commons took their allegations into consideration.

General Stanhope, to corroborate what Mr. Cooke had alledged, quoted the preamble of an act of parliament, made in the 13th year of Charles the 3d's reign, that run thus: "Forasmuch as it has been by long experience found, that the importing of French wines, brandy, linen, silk, salt, and paper, and other commodities of the growth, product, or manufactures, of the territories and dominions of the

The traders in the city of London, and those in all the other parts of England, were alarmed, with the great prejudice this would bring on the whole nation. The Turkey company, those that traded to Portugal and Italy, and all who were concerned in the woollen and silk manufactures, appeared before both Houses, and set forth the great mischief, that a Commerce with France, on the foot of the Treaty, would bring upon the nation; while none appeared on the other side, to answer their arguments, or to set forth the advantage of such a Commerce. It was manifest, that none of the trading bodies had been consulted in it; and the Commissioners for Trade and Plantations had made very material observations on the first project, which was sent to them for their opinion: and afterwards, when this present project was formed, it was also transmitted to that board by the queen's order, and they were required to make their remarks on it: but Arthur Moor, who had risen up from being a footman without any education, to be a great dealer in trade, and was the person of that board, in whom the lord treasurer confided most, moved, that they might first read it every one a-part, and then debate it; and he desired to have the first perusal: so he took it away, and never brought it back to them, but gave it to the lord Bolingbroke, who carried it to Paris, and there it was settled. The bill was very feebly maintained by those who argued for it; yet the majority went with the bill till the last day; and then the opposition to it was so strong, that the ministers seemed inclined to let it fall: but it was not then known, whether this was only a feint, or whether the instances of the French ambassador, and the engagements that our ministers were under to that court, prevailed for carrying it on. It was brought to the last step; and when a great many of those, who had hitherto gone along with the court, broke from them in this matter, and bestirred themselves so effectually, that when it came to the last division, 185 were for the bill, and 194 were against it: by so small a majority, was a bill of such great importance lost." Tindal.

French king, has much exhausted the treasure of this nation, lessened the value of the native commodities and manufactures thereof, and caused great detriment to this kingdom in general: Be it therefore enacted, &c." Hereupon

The Speaker, supposing that Mr. Stanhope had made a mistake, said, 'There was no such thing in that act:' But

General Stanhope insisted, that the clerk should read the said act; and his quotation appearing to be right, he, and other members, animadverted with some vehemence on the Speaker's blunder: At last the debate cooled, and was put off to the next day; and it was resolved, that the Petitioners, who had not yet been, should then be heard.

June 10. The Commons having resolved themselves into a grand committee upon the Bill, the Spanish, Italian, and Portugal merchants, and the weavers of London, were admitted to be heard upon their several Petitions. Mr. Torriano, who spoke in behalf of the Spanish trade, having animadverted on the 8th and 9th Articles of the Treaty of Commerce, and mentioned the 10th and 11th, as relating to the two former; some court members were offended at it, and, after he had done speaking, moved the committee, that a mark of their displeasure might be set on him: But general Stanhope, Mr. Lechmere, sir Peter King, and Mr. John Smith said, "That unless they gave the Merchants full liberty of speech, the House would never be able to form a right judgment on that important affair; and they hoped, that no man should be reprimanded, for standing up for the trade of Great Britain." This, together with a noble spirit that appeared in the House on behalf of the Merchants, by the great number of members, both Tory and Whig, who, all at once, stood up to defend Mr. Torriano, made the courtiers drop that matter; and so Mr. Wyat spoke for the Italian merchants; Mr. Milner for the Portugal trade, and col. Lekeux for the London weavers. The Merchants being withdrawn, the Speaker resumed the chair; and it was resolved, That the grand committee should, the next day, consider further of the Bill; and that the other Petitioners be then heard. It was also ordered, That the minutes of the Levant company, and all memorials, petitions, representations, schemes of trade, and papers relating thereto, that were either before the Commissioners of Trade and Plantations, or before the Commissioners of the Customs, relating to the trade between England and France, be laid before the House.

June 11. The grand Committee heard several petitioners, and read many petitions, and other papers: And, two days after, a clause was ordered to be inserted in the bill, declaring, "That the privileges, liberties, and immunities, as to all duties, impositions, or customs, relating to commerce, or to any other right whatsoever, that had been, or might be granted by France, with respect to the subjects, goods, or merchandises of any foreign nation, should be understood to extend as well to the four species of goods, excepted in the 9th Article from the Tariff of 1664, as to all other merchandises whatsoever, imported into France by the subjects of Great Britain." Then the Commons, in a grand committee, made a further progress in the bill, and went through it on the 15th of June. Three days after, sir Robert Davers reported the amendments made to the bill: which, with some others, were agreed to by the House. Then a motion being made, that the bill be ingrossed, the same occasioned a warm debate, from three o'clock in the afternoon, till near 11 at night. General Stanhope, sir Peter King, Mr. Gould, Mr. Hampden, and some others, shewed the disadvantage of an open trade with France, upon the foot of the last Treaty of Commerce: And the member that spoke most in favour of the bill, was the same who had been chiefly employed in that treaty, viz. Mr. Arthur Moore; but some of his arguments being strained; and precarious, the majority even of his own party adhered to the opinion of

Sir Thomas Hanmer, who made a long and elaborate speech; wherein, among other things, he said, That before he had fully examined the affair in question, he had given his vote for the bringing in the bill; but, that having afterwards maturely weighed and considered the allegations of the traders and manufacturers, in their several petitions and representations, he was convinced, that the passing of it, would be of great prejudice to the woollen and silk manufacturers of this kingdom, consequently increase the number of the poor, and, in the end, affect the land. That while he had the honour to sit in that House, he would never be blindly led by any ministry; neither, on the other hand, was he biassed by what might weigh with some men, viz. the fear of losing their elections; But that the principles upon which he acted, were the interest of his country, and the conviction of his judgment; and upon these two considerations alone, he was against the bill.

This speech made a great impression on many of the members; and Mr. Aislabe, one of the lords commissioners of the Admiralty, and Mr. Francis Annesly, one of the commissioners of the Public Accounts, having spoke also against the bill; the question, whether it should be ingrossed, was, at last, carried in the negative, by a majority of 194 voices, against 185.*

* "It was observed, that of the four members for the city of London, one only, sir William Withers, voted for the bill; and that sir Richard Hoare, then lord mayor, sir George Newland, and sir John Cass, voted against it; as did also the two members for Westminster, Mr. Medicot, and Mr. Thomas Cross. On the other hand, it was given out, that the Lord Treasurer, foreseeing the ill effects of passing such a bill at this juncture, wrote, the night before, a Letter to the Speaker of the House of

The Queen's Answer concerning the Equivalent for Dunkirk.] June 19. The Chancellor of the Exchequer acquainted the House, That their Address having been presented to the Queen for an Account to be laid before the House, what Equivalent was given to the most Christian king for the demolition of Dunkirk, and in case the Equivalent was not complied with, what was stipulated relating to Dunkirk: Her majesty had been pleased to command him to acquaint this House, "That, in pursuance of the Treaties, as well between her majesty and the most Christian king, as between that king and the States General, the Equivalent which was to be given for the demolition of Dunkirk, was already in the hands of his most Christian majesty."

Address relating to the Towns held by the Dutch Troops in Flanders.] June 27. The Chancellor of the Exchequer acquainted the Commons, That pursuant to their Address for an Account, what her majesty had stipulated for the Trade of Great Britain in Flanders, and how the same was to be secured, her majesty had commanded the Report of her Commissioners of Trade, about that matter, to be laid before this House. And he presented the same accordingly; which being read, it was resolved to address her majesty, "That she would be pleased to take care, that the towns in Flanders in her majesty's possession, be not evacuated till those who are to have the sovereignty of the Spanish Netherlands, agree to such articles for regulating of trade, as may put the subjects of Great Britain upon an equal foot with those of any other nation." To which Address the queen made a very gracious Answer, agreeable to the desire of the House.

Address of Thanks for the Treaties of Peace and Commerce.] June 23. Sir Thomas Hanmer moved, "That an Address be presented to her majesty, returning her majesty the humble Thanks of this House, for the great care she has taken of the security and honour of her kingdoms in the Treaty of Peace; and also for what she has done in the Treaty of Commerce with France, by laying so good a foundation for the interests of her people in trade; and humbly to desire her majesty, that she would be pleased to appoint Commaissaries to treat Commons, desiring him to use his interest to make it drop; which step he might, probably, be induced to take, from the opposition the bill was like to meet with in the House of Lords: where, that very afternoon, the earls of Anglesey and Abingdon, and some other peers, had declared against it: However, some suspected either the reality, or true design of such a letter: because most of the court, and Scotch members, voted for the bill. Be that as it will, the London drapers, mercers, and weavers, were overjoyed at the rejecting of the bill; and, on Friday night, the 19th of June, expressed their satisfaction by bon-fires and illuminations." Boyer.

with Commissaries on the part of France, for adjusting such matters as shall be necessary to be settled in the Treaty of Commerce between her majesty and France, that the Treaty may be so explained and perfected, that an entire scheme of trade may be settled, for the making effectual her majesty's gracious intentions for the good and welfare of her people." The House being very thin, and many of the members who voted against the Bill above-mentioned, and who did not expect such a motion, being absent, the question was carried in the affirmative by a majority of 156 voices against 72. After a Committee for drawing up the Address had been appointed, general Tanbroke made a motion, and the question was put, "That it be an instruction to the said Committee, that they do represent in the said Address, the sense of this House, That her majesty's Commissaries, who are to treat of the Commerce between Great Britain and France, shall insist, that liberty be given to her majesty's subjects to trade to all the ports in the French king's dominions." But the previous question being put, That that question be now put, it passed in the negative.

The next day sir Thomas Hanmer reported the Address of Thanks, which was agreed to as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign;
 "We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, having, at the opening this session, congratulated your majesty upon the conclusion of a Peace, find ourselves now under equal obligations of duty, to express our thankfulness to your majesty, since we have been acquainted with the conditions and terms of it; which by your great wisdom have been procured, and by your gracious condescension have been communicated to us; your majesty's extensive care hath not only provided for the security, but the honour of your kingdoms; and we should be wanting in concern for both, if we should omit our just acknowledgments for the particular regards which your majesty in this, as well as in other instances, hath shewn to them.—The good foundation your majesty hath laid for the interest of your people in Trade, by what you have done in the Treaty of Navigation and Commerce with France, gives us hopes of seeing it yet further improved to the advantage of your kingdoms; and we make our humble request to your majesty, that you will be pleased to appoint Commissaries to treat with those of France, for the adjusting such matters as are still necessary to be settled; and that you will give such orders for the perfecting the said Treaty, and explaining the several parts of it, that an entire scheme of Trade may be framed between Great Britain and France, which may fully answer, and make effectual your majesty's gracious intentions for the good and welfare of your people."

The Queen's Answer.] To which the queen gave this Answer:

"Gentlemen;

"I thank you most heartily for this Address, which so fully expresses your approbation of the Treaties of Peace and Commerce with France.—It was with no small difficulty that so great advantages in trade were obtained for my subjects, and I will readily comply with your desires, in continuing my utmost care to secure the benefits I have stipulated for my people."

This Answer surprized many of the members, such especially who readily went into the Address with no other intention, than to shew their approbation of the Treaty of Peace, abstracted from the Treaty of Commerce. However, the Speaker having early the next day reported the said Answer to a very thin House, it was resolved, nem. con. "That the humble Thanks of the House be returned to her majesty, for her most gracious Answer to the Address of this House."

This was all that passed this session with relation to Peace. It was once apprehended, that the ministers would have moved for an Act, or at least for an Address, approving the Peace, but no such motion was made.*

* Burnet says, that, if such a motion had been made, he would have spoken the following Speech, being the only one he ever prepared beforehand, which he has inserted in his History, in order to deliver down to posterity his thoughts of this great transaction:

"My lords; this matter now before you, as it is of the greatest importance, so it may be seen in very different lights; I will not meddle with the political view of it: I leave that to persons, who can judge and speak of it much better than I can; I will only offer to you what appears to me, when I consider it, with relation to the rules of morality and religion; in this I am sure I act within my proper sphere. Some things stick so with me, that I could have no quiet in my conscience, nor think I had answered the duty of my function, if I did not make use of the freedom of speech, that our constitution and the privileges of this House allow me: I am the more encouraged to do this, because the bringing those of our order into public councils, in which we have now such a share, was originally intended for this very end, that we should offer such considerations, as arise from the rules of our holy religion: in all matters that may come before us. In the opening my sense of things, I may be forced to use some words, that may perhaps appear severe: I cannot help it, if the nature of these affairs is such, that I cannot speak plainly of them, in a softer strain; I intend not to reflect on any person: and I am sure I have such a profound respect for the queen, that no part of what I may say, can be understood to reflect on her in any short: her intentions are no doubt, as she declares them to be, all for the good and happiness of her people; but it is not to be supposed, that she can read long treaties, or carry the articles of them in

" Her majesty thinks fit to acquaint her loyal House of Commons with the difficulties, which her memory ; so, if things have been either concealed from her, or misrepresented to her, ' She can do no wrong,' and if any such thing has been done, we know on whom our constitution lays the blame.

" The treaties that were made some years ago with our allies are in print ; both the Grand Alliance, and some subsequent ones : we see many things in these, that are not provided for by this peace ; it was in particular stipulated, that no peace should be treated, much less concluded, without the consent of the allies. But before I make any observations on this, I must desire you will consider how sacred a thing the public faith, that is engaged in treaties and alliances, should be esteemed.

" I hope, I need not tell you, that even heathen nations valued themselves upon their fidelity, in a punctual observing of all their treaties, and with how much infamy they branded the violation of them ; if we consider that which revealed religion teaches us to know, that man was made after the image of God, the God of all truth, as we know who is the father of lies ; ' God hates the deceitful man, in whose mouth there is no faithfulness.' In that less perfect religion of the Jews, when the Gibeonites had, by a fraudulent proceeding, drawn Joshua and the Israelites into a league with them ; it was sacredly observed ; and the violation of it, some ages after, was severely punished. And, when the last of the kings of Judah shook off the fidelity, to which he had bound himself to the king of Babylon, the prophet thereupon said with indignation, ' Shall he break the oath of God, and prosper ?' The swearing deceitfully is one of the worst characters ; and ' He who swears to his own hurt, and changes not, is among the best. It is a maxim of the wisest of kings, that, ' the throne is established in righteousness.' Treaties are of the nature of oaths ; and, when an oath is asked to confirm a treaty, it is never denied. The best account that I can give of the dispute of adding that sacred seal to treaties is this.

" The Popes had for some ages possessed themselves of a power, to which they had often recourse, of dissolving the faith of treaties, and the obligation of oaths ; the famous but fatal story of Ladislaus, king of Hungary ; breaking his faith to Amurath the Turk by virtue of a papal dispensation, is well known. One of the last public acts of this sort, was when pope Clement the seventh absolved Francis the first from the treaty made and sworn to at Madrid while he was a prisoner there : the severe revenge that Charles the fifth took of this, in the sack of Rome, and in keeping that pope for some months a prisoner, has made popes more cautious since that time, than they were for-in a particular manner she lies under by the Debts contracted in her civil government, occasioned by several extraordinary expenses formerly incurred ; so that her majesty thinks herself obliged in justice to many creditors, to order an Estimate to be laid before this House merly : this also drew such heavy but just reproaches, on the papacy, from the reformers, that some stop seems now to be put to such barefaced protection of perjury. But the late king told me, that he understood from the German protestant princes, that they believed the confessors of popish princes had faculties from Rome for doing this as effectually, though more secretly : he added, that they knew it went for a maxim among popish princes, that their word and faith bound them as they were men, and members of society ; but that their oaths, being acts of religion, were subject to the direction of their confessors ; and that they, apprehending this, did in all their treaties with the princes of that religion, depend upon their honour, but never asked the confirmation of an oath, which had been the practice of former ages. The protestants of France thought they had gained an additional security, for observing the edict of Nantes, when the swearing to observe it was made a part of the coronation oath ; but it is probable, this very thing undermined and ruined it.

" Grotius, Puffendorf, and others who have wrote of the law of nations, lay this down for a rule, that the nature of a treaty, and the law that arises out of it, is not altered by the having, or not having an oath ; the oath serves only to heighten the obligation. They do also agree in this, that confederacies do not bind states, to carry on a war to their utter ruin ; but, that princes and states are bound to use their utmost efforts in maintaining them : and it is agreed by all, who have treated of these matters, that the common enemy, by offering to any one confederate all his pretensions, cannot justify his departing from the confederacy ; because it was entered into with that view, that all the pretensions, upon which the confederacy was made, should be insisted on, or departed from, by common consent.

" It is true, that in confederacies, where allies are bound to the performance of several articles, as to their quotas or shares, if any one fails in the part he was bound to, the other confederates have a right to demand a reparation for his non-performance : but, even in that case, allies are to act as friends, by making allowances for what could not be helped, and not as enemies by taking advantages, on design to disengage them from their allies. It is certain, allies forfeit their right to the alliance, if they do not perform their part : but the failure must be evident, and an expostulation must be first made : and if, upon satisfaction demanded, it is not given, then a protestation should be made, of such non-performance ; and the rest of the confederates are at liberty, as to him who fails on his part : these are reckoned among the con-

what was owing on the Civil List in the year '10.—Her majesty hath used unexampled usimony to remove, if possible, this burden on herself; but the granting away, and lessening some part of her revenue by parliament, has

ms and laws of nations: and, since nothing of this kind has been done, I cannot see how it can be made out, that the tie of the confederacy, and by consequence, that the public faith is not been first broken on our side.

“My lords, I cannot reconcile the carrying a treaty with the French, without the knowledge and concurrence of the other confederate states and princes, and the concluding it without the consent of the emperor, the principal confederate; not to mention the visible uneasiness, that has appeared in the others, who seem to have been forced to consent, by declarations, if not by threatenings; from hence I say, I cannot reconcile this, with the Articles of the Grand Alliance, and the other later treaties, that are in print: this seems to come within the charge of the prophet, against those “who deal treacherously with those who had not dealt treacherously with them;” upon which he threatening that follows may be justly apprehended: it will have a strange sound among all Christians, but more particularly among the reformed, when it is reported, that the plenipotentiary of the head of the reformed princes laid openly to the other plenipotentiaries, that the queen held herself free from all treaties and alliances; if this be set for a precedent, here is a short way of dispensing with the public faith; and, if this was spoken by one of our prelates, I am afraid it will leave a heavy reproach on our church; and, to speak freely, I am afraid it will draw a much heavier curse after it. My lords, there is a God in heaven, who will judge all the world, without respect of persons: nothing can prosper without his blessing: he can blast all the counsels of men, when laid in fraud and deceit, how cunningly soever they may be either contrived or disguised: and I must think that a peace made in opposition to the express words of so many treaties, will prove a curse instead of a blessing to us: God is provoked by such proceedings, to pour heavy judgments on us, for the violation of a faith so often given, which is so openly broken: by this our nation is dishonoured, and our church disgraced: and I dread to think, what the consequence of those things is like to prove. I would not have expressed myself in such a manner, if I had not thought, that I was bound to it by the duty that I owe to Almighty God, by my zeal for the queen, and the church, and by my love to my country. Upon so great an occasion, I think my post in the church, and in this house, lays me under the strictest obligations to discharge my conscience, and to speak plainly without fear or flattery, let the effect of it, as to myself, be what it will: I shall have the more quiet in my own mind, both living and dying, for having done that, which seemed to me an indispensable duty.

made that impracticable; therefore her majesty hopes that this House of Commons, which on all occasions have shewn themselves so well affected to her, will not be unwilling to empower her to raise such a sum of money on the Civil List Funds, as may enable her to discharge the debts, and settle the expence, to be regularly paid for the future.

A Motion for an Account of those Debts rejected.] This Message having been read by the Speaker; Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer presented to the House an Estimate of the Debts which were owing to the several heads of expence for her majesty's Civil Government at or about Midsummer 1710, which being read, it was resolved to consider of the said Message the next day, in a committee of the whole

“I hope this house will not bring upon themselves, and the nation, the blame and guilt of approving that, which seems to be much more justly censurable: the reproach that may belong to this treaty, and the judgments of God, that may follow on it, are now what a few only are concerned in. A national approbation is a thing of another nature; the public breach of faith, in the attack that was made on the Smyrna fleet 40 years ago, brought a great load of infamy on those, who advised and directed it: but they were more modest than to ask a public approbation of so opprobrious a fact: it lay on a few; and the nation was not drawn in to a share in the guilt of that, which was then universally detested, though it was passed over in silence: it seems enough, if not too much, to be silent on such an occasion. I can carry my compliances no further.”

“The House of Commons was, as to all other things, except the affair of commerce, so entirely in the hands of the ministers, that they ventured on a new demand of a very extraordinary nature, which was made in an extraordinary manner. The civil list, which was estimated at 600,000*l.* a year, and was given for the ordinary support of the government, did far exceed it. And this was so evident, that, during the three first years of the queen's reign, 100,000*l.* was every year applied to the war; 200,000*l.* was laid out in building of Blenheim-house; and the entertaining the Palatines had cost the queen 100,000*l.* So there was apparently a large overplus, beyond what was necessary towards the support of the government. Yet these extraordinary expences had put the ordinary payments into such an arrear, that, at Midsummer, 1710, the queen owed 510,000*l.* But, upon a new account, this was brought to be 80,000*l.* less; and, at that time, there was an arrear of 100,000*l.* due to the civil list: these two sums amounting to 270,000*l.* the debt that remained, was but 240,000*l.* Yet now, in the end of the session, when upon rejecting the bill of commerce, most of the members were gone into the country, so that there were not 100 left, a Message was sent, &c.” Tindal.

House, and ordered that the said Message and Estimate be referred to the said Committee. An eminent member, Mr. J. Smith, formerly Speaker of the House, and one of the Tellers of the Exchequer, having raised some objections against that Estimate, saying, in vindication of the late ministry, that, to his certain knowledge, the Debts of the Civil List in August, 1710, did not amount to above 150,000*l.* for the payment of part of which sum there were some money standing out, besides great quantities of tin, whereas, by the Estimate now laid before the Commons, the said Debts, to Midsummer 1710, that is, about two months before, were made to amount to 400,000*l.*, a motion was thereupon made, and the question put, That an humble Address be presented to her majesty that she would please to direct an Account to be laid before this House of the Arrears of the Civil List Funds standing out at Midsummer, 1710. And also an Account of the Debts of the Civil List as they are at this time, and of the Arrears of the Civil List Funds to pay the same; but the same passed in the negative, to the great surprize of many.

*Vote to empower the Queen to raise 500,000*l.* to pay the Civil List.*] The next day the Commons considered of the Message, and after some debate, came to this Resolution, "That her majesty be empowered by letters patents under the Great Seal to set apart and appropriate a sum not exceeding 35,000*l.* per ann. for any term not exceeding 32 years, to be made a fund or security to raise, by such means and methods, and in such manner and form as her majesty by such letters patents shall appoint, any sum not exceeding 500,000*l.*, to discharge Arrears and Debts owing to her servants and others, payable out of the branches settled for defraying the expence of her Civil Government, and that the said yearly sum be charged upon all the said branches, whether they be hereditary or temporary, and be issued and paid at the Exchequer, out of the moneys from time to time arising by those branches, with preference to all other payments to be hereafter charged thereupon at the said receipt." Which Resolution was the next day reported, and agreed to by the House; and a Bill was ordered to be brought in thereupon.

*The Bills to raise 500,000*l.* for the Civil List, and 1,200,000*l.* by Exchequer Bills, consolidated or tacked.*] June 30. The Bill was read a second time, and committed to the Committee of the whole House, to whom the Bill to raise 1,200,000*l.* for her majesty's Supply, by circulating a farther sum in Exchequer Bills, was committed; and, notwithstanding the opposition made by some members, it was ordered, That it be an instruction to the said Committee, that they do alter the said bills, and make them into one*. After this, the motion some days before made and laid aside, being again proposed with better success, it was resolved to address her majesty, first, For an Account of the Debts on the Civil List to Midsummer 1711: And 2ndly, For a yearly account of the neat produce of the Civil List Funds, since her majesty's accession to the throne. This last Address was made upon a suggestion, that the Civil List Funds, which at first were given only for about 700,000*l.* per ann. yielded now above 850,000*l.* But whether there were any ground for that report or no, it is certain that no Answer was returned to that Address.

Motion in the Lords for removing the Pretender from Lorrain.] June 29. The duke of Bolton took notice in the House of Peers both of the queen's Message to the Commons about the Debts of the Civil Lists, and of the Resolutions of the Commons thereupon, insinuating, That they were somewhat extraordinary, the usual way being for the crown to ask subsidies of both Houses, otherwise the House of Lords would become altogether useless: but though the consideration of this matter was put off to the next day, yet the same was waved upon account of a more important affair, viz. The earl of Wharton then moved, "That an humble Address may be presented to the queen, that she would be pleased to use her most pressing instances with the duke of Lorrain, and with all the princes and states in amity and correspondence with her majesty, that they would not receive, or suffer to continue within any of their dominions, the Pretender to the imperial crown of these realms."

Several members appearing surprized at this unexpected motion, which was undoubtedly designed to try the inclinations and affections of some persons, there was a pause for a while: At last the lord North and Grey broke silence, and endeavoured to have that motion laid aside, princes; and as the account of the queen's Debts was deceitfully stated, so it was known, that the funds, set off for the Civil List, would increase considerably in times of peace. However, though there was a great superiority in point of argument against the bill, there was a considerable majority for it. And all people concluded, that the true end of getting so much money into the hands of the court, was to furnish their creatures sufficiently for carrying their elections. The Lords were sensible, that the method of procuring this supply was contrary to their privileges, since all public supplies were either asked upon the throne, or by a message sent to both Houses at the same time. This practice was enquired into by the Lords; no precedents came up to it; but some came up so near it, that nothing could be made of the objection. But the ministers apprehending, that an opposition would be made to the bill, if it came up alone, got it consolidated with another of 1,200,000*l.* that was before them. And the weight of these two joined together made them both pass in the House of Lords, without opposition." Tindal.

representing, that such an Address would shew distrust, either of the queen, or the ministers; that her majesty would be very much puzzled what to do, in case the princes and the states in amity with her, should be unwilling to comply with her instances, since it would not be in her power to compel them; concluding with his question, Where they would have the Pretender reside, since most, if not all the powers of Europe, were in amity with her majesty? To this the earl of Peterborough was said to have answered, That since he began his studies in Paris, the fittest place for him to improve himself was Rome. After some other warm expressions between the earl of Wharton and the Lord Treasurer, it was unanimously resolved that such an Address should be presented to her majesty.

The Lords' Address thereon.] Accordingly, July 2, the House of Lords attended her majesty with the following Address:

"Most gracious Sovereign,
 "We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled; do take leave humbly to return to your majesty the thanks of this House, for the great care it appears to us your majesty has, on all occasions, taken to prevent the Pretender to your crown from coming into any of your majesty's dominions: And we do humbly beseech your majesty, that for the safety of your person and government, the security of the Protestant Succession in the house of Hanover, and for the peace and quiet of these your kingdoms, your majesty will be graciously pleased to use your most pressing instances with the duke of Lorraine, and with all princes and states in amity and correspondence with your majesty, that they will not receive, or suffer to continue within any of their dominions the Pretender to the imperial crown of these realms."

The Queen's Answer.] To which her majesty returned this Answer:

"My Lords; I take extreme kindly your Address, and the thanks you give me for what I have done for establishing the Protestant Succession.—I shall repeat my instances to have that person removed according as you desire in this Address. And I promise myself, you will concur with me, that if we could cure our animosities and divisions at home, it would be the most effectual method to secure the Protestant Succession."

A Second Address against the Pretender ordered by the Lords.] The Lord Chancellor (Harcourt) having the next day reported her majesty's Answer, the duke of Buckingham, Lord President, said, he never heard of any instances that had yet been made to the duke of Lorraine, for removing the Pretender out of his dominions. If either of the two principal ministers of state had been in the House, they might, in all probability, have better explained her majesty's Answer; but they happened to be both at dinner with the duke D'Aumont, ambassador extraordinary from his most Christian majesty. Hereupon, the earl of Sunderland made a motion for a second Address; which was backed by the earl of Nottingham, and, notwithstanding some small opposition, it was ordered, "That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, to return the Thanks of this House to her majesty, for her most gracious Answer to their Address; and for the assurances her majesty has been pleased to give us, of repeating her instances for removing the Pretender; and to express our surprize, that such instances have not had their full effect, notwithstanding the French king and the king of Spain have shewed their compliance to her majesty's desires on that occasion; and to assure her majesty, that this House will stand by her and support her, in whatever her majesty shall judge proper for obtaining a demand, which is so warranted by the laws of nations, and so necessary for the honour and safety of her majesty, and for the present and future peace and quiet of the people." It was also ordered, that the said Address be presented to her majesty by the lords with the white staves; which was done accordingly: And on the 6th the Lord Steward acquainted the House, That the lords with white staves had presented to her majesty the Address of this House of Friday last; and her majesty was pleased to receive the same very graciously.

The Commons' Address for removing the Pretender.] July 1. General Stanhope made a Motion for an Address for the queen to use her most pressing instances with the duke of Lorraine to remove the Pretender out of Lorraine. Which was seconded by Mr. Lechmere. The only objection raised against it, was started by sir Wm. Whitlocke, who said, 'He remembered, that the like Address was formerly made to the Protector, for having Charles Stuart removed out of France.' Notwithstanding which, that prince was, some time after, restored to his father's throne; but nevertheless those few members who might have any affection for the present royal exile, being shy to shew it on so critical a juncture, when the parliament being so near expiring, a new election was coming on, Mr. Stanhope's motion was agreed to nem. con.

The Address, which was presented to her majesty on the 8th, was as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign;
 "We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, having nothing so justly at our hearts as the honour and safety of your most sacred person, and government, and the security of the Protestant Succession, do crave leave most thankfully to acknowledge the great care which your majesty, in tenderness to your people, hath always taken to prevent the Pretender to your crown from being in a condition to disturb these realms; and particularly by the late Treaty of Guaranty with the States-general, and the Treaty of Peace between your majesty and the French king; wherein, amongst other just and necessary provisions, for the security of the Protestant Succession, it is stipulated, that the Pretender to your majesty's crown shall not be suffered to reside in any of that king's dominions.—Your majesty wisely insisted upon his removal from that neighbouring kingdom; and your faithful Commons are so fully convinced of the necessity there is to remove him as far as possible, that they cannot but express to your majesty their apprehensions of the many dangers which may accrue to your majesty, and to your kingdoms, from his residing in the territories of the duke of Lorraine.—We do, therefore, out of the highest duty and concern for the preservation of your royal person, and the quiet of your people, most humbly beseech your majesty, that you will be pleased to use the most speedy and pressing instances with the duke of Lorraine, and with all other princes and states in amity or correspondence with your majesty, that they will not, under any pretext whatsoever, receive, or suffer to continue, within any of their dominions, that person who, in defiance of your majesty's most undoubted title to the crown, and the settlement thereof on the illustrious house of Hanover, has assumed the title of king of these realms: And we farther beg leave to assure your majesty, that the Commons of Great Britain will, on all occasions, to the utmost of their power, support your majesty in such steps as shall be necessary towards rendering those instances effectual, and your majesty safe and easy upon your throne."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty gave this Answer:

"Gentlemen; I thank you heartily for your Address, and I will give directions according to your desire."

Thanksgiving for the Peace.] The queen having appointed the 7th of July for a public Thanksgiving, for the safe and honourable Peace lately concluded, and invited her parliament to attend her to St. Paul's, both Houses went with the usual state; but the queen not having intirely recovered her strength since the last fit of the gout, she could not be present at that solemnity. The Whigs were absent for another cause. In the evening there were great bonfires and illuminations throughout the cities of London and Westminster, and magnificent fireworks were played off on the Thames over-against Whitehall.

The Queen's Speech at the Close of the Session.] July 16. The queen came to the House of Peers to pass the bills, and put an end to the session; when she made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"I come now to put an end to this session with great satisfaction, and return you all my hearty thanks for the good service you have done to the public.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons;

"I must particularly thank you for the Supplies you have now given: I will take care to apply them, as far as they will reach, to satisfy the services you have voted.—I hope, at the next meeting, the affair of commerce will be so well understood, that the advantageous conditions, I have obtained from France, will be made effectual for the benefit of our trade.—I cannot part with so good and so loyal an House of Commons, without expressing how sensible I am of the affection, zeal, and duty, with which you have behaved yourselves; and I think myself therefore obliged to take notice of those remarkable services you have performed.—At your first meeting you found a method, without farther charge to my people, to ease them of the heavy load of more than nine millions; and the way of doing it may bring great advantage to the nation.—In this session you have enabled me to be just in paying the debts to my servants.—And, as you furnished Supplies for carrying on the war, so you have strengthened my hands in obtaining a peace.—Thus you have shewed yourselves the true representatives of my loyal Commons, by the just regard you have paid to the good of your country and my honour. These proceedings will, I doubt not, preserve the memory of this parliament to posterity.

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"At my coming to the crown, I found a war prepared for me. God has blessed my arms with many victories, and at last has enabled me to make them useful by a safe and honourable Peace.—I heartily thank you for the assistance you have given me therein, and I promise myself, that, with your concurrence, it will be lasting.—To this end, I recommend it to you all, to make my subjects truly sensible what they gain by the peace; and that you will endeavour to dissipate those groundless jealousies which have been so industriously fomented amongst us; that our unhappy divisions may not weaken, and in some sort endanger, the advantages I have obtained for my kingdoms.—There are some (very few I hope) who will never be satisfied with any government; it is necessary therefore, that you shew your love to your country, by exerting yourselves, to obviate the malice of the ill-minded, and to undeceive the deluded.—Nothing can establish Peace at home, nothing can recover the disorders that have happened during so long a war; but a steady adhering to the constitution in Church and State.—Such as are true to these principles are only to be relied on; and as they have the best title to my favour; so you may depend upon my having no interest nor aim, but your advantage, and the securing of our religion and liberty.—I hope, for the quiet of these nations, and the universal good, that I shall next winter meet my parliament; resolved to act upon the same principles, with the same prudence, and with such vigour, as may enable me to support the liberties of Europe abroad, and reduce the spirit of faction at home."*

* "Few Speeches from the throne have in my time been more severely reflected on, than this was: it seemed strange that the Queen, who did not pretend to understand matters of trade, should pass such a censure on her houses, for their not understanding the affair of commerce; since at the bar of both houses, and in the debates within them upon it, the interest of the nation did appear so visibly to be contrary to the Treaty of Commerce, that it looked like a contempt put on them, to represent it as advantageous to us, and to rank all those, who had opposed it, among the ill-informed, or at least among the deluded. Nor did it escape censure, that she should affirm, that the nation was by them eased of the load of nine millions, without any farther charge, since the nation must bear the constant charge of interest at six per cent. till the capital should be paid off. The sharpness with which she expressed herself was singular, and not very well suited to her dignity or her sex: nor was it well understood, what could be meant by her saying, that she found a war prepared for her, at her coming to the crown; since she herself began it, upon the Addresses of both Houses. It was also observed, that there was not, in all her Speech, one word of the Pretender, or of the Protestant Succession; but that, which made the greatest impression on the whole nation, was, that this Speech discovered plainly, that the Court was resolved to have the Bill of Commerce pass in the next session: all people concluded, the ministers were under engagements to the Court of France to get it settled: and this was taken to be the sense of the queen's words concerning the making the Peace lasting; what effect this may have on the next elections, which are quickly to follow, must be left to time.

"I am now come to the end of the war, and of this parliament, both at once: it was fit they should bear some proportion to one another; for, as this was the worst parliament I ever saw, so no assembly, but one composed as his was, could have sat quiet under such a peace: but I am now arrived at my full period, and so shall close this work: I had a noble respect before me, in a course of many years, of bringing it to a glorious conclusion; now the scene is so fatally altered, that I can scarce restrain myself from giving vent to a just indignation, in severe complaints: but an Historian must tell things truly as they are, and save the disanting on them to others: so I here conclude this History of above three and fifty years.—I pray God it may be read with the same candour and sincerity, with which I have written it, and with such a degree of attention, as may help those who read it, to form just reflections, and sound principles of religion and virtue, of duty to our princes, and of love to our country, with a sincere and incorruptible zeal to preserve our religion, and to maintain our liberty and property." Burnet.

"Thus ended the third and last session of the third British parliament, which some have distinguished by the epithet of 'Pacific;'

PRINCIPAL OCCURRENCES DURING THE RECESS—The Parliament dissolved—Progress of the Elections—The Parliament further prorogued—Jars at Court—The Crisis published by Mr. Steele—The Queen's Illness—Her Letter to the Lord Mayor—Promotions.—On the 8th of August the parliament was dissolved, and a new one was appointed to meet on the 12th of November. The party writers and managers on both sides were extremely busy in preparing the minds of the people to favour their respective interests in the new Elections. But notwithstanding the weight and influence of the court, and the visible partiality of some returning officers, a far greater number of Whigs were chosen, than was by many expected.

"On the 18th of October," says Tindal, "the Parliament was, by proclamation, further prorogued, from the 12th of November to the 10th of December, which was occasioned by the queen's illness, and the contests among the ministers. It was then strongly reported, that the lord Bolingbroke, Mr. Secretary Bromley, and sir William Wyndham (who, on the 1st of November, was made a privy-counsellor) having gained the ascendant, the Lord Treasurer entertained thoughts of retirement. And, indeed, the author of the paper, called the Examiner, thought fit, about the middle of November, to prepare the minds of the people for an approaching change in the ministry.* But

and whose proceedings, as they are variously censured by the present age, so will they bear a various character with posterity. It may be observed, in general, that though this House of Commons was mostly made up of country-gentlemen, who having borne a great part of the burden of the war, were easily prepossessed against them, who were suggested to have prolonged it for their private interest; and so, on many occasions voted blindly with their leaders; yet when the Trade, that is, the main source of the riches and strength of Great-Britain, came to fall under their consideration, many worthy patriots opened their eyes, shook off all mean dependence, and firmly adhered to the interest of their country." Political State.

* In the Examiner of November the 16th, the author suggests, "That in a constitution, which hangs together by so many minute parts, and which depends upon such variety of wheels and motions, where power and freedom are in a perpetual flux and reflux, we must of necessity be liable to turns and contingencies—That this uncertainty is redoubled, wherever strife and contention are let loose in a nation, where factions rage and worry one another; and even the government itself is treated as a party—Thus, under these circumstances, a ministry is obliged to act in another capacity than that which properly belongs to them. They must sometimes act like military as well as civil officers; draw forth their forces, and appear at the head of squadrons, and battalions, whenever faction takes the field, and declares open

what appeared more surprizing, was the ludicrous stile in which the same author, who was the mouth of those in power, spoke of the queen's indisposition, and of the succession in case of a demise.*

"Whilst things were in this dangerous situation, Mr. Steele published his Crisis, or A discourse representing from the most Authentic Records, the just Causes of the late happy Revolution, and the several Settlements of the crowns of England and Scotland on her majesty; and, on her demise without issue, upon the most illustrious princess Sophia, electress and duchess-dowager of Hanover; and the heirs of her body being Protestants; by previous acts of both parliaments of the late kingdoms of England and Scotland; and confirmed by the parliament of Great Britain: with some Remarks on the danger of a Popish Successor.' The design of this piece was first suggested to Mr. Steele, by Mr. More, of the Inner-temple: and the work itself passed through the hands of Mr. Addison, Mr. Lechmere, and Mr. Hoadley. And it was so well received by the public, that many were confirmed by it in their affection to the Protestant Succession.

"All this while the queen continued in a very dangerous state of health at Windsor; of war against them. There wants but very little of bringing things, as they now stand, to this deplorable crisis—That the possession of power under these difficulties, is almost as great an uncertainty, as the fortune of war, and stands exposed to as many turns and cross accidents—And that these considerations amount to a full proof, that the best of patriots are more exposed to mortality, as ministers of state, than as men, &c."

* The Examiner of January the 8th, 1713-14, contains what follows: "According to the best advices sent us by the Whigs, and their oracles, the demise of the crown happened upon Thursday the 24th of December, being Christmas-eve, at four of the clock in the morning in the year 1713. All ages, ranks, sexes, and orders of men, at first hearing of the ill news, were affected with the deepest sorrow; and a general panic ran through the whole kingdom. For a long time, we were distracted and inconsolable; in the utmost horror and confusion, upon the loss of our most excellent queen, who then became immortal: but these black clouds were soon dispersed, our fears and jealousies vanished, and we revived from a deplorable state of grief and misery, at the first joyful tidings of the happy accession of her most sacred majesty queen Anne the second (whom God long preserve) to the throne of her ancestors: the nature of our monarchy being such, that, immediately after the death of the person in possession, the crown, by right of inheritance, descends to the next heir, without any previous formalities and conditions, or admitting so much as the least vacancy, or interregnum, &c."

which various accounts were spread abroad; but the truth was thus, as represented by Dr. Shadwell, in his letters to the duke and duchess of Shrewsbury: On Wednesday the 23d of December, her majesty was very uneasy all night with the gout in her foot. The next morning it went intirely off, and she said she was well. But, about one o'clock that day, she complained of a pain in her thigh, and was seized with a violent shivering, which lasted above two hours. Extreme heat followed, with intense thirst, great restlessness, anxiety, and inquietude. The pulse was full, hard, and quick; which Dr. Shadwell finding, the next day, he very much pressed bleeding, urging, it would probably carry off a good part of the fever, and bring a fit of the gout; but it was not agreed to; and these symptoms continued till Saturday morning, when her majesty fell asleep, waked refreshed, and on Sunday morning there was a perfect intermission of the symptoms; but the pulse, in Dr. Shadwell's opinion, was not quiet. The next night about twelve, she was attacked with an exacerbation of the fever, which lasted all the Monday till midnight. Most of the queen's physicians judging her distemper to be an ague, proposed and pressed the giving her the jesuit's bark; but, though this was warmly opposed by Dr. Shadwell, yet the physician, who watched that night, gave it, saying, he found the pulse calm. No exacerbation appeared after this: but nevertheless Dr. Shadwell still declared, he did not like the pulse: that there was no perfect intermission of the fever; but that the pulse was at work, to separate the morbid matter into the gout, or some worse shape. The pains of the thigh increasing, till three or four doses of the bark were given, Dr. Shadwell laid a stress upon having that part examined; but the other physicians called it a fit of the gout. Dr. Shadwell answered, it could not properly be called so in the muscles; and being of opinion, that this was an inflammatory fever from the translation of the gout, and not a common ague, or intermitting fever; and finding, that, after thirty-nine hours continuance, there was a perfect remission, but no intermission, he made a prognostic, that, unless the febrile matter were separated, and thrown off into a smart fit of the gout, a worse symptom might happen; as its falling into the thigh, and fixing into an erysipelous tumour. This opinion was justified by a severe fit of the gout, that came upon her majesty a few days after, and gave some hopes of her intire recovery.

"While the queen was in this uncertain state of health, the minds of the several parties were variously agitated. The friends of the Pretender believed, that all things were preparing for his restoration; and, on the other hand, the alarm of the well affected to the Hanover Succession was not a little increased upon the news, that a squadron of 14 men of war was fitting out in the ports of France; and that they were to take on board 12 or 14,000 land-men. The public funds fell gradually in the beginning till the end of January ; on such a panic seized on a sudden the nied men, that there was a great run upon bank for some days. The directors sent r of their members to the Lord Treasurer, to resent the dangers, which threatened the sic credit, and to desire his advice and as- sance. The Treasurer received this appli- cation very favourably ; endeavoured to dispel ir fears ; and promised to use his utmost en- vours to support the bank in this exigency. e doubts, which were still entertained about queen's health, being one of the chief occa- sions of the public alarm, she, by the advice of ministers, wrote the following Letter to air nuel Stanier, lord mayor of London :

' ANNE, R.

' Right trusty and well-beloved, we greet ou well. Although an aguish indisposition, sceeded by a fit of the gout, has detained us t this place longer than we designed ; yet nce it has pleased Almighty God to re- tore us to such a degree of health, that we pe to be able soon to return to our usual esidence, we continue determined to open ur parliament on Tuesday the 16th of this nstant February, according to the notice given y proclamation. Thus much we have judg- d proper to communicate to you, and by you o the court of aldermen, and to our loving bjects of our good city of London, to the ntent that you may all, in your several sta- tions, contribute to discountenance and put a top to those malicious rumours, spread by vil-minded persons, to the prejudice of redit, and to the imminent hazard of the ublic peace and tranquillity. And so we bid ou farewell. Given at our castle at Windsor, he 1st day of February, 1713, in the 13th ear of our reign.—By her majesty's com- mand,—ВОЛИГВРОКК.

" This Letter, and the news, which at the me time came from Holland, that the troops, hich had been reported to be assembled in e Bolognese, were mere chimeras, and that e Pretender continued in Lorraine, dispelled e fears of the generality, and soon put a stop he run upon the bank.*"

* " While the nation was in this ferment, id under various apprehensions, there was ublished a remarkable pamphlet, intitled, he Art of Restoring ; or the piety and pro- ty of general Monk, in bringing about the Restoration, evinced from his own au- entic letters : with a just account of sir oger, who runs the parallel as far as he can : a letter to a minister of state at the court of ienna.' This piece was levelled against the reasurer, and contributed the more to render n obnoxious to the friends of the Protestant accession, when it was known to be the per- mance of Mr. Toland, a person formerly in- uested and employed by that minister. To re- ove these suspicions, the Treasurer thought fit ave the reputed author of the late Treatise,

The queen, upon her recovery, being inform- ed of the death of Dr. Sharp, archbishop of York, named sir William Dawes to that me- tropolitan see, which had been strongly solici- ted by bishop Atterbury. At the same time, Dr. Smallridge was made bishop of Bristol, and lord almoner to the queen, and Dr. Gastrell, preacher at Lincoln's Inn, bishop of Chester, in the room of sir William Dawes.

The controversy concerning the demolition of Dunkirk, the continuance of the War against the Catalans, who had rejected the terms procured for them by the Treaty between Great Britain and Spain, the surrender of Fribourg to the French, and the opening of a negotiation for a Peace between the emperor and France, at Radstadt ; were the most remarkable occurrences abroad during the Recess.

FIRST SESSION OF THE FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF GREAT-BRITAIN.

Meeting of the New Parliament.] Feb. 16, 1714. This day, the New-Parliament met at Westminster, and the Commons, at the desire of the Lords Commissioners appointed by her majesty, attending their lordships in the House of Lords, the Lord High Chancellor signified to them her majesty's pleasure, That they should forthwith proceed to the Choice of a fit person to be their Speaker, and present him the Thurs- day following.

asserting hereditary right, brought to his trial ; and Bedford being found guilty of publishing that book, he was sentenced, ' to pay a fine of 1,000 marks ; to be committed to the Queen's-Bench prison, till he paid the same : to remain in custody there for the term of three years ; to find four sufficient sureties, who, with him, were to be bound in a recognizance of 5,000*l.* for his good behaviour during life.' He was also to be brought into all the courts of Westminster-hall, with a paper on his head denoting his offence. But, after sentence was passed, an order was produced from the government, counter-signed by a secretary of state, directing the judges of the Queen's-bench to supersede the ignominious part of the punish- ment, by reason of the sacred function of the criminal ; which proceeding, as Mr. Lechmere observed in a speech, ' could bear no other construction, than as a license and protection to men in holy orders, to propagate that destruc- tive position with impunity ; and the character of the person, which ought in justice to have aggravated his guilt, and heightened his punishment, became his indemnity against the reproach of it, even by the authority of the government itself, against which that treatise was levelled. This indulgence appeared the more glaring, considering what severities were, at the same time, exercised against those per- sons, who had courage enough to assert the interest of their country, and of the Protestant Succession.'"

 Sir THOMAS HANMER, Speaker.

Sir Thomas Hanmer chosen Speaker.] The Commons being returned to their House,

Sir Arthur Kay acquainted them, "That her majesty had directed them to proceed to the choice of a Speaker: that he conceived a person fitted for that high trust must be one of great temper, who would hear with candour, what every gentleman had to offer for the service of her majesty and the public: that he ought to be a person unquestionably true to the interest of the church of England; upon which the safety of the state depends: and, as he took this opportunity to express his satisfaction in the choice of the last Speaker, who would ever be an honour to those who chose him, and whose conduct ought to convince the world, that nothing can more effectually make this kingdom safe, than the same principles; so, to succeed that honourable gentleman, he took leave to propose another of the like character, whose sincere adherence to our constitutions, whose affection to the house of Hanover, whose conduct, integrity, and ability, were so well known, that he needed only take leave to propose him: And he named sir Thomas Hanmer *."

After which the Lord Scudamore said, "That he could add nothing to that gentleman's character; and therefore should only second the motion." Mr. Thomson and Mr. Onslow agreed in the same motion.

Mr. Richard Steele took upon him to say he had the same honourable sentiments of that gentleman, in the following words, "At the close of the last parliament, her majesty was graciously pleased to declare from the throne, that the late rejected Bill of Commerce between Great Britain and France, should be offered to this House. That declaration was certainly made, that every gentleman who should have the honour to be returned hither, might make himself master of that important ques-

* "Sir Thomas Hanmer, a statesman, born 1676, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ Church, Oxford. He was for 30 years member of parliament as representative of either Suffolk, Flintshire or Thetford, and in 1713 he was chosen Speaker, an office which he adorned by dignity of deportment, commanding eloquence, and great impartiality. He retired from public life, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. He published an edition of Shakespeare, in an elegant and magnificent stile, which he presented to the university of Oxford, in 6 vols. 4to. He died at his seat, Suffolk, 5th April, 1746."

ion. It is demonstration that was a most pernicious bill, and no man can have a greater merit to this House than his, by whose weight and authority that pernicious bill was thrown out. I rise up to do him honour * in some measure, and distinguish myself, by saying, I wish him our Speaker, for that his inestimable service to his country."

Sir Thomas Hanmer then stood up in his place; and acknowledged the obligation he had to those gentlemen who had thought him worthy to be mentioned upon that occasion; but said, "He was sure there were many others present, with whom he had had the honour to sit in former parliaments, who could witness for him, how unequal he was to such an undertaking. That it was true, he had been a member of the House long enough to have qualified himself better for the service of it; but the experience he had got served only to deter him, by making him sensible of the great difficulties which attended the chair, without giving him improvements sufficient for it. That he had always found the duty of a private member to be nice and difficult enough; but the mistakes of a single person could be of little consequence to the public; whereas, in the service of the chair, it was necessary to bring proportionable abilities, as well as honest intentions; otherwise the business, both of the queen and kingdom, would suffer by it. That it would be a great concern to him to be the occasion of any impediment or prejudice to the public affairs by those imperfections which it would not be in his power to help; and therefore he desired the House would think of calling some other gentleman to the chair, of better abilities, to answer the expectations which they ought justly to have from him whom they should appoint to serve them in that station."

But the House unanimously called upon him, To the Chair: Whereupon, sir Arthur Kay and the lord Scudamore, took him out of his place, and led him up the House from the bar to the Chair: Where, upon the steps, he said, It was not yet too late for gentlemen to alter their re-

"Whatever reception this speech met with in that honourable assembly, it is certain that a set of men, who for some years past, have made it their business to turn the best men and things into jest and ridicule, endeavoured to expose it, without foolishly carping at Mr. Steele's expression of 'Rising up to do sir Thomas Hanmer honour.' But, to all men of sense and learning, they only exposed their own ignorance, both of the beauties of the English tongue, and of true Latin; 'To rise up to do one honour,' being an elegant allusion to 'Assurgere alicui,' a common expression among the old Romans, signifying the same thing Mr. Steele meant in English." Political State.

solution; and begged leave to repeat his just excuses, and to assure them, that no one ever came so near the chair who was so little qualified to do the duty of it; and therefore he hoped they would consult their own honour and service, by turning their thoughts to a better choice. But the House cried, No, no. Whereupon he took the chair, and said, Though the House would not allow of his excuse, he hoped they would be pleased to permit him to intercede with her majesty to command them to proceed to another election. The members cried, No, no. And then the mace was laid upon the table. After which

Mr. Secretary Bromley said, "He congratulated the House and the public, for the good choice they had made of one who brought with him abilities, not only to fill, but to adorn, the chair. That he understood it was her majesty's pleasure, the House should present their Speaker on Thursday; and therefore moved to adjourn till that day."

The Speaker's Speech on being presented, and approved of.] Feb. 18. The Lords Commissioners being seated on a form placed between the throne and the woosack; the Lord Chancellor commanded the Usher of the Black Rod to go to the House of Commons, and desire their attendance in the House of Peers. Who being come;

"My Lords; The knights, citizens, and burghesses, of Great Britain, assembled in parliament, by virtue of her majesty's writ, and directed, by her royal command, to proceed to the choice of a Speaker, have cast their first hasty nomination upon one the most unworthy of their number; commanding me to present myself to her majesty, as the person they have hitherto thought of calling to that service.—It is an honour, and a duty, which no good subject ought to decline, who could hope so to acquit himself in that station as to be instrumental to the public service, and to the great ends of her majesty's government: But the trust is so important, and the task so difficult, that none should presume to undertake it, without abilities sufficient for the due discharge of it.—The many imperfections I am conscious of in myself make me justly apprehend the great prejudice which the business of parliament would receive from my weak performances, in a station upon which the good dispatch of it does very much depend: and therefore, from this unadvised step of the House of Commons (which I hope is the only one they will be guilty of), I must make my humble appeal to the throne, the last resort of justice; where the errors of all inferior judgments are reversed: And I desire, with all duty, to offer my petition to her majesty, That, for her own service and satisfaction, for the better success of those arduous and urgent affairs which have induced her to call this parliament, and for the honour of the House of Commons, she will be pleased to order them to re-consider this their resolution, and to come again, prepared to present some other person to her majesty more worthy of their choice, and of her royal acceptance and approbation." Whereupon

The Lord Chancellor said:

"Sir Thomas Hanmer, The queen could expect no less from an House of Commons composed of so many dutiful and affectionate subjects, whose interest in their country is an unquestionable pledge of their true concern for it, than the choice of a person for their Speaker equally qualified for that important trust, by a just regard for her prerogative, and an hearty zeal for the welfare of her people. She commands us, sir, to tell you, That on both these accounts their choice of you to be their Speaker is acceptable to her; and, therefore, that she approves and confirms it."—After which

The Speaker replied:

"My Lords; Whatever other feelings belong to me, there shall be no defect in my obedience to her majesty; and since she is graciously pleased to think me worthy of these commands, it is my duty to endeavour to make myself as little unworthy of them as I can.—The sincerity of my intentions, and my zeal for her majesty's and the public service, will be sure to guard me from all wilful errors: And as I rely upon her majesty's great goodness for the pardoning my involuntary mistakes; so I will comfort myself yet further with this hope, that the wants and imperfections of one of the meanest of her subjects can never be of moment enough to interrupt the signal prosperity of her reign, or do any considerable prejudice to the public affairs, whilst her great wisdom presides and watches over them.—Under these encouragements, I will with all diligence, and according to the best of my abilities, apply myself to the discharge of this great trust; and I shall account myself happy, if, in so public a post, I may be able to give any more open and apparent proofs of that loyalty and fidelity to her majesty's person and government, and that love and value for the constitution and liberties of this kingdom, which in my private station, as a subject and an Englishman, I have always proposed to myself as the rule of my actions.—In pursuance therefore of my duty, and as the first act of that trust which I am commanded to undertake, I beg leave, by way of humble petition to her majesty, in the name of the Commons of Great Britain, to lay claim to all their ancient and accustomed rights, privileges, and immunities; particularly, That, for their better attendance upon the public service, they, and their necessary servants, may be free, in their persons and estates, from all arrests, suits, and molestations: That they may be allowed freedom of speech in their debates; That, upon all occurrences of moment, and at times convenient to her majesty, she will be pleased to vouchsafe them access to her royal person: And that all their proceedings may be free from misconstruction, and receive the most favourable interpretation." Then

The Lord Chancellor said;

"Mr. Speaker, We are commanded by her majesty to assure you of her support in the discharge of your duty; and to let you know, That her majesty is graciously pleased to grant to the House of Commons all the privileges you ask in their name, as fully as they have been at any time granted by her majesty, or any of her royal predecessors."

After this, both Houses adjourned to the 1st of March.

Peace with Spain proclaimed.] During the adjournment, were brought over from Holland the Ratifications exchanged of the Treaty of Commerce between Great-Britain and Spain; and the Peace was proclaimed on the 1st of March. The chief Articles were, France and Spain were never to be united: the Protestant Succession acknowledged, and never to be opposed on any pretence: navigation and commerce, as in the Treaty of 1667: no licence to be given to the French or other nations to introduce negroes, or any merchandises, into the Spanish dominions in America, except what might be agreed by the Treaty of Commerce, and the privileges granted in the Asiento de Negros; except also what should be granted by the Catholic kings after the Asiento de Negros should be determined: the American dominions were not to be alienated from the crown of Spain, to the French or other nation: Gibraltar and the island of Minorca were given up for ever to England: no Moors to come there, but on account of traffic: all the Spanish inhabitants to enjoy their estates and religion; or to sell their estates and retire: the South-Sea company to have the privilege, exclusive of others, to introduce negroes into several parts of America for 30 years, beginning from 1713, in the same manner as enjoyed by the French; the Catalans to have a full pardon, with the possession of all their privileges, estates, and honours, and likewise the same privileges with the inhabitants of both Castles; Sicily was yielded to the duke of Savoy, but to return to Spain, in case of no heirs. By two separate Articles, the queen promised to persist in the measures, by which she had taken care, that no other part of the Spanish monarchy should be torn from it: and obliged herself to procure the princess Ursini to be put into possession of Limburg, or some other country in the Netherlands, which should produce 30,000 crowns a year, pursuant to a grant from king Philip, September 28, 1711.

The Queen's Speech on opening the Session.] The queen went in a chair to the House of Lords, and made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have much satisfaction in being able, at the opening of the parliament, to tell you, that the Ratifications of the Treaties of Peace and of Commerce with Spain are exchanged, by which my subjects will have greater opportunities than ever to improve and extend their trade. Many advantages, formerly enjoyed by contrivance, and procured by such methods made a distinction between one British merit and another, are now settled by Treaty, in an equal rule is established.—It has pleased me to bless my endeavours to obtain an honourable and advantageous Peace for my own people, and for the greatest part of my allies. Nothing, which I can do, shall be wanting to render it universal; and I persuade myself, that, with your hearty concurrence, my intercession may at last prove effectual to compleat the settlement of Europe.

"In the mean while, I congratulate with my own subjects that they are delivered from consuming land-war and entered on a Peace, of good effects whereof nothing but intestine divisions can obstruct.

"It was the glory of the wisest and greatest of my predecessors to hold the balance of Europe, and to keep it equal, by casting in their weight as necessity required. By this conduct they enriched the kingdom, and rendered themselves dreadful to their enemies, and useful to their friends. I have proceeded on the same principle, and I doubt not but my successors will follow these examples.

"Our situation points out to us our true interest; for this country can flourish only by trade, and will be most formidable by the right application of our naval force.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I have ordered such Accounts to be prepared and laid before you, as will shew you, at the conclusion of the War, the true state of your condition, whereby you will be better able to judge what aids are necessary: and I only ask of you supplies for the current service of the year, and for the discharge of such debts as you shall find, on examination, to be just and reasonable.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The joy, which has been generally expressed in my recovery from my late indisposition, and on my coming to this city, I esteem as a return to that tender affection which I have always had for my people.—I wish that effectual care had been taken, as I have often desired, to suppress those Seditious Papers and malicious rumours, by which designing men have been able to sink credit, and the innocent have suffered.—There are some, who are arrived to that height of malice, as to insinuate that the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover is in danger under my government.—Those who go about thus to distract the minds of men with imaginary dangers, can only mean to disturb the present tranquillity, and bring real mischief upon us.—After all I have done to secure our religion and your liberties, and to transmit both safe to posterity, I cannot mention these proceedings without some degree of warmth; and I must hope you will all agree with me, that attempts to weaken my authority or to render the possession of the crown uneasy to me, can never be proper means to strengthen the Protestant Succession.—I have done, and shall continue to do my best for the good of all my subjects. Let it be your endeavour, as it shall be mine, to unite our differences, not by relaxing from the strictest adherence to our constitution in Church and State, but by observing the laws yourselves, and enforcing a due obedience to them in others.—A long war has not only impoverished the public (however some particular men have been gainers by it) but has also greatly affected government itself.—Let it be your care so to improve the present opportunity, as to lay the foundation of recovering from those disorders.—I had the concurrence of the last parliament in making the Peace. Let it be the honour of this to assist me in obtaining such fruits from it, as may not only derive blessings on the present age, but even down to the latest posterity."

The Lords' Address thereon.] The Lords agreed upon the following Address:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, beg leave to approach your royal person with the greatest respect, to return the humble thanks of this House to your majesty, for your most gracious Speech from the throne.—We cheerfully embrace this opportunity of assuring your majesty, that the joy our hearts are filled with, upon your recovery from your late indisposition, cannot sufficiently be expressed; and that our fervent prayers to Almighty God shall never be wanting, that your majesty's reign may exceed in number of years, and in all manner of happiness, that of the longest and most prosperous of any of your royal predecessors, as that which will best conduce to the happiness and satisfaction of the most dutiful subjects to the best of queens.—It is with the greatest pleasure, and the utmost gratitude, that this House receives the communication your majesty is pleased to give them, that the ratifications of your Treaties of Peace and Commerce with Spain are exchanged; and that we are, by your majesty's great wisdom and goodness, at last delivered from that consuming land war, the burthens and ill consequences whereof, we are sensible, nothing can remove or prevent, but a right improvement of the present opportunity; and it shall be our endeavour, as we are satisfied it will be your majesty's, to unite our differences, not by relaxing from the strictest adherence to our constitution in church and state, but by observing the laws ourselves, and, to the utmost of our power, enforcing a due obedience to them in others.—And we do assure your majesty, that this House will most heartily concur with your majesty in all proper methods to compleat the settlement of Europe; and we will use our utmost endeavours to discourage and discountenance all attempts to weaken your majesty's authority, or to render the possession of the crown uneasy to you.—We acknowledge, with hearts full of duty and thankfulness, that great care which your majesty has taken, during the whole course of your reign, to secure our religion and liberties, and to transmit both safe to posterity.—It is with the utmost detestation, that we reflect on the proceedings of those men, who, by spreading seditious papers and factious rumours, have been able to sink credit, and thereby to involve the innocent in the ill consequences of their iniquity; and more particularly of those who have attained to that height of malice, as to insinuate that the Protestant Succession in the house of Hanover is in danger under your government."

"My lords; I return you my most hearty thanks, for your very affectionate Address.—You, who are nearest to the throne, will first of all my subjects feel the evil consequences of any diminution of the regal dignity.—It is a great comfort to me, that I have your assurance of support.—Depend upon it, I will never give way to the least attempt, either on the just authority of the crown, or on your rights and privileges."

The Commons' Address.] The Commons being returned to their House, Mr. Gore moved, That an humble Address be presented her majesty, for her gracious Speech; which was resolved accordingly, without any opposition. Sir Peter King only suggested, "That they ought not to act by a spirit of divination, and return thanks for the treaty of commerce with Spain, before they knew, whether the same was advantageous or no." Which occasioned some modification in the Address, which was as follows:

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, do with all humility, return our sincere and hearty thanks for your majesty's most gracious Speech from the throne.—We beg leave to assure your majesty, that as nothing could be more afflicting to your people, than the indisposition of the best of sovereigns, so nothing has ever been an occasion of greater joy and satisfaction to them than your majesty's late happy recovery.—We congratulate your majesty on the conclusion of the Treaties of Peace and Commerce with Spain, whereby your majesty is pleased to declare, that you have procured new benefits to your subjects; But your royal care hath not been confined to your own people; it hath been extended to all your allies: And your majesty's goodness must be for ever admired, That, notwithstanding any discouragements you may have met with, you are pleased still to continue your endeavours to make the Peace universal, and thereby to complete the settlement of Europe: And your faithful Commons will never be wanting in an hearty concurrence to assist your majesty in all such measures as your majesty shall judge proper to finish a design, so great and so glorious.—Your Commons will, with all cheerfulness, grant such supplies as are necessary for the current service, and for the discharge of such debts as are just and reasonable: They can never sufficiently express the sense they bear of their happiness, in being delivered from the calamities of a consuming war: They are therefore, in duty to your majesty, and in justice to those they represent, do all that is in their power, that the good effects of Peace may not be obstructed by any intestine divisions: They will, as far as in them lies, disappoint the designs of malicious and unreasonable men: They will, on all occasions, shew their just abhorrence of the licentious practices, in publishing scandalous papers, and spreading seditious rumours: And, as your Commons will always support and maintain the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover, they cannot but be astonished at the malicious insinuations of any, who would suggest that Succession to be in danger under your majesty's most auspicious government: For when we consider, that it is secured by the greatest obligations, civil and sacred; by acts of parliament, oaths, and treaties; we cannot but declare our entire acquiescence in these securities; and most loath upon such insinuations to be grounded on themselves, and affronting to your majesty, and your government:—And your majesty may depend, that your loyal Commons will never be prevailed on by any pretences whatsoever to countenance attempts that may tend to weaken your majesty's authority, and to render the possession of the crown uneasy to you; which can only proceed from the rage of a disappointed faction, and the spirit of rebellion."

"Gentlemen; This Address is so dutiful, and expresses so fully the sense of my loyal subjects, that I esteem it a proof of the good choice they have made of you to represent them.—I give you my hearty thanks for it. The confidence you have in my affection, the abhorrence you declare of the malicious insinuations of the Protestant Succession being in danger under my government, and your acquiescence in the present securities for it, are very suitable returns for the tender regard I have always had for what concerns my people; and will most effectually, by the blessing of God, unite the minds of my subjects, and disappoint the designs of those who would disturb the present tranquillity."

*Complaint in the House of Lords against a Libel* written by Dr. Swift, called, "The*

* "This Libel was written in the ludicrous and sarcastic strains of "The Tale of a Tub." After some scurrilous reflections on Mr. Steele, and occasionally on the earl of Nottingham, with some jests on the implicit munificence of the subscribers to the Crisis: the Author attacks the Union, reflects on the whole Scots nation, and, without reserve, insults the duke of Argyle, who of late had broken all measure with the ministry. This piece was generally looked upon as very impolitic and ill-timed; since the sixteen Scots peers, who sat in the blic Spirit of the Whigs."] March 2. The 1 of Wharton made a Complaint in the use of Lords against a Scandalous Libel, ended, "The Public Spirit of the Whigs," set it in their "generous encouragement of the Author of the Crisis, with some Observations on the Seasonableness, Candor, Erudition and Stile of that Treatise. Printed by John Morphew, near Stationers-Hall, 714." In which the Passage that gave offence to the Lords, is as follows :

"This work, (meaning the Union of the two Kingdoms) he tells us, was unsuccessfully attempted by several of her majesty's predecessors; though I do not remember it was ever thought on by any, except king James 1, and late king William. I have read, indeed, that some small overtures were made by the former these princes towards an Union between the two Kingdoms, but rejected with indignation and contempt by the English. And the Historian tells us, that how degenerate and corrupt ever the court and parliament then were, they would not give ear to so infamous a proposal. I do not find that any of the succeeding princes, before the Revolution, ever remembered the design; because it was a project for which there could not possibly be assigned the least reason or necessity: for I defy any mortal name one single advantage that England could ever obtain from such an Union. But towards the end of the late king's reign, upon apprehension of the want of issue from him, the princess Anne, a proposition for uniting the two Kingdoms was begun, because Scotland did not settle their crown upon the House of Anover, but left themselves at large, in hopes to make their advantage: and it was thought highly dangerous to leave that part of the Kingdom, inhabited by a poor, fierce, northern people, at liberty to put themselves under a fierce king. However, the opposition to this work was so great, that it could not be overcome till some time after her present Majesty came to the crown; when, by the weakness or corruption of a certain minister, since had, an act of parliament was obtained for the Scots, which gave them leave to arm themselves, and so the Union became necessary; not for any actual good it could possibly do us, but to avoid a probable evil; and at the same time, save an obnoxious minister's head, who was so wise, as to take the first opportunity of procuring a general pardon by act of parliament, because he could not with so much decency or safety desire a particular one for himself. These facts are well enough known to the whole kingdom; and I remember, discoursing above six years ago with the most considerable person of the adverse party, and a great promoter of the Union, he frankly owned to me, that this necessity brought upon us by the wrong management of the earl of Godolphin, was the only cause of the Union.

House of Lords, and who (at least there) were the principal support of those at the helm, were involved in the general reflections on the Scots nation." Tindal.

"On the first publication of this pamphlet, all the Scots Lords then in London went in a body, and complained to the queen of the affront put on them and their nation by the Author of this Treatise." Orrery.

"Therefore I am ready to grant two points to the Author of the Crisis: 1st, That the Union became necessary for the cause above related; because it prevented the island from being governed by two kings, which England would never have suffered; and it might probably have cost us a war of a year or two to reduce the Scots. 2dly, That it would be dangerous to break this Union, at least in this juncture, while there is a Pretender abroad, who might probably lay hold of such an opportunity. And this made me wonder a little at the spirit of faction last summer among some people, who having been the great promoters of the Union, and several of them the principal gainers by it, could yet proceed so far, as to propose in the House of Lords, that it should be dissolved; while at the same time, those peers who had ever opposed it in the beginning, were then for preserving it, upon the reason I have just assigned, and which the Author of the Crisis hath likewise taken notice of.

"But when he tells us, the Englishman ought, in generosity, to be more particularly careful in preserving this Union, he argues like himself. The late kingdom of Scotland, (saith he) had as numerous a nobility as England, &c. They had, indeed, and to that we owe one of the great and necessary evils of the Union upon the foot it now stands. Their nobility is indeed so numerous, that the whole revenues of their country would be hardly able to maintain them according to the dignity of their titles; and what is infinitely worse, they are never likely to be extinct, till the last period of all things, because the greatest part of them descend to heirs general. I imagine, a person of quality prevailed on to marry a woman much his inferior, and without a great to her fortune, and her friends arguing, she was as good as her husband, because she brought him as numerous a family of relations and servants, as she found in his house. Scotland in the taxes is obliged to contribute one penny for every forty pence laid upon England; and the representatives they send to parliament are about a thirteenth: every Scottish peer has all the privileges of an English one, except that of sitting in parliament, and even precedence before all of the same title that shall be created for the time to come. The pensions and employment possessed by the natives of that country now among us, do amount to more than the whole body of their nobility ever spent at home; and all the money they raise upon the public is hardly sufficient to defray their civil and military lists. I could point out some with great titles, who affect to appear very vigorous for dissolving the Union, though their whole revenues, before that period, would have all maintained a Welsh justice of the peace; and have since gathered more money than ever any Scotsman, who had not travelled, could form an idea of."

The Publisher and Mr. Barber ordered into Custody.] This Complaint being warmly espoused by the majority of the House of Peers, the Lord Treasurer protested he knew nothing of that pamphlet; exclaimed against the malicious insinuations contained in it; and readily joined with the House in an order for committing John Morphew, the Publisher, to the custody of the Black-Rod. Mr. Morphew upon this Examination, having declared, that an unknown porter had brought to his House the copies of the pamphlet in question; from the House of John Barber, Printer of the Gazette, and of the Votes of the House of Commons; the said John Barber was also ordered into the custody of the Black-Rod; and both he and Morphew, were, on Friday, the 5th of March, severally examined at the bar of the Lords' House. Mr. Morphew made the former declaration, and owned the publishing and selling of that Libel, but Mr. Barber said, he knew nothing of it; and insisted not to answer any questions, the answer to which might tend to accuse himself, or to corroborate the accusation against him.

They being withdrawn, the earl of Wharton said, "They had nothing to do either with the Publisher or Printer, but that it highly concerned the Honour of that august assembly to find out the villain, who was the Author of the false and scandalous libel, in order to do the Scottish nation justice;" and thereupon moved, That in order to that discovery, Barber might be again examined the next day, together with his journey-men and servants: the same was readily agreed to; but on the 6th of March, the earl of Marr, one of the secretaries of State, acquainted the House, That he had already ordered John Barber to be prosecuted, which put a sudden stop to all farther enquiries about that matter, in a parliamentary way."

* Lord Treasurer Oxford in a letter to Dr. Swift says, "I have heard that some honest men, who are very innocent, are under trouble, touching a printed pamphlet. A friend of mine, an obscure person, but charitable, puts the enclosed bill in your hands to answer such exigencies as their case may immediately require. And I find he will do more, this being only for the present." This Letter is thus endorsed by Swift: "Lord Treasurer Oxford's letter to me in a counterfeit hand with the bill when the printers were prosecuted by the House of Lords for a pamphlet. Letter with bill of 100*l.* Received March 14, 1713-14."

"Barber the Printer was some time ago, in great distress, upon printing a pamphlet, of which evil tongues would needs call me the author: he was brought before your house, which addressed the queen in a body, who kindly published a proclamation with 300*l.* to disco-

The Lords Address to the Queen there. Three days after, Barber and Morphew were upon their humble petition, enlarged from the custody of the Black-Rod; and the same day the Lords resolved upon an Address to the Queen about that matter; which was on the 15th presented as follows:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, a parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to represent to your majesty, that we have begun our endeavours to suppress seditious papers (which your majesty was pleased to take notice of in your most gracious Speech from the throne) by applying ourselves to discover the Author, Printer, and Publisher of a pamphlet entitled, 'The Public Spirit of the Whigs, &c.' forth in their generous encouragement of the author of the Crisis, with some observations on the seasonableness, candour, erudition, and style of that treatise. London, printed by John Morphew near Stationer's-Hall, 1711' Which we conceive to be a false, malicious and factious libel, highly dishonourable and scandalous to your subjects of Scotland, tending to the destruction of the constitution, and to making false and unjust reflections upon the Union, and the steps and motives to it; injurious to your majesty, who have been pleased often to declare from the throne, that the Union of the two kingdoms is the greatest happiness of your reign, in making a full provision for the peace and quiet of your people and the security of our religion, by so firm an establishment of the Protestant Successors throughout Great-Britain: it appeared to us in the confession of the said John Morphew at our bar, that he published, sold, and dispersed that libel; and, by the examination of several witnesses on oath, that the same was printed by John Barber, a Printer, who, at the time of the printing the said seditious libel, was, and yet is, entrusted with printing the Gazette: in the said John Barber, in his examination, insisting not to answer any questions, the answer to which might tend to accuse himself, or to corroborate the accusation against him, we have not as yet been able to discover the Author of the said libel, or who brought the written copy thereof to be printed. And therefore, that nothing may be wanting on our parts towards the discovering and punishing so great a criminal, as we take the Author of the said libel to be, we do most humbly beseech your majesty, that your majesty will be graciously pleased to issue your royal proclamation, with a promise therein of such a reward as your majesty shall, in your royal wisdom, think fit to any person who shall discover and make the proof against the Author or Authors of the said libel; as also your majesty's most gracious pardon to such person or persons as shall make such discovery, of all crimes and misdemeanors committed in relation to the printing, publishing, and dispersing the said libel."

The Queen's Answer.] To this Address the Queen returned this Answer:

"My Lords; I thank you for the concern you shew for suppressing all seditious Libels. And have given orders for a Proclamation according as desired."

Proclamation to discover the Author.] Accordingly, the same day, the Queen ordered a Proclamation to be published, containing the suggestions of the Lords' Address, and promising a reward of 300*l.* for discovering the author of the Libel. Which sum the Lord Treasurer was thereby directed to pay.*

Resolutions respecting the Qualifications of Members.] March 6. The Commons in a grand committee, considered the act of the 9th of her majesty's reign, intitled, 'An Act for securing the Freedom of Parliaments, by the farther qualifying the Members to sit in the House of Commons;' and came to the following Resolutions. 1. "That notwithstanding the Oath taken by any candidate, on or after any election, his Qualification may be afterwards examined into. 2. That the person whose qualification is expressly objected to in any petition, relating to his election, shall, within fifteen days after the petition read, give to the clerk of the House of Commons, a paper signed by himself, containing a rental or particular of the lands, tenements or hereditaments, whereby he makes out his qualification: if which any person concerned may have a copy. 3. That of such lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereof the party hath been in possession for three years before the election, he shall also insert in the same paper, from what person, and by what conveyance, or act in law, he claims and derives the same; and also the consideration, if any, paid, and the names and places of abode of the witnesses to such conveyance and payment. 4. That, if a sitting member shall think fit to question the qualification of a petitioner, he shall, within fifteen days after the petition read, leave notice thereof in writing with the clerk of the House of Commons; and the petitioner shall, in such case, within fifteen days after such notice, leave with the said clerk of the House the like account in writing of his qualification, as is required from a sitting member."

PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AGAINST MR. RICHARD STEELE.

Complaint against Mr. Steele.] Notwithstanding all the care and industry used by the court managers in the late Elections, many professed enemies of the present ministers were chosen. But, of these, none were so obnoxious to the men in power as Mr. Steele, who in several public writings, had arraigned the late measures with great boldness, as one, who was encouraged, and sure to be supported, by the whole Whig party. It was therefore agreed by the ministers (how much soever they differed in other matters) to exert their endeavours to remove him from his seat in parliament. A Petition, which was lodged against his election, happening to be the 17th of that kind, and therefore not like to come on this session, it was resolved to take a shorter way, and attack him about some of his late political writings. Mr. Hungerford, a noted lawyer, who had been expelled the House of Commons for bribery in the reign of king William, moved, on the 11th of March, to take into consideration that part of the queen's Speech, which related to the suppressing Seditious Libels; and complained, in particular, of several scandalous papers lately published under the name of Richard Steele, esq. a member of that house. He was seconded by Mr. Auditor Foley, a near relation to the Lord Treasurer, who suggested, "That unless means were found to restrain the licentiousness of the Press, and to shelter those, who had the honour to be in the administration, from malicious and scandalous libels; they, who by their abilities are best qualified to serve their queen and country, would decline public offices and employments." This was supported by sir William Wyndham, who added, "That some of Mr. Steele's writings contained insolent injurious reflections on the queen herself and were dictated by the spirit of rebellion." The next day, Auditor Harley (the Lord Treasurer's brother) made a formal complaint to the House against certain paragraphs of the three printed pamphlets, which had given most offence to the court; 'The Englishman,' of January 19; the Crisis; and the last Englishman,' all said to be written by Richard Steele;

† "Dear Prue; I send this to let you know that lord Halifax would not let me go to the House, but thought it would be better to have the first attack made in my absence. Mr. Foley was the gentleman who did me that honour; but they could not bring it to bear as far as to obtain an order for my attending in my place, or any thing else to my disadvantage; than that all pamphlets are to come on Saturday. Lord Halifax, in the House of Lords told the ministry, that he believed, if they would recommend the Crisis to her majesty's perusal, she would think quite otherwise of the book than they do. I think they have been very unhappy and ungracefully against me; and doubt not but God will turn their malice to the advantage of the innocent." Steele to his Wife, March 11, 1713-14. see; which pamphlets being brought up to the table, it was ordered, That Mr. Steele should attend in his place the next morning.

This brought a great concourse of members and spectators to the house; and, Mr. Steele attending, several paragraphs, contained in the pamphlets complained of, were read: after which, Mr. Foley, Mr. Harley, and some other members, severely animadverted upon the rancour and seditious spirit conspicuous in those writings. Mr. James Craggs, jun. standing up to speak in Mr. Steele's behalf, he was prevented by a confused noise of several voices calling to order; intimating, that, according to the order of the day, Mr. Steele was to be heard himself in his place. Upon this, Mr. Steele said, 'That, being attacked on several heads without any previous notice, he hoped the House would allow him, at least, a week's time to prepare for his Defence.' Auditor Harley having excepted against so long a delay, and moved for adjourning this affair to the Monday following, Mr. Steele, to ridicule his two principal prosecutors, Foley and Harley, who were known to be rigid Presbyterians, though they now sided with the High Church, assumed their sanctified countenance, and owned, 'in the weakness and contrition of his heart, that he was a very great sinner; and hoped, the member, who spoke last, and who was so justly renowned for his exemplary piety and devotion, would not be necessary to the accumulating the number of his transgressions, by obliging him to break the sabbath of the Lord, by perusing such profane writings, as might serve for his justification.' This speech, spoken in a canting tone, having put the generality of the assembly in good humour, Mr. Steele carried his point; and the further consideration of the charge against him was deferred for a week, by which time it was expected, that sir Richard Onslow, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Lechmere, and some other leading members of the Whig party, who were absent, would be come to town.

Mr. Steele's Motion relative to Dunkirk rejected.] March 15. This success encouraged Mr. Steele; not only to stand upon the defensive, but even to attack his accusers. As he believed a great part of the ill-will, he had brought upon himself, was owing to what he wrote about Dunkirk, he thought it would make for his defence, to have what passed, relating to the collusive demolition, appear to the House before his day came on. He therefore moved, on the very Monday proposed by Mr. Harley for his trial, "That an Address be presented to the queen, to give directions, that the several representations of her engineers and officers, who had the care and inspection of the demolition of Dunkirk, and all orders and instructions given thereupon, be laid before the House." But the Motion was rejected by 214 voices, against 109. But the court party did not think fit to oppose another Motion, which, with the same intent, was then made by the lord<sup>1</sup> Lunsley, eldest son to the earl of Scarborough, who being seconded by the earl of Hertford, it was unanimously resolved, "That an Address be presented to her majesty, that she would be pleased to order an Account to be laid before the House, what steps had been made for the removing the Pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorraine, pursuant to the Address of both Houses of the last parliament; and what answers had been given by the duke of Lorraine."

Mr. Steele's Trial in the House of Commons.] On the 18th, the day appointed for Mr. Steele's Trial, the courtiers thought fit to get the House cleared from all strangers; which done, and Mr. Steele appearing in his place, Mr. Auditor Foley moved, that before they proceeded any farther, Mr. Steele should declare, whether he acknowledged the writings that bore his name. Hereupon Mr. Steele owned, 'he wrote and published the said pamphlets, and the several paragraphs there, which had been complained of, and read to the House, with the same cheerfulness and satisfaction, with which he had abjured the Pretender.' Then a debate arising upon the method of proceeding, Mr. Auditor Foley proposed, that Mr. Steele should withdraw; but, after several Speeches, it was carried, without dividing, that he should stay, in order to make his Defence. He desired that he might be allowed to answer to what might be urged against him, paragraph by paragraph: But though he was powerfully supported by Mr. Robert Walpole, general Stanhope, the lord Finch, eldest son to the earl of Nottingham, and the lord Hinchinbroke, son to the earl of Sandwich, yet Mr. Steele's accusers insisted, and it was carried, "That he should proceed to make his Defence, generally, upon the charge given against him." Mr. Steele proceeded accordingly, to make his Defence, being assisted by Mr. Joseph Addison, who sat near him, to prompt him, upon occasion: And, for near three hours, spake to several heads, extracted out of the three pamphlets above-mentioned, (which had been given in print to all the members) with such a temper, modesty, unconcern, easy and manly eloquence, as gave entire satisfaction to all, who were not inveterately prepossessed against him*.

Mr. Robert Walpole's memorable Speech in Defence of Mr. Steele.] Mr. Steele being withdrawn, most members expected, that Mr. Auditor Foley would have summed up, and answered his Defence, paragraph by paragraph; but he contented himself with saying, in general, "That, without amusing the House with long speeches, it was plain, that the Writings that had been complained of, were seditious and scandalous, injurious to her majesty's government, the church, and the universities, and moved that the question should be put thereupon."

This occasioned a very warm debate, that lasted till 11 o'clock at night.

* See his APOLOGE at p. 1275.

Mr. Robert Walpole*, who spoke first in your of Mr. Steele, made a very long, and not eloquent Speech, wherein he went to the bottom of the affair; shewed that this extraordinary and violent prosecution, struck at the vitals of the subject in general, and of the members of that House in particular; justified Mr. Steele on all the heads of the accusation used against him; and said, he hoped this cause would not sacrifice one of their members, the resentment and rage of the ministry, for another crime, than his exposing their notorious mismanagements; and, like a good patriot, raising his countrymen against the imminent dangers, with which the nation in general, and in particular, her majesty's sacred person were threatened, by the visible encouragement that was given to the Pretender's friends. If a Papist, said Mr. Walpole, to that purpose, nay,

* Mr. Coxe's account of Walpole's conduct upon this occasion is as follows:

“Walpole was particularly active in defence of Steele. The rage of party was so violent on this occasion, that an attempt was made to compel Steele to withdraw, without entering into his own Defence, but this unjust proposition was over-ruled without a division. He then entered on his Defence, with a temper, modesty and eloquence quite unusual to him, and continued speaking three hours. After he had withdrawn, no member on the side of the ministry attempted to answer him; and auditor Foley only observed, that without amusing the House with long speeches, it was plain to every body, that the Writings complained of, were seditious and scandalous, and moved the question. This motion occasioned a warm debate, in which Walpole bore the most active and principal share. In this Defence, Walpole asked the House, “Why the author was answerable in parliament for the things which he wrote in his private capacity? And if he is punishable by law, why is he not left to the law? By this mode of proceeding, parliament, which used to be the scourge only of evil ministers, is made by ministers the scourge of the subject. The ministers, he added, are sufficiently armed with authority; they possess the great sanction of rewards and punishments, the disposal of the privy purse, the grace of pardoning, and the power of condemning to the pillory for seditious writings; powers consistent with, and naturally arising from their exalted situation, and which they cannot too jealously guard from being perverted to answer indirect or criminal purposes. In former reigns, the audacity of corruption extended itself only to judges and lawyers; the attempt so to degrade parliament was, till the present period, unheard of. The Liberty of the Press is unrestrained; how then shall a part of the legislature dare to punish that as a crime which is not declared to be so by any law, framed by the whole? And why should that House be made the instrument of such a detestable purpose; that House, which had to boast the honourable distinction of being an Irish Papist, who, for many years, has been a servant to the late king James, and the Pretender, (meaning sir Patrick Lawless), one who has borne arms against her majesty in France and Spain; one who is strongly suspected, of having embued his hands in the blood of the late duke of Medina-Celi, and marquis of Leganes: If, said he, such a man be not only permitted to come into England, but to appear at court, in the presence chamber: If he be caressed by the ministers: nay, I speak it with horror, if such a man be admitted to her majesty's private audience in her closet, will not every good subject think her majesty's person in danger? And is it then a crime in Mr. Steele, to shew his just concern, for so precious a life?—As to that passage in Mr. Steele's Crisis, wherein he says, ‘That a late Traon-able Book, on the Succession of Hereditary applied to, as the source of redress, in all cases of oppression? Steele, he observed, has advanced nothing which bears a direct criminal construction; nothing which can be construed into guilt without the assistance of forced inuendoes; and shall parliament assume the ungracious part of thus inferring guilt from mere arbitrary construction? If they do, what advantage to government or the community can be expected to result from such a measure? Are doctrines refused, and truths suppressed, by being censured or stigmatized?—In the reign of James, it was criminal to say, that the king was a Papist; but the severity of the law, or the cruelty of its ministers, could not eradicate from the mind of a single individual, the confirmed belief of the fact. Steele is only attacked, because he is the advocate for the Protestant Succession; the cause which he so ably defends, gives the offence; through his side the Succession is to be wounded; his punishment will be a symptom, that the Succession is in danger; and the ministry are now feeling the pulse of parliament, to see how far they may be able to proceed. Does Mr. Steele, he inquired, incur any blame for writing against Popery? In the reign of James, indeed, preaching against Popery was considered as casting a reflection on the ministry. But it was not so in the reign of king William. From what fatality does it arise, that what is written in favour of the Protestant Succession, and was countenanced by the late ministry, is deemed a libel on the present administration? General invectives in the pulpit against drinking, fornication, or any particular vice, have never been esteemed a reflection on particular persons, unless these persons are guilty of the darling sin against which the preacher inveighs. It becomes, then, a fair inference, from their irritability and resentment against its defender, that the darling sin of the present administration is to obstruct the Protestant Succession.” Coxe's Walpole, vol. I. p. 72. The part of the Speech here quoted was collected by Mr. Coxe from memorandums in the hand-writing of sir Robert Walpole.

Steele, has published the Will of king Henry 8, which seems to be intended as a pattern for 'the like occasion.' And a little lower, 'Let those who act under the present settlement, and yet pretend to dispute for an absolute Hereditary Right, quiet themselves with the arguments they have borrowed from Popery.' Mr. Walpole said, it could not be denied, "That the Lord Treasurer was the patron of learned men; for whose use and improvement, he had set up a fine library; and that it appeared by the book called, 'The Hereditary Right of the Crown of England asserted,' &c. that the author had free access to that library, and had drawn very material passages out of some manuscripts in it. But that the Lord Treasurer's care, to supply him with materials that work, went yet further, since his lordship had employed a man to look among old musty papers; the Will and Testament of king Henry 8, which the said author had inserted at length in the Appendix to his book: That he appealed to Mr. Lowndes, a member of the House, and Secretary to the Treasury, whether he had not paid, by the Lord Treasurer's order, twelve or fourteen pounds, to the person that had made that great discovery; but that in case he should deny it, he, Mr. Walpole, had evidence to prove it." Mr. Lowndes seemed not to deny the fact. He only said, that Will was not so rare a piece, since it was to be seen in a place he named, in Westminster-Abbey.—On this occasion, Mr. Walpole mentioned three points, in which he endeavoured to prove that the Peace had already been broke! "The first, he said, was the Demolition of Duabirk; which ought to have been finished five months after the signing of the Treaty: But that instead of that, the French had, yet, only pulled down part of the outward fortifications, without touching the foundations; which, on the one hand, rendered the English garrison useless, and exposed to any insults; and, on the other hand, would afterwards make it easy for the French to restore and rebuild those fortifications; which was the more probable to be in their thoughts, since, instead of ruining the harbour, they were actually repairing the sluices, and working on a new canal. That the second point, was the Renunciations of the princes of the house of Bourbon, which were laid down as the foundation and basis of the Peace, and as a pretence, that thereby the crowns of France and Spain, would be more divided than ever: But that supposing, (what he could not by any means grant) that those Renunciations were to be depended upon, they were yet conditional, and supposed the emperor's Renunciation to the crown of Spain: And therefore, as no care had been taken to engage his imperial majesty to agree to that necessary condition, so the Renunciations of the princes of the House of Bourbon, became thereby not binding and void." The third instance which Mr. Walpole gave, of the violation of the Peace, was the French king's Ordinance, dated September 18,

N. S. 1718, 'forbidding the children of French refugees, though born out of his dominions, to come into them, without his permission, upon pain of being sent to the gallees.' To which purpose, Mr. Walpole represented, "that the said Ordinance was against natural right, and the law of nations, and, in particular, derogatory to the rights and liberties of the British nation, which the children of the refugees, born in England, were entitled to enjoy, as well as the other natives. That he would adventure to say, in their behalf, that it were to be wished, that all who have the happiness to be born in England, were as good Englishmen as the sons of the refugees, and that the British nation was the more concerned, in having that Ordinance repealed, in that the refugees, and their children, were the fittest to carry on a trade with France."

Mr. Horatio Walpole backed what his brother Robert said in favour of the French refugees; and "Deplored the lamentable condition of their ministers and the poor amongst them, to whom the Lord Treasurer, had not paid one penny of the 15,000*l.* per ann. voted by parliament, and allowed in the Civil List, toward their assistance and relief, since he came into his office." To that purpose, he added "That some amongst the refugees suffered now more in England than they did during the persecution in France; since there were always some charitable people who relieved them while they were in prisons and dungeons, whereas here they were let starve."

The Lord Finch*, backed also Mr. Robert

* Daniel Finch, eldest son to Daniel earl of Nottingham, was elected one of the knights of the shire for Rutland in 1711, and served for the same county in all parliaments whilst he continued a commoner. In "the Monitor," No. 2, April 24, 1774, he is thus characterised: "Young Disrael is a modern of nature eloquence, and of hereditary gravity, known in the country where he dwells, for a genius particularly inclined to speech-making; and by a family propensity, more especially, addicted to it at those times when most may be said with the least signification." This ill-tempered introduction to a severe remark is introduced for the purpose of contrasting with it the following more pleasing anecdote.

"In a paper of his in the Guardian, Steele published a spirited defence of Lady Charlotte Finch, daughter of the earl of Nottingham, and afterwards duchess of Somerset, who had been treated with rudeness and ill-manners by an anonymous writer in the Examiner, for alleged misbehaviour in church; and won by this the heart of her brother, probably pre-disposed in favour of an amiable man, and, it may be, attached to him by an antecedent friendship. Be this as it may, when the question about Steele's expulsion was agitated in the House of Commons, lord Finch stepped forward, and made attempts to speak in Steele's behalf; but, being embarrassed by an ingenuous modesty, spole, and gave early, pregnant proofs, of eloquence hereditary in his noble family. Lordship among other things, endeavoured justify Mr. Steele, with relation to the nicest and tenderest part of the charge against him, over-deference to an assembly in which he had not yet been accustomed to speak, he sat down in visible confusion, saying, so as to be overheard, "It is strange I can't speak for a man, though I could readily fight for him." His words being whispered from one to another, created in an instant like electrical fire; and suddenly burst, from all parts of the House, of year him! hear him!" with ineffable marks of encouragement, brought lord Finch again on his legs, who with astonishing recollection, and in the utmost propriety, spoke a speech on the occasion, in which, as it was related to this writer, the language of the theatre, "there was not a word which did not tell.—The eyes of the whole company were upon him; and though it appeared to have utterly forgot what he rose up to speak, yet the generous motive, which the whole company knew he acted upon, procured him such an acclamation of voices to honour him, that he expressed himself with a unanimity and clearness, proceeding from the integrity of his heart, that made his very adversaries receive him as a man they wished ever friend.—Such was the noble motive which produced this nobleman's natural eloquence; the force of which was charming, and resistible, when exerted in the protection of the oppressed.

"On the accession of king George 1, lord Finch was appointed one of the gentlemen of the bed-chamber to the prince of Wales, when his father was declared Lord President of the Council: October 10, 1715, he was constituted one of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury; and resigned all his employments Feb. 1, 1715-16. He was made Comptroller of his majesty's household, May 25, 1725; which office he voluntarily resigned, after he succeeded his father as earl of Winchelsea and Nottingham (Jan. 1, 1729-30.) On June 1, 1725, he was sworn of the Privy-council. On March 6, 1741, was constituted First Lord Commissioner of the Admiralty; and April 15, 1743, was appointed one of the Lords Justices on his majesty's absence in his German dominions. He was one of the assistants to the duke of Somerset, chief mourner at the funeral of Frederick, prince of Wales, April 13, 1751. March 13, 1752, he was elected a knight of the garter, and installed June 4. April 6, 1757, he was a second time appointed first Lord of the Admiralty; but resigned in June following. At the accession of the present king he was continued of the Privy Council, and constituted President, July 12, 1765, which office he resigned July 30, 1766. He was also one of the elder brethren of the Trinity-house; and died Aug. 2, 1769, in his 81st year." See Nichol's Epistolary Correspondence of Steele, p. 328, 329, London 1809.

viz. his third wish, in the case of his last Englishman, That his electoral highness of Hanover, would be so grateful as to signify to all the world; the perfect good understanding he has with the court of England, in as plain terms, as her majesty was pleased to declare she had with that House, on her part. He said thereupon, "That supposing there were in this wish, some injurious insinuation, yet the same, could not, without injustice, be applied to the queen; but only to her ministers: That nobody doubted the good understanding between her majesty and the house of Hanover; but that it was notorious, that the ministers shewed no great regard to that illustrious House, witness, (to pass over other instances) the slight they put upon the baron Bothmar's memorial; which the queen had perhaps never seen, had not the duchess of Somerset shewed it her majesty in print in the Daily Courant." My lord Finch likewise justified Mr. Steele, in relation to his reflections on the Peace: We may, said his lordship, give it all the fine epithets we please; but epithets do not change the nature of things. We may, if we please, call it here honourable; but I am sure it is accounted scandalous in Holland, Germany, Portugal, and over all Europe except France and Spain. We may call it advantageous, but all the trading part of the nation find it to be otherwise: And if it be really advantageous, it must be so to the ministry that made it.

Sir William Wyndham saying thereupon, "That the ministry would not say that the Peace was advantageous to them."

The Lord Finch very smartly replied, Then it was plain it was advantageous to nobody, but our late enemies.

Mr. Steele expelled the House.] Lord Lumley, son to the earl of Scarborough, lord Hinchinbroke, and some other members, spoke with a great deal of vivacity in favour of Mr. Steele, and against the conduct of ministry: But Mr. Auditor Foley, sir William Wyndham, the Attorney-General, and some other courtiers, being supported by a great majority, still insisted on the question, so that at last, it was carried by 245 voices, against 152, First, "That a printed pamphlet intitled, The Englishman, being the close of the paper so called, and one other pamphlet, intitled, The Crisis, written by Richard Steele, esq. a member of this House; are scandalous and seditious Libels, containing many expressions highly reflecting upon her majesty, and upon the nobility, clergy, gentry and universities of this kingdom, maliciously insinuating, that the Protestant Succession in the house of Hanover is in danger under her majesty's administration, and tending to alienate the affections of her majesty's good subjects, and to create jealousies and divisions among them. Secondly, That Richard Steele, esq. for his offence in writing, and publishing the said scandalous and seditious libels, be expelled this House."

It is observable that two Scots members only spoke in this long debate, to wit, Mr.

Baillie, and sir James Stewart, judge advocate in North-Britain. The first said, "He was little acquainted with the affairs of England, but had made it his business, to know those of his own country; and that, by all the observations he could make for some years past, they who appeared the most zealous for the Pretender's interest, were most favoured and countenanced, by those in power." This was confirmed by sir James Stewart, who added, "That to his certain knowledge 3 or 4,000*l.* had been yearly remitted to the highland clans, whose chiefs, and the men under their command, were known to be entirely devoted to the Chevalier*."

MR. STEELE'S APOLOGY.

Shortly after his expulsion, Mr. Steele published a Defence of his Conduct. It was entitled 'Mr. Steele's Apology, for Himself and his Writings, occasioned by his Expulsion from the House of Commons.' Besides the masterly able Speech which he made in the House, it contains several particulars not mentioned in the foregoing Proceedings. We therefore give it entire:

"TO MR. WALPOLE.†

SIR; Whoever reads the following Apology will easily allow me, that I am much less cen-

* "By this it appears, that this affair gave the enemies of the present ministry, a handle to rip up several things, which, had it not been for this prosecution, had, perhaps, never been mentioned in the House of Commons: And which, being spoken in the hearing of several Lords, occasioned the like reflections, and stricter inquiries, in the House of Peers. A few days after, sir James Stewart was removed from his place, for telling tales." Boyer.

† "The speech of Walpole on this occasion procured him great applause; but the public did not know, that the Defence made by Steele himself, was in a great degree the offspring of his eloquence; a fact related by bishop Newton, on the authority of Pulteney: 'When Steele was to be expelled, the House of Commons, Mr. Walpole and Mr. Pulteney, and Mr. Addison were commissioned to go to him by the noblemen and members of the Kit Kat Club, with their positive order and determination, that Steele should not make his own speech, but Addison should make it for him, and he should recite it from the other's Writing, without any insertion or addition of his own. Addison thought this an hard injunction, and said, that he must be like a school-boy, and desired the gentlemen to give him a little sense. Walpole said, that it was impossible to speak a speech in cold blood;

cerned for the fame of a writer than that of an honest man. I have declared the assistance I had in composing the Writings which are here defended; for the upright purpose, the innocent intention of them, is all which I am anxious to assert. In defence of truth I incurred popular hatred and contempt, with the prospect of suffering the want even of the ordinary conveniences of life. The probability of being undone I could not but form to myself when I took upon me what I did; but a weight heavier than all this fell upon me, to wit, a Resolution of the Representatives of my country to my dishonour. This indeed was a blow unexpected; nor could it enter into my imagination, that the insolence of any minister could run so high, as to demand of the House of Commons to punish one of its members in being unacceptable to him. The perusal of this Pamphlet will convince the reader, there was not so much as the appearance of any other motive for my Expulsion. The day of debate was indeed a very memorable one, and the persons concerned in it hugely worth suspending the councils of a nation. It was remarkable however, that such was the force of truth, that the member accused had not so harsh personal expression used against him; and the minister, in the midst of all his power, who brought on the accusation, was treated in the manner which all mankind knows he deserves. As for my part, I ever thought meanly of the capacity, though not, till lately, of the good-nature of that demagogue, and saw very well his audaciousness would one day suffer by his ignorance. It was visible, whatever became of his country, which I believe had little share in his Lordship's cares, he would, with the wand in his hand, raise powers which he would want skill to command; and which consequently would tear himself in pieces.

But without dwelling upon the contemplation of mischiefs wrought by a cunning wicked creature, placed in a station proper only for a wise and virtuous man, I am now to give you my thanks for your generous defence of me in this great adversity. Your behaviour was indeed equally noble during the whole French administration, and your eloquence was of public service to your country, when the perceptive was strained to the utmost, not to exalt our own sovereign, but to compliment France with

'but being pressed, he said he would try, and immediately spoke a very good speech of what he thought proper for Steele to say on the occasion; and the next day, in the house made another speech his good, or better, on the same subject; but so totally different from the former, that there was scarce a single argument or thought the same; which particulars are mentioned as illustrious proofs of his uncommon eloquence.' (Life of bishop Newton, by himself)—Steele afterwards published an 'Apology,' which, with becoming gratitude, he dedicated to Walpole." Core's Walpole.

greatness and interest of her and her people. The intervention of providence has set us a stand against the immediate detection which such iniquity and folly had led before our eyes, and men in great employments can now be safe without depending on France.

I have mentioned Dunkirk till I am sick, there are not words to represent the infamous behaviour in a ministry, to cover so great a pernicious an imposture upon their country, the improvement of that port under the pretence of the demolition of it.

You have the honour and happiness to have sincerely opposed all the incursions which so guilty men made upon the greatness of the crown and the welfare of the subject, by constituting them both to their own selfish designs, and destroying, as far as in them lay, the good name of all men of virtue and service.

They have indeed reaped this good, that here is to be nothing said of themselves, the worst tyrants that ever sovereigns employed, but that they had caused to be laid to the charge of those who were their predecessors; persons whose avarice had raised their country to such grandeur, that nothing but the unnatural industry of her own ministers could lower to the wretched condition to which they had reduced it.

These evils could not have been supported, had not the demagogues, by the abuse of power, deafened many in the legislature against attention to the true interest of themselves and their country; while an inconsiderable creature, who had the good-will of no man, could manage aversions skilfully enough to be suffered to destroy all, for fear of an alteration in affairs that might be grateful to an opposite party.

Were the following instance of the harsh and furious disposition in gentlemen to sit determined before hearing, the concern only of me and mine, it would not be worth troubling the world with so many words on the occasion; but neither what I now write, or what you much better spoke, is a case of so little consequence; and when you undertook it, you and new you were pleading for the rights and liberties of the Commons of England; and I will take upon me to say, that there never was a greater insult on the constitution than this, except one practised by the same person without the least deference to the order of things, the common sense of mankind, the honour of the crown, or the property of the subject.

It needs not be said what this greater impudence was, nor who had so little grace as to be guilty of it: It was he who was born in our days for the chastisement and dishonour of them, a tool whose insignificance makes sorrow, occasioned by him, the subject of laughter, takes all dignity from distress, and renders calamity ridiculous.

As to my own part, under the fantastical tyranny of the Demagogue's administration, I could what you said in the House be communicated to the public, I should have no need of this defence; but since I have not here the assistance of your eloquence, I beg the advantage of your name and character: For I know it will be an argument with every honest man that my cause was good, that you so zealously espoused it; for that admirable talent of speaking of which you are master, has never been prostituted to serve dishonest purposes; and you have too candid a spirit not to esteem it a praise, rather than disparagement of your eloquence, that the cause for which you have at any time pleaded needed no art but from the iniquity of its opposers.

The happy ability of explaining the most difficult parts of business to men wholly unacquainted with negotiation, has been as useful to the public as honourable to yourself. As you have detected the artful, so you have helped the ignorant of your very adversaries, according to their intention to abuse or serve their country.

It has been said, That the greatest art is to hide art; but you have a much better instrument towards persuasion, the having nothing to conceal; for truth is as certainly the greatest eloquence, as honesty is the best policy. Let those who speak or act against their conscience, obtain their little purposes and applauds; be it ever your commendation to despise artifice and practise uprightness. A long course of suffering for your zeal in an honest cause, has gained you the character of an open honest English gentleman, with a capacity which takes off the imputation of weakness from simplicity of manners, and adds the dignity of knowledge to the beauty of innocence.

As I never entered into political debates with ambitious views, but have brought my desires within the necessaries and decent conveniences of life, I am the more jealously tenacious of the little I expect of the world, which is only to accept of my service to the best of my ability, without loading me with unjust reproach. In this reasonable expectation Mr. Walpole generously lent me his protection; and though he could not persuade my judges to do me justice, he convinced them I deserved a different sentence from what they pronounced. But, alas, they had learned; by long practice, to do shameful things, without being ashamed; and though your arguments could command their assent, it could not make them utter it in my favour. You sent them away, I thank you, with the same thoughts of themselves, which you had of them; and whatever force and oppression determined, in the eye of reason and conscience the judges were convict, and the accused man found innocent.

I humbly thank you for your eminent part in this affair, and congratulate you on receiving the favour of your prince for your service to your country. As doing good to the public is the motive of conferring favours, it is, with such as you, the rule in enjoying them. I wish you the possession of all your frank heart desires; and am, with great respect, Sir, &c.

RICHARD STEELE.

THE PREFACE.

This Defence was printed before the death of her late majesty; but upon that accident the publication was deferred, lest some handle might be taken to interrupt the business of the nation by an offence given to persons who were principally guilty of the oppression here represented. They might possibly have attempted to borrow another cast of conscience in their favour; and it was to be feared, that the same tyranny, which punished a man for a thing in which he ought to have been encouraged and supported, would have gone on to condemn the least murmur against its determination; I have said tyranny, because to resolve or act against justice, truth, or common sense, is as much tyranny in an assembly as a single person. But I must do the majority of the House which expelled me the justice to own, that they carried themselves as men conscious they were doing wrong, and no one appeared active in it but professed slaves and hirelings, that is to say, such as I have called in the following Narrative the Messengers of the Treasury: Members of the House who were immediately dependant upon or related to a noble lord whom I need not name, that sent orders by his kinsman to turn a commoner of England out of parliament, because it was not his lordship's good pleasure he should sit there any longer. When a man is out of power, it is usual to detract from the fame of his high talents and qualifications: But I cannot be guilty of such injustice to this great man; for never was minister since the creation more thoroughly master of that great necessary in him, who meditates vast designs, the choice of instruments. Machiavel, in some part of his precious writings, advises against the choice of raw murderers, for such are apt to utter some soft word flowing from compassion, or other weakness, for want of the habit of bloodshed, which might spoil the whole design. Our Hero cannot be accused of being injudicious this way, and I have a thousand times sat in deep admiration of his choice of Agents, who if they had been the least grain more rich, more poor, more foolish, more wise, more tall, more short, more knaves, or more fools, had been unfit for the work in hand. Had any man against his measures in either of the assemblies more eloquence, more penetration, or more credit than comes to a single member's share, let such a one open his mouth, he should be attacked with one who had as much right to speak as himself, with so firm absurdity, and then seconded by one just one degree worse than him, and a third half-fool pin up the matter with an assertion still wilder, to the utter confusion of the man in his senses, whose noble faculty of adorning the cause of truth should be immediately reduced to an interjection of sorrow, and down he must sit. Such was our Hero's manner of demolishing and frustrating all persons against him. The same genius in disappointing the force of superior talents, ran through all parts of business.

The writings hereafter spoken of were an apparent vindication of the king's title to the crown, and an honest representation of the dangerous state of the nation. Now would any man living believe, that it was in nature this could be made an accusation before an House of Commons? But so it was; and there appeared in it fellows born and contrived by nature for such a work; Creatures that could see, but not make you angry, such mean instruments of iniquity, that the wickedness was disparaged by their managing it, and the flagrancy and dangerous consequence of what was doing, was hidden by the inconsiderableness of the agents. A persecution from them was like being troubled with vermin. Though I had too much acuteness to be in humour enough to enjoy the scene, there was, with all the cruelty of it, something particularly comic in the affair. All the men of sense in the majority of the House, though they did not design to deny a friend a vote, stood off, and left the whole management to the family and the office.

The onset was made in the poorest manner, and the Accusation laid with an insipid action and cold expression. The Accuser arraigned a man for sedition, with the same indolence and indifference as another man pares his nose. What was spoken appeared only a rheum from the mouth, and Mr. Foley, as well as do what he did, might have blown his nose and put the question. But though the cholera of my accuser was corrected by their phlegm, inasmuch that they were harmless with ill-will; yet had they perseverance to go on, insensible of the raileries of the contrary party, and the contempt of their own. The most lamentable thing of this to consider was, that though there was not one man of honour, who spoke on the side of the ministry, but did it upon general terms, wherein he apparently discovered his disapprobation of the work he was about, so many honest gentlemen should join in a Vote of Expulsion?

It is possible some gentlemen might think in their consciences, it is an immoral action for any private man to animadvert upon the administration of the public. God forbid I should say they were not some worthy men who were thus persuaded in this case; but if they were so, I know not why they should, as members of the House of Commons, punish a man for what he did before he came into the House, especially since that thing would have been laudable in him to have done, if he had been in the House.

All I shall preface further is, that I thought the circumstances of Great Britain and Europe were such as made it an honest and necessary action to interrupt and oppose the measures of the ministry. When I thought it my duty, I thank God, I had no further consideration for myself than to do it in a lawful and proper way, so as to give no disparagement to a glorious cause from my indiscretion or want of judgment.

ment. A work against them I was the rather inclined to undertake, because the exceptions which were made against the conduct of the ministry seemed wild and calumnious, when written by nameless authors; but when any man with his name asserted things were unjust, I would believe the persons concerned to prove it calumny, or suffer under it: And I was willing to ripen the question of the Succession upon my own head. It soon appeared that here was so much ground for what I said in the Papers I then printed, that it was thought much more proper to weaken the validity of what I said, by invectives against me, which came out stitched, bound, and in loose papers or some months every week, than gainsay what I asserted. In the midst of this treatment the conversation happened which gave occasion to The Crisis. The gentleman mentioned in the following Defence, as giving the first hint to the design, I need no longer conceal; it was Mr. Moor of the Inner-Temple, a man perfectly skilled in the history, the laws, the constitution of this kingdom, and, in my poor opinion, as capable of doing eminent service, where those qualities are requisite, as any man in England not already employed. All I have to say further concerning him is, that I hope the mention of this his great merit may prove to his advantage; and it is not to be imputed to me if he feels no effect of public favour, for starting so useful a design as appeared in the Crisis.

When the Crisis was written hand in hand with this gentleman, I, who was to answer for it with my all, would not venture upon our single judgment, therefore I caused it to be printed, and left one copy with Mr. Addison, another with Mr. Lechmere, another with Mr. Minshall, and another with Mr. Hoadly. I don't name Mr. Hoadly last because I honour or depended upon him least: for he has every good quality, talent, and grace, that can adorn a Christian, a gentleman, and a divine; and whatever prejudice may suggest, I think it a great defence that the work passed his hand. From these corrected copies (no one of these gentlemen knowing till this day that the other had seen it) the Crisis became the piece it is.

When I was now fully convinced that what I said was justifiable in the sight of God and man, I thought I had an opportunity of giving an alarm to all honest men, and disconcerting the counsels of men I thought ready to attempt any thing they could act with impunity, and who cared not, so they carried on their own game, though they did it by bringing on their native country the imputation of falshood and treachery, accompanied with slavery, poverty, and dishonour.

All this was plainly intimated in the Crisis, but expressed in such a manner as to be without in the law, against those who had the administration of the laws, and seemed to me to be undermining the constitution. It was therefore reasonable to act within the law as far as a man could against those who made no use of it, but to cover themselves in making encroachments upon it, and transgressions against it.

Besides the care of rescuing my own name from a seeming disgrace of a Vote of the Commons, I thought this Apology necessary to shew the arbitrary use of numbers in the most odious colours, that gentlemen may have a just detestation of practising a thing in itself unwarrantable, from the support only of the insolent and unmanly sanction of a Majority.

A LIST of the Gentlemen who voted against the Expulsion of MR. STEELE.

MR. STEELE'S APOLOGY, &c.

I have waited with much patience during the session of parliament, without offering at any thing in my justification against the Sentence which passed upon me on the 18th of March last past; which Sentence, and the motives to it, are expressed in the two following Resolutions:

Resolved,

'That a printed Pamphlet, intitled, 'The Englishman,' being the close of the paper so called; and one other Pamphlet, entitled, 'The Crisis,' written by Richard Steele, esq. a member of this House; are scandalous and seditious Libels, containing many expressions highly reflecting upon her majesty, and upon the nobility, gentry, clergy, and universities of this kingdom, maliciously insinuating, that the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover is in danger under her majesty's administration, and tending to alienate the affections of her majesty's good subjects, and to create jealousies and divisions among them.'

Resolved,

'That Richard Steele, esq. for his Offence in writing and publishing the said scandalous and seditious Libels, be expelled this House.'

I hoped every day, during the session, to have heard other writers called to an account for their errors as well as myself, especially those who had provoked me to say what gave so much offence. In that case I might perhaps have heard something alledged, that would have made it appear necessary in the representative of the people, to censure as well those who are imprudently zealous for them, as those who are against them. But since they have punished only me, who, if I am guilty at all, am guilty only of too forward zeal in a good cause; I say, since the Commons, to shew their impartiality, have thought fit to distinguish only the crimes of one of their own members, by taking from him both his good name and seat in parliament, while all other writers pass unmentioned; that member thinks himself at liberty to do what he can to weaken the force of that censure, by a Narrative of all that passed in their House relating to himself, as well as he can recollect it.

If the reader will allow me the liberty of speaking of myself sometimes as a third person, to avoid the word I, (which often repeated, even in a justification, has an offence in it) I will tell the story very honestly.

It may, perhaps, appear unadvisable to argue against what was acted by the representative of one's country: but in order to keep us within such bounds, it is expedient, on their side, to have a due regard to the lives and honour of those whom they call before them, and not to expect that, when they have laid the heaviest weight which they are able upon an offender, he will be intimidated from disputing the justice of their sentence by the terrors of their future displeasure, which can have in store nothing so terrible as what is already inflicted. The Resolution against Mr. Steele carries in it all the infamy that can be joined to the name of a gentleman, and they have certainly made him desperate and regardless of what further they can determine to his disadvantage.—In inflicting punishments, especially where the penalty is not prescribed, there should be always a regard had to the person who is to suffer; and whatever sense any body of men may have of good and evil, they should still suppose there are some men who prefer their integrity to all other considerations, not excepting those of riches and power.—Honour is the true essence of a man, and consists in the consciousness of innocence and honesty. This, indeed, cannot be taken from him by the outrage of multitudes, or the abuse of power. But though such a sense of reproach is to be the private rule of a man's conduct, and will certainly prove the best support under all disappointments and adversities, it is too abstracted a notion to carry him through the busyness of the world, without having a due regard to reputation and fame. A man's reputation is the dress of his honour, and though tearing a man's clothes cannot hurt his life or his limbs, yet if he will allow them to be rent into tatters, or patiently let passengers throw dirt upon them, he will be unfit to be received by the decent part of mankind in that condition, from the prejudice they cannot but have to his habit and outward appearance, and consequently he will be unable to perform the offices of life with respect to others as well as himself.

To convince the world that Mr. Steele did not deserve the Sentence before recited, I hope to shew that his whole conduct as a writer, in which character only he has been charged in the House, has been full of instances of a quite contrary tenour to that of which they accuse him; as well as that the Passages themselves which were brought against him will not support their accusation.—Anger, which is never wise, made a man inconsiderable in himself, of so much consequence, that while he was in the House, people condescended (as if to lessen him as carrying a great point) to brow-beat and disparage him. I know not how better to represent his condition during that time, than by saying he was the quite contrary to that sort of creature among them whom they call ‘a favourite of the House.’ A favourite of the House, is one who says and does what he pleases, and is always acceptable, whatever he advances, because he is ridiculous. Mr. Steele, with a quite opposite fate, was to do nothing that should be disliked, because he was serious. This disposition against him appeared the very first day of the session; what happened to him at that time was the entertainment very where for a whole week, therefore I shall very circumstantially relate it.

After two or three gentlemen had proposed to Thomas Haamer for Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Steele took upon him to say he had the same honourable sentiments of that gentleman in the following words:

‘Mr. Jodrell;

‘At the close of the last Parliament, her Majesty was graciously pleased to declare from the throne, That the late rejected Bill of Commerce between Great Britain and France, should be offered to this House. That Declaration was certainly made, that every gentleman, who should have the honour to be returned hither, might make himself master of that important question. It is demonstration that was a most pernicious Bill, and no man can have a greater merit to this House, than his by whose weight and authority that pernicious Bill was thrown out. I rise up to do him honour, and distinguish myself by giving him my Vote for that his inestimable service to his country.’

It will be impossible for the reader to conceive how this Speech of his was received, except he has happened to have been at a cock match, and has seen the triumph and exultation which is raised when a volatile whose fall was some way gainful to part of the company has been necked. At the mention of the Bill of Commerce, the cry began; at calling it ‘pernicious,’ it increased; at the words, ‘Doing him honour,’ it grew insupportably loud; but having no reason for being confounded for other people’s folly or absurdity, Mr. Steele bore the applause well enough to speak out what he intended. He had hardiness enough to do it, from a resolution which he had taken, to govern himself by, when he went into the House, which was, to prefer the fame of an honest man to that of an orator. I must confess I stand in some amazement to find where the ridicule lay in the words ‘I rise up to do him honour,’ the natural meaning of which I take to be shewing him respect, and not implying that it is an honour to him that it is I who do him that respect: however, were it taken in the latter sense, in which Mr. Steele really did not intend it, I do not see the absurdity there would have been in it; he does not deserve to sit in that House, who does not believe his esteem an addition to the person’s reputation on whom he bestows it; for the good opinion of an honest man is an honour to the greatest man living. At the same time Mr. Steele does not attribute this particular outrage to the House, any further than that they ought to have suppressed it, and severely observed upon it, by turning out the offenders, who, it is supposed, were a parcel of rustics who crowded in with the members before the election of the Speaker, from a received error, that there is no authority in the House till he is chosen. As he came out of the House, he could hear nothing but those loud critics talk to one another, ‘Oh! it is not so easy a thing to speak in the House—He fancies, because he can scribble—’ and the like deep animadversions. But to the matter itself.

On the 12th of March, 1713-14, a Complaint was made to the House against certain paragraphs in three printed Pamphlets, one intitled, ‘The Englishman,’ from Saturday, Jan. 16, to Tuesday, Jan. 19, 1713, wherein is a printed Letter to the Englishman, to which is subscribed the name ‘Richard Steele;’ another, intitled, ‘The Crisis,’ in the title page whereof it is said, ‘by Richard Steele, esq;’ and the other, intitled ‘The Englishman being the close of the paper so called,’ in the title page whereof it is also said, ‘by Richard Steele, esq;’ as containing several paragraphs tending to sedition, highly reflecting upon her Majesty, and arraigning her administration and government. Upon which the accused member was ordered to attend in his place the next morning. He attended accordingly on Saturday the 13th, and heard the several paragraphs, in the printed Pamphlet complained of, read. After which, at the proper time, he stood up; and read a Paper containing the following words:

“Mr. Speaker;

“I have written and caused to be printed several books and papers with a sincere zeal and good intent to serve my Queen and country, the present happy establishment in Church and State, and particularly the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover. But I submit it to the House, whether, in justice to the defence that is due to every subject of this kingdom, I ought to admit that either the contents or substance of the papers laid upon your table are the same I wrote and caused to be printed, before I have perused and compared them; especially since every one knows it to be fact, that false editions of books, which sell, are published every day.

“Mr. Speaker, Though I was ordered to attend in my place before any particular passages, if I am rightly informed, were read or objected to in the House; and yet now that I have heard what they are, I trust to the justice of this House, that I shall have a reasonable time to peruse and compare them, and if I find them upon perusal to be really the same which I wrote and published, I shall ingenuously own them, and hope to make such a defence of them as will be satisfactory to the House; for which, I doubt not but you will allow me sufficient time."

Since time for comparing them was all Mr. Steele pretended to, the Monday following was proposed for the day of his defence; but that was easily got over, upon his urging that the next day was Sunday. After a proper time to be allowed was debated for some moments, and that the desiring to collate the papers was said to be mentioned only as the most obvious circumstance absolutely necessary for the Member's Defence, but that much more must be supposed as material, as that, for his justification, the House seemed in a very good disposition, which the accused member did not think he abused in desiring till the Saturday following. It was very faintly pressed that this was too distant a day, till a particular Orator stood up, and endeavoured to warm the House into an indignation of treating, with so much gentleness, so high an offender. It cannot be expected that one can remember every man's name; but the man I mean was of an enormous stature and bulk, and had the appearance, if I may so speak, of Dwarf-Giant. His complexion tawny, his mein disturbed, and the whole man something particularly unfamiliar, disingenuous, and shocking to an English constitution. I fancied, by his exotic make, and colour, he might be descended from a Moor, and was some purchase of our African, or other trading company, which was manumised. This man, thought I, was certainly bred in servitude, and being now out of it, exerts all that he knows of greatness in insolence and haughtiness. The untamed creature stood up to turn off the merciful inclination which he saw grown towards the member accused; and with well-chosen words and personated vehemence, laid before the House, that he, forsooth, was glad to see the good disposition gentlemen appeared to be in, and applauded their tenderness; but at the same time he could not but remark, that the drift of the writings before them was to make the greater number of the gentlemen of England appear Jacobites and enemies to their country. I do not pretend to give exactly what he said to this unjust and cruel purpose; but it prevailed very much towards the effect he desired, and loosened all that was obtained on the side of the defendant in the preceding part of the debate, insomuch that Mr. Steele grew in fear he should have no time at all allotted him; and therefore when the House was going to divide on the question, whether he should be allowed till Saturday or not, he stood up and begged till Thursday, in which request Mr. Pitt of Worcestershire had the humanity to second him, and the affair was appointed for that day without a division.

On Monday following, the 15th of March, believing a great part of the ill-will which he had brought upon himself was owing to what he had writ about Dunkirk, he thought it would make for his defence to have what passed relating to the collusive demolition appear to the House before his day came on. Mr. Steele therefore (upon the suggestion of some friends voice near him to be very humble) had the folly to pretend to move their pity, by a comparison of the powerful opposition against him from those who were numerously related in the House, and in such circumstances as to draw all others to them; and representing his own condition so particularly unalied and unassisted, that there was not one man living of his blood, nor he in circumstances capable of engaging the friendship of any man there but from the merit of his cause. 'I have,' said that facetious person, 'This to thank my adversaries for, that their hard prosecution has opened so good a way to the breasts of Englishmen as pity.' From this ill-judged quaint harangue, which was received with much coldness, he recovered himself as well as he could, by observing, That he never knew an unhappy man speak but just enough; and therefore would not wander further, but hasten to the question which he had prepared and held in his hand, as of use to his ensuing Defence; which was

"That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, that she will be pleased to give directions, that the several representations of her majesty's engineers and officers who have had the care and inspection of the demolition of Dunkirk, and all orders and instructions given thereupon, be laid before this House." It passed in the negative. And from that moment Mr. Steele despaired of his cause. He prepared his mind as well as he could to meet with his disgrace; and considered all that was to follow as a farce, wherein heedless men were to indulge their curiosity, mirth, or cruelty, without any regard to justice, or how far what they were doing would affect him or themselves. But Thursday the 18th is now come; and the order of the day for taking into consideration the Printed Pamphlets complained of to the House being read, Mr. Foley the accuser demanded that the matter appointed in the day might be entered upon, referring the method of proceeding to the House. Mr. Steele chose to make his appearance near the bar of the House; and I will not forget to mention one circumstance in this scene that very much sweetened his afflictions, which was, that he had the honour to stand between Mr. Stanhope and Mr. Walpole, who condescended to take upon them the parts of his advocates. The first Question proposed to divert the company, was, Whether the member accused owned the writings or not? upon which Mr. Steele stood up and said,

"Mr. Speaker,

"When I was called up the other day upon the same occasion, I suspended the utter acknowledgment of the papers laid on your table against me. I was advised to do so. What has hitherto been insisted upon by me was mere formality, in favour of other innocent men who may hereafter fall into my circumstances. I now frankly and ingenuously own those papers laid to my charge to be parts of my Writings. I write them in behalf of the House of Hanover, and I own them with the same unreservedness with which I abjured the Pretender. I humbly submit myself to this honourable Assembly, and depend upon your Justice."

This occasioned a long debate, and in the intervals between the speaking of particular members, the House called out, Mr. Steele, Mr. Steele, to begin his Defence; but his friends directed him to sit still. The dispute a little time ripened into this question, Whether the member accused should answer paragraph by paragraph, and hear what was urged against him to each, and thereupon answer; or that, now he knew upon what heads he was charged, he should proceed to defend himself? It seems it is the custom on such occasions, that the member withdraws without speaking for himself in the way the House prescribes to him, and is to have no further opportunity before the House proceeds to Censure: It was therefore intimated to him that now was his time to stand up; and making use of his papers he sometimes spoke, but chiefly read as follows:

"Mr. Speaker; You will easily believe I have not been in a very sedate temper ever since I came into this House. When I composed those writings of which I am accused, I studied carefully to avoid committing any fault in them, and now on a sudden I am to rack my invention to find out guilt in them. I have also been forced to apply myself to the making my Defence paragraph by paragraph, as well as according to this method to which you have now been pleased to restrain me. From these accidents, the different opinions of friends, being suspended between these opinions, want of sleep, and being pressed in point of time, I am in a very ill condition to make a Defence. But if you will forgive my blundering and stammering amidst a huddle of papers you see in my hands, not read over since transcribed, and the references from some to others of them not fixed in my mind, you shall have the truth of my heart in this discomposure, which will I hope with generous men do more for me, than what I could have produced with more meditation. I must therefore, as well as I can, from papers which, as I said, I have not so much as read over since transcribed, obey your commands; and fall abruptly into the particulars of my Defence, the way to which I thought to make in a more gradual and unforced manner, upon the views I had before I came into the House.

"I have not, I hope, written any thing with an improper heat, though I have not shewn an insensibility; and those who condemn what heat I have shewn, will at least approve the ends to which it was directed.

"If my wishes for the demolition of Dunkirk, and my zeal for that Succession which is the only security under God of our laws, our liberties, and our religion, have betrayed me into any errors which I am not sensible of, I hope the goodness of these motives which occasioned them, will be sufficient to extenuate and cover them. I am sure there are several writers who have talked with as much warmth and more boldness for a quite contrary end, without giving the same offence to those in whose power it has been to punish them: I say, sir, that there are many who have written with as great a zeal in a cause which is condemned as treasonable by our acts of parliament, and yet have had the good luck to escape the notice of those who have had either the making of laws or the putting them in execution. Besides, whilst I have thus preserved my temper, it must be allowed that no man ever received greater provocations. Those writers who declared themselves the professed advocates of the ministry, and give themselves the air of being in the secrets of the administration, were the first aggressors. They have loaded me with groundless calumnies, misrepresented me in every part of my character, and have been as disingenuous and unchristian in the methods of publishing these false reports, as they were in the inventing of them. When I had the honour to be returned as a member of parliament, and was therefore presumed to be such, instead of being thereby privileged from this infamous treatment, I was only the more exposed to it. These papers I am now speaking of prejudged my election, denounced to me the displeasure of men in great places, and foretold that storm which is now fallen upon me, unless it be averted by the justice and honour of gentlemen, who are the only persons that can interpose in this case between an innocent man and an offended minister. Such has been the cruel and ungenerous usage which I have met with from an author who has several times professed himself a champion for the ministry, that no longer since than last Friday he has fallen upon me with that rage and malice, which is becoming a scholar, a gentleman, or a christian, at the same time that so great a misfortune befel me as to be accused before this House. As if he did not think that weight heavy enough upon me, he makes his court to his superiors by determining the cause which lay before this honourable assembly, and represents me in such a character as I hope is due to no man living. I cannot but take notice of his last paper, which, if any gentleman will be at the pains of perusing, he will find, (by what strange accident or concerted measures I know not) that it is a brief of the charge against me before this House. It was in answer to this writer that I first employed my pen, and, as I thought, for the service of my country. This man has represented half of her majesty's subjects as a different people, who have forfeited the common protection allowed them by the constitution; but has never been called to account for it 'as a writer of matters tending to sedition.' He has treated the fathers of our church like the basest among the people, tore in pieces the reputation of the most eminent names in Great Britain, marked out several members in both Houses of parliament, and endeavoured to render them odious to the nation, when they have disagreed with him in opinion, or rejected any bill which the ministry had seemed to promote. He has vilified those persons which are in friendship and alliance with her majesty, and condemned treaties which are still in force. He has trifled upon so melancholy a subject as that of her majesty's late indisposition, and represented her as actually dead, for the sake of a poor conceit which the greatest part of his readers were not able to take, and those who did could not but regard with horror. All this, sir, the author I am now mentioning has done, without being called to account for any reflection 'tending to sedition, highly reflecting upon her majesty, and arraigning her administration and government.' In the opinion of the world he has not only done all this with impunity, but with encouragement. It is chiefly in answer to this author, that those papers were written which are now upon your table. I could not see without indignation an endeavour set on foot to confound truth with falshood, and to turn the whole history of the present times into a lie. I thought I might act with the same safety in vindicating, as he did in attacking the reputation of several innocent persons, who are unblemished every where but in his papers; and of many honourable persons, who by all sides are allowed to have deserved well of their country. And now, sir, let every British gentleman lay his hand upon his heart, and ask himself, Whether it was possible for a man of any spirit to have received those private and personal injuries which I have here mentioned, or for any honest man to have seen others so barbarously treated, without giving some loose to his resentments. Sir, a good name is as dear to me as it can be to the greatest man in England; and whoever employs all his artifices to make me appear vile and infamous, cannot be angry with me if I lay hold on what I think defective in his own character and behaviour, to expose it in the same manner. I am sure no man of honour, and it is my happiness that this assembly is composed of no other, would make such a sacrifice of himself to any, the most powerful of his fellow subjects. I know no law of God or man that requires this kind of resignation or self-denial.

"I have been the longer upon this head, to shew gentlemen that this great affair which is now laid before them, has been hitherto, notwithstanding the many insolencies I have now recited against the greatest persons in Church and State, only a paper war between two private persons; and they must have but a mean opinion of the dignity of a British House of Commons, who think they will make themselves parties in either side of it. Besides, I have another reason for opening my Defence in this manner, because I find that the first Paragraph which is laid to my charge, can accuse me of nothing else but of shewing disrespect to the Examiner. Here follows, as it is marked against me, what I say in the Esquire, Number 46.

'But there is still a circumstance in the same paper of the Examiner's that may have a consequence yet more immediately pernicious, and that is the last sentence of it; "Since her majesty is to be the last, we hope they will be obliged to own her for the greatest and wisest of the Stuarts." I cannot but think this expression uttered as lamenting in favour of a pretended Stuart, in whose behalf he sighs, and says, Since her majesty is to be the last. The natural way of speaking his sense, in a man who was in the interest of his country, had been to say, as her majesty without issue is to be the last. But whether his inclinations be for the Pretender or not, I am sure he promotes his service in a very great degree, when he endeavours to vilify that House of Commons which is now laying a price upon his head.—But let the rest of the world do what they please, and delay their protestations against these evils as long as they think fit, I will postpone all else that is dear to me to the love of my country: and as this is, and I trust in Providence will be my strongest passion to my life's end, I will, while it is yet day, profess, and publish the rules by which I govern my judgment of men and things in the present conjuncture.—Does this action bespeak such a one a wise man if he is for the Pretender, a madman if he is for the house of Hanover?—Does this position open a way to the Pretender? Or, does it further secure the Protestant Succession?—These are my questions, which I make the test of men and opinions; and if a man does a thing that may advance the interest of the Pretender or his friends, and can no way do good to the House of Hanover, he may swear to his last breath that he is for that House; before he shall make me believe him. In like manner, if people talk to me of hereditary right, and then follow it with professions for the House of Hanover, which can have no additional security from the urging of hereditary right, I shall no more believe them Hanoverians, than I should think a man religious who should make a blasphemous discourse, and close it with the rehearsal of the creed.—I speak all this because I am much afraid of the Pretender; and my fears are increased, because many others laugh at the danger. I presume to say, those who do laugh at it either do not think at all, or think it will be no day of danger to themselves. But I thus early let go my fire against the Pretender's friends, because I think myself a very good judge of men's mien and air, and see what they intend at a distance. I own I have nothing to say for the liberty I take now, or the book I put out to day, when no body else talks in the same stile, but what the tailor did when he fired out of the stage-coach upon highway-men before they cried land; Would you have me stay till they have boarded us?"

"My adversaries must make the Examiner, and the ministry, before they can bring the rest of these paragraphs within their complaint, cannot suppose that any Englishman can take me to blame for expressing my love to my country in the strongest terms, as I have already done. As to the rules by which I propose to govern my judgment, they are, I suppose, what none will controvert, as being of the nature of maxims or first principles, which cannot admit of no dispute. The paragraph that follows them is nothing else but the application of these general and undisputed maxims to a particular case. I cannot imagine why any gentleman should mark it in particular, unless for the sake of the word Hereditary; a word it seems with so many disputes, and which, according to my notion of it, is inconsistent with the Succession in the House of Hanover, which cannot be come at but by passing over the rights of those who are the next heirs in blood. As it happens that I have explained myself as to this point in the Englishman, Number 5, where I say,

"The unhappy animosities which have reigned amongst us, have made each side reduce itself to an absurdity, from their violence of opposing each other. While the one urges a hereditary title, his warmth betrays him into expressions disrespectful to the sovereignty; and his opponent expresses his indignation at principles too near the sentiments of commonwealths-men, with carrying too far the terms hereditary and indefeasible. Let them both agree that the queen is vested in all the rights inherent in the Crown of England, and in default of issue, the same titles devolved upon her House of Hanover. When we talk of hereditary in general, all who can be persuaded that the Pretender is the son of James 2, may be insinuated to conclude that his title is superior to that of any other upon earth: but when we allow that the Act of Settlement, and the other subsequent acts, have well vested all possible Title in her majesty and the House of Hanover, the Englishman has but one view before him; and any title of the Pretender, of whomsoever born, is as remote as that of the Tadors or Plantagenets, or any other extinct family.—In this plain rule for the direction of our obedience, we have nothing to divert our thoughts from pursuing the real interest of our queen and country; and all, as one man, will join in a common indignation against those who would perplex our obedience, as faithful subjects and Englishmen."

"The last paragraph expresses my fears of the Pretender, which I must still acknowledge; at least I can see nothing criminal in them, till such time as it shall be made a crime to say that the Protestant Succession is in danger. I thought I had reason to apprehend this danger, from the power of one who had declared himself the friend and patron of the Pretender, from his present residence with a prince who has been ineffectually applied to for his removal; from the apprehensions of a whole House of Commons in another kingdom, where men have been actually listed for his service; from addresses sent out of North Britain; from books written and published in vindication of his title. I thought my fears were not too early, when the danger appeared so imminent; and I believe every gentleman will concur with me, that it is more for the safety of the public we should, in this great case, be affrighted with imaginary danger, than lulled into imaginary security.

"I come now, Sir, to those passages which are marked in the Dedication to the Crisis. The first paragraph runs thus:

"I will take the further liberty to say, That if the acts of parliament mentioned in the following treatise, had been from time to time put in a fair and clear light, and had been carefully recommended to the perusal of young gentlemen in colleges, with a preference to all other civil institutions whatsoever, this kingdom had not been in its present condition, but the constitution would have had, in every member the universities have sent into the world since the Revolution, an advocate for our rights and liberties."

"I suppose, Sir, those who have marked this passage, would fetch an innuendo out of it that I speak disrespectfully of the universities; an imputation which I thought could never be laid to my charge, as may appear by innumerable passages that may be drawn out of books which I have published. It would take up the time of this House too much, should I desire that all those passages should be read; I shall therefore only beg leave to make use of that work which is intitled the Englishman, to vouch for me in this particular. In the paper of that name, Number 12, I thus express myself:*

"Our wholesome laws, large provisions, and the exemplary characters of our divines, place them above the necessity of practising false arts, to be in themselves, their families, and their posterity, the most happy as well as the most eminent of the people. If therefore they will at any time separate themselves from the common interest of their country, such errors in them must necessarily render them, in instances which might be indifferent in others, to a degree schismatics in the church, and rebels in the state."

"And I also say in the Englishman, Number 84† I have ever been of opinion, that our universities, as they have been the strongest support of our church, will be no less zealous for the defence of our civil liberties, whenever they shall see them openly attacked. One of those illustrious societies cannot yet have forgot, when, by a most unexampled piece of cruelty, six and twenty of her members, for re-

‘ fusing to be guilty of direct perjury, and bravely ‘ opposing an illegal commission, were all of ‘ them deprived of their fellowships, made in‘ capable of any ecclesiastical dignity; and ‘ such of them as were not then in holy orders ‘ declared and adjudged incapable of being ever ‘ admitted into the same. I shall conclude with ‘ this observation, That these noble foundations ‘ and monuments of the virtue of our ancestors, ‘ are in their very nature directly opposite to ty‘ ranny and unlimited power; since as igno‘ rance is a natural consequence of slavery, arts ‘ and sciences may be properly called the eldest ‘ daughter of liberty.’

“ It appears by these, and many other passages in my writings, that I have retained the greatest honour and esteem for those learned bodies; in one of which I received a part of my education, and where I can still boast of much personal friendship and acquaintance. But I believe, Sir, there are none among those learned societies, who will think I derogue from them by any thing said in this paragraph. They themselves bewail their misfortune, that several nonjurors are gone out from among them, and several still remain with them, who are the most able defenders of that cause, and who, if they had rightly studied our constitution as settled by acts of parliament, might have been as able advocates for our Rights and Liberties.
Sir, I have reason to esteem the universities, as I had the happiness to have had a part of my education in one of them: and it is for the like reason that I shall always have a veneration for the clergy, as having been bred up from my infancy (which I know not whether my accuser was or not) in the doctrine of the Church of England.

“ The paragraph which follows in the Dedication of the Crisis is this:

‘ There is one thing which deserves your ‘ most serious consideration. You have bound ‘ yourselves by the strongest obligations that ‘ religion can lay upon men, to support that ‘ Succession which is the subject of the follow‘ ing papers: you have tied down your souls
‘ by an oath to maintain it as it is settled in ‘ the House of Hanover: nay, you have gone ‘ much farther than is usual in cases of this ‘ nature, as you have personally abjured the ‘ Pretender to this crown; and that expressly,
‘ without any equivocations or mental reserva‘ tions whatsoever; that is, without any pos‘ sible escapes, by which the subtlety of tem-‘ porising casuists might hope to elude the force
‘ of these solemn obligations. You know much ‘ better than I do, whether the calling to God ‘ to witness to the sincerity of our intentions in ‘ these cases; whether the swearing upon the ‘ holy Evangelists in the most solemn manner; ‘ whether the taking of an oath before multi‘ tudes of our fellow-subjects and fellow-chris‘ tians in our public courts of Justice, do not ‘ lay the greatest obligations that can be laid ‘ on the consciences of men. This I am sure of,
‘ that if the body of the clergy, who consider-‘ ately and voluntarily entered into these en-

‘ gagements, should be made use of as instru‘ ments and examples to make the nation break ‘ through them, not only the Succession to the ‘ crown, but the very essence of our religion, is ‘ in danger. What a triumph would it furnish ‘ to those evil men among us, who are enemies ‘ to your sacred order? What occasion would ‘ it administer to Atheists and unbelievers to ‘ say, That Christianity is nothing else but an ‘ outward show and pretence among the most ‘ knowing of its professors: what could we af‘ terwards object to Jesuits? What would be ‘ the scandal brought upon our holy church, ‘ which is at present the glory and bulwark of
‘ the reformation? How would our present ‘ clergy appear in the eyes of their posterity,
‘ and even to the succession of their own ‘ order, under a government introduced and ‘ established by a conduct so directly oppo‘ site to all the rules of honour and precepts of ‘ Christianity?’

“ A man may own he apprehends that holy and recluse men may be misled by artful ones without any imputation to their characters; weakness or guilt. And I here only take the liberty of all writers, to suppose a case which is not likely to happen; and by that means to animate the zeal of those to whom I address myself, for that cause of the justice of which they are already persuaded.
This is a way of arguing made use of by every one who would bring over his reader to a zeal for what he advances. What is more frequent than to hear from the pulpit itself the scandal that would be brought upon Christianity, should the professors of it deviate from those rules which it prescribes? And it would be as just to say, that the preacher does by this method insinuate that his hearers are not Christians, as it would be to imply from that paragraph which I have now read, that our English clergy are against the Protestant Succession: Nay, I think, nothing can be so great an argument that I believe they are for it, as thus laying before the reader those solemn engagements that this holy order of men have entered into for its preservation.
But to take off all possibility of an insinuation in this place, I have, in the paragraph which immediately follows, disclaimed every such implication; where I say,

‘ As I always speak and think of your holy ‘ order with the utmost deference and respect,
‘ I do not insist upon this subject to insinuate ‘ that there is such a disposition among your ‘ venerable body, but to shew how much your ‘ own honour and the interest of religion is ‘ concerned, that there should be no cause
‘ given for it.’

“ It would be very unfair to separate my words, and to pronounce a meaning in them, which I have not expressed, when that which I have expressed is a positive denial of having entertained any such meaning.

“ Sir, I am afraid that those that stir up this accusation against me, only make use of the name of the clergy to give it a more popular urn, and to take off the odium from themselves, by the use of such venerable names. but I hope this accusation will be thought to proceed from the real cause of it; and if any ardent should fall upon me, as I know there cannot, whilst I have the honour and happiness to be heard before this house, that it will rather be imputed to the resentments of an angry minister than of an injured clergy.

"Sir, if I can arrogate to myself any little merit from the writings which I have published, it is chiefly this: That I have personally opposed such authors as have endeavoured to ridicule religion, and those holy professors of it. I have received several approbations in public and in private, from men in holy orders, for my concurring with them, to the best of my poor abilities, in the advancement of morality, and in beating down that unreasonable humour which had prevailed with so many writers to expose their persons and professions to the derision of foolish and wicked men. I must beg leave, on this head, to produce some out of innumerable passages which speak with the utmost deference and respect of their holy calling in general, and of some particular persons in it, for whom, I believe, most of the gentlemen of this House have a very great and just esteem.

"I shall first cite one or two very short passages out of a book called, The Guardian, which has been mentioned in this House; and which was published not long since. The first of which passages is in the 13th, 14th, and 15th pages of the 1st volume, in the following terms.*

"I am diverted from the account I was giving the town of my particular concerns, by casting my eyes upon a treatise, which I could not overlook without an inexcusable negligence, and want of concern for all the civil as well as religious interest of mankind. This piece has for its title, 'A Discourse of Thinking, occasioned by the rise and growth of a sect called Free Thinkers.' The author very methodically enters upon his argument, and says, by Free Thinking I mean the use of the understanding, in endeavouring to find out the meaning of any proposition whatsoever, in considering the nature of the evidence for or against, and in judging of it according to the seeming force or weakness of the evidence. As soon as he delivered this definition, from which one would expect he did not design to shew a particular inclination for or against any thing, before he had considered it; he gives up all title to the character of a Free Thinker, with the most apparent prejudice against a body of men, whom of all others a good man would be most careful not to violate, I mean men in holy orders. Persons who have devoted themselves to the service of God are venerable to all who fear him; and it is a certain characteristic of a dissolute un Governed mind, to rail or speak

'disrespectfully of them in general. It is certain that in so great a crowd of men, some will intrude who are of tempers very unbecoming their function. But because ambition and avarice are sometimes lodged in that bosom, which ought to be the dwelling of sanctity and devotion, must this unreasonable author vilify the whole order? He has not taken the least care to disguise his being an enemy to the persons against whom he writes, nor any where granted, that the institution of religious men to serve at the altar, and instruct such who are not as wise as himself, is at all necessary or desirable; but proceeds without the least apology to undermine their credit, and frustrate their labours. Whatever clergymen, in disputes against each other, have unguardedly uttered, is here recorded in such a manner as to affect religion itself, by wresting concessions to its disadvantage from its own teachers. If this be true, as sure any man that reads the discourse must allow it is; and if religion is the strongest tie of human society; in what manner are we to treat this our common enemy.'

"I shall cite another passage, Sir, which is taken out of the 245th and 246th pages of the 2nd volume of the same work, and contains the following words:†

'But if to inform the understanding, and regulate the will, is the most lasting and diffusive benefit, there will not be found so useful and excellent an institution as that of the Christian Priesthood, which is now become the scorn of fools.—That a numerous order of men should be consecrated to the study of the most sublime and beneficial truths, with a design to propagate them by their discourses and writings, to inform their fellow-creatures of the being and attributes of the Deity, to possess their minds with the sense of a future state, and not only to explain the nature of every virtue and moral duty, but likewise to persuade mankind to the practice of them by the most powerful and engaging motives, is a thing so excellent and necessary to the well-being of the world, that nobody but a modern free-thinker could have the forehead or folly to turn it into ridicule.—The light in which these points should be exposed to the view of one who is prejudiced against the names Religion, Church, Priest, and the like, is, to consider the clergy as so many philosophers, the churches as schools, and their sermons as lectures for the information and improvement of the audience. How would the heart of Socrates or Tully have rejoiced, had they lived in a nation where the law had made provision for philosophers to read lectures of philosophy every seventh day in several thousand of schools erected at the public charge throughout the whole country, at which lectures all ranks and sexes without distinction were obliged to be present for their general improvement? And what wicked wretches would they think those men, who should endeavour to defeat the purpose of so divine an institution?

"It ever was my sentiment, before I could have formed to myself any views of such engagements as those I have since fallen into, that respect to clergymen and their prosperity are essential to the good of society. Give me leave, Mr. Speaker, on this occasion, to read to you a passage out of a little Tract called 'The Christian Hero;' the 48th page, speaking of the enemies to the Christian name, and persons who envied the clergy, runs thus:

'But alas! its state is as much militant as ever; for there are earthly and narrow souls as deeply scandalled at the prosperity the professors and teachers of this sacred faith enjoy, and object to them the miseries and necessities of the primitive believers. Light and superficial men! not seeing that riches is a much more dangerous dispensation than that of poverty. This we oppose as a foe, that we run to as a friend; and an enemy does his business more successfully in an embrace than a blow. But since the necessities, conveniencies, and honours of life which the clergy enjoy, are so great an offence to their despisers, they are the more engaged to hold them dear; for they who envy a man what he has, would certainly scorn him without it. When therefore they are both in good and bad fortune irreconcilable to them, may they always offend with their happiness: For it is not to be doubted, but that there are bishops and governors in the Church of England, whose decent hospitality, meekness, and charity to their brethren, will place them in the same mansions with the most heroic poor, convince the mistake of their enemies, and shew that the eternal pastor has given his worldly blessings into hands by which he approves their distribution; and still bestows upon us great and exemplary spirits, that can conquer the difficulties and enchantments of wealth itself.'

"I have carried this inclination to the advancement of virtue so far, as to pursue it even in things the most indifferent, and which, perhaps, have been thought foreign to it. To give you an instance of this, Sir, I must mention a Comedy called 'The Lying Lover,' which I writ some years ago, the Preface to which says,

'Though it ought to be the care of all governments, that public representations should have nothing in them but what is agreeable to the manners, laws, religion, and policy of the place or nation wherein they are exhibited; yet it is the general complaint of the more learned and virtuous amongst us, that the English stage has extremely offended in this kind. I thought therefore it would be an honest ambition to attempt a comedy, which

"Mr. Collier had, about the time when this was published, written against the immorality of the Stage. I was (as far as I durst for fear of witty men, upon whom he had been too severe) a great admirer of his work, and took it into my head to write a comedy in the style he required. In this play I make the spurs a hero kill a man in his drink, and finding himself in prison the next morning, I give him the contrition which he ought to have on that occasion. It is in allusion to that circumstance that the Preface further says as follows:

'The anguish he there expresses, and the mutual sorrow between an only child and a tender father in that distress, are perhaps an injury to the rules of comedy, but I am sure they are a justice to those of morality: And passages of such a nature being so frequently applauded on the Stage, it is high time that we should no longer draw occasions of mirth from those images which the religious of our country tells us we ought to tremble at with horror.—But her most excellent majesty has taken the Stage into her consideration; and we may hope, from her gracious influence on the muses, that wit will recover from its apathy; and that by being encouraged in the interests of virtue, it will strip vice of the garb in which it has too long appeared, and cloath it in its native dress of shame, contempt and dishonour.'

"I cannot tell, Sir, what they would have me do to prove me a Churchman; but I think I have appeared one even in so trifling a thing as a comedy: And considering me as a comic poet, I have been a martyr and confessor to the church; for this play was damned for impiety.

"I shall in the last place, Sir, with your allowance, quote some passages out of another Book, intitled, 'The Tatler;' the first of which is in the 37th page of the first volume, published in 1710. as follows:*

'Will's Coffee-house, April 20, 1709.
'This week being sacred to holy things, and no public diversions allowed, there has been taken notice of, even here, a little treatise, called "A Project for the Advancement of Religion; dedicated to the Countess of Berkeley." The title was so uncommon, and promised so peculiar a way of thinking, that every man here has read it, and as many as have done so have approved it. It is written with the spirit of one who has seen the world enough to undervalue it with good breeding. The author must certainly be a man of wisdom as well as piety, and have spent much time in the exercise of both. The real causes of the decay of the interest of religion, are set forth in a clear and lively manner, without unseasonable persusions; and the whole air of the book, as to the language, the sentiments and the reasonings, show it was written by one whose se sits easy about him, and to whom vice is roughly contemptible. It was said by one of this company, alluding to that knowledge of the world the author seems to have; The author writes much like a gentleman, and goes to Heaven with a very good mien.

The gentleman I here intended was Dr. Hoadly; this kind of man I thought him at that time: We have not met of late, but I hope he deserves this character still.

The second passage which I shall cite out of that work, is in the 116th and 117th pages of the second volume published the same year 1710.

The Dean we heard the other day together an orator. He has so much regard to his congregation, that he commits to his memory that he is to say to them; and has so soft and careful a behaviour that it must attract your attention. His person, it is to be confessed, is no small recommendation; but he is to be highly commended for not losing that advantage, and adding to the propriety of speech (which might pass the criticism of Longinus) an action which would have been approved by Demosthenes. He has a peculiar force in his way and has many of his audience, who could not be intelligent hearers of his discourse, were there not explanation as well as grace in his action. This art of his is used with most exact and honest skill. He never attempts your passions till he has convinced your reason. All the objections which he can form are laid open and dispersed, before he uses the least vehemence in his sermon: but when he thinks he has your head, he very soon wins your heart; and never pretends to bow the beauty of holiness, till he hath convinced you of the truth of it.

The third passage which I shall cite from that work, is taken out of the 168th and 169th pages of the same volume.*

This matter is too sacred for this paper; but I can't see what injury it would do any clergyman, to have it in his eye, and believe all that are taken from him by his want of industry are to be demanded of him. I dare say Favonius has very few of these losses. Favonius, in the midst of a thousand impertinent assailants of the divine truths, is an undisturbed defender of them. He protects all under his care, by the clearness of his understanding and the example of his life. He visits dying men with the air of a man who hopes for his own dissolution, and enforces in others a contempt of this life, by his own expectation of the next. His voice and behaviour are the lively images of a composed and well governed zeal. None can leave him for the frivolous jargon of the ordinary teachers among dissenters, but such who cannot distinguish vociferation from eloquence, and argument from railing. He is so great a judge of mankind, and touches our passions with so superior a command, that he who deserts his congregation must be a stranger to the dictates of nature, as well as to those of grace.

In fine, sir, the last passage which I shall cite out of that work, is taken from the preface to the 4th volume, published in 1711, where it is said,

What a man obtains from the good opinion and friendship of worthy men, is a much greater honour than he can possibly reap from any accomplishments of his own. But all the credit of wit, which was given me by the gentleman above-mentioned (with whom I have now accounted) has not been able to atone for the exceptions made against me for some raillery in behalf of that learned advocate for the episcopacy of the Church and liberty of the people, Mr. Hoadly. I mention this only to defend myself against the imputation of being moved rather by party than opinion; and I think it is apparent I have with the utmost frankness allowed merit wherever I found it, though joined in interests different from those for which I have declared my self. When my Favonius is acknowledged to be Dr. Smalridge, and the amiable character of the dean in the 66th Tatler, drawn for Dr. Atterbury, I hope I need say no more as to impartiality.

Sir, I shall give you no more instances on this head, but shall beg that common candour from gentlemen, which is allowed to every body; that if my intention should appear doubtful or suspicious in any one passage, it may be explained by others which are more plainly and fully expressed. Sir, since I have touched upon the word religion, I hope I may be indulged one sentence more before I quit this head, and if I speak as a fool, that you will bear with me. I have in several of my writings espoused the interests of virtue and religion, and have reason to hope I have been of some use to the public upon that account. Why may not these now plead for me? I wish those who have written against me, and have contributed their utmost to bring me into my present misfortune, may in their day of adversity have the same foundation for support in themselves, and claim to your favour.

I now come, Sir, to the Passages marked in the first and second pages of the Crisis.

But since, by I know not what anxiety we are of late grown supine, and our anxiety for it [speaking of liberty,] is abated, in proportion to the danger to which it is every day more exposed, by the artful and open attacks of the enemies of our constitution: It is a reasonable and honest office to look into our circumstances; and let the enemies of our present establishment behold the securities which the laws of the country have given those who dare assert their liberties, and the terrors they have pronounced against those who dare undermine them. For whatever is the prospect before our eyes, it is the business of every honest man, to look up with a spirit that becomes honesty, and to do what in him lies for the improvement of our present condition, * Written by Mr. Steele himself.

‘ which nothing but our own pusillanimity can make desperate. The most destructive circumstance in our affairs seems to be, that by the long and repeated insinuations of our enemies, many are worn into a kind of doubt of their own cause, and think with patience of what is suggested in favour of contrary pretensions. The most obvious method of reviving the proper sentiments in the minds of men, for what they ought to esteem most dear, is to shew that our cause has in it all the sanctions of honour, truth, and justice; and that we are, by all the laws of God and man, instated in a condition of enjoying religion, life, liberty and property, rescued from the most imminent danger of having them all for ever depend upon the arbitrary power of a popish prince.’

“ I must here beg leave, Sir, to read the two or three following lines which are not marked, because they explain this latter part of this last paragraph, and show to whom these words are applied, where it is said, “ That we are by all the laws of God and man, instated in a condition of enjoying religion, life, liberty, and property, rescued from the most imminent danger of having them all for ever depend upon the arbitrary power of a popish prince.” The following paragraph, which determines these words, runs thus :

‘ We should have been chained down in this subject condition, in the reign of the late king James, had not God Almighty in mercy given us the late happy Revolution, by that glorious instrument of his providence the great and memorable king William.’

“ And now, Sir, can any one say, that we were not instated in a condition of enjoying religion, life, liberty, and property, by the late happy Revolution? Or that we were not before in the most imminent danger of having them all depend upon the arbitrary power of a popish prince? I appeal to the acts of parliament quoted in this book; and might appeal, as I am told, to a report of the grievances of this kingdom, under the reign of king James 2, made to this House by Paul Foley, esq. father to the gentleman who has so remarkably distinguished himself against me this day. This report, as I am told, explains by a multitude of instances, drawn up in the strongest terms, the several particulars which I have here just touched upon. If the House thinks fit that I should in this place have the assistance of the father against the son, I will desire that that report may now be read: Or, if that be not thought fit, shall go on with my defence.

“ And here, Sir, I think I may save you a great deal of time, by laying down a general rule which every one will agree, ought to take place in the perusal of any writing. That which I shall insist on is this; that if an author's words, in the obvious and natural interpretation of them, have a meaning which is innocent, they cannot without great injustice be condemned of another meaning which is criminal. If the same expression may be applied to different persons, and according to such application may be construed in my favour or to my prejudice, why should my words be applied to hurt me, when they may naturally be applied in such a manner as is capable of incurring censure? Thus, Sir, when I mention in the paragraph I have just now read, ‘ The artful and open attacks of the enemies of our constitution, the enemies of our present happy establishment, the terrors which are pronounced against those who dare endangering our liberties;’ why must all these and the like expressions be applied to a minister, when there are such numbers of popish emissaries, jacobites and non-jurors, to whom these expressions by a natural and unforced construction are very applicable? Does not the supposition of such an innuendo, reflect highly upon a minister who has given no occasion for it? Is a man seditious, who speaks in plain and open terms against the enemies of our constitution and country? or, is it impossible to make use of those words, without comprehending under them, persons whom it is criminal to attack? By this way of arguing, it is not in the power of words to be free from unwarrantable hints and innuendoes. Thus, Sir, in the next paragraph, where mention is made, of ‘ indirect arts and mean subtleties practised to weaken our securities:’ are not these words as general as possible, applicable to multitudes of open enemies and disaffected persons, both in foreign dominions and in her majesty's kingdoms? or will any one say that indirect arts and mean subtleties can be practised only by one man in the kingdom? What there are two different interpretations to be put upon any expression, will any gentleman of candour and humanity regard that only which carries guilt in it? especially when the interpretation which must render such expression criminal, is violent and forced, whereas the other that renders them innocent, is obvious and natural? I shall, after this, beg leave to read, in this light, the next paragraph marked in the Crisis, p. 2.

‘ I flatter myself that if the passages which happened in those days, the resolutions of the nation thereupon, and the just provisions made from time to time, against our falling into the same disasters, were fairly stated and laid in one view, all indirect arts and mean subtleties practised to weaken our securities would be frustrated, and vanish before the glaring light of law and reason.’

“ I cannot conceive why the other paragraph that follows page 2d and 3d, should have been marked, since it is no crime, nor any way tends to sedition, to speak in honour of parliament, or to quote acts of parliament. Here it is :

I shall not govern myself, on this occasion, by the partial relations of particular persons or parties, but by the sense of the whole people, by the sense of the Houses of Lords and Commons, the representative body of the whole nation; in whose resolutions, according to the different state of things, the constitution of the kingdom, by those who had the dearest stakes in it, has been from time to time plainly, impartially and pathetically expressed.

The next passage is in the Crisis, p. 27. And all this hath been done in so open a manner, and in so expressive and plain terms, that one cannot but think that our popish or cobite party, who have been of late so bold, both in writing and speaking against the settlement of the crown of Great Britain in the protestant line, and cannot possibly plead ignorance of these things, must have some unaccountable encouragement for their support.

"I here say that those who write or speak boldly and knowingly contrary to the tenor of acts of parliament, which I have before cited, and which are now in force, must have some unaccountable encouragement for their support; and the reason is very plain, because such a person is declared liable to the most severe penalties who does act or speak after such a manner; But whether this unaccountable encouragement comes from the Pretender himself, the French court, or the dukes of Orleans or Savoy, whose interest it may be to give them such encouragement, I do not pretend to determine: And I hope it will not be said that I do pretend to account for such an encouragement which I do here plainly declare to be unaccountable.

"The two next paragraphs are only a narrative or relation of matters of fact, which I conceived I might set down with that liberty which is allowed to the most common news-writer. Here they follow.

"If the beating the enemy in the field, and being too vigilant for their councils in foreign courts, were effectual means towards ending the war, and reducing them to a condition too low for giving fresh disturbance to Europe, the duke of Marlborough took just measures: But, however unaccountable it may appear to posterity, that general was not permitted to enjoy the fruits of his glorious labours: But, as France changed her generals for want of success in their conduct; so Britain changes hers, after an uninterrupted series of conquest. The minds of the people, against all common sense, are debauched with impressions of the duke's affectation of prolonging the war for his own glory; and his adversaries attack a reputation which could not well be impaired, without sullying the glory of Great Britain itself. His enemies were not to be softened by that consideration; he is dismissed, and soon after a cessation of arms between Great Britain and France is published at the head of the armies. The British, in the midst of the enemies garrisons, withdraw themselves from their confederates. The French, now no longer having the Britons, or their great leader to fear, affect no more strong garrisons and fortified camps, but attack and rout the earl of Albemarle at Denain, and necessitate the brave prince Eugene to abandon Landrecy, a place of such importance that it gave entrance into the heart of France. Or which the French king was so sensible, that before he was recovered from his fright, he acknowledged he owed in a manner his crown, to the suspension of arms between him and Great Britain. The suspension is followed by a treaty of Peace at Utrecht. The Peace is concluded between Great Britain and France, and between France and the States-General. The emperor and the empire continue the war? I shall not presume to enter into an examination of the articles of Peace between us and France; but there can be no crime in affirming (if it be a truth) that the house of Bourbon is at this juncture become more formidable, and bids fairer for an universal monarchy, and to engross the whole trade of Europe, than it did before the war.—All the world knows with what frankness the Dutch have been treated to deliver up Traerbach to the imperialists, as an expedient for the French to besiege it; because forsooth it lies convenient for their incursions upon the empire. This extravagant demand must give a melancholy prospect to other nations.

"If it be a crime to speak honourably of the duke of Marlborough, it is a crime that I must always be guilty of, and it is that which instead of denoting me a stirrer up of sedition, declares me to be a lover of my country. If I am rightly informed, that great man, when a circumstance relating to him was under your consideration during the last session of parliament, was mentioned in this place, not only with deference and respect, but with the highest encomiums by the most eminent members of this House. And I hope the most private man may take the liberty of expressing his gratitude to the duke of Marlborough, since there is no private man in England who is not obliged to him. Those who are represented as his adversaries and enemies, are only those who will always be so; I mean such who are friends to the Pretender and the French king, whose hopes he hath often and gloriously defeated. If any one question what I have said concerning the French king's letter, upon the raising of the siege of Landrecy, let him read that letter, and see what other interpretation can be put upon it.

"The last Sentence of this Paragraph I think defends itself, and is founded upon this maxim, which I fancy no gentleman will deny, That it is not a crime to speak the truth. Here is what follows in the 31st and 32d pages of the Crisis.

"The most important article between France and England, is the demolition of Dunkirk; which they have begun contemptuously and ‘arbitrarily their own way. The mole and harbour, which only are dreadful to us, are yet untouched; and just suspicions given that they ever will be.’

‘Sir, I always postpone my own private safety to that of my country; and therefore heartily wish that I lay open to the censure of this House for what I have here advanced. I say, sir, that I heartily wish, though I might have fared the worse for it at this time, that the event did not justify those apprehensions, which I have here, and in other papers expressed, in relation to Dunkirk. I have regulated my thoughts on that subject, by the treaty of Peace which has been published for the perusal of her majesty's subjects. It was thereby stipulated, that the mole and harbour should be first demolished: But instead of this, the French (for it is there I lay the blame) have only demolished the fortifications towards the land; and thus as I have said in another place, the queen's garrison is exposed, by levelling the works, to the mercy of the French; and the mole and harbour, which were first to be demolished, stand as they did. Will any one say that this proceeding of the French, so contrary to what was stipulated by the articles of Peace, is not begun contemptuously and arbitrarily their own way? The time stipulated by the same treaty for the demolition of the mole and harbour, is long since elapsed; and no longer since than a week ago, as I can prove by incontestable evidence, they were actually repairing that very mole, which should have been long before this a heap of ruins. These and many other reasons which I forbear insisting upon, will, I hope, explain what I have said in this paragraph, to every gentleman's satisfaction. Here is that which follows marked in the Crisis, p. 32.

‘Landau and Fribourg are taken, and in case there is no intermediate Peace, which may still be more immediately fatal to us, 300,000 French may be ready in the Spring to invade the empire, and restore the elector of Bavaria to his forfeited dominions.’

‘Will any one say there was no danger to be apprehended from a Peace, which was treating, according to our public accounts, without her majesty's interposition? and when we had reason to fear that her majesty's ministers had no opportunity given them of promoting any thing in it for the good of their country, as not being let into the secret. Have not our public prints told us, that England was not mentioned in the Treaty? Do they not speak of private articles, reciprocal complaisances, and several other particulars, which prove that the apprehensions I here mention were not altogether groundless?’

‘The next paragraph is only matter of fact, and an inference from it, which cannot be controverted. Here it is,

‘These incidents happen when the capital of Austria, the residence of his imperial majesty, is visited with the plague. The mole of that House is likely to terminate in himself; and should it please God to take him off, and no king of the Romans chosen, a prince of the House of Bourbon would be fair for the imperial dignity; after whose day, farewell liberty, Europe would be French. Here is the paragraph that follows:

‘But the scene is not yet closed; Portugal, which during the war, supplied to us the peace of Spain, by sending us vast quantities of goods in exchange for our woollen manufactures, is only at present a suspension of arms for us protection, which suspension may possibly last no longer than till the Catalonians are reduced; and who knows but the old pretensions of Spain to Portugal may be then revived? I mention the Catalonians, but who can name the Catalonians without a tear! Brave unhappy people! drawn into the war by the encouragement of the maritime powers, from which only a nation encompassed by land by France and Spain could hope for relief and protection, now abandoned and exposed to the resentment of an enraged prince, whose person and interest they have always opposed; and yet still so fond of their ancient liberties, that though hemmed up in a nook of land by the forces of the two crowns, and closely besieged in Barcelona, they chuse rather, like their countrymen the famous Sanguines of old, to perish with their wives and children, than live in slavery. Did the French king with a conquering sword in his hand, ever abandon the least and most considerable of all his allies? No. When these very Catalonians had assisted him against the king of Spain, he did not give up his power of treating, till he had made the most honourable conditions for them: Not a single man amongst them was then hurt, either in his person or privileges; but now—poor unhappy Catalonians, worthy of a better fate! Good and gracious God! To whom shall be attributed the loss of this brave people? Dreadful the doom of those who shall in the sight be esteemed their destroyers!’

‘I am at a loss with myself whether the gentleman marked out this paragraph for taking pity on the poor Catalonians, or for having spoken honourably of the French king. Common humanity will, I hope, be my excuse for the first, and I shall trust to that gentleman's known good nature to pardon me for the latter.’

‘But here the gentleman finds another inendo, and has marked out a seditious blank: that is in reality, he is very angry with me, not for any thing I have said, but for something I have not said: or rather, because I have not written what he would have had me write. But if he finds both my silence and my words criminal, I must confess I do not know how to please him.

‘Sir, I am afraid I have tired out the patience of this honourable house, in explaining these particulars, especially since I think they do sufficiently explain themselves to any impartial and unprejudiced reader. As for the remaining part of the Crisis which has been marked, ve examined it very carefully, and am very much perplexed to find out the passages in it which can have given any manner of offence. The greatest part of it consists of faithful quotations out of history, that may give us an abhorrence of popery, and of a popish successor, with several additional arguments drawn from the nature of the Roman Catholic religion, which are the same which have ever been made out against it since the reformation. There are also several considerations from the present situation of affairs in Europe, that may contribute to strengthen our resolutions in the defence of the protestant succession as established by our laws. I have declared again and again in this part of the book as well as several of the foregoing parts of it, that I did inculcate nothing but a due observance of the laws of the land, and a vigorous exertion of ourselves in the defence and preservation of them. Whatever warmth or spirit I have endeavoured to inspire my readers with, I have declared over and over, that it is for the maintenance of those points which are established by acts of parliament and the laws of the country. I must confess, sir, that I am very much at a loss to imagine why my accuser has laid his finger upon these passages which are so manifestly written in favour of the constitution, and in opposition to popery and the Pretender. He must have entertained very mean opinion of a British House of Commons if he could think that such passages would bring their displeasure upon me: and I am verily persuaded that if gentlemen will be so kind to hear them with attention, they will be more apt to conceive an indignation against the person who has charged them as criminal, than against him who writ them. I shall only give leave to take notice of one particular passage in them, because it is a full answer to an insinuation made against me by one who spoke in a former debate relating to this subject. An honourable member was pleased to say that I would insinuate the gentlemen of England were against the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover. Were this my thought, I would give up that cause as desperate. I say, Sir, if the gentlemen of England were just in it, all that he or any body else could do to it, would be ineffectual. But, Sir, to show you that I could not be so weak and unjust as to make this wicked suggestion, I beg leave to read these following words.—“A divided people as we are, those who are for the House of Hanover are infinitely superior in number, wealth, courage, and all arts military and civil, to those in the contrary interest. If that honourable person say, that the gentlemen of England do not fall within this description? Sir, my greatest hope this day is that the gentlemen of England, who are above being prejudiced by any false reports which are made of me, or by any sordid motives that might have an influence upon men of base and mercenary minds. But, Sir, I was going to read to you the remaining part of the Crisis,

as I find it marked upon your table; but after having spoke thus much of it, I shall leave it to its own justification.*

‘But to bring these several facts and circumstances home, we must observe that the person who seems to be the most favoured by the French king in the late treaties, is the duke of Savoy, who is made king of Sicily; and considering also the enlargement of his territories on the continent, by cession from the emperor, is become the most powerful prince in Italy. This prince put in his claim to the crown of England, in the right of his wife, a daughter of the late dutchess of Orleans, sister to our late king Charles the second, at the time of settling the crown of England on the House of Hanover. This prince, a man of as great address and capacity as any now living, is supposed to have entered into a secret and strict alliance with the House of Bourbon, and may therefore very well add to our fears of a popish successor. Things standing thus, and the House of Bourbon being in the actual possession of France and Spain, bidding fair for the conquest of Germany, or in peace and good understanding with it; what have Great Britain and Holland to hope from, but the mercy of France? What else have we to prevent the Pretender’s being imposed on us, when France shall think fit; nay, in failure of one Pretender, he has in his quiver a succession of them; the dutchess of Savoy, or her sons, or the Dauphin her grandson. The last named cannot be many years from the throne of France.—In the next place how are we disposed at home for the reception of such an attempt? The passions of many, which were raised so high by an impudent suggestion of the church’s danger, seem to have subsided into a lethargic unconcern for every thing else; harmless men are ashamed to own, how grossly they have been imposed upon; and instead of resenting the abuse, are willing to overlook it, with a certain reluctance against being moved at any thing else; least they should fall into the mortification of being misled a second time. Many who are above being blinded by popular noise and outcry, yet seem to think the warmth and zeal of a public spirit to be little better than a romantic heat of brain. Treasonable books lately dispersed amongst us, that have apparently struck at the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover, have passed almost without observation from the generality of the people; subtle queries have been published about the birth of a certain person; which certain person every body knows to be intended for the Pretender; the Author of the Conduct of the Allies has dared to drop insinuations about altering the Succession; and a late treasonable book, on the subject of Hereditary Right, has published the will of king Henry the eighth, which seems to be intended as a pattern for the like occasion. The conversion of the Pretender to our religion, has been occasionally reported, and contradicted, according to the reception it met with among the soft fools, who give that gross story a hearing: The unhappy prince, whose son the Pretender calls himself, is a memorable instance, how much such conversions are to be depended upon. King James, when duke of York, for a long time professed himself a Protestant; and even not long before his accession to the crown, several persons had actions brought against them for saying he was a papist, and exorbitant damages given and recovered; in a word, from the practice of all papists, that have come to protestant thrones, upon pretence of embracing the reformed religion, we have reason to believe they have dispensations from Rome to personate any thing, for the service of that church. A popish prince will never think himself obliged by the most solemn, even the coronation oath, to his Protestant subjects. All oaths are as insignificant and as soon forgotten, as the services done by such Protestant subjects.—King James, when duke of York, was preserved from the bill of exclusion, by the church of England, and particularly its bishops; when he came to the crown, the church was soon insulted and outraged by him, and her prelates committed to the Tower. Has not a neighbouring prince cruelly treated and banished his Protestant subjects who preserved the crown on his head? Did not the princess Mary promise the men of Suffolk, who joined with her against the lady Jane Grey, that she would make no alteration in the religion established by her brother king Edward the 6th? And yet as soon as she came to the crown, by the assistance even of Suffolk men, she filled all England, and in a particular manner that county, with the flames of martyrs. The cruelties of that reign were such, that multitudes of men, women and children were burnt for being zealous professors of the gospel of the Lord Jesus. In short, nothing less than this can be expected from a popish prince; both clergy and laity must share the same fate, all universally must submit to the fiery trial, or renounce their religion. Our bishops and clergy must all lose their spiritual preferments, or submit to antichristian tyranny; And should they submit to every thing they most notwithstanding part from their wives and children, which, according to the church of Rome, are harlots and spurious. The laity, possessed of lands that formerly belonged to the Roman Catholic clergy, must resign their estates, and perhaps be made accountable for the profits received.—What can be more moving, than to reflect upon the barbarous cruelties of papists beyond all example: And these not accidental, or the sudden effects of passion or provocation, but the settled result of their religion and their consciences. Above 100,000 men, women and children were murdered in the massacre of Ireland. How hot and terrible were the persecutions of Protestants in France and Savoy? How frequent were the massacres of the Protestants through the whole kingdom of France when they were under the protection of the then laws of that country? How barbarous, in a particular manner, was the massacre of Paris, at the marriage of the king of Navarre, the French king's grandfather, a Protestant, with the sister of Charles the 9th, where the famous admiral of France, the great Coligny, the glorious asserter of the Protestant interest, was inhumanly murdered, and the body of that hero dragged naked about the streets, and this by the direction of the king himself, who had but just before most generously given him, from his own mouth, assurance of his protection? Ten thousand Protestants without distinction of quality, age or sex, were put to the sword at the same time; the king of Navarre himself narrowly escaped the disaster, his mother the queen of Navarre having not long before been possessed by the same faction. These are some instances of what must ever be expected. No obligations on our side, no humanity or moral probity on theirs, are of any weight; their very religion forces them, upon pain of damnation, to forget and cancel the former, and to extinguish all remains of the latter. Good God! To what are they reserved, who have nothing to expect but what such a religion can afford them? It cannot therefore be too often repeated. We should consider, over and over again, that should the chain of the Protestant Succession be once broke as upon, though the Pretender should be laid aside, the next of the blood royal is the duchess of Savoy, after her, her two sons; after them, the present dauphin of France; the next in succession to him, the queen of Spain, and her heirs; in default of them, the duke of Orleans, and his heirs, and most of the other princes of the blood of France, all papists, who may be enabled to demand preference to the house of Hanover; so that besides the probability of this kingdom's being united to, and made a province of France, the train of popish princes is so great, that if one should not complete the utter extirpation of our religion, laws and liberties, the rest would certainly do it.—And here I cannot but add what is still of more importance, and ought to be the most prevalent of all arguments, that should there be the least hopes given to a Popish successor, the life of her majesty will certainly be in most imminent danger: for there will never be wanting bloody zealots of that persuasion, that will think it meritorious to take away her majesty's life, to hasten the accession of such a successor to her throne.—The only preservation against these terrors, are the laws before mentioned relating to the settlement of the imperial crown of Great Britain. Thanks be to heaven for that settlement. The princess Sophia, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants, are the successors to her present majesty, upon her demise without issue. The way is plain before our eyes, guarded on the right hand, and on the left, by all the sanctions of God and man, and by all the ties of law and conscience. Let those who act under the present settlement, and yet pretend to dispute for an absolute hereditary right, quiet themselves with the arguments they have borrowed from popery, and teach their own consciences the art of dispensing with the most solemn oath to this establishment whilst they think themselves bound only till opportunity shall serve to introduce another. God be thanked, neither we nor our cause, stand in need of such detestable prevarication. Our cause is our happiness. Our oaths are our judgment and inclination. Honour and affection call us, without the solemnity of an oath, to defend such an establishment; but with it we have every motive that can influence the mind of man. The terrors of God, added to the demands of our country, oblige and constrain us to let our hearts and our hands follow our wishes and our consciences; and out of regard to our queen, our religion, our country, our liberty and our property, to maintain and assert the Protestant Succession in the illustrious House of Hanover. It is no time to talk with hints and inuendos, but openly and honestly to profess our sentiments before our enemies have compleated and put their designs in execution against us. As divided a people as we are, those who are for the House of Hanover, are infinitely superior in number, wealth, courage, and all arts military and civil, to those in the contrary interest; besides which, we have the laws, I say the laws on our side. And those who by their practices, whatever their professions are, have discovered themselves enemies to the constitution, and friends to the Pretender, cannot make a step farther without being guilty of Treason, without standing in broad day-light, confessed criminals against their injured queen and country.—When the people were in a ferment, when faction ran high, with irresistible prepossessions against every thing in its former channel, sanguine men might conceive hopes of leading them their own way. But the building erected upon that quicksand, the favour of the multitude, will sink, and be swallowed up by that treacherous ground on which the foundation was laid.—It is easy to project the subversion of a people when men see them unaccountably turned for their own destruction; but not so easy to effect that ruin, when they are come to themselves, and are sensibly and reasonably affected with thoughts for their preservation. We cannot help it, if so many thousands of our brave brethren, who laid down their lives against the power of France, have died in vain; but we may value our own lives dearly like honest men. Whatever may befall the glory and wealth of Great Britain, let us struggle to the last drop of our blood for its religion and liberty. The banner under which we are to enter this conflict, whenever we are called to it, are the laws mentioned in this discourse; when we do not keep them in sight, we have no colours to fly to, no discipline to preserve us, but are devoted, and have given ourselves up to slaughter and confusion.—While we act manfully under them, we have given reason to expect the blessing and assistance of heaven on its own cause, which it has so manifestly acknowledged to be such by our many wonderful deliverances, when all human assistances and ordinary means of succour seemed irrevocably removed. We have no pretensions to the divine favour, but from our firm adherence to that settlement, which he has, by so many wonders and blessings, after such great difficulties and misfortunes, bestowed upon us, and which we have in his sight, and with the invocation of his sacred name, after preparing ourselves at his altar, so frequently and solemnly sworn to defend. This plain, unperplexed, unalterable rule for our conduct, is visibly the work of his hand to a favoured people. Her majesty's parliamentary title, and the Succession in the illustrious House of Hanover, is the Ark of God to Great Britain, and, like that of old, carries death to the profane hand that shall dare to touch it.

“ I come now to the Close of The Englishman, where I find the following paragraph marked.

“ But if God spares the good queen's life from such secret attempts as we have too much reason to fear, I doubt not but to see her judge rightly of such pretences. Though flattery carries witchcraft, yet when she shall see that these men, instead of supporting her government with their interest, cannot carry their elections but by representing all others as under her displeasure; when she shall see that they overbear the rights of corporations by the impertinent interposition of her power and name; when she shall see that those large bodies of men which the Examiner and others expose and exasperate, as men whom the queen hates, are so loth to be alienated from their hope in her, that their being actually cast from all preferments and places, hath not made them guilty of one seditious, or even undutiful action. When she shall see that those noisy men who embarrass the nation in every question, with calling out the Church, are but like the weather-cocks and clappers of the steeple; and that the sober, and laborious, and peaceable church-men, are its real support and pillars. When a little more time shall bring out things that begin to appear pretty plain already; then the queen will shew selfish men that would engross her favour, that she will be the mother of all her people; and as in spite of these men's studied provocations, she hath their hearts and affections, so she will rule with equal justice towards all. If the nation will be so wise as to lay aside parties and party quarrels, she ' will have no need to keep them up, but employ all men according as the law makes them qualified, and their virtues and parts make them fit. But if several interests, and opinions, and humours shall still continue our parties (as the Examiner's violence and partiality hath done more to sharpen them, than to take off the edge) then she will let all see, that her crown is not to be sunk down to be a partizan of either side, so as to take these to be her friends and the other enemies; but that she is over both, and will use either in their turns, according as they are fittest for the service she hath for them at that time. And for those who shall dare to insult and exasperate the other as enemies, they are sycophants instead of friends; and rob her of her best treasure, which is the love of her people.'

" I have heard some exceptions taken to the two or three lines of this paragraph where I say, ' If God spares the good queen's life from such secret attempts as we have too much reason to fear: ' but as to this passage, I think it is sufficiently explained by a paragraph which I shall beg leave to read in the 35th page of The Crisis.

' And here I cannot but add what is still of more importance, and ought to be the most prevalent of all arguments, that should there be the least hopes given to a Popish Successor, the life of her majesty will certainly be in most imminent danger: for there will never be wanting bloody zealots of that persuasion, that will think it meritorious to take away her life, to hasten the accession of such a successor to her throne.'

" The remaining part of this paragraph, is nothing else but the picture of an excellent princess, who notwithstanding the suggestions of unreasonable men, will still maintain in her the character of the best of sovereigns, by shewing herself the mother of all her people. If any inuendo can possibly be found in this paragraph, it can only affect those who would incline her royal heart to make an unjust distinction among her subjects.

" The next paragraph is in the 6th page of the quarto edition of The Englishman, in these words:

' I insist the more upon these Revolution principles, (as they are scornfully called now-a-days) not only because there never was more need of them than at this time, but because the best and greatest part of the clergy (especially those placed in eminent stations) have in all ages, so far as relates to our nation, and as far as my small reading informs me, been ready and hearty assertors of the privileges and properties of the people; and why the whole body should not be now, is past my comprehension.'

" I suppose my accuser would again insinuate by this paragraph, for reasons best known to himself, that I speak disrespectfully of the clergy: but how he will be able to make this out, from an eulogium which is given to their past conduct, and a presumption that their future will be conformable to it, is past my comprehension. I suppose he will not deny, notwithstanding his new and inexpressible tenderness for the clergy of the Church of England, that there are among them, some nonjurors and asserters of hereditary right, in opposition to the laws of their country.

" The following paragraph in the 10th page, concerning Dunkirk, has already received its answer. Here it is.

' Toby is mistaken: at this day it is in a more dangerous condition as to England, than it was when I writ about the importance of it. For I insisted upon the demolition of the mole and harbour; and instead of that, they have, as exactly as if Mr. Tugge's memorial had been the direction in this case, demolished the works, and left the harbour its sluices, and all its accesss that concern us, our safety and our trade, in good condition. That is, they have destroyed the works in possession of the British garrison, to make that garrison useless, and put off the demolition of the harbour until time shall serve.'

" The three next paragraphs are taken out of page 17; and are only matters of fact, which may be proved out of several books and addresses, as well as from common discourse, to which I dare say every gentleman in this House has been a witness. I shall therefore appeal from any little sophistical cavils which may be made against them, to the honour and veracity of those gentlemen before whom I have now the happiness to vindicate myself. I will only read them, and appeal to every gentleman's own conscience for the truth of them.

' This is not all; for before this run upon the bank, a man was thought to argue very well that would say, that for the better consumption and exportation of British manufactures, it was absolutely necessary to give both Spains to the friendly House of Bourbon: but lest a great monarch should be tempted by ambition, to use that trust for his own, rather than our interest, it would be expedient to keep a check upon him by dismissing all our allies. For our further security within ourselves and to prevent all invasions on liberty and property, one might very lately have said, the dignity and authority of parliaments could not be better strengthened, than by placing a despotic power in the sovereign.—We have so little public spirit amongst us, that these things passed like mathematical truths, until each man grew afraid for his own pocket.—A man who was uneasy before this accident, for the public welfare; and has observed nothing since that puts us in a better condition; a man, I say, who from only hearing the news contradicted, that the Pretender was a coming, cannot infer that he may not still come, ought to be excused for writing as I have and do, to raise in his fellow-subjects a just concern for those civil and religious rights, which they at present enjoy above all other nations.'

“The next paragraph is taken out of the 18th and 19th pages of the same book: and as it relates to Dunkirk has been already explained. Here it is.

“The queen's garrison is exposed by levelling the works to the mercy of the French: and the mole and harbour, which were first to be demolished, stand as they did, the terror of the British nation. Thus, Sir, as the interest of her majesty and her people are inseparable, I think I have behaved myself like a dutiful subject, in complaining of this open violation of her treaty in the most important article of it.

“I am now come to the last paragraph, in the 27d page of the same book, as follows.

“I wish, thirdly, That his electoral highness of Hanover would be so grateful as to signify to all the world, the perfect good understanding he has with the Court of England, in as plain terms as her majesty was pleased to declare she had with that House on her part. This last circumstance, dear Jack, would be very pleasing to all of us who are churchmen, because if the elector should be any way disobliged, I am confident her majesty has given no cause for it; and I cannot but attribute any misunderstanding, if such there should be, to the artifices of some new converts, who, for ought I know, may still be Presbyterians in their hearts.”

“I do not know whether I have been more troubled or surprized, to hear a gentleman affirm that these words, by an inuendo, contradict what her majesty had affirmed from the throne. This accusation may be put in such very hard words, as may incline those to be displeas'd with me, who attend more to the accusation itself, than to the grounds I have given for it. The gentleman who brought it against me, would artificially have stopped in the middle of the paragraph, had not he been put upon hearing the whole read out; wherein I positively assert that if the elector should be any way disobliged, I am confident her majesty has given no occasion for it. I say, Sir, I have positively asserted in the words which immediately follow those which were objected to me, that if the Elector of Hanover should be any way disobliged, I am confident her majesty has given no occasion for it. And the reason why I was so positive in this assertion, is, because her majesty, as I before said, was pleased to declare in plain terms, that she had a perfect good understanding with the House of Hanover.

“And now, Sir, is there a fault, after this, in wishing that his electoral highness would be so grateful as to signify to all the world, the perfect good understanding he has with the Court of England. It is certain such a declaration as this would quiet the minds of all her majesty's subjects upon this important article; and why should it be criminal in me to wish for that, which would so manifestly redound to the peace of our country? Let every gentleman ask his own heart, whether he would not be glad that the elector made such a declaration as is here mentioned. And shall any man be esteem'd an offender for wishing that which every man would be glad of? If there be any reflection in this passage, it is plain that it does not fall upon her majesty; and I question not but that in a point of this nature, gentlemen will be so just as to keep my plain and express words, and not to force a guilty interpretation upon a passage which has a natural interpretation that is innocent.

“I have now explained those several paragraphs which have been laid to my charge, and that in the shortest manner I was able; reserving to myself the liberty of producing any further reasons, for the defence of any particular passage, as the objections of my accusers and my own justification shall further require.

“I must declare, Sir, that upon the perusal of those paragraphs which have been marked against me, I have been more puzzled to know why I ought to defend them, than how they ought to be defended? And I dare appeal to any gentleman who is used to read pamphlets, whether he has seen any of either side for some years past, that have been written with more caution, or more thoroughly guarded against giving any occasion of just offence.

“Upon the whole matter, I do humbly conceive that no words which I have made use of can be censured as criminal, in the candid and natural interpretation of them, and can only be construed as such by distant implications and far-fetched inuendoes. I shall therefore beg leave to produce the authority of a very great man, with reference to accusations of this nature: since it is impossible for me to express myself with so much judgment and learning upon this subject, as I find it already done to my hand. The passages I mention, are in the Speech of the now Lord Chancellor of England, as I find them in doctor Sacheverell's Trial, in the following words:

“My Lords; if there be a double sense, in either of which these words are equally capable of being understood; if in one sense the Doctor's assertion be undeniably clear, but in the other some doubt might arise whether his words be criminal or not, the law of England is more merciful than to make any man a criminal, by construing his words against the natural import of them, in the worst sense. This is the great justice and clemency of our law in every man's case.” And a little lower.

“My Lords; If the manner of this solemn Prosecution has not altered the nature of things, I hope I may insist, without putting in a claim of right in behalf of all the factious and seditious people in the kingdom, to revile the government at pleasure, that by the happy constitution under which we live, a subject of England is not to be made criminal by a laboured construction of doubtful words; or, when that cannot serve, by departing from his words, and resorting to his meaning. Too many instances there were of

" After these excellent words of this great man, every thing I can say will appear very flat and low ; for which reason I shall give you but very little further trouble. I have heard it said in this place, that no private man ought to take the liberty of expressing his thoughts as I have done, in matters relating to the administration. I do own, that no private man ought to take a liberty which is against the laws of the land. But, Sir, I presume that the liberty I have taken, is a legal liberty ; and obnoxious to no penalty in any court of justice. If it had, I cannot believe that this extraordinary method would have been made use of, to distress me upon that account. And why should I here suffer for having done that, which perhaps in a future trial would not be judged criminal by the laws of the land ? Why should I see persons, whose particular province it is to prosecute Seditious Writers in the courts of justice, employing their eloquence against me in this place ? I think that I have not offended against any law in being : I think that I have taken no more liberty than what is consistent with the laws of the land : if I have, let me be tried by those laws. Is not the executive power sufficiently armed to inflict a proper punishment on all kinds of criminals ? Why then should one part of the legislative power, take this executive power into its own hands ? But, Sir, I throw myself upon the honour of this House, who are able, as well as obliged, to skreen any Commoner of England from the wrath of the most powerful man in it ; and who will never sacrifice a member of their own body, to the resentments of any single minister."

" • Temple, 7 o'clock, March 18.

" Dear Prue ; I have made my defence, and am ordered to withdraw. Addison was sent out after me, by my friends, to bid me not be seen till I heard what will be the censure. Nothing can happen to my condition in private the worse ; and I have busied myself enough for the public." Steele to his Wife. See his Epistolary Correspondence by Nichols, vol. 1. p. 320. London, 1809.

Mr. Pope, in a letter to Congreve, March 19, 1713-14, says, " Yesterday Mr. Steele's affair was decided. I am sorry I can be of no other opinion than you, as to his whole carriage and writings of late. But certainly he has not only been punished by others, but suffered much even from his own party, in the point of character, nor (I believe) received any amends in that of interest, as yet ; whatever may be his prospects in future. This gentleman, among a thousand others, is a great instance of the fate of all who are carried away by party spirit, of any side. I wish all violence may succeed as ill ; but am really amazed that so much of that sour and pernicious quality should be joined with so much natural good humour as I think Mr. Steele is possessed of."

Here I ended in the House. Most of what said was put into my mouth by my friends, whose kindness and discretion prevented my adding to these forcible arguments many honest truths, which they thought would authorize a severity from the House to me, rather than secure me against their resentment. I cannot, as an indifferent man, dare to assert what I would have done, under the sanction of a member of parliament, speaking in parliament. The happiness of convincing some honest gentlemen who were against me, was not to be my fate : but, (barring that I made the best and most respectful obeisance I could to the Speaker) with a very awkward and unwilling air I withdrew ; and the next news I heard was, that I was expelled.

It is justice due to human nature, to signify to an offender why he is punished. It is a justice to inform the meanest man in human society, why he is distinguished from the rest to his disadvantage ; it is a Christian duty to give him the contrition he ought to have, and work in him a repentance from arguments towards his conviction. But the House, without letting me hear one reason, or shadow of an argument to prove me seditious, have peremptorily pronounced me so.

To hear a man speak, without being moved by what he says, or-controverting it before Sentence, is only to give exercise to an hard heart ; a ridiculous candour, that is an aggravation of an injury, by putting on the face of justice. I shall therefore, as briefly as I can, consider the matter yet further : for I am now as much concerned to show why this Sentence should not be a Reproach to me now it is passed, as I was before to speak against its being pronounced.

It may be objected, that I am sure to come off, when I who am the criminal, am also to be the judge. I may make the same objections against the determination of the House, they who were the judges, were also the accusers. In the first place I aver, that if I had, as indeed I have not, been guilty of raising groundless fears to the disadvantage of the ministry, it is less the part of the House of Commons, than any other body of men, to be inquisitors in favour of them. Their more graceful province had been to have encouraged what I had to say, if I had had objections, rather than suppressed me for offering at it. It had been well, after such a search, to have chastised or approved the man accused, according to his deserts. But my fate is so extraordinary, that I am punished by the House of Commons, (where freedom of speech is an essential privilege) for saying what was criminal no where else. Had what I have written been spoken in the House of Commons, no man will pretend to say it had been criminal : how then when it was innocent in another place, came it to be criminal by being produced there ? I was safe when in circumstances that rendered me more accountable, and run into danger by being privileged.

But I flatter myself that I shall convince all my fellow subjects of my innocence from the ving circumstances, allowed me to be of it in all trials of this nature. From the moral character of the offender, the motive to offence, and the character of the persons appear for him, opposed to those who are just him. There are some points to be added, which bear hard against the prisoner at bar; and we must grant this by way of excusing and avoiding, and give it up, that the defendant has been as great a libertine as a sinner. We will suppose then a witness giving account of him, who, if he spoke true, should say as follows:

I have been long acquainted with Mr. Steele, who is accused as a malicious writer; I can give an account of him (from what he is wont to confess to us his private friends) what is the chief motive of his first appearing in print. Besides this, I have read every thing he has writ or published. He first became an author when an ensign in the guards, a way of life exposed to much irregularity; and being thoroughly convinced of many things, of which he had repented, and which he more often repeated, he writ, for his own private use, a little book called "The Christian Hero," with design principally to fix upon his own mind a strong impression of virtue and religion, in opposition to a stronger propensity towards warrantable pleasures. This secret admonition was too weak; he therefore printed the book with his name, in hopes that a standing testimony against himself, and the eyes of the world, (that is to say of his acquaintance) upon him in a new light, might curb his desires, and make him ashamed of understanding and seeming to feel what was virtuous, and living so in the contrary a life. This had no other good effect, but that from being thought no undesigning companion, he was soon reckoned an agreeable fellow. One or two of his acquaintances thought fit to mis-use him, and try their valour upon him; and every body he measured the least levity in his words and actions, with the character of a Christian hero. Thus he found himself slighted, instead of being encouraged, for his declarations to religion; and it was now incumbent upon him to galvanise his character, for which reason he writ the comedy called "The Funeral," in which (though full of incidents that are only laughter) virtue and vice appear just as they ought to do. Nothing can make the world so fond of a man as a successful play, and this, with some particulars enlarged upon in his advantage, (for princes never bear good will in the manner others do) obtained him the notice of the king: and his name, to be provided for, was in the last table book ever printed by the glorious and immortal William the Third.—His next appearance as a Writer was in the quality of the lowest minister of state, to wit, in the office of Gazetteer. Where he worked faithfully according to order, without ever erring against the rule observed by all other scribes, to keep that paper very innocent and very insipid.

'It is believed, it was to the reproaches he heard every Gazette day against the writer of it, that the defendant owes the fortitude of being remarkably negligent of what people say, which he does not deserve; except in so great cases as this now before us. His next productions were still plays, then the Tatler, then the Spectator, then the Guardian, then the Englishman. And now, though he has published, and scribbled so very much, he may defy any man to find one leaf in all these writings which is not, in point, a defence against this imputation, to find one leaf which does not mediately or immediately tend to the honour of the queen, or the service of the nobility and gentry, or which is not particularly respectful to the Universities. Farther this witness saiyeth not.'

When a man is accused, it is allowable not only to say as much as will refute his adversary, but if he can, he may assert things of himself praise worthy, which ought not to be called vanity in him, but justice against his opponent, by proving it is not only false what is said as to the fault laid to his charge, but also that he has exerted the contrary virtue.

You may observe that the Votes of the 18th of March imply, that the Writings were under consideration, as containing several paragraphs 'Tending to sedition, highly reflecting upon her majesty, and arraigning her majesty's administration and government.' There was not one argument used to support this heavy accusation against the member; but I suppose, upon consideration, that his reflecting upon the queen so directly, and arraigning her administration and government, was just the quite contrary to what he had done, the ill behaviour towards her majesty is in the resolution scattered among her subjects, and it was thought, since it was all equally true, it would be expedient to withdraw the offence, and for the amusement of the vulgar, to say more diffusively, that the Pamphlets were scandalous and seditious libels, containing 'Many expressions highly reflecting upon her majesty, and upon the nobility, gentry, clergy, and universities of this kingdom, maliciously insinuating that the Protestant Succession is in danger under her majesty's administration, and tending to alienate the affections of her majesty's good subjects, and to create jealousies and divisions among them.'

This is a very pleasant proceeding. The indictment before them was that, the accused member had reflected upon the queen; aye marry has he, say they, and upon the nobility and gentry, clergy and universities, and he did this also with a malicious intimation, that the Succession was in danger under her majesty's administration, and so forth. What need was there the man should be guilty of more than he was indicted for? Let this resolve be taken out of its formality, and it is just as if they had said he has been guilty of treason, and also of ill manners. But the bundle of offences was only to make a hue and cry, and the business was, that he should be marked; and as they well knew from the general corruption and meanness of the world, that if the crimes did not distinctly hurt every sort of people, they would not be zealous enough for the sake of the queen only, to vilify and distress the accused man: But the Succession, say they, he says is in danger 'under her majesty's administration': this phrase is ambiguous, and evasive, it retains the offence against the queen, only to hide ministers. This is a very thin mask, for it is no help to them; if any man should, in a proper place, have any thing to object to their conduct; it would be no answer to urge against such an impeachment, that this was asserting ill things are done under her majesty's administration. All manner of crimes are committed under every prince's administration, but for that reason are those princes to be loaded with the guilt? Or would a man that should complain of those crimes, be supposed to intend treasonably, or to assert that they are owing to his prince's administration? Should a man be robbed, and when he asked for a warrant against the offender he be answered by the magistrate, it is arraiging her majesty's administration to report any such thing? If any epithets may be added to any persons and things, provided they add the words, 'under her majesty's administration,' approbation and blame in those that use them will be both alike, and 'safe, honourable,' or any other adjectives will lose their force, as well as the words, 'seditious and scandalous.' It is very possible the worst designs imaginable may be laid, under her majesty's administration, and her sacred majesty's honour no way impaired, as she, without disparagement to her wisdom it may be supposed, may not be conscious of all that passes. Therefore on this occasion, I repeat that the phrase 'under her majesty's administration,' is only a feint way of coming up to my indictment, and amusing the populace with a show of what is not in reality.

But to proceed with the Evidence on the side of the offender. Taking the words of the resolution as they lye: It would be a contradiction to all Mr. Steele's past Writings, to speak to the disadvantage of the nobility and gentry. The war that the Tatler brought upon himself, for stigmatizing and expelling sharpers out of their company, is a merit towards them, that will outweigh this allegation, though it comes whence it does. That gamesters, knaves and pickpockets are no longer the men of fashion, or mingled with so good an air among people of quality as formerly, is much owing to Mr. Steele; that a licentious treatment of a clergyman, as a clergyman, is less practised, either on the stage or in common conversation, is much owing to the contempt and ridicule on all such false and scandalous pretensions to wit, in the writings which the public has had from Mr. Steele: That an University education is reckoned a necessary qualification to an English gentleman, and the less accomplishments without those arts appear frivolous, though of great use with them, is more owing to Mr. Steele than to any other author, transcriber, or publisher, under whatever class you rank him, that ever made use of pen and ink: But it seems the chief reason in these resolutions was to be made with less a resignation than that of all their sense and conscience.

All this is as clear and known as the noon day. But it may be answered, that though as to his former writings this may be true, our author or publisher might grow more true and impertinent, and conceive new thoughts of himself, from borrowed excellencies of others, men, his correspondents; and without fear of good manners run into the crimes of which he here stands accused. I shall therefore give an account of the principal thing laid to his charge, which is The Crisis, and the occasion of its being written.

Mr. Steele happened one day to make acquaintance to a gentleman of the Temple, who fell into discourse on public transactions; and complaining that dangerous insinuations were every day thrown among the people, ended his discourse by saying, That he thought Mr. Steele, for the kind reception the world gave to what he published, might be more instrumental towards curing this evil, than any private man in England. After much solicitation, the gentleman observed, the evil seemed only to flow from mere inattention to the real obligations on which we lye towards the House of Hanover; if therefore, continued he, the laws to that purpose were reprinted together with a warm preface and a well urged peroration, it is not to be imagined what good effect it would have. Mr. Steele was immediately struck with the thought and told him, that he hoped so good a design would repay his turning his thoughts what it was for a day or two, under promise of half the sale of a work, which would be every body's reading, should produce. This was agreed and there is hardly a sentiment or main proposition in the pamphlet, which that gentleman did not put together, as lawful and warrantable to be said; and deliver into Mr. Steele's hands to be published in the dress and manner he should think fit. But Mr. Steele was not content with writing The Crisis on this plan, and revising each paragraph with this gentleman only, but he also sent different copies to men of different talents and capacities; and with all these corrections, according to the authority of the corrector, Mr. Steele with his council at his elbow put the last hand to what he published under the name of The Crisis. Very able men passed and approved every word of it. Mr. Steele therefore thought it a most necessary, seasonable and worthy action to publish it with care and caution with which it was written, appears sufficiently in that it much offended, and the author was not in the courts of justice brought to answer for the offence. But as he was to suffer for it, where of all places in the world he ought to have been encouraged and protected. But I will hasten to a better ce than all this, which is: That the genen in the List at the beginning of this Narve, gave their negative to the votes against author. That the Map at the end of this is the state of the case of Dunkirk, and lains that the true design of the French was to make Dunkirk stronger. That there are words in her majesty's Proclamation of at Barleduc, notwithstanding we have insisted upon and renewed our instances in the most pressing manner for that purse our endeavours have not proved effecal, but he still continues and is entertained re.' These circumstances of Dunkirk, and stay of the Pretender at Barleduc, do strong-maintain the grounds all men ought to have suspicion of being in imminent danger; to rove that suspicion has been the chief aim all the political writings of this author:

 it was sincere in him, will appear from letter, wherein he resigned his office to my d Treasurer:

the Right Hon. the Lord High Treasurer of Great-Britain.

RICHARD STEELE.

There is nothing here said like a malecon-tent, but like an honest man, who gave up every thing to the love of his country; where obsequiousness interfered with that, he was ready to force a temper, the most unhappily ductile, to go through all oppositions and discountenances in the way to his duty. It has been frequently said in the writings of this publisher, that all merit consists in the regulation of the will, and that is the only merit pretended to in this Apology. The wit, the eloquence, the learning in his writings, the town may as it pleases give to others, but the application of them all must be ascribed to this publisher; and I cannot but again and again repeat, that there is no man on whom a censure, with 'maliciously' in it, could fall, from whose character it could be more remote. The writings excepted against were sufficiently defended in the House, and nothing said in opposition to all that was urged in favour of the accused member. Therefore, as those accused writings were innocent, and all the drift of his other writings uncontestably virtuous, what can any gentleman say to himself, or his country, for joining in so unreasonable a vote against him? Let any gentleman consider, if the vote had been proposed to take away this man's life, with what horror would the whole assembly, except the messengers of the treasury, have rejected such a motion? But let any gentleman think on, and he will find, that this Resolution against Mr. Steele's property in the House, and his good name in the world, was only the same injustice, in a less degree. Why then would they suspend their good-nature and generosity, as Englishmen, the natural bent of their country, of running to the aid of the afflicted, to be made tools, and form a posse, to assist the messengers of the treasury against their fellow member?

No man could help plainly seeing, that Mr. Steele in these writings had gone as far as he could with any safety to his liberty or life, and that he got into the House of Commons, for no reason but to say more for the good of his deluded country: And must the House of Commons frustrate this design? There are many instances of punishments in the House for being too obsequious to the court against the people; but Mr. Steele is the first that fell there, for being audacious towards ministers, in behalf of his country.

But be all that was done against him forgotten, and the names of the actors in it, except the messengers themselves, never mentioned with this circumstance of their lives; but let those who were for an oppressed gentleman, their fellow-citizen, against as high an insolence as ever was offered to the legislature, be had in everlasting remembrance. Many of them have taken care of that for themselves, by illustrious actions; many of them, with the assistance of personal accomplishments, as well as youth, birth, and fortune, are blooming and growing in the pursuits of virtue and honour; the rest of them are men of the greatest fortunes in this realm, who are come to the evening of honourable days, and have nobler prospects in view, than to follow mercenaries with their Vote against an 'Impotent Patriot;' who attempted, from the irresistible force of the love he bears mankind, with poverty and disgrace staring in his face, to rouse his country out of a lethargy; a lethargy from which she has awaked only to behold her danger, and upon seeing it too great, has only sighed, folded her arms, and returned to her trance.*

* "The plan of The Crisis was laid and chiefly executed by Mr. Moore, of the Inner-Temple; and many hints of it came from archbishop Tenison, whose steward obtained very large subscriptions for it." Memoirs of Steele, 1731. p. 14.

"Perhaps," says Dr. Somerville, "there never was in the annals of political literature a book more universally read, or so much the subject of conversation, as The Crisis, a work beloved by the public to be written by sir Richard Steele. To prove that sir Richard was not the author of that celebrated performance, the following Letter will not only evince how the world was at that time deceived, but discover the real author, and his motives for a temporary concealment of his name and profession. The Letter is addressed to the late lord Macclesfield, then Lord Chancellor:"

' My Lord; June 6, 1716.

' I am partly encouraged by Mr. Solicitor General, but chiefly by your lordship's known candour and humanity, humbly to lay my case before you, and to beg your lordship's patronage.—When the memorial of the Sieur

Mr. Quin committed for offering a Bill: the Speaker.] March 12. The Speaker acquainted the House, That the day before he received a Letter signed by one John Quin,

' Tuggha, relative to Dunkirk, was given gratis about the streets, one of them chanced to be put into my hands; it raised in me, on the first reading, a just indignation, when I considered how my country was intended to be imposed upon in the only article of a vile Peace, that seemed to carry any value with it, and therefore upon sent to Mr. Steele immediately, who then wrote a paper called The Guardian, shewing him the memorial, I sat down to write with him the Guardian of Dunkirk. After that, I wrote several of his papers, called the Englishman, relating to our constitution, which I thought openly invaded by the then ministry; and when I found the Succession impudently attacked, not only by pamphlets and papers that came out weekly, but by a book in folio, of Hereditary Right, stuffed with quotations out of the Harlequin library, and pompously published in the Gazette; I then thought it an honest office to attempt something that might prove an antidote to that intended poison.—After many thoughts spent thereon, I observed, that the mischiefs threatened, proceeded as well from an inattention in the common people to the obligations they lay under, both civil and religious, to the most illustrious House of Hanover, as from a forgetfulness of the dangers our religion, laws and liberties were exposed to, in the reign of the late king James; and thereupon concluded, that to print the memorial relating to the abdication of that king, and the subsequent settlements of the crown, was a proper introduction, and a well urged forcible conclusion in so small a volume as to put it in the power of the meanest subject to be master of, would be the most effectual method to undeceive the common people.— This gave occasion to my writing the Crisis, which appeared under the name of Mr. Steele, and had matters been carried to extremities against that gentleman, on account of that book, my fate would certainly have been more severe than his, for my profession as a lawyer would have been esteemed an aggravation of my crime by the then ministry, and consequently of my punishment.—On his majesty's accession to the throne, I flattered myself with the hopes of having some small ray of his royal favour shine upon me; and therefore addressed myself to the late lord Halifax, desiring his lordship to do me the honour of presenting me to the king; who, with a generous frankness, was pleased to say, he would first provide for me, and then present me to his majesty: and but two days before the death of which he died, his lordship assured me he would, in a week's time, give me what would be pleasing to me—but his death prevented it.—I then addressed count Bolingbroke, who was pleased to do me the honour to

h a Petition enclosed, drawn in a form to be presented to the House, in which letter was staid a scandalous offer of a sum of money be paid to him, upon passing such an act of liment as was desired in the said Petition: ich Letter being read, the said John Quin, rdered to be sent for immediately into the dy of the serjeant at arms, and was after ds examined touching the said Letter.

March 13. The said Mr. Quin, an Irish gennan, put up a Petition to the House. "Acwledging his offence, as being committed by through inadvertency and ignorance, being ranger, and unacquainted with the method obtaining acts of parliament, and begging don of Mr. Speaker and the House, for his

I thereupon desired at I might be named by him for Register, id he has been so good as to promise me his terest in it.—If it is not too great presumption, I would humbly beg your lordship's joint terest with that of Mr. Solicitor-General in y favour; a kind word from your lordship Mr. Walpole, and my lord Townshend innot fail of success.—My business, for several years, has been wholly conveyancing in y chambers; and though it has in a manner rendered me unfit for the bar, I presume will the better qualify me for that service, atters relating to the titles and estates coming to be the chief business of that commission.—If I have no active merit in writing e above papers in defence of the Protestant ccession in the most illustrious House of anover, I assure your lordship I have a eat deal of passive: for my being known to ve written them, has turred very much to y detriment from the malice of the Tories, ut only in the business of my profession, but y other private affairs; upon which head have taken some freedom with Mr. Solicitor-general; and I hope your lordship, who appeared with the greatest fortitude at the head those who were assertors of the Succession e most illustrious House of Hanover at a e of danger in the late reign, will think it ud for me, though a subaltern in the same rious cause, to be a sufferer on that account in this.—I humbly beg a thousand pardons for this presumption; and that I may ve the honour to be, my lord, &c.

offence; and praying to be discharged out of custody." Which being read, it was ordered, That the said Quin be brought upon Monday morning next to the bar of the House; where having upon his knees, received a reprimand from the Speaker, he was ordered out of custody paying his fees.

Debate in the Lords on the State of the Nation.] March 17. The Lords taking into consideration the State of the Nation, the earls of Wharton, Nottingham, and Sunderland, the lords Cowper, Halifax, and some others, represented the danger that threatened the Protestant Succession by reason of the Pretender's not being yet removed from Lorrain, and the ill condition the affairs of Europe were left in by the late treaties of Peace, and moved, that Addresses be presented to the queen, 1. "For an Account of what steps had been taken for removing the Pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorrain, and what answers had been given by that duke. 2. An Account of the negotiations of Peace: what measures had been taken to render the Peace universal; and what obstructions her majesty had met with. 3. An Account of what instances had been made for restoring to the Catalans their ancient privileges, and all letters relating thereto. 4. An Account of the monies granted by parliament, since the year 1710, to carry on the war in Spain and Portugal." These Addresses were ordered to be presented to the queen without any opposition.

But, in the mean time, the Lord Treasurer moved for leave to bring in a Bill "for the further security of the Protestant Succession, by making it high-treason to bring any foreign troops into the kingdom," which greatly surprised many peers.

The Earl of Nottingham, who immediately perceiving the dangerous consequence of that motion, represented, "That such a bill might be turned against the very guarantees of the Protestant Succession, and so weaken that happy settlement, for the security of which the bill was pretended to be designed."

The Lord Bolingbroke replied, "He doubted not, but the noble peer, who made the motion, meant only such foreign troops, as might be brought into the kingdom by the Pretender or his adherents. The Lord Treasurer having declared this to be the meaning, it was answered, "In that case such a bill was altogether unnecessary, since such troops were either open enemies, if foreigners, or traitors and rebels, if natives."

The Earl of Anglesea put an end to the debate, with saying, "That the lord who made the motion, was not acquainted with the methods of proceeding in that House; for every peer has the privilege of bringing in what bill he thinks fit; that the Lord-Treasurer's asking leave for it, was but a compliment to the House; and therefore, when he had brought in the bill it would be then a proper time to consider of it." So the motion was dropped. The same day a noble lord reflected on the bishop of Sarum's preface to his Pastoral Care; but, that prelate offering to vindicate himself, no farther notice was taken of it.

Two days after, in a farther debate on the State of the Nation, several Lords spoke again in favour of the Catalans, and insisted, "That the House ought strictly to examine how that poor people came to be abandoned, after they had been solicited and drawn in to declare for the emperor."

The Earl of Anglesea, seeing the ministry thus attacked, endeavoured to ward off the blow, by saying, "That, for his own part, he was one of the first that appeared against the late ministers, because he was fully convinced of their mal-administration, corruption, avarice, and unbounded ambition. That he would, in like manner, be one of the first that should attack the present ministers, if he thought them guilty of the same faults. But, as he had observed, it was merely out of spleen and envy, that some persons were for inquiring into the conduct of patriots, who had given signal proofs of their zeal for the public good, he was of opinion, that, they ought to examine into the conduct both of the late and present ministers, that so, by comparing one with the other, they might see, which had committed less errors."

However, the Whig Lords pursued their point, and in particular took notice of the danger, both the queen's person and the Protestant Succession were in, from the great number of out-lawed jacobites, who were permitted to come over from beyond sea; and complained of the favour shewn to the Pretender's friends, in granting Noli Prosequi's to persons (meaning Daniel de Foe among others) who were under prosecution for writing against the Protestant Succession. They animadverted upon the Debts of the Navy being much increased, though nothing had been done at sea for two or three years. The court-party having nothing to say to these particulars, it was moved and resolved to address the queen, that she would order the proper officers to lay before the House. 1. "An Account of the Debts and State of the Navy. 2. An Account of Noli Prosequi's granted since her accession to the throne. And 3dly, a List of Persons outlawed, attainted, or that had borne arms in the service of her majesty's, or the late king's enemies, who had got licences to return into Great Britain, or other her majesty's dominions, since the year 1688."

After this, upon a motion for adjourning, the Whig lords proposed to adjourn only to the Monday following. But, the ministry being highly concerned to put a stop to such enquiries,

The Lord Treasurer represented, "That the solemnity of the festival of Easter approaching, the next week ought, according to the primitive institution, and the constant practice of the church of England, to be set apart for works of piety;" and therefore moved to adjourn to the 31st of March. The Treasurer being seconded by the lord Trevor,

The Earl of Wharton said, "God forbid he should oppose that noble lord, who had made so pious and religious a motion; but that he appealed to that venerable bench (pointing to the bishops) whether humanity and charity do not require it at their hands, not to lose one moment of time, in addressing her majesty in behalf of the distressed Catalans, who were reduced to such an extremity, that the least delay in procuring them relief, might prove their ruin for ever." Then it was resolved, without opposition, to present the Address; and the earl of Oxford's motion for adjourning to the 31st of March was carried in the affirmative.

It is observable, the Commons having, the day before, made an order for clearing the House of all strangers, not excepting the peers, it was moved in the Lords' House to make the like order, without excepting the Commons: but this was opposed by the duke of Argyle, who said, "It was for the honour of that august assembly to shew, that they were better bred, and had more complaisance than the Commons."

Debate in the Lords concerning the Catalans.] The Parliament met on the 31st of March. The chief debates were in the House of Lords, concerning the Catalans, the Protestant Succession, removal of the Pretender out of Lorrain, and the late Treaties. The papers, which had been addressed for, being laid before the House, those relating to the Catalans were read on the 3rd of April. Then (the earl of Wharton and Sunderland, the lords Halifax, Cowper, and others, represented, "That, the crown of Great Britain having drawn in the Catalans to declare for the house of Austria, and engaged to support them, those engagements ought to have been made good." To this

The Lord Bolingbroke answered, "That the queen had used all her endeavours to procure to the Catalans the enjoyment of their ancient liberties and privileges; but that, after all, the engagements she was entered into, subsisted no longer than while king Charles was in Spain; but that prince being advanced to the imperial dignity, and having himself abandoned the Catalans, she could do no more than interpose her good offices in their behalf, which she had not been wanting to do." To this it was replied, "That God Almighty had put more effectual means into her majesty's hands." After such other speeches,

The Lord Cowper moved for an Address to the queen, importing, "That, her endeavours for preserving to the Catalans the full enjoyment of their ancient liberties, having proved ineffectual, their lordships made it their humble request, that she would continue her interposition in the most pressing manner in their behalf." None of the peers opposed this motion; only

The Lord Chancellor, in order to justify what had been done by the ministry, said, "This Address would be more grateful to her majesty, if the word 'ineffectual' was left out, and if they should only thankfully acknowledge her majesty's endeavours in favour of the Catalans," which was agreed to.

Address to the Queen thereon.] The next day, the Address was read and agreed to, as follows:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, having taken into consideration, the several papers your majesty was so graciously pleased to order to be laid before this House, in pursuance of our humble address, of the 17th day of March last, that it might be pleased to order an account to be laid before this House, of what endeavours had been used, that the Catalans might have the full enjoyment of their ancient liberties and privileges; did with the utmost industry to your majesty, and satisfaction to ourselves, observe the repeated and earnest labours of your majesty, for preserving to the Catalans the full enjoyment of all their ancient and ancient liberties; and that although it appears by the Treaty of Peace with Spain, that the king of Spain has hitherto not been inclined to agree with your majesty's interposition in their behalf, but insists that they shall come under the condition of his subjects of Castile, there is yet room for your majesty's further interposition, for securing to that people those liberties, which cannot but be very valuable to them: We do therefore make it our most humble and earnest request to your majesty, that your majesty would be graciously pleased to continue your interposition in the most pressing manner, that the Catalans may have the full enjoyment of their just and ancient privileges continued to them."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's Answer was as follows:

"My Lords; I heartily thank you for this address, and the satisfaction you express in your endeavours I have used for securing the Catalans their just liberties.—At the time I concluded my peace with Spain, I resolved to continue my interposition, upon every proper occasion, for obtaining those liberties, and to prevent, if possible, the misfortunes, to which that people are exposed by the conduct of those who are nearly concerned to help them."

Debate in the Lords, on the State of the Nation.] April 5. The Lords taking into consideration the State of the Nation, several speeches were made in relation to the dangers to which all Europe in general was left exposed by the late Treaties of Peace, and which, in particular, threatened the Protestant Succession. To this purpose the Whig lords mentioned the countenance and favour which were publicly shewn by those in power to the friends of the Pretender; and his continuing in Lorrain.*

* Some time before the parliament met, the following Letter, said to be written by the duke of Lorrain, was handed about, first in manuscript and afterwards in print:

"Madam, We could not be more surprized at the addresses of the British parliament last summer, than with the late remonstrances of

The Earl of Sunderland aided, "That, notwithstanding the earnest application made last session by both houses to her majesty, to use her utmost endeavours to get him removed from thence, yet he was assured by baron Fostner, the duke of Lorrain's minister, some weeks before his departure, that, to his certain knowledge, no instances had yet been made to his master for that purpose."

The Lord Bolingbroke said, "He wondered baron Fostner should make such a declaration, since he himself had made those instances to the baron in the queen's name."

"your majesty's minister at Utrecht, in relation to the removal of the chevalier de St. George from the dominions of Lorrain. Before we would absolutely comply with the request of the most christian king in that affair, the profound respect we have for your quiet, made us apprehensive of giving the least uneasiness to your majesty. But when we were assured, on the contrary, that this expedient would be highly agreeable to all sides, as the only means to remove one of the chief obstacles to the general peace of Europe, so much wanted and desired: proud of so great an honour we could no longer refrain from opening our arms, to receive a prince, the most accomplished, the most virtuous, and most amiable of human race, who only wants to be seen to be admired, and known to be almost adored: whose magnanimity, in his sufferings, renders him worthy his high birth; besides his other great and commendable qualities, which confess the royal blood that flows in his veins.—We therefore hope your majesty, and the British nation, will not take in ill part, that we cannot comply with a demand so inconsistent with our own honour, and the laws of hospitality; that, after our protection once given, we should voluntarily abandon, to the rage of his enemies, an innocent, distressed prince, who knows no crime, but being born the last heir male to that illustrious family, which, for several ages, has given so many great monarchs to the world, amongst the rest your majesty, of whose heroic virtues he is a happy imitator; and whose conspicuous and great actions have reflected as much lustre, as you have received from your noble and truly royal progenitors. That God Almighty would take your majesty into his holy protection, is the ardent wish of, madam, your majesty's, &c."

"The Whigs and the Jacobites were equally industrious in dispersing copies of the duke's Letter, which contained ample testimonies of the virtues and amiable character of the Chevalier. The former believed it to be well calculated for convincing the nation of the insincerity of the court, and the danger of the Protestant Succession; the latter hoped that it would promote an esteem for the character of the successor whom they favoured." History of the 1st and 2nd Session of the Last Parliament, p. 32.

The Lord Halifax confirmed what the earl of Sunderland had advanced, saying 'baron Fostner had told him as much but four days before; so that the lord Bolynbroke must be mistaken, at least, in point of chronology.' The earl of Wharton having urged the dangers, which threatened the nation, and the Protestant Succession from the mal-administration of affairs, a question was proposed, 'Whether the Protestant Succession was in danger under the present administration?' The court lords, who had a mind to screen the ministry under the queen's name, insisted, that the last words of the question should be, 'under her majesty's administration?' The Whig lords alledged, That the queen ought not to be mentioned in a question, that did not at all concern her majesty: for, by our constitution, the sovereign can do no wrong; and, if any thing be done amiss, the ministers alone are accountable for it.' But it was urged, 'That the queen having, in her speech from the throne, taken notice of the insinuations, that the Protestant Succession was in danger under her government; the question ought to be taken in her majesty's expressions about the same subject.'

The Protestant Succession voted out of Danger.] This being agreed to, the question was warmly debated from two in the afternoon, till 9 o'clock in the evening, when the Protestant Succession was voted out of danger by a majority of 13 voices only, 76 against 64. The most remarkable circumstance of this debate was, that the archbishop of York and the earl of Anglesea spoke and voted with the Whig lords, which added great strength to that side; the archbishop drawing after him the whole bench of bishops, three courtiers only excepted; and the other being followed by the earls of Abingdon and Jersey, the lords Ashburnham and Carteret, and some other temporal peers, who, like the lord Anglesea, had, upon most occasions, voted for the court lords; so that the victory, now gained, was owing to the Scots peers, or to the late creation. And it was the general opinion, that this seeming advantage was in reality a kind of defeat.

The Earl of Anglesea's speech upon this occasion, was much taken notice of: He said, among other things, That, when he came into the House, he thought indeed the Protestant Succession to be still in danger on the part of France, whose interest it was to restore the Pretender: But that, after he had heard what so many noble members of that august assembly, persons of undoubted honour and probity, had alledged against the ministers, and no answer offered to confute it, either by the ministers themselves, or their friends, he could not but believe the Succession to be in danger under such an administration. He afterwards endeavoured to clear himself, as to the share he had in some late transactions: "I own (said he) I gave my assent to the cessation of arms, for which I take shame to myself, and ask God, my country, and my conscience pardon. But, however, this fault I did not commit till that noble lord (turning towards the Lord-Treasurer) had assured the council, that the Peace would be glorious and advantageous both to her majesty and her allies. Adding, that, as the honour of his sovereign, and the good of his country, were the rule of his actions, so he had no respect of persons; and if he found himself imposed upon, he durst pursue an evil minister, from the queen's closet to the Tower, and from the Tower to the scaffold.'

The Lord Treasurer, against whom this was levelled, said, "That the Peace was as glorious and advantageous, as could be expected, considering the necessity of affairs, and the contradiction the queen's ministers had met with, both at home and abroad." Several lords replied, That no ministers ever had it in their power to make so honourable and advantageous a peace, as the queen's ministers had.

The Duke of Argyle in particular added, "That he had lately crossed the kingdom of France, both in going to, and returning from Minorca. That it was indeed one of the finest countries in the universe, but that there were marks of a general desolation in all the places through which he passed. That he had run 40 miles together without meeting a man fit to carry arms: that the rest of the people were in the utmost misery and want; and therefore he did not apprehend what necessity there was to conclude a Peace so precipitately with a prince whose dominions were so exhausted of men, money and provisions." As to the question now under debate he said, "he firmly believed the succession in the electoral House of Hanover to be in danger from the present ministers, whom he durst charge with mal-administration, both within those walls, and without: that he knew and offered to prove, that the Lord-Treasurer had yearly remitted four thousand pounds to the highland claus of Scotland, who were known to be intirely devoted to the Pretender, in order to keep them under discipline, and ready for any attempt: that, on the other hand the new-modelling of the army, by disbanding some regiments out of their turn, and by removing from their employments a vast number of officers merely upon account of their known affection to the House of Hanover, were clear indications of the designs in hand: that it was a disgrace to the nation, to see men, who had never looked an enemy in the face, advanced to the posts of several brave officers, who, after they had often exposed their lives for their country, were now starving in prison for debt, for want of their pay."

The Lord Treasurer, laying his hand upon his breast, said, "He had, on so many occasions given such signal proofs of his affection to the Protestant Succession, that he was sure no member of that august assembly did call it in question. That he owned he had remitted, for two or three years past, 3,800*l.* to the highland clans; but that he hoped the House would give him an opportunity to clear his conduct as to that point. And as for the reformed officers, he had given orders they should forthwith be paid."

The Lord Ashburnham, who had lately been advanced to the command of a troop of life guards, thinking himself reflected on by some expressions which had dropped from the duke of Argyle, took that occasion to say, "That the queen had no better nor a more loyal subject than himself; but that at the same time she was ready to spill every drop of his blood, and spend all his fortune for the security of the Protestant Succession."

Debate about the Removal of the Pretender (of Lorrain.) Though, after some other speeches, the Protestant Succession was voted it of danger as the court-party desired, yet,

The Lord Halifax, in order to put their professions of affection to the Protestant Successor to the test, moved, "That an Address be presented to the queen, that she would renew her instances for the speedy removing the Pretender out of Lorrain; and that she would, in conjunction with the States-General, enter into the guaranty of the Protestant Succession to the House of Hanover; and also with such other princes, as she should think proper."

The Earl of Wharton moved that, in the Address, "Her majesty might be desired to sue out a proclamation, promising a reward to every person who should apprehend the Pretender, dead or alive:"*

The Duke of Bolton, also moved, "That the reward might be suitable to the importance of that service." Nothing was said in opposition to these motions; but, it being late, some members cried, "Adjourn, adjourn." But the other side calling for the question, it was unanimously resolved, that the Address should be presented.

Before this debate came on, the Lord North and Grey moved, that all the strangers that were in the House should withdraw; upon which the earl of Wharton desired that they might be permitted to stay; and he was seconded by the duke of Argyle. But, the lord who made the motion, insisting upon it, all strangers were obliged to withdraw, except baron Schutz, envoy from Hanover, whose standing behind the throne among the peers was connived at.

* "Upon the motion for addressing her majesty to offer a premium for apprehending the Pretender, it was proposed by the earl of Wharton, to add the words, "whether dead or alive;" and this barbarous idea was espoused by some of the most respectable names in the Whig List, but, for the honour of the legislature, rejected by a great majority with that indignation which it justly merited. Attending to these circumstances, we are not surprized that the queen deviated from her ordinary respect to official ceremony, and answered the lords in terms expressive of her uneasiness and displeasure. She said, "that she did not see any occasion for such a proclamation; that it would strengthen the Succession of the House of Hanover and her own government, if an end was put to these groundless fears." Somerville.

April 8. When the Address against the Pretender was reported by the committee appointed to draw it,

The Lord North and Grey made a long speech, "Wherein he endeavoured to shew the barbarity of setting a reward upon any body's head; which, he said, was an encouraging of murder and assassination; and how repugnant such a practice was to christianity, the law of nature, and the laws of all civilized nations." To which purpose he quoted some passages out of Grotius, Puffendorf, and other civilians. He represented in particular, "how inconsistent such a proceeding was with the honour and dignity of so august an assembly in a nation and government, famed for lenity and clemency;" and in conclusion said, "No man either had more respect and affection for the illustrious house of Hanover, or would do more to serve them, than himself: but that they must excuse him, if he would not venture damnation for them."

The Lord Trevor, said, "What that noble peer had spoke, was sufficient to shew, how inconsistent such a proceeding was with christianity, and the civil law; and therefore he would confine himself to our own laws; and, if he knew or understood any thing of these, he was confident, they were no less opposite to such proceedings than the civil law. He knew, he did not speak there as a lawyer or judge, but as a peer. But he was so fully satisfied of our law discountenancing all such proceedings, that, if ever any such case should come before him as a judge, he would think himself bound in justice, honour, and conscience to condemn such an action as murder; and therefore he hoped, the supreme court of judicature in England, and the most august tribunal in the universe, would not make a precedent for encouraging assassination;" concluding that it was sufficient, and therefore he moved, "1. That the reward should be for apprehending and bringing the Pretender to justice in case he should land, or attempt to land either in Great Britain or Ireland. 2. That her majesty issue her royal proclamation whenever, in her great wisdom, she should judge it necessary." The lords Cowper and Halifax said, "That such a proceeding, as repugnant as it might be to the precepts of christianity, was yet warranted by the practice of the old Romans, of the most civilized nations in Europe, and of our nation. For, without recurring to remoter instances, we had the example of king James the 2nd, who set a price on the head of his own nephew, the duke of Monmouth." But these two lords were but weakly supported by their own party; and the earl of Anglesea and lords Ashburnham, Carteret, and Orrery, who, three days before, had left the court party, having approved the lord Trevor's motion, and most of the bishops who were against such an Address, being absent from the House, these mitigations were, upon a division, carried by a majority of ten voices.

others.] The same day, upon a motion made by the lord Halifax, the Lords resolved to present another Address to the queen, "That she would issue out a proclamation against all Jesuits, popish priests, and bishops; as also against all such, as bore arms against the late king William and queen Mary or her present majesty." Upon this occasion, some severe reflections were made against those persons, who, being outlawed for adhering to the late king James and the Pretender, had the assurance, and were encouraged, not only to come over but even to appear here with a public character. The earl of Anglesea said, on this occasion, "That for his own part, he was against widening our domestic divisions, by keeping up odious distinctions; and therefore, if they, who were born her majesty's subjects, and had been in arms against their country, were sensible of their fault, and inclined to return to their bounden allegiance, they ought in his opinion to open the door for them to come in." But the House had other thoughts of the matter, and the next day resolved, "1. That no person, not included in the articles of Limerick, and who had borne arms in France or Spain, should be capable of any employment civil or military. 2. That no person, who is a natural born subject of her majesty, should be capable of sustaining the character of public minister from any foreign potentate." These Resolutions were made with a view to sir Patrick Lawless, who, having been the Pretender's envoy at the court of Madrid, had come over with a credential letter from king Philip. But, upon the noise, which his being here made in both Houses of parliament, he thought fit to go to Holland.

The Lord Treasurer's Conduct in remitting Money to the Highlanders approved.] As a reflection had been made against the Treasurer, for remitting yearly about 4,000*l.* to the clans of Scotland, as if that sum were designed to keep in heart and discipline the Pretender's friends, the lord Townshend moved for taking that affair into consideration. The duke of Argyle represented, "That, the Scots highlanders being, for the most part, either rank papists, or declared Jacobites, the giving them pensions was, in effect, keeping up popish seminaries, and fomenting rebellion." In answer to this, the Treasurer alledged, "That in this particular he had but followed the example of the late king William, who, after he had reduced the highlanders, thought fit to allow yearly pensions to the heads of the clans, in order to keep them quiet; and, if the present ministry could be charged with any mismanagement on that article, it was only for retrenching part of that hush money." Nothing being alleged against this apology, the lord North and Grey made a motion for returning the Treasurer the thanks of the House for his good services. But the lord Bolingbroke, to put it off, said, "He was persuaded the Treasurer was contented with the testimony of his own conscience, and desired no further satisfaction, than to have his conduct approved by that august assembly." Which was accordingly done. Upon this unsuccessful attempt, said the Treasurer, the lord North and Grey said with an air of triumph, "That, having by that time, removed all fears and jealousies about Popery and the Pretender, he hoped the enemies of the ministry would now speedily produce all the objections they had against their conduct:" and moved, that a day might be appointed for taking into consideration the State of the Nation, with regard to the Treaties of Peace and Commerce. He was seconded by the earl of Clarendon; and then the House adjourned to the 13th, but, the day before, the lord chancellor, attended only by the Whig lords, presented their Address against the Pretender.

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, having a just and tender concern for your majesty, and our country, and being encouraged by that zeal your majesty has so often expressed from the throne, for the Protestant Succession in the illustrious House of Hanover, do now presume to renew our most humble application to your majesty, upon a subject so agreeable to you, as this which is nearest your own royal heart, and do humbly beseech your majesty, that whenever your majesty, in your great wisdom, shall judge it necessary, you will be graciously pleased to issue your royal proclamation, promising a reward to any person, who shall apprehend and bring the Pretender to justice, in case he shall land, or attempt to land, either in Great Britain or Ireland, suitable to the importance of that service, for the safety of your majesty's person, and the security of the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover.—We also desire leave to express our great concern, that your majesty's instances, for removing the Pretender out of Lorraine, have not yet had their effect; and do humbly intreat your majesty, that you will be graciously pleased to insist upon, and renew your instances for the speedy removing the Pretender out of Lorraine; and likewise, that your majesty will be graciously pleased, in conjunction with the States-General, to desire the emperor to enter into the guaranty of the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover, and also all such other princes, as your majesty shall think proper."

The Queen's Answer.] The Queen gave this Answer:

"My Lords; It would be a real strengthening to the Succession in the House of Hanover, as well as a support to my government, that an end were put to those groundless fears and jealousies, which have been so industriously promoted.—I do not, at this time, see any occasion for such a proclamation. Whenever I judge it to be necessary, I shall give my orders for having one issued.—As to the other particulars of this Address, I will give proper directions therein."

Demand of King James's Queen delivered in haucery.] This Answer revived the hopes of the Pretender's friends, who, before the warm speeches against him in both Houses, were so elated and secure of protection, that, towards the end of March, an agent of King James's queen desired to file a bill in Chancery of 650,000*l.* due to her by the crown of England, for the dowry of 50,000*l.* per annum since the death of James.

But, the agent having in the bill given her the title of Queen-mother, the officer refused to file it; upon which the agent changed the title, and presented it in the name of 'the most illustrious princess Maria, relict of James the 2<sup>d</sup>, king of England.' Though no notice was taken of this formal demand, yet, pursuant to a private agreement made in France by the lord Bolingbroke, about 50,000*l.* were remitted to her for her use.

Baron Schutz demands a Writ for the Duke of Cambridge.] The day, the Address against the Pretender was presented, an incident happened, which, as soon as known, threw the ministers into the utmost confusion. On the 10th of April, most of the Whig lords held a consultation at the lord Halifax's, to which baron Schutz, envoy from the elector of Hanover, was admitted. It was resolved, pursuant either to the orders, Schutz had received from his court, or to the discretionary power, which was lodged with some of these lords, that the envoy should take the first opportunity to demand a writ for the Electoral Prince to sit in the House of Peers, as duke of Cambridge. Accordingly on the 12th of April, baron Schutz made a visit to the Lord Chancellor, and among other civilities, acknowledged the affection, he had shewn, on several occasions, to the most serene Electoral House of Hanover. The Lord Chancellor told him, He was extremely sensible of the honour he did him by his visit and compliment; and desired him to assure the elector, of his intire devotion to his service; hoping his electoral highness gave no credit to the false reports, that were industriously spread abroad, in order to give him jealousies of her majesty's ministers. The baron answered, he would not fail discharging so agreeable a commission: but he had a favour to ask him, in the name of the Electoral Prince, that his lordship would be pleased to make out a Writ for his sitting in the House of Peers, as duke of Cambridge. The Lord Chancellor surprized at this unexpected demand, told the baron, 'It was not usual to make out Writs for peers, who were out of the kingdom. However, he would forthwith apply to her majesty for directions in this case.' The Baron answered, 'He did not doubt, his lordship knew, and would perform the duty of his office. But, as to the objection of the duke of Cambridge's being out of the kingdom, he would assure him, his Electoral Highness had resolved to come over very speedily, and perhaps might be landed before the Writ was made out.' Upon this, the Baron taking his leave, the Chancellor desired him to remember, 'He did not refuse his demand, but only thought it proper to acquaint the queen with it; which he would do immediately.' To this the Baron answered, 'He likewise desired his lordship to remember, that he applied himself to him for the duke of Cambridge's Writ.' The Chancellor having the same evening acquainted the queen and her chief ministers, with these passages, a council was immediately called; and, having sat from nine o'clock till after eleven, it was resolved 'That the Lord Chancellor should make out a writ for the duke of Cambridge.' This transaction, which, the next morning, was first whispered about in the court of requests, cast a sudden damp on the spirits of the open and secret friends of the Pretender. It was then a question, whether, baron Schutz had made that demand by express directions from his master or only by the advice of some Whig lords. But it is certain, the queen took so ill the baron's applying himself to the Chancellor, before he acquainted her with his orders, that she sent the master of the ceremonies to forbid him the court. Two days after a messenger was dispatched to Mr. Thomas Harley, at the court of Hanover, with instructions relating to the new scene opened by baron Schutz; who, about a week after, thought fit to return to Hanover, having left with resident Kreyenberg a letter to Mr. Bromley, telling him, 'That having had the misfortune to incur her majesty's displeasure, and being thereby rendered incapable of serving his master any longer in this court, he thought it his duty to return home. Kreyenberg delivered this letter to Mr. Secretary Bromley, who told him, 'That either he, or any other minister, whom the elector of Hanover would please to send over, would be well received by her majesty.' This affair occasioned various conjectures: and as, Schutz's declaration of the duke of Cambridge's intention suddenly to come over alarmed the Pretender's adherents, so it raised the spirits of the well affected to the House of Hanover. What was the sense of the courtiers about the duke of Cambridge's coming over, and the present juncture of affairs, may be gathered from some remarkable passages in a pamphlet published about this time with the title of 'Hannibal not at our Gates; or an Inquiry into the ground of our present fears of Popery and the Pretender: of which one of the principal writers of the Examiner was suspected to be the author. In this pamphlet, it was, among other things, ironically insinuated, 'That a certain gentleman was gone to Hanover to bamboozle.' And indeed it was the general opinion that Mr. Harley, who arrived at Hanover on the very day baron Schutz demanded the writ, was sent only to amuse that court with professions of the treasurer's and all his friends devotion to the electoral family; and (it is said) as a proof of that devotion, with the very original of a letter, the queen had writ with her own hand to the Pretender. But, as the subject of Mr. Harley's last embassy is still a secret, no stress can be laid on the various conjectures, it occasioned. It may only be observed, he met with a cold reception at Hanover, and making no long stay there, came back to London on the 25th of May. It may likewise be remarked, that upon the first surprize of baron Schutz demanding the writ for the duke of Cambridge, the lord Paget, who was named envoy extraordinary to the court of Hanover, he declined that employment in so critical a juncture; and the earl of Clarendon was afterwards appointed.

Resolution for a second Address about the Pretender.] The Lord Chancellor having on the 13th reported to the House of Peers the queen's Answer to the Address against the Pretender, some expressions in it did not please the Whig lords, who moved for another Address to return her majesty thanks for her Answer: and containing the grounds and reasons of their former Address. The court-lords, foreseeing, that if such an Address was carried, the prevailing party might advance to more vigorous resolutions, strenuously insisted not to enter into ungrateful particulars, but to confine themselves to expressions in the queen's Answer. An order for such an Address being offered, the duke of Leeds moved, that at the close of it where mention was made of the fears and jealousies universally spread, the words 'and industriously' might be added: which, after a debate of four hours, wherein the bishop of Sarum made a long speech, was carried only by the majority of two proxies, the votes in the House being equal, 61 on each side. This victory of the courtiers was by their antagonists treated as little better than a defeat. And it is certain, that the Whig lords had that day carried their point, had it not been for the accidental loss of four votes; the duke of Rutland, being then at Newmarket with a proxy in his pocket; the duke of Grafton, being sent for home to his dutchess then in labour with her first child; and the earl of Gainsborough, being taken so ill that very morning, that he could not sign his proxy. It was also remarkable, that of 16 bishops then in the House, two only, Rochester and Durham, voted with the court: that the new bishops of London and Bristol, who were thought blindly devoted to the ministry, joined with the Whigs; as did also the earl of Anglesea; which was undoubtedly owing to baron Schutz's demanding a writ for the duke of Cambridge, which visibly gave life and weight to the Whig party. However the Resolution being laid before the queen, she only answered, 'She thanked them for their Address; and that she took very kindly the assurances they gave.'

Debate in the Lords on the Treaties of Peace and Commerce.] April 14. A motion was made for taking into consideration the Treaties of Peace and Commerce; and some speeches were made on both sides, after which the debate was adjourned to the 16th. That day the Whig lords being apprehensive, that if any debate arose about the Spanish Treaty, the other party would propose an Address to the queen, approving of that Treaty, which they thought absurd, they therefore agreed to say nothing against the Treaty, that draw might them into a debate.

The Lord North and Grey stood up first, and said, If any lord had any objections against the Spanish Treaty, he was ready to answer them; and so, in a challenging manner, went on for some time. After he had done there was a silence for a quarter of an hour: and then.

The Earl of Clarendon said, "My lords, since no objection can be raised against the Spanish Treaty, we should address her majesty to return her our most humble thanks, for having, by a safe, honourable, and advantageous Peace with Spain, delivered these nations from a long, consuming land war; and to desire her, notwithstanding any obstructions, that may be thrown in her way, to proceed to the settlement of Europe, according to the principles laid down in her most gracious Speech."

The Lord Cooper answered, "My lords, this is the most barefaced attempt, that ever was made by this or any other ministry, to secure themselves, by endeavouring to get the sanction of this House for themselves. My lords, I have no objections against these Treaties. Are the ministers themselves jealous, that their actions stand in need of the sanction of this House? Else why this endeavour at an Address, to make their act the act of the House? The lord, that spoke first, acting like a soldier, would, by skirmishing, have drawn on a general engagement; but the troops are too well disciplined to fall into an ambush of his laying. But I cannot remove my finger from the original of our misfortunes, 'the cessation of arms.' We were then told, that, if a blow had been struck, it would have ruined the Peace. Would to God it had ruined this Peace."

The Lord Halifax said, "What was last mentioned, my lords, makes me rise into the highest resentment of the vile usage given my lord duke of Ormond; a lord for whom I have the most profound respect. My lord Ormond went over into Flanders with a true English heart, which, my lords, is the best in the world, with a desire to do his country all the service his great ability capacitated him to do. Therefore, it must be inconceivable, the horrible anguish it must give his noble and generous heart to receive such shocking orders, restraining the noble ardour of the soldiers, flushed with former victories, and hopes of still greater."

The Earl of Nottingham said, "My lords, I never knew the like Address to this ever offered at but once, in the case of the duke of Suffolk, who, in Henry the 6th's days, had made a Treaty, for which he thought it convenient to get the sanction of this House by an Address, and got seven lords made at one time to carry the vote. Yet he was called to an account afterwards for the Treaty, notwithstanding the Address. I say no more of the matter, because he came to an untimely end."

The Bishop of Salisbury likewise said, "My

ords, I do not understand what law or reason can be given, to empower one ally to disengage himself from his other allies, unless in a proper manner and time he acquaints them, he has done his ultimus conatus; and that to proceed further would be a certa pernicies. That we need not come to our ultimus conatus is plain, since in the year of the cessation of arms, and the year following, wherein nothing was done, we made as great efforts as the former, when we did so many glorious things; and to proceed further, in all human probability, it would have been certa pernicies to our then enemy be French."

The Bishop of London, who had been one of the plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, answered, "My lords, at the cessation of arms, our case was the very case in point, which the bishop of Arras puts, for we had then come to our ultimus conatus, and, for aught we know, to proceed further would have been certa pernicies."

The Earl of Wharton replied, "I did design to have said a great deal to-day, but I find it anticipated by the lords, who have spoken before me. Only I must say what I learn by sitting here, that the carrying this vote is the ultimus conatus of the ministry; and, if they do not carry it, it will be to them certa pernicies. Good, my lords, gratify my curiosity, so let me see what certa pernicies will be."

Some other Whig lords maintained, that there was no absolute necessity of making a peace, the nation having given almost as much money for these three years past, as during any three years of the war; and, as for the pretended advantages, gained by the Treaty with Spain, it was plain they were no more than that had been stipulated before by the Treaty of the year 1667. They also complained of the method, in which the negotiation of Peace had been carried on, and of our giving up the interests of the emperor, the king of Portugal, and of the Catalans. But after a warm debate, that lasted till nine o'clock in the evening, it was resolved by a majority of 82 votes against 9, to present an Address, to acknowledge her majesty's goodness to her people, in delivering them by a safe, honourable, and advantageous Peace with France and Spain, from the burthen of a consuming land war, unequally carried on, and become, at last, impracticable; and to intreat her majesty to pursue such measures, as she should judge necessary for completing the settlement of Europe on the principles laid down in her majesty's speech." An address to that purpose was the next day agreed on, and sent down to the Commons for their concurrence.

Report of the Commissioners of Public Accounts.] April 13. To prepare the Commons to give their approbation to the conduct of the ministry, in concluding their Treaties with France and Spain, several papers were laid before the House: particularly, a Report, with Observations from the Commissioners of Public Accounts, setting forth the Abuses and Mismanagements in cloathing the Army, in disposing the Off- reckonings of Regiments, and in other instances. Then to give a view how heavy the war was become to England, and how insupportable the continuance of it would have proved, there was added, 'A State-of the Expence of the late War' for 12 years, which, with the supply of 2,776,228*l.* granted this session, amounted to above 68½ millions.

Account of the late Treaties laid before the Commons.] But the most remarkable paper of all was an Account of the state of the several Treaties of Peace, between the queen and her allies, and France and Spain, with the obstructions she had met with, in her endeavours to make the same universal and compleat; and of what was done relating to the Catalans. This account (supposed to be drawn up by the lord Bolingbroke, in order to remove the objections against the late treaties, particularly, the giving up the interests of the king of Portugal and of the Catalans) was so varnished over with glosses and popular pretences, that many members, who were willing to believe what was said, and had no opportunity or inclination to be better informed, were persuaded of the truth of it, and induced to side with the ministry in all the debates about the succession and treaties.

The Protestant Succession voted, by the Commons, not in Danger.] April 15. A motion was made in a Committee of the whole House, by sir Edward Knatchbull, and the question put, "Whether the Protestant Succession in the house of Hanover be in danger under her majesty's government?"

Mr. Secretary Bromley endeavoured to prove it was not, by representing what the queen had done for securing that Succession, and removing the Pretender from Lorrain. He was answered by

Mr. Walpole* who, with great spirit, shewed

* "The zeal of Walpole on this subject, was by no means adopted from a spirit of opposition, and was not a sudden spark struck out by the circumstances of the moment: it was a leading principle which had regulated his political conduct from his first entrance into life; it had been instilled into him by education, and matured by reason and reflection, to which he uniformly adhered in all situations and under all circumstances." If his object in spreading these alarms was to distress government, and to excite tumults against the ministers, he acted a false and wicked part; but if he really had reason for his suspicions, he must be justified by every principle of attachment to the religion and constitution of the country. He can only be fully vindicated from the conviction, that it was the secret wish and resolution of the queen to exclude the Hanover family, and to restore the Pretender, and that the ministers were disposed to co-operate with her intentions. At the period of which we are now speaking, the strongest suspicions were entertained, that such a scheme was in agitation, and those suspicions have been since verified by the most authentic documents." Coxe's Walpole.

the Protestant Succession to be in danger, not from her majesty, but from the dubious conduct of some persons in high stations; and therefore insisted, that the queen might not be mentioned in the question.

Mr. Campion, having spoken in vindication of the ministry, was answered by the earl of Hertford. The lord Hinchinbroke expressed likewise his fears of the Protestant Succession being in danger, from the encouragement, that was given to the Pretender's friends, and particularly in North-Britain, which he had an opportunity to observe, when he was there with the regiment, in which he had a troop. After some other speeches, the court party, being apprehensive the question would go against them, endeavoured to drop it, by moving, that Mr. Freeman, chairman of the committee, should leave the chair. Upon this,

Sir Thomas Hanmer, the Speaker, made a memorable speech, importing, "That he was sorry to see, that endeavours were used to wave that question, and stop their mouths; but he was of opinion, this was the proper, and perhaps the only time for patriots to speak. That a great deal of pains were taken to screen some persons; and, in order to that, to make them overlook the dangers that threatened the queen, the nation, and the Protestant Succession. That, for his own part, he had all the honour and respect imaginable for her majesty's ministers; but that he owed still more to his country than to any minister. That, in this debate, so much had been said to prove the Succession to be in danger, and so little to make out the contrary, that he could not but believe the first. He concluded with taking notice of sir Patrick Lawless being suffered to come over, and admitted to an audience of her majesty." This speech had a great influence on the unbiassed and unprejudiced members; but nevertheless, after a long and warm debate, it was resolved, by a majority of 256 voices against 208, "That it is the opinion of this Committee, that the Protestant Succession in the house of Hanover is in no danger under her majesty's government. 2. That the House be moved humbly to address her majesty, returning the Thanks of the House to her majesty, for the instances she has used for the removal of the Pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorraine, and humbly desiring her majesty to insist upon, and renew her instances for his speedy removal from thence."

When these Resolutions were reported the next day to the House, there arose a debate, in which Mr. Walpole, Mr. Lechmere, and general Stanhope made very strong speeches. Mr. Walpole, among other things, applauded the public spirit, which the Speaker had shewn the day before; but added, he despaired of seeing truth and justice prevail, since, notwithstanding the weight of a person of his known integrity, merit, and eloquence, the majority of votes had carried it against reason and argument. General Stanhope endeavoured to prove the Protestant Succession to be in danger by this single but forcible induction, "That as it was universally acknowledged, it had been the French king's intention, so it was still his interest, and he had it now, more than ever, in his power, to restore the Pretender." However it was carried without a division, that the Protestant Succession was out of danger, and that an Address of thanks should be presented to the queen. To which Address she answered, that she would renew her instances for the removal of the Pretender out of Lorraine.

The Commons agree with the Lords in an Address upon the Treaties of Peace.] The Lords having sent, as before mentioned, a Message to the Commons for their concurrence, in an Address of thanks for the Treaties of Peace and Commerce with France and Spain, the Message was taken into consideration on the 23d of April, and a warm debate arose. The most material objections were raised by Mr. Ward, an eminent merchant, to the treaties of commerce, in which many essential points, particularly the duties on several sorts of goods and merchandize, were left loose and undetermined, and therefore liable to arbitrary explanations. Mr. Auditor Foley having answered him, he was replied to by Mr. Horace Walpole, who was supported by sir Peter King. Mr. Anstey, who had, some time before, left the court-party, and was therefore removed from his place as one of the lords of the Admiralty, spoke on this occasion, with great vehemence against the ministers, for having made so precarious a Peace. They were answered by Mr. Campion; and the leading men among the Whigs plainly perceiving from the noise and laughter of their antagonists, that they were sure of a majority, gave up the contest, and did not think fit to insist on a division, which would but expose their weakness.

Address of both Houses upon the Treaties of Peace.] So it was resolved to agree with the Lords in the following Address, which was presented, the 24th of April, by both Houses to the queen:

"Most gracious Sovereign;

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in parliament assembled, beg leave to express the just sense, which we have of your majesty's goodness to your people, in delivering them, by a safe, honourable and advantageous Peace with France and Spain, from the heavy burthen of a consuming land war, uncessantly carried on, and become at last impracticable. And we do most earnestly intreat your majesty, that you will be pleased, with the same steadiness, notwithstanding all the obstructions, which have been, or may be thrown in your way, to pursue such measures, as you shall judge necessary for completing the settlement of Europe, on the principles laid down to your majesty in your most gracious Speech from the throne."

The Queen's Answer.] To which the Queen returned this Answer:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; The state of public affairs in Europe, as well as the acc-ities of my own kingdom, obliged me to enter into a Negotiation of Peace; and, notwithstanding all obstructions and difficulties, I have, by the blessing of God, brought it to a happy conclusion.—I esteem this address as the united voice of my affectionate and loyal subjects; and I return you all the heartiest thanks, which can be given by a sovereign, who desires nothing more, than to see her people safe and flourishing."

The Schism Bill moved for in the House of Commons.] In the consultation held by the ministry, after the demand of the duke of Cambridge's writ, wherein it was debated, Whether the queen should invite over that duke? the Lord-Treasurer, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Privy-Seal, and another privy-counsellor, were for it; but the lord Bolingbroke having opposed it, and carried the negative, resolved to push his point, and to use all possible means to defeat the Protestant Succession. With that view he is said to have broke all measures with the Treasurer, and united himself more closely with the high church party. As the farther discouragement and even ruin of the Dissenters was thought necessary for accomplishing this scheme, it was begun with the famous Schism-Bill. A motion for it, on the 12th of May, by sir William Windham, was introduced, by reading the 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th sections of the 'Act of Uniformity,' passed after the Restoration, by which, above 2,000 ministers were turned out of their livings. The motion being approved, a bill was ordered to be brought in, 'to prevent the growth of Schism, and for the further security of the church of England as by law established.' On the other hand, in order to strengthen the jacobite party in Scotland, a motion was made for a bill, to invest the Scots bishops revenues and rents in the queen, to be applied to the support of the episcopal clergy. To render this bill ineffectual, it was proposed by the Whigs, that these revenues should be applied to such only of the episcopal clergy, as should pray for the queen and the princess Sophia in express words. As the court-party could not well oppose this addition, and as the resuming of the episcopal revenues, which had been forfeited at the Revolution, and given to the ministers of the kirk of Scotland, would have been attended with great difficulties, the bill was suffered to drop. It was, however, resolved to finish the Schism-bill.

Debate in the Commons on the Schism Bill.] When this bill was engrossed and read the third time in order to be passed, there arose a long and warm debate. Mr. Hampden, Mr. Robert Walpole, general Stanhope, Mr. Lechmere, sir Joseph Jekyll, and sir Peter King, exerted their eloquence in opposing it, representing in general, "That it looked more like a decree of Julian the apostate, than a law enacted by a Protestant parliament, since it tended to raise as great a persecution against our Protestant brethren, as either the primitive christians ever suffered from the heathen emperors, or the Protestants from Popery and the inquisition."

Mr. Stanhope shewed, in particular, the ill consequences of this law, as it would of course occasion foreign education; which, on the one hand, would drain the kingdom of great sums of money; and, which was still worse, fill the tender minds of young men with prejudices against their own country. He illustrated and strengthened his argument by the example of the English popish seminaries abroad, which, he said were so pernicious to Great Britain, that, instead of making new laws to encourage foreign education, he could wish those already in force against Papists were mitigated; and that they should be allowed a certain number of schools.—The chief advocates for the bill, were Mr. secretary Bromley, sir William Wyndham, Mr. Hungerford, and Mr. Collier.

Mr. Bromley maintained, "The dissenters were equally dangerous to church and state. However, if the members, who spoke in their behalf, would have this bill drop, he would readily consent to it, provided another bill were brought in, to incapacitate them either to sit in that house, or to vote in elections of members of parliament." Mr. Walpole answered this speech with great force; after which Mr. Hungerford recapitulated, and, in his usual ludicrous way, faintly endeavoured to confute what had been offered by the Whig members.

Mr. Collier, who brought up the rear, did still worse. This man, formerly an attorney, had, by a wife, got the directorship of the play-house in Drury lane; and afterwards, by his intruding assurance, the acquaintance and intimacy of the lord Bolingbroke. At whose earnest request, Mr. Collier, though scarce worth 30*l.* a year, was, by the duke of Beaufort's interest, brought into the House of Commons, where he took this solemn occasion to signalize his zeal for the cause he was to serve. With this intention he seconded Mr. Hungerford, and, in order to expose the dissenters, he desired leave to read to the house a collection of absurdities and impious expressions, which he pretended to have taken from their writings. After reading part of this impertinent legend, he fell on a passage extracted from the nonsensical rhapsodies of the late Mr. Hickeringhill, minister at Colchester, wherein Mr. Collier said, he averred, 'That our blessed Saviour was a son of a w——.' At these shocking expressions, Mr. Bromley interrupted him, saying, "Such impious words ought not to be repeated in that assembly."

On the other hand, some other members observed, that Mr. Hickeringhill was not a dissenting teacher, but a minister of the church of England: and that he was known to be crack-brained; and therefore his extravagancies and blasphemies proved nothing against any set of men, much less against the dissenters.

Mr. Lechmere spoke against the bill with great vehemence; and, among other things, took notice, "That the indulgence granted to Protestant dissenters, since the Revolution, had been so far from hurting the church, that it had rather enlarged its pale; and it was notorious, that some persons [meaning the Treasurer, the Chancellor, and the lord Bolingbroke] who had been bred among schismatics, were, or, at least pretended to be, the strongest supports of the established church."

Several other speeches were made for and against the bill; which was carried by a majority of 237 voices against 126.

Debate in the Lords on the Schism Bill. When the Bill was read the first time in the House of Peers,

The Lord Bolingbroke said, "It was a bill of the last importance, since it concerned the security of the church of England, the best and firmest support of the monarchy; both which all good men, and, in particular, that august assembly, who derive their lustre from, and are nearest the throne, ought to have most at heart: and therefore, he moved, that it should be read a second time."

The Lord Couper said, "No man was more ready than himself to do every thing, that should appear necessary to attain the seeming intention of this bill, the preventing the growth of schism, and the further securing the church of England. But the enacting part would be so far from answering the title of it, that, in his opinion, it would have a quite contrary effect, and prove equally pernicious to church and state." He spoke on these two heads near half an hour, and, among other things, represented, "That instead of preventing schism, and enlarging the pale of the church, this bill tended to introduce ignorance, and its inseparable attendants, superstition and irreligion." To this purpose he took notice, "That in many country towns, reading, writing, and grammar-schools were chiefly supported by the dissenters: not only for the instruction and benefit of their own children, but likewise of those of poor churchmen; so that the suppressing of those schools would, in some places, suppress the reading the holy scriptures." On the other hand, he observed, "That this bill struck at the ancient rights and prerogative of the House of Peers; which, by the constitution is the supreme court of judicature, and the dernier resort in all causes; whereas, by this bill, the justices of the peace were empowered finally to hear and determine the offences against the same. My lords, added he, I would rather enlarge, than abridge the power of justices of the peace, were it but to encourage gentlemen to take upon them an office so troublesome, and at the same time so unprofitable, unless it be perhaps in the county of Middlesex. But, my lords, I shall never consent to give up the birth-right and ancient privileges of this august assembly, of which I have the honour to be a member."

The Earl of Wharton said, "He was agreeably surprized to see, that some men of pleasure were, on a sudden, become so religious, as to set up for patrons of the church. But he could not but wonder, that persons who had been educated in dissenting academies, whom he could point at, and whose tutors he could name, should appear the most forward in suppressing them. That this was but an indifferent return for the benefit the public had received from those schools which had bred those great men, who had made so glorious a Peace and Treaties that executed themselves; who had obtained so great advantages for our commerce, and who had paid the public debts, without any further charge to the nation. So that he could see no reason there was to suppress those academies, unless it were an apprehension, that they might still produce greater geniuses that should drown the merits and abilities of those great men. My lords, continued he, to be serious it is no less melancholy than surprizing, that at a time, when the court of France prosecutes the design they have long since laid to extirpate our holy religion; when, not only secret practices are used to impose a popish Pretender on these realms, but men publicly insisted for his service; it is melancholy and surprizing, I say, that at the very time a bill should be brought in, which cannot but tend to divide protestants; and consequently to weaken their interest, and hasten their ruin. But then the wonder will cease, if we consider what madmen were the contrivers and promoters of this bill." He excepted, in particular, against the word Schism with which the frontispiece of the bill was set off, and said, "It is somewhat strange, they should call schism in England what is the established religion in Scotland; and therefore, if the lords, who represented the nobility of that part of Great Britain, were for this bill, he hoped, that, in order to be even with us, and consistent with themselves, they would move for the bringing in another bill, to prevent the growth of schism in their own country." He said also, on another occasion (for he spoke more than once) "That both in this bill, and in the speeches of those, who declared for it, several laws were recited and alledged; but that there was a law, that had not yet been mentioned. I expected, added he, that respectable bench [turning to the bishops] would have put us in mind of it: but since they are pleased to be silent in this debate, I will myself tell them, that it is the law of the gospel, To do unto others as we would be done unto."

The Earl of Anglesea said, "That the dissenters were equally dangerous both to church and state: that they were irreconcilable enemies to the established church, which they had sufficiently manifested in the late king James the 2<sup>d</sup>'s reign, when, in order to obtain a toleration, they joined themselves with the papists; and that they had rendered themselves unworthy of the indulgence the church of England granted them at the Revolution, by endeavouring to engross the education of youth, for which purpose they had set up schools and academies in most cities and towns in kingdom, to the great detriment of the universities, and danger of the established church."

The Lord Halifax urged, "That the very bringing in of this bill was injurious to the crown; and he could not believe, her majesty would ever give her royal assent to such a law, or the solemn declaration she had made in the throne, that she would inviolably maintain the toleration, which this bill visibly took away. That her majesty made it the glory of her reign to follow the steps of queen Elizabeth, who had not only entertained and protected the reformed Walloons, who took sanctuary in her dominions from the Spanish persecution, but had likewise allowed them the free exercise of their religion, and caused a law in their favour to be inserted in the act of uniformity. That by that means, that wise and glorious queen had vastly increased the wealth of the realm, the Walloons having settled here the woollen manufactures, which are the best branch of the national trade. That the protection and encouragement the late king William and queen Mary, and her present majesty, had given to the French refugees, had proved no less advantageous to Great-Britain, and therefore it would be a piece of Barbarity to make an act which should debar many French protestants of means of subsisting, either by keeping public schools, or teaching in private families; especially considering the severe hard usage, the government not having above three years past, paid them any part of the 15,000*l.* per ann. allowed by parliament in the civil list, towards the maintenance of their ministers and poor. He concluded with taking notice of the fatal consequences of persecuting the dissenters in king Charles the 1st's reign, which kindled a furious and unnatural civil war, and ended in the total overthrow of Church and State, and in the king's parricide."

The Lord Townshend represented the ill effects of persecution in general. He said he had lived a long time in Holland, and had observed that the wealth and strength of that great and powerful commonwealth lay in the number of its inhabitants: and at the same time he was persuaded, that, if the States should close the schools of any one sect, tolerated in the united provinces, to be shut up, they would soon be as thin of people as Sweden or Spain, whereas they now swarm with inhabitants.

The Lord North and Grey, who spoke for the bill, maintained the general assertion of his party, "That the church was in danger from the growth of schismatics."

The Earl of Nottingham said, "He owned he had formerly been of opinion, that the occasional conformity of dissenters was dangerous to the established church; and therefore he ever promoted the bill to prevent it. But that, the church having now that security, he believed her safe and out of danger; and therefore he thought himself in conscience obliged to oppose so barbarous a law as this, which tended to deprive parents of the natural right of educating their own children. He added he had observed both from history and his own experience, that all the persecutions that had been raised in England against schismatics, originally proceeded from, and tended to favouring Popery." He particularly excepted against that part of the bill, which enacts, "That any person who should keep any public or private school or instruct any youth as tutor, should have a licence of the respective archbishop or bishop of the place, &c. My lords, said he, I have many children; and I know not whether God Almighty will vouchsafe to let me live, to give them the education I could wish they had. Therefore, my lords, I own, I tremble, when I think, that a certain divine who is hardly suspected of being a christian [meaning Dr. Swift] is in a fair way of being a bishop: and may one day give licences to those who shall be intrusted with the instruction of youth." Some other lords made speeches for and against the bill. But the Lord Treasurer contented himself with saying, "That he had not yet considered of it; but when he had, he would vote according as it should appear to him, to be either for the good or detriment of his country. And therefore he was for reading the bill a second time;" which was agreed to without dividing, and put off to the 7th of June.

After this, the presbyterians petitioned that they might be heard by their counsel against the Bill; but their petition was rejected by a majority of 72 against 66. It was observed on this occasion, earl Powlet, the lord Foley, the lord Mansel, and some other friends of the lord-treasurer, voted with the Whig lords, for allowing the Petition; and the Lord-Treasurer himself was out of the house, that he might not be obliged to declare on either side: which strengthened their opinion, who thought the bill levelled against him, with a view, that, if he voted for it, he would lose the Dissenters and the Whigs entirely; if he voted against it, he would lose the queen.

June 7. The Lords read the Schism bill a second time, and after a short debate, agreed, that a clause should be inserted in the bill in favour of the French protestant churches. Two days after in a committee of the whole house, of which the archbishop of York was chairman, the bill was examined paragraph by paragraph, from one in the afternoon till eight in evening.

The Bishop of London having suggested, "That the dissenters had made this bill necessary, by their endeavours to propagate their schism, and to draw the children of churchmen to their schools and academies."

The Lord Halifax answered, That what they did was with the knowledge and consent of the parents, who, in many places, had not sufficient means to educate their own children: for which reason he moved, That since this bill was occasioned, as was suggested, by the dissenters endeavouring to ingross the education of the youth of both persuasions, they might be allowed schools to instruct their own children. This notion, being formed into a question, was debated near three hours. The lord Cowper and Halifax, the earl of Sunderland, and some other peers, made several speeches for the affirmative. But the lord Bolingbroke, the earl of Abingdon, and the lord chancellor, insisted on the negative, which was at last carried by 62 votes against 48.

After this it was moved, That Dissenters might, at least, be suffered to have school-mistresses to teach their children to read, which, after a debate of about half an hour, was carried without dividing; as was also a clause, That this act should not extend to any person, who should instruct youth in reading, writing, arithmetic, or any part of mathematical learning, that relates to navigation, or any mechanical art only. Then was examined that part of the bill, whereby the conviction of offenders against this act was left to the justices of the peace; and, after a warm debate, it was carried by a majority of 59 against 54, that the conviction should be in the ordinary course of justice, upon an information, presentment, or indictment, in any of her majesty's courts of record at Westminster, or at the assizes, or before justices of Oyer and Terminer. The court-party finding, by this last division, that they lost considerable ground, and fearing, other amendments would be made, which would render the bill altogether useless, moved, that the chairman leave the chair, in order to adjourn. But though the contrary party at first opposed it, yet, after some debate, upon the penalties to be inflicted on the offenders, both parties being equally tired; the house adjourned to the next day.

June 10. The Lords resumed the debate about the Penalties, and fixed the same to 3 months imprisonment; after which it was moved and agreed, 'That persons aggrieved might appeal from ecclesiastical censures, as in cases of ordinary jurisdiction.' A clause was afterwards proposed and carried to exempt from the penalties of this act any tutor, who shall be employed by any nobleman or noblewoman, to teach in their families, provided such tutor do, in every respect, qualify himself according to this act, except only in that of taking a licence from the bishop. The earl of Anglesea moved, That a clause might be inserted, to extend this act to Ireland: which after some debate was carried in the affirmative by the majority of one voice only. When the bill with these amendments was reported to the house, several speeches were made against the clause to extend this bill to Ireland: particularly by the duke of Shrewsbury, lord lieutenant of that kingdom, who was just returned from thence. But the question being put, it was carried by 57 against 51, that the clause should stand. The next day the bill was read the third time; and after a small debate, it was carried by 77 votes against 72, that it should pass.

When the bill thus amended was sent to the Commons, a short debate arose. Mr. Lech-mere and Mr. Walpole represented, 'That since the protestant dissenters of Ireland were made liable to the penalties of this bill, it was but just either to insert a clause in it, or to bring in another bill, to make them enjoy the benefit of the toleration act, passed in England in the last reign.' But sir William Wyndham and Mr. Campion said, 'If leave were given to bring in such a bill, they hoped they should have leave also to bring in another to incapacitate dissenters, from voting in elections for parliament-men:' upon which that matter dropped. On the other hand, general Stanhope proposed, 'That the tutors in the families of members of the House of Commons might be put on the same foot with those, who taught in the families of a nobleman or noblewoman; it being reasonable to suppose, that the members of that house, many of whom were of noble extraction, had as great a concern as the best for the education of their children, and as equal right to take care of their instruction.' Several members of both parties were of Mr. Stanhope's opinion. But Mr. Hungerford representing, That the least amendment now made in the house might occasion the loss of the bill, the promoters of it caused the question to be put, and it was carried by a majority of 19 votes against 98, that the Commons agreed to the Lords amendments. On the 25th of June the Schism-bill, with several others, received the royal assent by commission. But it is observable, the very day it was to take place the queen departed this life; which accident broke all the measures of those, who had promoted that law, and rendered it in a manner ineffectual.

Protest against the Schism Bill.] Against the passing of this Bill, was entered the following Protest:

"Dissentient"

"I. We cannot apprehend (as the Bill recites) that great danger may ensue from the Dissenters, to the Church and state.—Because, 1. By law no Dissenter is capable of any station which can be supposed to render him dangerous. 2. And since the several sects of Dissenters differ from each other as much as they do from the established church, they can never form of themselves a national church: nor have they any temptation to set up any one sect among them: for in that case all that the other sects can expect, is only a toleration, which they already enjoy by the indulgence of the state; and therefore, it is their interest to support the established church against any other sect that would attempt to destroy it.—It is nevertheless, the Dissenters were dangerous, severity is not so proper and effectual a method to reduce them to the church, as a charitable indulgence, as is manifest by experience, they having been more Dissenters reconciled to the church since the Act of Toleration, than in the time since the Act of Uniformity, to the time of the said Act of Toleration, and there is scarce one considerable family in England in Communion with the Dissenters: severity is"

ke them hypocrites, but not converts.—III. Severity could be supposed ever to be of use, this is not a proper time for it, while we are encircled with much greater dangers to our rich and nation, against which the Protestant dissenters have joined, and are still willing to stand with us in our defence; and therefore we should not drive them from us; by enforcing laws against them, in a matter which, of others, must most sensibly grieve them, viz. the education of their children; which reduces us to a necessity either of breeding them in a way they do not approve, or of leaving them without instruction.—IV. This must be the more grievous to the Dissenters, because it is little expected from the members of the established church, after so favourable an indulgence as the Act of Toleration, and the repeated declarations and professions from the one, and former parliaments, against all promotion, which is the peculiar badge of the Roman Church, which avows and practises its doctrine; and yet this has not been applied even upon the Papists, for all the laws made against them have been the effects of just punishment of treasons, from time to time committed against the State: but it is pretended that this Bill is designed as a punishment of any crime which the Protestant dissenters have been guilty of against the civil government, or that they are disaffected to the Protestant Succession, as by law established; in this their zeal is very conspicuous.—V. In all the instances of making laws, or of a strict execution of the laws against Dissenters, it is very remarkable, that the design was to weaken the church and to drive them into one common interest with the Papists, and to join them in measures tending to the destruction of

This was the method suggested by Popish ministers, to prepare them for two successive declarations in the time of king Charles 2, and the second one issued out by king James 2, to take away all our civil and religious rights: and we must not think that the arts and contrivances of the Papists to subvert our church, are proper means to preserve it, especially at a time when we are in more danger of Popery than ever the designs of the Pretender, supported by the mighty power of the French king, who is engaged to extirpate our religion, and by great numbers in this kingdom, who are professedly his interests.—VI. But if the Dissenters should not be provoked by this severity, to persevere in the destruction of their country and Protestant Religion, yet we may justly fear they may be driven by this Bill from England, to the great prejudice of our manufactures, for we gain them by the persecution abroad we may lose them by the like proceedings at home. Lastly, The miseries we apprehend are, are greatly enhanced by extending this Bill to Ireland, where the consequences of it may be still more fatal; for since the number of Papists in that kingdom far exceeds the Protestants of all denominations together, and that the Dissenters are to be treated as enemies, or at least, as persons dangerous to that Church and State, who have always, in all times, joined, and still would join, with the members of that church, in their common enemy of their religion; and, since the army there is very much reduced, the Protestants, thus unnecessarily divided, seem to us to be exposed to the danger of another massacre, and the Protestant Religion in danger of being extirpated.—And we may farther fear that the Scots in Britain, whose national church is Presbyterian, will not so heartily and zealously join with us in our defence, when they see those of the same nation, same blood, and same religion, so hardly treated by us.—And this will still be more grievous to the Protestant Dissenters in Ireland, because whilst the Popish Priests are registered, and so indulged by law, as that they exercise their religion without molestation, the Dissenters are so far from enjoying the like Toleration that the laws are by this Bill enforced against them. (Signed) Somerset, Dorchester, Scarborough, Nottingham, Haversham, Halifax, W. Lincoln, Dorset and Middlesex, Sunderland, Bolton, Grafton, Derby, Carlisle, Foley, Greenwich, J. Ely, T. Proclamation for apprehending the Pretender.] June 23. Upon information given to the earl of Wharton, that two Irish officers, Hugh and William Kelly, were enlisting men for the Pretender in London and Westminster, he carried his evidence to Chief-Justice Parker, upon whose warrant William Kelly was seized at Gravesend, with five men enlisted, as Hugh Kelly was a few days after at Deal, with a pass from the earl of Middleton, Secretary of State to the Pretender. This affair having made a great noise, the ministers could not avoid taking notice of those treasonable practices; and a Proclamation was published “for apprehending the Pretender, whenever he should land, or attempt to land in Great Britain, and promising a reward of 5,000*l.* for that service.”

The Commons vote an Address of Thanks thereon.] The next day, Mr. Freeman having moved in the House of Commons for an Address of thanks for the Proclamation, he was seconded by Mr. Auditor Harley, and supported by the earl of Hertford, who added, “That the 5,000*l.* mentioned in the queen’s Proclamation was too small a recompence for so important a service;” and therefore moved for an addition to the Address, “That this House would cheerfully aid and assist her majesty, by granting the sum of 100,000*l.* as a further reward to any, who should perform so great a service to her majesty and her kingdoms.” This was opposed by Mr. Bromley, sir William Windham, and Mr. Campion, who suggested, “That the promising of a reward so far beyond what was mentioned in the queen’s Proclamation, would be a sort of reflection on her majesty.”

The Queen's Answer.] June 24. But this objection being exploded, the Address was unanimously carried, and, four days after, presented by the whole House to the queen, who told them, "That the hearty concern they shewed in it, for the Protestant Succession, was very agreeable to her: and that she hoped, their concurrence would have the desired effect in removing jealousies, and quieting the minds of her good subjects."

Proceedings of the Lords against the Pretender.] The same day the earl of Nottingham moved in the House of Lords for an Address of thanks for the Proclamation against the Pretender, and was seconded by the lord Halifax. The earl of Wharton, who likewise supported the motion, holding the queen's Proclamation in his hand, most pathetically lamented her majesty's owning that her endeavours to remove the Pretender from Lorrain had been ineffectual. "Unhappy princess, (said he) how much is her condition altered! Will posterity believe, that so great a queen, who had reduced the exorbitant power of France, giving a king to Spain, and whose very ministers have made the emperor and the States-General to tremble, should yet want power to make so petty, so inconsiderable a prince as the duke of Lorrain, comply with her just request, of removing out of his dominions the Pretender to her crown?"

The Lords' Address against the Pretender.] None of the peers spoke against the earl of Nottingham's motion, so that the same was carried, nem. con. and the Lords' Address being immediately drawn up, and agreed upon, was, the next day, presented to her majesty as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign,
"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, in a just sense and acknowledgment of your majesty's goodness, return our most humble thanks for the Proclamation which your majesty, at the request of this House, has been graciously pleased to issue, for apprehending the Pretender, in case he should land, or attempt to land, in any of your majesty's dominions.—And since your majesty's instances for removing the Pretender from Lorrain, have hitherto been ineffectual, we take this occasion to repeat our humble request and advice to your majesty, to endeavour, in the most proper and speediest manner, not only to renew the alliances your majesty had with the princes of Europe, but also to invite them, and particularly the emperor and the king of Prussia, into the guaranty of the Protestant Succession as by law established, in the most serene House of Brunswick, and to desire them to join with your majesty, in pressing the duke of Lorrain, not to suffer the Pretender to remain in any part of his dominions.—And since the Papists and nonjurors are so insolent, as not only to support the Pretender's claim to your royal crown, by their writings and discourses, but also traiterously to enlist men into his service, and to send them to France; we most humbly beseech your majesty to issue out your royal Proclamation, promising a reward to all such persons as shall discover to any of your magistrates, and cause to be apprehended any person who hath already lived at person, or hath been listed in Great Britain or Ireland, into the service of the Pretender, or that shall carry such persons abroad.—And we do further pray your majesty to give orders to all your majesty's officers, and magistrates, to put the laws in execution against the Papists and nonjurors, by taking from them their horses and arms, and confining them to their usual habitations, in such manner as by law is directed: And that your majesty will be pleased to require an exact account of their proceedings therein, to be transmitted by them respectively, to your majesty in council, and to direct the same to be laid before this House at their next meeting."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's Answer was as follows:

"My Lords; I thank you kindly for this Address. And I am glad you are pleased with what I have done for the Protestant Succession.—You may be assured I shall continue to do whatever I judge necessary for the securing our religion, the liberty of my people, and by putting an end to the vain hopes of the Pretender."

Debate in the Lords about a Bill to prevent enlisting Soldiers for the Pretender.] The lord Bolingbroke, being come into the House of Peers, just after the above Address was voted, appeared a little surprized at that resolution, and said, 'There was a more effectual way to secure the Succession in the House of Hanover: Some members expressing their desire, that he would offer it to the House, he proposed a bill, to make it high-treason to list, or to be enlisted into the Pretender's service. The lord Halifax represented, 'That such a bill was altogether needless, both the Pretender, and all his adherents, being already attainted of high-treason. However, he should be glad such a bill were brought in, because, with some alterations, it might be made a very good one.' The bill was accordingly brought in, and, in a committee of the whole House, of which the lord Bolingbroke was chairman, the lords Halifax, Townshend, Cowper, Somers, and Wharton, made it their business to shew, 'That the Pretender was inconsiderable of himself, and not to be feared, but so far forth, as he was countenanced and protected by the Pretender, whose interest and constant design was to impose him upon these realms.' And therefore they moved, and it was agreed, That the title of the Bill should be, 'To prevent the listing her majesty's subjects to serve as soldiers, without her majesty's license; and that it should be 'high-treason to list, or be listed, to serve any foreign prince, state, or potentate, without a license under the sign manual of her majesty, her heirs or successors.' The following Proviso was likewise agreed to, 'That no license should be effectual to exempt any person from the penalties of this act, who should list, or cause to be listed into the service of the French king, until after the French king should have disbanded and dismissed all the regiments, troops, or companies of soldiers, which he had in his service, consisting of the natural-born subjects of Great-Britain: this act to continue in force for three years.* With these amendments, the Bill was sent to the Commons, who gave it their concurrence.*

Debate in the Lords about the Spanish Trade.]

July 27. The Lords took into consideration the Trade to Spain and the West-India; and the earl of Nottingham made it plainly appear, that by reason of the discouragements, to which that trade was subjected by the explanations of the third, fifth, and eighth articles of the treaty of commerce between Great-Britain and Spain (which explanations were made at Madrid, after signing the treaty at Utrecht) it was impossible for our merchants to carry on that trade without certain loss. This was confirmed by the testimony of sir William Hodges, and about thirty more eminent merchants, who, being called into the House, unanimously averred, that, unless the explanations of these three articles were rescinded, they could not carry on their commerce without losing twenty or twenty-five per cent. It was observed, the Treasurer joined with the Lords, who insisted on the hearing of the Spanish merchants; which was strenuously opposed by the lord Bolingbroke. But, after a long debate, it was resolved to address the queen, for 'All the papers relating to the negociation of the Treaty of Commerce with Spain; with the names of the persons, who advised her majesty to that Treaty.' The queen sent an Answer, "That, being given to understand, that the three explanatory Articles of the Treaty of Commerce with Spain were not detrimental to the trade of her subjects, she had consented to their being ratified with the Treaty." The queen making no mention of the persons, who had advised her to ratify those explanatory Articles (which was the chief design of the address) several members excepted against the Answer as unsatisfactory. And, among the rest, the earl of Wharton and the lord Halifax represented, 'That, if so little regard was shewn to the addresses and applications of that august assembly to the sovereign, they had no business in that House;' and moved, that a Representation be made to her majesty, to lay before her the insuperable difficulties, that attended the Spanish Trade on the foot of the late Treaty: which was agreed to: it was also moved, That the House should insist on her majesty's naming the persons, who advised her to ratify the three explanatory Articles. But the courtiers warded off that blow, which was chiefly levelled at the lord Bolingbroke, and his agent Arthur Moore.

* "This, and other provisions against the Pretender, seemed the more necessary, because his friends were by this time grown to that height of assurance, as publicly to assert his right, and drink his health. To this purpose, above an hundred Irish papists had a feast at the Sun-tavern in the Strand, where the lord Fingal was chosen steward, and all that came were admitted by a printed ticket, in which was the image of a pope, or popish saint, treading heresy under foot." Tindal.

The next day, the Lords proceeded to the consideration of the Spanish Trade, and to the examination of the Commissioners of Trade and Plantations. The earl of Wharton said ironically, 'He did not doubt but one of those gentlemen could make it appear, that the Treaty of Commerce with Spain was very advantageous;' which was meant of Arthur Moore, who had the chief management of that affair, and who contradicted himself in his answers to several questions; asked him, by the lord Cowper about the three explanatory Articles. This was aggravated by the confession of the other Commissioners, particularly of Mr. Robert Monkton, who declared, Mr. Moore only read cursorily to them the articles, without giving them time to examine the same. Besides which Mr. Pople, their secretary, deposed, that Mr. Moore had shewn him a letter in French from monsieur Orry, directed to don Arturio Moro, importing in substance, 'That he must not expect the 2,000 louis d'ors per annum, that had been promised him, unless he got the three explanatory Articles ratified.' Though the Lords came to no resolution about that affair, at a general court of the South-sea Company, upon a full hearing of a complaint of captain Johnson, it was resolved, 'That Arthur Moore, while a director of this company, was privy to and encouraged a design of carrying on a clandestine trade, to the prejudice of this corporation, contrary to his oath, and in breach of the trust reposed in him; and that, for such his breach of trust, he be declared incapable of being a director of, or having any other employment in this company.' This censure made a great noise, and was highly resented by the lord Bolingbroke.

July 8. The Lords examined Mr. Lowndes, Secretary to the Treasury, and Mr. Taylor, first clerk, concerning the Assiento Contract. They confessed, that they were only nominal assignees for the quarter part of the Assiento contract reserved for the queen, and that some persons, to them unknown (but who were strongly suspected to be the lord Bolingbroke, the lady Masham, and Mr. Arthur Moore) were to have the benefit of it. The lord Cowper having represented, 'That the uncertainty and suspense, in which the South-sea company had a long time been kept, whether her majesty would retain to herself, or give to the Company, the quarter part of the Assiento contract reserved to her, had been the principal obstruction to the Company's carrying on that trade;' the earl of Wharton moved, for an Address to the queen, 'To give to the South-sea Company, not only that quarter part of the Assiento contract, but also the 7½ per cent. granted to Manasses Gilligan, and any other profits arising from that contract.' But, the question being put, it was carried in the negative by 50 voices against 49. After this, on the earl of Anglesea's motion, it was resolved by 56 votes against 40, to present an Address, to return thanks for her majesty's having so generously given, not only licenses for two ships of 500 tuns each, and the Assiento Contract; but also the quarter part, which she was pleased, at first, to reserve to herself; and that she would be pleased, that such other advantages, which were, or might be, vested in her, might be disposed of for the use of the public. This day's debate took up the Lords till nine o'clock in the evening; so they had no time, as some Whig Lords designed it, to proceed to the censure of Mr. Moore.

July 9. The Queen's Answer to their Address was reported: "That she always had a great consideration for the advice of the House: and, as to the particulars desired, she would dispose of them, as she should judge best for the service." The latter part of this Answer was very ill relished by the Whig lords; and some members took occasion to complain of the queen's silence in relation to the persons, who advised her to ratify the three explanatory Articles.

QUEEN ANNE'S LAST SPEECH TO HER PARLIAMENT.] The same day, the Lottery-bill being ready for the royal assent, the queen came to the House of Peers, and put an end to the session with the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"The progress, which has been made in public business, and the season of the year, render it both convenient and necessary, that I should put an end to this session.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons;

"I return you my hearty thanks for all your good services to me and to your country, and particularly for the supplies you have given me, as well to defray the expences of the current year; as towards the discharge of the national debts. In our present circumstances, it could not be expected, that a full provision should be made on both these heads. What you have granted shall be laid out with the best husbandry, and to the greatest advantage.

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"I hope early in the winter to meet you again, and to find you in such a temper, as is necessary for the real improvement of our commerce, and of all the other advantages of Peace. My chief concern is to preserve to you, and to your posterity, our holy religion, and the liberty of my subjects, and to secure the present and future tranquillity of my kingdoms. But I must tell you plainly, that these desirable ends can never be attained, unless you bring the same dispositions on your parts; unless all groundless jealousies, which create and foment divisions amongst you, be laid aside; and unless you shew the same regard for my just prerogative, and for the honour of my government, as I have always expressed for the rights of my people."

When the queen had ended her Speech, the parliament was prorogued to the 10th of August, but she died before that day came.

[Open Rupture among the Ministers.] Presently after the rising of the parliament, the discord among the ministers came to an open rupture. The Treasurer, ever since he had received the staff, had kept to himself the principal direction of domestic affairs, and the disposal of most places of profit; and, by the credit and interest of his post, and favour with the queen, had procured advantageous alliances for his children, brought great riches into his family, and advanced all his relations, whilst the conduct of foreign affairs lay on the lord Bolingbroke, who, as he was less circumspect in the prosecution of bold measures than the Treasurer, had therefore the largest share of the public odium, without any other advantage than the profits of his office, most of which he lavished away in riotous pleasures. Being a man impatient of dependance, he had frequent warm expostulations with the Treasurer, who, thinking himself secure in the queen's favour, and in his interest with the parliament, disregarded his complaints, by which the Secretary was still more enraged. Their private disputes would often have ended in an open quarrel, had not the queen, assisted by the chancellor and lady Masham, as often reconciled them; rather, had not their confederacy in the late measures, made them suspend their mutual hatred to consult their common safety. But, as soon as the danger was over, by the parliament's solemn approbation of the Peace, it appeared, there was an irreconcilable rivalry and enmity between them. Before this last struggle, the Treasurer, either finding his interest declining at court, or despairing of the queen's life, and apprehending the consequences of the late steps, bethought himself of a timely retreat; and, to that end, endeavoured to reconcile himself to the Whigs. He tried to gain the friendship of the lord Cowper, who had the greatest weight amongst them; and, with that view, procured him to be chosen umpire between his son, the lord Harley, and the lord Pelham, in a controversy about the inheritance of the late duke of Newcastle. But the lord Cowper contented himself with arbitrating the matter according to the strictest rules of equity, and with doing justice to the son, without espousing the interest of the father. On the other hand, the Treasurer expected to be strongly supported by the duke of Shrewsbury, who had maintained himself in the esteem both of the sovereign and of the public, and whose late behaviour in Ireland had endeared him to the well-affected to the Hanover succession. But the duke, justly resenting the neglect of the ministers, while he was at Dublin, was very much unconcerned about them, when he came to London, and rather inflamed than moderated their differences, by complaining to the queen of some orders, that had been sent him, which he thought inconsistent with her majesty's and the nation's service. Notwithstanding these disappointments, the Treasurer formed a design of removing his competitor, as the best means to approve his affection to the Protestant succession, and therefore set Mr. Robert Monkton against Mr. Arthur Moore (the lord Bolingbroke's creature) who narrowly escaped a censure in the House of Peers, in which the Treasurer hoped the Secretary might have been involved. But, in this very instance, the Treasurer found he had lost considerable ground at court, the queen having thought fit, at the lord Bolingbroke's desire, to put a sudden stop to that inquiry. And it appeared soon after, that, by his superior interest with lady Masham, by the assistance of the lord chancellor, by his humouring the queen's natural inclination, and boldly pursuing the measures he had entered upon, the Secretary entirely ruined his rival in her favour and confidence.*

The Treasurer, in this situation of his affairs, wrote a Letter to the queen, and with it sent her an Account of Public Affairs from August the 8th, 1710, to June the 8th, 1714;† in which he endeavours to justify his own conduct, and expose the uneasy, turbulent, and ambitious spirit of lord Bolingbroke. But this did not the intended effect upon the queen.

The Lord Treasurer Oxford removed.] While the court was in this ferment, something happened, which hastened the Treasurer's disgrace. Some pretend, the lord Bolingbroke had intelligence, and informed the queen of the Treasurer's inviting the duke of Marlborough to come over (for which purpose the duke was indeed arrived at Ostend) and of his private conferences with several Whig Lords: hers, that he was suspected of discovering the queen's counsels to the court of Hanover, and even of putting them upon demanding a writ from the duke of Cambridge: others again, that he was both against the scheme of new-moulding the army, and the project of a new offensive and defensive league between Great-Britain, France, Spain, Sweden, and Sicily: and others, still, that the queen was extremely angry at his presuming to send orders to Ireland without consulting with her or the council; and that the duke of Shrewsbury insisted on his removal, which the duke of Marlborough had made a previous condition of his return to England. But a certain Author (who writes in vindication) plainly asserts, that his disgrace is entirely owing to his attachment to the cause of Hanover, whose succession his enemies were resolved to prevent. However this be, on the 20th of July the Chancellor (who had retired into the country for a few days) was sent for in haste; and the next day was in a conference with the queen and the lord Bolingbroke; after which it was generally reported, the Treasurer would be speedily removed. It was said at the same time, that, to soften his fall, the queen designed to bestow on him an annual pension of 5,000*l.* for life, with the title of duke of Newcastle; and, upon his recommendation, to give the title of earl of Clare to the lord Pelham. But, contrary to his own, and indeed the general expectation, when he came to court on the 27th of July the staff was taken from him, rather with mortifying than agreeable circumstances. It is certain, that severe reproaches passed, in the queen's hearing, between the falling minister, and the Lord Chancellor, and the lady Masham, whom the Treasurer had disobliterated some days before, by making a demur to a grant she had obtained of 1,500*l.* a year, and whom he looked upon as accessory to his disgrace! He told them, 'He had been wronged and abused by lies and misrepresentations; but he should be revenged, and leave some people as low as he found them.' These expostulations could not but shock the sick queen, and give her uneasy suspicions of her being abused and deluded by one or two, if not by all three, of her principal ministers. It is pretended, that in this agitation of thought, which opened her eyes, she resolved to resign herself wholly to the conduct of the duke of Shrewsbury. But it can hardly be supposed, that in her condition, she was capable of forming a resolution so inconsistent with her late measures. It is far more reasonable to imagine that the lord Bolingbroke, having gained so great an ascendant over her, was most likely to succeed the earl of Oxford in the management of affairs. This is certain, the very day, the Treasurer was removed, the lord Bolingbroke entertained at dinner the generals Stanhope, Cadogan, and Palmes, sir William Wyndham, Mr. Craggs, and some other gentlemen; which meeting of men of such opposite principles occasioned various speculations. The most probable conjecture was, that the lord Bolingbroke, considering he could not depend on the queen's precarious life to accomplish his designs, and foreseeing a storm, he could not be able to weather, resolved to strike in with the Whigs, and to invite over the duke of Marlborough; in which he had reason to expect better success than his late rival, with whom the duke had vowed never to be reconciled. Some other particulars were at that time mentioned to corroborate these suggestions. But though the duke of Marlborough, after having been detained about a fortnight by contrary winds, did, at this very time, embark at Ostend for England; yet the true motive of his coming at this critical juncture is not certainly known. It appeared plainly, however, soon after, that, whatever were the lord Bolingbroke's thoughts and views at this time, the main design of the Whigs was to inflame the animosity between him and the earl of Oxford as the readiest way to ruin them both.

Great Confusion at Court.] The Treasurer's removal was so sudden, and occasioned such confusion, that no scheme was either formed

er agreed on, to supply his place, and to fill up such other vacancies, as must naturally attend his disgrace. A cabinet-council, or rather chamber-consultation, was indeed held in a hurry, the very night the earl of Oxford was removed, and several persons were proposed to manage the treasury, which was designed to be put in commission. Their number was to be five, of which sir William Wyndham, as chancellor of the Exchequer, was to be one; but the choice of the other four perplexed both the queen and her counsellors. It is said, the persons named were the lords Bolingbroke, Paget, Lexington, Bathurst, and Masham; the bishop of London, Mr. Henry Boyle, and Mr. Bridges; sir John Packington, Mr. Campion, Mr. Hill, and some others. But, whether there were fewer or more in nomination, it is certain, no resolution was taken as to the choice of any four, either in that first consultation, or in the council held the next morning; several persons who had been proposed, and spoken to, having declined to accept a precarious employment in such a juncture. On the 29th of July, the cabinet-council was to have sat on the same affair; but their meeting was deferred to the next day, by reason of the queen's indisposition, which, she was sensible, was occasioned by the late quarrelling among her servants, having intimated to one of her physicians, "That she should not outlive it."

THE QUEEN'S SICKNESS AND DEATH.

It is certain, both the dispute, to which she was an ear-witness, and the consultation upon it, which lasted till near two o'clock in the morning, occasioned such a violent agitation of the queen's spirits, as could not but hinder, according to Dr. Shadwell's opinion, the usual discharge of the imposthumation in her leg, so that the gouty humour, translating itself upon the brain, was the immediate occasion of her death. On Thursday morning (July 29), the queen finding herself indisposed with a dozing heaviness, and a shooting pain in her head, the physicians judged proper she should be cupped, which she liked better than bleeding, and which, in the same symptoms, had often given her ease. The queen was now something relieved by it; went to bed at the usual hour; rested pretty well till three o'clock on Friday morning, (July 30) when she waked; and finding something heavy on her stomach, and reaching to vomit, she brought up some matter, and then composed herself to sleep. Towards seven o'clock she waked again; and, finding herself pretty well, rose from bed, and got her head combed. This done, towards eight, she went to look on the clock; and Mrs. Danvers, one of her bed-chamber women, taking notice, that she fixed her eyes a long time upon it, asked her, 'What she saw in the clock more than ordinary?' The queen answered her only with turning her head, and a dying look; at which Mrs. Danvers being frightened, she called for help. The physicians judging she was seized with a fit of an apoplexy, caused her to be let blood; upon which she came to herself again, and was pretty quiet till a little after nine, when she was seized with a second fit of heaviness and dozing, which increased so much upon her, that for above an hour she was speechless and motionless. Those about her judging, she was either dead, or near expiring, the duchess of Ormond, one of the ladies of the bed-chamber, then in waiting, sent, with all speed, a messenger to the duke her husband, with this melancholy news, which being brought to the committee of council, then assembled at the Cockpit, they immediately went to Kensington. In the mean time the physicians thought fit to give the queen a vomit, which not having all the desired effect, they administered another medicine, proposed by Dr. Mead; upon which she recovered her speech and senses.

The dukes of Somerset and Argyle, being informed of the queen's desperate condition, instantly repaired to Kensington, and, without being summoned, went into the council-chamber, where the lord-chancellor, the dukes of Shrewsbury and Ormond, the three secretaries of state, the bishop of London, and some others, were in a committee. It is easy to imagine, that some of them were surprized at their coming in; but, after they had acquainted the board with the reasons which brought them thither, the duke of Shrewsbury returned them thanks for their readiness to give the council their assistance in that critical juncture. Then they took their places, and moved, that the physicians might be examined, and ordered to give an account in writing of the queen's illness, which they did. After this, one of the council represented, how necessary it was, in case the queen died, that the place of lord-treasurer should be filled; to which the whole board assenting, the duke of Shrewsbury was proposed, and unanimously approved, as the fittest person for that high trust. Sir Richard Blackmore, Dr. Shadwell, Dr. Mead, and the other physicians, who were examined, having assured the council, that the queen was sensible, the Chancellor, with the duke of Shrewsbury, and some other lords, were ordered to attend her, and by before her the unanimous opinion of the council; upon which she said, 'They could not commend a person she liked better than the duke of Shrewsbury;' and, giving him the treasurer's staff, bid him 'use it for the good of her people.' The duke would have returned the lord-chamberlain's staff, but she desired he would keep them both; so the same person was at once possessed of three of the highest places of trust, honour, and profit, under the crown of Great Britain, being lord-treasurer, lord-chamberlain, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke's advancement to the post of lord-treasurer immediately changed the face of affairs; baffled the lord Bolingbroke's schemes; alarmed the friends of the Pretender; and revived the spirits of the well affected to the Hanover succession. Upon the motion of the dukes of Somerset and Argyle, it was agreed, that all privy counsellors, in or about London, without inction, should attend; which the lord Somers, and some other friends to the house of Hanover, did that very day.

About three o'clock in the afternoon, the queen relapsed into a lethargy or apoplectic fit, out of which she hardly recovered by the application of the spirit of sal ammoniac to her nostrils. The physicians thought fit to apply blisters; but, at the same time, acquainted the council, that the queen's life was in the utmost danger, and entirely depended on the effect of his last remedy.

The queen continued all night in a lethargic state, which increased to such a degree about ten o'clock on Saturday morning, (July 31), that all the physicians despaired of her life. Upon this the privy council sent orders to the heralds at arms, and to a troop of life-guards, to be in readiness to mount, in order to proclaim the elector of Brunswick king of Great Britain. At the same time, they caused a letter to be written to his electoral highness, to acquaint him "With the extreme danger the queen's life was in; with the measures they had taken to secure the crown to him; and to desire him to repair, with all convenient speed, to Holland, where a British squadron, that was fitting out with all possible expedition, would attend him, and bring him over, in case of the queen's death." This letter was that very morning sent express by Mr. James Craggs, and with him orders were dispatched to the earl of Strafford, to desire the states General to get ready to perform the guarantee of the Protestant Succession, if need should require.

The queen gave some signs of life between eleven and one o'clock, and took some spoonfuls of broth. She continued in a lethargic condition till about six in the afternoon, when her pulse beating a little faster and higher, she about her began to entertain some hopes. But the blisters not having had the desired effect, she expired on Sunday the 1st of August, a little after seven o'clock in the morning, having lived forty-nine years, five months, and six days, and reigned twelve years and five months, wanting seven days. She was not able, either to receive the Sacrament, which the bishop of London was ready to administer, or to sign the draught of a will, whereby she directed her burial to be in the same manner and place with her late royal consort; and in which she left legacies to some of her servants.

Queen Anne, as to her person, was middle sized, and well made, but not so majestic as her sister queen Mary. Her hair dark brown; her complexion sanguine and ruddy; her face round, rather comely than handsome; her features strong and regular; and the only blemish in her face was owing to the distension she had, when young, in her eyes, which left a contraction in the upper lids, and gave a loudness to her countenance. Her bones were small, and hands beautiful. She had a very good ear for music, and performed on the guitar, an instrument formerly much in vogue. Her voice was remarkably clear and harmonious, which particularly appeared, in the graceful delivery of her speeches to the parliament. She was reckoned a pattern of conjugal affection, and a prudent indulgent mother. She was liberal though an enemy to luxury and profuseness. She was very reserved; and in all conditions of life, she required a strict attendance from all persons in their respective stations; she herself being nicely observant of all the decourum of a court.

The exercise she principally loved was hunting, which she practised in her chaise; but the gout increasing upon her, and growing extremely unwholesome, she desisted that and other diversions, conducive to her health, which perhaps might have been longer preserved, had she not eat so much, an unhappiness derived to her not from her father, who was abstemious enough, but from her mother.

It was her unhappiness not to be much acquainted with our English history, and the actions of her predecessors, whereas, queen Mary was extremely well versed, not only in our own, but the histories of other countries.

Her reign may be called bloodless, not one person having been executed, at least beheaded, for treason, during the whole course of it; which cannot be said of any reign since the time of Edward 1, who died in 1307.

Semper eadem was the motto of queen Elizabeth, which queen Anne assumed upon her accession to the throne; and which had she pursued with the same resolution and steadiness, she might have exceeded her in glory and fame. But in one thing she was very unlike queen Elizabeth, whom she proposed for her pattern. Queen Elizabeth was very sparing of her honours, and a man must have deserved it before he could obtain so much as a knighthood at her hands: whereas queen Anne made more peers of the realm at once, than the other did in a reign of forty-four years. Indeed, her great grandfather king James, was the first that was lavish in conferring honour, whose example was but too much followed by his descendants; so that queen Anne was not singular in that respect, except in creating so many together, for an end that will remain a blemish upon her administration, as long as history endures.—In queen Anne ended the line of the Stuarts; their merit and demerit may be rightly stated, by considering what their regards or disregards were to the welfare of Europe: to the union and strengthening of the protestant interest; and to the quiet and prosperity of their subjects. In order to make up such an account duly and accurately, many important materials are still wanting.—There had been a new vault made on the south-side and towards the east-end of Henry 7th's chapel, to deposit the body of king Charles 2, in which that prince, queen Mary, king William 3, and prince George of Denmark were laid. Here the remains of queen Anne were likewise deposited, and there being no more room left, the vault is closed up with brickwork.*

DUKES, 8.

James Hamilton, D. of Hamilton

* " Whilst the queen was bestowing her favours on the church-party in England, some alterations were made in Scotland, which were as advantageous to the Anti-revolutioners and Episcopalians, as they were displeasing to the Presbyterians. The earl of Marchmont, lord chancellor; the earl of Melvil, president of the council; earl of Selkirk, lord register; Adam Cockburne, of Ormiston, treasurer-deputy; sir John Maxwell, of Pollock, justice-clerk; earl of Leven, governor of the castle of Edinburgh; and the earl of Hyndford, one of the secretaries of state, were all laid aside. On the other hand, the duke of Queensberry, and the lord viscount Tarbat, were made secretaries of state; and the earl of Seafield, chancellor; the marquis of Annandale, president of the council; the earl of Tulibardin, (afterwards duke of Athol) lord privy-seal; the lord Boyle, treasurer-deputy; Mr. Roderick Mackenzey, of Preston-hall, justice-clerk; sir James Murray, of Phillipburgh, lord register; and the earl of March, governor of Edinburgh-castle. And though all these, except the earl of March, had, at or since the revolution, been deeply engaged against the interest of king James and his family; yet the duke of Queensberry and his two dependants, the lord Boyle and Sir James Murray, pretended to be quite of another mind: The marquis of Annandale, earl Seafield, and viscount Tarbat, valued themselves upon having, once, opposed king William; and the marquis, every body believed, would, if kindly dealt with, go along with the prevailing party. But, before this change in the ministry was perfected, the scantiness of the funds provided by the last parliament, and the difficulties in collecting them, rendered it absolutely necessary to call a new parliament to sit in the spring of the year 1703. And therefore the earl of Seafield, then secretary of state, came down from London to Scotland, to influence the elections, which, by a concurrence of several accidents were so managed, that a greater number of Anti-revolutioners were chosen than had been known in any former parliament. At the same time, duke Hamilton, and some others, who had been the greatest persecutors of the Presbyterians, set up for patrons of the Episcopal clergy, and obtained from the queen a letter to the privy-council of Scotland, wherein, among other things, she said: ' We do, in the first place, recommend to your care the church now established by law, in it's superior and inferior judicatures, such as sessions, presbyters, synods, and general assemblies; as also in the exercise of their holy functions, and in what concerns their persons and benefices. We are informed, that there are many Dissenters who, albeit they differ from the established church in opinion, as to church government and form, yet are of the Protestant Reformed Religion, some of which are in possession of benefices, and others exercise their worship in meeting-houses. It is our royal pleasure, that they should be directed to live suitably to the Reformed Religion, which they profess, submissively to our laws; decently and regularly with relation to the church established by law, as good Christians and subjects; and, in so doing, that they be protected in the peaceable possession of their religion, and in their persons and estates, according to the laws of the kingdom. And we recommend to the clergy of the established discipline their living in brotherly love and communion with such Dissenters.'

"Encouraged by these expressions, and the queen's repeated assurances that she would maintain the church of England, and even the least member of it, in all their just rights and privileges; the Episcopal clergy framed an address, to which with great pains and many indirect methods, they procured many subscriptions, and which was presented to the queen, the 13th of March, by Dr. Skeen and Dr. Scot, introduced by the duke of Queensberry (who nine days before had been appointed high-commissioner) and viscount Tarbat.

"The queen, in her answer, assured them of her protection, and endeavours to supply their necessities as far as conveniently she could, and recommended to them to live in peace and Christian love with the clergy, who were by law invested with the church-government in her ancient kingdom of Scotland.

"The next thing, which the enemies of the revolution improved to their advantage, was a proclamation of indemnity published by the queen, on the 6th of March, 1702-3. It was set up for a maxim by the new ministry, that all the Jacobites were to be invited home; and therefore the proclamation was of a very large extent, indemnifying all persons for all treasons committed before April last, without any limitation of time for their coming home to accept of this grace, and without demanding any security of them for the future. Upon this, considerable numbers of Jacobites came over to Scotland from St. Germain's and other parts of France, though they had forfeited their lives to the law by corresponding with the enemy, and practising against the government in king William's reign. Some of them pretended to be new converts, and together with others at home, who had stood out all king William's time, qualified themselves to sit in parliament by taking the oaths. The Anti-revolutioners, being proud of this accession of strength, thought themselves in a condition to prescribe terms to the government, and carried matters to an unaccountable height.

"This was the posture of affairs in Scotland, before and at the time, when the queen found it necessary to satisfy the nation by calling a new parliament. The Episcopal party thought themselves so secure of a majority, that they every where gave out, they should be able to vote down Presbytery, and to restore patronages, or at least to carry a toleration, so as their own clergy might be called to benefices, as well as the Presbyterians. Nor did their confidence terminate in humbling the Presbyterians of Scotland, but they flattered themselves also with the hopes of mortifying the Revolution-party of the Church of England; and this they were prompted to expect by a north-country clergyman, turned out in 1699 for refusing the oaths to king William, whom they had since employed as their agent at London, and who, upon the death of that prince, in a letter to those who employed him in Scotland, expressed himself thus. "The church of England was so much out of order during the late reign, that it will take some time to put matters right, which her majesty is firmly resolved to see to with all convenient haste." Thus they endeavoured to spread the belief, that [the queen was their friend, while the greatest part of them not only refused to swear allegiance to her, but some of those who had taken the oaths, made no scruple openly to confess, that they swore to her only as a Tutrix or Regent, during the minority of her supposed brother. By this it appears, that the whole kingdom of Scotland was in a ferment at the sitting down of the parliament. The country-party (which took its rise from the affair of Darien, and had disputed the legality of the continuance of the convention-parliament) of which duke Hamilton and the marquis of Tweeddale were the leaders, insisted upon the redress of those grievances, which the country laboured under in the former reign. The Presbyterians in general, and others of revolution principles, who were headed by the duke of Argyle, were alarmed at the bold proceedings of the Anti-revolutioners, of whom the earl of Hume was chief. This divided the country party among themselves; for, most of that party in the late reign being Revolution-men, they were jealous of the new accession of Anti-revolutioners; and therefore it was not possible for them to concert measures together. Their jealousies were heightened by new discoveries, which the anti-revolutioners had made of their sentiments in council and elsewhere: that they were against ratifying the several steps of the revolution, and the proceedings of king William's parliament on that head; but thought best to pass it over as a thing extraordinary and out of course; and alleged, that all parties might be safe enough under the shelter of her Majesty's general in-lemnity. The revolutioners knowing well, that according to the whole constitution of the kingdom, general pardons granted out of parliament afford but little safety, when questioned in parliament, despised the motion, and thought it to leave those to plead the indemnity, who believed they needed it, but conceived themselves not to be of that number, and therefore resolved upon a parliamentary ratification of the revolution. This they judged to be the most effectual way to prevent after-blows from the opposite party, whose designs became more suspicious by their insisting on a dissolution of the garrison of Inverlochy, which was a great curb upon the Popish Highlanders, and rigid prelatists of the north, the great strength of the Anti-revolution party. In this disposition of affairs the parliament met at Edinburgh, the 6th day of May 1703." Tindal.

The Queen's Letter.] The Duke of Queensberry, her majesty's Commissioner, having taken his seat on the throne, the Queen's Letter was read as follows:

“ My Lords and Gentlemen; We thought to have brought you sooner together in this meeting of parliament, but the great and weighty affairs, wherein we have been engaged this winter, were a necessary hindrance.—We have on several occasions, given you and all our good subjects assurance of our firm resolution to maintain and protect them in their religion, rights and liberties, as at present established by law. And if there be any thing else wanting for the satisfaction of our people, and the security of that our ancient kingdom, we shall be always ready to have it timely provided for and supplied.—You see that we continue engaged in a great and necessary war for the defence of the Protestant Religion, and the preservation of the liberty of Christendom; and we hope you will be careful to guard against all dangers that this war may threaten; for which end, we recommend to you more particularly the consideration of the state of our forces, forts, and garrisons, that they be duly and sufficiently maintained, and the necessary supplies granted for that effect, and all kept in such order, as may be most condading to the ease, as well as safety of the country.—We also recommend to your care, that trade be encouraged, and all methods taken for the advancement thereof, either by amending former laws, or making new ones, or any thing else that may be found needful and expedient for the benefit of the kingdom.—It hath been, and shall always be our chief study and endeavour, to establish and secure the peace, and promote the good of that our ancient kingdom; and therefore we do expect your concurrence and assistance for such good and great ends; and that you will prosecute them with that wisdom, prudence and unanimity, as may most tend to our common advantage and satisfaction; but chiefly, that effectual means may be laid down for promoting of religion, virtue and true piety, and suppressing vice and immorality, and providing for the poor.—We have appointed our right trusty and entirely beloved cousin and counsellor James duke of Queensberry, to be our commissioner, to represent our royal person in this session of parliament, being well satisfied that the experience that both we and you have had of his great abilities and fidelity in his former discharge of his trust, will fully commend our choice, and render him to you acceptable.—This being your first meeting, and we having recommended nothing but what is for your own security and welfare, we confidently expect a suitable return, and a dutiful and cheerful concurrence in what we propose, and that, all differences and animosities laid aside, you will, with concord and diligence, bring matters to such a happy conclusion, as shall establish a lasting union between us and our people. So we bid you heartily farewell.”

—Given at our Court at St. James's the 30th day of March, 1703, and of our reign the second year.”

The Lord High Commissioner's Speech.] The Lord High Commissioner, the duke of Queensberry, then made the following Speech:

“My Lords and Gentlemen; Her majesty has been graciously pleased to give ample and frequent assurances to maintain and protect the religion, laws and liberties of this her ancient kingdom, and the present constitution of the church: if any thing be wanting for the ease and satisfaction of her majesty's good subjects, I am sufficiently instructed and empowered in what may be thought expedient to be proposed for that end.—The close conjunction of the two monarchies, which in their turns have designed to enslave Europe and extirpate our religion, made it just and necessary for her majesty to be engaged in the war; and her early appearance gave life and vigour to the Confederacy, and particular encouragement to the Protestant princes and states. God has hitherto blessed the army of her majesty and her allies, with glorious success both by sea and land: So that there is a stop put to the victories, and a check given to the encroaching power of France. It cannot but be great satisfaction to us, to be under the benign government of a Protestant Queen: We enjoy the comforts of peace, and feel neither the effects of tyranny, nor the disorders of war, in which so many are involved: but we ought not to be too secure, and it were to tempt our enemies to form designs, or make insults against us, if they see us in no condition of defence. All her majesty proposes to you, is for yourselves, without mingling any particular concern of her own; it is to continue the provision for the forces on the establishment, and to furnish and repair the forts and garrisons; which is so necessary, that I cannot doubt of your ready compliance with her majesty's desires: and your cheerfulness in it, will be very acceptable to her majesty, observable to the world, and a great evidence of your loyalty and affection, which will add much to the value of what you offer. The decay and present low condition of Trade requires your prudent and special consideration: her majesty on her part is willing to concur with you in any thing that may contribute to encourage and restore it, either by making new laws or amending the present ones.—My Lords and Gentlemen, It has pleased her majesty to honour me with a character to represent her royal person in this session of parliament; I am very sensible of the great weight and difficulties which do attend that trust, but my encouragement is from the confidence I have of her majesty's goodness, in believing my sincerity and zeal for her service, and that in her royal wisdom, she is so careful of her people, that I am not charged with any thing that can be constructed to be against the interest of the kingdom, which gives me assurance of your hearty concurrence, and I shall very faithfully report what services are done by every person to her majesty and the Nation.”

The Lord High Chancellor's Speech.] The Lord High Chancellor, the earl of Seafeld, spoke thus:

“My Lords and Gentlemen; Her Majesty's accession to the throne of her royal ancestors, is the great happiness of all her Majesty's dominions: She has ever firmly adhered to the Protestant Religion, and may justly be called the defender of the Protestant interest in Europe; and all who have had the honour to have more immediate access to her Majesty's person, or who have duly considered the whole steps of her Majesty's government, must be convinced, that it is her Majesty's chief design, to make all her subjects happy. You have heard her Majesty's most gracious Letter, and his grace my Lord Commissioner's Speech, and it must certainly give you who are the representatives of this kingdom, convened by her Majesty's authority, great satisfaction, that her Majesty does give you full assurance of her royal resolution, to maintain her people in the possession of their religion, of their laws and of their liberties; and has also frequently promised her protection to the government of the church: but if any thing be yet needful for the ease, contentment and satisfaction of her Majesty's subjects, her Majesty has given full instructions, as my Lord Commissioner has signified; so that nothing is wanting on her part, and nothing is proposed or demanded by her,

at what is necessary for the security and prosperity of this kingdom.—Her Majesty is engaged in a most just and necessary war, for the defence of the liberties of Europe, against the formidable power of the French king; and as we are to be thankful to God for the success her Majesty's arms have had, so we ought to give her Majesty all the support and assistance in our power, it being so necessary for our own defence; and all that her Majesty demands is, that you provide for your own security, by giving such supplies, as may be further necessary for maintaining her Majesty's forces, and repairing and providing for the forts and garrisons, the doing of which will be a convincing proof of that intimate union and confidence which is betwixt her Majesty and her people, and will be the most effectual means to disappoint the designs of our enemies, and to preserve the peace and tranquillity we now enjoy.—The trade of this kingdom does deserve our particular consideration, the advancing and improvement of it is the only mean to increase the wealth and riches of this nation, and the doing of which you have full assurance of her Majesty's concurrence; our manufactures are very much improved, and ought to have all encouragement, but we have almost no foreign trade, and all our towns and incorporations are thereby much impoverished. You are now an opportunity of doing what you shall think necessary in this matter, either by mending laws that may be prejudicial to trade, or by making new ones, or reviving such as are in desuetude.—My Lords and Gentlemen, seeing her Majesty's chief care is to make all her subjects happy and contented, let us therefore in compliance with her Majesty's just demands, cordially and unanimously concur to support her Majesty's authority and government, to advance religion and true piety, to discourage vice and immorality, to promote and improve trade, and to do every thing that is necessary for the honour, interest and security of this kingdom, that so all may be concluded that comes before you, to the satisfaction of her Majesty, and the good and welfare of her people."

Proceedings on the Act for recognising her Majesty.] This done, duke Hamilton, after a speech proper to the subject, offered the draught of a Bill, for Recognising her Majesty's undoubted Right and Title to the imperial Crown of Scotland, according to the declaration of the states of the kingdom, containing the Claim of Right, which was received and read the first time, and a second reading unanimously ordered, the 15th of May, when the queen's advocate, sir James Stuart, offered an additional clause, "That it should be treason to quarrel with her Majesty's right and title to the crown, or her exercise of the government from her actual entry to the same." This clause being read, it was urged by some, that it was dishonourable to her majesty, because it implied, that the house were giving her Majesty an indemnity for the actings and exercise of her power since her accession to the throne. It was answered, that the words meant only in general her majesty's right to exercise her power. To which it was replied, that, whatever was the meaning of those, who had offered the clause, yet the words could admit of no such meaning, unless either the last part of the clause was altered thus, 'her being in the exercise of the government.' To this it was again answered, in behalf of the clause, That by the late queen Mary's death, without heirs of her body, the right of succession came to the queen; upon the prospect of king William's death, seeing by the entail she was to succeed 'before any children' of his body. But that the exercise did never accrue to her till his actual death and her actual accession; and therefore it was proper not only 'to recognize her right to the succession;' but also 'to recognize her actual exercise;' and to secure it by a sanction of treason. To this it was replied by the duke of Hamilton's friends, that these rights spoken of did not import any other, than the apparent right of an heir before or after his immediate predecessor's death; the first of which naturally vanishes upon the existence of the second. That the act, as at first offered, fully recognized these and all manner of rights, which were or could be in her majesty's person; but that the clause now offered did most dishonourably superadd a ratification and sanction of her majesty's exercise, and must point at one of these three things: First, either it supposed, that there had been something lame and defective in her majesty's right and title above-mentioned, which had been since her actual succession, supplied by her majesty's acts, of administration and exercise, and therefore her exercise was proposed to be ratified towards validating her infirm title. But, as there was not the least defect in her majesty's right and title, therefore this clause was unnecessary and dangerous. That, in the second place, the clause insinuated, that her majesty, since her accession, had exercised some acts of administration; to indemnify which, a vote of this house seemed necessary. That, whatever might be charged upon the ministry, it was the highest indignity done to her majesty, to expose her exercise of her royal power to the least suspicion by such a clause. And, in the last place, no other reason could be given for the tenaciousness of the ministry in promoting a clause so dishonourable to the queen, but that they themselves must be conscious, that, contrary to law, they had been instrumental in advising her majesty, 'to exercise some acts of administration,' such as the calling together the late parliament, which had continued during all the 'time of the late reign,' and promoting in it some commission, laws, and powers, beyond the limitations, which determined the being, and circumscribed the power of that parliament: And, being sensible, that their advice might very justly rebound upon themselves: they shuffled in this dishonourable clause, hoping, 'under the name of her majesty's exercise, to shelter themselves: But that, whatever might become of this clause at this time it was hoped, that the wisdom of the house would, in due time, pass a censure on those advices, which were like to discompose her majesty's quiet, and endanger the welfare of the nation. The duke of Hamilton concluded with saying, 'That he had the honour of offering this act for recognizing her majesty's authority, right, and title; that he had been in hopes, that so dutiful an act would have passed the vote of this house with all imaginable cheerfulness; and that he was both sorry and surprised to find anything thrown in, which could create the least demur in it; but let those answer for it, who were the authors.' After a long debate, it was again moved, that instead of the words, 'her exercise of the government,' the following words might be added, 'her being in the exercise of the government.' But, by the concurrence of the Cavaliers, it was carried by a considerable majority, that the clause brought in by the queen's advocates should be added to the act, which, on the 19th of May, was touched by the sceptre, and made a law; but, before that was done, duke Hamilton desired, 'That it should be remembered, that, at passing this act, it was expressly declared, that the meaning of the advocate's clause could affect only the queen's exercise of her government, and not the actings of her ministry: And that, therefore, whatever challenge might be given afterwards to the illegality of the actings of the late parliament, might not be considered as a violation of this act.

After the act had received the royal assent, the earl of Hume, who was one of those, that had qualified him since king William's death, presented the draught of an act for the supply, but, before it was read, the marquis of Tweeddale said, that he had an Overture to make to the house, which he hoped would, by reason of its importance, be preferred to all other business. After some debate, it was agreed, that the Draught and Overture should both be read, provided, that nothing should be spoken to either. And accordingly the Act for supplying was read, as was afterwards the marquis of Tweeddale's Overture 'for a resolve of parliament, that, before all other business, the parliament might proceed to make such conditions of government, and regulations in the constitution of this kingdom, to take place after the decease of her majesty and heirs of her body, as should be necessary for the preservation of their religion and liberty.' Both which overtures were ordered to lie on the table.

Proceedings on the Supply.] May 26. The commissioner from the throne informed the house, "That having now sat twenty days, he did not doubt but they were all convinced, that the present state of affairs required a competent supply for maintaining the army: That the act, offered a week before for that purpose, had ever since lain upon the table: Wherefore he desired, that it might be now read and promised, that they should have full time afterwards allowed them to go upon other business." Notwithstanding this speech, it was moved, that, before the supply, the marquis of Tweeddale's Overture should be taken into consideration. Upon this the debate turned into a competition, whether the Act of Supply, or the Overture, should first take place? In behalf of the Overture, was urged the great importance of it; and in behalf of the Supply, the necessity of it, and the commissioner's promise, that after the first reading of the supply act, there should be time given for other business. To this a member answered, "That he had all the deference imaginable for the best commissioner's assurances, and doubted not that the whole house had the same; but he doubted extremely, that his grace could be master of himself in that point. Who knows (added he) but that, after all his grace's good purposes, the treasurer of England may cause to adjourn the house, when he shall think fit, notwithstanding all the assurances which the ministry can give. It is too well felt, that the influence of foreign counsels, from one corner of the world or other, have determined Scots affairs for these many years; and there is no appearance of discontinuing these practices." He concluded, "That from the matter of this Overture might arise such settlements, as might make a Scots man stand upon a Scots bottom: and therefore it was fit to prefer the consideration of it to any other business whatsoever."

Another member urged, upon the point of the abrupt adjournment of the parliament, "That it must still be fresh in every man's memory, that insults were made upon the sovereignty and independency of this nation, in the matter of their late trading company, both before their settlement in Darien by the legal actings of the Scots parliament, and by the scandalous memorials given in by the English resident at Hamburg, most falsely representing the Scots company as private persons, having no authority: as also, by the said resident's using threatening denunciations and expressions against the Hamburgers, if they should receive into any trading society with them: And likewise, after that company was settled in Darien by their most barbarous and inhuman execution of some proclamations issued out against them. That, whether these most injurious stretches were calculated really for the sake of an interest altogether foreign to this island, it was not proper here to dispute: but, that it was certain, that this had raised an insuperable jealousy in the Scots nation, which could not in some time or other, to break forth into consequences dangerous to both nations. And therefore he concurred with those noble and worthy members in promoting the Overture, from which he should expect, that some law should be enacted towards regulating the administration and government at home, as to deliver a Scot's prince and ministry from foreign influence, and might thereby conthose hurtful jealousies, in all times coming, to be mutual peace and quiet of the whole island."

After several warm speeches and long debates, the house came to this resolve, 'That be parliament will proceed to make such acts, as are necessary or fit for securing our religion, liberty, and trade, before any act for supply, or any other business whatsoever.' Whereupon the marquis of Athol offered, an act for the security of the kingdom, in case of her majesty's decease. But, before it was read, the duke of Argyle offered his act, ratifying the late revolution, and all the acts following thereupon; Mr. Fletcher, of Salton, an act, containing several imitations upon the succession, after the death of her majesty, and the heirs of her body; the earl of Rothes, an act, that, after her majesty's death, and failing heirs of her body, no person coming to the crown of Scotland, being at the same time king or queen of England, should, as king or queen of Scotland, have power to make peace or war, without the consent of parliament; the earl of Marchmont, an act for securing the true Protestant religion and Presbyterian government; and sir Patrick Johnson, an act, allowing the importation of all sorts of wines, and other foreign liquors; All which acts were placed, and ordered to lie on the table.

Act of Toleration] June 1. 'An Act for Toleration to all Protestants, in the exercise of religious worship,' presented by the earl of Strathmore, being read, a strong representation was offered against it, in the name, and at the appointment of the late general assembly, which concluded with these words; 'That they were persuaded, that to enact a toleration for those of the Episcopal way (which God of his infinite mercy avert) would be to establish iniquity by a law, and would bring upon the promoters thereof, and their families, the dreadful guilt of all those sins and pernicious effects, that might ensue thereupon.' The promoters of the Toleration finding by this representation, that it was like to meet with great opposition, agreed not to insist upon it, lest thereby they should offend and lose many, who at present sided with them against the court.

Thus, not only all the hopes of the Episcopal party for a Toleration (which they had made no doubt of carrying) were entirely lost, and every thing relating to the Church continued in the same state in which it was during the late reign, but the Presbyterians got a new law in their favour, which gave them as firm a settlement, and as full a security as law could give. For, on the 3d of June, an act passed for preserving the true reformed Protestant religion, and confirming Presbyterian church government and discipline, by kirk sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods, and general assemblies, as agreeable to the word of God, and the only government of Christ's church within this kingdom.

Lockhart, in his Memoirs, says, many members argued against it, but none with more spirit than sir David Cunningham of Milcrnig, who urged, that it was uncharitable to affirm, as this act did, that 'the Presbyterian government was the only Church of Christ.' To this the marquis of Lothian replied, 'That the clause was right, since he was sure the Presbyterian government was the best part of the Christian religion;' which raised great mirth in the house. However, the act passed; but it was evident, that the Presbyterian party was not so considerable as had been imagined; and that, if the queen had been as episcopal in Scotland as in England, she might easily have overturned Presbytery. For at this time the house consisted of about two hundred and forty members, thirty of whom voted against the act, and eighty-two were non-liquets, which last were all Episcopal, but chose to be silent, either because there was not then a formed design against Presbytery, or in order to please the court; so that, properly speaking, there was not a plurality of above sixteen voices for the act; among whom such, as the duke of Hamilton, the earl of Eglington, and many others, were no ways Presbyterians; so that, had the queen designed to introduce Episcopacy, it would not have been any hard task to have done it.

Act declaring the Meeting of the Estates to be a Parliament.] June 7. The Parliament proceeded to consider the duke of Argyle's act, which consisted of three clauses: For ratifying and perpetuating the first act of king William's parliament, that the three estates then met together were a lawful and free parliament: For declaring it high treason to disown the authority of that parliament, or to endeavour, by writing, or speaking, or other open act or deed, to alter or innovate the claim of right, or any article thereof. The two first clauses were agreed to without any opposition; but the third, relating to the claim of right, raised a very warm debate. It was alleged, that many libels had been spread, reflecting on the claim of right, and tending to unhinge the present happy settlement. To which it was answered, That there were standing laws by which the authors of such libels might be punished; but that the import of such a general and peremptory clause would be of most dangerous consequence: That it would fetter men in their common conversation, which, though never so innocent, might, by these words, 'endeavour 'by writing or speaking,' bring all the subjects, whether in the ministry or not, into daily snares; and, in short, that it would bind up the government, and the wisdom of the nation itself, in all succeeding ages, from making such alterations and reformations, as in course of time, and various circumstances of things, should be judged necessary. To this purpose James Moore of Stennywood said, That he was sure, and every body knew, that the shire of Aberdeen, which he had the honour to represent, was of episcopal persuasion; and if, after this act was passed, his countrymen should, in discharge of their own consciences, in a regular way address the sovereign or parliament, which by the claim of right is the privilege of every subject, for a rectification of the present Presbyterian establishment, which, in his opinion, was neither infallible nor unalterable, he desired to know, whether such an address should import treason? To this, Sir William Hamilton, of Whitlow, answered, That indeed this act did not preclude addressing for a toleration; but he was of opinion, that if, after it was passed into a law, any person should own, that he thought Presbyterian government a wrong establishment, and that episcopacy ought to be restored, such a person was guilty of high-treason. This occasioned a long and warm debate, wherein the dangers that would arise from this act, both to the government and the subject, were fully laid open. However, the question for approving the act was carried in the affirmative, though there were sixty members against it, and many non-liquets, or silent members, and several of the country party who were Presbyterians; but all the ministry and their dependants went into it, except the marquis of Athol, the lord justice clerk, the lord viscount of Tarbat, and some of their and the lord-commissioner's friends, who at this time, began to break with the court, and join in a particular correspondence with the cavaliers.

Proceedings on the Act of Security.] From the 9th of June to the 30th, there was little done relating to the public, except the reading of the Act of Security, and reasoning upon the several clauses of it; on the 22d of June, there were four several overtures in form of Acts, for Security of the kingdom, presented and read, which were ordered to be printed for the information of the members.

Mr. Fletcher's Speech on presenting a Draught of the said Act.] That which was most taken notice of, and came nearest to the Act that the house agreed to, was the Draught given in by Mr. Fletcher of Salton, with the following speech upon it:

“My Lord Chancellor; Prejudice and opinion govern the world to the great distress and ruin of mankind: and though we daily find men so rational as to charm by the disinterested rectitude of their sentiments in all other things, yet when we touch upon any wrong opinion with which they have been early prepossessed, we find them more irrational than any thing in nature, and not only not to be convinced, but obstinately resolved not to hear any reason against it. These prejudices are yet stronger when they are taken up by great numbers of men, who confirm each other through the course of several generations, and seem to have their blood tainted, or, to speak more properly, their animal spirits influenced by them. Of these delusions, one of the strongest and most pernicious, has been a violent inclination in many men to extend the prerogative of the prince to an absolute and unlimited power. And though in limited monarchies all good men profess and declare themselves enemies to all tyrannical practices, yet many, even of these, are found ready to oppose such necessary limitations as might secure them from the tyrannical exercise of power in a prince, not only subject to all the infirmities of other men, but by the temptations arising from his power, to far greater. This humour has greatly increased in our nation, since the union of the crowns; and the slavish submissions, which have been made necessary to procure the favours of the court, have cherished and fomented a slavish principle. But I must take leave to put the representatives of this nation in mind, that no such principles were in this kingdom before the union of the crowns; and that no monarchy in Europe was more limited, nor any people more jealous of liberty than the Scots. These principles were first introduced among us after the union of the crowns, and the prerogative extended to the overthrow of our ancient constitution, chiefly by the prelatial party; though the peevish, imprudent, and detestable conduct of the presbyterians, who opposed these principles only in others, drove many into them, gave them greater force, and rooted them more deeply in this nation. Should we not be ashamed to embrace opinions contrary to reason, and contrary to the sentiments, of our ancestors, merely upon account of the uncharitable and insupportable humour and ridiculous conduct of bigots of any sort? If then no such principles were in this nation, and the constitution of our government had greatly limited the prince's power before the union of the crowns; dare any man say he is a Scots-man, and refuse his consent to reduce the government of this nation, after the expiration of the entail, within the same limits as before that union? And if since the union of the crowns, every one sees that we stand in need of more limitations; will any man act in so direct an opposition to his own reason, and the undoubted interest of his country, as not to concur in limiting the government yet more than before the union, particularly by the addition of this so necessary limitation for which I am now speaking? My lord, these are such clear demonstrations of what we ought to do in such conjunctures, that all men of common judgment must be ashamed of entering into any other measures. Let us not then tread in the steps of mean and fawning priests of any sort, who are always disposed to place an absolute power in the prince, if he on his part will gratify their ambition, and by all means support their form of church government, to the persecution of all other men; who will not comply with their impositions. Let us begin where our ancestors left before the union of the crowns, and be for the future more jealous of our liberties, because there is more need. But I must take upon me to say, that he who is not for setting great limitations upon the power of the prince, particularly that for which I am speaking, in case we have the same king with England, can act by no principle, whether he be a presbyterian, prelatial, or prerogative man, for the court of St. Germain, or that of Lanover; I say, he can act by no principle unless that of being a slave to the court of England for his own advantage. And therefore let not those who go under the name of prerogative-men cover themselves with the pretext of principles in this case; for such men are plainly for the prerogative of the English court over this nation, because this limitation is demanded only in case we come to have the same king with England.”*

* Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, Scotland, as born in 1653. He was educated under shop Burnet, and when in parliament he strongly opposed the measures of the Court, that he was obliged to leave the country and to Holland. He landed in the West of England with Moomouth, 1685, and afterwards fought against the Turks in the Hungarian Army. The Revolution restored him to his country, and he became a Commissioner to settle the government of Scotland. He died in London 1716. From his Works, which were published in 1732, the above speeches are taken.

“Fletcher, (says lord Buchan,) made a very noble appearance in that Convention, which met in Scotland, after the Revolution, for the settlement of the new government. He was thought of England’s domineering over Scotland was what his generous soul could not endure. The indignities and oppression which Scotland lay under galled him to the heart; that in his learned and animated speeches, he exposed them with undaunted courage and rhetorical eloquence.”—In that great event, when he performed essential service. He got the Act of Security passed, which declared that the two crowns should not pass the same head, till Scotland was secured in her liberties, civil and religious. Therefore lord Godolphin was forced into the Union, to avoid a civil war after the queen’s demise. Although Mr. Fletcher disapproved of some of the articles, and indeed of the whole frame of the Union; yet, as the Act of Security was his own work, he had all the merit of that important transaction. In the order of his political career, Mr. Fletcher forgot not the interests of his birth place. He esteemed the education of youth one of the noblest objects of government. On this subject he wrote a treatise, still extant, most characteristic of himself; and he established at Salton a foundation for the same purpose, of great utility while it stood. This great man died at London in 1716, aged 66. His remains were conveyed to Scotland, and deposited in the family vault at Inverkeithing. “His political principles, says lord Buchan, were too high and refined, and his sentiments were too Roman, or rather, as I may now say, too Gallic, and too much in the odour of philosophical politics, to accept of the privilege granted by James 2’s act of indemnity, to return to his country and estate, when under the dominion of disguised despotism sanctioned by a venal parliament.” That Mr. Fletcher

“The estates of parliament considering, That when it shall please God to afflict this nation with the death of our sovereign lady the queen (whom God of his infinite mercy long preserve) if the same shall happen to be without heirs of her body, this kingdom may fall into great confusion and disorder before a successor can be declared. For preventing received neither honours nor emoluments from king William, may therefore in part be attributed to himself; a circumstance, however, that must add greatly to the lustre of his character. His uncompromising virtue, and the sternness of his principles, were ill calculated to conciliate courtly favour. He was so zealous an assertor of the liberties of the people, that he was too jealous of the growing power of all princes; in whom he thought ambition so natural, that he was not for trusting the best of kings with the power which ill ones might make use of against their subjects; He was of opinion that all princes were made by, and for the benefit of, the people; and that they should have no power but that of doing good. This, which made him oppose king Charles and invade king James, led him also to oppose the giving so much power to king William, whom he would never serve after his establishment. Mr. Fletcher was master of the English, Latin, Greek, French, and Italian languages; and well versed in history, the civil law, and all kinds of learning. In his travels, he had not only acquired considerable knowledge in the art of war, but also become versant in the respective interests of the several princes and states of Europe. In private life, he was affable to his friends, and free from all vice. He had a penetrating, clear, and lively apprehension; but is said to have been too much wedded to opinions, and impatient of contradiction. He possessed an uncommon elevation of mind, accompanied with a warmth of temper, which would not suffer him to brook an indignity from any rank of men, or in any place. Of this he exhibited a singular proof in the Scots parliament. The earl of Stair, secretary of state and minister for Scotland, having in the heat of debate used an improper expression against Mr. Fletcher, he seized him by his robe, and insisted upon public and immediate satisfaction. His lordship was obliged instantly to beg his pardon, in presence of parliament. Mr. Fletcher was by far the finest speaker in the parliament of Scotland: the earl of Stair alone rivalled him. The latter was famed for a splendid, the former for a close and nervous eloquence. He formed his style on the models of antiquity; and the small volume of his works, sir John Dalrymple observes, though imperfectly collected, is one of the very few classical compositions in the English language. “His speeches and his language,” says lord Buchan, “will bear a comparison with the best

‘thereof, our sovereign lady, with advice and consent of the estates of parliament, statutes and ordains, That if at the foresaid time, any

‘parliament or convention of estates shall be assembled, then the members of that parliament or convention of estates shall take the speeches of the reign of queen Anne, the Augustan age of Great Britain, far superior to the metricious, inflated, metaphorical style of our modern orators.”

The following character of Fletcher is preserved in his Works, and is there said to be taken from a MS. in the Library of the late Thomas Rawlinson, esq.

“Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, is a gentleman of a good estate in Scotland, attended with the improvement of a good education. He was knight of the shire for Lothian to that parliament, where the duke of York was commissioner in the reign of king Charles II. and openly opposed the arbitrary designs of that prince, and the fatal Bill of Accession: which obliged him wisely to retire, first to England, and then to Holland.

“The duke of York could not forgive his behaviour in that parliament; they summoned him to appear at Edinburgh, which he not daring to do, was declared traitor, and his estate confiscated: he retired to Hungary, and served several campaigns under the duke of Lorraine: he returned to Holland after the death of king Charles II. and came over to England with the duke of Monmouth: had the misfortune to shoot the mayor of Liue after his landing; and on it returned again to Holland: and came over at the Revolution with the prince of Orange.

“He is so zealous an asserter of the liberties of the people, that he is too jealous of the growing power of all princes; in whom he thinks ambition so natural, that he is not for trusting the best of princes with the power which ill ones may make use of against the people: believes all princes were made by, and for the good of, the people; and thinks princes should have no power but that of doing good. This made him oppose king Charles; invade king James; and oppose the giving so much power to king William, whom he never would serve; nor does he ever come into the administration of this Queen: but stands up a stout pillar for the constitution of the parliament of Scotland.

“He is a gentleman steady in his principles, of nice honour, with abundance of learning: brave as the sword he wears, and bold as a lion: a sure friend, and an irreconcilable enemy; would lose his life readily to serve his country, and would not do a base thing to save it. His thoughts are large as to religion, and could never be brought within the bounds of any particular set. Nor will he be under the distinction of a Whig or Tory; saying, those names are used to cloak the knaves of both.

“His notions of government, however, are too fine spun, and can hardly be lived up to by men subject to the common frailties of nature; neither will he give allowance for extraordinary emergencies: witness the duke of Shrewsbury, with whom he had always been very intimate; yet the duke coming to be secretary of state a second time, purely to save his country, this gentleman would never be in common charity with him afterwards. And my lord Spencer, now lord Sunderland, for voting for the army, was used by that man much after the same manner.

“He hath wrote some very good things, but they are not published in his name: he hath a very good genius. A low, thin man, of a brown complexion, full of fire, with a stern, sour look, and fifty years old.”

Lockhart in his Memoirs, (p. 68.) tells us, that “Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, in the first part of his life, did improve himself to a great degree by reading and travelling: he was always a great admirer of both ancient and modern republics; and therefore the more displeas’d at some steps which he thought wrong in king Charles II’s reign; whereby he drew upon himself the enmity of the ministers of that government; to avoid the evil consequences of which, he went abroad, during which time, his enemies malice still continuing, he was upon slight, frivolous pretences, summoned to appear before the privy-council; and their designs to ruin him being too apparent he was so enraged that he concurred, and came over with the duke of Monmouth, when he invaded England; upon which he was forfeited. Thereafter he came over with the prince of Orange; but that prince was not many months in England, till he saw his designs, and left him, and ever thereafter, hated, and appeared as much against him as any in the kingdom. Being elected a parliament-man in 1703, he shewed a sincere and honest inclination towards the honour and interest of his country. The thoughts of England’s domineering over Scotland, was what his generous soul could not away with. The indignities and oppression Scotland lay under, galled him to the heart. So that in his learned and elaborate discourses, he exposed them with undaunted courage, and pathetic eloquence. He was blessed with a soul that hated and despised whatever was mean and unbecoming a gentleman; and was so stedfast to what he thought right, that no hazard nor advantage, no, not the universal empire, nor the gold of America, could tempt him to yield or desert it. And I may affirm, that in his life he never once pursued a measure with the prospect of any by-end to himself, no further than he judged it for the common benefit and advantage of his country. He was master of the English, Latin, Greek, French, and Italian languages; and well versed in history, the civil law, and all kinds of learning: and as he was universally accomplished, he employed his talents for the administration of the government upon them: excepting those barons and boroughs, who at the foresaid time shall have any place or pension, mediately or immediately of the crown: whose commissions are hereby declared to be void; and that new members shall be chosen in their place: But if there be no parliament or convention of estates actually assembled, then the members of the current parliament shall assemble with all possible diligence: and if there be no current parliament, then the members of the last dissolved parliament, or convention of estates, shall assemble in like manner: and in those two last cases, so soon as there shall be one hundred members met, in which number the barons and boroughs before-mentioned are not to be reckoned, they shall take the administration of the government upon them: But neither they, nor the members of parliament, or convention of estates, if at the time foresaid assembled, shall proceed to the weighty affair of naming and declaring a successor, 'till twenty days after they have assumed the administration of the government: both that there may be time for all the other members to come to Edinburgh, which is hereby declared the place of their meeting, and for the elections of new barons and boroughs in place above-mentioned. But so soon as the twenty days are elapsed, then they shall proceed to the publishing by proclamation the conditions of government, on which they will receive the successor to the imperial crown of his realm; which in the case only of our being under the same king with England, are as follows.

1. That elections shall be made at every Michaelmas head-court for a new parliament every year; to sit the first of November next rod of mankind. He was a strict and nice server of all the points of honour, and his sword sacred, as brave as his sword; and had some experience in the art of war, having in his younger years been some time a volunteer in both the land and sea service. In his studies he had studied, and came to understand the respective interests of the several principal states of Europe. In his private conversation affable to his friends, (but could not endure to converse with those he thought enemies to their country) and free of all manner of vice. He had a penetrating, clear and lively apprehension: but so extremely wedded to his own opinions, that there were few (and those too must be his beloved friends, and of whom he had a good opinion) he could endure to reason against him; and did for the most part so closely and unalterably adhere to what he advanced, (which was frequently very singular) that he would break with his party before he would alter the least jot of his schemes and maxims: and therefore it was impossible that any set of men, that did not give up themselves to be absolutely directed by him, to please him, so as to carry him along in all points. And following, and adjourn themselves from time to time, till next Michaelmas: That they choose their own president, and that every thing shall be determined by balloting, in place of voting.

2. That so many lesser barons shall be added to the parliament, as there have been noblemen created since the last augmentation of the number of the barons; and that in all time coming, for every nobleman that shall be created, there shall be a baron added to the parliament.

3. That no man have vote in parliament, but a nobleman or elected member.

4. That the king shall give the sanction to all laws offered by the estates; and that the president of the parliament be empowered by his majesty to give the sanction in his absence, and have 10*l.* sterling a day salary.

5. That a committee of one and thirty members, of which nine to be a quorum, chosen out of their own number, by every parliament, shall, during the intervals of parliament, under the king, have the administration of the government, be his council, and accountable to the next parliament; with power in extraordinary occasions, to call the parliament together: and that in the said council, all things be determined by balloting in place of voting.

6. That the king without consent of parliament shall not have the power of making peace and war; or that of concluding any treaty with any other state or potentate.

7. That all places and offices, both civil and military, and all pensions formerly conferred by our kings, shall ever after be given by parliament.

8. That no regiment or company of horse foot, or dragoons be kept on foot in peace or war, but by consent of parliament.

thence it came to pass, that he often in the parliament stuck close to the country party, and was their Cicero. He was, no doubt, an enemy to all monarchical governments; at least thought they wanted to be much reformed: but I do very well believe his aversion to the English and the Union was so great, in revenge to them, he would have sided with the royal family; but as that was a subject not fit to be entered upon with him, this is only a conjecture from some innuendoes I have heard him make: but so far is certain, he liked, commended, and conversed with high-flying Tories, more than any other set of men, acknowledging them to be the best countrymen, and of most honour, integrity, and ingenuity. To sum up all; he was a learned, gallant, honest, and every other way well accomplished gentleman: and if ever a man proposes to serve and merit well of his country, let him place his courage, zeal, and constancy as a pattern before him; and think himself sufficiently applauded and rewarded; if he obtain the character of being like Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun."

9. ' That all the fencible men of the nation, betwixt sixty and sixteen, be with alldiligence possible armed with bayonets, and firelocks all of a calibre, and continue always provided in such arms with ammunition suitable.

10. ' That no general indemnity, nor pardon for any transgression against the public, shall be valid without consent of parliament.

11. ' That the fifteen senators of the college of justice shall be incapable of being members of parliament, or of any other office, or any pension: but the salary that belongs to their place to be increased as the parliament shall think fit: that the office of president shall be in three of their number to be named by parliament, and that there be no extraordinary lords. And also, that the lords of the justice court shall be distinct from those of the session, and under the same restrictions.

12. ' That if any king break in upon any of these conditions of government, he shall by the estates be declared to have forfeited the crown.

' Which proclamation made, they are to go on to the naming and declaring a successor: and when he is declared, if present, are to read to him the claim of right and conditions of government abovementioned, and to desire of him, that he may accept the crown accordingly; and he accepting, they are to administer to him the oath of coronation: but if the successor be not present, they are to delegate such of their own number as they shall think fit, to see the same performed, as said is: and are to continue in the administration of the government, until the successor his accepting of the crown, upon the foresaid terms be known to them: whereupon having then a king upon their head, they shall by his authority declare themselves a parliament, and proceed to the doing of whatever shall be thought expedient for the welfare of the realm. And it is likewise by the authority aforesaid declared, that if her present majesty shall think fit, during her own time, with advice and consent of the estates of parliament, failing heirs of her body, to declare a successor, yet nevertheless, after her Majesty's decease, the members of parliament or convention shall in the several cases, and after the manner above-specified, meet and admit the successor to the government, in the terms and after the manner as said is. And it is hereby further declared, that after the decease of her Majesty, and failing heirs of her body, the forementioned manner and method shall in the several cases be that of declaring and admitting to the government all those who shall hereafter succeed to the imperial crown of this realm: and that it shall be high treason for any man to own or acknowledge any person as king or queen of this realm, till they are declared and admitted in the abovementioned manner. And lastly, it is hereby declared, that by the death of her Majesty, or any of

' her successors, all commissions, both civil and military, fall and are void. And that the act shall come in place of the seventeenth act of the sixth session of King William's parliament. And all acts and laws, that any way derogate from this present act are hereby in so far declared void and abrogated!

Mr. Fletcher also made the following speech in defence of the Limitation he proposed.

' My Lord Chancellor; it is the utmost height of human prudence to see and embrace every favourable opportunity; and if a word spoken in season does for the most part produce wonderful effects, of what consequence and advantage must it be to a nation in deliberations of the highest moment; in occasions, when past, for ever irretrievable, to enter into the right path, and take hold of the golden opportunity, which makes the most arduous things easy, and without which the most considerable may put a stop to all our affairs? We have this day an opportunity in our hands which if we manage to the advantage of the nation we have the honour to represent, we may, so far as the vicissitude and uncertainty of human affairs will permit, be for many years easy and happy. But if we despise or neglect this occasion, we have voted our perpetual dependance on another nation. If men could always retain those just impressions of things they at some times have upon their minds, they would be much more steady in their resolutions. And as I may boldly say, that no man is to be found in this house, who at some time or other has not had that just sense of the miserable condition to which this nation is reduced by a dependance upon the English court, I should demand no more but the like impressions at this time to pass all the limitations mentioned in the draught of an act I have already brought into this house; since they are not limitations upon any prince, who shall only be king of Scotland, nor do any way tend to separate us from England; but calculated merely to this end, that so long as we continue to be under the same prince with our neighbour nation, we may be free from the influence of English councils and ministers; that the nation may not be impoverished by an expensive attendance at court, and that the force and exercise of our government may be, as far as is possible, within ourselves. By which means, trade, manufactures, and husbandry will flourish, and the affairs of the nation be no longer neglected, as they have been hitherto. These are the ends to which all the limitations are directed, that English councils may not hinder the acts of our parliaments from receiving the royal assent: that we may not be engaged without our consent in the quarrels they may have with other nations: that they may not obstruct the meeting of our parliaments, nor interrupt their sitting; that we may not stand in need of posting to London for places and pensions, by which, whatever particular men may get, the nation must vays be a loser, nor apply for the remedy of our grievances to a court, where for most part none are to be had. On the contrary, if these conditions of government be acted, our constitution will be amended, and our grievances be easily redressed by a due execution of our own laws, which to this day we are never been able to obtain. The best and wisest men in England will be glad to hear that these limitations are settled by us. For though the ambition of courtiers lead them to desire an uncontrollable power at any rate; yet wise men will consider that when two nations are under the same prince, the condition of one cannot be made intolerable, but a separation must inevitably follow, which will be dangerous and destructive to both. The senate of Rome was determined in the business of the Privileges, that all people would take hold of the opportunity to free themselves from an unhappy condition; that no peace could be lasting, in which both parties did not find their account; and that no alliance was strong enough to keep two nations in amity, if the condition either were made worse by it. For my own part, my lord Chancellor, before I will consent to continue in our present miserable and languishing condition after the decease of her majesty, and heirs of her body failing, I shall rather give my vote for a separation from England at any rate. I hope no man who is now possessed of an office, will take umbrage at these conditions of government, though some of them seem to diminish, and others do entirely suppress the place he possesses: for besides the scandal of preferring a private interest before that of our country, these limitations are not to take place immediately. The Queen is yet living, and by the grace of God may live many years, I hope longer than all those she has succeeded in any trust; and should we not be obliged, if those who for the future may design to recommend themselves for any office, could do it by any other way than the favour of the house, which they who appear for these conditions will deserve in a more eminent degree? Would we rather court an English minister for a place than a parliament of Scotland?

 Are we afraid of being taken out of the hands of English courtiers, and left to govern ourselves? And do we doubt whether an English ministry, or a Scots parliament will be most for the interest of Scotland? But that which seems most difficult in this question, and in which, if satisfaction be given, I hope no man will pretend to be dissatisfied with these limitations, is the interest of a king of Great Britain. And here I shall take liberty to say, that as the limitations do no way affect any prince that may be king of Scotland only, so they will be found highly advantageous to a king of Great Britain.
 Some of our late kings, when they have been perplexed about the affairs of Scotland, did let themselves such expressions, as intimated they thought them not worth their application. And indeed it ought not to wonder if princes, like other men, should grow weary of toiling where they find no advantage. But to set this affair in a true light: I desire to know, whether it can be more advantageous to a king of Great Britain to have an unlimited prerogative over this country in our present ill condition, which turns to no account, than that this nation grow rich and powerful under these conditions of government, should be able upon any emergency to furnish a good body of land forces, with a squadron of ships for war, all paid by ourselves, to assist his majesty in the wars he may undertake for the defence of the protestant religion and liberties of Europe. Now since I hope I have shewn, that those who are for the prerogative of the kings of Scotland, and all those who are possessed of places at this time, together with the whole English nation, as well as a king of Great Britain, have cause to be satisfied with these regulations of government, I would know what difficulty can remain; unless that being accustomed to live in a dependency and unacquainted with liberty, we know not so much as the meaning of the word; nor if that should be explained to us, can ever persuade ourselves we shall obtain the thing, though we have it in our power by a few votes to set our selves and our posterity free. To say that this will stop at the royal assent, is a suggestion disrespectful to her majesty, and which ought neither to be mentioned in parliament, nor be considered by any member of this house. And were this a proper time, I am confident I could say such things as being represented to the queen, would convince her, that no person can have greater interest, nor obtain more lasting honour by the enacting of these conditions of government, than her majesty. And if the nation be assisted in this exigency by the good offices of his grace the high commissioner, I shall not doubt to affirm, that in procuring this blessing to our country from her majesty, he will do more for us, than all the great men of that noble family, of which he is descended, ever did; though it seems to have been their peculiar province for divers ages, to defend the liberties of this nation against the power of the English and the deceit of courtiers. What further arguments can I use to persuade this house to enact these limitations, and embrace this occasion, which we have so little deserved?

 I might bring many; but the most proper and effectual to persuade all, I take to be this: that our ancestors did enjoy the most essential liberties contained in the act I have proposed: and though some few of less moment are among them which they had not, yet they were in possession of divers others not contained in these articles: that they enjoyed these privileges when they were separated from England, had their prince living among them, and consequently stood not in so great need of these limitations. Now since we have been under the same prince with England, and therefore stand in the greatest need of them, we have not only neglected to make a due provision of that kind, but in divers parliaments have given away our liberties, and upon the matter subjected this crown to the court of England: and are become so accustomed to depend on them, that we seem to doubt whether we shall lay hold of this happy opportunity to resume our freedom. If nothing else will move us, at least let us not act in opposition to the light of our own reason and conscience, which daily represents to us the ill constitution of our government; the low condition into which we are sunk, and the extreme poverty, distress, and misery of our people. Let us consider whether we will have the nation continue in these deplorable circumstances, and lose this opportunity of bringing freedom and plenty among us. Sure the heart of every honest man must bleed daily, to see the misery in which our commons and even many of our gentry live; which has no other cause but the ill constitution of our government, and our bad government no other root, but our dependence upon the court of England. If our kings lived among us, it would not be strange to find these limitations rejected. It is not the prerogative of a king of Scotland I would diminish, but the prerogative of English ministers over this nation. To conclude, these conditions of government being either such as our ancestors enjoyed, or principally directed to cut off our dependence on an English court, and not to take place during the life of the queen; he who refuses his consent to them, whatever he may be by birth, cannot sure be a Scots-man by affection. This will be a true test to distinguish, not whig from tory, presbyterian from episcopal, Hanover from St. Germans, nor yet a courtier from a man out of place; but a proper test to distinguish a friend from an enemy to his country. And indeed we are spilt into so many parties, and cover ourselves with so many false pretexts, that such a test seems necessary to bring us into the light, and shew every man in his own colours. In a word, my lord Chancellor, we are to consider, that though we suffer under many grievances, yet our dependence upon the court of England is the cause of all, comprehends them all, and is the band that ties up the bundle. If we break this, they will all drop and fall to the ground: if not, this band will straiten us more and more, till we shall be no longer a people. I therefore humbly propose, That for the security of our religion, liberty, and trade these limitations be declared by a resolution of this house to be the conditions upon which the nation will receive a successor to the crown of this realm after the decease of her present majesty, and failing heirs of her body, in case the said successor shall be also king or queen of England."

Lord Belhaven's Speech on the said Act.]
The lord Belhaven made the following Speech on the Act for Security of the kingdom, in case of the Queen's death:

"My Lord Chancellor; We are now upon an act of the last consequence, it is an Act for the Security of the kingdom in case of the Queen's death. I hear it proposed by a noble earl on the other side, that this act should have the same narrative with the act 1696. But I would have it considered, that our circumstances are much changed since that time: we had then both a king and successor in being; now our happiness and the welfare of the kingdom, doth solely depend upon the life of our most gracious and excellent queen (whom God long preserve for a blessing to this nation). It is from her bounty to this her ancient kingdom, that we hope to bring this excellent and useful law to perfection; therefore, my lord, in my humble opinion, the best narrative can be given to this act is, to set things in their true light before this honourable house, with relation to the circumstances of this nation as at present, and as it hath been this century of years by past, ever since the union of the two crowns under one monarch.

"If we consider, my lord, our present circumstances, we are a divided people among ourselves, divided and separated in our interests and circumstances from all Europe besides; we have no treaties, no alliances with any of the states or potentates of Europe; yes, we have little or no trade, commerce or correspondence abroad, our military corps serve abroad without post, name, or cartel, and are rather like to the Israelites service in Egypt, than that of a free independent nation assisting their neighbours: but, above all, my lord, we are under that singular speciality, that we know not who shall reign over us, neither have we any particular law, pointing out, or directing us what to do when that melancholy day comes that we shall be so miserably as to lose the best of queens, yea, the best of sovereigns.

"These, my lord, are our present circumstances, and I am sure they are so unfair, provoking and melancholy, that they deserve both the time and thoughts of this honourable house, to find out an adequate remedy for them; especially when we are encouraged to it by her majesty's gracious letter to this parliament, empowering us to make, alter, or amend what laws may tend to the benefit of the nation.

"Let us then go on, my lord, with that unanimity becomes us, in the treating of so weighty an affair: this is the concern of a nation, and of a nation that hath been under a sensible decay and consumption for this hundred years by past, and is now become so very weak and debilitated, that it hath scarce strength to endure a cure.

"If we do but consider the ruins of our royal burrows, we may see what a vast decay we have suffered in trade, in a century which may justly be called the century of trade, or the trading age; if we will but consult the histories of Europe, and of our own nation, we will find the share and figure we bore in the affairs of Europe, with respect, and in proportion to other potentates and states the preceding century, vastly fallen in this: what a figure were Sweden, Denmark, Switzerland, Savoy, Peste

d, Tuscany in the world now; with whom we are more than equal formerly; but above all, the estates of Holland have improved that way to the best advantage, and to their own honour, power and glory.

“It is true, my lord, if we consider England and Spain, that although they have made the greatest advances in trade and plantations, and we had kingdoms and provinces both in Europe and America made subject to their respective monarchs, yet their power for all these advantages seems to be lessened from what it was formerly, when Spain grasped at the fifth monarchy, and England at the conquest of France; and to speak truth, I can see no reason why it should be so, considering that money is the natural product of the dominions of the one, and that the riches of the other by trade, are so greatly increased, save that neither of them have encouraged their fellow subjects, with these necessary immunities and privileges which the wise Romans used to do; but, on the contrary, they have made their yoke so uneasy, that it hath pleased God to single out these two nations from the bulk of Europe from making any advances in power proportionable to what they have done in trade; and, my lord, I must say, this appears to be the finger of God, that they may see their sins in their punishment.

“From what I have said, my lord, it is evident that this nation is labouring under some fundamental error, with relation to its constitution, ever since the union of the two crowns, which our predecessors were not aware of at first, and their successors have never been able to rectify since, because our more prudent neighbours and fellow subjects have always made it their business to run cross to us in that point; this is demonstrable from our own history and acts of Parliament, from which I shall, as succinctly and distinctly as I can, shew the several opportunities our predecessors had to rectify their constitution, as also the ways and means our wise and prudent neighbours took to prevent it.

“The prudent foresight of Henry 7, the endless endeavours of Henry 8, and Edward 6, to bring Scotland under the same monarch with England, had not the desired end, being looked for effect until the death of queen Elizabeth.

“It is a matter of admiration, that during the forty years reign of that illustrious queen, our predecessors, so far as I can learn, had ever so much as under their consideration, how necessary it was to have their constitution rectified, in case of our monarch's residence in England: sure they had dear bought experience of her itch of government, and of her undue intermeddling in the affairs of Scotland, and that by supporting sometimes one party, sometimes another, as she found it necessary; and which was most unaccountable of all, by her allowing her own nearest kinswoman, queen Mary; the mother of our king, the then apparent heir to both kingdoms, to be arraigned, condemned and executed as a subject of England; but I am apt to think our predecessors have been much in the like case with the Israelites wandering in the wilderness, who, though they suffered much, their hearts were still kept up with the expectations of possessing a land flowing with milk and honey at the last: they thought to have been sharers with their king in the government of England, but they counted without their host; whatever may be in this, my lord, the plain reason of all this neglect of our predecessors came from the divisions among themselves, which was industriously fomented amongst them, by the English agents at that time: it was that which lost us that golden opportunity, I pray God, it do not so now.

“Upon king James's accession to the throne of England, our predecessors, though they were numerous, and did possess many considerable offices at court, yet they found they had overseen their interest and the interest of the nation, by not making such conditions of government, and rectifications of their constitution, as might have preserved the sovereignty and independence of their nation, they found that the powers and riches of England far exceeded that of Scotland, that their king's residence in England, would draw there a constant concourse of their nobility, and consequently the Scots money must be expended there; thus like Scotsmen wise behind hand, they endeavoured to retrieve it the best way they could, and to engage king James to allow them liberty to take the rectification of their constitution, in their present circumstances, under consideration; but our prudent neighbours were so wise as to foresee the consequences of it, which they were resolved to obviate, therefore they persuaded the king to propose an Union of the two kingdoms, accordingly a parliament was called at Perth in the 1604 year of God, and that the design might appear more solemn and real, it is called for that very end, for we find in our acts of parliament, that there was nothing else done in that parliament; they were also allowed to name their own commissioners, that the least shadow of jealousy might be removed: the narrative of the act empowering the commissioners to treat about the Union of the two kingdoms, makes clear the design our predecessors had of reserving the sovereignty and independence of their nation, which they saw was in great danger by the absence of their king; for it says, ‘The king vouchsafes to assure them of his sincere disposition and clear meaning, no way by the said union to prejudice or hurt the fundamental laws, ancient privileges, offices, and liberties of the kingdom, which, if innovate, could no more be a free monarchy.’ What the consequence of this Union was, is well known, it was only an amusement, and ended in an unconsiderable tariff of trade betwixt the two nations, and small as it was, it was thought too considerable for us to have, and therefore the English resiled.

“The next method our prudent fellow subjects take, to influence our government, so as we might not be able for the future to rectify our constitution, was to extend the prerogative; they judged well enough, that if our king have a large prerogative, that his residing among them would make them masters of that, therefore a parliament is called in the 1606 year of God, and the very first act is anent the king's royal prerogative. The narrative, which is the Ratio Legis, runs thus, ‘That since our king is now king of the renowned kingdoms of England, France and Ireland, whilks very far surpasseth the wealth, power and force of the dominions of any of his primo-genitors, kings of Scotland, for discharge whereof, God hath endued his majesty with sua many extraordinary graces and maist rair and excellent virtues, and that God having manifestly expressed his heavenly will to be, that his majesty's imperial power, whilk God hath sua graciously enlarged, shall not be deminished, but rather revered and augmented; therefore his sovereign authority, princely power, royal prerogative and privilege of his crown, is largely extended over all estates, &c.’ All I shall observe from this, my lord, is, That we may clearly see from whence this came, when at the same time there was no such extending of prerogative with relation to England.

“The second act of the same parliament is for restoring the estate of bishops, and the reason of that law is, because ‘They are sua far necessar fundaments and pillars for maintaining the authority of princes, &c.’ Therefore, &c.

“Before I proceed further, my lord, I shall once for all observe, that an Union, the Prerogative, and state of Bishops, are the three handles our prudent and potent neighbours have made use of, for these hundred years by past, to draw to them the sole power of influencing the government of our nation, and of preventing of the rectification of its constitution from time to time, and so I go on.

“In 1607, 1609, and 1612 years of God we had parliaments which were only employed in advancing the Episcopal government, as appears by the acts thereof, in favours of deans and chapters, teinds and other Ecclesiastical benefices.

“But in the year 1617, my lord, our good old king must be persuaded to make us a visit, and hold a parliament himself, where the conge d'elire, was establish'd, they were afraid that the Scots bishops might in time come to kick against them, and smell their design; Therefore the king must have a finger in that pyc too.

“But the main design of that journey, was to prepare the members of the general assembly to a more close union with the English in their Religious Worship; and this was done so effectually, that in the 1618th year of God, the five Articles commonly called the Five Articles of Perth, past in a general assembly kept there, though not without great struggle; and this was ratified afterwards in the parliament 21st, which was the last of king James's Parliaments.

“My lord, king James dies in the 1625 year of God. His son king Charles I. so sooner ascends the throne, but he is applied to by Archbishop Laud, who tells him, that the endeavouring to bring Scotland into an conformity with England in their method of religious worship, is not to be done by the servitious way of Parliaments; that he must take larger steps, his prerogative being much greater than any of his predecessors, and especially a church affairs. Therefore he may send them down a liturgy: he may order their habits: and that it was very fit, both upon a point as well as religious consideration, to tract the rude Scots to serve God in a more decent and splendid manner. This, my lord, was easily condescended to by that religious prince: a liturgy is made and sent down, with other religious habits: what the consequences were is too well known to be repeated, only with deference to that learned prelate the advice: It is evident he was als had a counselor to the father, as father Peters proved afterwards to the son.

“I come now, my lord, to the year 1644, which afforded us an excellent opportunity of rectifying of our constitution, and it appears by the acts of that time, that our predecessors were then falling to it in good earnest: they had had so recent an instance of their being invaded by force, when other means failed. But alas, they mistook their measures; for if they had at that time roudly and soundly rectified their constitution, and gone into the assistance of their lawful king, as they did to that of the English parliament, we might at this time have been reaping the benefit of it more ways than one; for, in common reasoning it is no pain to aggrandize a nation, that is by far our superior, and who have always shewed an inclination, both by writing and otherwise, to creep at our sovereignty. But though we acted not foolishly, yet our prudent and potent neighbours knew very well how to play their game, and seeing at that time, that they could not bring us up to their religious worship: no matter what it be, providing they have an influence in our affairs. They will complement us, and they will follow our manner of worship, and lest we should doubt the sincerity of their intentions by so sudden a change, they, good people, will give us a most solemn League and Covenant for our further security: thus we were catch'd.

“My lord, The next period is that of the 1650th year of God, when we called home the righteous heir king Charles 2; at that time also, we lost an excellent opportunity to rectify our constitution; then our prudent adversaries (for at that time we were in war with them) set all their engines at work, to break us among ourselves, and so to hinder us to unite among ourselves and with our young king, upon a solid foundation; and though they were laughing at the solemn League and Covenant, and emul-

an old Almanack, yet at the very same time they were telling us, that we had no security from our young king, unless he and all about him took the national Covenant: This they knew would divide us effectually. And it is really very strange to consider how easily our predecessors were deluded, and thereby lost at opportunity, where they might have done great things for their king, country and religion, as it was then established; and which in all probability would not have missed of a favourable event, if we had not sit in our own ght.

“What was the consequence of all this, my lord? This our neglect makes our enemies successful, our endeavours for our young king prove unsuccessful, and we in a manner totally subjected to them, both in our civil and religious concerns, and continued so till the 1660th year of God.

“In the 1660th year of God, king Charles is restored, and our old prudent neighbours saw the scene was changed, yet they were very unwilling to let go their hold of sovereignty over us; they were willing to keep what vires & iudis they had got, therefore they had advised our gracious king to continue us in the same condition we were then in: That is to say, as a province depending upon England. The unreasonable-ness of this proposal, my lord, may show how much people are blinded with their own interest, that we, who had been the first who saw our errors, who protested against the king's trial, sentence and execution, who had raised an army for his liberation when prisoner in the Isle of Wight, who had recalled and crowned his son, who had invaded England under his conduct for restoring him to his father's kingdoms, and for doing whereof, we had brought upon us and our nation, all the calamities of war, bondage and servitude, forts and castles built to keep us in subjection, and a standing army of ten thousand men kept foot upon us: a number sufficient to have kept in subjection the whole island. I say, my lord, that after all this, to think that any person should have dared to make such a proposition to a king who knew the truth of this so well, seems to me, to have been the height of impudence, to say no worse. And yet, my lord, this was done; I have very good vouchers for it, and general Monk was the principal counsellor thereof, though by our counsel and assistance he was enabled to accomplish that glorious design for his Majesty's restoration.

“But blessed be God, the proposal was both abhorred and rejected by our gracious king: and then being thus disappointed, they all to their old trade again, bishops must be restored, the prerogative must be extended, and we must not want the amusement of an Union: but above all, and before all, the grievous acts, of 1641, must be rescinded, and that with a stigma, as may be seen by the narrative of the act rescisory: the truth is, they were too opposite to their designs to be continued.

“My lord, I must observe, That from 1660 to 1689, there was nothing, saving the Jus Divinum of kings, non-resistance and passive obedience, preached up by the clergy of both kingdoms. I conceive that the memory of the troubles might afford some occasions for this doctrine; but when people go once off the solid foundation and fundamental constitution of a limited monarchy, be it upon never so good grounds, the consequences generally prove fatal, even to the monarch himself, in whose favours such things are pretended, and sometimes really designed.

“It fell out so during this period of time, our preachers strained their eloquence to persuade the people to that which is so far contrary to human reason, that it cannot be so much as the subject matter of faith, viz. That kings come down from heaven, as the image of Diana came down to the temple of Ephesus: It is true, interest, and particular views, may make people appear to relish and believe such a doctrine, as it did Demetrius and his silversmiths: this, I must say, my lord, is the worst service can be done princes: experience shows, That people generally deceive their deceivers as to that point, and the monarch must suffer for all at long run; for when these preachers and people came to be touched themselves, then nothing but religion and all is in danger, and therefore in the year 1689, then then the prince of Orange is invited over by our neighbours, non-resisters; he comes, and that seasonably too, and gives a great and glorious deliverance; thereupon is declared king of England, France and Ireland, and proclaimed accordingly.

“My lord, at that time our wise neighbours forgot not us, they did not indeed well know what we might do, they knew then we had a new opportunity to rectify our constitution, and make conditions of government, they knew we had reason for it, and were afraid of it. Therefore they come again to their old shift, nothing is so necessary as an Union, which is now easy, and they will not stand upon terms with us; but that being a work of time, it is as necessary, that the noblemen and gentlemen at that time present at London, should go down and settle their affairs upon that same bottom with theirs, lest king James come to Ireland, and from thence over upon them, and much to this purpose; what do we do, my lord, we swallow the bait, we are so fond of our deliverer, and forward to imitate our neighbours, that we lost in a great part the benefit of the deliverance. King James is forfeited because of his following the advice of evil counsellors, and yet after their way, these evil counsellors must not only be preserved, but employed.

“It is true, by their example we make a Claim of Right, but we forget the most necessary points, and remember not that we and they are under different circumstances, we without a king residing among us, they having both their own and our king in the midst of them:

Thus, my lord, we lose that excellent opportunity, I say we ourselves, not our predecessors, for we are living witnesses of our own mismanagement.

"Well, what followed, we write to our new sovereign that the Union might go on, and we make a nomination of commissioners accordingly, but the fish was caught, no more need of the net. I confess some years after, Presbytery was restored; but all of us know, that if the episcopal people had been all ready to swear to king William, as now they are to queen Anne, the opposition had been much greater than it was.

"During the first years of king William's reign, I cannot say but we were less under influence than formerly, yet we wanted not strangers meddling in our affairs, but it was rather a personal than a national influence, being acted by a person altogether ignorant of the state of our nation, save what he had from some of our selves, who were so mean as to bow to that golden image; I must confess we began to flourish a little in these days, and finding that we had more money than formerly, had hopes to promote a trade like our neighbour nation, but no sooner had we an act of parliament for our encouragement, but then our prudent neighbours fall upon us with a witness, and that above board too; The two houses of parliament acted and addressed against us, their residents abroad gave in memorials against us; and we must be represented in America as pirates and freebooters, and our gracious sovereign must cry peccavi for his favours towards us; This, my lord, is well known, and I having had the honour fully to discourse on this subject in this same place, I shall say no more but that king William dies.

"Our most gracious queen Anne succeeds, conform to our Claim of Right, who I hope will do right to this her ancient kingdom; what follows? She is proclaimed queen of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, whereby they prevent the forward seal of our privy counsellors then accidentally at London, as they prevented that of the Scots parliament; what more? An Union is trumped up again, by which it is evident, that they have some new design upon us, which I hope we shall be so wise to prevent by our unanimity in this session of parliament, to rectify what is amiss, and divert the fatal consequences that may follow thereafter.

"Thus, my lord, I think I have given this honourable house a short and true account from our own histories and acts of parliament of the several opportunities we have lost, when it was in our power to have rectified our constitution to this very day, which naturally brings me to the subject matter of this Act for the Security of the Kingdom, &c.

"My lord, as we go through the paragraphs of this Act, I shall speak my mind freely to the particular clauses thereof; all that I shall say farther at present is, that we have before our eyes our predecessors' faults; our most gracious queen hath before her eyes the infirmities of her royal primogenitors; she knows these people to be no good subjects, who pretend to establish a separate interest betwixt her and her people; she knows that she is queen over two distinct independent kingdoms, who have distinct laws, distinct interests and constitutions: And we know, that we are perfectly happy under her majesty's auspicious government; We are secure from all the open assaults and secret designs of our adversaries, during her reign; we want nothing to make our happiness complete, save her royal residence among us, which we have no reason to expect: What shall we then do, in the midst of our prosperity; let us consider how soon our joy may be turned to tears; how soon the dismal account may come that we have lost our guardian, the preserver of our laws and liberties.

"My lord, I think the thoughts of this should make a deep impression upon us, and make us to take time by the forehand. All things seem to concur in favour of our design. We have a most gracious queen who loves our nation; we have a new parliament, a new off-spring of many noble and hopeful young peers and other members of this new parliament, who love both our queen and country, and will venture their all in her service; we have begun a new century since our Union with England; and who know whence a blessing may come; What shall we then do? Even lay aside all divisions, all animosities and resentments, whether upon civil or ecclesiastic accounts, and let us join together like true Scots men, with our royal queen in passing this excellent law, in such an amicable manner as may re-unite us together for ever, and rectify our constitution so, as none shall afterwards be able to prevail against us in the manner they have done formerly.

"I am so much convinced of the necessity of doing this now, and not to delay it to another time, my lord, that I may truly say if in this day, we do not consider the things that tend so much to the happiness of this our nation and posterity, I am afraid such another day may be hid from our eyes; Let us then up and do, since we have a queen who will wish well from us nothing that is for our advantage."

July 1. The Act for the Security of the kingdom being read, a member moved for inserting in it such preliminaries, in case of a successor not of the queen's own body, as should sufficiently secure the Scots nation against the misfortunes arising from the influence of foreign counsels. This was seconded by a great many members; and, after some debate, it was agreed, that the act should be considered paragraph by paragraph. The next day it was resolved, that the estates of the nation should meet upon the 20th day after the queen's decease, and that the government should be lodged in their hands on that day. The 5th of July, a clause was added, excluding Papists from being members of the estates; and, on the 6th, another clause was offered, "That no Englishman or foreigner having a Scots title, and not having an estate

1,000*l.* sterling yearly rent within this kingdom, shall have place and vote in that meeting estates." Against this clause it was urged the marquis of Athol, that the privilege of erage belonged to some by birth, and to others by immediate creation. That, in the case of these cases, the private birthright of the nobles might be injured; and, in the latter, the prerogative seemed to be impaired. To this it was answered, first, that this clause is no incroaching upon the property and birthright of those peers, who were to be excluded at that time, seeing the exclusion was not that time alone, at which there was an offer to be negotiated, which was purely a Scots concern, viz. the choosing a successor for the kingdom of Scotland. Secondly, That possession and property is the true title for representation; and, though the crown, which is the fountain of honour, be not restrained to give titles according to that rule, yet, in a very nice case, there could be no exception made against excluding those from voting, who not only had no possession or interest in Scotland to represent, but who on the contrary, had possession and interest elsewhere, which might clash with the interest of the Scots nation. Thirdly, That in the affair, which was the subject-matter of the consideration of the meeting of the estates, the nominating a successor, the English were already predetermined and pre-engaged in their own choice. And though it should prove to be the interest of Scotland, not to enter into the same nomination with England, yet those predetermined peers, who had estates in England, would not risk them, to give a fair vote for the interest of Scotland, where they had no estate to lose; and therefore the clause was insisted on as proper. After some debate, the clause was put to the vote, and carried in the affirmative; it, before voting, the marquis of Athol protested, that this vote might not prejudice the undoubted right of all Scots Protestant peers; to which protest several other peers adhered. Then the marquis of Annandale, the duke of Argyll, and the earl of Kincardine also protested, that the vote might not be prejudicial to the privileges of the peers of Scotland, whether they be Scotsmen or English. On the 10th of July, it was moved, That such limitations as should be thought necessary to be put upon the successor, might be considered; and particularly a clause was offered, that the kingdom should not be engaged in any war, but by the advice and consent of the parliament. This clause being read, a long debate ensued, wherein it was urged, "That the settling the limitations upon the successor, was more proper to be done by that parliament or meeting of the estates, which should name the successor; and that the whole Act of Security might perhaps be lost, if it should be cramped by such limitations." Upon which, it was carried by a majority of twenty-six voices, 'Not to proceed to the limitations on the successor in this act.' However, it was afterwards voted, that the Act touching Peace and War should be considered, next after the Act of Security.

July 9. Upon a debate relating to the regency, in case the successor to be named were under age, it was resolved to refer that matter to the wisdom of the meeting of the estates. Five days after, it was moved, that the clause, empowering the meeting of the estates to declare a successor to the crown of the royal line and of the Protestant religion, might receive the addition of these words, 'of the true Protestant religion, as by law established, within this kingdom.' Against which it was urged, That the coronation-oath was a sufficient test to engage the successor (being a Protestant) to maintain the church, as by law established. To this it was answered, "That since the wisdom of this house had thought fit to exclude Papists, who professed the doctrine of Transubstantiation, from having any access to a Scots government; so he saw no reason why Lutherans, who profess the doctrine of consubstantiation, ought not likewise to be excluded; and more especially, considering that by this means the family of Hanover would be excluded, which was both proper and necessary, considering that the English had named that family for their successor. For he saw plainly, that the Scots nation must resolve to be in continual slavery, if they should go into the same nomination with England, unless they had such conditions of government settled within themselves, as might secure their liberty and trade; of which he saw no great appearance at this time, since it was evident from several struggles within these few days, that the ministry were in concert with the ministry of England, to continue the Scots nation under the same slavery as formerly; and therefore he did second that clause, and would second any other clause whatsoever, which might put the Scots nation under a distinct government from that of England, seeing they could not obtain such reasonable terms, as might make them easy under one and the same successor." Upon this occasion Mr. Grant informed the house, that he had instructions from the barons of the shire of Inverness, whom he represented, not to enter into any terms of succession, the same with England, unless first there should be such conditions of government, and terms of union of trade, previously concerted, passed and ratified by the parliaments of both kingdoms, as should put the Scots nation upon an equal foot with their neighbours. After some debate, the question was stated, either to 'add the words offered to the clause,' or to 'rest upon the security by the coronation-oath;' and it was carried for resting on the coronation-oath.

July 16. A clause was offered by the earl of Roxburgh, "providing the successor to be named by the meeting of the estates, be not the successor to the crown of England, unless in this session of parliament there be such conditions of government settled and enacted, as may secure the honour and independency of the crown of this kingdom, the freedom, frequency, and power of parliaments, and the religion, liberty, and trade of the nation, from the English or foreign influence." It was urged against the clause, that it imported limitations upon the successor, which had been by a former day's vote excluded out of this act. To which it was answered, That by this clause, there was no limitation designed to be brought into this act, but that the clause did only in general secure a capitulation for some proper conditions of government to be settled in the session of parliament, 'in case the nation should think fit to name the same successor with England,' in the same manner as the other day's resolve had made a capitulation for the Act of Peace and War in particular. It was again objected, That, as this clause was conceived, the making of the conditions of government was too peremptorily restrained to this session of parliament; and therefore it was moved, that, instead of 'this session of parliament,' it should be, 'in this or any other session of parliament.' To this it was answered, "That whilst the members were designing to secure a capitulation for settling such conditions of government, as might answer no less important ends than the honour and safety of the Scots crown, relieving the nation from slavery, and thereby to extinguish the jealousies, which must, for all future ages, make both nations uneasy; that, when they were projecting such good things with all imaginable dispatch in this parliament, they were told of an expedient for a new delay, by turning them off to some future parliament; which, upon the whole matter, aimed at nothing less than an intire disappointment of those generous designs. And therefore it was hoped, that the wisdom of the house would enter immediately into the clause, as at first offered." The question being put, whether 'to add the clause, or not,' some members threw in a great many new expedients, which occasioned several warm speeches; and it being late, and the house in great heat and confusion, several members pressed for a delay. The chancellor seconded this motion, adding, that this debate should be resumed the next sitting, and, by the commissioner's order, adjourned the parliament for four days. This adjournment without a vote, in the midst of a debate, was immediately protested against as illegal, and an address to the queen was framed and subscribed by above seventy members; but, on the 20th of July, the next day of meeting, the chancellor declaring, "That there was no manner of design by that adjournment to inroach upon the privilege of the parliament;" a stop was put to the address. The next day, the house proceeded on the earl of Roxburgh's clause; but, after reading it, there was another offered by the queen's advocate, "providing, that, after her majesty's decease, without heirs of her body, the same person shall in no event be capable to be king or queen of both kingdoms of England and Scotland, unless a free communication of trade, the freedom of navigation, and the liberty of the plantations be fully agreed to, and established by the parliament and kingdom of England, in favour of the kingdom and subjects of Scotland, at the sight and to the satisfaction of this or any ensuing parliament of Scotland, or the said meeting of estates." After this clause was read, it was moved, that it should be added to the Act of Security, instead of the clause offered by the earl of Roxburgh; and this motion was seconded by all the ministry and their dependents. After a long debate, some urging, to have the clause offered relating to the conditions of government added to the Act of Security; others insisting, to have the clause relating to communication of trade added; it was proposed, that both the clauses should be joined, and added to the Act of Security, which, on the 26th of July, was, after a long debate, carried by a majority of seventy-two voices: But the marquis of Annandale, lord president, and the duke of Argyll, protested against it, to which several others adhered.

Six Speeches by Mr. Fletcher on the Act of Security.] August 2. The lord high commissioner signified to the estates, that in regard a great many of the commissioners from the royal burrows were to meet in the convention of the burrows this week at Glasgow, he thought fit to adjourn the parliament for some days, and was accordingly adjourned till the Saturday after. This was very much resented by the country party, who thought it more reasonable that the convention of burrows, which related only to their own trade, should have been adjourned, than the parliament, which had before them the present and future concerns of the whole nation, and those too of as great weight as had ever been laid before the estates since the foundation of our government. On this occasion there were several sharp speeches, and one particularly by a very great man, where he took notice, that the expense and charge of a high commissioner now, was far greater than that of our kings was formerly: but our courtiers, since the union of the crowns, being more accustomed to command than to reason, the adjournment went on, upon which occasion,

Mr. Fletcher made the following speech:
"My Lord Chancellor; It is often said in this house, that parliaments, and especially long sessions of parliament, are a heavy tax and burden to this nation: I suppose they mean as things are usually managed: otherwise I should think it a great reflection on the wisdom of the nation, and a maxim very pernicious to our government. But indeed in the present state of things, they are a very great burden to us. Our parliament seldom meets in winter, when our country business and the goodness of the season make us live in town with regret. Our parliaments are sitting both in seed time and harvest, and we are made to toil the whole year. We meet one day in three; though no reason can be given why we should not meet every day, unless such a one as I am unwilling name, lest thereby occasion should be taken to mention it elsewhere to the reproach of the nation. The expences of our commissioners are very much greater than those of our kings formerly were; and a great part of this money is laid out upon equipage, and other things of high manufacture, to the great damage of the kingdom. We meet in this place in the afternoon, after a great dinner, which I think is a time to do business; and are in such confusion after candles are lighted, that very often debate of one single point cannot be finished but must be put off till another day. Parliaments are forced to submit to the conveniences which the lords of the session, and meetings of the boroughs, though no good reason can be given, either a lord of the session, or any one elected to the meetings of the boroughs, should be a member of this house; but on the contrary, experience hath taught us the inconvenience of this. When members of parliament, to perform the duty they owe to their country, have the most important affairs, and quitted their families many times in the utmost extremity, to be present at this place, they are told they may return again; as we were the other day called together only in order to be dismissed. We have been for several days adjourned in this manner, as if we were at harvest, when we had the most important affairs under deliberation; that as well as those who have neither place nor pension might be weary of their attendance, as those whose state of health makes the service of their country as dangerous, though no less honourable than if they served in the field. Do not these things shew us the necessity of those limitations I had the honour to offer to this house? particularly of that for lodging the power of adjourning in the parliament; that for meeting of parliament to be in winter; that for impeaching the president to give the royal assent; ascertaining his salary; with that for excluding all lords of the session from being members of parliament. Could one imagine that in parliament, in which we have had the first opportunity of amending our constitution by the conditions of government, occasion should be given, by reiterating former abuses, to conceal all men of the necessity of farther limitations upon a successor? Or is not this rather to be attributed to a peculiar providence, that they who are the great opposers of limitations, should by their conduct give the best reason for them? but I hope no member of this house will be discouraged either by delay or opposition; because the liberties of a people are not to be maintained without passing through great difficulties, and that no toil and labours ought to be declined to preserve a nation from slavery.

Other Clauses were afterwards offered, and, notwithstanding the strong opposition from the members, added to the Act, which, on the 13th of August, was read, and approved by a majority of 59 voices.

Some time after the house had agreed to this Act, Mr. Fletcher made two speeches about giving the royal assent to the Act of Security, and one concerning the Queen's Negative, as follows:

"My Lord Chancellor; I know it is the undoubted prerogative of her majesty, that no act of this house shall have the force of a law without her royal assent. And as I am confident his grace the high commissioner is sufficiently instructed, to give that assent to every act which shall be laid before him; so more particularly the Act for the Security of the Kingdom, which has already past this house; an act that preserves us from anarchy; an act that arms a defenceless people; an act that has cost the representatives of this kingdom much time and labour to frame, and the nation a very great expence; an act that has passed by a great majority; and above all, an act that contains a caution of the highest importance for the amendment of our constitution. I did not presume the other day, immediately after this act was voted, to desire the royal assent; I thought it a just deference to the high commissioner, not to mention it at that time. Neither would I now, but only that I may have an opportunity to represent to his grace, that as he who gives readily doubles the gift; so his grace has now in his hands, the most glorious and honourable occasion, that any person of this nation ever had, of making himself acceptable, and his memory for ever grateful to the people of this kingdom; since the honour of giving the royal assent to a law, which lays a lasting foundation for their liberties, has been reserved to him."

"My Lord Chancellor; On the day that the Act for the Security of the Kingdom passed in this house, I did not presume to move for the royal assent. The next day of our meeting I mentioned it with all imaginable respect and deference for his grace the high commissioner, and divers honourable persons seconded me. If now, after the noble lord who spoke last, I insist upon it, I think I am no way to be blamed. I shall not endeavour to shew the necessity of this act, in which the whole security of the nation now lies, having spoken to that point the other day: but shall take occasion to say something concerning the delay of giving the royal assent to acts passed in this house; for which I never could hear a good reason, except that a commissioner was not sufficiently instructed. But that cannot be the true reason at this time, because several acts have lain long for the royal assent: in particular, that to ratify a former act, for turning the convention into a parliament, and fencing the Claim of Right, which no man doubts his grace is sufficiently instructed to pass. We must therefore look elsewhere for the reason of this delay, and ought to be excused in doing this; since so little regard is had, and so little satisfaction given to the representatives of this nation, who have for more than three months employed themselves with the greatest assiduity in the service of their country, and yet have not seen the least fruit of their labours crowned with the royal assent. Only one act has been touched, for recognizing her majesty's just right, which is a thing of course. This gives but too good reason to those who speak freely, to say that the royal assent is industriously suspended, in order to oblige some men to vote, as shall be most expedient to a certain interest; and that this session of parliament is continued so long, chiefly to make men uneasy, who have neither places nor pensions to bear their charges; that by this means acts for money, importation of French wine, and the like, may pass in a thin house, which will not fail immediately to receive the royal assent, whilst the acts that concern the welfare, and perhaps the very being of the nation, remain untouched."

"My Lord Chancellor; Being under some apprehensions that her majesty may receive ill advice in this affair, from ministers who frequently mistake former bad practices for good precedents, I desire that the third act of the first session of the first parliament of king Charles 2. may be read.

'Act 3, Sess. 1, Parl. 1, Car. 2.

'ACT asserting his Majesty's Royal PREROGATIVE, in calling and dissolving of PARLIAMENTS, and making of LAWS.

'The estates of parliament now convened by his majesty's special authority, considering that the quietness, stability and happiness of the people, do depend upon the safety of the king's majesty's sacred person, and the maintenance of his sovereign authority, princely power, and prerogative royal; and conceiving themselves obliged in conscience, and in discharge of their duties to Almighty God, to the king's majesty, and to their native country, to make a due acknowledgment thereof at this time, do therefore unanimously declare, that they will with their lives and fortunes maintain and defend the same. And they do hereby acknowledge, that the power of calling, holding, proroguing, and dissolving of parliaments, and all conventions and meetings of the estates, does solely reside in the king's majesty, his heirs and successors. And that as no parliament can be lawfully kept, without the special warrant and presence of the king's majesty, or his commissioner; so no acts, sentences or statutes, to be passed in parliament, can be binding upon the people, or have the authority and force of laws, without the special authority and approbation of the king's majesty, or his commissioner interposed thereto, at the making thereof. And therefore the king's majesty, with advice and consent of his estates of parliament, doth hereby rescind and annul all laws, acts, statutes or practices that have been, or upon any pretext whatsoever may be, or seem contrary to, or inconsistent with, his Majesty's just power and prerogative above-mentioned;

'and declares the same to have been unlawful, and to be void and null in all time coming. And to the end that this act and acknowledgment, which the estates of parliament, from the sense of their humble duty and certain knowledge, have hereby made, may receive the more exact obedience in time coming; it is by his majesty, with advice abroad, statute and ordained, that the punctual observance thereof be specially regarded by all his majesty's subjects, and that none of them, upon any pretext whatsoever, offer to call in question, impugn, or do any deeds to the contrary hereof, under pain of treason.

"My Lord Chancellor; The questions concerning the king's prerogative and the people's privileges are nice and difficult. Mr. William Colvin, who was one of the wisest men that nation ever had, used to say concerning excessive arms, that he wished all princes thought them lawful, and the people unlawful. And indeed I heartily wish, that something like the moderate sentiments might always determine all matters in question between both. But the constitution of this kingdom, no act of the estates had the force of a law, unless touched by the king's sceptre, which was his undoubted prerogative. The touch of his sceptre gave authority to our laws, as his stamp did a currency to our coin: but he had no right to refuse or withhold either. It is pretended by some men, that in virtue of this act, the king may refuse the royal assent to acts passed by the estates of the kingdom. But it ought to be considered that this law is only an acknowledgment and declaration of the king's prerogative, and consequently gives nothing new to the prince. The act acknowledges this to be the prerogative of the king, that whatever is passed in this house, cannot have the force of a law without the royal assent, and makes it high treason to question this prerogative; because the parliament, during the civil war, had usurped a power of imposing their own votes upon the people for law, though neither the king, nor any person commissioned by him were present: and this new law was wholly and simply directed to abolish and rescind that usurpation, as appears by the tenor and express words of the act; which does neither acknowledge nor declare, that the prince has a power to refuse the royal assent to any act presented by the parliament. If any one should say, that the law-givers designed no less, and that the principal contrivers and promoters of the act frequently boasted they had obtained the negative, as they call it, for the crown; I desire to know how they will make that appear, since no words are to be found in the act, that shew any such design: especially if we consider, that this law was made by a parliament that spoke the most plainly, least equivocally, and most fully of all others concerning the prerogative. And those who promoted the passing of this act were under so strong a delusion, to think they had obtained a new and great prerogative."

the crown by a declaratory law, in which there is not one word to that purpose, it was the word of heaven that defeated their design of destroying the liberty of their country. I know our princes have refused their assent to some acts since the making of this law: but a practice introduced in arbitrary times can deserve no consideration. For my own part, I am far from pushing things to extremity on either side: I heartily enter into the sentiments of the wise man I mentioned before, and think the people of this nation might have been happy in mistaking the meaning of this law, if such an error as have had the greatest credit with our princes, would have let them into the true sense of it. And therefore those who have the honour to advise her majesty, should beware of inducing her to a refusal of the royal assent to the Act for the Security of the Kingdom, because the unwarrantable custom of rejecting acts, was introduced in arbitrary times."

The following Speech was spoke by Mr. Fletcher, on the Clause of the Act of Security for Arming the Protestant Subjects.

"My Lord Chancellor; I hope I need not form this honourable house, that all acts which can be proposed for the security of this kingdom, are vain and empty propositions, unless they are supported by arms; and that to rely upon any law without such a security, is to stand upon a shadow. We had better never pass this act: for then we shall not imagine we have done any thing for our security; and if we think we can do any thing effectual without that provision, we deceive ourselves, and are in a most dangerous condition. Such an act cannot be said to be an act for the security of any thing, in which the most necessary clause is wanting, and without which, all the rest is of no force: either can any kingdom be really secured but by arming the people. Let no man pretend that we have standing forces to support this law; and that if their numbers be not sufficient, we may raise more. It is very well known this nation cannot maintain so many standing forces as would be necessary for our defence, though we could entirely rely upon their fidelity. The possession of arms is the distinction of a freeman from a slave. He who has nothing, and belongs to another, must be defended by him, and needs no arms: but he who thinks he is his own master, and has any thing he may call his own, ought to have arms to defend himself and what he possesses, or else he lives precariously and at discretion. And though for a while those who have the sword in their power, abstain from doing him injuries; yet by degrees he will be awed into a submission to every arbitrary command. Our ancestors by being always armed, and frequently in action, defended themselves against the Romans, Danes, and English, and maintained their liberty against the encroachments of their own princes. If we are not rich enough to pay a sufficient number of standing forces, we have at least this advantage, that arms in our own hands serve no less to maintain our liberty at home, than to defend us from enemies abroad. Other nations, if they think they can trust standing forces, may by their means defend themselves against foreign enemies. But we, who have not wealth sufficient to pay such forces, should not, of all nations under heaven, be unarmed. For us then to continue without arms, is to be directly in the condition of slaves: to be found unarmed in the event of her majesty's death, would be to have no manner of security for our liberty, property, or the independency of this kingdom. By being unarmed, we every day run the risk of our all, since we know not how soon that event may overtake us: to continue still unarmed, when by this very act now under deliberation, we have put a case, which happening may separate us from England, would be the grossest of all follies. And if we do not provide for arming the kingdom in such an exigency, we shall become a jest and a proverb to the world."

The following Speech was spoke by Mr. Fletcher on the Clause of the Act of Security, for making all Military Commissions above that of a Captain void, upon her Majesty's death.

"My Lord Chancellor; If in the said event of her majesty's decease without heirs of her body, any considerable military force should be in the hands of one or more men, who might have an understanding together, we are not very sure what use they would make of them in so nice and critical a conjuncture. We know that as the most just and honourable enterprises, when they fail, are accounted in the number of rebellions; so all attempts, however unjust, if they succeed, always purge themselves of all guilt and imputation. If a man presume he shall have success, and obtain the utmost of his hopes, he will not too nicely examine the point of right, nor balance too scrupulously the injury he does to his country. I would not have any man take this for a reflection upon those honourable persons, who have at present the command of our troops. For besides that, we are not certain, who shall be in those commands at the time of such an event, we are to know that all men are frail, and the wicked and mean-spirited world has paid too much honour to many, who have subverted the liberties of their country. We see a great disposition at this time in some men, not to consent to any limitations on a successor, though we should name the same with England. And therefore since this is probably the last opportunity we shall ever have, of freeing ourselves from our dependence on the English court, we ought to manage it with the utmost jealousy and diffidence of such men. For though we have ordered the nation to be armed and exercised, which will be a sufficient defence when done; yet we know not but the event, which God avert, may happen before this can be effected. And we may easily imagine, what a few bold men at the head of a small number of regular troops might do, when all things are in confusion and suspense. So that we ought to make effectual provision with the utmost circumspection, that all such forces may be subservient to the government, and interest of this nation, and not to the private ambition of their commanders. I therefore move, that immediately upon the decease of her majesty, all military commissions above that of a captain be null and void."

When the parliament found the commissioner would not give an answer to their instances for passing the Security-act, it was moved, on the 25th of August, that the house should go upon the consideration of some overtures for securing the liberties of the nation, conformable to the tenour of the grand resolve, entered into the 28th of May. Against which it was urged, that, according to the terms of that resolve, the house had already made considerable progress in the matter of religion and liberty; and that trade was next in order. Upon which several acts for trade were offered and read, particularly, an Act allowing the Importation of all sorts of Wines and other foreign Liquors. As this overture was opposed by several members as prejudicial to the trade of the nation, it was alleged by one of the ministry, that it was very well known, that the customs on wines was the chief fund for the civil list; and unless the importation of French wines were restored, the government could not be supported, considering, that the funds were now very far deficient. This was seconded by another minister, representing the great benefit which would arise to the kingdom in general, and to the towns in particular, by the French trade; and concluding, "That unless that act was passed, the subjects might plow up their towns, and burn their ships." To this a member answered, "That, since he heard such harsh expressions as these come from about the throne, for no other reason, but to amuse and mislead the boroughs with pretended advantages of trade, the members must take the liberty to tell their mind the more freely. That he did openly aver, that it was plain to all this house, that the nation was ruined in all its concerns both of liberty and trade, by the most treacherous artifices of those, who were in the ministry." Upon this, some about the throne said, that these expressions ought 'to be taken notice of.' To which the same member answered, "That he heard it murmured about the throne, that his expressions ought to be taken notice of; but he defied any body to take notice of them, for they all knew too well, that what he had spoken was a certain truth." It was again urged in behalf of the act, "That upon further inquiry it would be found, that the trade with France was a trade beneficial to the nation, because the French took Scots goods in return for their wines." So that, after a long and angry debate, the act was ordered to be marked a first reading.

Sept. 6. The earl of Marchmont desired leave of the house to withdraw an 'Act, containing some Limitations upon the Successor,' which had been lately presented by him, but had not yet been read. His desire being granted, as soon as his lordship had withdrawn that act, he begged leave to present another in its room, which he desired might be read. This was an act to 'settle the succession on the house of Hanover;' and, as his lordship had not signified what the import of it was, no body opposed his motion for the reading of it; but when the clerk came to that paragraph, where it substitutes the princess Sophia, &c. no sooner were those words out of his mouth, but the whole house was in a flame. Some moved to have the overture burnt; and others to have the earl, who offered it, called to the bar, and others to have him sent to the castle. After the house had shewed a general dissatisfaction against the thing, at length the chancellor procured silence, and the clerk was ordered to read it through; and the earl of Marchmont desired it might be marked a first reading, and was seconded by the marquis of Lothian and another member. But they were so warmly opposed, that there was not a vote demanded; and the earl of Marchmont proposed only, that the overture might be marked in the minutes, expressing the import of it, urging, "That the minutes ought always to record the matter of fact as passed in parliament." This was warmly opposed by a member, who said, "That though it is both customary and proper, that every thing, which is moved in the house, be marked in the minutes; yet the act now offered by the earl of Marchmont ought to be distinguished by some particular mark of indignation from this house, seeing the generality of the members had sufficiently shewn their sentiments, in relation to the nomination of a successor, and had so frequently in this session declared it to be their opinion, that the nation was at present in a very improper state for nominating a successor the same with England: And therefore the best he could say, in behalf of this most unreasonable overture, was to move, that it might be buried in oblivion, and not marked in the minutes." Another member said, "That he heard an act offered, which seemed to contain some things inconsistent with the Act of Security, which had lately passed the vote of the house; and it was not unlikely, that the jealousy, which the members had contracted, that this act of settlement was not to receive the royal assent, prompted them to find out new acts to supply it. That he very plainly foresaw, that this would promote the jealousy, which this nation had already contracted against their neighbours; and therefore he moved, that the lord chancellor might, as the mouth of the house, address her majesty's representative to give the royal assent to that act." This motion was seconded by a great many members; and, the earl of Marchmont still insisting to have his act marked in the minutes, as a privilege naturally due to all overtures, the question was stated, Whether to mark the overture in the minutes, or not!

and it was carried in the negative by fifty-seven votes.

Sept. 9. It was represented by a member, That this parliament had now sate very long, and, after a vast expence of money, time, and pains, had at length passed an act for the security of the nation; and as it would be a great recompence to the members to see that they receive the royal assent, so it would, no doubt, be very satisfactory to the nation. And therefore he begged, that her majesty's commissioner would give the royal assent to the act." This was seconded by a great many members; and at length, a motion was made, at the house should 'address her majesty to give the royal assent.' Against this it was moved, That the parliament had already done their part, by voting the act, and what remained to be done, was the queen's part; and that there was no need for addressing, seeing was notified to the queen, that the parliament had voted the act. To this it was answered, "That, no doubt, it was made known to her majesty by her ministry, that this act had passed the vote of the house: But that every body knew very well, that courtiers never fail to represent the black-side of things; and therefore he concurred in that motion of condoning the former vote of the house, by a respectful address to her majesty." After some further debate, and several warm speeches, it was represented by the marquis of Tweedale, that it was somewhat too hasty to address her majesty for her assent, until the house knew from the commissioner, whether he was already instructed for that purpose; and therefore he begged, that the commissioner would declare his intentions. A great many members seconded this motion, and pressed, that the commissioner would give the house so much satisfaction, as to let them know, whether or no he was instructed to pass this act. But his grace did not think fit to give any answer in the matter. Thereupon another member, Mr. Fletcher of Salton, said, "That he had seldom seen any benefit from addresses, and for that reason he was very little concerned, whether his house did at present address her majesty or not. That he thought, that the acts, which the house had voted, were but very slender securities for the security of the nation: That the nation's case was desperate, and the provisions just be suitable. That he found some people were too forward in promoting the succession of the house of Hanover, and others that of the prince of Wales; and that they were both contented to sacrifice their own and their nation's liberty, rather than not accomplish their designs. That he did consider it as a very melancholy prospect for this nation, that they were not to expect either of those two successors, but at the rate of being slaves, not to their princes, but to their neighbours; or supposing, that, upon the one hand this nation should submit either willingly, or by commission, to the successor of England, without such conditions of government within themselves, as should secure them against the sole influence, of the English ministry upon their joint prince, in that case they were no better than slaves: Or, if on the other hand, the Scots should force their successor upon the English, without securing to themselves the conditions before-mentioned, they must still resolve to be under the same dependance, when conquerors, as when conquered. And therefore, that it was absolutely necessary for them to settle such conditions of government, as might place them in a reasonable state of freedom and security, whosoever might be the successor; and that to this purpose he offered an act, which might answer those ends." The first draught ran thus: "Our sovereign lady, with the advice and consent of the estates of parliament, statutes and ordains, that, after the decease of her majesty (whom God long preserve) and failing heirs of her body, no one shall succeed to the crown of this realm, that is likewise successor to the crown of England, but under the limitations following; which, together with the Coronation-Oath and Claim of Right, they shall swear to observe: That all places and offices, both civil and military, and all pensions formerly conferred upon our kings, shall ever after be given by parliament: That a new parliament shall be chosen every Michaelmas head-court, to sit the 1st of November thereafter, and adjourn themselves from time to time till next Michaelmas; and that they chuse their own president: That a committee of thirty-six members, chosen by and out of the whole parliament, without distinction of estates, shall, during the intervals of parliament, under the king, have the administration of the government, be his council, and accountable to parliament; with power, on extraordinary occasions, to call the parliament together."

After the act was read, the member said, "That he had not in this act made any nomination of a successor; and it was his opinion, that this nation was not, at present, in a condition for such a nomination; but seeing there was a great zeal amongst some for promoting the succession of Hanover, and no less among others for promoting that of the prince of Wales; therefore, to satisfy both, he had another act ready to offer, but which he need not read, seeing it was the very same with what was already offered in every circumstance, excepting only that it had a blank in it for nominating a successor. That he moved, that the members might go to work, and pass this act; and, immediately after that, let each party try their strength, and let the strongest carry the nomination, and fill up the blank, according to the mind of the plurality. That thus far he begged leave to declare his opinion, that he had rather concur in nominating the most rigid Papist with those conditions of government, than the truest Protestant without them." This motion was seconded by several members; but others urged against it, "That the house was now in the middle of an act of trade,

‘which ought to be finished before any other business.’ After some debate, and a great many new instances to the commissioner, to give the royal assent to the Act of Security, a member said, “That he found this house was to get no satisfaction from her majesty’s commissioner at this time; and it seemed, the nation was to expect as little good; and therefore, the next best clause was to prevent damage as much as possible. That it was to be noted, that there were lately some meetings betwixt some subjects of both kingdoms, in which several matters were agitated, in relation to an union between the two nations. That he should not descend to an inquiry into the nature of the powers, by virtue of which the subjects of Scotland did meet upon such a treaty. That those things might be spoke to in due time; but at present he humbly conceived, there were two things worthy the consideration of this house; The one was, that, seeing such a treaty had been entered upon by some of the subjects of this nation, it seemed strange, that nothing of that sort had all this session of parliament been laid before this house; and therefore he moved, That it be now laid before the house, to be considered by the members. The other thing was, that, seeing there were a great many things to be said in relation to that treaty, which might be more seasonably taken notice of at another time, therefore he moved, that a stop might be put to any further proceedings in that matter.” This motion was seconded by a great many members: and, after some debate, there was a motion made and acquiesced to without a vote, “That the progress, and advances, made in the said treaty, might be laid before the parliament next ensuing, and declared by a vote of parliament, that the commission granted for the said treaty was determined and extinct; and that there should be no new commission for treating of any union betwixt the kingdoms of Scotland and England, without consent of parliament.” After this was over, a great many members pressed the commissioner to give the royal assent to the Act of Security; but no answer was made from the throne. At length a member said, That, seeing so much had been said without an answer, it was better to leave the commissioner to his reflections; that, perhaps, he would be ready to comply against next day; and that, therefore, he moved the house should proceed to finish the act against the exportation of wool (which had been marked the first reading) and this was accordingly gone upon, put to the vote, and approved.

The Queen refuses her Assent to the Act of Security.] Sept. 10. The commissioner made the following speech:

“My lords and gentlemen; It was with great uneasiness to me, that I was forced to be silent yesterday, when so many did appear earnest, that I should speak. I have all the inclinations in the world to give you full satisfaction; but I thought, that I ought not to be pressed to give the royal assent, or to declare my instructions in parliament, which I had made known to many noble and worthy members, besides the queen’s servants.

“Now that these instances are let fall, and that you have proceeded to other business, I testify how willing I am to give you contentment in any thing, that is in my power, I tell you freely, that I have received her majesty’s pleasure, and am fully empowered to give the royal assent to all the acts voted in this session, excepting only that act, intitled, ‘an Act for the Security of the Kingdom.’ You may easily believe, that requires her majesty’s further consideration. At the same time her majesty expects you will mind your own safety, in making necessary provisions for the troops upon the present establishment; and that we will put the trade and customs on that foot, that the civil list may be supported. And I treat your lordships to finish these as quickly as possible, that this session may be put to a speedy and happy conclusion.”

The commissioner having ended his speech, a member said, “That, had it been spoke at the beginning of the session, it might have saved a great deal of labour and expence; for this was plainly to tell the parliament, ‘that their business was to raise a subsidy for the army, and customs for the civil list; and that then the session should be happily concluded by an adjournment.’” This was followed by a debate concerning the queen’s negative. It was urged, “That the third act of the first session of the first parliament of king Charles I. (which is the only act, upon which the negative is founded) was only made to obviate a practice, which had been usurped by the estates in the time of the late rebellion, of making laws by their own vote, and promulgating such votes, as having the authority of laws, without the royal assent: And therefore by the said act it is declared, ‘That the royal assent is necessary and essential to give the force of a law to the vote of the house;’ but from thence it could not be inferred, that the assent could be refused to an act offered, and solemnly passed the house; and that, till of late, the negative had never been interposed; and that but in very few cases.” After some debate, a motion was made to address her majesty, ‘That she would please to gratify the house in giving the royal assent to the act.’ But the question being put, ‘Address or Proceed to other business,’ it was carried, ‘Proceed to other business,’ by twelve voices. After this, Mr. Pringle, who had been secretary to the Treaty of Union, was ordered to lay the minutes of that Treaty before the house at their next sitting.

Proceedings in the Act of Limitation upon the Successor to the Throne.] Sept. 15. It was moved, that, seeing the royal assent had been refused to the Act of Security, therefore it was proper to go upon other overtures for the security of the nation upon the event of the queen’s demise. Against this it was urged, that the house had concluded by a late resolve to go upon overtures for trade: To which was answered, That this last resolve had entered into, 'after the Act of Security' I passed the vote of the house, and whilst it is not doubted, that the royal assent would be given to it; but that now, the royal assent being refused, the house did naturally recur to the vote of their first grand resolve, entered into 28th day of May. To this it was again read, That the Act of Security was indeed laid aside, but perhaps it might afterwards give the royal assent, when her majesty had her considered of it; and that, besides this Act of Security, there were some other very valuable acts passed in consequence of that grand resolve; such as the act 'securing Presbyterian government, the act ratifying the claim of Right, &c.' to which acts the royal assent was now promised by her majesty's commissioner; and therefore it was high time to upon some further acts for trade. After a long and warm debate, the question being put, 'to proceed either upon the Act for Limitation, or upon Overtures for Trade?' It was carried for the latter by a majority of eleven voices. This being over, the 'act for importing Wine' was read, and, the question for approving it being insisted on, the marquis of Tweedale said, "seeing no arguments could prevail with the people to part with this 'scandalous and pernicious act,' he thought it was very proper, that all honest men, who wished well to the trade of their country and the honour of their queen, should clear themselves of the assent to it: And therefore, before the act was put to the vote, he entered a protestation himself, and in the name of such as should adhere to it, "That this act, allowing the importation of French wines and brandy, ought not to pass, as being dishonourable to her majesty, inconsistent with the grand alliance, wherein she was engaged, and prejudicial to the honour, safety, interest, and trade of this kingdom." He desired, that this protestation might be marked and inserted in the records of parliament; and the same was adhered to by twenty peers, forty-three representatives for burghs, and twenty-one representatives of nobles; and then, the clause being put to the vote, it was carried in the affirmative. The next day, Sept. 14, a clause was offered, 'That no Scots ships should trade directly with France now in time of war;' but, several members objecting against it, the act was carried by a vote without it.

Sept. 15. It was urged by a member, "That it had been a very tedious and expensive session of parliament: That most part of it had been employed in adjusting the Act of Security of the nation after her majesty's decease: that, in passing this Act of Security was now laid aside, and therefore high time for the house to employ themselves in making new conditions. At that time there was an act now lying upon the table, offered by Mr. Fletcher, which he moved should be the standard of future deliberations, and that formerly offered by the marquis of Athol had been the foundation of the Act of Security."

This motion being seconded by many members, the lord treasurer represented, that the parliament had sat a long time without providing funds for the army, which must of necessity be supported, both for maintaining the peace at home, and for defending the nation against invasions from abroad: that there was an act now upon the table, which had been long before presented for that purpose: and he moved, that it might receive a first reading. This was opposed by a member, who said, "That it seemed very unseasonable to propose a supply at this time, when the house had so much to do for the security of the nation: it being well known, that this parliament should have no time allowed them after the supply was granted; though, for his part, he saw nobody unwilling to go upon the supply in due time, yet he thought it was very little encouragement for the nation to grant a supply, when they found themselves frustrated of all their labour and expense for these several months, and when the whole nation saw, that the supplies serve for no other uses, but to gratify the avarice of some untractable ministers." This occasioned a long debate, and many warm speeches were made in behalf of Mr. Fletcher's act in particular, and on the state of the nation in general; and at length Mr. Fletcher himself spoke in favour of his own act, entering into the detail of it. Among the many arguments for promoting it, and the good consequences which would arise from it, he urged, "That it would save a great sum, which was yearly expended by such as went to court to look after places. That this sum might serve for a good stock for trade. That by this act the nation would be free from the influence of English ministers, by having their own places bestowed by a Scots parliament. That such an establishment would not turn the form of the Scots government into a commonwealth, since there are precedents for it in some of the most absolute monarchies in the world, particularly China, where all offices are bestowed by the prince upon recommendation from his several councils in the several parts of his kingdoms: nor would the prerogative be impaired by it: for as to the prince's concern, it was only changing hands betwixt the advice of an English ministry and that of a Scots parliament. That a Scots parliament must know, who are persons fit for the service of their prince and nation better than English ministers, who, through their being unacquainted with the Scotsmen and Scots affairs, might commit mistakes hurtful to both nations. That the English would be gainers by this Act as well as their prince, since all the advantage, they had by the present establishment, was to have the vanity of directing Scots affairs by the humour of a few of their own ministers, who (as appeared of late) had very much mistaken the interest of England, in some directions they gave relating to the Scots affairs. That by these means Scotland was impoverished, and rendered incapable of giving that joint-assistance against the common enemy, which otherwise they might, if they were allowed to manage their own trade and business to the best advantage. That these difficulties must certainly make the nation uneasy in their present condition, and would certainly dispose them to lay hold on any opportunity of amending their condition, though to the ruin of their neighbours.

The Chancellor made an answer to this speech, representing the act as laying a scheme for a commonwealth, and tending to innovate the constitution of the monarchy. And then the ministry, offered a state of a vote for giving a first reading either to Mr. Fletcher's act, or to the act of subsidy. There were many of the country party, who had no mind to go to the full extent of Mr. Fletcher's act, but were withal resolved to go upon the consideration of overtures for the liberty of the nation. These urged another state of a vote, viz. 'overtures for subsidies,' or 'overtures for liberty?' But the ministry pressed the first state of the vote. Upon which Mr. Fletcher alledged, "That he had the honour to offer an act for securing the liberties of the nation against English influence. That it was his opinion, that the condition of the nation was so far gone into ruin, that the provisions in this act were absolutely necessary for its relief. That he doubted not to make this appear by reasons unanswerable; but that he found some people very ready to pervert the meaning of good designs: and, lest any such bad handle should be made of an overture, which he had sincerely designed for the good of his country, he begged leave to withdraw his overture:" adding, "That he should be very ready to go into such overtures, as the wisdom of the house should judge most proper for the honour and safety of the nation." Then the other state of the vote was offered, 'overtures for liberty,' or 'overtures for a subsidy.' Here the ministry were at a loss, for they knew, that overtures for liberty would be carried; and, by Mr. Fletcher's withdrawing his act, they were obliged to look out for another state of a vote. This put them to a consultation about the throne, during which time the members called from all sides of the house for a vote upon the question, as stated, Liberty, or Subsidy, and a great many warm expressions were thrown out against the ministry from people of all ranks. After some time spent in this manner, during which several uncertain and imperfect overtures of differing states of questions were made: the commissioner moved from the throne, "That, if the house would agree to allow a first reading to the subsidy act, he did promise, That, it should not be heard of for three ensuing sessions." To this a member answered, that he believed, that those about the throne did not expect, that this overture would take in the house: that the import of it was plainly this, that the act for a subsidy should get a first reading now; then the house should have three short sittings for the liberties of the nation; and the fourth should compleat the subsidy: after which, the house was sure to be adjourned: but, that he was certain the house was better acquainted with the artifices of the ministry, than to be misled by such overtures." Another member urged "That it was now plain, the nation was to expect no other return for their expense and toil, than to be put to the charge of a subsidy, and to lay down their necks under the yoke of slavery, which was prepared for them from that throne." A third member said, "That he insisted upon having a vote upon the question, which had been put. That he found, that, as the liberties were suppressed, so the privileges of parliament were like to be torn from them; but that he would rather venture his life than it should be so; and should rather to die a freeman, than 'live a slave.'" Some pressed for the vote, and particularly the earl of Roxburgh, who added, "That if there was no other way of obtaining so natural and undeniable a privilege of the parliament 'they would demand it, with their swords in their hands.' Whether or not the commissioner had information, that the house would adhere to what they proposed to be done, it is certain, that the foot guards were ordered to be in readiness, and that, for several days before, a grand-guard was set upon the Netherbow port; and lieutenant-general Ramsay was heard to say in his cups, 'That means would be found to make 'the parliament calm enough.' However, the commissioner, perceiving he should be torn in pieces, if he withstood the formidable opposition he saw against him, ordered the chancellor to acquaint the house, "That it was yielded the parliament should proceed upon overtures for liberty next session." Upon which assurance the members met the next morning, in order to prepare an overture for their purpose, which was in substance as follows: "That the elective members should be chosen for every seat at the Michaelmas head courts: that there should be a parliament held once in two years at least: that the short adjournments, de die in diem, should be made by the parliament themselves as in England: that no officer of the army, customs, or excise, or gratuitous pensioner, should sit as an elective member.

The Lord High Commissioner's Speech at the Adjournment.] If such an act had received the royal assent, the country-party had resolved in giving a supply, but the commissioner was not instructed to purchase it at that rate; and having notice of what passed, he called for such acts as he was impowered to pass, and having given the royal assent to them, made the following speech to the parliament:

"My lords and gentlemen; we have now passed several good acts for our religion, liberty and trade, which, I hope, will be acceptable to all her majesty's good subjects. I wish you had also given the supplies necessary for the maintaining of her majesty's forces, and preserving the peace and safety of the kingdom. But since, I hope, this may yet be done in due time, and that besides ome questions and difficulties are fallen, that, all probability, you can have no time to determine: and that withal, it is fit her majesty should have time to consider upon such things, that have been laid before her; and, that we may know her mind therein more perfectly, a short recess appears at present to be necessary, and that this parliament be adjourned for some time.—And therefore I have ordered my lord chancellor to adjourn this parliament until the 12th of October next.” Which the lord chancellor did accordingly.*

“My Lord Chancellor; I have waited long and with great patience for the result of this session, to see if I could discover a real and sincere intention in the members of this house to restore the freedom of our country in this great and perhaps only opportunity. I know there are many different views among us, and all men pretend the good of the nation. But every man here is obliged carefully to examine the things before us, and to act according to his knowledge and conscience, without regard to the views of other men, whatever charity he may have for them: I say, every man in this place is obliged by the oath he has taken to give such advice as he thinks most expedient for the good of his country. The principal business of this session has been the forming of an

* “Thus ended this famous session of parliament, in which the greatest part of the ministry had abandoned the duke of Queensberry; and particularly the earl of Seafield, lord chancellor, the marquis of Athol, lord privy-seal, and the lord viscount Tarbat, secretary of state, with all who depended on them; yet, upon the conclusion of the session, the marquis was made a duke, and the lord Tarbat earl of Cromarty; which looked like rewarding them for their opposition. The marquis of Douglass, though under age, was likewise made a duke; the viscounts of Stair and Roseberry were created earls of the same name: the lord Boyle, earl of Glasgow; James Stuart of Bute, earl of Bute; Charles Hope of Hopton, earl of Hop-ton; John Crawford of Kilbiruce, viscount of Carnock; and sir James Primrose of Carrington, viscount of Primrose. Soon after, the queen resolved to revive the order of the Thistle, which had been raised by her father, but was let fall by the late king. It was to be carried in a green ribbon, as the George is in blue, and the glory was in the form of a St. Andrew's cross, with a thistle in the middle. Argyle and Athol, Annandale, Orkney, and Seafield were the first who had it, the number being limited to twelve. To such a height did the disorders in that kingdom rise, that great skill and much secret practice seemed necessary to set matters right there. The aversion and jealousy towards those, who had been

Act for the Security of the kingdom, upon the expiration of the present entail of the crown. And though one would have thought, that the most essential thing which could have entered into such an act, had been to ascertain the conditions on which the nation would receive a successor, yet this has been entirely waved and over-ruled by the house. Only there is a caution inserted in the act, that the successor shall not be the same person who is to succeed in England, unless such conditions of government be first enacted, as may secure the freedom of this nation. But this is a general and indefinite clause, and liable to the dangerous inconvenience of being declared to be fulfilled by giving us two or three inconsiderable laws. So that this session of parliament, in which we have had so great an opportunity of making ourselves for ever a free people, is like to terminate without any real security for our liberties, or any essential amendment of our constitution. And now, when we ought to come to particulars, and enact such limitations as may fully satisfy the general clause, we must amuse ourselves with things of little significance, and hardly mention any limitation of moment or consequence. But instead of this, acts are brought in for regulations to take place during the life of the queen, which we are not to expect, and quite draw us off from the business we should attend. By these methods divers well meaning men have been deluded, whilst others have proposed a present nomination of a successor under limitations. But I fear the farmost active in the last reign, and the favour shewn to those, who were in king James's interest, had an appearance of bringing matters out of an excess to a temper; and it was much magnified by those who intended to flatter the queen, on design to ruin her. Though the same measures were taken in England, yet there was less danger in following them there, than in Scotland. Errors might be sooner observed, and easier corrected, where persons are in view, and are watched in all their motions; but this might prove fatal at a greater distance, where it was more easy to deny or palliate things with greater assurance. The duke of Queensberry's engrossing all things to himself, increased the disgust at the credit he was in. He had begun a practice of drawing out the sessions of parliament to an unusual length; by which his appointments exhausted so much of the revenue, that the rest of the ministers were not paid; which will always create discontent. He trusted entirely to a few persons, and his conduct was liable to just exceptions. Some of those, who had the greatest credit with him, were believed to be engaged in a foreign interest; and his passing, or rather promoting the act, which opened a correspondence with France, was considered as a design to settle a commerce there: and, upon that, his fidelity or his capacity were much questioned.” Tindal.

greater part have designed to, make their court either to her majesty, the house of Hanover, or those of St. Germain's, by maintaining the prerogative in Scotland as high as ever, to the perpetual enslaving of this nation to the ministers of England. Therefore I, who have never made court to any prince, and I hope never shall, at the rate of the least prejudice to my country, think myself obliged in discharge of my conscience, and the duty of my oath in parliament, to offer such limitations as may answer the general clause in the Act for the Security of the kingdom; and this I do in two draughts, the one containing the limitations by themselves; the other with the same limitations, and a blank for inserting the name of a successor. If the house shall think fit to take into consideration that draught which has no blank, and enact the limitations, I shall rest satisfied, being as little fond of naming a successor as any man. Otherwise, I offer the draught with a blank: to the end that every man may make his court to the person he most affects; and hope by this means to please all parties: The court in offering them an opportunity to name the successor of England, a thing so acceptable to her majesty and that nation: Those who may favour the court of St. Germain's, by giving them a chance for their pretensions; and every true Scots-man in vindicating the liberty of this nation, who ever be the successor.

First Draught.

“Our sovereign lady, with advice and consent of the estates of parliament, statutes and ordains, That after the decease of her majesty, whom God long preserve, and failing heirs of her body, no one shall succeed to the crown of this realm that is likewise successor to the crown of England, but under the limitations following, which, together with the Oath of Coronation and Claim of Right, they shall swear to observe. That all places and offices, both civil and military, and all pensions formerly conferred by our kings, shall ever after be given by parliament.—That a new parliament shall be chosen every Michaelmas head-court, to sit the first of November thereafter, and adjourn themselves from time to time till next Michaelmas; and that they chuse their own president.—That a committee of thirty six members, chosen by and out of the whole parliament, without distinction of estates, shall during the intervals of parliament, under the king, have the administration of the government, be his council, and accountable to parliament: with power in extraordinary occasions, to call the parliament together.”

Second Draught.

“Our sovereign lady, with advice and consent of the estates of parliament, statutes and ordains, That after the decease of her majesty, whom God long preserve, and heirs of her body failing, shall succeed to the crown of this realm. But that in case the said successor be likewise the successor to the crown of England, the said successor shall be under the limitations following, &c.”

“No man can be an enemy to these limitations, in case we have the same king out of England, except he who is so shameless a partizan either of the court at St. Germain's, or the house of Hanover, that he would rather see Scotland continue to depend upon an English ministry, than that their prerogative should be any way lessened in this kingdom. As for those who have St. Germain's in their view, and accounted the highest of all the prerogatives, I would ask them, if we should assist them in advancing their prince to the throne of Great Britain, are we, for our reward, to continue still in our former dependence on the English court? These limitations are the only test to discover a lover of his country from a courtier either to her majesty, Hanover, or St. Germain's. For prerogative-men who are for enslaving this nation to the directions of another court, are courtiers to any successor; and let them pretend what they will, if their principles lead necessarily to subject this nation to another, are enemies to the nation. These men are so absurd as to provoke England, and yet resolve to continue slaves of that court. This country must be made a field of blood, in order to advance a papist to the throne of Britain. If we fail, we shall be slaves by right of conquest; if we prevail, have the happiness to continue in our former slavish dependence. And though to break this vice all good men would venture their all, yet I believe few will be willing to lie at the mercy of France and popery, and at the same time draw upon themselves the indignation and power of England, for the sake only of measuring our strength with a much more powerful nation; and to be sure to continue still under our former dependence, though we should happen to prevail. Now of those who are for the same successor with England, I would ask, if in this case we are not also to continue in our former dependence; which will not fail always to grow from bad to worse, and at length become more intolerable to all honest men, than death itself. For my own part I think, that even the most zealous protestant in the nation, if he have a true regard for his country, ought rather to wish, were it consistent with our Claim of Right, that a papist should succeed to the throne of Great Britain under such limitations as would render this nation free and independent, than the most protestant and best prince without any. If we may live free, I little value who is king: it is indifferent to me, provided the limitations be enacted, to name or not name; Hanover, St. Germain's, or whom you will.”

“My Lord Chancellor; His grace the high commissioner having acquainted this house that he has instructions from her majesty to give the royal assent to all acts passed in this session, except that for the security of the kingdom, will be highly necessary to provide some new way for securing our liberty upon the expiration of the present entail of the crown. And therefore I shall speak to the first article of the limitations contained in the short act I offered the other day; not only because it is the first order, but because I persuade myself you know that parliaments were formerly chosen annually; that they had the power of appointing the times of their meetings and adjournments, together with the nomination of committees to superintend the administration of the government during the intervals of parliament: all which, if it were necessary, might be removed by a great number of public acts. So that if I demonstrate the use and necessity of the first article, there will remain no great difficulty concerning the rest.

“My Lord Chancellor; The condition of a people, however unhappy, if they not only know the cause of their misery, but have also the remedy in their power, and yet should refuse to apply it, one would think, were not to be pitied. And though the condition of good men, who are concluded and oppressed by a majority of the bad, is much to be lamented; yet Christianity teaches us to shew a greater measure of compassion to those who are knowingly and voluntarily obstinate to ruin both themselves and others. But the regret of every wise and good man must needs be extraordinary, when he sees the liberty and happiness of his country not only obstructed, but utterly distinguished by the private and transitory interest of self-designing men, who indeed very often meet their own ruin, but most certainly bring destruction upon their posterity by such courses. Sure if a man who is intrusted by others, should for his own private advantage betray that trust, to the perpetual and irreparable ruin of those who trusted him, the liveliest sense and deepest remorse for so great a guilt, will undoubtedly seize and terrify the conscience of such a man, as often as the treacherous part he has acted shall recur to his thoughts; which will most frequently happen in the times of his distress, and the nearer he approaches to life in which those remorse is perpetual. But I hope every man in this house has so well considered these things, as to preserve him from falling into such terrible circumstances: And is all men are subject to great failings) if any person placed in this most eminent trust, is conscious to himself of having ever been wanting in duty to his country, I doubt not he will this day, in this weighty matter, atone for all, and not blindly follow the opinion of other men, because he alone must account for his own actions to his great Lord and Master.

“The limitation, to which I am about to speak, requires, that all places, offices, and pensions, which have been formerly given by our kings, shall, after her majesty and heirs of her body, be conferred by parliament so long as we are under the same prince with England. Without this limitation, our poverty and subjection to the court of England will every day increase; and the question we have now before us is, whether we will be freemen or slaves for ever? whether we will continue to depend, or break the yoke of our dependence? and whether we will chuse to live poor and miserable, or rich, free, and happy? Let no man think to object, that this limitation takes away the whole power of the prince. For the same condition of government is found in one of the most absolute monarchies of the world. I have very good authority for what I say, from all the best authors that have treated of the government of China; but shall only cite the words of an able minister of state, who had very well considered whatever had been written on that subject; I mean sir William Temple, who says, “That for the government, it is absolute monarchy, there being no other laws in China, but the king’s orders and commands: and it is likewise hereditary, still descending to the next of blood. But all orders and commands of the king proceed through his councils; and are made upon the recommendation or petition of the council proper and appointed for that affair; so that all matters are debated, determined, and concluded by the several councils; and then upon their advices and requests made to the king, they are ratified and signed by him, and so pass into laws. All great offices of state are likewise conferred by the king, upon the same recommendations or petitions of his several councils; so that none are preferred by the humour of the prince himself, nor by favour of any minister, by flattery or corruption, but by the force or appearance of merit, of learning, and of virtue; which observed by the several councils, gain their recommendations or petitions to the king.” These are the express words of that minister. And if under the greatest absolute monarchy of the world, in a country where the prince actually resides; if among heathens this be accounted a necessary part of government for the encouragement of virtue, shall it be denied to Christians living under a prince who resides in another nation? shall it be denied to a people, who have a right to liberty, and yet are not capable of any in their present circumstances, without this limitation? But we have formed to ourselves such extravagant notions of government, that even in a limited monarchy nothing will please, which in the least deviates from the model of France, and every thing else must stand branded with the name of commonwealth. Yet a great and wise people found this very condition of government necessary to support even an absolute monarchy. If any man say, that the empire of China contains divers kingdoms: and that the care of the emperor, and his knowledge of particular men cannot extend to all: I answer, the case is the same with us; and it seems as if that wise people designed this constitution for a remedy to the like inconveniences with those we labour under at this time.

“This limitation will undoubtedly enrich the nation, by stopping that perpetual issue of money to England, which has reduced this country to extreme poverty. This limitation does not flatter us with the hopes of riches by an uncertain project; does not require so much as the condition of our own industry; but by saving great sums to the country, will every year furnish a stock sufficient to carry on a considerable trade, or to establish some useful manufacture at home, with the highest probability of success; because our ministers by this rule of government, would be freed from the influence of English councils; and our trade be entirely in our own hands; and not under the power of the court, as it was in the affair of Durien. If we do not obtain this limitation, our attendance at London will continue to drain this nation of all those sums, which should be a stock for trade. Besides, by frequenting that court, we not only spend our money, but learn the expensive modes and ways of living, of a rich and luxurious nation: we lay out yearly great sums in furniture and equipage, to the unspeakable prejudice of the trade and manufactures of our own country. Not that I think it amiss to travel into England, in order to see and learn their industry in trade and husbandry. But at court what can we learn, except a horrid corruption of manners, and an expensive way of living, that we may for ever after be both poor and profligate?

“This limitation will secure to us our freedom and independence. It has been often said in this house, that our princes are captives in England; and indeed one would not wonder if, when our interest happens to be different from that of England, our kings, who must be supported by the riches and power of that nation in all their undertakings, should prefer an English interest before that of this country. It is yet less strange, that English ministers should advise and procure the advancement of such persons to the ministry of Scotland, as will comply with their measures and the king's orders; and to surmount the difficulties they may meet with from a true Scots interest, that places and pensions should be bestowed upon parliament men and others: I say, these things are so far from wonder, that they are inevitable in the present state of our affairs. But I hope they likewise shew us, that we ought not to continue any longer in this condition. Now this limitation is advantageous to all. The prince will no more be put upon the hardship of deciding between an English and a Scots interest; or the difficulty of reconciling what he owes to each nation, in consequence of his coronation oath. Even English ministers will no longer lie under the temptation of meddling in Scots affairs: nor the ministers of this kingdom, together with all those who have places and pensions, be any more subject to the worst of all slavery. But if the influences I mentioned before shall still continue, what will any other limitation avail us? what shall we be the better for our Act concerning the power of War and Peace: since by the force of an English interest and influence, we cannot fail of being engaged in every war, and neglected in every peace?

“By this limitation, our parliament will become the most uncorrupted senate of all Europe. No man will be tempted to vote against the interest of his country, when his country shall have all the bribes in her own hands: offices, places, pensions. It will be no longer necessary to lose one half of the public customs, that parliament-men may be made collectors. We will not desire to exclude the officers of state from sitting in this house, when the country shall have the nomination of them; and our parliaments, free from corruption, cannot fail to redress all our grievances. We shall then have no cause to fear a refusal of the royal assent to our acts; for we shall have no evil counsellor, nor enemy of his country to advise it. When this condition of government shall take place, the royal assent will be the ornament of the prince, and never be refused to the desires of the people. A general unanimity will be found in this house; in every part of the government, and among all ranks and conditions of men. The distinctions of court and country-party shall no more be heard in the nation; nor shall the prince and people any longer have a different interest. Rewards and punishments will be in the hands of those who live among us, and consequently best know the merit of men; by which means virtue will be recompensed and vice discouraged, and the reign and government of the prince will flourish in peace and justice.

“I should never make an end, if I would prosecute all the great advantages of this limitation; which, like a divine influence, turns all to good, as the want of it has hitherto poisoned every thing, and brought all to ruin. I shall therefore only add one particular more, in which it will be of the highest advantage to this nation. We all know, that the only way of enslaving a people is by keeping up a standing army; that by standing forces all limited monarchies have been destroyed, without them none; that so long as any standing forces are allowed in a nation, pretexts will never be wanting to increase them; that princes have never suffered militias to be put upon any good foot, lest standing forces should appear unnecessary. We also know that a good and well regulated militia is of so great importance to a nation, as to be the principal part of the constitution of any free government. Now by this limitation, the nation will have a sufficient power to render their militia good and effectual, by the nomination of officers: and if we would send a certain proportion of our militia abroad yearly, and relieve them from time to time, we may make them as good as those of Switzerland are; and much more able to defend the country, than any inactive standing forces can be. We may save every year great sums of money, which are now expended to maintain a standing army; and which is yet more, ran no hazard of losing our liberty by them. We may employ a greater number of officers in those detachments, than we do at present in all our forces both at home and broad; and make better conditions for them in those countries that need their assistance. Or being freed from the influences of English councils, we shall certainly look better than we have hitherto done to the terms on which we may send them into the armies either of England or Holland; and not permit them to be abused so many different ways, as to the great reproach of the nation they have been, their rank, pay, clothing, arrears, levy-money, quarters, transport ships and gratuities.

“Having thus shewn some of the great advantages this limitation will bring to the nation (which every one of you will be able to add any more) that it is not only consistent with monarchy, but even with an absolute monarchy; having demonstrated the necessity of such a condition in all empires, which contain several kingdoms; and that without it we must never continue in a dependence upon the court of England; in the name of God, whatinders us from embracing so great a blessing? Is it because her majesty will refuse the royal assent to this act? If she do, sure I am, such a refusal must proceed from the advice of English counsellors; and will not that be a demonstration to us, that after her majesty and heirs of her body, we must not, cannot any longer continue under the same prince with England? Shall we be wanting to ourselves? Can her majesty give her assent to this limitation upon a successor before you offer it to her? Is she at liberty to give us satisfaction at this point, till we have declared to England by a vote of this house, that unless we obtain his condition, we will not name the same successor with them? And then will not her majesty, even by English advice, be persuaded to give her assent; unless her counsellors shall think fit to incur the heavy imputation, and run the dangerous risk of dividing these nations or ever? If therefore either reason, honour or conscience have any influence upon us; if we have any regard either to ourselves or posterity; if there be any such thing as virtue, happiness or reputation in this world, or felicity in a future state, let me adjure you by all these, not to draw upon your heads everlasting infamy, attended with the eternal reproaches and anguish of an evil conscience, by making yourselves and your posterity miserable.”

The following Speeches by Mr. Fletcher, being upon the same subject, are inserted here, though not in the order of time in which they were spoken:

“My Lord Chancellor; I am sorry to hear what has been just now spoken from the throne. I know the duty I owe to her majesty, and the respect that is due to her commissioner; and therefore shall speak with a just regard to both. But the duty I owe to my country obliges me to say, that what we have now heard from the throne, must of necessity proceed from English councils. If we had demanded that these limitations should take place during the life of her majesty, or of the heirs of her body, perhaps we might have no great reason to complain, though they should be refused. But that her majesty should prefer the prerogative of she knows not who, to the happiness of the whole people of Scotland; that she should deny her assent to such conditions of government as are not limitations upon the crown of Scotland, but only such as are absolutely necessary to relieve us from a subjection to the court of England, must proceed from English councils: as well because there is no Scots minister now at London, as because I have had an account, which I believe to be too well grounded, that a letter to this effect has been sent down hither by the lord treasurer of England, not many days ago. Besides, all men who have lately been at London, well know, that nothing has been more common, than to see Scots-men of the several parties addressing themselves to English ministers about Scots affairs; and even to some ladies of that court, whom for the respect I bear to their relations I shall not name. Now, whether we shall continue under the influence and subjection of the English court; or whether it be not high time to lay before her majesty, by a vote of this house, the conditions of government upon which we will receive a successor, I leave to the wisdom of the parliament. This I must say, that to tell us any thing of her majesty's intentions in this affair, before we have presented any act to that purpose for the royal assent, is to prejudice the cause, and altogether unparliamentary. I will add, that nothing has ever shewn the power and force of English councils upon our affairs in a more eminent manner at any time, since the Union of the crowns. No man in this house is more convinced of the great advantage of that peace which both nations enjoy by living under one prince. But as on the one hand, some men for private ends, and in order to get into offices, have either neglected or betrayed the interest of this nation, by a mean compliance with the English court; so on the other side it cannot be denied, that we have been but indifferently used by the English nation. I shall not insist upon the affair of Darien, in which, by their means and influence chiefly, we suffered so great a loss both in men and money, as to put us almost beyond hope of ever having any considerable trade; and this contrary to their own true interest, which now appears but too visibly. I shall not go about to enumerate instances of a provoking nature in other matters, but keep myself precisely to the thing we are upon. The English nation did, some time past, take into consideration the nomination of a successor to that crown; an affair of the highest importance, and one would think of common concernment to both kingdoms. Did they ever require our concurrence? Did they ever desire the late king to cause the parliament of Scotland to meet, in order to take our advice and consent? Was not this to tell us plainly, that we ought to be concluded by their determinations, and were not worthy to be consulted in the matter? Indeed, my Lord Chancellor, considering their whole carriage in this affair, and the broad insinuations we have now heard, that we are not to expect her majesty's assent to any limitations on a successor (which must proceed from English counsel) and considering we cannot propose to ourselves any other relief from that servitude we lie under by the influence of that court; it is my opinion, that the house come to a resolution, 'That after the decease of her majesty, heirs of her body failing, we will separate our crown from that of England.'

"My Lord Chancellor; That there should be limitations on a successor, in order to take away our dependance on the court of England, if both nations should have the same king, no man here seems to oppose. And I think very few will be of opinion that such limitations should be deferred till the meeting of the nation's representatives, upon the decease of her majesty. For if the successor be not named before that time, every one will be so earnest to promote the pretensions of the person he most affects, that new conditions will be altogether forgotten. So that those who are only in appearance for these limitations, and in reality against them, endeavour for their last refuge to mislead well-meaning men, by telling them, that it is not advisable to put them into the Act of Security, as well for fear of losing all, as because they will be more conveniently plac'd in a separate act. My Lord Chancellor, I would fain know if any thing can be more proper in an act which appoints the naming and manner of admitting a successor, than the conditions on which we agree to receive him. I would know, if the deferring of any thing, at a time when naturally it should take place, be not to put a slur upon it, and an endeavour to defeat it. And if the limitations in question are pretended to be such a burthen in the act, as to hazard the loss of the whole, can we expect to obtain them when separated from the act? Is there any common sense in this? Let us not deceive ourselves, and imagine that the act of 1696, does not expire immediately after the queen and heirs of her body; for in all that act, the heirs and successors of his late majesty king William are always restrained and specified by these express words, according to the declaration of the estates, dated the 11th of April 1689. So that unless we make a due provision by some new law, a dissolution of the government will ensue immediately upon the death of her majesty, failing heirs of her body. Such an act therefore being of absolute and indispensable necessity, I am of opinion, that the limitations ought to be inserted therein as the only proper place for them and surest way to obtain them: and that whoever would separate them does not so much desire we should obtain the act, as that we should lose the limitations."

"My Lord Chancellor; When our kings succeeded to the crown of England, the ministers of that nation took a short way to ruin us by concurring with their inclinations to extend the prerogative in Scotland; and the great places and pensions conferred upon Scotsmen by that court, made them to be willing instruments in the work. From that time this nation began to give away their privileges one after the other, though they then stood more in need of having them enlarged. And as the collections of our laws, before the union of the crowns, are full of acts to secure our liberty, those laws that have been made since that time, are directed chiefly to extend the prerogative. And that we might not know what rights and liberties were still ours, nor be excited by the memory of what our ancestors enjoyed, to recover that we had lost, in the two last editions of our acts of parliament the most considerable laws for the liberty of the subject are industriously and designedly left out. All our affairs since the union of the crowns have been managed by the advice of English ministers, and the principal offices of the kingdom filled with such men, that the court of England knew would be subservient to their designs: by which means they have had so visible an influence upon our whole administration, that we have from that time appeared to the rest of the world more like a conquered province, than a free independent people. The account is very short: whilst our princes are not absolute in England, they must be influenced by that nation: our ministers must follow the directions of the prince, or lose their places, and our places and pensions will be distributed according to the inclinations of a king of England, so long as a king of England has the disposal of them: neither shall any man obtain the least advancement, who refuses to vote in council and parliament under that influence. So that there is no way to free this country from a ruinous dependance upon the English court, unless by placing the power of conferring offices and pensions in the parliament, so long as we shall have the same king with England. The ancient kings of Scotland, and even those of France, had not the power of conferring the chief offices of state, though each of them had only one kingdom to govern, and that the difficulty we labour under, of two kingdoms which have different interests governed by the same king, did not occur. Besides, we all know that the disposal of our places and pensions is so considerable a thing to a king of England, that several of our princes, since the union of the crowns, have wished to be free from the trouble of deciding between the many pretenders. That which would have given them ease, will give us liberty, and make us significant to the common interest of both nations. Without this, it is impossible to free us from a dependance on the English court; all other remedies and conditions of government will prove ineffectual, as plainly appears from the nature of the thing; for who is not sensible of the influence of places and pensions upon all men and all affairs? If our ministers continue to be appointed by the English court, and nation may not be permitted to dispose of offices and places of this kingdom to base the English bribery, they will corrupt y thing to that degree, that if any of our stand in their way they will get them red. Let no man say, that it cannot be ed that the English court has ever bestow ny bribe in this country. For they bestow offices and pensions; they bribe us, and are ters of us at our own cost. It is nothing an English interest in this house, that those wish well to our country, have to struggle at this time. We may, if we please, dream their remedies; but so long as Scots-men go to the English court to obtain offices rust or profit in this kingdom, those offices always be managed with regard to the rt and interest of England, though to the ay of the interest of this nation, when it comes in competition with that of Eng- l. And what less can be expected, unless resolve to expect miracles, and that greedy, bitious, and for the most part necessitous ), involved in great debts, burthened with at families, and having great titles to sup- t, will lay down their places, rather than ply with an English interest in obedience he prince's commands? Now to find Scots- n opposing this, and willing that English isters (for this is the case ) should have the posal of places and pensions in Scotland, her than their own parliament, is matter of at astonishment; but that it should be so ch as a question in the parliament, is al- ther incomprehensible; and if an indifferent son were to judge, he would certainly say were an English parliament. Every man ows that princes give places and pensions by influence of those who advise them. So t the question comes to no more than, whe- r this nation would be in a better condition, n conferring our places and pensions the nce should be determined by the parliament Scotland, or by the ministers of a court, that ke it their interest to keep us low and miser- ble. We all know that this is the cause of r poverty, misery and dependence. But : have been for a long time so poor, so miser- ble and depending, that we have neither art nor courage, though we want not the eans, to free ourselves."

r. Fletcher of Saltoun, made the following eeches upon this subject:

"My Lord Chancellor;—This is an act for pealing a law made in the year 1700, which ohibits the importation of French wines. e were then in peace with France, and are ow in a declared war against them. The rohibition was made in time of peace, be- ase the French laid greater impositions upon ur trade than they did upon other nations: nd yet 'tis desired, that French wines may be orted in time of war; though not only the ame, but new burdens are laid upon our mer- chandize in France. 'Tis pretended that we shall not trade to France directly, but may buy French wines from certain nations, who trade to that country with our goods. I will allow all this, though it be false; but where is the necessity we should take French wines from those nations for our commodities? Have they not copper, iron, pitch, tar, hemp, flax, and timber for building of ships and other uses, which we need? or if our consumption of these things will not answer the value of those goods they take of us, may we not export the over- plus to other parts? Since therefore the same, or greater impositions continue still upon our merchandize in France, so as we cannot get of those neutral nations so high a price for our goods, as if the impositions in France were taken off, the reason of the law made in 1700 still remains. And if we had sufficient cause to prohibit the importation of French wines by our own ships in time of peace, shall we purchase French wines from other nations in time of war? The French would not receive our goods in time of peace, upon equal terms with those of other nations, which obliged us to forbid their wines: shall we now take them at a double value in time of war? or are we become greater friends to France now in a time of open war, than we were before in time of peace? Something might be said, if no wines were to be found in Portugal or Italy. But it seems no wine will please us, but that of a country, against which we are in actual war, and which uses us ill both in peace and war. One would have thought that the past services of a nation, which has more than once saved that base people from ruin, might have obliged them to a more favourable usage of us. But the world will say, we are yet a baser people than they, if whilst they continue to suppress our trade, we repeal a law, for which we have now more and better reasons than when we made it. To repeal such a law in time of war, will sound admirably well in England and Holland: since it is no less than a direct breach of our alliance with those nations; a formal renunciation of any advantages we may pretend in a treaty of peace, and exactly calculated to inform the world of the inclinations of our ministers. If we would trade to Portugal and Italy, we should have the benefit of the English and Dutch convoys. We might trade in our own ships, not in Swedes, Danes, and Hamburgers, to the ruin of our navigation. For if they drive our trade for us, we may indeed burn our ships and plow our towns, as has been told us. And therefore I move that this act, as prejudicial to our trade and navigation, and highly injurious to the honour of the nation, may be thrown out."

"My Lord Chancellor;—One would think that of all men lawgivers should be of the most undoubted probity, and that selfish ends and disingenuity should have no place in their assemblies. For if those who give laws to other men, have not the good of the nations they govern in view, but are ready to sacrifice every thing to their own private interest, such a scandalous conduct must be of the last consequence to a government, by alienating the affections of the people from those who shall be found guilty of such practices. My Lord, no man in this house can be ignorant, that this act will not only open a trade and correspondence with France, contrary to the declaration of war, and our own standing laws; but that the design of those who promote the passing of this act is to have a trade directly with France. It is known that Scots ships are already loading wines at Bourdeaux for this kingdom; and that a French factor is already arrived in this city. Besides, it is notorious, that a ship belonging to this port, and freighted with wines from France, is now lying in Queensferry-road, not eight miles from this place. She pretends indeed to be a Dane, because she came last from Norway; whither she was sent for no other reason than that she came too soon upon this coast. This ship has an officer and divers seamen on board, sent from one of our frigates for her guard, who have absolutely refused to permit the persons that were impowered by the admiralty to examine her, unless they should produce an order from the captain of the frigate, or from your lordship. And as if our act for the prohibition of French wines were already repealed, and our collectors, no less than our former kings, might dispense with the laws; another ship laden with the wines of that country has been brought into the Clyde, and her lading into the city of Glasgow, during this session, in contempt of the law and the authority of the parliament. All this, and much more of the same kind, is well known to those who are in the administration, and seem not to think it their business to take notice of such practices. But I hope this house will not overlook these gross mismanagements; and since the executive part of the government is arrived to that state, that hardly any law is put in execution, the parliament, according to the many precedents we have in our acts, will give order for a better administration in time to come, and take effectual care that those who are placed in the highest trusts, shall see the laws duly executed; especially your lordship, who during the intervals of parliament, as the principal person in the government, ought to be answerable to the nation for their due execution. Now the great argument which is used for allowing the importation of French wines is, that we shall certainly have the wines of that country, though very bad and very dear, if the prohibition be continued. Which is only to say, we have no government among us. Two good laws were made in the year 1700. One against the exportation of our wool, the other against the importation of French wines; the first to give a being to a woollen manufacture in this kingdom, the latter to vindicate our trade against the impositions of France. We have already rendered the one ineffectual, to the ruin of our woollen manufacture; Shall we now repeal the other?

Shall we send them our wool, and buy their wines, and oblige them doubly for burdening and oppressing us in our trade? It is pretended that the customs arising from the importation of French wines must serve to pay the civil list, because the former duties are fallen one half of the usual value. A very cogent argument indeed! when we know that the customs have been taken from the farmers, only in order to bestow the collectors places upon parliament-men. Shall we make good such funds as are exhausted, by bribing men to betray our liberty? If any justice were to be found in this nation, the advisers of these things had long since been brought to a scaffold. But as there is no crime under heaven more enormous, more treacherous, and more destructive to the very nature of our government, than that of bribing parliaments; so there is nothing more common and barefaced: and I think this session should have been opened by purging the house from such corrupted members; which if we had done, we had not met with so many difficulties and obstructions of the public service. But I hope we shall not be so remiss in the future. And for the present, my lord chancellor, I move, That this act for taking off the prohibition of French wines, as a design of the blackest nature, hurtful and ignominious to the nation, and highly reflecting on our ministers and administration, may be thrown out.

"My Lord Chancellor; I am not surprised to find an Act for a Supply brought into this house at the beginning of a session. I know custom has for a long time made it common. But I think experience might teach us, that such acts should be the last of every session, or lie upon the table, till all other great affairs of the nation be finished, and then only granted. It is a strange proposition which is usually made in this house; that if we will give money to the crown, then the crown will give us good laws: as if we were to buy good laws of the crown, and pay money to our princes that they may do their duty, and comply with their coronation oath. And yet this is not the worst; for we have often had promises of good laws, and when we have given the sums demanded, those promises have been broken, and the nation left to seek a remedy; which is not to be found, unless we obtain the laws we want, before we give a Supply. And if this be a sufficient reason at all times to postpone a money-act, can we be blamed for doing so at this time, when the duty we owe our country, indispensably obliges us to provide for the common safety in case of an event, altogether out of our power, and which must necessarily dissolve the government, unless we continue and secure it by new laws; I mean the death of her majesty, which God in his mercy has avert? I move therefore, that the house would take into consideration what acts are necessary to secure our religion, liberty, and trade.

use of the said event, before any Act of Pity, or other business whatever be brought to deliberation."

Mr. Fletcher's Speech, upon the State of the Nation.] To the preceding Speeches of Mr. Fletcher we shall add the following, which was made by him in April, 1701.

Gentlemen; It seems at first view hard to enquire, whether you would be more obliged to one who should persuade you of the miserable and irretrievable condition, into which you precipitating yourselves, and the rest of Europe; or to him, who after you are concerned, should shew you how to escape. But it is a much more difficult work to convince you of the true state of your affairs; so it seems you have this advantage, that when you know you are in danger, the frightful and terrible circumstances of your present condition will certainly make you improve every opportunity, and lay hold upon every thing that may in the least contribute to save you: and this will be the more easy for you to do, since such means are now in your power, as could hardly be expected on the like occasion; and which, if you neglect, you have resolved your own ruin. You are formerly convinced, that the French king is a dangerous neighbour, powerful and vigilant; that there was no end of his designs, no relying on his treaties; that he could corrupt not only those who under your princes had the management of public affairs, but even your princes themselves. The least increase of his power at sea, every inconsiderable fort taken from him in Flanders, alarmed you in the highest degree. You were jealous of his secret treaties with your princes, and so industrious, that you discovered one in which the abolition of parliaments, and suppression of your liberties were expressly stipulated; provided England would remain his ally, and not oppose the designs he had formed against the house of Austria, and the rest of Europe. You were then alarmed that no more was taken of the Protestant religion abroad, and began from thence, and the duplicities of your princes, to suspect them of declining to a religion that allows men to live in sin, and consecrates the arbitrary power of kings. At present, as if there were not the least ground to suspect any of these things, you are very ready to concur with the designs of France, and the court in every thing. France is too powerful to be opposed; you are too poor, and too much in debt to make war. Yet France has seized the whole Spanish monarchy; and, if suffered to enjoy it quietly, he who formerly was able to oppose, may hereafter trample on the rest of mankind. It is no longer Conde, Linck, and the sluices of Newport he pretends; his troops fill Brussels, Antwerp, and the Spanish Gelderland. Ostend and Newport are by our good conduct added to Dunkirk, in order to receive his royal fleets, and harbour his pirates, who are to enrich themselves with the ruin of our trade. In this state of things you are for preserving the peace of Europe; which would be yet much better secured by your slavery. When king Charles 2 went to Dover, and the French king came to Calais, gallantry and diversion seemed to be the only business of the two courts. It was not then and in those places publicly known that there was a secret treaty, yet you not only suspected one, but the design and intention of it also; and your suspicions were found to be well grounded. Now though two great armies have been witnesses that the Mareschal de Boufflers and earl of Portland were for several days employed in making a treaty, and sure it was a secret one, since none of you yet know what it was, you have not to this day taken the least notice of it. But can any man suspect the minister of a prince, who is said to have rejected a crown, and that of no contemptible country, by refusing to join in that very treaty of Dover? Can he, that in a private condition resisted the arts of France, be supposed, now he is master of three kingdoms, and of a powerful state, to risk them all at once, and yield to those arts he before despised? To this, whatever other answer I could give, I shall only say at present that we have always but too just ground to suspect all secret and close negotiations with France. But it seems you thought it not worth your inquiry, whether these negotiations were for your advantage or ruin. You will say, what ground was there of suspicion? for nothing appeared. I say, that of all others was the greatest. But who was it, that first was commissioned, and after as ambassador, was employed to treat? Was he an Englishman? And how were the plenipotentiaries of this nation used at the formal treaty? Were they not as pageants brought in to attend the show? Or as so many cyphers, that without the Dutchmen, who made the figure, could signify nothing? Yet this advantage we had, that the king having not been owned till the conclusion of the treaty, the abandoning of the Protestant religion at Reswick cannot with any colour of justice be imputed to English ministers; but only to the plenipotentiaries of Holland; and you could not by any means conceive or entertain the least suspicion of indirect dealing in the private treaty, when you saw yourselves and your religion so fairly dealt with in that which was public. Yet methinks, the abandoning of our ancient allies, and entering into the closest and most entire correspondence with France that has ever been seen between the two courts, ought to have moved you a little, and made you doubtful that a bargain was struck, unless you can think France incapable of entering into any that may be to your disadvantage. Here indeed I know not what to say for you: and the best account I can give of your careless indifference, must be set before you your present condition; which yet I fear will both offend and terrify you; I wish it may not throw you into despair. But such distempers are only to be cured by violent remedies: and I had rather venture your displeasure in doing my duty, than obtain the friendship of your enemies by omitting it. It is then thus. The English nation have now nothing remaining but the outward appearance and carcass, as I may call it, of their ancient constitution. The spirit and soul is fled. Jealousy for public liberty is vanished. The court has so often renewed the same arts, methods and councils, and so often made trial of the several parties in the kingdom, as well as of the alliance of France, in order to compass their ends, that the nation begins to grow weary of opposing the same things, and very wisely thinks there can be no danger of such attempts as have so often failed. Besides, you are grown weary of that old and antiquated care and concernment for the public: or at least have given it a new and better turn. Some of you improving your morals, which are so necessary for the preservation of liberty, in constant gaming, as others do their politics and skill in military matters by laying wagers. And even stock-jobbing makes you deeply concerned for the public affairs. Long sessions of parliament furnish great opportunities of knowing the interests of the several parties; by which you must needs know that of the nation, since the nation is made up of parties. And the court, by frequent shifting from one party to another, has forced you to double your attendance upon them. So that as well those who are at this time to go off the guard, as those who are coming on, being equally willing, the one to continue, and the other to enter upon duty, the court craftily keeps both parties under arms, whilst the country has nothing to trust to, but a weak, unpaid and disorderly militia party. And now I think I have sufficiently shewn the causes of your present indifference; since having so much business at home, you can hardly attend to what is doing abroad. Yet one would think that a certain affair transacted abroad, in which your ministers are said to have had no small part, and which has made so great a noise in the world, might deserve a little consideration, and oblige you to make some reflection upon the motives of that undertaking. Especially since it is of so extraordinary a nature, as to be the first of the kind, and like to prove of such consequence, as may involve the world in troubles and calamities, which perhaps may be of equal duration with its frame. And though, as a prodigious comet, it has alarmed the rest of the world, you did not see it 'till of late, and it is already vanished by the shutting of your eyes. As to what it may portend, you think it as foolish to enquire, as wise men do to attend the dreams of astrologers. In this I wish I could defend you; but that being utterly impossible, there remains nothing to be done, except only charitably to undeceive you, and shew, if you had time to spare from your great application to maintain the interests of your several parties, what consequences you must necessarily draw from things you all know and acknowledge. By this time you see it is the Partition-Treaty I mean. I say then that from the first appearance of that treaty, it was not only evident, but foreseen by thousands even of the most ordinary capacity, that it would unavoidably throw the whole Spanish monarchy into the house of Bourbon. If some men of more penetration did happen so far to refine, as to put any other construction upon the treaty, it only proceeded from a charitable opinion they had taken up, that the design could not be so black, as it has since appeared by the conduct of most of the partitioners, ever since the death of the king of Spain: which has demonstrated to the world with what intention it was made. The story of this treaty tells us of preserving the peace of Europe by dismembering the Spanish monarchy; but the spirit throws it intire into the family of Bourbon, intails an endless war upon Christendom, breaks the balance, which has preserved its liberty for two hundred years, and will consequently banish all remains of freedom both civil and religious from among men. Its treaty like an alarm-bell rung over all Europe. Pray God it may not prove to you a past-catch. Poor helpless Spain, rather than drive the child, chose to give it intire to the father to whom it did not belong. And she has got it; for the Solomon who commanded to drive the child, did it not in order to do justice. Instead of the preservation of the peace of Europe, for no great mischief was ever desired but piety was still pretended, Europe must from this time be either in a posture of war, and consumed by taxes; or in actual war, waste by bloodshed and rapine, 'till she be forced to hold out her hands to the shackles, and submit to a worse condition. These are the glorious works of such governors as the world think they cannot be without; perhaps too truly I mean those who are to execute God's judgments upon them. It is evident a treaty was made which if it had taken effect even in the plain meaning of the words, had broken the balance of Europe, and destroyed your trade in the Mediterranean, under the plausible pretence of avoiding a greater evil, into which it was contrived to throw you. Yet after all, you are positively resolved to rely upon the faith of those who contrived and concerted this, and obstinately bent to continue in peace, when the rest of Europe are to make the last push for their liberty. As those who are marked out for ruin are first bereft of understanding; so you who see nothing but sham upon sham played upon you, seem to be altogether incapable of making the least reflection to what end they are designed.

“You plainly see that those who have the direction of your affairs, have broken the balance of Europe, and delivered a great part of the world into the hands of France. Yet to this hour it cannot enter into your heads that this was done for any end, nor can you allow it the least reflection. It is true, wise men love not to determine suddenly: you take yet a sure way not to mistake in your determination, which is, not to think. It is commonly said, that in this world nothing is to be had for

ing: but you make no doubt, that almost one half of the world may be given for nothing. The proverb I own is meant of money, and of private persons: but you are of opinion, that riches may be more disinterested, and less so; or at least, that it is not much your business to enquire whether it be so or not. Besides, there is nothing to direct you in an enquiry touching this whole affair, there being no manner of resemblance between this treaty and that of Dover. For though the French king as a party concerned in both; yet he is now grown old, and would willingly, if you permit, pass the rest of his days in peace, and only apply himself to redress the disorders, and restore the vigour of the Spanish monarchy. The condition of the Dutch is much altered since the Dover treaty; for then they were partitioned, but now they are risen to the quality of parliamenters. And we are in absolute security that nothing can be stipulated to our prejudice, unless he who then gloriously refusing a crown, took the measures of king Charles and of France, now treats for us, and remains still as generously disinterested as ever, no advantage appearing to accrue by the treaty either to him or his. So that the Dover treaty affording no light at all in this affair, it still remains an impenetrable mystery, why France is allowed so many rich provinces in possession, and so many reversions. For if the duke of Anjou be any more than a viceroy, it is in the power of his grandfather to make him less, and dispose of him and his dominions at pleasure. But I have heard the secret. You will say, pray what is it? What you might have found out as well as I, if you had any goodness in you. It was the pious design of preserving the peace of Europe, on which you see the whole treaty is founded. You will answer; all the world knows this as well as you. Ay; but you do not sufficiently reflect upon the eminent degree of that piety so clearly demonstrated in a perfect resignation of all that the world calls honour and security, in order to continue the peace and quiet of the poor people of Europe. This was the thing that made us first sacrifice the balance of Christendom, together with a considerable part of our trade. After which, when, by the perfidiousness of our new allies, this treaty, that had cost us such a sacrifice to obtain, was impudently broken to the ruin of the balance, and putting ourselves and ancient allies into the most imminent dangers, we took so high an affront, so irreparable an injury with such an absolute resignation, and exemplary patience, as neither by word or deed to shew the least mark of resentment. But like true Christians, that we might do good to those who used us despitefully, and by ways of meekness and condescension, bring them back to a sense of what they owe to us, we delayed the calling of the great council of the nation, till they had sent the new king to his kingdom, and put themselves into a posture of seizing Milan and Flanders, which they have since effected. And now we are so moderate, to ask only a most inconsiderable or rather ridiculous security: perhaps because the French king is now become more solvent. Truly, if we design not to enter into a war we need not be nice upon any security; for all securities are alike, if France be permitted to increase in power. As to the security of a fleet, I say, that a people, who are resolved to have peace with their neighbours, at a time when it is highly the interest of their neighbours to keep peace with them, stand not in need of a fleet, unless it be to make a war of taxes upon themselves. And if the enemy contrary to his present interest, should unite his whole sea-force to attack us, such a fleet as we are now setting out, is exactly calculated to receive damage and affront. But peace, cautionary towns, and moderate fleets will secure our trade, till we have freed ourselves from debt, and are grown so rich, that we can make war when we please. That is, after our enemies shall have disabled all those that we may now have for our allies, and be at leisure to deal with us alone. The honour indeed will be great to be single in this attack, against a power that has baffled the rest of the world: but I fear the danger will be no less; for they always go hand in hand. You'll ask perhaps, what one would have the nation do? Both houses have damned the treaty; and some considerable men may possibly be punished for it. I know there is yet more done; for by excusing the late chancellor, the blame is thrown upon the king; since in all free governments, somebody must be answerable for whatever is done with relation to the public. But hitherto nothing has been so much as thought of to retrieve us from that ruin, into which the treaty throws us. This is that, which one might justly expect from the nation; and not that they should content themselves with railing at the treaty, whilst they are allowing and concurring in the execution of the real and pernicious design of it. Some will say; let the emperor and the Dutch be principals in this war; we who formerly were at the greatest expense in opposing France, will now be accessaries, and come in when we think fit. It would seem by this reasoning, that the power of France is diminished, and that you can overtake the growth of it when you please. Who told you that the Dutch, if they find themselves abandoned by you now, will not for the sake of their trade resolve to have peace at any rate? If the emperor be abandoned by both, is not the business at an end? What business? All opposition, by which the French may be hindered from bringing the affairs of Spain into order, and uniting those vast dominions to their empire. And this naturally leads me again to consider what return may be expected for the contrivance and execution of a treaty so infinitely advantageous to France. For whatever I have said before of a certain pious design; I fear I shall hardly persuade this wicked age of it. And though the Heathens thought virtue a sufficient reward for itself; yet the christian religion with more truth and solidity has accompanied it with other advantages. If then the dominions accruing to France by this treaty, may justly be accounted the greatest that ever were procured for any nation, the returns ought certainly to be the greatest that can be made; or such as the benefactor puts the highest value upon. You'll say, 'tis hard to judge of them; and that if I would insinuate any thing by the mention I made of the Dover treaty, the insinuation is ridiculous in a weakly man, without any probability of issue. I answer, if there should be such a tendency, I hope you do not take it for a virtuous inclination, and consequently ought to judge of it by the temper of the person, and the unreasonableness of every vicious disorder of the mind. No well-natured, generous, unthinking people, can ever penetrate the thoughts of a designing man. Does not an old miser, even though he want issue, increase in covetousness to the last hour of his life? Is ambition a less passion than avarice? Is not the conquest of free men more noble than that of slaves? Did ever any hero refuse to die in a great battle in which kingdoms and powerful states were to fall with him, and serve for trophies to his hearse? But I will shew you the thing in another view, which perhaps will suit better with your temper and disposition. You all say, every prince would be absolute; and this inclination you think so agreeable to the nature of man, that no one can be without it. And indeed it would be strange you should trust them with so much power, under the greatest temptations of employing it that way, if you thought it a great crime to do so. Besides, 'tis not their interest to use arbitrary power cruelly. And you do not know what condition a prince, who in order to good designs should obtain it, might at his death leave you: perhaps in greater liberty than you ever enjoyed. If then pursuant to these or the like thoughts his M—— should have judged that the monarchy of Spain will prove a burden to the French, and rather weaken than strengthen them; by exhausting their treasures and men in defending and re-peopling those countries: If he should have considered, that nothing can so effectually oppose the great and growing power of France, as the united and neighbouring force of England and Holland; countries abounding in people, riches, and store of shipping; provided that force were upon a right foot, as well in respect to secrecy, as the unanimity of counsel and command, flowing from an unjarring direction, not subject to the storms of a H—— of C—— or the capricious of a free people, little conversant in foreign affairs; (which you will allow to be a very natural thought in a prince.) I say, if upon these considerations, the K—— seeing the confederacy falling to pieces, and open force ineffectual, proposed to himself, in order to obtain an advantageous peace, and lay a sure foundation for the destruction of France, to blind them with the ruinous phantom of Spain, and promise to enter into any measures they should propose, in order to deliver it to them, in case they would assist him to establish himself, both here and in Holland. Was this design so criminal? Or could France do less for such a benefactor? I am afraid, I have put such a mask of innocence on this affair, that you will begin to like it. And in an age when divisions and exchanges of countries are so frequently mentioned, who knows, whether the agreement may not be, to unite the whole seventeen provinces to the crown of England, and in lieu of them to give the kingdom of Portugal to Spain, which is a country as much more convenient for Spain than Flanders, as accession of strength is more advantageous than ruin. What a glorious government would the three kingdoms and the seventeen provinces be? Might they not, when united under one wise and absolute prince (for people of such different tempers, and so emulous of each other in trade, seem necessarily to require it) bid defiance not only to France, but to the world? Might they not for ever establish in themselves the empire of the sea, with an entire monopoly of trade; especially if it should please him to crown all his obligations, by leaving them possessed of such immunities as might secure the continuation of the trade for ever? Is there, after all, such a probability of resisting the power of France? Or is it not the only way of saving both us and our religion, which is our main concern? You being men of understanding, I resolve to leave it thus with you, though you should think me a courtier. For according to the judgment you shall make of what I have said, it will appear whether it be possible to save you or not, and consequently whether it be to any purpose to give you or myself any farther trouble.

July 6, 1704. The Parliament of Scotland met at Edinburgh, and her Majesty's Commission to the right honourable the marquis of Tweedale, for representing her royal person in this session of parliament, was read by the Lord Clerk-Register, and ordered to be recorded.

The Queen's Letter to the Scottish Parliament; July 11. They met again, and her Majesty's Letter was presented by his grace the Lord High Commissioner, which follows in this manner:

“My Lords and Gentlemen; Nothing has troubled us more since our accession to the crowns of these realms, than the unsettled state of affairs in that our ancient kingdom.—We hoped, that the foundations of the differences and animosities that, to our great regret, we discovered among you, did not lie so deep, but that by the methods we have proceeded in, they might have been removed.—But, instead of success in our endeavours, the rent is become wide; nay, divisions have proceeded to such a height, as to prove matter of encouragement to our enemies beyond sea, to employ their emissaries among you, in order to debauch our good subjects from their allegiance, and to render that our antient kingdom a scene of blood and order, merely (as they speak) to make you ve for a diversion.—But we are willing to pe, that none of our subjects, but such as re obnoxious to the laws for their crimes, or n of low and desperate fortunes, or that are otherwise inconsiderable, have given ear to ch pernicious contrivances. And we have reason to doubt of the assurances given us those now entrusted with our authority, that ey will use their utmost endeavours to convince our people of the advantages and necessity of the present measures: for we have always been inclined to believe, that the late stake did not proceed from any want of duty

 d respect to us, but only from different opions as to measures of government.—This beg the case, we are resolved, for the full contentment and satisfaction of our people, [to ant whatever can in reason be demanded, for ctifying of abuses, and quieting the minds of our good subjects.—In order to this, we ve named the marquis of Tweedale our Commissioner, he being a person of whose capacity id probity, or qualifications and dispositions serve us and the country, neither we nor you n have any doubt. And we have fully empowered him, to give you unquestionable proofs our resolution to maintain the government
 th in church and state, as by law established, that our kingdom; and to consent to such ws as shall be found wanting for the further curity of both, and preventing all encroach-ents on the same for the future.—Thus, hav-g done our part, we are persuaded that you ill not fail to do yours, but will lay hold on is opportunity, to shew to the world the sin-erity of the professions made to us, and that it as the true love of your country, and the use of your duty to it, and therefore not the ant of duty to us, (for we shall always reckon these two inconsistent) that was at the bottom of the late misunderstandings.—The main thing at we recommend to you, and which we recommend to you with all the earnestness we re capable of, is the settling the succession in the Protestant line, as that which is absolutely necessary for your own peace and happiness, s well as your quiet and security in all our dominions, and for the reputation of our affairs broad; and consequently for the strengthening the Protestant interest every where.—This as been our fixed Judgment and resolution ver since we came to the crown; and though ither to opportunities have not answered our attention; matters are now come to that pass, y the undoubted evidence of the designs of our enemies, that a longer delay of settling the succession in the Protestant line, may have very dangerous consequences: and a disappointment of it would infallibly make that our kingdom the seat of war, and expose it to a devastation and ruin.—As to terms and conditions of government, with regard to the succession, we have empowered our Commissioner to give the royal assent to whatever can in reason be demanded, and is in our power to grant, for securing the sovereignty and liberties of that our ancient kingdom.—We are now in a war, which makes it necessary to provide for the defence of the kingdom, the time of the funds that were lately given for maintenance of the land-forces being expired, and the said funds exhausted, provision ought also to be made for supplying the magazines with arms and ammunition, and repairing the forts and castles, and for the charge of the frigates, that prove so useful for guarding the coasts.—We earnestly recommend to you whatever may contribute to the advancement of true piety, and the discouragement of vice and immorality; and we doubt not but you will take care to encourage trade, and to improve the product and manufactories of the nation: In all which, and every thing else that can be for the good and happiness of our people, you shall have our hearty and ready concurrence.

 We shall only add, that unanimity and moderation in all your proceedings will be of great use, for bringing to a happy issue the important affairs that we have laid before you, and will also be acceptable to us; So we bid you heartily farewell.—Given at our Court at Windsor Castle, the 25th day of June, 1704. And of our reign the third year.”

The Lord High Commissioner's Speech.] This done, her Majesty's High Commissioner made the following Speech:

“My Lords and Gentlemen; You have heard the queen's gracious Letter; her Majesty therein expresses such a concern for the good and welfare of this nation, and gives such unquestionable proofs of it, as prevents even your wishes. I do not in the least doubt, but when you duly consider the import of this letter, you will be all of the same mind with me, that it is now in our power to make ourselves and our posterity happy.—Such, indeed, are her Majesty's gracious condescensions that, in order to obtain what is for our good, we need only propose it, provided you do it, as no doubt you will, with the regard and deference that are due to so gracious a sovereign, and that in your demands you keep within just and reasonable bounds, and ask nothing but what is in her Majesty's power to grant.—If there be any thing yet wanting for the better securing our Religion, and the present church government, as now by law established: or for the suppressing of vice, and encouraging of virtue:
 if any grievances to be redressed, and new laws found necessary, as I doubt not but there will, for rectifying of abuses crept into your constitution, or administration of the government, or any part of it, whether it be in policy or justice? or for removing all encroachments upon the sovereignty, or liberties of the nation, and the securing and preserving these entire and inviolable to ourselves and our posterity;
 I am fully empowered and entrusted, not only in these matters, to give you what reasonable satisfaction you can demand; but likewise in any thing that may be proposed, for improving of learning, the advancement of trade, and encouraging manufactories: so that, in effect, nothing hath escaped her Majesty's care, that can any ways contribute to make you a flourishing and happy people, she reckoning the welfare, peace and prosperity of her subjects, the only way to her own greatness and happiness.—And yet, as if all this were too little her Majesty extends her care for you further, in recommending to you, as you have heard, the settling the succession in the protestant line; and this her Majesty recommends to you with all the earnestness she is capable of, as that which is absolutely necessary for securing to yourselves, and transmitting to your posterity, your religion and liberties, or whatever else you have or can have that is valuable. Sure her Majesty can have no concern in this, but the interest of her people, which does so evidently require the settling of the succession, and the settling of it at this time, that, I hope no true protestant, and lover of his country, will when he hath seriously thought on it, find just ground to oppose it.—Her Majesty having thus done her part, and in a manner so good and generous, and evidently disinterested, it remains that we fail not to do ours, by letting go this great opportunity, (which, if now lost, may possibly never be recovered) to deliver this nation from the inconveniences and hardships that it hath laid under ever since the union of the crowns, and which of late have grown heavier upon it.—Her Majesty hath also recommended to you the supplies that are wanting for the purposes mentioned in her letter, which I need not repeat; for sure there are none here, who are not convinced of the necessity of them, and who will not heartily concur in giving of them, notwithstanding the low circumstances the country is in at present; especially seeing her Majesty allows you to enquire into the misapplications of former funds given and appropriated by parliament, and to take such a course as may prevent the like for the future.—One thing more I have to add, and that is concerning the business of the plot, of which so great noise hath been made in our neighbour nation: her Majesty hath allowed me to acquaint you, that in due time the whole matter shall be laid before you, and that she hath given the necessary orders for having both the persons that have been examined in England, and the papers that relate to that affair, sent hither. Her Majesty doubts not but your enquiries into that plot, or any other practices of the like nature, will end in your laying down solid measures for preventing of them, or the fatal consequences of them in time to come; and as to any questions or contests that may arise upon such enquiries amongst you, her Majesty hopes, that you will manage them with all the temper and moderation that the nature of the thing will allow.—My Lords and Gentlemen, I have spoke long contrary to my way and inclination, and therefore I shall only add, in a word, as to myself, that I am very sensible of my unfitness for so great a trust; but since such is her Majesty's pleasure, I will do my best, and I shall esteem myself very happy, if I can any ways contribute to bring matters to any settlement in this nation. It is a great encouragement to me, I must own it, that the present opportunity, in a manner, enables me to give, at the same time, the greatest proof that I can ever hope to give of my duty to her Majesty, my love to my country, and my respect to parliaments, in particular to this honourable meeting."

The Lord Chancellor's Speech.] The Lord High Commissioner having done, James, earl of Seafield, Lord High Chancellor, took the word, and spoke to this effect:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; You have heard her Majesty's most gracious letter, and what his grace my Lord-Commissioner hath been pleased to add; which do fully lay before you the weighty and great reasons, for which her Majesty hath been pleased to call you together at this time; and you must all be convinced, that the chief design of her Majesty's government is to advance the happiness and welfare of her people, and to protect them in the full possession and enjoyment of their religion and civil concerns.—Her Majesty doth, with a very tender and affectionate concern, lay before you the danger of divisions and animosities; and recommends to you to employ your thoughts for promoting what is for the security and advantage of the kingdom: and you cannot but be sensible, that our divisions must encourage our enemies abroad, to form designs to disturb the peace and tranquility we now enjoy; and therefore ye will, no doubt, make use of this opportunity to convince all, that this nation is fixed and firm in their loyalty to her Majesty, and that all her good subjects will constantly support her government.—Her Majesty doth, with great earnestness, recommend the settling of the succession to the crown in the protestant line, as what would be the surest foundation for the security of your religion and liberties, and will contribute greatly to the advancement of the protestant interest every where; and this being of so great consequence, it is not to be doubted, but that you will think this the fit opportunity for taking it under your consideration, while we have the advantage of being convened in peace under her Majesty's protection, and can deliberately consider what is the most profitable means for the future, to secure and preserve all that is valuable to us: and, for your farther encouragement, you have heard how her Majesty hath given full instructions to her Commissioners, to grant such conditions of government, with regard to the successor, as can reasonably be demanded, for securing of the sovereignty and liberties of this kingdom: so that nothing is wanting on her Majesty's part, that is necessary for the establishment and security of the nation.—You know that her Majesty is engaged in a most just and necessary war, for the defence of the liberties of Europe, which makes it necessary that supplies be given for maintaining the forces, for repairing the forts and prisons, for providing the magazines with arms and ammunition, and for maintaining the gates, which have proved so useful for the arding of your trade: all these being so ainly needful, it is not to be doubted, but that a will readily comply therewith. It is to be gretted, that the nation is in so low a condim; but what we give is necessary for our defence, and will circulate within the kingdom; and her Majesty doth freely allow taking inspection of the funds that have been ven by parliament, and appropriated for the ublic use, and will take care, that what shall now given shall be duly applied.—Her Majesty hath given frequent assurances of her resolution to maintain the established government the church, and hath recommended to you to ll upon effectual means for discouraging of ce and immorality, and for encouraging true ty and religion, and providing for, and empying of the poor. The trade of the kingdom th also deserve your serious consideration; r the advancement of which, and improve- ment of the product and manufactories of the kingdom, her Majesty gives you assurance of r ready concurrence.—My Lord Commis- sioner has acquainted you, that the Plot, which is made so great a noise here, and in our ighbour nation, shall be laid before you, ith all its evidences: and it is not to be oubted, but that you will take care to do herein what is necessary for the discouraging bad practices, which may tend to disturb the ace and quiet of this kingdom; and in all our proceedings in this matter, that you will void animosities, and make it your principal ure to provide for the public security and ace.—My Lords and Gentlemen; I shall include with recommending to you again, e serious consideration of what her Majesty is so earnestly recommended; and that ye ill improve this opportunity, which God hath even you for securing to yourselves, and trans- mitting to your posterity your religion and li- erties, which will certainly be for your honour nd happiness, and will render you equally ceptable to her Majesty and to all her sub- jects.”

The Earl of Cromarty's Speech.] Lastly, George, earl of Cromarty, Lord Secretary, spoke to this purpose:

“My Lord Chancellor; Albeit this sent herein it has pleased her Majesty to place me, does allow, or rather oblige me to say some- thing on this occasion, yet my Lord High Com- missioner, and my Lord Chancellor have said so fully, and so well, as I fear what I can say will prove a diminutive adjection: But I shall speak little, and, if I can remember, I shall not repeat. My lord, should all her servants be silent, the actions, the sayings, the whole tract of her Majesty's government, and the happy effects thereof do speak loudly, that if ever prince or sovereign have devoted themselves to God and their country, without flattery or hy- perbole, we may truly say, that our most grarious queen hath: All may hear, and those who have the honour to attend her Majesty may see, that her time, her care, her pleasure, her leisure, her treasure, yes, her very health and life, are sacrificed every day, and almost every time of the day, to actual exercise of devotion to God, or administration of govern- ment to her people; and we may bless God, that by his blessing on her endeavours, all and every one of her subjects do participate of the fruits of the royal sacrifice: Nay, and all the best part of Europe beside, that is her Majes- ty's confederates; and her and their enemies do find with grief what we feel with satisfaction: And though her Majesty has many dominions under her royal care, and more confederates, yet she omits not any of our particular concerns, and we partake in our full capacity of those happy effects. We are, with many others, en- gaged in a great, but, to full conviction, neces- sary war, the effects whereof are dreadful and hurtful, not only in expence and soldiers, (which all must afford:) But, as to seeing our people slaughtered like beasts in our streets and houses, to see our towns in fire, our women ravished, our sacred things profaned, and many other dismal effects of war and rapine, (which almost all others feel and see:) We (thanks to God, and under him to his vicegerent our queen) do only hear of these things: My Lord Chancellor, this we ought, and, I doubt not, we do remem- ber and consider. My lord, this is not offered as an eulogy or panegyric on her Majesty; she is far above what I can say, but it is an ante- cedent to the following subsumption.—And as this of her care of us, and zeal for us, is evi- dent, so it is no less true, that the queen sits higher than we do, or ought to do, on this throne, as she does also on the throne of her other dominions. And farther, we know, that she is one of the heads, and highly situate in all the great confederacy, whereof her Majesty is, if not the chief, yet a principal: and from this both reason and discretion oblige us to conclude, that she must see very much farther, and more clearly into the actions, designs, and practices of her and our enemies, in the con- cerns, and in what directs and moves our allies, than it is possible for us to do, who both stand lower, and are bounded in our narrower spheres: Therefore, as in all matters, so espe- cially in points of fact, we are bound to rely on her information and her judgment more than our own, since what we can but conjecture, is obvious to her certain knowledge; and if we should fall (as I confidently hope we will not) into the indiscretion, to oppose our conjectures to her knowledge, that could not miss of dire effects, and rendily most mischievous to our- selves.—Her Majesty's royal letter, my Lord Commissioner his grace, and my Lord Chan- cellor have plainly laid before us matters of great importance: Her Majesty is very express in what she purposes; her reason and antece- dent is as plain and express as the conclusion. I hope the two motives I give for believing, and consequently for obeying her Majesty, are also tainly, and by the infallible rule of contrariety, a division of Britain is its greatest evil: And then, it is a necessary corollary, whoever is set for the union of Britain, may be concluded an enemy to it.*"

Proceedings respecting the Succession.] July 13. Pursuant to the scheme of a treaty between the succession was fixed, the duke of Hamilton presented a resolve, that this parliament would not proceed to name a successor to the crown, until the Scots had a previous treaty with England, in relation to commerce and other concerns. The courtiers, not expecting the cavaliers would have begun so early to oppose the succession, were not a little surprised and perplexed at this resolve, and all they could do for the present was to procure a vote, that it should lie on the table till the next meeting four days after. The duke of Hamilton being then moved the resuming of the consideration of his resolve, it occasioned a warm debate, in which Fletcher of Salton, in a particular manner represented the hardships and miseries which the Scots had suffered since the union of the two crowns under one sovereign, and the impossibility of bettering their condition, unless they took care to prevent any design that tended to continue the same. Upon this, the earl of Rothes presented another resolve, That this parliament would immediately proceed to make such limitations and conditions of government as might be judged proper for rectifying the constitution, and to vindicate and secure the sovereignty and independency of the nation; and then the parliament would take into consideration the other resolve offered by the duke of Hamilton for a treaty, previous to the nomination of a successor to the crown. This occasioned a new debate, wherein the court party earnestly urged the settling the succession, before the house proceeded to any other business; and, on the other hand, the cavaliers made very sharp reflections on the proceedings of the parliament of England, with relation to the plot, which had great influence on many members wholly unacquainted with that affair. However, the court-party, thinking they were strong enough to give the earl of Rothes's motion the preference to the duke of Hamilton's resolve, insisted plain and concluding.—My Lord Chancellor, the honour of being her Majesty's secretary obliges me to obviate and remove an aspersion on the queen's Majesty's candour and honour, if any such insinuation be made, which is, that some would persuade others to believe, that the queen has a secret will in the affair now before us, contrary to her express will revealed and declared by her in her royal letter. My lord, I am persuaded she does hate that position in theology, and I am certain she does so in her politics; and the reason of my certainty in this is, that her Majesty did command me, and I think her other servants, expressly to assure this house, That nothing in her service could please her better, than if they should believe and obey her in what she proposes in her letter; and nothing can displease her more than to do otherways.—My lords, both old custom and good manners oblige us to begin with her Majesty's letter, and in its method; if my zeal and duty on this subject have drawn me in to speak more than I intended, or perhaps needed, I beg the house's pardon: But since my hand is in, and that I neither use nor love to speak oft, I shall only add my earnest and humble wish for these two things; 1st. That the orders of the house may be strictly observed; for by that much time will be saved, and many inconveniencies prevented; and the not doing of this, will disgrace this great court. The 2nd is, That we may redargue one another with kindness and civility; let our force fall on the subject which we oppose, or the measure which we reject, and by no means on one another's persons. Would to God we were always unanimous; but that seldom, if ever, was in so numerous a court or council: But when we differ, will we argue the better by our being angry? No, 'impedit ira animum.' Will we convert others so well, by making them angry, as by a meek calmness in arguing? Does spite add force to reason; or does it produce that consent which we endeavour to obtain? So for our own sakes, and for the honour of our reasonings, let us urge and reply with calmness. I have oft regretted to see good reasoning lost, or at least ineffectual in great measure, by the heats in arguing: and I will say it were a pity: for the members of great courts elsewhere may, in the opinion of many, speak better language than these of this do; yet they do not speak better sense. And besides these motives to calm reasoning, this ought to determine us all against it, to wit, that neither our heat nor our self-pleasing arguments, are, what will determine any debate. The law of order, the constitutions, statutes, and necessity, give the faculty of concluding to the whole of this house: and all we can say must be submitted to what this whole house will approve, or to what the major part will agree in: And therefore, much reasoning, and all heats, will, on many accounts, be profitably forborne. I conclude with this assertion, which I think evident without discourse, that as the union of Britain is apparently its greatest politic good; so, as cer-

* "So, notwithstanding a long and idle speculation of the earl of Cromarty's, which was printed, running into a distinction among divines, between the revealed and secret will of God, shewing, that no such distinction could be applied to the queen; She had but one will, and that was revealed; yet it was still suspected, that at least her ministers had a secret will in the case. They went no further in this vote for a treaty with England; for they could not agree among themselves, who should be the Commissioners, and those who opposed the declaring the succession, were concerned for no more, when that question was once set aside: So it was postponed, as a matter about which they took no further care." Burnet.

have the question stated, Which of the two would come first under the consideration of the use? Upon which, great heats arose, and James Falconer of Phesdo spoke to this purpose. That he was very glad to see such a resolution in the house, upon account of the nation's interest and security: that he thought it the resolves under their consideration so good and necessary, that it was pity they should clash with one another; he therefore moved, that it be resolved, that this parliament will not proceed to the nomination of a successor, until there was a previous treaty with England for regulating the commerce and other affairs with that nation: and, that this parliament will proceed to make such limitations and conditions of government, as may secure the religion, liberty, and independency of this nation, before they proceed to the nomination of a successor to the crown. This joint resolve being put to the vote, it was carried by a majority of fifty-five voices. Of these, about thirty were in immediate dependence on the court, and were determined according to directions given them. However, they went no farther in this vote for a treaty with England; for they could not agree among themselves who should be the committers, and those, who opposed the declaring a succession, were concerned for no more, when that affair was laid aside. It was therefore postponed, as a matter about which they took no farther care.

Two Speeches thereon.] In the course of these debates the two following Speeches were made in relation to the settlement of the succession:

"My Lord Chancellor; We have had a long vacancy; nine months have given us a new light, and have let us into the knowledge men and things. The Act of Security was not as we staid upon very long last sessions: I think for it as much as any man; but my mind, as well as judgment, is altered, and I am now fully assured I was in the wrong. For if her Majesty could have passed it into a law, it would have done her nor us no manner of service, because it left the sessions loose during her Majesty's life time; which omission alone may undo her (whom God preserve) and us.

"We were not aware of the deep designs of the man who pretended only the good of the kingdom, a specious pretext to keep this nation free, and as a by-weight to throw in to balance upon occasion for a help to sway with those of our neighbours, who may be so wickedly and traitorously inclined, as to wish and act for the pretended prince at St. Germain, I mean for France, against the rightful and lawful title of her Majesty, and the succession of her English crown, so well established by the laws of that kingdom. I hope, my lord, the wisdom of this course will take care to disappoint the men of such malicious and dangerous designs. There have been many, and are still Achitophels; but God hath rewarded their counsels into folly: A trick will serve but for one turn amongst men of common sense.

"We ought to be very thankful to God and the queen, that things have been set before our eyes of late in a clear light; and some amongst us ought to bless both that they for their contrivances were not brought within the verge of the law, and made an example and terror to others, that none might venture on the like wicked practices against our Sovereign, and the peace of her government. These mens actions are known, and all their words are carried by the birds of the air to her Majesty's ears.

"I beg leave, my lord, to presume that there are few in this house but are well acquainted with the history of Peter Warbeck, (alias Perkin) in our king James 4 time. He was bred and nursed up with a design to dethrone Henry 7, by Margaret, Dutchess of Burgundy and Flanders, as a fit tool to satisfy her revengeful temper; and though she knew him to be only the son of a poor man at Tournay, she gave him the name and title of Duke of York, and true lineal heir of her deceased brother Edward, late king of England. She equipt him, and gave him ships, men and money, and sent him into Ireland, where a rebellion was raised, as well as in England, by him and his adherents: He failed in the expedition. The French king Charles 8, found him a fit instrument to serve a turn for him also; wherefore he entertained him as the prince of England, and he, with the Dutchess of Flanders, equipt him out a second time: But finding difficulties, at last he came here to our king James 4. The story of this Knight-errant had justly given our king and Court grounds to believe him a notorious impostor. Upon this pretended prince's address to the king for some aid, his Majesty wisely called his council, and asked their advice what to do on the subject: Buchanan informs you, 'Cum sententia rogarentur, prudentiores et quibus major erat rerum usus, rem integram reponendam censebant.'

"Here, my lords, the old wise men of experience in council were of opinion, that it was not fit for his majesty to receive or entertain this pretended prince, who they wisely believed to be a fourth, and who had given great trouble to this island, and was like to give much more.

"But when the question came to the young nobility of the council, the same author says, they were the majority, and carried it in favour of Perkins: 'At major pars, vel ob pueritiam rerum, et animorum inconstantiam, &c. fortissimum hominis commiserabantur.' The young counsellors, either for want of experience, or for want of steadiness of mind, were more easily caught. They were more in number, and had a compassion for the young stranger. They were told he was like the late king Edward, his pretended father, and the family of York, though they never had seen any of them.

"Here the cheat went on: he had the entertainment of a prince, he had a wife out of one of our noble families, he had an army raised in his favour, and led into England by our young king, and after much blood and treasure spent on this pretended prince, the cheat was discovered; he was sent away out of our country, and some time after had the reward of villainy.

"My lord, this act of inconsiderate hospitality to one who was but a cheat, gave just ground to the world abroad to call our judgment into question; and no body will read the history but will conclude, that our predecessors were extremely imposed on, and that the impostor might have caused the utter ruin of their liberties and country.

"My lord, the same game is playing now. Perhaps some have never read the history, and others have forgot it. No wonder it happened two hundred years ago; when no male issue was like to succeed king James 7, one was to be found 'visit et modis, per fas aut nefas' one at last was said to be born at St. James's, June 1688. That child died soon after, a second was put in his place, and carried to and nursed up at Richmond; but God thought fit to kill that second child also.

"Now, my lord, this pretended prince of Wales is a third child, in whose veins there is not a drop of royal blood. Here is a new Perkin come into the world 900 years after the first, who was sent to ruin England and Ireland, only to satisfy the violent malice of a revengeful woman. This second pretended prince is nursed up by Rome, France, and armies of implacable revengeful priests, who give him the title of king. For what? To the end that he may prove a more fit instrument, upon any occasion, to root out and totally destroy us and our holy religion, which they call heresy.

"Some of us, my lords, are no wiser than our predecessors in this point: we give the priests and other agents of France and Rome leave to pervert our understanding; we take such impressions as remain: young men's minds are tender and soft, and retain the first impressions long. Some of us have been in France not many years ago, and have seen this pretended prince, and commend his person and parts, his features, &c. and say he is very like the royal family; though some of us never saw one of them, except our own queen.

"Thus young men are very apt to be led out of the way. I have known some by keeping bad company did catch the French disease; modesty and shame made them conceal it till it was too late, and then it cost them their life. It is the case at present with some of us here, who have got the French inclinations, more dangerous in this nation than the disease, and will not own it till it is too late, and then it may cost them their lives, their estates, with the ruin of their posterity. Whatever young men may do, my lords, for want of better information, yet it is strange that men of riper age, pretenders to religion, to the good and interest of our country, are said to be tainted with the same inclination to have France rule over us; of which men there is a mighty jealousy: I will not believe them guilty, and at the same time I cannot answer for them; but let their works testify what they aim at.

"We all talk loud of love for our country and religion, but I presume to say, that the love of money, and self-interest, hath appeared more our study than any thing else. What bad practices hath not her Majesty by her great care found out? The countrivers may cover their designs the best way they please; but, my lord, whoever waits or inclines for the bondage and cruel oppressions we in this nation are so lately delivered from, be who they will, are and may be found guilty of crimes of a dangerous consequence, and of a transcendent nature, no less than the subversion of the government of this kingdom, and the alteration of the Protestant religion; and this not upon a bare information only; her Majesty knows their converse, and their actions speak aloud to all about them.

"Such practices are an enemy to all goodness and good men; it is from such proceedings that our assembly is corrupted, and till the fountain of mischief is purged, we cannot expect to have any clear channels: all here know what I mean.

"These crimes are various in their nature, heinous in their quality, and universal in their extent. If we examine them, my lord, theologically, as they stand in opposition to the truth of God, they will be found to be against the rules of faith, against the power of godliness, and against the means of salvation.—If you examine them morally, as they stand in opposition to the light of nature, to right reason and the principles of human society, you will then perceive pride without any moderation; such pride as that which exalts itself, &c. Malice without any provocation, malice against virtue, against innocency, against piety; injustice without any means of restitution, even such injustice as does rob the innocent of their just right and unspotted reputation.

"If these men, my lord, who set up for the pretended prince of Wales, be examined by legal rules in a civil way, as they stand in opposition to the public good, and to the laws of the land already in force; these men, I say, may be found to be traitors against her Majesty's crown, and incendiaries against the peace and safety of this kingdom; they may be found the highest, the boldest, and the most impudens offenders that ever were; betrayers of the queen and people, as well as of this country and our religion. If any one here is sensibly pinched, let him consider whether or no he is guilty; if he is, let him sin no more, lest a worse thing befall him.

"My lord, I see many here may remember, if they please, the frequent tragedies that were acted among us some twenty years ago. I am sure there are several of us, whose nearest relations were sacrificed to the despotic and arbitrary will, and to the revengeful resentments of popery and its principles; it was then that the orders to persecute, execute, to hang, draw, and quarter, and to shed the best blood in the nation, without, nay, against any law, were by a prerogative royal without reserve.

“ I see some here were banished, and forced wander in exile, and beg shelter from foreign powers, whose families were dispersed and ruined, whose estates were torn in pieces and sold to strangers, men of another communion. Can these melancholy reflections be forgot soon by ourselves, who were the martyrs? A spirit of delusion seems to cover the eyes of our understandings, till we fall a second sacrifice to the same bloody actors. I speak for against no party of men: but, my lord, it is high time for us to consider in cool blood, how to barricado ourselves against the assaults of the common enemy, France and popery; in order to which I have two things to move, which are, that we may all here obey our Saviour's new commandment, Love one another; and often repeat that excellent prayer taught us by that same blessed Saviour; by which whosoever shall be brought to forgive one another, as we desire God to forgive us. If this is done, we shall be in better circumstances to lay aside our pride, our passion, covetousness, our vain-glory, and unrelenting revenge, which alone belong to God Almighty to repay; I shall be in a condition to serve our sovereign, in obedience to her just commands, our country and people, in their necessary requests, and to settle a Protestant successor, while we are the occasion and power in our own hands: accidents may happen, and put it out of our power, ever to do it to our advantage. Wherefore I move, it may be considered and finished, before this house proceed to any other business.”

“ My Lord Chancellor; I second the noble member that spoke last, in his motion for settling the succession, before the house proceeds any other business: But I do not pretend to give any direction how the matter shall be treated; let the wisdom of this honourable house consider with mature deliberation, what can serve us from Rome and the French King, as her Majesty's royal person and crown may secure from all invasions abroad, and disturbances at home.

“ My Lord Chancellor, her Majesty deserves the returns of loyalty and duty that are in your power to make; I believe she hath given your Lord Commissioner such instructions as will prove to our advantage, if they are duly executed. Complaints have been made of late, that they are not full for settling a successor: I am morally sure, my lord, the complaint is ill-grounded, which I hope his Majesty will soon declare to this house, and satisfy all her good and loyal subjects, how much she hath the peace and advantage of this her ancient kingdom in her thoughts.

“ As hath been well observed just now, last sessions many of us were misled; I own my share in the mistake of things; we were going headlong into a labyrinth; our leaders misled us; the nation now may see its interest; in the several schemes and projects, which can never be brought to practice, ought to be laid aside; they create much debate, spend much time, and can never be of use. My Lord, with submission, this assembly ought to lay aside all frivolous debates, that our judgments may not be called in question elsewhere.

“ I am for following the advice just now mentioned: Let us forgive, and love one another; let us join hearts and hands to keep out the known enemy of our religion. If that deceiver or breaker of sacred vows and treaties, made and sworn upon the holy gospel at the altar, in the most solemn and most religious manner, shall by his power and our mistaken management, put upon us that thing in the air, called the prince of Wales, of no birth, of no blood, sprung from whom is unknown to himself, as well as to us; we must be ruined, my lord, every man here who enjoys his estate, may easily know what he has to trust to; we all know who must come with him, the same men and principles who destroyed us twenty years ago. I humbly move, with submission, that we may pass by all the mutual vexatious animosities which were amongst us but lately; all parties have been to blame; God will pardon the penitent: The Queen oversees, and graciously forgives; let us mutually do the same, and settle our succession, and secure and help ourselves, and God will help us; it will prove our own and the people's safety.”

“ Salus Populi suprema Lex esto.”

“ Let us follow the example of our wise neighbours, and make such laws as may tie up the hands and terrify the hearts of our own depraved subjects, who dare offer to act or speak in favour of any, in prejudice to her Majesty's lawful and rightful title to her crown and dignity.—I am confident, my lord, no man here dares own his inclinations to be for the French king, or that pretended prince, whatever prospect he may have of titles, honours, or subordinate power from him, who hath no bowels of compassion left, who consumes his own vitals, by persecuting and tormenting his own best subjects, and spares neither sex nor age in his neighbouring country, even of his own mistaken religion, if they but refuse to be his slaves; witness his new conquests in Alsace and Flanders. What then are we to expect, who by that tyrant are accounted heretics?”

“ Whoever are so wicked amongst us, as to venture either to counsel, conduct, or invite, whenever he comes, (which God prevent) may expect the same fate. For my own part, my lord, I have no personal prejudice against him, nor the pretended prince of Wales, but I here solemnly declare, that I will oppose him, or either of them, with all their adherents, whilst there is a drop of blood in my veins; and I am morally sure of 100,000 of the best men in Britain to accompany me in the opposition; and I am sure, my lord, of this, that the nation in general will go along with me also; God be praised, we are Protestants, and of the reformed religion, for which I hope we shall ever be ready and willing, upon any such occasion, to sacrifice our lives and our fortunes, to prevent all these independent evils. My lord, let us settle a successor who is a known Protestant, and of our own royal and antient race of kings.

“ For an argument of this, an anonymous author, in his Remarks on the late Plot, gives some reasons for it, which for your information I here presume to repeat : After he excuses two noble dukes, he says, ’Tis hoped this is sufficient to make it plain, that to insist on an Union and communication of trade at this time, would retard the succession, which may be dangerous to ourselves, and to the whole Protestant interest all over Europe.

“ The danger to ourselves, is evident from the conspiracy that Fraser and his accomplices have been carrying on in the Highlands, and other parts of this kingdom, the general discontents which are in our nation, &c. and gives his reasons, page 48. He continues to tell you, That the Jacobites here, and their friends beyond the Sea, make a great improvement of the delay of settling the succession; they flatter themselves, and impose upon the world, that it proceeds from the inclinations of our people to the St. Germain family.

“ Then he goes on to tell you, my lord, of our divisions, which, says he, encourage the French to solicit a rebellion, and to attempt an invasion, either of which effected, transforms our country into a field of blood. And supposing (which God forbid) her Majesty should die whilst the succession is unsettled, and our country lying under these intestine divisions, the Hanover and St. Germain parties will certainly engage us in a civil war: England and Ireland will assist the first, and France the other. This will make our nation a theatre of woe and calamity, and whoever hath the advantage in such a case, we must be slaves for ever.—Our author, my Lord, concludes the paragraph, and tells us in such circumstances, that there will be no room for thoughts of insisting on limitations, and humbly conceives that what is said is sufficient to shew the necessity of settling the succession upon the foot of our old constitution; that it will be the only way to secure us against those dangers we are threatened with, from the madness and folly of both parties, viz. Whig and Tory.

“ My Lord Chancellor, this anonymous author hath said very much in favour of the rights and privileges of this kingdom in these remarks and other books which I have seen; and in particular, hath been at some pains to excuse some great men, whose works and actions I would have rather to speak and plead for them, that we may see and know in good earnest in whose company we are, and with whom we have to do. Yet I must say, the author seems in earnest for settling the succession.

“ It is certain, my lord, whoever is for pressing an union or a communication of trade at this time, is diametrically against the settling the succession; and, if we do not perform this necessary point this session, what constructions will men of unbiassed principles, men of the same religion with ourselves all the world over, put upon our management?—Will not the majority of this assembly be justly suspected, if the succession be not settled this time? On this point depends the security of all that is dear to us both spiritual and temporal, at home and abroad; and whoever are against it, without all manner of doubt, are enemies at bottom to our queen, to our religion and government, and to the people of the kingdom, and their posterity. The person, my lord, who I presume you will think fit to name for a successor, is her royal highness the electress dowager of Brunswick and Lunenburg, the princess Sophia; she is the next Protestant of our own royal family, whose mother was a native of our own country; born at Dunfermling. Her highness’s blood is truly royal, her inclinations and heart, as I am credibly informed, are entirely British; and, my lord, we can go no where else for a successor, but to her and the heirs of her body. Were this point settled on the best conditions proper for us to ask, and in her Majesty’s power to grant, none in this assembly will have occasion so very often to make mention of her Majesty’s death, as they did last year, which indeed carries something rude in expressing it. We all know, my lord, she is mortal; may we act and speak as if we thought ourselves so, and may we never have occasion to make more mention of her death; may she outlive all of us; she is the support and glory of us, of our religion, and of the quiet and peaceable government we all enjoy; and by her shining character, illustrates and adorns all her good subjects.—Wherefore, my lord, let it never be said, that we of this parliament, either by neglect or by wrong principles, or by a mistake of our judgments, grasping at what can never be obtained, are either the immediate or mediate cause of eclipsing so bright a lustre, as shines through all the distinct parts of her wise management at home as well as abroad. From hence we hear the joyful news of victories, and a happy progress by the wise and adorable providence, in the late great success owing to her majesty’s arms and those of her allies; whereby God hath thus far disappointed the hopes, and confounded the devices and ambitious designs of the common enemy.

“ I presume to say, with submission, that our divisions amongst ourselves, these last two years past, have given her Majesty more real vexation and trouble than all the great affairs of Europe, of which she hath a very great share: this alone is a reproach to our nation in general: whereas indeed the true cause is the pride, ambition, and covetous humour of some few particular men of both parties, who all pretended the service of the queen and the public good: whereas in good earnest, all that these pretended patriots aim at is to be chief, and the first in posts and offices of profit and trust, by which they may pretend a privilege to spend and squander away the public revenue, upon the people, to support their own pride, &c.

and luxury. 'Hinc illa Lacrymæ.' From such managers and self-interested, passionate, proud men, are all our misery, and all the reproaches cast upon the nation: covetousness and the love of money blind these men's understandings. Let us not follow their maxims, lest we prove troublesome to our sovereign, and useless to the public. I know very well, my lord, some here who are really for the succession, but are not for having it settled at this time for several pretended reasons; but a great one is, they would not have his grace, my lord Commissioner, have the honour of passing it, whilst he sits on the throne.—I confess, for my own part, I have no concern whoever does a good thing, provided I have a share of it; and I hope, if any man is against it on that account, he will repent and consider the public advantage: from which, and from all that has been said, I am, my lord, for settling of the succession now, before the house proceeds to any other business."

The cavaliers were extremely elated by this victory; and the duke of Athol, lord privy-seal, and one of their leaders, moved, "That her majesty having been pleased to signify by her commissioner, that the examination of the plot should be laid before the parliament, his grace would be pleased to write to her majesty, to send down the persons, who were witnesses, and all the papers relating to that plot, as soon as possible, that the affair might be thoroughly examined: and those, who were unjustly accused, might be vindicated, and the guilty punished." Whereupon the lord chancellor declared, by order of the lord commissioner, that his grace had written, and would write again to the queen, for all the evidences relating to the plot.

July 19. The duke of Hamilton moved, "That the parliament would proceed to make such limitations and conditions of government, for the rectifying of the constitution, as might secure the religion, liberty, and independency of this nation: and that they would name commissioners to treat with England, for regulating the commerce, and other concerns with that nation, previous to all other business, except an act for two months ccess, first of all to be granted for the present subsistence of her Majesty's forces." Upon this, the earl of Marchmont made a long speech, importing, "That, since the house had resolved not to fall immediately upon settling the succession, it was reasonable, that an act should be made to exclude all popish successors." To which the duke of Hamilton answered, "That he should be one of the first who should draw his sword against a popish successor, though he did not think this a proper time, either to settle the succession, or to consider of the earl of Marchmont's proposal."

July 21. After some debate, the consideration of the duke of Hamilton's motion was adjourned for two days, when it was moved, That the act presented by the lord-justice clerk, and declared by him to be for fourteen months supply, payable in two years, might likewise be considered. After a debate, it was put to the vote, whether to give a cess for two, or for fourteen months? and, it was carried by 16 voices, that it should be for two months only.

Proceedings on the Supply, and the Act of Security.] July 25. The act of supply was taken again into consideration; but there was tacked to it a great part of the bill for the security of the nation, which (as hath been related) passed the former session of parliament, but was refused by the throne. After some debate, the following resolve was offered by the lord Ross, "That the parliament will proceed to grant two months supply for subsisting her majesty's forces; and, as soon as the act of security, now read, has got the royal assent, will give four months more." And then a second resolve was presented by the earl of Roxburgh, "That there be a first reading marked on the act of security; and that both this act, and that for the supply, lie, without being further proceeded on, until her majesty's commissioner receive instructions as to the act of security, it being then free for the parliament to proceed to the acts jointly or separately, as they should think fit." After reasoning on both these resolves, the question was stated, whether to approve the lord Ross's or the earl of Roxburgh's? It was carried for the lord Ross's; and the act of security being read, a first reading was ordered to be marked thereon. These things were carried with great heat and vehemence; for (as was before observed) a national humour of being independent on England, fermented so strongly among all sorts of people without doors, that those who went not into every hot motion that was made, were considered as the betrayers of their country: and they were so exposed to a popular fury, that some of those who studied to stop the torrent, were thought to be in danger of their lives. The presbyterians were so overawed with these proceedings, that though they wished well to the settling the succession, they durst not openly declare it. The dukes of Hamilton and Athol led all these violent motions, and the whole nation was strangely inflamed.

The ministers were in great perplexity how to act, with regard to the supply-bill, and the tack that was joined to it. If it was denied, the army could be no longer kept up; they had run so far in arrear, that, considering the poverty of the country, that could not be carried on much longer. Some suggested, that it should be proposed to the English ministry to advance the subsistence-money, till better measures could be taken; but none of the Scotch ministers would agree to that. An army is reckoned to belong to those who pay it; and therefore an army paid from England, would be called an English army. Nor was it possible to manage such a thing secretly. It was well known there was no money in the Scotch treasury to pay them: so that, if money were once brought into the treasury, how secretly soever, all men must conclude, that it came from England. And mens' minds were then so full of the conceit of independency, that, if a suspicion arose of any such practice probably it would have occasioned tumults. Even the army itself was so inflamed with this temper, that it was believed, that neither officers nor soldiers would have taken their pay, if they had believed it came from England. The affair was therefore reduced to this dilemma, that either the army must be disbanded, or the bill must pass. It is true, the army was a very small one, not above three thousand; but it was so ordered, that it was double or treble officered: so that it could have been easily increased to a much greater number, if there had been occasion for it. The officers had served long, and were men of a good character. Since therefore there were alarms of an invasion, which both sides looked for, and the intelligence which the court had from France, assured them it was intended; the ministers thought the inconveniencies arising from the tack might be remedied afterwards; but that the breaking of the army was such a pernicious thing, and might end so fatally, that it was not to be ventured on: therefore, by common consent, a letter was wrote to the queen, which was signed by all the ministers in Scotland, in which they laid the whole matter before her, and every thing stated and balanced; concluding with their humble advice to pass the bill. This was very heavy on the lord Godolphin, on whose counsel the queen chiefly relied. He saw, that the ill consequences of breaking the army, and laying that kingdom open to an invasion, would fall on him, if he should, in contradiction to the advice given by the ministry of Scotland, have advised the queen to reject the bill. This was under consideration in the end of July, when affairs abroad were in a great uncertainty; for though the victory at Schellenburg was a good step, yet the great decision was not then come. He thought therefore, considering the state of affairs, and the accidents which might happen, that it was the safest thing for the queen to comply with the advice of those to whom she trusted the affairs of that kingdom.

The Lord High Commissioner's Speech on passing the Act of Security—and to quicken the Supply.] August 5. The queen sent orders to pass the bill, which being done, the Commissioner made the following speech on the occasion:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; At your sitting down, her majesty, in her gracious letter, recommended to you two things, which she thought most necessary for your own quiet and security, as well as for that of her government; the settling of the succession in the protestant line, and the providing for the subsistence of the forces, the funds last given for that end being then exhausted. The first of these you have not thought fit for your interest to do at this time. I heartily wish you may meet with an opportunity for it more for your advantage at another. The other all of you seemed most ready and willing to go into, as witness the several motions and resolves made thereunto; but, withal, shewed strong inclinations for an act of security, as absolutely necessary. I told you then, as I had done at first, that I had been fully impowered and instructed, not only as to that, but many other things for your good; but upon the alteration of circumstances, had not now the liberty to make use of those power even as to that, till I had acquainted her majesty, and knew her mind, which I would do, and use my utmost interest to procure it favourable; which was the true reason of your long adjournment, and not what was insinuated by some, who ought to have known me better: the character I have in the world being, as I hope, above so mean a reflection.

"And now, my lords and gentlemen, I can tell you, that, from her majesty's innate goodness and gracious disposition towards you, I hath been more easy for me, and some other of her servants, to prevail with her, than perhaps was by others expected; so that you have an act of security sufficient for the ends proposed. And it is hoped, at the same time, you will perfect that of supply, which you yourselves seem convinced to be absolutely necessary at this time, and without which neither the forces can be kept on foot, nor any trade maintained for guarding our coasts and securing our trade: both which now lying before you, I hope you will go presently about, that, when finished, they may have the royal assent, which I am ready to give. And therefore you may have time to proceed to other business relating to trade, or your other concerns, where I shall be willing to comply with your desires, so they be within the bounds of my instructions."*

* "Thus this act of security was passed after the battle of Blenheim was over, but several days before the news of it reached England. When the act passed, copies of it were sent to England, where it was soon printed by those who were uneasy at the lord Godolphin's bearing the white staff, and resolved to make use of this against him: for the whole blame of passing it was cast upon him. It was not possible to prove, that he had advised the queen to it, and therefore some took it by another handle, and resolved to urge it against him, that he had not persuaded the queen to reject it, though that seemed a great stretch; for, he being a stranger to Scotland, it might have been liable to more objection, if he had presumed to advise the queen to refuse a bill passed in the parliament of that kingdom, which all the ministry there advised her to pass. Severe measures were passed upon this act. It was said, that the two kingdoms were now divided by law, and that the Scots were putting themselves in a posture to defend it: and all saw by whose advices this was done. One thing, which contributed to keep up an ill humour in the parliament of Scotland, was, where justly imputed to

m. The queen had promised to send down them all the examinations relating to the ot. If these had been sent down, probably the first heat the matter might have been ried far against the duke of Queensberry.
ut he, who stayed all the while in London, it it to be represented to the queen, that the ading down these examinations, with the ersons concerned in them, would run the sesion into so much heat, and into such a length, at it would divert them quite from considering e succession, and it might produce a tragical
ene. Upon these suggestions, the queen al-ered her resolution of sending them down ;
d though repeated applications were made her, both by the parliament and her minist-rs, to have them sent, yet no answer was ade to these, nor was so much as an ex-use made for not sending them. The duke of uensberry, having gained this point, got all is friends to join with the party that opposed e new ministry. This both defeated all their jects, and softened the spirits of those who ere so set against him, that in their first fury
o stop could have been put to their proceed-gs. But now the party that had designed to in him, was so much wrought on by the assist-nce that his friends gave them in this session, hat they resolved to preserve him.” Tindal.

address to the queen, desiring, that the Evidence and Papers relating to the plot might be

A. D. 1705.

The Scotch parliament met again on the 28th of June, 1705, when his grace John duke of Argyle, her Majesty's High Commissioner, went to the parliament house, where his grace's commission was read, and recorded ; after which a commission to James earl of Seafield to be Chancellor, commissions to William marquis of Annandale, and Hugh earl of Loudon, to be Secretaries of State, David earl of Glasgow, to be Lord Treasurer Deputy, sir James Murray of Philiphaugh, to be Clerk Register, and Adam laid before them against the next session.—

This was the state of that nation, which was aggravated very odiously all over England. It was confidently, though, as was afterwards known, very falsely reported, that great quantities of arms were brought over, and dispersed through the whole kingdom. And, it being well known how poor the nation was at that time, it was said those arms were paid for by other hands, in imitation of what it was believed cardinal Richelieu did in the year 1638.
Another thing was given out very maliciously by the lord Godolphin's enemies, that he had given directions under-hand to hinder the declaring the succession ; and that the secret of this was trusted to Mr. Johnston, who, they said, talked openly one way, and acted secretly another, though there never appeared any colour of truth in those reports. Great use was to be made of the affairs of Scotland, because there was no ground of complaint of any thing in the administration at home. All the duke of Marlborough's enemies saw, that his chief strength lay in the credit which the lord Godolphin was in at home, while he was so successful abroad : so that it being impossible to attack him in such a course of glory, they laid their aims against the Lord-Treasurer. The Tories resolved to attack him, and that disposed the Whigs to preserve him ; and this was so managed by them, that it gave a great turn to all the councils at home.—Immediately after the adjournment of the parliament, the courtiers repaired to London, where the marquis of Tweeddale was made chancellor of Scotland ; the earls of Seafield and Roxburgh, secretaries of state ; the earl of Rothes, lord-privy-seal ; the earl of Cromarty, justice-general ; Mr. Bailie of Jervis-wood, treasurer-deputy ; and the earl of Selkirk, lord Belhaven, and sir John Hume, lords of the treasury : Sir William Hamilton was also made justice-clerk ;
but he lived not to enjoy that office many months, and was succeeded by Adam Cockburn of Ormiston. A new commission was, at the same time, sent down to Edinburgh, by which most of the cavaliers, and all the duke of Queensberry's friends, were laid aside, and it was made up intirely of Scots revolutioners.
And thus the administration of affairs in Scotland was lodged in the hands of a body of men, who concurred with the measures at that time pursued by the court of England.” Tindal.

Ormistone, to be Lord Justice Clerk, were read and recorded as usual.

The Queen's Letter.] Then they adjourned to the 3rd of July, when they met again, and her majesty's Letter to them was read as followeth: and his grace the Lord Commissioner and the Lord Chancellor made the following Speeches:

“ My Lords and Gentlemen: It hath been our great care and concern ever since our accession to the crown, to preserve the peace, and promote the true interest and advantage of that our antient kingdom; and above all, to have your present establishment so secured, that both you, and after ages may reap the benefit thereof.—You are now again met in parliament, and no doubt, with a full view of all your present circumstances, which we heartily wish may be seconded with such endeavours on your part, as may best accomplish what we so really design.—In your last meeting we recommended to you with the greatest earnestness, the settling of the succession of that our ancient kingdom in the Protestant line, and several things having since happened, which shew the great inconvenience of this matter's continuing in suspense, we cannot but at present most seriously renew the recommendation of this settlement, as being convinced of the growing necessity thereof, both for the preservation of the Protestant religion, and the peace and safety of all our dominions, and for defeating the designs and attempts of all our enemies. And to prevent any objections to the said settlement, that can be suggested from the views or fears of future inconveniences that may happen to that our kingdom from thence, we shall be ready to give the royal assent to such proceedings and restrictions, as shall be found necessary and reasonable in such a case; and therefore we must still leave it upon you as most necessary for all the ends already mentioned, that you go to the settlement of the succession before all other business.—We are fully satisfied, and doubt not but you are, that great benefits will arise to all our subjects by an Union of Scotland and England, and that nothing will contribute more to the composing of differences, and extinguish the heats that are unhappily raised and fomented by the enemies of both nations, than the promoting of every thing that tends to the procuring the same. Therefore we earnestly recommend to you to pass an act for a commission to set a treaty on foot between the kingdoms, as our parliament of England has done, for effectuating what is so desirable, and for such other matters and things as may be judged proper for our honour, and the good and advantage of both kingdoms for ever; in which we shall most heartily give our best assistance.—The supplies granted by the parliament for maintaining the forces, with the forts, garrisons and frigates, are now at an end, and the same being still necessary to be maintained; as likewise that the magazines of arms and ammunition be duly furnished for the peace and security of the kingdom, especially now in time of war, we doubt not but you will provide the supplies needful, in such manner as may be easy and effectual.—We have next the duke of Argyle to be our commissioner, and represent our person in this session of parliament, as one, of whose capacity and zeal for our service, and the kingdom's good and advantage, we are sufficiently assured, and no less hopeful that he will be to you acceptable: We have fully empowered him to declare our firm resolution to maintain the government both in church and state, as by law established, and likewise to consent to such further laws as shall be thought needful for that end.—We have also empowered him to give the royal assent to such good laws, as shall be concluded for the advancement of piety, and discouragement of immorality, for the better encouraging and improving of trade and manufacture, the further securing of private rights and conveyances, and for promoting the more easy and speedy administration of justice; and generally for what may be found for the good and advantage of the kingdom. In all such, and whatever else may contribute for the happiness and satisfaction of our people, you shall have our ready and cheerful concurrence: and so we bid you heartily farewell.—Given at our court at Windsor Castle, the 18th of June, 1705; and of our reign the 4th year.”

The Lord High Commissioner's Speech.] His grace, the Lord Commissioner, made afterwards the following Speech:

“ My Lords and Gentlemen; Her majesty has in her most gracious letter expressed a much tenderness and affection towards this nation, in assuring you, that she will maintain the government, as established by law, both in church and state; and acquainting you that she has been pleased to give me such power, to pass such acts as may be for the good of the nation, that, were it not purely to comply with custom, I might be silent. Her majesty has under her consideration the present circumstances of this kingdom; and out of her extreme concern for its welfare, has been graciously pleased to recommend to you two expedients, to prevent the ruin, which does but too plainly threaten us: in the first place, your settling the succession in the Protestant line, as what is absolutely and immediately necessary to secure our peace, to cool those heats which have, with great industry and too much success, been fomented among us, and effectually disappoint the designs of all our enemies. In the second, a treaty with England, which you yourselves have shewn so great an inclination for, that it is not to be supposed it can meet with any opposition.—The small part of the funds which were appropriated, in your last meeting, for the army, are now at an end, and I believe every body is satisfied of how great a use our frigates have been to our trade; and it is fit to acquaint you, our forts are ruinous, and our magazines empty. Therefore I do not doubt but your wisdom will direct you to provide suitable supplies.—My Lords and gentlemen, I am most able of the difficulties that attend this post, and the loss I am at by my want of experience in affairs; but I shall endeavour to make it up by my zeal and firmness in serving her majesty and the great regard I shall have to whatever may be for the good of my country."

The Lord Chancellor's Speech.] Then the Lord Chancellor spoke to the assembly in the following words:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; Her Majesty her most gracious letter, and my lord commissioner his grace, in his speech, do propose these things to your consideration, which are of the greatest importance for the security of our religion and liberties; and her Majesty is most willing to do all that is in her power, to promote the happiness and prosperity of all her subjects.—For these ends her Majesty doth, with great earnestness, continue to recommend to you the settlement of the succession to the crown in the Protestant line, as the best measure for preserving all that is valuable to you, with regard either to your sacred civil concerns: so long as this is delayed, the enemies of our present establishment will continue their bad designs, and be ready to seize the first opportunity to disturb the public peace; and when can you enter upon the dejection of this matter, with greater advantage than now in her Majesty's own time; and when you have assurances from her of all encouragement, and that she is ready to grant such limitations and conditions of government, that regard to the successor, as can be reasonably proposed, and will give her royal concurrence in every thing that can make this settlement advantageous to this nation.—Her Majesty doth also in her royal letter, with great concern, signify her design to prevent all differences that may happen between this kingdom and that of England; and proposes the only expedient in this matter, the setting on foot a Treaty of Union, and of such other matters and concerns as may be for her Majesty's honour, and the good and advantage of both kingdoms. It is unquestionably the interest of both nations, that they be more closely united; and that there be an entire communication of advantages and privileges, and that they both should have the same interest, which would make the land secure at home and formidable abroad; and you are assured of her Majesty's royal concurrence and assistance; to make this treaty effectual, to the mutual advantage of both kingdoms.—You will certainly think it reasonable to grant the needful supplies for maintaining the forces and frigates, and for other uses mentioned in her Majesty's letter; these being so necessary now in time of war, or for the support of her Majesty's government, and for the defence of this nation, against the temptments and designs of our enemies.—My Lords and gentlemen, my lord commissioner being fully instructed by her Majesty, in every thing that concerns the good of this nation, you have the clearest and greatest evidence of her Majesty's most tender care for the happiness of her people. I am therefore hopeful you will improve this most desirable opportunity, for promoting of piety, for encouraging our trade, for preserving of your peace, and for doing all that may be for the mutual satisfaction of her Majesty and her subjects."

Proceedings respecting Trade, the State of the Coin, Paper Credit, &c.] July 6. The marquis of Annandale presented a proposal, "That the parliament would go upon the consideration of such limitations and conditions of government; as should be judged proper for the next successor in the Protestant line; and that, at the same time, a committee be appointed to consider the condition of the Coin of the nation, and the state of its commerce or trade, as to export and import, and to prepare and bring in the most proper remedies and regulations for that end." Hereupon the earl Marischal presented a resolve, "That the house, previous to all other affairs, would make such regulations of the Trade and Coin of this kingdom, as might be most for the advantage of the nation." Another resolve was also presented by the earl of Mar, "That the house would, preferably to all other business, take into their consideration the nation's circumstances, as to England, and how to enter into a treaty with them." This last being seconded by few, his lordship thought fit to withdraw it till another time: but the house fell into a debate of six hours upon the two first motions, and at last came to the question, Whether to proceed first to the consideration of Coin and Trade, or to that of Limitations; and the first was carried. Then a second question was put, Whether the Coin and Trade should be taken into consideration by way of resolve, which excluded all other business till that should be determined, or by way of proposal, which admitted of other business: and this was carried likewise by a great majority. It was the opinion of many, that the cavaliers made a wrong step in postponing the more material affairs, and trifling away the beginning of the session in matters of no importance; for, if they had immediately called for the queen's Letter, in order to return an answer to it, the treaty with England would naturally have fallen under consideration, and the duke of Queensberry's friends not being yet gone off from them, they might have either rejected it, or at least clogged it as they pleased, and chosen such members as they thought fit to be commissioners.

Whatever ground there may have been for this conjecture, it is certain, that the three next and many Sederunts or Sittings were spent in the consideration of Trade: in relation to which several overtures or proposals were laid before the house, some of which passed into laws, and the others were rejected. Amongst the rest, there were two proposals made for supplying the nation with money by a Paper-Credit. The first was offered by Dr. Hugh Chamberlaine, whose project by a Land-bank had, some years before, miscarried in England, and reduced him so low, that he was obliged to fly from his creditors into Scotland. The other was proposed by John Law, the son of a goldsmith in Edinburgh, a man of subtle parts, who, having squandered away his small fortune, was forced to live by gaming, but who, being an agreeable debauchee, found the way to ingratiate himself with the duke of Argyll, and the leaders of the flying squadron. Upon the confidence of their support, he presented a very plausible scheme, which was readily espoused by all the courtiers, and many of the flying squadron, because it was so framed, that, in process of time, it would have brought all the estates of the kingdom to depend upon the government. But the house rejected the proposal, and came to a Resolution, "That the establishing any kind of Paper Credit, so as to make bills pass for current coin, was an improper expedient." A council was likewise appointed, with power to put the laws relating thereto into execution; and it was recommended to them to bring the export and import of the nation to a balance, and lay the same before the house next session.

Proceedings respecting the Succession.] Before this act was brought to perfection, the cavaliers made all possible efforts to prevent the settling of the Succession, for which purpose the duke of Hamilton, on the 17th of July, presented the following resolve, "That this parliament will not proceed to the nomination of a Successor, till they have had a previous treaty with England in relation to commerce, and other concerns with that nation." And further "That this parliament will proceed to make such Limitations and conditions of government for the rectification of the constitution, as may secure the liberty, religion, and independency of this kingdom, before they proceed to the nomination of a successor." The court, and most of the flying squadron, united against this resolve; but the cavaliers insisted vigorously upon it, and, by the assistance of some of the duke of Queensberry's friends, carried it by a great majority.

"My Lord Chancellor; By what experience I have had in this world, I always found, that when divisions are once come to that consistency, as to form themselves in factions upon different measures and opposite designs, that then reason and reasoning make but a very small impression upon either of the parties. Therefore I shall not enter into the merits of this resolve, nor of its expediency or unexpediency at this time, that I may not give the least rise to debate, or occasion of misunderstanding amongst ourselves. What I shall say on this head, is to advance this position, viz. That there is more danger to our nation, and national concerns by divisions and factions, than by any mistakes in fit and adequate measures, if they be unanimously gone upon.—A wrong measure, especially, in resolutions, may be rectified and redressed, when we come to a fuller view of the affair. And, though some times they prove unsuccessful, yet unanimity endures a shock with firmness; but divisions and factions increase and multiply, and grow from very small beginnings, so as to render all persuasions abortive; and that more especially amongst men of honour, who, as they are generally more grateful, constant, and firm to their words and parties, so upon disappointments they are more prone to resentment and revenge, the most dangerous of all passions, and the most fatal to the very being of nations.—What I plead for, my lord, at this time, is unity. Would you have limitations? Or upon them unanimously. Would you have a treaty? Do the like. Would you settle the succession upon limitations without a treaty? Would you settle the succession or treaty without limitations? Would you have neither done at this time? In short, whatever you would have done, let it be done now, and it will not want its own weight; for I am persuaded, that, whatever resolution the honourable house shall come to, a wrong measure is preferable to a good one, if there be unanimity in the one, and faction at the heart of the other.—My lords, I could bring instances from the histories of Europe, to confirm what I have said, and from none more than that of our neighbours, the states of Holland, whose unity has raised them to the grandeur and riches they are possessed of this day. They wanted not wrong measures and unsuccessful attempts; but their unanimous firmness in the vindication of their liberties hath made good the verity of their motto, Concordia res parvæ crescunt.—But, what is foreign, I shall confine myself to our own histories, and by four examples I shall make it evidently appear, that our predecessors, when in good understanding amongst themselves, were always in a condition to defend their rights and liberties against the English, and that they never did prevail over us, save when we were divided and broke by factions.—The first instance is of that famous controversy about the right of succession of Alexander the third. The story is so well known, that I shall not give this honourable house the trouble of hearing it repeated, but shall only say, we divided upon it. What followed upon that? The king of England gave us a king. What was the consequence of that? Both of us paid very dear for it. For, as the historians of both nations tell us, there followed upon it the longest and most bloody war that ever was betwixt two nations. Then, and before, could it be said, that England had a pretence of homage from us.—Pray, my lord, had it not been better that our predecessors had of themselves chosen the worst of competitors, yea the worst men of the nation by a general consent, rather than to have sustained those calamities which followed on that division?—The other time, my lord, that we groined under English bondage, was by Constantine, who knew as well how to divide, as he

fight. We had called home king Charles a second, as successor to his father. Cromwell enters Scotland with an army, and pre-emptively: what was the reason of it? Was his my comparable to ours in number? He saw very well king Charles the first, his master, did come upon us with a far better army, and less prepared, and less accustomed to war; and yet, though sword in hand, he was necessitated to give us a valuable treaty at the risks. He knew very well, that we had the mains of that gallant army, which had proved us so good conditions at the treaty of Breda, and who afterwards had raised the parliamentary power above that of their sovereign. He knew, that we had the brave troops that had preserved the north of Ireland from the Irish rebels. Whence then came those hopes of Oliver? It came, my lords, from our divisions: we were united in those former times, and broken then. In short we had the Hamiltons, Grahams, and Campbells, each driving on opposite designs. Nay, my lord, faction was come to that height of enthusiasm, that when we came to fight Cromwell at Dunbar, we would not fight but as the Midianites, although we had no such warrant for it. I pray God, my lords, things come not to such an height now, especially when we, as they, mind more, who all do such and such things, than what things are fittest to be done; so that every commissioner now must have the board swept clean, before he undertakes the queen's business. I speak not this, my lord, out of any sentiment I have, by being lately turned out of a post, I profess I have not the least resentment upon it. Why should not the queen employ what servants she thinks fit? But I speak of it, because I am afraid it proves a seed to faction, it having proved so prolific already, as to have two crops in one year, though in this northern climate.—The two instances, where our unity preserved us from the fatal consequences of war with England, are those of king David and king James the first, after they had recovered under the conduct of the noble Bruce, who had forced the grand-child, to a most solemn renunciation, to yield up the claim of homage, unjustly imposed by the father upon us. Two unhappy accidents put these two kings in the hands of the English. Did they let go the opportunities to trump up their claim of homage? No, my lord. What hindered them to proceed further? King David had lost a considerable battle, was made prisoner himself, many of the nobility killed and taken, England successful against France at the same time, and their king prisoner in England. King James I. was our prisoner, being forced to fly from the unjust designs of his uncle Robert, and as unjustly made prisoner by them. These occasions, my lord, did appear favourable enough for England to make use of; but our firm unanimity put a stop to their designs. We declared we would not obey our kings as long as they were under English power and influence; and so both our armies in France and peers in Scotland, refused their oaths, as long as they were in England, looking upon them not as their king's commands, but the commands of an enemy. And thus we were preserved, and our kings delivered to us upon ransom.—My lord, I have observed, that England never let go any opportunity, neither before nor since the Union of the two crowns, to bring us under their power; and I am persuaded, that the heats and animosities amongst us these several sessions of parliament have, amongst other things, occasioned that threatening and unaccountable act of parliament, wherein they characterize our ministers, and criticize our acts: as it hath also given birth to those contemptible and ignorant pamphlets, published of late against the sovereignty and independency of our nation. Will you prevent the consequences of what is designed against us? Be as united as they in your actings against them. Did Whig and Tory differ about us? No, my lord: the two houses, though in civil war among themselves, did vie with one another, which of them should have the honour to give us the sharpest and severest blow.—To conclude, would you quench the fire that appears to be raised against us in England? Would you have a successful treaty and good limitations? Be unanimous; and I hope, the case is not as yet so desperate, but, what our predecessors have found, we may yet find the like.—It may be asked, my lord, how shall we be unanimous, and who shall yield? I think Providence has made that very easy with relation to this resolve. For suppose some be for limitations, that are not for a treaty; and others for a treaty, that are not for limitations; and that those who are against a treaty, are against it because they do not expect reasonable and good conditions from England; and that those who are against limitations, are against them because they would prove of no long continuance, and consequently look upon them only as an amusement to bring us to the English succession. There is no reason, my lord, in all this, why both parties should not agree in the resolve: for, suppose all those suppositions should prove true, shall we then be in any worse condition than we are at present? Shall it be said, we will not so much as resolve to treat with England; or that limitations, which are in our power both to make and to keep, shall be looked upon by us as things impracticable, and of no duration? No, my lord, we have a gracious queen that will assist us in both, and who, in her gracious Letter, seems to desire both.—I do consider England, with relation to the succession of Britain, as so many fishes inclosed in a large strong net. They have room to swim, toss, and tumble; but, as long as the fisherman keeps his hold, they cannot break through. I believe by this time they are sensible, that the succession to the two kingdoms in Britain ought not to have been designed, much less settled, without acquainting one part of Britain with the design, and that one part independent upon the other. Therefore if we be united, and keep our hold, and make no unreasonable demand, either of limitations from our queen, or conditions from England, but merely such as the necessity of the nation requires; I hope, by the blessing of God upon our just endeavours, and the cordial support of our excellent sovereign, that we shall have all our desires granted, and a good understanding betwixt the two nations promoted, not for this time only, but for ever: which, if they do slight at this time, I dare pretend to prophesy, that the time will come, when they will give with less ceremony.—Thus, my lord, I have frankly told you my mind, and that with all deference and submission to this honourable house; and though I do not pretend to the thanks of this parliament, as the lord Haversham had of the house of lords, yet I will not yield to his lordship, as to my integrity and sincere concern for the commonwealth of Britain. And in one thing, I think, I have the advantage, that what I have said tends to the composing of differences, first, among ourselves, and then betwixt our neighbouring nations and us. Whereas his lordship's Speech, if I be not as much mistaken as his lordship was at the time he spoke it, tends directly the quite contrary way. Therefore I am for the resolve, and for the beginning with the limitations."

The above Speech had such an effect, that, after some debate, the duke of Hamilton's Resolve was approved.

On the 30th of July, the parliament met again, and read the draught of a Letter presented by the marquis of Tweeddale, in answer to her Majesty's Letter to the parliament; as also a draught of an Act for a Treaty with England, presented by the earl of Mar; another draught of an Act for a Treaty with England, presented by the marquis of Lothian; a draught of an Act concerning the way of choosing officers of state, privy-counsellors, and members of the exchequer and treasury, in case of her Majesty's decease, without heirs of her body to succeed, presented by the earl of Rothes; and some other draughts of acts relating to trade: all which were ordered to be printed.

July 31. The duke of Queensberry arrived at Edinburgh, where he made a public entry with greater splendor and magnificence, and was received with greater demonstrations of joy, than the three times he had been commissioner. The next day he went to parliament, where the draught of a Letter, in answer to the queen's, was read, intimating "The parliament's readiness to establish the same successor with England; begging her Majesty would grant them such limitations to her successors, as were necessary for that purpose; and assuring her, that, if this was once done, they would cheerfully set about the work." But a motion being made, that, preferably to that letter, the house should take into consideration acts relating to trade, the same was agreed to.

Proceedings upon the Limitations of the Succession.] This being over, the cavaliers inclined to proceed upon the Limitations, proposing thereby, in the first place, to obstruct the establishment of the Succession, in case the projected Treaty should fail; for they knew the court would not grant them the royal assent, and that the succession would then miscarry. In the next place, to lay all the restraints possible on the monarch, in case the house of Hanover should come to the crown. And lastly, to ingratiate themselves with the people, who thought themselves oppressed by England, and were extremely fond of every thing, that seemed to free them from it. A motion being made on the 31st of July, to grant the first reading to an act of commission for a Treaty with England, the date of Hamilton, in opposition thereto, moved, That the house would proceed to the enacting the Limitations: and a vote being stated in these terms, 'Proceed to consider the act for a treaty, or limitations,' the latter was carried. In the next Sederunt, on the 2d of August, several acts for that purpose were presented, the most considerable of which was, an act for regulating the choosing the officers of state, enacting, "That from and after her Majesty's decease, without heirs of her body, all officers of state, and privy-counsellors, and lords of session, should be chosen and appointed by the parliament; and in case of the decease of any of them, during the vacancy of parliament, the office to be supplied by one nominated by the council, who should continue in the same till next session of parliament: and that as the officers of state, and privy-counsellors should be accountable to the parliament."

The court offered, on the 16th of August, a clause, giving the power of choosing officers of state (which by this act was solely lodged to parliament) to the king, with consent of parliament, which was carried in the negative: it was also a motion, that there should be three presidents of the session, to preside by turns each two months.

On the 23d, the whole act was approved, and the next day an act for a Triennial Parliament was read in these terms: "Our sovereign lady, being willing to restore to her ancient kingdom, their ancient custom and natural frequency of parliaments, does therefore, with the advice and consent of parliament, statute and ordain, That there shall be a new parliament called and indicted, to meet, sit, and act; and that once every third year after the 1st of August in the year. And her Majesty does hereby declare, with consent aforesaid, that this present parliament shall not continue and endure any longer than the 1st of August aforesaid; and this, without prejudice of her Majesty and successors royal prerogative and power to dissolve parliament sooner than the said term of three years, as shall be thought fit. And further, with the advice aforesaid, statutes and ordains, that from and after the 1st day of August aforesaid to farmer or collector of her majesty's customs or excise, or any other branch of her majesty's revenue, shall be capable to be a member of parliament, nor to sit and vote therein after the date aforesaid; and it shall be a sufficient objection against any member, that he is concerned, directly or indirectly, as a farmer or collector, in any part of her majesty's revenue, to remove him from his place and vote in parliament."

The courtiers saw it was to no purpose to oppose this act; and, being afraid of a new parliament, they only proposed, that this act should not take place during her majesty's life. The cavaliers, on the other hand, insisted, that it should commence immediately; but many members, who doubted their own interest to be elected anew, proposed a medium betwixt the two, that it should take place three years after the date, that is, the 1st of August 1708; with which, as the least of two evils, the courtiers joined and carried; and so the whole act was approved.

Another act ordaining, that the Scots ambassadors, representing Scotland, should be present, when the sovereign had occasion to treat with foreign princes and states, and accountable to the parliament of Scotland, was also approved: but several other overtures were made, that never were ingrossed into acts. Nor did the above-mentioned act obtain the royal assent, though the court promised it often to many of the members, and hereby kept them in good humour, while the act for a Treaty was framing, they thinking themselves in a tolerable good state by those acts of Limitation, and never imagining, that the Treaty would terminate as it did.

But Fletcher of Salton, having, in a long discourse, set forth the deplorable state to which the Scots nation was reduced by being subjected to English counsels and measures, while the same person was king of both kingdoms, concluded, that those acts were not sufficient, and therefore presented a scheme of limitations, which he proposed to be ingrossed into an act, and taken into consideration;

I. That elections should be made at every Michaelmas head-court for a new parliament every year, to sit the 1st of November, next following, and adjourn themselves from time to time till next Michaelmas. That they choose their own president, and that every thing be determined by balloting in place of voting.—II. That so many lesser barons should be added to the parliament, as there had been noblemen created since the last augmentation of the number of barons: and that in all time coming, for every nobleman that should be created, there should be a baron added to the parliament.—III. That no man should have a vote in parliament, but a nobleman, or elected member.—IV. That the king should give the royal assent to all the laws offered by the states; and that the president of the parliament be empowered by his majesty to give the royal assent in his absence, and have ten pounds sterling a day salary.—V. That a committee of thirty-one members, of which nine be a quorum, chosen out of their number by every parliament under the king, should have the administration of the government, be his council, and accountable to the parliament, with power, on extraordinary occasions, to call the parliament together: and that, in the said council, all things be determined by balloting, instead of voting.—VI. That the king, without consent of the parliament, should not have the power of making peace and war, or of concluding any treaty with any other state or potentate.—VII. That all places and offices, both civil and military, and all pensions formerly conferred by the crown, should ever after be given by parliament.—VIII. That no regiment or company of horse, foot, or dragoons, be kept on foot in peace or war, but by consent of parliament.—IX. That all the fencible men in the nation, betwixt 60 and 16, be armed with bayonets and firelocks, all of a caliver; and continue always provided in such arms and ammunition suitable.—X. That no general indemnity, or pardon for any transgression, should be valid, without consent of parliament.—XI. That the fifteen senators of the college of justice should be incapable of being members of parliament, or of any other office or pension, but the salary, that belongs to their place, to be increased as the parliament should think fit. That the office of president should be in three of their number, to be named by the parliament, and that there be six extraordinary lords: as also, that the lords of the justice-court should be distinct from those of the session, and under the same restrictions.—XII. That, if any king should break in upon any of these conditions of government, he should, by the estates, be declared to have forfeited the crown." Fletcher enlarged upon every article, endeavouring to shew, that the first eight were necessary to prevent English influence over Scots affairs; the ninth, to enable the nation to defend its rights and liberties; and the tenth, to deter ministers of state from presuming to give the king bad advice, and doing things contrary to law.* The eleventh article he said was necessary to preserve the judicatories from corrupt judges: "And if the twelfth, concluded he, be not approved, sure I am, this house must own, the last king James was barbarously and unjustly treated." However this scheme of Limitations was never framed into an act.

Proceedings on the Plot.] Another material point under the consideration of this parliament, was the Plot. They had, in their former session, addressed the queen to transmit to them such persons, as were evidences in, and such papers as related to, that affair; and, in the beginning of this session, the dukes of Hamilton and Athol were very desirous to prosecute it to the utmost. But the cavaliers were not so forward; first, because they under a kind of engagement to the earl of Mar and sir James Murray of Philiphaugh, that, if the duke of Queensberry's friends opposed the marquis of Tweeddale and his party, as in the former session, they should not insist on that affair; which would irritate the duke's friends to such a degree, that many of them would not concur in opposing the act for a treaty. In the next place, the cavaliers considered, that the edge of many people's indignation against the plot was blunted, by its lying so long dormant. And being, at the same time, apprehensive of being baffled, if they attempted any thing against the duke of Queensberry, they resolved to stand neuter, at least till they saw whether the dukes of Hamilton and Athol could prove any thing. It being moved, on the 28th of August, that the house might be acquainted what answer the queen had returned to the Address, the lord-commissioner declared, that he had received a letter from her majesty relating to that matter, and would signify her pleasure therein to the parliament in a few days. Accordingly, on the 11th of September, the lord-chancellor acquainted the house, that the rest of the papers relating to the late plot were now transmitted; and that they should be given to the clerk-register, to be perused by the members of the house. But, when the house took these papers into consideration, it was urged, that they were only copies, and that the principal evidences, such as sir John Maclean, Mr. Keith, and others remained in London; and that the parliament could not proceed any further in that affair, unless the original papers, and the persons who were evidences, were at their command. However the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, and Bailie of Jerviswood, made speeches in their own vindication, asserting, that the accusation against them in the discovery of the pretended plot was false and calumnious. The duke of Athol, in particular, made a long narrative of the beginning, progress and conclusion of the whole affair; accused the duke of Queensberry of endeavouring to give the queen sinister impressions of her good subjects; produced copies of letters sent from him to her majesty, affirming, that all the cavaliers had an hand in the plot, or, at least were enemies to her; and that, the better to carry on his design, he had employed and held correspondence with Frazer or lord Lovat. But, notwithstanding all this great clamour, no further notice was taken of this affair.

* "The earl of Stair having spoken against this scheme, Fletcher, in answer, said, "It was no wonder his lordship was against it; for, had there been such an act, his lordship had been long before hanged for the advice he gave king James, the murder of Glenco, and his conduct since the Revolution." Lockhart.

Proceedings touching an Union with England. The business, which the court had principally at heart, was the act for a Treaty with England. The earl of Mar had, in the beginning of this session, presented an act for appointing commissioners to treat with commissioners from England of an Union; which lay upon the table, till most of the overtures in relation to trade and the limitations were discussed; but these things being over, the other was resumed. This act was much of the same nature and import with the act passed in England, both empowering commissioners to meet and treat of an Union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, and restraining them from treating of any alterations of the church government, as by law established, in the respective realms. The only material difference was, that the English act not only gave the queen the nomination of the commissioners on the part of England, but required also that the queen should name and appoint the Scotch commissioners; whereas, in the draught presented by the earl of Mar, there was a bias for the power of the nomination. This gave occasion to Fletcher of Salton, in a public speech, on the 28th of August, to move against the haughty and imperious proceeding of the English in this affair; exhorting the house to resent this treatment, as became Scotsmen, for which purpose he offered an Address to be presented to her majesty, importing, "That the act passed in the parliament of England, containing a proposal for a Treaty of Union of the two kingdoms, was made in such expeditious terms to the honour and interest of the Scots nation, that they, who represented that kingdom in parliament, could no ways comply with it; which they had the greater regret to refuse, because a Treaty of Union had, in this session, been recommended to them by her majesty. But that they should be always ready to comply with any such proposal from the parliament of England, whenever it should be made in terms no ways dishonourable or disadvantageous to the Scots nation." The house, rejecting this motion, called for the earl of Mar's draught, and for the English act, both which were read. The cavaliers and country party observing, that there was a great inclination in the house to set a treaty on foot, thought it improper to oppose it any longer in general terms; and therefore resolved to endeavour to clog the commission with such restrictions and provisions, as should retard the treaty taking effect. In order thereto, the duke of Hamilton presented a clause to be added to the act, importing, "That the Union to be treated on should no ways derogate from any fundamental laws, ancient privileges, offices, rights, liberties and dignities of the Scots nation." This the courtiers vigorously opposed, as inconsistent with the intended entire or incorporating Union, of which the abolishing the Scots parliament was a necessary consequence. And thereupon they urged, "That, since Scotland and England were under one sovereignty, who mediated between her two kingdoms, and England had already given ample powers to their commissioners, it would be unbecoming in Scotland to restrain their commissioners. That it would shew a jealousy of her majesty and might put a stop to the treaty, since England could not but expect, that the Scots com-

commissioners should have as ample powers as theirs. That there could be no danger in giving unlimited powers to their commissioners, since it was expressly provided, that no matter of importance should be treated of, and agreed to, should be put in force, unless it were first approved of and ratified by the parliaments of both kingdoms. And therefore when their commissioners should make their report of the scheme of union that should be agreed on, then it would be proper for the house to consider, whether they would ratify or reject the same." To this was answered, "That Scotland and England being under one sovereign made this clause necessary, since woeful experience taught them, that it had been often complained of in the course, that their sovereign was under English influence, and subject to the counsels of her English ministers, who regarded the interest and honour of Scotland no further, than was consistent with that of England. That the addition of this clause could never imply the least distrust of the queen's inclinations towards her ancient kingdom, since all that could be made it was, that the Scots parliament being sensible that the queen was not in a capacity to follow the interest and circumstances of Scotland so well as those of England, had taken care to prevent any inconveniences, that might arise from thence. That there were some things so sacred, that the least innovation or alteration, much less the abrogating or suspending them, was never to be attempted, or the subject of any treaty. And the particulars of this clause, such as the sovereignty, independency, and freedom of the nation, being of this nature, ought therefore to be added. That England could not take it amiss, since they themselves had restrained their own commissioners from treating of any alteration in the ancient government of that kingdom. That the Scots were a free independent people, and had a power to give what instructions, powers, and restrictions they pleased to their commissioners. Neither was it to be imagined, that England would refuse to treat upon account of this clause, because the very clause, in the same express words, was inserted in the act of the treaty in the reign of king James 6. and to the same purpose. in most of the subsequent acts of treaty; and yet neither that king (who could have had good reason to be offended at any disrespect or distrust shewn, towards him) or his successors, nor the parliament of England, made any scruple upon that account to meet and treat with the commissioners of Scotland." These and many other arguments were urged for and against the clause; but the question being put, whether it should be added, or not? It was carried in the negative by two voices only, through the neglect of seven or eight of the cavaliers and country-party, who happened to be absent.

This being over, another clause was offered and reported, "That the commissioners should not be sent out of Scotland, to enter into any treaty with those to be appointed for England, until there was an act passed by the parliament of England, rescinding that clause in the English act, by which it was enacted, that the subjects of Scotland should be adjudged and taken as aliens, after the 25th of December 1705." The cavaliers insisted upon this clause as necessary to vindicate the honour of the nation from the injustice of the English in that act, upon a belief, that, if it were added, the English would not comply with it, and so the treaty would come to nothing. Upon the same consideration the courtiers opposed it; but observing it took with the house, they did not presume to do it openly, but by this artful motion, "That the clause should be approved, though not, as was proposed, ingrossed with the body of the act for a treaty; but, a resolve of the house passed, that, after the act was finished the house would immediately proceed to consider, whether the clause should be of force by a particular act, or by an order of the house;" and the question being stated, "Add the clause to the act, or by a separate way," the latter was carried. By this the courtiers were sure of having a treaty; for if the clause was turned into an act at the close of the session (when they had no more to require of the parliament) they might grant the royal assent to the act of treaty, or refuse it to this, as they should be directed from England: and in case the clause was turned into an order of the house, then they might dissolve the parliament, by which means the act, empowering the commissioners to treat, remained in force, and the order ceased. Before the vote was stated, upon the act for a treaty, the duke of Athol, on the 1st of September, entered his protest in these terms: "In regard, that by an English act of parliament made in the last session thereof, intitled, An act for the effectual securing England from the several acts lately passed in Scotland, the subjects of this kingdom are to be adjudged aliens, born out of the allegiance of the queen, as queen of England, after the 25th of December, 1705: I do therefore protest for myself, and in the name and behalf of all such as shall adhere to this my protestation, that, for securing the honour and interest of her majesty, as queen of this kingdom, and maintaining and preserving the undoubted rights and privileges of her subjects, no act for a treaty with England ought to pass in this house, unless a clause be adjoined thereto prohibiting and discharging the commissioners that may be nominated and appointed for carrying on the said treaty, to depart the kingdom, in order thereto, until the said act be repealed and rescinded by the parliament of England." To this protest most of the cavaliers and country party, and all the squadron adhered, making in all twenty-four peers, thirty-seven barons, and eighteen boroughs. While the rolls were calling, upon this resolve (it being very late) many of the members, after they had given their votes, went out of the house, expecting, that the parliament would not have proceeded to any more business that night; but immediately after the last name in the roll was called, duke Hamilton, addressing himself to the chancellor, moved, that the nomination of the commissioners for the treaty should be left wholly to the queen. Upon this unexpected motion fourteen or fifteen of the cavaliers ran out of the house in rage and despair, saying aloud, "That it was to no purpose to stay any longer, since the duke of Hamilton had deserted and so basely betrayed them." However those, who remained, strenuously opposed the motion; and a hot debate arose upon it, wherein the cavaliers used the very arguments which duke Hamilton had often urged: "What! leave the nomination to the queen? No; she is in a manner a prisoner in England; and the estates of Scotland had taught us our duty in a case nearly related to this during the captivity of king James the first. Our queen knows none of us, but as introduced by her English ministry, and recommended by our inclinations to serve that kingdom. Our queen never had an opportunity to know the true interest of our country; and, though she did, yet in her present circumstances, cannot shew her regard for it: and who then so proper to nominate Scots commissioners to treat of Scots affairs as a Scots parliament?" Little or nothing was offered in answer either to these arguments, or against the motion, "That no person who had any estate in England, should be of the number of the commissioners." Which was levelled at the duke of Hamilton. But the courtiers still insisting, that the sense of the house might be known in this matter, the question was put, "Whether the nomination of the commissioners be left in the queen or to the parliament?" And by reason of the absence of the members before-mentioned, it was carried for the queen by a majority of eight voices only. Duke Hamilton's proceeding in this affair was highly resented by the cavaliers; but he endeavoured to vindicate himself by alledging, that after the parliament had rejected the several clauses, that were proposed to be added to the act, he thought it in vain to contend any longer; and since the court would have had a majority, to give the nomination to the queen, he might be allowed to make her the compliment: Besides, it was the duke's opinion that if the commissioners named by the queen should do any thing, that should not be approved in the subsequent parliament, they might be the more severely censured for it, than if the parliament had named them. But it is thought, that the duke had a mind to be one of the commissioners himself; and fearing, that he should not be named by the parliament, he resolved to rely on the duke of Argyle's and the earl of Mar's promise of his being named by the queen; who having refused to do so, the duke of Argyle resented it so far, that he would not suffer himself to be named, and even threatened to oppose the Union, though means were afterwards found to induce him to alter his mind.

In the next sitting of the parliament, on the 4th of September, two draughts of an address were presented, one by the earl of Sutherland, the other by Fletcher of Salton, beseeching her majesty to use her endeavours with the parliament of England to rescind that part of the English act, declaring the subjects of Scotland to be aliens; both which draughts were read, as was also the overture of an act, ordaining, that the commissioners on the part of Scotland should not enter upon the treaty for an Union with England, until that clause were repealed. Hereupon the courtiers moved, that the parliament should proceed by way of order to their commissioners, and by address to her majesty, and not by way of act: and, after some debate, the question being put, was carried for the Order and Address, which was immediately drawn up, and unanimously agreed to. Then an overture of an act, was presented, discharging the peers of Scotland from going into England, without leave of the parliament-council; but on the 6th of September, after a first reading of this overture, it was rejected. After this, the house considered the act for a treaty with England, and made some amendments to the clause containing the powers to be given to the commissioners. The cavaliers took this occasion to renew the motion, "That the Union should not derogate from any fundamental laws, ancient privileges, offices, rights and dignities, and liberties of the kingdom of Scotland;" but, after some debate the question being put, whether that clause should be added, it was carried in the negative, and then the act was approved, and received the royal assent. However the duke of Argyll protested against it, for the reasons contained in his former protest, and was adhered to by 30 noblemen, 33 barons and 18 boroughs.

Sept. 23. The act for granting the queen a supply of six months cess, amounting to 438,800*l.* (Scots money) for maintaining the army, garrisons, and frigates for one year, was approved. On the 18th the house went upon the public accounts, and allowed to the commissioners of the same 200*l.* sterling each; 50*l.* to the clerk and 30*l.* to other servants; 1,500*l.* to the lord Belhaven; 300*l.* to the duke of Queensberry, and 3,000*l.* to the duke of Argyle, as being due to him; which sums were paid out of the 50,000*l.* sterling granted to the queen.

After this the parliament was adjourned on the 20th of December following.

A.D. 1706.

PROCEEDINGS in the SCOTS PARLIAMENT relating to the UNION with ENGLAND.

The Commissioners of both kingdoms having prepared a complete scheme of an act

* "Her Majesty's ministers were not insensible of the difficulties which they had to

tion between the two nations, some particulars being only referred, to be settled by their respective parliaments; when every thing was entered in the affair of the Union, against which, the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, the marquis of Annandale, the earls of Errol, Archeschal, and Buchan, the lord Belhaven, Mr. Fletcher of Salton, and some others, had formed a powerful party. The Commissioners of the shires and boroughs were almost equally divided, though, it was evident, they were to be the chief gainers by it. Amongst the Union was agreed to by a very small majority. It was the nobility, that in every respect turned the scale for the Union: they were severely reflected upon by those who opposed it; and it was said many of them were light off, to sell their country and their birthright. All those who adhered inflexibly to the cobite interest, opposed every step that was made with great vehemence, for they saw that the Union struck at the root of all their designs for a new revolution. Yet all these could not be raised or maintained so great an opposition as was made if they had not prepossessed with fears and jealousies the minds of many among the Presbyterian clergy, who had the greatest ascendant over the generality of the people in Scotland. Among other indications of its temper of the Scots ministers at this critical juncture, it was taken notice, that, some days before the meeting of the parliament, one of the duke Hamilton's chaplains proposed in the general assembly of the clergy, 'That, before an affair of so great importance, as the Union of the two kingdoms, they ought to enter into an association for the preservation of the Presbyterian discipline, if the treaty concluded by the Commissioners of both kingdoms was ratified by the respective parliaments.' Another minister proposed, 'That a day of fasting and humiliation should be appointed to seek the Lord for counsel in this arduous affair and time of danger.' But these two motions were rejected by the majority of voices. These jealousies of the Presbyterians, lest their church should suffer a change, and be swallowed up by the church of England, were infused into them chiefly by the old dutchess of Hamilton, who had great credit with them: and it was suggested, that she and her son had particular views, as hoping, that, if Scotland should continue a separate kingdom, the crown might come into their family, they being the next in blood after king James's posterity. The infusion of such apprehensions had a great effect on the main body of that party, who could scarce be brought to hearken on, but never to accept of, the offers that were made for securing their Presbyterian government. On the other hand, a great part of the nobility of Scotland, who had been often in England, and had observed the protection, which all men had from a house of commons, and the security which it procured against partial judges and a violent ministry, entered into the Union agreed to, they presented one copy of the Treaty to the Queen, and each side had a copy, to be presented to their respective parliaments, with great zeal. The opening a free trade, not only with England, but with the plantations, and the protection of the fleet of England, drew in those, who understood these matters, and saw there was no other way in view, to make the nation rich and considerable. Those who had engaged far into the design of Darien, and were great losers by it, saw now an honourable way to be reimbursed; which made them wish well to the Union, and promote it. But that, which advanced it most effectually, and without which it could not have succeeded, was, that a considerable number of noblemen and gentlemen, who were in no engagements with the court (on the contrary, had been obliged and turned out of great posts, and some very lately) declared for it. These kept themselves very close and united, and seemed to have no other interest but that of their country, and were for that reason called the Squadrone. The chief of these were the marquis of Tweeddale, the earls of Rothes, Roxburgh, Haddington, and Marchmont. They were in great credit, because they had no visible bias on their minds. Ill usage had provoked them rather to oppose the ministry, than to concur in any thing, where the chief honour would be carried away by others. When they were spoken to by the ministry, they answered coldly, and with great reserve; so that it was expected they would have concurred in the opposition; and, they being between twenty and thirty in number, if they had set themselves against the Union, the design must have miscarried. But they continued silent, till the first division of the house obliged them to declare; and then they not only joined in it, but promoted it effectually and with zeal.

"There were great and long debates managed on the side of the Union by the earls of Seafield and Stair for the ministry, and of the Squadrone by the earls of Roxburgh and Marchmont; and against it by the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, and the marquis of Annandale. The duke of Athol was believed to be in a foreign correspondence, and was much set on violent methods. The duke of Hamilton managed the debate with great vehemence, but was against all desperate notions. He had much to lose, and was resolved not to venture all with those, who suggested the necessity of running, in the old Scots way, into extremities.

"The topics from which the arguments against the Union were drawn, were the antiquity and dignity of their kingdom, which was offered to be given up, and sold: They were departing from an independent state, and going to sink into a dependency on England; what conditions soever might be now speciously offered, as a security to them, they could not expect that they should be adhered to, or religiously maintained in a parliament, where 16 peers and 45 commons could not hold the

all the three copies being signed by the commissioners of both kingdoms: It was resolved to lay the matter first before the parliament of Scotland; because it was apprehended it would meet with the greatest opposition there. Accordingly when the Scots parliament met, balance against above an hundred peers and 513 commoners. Scotland would be no more considered as formerly by foreign princes and states: their peers would be precarious and elective: they magnified their crown with the other regalia so much, that, since the nation seemed resolved never to suffer them to be carried away, it was provided, in a new clause added to the articles, that these should still remain within the kingdom. They insisted most vehemently on the danger, that the constitution of their church must be in, when all should be under the power of a British parliament: this was pressed with fury by some, who were known to be most violent enemies to Presbytery, of any in that nation: but it was done on design, to inflame that body of men by those apprehensions, and so to engage them to persist in their opposition. To allay that heat, after the general vote was carried for the Union, before they entered on the consideration of the particular articles, an act was prepared for securing the Presbyterian government: by which it was declared to be the only government of that church, unalterable in all succeeding times, and the maintaining it was declared to be a fundamental and essential article and condition of the Union; and this act was to be made a part of the act for the Union, which, in the consequence of that, was to be ratified by another act of parliament in England. Thus those, who were the greatest enemies to Presbytery, of any in the nation, raised the clamour of the danger that form of government would be in, if the Union went on, to such a height, that by their means this act was carried, as far as any human law could go, for their security: for, by this, they had, not only all the security that their own parliament could give them, but they were to have the faith and authority of the parliament of England, it being, in the stipulation, made an essential condition of the Union: the carrying this matter so far was done, in hopes that the parliament of England would never be brought to pass it. This act was passed, and it gave an intire satisfaction to those who were disposed to receive any; but nothing could satisfy men, who made use of this, only to inflame others.

“The party, who opposed the Union, finding the majority against them, studied to raise a storm without doors, to terrify them. A set of addresses against the Union were sent round all the countries, in which those, who opposed it, had any interest. There came up many of these in the name of counties and boroughs, and at last from parishes. This made some noise abroad, but was very little considered there, when it was known, by whose arts and practices they were procured. When this appeared to have little effect, pains were taken to animate the rabble to violent attempts, both at Edinburgh and at Glasgow. About two or three thousand commoners came in arms to Dumfries, and publicly burnt the articles of Union, and affixed on the market-cross a declaration of their reasons for so doing. Patrick Johnston, lord provost of Edinburgh, had been one of the commissioners, and concurred heartily in the design. A great multitude gathered about the house, and were forcing the doors, on design, as was believed, to murder him; but guards came and dispersed them. Upon this attempt, the privy-council published a proclamation, the next day, against tumults, and gave orders for quartering the guards within the town. But, to shew that this was not intended to overawe the parliament, the whole matter was laid before them, and the proceedings of the privy-council were approved. Although no person of distinction appeared among the rioters, yet it was no difficult matter to guess from what quarter that disturbance came, since, at the same time, that they insulted the High Commissioner, and other well-wishers to the Union, they attended the duke of Hamilton with loud acclamations, as he passed the streets to and from the parliament. However, no other considerable attempt was made after this; but the body of the people shewed so much sullessness, that probably had any person of authority once kindled to fire, they seemed to be of such combustible matter, that the Union might have cast the nation into great convulsions. These things made great impressions upon the duke of Queensberry and on some about him. He despaired of succeeding, and he apprehended that his person might be in danger. A friend of his wrote to the lord-treasurer Godolphin, representing the ill temper the nation was generally in, and moved for an adjournment, that so, with the help of some time and good management, those difficulties, that seemed insuperable, might be conquered. The Lord-Treasurer's answer was, that a delay was upon the matter, laying the whole design aside. Orders were given both in England and Ireland to have troops ready upon call; and, if it were necessary, more forces should be ordered from Flanders. The French were in no condition to send any assistance to those, who might break out: so that the circumstances of the time were favourable. The lord Godolphin desired therefore, that they would go on, and not be alarmed at the foolish behaviour of some, who, whatever might be given out in their name, he believed, had more wit than to ruin themselves. Every step that was made, and every vote that was carried, was with the same strength, and met with the same opposition: both parties giving strict attendance during the whole session, which lasted three months. Many protestations were printed, with every man's vote. In conclusion, the whole articles of the treaty were agreed to, with some small variations.

ie 3d of October 1706, his grace James duke of Queensberry, her majesty's High Commissioner, went to the parliament house, attended by most of the nobility, barons and members of parliament, where his grace's commission was read and recorded as usual.

The Queen's Letter to the Scotch Parliament.] After which, her majesty's letter to the parliament was read as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen: Since your last meeting, we did nominate Commissioners to treat of an Union between our two kingdoms of Scotland and England, and by their great care and diligence, a Treaty is happily concluded and laid before us.—We have called you together as soon as our affairs could permit, that the Treaty may be under your consideration, in pursuance of the act made in the last session of our parliament there; and we hope the terms will be acceptable to you.—The Union has been long desired by both nations, and we shall esteem it the greatest glory of our reign to have it now perfected, being fully persuaded, that it must prove the greatest happiness of our people.—An entire and perfect Union will be the solid foundation of lasting peace: it will secure your religion, liberty and property, remove the animosities among yourselves, and the jealousies and differences between our own two kingdoms: it must increase our strength, riches, and trade: and by this Union the whole island, being joined in affection, and free from all apprehension of different interests, will be enabled to resist all its enemies, support the protestant interest every where, and maintain the liberties of Europe.—We do upon this occasion renew the assurances we have formerly given you, of our resolution to maintain the government of the church, as by law established in Scotland, and he acts of both parliaments, upon which this Treaty proceeded, having reserved their respective governments of the church in each kingdom; the commissioners have left that matter entire; and you have now an opportunity for doing what may be necessary for securing of your present church government, after the Union, within the limits of Scotland.—

The support of our government, and your own safety does require, that you do make necessary provision for maintaining the forces, ships and garrisons, until the parliament of Great Britain shall provide for these ends in the united kingdom.—We have made choice of our trusty and right entirely beloved cousin and counsellor, James duke of Queensberry, to be our commissioner, and represent our royal person, being well satisfied with his fitness for that

"The earl of Stair, who had all along exerted himself with great zeal in favour of the Union, and who, though much indisposed, came on the 7th of January to the parliament house, and maintained the debate upon the 22d article, died suddenly the next night, his spirits being quite exhausted by the length and vehemence of the debates." trust, from experience we have of his capacity, zeal and fidelity to our service, and the good of his country; which, as it has determined us in the choice, we doubt not but will make him acceptable to you.

"My Lords and Gentlemen: It cannot but be an encouragement to you to finish the Union at this time, that God Almighty has blessed our arms, and those of our allies, with so great success, which gives us the nearer prospect of a happy peace, and with it you will have the full possession of all the advantages of this Union; and you have no reason to doubt but the parliament of England will do what is necessary on their part, after the readiness they have shewn to remove what might obstruct the entering on the Treaty. We most earnestly recommend to you calmness and unanimity, in this great and weighty affair, that the Union may be brought to a happy conclusion, being the only effectual way to secure your present and future happiness, and to disappoint the designs of our and your enemies, who will, doubtless, on this occasion, use their utmost endeavours to prevent or delay this Union, which must so much contribute to our glory, and the happiness of our people: and so we bid you heartily farewell.—Given at our court at Windsor castle, the thirty first day of July, 1706; and of our reign the fifth year."

The Lord High Commissioner's Speech.] The Letter being read, his grace the duke of Queensberry, her majesty's High Commissioner, spoke as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen: Her majesty, by her gracious letter, has acquainted you, that the Treaty of Union between the kingdoms of Scotland and England (pursuant to an act made in your last session) has been happily agreed on, which is now in my lord register's hands, ready to be laid before you.—The lords commissioners for this kingdom have been diligent and zealous in concerting just and reasonable terms; and it must be acknowledged, we meet with a very fair and friendly disposition in the lords commissioners on the other part.—The Treaty has, with all humility, been presented to the queen, and was most graciously received; and though no reign was ever so truly great, for wise and steady councils, and so many important successes, as that of her majesty, yet, you see, she is pleased to esteem the perfecting of this Union, as the greatest glory of her reign, being the most solid foundation of a lasting security to the Protestant religion, and the liberties of Europe, and of peace and happiness to her people.—These reasons, I doubt not, will make the Treaty acceptable to you; and I persuade myself that you will proceed with such calmness and impartiality, as the weight of the subject requires, and as becomes so great an assembly.—The lords commissioners for both kingdoms were limited in matter of church government; for the security of Presbyterian government in this church, you have the laws already made for its establishment, the queen's repented assurances to preserve it, and I am empowered to consent to what may be farther necessary after the Union.—Her majesty has been pleased to recommend to you to make provision for the forces, ships, and garrisons, which is very necessary, the subsidies granted at your last meeting being run out; so I doubt not but you will speedily renew them.—My Lords and Gentlemen: I am not insensible of the great difficulties that attend the weighty character, it has pleased her majesty to honour me with, but with your assistance, upon which I very much rely, I hope, by my zeal, and fidelity for her majesty's service, and the good of my country, which are inseparable, to discharge my duty on this extraordinary occasion."

"My Lords and Gentlemen; It hath been, and is the greatest happiness of this nation, that the queen our sovereign, hath always made it the chief design of her reign, to protect her subjects in the enjoyment of all their rights and privileges, to promote their good, and to establish their peace and prosperity upon sure and lasting foundations.—For these ends, her majesty, in her most gracious letter, doth, with great earnestness, recommend to you the concluding of the Union of the two kingdoms, and has plainly and fully laid before you the great advantages that this Union must bring with it to all Britain, and in particular to this kingdom.—The lords commissioners named by her majesty for this kingdom, to treat of this Union, have endeavoured to discharge this great trust with all fidelity, and have agreed to such terms and conditions as I hope shall be found just, honourable and advantageous; The Treaty has been already received very graciously by her majesty, and is now ready to be reported to you, for your consideration.—I do not think it proper, at this time, to descend into the particular Articles of this Treaty; I shall only beg leave to say in general, that it must be of great advantage to have this whole island united under one government, and conjoined entirely in interest and affection, having equality of all rights and privileges, with a free communication and intercourse of trade, which must certainly establish our security, augment our strength, and increase our trade and riches.—We can never expect a more favourable juncture for completing this Union, than at present, when her majesty has not only recommended it, but declared, that she will esteem it the greatest glory of her reign, to have it perfected; and when the parliament of England has shewn its inclination for it, by removing all those obstacles that did lie in the way of the Treaty: and it must also be acknowledged, that the lords commissioners for England did testify their good disposition all along in this affair; and the great and glorious successes wherewith God has blessed her majesty's arms, and those of her allies, give us the hope of a near and advantageous peace, whereby we will be put in the possession, and attain to the full enjoyment of all the liberties and privileges of trade, now offered by the Treaty.—The commissioners of both sides have only treated of such things as concern the civil government, liberties, privileges, trade, and taxes; but found themselves limited as to the church government, that being reserved to each kingdom by the respective acts of parliament, upon which the Treaty proceeded: and you have now not only the laws already made, with her majesty's most gracious, repeated assurance, for maintaining and continuing Presbyterian church government within this kingdom: but this further opportunity of making such conditions and provisions, as shall be found necessary for its security, after the conclusion of this Union, within the limits of Scotland.—Her majesty recommends to you, to provide the necessary supplies for the troops, garrisons and ships: the funds formerly given, are expired; and therefore I doubt not but you will easily comply with what is so plainly necessary, for the preservation of the public safety, and preventing the designs of enemies now in time of war.—Since we have now the opportunity of establishing for ourselves and our posterity, by this Union with England, all that concerns religion and liberties, together with the most valuable privileges of trade, I am hopeful that you will proceed to the consideration of the Articles of the Treaty, in such manner as shall bring it to the desired conclusion; and it cannot but tend to the lasting honour of this session of parliament, to have so happily finished this most important and weighty matter."

Proceedings about the Union.] Oct. 12. It was moved, That the Articles of the Union, carried on by the Commissioners of both kingdoms, should be read, as also the minutes of the said Commissioners. And they ordered that all records, relating to former treaties between both kingdoms, should be laid before the house; and that in the intervals of parliament, they should be seen in the lower parliament, where some of the lord Register's servants were to attend. And the Articles of Union being accordingly read again, it was agreed, that the parliament should proceed to the consideration of them.

Oct. 15. When they debated the vote of the 12th, to proceed the Articles of the Union, or delay: the country party argued for a delay: but being put to the vote, it was carried proceeed, Yeas 116, Noes 52; so that it was carried by 64.

Oct. 16. They read the first eight Articles of the Treaty, and the proceedings of the Commissioners relating to them: and on the 19th, the 1Xth, Xth, XIth, XIIth, XIIIth, and XIVth, were all severally read, with the proceedings of the Commissioners in the Treaty relating to them: and were all discussed on. Then the XVth Article was read, with the proceedings relating to it: and after some reasoning, there arose a debate about the calculation

the sums therein mentioned; which was adjourned till the next meeting. The calculations debated, were about the equivalent of 8,080*l.* 10*s.* to be granted to Scotland, for bringing into several customs, now payable in England, and applicable towards payment of the debts of England, contracted before the Union; according to the proportions which the present customs in Scotland, being 30,000*l.* per annum, did bear to the customs in England, computed at 1,351,559*l.* per annum; and which the present excise in Scotland, being 5,500*l.* per annum, bears to the excise in England, computed at 947,602*l.* per annum.

Oct. 22. The debate about the calculation of the Equivalent of 398,085*l.* 10*s.* was resumed; and after some time spent upon it, it was agreed to name a Committee of three persons from each State, to proceed and examine the said calculation, and to report the same to the Parliament. Then several paragraphs of the Vth Article were read again, and further argued on. The XVIth and XVIIth Articles were also read; and with the proceedings of the Commissioners relating to them, were also argued upon. So was the XVIIIth Article, and the proceedings relating to it, and after some discourse upon it, the further consideration of this article was delayed till the next sitting; the same day several members spoke to equivalent and trade in general, and that of the African company in particular: upon the latter, there were two motions made, one, that the parliament should insist upon a compensation of all the losses the Darien company had sustained, since those losses were occasioned by the undue intermeddling of England, as appeared by former votes of the Parliament of Scotland. The other was, that being the equivalent to be given to the proprietors of the African company, was not to be paid by England, but out of the Scots customs and excise, and therefore the property of that company ought to belong to the kingdom of Scotland, as a national company, and not to be abandoned until the nation saw a proper occasion, and an adequate price for it. Both these motions, and several others of the like sort, were laid upon the table, to be considered when the Articles to which they related were taken into consideration.

Oct. 23. The XVIIIth article of the Union was again read, when it was moved, that the English laws concerning the regulation of trade, &c. to which Scotland, by virtue of the treaty, was liable, be printed. Moved also, that the English book of rates, with thebridgment of the laws relating thereunto, be printed. Moved also, that it be remitted to a committee of parliament, to cause such of the said laws to be printed as they shall see just, or to report to the parliament. And after some debate upon it, the further consideration of it was delayed till the next sitting.

The Lauder Instructions read.] Oct. 29. The day that the XIXth, XXth, and XXIst

Articles were read and debated, and that the XXIIId and XXIIIrd was read, a Print was delivered to all the members as they entered the house, which ran in these words:

“INSTRUCTIONS by the Magistrates and Town Council of the Burgh of Lauder, to their Commissioner in Parliament, in relation to the Union proposed betwixt the Kingdoms of Scotland and England.

“At Lauder the 23d day of October, 1706 years, the which day the bailiffs and town-council of the burgh of Lauder, being convened in council within the Tolbooth of the said burgh, having received a letter directed to them from the right honourable sir Samuel Macklellan, lord provost of Edinburgh, dated the 15th day of October instant, calling and indicting a general convention of the royal boroughs, to be holden and to sit at Edinburgh upon the 29th day of this instant October, and intreating to send a commissioner to the said convention, fully instructed, in relation to the Union proposed betwixt the kingdoms of Scotland and England, &c. as the said letter bears. And the said letter, with the articles of the said proposed Union, being both verbatim publicly read, in presence of the bailiffs and council and all the other burghesses, inhabitants of the said burgh, allowed by the bailiffs and council in this so great concern, to be there present, and to give their opinions. It was unanimously agreed to by the bailiffs and council, with consent of their neighbouring burghesses, that sir David Cunningham of Milncraig, knight and baronet, and their commissioner and representative in this present parliament, should be their commissioner in the foresaid general convention of boroughs, in the terms of their commission of the date hereof. And being fully convinced, that albeit their commission for representing them in this current parliament, be conceived in the most full and ample terms imaginable, yet the same can never empower him to act or vote any thing which may tend to the impairing or subverting, or altering any manner of way his constituents constitution, rights or privileges, without their particular and unanimous consent given him for that effect. And having likewise seriously considered the several and particular Articles of the said proposed Union, and that they look upon themselves as bound in duty, at this time, to give their opinion in relation to the Union proposed, do therefore unanimously give it as their humble opinion, That the devolving the powers of the Scots parliament into the hands of a small number of lords, barons and boroughs, allowed by the said proposed Articles to sit and vote with the whole Lords and Commons of England, in a parliament to be called the parliament of Great Britain, is dishonourable and prejudicial to the kingdom of Scotland, tending to the destruction of their ancient constitution, and all their rights and privileges, as a free people in general, and to every individual person and society within the same, especially that of the boroughs.

"Therefore, unless it shall be first agreed to in this present parliament, or any other before the said Union, that the Scots parliament shall continue in all time hereafter as formerly, and the laws and subjects of Scotland shall be only subjected to the wisdom of a Scots parliament, constituted according to the laws of the said kingdom: The said bailiffs and council, with consent of their burgesses, have empowered, authorized and required, and hereby empower, authorise and require the said sir David Cunningham, their commissioner in this present parliament for them, and in their names and behalf, in open and plain parliament, by his vote to dissent to, and disapprove of all and every one of the Articles of the said proposed Union. And in case the said sir David shall not follow and obey these our instructions, we protest, that his vote in the contrary thereof is null, being not only contrary to his constituents their instructions, but likewise tending to the impairing and subverting of their constitution and privileges: but in case it shall be first agreed to, by this or any succeeding parliament, that this and the succeeding parliament shall continue as formerly, we then promise to give him, or any other our commissioner for the time, our particular instructions, as to the other several Articles of the said proposed Union. And that this our opinion and proceedings may be made known to our brethren the other royal boroughs, we have ordained these presents to be publicly printed and dispersed among them. In testimony whereof the said sir David Cunningham's commission to the royal boroughs, and these his instructions to the parliament, being subscribed by the bailiffs in presence of, and at the command of the council, are extracted forth of the town-court books of the borough of Lauder, by Mark Henderson, common clerk of the same, and the common seal of the said burgh is hereunto affixed.

"Sic subscribitur, M. HENDERSON, Clerk."

The same day, Mr. Fletcher of Salton took the freedom to say in parliament, that the interest and honour of the nation was betrayed by their Commissioners. This occasioned a great heat in the house, and it was demanded that he should be called to the bar; upon which several members of all ranks stood up to vindicate what he had said: and after a long debate it was proposed, that he should explain himself. The explanation which he gave was to this effect, that he could find no other name but treachery to the acting of those gentlemen: he did indeed acknowledge that the word was harsh, but it was truth; and if the house thought he had committed any offence by the expression, he was willing to submit to their censure; upon which the debate was let fall.

When the Articles about the number of Scots Lords and Commons, that were to be admitted to the parliament of Great Britain, and the proceedings of the commissioners relating to the same, were read, there were sharp Speeches on both sides, particularly betwixt the marquis of Annandale, and earl of Stair, by Mr. Fletcher of Salton, the lord justice clerk, and sir A. Home. And the duke of Hamilton concluded with one, wherein many doubts were proposed about the quota of the Scots Lords and Commons, and the yielding the precedence of the Scots peers, to all the English of the same rank: to which no answer was given, nor any vote proposed that night, so that they adjourned.

It must be owned that those who opposed the Union, left no stone unturned to carry their point; they and their emissaries talked of addresses from all the corners of the kingdom against the present scheme, wherein they pretended not to be against an Union, but against the terms, as proposed in the present Article; so that many of the traders, who at first seemed fond of it, now imbibed other notions, and pamphlets were spread about to persuade the Presbyterians, that this scheme was contrary to their national and solemn league and covenant, and that by the sacramental test, which was established in England, they would be excluded from all public posts in the government of Great Britain: and others pretended to assure them, that if they made the repeal of that test a condition for the Union, it would be complied with in England.

The parliament having read the XXIVth and XXVth, being the two last Articles, on the 30th, they adjourned to November 1st.

Several Petitions against the Union read.
The parliament went through the first reading of the Articles of the Union, last month, and on the 1st of November it was moved, that they should then proceed to the further and more particular consideration of the Articles of Union, in order to approve or not, and to begin with, and read the first Article. Moved also, that the further consideration of the Articles of the Union should be delayed for some considerable time, till the sentiments of the parliament of England concerning it be known; and that the members of parliament might consult those whom they represented. And after some debate on those motions, several Petitions and Addresses were presented, viz. One in the name of the barons, freeholders, and others, within the Shire of Midlothian: Another in name of the barons, freeholders and others within the Shire of Linlithgow: and three, in name of the barons and freeholders of Perth-shire: all against allowing of an incorporating Union with England; and read and discoursed on. And thereafter the debate for delay, on account of those whom the members represented, and of knowing the sentiments of the nation, and the procedure of the parliament of England, was let fall, and agreed that the first Article of the Union should be read; but that it should be entire next berunt of parliaments to debate whether or the first Article should be concluded, by proving thereof, or not. Or if the parliament ought not, before concluding thereof, begin and conclude any other of the Articles.

And accordingly the first Article was read.
The rest of the day was spent in reading and reasoning on the Addresses; the country party opined, that the Union was a matter of so great and general concern, that it was not to be gone into with precipitation, and that there were many more addresses coming, by which they would see the inclinations of the country, and of their constituents. After this several other proposals were offered as preliminaries, before they should enter upon the treaty; one of which was, that this kingdom should for ever be the place of the prince's education and residence; then there was a debate, whether they should proceed immediately to the consideration of the first Article of the Treaty, or the security of the Kirk. This lasted till the next day, and then the parliament was adjourned the next day, when accordingly they met, and had a very warm debate, whether they should secure the Kirk, or enter on the first Article. Much time being spent in this, the Lord Register gave in a resolve as the state of the vote, that they should enter on the Article; but with this proviso, that though it could be voted and approved, it should be no ways binding, except all the rest were consented to. In opposition to this, it was proposed, that the state of the vote should be applied, enter on the Article, or first secure the Kirk. A great many spoke for both states of the vote; but being put to the question, the Lord Register's was carried by a majority of 38, and then approved by a greater number.
Nov. 2. During the debate, whether the security of the Kirk, or the first Article for uniting the two nations into one kingdom, under the name of Great Britain, should have the preference; it was urged, that according to the laudable custom of this kingdom, as appears by their ancient Acts of parliament, the Kirk had always the preference to every thing else. But a lord, when he found that the first Articles of the Treaty had the preference, alluding, with respect to some who were of the opposite side, to Julius Caesar's saying in the Senate, Et vos iam mei Filii? And are you also against me my sons? There had been endeavours likewise used in the commission of the general assembly, to possess them with apprehensions of the danger of the Kirk, from twenty-six bishops speaking in the parliament of Great Britain, where the Kirk could have none to represent it, from the English sacramental test, and for the oath of abjuration, by which they must approve that part of the limitations, which obliged the sovereign to be of the church of England, &c. Notwithstanding all which, it was criminated, by the law of England, to say, the prince and parliament had no power to alter the succession. Upon which they would have carried resolutions, in the commission, against an incorporating Union, but were prevented by the ruling elders. And in order to make the Kirk easy, there were some who promised, that when the Article for an incorporating Union passed, they should have an irritant clause to make the Union void, in case the parliament of Great Britain should in time to come, alter the present government of the Kirk of Scotland. However, many of the ministers and zealous Presbyterians expressed their displeasure, that the security of the Kirk had not the preference.

Mr. Seton's Speech.] After this there were several long and smart Speeches. Mr. Seton, of Pitmaden, spoke thus:
"My Lord Chancellor; This honourable house has heard the several Articles of the Treaty of Union twice read, has spent a considerable time in discoursing to each of them, and, after much debate, is come to examine and determine upon the first. Notwithstanding all the arguments offered against it, I cannot find the least motive for altering the opinion I had at signing this Article, having had the honour to be one of the commissioners appointed by her majesty for that end; but that I may give all satisfaction to every member,
I shall humbly offer, in a plain manner, my thoughts in relation to it.—My Lord, this Article is the foundation of the whole Treaty, and the approving or rejecting it must determine Union or no Union betwixt both kingdoms.—
How far the approving this Article conduces to our happiness, appears evidently, by considering the three different ways proposed for retrieving the languishing condition of this nation; which are, that we continue under the same sovereign with England, with limitations on his prerogative as king of Scotland; that the two kingdoms be incorporated into one; or that they be entirely separated.—
That the Union of Crowns with limitations on the successor is not sufficient to rectify the bad state of this nation, appears from these positions founded on reason and experience.—
Two kingdoms subject to one sovereign, having different interests, the nearer these are one to another, the greater jealousy and emulation will be betwixt them.—Every monarch, having two or more kingdoms, will be obliged to prefer the counsel and interest of the stronger to that of the weaker: and the greater disparity of power and riches there is betwixt these kingdoms, the greater influence the more powerful nation will have on the sovereign. Notwithstanding these positions, I shall suppose the parliament of Scotland is vested with the power of making peace and war, of rewarding and punishing persons of all ranks, of levying troops, and of the negative itself.—I could shew the inconveniences that must attend such a state of government, in disposal of places, and managing public affairs. I could likewise shew the improbability of attaining such conditions, or keeping them if attained. But laying aside such considerations, my humble opinion is, that we cannot reap any benefit from these conditions of government, without the assistance of England; and the people thereof will never be convinced to promote the interest of Scotland, till both kingdoms are incorporated into one: so that I conceive such a state of limitations to be no better for Scotland, than if it were entirely separated from England; in which state there is little appearance of procuring any remedy to our present circumstances, which appears from these uncontroverted positions:—The people and government of Scotland must be richer or poorer, as they have plenty or scarcity of money, the common measure of trade.—No money or things of value can be purchased in the course of commerce, but where there is a force to protect it.—This nation is behind all other nations of Europe, for many years, with respect to the effects of an extended trade.—This nation being poor, and without force to protect its commerce, cannot reap great advantages by it, till it partake of the trade and protection of some powerful neighbour nation, that can communicate both these.—To illustrate this last position, I shall give a short view of the state of commerce we must needs be in, with respect to our neighbour nations, supposing an entire separation from England.—The ordinary mean whereby we can flourish in wealth, is, that balance which arises from the exchange of our natural or artificial product with other places: but we have no valuable branch of export, which does not interfere with the like commodity, in some more powerful neighbour nation, whose interest it is to suppress or discourage our commodity, for raising the value of its own; so that there is no demonstrable security for the vent and encouragement of any branch of our export.—Can it be expected, that Holland will suffer us to improve our fishery, which is to them a nursery for seamen, a livelihood to many families, and an immense treasure to the public.—If we traffic with England, our linen cloth, cattle, and coals will be discouraged, at least after the same manner that we discourage export from thence. If we traffic with Muscovy, Sweden, Denmark, Poland, Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, the sale of our commodities will be of small value in those places; seeing the Dutch or English, by their increase of trade, are capable to serve them with most of the like goods cheaper and better than we.—Let us look to any other part of the world for vent to our product, and we will find other nations have prevented us.—If we attempt the East-India trade, that is already enhanced by the Dutch, English, French, Spaniards, or Portuguese, from whom we must expect opposition, they themselves opposing one another daily; and we of no force to debate the same with the most inconsiderable of them.—The trade of Africa, is for the most part, of small value; and every province of America is claimed as property, by some powerful European nation.—If it be said, that Scotland may make alliance with one of its neighbour nations for protection; that alliance must be with Holland, England or France. Other countries being so remote or poor, that their friendships can be of little use to us.—With Holland we can have no advantageous alliance, because its chief branch of trade is the same with ours; with the English we can expect no profitable friendship, for being our near neighbours, will be jealous of our increase in power; and from France its advantages can be reaped, till the old offensive and defensive league be revived betwixt France and Scotland, which would give umbrage to the English, and occasion a war betwixt them and us. And allowing the Scots, in such a juncture, with the assistance of France to conquer England; Scotland, by that conquest, could not hope to better its present state; for it is more than probable, the conqueror would make his residence in England, as formerly the northern people used to do in their southern expeditions.—From these considerations, I conceive, that this nation, by an entire separation from England, cannot extend its trade, as to raise its power in proportion to a trafficking nations in Europe; but that being we may be in danger of returning to that Gothic constitution of government, wherein our forefathers were, which was frequently attended with feuds, murders, depredations and rebellions.—My Lord, I am sorry, that, in place of things, we amuse ourselves with words; for my part, I comprehend no durable Union betwixt Scotland and England, but that expressed in this Article by one kingdom, that is to say, one people, one civil government, and one interest.—It is true, the words, Federal Union, are become very fashionable, and may be handsomely fitted to delude onthinking people, but if any member of this house will give himself the trouble to examine what conditions or articles are understood by these words, and reduce them into any kind of federal compact, whereby distinct nations have been united, I will presume to say, these will be found impracticable, or of very little use to us.—But to put that matter in a clear light, these questions ought to be daily examined, Whether a Federal Union be practicable betwixt two nations accustomed to a monarchical government? Whether there can be any sure guaranty projected for the observance of the articles of a federal compact, stipulated betwixt two nations, whereof the one is much superior to the other in riches, numbers of people, and an extended commerce? Whether the advantages of a Federal Union do balance its disadvantages? Whether the English will accept a Federal Union, supposing it to be for the true interest of both nations? Whether any federal compact betwixt Scotland and England, is sufficient to secure the peace of this island, or fortify it against the intrigues and invasions of its foreign enemies? and, Whether England, in prudence, ought to communicate its trade and protection to this nation, till both kingdoms are incorporated into one?—To clear this last query, I shall offer a remark from history.—On two independent and distinct kingdoms, united by a federal compact, under one sovereign-weaker, to preserve its interest, has sometimes separated from the stronger, unless pressed by open force, or secret influence on government.—Spain and Portugal were subject to the same sovereign, Philip 2, and, withstanding the Portuguese got most advantageous conditions from Spain, they never found a favourable opportunity in the reign of Philip 4, than they revolted from their allegiance, and elected the duke of Braganza their king.—Sweden and Denmark were united by a federal compact under one monarch; but the Swedes judging a separation more for their interest, broke off, and chose Charles 1, for their king.—My lord, I should not consider an incorporating Union, as it is expressed in this Article by one kingdom; but as I may not take up the time of the house, I shall only give one historical remark with relation to it.—Two or more distinct kingdoms or states, by incorporating into one kingdom, are continued under the same sovereign, enjoy equally the protection of his government, and every part of the body politic, though never far removed from the seat of government, flourish in wealth, in proportion to the fertility of its natural product, or the industry of its inhabitants.—To prove this remark, there are many examples.—Spain was formerly divided into several kingdoms, ten whereof are incorporated into the one kingdom of Spain.—France was formerly divided into twelve states, which are incorporated into the one kingdom of France.—England was formerly divided into seven kingdoms, which are incorporated into the one kingdom of England; Scotland itself was formerly divided into two kingdoms, which are now present are incorporated into the one kingdom of Scotland.—I could give some account of the particular advantages we will obtain by an incorporating Union with England; but there will be occasions to discourse of these, as the other Articles fall under the consideration of this parliament. In general, I may assert, that by this Union, we will have access to all the advantages in commerce the English enjoy: we will be capable, by a good government, to improve our national product, for the benefit of the whole island; and we will preserve our liberty, property, and religion, secured under the protection of one sovereign, and one parliament of Great Britain.—Now, my Lord, if limitations on the successor can be of little or no use to us; if an entire separation from England brings no advantage to this nation; and if all federal contracts, as we are stated, have insuperable difficulties, which in some measure I have cleared, there is but one of two left to our choice, to wit, That both kingdoms be united into one, or that we continue under the same sovereign with England, as we have done these hundred years past. This last I conceive to be a very ill state; for by it (if experience be convincing) we cannot expect any of the advantages of an incorporating Union: but on the contrair, our sovereignty and independency will be eclipsed; the number of our nobility will increase; our commons will be oppressed; our parliaments will be influenced by England; the execution of our laws will be neglected; our peace will be interrupted by factions for places and pensions; luxury, together with poverty (though strange) will invade us; numbers of Scots will withdraw themselves to foreign countries; and all the other effects of bad government must necessarily attend us.—Let us therefore, my lord, after all these considerations, approve this Article; and when the whole Treaty shall be duly examined and ratified, I am hopeful, this parliament will return their most dutiful acknowledgments to her majesty, for her royal endeavours in promoting a lasting Union betwixt both nations.”

Lord Belhaven's Speech against the Union.] Next spoke the Lord Belhaven, but without answering what had been said by Mr. Seton. He made a long premeditated speech, as follows:

“ My lord Chancellor; When I consider the affair of an Union betwixt the two nations, as it is expressed in the several Articles thereof, and now the subject of our deliberation at this time; I find my mind crowded with variety of melancholy thoughts, and I think it my duty to disburden myself of some of them, by laying them before, and exposing them to the serious consideration of this honourable house.—I think I see a free and independent kingdom delivering up that, which all the world hath been fighting for since the days of Nimrod; yea, that for which most of all the empires, kingdoms, states, principalities, and dukedoms of Europe, are at this time engaged in the most bloody and cruel wars that ever were, to wit, a power to manage their own affairs by themselves, without the assistance and counsel of any other.—I think I see a national church, founded upon a rock, secured by a claim of right, hedged and fenced about, by the strictest and most pointed, legal sanctions that sovereignty could contrive, voluntarily descending into a plain, upon an equal level with Jews, Papists, Socinians, Arminians, Anabaptists, and other sectaries, &c.—I think I see the noble and honourable peerage of Scotland, whose valiant predecessors led armies against their enemies, upon their own proper charges and expences, now divested of their followers and vassalages, and put upon such an equal foot with their vassals, that I think I see a petty English exciseman receive more homage and respect than what was paid formerly to their quondam Mackallamores.—I think I see the present peers of Scotland, whose noble ancestors conquered provinces, over-run countries, reduced and subjected towns and fortified places, exacted tribute through the greatest part of England, now walking in the court of requests like so many English attorneys, laying aside their walking swords when in company with the English peers, lest their self-defence should be found murder.—I think I see the honourable estate of barons, the bold assertors of the nation's rights and liberties in the worst of times, now setting a watch upon their lips, and a guard upon their tongues, lest they be found guilty of scandalum magnatum.—I think I see the royal state of boroughs walking their desolate streets, hanging down their heads under disappointments, wormed out of all the branches of their old trade, uncertain what hand to turn to, necessitate to become 'prentices to their unkind neighbours; and yet after all, finding their trade so fortified by companies, and secured by prescriptions, that they despair of any success therein.—I think I see our learned judges laying aside their practiques and decisions, studying the common law of England, gravelled with Certioraries, Nisi Prius's, Writs of Error, Verdicts Indovar, Ejectione Firmæ, Injunctions, Demurs, &c. and frighted with appeals and avocations, because of the new regulations and rectifications they may meet with.—I think I see the valiant and gallant soldiery either sent to learn the plantation trade abroad; or at home petitioning for a small subsistence, as a reward of their honourable exploits; while their old corps are broken, the common soldiers left to beg, and the youngest English corps kept standing.—I think I see the honest industrious tradesman loaded with new taxes and impositions, disappointed of the equivalents, drinking water in place of ale, eating his saltless pottage, petitioning for encouragement to his manufactures, and answered by counter-petitions.—In short, I think I see the laborious ploughman, with his corn spoiling upon his hands, for want of sale, cursing the day of his birth, dreading the expence of his burial, and uncertain whether to marry or do worse. I think I see the incurable difficulties of the landed-men, fettered under the golden chain of equivalents, their pretty daughters petitioning for want of husbands, and their sons for want of employment.—I think I see our mariners delivering up their ships to their Dutch partners; and what through presses and necessity, earning their bread as underlings in the royal English navy.—But above all, my lord, I think I see our ancient mother Caledonia, like Cæsar, sitting in the midst of our senate, ruefully looking round about her, covering herself with her royal garment, attending the fatal blow, and breathing out her last with an 'Et tu quoque mi fili.'

"Are not these, my lord, very afflicting thoughts? and yet they are but the least part suggested to me by these dishonourable Articles. Should not the consideration of these things vivify these dry bones of ours? Should not the memory of our noble predecessors valour and constancy rouse up our drooping spirits? Are our noble predecessors souls got so far into the English cabbage-stock and colliflowers, that we should shew the least inclination that way? Are our eyes so blinded? Are our ears so deafened? Are our hearts so hardened? Are our tongues so faltered? Are our hands so fettered, that in this our day, I say, my lord, that in this our day, we should not mind the things that concern the being and well-being of our ancient kingdom, before the day be hid from our eyes?

"No, my lord, God forbid! man's enemy is God's opportunity: 'He is a present help in time of need, and a deliverer, and the right early.' Some unforeseen providence will fall out, that may cast the balance; some Joseph or other will say, 'Why do ye sit together, since you are brethren?' None will destroy Scotland, save Scotland itself; but your hands from the pen, you are sent Some Judah or other will say, 'Let not our hands be upon the lad, he is our brother.' There will be a Jehovah Jireh, and some will be caught in the thicket, when the bloody knife is at our mother's throat. Let us then, my lord, and let our noble patriots have themselves like men, and we know a how soon a blessing may come.

"My lord, I wish from my heart, that as my vision prove not as true as my reason, it is probable: I design not at this time to enter into the merits of any one particular Article; I intend this discourse, as an introduction to what I may afterwards say upon the whole debate, as it falls in before this honorable house; and therefore, in the further prosecution of what I have to say, I shall rest upon few particulars, very necessary to be understood, before we enter upon the detail of so important a matter.

"I shall therefore, in the first place, endeavour to encourage a free and full deliberation, without animosities and heats: In the next place, I shall endeavour to make an enquiry into the nature and source of the natural and dangerous divisions that are now on foot within this isle, with some motives shewing, that it is our interest to lay them aside at this time: Then I shall enquire into the reasons, which have induced, the two nations to enter into a Treaty of Union at this time, with some considerations and meditations, in relation to the behaviour of the lords commissioners of the two kingdoms, in the management of this great concern. And lastly, I shall propose a method, by which we may most distinctly, and without confusion, go through the several Articles of this Treaty, without unnecessary repetitions or loss of time. And all this with all deference, and under the correction of this honourable house.

"My lord chancellor, the greatest honour that was done unto a Roman, was to allow him the glory of a triumph; the greatest and most dishonourable punishment, was that of parricide: he that was guilty of parricide, was beaten with rods upon his naked body till the blood gushed out of all the veins of his body; then he was sewed up in a leather sack, called a culeus, with a cock, a viper, and an ape, and thrown headlong into the sea.

"My lord, parricide is a greater crime than parricide, all the world over. In a treaty, my lord, when the conqueror was riding in his triumphal chariot, crowned with laurels, adorned with trophies, and applauded with buzzas, there was a monitor appointed to stand behind him, to warn him, not to be high-minded, not puffed up with over-weening thoughts of himself; and to his chariot were tied a whip and a bell, to mind him, that for all his glory and grandeur, he was accountable to the people for his administration, and would be punished as their men, if found guilty.

"The greatest honour amongst us, my lord, is to represent the sovereign's sacred person in parliament; and in one particular it appears to be greater than that of a triumph; because the whole legislative power seems to be wholly entrusted with him: If he give the royal assent to an act of the estates, it becomes a law obligatory upon the subject, though contrary to without any instructions from the sovereign: If he refuse the royal assent to a vote in parliament, it cannot be a law, though he has the sovereign's particular and positive instructions to it.

"His grace the duke of Queensbury, who now represents her majesty in this session of parliament, hath had the honour of that great trust, as often, if not more than any Scotsman ever had: he hath been the favourite of two successive sovereigns; and I cannot but commend his constancy, and perseverance, but, notwithstanding his former difficulties and unsuccessful attempts, and maugre some other peculiarities not yet determined, that his grace has yet had the resolution to undertake the most unpopular measures last. If his grace succeed in this affair of an Union, and that it prove for the happiness and welfare of the nation, then he justly merits to have a statue of gold erected for himself: but if it shall tend to entire destruction and abolition of our nation; and that we the nation's trustees shall go into it; then I must say, that a whip and a bell, a cock and a viper, and an ape, are but too small punishments for any such bold unnatural undertaking and complaisance.

"That I may pave a way, my lord, to a full calm, and free reasoning upon this affair, which is of the last consequence unto this nation; I shall mind this honourable house, that we are the successors of our noble predecessors, who founded our monarchy, framed our laws, amended, altered, and corrected them from time to time, as the affairs and circumstances of the nation did require, without the assistance or advice of any foreign power or potentate, and who, during the time of 2000 years, have handed them down to us a free independent nation, with the hazard of their lives and fortunes: shall not we then argue for that which our progenitors have purchased for us at so dear a rate, and with so much immortal honour and glory? God forbid. Shall the hazard of a father unbind the ligaments of a dumb son's tongue; and shall we hold our peace, when our Patria is in danger? I speak this, my lord, that I may encourage every individual member of this house, to speak their mind freely. There are many wise and prudent men amongst us, who think it not worth their while to open their mouths; there are others, who can speak very well, and to good purpose, who shelter themselves under the shameful cloak of silence, from a fear of the frowns of great men and parties. I have observed, my lord, by my experience, the greatest number of speakers in the most trivial affairs; and it will always prove so, while we come not to the right understanding of the oath de fideli, whereby we are bound not only to give our vote, but our faithful advice in parliament, as we should answer to God; and in our ancient laws, the representatives of the honourable barons, and the royal boroughs, are termed spokesmen. It lies upon your lordships therefore particularly to take notice of such, whose modesty makes them bashful to speak. Therefore I shall leave it upon you, and conclude this point with a very memorable saying of an honest private gentleman to a great queen, upon occasion of a state project, contrived by an able statesman, and the favourite to a great king, against a peaceful obedient people, because of the diversity of their laws and constitutions. 'If at this time thou hold thy peace, salvation shall come to the people from another place, but thou and thy house shall perish.' I leave the application to each particular member of this house.

"My Lord, I come now to consider our divisions. We are under the happy reign (blessed be God) of the best of queens, who has no evil design against the meanest of her subjects, who loves all her people, and is equally beloved by them again; and yet that under the happy influence of our most excellent queen there should be such divisions and factions, more dangerous and threatening to her dominions, than if we were under an arbitrary government, is most strange and unaccountable. Under an arbitrary prince, all are willing to serve, because all are under a necessity to obey, whether they will or not. He chuses therefore whom he will, without respect to either parties or factions; and if he think fit to take the advices of his councils or parliaments, every man speaks his mind freely, and the prince receives the faithful advice of his people without the mixture of self-designs: if he proves a good prince, the government is easy, if bad, either death or a revolution brings a deliverance: whereas here my lord, there appears no end of our misery, if not prevented in time: factions are now become independent, and have got footing in councils, in parliaments, in treaties, in armies, in incorporations, in families, among kindred, yea man and wife are not free from their political jars.

"It remains therefore, my lord, that I enquire into the nature of these things, and since the names give us not the right idea of the thing, I am afraid I shall have difficulty to make myself well understood.

(K)

"The names generally used to denote the factions, are Whig, and Tory, as obscure as that of Gueffs and Gibelins: yea, my lord, they have different significations, as they are applied to factions in each kingdom; a Whig in England is a heterogeneous creature, in Scotland he is all of a piece; a Tory in England is all of a piece, and a statesman; in Scotland he is quite otherwise, an anti-courtier and anti-statesman.

"A Whig in England appears to be somewhat like Nebuchadnezzar's image, of different metals, different classes, different principles, and different desigus: yet take them altogether they are like a piece of fine mixed druggel of different threads, some finer, some coarser, which after all make a comely appearance, and an agreeable suit. Tory is like a piece of loyal home-made English cloth, the true staple of the nation, all of a thread; yet if we look narrowly into it, we shall perceive diversity of colours, which, according to the various situations and positions, make various appearances: sometimes Tory is like the moon in its full, as appeared in the affair of the bill of Occasional Conformity; upon other occasions it appears to be under a cloud, and as if it were eclipsed by a greater body, as it did in the design of calling over the illustrious princess Sophia. However by this we may see their desigus are to outshoot Whig in his own bow.

"Whig in Scotland is a true-blue Presbyterian, who, without considering time or power, will venture their all for the kirk: but something less for the state. The greatest difficulty is, how to describe a Scots Tory: of old, when I knew them first, Tory was an honest hearted comradish fellow, who provided he was maintained and protected in his benefices, titles and dignities by the state, he was the less anxious who had the government and management of the church: but now what he is since jure Divino came in fashion: and that christianity, and, by consequence, salvation comes to depend upon Episcopal ordination, I profess I know not what to make of him; only this I must say for him, that he endeavours to do by opposition, that which his brother in England endeavours by a more prudent and less scrupulous method.

"Now, my lord, from these divisions, there has got up a kind of aristocracy, something like the famous triumvirate at Rome; they are a kind of undertakers and pragmatic statesmen, who, finding their power and strength great, and answerable to their desigus, will make bargains with our gracious sovereign; they will serve her faithfully, but upon their own terms; they must have their own instruments, their own measures; this man must be turned out, and that man put in, and then they will make her the most glorious queen in Europe.

"Where will this end, my lord? Is not her majesty in danger by such a method? Is not the monarchy in danger? Is not the nation's peace and tranquillity in danger? Will a change of parties make the nation more happy? No, my lord, the seed is sown, that is like to afford us a perpetual increase; it's not an annual herb, it takes deep root, it seeds and breeds: and if not timely prevented by her majesty's royal endeavours, will split the whole island in two.

"My lord, I think, considering our present circumstances at this time, the Almighty God has reserved this great work for us. We may bruise this hydra of division, and crush this cockatrice's egg. Our neighbours in England, are not yet fitted for any such thing; they are not under the afflicting hand of Providence, as we are; their circumstances are great and glorious, their treaties are prudently managed, both at home and abroad, their generals brave and valorous, their armies successful and victorious, their trophies and laurels memorable and surprising; their enemies subdued and routed, their strong holds besieged and taken, sieges relieved, marshes killed and taken prisoners, provinces and kingdoms are the results of their victories; their royal navy is the terror of Europe, their trade and commerce extended through the universe, encircling the whole habitable world, and rendering their own capital city the emporium for the whole inhabitants of the earth: and which is yet more than all these things; the subjects freely bestowing their treasure upon the sovereign: and above all, these vast riches, the sinews of war, and without which all the glorious success had proved abortive, these treasures are managed with such faithfulness and nicety, that they answer seasonably all the demands, though at never so great a distance. Upon these considerations, my lord, how hard and difficult a thing will it prove, to persuade our neighbours to a self-denying bill.

"Tis quite otherwise with us, my lord, we are an obscure, poor people, though formerly of better account, removed to a remote corner of the world, without name, and without alliances, our posts mean and precarious; so that I profess I don't think any one post in the kingdom worth the bringing after, save that of being commissioner to a long session of a factious Scots parliament, with an antedated commission; and that yet renders the rest of the ministers more miserable. What hinders us then, my lord, to lay aside our divisions, to unite cordially and heartily together in our present circumstances, when our all is at stake? Hannibal, my lord, is at our gates, Hannibal is come within our gates, Hannibal is come the length of this table, he is at the foot of this throne, he will demolish this throne, if we take not notice, he'll seize upon these Regalia, he'll take them as our spolia opima, and whip us out of this house, never to return again.

"For the love of God then, my lord, for the safety and welfare of our ancient kingdom, whose sad circumstances, I hope, we shall not convert into prosperity and happiness! I want no means, if we unite; God blessed the peace-makers; we want neither men, nor sufficiency of all manner of things necessary, to make a nation happy; all depends upon management, 'Concordia res parvæ crescunt.' I fear not these articles, though they were ten times worse than they are, if we once cordially forgive one another, and that, according to our proverb, Bygones be Bygones, and fair play for me to come. For my part, in the sight of God, and in the presence of this honourable house, I heartily forgive every man, and beg, that they may do the same to me; and I do most humbly propose, that his grace my lord commissioner may appoint an agape, may order a love-feast for this honourable house, that we may lay aside all self-designs, and, after our lusts and humiliations, may have a day of renouncing and thankfulness, may eat our meat with gladness, and our bread with a merry heart; then shall we sit each man under his own fig-tree, and the voice of the turtle shall be heard in our land, a bird famous for constancy and fidelity.

"My lord, I shall make a pause here, and stop going on farther in my discourse, till I see farther, if his grace, my lord commissioner, receive any humble proposals for removing misunderstandings among us, and putting an end to our fatal divisions: upon honour, I have no other design, and I am content to beg the favour upon my beaded knees."

"My lord chancellor, I am sorry that I must pursue the thread of my sad and melancholy story: what remains, I am afraid may prove as afflictive as what I have said; I shall therefore consider the motives which have engaged the two nations to enter upon a Treaty of Union at this time. In general, my lord, I think both of them had in their view to better themselves by the Treaty; but, before I enter upon the particular motives of each nation, I must inform this honourable house, that, since I can remember, the two nations have altered their sentiments upon that affair, even almost to downright contradiction, they have changed lead-bands, as we say; for England, till of late, never thought it worth their pains of treating with us; the good bargain they made at the beginning they resolve to keep, and that which we call an incorporating Union, was not so much as in their thoughts. The first notice they seemed to take of us, was in our affair of Jaledonia, when they had most effectually broke off that design, in a manner very well known to the world, and unnecessary to be repeated here; they kept themselves quiet during the time of our complaints upon that head. In which time our sovereign, to satisfy the nation and allay their heats, did condescend to give us some good laws, and amongst others that of personal liberties; but England having declared their succession, and extended their entail, without ever taking notice of us, our gracious sovereign queen Anne, was graciously pleased to give the royal assent to our act of Security, to that of peace and war after the decease of her majesty, and the heirs of her body, and to give us a hedge to all our sacred and civil interests, by declaring it high treason to endeavour the alteration of them, as they were then established. Thereupon did follow the threatening and minatory laws against us by the parliament of England, and the unjust and unequal character of what her majesty had so graciously condescended to in our favours. Now, my lord, whether the desire they had to have us engaged in the same succession with them; or whether they found us, like a free and independent people, breathing after more liberty than what formerly was looked after; or whether they were afraid of our Act of Security, in case of her majesty's decease: which of all these motives has induced them to a treaty, I leave it to themselves. This I must say only, they have made a good bargain this time also.

"For the particular motives that induced us, I think they are obvious to be known: we found, by sad experience, that every man hath advanced in power and riches, as they have done in trade; and at the same time considering, that no where through the world, slaves are found to be rich, though they should be adorned with chains of gold; we thereupon changed our notion of an incorporating Union, to that of a federal one; and, being resolved to take this opportunity to make demands upon them, before we enter into the succession, we were content to empower her majesty to authorize and appoint commissioners to treat with the commissioners of England, with as ample powers as the lords commissioners from England had from their constituents, that we might not appear to have less confidence in her majesty, nor more narrow-heartedness in our act, than our neighbours of England; and thereupon last parliament, after her majesty's gracious letter was read, desiring us to declare the succession in the first place, and afterwards to appoint commissioners to treat, we found it necessary to renew our former resolve, which I shall read to this honourable house:

Resolve presented by the duke of Hamilton last session of parliament.

'That this parliament will not proceed to the nomination of a successor, till we have had a previous Treaty with England, in relation to our commerce, and other concerns with that nation. And further it is resolved, that this parliament will proceed to make such limitations and conditions of government, for the rectification of our constitution, as may secure the liberty, religion, and independence of this kingdom, before they proceed to the said nomination.'

"Now, my lord, the last session of parliament having, before they would enter into any Treaty with England, by a vote of the house passed both an act for limitations, and an act for rectification of our constitution, what mortal man has reason to doubt the design of this Treaty was only federal?

"My lord chancellor, It remains now, that we consider the behaviour of the lords commissioners at the opening of this Treaty: And, before I enter upon that, allow me to make this meditation: that, if our posterity, after we are all dead and gone, shall find themselves under an ill-made bargain, and shall have recourse unto our records, and see who have been the managers of that Treaty, by which they have suffered so much: When they read the names, they will certainly conclude, and say, Ah! our nation has been reduced to the last extremity, at the time of this Treaty; all our great chieftains, all our great peers and considerable men, who used formerly to defend the rights and liberties of the nation, have been all killed and dead in the bed of honour, before ever the nation was necessitate to condescend to such mean and contemptible terms: Where are the names of the chief men, of the noble families of Stuarts, Hamiltons, Grahams, Campbells, Gordons, Johnstons, Humes, Murrays, Kers, &c.? Where are the two great officers of the crown, the constables and marshals of Scotland? They have certainly all been extinguished, and now we are slaves for ever.

“Whereas the English records will make their posterity reverence the memory of the honourable names, who have brought under their fierce, warlike and troublesome neighbours, who had struggled so long for independency, shed the best blood of their nation, and reduced a considerable part of their country, to become waste and desolate.

“I am informed, my lord, that our commissioners did indeed frankly tell the lords-commissioners for England, that the inclinations of the people of Scotland were much altered of late, in relation to an incorporating Union; and that therefore, since the entail was to end with her majesty's life (whom God long preserve) it was proper to begin the Treaty upon the foot of the Treaty of 1604 year of God; the time when we came first under one sovereignty: But this the English commissioners would not agree to; and our commissioners, that they might not seem obstinate, were willing to treat and conclude in the terms laid before this honourable house, and subjected to their determination.

“If the lords-commissioners for England had been as civil and complaisant, they should certainly have finished a federal Treaty likewise, that both nations might have the choice, which of them to have gone into, as they thought fit; but they would hear of nothing but an entire and compleat Union, a name which comprehends an Union, either by incorporation, surrender, or conquest; whereas our commissioners thought of nothing but a fair, equal, incorporating Union. Whether this be so, or no, I leave it to every man's judgement; but as for myself, I must beg liberty to think it no such thing: for I take an incorporating Union to be, where there is a change both in the material and formal points of government, as if two pieces of metal were melted down into one mass, it can neither be said to retain its former form or substance as it did before the mixture. But now, when I consider this Treaty, as it hath been explained and spoke to, before us this three weeks by past, I see the English constitution remaining in, the same two houses of parliament, the same taxes, the same customs, the same excises, the same trading companies, the same municipal laws and courts of judicature; and all our either subject to regulations or annihilations, only we have the honour to pay their old debts, and to have some few persons present, as witnesses to the validity of the deed, who they are pleased to contract more.

“Good God! What, is this an entire surrender!

“My lord, I find my heart so full of grief and indignation, that I must beg pardon to finish the last part of my discourse, that I may drop a tear, as the prelude to so sad a story.

After having sat down, and some discourse by other members intervening, he continued his discourse thus:

“My lord chancellor; What I am now to say, relates to the method of proceeding in this weighty affair: I hear it proposed by a noble member of the other side, that we should proceed in the same order as the lords commissioners-treaters did. In my humble opinion, my lord, it is neither the natural method nor can it be done without great confusion and repetition. To say, you'll agree to the Union of the two kingdoms, before you agree to the terms upon which they are to be united, seems like driving the plough before the oxen. The articles, which narrate the condition seem to be the premises upon which the conclusion is inferred; and, according as they are found good or bad, the success will follow. When a man is married to a fortune in England, as they call it, I suppose he is satisfied with the thing before he determines himself to marry; and the proposal I have heard of agreeing to the first article, with a proviso, that if the rest of the articles shall be found satisfactory, and no otherwise, is of a piece with the rest, and looks like bearing the air, and so was consistent with fair and square dealings. Besides, my lord, if we were to go upon the first article; are not all the rest of the articles, besides many others not contained in the articles, valid arguments either pro or con, against concluding or not concluding the first article? And no vote in this house can hinder a man from making use of what arguments he thinks fit. Moreover, the searching the records, and the revising the statute-books, comparing the book of rates, customs, excise, taxes, of both nations one with another, must all be preliminarily considered ere we determine ourselves to one single article; add to this, that the prohibitory clause with relation to the trade of both nations, must be adjusted, lest like Esop's dog, we lose the old, in grasping at the new: the state of the English companies must also be proposed, how far we shall have liberty intended, and what advantage we may propose to ourselves, by trading to these places where they are secured; and above all, my lord, the security of our national church, and all that's dear unto us, must be previously established to us, if practicable, before we conclude the first article.

"Therefore, my lord, though my particular opinion be, though we had a cart-bleach from England; yet the delivering up of our sovereignty, gives back with one hand, what we receive with the other, and that there can be no security without the guarantee of a distinct independency betwixt the parties treating: yet, my lord, for further satisfaction to this honourable house, that every member may fully satisfy himself, I humbly propose, that, assing by the first three articles, which appear to be much of a piece, we begin the fourth article of the treaty; and if I be seconded in this, I desire it may be put to the question."

This speech, the reader may see, was pointed directly against the Union; and in the first part of it argues against the whole, in the last against the parts; but concludes to move against the immediate proceedings.—The first speech was from a person no less capable in the matter of the Treaty, and that had been a commissioner in the Treaty at London; the speeches are directly opposite, and are left thus upon record to argue against one another.

The time had been taken up with their length, and the house, as well as the nation, was, at this time, in an unusual ferment, so that many replies were made. Mr. Seton, who made the first speech, stood up to answer the lord Belhaven: but, as he had already spoken, he orders of the House, viz. "That the same member could not speak twice in the same cause," were urged against his speaking, and the earl of Marchmont standing up to speak at the same time, the lord chancellor gave place to him; who indeed made a very short return to so long a speech, and which answer occasioned some laughter in the house: The earl of Marchmont's speech was to this purpose, viz. "He had heard a long speech, and a very terrible one, but he was of opinion, it required a short answer, which he gave in these words, "Behold he dreamed, but lo! when he awoke, he found it was a dream." This answer, some said, was as satisfactory to the members, who understood the design of that speech, as if it had been answered vision by vision. After these two speeches, several members spoke pro and con; but the debate, at a close of the day, turned so warm, that, at the desire of the House, it was adjourned to the next sederunt."

Resolve of the Marquis of Annandale.] Nov. 4. The first Article of the Union was again read, and after some further debate upon it, a Resolve was offered, and given in to the house by the marquis of Annandale, as follows:

"Whereas it evidently appears, since the printing, publishing, and considering of the articles of the Treaty now before this House, this nation seems generally averse to this incorporating Union, in the terms now before us, as subversive of the sovereignty, fundamental constitution, and claim of right of this kingdom, as now by law established.—And seeing it is too evident, that if any Union were agreed to in these terms by this parliament, and accepted of in the parliament of England, it would in no sort answer the peaceable and friendly ends proposed by an Union, but would, on the contrary, create such dismal distractions and animosities amongst ourselves, and such jealousies and mistakes betwixt us and our neighbours, as would involve these nations in fatal breaches and confusions.—Therefore resolved, 'That we are willing to enter into such an Union with our neighbours of England, as shall unite us entirely, and after the most strict manner, in all their and our interests or successions, wars, alliances, and trade, reserving to us the sovereignty and independency of the crown and monarchy, and the ancient privileges and immunities of the kingdom, and the constitution and frame of the government both of church and state, as they stand now, established by our fundamental constitution, by our Claim of Right, and by the laws following thereupon. Or, resolved, that we will proceed to settle the same successions with England, upon such conditions and regulations of government within ourselves, as shall effectually secure the sovereignty and independency of this crown and kingdom, and the indissoluble society of the same, with the fundamental rights and constitutions of the government both of our church and state, as the same stands established by the Claim of Right, and other laws and statutes of this kingdom.'

Duke of Athol's Protestation against the Union.] Which being read and debated, the vote was stated, approve of the first article of Union or not: but before the vote, the Duke of Athol gave the following protestation:

"I John duke of Athol, protest for myself, and all others, who shall adhere to this my protestation, that an incorporating Union of the crown of Scotland with the crown of England, and that both nations should be represented by one and the same parliament, as contained in the articles of the Treaty of Union, is contrary to the honour, interest, fundamental laws and constitution of this kingdom, the birth-right of the peers, the rights and privileges of the barons and boroughs, and act 130 parl. 3 J. 6, by which it is ordained, that none of the lieges presume or take upon them, to impugn the dignity and authority of the three estates of parliament, or to seek or procure the innovation or diminution of the power and authority of the said three estates under the pain of treason: and is contrary to the Claim of Right, property, and liberty of the subjects; and the third act of her majesty's parliament 1703, by which it is declared high-treason in any of the subjects of this kingdom, to quarrel or impugn, or endeavour by writing, malicious or advised speaking, or other open act or deed, to alter or innovate the Claim of Right, or any Article thereof; and therefore do desire, that this my protestation be marked in the records of parliament."

First Article of the Union approved.] The same day, a note was stated in these terms, "Approve of the first Article of the Union, in the terms of the motion mentioned in the preceding day's minutes, viz. that if the other Articles of Union be not adjusted by the parliament then the agreeing to, and approving of the first, shall be of no effect; and that immediately after the said first Article, the parliament, will proceed to an act for the security of the doctrine, discipline, worship and government of the church, as by law established within this kingdom:" and it was carried, approve in the terms of the above motion.

Bill for the Security of the Scotch Church.] The act for the Security of the Church, which was under consideration of the parliament on the 9th, ran thus:

"Our sovereign lady and the estates of parliament considering, that by the late act of parliament, for a Treaty with England for an Union of both kingdoms, it is provided that the commissioners for that Treaty should not treat of, or concerning any alteration of the worship, discipline and government of the Church of this kingdom, as now by law established; which Treaty being now reported to the parliament, and it being reasonable and necessary that the true Protestant religion, as presently professed within this kingdom, with the worship, discipline and government of the Church, should be effectually and unalterably secured; therefore her majesty, with advice and consent of the said estates of parliament, doth hereby establish and confirm the said true Protestant religion, and the worship, discipline and government of this Church, to continue without any alteration to the people of this land, in all succeeding generations: and more especially her majesty, with advice and consent aforesaid, ratifies, approves, and for ever confirms the 5th act of the 1st parl. W. and M. entitled, An act for ratifying and confirming the confession of faith, and settling Presbyterian Church government, with the hail other acts of parliament relating thereto, in prosecution of the Declaration of the Estates of this kingdom, containing the Claim of Right, bearing date the 11th of April, 1689. And her Majesty, with advice and consent aforesaid, expressly provides and declares, that the foresaid true Protestant religion, contained in the above-mentioned confession of faith, with the form and purity of worship presently in use within this church, and its Presbyterian Church government and discipline, that is to say, the government of the Church by Kirk-sessions, Presbyteries, provincial synods, and general assemblies, all established by the foresaid act of parliament, pursuant to the Claim of Right, shall remain and continue unalterable; and that the said Presbyterian government shall be the only government of the Church within the kingdom of Scotland.

"And further, for the great security of the foresaid Protestant religion, and of the worship, discipline and government of the Church as above established, her majesty, with advice and consent foresaid, statutes and ordains, that, in all time coming, no professors, principals, regents, masters, or others bearing office in any university, college, or school within this kingdom, be capable, or be admitted or allowed to continue in the exercise of the said functions, be such as shall own and acknowledge the civil government, in manner prescribed by the act of parliament. As also, that before, or at their admissions, they do, and shall acknowledge and profess, and shall subscribe to the foresaid confession of faith, as the confession of their faith, and that they will practise and continue themselves to the worship presently in use in this Church, and submit themselves to the government and discipline thereof, and never endeavour, directly or indirectly, the prejudice or subversion of the same, and that before the respective Presbyters of their bounds, by whatsoever gift, presentation or provision, they may be thereto provided.

"And further, her majesty, with advice aforesaid, expressly declares and statutes, that none of the subjects of this kingdom shall be liable to, but all and every one of them forever free of any oath, test, or subscription within this kingdom, contrary to, or inconsistent with the foresaid true Protestant Religion, and Presbyterian Church government, worship and discipline as above established, and that the same, within the bounds of this Church in this kingdom, shall never be imposed upon, or required of them in any sort. And lastly, that after the decease of her present majesty (whom God long preserve) the sovereign succeeding her in the royal government of this kingdom, shall in all time coming, at his or her accession to the crown, swear and subscribe, that they shall maintain and preserve the foresaid settlement of the true Protestant religion, with the government, worship and discipline of the Church as above established, inviolably. And it is hereby statuted and ordained, that this act of parliament, with the establishments therein contained, shall be held and observed, in all time coming, as a fundamental and essential condition of any Treaty, or Union to be concluded betwixt the two kingdoms, without any alteration thereof, or derogation therein in any sort for ever. As also, that this act of parliament, and settlement therein contained shall be inserted and repeated, in any act of parliament that shall pass for agreeing and con-adding the foresaid Treaty, or Union betwixt the two kingdoms, and that the same shall be therein expressly declared, to be a fundamental and essential condition of the said Treaty or Union in all time coming."

Further consideration of the Act for the Security of the Kirk.] Nov. 12. The parliament proceeded to the further consideration of the Act for Security of the Kirk, &c. within that kingdom: and the fourth clause thereof being again read, it was moved, that a clause should be added in these terms: 'and that they shall be capable of any office, civil or military, and to receive any grant or gift, and to have command, or place of trust, from, and under the sovereign, within any part of Great Britain.' And after debate thereon, it was put to the vote, add or not; and it was carried not, and the clause, as it stood, agreed to. And when the third clause of the act was read; and being amended, was agreed to. Whereupon the whole act was again read, as also the representation of the commission of the general assembly; and a vote stated, approve of the act or not; but before voting, the lord Belhaven gave in a protestation in these terms: 'That he did protest in his own, and in name of all them that should adhere to him, that his act was no valid security to the church, in case of an incorporating Union; and that the church could have no real and solid security by any manner of Union, by which the Claim of Right is unhinged, our parliament incorporated, and our distinct sovereignty and independency entirely abolished:' which being read, he took instruments thereon, and adhered thereto.

Then the vote was put, Approve or not, and it was carried Approve: and it was carried on the 14th, that the second Article of the Union should have the preference, and be considered before any of those relating to trade, taxes, &c. But notice should have been taken before, that when on the 12th the clause was offered by my Lord Belhaven, for exempting Scots men from the sacramental test through all the dominions of Britain, those who were against the clause said it was a thing out of their power, and not reasonable to suppose that England would grant. To which it was replied by those of the other side, that the design of an Union was equality; but this was the greatest inequality imaginable; for the English were free to possess places in Scotland without any such imposition, but they were excluded from places in England without taking the said Test; and that though the English thought the Test a good security for their Church, it was not reasonable, that they being a part of the same united kingdom, and obliged to maintain the Presbyterian government there, should therefore be excluded from the prince's favour in any part of the united kingdom. However, the clause was thrown out by 39 votes; and then the other clauses being adjusted, the act for the security of the Church passed by a great majority, many of the cavaliers not thinking themselves concerned to vote in the matter. The duke of Hamilton, the duke of Athol, marquis of Annandale, earls of Errol, Marischal, Wigton, and others adhered to the lord Belhaven's protestation, that the act was no sufficient security to the church.

The representation of the commission of the general assembly, representing the increase of popery, profanity, &c. and craving the same might be restrained, and that the succession to the crown might be established in the protestant line, was read and remitted to the committee for calculating the equivalence, to do therein as they found just.

The Second Article read.] Then the second Article was again read, and it was moved, That the parliament should proceed to settle the Succession upon Regulations and Limitations, in the terms of the resolve mentioned in the minutes the 4th instant, and not in the terms of the second Article of the Union. Moved also to address her majesty, and to lay before her the condition of the nation, and the aversion in many persons to an incorporating Union; and to acquaint her majesty of their willingness to settle the Succession in the protestant line, upon limitations; and in order thereunto, that some recess be granted. And after some debate on those motions, a vote was proposed, Approve the second Article of Union in the terms of the preliminary motion, or not; and after some further debate, there was a second state offered, address or not. Then it was put to the vote, whether the first or second should be the state of the vote, and it carried the first.

But it being moved, that some further reasoning should be allowed before the vote, after some debate it was agreed, that the English acts of parliament in the second article of Union be read, and that immediately after a vote should be stated, proceed to call the vote, or delay. And accordingly the said English acts of parliament were read, and thereupon the vote was stated, proceed to call the vote for approving the second article, or delay, and it was carried proceed. Then the vote was put, approve the second article in the terms of the preliminary motion yea or no.

Earl Marischal's Protest against the second Article of the Union.] But before voting, the earl Marischal gave in the following Protest, whereby he did protest for himself, and all those who should adhere to this Protestation, "That no person can be designed a successor to the crown of this realm, after the decease of her majesty (whom God long preserve) and failing heirs of her body, who is successor to the crown of England, unless that in this present session of parliament, or any other session of this or any ensuing parliament, during her majesty's reign, there be such conditions of government settled and enacted, as may secure the honour and sovereignty of this crown and kingdom, the freedom, frequency and power of parliament, the religion, liberty and trade of the nation, from English or any foreign influence; which being read, he took instruments thereon."

The Second Article carried.] And it was agreed, that the list of the members shall be printed as they vote, Approve or not, and they who adhere to the Protest should be marked. Then the vote was put, ' Approve or not,' and it was carried Approve.

Lord Belhaven's Speech thereon.] Upon this occasion, the lord Belhaven spoke thus:

" My Lord Chancellor; Your lordship may remember the last day, when we had under consideration, whether to proceed to the fourth or second article, that I did witness my concern and resentment, to find so many honourable and worthy members of this house so forward to finish the demands of England in this Treaty, without taking notice of any one article that could be properly said to relate to the demands of Scotland.—Now that we are entered upon the second article, I desire to be resolved in one question: what are the motives that should engage us to take England's succession upon their own terms? is it not strange that no answer should be given to this question, save that, when you come to consider the rest of the articles, you shall be satisfied on that demand. This is a new way of arguing, my lord; a method without precedent, reversing nature, and looks more like design than fair dealing. I profess I think the huge and prodigious rains that we have had of late, have either drowned out, or found out another channel for reasoning, than what was formerly: for by what I can see by this new method, the agreeing to the first article shall be found a sufficient reason why we should agree to the second, and the agreeing to the second for the third, and so for all.—If there was ever such a farce acted; if ever reason was Hudibrased, this is the time: consult all the treaties since the beginning of the world to this day, and if you can find any one precedent, I shall yield the cause.—I shall instance, my lord, one for all, and that is, the first and worst treaty that ever was set on foot for mankind; and yet, I am sorry to say it, there appears more ingenuity in it than in our procedure. When the serpent did deceive our mother Eve, he proposed three advantages before he presumed to advise her to eat the forbidden fruit; the first was taken from the sight, the second from the taste, and the third from the advantage following thereupon. That from the sight was enforced by a ' Behold, how lovely and comely a thing it is! it is pleasant to the eye.' That from the taste, from a persuasion that it was good for nourishment; ' It is good for food.' That from the advantage, ' It will make you wise, ye shall be as the gods; therefore, upon all these considerations, eat.'—Allow me, my lord, to run the parallel of this with relation to our procedure in this Treaty.—Upon the first account that our nation had of the Treaty's being finished betwixt the two nations, people appeared all generally very well satisfied, as a thing that would tend to the removal of all jealousies, and the settling a good understanding betwixt the two kingdoms: but soon as the articles of the treaty appeared in print, the very sight of them made such a change as is almost inconceivable; they were so far from being pleasant to the eye, my lord, that the nation appears to abhor them.—One would think, my lord, that it had been the interest of those who are satisfied with the treaty, to have gone immediately into the merits of these particular articles which relate to Scotland, and to have said, Gentlemen, be not affrighted with their ugly shape, they are better than they are bonny; come taste, come, make a narrow search and inquiry; they are good for Scotland; the wholesomest food that a decaying nation can take: you shall find the advantages, you shall find a change of condition, you shall become rich immediately; you shall be like the English, the most flourishing and the richest people of the universe.—But our procedure, my lord, hath been very far from the prudence of the serpent; for all our arguments have run upon this blunt topic, eat, swallow down this incorporating Union; though I please neither eye nor taste, it must go over: you must believe your physicians, and we shall consider the reasons for it afterwards.—I wish, my lord, that our loss be not in some small manner proportionable to that of our first parents; they thought to have been incorporated with the gods: but in place of that, they were justly expelled paradise, lost their sovereignty over the creatures, and were forced to earn their bread with the sweat of their brows.—My Lord Chancellor, I have heard a proposal made from the other side by the marquis of Annandale; that, in place of agreeing to this second article, wherein the succession is to be declared as a consequence of our being united to England in one kingdom, we should immediately go to entail our crown upon the illustrious family of Hanover, upon such conditions and limitations as are in our own power to make, for the security of our sacred and civil concerns. I think this is the import of what his lordship gave in, by a resolve formerly, and hath told this honourable house, that he thinks he acts consequentially to his former declared principles, and that this is now the only measure which can settle and secure the peace and quiet of this nation, and fix a firm security to the Protestant interest, and a perfect understanding betwixt the two nations.—I have also heard a discourse by his grace the duke of Hamilton, shewing, that ever since his grace had the honour to be a member of this honourable house, he had made it his business to serve the sovereign and his nation faithfully and honestly, without any by-ends, by-views, or self interests; that before the affair of the succession was debated in Scotland, he had endeavoured to promote the interest of his nation, by good laws, and by the best counsels he was capable of giving for rectifying this gross amiss, and advancing the solid interest of his country; that since the fair of the succession came to be considered, he

I never give himself the liberty to believe, that previous to any settlement, we ought have had such condescensions with relation to trade and commerce from England, as might relieve the losses the nation hath sustained in them ever since the Union of the two crowns under one sovereign; and that therefore, to prevent all faction and party in the settling of an affair of such importance, he had only left the nomination of the lords commissioners to her majesty, and wishes the choice had been answerable to his design; but none will accuse him as bargaining for himself, since he has no reason to complain of the breach of any stipulation upon that head; that now having considered the articles of this treaty lying before us, and the fatal consequences that may follow upon the finishing of an incorporation with England, with the general aversion it appears by the addresses from the several estates of the kingdom, and particularly from the address of the commission of the general assembly, and of the royal boroughs of Scotland, he does not think it necessary to alter his thoughts of that matter; that he was none of those who would keep things loose and in confusion; he had an estate in both kingdoms, and therefore it is not to be supposed he would make use of a Treaty to throw out the succession in the time, and of the succession to throw out the treaty another time. Therefore, to prevent worse consequences, he is content, that in this parliament, the succession be declared and settled upon the illustrious princess Sophia, electress of Hanover, and the heirs of her body, upon such conditions and limitations as all be found necessary by this parliament, to secure our civil rights and liberties, the independency and sovereignty of the nation, and the Presbyterian government of this church, as is founded upon the claim of right, and established by law, and whose privileges and settlement he resolves to support with the utmost of his power.—And therefore his grace thinks himself obliged, with all humility in this present juncture of affairs, to address himself particularly to his grace my lord commissioner, and to beg of his grace, that he would be pleased to acquaint her majesty with the true state of the nation, and with the proposal made in allaying the present ferment, and settling a solid peace and good understanding betwixt the two kingdoms, and that a small recess may be granted in the mean time, till her majesty's gracious answer come, which, with all submission, he conceives will prevent these bad consequences that the farther pushing on of this treaty may occasion. I think, my lord, this is naturally what his grace said, though not so fully nor so well expressed.—Now, my lord, it remains that I give account of myself, and of my own opinion of this affair: all who know me, my lord, know that I have been from the beginning on a revolution foot; I ventured my life and fortune with the first, and I have ever since acted consequentially to my principle. It is true, I was never a good courtier under any reign, because I had a rule for my obedience, and never made obedience my rule; my reputation was never stained, nor had I ever any reproach laid upon me, save when I was brought in, head over ears, in a Scots plot, a plot, very well known, designed to blast the reputation of a set of people the best affected to the sovereign, and to the true interest of their nation, that ever Scotland bred. What my opinion was with relation to the succession is very well known also: I looked upon limitations with another eye than some others were pleased to do; I was far from treating them in ridicule; because, as all human affairs, they are liable to alterations, and might be taken off: that argument proves too much, and consequently proves nothing at all. Should a man refuse to have a good estate settled upon him, because he may squander it away, and become bankrupt? Must a good law be refused, because it may afterwards be repealed? no, my lord. Where the power is lodged in ourselves, we have all human security imaginable for the thing; it is not so, where the power is lodged in others: therefore I shall wisely chuse that security which depends upon myself, preferable to any other.—This, my lord, hath confirmed me, that limitations of our own making is the best security; though I atwice thought them not the full of what we merited for the going into the English succession. For considering the injuries that we have received from them, we ought to have reparation upon this emergent: and I think, without incorporating with them, they might have given us some small encouragement in our trade with them which would have been profitable unto us, and no manner of way prejudicial unto them, as I can clearly demonstrate if there be occasion for it. But since this is not the proper place nor season for such proposals, I shall go in with the proposal made by the marquis of Anandale, and fortified by his grace the duke of Hamilton; because I think it is the best that we can make of it at this time, the fittest measure to prevent civil wars, allay the ferment of the nation, and far preferable to this incorporating Union, which, as to us, in all its clauses appears to be most unreasonable.

Proceedings on the third Article.] The third Article being read on the 18th, it was moved, That the agreeing to the third Article of the Treaty, in relation to the parliament of Great Britain, should not be binding, nor have any effect, unless terms and conditions of an Union of the two kingdoms, and particularly the constitution of the said parliament, be finally adjusted and concluded, and an act pass thereupon in the parliament, and that the said terms and conditions be also agreed to, and ratified by an act of the parliament of England, the constitution of the parliament of Great Britain being left entire, until the parliament come upon the twenty-second article. It was moved also to proceed to the consideration of the fourth, and other articles of Union, before the third; and after reasoning it was put to the vote, Proceed to the consideration of the third article in the terms of the said motion, or Proceed to the fourth article, and carried, Proceed to the third.

Accordingly the parliament proceeded to the consideration of the third Article, and after long debate upon it, a vote was stated, Approve of the third Article in the terms of the said motion or not.

Marquis of Annandale's Protest.] But before voting, the marquis of Annandale gave a Protest, and craved that the narrative of the resolve, inserted in the Minutes of the 4th instant, might be prefixed thereunto; which Narrative and Protest is as follows:

"Whereas it evidently appears, since the printing and considering the articles of Treaty now before this House, this nation seems generally averse to this incorporating Union, in the terms now before us, as subversive of the sovereignty, fundamental constitution, and claim of right of this kingdom, and as threatening ruin of this church as by law established: and since it is plain, that if an Union were agreed to in these terms by the parliament and accepted of by the parliament of England, it would in no sort answer the peaceable and friendly ends proposed by an Union, but would, on the contrary, create such dismal distractions and animosities amongst ourselves, and such jealousias and mistakes betwixt us and our neighbours, as would involve these nations in fatal breaches and confusions.

"Therefore I do protest for myself, and in name of those who shall adhere to this my protestation, that an incorporating Union of the crown and kingdom of Scotland, with the crown and kingdom of England, and that both nations be represented by one and the same parliament, as contained in the articles of the Treaty of Union, and contrary to the honour, interest, fundamental laws and constitutions of this kingdom, is a giving up the sovereignty, the birthright of the peers, the rights and privileges of the barons and burghs; and is contrary to the claim of right, property, and liberty of the subjects, and 3d act of her majesty's parliament in 1708. By which it is declared high treason in any of the subjects of this kingdom, to quarrel, or endeavour by writing, malicious and advised speaking, or other open act or deed, to alter or innovate the claim of right or any article thereof: and do protest, that this shall not prejudice the being of future Scotch parliaments, and conventions within the kingdom of Scotland, in no time coming.

Third Article approved.] Then the Vote was put, Approve of the IIIrd article in the terms of the motion, and carried, Approve, by 50.

Mr. Seton's Speech thereon.] During the debates on the third Article, Mr. Seton, junior, of Pitmedden, made this speech;

"My lord chancellor; Having heard with much attention the third article debated, I find it liable, with the other articles of this

Treaty, to be put in a false or true light by the speakers to it, in proportion to those notions they have of the nature of this Union; what I am to say concerning it, shall be to remove some objections, which, in my opinion, is the proper method to smooth the way for approving it.—The principal objections are, That the representatives for shires and burghs cannot legally approve this article, without the assent of their constituents; and that by the approbation of it, the sovereignty and independency of this kingdom will be surrendered to England.—My lord, to give a distinct and convincing answer to the first objection, let us look a little to the nature of our constitution of government.—Our government is not a Polish aristocracy, founded on 'pacta conventa,' whereby all the gentry are empowered in their particular meetings, to prescribe rules to their representatives in a general diet.—Our government is not a common democracy, whereby every subject of Scotland may cast a vote in the legislature. Our government is, and has been many ages past, a limited monarchy, wherein the sovereign and representative are the only judges of every thing which does contribute to the happiness of the body politic, and from whom no appeal can legally be made; and this description is agreeable to reason, to our law, and to our history.—Reason teaches us, that anarchy is destructive to mankind, and that no society of people can be well governed without a supreme power, whose proceedings are only alterable by itself; Grotius says, (Lib. 1. cap. 3. sect. 7.) 'that we call the supreme power, whose acts are not subject to the power of another.—Our law is positive, that this supreme court is subject to no human authority, act 130. P. 8. J. 6.; and we learn from our history, that the greatest alterations have been made in the constitution of our government, without consulting the people; out of which I humbly offer a few examples: In the reign of Kenneth 3 the monarchy that originally was elective, became hereditary: in the reign of James 6 the representation of the clergy in parliament was restored: In the reign of Charles 2 the prerogative was exalted above its natural level; and in the year 1688 the king was dethroned, and the clergy expelled this house.—My lord, I have heard asserted, that there are fundamentals of government which cannot be altered by this house, without the consent of every Scotoman; but where were these stipulated? where are they recorded? were these made by our forefathers at the first institution of their government, and have all succeeding parliaments sworn to their observance? These questions, methinks, deserve our consideration, before it be asserted what is an unalterable fundamental by the house.—As to the arguments of Mr. George Mackenzie, and other eminent lawyers, brought upon the stage to support this notion of fundamentals, I think they require no particular answer, because any member who understands the nature of government may see clearly, that calculated for people as members of private societies, and not for perpetual rules to the supreme power of any nation.—In fine, I believe there are no fundamentals of government in any nation, which are not alterable by its supreme power, when the circumstances of times require; and whoever is acquainted with history, may learn, that there are no people at present in Europe, which in different ages have not suffered variety of changes in government. I do, indeed, acknowledge, here are fundamentals in nature, to wit, liberty and property, which this House can never destroy, without exceeding its utmost bounds of power, that are always limited to be public good; nevertheless, this honourable House is only capable to judge of the most proper means of securing these fundamentals: and for my part, I sincerely believe that no judicious man will say, there is the least danger of our liberty and property by an Union of parliaments, when he reflects that the people of England have been in all ages noble assertors of the rights of the subject; have spent much blood and treasure in defence of the liberties of their neighbours, and that after this Union, encroachments on the rights of the subjects of any part of Great Britain, must endanger the liberty of the whole.—My lord, I come now to the next objection, that by the approbation of this article, we surrender the sovereignty and independency of this kingdom.—These words, I acknowledge, are very long, and may sound harmoniously in the ears of the populace: for my part, I would be sorry just now to have occasion to say, that in fact our supremacy and independency were surrendered the day king James got possession of the English throne, if at the same time I could not affirm, that these are again restored to us by this Treaty, which was managed with a decorum and equality that became two independent and distinct nations, and not after such a clandestine manner as was used by queen Mary and the French, the 4th of April, 1554, on which day our sovereignty was indeed surrendered, as may be seen in the Recueil de Traitez, &c. p. 510.—But to put this question above controversy, I conceive two ways only where by a free nation loses its sovereignty and independency, which are conquest, and a voluntary surrender of its rights to another nation without any reservation.—I am sure no person in right judgment will alledge, that this intended Union is a conquest: nor can it be called a surrender, seeing the Treaty contains certain and distinct reservations to both kingdoms: nor can I comprehend how either of two nations, by an entire Union, surrenders its privileges: on the contrary, I agree with the learned Grotius (Lib. 2. cap. 9. sect. 9.) whose opinion is, that the rights and privileges of two distinct nations united, are consolidated into one, by a mutual communication of them.—Another objection, my lord, has been moved against this article, which belongs more properly to the next article, the number of the representation, to a parliament of objection I'll endeavour to clear up by words as the nature of nations are to be represented, there must be meetings, and their numbers some rule, which can be fundamental in the Union whereby suffrages are in proportion each society support of the whole. Scotland and England is great societies of people: so that we have nothing a true notion about the representative agreed to by this of Scotland, but the proper contribute for the support of Great Britain; and the numbers of our people; taxes; or to an arithmetic these and those of England duly considered, I may be the representative agreeable to the nature of society, or more societies, agree to the Grotius (L. 2. c. 5. sect. 1.) speaks out of Strabo relating Lybica united with three it was stipulated, that each have one voice, but Lybia contributed much more to than any of the rest. That there were twenty-two united, whereof some had two, and some but one.—representative of sixteen for no greater hardship put upon the small barons James 1. who then were of the nobility, and submitted to the commons, no prejudice of barons in respect for, if they be represented at least from the most considerable of no import, whether represented by one or more; as boroughs, I'll presume to submit of their representative done to this nation, if the rule of representation have I endeavoured to answer objections against this article in prospect to convince the Union, as to fortify the for it; and I wish heartily for shires and burghs may find defence in their representative accomplishing this great an Union of both kingdoms, desiring, that they are bound their best advices and so

ing, are common to them both; and that the good or bad consequences of this Union, must equally affect representatives and constituents.*

The Lord High Commissioner insulted by the Mob.] It was late before the house rose, and the mob was rude to the Lord High Commissioner; for in his return, though the horse-guards were round his grace's coach, and some of the foot grenadiers betwixt the coach, and horse guards, the mob threw stones from several corners, some of which fell into his coach, and the mob pressed so hard upon the coaches that they were forced to drive full speed down the streets; and one of his grace's pages falling behind, was very ill treated by the populace. Upon which, on the 19th, the Lord Chancellor acquainted the parliament, that the Lord High Commissioner was insulted the night before by a number of mean people with stones. The parliament remitted it to the committee for examining the equivalent, to indemnify and give reward for discovery, to seize and imprison any whom they suspected, and to report their information, and their opinion what measures might be proper for preventing the like. The parliament did likewise recommend to the Lord High constable, to prosecute those imprisoned for a former tumult, and that the magistrates of Edinburgh furnish what proof against them they could.

On the 19th it was moved, That the parliament proceed to the fourth Article of Union: then the duke of Athol moved, That before they proceed to the said Article, a clause be added to the third Article, That the said parliament of Great Britain should meet and sit once in three years at least, in that part of Great Britain, now called Scotland: and after debate, the consideration of it was delayed till the parliament should come to the XIIIth Article. Then the IVth Article of the Union was read; upon which the duke of Hamilton made a motion, that all the regulations and restrictions of the English trade, the privileges of their companies, &c. should be laid before the house; upon which the debate was by consent adjourned till next Sederunt.

Fourth Article approved of.] The IVth Article of Union was again read: whereupon it was moved, to take the several branches of trade to be communicated, into consideration,

* "This speech was received with great satisfaction and applause, and the arguments in it were so clear, especially as to the proportions of the representative, that it was very useful when that head came to be debated; and I cannot but suppose the reader will think his time well bestowed in reading it, in that he will see by it, whether the Union was carried by strength of reasoning, or, as some alledged, crammed down their throats by mere number of voices." De Foe.

...serving the consideration of the several branches of trade, till the parliament concert the subsequent articles, yea or not: and it was agreed, that the members shall be marked, as they shall vote, approve or not; and that the list of their names, as they shall vote pro and con be recorded and printed. Then the vote was put, Approve or not; and it was carried Approve.

The Fifth Article.] Then the Vth Article of the Union was read, whereupon a proposal was given for explaining and enlarging the same, in these terms; 'That all ships, or vessels belonging to her majesty's subjects of Scotland, at the time of ratifying the Treaty of Union of the two kingdoms in the parliament of Scotland, though foreign built, shall be deemed and pass as ships of the building of Great Britain: the owner, or where there are more owners, one or more of the owners, within twelve months after the Union, shall take oath, that, at the time of ratifying the Treaty of Union in the parliament of Scotland, he same did in whole or in part belonging to him or them, or to some other subject or subjects of Scotland, to be particularly named, with the place of their respective abode; and that the same doth then, at the time of the said deposition, wholly belong to him or them; and that no foreigner, directly or indirectly, hath any share part or interest therein.'

Which being read, it was moved, that six months more time should be added to the time allowed, by the proposal, for purchasing ships or vessels. And after some reasoning upon it, the further consideration thereof was delayed till next sitting, which was on the 23d, when the Vth Article of Union was again read, with the proposal for amending, explaining, and enlarging the same, inserted in the former days minutes, and rectified thus, viz. 'That all ships or vessels belonging to her majesty's subjects of Scotland, at the time of ratifying the Treaty of Union of the two kingdoms in the parliament of Scotland, though foreign built, should be deemed and pass as ships of the building of Great Britain: the owner, or where there are more owners, one or more of the owners, within twelve months after the 1st day of May next making oath, that at the time of ratifying the Treaty of Union in the parliament of Scotland, the same did in all or in part belong to him or them, or to some other subject or subjects of Scotland, to be particularly named, viz. the place of their respective abodes; and that the same doth then, at the time of the said deposition, wholly belong to him or them; and that no foreigner, directly or indirectly, hath any share, part, or interest therein.'

And after some reasoning thereon, there was a second proposal given in for amending the Article, in these terms, by the lord Belhaven. 'That all ships and vessels belong-to her majesty's subjects of Scotland, at the time of ratifying the Treaty of the Union of the two kingdoms, in the parliaments of both kingdoms, shall, &c.' And after some debate, a vote was stated, Approve of the first paragraph of the Vth Article, with the first amendment; and it was carried, Approve, with the first amendment.

Thereafter, the remainder of the said Vth Article of Union was read, and a proposal given in his grace the duke of Hamilton, for adding a clause in these terms: 'That for the space of seven years, from and after the concluding Treaty or Union in both kingdoms, it is expressly agreed, that none of the seamen or officers, on board any of the ships belonging to the subjects of that part of united Britain now called Scotland, shall either at home or abroad be pressed from on board their ships, to serve in any of her Majesty's ships of war, or frigates: and in case, after the said seven years, it shall happen that there be a deficiency of seamen in united Britain, that part now called Scotland shall only be burdened with such a proportion as our taxes bear in proportion to that part of united Britain now called England, but without prejudice to the officers of her majesty's ships or fleet, to engage many volunteer seamen in their service as they can agree with, in this part of united Britain; and this Article to be unalterable by any subsequent British parliament.' Which being read, after some reasoning thereupon, it was put to the vote, Ad the second clause, or not; and it was carried Not. Thereafter, the remainder of the said Vth Article being again read, the vote was put, Approve thereof or not; and it was carried Approve. Then the Lord Chancellor, by order of her majesty's High Commissioner, adjourned the parliament till Tuesday next at ten o'clock.

The Sixth Article.] On the 26th the VIth Article of Union was read; and it was moved, That there should be a scheme laid before the Parliament of the whole branches of their trade, as to export and import: and after some further debate, a proposal was given, viz. 'That the Article should be agreed to, except in so far as it should be rectified by the parliament, in the consideration of the subsequent Articles.' As also another proposal was given in, 'That seeing by the laws of England there were rewards given upon exportation of several kinds of grain, wherein oats was not specified, that after the Union when oats could be at 15s. per quarter, or under, there should be paid 2s. 6d. for every quarter of oat-meal, exported in the terms of the laws. whereby the terms were granted for exportation of the grains; and in respect there was a duty upon oats imported into England, but no duties upon oat-meal, the importing of which was a prejudice and discouragement to tillage: therefore, that from and after the Union, the quarter of Oat-meal should be deemed equal to three quarters of oats, and pay duty accordingly when imported to Scotland from any place whatsoever from beyond the sea.' Which being all read, after reasoning, it was moved, 'That the observations, in relation to the balance of trade, should be laid before the parliament, as made by the council of trade.' And after debate thereon, the further consideration was delayed till the next sitting; and it was ordered, 'That the observations made by the council of trade, be laid before the parliament.'

During the debate on the VIth Article, which brings them under the same customs with England, it was argued by some members, 'That it was hard to enter upon such a general, until they understood the several branches of their trade, and how they agreed with the impositions of England.' This point was argued by the duke of Hamilton, marquess of Annandale, &c. The marquess argued, 'That in the Treaty of 1603 they were allowed to be under their own regulations, and to have a book of rates for themselves; upon which many of the members thought it hard they should not be allowed the same now. And it being also urged, That the committee of parliament, appointed for a council of trade, last session, had prepared an account of the several branches of their trade; and where the balance lay; it was ordered, That this report should be laid before the House.

On the 27th the VIth Article or Union was again read, and a proposal given in for adding the word (Draw-backs) to both clauses of the said Article; which was agreed to.

And the said Article also amended was again read, as also the proposal mentioned in the last minutes, in relation to oats and oat-meal; with the addition of a further clause, in these terms: 'And that the beer of Scotland should have the like rewards and draw-backs as barley.' And it was likewise moved, 'That another clause should be added, allowing the like draw-back on the exportation of oat-meal, as is allowed on the exportation of rye in England. And after debate it was agreed, that the VIth Article, with the proposals for amendments, should be remitted to a Committee.'

Then was a clause offered to be added to the said VIth Article, thus: 'But Scotland, for the space of ——— years after the first day of May next, shall be free from, and no ways subject to the prohibitions and restrictions made against exporting of wool skins with wool upon them, and woollen yarn, which by the oaths of the seller and buyer shall be made appear to be the proper growth and product of Scotland, and spun within the same, which shall no ways be comprehended under any of the laws already made in England, or to be made during the space aforesaid.'

As also a clause thus; 'Excepting and reserving the duties upon export and import of such particular commodities, from which the subjects of either kingdom are specially exempted by their private rights, which, after the Union, are to remain safe and entire to them in all respects.'

And another clause thus, ' That after the Union all sorts of Scots linnen, or any kind of cloth made of flax or hemp, be exported out of the united kingdom free of all customs or other impositions whatsoever.'

And another thus, ' That before the Union, we may now have such a draw-back adjusted, as may enable us to export beef, pork and butter, to the West Indies, and other foreign parts, which will be one considerable branch of our trade after the Union.'

And another clause thus, ' That from and after the Union, all duties or bounty tolls, or other exactions upon black cattle, or any other product of Scotland, when carried into England, or product of England when carried into Scotland, payable either to the public or private persons, shall in all time coming be void and null.'

And another clause in these terms, ' That from and after the Union, the kingdom of Scotland shall have liberty for ever to manufacture plaiden, fingham, galloway, whites, serges, stockings, and all sorts of linnen, as they have been in use to do, conform to the regulations contained in their own laws, and to export the same to England, or the dominions and plantations thereunto belonging, or to any other place beyond seas, free of any duty or imposition whatsoever; but in case any of the subjects of that part of United Britain, now called Scotland, shall export any other sort of woollen manufacture than what is above mentioned, they are to be liable to the regulations and taxes of England, imposed before the Union, or to be imposed by the British parliament after the Union: all which were remitted to the Committee for examining the calculation of the equivalent.

The Seventh Article.] Then the VIIth Article of Union was read, and being debated on the 28th a proposal was made for an explanation or addition thus, ' That the 34 gallons English barrel of beer or ale, amounting to 12 gallons Scots, present measure sold in Scotland by the brewer at 9s. 6d. sterl. excluding all duties, and retailed including duties; and the retailers profit at 2d. per Scots pint, or eighth part of the Scots barrel, be not, after the Union, liable, on account of the present excises upon exciseable liquors in England, to any higher imposition than two shillings sterling upon the 34 gallons English barrels, being 12 gallons the present Scots measure.

And another clause being likewise offered thus, ' And it is hereby specially provided, that the twopenny ale and beer of Scotland, shall be only charged with the same excise as the small-beer in England.

After some debate, the vote was stated, ' Approve of the VIIth Article, as to the excise of ale and beer, with the explanation as contained in the first or last clause above-mentioned.' And carried for the first.

On the 29th it was moved, that the observations made by the council of trade, in relation to the export and import of this nation and balance of our trade, should be laid before a Committee to whom the sixth Article of the Union was remitted, and the same was accordingly ordered. As also the clerks of the said council of trade, were ordered to transmit to the said committee, all observations, papers and records relating thereto.

Tumult in Glasgow, &c. complained of by the Lord Chancellor.] Then the Lord Chancellor acquainted the parliament, that the secret council at their last meeting, had under their consideration, several accounts of irregular and tumultuary meetings, by some people of the common and meanest degree, in arms; and the abuses committed by them at Glasgow, Kilmarnock and Dumfries, and several places in Lanarkshire; and that there were papers drawn up, inviting people to take up arms, and to purchase ammunition and provisions, in order to their marching to disturb the parliament. All which he was directed by the secret council to lay before the parliament, to the effect proper methods might be resolved upon, for preventing the evil consequences of such practices after which he presented a letter from the magistrates of Dumfries to her majesty's secretary, bearing an account of the abuses and tumultuary meetings in that place, with a declaration emitted by those who met, which was affixed on the market cross of Dumfries and both were read.

Whereupon a draught of a proclamation, to be emitted by the parliament against all tumultuary and irregular meetings, and convocation of the lieges, was presented and read. And after some discourse thereupon, it being objected, that it did not appear that there was a particular information of any tumultuary meetings, or irregular convocations in any other part of the shire of Lanark, than at Glasgow her majesty's High Commissioner thereupon was pleased to notify to them, that he had information not only from Glasgow and Dumfries, but also from several places in Lanarkshire, of tumultuary and irregular meetings of men under arms, and of their giving out and publishing their design of marching to disturb the parliament.

The proclamation being approved of the draught of an Act suspending the effect of that clause in the Act of Security, for arming and exercising the fensible men, past in the second session of this parliament; and that during this session of parliament already, as read and past on the 30th, and the same, and the proclamation mentioned before, were ordered to be forthwith published and printed.

Then the VIIIth Article of Union was again read, and after some reasoning upon that part thereof, not formerly approved, it was put to vote, Approve of the rest of the VIIIth Article or not, and carried Approve.

A print was then given in, entitled, ' An account of the burning of the Articles of Union at Dumfries,' bearing the declaration read and affixed at the market cross thereof, by the tumult assembled on that occasion: and it being red, that enquiry be made, who had been printer and in-giver of the said scurrilous paper, and that the print be burnt by the hands of the hangman: it was remitted to the committee, to whom the VIth Article of Union was sent, to call for the magistrates of Edinburgh, and to take trial and make enquiry against the printer and in-giver of the said paper. It was ordered also, that the said scurrilous print should be burnt by the common hangman.

The XVth Article being read, on the 7th of December the report was brought in from the committee for examining the Calculation of the Equivalent, being as follows:

The committee of parliament, to whom the considering of the Calculation of the Equivalent was remitted, having considered the report made to them by Dr. James Gregory, professor of mathematics in the college of Edinburgh, and the report made by Dr. Thomas Bower, professor of the mathematics in the college of Aberdeen, of their several and respective examinations of the calculations and grounds thereof; whereupon the commissioners, in stating the Article for establishing the equivalent mentioned in the Article, say it is just, and the calculation is exact, and well founded in its terms, and in manner expressed in the said Article. Whereupon it was proposed to delay the consideration of the said XVth Article, till reports be brought in, in relation to the VIth and VIIIth Articles from the committee, to whom the said Articles were remitted.

And after debate upon it, it was agreed, that proceeding on the XVth shall not be understood to be any determination of the VIth or VIIIth Articles that stood committed; but that the reasoning and voting on the VIth or VIIIth Articles, shall be entire.

Then a state of a vote was offered in these terms, Approve of the first paragraph of the XVth Article, or not.

But it being moved, That the parliament first consider, whether they should be concerned in the payment of the English debts. A second state was thereupon offered, Whether they should engage in the payment of the debts of England; yea or no.

And after some reasoning on it, it was put to a vote which of the two should be the state of the vote, first or second.

Lord Belhaven's Protest against being concerned in the English Debts.] And the lord Belhaven gave in a Protest as follows: "I do protest in my own name, and in the name of those who do adhere to this my protest, that I voting and agreeing to the first clause of the XVth Article of the Treaty of Union, does in no ways infer any manner of consent or agreement, that Scotland should be liable to the payment of the English debts in general: but that it may be lawful to object against any branch of the said debt not already determined." And he took instruments upon it, and adhered thereunto.

Then the vote was put First or Second, and was carried First. Thereafter it was put to a vote, Approve of the first clause or paragraph of the XVth Article or not, and carried Approve.

The Sixth Article passed.] The VIth Article admitted of many debates, but was at last, on the 16th, passed with several additions, enlargements and explanations; but before, viz. on the 12th, the parliament ordered, That a scurrilous print, entitled, Queries to the Presbyterian noblemen, barons, burgesses, ministers and commoners in Scotland, who are for the scheme of an incorporating Union with England, according to the Articles agreed upon by the commissioners of both nations, be burned by the hands of the common hangman at the market cross of Edinburgh, to-morrow, between eleven and twelve of the clock, and the magistrates of Edinburgh appointed to see the same punctually done. And remitted to the committee of parliament, to whom the VIth and VIIIth Articles of Union were remitted, to make enquiry after the printer, author, and in-giver of the said scurrilous paper.

And on the 16th a scurrilous print, asserting the dependency of the crown and kingdom of Scotland upon that of England, was brought in, and several paragraphs thereof being read, Ordered, That the same be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, at the market cross of Edinburgh next morning.—The VIIIth Article of the Union took up the parliament's time from the 17th to the 26th, when it was approved with the several alterations, additions and enlargements made unto it; they went through the XVth Article on the 30th, and passed it.

The XVIth and XVIIth Articles were approved of on the 30th: then the XVIIIth Article was read, and a motion was made for making an additional clause to it, in these words; 'And that in making any such laws, special regard be had to overtures to be presented to that parliament by the lords of sessions of Scotland.' And after further reasoning, an overture was given in for adding another clause in these terms; 'that all Scotchmen be exempted from the English sacramental test, not only in Scotland, but in all places of the United kingdom and dominions thereunto belonging; and that they be declared capable of offices throughout the whole, without being obliged to take the said test.' And after debate, it being moved, 'that it was not now entire to add the said clause in relation to the sacramental test, in respect of the vote of parliament of the 12th of November last, against adding the like clause: After some further discourse thereon, it was agreed, 'That the same should be put to the vote, and that the members votes be marked and the list of their names, as they should vote, be printed and recorded, as usual.'

Then the vote was put, Whether it was entire to add the clause, or not? And it carried, Not; and so it was approved of.

The Scotch parliament, on the 2d of January, passed an Act for adjourning the session or term one month longer; and then proceed on the XIXth Article, to the first clause whereof they agreed with a stipulation, that the lords of the session should, for the future, be taken from among the advocates and writers to the signet (which was carried by thirteen votes only) and none to be deemed capable, that had not practised the law at least five years for the former.

The next day, a motion was made for an additional clause, in relation to the qualifications of writers, viz. 'With this provision, that no writer to the signet be capable to be admitted lord of the session, unless he undergo a private and public trial in the civil law before the faculty of advocates, and be found by them qualified for the above-said office, two years before they shall be named to be a lord of the session. After reasoning, the vote was stated, Add or not; but before voting, it was moved, that the qualifications made, or to be made for capacitating persons to be named ordinary lords of the sessions, shall be alterable by the parliament of Great Britain; and after debate, it was put to the vote, and carried Alterable, by sixty.' Then the vote was put, to add the clause about the qualification of writers, and it was carried, Add. The other clauses of the XIXth Article being read, and debated, the whole, as amended, was approved.

The 4th was spent in private affairs; for which, the lord chancellor, by order of the high commissioner, acquainted the house, that two other days should be appointed in this session.

On the 6th, the XXth Article, with the addition of the word Superiorities, and the 21st, without any amendment, were approved; and the next day the XXIId Article was read; and afterwards, the first paragraph in relation to the number of representatives for Scotland in the parliament of Great Britain, was read over again. After a long debate a Vote was stated, Approve of the first paragraph of the said Article or not; but before voting it was agreed, that the names of the members as they voted should be printed and recorded; and George Lockhart of Carnwarth, duke of Athol, earl of Buchan, earl of Errol, earl Marischal, and Walter Stewart, for the town of Linlithgow, gave in six several Protests, and took instruments thereof separately. Then the vote was put, Approve of the first paragraph of the XXIId Article, or not, and it was carried, Approve, by forty. The second paragraph of the said Article, about the calling the representatives from Scotland to the parliament of Great Britain, beginning thus, ('And that when her majesty, &c.') and ending thus, ('That the names of the persons so summoned, and elected, shall be returned by the privy council of Scotland, into the court from whence the said writ did issue,') was again read; and after some debate, an amendment was offered to be added, after these words, (according to the agreement in this Treaty) viz. 'In such manner, as by a subsequent parliament act, of this present session of the parliament of Scotland, shall be settled, which is hereby declared to be also voted, as a part of, and

'engrossed in this Treaty; and after further reasoning, it was moved, that the way and manner of choosing the representatives for Scotland, to the parliament of Great Britain, should be determined; and that a clause to that purpose be engrossed in this Article. After debate the vote was stated, Approve of the second paragraph of the XXIId Article, as amended by the above additional clause, yea or not; whereupon it being moved, to delay the said vote till next sitting of parliament, a previous vote was stated, Proceed, or delay; and it was carried, Proceed. The second paragraph of the XXIId Article with the amendment in the additional clause above asserted, or not. The clause with the amendments being again read, the earl of Aberdeen gave in a Protest, and took instruments thereupon. At last, the vote was put, Approve or not, and it was carried, Approve.

On the 8th it was moved, that the four protests given in the former sitting by the duke of Athol, earl of Buchan, George Lockhart of Carnwarth, and Walter Stewart, ought not to be inserted in the minutes, nor printed; and after some reasoning the earl of Marchmont gave in a protestation against the said four Protests, took instruments thereupon, and the lord chancellor, the marquiss of Montrose, president of the council, the duke of Argyll, the marquisses of Tweeddale and Lothian, and most of the well-affected to the Union, adhered thereto. The next day the lord Belmore gave in a Protestation against that of the earl of Marchmont, took instruments thereupon, and the duke of Hamilton and his party adhered to the same. After some further debate it was agreed, that none of the said protests should be inserted at length, in the minutes, or printed: but that they should be all inserted in the records of parliament.

Then the third paragraph of the XXIId Article, beginning, viz. 'And that if her majesty, on, or before the first day of May next, &c.' and ending thus, viz. 'And that the parliament may continue for such time only, as the present parliament of England might have continued, if the Union of the two kingdoms had not been made, unless sooner dissolved by her majesty,' was read: and after reasoning thereon, it was moved, to add the following clause, viz. 'And that the said parliament of Great Britain shall meet, and sit, once in three years, at least, in that part of Great Britain now called Scotland. After further debate, there were two states to the vote offered, the first, Approve of the third paragraph of the XXIId Article or not; and the second, Add the above clause or not, and the vote being put, first or second, it was carried First: Afterwards the vote was put, Approve of the third paragraph of the said Article, or not, and it was carried, Approve. The rest of the said Article was read, and after some reasoning, and reading of the oaths, which it related, an overture was given in for an additional clause, for explaining the words limitation,' mentioned in the oath appointed to be taken by stat. 13. William 3, ch. 6. as to an Overture for exempting persons in any office or employment in Scotland, from taking the oath of abjuration mentioned in the said Article. A third overture was given in for a clause, that so long as the act appointing the sacramental test, shall continue in force in England, all persons in public trust within the limits of Scotland, shall swear, and sign a formula hereto subjoined, in manner, and under the penalty therein mentioned. After reading the said three overtures, and reasoning thereon, a vote was stated, Approve of the XXIIId Article of Union as explained, or not. But before the vote was agreed, that notwithstanding of the said vote, and that the Article should nevertheless be approved, it should nevertheless be stated and free afterwards, to the parliament to give their sentiments thereon. And it being thereupon moved to delay the vote for approving the Article till next sitting, a previous vote was stated, Proceed, or Delay, and it was carried Proceed. Then the vote was put, Approve of the XXIIId Article as explained, or not, and it was carried Approve.

On the 10th, after reading the Address of the House of Commons against an Union, in the terms of the said Article, the overture for exempting persons in any office or employment in Scotland, from taking the oath of abjuration mentioned in the XXIIId Article of the Union, was again read, and after some reasoning thereon, the overture was dropped. Then the overture for an additional clause to the said XXIIId Article, for explaining the word 'limitation,' mentioned in the oath appointed to be taken by 13 William 3, cap. 6, was again read, viz. 'Like as it is declared, that by the word limitation, in the oath mentioned in the above Article, is only understood, entail of the succession, and not the conditions of government upon the successor; and that all persons of Scotland, who may be able to take the said oath, swear it in that sense only.' And, after reasoning thereon, the vote was put, Add the said clause, or Not, and it was carried, Not. Then the third overture for a clause to be added to the said XXIIId Article mentioned in the minutes of the last sitting, was again read in these terms, 'And further, it is agreed, that so long as that part of the second act, Anno 25 Ch. 2, appointing the sacramental test, shall stand, and continue in force in England, all persons in public trust, civil or military, within the limits of Scotland, shall swear and sign the formula under-written, within six months after the commencement of the Union: and all who shall be admitted to any public trust thereafter, shall, before the exercising their said office of trust, swear and subscribe the same, to be administered by the lords of the privy council, or any one of them, under the like penalties and disabilities, as are provided by the foresaid act made in the parliament of England. Here follows the formula, 'I A. B. do sincerely and solemnly declare, in the presence of God, that I own the Presbyterian government of the church, as by law established in Scotland, to be a lawful government of the church; and that I shall never, directly nor indirectly, endeavour the subversion thereof, nor any alteration in the worship, discipline, or government of the said church, as by law established: so help me God.' After reasoning thereon, the vote was put, Add the clause, or Not; and it was carried Not, by a majority of thirty-five voices. Then the XXIIIId Article of Union was read, and after reasoning thereon, the further debate was adjourned till the 13th, when an overture was given in, for adding a clause thereto in these terms, with this express provision, 'That none of the peers of Scotland should have personal protection within Scotland, for any debt owing before the commencement of the Union.' As also another overture for adding a clause, in these terms, 'That all the peers of that part of Great Britain now called Scotland, qualified according to law, shall, after the Union, have right to sit covered in the house of peers of Great Britain, notwithstanding that the right to give vote therein belongs only to the said sixteen peers, who are to be summoned in the manner appointed by the preceding Article.' After reasoning upon the said two overtures, and upon two separate motions, the first in relation to allowing all the peers of Scotland to sit upon the trial of the peers of Britain; and the other in relation to their precedency according to their patents; the vote was stated in these terms, Approve the XXIIIId Article of Union, or Alter, reserving entire the consideration of the above two overtures, and whether the same shall be added to the Article, and it was carried, Approve. Then the first overture for the clause, in relation to personal protection was again read; and after debate, it was put to the vote, Add the clause, or Not; and it was carried, Not. Afterwards the second overture, or a clause in relation to all the peers of Scotland, their sitting covered in the house of peers of Great Britain, was again read, and after reasoning, the vote was put, Add the clause, or Not, and it was carried, Not.

On the 14th the XXIVth Article was read, whereupon a memorial was given from Lyon king of arms, in relation to his precedency, which being read, after reasoning it was moved, that the rank and precedency of Lyon king of arms, be left to her majesty, and next to these words, in the said Article, viz. (And that the quartering the arms) these other words, viz. 'And the rank and precedency of Lyon king of arms of the kingdom of Scotland,' be added. And it being also moved, that his rank should be likewise inserted in the said Article, to be immediately next after Garter principal king of arms in England: after debate, it was put to the vote, Add the above words, that the rank and precedency be left to her Majesty, or Insert the rank and precedency, and it was carried, The words; which being accordingly added, there was another clause offered to be added, to the XXIVth Article, viz. 'And that the crown, scepter and sword of state, records of parliament, and all other records, rolls and registers whatsoever, both public and private, general and particular, and warrants thereof, continue to be kept, as they are, in that part of the united kingdom, now called Scotland, and that they shall so remain in times coming, notwithstanding the Union.' Which being read, the same was agreed to be added, and was accordingly subjoined, and the Article, as amended, read over. Then the vote was put, Approve of the said XXIVth Article, as amended, or Not, and it was carried Approve. The XXVth Article of Union being read: after reasoning thereon, the vote was put, Approve of the XXVth Article, or Not, and it was carried Approve.

Act of Ratification read.] Next day the draught of an Act, ratifying and approving the Treaty of Union of the two kingdoms of Scotland and England, was given in, and offered to be read; whereupon it was moved, that the parliament should first proceed, to the constitution of the manner of electing the representatives for Scotland to the parliament of Great Britain, and either now to determine that matter, or to appoint a day for that end. After debate the vote was stated, 'Proceed to the Ratification of the Treaty of Union, and Act for Security of the Protestant religion, and Presbyterian church government, or to the constitution of the manner of electing the representatives for Scotland to the parliament of Great Britain?' but before voting, it was agreed, that in case it should be carried to proceed to the Ratification, the parliament would immediately, after passing the Act of Ratification, proceed to the constitution of the manner of electing the representatives for Scotland. Then the vote was put, Proceed to the Ratification or Constitution, and it was carried Ratification: after which the draught of the Act, ratifying, approving, and at length, narrating the Articles of Union, as enlarged, explained and amended, and the Act for Security of the Protestant Religion, and Presbyterian Church-government was read; and after some discourse, a first reading marked thereon.

Act for Security of the Presbyterian Church Government passed.] On the 16th, the said Act was read a second time; and then the Act for Security of the Protestant Religion, and Presbyterian Church government, inserted in, and ratified by that Act, was touched with the royal sceptre, by the Lord High Commissioner.

Representation, &c. of the Church of Scotland.] Immediately after this, the following Representation and Petition were presented to the House:

The Representation and Petition of the Commission of the General Assembly of the National Church of Scotland, was presented to the House:

"Humbly shewing; That we, considering the trust reposed in us by the late General Assembly, find it our duty to lay before your grace and lordships, when, as we are informed, you are about the passing of an Act of Ratification of the Articles of the Treaty of Union betwixt the two kingdoms of Scotland and England, which contains these following words: Declaring nevertheless, that the parliament of England may provide for the Security of the Church of England, as they shall think expedient, to take place within the bounds of the said kingdom of England, and not derogating from the security above provided, for establishing the Church of Scotland within the bounds of this kingdom, which shall not suspend or derogate from the force and effect of this present ratification, but shall be understood as here included, without any necessity of any new ratification in the parliament of Scotland: which clause seems to us, not only to be a blank, put, with your grace and lordship's consent, in the hands of the parliament of England, to enact what they shall think fit, for securing the hierarchy and ceremonies of the Church; but also a consent that it be an Article and fundamental of the Union; and that as it is contained in your ratification cannot but imply a manifest homologation.—We therefore humbly beseech your grace and lordships, that there be no such stipulation, or consent for the establishment of that hierarchy and ceremonies, as you would not involve yourselves and this nation in guilt, and as you consult the peace and quiet of this nation, both in church and state. We pray, that God may bless and preserve our gracious queen, and direct your grace and lordships in this, and all the great and momentous affairs, which are, or may be before you."

Signed in the name, in the presence, and at the appointment of the commission of the late General Assembly, by
Sic Subscriptur

WILL. WISHART, Moderator.

The Act of Ratification passed.] After reasoning upon the Act and Representation, the vote was stated, Approve the act, or not: but before voting, it was agreed, that the votes be marked, and the chancellor allowed to be marked, as an approver. At the same time, the duke of Douglas gave in a protestation for his privilege of the first vote in parliament, and took instruments thereon; and the duke of Hamilton gave in also a protestation to the contrary. Then the vote was put, Approve the act, ratifying and approving the Treaty of Union of the two kingdoms of Scotland and England, Yea or Not; and it was carried Approve, by a majority of 110 voices, against 63, and then the act was touched with the royal scepter by her majesty's high commissioner in the usual manner.

The next business the Scotch parliament went upon, was the preparing an act for settling the manner of electing the sixteen peers, and forty-five commoners, to represent Scotland in the parliament of Great Britain.

ich was debated in the sittings of the 20th, 2, 23d, 24th, 27th, 28th, 29th, and 31st tant.

[The Manner of electing Representatives of the Island settled.] On the 23d, an overture relating to the ways of electing the representatives for Scotland, to the parliament of Great Britain, was read. And after reasoning thereon, the vote was put, Whether the 16 peers, who were to be representatives for Scotland, the parliament of Great Britain, should be chosen by Rotation or Election; and it was carried, by Election. Then it was moved, that it should be considered, what way the election should be made, whether by balloting, or by an open election; and after debate thereon, the vote was put; Whether it shall be by Open Election, or by balloting; and it was carried, by Open Election. On the 24th it was debated what proportions the members and boroughs should have, of the 45 members that were to sit in the House of Commons of Great Britain. And it being proposed, that 30 should be the number for the members, and 15 the number for the boroughs, it was put to the vote, and carried Approve.

The 29th, a vote was put, if the burgh of Edinburgh, by itself, should have one representative or not, and it was carried, One. Then a scheme dividing the burghs into 15 districts, each of which districts was to have one representative, was given in, and read as follows: The burghs of Kirkwall, Wick, Dornock, Lingsay, and Tain, one; Fortross, Inverness, Nairn, and Forres, one; Elgin, Cullen, Balmory, Inverary and Kintore, one; Aberdeen, Bervie, and Strathmore, Aberbrothock and Brechin, one; Perth, Dundee, Cowper and St. Andrews, one; Crayke, Kilreany, Anstruther, and Westray, one; Pitenwee, one; Dyro, Kirkcaldy, Kinghorn, and Brunt island, one; Inverkeith, Dumfries, Queen's-ferry, Glasgow and Sterling, one; Glasgow, Renfrew, and Glasgow, one; Edinburgh, one; Haddington, North-Berwick, Dunbar, and Jedburgh, one; Selkirk, Peebles, and Lanark, one; Dumfries, Sanquhar, Anan, Lockmohar and Kircubright, one; Wigtown, New-Galloway, Whithorn and Stranraer, one; Aire, Irwin, Rothsay, Cambleton and Inverary, one.

[Scotch Commissioners, &c. voted their Expenses.] This Vote being put, the scheme was carried, and the parliament, on the last of this month, took into consideration a motion for allowing the expence to the commissioners for the Union, and it was resolved, that each nobleman concerned should have 12,000*l.* each, and every other commissioner 6,000*l.*; their secretary 4,800*l.* the three accountants 1,400*l.* each, out of the equivalent, pari passu, with public debts, after the African company; and before voting, the votes were ordered to be printed, and the lord Archibald Campbell, when made earl of Isla, was allowed his expences as a nobleman! It was also carried that the commissioners for the Treaty in 1702, should be allowed for their expences, each nobleman 500*l.* sterling, each baron 300*l.* and each borough 200*l.* and the expence was declared to be a public debt, and referred to a committee to state the same as such.

[The Parliament of Scotland adjourned.] The remainder of the session was spent, among other affairs, in examining the accounts of the African and Indian company, and providing for the due application of the equivalent. In disposing of this sum, great partialities appeared, which were much complained of, but there was not strength to oppose them. The ministry, and those who depended on them, moved for very extravagant allowances to those who had been employed in this last, and in the former Treaty: and they made large allotments of some public debts, that were complained of as unreasonable and unjust; by which a great part of the sum was diverted from answering the end for which it was given. This was much opposed by the Squadrone; but as the ministers promoted it, and those who were to get by it, made all the interest they could to obtain it (some few of them only excepted, who, as became generous patriots, shewed more regard to the public, than to their private ends) so those who had opposed the Union, were not ill pleased to see this sum so misapplied: hoping, by that means, that the aversion which they endeavoured to infuse into the nation against the Union, would be much increased; therefore they let every thing go as the ministers proposed, to the great grief of those who wished well to the public.

Mar. 25. The business of the session being ended, the High Commissioner went to the Parliament house in great solemnity, being attended by the whole troop of life-guards, and all the nobility and gentry in their coaches, and, having touched with the royal scepter several acts, made the following speech to the parliament:

“My lords and gentlemen; The public business of this session being now over, it is full time to put an end to it. I am persuaded, that we and our posterity will reap the benefit of the Union of the two kingdoms; and I doubt not, but, as this parliament has had the honour to conclude it, you will, in your several stations, recommend to the people of this nation a grateful sense of her majesty's goodness and great care for the welfare of her subjects, in bringing this important affair to perfection; and that you will promote an universal desire in this kingdom, to become one in heart and affections, as we are inseparably joined in interest with our neighbour nation.—My lords and gentlemen, I have a very deep sense of the assistance and respect I have met with from you in this session of parliament; and I shall omit no occasion of shewing, to the utmost of my power, the grateful remembrance I have of it.”

The parliament being adjourned to the 22d of April, the duke returned to the queen's palace in the same solemnity as he went to the house, and gave a splendid entertainment to which he met with, he set out, a few days after, for London, where he arrived the 16th of April,

A. D. 1707.

THE Estates of Parliament considering, that Articles of Union of the kingdoms of Scotland and England, were agreed on the twenty-second of July, 1706, by the Commissioners nominated on behalf of this kingdom, under her majesty's great seal of Scotland, bearing date the 27th of February last past, in pursuance of the fourth act of the third session of this parliament, and the commissioners nominated on behalf of the kingdom of England, under her majesty's great seal of England, bearing date at Westminster the 10th day of April last past, in pursuance of an act of parliament made in England the 3rd year of her majesty's reign, to treat of and concerning an Union of the said kingdoms; which Articles were, in all humility, presented to her majesty, upon the 23d of the said month of July, and were recommended to this parliament by her majesty's royal letter of the date the 31st day of July, 1706; and that the said estates of parliament have agreed to, and approved of the said Articles of Union, with some additions and explanations, as is contained in the Articles hereafter insert. rated and exempted by their private rights, which, after the Union, are to remain safe and intire to them, in all respects, as before the same; and that, from and after the Union, no Scots cattle carried into England shall be liable to any other duties, either on the public or private accounts, than these duties, to which the cattle of England are or shall be liable within the said kingdom. And seeing, by the laws of England, there are rewards granted upon the exportation of certain kinds of grain, wherein oats grinded or ungrinded are not expressed, that, from and after the Union, when oats shall be sold at fifteen shillings sterling per quarter, or under, there shall be paid two shillings and sixpence sterling for every quarter of the oatmeal exported in the terms of the law, whereby and so long as rewards are granted for exportation of other grains, and that the bear of Scotland have the same rewards as barley. And for establishing an equality in trade, that all fishes exported from Scotland to England, and put on board in Scotland, to be exported to parts beyond the seas, and provisions for ships in Scotland, and for foreign voyages, may be salted with Scots salt, paying the same duty for what salt is so employed as the like quantity of such salt pays in England, and under the same penalties, forfeitures and provisions, for preventing of frauds, as are mentioned in the laws of England; and that, from and after the Union, the laws and acts of parliament in Scotland, for pining, curing and packing of herrings, white fish and salmon for exportation with foreign salt only, without any mixture of British or Irish salt, and for preventing of frauds in curing and packing of fish, be continued in force in Scotland, subject to such alterations as shall be made by the

Our sovereign lady and the estates of parliament considering, That, by the late act of parliament for a Treaty with England, for an Union of both kingdoms, it is provided, that the commissioners for that Treaty should not treat of or concerning any alteration of the worship, discipline, and government of the church of this kingdom, as now by law established: which Treaty being now reported to the parliament, and it being reasonable and necessary, that the true Protestant religion, as presently professed within this kingdom, with the worship, discipline, and government of his church, should be effectually and unalterably secured; therefore her majesty, with advice and consent of the said estates of parliament, doth hereby establish and confirm the said true Protestant religion, and the worship, discipline and government of this church, to continue without any alteration to the people of this land in all succeeding generations; and more especially, her majesty, with advice and consent foresaid, ratifies, approves, and forever confirms, the fifth act of the first parliament of king William and queen Mary, intitled, 'Act ratifying the Confession of Faith, and settling Presbyterian Church Government,' with the hail other acts of parliament relating thereto, in prosecution of the Declaration of the Estates of this kingdom, containing the Claim of Right, bearing date the 11th of April, 1689; and her majesty, with advice and consent foresaid, expressly provides and declares, that the foresaid true Protestant religion, contained in the above-mentioned Confession of Faith, with the form and purity of worship presently in use within this church, and its Presbyterian church government and discipline, that is to say, the government of the church by kirk sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods, and general assemblies, all established by the foresaid acts of parliament, pursuant to the Claim of Right, shall remain and continue unalterable; and that the said Presbyterian government shall be the only government of the church within the kingdom of Scotland. And further, for the greater security of the foresaid Protestant religion, and of the worship, discipline, and government of this church as above established, her majesty, with advice and consent foresaid, statutes and ordains, that the universities and colleges of St. Andrew's, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh, as now established by law, shall continue within this kingdom for ever. And that, in all time coming, the professors, principals, regents, masters, or others, bearing office in any university, college or school within this kingdom, be capable, or be admitted or allowed to continue in the exercise of their said functions, but such as shall own and acknowledge the civil government in manner prescribed, or to be prescribed by the acts of parliament. As also, that before, or at their admissions, they do and shall acknowledge and profess, and shall subscribe to the foresaid Confession of Faith, as the Confession of their Faith; and that they will practise and conform themselves to the worship presently in use in this church, and submit themselves to the government and discipline thereof, and never endeavour, directly or indirectly, the prejudice or subversion of the same: and that before the respective Presbyteries of their bounds, by whatsoever gift, presentation, or provision, they may be thereto provided. And further, her majesty, with advice foresaid, expressly declares and statutes, that none of the subjects of this kingdom shall be liable to; but all and every one of them for ever free of any oath, test or subscription within this kingdom, contrary to, or inconsistent with, the foresaid true Protestant religion and Presbyterian church government, worship and discipline as above established; and that the same, within the bounds of this church and kingdom, shall never be imposed upon, or required of them in any sort. And, lastly, that after the decease of her present majesty (whom God long preserve), the sovereign succeeding to her in the royal government of the kingdom of Great Britain shall, in all time coming, at his or her accession to the crown, swear and subscribe, that they shall inviolably maintain and preserve the foresaid settlement of the true Protestant religion, with the government, worship, discipline, right, and privileges of this church, as above established by the laws of this kingdom, in prosecution of the Claim of Right. And it is hereby statute and ordained, that this act of parliament, with the establishment therein contained, shall be held and observed, in all time coming, as a fundamental and essential condition of any Treaty or Union to be concluded betwixt the two kingdoms, without any alteration thereof, or derogation thereto, in any sort, for ever. As also, that this act of parliament, and settlement therein contained, shall be insert and repeated in any act of parliament that shall pass, for agreeing and concluding the foresaid Treaty or Union betwixt the two kingdoms; and that the same shall be therein expressly declared to be a fundamental and essential condition of the said Treaty or Union, in all time coming. Which Articles of Union, and Act immediately above-written, her majesty, with advice and consent foresaid, statutes, enacts, and ordains to be, and continue, in all time coming, the sure and perpetual foundation of a compleat and intire Union of the two kingdoms of Scotland and England, under this express condition and provision, that the approbation and ratification of the foresaid Ar-

ment of England, as they are now agreed to, approved and confirmed by her majesty, with and by the authority of the parliament of Scotland. Declaring nevertheless, that the parliament of England may provide for the security of the church of England as they think expedient to take place within the bounds of the said kingdom of England, and not derogating from the security above provided, for establishing of the church of Scotland within the bounds of this kingdom. As also, the said parliament of England may extend the additions and other provisions contained in the Articles of Union, as above insert, in favours of the subjects of Scotland, to and in favours of the subjects of England, which shall not suspend or derogate from the force and effect of this present ratification, but shall be understood as herein included, without the necessity of any new ratification in the parliament of Scotland. And, lastly, her majesty enacts and declares, that all laws and statutes in this kingdom, so far as they are contrary to, or inconsistent with, the terms of these Articles as above-mentioned, shall, from and after the Union, cease and become void."

Follows the Exemplification under the Great Seal of England, of the Act of the Parliament of that Kingdom, intituled, An Act for an UNION of the two Kingdoms of ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, as the same was transmitted to the Parliament of Scotland, and ordered to be recorded.

Fidei Defensor, &c. quod communi omnium Dnor. tam Spialium quam Temporal. et Communitatis, &c. consensus et regie Majestatis assensu (inter alia) statum inactitatum et stabilitum fuit hoc sequens statutum, viz. "An Act for an Union of the kingdoms of England and Scotland," capitulum quidem tenor sequitur in his verbis: Nos Gracioso Sovereign, Whereas Articles of Union were agreed on the 22nd day of July, in the 2d year of your majesty's reign, by the Commissioners nominated on behalf of the Kingdom of England, under your majesty's great seal of England, bearing date at Westminster the 10th of April then last past, in pursuance of an Act of parliament made in England, in the third year of your majesty's reign; and the commissioners nominated on the behalf of the kingdom of Scotland, under your majesty's great seal of Scotland, bearing date the 27th day of February, in the 4th year of your majesty's reign, in pursuance of the fourth Act in the third session of the present parliament of Scotland, to treat of and concerning an Union of the said kingdoms; and whereas an Act hath passed in the parliament of Scotland, at Edinburgh, the 16th day of January, in the fifth year of your majesty's reign, wherein it is mentioned, that the estates of Parliament, considering the said Articles of Union of the two kingdoms, had agreed to and approved of the said Articles of Union, with some additions and explanations: and that your majesty, with advice and consent of the estates of parliament for establishing the Protestant Religion, and Presbyterian Church Government within the kingdom of Scotland, had passed in the same session of parliament, an Act intituled, "Act for securing of the Protestant Religion and Presbyterian Church Government," which by the tenor thereof, was appointed to be inserted in an Act ratifying the Treaty, and expressly declared to be a fundamental and essential condition of the said Treaty or Union in all times coming, the tenor of which Articles, as ratified and approved of, with additions and explanations, by the said Act of Parliament of Scotland, follows:

Article 1. That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland shall, upon the 1st day of May, which shall be in the year 1707, and for ever after, be united into one Kingdom, by the name of Great Britain; and that the ensigns armorial of the said united Kingdom be such as her majesty shall appoint, and the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew be conjoined in such manner as her majesty shall think fit, and used in all flags, banners, standards, and ensigus, both at sea and land.

Art. 2. That the succession to the monarchy of the united kingdom of Great Britain, and of the dominions thereto belonging, after her most sacred majesty, and in default of issue of her majesty, be, remain and continue, to the most excellent princess Sophia, electress and dutchess Dowager of Hanover, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants, upon whom the crown of England is settled by an act of parliament made in England, in the 12th year of the reign of his late majesty king William the 3d, intituled, "An Act for the further limitation of the crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject:" and that all Papists and persons marrying Papists, shall be excluded from and for ever incapable to inherit, possess, or enjoy the imperial crown of Great Britain, and the dominions thereunto belonging, or any part thereof; and, in every such case, the crown and government shall, from time to time, descend to, and be enjoyed by such person, being a Protestant, as should have inherited and enjoyed the same, in case such Papist or person marrying a Papist, was naturally dead, according to provision for the descent of the crown of England, made by another act of parliament in England, in the first year of the reign of their late majesties king William and queen Mary, intituled, 'An Act declaring the rights and liberties of the subject, and settling the succession of the crown.'

Art. 3. That the united kingdom of Great Britain be represented by one and the same parliament, to be styled 'The Parliament of Great Britain.'

Art. 4. That all the subjects of the united kingdom of Great Britain shall, from and after the Union, have full freedom and intercourse of trade and navigation to and from any port or place within the said united kingdom, and the dominions and plantations thereunto belonging; and that there be a communication of all other rights, privileges and advantages, which do or may belong to the subjects of either kingdom, except where it is otherwise expressly agreed in these Articles.

Art. 5. That all ships, or vessels, belonging to her majesty's subjects of Scotland at the time of ratifying the Treaty of Union of the two kingdoms in the parliament of Scotland, though foreign built, be deemed and pass as ships of the built of Great Britain: the owner, or, where there are more owners, one or more of the owners, within 12 months after the 1st of May next, making oath, that at the time of ratifying the Treaty of Union in the parliament of Scotland, the same did, in whole or in part, belong to him or them, or to some other subject or subjects of Scotland, to be particularly named, with the place of their respective abodes; and that the same doth then, at the time of the said deposition, wholly belong to him or them; and that no foreigner, directly or indirectly, hath any share, part, or interest therein; which oath shall be made before the chief officer or officers of the customs, in the port next to the abode of the said owner or owners; and the said officer, or officers, shall be empowered to administer the said oath: and the oath being so administered, shall be attested by the officer or officers, who administered the same; and being registered by the said officer or officers, shall be delivered to the master of the ship, for security of her navigation; and the duplicate thereof shall be transmitted, by the said officer or officers, to the chief officer or officers of the customs in the port of Edinburgh, to be there entered in a register, and from thence be sent to the port of London, to be there entered in the general register of all trading ships belonging to Great Britain.

Art. 6. That all parts of the united kingdom for ever, from and after the Union, shall have the same allowances, encouragements, and drawbacks; and be under the same prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations of trade, and liable to the same customs and duties on import and export; and that the allowances, encouragements and drawbacks, prohibitions, restrictions and regulations of trade, and the customs and duties on import and export, settled in England, when the Union commences, shall, from and after the Union, take place throughout the whole united kingdom, excepting and reserving the duties upon export and import of such particular commodities from which any persons, the subjects of either kingdom, are specially liberated and exempted by their private rights, which, after the Union, are to remain safe and intire to them, in all respects, as before the same; and that, from and after the Union, no Scots cattle carried into England shall be liable to any other duties, either on the public or private accounts, than those duties to which the cattle of England are or shall be liable within the said kingdom. And seeing, by the laws of England, there are rewards granted upon the exportation of certain kinds of grain, wherein oats grinded or ungrinded are not expressed, that, from and after the Union, when oats shall be sold at 15 s. sterling per quarter, or under, there shall be paid 2 s. 6 d. sterling for every quarter of the oatmeal exported in the terms of the law, whereby and so long as rewards are granted for exportation of other grain, and that the bear of Scotland have the same rewards as barley. And in respect the importation of victual into Scotland, from any place beyond sea, would prove a discouragement to tillage, therefore, that the prohibition, as now in force by the law of Scotland, against importation of victuals from Ireland, or any other place beyond sea into Scotland, do, after the Union, remain in the same force as now it is, until more proper and effectual ways be provided by the parliament of Great Britain, for discouraging the importation of the said victuals from beyond sea.

Art. 7. That all parts of the united kingdom be for ever, from and after the Union, liable to the same excises upon all excisable liquors, excepting only, that the 34 gallons English barrel of beer or ale, amounting to 12 gallons

Scots present measure, sold in Scotland by the brewer, at 9 s. 6 d. sterling, excluding all duties, and retailed, including duties and the retailer's profit, at 2 d. the Scots pint, or eighth part of the Scots gallon, be not, after the Union, liable, on account of the present excise upon excisable liquors in England, to any higher imposition than 2 s. sterling upon the foresaid 34 gallons English barrel, being 12 gallons the present Scots measure; and that the excise settled in England on all other liquors, when the Union commences, take place throughout the whole united kingdom.

Art. 8. That, from and after the Union, all foreign salt, which shall be imported into Scotland, shall be charged, at the importation there, with the same duties as the like salt is now charged with, being imported into England, and to be levied and secured in the same manner. But, in regard the duties of great quantities of foreign salt imported may be very heavy upon the merchants importers, that therefore all foreign salt imported into Scotland shall be cellared and locked up under the custody of the merchants importers and the officers employed for levying the duties upon salt; and that the merchant may have what quantity thereof his occasion may require, not under a weigh or 40 bushels at a time, giving security for the duty of what quantity he receives, payable in six months; but Scotland shall, for the space of seven years from the said Union, be exempted from paying in Scotland, for salt made there, the duty or excise now payable for salt made in England, but, from the expiration of the said seven years, shall be subject and liable to the same duties for salt made in Scotland, as shall be then payable for salt made in England, to be levied and secured in the same manner, and with proportionable drawbacks and allowances, as in England; with this exception, that Scotland shall, after the said seven years, remain exempted from the duty of 2 s. 4 d. a bushel on home salt, imposed by an act made in England in the ninth and tenth of king William the 3rd of England. And if the parliament of Great Britain shall, at or before the expiring of the said seven years, substitute any other fund in place of the said 2 s. 4 d. of excise on the bushel of home salt, Scotland shall, after the said seven years, bear a proportion of the said fund, and have an equivalent in the terms of this Treaty: and that, during the said seven years, there shall be paid in England, for all salt made in Scotland, and imported from thence into England, the same duties upon the importation as shall be payable for salt made in England, to be levied and secured in the same manner as the duties on foreign salt are to be levied and secured in England. And that, after the said seven years, as long as the said duty of 2 s. 4 d. a bushel upon salt is continued in England, the said 2 s. 4 d. a bushel shall be payable for all salt made in Scotland, and imported into England, to be levied and secured in the same manner; and that, during the continuance of the duty of 2 s. 4 d. a bushel upon salt made in England, no salt whatsoever be brought from Scotland to England by land in any manner, under the penalty of forfeiting the salt, and the cattle and carriages made use of in bringing the same, and paying 20 s. for every bushel of wet salt, and proportionably for a greater or lesser quantity; for which the carrier, as well as the owner, shall be liable jointly and severally, and the persons bringing or carrying the same, to be imprisoned by any one justice of the peace by the space of six months, without bail, and until the penalty be paid. And, for establishing an equality in trade, that all fish exported from Scotland to England, and put on board in Scotland, to be exported to parts beyond the seas, and provision for ships in Scotland, and for foreign voyages, may be salted with Scots salt, paying the same duty for wet salt as is so employed as the like quantity of sea salt pays in England, and under the same penalties, forfeitures and provisions, for preventing of frauds, as are mentioned in the laws of England: And that, from and after the Union, the laws and acts of parliament in Scotland, for pineing, curing, and packing of herrings, white fish, and salmon, for exportation with foreign salt only, without any mixture of British or Irish salt, and for preventing of frauds in curing and packing of fish, be continued in force in Scotland, subject to such alterations as shall be made by the parliament of Great Britain; and that all fish exported from Scotland to parts beyond the seas, which shall be cured with foreign salt only, and without mixture of British or Irish salt, shall have the same easies, premiums, and draw-backs, as are or shall be allowed to such persons as export the like fish from England: and that, for encouragement of the herring fishing, there shall be allowed and payed to the subjects inhabitants of Great Britain, during the present allowances for other fish, 10 s. 5 d. sterling for every barrel of white herrings which shall be exported from Scotland; and that there shall be allowed 5 s. sterling for every barrel of beef or pork salted with foreign salt, without mixture of British or Irish salt, and exported for sale from Scotland to parts beyond sea, allowable by the parliament of Great Britain. And if any matters of fraud relating to the said duties on salt shall hereafter appear, which are not sufficiently provided against by this Article, the same shall be subject to such further provisions as shall be thought fit by the parliament of Great Britain.

Art. 9. That, whensoever the sum of 1,997,763 l. 8 s. 4½ d. shall be enacted by the parliament of Great Britain, to be raised in that part of the united kingdom now called England, on land, and other things usually charged in acts of parliament there, for granting an aid to the crown by a land tax, that part of the united kingdom now called Scotland shall be charged, by the same act, with a further sum of 48,000 l. free of all charges, as the quota of Scotland to such tax, and so proporonally for any greater or lesser sum raised in England by any tax on land, and other things usually charged together with the land; and that such taxa for Scotland, in the cases aforesaid, be raised and collected in the same manner as the cess now is in Scotland: but subject to such regulations, in the manner of collecting, as shall be made by the parliament of Great Britain.

Art. 10. That, during the continuance of the respective duties on stamp paper, vellum, and parchment, by the several acts now in force in England, Scotland shall not be charged with the same respective duties.

Art. 11. That, during the continuance of the duties payable in England on windows and lights, which determine on the first day of August, 1710, Scotland shall not be charged with the same duties.

Art. 12. That, during the continuance of the duties payable in England on coals, culm, and cinders, which determines the 30th day of September, 1710, Scotland shall not be charged therewith for coals, culm, and cinders, consumed there; but shall be charged with the same duties as in England for all coal, culm, and cinders not consumed in Scotland.

Art. 13. That, during the continuance of the duty payable in England upon malt, which determines the 24th day of June, 1707, Scotland shall not be charged with that duty.

Art. 14. That the kingdom of Scotland be not charged with any other duties laid on by the parliament of England before the Union, except those consented to in this Treaty, in regard it is agreed, that all necessary provision shall be made by the parliament of Scotland for the public charge and service of that kingdom, for the year 1707; provided, nevertheless, that, if the parliament of England shall think fit to lay any further impositions, by way of customs, or such excises, with which, by virtue of this Treaty, Scotland is to be charged equally with England, in such case, Scotland shall be liable to the same customs and excises, and have an equivalent to be settled by the parliament of Great Britain; with this further provision, that any malt, to be made and consumed in that part of the united kingdom now called Scotland, shall not be charged with any imposition on malt during this present war; and seeing it cannot be supposed that the parliament of Great Britain will ever lay any sort of burdens upon the united kingdom but what they shall find of necessity at that time for the preservation and good of the whole, and with due regard to the circumstances and abilities of every part of the united kingdom; therefore it is agreed, that there be no further exemption insisted upon for any part of the united kingdom; but that the consideration of any exemptions, beyond what are already agreed on in this Treaty, shall be left to the determination of the parliament of Great Britain.

Art. 15. That whereas, by the terms of this Treaty, the subjects of Scotland, for preserving an equality of trade throughout the united kingdom, will be liable to several customs and excises now payable in England, which will be applicable towards payment of the debts of England, contracted before the Union; it is agreed, that Scotland shall have an equivalent for what the subjects thereof shall be so charged towards payment of the said debts of England in all particulars whatsoever, in manner following, viz. That, before the Union of the said kingdoms, the sum of 398,085*l.* 10*s.* be granted to her majesty, by the parliament of England, for the uses after-mentioned, being the equivalent to be answered to Scotland, for such parts of the said customs and excises upon all excisable liquors, with which that kingdom is to be charged upon the Union, as will be applicable to the payment of the said debts of England, according to the proportions which the present customs in Scotland, being 30,000*l.* per annum; do bear to the customs in England, computed at 1,341,559*l.* per annum, and which the present excises on excisable liquors in Scotland, being 33,500*l.* per annum, do bear to the excises on excisable liquors in England, computed at 917,609*l.* per annum, which sum of 398,085*l.* 10*s.* shall be due and payable from the time of the Union: and in regard that, after the Union, Scotland becoming liable to the same customs and duties payable on import and export, and to the same excises on all excisable liquors as in England, as well upon that account, as upon the account of the increase of trade and people (which will be the happy consequence of the Union), the said revenues will much improve beyond the before-mentioned annual values thereof, of which no present estimate can be made: yet nevertheless, for the reasons aforesaid, there ought to be a proportionable equivalent answered to Scotland; it is agreed, that, after the Union, there shall be an account kept of the said duties arising in Scotland, to the end it may appear what ought to be answered to Scotland as an equivalent for such proportion of the said increase as shall be applicable to the payment of the debts of England. And, for the further and more effectual answering the several ends hereafter-mentioned, it is agreed, that, from and after the Union, the whole increase of the revenues of customs and duties on import and export, and excise upon excisable liquors in Scotland, over and above the annual produce of the said respective duties as above stated, shall go and be applied, for the term of seven years to the uses hereafter mentioned, and that, upon the said account, there shall be answered to Scotland annually, from the end of seven years after the Union, an equivalent in proportion to such part of the said increase as shall be applicable to the debts of England; and, generally, that an equivalent shall be answered to Scotland for such parts of the English debts as Scotland may hereafter become liable to pay by reason of the Union, other than such for which appropriations have been made by parliament in England, of the customs or other duties on export and import, and all other moneys which are to be answered or allowed to Scotland as aforesaid, are to be applied; it is agreed, that in the first place, out of the foresaid sum, what consideration shall be found necessary to be had for any losses which private persons may sustain, by reducing the coin of Scotland to the standard and value of the coin of England, may be made good: in the next place, that the capital stock or fund of the African and Indian Company of Scotland advanced, together with the interest for the said capital stock after the rate of five per cent. per annum, from the respective times of the payment thereof, shall be payed; upon payment of which capital stock and interest, it is agreed the said Company be dissolved and cease; and also, that, from the time of passing the act of parliament in England, for raising the said sum of 398,085*l.* 10*s.* the said Company shall neither trade, nor grant licence to trade, providing, that, if the said stock and interest shall not be payed in twelve months after the commencement of the Union, that then the said Company may from thenceforward, trade, or give licence to trade, until the said whole capital stock and interest shall be paid: and as to the overplus of the said sum of 398,085*l.* 10*s.* after payment of what considerations shall be had for losses in repairing the coin, and paying the said capital stock and interest, and also the whole increase of the said revenues of customs, duties, and excises, above the present value, which shall arise in Scotland, during the said term of seven years, together with the equivalent, which shall become due upon the improvement thereof in Scotland after the said term; and also, as to all other sums, which, according to the agreements aforesaid, may become payable to Scotland by way of equivalent for what that kingdom shall hereafter become liable towards payment of the debt of England; it is agreed, that the same be applied in manner following, viz. That all the public debts of the kingdom of Scotland, as shall be adjusted by this present parliament, shall be payed; and that 2,000*l.* per annum, for the space of seven years, shall be applied towards encouraging and promoting the manufacture of coarse wool within those shires which produce the wool, and that the first 2,000*l.* sterling be payed at Martinmass next, and so yearly at Martinmass during the space foresaid; and, afterwards, the same shall be wholly applied towards the encouraging and promoting the fisheries, and such other manufactures and improvements in Scotland as may most conduce to the general good of the United Kingdom. And it is agreed, that her majesty be empowered to appoint commissioners, who shall be accountable to the parliament of Great Britain, for disposing the said sum of 398,085*l.* 10*s.* and all other moneys which shall arise to Scotland upon the agreements aforesaid, to the purposes before-men-venues, and of all other duties from whence an equivalent may arise; and that the collectors and managers of the said revenues and duties be obliged to give to the said commissioners subscribed authentic abbreviates of the produce of such revenues and duties arising in their respective districts; and that the said commissioners shall have their office within the limits of Scotland, and shall in such office keep books, containing accounts of the amount of the equivalents, and how the same shall have been disposed of, from time to time, which may be inspected by any of the subjects who shall desire the same.

Art. 16. That, from and after the Union, the coin shall be of the same standard and value throughout the united kingdom as now in England, and a mint shall be continued in Scotland under the same rules as the mint in England; and the present officers of the mint continued, subject to such regulations and alterations as her majesty, her heirs or successors, or the parliament of Great Britain, shall think fit.

Art. 17. That from and after the Union, the same weights and measures shall be used throughout the United Kingdom, as are now established in England: and standarts of weights and measures shall be kept by those burghs in Scotland, to whom the keeping the standarts of weights and measures, now made there, does of special right belong; all which standarts shall be sent down to such respective burghs, from the standarts kept in the Exchequer at Westminster, subject nevertheless to such regulations as the parliament of Great Britain shall think fit.

Art. 18. That the laws concerning regulation of trade, customs, and such excises, to which Scotland is, by virtue of this Treaty, to be liable, be the same in Scotland, from and after the Union, as in England; and that all other laws, in use within the kingdom of Scotland, do, after the Union, and notwithstanding thereof, remain in the same force as before (except such as are contrary to, or inconsistent with this Treaty), but alterable by the parliament of Great Britain, with this difference betwixt the laws concerning public right, policy, and civil government, and those which concern private right, that the laws which concern public right, policy, and civil government, may be made the same throughout the whole United Kingdom, but that no alteration be made in laws which concern private right, except for evident utility of the subject within Scotland.

Art. 19. That the Court of Session, or College of Justice, do, after the Union, and notwithstanding thereof, remain in all time coming within Scotland as it is now constituted by the laws of that kingdom, and with the same authority and privileges as before the Union.

and that hereafter none shall be named by her majesty, or her royal successors, to be ordinary lords of session, but such who have served in the college of justice as advocates, or principal clerks of session, for the space of five years, or as writers to the signet, for the space of ten years, with this provision, that no writer to the signet be capable to be admitted a lord of the session, unless he undergo private and public trial on the civil law before the faculty of advocates, and be found by them qualified for the said office, two years before he be named to be a lord of the session, yet so as the qualifications made, or to be made, for capacitating persons to be named ordinary lords of session, may be altered by the parliament of Great Britain. And that the Court of Justiciary do also, after the Union, and notwithstanding thereof, remain, in all time coming, within Scotland, as it is now constituted by the laws of that kingdom, and with the same authority and privileges as before the Union, subject nevertheless to such regulations as shall be made by the parliament of Great Britain, and without prejudice of other rights of justiciary: and that all admiralty jurisdictions be under the lord high admiral, or commissioners for the admiralty, of Great Britain for the time being; and that the court of admiralty now established in Scotland be continued; and that all reviews, reductions, or suspensions of the sentences in maritime cases, competent to the jurisdiction of that court, remain in the same manner after the Union as now in Scotland, until the parliament of Great Britain shall make such regulations and alterations as shall be judged expedient for the whole United Kingdom; so as there be alwise continued in Scotland a court of admiralty, such as in England, for determination of all maritime cases relating to private rights in Scotland competent to the jurisdiction of the admiralty court, subject nevertheless to such regulations and alterations as shall be thought proper to be made by the parliament of Great Britain; and that the heretable rights of admiralty, and vice-admiralties, in Scotland, be reserved to the respective proprietors as rights of property, subject nevertheless, as to the manner of exercising such heretable rights, to such regulations and alterations as shall be thought proper to be made by the parliament of Great Britain: and that all other courts, now being within the kingdom of Scotland, do remain, but subject to alterations by the parliament of Great Britain: and that all inferior courts within the said limits do remain subordinate, as they are now, to the supreme courts of justice within the same, in all time coming; and that no causes in Scotland be cognoscible by the courts of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or any other court in Westminster-hall; and that the said courts, or any other of the like nature, after the Union, shall have no

there be a court of Exchequer in Scotland, after the Union, for deciding questions concerning the revenues of customs and excises there, having the same power and authority in such cases as the court of Exchequer has in England; and that the said court of Exchequer in Scotland have power of passing signatures, gifts, tutories, and in other things, as the court of Exchequer at present in Scotland hath; and that the court of Exchequer that now is in Scotland do remain, until a new court of Exchequer be settled by the parliament of Great Britain in Scotland after the Union: And that, after the Union, the queen's majesty and her royal successors may continue a privy council in Scotland, for preserving of public peace and order, until the parliament of Great Britain shall think fit to alter it, or establish any other effectual method for that end.

Art. 20. That all heretable offices, superiorities, heretable jurisdictions, offices for life, and jurisdictions for life, be reserved to the owners thereof, as rights of property, in the same manner as they are now enjoyed by the laws of Scotland, notwithstanding this Treaty.

Art. 21. That the rights and privileges of the royal burghs in Scotland, as they now are, do remain entire after the Union, and notwithstanding thereof.

Art. 22. That, by virtue of this Treaty, of the peers of Scotland at the time of the Union, 16 shall be the number to sit and vote in the House of Lords, and 45 the number of the representatives of Scotland in the House of Commons of the parliament of Great Britain: and that, when her majesty, her heirs or successors, shall declare her or their pleasure for holding the first or any subsequent parliament of Great Britain, until the parliament of Great Britain shall make further provision therein, a writ do issue under the great-seal of the United Kingdom, directed to the privy council of Scotland, commanding them to cause 16 peers, who are to sit in the House of Lords, to be summoned to parliament, and 45 members to be elected to sit in the House of Commons of the parliament of Great Britain, according to the agreement in this Treaty, in such manner as by an act of this present session of the parliament of Scotland is or shall be settled; which act is hereby declared to be as valid as if it were a part of, and ingrossed in, this Treaty; and that the names of the persons, so summoned and elected, shall be returned by the privy council of Scotland into the court from whence the said writ did issue; and that if her majesty, on or before the first day of May next, on which day the Union is to take place, shall declare, under the great-seal of England, that it is expedient, that the Lords of parliament of England, and Commons of the present parliament of England, should be the members of the respective houses of the first parliament of Great Britain, for and on the part of England, then the said Lords of parliament of England, and Commons of the present parliament of England, shall be the members of the respective Houses of the first parliament of Great Britain, for and on the part of England: and her majesty may, by her royal proclamation under the great-seal of Great Britain, appoint the said first parliament of Great Britain to meet at such time and place as her majesty shall think fit, which time shall not be less than 50 days after the date of such proclamation; and the time and place of the meeting of such parliament being so appointed, a writ shall be immediately issued, under the Great Seal of Great Britain, directed to the privy council of Scotland, for the summoning the 16 peers, and for electing 45 members, by whom Scotland is to be represented in the parliament of Great Britain; and the lords of parliament of England, and the 16 peers of Scotland, such 16 peers being summoned and returned in the manner agreed in this Treaty, and the members of the House of Commons of the said parliament of England, and the 45 members for Scotland, such 45 members being elected and returned in the manner agreed in this Treaty, shall assemble and meet respectively in their respective Houses of the parliament of Great Britain, at such time and place as shall be so appointed by her majesty, and shall be the two Houses of the first parliament of Great Britain; and that parliament may continue for such time only as the present parliament of England might have continued, if the Union of the two kingdoms had not been made unless sooner dissolved by her majesty. And that every one of the Lords of parliament of Great Britain, and every member of the House of Commons of the parliament of Great Britain, in the first and all succeeding parliaments of Great Britain, until the parliament of Great Britain shall otherways direct, shall take the respective oaths appointed to be taken, instead of the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, by an act of parliament made in England, in the first year of the reign of the late king William and queen Mary, intituled, "An Act for the abrogating of the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and appointing other oaths;" and make, subscribe, and audibly repeat, the declaration mentioned in an act of parliament made in England, in the 30th year of the reign of king Charles the 2d, intituled, "An act for the more effectual preserving the king's person and government, by disabling papists from sitting in either house of parliament;" and shall take and subscribe the oath mentioned in an act of parliament made in England, in the first year of her majesty's reign, intituled, "An Act to declare the alterations in this oath appointed to be taken by the act, intituled, An act for the further security of his Majesty's person, and the succession of the crown in the Protestant line, and for extinguishing the hopes of the pretended prince of Wales, and all other pretenders, and their open and secret abettors, and for declaring the association to be determined;" at such time, and in such manner, as the members of both Houses of parliament of England are, by the said respective acts, directed to take, make, and subscribe the same, upon the penalties and disabilities in the said respective acts contained. And it is declared and agreed, that these words, "This realm, the crown of this realm, and the queen of this realm," mentioned in the oaths and declaration contained in the aforesaid acts, which were intended to signify the crown and realm of England, shall be understood of the crown and realm of Great Britain: and that, in that sense, the said oaths and declaration be taken and subscribed by the members of both Houses of the parliament of Great Britain.

Art. 23. That the foresaid 16 peers of Scotland, mentioned, in the last preceding article, to sit in the House of Lords of the parliament of Great Britain, shall have all privileges of parliament which the peers of England now have, and which they, or any peers of Great Britain, shall have after the Union, and particularly the right of sitting upon the trial of peers: and, in case of the trial of any peer in time of adjournment or prorogation of parliament, the said 16 peers shall be summoned in the same manner, and have the same powers and privileges at such trial, as any other peers of Great Britain. And that in case any trials of peers shall hereafter happen when there is no parliament in being, the 16 peers of Scotland, who sate in the last preceding parliament, shall be summoned in the same manner, and have the same powers and privileges at such trials, as any other peers of Great Britain. And that all peers of Scotland, and their successors to their honours and dignities, shall, from and after the Union, be peers of Great Britain, and have rank and precedence next and immediately after the peers of the like orders and degrees in England, at the time of the Union, and before all peers of Great Britain, of the like orders and degrees, who may be created after the Union, and shall be tried as peers of Great Britain, and shall enjoy all privileges of peers as fully as the peers of England do now, or as they or any other peers of Great Britain may hereafter enjoy the same, except the right and privilege of sitting in the House of Lords, and the privileges depending thereon, and particularly the right of sitting upon the trials of peers.

Art. 24. That, from and after the Union, there be one great-seal for the United Kingdom of Great Britain, which shall be different from the great-seal now used in either kingdom; and that the quartering the arms, and the rank and precedence of the Lyon king of arms, of the kingdom of Scotland, as may best suit the Union, be left to her majesty; and that, in the mean time, the great-seal of England be used as the great-seal of the United Kingdom, and that the great-seal of the United Kingdom be used for sealing writs to elect and summon the parliament of Great Britain, and sealing all treaties with foreign princes and states, and all public acts, instruments, and orders of state, which concern the whole United Kingdom, and in all other matters relating to England, as the great-seal of England is now used; and that a seal in Scotland, after the Union, be always kept and made use of in all things relating to private rights or grants, which have usually passed the great-seal of Scotland, and which only concern offices, grants, commissions, and private rights, within that Kingdom; and that, until such seal shall be appointed by her majesty, the present great-seal of Scotland shall be used for such purposes: and that the privy-seal, signet, casset, signet of the Justiciary court, quarter-seal, and seals of writs now used in Scotland, be continued; it that the said seals be altered, and adapted to the state of the Union, as her majesty shall think fit; and the said seals, and all of them, and the keepers of them, shall be subject to such regulations as the parliament of Great Britain shall hereafter make: and that the crown, sceptre, and sword of state, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls and registers whatsoever, both public and private, general and particular, and warrants thereof, continue to be kept as they are within that part of the United Kingdom now called Scotland, and that they shall so remain in all times coming, notwithstanding the Union.

Art. 25. That all laws and statutes in either Kingdom, so far as they are contrary to, or inconsistent with, the terms of these Articles, or any of them, shall, from and after the Union, cease and become void, and shall be so deemed to be, by the respective parliament of each said Kingdom, as by the said Articles of Union ratified and approved by the said act of parliament of Scotland, relation thereunto being had, may appear; and the tenor of the aforesaid act, for securing the Protestant religion and Presbyterian Church Government within the Kingdom of Scotland, is as follows:

Our sovereign lady, and the estates of parliament, considering, that, by the late act of parliament for a Treaty with England, for the Union of both Kingdoms, it is provided, that commissioners for that Treaty should not treat of or concerning any alteration of the worship, discipline, and government of the church of this Kingdom, as now by law established, which Treaty being now reported to parliament, and it being reasonable and necessary, that the true Protestant Religion, presently professed within this Kingdom, and the worship, discipline, and government of this church, should be effectually and unalterably secured; therefore her majesty, with advice and consent of the said estates of parliament, doth hereby establish and confirm the said true Protestant religion, and the worship, discipline, and government of this church, to continue without any alteration to the people of this Kingdom in all succeeding generations; and more especially, her majesty, with advice and consent aforesaid, ratifies, approves, and for ever confirms, the fifth Act of the first parliament of king William and queen Mary, intituled, "Act for ratifying the Confession of Faith, and settling Presbyterian Church Government," with other Acts of parliament relating thereto, in prosecution of the Declaration of the Estates of this Kingdom, containing the Claim of Right, bearing date the 11th of April, 1689; and her majesty, with advice and consent aforesaid, expressly provides and declares, that the foresaid true Protestant religion, contained in the above-mentioned Confession of Faith, with the form and purity of worship presently in use within this Church, and its Presbyterian Church Government and discipline, that is to say, the government of the church by Kirk sessions, Presbyteries, provincial synods, and general assemblies, all established by the foresaid Acts of parliament, pursuant to the Claim of Right, shall remain and continue unalterable; and that the said Presbyterian Government shall be the only government of the church within the Kingdom of Scotland. And further, for the greater security of the foresaid Protestant religion, and of the worship, discipline, and government of this church as above established, her majesty, with advice and consent foresaid, statutes and ordains, that the universities and colleges of St. Andrew's, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh, as now established by law, shall continue within this Kingdom for ever. And that, in all time coming, no professors, principals, regents, masters, or others, bearing office in any university, college, or school, within this Kingdom, be capable, or be admitted or allowed to continue in the exercise of their said functions, but such as shall own and acknowledge the civil government in manner prescribed, or to be prescribed by the acts of parliament. As also, that before, or at their admissions, they do and shall acknowledge and profess, and shall subscribe to the foresaid Confession of Faith, as the Confession of their Faith: and that they will practice and conform themselves to the worship presently in use in this church, and submit themselves to the government and discipline thereof, and never endeavour, directly or indirectly, the prejudice or subversion of the same; and that before the respective Presbyteries of their bounds, by whatsoever gift, presentation, or provision, they may be thereto provided. And further her majesty, with advice aforesaid, expressly declares and statutes, that none of the subjects of this Kingdom shall be liable to, but all and every one of them for ever free of any oath, test, or subscription, within this Kingdom, contrary to, or inconsistent with, the foresaid true Protestant religion and Presbyterian Church Government, worship, and discipline, as above established; and that the same within the bounds of this church and Kingdom, shall never be imposed upon, or required of them in any sort. And, lastly, that, after the decease of her present majesty (whom God long preserve!) the sovereign succeeding to her in the royal government of the Kingdom of Great-Britain shall, in all time coming, as his or her accession to the crown, swear and subscribe, that they shall inviolably maintain and preserve the foresaid settlement of the true Protestant religion, with the worship, discipline, right, and privileges of this church, as above established by the laws of this kingdom, in prosecution of the Claim of Right. And it is hereby statute and ordained, that this Act of parliament, with the establishment therein contained, shall be held and observed, in all times coming, as a fundamental and essential condition of any Treaty or Union to be concluded betwixt the two kingdoms, without any alteration thereof, or derogation thereto, in any sort, for ever. As also, that this Act of parliament, and settlement therein contained, shall be insert and repeated in any Act of parliament that shall pass, for agreeing and concluding the foresaid Treaty or Union betwixt the two kingdoms; and that the same shall be therein expressly declared to be a fundamental and essential condition of the said Treaty or Union, in all time coming. Which Articles of Union, and Act immediately above-written her majesty, with advice and consent aforesaid, statutes, enacts and ordains to be, and continue, in all time coming, the sure and perpetual foundation of a compleat and intire Union of the two kingdoms of Scotland and England, under the express condition and provision, that the approbation and ratification of the foresaid Articles and Act shall be no ways binding on this kingdom, until the said Articles and Act be ratified, approved, and confirmed, by her majesty, with and by the authority of the parliament of England, as they are now agreed to, approved, and confirmed, by her majesty, with and by the authority of the parliament of Scotland. Declaring nevertheless that the parliament of England may provide for the security of the Church of England as they think expedient, to take place within the bounds of the said kingdom of England, and not derogating from the security above provided, for the establishing of the church of Scotland within the bounds of this kingdom. As also, the said parliament of England may extend the additions and other provisions contained in the Articles of Union, as above insert, in favours of the subjects of Scotland, to and in favours of the subjects of England, which shall not suspend or derogate from the force and effect of this present ratification, but shall be understood as herein included, without the necessity of any new ratification in the parliament of Scotland. And, lastly, her majesty enacts and declares, that all laws and statutes in this kingdom, so far as they are contrary to, or inconsistent with, the terms of these Articles as above-mentioned, shall, from and after the Union, cease and become void.

And whereas an act hath passed in this present session of parliament, intitled, "An act for securing the church of England as by law established," the tenor whereof follows, Whereas, by an act made in the session of parliament held in the 3rd and 4th year of her majesty's reign, whereby her majesty was empowered to appoint commissioners, under the great-seal of England, to treat with commissioners, to be authorised by the parliament of Scotland, concerning an Union of the kingdoms of England and Scotland, it is provided and enacted, that the commissioners to be named in pursuance of the said act should not treat of or concerning any alteration of the liturgy, rites, ceremonies, discipline, or government of the church, as by law established within this realm; and whereas certain commissioners appointed by her majesty, in pursuance of the said act, and also other commissioners, nominated by her majesty, by the authority of the parliament of Scotland, have met and agreed upon a Treaty of Union of the said kingdoms, which Treaty is now under the consideration of this present parliament; and whereas the said Treaty, with some alterations therein made, is ratified and approved by act of parliament in Scotland, and the said act of ratification is by her majesty's royal command laid before the parliament of this kingdom; and whereas it is reasonable and necessary that the true Protestant religion professed and established by law in the church of England, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof, should be effectually and unalterably secured; Be it enacted by the queen's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the Commons in this present parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, that an act made in the 13th year of the reign of queen Elizabeth of famous memory, intituled, "An act for the ministers of the church to be of sound religion;" and also another act made in the 13th year of the reign of the late king Charles 2, intituled, "An act for the uniformity of public prayers and administration of sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies, and for establishing the form of making, ordaining, and consecrating bishops, priests, and deacons, in the church of England;" (and all other such clauses in the said acts, or either of them, as have been repealed or altered by any subsequent act or acts of parliament), and all and singular other acts of parliament now in force, for the establishment and preservation of the church of England, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof, shall remain and be in full force for ever. And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that after the demise of her majesty (whom God long preserve!) the sovereign next succeeding to her majesty in the royal government of the kingdom of Great Britain, and so in ever hereafter every king or queen succeeding, and coming to the royal government of the kingdom of Great Britain, at his or her coronation, shall in the presence of all persons who shall be attending, assisting, or otherwise there and there present, take and subscribe an oath to maintain and preserve inviolably the said settlement of the church of England, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof, as by law established within the last

doms of England and Ireland, the dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, and the territories thereunto belonging. And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that this act, and all and every the matters and things therein contained, be, and shall for ever be, holden and adjudged to be a fundamental and essential part of any Treaty of Union to be concluded between the said two kingdoms; and also that this act shall be inserted in express terms, in any act of parliament which shall be made for settling and ratifying any such Treaty of Union, and shall be therein declared to be an essential and fundamental part hereof. May it, therefore, please your most excellent majesty, that it may be enacted, and be it enacted by the queen's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, that all and every the said Articles of Union as ratified and approved by the said act of parliament of Scotland as aforesaid, and herein before particularly mentioned and inserted, and also the said act of parliament of Scotland, for establishing the Protestant religion, and Presbyterian church government, within that kingdom, intituled, "Act for securing the Protestant religion and Presbyterian church government," and every clause, matter, and thing in the said Articles and Act contained, shall be, and the said Articles and Act are hereby for ever ratified, approved, and confirmed. And it is hereby further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that the said act passed in this present session of parliament, intituled, "An act for securing the church of England as by law established," and all and every the matters and things therein contained, and also the said act of parliament of Scotland, intituled, "Act for securing the Protestant religion and Presbyterian church government," with the establishment in the said act contained, be, and shall for ever be, held and adjudged to be and observed as fundamental and essential conditions of the said Union, and shall in all times coming be taken to be, and are hereby declared to be, essential and fundamental parts of the said Articles and Union: and the said Articles of Union so as aforesaid ratified, approved, and confirmed, by act of parliament of Scotland, and by this present act, and the said act passed in this present session of parliament, intituled, "An act for securing the church of England as by law established," and also the said act passed in the parliament of Scotland, intituled, "Act for securing the Protestant religion and Presbyterian church government," are hereby enacted and ordained to be and continue, in all times coming, the complete and entire Union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland.

And whereas, since the passing the said act in the parliament of Scotland for ratifying the said Articles of Union, one other act, intituled, "Act, settling the manner of electing the 16 peers and 45 members to represent Scotland in the parliament of Great Britain," hath likewise passed in the said parliament of Scotland, at Edinburgh, the fifth day of February 1707, the tenor whereof follows: Our sovereign lady considering that, by the 22nd Article of the Treaty of Union, as the same is ratified by an act passed in this session of parliament, upon the 16th of January last, it is provided, that, by virtue of the said Treaty, of the peers of Scotland, at the time of the Union, 16 shall be the number to sit and vote in the House of Lords, and 45 the number of the representatives of Scotland in the House of Commons, of the parliament of Great Britain; and that the said 16 peers, and 45 members in the House of Commons, be named and chosen in such manner as by a subsequent act in this present session of parliament in Scotland should be settled; which act is thereby declared to be as valid, as if it were a part of, and ingrossed in, the said Treaty; therefore, her majesty, with advice and consent of the estates of parliament, statutes, enacts, and ordains, that the said 16 peers, who shall have right to sit in the House of Peers in the parliament of Great Britain on the part of Scotland, by virtue of this Treaty, shall be named by the said peers of Scotland whom they represent, their heirs, or successors to their dignities and honours, out of their own number, and that by open election and plurality of voices of the peers present, and of the proxies for such as shall be absent, the said proxies being peers, and producing a mandate in writing duly signed before witnesses, and both the constituent and proxy being qualified according to law; declaring also, that such peers as are absent, being qualified as aforesaid, may send to all such meetings lists of the peers whom they judge fittest, validly signed by the said absent peers, which shall be reckoned in the same manner as if the parties had been present, and given in the said list: and in case of the death, or legal incapacity, of any of the said 16 peers, that the aforesaid peers of Scotland shall nominate another of their own number in place of the said peer or peers in manner before and after mentioned. And that of the said forty-five representatives of Scotland in the House of Commons in the parliament of Great Britain, thirty shall be chosen by the shires or stewardries, and fifteen by the royal boroughs, as follows, viz. one for every shire and stewardry, excepting the shires of Bute and Caithness, which shall choose one by turns, Bute having the first election; the shires of Nairn and Cromarty, which shall also choose by turns, Nairn having the first election; and in like manner the shires of Clackmannan and Kinross shall choose by turns, Clackmannan having the first election: And in case of the death or legal incapacity of any of the said members from the respective shires or stewardries above-mentioned, to sit in the House of Commons; it is enacted and ordained, that the shire or stewardry who elected the said member shall elect another member in his place. And that the said 15 representatives for the royal boroughs be chosen as follows, viz. That the town of Edinburgh shall have right to elect and send one member to the parliament of Great Britain: and that each of the other burghs shall elect a commissioner in the same manner as they are now in use to elect commissioners to the parliament of Scotland; which commissioners and burghs (Edinburgh excepted), being divided in 14 classes or districts, shall meet at such time and burghs within their respective districts as her majesty, her heirs or successors, shall appoint, and elect one for each district, viz. the burghs of Kirkwall, Wick, Dornoch, Dingwall and Tayne, one; the burgh of Fortrose, Inverness, Nairn and Forres, one; the burghs of Elgin, Cullen, Banff, Ioverury and Kintore, one; the burghs of Aberdeen, Inverbervie, Montrose, Aberbrothock and Brichen, one; the burghs of Forfar, Perth, Dundee, Cowper and St. Andrews, one; the burghs of Crail, Kilrennie, Anstruther Easter, Anstruther Wester, and Pittenweem, one; the burghs of Dysart, Kirkcaldie, Kinghorn and Brantisland, one; the burghs of Innerkeithing, Dumfermline, Queensferry, Culross and Stirling, one; the burghs of Glasgow, Renfrew, Ruglen and Dumbarton, one; the burghs of Haddington, Dunbar, North Berwick, Lawder and Jedburgh, one; the burghs of Selkirk, Peebles, Linlithgow and Lanerk, one; the burghs of Dumfries, Sanquhar, Annan, Lochmaben and Kirkcudbright, one; the burghs of Wigton, New Galloway, Stranraer and Whiteburn, one; and the burghs of Air, Irvine, J. theasay, Campbeltown and Inverary, one. And it is hereby declared and ordained, that where the votes of the commissioners for the said burghs, met to choose representatives from their several districts to the parliament of Great Britain, shall be equal, in that case the president of the meeting shall have a casting or decisive vote, and that by and according to his vote as a commissioner from the burgh from which he is sent, the commissioner from the eldest burgh presiding in the first meeting, and the commissioners from the other burghs in their respective districts presiding afterwards by turns, in the order as the said burghs are now called in the rolls of the parliament of Scotland. And that in case any of the said 15 commissioners from burghs shall decease, or become legally incapable to sit in the House of Commons, then the town of Edinburgh, or the district which choose the said member, shall elect a member in his or their place: It is always hereby expressly provided and declared, that none shall be capable to elect or be elected for any of the said estates but such as are 21 years of age compleat, and Protestant, excluding all Papists, or such who, being suspect of Popery and required, refuse to swear and subscribe the formula contained in the third act, made in the eighth and ninth sessions of king William's parliament, intituled, 'Act for preventing the growth of Popery;' and also declaring, that none shall be capable to elect or be elected to represent a shire or burgh in the parliament of Great Britain for this part of the United Kingdom, except such as are now capable by the laws of this kingdom to elect or be elected as commissioners for shires or burghs to the parliament of Scotland. And further, her majesty, with advice and consent aforesaid, for the effectual and orderly election of the persons to be chosen to sit, vote, and serve, in the respective houses of parliament of Great Britain, when her majesty, her heirs or successors, shall declare her or their pleasure for holding the first, or any subsequent parliament of Great Britain, and when for that effect a writ shall be issued out under the great seal of the United Kingdom, directed to the privy council of Scotland, conform to the said 22d Article, statutes, enacts and ordains, That, until the parliament of Great Britain shall make further provision therein, the said writ shall contain a warrant and command to the said privy council to issue out a proclamation in her majesty's name, requiring the peers of Scotland for the time to meet and assemble at such time and place within Scotland as her majesty and royal successors shall think fit, to make election of the said sixteen peers; and requiring the lord clerk register, or two of the clerks of session, to attend all such meetings, and to administer the oaths that are or shall be by law required, and to ask the votes; and, having made up the lists in presence of the meeting, to return the names of the 16 peers chosen (certified under the subscription of the said lord clerk register, clerk or clerks of session attending) to the clerk of the privy council of Scotland; and, in like manner, requiring and ordaining the several freeholders in the respective shires and stewartries to meet and convene at the head burghs of their several shires and stewartries, to elect their commissioners, conform to the order above set down, and ordaining the clerks of the said meetings, immediately after the said elections are over, respectively to return the names of the persons elected to the clerks of the privy council; and, lastly, ordaining the city of Edinburgh to elect their commissioner, and the other royal burghs to elect each of them a commissioner, as they have been in use to elect commissioners to the parliament, and to send the said respective commissioners, at such times, to such burghs within their respective districts as her majesty and successors, by such proclamations, shall appoint; requiring and ordaining the common clerk of the respective burghs, where such elections shall be appointed to be made, to attend the said meetings, and immediately after the election to return the name of the persons so elected (certified under his hand) to the clerk of privy council; to the end that the names of the 16 peers, 30 commissioners for shires, and 15 commissioners for burghs, being so returned to the privy council, may be returned to the court from whence the writ did issue, under the great seal of the United Kingdom, conform to the said 22d Article: And whereas, by the said 22d Article, it is agreed, that if her ma-

esty shall, on or before the 1st day of May next, declare that it is expedient the Lords and Commons of the present parliament of England should be the members of the respective Houses of the first Parliament of Great Britain, for and on the part of England, they shall accordingly be the members of the said respective Houses for and on the part of England; her majesty, with advice and consent foresaid, in that case only, doth hereby statute and ordain, that the 16 peers and 45 commissioners for shires and burghs, who shall be chosen by the peers, barons and burghs, respectively, in this present session of parliament, and out of the members thereof, in the same manner as committees of parliament are usually now chosen, shall be the members of the respective Houses of the said first parliament of Great Britain for and on the part of Scotland; which nomination and election being certified by a writ under the lord clerk register's hand, the persons so nominated and elected shall have right to sit and vote in the House of Lords, and in the House of Commons, of the said first parliament of Great Britain, as by the said act passed in Scotland for settling the manner of electing the 16 peers and 45 members to represent Scotland in the parliament of Great Britain may appear; be it therefore further enacted and declared, by the authority aforesaid, that the said last-mentioned act passed in Scotland for settling the manner of electing the 16 peers and 45 members to represent Scotland in the parliament of Great Britain, as aforesaid, shall be, and the same is hereby declared to be, as valid as if the same had been part of, and ingrossed in, the said Articles of Union, ratified and approved by the said act of parliament of Scotland, and by this act as aforesaid. ### THE LORD TREASURER OXFORD'S LETTER TO THE QUEEN, JUNE 9, 1714. [See p. 1365.]

May it please your majesty;

I presume, in-obedience to your royal command, to lay before your majesty a state of your affairs. Though I have very much contracted it from the draught I made, and the vouchers from whence it is taken, yet I find it swell under my pen in transcribing, being willing to put every thing before your majesty in the clearest light my poor understanding can attain to. It was necessary to lay it before your majesty in the series of time, from the beginning to this present time; and when that is compleatly laid before you, it remains only for me to beg God to direct your majesty.— And as to myself, do with me what you please; place me either as a figure, or a cypher; displace me, or replace me, as that best serves your majesty's occasions, you shall ever find me, with the utmost devotion, and without any reserve, Madam, Your most dutiful, most faithful, most humble, most obedient subject, and unworthy servant, OXFORD.

A brief Account of Public Affairs, since August 8, 1710, to this present 8th of June, 1714. To which is added, the State of Affairs abroad, as they relate to this Kingdom; with some humble Proposals for securing the future Tranquillity of her Majesty's Reign, and the safety of her Kingdoms.

HER majesty, on the 8th of August 1710, was pleased to alter her treasury, and two days after in a new commission, Robert Harley, by her majesty's great favour, was made chancellor of the exchequer.

The state of affairs at home and abroad are fresh in every one's memory.

The condition of the treasury at that time was laid before her majesty in a large representation.

I beg leave to touch some few heads: the army was in the field, no money in the treasury; none of the remitters would contract again; the bank had refused to lend 100,000*l.* to lord Godolphin, on very good security: the navy and other branches of service, eleven millions in debt, which enhanced the price of every thing proportionably; the civil list in debt about 600,000*l.*; and the yearly income too little for the current certain expence, by the lowest computation, 124,493*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*

In a few days this new commission made provision for paying the army, by the greatest remittance that had ever been known: though the opposition from every office, which was full of persons who were enemies to the change made by the queen, was very strong, and very troublesome and vexatious: and such was the situation of affairs, that nothing but great patience could ever have overcome these difficulties; it being impossible, as well as unavoidable; to make removes, but by degrees.

As soon as it was possible (and notwithstanding the clamours then raised, it was the only proper time) a new parliament is called.

Its first meeting was November 27, 1710. Robert Harley had prepared the funds ready (before the parliament met, as he had done every session to this day) not only for the current service of the year, both by sea and land, but also for easing the nation of above nine millions of debt. This was thought so chimerical, when Robert Harley did begin to open it, that it was treated with ridicule, until he shewed how practicable it was. It is true, this gave great reputation abroad, and enabled to treat advantageously of a peace. It raised sinking credit at home; but, at the same time, as it drew envy upon Harley from some, and the rage of others, so it gave offence to some of his fellow servants, who told him plainly, that he ought to have told his secret, and if he would not get money himself, he ought to have let his friends share 100,000*l.* which would not have been felt, or found out, in so vast a sum as 9 or 10 millions.

To this principle was owing the setting on foot at this time the unhappy voyage to Canada; to all which meetings Harley avoided coming, and gave lord Rochester his reasons; and after he desired his lordship to be a messenger to the queen, to hinder that expedition, but it happened to be too late. But lady Masham knows how much Harley was concerned at

though he did not know the true spring of it at voyage, which will appear after in this paper.

The beginning of February 1710-11, there began to be a division among those called Tories the House, and Mr. Secretary St. John thought it convenient to be listing a separate party for himself.

To prevent this, lord Rochester and Harley desired to have a meeting, and to cool such rash attempts; and it was contrived Mr. Secretary St. John should invite us to dinner (which as the last time he ever invited Robert Harley, being now about three years) where was so duke of Shrewsbury, earl Poulet, lord Rochester, and others; and lord Rochester took the aim to calm the spirit of division and ambition.

Harley was at this time seized by a violent fever; and on his first coming abroad March, met with a misfortune which confined him many weeks. The transactions during that time, are too public, as well as too black for me, to remember or to mention.

In the end of May, 1711, the queen, out of her abundant goodness, was pleased to confer undeserved honours on Robert Harley; and on the 29th of the same month, was pleased to put the Treasurer's staff into his hands: a post so much above Harley's abilities to struggle with, that he had nothing but integrity and duty to recommend him to her majesty's choice: so he must have recourse to her majesty's transcendent goodness and mercy to pardon all his faults and failings both of omission and commission, during the whole course of his service.

But to return and resume the thread of this discourse. The 4th of June 1711, three days after the Treasurer was sworn, he was surpris'd with a demand of 23,036*l.* 5*s.* for arms and merchandise, said to be sent to Canada. When the Treasurer scrupled this, Mr. Secretary St. John and Mr. Moore came to him with much passion upon this affair; and, about a fortnight after, the Secretary of State signified the queen's positive pleasure to have that money paid: and accordingly her majesty signed a warrant, June 21, and the Treasurer not being able then, with all his precaution, to discover farther light, the money was paid July 4th, 1711.

Since the return from that expedition, the secret is discovered and the Treasurer's suspicion justified; for the public was cheated of above 20,000*l.*

There is reason to be more particular upon this head, because it is one of the things never to be forgiven the Treasurer; and Lord Chancellor told him more to that purpose, that they told him no government was worth serving, that would not let them make those advantages, and get such jobs.

One thing more is craved leave to be added, that the Treasurer was forced to use all his skill and credit to keep the House of Commons from examining this affair last parliament.

June the 12th, 1712, the first session of last parliament ended.

From this time, to the beginning of the next session, 'The Treasurer's hands were full of negotiating the peace in all courts abroad;' and besides the ordinary and necessary duty of his office at home, he had frequent occasions of calming the quarrels and grudges Mr. Secretary had sometimes against lord Dartmouth, sometimes against lady Masham, and sometimes against the treasurer himself.

The second session of the last parliament began December the 7th, 1711.

This was attended with great difficulties and dangers, as well from the practices of the discontented here, as the designs carried on by Mr. Buys, prince Eugene, and Bothmer; in which designs concurred the emperor and other states and princes who gained by the war.

This put her majesty under a sort of necessity to preserve the whole, and to take a method which had been used, to create some new peers.

So many having been brought formerly out of the House of Commons, of those who used to manage public affairs, it was proposed to Mr. Secretary, that if he would be contented to stay in the House of Commons that session, her majesty would have the goodness to create him a peer, and that he should not lose his rank.

The second session ended the 21st of June, 1712, and notwithstanding Bothmer's Memorial, and all other attacks both from abroad and at home, supplies were provided, and every thing relating to the public put upon a good foot, and the malecontents began to despair, as appeared by the duke of Marlborough's retiring abroad, and other particulars.

After the session was ended, the queen, as she had promised, ordered a warrant for Mr. secretary St. John, to be a viscount: this happened to put him in the utmost rage against the Treasurer, lady Masham, and without sparing the greatest.

It did avail very little to tell him how much he had got in place; for had he been created with the other lords it would have fallen to his share to have come next after lord Trevor: but the Treasurer, with great patience, bore all the storm, of which lord Masham was often a witness of the outrageous speeches; and Mr. Moore very lately told the Treasurer, that lord Bolingbroke said very lately to him, that he owed him a revenge upon that head.

This discontent continued, until there happened an opportunity of sending him to France; of which there was not much occasion: but it was hoped, that this would have put him in good humour; which it did, until in October 1712, there were knights of the garter made. This created a new disturbance, which is too well remembered, and breaks out now very often in outrageous expressions publicly against all them made.

In November, on the death of duke Hamilton, he was much against duke Shrewsbury's going, for reasons very plain, which then were in negotiation; for before the last session of that parliament began, a new model was framed, or a scheme of ministry; which how they after-concluded and could be proclaimed. It is not decent to take notice "That during this whole negociation, the Treasurer was obliged by his own hand, and his own charge, to correspond in all the courts concerned in the negociation; and very often he had the good luck to set right several mistakes, and to obtain some things very little expected: but the only merit of this belongs to her majesty, the credit of whose favour brought it about, and gave power to the Treasurer to act with success."

During this session, the lords of the cabinet, and others, met every Saturday at the Treasurer's in order to carry on the queen's business, as they had done the year before on Thursdays. Many offers were made, and repeated by the Treasurer in order to attack former offenders, and quiet the minds of the gentlemen, and of the church-party; and the only reason for this failing was, because of the project laid for their new scheme, and putting themselves at the head, as they called it, of the church-party.

This being the last session of parliament, and some gentlemen fearing their elections, and some for other reasons, dropt the bill of Commerce.

The Treasurer saw this opportunity, and immediately took it, and prevailed with sir Thomas Hanmer, and others, to come into the payment of the civil list debts, incurred before the change of the treasury, though the present Treasurer was railed at, and maligned; which he chose to bear patiently, rather than own the true reason, that there was no money to do it with, which would have ruined all at once.

This step of paying the debts, put the male-contented into the utmost rage, which they did very publicly express in both houses.

This last session of that parliament, and the third since the change of the ministry, ended July the 16th, 1713.

The peace with France being over, and it growing necessary to put her majesty's affairs into a further settled regulation, and to ease the Treasurer of the burthen as well as envy, of such a bulk of business: her majesty was pleased to approve of the scheme of the duke of Ormond's staying here to attend the army-affairs, which was necessary at the time of disbanding; duke Shrewsbury to go to Ireland, upon his return from France; lord Findlater to be chancellor of Scotland; lord Mar third secretary; lord Dartmouth privy-seal, and Mr. Bromley secretary of state, and sir William Wyndham chancellor of the Exchequer. I am sure the queen very well remembers the rage this caused, as perfectly defeating their scheme, and shewing that her majesty would put her affairs upon a solid foot: the lord-chancellor said it was against law, and to this day will not treat lord Findlater with decency; and lord Mar has met with it possible, easy with and to those in her service: as soon as he was recovered enough to write, he wrote a large letter to lord Bolingbroke, containing his scheme of the queen's affairs, and what was necessary for lord Bolingbroke to do, as belonging only to his province. This letter was dated July the 25th, 1713, and was answered July the 27th, by lord Bolingbroke; the copy was shown to lady Masham, who came to visit the Treasurer then confined to his chamber; and she then thought it a very good one, and what was proper for the occasion. I believe the whole would be of use to give light to her majesty into the ground and foundation of the follies and madness which have since appeared; the whole is ready for her majesty's perusal when she pleases.

In this letter the Treasurer gives an account to lord Bolingbroke of the occasions, or rather the pretences for giving disturbance to the queen's servants. He proposes the remedy, and what was requisite to be done by him as secretary in his own province, and also assurance of the Treasurer's assistance to the utmost, and of his desire to consult with him (lord Bolingbroke) how to unite the rest of our friends.

Being then sick, the Treasurer took the liberty to put lord Bolingbroke in mind of the several particulars which then required dispatch, and were solely belonging to his province, without any other interposition than that of taking your majesty's direction.

Amongst others, that of a circular letter upon the address of both houses, relating to the Pretender.

This was not done in three months. His lordship wrote word it was done July the 21st.

In the same letter the Treasurer proposed that (according to the treaty of peace) ought to be taken of the following particulars, viz. Newfoundland, Hudson's-Bay, Acadia, St. Christopher's, Assiento, and other things contained in the treaties of commerce.

These particulars the Treasurer thought to have been executed, until within a few weeks he heard the contrary by accident, and that the time in the several treaties was elapsed. Upon this, the Treasurer on Wednesday, June the 2d, told Mr. Moor of this, that every body would be liable to blame who are in the queen's service. Thursday, June the 3d, 1714, lord Bolingbroke writes to the Treasurer a letter, which begins thus:

'Mr. Moor has been this morning with me, and has put into my hands a paper, which he calls, I think not improperly, a charge upon me.'

This paper contains the neglect above-mentioned in the Treasurer's letter of July the 25th, 1713, and yet those faults are now charged upon the Treasurer.
