THE Volume now presented to the Public comprises the period from the Accession of Queen Anne in the Year 1702, to the Accession of King George the First in the Year 1714. For this period, the Proceedings and Debates in both Houses have been, principally, collected from the following Works: 1. The Journals of the House of Lords; 2. The Journals of the House of Commons; 3. Timberland's History and Proceedings of the House of Lords; 4. Chandler's History and Proceedings of the House of Commons; 5. Boyer's Annals of Queen Anne's Reign; 6. Boyer's History of the Life and Reign of Queen Anne; 7. The Political State of Great Britain; 8. Burnet's History of His Own Times; and, 9. The Continuation of Rapin's History of England, published under the name of Tindal, but principally written by Dr. Birch.

Besides the above Works, recourse has been had to the Histories of Oldmixon and Somerville; to the political Writings of Swift, Steele, and Addison; the Works of Lord Orford; the Memoirs of the Life and Administration of Sir Robert Walpole, by Mr. Coxe; and other books illustrative of the Parliamentary History of the times.

In the Appendix will be found a copious Account of the Proceedings and Debates in the Parliament of Scotland, from the Meeting of the New Parliament in May 1703, to the Union with England in the Year 1707.

Parliamentary History.

1 ANNE, A. D. 1702.

ACCESSION OF QUEEN ANNE.] - March 8, 1702. Upon the death of King William, which happened this day, the crown, pursuant to the Act of Succession, devolved to the princess Anne of Denmark, daughter of king James the Second by the lady Anne Hyde, daughter of the earl of Charendon.*

* "She was entered on the thirty-eighth year of her age, and from her infancy had imbibed strong prejudices against the Whigs. She had been taught to look upon them all, not only as republicans, but as enemies to the church of England. This aversion to the whole party had been confirmed by the usage she had met with from her sister and king William, which was now to be charged to the account of the Whigs. And prince George, who had also been ill-treated (as he thought) in the late reign, threw into the scale his resentment. On the other hand, the Tories had the advantage, not only of the queen's early prepossession in their favour, but of their having assisted her in the affair of her revenue. It was indeed evident, that they had done this, more in opposition to the king, than from any real respect to her. But still they had served her; and, the winter before the king died, they had, in prospect of his death, paid her more than usual attendance. Hence it is, that, as soon as she was seated in the throne, the Tories (whom she usually called by the agreeable name of the Church party) became the distinguished objects of her favour, as will presently be seen." Tindal.

"It is certain that all the late king's hearty friends were under great apprehensions of ill consequences from queen Anne's accession to the throne, on account of her known attachment to that interest, which, under the disguise of Church, had imposed on many minds, otherwise well intentioned. And it was a most grateful surprize to them, when after a continual gathering of clouds over their heads in the beginning of her reign, a glorious sunshine broke forth and warmed them, and cheered them for seven years together." Oldmixon.

The Queen's Speech to the Privy Council.] On the evening of the same day the Privy Council came in a body to wait upon the new queen, who received them with the following Speech:

"My Lords;

"I am extremely sensible of the general misfortune to these kingdoms, in the unspeakable loss of the king, and the great weight and burden it brings in particular on myself; which nothing could encourage me to undergo, but the great concern I have for the preservation of our religion, and laws and liberties of my country. All these, being as dear to me, as they can be to any person whatsoever, you may depend upon it, that no pains nor diligence shall ever be wanting on my part, to preserve and support them; to maintain the succession in the Protestant line, and the government in church and state as it is by law established. I think it proper, upon this occasion of my first speaking to you, to declare my own opinion of the importance of carrying on all the preparations we are making to oppose the great power of France; and I shall lose no time in giving our allies all assurances, that nothing shall be wanting on my part, to pursue the true interest of England, together with theirs, for the support of the common cause. In order to these ends, I shall always be ready to ask the advice of my council, and of both houses of parliament, and desirous to countenance and employ all those, who shall heartily concur and join with me, in supporting and maintaining the present establishment and constitution against all enemies and opposers whatsoever."

After this declaration, she caused all the lords, and others of the late king's privy-council

* "The queen pronounced this, as she did all her other speeches, with great weight and authority, and with a softness of voice, and sweetness in the pronunciation, that added much life to all she spoke; and these, her first expressions, were heard with great and just acknowledgments." Burset.

cit. to take the oaths to her in the same quality, and ordered a proclamation to be published immediately, signifying her pleasure, that all persons being in office of authority or government, at the decease of the late king, should so continue till further directions. As, by the act made five years before, the parliament, notwithstanding the king's death, was now continued to sit; both houses met the same day, and unanimously voted to address the queen to condole with her on this sad occasion, and to congratulate her happy accession to the throne. Then the lords in a conference acquainted the commons, that orders were given for proclaiming her majesty that afternoon; which was accordingly done with the usual solemnity, and the loud acclamations of the people: Though it is remarkable, that this day afforded a visible mixture of sorrow and joy; many being apprehensive, that the death of king William, at so critical a juncture, might be attended with consequences fatal to Europe in general, and to the Protestant succession of these kingdoms in particular.

The Lords Address to the Queen.] March 9. The Lords, pursuant to vote, attended the Queen with the following Address:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, though deeply sensible of the unspeakable loss this nation hath sustained by the decease of his late majesty, of glorious memory, do, at the same time, most heartily congratulate your majesty's happy accession to the throne, and with all loyalty and duty assure your majesty of our zealous and firm resolutions to support your undoubted right and title, and the succession of the Protestant line, as by law established, against all your enemies whatsoever; being sensible our great loss is no otherwise to be repaired, to ourselves or our confederates, but by a most sincere and vigorous adherence to your majesty and your allies, in the prosecution of those measures already entered into, to reduce the exorbitant power of France: And we will ever make it appear to your majesty and the world, that our zeal and affection for your majesty's service, and the care we have of the public safety, engage us to exert ourselves with the utmost vigour and union, for obtaining, under your majesty's reign, such a balance of power and interest, as may effectually secure the liberties of Europe—And we further humbly desire, that, for the encouragement of your majesty's allies, no time may be lost in communicating to them your majesty's resolutions of adhering firmly to the alliances already made: And we shall never be wanting, to the utmost of our power, to enable your majesty to maintain the same."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty returned this Answer:

"My lords; It is with great satisfaction that I receive the assurances you give me in your Address. My endeavours shall always be very sincere, to promote the true interest of England, and support our common cause."

The Commons' Address.] The same day, in the evening, the Commons attended her majesty with the following Address:

"Most gracious sovereign; We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons in parliament assembled, having a deep and true sense of the great loss the nation has sustained by the death of our late sovereign lord king William the third, of glorious memory, who, under God, was our deliverer from popery and slavery, humbly crave leave to condole with your majesty, and express our sorrow, upon this sad occasion.—Your majesty's accession to the throne, which we most heartily congratulate, and your known zeal for our religion, and the government, as by law established, gives us a certain prospect of future happiness; moderates our grief; and engages us unanimously to assure your majesty, That we will, to the utmost, assist and support your majesty on that throne where God has placed you, against the pretended prince of Wales, and all your enemies: And, since nothing can conduce more to the honour and safety of your majesty, and your kingdoms, than maintaining inviolable such alliances as have been made, or that your majesty shall think fit to make, with the Emperor, the States-General of the United Provinces, and other potentates, for preserving the liberties of Europe, and reducing the exorbitant power of France; we do assure your majesty, That we are firmly resolved, to the utmost of our power, to enable your majesty to prosecute that glorious design: And, that all your subjects may rest in a full assurance of happiness under your majesty's reign, we will maintain the succession of the crown in the Protestant line, according to the limitation in the several acts of settlement; and effectually provide for, and make good, the public credit of the nation."

The Queen's Answer.] The Queen returned this Answer:

"Gentlemen; I return you my hearty thanks for the kind assurances you give me in this Address: They cannot be any way more agreeably confirmed to me, than by your giving dispatch to all your preparations for the public service, and the support of our allies."

The Queen's first Speech to both Houses.]

* "This good harmony between the queen and her parliament, together with the resolution of the Commons about public credit, immediately raised the national funds above their former value, which upon king William's death had fallen above fifteen per cent. The queen not only answered the addresses of both houses in this favourable manner, but moreover she received all that came to her so graciously, that they went from her highly satisfied with her goodness and her obliging deportment; for she hearkened with attention to every thing that was said to her." Tindal.

March 11. The queen went to the house of Peers with the usual solemnity, and addressed herself to both Houses in the following Speech :

“ My Lords and Gentlemen ;

“ I cannot too much lament my own unhappiness, in succeeding to the crown so immediately after the loss of a king, who was the great support, not only of these kingdoms, but of all Europe; and I am extremely sensible of the weight and difficulty it brings upon me.—But the true concern I have for our religion, for the laws and liberties of England, for the maintaining the succession to the crown in the Protestant line, and the government in church and state as by law established, encourages me in this great undertaking; which, I promise myself, will be successful, by the blessing of God, and the continuance of that fidelity and affection of which you have given me so full assurance.—The present conjuncture of affairs requires the greatest application and dispatch; and I am very glad to find, in your several addresses, so unanimous a concurrence in the same opinion with me, that too much cannot be done for the encouragement of our allies, to reduce the exorbitant power of France.—I cannot but think it very necessary, upon this occasion, to desire you to consider of proper methods towards attaining of an Union between England and Scotland; which has been so lately recommended to you as a matter that very nearly concerns the peace and security of both kingdoms.—Gentlemen of the house of commons; I need not put you in mind, that the revenue for defraying the expences of the civil government is expired: I rely entirely upon your affections, for the supplying it in such manner as shall be most suitable for the honour and dignity of the crown.—My lords and gentlemen; It shall be my constant endeavour, to make you the best return for that duty and affection you have expressed to me, by a careful and diligent administration for the good of all my subjects: And, as I know my own heart to be entirely English, I can very sincerely assure you, there is not any thing you can expect, or desire from me, which I shall not be ready to do for the happiness and prosperity of England; and you shall always find me a strict and religious observer of my word.”

* “ There were two passages in this speech, that were thought not so well considered: She assured them, her heart was ‘entirely English.’ This was looked on, as a reflection on the late king: she also added, that they might ‘depend on her word;’ both these expressions had been in her father’s first speech, how little however they were afterwards minded by him.” Burnet.

“ It must be confessed, that though the queen’s falling in so cheerfully with her royal predecessor’s measures, as she expressed herself in her speeches to the privy-council and parliament, helped very much to support all good Britons

March 12. The Commons having, by such members of their house as were of the privy-council, returned their humble thanks to the queen for her gracious speech, she gave the message a very gracious reception, and was pleased to command sir Charles Hedges to assure them, “ That nothing should be wanting, that might contribute to their safety and welfare.”

The Lords' Address upon the Queen's Speech.]

March 13. The House of Lords attended her Majesty with the following Address :

“ We, your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, cannot sufficiently express the great satisfaction we receive from your majesty’s most gracious speech; trusting in God it will have the same effect abroad as at home, equally reviving the hearts of your allies and subjects, uniting all people, and encouraging their utmost endeavours in the common cause.—The sincere concern your majesty hath shewed for our religion, the government in church and state as by law established, and the succession to the crown in the Protestant line; the hazards you have exposed yourself to, in concert with his late glorious majesty, for maintaining our laws and liberties, as well as your most gracious assurance at this time, give your subjects such a confidence in your promises, such a dutiful affection to your person, such a zeal for your service, as will oblige them to make the utmost efforts to support your majesty under the weight and difficulties of the present conjuncture.—The concern your majesty expresses for your allies is a further obligation laid upon us; who are sensible their preservation is necessary to our own, and who are as desirous as ever to support the character of the crown of England, in enabling your majesty to maintain the balance of Eu-

under so great a loss and affliction, as the king’s death was to them; yet her majesty’s saying that to the two houses of parliament, ‘her heart was entirely’ English, seeming to be a reflection on the late king for being a foreigner, it occasioned much speculation and discourse, and not a little discontent. Every one knew that her majesty’s speeches were drawn up by those of her counsellors in whom she most confided; and it was matter of concern that any of them should presume so much on the influence they had over her, as to put words in her royal mouth so unworthy of king William’s glorious memory, and so inconsistent with what she was pleased to say in her letter to the parliament of Scotland two months after; ‘It pleased God to make the late king the great instrument of delivering our people from Popery and Arbitrary Power, and of restoring to them their ancient rights and privileges; and through the same divine grace we shall in the whole course of our reign aim at nothing more than the preserving to them these advantages.’” Oldmixon.

rape.—We cannot make suitable returns to your majesty, for your most gracious promises of a careful and diligent administration for the public good; which we think ourselves sufficiently secured of, by so solemn an engagement under your sacred word.—Your majesty hath been pleased to assure us of all we could wish, and recommend to us what we ought to desire; and, we doubt not, your pious intentions will procure a blessing from heaven: And your majesty may be assured, that resolutions so becoming a queen of England cannot but make the deepest impression upon all hearts that are true to the interest of their country.”

The Queen's Answer.] To this, her majesty was pleased to answer:

“ My Lords; It is a great satisfaction to me, to find, that what I have said has your concurrence and approbation; and I am willing to repeat to you, upon this occasion, That I shall always hold very exactly to the assurances I have given you.”*

* “ The Address of condolence and congratulation of the bishops and clergy of London having the same day been presented to the queen by the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of London being indisposed, her majesty made answer, That she was very well pleased with the marks of their good-will, and they might be sure she should always have a particular care of the church. The Dissenters, in and about London, presented also an address, which was the more remarkable, because all the non-conformists, except the Quakers, joined in it. The queen, in her answer, assured them of her protection, and that she should do nothing to forfeit her interest in their affections. Which words were afterwards remembered, when the royal assent was given to the Schism and Occasional bills. The city of London, and all the counties, cities, and even the subaltern bodies of cities, came up with addresses. In these, a very great diversity of stile was observed; some mentioned the late king in terms full of respect and gratitude; others named him very coldly: some took no notice of him, nor of his death, and simply congratulated her accession to the crown; and some insinuated reflections on his memory, as if the queen had been ill used by him. Her majesty received all civilly; to most she said nothing, to others she expressed herself in general words, and some things were given out in her name, which she disowned.

“ The consternation at the Hague for king William's death was exceedingly great. Upon the first news of it, the States-general and those of Holland assembled immediately: they looked upon one another as men amazed: they embraced each other, and promised to hold together, and adhere to the interests of their country: they sat up most part of the night, and sent out all orders that were necessary, upon so extraordinary an emergency, and dispatched letters to the provinces and to the cities of Holland, to acquaint them with the news, and to exhort to union, and a perseverance in the alliances and concerted design. The Imperial, Prussian, and Danish ministers sent also expresses to their respective courts on this occasion, and went all to the English envoy's. Count Goetz encouraged them, assuring them, this accident would not call for the least alteration in the resolutions of the emperor, and that he had just received the important news from Vienna that the king of the Romans would in person make the campaign on the Rhine. As the express from England had brought the queen's speech to her privy council, it was agreed by these ministers, that it should be translated into French and Dutch in order to revive the drooping spirits of the people, which had a very good effect. The next day, the States-general met early in the morning and again in the evening. The States of Holland being likewise assembled, pensioner Fagel made them a moving, but without encouraging speech. He imparted to them a letter he had received from the earl of Marlborough in the queen's name, with very express assurances of union, assistance, and vigour. Upon this, the states of Holland went in a body to the assembly of the States-general, where having condoned their irreparable loss, they represented, ‘ That, in this dangerous conjuncture, nothing could prove more effectual for their preservation, than a perfect unity, mutual confidence, and a vigorous resolution for the defence of their country, and by adhering firmly to those measures already entered into, as such as should be judged farther expedient for the good of the common cause; declaring withal that they were ready to perform their part, and rather to sacrifice all their blood and treasure than to see their State, their Liberty, and their Religion destroyed.’ This representation was highly applauded by the States-general, who returned thanks to the States of Holland for their zealous resolutions in that perilous conjuncture and assured them of their hearty concurrence for the safety and welfare of the State, and strenuously carrying on the common cause; and they ordered letters to be sent to the other provinces, to invite them to give the same assurances. The city of Amsterdam, to signalize themselves more particularly, on that occasion signified to the States-general, that they would not only consent to such resolutions, as should be thought necessary at that time, but would advance money to those provinces, which could not so readily furnish out their quotas that should be granted. The States-general, soon after, published their resolutions at large in print to the same effect, and concluded, ‘ That they were resolved religiously to maintain their treaties and alliances, entered into with their confederates; stedfastly to pursue the content thereof; vigorously and cordially to put them in execution; to persevere in the measures al-consideration from the throne. The queen, in her first speech, having put them in mind of the expiration of the civil list revenue, a bill passed both houses, to continue to her for life the same revenue that was payable to the late king, though many seemed to apprehend, that a great revenue might be applied to uses, so profitable to the public, in a reign that was to be frugal, and probably would not be subject to great accidents.

ready taken, and agree to such other measures as should be thought convenient; and that notice should be given of this their true meaning and intention to all their allies and confederates."

* For a farther encouragement to the States, the next post brought a letter, in French, from queen Anne, which she had writ pursuant to her declaration in council, and the lords desire in their first address. The letter was sent to Mr. Stanhope, with new credentials as envoy extraordinary from England, both which, as he was the ill of the gout, he immediately delivered by the hands of his secretary, to the president of the week.

"These assurances from the queen, and the good disposition of both houses of parliament, expressed in their addresses (which were also come over) were a great comfort to the States in the loss of the stadtholder; but what revived them most, was the arrival of the earl of Marlborough, with the character of ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary. The queen, five days after her accession, had made him and the duke of Bedford knights of the Garter; and the next day, having declared the earl captain-general of her forces both at home and abroad, she sent him into Holland, to give the States full assurances of her maintaining the alliances, that had been concluded by the late king, and of doing every thing that the common concerns of Europe required. This the ambassador delivered, in a speech to the States, which was printed and dispersed for the satisfaction of the people. Dyckvelt, the president of the week, answered this speech in the name of the States. Expressing their great affliction for the death of the late king; their congratulation of her majesty's accession to the throne, their hearty thanks for the assurance of her friendship, and their own resolution readily to concur with her majesty in a vigorous persecution of the common interest. To which he added, "That his excellency's person would be highly acceptable to them, not only for the queen's choice of him, and for the sake of king William, who first invested him with that character, but for his own merit." It was observed that, when the president mentioned the late king, the tears ran down his cheeks.

"The news of king William's death was received in France, with such joy, that the court and people could hardly contain themselves, without breaking out into the most furious transports; as was done at Rome to such a degree of extravagance, that cardinal Grimani,

The Queen's Speech on passing the Revenue Bill and the Bill for taking the Public Accounts.] March 30. Her Majesty came to the House of Peers, and made the following Speech:

"My lords and gentlemen; I am very well pleased to have given my assent to the Act for taking the Public Accounts: nothing is more reasonable than to give the kingdom the satisfaction of having those great sums accounted the imperial minister, complained of it to the pope, as an affront to his master, the emperor, who was the deceased king's friend, ally, and confederate. But little notice was taken of it. They were so afraid in France that the news would not prove true, that the person who brought it first to Calais, was seized by the governor's order, and kept in prison till it was confirmed. However, the French king finding that the death of king William would not have that effect, either in England or Holland, as he had promised himself, immediately sent instructions to the sieur de Barré (who was left at the Hague by count d'Avaux as secretary to the embassy) to renew negotiations with the States, in hopes of separating them from their allies.

"The earl of Marlborough's stay in Holland, though it was but a few days, was to very good purpose. He had confirmed the Dutch in their former resolutions, and settled several important affairs with the States, particularly for the opening the campaign, for the siege of Keyser-swaert (which by his advice was first to be undertaken) and the attack of Cadix. He had agreed with the States and the Imperial minister that war should be proclaimed against France the same day at Vienna, London, and the Hague. During his stay, the States had entered into such a confidence with the earl of Marlborough, that he departed as well satisfied with them, as they were with him. He embarked on the 3d of April, and on the 6th arrived in England." Tindal.

* "The queen passed a bill for receiving and examining the Public Accounts; and in her speech, she expressed a particular approbation of that bill: a commission to the same effect had been kept up, for six or seven years, during the former reign, but it had been let fall for some years; since the commissioners had never been able to make any discovery whatsoever, and so had put the public to a considerable charge, without reaping any sort of fruit from it. Whether this flowed from the weakness or corruption of the commissioners, or from the integrity or cunning of those, who dealt in the public money, cannot be determined. The party that had opposed the late king, had made this the chief subject of their complaints all the nation over, that the public was robbed, and that private men lived high, and yet raised large estates out of the public treasure: this had a great effect over England; for all people naturally hearken to complaints of this kind, and very easily believe them: it was also said, to excuse the fruitlessness of the former com-for, which were raised to carry on the late war; especially when it is necessary, for our own safety, and the support of our allies, to continue great taxes.—Gentlemen of the house of commons; I return you my kind and hearty thanks, for continuing to me, for my life, the same revenue you had granted to the king: I will take great care it shall be managed to the best advantage; and, while my subjects remain under the burthen of such great taxes, I will straiten myself in my own expences, rather than not contribute all I can to their ease and relief, with a just regard to the support of the honour and dignity of the crown. It is probable the revenue may fall very short of what it has formerly produced: however I will give directions that 100,000L* be applied to the public service, in this year, out of the revenue you have so unanimously given me.—My lords and gentlemen; The present posture of affairs abroad, as well as the season of the year, missionous, that no discoveries could be made, under a ministry, that would surely favour their under-workmen, though they were known to be guilty. One visible cause of men's raising great estates, who were concerned in the administration, was this, that for some years the parliament laid the taxes upon very remote funds, so that, besides the distance of the term of payment, for which interest was allowed, the danger the government itself seemed to be often in (upon the continuance of which the continuance and assignment of these funds was grounded) made that some tallies were sold at a great discount, even of the one half, to those who would employ their money that way, by which great advantages were made. The gain that was made, by robbing the coin, in which many goldsmiths were believed to be deeply concerned, contributed not a little to the raising those vast estates, to which some had grown, as suddenly as unaccountably. All these complaints were easily raised, and long kept up, on design to cast the heavier load on the former ministry: this made that ministry, who were sensible of the mischief this clamour did them, and of their own innocence, promote the bill with much zeal, and put the strongest clauses in it, that could be contrived to make it effectual. The commissioners named in the bill, were the hottest men in the house, who had raised as well as kept up the clamour, with the greatest earnestness. One clause put in the act, was not very acceptable to the commissioners; for they were rendered incapable of all employments, during the commission: the act carried a retrospect quite back to the Revolution: it was given out, that great discoveries would be made by them, and the art and industry with which this was spread over England, had a great effect in the elections to the succeeding parliament." Burnet.

* "This was received with great applause, and particular notice was taken of it, in all the Addresses that came up afterwards." Burnet.

obliges me to put you in mind of giving all possible dispatch to the public business."

The Lords' Address thercon.] March: The House of Lords presented the following Address to her majesty:

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, parliament assembled, do humbly beg leave assure your majesty, of the unspeakable satisfaction we received, in the tender care of you subjects, which your majesty was pleased express in your most gracious speech; especially in desiring to have those great sums accounted for, which were raised to carry on the late war.—Your unparalleled goodness, in straining yourself for the ease of your people, much needs make the deepest impression of gratitude in the hearts of all your subjects, and engage their utmost and most faithful endeavours for your majesty's service.—Your majesty may be assured, that we shall apply ourselves with the utmost diligence to the dispatch of what remains necessary to be done, in the support of your majesty and your government."

The Queen's Answer.] To this her majesty answered:

"My lords; I give you many thanks for your address. I need not tell you, that your approbation of what I do will always be a great satisfaction to me."

The Commons' Address.] The Address of the Commons was as follows:

"Most gracious sovereign;

"We your majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the Commons of England, in parliament assembled, beg leave unanimously to return our most humble and hearty thanks for your majesty's most gracious speech from the throne; and particularly for your majesty's unparalleled grace and goodness, in declaring that your majesty, out of your own revenue will contribute so largely to the ease and relief of your subjects, at a time when your majesty thinks it probable that the revenue may fall very short of what it has formerly produced and when your majesty's expences must, of necessity, be greater than ordinary.—Nothing can more encourage your people to contribute, with alacrity, to the public occasions than to have before them so great and glorious an example, from your majesty, of zeal and affection for the common good; and that your majesty is so well pleased to have given the kingdom the satisfaction of having those great sums accounted for, which were raised to carry on the late war.—We cannot omit upon this occasion, to repeat our firm resolutions to maintain and defend your majesty and your government, against the pretended prince of Wales, and all other your majesty's enemies whatsoever.—May God prolong your majesty's auspicious reign over us, and bless these kingdoms with royal issue of your majesty to inherit the crowns of your ancestors."

The Queen's Answer.] The queen answered:

"Gentlemen; It is a great satisfaction to me to find you are so well pleased with what I have said. I shall be glad, upon all occasions, to do you see, I desire nothing so much as the use and happiness of my people."

A Ministry formed.] "The queen," says Lardal, "being settled in the throne, began to think of forming her Ministry, wherein she chiefly discovered her partiality to the Tories, in favour of whom she had been all along prepossessed, as thinking them better affected to the Church than the Whigs. In vain did the weakness of Marlborough, who was appointed captain of the stole, and keeper of the privy purse,* use her endeavours to moderate her zeal for the Tories, and engage her to a better opinion of the opposite party. Her influence over the queen, how great soever in other respects, was in this case but of little effect; and the lords Marlborough and Godolphin themselves would not have had so great a share of her favour and confidence, if they had not been reckoned in the number of the Tories. The truth is, both these lords had been educated in the persuasion, that the Tory party were the best friends to the constitution both of church and state; nor were they perfectly undeceived, but by experience.

"Dr. John Sharp, archbishop of York, was pitched upon by the queen herself to preach the sermon at her coronation, (which was performed on St. George's day, April 23, with the usual magnificence) and to be her chief counsellor in church matters. The late king had sent a message to the earl of Rochester, some weeks before his death, to let him know, that he had put an end to his commission of lord lieutenant of Ireland; but that was not executed in form; nor the commission still subsisted in his person, and he was now declared lord lieutenant of Ireland. The lord Godolphin was, on the 6th of May, declared lord high-treasurer. This was very uneasy to himself, for he resisted the motion long; but the earl of Marlborough, whose eldest daughter was married to that lord's eldest son, pressed it in so positive a manner, that he said he could not go beyond sea to command the armies, unless the treasury was put into his hands, for then he was sure, that remittances would be punctually made to him. The earl was declared captain-general, and the prince of Denmark, on the 17th of April, had the title of generalissimo of all the queen's forces by sea and land; and it was for some time given out, that he intended to go beyond sea, to command the armies of the alliance; but this report soon fell, it being said, that the Dutch were not willing to trust their armies to the command of a prince, who might think it below him to be limited by their instructions, or to be bound to obey their orders. The late king had dissolved the commission for executing the office of lord high admiral, and had committed that great trust to the earl of Pembroke. The secrets of that board had been so ill kept, and there was such a faction in it, that the king resolved to vest it in a single person. The earl of Pembroke was not easily brought to submit to it; he saw it would draw a heavy load upon him, and was sensible, that, by his ignorance of sea affairs, he might fall into errors. To avoid which, he made use of good officers to assist him, and, resolving to command the fleet in person, took great pains to put things in such order, that it might be soon ready. A land army was designed to go with the fleet, to the command of which the duke of Ormond had been named. But, upon new measures, the earl of Pembroke was first ordered not to go to sea in person, and soon after dismissed from his post, with the offer of a great pension, which he generously refused, though the state of his affairs and family seemed to require it. Prince George, on the 21st of May, was made lord high admiral, and appointed sir George Rooke, sir David Mitchel, George Churchill, admiral of the blue squadron, and Richard Hill, esq. to be his council; though the legality of such a council was much questioned, as it was a new court, which could not be authorized to act but by an act of parliament; yet, out of respect to the queen, no public question was made of it, and the objection to it never went beyond a secret murmur. On the 14th of April, the duke of Devonshire was appointed lord steward, the earl of Jersey lord chamberlain, the earl of Bradford treasurer, and l'eregrine Bertie vice-chamberlain, and sir Edward Seymour comptroller of the household, who, three days after, was likewise sworn of the privy council; and the earl of Abingdon, viscount Weymouth, lord Dartmouth, Musgrave, Greenvil, How,* Gower,

* "It will be seen by this view of the promotions, that those gentlemen who were loudest in the debate about Places, and for non-admission of those that were in them to be members of parliament, when there was no great likelihood of their being courted to accept them; did now very readily embrace the opportunity to get into them, without thinking of being excluded the parliament. Mr. John How had more than once declared, he for his part would never be drawn off from his Country Party by the temptation of a place, and when he was upbraided with acting contrary, it was reported he should say, 'he had kept his word, for he had 'not a place;' that of Pymester General being divided between him and Mr. Fox. A poor quibble for so renowned a patriot. It is certain there is a great deal of truth in what Dr. Calamy writes in his abridgement, 'King William 'was no sooner dead, than the Dissenters felt

* The ladies of the bed-chamber were, the duchesses of Ormond and Queensbury; the countesses of Scarborough, Burlington, and Abington; the marchioness of Huntingdon; the ladies Hyde, Spencer, Fretcheville, Charlotte Beverwert, and Harriot Godolphin; and the duchess of Hamilton.

Harcourt, with several others who had, during the last reign, expressed the most violent and unrelenting aversion to the whole administration, were now brought to the council-board, whilst the names of the lord Sommers and Halifax, and of several others firmly attached to the revolution principles, were left out of the list. The privy seal, to the admiration of all men, was given to the marquis of Normanby, and to sir John Levison Gower the chancellorship of the duchy of Lancaster. On the 2nd of May, the earl of Nottingham and sir Charles Hedges were appointed secretaries of state, in the room of the earl of Manchester, and Mr. Vernon, the latter of whom was however made one of the tellers of the exchequer. The Tories would trust none but the earl of Nottingham, and he would serve with none but sir Charles Hedges; and the maxim laid down at court was, to put the direction of affairs in the hands of that party, who promised to carry on the war, and to maintain the alliances. If they failed in this, it was said, the queen would put her affairs into other hands, which at that time few could believe.

The queen continued all the judges in their posts, except Mr. justice Turton and Mr. baron Hatsell; and most of the lord-lieutenants of counties; nor did she make any change in foreign ministers. It was generally believed, that the earl of Rochester and his party were for severe methods, and for a more entire change quite through all subaltern employments; but the lord Godolphin and the earl of Marlborough were for more moderate proceedings; so that, though no Whigs were put in any posts, yet the effects of the change. They that bore them ill will before, and were ready to reflect upon them on all occasions, now openly triumphed; and though their hands were tied before, seemed now to conclude they should have full liberty to deal with them as they pleased, and talked of nothing less than suppressing them. This was common in the city, and in several parts of the country. They talked of pulling down their meeting-houses, as places not fit to be suffered; and in one town, Newcastle Under-Line, a borough for which sir John Levison Gower was one of the representatives, they actually went to work as soon as ever the tidings of the king's death reached them. Several sermons were preached, and pamphlets dispersed to blacken them as much as was possible; and such a violent temper discovered itself on a sudden, and such an inclination to heat and fury, as plainly shewed the parties affected to have been kept under an unnatural sort of restraint. Some that had taken the oaths to king William, shewed they did not love him by aspersing his memory, &c. But her majesty openly declaring for the same measures as had been pursued in the last reign, and the house of peers appearing zealous for the memory of king William, it was a curb and a check to them." Oldmixon.

many were kept into those, which they had enjoyed during the former reign.

Declaration of War against France and Spain.] May 4. The following Declaration of war against France and Spain was solemnly proclaimed.

"ANNE R.

"Whereas it hath pleased Almighty God call us to the government of these realms, at time when our late dear brother William 3, glorious memory, had, in pursuance of the repeated advices of the parliament of this kingdom, entered into solemn treaties of alliance with the emperor of Germany, the States General of the United Provinces, and other princes and potentates, for preserving the liberty and balance of Europe, and for reducing the exorbitant power of France; which treaties are grounded upon the unjust usurpation and incroachments of the French king, who had taken, and still keeps possession of a great part of the Spanish dominions, exercising an absolute authority over all that monarchy, having seized Milan and the Spanish Low Countries by his armies, and made himself master of Cadix, of the entrance into the Mediterranean, and of the ports of the Spanish West Indies by his fleets; every where designing to invade the liberties of Europe, and obstruct the freedom of navigation and commerce. And being provided by the third and fourth article of the forementioned alliance, that if, in the space of two months (which are some time since expired) the injuries complained of were not remedied, the parties concerned should mutually assist each other with their whole strength: And whereas, instead of giving the satisfaction that ought justly to be expected, the French king has not only proceeded to farther violence, but has added thereunto a great affront and indignity to us and our kingdoms in taking upon him to declare the pretended prince of Wales king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and has also influenced Spain to concur in the same affront and indignity as well as in his other oppressions: We find ourselves obliged, for maintaining the public faith, for vindicating the honour of our crown, and for preventing the mischiefs which all Europe is threatened with, to declare, and we do hereby accordingly declare war against France and Spain; and placing our entire confidence in the help of Almighty God, and so just and necessary an undertaking, we will (in conjunction with our allies) vigorously prosecute the same by sea and land, being assured of the ready concurrence and assistance of our subjects, in a cause they have so openly and heartily espoused. And we do hereby will and require our lord high-admiral of England, our general of our forces, our lieutenants of our several counties, governors of our forts and garrisons, and all other officers and soldiers under them by sea and land, to do and execute all acts of hostility in the prosecution of this war, against France and Spain, their vassals and subjects, and to oppose their attempts; willing and requiring all our subjects to take notice of the same, whom we henceforth strictly forbid to hold any correspondence or communication with France or Spain, or their subjects. But, because there are remaining in our kingdoms many of the subjects of France and Spain, we do declare our royal intention to be, that all the subjects of France and Spain, who shall demean themselves dutifully towards us, shall be safe in their persons and estates.—Given at our court at St. James's, the 4th day of May 1702, in the first year of our reign."

The Lords' Address thereon.] May 5. The Lords presented the following Address:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, do return your majesty our most humble thanks, for laying before us the Convention made by your majesty with the Emperor and the States General, in order to a concurrent Declaration of War against France and Spain; and of your royal intention to declare the war accordingly; and beg leave to assure your majesty, that we shall never be wanting, to give your majesty our utmost assistance in the prosecuting so just and necessary a war; on the good success whereof, under God, the welfare of these your kingdoms, and the liberties of Europe, do entirely depend."

The Queen's Answer.] Her Majesty gave this Answer:

"My Lords, I return you many Thanks, for your Address, and the assurances of your support and assistance; which are always very agreeable to me, and particularly upon this occasion."

The Commons' Address.] The Address of the Commons was as follows:

"Most gracious sovereign, We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of England, in parliament assembled, being highly sensible of your Majesty's great and tender care for the safety and welfare of your people, do with one voice, return your Majesty our most humble thanks for your gracious condescension in communicating to us your royal intentions of declaring war, in conjunction with your Majesty's allies, against the French king, and his grandson: and we do heartily assure your Majesty, that we will, to the utmost, enable your Majesty to carry on the said war."

The Queen's Answer.] The queen gave this Answer:

"Gentlemen, I am extremely pleased with the assurances of your resolution to assist and support me in this war: I make no doubt but your unanimity, upon this occasion, will have a very good effect, for the encouragement of our allies."

The Lords' Resolutions concerning false Reports of the deceased King.] The same day came forth in print, by order of the house of Lords, the Resolution and Proceeding of their lordships upon an affair of great moment. There was a scandalous story raised, wherein, not only the late king, but her present Majesty also was traduced; viz. That the late king James did, before his death, write a letter to the queen, wherein he charged her not to accept by any means of the crown, upon the death of king William, but make way for the succession of his pretended son; and that the king having notice hereof, and desiring to see the letter, she should refuse it; upon which he should concert measures for setting her aside; and that Papers were found in his closet to that purpose: wherefore, the Lords having made enquiry into the matter, and, as much as in their lay, to vindicate the honour of their late royal sovereign, deceased, they came to this Resolution:

"That whereas their lordships had been informed, that there had been a report spread abroad, that, among the late king's papers some Paper or Papers had been found, tending to the prejudice of her present Majesty, or her succession to the crown; and the Lord President, the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, the Earl of Marlborough, and the Earl of Albemarle, who were the persons appointed by her majesty to inspect the said papers, having, at the desire of the house, severally declared, that amongst the late king's papers, they did not see or find any paper or papers, in the least tending to the prejudice of her Majesty or her succession to the crown; or to her prejudice in any respect whatsoever, or which might give any ground or colour for such report: It is thereupon resolved by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the said report is groundless, false, villainous and scandalous, to the dishonour of the late king's memory, and highly tending to the disservice of her present Majesty."

"It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the matter of fact aforesaid, and the resolution of this house thereupon, be laid before her majesty by his grace the duke of Bolton, the earl Marshal, the earl of Radnor, the earl of Stamford, the earl of Scarborough, and the lord Ferrers: and that they do humbly desire her Majesty, from this house, that her Majesty will give order to Mr. Attorney General to prosecute, with the utmost severity of law, the authors or publishers of the above mentioned, or such like scandalous reports."

The Queen's Answer.] In pursuance of this Resolution, and proceeding of their lordships, the duke of Bolton acquainted the house, that himself, and the other lords, attended and presented their lordships' resolution to her Majesty; in answer thereunto, she was graciously pleased to say:

"I am very ready to do any thing of this kind: I will give directions to Mr. Attorney General, effectually to prosecute the authors and publishers of such false reports."

Proceedings in respect to Dr. Drake's 'History of the late Parliament.'] Besides the above censure, the Lords had under their consideration a complaint made of a passage in the preface of a printed book, entitled, 'The History of the last Parliament, begun at Westminster in the reign of king William, anno 1700.' The passage was read to the house, and is as follows, viz. 'And perhaps, there was a third thing in prospect of deeper reach than all these; which was, that, should it have pleased God, for our sins, to have snatched from us the king, on the sudden, by chance of war, or other fatal accident, during the tumult of arms abroad, and the civil disorders they had raised among us at home, and a numerous, corrupt, licentious party throughout the nation, from which the house of commons was sometimes not free; they might entertain hopes from the advantage of being at the helm, and the assistance of their rabble, to have put in practice their own schemes, and to have given us a new model of government of their own projection, and so to have procured to themselves a lasting impunity, and to have mounted their own beast, the rabble, and driven the sober part of the nation like cattle before them.—That this is no groundless conjecture, will readily appear to any considering persons, from the treatment her royal highness the princess of Denmark, the heiress apparent to the crown, met with all along from them and all their party. They were not contented to shew her constant neglect and slight themselves, but their whole party were instructed not only to treat her with disrespect, but spite; they were busy to traduce her with false and scandalous aspersions; and so far they carried the affront, as to make her, at one time, the common subject of the tittle-tattle of almost every coffee-house and drawing-room; which they promoted with as much zeal, application and venom, as if a bill of exclusion had then been on the anvil, and these were the introductory ceremonies.'

The passage being thus read, it was thereupon ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That Francis Coggan, Robert Gibson, and Thomas Hodgson, for whom the said book was mentioned to be printed, should, and were thereby required to attend that house, on the Saturday following at eleven o'clock; but their lordships, in the mean time, being informed, that Dr. Drake owned himself to be the Author of the book, and that he desired he might be appointed to attend at the same time: thereupon it was ordered, That he should attend that house on Saturday, the same hour; when after reading the order made the 6th, at the desire of Dr. Drake, for his attendance that day, the house took into their consideration the above-mentioned paragraph. After the reading whereof, Dr. Drake was called in, and the order being read to him, the Lord-Keeper asked him what he had to say concerning the said book; and the book and the said paragraph being shewed him, he owned he writ the book, and that paragraph in particular: and he thought he had just reason to write it, he having heard her highness talk of disrespectfully in almost every coffee-house. Then he withdrew; and after some debate was called in again; and the Lord Keeper told him the house was not satisfied with what he had said, but thought he trifled, and require him to acquaint the house with the grounds of his writing that paragraph. He answered, He found it mentioned in divers anonymous pamphlets published at that time, and hope it was no hurt to answer those pamphlets, an desired time to recollect what those pamphlets were: and then withdrew.

After some time he was called again, and asked the following questions, viz. If he could charge any person or persons in the kingdom with the matters asserted by him in that paragraph? To which he answered, That he did not know any such person.

Then he was asked, Whether he had heard any other person say, that they could charge any person whatsoever with matters contained in that paragraph? He said, He did not know of any such persons.

Being farther asked, If he had any other grounds besides the pamphlets, and what these pamphlets were? He said, he had no other grounds besides the pamphlets; and named the several pamphlets following, a his reason for writing the said paragraph viz. The two Legion Letters; the Black List; the 'Jura Populi Anglicani'; and 'To land's' 'Reasons for inviting over the princess of Hanover.' And being asked, If in any one of these Pamphlets there was any thing said about setting aside the present Queen? He answered, he did not remember there was.

Then he being withdrawn, the said Paragraph was taken into consideration, and it was proposed to pass a censure thereupon. And after debate, this question was put, That a censure should be then put upon the said paragraph? It was resolved in the Affirmative.

Then this question was put, That in the Preface of the Book, entitled, The 'History of the last parliament, begun at Westminster the 10th day of February, in the 12th year of the reign of king William, Anno Dom. 1700; there were several expressions which were groundless, false and scandalous, tending to create jealousies in her Majesty of her people, and to cause great misunderstandings, fears, and disputes amongst the queen's subjects, and to disturb the peace and quiet of the kingdom.

It was resolved in the Affirmative, in these words, "It is resolved and declared by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that in the preface of a book entitled, 'The History of the last Parliament, begun at Westminster the 10th day of February, in the twelfth year of the reign of king William, 1700' (written by Dr. Drake, as he owned at

(the bar) there are several expressions, which are groundless, false, and scandalous, tending to create jealousies in her Majesty of her people; and to cause great misunderstandings, fears, and disputes amongst the queen's subjects, and to disturb the peace and quiet of the kingdom." After which they ordered her Majesty's Attorney-General forthwith effectually to prosecute the said doctor Drake, for having writ the said paragraph.

Proceedings in respect to 'Tom Double.'] May 12th. The order being read for the master and wardens of the Stationers'-Company, and John Nutt, to attend to give an account of what they had done, in order to find out the author and printers of the book entitled, 'Tom Double,' returned out of the country: Or the true Picture of a modern Whig, set out in a second Dialogue between Mr. Whiglove, and Mr. Double, at the Rummer-Tavern in Queen-Street. They were called in, and Mr. Nutt said that Mr. Barber, the printer, gave him the book to publish, and they withdrew. Then the house went into consideration of the paragraphs in the 89 and 90 pages of the said book, which were read as followeth, viz.

Whiglove. I find we have miscarried in one great design, the train would not take, we were very late upon it just before the parliament met, all the Whig coffee-houses rung how necessary it was to break into the Acts of Settlement, and to exclude—

Double. Mum, Whiglove, talk no more upon that subject, I beseech you; fresh orders are issued out, and since we are not strong enough to make it go, and that on the contrary, it has alarmed and provoked all sorts of men, we are now directed to say, that never any such thing was intended by our Party, though, God knows, it was the whole discourse of all our clubs. Under the rose, this was one of those embryos that proved abortive upon the 30th of December last; but though it be not seasonable to stir in it now, never fear our abandoning a wicked design; we never quite lay aside any mischief; however, since it has really opened the eyes of a great many, and weakened our interest among several of our own side, whom, (with grief of mind I speak it) we cannot work up to be guilty of so much injustice, let us take all occasions of declaring, that we will not violate these acts upon any account whatsoever; which we may the more safely do, because you know it is our principle not to think that we are bound by any protestations we make either in private or in public; and it is one of the great advantages we have over the rest of our fellow-subjects, and we can fetter the consciences of others, while our own are at perfect liberty.

Then it was proposed to pass the same censure on these passages, as was passed on part of the preface of Dr. Drake's book.

After debate the question was put, Whether the house should be then adjourned? It was resolved in the negative. Then this question was proposed, That in the paragraphs which have been read, contained in the 89th and 90th pages of the book entitled, 'Tom Double returned out of the country, &c.' there were several expressions, which were groundless, false, and scandalous, tending to create jealousies in her Majesty of her people, and to cause great misunderstandings, fears, and disputes amongst the queen's subjects, and to disturb the peace and quiet of the kingdom.

Then the question was put, Whether the words, 'groundless, false and scandalous,' should be left out of the question?

It was resolved in the negative: After which the main question was put, That in the paragraphs which had been read, as aforesaid, there were several expressions which were groundless, false, and scandalous, tending to create jealousies in her Majesty of her people, and to cause great misunderstandings, fears, and disputes amongst the queen's subjects, and to disturb the peace and quiet of the kingdom. It was resolved in the affirmative, in these words; It is resolved and declared by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that in the paragraphs which have been read, contained in the 89th and 90th pages of the book, entitled, 'Tom Double returned out of the country: or the true Picture of a modern Whig set forth, in a second dialogue between Mr. Whiglove and Mr. Double, at the Rummer tavern in Queen's-street,' there are several expressions which are groundless, false, and scandalous, tending to cause great misunderstandings, fears and disputes amongst the queen's subjects, and to disturb the peace and quiet of the kingdom.

Animadversions upon Sermons on the 30th of January, ordered to be burnt by the Hangman.] This being over, and complaint being made to the house, on the 16th, of a book entitled, 'Animadversions upon the two last 30th of January Sermons. One preached to the honourable House of Commons: The other to the Lower House of Convocation. In a Letter' after reading and considering the several paragraphs and places therein, and debate thereupon: It was resolved and declared by their lordships, That the book or pamphlet, aforesaid, was a malicious, villainous libel, containing very many reflections on king Charles 1, of ever-blessed memory, and tending to the subversion of the monarchy: And thereupon it was ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the pamphlet should be burnt by the hands of the common hangman at Westminster, on Friday, the 22nd day of this instant, between the hours of one and two of the clock in the afternoon of the said day.

Dr. Bincke's Sermon censured.] Then the house took into their consideration a book, entitled, "A Sermon preached on January the 30th, 1701, in king Henry 7's chapel before the reverend clergy of the Lower House of Convocation. By W. Bincke, D. D. a Proctor for the diocess of Litchfield and Coventry." And some parts or paragraphs out of the ninth, tenth, and fiftenth pages of the said book being read as followeth, viz.

'And 1st, As to the near resemblance between the parties concerned, as well the actors as the sufferers, comparing those in the text with those of the day.—And here one would imagine, the latter were resolved to take St. Paul's expression in the most literal sense the words will bear, 'and crucify to themselves the Lord afresh,' and in the nearest likeness that could be, put him to an open shame. If, with respect to the dignity of the person, to have been born King of the Jews, was what ought to have screened our Saviour from violence, here is also one, not only born to a crown, but actually possessed of it. He was not only called king by some, and at the same time derided by others for being so called, but he was acknowledged by all to be a king; he was not just dressed up for an hour or two in 'Purple Robes,' and saluted with a 'Hail King,' but the usual ornaments of majesty were his customary apparel; his subjects owned him to be their king, and yet they brought him before a tribunal, they judged him, they condemned him: and that they might not be wanting in any thing to set him at naught, they spit upon him, and treated him with the utmost contempt. Our Saviour's declaring, 'that his kingdom was not of this world,' might look like a sort of renunciation of his temporal sovereignty, for the present desiring only to reign in the hearts of men: but here was nothing of this in the case before us; here was an indisputable right of sovereignty, both by the laws of God and man; he was the reigning prince, and the Lord's anointed; and yet, in despite of all law, both human and divine, he was by direct force of arms, and the most daring methods, of a flagrant rebellion and violence, deprived at once of his imperial crown and life.—The fact of this day was such a vying with the first arch-rebel, the apostate angel Lucifer: It was such a going beyond the old serpent in his own way of insolence and pride, that it is no wonder if he began to raise his head, and set up for dominion in this world, when thus warmed and enlivened by a fiery zeal in some, and rage in others, to the degree of drunkenness, thirsting after and satiating themselves in royal blood; and in which respect only, heated to the degree of phrenzy and madness, the plea in my text may seem to have some hold of them. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

After debate thereupon, it being proposed to censure these paragraphs, the house came to the following resolution:

"It was resolved and declared by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That in the book entitled, 'A Sermon preached on January the 30th, 1701, in king Henry 7's chapel, before the reverend Clergy of the 'Lower House of Convocation, by W. Binckes D. D. a Proctor for the Diocess of Litchfield and Coventry;' there are several expressions that give just scandal and offence to all Christian people." Then it being proposed to burn the Sermon; it was resolved in the negative. But at the same time their lordships ordered That the resolution above-recited, should be communicated to the lord bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, his ordinary, whom they left to censure him as he thought fit, according to the rules of those courts.

A Book inviting over the Elector of Hanover censured.] In the next place, complaint being made to the house, of two passages in the pamphlet, entitled, 1. "Reasons for addressing his majesty to invite into England their highnesses the electoress dowager and the electoral prince of Hanover." And likewise 2. "Reasons for attainting and abjuring the pretended prince of Wales, and all others pretending any claim, right or title from the late king James and Queen Mary, with arguments for making a vigorous war against France." The passages were read to the house:

'It appears from history, that all free people have set aside the children of tyrants, for reasons of external and universal force, as inheriting the principles and designs of their parents, bearing an affection to their friends, and owing a revenge to their enemies; as more likely to grasp at a greater power than even their parents, the better to secure themselves from their disgrace, and being under extraordinary obligations to those foreign potentates, who protected or restored them.'

'In fine, whether abjuration be penal or voluntary, (for I cannot doubt of one or the other) I hope care will be taken that it be tendered, as I said before, to all manner of persons, not excepting the king's majesty, or her royal highness the princess of Denmark. For all the securities we give to them, they owe this security to us. Not that I doubt either of them, from which I am the farthest of any man in the world; but they both of them very well know, what stories and surmises our enemies have been actually spreading to amuse and intimidate the people: They have whispered horrible things of blind and clandestine bargains; but Cæsar's wife ought to be unsuspected, as well as innocent.'

After which, it was resolved and declared by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That there were in that pamphlet assertions and insinuations, scandalous and dangerous, tending to alienate the affections of the subjects of this kingdom from her majesty, and to disturb the peace and quiet of the kingdom.

A Bill for the Union of the two Kingdoms.] As the queen, in her first speech to the parliament, had renewed the motion made by the late king, for the Union of England and Scot and, a bill was brought in for that purpose. Many of those, who seemed now to have the greatest share of her favour and confidence, opposed this bill with much heat, and not without indecent reflections on the Scots nation; yet it was carried by a great majority, that the queen should be empowered to name commissioners for treating of an Union. It was so visibly the interest of England, and of the present government, to shut that back-door against the practices of France, and the attempts of the pretended prince of Wales, that the opposition in this first step towards an Union, and the innocent scorn with which Seymour and others reacted the Scots, were clear indications, that the posts, they were brought into, had not cooled their tempers: But that, instead of easing matters, they intended to irritate them rather by reproachful speeches; the bill went through both houses, notwithstanding the rough treatment it met with at first; and, on the 6th of May, received the royal assent.

 May 25. The queen came to the house of peers, and, after passing several bills, put an end to the session with the following Speech:

"My lords and gentlemen; I cannot conclude this session without repeating my hearty thanks to you all, for your great care of the public, and the many marks you have given of your duty and affection to me. And I must thank you, gentlemen of the house of commons, in particular, both for the supplies you have given to support me in this necessary war, and the provisions you have made for the debts contracted in the former: Your great justice in making good those deficiencies will be a lasting honour and credit to the nation: I wish the difficulties they have brought upon us, may be a warning to prevent such inconveniences for the future.—I must recommend to you all, in your several counties, the preservation of the public peace, and a due execution of the laws.—I shall always wish that no differences of opinion among those that are equally affected by my service may be the occasion of heats and animosities among themselves. I shall be very careful to preserve and maintain the act of toleration, and to set the minds of all my people at quiet; my own principles must always keep me entirely firm to the interests and religion of the church of England, and will induce me to countenance those who have the truest zeal to support it."

The Parliament prorogued. And then the Lord-Keeper, by her majesty's command, prorogued the parliament till the 7th day of July next.

PRINCIPAL OCCURRENCES DURING THE RECESS.—Naval Preparations in England and Holland—Commissioners to treat of an Union—Affairs in Ireland—Siege of Keynecourt—Attempt upon Nimeguen—Laudau invested—The Earl of Marlborough sets out to command the Army—Venlo and Fort St. Michael taken—Buxermond surrenders—Liege ca-

pitulates—The English Fleet sent to Cadix—The Galleons taken and burnt at Vigo.—
 "The naval preparations in England and Holland," says Tindal, "were now carried on with all possible speed; and, as they raised the spirits of the confederates, so they gave no small alarms to France, Spain, and even Portugal; the design of the expedition having been kept so secret, that it was uncertain which of those three kingdoms was most threatened. France, having sent a strong squadron of men of war into the West-Indies, both to attack the English plantations, and to bring home the Spanish galleons, had no sufficient number of ships left to defend her own coasts, much less to protect those of Spain, whose king, in the beginning of the spring, was gone into Italy, both to appease the tumults in the kingdom of Naples, and to share with the duke of Vendosme, the expected honour of forcing prince Eugene to repass the mountains of Tirol.

"And though the king of Portugal gave fair words to the imperial ministers, and to Mr. Methuen, the English envoy, yet he began to be apprehensive, that the allies, having a formidable power at sea, would use more prevailing means than a negotiation to make him break his late engagements with France. On the 30th of May, sir George Rooke, admiral of the English fleet, having hoisted the union flag on board the Royal Sovereign, came to Spithead with sir Cloudesly Shovel, on board the Queen, and the great ships that lay at the Nore: And, at the same time, rear-admiral Fairborne arrived there from Ireland, with a squadron of men of war, having on board four regiments of foot, that were to be part of the land forces, to be commanded by the duke of Ormond, who, on the first of June, arrived at Portsmouth, accompanied by sir Henry Bellasis, who was to serve under him, and by admiral Churchill; and, the next day, prince George likewise set out for that sea-port.

"The same day, the queen went from St. James's to Windsor, having appointed Simon Harcourt, esq. to be her Solicitor-General, and conferred the honour of knighthood both upon him and on Edward Northey, esq. the Attorney-General. The day before, out of a just regard to the law of nations, the queen, by proclamation, ordered all ships, stopped before the declaration of war, to be discharged, and caused another proclamation to be published, 'For the encouragement of her ships of war and privateers.' And at the same time her majesty renewed the commission for the management of the customs; and upon her return from Windsor, appointed the lord-lieutenants, the commissioners of trade; for prizes, stamp, and salt-duties; and generals of her land-forces; gave audience to several foreign ministers, and disposed of many places and employments; and, among the rest, the earl of Marlborough was made master of the ordnance, the hon. John Granville, lieutenant-general, William Bridges, master surveyor, Christopher Musgrave, clerk of the same; and Edward Southwell was appointed secretary of state in Ireland, on the resignation of his father sir Robert Southwell.

"The queen, pursuant to the power given her by acts of parliament of both kingdoms, appointed commissioners for treating about an Union between England and Scotland. The commissioners met, for the first time, on the 22d of October, at the Cock-pit, where, after reading both commissions, Lord-Keeper Wright made a short speech on the occasion of their meeting, and was answered by the duke of Queensberry.

"As there was not a quorum of the Scots commissioners arrived in town, their meeting was adjourned, by a letter from the queen, to the 10th of November; but, about the 20th of the same month, they met again; and, notwithstanding some previous objections made by the Lord-Keeper to the validity of the Scots commission, they fully adjusted the preliminaries, of which this was one of the most considerable, 'That nothing agreed on amongst themselves should be binding, except it be ratified by her majesty, and the respective parliaments of both nations; and that, except all the heads proposed for the treaty were agreed to, no particular thing agreed on should be binding.' The Lord-Keeper then proposed on the part of the English, 'That the two kingdoms should be inseparably united into one monarchy under her majesty and her heirs and successors, and under the same limitations, according to the acts of settlement.' And the duke of Queensbury proposed on the part of the Scots, 'That both nations should be united in one monarchy, and one parliament, with a mutual communication of trade and privileges.' The proposal of the English was readily agreed to; and the queen, to quicken matters, came on the 14th of December, and made a speech to them. The Scots commissioners had given in six proposals, on which some considerations, as a subject-matter of debate, were delivered by the English commissioners. But, when the Scots commissioners gave in their proposals for preserving the rights and privileges of their company trading to Africa and the Indies, such difficulties arose, as put a stop to all farther progress, and nothing more was done upon this commission, which was annulled by the new Scottish parliament called by the queen, as will hereafter be seen.

"Ireland was now put under lords justices, named by the earl of Rochester. The earl of Mount-Alexander, major-general Erle, and Thomas Knightly, were appointed lords justices, in the room of the archbishop of Dublin and the earl of Drogheda, whom the lord Rochester had left in the government of that kingdom. Mean time, the trustees for the forfeited estates continued still in their former authority.

"The first step of the war was to be made in the name of the elector Palatine, in the siege of Keyerswaert, which had been put into the hands of the French by the elector of Co-logne, and which, whilst in their hands, exposed both the circle of Westphalia and the dominions of the States; for their places on the Rhine, being in no good condition, lay open to the excursions of that garrison. The trenches had been opened before this town on the 1st of April; and the care of the siege committed to the prince of Nassau Saarbrugh (declared the emperor's marshal de camp) under which the Dutch served as auxiliaries to the emperor, the States not having declared war against France. Another army of the Dutch was formed under the earl of Athlone, and lay in the dutchy of Cleve to cover the siege; and a third, commanded by general Cohorn, brought into Flanders, forced and demolished the line between the two forts of St. Donat and Isabell, which the enemy had been many months retreating with great labour and expence, and laid the greatest part of the Chatellanie of Brabant under contribution. However, after these successes, upon the approach of the marquis Bedmar and the count de la Motte, with French troops under their command, who were superior in number to him, Cohorn was forced to retire under the walls of Sluys; but, to prevent the enemy's taking fort Donat, he first laid the country under water, and forced the Spaniards to retire towards Ghent.

"However on April the 24th, the besiegers carried their trenches within two hundred paces of the town, and had four batteries continually firing, with which they had made considerable breaches in the rampart, so that they intended to make an attack upon the counterscarp, for which purpose a good number of fascines and wool-packs were prepared, it being thought, that by those proceedings the town would soon surrender. However, the confederates were very much mistaken in their calculation: for, though they proposed to be masters of that place in three weeks, they found themselves held out near two months, and had likewise proved a bad beginning of a new war. For count Tallard, having posted himself with his flying camp, on the other side of the Rhine, fired from thence with so much success, that the besiegers, notwithstanding their intrenchments, were very much incommoded, and had besides, the mortification to see the besieged succoured from that camp with troops, ammunition, and all necessary refreshment, which, with the excessive rains that swelled the Rhine, did to the great prejudice of the assailants, occasioned the length of the siege. However, as this while the besiegers cannonaded the town, and battered the outward fortifications with forty-eight great guns, and thirty mortars: so that it was almost reduced to ashes, when they resolved to make a general attack on the counterscarp and ravelin. This they executed with unparalleled bravery. The conflict was obstinate and bloody, for nothing was to be seen for two hours, but flame and smoke: But at length the besieged were constrained to give ground, and leave the besiegers masters both of the ravelin and the counterscarp, upon which by immediately lodged themselves. The prince of Nassau Saarburgh performed prodigies of valour, giving his orders with great composure of the danger, and admirable presence of mind; and all the other officers and soldiers shared themselves in this action beyond expectation. This advantage, however, cost the confederates very dear; for they had six hundred and eighty men killed, and one thousand five hundred and two wounded in the action; and it likewise so much weakened the garrison, that they were forced to capitulate, and obtain honourable terms. The fortifications were raised according to agreement.

“On the 10th of June, N. S. the marshal Boufflers decamped from Zanten, and directed his march, without sound of trumpet or beat of drum, through the plains of Goeh towards Mooker-Hyde, close by Nimeguen, with a view to get between the confederate army and that city, and so to cut them off from their provisions, ammunition, and forage. Upon this the earl of Athlone, having early information of the enemy's motion, and discovering their design, called a council of general officers, wherein it was unanimously resolved, that the confederates should begin their march that evening. The baggage was accordingly sent to Nimeguen, and, after several marches and regulations, the earl about break of day received particular intelligence of the strength of the enemy, and caused the cavalry to be drawn up in order of battle to cover the march of the infantry. About eleven in the morning, the French horse advanced in great numbers, with the household-troops at their head, and pressed upon the earl, who behaved himself with great resolution. However, as the confederate squadrons were wheeling, the French troops pushed them upon the foot, and put two or three battalions into confusion; but, by the conduct of the general officers, the enemy was soon repulsed. On the other side there happened an encounter between some of the squadrons of the French king's household, some Danish squadrons, and some of the earl of Athlone's carabineers, who so remarkably distinguished themselves on this occasion, that the French were repulsed, though with considerable loss on both sides. By this time the confederates were got under the cannon of Nimeguen, which, soon after, began to play upon the enemy, and the barghers signalized themselves on this occasion in an extraordinary manner; for, though they had not a gunner in the town, they managed their artillery with great success. The English, who had the honour to close the retreat, maintained their post in excellent order, being assisted by the prince of Wirttemberg, who put a stop to the household-troops, which were advanced very near them, and preparing to charge them towards the end of their march. Twenty battalions of foot were posted in the outworks of Nimeguen, and the whole army was under arms all that night, as was the enemy likewise. The next morning a great body of French horse and foot advanced towards the allies, as if they intended to attack them; but this they did only to cover the march of their own army, which filed off towards Cleve, venting their rage at their disappointment upon the defenceless country, which they rifled and laid waste, destroying the park of Cleve, and all the delicious walks and avenues of that charming place. Thus was marshal Boufflers disappointed in his design upon Nimeguen, which, if taken, must have been followed with very fatal consequences, for the French would have penetrated into the very heart of the United Provinces: It was but indifferently provided for an attack, and the scheme was well laid against it, and wanted but little of being punctually executed, the enemy missing but half an hour of arriving in the outworks before the confederates. The earl of Athlone's conduct on this occasion raised his credit, as much as it sunk marshal Boufflers, who, though he had a superior army, animated by the presence of so great a prince as the duke of Burgundy, was able to do nothing, but was unsuccessful in every thing that he designed; and his parties, that at any time were engaged with those of the earl, were defeated in almost every action.

“The unsuccessful attempt upon Nimeguen, and the reduction of Keyerswaert, were not the only mortifications which the French suffered; for, their army in Germany being but weak, and drawing together but slowly under the command of marshal de Catinat, the Germans had an opportunity of laying siege to Landau. This strong and important place was invested on the 16th of June, N. S. by prince Lewis of Baden, who spent the rest of the month in raising batteries, and making his approaches; and, on the 27th of July, the king of the Romans arrived in the confederate camp, in order to have the honour of taking the city: his train was so large, and his equipage so splendid, that the expence of it put all the emperor's affairs in great disorder; the most necessary things being neglected, while a needless piece of pomp consumed so great a part of their treasure. The siege was stopped for some weeks for want of ammunition; but at last the citadel was taken by storm on the 9th of September, and, on the 12th, the city surrendered.

“This was the state of the campaign, before the earl of Marlborough left England, from whence he set out on the 12th of May, and, upon his arrival at the Hague, having the character of ambassador as well as captain-general, he had several conferences with the States, in which he gave them all possible assurances of the queen's affection and resolution to support them in all emergencies. The earl of Athlone was set on by the other Dutch generals, to insist on his quality of velt-marshal, and to have the command with the earl of Marlborough by turns. But, though he was now in high reputation by his late conduct, the States obliged him to yield this point to the earl of Marlborough, whom they declared generalissimo of all their forces, and sent orders to all their generals and other officers to obey him. The earl, on his part, made so modest and becoming a use of the power put into his hands, as soon gained him the hearts of all the general officers under him; and, to the earl of Athlone in particular, he behaved in so obliging a manner, that the command seemed to be equal between them.

"All things being now regulated with the deputies of the States, the earl left the Hague on the 30th of June, N. S. and went to Breda; from whence he sent what detachments could be spared from that place and other garrisons, to the camp at Nimeguen. He followed thither himself on the 2d of July, where, the next day, the earl of Athlone, lieutenant-general Dopff, and the other general officers, made him a visit; and, at an interview with them, he gave the necessary orders for drawing the army together. Nineteen battalions of the troops, which had been employed at the siege of Keiserswaert; the troops of Hesse and Luneburgh; the English forces from Breda under major-general Lumley, and other troops, having joined the army, a camp was formed at Duckenberg and Budweick, consisting of seventy-six battalions of foot, and one hundred and twenty squadrons of horse and dragoons, amounting together to about sixty thousand men, with sixty-two cannon, eight mortars and howbitz, and four and twenty pontoons. Thither the earl went likewise, and, on the 8th, called a council of war of all the general officers, to concert the further operations of the campaign.

"The earl of Athlone was always inclined to cautious and sure, but withal feeble, counsels; but the earl of Marlborough, when the army was thus brought together, finding his force superior to the duke of Burgundy, on the 16th passed the Maese, and encamped at Over-Asselt near Grave, within two leagues and a half of the enemy, who had intrenched themselves between Goch and Gennep. On the 26th, the confederate army repassed the Maese below the Grave; and, on the 28th, encamped at Geldorp, upon which motion the French passed the same river about Venlo. Two days after, the allies removed from Geldorp to Gravebroeck, where finding a French garrison in the castle, seated in a morass, and surrounded by a double ditch and good palisadoes, a detachment, under the command of the lord Cutts, briskly attacked it, and, with the assistance of four cannon and two howbitz, after a short resistance obliged the garrison, consisting of a captain and an hundred men, to surrender at discretion. The same day, the British artillery arrived in the camp from Holland, under convoy of two English regiments of horse and two of foot, which had left England in the beginning of June. On the 2d of August, N. S. they advanced to Petit-Brugel, following the French, who retreated as they advanced, so close, that they were obliged to abandon the Spanish Guelderland, which was left to the discretion of the confederates. The earl of Marlborough was for venturing upon a decisive action, for which end, the whole army ordered to their arms the next morning. But the Dutch were afraid to put things to an hazard, and would not consent to it. Pensionary Fagel, and those who had the administration of affairs at the Hague, proceeded with the more caution, because, upon the king's death, those, who had always opposed him, began to form parties in several of the towns, and were designing a change of government; so that any public misfortune, in conduct, would have given great advantage to those, who lay upon the watch for it. The pensionary was more particularly afraid at; and that made him the more unwilling to run any risque. Those, who pretended to be judges, thought, that, if the earl of Marlborough's advice had been followed, matter might have been brought to a happy decision, and the rather, as it afterwards appeared, the French army was not above half got to the camp, greatly fatigued by an almost continual march of two days and two nights, and in the greatest consternation. But, as the earl was prudent in his conduct of the army, so was he careful not to take too much upon himself.

"The duke of Burgundy, finding himself obliged to retreat as the confederate army advanced, thought this was not suitable to his dignity; and therefore left marshal Boufflers to command, ending his first campaign ingloriously; and it appears, that the French king was dissatisfied with the conduct of the marshal, for he never after reposed any confidence in him.

"The Dutch, who were so lately in the deepest consternation upon the retreat of the army under the cannon of Nimeguen, before the earl of Marlborough's arrival, had now pleasure to see the French fly in their turn, and thus were the United Provinces preserved by the earl's prudence and vigilance, whilst the duke of Burgundy, who came to the army to be taught how to fight, learned nothing but how to avoid an engagement.

"The earl of Marlborough went on, taking several places, which made little or no resistance; and finding at length, that the French were not to be brought to an engagement on equal terms, and the deputies of the States general, who followed the army, having represented to him, that it was much more for the advantage of Holland to dispossess the enemy of the places they held in the Spanish Guelderland, whereby the free navigation of the Maese was interrupted, and the important town of Mæstricht in a manner blocked up, he therefore disposed all things for the siege of Venlo. In the mean time, general Schultz was ordered to reduce the town and castle of Wertz, which capitulated after a short resistance.

"On the 7th of September, the trenches were opened on both sides the Maese, and the town of Venlo surrendered on the 25th of the same month, after fort St. Michael had been stormed and taken by the English under the command of the lord Cutts, who, with several other officers of the same nation, particularly the young earl of Huntingdon, shewed an incredible bravery on that hazardous occasion.

"The earl proceeded with the army under his command to sit down before Ruremond, the second city of Guelders, standing upon the Maese, at the confluence of that river and the Roer; which, after a very vigorous siege, fell partly on the 6th of October, and the next day surrendered upon articles. The same time Stevenswaert, a fortified place, seated on the Maese, about five miles from Ruremond to the south, capitulated likewise. Upon the success of the confederates, marshal Boufflers thought it high time to provide for the security of Liege which he justly apprehended to be in no small danger. Being accompanied therefore with the duke of Mayne, and taking with him some Engineers, he went to view the fortifications of the citadel, and, after that, the most considerable posts between that city and Metz, as if he intended to incamp there; but, finding it impracticable by the approach of the confederates, who were marching towards Liege, he retreated to Tongeren with great precipitation, and went towards Brabant, to defend such places, as at that time were not intended to be attacked.

"When the confederate army came before Liege, they found the suburbs of St. Walburgh taken fire by the French garrison, who were divided, part into the citadel, and part into the Charouse, after which the city was delivered to the besiegers, by a treaty between the earl of Marlborough, the deputies of the States-general, and commissioners from the chapter and magistracy. Six days after, the trenches were opened against the great citadel, which was taken by storm, notwithstanding de Violaine, the governor, five days before, upon a summons to surrender, sent the earl of Marlborough word, "That it would be time enough to think of that six weeks hence." The assailants having exerted an amazing courage in this attack, and put most of the garrison to the sword, gained a considerable booty, besides honour; for, in the cash of treasure alone, there were three hundred thousand florins in gold and silver, and notes for one million two hundred thousand florins upon substantial merchants at Liege, which were all accepted, and turned into ready money. This victory was soon after celebrated by the surrender of the Charouse, the garrison of which place, having capitulated, were conducted to Antwerp.

"This ended the campaign with great success, many places having been taken with little resistance, and an inconsiderable loss either of time or of men. The earl of Marlborough's conduct gained him the hearts of the army, and the States-general were highly satisfied with every thing he did; and the earl of Alliance did him the justice to own, that he had differed in opinion from him in every thing that was done, and that therefore the honour of the success was intirely owing to him.

"Whilst these things were transacting on the continent, the confederate fleet was not idle. It consisted of fifty ships of the line, thirty English and twenty Dutch; the English commanded by sir George Rooke, having under him vice-admiral Hopson, and the rear-admirals Fairborne and Graydon; the Dutch under the command of lieutenant-admiral Alltmond, admiral Callemburgh, the vice-admirals Vandergoes and Pieteroon, and the rear-admiral Wassanaer: with about 14,000 land forces on board the transports, 9,663 English, and 3,924 Dutch: The English commanded by sir Henry Bellasis, lieutenant-general; sir Charles O'Hara and lord Portmore, majors-general; and the colonels Seymour, Hamilton, and Matthews, brigadiers: And the Dutch, by major-general Sparre and brigadier baron Palandt: The duke of Ormond had the supreme command of the whole. Sir George Rooke spoke so coldly of the design, which he went upon, before he sailed, that those who conversed with him, were apt to infer, that he intended to do the enemy as little harm as possible. On the 19th of June, the fleet weighed from Spithead, and came to anchor at St. Helen's, in order to sail with the next fair wind. Three days after, the rear-admirals Fairborne and Graydon were detached from thence with sixteen men of war and two fireships, English, and a squadron of the Dutch, in all thirty sail, upon a secret expedition; and, on the 23d, the prince of Hesse d'Armstadt sailed in the Adventure frigate for Lisbon. Advice had been sent over from Holland of a fleet, that sailed from France under monsieur de Casse, and was ordered to call in at the Groyne. Sir John Munden was recommended by sir George Rooke to be sent against this fleet; and, though he came up with them with a superior force, yet he did not hinder the French from getting into the Groyne, nor fight them there.

"Upon his return therefore to St. Helen's, where he arrived on the 25th of June, a court-martial, of which sir Cloudesley Shovel was president, was appointed to try him. He was acquitted, some excusing themselves for their lenity to him, by alledging, that, if they had condemned him, the punishment was death; whereas they thought his errors flowed from a want of sense; so that it would have been hard to condemn him for a defect of that which nature had not given him. But this acquittal raised such a public clamour, that the queen ordered him to be broke.

"Sir George Rooke, to divert the design, which he himself was to go upon, wrote from St. Helen's, that the Dutch fleet was victualled only to the middle of September; so that no great design could be undertaken, when so large a part of the fleet was so ill provided. When the Dutch admiral heard of this, he sent to their ambassador to complain to the queen of this misinformation, for he was victualled to the middle of December. On the 1st of July, the confederate fleet set sail from St. Helen's, steering their course for Cadiz; but they were for some time stopped by contrary winds, accidents, and pretences, many of which were thought to be strained and sought for; however, at last, on the 12th of August, they came to anchor in the bay of Cadiz, about two leagues from that city. Sir George Rooke had laid no disposition beforehand how to proceed upon his coming thither, and some days were lost on pretence of seeking for intelligence. It is certain, that our court had false accounts of the state of the place, with regard both to the garrison and the fortifications; the garrison being much stronger and the fortifications in a much better condition, than had been represented. The French men of war and the galleys, that lay in the bay, retired within the puntals. In the first surprize, it had been easy to have followed them, and to have taken or burnt them, which sir Stafford Fairborne offered to execute; but sir George Rooke and the rest of his creatures did not approve of it. Some days were lost before a council of war was called. In the mean while, the duke of Ormond sent some engineers and pilots to sound the south side of Cadiz near the island of St. Pedro; but, while this was doing, the officers, by the taking of some boats, came to know, that the inhabitants of Cadiz had sent over the best of their goods and other effects to Port St. Mary's, an open village over against it, on the continent of Spain; so that there was good plunder to be had easily: whereas the landing on the isle of Cadiz was like to prove dangerous, and, as some made them believe, impracticable. In the council of war in which their instructions were read, it was proposed to consider, how they should put them in execution. General O'Hara made a long speech against landing; shewing, how desperate an attempt it would prove, and how different they found the state of the place from the representations made of it in England. The greater number agreed with him, and all that the duke of Ormond could say to the contrary was of no effect. Sir George seemed to be of the same mind with the duke, but all his dependants were of another opinion: so that this was thought a piece of craft in him. In conclusion, the council of war came to a resolution not to make a descent on the island of Cadiz; but, before they broke up, those whom the duke had sent to sound the landing-places on the south side, came and told them, that, as they might land safely, so the ships might ride securely on that side. Yet they had no regard to this, but adhered to their former resolution, nor were there any orders given for bombarding the town. The sea was for the most part very high, while they lay there; but it was so calm for one day, that the engineers believed they could have done much mischief, but they had no orders for it; and indeed it appeared very evidently, that they intended to do nothing but plunder Port St. Mary's; a design, which was directly contrary to the advice of Mr. Methuen, the English envoy in Portugal, who, in a letter to the duke of Ormond from Lisbon of the first of August, told him, 'That the point of the greatest importance was to insinuate to the Spaniards, and shew by his proceedings, that he came not as an enemy to Spain, but only to free them from France, and give them assistance to establish themselves under the government of the house of Austria.' However, the land-forces being set ashore in the bay of Bulls, made themselves masters of Rota, Fort St. Katharine, and Port St. Mary, which they found deserted, but full of riches, which were immediately plundered; some of the general officers setting a very ill example to all the rest, especially O'Hara and Bellasis. The duke of Ormond tried to hinder this, but did not exert his authority; for if he had made some examples at first, he might have prevented the mischief that was done. But the whole army running so violently on the spoil, he either was not able, or, through a gentleness of temper, not willing to proceed to extremities. He had published a manifesto, according to his instructions, by which the Spaniards were invited to submit to the emperor; and he offered his protection to all that came in to him. But the plundering of St. Mary's was thought an ill commentary on that text. After some days of unsuccessful attempts on the forts of that side, particularly Matagorda, it appeared, that nothing could be done; and, provisions now growing scarce, and the sea officers representing the danger of staying any longer in those seas, the duke of Ormond, though not without great reluctance, consented to the re-embarking of the land-forces. Some of the ships crews were so employed in bringing off and bestowing the plunder, that they took not the necessary care to furnish themselves with fresh water. Sir George Rooke, without prosecuting his other instructions, in case the design on Cadiz failed, gave orders only for a squadron to sail to the West-Indies, with some land-forces, and though he had a fleet of victuallers, that had provisions to the middle of December, he ordered them to sail home; by which means the men of war were so scantily furnished, that they were soon forced to be put on short allowance. Nor did he send advice-boats, either to the ports of Algarve or to Lisbon, to see what orders or advices might be lying there for him, but sailed in a direct course for England.

Some time before this, the news of the arrival of the French squadron, under M. Chateau-Renault, with the Spanish Galleons, in the harbour of Vigo, being brought to England, orders were immediately dispatched to sir George Rooke, to attempt the taking or destroying them; and sir Cloudesly Shovel was ordered upon the same design, with another squadron of men of war. But, before these orders could reach the grand fleet, sir George Rooke, in his return towards England, having, on the 22d of September, sent the Eagle, Sterling-Castle, and Pembroke, to water in Langos-bay, Mr. Beauvoir, the chaplain of the Pembroke, went ashore in the town of Lagos, and meeting with a gentleman in the street, whom, by several cir-circumstances, he judged to be no Portuguese, he accused him in French: which the other, who proved to be the French consul, returning in a very obliging manner, invited him to his house. Mr. Beauvoir, extremely willing to embrace this offer, continued there two nights; during which, the consul, in their several conversations, could not forbear to boast of his master's strength at sea, and at last gave some hints of the arrival of the galleons on that coast. On the 24th, Mr. Beauvoir being ready to embark, and understanding that a gentleman was arrived in that town bound for the fleet, with letters to the prince of Hesse and Mr. Methuen (who were gone from the fleet to Lisbon some time before) he invited him to go aboard the Pem-broke, without taking the least notice of their departure. The gentleman having gladly accepted this invitation, and told him just as they were leaving the shore, that M. Chateau-Renault was arrived at Vigo with thirty men of war, and twenty-two galleons, and that he was sent by the imperial minister to the grand fleet, they went together on board the Pembroke, where captain Hardy, her commander, being informed, as well by Mr. Beauvoir of what he had gathered from the French consul, as by the other gentleman, concerning what he knew of the matter, he set sail the next morning in quest of the grand fleet, which at last he met with on the 6th of October. Having imparted his intelligence to the English admiral, sir George communicated the same to the Dutch; and it was resolved to attempt the destroying of the French and Spanish ships at Vigo. Accordingly, the fleet came to an anchor on the 11th, against that place, almost unperceived by the enemy, by reasons of the hazy weather: and, finding that the French and Spanish ships were carried up beyond a narrow strait, defended by a castle, besides a strong boom about it, made with masts, cables, and chains, it was resolved in a council of war, that, since the whole fleet could not safely go up to the place, where the enemy's ships lay, a detachment of 15 English and 10 Dutch men of war, with all the fire-ships, frigates, and bomb-vessels, should go upon that service, with all the flag-officers aboard them, whilst part of the land-forces were to make a descent, and to attack the fort on the south side of Rodondela, a small fishing-town.

nadiers rushing in made themselves masters of the castle, and took 300 French seamen and 50 Spaniards prisoners. Whilst these things were transacting ashore, the squadron designed for this expedition advanced briskly towards the boom, and, after a little stop by a calm, vice-admiral Hopson, in the Torbay, broke, amidst the enemy's fire, through the boom, where he received several broad-sides from the Bourbon and l'Esperance, two French men of war placed within the boom. The rest of vice-admiral Hopson's division, and that of the Dutch vice-admiral Vandergoes, bearing at the same time upon the bottom, were becalmed, and consequently struck, so that they were forced to cut their way through it, except their admiral, who hit the same passage by which vice-admiral Hopson had entered before. Hopson, in the mean time, being boarded by a fire-ship, was in great danger of being burnt, had not the fire-ship been blown up too soon; notwithstanding which, he received considerable damage in his rigging, and many of his men, during the first consternation, threw themselves overboard, in hopes to save themselves, but were most of them drowned, whilst the rest behaved so well as to preserve the ship. The French admiral seeing the boom cut to pieces, the platform and castle in the enemy's hands, the Bourbon taken, and the whole confederate squadron ready to fall in among them, ordered his own ship to be set on fire; and his example being followed by all the rest, afforded a most dreadful spectacle to the Spaniards as well as to the French. Whilst they were thus busied in the destruction of their own fleet, the English were as careful in preserving it, not without some success; several, as well of the men of war as of the galleons, being taken, four by the English, and five by the Dutch; but the rest were burnt, with seven French men of war. What made this victory the more considerable, was its being gained with inconsiderable loss; there being not above forty men killed, and ten wounded, of the landmen in this action, and very few of the seamen, except those that were drowned of vice-admiral Hopson's ship. As to the cargo aboard this fleet, which was computed at twenty millions of pieces of eight in gold and silver, besides merchandizes, about fourteen millions of it were taken out before by the enemy; the rest was either taken by the English or Dutch, or left in the galleons, that were sunk or burnt. The goods were valued at twenty millions of pieces of eight more, of which one fourth part only was saved by the enemy, near two fourths destroyed, and the rest taken by the confederates, besides a great quantity of plate, and other rich commodities, concealed for the use of private persons in the galleons, and a great deal of other plate belonging to the French officers found at Rodondela, of which the duke of Ormond took possession the next morning, and in which much other plunder was found. The French seamen and soldiers escaped, for the English, having no horse, could not pursue them. The Spaniards sp-peared at some distance in a great body, but they did not offer to enter into any action with the duke of Ormond: And it appeared, that the resentment of that proud nation, which was now governed by French counsels, was so high, that they would not put themselves in any danger, or to any trouble, even to save their own fleet, when it was in such hands.

“After this great success, it came under consultation, whether it was not advisable to leave a good squadron of ships with the land-forces, to winter at Vigo, since the neighbourhood of Portugal could supply them with provisions and all other necessaries, and this might encourage that king to declare himself, when there was such a force and fleet lying so near him; and it might likewise encourage such Spaniards as favoured the emperor, to declare themselves, when they saw a safe place of retreat, and a force to protect them. Upon these considerations, the duke of Ormond offered to stay, if sir George Rooke would have consented; but he excused it, alledging, that he had sent home the victuallers with the stores, and therefore could not spare what was necessary for such as should stay there. And indeed he had so ordered the matter, that he could not stay long enough to try whether they could raise and search the men of war and galleons that were sunk; and he was obliged to make all possible haste home, for, if the wind had turned to the east, which was usual in that season, a great part of the ships crews must have perished with hunger.

“On the 16th of October, sir Cloudesly Shovel having joined the confederate fleet with twenty-nine sail, the land-forces re-embarked the next day; and, on the 19th, sir George Rooke and vice-admiral Hopson, with ten men of war, yet sail for England, leaving sir Cloudesly Shovel with the rest near Vigo, to destroy the enemy's ships that were ran ashore; which being effected, he also steered his course for England, where the fleet arrived (after being separated by a storm at the entrance of the channel) on the 17th of November. Ten days before, sir George Rooke, with his squadron, came into the Downs, and the same day, at four in the afternoon, the duke of Ormond landed at Deal, and having given the necessary orders for the landing and quartering the forces, went that night to Canterbury, and arrived at London the next day, being received with great marks of favour by the queen, and with the loud acclamations of the people; the success at Vigo, having silenced the clamours about the miscarriages before Cadiz. The queen gave likewise a noble gratuity to the lord Shannon and captain Thomas Hardy, who were sent express by the general and admiral with the first account of their prosperous attempt; and the captain, besides a present of a thousand guineas, had the honour of knighthood. On the other hand, sir Henry Bellasis and sir Charles O'Hara were, by her majesty's orders, put under arrest, for having by their example, promoted and encouraged the plundering of Port St. Mary's; but, upon the report of the generals appointed to examine into that matter, Bellasis only was found guilty, and dismissed from her majesty's service; and sir Charles O'Hara was cleared and his suspension taken off. A proclamation was also issued out, some time before, for discovery and recovery of all such goods, plate and other effects, as, contrary to her majesty and the duke of Ormond's express command were plundered or embezzled at Port St. Mary's and from the galleons taken at Vigo, and put on board her majesty's men of war and other vessels. But this proclamation had little or no effect, so that the public was not much enriched by this extraordinary capture, though the loss which the enemy sustained by it was a vast one; and, to compleat the ruin of the Spanish merchants, their king seized on the plate which was taken out of the ships upon their first arrival at Vigo.

The Parliament dissolved and a new one called. The parliament of England was in course to determine six months after the death of the late king; but, before that time expired, the queen thought fit to exert her royal prerogative and to issue out a proclamation, on the 2nd of July, for dissolving this present parliament, and declaring the speedy calling another to be holden at Westminster, the 20th of August next; but afterwards prorogued to the 8th of October, and at last, to the 23d of that month.

FIRST SESSION OF THE FIRST PARLIAMENT OF QUEEN ANNE.

List of the House of Commons.] October 20, 1702. This day, the New Parliament * met. The following is a List of the Members of the House of Commons:

A LIST OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS in the First Parliament summoned by Queen ANNE, October 20, 1702.

Bedfordshire.	Bedford Town,
Lord Russel,	William Spencer,
Sir William Gostwick.	Edward Carteret.

* “The Queen did not openly interpose in the Elections, but her inclinations to the Tories appearing plainly, all people took it for granted, that she wished they might be the majority: This wrought on the inconstancy and servility, that is natural to multitudes: and the conceits which had been infused and propagated with much industry, that the Whigs had charged the nation with great taxes, of which a large share had been devoured by themselves, had so far turned the tide, that the Tories in the House of Commons were at least double the number of the Whigs. They met full of fury against the memory of the late king, and against those, who had been employed by him.” Burnet.

ROBERT HARLEY, Speaker.

Mr. Harley chosen Speaker.] Oct. 21. Her majesty, being seated on the throne, attended with her officers of state, commanded the Usher of the Black Rod to let the Commons know, It was her majesty's pleasure, that they attend her presently, in the house of peers.—Who being come, they presented Robert Harley*, esq. whom they had chosen to be their Speaker, for her majesty's approbation. And, after a short speech made by him to her majesty, desiring her majesty to excuse him from that service, the Lord Keeper, by her majesty's command, acquainted the house of commons, That her majesty was pleased to approve of the choice they had made, and did allow of Mr. Harley to be their Speaker.

The Queen's Speech on opening the Session.] Then her majesty made the following Speech to both houses :

“ My lords and gentlemen ; It is with great satisfaction I meet this parliament, which I have summoned to assist me in carrying on the just and necessary war, in which we are engaged. I have called you together as early as was consistent with your convenience in coming out of your several countries ; and I assure myself of such evidences of your affection to me, and of your zeal for our common cause, as will not only give spirit and forwardness to our own preparations, but such example and encouragement to our allies, as, by God's blessing, cannot fail of a good effect, for the advantage of the whole confederacy.—I have met with so many expressions of joy and satisfaction in all the countries through which I have lately had occasion to pass, that I cannot but look upon them as true measures of the duty and affection of the rest of my subjects.

cular Treaties and Engagements, already made, and such others as may be necessary for the encouragement of our allies, and the prosecuting the war, where it shall most sensibly affect our enemies, and be most effectual for disappointing the boundless ambition of France.—And, that my subjects may the more cheerfully bear the necessary taxes, I desire you to inspect the Accounts of all the public Receipts and Payments; and, if there have been any Abuses or Mismanagements, I hope you will detect them; that the offenders may be punished, and others be deterred by such examples from the like practices.—I must observe to you, with some concern, that the funds given by the last parliament have, in some measure, fallen short of the sums proposed to be raised by them; and though I have already paid, and applied to the public service, the 100,000*l.* which I promised to the last parliament, yet it has not supplied that deficiency.

“My lords and gentlemen; I cannot, without much trouble, take notice to you of the disappointment we have had at Cadiz: I have not yet had a particular account of that enterprize, nor of all the difficulties our forces may have met with there; but I have had such a representation of disorders and abuses committed at Port St. Marie’s, as hath obliged me to give directions for the strictest examination of that matter.—I am earnestly desirous, for all our sakes, that this may prove a short session: however, I hope you will find time to consider of some better and more effectual method to prevent the exportation of Wool, and to improve that manufacture, which is of great consequence to the whole kingdom; on my part, nothing shall be omitted for its encouragement.—I am firmly persuaded, that the love and good affection of my subjects is the surest pledge of their duty and obedience, and the truest and justest support of the throne: And as I am resolved to defend and maintain the Church as by law established, and to protect you in the full enjoyment of all your rights and liberties; so I rely upon your care of me. My interests and yours are inseparable; and my endeavours shall never be wanting, to make you all safe and happy.”

The Lords’ Address thronon.] The Lords presented her majesty with the following Address:

“We, your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, do, with all dutiful acknowledgments, return your majesty our most humble thanks, for your gracious speech to both houses of parliament; and take leave, on this occasion, to congratulate the prosperous and glorious success with which it has pleased God to bless your majesty’s arms, in conjunction with your allies, under the command of the earl of Marlborough; as also for the other successes of your majesty’s allies in Germany and Italy; and for the prosperous condition the trade of the nation is now in, which we acknowledge is chiefly owing to your majesty’s great wisdom and conduct. We humbly take leave to as your majesty, that we shall always be ready to assist you, to our utmost, in the prosecuting this just and necessary war.—We likewise turn your majesty our most humble thanks, the resolution you are pleased to express maintain and defend the Church as by law established, and to protect us in the full enjoyment of our rights and liberties: And we further presume to assure your majesty, that we shall be ready, on all occasions, to support and defend your royal person and government, all possible zeal and duty.”

The Queen’s Answer.] Her majesty thus Answer:

“My lords; Your Address is very acceptable to me: I thank you kindly for your congratulations; and I hope you will have frequent occasions of renewing them.”

The Commons’ Address.] The Commons agreed upon the following Address:

“Most gracious sovereign; We, your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, commons in parliament assembled, do leave to lay before your majesty our most humble and hearty thanks, for your most gracious speech from the throne; which gives us instances of your majesty’s tender concern for your people, and of your intire confidence in their affections, as must engage them to manifest your majesty the utmost returns of duty and gratitude.—It is great condescension in your majesty, to take notice, in so public a manner of the expressions of joy and satisfaction, which your majesty was received in all countries, through which you had occasion lately to pass: all your subjects have already received so many benefits under the influence of your majesty’s happy government, that your majesty must have met with the like in every other part of your dominions, that you had honoured with your royal presence.—The disappointment at Cadiz does the more afflict us, because it gives your majesty so much trouble; but this misfortune cannot make us forget that the protection and security of our trade, the vigorous support of your majesty’s allies, and the wonderful progress of your majesty’s arms, under the conduct of the earl of Marlborough, have signally retrieved * the a

* “The word ‘retrieved,’ in this Address implying, that the honour of the nation had been lost, occasioned a warm debate. A who had a just regard for king William, insisted upon the word ‘maintained’ instead of it, alleging, that ‘retrieved’ was a reflection on the late king’s memory, who, instead of losing, had carried the honour of the nation farther than had been done in any reign before his: that to him they owed their preservation, their safety, and even the queen’s being on the throne: that he had designed and formed the great confederacy, at the head of which her majesty was now set. In opposition to this

cient honour and glory of the English nation.—After your majesty's repeated assurances we neither doubt of the full enjoyment of all our rights and liberties, nor of your majesty's defending and maintaining the church, as by law established. Your majesty has been always a most illustrious ornament to this church, and have been exposed to great hazards for it; and therefore we promise ourselves, that, in your majesty's reign, we shall see it perfectly restored to its due rights and privileges, and secured in the same to posterity, which is only to be done, by divesting those men of the power, who have shewn, they want not the will, to destroy it.—The prospect of these blessings, and your majesty's desire, to have the accounts of the public receipts, and payments, inspected, and to have any abuses and mismanagements thereof punished, will very much endear your majesty to your people, and encourage us most cheerfully to assist your majesty with those supplies, that may effectually enable your majesty to make good such alliances, as shall be necessary to prosecute the war, where it shall most sensibly affect your enemies, and thereby disappoint the boundless ambition of France.

was urged, that, during his reign, things had been conducted by strangers, and trusted to them; and that a vast treasure had been spent in unprofitable campaigns in Flanders. The Partition Treaty, and every thing else, with which his reign could be loaded, was brought into the account; and the keeping of the word 'retriev'd,' in the address, was carried by a majority of 180 voices against 80; all who had any favour at court, or hoped for any, voting for it.

"Mr. Walsh, at that time knight of the shire for Worcestershire (called by Dryden the greatest critic of the age) composed, on this occasion, the following verses, in a poem, called 'The Golden Age,' in allusion to Virgil's fourth eclogue:

"Now all our factions, all our fears shall cease,
And Tories rule the promis'd land in peace;
Malice shall die, and noxious poison fail; [rail, Barley shall cease to trick, and Seymour cease to
The lambs shall with the lions walk unhurt,
And Halifax with How meet civilly at court.
Vice-roys †, like providence, with distant care,
Shall govern kingdoms, where they ne'er appear.
Pacific admirals, to save the fleet,
Shall fly from conquest, and shall conquest meet.
Commanders shall be praised at William's cost,
And honour be retriev'd before 'tis lost."

"The strength of the Tory-party, in the house of commons, appeared not only from this, but also from all the controverted elections being determined in their favour, with such an open partiality, that it shewed the party to be resolved upon every thing that might serve their ends. Of this there were two remarkable instances. The one was of the borough of Hinton near Salisbury; in which, upon a com-

"Your majesty may safely rely upon the care of your faithful commons. The value, you are pleased to set upon the love and affection of your subjects, is the highest obligation, that can be laid on them, to give your majesty pledges thereof, in their duty and obedience: they are, and shall always be, sensible, that your majesty's interests, and theirs, are inseparable; and, as they gratefully acknowledge your majesty's great designs, to make them safe and happy, so their prayers, and sincerest endeavours, shall never be wanting, to make your majesty's reign more prosperous, and more glorious, than any of your majesty's royal predecessors."

The Queen's Answer.] To which her majesty, at the same time, returned her Answer, as follows:

"Gentlemen, I thank you very kindly for the many marks of your duty and affection expressed in this address. Nothing can be a greater satisfaction to me than an entire confidence between me and my subjects."

Sir John Packington's Complaint against the Bishop of Worcester.] November 18. Sir John

plaint of bribery, the proof was so full and clear, that they ordered a bill to disfranchise the town for that bribery; and yet, because the bribes were given by a man of their party, they would not pass a vote on him as guilty of it, so that a borough was voted to lose its right of electing, because many in it were guilty of a corruption, in which no man appeared to be an actor. The other was of more importance. Mr. John How stood for knight of the shire for Gloucestershire, and had drawn a party in that county to join with him in an Address to the queen, in which reflections were made on the danger and ill usage, which her Majesty had gone through in the former reign. This Address was received by the queen in so particular a manner, that it looked like owning the contents thereof to be true; but she made such an excuse for this, when the offence it gave was laid before her, that probably she was not acquainted with the matter of the Address, when she so received it. Upon this, great opposition was made to Mr. How's election; and, when it came to the poll, it appeared that he had lost it. The sheriff was then moved for a scrutiny to examine whether all those, who had sworn that they were freeholders of forty shillings a year, had sworn true. By the act of parliament the matter was referred to the parties oath, and their swearing falsely was declared perjury, therefore such, as had sworn falsely, were liable to a persecution; but, by all laws, an oath is looked upon as an end of controversy, till he, who swears, is convicted of perjury; and the sheriff being an officer named by the court, if he had power to review the poll, this put the election of counties wholly in the power of the crown. Yet, upon this occasion, the heat of a party prevailed so far, that they voted Mr. How elected." Tindal.

Packington exhibited a Complaint against the bishop of Worcester, and Mr. Lloyd his son, which he reduced to the following leads :

I. " That soon after the last parliament rose, the bishop of Worcester took upon him to send to me to desist from standing to be elected knight for that county, and to threaten me, that if I would not desist, he should think himself obliged to speak against me to his clergy.

II. " He sent some letters himself, and his secretary sent others to several of his clergy, with directions to make what interest they could against me in their several parishes, and where they could not prevail with such who voted singly for me in the last election, to give a vote for one or both the other candidates, they should desire them to stay at home; and in order to this, his lordship sent them copies of the poll of their respective parishes.

III. " He aspersed me to his clergy, branding me and my ancestors with several vices; and at his confirmation and visitations solicited his clergy to vote against me, representing me as very unfit to serve in parliament, and threatening them with his displeasure, if they did not vote against me.

IV. " He aspersed me and my ancestors to several of the laity, who were his tenants, and threatened them, that if they would not vote against me, they should never renew any estate under him, and that he would set such marks upon them, that his successors should not suffer them nor their children to renew any more.

V. " Mr. Lloyd, the bishop's son, aspersed me, and gave scandalous characters of me to several freeholders, whom he solicited to vote against me, and told them I voted for bringing in a French government.

VI. " The bishop's secretary aspersed me to several freeholders in the like manner, representing me as unfit to sit in the House, threatening them with the bishop's displeasure; and said, they might as well vote for the prince of Wales as for me."

All these Particulars were supported by Evidence at the bar of the House, and by the following Letters under the bishop's own hand :

" Sir; Hartlebury, July 29, 1702.

" I think I have more reason to hope for something of consideration from you, than from most others of the clergy of this diocese, and something also more from the freeholders in your parish, than in most other parts of the county; and therefore I thought I had reason to take it ill of your neighbours, that they should give their votes as they did, for the chusing of sir John Packington to be knight of the shire, when, in order to that very election, he had published two libels, full of horrible lyes, against myself, and several others of the bishops, that had never given him the least provocation. This grieved me much, but yet I had wherewith to comfort myself, in believing that those libels might not have come to their knowledge: though as I since understand great care was taken by sir John's agents to publish them all over your neighbourhood. But now since I understand there is a third libel come abroad, which is written against me in particular. The declared cause of it is not only my opposing sir John Packington's election, which after my coming into the country, and finding libels published among my tenants by his servants, I sent him word I thought myself obliged to do, unless he would be pleased to desist from standing, as I earnestly desired him to do more than once: But this author hath found, that was the writer of a printed half-sheet, call'd 'The Character of a Churchman,' and that it was written against sir John Packington for hindering his election; and for this he scourges me most unmercifully, with such a tongue, that St. James describes. For that 'Character of a Churchman,' I do declare to you in the presence of God, that I neither writ it nor know the author of it; but I certainly know that sir John Packington is not once mention'd in it, nor had I at the time when that was printed any breach with sir John Packington nor occasion to do this with respect to his election, for it was printed before I came to London, and that was before the dissolution of the former parliament, which if I had foreseen I had certainly staid longer in the country. After all this, it is true that I sent a great number of those half-sheets into the country, as did of such other small things, upon several accounts. They were sent chiefly on the account of our unhappy differences in convocation, and for promoting the most pious design of reformation. On this last account it was that I sent this 'Character of a Churchman' without making any reflection upon any particular person. I did indeed know, that the devil would be mad at me for it, and now have found the effects of his wrath: he has set a son of his to write against me, which thank God is the worst he can do. This account I have given you of this third libel, hopes it may have some effect upon you and your neighbour Mr. Hodge, to whom I desire you to shew what I have written. I hope you will both of you consider, whether any such promise as that you have made to that gentleman, to make him your representative in parliament, can oblige you to any thing else but repentance of your having made such a promise, and to bring forth fruits meet for repentance. For my part, I leave this upon your souls, desiring you both to do in this matter as you think you can best answer it to God at that great day, which I doubt not you believe, and expect as well as I. I pray God direct you I am, your faithful friend and diocesan,

W. WORCESTER."

" Sir,

July 27, 1702.

" You cannot but have heard, and probably have seen how the bishops of this church in general, and 5 or 6 of them in particular, have been abused with impudent lyes in two libels that were published by sir John Packington almost a year since, in order to his last election. At that time I had not given him the least provocation; and for the other abused bishops, few of them knew his face. Since that time, finding at my return from London, where I was all the while, he was libelling me in the country, that he had published these libels, some of them with his own hands, and the rest by his agents, I could not but think myself obliged by all honest ways to oppose his election, if he would stand; which I sent to him 3 times to let him know, and to desire he would forbear.—Hereupon there comes out a third libel against me, which I have only seen, but could not get a copy of it. I never saw any thing wrote with such a furious rage of railing, and scoffing, and lying; which I thank God, can do me no hurt, nor will it do him service, if I may so call it, in promoting his election, which I think would be the greatest hurt that could happen to him.—It is for the preventing of this that I writ to my friends, earnestly to desire them to get what votes they can for Mr. Bromley and Mr. Walsh; and to keep away as many as they can of them that will vote for sir John Packington.—Your diligence in this matter will be a very great obligation upon, Sir,

Your faithful friend, and Diocesan,
W. WORCESTER."

Upon a full hearing of the whole matter, the house came to the following Resolutions:

"Resolved, nem. con. That Sir John Packington has by Evidence fully made out the charge which he exhibited against the lord bishop of Worcester.

"Resolved, nem. con. That Sir John Packington has by Evidence fully made out the charge against Mr. Lloyd, the said lord bishop's son.

"Resolved, That it appears to this house, that the proceedings of William lord bishop of Worcester, his son, and his agents, in order to the hindering the election of a member for the county of Worcester, has been malicious, unchristian, and arbitrary, in high violation of the Liberties and Privileges of the Commons of England."

"Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, that she will be graciously pleased to remove William lord bishop of Worcester from being Lord Almoner to her Majesty."

"Ordered, That the said Resolution, and Address, be presented to her Majesty by such members of this house as are of her Majesty's most Honourable privy-council. 2. That the further consideration of the matter relating to the lord bishop of Worcester, be adjourned till this day's next night. 3. That Mr. Attorney-General do prosecute Mr. Lloyd, the lord bishop of Worcester's son, for the said offences, after his privilege as a member of the lower house of convocation is out.

Nov. 20. Mr. Comptroller reported to the house, that their Resolution and Address to her Majesty for the removing William lord bishop of Worcester, from being Lord Almoner to her Majesty, had been presented to her Majesty; and that her Majesty was pleased to give this most gracious Answer:

"I am very sorry that there is occasion for this Address against the bishop of Worcester: I shall order and direct, that he shall no longer continue to supply the place of Almoner, but I will put another in his room to perform that office."

Resolved, That the most humble Thanks of this house be returned to her Majesty, for her Majesty's most gracious Answer to their Address relating to William lord bishop of Worcester.

Ordered, That Mr. Comptroller of her Majesty's household, do return the said most humble thanks of this house to her Majesty.

Nov. 21. The Speaker acquainted the house, that there had been with him that morning, the prolocutor of the lower house of convocation, and also the dean of Canterbury, arch-deacon Ottley, and Mr. Moor, and had brought him the following order:

Nov. 20. Ordered, "That the prolocutor, the dean of Canterbury, arch-deacon Ottley, and Mr. Moor, do attend Mr. Speaker of the honourable house of Commons, and return our most humble thanks to him, and to that honourable house, for the great favour to the Church and Convocation, which they had on all occasions been pleased to express; and particularly for that late regard which they of themselves, without suggestion, were pleased to have to the privilege of this house, in the case of one of our members, who had the misfortune to fall under their displeasure."

Upon this, the house passed a Resolution, That they would upon all occasions, assert the just rights of the Lower House of Convocation.

The Lords, alarmed at these proceedings of the Commons, against a member of their house, agreed upon the following Address to the queen, "That it was the undoubted right of every lord of parliament; and of every subject of England, to have an opportunity of making his defence, before he suffers any sort of punishment; and therefore humbly desired her majesty, that she would be pleased not to remove the lord bishop of Worcester from the place of Lord Almoner, nor to show any mark of her displeasure towards him, till he be found guilty of some crime by due course of law." This Address being presented to the queen, she returned answer, "That she agreed, that every peer and lord of parliament, and indeed every other person, ought to have an opportunity of being heard to any matters objected against him, before he be punished. That she had not yet received any complaint of the bishop of Worcester, but she looked upon it as her undoubted right to continue or displace any servant attending upon her own person, when she should think it proper." The Lords, upon this Answer, resolved the same day unanimously, "That no lord of their house ought to suffer any sort of punishment by any 'proceedings of the house of Commons, otherwise than according to the known and ancient rules and methods of parliament.'

Nov. 21. Mr. Secretary Hedges delivered to the Commons a Message signed by the queen, importing, 'That her majesty considering, that there was but a very small provision made for the prince her husband, if he should survive her, and that she was restrained from increasing the same by the late act of parliament for settling her revenue, thought it necessary to recommend the making a further provision for the prince to their consideration.' The prince was many years older than the queen, and was troubled with an asthma, that every year had ill effects upon his health, and had brought him into great danger this winter; yet the queen thought it became her to provide for all events. The Commons having taken her message into consideration, Mr. How moved, That the yearly sum of 100,000*l.*, should be settled on the prince, in case he should survive the queen; and this was seconded by those who knew how acceptable the motion would be to the queen, though it was double of what any queen of England ever had in jointure; so that it passed without any opposition. But, while it was passing, a motion was made upon a clause in the act, that limited the succession to the house of Hanover, which provided against strangers, though naturalized, being capable to hold any employments. This plainly related only to those, who should be naturalized in a future reign, and had no respect to such as were already naturalized, or should be naturalized, during the present reign. It was, however, proposed as doubtful, whether, when that family might reign, all, who were naturalized before, should not be incapacitated by that clause from sitting in parliament, or holding employments; and a clause was offered to exempt the prince from being comprehended in that incapacity. Against this two objections lay; one was, that the Lords had resolved by a Vote (as will hereafter appear) to which the greater number had set their hands, that they would never pass any money-bill sent up to them by the Commons, to which any clause was tacked, that was foreign to the bill. They had done this, to prevent the Commons from joining matters of a different nature to a money-bill, and then pretending that the Lords could not meddle with it; for this was a method to alter the government, and bring it intirely into their own hands; by this means, when money was necessary for preserving the nation, they might force, not only the lords, but even the crown itself, to consent to every thing they proposed, by tacking it to a money-bill. It was said, that an incapacity for holding employments, and for sitting in the house of lords, were things of a different nature from money; so that this clause seemed to many to be a tack: while others thought it was no tack, because both parts of the act related to the same person. The other objection was, That this clause seemed to imply, that persons already naturalized, and possession of the right of natural-born subject were to be excluded in the next reign; though all people knew, that no such thing was intended, when the act of succession passed. Great opposition was made, for both these reasons, the passing this clause; but the queen pressed it with the greatest earnestness, that she had ever yet shewn in any thing whatever. She thought it became her as a good wife, to have the act passed, in which she might be the more zealous because it was not thought advisable to move for an act, that should take prince George in a partnership of the regal dignity. This matter raised a great heat in the house of lords. Those who had been advanced by the late king, and were in his interests, did not think it became them to consent to this, which seemed to be prejudicial, or, at least, a disgrace to those whom he had raised.*

Protest thereon.] But the court managed the affair so dexterously, that the bill passed with the clause, though it was protested against by several lords.

January 19. Upon a Report from the Committee of the whole house, on the bill 'to enable her majesty to settle a Revenue upon the prince of Denmark, in case he survived her, that they had gone through the bill, and had left out one clause, which enacted, that, in case of the prince's surviving, he might be capable to be of the privy-council, a member of the house, or to enjoy any office, the grants hereinafter mentioned, or any other, notwithstanding the act of succession in the 12th of the late king. And the question being put, Whether to agree with the committee in leaving out this clause. It was resolved in the negative.

"Dissentient."

"1. We do dissent from this clause, because we conceive this is a bill of aid and supply; and that this clause is altogether foreign to, and different from the matter of the said bill: and that the passing of such a clause is therefore unparliamentary, and tends to the destruction of the constitution of this government.

"2. Because we conceive, that a parliamentary expedient might have been found, whereby his royal highness might, by an unanimous consent have all the advantages designed him by this bill, without the lords being obliged to depart from what we conceive to be their undoubted right.

"3. Because we conceive, that this clause was not necessary to enable his royal highness to enjoy the benefits of the said grants.

"4. Because that the clause, which pretends to capacitate his royal highness to enjoy his peerage, 'Notwithstanding the act for the further limitation of the crown and better securing of the rights and liberties of the subject,' and which makes no provision for other peers, under the same circumstances, may tend much to their prejudice. (Signed.) Torrington.

ton, Say and Seal, Sommers, Portland, Manchester, Kingston, Jo. Litch. and Coven. Osalstone."

We dissent from the clauses relating to the grants :

" 1. Because the said grants are not laid before the house (though desired), by which we are ignorant upon what considerations the same were granted.

" 2. Because we conceive, that the saving clauses are so far from having any relation to his royal highness, that if they signify any thing (without any respect to him) they prefer their payment before his. (Signed.) Somerset, Devonshire, Tho. Cantaur. Huntington, Say and Seal, W. Worcester, Rich. Peterburg, Gt. Sarum, Radnor, Jo. Chichester, Jo. Longham, Stamford."

The Queen's Message relating to the Earl of Marlborough.] Dec. 10. The following message was brought to the house by Mr. Secretary Hedges, signed by the queen herself.

" ANNE R. The earl of Marlborough's services to her majesty, and to the public, have been so eminent, both in his command of the army, and in his having established an entire confidence and good correspondence between her majesty and the States-General, that she has thought fit to grant the title of a duke of this kingdom to him, and to the heirs male of his body, and also a pension of 5,000*l.* per annum, upon the revenue of the Post Office, for the support of this honour, during her majesty's natural life. If it had been in her majesty's power, she would have granted the same term in the pension as in the honour; and she hopes you will think it so reasonable in this case, as to find some proper methods for doing so."

The Commons, after the reading of the message, seemed for some time to be in amaze, and stood so long silent, that (it was said) the Speaker stood up, and looked round, to see if any body would speak to it: And at length Mr. Tindal having broke the ice, the debate ran very high on the occasion; and amongst others, common fame gave out, that an old member should say, 'That though he had accepted of an employment at court, yet, he never did it with a design that his mouth should be sewed up in that house, when any thing was offered that he thought detrimental to his country.'

The Commons Address thereon.] Dec. 21. The house at length having weighed this important affair, instead of complying with the message, presented the following Address to her majesty :

" Most gracious sovereign; We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects the Commons in parliament assembled, humbly beg leave to declare our unanimous satisfaction in the just esteem your majesty has been pleased to express of the eminent services performed by the duke of Marlborough, who has not only, by his conduct of the army, retrieved the ancient honour and glory of the English nation, but by his negotiation established an entire confidence and good correspondence between your majesty, and the States-General, and therein vindicated the gentlemen of England, who had, by the vile practices of designing men, been traduced, and industriously represented as false to your majesty's allies, because they were true to the interest of their country.—It is to their inexpressible grief, that your majesty's most dutiful Commons find any instances, where they are unable to comply with what your majesty proposes to them; but they beg leave humbly to lay before your majesty the apprehensions they have of making a precedent for the future alienations of the Revenue of the crown, which has been so much reduced by the exorbitant grants of the last reign, and which has been so lately settled and secured by your majesty's unparalleled grace and goodness.—We are infinitely pleased to observe by your majesty's late gracious acceptance of the duke of Marlborough's services, that the only way to obtain your majesty's favour, is to deserve well from the public; and we beg leave to assure your majesty, that whenever you shall think fit to reward such merit, it will be to the entire satisfaction of your people."

The Queen's Answer.] To which her majesty returned the following Answer :

" I shall always think myself much concerned to reward those who deserve well of me, and of the public: On this account, I bestowed some favours on the duke of Marlborough, and I am glad to find you think they are well placed."

* " Great liberty was taken of reflecting upon the queen, as well as the duke, for this transaction; and a satirical piece was handed about, wherein, among other things, it was affirmed, 'That her majesty designed to give one duke all the gold, which the other (Ormond) had brought home from Vigo.'" Tindal.

" As the queen had reason not to be pleased with this talk, so had all good Britons to be offended at the aspersion thrown upon the reign of king William. If there were more Grants in his time than before it, there were more persons who deserved them, and more good things to be granted: Whereas it cannot be said that one mortal, from the Restoration to the Abdication, did deserve the grant of a Brickkiln for his services to his country, as it included the Protestant religion, liberty and property." Oldmixon.

THE CONTROVERSY BETWEEN THE TWO HOUSES RELATING TO THE BILL FOR PREVENTING OCCASIONAL CONFORMITY*.] There had been a Bill brought in early this session by the Com-

* "When those matters were settled, a Bill was brought in by the Tories, against Occasional Conformity, which produced great and long debates: By this Bill, all those who took the sacrament and test (which by the act passed in the year 1672, was made necessary to those, who held offices of trust, or were magistrates in corporations, but was only to be taken once by them) and did after that, go to the meetings of dissenters, or any meeting for religious worship, that was not according to the liturgy or practice of the church of England, where five persons were present, more than the family, were disabled from holding their employments, and were to be fined in 100*l.*, and in 5*l.* a day for every day, which they continued to act in their employments, after their having been at any such meeting: They were also made incapable to hold any other employment, till after one whole year's Conformity to the church, which was to be proved at the quarter session: upon a relapse the penalty and the time of incapacity were doubled: no limitation of time was put in the bill, nor of the way, in which the offence was to be proved; But whereas, the act of the test only included the magistrates in corporations, all the inferior officers or freemen in corporations, who were found to have some interest in the elections, were now comprehended within this bill. The preamble of the bill asserted the Toleration, and condemned all persecution for conscience sake, in a high strain. Some thought the bill was of no consequence, and that, if it should pass into a law, it would be of no effect; but that the Occasional Conformists would become constant ones. Others thought, that this was such a breaking in upon the Toleration, as would undermine it, and that it would have a great effect on corporations; as indeed, the intent of it was believed to be, the modelling elections, and by consequence of the House of Commons.

"On behalf of the bill, it was said, the design of the test act was, that all in office should continue in the communion of the church; that coming only once to the sacrament for an office, and going afterwards to the meetings of dissenters, was both an eluding the intent of the law and a profanation of the sacrament, which gave great scandal, and was abhorred by the better sort of dissenters. Those who were against the bill, said, the nation had been quiet ever since the Toleration, the dissenters had lost more ground and strength by it, than the church; the nation was now engaged in a great war; it seemed therefore unreasonable, to raise animosities at home, in matters of religion, at such a time; and to encourage a tribe of informers, who were the worst sort of men: The fines were excessive; higher than any laid on Papists by law; and since no limitation of time, nor concurrence of witnesses, was provided for in the bill, men would be for exposing to the malice of a bold swearer wicked servant: It was moved, that since the greatest danger of all was from atheists and papists, that all such as received the sacrament for an office, should be obliged to receive it three times a year, which all were by the bill required to do; and to keep to their parish church, at least one Sunday a month; but this was not admitted. All, who pleaded for the bill, did in words declare for the continuance of the Toleration, yet the sharpness, with which they treated the dissenters in all their speeches shewed as if they designed their extirpation. The bill was carried in the House of Commons by a great majority. The debates held long in the House of Lords: Many were against it because of the high penalties. Some remembered the practice of informers, in the ending Charles's reign, and would not consent to the reviving such infamous methods; All believed, that the chief design of this bill was to model corporations, and to cast out of them those, who would not vote in elections for Tories; The Toleration itself was visibly aimed at, and this was only a step to break in upon it. Some thought, the design went yet further to raise such quarrels and distractions among us, as would so embroil us at home, that our allies might see, they could not depend upon us; and that we, being weakened by the disorders, occasioned by those prosecutions, might be disabled from carrying on the war, which was the chief thing driven at by the promoters of the bill. So that many of the lords, well as the bishops, agreed in opposing the bill, though upon different views; yet they consented to some parts of it; chiefly, that such as went to meetings, after they had received the sacrament, should be disabled from holding any employments, and be fined in 20*l.*; and many went into this, though they were against every part of the bill, because they thought it the most plausible way of losing it; since the House of Commons had of late set it up for a maxim, that the Lords could not alter the fine that they should fix in a bill, this being a meddling with money, which they thought was peculiar to them, that they would not let the Lords, on any pretence, break in upon it.

"The lords hereupon appointed a very close search to be made into all the rolls, that lay in the clerk of the parliament's office, from the middle of king Henry 7's reign, down to the present time: and they found, by some hundreds of precedents, that in some bills the lords began the clauses, that set the fines: and that when fines were set by the commons, some times they altered the fines, and at other times they changed the use, in which they were applied: The report made on this was so full and clear, that there was no possibility of reply in ject; and on the 2nd of December sent to the Lords for their concurrence. The Lords were so little fond of this bill, that apprehending it, or some other bill they did not wholly like, might one time or other be tacked to a Money-Bill by the Commons, they passed a vote, "That it would be an infringement of the Privilege of their house." When the Bill came to be considered by the Lords, they were pleased to make several Amendments to it, which occasioned several Conferences between the two houses; as follow after the bill, which it is thought expedient to annex, as necessary for the right understanding the matter in question.

THE ACT FOR PREVENTING OCCASIONAL CONFORMITY.

THE BILL AND AMENDMENTS.

The Commons Agreement and Disagreement, & the Amendments made by the Lords to the Bill for Preventing Occasional Conformity, with the Commons Amendments to the Lords Amendments.

The Amendments made by the Lords to the Bill for preventing Occasional Conformity.

December 2, 1702.

AS nothing is more contrary to the profession of the Christian religion, and particularly to the doctrine of the church of England, than persecution for conscience only; in due consideration whereof, an act passed in the first year of the reign of the late king William and queen Mary, intituled, 'An Act for exempting their majesties protestant subjects, dissenting from the church of England, from the penalties of certain laws;' which act ought inviolably to be observed, and ease given to all consciences to it, and the lords ordered it to be entered in their books. But the commons were resolved to maintain their point, without entering into any debate upon it. The lords also added clauses, requiring proof to be made by two witnesses, and that the information should be given in within 10 days, and the prosecution commenced within three months after the fact. The commons agreed to this, but would not alter the penalties that they had set. The matter depended long between the two houses; both sides took pains to bring up the lords that would vote with them, so that there were above 130 lords in the house; the greatest number that had ever been together.

different heads, the adhering was carried but by one voice in every one of them; and it was a different person that gave it in all the three divisions. The commons likewise adhered, so the bill was lost. This bill seemed to favour the interests of the church, so hot men were for it: and the greater number of the bishops being against it, they were censured, as cold and slack in the concerns of the church; a reproach, that all moderate men must expect, when they oppose violent motions. A great part of this fell on myself: for I bore a large share in the debates, both in the house of lords, and at the free conference. Angry men took occasion from hence, to charge the bishops as enemies to the church, and betrayers of its interests, because we would not run blindfold into the passions and designs of ill tempered men: though we can appeal to all the world, and which is more, to God himself, that we did faithfully and zealously pursue the true interests of the church, the promoting religion and learning, the encouraging of all good men, and good designs; and that we did apply ourselves to the duties of our function, and to the work of the gospel. Having this quiet within ourselves, we must bear the cross, and submit to the will of God; The less of our reward that we receive from men, we have so much the more to look for from him." Burnet.

"The court put their whole strength to carry the bill; Prince George, who had received the Sacrament, as lord high admiral, and yet kept his chapel in the Lutheran way, so that he was an occasional communicant, came and voted for the bill: After some conferences, wherein each house had yielded some smaller differences to the other, it came to a Free Conference in the Painted Chamber, which was the most crowded upon that occasion, that had ever been known; so much weight was laid on this matter on both sides.
"When the lords retired, and it came to the final vote of adhering, the lords were so equally divided, that in three questions, put on

truly scrupulous; nevertheless, whereas the laws do provide that every person to be admitted into any office or employment should be conformable to the church, as it is by law established, by enacting, that every such person, so to be admitted, should receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the rites and usage of the church of England; yet several persons dissenting from the church, as it is by law established, do join with the members thereof in receiving the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, to qualify themselves to have and enjoy such offices and employments, and do afterwards resort to conventicles or meetings for the exercise of religion in other manner than according to the liturgy and practice of the church of England, which is contrary to the intent and meaning of the laws already made: Be it therefore enacted by the queen's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, that if any person or persons after the 1st day of March, which shall be in the year of our Lord 1702, either peers or commoners, who have or shall have any office or offices, civil or military, or receive any pay, salary, fee, or wages, by reason of any patent or grant from her majesty, or shall have any command or place of trust from or under her majesty, or from any of her majesty's predecessors, or by her or their authority, or by authority derived from her or them, within the kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick upon Tweed, or in her majesty's navy, or in the several islands of Jersey and Guernsey, or shall be admitted into any service or employment in her majesty's household or family; or if any mayor, alderman, recorder, bailiff, town clerk, common-council-man, or other person bearing any office of magistracy or place of trust, or other employment relating to or concerning the government of the respective cities, corporations, boroughs, cinque-ports, and their members, and other port-towns within the kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, who by the laws are obliged to receive the sacrament of the Lord's supper, according to the rites and usage of the church of England, shall at any time after their admission into their respective offices or employments, or after having such grant, as aforesaid, during his or their continuance in such office or offices, employment or employments, or the enjoyment of any profit or advantage from the same, shall resort to or be present at any conventicle, assembly or meeting, under colour or pretence of any exercise of religion, in other manner than according to the liturgy and practice of the church of England, in any place within the kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, and town

[E]. Provided always, and be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that nothing in this act shall extend, or be construed to extend to any governor or governors of any hospital or hospitals, or to any assistants of any corporation or corporations, workhouse or work-houses, constituted, erected or employed for the relief, and setting of the poor on work, and for punishing of vagrants and beggars; all which said persons, and every of them, shall be, and are hereby exempted from all the penalties mentioned in this act, and are hereby adjudged and declared not to be subject or liable to any of the penalties or forfeitures mentioned in one act of parliament made in the 25th year of the reign of king Charles the Second, 'For preventing Dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants,' for or by reason of any of the aforesaid offices or employments.

First Conference.] Dec. 17. The managers appointed by the two houses had their first Conference, as follows:

To the first Amendment the Commons do agree.

To the second and third Amendments, line 10, and 11, the Commons disagree. 1. Because that the recital, that every person to be admitted into any office or employment, should be conformable to the church, as it is by law any such offence, unless upon the oaths of two credible witnesses at the least.

[B]. Provided always, and be it enacted, that from and after the said 1st day of March, no protestant dissenter shall be compelled or compellable to take, serve, hold or bear any office or place whatsoever, for the taking, serving or holding whereof he cannot be duly qualified by law, without receiving the Holy Sacrament according to the usage of the church of England, and also making and subscribing the Declaration mentioned in the statute, made 25 Car. 2, intitled, 'An Act for preventing Dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants,' any statute, law, usage, or other thing to the contrary notwithstanding.

[C]. Provided nevertheless, that this act shall not extend to the university churches in the universities of this realm, or either of them, when, or at such times as any sermon or lecture is preached or read in the same churches, or any of them, for, or as the public university sermon or lecture, but that the same sermons and lectures may be preached or read, in such sort or manner, as the same have been heretofore preached or read; this act, or any thing therein contained to the contrary, in any wise notwithstanding.

[D]. Provided, that no person shall incur any the penalties established, is confined to such laws as enact that every such person shall receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the rights and usage of the church of England. 2. Because the Corporation and the Test-Acts, which have been frequently evaded, and are by this bill intended to be made effectual, do provide, that all persons to be admitted into any office or employment, in pursuance of those acts, should receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the rites and usage of the church of England; and all persons under such obligation to receive the Sacrament, the Commons conceive are obliged to be conformable to the church, as it is by law established.

To the 4th Amendment, line 20th, the Commons disagree, because it depends upon the former.

To the fifth Amendment, 2nd skin, line the 4th, the Commons disagree; because your lordships admit this bill to be reasonable as to the officers and persons described in the former part of this clause, and the Commons see no reason why this bill should not equally extend to the persons and officers described in the latter part thereof, left out by your lordships in this Amendment. 2. Your lordships leaving out, in this Amendment, these words, (viz.) 'Who by the laws are obliged to receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the rites and usage of the church of England,' may countenance an opinion, that the persons described in the words left out by your lordships, are not obliged to receive the Sacrament. 3. Those words do equally refer to the persons described in the former part of this clause, to which your lordships have agreed, as to the persons described in your lordships' Amendment, and the Commons take it to be very evident, that every person described in this clause, as sent up to your lordships, is obliged to receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the rites and usage of the church of England.

To the 7th Amendment, line 30th, the Commons have agreed, with some Amendments.

To the 8th Amendment, line 34th, the Commons have disagreed, because (though many other reasons might be offered, from which the Commons can never depart, yet, at this time, they think it sufficient to say) that the penalties, left out by your lordships in this Amendment, are reasonable, and no more than what is necessary to make this bill effectual.

To the 9th Amendment, 3rd skin, line 9th, the Commons disagree, because they think the penalty of incapacity, as qualified by the subsequent provisos, is a proper punishment for this offence; and the Commons conceive it necessary to encrease the penalty upon a second offence, as has been practised in many other cases.

To clause [A.] the Commons agree.

To clause [B.] the Commons disagree, because, as this bill takes away no one privilege that the dissenters have by law, so the Commons cannot think it fit to give them any new privilege by it.

To clause [C.] the Commons disagree, because the Commons conceive there is no occasion for it.

To clause [D.] the Commons disagree, because the Commons think it necessary that the bill should equally extend to all persons, before recited, as obliged to receive the Sacrament, and see no reason for the distinction made thereby.

To clause (E.) the Commons disagree, because, if such persons are obliged to receive the Sacrament, there is no reason to exempt them out of this bill, and if they are not obliged, the clause is unnecessary.

Second Conference.] To these reasons of the Commons the Lords replied, at a second Conference, Jan. 9, as follows:

"The Lords insist on the 2nd and 3rd Amendments in the preamble of the bill: Because the words left out by this Amendment are introduced to the clause left out by their lordships in the fifth Amendment. Besides, as the law now stands, there are many offices and employments to which persons may be admitted, without being under an obligation to receive the Sacrament on that account; and therefore they cannot agree to let a clause stand, wherein a matter of fact is positively affirmed, which they take to be otherwise.

"The Lords insist on the 4th Amendment, because it depends on the former.

"The Lords insist on their fifth Amendment: Because the Act of the 25th of king Charles the Second, called 'The Test Act,' which has been found by experience to have been an effectual security against Popery, and which their lordships are willing to enforce yet further by this bill as to the Dissenters, is known to every body; and it is generally understood to what employments it does extend: and therefore their lordships think it reasonable to rest there, and not to subject men to the penalties of this bill upon general or uncertain words.—The Lords do not go about to take away the force of the Corporation Act, or to lessen any security the church of England has by it; but cannot agree to extend the penalties of this bill to the general words of that act, which, by construction, hereafter may serve purposes which are not owned at present to be the intent of this bill.

"The Lords insist on their 8th Amendment, which relates to the punishments as they stood when the bill was sent up from the house of commons.—Whatever regard their lordships may have to reasons which the house of commons are resolved never to depart from: they hope it will not seem strange, that they are not convinced by such reasons as are not thought fit to be offered: but, in justification of their Amendment, their lordships think fit to say, that as they have an undoubted right to begin bills with pecuniary penalties, and to alter and distribute pecuniary penalties in bills sent up to them by the house of commons (which right their ancestors have always enjoyed, and from which their lordships can never depart), so, they are convinced, there never was a more just occasion of making use of that right than in the present case.—They conceive, the penalty of 100*l.* and 5*l.* a day for every day after the offence committed, to be excessive; and the whole being given to the informer, would prove a dangerous temptation to perjury, and a pernicious encouragement to informers, the most odious sort of persons, which would be a blemish on the best reign.—Their lordships have given a sufficient proof of their willingness to make this bill as effectual as will consist with reason, by agreeing to such a pecuniary penalty (besides the loss of office), as may be a proper encouragement to informers to swear the truth, though not perhaps a sufficient temptation to go further.

“As to the 9th Amendment; the Commons say they disagree, because they think incapacity a proper punishment for this offence. 1. The Lords insist upon their Amendment, because they think directly the contrary. 2. Their lordships observe, that, as the law now stands, any person having an office may be present at mass upon much easier terms, than he might be present at a conventicle if the Lords should depart from this Amendment. 3. The Lords think an Englishman cannot be reduced to a more unhappy condition, than to be put, by law, under an incapacity of serving his prince and country; and therefore nothing but a crime of the most detestable nature ought to put him under such a disability: they who think the being present at a meeting to be so high a crime, can hardly think that a toleration of such meetings ought to continue long; and yet the bill says, ‘The Act of Toleration ought to be kept inviolable.’ The Lords do not think it at all necessary to make an increase of punishment for a second offence, because the first offence is made forfeiture of office; and when the office is gone, the person may go to a meeting, without breach of any law, while the Act of Toleration continues; and if he shall afterwards get another office, he will forfeit the same, and incur the penalties in this act, if he shall ever after be present at a conventicle; which their lordships think sufficient punishment for a second offence.

“2d Skin, 33 line. The Lords agree to the Commons Amendments to their lordships Amendment, with the addition of the words following, after the words [‘prayed for’]; (videlicet,) [‘in pursuance of the act passed in the first year of king William and queen Mary, intituled, ‘An Act declaring the rights and liberties of the subject, and settling the succession of the crown;’ and the act passed in the 12th and 13th of king William the Third, intituled, ‘An Act for the further limitation of the crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject.’]”

“The Lords insist on the clause (B.): Because, to leave Protestant dissenters subject to penalties if they do not accept of offices, and at the same time to restrain them, if they accept of them upon the penalties of this bill, from doing what they think themselves obliged to in conscience, is persecution for conscience, and does not agree with what is set forth in the preamble of the bill.

“The Lords insist on clause (C.): Because they see no reason why being present at sermons or lectures preached or read in the universities, and established by ancient custom, and with very good intentions, should subject men to the danger of incurring the penalties of this law; and the same clause was thought necessary in the Act of Uniformity.

“The Lords insist on clause (D.): Because the foreign reformed churches allowed, or to be allowed, were by the Act of Uniformity exempted from the penalties of that law; and other foreign Protestants, who have been forced out of their own country by a cruel persecution, have settled here in England, by encouragement from parliaments, as well as from the crown: it would have a strange appearance, if it should be thought so high an offence for any of her majesty’s subjects in office but once to be present at their way of worship.—This would give such a discountenance to those of the same religion abroad, as would no way suit with her majesty’s character of head of the Protestant interest in Europe.

“The Lords insist on clause (E): Because the persons concerned in it have no profit, nor any trust but what relates to the poor; and, without this clause, charitable foundations, as hospitals, public workhouses, and the like, would meet with discouragement, and the number of them might be lessened.”

Free Conference.] The 16th, The Committee of both houses met at the Free Conference,* which was managed for the Lords, by the duke of Devonshire, the earl of Peterborough, the lord bishop of Salisbury, the lord Somers, and the lord Halifax. And for the Commons, by Mr. Bromley, Mr. St. John, Mr. Finch, Mr. Solicitor-General, and sir Thomas Powis.

“They acquainted the managers for the Lords, That the Commons had agreed to the addition of words their lordships had made to the Commons amendments to the Lords amendment in the 2d Skin, line 23; but insisted on their disagreement to the Lords other amendments, and to their Lordships’ clauses marked B. C. D, and E.; and therefore had desired this Free Conference with the Lords, in order to preserve a good correspondence between the two Houses.

“That the interests of the church and state were not to be supported without it; and, that the Commons might omit nothing to maintain a good correspondence, they had taken this way, which had been practised with so good success by their ancestors.

* “The court put their whole strength to carry this bill: prince George came and voted for it, though he was himself an occasional Conformist. For he had received the sacrament as lord high-admiral, and yet kept his chapel in the Lutheran way. It was reported, the prince should say to the lord Wharton, when he was about to divide against him, ‘my heart is vid you.’ The earl of Marlborough and the lord Godolphin also were for the bill. After some conferences wherein each house had yielded some smaller differences to the other, it came to a Free Conference, on the 16th of January, in the Painted Chamber, which was the more crowded upon that occasion than had ever been known; so much weight was laid on this matter on both sides.” Tindal.

"That the intent of this bill for preventing Occasional Conformity is only to restrain, to put a stop to a very scandalous practice, which is a reproach to religion, gives offence to all good Christians, and to the best among the Dissenters themselves.

"That this bill enacts nothing new; that it is intended to make the laws in being more effectual.

"That those laws were thought sufficient to secure our establishment; but, since the invention, since the iniquity, of men had found out ways to evade and elude them, the Commons would never doubt but the Lords would let these men see they would not be wanting on their part, to maintain and support it.

"That this bill appears to the Commons absolutely necessary, for preventing those mixtures which must prove destructive to the church and the monarchy.

"That the Commons were incapable of having any designs they were ashamed to own: That they designed nothing but the preservation of the church of England and the monarchy; and doubted not to meet with a ready concurrence from the Lords in their designs.

"That an established religion and a national church are absolutely necessary, when so many of men pretend to inspiration, and when there are so many weak men to follow them.

"That, if a national church be necessary, the only effectual way to preserve it, is by keeping the civil power in the hands of those whose practice and principles are conformable to it.

"That, when the Corporation Act was made, the parliament had fresh in their minds the convulsions and calamities that had been brought upon the nation by such as pretended to be at the same time in the true interest of religion and their country: That the parliament by that act, and afterwards by the Test Act, thought they had secured our establishment both in church and state; and that they had provided a sufficient barrier, to defeat and disappoint any attempts against them, by enacting, that all in offices should receive the Sacrament of the Lord's supper, according to the rites and usage of the church of England; and never imagined a set of men would, at any time, rise up, whose consciences were too tender to obey the laws, but hardened enough to break through any.

"That as, upon the Revolution, the last reign began with an act in favour of the dissenters; so the Commons do desire, in the beginning of her majesty's auspicious reign, an act may pass in favour of the church of England; that the laws, which have been invaded, may now be effectually enforced; and that those men may be kept out of offices, who have shown they never wanted the will, when they had the power, to destroy the church.

"That nothing had been more misrepresented than this bill.

"That this bill does not intrench on the act of Toleration, and in no respect affects what is enacted by it.

"That this bill takes not from the Dissenters any one privilege they have by law.

"That this bill gives not any one privilege to the church of England, which is not (at least) intended her by the laws as they now stand.

"Their managers then acquainted the Lords, that the Commons insisted on their disagreement to the second and third amendments made by the Lords in the preamble of the bill, and on their disagreement to the fourth amendment; and argued,

"That a preamble is to declare the occasion of making a law; it makes no law; and if it be proper to the enacting clause, it is a proper preamble.

"That the propositions advanced in this preamble are these: That whatsoever persons are enacted to qualify themselves, the laws intend should be conformable to the Church.

"That if the laws provide they should receive the sacrament, and by that intend a conformity; then whosoever breaks the intention of the laws, breaks the law, or at least evades the law; and it is fit to secure us against such practices.

"That, if it be fit the Corporation Clause should stand in the body, the Lords reasons for the amendments in the preamble will not be of weight.

"That the preamble mentions such persons and such offices; which must be the persons and the offices the act relates to; and can be no other.

"That the word 'enacting' can only be understood of the laws that do so enact; being relative, is still more plain and necessary.

"That, however, and if the Lords had pleased, they might, by a very little amendment, have obviated the objection they make to these words, by changing ['every person'] into ['several persons'] which would have reconciled them to the most rigid construction.

"Then their managers acquainted the Lords, that they insisted on their disagreeing to the Fifth Amendment; and argued, "That the words in the Test Act are more general and uncertain than those in the Corporation Act, which their managers cited and compared.

"That the words in the Corporation Act have been there more than forty years, without any inconveniency from them, or any complaint against them, for their being too general and uncertain.

"That the inducements for passing the Corporation Act, according to the preamble, were, That a succession in corporations might be perpetuated in the hands of persons well affected to the king and the established government, and for the preservation of the public peace both in church and state.

“ That these were the purposes the Commons designed in the passing this law.

“ That these purposes, the Commons know, the Lords will with them own, are very proper to be attained; and that the Commons cannot at any time disown, because they can at no time have any other.

“ That the Lords agree, this bill should relate to officers in the Test Act; because the law intends those officers should be conformable: And if the intention of that law be the reason to provide against such evaders of it, the like intention in the Corporation Act will serve for a reason to provide against the evaders of the Corporation Act.

“ That, by Occasional Conformity, the Dissenters may let themselves into the government of all the corporations; And it is obvious how far that would influence the government of the kingdom.

“ That to separate from a church, which has nothing in it against a man's conscience to conform to, is schism.

“ That Schism is certainly a spiritual sin, without the superadding of a temporal law to make it an offence.

“ This Occasional Conformity declares a man's conscience will let him conform; and in such a man non-conformity is a willful sin: and why should occasional conformity be allowed in corporations, when the Lords agree that out of corporations it ought not to be allowed?

“ That, if it be reasonable, as the Lords allow it is, that he who hath an office out of a corporation, though it entitles him perhaps to very little profit or trust, should be conformable; it is certainly much more reasonable, that another, who is trusted with magistracy and power in a corporation, and has thereby a greater influence, should be conformable.

“ The managers for the Commons insisted on their disagreeing to the Lords' Eighth Amendment; and argued,

“ That, if the Lords were pleased to consider how much greater the penalties and other penal laws were in many instances than in this bill; they presumed, the Lords would not think those in this bill excessive.

“ That, in laying penalties, the Commons shall always endeavour to make them such, as shall neither tempt to perjury, nor totally discourage information and prosecutions; which they thought this Amendment of the Lords would do, should the Commons agree to it.

“ Their managers insisting on their disagreeing to the Lords' Ninth Amendment; and argued,

“ That the punishment of incapacity, the recapacitating, and the increase of punishment for a second offence, are warranted by many precedents of the like nature in other penal laws.

“ That an incapacity, as qualified by the subsequent proviso, is a very proper punishment: That a second offence is a relapse and an apostacy, which are circumstances that aggravate and make it more heinous than the first offence, and therefore deserve an increase of punishment.

“ That he is indeed reduced to a very unhappy condition, who is made incapable of serving his prince and country; but, in the present case, our prince and country would be in a more unhappy condition, to be served by such whose principles are inconsistent with the good and welfare of our establishment.

“ That the Commons could never imagine the Lords could infer, from this incapacity, the taking away the Toleration.

“ That the Toleration was intended only for the ease of tender and scrupulous consciences and not to give a license for Occasional Conformity.

“ That conforming and non-conforming are contradictions; nothing but a firm persuasion that our terms of communion are sinful and unlawful can justify the one, and that plainly condemns the other.

“ For their insisting on their disagreeing to the clauses marked B. C. D. and E. the managers offered these reasons:

“ That the exempting Protestant Dissenters from serving offices would rather establish occasional non-conformity, than prevent occasional conformity; and therefore increase, in cure, the evil the bill was intended to remedy.

“ That the Act of Uniformity, which established the liturgy and practice of the church of England, has provided for the sermons or lectures preached or read in the universities.

“ That, these sermons and lectures having been in such manner provided for, it was not thought necessary, when the act passed in the 16th and in the 22d Car. 2, to prevent an suppress seditious conventicles (in both which acts conventicles are described as in this bill to have any particular exceptions for them; and yet they were never, by any construction taken to be conventicles.

“ That the allowing an exemption to such should be present at the exercises in the foreign reformed churches, would be to open a door for the evading this law.

“ That the places of governors of some hospitals are very considerable preferments, as given as such to the clergy of the church of England; and the Commons can never consent, by any law, to let in the Dissenters to the enjoyment of them.”

“ The managers for the Lords did maintain the Alterations made in the Bill, and the clauses added to it.

“ The substance of what was said by the Lords' Managers was, That the Lords were as desirous as the Commons, to preserve a good correspondence betwixt the two Houses.

“ That, by their agreeing so far as they have done to this bill, they have gone a great way for the preventing the evil this bill is intended to remedy; and own it to be a scandal to religion that persons should conform only for a place.

“ That the Lords do not take, going to a meeting to be malum in se; for that the Dissenters are Protestants, and differ from the Church of England only in some little forms; and therefore the Lords think, loss of office a sufficient punishment, without an incapacity.

"That it can never be thought, those of the better sort will be guilty of this offence; if they are, they lose their offices: and loss of office is a severe penalty in inferior offices of the customs and excise, and who have little else to subsist on: In short, they will be undone by the loss of their office; and this the Lords think severe enough without carrying it much farther: This is yet more considerable in patent places, which, by a common custom, are bought and sold, and are of the nature of freeholds.

"That incapacity is too great a penalty; and that it is hard to imagine any offence, that is not capital, can deserve it.

"That there is no more reason to punish this offence with incapacity, than to make it felony.

"That the Dissenters are not obnoxious to the government, as when the Corporation Act was made.

"That the most considerable persons of the Dissenters are well affected to the present constitution, and are hearty enemies to the queen's and kingdom's enemies.

"That in some corporations, the Lords take the election of members to serve in parliament to be only in such as are concerned in the government of them, as at Buckingham, &c.; and the Lords would not, by this bill, deprive men of their birth-rights.

"That the Lords do not think fit to bring any greater hardships upon the Dissenters, since great advantages have accrued from the Act of Toleration.

"That the Dissenters had formerly been seditions and had appeared in open rebellion; they then declared both against church and state.

"But of late, in the greatest extremity of the church, they joined with her; when the bishops were in the Tower, the Dissenters shewed they had no prejudice to the church, and so they late continued to behave themselves.

"That the Lords did equally desire a good correspondence betwixt the two houses; and were so satisfied of the necessity of union at this time, that they thought all measures fatal, that might create any divisions amongst Protestants at home, or give any check to the necessary union amongst our allies abroad, of the reformed religion.

"For which Reasons, in a time of war, they thought alterations unnecessary and dangerous; and were unwilling to bring any real hardships upon the Dissenters at this time, or give them any cause of jealousies or fears.

"That the Toleration hath had such visible and good effects, hath contributed so much to the security and reputation of the Church of England, and produced so good a temper amongst the Dissenters, that the Lords are unwilling to give the least discredit to that act; being sensible, that liberty of conscience and gentle measures are most proper, and have been found most effectual, toward increasing the Church, and diminishing the number of Dissenters.

"That the Lords apprehend, that some parts of this bill by them amended have an air of severity improper for this season; that, though there may be some things to be found fault with, yet a proper time ought to be taken to apply remedies; that the attempting too hasty cures have often proved fatal.

"That the Lords could not conceive the interest of the church and state were not to be supported without this bill; since, in case of such danger and necessity, this remedy must have been proposed before now, by some of those worthy members of the Church of England, who, in so many parliaments, since the Toleration, have shewn so much zeal for the national church and government.

"That the Lords think they have sufficiently shewn their dislike to the practice of occasional conformity, on which they inflict no less a punishment than loss of place; and have consented likewise to a reasonable fine to be laid on those who are proved guilty of this crime.

"The Lords cannot but conceive that, if this bill did enact nothing new, there would not be such a contest about it; that it is plain, though occasional conformity ought always to have been esteemed a crime, that the practice was new, and the punishment provided by this law new likewise: the Lords consent to a punishment; but would proportion the penalty to the offence.

"That the Commons give up this argument, when they propose, for new invented crimes, new invented punishments.

"That, as the Commons need not be ashamed of designs so laudable as the preservation of the Church of England and monarchy; so, the Lords conclude, their desires of securing the Toleration Act, the peace and quiet of the kingdom at home, and the interest of the nation abroad, will meet with a fair construction; especially when they hope the church is so well secured, by her doctrine, by the good laws of the realm, and the protection of so pious a queen, assisted by a parliament so well affected to the church and state.

"That the Lords not only allow the necessity of an established religion and a national church; but, being likewise of that national church, they can never be wanting to those measures they think proper to secure it: and though, by the first appearance, the members of the house of commons may seem upon this occasion the most zealous champions to the national establishment; yet the Lords think the only contest between them is, which shall most befriend and take care of the church; the one would procure a hasty settled submission, not so much to be depended upon; the other would obtain for her a more gradual, but a safer, advantage over those that dissent from her; the same end being designed by both, and only some difference in the means to attain it.

"That the Lords do not well understand the inference, that as, upon the Revolution, the last reign began with an act in favour of the Dissenters; so the Commons do desire, in the beginning of her majesty's reign, an act may pass in favour of the Church.

"The Lords conceive, that both reigns began upon the same bottom and foundation; and that, as in this reign her majesty hath been pleased to give gracious assurances as to liberty of conscience, so in the last, the Church ever met with protection and support.

"That the interest of both princes is, to support the Church against her enemies: That it is hard, as well as untrue, to say of the Dissenters, they never wanted the will, when they had the power, to destroy the church and state; since in the last and greatest danger the church was exposed to, they joined with her, with all imaginable zeal and sincerity, against the Papias, their common enemies; shewing no prejudice to the church, but the utmost respect to her bishops when sent to the Tower; and that ever since they have continued to shew all the signs of friendship and submission to the government of church and state.

"That, in truth, formerly the Dissenters had been seditious, and in arms and opposition to the state and church; but it was the effect of persecution; and that, even then, they were open and avowed enemies; but that toleration and tenderness had never missed of procuring peace and union, as persecution had never failed producing the contrary effects.

"That the Lords cannot think the Dissenters can properly be called schismatics, at least that differ in no essential point; that such an opinion allowed would bring a heavy charge upon the church of England, who, by a law, have tolerated such a schism; that connivance hath been used to schismatics; that public allowance was never given to such; and the churchmen having allowed communion with the reformed churches abroad professing Calvinism, it must follow, they hold them not guilty of schism, or could not allow communion with them.

"That this Bill inflicts a second punishment on those who fled from France for their religion, that they sought a very improper refuge, amongst those that must think them guilty of schism, and must use them accordingly; that this may be used as an argument to justify even the persecution in France. Why may not the Roman Catholics, with reason, banish those, that even Protestants can hardly endure amongst them; and for whose doctrine and practice they shew such an aversion, that a man must forfeit his place, and undergo a hard penalty, but for entering once into their congregation?

"That the Lords cannot depart from the clause relating to the Dutch and Walloon churches so long established amongst us, lest it should give great disgust and offence to our allies abroad, and at the same time forfeit the greatest character can be given a church, that of tenderness and charity to fellow christians;

the contrary practice being what is so much abhorred amongst Roman Catholics.

"That, though the Lords allow, that no man hath a place by birth-right, or but few such examples in our government; yet that giving vote for a representative in parliament is the essential privilege whereby every Englishman preserves his property, and that whatsoever deprives him of such vote, deprives him of his birth-right.

"The Lords are of opinion, the Dissenters should have liberty of conscience; but agree to the further measures proposed by the Commons to allow neither Dissenters nor occasional conformists any share in the government: but they take this to be the great security for the established religion, that all who sit in the house of commons must be churchmen; and the difference between a churchman chose by churchmen, and chose by Dissenters, is only this, that the former will be for using severer, the other gentler means, for bringing the Dissenters into the church.

"That the disagreeing to the clause relating to workhouses where the poor were employed and relieved, seems very hard; since it could never be conceived, that the distribution of some Presbyterian bread to the poor, and Dissenting water-gruel to the sick, could ever bring any prejudice to the church of England; especially by such that, having no authority in the government, or profit by the administration of such charities, gave them indifferently to those of all persuasions.

"Allow them charity to cover their sins which God allows and commands.

"That the Lords conceived the Act of Toleration visibly proved, to the advantage of the church, that even the practice of occasional conformity in a few, as it had done great prejudice to the Dissenters, so had it added to the reputation and authority of the church; the Dissenters having determined the point against themselves by this practice: for, if they can conform for a place, much more ought they to do so in compliance with the law, and for the sake of unity: but one or two instances of this in so long a time.

"That the Lords are of opinion, the Dissenters are coming into the church, and that no thing but terrifying measures and severity can prevent the happy union.

"The main design of this bill is, to secure the church of England; and in this the Lords do perfectly agree with the Commons; both sides of the house join in it with equal zeal: and the main point of this bill being the excluding all persons from employments of trust, who join themselves to any other bodies for religious worship, besides the church of England; the Lords do agree entirely with them likewise in this; all the difference is, what further penalties should be laid, besides the forfeiture of the employment, on persons so offending.

"The Lords look on the fixing of qualifications for places of trust to be a thing so entirely judged with the legislature, that, without giving any reason for it, upon any apprehension of danger, how remote soever, every government may put such rules, restraints, or conditions, on all who serve in any place of trust, as they shall see cause for; but penalties and punishments are of another nature.—Draco's laws, by reason of their extreme severity, are said to have been writ in blood; if petty larceny were made capital, here would be just occasion for censure.—There ought to be a proportion observed between the offence and the punishment; and offences of a lower nature ought not to be punished more severely than offences of a higher nature.—Popery has been ever looked on, as that which we ought to apprehend and fear the most, and guard chiefly against it, being our most inveterate, most restless, and most formidable enemy; and therefore there has been always a great difference put between papist and protestant dissenters, how bad and dangerous soever they may be.

There has been a spirit of moderation eminently conspicuous in the whole progress of our legislation, with relation to that religion, suitable both to the natural gentleness of this government, and to the charity which our religion teaches.

In the first beginning of our Reformation, under Edward 6, the Act of Uniformity was conceived in terms suitable to that moderation. 2 & 3 Ed. 6. cap. 1) Any clergyman, that should use any other manner of mass, wilfully standing in the same, or that should preach against the book of Common Prayer, for the first offence was only to forfeit one year's profits of any one of his spiritual preferments, with six months imprisonment. Here was a mild punishment, even of a clergyman offending; and yet that was not inflicted, unless he continued obstinate.—By the same act, if any of the laity should procure or compel any to use any other form of worship in a cathedral or parish church, or for so public an affront to the established religion, he was only to be fined in ten pounds, or to suffer three months imprisonment.—With this gentleness was our Reformation at first set on; and though perhaps it may be suggested that by this mildness, Papists were so favourable used, that they had it soon in their power to lay that work in the dust, and to burn those who had used them so mercifully; yet, when Protestants were happily re-established by queen Elizabeth, though the penalties were a little heightened, still the moderation of that time was eminent.

A Clergyman, that before for his first offence had forfeited one year's profits of any one preferment, did, by the act of the queen, forfeit one year of all his preferments; and the procurers or compellers of using another form of worship, even in a Cathedral, were fined in an hundred marks.

With such gentle methods was our Reformation at first established. And when the many conspiracies against the life of that queen forced the government to greater severities, yet, in the statute of the twenty-third of the queen, the hearing of Mass was indeed made more penal; one hundred marks was set for the fine, with a year's imprisonment; but with this temper, that if the person accused did, before judgment, submit and conform, he was to be discharged. This is the highest severity to which our laws have carried the hearing of Mass; and here is an easy way provided to escape it. I need not observe, that the penalty of this bill goes higher, and is not so easily avoided.

A Papist convict, as soon as he conforms himself, and receives the Sacrament, is immediately cleared; no incapacity lies upon him: But this Act carries that matter further, to a year's incapacity. A Papist, that shall relapse, and fall under a second conviction, is only convicted over again, without any aggravation of the censure; which by this bill is much heightened upon a second offence: So that the penalties of this bill are higher than any the law has laid on Papists for assisting at the solemnest acts of their religion. It is true, if a Papist shall hear Mass with five persons more than those of his own family, he falls under the penalties of this bill; but all that have been abroad, and are acquainted with the methods of that religion, even where it acts in a full freedom, know that the practice of solitary Masses among them is so common, that no man of that church is in danger of falling under any penalty, for having any number about him in the acts of their worship.

When the first act against Conventicles passed, which is the foundation of a great part of this bill, the fines set were six months imprisonment, to be redeemable by 5*l.* for the first offence; a year's imprisonment, to be redeemable by 10*l.*, for the second offence; and banishment was the punishment for the third offence.

The Lords, disliking that severity, added a clause for redeeming that by 100*l.*, and appropriated the fine. The severity of these pains did not agree with the temper of Englishmen, and the act was not much executed. Some years after that, a gentler act was made; the fines were then set at 5*s.* and 10*s.* for the first and second offence; but no man could be fined above 10*l.* for any offence against that act, except the master of the house where the conventicle was held, who was to be fined in twenty pounds.

The severity of this was intended to force the Dissenters to petition for the Toleration, that was then designed, and followed not long after; this act was executed in Starling's mayoralty with the greatest severity, at the time that Madam was at Dover; soon after, that prosecution was slackened. But, after the attempt made for the exclusion, these laws were again executed for some years with great severity, by a Popish management; after they had set the Church against the Dissenters, then, according to their wonted arts, they studied to set the Dissenters as much against the Church.

“ When, by such methods, we were reduced to the last extremities, then was the late king invited to come and deliver us; and, after he had secured our religion, our laws, and our liberties, he, by the Act of Toleration, which he passed, quicquid those heats that had almost consumed us.

“ Whatever some may think, he will be still reckoned among the greatest of our kings: To him we owed a long continuance of a flourishing time, even during a great war; and it is to him, that we owe the great happiness of her majesty's being now on the throne.

“ The church has no reason to complain of the effects of the Toleration; for, as the numbers of those who divide from us do visibly abate all over the nation; so the heat and fermentation, which was raised by those divisions, is almost entirely laid, and we cannot but look on that as a happy step towards the healing of our wounds.

“ But what may we not look for under the reign of such a queen; whose example, whose virtues, and zeal, give us reason to hope for a happy state of matters in the church, if undue severities do not again raise new flames, and set a new edge on men's spirits, which may blast these hopes, and defeat the success that we might otherwise expect under such an auspicious reign!

“ Before the Act of Toleration passed, while conventicles were illegal and criminal assemblies; yet even then a man in office, that was present at them, was only liable to a fine of 10*l.*; whereas, by this bill, he is liable to a fine of 100*l.* for being present at them, though they have now an impunity by law: It does not seem so very suitable, that the same action shall be made ten times more penal after such an impunity is granted, than it was before the passing that law, while such assemblies were illegal.

“ This is yet more extraordinary with relation to the churches of the foreign Protestants, that were taken care of even in the Act of Uniformity; so that these are legal assemblies, not only tolerated, but allowed. Now, how unlimited soever the legislature is as to the qualifications necessary for all that hold any place of trust; yet it seems contrary to all known rules, to lay a very heavy penalty on any action that is allowed by law.

“ A known maxim, with relation to all laws that are highly penal, is, that the words expressing the crime ought to be clear, and of a determinate sense, not liable to constructions and stretches; since the greatness of the penalty may prove an inducement to make those stretches, and to carry them far beyond what is intended. The crime so penal by this bill is, to be in a meeting, with five more than the family, under the pretence of religious worship, other than according to the Liturgy and practice of the church of England. Now we know indeed what the Liturgy is; but it is not so easy to tell what the importance of the word practice may be, or how far that may be carried; whether it is the practice of cathedral, or parochial churches; and whether practice shall govern the liturgy, as in the not saying the second service at the altar, or christening after the second lesson? and whether all family prayer, if not by the form of the Liturgy is not condemned; though many books for family prayers have been much recommended, and commonly made use of?

“ In the country, few persons of condition are so retired, as not to have often five more than their family within their houses: must these be excluded from family prayer, if it is not according to the Liturgy? and may not even the liturgy prayers, without psalms and lessons be likewise included within these words, or at least be carried to that by vexatious informers, and be so given by easy juries and partial judges: It therefore seems ensnaring, and upon becoming so mild a government as ours happens to be, especially when it is in such hands, to lay so heavy a penalty upon an offence so doubtfully expressed.

“ But, as the penalty seems excessive, and the words are of uncertain signification; and the Lords do not approve of the application of the sums to be raised by this bill, that they should all go to the informer. The ancient method was to give them to the crown, and to leave the encouraging informers to the crown: it was one of those trusts that were lodged with the sovereign, and so the laws were to be executed severely or more remissly as the public occasions required. but, by this bill, all given to the informer, 100*l.* for the offence, and 5*l.* a day for three months, both which may amount to 550*l.*

“ For, though an oath must be made without ten days, yet, this not being to be done in open court, the party may not hear of it; and if he knows it to be false, he may have no regard to it, so he may let it run to the term limited by the bill.

“ This nation has been groaning long under false swearing, that has been in every corner: all sides have had their share in it. Till God pours out another spirit upon us, one of the chief securities against false witnessing is that such an infamy follows, especially where servants swear against their masters, that a small matter cannot tempt even a bad man to so base a practice; but, if so great a sum were to be the reward of such villainy, it is hard to tell where it would stop.

“ A couple of bad servants, dismissed for ill practices, might be tempted in interest, as well as revenge, to lay a probable story, and to carry it through by bold swearing: a great deal of this sort was but too much practised among us twenty years ago; and it is to be feared that such a bill as this would set the same things again on foot.

“ Those who acquaint themselves with the Roman Historians, see in them what a sort of people the Delatores were; the encouraging of them, especially servants against their masters, was reckoned amongst the greatest reproaches of the worst emperors: but, though Domitian made use of such venom, it is set out with great pomp, and in very lively expressions, as the glory of Trajan's reign, that he freed Rome from that plague, and banished all those infamous betrayers of their masters. It is to be hoped, that a reign, which God delights to honour, shall have no such blemish cast on it: and that no encouragement shall be given to false accusations and perjury, which, the Lords apprehend, might follow, if so great a reward were offered as this bill proposes: they think the reward they offer is enough to encourage honest and well-minded men to discover what they may know; and do not think fit to lay before them temptations, that may be too strong in so corrupt an age.

"As for this Occasional Conformity, the Lords do not go about to excuse or to defend it; but they, who have observed the progress of these matters, and have borne a large share in these controversies, must acquaint the Commons, that it is no new practice invented to evade a law; it has been both the principle and practice of some of the most eminent among the Dissenters, ever since St. Bartholomew's in the year 1662; it is known that Baxter and Bates did still maintain it, and that several books have been writ about it: and as the fiercest of the Dissenters, who intended to keep up a wall of partition between them and the church, have opposed it much: to the party of all the Dissenters that came nearest the church, and of whom the greatest numbers have come over to it, were those that pleaded for it. Nor is it a certain inference, that, because a man receives the Sacrament in the church, he can therefore conform in every other particular; the office of the Communion is certainly one of the brightest and best composed of any that ever was in the church of God; the little exceptions that lay to the posture were so fully cleared by the rubric that is added, that it is indeed a wonder how any person should except to any thing in the whole office; but it does not necessarily follow that therefore every man, who is satisfied with us, should be likewise satisfied with every other part of conformity. There was a very learned and famous man, that lived at Salisbury, Mr. Tombs, who was a very zealous conformist in all points, but in one, Infant Baptism; so that the receiving the Sacrament does not necessarily import an entire conformity in every other particular, no more than a man who can subscribe to the two first articles of our religion, that are indeed the main ones, and contain the doctrine of the Trinity, and the incarnation and satisfaction of Christ, is by that concluded to assent to the rest of the 39; the Dissenters agree to the first, but refuse some of the last. This is likewise to be remembered, that, after Saint Bartholomew in 1662, Occasional Conformity was a step that carried many much further; from occasional conformity, it grew to a constant conformity, & not in the persons themselves, yet in their children; so the Lords now see some, descended from occasional conformists, espouse the cause of the church with much zeal.

"For these Reasons, the Lords do conceive the penalties in this bill to be excessive and unreasonable.

"As to the Amendment in the Preamble: The Lords have reason to insist on it; because the words left out by them relate to another clause, which they think ought not to stand in the bill. But that is not all.—The words left out by this Amendment contain a proposition, which they cannot assent to as true; for, as the law stands, every person to be admitted to any office, is not obliged to be conformable or receive the Sacrament; officers of inheritance, forest officers, non-commission officers in the fleet, and many others, are under no such obligations.

"The managers of the House of Commons themselves seem to admit the words too general to be maintained in strictness: and therefore they have laboured to qualify them by construction. That is an expedient which must be resorted to when untrue or improper words happen to be found in a law already made; But, when a law is making, it has not been usual to contend for keeping in words which are plainly liable to exception; especially in a case where the clause is unnecessary, and, the preamble sufficiently expresses the design of the law without it.

"The Lords insist on their Amendment which leaves out the words relating to the Corporation Act. They say, it cannot be disputed, but that the Test Act extends to all the considerable offices and employments in which the security of the government may be concerned. That law was made when the kingdom was under a just apprehension of danger to the church; and the expedient agreed upon as most like to secure her was, the placing all the considerable offices in the hands of her members: so that the design of the Test Act is the same with that of this bill.

"Experience has justified the measures taken by that law; and there has been no complaint that it was not extensive enough as to the several sorts of offices.—To encounter a practice, which it is supposed may be made use of to elude the true design of the Test Act; the Commons have proposed by this bill to restrain absolute persons in office from going to meetings; and the Lords agree with them, so far as relates to all manner of offices comprehended in the Test Act, which the Lords think is the right measure to go by.

"All offices which relate to magistracy (as well within corporations as without) are manifestly comprehended in the Test Act; and therefore the Lords have wondered to hear the managers of the House of Commons argue, that it is of consequence to secure the magistracy of the corporations in the hands of the churchmen; or to affirm, that, if this Amendment was agreed, dissenters may let themselves into the government of corporations, since it is directly otherwise.

"The Corporation Act was made when the kingdom was just delivered from a long usurpation; and was principally founded on reasons peculiar to that time.—Indeed, nothing but so extraordinary a juncture could have excused the placing such extravagant powers in the hands of the commissioners appointed by that Act.—Part of the Act has been repealed; and there was no great regard had to it, at the time when a more effectual security was given to the church by the Test: The Lords go not about to weaken the force of the Corporation Act; but think it not reasonable to extend the penalties of this bill to the general and uncertain words of that law.

"The Managers for the Commons say, the words of the Test Act are as general as those of the Corporation Act: If so, we seem to be contending about nothing; since how general soever the words of the Test Act are, the Lords have agreed they shall stand in the bill.

"The words in the Test Act are universally understood; no doubt remains to what offices and persons it extends. It is not so as to the Corporation Act; the uncertainty of the words in that law determines the Lords to think they ought not to be the description of the persons to whom the bill should reach.

"They think themselves obliged to be more cautious in this matter, because the bill now depending does not only concern those who shall for the future come into offices, but such as are at present possessed of them.

"In Corporations there are many offices of a private and inferior nature; some have been obtained by purchase, some by long services, and men have attained to others in course; some of these are freeholds, many of them the whole subsistence of families, and perhaps have been enjoyed many years under an obedience to all such terms as the law now in being has prescribed: And the Lords think it hard to disturb men in their freeholds and possessions by new laws, unless the case be such, that the security of the government does appear to be manifestly concerned; where that does appear, the Lords can satisfy themselves to dispense with private considerations (as is seen by what they have agreed to in this bill); but they cannot go further.

"The Lords look on the penalties in this bill, as it was framed by the House of Commons, to be very excessive, and such as bear no proportion to the offence, and therefore they cannot agree to them.

"The practice of occasional conformity is not new; it is almost of the same date with the Act of Uniformity; it hath been a known dispute among the Dissenters, and vindicated in print by some of them, and practised by many of them, who had no thoughts of offices, and has been a means of bringing several persons entirely from meetings: the objection to this practice by those of the church of England has been but of late.

"The Lords do not go about to justify men who can come so far towards uniting with the church, and yet will stop there, any more than they do to justify any other of the points upon which the Dissenters continue their separation.

"And since there is reason to apprehend, that such a liberty as this may be perverted, to the eluding the law; the Lords have agreed to restrain it.

"They are willing to make it impossible for such men to keep in offices, because hypocrites would make use of such a liberty; but they are not willing to ruin persons utterly, on account of a practice that many well meaning men have been, and may be, led into, and which they think tends naturally to bring them over entirely to the church.

"The penalty of 100*l.* and 5*l.* a day, and that whole sum given to the informer, the Lords think a dangerous temptation to perjury.

"Our law has branded informers with the hardest character; troublesome persons, who grievously charge, vex, and disturb the commons; this is the description the law has given of them.

"Judges must encourage these sort of men, according to the terms of the laws, when made; but legislators, when they are considering of laws to be made, must speak of these men as they are. So great a temptation will make the innocent almost as insecure as the guilty. Experiences shewed this, in the instances of some of the most active informers, in prosecuting Dissenters on the acts against conventicles, who were convicted of perjuries against many persons; though there the temptation was nothing, comparable to what it would be if these penalties should stand.—And though the Commons have yielded to the Lord's Amendments, that two witnesses shall be necessary, and that the time of prosecution shall not be left indefinite; yet that will not be sufficient; for both those things were provided for in the Conventicle Act.

"And though the Commons have also yielded to shorten the time for the prosecution; yet the penalty may still amount to a very great sum, for the five pounds a day may go on for three months.

"The punishment of a total incapacity is the heaviest, next the loss of life; and yet it is to be inflicted for the first offence.

"The word employment is more general than any word the Test Act has. Such punishment ought only to be for a crime of the highest nature; and yet, going to a meeting is no crime as the law now stands; nor will it be a crime in any man who is not in office, when the bill is passed into a law.

"The Lords agree to that part of the penalty which answers the visible design of the bill, by making the going to a conventicle to be forfeiture of office. To go further, to ruin men's estates, to make them infamous (for what can be more infamous than such a disability?), they think is to exceed all bounds.

"The managers for the Commons say, there are greater penalties in other laws; it does not appear by any instances which have been given.

These penalties are much heavier than in most of the laws about religion; but if that were true, what is to be inferred from thence; if the crimes be not the same in the heinousness of their natures? Justice and good policy requires there should be some proportion between the offence and the punishment.

“The Lords have quite another consideration of the penalties in this bill, and those of the Test Act.

“In the present case, an innocent man has only a sort of negative proof, to defend him from false witnesses; who may chuse to assign such a time and place for the fact, as they know the party can be least likely to defend himself.

“Whereas, in the case of the Test Act, the man who resolves to obey the law, which is to subscribe the declaration, and receive the Sacrament, has not only the liberty to choose his own witnesses of his receiving the Sacrament, and the attestation of the minister who officiates; but the whole is put upon record; so that when a man has complied with the law, he is beyond all possibility of suffering by a false accusation.

“There seems to be no occasion here to increase the punishment upon a second offence; for it does not depend upon the former, as in most cases where the penalty is increased for the second offence; for, when the offence is gone the person is under no legal restraint from going to conventicles.

“If he obtains a new office, he brings himself at the same time under the reach of this law, upon a new account; and if he offends again, he will lose that office, besides incurring the pecuniary penalty.

“The Proviso which is to qualify the incapacity is made so very hard, that it is a new instance of the great severity of the bill. A man, to get himself right again, must take more public shame to himself than the severest laws against Papists require to discharge all the penalties and incapacities of a popish recusant convict, as appears plainly, by perusing the several acts relating to that matter; and the Lords will always be tender of putting greater hardships on Protestant Dissenters than Papists.

“That no comparison ought to be made between the penalties the law had laid upon Papists for holding of offices of trust, without taking the Test and receiving the Sacrament, and the penalties to be laid upon Occasional Conformity, for holding their office after they have been at a conventicle.

“This difference of punishment, that ought to be observed between these two, is not upon the account that the errors of the one are much greater than the errors of the other, how true never that is, but because the one depend upon foreign power, and are subject to it; so the nation is really in danger if such men should hold employments, who must be looked on as public enemies, and as persons who receive directions from an authority that we are sure is ever contriving our ruin; but no such danger can be apprehended from men who have no other strength than what they have among ourselves, which we are sure can no way be compared to the strength of the established church.

“As to the Occasional Conformity; it will appear no such formidable thing, if we consider what the sense both of the church of England and of the church of Rome was of this matter upon other occasions.

“In the beginning of queen Elizabeth’s reign, the Reformation and the Liturgy were put on a foot, to bring over the whole nation that had then a leaven of popery to concur in it: it had this effect, all the Papists of England came to church, and were occasional conformists; yet the church of England was not uneasy at this; they complained of no danger from it. But who was sensible of it? it was the pope; and he was in the right as to his own interest; for he saw what in time that occasional conformity would grow to; and therefore he put a stop to it, and by a bull condemned it.

“And indeed the church of Rome has shewed, by the methods of all their missions, that they apprehend no danger, but great advantage, from any step of the occasional conformity of protestants.

“They accept of any thing and encourage every thing of that kind; and we have all seen, by the fatal effects of their practice, that they are in the right, and gain their ends by it.

“As for the clauses about foreign protestants; there is great reason to give them all just encouragement; for, as they have brought among us many new manufactures, so they have carried them so far, that of late years we have exported to the value of a million of woollen manufactures more than was done in king Charles’s reign before they came among us; and the putting them under apprehensions or discouragements may be a means to drive them to a country where they will be sure of an entire liberty.

“The book that goes under the name of Mr. De Wit shews, the Dutch reckon that the woollen manufactures can never have such a settlement among us as with them, because they who must work them cannot have so entire a liberty of conscience here as there: we have felt the happy effects of the liberty granted them in the last reign; and it is to be hoped, that nothing will be done in this, to impeach that, or to raise apprehensions and fears in the minds of men that are so useful to us in the most important article of our trade.

“As to the clause concerning universities; we are not to consider the danger they may be in under our present circumstances, but what may happen in another state of things; it is not so long since we saw what advantages were like to be taken against those learned bodies, if there had been such a law, to furnish those that were troubling them without any reason or pretence, with the handle that this bill might have given them without this clause; and therefore, the Lords think, they are too much beholden to those great foundations, not to take care of them, and think themselves bound to secure them even from remote and possible dangers; besides that the vice-chancellor and heads of houses, being men often of great dignities and preferments, may by a severe prosecution be ruined, unless secured by a clause.

“As for the clause concerning those societies that are engaged in taking care of the poor; the nation, and this city in particular, has seen such good effects of their care and industry, that it cannot seem reasonable to put any discouragement upon them. How many poor children do they take care of! They are by their means clothed and taught, and bound out to trades; and if some misled people join their assistance and charity to so great a work, shall they be hindered from it, or punished for it, if they have been so far mistaken as to be at a conventicle; but this clause has no relation to endowed hospitals, which are under peculiar statutes, and to which none of these people have any access; the law has taken care of these, and secured them; and this clause relates only to free and voluntary societies for such charities, which the Lords do not think fit to put any restraints, or to bar any from coming into them.”

The Managers for the Commons, by way of reply to these Arguments urged by the Lords' Managers, said, “That several of the Lords' Arguments were against the bill.

“That the Lords had agreed to the greater part of this bill; and therefore should confine themselves, and speak only to their own Amendments.

“That no time could be more seasonable for this bill than the present; because the church was now in no danger of popery, or of fanaticism; but good laws are to be made for posterity, and may be obtained most easily in the best reigns.

“That the right of election of members to serve in parliament is in those that are concerned in the government of corporations; and if they should, by this bill, be turned out of their employments, and consequently lose their votes in the elections; yet it cannot be said they lose their birth-rights, because no man is born a magistrate.

“That the Commons penalty bears a just proportion to the offence; and that all above 100*l.* is for an obstinate persisting in the crime.

“That the offender cannot be guilty through inadvertency; he must offend knowingly and willingly.

“That the Test Act gives 500*l.* a much greater penalty than that in this Act, to the informer; besides, that Act brings the offender under very great disabilities.

“That an innocent man is no more secure under the Test Act, than under this bill: the question must be always upon his acting or not acting, which does not depend upon the record; and a very violent prosecution has been known within few years against an alderman of Worcester, a constant conformist, only upon a nicety, and where there has been no fault in the party.

“That the trial must be by a jury, not in summary way before a justice of the peace, in some of our penal laws.

“That it was very plain, good protestants might be affected by prosecutions upon the Test Act.”

Then their Managers left the bill with the Lords; and said, “They hoped the Lords would not let the public lose the benefit of so good a law.”

Then the Managers returned to their respective houses. When it came to the final vote ‘adhering,’ the Lords were so equally divided that in three questions put upon different heads the ‘adhering’ was carried but by one vote every one of them, and it was a different person that gave it in all the three divisions. Upon this, the bill was delivered to the Commons according to form, at a Free Conference, and they were told, that the Lords adhered to the Amendments. As the Commons likewise adhered to their disagreement with the Lords Amendments, the bill was lost for this time.

* “While the Occasional Conformity-bill was depending, Daniel de Foe, who had been a Libeller in the city of London, and had, some years before, published a severe satire, intitled, ‘The True born Englishman,’ now undertook to ridicule the immoderate zeal of the church-party in a pamphlet called, ‘The Shortest Way with the Dissenters: Or, Proposals for the Establishment of the Church.’ Some, on both sides were at first amused with it, as questioning what was the design of it; but it was not long before the author's real intention was discovered. He began with such bitter reflections on the dissenters, and their principles, that it was taken for the work of a violent church-man of some time, and met with applause from some of that party in the two universities. The author, after his reflections, proceeds to tell the world, that the representatives of the nation had now an opportunity, and perhaps the only one they should ever have, to secure the church of England, and destroy her enemies, under the favour and protection of a ‘true English queen.’ That this was the time to pull up the heretical weed of sedition, that had so long disturbed the peace of the church, and poisoned the good corn: That, if it should be objected that this renewing fire and faggot would I cruelty, and accounted barbarous, he answers that it is cruelty to kill a snake or a toad with cold blood; but the poison of their nature makes it a charity to our neighbours to destroy those creatures, not for any personal injury received, but for prevention: Not for the evil they have done, but the evil they may do. As that, as serpents, toads, and vipers, are noxious to the body, and poison the sensitive life, so the dissenters poison the soul, corrupt our po-

Bill for the farther Security of the Protestant Succession.] The Commons had now passed a bill in favour of those, who had not taken the oath abjuring the pretended prince of Wales, by the day that was named; granting them a year longer to consider of it; for it was said, that the whole party was now come entirely into the queen's interests; though, on the other hand, it was given out, that agents were come from France, on design to persuade all persons to take the abjuration, that they might become capable of employments, and so might in time be a majority in parliament; and by that means the Act of Succession, and the oath imposed by it, might be repealed. When the bill for thus prolonging the time was brought up to the Lords, a clause was added, qualifying those persons, who should, in the new extent of time, take the oaths, to return to their benefices or employments, unless they were already legally filled. When this was agreed, two clauses of much greater consequence were added to the bill. One was, declaring it high-treason to endeavour to defeat the succession to the crown, as it was now limited by law, or to set aside the next succession. This had a precedent in the former reign, and therefore it could not be denied now. It seemed the more necessary, because there was another person who equally claimed the crown; so that a further security might well be insisted upon. This was a great surprize to many, who were visibly uneasy at the motion, but were not prepared for it, and did not see how it could be resisted. The other clause was, for sending the abjuration to Ireland, and obliging all there (in the same manner as in England) to take it. This seemed the more reasonable, considering the strength of the Popish interest there. Both clauses passed in the house of Lords, without any opposition; but it was apprehended, that the Commons would not be so easy; yet, when it was sent to them, they struggled only against the first clause, that barred the return of persons, upon the taking the oaths, into places, that were already filled. The party tried their tenity, ensnare our children, destroy the vitals of our happiness, our future felicity, and contaminate the whole mass; and therefore they are to be rooted out of this nation, if ever we would live in peace, serve God, and enjoy our own.—The Commons, after the author and his design were discovered, ordered the pamphlet to be burnt by the common hangman, and de Foe to be prosecuted. He pleaded for himself, that he gave the violent church-men but their language, or, at least, the sense of their own expressions, when they talked of 'hanging out bloody colours and banners of defiance;' and shewed what many of their pamphlets and sermons, as well as their conversation tended to. But de Foe was fined 200*l.*, and put in the pillory. The earl of Nottingham is said to offer him mercy, whilst in Newgate, if he would discover who set him to write this pamphlet." Tindal.

strength upon this, and, upon their success in it, they seemed resolved to dispute the other clause; but it was carried, though only by one voice, to agree with the Lords. When the clause relating to the succession was read, sir Christopher Musgrave tried, if it might not be made a bill by itself, and not put as a clause in another bill; but seeing the house was resolved to receive both clauses, he did not insist on his motion. Every body was surprized to see a bill, that was begun in favour of the Jacobites, turned so terribly upon them; since by it a new security was given, both in England and Ireland, for a Protestant successor.

Thanks of the House given to the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Marlborough, and Sir George Rooke.] During this interval the House resolved nem. con. to give their Thanks to the duke of Ormond, sir George Rooke, and the earl of Marlborough. Which was done accordingly: To the lords Ormond and Marlborough, by a Committee appointed for that purpose: and to sir George Rooke from the chair, he being in his place. The Answer of the duke of Ormond was to this purpose:

"That it was the greatest honour which could be given a subject: that as for his part, he had done nothing, but what was his duty: that all the troops under his command behaved themselves very gallantly; and he desired to express his utmost thanks for the honour the house had done him."

The Earl of Marlborough expressed himself on the same occasion as follows:

"That nothing could add to the satisfaction he took in the queen's most gracious service, but the obliging and favourable sense which that house was pleased to express of them, (his endeavours perhaps) of which honour, no man could be more truly sensible than himself. That, our success was chiefly to be imputed to God's blessing upon her majesty's happy conduct, and the great bravery of her own troops, and those of her allies."

The Speaker's Speech to sir George Rooke, and his reply, are as follow:

"Sir George Rooke, you are now returned to this house, after a most glorious expedition; her majesty began her reign with a declaration that her heart was entirely English, and heaven hath made her triumph over the enemies of England: For this, thanks have been returned, in a most solemn manner, to Almighty God; there remains yet a debt of gratitude to those who have been the instruments of so wonderful a victory, (the duke of Ormond, and yourself, who had the command of the sea and land-forces.) In former times, admirals and generals have had success against France and Spain alone, but this action at Vigo hath been a victory over them confederated together: You have not only spoiled the enemy, but you have enriched your own country; common victories bring terror to the conquered, but you brought destruction upon them, and additional strength to England: France had endeavoured to support its ambition by the riches of India; your success, Sir, hath only left them the burden of Spain, and stript them of the assistance of it; the wealth of Spain and ships of France, are by this victory brought over to our juster cause. This is an action so glorious in the performance, and so extensive in its consequence, that as all times will preserve the memory of it, so every day will inform us of the benefit.—No doubt, Sir, but in France you are written in remarkable characters in the black list of those who have taken French gold; and it is justice done to the duke of Ormond, and your merit, that you should stand recorded in the registers of this house, as the sole instruments of this glorious victory; therefore the house came to the following resolution. Resolved, nem. con., That the thanks of this house be given to the duke of Ormond, and sir George Rooke, for the great and signal service performed for the nation at sea and land: Which thanks I now return you."

To which sir George Rooke answered in the following terms:

"Mr. Speaker, I am now under a great difficulty how to express myself upon this very great occasion; I think myself very happy, that in zeal and duty to your service, it hath been my good fortune to be the instrument of that which may deserve your notice, and much more the return of your thanks. I am extremely sensible of this great honour, and shall take all the care I can to preserve it to my grave, and convey it to my posterity without spot or blemish, by a constant affection and zealous perseverance in the queen's and your service. Sir, no man hath the command of fortune, but every man hath virtue at his will; and though I may not always be successful in your service, as upon this expedition, yet I may presume to assure you, I shall never be the more faulty.—I must repeat my inability to express myself on this occasion; but as I have a due sense of the honour this house hath been pleased to do me, so I shall always retain a due and grateful memory of it; and though my duty and allegiance are strong obligations upon me, to do my best in the service of my country, yet I shall always take this as a particular tie upon me, to do right and justice to your service upon all occasions."

Mr. Colepepper's Petition.] During this interval, likewise, Mr. Colepepper, who delivered the famous Kentish Petition, and was under prosecution for the same, petitioned the house, that proceedings might be stopped; upon which he was called before the house, and being asked, Whether he was sorry for the several scandalous, and seditious practices by him acted against the honour and privileges of that house, against the peace of the kingdom in general, and the quiet of his own country in particular: He replied, he was sorry. Upon which, a resolution passed to address the queen to stop proceedings, according to the prayer of the said petition.

The Queen's Message to the Commons, for an Augmentation of the Forces.] January 1703. The Queen sent the following Message to the House of Commons:

"Her Majesty, having received several letters from the States General of the United Provinces, as also several memorials from their ambassadors, setting forth the great apprehension they lie under, from the extraordinary preparations of France to attack them early in the spring, and the necessity, as they conceived, of making an augmentation of the forces of England and Holland, as the only means to prevent the immediate ruin, which threatened the country, was pleased thereupon to propose some expedients to the States General, which, she hoped, might have been of advantage to the common interest, and relieved them, in some measure, from their just apprehensions, without having recourse to her parliament: But those expedients, proposed by her majesty to the States General, not having produced the effect she hoped for; and the States having again renewed their applications to her majesty, with more earnestness than before, to assist them, at this time of their danger, with an augmentation of her forces, as the only means to dispossess the French of these great and early preparations which the French are making against them, her majesty has commanded the several letters and representations, which have passed between her majesty and the States General upon this subject, to be herewith transmitted to you, that you may the better judge of the danger, which threatens them.

"Her Majesty conceives this matter to be of such great consequence, as indispensably obliges her to acquaint you with the present state of it, that she may have your advice upon it, not doubting, but you will take such measures upon this occasion, as may be most for the honour and advantage of her Majesty, the safety of her kingdoms, and the necessary support of her allies."

"Most gracious sovereign; We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons in parliament assembled, do beg leave to return your majesty our humble thanks for your majesty's most gracious condescension, in communicating to your Commons the several memorials, transactions and letters that have passed between your majesty and the States General, for the augmentation of your majesty's forces, which are to act in conjunction with the forces of the States-general; by all which, your Commons are entirely convinced of your majesty's great tenderness for your subjects, in not laying a greater burthen upon them than the necessity of affairs does absolutely require.—And your Commons do humbly assure your majesty that in case your majesty shall think it necessary, to enter into any further negotiation for increasing the forces, which are to act in conjunction with the forces of the States-general (for whose interest and preservation we shall always have the greatest regard) your Commons will enable your majesty to make good the same.—And your Commons do further crave leave humbly to beseech your majesty, that you will be pleased to insist upon it with the States-general, that there be an immediate stop of all posts, and of all letters, bills, and all other correspondence, trade and commerce with France and Spain, which your Commons are humbly of opinion is so absolutely necessary for carrying on the just and necessary war, wherein your majesty is engaged, to the interrupting the trade of your enemies, and reducing them to the greatest straits; that your Commons do humbly desire, that England may not be charged with the pay of such additional troops, but from the day when such stop shall be made by the States general.”

The Queen's Answer.] To this Address of the Commons, her majesty was pleased to make the following Answer :

“ Gentlemen ; It is with great satisfaction, that I receive this Address, which enables me to join with the States general, in augmenting our forces, according to their desire. I make no doubt, but the condition, you mention, will be approved, since it is absolutely necessary for the good of the whole alliance ; and I shall this night send directions to my minister in Holland, to concur with the States-general in providing the troops accordingly.”

Narrative of the Commissioners for taking the Public Accounts, in relation to the Accounts of the Earl of Ranelagh.] The report of the Commissioners appointed to take the Public Accounts, was a business that took up much time this Session. They began with the Earl of Ranelagh as Paymaster-general of the Army, and drew up the following Narrative or Report of their Proceedings ; which Mr. Bromley presented to the House of Commons on the 11th of November, viz.

“ When your commissioners entered upon the execution of the trust, lodged in them by Act of parliament, they applied themselves, in the first place, to the examination of the general receipts and issues of the public revenue, for as long time past, as, they supposed, their commission would allow, and to the inspection of the particular management of those offices, through which the treasure of the nation is conveyed into the Exchequer ; and though it is little more than seven months, since they were first constituted, and some time was necessarily spent in many previous preparations, before they could enter upon business, as well as lost afterwards by that interruption, which the calling of a new parliament occasioned, yet they will in few days be ready to make you a report of their proceedings upon these matters.

“ They resolved also to enquire into the management of the receipts at the Exchequer, and the distribution of the money afterwards ;

but this being a large field, and a work of great extent, they chose chiefly to apply themselves to the two great branches, the Army, and Navy ; for the services of which 47,674,089*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* have been paid to the several Treasurers and Paymasters, between the 5th of November, 1688, and Michaelmas last : of which the greatest part has not been at all accounted for.—Of this sum the earl of Ranelagh, Paymaster of the Army, has received 19,518,452*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.*

“ Your commissioners began, as early as they could, to call upon his lordship, and the other officers concerned with the army, for those materials, they thought necessary, in order to the examining and stating his accounts ; and being very sensible of his long experience, and great abilities, as well as of their own little practice in things of this nature, they endeavoured to collect such papers, and ask such plain questions, as must, if fairly complied with and punctually answered, lay all open to their view.

“ That your commissioners might the better judge what was proper for them to ask of his lordship, they writ to him, April the 15th, for a true copy of his commission, together with such instructions, as he had at any time received, for the execution thereof.

“ May the 15th, your commissioners issued a precept to his lordship, for accounts to be exhibited, on Thursday, the 25th of June, according to the schemes they prescribed him, of the balance remaining in his hands on the 5th of November, 1688 ; of all money he had received, between that time, and the 25th of December, 1701 ; of all deductions made from the regiments ; and also of all his payments whatsoever.

“ His lordship, in return to this precept, brought to your commissioners general abstracts of accounts with gross items of his payments, and such as were in no respect conformable to the method, they prescribed ; and, among other things, his lordship urging the great pains and expence of time, it would require, to be so particular as they desired, that therefore the least trouble possible might be given him, your commissioners only insisted, that he should make up for them such regimental accounts, to the last of March, 1692, inclusive, as from that time he had been obliged to do by act of parliament. With this his lordship was sometimes pleased to say, he would comply, and immediately afterwards to affirm it to be impracticable. They argued, that it was impossible for him to make out debentures, for clearing the regiments to this time, if he had not had all his payments upon account to them before him ; and that the gross sum, delivered in to your Commissioners, must arise from particulars. At last his lordship owned, that in the books of his office they were contained, with all his payments to, and for the use of, the forces, digested regimentally. Much time having been unprofitably spent in conferences and letters, that no more might be lost, nor his lordship put to the trouble of picking, as he called it, these payments out of his ledger, they desired, he would please to let them have the originals, and promised to take that labour off his hands.

“ His lordship then began to dispute their authority to require any of these accounts, which had been laid before former commissioners, and some of which had been passed by the auditors : Though your commissioners must beg leave to observe, that his lordship had already brought them abstracts of these accounts and never disputed their authority, till they called upon him to lay before them such further particulars, as they thought absolutely necessary for the perfect examining and true stating, of them ; and that his last account, for 15 months, ending the 31st of March, 1692, was not declared till after they had sent to him for his accounts, and very few days before he made his return.

“ That your commissioners might be able to judge, whether the ledgers, in his lordship's office, would answer, what was expected from them, they sent, July the 2nd, a member of this commission, with one of the accountants, to inspect them ; but his lordship refused to suffer it, and, after taking more than 7 weeks, to consult his counsel (which he had promised to do in two or three days) whether, by law, he was obliged to comply with what your commissioners had desired, at last, August the 19th, he sent them two books, but at the same time acquainted them by letter, that he thought it both reasonable, and necessary, to take such abstracts, as might readily inform him, what they contained, should any misfortune happen to them : Upon which, your commissioners, taking into consideration his lordship's great care and caution, and the jealousies, he seemed to have of them, directed the books to be sealed up, and no use to be made of them, till the abstracts had been examined and compared.

“ His lordship's clerks were so uncertain in their attendance, and so often ill, or out of town, that three weeks passed, before this could be finished ; and then, upon your commissioners looking into them, it soon appeared, they were in no sort what they expected, or what his lordship had given them reason to believe they were.

“ These disappointments discouraged not your commissioners, who desired his lordship once more to give himself the trouble of coming to them. With this he was pleased to comply ; and they acquainted him, that they thought it impossible for them to discharge their duty faithfully, and to your satisfaction, unless they had the credits of the several regiments more particularly stated ; and unless he was pleased to distinguish, what he paid in cash, and what he had deducted for poundage, hospital, arms, ammunition, transportation, bread, &c. His lordship said, that, if your commissioners would name any regiment, he could soon give them such an account of it ; They then replied, if his lordship could do it in one instance, he must be able, in a little more time, to do it in all the rest ; and pressing him for such accounts, he thought fit again to insist that he was not obliged to give them any for this time ; but being asked, if that was his final resolution, he said, he would look for those scraps of paper, to use his own expression which Mr. Abbot perhaps might have left behind him ; and endeavour to give them satisfaction. They let his lordship know, he should have immediately a precept, to this effect, from them ; and accordingly, as soon as it could be dictated, and writ, it was dispatched to his lordship's office ; but he had just before taken coach, and was gone to Cranborne ; and from that time they have had no such account from him.

“ Notwithstanding all these difficulties, though your commissioners have laboured under, from the delays, neglects, and imperfect accounts they have received from the paymaster of the army, and the little satisfaction they have met with, in their enquiries, from those other offices that were chiefly instituted, as checks and controls upon the paymaster ; yet, that nothing might be wanting, on their part, to discharge the trust reposed in them, they have examined, as well as they have been able, the paymaster's accounts between the 1st of January 1687, and the last of March, 1692 ; and though they cannot pretend (to present) you with a perfect state of them, yet they shall humbly lay before you, what method they have taken, and what observations have occurred to them upon the said accounts.

Balance due from the Accountant at the foot of the preceding Account.	£. s. d.
The Exchequer Charge	- - 3,985 13
What his Lordship voluntarily charges	- - - 64,359 6
Interest received on Tallies, more than what his lordship brings to account	- - - 4,344 8

“ His lordship's Answer to the charge of interest, received on tallies, is, that these tallies were assigned over to several persons, who received the interest ; and therefore he ought not to be charged with it. He alleges, that it has been his constant course, to write his name upon the back of the orders, without any formal assignment ; that these orders were then delivered to such, as had a right to receive them with all the interest due from the date of them ; and that upon examination, it appears, that when the money, due on such orders, has been received at the Exchequer, acquittances have been written over the paymaster's name, as he had received both principal and interest. Upon which, your commissioners observing what his lordship affirmed, they thought it proper to write to him, to come prepared with evidence, to justify this answer to their charge of interest ; in return to which his lordship acquainted them, that Mr. Pigeon, his clerk, being out of town, he could not so soon be ready: And since that time they have never heard from him.

“Your commissioners have still charged him with this interest; and they beg leave to take notice, that the method his lordship uses in his assignments of tallies, appears to them a practice very liable to fraud, and capable of covering any; and since no date of assignment appears, nor other name, but his lordship's, or his agents, your commissioners conceive it their duty to charge him with all interest received upon the same.—If they are right in these particulars, then his lordship's charge for this time, as far as it has been in their power to state it, amounts to 4,344*l.* 8*s.* 3*d.* more, than he has made it.

“As to his lordship's discharge, they have at present, for the reasons before mentioned, only these following observations to lay before you: 1. That all the regiments, troops and companies, which were in the service of the late king James, and which it is notorious, had many Popish officers and soldiers in them, and were broke, and dispersed, upon the earl of Feversham's disbanding the army on the 13th of December 1688, are, by warrant upon his lordship's certificate of debentures, paid compleat to several days in January, February, March, and April, following. 2. That the warrants, for several such payments, bear date, some a year, others two years, after the said regiments, troops, and companies, were disbanded. 3. That there are several warrants, for paying compleat numbers allowed on the establishment, notwithstanding any defect in, or want of, muster-rolls. 4. That there is a warrant, dated the 17th of October, 1689, to the auditors of the Imprests, to allow his lordship the sum of 172,340*l.* which he had direction from his majesty to pay to several persons, without deductions. The auditors are not to charge the persons aforesaid with these sums or any part thereof; his majesty reserving the examination of the particular disbursements to himself, or to such, as he shall appoint for that purpose. 5. That his lordship discharges himself of several sums, paid for levying the lord Mordaunt's (now earl of Peterborough) and sr John Guise's regiments, although your commissioners find, one of the articles in the account, laid before this house, of the charge, the States General had been at in the revolution, and upon which you paid them 600,000*l.* is for raising the regiments of the lord Mordaunt, sir Robert Peyton, sir John Guise, and others. And here your commissioners must observe, that the earl of Leven's regiment is paid from the 5th of November, 1688, the earl of Monmouth's from the 10th, and that of colonel Lutterell's, from the 23d, of the said month, though his late majesty landed in England on the 5th of November, five days before the second, and nineteen days before the last. Besides; as to the payment of 1592*l.* 2*s.* to the earl of Monmouth, your commissioners find the vouchers signed, and, they believe, writ, by the said earl himself; in which it is expressed, that part of this sum was received from Mr. Row, part from the Dutch paymaster, and the rest from the earl Ranelagh: Now his lordship hath surcharged himself with what was paid by Mr. Row, but not (as he ought to have done) with what was paid by the Dutch paymaster. 6. That, whereas his lordship discharges himself of several sums, paid by warrant to captain Matthew Smith, captain Anthony Power, and captain Henry Davies, and has passed his account for the same, by vouchers under their hands, the said captains Smith and Davies have made positive oaths, that their hands are forged; and your commissioners have reason to suspect, that captain Power's hand is so too; and, as an undeniable evidence of this fact, in what concerns captain Smith it appears to your commissioners, that, after his lordship had made use of the voucher, in order to stop a complaint, which was coming into this house, he made up captain Smith's account, and paid him the balance. 7. That some of his lordship's vouchers for payments are only loose papers, put into warrants, with a name, and nothing more, writ on them. 8. That the payments differ very much, in many particulars, from the establishments: That there are rasures in some warrants, and very extraordinary payments directed in others; of which your commissioners will give you the instances, when you please to require them. 9. That his lordship charges himself, for interest received 916*l.* due intermediately upon tallies, transferred over to sir Joseph Herne: your commissioners find a warrant, signed by the late king, for allowing the earl of Ranelagh this sum, as paid to George Clark, esq. for secret service, together with another sum, paid to Rudolph Kien, of two thousand pounds, without account; and also a privy seal, dated the 18th of June last, for the auditor to allow his lordship the same, upon his accounts: And, upon further enquiry, it appears to your commissioners, that the said sum of 916*l.* (the only interest his lordship brings to account) was never paid, as is pretended, to George Clark, esq. but his name was only used in trust for his lordship, who had the same to his own proper use. 10. That, whereas his lordship discharges himself by payments to colonel Cunningham, and to lieutenant-colonel St. John, each 2,000*l.* your commissioners are not very well satisfied with his lordship's vouchers for the same, and are making further inquiry into that matter; but, in the mean time, they think themselves obliged to acquaint you, that col. Cunningham hath made oath, that he repaid to the earl of Ranelagh 1,500*l.* or thereabouts, in part of the 2,000*l.* which had been imprested to him; and this, your commissioners conceive, his lordship ought to have surcharged himself with.

“To their observations, upon these accounts, your commissioners have only this further to add, that the earl of Ranelagh makes the balance of his account, due to himself, 185,268*l.* 14*s.* 0*d.*

“ The army was cleared to the last of March, 1692; and therefore your commissioners made this the first period of time for their examining the paymasters accounts. They have not been able to proceed much further upon those, which follow, and which seem to be laid before them very confused and imperfect; for, upon the little inspection they have made into them, they observe, his lordship’s discharges are generally by payments of gross sums, upon account: Others by payments to several persons, for several services, and on several occasions, without specifying the services, or occasions. Particularly, he discharges himself, in some instances thus:

Paid to several persons, for especial services, and for sundry disbursements for especial services, relating to the forces - - - - -	£.	s.	d.
Paid to several persons, for contingencies of divers natures - - - - -	50,929	17	3½
To Monsieur Schuylenburg, for several sums advanced by him, for several services relating to the forces - -	76,477	8	0½

“ There are several other very great sums, charged for loss by remittances, and for secret services, without account; but with these, and others of the like nature, your commissioners will not at present trouble you: They only beg leave further to observe, that his lordship has forgot to carry a balance, due from him, of 20,792*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*

And that, in another account, he makes the balance, due to himself - - - - -	£.	s.	d.
But has carried to the following account - - - - -	98,429	13	11
Which, according to his own calculation, is more than it ought to be - - - - -	39,543	1	11

“ As your commissioners, from these, and other the like, instances, see, that these subsequent accounts are as extraordinary, and no less imperfect, than the former; so they have great reason to apprehend, that, when they shall call upon his lordship, to lay others before them, in such a method, as they conceive most necessary, for their due examining and stating of them, it cannot be complied with; because, when they sent two of their own members with a precept to his lordship, to see whether he had kept such a register of his regimental accounts, as he was required to do by a clause in an act, passed in the 4th and 5th of the late king and queen (for punishing officers, and soldiers, who shall mutiny, or desert) and continued, by several other acts, till the 10th of April, 1698, they reported, that there was no such register kept; that neither his lordship, nor those he employed, owned they knew of the clause; but that his lordship desired to know, where it was to be found, and said, he would read it, before he slept. They reported also, that his lordship seemed as ignorant of the like clause, passed in another act of the last session, against mutiny and desertion; and that he has kept no such register in his office.

“ This Narrative, and these Observations your commissioners humbly submit to the consideration of the house.

The Earl of Ranelagh’s Answer to the said Narrative.] On the 30th of November the earl of Ranelagh presented to the House of Commons his Answer to the Narrative, and Objections, of the Commissioners for taking the Public Accounts, relating to his Accounts and the same was read, and is as followeth viz.

The ANSWER of Richard earl of Ranelagh Paymaster General of her Majesty’s Forces &c. To the Narrative, and Objections relating to his Accounts, contained in a Paper, under the hands and seals of the seven Commissioners of Accounts, and by them delivered to this honourable House on Wednesday, the 11th day of this instant November, 1702.

“ The said Paymaster, in the first place returns his humble thanks to this house, for their having ordered him a copy of the said Narrative, &c. and a time to answer it.

“ In the next place, he must say, that I cannot but think myself very unhappy, to fall under so severe animadversions, as are contained in the said Narrative, after his having been 17 years in his office, without any material objection made to his management, either by the six former commissions of accounts, or by any other person whatsoever.

“ In the 3d place, he must observe to the honourable house, that his office of Paymaster is altogether ministerial: that, though, in virtue of it, he hath received vast sums of the public revenue, no less than one-and-twenty millions, and upwards, between the 1st of January, 1685, and this day, yet he hath no power to issue the same, but according to the establishments, regulations of subsistence, and warrants signed by the crown, or according to the directions of the Lord High Treasurer, or Commissioners of the Treasury: that he never receives any money from the Exchequer, but by orders of the Treasury; and most commonly, if not always, the uses, to which the sum, so ordered, is to be applied, are particularly set down and expressed in the same orders.

“ In the 4th place, he must observe, that during the said 17 years of his management he hath had the misfortune to bury three deputy tes, and all other the officers, which he found in his office, when he first entered upon it; by which means his books are not in so good order, as he heartily wishes they were; but, whatever trouble this creates to him, he will use his utmost care, that the public shall not suffer by it.

"In the 5th place, he must observe, that several millions of the aforesaid sum, received by him, were issued and paid out by his deputies in Holland, Flanders, Germany, and the West Indies: that this variety of payments, in so many places, hath, as may easily be believed, begot some confusion in his vouchers; which, howsoever, he doth not doubt to set right, though with great trouble.

"What the said Paymaster hath next to observe, is, that the paper, to which he is to answer, contains, first, a narrative of proceedings between the seven commissioners, and him: secondly, ten observations of theirs upon his accounts, passed, and declared: thirdly, some amendments, not numbered, on his accounts, not yet passed.

"As to the Narrative, the said Paymaster answers, that, pursuant to a letter of theirs, dated the 15th of April last, desiring a true copy of his commission, he sent them his two original patents, under the Great Seal of England; the one, from the late king James; the other, from the late king William.

"He owns, that he received a precept from them, dated the 15th of May last, requiring him to exhibit to them, on Thursday, the 25th of June following, according to the schemes therein prescribed, the balance remaining in his hands on the 5th of Nov. 1688, and accounts of all his receipts, and payments between that time, and the 25th of Dec. 1701.

"He saith, that, in pursuance of his precept, he attended the said commissioners on the day appointed, and then delivered to them a paper, intitled, *A State of the Accounts of Richard earl of Ranelagh, Paymaster-general of her majesty's forces, &c. from the 1st of January, 1685 (on which day he first entered upon the execution of that office) to the last of March, 1692, inclusive, being six years and three months; as also a state of the poundage, deducted by him within the same time: the said paper telling them, that, by that State, they might see, at one view, the whole of his receipts, and payments, within that time; which could not be clear to them by any State, beginning from the 5th of November 1688, as they desired; since the balances of his accounts, preceding that period, would not appear. He likewise told them, that his accounts, for the said six years and three months, were, in number, seven, and were all actually passed, and declared; and that he had a quittance upon each of them: and he then delivered to them true copies of the said seven accounts; as also an abstract of his account, lying before Mr. Auditor Bridges, from the 1st of April, 1692, (being the next day after his last account, declared, ended, as aforesaid) to* the last of September, 1695, inclusive; and an abstract of his account, lying before Mr. Auditor Done, from the 1st of October, 1695, to the 25th of March, 1699, inclusive; each of the said two accounts being for three years and an half, in all, seven years; his receipts, and payments, for that time, being divided into the said two accounts, by order of the then Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, that so both the auditors might proceed to examine, and state, the said two accounts, at one and the same time, for the more speedy dispatch of them. He also then told them, that he was making ready three further accounts, which should contain all his receipts, and payments, from the said 25th of March, 1699, to the 25th of December, 1701, being two years and three quarters: so that, by these twelve accounts, viz. the said seven declared accounts, the said two accounts, lying before the two auditors, and the said three accounts, preparing, they might see all his receipts, and payments, from the 1st of January, 1685, to the 25th of December, 1701, being 16 years; he desiring nothing more, than to lay all his public transactions plainly before them: and at the same time he delivered to them a current account of his receipts, and payments, from the said 25th of December, 1701, to the 24th of June, 1702; he being required so to do by two precepts of theirs: and, on the 29th of June last, he sent them, as they desired, the original parchment duplicates of the said seven declared accounts, which the said Commissioners, however, are pleased to call general abstracts of accounts, with gross items of his payments.

"On the 26th of September last he sent to them the three accounts, which, he told them on the 25th of June, he was making ready; which contained his receipts, and payments, from the said 25th of March, 1699, to the 25th of December, 1701; and which he could not possibly make ready sooner, by reason of the multiplicity of his other public business; particularly, by his being obliged, by act of parliament, to make out all the debentures, payable out of the forfeited lands in Ireland, by the 30th of September last; which was a very tedious, troublesome, and voluminous work; and on the said 26th of September last he likewise sent them a current account of his receipts, and payments, from the 24th of June last, to the 1st of September last: so that he can safely say, he made as much haste, as possibly he could, to comply with their several precepts; and he did then think, that, having thus laid all his accounts before them, they would have applied themselves to examine, and state, such of his accounts, as were not passed, and declared; which were five in number, and contained, as aforesaid, all his receipts, and payments, from the 1st of April, 1692, to the 25th of December last, being nine years and three quarters; his receipts, for that time, amounting [to] 14,798,215*l.* 0*s.* 5*d.* But the said Paymaster soon found, that the Commissioners, instead of proceeding upon his said five accounts, not yet passed, were resolved to lay open and unravel four of his seven accounts, passed, and declared, and upon each of which he had a quietus est; the said four accounts beginning from the 1st of January, 1687, and ending the last of March, 1692; for, on the 27th of June last, being but two days after he had delivered them so many of his accounts, as aforesaid, they sent him a precept, to make up regimental accounts, for the time of the said four accounts, in the same manner, as he was required to do by act of parliament, and had done from the 1st of April, 1692, to the 25th of March, 1699; and the next day, when, by summons he waited on them in their office, they insisted upon this direction: to which the Paymaster answered, that the Act, which required regimental accounts for the time aforesaid, did not look back beyond the 1st of April, 1692: that the reason of its requiring such accounts for that time, was, because the army had not been cleared between the said 1st of April, 1692, and the said 25th of March, 1699; which reason could have no operation in what they now directed, since the army was cleared to the last of March, 1692: that, when he passed the said four accounts before the auditors, he had delivered up all his vouchers, relating to them; which made it almost impracticable for him to comply with their directions: that, though his books might, in some measure, guide his compliance, yet, he could not, in justice to himself, and family, consent to lay open his accounts, upon which he had his quietus est. He likewise told them then, or soon after, that he did not think (with great submission to them) that they had any authority to unravel passed and declared accounts; and that none of the six former Commissions of Accounts had ever pretended to do it.

“ Upon this they required him to send them the original ledgers of his office, from the 1st of January, 1687, to the last of March, 1692; that so they might extract and frame out of them such regimental accounts, as they desired. To this he answered, that he had no distinct ledgers for that particular time: that ledgers were no public books, but only helps to an accountant, to settle accounts with his cashier: that they could neither charge, nor discharge, an accountant, before an auditor; and therefore they were never offered, or accepted, as vouchers: and after many other arguments, of this kind, he told them, that, since it was plain, they required them, in order to ravel into, and lay open, his said four accounts, passed, declared, and upon each of which he had a Quietus est, he could not part with them; neither did he think (with great submission) they had any authority to require them, none of the six former Commissions of Accounts having ever demanded them.

“ On July the 2d they sent one of their number to his office, with a precept, directing the Paymaster, and his deputy and deputies, his clerk, or clerks, belonging to his said office, to permit and assist the said commissioner, and Mr. Cartwright, their army accountant, to inspect the ledgers and journals of the office, which contained the receipts, and payments, from the said 1st of January, 1687, the last of March, 1692: to which precept returned an answer, which the said commissioner writ down; the substance of which was, That he hoped, they would not take it ill, if he did advise with counsel, whether any of the accounts, passed by the auditors, could be laid open by their authority, especially, since the said accounts, before declared, had been demanded before former Commissioners of Accounts. Notwithstanding this answer, they sent another precept to him, dated the very next day, requiring the said books to be laid before them the next morning; and by a letter, dated the day following, being a Saturday, he was summoned to attend them in their office on Monday morning, where and when they repeated their earnestness to have the said ledgers, and still insisted to have time to advise with counsel: upon which they told him, that from that day, they intended to make a retreat for three weeks, or a month; that they hoped he would advise with his counsel in the meantime; and that, if he was advised to deliver the said ledgers, their secretary, Mr. King would be in the way to receive them, and give a receipt for them. To this he answered, he would lose no time in taking advice, nor in delivering his books, if advised thereto. Accordingly, the Wednesday following, he endeavoured to meet with two gentlemen, who he always been his counsel, but found, they were both gone out of town, to attend their elections; where they staid till the beginning of August; on the 4th of which the commissioners being likewise returned, sent him a precept requiring him, on Saturday following, to exhibit his said original ledgers to them, or reasons, in writing, why he refused them, which order they repeated, in their letter of the 10th of that month. On the 19th of that month he sent them a letter which told them, that the reason, they had not sooner heard from him, was, his counsel being out of town: that, though, upon their return, they had both agreed in opinion, that the present commission of accounts gave no authority to lay open any account, passed, or declared, which had been before the former commissions of accounts, nor to demand the ledgers of any accountant (they being no public books) yet, to shew his readiness to give them any satisfaction he could, he had sent them his two original ledgers, from the 1st of January, 1685, to the last of March, 1692; and, that he should have sent them sooner, but he had not thought it reasonable to take such abstracts of them, as might inform him, what they contained, should any misfortune happen to them: which word “ Misfortune,” he solemnly avers, was not used by him, out of any jealousy of the honourable commissioners, but for the sake of their army accountant, who hath most maliciously and scandalously behaved himself towards the said Paymaster for some years past.

“The foregoing particulars, though many, the said Paymaster thinks necessary to lay before this honourable house, that they may be thereby truly informed, from whence the discrepancies and differences have arisen between the commissioners, and him. As to his part, he humbly leaves it to your judgment (to which he will always readily submit) whether he was in the right, to insist, that they have no authority, by their commission, to lay open any account passed, and declared, and which hath heretofore been examined by any of the six former commissions of accounts: but, that it may not be thought, he starts this question, in order to shelter himself against answering the particular objections in their Narrative, he will now hasten to return a particular answer to each of them.

“As to the charge of his four declared accounts, which begin from the 1st of January, 1687, and end the last of March, 1692, the commissioners make it consist of the following particulars:

Balance, due from the Accountant, of the preceding Account - - - -	3,985	13	8½
The Exchequer Charge - - -	3,838,540	18	0¼
What his Lordship voluntarily charges - - - -	64,359	6	3
Interest, received on Tallies, more than what his Lordship brings to Account -	4,344	8	3

“To this the said Paymaster answers, that he makes no objection to the first of the said four sums, being 3,985*l.* 13*s.* 8½*d.* nor to the third of the said sums, being 64,359*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* but to the second, being 3,838,540*l.* 18*s.* 0¼*d.* he objects; and saith, that this sum, by the auditors charge, is but 3,791,080*l.* 0*s.* 8½*d.* which is short of the commissioners said sum by 47,460*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* The reason of which difference is, because the said 47,460*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* though received from the exchequer in January, 1687, yet it was issued to him, to clear the establishment to the last of December, 1687, and he is charged with it in his account then ending; and consequently, he ought not to be charged with it in his account from that day: and the right honourable the lord Hallifax, when he delivered to the commissioners his account of the Paymaster's receipts, between the 1st of January, 1687, and the last of March, 1692, told them, that this was the truth of the fact; and, for a further confirmation of it, the total of the Paymaster's charge, from the exchequer between the 1st of January, 1685, and the end last of March, 1692, agrees to a farthing, with the total, charged by the auditors for that time, which is all taken into his seven declared accounts.

“To the 4th sum he likewise objects, being 4,344*l.* 8*s.* 3*d.* alleged to be received by him for interest on tallies, more than he hath accounted for; because he is positive, he never received that sum, nor any part of it; but the said sum was received by the several persons, to whom these tallies were assigned by him; who had a right to receive them, with all the interest due from the date of them. He further saith (as the Commissioners have very faithfully reported) that his constant course hath been, as it always was in the Pay-Offices of the army and navy, to write his name only upon the back of the orders, without any formal assignment; and that, upon examination, it appears, that when the money, due on such orders, hath been received at the Exchequer, Acquittances have been written over the Paymaster's name, as if he had received both principal and interest. This he hath discovered in several orders, which, in part, make up the said 4,344*l.* 8*s.* 3*d.* and he is in pursuit of the rest. In the mean time he humbly conceives, he ought not to be charged with that sum, in regard that, by a clause in an act, for making good deficiencies, passed in the last parliament, the account of interest, received by paymasters (if any) is to be brought into their final accounts.

“And this is all the said Paymaster hath to offer, in answer to that part of the Commissioners narrative, which relates to the charge of his four declared accounts, from the 1st of January, 1687, to the last of March, 1692.

“As to the discharge of his said four accounts, their Observations, and his Answers to them, are here set down in order, as follows:

First, that all the regiments, troops, and companies, which were in the service of the late king James, and which it is notorious, had many popish Officers and Soldiers in them, and were broke, and dispersed, upon the earl of Feversham's disbanding the army on the 13th of December, 1688, are by warrants upon his lordship's certificates of debentures, paid compleat to several days in January, February March, and April, following.

“To this observation the said Paymaster answers, and agrees, that there were several popish Officers and soldiers, in the regiments, troops, and companies, which were in the service of the late king James: he likewise agrees that several of the said regiments were dismissed by the earl of Feversham on the 13th of December, 1688: but he saith, that the late king, the then Prince of Orange, did the very next day issue a declaration, setting forth, that, he being informed, that divers regiments, troops, and companies, had been encouraged to disperse themselves in an unusual and unwarrantable manner, whereby the public peace was very much disturbed, he had thought fit thereby to require all colonels, and commanders in chief, of regiments, &c. to call together the several Officers, and Soldiers, belonging to their respective regiments, in such places, as they should find most convenient for their rendezvous, and there to keep them in good order and discipline.

“That, in pursuance of this declaration, most (if not all) of the said regiments, so dismissed, did re-unite, and were kept in good order and discipline; and when his late majesty did think fit, soon after, to disband several of the late king James's forces, none of the said disbanded regiments, troops, and companies, were paid compleat, but a deduction was made, for what was due to their popish Officers, according to the method prescribed by his said late majesty; and the same care was taken, in paying the remainder of the late king James's forces, which his late majesty thought fit to continue in his service; none of which were paid compleat (as this observation alledges) there being a deduction made also, for what [was] due to their popish Officers, as by a list of their said deductions will appear: and all the certificates of debentures, made, by the said Paymaster, for the payment of the said forces, contrary to the usual method (of which this observation seems to complain) were so made pursuant to several warrants under his late majesty's hand, positively directing them to be so; as by copies of the said warrants will fully appear, the originals thereof being in the hands of the said Commissioners.

Secondly, that the warrants, for several such payments, bear date, some a year, others two years, after the said regiments, troops, and companies, were disbanded.

“To this the said Paymaster answers, that the private soldiers of a regiment always receive, by way of subsistence, their full pay, except what reserved for their clothing; and the clothing, and subsistence, of the non-commissioned Officers, leaves but a small matter due to them; which, if paid, as generally it is before, or upon, their disbanding, there remains only a debt due to the commissioned Officers; for the payment of which, warrants are seldom, or never, prepared, till there is money ready to pay them; which many times there is not, till a year or two after the disbanding: witness the regiments, disbanded upon the peace at Reswick; where only the subsistence was cleared to the common soldiers, and a bounty-money given them; and non-commissioned Officers being cleared, and a bounty-money given them also (which a small sum effected) the commissioned Officers were left unpaid; and so they are to this hour, there being no warrants to clear them, although it is full five years, since they were disbanded.

Thirdly, that there are several warrants, for paying compleat numbers allowed on the establishment, notwithstanding any defect in, or want of, muster-rolls.

“To this observation the said Paymaster answers, that warrants, for paying the forces, are never prepared by the Paymaster, that hein the work of the Secretary at War; and if warrants are signed, directing the Paymaster to pay compleat, according to the establishment, notwithstanding defects in, or want of, muster-rolls, it is his duty to obey such warrants, and to pay accordingly.

Fourthly, That there is a warrant, dated the 17th of October, 1689, to the auditors of the imprests, to allow his lordship the sum of 172,310*l.* which he had direction from his late majesty to pay to several persons, without deduction. The auditors are not to charge the persons aforesaid with these sums, or any part thereof; his majesty reserving the examination of the particulars to himself, or to such, as shall appoint for that purpose.

“This observation seems to complain of the warrant mentioned therein, and not of the Paymaster; who certainly paid all the sums, contained in the said warrant, upon proper directions, and delivered to the auditor authentic vouchers for the same; and though he may say no more, to justify himself, yet, for the vindication of the warrant, he begs leave to set down here the particular sums, mentioned therein, which, together, make up the sum of 172,340*l.* and the nature thereof. The sums are, as follow:”

“This sum was paid to his lordship on the 22nd of February, 1688, for the use of his majesty's privy purse, by direction, in writing, from the then Lords Commissioners of the Treasury

“This sum was paid to his lordship on the said 22d of February, 1688, and by the like direction, for transporting the late king James's horses, who had desired, they might be sent after him; which his late majesty readily agreed to.”

To Henry Powle esq., Speaker, 1,140*l.*

“One thousand pounds of this sum was paid on the 26th of January, 1688, for his equipage money as Speaker of the then Convention; and the remaining 140*l.* was paid him for his allowance, as such, for 28 days, at the usual rate of 5*l.* a day; the whole being paid by direction, in writing, of the Treasury.”

To Peter Isaac, 6,000*l.*

“This Peter Isaac was steward to his late majesty's house, when prince of Orange; and this sum was paid him, for that use, by the several payments, in the month of January, 1688; all by direction, in writing, from the then Lords Commissioners of the Treasury.”

To Mrs. Anne Van, Golstein, 1,000*l.*

“This gentlewoman was one of the late queen's dressers; and this sum was paid her on the 22nd of Feb. 1688, for her said majesty's service, by an order of his late majesty in the Treasury Chamber.”

To Jacob Vander Esch, esq., 162,500*l.*

“This gentleman, as every body knows, was Paymaster to his late majesty's Dutch forces from the time they first landed in England; and the aforesaid sum was paid to him by the English Paymaster, for their use, at several times, between the 31st of December, 1688, and the 12th of April following, by direction in writing, from the Treasury.

“So that the sums, mentioned in this Warrant, are six in number. The five first (which make together 9,840*l.*) may seem improper to be paid out of the pay-office; but the reason, they were so, was, because there was no privy seal in being, but that of the Paymaster's of the army, when these payments were directed; and no body can think, that any of these five sums were proper to be accounted for but to his late majesty, or such, as he should appoint for that purpose: And as to the 6th sum, being the great sum, paid to Vander Esch, it is well known, that his late majesty would not, for many years after his accession to the crown, suffer his Dutch forces either to be mustered, or paid, but according to their own method; and therefore, not only in this warrant, but in several subsequent warrants, relating to the payment of his said Dutch forces, his said majesty always reserved the said Vander Esch's accounts to his own examination."

Fifthly, That his lordship discharges himself of several sums, paid for levying the lord Mordant's (now earl of Peterborough) and sir John Guise's regiments, although your Commissioners find one, of the articles, in the account, laid before this house, of the charge, the States-General had been at in the revolution, and upon which you paid them 600,000*l.* is for raising the regiments of the lord Mordant, sir Robert Peyton, sir John Guise, and others. And here your Commissioners must observe, that the earl of Levin's regiment is paid from the 5th of November, 1688, the earl of Monmouth's from the 10th, and that of colonel Luttrell's from the 23rd, of the said month, though his late majesty landed in England on the 5th of November, 5 days before the 2d, and 19 before the last. Besides, as to the payment of 1,582*l.* 2*s.* to the earl of Monmouth, your Commissioners find the vouchers signed, and, they believe, writ, by the said earl himself; in which it is expressed, that part of this sum was received from Mr. Row, part from the Dutch Paymaster, and the rest from the earl of Ranelagh: Now his lordship has surcharged himself with what was paid by Mr. Row, but not, as he ought to have done, with what was paid by the Dutch Paymaster.

"To this observation the said Paymaster answers, That he has lately seen an account, laid before the house of Commons on the 14th of March 1688, of the charge, the States General had been at in his late majesty's expedition for England, for which that house paid them 600,000*l.* in which account there was this following article: "Several charges to those, that followed his majesty, and to the forces, that came over, and also to the raising the regiments of the right honourable the lord Mordant, sir Robert Peyton, sir John Guise, and others, 250,000*l.* guilders."

"But the Paymaster never yet heard, nor indeed was it any ways material for him to enquire, what part of that sum was paid to the three colonels, mentioned in that article, for raising their regiments. Sure he is, that what he charges, as paid for levy money to the said three colonels, was a very inconsiderable sum; and not sufficient according to the lowest allowance, to raise three companies; for what he charges in his 16 months account, ending the last of April, 1689, to which this observation refers, is in all but 300*l.* viz. 100*l.* to my lord Monmouth, 100*l.* to sir John Guise, and 100*l.* to colonel Francis Luttrell; and his late majesty's warrant, which directs the allowance of these three sums, saith, that he was graciously pleased to allow the said three colonels the said 100*l.* each, as levy money, for completing their respective regiments: So that nothing is charged by the Paymaster, for raising the said three regiments. And as to that part of this observation, which saith, that my lord Levin's regiment is paid from the 5th of November, 1688, the earl of Monmouth's from the 10th, and that of colonel Luttrell's from the 23rd, of the said month; the Paymaster answers, that he was positively directed, by warrant under his late majesty's hand, to compute the said three regiments from these respective days, as by the said warrant will appear. And as to the objection, which closes this 5th observation, viz. That the Paymaster ought to have surcharged himself with what the Dutch Paymaster paid my lord Monmouth in part of the 1,582*l.* 2*s.* as well as he hath surcharged himself with what paid by Mr. Row, in part of that sum; the Paymaster answers, that he cannot imagine, how the Dutch Paymaster's name came to be mentioned in the said earl's acquittance; nor can the said earl (who has been spoke to in this matter) recollect, how he came to mention him therein: Besides, it appears by a certificate, hereunto annexed, under the hand of Mr. Sobinus, who was deputy to the Dutch Paymaster from the 5th of Nov. 1688, that the said Paymaster never paid my lord Monmouth any money whatsoever, for his regiment, between the said 10th November, 1688, and the last of April, 1689."

Sixthly, That, whereas his lordship discharges himself of several sums, paid by warrant to captain Matthew Smith, capt. Andrew Power, and captain Henry Davis, and hath passed his account for the same, by vouchers under their hands, the said captains Smith and Davis have made positive oaths, that their hands are forged; and your Commissioners have some reason to suspect, that captain Power's hand is so too; and, as an undeniable evidence of this fact, in what concerns captain Smith, it appears to your Commissioners, that, after his lordship had made use of the voucher, in order to stop a complaint, which was coming into this house, he made up captain Smith's account, and paid him the balance.

"To this observation the Paymaster answers, That there was a warrant, signed by his late majesty, dated the 28th of February 1688, directing him to pay to the aforesaid three captains, for the pay of themselves, and the three independent companies under their command, from the several days in October, November, and December, 1688, on which they were first mustered, to the time of their disbanding (which was on or about the 7th of January, 1688) the sums following; viz.

To captain Matth. Smith	237	13	2
To captain Anth. Power	221	15	8
To captain Henry Davis	253	7	4

“That the said sum of 712*l.* 16*s.* 2*d.* is charged, as paid to the said three captains, according to their respective proportions aforesaid, in his account for 16 months, which ended the last of April, 1689: That the said sum, so charged, was vouched by the original warrant of his late majesty upon the back of which the said three captains names were endorsed: That the said 16 months account has been passed, and declared, many years since, and none of the said three captains ever complained, or pretended to say that their names, endorsed upon the said warrant, were not their own hand-writing, till those, who had been employed by the Paymaster in the management of the business of his office, in the years 1688, 1689, and 1690, were all dead, but who, when living, were known to be men of undoubted integrity; and therefore it cannot be presumed, either in justice, or reason, that such men, through whose hands this warrant passed to the auditor, could be guilty of counterfeiting names upon the back of it. Besides, it is to be observed, that capt. Anth. Power, one of the said three captains, never made any complaint, that his name was counterfeited, or that there was any one farthing unpaid of the 221*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.* charged to his account; and that, when capt. Matthew Smith, another of the said three captains, did pretend, in the year 1695, that his name was counterfeited and that he had not received the full of the said 237*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* charged to his account he then claimed but 50*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.* as unpaid of that sum: which 50*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.* the said Paymaster's deputy, Mr. Mordecai Abbot (being tired with his clamorous importunity) paid him out of the said Paymaster's private money; telling him, when he did so, that he thought it was better for his service, to give that sum, than to have his name brought into the House of Commons, with a complaint from so scandalous a man, as captain Smith; who, upon receiving that sum from the said Mr. Abbot, gave this following acquittance, ready to be produced:

“Received from the right honorable Richard earl of Ranelagh the sum of 50*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.* being the balance of a warrant, for my independent company's pay, dated the 28th of Feb. 1688; his lordship having formerly paid it in his own wrong, without my acquittance, or my Aenge's, but upon an acquittance, to which my name was set, but was not my hand-writing; whereby both his lordship, and I, have been abused. Witness my hand this 25th of March 1658.
M. SMYTHE.”

“This is the truth, as to captain Smith; who certainly confirms the ill character he has in the world, by his complaining of, and swearing against, the Pay-office, after he had been so well used there. As to captain Henry Davis, the third of the said three captains, and one of the two late swearers, his case is as follows: he, being made a captain of an independent company in October, 1688, did, by a letter of attorney, in the usual form, dated the 17th of that month, constitute one Mr. Roderick Mackenzie his agent; which letter of attorney is entered at large in a book of the Pay-office; and when the said captain did, about two years since, pretend, that his name, on the back of the said warrant, was counterfeited, and that some part of the said 253*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.* directed for him by the said warrant, was still unpaid, and due to him, he was shewn the entry of his said letter of attorney, and the original receipt, signed by his said agent, Mr. Roderick Mackenzie for the said full sum of 253*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.* and at the time there was a gentleman present, who has been his lieutenant, who very well knew the said Mr. Mackenzie, was acquainted with his hand, and declared, before the said captain Davis, and several others in the office, that he verily believed the body of the acquittance, and name were Mr. Mackenzie's own writing; to which the said captain then made no objection. This being the matter of fact, which your Commissioners might have known, had they been pleased to have heard the Paymaster upon this observation, before they made it, he must not humbly desire this house to consider, of what fatal consequence it may be to the public, if men be allowed to swear themselves into a claim of money, by denying their hands to vouchers, delivered by an accountant to his auditor 12 or 13 years ago, and for which he has a legal discharge; and how improbable, & rather incredible it is that an office, which, during the said Paymaster's management, has received and paid more than one-and-twenty millions, without any reflections upon it, should be guilty of the forgery pretended, for so considerable a sum as 50*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.* To which he has this only further to add, that it is neither just nor reasonable to asperse any principal officer for miscarriages, supposed to be committed (nor indeed, though actually committed by any of his inferior officers; since it cannot be presumed that any principal officer can be always inspecting their proceedings, nor can any Paymaster pretend to judge of the variety of hands, which go through his office.”

Seventhly, That some of his lordship's vouchers for payments, are only loose papers put into warrants, with a name and nothing more, writ on them.

“To this observation the Paymaster answers That such as are acquainted with business of this nature, know it to be no unusual thing; and the only signing the back of a warrant, or writing a name on a loose paper, to put into a warrant, by a person who is empowered to receive the money, has always been esteemed a good voucher, and allowed as such.”

Eighthly, That the payments differ very much, in many particulars, from the establishment: That there are rasures in some warrants and very extraordinary payments directed in others; of which your Commissioners will give you the instances, when you please to require them.

“ To this observation the Paymaster answers, That no doubt in some cases he has made payments which differ very much from the establishment; which ought not to be reckoned as a fault in him, when it is visible that the said difference is occasioned by warrants; for, though he is obliged strictly to pursue the establishment, where no warrant interposes; yet, where warrants direct him otherwise, he is obliged to obey the warrant; since, [as] one establishment supercedes another in the whole, so a warrant, signed by the same authority, supercedes any establishment in part, and hath ever been accounted, for what it contains, as authentic as the establishment itself: and where there are warrants, which direct very extraordinary payments, the Paymaster is not to be blamed: since he has nothing to do, either with preparing or procuring those warrants. And as to the rasures, which, this observation says, are in some warrants, the Paymaster knows nothing of it; and he dares aver, that, if any such be, they were made before they came to his office; and do not, in any material matter, alter the intention of the warrant; for then he should have taken notice of them so far, as not to make any payment upon them.”

Ninthly, That his lordship charges himself, for interest received, 916*l.* due intermediately upon tallies, transferred over to sir Joseph Bense: Your Commissioners find a warrant, signed by the late king, for allowing the earl of Ranelagh this sum, as paid to George Clark, esq. for secret service, together with another sum, paid to Rudolph Kein, of 2,000*l.* without account; and also a privy seal, dated the 18th of June last, for the auditor to allow his lordship the same, upon his account: and, upon further enquiries, it appears to your Commissioners, that the said sum of 916*l.* (the only interest his lordship brings to account) was never paid, as is pretended, to George Clark, esq. but his name was only used in trust for his lordship, who had the same to his own proper use.

“ To this observation the Paymaster answers, That he freely owns whatsoever is said in it, relating to the 916*l.* particularly, that the said sum was granted by his late majesty to George Clark, esq. in trust for him: he further saith, that the warrant, granting this sum, was dated the 4th day of March, 1692, and countersigned by the then lords of the treasury: That his petition, desiring it, was publicly read in the Treasury Chamber; and the consideration, upon which he desired it, was the great loss he had suffered by the late war in Ireland; having had his two castles of Athlone and Roscommon utterly destroyed, his mansion house in Dublin pulled down, and upwards of 12,000*l.* of his rents in that kingdom entirely lost. And as to the 2,000*l.* mentioned in this observation, as paid to Mr. Rudolph Kein without account; he saith, it was for his late majesty's own private use; that he, the said Paymaster, never saw one shilling of it; and that the warrant, which allowed him the payment of this sum in his account, was dated the 8th of February, 1692, and countersigned by the then lords of the treasury, who well knew, that his said late majesty had then a pressing occasion for that sum.”

Tenthly, That whereas his lordship discharges himself by payments to colonel Cunningham, and to lieutenant-colonel St. John, each 2,000*l.* your Commissioners are not very well satisfied with his lordship's vouchers for the same, and are making further enquiry into that matter; but, in the mean time, they think themselves obliged to acquaint you, that colonel Cunningham has made oath, that he repaid to the said earl of Ranelagh 1,500*l.* or thereabouts, in part of the 2,000*l.* which had been imprested to him; and this, your Commissioners conceive, his lordship ought to have surcharged himself with.

“ To this observation the Paymaster answers, That, pursuant to two warrants, signed by his [late] majesty, and countersigned by the then lords of the treasury, the one dated the 14th of March, 1688, and the other, the 10th of April, 1689, he paid to colonel John Cunningham, and lieutenant-colonel Thomas St. John, 2,000*l.* each, without account, he being directed by the said warrant so to do; that their receipts for those sums are indorsed on the back of the said warrants, and are passed and allowed to him, in his 16 months account, ending the last of April, 1689, which has been passed and declared many years since; and therefore he cannot well understand, what the Commissioners mean, by saying, they are not very well satisfied with his vouchers, and that they are making further enquiry into that matter: and as to their saying, that colonel Cunningham has made oath, that he repaid the said Paymaster 1,500*l.* or thereabouts, in part of the said 2,000*l.* the Paymaster answers, That, though, in the paying out more than one-and-twenty millions of money, he has paid many and great sums to several persons, without account, yet he never knew any one of those, who received it so, return any one farthing of it again: and he further says, That colonel Cunningham's oath (who has been for many years in great distress and want, and is still a prisoner for debt) is not to be regarded; for certainly, if he had repaid the sum pretended, he would have produced the said Paymaster's acquittance for that sum; it being altogether incredible, that such a sum as 1,500*l.* or thereabouts, should be paid by any one man living to another, without a receipt for it.

“ And now the Paymaster, having thus humbly offered to this honourable house, his answers to the ten Observations of the Commissioners of Accounts, must beg leave to observe to you, That all the said ten Observations relate to four of his seven accounts, which are passed and declared, and upon each of which he has a Quietus est; and therefore, with great submission, he is humbly of opinion, that the said Commissioners had no authority to unravel them, for the reasons which he shall humbly offer to your consideration and judgment at the end of this paper: In the mean time he will apply himself to answer that part of the Commissioners' Narrative, which, though not numbered, follows the said ten observations."

The first paragraph is, That to their said observations they have only this further to add, That the earl of Ranelagh makes a balance, due to himself, of 185,268*l.* 14*s.* 0*d.*

"To this short paragraph, which seems to imply, as if the Paymaster was rich enough to credit the government with so great a sum, the Paymaster answers, That at the foot of his last declared account, which ended the 31st of March, 1692, there is written, 'And then the said account will be in surpluse 185,268*l.* 14*s.*' which, in the language of an auditor, is saying, that the payments, in that account declared, do exceed the sum received within the time of that account, so much; and it is the auditor who always makes the balance, and not the accountant: and when the payments in any declared account do exceed the receipts, it is well known that those payments have been made with public money, received after the period of time which ends the said declared account; and no accountant is one penny the richer for being in surpluse, nor one farthing the poorer, for having a balance due from him, except it be his last and final account; for, in the first case, he makes his surpluse part of his discharge in his next succeeding account; and, in the other case, he makes the balance due from him part of his charge: and, for proof of this, the Paymaster needs only to observe, that, though that great sum of 185,268*l.* 14*s.* was his surpluse on the last of March, 1692; yet, in his next succeeding account, which is now under the examination of Mr. Auditor Bridges, he is debtor, as far as yet appears, somewhat above 20,000*l.* And to this he must add, (though with grief he says it) that he was never yet in a condition to lend money, his folly having always led him to spend his income."

The next paragraph saith, That the army was cleared to the last of March, 1692; and therefore they made this the first period of time for examining the Paymaster's accounts: That they have not been able to proceed much further upon those which follow, and which seem to be laid before them very confused and imperfect; and, upon the little inspection they have made into them, they observe, the Paymaster's discharges are generally by payments of gross sums, upon account; others, by payments to several persons for services, and on several occasions, without specifying the services or occasions: Particularly, he discharges himself, in some instances, thus:

Paid several persons, for Contingencies of divers natures	50,929	17	3
To M. Schuylenburg, for several sums advanced by him, for several services relating to the Forces - - -	76,477	8	0

"To this paragraph the Paymaster answers That the words, 'very confused and imperfect' are not commonly applied to accounts, till the said accounts have been thoroughly examined which, the Commissioners are pleased to say they have not yet been able to do: That the army has not been cleared between the 1st of April, 1692 (to which day they are cleared) and the 25th of March, 1699, is certain; and therefore, whatsoever hath been paid them within that period of time (being seven years) was paid them upon account, and must consequently be charged, as so paid, in the Paymaster's accounts. And as to the three instances given that the Paymaster charges payments to several persons, and on several occasions, without specifying the services, or occasions; the said Paymaster answers, That the first sum instance being 27,150*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* is an article in his account, which begins from the 1st of October 1695, and ends the 25th of March, 1699, now under the examination of Mr. Auditor Dowd of which he delivered an abstract to the Commissioners on the 25th of June last; and though, in that abstract, this sum is mentioned only in general, to avoid perplexity, yet in the account, delivered to the said Auditor in December 1701, the particulars, making up that sum are enumerated, being about seventy in number.

"That the two sums instanced, being 50,929*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* and 76,477*l.* 8*s.* 0*d.* are contained in his account, which begins the 1st of April 1692, and the last of September, 1695, now under the examination of Mr. Auditor Bridges of which he also delivered an abstract to the Commissioners on the said 25th of June last and though, in that abstract, the said two sums are only mentioned in general, to avoid perplexity, yet in the account itself, delivered to the said auditor in November, 1701, the particulars, making up those two sums, are enumerated, being 210 in number, or thereabouts.

"And the Paymaster further saith, that the Commissioners have not only an abstract before them, of his accounts, delivered by him as aforesaid, to Mr. Auditor Bridges, but they have also had, for some months past, the original account itself, they having sent to the Auditor for it; by which they may be easily satisfied of what is here averred."

The third paragraph, which speaks particularly, is, That the Paymaster has forgot to carry a balance, due from him, of 20,792*l.* 7*l.* 1*d.* and that in another account he makes the balance due to himself, 58,886*l.* 12*s.* but has carried to the following account 98,429*l.* 13*s.* 11*d.* which, according to his own calculation, is more, than it ought to be, 39,543*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*

"To this paragraph the said Paymaster answers, first in general, That no accountant can ascertain the balance of any account, whilst it is under examination, since it is the Auditor, as before hath been observed, who alone settles the balance, due either to, or from, the accountant; and it is a justice, which hath been always shewn to an accountant, to leave his account open, for some time after the delivery of it to an Auditor (especially when the account is for great sums, and for a long period of time) that so the accountant may have time, and liberty, to add any articles, omitted in the first delivery, either to his charge, or discharge.

"He further saith, That he never yet knew an auditor forget to carry the balance, due at the first of one account, to the charge of the next succeeding account; nor did any Auditor, as he hath heard, ever allow a balance due to an accountant, beyond what his discharge, well watched, made it. And the Paymaster, having said this in general, hastens to answer the particular instances in this paragraph.

"In order to which, he must first humbly acquaint this honourable house, that he hath delivered to the said Commissioners five accounts of his receipts, and payments, from the 1st of April, 1692 (to which day his seven declared accounts go on) to the 25th of December 1701, none of which are yet passed, and declared; the two first of them depending before the two auditors, as before hath been said, and the three last not being yet delivered them, by reason they cannot properly take them into their examination, till the said two first are ready for declaration; and the said three last accounts were framed pursuant to the Commissioners precepts, and for their present satisfaction, in order to shew them the state of his receipts, and payments, from the 25th of March, 1699, to Christmas, 1701; which, as far as the said Paymaster can compute, will very near balance each the other: And he further saith, that the balance, due from him, of 20,792*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* (which, this paragraph saith, he hath forgot to carry to his next succeeding account) relates to the first of the said five accounts; that the balance, due to him, of 58,886*l.* 12*s.* relates to the second of the said five accounts; and the increase of that balance, from 58,886*l.* 12*s.* to 98,429*l.* 13*s.* 11*d.* (which, this paragraph saith, is an addition to it of 39,543*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* according to his own calculation) relates to the third of the said five accounts: To all which he answers, that, when he delivered his second account to Mr. Auditor Done, in Dec., 1701, he then delivered to him an abstract of it, at the bottom of which there was a memorandum, acquainting him, that he had other articles to add to the discharge of that account, which were not then ascertained, but which he hath since added, and make his discharge, upon the second account, not only sufficient to answer the charge of it, but also to clear the said 20,792*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* (said to be forgot, as aforesaid) and still to leave a balance, due to him, of 98,429*l.* 13*s.* 11*d.* which therefore is carried to the discharge of his third account. And this whole matter was fully explained to the Commissioners, before they delivered in their narrative to this honourable house, by a letter, which the said Paymaster writ to them, and of which he hath a copy ready to produce."

In the 4th and last paragraph, the Commissioners are pleased to say, That, as they see, from these, and other the like, instances, that the Paymaster's subsequent accounts are as extraordinary, and no less imperfect, than the former; so they have great reason to apprehend, that, when they shall call upon him, to lay others before them, in such a method, as they conceive most necessary, for their due examining and stating of them, it cannot be complied with; because, when they sent two of their own members with a precept to him, to see, whether he had kept such a register of his regimental accounts, as he was required to do by a clause in an act, passed in the 4th and 5th of the late king and queen (for punishing officers, and soldiers, who shall mutiny, or desert) and continued, by several other acts, till the 10th of April, 1698, they reported, that there was no such register kept; that neither he, nor these he employed, owned, they knew of the clause; but that he desired to know, where it was to be found, and said, he would read it, before he slept: They reported also, that he seemed ignorant of the like clause, passed in another act of the last session, against mutiny and desertion; and that he had kept no such register in his office.

"To this paragraph he answers, That a precept was brought him, to his office, dated the 13th of October last, by two of the Commissioners of Accounts; by which he was required to permit the said two Commissioners to inspect such offices, books, and papers, as they should think fit. Upon sight of this precept, the Paymaster assured them of his readiness to comply with it. Upon this they asked him, whether he had kept a register of his regimental accounts, as he was required to do by a clause in an act, passed in the 4th and 5th of the late king and queen (for punishing mutiny and desertion) and continued, by several other acts, to the 10th of April, 1698. To this he answered, That, pursuant to the clause aforesaid, he had, with great labour and pains, made up all the said regimental accounts, belonging to his office, from the 1st of April, 1694, to the 25th of March, 1699; that he had given out the said regimental accounts, so made up, to the several colonels, or their agents; and that, before he did so, he had caused them all to be fairly entered, or registered, in large books, prepared for that purpose. Whereupon they desired to see those books, which were immediately laid before them; and after they had inspected them some time, and taken notice, how fairly they were entered, they told him, that he was obliged, by the clause aforesaid, to attest, under his own hand, or that of his deputies, that each regimental account, so entered, was a true account. To this the Paymaster answered, that he, or his deputy, had signed all the original accounts, delivered, as aforesaid, to the several colonels, or their agents; and that, having done so, he thought, there was very little need of signing the copies of them, entered in those books: And when they replied to this, that the aforesaid clause required such signing, he told them, that he had not read that clause of a long time, but that he would read it, before he slept; and that he thought, he had fully complied with the intention of it, by signing the original accounts, given out to the colonels, or agents; and, if it were thought necessary, he would have the several entries of them signed by such of his clerks, as had both entered, and examined them; adding, that, though he entered all his letters of business in books, yet he never thought it necessary to attest, or sign, those entries. After this they asked him, whether he had made up such regimental accounts, pursuant to the like clauses, passed in another act, of the last session, against mutiny and desertion: To which he answered, That he had not as yet much minded that clause, thinking, there was no great need of it, since the forces, under his care, were now paid regularly, as soon as the rolls for any muster were brought into his office; and that, though the letter of this last clause had not been, as yet, exactly complied with, yet he had the vouchers and warrants, belonging to each regiment, from Christmas last, ready to shew them, though that last clause was to take effect only from the 1st of March last.

"This is a true Narrative of what passed between the said two Commissioners, and him, on the day aforesaid; and therefore the Paymaster cannot but wonder, that this paragraph should so positively suggest, that he had kept no register of the regimental accounts, required by the aforesaid first clause, and that even he had forgot, there was such a clause: though he can safely say, that it cost him very near two years constant trouble, in making up, and entering, the said accounts; which were made up with that exactness, that the five commissioners of accounts have grounded all their certificates for Debentures upon them; and as to the last clause, now in being, he hath since punctually complied ever, with the very letter of it, from Christmas last.

"These are the Answers, which the said Paymaster humbly offers to all the material observations, contained in the narrative of the Commissioners of Accounts; to which he begs leave now to add the reasons, why he hath, and still doth insist, that the said Commissioners have no authority to ravel into, or lay open, any of his accounts, passed and declared, upon which he hath his quietus est in due form of law, and which have been heretofore under the examination of any of the former Commissioners of Accounts.

"The first act, appointing Commissioners of Accounts, passed in the 2d year of the late king and queen: The Commissioners, thereby appointed, had a general power and authority to examine all accounts of public money, between the 5th day of November, 1688, and the 25th of January, 1691: Which act was revived to the 25th of April, 1693, by the last clause in the act, granting a quarterly poll to their majesty's, in the 3d year of their reign.

"The next act, appointing Commissioners of Accounts, passed in the 4th and 5th years of their said late majesty's reign. The public sentiment, thinking, that it was no ways reasonable to give such persons, as had delivered in their accounts to the Commissioners, appointed by the said first-recited act, the trouble of accounting over again, for the same matters, before the Commissioners appointed by this act, did not give them a general power, as in the first act, but confined and limited their power, to take accounts of all monies, issued between the said 5th of November, 1688, and the 24th of April, 1694, not accounted for by virtue, or in pursuance, of the said first-recited act, or the last clause, touching public accounts, enacted in the aforesaid act, granting a quarterly poll.

"And the powers of the Commissioners of Accounts, appointed by an act, made in the 5th and 6th years of their said late majesty's reign, and of those appointed by another Act, made in the 6th and 7th years of his said late majesty's reign, and of those appointed by another act, made in the 7th and 8th years of his said late majesty's reign, are all, for the same reason limited and confined to the taking the accounts of the public money, not accounted for by virtue, or in pursuance, of any of the former acts, and therefore the respective Commissioners, in the said acts named, did never require an account of any money from any Paymaster, or account of which had been laid before any former Commissioners.

"And since the power of the present Commissioners is given them in the very same word in the late act, as was given to the respective Commissioners in the said former acts; viz. To take accounts of all public monies, due or payable on the 5th day of November, 1688, or any time between the said 5th day of November, 1688, and the 25th day of March, 1701, not accounted for by virtue, or in pursuance, of the said former acts, or any of them; and that the public money, paid to the Paymaster of the forces, between the said 5th of November 1688, and the said last day of March, 1691, hath been accounted for by the said Paymaster to former Commissioners of Accounts, by virtue and in pursuance, of the said former acts; the said Paymaster did, and still doth, humbly conceive, that the present Commissioners had no power to require an account of the same from him, much less to ravel into, and lay open, the said four accounts, passed and declared, from the 1st of January, 1687, to the said last of March, 1692, upon which their ten observations, and the additional clause to them, are entirely grounded.

“ And the said Paymaster must further add, That in the first act, appointing Commissioners of Accounts, which passed, as before hath been said, in the 3d year of their late majesty's reign, there is a clause, which saith, ‘ Provided always, and it is the true intent and meaning of this present act, that all accountants to their majesties, of all such sums or sums of money, so by them received, and issued, or to be received and issued, as aforesaid, shall render and make their respective accounts, in their majesties Court of Exchequer, according to the usual course of the said Court; any thing contained in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.’ Which clause is revived in all the three succeeding acts, and in the present act:— And that, though this clause was certainly intended for the ease and quiet of accountants, yet it will prove altogether useless to them, if their accounts, when passed, and declared, according to the direction of this clause, shall be laid open, and unravelled.

“ All which the said Paymaster humbly submits to the judgment of this honourable house.
Nov. 30, 1702. RANELAGH.”

On the 5th of December, the house resolved, That it appears to this house, that the Paymaster-general of the army has given great and unnecessary delays, in his proceedings before the Commissioners, for taking, examining, and stating, the Public Accounts of the kingdom. That this house will, to-morrow morning, proceed to receive the proofs of the Commissioners of Accounts to the several articles of their Narrative, or representation, and of the Earl of Ranelagh's Answer also to the same.”

Resolutions against the Earl.] On the 7th of December, the house proceeded to receive the Proofs of the Commissioners of Accounts to the remaining Articles in their Narrative or Representation, and of the Answer of the earl of Ranelagh also to the same.

And the remaining Articles of the said Commissioners were severally read, and the earl of Ranelagh's Answer to them; and the Commissioners, and the earl of Ranelagh, were heard thereunto.

Resolved, nem. con. 1. “ That it appears to this house, that the Seven Commissioners, appointed by Act of Parliament, for taking, examining, and stating, the public Accounts of the kingdom, have had very good grounds for making their Observations in their Narrative, or Representation, laid before this house. 2. That all monies, issued to the Paymaster-general of the army, ought to be applied to the use of the army and forces only, and to no other use or purpose whatsoever. 3. That all privy seals, Orders of the Treasury, or other Warrants, to the Paymaster-general of the army, to apply the money, in his hands, to other, than the use of the army and forces, are illegal and void. 4.

That all privy seals, or warrants, to the auditors of the Imprest, to pass accounts, without proper vouchers, or to make any allowances, other than according to the law and course of the Exchequer, are illegal, and void. 5. That the Seven Commissioners, for taking, examining, and stating, the Public Accounts of the Kingdom, have made good the allegations in their Narrative, or representation, laid before this house.”

Resolved, “ That it, appears to this house, that the Earl of Ranelagh, Paymaster-general of the Army, hath misapplied several sums of the public money.”

“ The earl had been Paymaster of the Army in king James's time; and being very fit for the post, he had been continued all the last reign: he had lived high, and so it was believed, his appointments could not support so great an expence: He had an account of one and twenty millions lay upon him. It was given out, that a great deal of the money, lodged in his office, for the pay of the army, was diverted to other uses, distributed among favourites, or given to corrupt members of parliament; and that some millions had been sent over to Holland: it had been often said that great discoveries would be made, whensoever his accounts were looked into: and that he, to save himself, would lay open the ill practices of the former reign. But now, when all was brought under a strict examination, a few inconsiderable articles of some hundreds of pounds, was all that could be found to be objected to him; and, even to these he gave clear and full answers. At last they found, that, upon the breaking of a regiment, a sum, which he had issued out for its pay, had been returned to his office, the regiment being broke sooner than that pay was exhausted. And that no entry of this was made in his accounts. To this he answered, that his officer, who received the money, was, within three days after, taken so ill of a confirmed stone, that he never came again to the office, but died in great misery; And, during those three days, he had not entered that sum in the books. Lord Ranelagh acknowledged, that he was liable to account for all the money that was received by his under-officers; but here was no crime or fraud designed; yet this was so aggravated, that he saw his good post was his greatest guilt: He therefore quitted his place, which being divided, Mr. Howe was appointed pay-master of the guards and garrisons at home, as being the more lasting post; and sir Stephen Fox, pay-master of the forces beyond sea. Upon this, all the clamour raised against the earl of Ranelagh ceased; however, the Commons vindicated the report of the commissioners by a vote, and, to make a shew of severity, expelled the earl the house, on the 7th of February, ‘ for a high crime and misdemeanor, in misapplying several sums of the public money.’ But, upon all this canvassing, he appeared much more innocent than even his friends had believed him.” Tindal.

The Earl of Ranelagh expelled.] On the 1st of February, the House resolved, That Richard earl of Ranelagh, late paymaster of the forces, is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor, in misapplying several sums of the public money. 2. That Richard earl of Ranelagh, for his said offences, be expelled this house.

Proceedings of the Commons against Lord Halifax.] On the 18th of January, Mr. St. John, from the Commissioners of the Public Accounts, presented to the House of Commons a general state of Receipt and Issues of the public revenue, between the feast of St. Michael, 1700, 1701, and 1702, with observations thereupon. This having been taken into consideration the following days, and, Mr. Bridges, one of the commissioners, having, on the 25th, presented to the house an account of both the loans and payments on the votes of that house, in February 1700, and of the produce of 25 per cent. on French goods, and the application of the same, it was then resolved,

“That the borrowing of money, and striking tallies with interest unnecessary, before the public occasions required the same, had been one reason of the great debt, which lay upon the nation: and that the applying of the public money to the use of the civil list, which was otherwise provided for, was another cause of that great debt.”

The next day, colonel Bierley, from the Commissioners, presented to the house their Report, pursuant to an order of the house, by which they were directed to examine the auditor and other officers of the exchequer, relating to the passing of the accounts of the public money, and to lay before the House what they should find to be the cause, that the accounts were not annually and duly passed, according to the laws in that case, and through whose default it had happened. This report, and several paragraphs of the Commissioners observations, being read, the house resolved,

“1. That Charles lord Halifax, auditor of the receipt of the exchequer, had neglected his duty, and was guilty of a breach of trust, in not transmitting the imprest rolls half-yearly to the king's remembrancer, according to the act made in the session of parliament, held in the 8th and 9th years of his late majesty's reign, intitled, “An act for the better observation of the course anciently used in the receipt of exchequer.” 2. That the allowing accountants the charges of law-suits, to determine the right of their officers, was a misapplication of the public money. 3. That the auditors of the imprest had been guilty of a great neglect of their duty, in not certifying to the king's remembrancer the neglect of the several annual accounts, that the process might go out against them. And, 4. that there had been a general mismanagement of the public money, by not obliging accountants to make up their accounts, and by continuing receivers in several counties, contrary to law, who had neglected to make up their accounts in due time, which had been a great abuse of the public, and another cause of the great debt that lay upon the nation.”

“On the 27th, the Commons, having proceeded in the further consideration of the observation of the Commissioners of Public Accounts, resolved, 1. “That the money, imputed out of the exchequer for the service of the public, ought to be kept by the respective officers in their own custody, until the same shall be paid to the uses, for which it was directed. That Charles lord Halifax, auditor of the receipt of exchequer, had been guilty of a breach of trust, in not examining, every three months the tellers vouchers for the payments upon annuities, which he allowed in his weekly certificates, according to the forementioned act of parliament. 3. That the resolutions relating to the lord Halifax be laid before her majesty. And, 4. That an Address be presented to her majesty, that she would be pleased to give directions to the attorney-general to prosecute him for the said offences.” On the 7th of February, colonel Granville acquainted the house that the queen had been pleased to say, “That she would send to the attorney-general, and give him her directions pursuant to this Address.

Lord Halifax cleared by the Lords.] On the other hand, the Lords, before whom Mr. Gregory King, secretary to the Commissioners of Accounts, had, on the 15th of January, laid an Account of the general state of the receipts and issues of the public revenue, from the feast of St. Michael 1700, to the same feast in 1701, with their observations thereupon, ordered, the 1st of February, that the Commissioners of Accounts should lay before their lordships what further observations they had made in relation to the said accounts. The next day the lord took the book of public accounts into consideration, and read the first paragraph of the commissioners observations; which relating to lord Halifax his lordship was heard there. Then Mr. King delivered at the bar the Commissioners of Accounts farther observations, and at the same time the queen's remembrancer laid before their lordships the imprest-rolls transmitted to him since November 1699. This being done, a committee was appointed to consider of the observations delivered first to their lordships from the Commissioners of Accounts, and it was ordered, “That the queen's remembrancer should, the next day, bring before the said committee the imprest-rolls transmitted to him since the 20th of April 1697, being the time from which the act commenced: And secondly That the Commissioners for Public Accounts should have notice, that their lordships had appointed a committee to consider of their observations. On the 3d of February, Mr. Baker, deputy to her majesty's remembrancer brought the other imprest-rolls, as ordered the day before; which were delivered to the committee, and the duke of Somerset reported for the said committee, that they had taken their first observation into consideration, in relation to the auditor of the exchequer: That, that the Commissioners of Accounts had notice of the committee's sitting, yet none of them attended; and therefore the committee was of opinion, that a message be sent to the House of Commons, that they might have leave to attend; which message was, on the 4th of February, sent accordingly.

On the 5th, the Commons, having taken the said message into consideration, appointed a committee to inspect the journals, and to search precedents relating to what had been done upon the Lords desiring members of the House of Commons to attend the house of Lords, and in relation to the Lords inspecting and examining accounts. And the same day the duke of Somerset made the following report:

"The committee appointed to consider of the observations in the book of accounts delivered into this House, have made some progress in considering the said observations, and take leave to acquaint this House, that they have examined into the first of these observations; and also the further observations delivered into this House, the 2nd instant, relating to the transmitting the ordinary imprest rolls to the queen's remembrancer. They have inspected several of the original imprest-rolls delivered into the house by Mr. Barker, deputy to her majesty's remembrancer. They also examined divers officers of the Exchequer, and others, upon oath, and do find, that, by the ancient and uninterrupted course of the Exchequer, two imprest-rolls are to be made out for each year; the one comprehending all such sums received from the end of Trinity-term to the end of Hilary-term; the other containing all such sums from that time to the end of Trinity-term; which rolls are commonly called half yearly rolls, though improperly. They find, that, by the ancient course of the Exchequer, these imprest-rolls, being made out by the auditor of the receipt, are to be delivered by him to the clerk of the pells, whose duty it is to examine and sign them; and this being done, the clerk of the pells delivers them to the remembrancer. This usage was by degrees discontinued in the reign of king Charles the second; and the remembrancer, or his agent, used to come to the office of the auditor of the receipt, and take away the imprest-rolls from thence immediately. But, in the time when the earl of Rochester was treasurer, the ancient usage was restored, and he did order, that the imprest-rolls should be carefully examined and signed by the clerk of the pells, before they should be transmitted to the remembrancer; and accordingly, since that time, the ancient custom has been observed, as well before as since the act of parliament made in the 8th and 9th years of his late majesty, 'For the better observation of the course anciently used in the receipt of the Exchequer;' that is to say, the half-yearly rolls, when made out, and signed by the auditor, have been by him transmitted to the clerk of the pells; and when the clerk of the pells has examined and signed them, he, or his deputy, has delivered them to the remembrancer; and this appears by the remembrancer's indorsement upon the rolls. The committee finds, that Charles lord Halifax has been auditor of the receipt from the end of November 1699, since which time six imprest rolls have been transmitted to the remembrancer; and there is a seventh roll now under examination of the office of the pells, and no other roll can be prepared till after the 12th of this instant February. Upon the whole matter, the committee are humbly of opinion, that Charles lord Halifax, auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, hath performed the duty of his office, in transmitting the ordinary imprest rolls to the queen's remembrancer, according to the ancient custom of the Exchequer, and the directions of the act of the 8th and 9th Gulielm. 3. and that he hath not been guilty of any neglect or breach of trust upon that account."

This report being read, as also the examination taken upon oath by the committee, and the dates and indorsements of the several imprest-rolls, delivered by Mr. Barker, the question was put 'Whether this house would agree to the opinion of the committee in this report?' Which being carried in the affirmative, it was resolved and declared by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That Charles lord Halifax, auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, hath performed the duty of his office in transmitting the ordinary imprest-rolls to the queen's remembrancer, according to the ancient custom of the Exchequer, and the direction of the act 8 and 9 Gulielmi 3. regis, entitled, "An act for the better observation of the course anciently used in the receipt of the exchequer;" and that he hath not been guilty of any neglect or breach of trust upon that account. At the same time the Lords ordered their proceedings in this affair to be immediately printed and published.

Difference between the two Houses respecting the Public Accounts.] This vindication of the lord Halifax gave great offence to the House of Commons, who, on the 12th of February, ordered their committee to search the journals of the House of Lords, and report their lordships proceedings in relation to the observations of the commissioners of accounts. Pursuant to this order, col. Granville the next day reported to the house, what the committee had found both in the Lords journals relating to this affair, and in the journals of the House of Commons relating to what had been done upon the Lords desiring members of the said house to attend the House of Lords; and in relation to the Lords inspecting and examining public accounts.

This Report being read, the Commons ordered the same Committee to draw up what was proper to be offered to the Lords, at a Conference upon the subject matter of their lordships message of the 4th instant, which the Committee did accordingly in this manner:

"The Commons cannot comply with your lordships desires contained in your message of the 4th instant, because the Commons are still of the same opinion, as was delivered to your lordships in February 1691, at a free conference upon the subject matter of the amendments made by the Lords to the additional bill, for the appointing and enabling commissioners to examine, take, and state the public accounts, of the kingdom, when they desired to know the end your lordships would propose to yourselves by an enquiry into the public accounts. For, should any misapplication of money, or default of distribution, appear in the accounts, your lordships cannot take cognizance thereof originally, or otherwise, even in your judicial capacity, than at the complaint of the Commons. And, should a failure or want of money appear, it is not in your lordships' power to redress it, for the grant of all aids is in the Commons only; or, if there be any surpluse, the Commons only can apply it to the charge of the ensuing year. But, should the Commons give leave to the Commissioners to attend your lordships, no information they can give against any person whatsoever, can entitle your lordships either to acquit or condemn. Yet, since this message, the Commons find in your lordships journals a resolution, declaring, 'That Charles lord Halifax, auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, has performed the duty of his office, &c.' Which looks to the Commons, as if your lordships pretended to give a judgment of acquittal, without any accusation brought before your lordships, and consequently without any trial. And that, which makes your lordships proceeding yet more irregular, it tends to prejudging a cause which might regularly have come before you, either originally by impeachment, or by writ of error from the courts below. And therefore the Commons can see no use of their resolution, unless it be either to intimidate the judges, or prepossess a jury. But, if your lordships could have judged in this matter, it does not appear by your lordships journals, that you have had under your examination the respective times of transcribing the several imprest rolls to the queen's remembrancer; without which it is impossible to know, whether the auditor of the receipt has done his duty according to the late act of parliament."

These Reasons being reported, on the 16th of February, by colonel Granville, and afterwards read and approved by the house, a Message was immediately sent to the Lords, to desire a Conference; to which the Lords having the next day agreed, the managers for the Commons delivered the said Reasons to their lordships.

The Lords, upon this, on the 18th, came to the following Resolutions: first, "That the Lords have an undoubted right (which they can never suffer to be contested) to take cognizance originally of all public accounts; and to enquire into any misapplication or default in the distribution of public monies, or into any other mismanagement whatsoever; secondly, That the Lords, in their inquiry into, and examination of the observations of the commissioners of accounts, in relation to Charles lord Halifax, and in their resolution thereupon, had proceeded according to the rules of justice, and the evidence, that was before them. And, thirdly, that the Commons, in their reasons delivered at the last conference, had used several expressions and arguments highly reflecting, and altogether unparliamentary, tending to destroy all good correspondence between the two Houses, and to the subversion of the constitution."

The queen, being apprehensive of the consequences of these differences between the two Houses, sent a message to the Lords, on the 22d of February, by the earl of Nottingham, to make a quick dispatch with the business before them; and the same day their lordships communicated the above-mentioned resolution to the Commons at a Conference, which their lordships had desired and appointed. The Commons, having the next day taken the same into consideration, resolved, That a free Conference be desired with the Lords upon the subject-matter of the two last Conferences; and ordered their managers to consider of what heads were fit to be urged at the said Free Conference, which they accordingly did, and the said heads were as follow:

1. "That no cognizance, the Lords can take of the public accounts, can enable them to supply any deficiency, or apply any surpluse of the public money.
2. That the Lords can neither acquit or condemn any person whatsoever, upon any inquiry arising originally in their own house.
3. That the attempt the Lords have made, to acquit Charles lord Halifax, auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, is unparliamentary, and not warranted by any precedent: and the resolution thereupon plainly contrary to what appears on the records themselves.
4. That the Conference, desired by the Commons, was in order to preserve a good correspondence between both Houses, by offering reasons to prevent the Lords from proceeding in a case, which they had no precedent to warrant; and the Commons expressing the consequences they apprehend might follow from that resolution, was neither reflecting nor unparliamentary, nor tending to destroy the good correspondence between the two Houses; and much less to the subversion of the constitution:
- and, 5. That the Lords delivering at a Conference their resolutions, instead of reasons, in answer to the reasons of the Commons, is not agreeable to the ancient rules and methods of parliament observed in the conferences between the two houses.

These heads being reported by colonel Granville on the 25th, and then read, and approved by the House, a message was sent to the Lords, to desire a Free Conference with their lordships, who appointed the same immediately in the Painted Chamber, and named the lord Steward, the earl of Carlisle, and the lords Herbert, Halifax, and Ferrers, to be their managers.

The managers for the Commons, at the head of whom was Mr. Finch, opened the particulars, which they had in direction to insist on; adding, "That, when they acquainted their lordships, that the expressing the consequences, which they apprehended might follow from their lordships resolutions, it was not a charge upon their lordships, that they intended that consequence, but that they would have been very glad their lordships would have been pleased to have let them know, what use was to be made of it, or what they intended by it: and concluded, that, if their lordships did controvert any of these points, they were ready to maintain them."

The Lords made no answer to any of these particulars, except to the matter of the resolution relating to the lord Halifax, upon which they acknowledged, "That they were no court of inquiry to form any accusation: that their proceeding in relation to that lord was no trial, nor was their resolution any judgment or acquittal; but that he might still be prosecuted as before. But that, which gave occasion to that proceeding, was the resolution of the House of Commons, which they found in the printed votes, reflecting upon a member of their house; and thereupon they thought fit to give their opinion, which they did in the legislative authority."

The managers for the Commons replied, "That their lordships having in their resolutions declared, that they had proceeded according to the rules of justice, and the evidence that was before them, the Commons could put no other interpretation upon it, than that it was intended as a judgment: and no judgment could be made, where there was no accusation; and, if it was not a judgment, they could not imagine what it did tend to. As to their lordships delivering their opinion, that it was against the rules of any court, that any judge whatsoever should deliver his opinion in a cause, that might come before him; and that this matter might hereafter come judicially before their lordships. That there was a great difference between the vote of the Commons and the resolution of the Lords. That the vote of the House of Commons was but in order to a prosecution, which they can never vote without declaring the crime, and they can never come to be judges of it. That the House of Commons is the grand inquest of the nation, and every grand-jury, that finds Billa Vera upon an indictment, does by that declare the man guilty. But that the lords have a judicial capacity, and their resolution, before an accusation brought, is prejudging the cause, that may come regularly before them. As to the observation the Commons made, that the Lords had not examined the respective times of transmitting the imprest-rolls to the queen's remembrancer, the Commons' managers said, That, as their lordships resolution was no judgment, so this Conference was no trial. But, to shew the mistake of their lordships resolution, they observed, the date upon the several imprest-rolls, that had been transmitted to the remembrancer; and that they apprehend there were still two wanting; that the three last, that were transmitted, came not to the remembrancer till January last; the two first on the 23d, the last on the 27th; and that the first of these three imprest-rolls was money imprest to the 21st of February 1700, and said to be in the first year of queen Anne; which shewed, that the roll was so far from being examined or transmitted in time, that it was not made up till since her majesty came to the crown. That, as the custom formerly had been to set down the time of the examination of those rolls, since Mr. Charles Montagu came in to be auditor, he set down the month, but not the day: and, since the lord Halifax was auditor, he had set down neither month nor day; and that, by his example, on the three last imprest-rolls, the clerk of the pells had put no time at all."

To this the lord Halifax, in his own defence, replied, "that the Lords' Resolution was well founded, since they had the rolls themselves before them, and proof upon oath. That, by the words of the act, the auditor was to transmit the imprest-rolls to the remembrancer half-yearly, according to the usual course of the exchequer; which is eight months and four months. That it was not his duty to transmit them immediately to the remembrancer, because he was to send them to the clerk of the pells, who is to examine and sign them. That it could not be imagined, that the auditor should be tied to a certain time to transmit the rolls to the remembrancer, because they must first go through another hand; and he never took it, there was any occasion to put down the time he examined them, for that would appear from the time of the delivery and date of the roll. That there was one examined by the clerk of the rolls, the 4th of July, which he did not take to be the auditor's fault, but to be the duty of the clerk of the pells to deliver them. That every body knew the great trouble, that had been given in his, as well as other offices, by the commissioners of accounts; and that no loss had happened by not transmitting these rolls, no process having been issued forth for many years upon them."

The managers for the Commons said, "that though half-yearly should be taken for eight months and four months, yet by that they must be transmitted twice a year; and so he had failed in his duty in that respect. That to construe the ancient course of the exchequer in the act of parliament, to be meant, that the clerk of the pells should transmit the rolls, was a direct contradiction to the act, that says, the auditor shall do it." That the ancient course of the exchequer having not been observed, was the occasion of making that law; and that they thought laws were to be observed. That indeed no process could issue till the rolls were transmitted, and possibly might be the ground the accounts had been so long unpassed, to the prejudice of the public. And that, in his lordship's apprehension, there was no loss to the public by not transmitting the rolls, might probably be the reason of his lordship's neglecting his duty."

Here the Free Conference broke up: and the members being returned to their respective Houses, the Commons ordered their managers to draw up a Report of the said Free Conference; and then a motion was made, "That the votes of the House should not be printed; and that this might be a standing order;" which was carried in the affirmative.

The Lords, on the contrary, ordered their proceedings, in relation to the Public Accounts, to be immediately printed; whereupon the Commons resolved to publish their proceedings likewise.

The Commons' Address to the Queen concerning the public Accounts, public Delinquents, &c. On the 11th of February the House of Commons laid the following Representation before her majesty:

"Most gracious Sovereign;

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons in parliament assembled (being deeply sensible, that notwithstanding the immense sums which have been raised for the service of the late war, the nation still labours under a vast debt of many millions of money) do think it our indispensable duty to lay before your majesty the unhappy causes and instruments, which appear to us, to have brought this heavy burden upon your people, not doubting but your majesty will be graciously pleased, in your great wisdom and goodness, to give such effectual orders, that neither any indirect practices shall be suffered, nor any persons entrusted with the administration of the public affairs, who have been the authors of all our miseries.

"We therefore humbly crave leave to represent to your majesty, that during the said war, which was carried on in defence of the protestant religion, and the liberties of Europe, against the common enemy of both, and therefore cheerfully supported by the people of England; yet, even then, when the great necessities of the kingdom did require a more than ordinary frugality, there appears to have been a general mismanagement of the public revenue, which was principally owing to some of those great officers of the Treasury, who, being more intent on their own private profit than the due execution of their public trusts, did neither discharge the duty of their own places, nor take care that the sub-ordinate officers should discharge theirs.

"And we can attribute it to no other cause than this remissness in the Treasury, that many receivers in the several counties of England and Wales, made so long and unnecessary delays in their respective payments into the exchequer, of the taxes given by parliament, and levied on your majesty's good subjects, by which means they made unreasonable advantages to themselves, whilst the public was forced to pay great interest and large premiums, not only for the want of their own money, but, as we have great reason to believe, many times for the loan of it; and several receivers in such intermediate time have failed with considerable sums in their hands, to the great loss and damage of the public.

"Your dutiful Commons do further humbly represent to your majesty, that great sums of money have been borrowed, and divers tallies with interest struck unnecessarily upon the assessments and other parliamentary aids, before the public occasions have required them; and this practice hath been pursued, when votes of credit have been obtained, upon representations made to your Commons of very pressing necessities for the same: whereby many officers of the revenue, and their friends, have had an opportunity to receive great sums for interest which did incur on such tallies before their money was paid in, to the use of the public, for the advantage of which interest, we have also reason to believe, that many accountants (who have received from the Exchequer great sums of money for the use of the public) do industriously delay the payment thereof to the seamen and soldiers, to whom it was due. And this seems to be the great inducement that made such accountants trust great sums of the public money in the hands of goldsmiths and other persons, in order to make private advantages of it, and lend it back to the Exchequer in other persons names: all which tended to the great damage of your majesty's good subjects, to the manifest wrong and discouragement of the seamen and soldiers, and to the great dishonour of the English nation.

"This evil practice of striking tallies with interest, before the money was paid in, was also attended with another very great inconvenience to the public, that whenever the nation had occasion for ready-money to answer the present necessities of the kingdom, many persons who advanced their money upon loan, knowing they should have the same advantages by delay, as by prompt-payment, would not bring their money into the Exchequer for several months after the tallies were struck; whereby the government was forced, in the meantime, to pay excessive rates for stores and provisions for the army and navy, in regard the merchants and tradesmen could have no ready-money for their goods, but remote tallies upon a large discount.

"And by these and other undue means, a very great part of all the public aids were squandered away in extravagant interest, large premiums, and in excessive rates for stores and provisions, which has been one of the great causes that hath brought so heavy a debt upon this nation.

"But here we cannot, in justice, omit to acknowledge the present good management of the Treasury, whereby, for the honour of your government, and the advantage of the whole nation, no unnecessary tallies with interest are permitted to be struck, nor more money at any time borrowed, than the necessities of the nation do require; and care is taken to support the credit of the navy, victualling, and other public offices; and that stores and provisions are in good measure provided, with as great advantage to the public, as if the same were purchased with ready-money; which frugality and good management will be found to be one of the most effectual means, to make your majesty's government easy at home, and to carry on a vigorous war against the common enemy abroad.

“ And we humbly crave leave farther to represent to your majesty, that though your Commons who are always ready to support the dignity of the crown, had amply provided all those aids, which, according to the largest estimates laid before them, were thought necessary for the occasions of the civil-list, yet, over and above the said sums, and out of the aids given by parliament, (which by the law of England are appropriated, and ought to have been employed in the common profit of the whole realm) many large sums of money, during the time of such heavy taxes upon the people, have been diverted under the head of secret services, and for salaries, bounties and pensions to private persons, which, if proper to be paid at all, ought to have been supplied out of the civil-list: Nay, to so great a degree did this profuseness extend, that several thousand pounds were paid out of public aids, to purchase great places for the late earl of Sunderland, and the present earl of Albemarle; so little could your Commons depend upon the integrity of the public officers, so little regard was had by them to these heavy taxes the people lay under, that nothing less could secure the public money from misapplications, than an express clause of appropriation; which though not at all necessary for the security of the public money in general, but only to direct the application of it in some particular cases, yet whenever your Commons made no such particular appropriation, they seldom failed to misapply the public money; which has been another great cause of the heavy debt that lies upon the nation.

“ And your Commons humbly crave leave further to represent to your majesty, that the ancient and established method of accounting in your majesty's Exchequer, hath been in manner following: that is to say, the auditor of the receipt is to make out and transmit the imprest rolls half-yearly to your majesty's remembrancer, in order to the charging and prosecuting the accountants; which being communicated to the auditors of the imprest, they are to certify to the said remembrancer what accountants have not brought in, or prosecuted their accounts, and thereupon the remembrancer is obliged, every issuable term, to issue out process against them, so that the auditor of the receipt is the main wheel that sets all the rest a-going; and when that great officer is deficient in his duty, it is not regular, nor indeed possible, for the rest to proceed, but all process against accountants must be at a stand, and your majesty, and all your loyal subjects must extremely suffer by it. And as to the clerk of the pells, he is to examine the imprest rolls, but the auditor is obliged to transmit them to the remembrancer; and when, through the neglect or corruption of the said officers, this ancient method and course of the Exchequer, was not so strictly observed as it ought to have been, it was expressly provided by an act of parliament, so lately made as in the eighth and ninth year of the reign of his late majesty king William of glorious memory, and entitled, ‘ An Act for the better Observation of the Course anciently used in the Receipt of the Exchequer,’ in these words following: that is to say, ‘ That the auditor of the receipt shall transmit the ordinary imprest rolls half-yearly to the king's remembrancer, in order to the charging or prosecuting of accountants; and shall half-yearly, to wit, at Easter and Michaelmas, make out and transmit to the said commissioners of the Treasury, or the treasurer for the time being, the declaration of the receipt, issues and remains at the Exchequer for every half-year successively; all which matters and things, and all other matters and things belonging to the office and duty of the auditor of the receipt, shall be faithfully and carefully done and performed by the auditor of the receipt for the time being, in such manner as hath been anciently accustomed. And it is hereby farther provided, that the said auditor do, as frequently as he thinks fit, but at least once in every three months, carefully examine the tellers' vouchers, for the payments which he allows in his weekly certificates.’ But so it is, most gracious sovereign, that notwithstanding the plain and express words of the said statute so lately made, Charles lord Halifax, the present auditor of the receipt, though he was himself a member of that parliament, yet he hath taken so little care to discharge the duty of his office, for the interest of your majesty and the security of the public, that he hath not duly performed any one of the particulars above-mentioned; and for want of examining the tellers legal vouchers, the said auditor manifestly deceived your majesty and the public, by inserting into the weekly certificates of the receipts, issues, and remains of the Exchequer, such sums of money as were never actually and bona fide paid to the proper parties, nor the crown legally discharged thereof: And as to the imprest-rolls, your Commons cannot without grief observe to your majesty, that notwithstanding there may be six imprest-rolls now transmitted to the remembrancer, yet it is well known in the said office, that none of the said rolls from the 28th of June, 1700, exclusive, were so transmitted, till very lately after the 22nd of January last, and after the said Commissioners of Accounts had made their enquiries into that neglect by order of your Commons; which being long after the time they ought to have been transmitted, the said auditor was very far from doing his duty in this particular; and by reason of this neglect, no charge could be made in the mean time upon the respective accountants, who have received vast sums of the public money, which are unaccounted for to this day; and by this means, notwithstanding the imprest accountants ought annually to account within three months after the end of each year, yet due process hath not, nor indeed could be issued out against them; and many persons who have received great sums by way of imprest, from the treasurer of the navy, and paymaster of the army, are screened from prosecution, and not being set in super in the Exchequer, cannot be regularly called to an account for the monies by them received: And we have great reason to believe, that the damage to the public by this neglect in the said auditor and his predecessor, may amount to several millions of money, since by length of time (during which the principal accounts have been neglected) many of the persons who received the said public monies, are either dead, or become insolvent; and the greater the neglect of the former auditor was, before the making the said statute, and before the present auditor came into his office, the greater ought to have been his care to discharge his duty, pursuant to that law, which he himself was present at the making of, and which he has so highly neglected for the space of three years and upwards, ever since he came into the said office, to the great detriment of your majesty, and all your loyal subjects.

“And notwithstanding it was also provided by another act in the fourth year of the late king William and queen Mary, chap. 3, that in case any officer of the Exchequer should demand or take any fee, gratuity or reward, or misapply any of the weekly sums therein mentioned, or should not perform other things which by the said act they are required to perform, they shall forfeit their offices, and be incapable of any office or place of trust, yet the said auditor hath acted contrary to the said statute, and hath received several sums of money to his own use, contrary to law and the trust reposed in him: for all which, or any other breaches of his duty, as well as for those formerly laid before your majesty, (for whose gracious answer to our humble address on that occasion, we return your majesty our most humble and hearty thanks) we earnestly desire your majesty will be graciously pleased to order your Attorney-General, effectually to prosecute at law the said auditor of the receipt: And thus, as we have seen great and good actions rewarded by your majesty, we doubt not but to see all deceits and mismanagements duly punished; since your Commons can propose no benefit to themselves by all their enquiries, unless the laws are put in due execution, and those who have lived so long in defiance of them, come at last to feel their weight.

“And by the neglect of the said auditor and his predecessor, the auditors of the imprest and the remembrancer, and other officers of the Exchequer, have not been able to proceed in their duty, according to the law and course of the Exchequer; several of which officers have been also negligent therein, whereby all the public accounts of the nation are far behind. The state whereof (as delivered in the said commissioners of accounts) in the particulars hereafter mentioned, is as followeth:

“The earl of Ranelagh, late Paymaster of your majesty's forces, of one and twenty millions and upwards, received in fourteen year time, hath passed no account during all the late reign, farther than the last of December, 1690 nor any other account farther than March 1692, which was not declared before the 20th of June last, and even that upon vouchers which were not sufficient for a legal discharge.

“The Commissioners for the Sick and Wounded have brought in no account during all the late reign, and none since, any farther than the 31st of December, 1690.

“The late Treasurer of the Chamber, viz Rowland Gwyn, the late Master of the Robes, the earl of Albemarle, and Mr. Parkhurst, Mr. Paschall, and others, Commissioners of the Prize-Office, have delivered in no accounts at all to the auditors of the imprest.

“Jacob Vanderesche, esq. Paymaster of his late majesty's Dutch forces, hath received 3,025,753*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* which by computation is 52,907*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, more than the pay of those troops could have amounted to, if they had been always compleat; no deductions made from them, and upon an English establishment which all of them were not; and yet the said Vanderesche hath passed no account at all; and though often summoned, hath never appeared before the said Commissioners of the public accounts, but stands indebted to the said troops in 112,229*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.*; which is now demanded as an arrear due to them, your majesty and the public.

“The late Treasurer of the Navy, of seventeen millions and upwards received, hath brought in several accounts, to the last of December, 1698. His account for the year 1692, was declared the 3d day of July last; since which the accounts of the three following years only have been declared.

“The said Treasurer, by Mr. Papillion, cashier of the Victualling Office, hath passed no account during all the late reign, farther than the 31st of December, 1696, which was not declared till the 19th of May, 1701; and on the foot of that account he remained indebted 534,027*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*

“And many other accountants, whom it would be too tedious to enumerate to your majesty, are either far behind in their accounts, or have never brought in any accounts at all; insomuch that although 45,568,725*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.* (a sum never known to be raised in very many reigns before) hath been levied on your majesty's good subjects, and issued out of the Exchequer to the several Paymasters and

Treasurers of the navy, army and ordnance, for the service of the late war, between the 5th of November, 1688, and the 8th of March last past, (besides the several millions of money raised for other public uses) yet the far greatest part thereof hath not been accounted for to this day, to the great dissatisfaction of your people, and the great dishonour of the nation.

“By these neglects and delays, all accounts have been rendered so intricate and confused, that the several accountants have had great opportunities of defrauding the public, the discovery of their frauds has been made very difficult, and a hindrance thereby is given to the passing all succeeding accounts.

“Hence it is that so many public officers and accountants have raised great estates to themselves, at the expence of the public, when it is evident they have had no lawful means to attain them; and several persons, whose duty it was to hinder such exorbitancies, measuring their requests rather by their own avarice than their merit, have obtained for themselves grants to such a value, as in foregoing reigns have been esteemed large supplies towards great and public services; which has been another great cause of the debt that lies upon the nation.

“And your Commons do farther humbly represent to your majesty, that notwithstanding such vast sums issued out to the said late Paymaster and Treasurer, whereby your Commons had amply provided for all those services, and for the effectual carrying on the war against France; yet they find, to their great sorrow, that not only the officers, but the seamen and soldiers, who on all occasions have behaved themselves bravely in defence of their country, have not been paid during the late war, and that great sums are still owing to many of them: whereas if the public money had been duly applied to the uses for which it was given by your Commons, instead of those many hardships that were endured by your majesty's most faithful subjects and their families, who served so well as your fleets and armies, they would have had justice done them during the last war, and been encouraged more cheerfully to engage themselves in this.

“But, instead of justice, we have too much reason to believe, that those very persons, who by long and unnecessary delays have compelled them to accept of remote tallies and paper securities, have (amongst others) taken advantage of their necessities, and employing brokers to buy up those tallies and securities at a low rate, have afterwards paid themselves with that ready money which they should at first have distributed to the seamen and soldiers.

“And such was the mysterious trade upon tallies and Exchequer-Bills, which was formerly carried on by common brokers, betwixt the Exchange and the Exchequer, and which did, as it were, prey upon the very vitals of the government; and so great gain was made thereby, at the expence of the public, that vast sums of money were employed in it, which did very much lessen the true trading stock of the nation, whereby both the exportation of the woollen and other manufactures of this kingdom, and the importation of bullion, and other commodities of foreign countries, to be manufactured in England, have been very much obstructed; to the great prejudice of your majesty's customs, the loss of the balance of trade, and the great impoverishment of the whole kingdom.

“And though the late Paymaster and Treasurer, by long and unnecessary delays in settling their accounts, have in great measure prevented any discovery of their undue proceedings, and have endeavoured to protect themselves from a just and fair account to the nation, by privy-seals and other unjustifiable warrants; surreptitiously obtained for passing their accounts, without proper vouchers, contrary to the law and course of the Exchequer; yet your Commons, by the great fidelity and diligence of the same Commissioners for the taking, examining and stating the public accounts of the kingdom, have not only discovered the several mismanagements above-mentioned, but also some of the unwarrantable proceedings used by the said late Paymaster of your majesty's forces, by whom a considerable part of the money which came to his hands, and which ought not to have been applied to any other purpose than the payment of the army, hath been diverted to his own and to other private uses; for all which, upon a full and fair hearing in his own defence, he hath justly incurred the censure of this house, and been declared guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor.

“And we find, to our unspeakable grief, whilst his late majesty was engaged in the prosecution of the glorious design of preserving the protestant religion, and the liberties of Europe, and was thereby necessitated to commit the care of the public affairs in this kingdom to particular ministers, (whereof none were more particularly entrusted in the chief administration than those who have been the great causes of the unhappy differences among us:) this general mismanagement of the public affairs did actually spread itself over the whole kingdom, and seems to be owing (amongst other things) to a disposition of offices and places, where men were rather chosen for their inclinations to serve a party, than for their qualifications to serve the public.

“And these men being conscious to themselves of the many frauds and offences committed against the public, have no other hopes to shelter themselves from justice, than by taking away the reputation of those who desired to do right to their country, by detecting their iniquities; and being united in guilt and interest they endeavor to amuse and impose upon those, whose posterity, we have too much reason to fear, will groan under the sad effects of the wickedness of the one, and the too great credulity of the other.

“These, dread sovereign, are divers of the causes of those mischiefs your kingdom suffereth by the late mismanagements, and which your loyal Commons could not omit thus hum-by to represent in all dutiful manner, without being unfaithful to your majesty, and to the country by whom they are entrusted.

“ From hence your majesty will be graciously pleased to take notice, that the great debt which lies upon the nation, and all the arrears which are owing to your majesty's forces, do not arise so much from the deficiencies of the funds, as for want of care in the management, and fidelity in the application of them.

“ But since it hath pleased Almighty God to place your sacred majesty on the royal throne of your ancestors, we have so entire a confidence in your majesty's goodness, that we can no longer fear to see the public revenue mismanaged or misapplied, the accounts neglected, or the forces unpaid: and we cheerfully depend on your majesty's wisdom, that all our grievances, by your grace and favour, will in due time be redressed and removed, by punishing those who have been the causes of them, and by entrusting none in the administration of the public affairs, who, for their own private advantage, have manifestly contributed to the calamity of their country.

“ This (most gracious sovereign) will be the only effectual means to prevent the like mismanagement for the future; and thereby to make your majesty's reign happy at home and prosperous abroad.

“ This will be the best means to enable and encourage your dutiful Commons to raise those supplies which shall be necessary to support your majesty against all your enemies.

“ Thus we humbly crave leave, upon this occasion, to repeat our assurances to your majesty, that we will always stand by and assist your majesty to the utmost of our power, in preserving the established government both in church and state, maintaining the ancient glory of the English nation, and defending the liberties of Europe against the boundless ambition of France.”

The Queen's Answer.] To this address her majesty made answer:

“ Gentlemen, the repetition of these assurances you give me in this address, of your zeal for my service, and the good of the kingdom, is very acceptable to me. I shall consider the several particulars of it, and always have great regard to the representations of the house of commons, and the true interest of England.”

Several Bills moved this Session, but not finished.] Several bills had been moved this session (some of which passed the Commons) but were not finished. On the 23d of December, sir Edward Seymour moved for leave to bring in a bill ‘ to resume all the grants made in king William's reign, and applying them to the use of the public.’ This was carried by a majority of 180 against 78, though the bill was afterwards dropped by the Commons themselves. At the same time it was moved by Mr. Walpole, ‘ That all the Grants, made in the reign of the late king James, should also be resumed.’ But this by the same Commons was passed in the negative. Sir John Hollar then made a motion to bring in a bill ‘ for the more free and impartial proceedings in parliament, by providing; that no person who suer in office or employment should be capable of sitting in parliament,’ which also passed in the negative. How, Musgrave, Seymour, &c. who had so vehemently pushed the like bill in king William's reign, were now warm in opposing this, and instead of it carried a bill ‘ for the more free and impartial proceedings in parliament, by providing, that no person shall be chosen a member, but such as have a sufficient real estate.’ This bill was rejected by the Lords, on the 22d of February.

The Queen's Speech at the Close of the Session.] Feb. 27. While the disputes between the two Houses* were in agitation, her majesty being desirous to have an end put to the sitting, ordered Mr. Secretary Hedges to acquaint the Commons, that she desired they would give all possible diligence to the business depending, her majesty finding it necessary in the public affairs, to put an end to that session upon which they resolved on an Address to her majesty, humbly to lay before her, That they had already dispatched all the necessary bu

* “ During this session the Lords had rendered themselves very considerable, and had gained an universal reputation over the whole nation: it is true, those who had opposed the persons, that had carried matters before them in this session, were so near their number, that things of the greatest consequence were carried only by one or two voices; therefore as they intended to have a clear majority in both houses, in the next session they prevailed with the queen, soon after the prorogation, to create four new peers, who had been the violentest of the whole party; Fine Gower, Granvil, and young Seymour, were made barons. Great reflections were made upon this promotion; when some severe things had been thrown out in the House of Commons upon the opposition, that they met with from the Lords, it was insinuated, that it would be easy to find men of merit and estate to make a clear majority in that house: this was an open declaration of a design, to put every thing in the hands and power of that party: It was also an encroachment on one of the tenderest points of the prerogative, to make motions creating peers in the House of Commons. However, though of the other side, was at the same time made a baron, by private favour. The session of parliament was brought to a much better conclusion, than could have been reasonably expected by those, who knew whom it was constituted, and how it had begun. No harm was done in it: the succession was fortified by a new security, and the popular clamours of corruption and peculate, which the nation had been so much possessed with, were in a great measure dissipated.” Burnet ness before them. The concluding day at length came, when her majesty went to the House of Lords, and sending for the Commons, was pleased to give her royal assent to several public and private Bills. Which done, her majesty made the following Speech to both Houses:

“My lords and gentlemen; I return you my hearty thanks, for the great dispatch you have given to the public affairs in this session; which is an advantage extremely material at all times; and I hope we shall find the fruit of it this year, in the forwardness of our preparations.—I am to thank you, gentlemen of the House of Commons, in particular, for the great supplies with which you enable me to carry on the war: It shall be my care, to have them strictly applied to the uses for which you have designed them, and to the best advantage for the public service. You have reposed great confidence in me, by allowing so unusual a latitude as you have done, in the clause of appropriation: I shall improve all opportunities, in the use of it, for the honour and true interest of the nation.—I must further take notice to you that the readiness you have shewn in the provision made for the prince is a very sensible obligation to me.

“My lords and gentlemen; I desire and expect from you, that you make it your business, in your several countries, to continue and preserve the quiet and satisfaction of all my subjects: I hope, that such of them as have the misfortune to dissent from the church of England will rest secure and satisfied in the Act of Toleration, which I am firmly resolved to maintain, and that all those who have the happiness and advantage to be of our church will consider, that I have had my education in it, and that I have been willing to run great hazards for its preservation: and therefore they may be very sure I shall always make it my own particular care, to encourage and maintain this church, as by law established, and every the least member of it, in all their just rights and privileges; and, upon all occasions of promotions to any ecclesiastical dignity, I shall have a very just regard to such as are eminent and remarkable for their piety, learning, and constant zeal for the church; that, by this and all other methods which shall be thought proper I may transmit it securely settled to posterity.—I think it might have been for the public service, to have had some further laws for restraining the great license, which is assumed, of publishing and spreading scandalous pamphlets and libels; but, as far as the present laws will extend, I hope you will all do your duty, in your respective stations, to prevent and punish such pernicious practices.—Above all other things, I do recommend to you peace and union among ourselves; as the most effectual means, that can be devised, to discourage and defeat the designs of our enemies.—I must not conclude without acquainting you, I have given directions that my part of all the prizes, which have been or shall be taken during this war, be applied entirely to the public service; and I hope my own revenue will not fall so short, but that I may be able, as I desire, to contribute yet further to the ease of my people.”

After which the Lord Keeper, by her majesty's command prorogued the parliament to Thursday the 22d of April next.

The Queen's Speech on opening the Session.]
 November 9. The Queen opened the Session with the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I have called you together as soon as I thought you could conveniently come out of your countries, that no time might be lost in making our preparations for carrying on the present war, in which I do not doubt of your cheerful concurrence; since we cannot but be sensible, that on the success of it depends our own safety and happiness, and that of all Europe.—I hope I have improved the confidence you reposed in me last year, to your satisfaction and the advantage of us, and our allies, by the treaty with the king of Portugal, and the declaration of the duke of Savoy, which in a great measure may be imputed to the cheerfulness with which you supported me in this war, and the assurance with which you trusted me in the conduct of it: And we cannot sufficiently acknowledge the goodness of Almighty God, who is pleased to afford us so fair a prospect as we have now, of bringing it to a glorious and speedy conclusion.—I must therefore desire you, gentlemen of the House of Commons, to grant me such supplies as shall be requisite to defray the charge of the war in the next year, with regard not only to all our former engagements, but particularly to our alliance lately made with the king of Portugal, for recovering the monarchy of Spain from the House of Bourbon, and restoring it to the House of Austria: which treaty being in itself of the highest importance imaginable, and requiring all possible dispatch in the execution of it, has necessarily occasioned a great expence even in this present year, though not so much as it will require, and for which, I hope, we shall be amply recompensed in the next.—The subsidies which will now be immediately required for the assistance of the duke of Savoy, will likewise occasion a farther necessary charge.—I must take notice to you, That though no particular provision was made in the last session, either for the charge of our present expedition to Portugal, or for that of the augmentation-troops desired by the States-general, yet the funds given by parliament, have held out so well, and the produce of the prizes has proved so considerable, that you will find the public will not be in debt by reason of either of these additional services.—I may further observe to you, That though the funds for civil government are diminished by the war, I have, in conjunction with the States-general, contributed out of my own revenue towards some public services, and particularly the support of the circle of Swabia, whose firm adherence to the interest of the allies, under the greatest pressures, did very well deserve our reasonable assistance: And I shall still be careful not to engage myself in any unnecessary expence of my own, that I may have the more to spare towards the ease of my subjects.

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I heartily wish some easy and less chargeable method could be found for the speedy and effectual manning of the fleet.—I must also recommend to you, to make some regulation for preventing the excessive price of coals. I have examined this matter, and taken particular care to appoint convoys for that service; but the price has not been in the least abated, notwithstanding a very considerable quantity has been imported since that time; This gives great ground of suspicion there may be a combination of some persons to enrich themselves by a general oppression of others, and particularly the poor. It will deserve your consideration how to remedy this great inconvenience.—And in all affairs I must recommend to you as much dispatch as the nature of them will admit; This is necessary to make our preparations early, on which in great measure depends the good success of all our enterprises.—I want words to express to you my earnest desire of seeing all my subjects in perfect peace and union among themselves; I have nothing so much at heart as their welfare and happiness: Let me therefore desire you all that you would carefully avoid any heats or divisions that may disappoint me of that satisfaction, and give encouragement to the common enemies of our church and state.”

The Lords' Address thereon.] Nov. 10. The Lords presented the following Address to her Majesty:

“We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, do offer up our hearty acknowledgements to Almighty God, for the preservation of your royal person, so essential to the happiness of your people, and the safety of Europe.—We see, with the greatest satisfaction, the zeal with which your majesty espouses the public interest; which carries you even beyond the obligations of your treaties, in defence of the house of Austria, against the usurpations of the house of Bourbon; and the glorious restitution of that family to the monarchy of Spain, which we have great reason to expect, from the late alliance with the king of Portugal, will be chiefly owing to your majesty's arms and assistance.—Your majesty may depend upon security at home; in the love of your people. Our persons and fortunes shall ever be ready to defend you upon all occasions; and your majesty may therefore, with the greater safety and glory, send your fleets and armies abroad, in the defence of your allies.—The happy Declaration of the duke of Savoy, for the common interest, gives your majesty a reasonable opportunity to sliew your compassion and concern for those Protestants in the South of France, who lie under the heaviest persecution and oppression.—We lament, for ourselves and others, the unavoidable expences of war; but have reason to thank God, and your majesty, that we are free from all the other calamities of it, having almost nothing else to wish for (being secured of a Protestant succession) but your long and happy reign over us: And we shall most willingly pay our proportion of taxes, encouraged by your royal generosity for the ease of your people, and by the frugal management of what is given; being sensible there is no better way to save the wealth of the nation, than by carrying on the war at this time with the utmost vigour.—Your majesty may expect from us a most ready compliance with all your desires, so justly merited by your care of the general welfare and happiness of your people, extended even to the poorest and meanest of your subjects.—This appears yet more eminently, in that earnest and pressing recommendation to your parliament, of union and peace amongst themselves; and we, in the most solemn manner, assure your majesty, that we will not only avoid, but oppose, whatsoever may tend to create any disorder or disunion amongst your subjects.—We shall never be wanting in any part of our duty, towards the supporting your majesty's honour and your allies; not doubting but Almighty God will prosper your majesty's arms, so gloriously employed to protect all those whom the ambition of the French king would oppress.”

The Queen's Answer.] To which her Majesty answered:

“I am extremely sensible of the particular concern you express for me in this address, and of your great zeal for the common cause of Europe.—I rely very much upon the assurances you give me of your duty and affection; and shall always use my best endeavours to establish the safety and happiness of the kingdom.”

The Commons' Address.] Nov. 11. The following Address of the Commons was presented to her Majesty:

“Most gracious Sovereign;

“We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects the Commons in Parliament assembled, do humbly return your majesty our most hearty thanks for your majesty's most gracious speech from the throne.—We are truly sensible of your majesty's earnest endeavours to bring the war to a glorious and speedy conclusion, of which your majesty has given us so fair a prospect by your great wisdom and conduct, in engaging the king of Portugal and duke of Savoy in your alliance, for recovering the monarchy of Spain from the house of Bourbon, and restoring it to the house of Austria.—We do most gratefully acknowledge your majesty's singular care in the good management and application of the public money, whereby your majesty's Exchequer hath greater credit in this so expensive a war than was ever known in the most flourishing times of peace; and your most signal and unparalleled grace and goodness to your people, in contributing out of your own revenue towards the public service, particularly your majesty's most reasonable assistance to the circle of Swabia.—The many blessings we enjoy under your majesty's most auspicious reign, and your tender regard to the general welfare and happiness of your subjects, justly require our utmost returns of duty and gratitude. And your majesty may be assured, that your faithful Commons will support your majesty in your alliances, and effectually enable your majesty to carry on the war with vigour, to which nothing can more contribute than a firm union among ourselves: we therefore crave leave further to assure your majesty, That we will, according to your majesty's desire, carefully avoid any heats or divisions that may give encouragement to the common enemies of the church and state.”

The Queen's Answer.] To which her majesty answered:

"I am well pleased with your assurances of supporting me in the present war, and your kind acknowledgments of my endeavours to bring it to a happy conclusion.—You may assure yourselves I shall always pursue the true interest of the kingdom, and omit nothing that may promote the general welfare of my people."

Proceedings in the Commons on the Bill against Occasional Conformity.] November 25. A motion was made in the Commons, for bringing in the bill against Occasional Conformity: great opposition was made to it; the court was against it, but it was carried by a great majority, that such a bill should be brought in. So a new draught was formed. In it, the preamble, that was in the former bill, was left out. The number, besides the family, that made a conventicle, was enlarged from five to twelve: and the fine set on those who went to conventicles, after they had received the sacrament, besides the loss of their employment, was brought down to fifty pound.

Sir John Packington's Speech thereon.] The following Speech was made by sir John Packington on that occasion, and seems to contain the sense of the majority of that house:

"Mr. Speaker, her majesty has been pleased in all her speeches, to give us so many assurances of supporting the church of England by law established; and also such instances of being punctual to her promise in this particular, that I think she very justly deserves the title of Defender of the Faith. Her desire to see this bill succeed the last sessions of parliament, was sufficiently shewn by the prince of Denmark's constant attendance upon it; and I believe the reason why some persons opposed it, was because the queen seemed to oppose it.—But pray, gentlemen, let us consider, how this bill came to be lost? why, two or three noble lords were by turns to be absent? the miscarriage of the bill was imputed to their want of attendance, when at the same time they were desired to be out of the way. And is it not a shame, that we, who have given near a score millions of money for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, should have trimming at last in a bill to prevent hypocrisy?—It was a law among the Athenians, that when any controversy or difference arose in the city of Athens the inhabitants should take one side or other, or else they banished them the city: and truly sir, when members of parliament, and ministers of state stand neuter in matters that nearly concern the interest of the church of England, and have not courage to own their opinion, I think they very well deserve to be turned out. Every gentleman here is sent up to give his vote, and when he declines that, he cannot be properly said to serve the place he represents. This I take to be the worst sort of cowardice.—But pray, sir, let us inquire into the meaning of all this trimming. Are we afraid to disoblige a party of men, that are against the church and government? whose principle of hatred and malice to the family of the Stuarts descends to them by inheritance? men, sir, that offered open violence to her majesty's royal grandfather; men that have not only the impudence at this time to justify that fact, but to turn the day of his murder into ridicule, and keep a calf's-head-feast in the city. And can we imagine that those who are enemies to her majesty's person and office, and that were for hindering her from coming to the throne, would not be glad of any opportunity to shove her out of it?—Are these the men to be countenanced and encouraged? this in plain English makes me believe this ministry has too great a resemblance of the last; that my lord S—d is risen from the dead, and now become prime minister of state.—And now I am upon this subject, give me leave to tell some gentlemen here, who have been bellowing and roaring against persons for taking places in the late reign, that it is a reflection upon them to hold and continue their places, in the company of those that they have been exclaiming against.—They may remember, if they please to recollect the language in the late reign—sir, you must turn this gentleman out, or else I cannot serve you.—And if any gentleman was in the interest of the church of England, 'twas a sufficient exception against his being employed. No gentleman of that principle was then thought fit to be a deputy-lieutenant, or a justice of peace. If we would take the same resolution, and the same spirit, things might be better managed than they are.—I did wonder to hear so many Bishops against this bill, but that wonder ceased, when I considered whom they owed their preferment to. The Archbishop of C—y, I think, was promoted to that see by my Lord S—d's interest; and being asked what reasons he had against this bill, replied, he had not well considered the bill, but that my Lord S—d told him it ought not to pass.—This was a very weighty reason for the head of our Church to give; and yet, I dare say, none of the rest of them could give a better. One would be provoked, by the late behaviour of the Bishops, to move for leave to bring in a bill for the toleration of Episcopacy; for, since they are of the same principles with the dissenters, it is but just, I think, that they should stand on the same foot.—Now, Sir, give me leave to answer some objections made against this bill. The first is, that it is unseasonable at this time. Why unseasonable; is it not as seasonable for us to pass a law, for the further defence of the church of England here, as it was for Scotland to pass an act last sessions for the security of the kirk there? why unseasonable? does the success of our arms abroad, or the levying money at home depend upon it? no gentleman can say, that either of them do; and since there can be no objection made against the goodness of the bill, why should we defer the putting it in execution?—Another argument against this bill, is, that it will create divisions. Are we to allow a schism to avoid division? the Dissenters hold it lawful to communicate sometimes, and if so, why unlawful to communicate at other times? But oh! the fear of offending dissenters is to be urged as an argument, and not provoking the church of England; Either the ministry must think we are so good-natured, as not to be displeas'd at any thing they do, or else that our number is so inconsiderable, that they do not value it if we are displeas'd.—Another argument against this bill proceeds from the number and strength of the dissenters. This I take to be an excellent argument for the bill; for, if they are so strong and numerous, it is high time for us to guard ourselves against them, and I appeal to every gentleman here, whether one dissenter in place is not capable of doing more mischief to the church of England, than ten out of it? Suppose, Mr. Speaker, the dissenters had the power in their own hands (as they will certainly in a short time, if not restrained) would they admit the church of England into places of trust, and into the legislature, upon occasional conformity?—Her majesty has been so generous as to offer what further security they think fit for the religion in Scotland; how comes it, that some gentlemen should represent her majesty so much concern'd to preserve a religion she is not of, and so unwilling to grant a security for the church in which she expects to be saved? According to this method, one might expect the Scotch covenant to be brought again into England, and that the Presbyterian-party of that kingdom, should remonstrate (as they did to her royal grandfather) the necessity of having one religion, and one worship in both kingdoms.—We have been under great expences in keeping these gentlemen out, and have been traduced as persons designing a French government; and all the return we are like to have for our services and sufferings, in our purses and reputations, is, that these persons are like at last to become our masters, which is a very great discouragement.—Mr. Speaker, I take this practice of Occasional Conformity, to elude the force of one of the best laws made in the church of England's defence, that is scandalous and knavish in itself, and I will pretend to foretel this; that, by the benefit of this Occasional Conformity, the dissenters will come to be the majority of this house; and then I will venture to pronounce the days of the church of England few. That I may not see such dismal effects of our pretended moderation, I heartily wish success to this bill."

The Bill passed by a majority of 225 to 140*.

* "Notwithstanding the queen, who had been inform'd that the Occasional Conformity Bill had alarm'd a great part of her subjects, who were otherwise well affect'd to her government, and no less able and zealous to assist her in carrying on the war, had endeavour'd, by the warmest expressions, to dissuade the parliament from this measure, yet that bill was again revived. As this had been foreseen by the mo-

Debates in the Lords on the Bill against Occasional Conformity.] In the beginning of December the Occasional Conformity-bill was again sent up to the Lords, where it occasioned derate party, Dr. Davenant, who now seem'd to have forsaken his party, by the encouragement, and with the approbation of the lord Halifax, published a book, entitl'd, 'Essays upon peace at home and war abroad,' wherein he inforc'd what her majesty had lately recommended from the throne; and endeavour'd to bring all sorts of men to lay aside their heats and animosities, and to unite in their own defence, against the common danger, with design to dissuade the bringing in of the Occasional Bill. At the same time sir Humphry Mackworth published a small treatise, 'in defence of the Commons in relation to the Conformity Bill; which pamphlet, however, contain'd little besides the arguments used a year before on the same subject. At length, about a fortnight after the meeting of the parliament, a motion was made in the House of Commons, for bringing in 'a Bill against Occasional Conformity.' Great opposition was made to it; the court was against it; but it was carried by a great majority, that such a bill should be brought in. A new draught was accordingly form'd. Though it was the same in substance with the preamble, which was in the former bill, yet in several things it differ'd. The preamble against 'persecution for conscience only,' was now left out. The former bill began, with mentioning the 'act of indulgence,' saying, That 'that Act ought inviolably to be observ'd;' whereas, this takes not the least notice of it. This bill began with mentioning the corporation and test-acts, which it says, 'manifestly intend'd that all persons to be admitted into such offices and employments, should be, and always remain conformable to the church of England, as by law established; which acts, it says, 'have been notoriously eluded, &c.' And in the 'enacting part,' whereas the former bill allow'd but four besides the family where a conventicle was held, this allow'd nine, and inflict'd no punishment, unless there were ten or more, besides the family. The penalty in the former bill was 105*l.* for every day that the persons concern'd continu'd afterwards in office; But now it was brought down to a forfeiture of 50*l.* There were also some other differences. These were artifices, by which it was hop'd, upon such softening, to carry the bill on any terms; and when that point was gain'd, it would be easy afterwards to carry other bills of greater severity. There was now such a division upon this matter, that it was fairly debated in the House of Commons; whereas before it went there with such a torrent, that no opposition to it could be bearken'd to. Those who oppos'd the bill, went chiefly upon the ground, that the bill put the dissenters in a worse condition than they were in before; and that it was a breach upon the Toleration, which ought not to be made, since

The bishop of Salisbury* (Dr. Burnet) said :
 " My Lords ; I am very glad to find, that how much heat soever this matter has raised abroad, yet none of that has appeared in all this debate : if a heat of zeal has appeared in some, yet nothing has been mixed with it unbecoming the dignity of this house, and the solemnity of a great council : it is a disadvantage, especially to one of this bench, to speak against any thing, that, in the sound, and first appearance, seems to be intended for the service of the church ; and, I am sure, if I were not fully convinced that it is not so, but that, they had not deserved it by any ill behaviour of their's, by which it could be pretended, that they had forfeited any of their benefits designed by that act. That things of this kind could have no effect, but to embroil the nation with new distractions, and to disgust persons well-affected to the queen, and her government. That it was necessary to continue the happy quiet, that the nation now enjoyed, especially in this time of war, in which even the severest of persecutions made their stops, for fear of irritating the humours too much. The old topics of hypocrisy, and of the danger the church was in, were brought up again on behalf of the bill, which passed the Commons on the 7th of December, by a great majority, and was sent up to the House of Lords ; where it occasioned a debate of many hours, whether the bill should be entertained or read a second time, or thrown out. The prince of Denmark appeared no more for it, nor did he come to the house upon this occasion. Some who had voted for it in the former session, kept out of the house ; and others owned, that they saw farther into the design of the bill, and so voted against it. The bishops were almost equally divided : There were two more against it than for it. Bishop Burnet distinguished himself by his speech against the bill. He gave the Lords an account how the Test-Act had been carried, and mentioned the many practices of the Papists, in order to set the church against the dissenters, and the dissenters against the church, by turns, as it might serve their ends. He ventured to say, that a man might lawfully communicate with a church which he thought had a doctrine and a worship uncorrupted, and yet communicate more frequently with a church, which he thought more perfect ; and that he himself had communicated with the churches of Geneva and Holland, and yet at the same time communicated with the church of England ; So that, though the dissenters were in a mistake as to their opinion, which was the more perfect church, yet, allowing them a Toleration in that error, this practice might be justified. Several of the temporary lords spoke also against the bill, particularly the lord Haversham, the duke of Devonshire, the earl of Pembroke, the lord Mohun, the lord Ferrars, and the lord Wharton. The last of these, to shew the unseasonableness of any thing, that led to persecuting their Protestant brethren, took notice of the distracted state of Scotland, and of the insolence of the Papists in Ireland ; adding, that the house ought rather to imitate the parliament of Ireland in their zeal against popery, than to frame laws to increase divisions here. Nor did the lord Mohun stick to say, " That if they passed this bill, they had as good tack the pretended prince of Wales to it." Upon the whole matter, it was carried by a majority of 12 not to give it a second reading, but to reject it. The clergy over England, who were generally inflamed in this matter, could hardly forgive the queen and the prince the coldness, which they expressed on this occasion. The lord Godolphin did so positively declare, he thought the bill unseasonable, and had done all he could to hinder its being brought in, that, though he (as well as the duke of Marlborough) not only voted for a second reading, but also entered their dissent against the rejecting it ; the party were exasperated against him, and set up the earl of Rochester, as the only man to be depended on, and who deserved to be the prime minister." Tindal.

* " The Bishops were almost equally divided. There were two more against the Bill than for it. Among these I had the largest share of censure on me, because I spoke much against it : I knew how the Act of Test was carried, as has been already shewn in its proper place ; I related that in the House, and the many practices of the Papists, of setting us of the church against the dissenters, and the dissenters against us by turns, as it might serve their ends ; I ventured to say, that a man might lawfully communicate with a church, that he thought had a worship and a doctrine uncorrupted, and yet communicate more frequently with a church, that he thought more perfect : I myself had communicated with the churches of Geneva and Holland ; and yet at the same time communicated with the church of England ; So, though the dissenters were in a mistake, as to their opinion, which was the more perfect church, yet allowing them a Toleration in that error, this practice might be justified. I was desired to print what I said upon that occasion, which drew many virulent pamphlets upon me, but I answered none of them ; I saw the Jacobites designed to raise such a flame among us, as might make it scarce possible to carry on the war ; those who went not so deep, yet designed to make a breach on the Toleration by gaining this point : And I was resolved never to be silent, when that should be brought into debate ; For I have long looked on liberty of conscience, as one of the rights of human nature, antecedent to society, which no man, could give up, because it was not in his own power ; And our Saviour's rule, of doing as we would be done by, seemed to be a very express decision to all men, who would lay the matter home to their own conscience, and judge as they would willingly be judged by others." Burnet.

how well soever it may be intended by some, the effects of it will be quite contrary, I could not have a heart, or a face to speak against it, but should promote it with all possible zeal.—I confess, I am already bound up, as to this particular, and determined by a promise solemnly made to the queen. Her majesty recommended union to us, with a particular vehemence of style, when she said, she wanted words to express how earnestly she desired to see union and a good agreement among her subjects. I am sure; we must all want words to express a due sense of that royal tenderness and care of us. In our Address to her majesty we promised, not only to avoid, but to oppose every thing that might tend to create disunion and disorder: and I do freely own, that I had then this very thing in my thoughts, as I believe a great many others had, and therefore I look on myself as under an obligation now, to perform what I then promised. I know, some of our order, as well as myself, in particular, have been very indecently, and I hope, very unjustly too, treated in many printed libels upon this very account; as if we were the enemies to the church, because we cannot think this bill for its service. The station we are in sets us above the answering every spiteful writer. But, next to the queen, we owe it to your lordships to satisfy you, if any thing sticks with you. We hope we may appeal to the world, and to our diocesses in every particular, whether our labours do not shew a true zeal for the church, in all its concerns? We are the disciples of the cross, and must go through good report, and ill report; but we hope, we are so well known, and have acted so long in a public scene and have acted such a part on it, that we may reckon ourselves above such calumnies.—Even St. Paul said, he became a fool in glorying; but it was when others compelled him to it, we must freely own, that there have been such severities among us in every reign, since the reformation, that these are blemishes not easily wiped off. The burnings in king Edward's reign is the reproach of that time. The capital proceedings in queen Elizabeth's reign, and the severe act of the 25th year of it, that punishes meetings with imprisonment, banishment and death, is a blemish, even on that long and glorious reign. The repeal of that act past in both houses; and it is known by what management it was, that it was not tendered to the royal assent. The mention of queen Elizabeth's reign leads me to take notice of what has been said in relation to the maxims, by which she governed herself, as if she had been inflexibly steady in the observation of the laws in matters of religion. It is certain, that she treated the papists, all along, with very particular indulgence; she would have the peers excused from the obligations to take the oath of supremacy; she employed papists in all her affairs; they were privy counselors, and lord lieutenants; her lord-treasurer protested against all acts for the reformation, and was known to be a church-papist, or an occasional conformist; and yet he continued in that great post 14 years, till he died; she encouraged the occasional conformity of papists, and apprehended no danger in that, even from them; and yet, I hope, it will be acknowledged that there was more reason to be afraid of them, considering both their numbers, and the hopes of a popish successor, than we have now to be afraid of the Dissenters. She encouraged occasional conformity, and no body was uneasy at it: but the Pope saw what it was like to end in, and therefore he took care to put a stop to it.—The severities in king James's reign cast a blot on it; and the proceedings in the Star Chamber, and the High-Commission, are set forth by a noble Historian, as things that do not a little contribute to bring on us the miseries of a Civil War. The proceedings in king Charles the second's reign were severe, and set on with bad designs. That in a time, both of war and of plague, such an act as the Five-Mile act should have passed, will amaze all that know the secret of that time. Soon after the restoration, it had been a very easy thing to have made up all differences among us, but the design was to enflame them: and that matter was far driven, as we all know. The earl of Bristol called together a meeting of the chief of the papists, and tendered them an oath of secrecy, as the lord Stafford told me in the Tower, and told it likewise at the bar of the House; he told them, that the breach between the church and the Dissenters was now fixed and would be carried further; it was therefore their interest to make use of all the provocations the Dissenters might meet with, and to offer their assistance to them, in order to the engaging them to petition for a general Toleration: yet they could never be brought to it. When the declaration for a general Toleration, in 1672, was questioned in parliament, which brought on the act of the Test, set forth in the preamble of this bill, the lord Clifford got some to move in favour of the Dissenters, hoping that would have provoked either the one side or the other, and that either the Church party might be offended with the motion, or the Dissenters with the refusing it. That was stopt by alderman Love, who desired though his own persuasion was well known, that nothing with relation to them might intervene to stop the security, that the nation, and the Protestant religion would have by that act in this he was seconded by most of that party, so that the act was obtained, in some measure by their assistance, and therefore it would be hard to turn it against them; for the king was then highly offended with them, for the giving up his Declaration. This wrought so much of that House, that was so zealous for the Church that they ordered a Bill to be brought in for the Ease of Protestant Dissenters, in which little progress was indeed made, yet to the end of that parliament the Conventicles were held very publicly, and they never passed a vote, or made an address against them. In the end of king Charles's reign we all remember that a new prosecution of them was sat on foot; and even then, when the severities against them were very hard, they were solicited by the agents of the court to petition for a general Toleration, but they could not be prevailed on. What some of them did in king James's reign is well known, and cannot be excused. By all this we see, that the whole management, with relation to Dissenters, was an artifice to advance a Popish interest, which must needs give a just jealousy of every thing that looks that way. After the late king had delivered us from all our fears and dangers, to whom (let ungrateful and malicious men treat his memory as they please) we owe our present happiness, and that we are now sitting here, his next care was to secure the Church of England by the Act of Toleration, which has not only set the Dissenters at ease, but has made the Church both stronger and safer, since God has so blessed our labours, that we see the Dissenters lose as much strength as we gain by it. The heat raised by those dissensions is much allayed, and their numbers are abated by a moderate computation at least a fourth part, if not a third. But now they are alarmed and begin to put on more zeal, for they apprehend the Toleration is aimed at, and that how little sooner seems to be in this bill, it is a step, and will be followed by more, that are kept in reserve till this point is once gained. The next step may be for their wives and children, and so the matter may be carried on till the whole Toleration is broke through. If one picks at a great dyke that keeps out the sea, it will be thought, how small a breach soever he makes at first, that he designs a total inundation. This seems to weaken and shake the Toleration; so men will grow jealous, and be on their guard, and by this means we of the Church shall not have so free and unexcepted an access to work on their reasons, which we now do with so much success, when once their passions are kindled against us. The present state of our affairs makes this yet more unseasonable. It is a common maxim, followed even by persecutors, to keep things quiet at home, when nations are engaged in war; especially in such a war as this, which is for universal monarchy, where all is at stake. There may happen great accidents in war, and it is no way advisable to raise discontents or apprehensions in great numbers, at home, which may come to have very ill effects, when we are in so good condition to deal with them.—I know somewhat of Foreign affairs: during the first six or seven years of the last reign, it was the common topic of the agents of France, in the courts of our allies, that England was so divided by factions at home, that there was no trusting to it; no doubt the same arts are now practised. Portugal and Savoy are two allies of the greatest consequence to us, who have no strength to resist the force that will be poured in upon them, but as they hope to be supported by the treasure, the fleet, and the assistance of England. Any thing that divides and weakens us must give them a melancholy prospect, and may make very dangerous impressions on them; whereas our union at home, and the maintaining the happy calm the nation is now in, will incline them to depend more firmly on our treaties with them.

“Some things give a just suspicion, when the men who promote them, and write for them without doors, are the known and avowed enemies of the government, who deny the queen's title, and are looking to one beyond sea. Can we think that those who separate from our churches, and have raised a schism in it, can be zealous for the peace and order of the church? They are zealous for somewhat else, and therefore we may well believe their zeal in this particular, is with a view to that to which they are driving. One author, who has writ two books in behalf of this bill, is known to be the furiousst Jacobite in England, and does not conceal it even in those books. In one of these he says, he is one called an high church-man. These are new terms of distinction, raised on design to distract us yet more. I know no high church, but the church of Rome; and that author L—— has in another book shewed us how near he comes to that Church, when he proposes, that a Treaty may be set on foot between our convocation, and the assembly of the Clergy of France; and that we should abate the regal supremacy, and they the papal, and then he fancies, all other matters could be easily adjusted: So here we see who are to be called High Church. Our legal establishment, founded upon the primitive pattern, is the true measure of our Church; and those who rise above it, are as much out of the way, as those who fall below it. But I knew one of the eminentest papists of the age, who used often to say, He was for the Church of England as by law established: I took the liberty to ask him how such a profession did agree with his sincerity? He answered, He looked upon the laws of queen Mary as yet in full force, for he thought queen Elizabeth, who repealed them, had no more right to the Crown than Oliver Cromwell had, so that her laws were no laws. I confess, ever since that time, I have been jealous when I hear some persons pretend so much zeal for the Church of England. The fury with which this matter is driven, does heighten the jealousy. What great matters could this bill produce, if there were not somewhat under it?—How comes it that our bench should be indecently treated, because we cannot all of us think it reasonable, and do not apprehend that we need it? We have, in the whole course of our lives, adhered to the interest of the church as all perils, and in all times, without ever once in any particular leaning to the Dissenters: and yet we, who have been our whole life long, by our labours and writings, building up the church, must now be defamed as the underminers, because we cannot comply with other mens notions. The head of our order is misrepresented with as much injustice as violence, though he stood as in the front of the church in the most dangerous times; and false stories are made, and publicly reported of him. I love not to use harder words, but this could be the better borne, if it were not for the relations and dependencies of those who vent them. I myself have met with a large share of such treatment, though in no step or part of my life, I ever gave the least occasion for it. When I wrote the History of the Reformation, for which I had the thanks of this house, I was then under no bias; I had neither favour nor interest to tie me, so that I wrote purely what was my own sense of things; and yet I took care to mark all the first beginnings of non-conformity, all the grounds they went on, and all the colours that imposed on them, and have shewed the mistakes and weaknesses of every one of them with an honesty and zeal that ought to set me beyond suspicion. But I own I began the world on a principle of moderation, which I have carried down through my whole life, and in which I hope I shall continue to my life's end. There was a time when those who are now so furious, and perhaps so full of hopes, needed my service, and I had some credit, which for some years was chiefly employed in their behalf. Your lordships may remember with what vehemence I pleaded, for excusing the deprived bishops from the oaths. Others were then, and are now in great posts, who, I am confident, will do me the justice to own, that I was the common agent both for papists and jacobites in distress; for which we are now so ill rewarded. But now to speak to the title of the bill, Occasional Conformity, I cannot in the general condemn this, but as it is accompanied with error and mistake. For a particular instance, I myself was an Occasional Conformist in Geneva and Holland. I thought their churches were irregularly formed, under great defects in their constitution, yet I thought communion with them was lawful, for their worship was not corrupted; but at the same time I continued my communion with our own church, according to the Liturgy of this church, with all that came about me. And if the designs of some of the promoters of this bill should be brought about, and I driven beyond sea, (unless among other unpardonable people, I should be at first knocked on the head) I, in that case, would communicate with the foreign churches, but would likewise gather all of this church about me, and still continue to worship God, according to the Liturgy, to my life's end. So I think Occasional Conformity, with a less perfect church, may well consist with the continuing to worship God in a more perfect one. It remains then a point of opinion which church or society is the less perfect. In this I am sure our church is the more perfect and regular, and that the separation is founded upon error and mistake; and that true edification is among us, and not among them; but some of them, by unhappy education, think otherwise, and in this they are certainly to blame, as they are in every part of the separation. But if it is intended to tolerate them under their other mistakes, I do not see why this should not be tolerated likewise, since it is much less dangerous than the other practices, which are now at present complained of.—The noble historian whom ye are now all reading with pleasure finds great fault with those who did not go to the French churches, even where they had an Ambassador's chapel to resort to, though this was certainly an Occasional Conformity with a less perfect church, where there was no obligation to go to it; and when they had a more perfect one at hand. It has been a topick insisted on by all who have writ against the Dissenters, from the first beginning of the dispute down to the present times; they have been always called on to come as near to the church as they could, and to do all that they could do with a good conscience, and therefore before the wars, great difference was made between the Puritans and the Brownists or separatists, on this very account: But now all this is reversed; the separatists are well looked on, whereas those who come much nearer us are discouraged, though we all see, that this is a step, by which many come over entirely to us, and the children of others do enter into a constant communion with us; and we shall go to cast a scandal on this to discourage it?—In my diocese, those who are Occasional Conformists out of principle, who sometimes go to church and go sometimes to meetings, are without number; who yet have no office, and seem to pretend to none; I confess I do not desire to press it too hard upon them, that they may not do both, lest this, instead of keeping them from meetings, hinder them from coming to church. I have heard but of one in my diocese, who goes to meetings, and that is only to a weekly lecture.—Therefore, since Occasional Conformity is only to be blamed, when it goes upon an error and a mistaken principle, I do not see why it should be worse treated than the error that are now tolerated, for it is, of all the errors that which has done the greatest service to the church.—I now come to the bill itself: I will a preamble here, that was in the former bill in favour of Toleration, which is now left out. I confess I don't know how it came to be there; for it did not very well agree with the bill, especially as it was first sent up to us. I put me in mind of a clause in the sentence of the inquisitors; when a heretic is condemned and delivered to the secular arm, they conjure the magistrate by the mercies of God, and the bowels of Jesus Christ, that no harm be done to the obstinate heretic, neither in life nor limb; but all this is but farce, for he is to be burnt immediately: Yet, after all, these words were a solemn declaration that could not have been forgot, if other matters had been afterwards offered at: They are now left out with great sincerity, no doubt, by those who do not intend to maintain the Toleration-Act; a very honest part when they will not profess it! I know it may be said, let us put in these words, and stand to them. But still this will not lay the apprehensions, the the leaving out these words must raise, as if the original design of this bill was to strike at the Toleration; and that therefore those who have contrived it, would not limit themselves by words of their own framing, so they may, to carry their point, consent to their being put in by others, to which they do only give way, which they will not think to be such a tie on them, as if they had, of one accord, put them in the first draught of the bill. There are other words in the preamble, that do not appear to me to be well grounded after the two acts, the Corporation-Act and the Test-Act are set forth. It is inferred, that it was intended, that all men comprehended in them should be, and always continue to be of the Communion of the church of England. By the first of these acts, no man could bear office in a corporation, unless he had received the Sacrament within three months after; so by the other, he who had a place of trust was to receive the Sacrament within three months after, so by these acts, it is very true, that no man might be in any employment, who either had not been, or was not then in the Communion of the church; but there is not a clause, nor a word in either of these acts, that imports, that he should always continue to be so. If the clause once offered had been altered, obliging such persons to come to church once a month, and to receive the Sacrament once a year, when this intution should have been fairly declared: but, as it is, since no such clause appears, I don't see how, in a recital, we can affirm a thing that has no foundation, for how unlimited soever our enacting power may be, yet in a recital a thing must either be as it is set forth to be, or all the authority on earth cannot make it to be otherwise than it is. As for the enacting part, when in a proper time a bill shall be brought in, disabling all to hold any employment, but those who continue to be in the Communion of the church of England, I shall concur in it heartily; but for a fine of 50*l.* I cannot agree to it; that punishment goes further than disabling; I cannot agree to any such clause: Nor is it consistent with the Act of Toleration, to lay a heavy fine for going to a meeting tolerated by law: Nor can I consent to the reckoning the foreign churches tolerated among us, which are by name excepted in the Act of Uniformity, among the meetings of the separatists from our church. This will have a strange sound all the world over, and will be a mighty discouragement to all abroad, who expect deliverance and protection from hence, when they understand that it is made so criminal a thing to worship God with them, and according to their way: For these reasons, I think this bill ought not to be now entertained, but that the subject-matter of the bill ought to be left to be considered at a proper time."

Lord Haverham said:

"My lords; I am very little personally concerned in this bill; I have no office, I expect none, nor do I desire any; and yet I pay as much duty to her majesty, and wish as well to her government, as those that have half a dozen.—I shall not, my lords, enter into the consideration of the justice or injustice of this bill, whether a man may be deprived of what he has a legal right to, without any forfeiture on his part; though, in my opinion, he may; because private right is always to give place to public safety; and nothing else can justify one of the best bills that ever was made for the security of the Protestant Religion, I mean the Test-Act: But this is not the case here; the persons affected by this bill are such as have always been serviceable to the government, and are some of the best friends to it.—Nor shall I trouble your lordships to shew, that the great enemies of the State do not so much consider you as you are three different nations, but as you are an embodied people under one sovereign. Neither does the church of Rome so much oppose you, as considered under the notion of church of England, occasional conformist, or Dissenter; but as you are part of the northern heresy, as you deny the supremacy, infallibility, and assert the idolatry of their church: They have no more affection for any one of these persuasions, than for another, and equally design the ruin of us all.—But, my Lords, that which I shall strictly speak to, is the point of time in which this Bill visits you; and, in my opinion, it could never have come in a more unseasonable and more dangerous juncture: I hope your lordships will not think I wander from the subject of the debate, if I shew you a little the present posture of our affairs, as to many arguments, that at least will, I hope, justify me for giving my vote against a second reading of this bill.—First, my Lords, if we consider what a potent, what a vigilant adversary we have to struggle with, the French king, a prince whose designs are laid upon the greatest maturity of deliberation, carried on with the greatest secrecy, and executed with the greatest dispatch: There is no unsteadiness in his councils, his troops are never surprised, his designs are never betrayed, his attempts never disappointed by either the emulation, envy, or private piques of his great generals: He can bring his armies sooner into the field, and keep them longer there than we can; nay, can do more with a small part, after we are gone into winter-quarters, than we can with the main body of ours in a whole campaign, and that too, when they are commanded by a general that has retrieved the glory of the English nation. Sure, my Lords, all heads; all hearts, all hands, are little enough against such an enemy.—In the next place, my Lords, what heavy taxes lie upon us here at home, without any hope of ease, and very little expectation of advantage? The reason why men cheerfully undergo such burthens, is because they expect some public advantage by them, or, at least, that they may enjoy the remainder with security: But, when they have no prospect from what is given, and are not secure of enjoying what is left, it will come very hard. We have, my Lords, given great sums the last year for the army; but what great matter have we done? For my own part, I think no man can reasonably expect more from what we are now raising this year, than to meet again next winter, and give more, and so on.—And as to our Navy, what a vast and fruitless expence have we been at? I confess to your lordships, when I consider these two heads, it puts me in mind of old Jacob's prophecy of his son Issachar, in the 29th chapter of Genesis; Issachar 'is a strong ass, couching under two burdens, he bowed his shoulders to bear, and became a servant to tribute.' I believe this prophecy has been fulfilled elsewhere.—Was there ever such an expedition undertaken as that into the Streights, last summer? I could never yet meet with that man who could give a reasonable account of it: Sure, no man will say that it was to carry on your trade; that was to put the nation to a million expence to carry out 3 or 400,000*l.* and make a kind of necessity of as much more to bring it home: Nor will any man, I think, own, that so great a force was sent thither to make the Italian princes declare for the Emperor, and then leave them to the mercy of the French: It is very true, so vast a fleet plainly shewed how formidable a power the confederates were by sea; but sure, it shewed also the weakness of our conduct, that knew so little what to do with it.—But there is one thing, my lords, that above all amazes me: every body knows, that the foundation of all our expectations and designs of placing the house of Austria on the throne of Spain, is laid on the assistance we expected from Portugal; we know too, by the manner of that prince's conduct and treatment with us, that no prince is governed more by interest. Why then was not a greater part of so vast a fleet left there to countenance or secure him? sure, it is unaccountable that he should have any just cause to apprehend himself either forgotten or neglected. No man knows what difficulties or delays may force him to.—A noble lord, with a white staff, gave it as a reason, who, though he was against the bringing in of this bill, yet, since it had passed another place, he was for it; because the not passing of it now, he feared, would create a great disturbance in our affairs; which I take to be a great reason against this bill: For it is very well known, the leading part of the nation are most concerned in it; and, if this bill should pass, the sad effects of it would soon be found in the Exchequer.—Besides all this, my lords, what great and irreparable losses have we had? The parliament may vote money, and money may build ships; but it is impossible to recover our seamen, nor is there any encouragement to them, or nursery for them.—There is one thing more, my lords, which I will at present but name; because, upon some other occasion I intend to speak more of that point. It may perhaps seem too big to be named, but I shall never think any thing so, that may prove dangerous to the crown or government: it is the extraordinary favour of one or two persons. A thing that has been very fatal to the royal family, and what has been may be. I will only in short say, when all the favour is bestowed upon one or two persons when all the power by sea and land is either virtually or openly in one hand; when all the offices, like a set of locks, are commanded by one master key; I pray God it never may again prove fatal both to crown and country.—Give me leave only to recapitulate and say, whether your lordships consider the present posture of our affairs, either at home or abroad, by sea or land, in a court or camp, I can never think that a proper time for such a bill."

These two lords were supported by the duke of Devonshire, the earl of Peterborough, the lord Mohun, the lord Ferrers, and the lord Wharton. The last of these, to shew the unreasonableness of any thing that might seem to lead to persecution, took notice of the distracted state of Scotland, and of the insolence of the papists in Ireland; adding, they ought rather to imitate the parliament of the late kingdom, in their zeal against popery, than to frame laws to increase their divisions here. As the lord Mohun, a peer eminently conspicuous for his parts, and his affection to the protestant succession, did not stick to say, that if the passed this bill, they had as good tack the pretended prince of Wales to it.

The Bill rejected.] Upon the whole matter the bill, after a second reading, was rejected by a majority of 12 voices.

Abstract of the Occasional Conformity Bill. As there is some difference, especially in the preamble, between this and the Bill of the preceding year, it will not be improper to insert an Abstract of it in this place:

"Whereas by an act made in the 13th year of the reign of king Charles 2, entitled, An Act for the well-governing and regulating of Corporations, it is, among other things therein contained, enacted, That from and after the 24th day of March, 1663, no person or persons should for ever be placed, elected, or chosen in or to any office or place of mayor, alderman, recorder, bailiff, town-clerk, common-councilman, or any office or offices of magistracy, or place, trust, or other employment relating to or concerning the government of any city or corporation, within the kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick upon Tweed, who should not within one year next before such election or choice, have taken the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the rites of the church of England; and in default thereof every such placing, election or choice, was thereby enacted and declared to be void.

"And whereas, by another Act made in the 25th year of the reign of the said king Charles 2, entitled, An Act for preventing dangers which may happen from popish recusants, it is enacted, among other things therein contained, That all persons, who should be admitted into an office, civil or military, after the first day of Easter term, in the year 1678, should receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the usage of the church of England, within three months after their admittance, in some public church, upon some Lord's day; and that all persons, who should neglect or refuse to take the Sacrament, as aforesaid, should be, ipso facto, adjudged incapable, and disabled in law to all intents and purposes whatsoever, to have or enjoy the said offices or employments. By which said several acts it was manifestly intended, that all persons to be admitted into such offices and employments should be, and always remain conformable to the church of England, as by law established; yet the said acts have been most notoriously and scandalously eluded by many Dissenters from the church of England, who have received the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, in order only to have or retain such offices and employments, and to evade the penalties of the said laws, and have afterwards withdrawn themselves from the communion of the church of England, and resorted to conventicles for the exercise of religion, in other manner than according to the Liturgy and practice of the church of England.

"For the preventing therefore such a scandalous and irreligious practice for the future, and the evil consequences thereof,

"Be it enacted, &c. That if any person or persons, after the 24th day of March, 1704, either peers or commoners, who have, or shall have any offices, civil or military, or shall have any command or place of trust, from under her majesty, her heirs or successors, or from any of her majesty's predecessors, within the kingdom of England, &c. or in the navy, or in the several islands of Jersey and Guernsey, or shall be admitted into any service or employment in the household or family of her majesty, her heirs or successors, or if any mayor, alderman, or other person, bearing any office of magistracy, or place, or trust, or other employment, relating to, or concerning the government of any of the respective cities, corporations, &c. who by the said recited acts, or either of them, were, or are obliged to receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the rites or usage of the church of England, shall at any time after their admission into their respective offices or employments, or after having such patent or grant, command or place, or trust, during their continuance in their offices or employments, knowingly or willingly resort to, or be present at any conventicle or meetings, under pretence of any exercise of religion, in other manner than according to the liturgy and practice of the church of England, in any place within the kingdom of England, &c. at which conventicle there shall be ten persons or more assembled together, shall forfeit 50*l.* to be recovered by him or them that shall sue for the same, by any action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, in any of her majesty's courts at Westminster; wherein no assign, or protection, or wager of law shall be allowed, or any more than one imparlance."

"And be it further enacted, That every person convicted in any action, or upon any information, in any of her majesty's courts at Westminster, or at the assizes, shall be disabled from thenceforth to hold such office or employment, and shall be adjudged incapable to bear any office or employment whatsoever, within the kingdom of England, &c.

"Provided always, That if any persons, who shall have been convicted, and thereby made incapable to hold any office, shall, after such conviction, conform to the church of England for the space of one year, without having been present at any conventicle or meeting, and receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the rites and usage of the church of England, at least three times in the year, such persons shall be capable of the grant of any the offices or employments aforesaid.

"Provided also, and be it further enacted, That every such person so convicted, and afterwards conforming in manner aforesaid, shall at the next term after his admission into any such office or employment, make oath in writing in any of her majesty's Courts at Westminster, or at the next quarter-sessions for that county or place where he shall reside, that he has conformed to the church of England for the space of one year, before such his admission, and that he hath received the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper at least three times in the year, provided that no person shall suffer any punishment for any offence committed against this act, unless oath be made of such offence, before some judge or justice of the peace, within ten days after the said offence committed; and unless the said offender be prosecuted for the same within three months after the said offence committed; nor shall any person be committed for any such offence, unless upon the oaths of two credible witnesses at the least.

"Provided always, That this act, nor any thing therein contained, shall not extend, or be judged to take away, or make void any office of inheritance; nevertheless, so as such persons having or enjoying any such office of inheritance do, or shall substitute and appoint his sufficient deputy, to exercise the said office, until such time as such person having such office shall conform, as aforesaid."

List of the Lords who voted for and against the Bill.] The following is a List of the Lords spiritual and temporal, who voted for or against the Bill:

London, G. St. Asaph, Tho. Roffen. N. Castrien.

Supplies granted.] Notwithstanding these differences, the Commons voted 40,000 men to act in conjunction with the Allies, 10,000 augmentation troops for the next year's service, 1704: and 7,000 foot, and 1,000 horse and dragoons for Portugal; and that 1,801,000*l.* be granted for these forces, guards and garrisons, and payments to the allies. Two days after, they voted 40,000 seamen, including 5,000 marines, for the sea service, 1704. Mr. Secretary Hedges acquainted the house, the 30th, that her majesty had been pleased to give this answer to their address about stopping all correspondence with France, 'That she thought the continuance of the stop of all post letters, trade, and all other correspondence with the enemies, so necessary for the public good, that she would forthwith give orders to her minister at the Hague, to insist upon it with the States General, as the Commons desired.' The same day the house voted an Address to her majesty, assuring her, they would provide for the making good such alliances as her majesty had made, or should make, with the duke of Savoy.

Vote occasioned by the Great Storm.] Several men of war having been lost in the great storm* which happened about this time, they unanimously resolved, "That an Address be presented to her majesty, expressing the great sense the house had of the calamity fallen upon the kingdom by the late violent storm, and that they could not see any diminution of her majesty's navy, without making provision to repair the same: Wherefore they besought her majesty, that she would immediately give directions for repairing this loss, and for building such capital ships as her majesty should think fit; and to assure her majesty, that at their next meeting the House would effectually make good that expence; and would give dispatch in raising the supplies already voted, for making good her majesty's treaties with the king of Portugal, and all her majesty's other allies, and would consider of effectual ways for promoting of trade, for managing her majesty's navy royal, and for encouraging the seamen."

The Queen's Speech respecting the Scottish Plot.] Dec. 17. The queen came to the house of peers, and having passed the Land Tax bill, made the following speech to both Houses:

"My lords and gentlemen; I think it proper, upon this occasion, to acquaint you, that I have had unquestionable informations of very ill practices and designs carried on in Scotland, &

"About the end of November the weather grew very boisterous, and broke out, on the 27th, in the most violent storm, both by sea and land, that had ever been known in the memory of man. The city of London was so shaken with it, that people were generally afraid of being buried in the ruins of their houses, some of which fell and crushed their masters to death. Great hurt was done in the southern parts of England, little happening in the north, where the storm was not so violent. The best part of our navy was then at sea, which filled all people with great apprehensions of an irreparable loss. And indeed, if the storm had not been at its height at full flood and in a spring tide, the loss might have proved fatal to the nation. It was so considerable, that fourteen or fifteen men of war were cast away, in which 1,500 seamen perished. Few merchant men were lost; such as were driven to sea were safe; some few only were overset. Our squadron, which was then in the Maese, suffered but little, and the ships were soon refitted, and ready to sail. The parliament being then sitting, the Commons, on this dismal occasion, presented an address to the queen, &c." Tiadal.

† "The seasonable discovery about this time of the ill designs of the Jacobites and French emissaries in Scotland, justified the lord Whar-

lar's taking notice, in his speech against the Occasional Conformity Bill, of the distracted state of that kingdom. The court of St. Germain's perceiving the divisions in Scotland, and the great opposition made in the parliament of that kingdom, had been encouraged to set all their agents there at work, in order to engage both the chief of the nobility, and the several tribes in the Highlands, to be ready to appear for them. Simon Frazer of Beaufort, lord Lovat, had gone through the Highlands the year before, and from thence went to France, where he pretended, that he had authority from the Highlanders to undertake to bring together a body of 12,000 men, if they might be assisted by some force, together with officers, arms, ammunition, and money, from France. After he had delivered this message to the queen at St. Germain's, she recommended him to the French ministers, of whom he had some audiences. He proposed, that 5,000 men should be sent from Dunkirk, to land near Dundee, with arms for 20,000 men; and that 500 should be sent from Brest, to seize on fort William, which commanded the great pass in the Highlands. The French hearkened to all this, but would not venture much upon slight grounds, and therefore sent him back, with some others, in whom they confided more, to see how much they might depend on, and what the strength of the Highlanders was. They were also ordered to try, whether any of the great nobility of that kingdom would engage in the design. When these came over, Frazer got himself secretly introduced to the duke of Queensberry, to whom he discovered all that had been already transacted; and undertook to discover the whole correspondence between St. Germain's and the Jacobites. He named also many of the lords, who opposed the duke most in parliament, and said, that they were already deeply engaged. The duke hearkened very willingly to all this, and gave him a pass to go through the Highlands again, where he found some were still very forward, but others were more reserved. At his return, he resolved to go back to France, and promised to make a more intimate discovery. He put one letter into the duke of Queensberry's hands, from the queen at St. Germain's, directed on the back, but by another hand, to the marquis of Athol. The letter was writ in such general terms, that it might have been directed to any of the great nobility; and probably he, who was trusted with it, had power given him to direct it to any, to whom he found it would be most acceptable; for there was nothing in the letter, that was particular to any one person or family; it only mentioned the promises and assurances sent to her by that lord. This Frazer had been accused of a rape, committed on a sister of the marquis of Athol's, for which he was convicted and outlawed; so that it might be supposed, that he, to be revenged on the marquis, who prosecuted him for that crime, might put his name on the back of the letter. It is certain, that the others, who were more trusted than Frazer, and were sent over with him, avoided his company, so that he was not made acquainted with that proceeding. He came up to London in winter, and had some meetings with the practising Jacobites about the town, to whom he discovered his negotiation. He continued still to persuade the duke of Queensberry of his fidelity to him. His name was not told the queen; for, when the duke wrote to her an account of the discovery, he added, that, unless she commanded it, he had promised not to name the person, for he was to go back to St. Germain's to complete the discovery. The queen did not ask his name, but had more regard to what he said, because, in the main, it agreed with the intelligence, that her ministers had from their spies at Paris. The duke of Queensberry procured a pass for him to go to Holland, but by another name, for he opened no part of this matter to the earl of Nottingham, who gave the pass. The Jacobites in London suspected Frazer's correspondence with the duke of Queensberry, and gave advertisement to the marquis of Athol, and by this means the whole matter broke out. About this time sir John Maclean, a papist, and head of that tribe or clan in the Highlands, and western isles of Scotland, came over from France in a little boat, and landed secretly at Folkstone in Kent. He brought his lady with him, though she had been delivered of a child but eleven days before. He was taken, and sent up to London; and it seemed, by all circumstances, that he came over upon some important design. He pretended, at first, that he came only to go through England into Scotland, to take the benefit of the queen's general pardon there. But, when he was told, that the pardon in Scotland was not a good warrant to come into England, and that it was high treason to come from France without a pass, he was not willing to expose himself to the severity of the law, and was prevailed upon to give an account of all that he knew concerning the negotiations between France and Scotland. Some others were at the same time taken up upon his information, and some upon suspicion. Amongst those there was one Keith, whose uncle was trusted by the court of St. Germain's, and whom they had sent over with Frazer, to bring them an account of the temper the Scots were in, upon which they might depend. Keith had been long at that court; he had free access both to that queen and the pretended prince of Wales, and hoped they would have made him under secretary for Scotland. For some time he denied, that he knew any thing; but afterwards he confessed, that he was made acquainted with Frazer's transactions, and he undertook to deal out prejudice: In the mean time, I make no doubt but, by this seasonable discovery, I shall be able to give such directions for our security, as will effectually prevent any ill consequences with his uncle, to come and discover all he knew, and pretended there was no other design among them, but to lay matters so, that the prince of Wales should reign after the queen. Ferguson offered himself to make great discoveries; he said, that Frazer was employed by the duke of Queensberry, to decoy some into a plot, which he had framed and intended to discover, as soon as he had drawn many into the guilt. He affirmed, that there was no plot among the Jacobites, who were glad to see one of the race of the Stuarts upon the throne; and they designed, when the state of the war might dispose the queen to a treaty with France, to get such terms given her, as king Stephen and king Henry 6, had, to reign during her life. When bishop Burnet heard this, he recollected what the marquis of Athol had said to him soon after the queen's accession to the crown; when, upon the bishop's saying, That he hoped none in Scotland thought of the prince of Wales; the marquis answered, He knew of none that thought of him, as long as the queen lived. The bishop replied, That, if any thought of him after that, he was sure the queen would live no longer, than till they thought their designs for him were well laid. But the marquis seemed to have no apprehension of that. The bishop immediately told the queen this, without naming the person; and she answered him very quick, There was no doubt of that. But, though the bishop could not but reflect often on that discourse, yet, since it was said to him in confidence, he never spoke of it to any one person, during all the enquiry that was now on foot. Ferguson, ever since he had left the place which had been given him at the Revolution, had been the boldest and most active man of the Jacobite party. He pretended, that he was now for High-Church, but many believed him a Papist. There was matter of treason sworn both against him and Keith, but there was only one witness to it.—At the same time Lindsey was taken up, who had been under-secretary, first to the earl of Melfort, and then to the earl of Middleton. He had carried over from France the letters and orders, that gave rise to the earl of Dundee's breaking out the year after the Revolution; and he had been much trusted at St. Germain's. He had a small estate in Scotland, and he pretended, that he took the benefit of the queen's pardon, and had gone to Scotland to save his estate; and, being secured by this pardon, he thought he might come from Scotland into England; but he could pretend no colour for his coming to England; and, therefore, it was not doubted, but that he came hither to manage their correspondence and intrigues. He pretended, that he knew of no designs against the queen and her government; and that the court of St. Germain's, and the earl of Middleton in parti-

from these pernicious designs.—Gentlemen of the House of Commons; I am very sensible your great readiness and affection for the public service, by presenting me so early in the sessions with a considerable part of your supplies I depend entirely upon your continuing with the same zeal to dispatch the remainder of them, that so we may be prepared to give the speediest assistance to our allies, and to defeat the malicious designs of our enemies; we cannot be more industrious to contrive the ruin of this kingdom, and of the Protestant religion than I shall always be vigilant and careful both for their present preservation, and for their future security."

cular, had no design against her. But, when he was shewed Frazer's commission to be a colonel, signed by the pretended king, and countersigned Middleton, he seemed amazed at it. He did not pretend it was a forgery, but said, that things of that kind were never communicated to him.—At the same time that these were taken up, others were seized on the coast of Sussex. One of these, Boucher, was a chief officer in the duke of Berwick's family who was then going to Spain; but it was suspected, that this was a blind to cover his going to Scotland.—During the height of the debate about the bill against Occasional Conformity the earl of Scarborough produced a letter from his brother, acquainting him, that several suspected persons, retainers to the duke of Berwick, were come over and seized. Upon this the earl of Nottingham, secretary of state, took the House, 'That this matter was already before the queen, and would, in few days, be laid before both Houses.' Nevertheless, a majority of lords, either out of zeal for the safety of the queen's person and government, or because they did not think it prudent to leave the inquiry into so important an affair in the hands of a person, whose affection to the Revolution Settlement had been questioned, resolved to appoint a committee of seven of their own members to examine into it, and ordered, that sir John Maclean be brought to their house the next day. The Lord Steward, having, on that day, acquainted the house, by her majesty's command, 'That the examination relating to sir John Maclean, was a matter of that nicety and great importance, that she thought it would be inconvenient to take it out of the method of examination it was now in, and that her majesty would, in a short time, communicate it to the house their lordships acquiesced, and ordered the lords, with the white staves, to attend the queen, to desire her, that sir John Maclean might be committed to such safe custody, that no person be permitted to speak to him without her leave, and that he neither write nor receive any letters or papers from any person, without the like permission from her majesty: Which was complied with." Tindal

Lords appointed a Select Committee, to take examinations, as to the Plot, and presented the following Address to her majesty;

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, return our most humble acknowledgments to your majesty, for your gracious condescension, in promising to communicate to us those informations you have received of the ill practices of your majesty's and our enemies in Scotland; and we doubt not but the zeal this House has shewed, for having the persons secured, and their designs brought to light, has been very acceptable to your majesty: We rely upon your majesty, that you will give such directions as may effectually prevent all pernicious designs. And we trust in God Almighty's goodness, that that watchful providence, which has discovered the wicked Plot as seasonably, will likewise prosper all your majesty's counsels and good intentions. We reckon all our concerns, but chiefly the greatest of all, the Protestant religion, to be very safe under your majesty's tender care and wise administration; and we will, by our utmost zeal, maintain the rights of the crown and the church of England, in all such ways as may best answer your majesty's pious designs, and may most promote the good and happiness of all your subjects. We desire not to let our thoughts go beyond your majesty's person, to a future security, but as it is necessary for your majesty's preservation, as well as for settling the minds of all your good subjects; who look to the Protestant succession as your majesty's best security, as well as their own."

The Queen's Answer.] To this her majesty answered:

"My Lords; I am very glad to find that the communication I made to this parliament has been so acceptable to you.—I make no doubt of the seal of the House of Lords; nor shall my own ever be wanting, to secure my people from dangers, to promote their good and happiness, to establish the church of England and the Protestant succession to all posterity."

The Commons' Address thereon.] The Address of the Commons was as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign; We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons, in parliament assembled, do return your majesty our most humble and hearty thanks, for your most gracious speech from the throne.—We are truly sensible of your majesty's great goodness, and of the confidence you repose in us, by communicating the discovery of the ill practices and designs that have been carried on in Scotland, by emissaries from France; whereby we have an opportunity to repeat our unanimous resolutions to stand by, and support your majesty and the succession in the Protestant line, as limited by law, against all pretenders, and all your majesty's enemies whatsoever.—We want words to express to your majesty, the devotion we have any conspiracies and attempts, to disturb the peace and prosperity of your happy government; under which, we must think our security sufficiently provided for, since your majesty has been pleased to give such directions, as may prevent all ill-consequences from them.—It is a great satisfaction to us, to find that the supplies we have already given, are so acceptable to your majesty: We shall go on with the same readiness and zeal to dispatch the remainder of them, that we may enable your majesty to give the speedier assistance to your allies, and to defeat the malicious designs of your enemies.—Your faithful Commons can never have the least distrust of your majesty's vigilance and care, for the preservation of the Protestant interest in general, of the monarchy, and the church of England, as by law established: And we humbly beg leave to assure your majesty, that we will never be discouraged, but will continue incessant in our endeavours, by all proper methods, to transuit them securely settled to posterity."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty gave this answer:

"Gentlemen; I am very well pleased with your assurances of dispatching the supplies, and with the other parts of this address, in which you express so much duty and readiness to support, and to trust me.—You may depend upon my willingness to join my endeavours with you, in securing to posterity the Protestant succession, in the monarchy, and the church of England, as it is established by law."

Dispute between the two Houses concerning the Scottish Plot.] Dec. 20. Mr. St John reported, that the members appointed to search the Lords' Journals, as to their proceedings in relation to the Examination of any persons, who are discovered to have a Design against her majesty's government, had searched the Lords' Journals accordingly: and he read in his place what they had found therein, and delivered the same in at the table; where the same was again read.

A motion being made, and the question being proposed, That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, setting forth the great concern this House hath for her majesty's royal prerogative, and the resolution of this House to support the same; and that no persons accused for crimes, who are her majesty's prisoners, ought to be taken out of the custody of the crown, without her majesty's leave: and a debate arising in the house thereupon:

And a motion being made, and the question being put, that the debate be adjourned? it passed in the negative.

Then the main question being put; Resolved, "That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, setting forth the great concern this house hath for her majesty's royal prerogative, and the Resolution of this House to support the same; and that no persons accused for crimes, who are her majesty's prisoners, ought to be taken out of the custody of the crown, without her majesty's leave."

The Second Address of the Commons.] Dec. 23. Mr. St. John reported, from the committee to whom it was referred to draw up an Address upon the Resolutions of yesterday, that they had drawn up an Address accordingly, which they had directed him to report to the house; which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered in at the table, where the same was read, and agreed unto by the House, as follows;

“ Most gracious sovereign;

“ We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of England, in parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to lay before your majesty the great and just concerns we are under, to see any violation of your royal prerogative.—Your faithful Commons believe the administration of the government best secured, when it is left to your majesty, with whom the law has entrusted it; and have so firm a dependence upon your majesty's affection to your people, and your great wisdom, that they can never apprehend so little danger from any conspiracy, as when the examination thereof is under your majesty's directions.—We are therefore surprized to find, that when several persons, suspected of treasonable practices against your majesty, were taken into custody by your messengers, in order to be examined; the Lords, in violation of the known laws of the land, have wrested them out of your majesty's hands, and without your majesty's leave or knowledge, in a most extraordinary manner, taken the examination of them solely to themselves; whereby a due enquiry into the evil practices and designs against your majesty's person and government, may in a great measure be obstructed.—Your loyal Commons do therefore most earnestly desire your majesty, to suffer no diminution of that prerogative, which, during your majesty's reign, they are confident will always be exerted for the good of your people.—And we humbly beg leave to assure your majesty, that as we are resolved, by timely and effectual supplies, to enable your majesty to carry on the war, which you have so gloriously begun; so we will, to the utmost of our power, support your majesty in the exercise of your just prerogative at home, and the asserting of it against all invasions whatsoever.”

The Queen's Answer.] January 3, 1704. To this Address the queen answered:

“ Gentlemen; I have had the satisfaction to find, that the matter which may have occasioned this address, is now at an end.—I return you many thanks for the concern you express for my prerogative; and for your repeated assurances of making the supplies effectual, which will be greatly for the honour and advantage of the kingdom.—I shall be careful not to give way to any invasion of the prerogative of the crown, or of the rights and liberties of the people.”

The Lords declare their Right to examine

Persons, and order them into Custody, and the Address of the Commons is unparliamentary, &c.] Jan. 14. The Lords came to the following Resolutions:

“ 1. It is resolved and declared, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that, by the known laws and customs of parliament, this House hath an undoubted right to order persons, so to be examined, be taken into the custody of her majesty's sworn officers attending this house, during such examination; or to commit them to any other safe custody that they shall think proper and to restrain others, if they see cause, from having access to, or communication with them.”

“ 2. It is resolved and declared, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the Address of the House of Commons, presented to her majesty the 23rd of December last, is unparliamentary, groundless and without precedent, and highly injurious to the House of Peers, tending to interrupt a good correspondence between the two houses, and to create an ill opinion in her majesty of the House, and of dangerous consequence to the liberties of the people, the privilege of parliament, and constitution of this kingdom.”

Representation of the Lords to the Queen concerning the Address of the Commons complaining of the Lords examining Conspirators &c.] Jan. 17. Upon the last Address of the Commons, the Lords drew up the following Representation:*

“ May it please your most excellent ma-

* “ The Address of the Commons against the Lords was a proceeding without a precedent: the parliamentary method was, when one House was offended with any thing done the other, conferences were demanded, which matters were freely debated. But to begin an appeal to the throne was new, and might be managed by an ill-designing prince so as to end in the subversion of the whole constitution. And it was an amazing thing to see an House of Commons affirm, in so public a manner, and so positively, that the Lords taking criminals into their own custody, in order to an examination, was without warrant or precedent, when there was so many instances fresh in every man's memory, especially since the time of the Popish plot, of precedents in both Houses, that went much farther, of which a full search had been made, and a long list of them read in the house of Lords. That did not a little confound those among them, who were believed to be in a secret correspondence with the House of Commons; they were forced to confess, that they saw the Lords had cited precedents to justify them in what they had done, of which they were in great doubt before. It seemed surprizing to many, that the Commons, whose proper province it is to take care of the liberties of the subject, should not appear such zealous assertors of the royal prerogative, in opposition to the house of Lords jeſty; We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the Lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, find ourſelves under an unhappy neceſſity of making this our humble application to the throne, upon occaſion of an Address preſented to your majeſty, by the Houſe of Commons, the 23d day of December laſt, and ſince that time published to the whole nation in print; by which the Houſe of Lords is charged with the violation of your royal prerogative, and of the known laws of the land; with wreſting perſons ſuſpected of treaſonable practices, and taken into cuſtody by meſſengers, out of your majeſty's hands without your leave or knowledge, and in a moſt extraordinary manner taking the examination of them ſolely to themſelves; whereby a due enquiry into the evil practices and deſigns againſt your majeſty's perſon and government, might in great meaſure be obſtructed. And they conclude their Address, by moſt earneſtly deſiring your majeſty to ſuffer no diminution of your prerogative, and promiſe to ſupport you in the aſſerting it againſt all invaſions whatſoever. It is not poſſible for us to remain ſilent under this heavy charge, ſo unjuſtly, and, without the leaſt ground or colour, endeavoured to be fixed upon the whole body of the peers; which tending directly to create an ill opinion of us in your majeſty, puts us under an inevitable neceſſity, of vindicating both the legality and dutiful manner of our proceeding.

who are the natural defenders of it. But this was entirely owing to a party-pique; the Tories, or High-Church-party, who were the ſtrongeſt in the Houſe of Commons, laying hold of all opportunities, both to ingratiate themſelves with the queen, and to oppoſe the Whigs, who had the majority in the Houſe of Lords. Beſides, the Tories received no ſmall encouragement from ſome perſons in high ſtations, who were ready enough to countenance thoſe who endeavoured to ſtifle the Scots conſpiracy, which made the Whig Lords the more eager to examine into it.—The Houſe of Lords highly reſented the reflection caſt upon them by the Commons in this Address; and therefore, to vindicate their honour, and aſſert their privileges, they declared, “That, by the known laws and cuſtoms of parliaments, they had an undoubted right, whenever they conceive it to be for the ſafety of her majeſty and the kingdom, to take examinations of perſons charged with criminal matters, whether they be in cuſtody or not; and to order, that perſons to be examined be taken into cuſtody of her majeſty's ſworn officer attending their houſe.” And four days after, they reſolved, “That the Address of the Commons is unparliamentary, groundleſs, without precedent, and highly injurious to the Houſe of Peers, tending to interrupt the good correſpondence between the two Houſes, and create an ill opinion in her majeſty of the Houſe of Peers, and of dangerous conſequence to the liberties of the people, the con-

House of Commons are ſo very harſh and indecent, that we may truly affirm the like never uſed of the Houſe of Peers, in any age, not even by, that aſſembly, which, under the name of the Houſe of Commons, took upon them not only to aboliſh the Houſe of Lords, but to deſtroy the monarchy. We ſhall carefully avoid making returns of that kind: we conſider too much what we owe to ourſelves; and we know too well the profound reſpect due to your royal perſon, to let any provocation transport us ſo, as to uſe words unfit to be offered by us to our ſovereign.

“The matter of this Address is no leſs injurious to us than the terms. There was not the leaſt occaſion for a juſt objection to any part of our conduct in that buſineſs to which the Address relates; the proceeding was ſtrictly juſtifiable by the known laws and cuſtoms of parliament, it was carried on with the utmoſt reſpect to your majeſty, and with true zeal for the ſafety of your perſon and government; all that was done was agreed to by the concurrent opinion of the Houſe, without the leaſt objection from any of our members, who have the honour of ſerving your majeſty in your great offices and employments.

“We humbly repreſent to your majeſty, that, by the known laws and cuſtom of parliaments, the Houſe of Peers has an undoubted right, in caſes where they conceive it to be for the good and ſafety of your majeſty and the kingdom, to take examinations of perſons ſtitution of the kingdom, and privileges of parliament.” This done, they preſented, the next day, a Representation to the queen, in which they complained of the ill uſage they had met with from the Houſe of Commons: they uſed none of thoſe hard words, that were in the Address made againſt them by the Houſe of Commons, yet they juſtified every ſtep they had taken, as founded on the law and practice of parliament, and no way contrary to the duty and reſpect they owed to the queen. The behaviour of the Commons was ſuch, on this occaſion, as if they had no mind that plots ſhould be narrowly looked into. No houſe of parliament, and indeed no court of judicature, did examine any perſon, without taking him into their own cuſtody during ſuch examination; and, if a perſon's being in cuſtody muſt reſtrain an houſe of parliament from examining him, here was a maxim laid down, by which bad miniſters might cover themſelves from an enquiry into their ill practices, only by taking the perſons, who could make discoveries, into cuſtody. The Lords alſo ſet forth the ill conſequences that might follow upon one houſe of parliament carrying their complaints of another to the throne, without taking firſt the proper method of conferences. This representation was drawn with the utmoſt force, as well as beauty and decency of ſtile, and was reckoned one of the beſt pieces of its kind, that were in all the records of parliament.” Tindal.

charged with criminal matters, whether such persons be then in custody or not, and also to order the persons so to be examined, to be taken into custody of your majesty's sworn officers attending the House, during such examination, or to commit them to any other safe custody that they shall think proper; and to restrain others, if they see cause, from having access to, or communication with them: the House of Lords has exercised this right from time to time, as occasions have required, without objection. Our records are filled with precedents which warrant our claim in every part of it, and we presume to affirm to your majesty, that the drawing this right into question at any time, cannot but be of dangerous consequence to the liberties and safety of the people, and to the constitution of the government, as tending to avoid, or render in great measure ineffectual the enquiries of parliaments, which are so absolutely necessary, especially where many and great persons are engaged in dangerous designs against the government; or where ill ministers abuse their favour towards the oppressing or enslaving of the people. Your majesty's wisdom and goodness make us secure at present against all influences of that kind, and we unanimously and heartily pray we may long enjoy the blessing of your reign. But if it happens in future times, that ill men should gain too great a degree of favour with our princes; how easy will it be for them to stifle or defeat all parliamentary enquiries into their crimes; for if the being in prison, or in the hands of a messenger, will protect men from being examined in the House of Lords, or from being put into the custody of the proper officers of the House during the examination, and debarred from conversing with others; it will certainly be always in the power of favourites to cause those who can be witnesses against them, as well as the accomplices of their designs, to be taken into custody. And if persons in custody are out of the reach of the House of Lords, who are the hereditary counsellors of the crown, and in whom a judicial power is lodged by the constitution, it is not to be imagined that the Commons can pretend to a greater power of examining, committing, or restraining them.

"No House of Commons till now has given countenance to this dangerous opinion, which does so directly tend to the rendering ill ministers safe from the examination of parliaments, and we are persuaded no House of Commons hereafter will assert such a notion, because they are not wont easily to part with a power they have assumed; and it is certain, that they have several times taken upon them to exercise an authority like that which they have so severely reflected on in their Address.

"This consideration gave us the greater astonishment, to find our proceeding represented in the strange terms of wresting prisoners out of your majesty's hands, and taking the examination of them solely to ourselves. We believe the ordering persons to be examined in that high court, where your majesty is always present in consideration of law, and in that great council where you may be present in your royal person, as often as you please, will never be thought an exclusion of your majesty from the examinations, if that was intended to be insinuated by saying, we have taken the examinations solely to ourselves. Having thus laid before your majesty what is we claim, and must insist on, as the indisputable right of the House of Peers, which we never thought, in the time of your royal ancestors, to be prejudicial to the just prerogatives of the crown, and which is manifestly necessary for the securing the liberties of your people, whereof we are assured your majesty will have an equal care, we humbly beg leave to lay before you a short state of the particular matter of fact relating to these prisoners, not doubting, but when the whole proceedings is known to your majesty, it will be approved not only as lawful, but every way respectful to your majesty.

"On Tuesday the 14th of December, the House of Lords was informed, that seven persons had been seized by the custom house officers on the coast of Sussex as they came from France; and that amongst them there was one Boucher, who was capable of making considerable discoveries, having been in arms in the French service for many years, and a gentleman of the horse, and aid de camp to the late duke of Berwick, who stands attainted of high treason; and who had been secretly in England several times before; that it was probable, if he was strictly examined, he might be brought to confess, since he saw his life in apparent danger; but that he was a bold man and likely to attempt an escape on that account, if he was not carefully looked after, and the House was also told, that there was general remissness both in the taking, searching and looking to such prisoners, which deficiencies afterwards appear very evidently in the examinations that were taken. Upon this information the earl of Nottingham, your majesty's principal secretary of state, acquainted the house that he had not heard of Boucher's name particularly, but had sent messengers to bring one Ogilby, and the other prisoners who had been apprehended by the custom house officers to town; and that he believed the messengers would do their duty, but he would not be answerable for them.

"After this account of the prisoners, and what had been done in order to secure them, the House thought themselves obliged in duty to your majesty, and for the public safety, at that time when the kingdom is engaged in an open war with France, and that there are too just grounds to apprehend the dangerous practices of French emissaries, to make an humble Address to your majesty, that particular care might be taken for securing the person of Boucher, and of those who were taken with him, and that none might be suffered to speak with them till they were examined.

"The next day your majesty's gracious Answer to this Address was reported to the House, that care had been taken to secure the prisoners, and that your majesty would give orders that nobody should speak with them till they were examined. Thereupon the Lords retired into a farther consideration of the importance of this matter, and, conceiving nothing to be more likely to bring prisoners, who had forfeited their lives, to a full discovery of the truth, than to find themselves under the enquiry of a parliament, they thought it would be of public service, for them to take examinations of these persons; and accordingly an order was made that no persons should speak with the prisoners, till they had appeared at the bar of the House.

"On the 16th day, the earl of Nottingham informing the House of Lords, that the prisoners were brought to town; the usher of the black rod was ordered to take them into his custody, in order to their examination, and to keep them separate, and in close custody, (as your majesty had before directed) and it being thought most proper, from the nature of the case, that the examination should be by a committee of Lords, rather than by the whole House, it was resolved accordingly.

"We beg leave to mention to your majesty a matter of fact which satisfied the Lords, that their resolution to take the examinations of Boucher, and the persons apprehended with him, was neither unknown nor disagreeable to your majesty: on the same day when that was ordered, being the 15th of December, the Lords resolved to examine sir John Maclean, a very dangerous person, as was represented to the House, who then stood committed in the hands of a messenger; and for that purpose ordered him to be brought to the House the next day, having, as they then thought, very good grounds to believe it might prove of great service to your majesty. Sir John Maclean was brought to the House according to the order, but your majesty being pleased so far to take notice of this order, as to signify to the House by the lord steward, that sir John Maclean had been in part examined already, and that your majesty thought it not proper to have that business taken out of the way of examination it was then in, but that your majesty would in a short time communicate it to the House; the Lords immediately acquiesced in your majesty's opinion, and sent back sir John Maclean to the place from whence he was brought. It was with this disposition of mind the Lords acted in the whole matter; and if your majesty, who no doubt had the same notice of both orders, had thought any other method of the examination of Boucher, and the persons taken with him, more proper than of the Lords; they had reason to conclude your majesty would have intimated it at the same time, and most certainly the House would have had a like deference for your royal judgment in that instance also.

"The Lords committees appointed to examine the prisoners, proceeded with all possible dispatch, and made their report to the House on the 21st of December. Upon consideration of the report, the House found it requisite to commit Boucher to the prison of Newgate, for high-treason, and the Lords committees having submitted to the judgment of the House, whether several parts of the examinations referred to in their report, should be laid open to the House, or put into any other way of being farther enquired into, or prosecuted; the House, out of a full assurance they had, that when the matter of fact should be laid before your majesty, you would certainly give such orders thereupon as were every way suitable to your royal prudence, and tender care of the public safety, did unanimously resolve, without so much as suffering those parts of the report to be laid open to the House, that an humble Address should be made from the House to your majesty, by the Lord Steward, and the duke of Somerset, (two of the Lords committees to whom the examination had been referred) laying before your majesty the whole report, with all matters relating thereto, and humbly desiring your majesty to give order, that Boucher should be prosecuted by Mr. Attorney-General for high-treason, and that as to the commitment, prosecution or discharge of the other prisoners mentioned in the report, you would be pleased to give such directions as should seem most proper to your royal wisdom. Thus, that as the whole affair was entered upon out of zeal for your majesty's preservation, and the safety of the kingdom, and was carried on and concluded with all possible respect to you; so we had the comfort to rest assured, that our behaviour was no less graciously accepted by your majesty, from the Answer you were pleased to make, the same day, to our last Address on this subject, and which was reported to us on the 22d of December, by the duke of Somerset, whereby your majesty was pleased to signify to the House, with your accustomed goodness, that you would give order for every thing as the Lords had desired.

"Madam; this is a true and just account of our proceedings, which have been so strangely misrepresented, and to which no exception can possibly be taken, by any persons rightly informed. For, as we had your royal approbation of all that was done; so the House of Commons could have had no pretence of objection, if they had taken the usual parliamentary methods of desiring to be informed of what we had done, and of the grounds of our proceedings, before they had approached your majesty with such a representation of them.

"Their carrying this unprecedented Address to your majesty, in so hasty a manner, gives us almost as great trouble as the hard usage we find in it.

"The ancient, known, and indeed only effectual method of preserving a good correspondence between the two Houses of parliament, has been by Conferences. If, at any time, either House conceived they had a reasonable ground to object against the proceedings of the other, conferences have been desired, and the matter in debate between them fairly discussed; and thereby, mistakes have been declared for the most part, and a good understanding cultivated, and a mutual respect preserved, which is always highly requisite, in the nature of our constitution, but more especially necessary in this time of war and danger.

“Had the House of Commons thought fit to have pursued this method upon this occasion, we should have been able to have given them entire satisfaction, not only of the lawfulness of all we had done, but of the just and weighty ground upon which we took the examinations of these persons into our own hands: or at least, if they could have convinced us of any mistake, we should have given them any reasonable satisfaction.

“But, without making any such previous step, the House of Commons have made an appeal directly to the throne, against the House of Lords, and charged them, though most unjustly, with attempts of the highest nature. Nothing like this was ever done before, and out of our hearty concern for the preservation of our happy constitution, we hope the same thing will never be done again. We know your royal heart is unmoveably fixed on the preserving the liberties of your people, and transmitting them entire to posterity; but if, in after times, the houses of parliament should be appealing against one another to the crown, (for, if such a course be justifiable in the House of Commons, the same method may be taken by the Lords) as your majesty is now sensible how great difficulties it necessarily brings upon a good prince; so it is easy to foresee (and we cannot think of it without terror,) how fatal the consequences may be, in the reign of an ill-designing prince, and what advantages may be taken from it, for utterly subverting the best ordered form of government in the world. There are examples abroad, where proceedings of this kind have ended in the overthrow of the liberties of the people, which makes us the more apprehend the beginning of them among ourselves. Your majesty's great judgment cannot but readily discern, whither it does naturally tend, for one House of parliament to be exciting, and earnestly desiring the sovereign to exert a real or supposed prerogative against the other House. It is not easy to imagine what the Commons could expect of your majesty from such an application: the Lords have never entertained a thought of using this dangerous method, whatever occasions may have been given within the compass of late years; and we promise your majesty, we will always endeavour to preserve a good understanding with the House of Commons, and shall never think it too dear to procure that union at any rate, unless that of delivering up those rights and powers which are lodged in us by the law, and without which, the constitution cannot subsist.

“We shall never be guilty of the presumption of prescribing to your majesty, when, or against whom you should exert your prerogative; but we will be always ready to assist you in the support of all the just rights of the crown, as well as in the maintaining the liberties of the subject, which we know are no less dear to your majesty.

“It may, with modesty and truth, be affirmed that the Lords have, in all times, been the surest and most natural bulwark of the prerogatives of the crown, they being (as your royal grandfather, of ever blessed memory, was pleased to express it) an excellent screen and barrier between the prince and the people, to assist each against any encroachment of the other.

“We will never contribute, by any actions, to the diminution of the rights of the crown, nor, as far as we are able, will suffer in others. We cannot act otherwise without hurting ourselves in the highest degree, being thoroughly convinced, that the preservation of the legal prerogative is not only the surest way to secure our own privileges, but of absolute necessity for the happy and rightful administration of the government. And we hope the House of Commons will, in all times to come, speak and act with that regard to the prerogative which they seem to have taken lately.

“There remains one particular more, which we will only name to your majesty, because we rest satisfied it cannot have weight at court; that is, the insinuation in the Address as if the examination of these prisoners, by the Lords, was in order to obstruct the enquiry into the designs against your majesty's person and government; or at least, that it was likely to produce such an effect. Our dutiful zeal in your majesty's government, and our warm concern to discover all designs and oppose all practices against it, are too well known to the world, that any suggestions of that sort should make the least impression to our disadvantage; and we are very sure it was no suspicion of that nature which gave the true rise to this very sharp Address. It is easy to determine, whether a hearty and forward undertaking to search into the designs of your enemies, or the seeking occasions to object to, and interrupt such endeavours, be most likely to obstruct the discovery of the pernicious practices of traitors.

“Most gracious sovereign; we most humbly ask pardon for presuming to give your majesty the trouble of this long representation, which has proceeded from the passionate concern we have to stand, not only acquitted, but entirely approved in the judgment of so excellent a queen, and so justly beloved of all her subjects.

“We depend upon your justice, as well as your goodness, that nothing can do us prejudice, (from whatsoever hands it comes) in your royal opinion, while we continue to act in the station where we are placed by the form of the English government, according to the law.

and customs of parliament, with all imaginable respect and duty to yourself, and all possible zeal for the safety and happiness of your kingdom.

"Give us leave to conclude this our humble Address with this firm promise, that no danger, no reproaches, nor any artifices whatsoever, shall deter or divert us from using our utmost endeavours, from time to time, in discovering and opposing all contrivances and attempts against your royal person and government, and the Protestant succession as by law established."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's Answer to this Representation was:

"My Lords; I am very sorry for any misunderstandings that happen between the two Houses of parliament, which are so inconvenient for the public service, and so uneasy to me, that I cannot but take notice, with satisfaction, of the assurances you give me, that you will carefully avoid all occasions of them.—I thank you for the concern you express for the rights of the crown, and for my prerogative; which I shall never exert so willingly as for the good of my subjects, and the protection of their liberties."

The Commons' Address, in answer to the Representation of the Lords.] Jan. 22. The Commons ordered, that some of their members be appointed to search the Journals of the House of Lords, touching their proceedings upon the late Address of this House to her majesty, and the Representation thereupon; and also to search precedents concerning commitments by the House of Lords, in cases where the person has been in the custody of the crown, and report the same to the House: and several members were appointed accordingly.

Feb. 3. The said Report of the Journal of the House of Lords, relating to the Address of this House, and the Representation of the House of Lords, was read.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, to clear this house from the misrepresentation of the house of Lords, in their Representation presented to her majesty; which said Address was conceived in the following terms:

"Most gracious sovereign; your majesty having with great goodness, declared from the Throne to your parliament, that divers ill practices and designs had been carried on in Scotland, by emissaries from France, which might have proved extremely dangerous to the peace of these kingdoms; and that you would lay the particulars before your parliament, as soon as the several examinations could be fully perfected and made public, without prejudice; we, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal Commons, resting secure and satisfied in your majesty's great wisdom and care, most thankfully acknowledge the confidence you have been pleased to repose in us.—But finding upon the Lords' Journals, that their lordships, the very same day, made two orders, one to remove your majesty's prisoners out of your custody into their own, and the other to commit their examination solely to a committee of seven Lords, chosen and appointed by themselves; by which your majesty seemed excluded from any power over the said prisoners:—Your loyal Commons, justly sensible of the dangerous consequences of such proceedings, thought themselves obliged to declare their concern at this violation of your royal prerogative, and the known laws of the land, in an humble Address presented to your majesty.—Your faithful Commons are well assured, when this matter comes to be rightly stated and understood, a zeal so well intended, and so well grounded, will rather be imputed to them as meritorious than liable to exception; and therefore, since their humble Address has been so artfully misrepresented by the Lords in their late Representation, presented to your majesty on Tuesday, the 18th of January, and published and spread with unusual industry through all parts of the kingdom, they look upon themselves under an indispensable necessity of appearing before your majesty in their own justification.—Their lordships think fit to take offence at the manner and words of our Address, and accompany this exception with reflexions and insinuations, more harsh and more odious than the most opprobrious language: but, as we made use of no terms but what were suitable to the occasion, so it will appear by precedents, that the same have been frequently and reciprocally used by both Houses to each other; nor could the Commons, in respect to your majesty, assert your royal prerogative, in words of less force than those in which they have vindicated their own privileges.—Whatever expressions our zeal for your majesty, and the public, might have inspired, we could never have offered to our sovereign so ungrateful a remembrance as the destruction of the monarchy, by a detestable assembly, composed of members of both Houses, who being alike partakers in the guilt, ought equally to share the reproach.—With much more reason might we observe, both on behalf of your majesty and the Commons, that their lordships, not contented with preferring their own examinations to yours, not contented with excluding your majesty and the Commons, to whom parliamentary enquiries most properly belong, do appropriate to their House only, even in their application to their sovereign, the name of a parliament; an instance not to be paralleled, unless by that very assembly that subverted the monarchy.—It is not the question at present, as stated by the Lords, whether their lordships have a power of taking into custody, while under examination, persons accused of criminal matters, cognizable in parliament? but, that their lordships have a right to take the prisoners of the crown, and the examination of them, solely into their own hands, without your majesty's consent, and in such a manner as must necessarily prove an exclusion to your majesty, and this house, is the proposition your Commons deny, and for which their lordships have produced no precedent.—This unhappy occasion has been, at the same time, accompanied with the most surprising instances of contradiction, and counter-orders to your majesty, both preceding and subsequent to it, but especially on the 29th of January last, when your majesty, with your accustomed goodness, communicated to the Lords the papers relating to the Scotch conspiracy, with an exception only of some matters not yet proper to be made public, without preventing a further discovery of secrets of greater importance, with which your majesty assured their lordships they should also be acquainted, as soon as it could be done without prejudice. However their lordships, upon what provocation, or for what reason now where appears, immediately addressed your majesty, pressing you to lay before them the whole matter, with all papers relating thereto; by which your majesty was put under a necessity, either to give their lordships a refusal, or to comply with their unexpected importunity, to the endangering the public service. These proceedings, so extraordinary in their nature and in their manner, could not but sensibly affect your faithful Commons, whose earnest desire it is to see both your houses of parliament, and the whole body of your people, entirely agreed to pay the deference due to your majesty's wisdom, to confide in your care, and to promote and maintain your honour and dignity.—Their lordships, not satisfied with assuming this unprecedented power, have endeavoured, with a great deal of art, to persuade your majesty of the necessity of it, to prevent the designs of ill princes and their favourites: but as it may seem unreasonable for their lordships to begin to practise upon a good prince, such methods as are pretended only to be needful against an ill one, so it is our humble opinion, that the dangers might be much greater, admitting this precedent; should the Lords combine to defend one another from enquiries and prosecutions, all parliamentary impeachments might be eluded, secret designs carried on, the innocent aspersed without reparation, and the guilty acquitted without trial. Nor is that instance mentioned by the Lords an unreasonable caution, since that revolution in a neighbouring kingdom alluded to by their lordships, was occasioned by the encroachments of a prevailing cabal of Lords, who endeavouring to enslave the people, and to betray their king and their country to a foreign power, obliged the Church and the Commons to unite in the public defence.—Your faithful Commons have found themselves so happy under your majesty's administration, that they please themselves with more agreeable prospects, and, renouncing such examples of unseasonable jealousies and fears, most thankfully receive the blessing of your reign: nor could they have made a more grateful return for your majesty's generous protection to their liberties, than by a suitable concern for your prerogative.—If their lordships had consulted their own Journals, with the same care that we always take to be rightly informed, they would hardly have affirmed that a direct appeal to the throne, without a previous desire of conference, had been an unprecedented practice. Their books are not with variety of instances to the contrary; but without examining their books, it seems very surprising, that their lordships could so soon forget their Address presented to your majesty the last session on behalf of the lord bishop of Worcester, and their address to the late king on behalf of William earl of Portland, Edward earl of Orford, John lord Somers, and Charles lord Halifax, impeached by the Commons for high crimes and misdemeanors; and when the House formerly expostulated with the House of Lords, for proceedings in the very same method of which they now complain, their lordships made a most solemn declaration in the following words.—That they must ever assert a liberty to their House to apply to the throne by themselves, for the doing any thing warranted by law, &c.—Nor can the Lords, we presume upon second reflection, deny the Commons the same liberty, which their lordships themselves have so strongly asserted, and so frequently practised.—Your loyal Commons since concur with their lordships in declaring, that we will never contribute by any act of ours to the diminution of the rights of the crown, and that we will not suffer it in others: Your majesty, their lordships, and the whole world may judge from the example we have given, if their lordships do truly wish the House of Commons may, in all times to come, speak and act with that regard to the prerogative, which they allow us the honour to be now taken up; we shall be very unfortunate to continue under their displeasure, at the same time when they seem to hope, that those who succeed us will take pattern by us.—We wish their lordships also on their part may continue in all times to come, to speak with that regard to parliamentary impeachments, which it seems so lately to have taken up: since we begin to reason to apprehend, that the misunderstandings which have of late years arisen between the two Houses, have been principally owing to the artifices of some particular persons among themselves, whom the Commons thought it their duty, for the public safety, to bring to justice. How much more difficult will all our endeavours be rendered, should their lordships be once admitted sole examiners of accusations against each other, as they are already judges?—We are accused, but most unjustly of exciting and earnestly desiring your majesty to exert your prerogative against the House of Lords. We appeal to the words of our Address if it is possible naturally to impose any sense upon any expression that is there: We are sorry their lordships should descend so low as to the straining and wresting of words, which they rather discover an unfortunate inclination, to make us seem culpable upon such terms, than that they in truth believe us so. We know how vain and how fruitless an ation it would be to excite your majesty to any abuse of your power, which we are convinced you will always exercise for the general good; and so far are your Commons from entertaining any such desire, that we heartily wish to see a good correspondence preserved between the two Houses; nor would forbear to purchase it at any rate, except giving up the rights of your majesty, by whom we are protected, and the liberties and properties of the people, by whom we are entrusted.—These are instances, so plain, and so uncontestable, we presume will be sufficient, without trespassing much longer upon your majesty's time, to discredit whatever else has been alledged, to create in your majesty, and those we represent, an ill opinion of us; We have been careful and industrious to avoid, as far as was consistent with our necessary justification, all occasion of reviving animosities, and, how great soever the provocation has been, your majesty having declared how uneasy you are under such misunderstandings, we shall make no difficulty to lay aside our resentments, who shall always be ready to sacrifice our lives and fortunes to your quiet and service: Nor can we doubt but we must stand fully acquitted in the whole world, and especially to your majesty, since the seal that we have shewn, and the reproaches that we have borne, have been owing to no other cause but the defence of an excellent queen, in whose hands God Almighty hath placed the executive authority over these nations; which authority it has been the only endeavour of your faithful Commons to preserve as entire as our laws and constitution allow:—May it please your majesty, It is with the deepest concern, and a grief not to be expressed, that your dutiful and loyal Commons have found themselves engaged in disputes of this nature, by which they have been so unseasonably interrupted in finishing the supplies, and other matters of the highest importance. How zealously they have applied themselves to the discharge of their duty, appears from their having already presented your majesty with the greatest part of their aids, with a dispatch and unanimity beyond example: Nor could the few bills yet depending have met the least objection or delay, but from the indispensable necessity of vindicating your majesty's royal prerogative, the privileges of our own House, and the rights and liberties of all the Commons of England, in several instances invaded almost at the same time; we wish there may have been more of mistake than design in those who have created these unhappy differences: However, we desire the remembrance may be henceforth blot- ted out, and that there may remain no other impression in the hearts both of Lords and Commons, than a sincere and passionate concern for your majesty's welfare and glory: Nor any other contention hereafter arise, but by whom the public good shall be best advanced, the Protestant succession, and the Church of England best secured, and the just rights and prerogatives of the crown best supported.

The Queen's Answer.] The queen's answer was this:

"Gentlemen; I return you many thanks for the great concern which you express for me and my just rights. Your dispatch of the supplies is a great advantage to the public service. And I am very well pleased with the assurances you give me of your care to avoid any occasion of difference between the Houses, especially at this time, when there is so apparent a necessity of strengthening ourselves against the malicious designs of our enemies.

Feb. 24. Ordered, That some members be appointed to search the Journals of the House of Lords, as to what proceedings have been since the last Report to this House, upon the Papers communicated to the Lords by her majesty, relating to the Conspiracy; and several members were appointed accordingly.

Feb. 23. Sir Humphry Mackworth reported, that the members appointed had been to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords, what proceedings had been since the last Report to this House, upon the Papers communicated to the Lords by her majesty, relating to the Conspiracy; but that they did not find any proceedings as yet entered into their Journals: But that out of the papers for making up the same, they had taken copies of the proceedings they found therein, which he reads in his place, and afterwards delivered in at the table, where the same was read.

Ordered, That the consideration of the said Report be referred to the Committee of the whole house, who are to consider of the Papers communicated by her majesty to this house, relating to the treasonable correspondence carried on with St. Germain's and the court of France.

Feb. 29. Mr. Freeman, according to order, reported from the Committee of the whole House, to whom it was referred to consider of the Papers communicated by her majesty to this house, relating to the treasonable correspondence carried on with St. Germain's and the court of France, the Resolution which they had directed him to report to the house, which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered in at the table, where the same was read, and is as followeth:

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this Committee, that the House be moved, that an humble Address be presented to her majesty, that she will be pleased to re-assume the just exercise of her prerogative, and take to herself the examination of the matters relating to the Conspiracy, communicated to this House by her majesty; and to give assurance, that they will defend her majesty's sacred person and government against all persons concerned in the said Conspiracy, and all other conspirators whatsoever: And to declare, that the establishing of a Committee of seven Lords, for the sole examination of the said Conspiracy, is of dangerous consequence, and may tend to the subversion of the government."

Resolved, "That the house doth agree with the Committee, that an humble Address be presented to her majesty, that she will be pleased to re-assume the just exercise of her prerogative, and take to herself the examination of the matters relating to the Conspiracy, communicated to this house by her majesty, and to give assurance, that they will defend her majesty's sacred person and government, against all persons concerned in the said Conspiracy, and all other conspirators whatsoever; and to declare, that the establishing of a Committee of seven Lords, for the sole examination of the said Conspiracy, is of dangerous consequence, and may tend to the subversion of the government."

Resolved, "That the said Resolution be presented to her majesty by the whole House; which was done according, and her majesty was pleased to return the following answer:

"Gentlemen; The great marks of trust and confidence, which you have given me in this Address, are very acceptable to me.—I thank you for your advice, and shall constantly exercise my just prerogative for the security and satisfaction of my subjects."

Further Proceedings respecting the Scottish Plot.] About the end of January, the earl of Nottingham acquainted the House of Lords, "That the queen commanded him to lay before them the papers, which contained all the matters hitherto discovered of the conspiracy in Scotland; but that there was one thing, which he was also commanded to let their lordships know, was not yet proper to be communicated to the house: because the making it public might prevent a farther discovery of matters of greater importance; but that their lordships should be acquainted with this also, so soon as it could be done without prejudice to the public service." Upon this the Lords resolved to Address her majesty, "That the whole matter, and all papers relating to the Scots plot, might be laid before them with all convenient dispatch, that this House might not want an opportunity, before the end of this session, of enquiring into, and discovering the wicked designs and conspiracies of her enemies." To this Address the queen answered, "That having so lately acquainted them, that she had communicated to them all the particulars relating to the design against Scotland, which could yet be made public without prejudice to the service, her majesty did not expect to be pressed upon that matter, before it was scarcely possible that the state of it could be altered; and that her majesty made no doubt, but, before the end of the session, there would be a proper time to communicate that which could not now be made public without great inconvenience." Two days after, the earl of Nottingham delivered to the Lords several papers relating to the Scots Conspiracy, which being sealed up as the former were, it was ordered, that all the papers should be opened on Tuesday the 8th of February, and all the Lords summoned to attend.

By this time, all possible endeavours had been used to stifle the Plot, and to prepossess the Queen and the public, that the whole was a contrivance of the duke of Queensberry, in order to ruin the dukes of Hamilton and Athol. The duke of Athol drew up a plausible memorial for that purpose, which he read in the Scotch council in the presence of the Queen; by this memorial it manifestly appeared, that the duke of Athol, though one of the principal persons suspected, had either the perusal or information from the Secretary of State, of the contents of the letters, declarations and examinations relating to the Scots conspiracy, before they were communicated to the House of Lords; a convincing circumstance, that the accused were more countenanced than the accusers: so that it was no difficult matter for them to put a stop upon the plot. There were two other circumstances which seemed to reflect on the earl of Nottingham; his giving ear to the information of Ferguson, whom the suspected persons made use of, to clear them of the treason they were in danger of being charged with; and his discharging an officer in king James's army, who had been seized by the governor of Berwick. This being complained of in the House of Commons, a long debate ensued, which ended at last in a resolve, "That the earl of Nottingham, one of her majesty's principal secretaries of state, for his great ability and diligence in the execution of his office, for his unquestionable fidelity to the queen and her government, and for his steady adhering to the church of England, as by law established, had highly merited the trust her majesty had reposed in him." The Commons, at the same time, ordered, that the Speaker should lay this Resolution before her majesty, when the said Address should be presented to her: Which being done accordingly the queen was pleased to say, "That she was glad to find they were well satisfied with the earl of Nottingham, who was trusted by her in so considerable a post."

The examinations of the prisoners being all sent to the House of Commons, they heard them read, but passed no judgment upon them, nor did they offer any advice to the queen upon this occasion; they only sent them back to the queen, with thanks for communicating them, and for her wisdom and care of the nation: It was thought strange, to see a business of this nature treated so slightly, by a body that had looked, in former times, more carefully to things of this kind; especially, since it had appeared in many instances, how detestable the French were in raising distractions in their enemy's country: It was evident, that a negotiation had begun, and had been now carried on for some time, for an army that was to be sent from France to Scotland; upon this, which was the main of the discovery, it was very amazing to see, that the Commons neither offered the queen any advice, nor gave her a vote of credit, for an extraordinary expence, in which the progress of that matter might engage her; a credit which given might have had a great effect, toward defeating the design, when it appeared but well the queen was furnished to resist it: This coldness, in the House of Commons, gave great and just ground of suspicion, that those who had the chief credit there, did not act heartily, in order to the defeating all such plots, but were willing to let them go on, without check or opposition. But the Lords, on the day appointed, resolved to take the plot into consideration, and examine the whole matter fully. They began with reading the papers laid before them, the most material of which was drawn up by the earl of Nottingham, intitled, "An Account of the Conspiracy in Scotland." It was an abstract of all the examinations the council had taken. Some took great exceptions at it, as drawn on design to make the affair appear more inconsiderable than they believed it to be. The substance of the whole was, that there went many messages between the courts of St. Germain's and Versailles, with relation to the affairs of Scotland; the court of Versailles was willing to send an army to Scotland, but they desired to be well assured of the assistance they might expect there; in order to which, some were sent over, according to what France had told the duke of Queensberry; some of the papers were writ in gibberish, so the Lords moved, that a reward should be offered, to any who should decipher these. When the Lords asked the earl of Nottingham, if every thing was laid before him, he answered, that there was only one particular kept from them; because they were in hopes of a discovery, that was like to be of more consequence than all the rest: So, after the delay of a few days, to see the issue of it, which was Keith's endeavours to persuade his uncle (who knew every step that had been made in the whole progress of this affair) to come in and discover it, when they were told there was no more hope of that, the Lords ordered the committee, which had examined Boucher, to examine into all these discoveries. Upon this the Commons, who expressed a great uneasiness at every step the Lords made in that matter, went with a new Address to the queen, insisting on their former complaints, against the proceedings of the Lords, as a wresting the matter out of the queen's hands, and the taking it wholly into their own; and they prayed the queen to resume her prerogative, thus violated by the Lords, whose proceedings they affirmed to be without a precedent.

The seven lords went on with their examinations, and, after some days, they made a report to the House; Maclean's confession was the main thing; it was full and particular; he named the persons that sat in the council at St. Germain's; he said, the command was offered to the duke of Berwick, which he declined to accept, till trial was made whether duke Hamilton would accept of it, who, he thought, was the proper person; he told likewise, what directions had been sent to hinder the settling the succession in Scotland; none of which particulars were in the paper, that the earl of Nottingham had brought to the House of his confession. It was further observed, that all the rest, whose examinations amounted to little, were obliged to write their own confessions, or, at least, to sign them: But Maclean had not done this: for, after he had delivered his confession by word of mouth to the earl of Nottingham, that lord wrote it all from his report, and read it to him the next day; upon which he acknowledged, it contained a full account of all he had said. Maclean's discovery to the Lords was a clear series of all the counsels and messages, and it gave a full view of the debates and opinions in the council at St. Germain's, all which was omitted in that, which was taken by the earl of Nottingham, and his paper concerning it was both short and dark; there was an appearance of truth, in all that Maclean told, and a regular process was set forth in it.

Upon these observations, those lords, who were not satisfied with the earl of Nottingham's Paper, intended to have passed a censure upon it, as imperfect. It was said, in the debate that followed this motion, either Maclean was asked, who was to command the army to be sent into Scotland, or he was not. If he was asked the question, and had answered it, then the earl of Nottingham had not served the queen, or used the parliament well, since he had not put it in the paper. If it was not asked, here was great remissness in a minister, when it was confessed, that the sending over an army was in consultation, not to ask who was to command the army. Upon this occasion, the earl of Torrington made some reflections, which had too deep a venom in them. He said, That the earl of Nottingham did prove, that he had often read over the paper, in which he had set down Maclean's confession, in his hearing, and had asked him, if all he had confessed to him was not fully set down in that paper; to which he always answered, That every thing he said was contained in it. Upon this the earl observed, that sir John Maclean having, perhaps, told his whole story to the earl of Nottingham, and finding afterwards, that he had writ such a defective account of it, he had reason to conclude, (for he believed, had he been in his condition, he should have concluded so himself) that the earl of Nottingham had no mind, that he should mention any thing, but what he had writ down, and that he desired, that the rest might be suppressed. That he could not judge of others but by himself: If his life had been in danger, and if he were interrogated by a minister of state, who could do him either much good or much hurt, and if he had made a full discovery to him, but had observed, that this minister, in taking his confession in writing, had omitted many things, he should have understood that as an intimation, that he was to speak of these things no more; and so he believed he should have said it was all, though, at the same time, he knew it was not all that he had said. It was thereupon moved, That sir John Maclean might be sent for and interrogated, but the party was not strong enough to carry any thing of that kind, and, by a previous vote, it was carried by a majority of eleven voices, to put no question concerning the earl of Nottingham's papers.

The Lords were highly offended with Ferguson's papers, and passed a severe vote against those lords who had received such scandalous papers, and had not ordered him to be prosecuted, which they directed the Attorney-general to do. But Ferguson never received the least punishment.

It was apparent, that there was a train of dangerous negotiations, that passed between Scotland and St. Germain's, though the Lords could not penetrate to the bottom of them. And the design of Keith's bringing in his uncle, who knew every step, that had been made, and the whole progress of the affair, to discover the whole scheme of it, was managed so remissly, that it was generally concluded, that it was not in earnest desired it should succeed. During the debates, one very extraordinary thing happened; the earl of Nottingham affirmed, upon three or four occasions, that some things had been ordered in the cabinet-council, which the dukes of Somerset and Devonshire, who were likewise of that council, did not agree with him in. After all these examinations and debates, the Lords concluded the whole matter with voting, "That there had been dangerous Plots between some in Scotland and the courts of France and St. Germain's; and that the encouragement of this plotting came from the not settling the succession to the crown of Scotland in the house of Hanover."

The Lords' Address concerning the Representation of the House of Commons, about the Lords taking the Examinations of Persons concerned in the Scotch Conspiracy.—March 28. In the House of Lords the duke of Somerset reported an Address,* drawn by the committee, upon the Representation of the House of Commons presented to her majesty; and also the several Precedents cited: Which was read, and agreed to, as followeth:

"May it please your most excellent majesty; We, the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled, found ourselves obliged (though with great unwillingness) to make an humble Representation to your majesty, on the 18th of January last, of the injustice done to us by the House of Commons; and it is with the utmost reluctance we are brought to give * "This Address was penned with great care and much force. These addresses were drawn by the lord Somers, and were read over and considered, and corrected very critically, by a few lords, among whom I had the honour to be called for one. This, with the other papers that were published by the Lords, made a great impression on the body of the nation: for the difference that was between these, and those published by the House of Commons, was indeed so visible, that it did not admit of any comparison, and was confessed even by those who were the most partial to them." Burnet.

your majesty a second trouble upon the like unhappy occasion.—This appears by our silence after the Address of the House of Commons presented to your majesty the 21st of February for, though that paper be in effect but one continued misrepresentation of our words and our proceedings; yet we thought ourselves secure in your majesty's great judgment, which would discern where the truth lay, through all the colours made use of to disguise it: And we were willing to hope, that a moderation, which was so little deserved, could not but have a good effect upon the House of Commons. But the Votes of the 29th February, which they laid before your majesty, have convinced us of our mistake, and made it impossible for us to flatter ourselves longer with any such expectation. They continue to misrepresent our proceedings and to solicit the throne against us; and thereby put us upon an absolute necessity of doing ourselves justice, in laying a true state of things before your majesty. When we observe, that the first Address of the House of Commons was ordered the next day after we entered upon the examination of Boucher; that, on the 2d of February, when we appointed a day for taking the papers relating to the Conspiracy into consideration, the House of Commons appointed a committee to draw up the Address against us, presented to your majesty on the 21st, which was the day our committee reported Keith's examination; and that their votes of the 29th came from a committee appointed to consider of the papers communicated to them, the same day we made our Address to your majesty to issue out a proclamation for encouraging the discovery of the cypher of the gibberish letters (though they had made a compliment to your majesty on their reading those papers, and had laid aside all thoughts of them for three weeks together) we cannot without great concern reflect upon the unseasonableness of these applications; what can be more likely to prevent the discovery of this dangerous conspiracy, than a disagreement among those who should unite their endeavours in assisting your majesty to search to the bottom of it? What can more encourage offenders to an obstinate silence, than the prospect of having the examination interrupted by an unhappy breach between the two Houses? And what can give greater security to your majesty's enemies, than to see a foundation laid for such disputes, as will for ever put an end to all parliamentary enquiries into their designs? The gentlemen of the House of Commons have carried this point so far, that rather than suffer us to proceed quietly in searching into the bottom of this dangerous conspiracy, they do not only reflect on us, but depart from their pretences of respect to your majesty, and censure your conduct in assisting our examination, as if you had thereby done an injury to your prerogative. We are therefore obliged, in duty to your majesty, as well as justice to ourselves, farther to explain the grounds on which we have acted, and to produce precedents to shew, we have done nothing unwarranted by the practice of our ancestors.

"We cannot but observe how the House of Commons have varied their style; in their first Address they directly charged the Lords with wresting prisoners out of your majesty's hands; in their second paper they say only, we seem to exclude your majesty from any power over the prisoners; but the charge is alike unjust in both.—They continue to complain of two of our Orders, one of which, they say, was to remove your majesty's prisoners out of your custody into our own; and the other to commit their examination solely to a committee of seven Lords, chosen and appointed by ourselves.

"We know not by whom a committee of the Lords can be chosen but by the House of Lords; nor can there be any thing more parliamentary, and more proper for the dispatch and secrecy of an examination, than referring it to a committee.—This was practised by both houses of parliament in the year 1678 and 1679, nor was it objected to either, that they took the examination solely to themselves: though the committee of the House of Commons was, in the style of their own books; a committee of secrecy.

"The Lords, the Commons, and the Privy Council had that plot under examination at the same time, yet there were no interfering jurisdictions; the papers and the witnesses were conveyed to one another as there was occasion, without any disputes; none of them stopped or delayed the enquiries of another, but concurred in promoting them.

"We might have expected, that when the House of Commons charged as a second time with violating your royal prerogative, and the known laws of the land, they would have specified what branch of the prerogative we had infringed, or what law, statute or usage, we had broken; whenever they think fit to be more particular in the charge, we shall be very ready with our answers.

"We shall always contend with the House of Commons in zeal for your majesty's honour and safety; but we shall never pretend to be meritorious in giving up what we know to be the right of parliament: And we are sure your majesty understands and loves the constitution of the English government too well, to approve of such a present: and therefore we must again beg leave to insist on our former Representations, as well founded in every particular.

"We have no cause to be sorry to hear it has been so universally well received, since we are sure it cannot but be for your majesty's service, as well as a full justification of ourselves. We were very careful that there should be no harshness in any expression of our representation; but if they complain of reasoning they cannot answer, or are uneasy to hear truths they cannot deny, it is not our fault.

"The House of Commons were certainly in the right, in not producing the precedents, which they say they have, of the ill language that has passed between the two Houses, because it could not have been agreeable to your majesty.

"We must own we never searched our book for that purpose; and we believe, that if ever the Commons used the like before, our ancestors thought it unbecoming them to return it; and we think it most proper to be forgotten.

"We cannot think that any expressions (by whatever zeal inspired) that are not suitable to the decency which is due from one House of Parliament to another, can shew a respect to your Majesty, or add any force to their arguments.

"We do not comprehend what is meant by their saying, we did appropriate to the House of Lords only the name of a parliament. There is no foundation for that charge in any word of our representation; nor was there any occasion for such an assertion in the controversy between us: both Houses are alike interested in the point we maintain. We are sure the House of Commons have claimed and exercised such a power of examination and commitment as the Lords insist upon; and we are well assured, that, on proper occasions, every future House of Commons will do the like again: so that let the gentlemen of the present House of Commons be as liberal as they please in renouncing their own right, and as much displeased as they think fit with the House of Lords for not following their example, we have this comfort, that your majesty is too equitable to think amiss of us for our parliamentary rights, and we are sure of having every House of Commons, that shall sit hereafter, of our side, as well as every Englishman who values the constitution of his country.

"There is no passage in our history more notorious, than that the pretended House of Commons in the year 1648, when they could not prevail with the House of Lords, then sitting, to join with them in the intended murder of their king, took upon them first to abolish the House of Lords by a vote, and then to proceed to do that execrable fact by themselves.

"It is not therefore to be imagined that the House of Commons can mean, by saying, that assembly was composed of both houses. If all other proof of the contrary was wanting, yet the testimony of that blessed, though unfortunate king, is abundantly sufficient, who made it one of his exceptions to that detestable court at his trial.

"We can never call to mind that fact without horror, and yet we are obliged by law to commemorate it every year; and surely it can never be mentioned more usefully than upon such an occasion, when the strange usage of one House of Parliament by another, makes it impossible not to reflect on the miserable consequences that have formerly followed from such differences.

"When the gentlemen of the House of Commons act according to the measures taken in those times, they ought not to be offended, if they are remembered by the Lords. If they will take upon themselves to stop the issuing out your majesty's writs for filling up their house, and that in several places, and for a long time, whereby they make themselves an imperfect representation, which is a wound to the constitution, a wrong to the boroughs who have a legal right to send representatives, and an injustice to your majesty, who has an undoubted title to the service and attendance of all the members; can they wonder, or ought they to complain, if we presume to tell your majesty, that very few things were less excusable in that unhappy House of Commons, than their refusing to fill up their body, and compleat the representation?

“These beginnings are very dangerous: it is not easy to foresee how far such a practice may be carried, or what effects it may have upon the boroughs that suffer the present wrong, or upon others who may apprehend the like usage; and who can say, but in after-times an ill prince may take advantage of such precedents, and think himself justified in withholdings his writs from some, by as good law as the Commons can shew, for pretending to stop them from issuing to others?

“The Commons have made three Addresses to your majesty upon this occasion, yet have not stated the matter in dispute fairly in any one of them. The plain matter of fact is this; Boucher, Ogleby, &c. being seized by the custom-house officers on the coast of Sussex, as they landed from France, were sent for to be brought to town by messengers: the Lords having resolved to examine these persons themselves, ordered the messengers to bring them to the House; and committed them to the black rod, in order to their examination. The question is, Whether this proceeding of the House of Lords was a breach of any law, or contrary to the custom of parliament? we asserted it was not, and as we humbly apprehend, we proved our assertion, by undeniable reasons, and we assured your majesty we could justify it by precedents.

“It appears by our records, that we have at all times, when we thought it expedient for the public good, not only taken prisoners out of the custody of messengers (which is but a temporary confinement in order to the examining persons, or while they are under examination) but taken them out of any other custody, and put them sometimes into the custody of your majesty's officers attending the House of Peers, sometimes removed them from one prison to another, as the House thought most safe and proper for their examination.

“Persons condemned, and under sentence of death, may be most properly called the prisoners of the crown, when their lives and estates, as well as liberties, are entirely at mercy; yet the House of Lords sent for several in those circumstances from the farthest parts of England to be examined.

“We could produce precedents in all times when any thing of this nature has been before the house; the most antient records furnishing the clearest and most frequent instances of the jurisdiction of the Lords, in examining, trying, and punishing all great offenders.

“But we shall at present confine ourselves to the proceedings in respect to the Popish Plot, in the reign of your majesty's royal uncle (except in some few instances in both house as well before as after that time) not only because that was the last conspiracy that fell under a parliamentary examination; but because both Houses of Parliament entered in the enquiry with equal zeal. And we beg leave to annex to this our humble Address, some extracts of the Proceedings of both Houses in this enquiry.

“We desire to observe, that though the king mentioned that Plot in his speech, at the opening of the session, yet he was so far from communicating the particulars to the parliament, desiring them to look into it, that he directly told them, he would leave the matter to the law.—He was not very desirous of having the parliament meddle with that enquiry, and therefore it is reasonable to suppose he would not have been silent, if their proceedings had been a violation of the prerogative, and the known laws of the land.

“We beg leave to make this single remark on such of the precedents as relate to the removal of the popish priests after sentence of condemnation, that this was taken notice of in the Commons, and several messages passed between the two Houses about them: The Commons were earnest that they should be executed and insisted to have them sent back to the several prisons for that purpose; but they pretended to deny that the Lords had power to send for them, or change the custody.

“The Commons in their second Address pretend to have been sensibly affected, and provoked to their harsh treatment of the Lords, by what passed in the Lords' House the 29th of January, which was almost six weeks after their Address was presented. It looks as if they wanted reasons to justify the ordering that Address, when they are forced to defend it by argument drawn from facts which happened so long after.

“If the Commons had considered our Address of the 29th of January, or 15th of February, they would have found in them no contradictions, or counter-orders to your majesty, which they charge us. We were informed several papers that had not been communicated to us; those we desired, and we received them by your majesty's command; and have, we hope, made use of them for your majesty's service and the public safety. We have had the happiness that our zeal has been more than once approved by your majesty: and we leave the Commons to justify their own coldness and indifference in a point of such high concern.

“If we look back on the steps the Commons have made in this whole matter, they are such as will hardly be believed hereafter: And we can desire nothing more for our justification than that our proceedings and theirs may be compared.

“When the papers relating to this Conspiracy were laid before them they contented themselves with reading them, and without offering any advice or assistance, gave your majesty thanks for laying the papers before them, and expressed their satisfaction in your majesty's wise conduct and great care of your people. This was certainly justly due to your majesty's prudent administration, but was not all that might have been expected from a House of Commons, when your majesty had laid before them the account of such a dangerous Conspiracy.

" Thus the matter rested for several weeks; and when at last the House of Commons thought fit to take up a second time the consideration of those papers, instead of doing what we hoped, and the kingdom expected from them, all they did was to find new cause of displeasure against the Lords, to complain of what your majesty had done, to solicit you to re-assume the just exercise of your prerogative, and to desire you to stop our proceedings, as of dangerous consequence, and what might tend to the subversion of the government.

" This conduct seems very unaccountable: And when they had not thought fit to pass any judgment on the Conspiracy, it is hard that the enquiry into it should be so severely censured.

" The Commons confine what we spoke in general terms, of the fatal consequences that have happened in most countries in Europe, from the unhappy differences that have arisen between the estates of the several kingdoms, to the instance of one country: The observation was general, and the overthrow of the liberties of most of our neighbours sprung from this root.

" But we are surprised, that the House of Commons should single out that instance of a revolution in a neighbouring country, where the King and the Commons were prevailed upon by the management of the court, to carry their resentments against the Lords so far, that they delivered up the authority of the Lords, the freedom of the people, and made a total alteration of the government.

" We cannot imagine what is meant by calling this treachery of the Commons and Clergy, in betraying the liberties of their country, their want in the public defence; nor can we conceive, how this comes to be mentioned on this occasion: We hope there is no danger of such usage amongst us for such purposes; and we thank your majesty and your people are equally concerned in this insinuation.

" It is wonderful that the Commons should signify their own care in examining our journals, reflect on us for not looking into our own books, and at the same time cite two precedents, in which they are entirely mistaken, and which prove the direct contrary to what is insinuated from them.

" The Lords in their Representation affirm, that the Commons, by appealing directly to the throne against the House of Lords, and charging them with attempts of the highest nature, without first asking a conference, had done a thing unprecedented. The Commons, to prove the contrary, cite the Address presented to your majesty on behalf of the bishop of Worcester, and the Address of the Lords to the late king on behalf of four lords named in their Address. We crave leave to state those two cases: The Commons had censured the bishop of Worcester without giving him any opportunity of being heard: They had voted him unchristian, which surely is aspersing the innocent without possibility of reparation, as well as it was condemning him without a trial, and made an Address to your majesty to remove him from being almoner. This proceeding seemed very extraordinary with respect to your majesty; and very unparliamentary with respect to the House of Lords, of which the Bishop was a member, and yet no notice was taken of them: Upon this the Lords made an application to your majesty on behalf of the reverend prelate, that he might not suffer in your majesty's opinion, before he had an opportunity of making his defence.

" The case of the four Lords was this: the Commons having at the bar of the House of Lords impeached them for high crimes and misdemeanors, the next day made an Address to the late king to remove them from his presence and councils for ever: The House of Lords thought this an attempt of the highest nature upon their judicature, that while the causes were depending before them in parliament, the Commons should quit the part they had taken of accusers, and pretend to be the judges themselves, and solicit the king to put their sentence in execution immediately. But yet they proceeded to act with such a moderation as was scarce to be justified; they forbore expostulating with the Commons, much less did they appeal to the throne against them; they only desired the king not to pass any censure upon them before they were tried; they took no notice that the Commons had made any address, and only endeavoured to prevent the injustice and oppression which might have been done to their own members, and the affront offered to their judicature, without making the least reflection on this proceeding; and they had no other way of acting, for no conference could have prevented the impression that might have been made on the king by such an application of the Commons.

" Besides, in both these cases the Commons were the aggressors; they first applied to the throne, and made it necessary for the Lords to follow them. Thus far these instances may be of use to shew by what steps the Commons rose to this way of addressing against the House of Lords; they began these attempts in the case of particular Lords, which now they put in practice against the whole body of the peers.

" The Lords will think themselves concerned in all times, to observe and maintain the laws and usage of parliaments, in impeachments, and this they did with all possible exactness upon the occasion of the impeachments of those four Lords; but they could not judge it reasonable to let the accusers share with them in their judicature. And if the Commons in times to come shall so far forget themselves, as to endeavour to blast men's reputation, by exhibiting articles, when they are not able or prepared to maintain their charge, the Lords will always look upon themselves as bound to do equal justice and discharge the innocent. Nothing can truly lessen or weaken the force and awe of impeachments, but a partial use of them: While they continue to be the equal instrument of public justice, they will have their weight in all places; but if once they are made use of to defame men only without thoughts of bringing them to trial, impeachments will lose their terror and the House of Commons will not increase their honour or authority: And if in that case the House of Lords could not do justice to the accused, they would be the only judicature which had the unhappy power of condemning, but not of acquitting.

"The Lords are far from pretending to be the sole examiners of conspiracies, if the Commons will do their duty in concerning themselves for the public safety; but if they will show so little zeal as the gentlemen of this House of Commons have done; if, when they are told of conspiracies from the throne, they will concern themselves so little as to leave the enquiry to others, the Lords must of consequence be the sole enquirers, or else parliaments must be totally excluded from such examinations.

"The Commons in their second Address complain, that they are accused most unjustly of exciting and earnestly desiring your majesty to exert your prerogative against the House of Lords. The words of their first Address are so plain, that no other construction could be reasonably put upon them, and we are now very sure we did not mistake their meaning, since in the Votes which they have laid before your majesty, they have thought fit to explain themselves, and in direct terms desire your majesty to re-assume the just exercise of your prerogative, and take to yourself the examination of the matters relating to the conspiracy.

"There needs no wresting or straining these words, to justify the interpretation we made of their first Address, and surely they had forgot what they said in their second, when they came to pass those Votes, by which the sincerity of their professions, when they pretend to desire that the remembrance of those unhappy differences may be blotted out, does best appear. But we are still at a loss to know what they truly mean by your majesty's re-assuming your just prerogative.

"Your majesty was pleased to lay the papers relating to the Conspiracy before us, and you have given your royal approbation to the method in which we had put the examination: and it seems a strange averseness to parliamentary enquiries, that they would not leave it possible, even with the concurrence of the crown, for either house of parliament to enquire into conspiracies; though at the same time we must freely own, that if this power be not lodged in us by the constitution, it ought not,

"Most gracious sovereign, we humbly ask pardon for having detained you so long, upon a subject which cannot but be disagreeable to your majesty.—We beg leave to conclude with expressing the just sense we have of the virtuous and truly royal moderation, which your majesty has shewn upon this occasion, not suffering yourself to be prevailed upon, to do any thing to the prejudice of the constitution from whatsoever hands the invitation come. It shall be our daily prayers to Almighty God that he will long preserve and prosper your majesty for the good of this kingdom; and that your reign may be as glorious all the world over, as it is happy to all your people."

Annexed to the above Address, was the following List of Precedents.

PRECEDENTS out of the Journals of the House of LORDS.

May 22, 1675. A paper was presented to the House, being Examinations taken by several Justices of the Peace in the county of Surrey concerning some blasphemous speeches spoken by John Taylor now a prisoner at the gaol of Guilford, which paper being read, the House ordered as follows:

Ordered, That the serjeant at arms bring John Taylor into safe custody to the bar of this house, on Friday next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, to the body of the said John Taylor.

Oct. 21, 1678. His majesty acquaints the Lords and Commons with a Plot against a person, in a speech, part of which speech so far as relates to the Plot, follows, in his verba:

"I now intend to acquaint you, (as I shall always do with any thing that concerns me) that I have been informed of a design against my person by the Jesuits; of which I shall forbear my opinion, lest I may seem too say to much or too little, but I will leave the matter to the law; and, in the mean time, will take as much care as I can, to prevent all manner of practices by that sort of men and of others who having been tampering in a high degree with foreigners, and contriving how to introduce popery among us."

Whereupon, the House made the following Address;

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, having been acquainted by your majesty, that there is information given of a horrible design against your majesty's sacred life, (which God long preserve) and your humble suitors to your majesty, that you would vouchsafe to communicate to us (as far as your majesty shall think fit) such papers as have any tendency to the discovery thereof, of any other design against the Protestant religion, as it is now established in the church of England, that we may use our utmost endeavours to serve your majesty, according to our bounden duty and allegiance.

Oct. 23, 1678. The papers concerning the plot were delivered to the deputy clerk of the parliaments, by one of the clerks of the council.

Lords Committees were appointed to consider of the papers transmitted from the council by his majesty's directions, concerning the discovery of the horrid design against his majesty's sacred person, or of any other design against his majesty, or his kingdom, by introducing popery, whose lordships have power to send for persons, papers, and records, as they shall see cause.

Oct. 30, 1678. Ordered, That Nathaniel Thomson, who is now in the custody of William Sorocold, for printing popish books for James Thomson, shall stand committed to the prison of the Gate-house, at Westminster, during the pleasure of this House.

Oct. 31, 1678. Ordered, That the Lords with white staves do attend his majesty, humbly to desire him from this House, that the papers of Mr. Whitebread and Mr. Micho, which have been read at the Council-Table, may be by his majesty's command, brought before the Committee to examine papers, relating to the horrid design against his majesty; and also that the clerks of the Council may bring the minutes, taken by them, upon the examination of Titus Oates, and others, before the Council, concerning this matter.

Nov. 4, 1678. Ordered, That the Lords Committees appointed to examine the Lords who are prisoners in the Tower of London, for treason, shall also examine such other persons, who are now prisoners in the Tower for treason, as their lordships shall think fit, and also sir Ellis Leighton, now prisoner in Newgate; and that the Lord Chief Justice of England do assist their lordships at such times as they shall appoint; and that one of the clerks of the Privy Council do attend their lordships.

Nov. 8, 1678. Ordered, That the Lords, with white staves, do attend his majesty, humbly to desire from this House, that the letter of Mr. Coleman, of the 29th of September, 1675, to father Le Chese, and another of his to father Le Chese, wherein he owns the sending the said letter, and monsieur Le Chese's letter, whereby he owns the receipt thereof, which have not been read in this House, may, by his majesty's Order, be brought hither.

The Lord Treasurer reported his majesty's Answer.

'That his majesty will give Order, that the said Letters shall be brought to this House, as soon as may be.'

Nov. 18, 1678. Ordered, That Edward Coleman, now a prisoner in Newgate for treason, be brought by the keeper of Newgate, before the Lords Committees to peruse letters and papers, to morrow at nine of the clock in the forenoon; and that the duke of Monmouth be desired to send a sufficient guard of soldiers, to assist the keeper of Newgate, in the service of bringing and returning Edward Coleman.

Ordered, That the Lords, with white staves, do humbly desire his majesty, that his majesty will please to give Order, that the papers of Mr. Goodwin, now in the hands of the clerks of the Council, may be brought before the Lords Committees appointed to consider of, and prepare the evidences for the trial of Mr. Coleman.

Nov. 23, 1678. Ordered, That the serjeant at arms attending this House, his deputy, or deputies, do forthwith repair to Stratford upon Avon in Warwickshire, and bring thence the body of Mr. John Gerard, supposed to be a priest, and one other person mentioned, but not named, (in a letter dated there the 20th of November) and subscribed Simon Cale, mayor, John Wolmer; in which it is recited, that they were in custody there, for refusing the oath of allegiance, and bring them in safe custody to the bar of this House.

Dec. 27, 1678. Ordered, That Dr. Lower and Dr. Warner, be, and are hereby appointed to visit Mr. White, alias Whitebread, being sick near Weld house, and give this House an account to morrow morning, in what condition of health they find him.

Nov. 28, 1678. Ordered, That the clerk of his majesty's privy council, in whose custody the depositions lately taken at the Council-board are, which concern the queen's majesty, be, and is thereby appointed to bring the said depositions before this house to morrow at nine of the clock in the forenoon.

Nov. 29, 1678. The House received an account, that Dr. Lower and Dr. Warner have visited Whitebread, and they find that his former distempers have left him, and he hath now only a tertian ague; and their opinion is, that he may be removed safely upon his intermitting days: It is ordered, that the serjeant at arms attending this House, shall to morrow, attach the body of Mr. White alias Whitebread, and carry him forthwith to the prison of Newgate, there to remain in safe custody, till he shall be delivered by due course of law.

Upon information given to this House, that one Daniel Maccarty, a Romish priest, is now under custody in Thetford in the county of Norfolk, It is ordered, That the serjeant at arms attending this House, his deputy or deputies, shall forthwith repair to Thetford aforesaid, and bring thence the body of the said Daniel Maccarty, in safe custody to the bar of this house.

Dec. 20, 1678. Whereas Daniel Maccarty, a Romish priest, was, by Order of the 29th of November last, brought from the jail of Thetford in the county of Norfolk, by the serjeant at arms attending this House, and is now in his custody here; it is this day ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, that the Lords Committees for examining persons and papers, for discovery of the horrid design against his majesty's person and government, shall examine the said Daniel Maccarty: And if their lordships find, that he is not charged with any particulars relating to the said design, he is to be remitted and left to the law; but if otherwise, their lordships are to report to the House what they find concerning him.

Dec. 3, 1678. Upon information given to this House, by the lord Windsor, that one Edward Whitaker stands committed in the city of Worcester, for some unbecoming words by him uttered, as is certified in a letter to his lordship, signed Jo. Tyas, mayor: It is ordered, that the said Mr. Whitaker shall give bail before the mayor of Worcester, for his appearance before the Lords in parliament, within eight days next after such bill given:

Dec. 13, 1678. Edward Whitaker being called for, to answer the charge against him, sent up from the mayor of Worcester, but being not to be found, It is ordered, that if the said Edward Whitaker come not, and render himself before the house rises, he shall be attached; and he not coming, it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, That the serjeant at arms attending this House, or his deputy, do forthwith attach the body of Edward Whitaker of London, gentleman, and bring him in safe custody to the bar of this house to-morrow morning, to answer to the informations put into this house, upon oath, against him: And this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

Dec. 14, 1678. Whereas Edward Whitaker was this day brought to the bar by the serjeant at arms attending this house, to answer to the informations against him, which he denies, alledging, that he hath witnesses to clear himself of the matters charged on him: Upon consideration had thereof, it is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, That the said Edward Whitaker may, and shall have order for summoning his said witnesses, to be heard viva voce, on the second day of the sitting of the parliament, next after Christmas, if he desires it; at which time also the witnesses, who have informed against him, shall be summoned to be heard viva voce; and that in the mean time, the said serjeant at arms shall deliver the said Edward Whitaker, into the prison of Newgate, there to remain in safe custody till further order: And this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

Dec. 3, 1678. Upon information given to this House, that one ——— Barnesly, a Romish priest, is now under custody in the city of Worcester; it is ordered, That the serjeant at Arms attending to this House, his deputy, or deputies, shall forthwith repair to the city of Worcester, and bring thence the body of the said ——— Barnesly, in safe custody, to this House.

Dec. 14, 1678. Whereas Henry Barnesly, who was by order of this House, sent for from the gaol of Worcester, was this day brought to the bar by the serjeant at arms attending this House, and there examined, being supposed to be a Popish priest; it is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, That the said Henry Barnesly shall, by the said serjeant at arms, or his deputy or deputies, be returned into the gaol in Worcester, there to remain in safe custody, until he shall be thence delivered by due course of law: And this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

Dec. 23, 1678. Upon reading the petition of Henry Barnesly, now in the custody of the serjeant at arms attending this House, shewing, that, being by order of this House brought from Worcester, and, by like order, to be returned thither again; and that being very old and sickly, he is not able to bear the journey in this hard season of the year; and therefore praying, that he may remain here upon bail: It is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the said Henry Barnesly (being charged to be a Popish Priest) shall, by the said serjeant at Arms, be delivered into the prison of the King's Bench there to remain in safe custody, till he be better able to be returned to Worcester, in order to his trial there; and this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

Dec. 6, 1678. Upon report made by the earl of Clarendon, from the Lords' committee to examine persons, and papers, &c. that their lordships think it necessary that sir Henry Tichborne, a Popish recusant, now prisoner in the gaol at Winchester, be brought up to town: It is ordered, that the Serjeant at Arms attending this house, his deputy or deputies, shall forthwith repair to Winchester, and bring thence the said sir Henry Tichborne, and deliver him into his majesty's Tower of London, there to remain in safe custody, till farther order; and this shall be a sufficient warrant in that behalf.

To sir George Charnock, knight, serjeant at arms, attending this House, and to the Keeper of the Gaol at Winchester, and to the Constable of his majesty's Tower of London, and their respective deputies; as also, to all his majesty's officers, civil and military, to be aiding and assisting in this service.

Dec. 20, 1678. Upon information given to this House upon oath, that Thomas Thorn now, or late, servant to Richard Tasbrough esq.; hath uttered dangerous and treasonable words, and that he is at present in the gaol at Bury in Suffolk: It is ordered, that the serjeant at arms attending this House, or his deputy or deputies, shall forthwith repair to Bury, and bring thence the said Thomas Thorn, in safe custody to the bar of this house, to answer thereunto.

Dec. 21, 1678. Whereas Richard Tasbrough, esq.; was this day brought to the bar by the serjeant at arms, and denied all that was alledged against him; and whereas there is a warrant of the Lord Chief Justice of England, issued against him; it is ordered, that the serjeant at arms deliver the said Richard Tasbrough in safe custody, to such person or persons as the Lord Chief Justice of England shall direct.

March 29, 1679. Upon information given to this house, that Richard Tasbrough, esq. who is charged to be guilty of the late horrid conspiracy, for which he was committed to the prison of the King's Bench, hath since been enlarged, upon bail, and is now to be brought to his trial at the assizes at Bury, in the county of Suffolk: Upon consideration had of the case of the said Richard Tasbrough, it is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, that the judge of assize for that county be, and is hereby directed, that his lordship proceed no further upon the trial of the said Richard Tasbrough, than to the indictment of him, and the finding thereof by the Grand Jury; and that the said Richard Tasbrough may be safely sent up to London, in order to his trial, to be had at the bar of the court of King's Bench. And it is further ordered, that Mr. Thomas Beake, one of the messengers attending his majesty's Council-board, be, and is hereby authorized and required, with all speed, to attend the said judge of assize for this purpose, and to take care of the execution of this order, as to the bringing up the said Richard Tasbrough in safe custody, in order to his intended trial: And for so doing this shall be a sufficient warrant.

December 26, 1678. Ordered, That it be referred to the Lords' committees for examining persons and papers, to examine Richard Tasbrough and Thomas Thorn.

Upon information to this House by the lord viscount Newport, that one Valentine Harcourt, a Popish priest, is taken, and now in custody in the gaol of Shrewsbury: It is ordered, that the Sheriff for the county of Salop, be, and is hereby required, to take, and give order for the sending of the said Valentine Harcourt in safe custody, to appear at the bar of this house, and that the charge of the said Sheriff shall be allowed upon his account in the Court of Exchequer. And it is ordered, that the Sheriffs of the respective counties, through which the said Valentine Harcourt shall pass in his being sent up, as aforesaid, be aiding and assisting to the furtherance thereof, as occasion shall require.

March 21, 1678-9. Upon report made from the Lords' committees, for examining matters relating to the discovery of the late horrid conspiracy, that capt. Francis Spalding, deputy governor of Chepstow Castle, who was, by order of this house, dated the 21st day of Nov. last, committed to the prison of the King's Bench, for matters wherewith he stands charged, hath since that time been enlarged upon bail, and being upon bail, commands still at Chepstow Castle, as deputy governor, and hath misbehaved himself, as hath appeared to the said Lords' committees: it is thereupon ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, that the serjeant at arms attending this House, or his deputy or deputies, do forthwith attach the body of the said Francis Spalding, and bring him in safe custody to the bar of this House: And this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

March 27, 1679. Captain Francis Spalding being brought to the bar by the serjeant at arms, was asked, whether he is not under bail? which he acknowledged; and that Sir Ralph Delaval and Mr. Banks are his bail, taken in the King's Bench; and being asked why he went down to Chepstow Castle, being a prisoner under bail, and by whose order? he said, he had no order for it, but went of his own head. Then the matter wherewith he was charged, and for which he was committed on the 21st of November last, was read, and also the deposition of Thomas Crowder, a soldier of that garrison, was read, &c.

Whereas Captain Francis Spalding, who was on the 21st November last committed to the prison of the King's Bench, there to remain in safe custody till further order, hath since procured his enlargement upon bail, and repaired to Chepstow Castle, as deputy governor thereof, and misbehaved himself there, as appeareth by the deposition of Thomas Crowder, and other matters, upon which he was this day examined at the bar, being now in custody of the serjeant at arms attending this House: It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, that the said Francis Spalding be re-committed to the prison of the King's Bench, there to remain in safe custody, till further order; and that the said serjeant at arms, or his deputy, take care to convey him, the said Francis Spalding, to the said prison: And this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

March 25, 1679. Upon report made by the earl of Clarendon, from the Lords' committees for examining matters relating to the discovery of the late horrid conspiracy, that their lordships are of opinion, that Edward Turner, a Priest and Jesuit, who hath been examined before them, and is now in the custody of Francis Strutt, a messenger, should be committed to prison: It is ordered, that the said Francis Strutt shall forthwith deliver the said Edward Turner into the prison of the Gate-house, at Westminster, there to remain as a prisoner, till he shall be delivered by due course of law.

To Francis Strutt, messenger, his deputy or deputies, and to the keeper of the prison of the Gate-house.

April 15, 1679. Whereas, sir William Andrews is seized on, and brought to town in custody, as an agent in the late horrid conspiracy against the king: It is this day ordered, that the officer in whose custody the said sir William Andrews is, shall forthwith deliver the said sir William Andrews into the prison of the Gate-house at Westminster, there to remain a prisoner, till further order.

April 28, 1679. Upon report from the Lords' committees for examining matters relating to the discovery of the late horrid conspiracy, that their lordships have received information made upon oath, that sir William Andrews, now a prisoner in the Gate-house, at Westminster, is engaged in the conspiracy against his majesty's person and government: It is thereupon ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, that the keeper of the Gate-house aforesaid, be, and is hereby required to take care, that the said sir William Andrews be forthwith conveyed and safely delivered into the Tower of London, there to remain a prisoner, till he shall be discharged by due course of law; and for so doing this shall be a sufficient warrant.

April 21, 1679. Upon report from the committee for examinations, that James Allen, who was taken into custody, being charged with encouraging Elizabeth Oxley to fire houses, hath been examined by your lordships, and denieth what is charged upon him; and in regard the examinations taken concerning a house fired in Fetter-lane, are before a committee of Commons: It is ordered, that the serjeant at arms attending this House, do forthwith carry the said James Allen to the said Committee, to be examined, and disposed of as they please.

Upon report from the committee of examinations, that their lordships think it necessary that William Sturges, now a prisoner in the gaol at Chelmsford, should be brought to town: It is ordered, that the serjeant at arms attending this House, do forthwith repair to the gaol at Chelmsford, in Essex, and bring thence the body of the said William Sturges, and deliver him into the prison of the Gate-house, at Westminster, there to remain a prisoner till further order.

April 23, 1679. Upon report from the Lords' committees for examinations, that their lordships find it requisite, that David Lewis, who hath been tried and condemned as a Popish priest, at the assizes held for the county of Monmouth, and is now in gaol there, may be brought to town: It is ordered, that the sheriff for the county of Monmouth be, and is hereby required to take care, and give order for the speedy conveying the said David Lewis, in safety, from the said gaol, to be delivered into the prison of Newgate, the charges of which service shall be allowed to the said sheriff upon his account in the Exchequer.

The like order for John Kemple, in the gaol at Hereford.

The like order for Francis Johnson, alias Webb, in the gaol at Worcester.

May 8, 1679. The earl of Clarendon reported from the Lords' committees for examinations, that William Harcourt the Jesuit is taken, and now in the hands of the officer that took him: It is ordered, that the said William Harcourt be brought to the bar presently.

Eodem die, p. m. William Harcourt was brought to the bar, and being there charged with treason, the House made the following Order:

“Whereas William Harrison, alias Harcourt, was this day brought to the bar, and was there charged with High Treason: It is ordered, that the gentleman-usher of the black rod, attending this House, do take special care, forthwith to convey the said William Harrison alias Harcourt, in safety to Newgate, there to remain a prisoner, till he shall be discharged by due course of law.”

To the Gentleman-Usher of the Black-Rod, attending this House, &c.

May 19, 1679. Whereas Richard Gerrard esq.; is charged upon oath with treason: It is ordered that the keeper of the prison of the Gate-house, at Westminster, (in whose custody the said Richard Gerrard now is) be, and is hereby required forthwith to take care for the conveying of the said Richard Gerrard to the prison of Newgate, there to remain a prisoner till he shall be discharged by due course of law. And this shall be a sufficient warrant in the behalf.

Oct. 30, 1680. It being signified to this House that Oliver Plunket, the titular primate of Armagh, in the kingdom of Ireland, is, by his majesty's order, brought over hither, in order to his trial here, and is now in custody in the hands of a messenger: It is ordered, that the messenger, in whose hands the said Oliver Plunket now is, be, and is hereby authorize and required, forthwith to convey and deliver the body of the said Oliver Plunket into the prison of Newgate, and that the keeper of the said prison do keep him there in safety, until he shall be discharged by due course of law. And that the said keeper and his under-officer do take care, that the said Oliver Plunket be kept a close prisoner, till the pleasure of the House be farther signified; and this shall be sufficient warrant in that behalf.

To the Messenger in whose custody the said Oliver Plunket is, and also to the Keeper of the Prison of Newgate, his Deputies and Under-Officers, and every of them.

Jan. 4, 1680. Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled that Mr. Attorney General do peruse the information read this day, and draw warrants for the commitments of sir John Fitzgerald, col. Pierce Lacy, and lieut. col. Bradly, as may be available in the law, and attend the judges for their assistance therein, and present the same to the House to-morrow, at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

Ordered, That sir John Fitzgerald, col. Pierce Lacy, and lieut. col. Bradly, do remain in the custody of the pursuivant, as now they are, till the House gives further order.

Jan. 5, 1680. Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled that sir John Fitzgerald be committed to the Gate-house for treason, in compassing the king's death, and in levying war, and practising to introduce a foreign force into the kingdom of Ireland, and to depose the king from the crown of Ireland; and that the messenger, in whose hands the said sir John Fitzgerald is, be, and is hereby authorised and required, forthwith to deliver and convey the body of the said sir John Fitzgerald into the prison of the Gate house; and that the keeper of the said prison do receive and keep him there in safe custody, till he shall be discharged by due course of law: And this shall be a sufficient warrant in that behalf.

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that Pierce Lacy, esq. be committed to Newgate for Treason, in compassing the king's death, and in levying war, and practising to introduce a foreign force into the kingdom of Ireland, and to depose the king from his crown of Ireland; and that the messenger, in whose hands the said Pierce Lacy now is, be, and is hereby authorised and required, forthwith to convey and deliver the body of the said Pierce Lacy into the prison of Newgate; and that the keeper of the said prison do receive, and keep him there in safe custody, until he shall be discharged by due course of law: And this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

The like Order for col. William Bradly.

Dec. 10, 1689. And it is further ordered, that the said gentleman-usber go to the lodgings of the said Vernatti, and secure his papers, and seal them up in his presence, and set a guard on his house or lodging.

PRECEDENTS out of the JOURNALS of the HOUSE OF COMMONS.

March 24, 14 Car. 2. Upon information, that George Withers had been the author and publisher of a scandalous and seditious pamphlet, to enrage the people, and to vilify and defame the members of this House, and to blench the honour and justice of this House, and their proceedings, and was now a prisoner in Newgate,

Resolved, That the said George Withers be brought in custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House, or his Deputy, to the bar of this house, at four o'clock this afternoon, to be examined touching the matters objected against him; and the keeper of Newgate, or his deputy, is to cause him to be brought accordingly.

Resolved, That this House do adjourn 'till 3 o'clock this afternoon.

George Withers being then brought in custody to the bar of this House, and the scandalous seditious libel, with which he stands charged, being shewn unto him, the same being in two distinct papers; upon view of the first of them, he declared, That the same might be his hand, but that it was but parcel of what he intended; and the other writing being shewn to him, he confessed the same to be of his own handwriting; and two witnesses being called in, viz. Henry Northrop and Robert Heyborne, and testifying that they took the said papers from under Mr. Withers's hand, and that he was writing part of them just when they were taken from him; and that he did, upon examination before Mr. Attorney General, confess the said papers to be of his own contriving and drawing.

Resolved upon the question, That George Withers, who was this day brought from the prison of Newgate to the bar of this House, be sent prisoner, and delivered into the custody of the Lieutenant of the Tower, there to be kept in close custody, and to be denied pen, ink, and paper, and barred from having any company to come unto him. And it is referred unto Mr. Pryn, Mr. Serjeant Charleton, Mr. Solicitor General, Serjeant Maynard, Dr. Birkenhead, Mr. Thurland, Mr. Smyth, Mr. Vaughan, and Mr. Clifford, or any three of them, to peruse the seditious, infamous libel by him contrived, and draw up an impeachment against him, and report it to the house at their next meeting.

Oct. 21, 1678. Ordered, that a committee be appointed to examine concerning the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and to enquire into the manner and means how he came by his death; and likewise to enquire into the particulars of the plot and conspiracy, mentioned in his majesty's speech, against his person and government; which committee was empowered to send for persons, papers and records.

Ordered, That an Address be made to his majesty, by such members of this House as are of his majesty's privy council, humbly to desire his majesty, that all papers which do relate to the plot and conspiracy, mentioned in his majesty's speech, against his person and government, may be communicated to the said committee.

Oct. 23, 1678. Resolved, &c. That the matter concerning the plot and conspiracy, mentioned in his majesty's speech, against his person and government, be heard at the bar of the House.

Ordered, That Mr. Michael Godfrey be forthwith sent for to attend with the papers of examinations, taken by sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and now remaining in his custody sealed up, touching the plot and conspiracy mentioned in his majesty's speech.

Oct. 24, 1678. The papers of examinations taken by sir Edmundbury Godfrey, touching the plot and conspiracy, mentioned in his majesty's speech, which were delivered in by Mr. Michael Godfrey, were opened, and by Mr. Speaker read to the House.

Ordered, That the chairmen of the committee, appointed to examine concerning the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, concerning the plot, mentioned in his majesty's Speech.

Ordered, That Mr. White, alias Whitebread, and Mr. Micho, be removed from the House where they are now, to Newgate, in case they be in a condition fit to be removed.

Oct. 25, 1678. Mr. Speaker acquaints the House, that in pursuance of the order of the House yesterday, he had waited upon his majesty, and acquainted him with the informations the House had yesterday received, and that his majesty was pleased to acknowledge the great care of this house, in the preservation of his person and government; and that his majesty was informed, that Mr. White, alias Whitebread, and Mr. Micho, were at present very sick, but that his majesty would send to see them; and if they were in a condition fit to be removed, they should be forthwith sent to Newgate.

Ordered, That the members of this house, who are justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex, do repair to the lodgings of Mr. White, alias Whitebread, and Mr. Micho, and take their examinations touching the plot and conspiracy mentioned in his majesty's speech, against his person and government; and do issue out their warrants for searching their lodgings, and seizing all such papers and writings relating thereto, as shall be there found.

Oct. 25, 1678. p. m. Ordered, That the secretaries be desired to move the king, that the keys of Mr. Langhorn's chamber may be delivered by the messengers in whose hands the same are, to the committee appointed by the House to search Mr. Langhorn's papers and writings.

Oct. 26, 1678. Ordered, That an humble Address be made to his majesty, by such members of this house as are of his majesty's most honourable privy-council, to desire his majesty, that Mr. Coleman's Papers and all other papers relating to the plot and conspiracy, mentioned by his majesty in his speech, may be communicated to the House.

Mr. Secretary Williamson informs the House, that in pursuance of the order yesterday, he had attended his majesty, and acquainted him with the desires of this House, that a committee of this House might have leave to search Mr. Langhorn's Papers; and that his majesty was pleased to give leave that the same may be searched, and had appointed two of the clerks of the council to assist the Committee therein; And that his majesty was pleased to deliver him some of Mr. Coleman's papers sealed up, and ordered him to deliver the same to the House; and had also commanded him to acquaint the House, that the rest of Mr. Coleman's papers were at present under examination before the House of Lords; and that so soon as the Lords had done with them, they should be communicated to this House; And the papers were accordingly, by Mr. Secretary Williamson, delivered in, sealed up.

Oct. 29, 1678. Ordered, That his majesty be humbly desired, by such members of this House as are of his majesty's most honourable privy-council, that an inventory, or list of all Mr. Coleman's papers, which have been sorted by the clerks of the council, may be communicated to this House; and that all those papers which are not sorted, may be delivered over to a committee of this House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to examine Mr. Coleman, touching the plot and conspiracy mentioned in his majesty's speech.

Oct. 31, 1678. This House being informed that the clerk of the council was attending without, with Mr. Coleman's papers;

Ordered, That the papers be delivered to the clerk of the House, and by him transmitted to the committee appointed to examine the same.

Nov. 2, 1678. Ordered, That the clerk of the council now in waiting, do forthwith attend with Mr. Harcourt's papers and writings; and that all other papers and writings relating to the plot mentioned in his majesty's speech, either in the hands of the secretaries of state, or in the hands of the clerks of the council, be forthwith communicated to this House, according to the leave graciously given by his majesty.

Nov. 22, 1678. Resolved, that an humble address be made to his majesty, by such members of this House as are of his majesty's privy-council, to desire his majesty, that such letters and papers which relate to the plot now under examination, as have not been perused by this House, may be communicated to them.

Nov. 20, 1678. A message from the Lords by sir John Coel and sir Samuel Clark.

“Mr. Speaker, the Lords have received information, that there is a faculty under the seal of Cardinal Barberini, for dispensing with the taking of the oaths, and other things, in the hands of a member of this house, which their lordships desire may be communicated to them.”

Sir John Knight acquaints the house, that the paper mentioned by the Lords was found among Mr. Ireland's papers, and he delivered the same in at the clerk's table; which being read by Mr. Speaker, Ordered, That the said paper be sent to the Lords, and that Mr. Speaker do acquaint the messengers, that when their lordships have perused the same, this House does expect it should be returned again, in order to be entered in the Journal of this House: and the messengers being called in, the said paper was delivered them, and Mr. Speaker acquainted them with the pleasure of the House.

April 26, 1679. Resolved, That an humble Address be made to his majesty, to desire his majesty to give order for the executing of Pickering; and also to give order to the judges, to issue out their warrants for executing the several popish priests, which they have condemned in their several circuits.

May 5, 1679. The lord Russel acquaints the house, that his majesty had commanded him to let the House know, that his majesty is willing to comply with the request made to him by this house concerning Pickering, and that the law shall pass upon him accordingly.

As to the condemned priests, the House of Peers have sent for them, in order (as his majesty conceives) to some examinations.

May 9, 1679. p. m. Mr. Hampden reports from the committee appointed to inspect the Lord's Journals, and see, inter alia, upon what grounds the condemned Popish priests are sent for, that the committee had inspected the Journals, and taken out copies of their proceedings, which he reported to the house.

May 30, 1679. Ordered, That a message be sent to the Lords concerning the condemned Popish priests, sent for up to London from the several county gaols, by order of their lordships.

May 22, 1679. Sir William Franklyn reports from the committee appointed to draw up and prepare a message to be sent to the Lords, concerning the Popish priests condemned in the circuits, that the committee had agreed upon a message to be reported to the House, which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered the same in at the clerk's table, where the same was twice read, and upon the question, agreed, and is as followeth, (viz.)

The House of Commons having made an humble Address to his majesty, that he would be pleased to give Order to the judges, to issue out their warrants for the executing the several Popish priests condemned in the several circuits; and his majesty having been graciously pleased to signify to the House of Commons, that your lordships have sent for them, in order (as he conceived) to some examination: and the House of Commons being also informed, that the said priests have, by Order from your lordships, not only been brought out of the several counties, where they were condemned, but continued yet in Newgate, and other prisons, in or about the cities of London and Westminster, by reason whereof the execution of the sentence pronounced upon them is still delayed, do desire of your lordships that the said priests may be forthwith remanded to the several counties where they were condemned, that so they may be executed, according to the judgment passed upon them.

October 25. 1 Will. & Mariz, the House being informed, that several of the prisoners of the Tower were now bailing in the court of King's-Bench, being brought thither by the governor of the Tower, by virtue of a Habeas Corpus awarded for that purpose, particularly sir Thomas Jenner, Mr. Richard Graham, and Mr. Philip Burton, Ordered, That sir Thomas Jenner, Mr. Richard Graham, and Mr. Philip Burton, be immediately brought to this House by the governor of the Tower, to answer to such matters as shall be objected against them.

And Mr. Speaker issued his warrant accordingly, and the same was sent by the serjeant at arms attending this House.

Afterwards, the serjeant acquainted the House, that sir Thomas Jenner was bailed, and gone out of court, and that Mr. Graham was bailing in the court: and that notwithstanding he had delivered the warrant to the governor of the Tower, and that he was coming with Mr. Graham, and Mr. Burton.

Ordered, That sir Thomas Jenner be sent for in custody of the serjeant at arms attending this house, to answer to such matters as shall be objected against him.

The house being informed, that Mr. Burton and Mr. Graham were at the door, they were severally called into the bar of the House and charged with the several matters mentioned in the said report, and heard what they could say touching the same.

And being withdrawn, ordered, That Mr. Richard Graham, and Mr. Philip Burton, be committed to the custody of the serjeant at arms attending this House, for several high crimes and misdemeanors objected against them.

And it is referred to, &c.

Jan. 4, 1697. The House being informed, that Mr. Reginald Marriot* had sent to several members of this House, letters, acknowledging that he had been concerned in the irregular indorsement of exchequer bills; and therein offered fully to relate how that notorious practice had been projected and carried on, and in what manner he had been drawn into the same, Ordered, That the said Mr. Reginald Marriot be summoned to attend this house immediately, and the said Mr. Marriot attending accordingly: he was brought in by the serjeant at arms attending this House to the bar, when he delivered an account of his knowledge of that matter in writing, signed by himself, which he read at the bar, and afterwards delivered into the House.

Ordered, That the examinations taken before the lords of the treasury, relating to the irregular indorsement of the exchequer bills, be laid before this House.

A motion being made, that the House will order that all prosecutions at law against the said Mr. Marriot be stayed during the pleasure of the House; and a debate arising thereupon: Resolved, That the debate be adjourned till tomorrow morning.

Ordered, That the said Mr. Marriot be taken into custody of the serjeant at arms attending this House; and that no person be permitted to converse with, or bring any letters to him, without leave of the House.

Jan. 5, 1697. Mr. Lowndes, according to order, presented to the House several papers relating to the examinations, taken before the lords of the treasury, touching the false indorsement of the exchequer-bills.

The House resumed the adjourned debate of yesterday touching the ordering the stay of any prosecution at law against Mr. Marriot.

Ordered, nem. con. That all prosecutions at law against Mr. Reginald Marriot, in relation to the false indorsement of exchequer-bills, be stayed, during the pleasure of this House.

But nothing more was done in this business.

The Lords' Address concerning the Scotch Conspiracy, and for endeavours to be used to settle the Succession there in-the Princess So- phia.] March 31. The Lords, after the conclusion of this affair, made the following Address to her majesty in answer to that which the Commons had made against them: (see p. 179), viz.

“We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, humbly beg leave to acquaint your majesty, that, as soon as all the papers relating to the conspiracy in Scotland were, by your majesty's command, laid before the House; according to our duty, and with that zeal which we have always shewn, where the safety of your person, and the security of your people may be concerned;—We applied ourselves to search into the designs of your enemies, as well by a careful perusal and consideration of the papers, as by appointing a committee to examine the persons who had been taken into custody upon account of the Conspiracy, and others from whom it might be reasonably supposed any light might be gained towards the discovery.—And the committee having made their report to the house; upon mature deliberation of the whole matter, we came to this unanimous Resolution: ‘That it did appear to us, there has been a dangerous Conspiracy carried on, for the raising a rebellion in Scotland, and invading that kingdom with a French power, in order to the subverting of your majesty's government both in England and Scotland, and the bringing in the pretended prince of Wales.’—We do also humbly take leave to offer to your majesty, as our concurrent opinion, that nothing has given so much encouragement to your enemies at home and abroad, to enter into this detestable conspiracy; as that, after your majesty, and the heirs of your body, the immediate succession to the crown of Scotland is not declared to be in the princess Sophia, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants.—Most gracious Sovereign; We, being fully convinced of this important truth, most humbly beseech your majesty, in regard to the safety of your own royal person, the quiet of your reign, and the present and future happiness and peace of your people, to use your royal endeavours, by all such methods as your majesty in your wisdom shall judge most proper, to have the succession of the crown of Scotland declared to be settled upon the princess Sophia, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants. And we do also humbly beseech your majesty to take all other measures, which may best and most effectually conduce to the disappointing and frustrating the designs of your enemies, and of such of your traitorous subjects as are engaged with them in this dangerous conspiracy against your majesty, for the utter subversion of your government. And we do most heartily and unanimously assure your majesty, that, when your wise endeavours for the settling the succession in Scotland shall have taken the desired effect, we will do all in our power to promote an entire and compleat Union between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, for their mutual security and advantage.”

The Lords' Address for the Commissions of the Peace to be reviewed.] March 31. The Lords presented the following Address to her majesty:

“We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, having taken into our consideration the great alterations that have been of late made in the commissions of the peace, do most humbly beg leave to lay before your majesty, that it is our opinion, that no person that refused to take the oaths to the late king is fit to be in the commission of the peace under your majesty: and we do further humbly beseech your majesty, that you will be graciously pleased to order the commissions of the peace to be reviewed; and to give direction, that no person or persons be continued, or put into the commission of the peace, but men of quality and estates, and of known affection to your majesty's title and government, and the Protestant succession and the Church of England, as they are both established by law; and that your majesty will be pleased to order, that such be restored who are so qualified, and have been turned out without just cause.”

The Queen's Answer to the Address of the Lords.] To this Address, her majesty gave this Answer:

“My Lords; 1. I hope, none of my subjects have any desire to lessen my prerogative; since I have no thought of making use of it but for their protection and advantage.—I look upon it as a great misfortune, when any misunderstandings happen between the two houses of parliament; which cannot be, without so much prejudice to the public, that I shall never omit any thing in my power to prevent the occasions of them.

“My Lords; 2. This Address consists of so many parts, that I cannot take notice of them now but in general. I will consider the several particulars, and give such directions as shall be proper for the safety and welfare of the nation.

“My Lords; 3. I have some time since declared my intentions of endeavouring the settlement of the Protestant succession in Scotland, to my servants of that kingdom, as the most effectual means for securing their quiet and our own, and the readiest way to an entire Union betwixt both kingdoms; in the perfecting of which, it is very desirable, no time should be lost.

“My Lords; 4. I have always thought it reasonable, that the commissions of the peace should be filled with gentlemen of the best quality and estates in their country.—And it is as fit they should be of known loyalty and affection to the government, to the Protestant succession, and the Church of England as established by law. And I shall give directions according to this rule.”

PROCEEDINGS OF BOTH HOUSES IN THE GREAT CASE OF ASHBY AND WHITE.*

PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.]
About this time the Great Case of ASHBY and WHITE came on in the House of Commons.

* " These differences between the two Houses were still heightened by the Lords interposing in an affair, the cognizance of which the Commons pretended to belong solely to themselves. There had been great complaints long made, and these had increased within a few years, of great partiality and injustice in the election of parliament-men, both by sheriffs in counties, and by the returning officers in boroughs. In Aylesbury in Buckinghamshire the return was made by four constables; and it was believed, that they had made a bargain with some of the candidates, and then managed the matter so, as to be sure, that the majority should be for the person, to whom they had engaged themselves. They canvassed about the town, to know how the voters were set, and they resolved to find some pretence for disabling those, who were engaged to vote for other persons than their friends, that they might be sure to have the majority in their own hands.

" And, when these matters came to be examined by the House of Commons, they gave the election always for him, who was reckoned of the party of the majority, in a manner so barefaced, that they were scarce out of countenance, when they were charged for injustice in judging elections. It was not easy to find a remedy against such a crying abuse, of which all sides in their turns, as they happened to be depressed, had made great complaints; but, when they came to be the majority, seemed to forget all, that they had before exclaimed against. Some few excused this on the topic of retaliation, alledging, that they dealt with others as they dealt with them or their friends. At last an action was brought against William White, and the other constables of Aylesbury, by one Matthew Ashby, who had been always admitted to vote in former elections, but was denied it in the last election. This action was tried at the assizes, and it was found there by the jury, that the constables had denied him a right, of which he was undoubtedly in possession, so that they were cast with damages. But it was moved in the Queen's Bench to quash all the proceedings in that matter, since no action did he, or ever had been brought upon that account. The judges Powel, Gould, and Powis, were of opinion, that no hurt was done to Ashby; that the judging of elections belonged to the House of Commons: That, as this action was the first of its kind, so, if it was allowed, it would occasion an infinite number of suits, and put all the officers, concerned in that matter, under great difficulties. Chief justice Holt alone differed from the rest. He thought this a matter of the greatest importance, both to the whole nation in general, and to every man in

Matthew Ashby, having commenced and prosecuted an action at common law against William White, mayor of Aylesbury, and others, the constables of that town, for refusing to receive his vote at an election of burgesses to serve in parliament, for the said borough; but his own particular. He made a great difference between an election of a member, and a right to vote in it. That the House of Commons were the only judges of the former, whether it was rightly managed or not, without bribery, fraud, or violence; but the right of voting in an election was an original right founded either on a freehold of forty shillings a year in the county, or on burgage-land, or prescription, or by charter, in a borough. These were all legal titles, and, as such were triable in a court of law. Acts of parliament were made concerning them, and, by reason of these, every thing relating to those acts was triable in a court of law. He spoke long and learnedly, and with some vehemence, upon the subject; but he was one against three, and therefore the order of the Queen's Bench was given in favour of the constables. The matter was upon that brought before the House of Lords by a Writ of Error; the case was very fully argued at the bar, and the judges were ordered to deliver their opinion upon it, which they did very copiously. Chief Justice Trevor insisted much on the authority, that the House of Commons had to judge of all those elections. From that he inferred, that the Commons only could judge, who were the electors. Petitions were often grounded on this, that in a poll some were admitted to a vote, who had no right to it, and that others were denied it, who had a right; so that in some cases the Commons were the proper judges of this right, and, if they had it in some cases, they must have it in all. From this he inferred, that every thing relating to this matter was triable by them, and by them only. If two independent jurisdictions might have the same cause brought before them, they might give contrary judgments in it; and this must breed great distraction in the execution of those judgments.

" To all this it was answered, that a single man who was wronged in this matter, had no other remedy but by bringing it into a court of law; for the House of Commons could not examine the right of every voter: If the man, for whom he would have voted, was returned, he could not be heard to complain to the House of Commons, though in his own particular he was denied a vote, since he could not make any exceptions to the return, and therefore must bear his wrong without remedy, if he could not bring it into a court of law. A right of voting in an election was the greatest of all the rights of an Englishman, since by that he was represented in parliament. The House of Commons could give no relief to a man wronged in this point, nor any damages; they could only set aside one, and admit of another return. But this was no redress to him, who suffered the wrong; it made him the less considered in his borough, being cast, he brought a Writ of Error into the House of Lords, who, upon strict examination of witnesses, and upon mature deliberation, gave Judgment in favour of Ashby. The Commons looking upon these Proceedings as an incroachment on their privileges, proceeded as follows:

and that might be a real damage to him in his trade. Since this was a right inherent in a man, it seemed reasonable, that it should be brought, where all other rights were tried, into a court of law. The abuse was new, and was daily growing, and it was already swelled to a great height. When new disorders happen, new actions must lie, otherwise there is a failure in justice, which all laws abhor. Practices of this sort were enormous and crying; and if the rule made in the Queen's Bench was affirmed, it would very much increase these disorders by this indemnity, that seemed to be given to officers, who took the poll.

“After a long debate, it was carried by a great majority to set aside the order of the Queen's Bench, and to give judgment according to the verdict given at the assizes. This gave great offence to the Commons, who looking on these proceedings as incroachments on their privileges, after having inspected the Lords' Journals, resolved, “1. That, according to the known laws and usage in parliament, it is the sole right of the Commons of England, in parliament assembled (except in cases otherwise provided for by act of parliament) to examine and determine all matters relating to the right of election of their own members. 2. That neither the qualification of any elector, or the right of any person elected, is cognizable or determinable elsewhere than before the Commons. 3. That the examining and determining the qualification or right of any elector, or any person elected to serve in parliament, in any court of law, or elsewhere, than before the Commons, will expose all mayors, bailiffs, and other officers, who are obliged to take the poll, and make a return thereupon, to multiplicity of actions, vexatious suits, and insupportable expences, and will subject them to different and independent jurisdictions, and inconsistent determinations in the same case, without relief. 4. That Matthew Ashby, having, in contempt of the jurisdiction of this House, commenced and prosecuted an action at common law against William White and others, the constables of Aylesbury, for not receiving his vote at an election of burgesses to serve in parliament for that borough, is guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House. 5. That whoever shall presume to commence or prosecute any action, indictment, or information, which shall bring the rights of the electors, or persons elected to serve in parliament, to the determination of any other jurisdiction than that of the House of Commons (except in cases specially provided for by act of parliament) such person or persons, and all attorneys, solicitors, counsellors, and serjeants at law, soliciting, prosecuting, or pleading in any such case, are guilty of a big breach of the privilege of this House.” And they ordered these Resolutions to be fixed upon Westminster-Hall-gate, signed by the clerk. However, they did not think fit to send for Ashby, who had sued, or rather, in whose name the suit was carried on, but let the matter fall as to him, under a shew of moderation and pity, and rested it upon the general votes. On the other hand, the Lords appointed a Committee to draw up the state of the Case upon the Writ of Error wherein Ashby was plaintiff, and William White and others defendants; which Committee having made their report, their lordships resolved “1. That, by the known laws of this kingdom every freeholder, or other person having a right to give his vote at the election of members to serve in parliament, and being willfully denied or hindered so to do by the officer who ought to receive the same, may maintain an action in the queen's courts against such officer to assert his right and to recover damage for the injury. 2. That the asserting, That a person having a right to give his vote at an election, and being hindered so to do by the officer who ought to take the same, is without remedy for such wrong, by the ordinary course of law is destructive of the property of the subject against the freedom of elections, and manifestly tends to encourage corruption and partiality in officers, who are to make returns to parliament, and to subject freeholders, and other electors, to their arbitrary will and pleasure. 3. That the declaring Matthew Ashby guilty of a breach of privilege of the House of Commons, for prosecuting an action against the constables of Aylesbury, for not receiving his vote at an election, after he had, in the known and proper methods of law, obtained a Judgment in parliament for recovery of his damages, is an unprecedented attempt upon the judicature of parliament, and is, in effect, to subject the law of England to the votes of the House of Commons. And, 4. That the deterring electors from prosecuting actions in the ordinary course of law, when they are deprived of their right of voting, and terrifying attorneys, solicitors, counsellors, and serjeants at law from soliciting, prosecuting and pleading in such cases, by voting their so doing to be a breach of privilege of the House of Commons is a manifest assuming a power to controul the law, and hinder the course of justice, and subject the property of Englishmen to the arbitrary votes of the House of Commons.” The Lord likewise ordered the lord-keeper to send a copy of the Case, and of their Resolutions, to all the sheriffs of England, to be communicated to all the boroughs in their counties. The Commons ment given in the House of Lords upon a Writ of Error from the court of Queen's-bench, in a Cause between Matthew Ashby and William White, wherein the Privileges of the House were concerned, appointed some of their members to search the Journals of the House of Lords as to their Proceedings upon the said Writ of Error, and to report the same to the House. They also ordered the same members to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords, as to what they had done formerly in the Case of Soame and Barnardiston; and likewise to report that matter to the House.

January 18. The House ordered, that the members who were appointed to search the Journals of the House of Lords as to their Proceedings upon a Writ of Error from the court of Queen's-bench, in the cause between Ashby and White, should likewise search the several offices of the court, of Queen's-bench, for the Record of the Judgment, and all other Proceedings there in that Cause, and report the same to the House.

January 20. Ordered, That the Report, with relation to the Proceedings of the House of Lords and Court of Queen's-bench, in the Case of White and Ashby, should be made on the morrow morning.

January 21. Mr. Freeman reported, That the members appointed to search the Lords Journals, touching the Proceedings upon a Writ of Error from the court of Queen's-bench, in a Cause between White and Ashby, and what the Lords had done in the Case of Soame and Barnardiston, had searched the same accordingly; and he read in his place what they found therein, and he delivered the same at the table, where the same was read. And Mr. Brewer also reported, That the members appointed had also searched the offices of the court of Queen's-bench, for the Judgment and Proceedings there in the Case of Ashby and White, and had obtained a copy of the record of the Judgment, which he delivered in at the table.

The Speaker, (Mr. Harley, afterwards earl of Oxford) after the Reports were over, told the House, That he thought it to be his duty to put them in mind of the great consequence and importance of this matter, and that it behoved them to take very great caution in their proceedings, not only that the grounds and foundation be good, but also that the method and manner of treating it be according to ancient usages and custom of parliament: and to were highly provoked with this, but they could not hinder it. The thing was popular, and the Lords got great credit by the Judgment given by them, which let the people of England see, how they might be redressed for the future, if they should meet with the injustice, the partiality, and other ill practices, that had appeared of late in elections, even beyond the examples of former times." Tindal.

that end he desires the House would give him leave to state this matter, as it appeared to him, and according to what occurred upon the sudden to his memory, that the House might take proper methods upon this occasion.

The Speaker then proceeded to give the House an account of the state of elections by custom of common law, and that the great alteration in point of election was in the beginning of Hen. 4's time, since whose reign the returns for parliament have been made by indenture. That by the statute of 7 H. 4, there is a method prescribed of election and return, and the occasion he took to be this: H. 4 came to the succession of the crown by the deposition of R. 2, when the parliament was sitting. That parliament was continued to H. 4's time: for though in the rolls it was called a new parliament, and returns were made as by the sheriffs of the counties, and also by the boroughs, as if it was a new parliament; yet it was the same parliament, for they were the same men, and there were too few days between one parliament and the other, to have a new election. But Henry 4, having made such an extraordinary step, he would not leave it as a precedent to be found out. Afterwards, when times were a little more settled, in his 7th year, and that practice was necessary to be condemned, it was provided, at the great complaint of the Commons, that it should be done by indenture, that the same or like deceit should never be put upon the kingdom afterwards, and one part was to be kept below. This continued for about four years, when there was another complaint of the proceedings of sheriffs (he said he need not mention the regulation of 40s. a year, and some other things which are not directly to this case); and upon that there was a penalty put upon the sheriffs of 100*l.* which he took to be the 11th year; and it was put under the inquiry of judges of assize, and so it stood all that king's reign till H. 5. And then there was another law made for electors and elected, that they should be all resident. Some of the law books give a pretty construction of it, that though there was such a law, yet the custom of parliament was to be the rule. But he said he thought it to be a better construction, that it being then reckoned a service, and a hard service, none but residents in the borough were compellable. Thus it continued till about H. 6's time, and then if the sheriffs had made a wrong return, if indicted or prosecuted at the assizes, there was to be immediate execution for this 100*l.* without any traverse. Upon this there was a statute to allow the sheriff a traverse for this 100*l.* and that he should not be liable to it till he was legally convicted; so it stood till about a year afterwards, that the parliament thought it necessary to make another act about 8 H. 6. and then there was great complaint again of the ill proceedings of sheriffs. And the law was enforced again, and it was declared who should be the electors, and the sheriff was made liable to the penalty of 100*l.* and imprisonment without bail or main-prize, and it was inquirable by the judges of assize. Another statute was made the 10 H. 6, which enforceth the manner of elections, so it stood. Then 23 H. 6, there are two statutes, one relating to the wages of knights, citizens and burgeses, and how they should be levied; another reciting the statute of H. 5, and H. 6. and it says, that there were not sufficient penalties on sheriffs, who, besides that sometimes they sent no writs to boroughs, made insufficient returns, &c. And the mayors and bailiffs were guilty of the same; and therefore over and above the first penalty of 100*l.* they laid another penalty of 100*l.* more, which was to the plaintiff, with costs of suit; and this was to be tried before the judges of assize, and the courts at Westminster, and at the sessions, and the action is to lie either for a knight, or burges, or any other person that would bring the same, but within a time limited, three months from the commencement of the parliament. Thus elections stood in point of law, till the modern alteration within every body's memory, and he hoped whatever time gentlemen took this matter into consideration, they would do it as became the House of Commons, and examine all particulars, as well as the judgments of law, and they would do what became a House of Commons, and that nobody would see the dignity of the House of Commons impaired. And however differences were between them in other things, they would be unanimous in preserving the rights of the Commons, and of doing it in a right and justifiable manner: and offered to their consideration, whether it would not be best to proceed in the old method, by going into a grand Committee for the Courts of Justice to consider this matter, and that by taking this course, they would walk in the steps of their predecessors, and avoid many inconveniences, which were easily to be foreseen would happen, by taking another course.

But it being moved and seconded, to consider of the said Reports in a Committee of the whole House, the question was put, and carried, That the House on Tuesday then next following, would resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to consider of the said Reports.

Ordered, That the same members do also search the officers of the court of Queen's-bench, what proceeding were there in the Case of Barnardiston and Soame, and for a copy of the record of the Judgment in that Case, and report the same to the House.

January 24. Mr. Brewer reported, that the members appointed to search the offices of the court of Queen's-bench, as to what proceedings were there in the Case of Barnardiston and Soame, and for a copy of the Judgment in that Case, had searched the same accordingly; and he presented to the House a copy of the said Judgment, the consideration whereof was referred to the committee of the whole House who were appointed to consider of the Report relating to the Case of Ashby and White.

January 25. This day the House resolve into a committee of the whole House to take into consideration the Report of the Lord Journals touching their lordships proceeding on a Writ of Error in the Case between Ashby and White, & al. and also touching their lordships proceedings in the matter mentioned the Petition of Mr. Bathurst; in which last Case of Mr. Bathurst, as it was alledged, the lordships had taken upon them an original Jurisdiction, in controuling an order made by the court of exchequer for the filing of a record that had been several years lodged in Mr. Granges' chamber of the Temple. But the committee in the first place agreed to go on with the business of Ashby and White; and the debate of that matter was carried on with great order and temper, and was to the effect following.

Mr. Freeman in the Chair.

Mr. Brewer. Sir, we are now in a Committee of the whole House upon the consideration of the Case of Ashby and White; which I take to be a matter of the last consequence to the privileges of the House of Commons, which I think are dangerously invaded, by the Lords pretence of Judicature upon them. But, as I don't think every gentleman here thinks it his duty to support and maintain the just rights and privileges of this House, as intrusted by those who sent us hither; so we shall do it in such a manner, as will consist with, and maintain due correspondence with the Lords. I shall open the true state of the case, with the Judgment given upon it in Westminster-Hall, and some of the reasons, which, in my opinion support that Judgment; and then speak to the reversal of it by the Lords, (which, with submission, I take to be a new attempt of the lordships, to bring this, and all our privileges before them in Judgment) which I believe neither this, nor any other House of Commons will endure, or want will or power to relieve themselves against such an usurpation.—The plaintiff declares against the defendants, that whereas, on the 26th day of December, in the 12th year of king William the third, writ issued to the Sheriff of Bucks, commanding him to cause to be elected two Burgesses for Aylesbury; the sheriff directed his precept accordingly to the Constables, to whom it was longed to execute that precept; and the burgeses being assembled, and the plaintiff duly qualified to give his vote, he offered to give it for sir Thomas Lee and Mr. Mayue; but the defendants, falsely and maliciously intending to defeat him of that privilege, did refuse to receive it; which he lays to his damage, and issue being joined, that cause was tried at the assizes, and a verdict for the plaintiff, and 5*l.* damages.—The fact being thus tried, the matter in hand (that is to say, whether this action is maintainable by the rules of law or not) was often argued by counsel learned at the bar, and afterwards considered by the judges in the Queen's-bench; and upon their mature consideration, Judgment was given for the defendants, that is, that the plaintiff had no good cause of action.—Now I understand the chief reason was, for that the right of voting in such cases hath ever been, and ought to be cognizable and determinable by the House of Commons, and not elsewhere; for by the law and usage of parliament, the House of Commons have heard and determined the right of their own elections, and consequently and necessarily the right of the electors to vote; and for this purpose, at the opening of all parliaments a committee of elections is nominated of members of our own, to hear and determine of such right of elections, to whom petitions (after presented to the House) are referred; and if any elector had been refused his vote in the country he is, notwithstanding, allowed his vote here in case he had right; and it shall avail the candidate as much as if the vote had been received below: and the committee, after judgment upon the case, report to the House all the special matter, and their resolutions; and the whole matter may be afresh determined, and the House agree or disagree with the committee, as shall appear reasonable. So that this determination and method of trial are two digressions, and more likely to be well founded than that of a common jury, who we know are made by Under-Sheriffs, and often of persons so corrupted or ignorant, that new trials are often granted by the judges. But it may be objected, that no single petitioner will be received by the House: in answer to this, I say he may; and I have known petitions touching elections preferred by very few persons, and by the same reason may by one: I assure you we have no order of the House against it; and if gentlemen object, that no single petition of this nature was ever received, if they will shew me when it was offered, I will shew them when it was received; I believe they cannot shew me it was ever refused. But I would ask if they can shew me that such an election as this was ever brought against the officer, as in this case. I am sure they cannot, and which, in our law, is allowed a good argument, that no action lies; especially it being a case which cannot be presumed, but may happen very often, almost in every election: And I believe there never was a parliament called but frequent occasions might have been taken for such an action, and better founded than this of the Plaintiff's, who was a poor hostler, and removed from that parish by the order of two justices, as being likely to become chargeable. But it seems our ancestors reposed a confidence in their representatives to have right done them in such cases: They sought not relief from common juries. And what is now done by this attempt? Why, the judges, upon their oaths say, that they have no cognizance of the cause; but notwithstanding the Lords say they have cognizance, and reverse that judgment; and the consequence of that is, the Lords will judge of this our undoubted privilege, never 'till now drawn into question; and by that reason and law, the Lords may sit in judgment upon all other our privileges, and thereby we become depending upon them; which some without doors, I find, are willing to submit to: for that they say, where one is deprived of his right he ought to have damages, which the House of Commons cannot give. I allow, where one is injured he shall have relief, by our law, in one place or other; but we have not one shop to cure all distempers. The Queen's-bench relieves chiefly in matters criminal; and the Common-Pleas in civil pleas between party and party; the Exchequer in matters of revenue; Chancery in cases of fraud; and in the Case in question, relief may be had (as said before) in the House of Commons, by law and usage of parliament, which all lawyers know, is a very considerable, known and approved part of the laws of England. And though no damages are usually given here, yet the officer, for misbehaviour, and arbitrarily refusing votes who had right, may be, and has been punished, by the power and authority of the house, and even at Common-Law; as when an alderman is refused by the Mayor, or other person who ought to admit him, the remedy is by Mandamus, which though it is chargeable to the person injured, yet I do not know any damages are given him, otherwise than that the party injured is admitted; which is a relief, the alderman having what he complained for? And so the elector; his vote is allowed as good as if the constable had took it. And, by the way, give me leave to observe how small a relief the new devised remedy, by damages, is: I dare affirm and demonstrate, that the Plaintiff, in the case in question, is above 100*l.* out of pocket, more than the costs and damages recovered, which I take to be infelix victor. But if gentlemen say, the poor hostler could not expend so much, I believe so too, but if at the expence of any great man, I think it less justifiable, to make a tool of that poor fellow, perhaps in order to enlarge a jurisdiction.—I must confess I take the case of the elected to be much stronger than that of the electors; and yet, in such cases, relief at Common-Law was always denied, as in the case of sir Samuel Barnardiston and Soeme, there the Sheriff made a double return; and in the Case of Mr. Onslow*, a false return; and the persons injured

* The Case of Denzil Onslow, esq. was tried at the Assizes holden for Surrey on Wednesday the 20th of July, 1681, at Kingston upon Thames, before the Lord Chief Justice of England, sir Francis Pemberton.

THE DECLARATION.

Denzil Onslow, esq. had brought his action on his Case in the court of Common Pleas, against William Rapley, late bailiff of the borough of Haselmere; thereby setting forth, that Haselmere was an ancient borough by those returns were put to very great charges, and kept long from their seats in the House, that used to send burgesses to parliament, that a writ issued to the sheriff of Surrey, to chuse knights and burgesses to be chosen for the parliament to be held the 17th of October, anno 31 Caroli regis. The sheriff made a precept to the borough of Haselmere, to chuse burgesses. That, August 31, Anno 31 Caroli secundi, the Plaintiff was duly elected one of the burgesses, and returned, by indenture, with sir William Moore. That the Defendant, intending to deprive the Plaintiff of the honour and benefit of his election, did, by another indenture, return sir William Moore, bart. and James Gresham, esq. as duly elected: whereby the Plaintiff was hindered from sitting in parliament, and put to great charge to assert his right, to his damage of 200*l*.

After Not Guilty pleaded, upon evidence given on both sides, at the trial, the Case appeared to be thus:

THE CASE AND EVIDENCE.

At the election in this borough for the last parliament at Westminster, there were four competitors, viz. sir Wm. Moore, the Plaintiff, Mr. Dorington and Mr. Gresham. The electors meeting and voting, the poll was demanded, granted, and taken: The Defendant took time to peruse and consider the poll until the afternoon; and having considered of it, came again to the place of election, and declared the Plaintiff and sir William Moore had the majority of the ancient and lawful burgesses, and proclaimed those two to be duly elected, and sealed an indenture thereof accordingly; and Mr. Gresham being then present, opposed not the same, but desired that sir William Moore (with regard to his title and quality) might be first named in the indenture, although (as was then admitted) Mr. Onslow had the majority of him; which was done accordingly, Mr. Onslow readily and generously consenting to the doing thereof.

That about a week or a fortnight after, the bailiff was prevailed with to seal and return another indenture, whereby sir William Moore and Mr. Gresham were returned as elected. Whereupon Mr. Onslow's right to sit was controverted, and he suspended from sitting; and was put to his Petition to the House of Commons, who, upon hearing of the whole matter, and consideration had of the indirect dealing of the Defendant and others, declared Mr. Onslow duly elected, and committed the Defendant; and Mr. Onslow sate in the last parliament at Westminster for that borough, and that Mr. Onslow had been at great charges to clear his election.—First, the Defendant's counsel insisted on the statute of 1 H. 5, c. 1, That a person elected must be free, resident, and dwelling within the borough; to which it was answered, and resolved by the court, that little or no regard was to be had to that ancient statute, forasmuch as the common practice of the kingdom had been, and yet, at Common-Law could never obtain relief. The Judges were of opinion (as the ever since, the contrary; and it was the way fill the parliament house with men below employment: and the objection was disallowed. Secondly, it was agreed unto by the party and by their counsel on both sides, that the right of choice of burgesses for this borough parliament, lay in the burgage freeholders, resident, and inhabiting within the borough, and none others.

Then the Plaintiff's counsel insisted and proved, that there voted for him 13, having good and unquestionable votes; unto one whereof the Defendant's counsel excepted, for that before the election, had mortgaged his estate which the party himself, present in court, denied upon oath: and the court was of opinion it had not been a good objection, if true, so long as the mortgager continued the possession, and had the benefit of redemption in him.

The Defendant's counsel said, there vote for Mr. Gresham 14, having good votes: which if so, would have made a majority; but the Plaintiff's counsel excepted to six of the 14 as being no good electors, for one of them lived not within the borough; which was proved, by ancient reputation and perambulation, that the house where he lived was left without the bounds. As to the other five, the objection was, that they were no real burgage-tenants; and that, if any conveyances had been made to them of burgage lands, they were lately made, and fraudulently contrived, to make votes against an election; and because the Defendant's counsel could not deny but these conveyances were lately made, the Court put the Defendant to produce as many as he could, to prove them, which was done; and upon reading of them, it appeared, two of the five were made after the test of the parliament writ, and three of them in order to carry on sir Philip Floyd's election in the borough, about five years since. Two of them were conveyances by one Waller, who had a garden about 30 rods, and conveyed to each of his two sons a piece of it, containing about ten rods, of which they had made jointure to their wives, each share being worth, at best 2*s*. per annum. Another of the five was made by the father, who had a close containing two acres, and made a conveyance to his son of about a quarter of an acre, which always after lay undivided, and was constantly enjoyed by the father. Another conveyance was made by a son-in-law to his father-in-law, of a car house. The last conveyance was to one Jackson, of a little tenement: but it was proved the collateral security given to re-convey, and that the grantor had repaired. As to all five, they appeared several badges of fraud; as a continued possession in the grantors, &c. and their several confessions of the purpose and intent in making them for the elections.

The court censured such proceedings as erroneous and unlawful; Mr. W. (Recorder of G.) one of the Defendant's counsel, stood up to justify these proceedings, and said, it was part of the constitution of our government to do so. At which the Court seemed very angry, and wondered that any one, especially a man of the gown, should say so, and said, Do you think our government hath no better constitution? with which the gentleman not being satisfied, he was told by the Court, he deserved to be taken notice of for saying so, and that he seemed to have advised to have the thing done.

now are in the case of the elector) that it was a matter of parliamentary cognizance, of which

To conclude the evidence, the Plaintiff's counsel delivered into Court ten or twelve several conveyances, that were proved by the party that wrote them, to have been made by Mr. G.'s order, to make so many votes at a former election, wherein Mr. Gresham was concerned; and the election being over, they were cancelled and delivered up; concerning which, Mr. Gresham endeavoured to say something by way of excuse, but was told by the Court, it was too bad to be excused; and it was well an act of general pardon had passed since this was done, else he should have answered it in another place. During the whole time of the trial, the same was managed with great patience and circumspection; for, so soon as the cause was opened by the Plaintiff's Counsel, the Court perceiving the nature of it, commanded silence and attention in the jury: The Court declaring it was of great weight, as great as any that ever came there to be tried. And the evidence being fully given on both sides, the Court, by way of direction, told the Jury, that the Plaintiff need not, as this case is, prove any express malice in the Defendant; for it shall be intended when a man shall do such an evil thing as this is, contrary to his own knowledge and declaration made upon the election, and afterwards also; (for it was proved against him, by one or two witnesses, that a little time before this trial, he did confess Mr. Onslow duly elected, and that he had told Mr. Gresham what would come of it.) And the Court further told the Jury, that this was a cause of moment, and deserved more than ordinary consideration; and that the making votes by such means was a very evil and unlawful thing, and tended to the destruction of the government, and detaching of parliaments: and although some of the conveyances were made some time before this election, to serve a turn at a former choice; yet that they were fraudulent and void in their creation, and ought not to be made use of at any time against any other person; and that it was senseless to think such practices were part of the constitution of the government, or to imagine that persons whom we intrust with our lives and fortunes ought to be made and chosen by such evil devices: and that such practices deserve to be severely punished, and directed the Jury to give signal damages. Whereupon the Jury withdrew, and after a short stay, gave a Verdict for the Plaintiff, and 50*l.* damages.

And the Court, in the course of the evidence, they were not competent judges. And should we now admit this matter to be determined by having observed one Billingham to be much concerned in the proof and management of their fraudulent deeds, conceived him to be privy to much of the practice thereabouts, and commanded him to stay in the court till the jury had given in their verdict: which when they had done, the Court required him to find sureties to appear in the Court of King's Bench next Michaelmas-Term, to answer to an information touching the said misdemeanor: and in the mean time to be of good behaviour, which accordingly he did do; and sir William Moore, and sir George Woodruff, whom he had served last election at Haselmere, were his sureties. And the Court required the Plaintiff, Mr. Onslow, to see that an information be preferred; which he promised to do: And the Court declared it was a very great offence, and should be severely punished.

I shall give a few instances of what the House of Commons have done in former ages to punish and prevent evils about Elections.

1. Anno 20 Jacobi, doctor Harris, minister of Blechingley in Surrey, for misbehaving himself by preaching, and otherwise, about election of members of parliament, upon complaint, was called to the bar of the House of Commons, and there as a delinquent, on his knees, had judgment to confess his fault there, and in the county, in the pulpit of his parish church on Sunday before the sermon.

2. Anno 20 Jacobi, Ingrey, under-sheriff of Cambridgeshire, for refusing the poll, upon the promise of sir Thomas Steward to defend him therein, kneeling at the bar, received his judgment, to stand committed to the serjeant at arms, and to make submission at the bar, and acknowledge his offence there, and to make a farther submission openly at the quarter sessions, and there also to acknowledge his fault.

3. Anno 20 Jacobi, the mayor of Arundel, for misbehaving himself in an election, by putting the town to a great deal of charge, not giving a due and general warning, but packing a number of electors, was sent for by a warrant, and after, ordered to pay all the charge; and the House appointed certain persons to adjust the charges.

4. And lastly, 3 Car. 1. Sir William Wrey and others, deputy-lieutenants of Cornwall, for assuming to themselves a power to make whom they pleased knights, and defaming those gentlemen that then stood to be chosen, sending up and down the country letters for the trained-bands to appear at the day of election, and menacing the country, under the title of his majesty's pleasure; had judgment given upon them to be committed to the Tower. 2. To make a recognition of their offence at the bar of the House, upon their knees; which was done. 3. To make a recognition and submission at the assizes in Cornwall, in a form drawn by a committee. See this Case in a folio pamphlet, printed 1681.

the courts below, what great confusion and inconvenience would follow? I presume no body will pretend to exclude the jurisdiction of the House of Commons, in his Case; and yet, if they judge one way, and the courts below another, and neither have power to supersede or reverse the determination of the other, under what uncertainty will the officers and all parties concerned lie? Whereas, in other cases, where one court errs, a superior court reverses; but here, both adjudications shall stand together, though inconsistent the one with the other.—But it is said, in this Case, the action lies, because the Defendant refused the Plaintiff's Vote, malicious et falso. I take those to be words of course, and no evidence of that is given to the jury.—Sir, to conclude, the House lately passed a Resolution, that no Lords should intermeddle at any of our elections: But if this be allowed as law, they may at the last, judge and make (for aught I know) all our elections. But for my part, I am for continuing the possession of this, and all our other just privileges, as derived down to us from our predecessors, who ever enjoyed and exercised them as now we should; and I hope before we rise we shall think of some remedies, and not lie wholly under the power or mercy of the Lords.

Sir Thomas Powis. Mr. Freeman; I believe I should hardly have rose up in this matter, but that I think it more particularly my duty to speak to this thing, if it were possible, than any other; for in truth, I have had a more particular opportunity of knowing the nature of this case, and the proceedings in it, and what the consequences of it will be, than many others have had.—I must acquaint you I was of counsel in this cause, in the House of Peers, upon the Writ of Error with White, and the other constables that were prosecuted in this action, and did to my power defend what I took to be the rights and privileges of this house.—I would stand right in the opinion of every body; for what I did there for my client, in the course of my profession, I do not think myself obliged to maintain here: for then it was my duty to do my best for him as his counsel, but now he hath done with me, and I have done with him, in this place.—It hath been to the great honour of some Judges in Westminster-Hall, who have argued in cases below, at the bar, and have been brought on the Bench before the cause hath been determined, that they have argued at the bar one way, and when upon the Bench, have given Judgment another way, against their very clients, and thereby have done their duty in both places.—Now, when I have said this, I hope I do stand fair and clear, that I do now speak as a member of the House of Commons.—You are upon a point which I wish had never happened, for there is nothing I enter upon with greater reluctance than what looks like a dispute with the other House; for no man pays a greater honour to the House of Peers, and to every peer there, than I do; however, as I am instituted, I shall endeavour to maintain the right of this House. And I do say, if the Peers of England can determine all our properties a law, upon Writs of Error, and all our right in equity upon Appeals; and if they can determine our elections in consequence of this action, as I am of opinion they may, if this action prevails, they have a greater power than ever that House had in the days of their noble ancestors, when they were in the greatest grandeur. I will shew what will be the ill consequences, and I think it very fit for you to take this matter into consideration, if there be any way to come at it. First, I cannot deny but, generally speaking, a man has right to bring his action at law; but then I hope though a man hath a right to bring an action yet he cannot bring it in detriment to another man's privilege; for if a member of the House be sued in time of privilege, though the person have a right to such action, yet he cannot prosecute it in breach of the privilege: such person, much less can a man prosecute an action in breach of the privilege of this House. And suppose this should come before the Lord in question, by Writ of Error, and they should be in possession of the cause, sure every determination of the Lords, upon a Writ of Error, is not without more ado to be conclusive to the Commons in their rights and privileges so as that they may not take an alarm, and be concerned if all their privileges are about to be taken from them. Suppose any member of this House, (as I think by the privileges of the House he may,) should, in this House, have just occasion to take notice of some great misdemeanor in any great officer of the crown, and should assert matters high trenching on the honour of a peer of England; and suppose, when the parliament was up, the peer should bring his action of scandalum magnatum against the member, a law, for words that he had spoken here, as lay them as spoken elsewhere, for in a transitory action he may, and he should justify that they were spoken in the House of Commons, where by the privileges of the House, freedom of speech is allowed; and suppose Judgment in that case, as in this it was, should be given against the plaintiff, and afterwards this, by a Writ of Error, should be brought before the Peers, and they should reverse this judgment, and give Judgment for the Plaintiff; can any thing be more destructive to the constitution of parliament, if such a case as this should happen? And must the Commons in such case sit down under it?—Suppose any man should presume to arrest any member as he was going into the House of Commons, nay, the Speaker himself, and afterwards he is committed by order of the House, and the person committed should bring his action for taking him into custody, and the serjeant who took him into custody should plead this matter, and the judges give Judgment for him as they did for the Defendants in this Case, and by Writ of Error, if being brought into the House of Peers, they should reverse this Judgment, and give the Plaintiff his damages; will any one say, we could not take notice of this? Would it not destroy all our rights and privileges? So no doubt in this Case, though they have gone by way of action at law, and Judgment in Westminster-Hall, and Writ of Error in the House of Peers, it cannot be said, but, if it concerns our rights, we may take notice of it. In the Case of Mr. John Elliot, &c. the Commons declared the Judgment, 5 Car. 1. illegal, and against the privilege of parliament.—It is my poor opinion, it is our right (and I think no body can doubt it,) if we are in possession of it, to determine our own elections; and I would be glad to be acquainted when first we began to hear and determine our own elections: I believe nobody will say with certainty when we did not.—I know we have a turbulent author, who generally affected to be in the wrong, and, though a member of this House, made it his business to preargue against their privileges, and was always hearing among the records of the Tower, from whence he brought away a great deal of dirt with him, and yet could never pretend or produce more than two instances, where the Commons resorted to any other place for the settling the right of their elections: The man I mean, is Mr. Prynne: he takes occasion to do it from what is said by my Lord Chief Justice Coke, (who, with your favour, I must take notice so far, as to say he was not only a very great man in our profession, but had been speaker of the House of Commons in his time) and he, in his 1 Inst. fol. 116. and 4 Inst. 1 imp. fol. 14, 15, and 23, asserts, 'That the law of parliament is as much part of the law of the kingdom, as any other, and indeed the best: He calls it Lex et consuetudo parliamenti;' and says, this is the law that each House hath possession of, and judgeth by, and each House is a House of Judicature; and he puts upon this a great many instances, and some of them may seem strange to those who have run upon the Commons of late. He tells you of a case 8 Ediz. (at that time Oslow was Speaker, and it is in fol. 19, of the Book of the House of Commons of that year) one Long was returned a member for Westbury; and it being complained of that he came into the House by undue practices, it was engaged into by the House of Commons, and found that he had given four pounds to the Mayor of Westbury; and they having examined and tried this matter, did not only expel Long, but they fined and imprisoned the Mayor of Westbury, 'Secundum Legem et Consuetudinem Parliamenti.' Mr. Prynne, the author I mentioned, supposeth there was a time when the Commons used to apply to the king, in case wrong was done in the matter of their elections; and in his comment on the 4 Instit. 31, goes back to the 12 Ed. 2, there the king was pleased by commission to appoint several persons to hear the matter of an election. He pretends too, another instance, and that is in Henry the 6th's time, in the case of Huntington; and there was a Petition to, and a Commission from the king in like manner. The latest of these instances is above 200 years ago, and neither of them make any thing for a power in the Lords to determine the elections of the Commons; but, on the contrary, rather for a power to be delegated by the king; and the instances are but two. Now, I say, Sir, we are, and have been in possession of this right for a very great length of time, and have it confirmed to us by act of parliament; for the late act of 7 and 8 of king William, hath, in effect, declared, that the determination of the Right of the electors is in the House of Commons: for it says, That the sheriffs and officers of all sorts, shall follow the last determination of the House of Commons, as their rule and guide in such cases. And surely nothing is more absurd, than to say this House shall examine, try, and determine who are elected; and yet Westminster-Hall, and the Lords, shall examine and determine the right of the electors. How can any one examine the election, but the first step he takes must be to consider and determine who are the electors? And the determining the one, is determining the other.—I would trouble you a little with the Reasons they give why this action should lie. It hath been said, and I think it is true, for the honour of England, and I believe it hardly can be found to fail, that where a man hath a right, and a wrong done him, he is somewhere to have a remedy, but now let us see the application of this rule. Are they not by the same law that settles the right, and declares the wrong, to enquire where the remedy is to be had? For, though you have a remedy, you mistake that which is the proper remedy; and the same law that settles the right, and declares the wrong, gives the remedy; you must therefore go to the place where the law directs, for your remedy, not where yourself would desire the remedy. 'Therefore' says my Lord Coke, in his Preface to his 4 Instit. and likewise fol. 14, and 15, 'we have several jurisdictions, some ecclesiastical, some temporal, &c. some governed by one law, and some by another; and all must have their rules and bounds, which we must observe.' If your right be ecclesiastical, as for instance, before the Statute of Tithes, could you in Westminster-Hall have brought your action? Or if issue had been joined in such an action, and the parties had gone to trial, will any body say but that the Judges must have arrested judgment, and said that it was out of their jurisdiction? If a lord of a manor should refuse to admit a man, to whom a surrender is made of a copyhold estate, the lord has done him wrong, and damage too; but yet he cannot bring his action at law for it, for it is an equitable right, and he must go to a court of equity for his remedy: and so I could put a thousand instances, but I will not spend your time. So that I say, it is not enough to say you have a right, and must have a remedy, and therefore you may bring your action at the common law; but you must seek it in a proper place, though perhaps costs and damages, and a trial by a jury, may be more desirable to the party.—Now, in this Case I would know, whether this is not a matter of parliamentary jurisdiction, and also a parliamentary right? Is any thing more plain? He that hath right to vote, hath a right to send a person to represent him, and sit in parliament; therefore it is a parliamentary right; where then must be your remedy? In the House of Commons, where you have a right to send a person to sit and represent you; there you may complain, I was denied my vote, or misused upon the election. This, by the law of parliament, shall be examined here, and for this purpose you constantly appoint a standing committee of elections. Indeed I cannot but wonder at the bringing of this new-invented action; for if there be any thing certain in the common law, it is this, that where you claim a right to any thing, it must be founded upon common usage in that case, or in some case that carries the same reason, and is just like it; for the common law, generally speaking, is nothing else but common usage. Now let us see for the usage in this case, and whether there has been any thing like this action before. Say they, how do you know but such actions have been brought before? I do not see that there can be a stronger negative proof in any other case than in this; for we have had parliaments, as appears by our statutes in print, for 500 years, and we have had parliaments in every reign since, and in several reigns a great many parliaments: and let us consider, whether this case would not have happened frequently in 500 years, in so many elections in counties, boroughs, and cities where there are such an infinite number of electors? And therefore this case must frequently have happened if such an action lay at law. If it be asked, how do I know that such an action hath not been brought before; I answer, it is wondrously plain there never was such an action brought before; for as we have our acts of parliament in print, so we have faithful Reports of all our Law-Cases, which we call the Year-Books, and which are memorials of all cases so long back as from Ed. 2's time, that is 400 years, followed by a series of Reports till this time, and are now grown so numerous, that they become a burden: and I will desire any gentleman of the law here, or in England, to shew me the footsteps of any such action as this, or of this kind till now, ever brought before. We have always said, our fore-fathers were wiser men, and greater lawyers than we are; and so they were: but such an action as this never entered their thoughts.—But it may be said, how does it appear that there was occasion for these kind of actions formerly, for men heretofore were unwilling to serve in parliament, they were hired, and almost prest to it, and it was hard to get men to come up? I answer, it was so far otherwise for many years past, that so early as Henry 4's time, there were great content about elections, and the sheriffs in those days were apt to do wrong, as appears by 7 H. cap. 15. And therefore 11 H. 4, cap. 1, there was imposed 100*l.* penalty to the king, on a sheriff that did not do his duty, according to the statute does direct: so that it does appear there was occasion for these actions, if it had lain by law; and yet you will find it never, till 25 H. 6, did it enter into the thought of any man, that an action at common law could be brought for an injury in an election and therefore that act recites, that there was not before that time, a sufficient remedy for the party grieved, and therefore gives 100*l.* to the party, and costs, if a knight, and 40*l.* to a citizen or burges, and that by a law made for purpose to help the party to an action, where there was no such remedy before. Thus rested till the famous Case between Nevill & Strode, in 2 Siderfin, fol. 168, (in that time they sent five knights of the shire out of Berkshire Mr. Nevill brought his action against Strode the sheriff; and he alledged that he being one of the five chosen for that county, Strode maliciously and falsely refused to return him &c. and the jury gave him 1,500*l.* damages. This action made a great noise, and the Judges looked upon it as a great novelty, and thought fit to consult the parliament in it; (they used to consult the parliament in former days, matters relating to the parliament,) and (

* Sir Humphry Mackworth, in his Vindication of the Fundamental Right of the Commons of England, p. 27, saith, In the Case Strode and Nevill, A. D. 1655, in an action brought by the King against the sheriff for a false return to the damage of 2,000*l.* after a Verdict for the Plaintiff and 1,500*l.* Damages, the Court the King's Bench adjourned the case into parliament, propter difficultatem, whether the action did lie or not? Where it is to be observed, that it was not adjourned into the House of Peers, but into the House of Commons, as the only proper judges, in all cases of that nature concerning elections; so care were they of the Rights of the Commons. A let not the iniquity of those times of Rebellion be objected to this instance; the Argument thence extremely confirms the Right of the Commons; for if it be considered that Cromwell had then created a new House of Lords, and wanted nothing but a House of Commons to establish his usurpation, that this purpose he had formed a new model of the House of Commons, and overturned the method of elections, depriving all the boroughs of their rights, and causing the choice of returns of members to be made by the count yet the name of a House of Commons remained; and even that was so revered, that those days, that none would attempt to deprive them of their essential privilege, of judging elections: no influence could bias the judge they thought it so inherent, that they would not presume to intermeddle in it.

Judges heretofore, when they were asked their Opinion in difficult matters relating to the parliament, would say, this is above us, and therefore to be decided by parliament. And this case being referred to the parliament, they looked upon it as so extraordinary an attempt, that though Mr. Nevill had a verdict for 1,500*l.* Damages, yet he never got a farthing of the money, or any benefit by the verdict: Sed ibi dormiuit.—After this, came the great Cause, that hath been mentioned, of Soame and Barnardiston; and methinks this deserves very much our consideration, and how far the determination of the House of Peers ought to be a rule in this very case. That cause set forth with great prospect of success; sir Samuel Barnardiston, in that case, did not slight the determination of the House of Commons, but first petitioned this House as the proper place to determine his right, and had it decided for him, that he was the person duly elected, and the other return was taken off the file; and then he brought his action at common law, and set forth this whole matter, and that the sheriff falsely and maliciously returned another with him, whereby he was kept out of his right, &c. a long time, and put to very great expence and costs. This came to be tried at the bar of the King's-bench, and there was a verdict given for sir Samuel Barnardiston for 800*l.* This was looked upon as a great case, and my lord chief justice Hale told all persons about him take notice, that they did not determine the right of the election, for the judgment in that case belonged to the parliament; but said, since the House of Commons had determined the right, he thought they might follow their judgment to repair him in damages, and so gave judgment for the damages the jury had given the plaintiff.—This Case was looked upon as so improper for the common law, that upon a Writ of Error brought into the Exchequer Chamber, that Judgment was reversed, because the common law could not in any way intermeddle with elections to parliament, further than was directed by act of parliament. It might have been said, and I know it was said, that the reversal of this Judgment was by an extraordinary high hand: and therefore upon the Revolution, in the very beginning of king William's reign, sir Samuel Barnardiston brought a Writ of Error to parliament, complaining that in the Exchequer-Chamber, they had reversed this Judgment unjustly, and went upon these Reasons, as may be observed from the Journal of the House of Lords, which were the reasons of some very few protesting Lords: 1. Because it was a denying sir Samuel Barnardiston the benefit of the law, which gives relief to all wrongs and injuries; and is a very great damage to the plaintiff, and therefore he ought to be repaired. 2. Say they, if it should be allowed that sheriffs and bailiffs may make false returns, and no remedy but a 100*l.* forfeiture, it would be of dangerous consequence, and might tend to the packing of a House of Commons, which may overturn the whole constitution. But the Peers then did not think these Reasons sufficient for this new action at common law, and accordingly the House of Peers affirmed the Judgment of reversal in the Exchequer Chamber, and said, the Judgment was well reversed, for that no such action did lie at the common-law, though the injury done did tend to the plaintiff's damage; and all other mischiefs which are now suggested, were insisted on; and thus it stands to this day. And yet now it is said upon the same reasons, the action does lie for this person, though he be only an elector, and must receive much less damage than the person elected; and there is no one reason for the elector, but holds more strongly for the elected. The elected cannot maintain an action, and yet now it is clear that one of the electors may, though he can have no substantial damage; for if a man comes and gives his vote, (as here in this case) it is not in the power of the officer to hinder him of the benefit of it; for his vote will be as well given as if the officer had put it down, and this with respect both to the person who gave the vote, and him for whom he voted; and so really it is no substantial damage to any man.—The next thing I shall mention to you, is another case of Mr. Quslow: he brought his action against the sheriff of Surrey for making such a return upon him, (I believe I have the gentleman in my eye who brought that action) he declared in the same manner, that it was done falsely and maliciously, and had a trial and a verdict; and yet notwithstanding the court of common pleas, (being governed by sir Samuel Barnardiston's Case) did unanimously, 33 Car. 2, say, we must not presume to determine the merits of elections, or returns, there is a proper jurisdiction for it; and they gave Judgment against the action, and I think he hath acquiesced in it ever since. I am sure I have heard no more of it; the Reasons given by the court, appear in the Report of the Case in 3 Levinz, fol. 29, and 30, and are worth the reading.—There was a Case a year ago between Prideaux and Morris, in the county of Cornwall. Mr. Stratford was returned, and Mr. Prideaux brought an action in the common pleas, in the time of king William, against the Viander, for making a false return against him to his great damage, and laid it with all aggravation. This went to a trial in Cornwall, and there was a special verdict found; and the question was, whether this action would lie before the Commons had determined the right of election? And the whole court unanimously gave Judgment, that the action could not be brought, till the matter had been first brought before the House of Commons, and they had determined the right.—Now here is a total silence in all books of the law, that any such action as this is doth lie: here are the acts of H. 6, and king William, which provide remedies at law, because there was no other provision before. Here are not only the solemn Judgments in Westminster ster-Hall, but the Judgment of the House of Peers, in the case most like to this of any that can be thought of, that no such action doth lie: and yet I cannot tell how, there are, abroad, persons that endeavour to run upon the house of Commons, and use them ill on all occasions, and are zealous for this cause, which seems to be set on foot to undermine all our elections, and bring them to another judicature.—Now see the consequence: no man ought to have a foot against him, two Judgments at once in two several courts; whereby one may punish him at the same time for doing a thing, and the other for not doing it. I believe such proceedings would be looked upon as barbarous even in Turkey, and yet that will be just our case: a gentleman petitions the House of Commons, and says, the right is in such a set, or sort of men; as for example, in all the freemen, or free burgesses; and that, according to that way of election, he was chosen, and not the person that is returned: and this is determined by the committee of elections, and afterwards by this House against him that petitioned. This man goes immediately and brings an action in Westminster-Hall against the officer that returned the other; nay, every one of these persons that he affirmed the right of election to be in, bring their actions, and it comes into Westminster-Hall to be tried, and the jury find the right to be in these men, as he has alledged, contrary to the determination of the House of Commons, and judgment is given against the officer in every one of these actions for the men you have determined the right not to be in. You cannot set one of these judgments against the other; I cannot defend myself in Westminster-Hall, by saying, the House of Commons have determined that these men, who sue me, have no right to vote. There is nothing like this in the world; two independent Courts cannot controul one another, but both may go on together in the same cause; and both having a right to judge, one judges one way, and the other the other, and the officer is crucified between them.—Let it be considered again, that at this rate none but knaves, or beggars, will be mayors, or bailiffs in an election-year: For suppose as at Westminster, where I think there are ten thousand electors: Or suppose it be as in some towns near Wales, for one of which I have the honour to serve, where the descendants of every burgess claim a right to vote, and by consequence they will bring it in time almost to all the sons of Adam: for all the sons, and all the daughters' husbands, and all their descendants claim a right to vote. Now what a miserable case must that officer be in, when persons shall come from east, west, north and south, and say their pedigree is so and so, (for they are good at pedigrees in those countries,) yet, what a condition is he in? he is bound to determine whether they have a vote or not; and though he is no lawyer, or herald, yet however he is bound to give judgment one way or another at the peril of an action: And suppose but a hundred men should bring their actions against the officer, what man can stand hundred actions, though he be in the right. There are not only these difficulties in the case but there is revenge: and in popular elections there are those heats, and the voters engaged with that animosity, that the losing side next day will be ready, perhaps only for revenge, send for a multitude of writs, and have the pleasure of ruining the officer who was against them, though he was in the right; for every one has a right to bring his action whose vote was disallowed, though it should be found last that he had no right.—As to the words falso et malitiose laid in this declaration, which seem to be a great ingredient in this action, agree, in some cases where there is a jurisdiction, these words may make a great aggravation of the offence; but they cannot make a thing unlawful that is lawful, nor give a jurisdiction where there was none before: For no man may say, if a person should bring an action at common-law for a legacy, and alledge, that the executor, though he had sufficient assets, yet falso et malitiose, refused to pay it; that would give a jurisdiction to the courts of common-law. These words are verba clericorum, words of course for the most part. Besides, how dangerous and hazardous would it be for an officer though ever so innocent, to depend upon the words; when every body knows that falsity and malice rest in the mind, they are in the imagination, and the jury that are to try this action are at liberty to judge with what mind the officer acted; that would be the hardest thing in the world for an officer to undergo in every action. It would be enough for the jury to presume it was done maliciously, (seeing the mayors, or bailiffs, but have their inclination and give their votes themselves for their friends because the officer made an interest for the other side; and the consequence of this new invented action, if countenanced, will be, that every triennial parliament will bring a triennial harvest to Westminster-hall. I speak against my own private interest, if that was to be considered. Elections, without actions, keep the animosities too long, so that they are hardly healed in three years time; but these actions will help to vex and worry corporations from three years to three years; and mayors and bailiffs will be the most miserable men in the kingdom, and ought to run their country rather than stand a popular election: whereas the officer is accountable to you for his behaviour at the election.—This is not a matter that stands in need of the aid and assistance of Westminster-hall, that they should invent a new action and remedy, as if there was a failure of justice. Has any one come with a complaint against any officer to this House, and they have not been willing to hear it? Have not the Committee a right to hear and report matters with respect to the electors, as well as to the elected? And have not we known that the electors though but a small number of them (as in a late case of this sorry town of Aylesbury about five, I think, of the electors came and complained, and their complaints were fully heard. And if any single elector should come with a petition and represent that he was abused by an officer, or ill-treated by any mayor, or bailiff at the election, I do not think but the House would be ready to do him justice: And they have a right so to do, for the officer is accountable to them for his behaviour. It is not now only so practised, but always was so; for in the same treatise of my lord Coke's 4th Inst. Fol. 49, he says, That they will make him change his very return; they will make him raise out the name of one, and put in the name of the other. So that they have a jurisdiction adequate in this case; and surely if they can hear the complaint of several electors, they can hear the complaint of any one elector. I would not trouble you with arguments that may be proper in Westminster-hall, because we are here upon matter of our constitution; but I know no action more obnoxious to the true reason of the common-law, which abhors multiplicity of actions: and a man shall never have a particular action, for that which naturally draws on multiplicity of actions, and may be reformed in a more compendious manner. Upon this reason that famous Case in 5 Rep. called 'Bolton's Case,' is founded: If a man builds a dove house near a common field, where men make all their profit by plowing and tillage, and therein keeps a great number of pigeons that live upon his neighbours' corn, is not this a great wrong and injury to them? And yet no action lies: for, if one man that is wronged thus may bring his action, a great many more may do the like, and so there will be infinite actions; therefore it shall be presented in the Court-leet, as that book says. So there is that Case of Williams in the same book, where the lord of a manor had a chapel for himself and his tenants to repair to, and to hear divine service, within the parish of Aldbury: he brought his action against the vicar, who was obliged to officiate, for that he had neglected, &c. though he had used time out of mind to officiate, and had an allowance for it: says the Case, if this action should be allowed, all the tenants and servants of the Lord might have the like action, and so there would be a multiplicity of actions, and therefore he shall not have this action; but, if it had been to have been performed in his own private house or chapel, he alone might have had an action. But since it would draw on a great many actions, which may ruin any man, therefore the remedy must be taken in such a manner as it is given where there is public offence. In the case before us, every person is chosen pro bono publico; for though he be chosen for a particular place, he serves for the whole kingdom; and for that reason you shall not proceed by way of action, but in such manner as it hath been always used, where the whole thing shall be examined at once, and all determined upon one Petition, wherein all the parties injured may join, instead of a multitude of actions.—I shall not propose to you any thing, but hope you will at least come to some determination that may assert our right in this point; that this door may not be open to bring a new jurisdiction, to examine and determine whether any of us sit here rightfully or not.—It is a standing order of the House, that no peer hath a vote in the election of a commoner; but in the next election, if this be allowed, every peer may vote, for they are freeholders, and many of them burgesses and members of corporations, and they may all come and demand their votes, and if refused, bring their actions. These and many more inconveniencies are obvious, if this action should be allowed, and I believe it may have a great effect upon our constitution. Very much more might yet be said, but I have taken up too much time already."

Sir John Hawles, (Solicitor-General, temp. Will. 3.) "Mr. Freeman, we are jealous of our privileges, and I think we have just reason so to be; but we must take care that that does not carry us too far out of the way. I would not have it taken for granted, that whatsoever is said against the Lords here, tends to assert the privileges of this House, or that what is said for the Lords here, is against this House. I am as much for the privileges of the Commons of England as any man, and I own they have lost a great deal of power; I think the Commons had a great power, when the greatest part of the judicature of this government was their sole right: Nay, if a peer had had a matter of contest with another peer, or with a commoner, and issue was joined, that issue was to be tried by commoners, and not by peers. It is true, if the prosecution of a peer was in a capital matter at the king's suit, it was to be tried part by commoners and part by peers; the bill of Indictment was to be found by commoners, but the issue was to be tried by peers; But if a peer was prosecuted in a capital matter by a commoner, or peer, as by an appeal, the issue was to be tried by commoners. I must confess, as to the Lords jurisdiction in matters of equity, the Commons have great reason to be jealous, because, there, all facts, as well as law and equity, come to be tried and judged by the Lords alone.—Sir, I say, when all facts were tried, and most of the officers of government were chosen by the freeholders of the county, the Commons were somewhat greater than now they are; when they had the election of the sheriffs of the counties; when they had the election of what they called conservators of the peace, officers that were the same with our now justices of the peace, with this difference only, those the Commons made, these the crown makes. The Commons had a great power when they were to elect their captains that led them out to war, which heretofore they did, and had a right to do, till it was taken away from them by the act that settles the militia, though I own it was disused many years before. The making of sheriffs is now placed in the crown: we have nothing left now, but matters of trials in particular cases, and even that is so far cramped, that the jury is returned by an officer that the crown puts upon the county.—But yet I am not for carrying things farther than we have a right to do; I am for keeping what we have, and for that reason I am not for encroaching upon the allowed jurisdiction of the House of Lords: we have always allowed them a right to hold plea of Writ of Error. The parliament in Hen. 4th's time, did declare the right of Judicature to be in the House of Peers; and I never found any inconvenience in it, if the Peers kept only to matters of law, and left the facts to be tried by the Commons; nor did I ever know that right of the Lords questioned till now. A great deal hath been said for, and against the right of bringing this action; I do not think that that is now the question: the question is, Whether a Judgment being given in the King's-Bench, a Writ of Error does not lie in the House of Lords? But whether the Lords did right, in giving that judgment they have now given in the case before you, that is another thing. I speak to the right of holding plea of this particular Writ of Error: no body hath denied but that they have a right to hold plea of a Writ of Error in general, upon a judgment given in Westminster-hall; but, say they, the Lords ought not to have done it in this particular case; and several reasons have been given for it.—First, Here is the privilege of the House of Commons in question in the case: That hath been argued and insisted on, but I confess, that argument does not influence me. The Lords have held plea of a Writ of Error, in which the privilege of the Commons hath been in question, and the Lords have done right to the Commons in it, particularly in that matter of the parliament of 1640, when some were supposed to have done irregular things in the House of Commons, and were prosecuted for it by information in the King's-Bench, and were fined in king Charles 1's time; whereupon a Writ of Error was brought in the House of Lords, and that judgment reversed in the time of king Charles 2. The Lords did right to the Commons in the matter of privileges of the Commons, for it was for laying hands upon the Speaker in this House; and I think every body commended what was done in that matter by the House of Lords, and no body ever said but that they had a right so to do. Some things are not to be come at otherwise, than by a Writ of Error in the House of Lords; and I believe if you look a little back, there have been Judgments given in Westminster-hall, not only in matters of, but against the privilege of the Commons: and these Judgments stand unreversed, though I think they are fit to be reversed, and I know no other method to do it but by Writ of Error in the House of Lords. I think there is one Judgment upon an information against the Speaker, for licensing papers to be printed, which he did by order of the House.—There is another instance of a person taken into custody by order of this House; it was the case of Mr. Topham serjeant of this House: The party brought his action; the ser-jeant pleaded his warrant, that it was done by order of the House of Commons, and Judgment was given against him, and this Judgment stands unreversed. Now what method have you to reverse these Judgments, but by Writ of Error? If you think to do it by a bill in this House, that must likewise pass the House of Lords, and so will be the same thing as a Writ of Error. Another thing is said, that this person was not damned; or if he was, there are such a number of persons who were then likewise damned, that may bring their actions; that no body will execute such an office. I think that argument ought not to prevail, for at that rate you will allow the officer not only to be a judge, but the supreme judge, and the parties damned shall be without relief; he may do what he pleases, and he shall never be questioned afterwards, save in this House which I will consider by and by. It is agreed you may punish an officer that misbehaves himself in matters of elections, and that is practised now very much; but at the same time you punish the officer, the person damned hath no satisfaction, though our law allows satisfaction, in cases where he that did the wrong shall not be punished, and allows satisfaction in all cases where a person is punishable, if another hath received a particular damage. A man is liable to be fined to the king or queen, that is a punishment; but if he pays so much to the party damned, that is satisfaction. If a man's horse breaks into another's ground, he shall not be punished, but the person damned shall have satisfaction; But in this case you allow the officer shall be punished, but you will not allow the man injured any satisfaction for the damage he received; which cannot be supported by reason, or by the authority of any particular case. In all cases I take it to be true, where a man is punished for doing another damage, the person damned shall have satisfaction. But that rule does not hold true in the contrary.—It is said there are a great many persons concerned, and if you give every one an action, there will be no end of these actions, and therefore none shall have an action. This is a strange argument: If a man injures one, or two persons, each shall have an action for their respective damages; but if he injures an hundred, none of them shall have an action: as if when a man is moderately injurious, he shall make satisfaction; but if he is extravagantly injurious, he shall be scot-free, and make satisfaction to none. This rests to be made good either by reason or authority, which hitherto hath not been done. The case cited, I own, is true; but you must take it with this difference, if any thing is done which might have been of damage to a hundred people, but was of damage to none, none shall bring their action, though the criminal shall be punished; but where there is particular damage done to any person, an action will lie for the damnification of that person. If a man digs a pit, any man may fall into it, and no person shall bring an action for that; but if any person doth fall into it, and hath particular damage by it, he shall bring an action and have satisfaction. And with submission, that argument will not hold, that because a person might be ruined, if he be obliged to make satisfaction for the wrong he hath done, therefore he shall not make satisfaction to any particular person he hath damnified.—It hath been said, admitting it to be so, that the party ought to have satisfaction, yet he ought to take his remedy in a proper court; as if a legacy was given, an action would not lie in the Queen's-bench for it; which is true. But it would have been well if that gentleman had told us which was the proper court to give satisfaction, for the wrong supposed to have been done in this case; if the Queen's-bench be not the proper court, what court is it? It is said the House of Commons is a court, I was always of opinion it was so: It is a Court of Judicature, my lord Coke says, and a Court of Record. I wonder, when all this is allowed, it should be said this court hath not a power to administer an oath to a witness; I think that was never denied to any other court whatsoever. Every Court of Record has power to administer an oath; but though this be a Court of Record, this cannot, it hath not that power. It would have been very well if those, who are against this action, could shew us that this is a court that can give satisfaction; some courts can punish, but cannot give satisfaction, whereof I think this one; satisfaction was never given here that I know of; was it ever? or pretended to be had here? In the first instance, it is true, this House hath punished, and by such punishment compelled the delinquent to make satisfaction to a person, by increasing, or remitting such punishment; but that is not the case before us.—It hath been said there has been no instance of this kind of action brought; and that the court of Queen's-bench have declared they have nothing to do with the business of elections, for that the right of elections ought to be determined here, and for that purpose the declaration of the Lord Chief-Justice Hale, in the case of Barnardiston and Soame, has been cited. I must confess I cannot but wonder at that case; we did lately think that the Judgment given in the King's-bench in that case, was rightly given; and afterwards, when it was reversed, people were astonished at the reason of it; and more when that Judgment of reversal came to be affirmed in the House of Lords. Nobody hath ever said why that judgment was reversed; I do not see but, on the same reason, several Judgments within these few years, nay, even in this reign, may be reversed likewise; for the court of King's-bench, in that case, did not pretend to a Judicature of determining the right of elections; the matter in that case had been determined before in this House; but they only gave damages for the wrong sustained, that was all the court did in that case, and yet that Judgment was reversed. I believe there hath been some Judgment given by this House, within these twelve months, that where the House hath determined the right of election' the party grieved shall be allowed to maintain an action at law for his damnification.—But I take it there is a difference between the case of Barnardiston and Soame, and this present case. Time was, when it was doubted, where a man was elected and the officer refused to return him, whether the person elected was damnified or not. It is very certain, heretofore persons were not so ambitious of sitting in this House as now they are; and some persons purchased charters of exemption, to be excused sitting in this House: And so it had been practised in the House of Lords. The act that hath been mentioned before expressly commands, that the person chosen shall come and be present in parliament. And afterwards there was a penalty put upon such as were chosen, if they did not appear here; to which another punishment was added, which was, that the person elected, if he did not come hither, should lose his wages. It was not reckoned a damage that any person was not returned a burgess to sit here, but a kindness; but that did not hold so in the case of an elector. Every body agrees, as the electors had a right to chuse, so there was no statute to compel them so to do; but they looked upon it not only as their right, but their interest, to be present at the elections. And none can say but it is a man's interest, to make choice of such a person to serve in parliament, (who hath the power over his estate, and life too for aught I know,) as he could trust. No body ever doubted that a person who had a right to vote, had an interest, and might be damnified if his vote was refused. So that none of the cases that have been put of the right of the person elected to serve in Parliament, as knight of the shire, or as burgess, come up to the case in question.—I would say one thing as to the damnification of the persons elected; there is a late act that gives double damages where the return is contrary to the last determination. Now, I do take it, that act supposes that a man might have been damnified before; and if he was damnified before, he was so by the common-law, for no statute gives him any damages; It is true, that statute gives double damages, but still that statute supposes there was a damage before, and builds upon that foundation; so that with submission, that very statute runs against all the cases that have been put as to the persons elected.—It is said, at this rate, the Lords may come to vote in elections. I am of opinion the Lords have no right to vote in elections for a knight of a shire or a burgess; and the reason I go upon is this, every person who had a right to vote, ought to have contributed to the expences of him that was elected; if he was a freeholder, he was an elector for the county, if a burgess, for the borough; and the expences of the knight of the shire were to be levied of all the freeholders, and the expences of the burgesses upon all that were resident in the borough. But the Lords were excused from that charge, they were not to be contributors to the expences of a knight of the shire, or burges, because they were of another house. There was a law made which says, that for lands purchased by any Lords, such lands should continue chargeable to the expences of knights of the shire, as they were before such purchase; so that it is plain before that act, the lands the Lords were seized of, or purchased, were excused from the charge.—But, Sir, I think this matter is not to the case in question. This is nothing but a collateral action for damnification, whereof the consequence is not much, not above five pounds: though I acknowledge the smallness of the sum does not influence this case. Nor is the question, whether the Lords have done right or not, in reversing the Judgment given in the Queen's-bench: 'Humanum est errare.' If they have a jurisdiction, we cannot justly complain; though I am of opinion they have done right: I think the plaintiff in this case was damnified, and the court of Queen's-bench ought to have given Judgment against those who did him the injury, for the damage he sustained; and the Lords have done right in reversing that Judgment, and in giving such as the court of Queen's-bench ought to have given."

Sir Edward Seymour. "Sir, It is enough for me that we have the law on our side, and we are very much obliged to the pains and understanding of those learned gentlemen that opened this debate, in presenting us with a true state of our disease; it only remains now for your prudence, to apply a remedy. And I cannot but take notice, that this is an action without any precedent to warrant this proceeding; and I believe it might have remained so still, (for I do not think there was virtue enough in the cobler of Aylesbury, nor had he purse enough) if a Lord had not acted that part.—For my part, Sir, I do not think this to be the single instance of the House of Lords, we have reason to complain of: I think in a great measure, by their proceedings, they seem to hold forth, That the axe is laid to the root, and that they have a dislike of this House of Commons, and endeavour to get rid of them. I shall not instance in particulars, but I hope there is one you will not let go, without applying some remedy to; and that is, that noble Representation* in which they have vilified you in the highest degree, and lay all the mischiefs of the last reign, and this, at your door. I could shew you, there is nothing in it but stuff, populum fallere; and we see the consequence of it, and what pains and endeavours they have taken care to disperse it all over the world, to make impressions upon the people. But that which I would have some resort to, is this, that these worthy persons that have spoke before, though they have truly represented the state of our condition, yet they have been very tender of applying a remedy.—It does, I think, consist of two parts; one is what relates to the inferior courts, the other to the Judgment of the House of Lords upon this Writ of Error. Now there is a right to bring a Writ of Error, tho' I learned admit; but I would take away the foundation, and make this declaration:—That no inferior court below should presume to inter-meddle with the elections of the House of Commons; and I am sure then there will be no foundation for a Writ of Error. In the next step, with relation to the Judgment given in the House of Lords; it is true, the Lords make great complaint, that in matters of parliament we have addressed, without advising and consulting with them: I will not say how far it is justified by their proceedings; I need not remind you of the Address they made without you, when you addressed against my Lord Worcester; before you had presented your Address, they presented a Counter-Address to yours. But I take the distinction to be here, it is one thing in matters of state, and another thing when the matter depends between the two Houses: where it is a matter of state, with relation to the queen's prerogative being violated and invaded, as you are her great council, you are to advise the queen in that matter and not let any thing of that kind pass upon her.—But however I would go the regular way by condemning this Judgment, in relation to the House of Lords; and, after you have made that condemnation, I would apply to the House of Lords, to see if they would recede from the Judgment of theirs. But I am afraid arguments or debates will help your case but little, you must have recourse to remedies that are in your own power. We see what they did upon the last occasion, when they thought their privileges were concerned; they adjourned, and all to prepare the way to make the world believe they were injured, and prepare them for the proceedings afterwards.—And I say, this is not a thing that falls out by chance, but carried off by all their power, to represent you as considerable, and to make you useful for nothing but giving money, and then to send you home into the country. But if you do not keep the power in your own hands, you will be without remedy. I conclude with what I mentioned in relation to the courts below, to declare that they have no power to intermeddle in matters of their elections."

Marquis of Hartington, (afterwards duke of Devonshire). "I shall not pretend to follow that hon. gentleman near the bar, in all the steps he hath made, though I think I may be as regular as he. I think he hath only shewed that there is not so much reason in this case to find fault with the Lords, but that it is necessary to find fault with them one way or other.—I think this is a matter of great consequence and as long as I sit here, and as long as I live I shall be as tender of the privileges of this house as any body. I think it is upon the due balance of both houses, that the safety of the whole does consist; and I must confess, I think the liberty of a cobbler ought to be as much regarded as of any body else; that is the happiness of our constitution.—I think it was very well observed by an experienced member, that this writ came very regularly before the Lords: if so, then I think the question is between us, and the persons that elected us; and I think, though gentlemen would not formerly allow of any distinction between the privileges of the House, and those of the people of England, yet they must allow it now, or they cannot complain that this action is any prejudice to this House. For when a person offers his vote at an election, and is not admitted to give it, and upon such refusal brings his action in the courts in Westminster-hall, (which I take to be the present case), if giving judgment upon it be contrary to the privileges of this House, then it is pretty plain, that our privileges do interfere with the rights of the people that elected us. I shall plainly give you my opinion in this case: I cannot think this action to be a breach of the privilege of this House; for, Sir, the party grieved, can be no way relieved, but by applying to the law: and I think the learned gentleman below, is out in all his instances; for he hath given an account of people injured applying to you, but they were candidates, and certainly that was their proper remedy; but in the case of an elector, I do not see he can have satisfaction by applying to you.—Gentlemen talk of the law of parliament; I cannot see how that can give any interruption to the law of the land, that it shall not do right to the party grieved. How shall a man, injured in the manner I have mentioned, receive satisfaction, by applying to the parliament? It is true, the officer offending may be punished, but the party injured cannot receive that satisfaction he would in the courts below, by giving him his damages.—I think this is a matter of great consideration, and it is necessary to consider well of it, and not to determine rashly. I think it may be of use to us, since there are judges who have been of opinion, that the subject ought not to have his remedy in this case. A judge that will, out of fear, or any regard to one house, do contrary to his oath, I believe at another time will be influenced by the other. I think it is the duty of a judge to act according to law, and not be afraid of either.”

Mr. Lowndes. “Sir, there is no doubt but all the Judges, (as hath been said) and every body else, are obliged to behave themselves according to the laws of the land: but the question is, what is the law of England in this case? If the House of Commons has an original right to determine all matters concerning elections of their own members, (as it hath been always understood to have) and if we have a power to punish officers for making false returns, or any other misfeasances committed by the returning officers; then it will not be necessary, that the judges in Westminster-hall should have any jurisdiction at all, in the matter now in question; and if they have none, then by consequence the Lords will have as little by Writ of Error.—I do confess, Sir, when I first heard of this case, it gave me some apprehension that it might be of fatal consequence (by reason of the novelty of it), to your privileges, which are indeed the privileges of the commonalty of England, which we represent. But since I have thought of it from time to time, and it hath been better opened by the learned gentlemen that have spoke in this debate, I conceive our coming to some resolutions declaratory of our right in this affair, may preserve the Liberties of this House, and of all the Commons of England, who have entrusted us with the preservation of their rights.—I think the learned gentleman over-the-way took his ground too narrow; I might yield him this point, that where there is a Writ of Error brought from a Judgment in Westminster-hall, in cases where a Writ of Error lies, and where that court and the House of Lords have a jurisdiction, there the House of Lords are at liberty to give what judgment they please. But I have read, The House of Lords is not an unlimited jurisdiction, but is bounded, as well as the courts of Westminster-hall, by the law of England. I speak it with the greatest reverence, that the regal power, (which is the most supreme in England) is obliged to the observance of the laws; and it would be absurd at the same time to say, that any part of the parliamentary constitution is not limited by the known laws of the land, or the laws and customs of parliament; and I doubt not but it will appear, a Writ of Error doth not lie, and never did lie before the Lords in such a case: and so it comes at last to this point, what is the law of England in this case? And I will tell you my thoughts of it. I have read and learned, and I believe it is true, that matters of parliament are determined by the laws and customs of parliament; and I believe there is as good an authority for it as there is for Writs of Error, or any thing else; and that this law and custom of parliament is a principal part of the laws of England, and to be learned by experience and precedents, and I reckon that we must come to them at last. Now, Sir, let us see what experience or precedents we have to found this jurisdiction of the House of Commons upon, for examining and determining matters concerning their own elections. It is true, we have no Journals extant before Edw. 6's time: and there is a Book they call Seymour, I think it is a book of no great authority, and if be, there is but a small matter in it. I have read it over carefully myself more than once, and find only titles of Bills depending, and when they were read; and all I learned from it was, that sometimes Bills in those days were read four times. And, Sir, there is as little concerning elections in queen Mary's reign; but in the beginning of queen Elizabeth, you have the matters of elections plainly set down, and so they have been ever since. And from that time to this it hath been a standing Rule in the House of Commons, in the beginning of every parliament, and, as I take it, of every session, to appoint a Committee to examine all matters concerning Elections. Now, if the right of elections is not a matter concerning the election, then I own myself under a mistake: but if that be a material part, and comprehended within the general words, and if those committees have from time to time proceeded to examine the right of electors, and this House hath proceeded from time to time to give judgment in such cases, sometimes according to general qualifications settled and adjusted in the House, and very frequently upon examining and considering the rights of particular votes; then I think we have as good authority for the jurisdiction of this House, in the matter of these elections, as can be had for any thing whatsoever.—I do say, in this case, we ought to take our ground and foundation upon the right which the Commons of England have, and ever had by law and customs of parliament, to be exercised by the representatives of their own choosing; which right is grounded upon manifold precedents and constant usage. For if we have a power to hear and determine the right of the electors; and to punish officers for abridging them of their right, and give satisfaction to the party, which most evidently appears, not only in our Journals but by a continued and uninterrupted practice, time out of mind; then I think we need look no further.—I do say, that from time to time there has never been a session of parliament but this power has been exercised; and in your Committees they have often come to resolutions to determine the right of all electors, and frequently of particular electors; and for that purpose only they have examined whether persons had burge-tenures, or have paid scot and lot, or have been freemen, and other circumstances necessary for the information of the Committees; and as matters have appeared, they have judged them qualified or unqualified: And where the votes of persons having right have been offered, though refused at the election, the Committees have usually allowed those Votes as if they had been given; and upon their determination the House have agreed with the Committee very frequently, and sometimes have disagreed with the Committee, as the merits of the cause have appeared to the House. So that nothing is plainer than that the House of Commons have, from time to time, exercised this jurisdiction in all the parts of it; and sometimes elections have been tried at the bar, and determined by the House upon such trial.—Then how comes this action to be brought in Westminster-Hall; I have considered that point, and take nothing to be plainer than this, that Westminster-Hall never had a power to meddle with elections, but where, by some special act of parliament, you have given them power. I know that there are some opinions that elections have been tried in Chancery, and in the House of Lords; but I cannot find any thing of that nature ever settled, though some attempts have formerly been made that way. I know that witnesses have been carried up sometimes to the House of Lords bar to be sworn, but the trial of elections, and of the right of the electors hath always been in the House of Commons; so that here would be no defect of power or justice if nobody else meddled in this matter.—They consider what acts have altered this original right; I think there are two that are most material to be considered; one is that of 23 of H. 6, cap. 15. What is the importance of that? I take notice, that convenient remedy for the party grieved was not ordained in the former statutes against Sheriffs, Mayors and Bailiffs offending; whereby one would infer, that the parliament in those days did not think or know any thing of the remedy now endeavoured to be set up in Westminster-Hall and the House of Lords. And this Statute provides, that any Sheriff do contrary to the Statutes about elections, he shall incur the penalty of the former Statutes, viz. 100*l.* to the king, and years imprisonment, and shall forfeit 100*l.* more: To whom? to the party that ought to have been returned; and if he do not sue, there is an action given for the same to any body else. And a mayor or bailiff, for a false or undue return, is to forfeit to the king 40*l.*, and 40*l.* to the party that should be returned; and if he do not sue, then a popular action is given for the last penalty: So it is plain, by this statute, an action is given to the Voter, who had his remedy in the House of Commons. Your ancestors were so careful of your liberties, that they never trusted their elections to all persons; such as held in villenage, all customary tenants who held at the will of their Lords, and might be influenced by them, and, (as I take it) tenants by escuage, till escuage was reduced to certainty were excluded, and afterwards all freeholders under forty shillings a year; and when the officers were by law to admit some Votes and reject others, they were to use the best of their judgments, without being liable to a multiplicity of actions, (unless in the cases I have mentioned,) but for their Defaults were always responsible to the House of Commons.—Let us consider then the statute in king William's time, I think it is in the 7th year of his reign; then the statute takes notice of the injury done to gentlemen by double and false returns, and thereby a double return is made a false return, and by the statute it is provided, that if any returning officer return contrary to the last determination of the House of Commons, of the right of election; such return is thereby adjudged to be a false return, and void.—This statute of the 7th of king William, admits the very determination of the right of election to be in the House of Commons; it does not say the determination of the election, but of the right of election. I will endeavour to avoid repetition.—But how does this matter stand? By the law and custom of parliament, which is a most material part of the law of England, the House of Commons have the jurisdiction in these matters of their elections; but, by one or two statutes, the House of Commons have given power in one or two cases, to proceed in the manner therein prescribed; but none of the cases allowed by those statutes, are like the case of this man at Aylesbury, for he is not a person who has suffered because he was not duly returned, nor the person mentioned in 7 Willielmi; nor is his action founded upon any statute; so that this case is left out of the statutes, and it must be determined according to the law and custom of parliament.—As to the case of Mr. Nevil, it never came to be determined in parliament: We read it was put off to the parliament because of the great weight of it; and the judges were of opinion that it was a matter too high for them. And in the case of Mr Onslow, where the case of Mr. Nevil was cited, they positively said, it was a matter of too great presumption for the judges to meddle with it.—Then how comes it to pass, if this action might have been brought at common-law; I say, how comes it to pass, that this action was never brought before? Certainly that is an argument it never lay, for there must have been occasion for such an action, if the common-law would have maintained it. But the judges, who knew best the grounds and reasons for this pretended action, have refused meddling in this matter, because it concerned the parliament, and the parliament had not entrusted them with it. As to the case of Barnardiston and Soame, first adjudged in the King's-Bench, the reason was, because it had been adjudged in parliament; for sir Samuel Barnardiston had a majority by near 100, and the House of Commons had tried the cause, and gave him his right of sitting in the House; so that one would have thought that he had liberty to have gone into Westminster Hall. But afterwards this judgment was reversed in the Exchequer; and judge Ellis, in his Argument, says plainly, that the right of determining elections belongs to the House of Commons, and the House of Commons have determined it for sir Samuel Barnardiston, and for that reason you ought to affirm this Judgment.—This matter was brought, presently after the Revolution, into the House of Lords, and when it came there, all but five or six lords were for affirming the reversal. Now, Sir, by reading the reasons of these five or six lords that dissented, we may easily infer what were the reasons that induced the whole House to affirm the reversal. Two reasons were given; first, say they, because otherwise there will be a defect of justice. One may infer, if these five or six lords were of opinion that there would be a defect of justice, all the other lords were of opinion there would be no defect of justice. The five or six lords that dissented said, that the plaintiff ought to have this action by the common law; certainly if the other lords had been of this opinion, they would have maintained the action, but they concluded no such action did lie, because no such action was given by the common law.—I take this matter to be of infinite moment, and I think there is no degree or state in this realm but what is bound by the known laws of this land, so that they have no jurisdiction in this case, then I do not see how a Writ of Error can give them jurisdiction. Sir, I appeal to you, and all the gentlemen here, whether what hath been said on one side hath been at all answered by the other: If an action of scandalum magnatum should be brought against a member, for what he has said in this house, no doubt but that member would plead the privilege of this House, and it is to be hoped the judges would allow it, and put the plaintiff off sine die. But notwithstanding, a Writ of Error, according to this doctrine, might be brought, and the Lords might give judgment that this action does lie, and then what would become of your liberty of debate? This is an instance worth your regard. It hath been told you how the Lords have taken notice of the privileges of this House, in the Case of Hollis and Elliot. Let that be set in its true colours, and see whether any thing can be drawn from that case to fortify the Judgment lately given in the House of Lords. There was a disorder in the House of Commons, and the Speaker was violently forced back into the chair, and scandalous words against the king's privy council and judges, were uttered by Elliot, Hollis and others, and upon that a prosecution was brought, 5 Car. 1, against those particular gentlemen in Westminster-hall; as well for the words spoke in the House of Commons as for the force; and fines were set upon them. This matter, after the Restoration of Charles 2, was brought before the Lords, at a conference, and they took notice of the privileges of this House, not to set them aside, but confirm them; and their lordships declared the Judgment to be illegal, and the freedom and privilege of parliament, and desired the lord Hollis to bring the roll before them by Writ of Error; and so, by agreement, the Judgment was reversed, as being against the freedom of speech in parliament, allowed by Strowd's act; which their lordships acknowledged to be declaratory of the ancient and necessary rights and privileges of parliament. Their lordships then would not let any matter appear upon record, to the destroying the Commons' privileges; and I wonder how this precedent comes to be cited, to justify a proceeding which tends directly to take away your privileges.—I wish with all my heart the House would have appointed some persons to have searched Precedents, and I am sure they would have found an infinite number to be produced, to have justified the power of the House in this case, how it hath been in their power, time out of mind, how they have a power to punish officers, and in some instances they have given damages. I remember one in my time; Mr. Tankred caused a person to be brought hither, and he cleared himself; and the House (as I remember) made an Order, that, as he was the occasion of the man's coming up, and had done him an injury, he should make him reparation, and he was forced to do it by paying him a sum of money.—Not that I would go so far as to say, that this House is a proper court for imposing fines: But if they are not a proper jurisdiction for the business of their own elections, I think they have no jurisdiction at all. I will not say this House has a power to fine: I know we read something of that in your Journals, but I think those fines came to nothing, because there was no means to estreat them, or cause them to be levied; and so that matter has slept ever since, and I hope, will for ever.—But not only your freedom of debate, but right of sitting in this House, is concerned in this case: And if you have not a power to determine matters of elections to this House, I wonder how any author comes to say this House has any judicature at all; for if they have not a jurisdiction to this, they have no jurisdiction to any purpose whatsoever.—If this point be settled, that this power belongs to the House of Commons, the next consideration will be how to attain it; and in this, I hope gentlemen will take such steps as are proper for them, and for those they represent; for we are sent here ad tractandum, &c. in the name of those we represent: And we have but a delegated power, and can't without breach of trust, give up the rights of the commonalty. For my own part I have taken an oath to preserve the privileges of the people that chose me, but, without such an oath, should be of opinion that I cannot give up this privilege which I am to execute on their behalfs; but I will use all the lawful and just methods I can to come at it, and I think you may do this without interfering with the House of Lords, or the judges. There is no doubt but the judges in Westminster-Hall are bound to take notice judicially of your legal proceedings here; and if you come to make a declaration, that the power of hearing and determining all matters concerning elections, does belong to the House of Commons in parliament; I doubt not but they will take notice of it, as becomes them. And give me leave to say, nobody can help bringing this action, as this was done; for a person may take out a writ and declare upon it, and carry it down to trial, without the privity or knowledge of any court; and then, when the cause is tried, the other side comes and moves in arrest of judgment, and the court gives sentence. But I wish the defendant had demurred, and then that would have put it as a point of law to the judges; and if they had determined it judicially for you, I believe it would have gone no further. For it is one thing to determine it upon demurrer, and another thing when the cause has been tried and damages given, to have the court's opinion ex post facto.—The judges determined the action does not lie; but as matters stand now, perhaps in like cases, there will be brought a Writ of Error before the Lords, and they will give such a judgment as they have given now, for aught I know. I should not think it proper to come to any question now, by which you shall determine your right, if you are not fully satisfied about it; but it ought to be considered farther. The law and custom of parliament is to be found out by experience and precedents: But if you are satisfied, then I think the proper question is, that by the law and custom of parliament, the hearing, examining and determining all matters concerning election of members to serve in the House of Commons, is to be by the same House. I think that is to be your question, or to that effect.—The consequence will be, if this be part of the law of England, as it plainly is, you may as well stand upon that declaration, as upon any new law to be made by parliament, if you could get it: But I believe you have no great reason to expect a new law in this case to pass in the House of Lords. Then what would you do? If you should try to get a new law and fail, it will be construed, that you had not this power before, but endeavoured to get it, and the House of Lords denied it you. But it is plain and clear you have this power already, and a sufficient ground to stand upon; and I doubt not but Westminster-hall will take notice of it, and the House of Lords too; If they do not—[Here Mr. Lowndes was interrupted by a noise made by some few of the Members, who said, What then? but he proceeded].—I say, if they do not, it will be time enough to confer with them afterwards: And give me leave, I am not afraid to say, if a private man, much more the House of Commons, have the law of England on their sides, let them be undetermined ever so much, one way or other they will obtain their right sooner or later. The rights of the people of England are safer in the hands of their representatives than any other; if they do not like them, they can turn them out and choose new ones; but they cannot do so in the case of the Lords.—I beg pardon for my great prolixity: I take it to be of importance to avoid all contests with the House of Lords, and with Westminster-hall, and I think you may do it, by proposing and adjusting a plain Declaration of your right by the law and custom of parliament.”

Mr. Solicitor General, (Sir Simon Harcourt, afterwards Lord Harcourt and Lord-Chancellor). “After what hath been said at large concerning the law in this case, especially since it hath received no contradiction in any instance whatsoever; I will avoid the repetition of what has been already offered, and endeavour to shorten your debate, by bringing it something toward a point. It hath been said that the question now before you is, Whether Judgment being given in the Court of Queen's-bench, a Writ of Error does not lie in the House of Lords, to reverse that Judgment? I cannot by any means, agree that to be the question.—But that which I take to be the proper question before you is, Whether or no it be the sole right of the Commons of England to determine their own elections? If you are of that opinion, never let your disease grow to such a head, as to put you upon the necessity of complaining of a Judgment of the Lords, but rather check it in its infancy.—It may perhaps sound harsh, that a man shall not be admitted to make use, and have the benefit of the law; and yet when that thought is thoroughly digested, I believe no gentleman in this house, but will agree, that there may be many such instances, where you will not endure any suit at law. I cannot give you any better instances, than what have been mentioned to you by a learned gentleman on the other side, who approves of this proceeding by Writ of Error; the prosecution against sir William Williams for publishing a libel (as it was called) by direction of this House, and an action against the Serjeant for obeying your commands. If such an action should be brought against the Speaker or Serjeant, should we sit still here to see what they would do in the Courts below, and afterwards wait for the event in the House of Lords by Writ of Error?—It is very true, these Judgments that are mentioned by that gentleman continue still unreversed. As to that given against the Speaker, he mentioned it as a Precedent not fit to be followed; indeed, it is a reproach to the House to mention it, since no parliament hath reversed it. As to the other action against the Serjeant, he says, Judgment was given against him, and that stands in full force; as I remember that case, it went off upon the form of pleading.—But nothing of that kind being the question now, I beg leave to state what this action is that is now before us; for gentlemen in the country, who have frequently met with actions, prosecuted without censure for matters relating to elections, may, perhaps, be surpris'd, till they come to consider what the point is. This is not an action grounded upon any statute whatsoever. It is agreed an action may be maintained where a statute gives a particular remedy, but this is an action founded upon the common-law. Whatever your privileges are, if you will consent to an act of parliament to make other persons judges of those privileges, so far as you consent, if they pursue the power given them by act of parliament, there is no wrong done you: but an action brought at common-law is that which, I think, interferes, with the inherent right of this house.—We have, I think, attained to one piece of knowledge upon this debate, that this was the first action that was ever brought of this kind; and gentlemen will not much wonder why this is brought now, when they consider what endeavours have been used to make this House contemptible. I believe this may be thought the most probable method to attain that end.—I would not repeat the precedents that have been quoted, yet I cannot but take notice of that of Barnardiston and Soame: those arguments that were made use of for this Judgment, in that case were rejected, and the Judgment of the Lords was then directly contrary. I should be very glad to hear how the Lords Judgment of reversal in that case, and in this, are reconcilable. The Commons, at that time, would scarce have suffered such an attempt upon their privileges, and I hope we shall be as careful and as zealous to preserve ours: we have as much power as our predecessors, we shall never suffer for want of power, if we do not suffer for want of will to exert it.—I expect to hear of the great authority of one learned judge, that differed from them; I have the utmost esteem for his judgment, but I am sorry to hear any insinuation, that those judges who have given their opinion otherwise, are guilty of a breach of their oaths. It hath been touched upon, that, whenever any question has been asked the Judges, concerning the privileges of the Lords, or the privileges of the Commons, their answer is recorded for the instruction of all their successors, and, to the honour of both houses of parliament, that it was a matter above their knowledge: the law of parliament is above the judges of the common-law, and is not to be subject to their judgment, it is alieni fori.—And, Sir, as I have been informed, this was the answer given in the House of Lords by one of the present Judges, and by what I have heard, it was well he escaped their censure; shewing too much respect to this House gave very great offence.—I beg gentlemen to consider, (I shall not enter into particulars that have been mentioned) whether any thing of this kind would not make you despicable, to the lowest degree, in the world, and expose electors to such mischiefs that none could endure? Upon every election that comes before you, it is impossible to judge the right of election, but by the right of the electors. If you will endure any person, after you have said he has no right, to go into Westminster-Hall, and bring an action in the courts there, a jury may find a verdict, that the House of Commons are mistaken, and that this person hath a right, and judgment shall be given accordingly. Will not this proceeding, that very moment, submit your resolutions to the examination and censure of the inferior courts? May not they say, they vote for one another, we have detected them all? That they are a parcel of people packed together, and not one of them elected as they should be?—What condition the magistrate will be in, hath been mentioned already; when a multitude hath a right, and every body may bring his action, can any magistrate, (a constable as in this case) bear the expences of a hundred or a thousand actions at law? There will not be wanting some to prosecute a magistrate with all the violence possible.—Though I can by no means agree, that this matter is to be determined according to the common rules and methods of law, but according to the course of parliament; yet I shall compare it with some other cases in the law.—That which makes these persons hardships the greater, is, these magistrates are not people that officiously interpose to take a poll at elections, and make a return; but these are men, who, by the duty of their office, are obliged to do it; and if they do not execute their office, and give you satisfaction, yet if you let this be examined in another place after you have said they have done well, they may be punished for doing so.—I will compare this with one or two common cases that have not been mentioned; suppose a person should exhibit an indictment against another maliciously: he does this wilfully, and an action does lie against him; but if a Grand-Juryman find a bill against a man, the law will not admit an averment that it was done maliciously, because he was obliged by his office to do it: so it is in the case of a witness, because he is brought in by the process of the court: so it is in the case of judges. And is it not equally the duty of a magistrate to determine upon the poll, and afterwards to make a return? and is not that examinable before you?—A great deal might be said further upon this, but I hope it is pretty unnecessary: and that no body can have any doubt but that our privileges are very much concerned in this question, and what the consequences would be; therefore I would humbly propose for the question what another gentleman hath hinted at, which may reduce this debate to a particular point.—We certainly have such a thing as the law and custom of parliament, and that is very well known, and upon that foot I desire you would put a question to this effect:

“That the sole right of examining and determining all matters relating to the election of members to serve in parliament except in such cases as are otherwise provided for by an act of parliament, is in the House of Commons; and that neither the qualification of the electors, or the right of the persons elected, is elsewhere cognizable or determinable.”

Members. “The Question, the Question!”

Mr. Smith.—“Sir, I speak only to your order, that gentleman would not interrupt one another by calling for the Question, but give diligent attention to the debate, for this is a matter of great consequence.”

Then Mr. Freeman (in the chair) stated a question on his paper to the effect proposed by Mr. Solicitor, and read the same to the committee.

Sir Christopher Musgrave.—“I am very willing to hear any gentleman that will stand up and speak, and you have had a very good hint given you by an honourable person, that this is a business of great moment; and I hope we shall continue to do as we have done, that is, to hear gentlemen patiently: and that we may not be guilty of any disorder, I move you for candles to be brought in.”

Then the question was put, and carried for candles. And they were brought in accordingly.

Mr. Dormer, (afterwards a Judge).—“Mr. Freeman, you have now a question upon your paper, but that which I take to be the question is, Whether a freeholder, or a freeman, who bath a right to give his vote for his representatives in parliament, may arbitrarily and maliciously be deprived of that privilege without any redress in any court whatsoever.—This I take to be the case before you, it said to be of great consequence, and I take it to be of as great consequence as anything that ever came before either house; and I don't look upon it only to concern the jurisdiction of the Lords and Commons, but affect every part of the constitution, and the queen the head thereof, in the highest degree. For it comes to this; if the Lords have not right to determine in this matter, which Writ of Error is regularly brought before them, we shall be turned into a state-villainage, and the people will be deprived of choosing their own representatives without relief, and shall not have relief by her majesty in the Court of Queen's-bench, nor before her in the Court of Parliament, where, in consideration of law, she is always present, and where by our law, she is the last appeal; and there will be a failure and an interruption of justice and our constitution, in relation to ourselves will be so far changed, that it will be impossible there should be any right representation of the people: for, it will not be the people then that will chuse, but the officer may arbitrarily refuse and return whom he thinks fit, and the particular person will be without remedy. For, whatever gentlemen apprehend if the right of return be not controverted, which way can any particular man bring his case before you? And what remedy shall he have, if not by action? I will not say there has not, (but I will turn the argument, and put it upon them to shew there has;) but I believe there never was any particular application to the committee of privileges, where the injury has been done to a particular man, which is the present case: and this matter is found by a jury that was struck, and not one man of the jury but of quality, and approved on both sides: and I think, though never came before the parliament, nor the committee of privileges, they might consider of a particular injury.—And as for the notice that hath been taken up, that where the House of Commons have a jurisdiction, there the party is in all cases without remedy in any other court; sure that is not according to truth: for in the case of a false return there is a public injury that does not hinder the party from obtaining satisfaction as to his particular injury; and if no action lie there can be no satisfaction; for this House hath not awarded damages in any case notwithstanding the case cited, for that was only costs for the man's trouble in coming up to be examined before this House. And, if they should award damages, there is no way of levying those damages; What writ can we issue out? And if this person be without remedy at law, he must sit down without any redress whatsoever.—There may be a multitude of cases, where this House hath a jurisdiction as far as concerns the public and themselves, and the party shall have his action also. If I receive a blow in this House, it is a violation of the privilege of this House, and this House can take jurisdiction of it, and censure the person that hath done the injury; but will any man say, that an action of battery will not lie at the common-law in that case? There was the Case of sir Thomas Clarges: At the time of his election there was one Roe spoke words to his prejudice: He might certainly have complained to this House of it; you had an instance, I think, last session, of one that complained, for some such injury, against the lord bishop of Worcester, and the House took it into consideration; (which sir Thomas Clarges might have done,) but he brought his action, and recovered considerable damages: and afterwards a Writ of Error was brought in the King's-bench, and Judgment was affirmed.—There is a case not within any provision of your law, and that is, where a sheriff made a return, and he delivered this to a private messenger to bring up to the Crown-Office. The messenger by the way thought fit to vitiate the return, and make another return than what he received from the sheriff: For this an action was brought and he recovered at law against this messenger, for the private damage he had done him. Certainly otherwise the law would be defective.—In another Case, the sheriff adjourned, in prejudice to a candidate, to a corn-field: an action was brought against this sheriff, at law, for the damages he had done this gentleman, and it was maintained, and I dare say more cases may be put; Which shews that your having a jurisdiction, as to what concerns the public, does not exclude the party, but he may have an action for his private injury.—A great many positions I have heard, which I take not to be true, particularly this, 'That there is no remedy at law, but in cases provided for by the statutes: That is not so; these statutes imply the contrary. The first says, Whereas there was not a sufficient remedy, therefore, that gives a more compleat remedy, and so the judges declared in the Case of Barnardiston and Soame.—Sir, they have told us of the Cases of Barnardiston and Soame, and of Nevil and Strode; with humble submission to you, those Cases go so far as to prove the jurisdiction of the Lords, and the inferior courts: That of Barnardiston and Soame, was an action tried before the court of King's-Bench, and a set of as learned judges as ever were before, or since; and three of them were of opinion for the action, and my lord chief justice Hale was one of them; who, the term before he surrendered his character, did thus express himself: 'He gave thanks to God, that he had spared him to that time, that he was able to keep his cushion, and declare his conscience in that place.' But afterwards it had its fate; a Writ of Error was brought in the Exchequer-Chamber; Mr. Justice Levinz, that reports it, says it appears, that those who argued against the Judgment in the King's-bench were made judges, and they themselves afterwards determined the Case. And every body knows how valuable it was at that time, to know the price of an House of Commons, and an English parliament. Three judges were made then in the exchequer, and I think two in the Common-Pleas. Afterwards it came into the House of Lords, and there the reversal in the exchequer was affirmed, for reasons different from what are argued now, and I believe for several good reasons. The sheriff in that case had made a double return, and the sheriff might do it for his own indemnity, for it was no more than finding a special verdict; and therefore the saying, salvo et malitiose, being put to a thing that was in itself right, would not alter the nature of the thing. Another reason they went upon was, they said this double return was a void return, and for that reason the action did not lie; and upon these reasons depended that Judgment. That gentleman who said that only four or five lords dissented, is under a great mistake; four or five lords only I believe, entered their dissent, but there was a great number, and near an equality against that Judgment: and divers lords, now in that house, were against that Judgment, that did not enter their dissent.—Then, Sir, there is the Case of Nevill and Strode, and that was first a Judgment in the Common-Pleas, and when it had taken its progress in Westminster-hall, it came before the House of Lords; and the Lords returned it back again to Westminster-hall, and ordered all the Judges of England to deliver their Opinion in it. That was founded upon an ordinance of those times: Berkshire was to send five knights, and Nevill was one of them that were elected, but not returned: There they said, in that case that ordinance was entirely new, and that case did not recommend itself by the known laws of the land, and for that reason they would not give Judgment, for wages could not be levied for five such knights. And, when afterwards they were to give Judgment, the right constitution had recovered itself.—Now, as to the Lords right to receive a Writ of Error in this case: You have addressed to them that they would receive a Writ of Error, at a time when your privileges were invaded. That was the case of my lord Hollis, who with others was informed against, 5 Car. for having spoke words in this House that did affect the government: And he pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, (is there any such thing here? No they have submitted to it;) and the court over-ruled their plea to the jurisdiction, and that Judgment continued in force, (as some others which have been since do now, which it were well if they were reversed,) it is this House took notice of it; and in 1667, they desired a conference with the House of Lords. The chairman was my lord chief justice Vaughan, and this House there complained how they were grieved by that Judgment; and, after repeated conferences, both Houses did consent to this expedient, that my lord Hollis being the only survivor, should be desired to bring a Writ of Error in the House of Lords, and he did so, and the Lords in that case did you justice, and reversed the Judgment: As to your passing this Vote, what it will signify I cannot tell. What signified a Vote you passed before about the year eighty, That the putting the laws in execution against Protestant dissenters, was an injury to the public, and a subversion of the government; and that those that put them in execution, should be looked upon as enemies to the king and kingdom? The consequence was, that all the laws against Popery were put in execution against Protestants more than they were before. The Judges in Westminster-hall said, this Vote had not passed into a law, and they could not take notice of it. I hope we shall do nothing that will lessen ourselves, nor any thing but what will be effectual for the ends for which it is proposed."

Sir Joseph Jekyll, (afterwards Master of the Rolls.) "Mr. Freeman, I consider you have been a long time in this debate, and a great deal of it has been spent, either in suggestions contrary to what appears before you, or else in questions altogether improper for the consideration of the Committee, and therefore it is necessary to look back to that which gave occasion to the present dispute.—The Committee hath a copy of the proceedings of this action referred to them, but it hath not been read; and I am confident if it had, and had been attended to by gentlemen, they would scarce have said that the Lords in the Judgment they gave, did any thing in opposition to your Judgment, or in derogation to your privileges.—Before the action was brought, there was a Resolution of the House of Commons, That the right of election for the borough of Aylesbury, was in the inhabitants not receiving alms. It is from that Resolution the Plaintiff hath taken his rise, and hath brought his action; for by his declaration he makes his Case to be, that he was an inhabitant of that borough, not receiving alms; and that the constables, falsely and maliciously, obstructed and hindered him from giving his Vote at the election there. The constables plead, Not Guilty, and the matter goes to a Jury, and they find for the Plaintiff, and give him 5*l.* damages: Which is in effect a finding that the Plaintiff was an inhabitant, not receiving alms, and that he was obstructed and hindered from voting by those constables, and that it was done fauld et malitiose, and to his damage. And this may serve to demonstrate, that the proceeding at law has not been in opposition, but in conformity to your judgment.—Now let us consider, whether the bringing of this action is a violation of your privileges: A great many things have been said not proper for you to deliberate upon; one, that this will encourage a multitude of suits; another, that this action was never brought before, and several other matters which go to the question, whether the action will lie. Now that is not the question here; but the true and only question before you, is, whether this action was brought in violation of your privileges; for, there be no breach of privilege in it, I know no authority we have to stop the course of legal proceedings. And as to that, but one thing (as I conceive) has been said material which is this, that this is a parliamentary cause and appertains to your jurisdiction; and the judges of the common-law, are not judges of the law of parliament, and therefore they ought not to have given the Plaintiff his judgment (and it must be admitted the Lords ought not to have given any judgment, but what the judges ought to have given.) To maintain that it hath been said, and undoubtedly it is true that this House hath a right to judge election and it is as true, that in order to come to that determination, it is incidently necessary that the House do judge of the right of electors; as it has been said, (but that I deny) that the right of the electors is by the law of parliament.—I take the right of every elector in England to accrue to him by the common-law, for it is under one or other of these qualifications. Either he is a freeholder, and then he hath a right to vote for knights of the shire; or he is a right by charter, or a right by prescription, which two last rights take in the right of voting in all cities and boroughs. Now I would be glad to know whether the right of a freehold is not by the common-law? Is it not an estate with all its privileges and services, created by that law? Whether a right by charter is not by the common-law? Is it not that law that enables the crown to grant charters, and qualifies that power? Whether a right by prescription is not by the common-law? Is not prescription, common-usage? And is the common-law, any thing but common-usage? So that the right of every elector being by the common-law, the judgment of that right is primarily and originally in the courts of law. The freeholders right of voting, is of the essence of his freehold; and you may as well take away his freehold, as take away his right to vote, which he has by virtue of that freehold, as then tell him he must come to the House of Commons to recover it. And the same may be said of those several interests, which gave a right of voting in cities and boroughs. And thus, I hope, I have made it out, that a right of voting is not a parliamentary right, but an ordinary, legal one, and by the common-law Judges have the judgment of it originally; and it is incidently only that the House has a power of judging of it, and that too according to the rules of the common-law; which is a further demonstration, that it is a common-law right; for it would be absurd to say, a man has a right by one law, which is to be judged by the rule of another.—Then what course has the Plaintiff taken? He has a right by the common-law to chuse burgesses for Aylesbury: That right has been invaded, and he has gone to the common-law for redress, and from no other power could he have it; for this House, or the Committee of Elections, cannot give a remedy in this Case, that is, cannot make the person

jured reparation for the damages done him, by obstructing him in the exercise of his privilege: And that is the thing the learned gentlemen, who have spoke in this debate, have passed by: And these are the material points: That this is a right at common-law, and this House cannot apply a remedy.—But it has been said, that the House will examine, not only on behalf of the elected person, but of the electors. It is true, but in order to what? To see whether you have a right member here, and for no other end; for I challenge any gentleman, to shew me one instance of a single man who came hither and complained, that he had a right to vote, and was hindered from voting, and made that solely to be the offence of the officer. Did the House, or would the House receive such a complaint? And yet he may go with that complaint to the law: For whether the person he would vote for be returned or not, the injury is the hindering him from enjoying his privilege: And it cannot be made an injury or not an injury, by matter ex post facto; that is, by the officer's returning, or not returning the candidates. And though the officer should repent him, and not carry his injustice so far as to make a false return, yet it is of use, that the law will redress the wrong done to the Voter, and thereby, perhaps, stop the first steps or approaches towards a false return.—But if I should admit the House would receive the single Petition of a voter, who was refused, and when the person he would have voted for was returned, yet the House cannot make him reparation; all we can do, is to censure the officer, but we cannot make the person complaining whole, in point of damages. Indeed it has been said, the House can give damages, and there was an instance given of Mr. Tankred, who complained against a clergyman, and the House ordered Mr. Tankred to pay him costs; So was sir George Meggot ordered to pay costs to the member he causelessly petitioned against, and the like is provided for at the beginning of every session. But are these instances of any Petitioner repaired in damages

A Complaint being made to the House, that sir George Meggot had prosecuted at law several persons, for what they had testified the last session at the committee of privileges and elections, upon hearing the matter touching the election for the borough of Southwark; it was referred to the committee of privileges to examine the matter of the said complaint, and report their opinion.

4 Decemb. 8 Willielmi. A report was made of the matter of fact, and that the committee had come to this resolution; That sir George Meggot having prosecuted, at law, Thomas Malyn, and John Ladd, for what they testified at the committee of privileges and elections the last session, upon hearing of the matter touching the election for the borough of Southwark, was guilty of a breach of privilege.

by this House? No, these are instances against Petitioners, not in favour of them; nor are damages given in those cases, but costs; all that is provided for, is, that persons, frivolously complained against, shall not be out of pocket. And by a mean you have a jurisdiction in point of expences, but not in point of damages; for you may order the wrong doer into custody, and make his payment of costs to the injured person the price of his liberty; but there is no direct remedy, even for costs. But it is apprehended, here may be a clashing of jurisdictions, and if the party should be allowed to go to law, the courts of law may be of one opinion, and this House of another. This is a supposition the law does not allow of, for this is to suppose courts of justice will not do right. It will be allowed to me that your determination will always be just, and other courts the law supposes will do right too, and then they will determine as you; and your determination, and that of the law, as I said before, has been the same in this case. But then, as the supposition of law is, that all courts will do right, so human frailty supposes there may be, an error in Judgment: And yet courts must have jurisdiction, or else there can be no administration of justice among men, since there is no judicature short of another world, that can pretend to an unerring judgment. And now I will shew you the several courts have different jurisdiction of the same fact, and the law allows them, notwithstanding there may be diversity of judgments. The court of Common-pleas may punish a person for assaulting an officer in the execution of their process, as a contempt to that court; but at the same time, for the same matter, the offender may be punished in the King's-Bench, as it is a breach of the public peace; and the officer may, if he pleases, bring his action in the court of Exchequer for the damage done him. I would observe a little upon the cases cited, and that as short as possible; The first is that of Nevill and Strode: I have looked into the Journal of 1659, and the only book of our law, where that case is re-

The House then agreed with the committee, and ordered sir George Meggot to be taken into custody of the Serjeant at Arms.

The Case of Mr. Tankred, 20 Jan. 9 Willielmi R.

Mr. Tankred complained to the House of a breach of privilege against Mr. Edward Morris, minister of Aldborough, in the county of York; for that the said Morris had intercepted letters of Mr. Tankred's which were sent by the post.

14 Feb. 10 Willielmi R. Mr. Morris attending, was brought in, and the House having heard him, and his witness, resolved, that there was no ground of complaint of breach of privilege, and ordered that Mr. Morris should be discharged from any further attendance, and that he should be paid the charge of his attendance by Mr. Tankred.

ported, and that is Syderfin's second Reports: and that was upon writs issued out by Cromwell, whereby he appointed counties to chuse differently, some three, some four, some five members. Mr. Nevill who was a member of the long parliament, stood for one of the five knights for the county of Berks; they chose him, but he was not returned, and therefore he brought his action in the Common-pleas: The action depended there some time, and thereupon the justices brought the record into this House for difficulty, and desired the House would come to a determination in it, (and by the way, there was no House of Lords in being at that time; for it was in the time of the long parliament, who had usurped the whole legislative, as well as the executive power:) and no wonder the judges complimented them with the determination of that question, since they were their creatures, and had their commissions from them. Well, but the record being brought in, the House appointed a day to consider of the matter, and when they saw the plaintiff had proceeded according to the known methods of law, they gave no judgment in it, but sent it back to Westminster-hall, and there it was argued, but never adjudged. And that there was no judgment given, is easy to account for, if the judges thought such an action would lie; for at that time, the Long Parliament was upon the point of bringing in the king, and restoring the laws: And if they had given judgment for the plaintiff, they had given a sanction to the highest usurpation of the Protector, and all his wild fancies of changing the constitution at his will and pleasure. And indeed the plaintiff had disaffirmed the authority of the Long Parliament, which he had with great zeal asserted, and of which he was himself a member. But if the judges had thought such an action would not lie, they might, without any scruple, have given judgment for the defendant. And this seems to me a strong authority that Westminster-hall thought such an action would lie: As it is very remarkable, that when that House of Commons (as they called themselves) had usurped the exorbitant power I mentioned before, they did not proceed to assume the jurisdiction of the common law.—The next case is that of Soame and Barnardiston, in which Westminster-hall was divided: My lord Hale was of one opinion, and my lord North of another, and there were six and six of a side, and the matter came by writ of error into the House of Lords, and a gentleman said 800*l.* was worth contending for. But I am apt to think sir Samuel Barnardiston did not hope to recover one farthing of the money, for Soame was dead, and I believe without assets: For, in all the proceedings in the House of Lords, none appeared on the behalf of his widow, she had no council there: But it was argued against sir Samuel Barnardiston, by Mr. Montague, the late Lord Chief-Baron, to vindicate the proceedings of the Exchequer-Chamber, and judgment was given, as hath been said in the House of Lords.—But what happened next?

The Commons were so uneasy under that judgment, and the injury which might be done to the people, from whom they derived their authority, by double or false returns, that the next thing was the interposition of the legislature to apply a remedy, and the Lords came into it, though it was a great discredit to the reversal of that judgment; for the act of the 7th of the late king, declares false returns to be against law, and provides an action shall lie where an officer makes a return falsely and maliciously; they never thought it an ensnaring thing, but knew malice might be tried in that as well as many other cases: And I wonder to hear falso et malitiosè should be so much words of course. Men are tried for their lives every day where malice is the main point in issue. If a man does without any provocation kill another, the law intends malice, and that is murder: So here, if an officer refuseth the vote of one, who hath a clear and indisputable right, the law presumes it done maliciously; but if the officer refuses a man's vote, and there is any probable cause, or colour to do it, or his right of voting is doubtful, the judge will tell the jury they ought to find for the defendant; and therefore it is only in a plain and glaring case, that a man can prevail in such an action; and this by the way, is an answer to that objection, that such actions as these will bring all your elections to be determined by the Lords; since an officer can never be found guilty by a jury upon this action, where there is a controversy or dispute, much less can the Lords try or determine any thing of the right.—There is another case, and that is the case of Mr. Onslow against the bailiff of Haslemere; that judgment was against the action; and was given by my Lord Chief-Justice North, and the rest of the judges of the Common-pleas, upon the authority of the judgment in the case of Soame and Barnardiston, in the Exchequer-Chamber: and no wonder; they would not give a judgment contrary to what some of themselves had given in another place.—Sir, this question hath been before this House not long since, Whether a candidate should be hindered from proceeding upon an action at law, before he had come to this House for their determination, whether he was chosen or no? And this House, upon a solemn debate, adjudged that he might go to law before he had come hither; and I desire your clerk may read a word or two in your Journal, it is Monday, March 13, 1698."

Clerk, reads, [The House being acquainted, that John Buller, esq.; who was candidate at the election for choice of members to serve in this present parliament, for the borough of Leocard, in the county of Cornwall, hath brought an action upon the statute made in the 7th year of his majesty's reign, against Mr. Richard Roberts, mayor of the said borough, for the sum of 500*l.* for making a false return of William Bridges, esq.; although the said Mr. Buller never petitioned against, or questioned the said return in this House, and a debate arising thereupon, resolved that the debate be adjourned until Wednesday morning next.]

Sir Joseph Jekyll. Now I desire you to look upon Wednesday the 15th day of March, when that debate was resumed.

Clerk reads. [‘This was the 15th day of March. The House resumed the adjourned debate relating to Mr. Boller; and after a long debate, the same fell, without any thing done thereupon.’]

Members. Well, what then ?

Sir Joseph Jekyll.—“ I take this to be a plain authority, that will govern the case before you: for if it was not reasonable to restrain a man from proceeding at law upon the statute, before he had come hither for a determination, when it was to controvert the very election, which was undoubtedly proper for the judicature of the House; much less will it be reasonable to restrain a proceeding at law, which is not to controvert the election, and upon a case not proper for the judicature of the house; and the House doing nothing upon that complaint, is a declaration, that the House could not justly do any thing upon it. For if a man makes a motion in any other court, and the court declares they will do nothing upon it, I desire to know whether that be not a declaration of that court, that the motion is unreasonable, and it is all the judgment the court gives in such a case. And I had the honour to sit in parliament when that motion was made, and very much pressed; and some that have spoke in this debate, were then of an opinion contrary to what they are now, and were not for stopping the course of law.— Sir, I apprehend the action is well founded in this case; this man had a right to vote, he had an injury done him in respect to that right, he hath sought to be repaired in a proper way, and he could not be repaired in any other: I am for doing nothing to his prejudice, and therefore am against your question.”

The Speaker (Mr. Harley).—“ Sir, I shall trouble you but with a few words after this long debate: and rather to understand the terms you are debating on, than to think any thing I can offer to be of any great weight. But I take the question not to be as some have represented it, but to be singly this in general, whether an action does lie at common law in the case before you?—There is no need to mention the particular circumstances of Aylesbury election; for if that was the single case, you might have taken another method. I will not insist, that in this very election, a great number of those inhabitants petitioned this House upon this point, that their votes were denied? And after this petition had been in the House some time, it was withdrawn by their own consent; I do not trouble myself whether this particular man was amongst them, nor will I trouble you with what may reasonably be urged from this; but leave that to other gentlemen.—But I desire we may understand the terms upon which we are debating; we have had maxims of the common law, and the rights of parliament mentioned. The common law is the common usage of the realm; I take the laws of parliament to be the common law of the land, and the usage of parliament to be the law of parliament; and the law of parliament is to be known by usage, as the common law is.—Then how shall we know whether this belongs to the common law? If there be any other way, I should be glad to be informed; but I think there is no other way of knowing, whether an action will lie at common law, but by reason or usage, and precedents. Now, if by reason; it is to be made out by what necessarily attends this case, or some other cases like it. And pray what do they offer, that it lies at common law? do they give you any precedent? what reason do they offer? I suppose that which was read last is no precedent in this case; for that was an action upon the statute; or that the courts below take upon them a legislature instead of a judicature, which must be, if there be no rule for them to go by. I take the question you have read, to consist of two parts; one asserting your own right, the other is negative, that no other courts have any right, but in cases particularly directed by the statute.—I cannot think this of electors and elected a privilege, I take it to be a service both in the electors and elected; and formerly it was reckoned a hard service; I know not how they find it now. It is a service, I take it, because all who are electors are liable to pay the wages, and I take that to be a burden: and not only from that, but the very towns that were boroughs, and elected when one paid fifteenths, the other paid tenths; so that I take it to be a service: and if a franchise, see the consequence, it will be in the power of the crown to create as many boroughs as they please.—Then consider, this House is in possession of this power, as of right, and I do not find the common law in possession of any such right. Then what do they offer to bring it in, but that there would be some failure of justice? now I took it, that the Judges are ius dicere, and not ius dare: if any thing want a provision to be made for it, it must be done by the legislative power; and if the electors want it, provision must be made for them, that they shall have an action. And those gentlemen, who think that necessary, may bring in a bill to that purpose, and take the sense of the legislature upon it in a regular way.—The question before you now is, Whether the examination, hearing, and determination of all matters relating to elections, where some statutes have not particularly directed otherwise, do not belong to this House? There was a famous case of Goodwin, that was contested by the crown, and the crown pretended to send out another writ. And there they say, that as so members of parliament, their attendance, &c. they are the sole judge: and this they laid before King James in the first year of his reign, and claim it as their sole right, and the king's second writ was determined to be void.—But a gentleman makes an argument, if one should strike another in the House, what remedy? Why there is an act made for that case in Henry the 6th's time. I think now the matter will turn upon this: Say they, it is true you can try elections, and who are the electors; but here is one thing remains, that is, to give satisfaction. Have they any precedents for this? I believe the precedents are without; they have a power for what is necessary; nothing less than a law can give the other.—Gentlemen say, there may be a difference in judgment in courts below, but they are subordinate, and there lies an appeal: But in this Case, all courts will be co-ordinate with you; and therefore if that be a grievance, may a sollecism in government, prevent it now.—It is said, what will your vote do? That is pretty odd: If they would have an act of parliament, your vote must be the ground of it.—You are judges of the whole; but say some, you cannot give the pecuniary satisfaction. Well, suppose so; but you can restore all to their right. But let me say this, if you would not set up a co-ordinate power with you in matters of elections, and which will be too hard for you at last, I hope it will be a warning to you, to take more care in the judging of your elections for the time to come.—If the judgment belongs to you, and you are possessed of it for so long a tract of time, that nobody can offer any thing against it since Hen. 4's time; till gentlemen shew me some reason, why the common law should lay hold of it, I must be of opinion, that it does belong to you, and no Court can take cognizance of it but you, except where it is otherwise provided for by statute.”

Sir Thomas Meres. “Sir, I shall not enter into a discourse, and repeat what I remember of former times: I will say but this, let others answer it better if they can. As to the words falso et malitiose, it seems one Chief-Justice said, they were words of importance, and must be proved; another Chief Justice said, they were only words of course, that is, like pepper and vinegar to a slice of roast beef: So there is one Chief Justice, that spoke last but one, against another.—As to making satisfaction, I confess, I like very well what that gentleman said on the right hand, if there was any precedent for it, I agree it would do very well, that this House would give damages, and we will make the best of it; but most of these things have spite in them, and these actions are brought with spite. Now this we can do, we can punish the officer, and there is revenge in that; and that is a sweet bit, and some satisfaction. What further occurs to me, hath been spoken by other gentlemen, better than I can do it: and I shall not repeat, it being so late in the night.”

Mr. Cowper, (afterwards earl Cowper). “I perfectly agree with that honourable and learned gentleman that spoke last but one in this debate, in what he laid down as an undoubted maxim or ground work for the opinion he delivered, that the law and custom of parliament is part of the law of the land, and as such ought to be taken notice of by all persons. And I think it is the exact standard by which we ought to walk; and the deduction of my poor judgment is apt to make from that principle is this, that we ought not, out of zeal to our own jurisdiction, to go one step farther than that known law and custom of parliament will warrant us to do.—Now I take it upon this debate, that this law and custom of parliament doth not give the subject, who is injured by his vote being denied him, any satisfaction, or recompence for that damage: And am the rather confirmed in that opinion, because that very learned and honourable gentleman, who is particularly knowing in the laws and precedents of parliament, has not pleased to represent to you any one precedent, where the subject so injured hath complained to the parliament, and had redress in that particular; but all petitions have been either from the candidates, or electors, complaining of an undue return. So that it cannot be shewed, that it hath been the law and custom of parliament to give that remedy, or relief in parliament, which is the subject-matter, or end of the action now in question.—I go likewise along with him, and every gentleman that hath spoke in this debate, that by the law and custom of parliament, none but yourselves can determine who are rightly elected, in order to displace, or place them here; and, incident to that end, you have the sole right of considering the right of electors; I say so far forth, as it is necessarily incident to determine, who shall, and who shall not sit here; and no other Court can consider the right of the electors, in order to determine the right of any to sit in this place, further than you, by some act of parliament, have given them leave. But this matter having now been disputed a great while, you have had it fully represented to you, how they came to hold the scales in this action in Westminster-hall, not as in a Case where the right of election, or the privileges of this House was the subject matter of the question: The action was brought there only to entitle the injured subject to damages. And this matter ought to be considered, as it relates to different ends and purposes, and upon that it turned in the Case of Soame, and Barnardiston. They who thought that action lay, thought courts below might try the merits of an election to repair damages, not to determine who should be admitted to sit in parliament.—And I will venture to say, that the Judgment of the House of Lords that confirmed that reversal, was in no wise, at that time, satisfactory to the Commons of England.—But the act of parliament that hath been mentioned, was built upon this, that the reversal of the judgment between Barnardiston and Soame was not right, and so that act was procured to set up the right of the Commons of England, that was thought to be invaded by that reversal, or judgment, that the action upon the case did not lie.—I will go a step farther, that as you have the sole power to try the right of election, and consider the right of the electors, to the end I mentioned, to determine who shall be admitted here; so I grant it hath been the law and custom of parliament, (how ancient I will not enquire) to punish the offenders, particularly the officer and magistrate presiding at the election, for doing any wrong, or injury in his office on that occasion, in order to make him an example; or as an offender against the public, and the constitution of parliament: so far I grant you have just right to go, and no body ought to interfere with you.—But now we are carrying the matter yet further: the question now is not, Whether we have the sole right to punish the officer as a public offender; this action is not brought to that end, nor is there a word in the declaration who was, or who was not duly elected, or that the constitution or privilege of parliament was violated. But the plaintiff only says he had a right to vote, and that he was injuriously denied it (whether the right or wrong member was returned, he meddles not with it) and he submits it to the court and to the law. Whether he ought not to have damages for that wrong? And the question now is, whether that demand of damages was not well founded? Or whether there is any thing in this, contrary to the law and constitution of parliament? Law depending on custom, certainly consists not in, and is not to be made out by one act, but by often re-iterated acts: and that must be very far from the law and custom of parliament, which is so far from being a frequent repetition of acts, or precedents, that in this case, there is not one instance, where an elector hath brought his petition, without regard to the return made, and secured his particular right to vote might be tried and asserted, he having been obstructed and injured in giving his vote: nor was ever such elector repaired in damages here, nor ever had his particular right to vote resolved, or asserted by any judgment, or declaration of this House.—The learned and honourable person, upon whose reasoning I am humbly offering my thoughts, with great deference, was pleased to instance in the case of five persons, in the town of Aylesbury, who exhibited a petition, and complained of an injury done them at an election for that town, at which their votes were refused. And if they complained of nothing further, and did not conclude to the right of the return, and complain, that they were unjustly represented, I admit it had been so far an instance to his purpose. But if they had so complained only of the injury done the petitioners in denying their votes: yet he is pleased to tell you, this petition was withdrawn, and by the consent of the persons who presented it, and so came to nothing. I suppose this is the single precedent to prove the law and custom of parliament, because there is no other instance given. It does not appear upon what ground or reasons it was withdrawn; and I having no particular memory of that passage: you will pardon me, if I am mistaken in my conjecture. I believe no man, that seeks a remedy, would desist, if he expected to succeed; so I take the most probable reason, till another appear, to be, that they were hopeless of doing any good with it: and one petition not prosecuted, will hardly shew, that parliaments use to give redress in such cases. Now, if that precedent had been successful, if the petition had been referred to a committee, if damages had been given upon the complaint, and a declarative vote had passed to assert the petitioners right, (but I did not observe there were any such proceedings;) then, indeed, I must admit, that it was one precedent in point, and a very material one; and it would have proved, that we had once held plea of this matter, and by consequence, if we had often done so, that no body else had to do with it. But if that precedent be defective, and none can shew, that ever any petition was exhibited by any elector, for a personal injury done him in rejecting his vote, though the person he would have voted for was returned, this action may lie for such an injury done to an elector, without interfering with any law, or usage of parliament, that hath yet been made evident; and that brings me to another matter of that honourable person's discourse, and I acknowledge he entered into it with a great deal of candour and fairness.—He was pleased to say, he thought it was admitted in this debate, that the like action is not to be found in all the reports or books of law. I would allow his objection its due weight, and admit what I take his meaning to be, that this action, in the particular species of it, may be new, though it is old in its genus, or the principal materials on which it is built; and I take it, if by the general rule, or reason of law for such an action, it be warranted, this action, as a thousand other actions on the case may, will lie, though in all the parts it is not to be exactly paralleled; for it is the very nature of, and implied in the name of an action upon the case, that every man may maintain it on his particular case, provided it carry in it the general reason, or ingredients required by law to support such an action, though, in many circumstances, it may be perfectly new. I see that honourable person understands clearly the necessary incidents of that action; that is, there are to be damnum et injuria, which I take to mean a damage to the subject, not arising from a lawful, but, which is the consequence, of an unlawful act. Now, says he, first here is no damage, because anciently the attendance was thought a service and a burden, and the right of electing was a service too, and in being deprived of a service, there can be no damage; and therefore one of the main ingredients of an action of the case is wanting. This is clear reasoning, and either to be answered or submitted to.—It is said, the right of electing was a service, how true, I doubt upon the reason of the thing:

A service was often a part of the tenure, by which a man held his land till it came up to the crown; and the service was originally created by grant and reservation. Now, can any one imagine, that where one holds a small freehold, any such tenure was created between him and his immediate Lord, originally by reservation, as that he should vote to send members to parliament?—But if it might be considered as a service so created, it will not do the business of the argument, unless you consider it also as a service of burthen, without advantage or privilege; for if it be a privilege too, (though in its creation it might be a service) then the depriving a man of it is an injury. Now no body can think but that the right to elect a parliament-man, which is a distinguishing character from the vulgar, and hath its weight in the legislature, is a privilege; and therefore to be deprived of it, is to be deprived not only of a service and burden, but of a very valuable privilege; and I believe any Englishman would think we dealt hardly by him, to deprive him of it, though we should tell him at the same time, we deprived him only of a service and burden, and not of a valuable privilege.—There is another thing occurs on this head: We have been so far from thinking the being elected, a service or burden only, that, in the nature of a repeal of those judgment of Soame and Barnardiston, by a positive law, we have given the elected double damages if he be deprived of that service. Therefore, by our own notion, and in our case, it is a privilege that ought to be recompensed even with double damages, that is to say, when it concerns ourselves. And shall we declare it a mere service in the case of our electors, not to be recompensed even by single damages and that after the undoubted methods of the common-law have adjudged it their due; for I do not find any body doubts, whether this man has proceeded in the legal method throughout, even in the last resort? The Lords have not judged the fact; they are bound as to the fact by the verdict, and they are unquestionably the judges of the law on a Writ of Error. And therefore, as to what has been said that any fact of an election might come to be determined before the Lords, it is a great mistake, for they judge purely of the law on Writs of Error, as every one knows, that knows any thing of our constitution. Give me leave to say, we, upon this occasion, judge of this matter only as a matter of law, which may affect our privileges, and, though we have authority to consider what is law, as it relates to, or may intrench upon our privileges, no body that sits here can think that there lies an appeal in this place, or a second consideration of this matter after the Lords' Judgment, as it is a point of law only, and as it regards the right of the subject. So that an objection in point of law here, to the Judgment of the Lords, will not hold otherwise than as it relates to our own privileges; for nobody will say, that we are the dernier resort in any other respect. And though that is the only point that brings it properly under our consideration; yet I fear we are taking from the subject, in effect, what the law hath adjudged his right, and reversing a legal Judgment given in the subject's favour. There are other arguments flung in, to make up the weight only, as that which compares the present to the case of a dove-house; in which case, in regard of the multitude of actions that would follow, an action will not lie for every one that is injured by the erecting of it. It is true, where a multitude are injured by one and the same fact, it shall not be punished by a multitude of actions; but the public is to take care of it, because the injury is of a public nature; but by the same standard and known laws of England, if one man is so rash as to commit a multitude of injuries, which severally affect several persons, it was never said, that he became unpunishable by the multitude of his offences, but every one injured has his action against him. I have heard it said, defendit numerus, but that is spoken as to the number of offenders, not the number of offences committed by the same man. And these injuries which consist in denying the subject to vote, when of right he ought, will not be multiplied (as is objected) by letting the subject know, that as they may come into parliament to punish the officer, as a public offender against the constitution; so the particular person injured by being denied his vote, may also have an action for the private and particular injury done to him only.—I would mention one thing more: they who have spoke for the other opinion, seem to take it for granted, (which I do not take to be a true way of reasoning) that because, in determining who have a right to sit here, we do intently, and only can, in order to that end, determine who have a right to vote: therefore no other jurisdiction can try the same matter or right to vote, though it be to different ends and purposes.—Now if you will consider the different jurisdictions in the constitution of this kingdom, there is nothing more common, and many instances may be given of it. There are variety of jurisdictions that try the same fact, and yet each hath a sole and separate jurisdiction in that matter, to different ends; and these jurisdictions are not, in that respect, subordinate to another: take the spiritual and temporal; the spiritual is not subordinate, but only restrainable by the temporal, where they intrench upon the temporal; as in the common instance of matrimony, which, directly, and abstracted from other purposes, is triable in the spiritual court, and no where else. But, yet, if that comes to be a question of fact in relation to a title at law, or to make out a descent, why the temporal courts every day try it, though per se, and taken by itself, it belongs to the jurisdiction of the spiritual court; and yet these courts are not, in that respect, subordinate one to another.—So, in the case touched upon, of a battery, it is not triable in the Common-pleas, as it is an offence against the public peace, by indictment, in order to a fine, but triable in those courts only that have a criminal jurisdiction; but as it is a private injury, and in order to recompense the injured in damages, that is triable in the court of Common-pleas, and other places which have cognizance of civil actions only; and this is not in respect that one court is subordinate to the other, but one holds plea of the same fact, in order to one end; and the other in order to another end; and there is no clashing of jurisdictions in such cases.—For what hath been objected, that this may create variety of judgments concerning the same right: this does not weigh, it seems, in our own cases; for we may bring our actions for double damages for a false return, and yet that may produce the same variety of judgments. So was the opinion of the House in the case cited behind me; and the law is plain, that though the last determination of this House, where there hath been any, shall determine the right of election, and there the judges and jury shall be bound by the last determination, and to act by the same rule; yet, in towns where there has been no dispute of the right settled here one way or other, the candidate may, notwithstanding, bring his action, and he, or the people of the place, may also petition the House of Commons. And then there is the same objection; for there may be variety of judgments touching the right of election, one in the House of Commons and another in the courts below. And upon the trial, in order to obtain damages, a jury, in such cases, where the right had never been settled in parliament before the election in question, are not directed by the judgment of your House, on the same disputed election: nor is any jury bound to follow such judgment; and if you will go upon a supposition that a judge and jury may go contrary to law and right, or the determinations of the House, in the case before you, it is an objection which you have overlooked in your own cases; and therefore why should it be an objection to hinder the person whom you represent of his remedy for the injury done him?—Upon the whole, I am for so much of your question as serves only to declare, that you have the sole power of determining the right of all elections and even the elector's right to vote, to the end to try who is your member, or to punish the officer as an offender against the constitution: so far is agreeable to the constant law and practice of parliament. But for that part of the question which relates to the restraining the electors from bringing their actions for the personal or private damage done to them, I think it is not agreeable to the law or constitution of parliament."

Sir Humphry Mackworth.—"Mr. Freeman, we are much obliged to the gentlemen that have argued on both sides, who have brought the matter of this debate into a narrow compass: the question is, whether an elector be entitled to an action at common-law against the officer, for recovery of damages, in case his vote which he offered, be not taken down in writing, and entered on the poll? or, whether the House of Commons have the sole privilege of examining and determining the right or qualification of every elector to give his vote, and to judge of the behaviour of every sheriff and other officer, in taking the poll on the election of Members to serve in parliament.—I am of opinion, with great submission to better judgments, that the House of Commons have a sole right of judicature in these cases, and that the elector is not entitled to an action at common law. I shall endeavour to support this opinion by answering the arguments that have been made use of to prove the contrary: and first, I crave leave to observe, that the gentlemen who have argued on the other side, have not taken notice of a distinction, which seems to be very material in this case, and that is between an actual force or violence done by the officer, and a bare omission in point of duty. It is agreed, that, in case the officer does by force or violence obstruct, or hinder an elector from offering or pronouncing his vote at an election, for which of the candidates he pleases, the elector will be entitled to an action at common-law for recovery of damages, for that is personal wrong, and does not concern the right or qualification of an elector to vote in elections: but, in case the officer does permit the elector quietly to offer or pronounce his vote, (as he did in the case of Ashby, who pronounced his vote for sir Thomas Lee, and Symon Mayne, esq.) but does not think fit to enter his vote upon the poll, the elector in this case is not entitled to an action at common law for recovery of damages, because he has neither suffered any force or violence, nor is, by such omission, deprived of his vote; for a vote being once pronounced, the law takes it for the benefit of the public, though the officer be wanting in his duty; and none have power to determine whether the elector had a legal vote, and whether the officer had sufficient reason to refuse to enter the said vote in the poll, but the House of Commons. If any other persons should have authority in this case, they will be able to destroy the freedom of elections, and the constitution of parliament.—It is insisted by some gentlemen, that the electors have no proper remedy, in this case, in the House of Commons, and therefore they must have their remedy at common-law: but, with great deference to their judgments, the electors have a proper remedy, in this House, in every respect; for here their votes will be allowed, the legal representatives restored, and the officer will be punished for any wilful default in the execution of his office. This is a remedy that answers the end for which every elector is entitled to give his vote, which is not for a private advantage to himself, but for the general advantage of the whole kingdom. But the action at law is no proper remedy in any respect, for since a vote that is offered and refused, is as good by the law of parliament as a vote that is offered and received, and is so adjudged on the trial of every election in the House of Commons, or else they could not fill their House with legal representatives; it is not proper or reasonable that an officer should pay damages to an elector that has not suffered any, nor that a public offence should be punished by a private satisfaction; which is not likely to prevent the evil, preserve the vote, and restore the representative; nor is the same consistent with the constitution or the public safety.—The qualification of electors, and the behaviour of officers, in all elections, are matters of parliament, and such matters are not cognizable elsewhere, as hath been often declared by all the judges of England: a parliamentary case requires a parliamentary remedy. And since votes have been refused in all elections; if electors, in this case, had been entitled to an action at law, it must be presumed, that some time or other such an action would have been brought, which yet was never once attempted in any former reign; and all those acts of parliament that were made to give damages in cases relating to elections, do demonstrate that no such damages could be recovered at common-law; for if they could, there had been no occasion for making any of those statutes.—It is insisted, that every right must have a remedy, but then the subject must be first deprived of that right, which in this case he was not; and, even when he is, he must have his remedy in a proper manner, and in a proper court. There are several sorts of rights and several sorts of laws in England, and there are several courts of justice for the administration of those laws: a man that has a right to a legacy cannot bring an action at common-law, but he has a proper remedy in the spiritual court. The like may be observed of cases that belong to the courts of Chancery, Admiralty, Stanneries, and of the Forest-laws. The subject cannot bring actions at common-law, in cases that belong to the jurisdiction of other courts. And when my lord chief justice Coke enumerates the several laws in this kingdom, he gives the precedence to the law and custom of parliament, which he tells us is superior to the common-law in Westminster-Hall. And as every court at law has its customs and privileges peculiar to itself, and is sole judge of them, so also the high court of parliament, 'suis propriis legibus et consuetudinibus subsistit,' hath its own power, laws and customs, and is sole judge thereof. And, if an action at common-law will not lie for a legacy, where the spiritual court has a jurisdiction, though the temporal courts have, in many respects, a superior authority, such an action will much less lie in a case concerning the parliament, which is the highest court of the kingdom, and who are sole judges in all cases relating to themselves. But some carry this further, and say that every right must have a remedy with damages. This may be true in most cases, where a man is deprived of rights of property and possession; but there are many instances to be given, where a right of franchise or privilege is not entitled to any damage: as a person elected mayor of a corporation, if the proper officer refuses to swear him, has no action at law for damages; but his remedy is by Mandamus out of the Queen's Bench; there is a remedy by Quo Impedit, but not to recover damages. In writ of right you shall recover the land, but not damages: so in this case, the proper remedy is to have the vote allowed, which can only be done by the House of Commons. Some gentlemen have found out a new distinction which I never heard before, that the House of Commons have the sole privilege to judge of the rights of electors, and of the behaviour of officers, to one intent, but not to another; that is, in order to determine who are the legal representatives, but not to give damage to the party injured. But, with great submission, there is no weight at all in this distinction; for, as it is plain that the elector is not in this case, deprived of his vote, and therefore suffers no damage, so it is also evident that the judgment of the House of Commons, in matters properly cognizable before them, cannot be contradicted by any other judicature; and therefore their judgment of the qualification of the elector, and of the behaviour of the officers, must be conclusive to all intents and purposes whatsoever. It is contrary to the reason of all laws, that the behaviour of an officer should be subject to the determination of two independent jurisdictions; or that he should be innocent by the judgment of a superior court, and guilty by the judgment of an inferior; or that he should be twice punished for the same offence. No man can serve two masters; the officer, at this rate, will be every way ensnared and made liable to punishment, whether he does his duty or not; if he accepts illegal votes on the poll, he will forfeit 500*l.* by the statute for a false return; if he refuses them, he may be ruined by a multitude of actions; for if one may bring an action, there may be five hundred, since every man, at this rate, may offer a vote, and bring an action for not entering it upon the poll. How is this consistent with the freedom of elections, in which there ought to be no terror neither on the electors, nor on the officers? But as the electors should be free to offer their votes, so the officers should be free to judge whether they ought to be entered on the poll, or not; and they ought not to be accountable to any but the House of Commons, whose servants they are, in all matters relating to elections, and who are entrusted with the determination of all matters and cases relating thereto; and they may as well punish them for taking illegal votes on the poll, as for not taking those that are legal. In neither of which cases have the judges of the common law any jurisdiction, though there is the same reason in both, to take care that every the meanest subject may have relief for any injury done him; but we are not to take more care of the meanest subject than of the whole House of Commons. The greatest subject in England ought to have no relief but what is consistent with the law of parliament and the safety of the constitution. If an action lies and upon a judgment on that action a Writ of Error lies in the House of Peers, the Lords will be the sole judges at last, who have votes to choose a House of Commons; which is directly contrary to the fundamental maxim of the law and custom of parliament that the two Houses are mutual checks to each other and sole judges of their own privileges.—This is an excellent constitution and admirably well contrived for the common safety: but how can this constitution be preserved if the Lords can punish our officers and govern our elections? This will be the way to destroy all checks, and to make the House of Commons dependent on the Lords; and then I cannot see upon what foundation you can be said to sit here to do any service for your country.—Others insist that this is a right that is incident to the freehold and freedom of electors; therefore as their freeholds are cognizable at common-law, so is every incident belonging to it. This argument is plausible at first sight, but in reality there is nothing in it, for though the Commons of England have submitted their private differences to arbitrators, or judges, inaudiently chosen and appointed by the prince, the common parent of the people; yet they have never submitted their fundamental rights and privileges, which they hold in their public and political capacities, as a free branch of the high court of parliament, to any but their own representatives, who are chosen and appointed by themselves. This is not a case, properly speaking, between party and party, but between the Lords and Commons; because the determination of this case brings the whole right in question, who have a privilege to judge of the qualification of electors, to give their votes in election of members to serve in parliament, whether the Lords or the Commons? It is not now the question who hath the best right to a freehold or freedom, or to any thing that is incident to it; but whether the Commons of England shall have any freeholds or freedoms at all? or, which is the same thing in effect, whether they should have any security for those rights or not? For if the Lords are judges of your privileges, you can hold no right but during their pleasure.—The Lords seem to contend for the right of the subject, but I wish it be not for a power to enable themselves to judge and determine, as they think fit, of all our rights and liberties; for this is the necessary consequence of allowing an elector to have a remedy in any other place but within these walls.—This is my humble opinion; and if I am mistaken, other gentlemen will set me right. This is certainly a matter of the highest importance to the welfare of the subject, and I doubt not but they will very well consider it before they give way to the establishing a precedent that tends to destroy the privileges of this House, or the liberties of their country.—A great tenderness is expressed for this poor man, whose vote has been refused: but whether he had a right to give his vote is very much questioned, and never yet determined by this House, who has the proper judicature thereof. But admitting he had a vote, whether ought to be preferred, a private interest or the public safety? Whether will be most for the honour of this House and the interest of our electors, the care of a private person by a new-invented action, neither warranted by reason, precedent or any established law; or the care of the parliament, and the constitution, on which depend the rights and liberties of all the Commons of England.—Sir, I beg pardon for taking up so much of your time, but I must confess it seems to me, that our all depends upon a right determination of this matter: for I cannot see any other reason why this new device is supported by the Lords, but only to render you precarious and useless.”

Sir Gilbert Dolben. “Mr. Freeman, I shall not trouble you very long at this time of day; I think the point in debate has been truly stated by the gentlemen who insisted on this question; Whether an action will lie for an elector, for having been refused his vote at the election of a member to serve in parliament? A learned gentleman would have the question to be, not whether an action will lie, but whether this House has the sole right of determining that matter, and of giving remedy in it. I confess I think it is more properly stated the other way: but the thing is scarce worth a dispute, since which way soever you turn the tables it comes to the same point, and one of the questions will in consequence be resolved by the resolution of the other. For if that question be put which is proposed by the gentleman, and carried in the affirmative, that this House has the sole right of determining this, and all other matters whatsoever that concern the right of election; then it must follow, that whoever is wronged in any such respect, cannot be redressed by action, since the right of determining in cases of this nature, is not in the courts below, but solely in this House. I shall not offer you any arguments to prove this sole right, many having been urged by others; but I will consider some things (without taking up much of your time), that have been offered as objections to it. Some gentlemen have made a distinction, in this case, between the right of electors and of the elected; and they will have it, that the courts below may decide the first, but not the last; whereas, in my poor opinion, the decision of the elector's right must necessarily, in many cases, decide who has a right to be elected. For suppose a common case, that one of the candidates insists upon an election by a select number, and the other upon a popular election: If, in this case one of the populace be refused his vote, upon a pretence that he is not of the select number, whereupon he brings his action against the officer; will not the event of that trial determine (in consequence) the right of the candidates? Surely it must; since if it go for the plaintiff, he for whom the plaintiff offered to vote, and who had the popular interest, will appear to have had the right of election; and so will the other candidate, if it go for the defendant. Several other cases to the same purpose might be put: So that if an action of this nature should lie, it must (as I apprehend) unavoidably follow, that Westminster-hall by original action, and by Writ of Error the House of Lords, will have power to determine, (at least consequentially,) who has a right to sit in this House, and who not. And how consistent such a determination will be with your undeniable right, (acknowledged on all sides) of determining the elections of your members, exclusive of all other jurisdictions, I leave to gentlemen to consider. A learned person was pleased to object, that right is founded upon usage; and if this House had the sole right of judging in a case of this nature, where a single elector is wronged, doubtless there would be some precedent of relief given to such an injured person. But, says the gentleman, there is no such precedent, and therefore it must follow, that this House has not the sole right of relieving in that case. I think I may safely deny his first proposition, as he applies it to the rights of this House, which (generally speaking) are not founded upon usage. Sir, the rights of parliament are chiefly founded upon the nature and constitution of parliaments. Usage is indeed a corroboration, and an evidence of those rights; but the foundation of them, is our being a part of the legislature, whereby we necessarily become invested with such rights and privileges, as enable us to act, and to discharge our duty, in that great capacity: So that it is not so much what has been used, as what is necessary to the support of our constitution, that must be the rule and measure in determining the rights of the House of Commons. But neither has usage been wanting in this case: For whereas the gentleman asserts, that there is no precedent where this House has given relief to a wronged elector, (with submission,) several such precedents appear upon your books, particularly in the case of Benbury, where four or five of the inhabitants complained, and the House gave a remedy. And I cannot see why, if it has been given to four, it may not be given to one; nay, I should think it more than one have been relieved, a fortiori one should be relievable. But it seems to me, that the argument drawn from usage, goes much further than the learned gentleman intended it should: for if all right be founded upon usage, all right of action must be so founded; and then what becomes of this action which the gentleman has laboured to support? If usage be nothing else but the repetition of the like acts, then this action (according to the gentleman's rule, that usage is the foundation of right,) cannot be rightful, unless there hath been a repetition of the like action. Nor can it be said, that this is the first time any such cause of action has arisen, and that therefore it could not have been brought before; for there has scarce been a parliament called in any reign, but some or other has, without doubt, been wrongfully refused his vote: So that the cause having been frequent, it must have had the like effect ere now, in case such a wrong could have been redressed by bringing such an action. But no gentleman has pretended to say, that any action of this nature was ever brought before; and therefore we may infer from the learned gentleman's own position, as likewise from the authority of Littleton's text, that, since none has been brought, none can be brought. And this has been the constant opinion of the courts in Westminster-hall, the judges having, upon every occasion where the rights of parliament have fallen under their consideration, in all times declared that nothing of that kind is within their jurisdiction; nor can they judge of any such matter, farther than as they are empowered by particular statutes. And this was the reason why the Judgment in Barnardiston's Case, given in the Queen's-bench, was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber, because it was a thing purely of parliamentary cognizance; the House of Commons having the sole power of determining all matters relating to elections and returns, except in statute-cases. Nay, the court of King's bench had declared, they would not have proceeded in that action of Barnardiston, had it not been grounded by a precedent Judgment given in the House of Commons. But the judges in the Exchequer Chamber thought, that even the determination of the House was not a sufficient authority to the courts below, to hold plea in an action relating to the rights of parliament, though the action was grounded upon that determination; and therefore they reversed the Judgment given in that action, and (which is a mighty strong circumstance in that case) that reversal was afterwards affirmed in the House of Lords. So that it is plain, even the Lords themselves were, at that time, of the same opinion of the judges, that nothing which concerned elections was cognizable in Westminster-hall: For otherwise they could not have affirmed the Judgment given in the Exchequer Chamber, which was grounded entirely upon that maxim. This appears further, by what their lordships did in the Case of Hollis and Elliot, against whom Judgment had been given in the King's-bench, for what they had said and done in this House. In the year 1667, the House of Commons voted, that the Judgment given in the King's-bench against those persons was illegal, as being against the privilege of parliament. And this vote was (as I remember) delivered to the Lords at a conference, with a desire of their concurrence to it: Accordingly, the Lords sent a message, that they did concur. Nay, they were so zealous, as to desire the lord Hollis to bring a Writ of Error upon that Judgment, which was done, and the Judgment was reversed. From whence it must be inferred, that their lordships were then of opinion, that whatever Judgment is against the privilege of Parliament (that is, of either House of Parliament,) is an illegal Judgment.—Now to lay these two opinions of the Lords together: If the House of Commons has the sole privilege of judging all matters relating to elections, (upon which ground their lordships affirmed the reversal of the Judgment in Barnardiston's Case) and if every Judgment given against the privilege of parliament be illegal (as their lordships both resolved, and judged in the Case of Hollis and Elliot;) how comes it to pass, that the Lords have lately thought fit to reverse the Judgment given in this Case of Asbby and White, which was grounded upon that very opinion, established by their Lordships in the Case of Barnardiston, that all matters concerning elections are determinable only in the House of Commons? And consequently, how can we avoid saying, (pursuant to the other opinion, and to the Judgment they gave in the Case of Hollis) that their lordships Judgment of reversal given upon the Writ of Error in Asbby's Case, being against what themselves have owned to be the privilege of the House of Commons, is an erroneous, (not to say an illegal) Judgment?—I confess I cannot much wonder at its being so, when I consider, that the steps their lordships made in proceeding to this Judgment of reversal, were so very hasty, as not to afford them sufficient time to weigh and to deliberate upon a matter of such importance. This cause had depended near a twelvemonth in the King's-bench, it had been argued several times at the bar, and at length seriatim by the justices, three of whom, upon the reason of former resolutions, gave Judgment against the plaintiff, that the action does not lie; And yet no sooner was this Writ of Error brought, but the errors are immediately argued; and upon the first argument the opinion of the judges are required; and notwithstanding they desired time but till the next day to consider of the Case, the Lords (as I am very well assured) would not allow them an hour; but obliged them to deliver their present thoughts, which though several of them expressed very doubtfully, and several others were for affirming the Judgment; yet their lordships were so very clear, and so determinate in the point, that, without any farther consideration, the Judgment was reversed.—And now I desire gentlemen to judge, whether, in this instance, the Lords have shewn that regard either to the privileges, or to the dignity of this House, which their ancestors, and themselves, had formerly expressed upon the occasions before mentioned.—I will take notice but of one thing more, which fell from a learned gentleman, who insisted, that the election to parliament is not a service, but a privilege, because double damages are given by the late act concerning returns. I have cast my eye upon that act, and I think, if the preamble be read, it will appear, that gentleman was somewhat unfortunate in appealing to it; for the preamble calls the election to parliament, a service, in express terms, and certainly with good reason; if the House will give me leave, I will read it.—“Whereas false and double returns, of members to serve in parliament, are an abuse of trust in a matter of the greatest consequence to the kingdom, and not only an injury to the person duly chosen, by keeping them from their service in the House of Commons and putting them to great expence to make their elections appear; but also to the counties, cities, boroughs, and cinque-ports by which they are chosen, and the business of parliament disturbed and delayed thereby; be it therefore enacted.”—Sir, not to trouble you any longer, I am entirely for the question, as it is stated.”

Mr. King, (afterwards Lord King, and Lord Chancellor.) “That which calls me up, in the first place, is what that honourable gentleman, just against me, was pleased to intimate, as if the right of electing was only a service, and not a liberty, or privilege; and I find a worthy member, that spoke last, is of the same opinion. Truly, I am loth to tell you my own, without desiring the act 25 Car. 2. 9 cap. may be read. (Members. No! no!) It is an act to enable the county-palatine of Durham to send members to parliament, and it recites, that they had not, before that time, had the liberty and privilege of electing and sending any members to parliament: Where you see the legislature call it a liberty and privilege; and if the legislature call it so, I think I may venture to call it so too. And if it be a liberty and privilege, then the question will be, whether it does not stand on the same bottom with our liberties and privileges? In case of any other franchise or liberty, an action lies at common-law for the breach thereof; and why an action should not lie at common-law for the breach of this franchise, as well as for the breach of every other franchise, is to me very strange. Gentlemen take it for granted, this is purely an action at common-law, and no statute hath any influence on it. Now there is a statute which hath not been mentioned, only I must first premise that which, I think, no body will deny, viz. That wherever an act of parliament does forbid any thing, if any body be injured by the doing of the thing so prohibited by that act, in consequence of law, the person injured hath an action: I say, there is a statute that forbids disturbances or hindrances in matters of elections; and, by consequence of law, the statute gives an action to the party injured, against the person disturbing or hindering him in his election. The statute I mean is the 3 Ed. 1. 5 cap. That is a positive law whereby all disturbances in elections are forbid: every man is forbid to hinder or disturb by force of arms, by malice, or menacing any man, to make a free election.—I shall only instance in one parallel case, though I could in many more, the statute in Rich. 2's time, de Scand. Mag. which only forbids the speaking evil of great men; there is not one word of an action; yet, by operation of law, it was always held, that an action would lie upon that statute for a scandal of a great man, because it was prohibited by that statute. So here, the statute forbids the disturbing of any man by force or malice to make free election; the Jury have found, that the defendants did in this case maliciously disturb and hinder the plaintiff from voting at the election; and, by a like consequence and operation of law, this action is maintainable.—Gentlemen say, this is a new action never heard of before; It is true, this particular action was never brought before; but actions of the same kind and nature, and grounded on the same principles and reasons of law, have been brought before ‘Et ubi eadem est ratio, idem jus.’ I could give you many instances of this kind. Was it ever heard, ’till the 20th or 21st Car. 2, that an action lay against an officer, for denying a poll to one who stood candidate for a bridge-master? The mayor denied the poll, and said, he was judge of the election; and upon this the person injured brought his action, and recovered. At the same time it was said, there was no such action heard of before; ’tis true, not that species, but the genus was heard of. Another action was brought 30 Car. 2, (which was never heard of before) against a mayor, for refusing the plaintiff’s vote for a succeeding mayor.—I believe every body knows that all the law books for 400 years say, that the Reversioner has liberty to go into an estate of a tenant for life, to see if he commit waste. And no action was ever brought till 16 Jac. 1, by a reversioner against a tenant for life, for refusing to let him in to see whether waste was committed. No action was ever brought against a master of a ship, for the negligent keeping, and loss of goods on board his ship, till about the 24 Car. 2, and yet the action lay.—There was another action, in k. Car. 1st’s time, brought for a false and malicious prosecution of an indictment of a man for treason. There was the same objection; and it was said, that this would deter people from prosecuting. And no body ever dreamt of it before, it is true, but it stood upon the general reason of the law; if you do me a wrong, I must have a remedy. And as to what a worthy gentleman hath said, that there are instances at common-law, where a man shall recover, and yet have no damages; it is true in real actions, but let him give me an instance of that in an action of the case. He recovers nothing there: if he does not recover damages in real actions, he recovers the land itself.”

Mr. King. “I find gentlemen are very uneasy, I will trouble you no further.”

Members. “Go on, go on.”

Mr. King. “I agree the determining the right of election belongs to the House of Commons; and they ought to apply to the House of Commons in that case: and I shall not depart from that, I think I cannot, without ruining the constitution; but that which I say is, that this action does not at all relate to the right of election. This action is brought by a man that hath an undoubted right of voting, against an officer for maliciously refusing his vote. Put the case this had happened in a county, (for the law would have been the same) that a freeholder, who had a right to vote, had tendered his vote to the sheriff; and though he knew he was a freeholder, yet, the sheriff should maliciously refuse his vote: hath the sheriff done this man an injury, or no? This man does not bring his action, because the person he would have voted for is not returned, but it is because there is an injury done to his franchise. If I thought the right of election was concerned in this case, I would go as far as any, for I think that does belong to the House, but I do not think this is concerned in the present case.”

Sir Thomas Littleton. “I shall be shorter than some imagine. It has been discoursed, whether this be a privilege, or a burden, &c. Let them think it a burden that call it so: if it be a burden it is such a burden as some men spend a great part of their estate for, as if it was a privilege. I think this resolution which is proposed, tends to the encouraging one man to injure another man’s franchise without any reparation, which I believe is not very consistent with law or reason. You have no doubt a power of punishing the offenders, but you cannot give damages: I think this is a plain case; here was a man who had a right to vote, and was not admitted.”

Members. “No, no.”

Sir Thomas Littleton. “That is admitted upon the judgment: for the case is made upon the right; and if he had not proved his right, he could not have recovered: then if he was denied his right, no body will say, we can give him damages. What would you have a poor man do, come with a petition, and fee council, and attend the parliament for a month together? The man it seems thought it better to go this way. I think if he had complained, we might have punished the officer; but for damages, he could have them no way but this.—Suppose the judges in Westminster-hall had been of opinion, that this action did lie, and the constables had brought a Writ of Error; what would you have said in a case where a man had been denied his privilege of voting, and the law had given damages, if the Lords had said no, there shall be no action? I think the Lords have done what is right, I think they have relieved the persons injured according to justice; and it does not interfere with your rights, for he founds his actions upon your determination.”

Members. “No, no.”

Mr. Walpole. “Mr. Freeman, I desire to have the question read.”

Accordingly Mr. Freeman in the chair read the question again.

Mr. Serjeant Hooper. "A gentleman that spoke last but one, was pleased to say, that if he thought the right of electing members was any way concerned in this question, he would come heartily into it: I know not what that gentleman means by it; but believe all future elections will depend much upon the determination you make now. If you give the Lords this jurisdiction to take cognizance of matters relating to elections, we must come to them to know whether we have a right to sit here. One gentleman said, he could not tell whether the sitting here was a burden, or a privilege: I believe it is a privilege to some, who by sitting here obtain a good place; but I think as to others, it may be looked upon as a great burden, to come up and spend a great deal of money for the public service; and all the privilege that I know they have, is to protect their estates, and serve their country.—There is no extravagant thing that may be brought into the House of Lords, if you countenance them in the jurisdiction they have now taken upon them. Any action whatsoever, let it belong to any temporal jurisdiction, may be there determined. I will still suppose, notwithstanding what is objected against the judges, that they will do their duty; but Westminster-hall is now no barrier; for whatever is there determined, may be brought by Writ of Error into the House of Lords, and they will determine it as they think fit. In the Case of Soame and Barnardiston, the law was taken to be, that Westminster-hall had not a right to intermeddle in these matters. What then hath since altered the law, unless the Lords have the legislative power in them? And that I dare say they will have, if you allow this.—This I must take notice of from the report now before you, that here is a step made, which if it had been made in another jurisdiction, I should have given a hard name to it.—I think, in the first place the party should be brought in by the queen's process. When errors are to be assigned, there uses to go out a Scire Facias, which is the queen's Writ; but here is only a Order made, and for what? That the party shall join issue upon the Writ of Error. Suppose there had been a release of errors, must he have joined issue upon the errors? And yet it is here so ordered before the party is heard. I say, if they have a jurisdiction, the party ought to be called in by Scire Facias: and no judge, or judicature, can grant execution, or process, but it must be in the queen's name. As for your question, I come heartily into it."

Sir William Strickland. "Mr. Freeman, I think this question depends upon two parts, and I believe it the best way to divide your question; one part of it concerns the rights and liberties of this House, and I think every body will come up to it: and as I would not lessen the privileges that belong to the House of Commons, so I would not lessen any privilege of the Commons of England, whom we here represent. As one are the privileges of this house, so the other concerns the liberties of the people of England, who cannot otherwise come to a remedy when they are abused in this manner. The gentleman that called it a hard service, if he would tell his country so, I believe he might be excused, and they would send another in his room."

Mr. Walpole, (afterwards Sir Robert, and Chancellor of the Exchequer.) "I will trouble you very little at this time: I think the point of learning and law hath been so well spoken to, by those learned gentlemen that have been against the question, that, if I was able, I should say nothing more to that. But I think the question as it is going to be put, is not right; for as the question stands, though I can't give my negative to one part, I think 'tis impossible to give my affirmative to the other. The matter before you comes to this single question, whether you will encourage, and give a power to an officer, be he whom he will, to act arbitrarily; or rather chuse, in such case, to do something in favour of the electors? I am sure if I desire to be elected by those that had the right, I would never give the officer an authority to the prejudice of the electors. Where you come to say, that the sole judging of the qualification of the electors belongs to the House of Commons only, those I apprehend, are words of too large extent and ill consequence. Suppose there was an action brought upon the last act of parliament, for a false or double return."

Mr. Freeman. "There is an exception in the question as to that."

Mr. Walpole. "I know there is; but suppose an action is brought upon that statute, the officer may have proceeded with the greatest impartiality, may have taken the poll with the greatest exactness and justice, and there may appear to be an equal number of votes for each candidate; whereupon he makes a double return, and this brings it to be determined by the committee of elections, and they vote one of them duly elected. This gentleman that had the favour of the committee, (though afterwards possibly it might be made appear, that by bribery or corruption, and at a great expence, he procured himself to be elected,) after you have voted him duly elected, he hath nothing to do but to try his action, and see if he can make his double damages amount to his expences. The first thing he is to do is to produce the vote of the House of Commons, that declared him duly elected, contrary, perhaps, to the last determination in parliament, which in every place is to be the guide to the returning officer. But shall there then be given in evidence no qualification of the electors? Nothing to prove that the persons admitted to vote were qualified according to such last determination? Or shall that vote of the House of Commons, that was intended only to bring him into the House, recover him 5 or 600*l.* damages? I take it to be so as the law stands. Now it ought to be seen who hath the greater number of legal votes, and whether duly qualified; and in that case you must suffer the matter again to be tried by the court, and you do, in some measure, make them judges of the qualifications of the electors; if it were otherwise, they could not inquire into the majority of legal votes.—What happens in the case of a mayor, or, may be in the case of a sheriff: If a mayor or a constable may deny a man his vote that hath an uncontroverted right in a corporation, a sheriff may refuse a freeholder, and strike off enough to make a majority for whom he pleases. You had once the case before you, whether a sheriff could refuse a scrutiny, and one or two gentlemen would have given that power to a sheriff; but a learned gentleman thought it a dangerous question, and he desired to come to the merits of the election; and that was determined, and you voted the worthy member duly elected, and thought it a dangerous thing to determine whether the officer had that power one way or another? I think that part of the question, which concerns the qualifications of the electors, ought to be left out.”

Mr. Freeman. “I will read the question,” (which he did.)

Marquis of Hartington. “Sir, I think it is a constant rule, where a question is complicated, it is the right of every member, if he desire it, to have the question divided, and I think it regular to do it by an amendment; and therefore I second that worthy gentleman, that you would leave out those words that relate to the qualification of the electors.”

Mr. Solicitor General. “My Lord is undoubtedly right in what he desires; that if there be any words in the question to which gentlemen have a dislike, that question is not to be put; but, only whether those words shall stand part of the question: Therefore if those words of the qualification of the electors do give offence, it must be put, Whether they shall stand part of the question? But I hope at the same time gentlemen will apprehend, that leaving out those words, leaves out all you debated on.”

Sir Christopher Musgrave. “No doubt, if any question is complicated, gentlemen do not know how to give an affirmative or a negative, and you must divide it: But I hope gentlemen will consider the latter part of the question is the main thing whereon you have debated; for, if you do not assert that you have the power of determining the qualifications of the electors, you give up the right of the Commons of England: I do agree that the question may be divided.”

Mr. Freeman. “That which is debated now, is, Whether these words shall stand part of the question?”

Sir Thomas Meres. “Sir, I think the question ought to be divided.”

Mr. Freeman. “The question, as I have upon my Paper, is this:

“That according to the known law and usage of parliament, neither the qualification of an elector, or the right of any person elected, cognizable or determinable elsewhere than before the Commons of England in parliament assembled, except in such cases as are specially provided for by act of parliament.”

“But some gentlemen are for leaving out the words, [“Neither the qualification of an elector, or,”] So that I must put a question: Whether these words shall stand part of the question?” (Members. Aye, aye.)

Then Mr. Freeman put the Question, and the Committee divided.

Teller for the Ayes, Mr. Gulston, - - - 2

Teller for the Noes, Mr. Wythe, - - - 1

So it was carried, that those words should stand part of the question.

And the main Question being put,

Resolutions of the Commons on the Case Resolved, 2. “That according to the known law and usage of parliament, neither the qualification of any elector, or the right of any person elected, is cognizable or determinable elsewhere than before the Commons of England in parliament assembled, except in such cases as are specially provided for by act of parliament

Resolved, 3. “That the examining and determining the qualification or right of an elector, or any person elected to serve in parliament, in any court of law, or elsewhere than before the Commons of England in parliament assembled, except in such cases as are specially provided for by act of parliament, will expose all mayors, bailiffs, and other officers, who are obliged to take the poll, and make a return thereupon, to multiplicity of actions, vexatious suits, and unsupportable expences, and will subject them to different and independent judgments, and inconsistent determinations in the same case, without relief.”

Resolved, 4. “That Matthew Ashby having in contempt of the jurisdiction of this House commenced and prosecuted an action at common law against William White, and others the constables of Aylesbury, for not receiving his Vote at an election of burgesses to serve in parliament for the said borough of Aylesbury, is guilty of a breach of the privilege of this House.”

Resolved, 5. “That whoever shall presume to commence or prosecute any action, indictment, or information at common-law, which shall bring the right of electors, or persons elected to serve in parliament, to the determination of any other jurisdiction than that of the House of Commons, except in cases specially provided for by act of parliament, such person and persons, and all attorneys, solicitors, counsellors, serjeants at law, soliciting, prosecuting, or pleading in any such case, are guilty of a high breach of the privilege of this House.”

Ordered, “That the said Resolutions be fixed up on Westminster-Hall Gate, signed by the clerk."

These Resolutions, with this (to wit, Resolved, 1. "That according to the known laws and usage of parliament, it is the sole right of the Commons of England in parliament assembled, except in cases otherwise provided for by act of parliament, to examine and determine all matters relating to the right of elections of their own members,)" before passed in the Committee, were reported to the House.

Debate thereon.] January 26, 1704. Mr. Freeman reported the five Resolutions agreed to by the Committee, the first Resolution was not opposed, but after the second Resolution (viz.) "That according to the known law and usage of parliament, neither the qualification of any elector, or the right of any person elected, is cognizable or determinable elsewhere than before the Commons of England in parliament assembled, except in such cases as are specially provided for by act of parliament)

Was read the second time by the clerk, the question (according to order) being proposed to agree with the Committee in that Resolution, the marquis of Harrington stood up in his place, and spoke to this effect :

Marquis of Harrington. I do not expect the House will be of a different opinion from the Committee; but I think it is my duty, when I apprehend what you are doing will be of ill consequence to the constitution, to give my dissent in every step. I think it will be dangerous to the very being of this House: If the maxim had been allowed formerly, I think there would have been no need of taking away charters, and of quo warranto's; by the influence of officers they might have filled the House with what members they had pleased, and then they could have voted themselves duly elected.

Sir William Strickland. Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree to this Resolution; I think it denies the people of England of their birth-right: For they who have freeholds in any of the counties, or freedoms in any corporation, have as much right to vote in elections to parliament, as they have to their estates. And if any gentleman would subject them to such arbitrary proceedings, that a sheriff, or any other officer, may deny them this privilege, give me liberty to say, I must be always against any such thing; for though you can punish the elector, you cannot give any satisfaction to him that receives the injury.

Mr. St. John. Sir, I do not rise up to trouble you long, but to speak to one point that was mentioned by a noble lord over the way. I shall be as tender as any man alive of doing any thing against the liberty of the people; but I am for this, because I take it to be the greatest security for their liberty. The noble lord was pleased to take notice, that in the consequence the crown would have a great influence on those that are to return the members of the House of Commons; and when they were in, they might vote for one another. I cannot think that the liberties of the people of England are safer in any hands below, or that the influence of the crown will be stronger here than in other courts.

Marquis of Harrington. I think that gentleman hath not answered what I said. I shall never have any suspicion of any that sit in this house now; but when those that have no right are returned, and make a majority, I think it will not be safe.

Mr. Ward. I do not apprehend that consequence from this Resolution, I think if it was so, this should have been offered before the first Resolution was passed, which hath passed in the House and Committee, nemine contradicente; for you cannot determine the right of any members sitting here without determining the right of the electors.

Mr. Lowndes. I cannot but think it will be harder to influence this House to get an ill vote; than it will be in another place: However, if I am a freeholder, and have a right to vote in a county, or a freeman, and have a right to vote in a borough, by admitting persons to vote that have no right, it may be as much prejudice to me, for that may make my vote signify nothing: And there is as much injury one way as the other. If all the people of England who have a vote, should go together by the ears in Westminster-hall and dispute there who has a right vote, and who not, I believe the judges of the common-law and noble peers of the other House, would be glad, in a little time, to restore the right where it is, it would breed so much confusion. If gentlemen are not satisfied already, they may easily be so, That there is no defect of power in this House, but they have a power to do justice in all cases of elections, and I hope every body will take care not only to maintain the rights of the people that sent them hither, but the trust lodged in them, which they cannot depart from by the rules of justice.

Then the second, with the other three Resolutions passed in the Committee, was agreed to by the House without a division, with this amendment only, of leaving out [at common-law] in the fifth Resolution.

But the House, though they voted Ashby guilty of a breach of privilege, in commencing and prosecuting the said action, yet there having been no declaration of the House in that case before, they made no order for taking him into custody, as usual in cases of breach of privilege.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.] Upon these Proceedings of the House of Commons, the House of Lords appointed a Committee, who drew up The State of the Case upon the Writ of Error in their House; which is as followeth:

The REPORT of the Lords Committees appointed to draw up the State of the Case upon the Writ of Error, lately depending in the House of Peers; wherein Matthew Ashby was plaintiff, and William White, and others, defendants. With the Resolutions of the House of Peers, relating thereunto*.

ASHBY against WHITE, & al' †.

The Plaintiff in this action declares, That the 26th of December, in the 12th year of King William the 3rd, a writ issued out of Chancery, directed to the sheriff of Bucks, reciting, That the king had ordered a parliament to be held at Westminster, on the 6th of February following: The writ commanded the sheriff to cause to be elected for the county two knights, for every city two citizens: and for every borough, two burgesses; which writ was delivered to the sheriff, who made a precept in writing under the seal of his office, directed to the constables of the borough of Aylesbury, commanding them to cause two burgesses of the said borough to be elected, &c. which precept was delivered to the defendants, to whom it did belong to execute the same. By virtue of which writ and precept, the burgesses of the borough, being summoned, did assemble before the defendants to elect two burgesses; and they being so assembled, in order to make such election, the plaintiff being then a burges, and inhabitant of that borough, being duly qualified to give his vote at that election, was there ready, and offered his vote to the defendants for the choice of sir Thomas Lee, bart. and Simon Mayne, esq. and the defendants were then required to receive and admit of his vote.

The defendants being not ignorant of the premises, but contriving, and fraudulently and maliciously intended to damnify the plaintiff, and to defeat him of that his privilege, did hinder him from giving his vote: so that the two burgesses were elected without any vote given by the plaintiff, to his damage, &c. upon not guilty pleaded, the case went down to trial, and a verdict was given for the plaintiff, and five pounds damages and also costs.

It was moved in the court of King's-bench in arrest of judgment, that this action did not lie, and that point was argued by counsel, and afterwards by the Court.

* 27 Martij, 1704. "It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the Report made from the Lords committees appointed to draw up the State of the Case upon the Writ of Error, lately depending in this House; wherein Matthew Ashby was plaintiff, and William White, and others, defendants, and the Resolutions made this day relating thereunto, shall be forthwith printed and published. Matth. Johnson, Cleric. Parliament."

† Salkeld's Reports, fol. 19, in Case.

The Lord Chief Justice Holt was of opinion, that judgment in this case ought to be given for the plaintiff; but Mr. Justice Powel, Mr. Justice Powis, and Mr. Justice Gold being of a different opinion, judgment was entered for the defendant; Whereupon the plaintiff brought a Writ of Error in parliament; and the cause being argued at the bar of the House of Lords by counsel, and ten of the judges, who were present in the House, being heard, and the matter fully debated by the Lords, * the House

* The Case of William White, Richard Talboys, William Bell, and Richard Heydon, constables of the town of Aylesbury, in the county of Bucks, in the year 1700. In a Writ of Error brought in the House of Lords by Matthew Ashby, upon a Judgment given for the constables against him in the court of Queen's-Bench, last Michaelmas Term, as drawn up by their counsel, and presented to the House.

The Plaintiff, Ashby, being a poor, indigent person, and coming to settle in Aylesbury, the overseers of the poor there warned him out of the parish unless he would give security to save the parish harmless; and to the purpose complained to the next justices of the peace, to get an order to remove him: Whilst this matter was in controversy, the election for burgesses of parliament came on, and the said Ashby offering himself to be polled, the constable, (now the defendants) refused to receive him to poll, being, in their opinions, no settled inhabitant there, nor did he ever contribute to the church or poor, either before or since the election. After the election was over, the said Ashby brought his action on the case against the constables, wherein he sets forth, that he had right to vote for burgesses there, and that at that election he offered to poll for sir Thomas Lee, and Mr. Mayne, and that the constables refused to receive his poll, to his damage of 200l.

The constables pleaded Not Guilty, and thereupon a trial was had at the assizes at Bucks, and Ashby got a verdict against them, and had 5l. damages given.

Whereupon, according to the constant course of that, and all other courts, it was moved in arrest of judgment in the Queen's-Bench, where the action was brought; that notwithstanding the verdict, which only found the fact, yet no such action did by law lie against the defendants; and after several arguments at the bar, and at last at the Bench, three judges, against the Chief-Justice, held, that the action did not lie, and so judgment was given for the constables.

And now the plaintiff, Ashby, hath brought a Writ of Error in parliament.

The defendants conceive the judgment in the Queen's-Bench well warranted by law.

1. No such action hath ever been brought, notwithstanding the many elections that have been controverted every new parliament; whereby it is evident, that it hath been the was of opinion, that the judgment given in the King's Bench was erroneous, and that the plaintiff had a good cause of action, and ought to have judgment.

To maintain this opinion, these three positions were laid down:

I. The plaintiff, as a burghess of this borough, had a legal right to give his vote for the election of parliament burghesses.

II. That, as a necessary consequence thereof, and an incident inseparable to that right, he must have a remedy to assert and maintain it.

III. That is the proper remedy which the plaintiff hath pursued, being supported by the grounds and principles of the ancient common law of England.

To make good the first position, that the plaintiff has a legal right to give his vote at the election of burghesses for this borough, it was said, that it is well known, the House of Commons consists of knights, citizens, and burghesses.

The knights of shires represent all the freeholders of the counties. Anciently, every the least freeholder had as much right to give his constant opinion of all lawyers, and others, in all ages, that such action would not lie.

2. Several acts of parliament have been made to give remedy by actions in Westminster-hall, in some particular cases of elections to parliament, which shew there was no remedy at common law in those courts.

3. There never were but three actions upon the case brought by Candidates for false returns, viz. Nevill's case in the late times, and Sir Samuel Barnardiston's case, and Onslow's case in the time of king Charles 2, in all which cases the defendants prevailed upon the point of law, viz. that such action would not lie. And if such action doth not lie for one elected, much less will it lie for an elector.

4. To support every action upon the case, there must be damage, in presenti, or a possibility of damage in futuro, which there cannot be in this case, unless it be presumed, that, contrary to act of parliament, the plaintiff was to have money for his vote.

5. If there was Damnum, (which there is not; yet it cannot be pretended there was injuria; and 'damnum absque injuria,' is not sufficient to support an action upon the case. As at the common law; if the lawful patron presented his clerk to the bishop and he refused to admit him, it is conceived, no action upon the case lay against the bishop, but a quære impedit, in which, at common law, no damages were given, which is a much stronger case than this.

6. This is not to be compared to other cases, where the party hath no remedy elsewhere than in Westminster-hall; for here the plaintiff hath a proper remedy by applying to the House of Commons; although the election is not contested by the candidates, and parliamentary causes are to be determined in parliament: And therefore,

7. It is conceived, that, since this matter concerns the election of members to serve in parliament, the courts of Westminster-hall being not empowered by an act of parliament in this case, have no cognizance in it, but the House of Commons have the determination of it: And this jurisdiction is confirmed to them by parliament; for by the act 7 and 8 Will. 3, cap. 7. If any person shall return a member to serve in parliament, contrary to the last determination in the House of Commons, of the right of election, in such place the return shall be adjudged a false return; by which it is evident, that the Commons are the only judges in all matters where the right of election may come in question, as it must of necessity do, in all cases where the question is, who are the electors.

The second and third sort of men, which compose the great representation of the people of England, are citizens and burghesses, who, though they differ in name, yet are in essence and substance the same, for every city is a borough, and, as such, sends members to parliament.

There are two sorts of boroughs, the one more antient, the other more modern.

mentary causes are to be determined in parliament: And therefore,

7. It is conceived, that, since this matter concerns the election of members to serve in parliament, the courts of Westminster-hall being not empowered by an act of parliament in this case, have no cognizance in it, but the House of Commons have the determination of it: And this jurisdiction is confirmed to them by parliament; for by the act 7 and 8 Will. 3, cap. 7. If any person shall return a member to serve in parliament, contrary to the last determination in the House of Commons, of the right of election, in such place the return shall be adjudged a false return; by which it is evident, that the Commons are the only judges in all matters where the right of election may come in question, as it must of necessity do, in all cases where the question is, who are the electors.

8. If this action should prevail, the chief magistrates, in all places where the elections are made, would be in a miserable condition upon every new parliament, by reason of a multitude of actions, which probably would be brought against them upon all contested elections, and by the different judgments that possibly may be given in the House of Commons, and in Westminster-hall, touching the same election.

9. The laying it to be done falso et malitiose (which are grown to be almost words of course in actions on the case) cannot give a jurisdiction where it was not before, and, if those words shall be sufficient, by being annexed to a man's intention, almost all a man's actions may brought into Westminster-hall by those words, and subjected to the power of a jury.

T. POWELL; CON. PAPER.

Of the first sort are the most antient towns of England, whose lands are held in burgage, and by reason thereof had the right and privilege annexed to their estates, of sending burgesses to parliament. The second sort are those cities and boroughs that have a right by prescription, time immemorial, or by charter, within time of memory, to chuse burgesses for parliament: both these are upon several foundations, the one as belonging to their burgages, the other as belonging to their corporations; the first is a real right belonging to their houses and lands, the other is a personal right belonging to their body-politic.

As for the first, it is sufficiently described in Littleton's Tenures, Sect. 162, 163, 164. A tenure in burgage is a tenure in socage, and is called a tenure in burgage, because these are the most antient towns in England, and from thence came the burgesses to parliament, and they who have this privilege, have it as belonging to their estates or possessions.

The other right of chusing parliament burgesses, is not annexed to any freehold or estate in possession, but vested in the corporation of the place, and is created in this manner, viz.

When a town was incorporated, a grant was either then, or after, made to the body politic, that they shall have two burgesses for parliament, to be chosen either by all the freemen and inhabitants of the place, or such a selected number as is prescribed by the charter.

The inheritance of this privilege is in the whole corporation aggregate, but the benefit, possession, and exercise is in the persons of those, who by the constitutions of those charters, are appointed to elect.

And in all cases, where a corporation hath such a privilege, the members thereof, in their private capacity, have the benefit and enjoyment thereof, because, the corporation, as such, is not to be represented: For it is not necessary that it should have any estate, but by being a corporation, they have only a capacity to have estates. Jones 165. Hyward and Fulcher. For as the citizens and freemen of a place are incorporated for the better government of those of the place, so is this privilege of having burgesses given for the advantage of the particular members thereof, whose estates are to be bound by the acts of their representatives.

And therefore the wages of citizens and burgesses were always levied, not upon the estates or goods of the corporation, but upon the goods and estates of the members thereof.*

It appears by other instances, that it is usual and proper for corporations to have interests granted to them, which ensure to the advantage of the members in their private capacities. Moore 832. Sir Thomas Waller versus Hanger. The king granted to the mayor and citizens of London, that no prisage be paid for wines of the citizens and freemen of London. This ensures to the benefit of every citizen and freeman of London for his own wines, in which the corporation of the city hath no interest.

But there is no such notion in the law of England, as a right without a remedy.

The same thing appears by the Case of Waller and Spateman, 1 Saund. 343. and by a Case of Meller and Walker. These instances make it sufficiently appear, that though the inheritance of this franchise be in the body corporate, yet it is for the benefit of the particular members thereof: And it is certainly a great advantage for the men or inhabitants of a place to chuse persons to represent them in parliament, who thereby will have an opportunity, and be under an obligation to represent their grievances, and advance their profit.

Of this opinion have two parliaments been, as appears by two several acts, the one 34 and 35 H. 8, cap. 13, the other 25 Car. 2, cap. 9. The first is an act for making knights and burgesses within the county and city of Chester, which begins in this manner, In humble wise shew to your majesty, the inhabitants of your grace's county Palatine of Chester, that they being excluded and separated from your high court of parliament, to have any burgesses within the said Court, by reason whereof, the inhabitants have hitherto sustained manifold losses, and damages, as well in their lands as goods and bodies: Therefore it was enacted, that they should have knights for the county, and citizens for the city of Chester: The other act, which constitutes knights and burgesses for the county Palatine, and city of Durham, recites, that the inhabitants thereof hitherto had not the liberty and privilege of electing and sending knights and burgesses to the High Court of Parliament.

The application of these two acts is very plain; the first saith, to be excluded from sending knights and burgesses to parliament, is a damage to lands, goods, and body; the other saith, that it is a liberty and privilege to send them.

This the right of election is explained, and shewed to be a legal right.

That of electing knights of shires, belonging to and inherent in the freehold.

The other, of electing burgesses, belongs in some cities and towns to the real estates of the inhabitants; and in others, is vested in the corporation, for the benefit of the particular members, who are the electors; the having of which is a great benefit and advantage to the people thereof, and will prevent great loss and damage that otherwise would ensue.

II. It follows, that in consequence of this right or privilege, the possessors thereof must have a legal remedy to assert and maintain it.

It was said, that there are many rights for which a man has no remedy by the common law, as in case of a legacy given, if it be not paid, the party cannot bring an action for it. This is very true, but not applicable to the present purpose; for the constitution of the Eng-

Each government has wisely distributed to several courts, the determination of proper causes, but has left no subject, in any case where he is injured, without an adequate remedy, if he will go to the right place for it; if a man will seek for a remedy at common law, for a legacy, which by our constitution is to be recovered in the Ecclesiastical Court, it is his own fault if he do not recover; as it would be, if he should begin a suit for land in the Court of Admiralty, or go for equity to the Common Pleas.

He who loses or quits his remedy, loses his right: if a man has a bond for payment of 1,000*l.* he has no remedy to recover this money but by action: therefore, if he releases all actions, he loses right to the money, because he has given away the means to recover it. Coke's 6th Rep. 58, Bredman's Case. If a man purchases an advowson, and at the next avoidance suffers an usurpation, and brings not the quare impedit in time, he hath lost all manner of remedy, and in consequence his right, to which neither he nor his heirs can ever be restored. Would it not look very strange in a constitution so formed, that the Commons of England have an undoubted share in the legislative authority, which is to be exercised by their representatives chosen by themselves, in which every freeholder of 40*s.* per ann. hath a right to vote for the county, every citizen for a city, and every burgess for a borough: that, if the sheriff, or other officer, who is to cause the election to be duly made, shall hinder or deprive any of those electors of his right, the person injured shall have no remedy, though the injury be done to such a right, upon the security whereof the lives, liberty, and property of all the people of England so much depend.

That the defendants, in this case, by hindering the plaintiff from voting, have done ill, cannot be denied; because they have excluded one who has a right from his vote. Then, if the law doth not allow an action to the party injured, it tolerates the injury, which is absurd to say is tolerable in any government.

There was much weight laid upon the case of Ford and Hoskins, 2 Cro. 368, Mo. 142, which is, that where, by the custom of the manor, every tenant for life might name his successor for his life, whom the lord is to admit; if one be named, and the lord refuses to admit him, it was held, an action on this case would not lie; because the nominee had no right without being admitted. But the reason given for that opinion shews it has no relation to this case, for the plaintiff's right of voting is vested in him, without any previous admittance, therefore though it should be law, that no action will lie for not giving a right, yet certainly an action must lie, for defrauding and hindering a man to enjoy a right that he hath.

When any statute requires an act to be done for the benefit of another, or to forbear the doing of an act, which may be to his injury, though no action be given in express terms by that statute, for the omission or commission, the general rule of law, in all such cases, is, that the party injured shall have an action, Coke 10 Rep. 75. The Case of the Marshalsea, 12 Rep. 100, Co. Mag. Car. 118. This is a maxim allowed and approved of in all ages.

There is the same reason where the common law gives a right, or prohibits doing a wrong: but in this case an act of Parliament is not wanting, for the statute of West. 1. c. 5, enacts, That elections shall be free; if he who hath a right to vote be hindered by him who is to take his vote, or to manage the election, that election is not free, such an impediment is a manifest violation of that statute, as well as an injury to the party whose vote is refused. This statute of West. 1, shews what opinion the king and parliament had, of the great consequence it was to the whole realm, that people should have their freedom in choice; and though the common law was the same before, as appears even by the statute itself, the words whereof are, Elections ought to be free; yet it was judged necessary to add the sanction of an act of parliament thereunto; the king commandeth, upon great forfeiture, that no great man, or other, by force of arms, or by malice, or menaces, shall disturb any to make free election. The defendants did not, by force of arms, drive the plaintiff away from the election, nor by menaces deter him, but they did maliciously hinder him (so it is charged by the plaintiff in the Declaration, and it is found by the jury to be done by fraud and malice) and so the defendants are offenders within the very words of the statute of West. 1. Where the law is so clear as to the right, and the duty so strictly enjoined by act of parliament to be observed, it seems a great presumption to make it but a light thing.

It being apparent that the plaintiff had a right, and that the defendants have done him wrong, and that by consequence of law he must have some remedy to vindicate his right, and to repair the wrong.

III. The third thing to be shewn is, that the remedy the plaintiff pursued by bringing this action, is the proper remedy allowed by the ancient law of England.

This action is that which is called in the law, an action upon the case; that is, founded upon the particular case of the party injured.

The law, in all cases of wrong and injury, hath provided proper and adequate remedies.

1. When a man is injured in his person, by being beaten or wounded, the law gives him an action of trespass, assault and battery; if by being imprisoned, an action of false imprisonment.

2. If his goods be taken away, or trespass done unto his house or lands, an action of trespass lies to repair him in damages.

3. If a man hath a franchise, and is hindered in the enjoyment thereof, the proper remedy is an action upon the case.

The plaintiff, in this case, hath a privilege and a franchise, and the defendants have disturbed him in the enjoyment thereof, in the most essential part, which is the right of voting.

4. Where any officer or minister of justice, entrusted with the execution of the process of law, does an injury, an action of the case lies against him. If the sheriff will not execute a writ by arresting the party-defendant, or taking his goods, the plaintiff shall have his action upon the case, because he refused to do his duty, to the plaintiff's damage.

The precept which the defendants received from the sheriff in this case, was founded upon the king's writ: and the defendants are commanded, to cause two burgesses to be elected for the borough of Aylesbury, of which they are to give notice, and to admit every one who hath a vote to make use of it; if they refuse any man to vote who hath a right, they act contrary to the duty of their office.

It was objected, that it did not appear that the persons for whom the plaintiff voted, were elected, nor that they would have been elected if his vote had been admitted.

The Answer is, that it is not material whether the person for whom the plaintiff voted was chosen, if his vote had been taken; his right and privilege is to give his suffrage, to be a party in the election; if he be excluded from it he is wronged, though the persons for whom he would have given his vote were elected.

The right of action must accrue upon the refusal of the vote, and is never to be made better or worse by the return, which is a matter ex post facto.

It was said in the arguing this case, that the plaintiff had no damage; or at least, that there was no such injury or damage done to him as would support an action.

The Answer to that is, that the law will never imagine any such thing as injuria sine damno. Every injury imports damage in the nature of it. If a man pick a lock, and come into an house without the consent of the owner, perhaps there is no pecuniary damage done to the value of a farthing; yet the owner shall have an action against him, and recover damages for the invasion of his possession and property. There are many cases of the same nature, which have been determined upon this ground. In the case between Starling and Turner, 24 Car. 2. in con. ban. (see Ventris first part, page 306.) and afterwards in ban. reg. The plaintiff Turner, amongst others stood to be one of the Bridge-Masters of London Bridge, which officer is to be elected by a common hall of the city of London: the question was, who had the greatest number of voices? the plaintiff demanded the poll; and the defendant, being then Lord-Mayor of London, refused it: it was adjudged, that the action was maintainable for refusing the poll; because every candidate has a right to have; and though perhaps if the poll had been granted to the plaintiff in that action, it might have been against him, yet the denial of that right was a good ground of action. Upon the same reason, the case 29 Ed. 3. 18. was determined; and also the case of Hunt and Downman, 3 Car. 487. 2 Rolls 21.

It is apparent by what has been said, that the plaintiff in this present case hath been injured, in being denied his right; and no good reason can be assigned that so affects this case, as to make it differ from other cases; though to that purpose several matters were urged and insisted upon. As first, that this would be the occasion of many actions.

If that be so, there is the greater reason to support this action, to punish the many wrongs that have been done, which will prevent any more of the like nature. If offences multiply, remedies against them ought to be advanced. If other officers of boroughs have been, or shall be guilty of the like misfeasances, as these defendants have been, it is fit they should be liable, as these defendants are, to make satisfaction. If one man be beat and imprisoned, is it any objection against his having an action, because all others who shall be as ill treated as he hath been, shall have the like remedies? The only means to hinder corruptions, that will soon become frequent among those officers of boroughs and corporations, is, to let them see that they are obnoxious to the law, and that their purses must make satisfaction to all whom they shall injure in this manner. It is true, if one act which tends to the injury of many persons be committed, no one person injured shall be allowed to have an action, because the rest might have the same. Co. 5. Rep. 72. William's case, 3 Cr. 664. Pineux ver' Hovenden; as the case of not saying divine service in a chapel of a minor, to the lord and tenants; or for stopping of a lane or common way, because the defendant, for one act, would have a multitude of suits against him, the injury alike affecting a multitude: but the refusal of every vote is a distinct act: the party grieved, whose vote was denied, can only bring an action for the refusal; the others whose votes were admitted are not concerned. And if an officer denies an hundred, who have a right, these are a hundred several wrongs, for which he ought to be liable to as many several actions. As if a man will make it his business to sling stones, and shall hit a hundred several men, he must make satisfaction to them all: but surely this is so far from being an objection, that it is a strong argument to support the action: for if the mayor or bailiff of a borough shall have liberty to refuse men who have votes, he can easily make a majority to vote on his side; and then, what will become of elections? the officer will return him that is elected by a majority of his own making, by excluding the votes of others that have right.

This would encourage officers to be partial and corrupt, and to return divers persons elected in that manner, who at least must have possession of seats in the House of Commons for some time, and give voices in the making laws, and imposing of taxes, until the right of election be deter-

And though, upon hearing the cause in the House of Commons, this matter may be set right at last; yet, what can compensate for the mischief that may be done to the kingdom in the mean time, by the votes of those who shall be particularly returned, and are not the representatives of the people of the place who are to chuse them.

Besides, the before-mentioned rules against multiplying actions, is confined to such acts where there is another remedy to be had; but where there is no other remedy but an action, the wrong doer must answer to so many several actions as there are persons injured. Suppose a man will plough up the ground in which a hundred persons have a common, he must answer all their actions. If the inhabitants of a town have a common watering place, and a stranger stops the current, whereby the water is diverted, every inhabitant shall have his action, because there is no other remedy.

The injured plaintiff, in this case, has no other remedy besides this action; no indictment lies, because it is a personal wrong to the party, and not wrong to the public, but only in the consequence of it, as an evil example, which leads to the encouragement of other such officers to commit the like transgressions; nor is there any danger to an honest officer, that means to do his duty; for where there is a real doubt touching the parties' right of voting, and the officer makes use of the best means to be informed; and it is plain his mistake arose from the difficulty of the case, and not from any malicious or partial design, no jury will find an officer guilty in such a case, nor can any court direct them to do it; for it is the fraud and the malice that entitles the party to the action: In this case, the defendants knew the plaintiff to be a burgess, and yet fraudulently and maliciously hindered him from his right of voting; and justice must require, that such an obstinate and unjust ministerial officer should not escape without indemnity.

That the officer is only ministerial in this case, and not a judge, nor acting in a judicial capacity, is most plain; his business is only to execute the precept, to assemble the electors to vote the election, by receiving their votes, computing their numbers, declaring the election, and returning the persons elected: the sheriff or other officer of a borough, is put to no difficulty in this case, but what is absolutely necessary in all cases. If an execution be against a man's goods, the sheriff must at his peril take notice what goods a man has.

Another objection was made in respect to the novelty of the action; it was said, never any such action was brought.

In answer to this objection, it may be said, that probably there have been many occasions given for bringing such suits. It is to be hoped, that very few have ever been so presumptuous as to make an obstinate and malicious refusal of an undisputed vote. If the case has happened before, perhaps the party, out of consideration that only small damages were to be expected, might be discouraged, and think it better to acquiesce. And it is probable, the ill-designing officer would be at least so cautious, as to refuse the votes of such persons only, as he thought, by reason of the meanness of their circumstances, were unable to vindicate their right. It is not every one that has such a true English spirit as the plaintiff, who could not sit down mealy under a wrong done to him, in one of the most valuable privileges of an Englishman. It is not the novelty of the action that can be urged against it, if it can be supported by the old grounds and principles of law: the ground of law is plain, certain, and universal, that where any man is injured in his right, by being either hindered in, or deprived of the enjoyment thereof, the law gives him an action to repair himself.

The Case of Hunt and Dowman, which was, 16 Jac. 1. A. D. 1618, of an action by the landlord against the tenant, for hindering him from searching his house to see whether it was in repair, was never brought before that time: and that of Turner and Starling was not brought till 23 Car. 2.

The law of England is not confined to particular precedents and cases, but consists in the reason of them; which is much more extensive than the circumstance of this or that case: 'Ratio legis est anima legis; et ubi eadem ratio, ibi idem jus,' are known maxims.

An action against the master of a ship, for that the ship, lying in the river of Thames, was robbed was maintained upon the same reason as against a common carrier; yet, such an action was never known until 23 Car. 2. in the Case of Moss and Blue. 1 Car. 15. Jones 93. Palmer 313. Smith and Cranshaw; an action of the case was brought for maliciously, and, without any probable cause, indicting the plaintiff of high treason: this was the first action that was ever brought in such a case; and yet it was adjudged maintainable, upon the same reason as upon a malicious indictment of felony, 2 Levinz 250. Heming and Beal; an action of the case was brought against the mayor of a town, for refusing the plaintiff to give his vote at the choice of a new mayor: and there was not any scruple made, but that the action did well lie, though that was the first precedent.

It is granted, that if a freeman, who hath a right to give his vote for the choice of a mayor be denied his vote, he may maintain an action upon the case.

There can be no difference between that case and this, unless it can be supposed that the right to vote at the election of a mayor is of a higher estimation in the eye of the law, than a right to chuse members to serve in the high court of parliament.

This action is not only founded upon the reason of the common law, but it hath the sanction of an act of parliament, viz. The statute of West. 2, cap. 24. Which says, that whosoever, from thenceforth, it shall fortune in chancery, that in one case a writ is found; and in a like case falling under like right and wanting like remedy, none is found, the clerks of the chancery shall agree in making a writ, and by consent of men learned in the law, a writ shall be made, lest it should happen hereafter, that the king's court might fail in ministring justice to complainants.

The objection most insisted on was, that this is a matter relating to parliaments, and ought to be determined by the law and custom of parliaments, and for that reason is not cognizable in the Queen's courts.

In answer to this objection, it was shewed, first, that this case is proper in the nature of it, to be determined in the Queen's court.

2. There is no other provision made for the plaintiff, who is highly injured in his right, but by bringing his action in the courts of law, that have power to determine of men's lives, liberties and properties.

First, the case in the nature of it is proper for the Queen's courts. This will be apparent, if the several rights of electing members to serve in the House of Commons be considered.

The right of chusing knights of the shire is founded upon the electors freehold. Matters of freehold are determinable originally and primarily in the Queen's court, by the rules and methods of the common law, by a jury sworn, and by the evidence of witnesses upon oath: and, as the right of the freehold is determinable there, so are all benefits, rights and advantages depending thereupon, or belonging thereto.

If a freeholder's voice be refused by a sheriff, what is it should hinder the Queen's court from trying and determining this matter, like all other questions of freehold, by a jury, upon the oaths of witnesses, or evidence in writing, whether the plaintiff that supposes himself wronged was a freeholder, or not?

The right of chusing citizens and burgesses depends either upon prescription or custom, or upon letters patents; these are also primarily and originally cognizable by the Queen's courts: customs and prescriptions are triable by the country, that is, by a jury of twelve men of that country, where the custom is alleged to be: this is a known law in all cases, without exception.

And, as to letters-patents, if pleaded specially, the court must judge of them; and, if either party conceives the court hath judged amiss, he hath his remedy by Writ of Error, till at last it comes where it will receive a final judgment. So that every right which an elector can have, is proper for the determination of the Queen's Court. There are various ways of election in different boroughs, but they all depend upon charters or customs; and therefore are not more difficult to determine, than other franchises or liberties which depend upon the same foundations.

And, whereas it was said, that by a late act of parliament in the 7 and 8 Will. 3, the last determination of the House of Commons concerning the right of elections, is to be pursued; it amounts to no more than this, that the officer who is to make the return is to take care to return him to be elected, who is chosen by a majority of electors, qualified according to the last determination of the House of Commons; if he does so, he incurs no danger he is not liable to an action, but the House of Commons itself is not bound by that return. Now, suppose the officer will deny a man's vote, who, according to the last determination, there, ought to have one; and this the officer did well know, what is it hinders him that he is not right, according to that determination, by bringing his action against the officer who has injured him? It cannot be the act of parliament, for the Queen's courts are by law the first and original expounders of the statutes in this realm.

But, secondly, there is no other court of jurisdiction appointed by the law of England for determining the right, and repairing the injury, but the courts of Westminster.

It is a general rule, that whoever impeach the jurisdiction of one court, must entitle some other court to have a jurisdiction of that cause but that is impossible to be done in this case.

It was said, that the determination of the right of elections of members to serve in parliament, is the proper business of the House of Commons, which they always would be very jealous of; and this jurisdiction of theirs is uncontested, that they exercise a great power in that matter; for they oblige that officer to alter his return according to their judgment, and affirm that they cannot judge of the right of election, without determining the right of the electors; and if electors were at liberty to prosecute suits touching their right of giving voices, in other courts, there might be disagreeing judgments, which would make confusion, and be dishonourable to the House of Commons, and that therefore such an action was a breach of their privilege.

As to these Objections, several Answers were given.

It was admitted, that the House of Commons exercise a jurisdiction, in determining the right of election of their own members, and though the time may be assigned, where that jurisdiction was exercised in another place, yet there has been a usage long enough to hinder that point from being drawn in question, especially after the sanction given to it by the act made in the seventh year of king William's reign.

But though it be true, that the merit of the election of a member, be a proper subject for the House of Commons to judge of, because they only can give the proper and most effectual remedy, by excluding the usurper, and giving possession of the place to him who has the right; yet there is a great difference between the right of the electors, and the right of the elected; the one is a temporary right to sit in parliament, pro hac vice, the other is a freehold, or a franchise: who has a right to sit in the House of Commons may be properly recognizable there; but who has a right to chuse, is a matter originally established, even before there is a parliament: a man has right to his freehold by the common law, and the law having annexed his right of voting to his freehold, it is of the nature of his freehold, and must depend upon it. The same law that gives him his right, must defend it for him, and any other power that will pretend to take away the freehold, upon which it depends.

To say the plaintiff, in this case, may apply to the House of Commons, is not sufficient, unless proved: never any single elector of my county or borough did complain to the House of Commons, that he was debarred of his vote, and desire them to determine his particular right. Sometimes some of those who have right to chuse in a borough have complained, that persons have been returned by the officer, who were not duly elected, as being an injury done to the whole community of the borough, to have a person without right sit there as their representative: but this is only to bring the merits of the election in question, of which that House hath cognizance, and therefore, as incident and necessary thereto they may try the right of electors, which of them, by custom, or letters patents, have the right; but this is no more than all courts may do. In the ecclesiastical courts, which proceed according to the civil law, if the suit be originally proper for their jurisdiction, they have power to determine things foreign thereto, as letters patents or conveyances of lands being in question, though primarily and originally determinable in the courts of common law. Matrimony is properly under the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical court, and if a question arises between the supposed married parties in their life time, or upon dower or bastardy, it shall be tried and determined there: but when an action is brought by a man and woman, supposing her to be his wife, if the defendant pleads in abatement, that they were not married, it shall be tried by a jury where the action was brought; so if any one's title to lands depends on a marriage, if an action be brought to try the title, the marriage may be determined by a jury. This shews plainly, that because the House of Commons may determine who are electors, and who are not, incidentally, and so far only as it is necessary to try the right of the election, it doth not follow that when the right of election is not in question they can try the right of an elector.

When the right of the candidate is examined in the House of Commons, it is in order to determine which person hath the right to join with them in the making of laws, and other public services; and if, in order to the determining this point, the House of Commons must judge of the electors, they do it only to this purpose. But the courts of law judge of an elector's right wholly to another end, as it is their right, to assert that, and to repair in damages the elector who is wrongfully hindered from exercising it. This is what the House of Commons cannot do, nor to this day was there ever any application made to do it, and it may reasonably be supposed they will not now begin to take it upon them.

It commonly takes up a great part of the time of a session, to determine the cases of elections, before they can be sure the House is composed of such as have a right to sit; but should they once pretend to take cognizance of particular men's complaints, in order to decide the rights of electors, it would be impossible for them to have any leisure to employ themselves about the 'ardua et urgentia negotia regni,' the safety and defence of the kingdom, for which the writ calls them together. It is granted, that the deciding of the right of electors is a matter of great weight, and, in consequence, concerns the lives and liberties of the subjects of England, but the law hath provided a proper remedy to be pursued in the ordinary methods of justice, a remedy that is adequate, where damages may be recovered. The plaintiff, in this case, knew, he had a right by law to give his vote, and when he found himself deprived of it, he resorts to the law for his remedy: and it is probable, most of the electors of England will be of his mind, and think it for their interest to resort to the courts of Westminster-hall, for asserting this great right of theirs upon occasion, where they may prove their case by witnesses upon oath, and have their damages assessed by their countrymen duly sworn, nothing of which can be done, if they are to seek for a remedy in the House of Commons.

Where a man is injured, if he cannot bring his action to recover the thing itself he hath lost by the injury, the law will always give him damages in lieu thereof.

It was said in the debate of this case, that instances were to be given, where the party injured did not recover damages, as in case where one has a right of presentation, and is disturbed, he could not recover damages at the common law, and that was resembled to the right of an elector, which was said to be only a right of nomination. But the answer to this objection is plain; there the law gives the party a remedy to recover the presentation, the thing that was taken from him, to which he is restored by the judgment; but, in the present case, there is no possibility for the plaintiff to recover the thing he has lost, which was his vote at the election, for that election is over, and can never be had again, so that the plaintiff cannot possibly have any reparation, unless it be in damages, and this sort of reparation the House of Commons cannot give him.

If the plaintiff, and all other injured electors, should be obliged to go to the House of Commons for satisfaction, it may be reasonably supposed, that the parliament may be dissolved before it could come to his turn to have his cause heard: what would be the consequence of this? If the plaintiff must be thereby without remedy, would not the law be notoriously defective; and yet none will say, that another parliament did ever take cognizance of any injury done, upon account of an election, to a preceding parliament: but, suppose the next House of Commons will determine it, what endless work would the House of Commons be engaged in? for, probably, the ensuing election would make as many new questions as that which went before, and which the parliament did not live long enough to dispatch.

As to what was objected, that the same matter may come in question in the House of Commons, where it may be determined, that the plaintiff hath no right; so that great confusion would arise from different judgments in different courts; it is no more than what may happen every day in Westminster-Hall, where the several courts may be of various opinions upon the same question, and yet no hurt is done to the public; nay, this is no more than happens often in the House of Commons, where the right of election in the same borough is decided different ways in different parliaments, and they do not think themselves dishonoured by it.

This contrariety of judgment can never appear, for the House of Commons never gives a direct judgment, on this or that individual elector's right; the voting is either upon a general question of the competitors, or where the right of election in the borough is placed, whether all inhabitants, or those under a particular qualification, or whether the whole commonalty, or a selected number, have voices, and all these are but ways and means to determine the right of election.

If the House of Commons judge of a particular elector at any time, it is only 'pro ista vice,' so far as it relates to the particular case before them; but surely the House never thought the elector's freehold finally concluded thereby, because he is no party to that suit, his right came not there in question originally, but consequently, in a cause litigated between other persons, to which he is no party; and it cannot be agreeable to right reason, or the principles of law, for a man's right to be conclusively determined, in a cause between other parties.

And, after all, where is the damage to the public, if there should be a variety in the determination of the House of Commons, and the courts of Westminster? It is not impossible, in the nature of things; for the courts of law have great advantages, which the House of Commons want; they want the help of juries, and the power of giving oaths, and they ought not to be displeas'd with their electors, if they resort to courts provided with these powers, for asserting their right of election, especially when it is considered, that the person, whose pretensions the House of Commons approves of, will sit there, which is all they are concern'd in: They are the elected: and it would be strange, if that should entitle them to challenge the sole power of deciding the rights of their electors; which is, indeed, to chuse their electors.

It was urged as a great argument against the maintaining this action, that it had been adjudged, in the case of Mr. Onslow, in the 33d year of king Charles 2. (second Vcnt. 37.) that no action did lie at common law for a false return of a member to sit in parliament; and that in the case of Barnardiston and Soame, it was adjudged the candidate could not maintain an action against the sheriff for a double return; and if the person elected to serve in parliament cannot maintain an action against the officer, it was urged à fortiori, that the person electing, who, perhaps, is but a cobbler, ought not to be allowed to have such an action.

It was answered, that the law of England has no respect to persons: If an elector be a cobbler, he is a freeman of England, and has that great privilege belonging to him to be represented in parliament. It was remembered with what variety of opinion among the judges that case of sir Samuel Barnardiston was determined, and what an alarm that judgment gave to the House of Commons, to such a degree, that in the session of parliament 1679 a committee was appointed to enquire into it as a grievance. And it was observed, that the great design of the act of parliament made in the seventh year of the late king (which was often mentioned in the debate of this case to other purposes) was to cure the many inconveniencies arising from that judgment, and the judgment in Mr. Onslow's case, which only followed Barnardiston's, and was judged upon the authority of it. But there is no resemblance between those cases and the case of an elector. In Barnardiston's case of a double return of members, the reason on which the judgment was founded, was, that a double return was no return which the law took notice of, but was only allowed of by the custom of parliament. When an officer, who doubts makes a double return, he submits to the judgment of the House of Commons; and, if the House admits of such a return, as they have often done, it would be hard the law should subject a man to an action, for submitting a matter of fact, (the truth of which the officer doubts) to the determination of those who have a jurisdiction of the matter, and approve the manner of such a return.

In the other case of a false return of a member, several reasons may be assigned for the judgment, which are not applicable to the case of an elector; perhaps it might be because such a return is a manifest injury to every one of the electors (though principally to the candidate) and therefore it might fall within the reason of William's case above-mentioned, that every elector might sue him; and therefore none of them severally can maintain the action. But there is another reason very obvious, because the candidate has a proper remedy to recover his place, from which he is excluded by the false return; the right of election is cognizable in the House of Commons, there he will recover his seat in parliament, which is what the law has the principal regard to, and there is no reason he should have another remedy elsewhere.

It is absurd to say, the elector's right of chusing is founded upon the law and custom of parliament; it is an original right, part of the constitution of the kingdom, as much as a parliament is, and from whence the persons elected to serve in parliament do derive their authority, and can have no other, but that which is given to them by those that have the original right to chuse them; this doth not touch the jurisdiction claimed and exercised by the House of Commons, to try the right of election of their own members; they who pretend to be admitted to sit there, ought to make out their right to the House; but there is no ground to infer from thence, that the House hath power to try or determine the right of other persons, who are not their members, and do not pretend to any place amongst them.

It was said, that if this action were allowed, there would be a way found out for the Lords to let themselves into, to judge of the right of the members of the House of Commons to sit there, and by parity of reason to judge of their own privileges, as if actions were brought for words spoken in the House of Commons, or other things happening in that House; which would be of ill consequence.

But it was said in the first place, that this objection was little applicable to the present case, but it has no relation to the sitting of that member, for whom the elector who brings his action gave his vote.

And, secondly, if things are so ordered by the constitution of the English government, that the ultimate resort in point of judicature is lodged with the Lords, let the case concern what it will, when it is brought before them by Writ of Error, they are bound to give Judgment one way or other; and as to the particular instance mentioned, relating to the words spoken in the House of Commons, it was said, there never was a greater attempt made upon liberty of speech in the House of Commons, than by the information brought in the King's-bench, 5 Car. 1, against sir John Elliot, Denzil Hollis, and Benjamin Valentine, esqrs., for words spoke in the House of Commons; they pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, as being for what was done in parliament, and therefore ought not to be examined or punished elsewhere; but Judgment was given against them, and great fines imposed upon them (Cro. Car. 181.) In the parliament which met in 1640, these proceedings were taken into consideration with great warmth, and the 8th of July, 1641, it was resolved in the House of Commons, that the exhibiting of that information was a breach of the privilege of parliament; and that the over-ruling of the plea to the jurisdiction of the court, and the Judgment, and all that followed thereupon, was against the law and privilege of parliament, and many other severe votes were passed. Thus the matter rested till after the Restoration of king Charles 2; but when things grew to be settled, and there was leisure to consider the consequences of former proceedings, the House of Commons began to think, that those votes were not to be depended upon as a sufficient security, in a case of so high a nature, since upon liberty of speech all parliamentary debates were founded; and they could not think that great privilege safe while so solemn a Judgment stood in force. Therefore, in 1667, the consideration of this matter took up a great part of the session, and the best expedient they could find out was, first, to come to a resolution among themselves, that the Judgment given, 5 Car. 1, in that case, was an illegal Judgment, and against the freedom and privilege of parliament; and then to present this resolution of theirs to the Lords at a conference, which was done December the 10th, 1667, and to desire their concurrence. The next day the Lords concurred in the resolution, and at the same time (which was a thing aimed at and desired by the House of Commons) the Lords ordered the lord Holles to bring a Writ of Error in parliament, to the end there might be a judicial determination of that great point, which was done accordingly; and on the 15th of April, 1668, that cause coming to be heard in parliament, the Judgment in the King's-bench was reversed, to the great satisfaction of the House of Commons.

So little did the House of Commons entertain jealousies of this kind, that they themselves resorted to the judicature of the Lords, in the manner that has been mentioned, upon so weighty an occasion.

It was objected, that many inconveniences would follow, if this action were allowed; but they were very sparing in giving particular instances of those inconveniences.

But nothing is plainer, than that by the plaintiff's prevailing in this action great inconveniences will be prevented, and the subjects' right and property secured against the partialities and corruption of officers, who are trusted in a matter of so great moment, as the receiving and allowing their suffrages upon elections.

This tends to encounter false returns in the first approach, and to have just returns is all the House of Commons ought to desire.

How endless would the inconveniences be, if this action did not lie? How would occasions of complaint be multiplied? The officers who had the return would become the masters of elections, and admit and reject electors as they pleased with impunity; for if the electors are only to seek for a remedy before the House of Commons, it would be a remedy worse than the disease; the greatest part of their cases would never be determined for want of time; and they who could get their cases heard, could have no amends, that is, no damages given them for reparation of the wrong, besides the absurdity of having, for the most part, the parties to the injury, those who sit by a false return, parties to the Judgment.

So that to deny this action, is to deny the the benefit of the law in a matter of the most tender concern to an Englishman.

To pretend it to be a breach of privilege of the House of Commons, for an elector to seek for remedy at law, if he be wrongfully excluded of his vote, is very strange.

That certainly can never be esteemed a privilege of parliament, that is incompatible with the rights of the people. Every Englishman is entitled to reparation for the injuries done to his rights and franchises, in the ordinary and common methods of justice, where the juries who try, and the witnesses who give evidence, are to be upon their oaths; Magna Charta, cap 29, is very express. No freeman shall be disseised of his freehold, or liberties, or free customs, unless by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

By the lawful judgment of the peers, in the case of a commoner, is meant, by a jury of lawful men upon their oaths.

If one be injured in such a manner as the plaintiff in this action hath been, no man can say that per legem terræ, by the law of the land, he can have a remedy for satisfaction, and asserting his right in the House of Commons; if there be any such law, it must be either statute law, or common law. No statute gives him such a remedy, nor doth the common law, because that is constant usage for time immemorial; and there is not one precedent can be produced, that ever any man, upon such an occasion, did ever apply to the House of Commons for relief.

Upon the 14th day of January, 1704, the House of Lords reversed the Judgment, and gave Judgment, that the plaintiff should recover.

Resolutions of the Lords upon the Case.] This State of the Case being read and approved of, the House came to the following Resolutions, viz.

“It is resolved by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that by the known laws of this kingdom, every freeholder, or other person, having a right to give his vote at the election of members to serve in parliament, and being wilfully denied or hindered so to do by the officer who ought to receive the same, may maintain an action in the Queen's courts against such officer, to assert his right, and recover damages for the injury.

“It is resolved by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the asserting, that a person having a right to give his vote at an election, and being hindered so to do by the officer, who ought to take the same, is without remedy for such wrong by the ordinary course of law, is destructive of the property of the subject, against the freedom of elections, and manifestly tends to encourage corruption and partiality in officers, who are to make returns to parliament, and to subject the freeholders and other electors, to their arbitrary will and pleasure.

“It is resolved by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the declaring Matthew Ashby guilty of a breach of privilege of the House of Commons, for prosecuting an action against the constables of Aylesbury, for not receiving his Vote at an election, after he had, in the known and proper methods of law, obtained a Judgment in parliament for recovery of his damages, is an unprecedented attempt upon the judicature of parliament, and is in effect to subject the law of England to the Votes of the House of Commons.

“It is resolved by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the deterring electors from prosecuting actions in the ordinary course of law, where they are deprived of their right of voting, and terrifying attornies, solicitors, counsellors, and serjeants at law, from soliciting, prosecuting, and pleading in such cases, by voting their so doing to be a breach of privilege of the House of Commons, is a manifest assuming a power to controul the law, to hinder the course of justice, and subject the property of Englishmen, to the arbitrary Votes of the House of Commons.”

The lenity of the House of Commons to Ashby, had not that effect as might have been expected; for before the then following sessions, not only execution was taken out upon the said Judgment, but Mr. Mead brought actions of like nature for John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, jun. Henry Basse, and Daniel Horne, five other inhabitants of Aylesbury, for being denied their Votes at the election of members to serve in parliament for the said borough of Aylesbury; of which complaint being made to the House of Commons, they proceeded thereon, as will hereafter appear.

Case of Mr. Bathurst.] January 30. On this day Charles Bathurst, esq. presented a Petition to the House of Commons; setting forth, “That the petitioner, being seized in fee of the manor of Arkelegarthdale, within the honour of Richmond, in the county of York, and of several lead mines therein, admitted Robert Squire, and others, to be partners with him in the said lead mines, for a term of years only; and in the 15th year of the reign of king James the 1st a Commission of survey, with Articles of Instructions, issued out of the Court of Exchequer, and an inquisition and survey was taken thereupon, and the boundaries of the honour of Richmond, and lordship of Middleham, and many other manors and lordships bounding thereupon, were set out, and the commission, instructions, inquisition, and survey, were returned into the court of Exchequer, and filed, and became a record of the said court: That, about 20 years since, there was a suit concerning the boundaries of some or one of the said manors, mentioned in the said survey, and the said record was given in evidence on a trial at bar, and came to the hands of Mr. Ralph Grange, deceased, then an attorney for one of the parties concerned, and, by mistake, was not delivered back into the Exchequer court, till after his death (which was about four years since) when it was found amongst his papers, and then delivered into the court of Exchequer, to be filed upon the proper file: That the lord Wharton being seised of the manor of Helagh in Swaledale, adjoining to the petitioner's said manor, and there being a suit depending in Chancery between the lord Wharton, and the petitioner and his partners, concerning the right of some lead mines, which intirely depended upon the boundaries of their manors, the lord Wharton opposed the filing of the said record, pretending some ill practices in one of the attorneys of the Exchequer, and that the record having been out of the court many years, if ever filed, yet it could not be known, what hands it had been in, or whether it had been altered; but, after hearing counsel several times, and great consideration had, the Court of Exchequer, the 15th of July, 1701, made an order for filing the said commission, articles, inquisition, and survey, on the proper file: That, upon hearing the said cause in Chancery, an issue was directed, to try, in which manor the lead mine in question lies; and at the trial, at the bar of the Queen's-bench, the petitioner gave the said Record in evidence (though the lord Wharton's counsel opposed it, and a verdict was given for the petitioner: Thereupon the lord Wharton appealed to the House of Peers from the said Order of the 15th of July, 1701, and Mr. Squire, (only interested, as aforesaid) was ordered to give his Answer therunto, and no notice was taken, in the said appeal, of the petitioner, nor any other of his partners; and Mr. Squire having given in his Answer, the Lords, on the 12th of February, 1702, upon hearing counsel on both sides, ordered, that a trial should be had the next term, at the Common-pleas bar, upon this debated issue; viz. 'Whether the skins of parchment, directed by the order of the Court of Exchequer, on the 15th of July, 1701, to be filed, are the perfect, unaltered, exact, and intire, commission and return, first filed in the Court of Exchequer in the 16th year of king James the first;' and that in the said action the said Robert Squire should be Plaintiff, and take the proof of the issue upon himself, and the lord Wharton defendant; and that the said skins of parchment, or any copy thereof, should not be given in evidence in any Court whatsoever, until the said trial was over; and that the said skins of parchment (being upon the file, by virtue of the said order of the 15th July) should not be allowed as any evidence, on the said trial, for the Plaintiff: That the Court of Chancery, as is usual, where a right of inheritance is to be bound, directed a second trial, which came on at the Queen's-bench bar in Michaelmas term last; at which trial the lord Wharton's counsel insisted, that the petitioner could not give in evidence the said inquisition, and survey, by reason of the said Order of the House of Peers, of 12 Feb. 1702; and the petitioner's counsel also advising not to offer the said record, or any copy thereof, in evidence, lost his cause, and the Jury found a boundary between the said manors, different from what either side had proved, or so much as opened, or insisted on, at either of the said trials, or in Chancery, and the issue and verdict were recorded for the plaintiff, which could not have been, if the said record had been given in evidence: That by the Lords' said Order the petitioner's inheritance, and the right of many other persons, will be bound, although none were parties before their lordships, nor ever heard touching the said record: That the Order of the 15th of July was not made in any cause depending in the Court of Exchequer, but was made by the Court ex officio, to preserve their own record, of which they are sole judges, and (there being no suit depending) there was no ground for an appeal; and therefore their lordships making such Order, as aforesaid, was (as the petitioner conceives) exercising an original jurisdiction, to bind the inheritance of many of her majesty's subjects, without hearing them: That the lord Wharton, endeavouring to impeach the said record, ought to have been the plaintiff in the said issue, directed by the Lords; and conceives it hard to make Squire plaintiff, and much more to lay the burthen upon him, to prove the record to be the perfect, unaltered, exact, and intire, commission, and return, first filed, and to put the validity of the whole record upon that issue; for that the petitioner is advised, that, although a record be, through time, accident, or evil practice, defaced in some part of it, yet, as to such part, as remains legible, it is always allowed to be given in evidence; and the petitioner ought not have been debarred from making use of this record, to support his inheritance, it being the right of every subject, to give in evidence any record, or copy thereof, for defence of his title in any matter in question; and he conceives, there is not the least grounds to suspect, that the said record hath been altered in any part, there being, as the petitioner is informed, and believes, better proofs for the validity thereof, than for any one of the most authentic records now extant in any of the Courts at Westminster, there being divers copies thereof, made long before the same came to the hands of Mr. Grange, which do exactly agree with the said record: And praying relief in the premises, and that the House will take the same into consideration, inasmuch as the making such Orders by the House of Peers will hereafter prove of fatal consequence to the rights and inheritance of the Commons of England."

Resolutions of the Commons on the said Case.]
In consequence of this Petition, &c. the House of Commons appointed Committees to inspect the Lords' Journals, as likewise the proceedings of the Chancery and Exchequer court, with relation to the said Case: And upon the whole, came to the following Resolutions:

"That the House of Lords taking cognizance of, and proceeding upon, the petition of Thomas lord Wharton, complaining of an Order of the court of Exchequer, bearing date the 15th day of July, 1701, for filing the record of a survey of the honour of Richmond, and lordship of Middleham, in the county of York, is without precedent, and unwarrantable, and tends to the subjecting the rights and properties of all the Commons of England to an illegal and arbitrary power.

“That it is the undoubted right of all the subjects of England, to make such use of the said record, as they might by law have done before the said proceedings of the House of Lords.”

Resolutions of the Lords thereon.] After this the House of Lords took into consideration the proceedings of the House of Commons, and made the following Resolution:

March 27. It is resolved and declared by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, “That the House of Commons, taking upon them by their Votes, to condemn a Judgment of the House of Lords, given in a cause depending before this House in the last session of parliament upon the petition of Thomas lord Wharton, and to declare what the law is, in contradiction to the proceedings of the House of Lords, is without precedent, unwarrantable, and an usurpation of a judicature, to which they have no sort of pretence.”

“That the Resolution and Declaration made this day, with respect to the Votes of the House of Commons, in relation to the Judgment of this House given upon the Petition of Thomas lord Wharton, the last session of parliament, shall be forthwith printed and published.”

Proceedings against the Author of the ‘Observator.’] About this time, the author of a weekly Paper called the Observator having ventured to publish his remarks on Occasional Conformity, a complaint was made against him in the House of Commons; and, upon examination of the matter, it was resolved, “That the Observator, from the 8th to the 11th of Dec. 1703, contains matters scandalous and malicious, reflecting upon the proceedings of the House, tending to the promoting of sedition in the kingdom: And that Tutchin the author, How the printer, and Bragg the publisher of that paper, should be taken into custody of the serjeant at arms attending the House.” Thereupon Tutchin absconded, and notwithstanding the censure passed upon him, went on in his way of writing, and made sharp reflections upon a Speech said to have been made by sir John Packington, in the House of Commons, in favour of the bill to prevent Occasional Conformity.* A fresh complaint being made again for this second offence, the Commons resolved, “That the author, printer, and publisher of the ‘Observator,’ having broke the privilege of the House, and since absconded from justice; an humble Address be presented to her majesty, that she would please to issue her royal proclamation for apprehending them, promising a reward for discovery of them.”

The Queen’s Message respecting the Poor Clergy.] Feb. 7. Her majesty ordered the following Message to be delivered to the House of Commons:

“Her majesty, having taken into her serious consideration the mean and insufficient maintenance belonging to the Clergy in divers parts of the kingdom, to give them some ease, hath been pleased to remit the Arrears of the Tenth to the Poor Clergy; and for an augmentation of their maintenance, her majesty is pleased to declare, that she will make a grant of her whole revenue arising out of the First Fruits and Tenths,* as far it now is, or shall become

* “The first-fruits and tenths was an imposition begun by the popes in the time of the holy wars, and it was raised as a fund to support those expeditions. But, when taxes are once raised by such an arbitrary power, as the popes then assumed, and after there has been a submission, and the payments have been settled into a custom, they are always continued, even after the pretence, upon which they were at first raised, subsists no more. Thus this became a standing branch of the papal revenue, till Henry 8 seemed resolved to take it away. It was first abolished for a year, probably to draw in the clergy to consent the more willingly to a change that delivered them from such heavy impositions. But, in the succeeding session of parliament, this revenue was again settled as part of the income of the crown for ever. It is true, it was the more easily borne, because the rates were still at the old value, which in some places was not the tenth, and in most not above the 5th part of the true value; and the clergy had been often threatened with a new valuation, in which the rates should be rigorously set to their full extent. The tenths amounted to about 11,000*l.* a year; and the first-fruits, which were more casual, rose one year with another to 5,000*l.*; so that the whole amounted to between 16 and 17,000*l.* a year. This was not brought into the treasury, as the other branches of the revenue were; but the bishops, who had been the pope’s collectors, were now the king’s; and persons in favour obtained assignations on them for life, or for a term of years. This had never been applied to any good use, but was still obtained by favourites for themselves and their friends; and, in Charles 2’s time, it was distributed chiefly among his women and natural children. It seemed strange, that, while the clergy had much credit at court, they had never represented this as sacrilege, unless it was applied to some religious purpose; and, that during archbishop Laud’s favour with king Charles 1, or at the restoration of king Charles 2, no endeavours had been used to appropriate this to better uses. When bishop Burnet wrote the History of the Reformation, he considered this matter so particularly, that he saw there was a free from incumbrances, to be applied to this purpose; and if the House of Commons can find any proper method by which her majesty's good intentions to the Poor Clergy may be made more effectual, it will be a great advantage to the public, and very acceptable to her majesty."

The Commons' Address thereon.] Upon which the House of Commons presented the following Address:

fund for providing better subsistence for the poor clergy, there being some hundreds of cures, which had not of certain provision 20l. a year, and some thousands, that had not fifty. He therefore represented this case afterwards to queen Mary, in such a light, that she was fully resolved, if ever she lived to see peace and settlement, to have cleared this branch of the revenue of all the assignations that were upon it, and to have applied it to the augmentation of small benefices. The bishops afterwards laid the matter before king William, when there was a prospect of peace, hoping, that this might have gained the king the hearts of the clergy, or at least have put a stop to a groundless clamour raised against him, that he was an enemy to the clergy, which began then to have very ill effect on all his affairs. The king entertained this so well, that he ordered the bishop to speak to the ministers about it, who all approved of it; more particularly, the lords Souther and Halifax: But the earl of Sunderland obtained an assignation upon two dioceses for 2,000l. a year for two lives; so that nothing was to be expected after that. The bishop laid the matter very fully before the princess of Denmark, during king William's life, and had often spoken of it to the lord Godolphin. This time was perhaps chosen to pacify the angry clergy, who were dissatisfied with the court, and began now to talk of the danger the church was in, as much as they had done during the former reign. When the queen's message was brought to the House of Commons, some of the Whigs, particularly sir John Holland and sir Joseph Jekyll, moved, that the clergy might be entirely freed from that tax, since they bore as heavy a share of other taxes; and that another fund might be raised of the same value, out of which small benefices might be augmented. But this was violently opposed by sir Christopher Musgrave, and other Tories, who said, that the clergy ought to be kept still in a dependance on the crown.— Upon the queen's Message, a bill was brought in, enabling her to alienate this branch of the revenue, and to create a corporation by charter, to apply it to the use, for which she now gave it. They added to this a repeal of the statute of Mortmain, so far as that it might be free to all men, either by deed or by their last wills, to give what they thought fit towards the augmentation of benefices. It was suggested, that this addition was made in hope, that it would be rejected by the Lords, and that the scandal of losing the bill might lie upon them. It occasioned a great debate in the House of Lords: It was said, that this law was made and kept up, even during the times of Popery; and it seemed not reasonable to open a door to practices upon dying men. It was answered, That we had not the arts of affrighting

"Most gracious sovereign; We your majesty's most dutiful and royal subjects, the Commons in parliament assembled, beg leave to present our most humble and hearty thanks to your majesty, for your most gracious Message, in which you were pleased to declare your royal bounty, in remitting the arrears of the Tenth due from your Poor Clergy: and in charitably designing for the future to apply your majesty's whole revenue arising from the First Fruits and Tenths, in augmentation of their maintenance.—We are justly sensible of your majesty's pious concern for the church of England, and of the great advantage it will receive from your majesty's unparalleled goodness, in giving up such a part of your majesty's revenue towards the better provision for the poorer clergy, who were not sufficiently provided for at the happy Reformation of religion under your royal ancestors.—Your majesty's faithful Commons use their utmost endeavours to render your majesty's charitable intentions most effectual; and will, upon this, and all other occasions, readily apply themselves to such proper methods, as may best conduce to the support of the Clergy, and to the honour, interest, and future security of the church of England as by law established."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty was pleased to give this Answer:

"Gentlemen, I am very glad to find my Message has been so acceptable to you; I hope you will effectually improve it, to the advantage of the church of England as by law established, for which nobody can have a more true and real concern than myself."

men by the terrors of purgatory, or by fables of apparitions. Where these were practised, it was very reasonable to restrain priests from those artifices, by which they had so enriched their church, that, without some effectual checks, they would have swallowed up the whole wealth of the world, as they had indeed in England, during Popery, made themselves masters of a full third part of the nation. The bishops were so zealous and unanimous for the bill, that it was carried and passed into a law. The queen was pleased to let it be known, that the first motion of this matter came from bishop Burnet. Such a project would have been much magnified at another time; and those who had promoted it, would have been looked upon as the truest friends of the church. But this did not seem to make any great impression at that time; nor to have much effect in softening the tempers of peevish men. Only it produced a set of addresses from all the clergy of England, full of thanks and just acknowledgments." Tisdal.

Books censured by the Commons.] March 17. Sir Dudley Cullam reported from the committee, appointed to examine two Books; one intitled, "Second Thoughts concerning human Soul, as believed to be a spiritual immortal substance, united to human Body, to be a plain heathenish Invention, and not consonant to the Principles of Philosophy, Reason, or Religion;" the other, "The grand Essay; or, Vindication of Reason and Religion against Impostures of Philosophy;" and to collect thereout such Parts, as are offensive; and to examine, who is the author, printer, and publisher, thereof; that they had examined the same accordingly, and had collected out of the said Books several passages therein, which they conceive offensive; and that they found, that Dr. William Coward was the author of the said Books; and that Mr. David Edwards was the printer of the one, and Mr. William Pearson was the printer of the other; and that Mr. Basset was the publisher of the said Books: Which Report he read in his place, and afterwards delivered in at the clerk's table; where the same was read, and is, as followeth:

P. 84. "Now the notion of an immaterial, immortal, substantial being in man, or soul, was one of those principles, I had by education so imbibed; and having thought fit, more strictly to enquire into the reasons or foundation of this belief, I find it to be only an opinion derived down to posterity, as it were, upon trust."

P. 85. "But these grounds of the framing an immaterial immortal soul in man I look upon to be idle and fabulous; and conceive it rather to be the consent and doctrine of the philosophers, in general preaching, that virtue was to be rewarded, and vice punished; and, when they usually saw good men to die untimely deaths, and unrewarded too, being ignorant of a resurrection, taught their scholars, that men's souls, after death, remained alive, to receive the same; i. e. good men, rewards, and ill men, punishments."

P. 88. "Now after the piety of the primitive christians began by secular interest to be perverted, and the ambition of crafty prelates grew so high, as to require to be supported in grandeur and state, then it became convenient to propagate this doctrine to the height."

P. 144. "Thus, upon the whole, we find, how weak and insufficient the arguments of philosophy are, to defend the opinion of an immaterial soul, united to the body; what idle and trifling distinctions they are forced to make, to defend it; what shifts and evasions they frame, to support their notion; inasmuch that a man may say, there is no plea, to ground a belief on the philosophers arguments, which pretend to establish two distinct substances, spiritual and material, in man, but only to those, who are resolved not to be informed, and will know no better."

P. 176. "If we allow this conjunction of body and soul to be the union of an immortal immaterial spirit to a mortal material body, where is then the mystery of the hypostatic union? The union of the soul and body no man yet ever allowed to be a mystery of religion; therefore either both must be reputed so or neither."

P. 206. "1. That human soul will cease when the body dies (i. e. life and soul, are the same thing in scripture) and consequently, the common notion of a spiritual immortal substance, united to, or in, man, is erroneous;

"2. That, by the common course of providence, man's immortality begins not until after the resurrection."

"As to the first proposition, thus I argue. If it appear by the whole current of Scripture that life is properly the soul of man, and no text gives us a sufficient ground to call it an immaterial substance; then the soul of man will cease to be, when the body dies: But it appears by the whole current of Scripture, &c. et ego, the soul of man will cease to be, when the body dies; and consequently the notion of a spiritual immortal substance, united to, or in man, is erroneous."

P. 222. "1. 1. e. salon. cap. iv. 13, 14.—Who will be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal put on immortality, before it can be pronounced, that death is swallowed up in victory. 1 Cor. xv. 51, &c. Where it is very observable, that the apostle, in all the whole course of his writing, says, 'we,' not 'our bodies; who cannot be called 'we.' As, 'We shall not all sleep;' 'We shall be 'rai-ed incorruptible;' and, 'we shall be 'changed.' Which could not be true, were the soul, our better part, an incorruptible immortal being already; for that has no change at all, but retains its first immortal nature."

P. 278. "Obj. 14. "Then shall the dust return to the earth, as it was; and the spirit to God, that gave it:" "The refore, here is a plain distinction of soul, and body; and that when we die, our souls will certainly return to God."

"Answer: This is the great Goliath argument, generally brought to knock down all opposers; though it argues not for an immaterial spiritual substance, but is rather, and ought to be explained as, a confirmation of my opinion."

Pa. 280. "Thus far, I think, I have sufficiently answered all objections, brought from the Old Testament: And though there occur many of the same nature in the Apocrypha, and, indeed more seemingly opposite to my opinion, yet I shall here pass them by, until the Apocrypha be proved canonical; and so proceed to objections, extorted from the New Testament.

"1. The first I meet with, that seems significant, is this: 'Fear not them, that can kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him, which is able to destroy both body and soul in hell.' Matth. x. 28. Therefore there is a being in man, distinct from his body, capable of being cast into a place of torment; whereas the body only lies in the power of man, and not the soul, to be destroyed."

P. 233, 284. "Answer: If by this text was meant a spiritual, substantial, immortal, soul, no doubt, but that our Saviour knew it, and so did his disciples, to whom he then preached this doctrine; therefore, for our Saviour to instruct them in a doctrine, viz. The impossibility of man's power to kill an immortal spirit, which they must know before, if true, would savour more of trifling, than giving of real instructions in Christianity; for it might easily be returned, that all the world knows, an immortal spirit cannot be killed; so that such instructions are vain, and useless."

P. 235, 286. Luk. xxiii. 43. "This day, says our Saviour to the thief on the cross, 'thou shalt be with me in Paradise.' Therefore his soul must be there with our Saviour, or else our Saviour's words could not be admitted for truth; for, be sure, the thief's body was buried, and laid in the ground, as others were."

"Answer: This objection, though oft brought, I cannot see of what force it is, unless it be, to tell us, that our Saviour spake to the soul of the thief, when he said, 'thou shalt be with me in Paradise,' 'Thou soul of the thief, for owning me, shall this day be with me in a state of bliss: But, O thief! thy body shall go to corruption, as other bodies do.' Now what a speech must such men make for our Saviour, that give such an interpretation of this text, let the learned judge."

In "The Grand Essay," &c.

P. 185. "Theol. How could man come by this immaterial substance, but at the first creation? And it is plain there, by express words, that he was made no more than a living creature.

"Philos. You had as good throw your cap into the air. All the heathen philosophers preached up man to be made of a soul, called immaterial substance, and body; and if you throw all the Old and New Testament at that doctrine, you will never confound it, or convince its believers to the contrary."

P. 186, 187. "Theol. Don't a man die, if he lose his life?

"Philos. No; he doth die in his body, but not in his soul; for that lives as well, if not better, than it did in the body.

"Theol. Not one word of this, or like it, do I find in the Bible. This is as much as to say, a man doth die, and he doth not die. Pray what is meant by dying in his body?

"Philos. His material body dies.

"Theol. As far as I find, it never lived; for it was the soul lived all the while; and how can any thing die, which never lived?

"Philos. It is no matter how; it is so: the soul, or immaterial substance, gave the body life, and now it is separated, the body is dead.

"Theol. What chapter and verse, for your immaterial living substance, in the Bible?

"Philos. I told you, you were always for Scripture. It is so by philosophy, that is enough: And so, if a man is said to sleep in death, he is as fully awake in his soul, the next minute of separation, as ever he was in his life in this world.

"Theol. A pretty way of sleeping indeed! You philosophers make us believe any thing, I will be stigmatized [for a fool*] all my life time, if you can bring the like case, whereas many absurdities, without any warrant from Scripture, or common reason, are believed."

That Mr. Bassett was called in to the committee; and being asked, who was the author and printer of the book, called, 'Second Thoughts concerning human soul,' &c. said, That doctor William Coward was the author of the said book; and that Mr. David Edwards printed the same. That Dr. Coward sent for the said Bassett, and told him, he had 500 of the said books, and would have him to sell them: Whereupon they came to an agreement; and the said Bassett, by a writing under his hand, did promise, and oblige himself, to account for and pay unto Dr. William Coward 3s. 6d. for every one of the said books sold.—That he sold about 300 of the said books, and had three pence a book for selling the same.

Mr. Chantry being asked, who was the author, and printer, of the book called, 'The Grand Essay,' said, that Dr. Coward was the author, and William Peirson was the printer. That he sold about five hundred of the said books, by Dr. Coward's directions; and that the said Doctor agreed to allow him half the profit, for selling the same.

Mr. Edwards said, that he printed part of the book, called, 'Second Thoughts;' and that Dr. Coward delivered to him the copy.

Mr. Person said, that he printed the book called, 'The Grand Essay;' and that Dr. Coward delivered him the copy, and he printed 500 of them.

Dr. Coward, being called in, said, that he hath not read the book, called, 'Second Thoughts,' &c. since Edwards printed the same; so that he knows not, whether it be printed according to his copy: He never intended any thing against religion; and that there is nothing contained in those books, contrary either to morality, or religion. That he does not deny himself to be the author of those books; and, if there be any thing therein, against religion, or morality, he is heartily sorry, and is ready to recant the same.

Resolved, "That the said Books do contain therein divers doctrines and positions, contrary to the doctrine of the church of England, and tending to the subversion of the Christian religion.

A Bill for raising Recruits passed.] March 21. A Bill entitled, 'An Act for raising Recruits* for the Land-forces and Marines, and

* "One of the most considerable Acts passed this session, was, for 'raising recruits for the 'land-forces and marines,' which impowered the justices of peace, or any three of them, to take up such idle persons, as had no calling nor means of subsistence, and to deliver them to the officers of the army, upon paying them the levy-money, that was allowed for making recruits. The method of raising these hitherto, by drinking, and other bad practices, as they were justly odious, so they were now so well known, that they were no more of any effect; so that the army could not be recruited but by the help of this act; which, if well managed, might prove of great advantage to the nation; since by this means they would be delivered from many vicious and idle persons, who were a burthen to their country, and indeed of late years there was such an increase of the poor, that their maintenance was become in most places a very heavy load, and amounted to the full half of the public taxes. The party in both houses, who had been all along cold and backward in the war, opposed this act with unusual vehemence, pretending zeal for the public liberty and the freedom of the persons, to which, by the constitution, they said every Englishman had a right; which they thought could not be given away but by a legal judgment, and for some crime. They thought this put a power into the hands of justices of peace, which might be stretched and abused to serve bad purposes. Thus men who seemed engaged to an interest that was destructive to all liberty, could yet make use of that specious pretence, to serve their purpose. The chief objection made to this act in the house of lords was, that the justices of peace had been put in and out in so strange a manner, ever since sir Nathan Wright had the great seal, that they did not deserve that so large a power should be committed to them. Many gentlemen of good estates and ancient families had been of late put out of the commission for no other visible reason, but because they had entered heartily into the revolution, and had continued zealous for king William. This seemed done on design to mark them, and to lessen the interest they had in the elections of members of parliament; and at the same time, men of no worth, nor estate, and known to be ill-affected to the queen's title and to the Protestant succession, were put in, to the great encouragement of ill-designing men. All was managed by secret accusations, and characters, that were partially given. The lord-keeper was a zealot to the party, and was become very exceptionable in all respects. Money, as was said, did every thing with him; only in his court he was never charged with any

'for dispensing with part of the encouragement 'and increase of shipping and navigation, do 'ring the present war;' was passed by the House of Lords.

The Queen's Speech at the close of the Session.] April 3. Her majesty came to the House of Peers, and after passing several acts made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I cannot put an end to this session, without returning you thank for the willingness which you have all expressed to support and assist me, in continuing the present war.—And I must thank you, gentlemen of the House of Commons, very particularly, for the great forwardness and zeal which you have shewn, both in the early dispatch of the supplies, and in making them effectual for carrying on the public expence without any additional burthens upon the country: it shall be my care, to improve this to the best advantage.—My Lords and gentlemen; at the opening of this session, I did earnestly express my desires of seeing you in perfect unity among yourselves, as the most effectual means imaginable to disappoint the ambition of our enemies, and reduce them to an honourable and lasting peace: and though this has not met with all that success which I wished and expected, yet, being fully convinced that nothing is so necessary to our common welfare, I am not discouraged from persisting in the same earnest desires, that you would go down into your several countries disposed to moderation and unity, as become all those who are joined together in the same religion and interest.—This I am persuaded will soon make you sensible that nothing, next to the blessing of God, can so much contribute to our success abroad, and to our safety at home."

Then the Lord Keeper, by her majesty's command, prorogued the parliament to Tuesday the 4th day of July next.*

thing but great slowness, by which the Chancery was become one of the heaviest grievances of the nation." Tindal.

* "Thus ended this session of parliament after much heat and contention between the two houses; and though the queen in her speech commended to them union and moderation, yet those words, which had hitherto carried good a sound, that all sides pretended to, were now become so odious to violent men, that even in sermons, especially at Oxford, they were arraigned as importing something that was unkind to the church, and that favoured dissenters. The House of Commons had, during this session, lost much of their reputation, not only with fair and impartial judges, but even with those who were most inclined to favour them. It is true, the body of the freeholders began to be uneasy under the taxes, and to cry out for a peace; and most of the considerable gentry of England, who had most to lose, seemed not to apprehend the danger the nation was in, if it should fall under the power of France, and into the hands of the Pretender; or else they were so fatally wounded, as not to see, that these must be the consequences of those measures, into which they were engaged." Tindal.

PRINCIPAL OCCURRENCES DURING THE RECESS—Change in the Ministry—The Scottish Plot—The Duke of Marlborough marches into Germany—The Battle of Schellenberg—Battle of Hochstet—Surrender of Landau and Traerbach—The Duke of Marlborough arrives in England—Gibraltar taken—Engagement of Malaga. [The earl of Nottingham, says Tindal, "was animated by the party to press the queen to dismiss the dukes of Somerset and Devonshire from the cabinet council, or at least, that they might be called thither no more. He moved it often, but, finding no inclination in the queen to comply with his motion, he carried the seals to her, and told her, that he could not serve any longer in councils, to which those lords were admitted. The queen desired him to consider better of it, but he returned next day fixed in his first resolution, to which he adhered the more steadily, because the queen had sent to the earl of Jersey for the lord chamberlain's staff, and to sir Edward Seymour for the comptroller's. The earl of Jersey was a weak man, but crafty and well practised in the arts of a court. His lady was a papist, and it was believed, that, while he was ambassador in France, he was secretly reconciled to the court of St. Germain's, for after that he seemed to be in their interests. He was considered as the person, who was now in the closest correspondence with the court of France; and, though he was in himself a very inconsiderable man, yet he was applied to by all those, who wished well to the court of St. Germain's. His staff of lord chamberlain was given to the earl of Kent, who was the first earl of England, and had a great estate. Mr. Mansel, the heir of a very considerable family in Wales, was made comptroller of the household; and, after a month's delay, Mr. Harley, the Speaker, was declared secretary of state, and Mr. Henry St. John was appointed secretary at war in the room of Blaitwaite.*

"The late differences between the Lords and Commons had raised so great a ferment in the nation, that the parliament had not long been prorogued, before a paper was printed and dispersed, intitled, 'Legion's humble Address to the Lords,' wherein the proceedings of the Commons, with relation to the Aylesbury business, and the examination of the Scots Plot, were reflected on with great freedom. The first were taxed 'as arbitrary and illegal, contrary to the liberties of Englishmen, destructive of the rights of election, and an invasion of the nation's judicature.' And, as to the other it was suggested, "That the complimenting her majesty with the title of 'a queen sitting on the throne of her ancestors by right of succession from her father,' when,

"During these transactions, the Scottish Plot made a great noise, and accounts of it soon reaching France, Frazer was immediately shut up in the Bastile. On the other hand, Lindsay, who would discover nothing before the committee of Lords, was tried upon the act made against corresponding with France, and sentenced to die. Being carried to Tyburn, he was told by the sheriff, that he must expect no mercy, unless he acknowledged his crime, and discovered what he knew of the conspiracy. But, as it is believed, upon a secret intimation, that he was to be reprieved, he still continued obstinate and mute, and was carried back to Newgate, where he continued prisoner for some years, and then, being banished the kingdom, he died in Holland in a very miserable condition. The truth is, whether, as some were of opinion, the ministry found the queen inclined to favour the friends of the court of St. Germain; or whether they themselves were unwilling to irritate the Scots at this critical juncture; it is most certain, that, even after the removal of the earl of Nottingham, the farther discovery of the Plot was prosecuted with great tenderness or negligence.

at the same time, they knew her right depended upon the validity of parliament-limitation, and was built on the foot of the late Revolution, and the Act of Settlement, was a barbarous treachery to the whole nation, an insolent affront to her majesty, an insinuation of the title of the pretended prince of Wales, and a villainous attempt to destroy the present settlement of the succession, and was consequently high treason by their own act of parliament: And that to address her majesty to extend her prerogative, and thereby to embroil her with the privilege of the Peers, was the most aggravated piece of treachery, that ever House of Commons was or could be guilty of; the same being an affront to her majesty, a malicious design on her person, by persuading her to enter on that very thing, the exorbitant practice whereof was the ruin of her father and grandfather; an unprecedented attempt upon the liberties of the people, and a meddling with what they have no power or right to touch. Their lordships were likewise applauded for their zeal, courage, and fidelity, in vindicating their own undoubted rights invaded by the House of Commons, in their diligent care for the safety of her majesty's person, in searching after the deeply-laid contrivances of her enemies in the late plot, and in their asserting the liberties and rights of the people of England against the invasion and usurpation of the House of Commons. And, as the Lords were looked upon as the sanctuary and safety of this nation, so, in the name of the injured freeholders and Commons of England, their lordships were assured, that they would firmly adhere to, and faithfully defend their lordships in the further pursuit of these just and glorious ends." Though there was a great deal of truth in this paper, yet, being represented by the Gloucestershire justices, at the instigation of Mr. Howe, to the queen, as of dangerous consequence, a proclamation was published, promising a reward of 100*l.* for the discovery of the author, and 50*l.* for apprehending the printer, which had no effect." Tindal.

“On the 21st of April, the duke of Marlborough embarked for Holland, and in three days arrived at the Hague. Two days after his coming, he was attended by a solemn deputation of the States, in order to confer with him. The conference lasted six hours. The chief subject of debate was about sending a good army towards the Moselle. This was all that was proposed in public, and to this the States of Zealand, and two other provinces, strongly objected. They would not agree, that the duke should have an unlimited command to lead the army where he pleased, and thought it a very dangerous project to march the troops at so great a distance. The Zealand deputies opposed it so strenuously, that the duke was obliged to tell them plainly, that he had the queen's positive orders to march with the troops in her way towards the Moselle. Accordingly, having taken his leave of the States, the duke set out from Holland, and in five days arrived at Maestricht, where his army was encamped. From Maestricht the duke of Marlborough marched to Bedburg.

“The French began by this time to be alarmed, though they were far from suspecting the duke's real design. His marching towards Coblenz, and the great preparations which were making in that place, made them believe, that he designed to open the campaign with the siege of Traerbach, and endeavour to advance along the Moselle into France. Upon this supposition they detached 5,000 foot, and 2,000 horse towards that river, and gave out, that they intended the siege of Huy, vainly imagining, that by this report they might stop the progress of the English general. But the duke, well knowing that the forces which were left in Flanders under Auverquerque, were sufficient to frustrate any attempt which the French could make on that side, continued his march, and advanced from Bedburg to Kerpenord, the next day to Kalsecken, where he received an express from prince Lewis of Baden, with some intercepted letters, by which it appeared, that the French intended to force their passage through the Black-forest, and, after joining the Bavarians, to march directly to Vienna. About the same time, the duke received advice from the Netherlands, that the court of France had sent positive orders to Villeroi to march towards the Moselle with 35 battalions, and 46 squadrons, being still firmly persuaded, that the duke would act on that side. Upon this, the duke gave immediate orders for his forces to march with all expedition; and whilst the army was on a full march, he went to take a view of the fortifications of Bonne, where, having given his directions to the governor of that place, he returned in the evening to the army. Here he received certain advice, that the recruits for the French army in Bavaria, with farther reinforcements had joined the elector three days before a Villigen. But the duke, notwithstanding this junction of the enemies, was, on account of the number of the troops which the French left behind them, and by the marshal's marching back with the rest of his army towards the Rhine confirmed in his opinion, that the enemies were as yet wholly ignorant of his design. He therefore continued his march with unwearied diligence, and advanced to the camp of Neudorf near Coblenz, where, besides Mr. Davenant the queen's agent at Francfort, and M. d'Amello, envoy extraordinary from the States-general, count Wratislaw, in his return from London waited on him to settle all things for his farther march, and his conjunction with the imperial army. Then the duke passed the Neckar near Ladenburg, where he rested three days. Having, by this time, gained the advance of some days of the French army, he wrote to the States from Ladenburg, to let them know that he had the queen's order to march to the relief of the empire, with which he hoped they would agree, and allow his carrying their troops to share in the honour of the expedition. He had their answer as quick as the courier could bring it, by which they approved of the design, and of his carrying their troops with him. So he had now the whole army at his own disposal.

“The French imagining that he would advance to the Upper-Rhine, Villeroi marched thither with all possible speed; and, at the same time, a detachment of 7 battalions and 21 squadrons, from the confederate army in Flanders, under the duke of Wirtemberg, followed the duke of Marlborough, who marched from Ladenburg to Mildenheim, where, the next day, prince Eugene paid him a visit. The consultations between the prince and the duke lasted several hours; and it was agreed upon that the two armies should join, and the duke and prince Lewis of Baden should command each day alternately, and that prince Eugene should go upon the Rhine to command a separate army. The troops being drawn up in order of battle, the duke accompanied prince Eugene to a review, when the prince seemed wonderfully pleased to find them in such excellent order after so long a march. The next day, prince Lewis of Baden arrived in the camp at Great-Heppach, where a conference was held in the evening. The day following the troops marched from Great-Heppach, and prince Lewis went to his army on the Danube, and prince Eugene rid post for Philipshurg to command the army on the Rhine, and on the 22d joined prince Lewis of Baden at Wasterstedt. On the 24th the army marched from thence to Elchingen, the next day to Gingen. On the 30th the army marched from thence to Landthausen on the right, and Balmertsloffen on the left, and passed so near the enemy's camp, that lieutenant-general Bulau was sent out the night before with a detachment of 1,000 horse and dragoons, to secure the avenues, by which they might have disturbed the march of the allies, who, by this means, proceeded without any opposition: On the 1st of July they continued their march in sight of the enemy's intrenchments at Dillingen, and incamped the right at Amerdighen, and the left at Onderingen.

"While they lay in this camp, the duke received advice, that the elector of Bavaria had sent the best of his infantry to reinforce count d'Arco, who was posted at Schellenberg, a rising ground on the Danube, near Donawert, where, for several days, he had caused some thousands of men to work upon intrenchments, as being a post of vast importance. The duke resolved to march and attack the enemy; and the necessary directions being given to the army, on the 2d of July, early in the morning, he advanced with a detachment of 30 squadrons of English and Dutch, a considerable number of foot commanded by lieutenant-general Goor, 3 battalions of imperial grenadiers under prince Lewis of Baden, and the rest of the army followed with all possible diligence. But the march being long, and the ways very bad, they could not reach the river Wermitz, which run by Donawert, till about noon, and it was three hours before the bridges were finished, for the troops and cannon to pass over. About 5 o'clock in the afternoon, they came before Schellenberg, and the duke of Marlborough moved up with the horse as near the enemy's intrenchments as was necessary to take a view of them. In the mean time, the artillery began to fire upon the enemy, who answered briskly from their batteries for about an hour, when the English and Dutch foot, supported by the horse and dragoons, began the attack with prodigious resolution, before the Imperialists could arrive; but, having the greatest part of the enemy's forces to contend with, they were at first obliged to give ground. Soon after the Imperialists came up very seasonably, and being led on in good order by prince Lewis of Baden, advanced to the enemy's works without once firing, threw their fascines into the ditch, and passed over with inconsiderable loss. The enemy's horse charged them vigorously, but were repulsed; and then, the Imperial cavalry entering their intrenchments, and the English and Dutch breaking in about the same time, the confederates made a dreadful slaughter of the enemy. The horse and dragoons shared the glory of the day with the infantry, and all the confederate troops behaved themselves with incredible bravery and resolution. But, as the attack was begun by a battalion of the English foot-guards, and the regiments of Orkney and Ingoldshby, they suffered very much. The enemy's forces consisted of 32,000 men, all choice troops, commanded in chief by count d'Arco, and under him by two Bavarian and two French lieutenant-generals. As soon as the confederates had possessed the intrenchments, the enemy ran away in great confusion to Donawert and the Danube; but, being closely pursued by the horse and dragoons, a great many followed the example of their generals, who saved themselves by swimming over that river. The loss of the enemy was computed to be about 6,000 men. The confederates made themselves masters of 16 pieces of cannon, 13 colours, with all their tents and baggage. The duke of Marlborough gained great honour in this action, giving directions with extraordinary presence of mind, and exposing his person to the greatest danger. The next day, the Bavarian garrison quitted Donawert upon the approach of the confederates, and broke down the bridges, but had not time to destroy their ammunition and provisions, as they had intended.

"The elector of Bavaria was no sooner informed of the defeat of his troops at Schellenberg, than he quitted his strong camp between Dillingen and Lavingen, and came to the other side of the Danube, over-against Donawert, in his march to the river Leche, to prevent the confederates cutting off his retreat to his country.

"On the 5th of July, the duke of Marlborough passed the Danube near Donawert; and, on the 17th, count de Frise, with a detachment of 4,000 men and 12 pieces of cannon, marched over the river Leche, and took post in the country of Bavaria. The whole army marched at the same time, and incamped with the right at Hamber, and the left at Ginderkingen. Upon the first notice of the allies having begun to pass the Leche, the garrison of Newburg marched out and retired to Ingoldstadt. Whereupon a detachment of dragoons was immediately sent out by the duke of Marlborough to take possession of that place; and prince Lewis of Baden ordered general Herberville, who commanded a separate body of between 3 and 4,000 men on the other side of the Danube, to remain there for the security of that important place, and for the drawing of provisions out of Franconia for the subsistence of the confederate troops, while they continued in Bavaria. On the 10th, the whole army passed the Leche; and, on the 13th, count Vecklen, general of the Palatine horse, arrived from prince Eugene of Savoy with an account, that the marshals Villeroy and Tallard had passed the Rhine above fort Kehl, in order to succour the elector of Bavaria: for which reason he desired a reinforcement of horse, to enable him the better to observe the enemy's motions. Upon which prince Maximilian of Hanover was detached with thirty squadrons of imperial horse, with orders to join prince Eugene with all possible diligence.

"The duke of Marlborough having now the elector of Bavaria at so great a disadvantage, entered upon a treaty with him, and offered him what terms he could desire, either for himself or his brother, even to the paying him the whole charge of the war, upon condition that he would immediately break with the French, and send his army into Italy to join with the Imperialists there. The elector's subjects who were now at mercy, pressed him vehemently to accept of these terms; and he seemed inclined to hearken to them, and messengers went often between the two armies. But this was done only to gain time, for he sent courier after courier with most pressing instances to hasten the advance of the French army. When he saw, that he could gain no more time, the matter went so far, that articles were ordered to be made ready for signing, which, in conclusion, he refused to do. This refusal was highly resented by the duke of Marlborough and prince Lewis of Baden, who immediately sent out the count de la Tour, general of the imperial horse, and the count of east Friseland, lieutenant general in the Dutch service, with 30 squadrons of horse and dragoons, to plunder and burn the country of Bavaria as far as Munich, the capital city, hoping, that either a generous compassion for his subjects, or the want of subsistence, would conquer the elector's obstinacy. In the mean time, the inhabitants of these parts were in the greatest consternation, and sent deputies to the duke of Marlborough, offering to pay large contributions to prevent military execution. But the duke replied, "That the forces of the queen of Great-Britain were not come into Bavaria to get money, but to bring their prince to reason." The two generals therefore put their commission in execution with the utmost severity, while the elector of Bavaria and the marshal de Marsin, having evacuated Ratisbon, were obliged to confine themselves within their strong camp and intrenchments at Augsburg, in expectation of another army from France under marshal Tallard, which, notwithstanding all the vigilance and precaution of prince Eugene, arrived before the end of July at Biberach near Ulm, to the number of about twenty-two thousand men. Upon this, the elector marched with his army from Augsburg, and took that opportunity to join the French.

"The confederate army, under the duke of Marlborough, having intelligence of these proceedings, decamped on the 4th of August from Friburg, and marched that night to Kippach. The next morning they encamped from thence, and marched to Hokenwert, where they continued two days. During that time, the duke of Marlborough, prince Eugene, and prince Lewis of Baden, held a council of war; wherein it was agreed, that prince Lewis should besiege Ingoldstadt, whilst the other two were to observe the elector of Bavaria. On the 8th, the army under the duke of Marlborough marched from Hokenwert to St. Sanditzel; and, on the 9th from thence to Axheim; and at the same time, prince Lewis went another way, and bent his march directly to Newberg, in order to invest Ingoldstadt. The same day, the duke of Marlborough received advice, that the enemy had passed part of their army over the Danube, at Lewingen: whereupon he ordered general Churchill to march with a strong detachment over that river at Schonevelt; to reinforce prince Eugene, who lay encamped at Donawert. The 10th, they marched to Schonevelt; and the day following intelligence was brought, that the enemy's troops had all got over the Danube; so that the duke of Marlborough immediately ordered his army to march by break of day, and pass that river likewise; which was performed accordingly, and, at night, the whole army, being rejoined, encamped at Munster. On the 12th, very early in the morning, the generals of the allies went to view the enemy's army, taking with them all the picquet guard, which consisted of twenty-eight squadrons. The duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene went up to the top of a tower called Thiffingen, that they might the better observe the posture of the enemy; and they took notice, that their advanced squadrons, which were in motion towards the allies, stopped short, after they had perceived them. They were possessed of a very advantageous post, on a hill near Hochstet, their right flank being covered by the Danube, and the village of Blenheim, and the left by the village of Lutzingen; and they had a rivulet before them whose banks were very high, and the bottom marshy. However, after some consultation, it was thought proper to fall upon the enemy before they had time to fortify themselves at that post. The duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene saw the danger of being forced to lie idle in their own camp, till their forage should be consumed, and their provisions spent. They had also intercepted letters from marshal Villeroy to the elector of Bavaria, by which it appeared, that he had orders to march into Wirtemberg, to destroy that country, and to cut off the communication with the Rhine, which must have been fatal to the allies. The necessary dispositions were therefore made for the next morning's action. Many of the general officers came and represented to the duke of Marlborough the difficulties of the design; he answered, that he saw these well, but that the thing was absolutely necessary; so they were sent to give orders every where, which were received all over the army with an alacrity that gave a happy presage of the success which followed.

"On the 13th of August, a day which decided the elector's fate by the loss of all his country, early in the morning, the whole confederate army marched from Munster, leaving their tents standing; and the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene, having posted themselves on a rising ground, summoned all the general officers, to give them the necessary directions, if other to attack the enemy; upon which, the army advanced to the plain, and were drawn up in order of battle. About nine o'clock, the enemy fired some cannon upon our troops, as they were marching to form the line, who were answered from our batteries with good success; and both armies continued cannonading each other till near one; during which time, the duke of Marlborough ordered a little rivulet and morass in the front of the enemy to be sounded; and, where it was found impassible, orders were given to the horse of the second line of the allies to provide themselves, each squadron with twenty fascines, to facilitate the passage. These preparations being made, the duke of Marlborough gave orders for a general attack, which was begun about one o'clock. Prince Eugene and the imperial general officers were on the right; general Churchill, the lord Cutts, lieutenant general Lumley, the lord Orkney, and lieutenant general Igouldsby, with the rest of the English and Dutch generals, were on the left; and the duke of Marlborough in the centre commanded the whole. Major-general Wilks made the first onset, with five English battalions of How, Igouldsby, Marlborough, Rowe, and North and Grey, and four battalions of Hessians, supported by the lord Cutts, and major-general St. Paul, with eleven other battalions, and fifteen squadrons of horse, under the command of major-general Wood. The five English battalions, led on by brigadier Rowe, who charged on foot at the head of his own regiment with unparalleled intrepidity, assaulted the village of Blenheim, advancing to the very muzzles of the enemy's muskets, and some of the officers exchanging thrusts of swords with the French through the palisadoes. But being exposed to a fire much superior to their own, they were soon obliged to retire, leaving behind them one third part of their men either killed or mortally wounded, the brigadier who commanded them, being among the last. In this retreat, they were pursued by thirteen squadrons of the French gendarmes and carabineers, who would have intirely cut them to pieces, had not the Hessian infantry stopped their career, by the great fire they made upon them. The French being repulsed, and forced to fly in their turn, were chased by five squadrons of English horse, who by this time had passed the rivulet; but whilst the enemy rallied themselves, some fresh brigades, superior in number, came to their assistance, charged the assailants with great vigour, and obliged many of them to re-pass the rivulet with great precipitation. Here again the Hessian foot performed signal service, putting the French to the rout by their continual fire, and regaining the colours, which they had taken from Rowe's regiment.

"While Rowe's brigade rallied themselves, that of Ferguson, commanded by himself, attacked the village of Blenheim, on the left, but with no better success; and, though both returned three or four times to the charge with equal vigour, yet they were both still repulsed with like disadvantage, so that it was found impossible to force the enemy in that post, without intirely sacrificing the confederate infantry.

"The English foot having thus begun the engagement on the left, the horse of the same wing passed the rivulet, with great bravery, and covered against the centre or main battalia of the enemy; as did likewise that of the right wing, having made several passages with divers pieces of wood. After which they drew up in order of battle, the French and Bavarians giving them all the time that could be desired for that purpose, keeping themselves very quiet on the hills, which they were possessed of, without descending into the meadows towards the rivulet, so that even the second line of the horse had time to form themselves: and to this capital fault of the French, the confederates were thought to have owed principally their victory. This neglect is said to have proceeded from an ill-timed haughtiness and presumption of marshal de Tallard, who being informed that the allies were laying bridges on the rivulet, used this expression, "if they have not bridges enough, I will lend them some;" and when they told him that our troops were actually coming over the rivulet, he is reported to have said, "Let them pass: the more comes over, the more we shall have to kill and make prisoners." But, on the other hand, it is alleged by some that he had given positive orders not to let the enemy pass the rivulet, but to charge them as they passed; which orders were not executed.

"At length the duke's cavalry moving towards the hill, that of marshal de Tallard came down, and charged them with a great deal of fury; the French infantry, posted at Blenheim, making at the same time a terrible fire from behind some hedges on their flank, which were advanced too near that village, so that the first line was put into such disorder, that part of them retired beyond the rivulet. Upon this, the duke gave orders to lieutenant general Bulaw, commander in chief of the troops of Lunenburgh, to bring up his own regiment of dragoons, and two of the troops of Zell; which charged the enemy's horse with so much vigour, that they broke them, and drove them beyond the second rivulet, called Meul Weyer, and from thence to the very hedges of the village of Blenheim. This gave time to those, who had given ground, to re-pass the rivulet, and to form a second line behind those regiments of dragoons, and some others, that had joined them, so that those dragoons remained in the first line during the rest of the action.

"The cavalry of the confederates left wing, having by this success gained the advantage of forming themselves intirely in order of battle, advanced leisurely to the top of the hill, and several times charged the enemy's horse, who were always routed, but who, nevertheless, rallied every time, though at a considerable distance, and thereby gave the allies an opportunity of gaining ground. As the duke of Marlborough, who was now in person among them, was preparing a fresh attack, marshal de Tallard caused ten of his battalions to advance, to fill up the intervals of his cavalry, in order to make a last effort; which the duke perceiving, caused three battalions of the troops of Zell to come up and sustain the horse. Then the prince of Heese Cassel, general of the horse, and the lieutenant generals Lumley, Bulaw, Hompesch, and Ingoldsby, returned with their troops to the charge; but the superior fire of the enemy's infantry put their first line into some disorder, so that it shrunk back, and remained, for some time, at about sixty paces distant from the enemy, neither party advancing against the other. At length, the confederates pushed forwards with so much bravery and success, that, having broke and routed the enemy's horse, the ten battalions, who found themselves abandoned by them, were cut to pieces, none escaping, but a very few soldiers, who threw themselves on the ground, as dead, to save their lives.

“ Marshal de Tallard rallied his broken cavalry behind some tents, which were still standing in his camp; and, seeing things in this desperate condition, resolved to draw off his dragoons and infantry out of the village of Blenheim. He thereupon sent one of his aid-de-camps to marshal de Marsin, who, with the elector of Bavaria, commanded on the left, to desire him, ‘to face the enemy with some troops on the right of the village of Oberklau, to keep them in play, and favour the retreat of the infantry, that was in Blenheim.’ But marshal de Marsin represented to the messenger, ‘That he had too much business in the front of the village, where he was posted, and where he had to deal with the duke of Marlborough, who was come to the assistance of prince Eugene, as well as in the rest of the line, to spare any troops; since he was so far from being victorious, that all he could do was to maintain his ground.’

“ In the mean time, Ingoldsby made the other generals of the same attack sensible, how easily they might entirely defeat the French cavalry, by charging them on the right flank. This advice being put into execution with a great deal of vigour, the enemy were soon thrown into disorder, and put to flight, part of them endeavouring to gain the bridge, which they had over the Danube, between Blenheim and Hochstet; and the other part, among whom were the Gens d'Armes, were closely pursued by the Lunenburgh dragoons, and those, who escaped the slaughter, threw themselves into the Danube, where most of them were drowned. Those, who fled towards Hochstet, rallied once more, making a shew to succour the rest; but the same regiment of Bothmar faced them, and kept them in awe for some time, till it was joined by some other regiments, when the enemy made the best of their way to save themselves by flight.

“ The marshal de Tallard was surrounded by the fugitives, and taken near a mill, behind the village of Sonderen, not far from the Danube, by M. de Boineburg, a lieutenant-colonel of the troops of Hesse, aid-de-camp to the prince of Hesse Cassel. The marquis de Montperroux, general of horse; de Seppéville, de Silly, and de la Valiere, major generals; M. de la Messeliere, St. Poulange, de Legondais, and several other officers of note, were likewise made prisoners in this defeat.

“ While these things passed at the village of Blenheim, and in the centre, the duke of Marlborough caused the village of Oberklau, which was marshal de Marsin's quarters, to be attacked by the brigade of Berensdorf, consisting of ten battalions. The prince of Holstein-Beck who commanded them as major-general, passed the rivulet, at the head of two battalions, with undaunted resolution. But as the Imperial cavalry, which was to have supported him, were wanting in their duty, and kept musket-shot from him, he was scarce got over, when seven or eight of the enemy's battalions fell upon him with great fury, before he could form his two battalions; so that one of them, that of Goor, was almost entirely cut to pieces, and the prince himself desperately wounded and taken prisoner. But, notwithstanding this first shock, these battalions were no sooner supported by some Danish and Hanoverian cavalry, than they charged a second time, but with no better success; till, upon the third charge, the duke of Marlborough having himself brought up some squadrons, which were supported by others of the body of reserve, made them advance with some battalions beyond the rivulet; upon which the enemy began to retire.

“ As soon as the duke had performed this considerable service, he repaired to the centre, where, finding the action decided in favour of the confederates, he caused part of his victorious cavalry to halt, to observe the motions of that part of the enemy, which, by this time, was drawn up beyond the morass of Hochstet. During this halt, the elector of Bavaria, whom prince Eugene could make no impression upon for some time, but whose bravery at last put that elector's troops to the rout, was perceived making his retreat from the village of Lutzingen. Upon which, orders were dispatched to the baron de Hompesch (who with several squadrons was pursuing the fugitives towards Morselingen, and who had already overtaken and forced two of their battalions to lay down their arms) to face about, and march to join those who halted, as well to prevent the elector's falling upon Hompesch's rear, as to form a body, in order to charge that prince, who marched in great haste, but in pretty good order, with his squadrons on the left, and his battalions on the right. But before general Hompesch returned from his chace, the right wing of the confederate army was perceived at some distance behind the elector; and, appearing to be part of his army marching in such a manner, as might easily have flanked them, had the duke immediately charged him, the duke, with great prudence, sent out a party to view them. During this time, the elector continued marching off with great precipitation, till he reached the morass of Morselingen.

“ The French horse being intirely defeated, and the confederates masters of all the ground, which was between the enemy's left and the village of Blenheim, the 28 battalions and 12 squadrons of dragoons, which were in the village, found themselves cut off from the rest of their army, and, despairing of being able to make their escape, after a weak attempt to re-

paise the infantry, who surrounded them, capitulated about 8 in the evening, laid down their arms, delivered their colours and standards, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war, on condition that the officers should not be searched.

" This defeat cost the enemy, by their own accounts, 40,000 men, in which number they included 4 or 5,000 lost in their precipitate retreat to the Black Forest, either by desertion, or the pursuit of the Hussars or peasants, who made a great slaughter of the stragglers. The confederates gained above 100 pieces of cannon, 24 mortars, 129 colours, 171 standards, 17 pair of kettle-drums, 3,600 tents, 34 coaches, 300 laden mules, 2 bridges of boats, 15 ponies, 24 barrels, and 8 casks of silver. But this success cost them 4,485 men killed, 7,552 wounded, and 273 left or made prisoners.

" The emperor made great acknowledgements to the duke of Marlborough for this signal service, and offered to make him a prince of the empire, which the duke said he could not decently accept of, till he knew the queen's pleasure; and, upon her consenting to it, he was created a prince of the empire, and about a year after, Mindleheim was assigned him for his principality.

" The success of the battle having entirely changed the face of affairs in the empire, and saved the house of Austria from ruin, the duke of Marlborough, being willing to lose no time, and judging it more advantageous for the common cause to join all the confederate forces together, to straiten the enemy as much as possible, and oblige them to abandon Germany, and pass the Rhine, sent an express to prince Lewis of Baden, to leave the siege of Ingoldstadt, and rejoin the army with the forces under his command; considering, that not only that city, but the whole country of Bavaria, must be of course into the emperor's hands. The duke's and prince Eugene's opinion was confirmed by the example of the city of Augsburg, which the French abandoned, carrying with them four hostages, as a security for 2,000 sick and wounded men, whom they left in that place. The magistrates being assembled immediately after, sent four deputies to the duke of Marlborough to desire his protection; who assured them, that they had nothing to fear from the troops of her Britannic majesty and the States-general, which were only sent against the enemies of the empire and their allies. And thereupon he ordered a detachment to march, and take possession of that important place. Soon after marshal de Tallard, with the prisoners of distinction, were sent towards Bamau and Francfort under a guard of dragoons, and the other prisoners were sent into the adjacent places.

" On the 21st of August the duke encamped at Seffelingen, within half a league of Ulm; and the next day the governor of Ulm, who apprehended a siege, sent out of the town 430 prisoners, which the enemy had taken at Hochstet, Dillingen, and other places, with a compliment to the duke, that he would be pleased to take an opportunity to return an equal number; and, those persons being Germans, the duke sent them to prince Eugene. On the 23rd, the duke, prince Eugene, and prince Lewis of Baden had a long conference, wherein they concerted the further operations of the campaign; and it was resolved, that, seeing the enemy were returning towards the Rhine, all the confederate forces should likewise march that way, except 23 battalions and some squadrons, which should be left under the command of general Thungen to carry on the siege of Ulm. In pursuance whereof, the confederate troops began their march from the neighbourhood of Ulm, on the 26th of August, by different roads, to the general rendezvous of the army, which was appointed to be at Bruschal near Philippsburgh. From that day the confederate army was in motion till the 9th of Sept., when a party of Imperial horse, having met some squadrons of the enemy, commanded by the duke de Monfort, a major-general, who had been conducting 4 battalions and a sum of money into Landau, fell upon them with great vigour, and routed them, killing above 100 upon the spot, taking several prisoners, and mortally wounding their commander. On the 12th, prince Lewis of Baden marched towards Landau, with the troops appointed to besiege that place; and the duke of Marlborough, with prince Eugene, came to the camp of Croon Weissenburgh, in order to cover the siege. The same night, the duke received an express from general Thungen, importing, that, having formed the siege of Ulm, and received his great artillery, the garrison beat a parley the 10th, and the next day surrendered that place upon honourable terms; which he was willing to grant, that no time might be lost for the further execution of the projects of this campaign. The Imperialists found in Ulm 229 pieces of brass cannon, 25 brass mortars, 1,200 barrels of powder, with a considerable quantity of provisions, which was seasonably applied to the carrying on the siege of Landau, which prince Lewis of Baden insisted on, as necessary to secure the Circles, Suabia in particular, from the excursions of that garrison. This was popular in Germany, and, though the duke did not approve it, he did not oppose it with all the authority, that his great success gave him. This was universally blamed, for, while France was in the consternation, which their late great loss brought them under, a more vigorous proceeding was like to have greater effects; and, besides that the Imperial army was ill-provided, the great charge of a siege was above their strength. Prince Lewis suffered much in his reputation for this undertaking: It was that which the French wished for, and therefore it was suspected, that some secret practice had prevailed on that prince to propose it. It is certain, that he was jealous of the glory which the duke of Marlborough had obtained, and in which himself had no share; and it was believed, that if he had not gone to besiege Ingoldstadt, the battle of Höchstet had never been fought. He was indeed so fierce a bigot in his religion, that he could not bear the successes of those whom he called heretics, and the exaltation which he thought heresy might have upon it. While the duke of Marlborough lay covering the siege, marshal de Villeroy, with his army, came and looked on him; but as the soldiers of the confederates were exalted with their success, so the French were too much dispirited with their losses to make any attack, or to put any thing to hazard, in order to raise the siege. They retired back, and went into quarters, and trusted to the bad state of the Imperial army, who were ill-provided and ill-supplied. The garrison made as vigorous a defence, and drew out the siege to as great a length, as could be expected. Prince Lewis had neither engineers, nor ammunition, and wanted money to provide them; so that, if the duke had not supplied him, he must have been forced to give it over. The king of the Romans came again, to have the honour of taking the place: But his behaviour there did not serve to raise his character; for he was not often in the places of danger, and was content to look on at a great and safe distance. He was likewise constantly beset with priests, and such a face of superstition and bigotry appeared about him, that it very much damped the hopes that were given of him. However, on the 23rd of November, the besiegers having lodged themselves on the counterscarps both on the right and left, and sufficient breaches being opened, the next morning the necessary dispositions were made for a general assault, and 5,000 men were commanded upon that service. The besieged, being therefore reduced to this extremity, were obliged to beat a parley between 10 and 11 o'clock, whereupon hostages were exchanged, and the capitulation signed the same day.

“The confederates, omitting nothing that might advance the glory, which they had already acquired in Bavaria, resolved to prosecute the siege of Traerbach. To which end, the duke of Marlborough marched towards the Moselle with a considerable army, which he left under the command of the hereditary prince of Hesse-Cassel, as also the direction of the attacks of that place. The castle was invested in the beginning of November, and the approaches were carried with such success, that, on the 21st, the besiegers attempted to storm it. But as they were climbing up the eminences (the rock, on which that fortress is built, proving very steep, and the weather exceedingly stormy) the garrison made so vigorous a defence, that the assailants were obliged to retire with considerable loss. Notwithstanding these discouragements, the prince of Hesse was resolved to carry on the siege with the utmost vigour; and, on the 20th of December, obliged the garrison to surrender on honourable conditions. The confederates met with a great deal of difficulty and opposition in all the attacks; and the baron de Trogne, the States' chief engineer, was shot by the prince of Hesse's side, as he was giving the necessary directions; and they had above a thousand men killed or wounded.

“During the siege of Traerbach, the duke of Marlborough went to the court of Prussia, to negotiate that 8,000 Prussians might be sent to Italy the next campaign, to serve there for the relief of the duke of Savoy, under the command of prince Eugene. He was received at Berlin, and at all other places, through which he passed, with the highest respect; and thence he proceeded to the court of Hanover, where he arrived on the 1st of December, and thence continued his journey to the Hague, where he was congratulated by the deputies of the States-general, upon his victories at Schellenberg and Höchstet; and was as much considered and submitted to in Holland, as if he had been their stadtholder. The credit, which he was in among them, was very happy for them, and was, indeed, necessary at that time for keeping down their factions and animosities, which were rising in every province, and in most of their towns. Only Amsterdam, as it was the most sensible of the common danger, so it was not only quiet within itself, but it contributed not a little to keep all the rest so, which was chiefly maintained by the duke of Marlborough's prudent management; who, having settled all matters relating to the ensuing campaign, embarked for England, and arrived at London the 11th of December.

“At sea, this summer, affairs were carried on much more doubtfully than at land. Sir George Rooke sailed into the Streights, where he reckoned he was strong enough for the Toulon squadron, which was then abroad in the Mediterranean. Soon after that a strong squadron from Brest passed by Lisbon into the Streights. Mr. Methuen, the English ambassador in Portugal, apprehending, that, if these two squadrons should join to attack sir George Rooke, it would not be possible for him to fight against so great a force, sent a man of war, which that admiral had left at Lisbon, with some particular orders, which made the captain very unwilling to carry the message; but the ambassador promised to indemnify him. The captain sailed through the French fleet, and brought this important advertisement to sir George Rooke, who told him, that on this occasion he would pass by his not observing his orders, but that, for the future, he would find the safest course was to obey orders. Upon this sir George stood out of the way of the French towards the mouth of the Streights, and there met sir Cloudeley Shovel with a squadron of our best ships, with which being reinforced, he sailed up the Streights again, being now in a condition to engage the French. He came before Barcelona, where the prince of Hesse-Darmstadt assured him, there was a strong party ready to declare for king Charles, as it was certain there was a disposition in many to do it. But sir George would not stay above three days before that city; so that the motions within the town, and the discoveries which many made of their inclinations, had almost proved fatal to them. He answered, when pressed to stay a few days more, that his orders were positive; and that he must sail towards Nice, which it was believed the French intended to besiege. But, as he was sailing that way, he received advice, that the French had made no advances in that design; and therefore he turned his course westward, and came in sight of the French fleet, sailing from Brest to Toulon. The advantage which he had, was so visible, that it was expected, he would have made towards the enemy, but he did not. What orders he had was not known, for the matter never came under examination. The French got to Toulon, and he steered another way. The whole French fleet was then together in that harbour, for though the Toulon squadron had been out before, it was then in port. A very happy accident had preserved a rich fleet of merchant ships from Scanderoon under the convoy of three or four frigates, from falling into their hands. The French fleet lay in their way in the bay of Tunis: and nothing could have saved them from being taken, but that, which happened in the critical minute, in which they needed it. A thick fog covered them all the while that they were sailing by that bay, so that they had no apprehension of the danger they were in, till they had passed it.

“ Sir George Rooke, as he sailed back, fell upon Gibraltar, which, in a council of war held, July 17, about seven leagues to the eastward of Tetuan, it was resolved to attack. Four days after, the fleet got into the bay, and 1,800 marines, English and Dutch, with the prince of Hesse Darmstadt at their head, were put on shore, on the neck of land to the northward of the town, to cut off any communication with the country. The prince having thus posted his men, sent a summons to the governor to surrender the place for the service of his catholic majesty; which he refusing, the admiral, the next day, gave orders that the ships which had been appointed to cannonade the town under the command of rear-admiral Byng, and rear-admiral Vanderdusson, as also those which were to batter the South-mole-head, commanded by captain Hicks in the Yarmouth, should range themselves accordingly. But, the wind blowing contrary, they could not possibly get into their places till the day was spent. In the mean time, to amuse the enemy, captain Whitaker was sent in with some boats who burnt a French privateer of twelve guns, at the Old Mole. On the 23rd, soon after break of day, the ships being all placed, the admiral gave the word for beginning the cannonade, which was performed with very great fury, about fifteen thousand shot being made in five or six hours time against the town, so that the enemy were soon driven from their guns, especially at the South-mole-head. Whereupon, the admiral considering, that by gaining that fortification they should of consequence reduce the town, ordered captain Whitaker, with all the boats armed, to endeavour to possess himself of it; which was performed with great expedition. But captain Lickes and captain Jumper, who lay next the Mole, had pushed on shore with their pinnaces and some other boats, before the rest could come up. Whereupon the enemy sprung a mine, which blew up the fortification about the Mole, killed two lieutenants, and about forty men, and wounded about sixty. However, our men kept possession of the great platform, of which they had made themselves masters; and, captain Whitaker landing with the rest of the seamen, who had been ordered upon this service, they advanced, and took a redoubt or small bastion, half way between the mole and the town, and possessed themselves of many of the enemy's cannon; upon which the governor desired to capitulate, and surrendered upon honourable terms.

“ Sir George Rooke, after he had supplied Gibraltar, sailed again into the Mediterranean, and, in conjunction with the Dutch fleet under vice-admiral Callemburgh, met off Malaga the count de Thoulouse with the whole French fleet, which was much superior to the English in number, and had many galleys with them, that were of great use. Sir George Rooke called a council of war, in which it was resolved to engage the enemy; but there was not due care taken to furnish all the ships with a sufficient quantity of powder, for some had wasted a great part of their stock of ammunition before Gibraltar; however they had generally 25 rounds, and it had seldom happened, that so much powder was spent in an action at sea. On the 13th of August, as the two fleets engaged, sir Cloudesly Shovel advanced with his squadron to a close fight, for it was the maxim of our seamen to fight as near as they could; and he had the advantage, and the enemy's van gave way in no little confusion, as did their rear soon after, being no less vigorously attacked by the Dutch. But the enemies being very strong in the centre, and some of the English ships being obliged to go out of the line for want of shot, (occasioned by the great expence of it at Gibraltar) several of sir George Rooke's own squadron suffered very much. About seven in the evening, one of the French admiral's seconds advanced out of the line, and began a close fight with the St. George, commanded by sir John Jennings, but, notwithstanding the St. George had already suffered much, she met with such rough treatment, that she had difficulty enough to rejoin the line, after the loss of both her captains and many of her men. The engagement continued till night parted them, and, if the French had come to a new engagement next day, it might have been fatal, since many of our ships were without shot, whilst others had enough and to spare. In this long and hot action there was no ship on either side, that was taken, sunk, or burnt. The English made a shew the next day of preparing for a second engagement, but the enemy bore off, to the great joy of our fleet. The French suffered much in the action, and went into Toulon so disabled, that they could not be put in a condition to go to sea again in many months. They left the sea, as the field of battle, to the English; so that the honour of the action remained with us, though the nation was not greatly elated with the news of a drawn battle at sea with the French: It was long before a certain account of the action was brought to England; but the modesty, with which the French king wrote of it to the archbishop of Paris, put us out of all fears; for, whereas the French stile was very boasting of their successes, in this case it was only said, that the action was to his advantage. From that cold expression the English concluded, that the victory was on their side. When the full account was sent home from our fleet, the partialities on both sides appeared very signally. The Tories magnified this as a great victory; but persons skilled in naval affairs, differed much in their sentiments, about sir George Rooke's conduct in that action, some not only justifying, but extolling it as much as others condemned it."

THIRD SESSION OF THE FIRST PARLIAMENT OF QUEEN ANNE.

The Queen's Speech on opening the Session.] October 29. The parliament met for the dispatch of business, when her majesty made the following Speech to both Houses.

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"The great and remarkable success with which God hath blessed our arms in this summer, has stirred up our good subjects in all parts of the kingdom to express their unanimous joy and satisfaction: and I assure myself you are all come disposed to do every thing that is necessary for the effectual prosecution of the war; nothing being more obvious, than that a timely improvement of our present advantages will enable us to procure a lasting foundation of security for England and a firm support for the liberty of Europe: this is my aim. I have no interest, nor ever will have, but to promote the good and happiness of all my subjects.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; I must desire such Supplies of you, as may be requisite for carrying on the next year's service both by sea and land, and for punctually performing our treaties with all our allies; the rather, for that some of them have just pretensions depending ever since the last war: and I need not put you in mind of what importance it is to preserve the public credit, both abroad and at home.—I believe you will find some charges necessary next year, which were not mentioned in the last sessions, and some extraordinary expences incurred since which were not then provided for.—I assure you, that all the Supplies you give, with what I am able to spare from my own expences, shall be carefully applied to the best advantage for the public service: and I earnestly recommend to you a speedy dispatch, as that, which under the good providence of God, we must chiefly depend upon, to disappoint the earliest design of our enemies:

"My Lords and Gentlemen, I cannot but tell you how essential it is for attaining those great ends abroad, of which we have so hopeful a prospect, that we should be entirely united at home.—It is plain, our enemies have no encouragement left, but what arises from their hopes of our divisions. It is therefore your concern not to give the least countenance to those hopes.—My inclinations are to be kind and indulgent to you all. I hope you will do nothing to endanger the loss of this opportunity which God has put into our hands, of securing ourselves and all Europe; and that there will be no contention among you but what shall most promote the public welfare.—Such temper as this in all your proceedings cannot fail of securing your reputation both at home and abroad.—This would make me a happy queen, whose utmost endeavours would never be wanting to make you a happy and flourishing people."

The Lords' Address.] Oct. 30.—The two Houses immediately voted congratulatory Addresses; and, the next day the following one was presented by the Lords:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual, and temporal, in parliament assembled, beg leave to return our humble and hearty thanks to your majesty for your most gracious Speech to your parliament.—The kindness and indulgence your majesty hath expressed for all your subjects: your care to create a perfect union among us, by forewarning us of the mischiefs of divisions: your goodness in declaring your own happiness to depend upon that of your people; your desire to see that happiness settled upon a lasting foundation; your strict regard to treaties: your justice to public engagements abroad as well as at home; and, your noble concern for the support of the liberties of Europe, comprehend all the royal qualities that can be desired in a sovereign; and when they are all so manifestly united in you royal person, we, and the whole nation should be inexcusable to God and the whole world, in this age and to posterity, if we should not endeavour effectually to accomplish all those great and excellent designs, which your majesty hath so wisely and graciously recommended.—We, for ourselves, faithfully assure your majesty, that we will do all in our power to bring this session to a happy and speedy conclusion, and to improve, to the utmost, the blessed opportunity, that God hath put into our hands.—Upon this occasion of approaching your majesty, we desire humbly to congratulate the great and glorious success of your majesty's arms, in conjunction with those of your allies under the command of the duke of Marlborough. We can never enough admire your wisdom and courage, in sending that seasonable and necessary assistance to the empire; and we cannot too much commend the secrecy and bravery, with which your orders were executed.—What remains for us to do, is, to beseech God, that the like success may attend your majesty's arms, till you see the protestant religion and the liberty of Europe, settled upon a firm and lasting foundation; and that your majesty may live many years, to have the pleasure and glory of beholding those parts of the world happy in the enjoyment of those blessings, which your majesty shall have procured for them."

The Queen's Answer.] To this the queen answered:

"I am very sensible of the great duty and affection you have expressed in the several particulars of this Address; and I return you my hearty thanks for your congratulation of our great success, and for the assurances of your readiness to concur in prosecuting it effectually."

The Commons' Address.] The Address presented to the Commons the same day was thus expressed:

"Most gracious sovereign;

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, in parliament assembled, do beg leave to return to your majesty our most humble and hearty thanks for your majesty's most gracious speech from the throne; and to congratulate your majesty upon the great and glorious success, with which it hath pleased God to bless your majesty in the intire defeat of the united force of France and Bavaria, by the arms of your majesty and your allies under the command and by the courage and conduct of the duke of Marlborough; and in the victory obtained by your majesty's fleet under the command, and by the courage of sir George Rooke.—Your majesty can never be disappointed in your expectation from us, your faithful Commons, who all come disposed to do every thing necessary for the effectual prosecution of the war; and therefore your majesty may depend upon our providing such supplies, and giving such speedy dispatch to the public business, as may enable your majesty to pursue these advantages so happily obtained over the common enemy, which we can never doubt but your majesty's wisdom will improve to the procuring a lasting security for England, and a firm support for the liberty of Europe.—We are truly sensible, that nothing can be more essential for the attaining those great ends, than to be intirely united at home. We shall therefore use our utmost endeavours, by all proper methods, to prevent all divisions among us, and will have no contention, but who shall best promote and establish the public welfare both in church and state. Thus your majesty's reign will be made happy, and your memory blessed to all posterity."

"The Lords' Address was universally applauded; but that of the Commons gave great

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's Answer was as follows:

"Gentlemen: I return you my hearty thanks for this Address and the assurances you give me of dispatching the supplies, and avoiding all divisions; both which, as they are extremely acceptable to me; so they will be advantageous to yourselves, and beneficial to the public."

However, after the Commons had taken the services of the army and navy into consideration, and by an unanimous vote, on the 2d of November, desired the queen to bestow her bounty upon the seamen and land-forces, who had behaved themselves so gallantly, they proceeded to the Supply. The several sums they granted for the navy, the army, and other necessary expences, amounted to 4,670,486*l.* which they resolved to levy by a land tax of 4*s.* in the pound, by continuing the duties on malt, by raising 877,931*l.* by sale of annuities, and by several other ways and means.

The Queen's Speech on passing the Land tax Bill.] They made so great a dispatch, that, on the 9th of December, the Land tax bill received the royal assent, on which occasion the queen made a short Speech to both houses as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen: I am glad of this occasion to return you my hearty thanks for your making good the assurances you gave me, in your several Addresses, of your zeal and readiness to promote the public business. And I must thank you, gentlemen of the house of Commons, in particular, for your early dispatch of so great a part of the necessary Supplies; which cannot fail of being a very essential advantage, both in the forwardness of our own preparations, and in the great encouragement it will give to all our allies.—My lords and gentlemen, I look upon this good beginning to be so sure a pledge of your affections for my service; particularly, because it spoke in the same terms of the duke of Marlborough's victories and the advantages gained by sir George Rooke. It was also observed, that the promise, which they made to the queen, of using their utmost endeavours to prevent all divisions, was in a manner restrained by the addition of all proper methods, which many looked upon as ominous.

"The duchess of Marlborough, in the Account of her Conduct (p. 146,) makes the following observation on this occasion: My lord of Marlborough, before he had had sufficient opportunity of shewing the greatness of the general, had, for his first successes in the war, been complimented by this very House of Commons, as the retriever of the glory of the English nation, being then reputed a high-churchman. But now, that he was thought to look towards the moderate party, his complete victory at Blenheim was, in the Address of congratulation to the queen, ridiculously paired with sir George Rooke's drawn battle with the French at sea." Tindal.

vice, and for our common interest, that I have not the least doubt but you will continue with the same zeal to dispatch what remains of the public business, and to bring this session to a happy and speedy conclusion."

The Occasional Conformity Bill again brought into the Commons.] It was generally wished, and indeed expected, in the court as well as in the city and country, that the "bill to prevent Occasional Conformity," which was the occasion of great divisions and contests in the two former sessions of this parliament, would not have been revived again at this juncture, when all parties ought to have suspended their animosities, and joined in celebrating the successes of her majesty's arms. But, notwithstanding all the endeavours used by the ministry to engage the leading-men of the high-church party to restrain their zeal, till they might have an opportunity of gratifying it, without obstructing the public business, the parliament had not sat long before Mr. William Bromley moved in the House of Commons for leave to bring in that bill. This motion met with great opposition from all the moderate party, among whom appeared many courtiers, particularly Mr. Henry Boyle, Chancellor of the Exchequer, who spoke strenuously against it. But though it was carried in the affirmative, yet the chief of the high-church party debated several days in their private assemblies, whether they should bring in the bill or not? Though many urged strong reasons for the negative, yet the bill was brought in, but moderated in several clauses: for those, who pressed it, were now resolved to bring the terms as low as possible, in order once to carry a bill upon that head. Upon the first reading of it, after a warm debate, the question was carried for a second reading.

Endeavours to tack it to the Land-Tax Bill.]

This vigorous struggle against the bill, even in the House of Commons, made the patrons of it justly apprehensive, that it would never pass by itself through the Lords; and therefore, after a long consultation in their chief meeting, and (as was then whispered) by the suggestion of Mr. Secretary Harley, in whom they still reposed great confidence, but who designed to decoy them into a snare, they resolved to attempt the tacking of it to the Land-tax bill. Accordingly, Nov. 28, on the second reading of the Occasional Conformity bill,

Mr. Bromley made a long speech, wherein, among other things, he urged, "That the practice of Occasional Conformity was such a scandalous hypocrisy, as was no way to be excused upon any pretence whatsoever. That it was condemned even by the better sort of dissenters themselves. That the employing persons of a different religion from that established by law had never been practised by any wise government, and was not allowed even in Holland. That the sacramental-test was appointed by the wisdom of the legislature to preserve the established church; which church seemed in as much danger from the dissenters at this time as it was from papists, when the act was made. That this law, being so necessary, and having been twice refused in the House of Lords, the only way to have it pass was to tack it to a money-bill. That it had been an ancient practice to tack bills, that were for the good of the subject, to money-bills, it being reasonable, that, while grievous taxes were laid upon the subject, for the support of the crown, the crown should, in return, pass such laws, as were for the benefit of the people. That the great necessity there was for the money bill's passing, was rather an argument for than against this proceeding. For what danger could there be, that the Lords, who pretended to be such great patriots, should rather lose the necessary supplies, than pass an act so requisite for the preservation of the church. That, however, if they should suppose them so unreasonable, the matter was not yet so bad, for it was only but proroguing the parliament for a few days, and then the Commons might pass the Land-tax bill again without the tack. He concluded with moving, That the bill to prevent Occasional Conformity might be tacked to the Land-tax bill."

This motion occasioned a long and warm debate. The design of the party was, that the Lords should be put under a great difficulty; since if they should untack the bill, and separate one from the other, then the House of Commons would have insisted on a maxim, which was now settled among them as a fundamental principle never to be departed from, that the Lords cannot alter a money-bill, but must either pass it, or reject it, as it is sent to them.—On the other hand, the Lords could not agree to any such tack, without departing from that solemn Resolution which was in their books signed by most of them, never to admit of a tack to a money-bill; and, if they yielded now, they taught the House of Commons the way to impose any thing on them at their pleasure. The party in the Commons put their whole strength on the carrying this point. They went farther in their design; that which was truly aimed at by those in the secret, was to break the war, and to force a peace. They knew, that a bill with this tack could not pass in the House of Peers; for some lords even of their own party confessed, that they would never pass it in that manner. By this means money would be stopped; and this would throw all matters into great confusion both at home and abroad, and dispose the allies, as despairing of any help from England, to accept of such terms as France would offer them. Thus an artful design was formed to break, or at least to shake, the whole alliance. The court was very apprehensive of this, and the lord-treasurer Godolphin opposed it with much zeal. The party disowned the design for some time, till they had brought up their whole strength, and thought they were sure of a majority. The debate held long: Those who opposed the tacking, urged, that it was a change of the whole constitution, and was in effect turning it into a common-wealth, for it imported the denying, not only to the Lords, but to the Crown, the free use of their negative in the legislature. If this was once settled, then, as often as the public occasions made a money-bill necessary, every thing, which the majority in the Commons had a mind to, would be tacked to it. It is true, some tacks had been made to money-bills in king Charles's time; but even these had still some relation to the money which was given. But in this case a bill, whose operation was only for one year, and which determined as soon as the four shillings in the pound were paid, was to have a perpetual law tacked to it, which must continue in force, after the greatest part of the act was expired.

Besides these arguments, Mr. Sec. Hedges and the lord Cutts represented to the House that the duke of Marlborough had lately concluded a treaty with the king of Prussia for 8,000 of his men, to be employed towards the relief of the duke of Savoy, who was in most imminent danger. That these troops were actually on their march upon the credit of a vote of that House, that they would make good her Majesty's treaties: And that the obstructing the money-bills, which the tacking would intally do, would put an immediate stop to the march of those troops, and thereby occasion the entire ruin of the duke of Savoy.

Lord Cutts urged, "That the English nation was now in the highest consideration abroad: That all Europe was attentive to the resolutions of this parliament; and that, if any divisions should happen between the two Houses, it would cast a damp upon the whole confederacy, and give the French king almost as great advantage, as we had gained over him at Blenheim."

Mr. Boyle, Chancellor of the Exchequer, spoke on the same side, and asked, whether any wise man amongst them would venture his whole estate upon a vote; And, answering himself in the negative, then, added he, shall we now venture the safety of all England, nay, of all Europe, upon this vote?

Sir John Hawles perceiving, that many members had left the high-church party, observed, "That for his own part, he had been against this bill from the beginning, but he wondered, that those gentlemen, who had all along pretended, that the church of England was on the brink of ruin, unless such a bill should pass, did not pursue the only method, that might secure the passing of that bill. I put it (added he) to the conscience of those gentlemen, who, are come over to us, whether they were before satisfied, as to the reasonableness and necessity of this bill, since now they desert their own friends? I wish they had voted on our side two years ago, for it would have saved us a great deal of trouble, the greatest part of the nation a great deal of uneasiness, and themselves the confusion of abandoning their party at a pinch."

Sir Thomas Littleton spoke on the same side, and said, "By the tacking of this bill, we mean to throw a necessity upon the Lords to pass it.

But suppose the Lords think fit to untack what we have tacked, and to acquaint us that they are ready to pass the money-bill, but will consider of the other; whose fault will the nation account it to be, that the queen's business is retarded?"

In answer to all these objections, some precedents were alleged, and the necessity of the bill for the preservation of the church was urged, which they saw was not like to pass, unless sent to the Lords so accompanied; which some thought was very wittily expressed by calling it a portion annexed to the church, as in a marriage; and they said they did not doubt but those of the court would exert themselves to get it passed, when it was accompanied with two millions as its price. Upon the division, the tack was rejected by a majority of 251 voices against 134.

The report of the Bill, was made on Dec. 5. and a debate arising, Whether it should be engrossed or not, it was carried in the affirmative, Yeas 145, Noes 118. The Bill was read a third time, and passed on the 14th, Yeas 179, Noes 131.

The Occasional Conformity Bill sent up to the Lords, is debated and rejected by them. Dec. 14. The Bill<sup>s</sup> was sent up to the Lords and the next day it was read for the first time. If the queen had not been present, there would have been no long debate on that head for it was scarce possible to say much, that had not been formerly said; but to give her majesty full information, since it was supposed that she had heard that matter only on one side, it was resolved to open the whole in her hearing. The topics most insisted on were, the quiet that the nation enjoyed by the toleration, on which head the severities of former reigns were laid open, both in their injustice, cruelty, and their being managed only to advance popery and other bad designs. The peaceable behaviour of the dissenters, and the zeal they expressed for the queen and her government were likewise copiously set forth, while other shewed a malignity to it. That which was chiefly urged was, that every new law made in the matter, altered the state of things from what it was, when the act for toleration first passed. This gave the dissenters an alarm they might from thence justly conclude, that one step would be made after another, till the whole effect of that act should be overturned. It did not appear, from the behaviour of any among them, that they were not contented with the toleration they enjoyed, or that they were carrying on designs against the church. In that case it might be very reasonable to look for a further security; but nothing tending that way was so much as pretended: all went on jealousies and fears, the common topics of sedition. On the other hand, to support the bill, all stories were brought up to shew how restless and unquiet that sort of men had been in former times. The archbishop of York declared 'That he was for so much of the bill as concerned the church.' Whereupon the earl of Peterborough said, 'That he was glad to hear that learned prelate make a distinction between the ecclesiastical and political part of the bill; and he hoped, that all the Lords, who, in their consciences, were satisfied, as his grace seemed to be, that this bill was framed to serve a temporal, as well as a spiritual end, would vote against it.' The question being put, whether the bill should be read a second time, it was carried in the negative by a majority of 71 voices against 50, 5 members present, and 20 proxies, being for rejecting it; and 33 peers in the House, and 17 proxies, for giving it a second reading.

Proceedings in both Houses concerning Scotland.] By this time the Lords were engaged in an affair which made no less noise than the * Burnet.

Conformity-bill, and was occasioned by a speech of lord Haversham; his Lordship having acquainted the peers, that he had matters of great importance to lay before them; but that he desired it should be in a full house; all the Lords in town and in the neighbourhood were summoned to attend three days after; when his Lordship made a speech, of which these are the most remarkable passages:

Lord Haversham. "I would be far from detracting or lessening any man's just praise, and do really believe, that the wonderful victory obtained over the French, under the conduct and command of prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough, if considered in all its circumstances, especially the unusual secrecy with which the orders were executed, is the greatest any history can shew us.—And, though our success at sea was not equal to what it was at land, yet the English courage and bravery shewed itself the same. I cannot indeed congratulate sir George Rooke's intire victory over the French; but I can, and do most heartily, his safe deliverance from them.—Let our victories be what they will ashore, while France is thus powerful at sea, and more so daily, not only by her new additions, but by our too easy concessions, as were those of St. Christopher's, Newfoundland, and Hudson's-bay; while our trade is thus neglected, and your lordships faithful and provident advice baffled by the dark counsels of nobody knows who; England, in my opinion, can never be safe.—Another thing that I shall take notice of, is the present state of the coin; and I dare venture to say, that, if such vast exportations be much longer continued and allowed, we shall have very little left at home. France may be beaten, but England must be beggared. I know we are not so sensible of this, because there is a paper-money now current; but, should there ever happen to be a stop there, I pray God preserve us from sinking all at once. The last thing that I shall mention to your lordships, is in relation to Scotland. I think I need but lay before your lordships the true matter of fact, to convince you how much it deserves your consideration. A little before the last sitting down of the parliament there, it was thought necessary to make some alteration in that ministry; and accordingly some were displaced to make room for others, taking some from each party, who might influence the rest. Things being thus prepared, and a motly ministry set up, the parliament met about the 6th of July last. And, though the succession to the crown in the protestant line was the main thing recommended with the greatest earnestness by the queen in her letter to them, yet was it so postponed and baffled, that at length it came to nothing; partly, because the ministry was so weak and divided, that, instead of doing every thing, they could do nothing; and partly from a received opinion, that the succession itself was never sincerely and cordially intended, either by the ministry there, or by those that managed the Scots affairs here.—This is very evident; for, at the opening of the session, my Lord Secretary himself distinguishes between a secret and revealed will. And not only that, but upon the fourth Sederunt (as they call it) a motion was made for a bill of exclusion; I take it formally to be so, though it bears the title of an Act of Security, which was read the first time on the 7th, and ordered to lie on the table till they heard from England, and, on the 10th, it passed into a law. Now can any reasonable man believe, that those who promoted a bill of exclusion there, or those who here advised the passing of it, could ever be really and cordially for the English succession. I know there is an exception in the act itself; but it is such a one as might have full as well been left out. For he that asks what he knows before will never be granted, only asks the denial. And yet this is not all, but in this very bill of exclusion, as I call it, all the heretors and boroughs are not only allowed, but ordained (as the word is) to be armed, and to exercise their fencible men once every month.—This being the fact (and, I think, I have stated it very truly) surely, my Lords, it is what deserves your consideration; and I shall make but one or two observations to your Lordships. There are two matters of all troubles; much discontent, and great poverty; and whoever will now look into Scotland, will find them both in that kingdom. It is certain, the nobility and gentry of Scotland are as learned and as brave as any nation in Europe can boast of; and these are generally discontented. And as to the common people, they are very numerous and very stout, but very poor. And who is the man that can answer what such a multitude, so armed, so disciplined, with such leaders, may do, especially since opportunities do so much alter men from themselves? And there will never be wanting all the promises and all the assistance France can give.

"Besides this, my lords, I take it to be of the last danger to England that there should be the least shadow or pretence of a necessity to keep up regular and standing troops in this kingdom in time of peace; for I shall always be of the same opinion, that that has been, may be. In short, my lords, I think every man wishes these things had not been; and in my opinion, there is no man, but must say, they should not have been. I shall end with an advice of my lord Bacon's. Let men, says he, beware how they neglect or suffer matter of troubles to be prepared; for no man can forbid the sparks that may set all on fire."

The Lords were variously affected with this speech; which though generally approved, as to that part of it, which related to the Scots affairs, yet was it no less unwelcome than unexpected to see the present ministry reflected upon, to whose counsels and management the nation owed its prosperity at home, and, in great measure, its successes abroad. And besides, some peers thought it derogatory to the duke of Marlborough, that prince Eugene should be named before him in the mention of an action, in which that prince acted but a second part. However, this speech was seconded by the earls of Rochester and Nottingham; the former particularly lamenting the ill consequences of the exportation of the coin, and insisting on the necessity of putting a stop to that evil. The lord-treasurer, who took this to be an oblique reflection on himself, said, "That, though it would not be difficult to demonstrate, that there never was so great a plenty of money in England, as at present, yet there was a sure way to increase that plenty, and prevent the exportation of coin, and that was by clapping up a peace with France. But then, added he, I leave it to the consideration of any wise man, whether we shall not thereby be shortly in danger of losing not only all our coin, but all our land to boot."

The Scots business being the most material part of the lord Haversham's speech, the 29th of November was appointed to consider of it, upon which day the queen went to the House of Peers, both to hear the debates about that important point, and to moderate by her presence any heats, which might arise*. This, however, had not all the desired effect; for the earl of Nottingham, having reflected on king William with relation to the treaty of partition, the lord Somers rose up and said, "That it was unbecoming a member of that House to sully the memory of so great a prince; and he doubted not, but a man, who could reflect upon king William before his successor, would do the same by her present majesty, when she was gone." As to the treaty mentioned by the earl of Nottingham, he added, "That there was a noble lord there present (meaning the earl of Jersey) who was the principal agent and plenipotentiary in that treaty, and whose duty, as well as interest, it was to vindicate both the memory of his late most gracious master and his own conduct." In the mean time the lord Mohun consulted with several peers, whether they should move to send the earl of Nottingham to the Tower. But this being the first time the queen did the House the honour of coming to hear their debates, they thought fit to decline that motion out of respect to her majesty. As to the main business of the day, the earls of Nottingham and Rochester urged the ill consequences of the Act of Security passed in Scotland. And it being answered, that the same was granted to prevent the danger of a rebellion in that kingdom, it was replied, "That, if the Scots had rebelled, they would have rebelled without arms; whereas, if they had a mind to rebel now, this act had legally supplied them with necessaries to support their rebellion." The more moderate represented, That, like skilful physicians and wise legislators, they ought rather to apply present remedies to a known evil, than to lose time in enquiring, whether or no it might have been prevented. It was after much declaiming moved, that the Lords might pass some votes upon the Scots Act. The Tories, who pressed this, intended to add a severe vote against all those, who had advised it; and it was visible at whom this was aimed. The Whigs diverted this: They said, that the putting a vote against an act passed in Scotland looked like claiming some superiority over them, which seemed very improper at that time: since that kingdom was possessed with a national jealousy on this head, which would be much increased by such a proceeding. More moderate methods were therefore proposed, in order to the making up of a breach in this island, with which it seemed to be threatened; and, at last the grand committee of the Peers came to these resolutions, "That the best method to prevent the inconveniences, which might happen by the late acts passed in Scotland, was by making such laws here for that purpose: That the queen be enabled by act of parliament, on the part of England, to name commissioners to treat about an Union with Scotland, provided, that these powers be not put in execution, till commissioners should be named on the part of Scotland by the parliament there. That Scotsmen should not enjoy the privileges of Englishmen, except such as are settled in this kingdom, in Ireland, and the plantations, and such as are or shall be in our land or sea-service, until an Union be had, or the succession settled as in England. That the bringing of cattle from Scotland into England be prevented. That the lord admiral or commissioners of the Admiralty, for the time being, be required to give orders to her majesty's ships, to take such ships, as they shall find trading from Scotland to France, or to the ports of any of her majesty's enemies; and that cruisers be appointed for that end. And that the exportation of English wool into Scotland be carefully hindered." These Resolutions being approved by the House, the judges were ordered to reduce them into bills; one of which for an entire Union, was read a third time, and passed the 20th of December, and sent to the Commons for their concurrence. On the 9th, the Lords presented an Address to the queen, impugning, "That, having taken into consideration divers acts of parliament lately passed in Scotland, and duly weighed the dangerous and pernicious effects which were likely to follow from them, they were preparing bills for preventing such great evils; and, in the mean time, they thought themselves bound to represent to her majesty, as their humble opinion, that it was highly requisite for the safety of this kingdom, that speedy and effectual orders be given for putting of Newcastle into a condition of defence, for securing the port of Timmouth, and for repairing Carlisle and Hull. They also besought her majesty to cause the militia of the 4 northern counties to be disciplined and provided with arms and ammunition; and a competent number of regular troops to be kept upon the northern borders of England and in the north parts of Ireland: and to direct the laws to be effectually put in execution against all papists in respect to their arms and persons, and to order a particular account of what was done, in execution of her commands, to be laid before her majesty in council without delay."

* "The queen began this winter to come to the House of Peers upon great occasions to hear their debates, which, as it was of good use for her better information, so it was very serviceable in bringing the House into better order. The first time she came, was, when the debate was taken up concerning the Scots act: she knew the Lord Treasurer was aimed at by it, and she diverted the storm by her endeavours, as well as she restrained it by her presence." Burnet.

To this Address the Queen answered, "That she should direct a survey to be made of the several places mentioned in this Address, in order to lay it before the parliament: And what forces could be spared from their attendance here, should be quartered upon the borders, as they had been the last year: And that she would likewise give the necessary directions upon the other particulars of the Address."

The Commons likewise, having in a grand committee, considered the State of the Nation with regard to Scotland, resolved on the 13th of December, that a Bill should be brought in for the effectual securing the kingdom of England from the apparent dangers, that might arise from several acts lately passed in the parliament of Scotland.'

And on the 11th of January, Mr. Conyers reported from the committee of the whole House, to whom it was referred to consider of heads for that bill, the Resolutions they had to come to, and which were as follow :

"That it be one head of the bill to enable her majesty to nominate and appoint commissioners for England to treat with commissioners from Scotland, for an Union between the two Kingdoms. 2. That all natives of the kingdom of Scotland, except such as are settled and shall continue inhabitants of England, or the dominions thereunto belonging, or at present in the service of the army or navy, shall be reputed as aliens, unless the succession to the crown of Scotland be settled on the princess Sophia of Hanover and the heirs of her body being protestants. 3. That a more effectual provision be made to prevent the exportation of wool from England and Ireland into Scotland. 4. That provision be made to prevent the importation of Scots linen into England or Ireland, and to permit the exportation of the linen manufactures of Ireland in English bottoms into her majesty's plantations in the West-Indies. 5. That immediate provision be made to prevent the conveying of horses, arms, and ammunition, from England into Scotland. 6. That all the protestant free-holders of the six northern counties of England be permitted to furnish themselves with arms."

These Resolutions being read twice, all, except the last, were agreed to by the House, who appointed a committee to prepare and bring in a bill accordingly; and on the 16th of January, upon the second reading of the Lords bill to the same purpose, it was ordered to lie upon the table, because the Commons were resolved to adhere to a notion, which had now taken such root among them, that it could not be shaken, that the Lords could not put into a bill begun with them any clause, containing money-penalties, as they had done into this. This notion was indeed wholly new, for penalties upon transgressions could not be construed to be a giving of money. The Lords were clearly in possession of proceeding thus; so that the calling it in question was an attempt on the share, which the Lords had in the legislature. On the 1st of February, the Commons read it a third time, and passed their own bill relating to Scotland; and the following Christmas was the day prefixed for the Scots to enact the succession, or, on failure thereof, then this act was to have effect. A great coldness appeared in many of the Commons, who used to be hot on less important occasions: they seemed not to desire, that the Scots should settle the succession; and it was visible, that some of them hoped, that the Lords would have used their bill, as they had used that sent down by the Lords. Many of them were less concerned in the fate of the bill, because it diverted the censure, which they had intended to fix on the lord-treasurer. But the Lords were aware of this, and four days after the bill was sent up to them, passed it without any amendment. Those, who wished well to the Union, were afraid, that the prohibition, and the declaring the Scots aliens after the day prefixed, would be looked on as threatenings; and they saw cause to apprehend, that ill tempered men in Scotland would use this as an handle to divert that nation, which was already much soured, from hearkening to any motion that might tend to promote the Union, or the declaring the succession. It was given out by those, that this was an indignity done their kingdom, and that they ought not so much as to treat with a nation, that threatened them in such a manner. The marquis of Tweedale excused himself from serving any longer, upon which the duke of Argyle was appointed lord-high-commissioner in his room.

Thanks of the Lords to the Duke of Marlborough.] Dec. 15. The duke of Marlborough, upon his return to England, and first coming to the House of Peers, received the following compliment from the Lord-Keeper in the name of that House:

"My Lord Duke of Marlborough; The happy success that hath attended her majesty's arms under your grace's command in Germany the last campaign, is so truly great, so truly glorious in all its circumstances, that few instances in the history of former ages can equal, much less excel the lustre of it.—Your grace has not overthrown young unskilful generals, raw and undisciplined troops; but your grace has conquered the French and Bavarian armies; armies that were fully instructed in all the arts of war, select veteran troops, flushed with former victories, and commanded by generals of great experience and bravery.—The glorious victories your grace has obtained at Schellenburgh and Hochstet, are very great, very illustrious in themselves: but they are greater still in their consequences to her majesty and her allies. The emperor is thereby relieved; the empire itself freed from a dangerous enemy in the very bowels of it; the exorbitant power of France is checked; and, I hope, a happy step made towards reducing of that monarch within his due bounds, and securing the liberties of Europe.—The honour of these glorious victories, great as they are, under the immediate blessing of Almighty God, is chiefly, if not alone, owing to your grace's conduct and valour. This is the unanimous voice of England, and all her majesty's allies.—My Lord, this most honourable House is highly sensible of the great and signal services your grace has done her majesty this campaign, and of the immortal honour you have done the English nation; and have commanded me to give you their thanks for the same. And I do accordingly give your grace the thanks of this House for the great honour your grace has done the nation, and for the great and signal services you have done her majesty and this kingdom, the last campaign."

The Duke's Answer.] The Duke's Answer was as follows:

"My Lords; I am extremely sensible of the great honour your lordships are pleased to do me. I must beg, on this occasion, to do right to all the officers and soldiers I had the honour of having under my command. Next to the blessing of God, the good success of this campaign is owing to their extraordinary courage. I am sure it will be a great satisfaction, as well as encouragement to the whole army, to find their services so favourably accepted."

The same day, a committee of the House of Commons waited on the duke, to give him also the Thanks of that House.

Thanks of the Commons to the Duke of Marlborough.] It was also unanimously resolved by the Commons to give the duke of Marlborough the Thanks of the House, for the eminent services he had performed to her Majesty and this kingdom, as well in the glorious Victories he had obtained by the Arms of her Majesty and her Allies under his command, as for his prudent negotiations with several princes and states; and having appointed a committee to attend his grace for that end, Mr. Comptroller reported on the 15th, That they had congratulated his arrival, as they were directed, and that thereupon his grace was pleased to say to this effect: "It is a great satisfaction to me to find, that my faithful endeavours in discharging my duty to the queen and to the public are so favourably accepted. I beg leave to take this opportunity of doing justice to a great body of officers and soldiers who accompanied me in this expedition, and all behaved themselves with the greatest bravery imaginable. And I am sure this honour done us by the House of Commons, in taking so much notice of it, will give a general satisfaction and encouragement to the whole army."

On the 16th, her Majesty was pleased to give the royal assent to the two following acts, viz. An act for raising monies by sale of several annuities for carrying on the present war: and an act for continuing the duties upon malt, mum, cyder, and perry, for one year: and also to five private bills.

The Queen's Message relating to the Manor of Woodstock.] Dec. 16. Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer acquainted the House, that he had a Message signed by her Majesty: and he delivered it to Mr. Speaker, who read the same to the House, and was as followeth:

"ANNE R.

"Her Majesty having taken into her consideration the Address of this House, relating to the great services performed by the duke of Marlborough, does incline to grant the interest of the crown in the honour and Manor of Woodstock, and hundred of Wootton, to him and his heirs; and desires the assistance of this House upon this extraordinary occasion.—The lieutenancy and rangership of the parks, with the rents and profits of the manor and hundred, being granted for two lives, her Majesty thinks it proper that incumbrance should be cleared."

A Bill ordered in thereon.] Upon which the House resolved, "That a bill be brought in to enable her majesty, to grant the honour and manor of Woodstock and hundred of Wootton, to the duke of Marlborough and his heirs." And it was further resolved, "That an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, that she would be graciously pleased to advance the money for clearing the present incumbrance upon the lieutenancy and rangership of the parks, rents, and profits of the honour and manor of Woodstock and hundred of Wootton, in order to the present settlement thereof upon the duke of Marlborough and his heirs."

PROCEEDINGS IN THE CASE OF THE AYLESBURY MEN. *

All the Proceedings in relation to the Aylesbury-Men, committed by the House of Commons: with the Report of the Lords' Journal, and the Reports of the Conferences and of the Free Conference.

* Martis, 13 die Martii, 1704. Ordered, "That all the Proceedings in relation to the Aylesbury-Men, committed by this House, and this Report of the Lords' Journal, and Reports of the Conferences, and of the Free Conference, be printed.—Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do appoint the Printer of the said Proceedings and Reports."

November 21. A complaint being made to the House of Commons that Robert Mead, an attorney at law, had proceeded in the Cause of Ashby and White, and others, (see p. 295.) since the last session of parliament, and taken

“The last business of this session, with which this parliament ended, was the Case of the Aylesbury men. It has been related, what proceedings had been at law upon the election at Aylesbury. The Judgment that the Lords gave in this matter was executed, and, upon that, five others of the inhabitants brought their action against the constables, for refusing their votes. The House of Commons looked on this as a high contempt of their votes, and a breach of their privileges, to which they added a new, and till then, unheard-of crime, that it was contrary to the declaration they had made. At the same time they sent their message for these five men, (namely, John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, Jan. Henry Basse, and Daniel Horn) and committed them to Newgate, where they lay three months prisoners. They were all the while well supplied, and much visited, and therefore remained without making any application to the House of Commons. It was not thought advisable to move in such a matter, till all the money bills were passed; then motions were made, in the interval between the terms, upon the statute of Habeas Corpus, but that statute relating only to commitments by the royal authority, this did not lie within it.

“When the term came, a motion was made in the Queen’s-bench upon the common law, in behalf of the prisoners for a Habeas Corpus. The lawyers, who moved it, produced the commitment in which their offence was set forth, that they had claimed the benefit of the law, in opposition to a vote of the House of Commons to the contrary. They said, the subjects were governed by the laws, which they ought and were bound to know, and not by votes of a House of Parliament, which they were neither bound to know nor to obey. Three of the judges were of opinion, that the court could take no cognizance of the matter, and that the prisoners ought to be remanded; but the chief justice Holt was of another mind. He thought a general warrant of commitment for breach of privilege, was of the nature of an execution; and, since the ground of commitment was specified in the warrant, he thought it plainly appeared, that the prisoners had been guilty of no offence, and that therefore they ought to be discharged. Though Holt’s judgment seemed clear and solid, yet, as he was but one against three, the majority prevailed, and the prisoners were remanded to Newgate.

“Upon this Paty and Oviat, two of the prisoners, moved for a Writ of Error, to bring the matter before the Lords. This Writ was only to be obtained, by petitioning the queen, that the judgment of the court of the Queen’s-bench might be brought before her majesty in parliament. The Commons were alarmed at these petitions, and resolved upon an Address to the defendants in execution, in breach of the privilege of this House:

Ordered, That the matter of the said Complaint be heard at the bar of this House upon Thursday morning next. Ordered, That the queen, ‘setting forth the undoubted right and ‘privilege of the Commons of England in parliament assembled, to commit, for breach of ‘privilege; and that the commitments of this ‘House are not examinable in any other court ‘whatsoever; and that no such Writ of Error ‘was ever brought, nor doth any Writ of Error ‘lie in this case: and that as this House had ‘expressed their duty to her majesty, in giving ‘dispatch to all the supplies; so they had an ‘entire confidence in her majesty’s goodness ‘and justice, that she would not give leave for ‘the bringing any Writ of Error in this case; ‘which would tend to the overthrowing the undoubted rights and privileges of the Commons ‘of England.’

“Ten judges (two only being of another mind) agreed, that, in civil matters, a petition for a Writ of Error was a petition of right and not of grace. It was therefore thought a very strange thing, which might have most pernicious consequences, for a House of Commons to desire the queen, not to grant a petition of right, which was plainly a breach of law, and of her coronation oath. It was no less strange for them to take upon them to affirm, that the writ did not lie, when that was clearly the work of the judicature to declare, whether it lay or not, which was unquestionably the right of the Lords, who only could determine that. Besides, their having supplied the public occasion, was a strange consideration to be offered to the queen, as an argument to persuade her to act against law, as if they had pretended, that they had bribed her to infringe the law, and to deny justice; since money, given for public service, was given to the country and to themselves, as properly as to the queen. Her answer to this Address was to this effect: ‘That she was much ‘troubled to find the House of Commons of ‘opinion, that her granting the Writs of Error, ‘mentioned in their Address, was against their ‘privileges, of which she would always be as ‘tender, as of her own prerogative: and therefore they might depend, she would not do any thing to give them any just occasion of complaint. But this matter, relating to the course ‘of judicial proceedings, being of the highest ‘importance, she thought it necessary to weigh ‘and consider very carefully, what might be ‘proper for her to do, in a thing of so great ‘concern.’ This answer was thought so cold, that no thanks were returned for it; though a well composed House of Commons would certainly have thanked her for that tender regard to law and justice. The same day the answer was reported by Mr. Secretary Hedges, the Commons proceeded to carry their resentments to greater extremities, and having continued sitting till the evening, voted, ‘That Mr. Francis Page, Mr. James Montague, Mr. Nicholas said Robert Mead do attend this House upon Thursday morning next.

Nov. 24. The order of the day being read for the hearing the matter of the complaint

Lechmere, and Mr. Alexander Denton, in pleading upon the return of the Habeas Corpus, on behalf of the five prisoners committed by this House, were guilty of a breach of privilege; and ordered them to be taken into custody. As they were apprehensive lest the queen should grant Writs of Error, whereby the five Aylesbury men might be discharged from their imprisonment, they also ordered them to be removed from Newgate, and taken into the custody of their serjeant at arms; which order was executed at midnight, with such circumstances of severity and terror, as have been seldom exercised towards the greatest offenders. These were such strange and unheard-of proceedings, that by them the minds of all people were much alienated from the House of Commons. But the prisoners were under such management, and so well supported, that they would not submit, nor ask pardon of the House. It was generally believed, that they were supplied and managed by the lord Wharton. They petitioned the House of Lords for relief, who resolved to proceed in the matter by sure and regular steps. They first came to the following general resolutions: 1. That neither house of parliament has any power, by any vote or declaration, to create to themselves any new privilege, that is not warranted by the known laws and customs of parliament. 2. That every freeman of England, who apprehends himself to be injured, has a right to seek redress by action at law; and that the commencing and prosecuting an action at common law against any person (not entitled to privilege of parliament) is no breach of the privilege of parliament. 3. That the House of Commons, in committing to Newgate, Daniel Horne, Henry Bass, John Paton, junior, John Paty, and John Oviat, for commencing and prosecuting an action at the common law, against the constables of Aylesbury, for not allowing their votes in election of members to serve in parliament, upon pretence, that their so doing was contrary to a declaration, a contempt of the jurisdiction, and a breach of the privilege of that House, have assumed to themselves alone a legislative authority, by pretending to attribute the force of a law to their declaration; have claimed a jurisdiction not warranted by the constitution, and have assumed a new privilege, to which they can have no title by the laws and customs of parliament, and have thereby, as far as in them lies, subjected the rights of Englishmen, and the freedom of their persons to the arbitrary votes of the House of Commons. 4. That every Englishman, who is imprisoned by any authority whatsoever, has an undoubted right, by his agents or friends, to apply for and obtain a writ of Habeas Corpus, in order to procure his liberty by due course of law. 5. That against Robert Mead, an attorney at law, for having proceeded in the Cause of Ashby and White, and others, since the last session of parliament, and taken the defendants in execution, for the House of Commons to censure and punish any person, for assisting a prisoner to procure a writ of Habeas Corpus, or by vote or otherwise, to deter men from soliciting, prosecuting, or pleading upon such writ of Habeas Corpus, in behalf of such prisoner, is an attempt of dangerous consequence, a breach of the many good statutes provided for the liberty of the subject, and of pernicious example, by denying the necessary assistance to the prisoner upon a commitment of the House of Commons, which has ever been allowed upon all commitments by any authority whatsoever. And, 6. That a writ of error is not a writ of grace, but of right, and ought not to be denied to the subject, when duly applied for (though at the request of either house of parliament) the denial thereof being an obstruction of justice, contrary to Magna Charta.

These Resolutions being delivered to the Commons at a Conference, they took time to consider of them till the 7th of March, upon which day, at their desire, a second Conference was held, wherein the Commons delivered a long answer, in which they set forth, that the right of determining elections was lodged only with them; and that therefore they only could judge who had a right to elect: that they only were judges of their own privileges, and that the Lords could not intermeddle in them. They quoted very copiously the proceeding in the year 1675, upon an appeal brought against a member of their House; and urged, that their prisoners ought only to apply to them for their liberty; and that no motion had ever been made for a Writ of Error in such a case.

The Lords, upon this, desired a Free Conference, which was held with the Commons on the 9th of March; but that it ended without success, was not surprising, considering the temper, with which the Commons came to it, and which appeared from the votes they made the day before, after they had agreed to the Free Conference. For, upon information, that their serjeant at arms had been served with two writs of Habeas Corpus, returnable before the Lord Keeper, in behalf of Mr. Montague and Mr. Denton, two of the gentlemen, who had been of counsel for the five prisoners, they came to these resolutions, That no commoner of England, committed by the House of Commons for breach of privilege, or contempt of that House, ought to be by any writ of Habeas Corpus made to appear in any other place, or before any other judicature, during that session of parliament, wherein such person was so committed. That the serjeant at arms attending that House do make no return, nor yield any obedience to the said writs of Habeas Corpus; and, for such his refusal, that he have the protection of the House of Commons. And that the Lord-keeper be acquainted with the said in breach of the privilege of this House: Ordered, That the hearings the said complaint be adjourned until Tuesday sevensnight. That the said Robert Mead do attend this house upon Tuesday sevensnight.

A further Complaint being made to the House, That since the Resolutions of this

Resolutions, to the end that the said writs of Habeas Corpus might be superseded, as contrary to law, and the privilege of the House.' Five days after, the Commons ordered the Report of the Free Conference, which was made by Mr. Bromley, to be entered upon their Journals; and resolved, 'That the proceedings of the House, in relation to the Aylesbury men committed by the House for breach of privilege, and the other proceedings of that House in that matter, were in maintenance of the ancient and undoubted rights and privileges of the Commons of England; and they ordered all the Proceedings in relation to the Aylesbury men, the Report of the Lords' Journals, and the Report of the Conferences, and of the Free Conference, to be printed. The next day, the Lords attended the queen with a full Representation of the whole thing, wherein having recited the matter of fact relating to this affair, they laid before her, 'That the proceedings of the House of Commons against the Aylesbury men were wholly new and unprecedented. That it is the birth-right of every Englishman, who apprehends himself to be injured, to seek for redress in her majesty's courts of justice. That if there be any power, that can controul this right, and can prescribe when he shall, and when he shall not, be allowed the benefit of the laws, he ceases to be a freeman, and his liberty and property are precarious. That the crown lays claim to no such power, and their lordships were sure the law has trusted no such authority with any subjects whatsoever.' They urged, that in former times the opinion of the House of Commons was very different from what it was at present, of which their lordships gave several instances; and they concluded as a humble request, 'That no importunity of the House of Commons, or any other consideration whatsoever, might prevail with her majesty to suffer a stop to be put to the known course of justice, but that she would be pleased to give effectual orders for the immediate issuing of the Writs of Error.'

This Representation was thought so well drawn, that some preferred it to those of the former sessions; it contained a long and clear deduction of the whole affair with great decency of style, but with many heavy reflections on the House of Commons.

By this time the whole business of the session was brought to a conclusion; for the Lords, who had the money-bills, would not pass them till this was ended. The queen, in answer to their Representation, told them, 'That she should have granted the Writs of Error, they desired, but that finding an absolute necessity of putting an immediate end to this session, she was House the last session, upon the Case of Ashby and White, there had been several new actions brought by John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, junior, and Henry Basse, and prosecuted by the said Robert Mead, against the constables of Aylesbury, in breach of the privilege of this House. Ordered, That the matter of the said complaint be also heard at the bar of this House upon Tuesday sevensnight. That the said John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, jun. and Henry Basse, do attend this House upon Tuesday sevensnight. That copies of the original Declarations in the said actions be laid before this House.

Nov. 24. Ordered, That Daniel Horne, a plaintiff in one of the actions brought against the constables of Aylesbury, of which complaint was made to the House yesterday, do attend this House upon Tuesday sevensnight.

Dec. 5. The orders of the day being read for the hearing the matter of the complaints of several breaches of privilege committed by Robert Mead, John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, jun. Henry Basse, and Daniel Horne; and for their attending this House: The serjeant at arms was called upon, to give an account of what had been done for the summoning of them; and he acquainted the House, that his messenger had been at Aylesbury, and left a copy of the order at Mr. Mead's house, and at his chamber in Thavies-Inn, but that he does not attend; but that all the other persons had been summoned, and do attend.

And thereupon, Mr. Arthur Crabb was called for, and brought in with the mace to the bar who said: That he was attorney for the late constables of Aylesbury in five several actions, at the several suits of John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, junior, Henry Basse, and Daniel Horne: And that he did serve Mr. Robert Mead, the 6th of March last, with the Resolutions of this House of the last session of parliament, relating to the Proceedings in the cause of Ashby and White and others, by giving him a copy thereof, and shewing him the Resolutions signed by the clerk of this House: And that he afterwards, viz. the 10th of June last, had from Mr. Mead copies of five Declarations in the said actions, viz. one from Mr. Mead himself, and the other four left at his house, which Mr. Mead afterwards owned, and that he paid Mr. Mead for them all.

'sensible there could have been no further proceedings upon that matter.' This answer being reported to the House of Lords, was looked on by them as a clear decision in their favour, and therefore they ordered, 'That the humble thanks of their house be immediately presented to her majesty, for her most gracious answer, in which she had expressed so great a regard to the judgment of their house, so much compassion to the prisoners, and such tenderness to the rights of the subject.' About an hour after the queen came to the House of Lords, and, after passing the bills, ended the session." Tindal.

Which copies of Declarations the said Mr. Crabb produced to the House, together with notice in writing from the said Mr. Mead, the 22d of July last, that he would try one of the said actions, but not the other four, at the then next assizes. And then he withdrew. And the notice was read. And the copy of the declaration between Paty and White & al' was also read.

And, mutatis mutandis, were the same with the former Declarations against White and others.

Then the said John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, jun. Henry Basse, and Daniel Horne, were severally called in to the bar, and examined, and then withdrew.

Resolved, "That it appears to this House, That John Paty of Aylesbury has been guilty of commencing and prosecuting an action at common law against William White, and others, late constables of Aylesbury, for not allowing his Vote in the election of members to serve in parliament, contrary to the declaration, in high contempt of the jurisdiction, and in breach of the known privileges of this House.

"That it appears to this House, That John Oviat of Aylesbury has been guilty of commencing and prosecuting an action at common law against the late constables of Aylesbury, for not allowing his Vote in the election of members to serve in parliament, contrary to the declaration, in high contempt of the jurisdiction, and in breach of the known privileges of this House.

"That it appears to this House, That John Paton, jun., of Aylesbury, has been guilty of commencing and prosecuting an action at common law against the late constables of Aylesbury, for not allowing his Vote in the election of members to serve in parliament, contrary to the declaration, in high contempt of the jurisdiction, and in breach of the known privileges of this House.

"That it appears to this House, That Henry Basse of Aylesbury, has been guilty of commencing and prosecuting an action at common law against the late constables of Aylesbury, for not allowing his Vote in the election of members to serve in parliament, contrary to the declaration, in high contempt of the jurisdiction, and in breach of the known privileges of this House.

"That it appears to this House, That Daniel Horne of Aylesbury, has been guilty of commencing and prosecuting an action at common law against the late constables of Aylesbury, for not allowing his Vote in the election of members to serve in parliament, contrary to the declaration, in high contempt of the jurisdiction, and in breach of the known privileges of this House.

"That it appears to this House, That Robert Mead has been guilty of soliciting and prosecuting (as attorney at law) divers actions at common law against William White and others, late constables of Aylesbury, for not allowing divers Votes in the election of members to serve in parliament, contrary to the declaration, in high contempt of the jurisdiction, and in breach of the privileges of this House.

Ordered, "That the said John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, jun. Henry Basse, and Daniel Horne, be, for their said offence, committed prisoners to her majesty's gaol of Newgate; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrants accordingly."

Ordered, "That the serjeant at arms attending this House do take care that the said warrants be executed."

Ordered, "That the said Robert Mead be, for his said offence, taken into the custody of the serjeant at arms attending this House."

Feb. 1, 1705. Ordered, "That the keeper of Newgate do to-morrow morning bring to this House John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, jun. Henry Basse, and Daniel Horne, committed by this House; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant or warrants accordingly."

Feb. 2. The House being informed, That the keeper of Newgate attended, according to order, with John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, jun. Henry Basse, and Daniel Horne, committed by this House, several of them were severally called in and examined, and then withdrew. And also the keeper and his clerk and turnkey, one Edward Hill, were called in and examined, and then withdrew.

Ordered, "That the said John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, jun. Henry Basse, and Daniel Horne, be remanded prisoners to her majesty's prison of Newgate; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrants accordingly."

Feb. 24. The House being informed, That there have been endeavours to bring a Writ of Error on the proceedings in the court of Queen's-Bench, upon a Habeas-Corpus granted there for the persons committed by this House to Newgate for breach of their privilege, and thereby to bring the commitments of this House under the examination of the House of Peers:

Resolved, "That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, humbly to lay before her majesty the undoubted right and privilege of the Commons of England, in parliament assembled, to commit for breach of privilege; and that the commitments of this House are not examinable in any other court whatsoever. And that no such Writ of Error was ever brought, nor doth any Writ of Error lie in this case. And that as this House hath expressed their duty to her majesty, in giving dispatch to all the supplies, so they have an entire confidence in her majesty's goodness and justice. That she will not give leave for the bringing any Writ of Error in this case; which will tend to the overthrowing the undoubted rights and privileges of the Commons of England."

Ordered, "That the said Address be presented to her majesty by such members of this House as are of her majesty's most honourable privy council."

Resolved, "That whoever has abetted, promoted, countenanced, or assisted the prosecution of the several Writs of Habeas Corpus, brought for the prisoners committed by this House, and since their being remanded have endeavoured the procuring Writs of Error, are guilty of conspiring to make a difference between the Lords and Commons in parliament assembled, are disturbers of the peace of the kingdom, and have endeavoured, as far as in them lay, to overthrow the rights and privileges of the Commons of England in parliament assembled."

Ordered, "That a committee be appointed to examine what persons have been concerned in soliciting, prosecuting, or pleading, upon the Writs of Habeas Corpus, or Writs of Error, on the behalf of the persons committed to Newgate for breach of the privilege of this House: or what other persons have promoted or abetted the same." And a committee was accordingly appointed.

Feb. 26. Mr. Secretary Hedges acquainted the House that their Address of Saturday last, in relation to the Writs of Error therein mentioned, having been presented to her majesty, according to the Order, her majesty was pleased to give this gracious Answer:

"Her majesty is much troubled to find the House of Commons of opinion that her granting the Writs of Error mentioned in their Address, is against their privileges: of which her majesty will always be as tender as of her own prerogative; and therefore the House of Commons may depend, her majesty will not do any thing to give them any just occasion of complaint: but this matter, relating to the course of judicial proceedings, being of the highest importance, her majesty thinks it necessary, to weigh and consider very carefully what may be proper for her to do, in a thing of so great a concern."

Resolved, That this House will take her majesty's gracious Answer into consideration to-morrow morning.

The earl of Dysert reported, from the Committee appointed to examine what persons have been concerned in soliciting, prosecuting, or pleading upon the Writs of Habeas Corpus, or Writs of Error, on the behalf of the persons committed to Newgate for breach of the privileges of this House, or what other persons have promoted or abetted the same, the matter as it appeared to them; which they had directed him to report to the House, which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered in at the clerk's table, where the same was read: Upon which it was ordered that all the said persons so concerned should be taken in custody for breach of privilege.

And though the Commons had resolved before to take her majesty's Answer into consideration, yet being apprehensive lest her majesty should grant the Writs of Error, whereby the five Aylesbury-men might be discharged from their imprisonment, they ordered them to be removed from Newgate, and taken into the custody of the serjeant at arms; which Order was executed at midnight, with such circumstances of severity and terror, as have been seldom exercised towards the greatest offenders*.

Feb. 28. Mr. Bromley reported, That the members appointed to search the Journals of the House of Lords, what proceedings have been in that House, in relation to the five Persons committed to Newgate for breach of the privilege of this House, had searched the same accordingly, and had taken thereout what they found relating to the same; and also copies of two Petitions of the said persons; which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered in at the table, where the same were read, and are as follow, viz.

Feb. 26. "Upon reading the Petition of Daniel Horne, Henry Basse, and John Paton jun. as also the Petition of John Paty, and John Oviat, prisoners in Newgate, in relation to some proceedings for obtaining the Writs of Error, and praying, amongst other things, the protection of this House for their counsel and agents. It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the said Petitions shall be taken into consideration to-morrow at 12 o'clock, and all the Lords summoned to attend; as also the judges in town, who are to come prepared to speak to the point, whether a Writ of Error be a Writ of Right or a Writ of Grace? And that the Petitioners have notice, that when they send to this House the names of their counsel and agents they desire to be protected, they shall have the protection of this House for them.

"In pursuance of the Order of this day made, Daniel Horne, Henry Basse, John Paton, jun. John Paty, and John Oviat, prisoners in Newgate, sent the names of their Counsel and Agents, viz. James Montague, esq., Nicholas Lechmere, Alexander Denton and Francis Page, Counsellors at Law. William Lee and John Harris, Attorneys at Law. Whereupon, it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the said persons, shall, and they have hereby the protection and privilege of this House, in the advising, applying for, and prosecuting the said Writs of Error; and that all keepers of prisons, and jailors and all serjeants at arms, and other persons whatsoever, be, and they are hereby, for, or in respect of any of the cases aforesaid, strictly prohibited from arresting, imprisoning, or otherwise detaining or molesting, or charging the said persons, or any or either of them, as they and every of them will answer the contrary to this House."

The Serjeant at Arms being called upon to give an account what he had done pursuant to the Orders of the House on Monday last, since the account he gave yesterday: He gave the House an account accordingly: that he had found Mr. Denton at his own chamber, and had him in custody; but that he could not find the other persons.

Conference between the two Houses.] Feb. 26, p. m. A message from the Lords, by Mr. Justice Tracy, and Mr. baron Smith: "Mr. Speaker, The Lords desire a present Conference with this House in the Painted Chamber, about some ancient fundamental Liberties of the kingdom."

Which was agreed to, and the managers being returned, the lord marquis of Hartington reported the Conference, and that it was managed by the earl of Sunderland, who expressed himself as followeth:

"That the Lords have desired this Conference with the House of Commons, in order to a good correspondence between the two houses, which they will always endeavour to preserve. When either House of parliament have apprehended the proceedings of the other to be liable to exception, the ancient parliamentary method has been to ask a Conference; it being ever supposed, that when the matters are fairly laid open, and debated, that which may have been amiss will be rectified, or else the House that made the objections will be satisfied, that their complaint was not well grounded.

"Such hopes as these have induced the Lords to command us to acquaint you, that, upon the consideration of the Petition of Daniel Horne, Henry Basse, and John Paton jun., and also of the Petition of John Paty, and John Oviat, complaining to the House of Lords, that they have been prisoners in Newgate for about twelve weeks, upon several warrants, signed by the Speaker of the House of Commons, bearing date the 5th of December last, for their having commenced and prosecuted actions at common-law, against the late constables of Aylesbury, for not allowing their Votes, at an election of members to serve in parliament; which actions, they alledged, they were encouraged to bring, by reason of a Judgment given in parliament upon a Writ of Error, brought in the last session by one Ashby against White, and others; and also representing by the same Petitions, what had been done by them respectively since their said commitment, in order to obtain their liberty, and praying the consideration of the House of Peers upon the whole matter; and also upon consideration of a printed Paper, entitled, 'The Votes of the House of Commons,' signed with the Speaker's name, and dated the 24th of this instant February; the House of Lords found themselves obliged to pass several Resolutions, which they have commanded us to communicate to you at this Conference; and are as follow:

1. It is Resolved by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That neither house of parliament hath any power, by any Vote, or Declaration, to create to themselves any new privilege, that is not warranted by the known laws and customs of parliament.

2. That every freeman of England, who apprehends himself to be injured, has a right to seek redress by action at law: and that the commencing and prosecuting an action at common-law, against any person (not entitled to privilege of parliament,) is no breach of the privilege of parliament.

3. That the House of Commons, in committing to Newgate, Daniel Horne, Henry Basse, and John Paton, jun. John Paty and John Oviat, for commencing and prosecuting an action at common-law, against the late constables of Aylesbury, for not allowing their Votes in election of members to serve in parliament, upon pretence that their so doing was contrary to a declaration, a contempt of the jurisdiction, and a breach of the privilege of that House, have assumed to themselves alone a legislative power, by pretending to attribute the force of a law to their declaration, have claimed a jurisdiction, not warranted by the constitution, and have assumed a new privilege, to which they can shew no title by the law and custom of parliament: and have thereby, as far as in them lies, subjected the Rights of Englishmen, and the freedom of their persons, to the arbitrary Votes of the House of Commons.

4. That every Englishman, who is imprisoned by any authority whatsoever, has an undoubted right, by his agents, or friends, to apply for, and obtain a Writ of Habeas Corpus, in order to procure his liberty by the due course of law.

5. That for the House of Commons to censure, or punish any person for assisting a prisoner to procure a Writ of Habeas Corpus, or by vote, or otherwise, to deter men from soliciting, prosecuting, and pleading upon such Writ of Habeas Corpus, in behalf of such prisoner, is an attempt of dangerous consequence, a breach of the many good statutes provided for the liberty of the subject, and of pernicious example, by denying the necessary assistance to the prisoner, upon a commitment of the House of Commons, which has ever been allowed upon all commitments by any authority whatsoever.

6. That a Writ of Error is not a Writ of Grace, but of Right, and ought not to be denied to the subject, when duly applied for, (though at the request of either House of parliament,) the denial thereof being an obstruction of justice, contrary to Magna Charta.

"In these Resolutions, the House of Lords have expressed that regard and tenderness which they have always had, and will ever maintain for the rights of the people of England, and for the liberties of their persons; and also their zeal against all innovations to the prejudice of the known course of law, whereupon the happiness of our constitution depends; and they hope that, upon recollection, the House of Commons will be of the same opinion in all the particulars resolved by the Lords, and agree with their lordships therein."

Ordered, That the said Report be taken into consideration to-morrow morning: When the Managers of the last Conference were appointed to draw up a proper Answer.

March 6. The Serjeant at Arms attending this House, acquainted the House, that a person had this morning brought him a Writ of Habeas Corpus, under the great seal, for Mr. Mountague (in his custody by order of this House) to be brought, as he was informed, before the Lord Keeper of the great seal of England: And he delivered the Writ, under seal, in at the table. And it appearing by the label to be returnable immediatè, but not before whom he was to be brought, nor any officer's name thereto, the Writ was opened by the Clerk, and read, and is as followeth:

The Serjeant also acquainted the House, that he heard there was another Habeas Corpus granted for Mr. Denton, in his custody also.

While the matter (upon occasion of the said forementioned Writ) was debating, the Serjeant acquainted the House, that the other Writ of Habeas Corpus, was just served upon his deputy, who had Mr. Denton in his custody: And he also delivered the same in at the Clerk's table, where it was read, and was the same, mutatis mutandis, with the former.

And the precedents of what was done in the year 1675 were, by order, read: And several members mentioned, upon their memory, what was done in the year 1680, in the Case of one Mr. Sheridan.*

But the House were of opinion, that any person committed by the House of Commons was not bailable, within the act of Habeas Corpus of 31 Car. 2, but came not then to any resolution.

Reasons of the Commons to be offered at a second Conference.] The same day Mr. Bromley reported, from the Committee appointed to draw up what is proper to be offered to the Lords at the next Conference, that they had drawn up the same accordingly, which they had directed him to report to the House; which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was read, and, with some amendments, agreed unto by the House: And the same is as follows, viz.

The Commons have desired this Conference with your lordships, in order to preserve that good correspondence between the two Houses, which the House of Commons shall always sincerely endeavour to maintain, and which is so particularly necessary at this time of common danger, that the Commons would not engage in any thing that looks like a dispute with your lordships, were it not for the necessity of vindicating, from a manifest invasion, the privileges of all the Commons of England, (with which the House of Commons is entrusted) even those privileges which are essential not only to the well being, but to the very being of an House of Commons, and the preventing of the ill consequences of those misunderstandings, which, if they are not speedily removed, must otherwise interrupt the happy conclusion of this session, and the proceedings of all future parliaments.

It was this consideration alone has so long prevailed with the House of Commons, not to insist on due reparation for those violent and unparliamentary attempts, made by your lordships upon their rights and privileges, at the end of the last session of parliament, but to apply themselves to the giving the speediest dispatch, to those supplies which her majesty so earnestly recommended from the throne, which are so necessary to enable her majesty to pursue the advantages that have been obtained against the common enemy, by the great and glorious success of her majesty's arms: And which are now delayed in your lordships' House, in so unusual a manner.

The Commons do agree to your lordships, that when either House of Parliament have apprehended the proceedings of the other to be liable to exception, the ancient parliamentary method has often been to ask a Conference; because it ought to be supposed, that when the matters are fairly laid open and debated, that which may have been amiss will be rectified, or else the House that made objections will be satisfied that their complaint was not well grounded. But your lordships seem so little to desire to have matters fairly laid open and debated, that, to the great surprise of the Commons, when your lordships have invited them to a Conference, about some ancient fundamental liberties of the kingdom, they found only the antient and fundamental rights of the House of Commons, and their proceedings, censured, and treated in a manner unknown to former parliaments; and that your lordships had anticipated all debates, by delivering positive Resolutions; and these proceedings of your lordships, grounded only upon the petitions of criminals, that had fallen under the just censure and displeasure of the Commons, and upon a printed paper, which was not regularly before your lordships.

Though this manner of proceeding, as well as the matters of your lordships Resolutions, might have justified the House of Commons in refusing to continue Conferences with your lordships, as their predecessors have done upon less occasions; and though the Commons cannot submit their privileges to be determined or examined by your lordships, upon any pretence whatsoever; yet, that nothing may be wanting on their part to induce your lordships to retract these Resolutions, they proceed to take them into their consideration.

Your Lordships' first Resolution is, viz. 'That neither House of Parliament hath any power, by any Vote or Declaration, to create to themselves any new Privilege that is not warranted by the known laws and customs of Parliament.'

As the Commons have guided themselves by this rule, in asserting their privileges, so they wish your lordships had observed it in all your proceedings. This had entirely taken away all colour for disputes between her majesty's two Houses of Parliament, and many just occasions of complaint from those the Commons represent. This would effectually put an end to that encroachment in judicature, so lately assumed by your lordships, and so often complained of by the Commons; we mean the hearing of Appeals from Courts of Equity, in your lordships' House. This would have hindered the bringing of original causes before your lordships, and your unwarrantable proceedings upon the Petition of Thomas lord Wharton, complaining of an Order of the Court of Exchequer, bearing date the 15th of July, 1701, for filing the record of a Survey of the honour of Richmond and lordship of Middleham in the county of York; an attempt which (contrary to the antient, legal judicature of parliament heretofore exercised, for the relief of the subject oppressed by the power of the great men of the realm) was, in favour of one of your own body, to suppress a public record, which all her majesty's subjects had an undoubted right to make use of; an attempt, that tends to render all fines and recoveries, and other records, upon which estates and titles depend, precarious; and consequently subjects the rights and properties of all the Commons of England, to an illegal and arbitrary power.

A due regard to the same rule, would have prevented your lordships entertaining the Petitions mentioned at the last Conference, which set forth, "That the Lords having given Judgment in the Case of Ashby and White, viz. That, by the known laws of this kingdom, every freeholder, or other person, having a right to give his vote at the elections of members to serve in parliament, and being wilfully denied or hindered so to do, by the officer who ought to receive the same, may maintain an action in the Queen's courts, against such officer, to assert his right and recover damages for the injury." The Petitioners thereupon brought the like actions in their own cases.

Whereby an extrajudicial Vote of your lordships is stated as a Judgment of parliament, and standing law in that case, your lordships having no foundation for the entertaining such petitions, unless, that, after having assumed to yourselves the hearing of appeals from courts of equity, you would now bring appeals to your lordships from the proceedings of the Commons, who are not accountable to your lordships for them.

Your Lordships' second Resolution is, 'That every freeman of England, who apprehends himself to be injured, has a right to seek redress by action at law; And that the commencing and prosecuting an action at common-law, against any person (not entitled to privilege of parliament) is no breach of the privilege of parliament.'

To which the Commons say that every freeman, and every subject of England, has a right to seek redress for an injury; but then such person must apply for that redress to the proper Court, which hath, by ancient laws and usage, the cognizance of such matters; For, should your lordships' Resolution be taken as an universal proposition, all distinction of the several courts, viz. common-law, equity, ecclesiastical, admiralty, and other courts, will be destroyed; and, in this confusion of jurisdiction, the high court of parliament is involved in your lordships' Resolution.

However, the Commons conceive it no wonder your lordships should favour the universal proposition that all rights whatsoever are to be redressed by actions at law, when your lordships pretend to have the last resort in cases of judicature by Writs of Error; so that your lordships are, in this, only extending your own judicature under the colour of a regard and tenderness for the rights of the people and liberties of their persons.

The Commons are surprised to find your lordships assert, that the commencing and prosecuting an action against a person not entitled to privilege of parliament, is no breach of the privilege of parliament, since it is most certain, that to commence and prosecute an action which would bring any matter or cause solely cognizable in parliament, to the examination and determination of any other court, is more destructive to the privileges of parliament, than to commence and prosecute an action against a person only who is entitled to such privilege.

That some matters and causes are solely cognizable in parliament, hath ever been allowed by the sage judges of law, and is evident from many precedents; and to bring such causes to the determination of other courts, strikes at the very foundation of all parliamentary jurisdiction, which is the only basis and support, even of that personal privilege to which the members of either House of Parliament are entitled; and consequently to commence and prosecute any action, whereby to draw such causes to the examination of any other courts, is equally a breach of the privilege of parliament, whether the defendant, against whom such action is brought, is entitled to the privilege of parliament, or not, which, besides the nature and reason of the thing, is fully evident from the constant usage of each House of Parliament, in committing for contempts only against their respective bodies, as appears from many precedents upon the Journals of both Houses.

Your Lordships' third Resolution is this, viz.

'That the House of Commons, in committing to Newgate, Daniel Horne, Henry Basse, and John Paton, jun. John Paty, and John Oriat, for commencing and prosecuting an action at common-law against the constables of Aylesbury, for not allowing their votes in election of members to serve in parliament, upon pretence, that their so doing was contrary to a declaration, a contempt of the jurisdiction, and a breach of the privilege of that House, have assumed to themselves alone a legislative authority, by pretending to attribute the force of a law to their declaration: have claimed a jurisdiction not warranted by the constitution, and have assumed a new privilege to which they can shew no title, by the laws and customs of parliament; and have thereby, as far as in them lies, subjected the rights of Englishmen, and the freedom of their persons, to the arbitrary votes of the House of Commons.'

In answer to which, the Commons affirm, that the said commitment is justified by ancient precedents, and by the usage and customs of parliament which is the law of parliament, and the rule by which either house ought to govern their proceedings; and that the terms of assuming to themselves alone a legislative authority, of attributing the force of law to their declaration, of claiming a jurisdiction not warranted by the constitution, of assuming a new privilege, to which they can shew no title by the law and custom of parliament, and of arbitrary votes; are more applicable to this Resolution of your lordships, which hath no one precedent to justify it.

According to the known laws and usage of parliament, it is the sole right of the Commons of England, in parliament assembled, (except in cases otherwise provided for by act of parliament,) to examine and determine all matters relating to the right of election of their own members.

And, according to the known laws and usage of parliament, neither the qualification of any elector, nor the right of any person elected, is cognizable, or determinable elsewhere, than before the Commons of England in parliament assembled, excepting such cases as are especially provided for by act of parliament.

And were it otherwise, the mayors, bailiffs, and other officers, who are obliged to take the poll at elections, and make a return thereupon, would be exposed to multiplicity of actions, vexatious suits, and unsupportable expences; and such officers would be subjected to different independent jurisdictions, and inconsistent determinations, in the same case, without relief.

And the exercise of this power by the House of Commons, is warranted by a long, uncontested possession, and confirmed by the act that passed 7 & 8 Guil. 3, cap. 7, and the House of Commons must be owned to be the only jurisdiction that can allow the elector his vote and settle and establish the right of it; the last determination in that House being, by the act of parliament, declared to be the standing rule for the right of election in each respective place. Nor can any elector suffer either injury, or damage, by the officers denying his vote; for when the elector hath named the person he would have to represent him, his vote is effectually given, both as to his own right and privilege, and as it avails the candidate in his election; and is ever allowed, when it comes in question in the House of Commons, whether the officer had any regard to it or no.

In the beginning of the Parliament held 28 Eliz. Mr. Speaker acquaints the House, that he had received, by the Lord Chancellor, her majesty's pleasure; that she was sorry the House was troubled with the matter of determining the chusing and returning of knights for the county of Norfolk; that it was improper for the House to meddle in it, which was proper for the Lord Chancellor, whence the writs issued out, and whither they were returnable: that her majesty had appointed the Lord Chancellor to confer therein with the judges; and upon examining the same, to set down such course as to justice and right should appertain.

Nov. 9. A committee was appointed to examine and state the circumstances of the Return of the knights for the county of Norfolk. And on the Friday, Nov. 11, Mr. Cromwell reports the Case of the Norfolk election very largely, in which Report are these Resolutions. 1. "That the said Writ really was executed. 2. That it was a pernicious precedent that a new Writ should issue without the order of this House. 3. That the discussing, or judging of this, and such like differences, only belonged to the said House. 4. That though the Lord Chancellor and Judges are competent judges in their courts, they are not so in parliament. 5. That it should be entered in the Journal-Book of the House, that the first election is good; and that the knights then chosen were received and allowed as members of the House; not out of any respect the House had, or gave to the Lord Chancellor's Judgment therein passed, but merely by reason of the Resolution of the House itself, by which the said election had been approved. 6. That there should be no Message sent to the Lord Chancellor, not so much as to let him know what was done therein, because it was derogatory to the power and privilege of the said House.

It also appears, that sir Edmund Anderson, lord chief justice of the common-pleas, was acquainted, that the explanation and ordering of the cause appertained only to the censure of the House of Commons, not the Lord Chancellor and the Judges; and that they should take no notice of their having done any thing in it.

Accordingly Mr. Farmer and Mr. Gresham were received into the House, and took the oaths; being admitted only upon the censure of the House, not as allowed by the Lord Chancellor, or the Judges; and so ordered to be set down and entered by the clerk.

And this right of the Commons to determine their own elections, has never been disputed since the Case of sir Francis Goodwin, 1 Jac. 1, (See vol. 1, p. 998.) when the Lords would have enquired into the proceedings of the House of Commons upon his election; but the Commons then told their lordships, it did not stand with the honour of the House to give account to their lordships of any of their proceedings or doings.

And in the reasons of their proceedings in that Case, which they laid by Petition before the king, among other things, they say, They are a part of the body to make new laws; yet, for any matter or privileges of their House, they are and ever have been a court of themselves, of sufficient power to discern and determine without the Lords, as the Lords have always used to do theirs without them.

In which Reasons, as well as in their Apology afterwards to that prince, the House of Commons did, above 100 years since, so clearly, and with so much strength of reason, assert their right in the matter of the election of their members. The Commons think it their duty to resist all attempts whatsoever to invade them.

And upon this occasion, it may not be improper to cite the opinion the House of Commons had of the Judges intermeddling in matters of their elections, as they have delivered it in the aforesaid Apology, in these words, viz.

'Neither thought we that the Judges Opinions, (which yet, in due place, we greatly reverence, being delivered with the common law,) which extend only to inferior and standing courts, ought to bring any prejudice to this high court of parliament; whose power, being above the law, is not founded on the common laws, but they have their rights and privileges peculiar to themselves.'

When the earl of Shaftsbury was Lord Chancellor, writs were issued, during a prorogation of parliament, for electing members in the room of those that were dead: the king himself was so cautious, as to the regularity of this proceeding, and had so much regard to the privileges of the House of Commons, that at the next session of parliament, Feb. 5, 1672, he spoke to the Commons, from the throne, in these words: "One thing I forgot to mention, which happened during this prorogation; I did give orders for the issuing some Writs, for the election of members instead of those that are dead, that the House might be full at their meeting: and I am mistaken, if this be not according to former precedents. But I desire you will not fall to other business until you have examined that particular; and I doubt not but precedents will justify what is done; I am as careful of all your privileges as of my own prerogative."

Feb. 6, 1672. The House of Commons took that matter into consideration; and several precedents being cited, and the matter at large debated, and the general sense and opinion of the House being, "That, during the continuance of the high court of parliament, the right and power of issuing writs for electing members to serve in this House, in such places as are vacant, is in this House, who are the proper judges also of elections, and returns of their members."*

Thereupon it was resolved, "That all elections upon the writs issued since the last session are void, and that Mr. Speaker do issue out his warrant to the clerk of the crown, to make out new writs for those places." Which was done accordingly.

No other court than the House of Commons hath ever had the determination of the elections, or any cognizance of such causes, except where by acts of parliament directed: and such an action as that against the late constables of Aylesbury, to bring the right of voting in an election, in question in the courts of law is a new invention never heard of before which (as new devices in the law are generally attended with inconveniences and absurdities) was plainly to subject the elections of all the members of the House of Commons to the determination of other courts.

This undoubted privilege and jurisdiction the Commons think will warrant these commitments, if the late Declaration, (which is agreeable to, and cannot lessen their antient right,) had never been made.

For it is the antient and undoubted right of the House of Commons to commit for breach of privilege: and instances of their committing persons, not members of the House, for breach of privilege, and that to any of her majesty's prisons, are ancient, so many and so well known to your lordships, that the Commons think it needless to produce them.

And it being the privilege of the House o

* See vol. 4, p. 507.

Commons, to have the sole examination and determination of all causes relating to their elections, as aforesaid: It follows, that any attempt to draw any such cases to the determination of any other court, is a breach of the privilege of the House of Commons; for which the person offending may be committed by the Commons.

And here we cannot but take notice of that unreasonable, as well as unnatural insinuation, whereby your lordships endeavour to separate the interest of the people from their representatives in parliament, who pretend to no privileges, but upon their account, and for their benefit; and are sorry to say, they are thus severely reflected on by your lordships, for no other reason, but for their interposing to preserve the rights of the people, and their liberties, from your lordships arbitrary determinations.

Your Lordships' fourth Resolution is, 'That every Englishman, who is imprisoned by any authority whatsoever, has an undoubted right, by his agents, or friends, to apply for, and obtain a writ of Habeas Corpus, in order to procure his liberty by due course of law.'

The Commons do not deny that every Englishman, who is imprisoned, by any authority whatsoever, has an undoubted right to apply by his agents, or friends, in order to procure his liberty by due course of law, provided such application be made to the proper place, and in a proper manner; as, upon the commitments of the House of Commons, (which sometimes are not, as other commitments, in order to bring to trial; but are, in cases of breach of privilege and contempt, the proper punishment of the House of Commons,) the application ought to be to that House.

The Commons are so willing to allow and encourage every Englishman to apply, by his friends, or agents, to obtain a Writ of Habeas Corpus, in order to procure his liberty by due course of law, that they have not censured any person merely for applying for such Writ of Habeas Corpus, even in cases where by due process of law the prisoners cannot be discharged. For the Commons must observe, that, in many cases a prisoner cannot, upon a Writ of Habeas Corpus, obtain his liberty; as in cases of commitment in execution, or for contempt to any Court of record, or by virtue of mesne process, or the like: and in the act of Habeas Corpus, several cases are expressly excepted; and that no person, committed for any contempt, or breach of the privilege, by the House of Commons, can be discharged upon a Writ of Habeas Corpus, or by any other authority, than that of the House, during that session of parliament, is plain from the following precedents.

"May 23, 1 Jac. 1. Ordered, Jones the prisoner to be sent for hither, and to attend his discharge from the House."

That the prisoner committed by us, cannot be taken from us, and committed by any other.

In May 1675, the House of Commons having resolved, That there lay no appeal to the judicature of the Lords, from courts of equity; and that no member of the House should prosecute any appeal from any court of equity, before the House of Lords; serjeant Pemberton, serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, and Charles Porter, esq. were committed to the custody of the serjeant of the House, for a Breach of privilege, in having been of counsel at the bar of the House of Lords, in the prosecution of a cause depending upon an appeal, wherein Mr. Dalmahoy, a member of the House of Commons, was concerned.

But the serjeant having been by force prevented from keeping them in custody, the Commons did, the 4th of June 1675, acquaint the Lords, at a Conference, as followeth, viz.—
"We are further commanded to acquaint you, that the enlargement of the persons imprisoned by order of the House of Commons, by the gentleman usher of the black-rod; and the prohibition with threats, to all officers, and other persons whatsoever, not to receive or detain them, is an apparent breach of the rights and privileges of the House of Commons. And they have therefore caused them to be retaken into the custody of the serjeant at Arms, and have committed them to the Tower."

The said Counsel were afterwards committed to the Tower for a breach of privilege, and contempt of the authority of the House: and the House being informed, that the Lords had ordered Writs of Habeas Corpus for bringing the counsel to the bar of their House,

The Commons then passed the following Resolutions:

June 7. Resolved, nem. con. "That no person, committed for breach of privilege by order of this House, ought to be discharged, during the session of parliament, but by order, or warrant of this House. 2. That the lieutenant of the Tower, in receiving and detaining in custody sir John Churchill, serj. Peck, serj. Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, performed his duty according to law; and for so doing he shall have the assistance and protection of this House. 3. That the lieutenant of the Tower, in case he hath received, or shall receive any writ, warrant, order or commandment, to remove or deliver any person or persons committed for breach of privilege, by any order or warrant of this House, shall not make any return thereof or yield any obedience thereunto, before he hath first acquainted this House, and received their order and directions how to proceed therein."

Ordered, "That these Resolutions be immediately sent to the lieutenant of the Tower."

Afterwards the lieutenant of the Tower gave the House an account, that he had refused to deliver the counsel upon the Lords' Order, signified to him, by the black-rod, because they were committed by this House; and that after he had received the Votes of this House, he had Writs of Habeas Corpus brought him, to bring the counsel to the House of Lords at ten o'clock the next morning, and humbly craved the direction of the House what to do.

Mr. Speaker intimated to him, he should forbear to return the writs.

And the House came to several other resolutions:

June 9. Resolved, new. con. "1. That no commoner of England, committed by order or warrant of the House of Commons, for breach of privilege, or contempt of that House, ought without order of that House to be, by any Writ of Habeas Corpus, or other authority whatsoever, made to appear and answer, and do, and receive a determination in the House of Peers, during the session of parliament wherein such person was committed. 2. That the Order of the House of Peers, for the issuing out of Writs of Habeas Corpus concerning serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, serjeant Pemberton and Mr. Charles Porter, is insufficient and illegal; for that it is general, and expresses no particular cause of privilege, and commands the King's great seal to be put to Writs not returnable before the said House of Peers. 3. That the Lord keeper be acquainted with these Resolutions, to the end that the said Writ of Habeas Corpus may be superseded, as contrary to the law and the privileges of this House. 4. That a message be sent to the Lords, to acquaint them, that serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, were committed by order and warrant of this House, for breach of the privilege, and contempt of the authority of this House."

March 22, 1697. Charles Duncomb, esq. having been committed by order of this House, and afterwards discharged by order of the House of Lords, without the consent of this House,

"Resolved, That no person committed by this House can, during the same session, be discharged by any other authority whatsoever.—That the said Charles Duncomb be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House."

These are some instances, among many others, that might be produced upon this occasion; and the last cannot but be particularly remembered by some noble lords that then sat in the House of Commons, and strenuously asserted this privilege of the Commons.

Your Lordships' fifth Resolution, viz. Resolved, 'That for the House of Commons to censure or punish any person for assisting a prisoner to procure a Writ of Habeas Corpus, or by vote, or otherwise, to deter men from soliciting, prosecuting, and pleading upon such Writ of Habeas Corpus, in behalf of such prisoner, is an attempt of dangerous consequence, a breach of the many good statutes provided for the liberty of the subject, and of pernicious example,

'by denying the necessary assistance to the prisoner, upon a commitment of the House of Commons, which has ever been allowed upon all commitments by any authority whatsoever.'

The Commons take this to be another instance of your lordships' breach of your own rule, your lordships being no judges of their privileges; though by this Resolution you seem to make a Judgment without having heard, and knowing what the Commons have to allege for them.

This attempt, therefore, of your lordships is of dangerous consequence, tending to a breach of the good understanding between the two Houses, and of most pernicious example. That Commons late proceeding, in censuring and punishing the counsel that have pleaded upon the return of the Writs of Habeas Corpus, in behalf of the prisoners, if duly considered, is a great instance of the temper of the House of Commons: For this House did not interpose when the prisoners applied to the lord-keeper, and the judges to be bailed: and, had the lawyers shewn so much modesty, as to have acquiesced in the opinion of the lord-keeper, and all the judges, that these prisoners were not bailable by the statute of Habeas Corpus, the Commons had never taken any notice of it: But they would not rest satisfied without bringing on again this case; and the privileges of the Commons were, with great licentiousness of speech, denied, and insulted in public court; not with any hope or prospect of relief of the prisoners, (who in this whole proceeding have apparently been only the tools of some ill-designing persons, that are contriving every way to disturb the freedom of the Commons' elections) but in order to vent these new doctrines against the Commons of England, and with a design to overthrow their fundamental right. And, after so much inveteracy shewn to the Commons, they could do no less than declare the abettors, promoters, countenancers, or assistants, of a prosecution so carried on, to be guilty of conspiring to make a difference between the two Houses of parliament, to be disturbers of the peace of the kingdom; and to have endeavoured, as far as in them lay, to overthrow the rights and privileges of the Commons of England in parliament assembled.

And the Commons, in committing the lawyers, have only done that right to their body which your lordships have frequently practised, in cases of personal privilege, where any single member of your lordships' House is concerned.

Your Lordships' last Resolution, viz. 'That a Writ of Error is not a Writ of grace, but of right, and ought not to be denied to the subject, when duly applied for; (though at the request of either House of parliament) the denial thereof being an obstruction of justice, contrary to Magna Charta.'

The Commons shall not enter into any consideration, whether a Writ of Error is of right, or of grace: they conceiving it not material in this case, in which no Writ of Error lies, nor was ever any Writ of Error brought or attempted in the like case before; and the allowing it in such cases would not only subject all the privileges of the House of Commons, but the liberties of all the people of England, to the will and pleasure of the House of Lords.

And when your Lordships exercise of judicature upon Writs of Error is considered, how unaccountable is it in its foundation; how inconsistent is it with our constitution, which, in all other respects, is the wisest and happiest in the world, to suppose the last resort in judicature, and the legislative to be differently placed?

And, when it is considered how that usurpation, in hearing of appeals from courts of equity, so easily traced, though often denied and protested against, is still exercised, and almost every session of parliament extended, it is not to be wondered, that, after the success your lordships have had in those great advances upon our constitution, you should now at once make an attempt upon the whole frame of it, by drawing the choice of the Commons representatives to your determination; for that is a necessary consequence, from your lordships encouraging the late actions, and your countenancing a Writ of Error; which, if allowed upon such a proceeding, might as well be introduced upon all acts and proceedings of courts or magistrates of justice: And though the present instance has been brought on under the specious pretence of preserving liberty, it is obvious the same will as well hold to controul the hearing and discharging prisoners in all cases.

And the Commons cannot but see how your lordships are contriving, by all methods, to bring the determination of liberty and property, into the bottomless and insatiable gulph of your lordships' judicature, which would swallow up both the prerogatives of the crown, and the rights and liberties of the people; and which your lordships must give the Commons leave to say, they have the greater reason to dread, when they consider in what manner it has been exercised: The instances whereof they forbear, because they hope your lordships will reform; and they desire rather to compose the old, than to create any new differences.

Upon the whole, the Commons hope, that, upon due consideration of what they have laid before your lordships, you will be fully satisfied they have acted nothing in all these proceedings, but what they are sufficiently justified in from precedents, and the known laws and customs of parliament; and that your lordships have assumed and exercised judicature contrary to the known laws and customs of parliament, and tending to the overthrow of the rights and liberties of the people of England.

The next day the said Report was left with the Lords at a Conference; after which the Lords desired a Free Conference, which was agreed to.

The Serjeant at Arms, attending the House, having acquainted the House, that he had received two Writs of Habeas Corpus under the great seal of England, to bring before the lord-keeper the bodies of James Mountague, esq.; and Alexander Denton, esq.; (who are committed to his custody by warrants from the Speaker of this House for a breach of privilege.)

The House again assumed the consideration of that matter: And after Debate,

Resolved, "That no Commoner of England, committed by the House of Commons for breach of privilege, or contempt of that House, ought to be, by any Writ of Habeas Corpus, made to appear in any other place, or before any other judicature, during that session of parliament wherein such person was so committed.

"That the Serjeant at Arms attending this House, do make no return of, or yield any obedience to the said Writs of Habeas Corpus; and, for such his refusal, that he have the protection of the House of Commons.

"That the Lord-Keeper be acquainted with the said Resolutions, to the end, that the said Writs of Habeas Corpus may be superseded, as contrary to law, and the privileges of this House."

Ordered, "That the clerk of this House do acquaint the Lord-Keeper of the great seal of England with the said Resolutions."

Free Conference.] March 13th. The Report of what passed at the Free Conference was delivered by Mr. Bromley, as follows:

That the Lords who appeared as managers, and spoke at this Free Conference, were, the earl of Sunderland, the lord Ferrers, the bishop of Salisbury, the lord Halifax, the lord Wharton and the duke of Devonshire Lord Steward. That the Free Conference was begun by the managers for the Lords, who said, this Conference was desired to maintain a good correspondence between the two Houses, which was never more necessary than at this time.

That the delivering Resolutions at their first Conference was parliamentary; and instanced the Resolutions 3 Car. 1, which produced the Petition of Right.

That the Lords look upon the Commons to be a great part of the constitution, which cannot be preserved but by doing right to both Houses.

That every part of the body politic, as well as the body natural, ought to be kept within due bounds; an excess in any member will weaken the whole.

That this Constitution is the wonder of the world, and glory of this nation; it is founded upon liberty and property; and the House of Commons hath been a great fence and bulwark of liberty.

That the Lords' Resolutions are very well founded, and justified by the laws of the land, as is their judicature in this case.

That it was proper for them to receive the Petitions, and make these Resolutions thereupon.

That the Lords are the great court of judicature.

ture; and when the courts below have differed in opinion, there has been resort to the Lords for their Judgment, as in the Case of Kindred of half-blood claiming shares of intestates estates.

That when such a Complaint comes before the Lords, they ought to give their opinion as to the law of the land; and that was the foundation of their present Resolutions.

1. That the first Resolution was, in effect, agreed to by the Commons, though they go off to foreign matters, of which the Lords take no notice.

That the law of the land can be altered only by the legislature.

2. That the second Resolution asserts the subjects redress by action at law, &c.

That all constitutions have reckoned this their safety; that every man, from the highest to the lowest, hath the protection of the law.

That, according to our constitution, the subject may contest his right with the crown, and upon equal terms, with that respect which is due.

That this Resolution only asserts the right, does not state the respective Courts, where the redress is to be had: If the party mistakes the Court, he is punished by costs of suit.

The term of 'privileged causes' is new, and the distinction unknown.

3. To support the said Resolution, it was urged, That the breach of privilege was not well grounded.

That it belongs to the crown to make Declarations; the Commons did indeed make Ordinances; and when their prince was murdered, they came to Declarations.

That a law, without promulgation, cannot have force to make an offence.

The liberty of men's persons is the greatest privilege, and not to be taken away, but in known cases; the invading of it has shook the best constitutions.

That the taking away the liberty of one mean person, once endangered the government of Rome.

That both Houses may commit for breach of privilege, but cannot declare any thing to be a privilege, without good grounds, nor consequently make any thing a contempt, that is not known to be so.

That Commitments, or Censures, have not been usual upon actions at law, though such actions have brought the proceedings or privileges of either House in question.

That, in the case of Freedom of Speech, which is the greatest privilege, there was a Judgment in king Charles the 1st's reign, in the heat of those things, against some members, for Speeches in parliament: this the Commons first condemned; and then by Conference brought it before the Lords, who came to a Resolution, that it was erroneous, and desired the lord Hollis to bring his Writ of Error; and thereupon it was reversed by the Lords, in the time of Charles the 2nd; which shews the care the Lords had of the Commons privileges.

That in Soame and Barnardiston's Case, the Commons did not concern themselves, only in support of the action, when in 1678, they examined the judgment of reversals as a grievance.

That the Lords had not interposed in any suits, which concerned the proceedings of their House.

That the earl of Banbury (as he was called) was, by the Lords, adjudged to be no peer: This was examined in the King's Bench, where, in abatement of an indictment of murder against him, as Charles Knowles, esq. he pleaded his title of an Earl; and in avoidance of that, the Order of the Lords was replied, and was examined by the Court, and disallowed.

That the late bishop of St. David's was prosecuted in the spiritual Court, and deprived, though a member of that House; and the Lords did not interpose.

That it is the wisdom of all governments, to have the law open; and that is the difference between a legal and an arbitrary government.

That the Lords do not meddle with the Commons' right of determining their own elections; they have a settled possession of it, which is a right: But if all the rights of subjects concerned in those elections are to be determined there, that will bring all questions of Freehold, and the allowance of all Charters, and all liberty and property before them.

That a freeholder of 40s. per annum has a right of inheritance, to which he is born; and if his Vote is denied, he is damnified, and loses the credit of his Vote; and if he shall only come to the House of Commons, they can neither give him damages nor costs of suit.

That a freehold cannot be determined by any Court which cannot give an Oath.

That the Precedents produced concern only the right of determining elections in general.

And an action by an elector, for his right of Voting, does not avoid the election.

4. To maintain the fourth Resolution, they said, That it may be lawful for a man to apply for his liberty, when he cannot have it.

That the proceeding in 1675, produced as a precedent in this Case, were upon a matter contested between the two Houses, and resolved differently in the Lords House: Topham and the lieutenant of the Tower were both turned out; and the ferment was so high, that the parliament was prorogued, and soon after dissolved.

The fifth Resolution is a consequence of the fourth:

That the commitment of the lawyers was not for licentious speech, as was insinuated at the last Conference, but for pleading upon the return of the Writs of Habeas Corpus.

That it is the particular character of that odious Court called the Inquisition, that no body dares appear for, or resort to a person imprisoned there, but he is left to the mercy of that Court.

The lawyers are not to be answerable for every thing they argue; they are to do their duty for their clients, and the Court is to judge of it.

6. The Commons declining the last Resolution is an agreeing to it, though not so parliamentary as it would have been to have agreed to it directly.

That the Lords are the only proper judges, whether the Writ of Error lies before them.

To these Arguments the Managers for the Commons answered :

That they agreed the necessity of a good correspondence between the two Houses, especially at this time of common danger: and that the Commons had fully shewn their desire to maintain that good correspondence, by condescending to meet their lordships at this free Conference, although their ancient and fundamental privileges had been called in question, and denied by their lordships, and that in an extraordinary and very unparliamentary manner.

That the delivery of Resolutions is so far from being the only method of Conferences, that the more usual method has been to offer reasons, without Resolutions; and it would be very difficult to give any instance (before this) of either House delivering positive Resolutions at a Conference, without the reasons, at the same time, to support them, and that induce them to make such Resolutions.

1. That the Commons' Answer to the Lords' first Resolution, is not foreign to the subject-matter of the Conference: because the Commons apprehended the subject-matter to be their lordships denying the privileges of the Commons, on the one hand, and their extending their own judicature beyond its proper limits, on the other: and therefore the Commons could not but take notice, how far their lordships had transgressed in the exercise of an unwarrantable judicature, in contradiction to that very rule they had laid down for the test of the proceedings of the Commons, and by which the Commons had strictly governed themselves.

That though the Commons cannot create new privileges; yet, in Coke's 13 Reports, fo. 68. it is said, the privilege of parliament, either of the upper House, or of the House of Commons, belongs to the determination or decision only of the court of parliament; for every court hath a right to adjudge their own privileges, according to the book of Ed. 4, sir John Paston's Case.

2. To their lordships Arguments for their second Resolution your managers answered :

That every person injured, hath a right to seek redress; but then that redress must be sought in the place where the matter is properly cognizable.

3. To what the Lords offered upon the third Resolution, your managers answered :

That matters of election do not belong to the courts below, but only to the House of Commons, which hath been in long possession of them: that there was an act of parliament made in the time of king Henry the 6th, to give an action for a false return of members to serve in parliament, because no such action lay at Common-Law, it relating to elections.

That double returns not being within that statute, no action lay in the courts of common-law, for making any double return, till the statute 7 and 8 William 3.

That, besides the instances given, in the Answers the Commons gave to the Lords Resolutions, at the last Conference, this distinction as to privileged cases, is fully and undeniably warranted by the statute made in the first year of king William and queen Mary, entitled, 'An Act declaring the Rights and Liberties of the subject, and settling the succession of the Crown;' where, among' other endeavours of the late king James, to subvert and extirpate the laws and liberties of the kingdom, these are mentioned, 'by violating the freedom of election of members to serve in parliament, and prosecutions in the court of King's-bench, for matters and causes only cognizable in parliament.'

Besides, that there are privileged cases as well as privileged persons appears from hence; a prohibition, and afterwards attachment, lies, for suing in the spiritual court for a temporal cause determinable in the temporal court. There are divers laws within this realm, of which the common-law is but one, as appears in Coke's 1 Inst. fo. 2, b, where he mentions 'Lex et consuetudo parliamenti, et lex communis,' as distinct laws.

As there are several laws, so there are several courts and jurisdictions, and several causes proper for those several laws and several jurisdictions: of these the high court of parliament is the first: 'Lex et consuetudo parliamenti' is a great branch of the law of England: and many causes are to be determined only by that law, as appears in the Inst. fo. 23.

With such causes as are in their nature parliamentary, and to be determined by the law of parliament, the common-law, and common-law judges have nothing to do; as further appears, 4 Inst. fo. 14, 15. where the expressions are very suitable to the present controversies.

That the persons assisting in the prosecution of such actions, after a prohibition by the Commons, for that such causes belong to their jurisdiction, the committing them for the breach of their privileges in that particular, is no more than is done by the common-law courts for a like contempt, when persons will sue, after a prohibition, to the spiritual courts: and the Commons' usual way to defend their privileges against such invasions, has been by committing the tools and instruments thereof.

It is a fundamental maxim of the law and custom of parliament, which is the highest and noblest part of the law of England, and particularly adapted to the preservation of the liber-fies of this kingdom, that the two Houses are independent of one another, and sole judges of their rights and privileges: That their lordships did admit, the Commons have a privilege to judge of the rights of their own elections, to one intent, but not to another: but if the Commons have such a privilege to one intent, they must be judges of it to all intents and purposes whatsoever; and, being sole judges thereof, their judgment cannot be legally called in question, either by writs of Habeas Corpus, Writs of Error, or otherwise, in any other court; and consequently the proceedings in Westminster-hall, and in the House of Peers, and the Judgment given there, are all null and void, et coram non iudice.

The Commons' commitment for commencing these actions, is no more than what they and their predecessors have in all times practised, in cases of breach of privilege.

4. In answer to what the Lords had offered upon the fourth Resolution, your managers insisted, that application of friends for the liberty of any person imprisoned, ought to be in a proper place, and in a proper manner, which in this case ought to have been only to the House of Commons, and by the petitions of the persons they had committed.

That the proceedings in 1675, were so well grounded, that they must be precedents to the Commons to follow at all times upon the like occasions.

5. To what the Lords offered upon the fifth Resolution, your managers answered:

The licentiousness of speech used by the lawyers, was only mentioned among other particulars of the provocations they gave the House of Commons; but they were committed for pleading upon the returns of the Writs of Habeas Corpus, in behalf of the prisoners committed by the House of Commons, which the Commons, who are the only judges of their own privileges, take to be a great breach of the privilege of their House.

6. To the last Resolution your managers insisted, that no Writ of Error lies in that case; and that there may be cases wherein no Writ of Error lies, was their lordships' opinion in the Case of the late bishop of St. David's, who brought his Writ of Error upon the courts not granting him a prohibition.

The Case of sir Thomas Armstrong, mentioned by their lordships, was particular, in that the Commons then apprehended he was entitled to a Writ of Error, within the meaning of the statute of Edw. 6.

Your managers further urged the novelty of the action in the Case of Ashby and White, of which no footsteps can be found in any book of the law, or in any record, although we have faithful reports of all memorable Cases for 400 years past; and the occasion of such an action must frequently have happened.

The Lords themselves, when they had no design upon the privileges of the Commons, were of opinion, in the Case of sir Samuel Barnardiston, in the first year of the reign of king William, that no such action lay; and there is no reason can be offered to maintain this action, but held more strongly in the Case of sir Samuel Barnardiston, as damages, costs, &c. And it is an absurd distinction to say, that in this case the right of election cannot come in question, because the determining of the right of the electors doth generally determine the right of the elected; and almost all controverted elections depend upon the qualifications of the electors.

That the Commons had shown such a disposition to maintain a good correspondence with their lordships, though their lordships in the Case of Ashby and White, had, contrary to the judgment of the courts below, allowed the action, upon which the plaintiff had taken out execution, and levied the money; that the Commons took no notice of it, and were willing to let the matter fall, which might occasion any contest in this time of public danger: But when other actions of the like nature were still commented and prosecuted, whereby all elections would be brought to the determination of the Lords, or, at least, in time so influenced, as that the Lords would in effect chuse the Commons, and thereby the independency of the two Houses would be destroyed, which is the great safety of the constitution; then it concerned the Commons, who are the representatives of the people, to oppose what would be so fatal to our constitution.

The bringing Writs of Habeas Corpus upon the commitments of the Commons, and a Writ of Error thereupon before the Lords, would bring all the privileges of the Commons to be determined by the judges, and afterwards by the Lords, upon such Writs of Error.

Nay, such Writs of Error upon every Habeas Corpus, would bring the liberty of every commoner in England, to the arbitrary disposition of the House of Lords.

And if a Writ of Error cannot be denied in any case, and the Lords alone are to judge whether the case be proper for a Writ of Error, then all the queen's revenue, all her prerogatives, and all the lives and liberties of the people of England, will be in the hands of the Lords, for every felon, burglar, and traitor, will be entitled to a Writ of Error before the Lords; and they will have even power of life and death.

And by Writs of Error and Appeals, as already exercised, they will have all our properties; by such new-invented actions they will have all our elections; and by such Writs of Habeas Corpus, and Writs of Error thereupon, they will have all our privileges, liberties, and even lives, at their determination: who determine by vote, with their doors shut, and it is not certainly known who it is that hurts you.—The novelty of those things, and the infinite consequences of them, is the greatest argument in law, that they are not of right.

The Commons are not contending for a small thing, but for their all: Especially since the Lords have found out a way to distress the government, by detaining the money given by the Commons, which must come last to them, because the Money-Bills must begin with the commons; and if by that means they can extort Writs of Error where they never were heard of, the Commons must commit the persons employed in all such innovations, or else they must lose, by such contrivances, all that they have.

In the Case of Denzil Holles, sir John Elliot, &c. in 1667, the Commons declared the Judgment given in 5 Car. 1, to be an illegal Judgment, and against the privilege of parliament; and this they did of themselves, before they acquainted the Lords therewith.

Afterwards, because it concerned the Lords as well as the Commons, they imparted their Resolutions, to the Lords, who concurred with the Commons; and the Writ of Error, which was afterwards brought at the desire and instance of the Lords, and not at all by the desire of the Commons, they rested upon their own Resolution, that it was an illegal Judgment.

The Lords, by way of Reply, said further, that this is a cause of liberty and property, and judicial proceedings, which the Commons had endeavoured to stop.

That the Conference, therefore, asked by the Lords, upon the fundamental rights and liberties, was proper.

That they are the same terms the Commons used, 3 Car. when their liberties were attacked.

That the true method of conference is not by way of question and answer, but by Resolutions; which are not so binding, but if the Lords are convinced by arguments, they may retract them.

That the Lords, sure, may regularly take notice of this printed Paper, when it contains such declaration, as all persons are bound to take notice of at the peril of commitment.

That the right of the House of Commons to determine their own elections is not in question, or intended to be changed; but the two precedents produced to support them are very much mistaken.

That the Case of sir Francis Goodwin is not fairly stated, the word 'Order' being omitted in the Commons' Answer to the Lords' Message, relating to the Commons' proceedings in this case; which refers to a particular Order of the House of Commons, they having before determined that election. That it is not taken notice that the Lords went with the Commons to the king, and were mediators; and that, at the last, a new Writ issued for a new election.

That, in the stating the precedent 28 Eliz. the Commons have not taken notice, that the election was in that case determined by the Judges.

That the Commons did not confine their Resolution to Armstrong's Case; but it is general and absolute, that a Writ of Error in felony or treason, is of right and not of grace.

That by the Writ of Error brought in the late bishop of St. David's case, upon the denial of a Prohibition, and disallowed by the Lords, it appears, when a record comes improperly before them, they are so just as to dismiss it.

That, instead of proving the law, the consequences are urged, which is not right arguing.

That the question is, whether the queen is bound to grant a Writ of Error? If she is, it will be hard for any body of men to intrepose with the crown, and stop it, to hinder that fiat, which, by the opinion of the Judges, she ought to give.

She is obliged too, by Magna Charta: 'Nulli negabimus, nulli deferemus, justitiam.'

That whether a Writ of Error lies or not, will afterwards be proper for the Judgment of this Court, as it is of any other Court where a Writ of Error is returnable.

That the Commons are very safe, and may depend the Lords will be as tender of their privileges as of their own.

That whatever privileges accrue to the Commons, will accrue to the Lords also: If the commitments of the Commons are free from the cognizance of the courts below, those of the Lords will be so too.

That 3 Car. the Commons maintained, that the measure of persons being bailable, is not from the authority which committed, but from the cause of commitment.

Your Managers further observed, this subject matter was scarce ever in conference before, between the Lords and Commons, and will seem strange to posterity.

That the Lords' concern for liberty and property cannot be equal with that of the Commons; for the Lords' liberty is better fenced, and consequently their property too, than that of the Commons.

The Lords are less interested in the event of this Conference than the Commons, who are the trustees of those who sent them, and are bound in duty and interest to preserve their liberty and property; and having but a triennial duration, which is at this time near expiring, it is not to be imagined they will infringe what they are entrusted with, and so much concerned to maintain; and that so notoriously, that the Lords should complain, who are much less concerned, but more to be feared, as their designs as well as honour may be hereditary.

At the first Conference, six Resolutions were delivered, as matters of undoubted truth and law. And the proceedings of the Commons are to be tried by these rules, though they were no parties to the making them.

1. The first is not to be excepted against; only is an insinuation, as if the Commons had practised the contrary, which they are not conscious of.

2. To the second, there are many injuries for which no action at law is allowed; as if a judge give a wrong judgment, the redress by Writ of Error, is no satisfaction for the damage.

So for other acts of a judge, or court of justice, as denying a Writ of Habeas Corpus, or bail, no action lies, but upon the late statute.

That their lordships, not making any distinction between matters and causes, which were exempt from the cognizance of the common law courts, as being solely cognizable in parliament, and causes which were exempt only in respect of the persons sued, being entitled to privilege of parliament, seems to be the occasion of the mistakes their lordships have entertained, in relation to the proceedings of the Commons; that the House of Commons is a court of judicature in many respects; and, as such, hath as well as other courts, causes proper and peculiar to its jurisdiction.

That the law books, and particularly the lord Coke, speak of matters of parliament which are not to be determined by the common law, but according to the law and usage of parliament.

That all matters moved or done in parliament, must be questioned and determined there, and not elsewhere, has been heretofore asserted by the House of Commons, as their ancient and undoubted right, and has been allowed both by the judges of law, and by their lordships. And when the judges of the King's Bench, in the fifth year of king Charles the First, upon an information against sir John Elliot, Mr. Hollis, and others, held, that matters done in the House of Commons, if not done in a parliamentary way, might be questioned elsewhere; that judgment was afterwards reversed in parliament.

That their lordships allowed all matters relating to elections, ought to be determined solely by the Commons: and though their lordships attempted to make a distinction between the right of elections, and the right of electors, yet their lordships cannot find room for such a distinction, unless they would say, the right and qualification of the electors was a matter not relating to elections.

That by the Parliament Rolls, 11 Rich. 2. it appears a petition was exhibited by parliament, and allowed by the king, that the liberties and privileges of parliament should be discussed by the parliament, and not by any other courts, nor by common or civil law; and, therefore, when the judges have been asked their opinions in matters of parliament, they have answered, that the privileges of parliament ought to be determined there, and not by any other; as they did in the case of Thorp, Speaker of the House of Commons, 31 H. 6.

That these matters are not exempt from the determination of other courts, in respect of the persons sued; for then they might be determined there after the time of privilege was expired; whereas it is evident, that such matters and causes cannot be determined, in any other court than that of the parliament, after the expiration of the time of privilege, any more than before.

That these matters are determinable in parliament, although the persons prosecuted are not entitled to the privilege of parliament, as appears by many instances, particularly by that of the mayor of Westbury, in the 8th year of Eliz. who, for taking 4*l.* to get a person elected a Burgess for that borough, was fined and imprisoned by the House of Commons, although he was not a person entitled to the privilege of parliament.

That it may be as well said, that an action is maintainable for refusing any of the Lords, a right of precedency in parliament; yet it cannot be imagined the House of Peers would be content the same should be brought in question, in any of the courts of law, and decided by a Jury of Commoners.

But the same arguments will hold for maintaining such an action, to recover damage for refusing precedency to him that hath right to it, as for maintaining an action to recover damages, for refusing to take down upon the poll the vote of an elector: For it may with equal reason be said in both causes, that the plaintiff hath a right, that the defendant refused him that right, that such refusal is an injury, and consequently ought to be repaired in damages.

3. As to the third Resolution, the Commons are not accountable to the House of Lords, or any other court, for what they did in that matter.

Their privileges being rights peculiar to that House, what is their privilege, and the breach of it, is only examinable, and to be judged by themselves.

That the courts of Westminster-hall have that deference for each other judgment, that, in commitments for contempt or misdemeanour, which are frequent every term, another court, though superior, will not redress the prisoner by Habeas Corpus, or otherwise; but he must address to the court which committed him, much less can an inferior court do it.

The House of Commons therefore expected the same deference from those courts which they pay each other; and also from the Lords' House what is due to a co-ordinate jurisdiction: The Commons taking themselves to be superior to any court in Westminster-hall, and not allowing any court in this government to be their superior, no more than their predecessors have done.

The Commons do not intend by their Declaration to make a new law, but barely declare what the law was, and prohibit any person to act contrary.

The term Declaration is not peculiar to the prince, but is a familiar term in Westminster-hall.

The commitment was not for acting contrary to the vote of the Commons, but for acting contrary to law, after the law was notified to them by that Declaration, and they thereby prohibited to proceed in that course.

To set this in a true light, if a man sues in the admiralty, or ecclesiastical court, for a matter properly cognizable at common-law, the party shall not indeed be committed for commencing that suit; but if the defendant in such suit obtains a prohibition, which declares what the law is, and gives the plaintiff notice that his suit is contrary to law, and therefore prohibits him to proceed any further therein; if he does proceed, an attachment will issue to arrest him for breach of prohibition, as it is said, though in truth, it is for acting contrary to law, after he had been admonished what the same was.

Now there is no difference between the declaration complained of, and the prohibition mentioned, but in the name only; both declare what the law is; both admonish the person offending, and both command him not to proceed; so that there is as much reason to complain of a prohibition at law, as of the declaration mentioned in the Resolution.

4. To the fourth Resolution, if it respects the prisoners committed by the Commons, they apprehend the application ought to be to their House.

5. For the fifth Resolution, the Commons have the same exceptions to it as they had to the third Resolution: For if counsel, attorneys, or solicitors, are prohibited, and act contrary to the order of any court, they are guilty of a contempt of that court, and for such contempt they may be taken into custody.

To their lordships' last Resolution, it is very true, that in the last reign the House of Commons did so resolve in the cause of sir Thomas Armstrong, as hath been cited, which case was, that sir Thomas Armstrong was indicted for high-treason, and afterwards fled beyond sea, where he was at the time of the exigent awarded against him; and afterwards, within a year after the exigent awarded, he was brought prisoner into England, and would have a Writ of Error, but it was denied him; upon which the House of Commons made the Resolution mentioned. At the common-law, if a person had been guilty of a capital, or any other crime, and had been in England at the time of the indictment found against him, but was beyond sea at the time of the exigent awarded, and thereupon an outlawry was had, the person outlawed might any time afterwards have reversed that outlawry, for that Error in Fact; the practice whereupon was, that persons guilty of treason, would fly beyond sea, and there stay till the witnesses against them were dead, and then return into England, reverse their outlawry, and become safe. To remedy which mischief, was the statute of Edw. 6, made, which takes away the Error in Treason, unless the person outlawed rendered himself to the Chief Justice within a year after the outlawry. Within which exception was the case of sir Thomas Armstrong, as the Commons apprehended, which was the reason of the Resolution: And in other cases the practice since that Resolution has been otherwise; for in the Case of Salisbury, who was attainted of Felony for counterfeiting the stamps, a Writ of Error was denied him, though he petitioned for the same. But if this Resolution is aimed at a Writ of Error for denying a Habeas Corpus, or decreeing to bail, or discharge persons committed by the House of Commons, this Resolution is very wide from the purpose; for, whether a Writ of Error be a Writ of Right, or a Writ of Grace, in all cases where a Writ of Error does lie, yet their lordships' Resolution cannot be carried so far as to make a Writ of Error lie, in a case where there is no judgment pronounced, as there never is in the case of an Habeas Corpus, or in any thing relating thereunto: for if a Habeas Corpus is denied, or if granted, and the persons thereupon denied to be bailed or discharged, this is no such judgment, but that the same, or any other court, may grant an Habeas Corpus, and discharge or bail the person committed.

Your Managers added, The Commons hoped it would be no difficulty to convince the Lords, that these Resolutions were both unreasonable and unparliamentary, and they have not been much justified; and certainly it cannot be parliamentary, or reasonable, for the Lords to condemn the Commons in the case of their own privileges, when the Lords are no judges of them: and therefore, though the Commons have now entered into this debate with their lordships, it was never meant to subject their proceedings to the Lords' examination, but only to satisfy the Lords, and all mankind, that the Commons have not done an extravagant thing. That a noble lord said, they did not intend to interrupt the Commons in the determination of their elections. The Commons are beholden to them for that; for otherwise, when they thought fit, they might as well meddle with that, as several other things they have of late taken upon them.

The Commons hope their lordships will consider what the constitution is, and think it not reasonable, that any part should exceed its due bounds: but there have been great invasions made upon it by their lordships, and some instances of that kind have been delivered at the last Conference; and it would be easy to shew, that the judicature which of late has been assumed by the Lords, is not consistent with the constitution.

A Writ of Error in this case, the Commons take to be such: and the Commons would be blameable for admitting of it, since no such Writ does lie: and the Commons have done well in advising her majesty not to grant it, since it is against the law: the Commons find no such Writ ever brought.

It is said their lordships will do right to the Commons upon it; but the Commons can never think it reasonable to trust the liberties of the people of England to their lordships' pleasure, for they that have power to do right, have power to do wrong; and power is so often abused, that the Commons can never suffer the Lords to assume this new power to themselves. Were we certain power could never be abused, an arbitrary, and what is called a tyrannical power, would be the best in the world, for that, not being tied to any rule, would apply the remedies proper in all cases; but since this is not to be expected, the Commons were in the right to stop this Writ of Error; they find one thing has brought on another; and therefore, for the future, shall oppose any further progress of this nature.

It was further urged by the Lords, in Reply, that if such a Writ of Error wants a precedent, it is a new sort of imprisonment has occasioned this.

That the consequences urged by gentlemen cannot avail.

That if the law be so, nothing but the legislature can alter it.

That it is said, the Lords cannot judge of the privilege of the House of Commons. They do not say they can; there may be no occasion; but from precedents it appears they have done it by Writ of Error, and at the desire of the Commons.

That not only the Lords, but all mankind will judge of what is not their privileges, if they claim that which neither sense, nor reason, nor law will justify.

That if the Commons say, to bring an action at law against persons not privileged is a breach of privilege, all mankind will say it is not.

That this comes upon a Petition of five men to the Lords, setting forth, they have been imprisoned by the Commons for bringing their actions against the constables of Aylesbury, and for suing out writs of Habeas Corpus, and are at least delayed in a Writ of Error.

The question lies in a narrow compass; whether they have a right to bring their actions at law; if so, it is injustice to imprison them for doing it;

A hardship to deny them writs of Habeas Corpus, and a greater to imprison their counsel and agents for endeavouring to procure them their liberty.

That their right is settled by a judgment of law, which will ever remain, till altered by the legislature.

That a Declaration of one House, or both Houses, cannot alter the law.

That the Lords intend not to disturb the Commons in the right of judging, only as to their own members.

That the material difference is between judging of the right of the electors, and the right of the elected.

And there may be cases, as here, where the election is not in question, and yet the electors receive great damage in being denied their vote.

That the right of freehold is a man's birth-right, and cannot be taken from him but by law.

That if any person be injured by any officer whatsoever, he may, by law, seek for reparation: otherwise, there is a right without a remedy, which is no right at all.

In answer to this, your Managers said, This action is of the first impression; and it is a good argument no such action lies, because none was ever brought before, and especially, because occasions cannot be presumed to have been wanting in every new election of members to serve in parliament, any many more justifiable than in the late Case of Ashby and White, where the plaintiff was a person likely to become chargeable to the parish, and therefore removed by the order of two justices: and this, by the way, brings in mind the printed Case of Ashby and White, from the Report of the Lords' Committees, where it is given in answer, no such action before was brought, that few had such a true English spirit as that plaintiff, though it is said he then was a cobbler, and formerly had been an ostler; and his breast, it seems, was first warmed with this true English spirit, which was rather a spirit of faction.

And it is worthy observation, that in this case, the costs and charges sustained by Ashby, or somebody for him, could not be less than 100*l.* more than the costs and damages recovered; so that it was infelix victoria, and no benefit, but a loss to him. A noble lord was pleased to say further, that though he would not pretend to judge of the Commons privileges, yet he might of what was not their privileges. That argument appears very strange, since the Commons say the matter in question is their privilege; and if the Lords saying it is not, is sufficient to divest them of it, the same method may divest the Commons of all the rest. The Commons are not going about to create new privileges, but continue the possession of those which their predecessors ever enjoyed and exercised; and which they think neither this or any other future House of Commons, can ever depart from.

The Lords afterwards receded from the generality of their second and last Resolutions.

They said, the second, so far as that every one who apprehends himself injured has a right to seek redress, was general, but what followed of an action at law, was confined to the present case.

So the sixth, though it was general, was to be understood in this particular case.

As to what was said, that none but a superior court can take cognizance of what another does, it was answered, That when the earl of Shaftsbury was committed by the House of Lords for a contempt, he was brought by a Habeas Corpus to the Court of King's-bench; This was complained of to the House of Lords, but they passed it over, being of opinion a man might seek for liberty where he would.

The Lords' judicature is too sacred a thing to be touched.

Your Managers thereupon returned, They wished your lordships had said that at the beginning, it would have saved much time and shortened the debates; for the Commons think their privileges as sacred as the Lords can their Judicature. Your Managers proceeded to say,

That as nothing offered at this Conference, or the last, was meant to submit or lessen the privileges of the Commons; much less had any thing in the precedents, in the time of queen Elizabeth and James 1, preceded at the last Conference, any tendency that way.

And, in answer to some objections made to those precedents, your Managers said, the Commons did not take upon them to set forth the whole proceedings, which are very long; but though they had not their books there to make out the quotations, can depend upon what they have stated to be true.

In the precedent of sir Francis Goodwin's case, cited by the Commons, there are no omissions that, duly considered, can make that case less to the advantage of the Commons, on this occasion; for if the word Order be omitted, and taking the answer to have been, that they did conceive it did not stand with the honour and order of the House, to give account of any of their proceedings or doings, that will little alter the case, since it is plain, from the entry on the Journal, the Commons in returning this answer, had regard chiefly to the precedent then quoted, 27 Eliz. when the Commons refused to give the Lords any reasons (though the Lords desired them) for the rejecting, at the first reading, a bill the Lords had sent down to the Commons: The Reasons for the Commons proceedings in this case were prepared by themselves, which they did communicate to the Lords; but the Lords were not to add or diminish: And though some Lords were present at the Commons delivering their reasons, there is a material distinction, upon the Commons Journals, of those Lords being present as Lords of the Council, and not as Lords of the parliament.

And the noble Lord who took notice of the Commons in the stating of this case, and pretended to state it fully and truly himself, omitted, that the new writ was ordered to issue at the request of sir Francis Goodwin, by his letter; which, for the satisfaction of the House, was read and entered on the Journal, before any question for the new election was made.

In that of the 28th of Eliz. the Commons did not, at the last Conference, omit to take notice of the judges' determination; but it is justly stated as a matter the Commons, in the examination of that case, were informed of, but did not respect; the Commons then asserting themselves to have the sole determination of that case.

Your Managers further urged, Though the Commons do not submit their privileges, it may be proper to ascertain what they claim, with the reasons why they are at this time the more concerned to oppose all attempts upon them.

They do agree the right of voting may be grounded upon freehold, charter, or prescription; and they do not pretend to draw them from courts of common-law, when, as such, they come there originally, immediately and directly in question.

But it is as plain, when the right of voting in an election is the thing originally, immediately and directly in question, that is solely cognizable in the House of Commons, whose determination is the standing rule for all places: And if the elections only were examminable by the Commons, and every elector's vote was examinable elsewhere, the consequence of such different determinations is fully stated, as delivered at the last Conference; which common and known difference of coming originally, or collaterally and incidentally in question, will answer the case of the earl of Banbury, where the Order of the House of Lords came only incidentally in question, upon an indictment for murder; nor is there any injury in this case that requires an action, much less damages: The elector's vote, upon every election, depends upon its own true foundation, as the elector then stands entitled by freehold, charter, or prescription, whether he was entitled, or was allowed, or refused at any former election, or not.

Nor is damage always necessary to a remedy; that which is specific and gives the right, is the most noble and compleat remedy; Damages being only secondary, substituted by way of recompence where the other cannot be had, as appears by many instances in the law.

The Commons had great reason to assert their ancient right, and withstand these late and new attempts upon the constitution, which in every step have been unprecedented; viz. the action, the Habeas Corpus, and the Writ of Error.

The action was never known, though the like occasions have been as frequent as elections, unless these Aylesbury men have more refined notions of their rights and privileges than others ever had.

As to the Habeas Corpus, the argument is so much stronger as Liberty is dearer than Property.

As to the Writ of Error, though the Lords Resolution is general, they now assert it to be of right only in this case.

As the Commons, at the last Conference, waved the point of a Writ of Error being of right or of grace, so they do now, not by way of admission, but as it is not material in this case.

But thus much may be observed, that this is not the common case, where the question arises and falls under the determination of the Judges of the law, which is of petitions of right, and Writs of Error in the courts of Westminster, (as that of sir Thomas Armstrong was) where the queen is party: there it is in the room of a suit against the crown, and if denied, the party has no remedy.

This Petition to the queen, for a Writ of Error in parliament, is properly a parliamentary case, and is the same when the queen is party or not; and seems some remnant of our ancient constitution, where all petitions were to the king in parliament, or to the king and his great council, which was distinct from the House of Peers, and were examined by triers, whether fit for the parliament to proceed upon, or not; and to say, that upon such examination, they could not be rejected, is to say, that examination was insignificant. And, if in this case no Writ of Error lies, it cannot then be said, that the denying of it is an obstruction of justice, or contrary to Magna Charta.

That a Writ of Error lies not in any proceeding on any Habeas Corpus, has been the uniform opinion of former times, as appears in the Case of the City of London, 7 Jac. reported by the Lord Chief-Justice Coke, in his eighth Report, where one under an arrest, for the the penalty in a by-law, brought his Habeas Corpus, and the judges took it for a ground, that no issue or demurrer could be joined upon the return, nor could any Writ of Error lie upon their award; and upon that, as a principle, grounded their resolution, fol. 128.

And that this never came directly in question, is because a Writ of Error in such case was never asked, much less had, upon a bare commitment of any court whatsoever: And it is hard to imagine that there is any lawful resort or appeal for liberty, left untried at this day, when so many, in all times, have had occasion to apply for it; especially considering the frequent commitments of both Houses of parliament.

That the Commons are not surprized, to find the Lords make such a shew of submitting their privileges to the courts of Westminster, when it is in order to draw all the rights and privileges of both Houses to their own final determination; and much less when they consider how insignificant all courts of justice are rendered, while their lordships exercise the last resort in judicature.

The several attempts in the way of judicature, which have been made upon the constitution, are so many reasons for the Commons at last to make a stand.

The very form of the Writs of Error in parliament is altered in a most material part.

It is still returnable into parliament generally; and the judgment is entered, 'per Curiam Parliamenti.'

But where the ancient form, which appears in Bostall's Entries, fol. 302, was, 'Ut de consilio et advisamento, dominorum spiritualium et temporalium ac communitatum in parlamento nostro exitentium ulterius pro errore corrigendo fieri faciamus quod de jure, &c.' Of late, as appears by a Writ of Error, printed in the lord chief-justice Saunders's second Report, fol. 223, (and agreeable to that are all the modern ones) that word 'communitatum' is omitted.—This is only touched for an instance, that even the highest Records, which ought to derive to us our laws and constitution pure and entire, have been corrupted.

And to proceed to instance some modern innovations upon our constitution, in point of Judicature:

In Dec. 18. Jac. 1. It appears by the Lords' Journal, that an Appeal to the Lords from a court of equity, was by them acknowledged to be as new and unprecedented, as any of the attempts which occasion the present Conference.—

Here the Lords interrupted your Managers, affirming, That they were restrained from entering into debate of their judicature of appeals from equity, as foreign from the subject-matter of the last Conference. But it was answered, and insisted by your Managers, that this was part of the matter offered at the last Conference.

And your managers declared, That they had more to offer, and were ready to proceed upon the subject-matter of the last Conference, in such manner as they thought their duty to the Commons of England required, if their lordships thought fit to bear them: whereupon the Lords did rise, and broke off the Conference.

Resolved, "That the proceedings of this House, in relation to the Aylesbury Men, committed by this House for a breach of privilege, and the other proceedings of this House, in that matter, are in maintenance of the ancient and undoubted rights and privileges of the Commons of England."

Ordered, "That all proceedings, in relation to the Aylesbury Men, committed by this House, and the Report of the Lords' Journal, and Reports of the Conference, and of the Free Conference, be printed."

Representation and Address of the Lords, on the Commitment of the five Aylesbury Men. March 13. Upon the commitment of these five Aylesbury men, and their being remanded to Newgate, the House of Lords drew up the following Representation and Address, viz.

The Humble REPRESENTATION and ADDRESS of the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, presented to her Majesty the 14th day of March, 1704, and her Majesty's most gracious Answer thereunto: with their Lordship's Thanks for the same.

We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, are under an unavoidable necessity of making our humble application to your majesty, upon an occasion, which, as it is very grievous to us, so we fear it may be uneasy to your majesty: but the proceedings of the House of Commons, in relation to five burgesses of the town of Aylesbury, John Paty, John Oriat, John l'aton, Henry Basse, and Daniel Horne, have been so very extraordinary, that the consequences of such proceedings may prove so fatal to the properties and liberties of the people of England, and so directly tend to the interruption of the course of justice, to the eluding the judicature of parliament, and to the diminution of your royal prerogative, that we cannot answer it to your majesty, to the kingdom, and to ourselves, without setting them before you in a due light.

One Matthew Ashby, a Burgess of the borough of Aylesbury, brought an action upon the case at common law, against the constables of the town of Aylesbury (being the proper officers to return members to serve in parliament for that place) for having, by contrivance, fraudulently and maliciously hindered him to give his vote at an election. In this action a verdict was found for him; but judgment was given against him in your majesty's court of Queen's-Bench, which was reversed upon a Writ of Error brought in parliament; where he obtained judgment to recover his damages for the injury, and afterwards had execution upon that judgment.

The five persons above-named being burgeses of the same borough, and having (as they conceived) had the like wrong done them by the constables there, and supposing the law to be equally open to all Englishmen, did severally commence and prosecute actions against those officers, in order to recover their damages. And for so doing, they were sent for to the bar of the House of Commons, and committed prisoners to Newgate, the fifth day of December last, during the pleasure of the House of Commons, as having acted contrary to the declaration, in contempt of the jurisdiction, and in breach of the privileges of that House.

These proceedings are wholly new and unprecedented. It is the birthright of every Englishman, who apprehends himself to be injured, to seek for redress in your majesty's courts of justice: and if there can be any power can controul this right, and can prescribe when he shall, and when he shall not be allowed the benefit of the laws, he ceases to be a freeman, and his liberty and property are precarious, the crown lays claim to no such power; and we are sure the law has trusted no such authority with any subjects whatsoever. If a man mistakes his case, in believing himself to have a good cause of suit, when he has not; if he mistakes his court, by applying to an incompetent jurisdiction, he will fail of relief, and be made liable to costs, but to no other punishment: he is not guilty of a crime, nor is it a contempt of the court that has the proper jurisdiction.

But these men were guilty of no mistake: the point of law was settled by the judgment of that court, which is allowed to be the last resort; and this will continue to be the law, until it be altered by the legislative authority. They saw their neighbour quietly and unmolested reap the fruit of the judgment he had obtained; and yet, for pursuing the same remedy, they are condemned to an indefinite imprisonment, during the pleasure of the House of Commons. This method does introduce an uncertainty and confusion never before known in England. The most arbitrary governments cannot shew more direct instances of partiality and oppression. The point of law is judicially settled; and yet the House of Commons take upon them to punish men by imprisonment, for endeavouring to have the benefit of what is so established for law.

We humbly observe to your majesty that the first thing, they alledged in the warrant of commitment, as to the offence of these five persons, is, that those actions were brought contrary to a declaration of the House of Commons.

It was never yet heard (when there was a House of Lords in being, and a king or queen upon the throne) that the House of Commons alone claimed a power, by any declaration of theirs, to alter the law, or to restrain the people of England from taking the benefit of it; nor have their declarations any such authority, as to oblige men to submit to them at the peril of their liberty. If they have such a power in any case, they may apply it to all cases as they please; for when the law is no longer the measure, will and pleasure will be the only rule.

The certainty of our laws is that which makes the chief felicity of Englishmen: but if the House of Commons can alter the laws by the Declarations, or (which is the same thing) can deprive men of their liberty if they go about to take the benefit of them, we shall have no longer reason to boast of that part of our constitution.

The next thing alledged in the Warrant is, that the commencing and prosecuting these actions, was contempt of the jurisdiction of the House of Commons. Such a jurisdiction was never claimed by the House of Commons, till upon this occasion; and if this novelty of a jurisdiction be founded on their new authority of declaring, they will stand and fall together.

The House of Commons have for a long time exercised a jurisdiction over their own members by allowing or disallowing their elections, as they saw cause: but they have never before entertained a notion, that they had a jurisdiction over their electors, to determine (finally and exclusively of all other courts) the particular rights of those to whom they owe their being.

Your majesty's royal writ commands, that the several electors make choice of persons to represent them in parliament, in order to do and consent to such things as should be ordained there, relating to the state and defence of the kingdom and the church, for which the parliament is called: and they obey the command, in proceeding to chuse members for the parliament then summoned; but neither the writ which requires them to chuse, nor the indenture by which the return is made, import any thing whereby it may be inferred, that the electors put into the power of their representatives, their several rights of elections, to be finally disposed of at their pleasure.

It was an interest vested in them by law before the election, and which the law will preserve to them, to be exercised again in the like manner, when your majesty shall be pleased to call another parliament.

It was not possible for the electors to suspect that such a pretence would ever be set up by their representatives, when, in the course of so many ages, the House of Commons had never taken upon them to try or determine the right of any particular elector, unless incidentally, and only in order to decide a question, of the title of some member of their own House to sit amongst them.

The right of election is a legal interest incident to the freehold, or founded upon custom, or the letters patents of your majesty's royal ancestors, or upon particular acts of parliament, and must be tried and determined like other legal interests: And this consideration does manifestly shew the absurdity of pretending, that such rights can be decided by the House of Commons, where there is neither a power of administering an oath, in order to discover the truth, nor a power of giving damages, which is the only reparation the elector is capable of receiving in such a case. Therefore, if the electors, when they are deprived of their rights, have no place to resort to, but the House of Commons, the right of election would be a right without a remedy, which indeed is no right at all.

And it is put into the power of the officers, who have the return of members to serve in parliament, to reject the votes of as many electors as they please, without being liable to make any reparation in damages to the parties; which is a notion not very likely to preserve the freedom and impartiality of elections.

The third thing alleged against these men in the warrant of commitment is, that by bringing these actions they have broken the privilege of the House of Commons. A breach of the privileges of parliament is certainly a great offence; and, of all others, the House of Lords ought to be the last who should go about to lessen or excuse it, as having a like interest with the Commons in the preservation of the privileges of parliament.

But however it might seem the interest of the Lords to be silent, while the House of Commons are setting a-foot new pretences of privilege, because they may share in the advantage; yet we think it our duty and our interest, to do all we can to preserve the constitution entire, and not to sit quiet when we see innovations attempted, which tend to the diminution of the rights of the crown, or to the prejudice of the subject: Because the best and surest way to preserve the rightful privileges of parliament, is to abide by those that are certain and known; and it is not in the power of either, or both Houses, to create new privileges to themselves.

It never was thought a breach of the privileges of parliament, to prosecute an action against any man, who was not entitled to privilege of parliament; and therefore since the constables of Aylesbury had no privilege of parliament, at the time when those actions were commenced or prosecuted, we cannot imagine, upon what foundation the pursuing these actions can be voted a breach of privilege by the House of Commons.

It seems very necessary it should be known upon what rule this pretence is grounded, that the people of England may be at a certainty, and see some limits set to the claims of privilege. To serve the turn, it hath been said, there are privileged cases, as well as privileged persons; but no instance has been produced, whereby this distinction can be applied to justify these commitments.

Actions at common law have been brought upon false returns and double returns of members to serve in parliament, as in the cases of sir Samuel Barnardiston and Mr. Ouslow, which proceeded to Judgment, and a Writ of Error was brought in one of them, and the plaintiffs could not prevail in either of those suits; and yet it was never pretended, that the commencing or prosecuting those actions was a breach of privilege of parliament; nor were the persons concerned in them imprisoned or censured, though there was a much greater colour for such a pretence in those cases, because the question there directly concerned the right of sitting in parliament; and consequently those would have been indeed privileged cases, if any such distinction had been once thought of in those days: Whereas in the actions brought by these five men, neither the plaintiffs nor defendants were members of parliament, nor did the actions relate in any manner to the right of sitting there.

The opinion of the House of Commons, at that time, was very different from what it is now.

When the Judgment of the King's-bench (where sir Matthew Hale sat then Chief Justice) which passed in favour of sir Samuel Barnardiston, that the action was maintainable, was reserved in the Exchequer-Chamber, the House of Commons was so far from thinking it for their advantage, to have their members deprived of the benefit of the common law, that in the year 1679, a committee was appointed to enquire touching the reversing that Judgment, and by whose procurement and solicitation, and by what ways and means, the same was reversed, and the names of the particular judges that were concerned: And when afterwards that Judgment in the Exchequer-Chamber was affirmed in parliament, the House of Commons never thought themselves secure against the corruptions of the officers, who were to take the poll, and make return at elections, till they had got an act in the 7th and 8th years of the late king, which gave a remedy in Westminster-hall for false and double returns; so little contented were they, in their own cases, with the jurisdiction of the House of Commons, and the remedy to be had there, which now they so fiercely contend their electors should entirely acquiesce in: And we cannot but think it manifest partiality in those gentlemen, to go about, by such violent means, to deprive their electors of recovering of damages, when they are wronged in being deprived of giving votes, since they thought it necessary for themselves to have that advantage, when they are injured in their own elections.

The sufferings of these unfortunate men have not ended here, and the rights of the free-born subjects of England have received a further and no less dangerous wound, in their persons.

These five men having endured a long and chargeable imprisonment, and despairing of their liberty any other way, were advised to sue out Writs of Habeas Corpus, returnable in your majesty's Court of Queen's-bench, hoping to obtain their discharge by the help of that court, where the Judgment ought to be given according to the laws of the land, without regard to any Votes, or Declarations, or commands to the contrary: But this endeavour proved unsuccessful, and they were remanded to Newgate by three of the judges of that court, contrary to the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice Holt.

We shall not presume to offer any opinion to your majesty, upon occasion of this Judgment, at present, because it is not regularly brought before the House; and we only mention it, because the House of Commons took such offence at the bringing these Writs of Habeas Corpus, that, on the 21th of February last they voted, that whoever had abetted, promoted, countenanced, or assisted the prosecution of those writs, were disturbers of the peace of the kingdom, and had endeavoured, as far as in their lay, to overthrow the rights and privileges of the Commons in parliament.

This is a heavy charge; and if it be so criminal a thing for a prisoner to pray a Habeas Corpus, it does not only affect those who are at present concerned, but ought to touch every Commoner of England, in the most sensible manner.

Liberty of person is, of all rights, the most valuable; and of which, above all other things, the law of England is most tender, and has guarded with the greatest care, having provided writs of several kinds, for the relief of men restrained of their liberty, upon any pretence, or by any power whatsoever; that so in every case they may have some place to resort to, where an account may be taken of the reason and manner of the imprisonment, and the subject may find a proper relief according to his case.

No crime whatsoever does put an Englishman into so miserable a condition, that he may not endeavour, in the methods of law, to obtain his liberty; that he may not, by his friends and agents, sue out a Habeas Corpus, and have the assistance of solicitors and counsel, to plead his cause before the court where he is to be brought.

The court is bound by the law to assign him counsel, if there be occasion, and to give Judgment upon his case, as it stands upon the return of the Habeas Corpus, and have the assistance of solicitors and counsel, to plead his cause before the court where he is to be brought.

The court is bound by the law to assign him counsel, if there be occasion, and to give Judgment upon his case, as it stands upon the return of the Habeas Corpus, and to remand, discharge, or bail the prisoner, as the cause of his commitment appears there sufficient or insufficient in law; and if what is alleged as the cause of imprisonment appears to be no crime in law, it is not the authority of those who made the commitment, that can excuse that court for remanding the prisoner.

This is the law of England: But, according to these Resolutions of the House of Commons, if a man has the unhappiness (though through ignorance or mistake) to do an act which shall be voted a breach of privilege, he becomes in a worse condition than any felon or traitor; his confinement makes it impossible for him in person to solicit and procure a Habeas Corpus, and, if any have charity enough to assist him, or to plead for him, in order to shew to the Court the insufficiency of the commitment in matter of law, they become liable to lose their own liberty, and are involved in the same guilt of breach of privilege; So that let the imprisonment be upon the most trifling occasion imaginable, if it be by order of the House of Commons, every Commoner must submit to it without redress, no friends can help them, no other authority can deliver them, till your majesty shall put an end to that session.

The Lords have as just a concern as the House of Commons can have, to maintain the authority, and keep up the awe of parliamentary commitments: And they will always do it, as far as justice and the usage of parliaments will allow.

There have been cases, particularly that of the earl of Shaftsbury, where persons committed by the House of Lords, even members of that House, have sued out writs of Habeas Corpus; and upon the return of those writs, have been brought before the court of King's Bench, and their counsel have been heard on their behalf; and yet no censure ever passed upon them for these endeavours to obtain their liberty, or upon their agents, solicitors, or counsel.

The House of Commons formerly acted with more reserve upon so nice an occasion, as the liberty of the subject; for in the year 1680, when a writ of Habeas Corpus was served upon the serjeant at arms attending the House of Commons, in the behalf of Mr. Sheridan, who stood committed by order of that House; after the House was made acquainted, that such a writ was served upon their officer, and had entered into very long debates upon the matter, they did not think fit to interpose nor pass any censures upon the persons concerned in procuring the writ, or in appearing in behalf of the prisoners; but left the serjeant at arms at liberty to obey the command of the Habeas Corpus; which he did accordingly, by carrying his prisoner before the judge, where the Habeas Corpus was returnable.

The House of Commons have, in former ages, shewn a great and steady concern for the freedom of the persons of their fellow subjects; and upon their petitions many excellent laws have been made, to protect liberty against all unlawful restraints by any authority, even that of the crown: But now it is insisted that their own imprisonments are out of the reach of those laws, and their legality not to be examined.

In the 3rd year of the reign of your royal grandfather, the House of Commons made a noble stand for the English liberties, and shewed, by undeniable evidence, that the causes of the imprisonment must be expressed in all cases, that so it might appear, upon the return of the Habeas Corpus, whether they were sufficient in point of law.

It could not then have been imagined, that the successors of those men would ever have pretended to an arbitrary and unlimited power of depriving their fellow subjects of their liberties, or to vote it to be criminal so much as to enquire into the validity of their commitments.

There is another occasion of offence, which the House of Commons have taken against John Paty and John Oviat, two of these prisoners, who thinking themselves wronged in their being remanded to Newgate, by the opinion of the major-number of the judges of the court of Queen's Bench, humbly petitioned your majesty for a Writ of Error, in order to bring this judgment before your majesty in parliament: and it is certain the subject is never concluded by any judgment, till he comes to the last resort fixed by the law in this case.

The House of Commons being informed of these petitions, came to a Resolution, which they laid before your majesty, that the commitments of that House were not examinable in any other courts whatsoever; that no Writ of Error lay in this case; and that as they had expressed their duty to your majesty in giving dispatch to the supplies, so they had an entire confidence in your majesty, that you would not give leave for the bringing any Writ of Error.

The first position in this vote is very general, and the consequences of it are plain; if the commitments of the House of Commons are examinable in no other place, then no man in England, how insolent soever, is secure of his liberty longer than the House of Commons pleases; and men may be allowed at least to wish that it were not so, though they may have a very high opinion of the justice of that House.

It has been held as an undeniable maxim, that whoever executes an illegal command, to the prejudice of his fellow subjects, must be answerable for it to the party grieved.

Let it be supposed then, that an action of false imprisonment was brought against the serjeant of the House of Commons, and that the defendant justifies his taking the plaintiff into custody, by virtue of a warrant of that House, and it appears upon the face of the warrant, that the cause of the commitment was no crime in law, and the plaintiff demurs, what must the judges do in such a case? Will it be possible for them to avoid examining into the commitment and so give judgment one way or other? Or can it be pretended, that a Writ of Error may not be brought upon such a judgment? And is not the Court, before which the Writ of Error is brought, under a necessity to do justice thereupon, as the law requires?

As to the second thing they have taken upon them to assert, that no Writ of Error lies in the case, we affirm to your majesty with great assurance, that, by our constitution, the House of Commons have no right or pretence to determine whether that be so or not, the right of judgment when a Writ of Error is properly brought, is by law entrusted to that Court to which the Writ of Error is directed; and therefore we shall not at present say any thing to your majesty, in an extrajudicial way, and before the proper time as to that point, whether a Writ of Error brought upon a judgment for remanding prisoners upon a Habeas Corpus can be maintained.

Which way that question will be decided hereafter, when the Writs of Error are returned into the parliament, is not at all material, in respect to the petitions of the prisoners which now lie before your majesty: For, unless your majesty be pleased to grant the Writs of Error according to their prayer, the matter cannot come to the proper decision in parliament, and justice will be manifestly obstructed.

Whether the Writs of Error ought to be granted, and what ought to be done upon the Writs of Error afterwards, are very different things. The only matter under your majesty consideration is, whether, in right and justice the petitioners are not entitled to have the Writs of Error granted.

We are sure, the House of Commons, in the year 1689, were of opinion, that a Writ of Error, even in cases of felony and treason, the right of the subject, and ought to be granted at his desire, and is not an act of grace and favour, which may be denied or granted at pleasure: So that as far as the opinion of the House of Commons ought to have weight in such a question, (whatever the present opinion of the House is) they then thought a Writ of Error was the right of the subject in capital cases (where only it had been at any time doubted of.)

But that it is a Writ of Right in all other cases, has been affirmed in the law-books, verified by the constant practice, and is the opinion of all your present judges, except Mr. baron Price, and Mr. baron Smith.

The law, for the better protection of property and liberty, has formed a subordination of Courts that men may not be finally concluded in the first instance: But this is a very vain institution, if they be left precarious in the method of coming to the superior Court.

All suits are begun, as well as carried on, by the authority of your majesty's Writs, and the subject has a like legal claim to all of them.

The petition for a Writ of Error returnable in parliament, is only a matter for form, as respect to your majesty, (like the petition which the Speaker makes in the name of the Commons, at the beginning of every parliament, for those privileges which they do not believe depend upon the answer to those petition and is no more to be refused than any other Writ throughout the cause.

To affirm the contrary, is to allow an arbitrary latitude to intercept justice, and to mal depend upon private advices, and extra-judicial determinations, whether any causes at all shall be brought to judgment before the high court of parliament.

These things being considered, how extremely surprising is an Address from such a body as the House of Commons, that your majesty would not give leave for such a Writ?

And no less surprising is what they insinuate, as the reason of their confidence in your majesty, that you would hearken to such an Address, that they have given dispatch to the supplies; They proceeded surely in the matter of the supplies, with a nobler aim, for the safety of your majesty's crown and person, and for the delivering the kingdom from the oppression of French power, employed to set an unjust Pretender upon your majesty's throne.

These are good reasons for disposing of the people's money. Their liberties, and all that is valuable to them, depend entirely upon the good success of the war; and they have used, in all ages, to part freely with their money, for the defence of their liberties and properties, and the removing of grievances and oppressions.

But this is the first time a House of Commons have made use of their having given the people's money, as an argument why the prince should deny Writs of Right to the subject, obstruct the course of justice, and deprive them of their birth-rights.

On the 26th of February, the House of Commons proceeded to carry on their resentments to greater extremities, and voted, that the gentlemen who plead as counsel for the five prisoners, upon the returns of the Writs of Habeas Corpus, and the agents and solicitors who assisted them, were guilty of a breach of privilege, and ordered them to be taken into custody, which order has been executed.

This seems to be so great an excess, that it is hard to find words proper for expressing it. When Cromwell committed Mr. Maynard to the Tower, for assisting one Coney as his counsel, upon a Habeas Corpus, a celebrated author expresses the detestation due to such a fact, in these words: 'It was the highest act of tyranny that ever was seen in England: 'It was shutting up the law itself close prisoner, that no man might have relief from, or access to it.'

But as strange and unjustifiable as this appears, we beg leave to take notice of another thing yet more irregular (if it be possible:) While the matter was depending before your majesty, upon the petitions for Writs of Error; after the House of Commons had made an Address to your majesty, that you would not give leave for the bringing of Writs of Error; after your majesty had, by your gracious answer, signified to them, 'That this matter, relating to the course of judicial proceedings, was of the highest importance, and therefore your majesty thought it necessary to weigh and consider, very carefully, what was proper for you to do;' and after they had voted to take this very Answer of your majesty's into consideration: The day following, they ordered the five prisoners to be removed from Newgate, and taken into the custody of the serjeant at arms attending the House of Commons; and this Order was executed at midnight, with such circumstances of severity and terror, as has been seldom exercised towards the greatest offenders.

Your majesty is the only proper judge how highly disrespectful this action is to your royal person and authority. But it concerns us to say, that such a proceeding tends directly to the depriving the petitioners of that justice, which they were endeavouring to obtain by means of the Writs of Error.

While your majesty was deliberating how to put an end to a matter, which they had only made difficult by an unreasonable address, the House of Commons rightly apprehended, that justice would prevail with your majesty over all other considerations, and therefore, as far as possible to disappoint the prisoners, of the fruit they expected from these Writs of Error when granted, they transferred them, in the mean time, to another prison.

This practice of removing prisoners from one custody to another hath been ever complained of, as manifest oppression, and most evidently destructive of the liberty of the subject: It is a mischief provided against in express words, by the act made in the reign of your royal uncle king Charles the second, for the better securing the liberty of the subject; That if any person, being a subject of this realm, shall be committed to any prison, or in custody of any officer whatsoever, for any criminal, or supposed criminal matter, that the person shall not be removed from the said prison or custody, into the custody of any officer (unless it be by a Habeas Corpus, or some other legal Writ:) and this upon the great penalties mentioned in that act. The penalties in the act were new, but the law of England was the same before the making it. The shifting of men from one prison to another, while they are using means in the course of law to recover their liberty, is inexcusable cruelty, and against the plain rules of natural justice; for by such artifices, imprisonments, however unlawful, might be made perpetual, and the subject, as he was at the point of being discharged from one prison, might be, without end, removed to another.

May it please your majesty, your dutiful subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, were so solicitous to avoid any thing, which might give a pretence to interrupt the necessary and early provision for the war, in order to improve the wonderful successes God had given to your arms; that though they were sensible the imprisonment of these men, in the manner, and upon the pretences abovementioned, was a manifest attempt to elude the judicature of parliament, and of pernicious example, to the liberty and property of the subject, yet they forbore to take notice of it, till they were in a manner enforced by Petitions from the prisoners presented the 24th of February last, and by the unjustifiable proceedings of the House of Commons the same day which we have already mentioned to your majesty.

But then the Lords found it absolutely necessary, to enter into a consideration of the whole matter, as it appeared to them, and upon the 27th of February they came to the following Resolutions:

Resolved, "That neither House of parliament have power, by any vote, or declaration, to create to themselves new privileges, not warranted by known law and custom of parliament.

"That every freeman of England who apprehends himself to be injured, has a right to seek redress by action at law, and that the commencing and prosecuting an action at the common law, against any person, who is not entitled to privilege of parliament, is no breach of the privilege of parliament.

"That the House of Commons, in committing to the prison of Newgate, John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, Henry Basse, and Daniel Horne, for commencing and prosecuting actions at the common law, against the late constables of Aylesbury, for not allowing their votes in the election of members to serve in parliament, upon pretence, that their so doing was contrary to a declaration, a contempt of the jurisdiction and a breach of the privilege of that House, have assumed to themselves alone a legislative power, by pretending to attribute the force of a law to their declaration, have claimed a jurisdiction not warranted by the constitution, and have assumed a new privilege, to which they can shew no title by the law and custom of parliament, and have thereby, as far as in them lies, subjected the rights of Englishmen, and the freedom of their persons, to the arbitrary votes of the House of Commons.

"That every Englishman who is imprisoned by any antiorion whatsoever, has an undoubted right, by his agents or friends, to apply for, and obtain a Writ of Habeas Corpus, in order to procure his liberty by due course of law.

"That for the House of Commons to censure or punish any person, for assisting a prisoner to procure a Writ of Habeas Corpus, or by vote or otherwise, to deter men from soliciting, prosecuting, or pleading upon such Writ of Habeas Corpus, in behalf of such prisoner, is an attempt of dangerous consequence, a breach of the many good statutes provided for the liberty of the subject, and of pernicious example, by denying the necessary assistance to the prisoner upon a commitment of the House of Commons, which has ever been allowed upon all commitments, by any authority whatsoever.

"That a Writ of Error is not a Writ of grace, but of right, and ought not to be denied to the subject, when duly applied for, (though at the request of either House of parliament) the denial thereof being an obstruction of justice, contrary to Magna Charta."

These Resolutions were delivered to the Commons at a Conference, the 28th of February; and they took time to consider of them till the 7th of March; upon which day, at their desire, a second Conference was had, and though it was too apparent by what was delivered by the Commons at that Conference (which consisted of injurious invectives against the House of Lords, and tedious recitals of precedents in no sort applicable to the present subject of debate) that their design was either to provoke the Lords to such a degree, as might necessitate them to break off all correspondence, or by engaging them in new matters, to draw things to such a length, as might prevent the bringing these debates to any issue during the session: Yet the Lords immediately desired a Free Conference, which was afterwards had with the Commons.

We are so desirous that your majesty should be made fully acquainted with all the passages relating to this dispute between the two Houses, that we humbly beg leave to annex to this our Representation, what passed at the first and second Conference; and also (as far as we have been capable of recollecting in so short a time) the substance of what was said at the Free Conference, and in our debates, in maintenance of the Resolutions of the House of Lords.

But we take it to be a duty necessarily incumbent on us, to observe to your majesty, the manner in which we have been treated by the House of Commons, at these Conferences; so that from thence your majesty, according to your great wisdom, may judge to what such proceedings do naturally tend. They told us, that the judicature of the House of Lords was unaccountable in its foundation, and inconsistent with the constitution: if they mean it is so ancient, that no account can be given of its foundation, it is true; but there is reason to believe it began with the monarchy, and we are sure it has continued without interruption, unless during that unhappy interval, when a pretended House of Commons destroyed the Church and the Monarchy, as well as the House of Lords: as many ages as the constitution of the English government has lasted, this judicature has consisted with it, and formed a noble and necessary part of it, and therefore these gentlemen will hardly be believed, against so long an experience, that it is inconsistent with the constitution.

They also charged the Lords in direct terms, with usurping the hearing appeals, with making advances upon the constitution, with contriving to bring liberty and property into the bottomless and insatiable gulf of the Lords' judicature, and with direct reproaches, as to the manner in which that judicature has been exercised, and in the most contemptuous way told us, they forbore to mention the instances, because they hoped we would reform.

We desire no other judge but your majesty, how such a treatment of us becomes these gentlemen; and we dare appeal to all your subjects, for witnesses of the irreproachable manner of administering justice in the House of Lords.

We hope the great displeasure the House of Commons has conceived against us may prove of some real service, and of useful cution to your majesty, for it has drawn them directly to own (what was but too visible before) that they are aiming at more power, and a larger share of the administration, than is trusted with them by the nature of our government. They directly complained, that by the constitution, the judicature, in the last resort, was not placed in the same hands with the legislature, though they cannot shew it to be so, in any country where the government is not arbitrary, and the prince's will the law. They have been long endeavouring to break in upon the Lords' share in the legislature, of which we could mention too many instances to your majesty. From an ancient claim, that aids to the crown are to begin in the House of Commons, and that the Lords could not alter the sums, they have of late years pretended (but without any reason, and against the known usage of parliaments) that we could make no alterations in any part of a money-bill, though it have no relation to the money: and, upon that foot, when they have had a mind to get any thing passed into a law, of the reasonableness of which they have despaired to convince the Lords, they have tacked it to a money-bill, in order to put the crown and the Lords under that unhappy necessity, either to agree to a law they might think prejudicial to the public, or to lose the money, which perhaps, at that time, was absolutely necessary to the saving the kingdom.

By this method they assume to themselves the whole legislative authority, taking in effect the negative voice from the crown, and depriving the Lords of the right of deliberating upon what is for the good of the kingdom: For this reason the Lords had, in a very solemn manner, resolved never to suffer such impositions for the future, let the importance of the bill be never so great. This resolution was well known, and yet in this present session (as appears by the printed Votes of the 28th of November last) a great number of the gentlemen of the House of Commons, to the manifest danger of disappointing the supplies of the year, which must have been the ruin of the whole confederacy, and delivering up of Europe into the hands of France, made an attempt to tack to the land tax a bill which had been rejected in two preceding sessions of parliament.

Thus the House of Commons have formerly set on foot several attempts, against that share in the legislature which is placed in the Lords: But this is the first time they have published their desire, to be let into the judicature of parliament.

Whatever they would insinuate upon this occasion, we desire not to meddle with the choice of the Commons' representatives, we willingly leave that matter where it is, and in what manner it is exercised there; how impartially and how steadily, is so well known by experience to all parts of the kingdom, and so universally understood, that the people will be extremely desirous their estates and properties should be subject to such determinations.

It is not strange the Free Conference ended without success, when the Commons came to it with such a temper, as appears by the Votes of the 8th of March, made after they themselves had consented to the Free Conference. If those Votes had been published soon enough, it would have fully convinced the Lords, how vain a thing it was to confer with them further, upon the matters in debate at the former Conferences; for, not content with what they had done before, upon information that their Serjeant had been served with two Writs of Habeas Corpus, returnable before the Lord Keeper (Wright) in behalf of Mr. Montagu and Mr. Denton, two of the gentlemen who had been of counsel with the five prisoners, they came to a Resolution, That no commoner, committed by them for breach of privilege, or contempt of the House, ought to be, by Habeas Corpus, made to appear before any other judicature, and required their Serjeant to make no return, or yield any obedience to those Writs; and that for such refusal he had the protection of the House of Commons.

It has been always held the undoubted prerogative of the crown, to have an account of the reason why any subject is deprived of liberty, and it has ever been allowed, that, by the known common law, it is the right of every subject under restraint, upon demand, to have his Writ of Habeas Corpus, and thereupon to be brought before some proper court, where it may be examined, whether he be detained for a lawful cause: and the statutes made in the reign of your royal grandfather and your royal uncle, have enacted, that, in all cases, Writs of Habeas Corpus be granted and obeyed, by the respective officers, upon great penalties.

But these Votes import a direct repeal of those laws, as to all persons committed by the House of Commons.

It is no longer worth disputing, whether a person committed by them, though for a fact which appears to be both lawful and necessary, may be delivered by any court; for by this new law he shall never be brought thither, and the Serjeant is not only warranted, but commanded openly to condemn your majesty's royal Writs of Habeas Corpus, brought upon the act of 31 Charles 2, which is an invasion of your prerogative, never before heard of in England.

Your majesty does not claim an authority to protect any of your officers for disobeying a known law. The Habeas Corpus act, in time of imminent and visible danger, was in the late reign suspended by acts of parliament for some short time, and yet (so sacred was that law held) that those acts passed with great reluctance, and one of the arguments that prevailed most for agreeing to that temporary suspension was, that it would be an unanswerable evidence to all future times, that this act could never be suspended afterwards, by any less authority than that of the whole legislature. But we live to see a House of Commons take upon them to suspend this law by a Vote.

They ordered, that the Lord Keeper of your great seal should be acquainted with their Resolutions, to the end the writs of Habeas Corpus may be superseded, as contrary to law, and the privileges of their House. They are contrary to no law, but that of these Votes, which surely are none of the laws the Lord-Keeper was sworn to observe: But yet he is to act at his peril. They have ordered this law to be published to him by their clerk.

The Lord Keeper is a Commoner, and if he disobeys, it is a breach of privilege; and if they should carry it so far, as to order him into custody, he may seek, but is not to have relief from any Habeas Corpus.

We humbly beg pardon of your majesty for this long and melancholy Representation, which we could not avoid, without being guilty of treachery to your majesty, and to our native country. The five persons immediately concerned are but poor men; but we well know your majesty's justice and compassion extends itself to the meanest of your subjects.

The matters in dispute are of the highest consequence: Your majesty's prerogative, the reverence due to laws, and the liberties and properties of all the people of England are concerned, and at stake, if these encroachments prevail.

We do not pretend to solicit your majesty to put a stop to these innovations, your own wisdom will suggest the most proper methods: We have endeavoured to do our duty, in laying the whole matter before you.

We humbly beg leave so far to resume what has been said, as to present your majesty a short view of the unhappy condition of such of your subjects, as have right of giving Votes for chusing members to serve in parliament, which has been hitherto thought a great and valuable privilege; but, by the late proceedings of the House of Commons, is likely to be made only a dangerous snare to them, in case they who may be hereafter chosen to serve in parliament, shall think fit to pursue the methods of this present House of Commons.

If they refrain from making use of their right in giving their Votes, they are wanting in their duty to their country, by not doing their parts towards the chusing such representatives as will use their trust for the good of the kingdom, and not for the oppression of their fellow-subjects.

If the officer, who has the right of taking the suffrages, refuse to admit them to give their Votes, they must either sit down by it, and submit to be wrongfully and maliciously deprived of their rights; or if they bring their actions at law, in order to assert their rights, and recover damages for the injury (as all other injured men may do in like cases) they become liable to indefinite imprisonment, by incurring the displeasure of those who are elected.

If, being thus imprisoned, they seek their liberty by Habeas Corpus, (the known remedy of all other subjects) they do not only tie their own chains faster, but bring all their friends and agents, their solicitors and counsel, into the same misfortune with themselves.

If they think themselves to have received injury by the judgment upon the Habeas Corpus, and seek relief by Writ of Error, (the known refuge of those who suffer by any wrong judgment) all that assist them in that matter, are likewise to lose their liberties for it, and they themselves will be removed to new prisons, in order to avoid the justice of the law.

We humbly conclude with acquainting your majesty, that we have been informed by the petition of two of the prisoners, that they have been long delayed, though they have made their applications in due manner for Writs of Error: We are under a necessary obligation, for the sake of justice, and asserting the judicature of parliament, to make this humble address to your majesty, that no importunity of the House of Commons, nor any other consideration whatsoever, may prevail with your majesty to suffer a stop to be put to the known course of justice, but that you will be pleased to give effectual orders for the immediate issuing of the Writs of Error.

The Queen's Answer.] To which her majesty was pleased, the same day, to return the following most gracious Answer:

"My Lords; I should have granted the Writs of Error desired in this Address: But, finding an absolute necessity of putting an immediate end to this session, I am sensible there could have been no further proceeding upon that matter."

Vote of Thanks.] Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the humble thanks of this House be presented to her majesty, for her most gracious Answer, in which she has expressed so great a regard to the judgment of this House, so much compassion to the petitioners, and such tenderness to the rights of the subject.

The Queen's Speech at the end of the Session.] March 14. The queen came to the House of Peers, and after passing several Bills made the following Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I cannot put an end to this session, without doing you the justice to acknowledge you have fully made good the assurances you gave me at the beginning of it, by the great readiness you have shewn in the dispatch of the public business. And I make no doubt, but this dispatch will prove a real advantage to us, and a great discouragement to our enemies.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; I return you my hearty thanks in particular for the great supplies with which you have enabled me to carry on this necessary war. I assure you, they shall be carefully applied to the uses, for which they have been given; and I persuade myself, I shall always have the cheerful assistance of my dutiful and loving subjects, in the prosecuting of the present war, till our enemies are obliged to such a peace, as shall be a lasting advantage and security to us and our allies."

"My lords and gentlemen; we have, by the blessing of God, a fair prospect of this great and desirable end, if we do not disappoint it by our own unreasonable humour and animosity, the fatal effects of which we have so narrowly escaped in this session, that it ought to be a sufficient warning against any dangerous experiments for the future.—I conclude therefore with exhorting you all to peace and union, which are always commendable, but more particularly necessary at this time, when, the whole kingdom being shortly to proceed to new elections, it ought to be the chief care of every elector, especially of such as are in public stations, to carry themselves with the greatest prudence and moderation. Nothing will contribute more to our reputation abroad, and our security at home."

Then the Lord Keeper, by her majesty's command prorogued the parliament to Thursday the 1st of May following.*

Bills not passed.] "Before we take leave of this parliament," says Tindal, "it will be proper to take notice of some things, which were begun, but not finished in it. There was a bill offered for the naturalization of some hundreds of Frenchmen, to which the Commons added a clause, disabling the persons so naturalized from voting in elections of parliament. The true reason of this was, that it was observed that the French in England gave in all elections their votes for those, who were most zealous against France; and yet, with an apparent dissimulation, some of the members gave it as a reason for such a clause, that they must be supposed so partial to the interests of their own country, that it was not fit to give them any share in the government. The Lords looked on this as a new attempt, and the clause added was a plain contradiction to the body of the bill, which gave them all the rights of natural born subjects; while this took from them the chief of them all, the chusing their representatives in parliament. They would not therefore agree to it, and the Commons resolved not to depart from it; so that, without coming to a free conference, the bill fell with the session.

"Another bill was begun by the Lords against the Papists. It was occasioned by several complaints brought from many parts of the kingdom, especially from Cheshire, of the practices and insolence of those of that religion. A bill therefore was ordered to be brought in, with clauses in it which would have made the act passed against them four years before, prove effectual, which, for want of these, had hitherto been of no effect at all. This passed the lords, and was sent to the Commons, who had no mind to pass it, but, to avoid the ill effects of their refusing such a bill, they added a clause to it, containing severe penalties on papists, who should once take the oaths, and come into the communion of the Church of England, if they should be guilty of any occasional conformity with popery afterwards. They imagined, that this of occasional conformity was so odious to the Lords, that every clause, that condemned it, would be rejected by them. But when they came to understand, that the Lords were resolved to agree to the clause, they would not put it to that hazard; and therefore the bill lay on their table till the prorogation.

* "Thus this session," says Tindal, "and with it this parliament, came to an end. It was no small blessing to the queen and to the nation, that they got so well out of such hands. They had discovered on many occasions, and very manifestly, what lay at the bottom with most of them; but they had not skill enough to know how to manage their advantages, and to make use of their numbers. The constant successes, which had attended the queen's reign, put it out of their power to compass that which was aimed at by them, the forcing a peace, and consequently the delivering up to France. Sir Christopher Musgrave, the wisest man of the party, died before the last session; and by their conduct after his death it appeared, that they wanted his direction. He had been at the head of the opposition, that was made in the reign of king William from the beginning to the end; but he gave up many points of great importance in the critical moments, for which there were good grounds to believe, that he had twelve thousand pounds from that king at different times. At his death he appeared to be much richer than by any reasonable computation he could be valued at, which made some cast an imputation upon his memory, as if he had received great sums even from France."

"A general Self-Denying bill was offered by those very men, who, in the first session of parliament, when they hoped for places themselves, had opposed the motion of such a bill with great indignation. Now the scene was a little altered; they saw they were not like to be favourites, and therefore pretended to be patriots. This looked so strangely in them, that it was rejected; but another bill of a more restrained nature passed, disabling some officers, particularly those who were concerned in the prize-office, from serving in parliament. To this a general clause was added, that disabled all, who held any office, that had been created since the year 1684, or any officer that should be created for the future, from sitting in parliament. This bill had a quick and easy passage among the Commons, being brought in on the 16th of January, and sent up to the Lords on the 23d of that month, who did not think fit to agree to so general a clause, but consented to a particular disability put on some officers by name. The Commons did not agree to this alteration, but insisted on the whole; and therefore the bill fell.

"Among the many ways and expedients, by which the Tory-party of the House of Commons endeavoured to secure their interest against a new election, they thought it necessary to procure an act, whereby the commissions of the peace should be lodged in the hands of men of estates; and thereupon a bill was brought in, and passed on the 2d of February, for qualification of justices of the peace; but the same being sent up to the Lords, they did not think fit to give it their concurrence.

The Parliament dissolved.] "April 5. The parliament, according to the triennial act; being now expiring, a proclamation was issued out for dissolving it; and, on the 23d, another was published for calling a new parliament."

The conclusion of the Parliament set the whole nation in a general ferment; both parties studied how to dispose the minds of the people in the new elections, with great industry and zeal.

Promotions in the Church.] "Before the queen went to Cambridge," continues Mr. Tindal, "she resolved at last to fill the see of St. David's which had now been long vacant. Dr. Bull was promoted to it, in the room of Dr. Watson, deprived for his enormities.* Bull * "Watson's affair was debated this last session in the House of Lords, which the queen came to hear in person. His business had been kept long on foot in the courts below, by all the methods of delay that lawyers could invent: after five years pleading, the concluding judgment was given in the Exchequer, that he had no right to the temporalities of that bishoprick: and that, being affirmed in the Exchequer-Chamber it was now by a Writ of Error brought before the Lords in the last Resort: but as the House seemed now to be set, he had no mind to let it go to a final decision; so he delayed the assigning the errors of the judgment, till the days were lapsed, in which, according to a standing order, errors ought to be assigned upon a Writ of Error, in default of which the record was to be sent back. He suffered the time to lapse, though particular notice was ordered to be given him, on the last day, in which, according to the standing order, he might have assigned his errors: and the House sat that day some hours on purpose waiting for it. Some weeks after that, when the session was so near an end, that he thought his cause could not be heard during the session and so must in course have been put off to another session, he petitioned for leave to assign his errors: this was one of the most solemn orders, that related to the judicature of the Lords, and had been the most constantly stood to: it was not therefore thought reasonable to break through it, in favour of so bad a man, of whom they were all ashamed, if parties could have any shame. He had affected, in every step he had made, to seek out all possible delays, for keeping the see still void, which, by reason of a bad bishop, and a long vacancy, was fallen into great disorder: yet, after all this, he had still by law the benefit of a Writ of Error, which he might bring in any subsequent session of parliament. For which reason the queen resolved to fill the see.

had writ the most learned treatise the age had produced, of the doctrine of the primitive church, concerning the Trinity. This treatise had been so well received all Europe over, that in an assembly general of the clergy of France, the bishop of Meaux was desired to write over to a correspondent he had in London, that they had such a sense of the service he had done their common faith, that upon it they sent him their particular thanks: I read the letter, says Burnet, and so I can deliver it for a certain truth, how uncommon soever it may seem to be. The queen had, a little before this, promoted Dr. Beveridge to the see of St. Asaph, who had shewed himself very learned in the ecclesiastical knowledge. They were both pious and devout men, but were now declining; both of them being old, and not like to hold out long. Soon after this, the see of Lincoln became vacant by that bishop's death, and Dr. Wake (late archbishop of Canterbury) was promoted to it. He was a man eminently learned, an excellent writer, a good preacher, and, which is above all, a man of an exemplary life.

Alterations and Promotions in the State.] "It was no small mortification to the high church party that the duke of Buckingham was removed; and the privy seal given to the duke of Newcastle, whose interest was great with the whigs. About the same time, the earl of Peterborough and the lord Cholmondley were sworn of the privy counsel. The lord Cutts was appointed to command the forces in Ireland under the duke of Ormond; but this seeming preferment was, in reality, a kind of disgrace, for his lordship would gladly have changed this command for an equivalent in the service abroad. The earl of Montague was created marquis of Mounthermer, and duke of Montague.

Progress of the Elections.] "The election of the members of the House of Commons was managed with zeal and industry on both sides. The Clergy took great pains to infuse into a people tragical apprehensions of the danger the church was in. The Universities were inflamed with this, and took all possible means to spread it over the nation with much vehemence. The danger of the Church of England grew to be the word as given in an army. Men were known as they answered it. None carried this higher than the Jacobites, though they had made a schism in the church. At last, even the papists, both at home and abroad, seemed to be disturbed with the fears which the danger of our church put them under; and this was supported by the Paris gazette, though of that the party seemed ashamed. Books were writ and dispersed over the nation with great industry, to possess all people with the apprehensions that the church was to be given up, that the bishops were betraying it, and that the court would sell it to the dissenter. Now it was, that the Memorial of the Church of England, penned by some zealous churchmen, was printed and spread abroad, setting forth her melancholy situation and distress.* They also hoped, that this campaign, proving

* "This pamphlet was composed by Dr. Drake the physician, and others, and humbly offered to the consideration of all true lovers of our church and constitution. In it was the following passage: "Those that look no deeper than the surface of things, are apt to conclude, without hesitation, that the church of England is in a very flourishing condition. Its dignities and preferments make a very good shew, and the patronage of the queen seems to promise a continuance of prosperity. But, for all this fine complexion and fair weather, there is an hectic fever lurking in the very bowels of it, which, if not timely cured, will infect all the humours, and at length destroy the very being of it. The nation has a long time abounded with sectaries, who in the preceding century, violently overturned both church and state, though their own extravagance and confusion, through a special providence, contributed more than human wisdom to the re-establishment of them. The sons of those men yet remain, and inherit, many of them, the principles of their fathers. It would therefore be no very uncharitable supposition, without any other argument, to imagine them heirs of their designs likewise; for it is easy to demonstrate, that such principles lead naturally to such designs, and that no man can heartily embrace one, without having favourable thoughts of the other. Nor can we blame them; for, if any man is persuaded (as many of our sectaries avow themselves to be) that the discipline and worship of the church of England are an abomination, his conscience will readily suggest to him, that he ought to do his utmost to purge the land from such abomination; and upon this pretence has the church been once already subverted, though raised again by God in a miraculous manner. In those days a thorough reformation, root and branch, was the cry of all the pulpits, the Shibboleth of the party. If, since the church recovered its ancient lustre and authority, they have been more silent, and in appearance more moderate, it is not that they are better tempered or affected, but that, submitting to the necessity of the times, they have dissembled their intentions better: Yet some overt-attempts here, and the whole course of their proceedings in Scotland during these two last reges, sufficiently shew us what treatment we might expect, if they had the power. But these people, though they may have the will, have not the power alone to endanger the church. The dissenters are not yet considerable enough for their numbers (however they boast of them) wealth, or quality, to bring about any great change in the constitution of church or state. And our church is too strong to be shaken, but through the treachery or supine negligence of its own members; or those, at least, that pretend to be such; and, as such, palm themselves frequently upon their country and church, to the irreparable damage of both.

less prosperous, than had been expected, might put the nation into ill humour, which

The sudden death of the late king disappointed, mortified, and humbled the dissenters and their abettors, the Whigs, so excessively, that they were ready to have thrown a blank to the church, and would have taken a general indemnity, with an exclusion from all public trust and office. They, who not a month before, breathed nothing but defiance, and insulted the church, and treated the princess with the most scandalous indignities and rudest calumnies, were in an instant grown the most dutiful subjects, the most affectionate friends, and the most peaceable, meek, and christian-spirited people in the universe. They preached nothing but charity, peace, and love, forgiveness of injuries, oblivion of wrongs, and the utter abolition and extinction of parties and factions for ever. So very good and gracious can men in fear be! But whence this humility and dejection of mind, this sweetness of temper? Was it natural, or the result of more extraordinary grace, or more christian principles than other men were possessed of? No; but they had just before injured and affronted the princess and church of England in so insolent and outrageous a manner, upon presumption, that durable schemes were upon the anvil in their favour, that their own consciences, upon the vanishing of them, prompted them to seek pardon and peace, from those whom they had so abused, by an extraordinary submission. But when, contrary to these fears, they found the head of the church, and, after her example, the members of it too inclined not only to forgive, but to forget past injuries, and that, instead of punishment, they met not with so much as a rebuke or reproach, but comfortable speeches and kind assurances from the queen herself, and good countenance from some of her prime ministers, their spirits were elated in an instant; the spirit of humility and pacification vanished; their former insolence and presumption returned upon them in full force; and they began to challenge and provoke the church as boldly as ever. Thus far the history of their carriage towards the church is public and recent, as likewise the advances, that have been made in their favour, and the repulses, which the church has met with. Every thing has passed in Scotland to the desire of the presbytery, even to the endangering the church and monarchy of England, and the disherison of its crown, and the immediate prejudice of its sovereignty; but on the contrary, nothing for the security of the church here, which can not only boast itself to be a main branch of the civil constitution, but the prop and support of the whole frame of government; which removed, it must necessarily fall to the ground, as has been once fatally experimented. All attempts to settle it on a perpetual foundation have been opposed and rendered ineffectual by ministers, who owe their present grandeur to its protection; and who with a prevarication as shame-might furnish them with some advantages. In opposition to all this; the court acted with such caution and coldness, that the Whigs had very little strength given them by the ministers in managing the elections. They seemed rather to look on indifferent spectators, but the Whigs exerted themselves with great activity and zeal. The dissenters who had been formerly much divided, were now united intirely in the interests of the government, and joined with the whigs every where.

Sir Nathan Wright dismissed, and Cowper made Lord Keeper.] "When the elections were all over, the court took more heart, for it appeared, that they were sure of a great majority; and the Lord Godolphin declared himself more openly, than he had yet done, in favour of the Whigs. The first instance given of this, was the dismissing of sir Nathan Wright, who had continued so long lord-keeper, that he was fallen under a high degree of contempt with all sides; even the Tories, though he was wholly theirs, despising him. He was sordidly covetous, and did not at all live suitably to that high post. He was become extremely rich though he was not charged with bribery in his court; but there was a rumour with relation to the livings of the ful as their ingratitude, pretend to vote and speak for it themselves, while they solicit and bribe others with pensions and places to be against it."

"This last reflection was visibly levelled against the duke of Marlborough and the lord treasurer Godolphin: and the rest of that libel, containing no less injurious insinuations against the queen herself for removing some of her ministers, the grand jury of London and county of Middlesex, at the sessions held at the Old-Bailey, on the 31st of August, "with the utmost indignation and resentment, presented one book, lately printed by a notorious criminal [David Edwards] (convicted in that court for printing and publishing a seditious and treasonable libel, for which he was fined and pilloried, and was now fled from justice) intitled, The memorial of the church of England, &c. to be a false, scandalous, and traitorous libel, secretly, but industriously spread abroad, to advance and accomplish traitorous and wicked designs, highly impeaching the truth and sincerity of her majesty's royal resolution and pious assurances to support and preserve our government, both in church and state, the rights, liberties, and properties of all her people; and also craftily designed to reproach and scandalize her wise and faithful ministry, divide her councils, create variances, disputes, and discords in her parliament, and to raise and foment animosities, fears, and jealousies amongst all her people." Upon this presentment the court ordered the said libel to be forthwith burnt in the sight of the said court then sitting, and also, on the Tuesday following, before the Royal Exchange; which was done accordingly, on the 1st of September, the sheriffs attending." Tindal.

crown, that were given by the great seal, as if they were set to sale by the officers under him. The great-seal being sent for, the custody of it was given, in council, to William Cowper, with the title of Lord-keeper. He was a gentleman of a good family, of excellent parts, and of an engaging deportment, very eminent in his profession, and had been, for many years considered as the man who spoke the best in the House of Commons. His promotion was very acceptable to the Whigs, who had been much disgusted with the Lord Treasurer for the coldness he expressed, as if he would have maintained a neutrality between the two parties, though the one supported him, while the other designed to ruin him. But this step, in preferring the new Lord-keeper, went a great way towards reconciling the Whigs to him.*

FIRST SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT OF QUEEN ANNE.

* The duchess of Marlborough, in the Account of her Conduct (p. 159.) says, "The next year I prevailed with her majesty to take the great seal from sir Nathan Wright, a man despised by all parties, of no use to the crown, and whose weak and wretched conduct in the court of Chancery, had almost brought his very office into contempt. His removal, however, was a great loss to the church, for which he had ever been a warm stickler. And this loss was the more sensibly felt as his successor, my lord Cowper, was not only of the Whig-party, but of such abilities and integrity, as brought a new credit to it in the nation."

Speaker to this Parliament, JOHN SMITH.

John Smith, esq. chosen Speaker.] The appearance in the House of Commons was greater than had been known at the opening of any parliament for fifty years before; no less than 456 members being present. The first struggle was about the choice of a Speaker, by which a judgment was to be made of the temper and inclination of the members. The court declared for Mr. John Smith, a man of clear parts, and of a good expression, who was then in no employment, but had gone through great posts in the former reign with reputation and honour, having been a Commissioner of the Treasury, and Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had, from his first setting out in the world, been thoroughly in the principles and interests of the Whigs, yet with a due temper in all personal things, with relation to the Tories. But the Tories all declared against him for Mr. Bromley, one of the representatives of the university of Oxford, a man of a grave deportment and good morals, but considered as a violent Tory, and as a great favourer of Jacobites, which appeared evidently in a relation which he printed of his travels. The marquis of Granby, eldest son to the duke of Rutland, who first proposed Mr. Smith, was seconded by Mr. Robert Walpole*, and sir John Holland, the marquis of Hartington, sir William Strickland, sir Charles Turner, and some others spoke by turns on the same side. On the other hand, the earl of Dysert recommended Mr. Bromley, and was supported by sir Thomas Hanmer, sir Edward Seymour, sir William Drake, Mr. Fredrick Herne, Mr. Annesley, and sir Roger Mostyn. No affair of that sort had ever been carried with such heat on both sides as this was: So that it was just to form a judgment upon it of the temper of the House. After a debate of about an hour and half, the House divided, and, two members being appointed to tell the voices, Mr. Smith had 248, and Mr. Bromley 205 only. Mr. Smith being, on the 27th of October, presented to the queen, seated on the throne in the House of Peers, she approved the choice of him.

* "I should be glad to know whether you design to be in town at the opening of the sessions. It is now reported afresh that Mr. Harley will quit the chair, and that the court will set up the Solicitor, but that the other Tories will try for Mr. Bromley; I do not know whether you will think this contest worth your attendance, but sure some good may be struck out of this division. Lord Hartington continues ill of the gout, and Mr. Smith has a defluxion on his eyes, and if Mr. Walpole should be absent, the poor Whigs must lose any advantage that may offer itself, for want of a leader." Spencer Compton (afterwards Sir Spencer Compton, Speaker of the House of Commons, and Earl of Wilmington) to Robert Walpole. Coxe's Walpole, vol. 2, p. 6.

The Queen's Speech on opening the Session.]
After which, her majesty made the following Speech to both Houses;

“My Lords and Gentlemen;

“I have been very desirous to meet you as early as I thought you might be called together without inconvenience to yourselves. And it is with much satisfaction, I observe so full an appearance at the opening of the parliament, because it is a ground for me to conclude, you are all convinced of the necessity of prosecuting the just war, in which we are engaged, and therefore are truly sensible, that it is of the greatest importance to us, to be timely in our preparations.—Nothing can be more evident, than that if the French king continues master of the Spanish monarchy, the balance of the power in Europe is utterly destroyed, and he will be able in a short time to ingross the trade and the wealth of the world.—No good Englishman could at any time be content to sit still, and acquiesce in such a prospect; and at this time we have great grounds to hope, that by the blessing of God upon our arms, and those of our allies, a good foundation is laid for restoring the monarchy of Spain to the House of Austria; the consequences of which which will not only be safe and advantageous, but glorious for England.—I may add, we have learned by our own experience, that no peace with France will last longer, than the first opportunity of their dividing the allies, and of attacking some of them with advantage.—All our allies must needs be so sensible this is the true state of the case, that I make no doubt but measures will soon be so concerted, as that, if we be not wanting to ourselves, we shall see the next campaign begin offensively on all sides against our enemies, in a most vigorous manner.—I must therefore desire you, gentlemen of the House of Commons, to grant me the supplies, which will be requisite for carrying on the next year's service both by sea and land; and, at the same time, to consider, that the giving all possible dispatch, will make the supply itself much more effectual.—The firmness and conduct, which the duke of Savoy has shewn amidst extreme difficulties, is beyond example. I have not been wanting to do all that was possible for me in order to his being supported.—I ought to take notice to you, that the king of Prussia's troops have been very useful to this end. Your approbation of that treaty last session, and the encouragement you gave upon it, leave me no doubt of being able to renew it for another year.—I take this occasion to assure you, that not only whatever shall be granted by parliament for bearing the charge of the war, shall be laid out for that purpose with the greatest faithfulness and management; but that I will continue to add, out of my own revenue, all I can reasonably spare, beyond the necessary expences for the honour of the government.

“My Lords and Gentlemen; By an act of parliament passed the last winter, I was enabled to appoint commissioners for this kingdom, to treat with commissioners to be empowered by authority of parliament in Scotland, concerning a nearer and more complete Union between the two kingdoms, as soon as an act should be made there for that purpose. I think it proper for me to acquaint you, that such an act is passed there; and I intend in a short time, to cause commissions to be made out in order to put the Treaty on foot, which I heartily desire may prove successful, because I am persuaded, that an Union of the two kingdoms will not only prevent many inconveniences, which may otherwise happen, but must conduce to the peace and happiness of both nations; and therefore I hope I shall have your assistance in bringing this great work to a good conclusion.—There is another Union I think myself obliged to recommend to you in the most earnest and affectionate manner; I mean an Union of minds and affections amongst ourselves. It is that, which would, above all things, disappoint and defeat the hopes and designs of our enemies.—I cannot but with grief observe, there are some amongst us, who endeavour to foment animosities; but I persuade myself, they will be found to be very few, when you appear to assist me in discountenancing and defeating such practices.—I mention this with a little more warmth, because there have not been wanting some so very malicious, as even in print to suggest the Church of England, as by law established, to be in danger at this time.—I am willing to hope, not one of my subjects can really entertain a doubt of my affection to the Church, or so much as suspect, that it will not be my chief care to support it, and leave it secure after me; and therefore we may be certain, that they, who go about to insinuate things of this nature, must be mine and the kingdom's enemies, and can only mean to cover designs, which they dare not publicly own, by endeavouring to distract us with unreasonable and groundless distrusts and jealousies.—I must be so plain, as to tell you, the best proofs we can all give at present of our zeal for the preservation of the church, will be to join heartily in prosecuting the war against the enemy, who is certainly engaged to extirpate our religion, as well as to reduce this kingdom to slavery.—I am fully resolved by God's assistance to do my part. I will always affectionately support and countenance the Church of England as by law established. I will inviolably maintain the Toleration. I will do all I can to prevail with my subjects to lay aside their divisions, and will study to make them all safe and easy. I will endeavour to promote religion and virtue amongst them, and to encourage trade, and every thing else, that may make them a flourishing and happy people. And they, who shall concur zealously with me in carrying on these good designs, shall be sure of my kindness and favour.”

The Lords' Address thereon.] November 1.
The Lords attended the queen with the following Address:

“ We your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, beg leave to make our humble and sincere acknowledgments to your majesty, for your most gracious speech to both Houses; which has opened the eyes, and raised the hearts, of all your loyal subjects.—Your majesty is pleased to give us warning of the danger of being so far deluded, as to depend again on the faith of treaties with an enemy, who has never yet had any other regard to them than as they served the purposes of his interest and ambition; and to inform us, that no peace can be lasting, safe, and honourable, till the Spanish monarchy be fixed in the House of Austria, and France reduced to such a degree that the balance of power in Europe be again restored.—We humbly concur with your majesty in these your wise and noble sentiments. And we faithfully promise, that no dangers shall deter us, nor any artifices divert us, from doing all that is in our power, to assist your majesty in carrying on the war, till you shall be enabled to procure such a peace for Europe.—Your majesty is graciously pleased to encourage us with the hopes of a glorious campaign the next year: and we humbly present our thanks to your majesty, for having wisely and providently endeavoured to concert such measures as, by the goodness of God, may be a reasonable foundation, for those hopes: and we assure your majesty, nothing on our part shall be wanting, to make them effectual.—We rest confident, that all your majesty’s allies, excited by your constancy and courage, and fired by the example of a prince whom you have been pleased to mention in so honourable a manner, will make their utmost efforts to carry on the cause of liberty, and bring this just and necessary war to a speedy and happy conclusion.

“ May it please your majesty; What you have already performed, and what you are still pursuing for the good of christendom, discovers a greatness of mind, equal to the most heroic of your predecessors.—But we, who have the happiness to be your subjects, ought in the first place to admire in your majesty that tender and indulgent affection to your people, which you have shewn from the beginning of your reign; that earnest desire to unite them among themselves, and to make them all easy, safe and happy, under your government; that steady zeal for the Church of England as by law established, and that compassion for those who are so unhappy as to dissent from her. All which your majesty having expressed at this time in so gracious and moving a manner, cannot but raise in us the most firm and lively resolutions of promoting every thing you have thought fit to recommend.—We assure your majesty, we will do all we can, to discountenance and defeat the designs and practices of those who foment animosities among your people; and will ever shew the utmost detestation of those ungrateful and wicked men, who labour to dishonour your majesty’s reign, and distract your subjects with unreasonable and groundless jealousies of dangers to the Church of England.

“ We shall be ready to concur in all measures requisite to put a stop to the malice of these incendiaries. In the mean time, we humbly advise and beseech your majesty to require and command your officers and ministers, to whom that part belongs, that they prosecute and punish them with the utmost rigour of law, as the most spiteful and dangerous enemies to the Church and State.—Your majesty’s example is the shining ornament of our Church, which, under the influence of your happy government, increases in honour and esteem, not only at home, but abroad. Your unexampled bounty for the relief of the wanting clergy (which has been justly and universally acknowledged and celebrated) is an undeniable evidence of your concern for the dignity and honour of the church; and your majesty’s care to lay hold of every opportunity of declaring it from the throne makes it impossible for any of your subjects to entertain a real doubt of your zeal for the support of the Church as by law established.

“ We beg leave to offer to your majesty our most sincere assurances that we will not be wanting in our utmost endeavours to reconcile and unite all your subjects, and to extinguish those unhappy animosities which have too much prevailed among us; the effecting whereof seems to be the only happiness wanting to complete the blessings of your reign, which we pray God may long continue; and that you may see the fruit of all your majesty’s gracious admonitions to your subjects, in their hearty and entire union; and the happy effects of all your great designs abroad, in the well established peace and liberty of Europe.”

“ My lords; I return you my hearty thanks for your Address; and I assure you, it is a great satisfaction to me, to find you are so ready to concur in those things which I have recommended to you.”

The Commons’ Address.] Nov. 6. The Commons presented their Address as follows;

“ Most gracious Sovereign; your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of England, in parliament assembled, are met together, with minds fully disposed to assist your majesty in compassing the great and glorious designs, mentioned in your most gracious speech to both Houses of parliament; for which we beg leave to return our most hearty thanks, and at the same time to congratulate the glorious success of your majesty’s arms, and those of your allies.—We are fully convinced, that the balance of power in Europe can never be restored, till the monarchy of Spain is in the possession of the House of Austria, and that no peace with France can be secure and lasting whilst the French king shall be in a condition to break it; and therefore your faithful Commons are fully resolved, effectually to enable your majesty to carry on the war with vigour, to support your allies, and make good such treaties as your majesty shall judge necessary to reduce the exorbitant power of France.—It is no small encouragement to your Commons cheerfully to grant the supplies necessary for those great ends, to find a frugal management and a just and prudent application, of the public money.—We cannot omit upon this occasion, most thankfully to acknowledge your majesty's goodness, in continuing to contribute out of your own revenue to the expences of the war.—We want words to express the deep sense we have of the many blessings we enjoy under your majesty's most happy government: we are thoroughly sensible of your affectionate care to support and countenance the Church of England, as by law established, your resolution to maintain the Toleration, and to encourage the trade, union, and welfare of your people.—This being the happy condition of all your subjects, it is the greatest concern imaginable to us, to find, your majesty has so just reason to resent the ingratitude of some, who endeavour to foment animosities and divisions amongst us; and we cannot without indignation reflect, that there should be any so malicious as to insinuate, that the Church of England, as by law established, is, or ever can be, in danger, for want of your majesty's care and zeal to support and maintain it. Your majesty's exemplary piety, your steady adherence to the Church of England, leave no room to doubt, but that these suggestions proceed from your majesty's and the kingdom's enemies, who to cover their own disaffection to the present establishment and administration, endeavour to distract your subjects with unreasonable and groundless distrusts and jealousies.—Your majesty may be assured, that your Commons will zealously concur in every thing, that may tend to discourage and punish such incendiaries, and to disappoint your enemies both at home and abroad."

The Queen's Answer.] To this her majesty answered:

"Gentlemen; I take very kindly the confidence you express in my care of the public, and your concern for the occasion I have had to complain.—I return you my hearty thanks for the assurances of your support and assistance, which, by God's blessing, I shall always endeavour to improve for the advantage and happiness of my people."

The Commons' Address, concerning the Union and Succession in Scotland.] This done, the Commons* went vigorously on with the necessary Supplies and other matters; and on the

* "The first matter, with which the Commons commonly begin, is to receive Petitions against the members returned, so that gave a further discovery of the inclinations of the majority: the corruption of the nation was grown to such a height, and there was so much foul practice on all hands, that there was, no doubt, great

15th, resolved that an Address should be presented to her majesty, "To return her the thanks of the House, for her great regard of the good and welfare of both her kingdoms of England and Scotland; for her great care and endeavour to settle the Succession of the kingdom of Scotland in the House of Hanover, for preserving the peace and promoting the Union of the two kingdoms; and to assure her that they would, to the utmost of their power, assist her majesty to bring that great work to a happy conclusion, and likewise that she would be graciously pleased to direct, that the whole proceedings of the last Sessions of parliament in Scotland, relating to the Union of the two kingdoms, and the settlement of the Succession of Scotland, in the House of Hanover, might be laid before that House;" and, having ordered an Address to be presented to her accordingly by such members of that House as were of her privy-council, Mr. Secretary Harley acquainted them, That that having been done accordingly, her majesty was pleased to answer "That she took very kindly the sense they expressed of her endeavours to promote the Protestant Succession, and the Treaty of Union with Scotland: and that she had given direction for complying with their Address, and that they should have the state of that matter, as soon as it could conveniently be sent them."

A Supply granted.] Proceeding afterwards upon the Supply, they resolved; "That 357,000*l.* be granted for Guards and Garrisons, including 5,000 Marines for the Fleet. That 886,233*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* be for the maintaining the 40,000 Men. That 177,511*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* be for the additional 10,000 Men. That the proportion with Portugal be 10,210 Men, and 222,379*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* to maintain them. That 5,000 land Forces be maintained in Catalonia, and 96,729*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* be for them. That 414,166*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* be for her majesty's pro-cause of complaint. The first election that was judged, was that of St. Albans, where the Dutchess of Marlborough had a house: she recommended admiral Killigrew to those in the town; which was done all England over, by persons of quality, who had any interest in the Burghers: yet, though much foul practice was proved on the other hand, and there was not the least colour of evidence to fix any ill practice on her, some reflected very indecently upon her: Bromley compared her to Alice Piers, in king Edward the Third's time, and said many other virulent things against her; for indeed she was looked upon, by the whole party, as the person who had reconciled the Whigs to the Queen, from whom she was naturally very averse. Most of the controverted elections were carried in favour of the Whigs: in some few they failed, more by reason of private animosities, than by the strength of the other side. The House of Commons came readily in to vote all the supplies that were asked, and went on to provide proper funds for them." Burnet.

portion to the Allies. That 48,630*l.* be for payment, for bounty-money to the forces that were in Germany, 7,047*l.* to make good the additional Troops of Hanover and Zell, and 5,996*l.* for Levy-Money to recruit the Horses in Flanders."

Debate in the House of Lords, concerning the next Successor.] Nov. 15. The House of Lords having fixed upon this day to consider of the State of the Nation,

Lord Haversham* opened the debate in these words:

"My Lords; It may perhaps be expected since I moved to you the State of the Nation, that I should say somewhat to you upon this occasion; and though I never laboured under more difficulties than I do at present, yet being conscious to myself of a heart full of loyalty and duty to her majesty, and zeal for her service, as is possible for any subject to have; and knowing, that the best way of preserving liberty of speech in parliament, is to make use of it, I will mention three or four general heads to your lordships, and speak to them with a great deal of freedom and plainness.

"The first thing I shall speak to is, the present confederate war in which we are engaged:

* This lord, whom Burnet often mentions cursorily, but without thinking him of consequence enough to draw his character, is little known. Being of a republican family, which recommended him, to the earl of Anglesea, the patron of the Dissenters, he married the daughter of that earl, who recommended him to the good graces of Charles the second. The king made him a baronet, and offered him the treasurership of the chambers, which he declined; his principles being as yet of a more stubborn temper than those of his father-in-law. The young baronet was active against the measures of the court during the Popish reigns, and joined the prince of Orange, by whom he was made a baronet and lord of the admiralty. He offended the Tory House of Commons, who impeached the Whig Lords in 1701; and the Tory administration were eager to remove him. However, being disgusted, as his biographer says, at the promotion of the earl of Pembroke, he took all opportunities of opposing almost every thing that was advanced by the court, and finding no notice taken of him by the court, he went on with his resentment, and was a great obstacle to the Occasional Conformity bill, which at that time was voted for by all who had places of trust. From this time his lordship seems entirely to have abandoned his first principles, and to have given himself up to the high church party, though he continued to go sometimes to meetings. His historian ascribes this change to the violent measures of the Whigs; but after so candid a confession as he had made above of his lordship's disgusts, the reader will be apt to think that the measures of the Whigs were not the sole stumbling-block. Be that as it may, in

And because the best way of judging what we may reasonably expect for the future, is to consider the actions that are passed, give me leave to take a little notice to your Lordships of the operations of the last campaign: I shall not say much of our forcing the French lines, and our beating the French troops afterwards, (though that was a very great and brave action) but because there was such a mixture of victory and misfortune; and that this is such a chequered piece, I purposely forbear taking further notice of it.—But there were two other actions which, I think, take in your whole campaign, the march of our army to the Moselle, and the business of Overisch; in both which, give me leave to say, (not to give it a harder term) I think we were not used as we might have reasonably expected. Our General, with a great deal of conduct, covered prince Lewis of Baden's army; nor can it be doubted, he might easily have joined us if he had pleased, without the least danger from the French; which if he had done, (by the best account I could ever get, and I think I have a very true one) we had been at least 25,000 stronger than the enemy there. But being disappointed of being joined by prince Lewis, and of the assistance we expected from him, that great design proved abortive.

1705 we find lord Haversham opening the debate against the duke of Marlborough; and, in the year 1707, he was one of the lords that attacked the conduct of the admiralty. In 1708, 'My lord Haversham, a great speech-maker and publisher of his speeches,' says the duchess of Marlborough, 'and who was become the mouth of the party for any extraordinary alarm, was sent privately by the Tories to the queen to acquaint her with the discovery they pretended to have made, of a terrible design formed by the Whigs, to bring over one of the House of Hanover, and to force this upon her whether she would or not.' Unluckily this very lord 'had been the man, who had moved for the princess Sophia's coming over as a thing necessary for the preservation of the Protestant religion.' His death took place on the 1st of Nov. 1710.

"Browne Willis, in a MS. which Mr. Cole had seen, called lord Haversham a person of mean extraction, whose father, raising himself by merchandize, enabled the son to purchase a baronetage. Muckley, in his Memoirs, describes him as a short red-faced man, very eloquent, but very passionate and fiery; a Dissenter by principle, and always turbulent. Dunton commends his penetration and deep knowledge in the affairs of Europe, and adds, 'He is a patriot of a public and discerning spirit, and asserts the rights of the Church of England, without persecuting the dissenters: he has about him all the tenderness of good nature, as well as all the softness of friendship: he carries himself with wonderful conduct and loyalty, and has a quick and generous sense of the miseries of mankind.'" See Park's enlarged edition of lord Orford's Noble Authors, vol. 4. p. 33.

“The next was the business of Overisch, where, by the conduct of my lord Duke of Marlborough, we had a fair opportunity of putting an end to the war at once. But the Dutch held our hand, and would not let us give the deciding blow. Thus ended your campaign, though it begun with more promising hopes of success than this next I believe will. You had then to deal with an enemy whose councils were distracted, whose troops were broke, and the courage of his army sunk.—From all this give me leave to conclude, that it is neither men nor money, courage nor conduct, that are the only things to carry on a successful confederate war.—Those who command your army, are men of that bravery, and every common soldier hath so much courage, that no equal number of men in the world, I think, can stand before them; but let our supplies be never so full and speedy, let our management be never so great and frugal, yet if it be our misfortune to have allies that are as slow and backward, as we are zealous and forward; that hold our hands, and suffer us not to take any opportunity that offers; that are coming into the field, when we are going into winter quarters; I cannot see what it is we are reasonably to expect.

“The next thing I shall take the liberty to speak to, is the point of Trade. Every one sees how our Merchants go off daily, and how low the trade of this nation at present is. I know, my lords, there is a word we are very fond of, of which we call the balance of power; but the Dutch, who are very wise people, have a double view, and take as much care of the balance of trade, as they do of the balance of power; and are as fearful of our power at sea, as of the power of France by land. My lords, the best knowledge of things, is by the causes; It is trade begets wealth, as wealth begets power, and it seems very hard for England, that while the Dutch live at peace under the protection of our arms, we, if we will have any part of trade with them, must have it under the protection of their passes: But it will be much harder, if, after their having the advantage of a trading war, we should make a tradeless peace.

“I know, my Lords, the Dutch generally complain they are very poor; but give me leave to say, I cannot see how they have been out of pocket one shilling since this war; for they gain more by remittances from England, than all the money that goes out of their country to Portugal, Savoy, and the German princes.

“There is one thing more, which I take to be of the greatest importance to us all. It is this I had chiefly in my intention; and with which I shall conclude what I have to say.—But before I come to it, give me leave to take notice of one thing to your lordships. My Lords, it is the happiness of England, and that which ever did, and ever will keep the greatest ministers in awe; that by the law and custom of parliament, the meanest member of either House has undoubted right to debate on any subject, and to speak his thoughts with all question by any person whatever, till the parliament itself hath taken notice of them. This is grounded on the greatest equity and reason, because that which concerns all, should be debated by all: Nor is it possible for a parliament to debate, or come to a clear resolution on any question, or to give advice to her majesty, as they ought, without this freedom. I give good authority to justify what I say; Sir Robert Atkins (fol. 54.) in his treatise of the power and privilege of parliaments, tells us of the case of one Sir Thomas Haxey, in the time of king Richard 2, who having delivered a petition to the king, with which he was displeas'd, the king sent to the Speaker to know who it was that delivered that petition; by which, says Sir Robert, it is apparent, the king cannot take notice of any thing done in parliament, (he names the House of Commons) but as it is represented to him by the House itself.

“Having said this, give me leave to read to your Lordships a paragraph of her majesty's speech to her last parliament last year. ‘My Lords and Gentlemen, we have, by the blessing of God, a fair prospect of this great and desirable end; if we do not disappoint it, by our own unreasonable humour and animosity, the fatal effects of which, we have so narrowly escaped in this session, that it ought to be a sufficient warning against any dangerous experiments for the future.’—I shall not go about to shew the grammatical construction of these words, but chuse rather to say, that as we enjoy many blessings under her majesty's happy government, so I hope we shall have this too, that her majesty will never give ear to any secret and private information; but as it comes to her in a parliamentary way, by the Houses themselves.

“The last thing, my Lords, is that which I take to be of the greatest concernment to us all, both queen and people. I love to speak very plain, and shall do so in this point.—My Lords, I think there can be nothing more for the safety of the queen, for the preservation of our constitution, for the security of the church, and for the advantage of us all; than if the presumptive heir to the crown, according to the Act of Settlement, in the protestant line, should be here amongst us. It is very plain, that nothing can be more for the security of any throne, than to have a number of successors round about it, whose interest is always to defend the possessor from any danger, and prevent any attempt against him, and revenge any injury done him. Is there any man, my Lords, who doubts, that if the duke of Gloucester had been now alive, her majesty had not been more secure than she is? We cannot think of that misfortune without the greatest grief; but yet we are not to neglect our own safety: and though a successor be not the child of the prince, yet is he the child of the queen and the people.—Besides, my lords, the beats and differences which are amongst us make it very necessary that we should have the presumptive heir residing here, the duty and respect we pay her majesty, and the authority of the law, can hardly keep us in peace and union amongst ourselves at present; what then may we not fear when these bonds shall ever happen to be broken?—And would it not be a great advantage to the church, for the presumptive heir to be personally acquainted with the right reverend the prelates? Nay, would it not be an advantage to all England; that whenever the successor comes over, he should not bring a flood of foreigners along with him to eat up and devour the good of the land?—I will say no more to your lordships, but conclude with this motion; 'That an humble Address be presented to her majesty by this House, that her majesty will be graciously pleased to invite the presumptive heir to the crown of England, according to the acts of parliament made for settling the succession of the crown, in the protestant line, into this kingdom, to reside here.'"<sup>9</sup>

"The Lord HAVERSHAM's Vindication of his Speech in Parliament, Nov. 15, 1705.

"The insults and scandalous reflections that have been made upon me in several late Reviews, though they are beyond all precedent, yet should have been without any notice, had the author of those papers been the only person concerned in them; but being convinced upon enquiry from whence he has both his encouragement and instructions, and being unwilling to be thought guilty by default, or that silence on my part should go for confession, or railing on his part go for reason, I choose rather to appeal from the malicious insinuations, and false suggestions of those papers, to the candid and impartial judgment of every unbiased reader, than take those advantages which his rashness and impudence, perhaps, have given me.

"I would not have it thought I am entering the lists with such a mean and mercenary prostitute as the author of the Review: I know better the regard due to the peerage of England (though some have forgot it) than to lessen either that or myself to such a degree. But when a person, my equal, excepting a few accidental ornaments and advantages which I do not pretend to, who never yet would give me any answer elsewhere, though more than once provoked to it, has betaken himself to such unusual and unbecoming methods; it is but justice to myself to let him see, that as I covet no man's favour, so I do not fear any man's power so much as to desert my own just defence in a compliment.

"I begin with the reflections made upon my person; and here it looks very unaccountable, how one that has pretended to so great moderation, as the author of the Review, should be carried so much above his avowed principle in a matter he is so very little concerned in. It must certainly be the force of some irresistible

This motion was backed by several lords, but opposed by a great majority; so that temptation, or the occult quality, and malign influence of some ruling star, that warmed and transported this State-Mountebank, when he wrote those papers, to such a degree above his pretended moderation-temper, as to characterize a person he had not the least knowledge of, with as black marks of infamy as he could invent, or durst venture upon: As if for speaking my mind with the duty of a subject, and the freedom of an Englishman, I became every thing that was not scandalum magnatum.

"What a monster has one speech made me! He says, 'It is calculated and screwed up to a pitch of malecontent and chagrin; as if done on purpose to sour the nation, and printed with an unpeaceable and mischievous meaning: to be designed to keep alive a malecontent party; by a mouth bent to noise and reflection; by a person malign to the settlement, in hopes to raise grounds of clamour; and as one, who has a great many ill ends; that it was spoke with freedom that consists not any where with duty, allegiance, truth, sense or respect; with expectation to force a fortune by railing at his betters, reviling the ruler of the people, and accusing the innocent, to please and court a party; spoken like Solomon's fool, with his eyes in the ends of the earth; proposing what is ridiculous and incongruous; calculated to revive the heats and dying quarrels in the nation, and encourage the follies that madmen make use of to ruin the country in such cases; by a person, whose fancied reputation, to them that did not know he had — it, might serve to push on the specious sham to an extremity, and to bias honest ignorant people in his favour, &c.'

"What a number of unaccountables (as he calls them) are here! Whence could he furnish himself with such an expence of scandal, or rake together such a load of infamy? But no men charge so furiously as those that are in compact, and think themselves shot-free by having their charm and protection about them. Being then thus unjustly attacked, not so much by this hackney tool, whom I despise, as by a M—— in masquerade, I am compelled to say those things for myself, which, without such provocation, would look vain and boasting.

"This scandalous author, or whoever bid him say so, when he tells the world that I have — my reputation, would have done well to have proved it by instance. I have had the honour to have been employed in some public stations, and entrusted by some of the chief of his party, at a time when they thought themselves in no small danger, and when there was not so good an understanding between us; I appeal to the head of them, whether, at his earnest desire, I did not act the gentleman-part, and serve him faithfully; And though afterwards I had the misfortune to fall under the displeasure of a House of Commons, it is as well known as they are, it was for interposing between them and danger, for too vigorously espousing their cause: And could never have imagined the same way or proceeding in falling upon some, and leaving others, who were equally concerned in the same facts, which I always did, and ever shall think very partial, should be looked upon as unjust, when it was some men's own case, and quite otherwise when it was the case of the E—— of N—— in the business of the Sc—— P——t. It was my differing from some men in this affair, that I believe was my original sin, which is never to be forgiven, because it will never be repented of. But what, though I am so unfortunate as to differ in some things from those, who, in my opinion, sometimes differ from themselves: I might, notwithstanding, both in justice and gratitude, have expected better usage, than to be marked and singled out like a blown deer, to be run down the shortest way by such a foul-mouthed mungrel? If I have not deserved such a return, (as by their own acknowledgements I can shew I have not) those that serve the better hereafter, may expect, if possible, to be used worse.

“The maxim is as known as ancient, It is the office shews the man: Let any instance then of any one single act of partiality, oppression, corruption or injustice, during my being in any public station, be charged upon me: I appeal to the sea-officers, and every common seaman that knew me, whilst I was in the admiralty. I made no after-advantage by serving any body in the commission of accounts; nor was I trusted with any secrets, though I could not sit there without making remarks as well as others; Nor did I ever contrive any clauses for the advantages of the public service whilst out of the ministry, which I forgot when I once got in.

“Had I ever been suspected for holding intelligence with St. Germain, or the French king; had my name been ever used in any French or Scotch Plots, or mentioned in the confession of any dying man; had I, being an Englishman, advised the queen to pass the Act of Security in Scotland, or the removing or laying aside any of the great Scotch Lords whilst they were promoting and endeavouring to bring the succession to bear the two last sessions of the Scotch parliament; or had I, before that, upon the presumptive confidence of my own better judgment, without communicating the matter to any other person, singly advised the passing the Act of Peace and War in Scotland, and endeavoured to shelter myself from that imputation, by persuading the world that others, who knew nothing of it, were as much concerned in that advice as myself; These might have been some tolerable grounds to have justified the pamphleteer's reflections. But to speak inconsistently with duty, allegiance, truth, sense or respect, before such a presence, and not be in Tower; and if I did not, that the pamphlet should not be somewhere else, may sent for over to England, or not? The previous question was put, Whether that question should seem as strange as the railing at my betters, and reviling my ruler would be to force a fortune, by courting a party, who at present are so far from having it in their power to oblige any body by their interest, that it is looked upon by some as a crime to have the honour of so much as the least acquaintance with them. But this author, who writes for bread, and lives by defamation, thinks those, I perceive, who are known to be under no inducement of necessity, govern themselves by his base and mercenary principles.

“It is very wonderful, after all, that a proposal for inviting over the presumptive heir to the crown should expose a man to all this virulent fury: That a person only for mentioning it should be called by the names of Mr. Politicus, Speaking Trumpet, Grating Saw, &c. Whoever have read Great Britain's Union, and the Security of the Hanover Succession considered, will find that matter was thought on many months before the paper called Mercurius Politicus ever appeared. And though the Reviewer is very free in calling this a ridiculous proposal, incongruous and inconsistent with the general good; yet, perhaps, this very person would not have been so very confident, had he seen (as I have) the extract of the princess Sophia's answer, dated November 3, 1705, to the archbishop of Canterbury's letters; in which are these words, viz. “I am ready and willing to comply with whatever can be desired of me by my friends, in case that the parliament think that it is for the good of the kingdom to invite me into England.” Some men reading this, I doubt not, will think again. If we only consider what that proposal has produced, it might deserve (one would think) better language. We had several acts of parliament relating to the security of the succession looked into since, and their defects cured; by which it appears, that the succession was not so safe as was in general imagined: A bill for naturalizing the princess Sophia, and her issue, and another to establish a Regency (in case of the queen's demise) sent down to the House of Commons, which those that framed and consented to, thought, no doubt, a security to the succession: And yet there was not the least appearance of the succession's being so much as thought of in parliament, when this proposal was made: So that not to enter into the consideration, how far these expedients will be a security, if they prove, as they are thought, great ones; he that gave the occasion and rise to them, sure, only for that, cannot deserve to be thus treated.

“But I fear there are other reasons that have raised some persons spleen: Some perhaps are angry to have heard it said where it was, That there was so great a favourite as the duke of Buckingham in king James 1, his time, who (as the Spanish Ambassador told his majesty) had besieged him, had enclosed him with his own vassals and servants, and would suffer no one else be put? And was carried in the negative :

to have his majesty's ear, or so much as come near his presence, and yet that great man never had half that power and favour, that we see some persons now possessed of.

"They care not to hear of taxes laid upon all court preferments, or of persons being so fat with favour, and great offices, as make them insensible of the pressing necessity a great part of the nation labours under.

"Others do not like it should be said that whenever there is a dispute between a parliament and a minister, either the minister will be too hard for the parliament: and there is an end of your constitution; or the parliament will be too hard for your minister, and there is an end of your minister.

"But for the author of the Review, it is impossible he should ever be hearty for inviting the princess of Hanover hither; even upon the very foot he puts it: For if the presumptive heir ought not to be invited hither (as he says) till the press is restrained by law, that virulent lampoons, memorials, and the like, may not swarm every day in the streets; one in his circumstances would soon be reduced to a starving condition.

"I should have said no more on this last head; having formerly more than once given the world an account, not only of the security to the constitution, but of the advantages the nation would have by the presumptive heir to the crown residing here: Were it not for some extravagant and dangerous expressions of this pamphleteer, (which one would wonder should not have been taken notice of before now in nother manner.) He says, he cannot foresee the security of the queen from the heirs being at her elbow: And for fear these dark terms should not be truly understood, but lie hid (as he calls it) like the poison of asps under the tongue; in another place (Rev. Numb. 115, p. 460.) he spits the venom out, and tells the world plainly,—— Such is the corruption of man-

'kind, and the general depravation has spread to such a height; Nature has received such a universal taint, that jealousies have spread into the nearest relations; Fathers have been jealous of their own children; and we have some instances even of men murdering their own flesh and blood on these accounts, besides what we find among the Turks.—— And if I should instance very near home, I have such authority on my side, as few people question.'

"This is such a groundless two-edged scandal, and published at such a conjuncture, that no man, I think, can read without abhorrence.

"The next thing I am charged with, is, a heightening the miscarriages of the war, rendering our allies suspected, and leading the Dutch and Imperialists, as if they had betrayed and abandoned us.

"But the very stating matter of fact is enough to wipe off this scandal. There were two great attempts designed (besides the passing the

however, some lords, who were for inviting the French lines) this last Campaign worthy the conduct of our general, viz. That on the Mozelle, and that at Overisch. Had either of which succeeded, it had soon put an end to this chargeable war; and that they did not succeed is known to every body: I would then ask any man, to whom are these two disappointments to be imputed? The answer to this question, I doubt not, would clear me from all the malicious insinuations of this insolent scribbler. Is it possible for any man to imagine the duke of Marlborough would have marched the grand army some hundred miles, upon a design he knew he was not strong enough to put in execution, without the assistance of prince Lewis of Baden's army, which he must have depended upon? Can any man think that matter was not first concerted? And if so, whence was it, that when the duke of Marlborough had covered that prince from the French, he was not joined by him as was expected; By which conjunction Saar Louis, which the French left uncovered, had fallen into our hands, and a free and easy passage opened into France; and for want of which, a very promising design was totally defeated: (And as the Reviewer confesses) our affairs had a bad aspect at the unhappy baulk at the Mozelle.

"Again, in the business of Overisch, did not the Dutch deputies march near three days in company with the duke of Marlborough, and in all that time did they ever make any exception against the design. Yet, when it came to be put in execution, when a fair opportunity offered, and victory in a manner courted us, there not being half the danger and difficulty there, as at Bleinheim, could any arguments persuade them to consent to venture a battle? Have not the letters of the duke of Marlborough and Monsieur A—k—que been made public; and was there not a book called The Dutch Politics examined, &c. printed before the parliament met, that carries this matter much higher than ever I did, which I never yet heard was answered? And must I only not be allowed to speak of such things without lying under the lash of a scandalous pen, and looked upon as an enemy to the confederates? But the most wonderful part of all this, is, that those persons, who before were so full of those matters, that they could scarce forbear shewing resentment of the usage the duke of Marlborough met with, have, ever since this was mentioned by me, made it their business to give it quite a different turn. However, let this snarler, or those who employ him, be as angry as they please; when I read the joint Address of both Houses of parliament (which he might have been more ingenious than to have mangled as he has done) and read how earnestly they intreat her majesty, by all proper means to excite the whole confederacy to make early and effectual preparations, and to exert their utmost vigour in the prosecution of the war against France; I must be of opinion, that they had very good princess Sophia to come over, entered their grounds for what they did, which sufficiently justifies me.

“ There is one thing more, which is so very ridiculous, it is scarce worth notice, viz. how this learned critic labours, and is put to it, to bring the business of Barcelona within the construction of what I said. It is so common a rule, that words are to be understood according to their subject matter, there is scarce a school boy who does not know it; And from the beginning to the end of that speech, there is not the least intimation or glance of any thing done in Spain. But it is all one to him whether that be so or not, he never considers the grammatical constructions of words; but, right or wrong, the world is to be told, that I throw black scandals upon, and contradict my lord P—h, the king of Spain's letter, the queen's speech, &c. and prevaricate the fact, that the paper is a libel, and deserves to be burnt by the hangman.

“ Thus he has drest up a man of straw of his own, and then lays about him most unmercifully; he might as well as have brought in the Czar of Muscovy, and the king of Sweden's wars within the compass of these words, Thus ended the campaign, as our operations in Catalonia. I could not look towards Barcelona and forget Portugal, from whence I have seen a letter giving an account ‘ how Monsieur Fagel, ‘ at the head of 20,000 men, very quietly let ‘ the Mareschal de Thesse, with 8,000 men, ‘ (which he might have easily cut in pieces) ‘ march within pistol shot of him, and relieve ‘ Badajoz; and how kindly he was received ‘ at home upon his return is well known.’

“ I shall say no more, at present, but leave it to the judgment of any indifferent and impartial reader, how far, by that speech, I have pushed on any specious sham to bias the ignorant and honest people in my favour, or how far I have been treated, as any man might expect.

“ In short, though no man rejoices more in our successes every where than myself, yet I cannot but remember, that it often happens in war, as in races, where ‘ sometimes those that ‘ win a heat, may lose the plate,’ which I heartily wish may never be our case.

“ And as for those who set this person at work, however they have made a shift, thinking to keep up their reputation with some, which they have lost with others; yet they are so well known by both, as not to be long trusted by either, and whenever it shall happen they have nothing but their own merit and interest to support them, I doubt not but they will find their own reputation as low in the world, as they endeavour to make that of others: And, in the mean time, their present fears, unsteadiness, and mistrust of every body, make them not only very uneasy to themselves, but the very contempt and property of those they depend on.

“ There are two other points, which the limits of this paper will but just give me leave

Protest;* and though the greatest part of the House of Peers were against this invitation, yet they so far concurred with the tendency of this speech, that they carried it without dividing on the 19th of the same month, the queen again present, That a bill should be brought in, for the better security of her majesty's person and government, and of the Succession of the crown of England, in the protestant line, &c. and at the same time, ordered another bill to be brought in for naturalizing such of the illustrious House of Hanover, as were protestants.†

to mention, viz. Liberty of speech in parliament, and the present state of affairs in Holland, with relation to the trade, and the expense of the present war: As to the first of these, I should think myself felo-de-se, should I go to dispute it: And, for the second, it were very easy for me to shew the advantages the Dutch have over us at this time in the point of commerce. And whenever a just account is given of what remittances, bullion, and money in specie, have been sent to Holland since this war, (which I would be very glad to see) that matter, I am confident, will appear as evident as that the species of our coin lessens daily, whilst that of the Dutch increases. But it would be very well for England, if no just occasions were given to take further notice of this matter.”

“ Dissentient; Because, we humbly conceive the having a presumptive heir to the crown residing within the kingdom, would be a great strengthening to her majesty's hands in the administration of the government, a security of her royal person, and the succession to the crown as by law established, in the protestant line. (Signed.) Winchelsea, Jersey, Buckingham, Nottingham, Angleson, Haversham, Rochester, Abingdon, Howard, Conway, Leigh.”

† Bishop Burnet's Account of this Debate is as follows:

“ The most important debates that were in this session, began in the House of Lords; the queen being present at them all. The lord Haversham opened the motions of the Tories: he arraigned the duke of Marlborough's conduct, both on the Moselle and in Brabant, and reflected severely on the Dutch, which he carried so far as to say, that the war cost them nothing; and after he had wandered long in a rambling discourse he came at last to the point which was laid, to be the debate of the day: He said we had declared a Successor to the crown, who was at a great distance from us: while the Pretender was much nearer; and Scotland was armed and ready to receive him; and seemed resolved not to have the same Successor, for whom England had declared: these were threatening dangers that hung over us, and might be near us. He concluded, that he did not see how they could be prevented, and the nation made safe, by any other way, but by inviting the next successor to come and live among us. The duke of Buckingham, the earls of Rochester, Nottingham, and Anglesey carried on the debate, with great earnestness: it was urged, that they had sworn to maintain the succession, and by that they were bound to insist on this motion, since there was no means so sure to maintain it, as to have the Successor upon the place, ready to assume and maintain his right: it appeared, through our whole history, that whosoever came first into England, had always carried it: the pretending successor might be in England within three days, whereas it might be three weeks before the declared Successor could come: from thence it was inferred, that the danger was apparent and dreadful, if the Successor should not be brought over: if king Charles had been in Spain, when the late king died, probably that would have prevented all this war, in which we were now engaged. With these Lords, by a strange reverse, all the Tories joined; and by another, and as strange a reverse, all the Whigs joined in opposing it. They thought this matter was to be left wholly to the queen; that it was neither proper nor safe either for the crown, or for the nation, that the heir should not be in an entire dependence on the queen; a rivalry between two courts might throw us into great distractions, and be attended with very ill consequences: the next Successor had expressed a full satisfaction, and rested on the assurances the queen had given her, of her firm adherence to her title, and to the maintaining of it: the nation was prepared for it, by the orders the queen had given to name her in the daily prayers of the Church: great encouragements had been used, to bring the Scotch nation to declare the same Successor. It was true, we still wanted one great security, we had not yet made any provision, for carrying on the government, for maintaining the public quiet, for proclaiming and sending for the Successor; and for keeping things in order, till the Successor should come: it seemed therefore necessary, to make an effectual provision against the disorders, that might happen in such an interval. This was proposed first by myself, and it was seconded by the lord Godolphin, and all the Whigs went into it; and so the question was put upon the other motion, as first made, by a previous division, whether that should be put or not, and was carried in the negative by about three to one. The queen heard the debate, and seemed amazed at the behaviour of some, who, when they had credit with her, and apprehended that in a motion might be made by the Whigs, had possessed her with deep prejudices against it: for they made her apprehend, that when the next Successor should be brought over, she herself would be so eclipsed by it, that she would be much in the Successor's power, and reign only at her or his courtesy: yet these

'Bill for the better security of her majesty's person and government and of the succession to the crown of England,' was brought in. very persons, having now lost their interest in her, and their posts, were driving on that very motion, which they had made her apprehend was the most fatal thing that could befall. This the dutchess of Marlborough told me, but she named no person: and upon it a very black suspicion was taken up, by some, that the proposers of this matter knew, or at least believed, that the queen would not agree to the motion, which way soever it might be brought to her; whether in an Address, or in a Bill; and then they might reckon, that this would give such a jealousy, and create such a misunderstanding between her and the parliament, or rather the whole nation, as would unsettle her whole government, and put all things in disorder. But this was only a suspicion, and more cannot be made of it."

The dutchess of Marlborough, in the Account of her own Conduct (p. 160) clears up this matter; she says, "The earls of Rochester and Nottingham, and the other grave men of the party, had not the least hope or the least desire to carry their point; but being well assured, that the queen would never consent to such an invitation, nor pardon her ministers, if they encouraged the design; this was a notable stratagem to ruin them, either with her majesty, or with the nation; for if in compliance with her prejudices they opposed this motion, it was to be hoped it would draw the public odium upon them as declared enemies to the protestant succession. This hopeful scheme, however, did not succeed. The Whigs opposed the invitation, and yet preserved their credit, to the great mortification of the other party. I know that my lord Godolphin, and other great men, were much reflected upon by some well disposed persons, for not laying hold of this opportunity which the Tories put in their hands of more effectually securing the succession of the crown in the house of Hanover. But those of the Whigs whose anger against the minister was raised on this account, little knew how impracticable the project of invitation was, and that the attempt would have only served to make the queen discard her ministry, to the ruin of the common cause of these kingdoms, and of all Europe. I had often tried her majesty upon this subject, and when I found, that she would not hear of the immediate successor's coming over, had pressed her that she would at least invite hither the young prince of Hanover, who was not to be her immediate successor, and that she would let him live here as her son: but her majesty would listen to no proposal of this kind in any shape whatsoever. It was upon this occasion, that the queen gave the first indications of any thing like a real reconciliation to the Whigs. She had been present at the debate in the House of Lords upon the subject of the invitation, and had heard the duke of Buckingham treat her with great dis-

On the 19th of November, the lord Wharton opened the debate in a manner, that charmed the whole House. He had not been present at the former debate, but he said, he was much delighted with what he had heard concerning it. He observed, that he had ever looked on the securing a protestant succession to the crown as that, which secured all our happiness. He had heard the queen recommend from the throne union and agreement to all her subjects, with a great emotion in his own mind. It was now evident, there was a divinity about her, when she spoke: the cause was certainly supernatural, for we saw the miracle, that was wrought by it: now all were for the protestant succession. It had not been always so. He rejoiced in their conversion, and confessed it was a miracle. He would not, he could not, he ought not to suspect the sincerity of those, who moved for inviting the next successor; yet he could not hinder himself from remembering what had passed in the course of many years, and how men had argued, voted and protested all that while. This confirmed his opinion, that a miracle was now wrought; and that might oblige some to shew their change by an excess of zeal, which he could not but commend, though he did not fully agree to it. After this preamble, he opened the proposition for the Regency in all the branches of it: that regents should be impowered to act in the name of the successor, till he should send over orders: that besides those, whom the parliament should name, the next successor should send over a nomination sealed up, and to be opened, when that accident should happen, of persons who should act in the same capacity with those, who should be named by parliament.

The notion, being thus digested, was agreed to by all the Whigs, and a bill was ordered to be brought in, pursuant to these propositions. But, upon the debate on the heads of the bill, it appeared, that the conversion, which the lord Wharton had so pleasantly magnified, was not respect; urging as an argument for inviting over the princess Sophia, that the queen might live till she did not know what she did, and be like a child in the hands of others, and a great deal to that effect. Such rude treatment from the Tories, and the zeal and success of the Whigs in opposing a motion so extremely disagreeable to her, occasioned her to write to me in the following terms: 'I believe dear Mrs. Freeman and I shall not disagree, as we have formerly done, for I am sensible of the services those people have done me, that you have a good opinion of, and will countenance them, and am thoroughly convinced of the malice and insolence of them, that you have always been speaking against.' And at this time it was, that the queen authorized the lord Godolphin to give the utmost assurances to the chief men of the Whigs that she would put herself, and her affairs, into such hands as they should approve, and would do every thing possible for the security of the protestant religion."

so entire as he seemed to suppose. For when a security, that was real and visible, was thus offered, those, who made the other motion, flew off from it. They pretended, that it was, because they could not depart from their first motion: But they were told, that the immediate successor might indeed, during her life, continue in England, yet it was not to be supposed, that her son, the elector, could be always absent from his own dominions, and throw off all care of them, and of the concerns of the empire, in which he bore so great a share. If he should go over for ever so short a time, the accident might happen, in which it was certainly necessary to provide such an expedient as was now offered. This exposed them to much censure; but men engaged in parties are not easily put out of countenance. It was resolved, that the regents should be seven, and no more; and they were fixed by the posts they were in. The archbishop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, lord-keeper, lord-treasurer, lord-president, lord-privy-seal, lord-high-admiral, and the lord-chief-justice of the Queen's-bench for the time being, were named for that high trust. The Tories struggled hard, that the lord-treasurer should not be one, only to shew their spleen against the lord Godolphin; but their motion was rejected with scorn; for it seemed ridiculous in a time, when there might be much occasion for money, to exclude an officer from that high trust, who alone could furnish them with it, or direct them how to be furnished. The Tories moved likewise, that the lord-mayor of London should be one; but that was also rejected; for the design of the act was, that the government should be carried on by those, who should be at that time in the conduct and secret of affairs, and were persons nominated by the queen; whereas the lord-mayor was chosen by the city, and had no practice in business. These regents were required to proclaim the next successor, and to give orders for the like proclamation over England and Ireland. The next successor might send a triplicate of the persons named by her or him; one of these was to be deposited with the archbishop of Canterbury, another with the lord-keeper, and a third with his own minister residing at this court; upon the producing whereof, the persons nominated were to join with the regents, and to act in equality with them. The last parliament, even though dissolved, was to be immediately brought together, and impowered to continue sitting for six months; and thus things were to be kept in order, till the successor should either come in person, or send over his orders.

The Tories made some opposition to every branch of the act; but, in that of the parliament's sitting, the opposition was more remarkable. The earl of Rochester moved, That the parliament and the regents should be limited to pass no act of repeal of any part of the act of Uniformity; and in his positive way said, that if this was not agreed to, he should still think the church was in danger, notwithstanding what they had heard from the throne in the beginning of the session. It was objected to this, that, if the regal power was in the regents, and if the parliament was likewise a legal one, then by the constitution the whole legislature was in them, and that could not be limited; for they could repeal any law, that limited them: But the judges were of opinion, that the power of regents might be limited; so that, as the design of moving this might be to have a new pretence to possess the clergy that there was a secret design against the church, which might break out at such a time, the Lords gave way to it, though they thought it unreasonable, and proposed with no good design. The Tories, upon the yielding this to them, proposed a great many more limitations; such as the restraining the regents from consenting to a repeal of the act for triennial parliaments; the acts for trials in cases of treason, and some others, and so extravagant were they in their design of making the act appear ridiculous, that they proposed as a limitation, that they should not have power to repeal the act of Succession. All these were rejected with scorn and indignation; the Lords seeing by this their error in yielding to that proposed by the earl of Rochester. The bill passed in the House of Lords, but the Tories protested against it.

There was not any thing in the management of the Tories, by which they suffered more in their reputation than by this. They hoped, that the motion for the invitation would have cleared them of all suspicion of inclinations towards the pretended prince of Wales, and would have reconciled the body of the nation to them, and turned them against all who should oppose it. The management was so ill-disguised, that it was visible they intended only to provoke the queen by it, hoping that the provocation might go so far, that in the sequel all their designs might be brought about, though by a method, that seemed quite contrary to them, and destructive of them.

The bill lay long in the House of Commons, by a secret management, that was against it. The Tories there likewise proposed, on the 14th of December, that the next successor should be brought over; which was moved by sir Thomas Hanmer, seconded by Mr. Benson, and supported by Mr. Bromley, and others. This was opposed by the Whigs, who moved, That the Chairman leave the chair; which was carried in the affirmative without dividing. The secret management was from Hanover. Some indigent persons, and others employed by the Tories, had studied to infuse jealousies of the queen and her ministers into the electress Sophia. She was then seventy-five, but had still so much vivacity, that as she was the most knowing and the most entertaining woman of the age, so she seemed willing to change her scene, and to come and shine here in England. They prevailed with her to write a letter to the archbishop of Canterbury, intimating her readiness to come over, if the queen and parliament should desire it. This was made public by some intriguing persons in that court, and a colour was soon found to keep some Whigs from agreeing to the act. In the act, which first settled the Succession, one limitation had been, that, when the crown should pass into that House, no man, who had either place or pension, should be capable of sitting in the House of Commons. The clause in this bill, which impowered either the parliament, which should be current at the queen's death, or that which had sat last, though dissolved, to sit for six months, or till the successor should dissolve it, seemed contrary to this incapacitating clause in the former act. Great exceptions were taken to this by some zealous Whigs, who were so possessed with the notion of a self-denying bill, as necessary to preserve public liberty from the practices of a designing court, that for some weeks there was cause to fear, not only the loss of the bill, but a breach among the Whigs upon this head. Much pains were taken, and with good effect, to heal this. It was at last settled; and a great many offices were enumerated; and it was declared, that every man, who held any of these, was thereby incapacitated from sitting in the House of Commons; and every member of the House, who accepted of any other office, was, upon that, excluded the House, and a new Writ was to go out to those, whom he represented, to chuse again; but it was left free to them to chuse him, or any other, as they pleased. It was desired by those, who pressed this matter most, that it should take place only in the next reign. But, to remove all jealousy, the ministers were content, that these clauses should take place immediately, upon the dissolution of the present parliament. And, when the House of Commons sent up these self-denying clauses to the Lords, they added to them a repeal of that clause in the first act of Succession, by which the succeeding princes were limited to govern by the advice of the council, and by which all the privy-councillors were to be obliged to sign their advices; which was impracticable, since it was visible, that no man would be a privy-counsellor on those terms. The Lords added the repeal of this clause to the amendments sent up by the Commons; and they made some alterations in the clause inserted by the Commons, their lordships excluding only the commissioners of the prize-office, and all such new officers, as the court might create for the time to come. Two conferences were held about these respective amendments between the two houses; and, the report of the latter conference being made in the House of Commons, on the 15th of February, it occasioned a long and warm debate. The court-party endeavoured to shew the injustice of excluding from the house such as were actually performing services to the nation: urging, that all counties and corporations of England have, by their charters, liberty to elect such, as they think best qualified to represent them in parliament; they should, in great measure, be deprived of that liberty by this exclusion of several officers, military and civil; who, by reason of the great estates they have in those corporations, seldom fail, and have more right than any others to be chosen. And that the exclusion of those officers would very much abate the noble ardour, which several gentlemen shewed at this juncture, to serve the nation in this just and necessary war, since they could not but look upon it as a disgrace, to be made incapable of serving likewise their country in parliament. The opposite party, which chiefly consisted of the Tories, with whom several of the Whigs joined on this occasion, alledged, the ill use which a bad prince might make of a parliament in which there should be many of his creatures; such are generally all those, who have employments immediately depending on the crown. The other party, foreseeing that they should lose the question, agreed to the postponing of three of the Lords' amendments, having already agreed to one of them. But, three days after, being reinforced by the return of those, who, for some time, had voted on the contrary side, the Lords' amendments were approved, with some few alterations; to which the Lords agreed on the 19th of February.

Complaints of the Allies rejected.] Nov. 22. Lord Haversham moved, That the Miscarriage of the last campaign, occasioned by the Allies, might be enquired into. In the course of this debate, the errors, committed in the conduct of the war this year, were complained of; the blame, indeed, of the miscarriage of the design on the Moselle was laid on the prince of Baden, and the errors in Brabant on the States and their deputies. But, as the party said, they could not judge of these things, nor be able to lay before the queen those advices, that might be fit for them to offer to her, unless they were made acquainted with the whole series of these affairs; therefore they proposed, that by an Address they might pray the queen to communicate to them all that she knew concerning those transactions during the last campaign; for they reckoned, that, if all particulars should be laid before them, they should find somewhat in the duke of Marlborough's conduct, on which a censure might be fixed. To this it was answered, that, if a complaint was brought against any of the queen's subjects, it would be reasonable for them to enquire into it by all proper ways; but the House of Lords could not pretend to examine or to censure the conduct of the queen's Allies, who were not subject to them, nor could be heard to justify themselves: and it was somewhat extraordinary, if they should pass a censure, or make a complaint of them. It was one of the trusts, which was lodged with the government, to manage all treaties and alliances, so that our commerce with our allies was wholly in the crown. Allies might sometimes fail, being not able to perform what they undertook; they are subject to errors and accidents, and are sometimes ill served. The entering into that matter was not at all proper for the House, unless it was intended to run into rash and indiscreet censures, on design to provoke the Allies, and by that means to weaken, if not break the alliance. The queen would, no doubt, endeavour to redress whatever was amiss, and that must be trusted to her conduct. Thus this attempt, which was chiefly levelled against the duke of Marlborough, not only failed, but it happened upon this, as upon other occasions, that it was turned against those who made it.

Address to maintain a good Correspondence with the Allies.] On the 27th of November, the two Houses attended the queen with the following Address:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the Commons, in parliament assembled, being justly alarmed by the many artifices which the emissaries of France have put in practice this last year, in order to raise jealousies, and create misunderstandings, amongst the Allies engaged in this necessary war, for the support of the liberties of Europe; and being apprehensive lest such malicious insinuations, if they should pass unobserved, might in time so far take place, as to abate the spirit, and slacken the zeal, of the confederacy; do most humbly beseech your majesty to use all possible endeavours to preserve a good correspondence amongst all the confederates, and, in a most particular manner, to maintain and cultivate a strict friendship with the States-general of the United Provinces.—And we most humbly entreat your majesty, That as, in your own way of acting, you have set before your Allies a great and noble example; so you would be graciously pleased, by all proper means, to excite the whole confederacy to make early and effectual preparations, and to exert their utmost vigour in the prosecution of the war against France."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's Answer was to this effect:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; your joining in this Address, is a very particular satisfaction to me.—The opinion of both Houses of Parliament will always be of the greatest weight with me. I shall readily comply with your desire; and I make no question but it will meet with a just regard from all our Allies."

The Acts against the Scots repealed.] The queen having laid before the two Houses the Addresses of the Scots parliament against any progress in the Treaty of Union, till the Act, which declared them aliens by such a day, should be repealed; the Tories, upon this occasion, to make themselves popular, after they had failed in many attempts, resolved to promote this, apprehending, that the Whigs, who had first moved for that act, would be for maintaining their own work; but they seemed to be much surprised, when, after they had prefaced their motions in this matter with such declarations of their intentions for the public good, that shewed they expected opposition and a debate; the Whigs not only agreed to this, but carried the matter further to the other act relating to their manufacture and trade. This passed very unanimously in both Houses; and, by this means, way was made for opening a Treaty, as soon as the session should come to an end. All the northern parts of England, that had been disturbed for some years with apprehensions of a war with Scotland, which would certainly be mischievous to them, whatever the end of it might prove, were much delighted with the prospect of peace and union with their neighbours.

The Queen's Speech concerning the Affairs of Spain.] Nov. 27. The nation having been long in suspense about the success of the earl of Peterborough's Expedition, when the account of it was at last brought by captain Norris in the Britannia, with the lord Shannon and brigadier Stanhope, the queen went to the House of Peers and made the following speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen: Having newly received letters from the king of Spain and the earl of Peterborough, which contain a very particular account of our great and happy successes in Catalonia, and shewing, at the same time, the reasonableness of their being immediately supported; I look upon this to be a matter of so much consequence in itself, and so agreeable to you, that I have ordered a copy of the king of Spain's letter to myself; a letter from the Junta of the military arm of Catalonia; and another letter from the city of Vich; as also an extract of the earl of Peterborough's letter to me, to be communicated to both Houses of Parliament.—I recommend the consideration of them to you, gentlemen of the House of Commons, very particularly, as the speediest way to restore the monarchy of Spain to the House of Austria. And therefore I assure myself, you will enable me to prosecute the advantages we have gained, in the most effectual manner, and to improve the opportunity, which God Almighty is pleased to afford us, of putting a prosperous end to the present war.—My Lords and Gentlemen: I must not lose this occasion of desiring you to give as much dispatch to the matters before you, as the nature of them will allow, that so our preparations for the next year may be early, which cannot fail of being of great advantage to us."

The Commons being returned to their House, Mr. Secretary Hedges laid before them the Letters mentioned in the queen's speech; and, two days after, they voted the granting of several sums, and, in particular, 250,000*l.* for her majesty's proportion of the charge of prosecuting the successes already gained by king Charles 3, for the recovery of the monarchy of Spain to the House of Austria.

A Rider offered to the Bill for the Security of the Succession.] Dec. 3. An Act for the better Security of her majesty's person and government, and of the Succession to the crown of England in the Protestant line was read a third time.

A Rider was offered to be added to the Bill, to restrain the Lords Justices from giving the royal assent to any bill for repealing or altering the act 31 Caroli Secundi, called, 'The 'Habeas Corpus Act,' the act called, 'The Toleration Act,' that called, 'The Triennial Act,' and the 'Act for regulating Trials in Cases of Treason.'—And the same being read, after debate, the question was put, whether this Rider shall be read a second time?—It was resolved in the Negative.

Protests thereon.] "Dissentient" Because we conceive, these acts mentioned in the foregoing Rider, are as necessary for the preservation of the Protestant religion, and the rights and liberties of the subjects of England, as the act of Uniformity, in the opinion of the House itself, is for the preservation of the church of England. (Signed) Beaufort, Scarsdale, Haversham, Northampton, Guilford, H. London, Carnarvon, Thanet, Anglesea, Rochester, Granville, Guernsey, Buckingham, Weymouth, Nottingham, North and Grey, G. Bath and Wells."

Then, after further debate, the question was put, Whether this bill shall pass? It was resolved in the affirmative.

"Dissentient"

"1. Because, it having been our humble opinion, that nothing can so firmly secure the succession to this crown in the Protestant line, as the presumptive heir's residing in this kingdom, and our proposal of an humble Address to her majesty for that purpose having been refused, this whole bill also being founded on the said heir's being absent at the time of the queen's demise, we fear the bill may prove not only ineffectual to these good purposes for which it is designed, but dangerous also in preventing the said heir's coming hither, in the mean time, by the opinion some have of the successor's being so well secured, that no such further care needs to be taken about it.

"2. Because every one of the 7 Lords Justices, constituted by this bill, is therein made so far independent of the very successor, as not to be displaced by the said successor in that instrument, which is to be deposited here for the addition of more Lords Justices; the reason for which addition we think equally strong, by enabling also the successor to exclude, by the said instrument, any of those seven justices: which said justices may otherwise be found (when, perhaps, it will be too late) invested with too great a power, if they can ever be supposed capable of ill employing it.

"3. Which last objection we conceive to be of more weight, since it was refused by the House to restrain those future Lords Justices from repealing the following acts, viz. An Act for preventing dangers which may happen from Popish recusants; an act for the more effectual preserving the king's person and government, by disabling of papists from sitting in either house of parliament; the act for the better securing the liberty of the subject, and for prevention of imprisonment beyond the seas; the act for the further security of his majesty's person, and the succession of the crown in the Protestant line, and for extinguishing the hopes of the pretended prince of Wales, all other pro-tenders, and their open and secret abettors; the act for exempting their majesties Protestant subjects, dissenting from the church of England, from the penalties of certain laws; the act for the frequent meeting and calling of parliaments; and the act for regulating of trials in cases of treason and misprision of treason; which laws we account the very pillars of our constitution, and that consequently no subjects whatsoever ought to be entrusted with the power of passing any act to repeal them, during the time, when it will be impossible for the successor to know any thing of the matter, or so much as that the said successor is become our sovereign.

4. "Because in this very bill, which entrusts the Lords Justices with a power of giving the royal assent to laws of so dangerous a nature, and with all the executive power, yet, we conceive, they are restrained from revoking the least military commission, or disbanding any officer of the army, though never so much deserving to be suspected by them.

"Lastly, We apprehend the great danger her majesty may be exposed to, since whatever is insufficient to secure the succession in the Protestant line, and may render it liable to difficulties or uncertainties, must also encourage ill designs against her sacred life; which may be thought the only obstacle in the way of such wicked persons, who may flatter themselves with the hopes of confusions after it.—(Signed) Beaufort, Carnarvon, Denbigh, Buckingham, Anglesea, Haversham, Nottingham, Thanet.

"We dissent for the four last reasons, Granville, North and Grey, Guernsey."

Debate in the House of Lords concerning the Danger of the Church.] Dec. 6. After the Act for the Regency had passed, the lord Halifax remembering what the earl of Rochester had said concerning the danger the Church might be in, moved, that a day might be appointed, to enquire into these dangers, about which so many tragical stories had been published of late. Accordingly, this day was appointed for this purpose, when

The Earl of Rochester* began the debate, (the Queen being present) and told their lord-

* "The second son of lord chancellor Clarendon, created earl of Rochester by Charles the Second; lord treasurer and a knight of the garter by James the Second; lord lieutenant of Ireland by William the Third; and president of the council by queen Anne. He died in 1711.

"Dunton, his contemporary, says he was set in the conspicuous place of lord lieutenant of Ireland, on purpose to guide the people into the path of love and obedience to their God and king. 'He is a person,' he adds, 'of extraordinary sense and very close thinking, a refined politician, and was ever a firm adherer to the royal line: but his zeal for the church is the most remarkable quality in him, and so perfumes the actions of his whole life, that it makes him whatever is brave, generous, merciful, just, and good,' &c. Macky de-ships, "That the subject-matter of it was of so tender a nature, that it was difficult to speak to it; for her majesty had expressed herself so conclusively in her speech, that it seemed to be to contradict the queen, to speak freely: but in regard, that the ministers might be supposed to make the speeches, he desired, that what he had said might not be offensive to the queen, for whom he had all the affection and respect that could be. He urged, that ministers might mistake, and not always act for the public good; and instanced in the ministry of Portugal, where the king was our friend, but the ministry seemed to be otherwise, insomuch that the alscribes him as 'one who had all the improvement of education and experience, with a 'good capacity;' and says he was, when very young, employed by Charles the Second in foreign negotiations. He opposed king William's coming to the throne, and generally thwarted the measures of that court, till the king, to gain him and his party, made him lord lieutenant of Ireland, and when he was thrown out of office, gave him a very considerable pension during his reign. 'He is easily wound up to a passion,' observes the same writer, 'which is the reason why he often loses himself in the debates of the House of Peers: and the opposite party know so well how to attack him, as to make his great stock of knowledge fail him. He is, notwithstanding, one of the finest men in England for interest, especially the church party, and is very zealous for his friends.' Burnet, a more accredited judge, speaks of lord Rochester as a man of great parts and incorrupt practices, though of austere manners. Before he rose to high posts, he was thought the smoothest man in the court; and during all the dispute concerning his father, managed so dexterously, that no resentments were excited against him.

"Dryden penned a very caustic epitaph upon the earl of Rochester's being dismissed from the treasury in 1687; which thus begins:

"Here lies a creature of indulgent fate,
From Tory Hyde rais'd to a chit of state;
In chariot now, Elisha-like, he's hurl'd
To th' upper empty regions of the world:
The airy thing cuts through the yielding sky,
And as it goes does into atoms fly:
While we on earth see with no small delight,
The bird of prey turn'd to a paper kite."

"The same versatile poet's previous character of lord Rochester should, however, be opposed to this libel:

"Hushai, the friend of David in distress,
In public storms of manly steadfastness,
By foreign treaties be inform'd his youth,
And join'd experience to his native truth.
His frugal care supply'd the wanting throne, Frugal for that, but bounteous of his own."

liance was of no benefit to us: and added, that the duke of Buckingham and archbishop Laud were heartily in the interest of king Charles I, but did many things that very much injured him. The full expressions in the queen's speech he compared to the law in king Charles the second's time, to make it treason to call the king a papist; for which very reason, he said, he always thought him so. The reasons he gave for his fear of the church's danger, arose from these three causes: first, the Act of Security in Scotland: secondly, the heir of the house of Hanover not being sent for over: thirdly, the not passing the Occasional Bill. Upon the first he said, the Presbyterian church in Scotland was fully established without a toleration, that to arm that people was to give them a power to invade England, where they had a powerful party for their friends, who never wanted the will to destroy the church. That he thought the heir of the crown ought to be present among us, in order to be fully acquainted with us and our constitution, and thereby enabled to prevent any evil designs upon the church and state: That the Occasional Bill was in itself so reasonable, and the church's request in it so small, that the industry in opposing it gave the greater ground for suspicion."

When that noble lord had done, the House sat still a quarter of an hour, expecting some body would second him; but no body else speaking on that side,

The Lord Halifax* said, "That he having moved for the present debate, it might be expect-* "Charles Montague, earl of Halifax, was the fourth son of the hon. George Montague, a younger son of the earl of Manchester. He was born in 1661, educated in Westminster-school, where he is said to have recommended himself to Dr. Busby by his felicity in extemporary epigrams, and removed in 1682 to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he commenced an acquaintance with the great Newton, which continued through his life, and was at last attested by a legacy. He intended to have taken orders; but afterwards altering his purpose, purchased for 1,500*l.* the place of one of the clerks of the council. In 1691, being a member of the House of Commons, he argued warmly in favour of a law to grant the assistance of counsel in trials for high treason; and in the midst of his speech, falling into some confusion, he is said, by his biographers, to have drawn a dexterous argument from the circumstance, precisely in the same way lord Shaftesbury has been stated to do.

"After this he rose fast into honours and employments, being appointed, in 1691, a commissioner of the treasury, and a privy-counsellor. In 1694 he became chancellor of the exchequer; and the next year engaged in the arduous attempt of recoinning the silver currency, which was in two years happily completed. In 1696 he projected the scheme for a general fund, which was the precursor of the ed that he should speak to it. The Act of Security in Scotland, was a national thing, wholly foreign to church-affairs; that it was not to pass, but to prevent immediate war, which the Scots seemed to have resolved upon; that in case it should ever be made use of, it would be but as other wars with that nation had been, in former days, wherein England was always able to defend itself, and would sure, hereafter, sinking fund established by sir Robert Walpole; and after an inquiry concerning a grant of Irish crown lands in 1698, it was determined by a vote of the Commons that he 'had deserved his majesty's favour.' In the same year he was advanced to the first commission of the treasury, and appointed one of the regency in the king's absence. The next year he was made auditor of the exchequer, and the year after created baron of Halifax, in the county of York. He was, however, impeached by the Commons for advising his majesty to sign the Partition Treaty; but the Articles were dismissed by the Lords. At the accession of queen Anne he was removed from the council, and in the first parliament of her reign was again attacked by the Commons, and again escaped by the protection of the Lords. In 1706 he proposed and negotiated the Union with Scotland; and moved the bill for the naturalization of the house of Hanover, and securing the Protestant succession; after which he was appointed to carry the ensigns of the order of the garter to the electoral court. At the queen's death he was nominated one of the lords regent; and by George the First was made viscount Sunbury, earl of Halifax, a knight of the garter, first commissioner of the treasury, and lord lieutenant of the county of Surrey. 'More,' says Dr. Johnson, 'was not to be had, and this he kept but a little while.' His lordship died on May 19, 1715; in the fifty-fourth year of his age. A namby-pamby ode by Philips was dedicated to his memory.

"Dunton says he was affable, easy, and obliging, candid and ingenious, and that all these qualities were well tempered. Steele in a dedicatory epistle flatters him with saying, 'Your lordship's patronage has produced those arts, which before shunned the commerce of the world, into the service of life; and it is to you we owe that the man of wit has turned himself to be a man of business. Your own studies have been diverted from being the highest ornament to the highest use to mankind; and the capacities that would have rendered you the greatest poet of your age, have to the advantage of Great Britain been employed in pursuits which have made you the most able patriot.' Smith was not less laudatory in the dedication to his Phædra and Hippolitus: nor was Philips in his epistolary verses. Tickell added much in a similar strain of panegyric, which drew forth the following remarks from Dr. Johnson: 'Of him who from a poet became a patron of poets, it will be readily believed that the works would not miss of cele-be more able to do it, inasmuch as the strength of England was increased much more than that of Scotland; so that unless France should come into the quarrel, whose hands were already too full to do it, it would signify little; but blessed be God, things were so well compromised with the Scots, and their former heat so much abated, that there was no reason to doubt of an amicable issue of that difference: as to the house of Hanover, he said, that was a danger of but eight days standing; for he durst say a fortnight ago, no body made the absence of the princess Sophia, a danger to the church; and as for her absence upon the queen's death, that was now so well to be provided for by the act for Lords Justices, that he thought no evil could possibly happen to the church before her arrival. That he wondered the house of Hanover should be now esteemed such a security to the church; whereas, when the laws were made for the security of that succession, it was generally reckoned a hardship upon the church: and a clergyman, in a company of convocation-men, had openly called her an unbaptized Lutheran; the truth of which he could prove. As to the Occasional-Bill, he said, that matter had been canvassed already, and it was then the opinion of that bration. Lord Halifax was, as Pope says, 'fed with soft dedications;' for Tickell affirms that no dedicator was unrewarded. Yet to charge all unmerited praise with the guilt of flattery, and to suppose that the encomiast always knows and feels the falsehood of his assertions, is surely to discover great ignorance of human nature and human life. Very near to admiration is the wish to admire.'

'Considered as a poet,' says Cibber, 'his lordship makes a less considerable figure than the earl of Dorset: there is a languor in his verses which seems to indicate that he was not born with a poetical genius. That he was a lover of the Muses there is not the least doubt, as we find him patronizing the poets so warmly; but there is some difference between a propensity to poetry and a power of excelling in it.' Dr. Anderson seems to concur with the judgment of Cibber, when he determines that lord Halifax can only be ranked with Stepney and Walsh, as he is associated in the works of the Minor Poets, since he makes a less considerable figure than Dorset, or even than Sedley and Hopkins. Dr. Johnson proceeds so far as to assert, 'It would now be esteemed no honour, by a contributor to the monthly bundles of verses, to be told that in strains either familiar or solemn he sings like Montague;' and this appreciation of his lordship's poetic merit will not perhaps be found to fall much short of the general estimate." house that it would not prove of any advantage and security to the church, but rather the contrary. That, upon the whole, there had been times in their memory, wherein the church might be said to be in danger. That king Charles 2, was a Roman Catholic; at least, his brother thought fit to declare it after his death, and the successor, who had the management of all affairs, was known to be such; and yet the church thought herself then secure; and those patriots, who stood up in its defence, and endeavoured to prevent the evils which might ensue from a popish successor, were discountenanced and punished. Nay (added his lordship) when that successor came to the throne, and that the church was very apparently in the greatest danger by the High-commission Court, and otherwise, we were then indeed generally alarmed; but we know who sat in that court, and went large steps in the work then on foot. That, soon after the succession of king William to the crown, the cry of the Church Danger began, and was continued all his reign, but with what ground his lordship was yet unacquainted with. That upon her majesty's happy succession, for some time the complaint was silent; but that, when she was pleased to make some alterations in her ministry, it was immediately revived, and ever since continued: and so his lordship concluded, that the church was now in no danger."

† Henry Compton, youngest son of Speaker, earl of Northampton, who was killed in the civil war, was educated at Queen's College in Oxford. Having staid about three years at the university, he made the usual tour of Europe. After the Restoration, he became a cornet in the royal regiment of guards, commanded by Aubrey de Vere, earl of Oxford: but a military life not suiting his disposition, he entered into holy orders, and was in a few years advanced to the bishopric of Oxford, and afterwards to that of London. He strongly expected to be promoted to the see of Canterbury; and was greatly disappointed when it was given to Dr. Sancroft, but more, when Dr. Tillotson was preferred to it. His learning was superficial, but his great diligence in discharging the duties of his function was truly exemplary. He is said to have been 'an humble, modest, generous, and good natured man; but weak, wilful, much in the power of others, and strangely wedded to a party.' He was emphatically called The Protestant Bishop, for the noble stand he made in defence of the rights of the church in this reign, when spirit and resolution were much more necessary than learning. He patronized converts from popery, and was a generous friend to the French Protestants who fled hither from the persecution of Lewis XIV. He appeared in arms at Nottingham, a little be-delivered, immediately took up the lord Halifax; giving for his reason of the church's being in danger, that profaneness and irreligion were so rife among us, and the licentiousness of the press so intolerable, that a most vile book had been lately published by a clergyman in his diocese (meaning Mr. Hickeringhill) whom he had endeavoured to punish; but that he had such subterfuges in the quirks of the law, that he could not come at him: and that sermons were preached, wherein rebellion was countenanced, and resistance to the higher powers encouraged.

The Bishop of Salisbury * replied, That his lordship ought to have been the last man to fore the Revolution, and declared his readiness to fight for the prince of Orange. He was a true son and brave champion of the church, and a most munificent benefactor to it. Whatever imperfections there might be in his character, he was allowed to be much a gentleman, and no less a Christian. Ob. 7 July, 1713, Æt. 81. Granger.

“ Being part of ‘ God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of Jesus Christ.’ His literary works were, a translation, in 1667, of ‘ The Life of Doana Olympia Maldaelini, who governed Innocent X. and the church;’ the ‘ Jesuits Intrigues, with the private Instructions of that Society to their Emissaries,’ 1669; ‘ A Treatise on the Holy Communion,’ 1677; ‘ A Letter to his Clergy concerning Baptism, the Lord’s Supper, Catechism,’ 1679, and other letters to them. It was nobly said by him, when a person told his lordship that a certain clergyman had spoken contemptuously of him, his diocesan, ‘ I am glad of it, for he has given me an opportunity of setting you a good example in forgiving him.’ Noble’s Continuation of Granger.

* “ Gilbert Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, was born of a respectable and antient family at Edinburgh, 18th September, 1643. He was educated in the college of Aberdeen, and under the watchful eye of his father, he early acquired habits of industry and application which attended him through life, and never till the infirmities of age compelled him, discontinued the custom of rising every morning at four o’clock to prosecute his studies with ardour and effect. At the age of 18 he was admitted expectant preacher, but he refused the offer of a benefice, and in 1663, two years after his father’s death, he visited Oxford and Cambridge for six months, and soon after passed over into Holland, where he applied to the study of Hebrew, and by an indiscriminate and friendly intercourse with men of every religious persuasion, he fixed his principles of universal benevolence and toleration, without regard to tribe or sect. On his return to Scotland in 1665, he was ordained, and afterwards appointed divinity professor at Glasgow; but his benevolent attempts to reconcile the contending parties in ecclesiastical affairs rendered him unpopular and suspected. He afterwards engaged himself to write the History of the dukes of Hamilton, and recommended himself so much to the earl of Lauderdale and to the king’s ministers in London, by his moderation and his superior abilities, that he was several times offered a Scotch bishopric, which he as often declined. His interest with the court however was of short duration, he became suspected, and was treated with harshness by the king, who ordered his name to be erased from the list of chaplains. His character was so well established, that, in his travels in France and Italy, he was received with every mark of attention and respect by the French king, and by pope Innocent 2. The accession of James 2, to the throne, formed a new era in the life of Burnet. Unwilling to return to his native country, he resolved to settle in Holland, and the attention which was paid to him by the prince and princess of Orange, proved so offensive to the English monarch, that he caused his ambassador to demand his banishment from the States, a tyrannical interference which was rejected, as he was under the protection of the laws as a naturalized subject and the husband of a Dutch lady. His character was so well established, that, in his travels in France and Italy, he was received with every mark of attention and respect by the French king, and by pope Innocent 2. The accession of James 2, to the throne, formed a new era in the life of Burnet. Unwilling to return to his native country, he resolved to settle in Holland, and the attention which was paid to him by the prince and princess of Orange, proved so offensive to the English monarch, that he caused his ambassador to demand his banishment from the States, a tyrannical interference which was rejected, as he was under the protection of the laws as a naturalized subject and the husband of a Dutch lady. Some time after he accompanied as monastery, if he did not speedily crush them, and therefore stabbed the duke of Guise to the heart. To the reasons, which the noble lord who began the debate, gave for the church's danger, he re-chaplain the prince on his invasion of England, and so zealously active did he shew himself in his cause, both by his pamphlet and his pulpit eloquence, that William, a few days after he was seated on the throne, advanced him to the see of Salisbury. In his new office he was moderate but dignified, though his assertions in a Pastoral Letter, that William's title to the crown was founded on conquest, proved highly disagreeable to both Houses, and the offensive paper was publicly burnt by the hands of the hangman. He resided in his diocese the best part of his time, and though he was engaged as preceptor to the duke of Gloucester, yet he devoted himself as much to improve the comforts of his clergy, by augmenting poor livings, as to advance the interests of religion by his writings. He died 17th March, 1715, in his 72nd year, and was buried at St. James's Clerkenwell. He was thrice married, first to lady Margaret Kennedy, daughter of earl Cassilis, about 1670, secondly, to a Dutch lady of family and fortune, who died of the small pox 1698, and thirdly, in the same year, to Mrs. Berkeley, a woman of excellent character. Besides his works already mentioned, and a third volume of the Reformation, &c. he wrote the History of his own Times,—an excellent treatise on the Pastoral care,—an Exposition of the 39 Articles,—and Sermons. His son Thomas Burnet published an account of his Life annexed to the History of his own Times, and the marquis of Halifax has drawn his character with great judgment and impartiality." Lempriere.

The following is Burnet's Character, as drawn by the marquis of Halifax. The copy from which this is printed in the Bishop's Life, p. 77, was taken from one given to the Bishop, in the Marquis's own hand-writing:

"Dr. Burnet is like all men, who are above the ordinary level, seldom spoke of in a mean, he must either be rail'd at or admir'd; he has a swiftness of imagination, that no other man comes up to; and as our nature hardly allows us to have enough of any thing, without having too much, he cannot at all times so hold in his thoughts, but that at some time they may run away with him; as it is hard for a vessel, that is brim-full, when in motion, not to run over; and therefore the variety of matter, that he ever carries about him, may throw out more, than an unkind critic would allow of. His first thoughts may sometimes require more digestion, not from a defect in his judgment, but from the abundance of his fancy, which surrishes too fast for him. His friends love him too well, to see small faults; or if they do, think that his greater talents give him a privilege of straying from the strict rules of caution, and exempt him from the ordinary rules of censure. He produces so fast, that what is well in his plied, that, as to the Scots affairs, he was particularly acquainted with them, and therefore he would venture to speak with the more assurance. That the Scots Kirk being established writings calls for admiration, and what is incorrect deserves an excuse; he may in some things require grains of allowance, which those only can deny him, who are unknown or unjust to him. He is not quicker in discerning other men's faults, than he is in forgiving them; so ready, or rather glad to acknowledge his own, that from blemishes they become ornaments. All the repeated provocations of his indecent adversaries, have had no other effect, than the setting his good-nature in so much a better light; since his anger never yet went farther than to pity them. That heat, which in most other men raises sharpness and satire, in him glows into warmth for his friends, and compassion for those in want and misery. As dull men have quick eyes, in discerning the smaller faults of those, that nature has made superior to them, they do not miss one blot he makes; and being beholden only to their barrenness for their discretion, they fall upon the errors which arise out of his abundance; and by a mistake, into which their malice betrays them, they think that by finding a mote in his eye, they hide the beams that are in their own. His quickness makes writing so easy a thing to him, that his spirits are neither wasted nor soured by it: The soil is not forced, every thing grows, and brings forth without pangs; which distinguishes as much what he does, from that which smells of the lamp, as a good palate will discern between fruit which comes from a rich mould, and that which tastes of the uncleanly pains that have been bestowed upon it. He makes many enemies, by setting an ill-natured example of living, which they are not inclined to follow. His indifference for preferment, his contempt not only of splendour, but of all unnecessary plenty, his degrading himself into the lowest and most painful duties of his calling; are such unpretential qualities, that let him be never so orthodox in other things, in these he must be a dissenter. Virtues of such a stamp are so many heresies, in the opinion of those divines, who have softened the primitive injunctions, so as to make them suit better with the present frailty of mankind. No wonder then, if they are angry, since it is in their own defence, or that from a principle of self-preservation they should endeavour to suppress a man, whose parts are a shame, and whose life is a scandal to them."

The following short view of Dr. Burnet, in his domestic life, as drawn by his son Thomas, may not be unacceptable to the reader:

"His time, the only treasure of which he seemed covetous, was employed in one regular and uniform manner. His constant health permitted him to be an early riser, he was seldom in bed later than five o'clock in the morning during the summer, or than six in the winter.

without a toleration, was an unfair allegation; for there needed no law for toleration, where there was no law to inhibit. The Episcopalians were not forbid to worship God their own Private meditation took up the two first hours and the last half-hour of the day. His first and last appearance to his family was, at the morning and evening prayers, which were always read by himself, though his chaplains were present. He drank his tea in company with his children, and took that opportunity of instructing them in religion; he went through the Old and New Testament with them three times, giving his own comment upon some portion of it for an hour every morning. When this was over, he retired to his study, where he seldom spent less than six, often more than eight hours in a day. The rest of his time was taken up with business, exercise and necessary rest, or bestowed on friendly visits and cheerful meals. As he kept an open table, in which there was plenty without luxury, so no man was more pleased with innocent mirth there, no man encouraged it more, or had a larger fund of entertainment to contribute towards it. His equipage, like his table, was decent and plain; and all his expences denoted a temper generous, but not profuse. The episcopal palace, when he came to Salisbury, was thought one of the worst; and when he died, was one of the best in England.

"The character I have given his wives, will scarce make it an addition to his, that he was a most affectionate husband. His tender care of the first, during a course of sickness, that lasted for many years; and his fond love to the other two, and the deep concern he expressed for their loss, were no more than their just due, from one of his humanity, gratitude and discernment. His love to his children, perhaps accompanied with too much indulgence, was not exerted in laying up for them a board of wealth, out of the revenues of the church, but in giving them a noble education; though the charge of it was wholly maintained out of his private fortune. At seven years old, he entered his sons into Latin, giving each of them a distinct tutor, who had a salary of 40*l.* a year, which was never lessened on account of any pretence the Bishop gave him. After five or six years had perfected his sons in the learned languages, he sent them to the University; the eldest a gentleman commoner to Trinity College in Cambridge, the other two commoners to Merton College in Oxford; where, besides the College Tutor, they had a private one, to assist them in their learning, and to overlook their behaviour. In the year 1706, he sent them abroad for two years to finish their studies at Leyden; from whence two of them took a tour through Germany, Switzerland and Italy. The eldest and youngest, by their own choice, were bred to the law, and the second to divinity.

"In his friend-ships, our author was warm, open-hearted and constant: from those I have way, being only excluded from livings; and that there were at that time fourteen episcopal meeting-houses in Edinburgh, as open as the churches, and as freely resorted to; in many taken the liberty to mention, the reader will perceive, that they were formed upon the most prudent choice, and I cannot find an instance of any one friend he ever lost, but by death. It is a common, perhaps a just observation, That a hearty friend is apt to be as hearty an enemy; yet this rule did not hold in our author. For though his station, his principles, but above all his steadfast adherence to the Hanover succession, raised him many enemies; yet he no sooner had it in his power, to have taken severe revenges on them, than he endeavoured, by the kindest good offices, to repay all their injuries, and overcome them, by returning good for evil. I have already given some instances of this nature here, and many more will occur to the reader in the history.

"The Bishop was a kind and bountiful master to his servants, whom he never changed, but with regret and through necessity: Friendly and obliging to all in employment under him, and peculiarly happy in the choice of them; especially in that of the steward to the bishopric and his courts, William Wastfield, esq. (a gentleman of a plentiful fortune, at the time of his accepting this post) and in that of his domestic steward, Mr. Mackney. These were both men of approved worth and integrity, firmly attached to his interests, and were treated by him, as they well deserved, with friendship and confidence. To them, I must appeal, for the truth of many facts here related, particularly those concerning his labours in his diocese; from them I likewise had an account of his extensive charities.

"This was indeed a principal article of his expence, impossible now to fix as to all the particulars; our author being as secret as he was liberal, in those charities, which he distributed with his own hands: Yet the greatest part of them could not be hid from the persons who were entrusted with the management of his affairs. His gifts, for the augmentation of small livings, of 100*l.* at a time; his constant pensions to poor clergymen, to their widows, to students for their education at the Universities, and to industrious families that were struggling with the world; the frequent sums given by him, towards the repairs or building of churches and vicarage-houses; his liberal contribution to all public collections, to the support of charity-schools (one of which for fifty children at Salisbury was wholly maintained by him), and the many apprentices, at different times put out to trades at his charge, were charities that could not be wholly concealed. Nor were his aims confined to one nation, sect or party; want and merit in the object were the only measures of his liberality. Thus when Mr. Martin (minister of Compton Chamberlain) for refusing to take the oaths to the government, soon after the Revolution, had of which the English liturgy was used, but that in several of them the queen was not prayed for. And the bill for giving patrons liberty of conferring their benefices on clerks episcopally ordained would have passed (at least, king William had allowed it) if they would have put in a clause to oblige them to take the oath to the government; but, upon offering that clause, the person, that solicited it, let it drop. That, if the lord, who had mentioned the Act of Security, had looked two years backwards, he might have found another law, which seemed much more to his purpose; namely, the Act for confirming Presbytery, 1 ANNO; but his lordship was a minister of state, when that act passed, and so perhaps advised it.—As to the argument of the Hanover family, it was not observed, that the bishop offered any thing remarkable; and, for the Occasional Conformity bill, he said, it had been there already sufficiently argued, and he was glad they were rid of it: but, as to what a noble prelate had advanced, he owned, that the church would always be subject to the enmity of profaneness and irreligion: that the devil would have his agents in the world, be the government never so careful; but he hoped he might say, that irreligion and profaneness were not now at a higher pitch than usually: that he hoped quite the contrary, and thought the Society set up for Reformation in London, and other cities, had contributed considerably to the suppressing of vice. He was sure the Corporation for the Propagation of the Gospel, had done a great deal towards instructing men in religion, by giving great numbers of books in practical divinity; by erecting libraries in country parishes, by sending over many able divines to the foreign plantations, erecting libraries there for their use, and setting up schools to breed up the children in Christian knowledge; that to his knowledge 1,200*l.* had been expended last year in books to these purposes, all collected by voluntary contributions; but in truth very little of it from those who appeared so wonderfully zealous for the church. That the press was indeed become very licentious, and sermons were preached wherein forfeited his prebend in the church of Sarum; the Bishop, out of his own income, paid him the yearly value of it during his life. His usual allowance for charity was 500*l.* a year, which he often exceeded; particularly in the two years that he was preceptor to the duke of Gloucester, in which time this article amounted to 2,100*l.* In a word, no object of Christian compassion ever came within his knowledge, without receiving a proportionable relief. He looked upon himself, with regard to his episcopal revenue, as a mere trustee for the church, bound to expend the whole, in the maintenance of a decent figure suitable to his station, in hospitality, and in acts of charity. And he had so faithfully balanced this account, that at his death no more of the income of his bishopric remained to his family, than what was barely sufficient for the payment of his debts."

very strange expressions were published. That he would read some of them to their lordships, and then pulling out Tilly's and Madder's Sermons, he read some paragraphs: these, said he, were what were preached at Oxford, and these are the men picked out for public occasion: I must remark that both these gentlemen are of a House where a noble peer makes his residence, when he honours that University with his presence.

Then the Archbishop of York (Dr. Sharp)* stood up and said, He apprehended danger

* "The pious and learned Dr. Sharp, archbishop of York, was a native of Bradford in Yorkshire, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he made very considerable progress in literature; but more attached to botany and chymistry than the mathematics, he chiefly studied those branches of science. A tedious ague rendered him hypochondriac; but recovering, he was appointed domestic chaplain and tutor to four sons of sir Henrage Finch, attorney-general, which led to his future promotion. Sir Henrage obtained the highest office in the law, and as lord chancellor, recommended his friend Sharp to Charles 2, and procured for him the archdeaconry of Berkshire; to that office his patron added a prebendal stall at Norwich, and the rectory of St. Bartholomew, near the Exchange, London. The profits of those enabling him to marry, he left the chancellor's house, where he had resided five years; and the rectory of St. Giles's in the Fields becoming vacant soon after, (where he had been curate to the deceased rector,) it was given to him. Dr. Sharp enjoyed the friendship of the most eminent divines, but that of Dr. Tillotson was procured by one of those singular circumstances which often mark the lives of eminent men. His father was a dry salter, as was Mr. Joshua Tillotson, uncle of the latter: they dealt together. The son and nephew had only to know, to esteem each other. The lectureship of St. Lawrence was given to Sharp, and he received his doctor's degree; this was followed by the accession of the deanery of Norwich. Before the death of Charles 2, to whom he had been chaplain, he wrote the address of that city and grand jury; and attended the coronation of James 2, which monarch he soon offended by his refutation of the idle pretensions of the Church of Rome to be the only visible Catholic one. Bishop Compton, his diocesan, was ordered to suspend him, and was himself suspended for refusing so to do. Dr. Sharp read his notes to Chancellor Jelfries, who endeavoured to screen him; but it was judged proper he should retire, and not preach until leave was given. He modestly acquiesced, and removed to Norwich, amusing himself there with forming a collection of coins, chiefly British, Anglo-Saxon, or English. Recalled, he returned with joy, but refused to obey the ecclesiastical commissioners. After the arrival of William 3, he was appointed to preach before him, was named one of the refrom the increase of dissenters, and particularly from the many academies set up by them, and moved, that the judges might be consulted what laws were in force against such seminaries, and by what means they might be suppressed.

The Lord Wharton * spoke next, and moved, That the judges might be consulted about the visers of the liturgy, and offered the vacant vacant of one of the deprived prelates, but this he nobly refused. Dr. Tillotson at length proposed, and the king acceded to his wish, that Dr. Sharp should succeed Dr. Lamplugh in the see of York; and that prelate dying July 5, 1691, he was consecrated and appointed. It is a remarkable circumstance, that neither of the above primates should previously have been a bishop. Queen Anna made him lord almoner, a privy counsellor, and a commissioner for the Union. He presided at York for more than twenty years, equally admired and beloved. Piety and virtue seemed matured in him; every thing like malice, envy, and detraction, were absolutely unknown to him. Elegance and ease characterized all his motions. He died at Bath, February 1713-14, without an enemy. York received his highly respected remains. By Elizabeth, youngest daughter of William Palmer, of Winthrop in Lincolnshire, esq. he left a family who justly gloried in so good a parent. His Sermons, in several volumes, have been collected and published." Noble's Continuation of Granger, 74:

* "Thomas marquis of Wharton was son of Philip lord Wharton, imprisoned by Charles 2, during whose life he sat in the House of Commons, with his relation, Mr. Hampden, (son of the patriot,) as representative for Buckinghamshire. "A presbyterian in politics, he was an atheist in religion." William, who found him at the head of a party in the House of Commons, and the avowed enemy of the Stuarts, gave him the office of comptroller of the household, made him a privy counsellor, and chief justice in Eyre, south of Trent; but being entreated to raise him to the premiership, he always firmly refused. The same boldness distinguished him in the House of Peers, after his father's death, which had marked his conduct in the lower House. On the queen's accession he was dismissed, but she afterwards named him a commissioner for the Union; created him earl of Wharton, in 1706, and viscount Wintchenden, in the county of Buckingham; and, in 1708, appointed him Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; but recalled him in 1710. It was he who moved for an address to the queen, to use her influence to expel the son of James 2, from the court of Lorraine; and to prevent his residence in the dominions of any of her allies, with which she reluctantly complied. George 1, made him lord privy seal, named him one of the privy council, and created him marquis of Wharton and Malsbury in England; and marquis of Cathelrugh, earl of Rathfarnham, and baron Trim, in Ireland. He died April means of suppressing schools and seminaries held by nonjurors, in one of which a noble Lord of that House had both his sons educated:

Upon which the Archbishop stood up again and said, He supposed he was the person meant, and therefore he must explain that matter. He said his two sons were taught by 12, 1715, aged 66. Never were excellent abilities more abused than by this peer. He did not attempt to disguise but even gloried in vice. He defied its effects, either as to his interest, or to his constitution; oaths, falsities, and profaneness of every kind were familiar to him. He exceeded the profligacy of the youngest men; yet, at an advanced age he had the appearance of one. His avarice kept pace with his profligacy: he was vena to excess. No impression could be made upon him; he behaved with the same familiarity to the man whom he injured, as to one who expected his patronage. To majesty, though he owed so much to his sovereigns, he acted as if he had been opposing his relation, the usurper, Cromwell. In fine, the strength of his constitution, the vigour of his mind, his great wealth, and his high honours, were made subservient to very unworthy purposes. By his first marriage with Anna, daughter and co-heir of sir Henry Lee, of Ditchley, in Oxfordshire, bart. he had no child; but by Lucy, daughter and heir of Adam Loftus, baron Loftus, he had Philip, created duke of Wharton, so famed for his eccentricities; and two daughters, Jane and Lucy. Mackay describes 'the marquis of Wharton as 'one of the completest gentlemen in England: 'of a very clear understanding and manly expression, with abundance of wit; brave in his person, much of a libertine, of a middle stature, and fair complexion.'" Noble's Continuation of Granger, 40.

"He was a complete statesman, a principal promoter of the Revolution: zealous for the Hanover settlement; of great sagacity, elocution and spirit." Bolton's Extinct Peerage, p. 302.

"A Poem to the marquis's memory was printed in Dodsley's Collection, vol. 5, and contains, among many other encomiums, the following tribute to his patriotism:

"Not bribes nor threatnings could his seal abate
To serve his country, and avert her fate.
Firm to her laws and liberties he stood,
Submitting private views to public good.
Who could obsequious with the current swim,
Whigs might be called, but Tories were to him;
Parties or persons he no longer knew
When swerving once, from honest, just and true.
Oft has he stemm'd the rage of impious times,
When patriot virtues bore the brand of crimes,
To check proud tyrants born, and factions awe,
But most devoted to good kings and law."

"Lord Shaftesbury drew a less partial estimate of the marquis in 1709, when writing to Mr. Molesworth. "Your character of lord Wharton is very generous: I am very glad to hear so

Mr. Ellis, a sober, virtuous man, and a man of letters, and who had qualified himself according to law when they were sent to him; but when the Abjuration-Oath was enjoined, that, it seems, he refused it, which as soon as he was apprized of, he took his sons from him.

The Lord Wharton having made a reply to this, went on, and said, That although he had been born and bred a Dissenter, yet he soon conformed to the church, when he grew up, and became acquainted with its doctrine and discipline; that he was now firmly resolved, by God's blessing, always to continue in that church, and would go as far in defending it as any man: Wherefore if he were now sensible that it was in any danger, he would be heartily ready in providing remedies against it; but that, after all the cry and expectations they were screwed up to, upon hearing wherein those dangers consisted, it appeared just as he expected, namely, that it was only repeating The Memorial, which pamphlet he had carefully read over, but could learn nothing from it, except that the d— of B—, the e— of R—, the earl of N—,* were out of place. What these B's, R's, and N's meant he could not tell; perhaps there might be some charm in them for the church's security: But if those letters meant some noble peers there present, he remembered very well, that some of them sat in the High-commissioned Court, and then made no complaints of the church's danger; but now that we had a queen, who was herself a real lover of the church, and had given such encouragement and bountiful tokens of her affection for it, we must be amused with the Church's Danger: But he concluded with being of opinion, that the church was in no danger.

The Bishop of Ely (Dr. Patrick),† stood up, and moved, That the Judges also might be consulted what power the queen had in visiting the well of him. If ever I expected any public good where virtue was wholly sunk, it was in his character: the most mysterious of any, in my account, for this reason. But I have seen many proofs of this monstrous compound in him, of the very best and worst." See lord Orford's Noble Authors, Park's edition, vol. 4, p. 66.

* Buckingham, Rochester, Nottingham.

† "Simon Patrick, a learned prelate, son of a mercer at Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, where he was born 8th of Sep. 1726. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and of which in 1661, he was elected master, against Sparrow, appointed by royal mandamus. His opponent, supported by power, prevailed, whilst he himself retired from Cambridge, and became rector of St. Paul's Covent Garden, where he continued an active parish priest during the whole of the plague. He took his degree of D. D. as a member of Christ-church college, Oxford, 1666, and was made chaplain to the king. In 1672 he was made prebendary of Westminster, and Universities, complaining of the heat and passion of the gentlemen there; which they inculcated into their pupils, who brought the same fury with them to the parishes, when they came abroad, to the great disturbance of public charity; that at the election at Cambridge it was shameful to see a hundred or more young students, encouraged in hollowing like school boys and porters, and crying, No Fanatic, No Occasional Conformity, against two worthy gentlemen that stood candidates. Then he complained of the undutifulness of the clergy to their bishops, and the difficulty they had to govern them regularly.

The Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry (Dr. Hough),* made the same complaint. He spoke in 1679 dean of Peterborough. During the reign of James 2, he shewed himself an active advocate for the protestant cause, and though flattered and courted by the king, was steady and sincere in his principles. At the Revolution his abilities were employed in settling the affairs of the church, and in reviewing the liturgy. In 1689 he was made bishop of Chichester, two years after translated to Ely, where he died 31st of May, 1707, aged 80. This worthy prelate, so highly commended by Burnet, wrote Sermons—Tracts against Popery—Commentaries on the Scriptures, 3 vols. folio, which with Lowth on the prophets, Arnold on the apocrypha, and Whitby on the new testament, contain a regularly continued commentary on the bible. Lempriere.

* "John Hough, bishop of Worcester, is celebrated for his opposition when president of Magdalen college, Oxford, to the arbitrary proceedings of James 2. He was born in Middlesex 1650, and after receiving his education at Birmingham, entered at Magdalen college, 1669, where he became fellow. At the breaking of the Popish Plot, he was improperly suspected, and his papers were examined, but he did not lose his popularity, and he attended his patron the duke of Ormond to Ireland, and at his return 1685, he obtained a prebend at Worcester. In 1687 he was elected president of his college by the fellows, who thus rejected the arbitrary mandamus of James in favour of Anthony Farmer, but he was soon after expelled by the king's commissioners, and Parker bishop of Oxford placed in his room. During this struggle with a court and with a popish party, Hough behaved with great spirit but becoming moderation and dignity, and at the approach of William of Orange, the college was restored to its rights, and the president to his office. In 1690 William nominated this faithful champion of protestantism to the see of Oxford, and in 1699 he was translated to Litchfield. On Tenison's death he through modesty declined the primacy, but two years after, 1717, accepted the see of Worcester, where he continued upwards of 26 years. He was a liberal benefactor, and repaired with becoming magnificence the palaces of the sees to which he was promoted, at the expence, it is of the opprobrious names the clergy gave their bishops, and the calumnies they laid on them, as if they were in a plot to destroy the church, and had compounded to be the last of their order, and when the plot was ripe, to resign their bishoprics, and accept a pension for life. He alleged, that the church was as well governed as it had at any time been; challenged any body to charge the bishops with any omission of their duty, or any action wherein they strained or injured any body. Then he spoke of the honour he had to suffer in a good cause, and thought that might have protected his reputation from the calumny of being an enemy to the church.

The Bishop of Bath and Wells (Dr. Hooper),*

said, of no less than 7,000*l.* This worthy, and venerable, prelate died 8th March 1743, in his 93d year, and the 53d of his episcopate." Lempriere.

"This intrepid and excellent prelate, thus addressed the commissioners whom king James the second sent to Magdalen college, Oxon, to impose a catholic fellow upon that learned and venerable society: 'My lords, you say your commission gives you authority to change and alter our statutes, and to make new ones, as you think fit: now, my lords, we have taken an oath, not only to observe our statutes (laying his hand upon the book of the statutes of the college), but to admit of no new ones, or alterations in these. This must be my behaviour here: I must admit of no alteration from them, and by the grace of God I never will.' The bishop was as amiable and excellent in private as he was upright and spirited in public life: His servant having one day let fall a very fine barometer belonging to him, which he had caused to be brought into his drawing-room to shew to his company, the glass broke and the quicksilver flew about the floor; the bishop, turning round to his guests, said with a smile, 'I protest I never saw the quicksilver so low in all my life.'" Seward's Anecdotes, vol. 2, p. 320.

* "George Hooper was born at Grimley, Worcestershire, about 1640, and educated at Westminster school, from whence he went to Christ-church as student, 1656. Highly distinguished as a scholar, he, in 1672, was made chaplain to Morley, bishop of Winchester, and soon after to Sheldon, the primate, who gave him the rectory of Lambeth, and the precentorship of Exeter. In 1677 he became D. D. and the same year was made almoner to the princess of Orange, whom he attended in Holland. He refused in 1680 the divinity professorship at Oxford, and in 1691 was made dean of Canterbury. In 1701 he was offered the primacy of Ireland by lord Rochester, the viceroy; and soon after Anne's accession, he was nominated bishop of St. Asaph, and half a year after, removed to Bath and Wells, where he continued to preside for 24 years. He died at Barkley, Somersetshire, 1727, and was buried in the cathedral of Wells. Besides three sermons, he also spoke, and complained of the terms of the High-church and the Low-church; that it was an invidious distinction, tending to set us at enmity, that by high church people were made to believe a man inclined to popery, or, at least, one that endeavoured to carry church-power beyond our constitution, which he thought was great injustice, the gentlemen that bore that character meaning nothing more, than to keep up the just dignity and discipline of the church. Neither did he believe, that the others called low-church, had any designs of lowering or levelling it with Presbytery, as was on the other hand maliciously suggested.

The Duke of Leeds* stood up, and said, he apprehended the church was in danger, and could published various tracts on theological and other subjects,—a Latin tract on divorce—an Inquiry into the state of the ancient measures, the Attic, Roman, and especially the Jewish, with an appendix concerning our old English money and measures of content, 1731. A beautiful edition of his works appeared at Oxford in 1757, folio." Lempriere.

* "Thomas Osborne, first duke of Leeds, was great grandson to Edward Osborne, who in the reign of Henry the 8th was put apprentice to sir William Hewet, a merchant of considerable eminence, then residing on London bridge. It happened that his master's only daughter fell from the arms of her maid into the Thames, and must inevitably have perished, had it not been for the heroism of young Osborne, who plunged into the river and brought her safe to shore. As a recompence for this act of magnanimity, sir William bestowed on the courageous youth his daughter and his fortune; which procured him the civic honours of sheriff in 1575, and lord mayor in 1582; when he was knighted at Westminster. He served in parliament for the city of London in 1585, and died in 1591. This anecdote, though irregular in point of time, can hardly be thought irrelevant to the present publication; since it forms the basis of a column to what Mr. Burke has happily termed 'the Corinthian capital of polished society.'

"Sir Thomas Osborne, from adhering to the royal interest, and co-operating with others to restore Charles the second, was by that king made treasurer of the navy 1671, lord high treasurer of England 1673, baron of Kiseton and viscount Latimer 1673, viscount Dumblain and earl of Danby 1674, and a knight of the garter 1677. On the accession of king William the third he was constituted president of the council, and lord lieutenant of the West-riding of Yorkshire. In 1680 he was advanced to the title of marquis of Carmarthen; and in 1694 was created duke of Leeds. In 1695 he was impeached by the House of Commons for receiving money for promoting the charters of the East India Company; but the parliament being prorogued by king William, a few days afterward, there was no prosecution carried on against him. In the reign of queen Anne he not be safe without the act against Occasional Conformity, and that the queen had, in discourse with him, declared herself of that opinion.

The Lord Somers* recapitulated all the arguments on both sides, added his own judgment, distinguished himself at the trial of Dr. Sacheverell; and on that occasion, spoke with great freedom concerning the Revolution, which he had signally assisted in bringing about. He died in 1712, at the age of eighty." Lord Orford's Noble Authors, Park's edit. vol. 4, p. 46.

* To the short account of Lord Somers, which will be found in vol. 5, p. 42, it may not be unacceptable to the reader to add the character of this great man, as drawn by Mr. Addison and also by Dr. Swift :

Prodesse quàm Conspici. Lord Somers's motto.

"Useful rather than conspicuous."

"It often happens, that extirpating the love of glory, which is observed to take the deepest root in noble minds, tears up several virtues with it, and that suppressing the desire of fame is apt to reduce men to a state of indolence and supineness. But when, without any incentive of vanity, a person of great abilities is zealous for the good of mankind; and as solicitous for the concealment, as the performance of illustrious actions: we may be sure, that he has something more than ordinary in his composition, and has a heart filled with goodness and magnanimity.

"There is not perhaps, in all history, a greater instance of this temper of mind, than what appeared in that excellent person, whose motto I have placed at the head of this paper. He had worn himself out in his application to such studies as made him useful or ornamental to the world, in concerting schemes for the welfare of his country, and in prosecuting such measures as were necessary for making those schemes effectual: but all this was done with a view to the public good that should rise out of these generous endeavours, and not to the fame which should accrue to himself. Let the reputation of the action fall where it would; so his country reaped the benefit of it, he was satisfied. As this turn of mind threw off in a great measure the oppositions of envy and competition, it enabled him to gain the most vain and impracticable into his designs, and to bring about several great events for the safety and advantage of the public, which must have died in their birth, had he been as desirous of appearing beneficial to mankind, as of being so.

"As he was admitted into the secret and most retired thoughts and counsels of his royal master king William, a great share in the plan of the Protestant succession is universally ascribed to him. And if he did not entirely project the Union of the two kingdoms, and the Bill of Regency, which seem to have been the only methods in human policy for securing to us so incalculable a blessing, there is and ended with a declaration, that the nation was happy under a most wise and just administration, wherein the public money was justly applied, the treasury kept in a most regular method, and thereby the public credit in the highest esteem, the armies and fleets were none who will deny him to have been the chief conductor in both these glorious works. For posterity are obliged to allow him that praise after his death, which he industriously declined while he was living. His life indeed seems to have been prolonged beyond its natural term, under those indispositions which hung upon the latter part of it, that he might have the satisfaction of seeing the happy settlement take place, which he had proposed to himself as the principal end of all his public labours. Nor was it a small addition to his happiness, that by this means he saw those who had been always his most intimate friends, and who had concerted with him such measures for the guaranty of the Protestant succession, as drew upon them the displeasure of men who were averse to it, advanced to the highest posts of trust and honour under his present majesty. I believe there are none of these patriots, who will think it a derogation from their merit to have it said, that they received many lights and advantages from their intimacy with my lord Somers: who had such a general knowledge of affairs, and so tender a concern for his friends, that, whatever station they were in, they usually applied to him for his advice in every perplexity of business, and in affairs of the greatest difficulty.

"His life was, in every part of it, set off with that graceful modesty and reserve, which made his virtues more beautiful, the more they were cast in such agreeable shades.

"His religion was sincere, not ostentatious; and such as inspired him with an universal benevolence towards all his fellow-subjects, not with bitterness against any part of them. He shewed his firm adherence to it as modelled by our national constitution, and was constant to its offices of devotion, both in public and in his family. He appeared a champion for it with great reputation, in the cause of the seven bishops, at a time when the Church was really in danger. To which we may add, that he held a strict friendship and correspondence with the great archbishop Tillotson, being acted by the same spirit of candour and moderation; and moved rather with pity than indignation towards the persons of those, who differed from him in the unessential parts of Christianity.

"His great humanity appeared in the minutest circumstances of his conversation. You found it in the benevolence of his aspect, the complacency of his behaviour, and the tone of his voice. His great application to the severest studies of the law had not infected his temper with any thing positive or litigious. He did not know what it was to wrangle on indifferent points, to triumph in the superiority of his un-

understanding, or to be supercilious on the side of truth. He joined the greatest delicacy of good breeding to the greatest strength of reason. By approving the sentiments of a person, with whom he conversed, in such particulars as were just, he won him over from those points in which he was mistaken; and had so agreeable a way of conveying knowledge, that whoever conferred with him grew the wiser, without perceiving that he had been instructed. We may probably ascribe to this masterly and engaging manner of conversation, the great esteem which he had gained with the late queen, while she pursued those measures which had carried the British nation to the highest pitch of glory; notwithstanding she had entertained many unreasonable prejudices against him, before she was acquainted with his personal worth and behaviour.

"As in his political capacity we have before seen how much he contributed to the establishment of the Protestant interest, and the good of his native country, he was always true to these great ends. His character was uniform and consistent with itself, and his whole conduct of a piece. His principles were founded in reason, and supported by virtue; and therefore did not lie at the mercy of ambition, avarice, or resentment. His notions were no less steady and unshaken, than just and upright. In a word, he concluded his course among the same well-chosen friendships and alliances, with which he began it.

"This great man was not more conspicuous as a patriot and a statesman, than as a person of universal knowledge and learning. As by dividing his time between the public scenes of business, and the private retirements of life, he took care to keep up both the great and good man; so by the same means he accomplished himself not only in the knowledge of men and things, but in the skill of the most refined arts and sciences. That unwearied diligence, which followed him through all the stages of his life, gave him such a thorough insight into the laws of the land, that he passed for one of the greatest masters of his profession, at his first appearance in it. Though he made a regular progress through the several honours of the Long Robe, he was always looked upon as one who deserved a superior station to that he was possessed of; until he arrived at the highest dignity to which those studies could advance him.

"He enjoyed in the highest perfection two talents, which do not often meet in the same person, the greatest strength of good sense, and the most exquisite taste of politeness. Without the first, learning is but an incumbrance; and without the last, is ungraceful. My lord Somers was master of these two qualifications in so eminent a degree, that all the parts of knowledge appeared in him with such an additional strength and beauty, as they want than had been known, and that we had a fair prospect of bringing the war to a happy con-in the possession of others. If he delivered his opinion of a piece of poetry, a statue, or a picture, there was something so just and delicate in his observations, as naturally produced pleasure and assent in those who heard him.

"His solidity and elegance, improved by the reading of the finest authors both of the learned and modern languages, discovered itself in all his productions. His oratory was masculine and persuasive, free from every thing trivial and affected. His stile in writing was chaste and pure, but at the same time full of spirit and politeness; and fit to convey the most intricate business to the understanding of the reader, with the utmost clearness and perspicuity. And here it is to be lamented, that this extraordinary person, out of his natural aversion to vain glory, wrote several pieces as well as performed several actions, which he did not assume the honour of: though at the same time so many works of this nature have appeared, which every one has ascribed to him, that I believe no author of the greatest eminence would deny my lord Somers to have been the best writer of the age in which he lived.

"This noble lord, for the great extent of his knowledge and capacity, has been often compared with the lord Verulam, who had also been chancellor of England. But the conduct of these extraordinary persons, under the same circumstances, was vastly different. They were both impeached by a House of Commons. One of them, as he had given just occasion for it, sunk under it; and was reduced to such an abject submission, as very much diminished the lustre of so exalted a character; but my lord Somers was too well fortified in his integrity to fear the impotence of an attempt upon his reputation; and though his accusers would gladly have dropped their impeachment, he was instant with them for the prosecution of it, and would not let that matter rest until it was brought to an issue. For the same virtue and greatness of mind, which gave him a disregard of fame, made him impatient of an undeserved reproach.

"There is no question but this wonderful man will make one of the most distinguished figures in the history of the present age; but we cannot expect that his merit will shine out in its proper light, since he wrote many things which are not published in his name; was at the bottom of many excellent counsels, in which he did not appear; did offices of friendship to many persons, who knew not from whom they were derived; and performed great services to his country, the glory of which was transferred to others: in short, since he made it his endeavour rather to do worthy actions than to gain an illustrious character." Addison's Freeholder, No. 39.

"The lord Somers," says Swift, in his History of the four last years of Queen Anne, "may very deservedly be reputed the head clusion, to the immortal honour of the age, and the inexpressible benefit and safety of and oracle of the discontented party: he hath raised himself, by the concurrence of many circumstances, to the greatest employments of the state, without the least support from birth or fortune: he hath constantly, and with great steadiness, cultivated those principles under which he grew. That accident which first produced him into the world, of pleading for the bishops, whom king James had sent to the Tower, might have proved a piece of merit as honourable as it was fortunate; but the old republican spirit, which the Revolution had restored, began to teach other lessons; that since we had accepted a new king from a calvinistic commonwealth, we must also admit new maxims in religion and government: but since the nobility and gentry would probably adhere to the established church, and to the rights of monarchy as delivered down from their ancestors; it was the practice of those politicians to introduce such men as were perfectly indifferent to any or no religion, and who were not likely to inherit much loyalty from those to whom they owed their birth. Of this number was the person I am now describing. I have hardly known any man with talents more proper to acquire and preserve the favour of a prince, never offending in word or gesture, which are in the highest degree courteous and complaisant, wherein he set an excellent example to his colleagues, which they did not think fit to follow; but this extreme civility is universal and undistinguished, and in private conversation, where he observeth it as inviolably as if he were in the greatest assembly, it is sometimes censured as formal; two reasons are assigned for this behaviour; first, from the consciousness of his humble original, he keepeth all familiarity at the utmost distance, which otherwise might be apt to intrude; the second that being sensible how subject he is to violent passions, he avoideth all incitements to them, by teaching those he converses with, from his own example, to keep a great way within the bounds of decency and respect; and it is, indeed, true, that no man is more apt to take fire upon the least appearance of provocation, which temper he strives to subdue with the utmost violence upon himself: so that his breast has been seen to heave, and his eyes to sparkle with rage in those very moments, when his words, and the cadence of his voice, were in the humblest and softest manner; perhaps that force upon his nature, may cause that insatiable love of revenge, which his detractors lay to his charge, who consequently reckon dissimulation among his chief perfections. Avarice he hath none; and his ambition is gratified, by being the uncontested head of his party: With an excellent understanding, adorned by all the polite parts of learning, he hath very little taste for conversation, to which he prefers the pleasure of reading and thinking: and in the intervals of his posterity: Wherefore for men to raise groundless jealousies 'at this time of day, it could time amuseth himself with an illiterate chaplain, an humble companion, or a favourite servant.—These are some few distinguishing marks in the character of that person who now presideth over the discontented party; although he be not answerable for all their mistakes; and if his precepts had been more strictly followed, perhaps their power would not have been so easily shaken. I have been assured, and heard him profess, that he was against engaging in that foolish prosecution of Dr. Sacheverel, as what he foresaw was likely to end in their ruin; that he blamed the rough demeanor of some persons to the queen, as a great failure in prudence; and that when it appeared, her majesty was firmly resolved upon a treaty of peace, he advised his friends not to oppose it in its progress, but find fault with it after it was made, which would be a copy of the like usage themselves had met with after the treaty of Ryawick; and the safest, as well as the most probable way of disgracing the promoters and advisers. I have been the larger in representing to the reader some ideas of this extraordinary genius, because whatever attempt hath hitherto been made with any appearance of conduct, or probability of success, to restore the dominion of that party, was infallibly contrived by him; and I prophesy the same for the future as long as his age and infirmities will leave him capable of business."

"The following Anecdotes of Lord Somers were copied many years ago from a manuscript in the possession of the late Dr. Birch.

"April 26, 1716, died John Lord Somers. Burnet hath done him justice in several places, and Addison has given us his character in colours so strong, that little remaineth to be added.

"His application and capacity were equally great and uncommon. At his first going to school, he never gave himself any of the diversions of children of his age; for at noon the book was never out of his hand. To the last years of his life a few hours of sleep sufficed: at waking, a reader attended, and entertained him with the most valuable authors. Such management raised him to the highest eminency in his own profession, and gave him a superiority in all kind of useful knowledge and learning.

"Natural strength and clearness of understanding thus improved, was the distinguishing peculiarity, which appeared in all his performances. Every thing was easy and correct, pure and proper. He was unwearied in the application of all his abilities for the service of his country. As a writer, he greatly assisted the cause of liberty in the days of its utmost peril. As an advocate, a judge, a senator, and a minister, the highest praises and the most grateful remembrance are due to his merit.

"He was invariable and uniform in the pur-mean no less, than an intention to embroil us at home, and to defeat all those glorious designs abroad.

The Church voted not to be in Danger.] The 'suit of right paths. As he well understood, he was equally firm in adhering to the interest of his country while in its service, and when in a private station. To this uniformity the calumnies and reproaches of his enemies may be truly ascribed. They envied him his superiority; and as their wishes and designs were far from being engaged for the real welfare of society, a man so upright and able naturally became the object of their hatred; and they had too easy and too much credit. What greater misfortune can be entailed on popular government, than forwardness in receiving all the impressions of malevolence!

"When I had finished my letter, it came into my mind to add Somers's character, which was uniform, to Shrewsbury, which was all deformity.

"I have been so very short, not only for the reasons prefixed, but in expectation of your having additions from your truly worthy friend Mr. Yorke. The account of his behaviour at school I had many years ago from a school-fellow. I think Walsall in Staffordshire was the place where they learned their grammar together. I remember very well his account of Johnny Somers being a weakly boy, wearing a black cap, and never so much as looking on when they were at play, &c.

"Mr. Winington's account is, that by the exactness of his knowledge and behaviour he discouraged his father and all the young men who knew him. They were afraid to be in his company."

"Towards the close of Lord Somers's Treatise on the Succession, there is this very remarkable passage: 'I will not (though I safely might) challenge these men to tell me wherever any settled nation, which had laws of their own, and were not under the immediate force of a Conqueror, did ever admit of a king of another religion than their own. I will not insist on it, that the crown is not a bare inheritance, but an inheritance accompanying an office of trust, and that if a man's defects render him incapable of that trust, he has also forfeited the inheritance.' In another place of this golden Treatise he says, 'I need not say how far a nation is to be excused for executing justice summarily, and without the tedious formalities of law, when the necessity of things requires haste, and the party flies from justice, and the confederates are numerous and daring, and the prince's life in danger.'

"A pretender to literature having owned a copy of verses which Lord Somers wrote, was asked by his lordship, when he was presented to him as Lord Chancellor, whether he was really the author of the lines in question. 'Yes, my Lord,' replied the pretended Poet, 'it is a trifle, I did it off-hand.' On hearing this, Lord Somers burst out into a loud fit of debate* at length being over, the question was put, Whether the Church of England was in danger, or not? And upon a division, it was carried in the negative: Noes 61, Yeas 30, laughter, and the gentleman withdrew in the greatest confusion.

"The king, (George the first,) says Lord Bolingbroke in a manuscript letter, 'set out from Hanover in the resolution of taking the Whigs indeed into favour; but of oppressing no set of men who acknowledged the government, and submitted quietly to it. As soon as he came to Holland, a contrary resolution was taken by the joint importunity of the allies and of some of the Whigs.

"Lord Townshend came triumphantly to acquaint lord Somers with all the measures of proscription and of persecution which they intended, and to which the king had at last consented. The old Peer asked him what he meant, and shed tears on the foresight of measures like to those of the Roman Triumvirate." Seward's Anecdotes.

* Bishop Burnet gives us the substance of the Debate in the following manner: "On the day appointed we were all made believe, that we should hear many frightful things: but our expectations were not answered: some spoke of danger from the presbytery, that was settled in Scotland; some spoke of the absence of the next successor: some reflected on the Occasional bill, that was rejected in that house: some complained of the schools of the Dissenters: and others reflected on the principles that many had drank in, that were different from those formerly received, and that seemed destructive of the church.

"In opposition to all this, it was said, that the church was safer now than ever it had been: at the Revolution, provision was made, that our king must be of the reformed religion, nor was this all; in the late Act of Succession it was enacted, that he should be of the communion of the church of England: it was reasonable to object to the House the rejecting a bill, which was done by the majority, of whom it became not the lesser number to complain: we had all our former laws left to us, not only intire, but fortified by late additions and explanations; so that we were safer in all these, than we had been at any time formerly: the Dissenters gained no new strength, they were visibly decreasing: the toleration had softened their tempers, and they concurred zealously in serving all the ends of the government; nor was there any particular complaint brought against them; they seemed quiet and content with their toleration, if they could be but secure of enjoying it: the queen was taking the most effectual means possible to deliver the clergy from the depressions of poverty, that brought them under much contempt and denied them the necessary means and help of study: the bishops looked after their dioceses with a care, that had not been known in the memory of man: great sums were yearly raised, by their

the queen present. Next day the Lords sent a Message to the Commons, to acquaint them with their proceedings touching the Church, and desiring their concurrence to the following resolve, viz. "Resolved by the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in parliament assembled, that the Church of England, as by law established, which was rescued from the uttermost danger by king William 3, of glorious memory, is now, by God's blessing, under the happy reign of her majesty, in a most safe and flourishing condition, and whatsoever goes about to suggest and insinuate, that the church is in danger under her majesty's administration, is an enemy to the queen, the church and the kingdom."

Protest thereon.] This Resolution being carried in the House of Lords, as aforesaid, by so great a majority, the opposite side, however, entered the following Reasons for dissenting.

"Dissentient. 1st. Because we humbly conceive, there may be dangers to the church always impending on several accounts, the prayers set forth to be used on the solemn feast-days, under the head of a prayer for unity, imploring God Almighty's grace, that every body may seriously lay to heart the great dangers we are in by our unhappy divisions, shew plainly, that, in the opinion of the compilers of this form of that prayer, and in her majesty's judgment, who commands it to be used in all the churches and chapels throughout England and Wales, there are very many dangers.

"2. We humbly conceive the Church to be in danger from a neighbouring kingdom, which though under her majesty's sovereignty, during her life (which God long preserve) hath not, by any means, yet been induced, to settle the same Succession to the crown, as is established by law in this kingdom, in the Protestant line; but, on the contrary, that Succession has been abrogated by the Act of Security, which, with several other acts, passed in that kingdom, has been judged by this House, in the last parliament, to be dangerous to the present and future peace of this kingdom; and therefore we may justly fear there are dangers from hence, both to Church and State.

"3. We humbly conceive, there may be very great dangers to the Church, for want of care and zeal, for serving the plantations better than had ever yet been done: a spirit of zeal and piety appeared in our churches, and at sacrament, beyond the example of former times. In one respect it was acknowledged the church was in danger; there was an evil spirit and a violent temper spread among the clergy; there were many indecent sermons preached on public occasions, and these hot clergymen, who were not the most regular in their lives, had raised factions in many dioceses against their bishops: these were dangers created by those very men, who filled the nation with this outcry against imaginary ones, while their own conduct produced real and threatening dangers."

a law to prevent any person whatsoever from holding offices of trust and authority, both in Church and State, who are not constantly of the communion of the church established by law; and therefore, on the account of the unhappy divisions in the kingdom in points of Religion and divine worship, as also, on the account of the calamities of this age, in the too public and common disowning any religion at all, the church may be in danger.

"4. Though we have an entire confidence in her majesty's zeal and piety to the church, we dare not, in duty to her majesty and the service of the government, condemn all such as may have fears, in relation to the preservation of the church, and safety of the crown.

"5. Being sincerely convinced that these reasons, among some others mentioned in the debate, are sufficient to justify our fears, we humbly conceive, that it is not a proper way to prevent dangers, by voting there are none.

"I dissent for the first, second, and fourth reasons, Havershham."

The Archbishop of York, and bishop of Rochester, protested afterwards.

The Commons concur with the Lords therein.

Dec. 7. The Lords sent a message to the Commons, to acquaint them with their proceedings, and to desire their concurrence to their Resolution in relation to the church. Whereupon the question was put the day following, Whether they should consider of that message in a committee, or in a full house? It being carried for the latter by a majority of 222 voices against 161.

Mr. Bromley opened the debate with a speech wherein he endeavoured to prove the church to be in danger by the same arguments, that had been insisted on in the House of Peers, such as, the power of the presbyterians in Scotland, where the church of England was not so much as tolerated: the absence of the next Protestant successor, in case of the queen's demise: the want of an act against occasional conformity: the increase of presbyterian schools and seminaries: profaneness, immorality, and irreligion: and the Act of Security passed in Scotland; to which he added another, viz. the abuse and ill dispensation of her majesty's late bounty to the clergy.

Sir John Packington, who spoke on the same side, urged the licentiousness of the press and the great number of libels, which were daily published against the church; the increase of presbyterian conventicles; and the Lords' Resolution itself, which was the subject matter of their debate, as proofs of the church's being in danger; adding, That, if the Commons agreed to that resolve, the same would in some measure, have the force of an act of parliament, which would be a dangerous weapon in the hands of ill ministers of state, who thereby might awe people into silence, in case the faculty should take them to suppress episcopacy.

The opposite party answered these arguments, and, after a long debate, the Lords Resolution was agreed to by a majority of 212 against 160.

Address of both Houses concerning the Reports of the Church of England being in Danger.] Dec. 19. Both Houses agreed upon the following Address to her majesty:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in parliament assembled, having taken into consideration your majesty's most gracious speech at the opening of this parliament, have, upon mature deliberation, come to the following Resolutions:

'Resolved, by the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in parliament assembled, That the Church of England as by law established, which was rescued from the extreme danger by king William the Third, of glorious memory, is now, by God's blessing, under the happy reign of her majesty, in a most safe and flourishing condition; and that whoever goes about to suggest and insinuate, that the Church is in Danger, under her majesty's administration, is an enemy to the queen, the Church, and the kingdom.'

"Which we humbly beg leave to lay before your majesty: And, as your majesty has been pleased to express a just indignation against all such wicked persons; so we assure your majesty, that we shall be always ready, to the utmost of our power, to assist your majesty in discountenancing and defeating their practices: And we humbly beseech your majesty to take effectual measures for the making the said Resolution public; and also for punishing the authors and spreaders of these seditious and scandalous reports, to the end that all others may, for the future, be deterred from endeavouring to distract the kingdom with such unreasonableness and groundless distrusts and jealousies."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty gave this Answer:

"My lords and gentlemen; I shall readily comply with your Address; and am very well pleased to find both Houses of Parliament so forward to join with me in putting a stop to these malicious reports."

Mr. Caesar committed for offensive Words.] This day, an engrossed Bill from the Lords, entitled, 'An Act for the better Security of her majesty's person and government, and of the succession to the crown of England in the protestant line,' was read a second time, and Charles Caesar, esq. upon the debate of the said Bill, standing up in his place, and saying the words following, (which were directed by the House to be set down in writing at the table) 'There is a noble Lord, without whose advice the queen does nothing, who, in the late reign, was known to keep a constant correspondence 'with the Court at St. Germain's.' And then said Mr. Caesar endeavouring to excuse himself, and being called upon to withdraw, and he being withdrawn accordingly, and a debate arising thereupon; the House resolved, "That the said words are highly dishonourable to her majesty's person and government. And, That the said Charles Caesar, esq. should for his said offence be committed prisoner to the Tower."

The Queen's Proclamation concerning the Reports of the Church being in Danger.] Dec. 20th. The following Proclamation was published:

"ANNE B.

"Whereas of late several persons, endeavouring to foment animosities, and to cover designs which they dare not publicly own, have falsely, seditiously, and maliciously suggested, the Church of England, as by law established, to be in danger, at this time, whereof we thought fit to take notice in our speech made at the opening of this Parliament: and whereas the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in parliament assembled, have by their humble Address represented to us, that, having taken into consideration our said most gracious speech, they had, upon mature deliberation, come to a Resolution, which they laid before us, assuring us, that, as we had been pleased to express a just indignation against all such wicked persons, they will, be always ready, to the utmost of their power, to assist us in discountenancing and defeating their practices, humbly beseeching us to take effectual measures for the making the said Resolution public, and also for punishing the authors and spreaders of these seditious and scandalous reports, to the end that all others may, for the future, be deterred from endeavouring to distract the kingdom, with such unreasonableness and groundless distrusts and jealousies: We, therefore, at the said humble request of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in parliament assembled, do by this our royal Proclamation, make public the said Resolution, which follows in these words:

'Resolved, by the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in parliament assembled, That the Church of England, as by law established, which was rescued from the extreme danger by king William 3, of glorious memory, is now, by God's blessing, under the happy reign of her majesty, in a most safe and flourishing condition; and that whosoever goes about to suggest and insinuate, that the church is in danger under her majesty's administration, is an enemy to the queen, the Church, and kingdom.'

"And we do hereby, by the advice of our privy-council, declare, that we will proceed with the utmost severity the law shall allow of, against the authors or spreaders of the said seditious and scandalous reports. And we do hereby strictly charge and command all and singular our judges, justices of the peace, sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, and all other our ministers whatsoever to take effectual care for the speedy apprehension, prosecution and punish ment of all such persons, who have or shall at any time hereafter offend herein. And we do hereby further require and command all our loving subjects whatsoever, to discover and apprehend all and every person and persons whatsoever offending, as aforesaid, to the end they may be dealt with and proceeded against according to law. And whereas the said seditious and scandalous reports have been greatly promoted and spread, by the printing and publishing of a malicious and seditious libel, entitled, The Memorial of the Church of England, humbly offered to the consideration of all true lovers of our church and constitution: And whereas David Edwards, of the parish of St. Dunstan's in the west, London, printer, is charged on oath to be the printer and publisher of the said libel, and is now under prosecution for the same, and on that account absconds from justice, and the author or authors of the said libel is or are not discovered, we do hereby further require and command all our loving subjects whatsoever, to discover and apprehend the said David Edwards, and the author or authors of the said libel, to the end they may be dealt withal, and proceeded against according to law, &c.?"

The Queen's Speech at the Adjournment. Dec. 21. The queen came to the House of Peers, and after passing several Bills, made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords, and Gentlemen; The unanimity of your proceedings in this parliament has already had so good an effect all over Europe, that I cannot but take notice of it to you with great satisfaction.—The good disposition you have shewn in doing your part so fully towards an Union with Scotland, is also very acceptable to me; and, I hope, it will prove for the advantage and quiet of both kingdoms.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; I must not omit to take this occasion of returning you my hearty thanks, for the great dispatch of this seasonable supply which you have given me: I look upon it as a sure pledge, that the same zeal and affection for my service, and the good of the kingdom, will carry you through all the necessary parts of the public business in this session.

"My Lords and Gentlemen; In case you now think of some recess, as is usual at this season; I make no doubt, you will afterwards return with the same good disposition to give all possible dispatch to the public affairs still depending, and bring this session of parliament to a happy conclusion."

Both Houses then adjourned; the Commons to the 7th, the Lords to the 8th of January.

The Commons give the Duke of Marlborough Thanks. Jan. 7, 1706. The Commons resolved, "That the Thanks of their House should be given to his Grace the Duke of Marlborough, for his great services performed to her majesty, and the nation, in the last campaign, and for his prudent negotiations with her majesty's allies," and appointed a Committee for that purpose: Who having attended his Grace, his Grace said, "He was so sensible of the great honour that was done him by this message, that he could not have the least concern at the reflections of any private malice, while he had the satisfaction of finding his faithful endeavours to serve the queen, and the kingdom, so favourably accepted by the House of Commons."

The Queen's Message to the Commons about the Authors of the Memorial. Jan. 21. Mr. Secretary Harley acquainted the House, "That her majesty, in pursuance of the Address of both Houses, put out a Proclamation, in which was an encouragement for discovery of the Author or Authors of 'the Memorial of the Church of England,' &c. the printer* of which Book, being now in custody, and other persons being examined, in whose depositions there appeared the names of some members of this House: her majesty's tenderness for any thing which had the appearance of the privileges of this House, had inclined her to command him to acquaint the House therewith, before she directed any further proceedings in the said examination." Thereupon, the Commons ordered the Serjeant to go with the mace into Westminster-Hall, the Court of Requests, and places adjacent, and summon the members there to attend the service of the House. And the Serjeant being returned, the House resolved, "That an humble Address should be presented to her majesty, returning the thanks of the House, for her gracious message that day, and her tender regard to the privileges of that House; and to desire, that she would be pleased to give order for a further examination into the Authors of the libel mentioned in the said message."

Which Address being presented accordingly,

* Jan. 15. David Edwards, printer of the Memorial, who had a long time absconded, and was left without any support by that party that had employed him, was, by his own consent, taken into custody of a Messenger, upon a promise in writing, from Mr. Secretary Harley, That he should have his Pardon, provided he discovered the Author or Authors of that Pamphlet. Three days after, being examined before the same Secretary, he pretended he could fix it upon three gentlemen, members of the House of Commons, viz. Mr. Poley, Mr. Ward, and sir Humphrey Mackworth; and related, That a woman in a mask, with another barefaced, brought the Manuscript to him, and made a bargain with him to have 250 printed copies for it; which he delivered to four porters sent to him by the persons concerned. But though the woman that came to Edwards without a mask, and some of the porters, were found out and taken up, yet it was impossible to carry on the discovery any farther. Which gave occasion to a member of the House of Commons (Mr. Poley) to say, "That it was not usual to accuse members of their House, of being concerned in any thing to the prejudice of the government, without naming their names." Tindal.

her majesty was pleased to answer, "That she was glad to find this House express so much resentment against the libel mentioned in her message, and took very kindly the confidence this House reposed in her, which she would make the best use of, for the advantage of the public."

The Queen's Speech on passing the Money Bills.] Feb. 16. The Queen, after passing several Bills, made this Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I cannot but take this occasion to return you my hearty thanks, for the great care and concern you have shewn to promote every thing in this session, that may tend to the public good.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; I must thank you in particular for your having so fully complied with your assurances to me, at the opening of this parliament, that you would give all possible dispatch to the public Supplies. There is scarce any instance to be given, where so great, and I hope, effectual supplies, have been perfected in so short a time.—I look upon this to proceed not only from your great zeal for the public service, but from a just impression upon your own minds, that there is a necessity of making extraordinary efforts, to support and encourage our allies, and to be early in endeavouring to disappoint the designs of our enemies.

"My Lords and Gentlemen; It will be convenient to make a recess in some short time, I hope therefore you will continue to give all necessary dispatch to what may yet remain unfinished of the public business before you."

The public Revenues voted to have been duly applied.] Feb. 21. The House of Commons proceeded to take into further consideration the Accounts of the Revenues and Debts ever since her majesty's happy accession to the crown; and resolved, "That it appeared to the House, That the public Revenues granted, or arisen since her majesty's happy accession to the crown, had been duly applied to the happy uses, under a prudent management, to the advancement of the public credit, and for the advantage and honour of the nation."

* "The House of Commons went on in creating funds for the supplies they had voted for the next year: and the nation was so well satisfied with the government, and the conduct of affairs, that a fund being created for two millions and a half, by way of annuities for 99 years at 6½ per cent. at the end of which the capital was to sink; the whole sum was subscribed, in a very few days: at the same time the duke of Marlborough proposed the advance of a sum of 500,000*l.* to the Emperor, for the use of prince Eugene, and the service of Italy, upon a branch of the emperor's revenue in Silesia, at eight per cent. and the capital to be repaid in eight years: the nation did so abound both in money and zeal, that this was likewise advanced in a very few days: our armies, as well as our allies, were every where punctually paid: the credit of the nation was never raised

A Bill to prevent the Growth of Popery rejected.] Feb. 27. A Petition of the gentry and clergy of the south parts of Lancashire, at their monthly meeting, on the 12th, in the borough of Wigan, for suppressing profaneness and immorality, was presented to the House of Commons, complaining of several grievances they laboured under from the priests, Romish gentry, and popish emissaries, and praying for redress and relief. After the reading of this Petition it was unanimously resolved to address the queen, "That she would be pleased to issue out her royal proclamation for the putting in execution the laws in force against all such persons, as had or should endeavour to pervert her majesty's subjects to the popish religion:" And they ordered, that a Bill be brought in for making more effectual the act of the 11th year of his late majesty's reign, for the further preventing the Growth of Popery. This bill was accordingly presented the next day, by sir James Montague, and read the first time; and, on the 1st of March, the Commons gave it a second reading, and went through it in a grand committee. By the act, passed in the latter end of the late reign, it was provided, "That all papists should, within six months, after they had reached the age of eighteen, take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, or declare themselves protestants; in default whereof, their estates were to go to the next heirs, being Protestants." Now this clause was so lamely expressed, that the Roman Catholics found two ways to evade it. First, there being in all families a gradation of age among the several heirs to the same estates, it happened, that though the person, who was come to the age of eighteen, did not take the oaths prescribed by the law, yet the title of Protestant heir remained undecided, as long as so high in any age, nor so sacredly maintained: the Treasury was as exact and as regular in all payments as any private banker could be. It is true, a great deal of money went out of the kingdom in specie: that which maintained the war in Spain, was to be sent thither in that manner, the way by bills of exchange not being yet opened: our trade with Spain and the West-Indies, which formerly brought us great returns of money, was now stopt: by this means there grew to be a sensible want of money over the nation: this was in a great measure supplied, by the currency of Exchequer bills and Bank-notes: and this lay so obvious to the disaffected party, that they were often attempting to blast, at least to disparage this paper credit: but it was still kept up. It bred a just indignation in all, who had a true love to their country, to see some using all possible methods to shake the administration, which notwithstanding the difficulties at home and abroad, was much the best that had been in the memory of man: and was certainly not only easy to the subjects in general, but gentle even towards those, who were endeavouring to undermine it." Burnet.

any next Popish heir was under age. Secondly, (and this was the main inconvenience) it lying by that clause upon the next heir to him, who at the age of eighteen refused to declare himself a Protestant, to prove that he had not made that declaration, it was impossible for the next heir to prove such a negative. Now, to make that clause binding and effectual, it was enacted in this bill, "That all Papists, and reputed Papists should, within six months after they had reached the age of eighteen, not only declare themselves Protestants, but prove also, that they had made such a declaration." This alarmed all of that religion, so that they made very powerful (or to follow the raillery of that time) weighty intercessions with the considerable men of the House of Commons. The court looked on, and seemed indifferent in the matter; yet it was given out, that so severe a law would be very unreasonable, when the nation was in alliance with so many princes of that religion; and that it must lessen the force of the queen's intercession in favour of the Protestants, who lived in the dominions of those princes. The proceeding seeming rigorous, and not suited to the gentleness which the Christian religion so particularly recommended, and was contrary to the maxims of liberty of conscience and toleration, that were then in great vogue. It was answered that the dependence of those of that religion on a foreign jurisdiction, and at present on a foreign pretender to the crown, put them out of the case of other subjects who might differ from the established religion, since there seemed to be good reason to consider them as enemies rather than as subjects. But the application was made in so effectual a manner, that the bill was let fall; for on the 2d of March when sir James Montague was to report to the House the amendments made to the bill by the grand committee, the duke of Norfolk, the chief among the Roman-catholics in England, petitioned, "That he might be heard by his counsel for explanation of some words in the bill, and for such relief to him, as to the House should seem meet." Upon the reading of this petition, the Commons ordered, that the duke of Norfolk be heard by his counsel, as to the property in the office of earl marshal of England only. But his counsel not being then ready, the House heard sir James Montague's report, and then ordered the bill, with the amendments, to be ingrossed. Two days after, the bill was read the third time, and several other amendments were made to it; after which the question was put, "That the bill do pass?" This occasioned a great debate, wherein colonel Godfrey, Mr. Boscawen, and Mr. Asgill endeavoured to shew the injustice of such a law, urging, that, besides the offence it would give to the Roman-catholic princes in alliance with the nation, it would look as if they approved the persecution exercised by the French king and other Catholic princes against their Protestant subjects. At last the bill was rejected by a majority of 119 against 45.

The Lords' Address against Papists.] And, though the Lords had made some steps towards such a Bill, yet since they saw what fate it was like to have in the House of Commons, instead of proceeding further in it, they dismissed that matter with the following Address to the queen, on the 14th of March:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, do humbly beg leave to acquaint your majesty, That the Lord Bishop of Chester has presented to the House a Petition, for himself and the gentry and clergy of the south parts of Lancashire; complaining of the intolerable boldness and presumption of the Romish priests and papists, in employing all their inveigling arts and devices, in perverting and seducing the gentry and commonalty, and that not only secretly, but openly and publicly, in defiance of the laws; that their priests are numerous, their masses frequent; their people go affectedly in troops; they marry without license, or publication; they visit Protestants, when sick or dying, in order to pervert them; they throw out ill language against the church and government, and spread false reports and scandalous reflections upon the orthodox clergy; and have built a stately edifice, which, as the Petitioners had good reason to believe, is intended for a seminary; and several lands have been settled, for the endowment of that and other places; that the popish gentry are assistant to their priests in their perversions; and, to insinuate themselves into Protestant families, catch at all opportunities to marry amongst them, whereby they have proselyted many of the gentry.

"Such open insolence, shewn by people so obnoxious to the laws, in the midst of a war, in which your majesty is engaged against the French king, the declared protector of one of the popish religion, who openly pretends a title to your majesty's crown, does not only raise in us a just indignation, but makes us think it absolutely necessary, for the safety of your majesty's royal person and government, that a more watchful eye should be had over them for the future; and, for that purpose, that a distinct and particular account should be taken of all papists, and reputed papists, in the kingdom, with their respective qualities, estates, and places of abode.

"We do therefore most humbly beseech your majesty, that you would be graciously pleased to send directions to the several Lords Lieutenants and Custodes Rotulorum of the several counties and places, to cause all the Deputy Lieutenants and Justices of the Peace of the respective counties and places to assemble together, and, being so assembled, there to agree of the most proper manner to sub-divide themselves into several divisions, for the more effectual performing the said service within such subdivisions; and that, at such general meeting, an account be taken distinctly of the names of the several Justices and Deputy Lieutenants designed for the said several sub-divisions; and that the several Justices of Peace and Deputy Lieutenants should, under their several hands, return a particular account, in writing, of what they shall perform in the said several sub-divisions, which the said Lords Lieutenants and Custodes Rotulorum shall return to your majesty in council, together with the names of every one of the Deputy Lieutenants and Justices of Peace who did neglect or refuse to perform their duties in relation to that service.

“And, to the end the said account may be the more exact and useful, we most humbly beseech your majesty to send your royal commands to the archbishops, requiring them to issue orders to all the bishops in their respective provinces, directing them to require the clergy in their several dioceses to take an exact and particular account of the numbers of the papists, and reputed papists, in every parish, with their qualities, estates, and places of abode, and to return the same to their respective dioceses, who shall return the same to their several archbishops, in order to be laid before your majesty.

“And we also desire your majesty will be pleased to direct, that the archbishops do require the bishops, in their several dioceses, to proceed against such of the clergy as shall refuse or neglect to do their duty in respect to the said service, according to the utmost severity of law; and also to return the names of the clergy, who shall be defective in performing the said service, in order that the same may be laid before your majesty.

“And we farther beseech your majesty, to command the archbishops to require the bishops, by all proper ways and means, to inform themselves what advowsons, or rights of presentation, or donation of churches, benefices, or schools, are in the disposition of any papists, or reputed papists, or of any in trust for them; and to return what they shall find, particularly and distinctly, to the archbishops, to the intent the same may be represented to your majesty.—And lastly, we most humbly desire your majesty, that you will be graciously pleased to cause the several accounts of all these inquiries to be laid before this House, at the next session of parliament.”

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty gave this Answer:

“I am fully convinced, that the insolent behaviour of the papists hath made what you advise necessary to be done, for the safety of my person and government, and the welfare of my people.—I thank you for your care in this matter; and will give, as soon as possible, the necessary orders for every thing you desire of me in this Address.”

A Bill to regulate Proceedings at Law.] About this time Lord Somers made a motion in the House of Lords, to correct some of the Proceedings in the Common Law and in Chancery, which were both dilatory and very chargeable. He began the motion with some instances, that were more conspicuous and gross; and he managed the matter so, that both the lord keeper and judges concurred with him, though it passes generally for a maxim, that judges ought rather to enlarge than contract their jurisdiction. A Bill passed the House of Lords, which began a reformation of proceedings at law; but, when it went through the Commons, it was visible, that the interest of under officers, clerks, and attornies, whose gains were to be lessened by this bill, was more considered, than the interest of the nation itself. Several clauses, how beneficial soever to the subject, which touched on their profit, were left out by the Commons. But, what fault soever the Lords might have found with these alterations, yet, to avoid all disputes with the Commons, they agreed to their Amendments.

There was another general complaint made of the private acts of parliament, that passed through both Houses too easily, and in so great a number, that it took up a great part of the session to examine them, even in that cursory way, that was subject to many inconveniencies. The fees, that were paid for these to the speakers and clerks of both Houses, inclined them to favour and promote them. The lord Somers therefore proposed a proper regulation in that matter. The lord keeper Cowper did indeed very generously obstruct those private bills, as much as his predecessor Wright had promoted them. He did another thing of a great example: On the first day of the year, it became a custom for all those, who practised in chancery, to offer a new year's gift to the lord, who had the great seal. These grew to be so considerable, that they amounted to 1,500*l.* a year. On the new year's day of this year, which was his first, he signified to all those, who, according to custom, were expected to come with their presents, that he would receive none, but would break that custom. He thought it looked like the insinuating themselves into the favour of the court; and that, if it was not bribery, yet it came too near it, and looked too like it. This contributed not a little to the raising his character; and he managed the court of chancery with impartial justice and great dispatch, and was very useful to the House of Lords in the promoting of business.

A Bill for the Encouragement of Seamen.] There were also some regulations made this session about Seamen, which were inserted in a Bill for the Encouragement and Increase of Seamen. This bill was brought in, because about 12,000 sailors were wanted at this time to man the fleet, and was perfected and passed both Houses in four days. The Resolutions in the Bill were as follow: 1. “That, in order to the speedy and more compleat manning of her majesty's navy for the year 1706, the justices of the peace and other civil magistrates throughout the several counties, ridings, cities, towns, and places, within the kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, be impowered and directed forthwith to make, or cause to be made, strict and diligent search for all such seamen, or sea-faring men, as lie hid, and are not in her majesty's service. 2. That the justices, and other civil magistrates, do take up, send, conduct, and convoy, or cause to be taken up, sent, conducted, and conveyed, all such seamen or sea-faring men, to be delivered to such persons, as shall be appointed to receive the same. 3. That a penalty be inflicted upon every person, who shall presume to harbour or conceal such seamen or sea-faring men. 4. That a reward be given to every person, who shall discover and take up such seamen or sea-faring men, as aforesaid, the same to be distributed and paid to every such discoverer or person, so taking up such seamen or sea-faring men respectively, out of the money given for the service of the navy. 5. That conduct-money be allowed for conveying and subsisting such seamen and sea-faring men, according to the present usage of the navy. 6. That, for the encouragement of the service, every seaman, who shall be turned over from one ship to another, shall be paid his wages which shall appear to be due to him in the ship, from which he was turned over, before such ship, to which he shall be turned over, go to sea, either in money, or by a ticket, which shall intitle him to an immediate payment. 7. That such able-bodied landmen, who are liable to be raised for the recruiting her majesty's land-forces and marines, be raised for the service, in the like manner, and delivered to such persons, who shall be appointed to receive the same." And they ordered, "That the committee, to whom the Bill for the Encouragement and Increase of Seamen, and for the better and speedier manning her majesty's fleet, and for making provision for the widows and orphans of all such, as shall be slain or drowned in her majesty's service, and for the support of trade, was committed, have power to receive a clause or clauses pursuant to these Resolutions: And that it be an instruction to the committee, that they have power to receive a clause for discharging of such seamen, and other insolvent persons, as are in prison for debt, and delivering them into her majesty's service on board the fleet."

Complaint against Sir Rowland Gwynne's Letter to the Earl of Stamford, for bringing over the Princess Sophia.] March 8. A Complaint was made to the House of Commons of a printed pamphlet entitled, "A Letter from sir Rowland Gwynne to the right honourable the earl of Stamford;" which was read at the table, and some of the most remarkable passages are as follow:

"My lord, I did long since receive the letter your lordship was pleased to honour me with, of the 9th of November; and have hitherto delayed returning any answer to it, that I might with more deliberation tell you my thoughts upon a matter of so great importance.

"I did also expect, that some friends would have discovered to us the wicked designs you suspected to lie hid under the advice to the queen, to invite the electress over into England; and shewed us better reasons than I have yet seen, why they were not for it. But I must own, that I am hitherto at a loss in this matter, and not a little surprized to see them act so contrary to the opinion they were formerly of.

"The occasion of my last letter to your lordship, was to communicate to you a Letter<sup>e</sup> writ by the electress to my lord archbishop of Canterbury, in answer to one that her royal highness had received from his grace; wherein she thought fit to declare her respect for the queen's majesty, and the good intentions she hath always had for the good of England. Her royal highness being informed, from several persons of credit, that her good inclinations for the queen and the nation, were misrepresented; some having reported, that she did not think of England; others that she might give a rise to intrigues against the queen and the public, if she came thither: She thought herself therefore obliged to declare to my lord archbishop and others she wrote to, and also

* The following is a copy of the said Letter:

A LETTER from her royal highness, the Princess SOPHIA, Electress of Brunswick and Lunenburg, to his grace the Archbishop of Canterbury.

"My lord; I received your grace's letter; * * * You have no reason to make any excuse that you have not writ to me more often. For I do not judge of people's friendship for me, by the good words they give me, but I depend upon your integrity, and what you tell me, in general, of the honest men of England.

"I desire no further assurance of their good will and affection to me, unless they think it necessary for the good of the Protestant religion, the public liberties of Europe, and the people of England.

"I thank God I am in good health, and live in quiet, and with content here: Therefore I have no reason to desire to change my way of living, on the account of any personal satisfaction that I can propose to myself.

"However, I am ready and willing to comply with whatever can be desired of me, by my friends, in case that the parliament think, that it is for the good of the kingdom, to invite me into England.

"But I suppose they will do this in such a manner, as will make my coming agreeable to the queen, whom I shall ever honour, and endeavour to deserve her favour; of which she hath given me many public demonstrations, by what she hath done for me in England and Scotland, which you can judge of more particularly: And I most remember that she ordered me to be prayed for in the churches.

"I doubt not, but her majesty is as much inclined at present, to establish the safety of the three kingdoms upon such a foot, that they may be exposed to the least hazard that is possible, and that she will begin with England:

"Mr. How has acquainted me with her majesty's good inclinations for my family; which makes me think, that, perhaps her majesty's to tell the duke of Marlborough and the earl of Sanderland, when they were here, that she would always most sincerely maintain a true friendship with the queen: and also be ready to comply with the desires of the nation in whatever depends upon her, though she should hazard her person in passing the seas, if they thought it necessary towards the establishment of the Protestant succession, and for the good of the kingdom; But that, in the mean time, she lived in great quiet and content there, (without meddling with parties or cabals) and left it to the queen and parliament to do whatever they should think fit.

"I did therefore believe I should please your lordship by sending you so desirable a declaration, by recommending you as a fit person to be consulted upon it, and by entreating you to communicate it to our friends, being well assured of your zeal for the Protestant succession, and friendship for me. But I was very much surprised when I found, by your answer, that you did attribute her royal highness's declaration, which was so necessary in itself, to the artifices of the Jacobites.

"What, my lord, would you then be pleased that the electoress should not think of England, and that the people should believe so? or that she would countenance cabals against the queen? Or ought one to be called a Jacobite for undeceiving the world of so gross and wicked a misrepresentation? The electoress hath been often desired to declare, that she was willing to come into England; but she never thought fit to give any answer to it, further than she submitted herself and family to the pleasure of the queen and parliament; till she was pressed to declare, That she would not approve of the motion to be invited to come over. This was such advice that it gave her just reason to suspect, that there were some secret designs against the succession, or at least tending to alienate the affections of the people from her person: And this was a further reason for the declaration she made, that she might not be misrepresented.

“This is a proper time for her to express herself in our favour. But whether I am right in this point or not, my friends in England can best judge.

“It is but reasonable that I should submit myself to their opinions and advice. And I depend most upon what your grace shall advise, which will ever have the greatest weight with me.

“Therefore I write the more plainly to you, and tell you my thoughts, that you may communicate them to all you think fit. For they will then see that I have great zeal for the good of England, and a most sincere respect for the queen.

“This is the best proof that I can give, at present, of my esteem for your grace. But I shall be glad of further opportunities to assure you, that I am, and shall ever be most sincerely, my lord, vostre très affectionné à vous servir, SOPHIE, Electrice.”

However, Nov. 3, 1705.

“Your lordship farther tells me, That you will not dip in any thing of this kind, (I use your own words, that I may not mistake your meaning) which tends, in your lordship's opinion, to set up two courts in England, in opposition to each other? Did I propose any thing to your lordship but to do justice to truth by making known to our friends her royal highness's good intentions? And can you complain of me for desiring a thing so just in itself, and which every honest man ought to do? How then can your lordship imagine, that this tends to set up two courts in opposition to each other? It is plain, by the electoress's Declaration, that she hath said nothing therein, either to desire her being invited over, or to hinder it; but she leaves all to the queen and parliament. I told you this, and you seemed to take it ill, or at least otherwise than I intended it.—Whoever did represent this to your lordship as a thing that may disturb our present quiet and future peace, must be an enemy to both.

“Do you think, my lord, that the electoress ought to declare, That she would not come into England? or that she herself should obstruct any invitation that the queen and the parliament may give her? This might be taken as an abdication of her right to the succession. But I can assure your lordship, that she will not betray the trust and confidence the people of England have reposed in her, nor injure her family. It is true that she is much advanced in years, and, according to the course of nature, may not live long; but the elector and prince-electoral have many years to come, in all appearance, and have virtues that deserve the crown of England, whenever it shall please God that the reversion shall come to them. Can you approve such advice? Or can you think the authors of it friends to her, or her family, or, which is more, friends to England? Must we say, that those who speak against her, are her friends; and those who speak for her, are her enemies? This seems to me to change the name and nature of things.

“When your lordship considers what I have said, and reflects upon it in your heart, I doubt not, but you will see that you have been imposed upon by those who are Jacobites themselves in their hearts, or something worse, if it be possible, and certainly design to subvert the Protestant succession established by law, or so to weaken it, that it may depend upon accidents, or upon the humour and interest of particular men: For none but such can have the malice to invent, and insinuate to others, that the presence of the successor is dangerous: This is a thing that hath not been heard of in other countries, and is directly against common sense. This is a new paradox, which cannot be conceived in England, by any but those, who are very weak, or corrupted. We ought to maintain the contrary; since we know that we have secret and dangerous enemies at home, and an irreconcilable and powerful enemy abroad, who may have both the will and power to hinder the passage and establishment of the successor, at the time when it may be most necessary; and totally thereby to subvert our constitution, if it does not please God once more, to preserve us by his manifest providence.

“ You go on, my lord, and desire that I would advise the electoress to take care that she is not imposed upon by the Jacobites: But this caution is very unnecessary; for I can assure you that her royal highness does not consult them in any thing, and much less will she do it in what relates to the succession: For if she did, she must act against the rules of good reason and sense. You may say that they are Jacobites who give these advices: But her royal highness did not want any advice to express and declare herself, as she hath done, in a manner so suitable to her former conduct. If we will suppose that this proceeds from the Jacobites, we must, at least, think that it is for their interest.

“ But can you believe, my lord, that it is, in any manner, for their interest to persuade the Protestant successor to declare her esteem and affection for the queen and nation? And yet this is all that her royal highness hath expressed in her letter to the lord archbishop. Such Jacobites must be very silly, and not to be feared, who should advise that which must destroy all their hopes. For the electoress's declaration was to take off all the groundless suspicions, to unite all honest men, and to secure our constitution: And therefore your lordship, and all our friends, ought to have desired her royal highness to explain herself after this manner: and all that wish well to their country, ought to thank her for having done it.

“ We Whigs would have been formerly very glad to have seen such a declaration from her royal highness. I pray then, my lord, judge what opinion the electoress ought to have at present, of our steadiness and principles, if she should receive advice from us, so contrary to what she ought to have expected. But I do not apply this to this your lordship: For I am persuaded that you will be one of the first that will quit this mistake, and condemn the strange notions that have been imposed upon you by others.

“ We have been proud to say, that the House of Hanover, the people of England, and our posterity, were most obliged to the Whigs, next to the king, for settling the succession upon that most serene House: And how much should we be to be blamed, if we should lose this merit, by parting with our principles, that were so well grounded upon honour, and the public good; and by destroying the work of our own hand, for a base and uncertain interest; or for a blind obedience to those, who lead others where they please, and yet are led themselves by their passions, or imaginary prospects, of which they may be disappointed? For if they hope to get into favour by such methods, they cannot be long serviceable nor preserve the favour they seek; for they will soon be cast off, when it is found that they have lost the esteem and affection of the people, by their weak or mercenary conduct. They cannot do any thing that will better please their enemies: for, while they think to keep down the Tories by a majority, and oppose them, even in things so reasonable and just; they will raise their reputation, instead of lessening it. If other think fit to quit their principles, yet I will never part with mine; for I am still of the same opinion that the best Englishmen professed themselves to be of, in the late king's time; and I find no reason for any honest man to change.

“ I am sorry for those who suffer themselves to be imposed upon; but they who have wicked designs, may one day repent of them. And I will be bold to say, that they must either plunge the nation in the greatest confusion to make it unable to punish them; or that they will be answerable for the dangers into which they are like to bring it. Those who betray their country, will have little satisfaction or assurance of enjoying their hoped-for advantage, which will be embittered by their guilt and the perpetual apprehensions they will have; and nothing but a timely death can deliver them from being punished as they deserve; whether the nation continues to flourish, and escapes the designs laid to enslave it, or whether it be ruined by popery and tyranny; which may happen by their artful conduct in making us neglect our own safety. For if tyranny and popery prevail, many of them will suffer under the French and Jacobite cruelties, which will not be less than those we have read of in queen Mary's time; and they, that may think themselves the most secure among us, will be happy if they can save only their lives.

“ So terrible a revolution is, perhaps, more to be apprehended, than people think. But if it does not happen at present, yet it may come to pass, even in the life-time of those who believe they may contribute towards it with impunity. They themselves may feel those miseries which they would carry down to posterity, and even to their own children, if they have any; and this only to satisfy their own present passions, at the expence of their country, and contrary to their duty both to God and man.

“ These, my lord, are the sentiments and measures that are wicked in themselves, and that we ought to abhor; and not the thoughts of endeavouring better to secure the Protestant succession, by having the next heir of the crown in the kingdom. But your lordship is told, that the coming of the electoress into England, will set up two courts, that will oppose each other. I cannot conceive how any body could tell you such a thing, or what colour they could have for so base an insinuation.

“ For the electoress declares, “ That she will be entirely united with the queen; and that all those, who imagine she will countenance any intrigues against her majesty, will be very much deceived in their expectations.' Yet, notwithstanding, it seems there are some people, who endeavour to persuade your lordship, that even this sincere declaration tends to raise confusion. Is not this, in plain terms, to contradict what the electoress hath said, and to put an affront upon this great princess, and your lordship, as well as upon all others, who have had the honour to converse with her royal highness, and must have done her justice. The world knows that she is a princess, whose natural temper is generous, and obliging, and sincere, and of a public spirit. Are not you, my lord, then obliged as much as any man living, boldly to contradict these malicious calumnies which you know to be false, to set them right who are mis-informed, and to oppose those who endeavour to impose upon others?

"But let us suppose what you say, and allow that (contrary to all appearance) discontented or ill men may impose upon the electoress's good-nature, and incline her to do such things, as may displease the queen. What hurt can that do? since her royal highness's court can have no power in England, and must be subject to the queen's court, who is the sovereign. I will not touch upon things that have passed in our time, and confirm what I say. So that it is most absurd, to make people believe, that this pretended opposition of the two courts, can bring us into so great dangers, as those we may avoid, by having the Protestant heir in the kingdom. Let us, in the mean time, examine these pretences, how absurd soever. If we will keep the next Protestant heir at a distance, it must be allowed to be grounded upon two suppositions; First, that the queen is against the electoress's coming over; and secondly, that her being in England during the queen's life, is a thing ill in itself.

"These two propositions are wicked and criminal in themselves: for to say, that the queen would take away, from the presumptive heir, the right of coming into England, is to cast a great reflection upon her majesty, and to create a misunderstanding between her majesty, and the person in the world she ought to be most united with.

"But to maintain, That the electoress's being in England, is ill in itself; one must declare himself to be of a most ridiculous, or of a most malicious opinion. For either it must be a general rule, that the successor must be always kept out of the kingdom: Or, it must be supposed, that the people have just reason to entertain some just notion in prejudice to the electoress. But the general rule is, absolutely, not to be maintained, There is neither law nor example to justify it. For if it were so, then her majesty, when princess of Denmark, must have been sent out of the kingdom; and yet no man ever pretended to broach so outrageous an opinion. And all the world knows, that the electoress may come over whenever she pleases without being invited. All wise princes and governments, that have had a succession, have ever thought, that the securing of that succession, was a present and great security to the public safety; without considering whether there should arise any real or imaginary disputes between the sovereign and the next heir.

"And I also hope that our friends will never pretend to have any reason to insinuate, that they ought to have any jealousies of the electoress, as to her own person. For people must be very malicious to say, or very ill informed to believe, that she is weak or disaffected, that she loves divisions, or that intriguing persons can manage and turn her at their pleasure. You know, my lord, that she is infinitely above these characters. That she is wise, and hath the greatest tenderness in the world for her relations, and particularly for her majesty. That she is charitable to all men, a friend to English liberty; and so knowing, that she cannot be easily imposed upon. All those who are acquainted with her, ought to believe, that the queen would be well pleased with her agreeable temper and conversation. Her moderate behaviour hitherto ought to assure us of the continuance of it for the time to come. Her quiet temper, her zeal for our preservation, and her esteem for the queen, have made her not comply with the advice of some, who called themselves Whigs; which might have given offence, if she had followed them.

"If, after all this, people can think, that her presence in England can be any prejudice to the queen or kingdom, they must be very ungrateful. And it is no less injurious to her character to misrepresent the publishing a Letter, that was so judiciously writ, and so necessary, at this time, to suppress these groundless reports. This letter, which I sent to your lordship, was only to confirm what she had said to Mr. Howe, who is the first of the queen's ministers that have come to this court, that hath owned he had orders to declare to her royal highness the queen's good intention, further to secure the succession in her royal highness's family. So that nobody can say, that she hath done any thing at present, but what came from the queen herself.

"It also appears, that it is a most skilful and malicious contrivance of some, to cry out, Jacobitism; as soon as any body they do not like, speaks of inviting over the presumptive heir. Those who are sincerely for so proper a method to secure the succession, ought to take the advantage of joining in this point with all who ever are for it, let their character be what it will. For when men mean well, they will thoroughly pursue their point, and consider the nature of things as they really are in themselves. If those whom you suspected to have had wicked designs, were not sincere in shewing their zeal to invite the presumptive heir, we ought to have taken them at their word; and by this means they had been punished as they deserved, by being caught in their own snare. Then the crown might have been joined with the church, in an excellent address to the queen, and both voted out of danger. May the judgment, honour and candour of our friends, never be called in question by our own, and other nations; for their very visible mistake, in losing this great, and, perhaps, irrecoverable, opportunity they had to oblige their country for ever.

"If the motion to invite the Successor could be of any use to the Jacobites, it must be because it was not received. Ought a good thing to be disapproved, because a man I suspect, or do not love, proposes it? If we maintain this position, we shall put it into the power of the Jacobites, to hinder any good resolution we can desire to take; for it will be enough, if any one we call a Jacobite, seems to agree with us. It is a shame that we should be imposed upon by such weak and malicious notions.

"In short, to oppose the further securing of the Protestant Succession, is to act directly for the Jacobites; and to hinder the Successor's coming into England, is to oppose the further securing of the succession, in my humble opinion. The succession and England are in great danger from the present conjuncture of affairs. The success of the present war, which is, as yet, very uncertain, will have the greatest influence on this subject. Our constitution does not allow of a standing army in time of peace, though we have a formidable neighbour, who hath always a will, power and pretences to surprise us, whether we are in peace or war with him, if we are not ever upon our guard: And he aims at no less, than to subvert our religion, liberty and property.

"Under such circumstances, we ought to think of all possible means to secure ourselves against a deluge of blood, and an universal confusion. The subversion of our constitution is much to be apprehended; if it should so unfortunately fall out, that there should be a demise; and the successor, being absent, should not be in a condition to pass the seas, while the enemy may have time to prevent all our good measures. It is certain, that those, who are not sensible of the consequences, that may attend our negligence, and the malice of our enemies, on such an occasion; must either be corrupted, or very indifferent, as to the safety of their country.

"Therefore it is necessary, that the presumptive heir should be always established in England: And it would be better husbandry, to make an honourable provision for him suitable to what was settled in the late reigns; than to be at the charge of a war, to recover his right, and our own liberties, from the dangers which they then may be in. This may save us great sums, which we may be obliged to lay out, to bring him over; and yet, perhaps, we may not have the success we desire.

"We may well remember, that the nation paid 600,000*l.* for the expence of the prince of Orange's Expedition to deliver us from the danger our own folly had brought us into: And yet it was a hundred to one, that he succeeded, though so many men of quality and interest, both in church and state, did appear for him. But the expence of money is the least evil that our negligence may bring upon us: Since our religion, lives, and liberties, and all are at stake.

"Your lordship further says, that the Court was threatened last sessions with this motion and dared with it ever since the parliament was chose; and that it is your opinion, that the electoress should not give any further countenance to it. I use your lordship's own words and do assure you, that the electoress hath not meddled with, nor countenanced any design otherwise than appears in her letter to my lord archbishop; having had no knowledge of what was to be proposed in her favour before the motion was made. But since you had such early notice of this design, I do the more wonder that this motion was not made by those who belonged to the Court: Since it is most manifestly for her majesty's interest, as well as that of the nation, that the presumptive heir should be established in England.

"You could not then have had a pretence to complain, that it came from men you did not like; and we have no reason to think that it would not have been agreeable to the queen, if the whole matter had laid before her majesty, who does every thing that can be advised for the good of Europe and of her own subjects. It is a strange notion, to think, that the presence of the Successor can ruin the succession. And it is very unlikely, and not to be supposed, that the successor (at least any of those we have in this family, who have a true respect and love for the queen, and true honour and virtue in themselves) will ever be a cause of confusion in England, by his presence; this must be invented by those, who ought to be as much suspected as any, by all, who are for the Protestant Succession: And it carries so much malice and wild-fire in it, that I am afraid to touch it any more.

"As to the other methods proposed by the House of Lords, for the better securing of the Succession: though I have all the deference in the world for their lordships, as well as for the honourable House of Commons; yet I am persuaded, with great submission, that the parliament will yet think such measures not sufficient for these ends, and will, in time, consider of others more effectual. We hear from England, That the laws have been considered which relate to the administration of the government, in case a demise should happen during the absence of the successor; and that they are found defective. This may well be, for neither our ancestors or we did ever imagine, that any good Englishman would oppose the establishment of the rightful and lawful next, or presumptive protestant heir in the kingdom; but that he should be ready at hand to support the constitution, whenever the succession came to him. And this is more necessary at present, than ever; since there is a Pretender supported by France, who usurps the stile and title of king of England, to her majesty's

“As for the Act to secure the queen’s person and government, &c. The powers which the Lords Justices are to have, for the time being, must be very great; and may be liable to bring dangers, if not ruin to the kingdom, if they shall happen to fall into the hands of ill men. The heir being kept at a distance will not be able, in time of danger and confusion, to distinguish his friends from his enemies; since he will not be acquainted with the nobility and gentry, whom he would have known if he had been in the kingdom: And therefore will be under great difficulties how to name proper persons to join with the seven Lords Justices.

“Besides, it is very doubtful how far his orders and choice will be respected; for many pretences and measures may be put in practice by a powerful skill to elude them. Who can say what men will be in the great employments, when a demise may happen? Those we think the best friends to the succession may die before that time comes; and those whom we call Jacobites, or others who are such in their hearts, without being known, may yet come into those employments. The power of the nation both by sea and land, and even the treasure, may be in ill hands; and if this happens, they may dispose of the crown and succession as they please. One single person may usurp the power of all the Lords Justices and council, as it did fall out in Edward the 6th’s time, by the subtlety of the duke of Northumberland, to the great prejudice of your lordship’s family. And this hath often happened, both in England, and other countries, though criminals have been frequently punished.

“But such circumstances may be more dangerous in England at present, than people thought them in former ages. The happy criminals are always applauded, far from being punished. Such a single person at such a conjuncture may chuse to play the game of Cromwell, or that of Monk, for the false, or for the true heir.

“And the time may come, in which the Pretender, with the great foreign power, and the intrigues within the kingdom, may be able to gain more people than the Successor, being absent and destitute of the necessary supports, especially after the dissolution of the great alliance, which may justly be apprehended in time of peace; as it did happen after the treaties of Nimwegen and Ryswick, and as it is very like to fall out again after this war; if more effectual measures are not taken in the kingdom as well as abroad. And if the allies do not find their security in our constitution, and in the succession.

“The Lords have made an excellent Address to the queen, to maintain a good intelligence with the Allies and particularly with the States General. But it is to be wished that this good intelligence may be so extended, and that such measures may be taken, that we may be always certain of their assistance to secure the protestant succession.

“England and the States are the great support of the protestant religion and interest, and of the liberty of Europe. It is undoubtedly the interest and safety of both, always to maintain a good correspondence and true friendship. Therefore the wise and honest ministers on both sides will easily find the most proper means to prevent any quarrel, and will preserve a perfect union, which must be grounded upon the obligation and necessity of each others mutual defence. England may, and ought to depend on its own wisdom and force, to defend itself; being secured and quiet at home. And we have had hitherto the good fortune to preserve our liberties, when most other nations have lost theirs. But late experience has shewn us how near we may come to slavery by our negligence. And also, how necessary it may then be to recur to, and how dangerous to rely upon foreign aid, as to our own safety. We can be in no danger under her majesty’s reign, and wise conduct. But we are to apprehend and prevent, to the utmost of our power, any ill accidents, that may befall us, when it may please God to take our good queen from us.

“Who knows what men or parties may rise up at home and abroad; We ought, therefore, like honest and wise men, to set things upon the best and surest foundations. At least we ought not to weaken the succession by neglecting the proper means for its security. It is true, that the invitation of the presumptive heir hath no negative put upon it; But it is also true, that if it had pleased our friends in parliament at this time, when they were a majority, to advise her majesty to it, in concurrence with others; that this would have better secured the protestant succession, and our constitution, than all the laws the nation can make.

“I pray, my lord, what will our acts of parliament, our oaths, the proclamation of the Successor, and even our Lords Justices signify, if the Successor is not certain of passing the sea, and of being possessed of the fleet, the troops, the treasure, the garrisons, the sea-ports, the Tower, and the city of London? The world will wonder at, and we shall deplore our fatal blindness; if we are capable of being amused by imaginary securities, and neglect, at this time of day, what is really necessary for our safety. Laws are no more than cobwebs against power and force.

“The History of England doth furnish us with many examples, which shew that the next heirs to the crown have been often excluded from the succession to it, by their being absent at the time of the demise. We have an instance now before us in Spain, which hath cost us much blood and treasure, and is like to cost us much more; besides, what England doth, and may suffer by the loss of that trade, which was next to that of our West Indies, the most profitable to us. For if king Charles had been in Spain before the death of the late king, it might in all probability, have prevented this general war; and the French king would never have attempted the conquest of Spain, if he had not had footing there before; nor the Spanish ministers have dared to do what they did, if the arch-duke had been present at Madrid. Therefore to hinder the next heir's coming into England, will be a very great reflection upon us: For it must tend to the destruction of, or at least, very much hazard our religion and liberties. And so we ought to consider of our dangers in due time; since it may so happen, that it may not be in our power to secure the coming over of the successor: And I will only mention what has been said in England, that we are not always sure of a protestant wind. A thousand other accidents may befall us, if we trust to the last extremity.

"Therefore we ought now to take right measures, that the successor may be always established, and sure to possess himself of the power, whenever it shall please God to afflict us with a demise: And that we may be as little exposed as is possible either to chance or treachery. The queen seems to be of this opinion, and all honest men ought, and will contribute all they can to make it agreeable and easy to her majesty. The electress, and the other princes of this family, do always praise and admire the care that the queen takes of the interest of Europe against our common enemy; and pray for her majesty's long life and happiness. God be thanked the queen is in good health, but alas! She is mortal, and must our safety depend upon an accident, that must befall the best of mankind?

"It is true, that the electress hath many years more than her majesty, and that the queen is in the vigour of her age; and therefore, that the electress is not like to survive her majesty; but our interest and safety consists in making such provision once for all, whether the electress lives or not, that the next heir may be always present, or in a condition to be so; without which, in my humble opinion, we cannot be safe, otherwise than by an extraordinary providence. My lord Haversham hath always shewed himself so true a friend to this family and the constitution of England; that I thought no man could be more proper to be advised with upon the electress's letter.

"I ask your lordship's pardon for troubling you with so long a letter; but I thought myself obliged in duty to my country, and friendship to you, to speak plainly upon this question, which contains the happiness or misery of England: And therefore I hope that all wise and honest men will take care how they decide it. I am, my lord, your lordship's, &c.

Hanover, Jan. 1st.

R. GWYNNE.

Censure passed thereon.] After the reading of this Letter, the Commons resolved, "That it was a scandalous, false and malicious libel, tending to create a misunderstanding between her majesty and the princess Sophia, and highly reflecting upon her majesty, upon the princess Sophia, and upon the proceedings of both Houses of Parliament; that an humble Address should be presented to her majesty, that she would be pleased to give order for the discovery and prosecuting the author, printer and publishers of the said pamphlet, and that the said Resolutions should be communicated to the Lords at a conference, and their concurrence desired thereunto."

Address of both Houses to the Queen thereon.] Their lordships not only readily concurred with the Commons on the 11th, but likewise agreed upon an Address to be presented to her majesty, pursuant to the said Resolutions; to which Address they desired the concurrence of the Commons, who heartily joined with them, and so the next day both Houses presented the following Address to the queen;

"We your majesty's most dutiful and obedient subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in parliament assembled, beg leave to acquaint your majesty, that, having taken into serious consideration a printed pamphlet, entitled, 'A letter from sir Rowland Gwynne, to the right honourable the earl of Stamford,' we came to the following Resolution.—'That the said pamphlet is a scandalous, false and malicious libel, tending to create a misunderstanding between your majesty, and the princess Sophia, and highly reflecting upon your majesty, upon the princess Sophia, and upon the proceedings of both Houses of parliament.'—May it please your majesty, this seditious libel having been, of late, with great industry dispersed among your subjects, we humbly beseech your majesty to give strict orders for the discovery of the author, printer and publishers thereof, to the end they may be brought to condign punishment, according to the utmost rigour of the law. And we pray your majesty to use all means, which shall seem proper to your royal wisdom, for preventing such insolent and dangerous attempts for the future."

The Queen's Answer.] To this Address, the queen was pleased to give the following Answer:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; nothing can be more acceptable to me, than so reasonable an instance of your concern to preserve a good understanding between me and the princess Sophia, and of your care to defeat the artifices of designing and malicious men. I am fully sensible of the very ill design of the paper, which you have so justly censured, and I will not fail to give the necessary directions for complying in the most effectual manner with all you desire in your address."*

* "The Whigs in this proceeding shewed themselves dupes to the court. The ministry had so many public and private reasons for carrying on the war, that they would not suffer the queen to be in the least put out of humour, as she would have been by any measures for bringing over the Protestant successor, which all good Englishmen who had no views but for the public heartily wished, and were not at all

The Queen's Speech at the Close of the Session.] March 19. Her majesty came to the House of Peers, and after giving her assent to the several bills, made the following Speech to both Houses :

"My Lords and Gentlemen ; Being now come to a close of this session, I am to return you my thanks, for having brought it so speedily to a good conclusion ; especially for the wise and effectual provision made, to secure the Protestant Succession in this kingdom ; and the great advances on your part, towards procuring the like settlement in the kingdom of Scotland, and a happy Union of both nations.—I am very well pleased likewise with the steps you have made, for the amendment of the law, and the better advancement of justice.—I must again repeat to you, gentlemen of the House of Commons, that I am extremely sensible of the dispatch you have given to the public supplies : I assure you, I will be very careful that they may be applied, in the most effectual manner, for our common interest.

"My Lords and Gentlemen ; At the opening of this parliament, I recommended, with great earnestness, an entire union of minds and affections among all my subjects, and a sincere endeavour to avoid and extinguish all occasions of division and animosity. I am much pleased to find how entirely your sentiments have agreed pleased with the conduct of the ministry on this occasion. Besides, there was an insincerity in it unworthy the character of the persons then in the administration, and more suitable to that of their successors : for they not only knew that sir Rowland Gwynn's Letter was genuine, but that her serene highness the princess Sophia had herself written a letter to the archbishop of Canterbury on the same subject. However, they were so very fearful of losing their hold of the queen, that they would rather venture the losing the protestant succession ; for which they paid dearly enough, when Mr. Harley had thrust himself in between her and them. Sir Rowland Gwynn's letter was published by Charles Gildon, better known as a retainer to the stage, and the ministry ordered him to be prosecuted with the utmost severity ; inasmuch, that had it not been for Mr. Maynwaring's interposition, he had certainly stood in the pillory. He was fined above 100 times as much as he was worth, no less than 100*l.* sterling, which was also remitted by the good officers of the same worthy gentleman. To settle matters after this little shock between the courts of St. James's and Hanover, his highness prince George Augustus, electoral prince of Brunswick Lunenburg, was elected knight of the garter, and it was resolved to send the lord Halifax to Hanover, not only to invest his highness with that order, but to confer with the electress Dowager and the elector her son, on what had happened in England with relation to the contents of sir Rowland Gwynn's letter." Oldmixon.

with mine : your unanimity and zeal which I have observed with great satisfaction, throughout this whole session against every thing that tends towards sedition, doth so much discourage all such attempts for the future, and hath set such an example to the whole kingdom, that, when you are returned into your several countries, I doubt not but you will find the effects of it every where ; and, I assure myself you will make it your business and care to improve and perfect that good work you have so far advanced here ; and, by continuing to shew a just dislike of all factious and turbulent proceedings, and resolving to discountenance the encouragers and promoters of them, you will soon make the whole kingdom sensible of the good effects of so prudent and happy a conduct."

Then the lord keeper prorogued the parliament to Tuesday, the 21st of May next.*

Proceedings of the Commissioners for the Union.] During this recess, the grand affair of the Union of the two kingdoms took place. According to the powers given to the queen by the parliaments of England and Scotland, on the 10th of April she appointed the Commissioners on the part of England, the Commissioners on the part of Scotland having been named before, on the 27th of February. Mr. George Dodington was named secretary by the English, and sir Daniel Nairne by the Scots Commissioners. The persons who were appointed on the English side were well chosen. They were the most capable of managing the Treaty, and the best disposed to it of any in the kingdom.† The Scots Commissioners were so * "Thus this session of parliament came to a very happy conclusion : there was in it the best harmony within both Houses, and between them, as well as with the crown, and it was the best applauded in the city of London, over the whole nation, and indeed over all Europe, of any session that I had ever seen : and when it was considered, that this was the first of the three, so that we were to have two other sessions of the same members, it gave an universal satisfaction, both to our own people at home, and our allies abroad, and afforded a prospect of a happy end, that should be put to this devouring war, which in all probability must come to a period before the conclusion of the present parliament. This gave an unspeakable satisfaction to all who loved their country and their religion, who now hoped that we had in view a good and a safe peace." Burnet.

† THE ENGLISH COMMISSIONERS were :

Thomas, lord archbishop of Canterbury.
William Cowper, esq. lord keeper of the Great Seal of England.
John, lord archbishop of York.
Sidney, lord Godolphin, lord-high-treasurer of England.
Thomas, earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, president of the council.
John, duke of Newcastle, keeper of the privy-seal.

strangely chosen, that from thence many concluded, that an Union was not sincerely designed by the ministry, when they saw such a nomination.* For they were not looked on as men well-affected to the design, many of them

William, duke of Devonshire, steward of the household.

Charles, duke of Somerset, master of the horse.

Charles, duke of Bolton.

Charles, earl of Sunderland.

Evelyn, earl of Kingston.

Charles, earl of Carlisle.

Edward, earl of Orford.

Charles, viscount Townsend.

Thomas, lord Wharton.

Ralph, lord Grey.

John, lord Paulet.

John, lord Somers.

Charles, lord Halifax.

John Smith, esq.

William Cavendish, marquis of Hartington.

John Manners, marquis of Granby.

Sir Charles Hedges, knt. and Robert Harley, esq. principal secretaries of state.

Henry Boyle, esq. chancellor and under-treasurer of the exchequer.

Sir John Holt, knt. chief justice of the court of Queen's Bench.

Sir Thomas Trevor, knt. chief-justice of the court of Common-pleas.

Sir Edward Northey, knt. attorney-general.

Sir Simon Harcourt, knt. solicitor-general.

Sir John Cook, knt. doctor of laws, advocate general.

Stephen Waller, doctor of laws.

* The SCOTS COMMISSIONERS were

James, earl of Seafield, lord chancellor of Scotland.

James, duke of Queensberry, lord privy-seal.

John earl of Mar, and Hugh, earl of Loudon, principal secretaries of state.

John earl of Sutherland, John earl of Morton, David earl of Wemys, David earl of Leven, John earl of Stair, Archibald earl of Roseberry, David earl of Glasgow, deputies of the treasury.

The lord Archibald Campbell, brother to the duke of Argyle.

Thomas, viscount Dupplin.

The lord William Ross, one of the Commissioners of the treasury.

Sir Hugh Dalrymple, president of the session.

Adam Cockburn, of Ormiston, lord-justice-clerk.

Sir Rob. Dundass, of Armistown, and Mr. Rob. Stuart, of Tillicultrie, lords of the session.

Mr. Francis Montgomery, one of the Commissioners of the treasury.

Sir David Dalrymple, one of her majesty's solicitors.

Sir Alexander Ogilvie, receiver-general.

Sir Patrick Johnstoun, provost of Edinburgh.

Sir James Smallet, of Bonhill.

having stood out in a long and firm opposition to the Revolution, and to all that had been done afterwards pursuant to it. The nomination of these was fixed on by the dukes of Queensberry and Argyle. It was said by them, that, though these objections did indeed lie against them, yet they had such an interest in Scotland, that engaging them to be cordially for the Union would be a great means to get it agreed to in the parliament there. The earl of Stair, who heartily concurred in the design, was thought to have a hand in this piece of policy, in which the event shewed that right measures were taken. The Scots had got among them the notion of a Federal-Union, like that of the United-provinces, or the cantons of Switzerland. But the English resolved to lose no time, in the examining or discussing that project; for this reason, besides many others, that, as long as the two nations had two different parliaments, they could break the Union whenever they pleased; for each nation would follow their own parliament. The design was now to settle a lasting and firm Union between the kingdoms; therefore they resolved to treat only about an incorporating Union, that should put an end to all distinctions, and unite all their interests: so they at last entered upon the scheme of an intire Union.

On the 10th of April, the commissioners of both kingdoms met the first time, in the Council-chamber in the Cock-pit near Whitehall, the place appointed for their conferences; and their commissions being opened and read by the secretaries, the Lord-Keeper of England, and the Lord Chancellor of Scotland, made introductory speeches; after which it was agreed, that copies of the two commissions should be prepared and signed by the respective secretaries, and interchanged against the next meeting, which was put off till the Monday following.

Accordingly, on the 22d of April, they met again, and the Lord Keeper delivered to the board the following preliminaries:

“ 1. That all proposals made by either side be made in writing, and every point, when agreed, reduced into writing. 2. That no points, though agreed on, and reduced into writing, be obligatory on either side, till all matters be adjusted in such a manner, as will be proper to be laid before the queen and the two parliaments for their approbation. 3. That there be a committee appointed, consisting of a certain number of each commission, to revise the minutes of what passes, which are not to be inserted by the secretaries in their respective books, but by order of the said committee, having first made report thereof to the respective commissioners, and received their approbation of the same. 4. That all the proceedings of the commissioners of both kingdoms, during the Treaty, be kept secret.

The Lord-Keeper also delivered to the board the following Proposal,

"That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland be for ever united into one kingdom, by the name of Great-Britain: that the United Kingdom of Great-Britain be represented by one and the same parliament; and that the succession to the monarchy of the United Kingdom of Great-Britain, in case of failure of heirs of her majesty's body, be, according to the limitations mentioned in an act of parliament, made in England in the 12th and 13th years of the reign of the late king William, intituled, An act for the further limitation of the crown, and the better securing the rights and liberties of the subject."

After this the Commissioners adjourned to the 24th of the same month, when the Lord-Chancellor of Scotland acquainted the board, that the commissioners of Scotland did agree to the preliminary articles proposed at the last meeting, for regulating the method of proceeding in this Treaty: and then he delivered to the board the following Proposals:

"1. That the succession to the crown of Scotland, in case of failure of heirs of her majesty's body, should be established upon the same persons mentioned in an act of parliament made in England, in the 12th and 13th years of the reign of the late king William. 2. That the subjects of Scotland should for ever enjoy all rights and privileges, as natives of England, in England, and the dominions thereunto belonging; and reciprocally, that the subjects of England enjoy the like rights and privileges in Scotland. 3. That there be a free communication and intercourse of trade and navigation between the two kingdoms and plantations thereunto belonging, under such regulations, as, in the progress of this Treaty, shall be found most for the advantage of both kingdoms. 4. That all laws and statutes in either kingdom, contrary to the terms of this Union, be repealed."

The Commissioners for England, after a short consultation by themselves, returned an Answer:

"That they were so fully convinced, that nothing but an entire Union of the two kingdoms would settle perfect and lasting friendship between them, that they therefore thought fit to decline entering into any further consideration upon the proposals now made by the commissioners for Scotland, as not tending to that end; and desired, that the commissioners for Scotland would give in their Answer to the Proposal delivered by the commissioners for England, in order to an entire Union of both kingdoms."

The next day the Lord-Chancellor, in the name of the commissioners for Scotland, delivered to the board the following Answer:

"The commissioners for Scotland have considered the proposal given in to them by the commissioners for England, on Monday the 22d instant; and do agree, that the kingdoms of Scotland and England be for ever united into one kingdom, by the name of Great Britain: that the united kingdom of Great-Britain be represented by one and the same parliament: and that the succession to the monarchy of the kingdom of Great-Britain, in case of failure of heirs of her majesty's body, shall descend upon the most excellent princess Sophia, electress and duchess dowager of Hanover, and remain to her and the heirs of her body, being protestants, with this provision, That all the subjects of the united kingdom of Great-Britain shall have full freedom and intercourse of trade and navigation, to and from any part or place within the United Kingdom, and plantations thereunto belonging; and that there be a communication of all other privileges and advantages, which do or may belong to the subjects of either kingdom."

After a private consultation, the Lord-Keeper in the name of the Commissioners for England, delivered to the board this reply.

"The commissioners for England are of opinion that the provision added by the commissioners of Scotland, to the proposal made by the commissioners for England, on the 22d instant, is a necessary consequence of an entire Union; and therefore their lordships do agree to that provision, under such terms, as in the further progress of this Treaty shall be found to be for the common advantage of both kingdoms."

The same day, in pursuance of the third preliminary, a committee was appointed for revising the Minutes; and there were nominated, on the part of England, the lord Grey; Mr. John Smith, Speaker of the House of Commons, sir Thomas Trevor, sir John Cook, and Dr. Waller, or any three of them; and on the part of Scotland, the earl of Sutherland, the earl of Leven, the lord president of the session, the lord Justice Clerk, John Clark of Pennycook, or any three of them.

Four days after, the commissioners met again, and the Lord-Keeper delivered to the board the following Proposal: That there be the same customs, excises, and all other taxes; and the same prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations of trade throughout the united kingdom of Great-Britain. Hereupon the Scots commissioners proposed, That a committee be appointed of an equal number of each side, to adjust the several points contained in that proposal; and desired, that the English commissioners would order the account of the taxes and other things, to be laid before the committee.

The English Commissioners having proposed to appoint a committee to consist of eleven of each side, and of them any six to have power to proceed, and that they should be nominated the next meeting; this was readily agreed to by the Scots; and accordingly, on the 1st of May, the commissioners proceeded to the nomination of the committee. The English named the dukes of Somerset and Bolton, the earl of Sunderland, the lords Townshend, Wharton, and Somers, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the marquis of Hartington, Mr. secretary Harley, Mr. Henry Boyle, and sir Simon Harcourt. The Scots appointed the lord-chancellor, the duke of Queensberry, the earls of Sutherland, Leven, and Stair, the lord Duplin, the lord-president of the session, the lord-justice-clerk, and sir Patrick Johnston: and it was agreed, that this committee should meet the next morning, and have power to adjourn themselves.

On the 21st of May, when the Treaty was pretty well advanced, the queen went to the meeting, and told the commissioners, "That she was so much concerned for the Union of the two kingdoms, that she could not satisfy herself without coming, before she went out of town, to see what progress they had made in the Treaty, and to recommend very earnestly to them the bringing it to a happy conclusion, with as much dispatch, as the nature of it would admit; not doubting of the general satisfaction, which her subjects of both kingdoms would receive, in finding them to overcome all difficulties to attain so great and public a good."

When she had done speaking, the Lord-Keeper desired to know, if she would hear the Proposals, made on either side, and the Resolutions taken thereupon, read by the secretaries; which she allowed of, and then retired.

About a month after, the queen came again to their meeting, and told the Commissioners, "That she was come thither once more to see what further progress they had made in the Treaty, and to press a speedy conclusion of it, in regard her servants of Scotland could not, without great inconveniency, be much longer absent from that kingdom." Upon this, in the thirty-fifth meeting, on the 28th of June, the English commissioners proposed, that four commissioners of each part be appointed to draw up into form the Articles of the Treaty, upon the points already agreed, or which which should afterwards be agreed. To which the Scots commissioners having consented, the Articles were brought to perfection by the 22d of July, when the commissioners of both kingdoms signed and sealed the instruments, and ordered, that the respective secretaries of each commission should sign each other's journals of the proceedings, and afterwards enter in the journals the Articles of the Treaty of Union.

The next day, the commissioners for both kingdoms went from the Cockpit to attend the queen at St. James's, where the Lord-Keeper, in the name of the commissioners for England, presented to her majesty one of the signed and sealed instruments containing the Articles of the Union, and made the following Speech:

"May it please your majesty;

"We the commissioners appointed by your majesty, in pursuance of the act of parliament passed in your kingdom of England, to treat concerning an Union of the two kingdoms with the commissioners of Scotland, do (according to our duty) humbly beg leave to present to your majesty these the effects of our continued and faithful endeavours to that end.—They are Articles agreed upon between your commissioners of both kingdoms, as the terms or conditions upon which the intended Union is to take place, if your majesty, and the parliaments of both kingdoms, shall think fit to approve and confirm the same.—In these we have come to an agreement on every point we judged necessary to effect a complete and lasting Union; and we have endeavoured not to stir into any matter we had reason to think was not so.—And although we have unanimously carried this Treaty thus far, purely from a conviction, that we have done therein to God, your majesty, and our countries good service; yet we are far from thinking, that what we have done, will or ought to be of any weight or authority elsewhere; but do most intirely submit these our labours to the high wisdom of your majesty and both your parliaments, to stand or fall by the reason, justice, and public utility, on which they are founded.—Your majesty's royal presence and seasonable admonitions to us, at the fittest junctures were (we most thankfully acknowledge) a very great encouragement and assistance to us in the difficulties we met with.—Your majesty's glory is already perfect; and the finishing this work is all that is wanting, to complete as well as secure the happiness of so great a people as your subjects may now, without any arrogance, pretend to be.—May your majesty live, not only to give sanction to this universal blessing to all your people, but also to see, in a long and prosperous reign over us, the many immediate or near good effects of it. But as for than great and main consequence of it, for which your majesty is making, by a most gracious and charitable foresight, this only effectual provision; I mean, the continuance of peace and tranquillity in this island, upon a descent of the crown, instead of that bloodshed and destruction which would probably follow upon the fatal division of it;—May we be so happy, as never, in our days, to experiment the fitness of these measures your majesty is now taking for that end; but may late, very late, posterity only in that respect reap the advantage of them."

Then the Lord Chancellor of Scotland, in the name of the commissioners for that kingdom, presented also to her majesty one of the signed and sealed instruments of the Articles of Union, on the part of Scotland, with the following Speech:

"May it please your majesty;

"The commissioners, appointed by your majesty for the kingdom of Scotland to treat of an Union of your two kingdoms of Scotland and England, have commanded me to return your majesty their most humble and dutiful acknowledgments, for the honour your majesty has conferred on them, in employing them to negotiate this most important affair, which is of the greatest consequence to all your majesty's subjects.—We have endeavoured to discharge this trust with all fidelity; and are now come humbly to lay before your majesty the Articles and conditions of Union, which we have treated of, and agreed upon, and do submit them to your majesty's royal consideration.—It is a great satisfaction to us, that what we have concluded in this matter has been done with unanimity. And we must own, that the knowledge we had of your majesty's great concern for uniting your two kingdoms, and the earnestness with which your majesty has been most graciously pleased to recommend it, hath enabled us to bring this Treaty to a happy and speedy conclusion, to the mutual satisfaction of the commissioners on both sides; and we shall esteem it our greatest happiness, if what we have prepared be acceptable to your majesty, and ratified by the parliaments of both kingdoms, without which what we have done can be of no authority.—An Union of the two kingdoms has been long wished for, it being so necessary for establishing the lasting peace, happiness, and prosperity of both nations. And though it has been frequently endeavoured by your majesty's royal predecessors without the desired success; yet the glorious successes, with which God has blessed your majesty's endeavours for the happiness of your people, make us hope, that this great work is reserved to be accomplished in your majesty's reign."

After which, the Queen was pleased to make the following Speech:

"My Lords;

"I give you many thanks for the great pains you have taken in this Treaty, and am very well pleased to find your endeavours and applications have brought it to so good a conclusion. The particulars of it seem so reasonable that I hope they will meet with approbation in the parliaments of both kingdoms. I wish therefore, that my servants of Scotland may lose no time in going down to propose it to my subjects of that kingdom: and I shall always look upon it as a particular happiness, if this Union, (which will be so great a security and advantage to both kingdoms) can be accomplished in my reign."

The same day, the queen being in council, an Order was made, importing that whosoever should be concerned in any seditious discourse, or libel, or laying wagers relating to the Union, should be prosecuted for such their offences, according to the utmost rigour of the law.

The lord Somers had the chief hand in projecting this scheme of the Union, into which all the commissioners of the English nation went very easily. The advantages, that were offered to Scotland in the whole frame of it, were so great and so visible; that nothing but the consideration of the safety, that was to be procured by it to England, could have brought the English to agree to a project, that, in every branch of it, was much more favourable to the Scots nation. The Scots were to bear less than the fortieth part of the public taxes. When four shillings in the pound were levied in England, amounting to 2,000,000*l.* Scotland was only to be taxed at 48,000*l.* which was eight months' assessment of the 6,000*l.*, which they had been accustomed for some years to pay, and which, they said, was all that the nation could bear. It is held a maxim, that, in the framing of a government, a proportion ought to be observed between the share in the legislature, and the burden to be borne. Yet in return of the fortieth part of the burden, the Scots were offered near the eleventh part of the legislature. For the peers of Scotland were to be represented by sixteen Peers in the House of Lords; and the Commons, by forty-five members in the House of Commons; and these were to be chosen, according to the methods to be settled in the parliament of Scotland. And since Scotland was to pay customs and excises on the same foot with England, and was to bear a share in paying much of the debt, which England had contracted during the war; 398,000*l.* was to be raised in England, and sent into Scotland, as an equivalent for that; and this was to be applied to the redeeming the money, that all might be of one denomination and standard; and to the payment of the public debts of Scotland, and repaying to the African company all their losses with interest; upon which that company was to be dissolved; and the overplus of the equivalent was to be applied to the encouragement of manufactures. Trade was to be free all over the island, and the plantations; private rights were to be preserved; and the judicatories and laws of Scotland were still to be continued. But all was put, for the future, under the regulation of the parliament of Great Britain; the two nations now were to be one kingdom, under the same succession to the crown, and united in one parliament. There was no provision made in this Treaty with relation to religion; for in the acts of parliament in both kingdoms, which impowered the queen to name commissioners, there was an express limitation, that they should not treat of those matters.

This was the substance of the Articles of the Treaty, which when they came to be laid before the Parliament of Scotland, met with great opposition.*

The Summer's Exploits.] May the 14th. The duke of Marlborough set out for Holland; and, August the 12th, he obtained a complete victory over the French, commanded by the elector of Bavaria and marshal Villeroy, at Ramillies; which was followed by a general Revolution in the Low Countries in favour of king Charles.

In Italy, enabled by a loan of 250,000*l.* from England, prince Eugene, after thirty four marches to join the duke of Savoy, offered battle to the French, who laid siege to Turin; and after two hours engagement, in which the marshal Marsin was killed, and the duke of Orleans wounded, utterly defeated them, seized on their camp, tents, baggage, &c. and relieved that capital.

In Spain, king Charles was closely besieged in Barcelona, by the marshal de Thesse by land, and the count de Thoulouse by sea; but was most opportunely relieved by the gallant earl of Peterborough and sir John Leake; the count de Thoulouse not staying till the English fleet appeared in sight, and the marshal de Thesse decamping with the utmost confusion a few days after, and leaving his ammunition, stores, tents, and even his sick and wounded men, at the mercy of the enemy.

SECOND SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT OF QUEEN ANNE.

The Queen's Speech on opening the Session.] December 3, 1706. It was the general opinion, and perhaps the first resolution of the court, that the parliament of England should not sit, till that of Scotland had finished the affair of the Union; but, that drawing into a great length, and the queen's occasions not admitting of delays, the parliament of England, which on the 21st of November, had been further prorogued to the 3d of December, met this day at Westminster; and the queen, being come to the House of Peers with the usual solemnity, made the following Speech to both Houses:

“My Lords, and Gentlemen; I hope, we are all met together at this time with hearts truly thankful to Almighty God, for the glorious successes, with which he has blessed our arms, and those of our Allies, through the whole course of this year; and with serious and steady resolutions to prosecute the advantages we have gained, till we reap the desired fruit of them, in an honourable and durable peace.—The goodness of God has brought this happy prospect so much nearer to us, that, if we be not wanting to ourselves, we may, upon good grounds, hope to see such a balance of power established in Europe, that it shall no longer be at the pleasure of one prince, to disturb the repose, and endanger the liberties, of this part of the world.—A just consideration of the present posture of affairs, of the circumstances of our enemies, and the good disposition of our Allies, must needs excite an uncommon zeal, and animate us to exert our utmost endeavours, at this critical conjuncture.

“Gentlemen of the House of Commons; As I am fully persuaded, you are all of this mind; so I must earnestly desire you to grant me supplies, sufficient for carrying on the war next year in so effectual a manner, that we may be able to improve every where the advantages of this successful campaign: And, I assure you, I shall make it my business to see all you give, applied to those ends, with the greatest care and management.

“My Lords, and Gentlemen; In pursuance of the powers, vested in me by act of parliament, both in England and Scotland, I have appointed commissioners, to treat of an Union between the two kingdoms: And though this be a work of such a nature, as could not but be attended with great difficulties; yet such has been the application of the commissioners, that they have concluded a Treaty, which is at this time before the parliament of Scotland; and, I hope, the mutual advantages of an entire Union of the two kingdoms will be found so apparent, that it will not be long before I shall have an opportunity of acquainting you with the success which it has met with there.—Your meeting at this time being later than usual, I cannot conclude, without earnestly recommending to you to give as much dispatch to the public affairs as the nature of them will admit; it being of the greatest consequence, that both our friends and our enemies should be fully convinced of your firmness, and the vigour of your proceedings.”

The Lords' Address thereon.] Dec. 4. The Lords presented the following Address:

“May it please your majesty; We, your majesty's most dutiful and obedient subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, with hearts full of joy, beg leave to congratulate your majesty upon occasion of the many great successes obtained by your majesty's arms, and those of your allies, in all places, during this wonderful year. We could not hope for any thing more glorious, than the opening the campaign by the ever-memorable victory gained at Ramillies, under the command of your majesty's wise and valiant general the duke of Marlborough; and nothing could be more reasonable, at the close of the campaign, than the complete victory gained by the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene, before the walls of Turin. The illustrious consequences of those two battles made it impossible for your enemies to disguise their losses; and demonstrated to the world, that never any generals better understood how to make use of their success. And if we, your majesty's subjects, should not do all that lies in our power, towards improving the advantages which the divine Providence has given to your majesty and your allies; we should shew ourselves unthankful to God, inexcusable to your majesty, and manifestly wanting to our country, and the common cause of Europe.—We cannot sufficiently express the universal pleasure and satisfaction of your people, upon the public declaration which your majesty, in concert with the States General, made to the ministers of the other confederate princes, ‘That no negotiations of peace should be entered into, but in conjunction with all the Members of the Grand Alliance.’ This generous method will prevent the indirect and dangerous practices of the common enemy, will put a stop to clandestine and corrupt transactions; and must not only remove all present jealousies from the allies, but create in them a lasting confidence and reliance on your honour and justice.—Your majesty's example, and that of the States General, ought to inspire all the other allies with a noble emulation of acting with the like vigour. If any of them have been failing for the time past, we hope your majesty will find proper means to let them see, that the only right amends they can make to the cause of liberty, is by doubling their efforts at this important conjuncture.—This will be the true way to obtain such a peace as all good men desire; which may secure to your majesty's subjects the Protestant Succession, and all the advantages of trade and commerce; may restore the whole monarchy of Spain to king Charles the Third; may fix such a barrier for the States General (in whose security we must always think the interest of England is engaged) as may be to their just satisfaction; and may procure such terms and conditions for all the allies, as may be just, safe, and honourable; such a peace as may be durable and lasting; by reducing effectually the exorbitant power of a prince, whose restless ambition nothing could satisfy, and who has always despised the obligations of the most sacred leagues and treaties.

“Most gracious sovereign; We cannot omit to make our most thankful acknowledgments, of our universal happiness under your just and mild government; of your true zeal for the safety and honour of the church of England; of your great care for the due administration of justice, and your tender regard for the properties and liberties of your people; but, in a particular manner, we most own, with all gratitude, your majesty's wisdom and foresight, as well as your goodness, in your royal endeavours, to bring to pass an entire and complete Union of your two kingdoms of England and Scotland. May God Almighty make these your glorious designs successful! and may your majesty long reign over us, to see the happy fruits of them, in the safety, tranquillity, wealth, honour, and flourishing estate, of your majesty's united people!”

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's Answer was as follows:

“My lords; I am very much pleased with the many expressions of your affection for my service, and of your zeal for the common cause, in the several particulars of this Address, which is entirely to my satisfaction, and I assure myself it will have its just weight both at home and abroad.”

The Commons' Address.] The Address of the Commons was as follows:

“Most gracious Sovereign; We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons, in parliament assembled, return your majesty our humble thanks for your most gracious speech from the throne.—And, with all thankfulness to Almighty God, we congratulate your majesty upon the signal victory obtained by your arms, and those of your allies, under the command of the duke of Marlborough, at Ramillies; a victory, so glorious and great in its consequences, and attended with such continued successes, through the whole course of this year, that no age can equal.—And as your majesty's allies have shewed their firmness and good disposition to carry on the war with vigour, so the Commons of England are determined, that no specious pretences of peace shall divert them from their steady resolutions of enabling your majesty to improve, in all places, the advantages of this successful campaign.—The experience your Commons have had of the prudent administration, and the great care and management in the application of the public aids, encourage us to assure your majesty, that we will cheerfully give such speedy and effectual supplies, as, by the continuance of God's blessing upon your majesty's arms, may establish the balance of power in Europe, by a safe, honourable, and lasting, peace.—We beg leave likewise to return your majesty our hearty thanks, for your promoting the Union betwixt England and Scotland; whereby your majesty shews your great concern and tenderness, not only for the present, but the future happiness of both kingdoms.”

The Queen's Answer.] The Queen gave this Answer:

“Gentlemen; I thank you heartily for this Address, and the assurances of giving me effectual supplies to carry on the war, and to obtain a safe and honourable peace.—I am glad to find, you are so well satisfied with the application of the public money.—As to the matter of the Union with Scotland, so in all other things, I shall still be desirous to promote the present and future happiness of my people.”

Thanks given to the Duke of Marlborough.] Dec. 5. The Duke of Marlborough being this day present, and in his place in the House of Peers, the Lord Keeper gave him the Thanks of this House, as follows:

“My Lord Duke of Marlborough; I am commanded by this House to give your grace their Acknowledgment and Thanks, for the eminent services you have done, since the last session of parliament, to her majesty and your country, together with their confederates, in this just and necessary war.—Though your former successes against the power of France, while it remained unbroken, gave most reasonable expectations, that you would not fail to improve them; yet what your grace hath performed this last campaign, has far exceeded all hopes, even of such as were the most affectionate and partial to their country's interest and your glory.—The advantages (I use the lowest expressions for every thing) which you have gained against the enemy, are of such a nature, so conspicuous in themselves, and so undoubtedly owing to your courage and conduct, so sensibly and universally beneficial in their consequences to the whole confederacy, that to attempt to adorn them with the colouring of words, would be vain and inexcusable; and therefore I decline it, the rather because I should certainly offend that great modesty, which alone can, and does add a lustre to your actions, and which, in your grace's example, has successfully withstood as great trials, as that virtue has met with in any instance whatsoever.—Only I beg leave to say, that if any thing could move your grace to reflect with much satisfaction on your own merit, it would be this, that so august an assembly does with one voice praise and thank you; an honour, which a judgment, so sure as that of your grace's, to think rightly of every thing, cannot but prefer to the ostentation of a public triumph."

To which His Grace replied, as follows :

"I esteem this as a very particular honour, which your lordships are pleased to do me; nobody in the world can be more sensible of it than I am, nor more desirous to deserve the continuance of your favour and good opinion."

A Committee of the House of Commons also attended the Duke, to give him Thanks for his eminent services to her majesty and this kingdom, in the great and glorious victory and successes obtained over the enemy the last campaign: And his grace made them this Answer: "If any thing could add to my satisfaction in the services I have endeavoured to do to the queen and my country, it would be, the particular notice which the House of Commons is pleased to take of them, so much to my advantage."

Manor of Woodstock settled on the Duke of Marlborough.] Dec. 20. A Bill from the Lords for settling the honours and dignities of John duke of Marlborough, upon his posterity, and annexing the honour and manor of Woodstock, and House of Blenheim, to go along with the said honours, was read three times by the Commons, and passed nem. con.*

* The Creations and Promotions at this time were as follows: Towards the middle of December the queen was pleased to create Henry, earl of Kent, lord chamberlain of her household, viscount Goderick in the county of Hereford, earl of Harrold in the county of Bedford, and marquis of Kent. A few days after her majesty was also pleased to create Robert, earl of Lindsey, lord great chamberlain of England, marquis of Lindsey in the county of Lincoln; Evelyn, earl of Kingston, marquis of Dorchester in the county of Dorset; Thomas, lord Wharton, viscount Winchendon in the county of Bucks, and earl of Wharton in the county of Westmoreland: John, lord Poulet, of Hinton St. George in the county of Somerset, earl Poulet; Sidney, lord Godolphin, lord high-treasurer of England, viscount Hinton, and earl of Godolphin in the county of Cornwall; Hugh lord Cholmondeley, viscount Malpas, and earl of Cholmondeley in the county of Chester; Henry, lord Walden, son and heir apparent of Henry, earl of Suffolk, baron of Chesterfield in the county of Essex, and earl of Bindon in the county of Dorset; the lord keeper, a peer of this kingdom by the name and title of William, lord Cowper, baron of Wiugham in the county of Kent; and Sir Thomas Pelham, bart. likewise a peer by the name and title of lord Pelham, baron of Loughson in the county of Sussex.

supplies for the fleet and army in less than a week: so that, this day the queen came to the House of Peers, and, having sent for the Commons, the Speaker presented the bills, and made a speech importing, "That as the glorious victory obtained by the duke of Marlborough at Ramillies was so surprizing, that the battle was fought before it could be thought the armies were in the field, so it was no less surprizing, that the Commons had granted supplies to her majesty, before her enemies could well know that her parliament was sitting."

The Queen's Speech on passing the Money Bills.] After which her majesty gave the royal assent to the Land-Tax Bill (4s. in the pound,) the Malt Bill; an Act for settling the honour and dignities of the duke of Marlborough, upon his posterity, together with the manor of Woodstock, &c. And her majesty afterwards made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I am glad of this occasion to repeat to you my great satisfaction in your several Addresses presented to me in the beginning of this Session.—The zeal and affection which you expressed in them for my service, and the common cause of Europe, cannot fail of being a great encouragement to all our allies.—The particular notice which you have taken of the eminent services of the duke of Marlborough is also very agreeable to me, and I make no question but it will be so to the whole Kingdom.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; I am to thank you in a very particular manner, for the more than usual dispatch of the Bills of Supply, with which you have presented me.—This will enable me to put all our necessary preparations for next year into a great forwardness, and must needs have a very good effect for improving the advantages of the last campaign.

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I suppose you will think it convenient to make some short recess during the holidays.—The zeal and unanimity you have already shewn, are a sufficient assurance to me, that you will all return in the same good temper and disposition to dispatch what remains of the public business."

* "The queen closed the year with two triumphal processions. At the request of the city of London, she ordered that the standards and colours taken at the battle of Ramillies, and which were lately brought from the Netherlands, should be put up in Guildhall, as trophies of that victory. This was done with great solemnity on the 19th of December. Soon after the queen having, by proclamation, appointed a general thanksgiving for the great successes of her arms, and those of her allies, the last campaign, she went to the cathedral of St. Paul's, attended by both Houses of Parliament, the great officers of state, the judges, and other public officers. The bishop of Salisbury preached the sermon upon this occasion." Tindal.

The Commons' Address in favour of the Duke of Marlborough.] January 7, 1707. The Commons having taken into consideration the eminent services of John duke of Marlborough, whereby the glory of her majesty's government, the honour and safety of the kingdom, and the interest of the common cause had been so highly advanced, agreed upon the following Address to the queen :

"Most gracious Sovereign; We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of England in parliament assembled, taking into our consideration the many eminent services of John duke of Marlborough, whereby the glory of your majesty's government, the honour and safety of your kingdoms and the interest of the common cause have been so highly advanced, do, with all submission, address ourselves to your majesty's most sacred person, humbly to desire, That, as your majesty is, at your expeuce, graciouly pleased to erect the house of Blenheim, as a monument of his glorious actions, and the House of Peers, by your majesty's permission, have given rise to a law for continuing his honours to his posterity, we, your majesty's obedient Commons, may be permitted to express our sense of so distinguishing a merit, and our ready disposition to enable your majesty to make some provision for the more honourable support of his dignity in his posterity, in such manner as shall be most agreeable to your majesty.—Thus the gratitude of the whole kingdom will remain upon record to after-ages, and encourage others to follow his great example."

The Queen's Answer.] This Address being the next day presented to the queen by the whole House, her majesty was pleased to answer in these words :

"Gentlemen; I am very glad you have so just a sense of the repeated services of the duke of Marlborough; I will consider of your Address, and return an Answer very speedily."

The Queen's Message concerning the Duke of Marlborough.] Accordingly, on the 9th, Mr. Secretary Harley delivered to the House the following Message, signed by her majesty :

"ANNE R.

"Her majesty, in consideration of the great and eminent services performed by the lord Marlborough in the first year of her reign, as well by his prudent negotiations as her plenipotentiary at the Hague, as by his valour and good conduct in the command of the confederate armies abroad, thought fit to grant to him and the heirs male of his body, the title of a duke, of this realm, and as a farther mark of her favour and satisfaction with his services, and for the better support of his dignity, her majesty granted to the said duke and the heirs male of his body during his life, a pension of 5,000*l.* per annum, out of the revenue of the Post-office; and an act having passed the sessions for settling the honours and dignities of the duke of Marlborough upon his posterity, and annexing the honour and manor of Woodstock, and House of Blenheim, to go along with the said honours, it would be very agreeable to her majesty if the pension of 5,000*l.* per annum, be continued and limited by act of parliament to his posterity, for the more honourable support of their dignities, in like manner as his honours, and the honour and manor of Woodstock and House of Blenheim, are already limited and settled. Kensington, Jan. 9, 1706-7."

Vote thereon.] Upon the reading of this Message, the House resolved, "That a Bill be brought in for continuing and settling upon John duke of Marlborough and his posterity the pension of 5,000*l.* per annum, (already granted by her majesty) for the more honourable support of their dignities, in like manner as his honour and dignities, and the honour and manor of Woodstock and House of Blenheim, are already limited and settled; and that Mr. Secretary Harley, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, lord Granby, Mr. Solicitor-general, col. Strangways, Mr. Verney, Mr. Fortman and Mr. Lowndes, do prepare and bring in the Bill."

Resolutions about the Supply.] There being several Establishments and Accounts relating to the Army, Navy and Victualling, laid before the Commons: the House agreed with the committee in the following Resolutions :

1. "That 49,000*l.* be granted to her majesty, for the payment of another year's interest of the unsatisfied debentures charged upon the Irish forfeitures. 2. That a further sum of 10,000*l.* be allowed to the office of Ordnance, towards making a wharf and storehouse at Portsmouth. 3. That 120,000*l.* be granted to her majesty for the Land-Service, to be performed by the office of Ordnance for the year 1707. 4. That 144,000*l.* be granted to her majesty, towards defraying the charge of transporting Land-Forces. 5. That 3,500*l.* be granted to her majesty, for the charge of circulating Exchequer-Bills for another year."

Then Mr. St. John presented to the House an Account of some extraordinary Charges of the War, not provided for the last session of parliament, or incurred since; and also of the extraordinary Charges of the war in the years 1705, and 1706, for Horses.

Further Resolutions.] The next day the Commons went again upon the Supply, for the service of the year 1707, in a Committee of the whole House, and came to several Resolutions, which were on the 11th reported to the House, and agreed unto, viz.

1. "That 37,500*l.* be granted to defray the proportion of the Subsidies payable to the king of Denmark. 2. That 150,000*l.* be granted to defray the proportion of the Charges of 13,000 men in the service of the king of Portugal. 3. That 160,000*l.* be granted to defray the proportion of the Subsidies payable to the duke of Savoy. 4. That 5,953*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* be granted to defray the proportion of the Subsidies payable to the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. 5. That 5,953*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* be granted to defray the proportion of the Subsidies payable to the Elector of Treves. 6. That 4,781*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* be granted to defray the proportion of the Subsidies payable to the Elector Palatine. 7. That 50,000*l.* be granted to defray the proportion of the Charge of 8,000 men sent to the assistance of the duke of Savoy.* 8. That 443,350*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.* be granted for defraying the Charge of maintaining 20,562 men, part of her majesty's forces, to be employed in Spain or Portugal, and for the general officers, contingences, hospitals, forage and waggon-money, and for the garrison of Gibraltar, and for general officers serving the king of Portugal, for the year 1707. 9. That 186,296*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* be granted for defraying the Charge of maintaining 8,833 men (additional forces) to be employed in Spain or Portugal, and for the general officers and Contingences, for the service of the year 1707. And lastly, 10. That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, That she will be pleased to give order, that the Treaty with the king of Prussia in the year 1706, and also the Treaty with the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, may be laid before this House.

Jan. 13. Mr. Secretary Harley laid before the House, by her majesty's order, the Treaty for repatriation of the Prussian troops, Hague, November 24, 1706. And also, the ratification of the Treaty for the march of the Hessian troops to Italy, concluded May 20, 1706. The consideration whereof was referred to the grand committee for the Supply. And on the 16th the Commons ordered the Commissioners of Trade to lay before their House a State of the Newfoundland trade, in relation to the fishery. And Mr. Secretary Harley presented to the House a Representation from the Lords Commissioners of Trade and Plantations, relating to the trade with Flanders: And extracts of letters from Mr. Stepney, her majesty's Envoy at Brussels, relating to trade; The consideration whereof was referred to the committee for the whole House, who were to consider of the Trade of the kingdom.

Jan. 27. A motion being made, That the several sums of money for the extraordinary services for the year 1706, which had been agreed to by the House, had been advanced and expended for the preservation of the duke of Savoy, for the interest of king Charles the 3d in Spain,

* "All things were very quiet in parliament till the Christmas holidays, but the cabals of that recess produced fresh play: the first attack was in the committee of supply, where a demand was made for nine hundred and odd thousand pounds advanced to the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene, expended on my lord Rivers's expedition over and above the Supplies given the last session of parliament; they carried this so far that they moved a censure upon the ministry for it; it was a long and warm debate, and upon the division we carried it in favour of the service, 211 against 105." * "The grant of the Supplies went on quicker than was usual. There was only one particular, to which great objections were made: Upon the great and early success of the former campaign, it was thought necessary to follow that, with other projects, that drew on a great expence, beyond what had been estimated, and laid before the parliament. An embarkation, first designed against France, and afterwards sent to Portugal; and the extraordinary Supplies, that the duke of Savoy's affairs called for, amounted to about 800,000*l.* more, than had been provided for by parliament. Some complained of this, and said, that if a ministry could thus run the nation into a great charge, and expect that the parliament must pay the reckoning, this might have very ill consequences. But to this it was answered, that a ministry deserved public thanks, that had followed our advantages, with such vigour: If any thing was raised without necessity, or ill applied, under the pretence of serving the public, it was very reasonable to enquire in it, and to let it fall heavy on those, who were in fault: But if no other exception lay to it, than because the matter could not be foreseen, nor communicated to the parliament, before those accidents happened, that occasioned the expence, it was a very unjust discouragement, if ministers were to be quarrelled with, for their care and zeal; So it was carried by a great majority, to discharge this debt. All the other Supplies, and among them the equivalent for Scotland, were given, and lodged on good funds: So that no session of parliament had ever raised so much, and secured it so well, as this had done." Burnet.

† "Daniel, the son of Henenge Finch, earl of Nottingham, was born in 1647, and succeeded his father in his honours and possessions. On the death of Charles the Second he was one of the privy-counsellors who signed the order for proclaiming the duke of York, but kept at a distance from the court that whole reign. When the convention met on king James's abdication, he was the principal manager of the debates in favour of a regent, against setting up another king: yet he observed, that if one was made, he would be more faithful to him than those who made him could be according to their own principles. When William and Mary were advanced to the throne, though he declined the office of lord chancellor, he accepted that of secretary of state, in which station he continued after the accession of queen Anne, when both Lords and Commons voted him highly deserving the great trust her majesty reposed in him: yet he went out of office in 1704, and accepted no other till George the first came to the crown, when he was made president of the council; but in 1716 he finally retired from all business to a studious course of life, and died in 1730.

“All the Finches,” says Dunton, “have been famous for their wit and learning; and this noble earl is a master of eloquence: yet his speeches in parliament were never known to flatter with the secret glosses of double or reserved senses; and when his name is traduced (as has been the fate of the best favourites), his innocence bears him out with courage. He is a peer of strict and remarkable justice, an excellent paymaster, and a most accomplished gentleman.” Macky represents him in his habit and manners very formal, with an exterior air of business, and application enough to make him very capable.” Lord Orford’s Noble Authors, Park’s edition, vol. 4, p. 119.

The Earl’s character is thus drawn by Swift:

“His vehement and frequent speeches against admitting the Prince of Orange to the throne, are yet to be seen; and although a numerous family gave a specious pretence to his love of power and money, for taking an employment under that monarch; yet he was allowed to have always kept a reserve of allegiance to his exiled master, of which his friends produce several instances, and some while he was secretary of state to king William. His outward regularity of life, his appearance of religion, and seeming zeal for the church, as they are an effect, so they are the excuse for that stiffness and formality with which his nature is fraught. His austere complexion disposeth him to rigour and severity, which his admirers palliate with the name of zeal. No man had ever a sincerer countenance, or more truly representing his mind and manners. He hath some knowledge in the law, very amply sufficient to defend his property at least: a facility of utterance, descended to him from his father, and improved by a few sprinklings of literature, hath brought himself, and some few admirers, into an opinion of his eloquence. He is every way inferior to his brother Guernsey, but chiefly in those talents which he most values and pretends to; over whom, nevertheless, he preserveth an ascendant. His great ambition was to be the head of those who were called the church-party; and, indeed, his grave solemn deportment and countenance, seconded by abundance of professions for their service, had given many of them an opinion of his veracity, which he interpreted as their sense of his judgment and wisdom; and this mistake lasted till the time of his defection, of which it was partly the cause: but then it plainly appeared, that he had not credit to bring over one single proselyte, to keep himself in countenance.” Swift’s Four last years of Queen Anne.

desired, that they would appoint a day to receive it, in a full House. The Lords having named the Tuesday following, being the 14th, on which day the members, in and about town, were summoned to attend, the earl of Nottingham, in a set speech, represented to them, “That the Union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, was a matter of the highest importance; and a work of so much difficulty, that all the attempts that had been made towards it, in the last century, had proved ineffectual; that the parliament of Scotland, having thought fit to secure the Presbyterian church-government in that kingdom, it became the wisdom of the parliament of England, to provide betimes against the dangers, with which the church, by law established, was threatened, in case the Union was accomplished: And therefore he moved, That an Address be presented to the queen, humbly to desire her majesty, that the proceedings, both of the commissioners for the Treaty of Union, and for the parliament of Scotland, relating to that matter, should be laid before them.”

He was seconded by the Earl of Rochester, who declared, “He was for an Union, and had been so for 20 years past; but that he had a few doubts in the matter, and therefore was for entering upon the debate of that important affair as soon as possible.”

The Duke of Buckingham* spoke to the same purpose; adding “That the Union of * “John Sheffield, son of Edmund, earl of Mulgrave, was born about 1650. Having the misfortune to lose his father before he was ten years old, and his mother soon marrying again, he was put into the hands of a tutor, with whom he was so little satisfied, that he got rid of him in a short time, and resolved to educate himself. Such a purpose, observes Dr. Johnson, formed at such an age, and successfully prosecuted, delights as it is strange, and instructs as it is real. His literary acquisitions are the more wonderful, as those years in which they are commonly made, were spent in the tumult of a military life, or the gaiety of a court. In 1665, when war was declared against the Dutch, he went on board the ship in which prince Rupert sailed; and volunteered his services a second time on a similar occasion, in 1672, when his zeal was rewarded by an appointment to the command of the best second-rate ship in the navy. He afterwards raised a regiment of foot, and commanded it as colonel. He was made a gentleman of the bedchamber, and had the promise of a garter, which he obtained in his 25th year. He afterwards made a campaign in the French service under Turenne. Being opposed by the duke of Monmouth in his pretensions to the first troop of horse-guards, he in return made Monmouth suspected by the duke of York: and when Monmouth fell into disgrace, he obtained the lieutenancy of Yorkshire and the government of Hull. Coming very young to the possession of a plentiful fortune, says Dr. Anderson, and in both kingdoms had been upon the anvil since the accession of king James 1, to the English throne; and as it could not be expected that so weighty a matter, which took up so much time and labour before, should now be completed in a few days, therefore he was for taking it forthwith into consideration."

The Lord High Treasurer Godolphin*, an-

an age when pleasure was more in fashion than business, he prosecuted his studies amid the allurements of dissipation, and in making his way to military honours and civil employments, was never wholly negligent of literature, but at least cultivated poetry; in which he must have been early considered as skilful, if it be true, which is reported, that his recommendation advanced Dryden to the laurel. At the accession of James the second, with whom he lived in great familiarity, he was admitted into the privy-council, and made lord chamberlain. Though he was in some respects a man of honour, he was 'apt to comply with any thing that he thought might be acceptable.' In the Revolution he acquiesced, though he did not promote it. When the crown was settled upon William and Mary, he voted for the conjunctive sovereignty: this vote gratified king William; yet either by the king's distrust or his own discontent, he lived some years without favour. But in 1694 he was made marquis of Normanby, and soon after obtained a pension of 3,000*l.* When Anne succeeded to the throne, he was made lord privy-seal, duke of Normanby, and then of Buckinghamshire. Soon after, becoming jealous of the duke of Marlborough, he resigned the seals, and retiring from business, built that house in St. James's Park which is now the queen's, upon ground granted by the crown. On the succession of George the first he became a constant opponent of the court, and having no public employ, is supposed to have amused himself with writing his two tragedies, "Julius Cæsar," and "Marcus Brutus." He died Feb. 24, 1721, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where a monument is placed to his memory, with an epitaph written by himself.

"His character, says Dr. Johnson, is not to be proposed as worthy of imitation. His religion he may be supposed to have learned from Hobbes, and his morality was such as naturally proceeds from loose opinions. His sentiments with respect to women he picked up in the court of Charles, and his principles concerning property were such as a gaming-table supplies. He is said, however, to have had much tenderness, and to have been very ready to apologize for his violences of passion. As a statesman, says Dr. Anderson, he is characterized by a steady attachment to Tory principles of government. As a courtier he is distinguished by personal dignity, gracefulness, and good breeding. As a poet he has been eulogized by Dryden, Garth, Prior, Addison, and Pope; but this praise has received a critical counterpoise from the pens of Dr. Johnson, Dr. Warton, and lord Orford: whence a writer in the New Biog. Dict. has taken occasion to exclaim, 'What a precarious and uncertain thing is literary reputation, and how miserably may many an author flatter and delude himself with dreams 'and visions of immortal fame!'" Lord Orford's Noble Authors, enlarged by Park, vol. 4, p. 92.

Macky thus drew his living character, about 1704: "The duke of Buckinghamshire is a nobleman of learning and good natural parts, but of no principles. Violent for the high church, yet seldom goes to it. Very proud, insolent, and covetous, and takes all advantages. In paying his debts, unwilling; and is neither esteemed nor beloved: for notwithstanding his great interest at court, it is certain he bath none in either House of Parliament, or in the country. He is of a middle stature, of a brown complexion, with a sour, lofty look." Characters of the Court of Great Britain, p. 20.

"This statesman, descended from a respectable family in Cornwall, was the third son of sir Francis Godolphin, k. b. The first situation he held was that of page to Charles 2. The utmost endeavours to learn the characters of others, and to conceal his own, gained him a reputation which his future conduct shows he deserved. His negotiation in Holland prepared the way for the treaty of Nimeguen. Charles esteemed him as his most faithful minister. Though lord chamberlain to Mary de Modena, consort of James 2, he never approved the violence of that monarch, but as duty demanded, he waited upon the prince of Orange to ask what was his object; what his demands were. When lord Clarendon loaded James with abuse, Godolphin and the marquis of Halifax conducted themselves with equal propriety. After the Revolution was effected, he submitted to the new order of things. William 3 admired his abilities, incorruptibility, and taciturnity; retained him in the treasury, and honoured him, by making him a lord-justice, during his absence from the kingdom; and under queen Anne he was lord high treasurer. The fall of Mr. Harley, which he wished, deprived him of this post; he died soon after, in the house of the duke of Marlborough, at St. Alban's, Sept. 15, 1712, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Though a member of the treasury thirty years, and nine of them at the head of it, yet he died worth only 4,000*l.* per annum; he even kept his servants from peculations—to him we are indebted for the present low interest of money. In four reigns he was a favourite with the sovereigns, yet never, in one instance, sacrificed the interest of the people. Queen Anne, it is well known, had loved him when young, but state necessity prevented her union with a subject. His understanding was strong and clear; he despised vanity: it was with difficulty he could be prevailed upon to accept the titles of earl of Godolphin, and viscount Rialton; he absolutely declined being elected a knight of the garter. Flattery was swered, "That this affair was not yet ripe for them to debate, and that they need not doubt, but that her majesty would communicate to the parliament of England, all the proceedings about the Union, as soon as that of Scotland should have gone through with it."

The lords Wharton, Somers, and Halifax, spoke on the same side, and urged, "That it was an honour to this nation, that the Treaty of Union should first come ratified from the parliament of Scotland: and that then, and not before, was the proper time to take the same into consideration."

The Motion dropped.] Feb. 3. Upon which, the other party finding they were too weak to carry the question, the earl of Nottingham's motion was dropped.

odious to him. He seldom promised, but often gave without application. Retired and silent, admittance was denied to all. His foible was a most immoderate love for gaming; he pleaded in excuse his dislike to conversation. Godolphin was short and thin; of complexion swarthy; and of countenance stern, even to severity." Noble's Continuation of Granger, vol. 6, p. 18.

"It is said, he was originally intended for a trade, before his friends preferred him to be a page at court, which some have very unjustly objected as a reproach. He hath risen gradually in four reigns, and was more constant to his second master king James, than some others who had received much greater obligations; for he attended the abdicated king to the sea-side, and kept constant correspondence with him till the day of his death. He always professed a sort of passion for the queen at St. Germain's; and his letters were to her in the style of what the French call double-entendre. In a mixture of love and respect, he used frequently to send her from hence little presents of those things which are agreeable to ladies, for which he always asked king William's leave, as if without her privacy; because if she had known that circumstance, it was to be supposed she would not accept them. Physiognomists would hardly discover, by consulting the aspect of this lord, that his predominant passions were love and play; that he could sometimes scratch out a song in praise of his mistress with a pencil and card; or that he hath tears at command, like a woman, to be used either in an intrigue of gallantry, or politics. His alliance with the Marlborough family, and his passion for the dutchess, were the cords which dragged him into a party, whose principles he naturally disliked, and whose leaders he personally hated, as they did him. He became a thorough convert, by a perfect trifle, taking fire at a nickname, (Volpone), delivered by Dr. Sacheverel, with great indiscretion from the pulpit, which he applied to himself: and this is one, among many instances given by his enemies, that magnanimity is none of his virtues." Swift's Four Last Years of Queen Anne, p. 18.

The Queen's Speech concerning the Union.]

Jan. 28. By this time the act of the parliament of Scotland, for ratifying the Treaty of Union, was sent up to London. Upon which, the queen came this day to the House of Peers, and made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; Having acquainted you at the opening of this session, that the Treaty for an Union between England and Scotland, which had been concluded here by the Commissioners appointed for that purpose, in pursuance of the powers given by the parliaments of both kingdoms, was then under the consideration of the parliament of Scotland, I can now, with great satisfaction, inform you, that the said Treaty has been ratified by act of parliament in Scotland, with some alterations and additions.—I have directed the Treaty agreed to by the commissioners of both kingdoms, and also the Act of Ratification from Scotland, to be laid before you, and I hope it will meet with your concurrence and approbation.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; It being agreed by this Treaty, that Scotland is to have an equivalent for what that kingdom is obliged to contribute towards paying the debts of England, I must recommend to you, that, in case you agree to the Treaty, you would take care to provide for the payment of the equivalent to Scotland accordingly.

"My Lords and Gentlemen; You have now an opportunity before you, of putting the last hand to a happy Union of the two kingdoms, which I hope will be a lasting blessing to the whole island, a great addition to its wealth and power, and a firm security to the protestant religion.—The advantages which will accrue to us all from an Union, are so apparent, that I will add no more, but that I shall look upon it as a particular happiness in this great work, which has been so often attempted without success, can be brought to perfection in my reign."

The Articles of the Union presented to the House of Commons.] The lord Coningsby upon the return of the Commons to their own House, by her majesty's command, presented to them the Articles of the Union*, agreed upon by the commissioners, the act of parliament passed in Scotland for the ratification of them, and a copy of the Minute book, of the Proceedings of the said Commissioners, which were ordered to be printed; and upon a motion being made, and the question being put, That an Address should be presented to the queen, to order the Minutes of the former Commissioners proceeding in the first year of her reign, about an Union, to be laid before the House, it passed in the negative; and they afterwards resolved on an Address of thanks to her majesty for her Speech, and for communicating the Articles of the Union, and the Scottish Ratification of them; To which the queen made answer, "She was well pleased, what she had done was so much to the satisfaction of that House."

* See Appendix, No. II.

An Act for the Security of the Church of England.] Feb. 3. The Lords on the motion of the Archbishop of Canterbury ordered a Bill to be brought in for the Security of the Church of England; which being read a second time, this day (the queen and prince being present) a question was put, Whether it should be an Instruction, by the leave of the House, to insert in the bill, the Act made the 35 Car. 2, entitled, 'An Act for the preventing dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants:' which was resolved in the negative by a majority of 63 voices against 33. Then another question was put, That it be an instruction to the committee of the whole House, to whom the Bill for Security of the Church was committed, that there should be inserted in the said bill, as a fundamental condition of the intended Union with Scotland, particular and express words, declaring, perpetual and unalterable, an act of parliament made the 25 Car. 2, entitled, 'An Act for preventing, &c.'

Protest thereon.] But this being resolved also in the negative, occasioned the following Protest:

"We conceive that this Act doth deserve to be particularly mentioned, and not left to double constructions; because as it was at first made to secure our church, then in danger, by the concurrence of Papists and Dissenters to destroy it; so they have found by experience, both in the reign of king Charles 2, and of king James 2, that it was the most effectual means of our preservation, by removing from their employments the greatest enemies of our church; and particularly in the reign of the late king James 2, the assuming of a dispensing power, and illegal practices, by closeting and corrupting the members of parliament, were chiefly levelled against the Test Act. (Signed) Northampton, Nottingham, Buckingham, Craven, Thomas Roffen, Guilford, R. Dunelm. Beaufort, Scarsdale, Jo. Ebor. R. Cestriens. Stawel, Thanet, Anglesa, Howard, Sussex, Weymouth, Graunville, Guernsey, North and Grey."

After which their lordships went through the Bill.*

* Dr. Calamy has the following observation on this Act: "The thus confirming the act of uniformity and the ecclesiastical constitution here in England, in all particulars, upon the present foot for perpetuity, was reckoned by the dissenters to make their way the clearer, since all hopes of a further reformation of the constitution (of which there is so much need) were hereby taken away. The old puritans many of them fell in with the established church, in hope of that way contributing to a farther reformation: and they, that adhere to their principles have, since the restoration, been often pressed to imitate their example, and fall in with the established church, with that view; and some worthy persons actually have done it: but the government by this settlement of all things in

Debate in the House of Commons concerning the Union.] Feb. 4. The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole House, to consider of the Articles of Union, and Act of Ratification of the parliament of Scotland, and Mr. Compton being chosen chairman,

Mr. Charles Cæsar opened the debate, and raised, though modestly, some scruples against the Union. He was seconded by Sir John Packington, who said, "That the business of the Union, that was now before them, being of the highest importance, required therefore the most deliberate consideration; that, with relation thereto, people without doors had been, for a long time, tongue-tied by a special order of council, which not reaching them within those walls, he would very freely impart his thoughts about it. That, for his part, he was absolutely against this incorporating Union, which he said, was like the marrying a woman against her consent: an Union that was carried on by corruption and bribery within doors, and by force and violence without, &c." Many of the members taking offence at these bold expressions, which so highly reflected both on her majesty's ministers, and the Scottish Commissioners and parliament; sir J. Packington said he was informed, That in Scotland they said the Union was carried by bribery and force: adding, "That the promoters thereof, in thus basely giving up their independent constitution, had actually betrayed the trust reposed in them, and therefore he would leave it to the judgment of the House to consider, whether or no men of such principles were fit to be admitted to sit amongst them? That, among the many inconveniences and irreconcilable contradictions this Union was liable to, he would only take notice of this material one, viz. That her majesty, by the Coronation Oath, was obliged to maintain the Church of England, as by law established, and bound likewise, by the said Oath, to defend the Presbyterian Kirk of Scotland, in one and the same kingdom: Now, said he, after this Union is in force, who shall administer this oath to her majesty? It is not the business of the Scots, who are incapable of it, and no well-wishers to the Church of England: it is then only the part of the bishops to do it; and can it be supposed those reverend prelates will, or can act a thing so contrary to their own order and institution, as thus to promote the establishment of the Presbyterian church-government the church as they were to perpetuity, and embodying this settlement with the Union, and making it a fundamental part of it, has quite silenced that plea, and made it as senseless to urge it as it would be weak to regard it. So that henceforward all, that are convinced, that a farther reformation is needful, and that it is their duty in their places to pursue it, are bound in conscience to keep at a distance from that church, which (as much as in it lies) barred all avenues of farther light, and determined by a law, that it will be, as it is, for ever."

in this United Kingdom?" He urged, "That the Church of England being established jure divino, and the Scots pretending that their Kirk was also jure divino, he could not tell, how two nations that clashed in so essential a point, could unite: and therefore he thought it proper to consult the Convocation about this crucial point."

Major general Mordant in opposition to sir John Packington, said, "That he knew of no other jure divino than God Almighty's permission: In which sense it might be said that the church of England and the kirk of Scotland were both jure divino, because God Almighty had permitted that the first should prevail in England, and the other in Scotland, and that the member who spoke last, might, if he thought fit, consult the Convocation, for his own particular instruction; but that it would be derogatory from the rights of the Commons of England to advise on this occasion, with an inferior assembly, who had no share in the legislature."

Little was said in answer to this speech; only some members moved, "That the first Article of the Treaty, which implied a peremptory agreement to an incorporating Union might be postponed, and that the House should proceed to the consideration of the terms of that intended Union contained in the other Articles."

The Articles of the Treaty approved of by the Commons.] Which motion being rejected by a great majority, several members of the opposite side went out of the House, and the rest read and approved, without opposition, the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th Articles of the Treaty, and read the 5th.

Feb. 8. The Commons, in a committee of the whole House, went through, and approved the remaining Articles of the Treaty. The only objection the other party raised on this occasion, was that they went post-haste in a business of the highest importance. To which it was answered, "that deliberation always supposes doubts and difficulties, but no material objections being offered against any of the Articles, there was no room for delays." But some of the members still crying out 'post-haste, post-haste,' Sir Thomas Littleton very smartly pursued the allegory, and said, "They did not ride post-haste, but a good easy trot: and, for his part, as long as the weather was fair, the roads good, and their horses in heart, he was of opinion, they ought to jog on, and not take up till it was night."

Feb. 8. The Commons received the report of their grand committee, with their resolutions, containing their approbation of the Articles of the Union, as amended and ratified by the parliament of Scotland, to which the House agreed, without any amendment; and ordered a Bill to be brought in to ratify the same.

Debate in the House of Lords concerning the Union.] Feb. 16th. This day, in the House of Lords, there was a grand debate about the Treaty of Union, the queen being present. Their lordships having resolved themselves into a committee of the whole House, and the Bishop of Salisbury (Dr. Burnet) being called upon to take the chair, the debate on the first Article was opened by

The Earl of Rochester, who acquainted the House, "That he had many things to object to several of those Articles, which, he said, it was all one to him whether their lordships would please to receive them now, or when those Articles came more properly under their consideration."

The Earl of Anglesea moved, "That the first Article might be postponed, it being impossible for him to give his vote to it, before he knew, and was thoroughly satisfied, wherein this Union was to consist." Several others were of that opinion, among whom the bishop of Bath and Wells spoke much to the same effect.

The Earl of Nottingham excepted against the name of 'Great-Britain,' alledging, it was such an innovation in the monarchy as totally subverted all the laws of England, and therefore moved, that the judges opinion might be asked about it; wherein he was seconded by several other lords: hereupon the Judges being severally asked their opinions in that respect, unanimously declared they could not conceive that it any ways altered or impaired the constitution of this realm, whose laws, they were of opinion, must remain entirely the same as well after as before the Union, except such as were altogether inconsistent with, and directly contrary thereto.

Lord Haversham. "My lord; What my noble lord (Rochester) has mentioned to your lordships, occasions my standing up; I find myself under the same difficulties: I have several things to say to this matter of the Union, to your lordships, and it is very indifferent to me when I offer them. I have a right of speaking my thoughts, and entering my protest too, to any thing I dislike, and I shall certainly find some time to do so, before this matter can pass into a law. I am in your lordships judgment, whether you will allow me to speak what I have to say, now."

"My lords, with what disposition I come hither, I hope, may be collected by the motion I made your lordships last year, for repealing certain clauses that were grievous to Scotland. I would do any thing that was for the benefit and good of both nations."

"These Articles come to your lordships with the greatest countenance of authority that I think it is possible any thing can come; your commissioners have agreed to them; the Scots parliament has, with some few amendments, ratified them; and the queen herself, from the throne, approves of them; and yet you must give me leave to say that authority, though it be the strongest motive to incline the will, is the weakest argument in all the world to convince the understanding. It is the argument the Church of Rome makes use of for their superstitious worship, where there are ten Avemaries to one Pater-noster; just as unreasonable as if ten times the application and Address were made to a she-favourite, as to the person of a Sovereign, which is a kind of state idolatry.

“I would not, my Lords, be misunderstood, as if I were against an Union. A federal Union, an Union of interest, an Union in Succession is what I shall be always for; nay, were it whether a people inhabiting the same island, speaking the same language, and having the same religion, should be under one and the same form of policy and government, I cannot see how any man could be against it; but this a matter of a quite different nature; it is, whether two nations independent in their sovereignties, that have their distinct laws and interests, and, what I cannot forget, their different forms of worship, church-government and order, shall be united into one kingdom.—An Union made up, in my opinion, of so many mismatched pieces, of such jarring, incongruous ingredients, that, should it ever take effect, I fear would carry the necessary consequence of a standing power and force, to keep us from falling asunder, and breaking in pieces every moment: for, as my lord Bacon well observes, (whom I take to have been a very great man, though sometimes the courtier got the better of the philosopher) an unity, says he, that is pieced up by a direct admission of contraries in the fundamental points of it, is like the toes of Nebuchadnezzar's image, which were made of iron and clay; they may cleave together, but can never incorporate.

“Another reason why I am against an incorporating Union is for the sake of the good old English constitution justly allowed to be the most equal and best poised government in all the world, the peculiar excellency of which lies in that well proportioned distribution of powers, whereby the greatness of the monarch, and the safety of the people, are at once provided for; and it is a maxim in all policy, that the surest way to preserve any government, is by a strict adherence to its principles, so that whilst this balance of power is kept equal, the constitution is safe; but who can answer what alteration so great a weight, as sixty-one Scots members, and those too returned by a Scots privy-council, when thrown into the balance, may make?

“Besides, my lords, I must own I am apprehensive of the precedent, and know not how far it may be carried hereafter, or what alterations future parliaments may think fit to make; It is evident, by the two and twentieth Article, that above a hundred Scots peers, and as many commoners, are excluded from sitting and voting in the British parliament; who perhaps as little thought of being so a year or two ago, as any of your lordships do now; for they had as much right by inheritance, of sitting there, as any one lord in this House has of sitting here; and that right too, as well and as strongly fenced and secured to them by the fundamental laws of their kingdom, by Claim of Right, and act of parliament, which made it treason to make any alteration in the constitution of that kingdom; and yet have not they lost their privilege? And what one security has any peer of England, by the laws of this land, to his right and privilege of peerage that those lords had not? My lords the bishops have once been voted out of this House by the temporal lords already, and who knows what question may come hereafter: I will venture my life in defence of the church of England, and yet, at the same time own myself an occasional conformist. But if, my lords, the bishops, will weaken their own cause so far as to give up the two great points of episcopal ordination and confirmation, if they will approve and ratify the act for securing the presbyterian church government in Scotland, as the true protestant religion and purity of worship, they give up that which has been contended for between them and the presbyterians these thirty years; and which I will undertake to prove to my lords, the bishops, has been defended by the greatest and learnedest men in the church of England. I hope, when it is proper, my lords will please to give some light to one who desires instruction, that I may not ignorantly do any thing in this matter.

“There is another reason why I am against this Union, because I cannot think it an entire Union; the exempted Articles, I mean the twentieth Article, whereby heretable offices and superiorities are reserved; and also the one and twentieth; both which Oliver, by an act of state, was so wise as to abolish; especially their act for securing their presbyterian church government, and general assemblies, seem to me like those little clouds in a warm, calm summer's day, that are generally the seeds and attractives of approaching tempests and thunder. I the rather take notice of these, because though the Articles of Union are ratified by the Scotch parliament, yet the bulk and body of that nation seem to be against them. Have not the murmurs of the people there been so loud as to fill the whole nation? And so bold too, as to reach even to the doors of the parliament? Has not the parliament itself thought fit to suspend their beloved clause in the act of security, for arming their people during the session? Nay, has not the government, by advice of parliament, set out a proclamation, which I have here in my own hand, pardoning all slaughter, bloodshed, maiming, &c. that is committed upon any who are found in any tumults there, and discharging all prosecution for the future? I do not mention this to find fault with any thing that is done in Scotland, but only to shew to your lordships, that when such an unusual proclamation as this is set out by advice of parliament, and cannot stay the forms of a law, when we know that, upon extraordinary occasions, if it be but to grace a compliment, a bill may be read three times in one day; sure, my lords, it shews a very great ferment that requires so very speedy an application. After all, has not what we desire, I mean their being upon the same foot of succession with us, been offered without this Union? In short, my lords, I think an incorporating Union one of the most dangerous experiments to both nations; in which, if we happen to be mistaken, however we may think of curing things hereafter, the error is irretrievable.

"My lords, this is the last time that I believe I shall ever trouble your lordships in an English parliament, give me leave therefore to say but one word. In king Charles the first's time, the cavaliers were the persons that ventured their lives, and lost their estates to serve him. And in king Charles the second's time they were forgot, and left starving. At the Restoration, the presbyterians were as zealous for that as any men whatever, and none were more prosecuted all his reign. Towards the latter end of that reign, the bishops threw out the bill of Exclusion, and king James put them into the Tower. At the Revolution, the Londonderry men, &c. were the persons that made the first and noblest stop to king James in Ireland; and I myself have fed some of them at my own table, when they were starving with the greatest commendations and promises in their pockets; which I have seen under king William's own hand. In the last reign, every body knows who they were that made their most constant court at St. James's, and we see in what favour they are at this present.—Now there is a great deal of zeal for this Union, I wish from my soul that the advantages may attend it, of tranquillity and security, power, peace and plenty, as is intended by it; but yet it is possible men may be mistaken, I won't say they will ever repent of it; but I will take leave to say what I have formerly said in this place, that what has been, may be."

The debate being over, the question was put, Whether the consideration of the first Article of the Treaty of Union should be postponed till all the other Articles had been examined? But the negative carried it by a majority of 72 voices against 22: and so the first six Articles were read and approved, and the consideration of the rest adjourned to the 19th, when the Lords resumed the consideration of the Treaty.

The Lord North and Grey* observed, with relation to the ninth Article, The small and un-

* "William North was born December 22, 1673, and succeeded, on the death of his father, Charles, in 1690, as sixth lord North, and second lord Grey, of Rolleston in Staffordshire; of this family he took his place in the House of Peers, in January, 1698. In the reign of queen Anne he was appointed lord lieutenant of Cambridgeshire, governor of Portsmouth, and made a member of the privy council; but his chief merit was his military conduct: and having served, with great honour, under the duke of Marlborough, he was appointed lieutenant general of the British forces; and particularly distinguished himself at Blenheim, where his right hand was shot off. In the reign of George I he was confined in the Tower, on suspicion of treason, with the duke of Norfolk, bishop Aterbury, and Dr. Friend. After his release he retired to Spain, and entered into the army of that country, with the same rank he had held in the British service. Lord North died at Madrid, October 31, 1734; and left no issue by his lady, Maria Margareta, daughter of M. Ellmeert, receiver-general to the States of Holland. Charles, his only brother, died unmarried, at the siege of Lisle: and the barony of Grey, of Rolleston, became extinct. equal proportion Scotland was to pay to the land-tax, urging, that Wales, as poor a country every whit as that, and of a much lesser extent, paid to the full as much again, and yet sent not much more than half the representatives to parliament, which were granted to Scotland, and for that reason his lordship said, he could not agree to that Article.

He was answered by Lord Halifax, That the number of representatives was no rule to go by, since there was the county of Cornwall of England, that paid not near so much towards the land tax as that of Gloucester, and yet sent almost five times as many members to parliament as the latter did. That it was very true the quota of Scotland was very small and unequal, in comparison to what was paid in England; but that the English commissioners could not induce the Scotch to agree to any more, upon account of several impossibilities on their side; that we could not expect to reap the like advantages of every Article of the Treaty; and that if they had the better of us in some few, we were infinitely recompensed by the many advantages which did accrue to us from the whole.

The House divided again on this Article, there being 70 contented with it, against 23 not contented, and so having run over the four following ones, the consideration of the rest was further adjourned to the 21st, when (the queen being present) the debate chiefly ran on the fifteenth Article.

The Earl of Nottingham observed, it consisted of two parts, viz. a certain grant of money, and the application thereof, in reference to which he said, That it was highly unreasonable, that the Scots, who were by the Treaty let into all the branches of our trade, and paid so little towards the support of the government, and of a most expensive and bloody war, should moreover have an equivalent of 398,085*l.* given them for coming into that Treaty. He insisted much upon that argument, and took notice, as to the disposal of the equivalent, that that part of it which was given to the Darien company, was so ordered, as that it might be swallowed up by a few persons, without any particular regard to the indemnifying every private sufferer in that unhappy enterprize.

The Lord Halifax answered, That this Equivalent could not be looked upon as a gift, but as an actual purchase of the Scots revenue and customs, which by this Union, were to be applied to the payment of the debts of England; and that they were no more gainers by it, than we were here by the sale of annuities at 15 or 16 years purchase: That as to the disposal of the money, it being their own, it was but reasonable that they should have the liberty of applying the same, as they thought most convenient, the English commissioners being no ways concerned therein; whose care, nevertheless, and great prudence had been such, that they made provision that it should not be disposed but by certain commissioners who should be accountable for the same to the parliament of Great Britain.

Their Lordships this day proceeding as far as the 19th Article, adjourned to the 24th, when (the Queen being still present.)

The Earl of Thanet, on the 20th Article, acquainted their Lordships, That himself having an heretable office here in England, by being perpetual sheriff of the county of Westmorland, he would be glad, with their Lordships leave, to have the opinion of the Judges, about the preservation of that his right, there being no provision made in this article for heretable offices in England.

The Lord Chamberlain (Marquis of Lindsey) seconded him in that motion, saying, He had the honour likewise of having such an heretable office, as was then in question, about the preservation whereof he had the very same doubts and scruples with the noble peer that spoke last: whereupon it was agreed, that the Judges should deliver their opinion about it, which they accordingly did, from the puisne Judge, to the Lord Chief Justice; whose answers were near the same, with what they had declared to the House, to be their opinion, with respect to the first Article.

The Earl of Rochester, after reading the 22d Article, declared, He looked upon it as incongruous, contradictory to, and inconsistent with itself; that there were 16 Peers to be returned to the House of Lords in the Parliament of Great Britain, who were peers and no peers: that being all peers by right of inheritance, they were nevertheless made here elective, he took to be divesting them of their Peerage: because not being always elected to every parliament of Great Britain, they consequently must lose, when left out, the benefit of sitting in parliament, what was ever deemed an inseparable right of the Peerage: that the rest of the nobility of Scotland, to the number of above 100, were thereby manifestly injured; and that, for his part, he wondered very much, how the Scots came to accept of such unreasonable conditions; or how their lordships could entertain the thoughts of permitting such peers by election to sit among them.

The Lords Nottingham, North and Grey, &c. very much enforced this topic, adding, That as one might very well suppose that those Scots Peers would be such as were addicted kirk, it might prove of a dangerous consequence to the church of England.

The Earl of Wharton replied, That though they were all never so much of the kirk party, yet there was no reason to fear, but they would also be very well disposed for the church of England, and stand up in its defence on all occasions; since there were even some sitting among their lordships who would venture their lives for the church of England, and yet openly declared themselves to be at the same time occasional conformists.

The Lord Haberham, rightly judging he was hinted at by that noble peer, stood up to inform the House, what he understood by an occasional conformist; (in which explanation he appeared somewhat gravelled;) for after having made a long encomium on the episcopal order, which he took to be the best and most conformable to primitive Christianity, he gave no less commendation to all the Protestant Churches abroad, and to the kirk of Scotland itself, in particular; which he said, was a true Protestant Church.

The Bishop of Bath and Wells, after begging pardon for troubling their Lordships on this account, and saying that if he spoke any thing out of the way, he was under their correction: declared, That, for his part, he was altogether against the Union, which he could wish with all his heart had been compleated an hundred years ago; because, said he, all the ferment and discord which were likely to ensue upon it, would by this time have had their course: that he could no better compare it, than to the mixing together strong liquors, of a contrary nature, in one and the same vessel, which would go right to be burst asunder by their furious fermentation: That as their bench was always reckoned the dead weight of the House, so those sixteen Peers being admitted to sit therein, would more effectually make it so, especially in any future debates relating to the church, towards which they could no ways be supposed to be well affected; and therefore he was humbly of opinion, that some provision might be made for debarring them of their vote in any church matter that should hereafter come in agitation.

The Lords Somers, Halifax, and others, made very pertinent Answers to those objections, after which the debate ended in a general division of the House, there being 71 contents for the 22nd Article, against 22 not contents.

After reading the last Article,

The Earl of Arran moved that the Judges Opinion might be asked, what laws would be repealed by this Union, and what would remain in force, but that motion was rejected: Upon which

The Earl of Nottingham stood up and begged their lordships pardon for having troubled them almost to every Article, urging there were such material objections occurring to his thoughts, as in conscience he thought himself obliged to lay before the House: that as Sir John Maynard, made this compliment to the late king at the Revolution, that having buried, upon account of his great age, all his contemporaries in Westminster-Hall, he was afraid, if his majesty had not come in that very juncture of time, he might have likewise out-lived the very laws themselves; so, if this Union did pass, as he had no reason to doubt but it would most certainly, he might wish as much reason, and as justly affirm, he had out-lived all the laws and the very constitution of England; concluding with a Prayer to God, to avert the dire effects which might probably ensue from such an incorporating Union.

The Treaty of Union approved by the Lords.] Three days after, the bishop of Salisbury reported to the House of Lords the Resolutions of their grand Committee, for approving the Articles of Union, which were agreed to by a great majority; but several peers made and entered the following Protest.

Protest thereon.] "Dissentient. We dissent to every one of the 25 Resolutions. Granville, Maversham, Stawell.

"I dissent to the 4 last Resolutions, having not been present at the passing the others. Geo. Bath and Well.

"I dissent to every one of the 25 Resolutions except the second. Beaufort.

"I dissent to the 1st, 4th, 5th, 6th, 9th, 15th, 18th, 19th, 21st, 22d, and 25th, Resolutions. Abingdon.

"Dissentient. To the Ninth Resolution.

"Because we humbly conceive the sum of 48,000*l.* to be charged on the kingdom of Scotland, as the quota of Scotland, for a land-Tax, is not proportionable to the 4*s.* aid, granted by the parliament of England; but if, by reason of the present circumstances of the kingdom, it might have been thought it was not able to bear a greater proportion at this time, yet we cannot but think it unequal to this kingdom, that it should be agreed, that whenever, the 4*s.* aid shall be enacted by the parliament of Great-Britain, to be raised on land in England, that 48,000*l.* now raised on Scotland shall never be increased in time to come, though the trade of that kingdom should be extremely improved, and consequently the value of their land proportionably raised, which in all probability it must do, when this Union shall have taken effect. North and Grey, Rochester, Howard, Leigh, Guilford.

"Dissentient. To the 16th Resolution.

"Because we humbly conceive nothing could have been more equal on this head of the Treaty, than that neither of the kingdoms should have been burdened with the debts of the other, contracted before the Union; and if that proposal which we find once made in the Minutes of the Treaty, had taken place, there would have been an occasion to have employed the revenues of the kingdom of Scotland towards the payment of the debts of England, those revenues might have been strictly appropriated to the debts of the kingdom, and to any other uses within themselves as should have been judged requisite, and there would have been no need of an equivalent of very near 400,000*l.* to be raised on England, within this year, for the purchase of those revenues in Scotland, which however it may prove to be but a reasonable bargain, upon a strict calculation, there does not seem to have been a necessity just now to have raised so great a sum when this kingdom is already burdened with so vast ones, for necessary charges of the war. Rochester, North and Grey, Guilford, Leigh.

"Dissentient. To the 23d Resolution.

"Because we humbly conceive, in the first place, that the number of sixteen peers of Scotland, is too great a proportion to be added to the peers of England, who very rarely consist in more than an hundred attending Lords, in any one session of parliament, and for that reason we humbly apprehend, such a number as sixteen may have a very great sway in the Resolutions of this House, of which the consequence cannot now be foreseen.—In the second place, we conceive the Lords of Scotland, who by virtue of this Treaty are to sit in this House, being not qualified as the peers of England are, must suffer a diminution of their dignity to sit here on so different foundations; their right of sitting here, depending entirely on an election, and that from time to time during the continuance of one parliament only; and at the same time, we are humbly of opinion, that the peers of England who sit here by creation from the crown, and have a right of so doing in themselves or their heirs, by that creation for ever, may find it an alteration in their constitution, to have Lords added to their number, to sit and vote in all matters brought before a parliament, who have not the same (Right) of their seats in parliament, as the peers of England have. Buckingham, North and Grey, Leigh, Rochester, Guilford.

"We dissent to the Resolution of passing the last Article, because there being no enumeration of what laws are to be repealed, it is conceived too great a latitude of construction thereupon is left to the Judges. Rochester, Leigh, North and Grey, Guilford."

A Rider offered to the Bill of Union.] March 1. The Commons sent up a bill for uniting the two kingdoms, by Mr. Compton, to the House of Lords, who gave it a quick dispatch; but, upon reading it the third time, the lord North and Grey offered the following Rider to be added to it, viz. "Provided always that nothing in this ratification contained, shall be construed to extend to an approbation or acknowledgment of the truth of the Presbyterian way of worship, or allowing the religion of the Church of Scotland, to be what it is stiled, the true protestant religion."

Protest thereon.] But, after a debate, the question being put, Whether the said Rider should be read a second time? It was carried in the Negative, by a majority of 56 against 19.

“Dissentient. Beaufort, Buckingham, North and Grey, Anglesea, Winchelsea, Northampton, Abingdon, Nottingham, Scarsdale, Geo. Bath and Wells, Thanet, Granville, Stawell, Guernsey, Weymouth, Guilford, Leigh.”

Protest against the Ratification of the Union.] Then the question was put, Whether this Bill should pass? Which was resolved in the affirmative, by a great majority. The peers who entered their dissent were these that follow :

“Dissentient. Nottingham, Anglesea, Thanet, Winchelsea, Northampton, Scarsdale, Weymouth, Guernsey.

“Because the constitution of this kingdom has been so very excellent, and therefore justly applauded by all our neighbours for so many ages, that we cannot conceive it prudent to change it, and to venture at all those alterations made by this Bill, some of them, especially, being of such a nature, that, as the inconveniences and danger of them (in our humble opinion) is already but too obvious, some think it more proper and decent to avoid entering further into the particular apprehension we have from the passing of this law. (Signed.) Beaufort, Buckingham, Stawell, Guilford, Granville.”

*The Bishop of Oxford's Speech in favour of the Union.**] During the debates on the Union, The Bishop of Oxford (Dr. Talbot †) made the following speech :

“I do the more easily presume upon pardon from my lords, for my taking up their time in a debate of this consequence, because I have not often stood in need of it, by offending in this kind; and because I think I am now necessarily called up by the noble lord that spoke last but one. It is indeed no new favour that lord has bestowed upon this bench. I have too often had occasion to observe, with a great deal of concern as if we sat here on no other terms than the judges do, to be called up at pleasure, and many times with questions that carry (to say no worse) very unkind insinuations or suspicions.

“I need not go back for instances further than the time of this bill's coming into the House. One noble lord, in the debate on our bill of security, was pleased to direct himself to us in words to this purpose: ‘If those reverend prelates do not believe the religion of the church of England to be the purest and most agreeable to the scriptures, and her constitution and government most conformable to the ‘primitive church: If they that instructed me in my religion have taught me wrong, if they have changed their opinion, let them tell me so, let them undeceive me.’ And that noble lord, in a speech, with which the world has since been obliged in print, was pleased to express himself thus: ‘If my lords the bishops will weaken their own cause, will give up the two great points of episcopal ordination and confirmation; if they will approve and ratify the act for securing the Presbyterian church-government in Scotland, as the true protestant religion and purity of worship.’ And the noble lord that called me up asserted, ‘That there could not be two true religions; if that of Scotland be true, ours cannot be so;’ and desired, for the sake of the bishops, that part of the Scotch act might be distinctly read, wherein they call their presbyterian religion the true religion and purity of worship; or if we believe ours to be the true religion, can we assent to such a proposition?

“Now, my lords, surely any indifferent persons may judge, that these ifs do carry pretty severe implications with them, as if we of this bench had not that real love for episcopacy we ought to have, as if we were more tenderly inclined to those churches, that have not episcopal ordination and confirmation, than we should be, as if supposing we had a due opinion of the constitution of the church we should contradict it, by giving our consent to this bill; nay as if we were regardless of the danger episcopacy might be exposed to by passing this act; for as one of my noble lords says, the bishops have been once voted out of this House by the temporal lords, and who knows what question may come hereafter.

“I shall beg leave to resume my complaint by and by, and shall first answer directly to the several heads of this charge. As for episcopacy, there is no man breathing has a greater esteem, or a juster value for that primitive form of church government than I have. I shall express my notion of it, not in the words of any bishop or particular doctor, but of the church herself, in her preface to the office of ordination, which is made the law of the land by the act of Uniformity. Her words are, and such is my opinion, ‘That it is evident to any man diligently reading the holy scriptures and ancient authors, That there have been in the church, from the apostles times, the three orders of bishops, priests and deacons.’ As to those reformed churches which have not episcopacy, I must distinguish between them that want it necessarily, and those that are without it upon choice. As to the former, my opinion is, that it is uncharitable to condemn them, as if they wanted lawful pastors, or had not the sacraments rightly administered. And this opinion I shall back with a very good authority, that of the university of Oxford, who, in a letter lately wrote in answer to one received from Geneva, have these words; ‘Longe est a charitate nostrâ ecclesias illas reformatas, que necessitatis lege a primava episcopalis regi-

"As to those of the Scotch Kirk, they cannot come under this favourable opinion; for they cannot be said to be without episcopal government by necessity, but upon choice; and I shall not fear to speak my judgment very freely of them, which is, That I take them to be guilty of a wilful and most unjustifiable deviation from the pattern of the apostolic and primitive church; and yet, notwithstanding my opinion of episcopacy and the Scotch presbytery, I do not apprehend that I shall in the least contradict it, or be inconsistent with myself in voting for this bill. It is true, the Scotch in the bill for the security of the kirk, which is to be an essential condition of any Union betwixt the two kingdoms, have called their presbyterian religion the true protestant religion. But do I acknowledge their religion to be such by consenting to this bill? What is it that I or any lord should consent to, by saying Content when the question for this bill shall be put? Why that the bill shall pass into a law. And what passes into a law but what the bill enacts? Does the bill enact that their religion is the true protestant religion? No such thing. They have used that epithet; but can my consenting to what is enacted in the bill include my assent to every proposition that may be found, by putting a copula between a subject, and an epithet that may have been unduly applied to it in the preamble? I would suppose we were treating upon articles with the French king; those that should act for him would be sure to give him the stile of the Most Christian king; but would it follow, that if we were to ratify the Treaty agreed on, in some part whereof he was to be so stiled, that we consented to this proposition, that Lewis 14, is Most Christian? Or were we upon a treaty with some part of Spain or Italy, where the Inquisition prevails, and something were to be stipulated on account of that office, they would surely use the stile of the Most Holy Inquisition; but would it follow from our confirming a treaty, in some part of which they used that epithet Most Holy, that we assented that the inquisition was Most Holy? No more can be supposed to be consented to in those cases, than that that king who stiles himself Most Christian and that inquisition that calls itself Most Holy, shall have the benefit of the articles agreed upon in those treaties. In like manner, by consenting to this act, I only agree that there shall be an Union between the two kingdoms on the terms agreed on; and that notwithstanding this Union in other points, they of Scotland shall enjoy the religion established there, which they call the true one, and we shall enjoy the religion here, which we call and know to be the true one. But I do no more assent, by consenting to this bill, that their religion is the true one, than they do acknowledge ours to be the true one; which surely they are far enough from owning.

"As little am I apprehensive, that this Union may endanger episcopacy, and the religion established in our church. Indeed if I were, notwithstanding that I can foresee many great and glorious advantages that this Union will bring to both kingdoms: yet were there ten times more and greater, that single danger should turn the scale with me, and make me give my negative to the bill. I cannot but take notice, that this proposition of the Union is an unhappy one in this respect; the greatest bignots of the Scotch kirk were fearful it would ruin that, and some of the most zealous of our church, particularly my noble lord that will venture his life for her, are under great apprehensions that will destroy our church.

"My lords, if notwithstanding the two acts passed for the security of the religions respectively professed in the two kingdoms, both must not subsist after the Union, but one must swallow up the other; I cannot for my life imagine, but it is far more likely that England may at some time or other restore episcopacy to Scotland, than that ever Scotland should be capable to introduce presbytery into England. To omit other advantages that England may have over Scotland as to this, let us reflect only on the superiority of numbers that England will have over Scotland in the British parliament: 513 to 45 in the other House, and about 140 to 16 in this. But it is said, We may not all be of one mind, we may not all be cordial for episcopacy: And are we sure that the Scotch members will be all of one mind, all zealous for presbytery? I am sure we have been told over and over, when presbytery was established in Scotland, that it was a most unpolitic as well as wicked thing, for that the best part of the nobility and gentry of that kingdom were against the tyranny of the presbyterian government, and were for the episcopal. Now if this be true, if they that are to come into this House must be of the nobility, and those that come into the other House probably of the best gentry, we shall have an accession of strength to the cause of episcopacy. But I will suppose the Scotch members to be rank zealots for presbytery; yet what can 16 of them do in this House; wherein, since a noble lord has declared himself so plainly and warmly, I will venture to pronounce we are all to a man for episcopacy, even all we of this bench.

"And now, my lords, while I am up, let me beg your leave while I a little complain of, or at least lament, that unkind treatment, we meet with. I have observed to your lordships, how we have been called up, and with hard insinuations or suspicious, as if we were not heartily inclined to the constitution of the church. And truly if such jealousies can be entertained and expressed of us within, we ought not to wonder at the usage we have without doors: That we are traduced as men governed by no better principles than those of interest and present views; as no true friends to the interest of our church, but distinguished enemies, ready upon occasion to betray her.

However senseless and contradictory these reflections are, there are those that are wicked enough to spread them abroad, and those that are credulous and silly enough to receive them.

“As for myself, it is a little thing to say that the religion of the church of England is that I received from my ancestors, in which I have been born and bred, though I am sure that is more than several can say, that are now very zealous for it; but it is that which I have embraced upon judgment and choice; and ever since I have been able to form an opinion of this kind, it has been my opinion, That the religion professed in this church is the purest and most agreeable to that introduced by our blessed Saviour, and her discipline, government, and worship most conformable to the pattern of the primitive church, of any that is now upon the face of the earth. And I do defy any man to prove, that I have any where in my practice, human frailties excepted, deviated from this opinion, since I have been admitted to minister in holy things, either as a private presbyter, in a country-parish, as a dean of a cathedral, or since I have been advanced to that higher post I now unworthily enjoy. But did these reproaches terminate in me, and go no further, they would not be worth any one's resentment, or my complaint; I hope I could bear them with patience and silence too, having learned to go through good report and evil report. But when they reach to the bench in general, or to the far greater part of it, it would be criminal to be silent.

“Of what fatal consequence must it be to the church of England, to have the clergy and people of it possessed with an opinion, that the bishops, the governors of it, do not approve of, are not friends to its constitution? My lords, if I am a fool in glorying, I am compelled to it; but in what I am now going to say, I desire to be understood as excluding myself, and then I will venture to affirm, That since the first establishment of this church, this bench was never filled with men of more venerable or deeper judgments, greater learning, more orthodox principles, or more exemplary lives: Men that have been more laborious and diligent in preaching the word, visiting their diocesses, administering the rite of confirmation, more prudent and cautious in admitting persons into orders, or instituting them into livings: men that have more faithfully discharged all the duties required in a good bishop by St. Paul, in his epistles to Timothy or Titus, or by the constitutions of our church; men that have with greater strength of reason, greater learning, or greater success, vindicated her doctrine, worship, discipline and government, against all opposers whatsoever; men that have more faithfully exposed themselves in trying times, or would be more ready, if occasion should again happen, to hazard their dearest interests in her service and defence; than the present set of bishops, who are treated as the off-scouring of the world without doors, and hardly with that decency they should be entitled to within. Our predecessors have been treated with another sort of respect; but I am at a loss to find such a difference betwix them and their successors, as can justify so different a treatment.

“My lords, give me leave to speak very plainly: If our faults be, and so I shall take them to be, till some others are proved against us, That we were zealous for the service of our great deliverer, his late majesty of glorious memory; That we were unshaken in our adherence to his government; If our fault be, That we are as zealous and unshaken in our adherence to the present government so gloriously administered in the hands of her present majesty (whom God long preserve) to her interest and service; If our fault be, That we have been zealous for the Protestant succession established by law: if it be that we have been jealous of any offers that have been made, which to us seemed to have a tendency to the prejudice or weakening any of these, and have opposed any steps which we apprehended might facilitate the bringing in a young prince from abroad: If these be our faults, from such as take them to be faults we can never hope for pardon; for they are such as we never will repent of. But if I am sure they will not be adjudged by your lordships to be faults, till some other are proved against us, I hope and beg that we may be allowed the common privilege of the House, to differ from any Lords when we cannot bring our opinions up to theirs, and to vote according to our judgments and consciences, without being exposed to unkind reflections for so doing; to speak when we think it reasonable, and be silent when we judge it convenient so to be, without being called up at the pleasure of any Lord that shall have a mind to be angry with us.”

The Queen's Speech on Passing the Act of Union.] March 6. The Queen came to the House of Lords to pass the Union-Bill, and made the following Speech to both Houses:

“My Lords and Gentlemen; It is with the greatest satisfaction, that I have given my assent to a bill for uniting England and Scotland into one kingdom.—I consider this Union as a matter of the greatest importance to the wealth, strength, and safety of the whole island; and at the same time, as a work of so much difficulty and nicety in its own nature, that till now all attempts, which have been made towards it, in the course of above a hundred years, have proved ineffectual; and therefore I make no doubt, but it will be remembered and spoke of hereafter, to the honour of those, who have been instrumental in bringing it to such a happy conclusion.—I desire and expect from all my subjects of both nations, that from henceforth they act with all possible respect and kindness to one another, that so it may appear to all the world, they have hearts disposed to become one people.—This will be a great pleasure to me, and will make us all quickly sensible of the good effects of this Union.—And I cannot but look upon it as a peculiar happiness, that in my reign so full provision is made for the peace and quiet of my people, and for the security of our religion, by so firm an establishment of the Protestant Succession throughout Great-Britain.

“Gentlemen of the House of Commons; I take this occasion to remind you of making effectual provision for the payment of the equivalent to Scotland, within the time appointed by the act; and I am persuaded, you will shew as much readiness in this particular, as you have done in all the parts of this great work.

“My Lords and Gentlemen; The season of the year being now pretty far advanced, I hope you will continue the same zeal, which has appeared throughout this session, in dispatching what yet remains unfinished of the public business before you.”

Address of both Houses concerning the Union.]
March 8. Both Houses agreed upon the following joint Address:

“We, your majesty’s most dutiful subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in parliament assembled, return our most humble thanks to your majesty, for your gracious approbation of the share we had in bringing the Treaty of an Union between your two kingdoms of England and Scotland to a happy conclusion; a work, that (after so many fruitless endeavours) seems designed by providence to add new lustre to the glories of your majesty’s reign. The success of your arms having

“When all was agreed to, in both Houses, a Bill was ordered to be brought in to enact it; which was prepared by Harcourt, with so particular a contrivance, that it cut off all debates. The preamble was a recital of the Articles, as they were passed in Scotland, together with the acts made in both parliaments, for the security of their several churches; and in conclusion, there came one enacting clause, ratifying all. This put those, upon great difficulties, who had resolved to object to several Articles, and to insist on demanding some alterations in them; for they could not come at any debate about them; they could not object to the recital, it being merely matter of fact; and they had not strength enough, to oppose the general enacting clause, nor was it easy to come at particulars, and to offer proviso’s relating to them. The matter was carried on with such zeal, that it passed through the House of Commons, before those, who intended to oppose it, had recovered themselves out of the surprise, under which the form, it was drawn in, had put them. It did not stick long in the House of Lords, for all the Articles had been copiously debated there for several days, before the Bill was sent up to them: and thus this great design, so long wished and laboured for in vain, was begun, and happily ended, within the compass of nine months. The Union was to commence on the First of May, and until that time, the two kingdoms were still distinct, and their two parliaments continued still to sit.” Burnet.

secured us from all attempts from abroad; and the care your majesty has taken of the firm establishment of the Protestant Succession having given a great and lasting security to our religion, as in the Church of England by law established, we beg leave humbly to assure your majesty, that our endeavours shall never be wanting, to support your government at home; and so to establish the peace of this island, that no dispute may remain among us, but how to acknowledge, in the most dutiful manner, the auspicious conduct of so great and so renowned a queen.”

“My Lords and Gentlemen; I am glad to find your opinion so perfectly agrees with mine concerning the Union; you cannot do me more acceptable service, than by using your utmost endeavours, to improve all the good consequences of it.”

Resolution in favour of the Leeward Islands.]
March 18. The Commons proceeded to take into consideration the Report from the Committee to whom the petition of several proprietors of plantations in the islands of Nevis and St. Christophers in America, and other merchants trading to the same, on the behalf of themselves, and the other inhabitants and traders to the said islands, was referred, and the same being read, it was resolved, “That an humble Address be presented to her-majesty, that she will be pleased to appoint such persons as her majesty shall think fit, to enquire into the true state of the losses of the people of the islands of Nevis and St. Christophers, in order to lay the same before this House the next sessions of parliament; and in the mean time, that she will be graciously pleased out of the public money granted this session of parliament, to apply what may be convenient for the better securing those islands, and supplying them with necessaries, in order to a re-settlement.” The said Address being presented accordingly, her majesty was pleased to answer, “That she was very well pleased to find the House of Commons had so compassionate a sense of the losses of her subjects in Nevis and St. Christophers, as also with the concern they shewed upon this occasion for the plantations, which were so justly entitled to their care, by the large returns they made to the public; and her majesty would give the necessary orders for what the House had desired in that matter.” Accordingly her majesty was afterwards pleased to appoint two gentlemen of known ability and integrity to go to the said Islands to procure an exact state of the losses of her subjects there, in order to their being put on such a footing, as might be most for the particular benefit of the inhabitants, and the general good of those kingdoms.

The Queen’s Speech to both Houses.]
April 8. The queen came to the House of Peers, with the usual solemnity, and gave her royal assent to the several following public bills. These things being over, the Lord-

Keeper, by her majesty's command, prorogued the parliament until Monday the 14th, when her majesty being come to the House of Peers, and the Commons sent for up, her majesty made the following Speech to both Houses :

" My lords and gentlemen; I was willing to give you an opportunity of coming together again, to consider if any thing can properly be done to prevent the inconveniences that may happen to our trade, by too great an interval between the rising of the parliament and the first of May; and I need not add, that whatever is to be done of that kind, will require to be dispatched in a little time."

Petition of the Merchants against the importation of Goods into Scotland.] The Commons being returned to their House, received and read a Petition of the Merchants, on behalf of themselves and many others, concerned in the importation of Wines and Brandy from Spain, Portugal, and Italy, and of other goods from Holland, &c. complaining, " That (as the petitioners were credibly informed) great quantities of French wines, brandies, silks, prunes, rosin, &c. of the growth and product of France; whale-bone, linnen, drugs, coffee, spices, &c. from Holland and from France, directly were brought, and more intended to be imported into the kingdom of Scotland, in order to be brought thence and imported into this kingdom of England, after the first day of May, to avoid the English duties, to the great detriment and loss of some, and the utter ruin of other the petitioners, who had imported, and were importing into England the like commodities from Spain, Portugal, Italy and Holland, paying the high duties upon them; which commodities had been chiefly purchased abroad with the woollen-manufactures, corn, and other products of England; and praying, that the House would prevent the importation of the said goods and merchandizes, the importation whereof, without being made subject to the English duties, would be a great damage, not only to the petitioners, but to her majesty's revenue of her customs; or otherwise to provide for the petitioners relief in the premises, as the House shall think fit."

Resolutions thereon.] The next day, the Commons, in a Committee of the whole House, came to these Resolutions, viz.

1. " That it is the opinion of this Committee, That the importation of goods and merchandizes of the growth and produce of France, and other foreign parts, into Scotland, in order to be brought from thence into England after the first of May, and with the intention to avoid the payment of the English duties, will be to the damage and ruin of the fair traders, to the prejudice of the manufactures of England, a great loss to her majesty's revenues of the customs, and a very great detriment to the public.
2. That the exporting of goods and merchandizes from England into Scotland, that are intitled to a drawback, with intention to bring the same back again into England after the first of May, is a most notorious fraud, to the damage and ruin of the fair traders, to the great loss of her majesty's revenues of the customs, and a very great detriment to the public."

These Resolutions being immediately reported and agreed to; a Bill was ordered to be brought in upon the same; which was accordingly done, and after the second reading, the said bill was ordered to be ingrossed. The bill on the 19th was passed, and sent up to the Lords for their concurrence; but it being apprehended, that this law would give offence to the Scots, and the most eminent lawyers, who were consulted about it, not agreeing in their opinions, the court thought fit to let it fall: considering, that the 1st of May was near at hand, and that the practices of the fraudulent traders, had, in some measure, been prevented, by the terror of this intended law.*

The Queen's Speech at the Prorogation.] Hereupon, the queen came to the House of Peers, on the 24th, and made the following Speech to both Houses :

" My Lords and Gentlemen; I return you my hearty thanks for the great zeal and affection which you have shewn for my service, and the public good, in the several affairs which have been before you, especially in that of the Union with Scotland, which I doubt not will prove a lasting blessing to this island:

" Gentlemen of the House of Commons; I am to thank you in particular, for the great dispatch you have made in providing the largest and most effectual supplies that have ever been given to the crown for the current service in any one session of parliament. I am very much concerned that the public occasions require the raising of such great sums from my people. I will take care they shall be applied to the uses for which they are given; and I hope, by God's blessing, we may obtain advantages from them answerable to so great an expence.

" My Lords and Gentlemen; It is proper for me, before we part, to communicate to you that I think it expedient that the Lords of parliament of England, and Commons of the present parliament of England, should be the members of the respective Houses of the first

* " There has been a great deal to do here in my absence occasioned by a sudden and unusual prorogation of the parliament upon account of a bill the Commons sent up to the Lords in relation to frauds carrying on in Scotland by importing prohibited goods, which after the Union were to be re-landed in England; the Lords would not pass the bill, nor would they reject it, but hoped by a prorogation to give the Commons an opportunity to recant, and bring in another bill that might not infringe upon the Union, as they apprehended this did, but the Commons were stubborn and sent them the same bill again; that the queen was forced at last to interpose and determine the dispute by putting an end to the parliament." parliament of Great Britain, for and on the part of England; and therefore I intend, within the time limited, to publish a proclamation for that purpose, pursuant to the powers given me by the acts of parliament of both kingdoms, ratifying the Treaty of Union: and after we have so fully compleated this great work, I assure myself that when you return to your several countries, you will omit no opportunity of making my subjects sensible of the security, and the other great and lasting benefits, they may reasonably expect from this happy Union.—This will conduce very much to make it prove so, and be a good preparation to the success of our next meeting, when, I hope, we shall all join our sincere and hearty endeavours to promote the welfare and prosperity of Great Britain.”

After which the Lord-Keeper by her majesty's command, prorogued the Parliament until Wednesday the 30th.*

* “ Thus this remarkable session came to a happy conclusion, after having finished the great transaction of the Union, on which it may not be improper to make the following observations. It is certain, the design on Darien, the great charge it put Scotland to, and the total miscarriage of that project, made the trading part of that kingdom see the impossibility of undertaking any great design in trade; and this made them the more ready to concur in carrying on the Union. The wiser men of that nation had observed long, that Scotland lay at the mercy of the ministry, and that every new set of ministers made use of their power to enrich themselves and their creatures at the cost of the public; that the judges being made by them were in such a dependence, that, since there are no juries allowed in Scotland in civil matters, the whole property of the kingdom was in their hands, and by their means in the hands of the ministers. They had also observed, how ineffectual it had been to complain of them at court. It put those, who ventured on it, to a vast charge, to no other purpose but to expose them the more to the fury of the ministry. The poor noblemen and the poor boroughs made a great majority in their parliament, and were easily to be purchased by the court. They saw therefore no hopes of a remedy for such a mischief, but by an incorporating Union with England. These thoughts were much quickened, by the prospect of recovering what they had lost in that ill-concerted undertaking of Darien; and this was so universal and so operative, that the design on Darien, which the Jacobites had set on foot, and prosecuted with so much fury and with bad intentions, did now engage many to promote the Union, who, without that consideration, would have been at least, neutral, if not backward in it. The court was engaged to promote the Union, on account of the act of security passed in the year 1703, which was imputed chiefly to the lord-treasurer. Threatenings of impeaching him for advising it had often

The Parliament revived by Proclamation.]

The parliament being at an end, the queen, by virtue of a clause in the Act of Union, and pursuant to her promise in her speech, revived it by a proclamation of the 29th of April, and by another of June 5, declared her pleasure for holding the first parliament of Great-Britain on the 23rd of October. Upon this, many of the Scotch lords came to London, and were very well received. Montrose and Roxburgh were been let fall; and, upon that, his enemies had set their chief hopes of overthrowing him; for, though no proof could be brought of his counsel in it, yet it was not doubted, but that his advice had determined the queen to pass it. An impeachment was a word of an odious sound which would engage a party against him, and disorder a session of parliament; and the least ill effect it might have, would be to oblige him to withdraw from business, which was chiefly aimed at. The queen was very sensible, that his managing the great trust he was in, in the manner he did, made all the rest of her government both safe and easy to her; and therefore she spared no pains to bring this about, and it was believed she was at no small cost to compass it; for those of Scotland had learned from England to set a price upon their votes, and expected to be well paid for them. The lord treasurer likewise exerted himself in this matter with an activity and zeal that seemed not to be in his nature; and indeed, all the application with which the court pursued this affair, was necessary to master the opposition and difficulties which sprang up in the progress of it. That, which compleated all, was the low state to which the affairs of France were reduced. That kingdom could spare neither men nor money to support their party, which otherwise they would undoubtedly have done. They had, in imitation of the Exchequer-notes here in England, given out Mint-bills to a great value; some said two hundred millions of livres. These were ordered to be taken by the subjects in all payments, as money to the full value, but were not to be received in payments of the king's taxes. This put them under a great discredit, and the fund created for repaying them, not being thought a good one, they had sunk 70 per cent. This occasioned an inexpressible disorder in all payments, and in the whole commerce of France. All the methods that were proposed for raising their credit, had proved ineffectual; for they remained after all, at the discount of 58 per cent. A court in this distress, was not in a condition to spare much to support such an inconsiderable interest, as they esteemed their party in Scotland; who therefore had not the assistance which they promised themselves from thence. The conjuncture of these various incidents, which brought this great work to a happy conclusion, was so remarkable, that the laying them all in one view will, it is hoped, not to be thought an impertinent digression.”

made dukes in Scotland; some of them were made privy counsellors in England; and a commission for a new council was sent to Scotland: there appeared soon two different parties among the Scots; some of them moved, that there should neither be a distinct government, nor a privy council continued there, but that all should be brought under one administration. as the several counties in England were; they said, the sooner all were consolidated, in all respects, into one body, the possibility of separating and disuniting them would be the sooner extinguished; this was pressed with the most earnestness by those who were weary of the present ministry, and longed to see their power at an end: but the ministry, who had a mind to keep up their authority, said, there was a necessity of preserving a shew of greatness, and a form of government in those parts, both for subduing the Jacobites, and that the nation might not be disgusted, by too sudden an alteration of outward appearances. The court resolved to maintain the ministry there, till the next session of parliament, in which new measures might be taken. Thus affairs were happily settled at home, and the first of May, when the Union took place, being appointed to be observed as a day of public and general thanksgiving for the happy conclusion of the Treaty of Union, it was celebrated with a decent solemnity. Congratulatory addresses on account of the Union were presented to the queen from all parts of the kingdom. But it was observed, that the university of Oxford were silent on this occasion, as well as the Scots, which made the addressers of Brackley in Northamptonshire suggest, "That after the little notice that had hitherto been taken of the Union by those who enjoyed the greatest share of it, at least an equivalent of the advantage, they had some thoughts of not disturbing her majesty at this time, in her great concerns for the liberties of all Europe, had they not been afraid, lest the malice of the world should have unjustly tacked them to some of her majesty's mistaken subjects, who, by their silence in not addressing, had sufficiently declared their dislike of what her majesty had owned her greatest pleasure and satisfaction."

PRINCIPAL OCCURRENCES DURING THE RECESS—Changes and Promotions—Expectations of the ensuing Campaign not answered—Proceedings with regard to Scotland—A New Party at Court—Promotions in the Church—Four Men of War lost—Dispute concerning the Parliament—A New Parliament called.]—"About this time," says Tindal, "there were made some changes in several public offices. The earl of Stamford, the lord Herbert of Cherbürg, Robert Monkton, and John Pultney, esquires, were made commissioners of trade and plantations, in the room of the lord viscount Weymouth, who had before resigned that post, and of William Blaitwaite, John Pollexfen, and Matthew Prior, esquires, who were laid aside, as too strongly attached to the Tory-party. At the same time, by the interest of Mr. Secretary Harley, sir Simon Harcourt was constituted Attorney General, in the room of sir Edward Northey; sir James Mountague succeeded sir Simon Harcourt in the place of Solicitor General; and the honourable Spencer Compton, who had exerted his zeal and abilities in the Treaty of Union, was made treasurer and receiver-general to prince George of Denmark, and pay-master to her majesty's pensions, in the room of Mr. Nicholas. In the beginning of May, the queen declared the lord Cowper lord high chancellor of Great Britain. In like manner, the lord Godolphin was appointed lord high treasurer of Great Britain. Prince George of Denmark took the oath in the court of Chancery, as lord high admiral of Great Britain, and by a new commission appointed sir David Mitchell, George Churchill, Mr. Robert Walpole, and sir Stafford Fairborne, to be council in the affairs of the admiralty. In January, the earl of Manchester received his instructions to go ambassador extraordinary to the republic of Venice, and, in his journey thither, he went to the courts of Vienna and Turin. But the most considerable change had been made, in December, by the promotion of the earl of Sunderland to the post of secretary of state, in the room of sir Charles Hedges: Though it was not till after much solicitation, that the queen could be prevailed with to make this alteration.

"The unparalleled successes of the allies, in the glorious and ever-memorable year 1706, and the many eminent misfortunes to the French king in one campaign, raised great expectations from the next, and made it concluded, that the time was come, in which the perfidy, tyranny, and cruelty of that king's long and bloody reign, were going to be repaid him with the same measures wherewith he had formerly treated others. But the events of the ensuing campaign produced a contrary effect, and proved very unfortunate to the allies. The offers of peace made by France, had been indeed rejected by Great Britain and Holland, but the inclination (as hath been observed) expressed by some persons to come to a treaty with the French, upon the terms offered, was thought to have raised, in the Imperial court, a strong jealousy, that the maritime powers were tampering with France, and making terms for themselves, to which the interest of Austria was to be sacrificed. And this jealousy was supposed to have put that court upon measures, that had a fatal influence on the campaign of this year, and to have occasioned the two most unfortunate events that happened during the whole war. For the conclusion of a treaty with the French, for evacuating the Milanese, without the privy of England and Holland, gave the French an opportunity of sending immediately into Spain a great body of good veteran troops, to the assistance of king Philip, whose army had by that means the superiority over the allies, and gained the battle of Almanza. And the expedition to Naples was the chief cause of the ill success of the design against Toulon.

" During the campaign, things went in England in their ordinary channel. But the conduct, with relation to Scotland, was more unaccountable. For whereas it might have been reasonably expected, that the management of the newly-united part of this island should have been particularly taken care of, so as to give no just distaste to the Scots, nor offer an handle to those, who were still endeavouring to inflame that nation, and to increase their aversion to the Union; things were on the contrary, so ordered, as if the design had been to contrive methods to exasperate the spirits of the people there. Though the management of the Scots revenue was to fall into the lord treasurer's hands on the 1st of May, no care was taken to have all the commissions ready at the day, with new officers to serve in them; so that the whole trade of Scotland was stopped for almost two months for want of orders, to put it into the new course, in which it was to be carried on. Three months passed before the equivalent was sent to Scotland; and, when wine and other merchandize were imported into England, from thence, seizures were every where made; and this was managed with a particular affectation of roughness. All these things heightened the prejudices, with which that nation had been possessed against the Union. It was also known, that many messages passed between Scotland and France; and that there were many meetings and much consultation among the discontented party there. A great body appeared openly for the Pretender, and celebrated his birth-day very publicly, both at Edinburgh, and in other places of the kingdom; and it was openly talked, that there was now an opportunity that was not to be lost, of invading the kingdom, though with small force; and that a general concurrence from the body of that nation might be depended upon. These things were done in so public a manner, that no check being given to them, nor inquiry made after them by those who were in the government, it gave occasion to many melancholy speculations. The management from England looked like a thing concerted to heighten that distemper; and the whole conduct of the fleet afforded great cause of jealousy.

" But, to open this more clearly, it will be necessary to give an account of a new scene at court. It was observed, that Mr. Harley, who had been for some years secretary of state, had gained great credit with the queen, and began to set up for himself, and to act no more under the direction of the lord-treasurer. There was one of the bedchamber-women, Mrs. Abigail Hill, who, being nearly related to the duchess of Marlborough, had been taken care of by her, together with her whole family (for they were fallen very low) in a most particular manner. She brought her not only into that post, but had treated her with such a confidence, that it had introduced her into a high degree of favour with the queen; which, for some years, was considered as an effect of the duchess's credit with her majesty. She was also nearly related to Mr. Harley; and they two entered into a close correspondence. She learned the arts of a court, and observed the queen's temper with so much application, that she got far into her heart. She employed all her credit to establish Mr. Harley in the supreme confidence with the queen, and to alienate her affections from the duchess of Marlborough, who studied no other method of preserving her favour, than by pursuing the true interest of the queen and of the kingdom. It was said, that prince George was brought into the concert, and that he was made to apprehend, that he had too small a share in the government, and that he was shut out from it by the great power which the duke of Marlborough and the lord-treasurer had drawn into their hands; that all depended upon them; that the queen was only a cypher in the government; that she was in the duchess of Marlborough's hands, as her affairs were in the duke's. It was likewise talked among those, who made their court to the new favourites, that there was not now a Jacobite in the nation; that all were for the queen; and that, without doubt, she would reign out peaceably her whole life, but she need not concern herself for a German family. These discourses began to break out, and gave melancholy apprehensions to those to whom they were brought. This went on too long, little regarded. The duchess of Marlborough seemed secure of her interest in the queen, and shewed no jealousy of a favour, to which herself gave the first rise. This was the state of the court at the opening of the parliament.

" There were at that time three bishopricks vacant. Sir Jonathan Trelawney, considerable for his birth and interest in Cornwall, had been removed the summer before from Exeter to Winchester. The lord-treasurer had promised, that preferments should be bestowed on men well-principled with relation to the present constitution, and on men of merit. The queen, without regarding this, secretly engaged herself to Dr. Blackall for Exeter; and for Chester (being at the same time void by the death of Dr. Stratford) to sir William Dawes. These divines were in themselves men of merit, but their notions were all on the other side. They had submitted to the government; but they, at least Dr. Blackall, seemed to condemn the Revolution, and all that had been done pursuant to it. Sir William Dawes was likewise looked on as an aspiring man, who would set himself at the head of the Tory-party. His nomination therefore gave great disgust. To qualify this a little, Dr. Patrick, the pious and learned bishop of Ely, dying at this time, the queen advanced bishop More from Norwich to that see; and Dr. Trimnel, a worthy person in all respects, was named for Norwich; yet this did not quiet the uneasiness which many were under, by reason of the other nominations, which seemed to flow from the queen herself, and so discovered her inclination.

" To prevent the ill effects that this might have in the approaching session, some of the eminent members of the House of Commons were called to a meeting, with the dukes of Somerset and Devonshire. These lords assured them, in the queen's name, that she was very sensible of the services which the Whigs did her; and, though she had engaged herself so far with relation to those two bishopricks, that she could not recall the promises she had made, yet for the future she was resolved to give them full content.* But, while this was said to some Whigs, Mr. Harley, and his friends Mr. St. John and sir Simon Harcourt, took great pains with the leaders of the Tories, particularly sir Thomas Hanmer, Mr. Bromley, and Mr. Freeman, to engage them in the queen's interests, assuring them, that her heart was with them; that she was weary of the tyranny of the Whigs, and longed to be delivered from it. But they were not wrought upon by that management; they either mistrusted it, as done only to insnare them; or they had other views, which they did not think fit to own. This double-dealing came to be known, and gave occasion to much jealousy and distrust.

"A little before the session was opened, an eminent misfortune happened at sea. A convoy of five ships of the line (the Cumberland of eighty guns, captain Richard Edwards commodore; the Devonshire of like force; the Royal-Oak of seventy guns; and the Chester and Ruby of fifty) were sent to Lisbon, to convoy thither a fleet of about 130 sail of merchant-ships, with merchandise, provisions, stores

* "The duchess of Marlborough, in the Account of her Conduct, p. 174, observes, "That notwithstanding the promotion of lord Sunderland to the post of secretary of state was carried by the Whigs, they were soon alarmed again by the queen's choice of two high-church divines to fill two vacant bishopricks. Several of the Whigs were disposed to think themselves betrayed by the ministry; whereas the truth was, that the queen's inclination to the Tories, being now soothed by the flatteries and insinuations of her private counsellors, had began to make it irksome to her to consult with her ministers upon any promotions, either in the church or the state. The first artifice of those counsellors was to instil into the queen notions of the high prerogative of acting without her ministers, and (as they expressed it) of being queen indeed. And the nomination of persons to bishopricks against the judgment and remonstrances of her ministry, being what they knew her genius would fall in with more readily than with any thing else they could propose, they began with that; and they took care, that these remonstrances should be interpreted by the world, and re-vented by herself, as hard usage, a denial of common civility, and even the making her no queen. Her majesty, however, to quiet the dissatisfaction of the Whigs for the late promotions, ordered her ministers to assure them, that she would prefer no more Tories, and she

of war, and a thousand horses bought in England for the king of Portugal. They left Plymouth on the 9th of October, being ordered to sail, as if it had been by concert, at a time when a squadron from Dunkirk had joined another from Brest, and lay in the way, waiting for them under the command of M. Forbin, and M. du Gue Trouin, and making in all 14 sail; one of 72 guns, others of 60, some of 50, and none under 40. Some advertisements were brought to the Admiralty of this conjunction, but they were not believed. When the French set upon the English ships off the Lizard, the convoy did their part very gallantly, though the enemy were almost three to one. One of the English men of war was blown up, and three of them were taken, so that only one escaped much shattered; but they had fought so long, that most of the merchant-ships had time to get away; and sailed on, not being pursued, and got safe to Lisbon. This coming almost at the same time with the loss of admiral Shovel, the session of parliament began with a melancholy face, and a dispute, upon the opening, had almost put the Houses into great disorder.

"It was generally thought, that, though this was a parliament that had now sat two years, yet it was a new parliament, by reason it had been let fall; and was revived by a proclamation, as had been said. The consequence of this was, that they, who had got places, were to be re-elected. Others maintained, that it could not be a new parliament, since it gave the same assurances with her own mouth in the cabinet-council. And she was suffered by her secret counsellors so far to observe this promise, as to give, about the same time, the bishoprick of Norwich to Dr. Trimnell, a particular friend of lord Sunderland's. And she also, some time after, gave the professorship of divinity at Oxford to Dr. Potter, the present archbishop of Canterbury, who had Dr. Smalridge for his competitor, recommended by the Tories. But this latter favour to the Whigs was not so easily obtained as the former. And, upon the delays that were made in bestowing it, my lord Marlborough thought it proper to try what credit he had with the queen, whose glory he had carried to a height beyond that of any of her predecessors. He wrote therefore a very moving letter to her, complaining of the visible loss of his interest with her, and particularly of her so long deferring the promotion she had promised, of the person recommended by her ministry, as a faithful friend to her government, adding, that the only way to make her reign easy, was to be true to that rule, which she had professed to lay down, of preferring none of those who appeared against her service and the nation's interest, &c. He wrote at the same time to the same effect to me, and I wrote to the queen: and at length by much solicitation, this matter was obtained, and Dr. Potter fixed in the professorship."

was not summoned by a new writ, but by virtue of a clause in an Act of parliament. Mr. Secretary Harley was for maintaining it to be an old parliament: but the duke of Marlborough, upon his coming over, prevailed to have it yielded to be a new one."

FIRST SESSION OF THE FIRST PARLIAMENT OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Meeting of the New Parliament.] October 23, 1707. This day the First Parliament of Great-Britain met at Westminster, all the forms usual in the beginning of a new parliament were observed. The queen came to the House of Peers, and, the Commons being sent for, they were directed by the Lord-Chancellor to return to their House, and chuse a Speaker, and present him that day se'nnight. They unanimously made choice of Mr. Smith, their former speaker, and then adjourned to the 30th of the same month. The Lords adjourned to the same day, after thirteen peers, of that part of Great-Britain called Scotland, had been admitted to their places, by virtue of their respective writs, each being introduced by two English peers of the same rank.

The Queen's Speech on opening the Session.]
November 6. On the 30th the Queen came again to the House of Peers, and the Commons, being sent for, presented their Speaker, whose election was approved. Then the Lord Chancellor acquainted both Houses with her majesty's pleasure, that they should adjourn to this day; when the Queen made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; It is with all humble thankfulness to Almighty God, and with entire satisfaction to myself, that I meet you here, in this first parliament of Great Britain; not doubting, but you come with hearts prepared, as mine is, to make this Union so prosperous, as may answer the well-grounded hopes of all my good subjects, and the reasonable apprehensions of our enemies.—To this end, nothing is so immediately material, as to convince, as soon as is possible, both our friends and our enemies, that the uniting of our interests has not only improved our abilities, but our resolutions also, to prosecute this just and necessary war, till we obtain a safe and honourable peace for ourselves, and for our allies.—In so great and extensive a war, as this is, many things may be usefully undertaken, which are not fit to be communicated beforehand: The attempt upon Toulon was of this nature; and, though it had not wholly its desired effect, has, nevertheless, been attended with many great and obvious advantages to the common cause in this year; and has made our way more easy, I hope, to greater in the next.—As the French have gained ground upon us in Spain, so they have been wholly driven out of Italy; by which it is become more easy for all the allies to join their assistance, next year, for enabling the king of Spain to recover his affairs in that kingdom, and to reduce the whole Spanish monarchy to his obedience.—The weakness and ill posture of affairs upon the Rhine, in the beginning of the year, has given an opportunity to the French, to make themselves stronger in all other parts; but this defect seems in a very promising way of being fully remedied, against next campaign, by the conduct and authority of the elector of Hanover, whose reasonable acceptance of that command has strengthened and obliged the whole confederacy.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; The just application of the supplies, given me by former parliaments, the plain necessity of continuing this war, the reasonable prospect of putting a good end to it, if we be not wanting to ourselves; and the honour of the first parliament of Great Britain, are, I make no doubt, sufficient arguments to invite you to provide the necessary supplies, which I am obliged to desire of you, for the ensuing campaign in all parts, and particularly for the timely support of the king of Spain, and the making good our treaty with Portugal; as also for strengthening the confederate army under the command of the duke of Savoy: All which services I do not doubt but you will think so necessary, that they ought not to be neglected, even though they should require an augmentation.—The sums already expended in this war, have been very great; and they are sufficient proofs how well satisfied my subjects have always been with the ends of my government; of which I am so sensible, as never to ask any supplies from them, but what are absolutely necessary for the preservation of their religion and liberty; and I look upon it as my great happiness, that I have not the least interest separate from that of all my good subjects.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen; In a work so great and new in its kind, as that of the Union, it is impossible but that some doubts and difficulties must have arisen; which, however, I hope, are so far overcome, as to have defeated the designs of those who would have made use of that handle to foment disturbances.—There are several matters expressly made liable, by the Articles of the Union, to the consideration of the parliament of Great Britain; which, together with such others as may reasonably produce those advantages, that, with due care, must certainly arise from that Treaty, I earnestly recommend to your serious consideration.—On my part, nothing shall be wanting to procure to my people, all the blessings which can follow from this happy circumstance of my reign; and, to extinguish, by all proper means, the least occasions of jealousy, that either the civil or religious rights of any part of this my United Kingdom can suffer by the consequences of this Union.—Such a suggestion shall never, in my time, have any foundation; how restless soever our enemies may be in their endeavours and artifices to disturb our peace and happiness. Those great and valuable blessings cannot but be always secure to us, if we heartily endeavour to confirm and improve our present union: I hope, therefore, you will suffer nothing to prevail with you to disunite among yourselves, or abate your zeal in opposing the common enemy."

The Commons' Address thereon.] The Commons forthwith resolved upon an Address of Thanks to her majesty, which was as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign; We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, do, with all thankfulness and humility, acknowledge the Divine goodness, in making your majesty the glorious instrument of uniting your two kingdoms.—And we shall never be so far wanting in our duty to your majesty, and the trust reposed in us by those we represent, as not to embrace all occasions of confirming and improving the advantages of this happy Union.—As this cannot fail to strengthen your majesty's government at home, and answer the well-grounded hopes of good subjects; so your faithful Commons are resolved to exert the united strength of this island in such a manner as shall make it a terror to your enemies.—The elector of Hanover being at the head of the army on the Rhine, gives us the greatest hopes of success on that side, from his conduct and authority.—And though your majesty's great and wise designs for the advantage of this nation, and the good of the common cause, have not had all the desired effects in the last campaign, yet we beg leave to assure your majesty, that no disappointments shall discourage us from making our utmost efforts to enable your majesty, in conjunction with your allies, to reduce the whole Spanish monarchy to the obedience of the king of Spain, to make good the treaty with Portugal, and to strengthen the confederate army, under the command of the duke of Savoy.—Your majesty has shewn, throughout the whole course of your reign, that you have no interest separate from that of your people: who have been so sensible of the many blessings they have enjoyed under your administration, as never to be wanting on all occasions to express their gratitude to the best of queens.—And we, your united Commons of this parliament, do faithfully promise your majesty, that we will proceed upon public business with unanimity and dispatch, and give such effectual supplies as may carry on the war with vigour, and, by the blessing of God upon your majesty's arms, obtain an honourable and lasting peace."

The Queen's Answer.] To this Address her majesty answered thus:

"Gentlemen; I thank you very kindly for this Address. The desires you express, of taking all occasions to improve the advantages of our happy Union, are extremely agreeable to me. As you cannot give me a more sensible proof of your loyalty and affection to me, and my government, than by your assurances of supporting me effectually in a vigorous prosecution of the war, so I make no doubt, but that these assurances will have their due weight abroad, and be of the greatest advantage imaginable to the common cause."

Debate in the Lords on the State of the Nation and the great Decay of Trade.] It was expected, according to custom, that the Lords would have begun with an Address of Thanks to the queen; but when her majesty's speech came first to be considered, the earl of Wharton made an elaborate harangue, wherein, among other things, he took notice of the great decay of trade and scarcity of money. He was seconded by the lord Somers, who likewise enlarged upon the ill condition and late mismanagements of the Navy: So that when the earl of Stamford moved for an Address to her majesty, to return her Thanks for her most gracious speech, he was opposed by the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Rochester, and the lord Guernsey, who said, they ought, in the first place, to consider the State of the Nation. Upon which it was ordered, that the State of the Nation should be taken into consideration on Wednesday the 3d of December, in a Committee of the whole House.

Accordingly, the lord Herbert of Cherbury, being chairman, a Petition given in by the two sheriffs of London, and subscribed by above 200 of the most eminent merchants in the city, was read, complaining of the great losses they had lately sustained at sea, for want of Convoys and Cruizers, and begging a speedy remedy. After the reading of this Petition, which was presented to the committee by the earl of Wharton, his lordship began the debate, by laying open the miserable condition of the Nation, and the great Decay of Trade. Several other Peers spoke to the same effect, and among the rest,

"My lord Herbert; I was so unfortunate as not to be in the House when your order was moved for, but thought it my duty to pay attendance upon so extraordinary occasion. I know it is generally looked upon as a mark of great weakness and imprudence, to attempt impossibilities: That man would scarce be thought in his right senses, that should endeavour to stop the tide at Gravesend with his thumb; and not rather suffer it to take its own course, as knowing that it will as surely have its ebb, as it will its flux; but yet there are some cases wherein the universal practice of mankind shews the mistake of this maxim. Who is there, that, seeing his parent languishing, and in an irrecoverable consumption, would not think it his duty to give him all the assistance in his power, though he was morally certain, all his endeavours would prove ineffectual, and the fatal hour was just approaching? Nay, does not every man endeavour to preserve his own life, while at the same time, he knows, that death itself is most unavoidable? This I take to be the present case of England (I ask your lordship's pardon, that I have not yet forgot that beloved name) I mean Britain. Our condition is very low and desperate, and yet I think myself obliged to do all I can toward the helping of a poor sinking island, though I am convinced, at the same time, it will prove very insignificant. My lords, the two things you have now under your consideration, your Fleet, and your Trade, have so near a relation, and such mutual influence upon each other, they cannot well be separated; your trade is the mother and nurse of your seamen; your seamen are the life of your fleet, and your fleet is the security and protection of your trade, and both together are the wealth, strength, security and glory of Britain. And this is so manifest, that those who have written upon these subjects, whether foreigners, or among ourselves, have owned it, which makes it astonishing, that a thing so clear and evident, and wherein our interest and safety does so much consist, should be postponed to any foreign consideration whatsoever, wherein we are less concerned: but we are so unhappy, as to struggle with so many complicated difficulties, that what is proper for one thing, is prejudicial to another. My lords; I must make the same apology for myself as that noble lord did (the earl of Wharton) who first began this debate; though I may speak very plainly, it is with a very honest intention of service, and a very real sense of our great losses and misfortunes. His lordship has spoke so very well, and so fully too to these points, that whatever I can say upon the same subject, will, after what has been said by him, come from me with a very ill grace, yet give me leave, my lords, to speak a word or two. Your disasters at sea have been so many, that a man scarce knows where to begin. Your ships have been taken by your enemies, as the Dutch take your herrings, by shoals, upon your own coasts: nay, your royal navy itself has not escaped: And these are pregnant misfortunes, and big with innumerable mischiefs; your merchants are beggared, your commerce is broke, your trade is gone, your people and manufactures ruined, the queen has lost her customs, and the parliament must make good the deficiencies; while in the mean time our allies have an open and flourishing trade, and our enemies make use of both our own ships and seamen too against us. There is yet a further grievance, when, through a thousand difficulties and dangers, the honest trader has brought home some small effects, he is fallen upon, and oppressed by vexatious and unjust prosecutions: I mention this with relation to the Union, and shew, that though I was always against it, yet since it is made, I am for keeping firmly and exactly to it.—My lords, the face of our affairs is visibly changed in the space of one year's time, and the temper of the nation too. Formerly men stifled their misfortunes, and were afraid of whispering them out for fear of being overheard and undone. Now, it is hard to stop their mouths, or keep them within any bounds, the moving objects of sorrow we meet with every where, the tears of the fatherless, and cries of the widows, have raised both a compassion for the distressed, and resentment, and indignation against the authors of these misfortunes; and the very flames which of late have flown abroad, nobody knows from whence, and papers have been cryed in your streets, are all marks of the great ferment the nation is in. My lord, you are now upon the great enquiry, by what ways and persons we have been brought into this miserable condition; I think it very indifferent which way you proceed. It seems reasonable that those Lords who first moved this order, should put it into what method they please; but I must take leave to say, that, begin were you will, if you do not end with the ministry, we shall be in a worse condition, in my opinion, than we were before.—As to the Admiralty, if the prince's council have committed any fault, it is very fit they should have what they deserve, but I hope no persuasion will prevail with the prince himself to lay down that commission. The navy I think is safer in his hands, than in any other man's whatsoever; and I will give your lordship my reason for it. He has advantages no other person can pretend to: He owes not his commission to the favour of any great minister whatsoever, nor is he within the reach of their power; he stands upon a much more unshaken and firm foundation; and if there be any mistake, it is impossible to be the effect either of the fear, or the anger of a great minister, or a care to please him.—My lord, I take the root of all our misfortunes to be in the ministry; and without a change of the ministry, in my opinion, no other remedy will be effectual: It may perhaps be told by some lord, that I ar-rain the ministry. I know that is not proper here, yet every lord has liberty of speaking his thoughts freely, and taking notice of any thing he thinks a grievance to the nation: And it is under this notion of complaint, and from a sense of our miserable condition, that I say this to your lordships; and if I were not confident I stand upon sure ground, I should not venture thus far; but I have my justification in my hand. And now, my lords, it is fit I should prove what I say.—Should I mention the first, fourth, and last Articles of the Union, I am within your order, and those lords who serve at present for the north part of Britain, I am confident, have heard of a complaint and address of the royal boroughs; and I might remember the disappointments we have met with in Spain; but I hope those two points will be some time or other considered. I will therefore keep myself for proof strictly to your petition, and I think nothing is more evident than that your ministry has been the cause of these misfortunes. And the argument which convinces me: of it is drawn from an address of your lordships in 1704, which I have in my hand. I know before whom I speak, the queen is a princess of that consummate wisdom, as not to do any thing without the advice of her ministry; your lordships did then most humbly advise and address her majesty, that particular care might be taken of those two points, none but those who have her majesty's ear could prevail to the contrary, and the want of following your lordships advice has lost the nation near ten millions since; and therefore it evidently follows, that your ministry have been the occasion of these losses.—In short, my lords, for I will trouble you no farther; let our misfortunes be skinned over as they will, if they fester and throb, and are foul at bottom, they will certainly break out with incurable rage and fury."

The debate growing high, some lords endeavoured to allay it, by proposing ways and means to retrieve our losses at sea; and, among the rest, the lord Halifax moved, That a Committee be appointed to receive proposals for encouraging of Trade and Privateers in the West-Indies; which motion being seconded by the Lord Treasurer, and the question put, the same was carried in the affirmative. After which, a day was appointed to hear, in a grand committee, what the merchants had to allege, to prove the suggestions of their petition. It was observed, that, as soon as the debate was over, the duke of Marlborough took the earl of Wharton aside, and there passed some warm expostulations between them.

Mr. Asgill expelled.] Nov. 25. The Commons took into consideration the Report of the committee appointed to examine the Petition of Mr. John Asgill, a member of the House, in prison in the Fleet for debt; at the suit of Mr. Holland, a Staffordshire gentleman: which Report was ordered to be re-committed. On the other hand, the House being informed of a printed book or pamphlet, signed, J. Asgill, intitled,

An argument, proving, that according to the covenant of eternal life, revealed in the Scriptures, man may be translated from hence into that eternal life, without passing through death, although the human nature of Christ himself could not be thus translated, till he had passed through death. Several passages of which treatise being contrary to and reflecting on the Christian religion, the book was brought up to the table, and the title, and several paragraphs therein, being read, it was ordered, that it be referred to a committee to inquire into the author of the said book. On the 16th of December, the Commons resolved, That Mr. Aggill ought to have the privilege of the House, as a member thereof, and be delivered out of the custody of the warden of the Fleet, to attend the service of the House. Pursuant to which resolution, he was immediately discharged; but two days after the House proceeded to take into consideration the Report from the committee, to whom it was referred to examine, who was the author, printer, and publisher of the book above mentioned, ascribed to Mr. Aggill: who having been heard in his place in relation to the Report, the Commons resolved, That in the said book are contained many profane and blasphemous expressions, highly reflecting upon the Christian religion; and ordered the same to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman in the New-Palace yard, Westminster; and resolved that John Aggill, esq; having in his place owned himself to be the author of the said book, be expelled the House.

Resolutions about Members incapable to sit.] The Commons came also to this Resolution, "That every person, who, by an Act of the first session of the last parliament, entitled, "An Act for the better security of her majesty's person and government, and of the succession of the crown of England in the Protestant-line (relating to disabling of several officers to sit in parliament) was disabled, from and after the dissolution or determination of the said parliament, to sit or vote as a member of the House of Commons in any parliament to be thereafter holden, was by virtue of the said act incapable of sitting or voting as a member of that House in this present parliament."

A Supply granted.] The Commons, at the same time, went roundly to work with the Supplies, so far and as soon as the states of the Accounts of several offices and other matters could be laid before them and examined: They rejected a motion to bring in a Bill to repeal the Game-act made last year; vindicating the privileges of their own members, and having addressed the queen to order her Attorney-General to enter a Noli Prosequi, to discharge the several informations exhibited in the court of Exchequer, relating to goods imported into Scotland before the 1st of May last; her majesty answered, "She was very well pleased with what the House of Commons had done in that matter, and she would give directions accordingly, as was designed by their Address."

Naval Miscarriages examined into.] The Commons next thought fit to go upon the business of Admiral Whetstone's conveying the Russia-fleet last summer, and his cruize before Dunkirk: this, with other matters, took up a pretty deal of their time, and brought the whole concerns of the navy under consideration. Some Miscarriages*, no doubt, there were, as well as misfortunes; the merchants were respectively examined touching their complaints and grievances, and the Prince's council made their replies and vindication. Mr. Heathcote, son of Sir Gilbert Heathcote, and Mr. Dawson, Russia-Merchants, spoke very boldly, and stuck not to charge the managers of the navy with fraud, malice, and ignorance, which all bore hard on Admiral Churchill. Several members interrupting them, Sir Richard Onslow, chairman of the committee, desired them to go on. Whetstone, who commanded the Russia-convoy, and rose to a flag, from being master of a small Bristol-Ship, had a character which seemed to be referred to by Mr. Heathcote and Mr. Dawson, in their complaint of fraud, malice, and ignorance. These debates and complaints ended in a Resolution, "That, for the better securing the Trade of this kingdom, over and above the ships of war for the line of battle, and the convoys to remote parts, a sufficient number of ships, afterwards settled at four, be appointed to cruise in proper stations."

* "These were, no sooner over, than the complaints of the Admiralty were offered to both Houses: Great losses were made, and all was imputed to the weakness, or to a worse disposition, in some, who had great credit with the Prince, [George of Denmark Lord High Admiral] and were believed to govern that whole matter: For as they were entirely possessed of the Prince's confidence, so when the Prince's Council was divided in their opinions, the decision was left to the Prince, who understood very little of those matters, and was always determined by others. By this means they were really Lord High Admiral, without being liable to the law for errors and miscarriages. This Council was not a legal court warranted by any law though they assumed that to themselves; being councillors, they were bound to answer only for their fidelity. The complaints were feebly managed, at the bar of the House of Commons: for it was soon understood, that not only the Prince, but the queen likewise concerned herself much in this matter: And both looked on it as a design, levelled at their authority. Both Whigs and Tories seemed to be at first equally zealous in the matter; but by reason of the opposition of the court all those who intended to recommend themselves to favour, abated of their zeal: Some were vehement in their endeavours to baffle the complaints; They had great advantages from the merchants managing their complaints but poorly; some were frightened, and others were practised on, and were carried even to magnify the conduct of the fleet, and to make excuses for all the misfortunes that had happened. That which had the chief operation, on the whole Tory party, was, that it was set round among them, that the design of all these complaints was to put the earl of Orford again at the head of the fleet: Upon which they all changed their note, and they, in concurrence with those, who were in offices, or pretended to them, managed the matter so that it was let fall, very little to their honour. Unkind remarks were made on some, who had changed their conduct upon their being preferred at court; but the matter was managed with more zeal and courage in the House of Lords, both Whigs and Tories concurring in it. A Committee was appointed to examine the complaints; they called the merchants who had signed the Petition, before them; and treated them not with the scorn, that was, very indecently, offered them by some of the House of Commons, but with great patience and gentleness; they obliged them to prove all their complaints by witnesses upon oath." Burnet.

Resolutions to make the Union more compleat.] The commons ordered a bill to be brought in to repeal the acts passed in Scotland, for the security of that kingdom, and about peace and war, which had given so great a jealousy to the English nation, that the rescinding of them was one of the principal views of the ministry, in the prosecution of the Treaty of Union. This done, they considered those parts of the Queen's Speech relating to the making of the Union more compleat, and resolved, on the 11th of December, "1. That there be but one privy-council in the kingdom of Great Britain. 2. That the militia of that part of Great Britain called Scotland be regulated, in the same manner as the militia of that part of Great Britain called England is regulated. 3. That the powers of justices of peace for preserving the public peace be the same throughout the whole United Kingdom. 4. That for the better administration of justice and preservation of the public peace, the lords of judiciary be appointed to go circuits twice in the year. 5. That the writs for electing members to serve in the House of Commons, for that part of Great Britain called Scotland, be directed to the sheriffs of the respective counties, and that the returns be made of such writs, in like manner as returns are made of such writs in that part of Great Britain called England."

The Queen's Speech on passing the Money Bills.] Dec. 18. The Queen came to the House of Lords, and after giving the royal assent to several Bills, made the following Speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen: I am very well pleased with the occasion of my coming hither at this time, and desirous to take this opportunity of expressing to you the satisfaction I have in seeing so good a progress made in the public business.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; I am extremely sensible of the readiness and affection with which you have provided so considerable a part of the supplies: as I am fully persuaded it must needs give the greatest satisfaction to all our allies, so I look upon it as a sore pledge of your being disposed to make good those hearty assurances which you gave me in the beginning of the session.—I told you at the opening of this parliament, that I did hope you would look upon the services relating to Spain, Portugal, and the army under the command of the duke Savoy, to be of so much importance in the prosecution of this war, that they might deserve an Augmentation, which I cannot but think will be of the greatest use to the common cause,* both with regard to those

* Mr. Addison wrote an excellent piece to this purpose, which was printed at London in 1708, under the title of "The present State of the War, and the necessity of an Augmentation considered." In this discourse, after having shewn, that the French are the constant and most dangerous enemies to the British nation, and that the danger from them was then greater than ever, and would still increase till their Union with Spain were broken, he sets forth the several advantages, which this Union had already given France, and taken from Great-Britain, in relation to the West-Indies, the woollen manufactures, the trade of the Levant, and the naval power of the two nations. He then shews how these advantages would still rise higher after a peace, notwithstanding the present conquests of Great-Britain, with new additions, should be confirmed to the nation, as well because the monarchy of Spain would not be weakened by such concessions, as because no guarantee could be found sufficient to secure them to us. For which reason he lays it down as a fixed rule, that no peace was to be made without an intire disunion of the French and Spanish monarchies. That this might be brought about, he endeavours to prove from the progress, which had been already made towards it, and the successes, which the British nation had purchased in the war, and which were very considerable, if well pursued; but of no effect, if the nation should acquiesce in them. In order to compleat this disunion, in which we had gone so far, he would not have us rely upon exhausting the French treasury, attempts upon the Spanish Indies, descents on France, but chiefly on out-numbering them in troops, France being already drained of her best supplies, and the confederates masters of much greater forces for multitude and strength, both in men and horses, and provided with generals of great fame and abilities. He then considers the wrong measures, which had been hitherto taken in making too small levies after a successful campaign, in regulating their number by that of the enemy's forces, and hiring them of our confederates; shewing at the same time the inconveniences suffered from such hired troops, and several advantages, which would arise from employing those of our own nation. He further recommends this suggest-particular services, and to the putting ourselves in a condition to improve such favourable opportunities as may arise in the ensuing year.

“My Lords and Gentlemen; I shall only add, that as nothing is more essential to my own quiet, and the happiness of all my good subjects, than the bringing this war to a safe and honourable conclusion, so I must think myself obliged to look upon all those who are willing and desirous to support me in it for attaining that end, as the most proper objects of my favour and encouragement.—I cannot conclude without once more recommending to you to confirm and improve the advantages of our happy Union, not doubting but at the same time you will have a due regard to what shall be found necessary for preserving the public peace throughout the whole island of Great Britain.”

Debate in the Lords concerning the Earl of Peterborough and the Affairs of Spain.] Dec. 19. A long and memorable debate took place in the House of Lords, in relation to the Affairs of Spain, the Queen being present, incognito, till five of the clock in the afternoon.

The Earl of Rochester spoke first, and having commended the earl of Peterborough's courage and conduct, and enumerated his services, said, It has been a constant custom, that when a person of rank, that had been employed abroad, in so eminent a post as his salutation of our forces, to prevent the keeping up a standing body of them in times of peace, to enable us to make an impression on the enemy in the present posture of the war, and to secure ourselves against the king of Sweden, who was then at the head of a powerful army, and had not yet declared himself. In the last place he answers by several considerations those two popular objections, that we furnished more towards the war than the rest of the allies; and that we were not able to contribute more than we did already. With regard to the former objection, he observes, that if it were true in fact, that England contributed more than any other of the allies, he does not see any tolerable colour, that she should not make any addition to her present efforts. Supposing, says he, “among a multitude embarked in the same vessel, there are several, that in the fury of a tempest will rather perish than work for their preservation; would it not be madness in the rest to stand idle, and rather chuse to sink together, than to do more than comes to their share? Since we are engaged in a work so absolutely necessary for our welfare, the remissness of our allies should be an argument for us to redouble our endeavours rather than slacken them. If we must govern ourselves by example, let us rather imitate the vigilance and activity of the common enemy, than the supineness and negligence of our friends. We have indeed a much greater share in the war than any other part of the confederacy. The French king makes at us directly, keeps a king by him to set over us, and hath very lately augmented the lordship had, returned home, he had either thanks given him, or was called to an account: urging, that the same ought to be done in relation to the earl of Peterborough.

The Lord Halifax who spoke next enlarged likewise on the earl of Peterborough's successful services, but conningly put off the returning him Thanks, till the whole tenor of his conduct had been examined: than which the earl himself professed, he had nothing more at heart.

The Lord Haversham was not silent: but having highly extolled my lord Peterborough's valour, skill, and successes, made a side-wind reflection on the earl Galloway, saying, it was no wonder our affairs in Spain went so ill, since the management of them had been entrusted to a foreigner.

Hereupon, several members shewed the necessity of carrying on the war, till the whole monarchy of Spain was recovered, and king Charles seated on his throne; and among the rest,

The Earl of Peterborough said, ‘They ought to give the queen 10 shillings in the pound, rather than make peace on any other terms, adding, That if it were thought necessary, he was ready to return to Spain, and serve, even under the earl of Galloway.

This naturally brought on the consideration of ways and means to retrieve the Affairs of Spain, in relation to which the salary of his court, to let us see, how much he hath that design at heart. Few of the nations in war with him, should they ever fall into his hands, would lose their religion or form of government, or interfere at present with him in matters of commerce. The Dutch, who are likely to be the greatest losers after the Britons, have but little trade to the Levant in comparison with ours, have no considerable plantations or commerce in the West-Indies, or any woollen manufacture, for Spain; not to mention the strong barrier they have already purchased between France and their own country. But, after all, every nation in the confederacy makes the same complaint, and fancies itself the greatest sufferer by the war. Indeed in so common a pressure, let the weight be never so equally distributed, every one will be most sensible of that part, which lies on his own shoulders. We furnish, without dispute, more than any other branch of the alliance, but the question is, Whether others do not exert themselves in proportion according to their respective strength? The Emperor, the king of Prussia, the elector of Hanover, as well as the States of Holland, and the duke of Savoy, seem at least to come up to us. The greatest powers in Germany are borrowing money, where they can get it, in order to maintain their stated quota's, and go-through their part of the expence: And, if any of the circles have been negligent, they have paid for it much more in their late contributions, than what would have furnished out their share in the common charges of the war.”

Earl of Rochester said, That we seemed to neglect the principal business, and mind only accessories; adding, he remembered the saying of a great general, the old duke of Schomberg, viz. 'That the attacking France in the Netherlands, was like taking a bull by the horns?' and therefore his lordship proposed, That we should stand on the defensive in Flanders, and send from thence 15 or 20,000 men into Catalonia.

That noble peer was seconded by the Earl of Nottingham, who complained of Spain being in a manner abandoned. But

The Duke of Marlborough undertook to shew, though with some warmth, the danger of such an undigested council, and the necessity of augmenting, rather than diminishing our forces in Flanders. The two chief reasons his Grace urged were, 1st, That most of the enemies strong places there, might be kept with one battalion in each; whereas the great towns of Brabant, we had conquered, required twenty times that number of men, for their preservation. 2dly. That if our army in the Netherlands was weakened, and the French, by their great superiority, should gain any considerable advantage, which it was not improbable they might, the discontented party in Holland, who were not a few, and bore with impatience the necessary charges of the war, would not fail crying aloud for peace. Hereupon,

The Earl of Rochester, said, He wondered that noble peer, who had been ever conspicuous for his calmness and moderation, should now be out of his temper; adding, that there being an absolute necessity to succour Spain, his grace would oblige their lordships, if he would let them know, where they might get troops to send thither: and the more, because the earl of Peterborough had that very day assured them, that he had heard prince Eugene say, That the German soldiers had rather be decimated than sent into Spain.

The Duke of Marlborough answered for the cause of having shewn some warmth, by saying The thing was of too great importance to be spoken of without concernment: and as for the question proposed by the Earl, he added, that although it was improper to disclose secret projects in so great an assembly, (to which that day many strangers had been admitted, by the favour of the queen's presence) because the enemy would not fail being informed of them; yet, to gratify their lordships he might assure them, that measures had been already concerted with the emperor for the forming an army of 40,000 men, (whom he specified) under the command of the duke of Savoy, and for sending powerful succours to king Charles; adding, it was to be hoped that prince Eugene might be prevailed with to go and command in Spain, in which case the Germans would gladly follow him thither. The only difficulty which, his grace said, might be objected against this scheme, was the usual slowness of the court of Vienna; to which purpose he took notice, that if the 7000 German recruits, which the emperor had promised for the army in Piedmont, had arrived time enough, the enterprise against Toulon might have been attended with success: but that it was to be hoped, and he durst engage his word for it, that for the future his imperial majesty would punctually perform his promises.

The Lord's Address upon the Queen's Speech, thanking her Majesty for her Intentions of pursuing the War with vigour.] This put an end to the debate; and a committee was appointed to draw up an Address to the queen, which was presented the same day; and was as follows:

"We, your majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, do return our most humble thanks to your majesty for your most gracious speech to your parliament.—The great spirit and resolution your majesty is pleased to express for the vigorous carrying on the war in Spain and Portugal, and strengthening the army of the duke of Savoy, who has deserved so well of the whole confederacy, cannot fail to contribute in the most effectual manner to bring this war to a speedy and happy conclusion.—Such an example ought to excite all your allies to a noble imitation; and we are sure your majesty will do your utmost to oblige such of them as hitherto have failed in their parts, for the future to act as those who have a real concern for restoring and securing peace and liberty to Europe. Your majesty's favour will always be the highest encouragement to your subjects; but the zeal we have for the preservation of your majesty's person and government, and the duty we owe to our country, always has and ever will oblige us to do all that lies in our power, for supporting your majesty in this just war, till it be brought to a safe and happy conclusion.—And as we have shewn the greatest zeal for bringing the Union to pass, and for preventing every thing that might disturb it; so we unanimously promise your majesty to do all that is possible for us to make it complete and entire."

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty answered:

"I return you many thanks for your Address, and the assurances of your zeal to support me in the present war.—Nothing shall be wanting on my part, either abroad or at home, to make my people safe and happy."

Resolutions of the Lords concerning Spain.] The same day the Lords resolved: 1. "That no peace can be honourable or safe, for her majesty and her allies, if Spain and the Spanish West Indies be suffered to continue in the power of the House of Bourbon. 2. That an humble Address be made to her majesty, to thank her majesty for the care she has taken, and the instances she has used with the emperor, for the sending a considerable force to the relief of the king of Spain, under the command of prince Eugene; and to desire her majesty, that she would continue to make the most pressing instances to the emperor to send powerful succours to Spain under the command of prince Eugene with expedition; and to make good the consent for of 20,000 men under the command of the duke of Savoy; and that the emperor use his utmost efforts for strengthening the army on the Rhine."

Address of both Houses against concluding a Peace whilst Spain, &c. continue under the House of Bourbon.] Dec. 22. Both Houses agreed upon the following Address to her majesty:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and obedient subjects the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in parliament assembled having been always fully persuaded, that nothing could restore a just balance of power in Europe, but the reducing the whole Spanish monarchy to the obedience of the House of Austria; and having seen several great parts of that monarchy by the blessing of God upon the victorious arms of your majesty and your allies, already in the possession of that House; do think it not only reasonable but necessary, at this juncture humbly to offer this our unanimous opinion to your majesty. That no peace can be honourable or safe, for your majesty or your allies, if Spain, the West Indies, or any part of the Spanish monarchy be suffered to remain under the power of the House of Bourbon.

"When we consider what efforts this kingdom has continued to make from the beginning of the war; we cannot but think a much greater impression might have been made upon the enemy before this time, if some of your allies who seem principally concerned, and have reaped the most immediate advantage, had seconded your majesty with like vigour, whereby France might have been equally pressed on all sides.

"We are obliged to return our humble thanks to your majesty, for the care you have taken and the instances you have used with his imperial majesty for sending a considerable force to the relief of Spain under the command of prince Eugene; as being certainly the most likely method to restore the affairs of the confederacy in that country.

"But the frequent disappointments we have observed on the part of the emperor and empire to the great prejudice of the common cause, makes us think it our duty, in order that the war may be brought to a speedy and happy conclusion, to beseech your majesty to make the most pressing instances to the emperor, that he would with all expedition send powerful succours to his brother the king of Spain, under the conduct of that great and successful general: that he would timely and effectually make good what has been concerted for his putting 20,000 men under the duke of Savoy: and would also make use of his utmost power and interest for strengthening the army upon the Rhine which is now happily put under the command of that wise and valiant prince the elector of Hanover.

"We believe no part of this can be refused upon your majesty's earnest interposition, who has done such great things for the House of Austria; and this being complied with, we may reasonably hope, by God's assistance, the next will prove a happy and glorious campaign.

The Queen's Answer.] Her majesty's most gracious Answer was this:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I am fully of your opinion, that no peace can be honourable or safe for us, or for our allies, till the entire monarchy of Spain be restored to the house of Austria; and very well pleased to find, that the measures I have concerted for the succour of the king of Spain, are so well approved by both Houses of Parliament. I shall continue my most pressing instances with the emperor for the hastening further succours, and that they may be commanded by prince Eugene; as also upon all the other particulars mentioned in your Address."

A Supply granted.] On the 19th of December, the Commons came to several Resolutions about the Supply, so that, by the 22d, they had given very near six millions. The particular sums were,

The Commons' Address for recruiting the Army.] January 21, 1708. The Commons came to an unanimous Resolution, "That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, that she would be pleased to issue her royal proclamation, for the better putting in execution an Act made in the fifth year of her majesty's reign, 'for the better recruiting her majesty's land-forces and the marines; and for the greater encouragement of the parish-officers to perform their duty enjoined by that act,

That for every person they shall bring before the magistrate, who shall be impressed, they do receive the sum of 20 shillings; and that every volunteer, for his encouragement to come into the service, do receive 4*l.*; and also that her majesty will be pleased to signify her royal pleasure, that the said volunteer shall have his discharge after three years service, if he desires it: as likewise, that her majesty will be graciously pleased to grant the same allowances and encouragements to such persons as shall voluntarily come into the service out of that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland."

The Queen's Answer.] The said Address being accordingly presented to the queen, her majesty was pleased to give answer, "That she should lose no time in giving orders for such a Proclamation, pursuant to their Address; nothing being more essential to the public service, than the immediate providing the necessary recruits for the army; and that she could not but hope they would take care it should be done, in such a manner as might be effectual."

State of the War in Spain considered.] Jan. 29. The Commons took into consideration the State of the War with Spain; and the residue of the Papers which had been laid before the House having been read, and the question being proposed, "That of the 29,395 English forces provided by parliament, for the service of Spain and Portugal, in the year 1707, there was but 8,600 in Spain and Portugal, at the time of the battle of Almanza;" a debate arose thereupon, which was adjourned to the 3d of February, when the House resumed it, and Mr. St. John offering to the House an Account of the number of Forces provided for Spain and Portugal in 1707, the same was brought up to the table, and read; and the question formerly proposed and debated, was, with an amendment, agreed unto by the House, as followeth, viz. Resolved, "That it appears to this House, that of the 29,395 English forces provided by parliament, for the service of Spain and Portugal in the year 1707, there were but 8,600 men, besides Commission and Non-commission officers, and servants, in Spain and Portugal, at the time of the battle of Almanza." Then a motion being made, and the question proposed, That an humble Address be presented to her majesty (laying the said Resolution before her majesty) and humbly desiring, That she would be graciously pleased to order an Account to be laid before that house, how it came to pass that there were no more English forces in Spain and Portugal at the time of the battle of Almanza; and also that her majesty would be pleased to use her utmost endeavours, that the war in Spain might be vigorously and effectually prosecuted: it was carried in the affirmative: and resolved that the Address be presented to her majesty by the whole House. Accordingly on the 5th, the Speaker, with the House, attended the queen with the said Address, to which her majesty answered: "Gentlemen, What you desire shall be carefully examined, and I will send you an answer in a short time."

The Lords' Address concerning the Complaints against Captain Kerr.] Feb. 7. All this while the Lords had under consideration the business of Spain, and the Grievances of the Merchants. In reference to the last, their lordships having maturely considered the Complaints against captain Kerr, presented the following Address to her majesty:

"May it please your most excellent majesty; We your majesty's most dutiful and obedient subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, do humbly inform your majesty, that there has been laid before this house by Mr. Thomas Wood, in behalf of himself and divers other Jamaica merchants, a complaint against captain William Kerr, late commander of a squadron of your majesty's ships at that island, for refusing to grant convoys for their ships to the Spanish coast of America; and in particular, that the said Mr. Thomas Wood had offered to the said captain Kerr the sum of 600*l.* as a gratuity, if he would order one of your majesty's men of war under his command, to go as convoy to the Neptune sloop, and Martha galley, loaded with woolen and other goods of your majesty's subjects: That the said captain Kerr at that time seemed pleased with the proposal, and said, the Windsor should be the ship, and ordered Mr. Wood to make what dispatch he could in getting the galley and sloop ready. On which encouragement he got them ready to sail, and bought three hundred negroes to put on board them; and then acquainted captain Kerr therewith, and with the great charge he was at in maintaining the negroes, and his fear of their sickness. Captain Kerr then said, he feared he could not spare a man of war, but the next day sent Mr. Tudor Trevor, captain of the Windsor, to acquaint Mr. Wood, that captain Kerr said, he thought Mr. Wood could not have offered less than 2,000, or at least 1,500*l.* Whereupon Mr. Wood declared the sum was so great, that the trade could not bear it, and so the sloop and galley proceeded on their voyage without convoy; and in their return, the sloop, loaded with great wealth, being pursued by French privateers, and having no convoy, and crowding too much sail to get from the enemy, was unhappily overset and lost.

"The said Mr. Thomas Wood also made another complaint, that upon a further application to the said Mr. Kerr, for a convoy for three sloops bound for the said Spanish coast, he promised to give the Experiment man of war, commanded by captain Bowler, as a convoy, for which the said Mr. Wood agreed to give 800*l.*; 400*l.* part thereof, was paid to the said Bowler, and the other 400*l.* was made payable by note to one Mr. Herbert, for the use of Mr. Kerr, which note was sent in a letter to Mr. Kerr, and by him put into Mr. Herbert's hands: and besides that, as a further encouragement for allowing the said convoy, Mr. Kerr had an adventure of 1,500*l.* in the said sloops, without advancing any money. To this complaint Mr. Kerr put in his answer, and both parties were fully heard by themselves, and their witnesses: and upon the whole matter, the House came to this following Resolution, That the said complaint of the said Mr. Wood against the said Captain Kerr, as well in relation to the Neptune and Martha galley, as also in relation to the other three sloops that went under the convoy of the Experiment man of war, hath been fully made out and proved to the satisfaction of this house.

“These matters we think ourselves bound in duty to lay before your majesty, as being of the highest consequence to the trade of your majesty’s subjects, whereupon the wealth and flourishing estate of the kingdom doth so manifestly depend.

“We do also think ourselves obliged to inform your majesty, that in the examination of these complaints, we find divers corrupt and unjustifiable practices of the like kind (though not attended with altogether such aggravating circumstances) have been too frequent in your majesty’s fleet: and we are humbly of opinion, that nothing can be of more pernicious consequence than the suffering such abuses to proceed with impunity: and therefore we beseech your majesty to be pleased to give such effectual orders and directions, as shall for the future prevent the like corrupt doings, to the oppression of the merchants, who at this time lie under many heavy discouragements. And we do humbly hope, your majesty will be pleased to declare in such a manner as may be most public and effectual, to all commanders of squadrons, and captains of men of war, that their care and diligence in attending, protecting, and securing the trade of your majesty’s subjects, when any charge of that nature should be committed to them, or when they shall have any opportunity of doing it, shall be a sure, particular, and principal recommendation of them to your majesty’s favour, in any of their pretensions to promotion in your majesty’s service.”

The Queen’s Answer.] To this Address, the queen made the following Answer:

“That her majesty would take care, in the most effectual manner, to discourage the abuses and ill practices complained of in that Address, and to prevent the like for the future; and the House might be assured, that her majesty would always countenance with her favour, such commanders and officers, who should discharge their duty by protecting and securing the trade of the nation.”

Bill for rendering the Union more complete passed.] A Bill entitled, ‘An act for rendering the Union of the two kingdoms more entire and complete, by which one privy council was to serve for the United Kingdom,’ was read a third time. The question was put, Whether this bill shall pass? It was resolved in the affirmative.

Protest thereon.] “Dissentient’ 1st, Because the clause of this bill, which relates to the privy council, determines the privy council of Scotland, so soon as the first day of May next, by which time the provision made in the same bill, instead of the privy council, for the security of the peace, by appointing justices of the peace, to be constituted under the great seal of Great Britain, in the several counties of Scotland, cannot be expected to take effect; and therefore we conceive, that if that clause had been framed so as not to take place till the first of October next, as was proposed, the privy council of Scotland had been abolished, as certainly as by the present bill, and with more security to the peace and tranquillity of that part of the United Kingdom.—2d, Because the clause in the bill which appoints the commissions and powers to the justices of peace, authorizes those justices to proceed against offenders during the first 15 days after the crime committed; and that in the liberties of heretable offices and officers for life, which, at the time of the Union of the two kingdoms, the justices of the peace (and all ordinary officers and ministers of justice) were by law excluded from doing; and therefore we apprehend, that the last-mentioned clause in the bill might be constructed to be an encroachment upon the 20th Article of the Union, and by that means be the occasion of raising great jealousies and discontents throughout that part of the United Kingdom. Bridgewater, Seafield, Cholmondely, Greenwich, Stair, Godolphin, Somerset, Leven.”

Resolutions of the Commons against Captain Kerr.] Feb. 16. The Commons upon the Report made by sir Richard Onslow, from the Committee of the whole House, in relation to the State of the Navy, and Trade of the Nation, came to the following Resolutions: “1. That the complaint of Mr. Wood and other merchants against captain Kerr, in relation to the Neptune sloop and Martha galley, and also in relation to three other sloops, which were under the convoy of the Experiment man of war, hath been fully proved and made out. 2. That the trade to the West Indies, being of great advantage and benefit to Great Britain, hath, by captain Kerr’s exacting exorbitant sums of money from the merchants for convoys, whilst he commanded a squadron of her majesty’s ships of war in the West Indies, been greatly obstructed and prejudiced. 3. That the requiring or demanding of money for convoys, is illegal, oppressive to merchants, and destructive to trade. 4. That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, laying before her the said Resolutions, and humbly desiring that her majesty will be pleased, not to employ the said captain Kerr in her majesty’s service for the future.”

This Address having been presented to the queen, on the 26th, her majesty declared, “That she would comply with it.”

The Queen's Answer to the Commons' Address, concerning the Affairs of Spain and Portugal.] Feb. 18. The lord Coningsby acquainted the House, That her majesty had been pleased to send by him her Answer to their Address of the 5th of that month; that her majesty would be pleased to order an Account to be laid before the House how it came to pass that there were no more English forces in Spain and Portugal, at the time of the battle of Almanza, and that her majesty would be pleased to use her utmost endeavours, that the war in Spain might be vigorously and effectually prosecuted; and he delivered the same to Mr. Speaker, who read it to the House, as followeth:

“ANNE R.

“Her majesty, having considered the Address of the House of Commons, presented to her the 5th instant, hath directed the following Answer to be returned.

“In relation to that part which concerns the prosecution of the war in Spain, her majesty is pleased to acquaint the House, That the restoring the Spanish monarchy to the house of Austria, and thereby the balance of power in Europe, was the principal inducement of the present war, so her majesty is sensible, That on the success thereof, not only the trade and tranquillity, but even the security of Great Britain, (subject to the Divine Providence) do in a great measure depend: And therefore her majesty can never be wanting to continue her utmost endeavours, as her Commons have desired, to prosecute with vigour and effect a war of such a nature and consequence, or to excite her allies, upon all occasions, to concur with her majesty's endeavours in that behalf.

“And as to the Account, how it came to pass, That there were no more English forces in Spain and Portugal, at the time of the battle of Almanza, her majesty cannot but be very much concerned, to find that matter has not been fully stated to the House; and to the end the same may be set in the clearest light, for the satisfaction of herself and her subjects, she hath caused an enquiry to be made of the regiments, that were intended to compose the number of 29,395 men, mentioned in the Address, (in which number are included officers and their servants, making a full fourth part of the whole, according to the establishment and allowance always made on the musters) and how many of them were in Spain and Portugal in January in 1706-7, when the resolutions were taken to make provision for their pay, and what regiments have been sent thither since that time: whereby it may appear, what numbers of men could reasonably be expected to be in Spain or Portugal on the 14th of April, 1707, when the said battle happened, and what diligence hath been used towards making up the said whole number, for which provision was made by parliament. Upon which enquiry it appears, That the said body of 29,395 English forces, were intended to consist of one regiment of horse, five regiments of dragoons, and one and thirty of foot; in all thisty-seven regiments.

“That the said 37 regiments were to be made up of one regiment of horse, four regiments of dragoons, and nineteen regiments of foot, which had served in Portugal and Spain, under the respective commands of the earls of Peterborough and Galway, and would, if compleat, have amounted to 18,852 men; and of one regiment of dragoons, and ten regiments of foot, which had been sent the year before to Portugal, under the command of the earl Rivers; and if they had arrived compleat in Spain, would have amounted to 8,893 men; and of two regiments, making together 1,740 men, which were designed to be new raised in England: so that in case all these 37 regiments could have been compleated, they would have made up the said whole number of 29,395 English forces, including officers and their servants.

“Her majesty is farther informed by lord Tyrwally, who was lieutenant-general, and col. Wade, who was adjutant-general, that as to the said regiments which had served in Spain under the earl of Peterborough, and those which had served in Portugal and Spain under the earl of Galway, the officers and their servants, with the private soldiers which remained in those regiments at the time of the said provision made by parliament, did amount in the whole to 12,017, besides 1,790 prisoners, who belonged to those regiments, in all 13,807 men, or thereabouts, and no more; although in the years 1704, 1705, and 1706, several recruits, amounting to 3,490 men, had been sent into Spain and Portugal by draughts made out of the standing regiments of England and Ireland, as a particular favour to the service of Spain, and never practised in any other case, but once to the West Indies.

“That as to the said regiment of dragoons, and ten regiments of foot, which were sent in the year 1706, under earl Rivers into Portugal, and consequently were near at hand to be transported to Spain for immediate service, the said earl Rivers received her majesty's commands so timely, that he arrived with them in the kingdom of Valencia about the latter end of January, 1706-7. And although those regiments, when they sailed from Torbay for Portugal, were by draughts compleated to the number of 8,297 men, including officers and servants; and if that number had arrived in Spain, would have made up about 22,104 English troops; yet soon after the arrival of the said forces with earl Rivers in Valencia, they were found to be reduced, by death or otherwise, to about 4,500 men, including officers and their servants; and therefore it was thought convenient, at the beginning of the year 1707, to take the common soldiers which remained in six regiments of foot, then in Valencia and Catalonia, and distribute them towards filling up several of the rest of the regiments then there, and to send the officers of the said six regiments, with the officers of the late earl of Barrymore's late regiment of foot, (which had the year before been converted into one of dragoons by the earl of Peterborough) into England, to raise their regiments entirely of new men; which officers arrived in England about May and June 1707, and soon after had their recruiting orders, and have ever since been employed in that service, except those of the regiment of Barrymore, which some time since embarked for Portugal; so that it was impossible that the new-raised soldiers of those seven regiments could be in Spain or Portugal, at the time of the said battle.

“That upon duly weighing the premises, it doth not appear to her majesty how there could reasonably be expected of English forces in Spain or Portugal, at the time of the battle of Almanza (which happened so soon after the provision made by parliament) any more effective men than could be supplied by the said 13,807 men, including officers, servants and prisoners, before commanded by the earls of Peterborough and Galway respectively, and by the said numbers of about 4,500 men, including officers and servants, which remained of the forces that went under earl Rivers, as aforesaid.

“That as to the two new regiments which were intended to be raised, and to make 1710 men, part of the said 29,395 English forces, it was found to be for the advantage of the public in respect of the apparent difficulties of raising them (in concurrence with the men of the said seven regiments) to apply the money given for the said two regiments, to other uses of the war, according to the liberty given by authority of parliament in that behalf.

“That when the making of recruits grew extremely difficult, if not impracticable, and the making draughts from standing regiments had been found ruinous to the service, her majesty caused four regiments which were on the Irish establishment to be completed, and the levy money for completing the same, and the growing charge of their pay, to be placed on the savings of the non-effectives of the Spanish establishment; which four regiments embarked in April 1707, and arrived in Portugal in June following, and ought to be reckoned as so many recruits towards making up the said number of 29,395 English forces.

“That, since the arrival of the said four regiments in Portugal, three other regiments have been prepared, to wit, that of Barrymore on the Spanish establishment, that of Paston taken from the establishment of the guards in England, and that of Wynn taken from the establishment of the forces in Ireland; which have been embarked for some time for Portugal, as another reinforcement for the service of the said war.

“That as soon as her majesty had the news of the battle of Almanza, she applied herself immediately to obtain such foreign troops as were nearest at hand to supply that loss, and hath agreed for 7,000 Palatines, 3,000 Germans, and 1,200 Italians, the greatest part of which have been embarked ever since November last for Catalonia, and the rest are ready for embarkation as soon as there is an opportunity. Besides which, her majesty hath made application to the emperor for 6,000 Germans more, with an offer to pay all such part of them as his imperial majesty can spare for that service.

“And upon the whole matter, reflecting impartially upon the situation of this necessary war in Spain and Portugal, and upon the difficulties wherewith, for the time past, the men have been supplied from England and Ireland; and considering the losses and accidents which have attended the service in parts so remote, and the provision made for foreign forces for the future, her majesty assures herself, it will be very evident that no care has been wanting to support the war in Spain and Portugal in the most effectual manner.”

Feb. 19. The Commons ordered, that the Addresses of the House to her majesty of the 18th December, and 12th of January last, about the Forces maintained by the kings of Spain and Portugal, be renewed to her majesty.

The Queen's Answer, in relation to the Troops of the Kings of Spain and Portugal. Feb. 23. The Lord Coningsby acquainted the House, that their Addresses to her majesty of the 18th of December, and 12th of January, having been renewed, according to their order, her majesty had been pleased to give this Answer following, viz.

“That in relation to that part of the Address which concerns the forces of the king of Spain, her majesty has ordered to be laid before the House a List of the Troops provided by the king of Spain, for the service of the year 1707. And in relation to the Troops of Portugal, her majesty has, ever since the Treaty with that crown, given directions to her ministers there to use all possible means that his said majesty should furnish the whole of of the number of men agreed for by the said Treaty, and her majesty hopes, that those instances have, in a great measure, had their desired effect.—At the same time her majesty observes, That the methods of discipline there make it impossible to know the number of those Troops with the same exactness as is practised in other parts; and, considering with what cheerfulness and success they marched through Spain to Madrid, and the losses they sustained, and being well assured, that the king of Portugal has lately raised, and is still raising a considerable number of forces, her majesty has not thought it advisable to make too nice an enquiry into the state of those Troops; especially since she is very sensible how diligent the enemy is in making continual application, to break an alliance of so great importance to the common cause.”

This done, the Lord Coningsby presented to the House the List of the Troops provided by the king of Spain, for the service of the year 1707.

The Lords' Address relating to the Merchants' Complaint, on Account of Losses, for want of Cruisers and Convoys. Feb. 25. The Lords agreed upon the following Address* to her majesty:

* “When the Examination was ended, and reported to the House, it was resolved to lay

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and obedient subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, do humbly acquaint your majesty, that, early in this session of parliament, a Petition of several merchants, on behalf of themselves and others, traders of the city of London, was presented to the House, whereby they complained of great losses by the ill-timing of Convoys, and for want of cruisers; so that they durst no longer engage the remainder of their estates to carry on their several trades, unless immediate care was taken to remedy these two main causes of their misfortunes.— This Petition containing Complaints of great consequence to your majesty's subjects; and we being sensible, that nothing but a strict and impartial enquiry into matters of fact, could put them in a due light, and enable us to distinguish between ill-grounded clamours, and a just cause of complaint, in order to take the usual method of being rightly and fully informed, did refer the Petition to a the whole matter before the queen in an Address; and then the Tories discovered the design, that they drove at: for they moved in the committee, that prepared the Address, that the blame of all the Miscarriages might be laid upon the ministry, and on the cabinet council. It had been often said in the House of Lords, that it was not intended to make any complaint of the Prince himself [the Lord High Admiral]: and it not being admitted, that his Council was of a legal constitution, the complaining of them would be an acknowledging their authority; the blame therefore could be regularly laid no where, but on the ministry. This was much pressed by the duke of Buckinghamshire, the earl Rochester, and the lord Haversham. But to this it was answered by the earl of Orford, the lord Somers, and the lord Halifax, that the House ought to lay before the queen only that, which was made out before them upon oath; and therefore, since in the whole Examination the ministry and the cabinet council were not once named, they could offer the queen nothing to their prejudice. Some of the things complained of fell on the Navy-Board; which was a body acting by a legal authority. The Lords ought to lay before the queen such Miscarriages, as were proved to them, and leave it to her to find out, on whom the blame ought to be cast. So far was the ministry from appearing to be in fault, that they found several advertisements were sent by the secretaries of state to the admiralty, which, as appeared afterwards, were but too well-grounded; and yet these were neglected by them; and that, which raised the clamour higher, was, that, during the winter, there were no cruisers lying in the channels, so that many ships, which had run through all dangers at sea, were taken in sight of land; for the privateers came up boldly to our ports. All this was digested into a full and clear Address laid by the House before the queen." Tindal.

"committee, and did also refer to the same committee several papers, which the House had found necessary to call for from the proper offices, for their better information in divers things relating to the Navy.—The committee having prepared a Report, and presented it to the House, upon a mature consideration, it was approved and agreed to: and we think it our duty humbly to lay the same before your majesty.—The Lords Committees have heard many of the Petitioners upon their oaths, and have caused them to put their depositions into writing, and sign the same."

[Here follows the First Report.]

"The Lords Committees observing, that the complaints of the Petitioners naturally fell under several heads; for the greater ease of the House, have endeavoured in their report to reduce the evidence to the following method, always referring, as they proceed, to the depositions themselves.

"One thing complained of, was the insufficiency of Convoys appointed for the merchants, whereby their ships had from time to time become a prey to the superior force of the enemy.

"A second point was, The merchants suffered great discouragement by their being forced to wait long for Convoys, even after the time promised and prefixed for their sailing, whereby the charge of seamen's wages and victuals, demurrage of shipping, damage of goods, and loss of markets, made trading insupportable.

"A third Ground of Complaint, was, The untimely and unseasonable sailing of Convoys, whereby trade (to the West-Indies, especially) was in a manner ruined.

"A fourth was, The great want of cruisers in the Channel and Soundings.

"A fifth Complaint was, concerning the arbitrary proceedings of the captains of the queen's ships of war, in impressing seamen out of the merchant-ships in the West-Indies; as also upon their return into the ports of Great Britain, to the endangering of many, and loss of several ships.

"In order to make out the first Head of their Complaint, relating to the insufficiency of Convoys, they gave the following instances:

1. In June, 1706, a fleet of merchant-ships, under convoy of the Gosport man of war, bound for the West Indies, were attacked in the Soundings, and the Gosport and eight or nine of the merchant-ships were taken.—2. The Lisbon fleet, under convoy of the Swiftsure and Warspight, were attacked in March, 1706-7; and about 14 merchant ships taken in the Soundings.—3. The Newfoundland fleet under convoy of the Falkland and Medway's prize, were attacked in April, and some of them taken.—4. The coasting convoy was attacked in April off the Land's End.—5. The convoy from the Downs, consisting of the Hampton Court, the Royal Oak, and the Grafton, sailed the 1st of May last, and the next day were attacked in the Channel, and the Hampton-court and the Grafton, and about 20 merchant-ships, were taken by the Dunkirk squadron.—A 6th instance was, that of the Russia ships outward bound this year, which was attacked by the Dunkirk squadron, and 16 of them taken.—And farther, in respect to the Russia Fleet, Mr. Dawson informed their lordships, that on the 29th of April, the governor and a committee of the Moscovia company, attended the Prince's council to know what convoy was appointed to conduct their ships to Archangel: They were told their convoy should be one fourth, and two fifth-rate ships. Upon their representing their fears of danger from the Dunkirk squadron, it was told them from the board, they need not be under any apprehension on that score, for the Dunkirk squadron was gone westward; which proved not true, for on the Thursday following, the Hampton-Court, Grafton, and Royal Oak, sailed out of the Downs with the ships under their convoy, and the next day, being the 2d of May, fell in with the Dunkirk squadron.

‘To shew the Losses and Disappointments that have lately happened to the fleets of the Moscovia company, Mr. Dawson acquainted their lordships with the substance of a petition lately presented by the Moscovia company to the Prince's council; and upon his oath informed their lordships of many facts, in order to make good what was contained in that petition; but those facts being not particularly set down in his deposition delivered to their lordships, and signed by him, no notice is taken of them in this report. The merchants also desired, that notice might be taken of the Gazette of the 8th of May last.

‘The merchants instanced in the convoy which went with the king of Portugal's horses, and many other merchants ships, which were attacked the 10th of October last, by the Dunkirk and Brest squadrons joined together, who burnt one of our men of war, and took three others, with about 30 of our merchant ships. To shew this, the merchants produced the Gazette of the 3d Nov. 1707. These several convoys having been thus attacked in the soundings and channel in less than a year and a half, the merchants insisted, was a convincing proof of their insufficiency.

‘The second Head of Complaint was, of the great discouragement and prejudice to Trade, by the merchants being under a necessity of waiting so long for convoys, whereby their charges were exceedingly increased, great damages happened to their cargoes, and their markets were lost. They said, if any of their ships happened to escape the enemy in their return home, their losses were much heightened by their long lying for a convoy in the river; which, though very much and long complained of, yet seldom met with any redress.

‘One instance of the damages arising by the delay of convoys, was, that several of our merchants had orders in July, 1704, for buying great quantities of corn for the King of Portugal's use, and had assignments on the treasury for 100,000 pieces of eight: Accordingly a great quantity of corn was bought in July and August, and frequent applications made to the Prince's council for convoy, and they promised from time to time to take care of it; but the convoy did not sail from Portsmouth till the 6th of February following, near seven months after they had orders: And by this delay their corn was in a very bad condition.

‘The merchants had an order from the king of Portugal to the same purpose the year before, but then they had worse success in getting their corn conveyed to Portugal: and by these disappointments the Portugal court was discouraged in sending orders for more corn from hence, not only by reason of the great disappointment, as to time, but by the spoiling of the corn, whereby our corn was brought under great disrepute: and they now supply themselves from Holland, and thereby the Dutch not only reap the advantage thereof, but, as the corn comes chiefly to them from the Baltic seas, it is a great advantage to their trade and navigation.

‘The 25th of March, 1707, a fleet sailed for Portugal, but there was then a prospect given, that there should soon go another convoy. This encouraged the shipping of great quantities of corn, and woollen manufactures; and the heat of the weather coming on, pressing applications were made for that convoy, but without success.

‘The 10th of August, the grand fleet sailed from Portsmouth, but took no merchant ships under their convoy. The merchants having continued petitioning, till about the latter end of September, then told the Prince's council in plain terms, that if they did not grant a convoy immediately, the goods aboard their ships would inevitably perish in port. At that time they promised the Norfolk and Warspight; the merchants prayed a small ship might be added to see their ships safe along the coasts of Portugal, but that was denied; and the Prince's council told them, the Warspight had orders to that purpose.

‘The merchants acquainted them, that so large a ship at that season durst not venture so near the shore, as was necessary to protect the trade from privateers lying near the shore; and did also represent the danger to which the main fleet of merchant ships, bound for Lisbon, would be exposed, if they proceeded with a single man of war; but this was not regarded; so the merchants were forced to submit, having some chance for saving their cargoes, if they proceeded; whereas they had none, if they continued longer in port; for not only their corn would be spoiled, but all their woollen manufactures were in danger of decaying by the heating of their corn, as had been often experienced.

‘Soon after, a report came, that a French squadron was cruising in the Channel, and an embargo thereupon was laid on that fleet. The Portugal merchants drew up a remonstrance, representing the great hardships they had suffered: but it happened at the same time, when the remonstrance was presented to the Prince's council, news came, that some Dutch homeward bound West India ships, meeting with contrary winds in the Channel, had been taken for French, and were put into Portsmouth. Upon this, the merchants pressed they might proceed without delay, the cause of the embargo being removed: but the Board seemed displeas'd with their remonstrance, and told them, the embargo had been laid by the Prince, and could not be taken off without his direction; and that his highness being then at Newmarket, it must take up time before such an order could be sent; but, if they would stay a week longer, the Exeter should be added to the convoy, and the Nassau, if she could get up in time; to which several of the merchants did agree, and were oblig'd by the Board to sign a paper to that purpose.

The fleet sailed the 18th Oct. with the Norfolk, Warspight, and Exeter, but the Nassau did not join: which the merchants said, was only for want of necessary orders; for the fleet was not under sail till three of the clock in the afternoon, and the Nassau came to Spithead before night.

By reason of the insufficiency of this convoy, several ships were taken out of the fleet near Portland; and afterwards the fleet meeting with bad weather in the Bay of Biscay, the Warspight and Exeter came back disabled: whereas the merchant ships (except some few, which had fallen foul upon each other) proceeded to Lisbon with the Norfolk only: but several more ships were lost out of the fleet by the weakness of the convoy, and two men of war, out of three, being disabled, and forced to return, they thought it reasonable to conclude it could not be without some considerable defects in the ships, when they went out.

Another instance insisted upon, was, that a great number of merchant ships having gotten into Portsmouth from Jamaica, Virginia, New England, Antigua, Lisbon, and other parts, in December, 1706, as also many coasters; all these were detained there for want of convoy to the Downs, from that time to the 24th of April following, being between four and five months, although frequent applications were made to the Prince's council, for convoy to the Downs, from the masters there, and the owners at London, and many promises given; and yet during that time, many of her majesty's ships lay there in harbour, and several men of war passed by from Plymouth, without calling for the merchant ships which lay there. Sir Thomas Hardy, with the East India ships, and other ships from Ireland, passed by without calling in.

When these merchant ships came into Portsmouth, the Southampton lay ready fitted at Spithead, and continued there two months at least, and the Anglesea lay there a considerable time ready fitted. During this time, several frigates sailed from Portsmouth, and cruised up as far as Dungeness, within seven leagues of the Downs, but, for want of orders, took no ships with them. Whilst these ships lay there for want of convoy, there were at Spithead the following men of war, many of which lay there a considerable time: viz. The Anglesea, Southampton, Swifsure, Warspight, Severn, Portland, Ruby, Feversham, August, Nassau, and the Albemarle, Reserve, Dover, Ramillies, Sun-Prize, and two fifth rates. Some of these (it was hoped, during the westerly winds, which were very frequent) might have been ordered to have seen these ships, being about 50 or 60 sail, to the Downs, which was within about 16 hours sail. All this while the merchants lay at great charges, besides the damage to their cargoes, and the loss of many of their voyages for the following season.

About the 10th of February, the Ruby and Feversham, appointed as a convoy for them, gave sailing orders, but were again countermanded, and the Ruby went into the dock to clean. Afterwards, upon further importunity, the August was ordered to join the Ruby and Feversham; but instead of going for the Downs, they went first to fetch the coasters from Topsham, and then came to call for the ships at Portsmouth.

About the beginning of October, 1706, Mr. Coward and Mr. Jones let several ships to freight to the Commissioners of the Victualling Office, for the queen's service directly to Jamaica: being told, the convoy waited for them, they were bound by charter-party to be at the Nore the 15th of November following, on penalty of 5s. per ton freight. Their ships were ready, and the wind was fair, but they were detained for the convoy, and carried from place to place, from the Downs to Portsmouth, thence to Plymouth, thence to Ireland, thence to Barbadoes and Antigua, staying at each place, so that they arrived not at Jamaica till the 3rd of June last, to the ruin of their voyage, and their ships, of which they just then had an account, that they are lately come back to Ireland.

Mr. Coward, the 11th Feb. last, let to freight to the Commissioners of Victualling in the queen's service for Lisbon, the Walthamstow galley, (and as he was bound by charter-party, under the same penalty) was ready by the 1st of March last, but was detained till the end of August, before he sailed from England.

Captain Kerr appointed all the ships at Jamaica to be ready to sail the 1st of August last, but then he made them wait till the 26th of August, and after, with his convoy, left them all wheat at sea.

Mr. Palmer, in 1705, had a part in a frigate called the Ruby, laden with corn and bale goods for Lisbon; and, in company with many others, was convoyed from the Downs to Portsmouth, by the Litchfield prize; but for want of orders, she could not see them at Plymouth, about 12 hours sail further, where they might have joined sir Cloudesley Shovel's fleet, bound for Portugal. Upon this, the merchants sent many petitions to the Prince's council, which together with the answers, (being direct refuasls) were inserted in his deposition. Mr. Palmer, in person, afterwards, in the name of the several merchants, attended the Prince's council, and represented, that, without speedy relief, all the corn aboard the ships would be spoiled; but the answer was, That no convoy could be granted; and at last, by a violent storm the 10th of August, about 20 sail of these were cast away, and amongst them the Ruby, worth at least, 7,000*l*.

‘For a farther evidence, the merchants produced to their lordships the Gazette of the 1st of May, 1707, and shewed the paragraph from Ostend, in which are these words: ‘A fleet of merchant ships, which lay five months in the Downs, consisting of 55 sail, arrived at Ostend this evening, to the great advantage and satisfaction of this place.’ This the merchants observed was a great delay for so short a passage, and must extremely prejudice the Flanders trade, which the parliament thought fit to encourage, by passing an act the last session for repealing the prohibition of importing lace.

‘A third Ground of the merchants’ Complaint was, That by the untimely and unseasonable proceeding of convoys, especially to the West-Indies, they were very great sufferers upon many accounts. By arriving there at an improper time, in the hot, sultry, and rainy seasons, a great mortality is occasioned among the seamen, which proves a loss of their voyages, for want of hands to bring home their ships, or put them to vast charges to purchase men there. The same cause obliges the traders to the West Indies to return in the winter time, when they commonly meet with stormy and foggy weather, which is often the occasion of their separation from their convoy; who being well manned, and crowding all the sail they can, out sail the merchant ships, being (for the reasons aforesaid) generally but weakly manned, and so are left in distress to the mercy of the enemy, or the seas, for want of a little conduct in the convoys in shortening sails, and taking care of them.

‘An instance of this was alledged in the fleet now missing from Jamaica, which came under convoy of captain Kerr, with three men of war, the Breda, the Sunderland, and the Experiment, and a fire-ship; one of which, the Sunderland, came alone to Portsmouth, the Breda, and the fire-ship, to Plymouth, and the Experiment afterwards to Spithead, but not one merchant-man, except a small ship to Bristol.

‘The merchants observed that if the convoy had fired guns, at tacking in the night, or used any other reasonable care, they could hardly have lost a whole fleet of above twenty sail. They observed also, That the convoy were all come to Portsmouth or Plymouth, and yet Mr. Kerr himself had wrote from Plymouth, that, in case of separation, the rendezvous was to have been in Ireland.

‘The Jamaica merchants complain, That they had long lain under great discouragements. That about October, 1705, they applied themselves to the Prince's council, complaining of the many losses in their fleet the preceding year, which had to a great degree disabled them from sending another that year: But that however, depending upon the then repeated assurances, that they should have a sufficient convoy to depart early, and more particularly, upon an order sent from that board to the Jamaica Coffee-House, That the merchants should get their ships ready to depart by the 20th of January, at farthest; they had prevailed with sundry persons to let their ships go to Jamaica. Accordingly, ships were fitted out with great expedition, and men hired at extravagant wages. But, after all those fair promises, their ships, thus fitted, lay almost two months beyond the time prefixed, for want of a convoy.

‘The 21st of March, the merchants, as men in despair, reciting the former assurances given them, petitioned his royal highness, that their ships might depart with the first squadron bound out of their channel; adding, That if that fleet should miscarry by their late going out, and return, they desponded of getting ships to carry on the trade the succeeding year.

‘Howbeit, that fleet was detained till the beginning of May, and the ill success too well answered the merchants’ apprehensions; for the greatest part of the fleet, being separated from their convoy in their return, were lost.

‘That by these and many other hardships, the Jamaica Trade is brought to so low a state, that wherens at the beginning of the war, their fleets home, have consisted of 30 or 40 sail, when they were lately informed by the Prince's council, that a sufficient convoy should be ready to depart with their fleet in a proper time, they were obliged to acquaint the board, that they had now but two ships in loading.

‘They also said, That, without some speedy remedy, they should be quite disabled to make any farther efforts, to carry on the hopeful Trade begun to the Spanish West Indies: upon account whereof more woollen and other English manufactures were shipped to Jamaica for that Trade, than had been in several years before.

‘In respect to the Virginia Trade; In Oct. 1705 some ships sailed for Virginia, under convoy of the Woolwich and Advice, who were ordered to stay there till reinforced from England; and the merchants were then promised, that the Greenwich and the Hazardous should sail with the first fair wind in January following; but those ships did not sail till May, 1706. This delay was the cause they did not reach Virginia till August; at which time the greatest part of their fleet had been sixteen months in their voyage. By this length of the voyage, their whole freight was expended in wages, victuals, and other incident charges. 2. The ships lying there almost two whole summers, several of their bottoms were perished by the worms, which in those parts always eat in the summer months. 3. To compleat their misfortune, they were forced to make a winter passage home, and by the badness of the weather, &c. sixteen or more ships were sunk or foundered in the sea, and about eight thousand hogsheads of tobacco lost, other ships with above two thousand hogsheads of tobacco more, were taken and carried into France; and divers ships were forced back to America, and since returning without convoy, are lost, and not heard of.

The particulars of these losses are annexed to the Depositions given in by the merchants, and thereby it is alledged, That the public revenue has suffered above 150,000*l.*, besides the very great loss to the particular persons concerned.

It having been the last winter represented by the Commissioners for Trade, That it was necessary a convoy should go to Virginia in the spring, to fetch the ships which should be there, and that they should stay there 20 days after their arrival, to collect them the better together; a great body of ships which had taken stores, &c. for Lisbon, upon her majesty's account, were thereby encouraged to go from thence to Virginia, and many other ships went from London directly. But most of these remained in Virginia in September last, expecting this convoy, and will now be obliged to come home without convoy in the winter season: for though the last spring her majesty in council ordered a convoy to be ready in August, to go for Virginia, yet they still remain at Portsmouth. By this the Virginia ships will be forced to lie all summer in Virginia, and come home again in the winter, and thereby not only the merchants losses and damages will be very great, and the revenue suffer much, but there is aboard this fleet, far greater quantities of the woollen manufacture, for the winter cloathing of that country, than has been usually sent to those parts, which now cannot arrive till the winter be over, and the market past; and necessity will justify those people for undertaking our manufactures, which many of them have already fallen into: the ill consequences of which the merchants submitted to the consideration of their lordships. They also said, That, for some years past, there had been no frigate appointed to take care of the Virginia coast, for want of which, many ships have been taken, going in, and coming out, by the French privateers. These merchants prayed their lordships to use some means, that the coasts of Virginia may be guarded, proper convoys appointed, and the merchants have due notice thereof, and that then they might neither be delayed nor diverted, and that the admiral's protection might stand good, till the ships were arrived in the proper ports of discharge. A fourth Head of the Merchants' Complaint was, the great want of cruisers in the Channel and Soundings. Mr. John Wood informed their lordships, That in the space of 16 months last past, he had been concerned as owner and freighter of several ships that loaded corn in the port of Shoreham in Sussex for Holland and Lisbon. The Union frigate was ready to sail for Portsmouth in October, 1706, but the coast was so infested by privateers, that she could not, without apparent danger, proceed in Portsmouth, though only eight or ten leagues distant: thereupon he and other owners, in like circumstances, made frequent application to the Prince's council, for a man of war to convoy those ships, but they from time to time delayed to order any ship to call at Shoreham. He said, that upon application the Prince's council told them, that they had only some third-rate men of war, too large to lie on that coast, except a frigate of about 26 guns, which admiral Mitchell said they might have; but admiral Churchill said, if she was sent, she would certainly be taken. At last Mr. Wood despairing of assistance, after waiting six months (the ship lying at great charges, and having on board a perishing commodity) notwithstanding the apparent hazard, directed the ship should sail for Portsmouth, but they were soon chased by three privateers, and thereupon got under the guns of Brightbelmont, but found little protection there, the guns being not in order, and there being no powder to charge them: but night coming on, and the weather bad, and the privateers standing off to sea, the Union frigate, by the favour of the night, weighed and stood for the Downs, and by the dawning of the day was got up with Beachy-head, but there fell in with several privateers, who chased her under the guns of Hastings, where then lay a tender to a man of war, with about an 100 impressed men, which durst not stir out, either for the Downs or Portsmouth, for fear of the French privateers, which were very numerous on the coast, and almost constantly cruising between Beachy-head and Shoreham, without interruption from our men of war. Some days after, a convoy coming from the westward with some ships, the Union frigate joined them, and got into the Downs. The same Mr. Wood, in the months of April, May and June last, was concerned in several other ships freighted with corn, in the same port of Shoreham, for Lisbon and Holland; but then also he did not dare to suffer his ships to stir out, the coast continuing still infested with French privateers. There was also, at that time, in the same harbour, a vessel laden with timber for the use of the navy, which was said to have lain there 12 or 13 months for want of convoy to Portsmouth. At last, upon frequent applications to the Prince's council, a convoy was sent, and the ships went out; but soon after they had joined, the convoy run away, and left the ships, upon a report that the Dunkirk squadron was upon the coast, and the ships were pursued by privateers, and with great difficulty got to Portsmouth. The privateers continuing to infest the coast as much as ever, Mr. Wood refused to be farther concerned from the port of Shoreham, and has not heard of any corn exported since that time from that harbour, which is a great impoverishment to the country thereabouts, the price of corn there being 20 or 25 per cent. cheaper than at any other places which lie nearer Portsmouth. Mr. Thomas Palmer deposed, That within three years he has lost to the enemy in the Channel and Soundings, a large part in three running galleys, outward bound to the Straights, and in six weeks time, has lost as much coming home, as would have paid her majesty some thousand pounds custom. The Pilgrim galley, laden with fish, was taken in the Soundings, by three large privateers. The Providence galley, laden with our manufactory, and some fish, lead and tin, bound to the Straights, worth near 10,000*l.* was taken off of Dungeness some few hours sail from the Downs, by three or four large Dunkirkers. The Mead galley and Fly galley, going out in March last in company with the London galley, they were chased off of Beachey-head by three privateers, who took the two first, the London narrowly escaping, as he was informed from Plymouth by the master, who informed him in the same letter, that a neutral ship put in there, and had been boarded above a dozen times in one day by French privateers.

'The 15th of the same March, several merchants made a remonstrance of their losses to the Prince's council, who told them, They were not to expect convoy for their running galleys: They replied, they did not, but desired cruisers might be appointed for the Channel and Soundings, the running-galleys being now the vessels which chiefly carried on trade; and that if some better care were not taken, even the men of war would be in danger in the Channel. The merchants were directed to leave their remonstrance, that it might be looked into at a full board, but it had no effect: The same vessel, the London, going out in company of the Handiside and Fleet galley, the London was taken, and the Handiside blown up in a fight off of the Lizard, and the Fleet galley only escaped.

'The Antelope galley, laden with lead, tar, and stock-fish for the Straights, was chased off of Beachey-head, by the Lyme and Gosport men of war, under Dutch colours; the master taking them to be enemies, made the best of his way for Hastings; then the men of war hoisted English colours, but the master not trusting to colours, unfortunately ran the galley ashore: This accident cost above 100*l.* to get her into Rye, and above twice as much since, upon the account of loss of time, she being detained there by the swarms of privateers, as appears by several of the master's letters of the dates following.

'The 15th of Oct., there were two privateers and a snow off that harbour. The 17th, two privateers off that harbour. The 22nd two ships of 30 guns within three miles of the harbour. The 24th, four French men of war at anchor within sight of the town. The 26th, a fleet passed by, with which the master would have joined, but could not, because there lay three French privateers between them and him, and seven more in sight. The 30th, a Dutch dogger was chased in there by seven privateers. The 5th of Nov, a sloop came into that harbour, which had been taken and ransomed coming from Lisbon, and afterwards boarded and plundered by several French privateers in the channel. The master of the sloop gave an account that three privateers were lying off the Isle of Wight, three off of Beachey, and five or six others off of Rye. The 8th of November, six sail of French ships, and a sloop lay in sight of Rye, and the sloop was come within a mile of the harbour, right in the Channel. The 15th, a gentleman that rode along the coast saw Fourbin's squadron, and several privateers cruising off of Beachey. The 17th, another master saw eight sail of French ships off the Downs, who were sending their scouts very frequently to observe what was a doing.

'The merchants desired to submit it to the consideration of the House, if there be a probability of carrying on trade under such difficult circumstances.

'Captain Winter came in the King William galley the 14th of March last from Gibraltar, in company of the Pearl, the Hanover, and the Lodington galleys, and at the Straights mouth they joined the Sea-Horse and the Sunderland. The 31st of March, they were pursued by four sail, but escaped them by tacking in the night. Upon the 9th of April, they had sight of Beachey-Head, and soon after five sail of privateers, lying under the land, bore down upon them, who all made the best of their way; but the Lodington and the Sunderland were taken, and the Hanover and King William were pursued within two leagues of Dover-Castle, and the privateers would have followed them into the road, had they not seen a great ship ahead of them, standing in for that place. And though the enemies cruise in such great numbers, that it is very hard for any English ships bound homeward to escape, yet captain Winter said, he did not see one English cruiser throughout his whole voyage.

'Mr. William Wood, in order to satisfy their lordships that few or no cruisers had been employed, gave an account of many ships taken and attacked at sundry times, some within a few hours sail of the river Thames, viz.

'Off Beachey or Dungeness in December, 1706, Dove galley, Phoenix, Mary galley, Betty galley, taken in company of the Pearl galley, Lewis, Greyhound escaped.

'Off Plymouth in December and January, Volant, Hurdis, George, Berkeley galley, taken together. Tuscan and Page escaped.

'Off Dungeness in January, Trumball galley, taken with 15,000 pieces of eight on board.

'Off Dungeness in March, Mead galley, Fly galley, taken. The London at that time escaped.

'Off Beachey-Head in March, Anne galley, Eagle, taken. Neptune, Phoenix, Mary, Hooker, escaped.

' In April, 1707, Sunderland, Lodington, taken in company of the Sea-Horse, Pearl galley, Hanover, King William, escaped.

' In 1704, few or no ships arrived safe for want of proper cruisers: The Jamaica traders lost 14 ships in the Soundings and Channel.

' Sir George Byng and Admiral Jennings in January, 1704-5, were at sea cruising till October following, during which time the English ships were protected, and twenty sail of the enemies privateers and merchant ships were taken, but from that time till October or November 1706, very few ships were cruising.—Then Sir Thomas Hardy sailed with five men of war, which all returned in 5 or 6 weeks, and soon after sailed for Ireland, and returned to the Downs in February or March, since which time the merchants have had no knowledge of any ships cruising till September, 1707.—Mr. Wood told their lordships, that the account he gave, was the best he was able to procure of the number of Cruisers employed, and the time they have been in service since October, 1705. Thomas Pipon, commander of the Elizabeth galley, said, that being bound for London from Faro, he had sight of Beachy the 22d of November last, there he spied three sail to the Eastward of him, and stood from them, but soon after seeing three more near his wake, and having tried their sailing, and finding he could by no means escape, he being so encompassed, he ran his ship on shore at East-Bourn, on the coast of Sussex, in hopes of some assistance; but two of the privateers came and anchored within pistol shot of the ship, and, by firing forced the ships company to get on shore, after the best defence they could make, having first endeavoured to disable the ship, and put fire to some of the sails; but the enemy was so near, that they soon extinguished the fire; and, by the help of the rising water, got off the Elizabeth galley and carried her away.

' Mr. Pipon said, that while he stayed at Eastbourn, which was two days, he saw six or seven privateers cruising off and on, several very near the shore; and was informed by the people of the place, that, for four or five weeks past, they had seen French privateers almost every day, sometimes to the number of sixteen, but mostly eight or ten of them, and some of good force.—He said, by reason of their great numbers, and cruising in the narrow of the Channel, it is very difficult for any ships to avoid falling into their hands, especially since there are no good harbours or forts to succour them, nigh that place; and the enemy's harbours of Dunkirk and Calais are so near, and so few English cruisers in the Channel to intercept the said privateers and their prizes, which makes the ships companies be altogether for running on shore to save their liberties.

' Captain George Guillaume told their Lordships, that in his last voyage from St. Ubes to London, in the ketch Concord, on Sunday the 16th of November last, he was forced, by contrary winds, into Falmouth harbour; the next day he saw three French privateers take a Dutch ship within three miles of Pendennis Castle. On Thursday he left Falmouth, and on Friday he saw two vessels which chased him into Fresh Water Bay in the Isle of Wight; but, night coming on, and the weather very black, he escaped betwixt the land and the ships. On Saturday the 22d, he made Beachy-Head; and, as soon as it was day, saw a French privateer under his lee; and soon after, saw two at his stern, and three more at his lee, and two more a breast of him, which made him resolve to run his vessel on shore, being very near land. Upon this, the privateers put up English colours, which made him forbear for some time to run his ship ashore; but one of them putting all his sails out, and coming upon him, he grounded his vessel, and disabled her all he could, that they might not carry her off, and then went ashore at a place called Pevensay, and went to the town and got some assistance. The privateer came to an anchor, and fired upon them, and the shot went above an half a mile into the country. He said, if they had any great guns, they might have saved their vessel; for it was above five hours before the privateer had her aloft.

' The two following days (which was the time he stayed there) he saw from the shore six privateers. He affirmed, that in his whole passage he did not see any English man of war.

' The merchants gave an account of the vast advantage of the Mediterranean trade, which, for a considerable time, had been carried on with great success, by nimble galleys, without putting the government to the charge of convoys.

' Mr. Gould informed, that beside the Turkey trade, and trade from several other places in the Mediterranean, the customs of Leghorn, Venice, and Genoa, did amount to about 300,000*l.* sterling per annum; and an account was also given in by him, in particular, of the very great annual exports to Leghorn, alone, consisting of our manufactures, goods of our native growth, and other merchandizes; which trade had continued for many years, while our channel was better guarded; but of late it is in a manner quite interrupted for want of cruisers in the Channel and Soundings, and many rich ships taken there. He mentioned, in particular, the Mazarin galley from Turkey, worth above 80,000*l.* taken in the Soundings: the Mediterranean galley from Zant, taken off Beachy Head; the St. George galley, taken in the Channel; the Royal Anne galley, taken in the Channel, where she had made boards for about fifteen days together without seeing any one cruiser to help her; the Trumball galley, rich in mosey, taken near the Downs.—He said, he declined naming more, though he could mention several others, the rather, because some of them are included in the great lists of merchants losses, given in to their lordships, consisting of near 1160 ships: but, in order to shew the difference, when any care was taken for cruisers, he produced a list to their lordships of 91 sail of galleys bound, from Leghorn, which arrived safe, without convoys, from September, 1703, to October, 1704, whilst there were some cruisers employed.

‘He said, that foreigners did reproach our nation for the great neglect of the merchants ships; and to this purpose he produced two letters from his correspondents at Leghorn, one dated the 12th of September, in which, after taking notice of the loss of the Russia ships, it follows; ‘Seeing the enemy fall in with so many of our convoys, we begin to suspect there may be some traitors among us.’ And another letter, in which (amongst other things) it is said, ‘They have received a lamentable account of the Liabon Horse convoy, by which they observed there had been strange management in our maritime affairs, seeing we can suffer so much near home.’

‘He also produced another letter from Plymouth, dated the 18th Nov. last, wherein it was said, That the French privateers are so bold as to cruise in our very mouth: About four days since, two of them chased a Dutchman from Mounts-bay into our very harbour within Pentec, where there was a sharp dispute, and some score of guns fired: There was at that time between the island and the main, the three Welch convoys, but neither of them stirred, having no orders; however the Dutchman saved his ship; but this is enough, and too much on so melancholy a subject.—Mr. William Coward said, he believed that the list of eleven hundred and odd sail of merchant-ships lost, given in to their lordships, was very far short of the whole number.

‘As to the Fifth Head of the merchants complaints concerning their hard usage, in having their men impressed out of their ships in the West Indies, as also upon their return home, by the captains of the queen’s ships, to the very great loss and danger of their ships and merchandise, several instances were laid before their lordships.

‘The Gould frigate, Josiah Dowell, master, arrived at Jamaica in September, 1703, and whilst he went to wait upon the governor, captain Douglass, of the Norwich, impressed five of his best seamen: The master waited on the captain, and shewed him his protection, but Douglass told the master, he had twenty-five seamen, and his orders from the Admiralty were to press every fifth man: And though the master acquainted him, that some of his men were sick, and that he really wanted men to sail his ship home, yet he could not prevail but for one seaman; the captain telling him, if he would, he could take away all his men, and threatened to stop his ship, unless he would pay him the wages of the seamen he had so impressed. Upon Dowell’s arrival at Plymouth, his seamen were again impressed. This impressing of the seamen, and the extraordinary charges occasioned thereby, and the delays of the ship, amounted to near 1,000*l.* loss to the owner and merchants in that voyage.

‘In a second voyage to Jamaica in Nov. 1705, by the same ship, Daniel Bright, master, several of his men were impressed, and the master forced to hire others at an extravagant rate, and to take French prisoners on board to help to sail his ship home: And upon his arrival at Plymouth the 5th of April, 1706, all his men except his two mates, the carpenter, steward, and two boys, were impressed, and taken from him by one Saunders, a midshipman belonging to the Orford, and other press-gangs, so that his ship lay in danger: and he could not have brought her to London, but by the help of a Dutch man of war, who furnished him with ten men, after he was refused by all the queen’s men of war, to whom he applied in every place where he came, though in vain.

‘In July, 1704, the Roundbark galley, John Sampson, master, arrived at Jamaica, where captain Bois, in the Nonsuch man of war, pressed five of his seamen, whereby he was disabled (though fully laden) to sail in company of a ship of good force, which then sailed for London; and with great difficulty, and after long delay, (with much damage and danger to the ship in the mean time) the master got four seamen more, two of his own five before pressed from him, for which two he was forced to give captain Bois a pipe of wine, charged at 25*l.* But the ship proving leaky, by long lying, was lost on her passage home, in the Gulf of Florida; which loss in the ship and goods was computed to amount to 2,500*l.* to the owner, Mr. Coward, beside the losses of several other merchants.

‘The Somerset frigate, John Wicksted master, arrived at Barbadoes in April or May, 1705, where several of his men were impressed, and returning to Plymouth the 9th of August, 1705, captain Johnson of the Valour man of war, impressed five of his best seamen; and the next night in a violent storm the ship and cargo was lost; which loss in ship and goods was computed at 2,000*l.* to the owner Mr. Coward, besides the losses of other merchants.

‘The Walthamstow galley, Peter Roberts, master, arriving from Barbadoes about the same time, though he had several of his men impressed at Barbadoes, and only nine men and two boys left, with himself on board; yet captain Roach of the Fox, impressed three of his best men, his boatswain being one; although the master told him how weak he was, and that he had but one anchor on board: captain Roach said to him, if he was saucy, he would take him and all his ship’s company aboard, and whip the master at the Geers. Captain Roach sent him three Italians who could speak no English, and they the next night in a storm run away with the ship’s boat, which was staved, and the ship ran on shore, and so continued 13 days to her damage of 4 or 500*l.* besides the great prejudice to the merchants goods; upon which account the master protested at Plymouth, and the protestation was delivered to their lordships, and is laid before the House.

House, that there has been offered to them an information of Mr. Benjamin Way, in which he represented in behalf of himself and other owners and freighters of the London galley, that the said galley sailed from Jamaica the latter end of February last, bound for London, under convoy of her majesty's ship the Northumberland, captain Roffey, commander, with whom they kept company till the 7th of March. But there having been seven men impressed from her before she left Jamaica, and being forced to take French prisoners on board, and to hire what other men she could at excessive wages, to help to sail the galley home, and crowding all the sail they could to avoid being left by the convoy, the galley suffered such damage in her masts, as disabled her to keep company, and being weakly manned and in great distress, they fired guns and made signals; but being left by their convoy, the ship and cargo perished, to the loss of many thousand pounds.

The merchants made the following observations to their lordships, from the evidence given before them, that the Prince's council were fully informed of the great number of the enemy's privateers; that the nation had lost the exportation of corn for the king of Portugal's stores by the delays of the convoys; and the Portuguese army is now furnished by the Dutch with corn from the Baltic; and the advantage designed by act of parliament to the land-owner, by giving a bounty of five shillings the quarter upon exportation, is in a manner disappointed, especially since, for want of cruisers, the running-galleys are almost wholly discouraged.—That the Prince's council were so sensible of the swarming of privateers on the coasts, that they declined sending one of her majesty's ships of 26 guns, lest she should be taken.—And that from Tuesday the 29th of April, 1707, when Mr. Dawson was told by the Prince's council, that they had notice the Dunkirk squadron was gone westward, to Thursday the first of May, when the Hampton-court, Royal Oak, and Grafton, with the merchant ships under their convoy, sailed out of the Downs, there was time enough to have sent orders not only by express, but by ordinary post, to have stopped the sailing of that convoy.

The Lords committees do also herewith present to the House the great List of ships lost, which the merchants did lay before them, consisting of 1146. The Lords committees do also beg leave to inform your lordships, that the method used by them in taking the examinations of the several merchants was, that, after they had signed their several depositions, their lordships required them to depose, that all that was contained in their papers, respectively, which was said to be of their own knowledge, was true, and what was mentioned therein, as heard by them, or received in writing from any other person, they believed to be true.

“After this Report had been made and “agreed to, the House was moved, that it might be transmitted to the lord high admiral, which was readily assented to, and the same was transmitted accordingly, together with all the depositions relating thereto.

“On the 9th of January last, a paper was laid before the House, which purported to be the lord high admiral's answer, viz.

The Lord High-Admiral's ANSWER to the Report made to the House of Peers, from the Lords Committees appointed to consider of the Petition of several Merchants and others, Traders of the City of London.

Admiralty, Jan. 8, 1707-8.

‘The Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, having by their order, bearing date the 17th day of December last, directed, that a copy of the Report should be sent to the Lord High-Admiral, which was made to them on the same day, from the Lords Committees appointed to consider of the petition of several merchants, on behalf of themselves and others, traders of the city of London, and of the depositions to which the said Report doth refer; and the said merchants having represented in their petition, that they have, of late years, sustained great losses by the insufficiency, by the delays, and by the unseasonable sailing of convoys, and the want of cruisers; his royal highness has thought it necessary, that this general complaint, as well as the several particulars contained in the afore-mentioned Report, should receive such answers, as may set the whole matter in a much truer light than their lordships can possibly have by those papers only, from which the Report had been collected: And therefore it is desired that their lordships will be referred to the following particulars.

1. ‘As to the insufficiency of convoys.

‘The Lord High-Admiral does not observe any instances given, where the trades that usually proceed with convoys have ever wanted a reasonable and sufficient strength for their security; and even the last year, the stated convoys have been much stronger than formerly. The misfortunes of several convoys being attacked by a superior force, were no ways to have been prevented but by whole squadrons: But it is to be observed, that all the instances mentioned in their lordships report, happened in the latter years of this present war. In the two first years of her majesty's reign, there were not many ships employed either in or towards the Mediterranean, and even those not long absent from our own coasts; so that there were undoubtedly many more ships, and those very proper too to be employed in the defence of the trade of the nation, with respect not only to convoys, but cruisers: Whereas, in the latter years of her majesty's reign, the public service hath required the employing great part of our fleet abroad in the Mediterranean; and although several ships have returned from thence to England in the latter end of those years, yet they have not been fit for any service, until the time appointed, wherein it was necessary they should be sent abroad again; for they were such as were the least able to continue out, and consequently wanted the greatest repairs.

2. 'As to the merchants waiting long for convoys after the time promised and fixed for their sailing.

'The many constant, as well as accidental services, which have absolutely required the use of the queen's ships, have often left but very little choice of ships for foreign convoys: But when applications have been made by the merchants, the proper convoys have been ordered to be got in readiness by the time desired, and not afterwards diverted to other uses; yet it hath sometimes happened, upon their coming into the dock, that they have been found, by a long and constant use, in a much worse condition than was hoped and expected. The necessity of fitting ships at different ports for the same convoy, and contrary winds have often prevented their joining at the rendezvous, and sometimes the want of men, and necessity of removing them from ship to ship, and the constant care to pay the men so removed before they sailed, may have occasioned the delays complained of; yet, upon a strict enquiry, it will appear, that the delays are as often to be imputed to the traders, who are seldom ready to sail altogether at the same time, and that the queen's ships have as often staid for the merchants, as they tor their convoys; as their lordships may observe from one instance in the paper herewith transmitted to them, marked A.

3. 'As to the want of sufficient cruisers in the Soundings and Channel.

'There hath every year been a provision made for cruisers in the Soundings, Channel, North Seas, and never less than twelve for the North Seas, and fifteen for the Soundings, which were as many as other necessary and pressing services would possibly admit of; but they have been very frequently diverted from the service of cruising, upon the applications of the merchants themselves, either for the conveying up the Channel their homeward-bound ships, or the fetching them from Ireland, or other parts, and in conveying the traders to Archangel, the Baltic, Holland, &c. And there hath been a necessity to comply with this, because those services could not possibly be otherwise accommodated, unless some of the few ships had been taken off, which were on various stations placed on the coast, to secure the trade from one port to another.

4. 'As to the complaint of the arbitrary proceedings of the captains of her majesty's ships, in impressing seamen from merchant ships in the West-Indies, and at their return into the ports of Great-Britain.

'If this hath been done, it is contrary to the constant and direct orders given to the said captains, by which they are required not to impress any men from merchant ships in the plantations, without applying to, and receiving the consent of the respective governors, and then never above one out of five, which is more than have ever been exacted from them during this war. And if, for the better manning her majesty's fleet, any men are taken from merchant ships when they arrive here, the captains of her majesty's ships are strictly required to supply as many good men in their room, to bring them unto the ports whereto they are designed, and to send a careful officer with them; and when such men have performed those services, they are allowed the usual conduct-money to enable them to repair to their proper ships again. But if this should be true, it must needs seem hard to their lordships, that the merchants do impute to the Lord High-Admiral, the miscarriages of his officers, which have never been complained of to him without a proper redress.

5. 'As to the Gosport's being taken in her passage to the West Indies in June 1706, with several of her convoys.

'This was an accident that could neither be foreseen nor prevented; and these ships being taken almost 300 miles in the sea, on which occasion, as the queen's officers did all that was possible in the defence of the merchant ships, so it is hoped that their lordships' justice and wisdom, will not make such misfortunes criminal. And as for the particulars of that action, they are contained in the paper marked B.

6. 'Another complaint is, That the Lisbon fleet, under convoy of the Warspight and Swiftsure, was attacked in March, 1706-7, and 14 merchant ships taken in the Soundings.

'This convoy had the misfortune to fall in with 17 ships of the enemies, which were going directly from Brest to the West-Indies, and by the greatest chance imaginable met them in their passage: the particulars whereof are in the paper marked C.

7. 'It is farther alledged, that the Newfoundland fleet was attacked in April, under convoy of the Falkland and Medway prize.

'Those two ships did in their passage out of the Channel, meet with eight sail of the enemy's privateers from 30 to 20 guns, with which they engaged, but carried all their convoys safe to Newfoundland, except two that made sail from them, and by that means fell into the enemy's hands.

8. 'It is alledged, that a coasting convoy was attacked in April off the Land's End.

'This may be true, though this is the first advice of it.

9. 'Another complaint there is, that the Hampton-court, Royal Oak, and Grafton, sailing from the Downs, the first of May last, were the next day attacked, and the Hampton-court and Grafton, and about 80 merchant ships taken by the Dunkirk squadron. Otherwise than that, they were in the Flemish-road, notwithstanding what is sworn by Mr. Dawson, that he was told at the Admiralty-office, the said squadron was gone westward; for, upon the strictest examination of all the advices, and of the minutes of the office of that very day, there does not appear any notice of the enemy's ships being sailed to the westward: wherefore those three ships, which were one of 76 guns, and the other two of 73 guns each, were judged a sufficient convoy between the Downs and Spithead, nor were there any ships within reach to have strengthened them.

10. 'It is also alledged, that the Russia ships outward-bound the last year, were attacked by the enemy, and 16 of the merchant ships taken.

'As to this matter, their lordships are desired to be referred to a paper marked D. by which their lordships will find a particular account of that affair, from the time that the merchants did first apply for the convoy; and that sir William Whetstone, with the squadron under his command, did conduct them to the latitude of 68 degrees, and that then leaving them to their proper convoy, none of the merchant ships did fall into the enemy's hands, but those whose masters did actually leave the said convoy, and that not till they were in the latitude of 70 degrees, about three weeks after sir William Whetstone parted with them.

11. 'Complaint is also made, that the convoy was attacked the 10th of October last, which was conducting the ships with horses for the king of Portugal, and the trade to Lisbon.

'This convoy was her majesty's ships the Cumberland, Devonshire, Royal Oak, Ruby and Chester, which were two of 80 guns, one of 76, and two of 50 guns each, which were thought to be a sufficient convoy to Lisbon in the opinion of the merchants, till the misfortune happened by the accidental junction of two French squadrons: but on this occasion the queen's ships behaved themselves so well, that very few of the merchant ships were taken, and their lordships will find a particular account of this affair in the paper marked E.

12. 'The merchants also complain, that they waited long for convoys, and of the prejudice they received, when they returned from foreign parts, for want of convoys to the river Thames.

'This head being general, their lordships are desired to be referred to what hath been already said on this subject in the beginning of this paper.

13. 'They farther alledge, that they had orders in July 1704, to buy great quantities of corn for the king of Portugal's use, and that in July and August they did the same; but that notwithstanding the frequent applications, they could not obtain convoys till the 6th of February following.

'This seems to be somewhat extraordinary: for they say, their ships were ready to sail in July and August; whereas the latter of those two months, there were orders given to her majesty's ships the Pembroke, Canterbury, Greenwich and Gloucester, to convoy the trade to Lisbon; and on the 6th of September, sir William Whetstone was ordered, with the squadron under his command, to see them an 100 leagues South South West from Scilly, which he did; and why the ships that were ready in July and August (as is alledged) did not proceed with this convoy, their masters, or the owners of them, or both can give the best account: besides there were several ships of the States general, when called at Spithead in their way to Lisbon, and (as it had been concerted at the Hague) took our merchant ships under their convoy. And here it may be observed, that although it had been found impossible to furnish convoys for the trade to Portugal, at the immediate times the merchants have applied for the same: yet there hath been 29 convoys between England and that kingdom, from the month of April, 1703, to October last, and some of those convoys no less than great part of the fleet, and at other times considerable squadrons: and particularly in the year 1706, there were five convoys in one year, which makes it very improbable, that the king of Portugal's magazines and armies have been furnished with corn from the Baltic.

14. 'They farther complain, that the grand fleet sailed the 10th of August from Portsmouth, and did not take any merchant ships under their convoy.

'This was the year 1706, when the admiral of the fleet had instructions to proceed upon services, not fit to be made public, which did consequently render it impracticable for him to take merchant ships in his company.

15. 'Another Objection they make, that there was an embargo laid on their trade and convoys.

'It is presumed, that by the word Embargo, they mean, that there was some little stop put to their proceedings, until there could be a more certain account of the intelligence received, that there was a squadron of the enemy's ships in the Soundings, which proved afterwards (as they observed) to be Dutch home-ward-bound merchant ships from the West-Indies.

'It cannot be imagined, that this caution was designed for their prejudice, but rather entirely for their service, as well as for the safety of her majesty's ships; and as they own that the Norfolk, Warspight and Exeter did sail with their trade, so do they alledge, that the Nassau did not join them for want of necessary orders, for the fleet did not sail till three in the afternoon, and the Nassau came to Spithead before night; whereas, on the contrary, the Nassau passed through the Downs the 14th of October, 1706, and got as far westward as Folkston, but the wind coming to the south-west, and there being a likelihood of dirty weather, she bore up for the Downs the 16th, from whence she sailed the 18th at six at night, and arrived at Spithead the 20th, which was two days after the convoy sailed: and their lordships may please to take notice, that a Dutch convoy sailed the beginning of January, 1705-6, in company of her majesty's ships; that the 25th of February, capt. Price sailed with five ships of war; that the 27th of March following, sir George Byng sailed thither with a squadron; that the 18th of June, four other ships of war sailed thither; and that in July the merchants petitioned for a convoy to go in August, which was appointed; and the reason of their being stopped; and an account of the whole affair, their lordships will be informed of by the paper marked F.

16. 'They farther declare, that, by reason of the insufficiency of this convoy, several merchant ships were taken out of the fleet off of Portland, and that afterwards, meeting with bad weather in the Bay of Biscay, the Warspight and Exeter came back disabled, and that the trade, except some few ships, proceeded to Lisbon with the Norfolk only.

'The convoy appointed for the trade, were three ships, one of 80, one of 70, and one of 60 guns: and as this was thought a sufficient strength, so were there not at that time any more ships to reinforce them; nor could it be foreseen, that two of the ships would have been disabled in their passage, though accidents of that kind have, and frequently may happen.

17. 'Another subject of their complaint is, That great numbers of merchant ships were in Portsmouth harbour in the month of December, 1706, and detained there for want of Convoy to the Downs, till the 23d of April following; and this, notwithstanding several of her majesty's ships were at Spithead, which they have enumerated, and that others came from the west, and did not call for them; and they particularly mention the Suffolk and Bristol.

'All the ships which the merchants suppose lay idle at Portsmouth, during this time, were under orders for particular services, as their lordships may perceive by the paper marked G.

18. 'Another Complaint is made, That in the month of October, 1706, Mr. Coward and Mr. Jones let their ships to the commissioners for victualling, on condition that they should go directly to Jamaica; whereas they were carried from the Downs to Portsmouth, thence to Portsmouth, from that port to Ireland, and then to Barbadoes and Antigua.

'It is not doubted, but these ships were taken up by the commissioners for victualling, at so much a month freight; and her majesty finding it necessary for her service to send a governor to her Island of Barbadoes, and some forces which were to be embarked in Ireland with provisions, and other necessaries for the plantations of Nevis and Antigua, there was a necessity of these ships accompanying the convoy which was appointed for that service, in regard there was not any other which was got in readiness for them; and their owners will be paid for the time they have been employed in the service of the public, according to the agreement made with them.

19. 'Mr. Palmer deposes, That in the year 1705, a ship, of which he was part-owner, with several others, were convoyed from the Downs to Portsmouth by the Litchfield prize, but that, for want of orders, she could not see them to Plymouth, where they might have joined the fleet with sir Cloudesley Shovel, bound to Lisbon.

'Their lordships may perceive how much this person hath forgot himself, and imposed on them. For the Litchfield prize did not arrive with the trade at Spithead until the 7th of June; and sir Cloudesley Shovel sailed from thence the 23d of May, passed by Plymouth the 25th of the said month, and was off of Lisbon the 9th of June; so that the fleet was actually at Lisbon two days after the time that this gentleman says the Litchfield prize might have joined them at Plymouth.

20. 'As a farther evidence, the merchants have produced to their lordships' the Gazette of the 8th of May, 1707, wherein there is the following paragraph from Ostend, viz. "A fleet of merchant ships which lay 5 months in the Downs, consisting of 55 sail, arrived at Ostend this evening, to the great satisfaction of this place."

'This advertisement was very ignorantly and unadvisedly inserted in the Gazette, the fact itself being entirely wrong; For her majesty's ships, the Lyon and Deal-Castle, sailed to Ostend the 7th of February, and there were then no more than five merchant ships to accompany them; and sir Edward Whitaker, with his squadron, did the like the 17th of April following, and saw the trade into that port, and brought what was there from thence; but he carried with him not above 15 ships and vessels; and how that number could swell to 55 is somewhat strange; Besides, it doth not appear, that at any one time, from December to the month of May, there were more than five merchant ships in the Downs bound to Ostend, and above three fourths of that time not so much as one; and yet the advertisement in the Gazette says, That the 55 ships arrived at Ostend from the Downs, and that they had lain there five months for a convoy.

21. 'As to the general article relating to the untimely and unseasonable proceeding of convoys, especially to the West Indies, their lordships are desired to be referred to what hath been already said at the beginning of this paper, relating to that matter.

22. 'The Virginia merchants alledge, That in October, 1705, some of their ships sailed from hence, under convoy of the Woolwich and Advice, which were ordered to stay till reinforced from England; and that they were promised, the Greenwich and Hazardous should sail the first fair wind in January following; but that they did not sail till May, which occasioned their not reaching Virginia till August.

'The Greenwich and Hazardous were ordered for this service the 26th of February, 1705-6, but could not get clear from Plymouth till the 24th of April, and on the 27th they were forced by bad weather into Falmouth; but the Hazardous sailed soon after; for the Greenwich was disabled, and forced to come to Plymouth to refit: However, the said ship, Greenwich, sailed from Plymouth the 1st of June, and arriv'd at Virginia the 11th of August; and the 17th of September came from thence, with the Hazardous, Woolwich, and Advice, and 182 merchant ships, and arrived with them in the Channel in November following.

23. 'The said Virginia Merchants have farther represented, That, in hopes of convoys proceeding from hence to Virginia, the last Spring, many ships that carried stores from hence to Lisbon, and others from London, proceeded to Virginia, but remained there till September last, expecting convoy, and must now come home without, in the winter-season. And, although the last Spring her majesty, in council, ordered a convoy to be ready in August, yet the said convoy remains at Portsmouth.

'The delays and misfortunes which have happened this year to the Virginia traders, are, in a great measure, to be attributed to the different interests and opinions of the merchants and planters concerned in that trade, to the frequent westerly winds, which have hindered their departure, and to the delays occasioned by several merchants letting their ships to the Portugal convoy, for transporting horses to Lisbon; which will be more particularly explained to their lordships by the paper marked H.

24. 'They farther declare, That, for some years past, there hath not been a frigate appointed to take care of the Virginia coast; for want of which, many ships have been taken going in, and coming out.

'The men of war which convoy the Virginia ships have usually orders to cruise between the capes, while the trade is loading: the Strombolo had those particular orders; and the Gosport, which was taken in her passage, (and which may occasion this complaint) had the same; and the Garland is now upon that service; and the ships going to Virginia have the same directions.

25. 'Complaint is made by Mr. John Wood, of the difficulties he met with in September, 1706, and some time after, in getting a ship of his, called, the Union frigate, to Portsmouth.

'This ship took in her loading of corn at Shoreham, one of the most difficult ports along the coast to get out from: But when the ships of war are ordered, either eastward from Portsmouth, or westward from the Downs, they have always directions to call at the several ports in their way; and several have been unsuccessfully appointed, to get the ships and vessels out of this harbour.

26. 'The said Wood does also affirm, That in the months of April, May, and June last, he had several ships freighted with corn at Shoreham, which could not proceed to Spithead, by reason of the enemy's privateers: that at last there was a convoy appointed, but soon after ran away, and left the ships, upon a report that the Dunkirk squadron was upon the coast.

'The convoy here meant, was the Charles galley and Gosport, though several others were before appointed to get those vessels out of the harbour, however, the aforesaid two ships did do it about the 19th of June, 1707, and being on their way towards Spithead, they received an express from the mayor of Hastings, with an account, that there were 18 sail of French men of war coming from the eastward, with all the sail they could make; which advice, although it proved false, was not safely to be neglected: but so far were her majesty's ships from running from the trade, upon this intelligence, (as is falsely and maliciously insinuated) that they kept them company, and brought them safe to Spithead, as the captain of the Charles galley gave an account, in his letter of the 20th of June, 1707; and those ships which occasioned the alarm, were her majesty's ships the Defiance and Advice, with their convoys, from the Downs.

27. 'Mr. Winter deposes, That he came from Gibraltar the 14th of March last, in company of the Pearl, Hanover and Lodington galleys; and off of Beachey-Head, two of them were taken by French privateers.

'These ships were all runners, (or, at least, called so) and had they put into Portsmouth, until an opportunity of convoy had presented, the person who complains of these losses, would not have run the hazard he did. Nor, can it be thought, that these ships, which the merchants call galleys, can, when they are laden and foul, sail much better than other ships, not under that denomination; and therefore are consequently as much subject to misfortunes, by going without convoy; and, it is, very reasonable to believe, that till this trading by galleys or runners grew so much in fashion the losses were much less; and so, it is to be hoped, will be again, when the merchants will learn to alter their way of trading, as the enemy hath altered their method of carrying on the war by sea.

'The remaining part of their lordships' Report, relates chiefly to (viz.) 1. Our merchant ships being chased off of Beachey, and the parts thereabouts, by the enemy's privateers. 2. The advantages to the Mediterranean trade by carrying it on with galleys; but the hazards they run in their return home, for want of cruisers in the Soundings and Channel. 3. A French privateer's chasing a Dutch ship into Plymouth, on, or about the 14th of November last, whilst three Welch convoys rid fast for want of orders. 4. That the list of 1146 sail of merchants ships lost, was far short of the real number. 5. The inconveniences by impressing men in the West-Indies, and at their return. 6. The complaint of Mr. Benjamin Way, That the captain of the Northumberland did not take care of his ship, called the London galley, which sailed from Jamaica the latter end of February last.

'As to the 1st, 2nd, and 5th of these Articles, their lordships are desired to be referred to what hath been already said.

'Then, as to the third, which relates to the chasing of a Dutch dogger, it seems not all material, only to swell a complaint; but, as to what is insinuated, that the three men of war did not stir, for want of orders; it is well known, that when her majesty's ships get sight of an enemy, they stand in need of no particular orders to attack them: for their general instructions, annexed to their commissions, do sufficiently require that of them: but this happening at five a clock in the evening, in the month of November, it was impossible for any of the three ships aforementioned, to have come up with the privateer; and the Dutch ship was secure under the guns of the fortification.

‘The Lord High Admiral cannot, without great concern, take notice of the list of 1146 ships, said to be lost during this war: although it is possible great part of that number consists of galleys and runners: that some part of this loss may be attributed to the inevitable fate of war; and some hath arisen from the wilfulness or negligence of masters of merchants ships who, when sufficient convoys have been granted them, have deserted that protection, and exposed themselves a prey to the enemy, of which frequent complaints have been made.

‘Lastly, As to the sixth Article, which is the complaint of Mr. Way, That care was not taken of his ship from the West-Indies, their lordships are desired to be referred to the copies of two letters herewith transmitted to them, marked L. and K. the one from sir John Jennings, and the other from the captain of the Northumberland: the which give a particular account of that matter, which was not complained of at the Admiralty-Office, before it was brought to their lordships.

‘Thus much being said to the report of the Lords Committees, grounded upon the depositions of the merchants, which are partly what they say of their own knowledge, and the rest, what they have gathered from others; the Lord High-Admiral thinks it necessary to lay before their lordships some farther observations, under the following heads, to explain some papers which have been demanded by their lordships from the admiralty office.

1. ‘That notwithstanding almost the continual use of her majesty's ships, the loss sustained by storms, (particularly in the violent tempest in the year 1703,) and the many hazards they have been exposed to in this expensive war, the number of ships of the royal navy, is so far from being diminished since her majesty's accession to the throne, that it is increased by ten ships of war, although the parliament hath not in this reign, given one farthing of money for building of ships; and that the last war there was about four millions given for that, and other extraordinary services; and yet the royal navy was less in strength at the end thereof, than at the beginning, by twenty ships of the line of battle.

2. ‘That the number of ships of the navy of France, which have been taken or destroyed by her majesty's ships this war, does much exceed our losses, as will plainly appear by the two papers marked L. and M. wherein there is no mention made of the French ships, which have been taken or destroyed by the ships of the States-general.

3. ‘That during the present war, there hath been 175 of the enemy's privateers taken, and many of them of considerable force.

4. ‘That in the last war, which was declared the 7th of May, 1689, and ended the 10th of September, 1697, the whole number of the enemy's ships taken and condemned was 1296; whereas in the present war, which was declared the 4th of May, 1702, unto the first of December 1707, the number of ships taken from the enemy, and condemned, is 1346, which carries with it no little disproportion.

5. ‘That the re-captures by her majesty's ships of war, from the 4th of May, 1702, to the 1st of December 1707, are 128, which amounted by appraisement, to above the sum of 82,975*l.* and the re-captures by privateers within that time, 38,054*l.* both which sums amounts unto 121,050*l.* exclusive of customs.

6. ‘That in the last war, the trading part of the nation had the misfortune to lose near 4,000 ships; whereas in this war, themselves have given an account but of 1146, and it were to be wished, that even that loss could have been prevented. But here it may be observed, that, during the last war, we had the ports of Spain as well as those in the Spanish West-Indies, always open to secure our merchant ships and vessels, not only from the enemy, but from bad weather: Whereas, during the whole course of this war, our trade hath been entirely debarred from that so essential a countenance and protection.

7. ‘Besides, whilst her majesty has yearly fitted her royal navy for carrying on the war abroad, the enemy hath, ever since the battle off of Malaga, totally altered their methods of carrying on their naval war: And instead of sending forth great fleets, they fill the seas with privateers, and with squadrons of their nimble ships, and by that means watch all opportunities of seizing upon our trade, for which the situation of their ports gives them but too good opportunities; and yet our merchants (who cannot but be sensible of this danger) carry on their trade in a very great degree, in defenceless ships called runners; and they being obliged by charter-party to go without convoys, are thereby but too often exposed to the enemy, who lie in wait for them.

Lastly, ‘The Lord High Admiral desires their lordships to do him so much justice, as to believe, that no man is more sensibly affected than he is, with the great losses and misfortunes which have happened to the merchants; and he is so much the more sensible of them, because, in the way those gentlemen carry on their trades by single, defenceless ships, and by the method the enemy now takes, whilst the French king himself, and so great a part of his subjects, employ so many ships and men only to make war upon the merchants, such misfortunes will still happen; yet his royal highness does hope their lordships will believe, that the queen's fleet has not been useless and unemployed during this war; which cannot be carried on, agreeable to the declared sense of their lordships, but by supporting a superiority at sea, upon the coasts of Portugal, Spain, and Italy; in all which places the queen's fleet hath done great services the last four years, and attempted some things which might have secured Britain for one age, from all the naval power of France.

"The House took this Answer into their most serious consideration, and finding several facts stated therein very differently from what had been asserted by the merchants, upon their oaths, (who had therefore, according to the methods of justice, a right to be further heard by way of reply) and finding several other things alledged in the Answer, which at first light seemed to be plain mistakes, we thought it necessary, for our fuller information and satisfaction, to appoint a Committee to bear the merchants, and also to make such observations upon the Answer, as they should think proper.

"The Committee having perfected their Report, and laid it before the House, the same was agreed to, and we think ourselves obliged humbly to present this second Report to your majesty:

Second REPORT of the Lords Committees, 17 Feb. 1707-8.

"In relation to the first Head of the Answer, which is conceived in general terms, without being applied to any of the particulars in the merchants complaints, some things seem proper to be taken notice of.

1st. 'The Answer says, That all the instances mentioned in the Report, are in the latter years of her majesty's reign.

"The Lords Committees observe, That an Address of the House of Lords, presented to her majesty in the year 1704, did lay before her the heavy losses of the merchants, which had happened for want of cruisers and convoys for the home trade. Soon after the presenting of that Address, sir George Byng and sir John Jennings were sent out to cruise, and continued cruising till the October following, during which time the English ships were well protected, and many of the enemy's privateers taken; and the Lords hoped there would have been no farther occasion of complaints from the merchants: And all the losses contained in the Report, now before the House, have happened since that care was laid aside.

2dly. 'It does appear by the papers sent to the House from the Lord High-Admiral. That in the year 1706, the highest complement of the ships employed in the Mediterranean (supposing them manned to that complement) did not exceed 17,373 men; and in the year 1707, the highest complement of the ships employed there did amount only to 15,690 men. And therefore notwithstanding that part of the fleet which was made use of there, in both those years, yet about 22,000 men of the numbers provided for by parliament, remained for the necessary service of guarding and protecting the coast and trade; so that it seems not possible, that the keeping those squadrons in the Mediterranean, could be the occasion of the cruisers and convoys being so weak and few, and the coast so ill guarded.

Sdly. 'The strength of convoys is to be proportioned to the present circumstances of the enemy, as far as intelligence can be had, and the many instances mentioned by the merchants of convoys attacked to our disadvantages, shew by experience, that most of our convoys have been too weak.

"The second Head of the Answer is also general, but the Lords Committees observe, That the great ships are the strength of the line of battle, and if more first and second rates had been employed in the Mediterranean, instead of so many third and fourth rates, and smaller ships, a much greater number of ships proper for convoys and cruisers, for the protection of trade in the Channel and Soundings, would have remained free for those services; or if there was found to be a real want of such ships, timely and proper application might have been made to the parliament, who have ever been forward in providing for the security of trade. And, in the mean time, ships might have been hired, as has been often done, rather than the whole coast should continue in a manner besieged by the enemy's men of war and privateers, without interruption.

2. 'The want of seamen is too well known, which proceeds principally from the many hardships they suffer. The constant practice now in use in turning over, or removing them from ship to ship, is of all others the greatest discouragement, and though the paying them at the same time they are turned over, may have a fair appearance, yet that being generally done when they are abroad, it tempts the seamen to extravagant expences, and proves in conclusion the utter ruin of their families.

3. 'Many of the inconveniencies mentioned in this paragraph of the Answer, could hardly ever happen in case an early distribution was made of proper ships for convoys, and the time of their departure fixed; whereas very frequently ships are appointed when they are at sea, and it is unknown in what condition they will return. The merchants say, That this year one of the convoys named for the Jamaica trade, was at that time in the Sound.

'The Answer says, The queen's ships have as often stayed for the merchants, as they for their convoys; of which one instance is given in the paper marked A. The fact may be so sometimes; but the case mentioned in the paper is not of that sort; for there the merchants ships were lying in the Downs, together with the Assistance and Dunkirk prize, two of the ships of capt. Kerr's squadron, and were ready to sail, and did sail with them to Spithead, where the rest of the squadron lay. And, though it be asserted, that Mr. Kerr's ships were ready the 16th of February, at Spithead, yet it ap-years, that his instructions do not bear date till the 3d of March, 1706-7.

'As to the third Head, relating to the Want of Cruisers, the Lords Committees observed, That it is not the appointing cruisers yearly, which will protect trade, but the careful and strict observation, that the ships appointed for that purpose do cruise accordingly.

'Whereas it appears in the account of the disposition of the fleet, laid before the House of Lords, That no ship was cruising in the Soundings and Channel, in the months of June, July, August and September last, in which almost all the galleys and homeward-bound ships, whose loss was so heavily complained of by the merchants, were taken and destroyed :

'In relation to the arbitrary proceedings of the captains of the queen's ships of war, in impressing seamen out of the merchant ships in the West-Indies, as also upon their return to the ports of Great Britain, the fourth paragraph of the Answer says, if any such thing has been done, it is contrary to orders, and has never been complained of without a proper redress. Upon reading this passage, the Lords Committees summoned Mr. Coward (to whose complaint principally that part of the Answer related) who attending, and being examined as to the matter of fact, made oath, that he had often complained to the Prince's council of these great hardships, and begged relief from them, before he applied to the House of Lords ; that he could mention many other instances of the ill usages he had suffered in the same kind. That year after year, from the beginning of the war, not one of his ships had escaped, having men pressed out of them both at Jamaica, and upon their return (if there then was a press) except such as had run through all danger into the Downs and so got to London. In particular he swore, that he had complained to the Prince's council, of capt. Johnson's impressing his men out of the Somerset frigate, and capt. Roche's impressing his men out of the Waltheanston galley, as also of taking away his men out of the Gold frigate, and produced to the Prince's council the evidence he had of these several facts, but could not learn, that any of the captains were punished or censured or so much as once called to an account for their violences. He also swore, that all the captains he had employed to the West Indies have declared to him, that they who impressed his men at Jamaica, never shewed any authority or consent from the governor for so doing; and he affirmed, he was ready to produce many captains, who would swear the same thing. He said, if such orders are given as is asserted in the Answer, the Prince's council well know, by the frequent complaints of him and others, they are not observed either at Jamaica, or at home.

'In the sixth Paragraph of the Answer, which relates to the loss of the Lisbon fleet, under the convoy of the Swiftsure and Warspight, it is stated in this manner: 'This convoy had the misfortune to fall in with 17 ships of the enemy's which were going directly from Brest to the West Indies, and by the greatest chance imaginable met them in their passage.' And in the paper marked C. (to which the paragraph refers) after reciting an account given by the captain of the Swiftsure of this action, and that most of the merchant ships escaped, the paper C. proceeds thus: 'That as there was not any previous notice of this squadron of the enemy's ships, so if greater strength had been added to this convoy (which was not then to be had) it would have been but of little advantage against such a number of the enemy's ships.' This seems so strange a representation of this affair, that it is necessary to lay before the House, the true matter of the fact, as it appears upon a careful examination of it by the Lords Committees.

'First, As to the assertion: that there was no previous notice of this squadron of the enemy.

'The Lords Committees refer to the advices concerning the French shipping sent to the Admiralty from the secretary of state the last year, (which advices are now lying before the House) particularly to an extract of a letter from Mr. Secretary Harley's office, dated at Rotterdam the 7th of February, N. S. and sent to M. Burchett the 1st of February, O. S. giving an account of the squadron of ships then lying at Brest, and another from the earl of Sunderland's office, dated at Paris the 6th of February, N. S. and sent to Mr. Burchett the same 1st of February, O. S. As also to another letter from Brest of the 3d of February, N. S. sent from the earl of Sunderland's office, to the Admiralty the 14th of February, O. S. giving a particular account of the same squadron, and the strength of it, and that it was ready to sail, and to another dated at Brest of the 14th of February, N. S. sent from Mr. Secretary Harley to the Prince's council the 24th of Feb. O. S. to the same effect.

'Secondly, As to the assertion, that there was then no greater strength to be had, it is to be observed, that a Dutch fleet of nine men of war, under the command of admiral Vandergoes, had laid for some time at Portsmouth, and sailed from thence the very same day that captain Griffiths, who commanded this convoy, sailed in the Swiftsure from the same place.

'If orders had been given to captain Griffiths to have kept company with the Dutch squadron, there had been a sufficient strength to have saved all the ships under his convoy. But it appeared, by the examination of Mr. Jacob Hauckell, Mr. William Wood, captain Francis Cook, and captain Edward Smith, two masters of the merchant ships which went under his convoy, and also by a letter of captain John Hunt, another master, dated from Dinant, where he was then a prisoner, that captain Griffiths was guilty of divers most unaccountable delays off of Plymouth, and thereby lost the advantage of keeping the Dutch fleet company.

'On the 23rd of February, captain Griffiths made a signal of seeing seven ships, and after wards seeing seventeen; but, instead of making the best of his way from them, he lay by with an easy sail (not suffering any of the merchants to go a-head of him) till those ships came within gun-shot, (although he could not but discern them not to be English ships long before, and if they had been English, he had no occasion to speak with them.) When those ships were come so near, they put out French colours; and thereupon the two men of war, the Swiftsure and Warspight, made all the sail away possibly they could, leaving the merchant ships, and ships with provisions for Spain and Portugal, which captain Griffiths had under his care, to shift for themselves, and of 18 merchant ships that were in the company, 13 were taken, so that most of them did not escape, as is asserted in the Answer.

It was also proved, that these French ships were cruising, and not going directly to the West Indies, as the Answer asserts, and that they kept cruising all together about nine days after this action, and then sent their prizes with five of their men of war into Brest, and the rest of the men of war continued cruising about 14 days longer, and then they also returned to Brest.

It was farther proved, that the letter wrote from Dinant by captain John Hunt, complaining of captain Griffiths's behaviour, was by sir Edmund Harrison and Mr. Henckell laid before the Prince's council, who told them, they had been informed of the matter before, and were sending directions to Lisbon to have captain Griffiths tried; to which sir Edmund Harrison then objected, that such a trial must signify very little, since no evidence could be had against him at that place.

Notwithstanding, there was an order sent in April last, for trying captain Griffiths at Lisbon, at a court-martial. The Lords Committees having desired to know what was done upon that order, have been since informed by a paper dated from the Admiralty Office to this effect, that he was tried accordingly; and it is presumed he was acquitted, because he was continued in his command; But the result of the court martial is not sent to that Office; and he who acted as Judge Advocate at the trial is since drowned. The same paper goes on to say, that the trial was at the desire of the merchants, because there was no evidence against him at home. Whereas it is observed before, that sir Edmund Harrison told the Prince's council, there would be no evidence against him if he were tried at Lisbon.

The ninth paragraph of the Answer relates to the loss of the Hampton-Court and Grafton men of war, which, together with the Royal Oak, and the merchant ships under their convoy, sailed from the Downs the first of May last.

The Answer affirms, that, notwithstanding what Mr. Dawson swore before the Lords, that he was told at the Admiralty Office, the 29th of April last, that the Dunkirk squadron was gone westward; yet there was no notice at that time of the Dunkirk squadron, otherwise than that they were in the Flemish Road: Wherefore the three men of war, one of 76, and the other two each of 70 guns, were judged a sufficient convoy from the Downs to Spithead. Mr. Dawson being ordered to attend the Lords, and acquainted with what was charged upon him, did again affirm upon oath, that the governor and committee of the Muscovia company, of which he was one, attended the Prince's council on Tuesday the 29th of April last, to know what convoy was appointed for that trade; and, being told by the Prince's council, that one fourth and two fifth rates would be their convoy, the governor and committee represented their fears of danger from the Dunkirk squadron; but were then told from the board, they need be under no apprehension on that score, for the Dunkirk squadron was gone to the westward. He also mentioned many circumstances, which made him so very positive as to the time; and observed, that if the committee had been told at the board, that the Dunkirk squadron was then in the Flemish Road, it was so far from being an argument to persuade them to acquiesce with so small a convoy, that it must have increased their fears, that station being equally proper for the squadron to sail, either to the northward or westward.

Sir Benjamin Ayloff, governor of the Muscovia company, and five of the committee of the same company, viz. Mr. Raulolph Knipe, Mr. Henry Phill, Mr. Josiah Wadsworth, Mr. Thomas Stiles and Mr. Samuel Heathcote, did also severally depose, that they did attend the Prince's council the 29th day of April last, and then were told from the board, that the three ships designed for them were sufficient for their security, because the Dunkirk squadron was gone westward, and four of them, viz. Sir Benjamin Ayloff, Mr. Wadsworth, Mr. Styles, and Mr. Phill, swore, they believed admiral Churchill was the person that told them so, but, as to that particular, they were not so positive.

This matter of fact being directly proved by so many persons of unquestionable credit, the Lords Committees think, that, by the reasoning used in the Answer, the Prince's council could not judge the three men of war a sufficient convoy, and consequently ought to have suffered them to sail westward on the first of May; especially considering that from time to time notice had been sent to the Admiralty Office, from both the secretaries of state, of the strength of the Dunkirk squadron; and when it is so fully proved, that they owned, that they had notice that the squadron was gone westward.

The tenth Paragraph of the Answer relates to the complaint of the merchants, touching the Russia ships.

The instructions to sir William Wbextone, of the 10th of June last, take notice, that the Dunkirk squadron was gone northward, and that there was reason to believe they were designed for the coast of Norway; and that they would look out for, and endeavour to intercept the fleet bound to Russia for naval stores; which made it absolutely necessary, that the convoys to that trade should be strengthened; and he is thereby directed to proceed with all the merchant ships under his convoy, as far as the northernmost part of the Isle of Shetland, and there to leave them to prosecute their voyage with their proper convoy.

The Lords make this Observation, that after such intelligence, it appears very reasonable, that sir William Whetstone's orders should have been to see a fleet of such consequence out of danger, before he left them.

The Lords' Committees do think it necessary to inform the House, that captain Nenyon Masters, commander of the ship Nenyon and Benjamin, made oath, that on or about the 9th day of July last, his ship, together with about eleven or more English ships, were unfortunately taken in their voyage to Archangel, by the chevalier Fourbin's squadron, consisting of seven French ships of war: That his ship was the first taken, and he was immediately carried on board Monsieur Fourbin, who demanded of him what number of convoys the English fleet bound for Archangel had with them. He answered, Twelve sail: To which Fourbin replied, he spake what was false, for there were only three ships of war convoy to the English fleet; Fourbin then declaring, that he knew admiral Whetstone, with his squadron, came with the fleet no farther than the Isle of Shetland, and then returned back again.

As to the eleventh Head of the Answer, respecting the merchants complaint of the weakness of the convoy sent for conducting the king of Portugal's horses and the trade to Lisbon, the Lords Committees do only make this observation, that the fleet having lain at Spithead for many months, whereby the enemy had an opportunity of knowing the value and consequence of it, and notice being taken in the orders to captain Edwards, of the 7th of September, 1707, of a squadron of the enemy's ships cruising betwixt Scilly and Ushant, and notice being also taken in the orders of the 6th of October to sir John Leake, that Monsieur Fourbin was sailed from Brest with several ships, and was to be joined with others, it seems very unaccountable, that at last such a fleet should be suffered to sail without a greater strength.

The 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th paragraphs of the Answer, relating principally to the former deposition of Mr. Jacob Henckell, the Lords Committees ordered him to attend again; and he was further examined in relation to the facts mentioned in the Answer. He desired to observe, that the 13th paragraph made him say what was not in his deposition; for he did not say, the corn ships were ready to sail in July and August, but, that a great quantity of corn was bought in those months.

If any thing was concerted at the Hague, that the ships of the States-general should call at Spithead, to take our merchant ships under their convoy, it was strange no notice should be given of so good an agreement, that so the merchants might have disposed their affairs for taking the benefit of it, especially when he and other corn merchants very frequently applied to the Prince's council, to know when they might expect a convoy.

As to what is said of the great number of convoys which have gone between England and Portugal since April, 1703. Whereas the Dutch have seldom sent above one convoy in a year, and the inference made from thence, that therefore it is not probable the king of Portugal's magazines and armies should be furnished from Holland.

Mr. Henckell still affirmed the fact to be so as he had formerly sworn, and that, at the very time of his examination, the Portuguese have great quantities of corn shipped in Holland; and though the Dutch have not sent so many convoys as have gone from England, yet they go at certain and proper times, by reason whereof their corn arrives in a good condition; whereas the unaccountable delays and uncertainties of the English convoys have been the occasion of great losses to our merchants, and great disappointments to the Portuguese. He also took notice, that of the many convoys enumerated in the Answer, several of them were fleets or squadrons of men of war, of which the merchants had no notice, nor were allowed to have any benefit, as appeared by the 14th Head of the Answer, relating to the fleet that sailed with sir Cloudsley Shovel.

In the 14th Head of the Answer, much weight seems to be laid upon this, that the Nassau did not arrive at Spithead till the 20th of October, whereas Mr. Henckell, in his complaint, had sworn the Nassau came to Spithead the 18th at night, the same day the convoy sailed from thence. To clear himself, Mr. Henckell produced two original letters signed by Cornelius Collier, his captain, written from Portsmouth, the one dated the 19th of October, which says, the Nassau came too late for the convoy, but was at that time at Spithead; and the other dated the 25th, which says expressly, the Nassau came to St. Helens the same night the Lisbon fleet sailed. Mr. Henckell affirmed also, that he had other advices which fully verified what he had said in his former deposition, as to the Nassau's arriving the 18th at Spithead.

Mr. Henckell farther said, that the convoy mentioned in that paragraph of the Answer, consisting of four ships of war, which is there said to have sailed the 18th of June, does appear by the paper marked F. (to which the paragraph refers) to be a convoy that sailed from Portugal that day, and so does not contradict what the merchants had insisted on in their complaint, that there was no convoy for Portugal between March and October, a homeward-bound convoy being mistaken in the Answer for an outward bound convoy, and consequently it was no contradiction to what the merchants had affirmed: and though in the 16th paragraph of the Answer it be asserted, that the three ships appointed for convoy to the Portugal fleet, were at that time thought a sufficient convoy, Mr. Henckell swears, the Prince's council (by the reasoning of the merchants before them) was convinced of the contrary, at the time the convoy was sent, and did then pretend no other reason for their not strengthening it, but want of ships. And he desired to refer particularly to the remonstrance of the 10th of October last, which was delivered at that time by the merchants to the Prince's council, and is now lying before the House; whereby, in very strong terms, they represented their many solicitations without effect, the great delays they had met with, and their great sense of danger, if they should proceed without that convoy, as well as of their certain ruin by any farther delay.

'The 17th Head of the Answer says, that the ships which the merchants supposed lay idle at Portsmouth so long, were under orders for particular services, as appears by the papers marked G.

'Upon consideration of this paragraph, and of the paper marked G. to which it refers, the matters of fact, whereof the merchants did complain, seem, in effect, to be admitted to be true; and the services for which it is alleged the ships were designed, do not appear so pressing, but that some of them might have been employed to help the merchants in their great extremity.

'As to the 18th Head, which relates to Mr. Coward's complaint of the long detaining of his ships let to freight to the Commissioners of victualling; the Answer says, it is not doubted they were taken up at so much a month freight, and the owners will be paid for the time they have been employed, according to the agreement made with them. Mr. Coward deposed, that his ships were not taken by the month (as the Answer alleged) but the contract was at three pounds a tun, directly for Jamaica, which might have been performed in seven or eight weeks; whereas, by means of the deviations complained of, they have been detained ever since the 15th of November, 1706, and were yet in Iceland at the time of the complaint, whereby the ships are ruined, and he left at mercy, as to any satisfaction.

'The 19th Paragraph of the Answer takes notice, how far Mr. Palmer had forgot himself, and imposed upon the Lords in his deposition, for that the Litchfield prize did not arrive at Portsmouth till the 7th of June; whereas sir Cloudesly Shovel was off of Lisbon the 9th of June; and therefore it was not possible that the Litchfield prize should have joined him at Plymouth.

'Mr. Palmer being examined as to this particular, said, That in this complaint it was alleged, the Litchfield prize came to Spithead the 7th of July, not of June, as it is repeated in the Answer; but he owned his mistake in saying, if the Litchfield prize might have proceeded to Plymouth, the corn-ships might have joined sir Cloudesly Shovel's fleet; whereas he meant to have said, the transport-fleet, which at that time lay at Plymouth bound to Portugal.

'To shew that: it was a mere mistake, he produced to the Lords three original letters from Portsmouth, wrote by his master, Richard Riccard, dated the 7th, 12th, and 28th of July, which mention the transport-fleet, which had lain for a considerable while at Plymouth, and (as those letters say) sailed for Portugal about that time.

'The twentieth Paragraph, affirming that the Article in the Gazette of the 8th of May, 1707, which the merchants had produced, was very ignorantly and unadvisedly inserted, the fact being entirely wrong; the Lords Committees thought fit to be informed, how that passage came to be put into the Gazette; and upon examination it appeared, that Mr. Stepney the 12th of May, N. S. wrote a letter from Antwerp to the earl of Sunderland, at the solicitations of some considerable traders there, representing the hardships they lay under for want of a convoy from Ostend, (though it had been promised, and several times notified on the Exchange of London) to their great loss and discouragement, and what was like to have an ill influence on that trade, which was in a way of being better established than ever; and that, afterward, upon the arrival of that fleet at Ostend, Mr. Stepney wrote another letter to the earl of Sunderland, dated the 14th of May, N. S. the very words of which second letter are those transcribed into the Gazette.

'The Complaint of the Merchants, in relation to the Virginia trade, consisted of many particulars; none of which seem to the Lords Committees to be answered or excused, by what is alleged in the 22d, 23d, and 24th paragraphs of the Answer, nor by the paper marked H, to which the 23d paragraph does refer.

'The 25th and 26th Paragraphs of the Answer, which relate to the complaint of Mr. John Wood, of the difficulties and delays he met with in getting his vessels, laden with corn, to Portsmouth; containing nothing in particular, besides one matter of fact, viz. That the Charles galley and the Gosport, the two convoys for the corn-ships to Spithead, were so far from running from the trade (as was falsely and maliciously insinuated by Mr. Wood) that they kept the merchant ships company, and brought them safe to Spithead, as the captain of the Charles galley informed the Prince's council by letter.

'Mr. John Wood being sent for, and charged with this matter, produced two letters, which he made oath were sent to him from Portsmouth, by captain Edward Friend, the master of one of the corn-ships; the first dated the 21st, and the other the 22d of June last, wherein it is expressly affirmed, that, about eight o'clock in the evening, the commander of the convoy sent his boat aboard the merchants, to tell them the news, that the Dunkirk squadron was at sea, and at the same time to let them know that the convoy will take no farther care of them, but would make the best of their way to Portsmouth, and the merchants must shift for themselves.

'Captain John Falkner, the master of the Mary, another of the ships from Shoreham, made oath, that the commander of the convoy sent his boat aboard the merchants, to tell them, that he had advice of a French squadron, and that they must shift for themselves; for they would take no care of them, but would make the best of their way to Portsmouth, and be sworn the convoys were as good as their words, and made away with all the sail they could, and got in thither a considerable time before the merchants, who were in very great danger of being taken, having been chased at least eight hours by a French privateer. The same captain did, upon his oath, confirm what Mr. Wood had before alledged, that for full six months, while he lay at Shoreham, the French privateers did continually cruise on the coast in considerable numbers; but in all that time he could never see or be informed of any man of war cruising to prevent or intercept them.

'As to what is said in the Answer, that the men of war who sail eastward or westward, have always directions to call at several ports in the way; Mr. Wood added to what he had said before, that if they had such orders, it was strange not one of them should ever appear off of that harbour in six months time.

'The 27th Paragraph of the Answer relates to the merchants complaints of the many and great losses of ships off of Beachey, and upon the English coast in their return home.

'What this Paragraph says, is, that these ships were runners, and should have put into Portsmouth till they had an opportunity of convoy; but when the merchants shall leave off trading in these galleys or runners, (which are subject to many misfortunes by going without convoy) it is to be hoped their losses will be less.

'Their lordships cannot think it strange, if the merchants are very unwilling to put into Portsmouth, in hopes of convoy, after the instances given by them of their ships lying there for many months, in vain expectation of men of war to convoy them.

'As to the proposal for the merchants leaving off to trade in galleys, in expectation of convoys: the Lords Committees observe, the use of this kind of vessels was taken up during the late war, and has been continued ever since with very great success till within two years last, during which time there has been, in a manner, a total neglect of having any cruisers in the Channels or Soundings, or any men of war to guard the coasts.

'These ships are built for sailing, and also to row with oars, and carry no more goods than are proper for sailing, and carry twice the number of men to a common sailing ship, and are of force from 16 to 40 guns.—There is no convoy granted to any trade within the Straights but to Turkey only, which is never above once in the year, and must be acknowledged to be too seldom to answer the occasions of the traders to Leghorn, Genoa, Venice, and other places in those seas.—If therefore the use of galleys or single ships be laid down (for if any single ships be used in trading, it will be granted the galleys are better sailors, and have the advantage of any common built ships) and all the Mediterranean trade is to be carried on by convoys, that whole trade will be in a manner lost to England, especially in respect to fish, and other perishable commodities; and would be soon felt in a very heavy manner in all parts of the nation, the great consequence of that trade fully appearing by the merchants proofs set down in the report made upon their petition.—It is necessary for the safety and honour of the kingdom, and of all manner of trade whatsoever, that the Channel and Soundings be well guarded; and if this be done, the traders in galleys own they have no reason to complain.—The enemy have not altered their way of making war by sea: they always endeavoured to infest our trade by their privateers, to as great a degree as they could, but it must be owned, that of late they have had greater success than ever, and the great encouragement they met with, (the sea in effect being laid open to them) it is too probable will soon increase their numbers.

'The merchants do insist, that the List of 1146 ships, given in by them, does not contain all their losses during this war, but, in a manner, such only as have been taken in the Channels and Soundings, within two or three years last past, and principally such as do belong to the Port of London. They have already had an account of 34 ships taken in the Channels and Soundings, since they made their complaint to the House of Lords; of which ships they delivered a list to the Committee, and affirmed, that the loss of those ships, by a modest computation, amounted to above 17,000*l*. They affirmed, that besides those named in that list, several other rich ships are missing, and many of them, they fear, have met with the same fate, the Channel and Soundings being infested with the enemy's men of war and privateers, as much as ever. The neutral ships which come into the ports of Britain, declaring, that they have been boarded by them in those places several times in a day.

'The Answer (as to what concerns Mr. Benjamin Way) says expressly that matter was not complained of at the Admiralty office, before it was brought to the Lords.

'This seems very strange, for it appears plainly by the two letters marked J and K, referred to in the Answer itself and sent therewith to the Lords, that both of them were written upon occasion of a complaint made by Way to the Admiralty, and are only copies of the very same letters which were annexed to Way's complaint to the Lords, and were sent together with the Lords' Report to the Lord High Admiral.—This is what the Lords Committees have humbly to offer to your lordships, in relation to so much of the Answer as concerns the merchants complaints.—The remaining part of it seems entirely foreign to the subject of the report, containing only an unnecessary comparison of the management of the naval affairs in this and the late war; since any faults or errors which might have happened at that time, would not lessen the misfortunes of the merchants, or justify any wrong conduct at present. But the Lords Committees think themselves obliged to lay before your lordships, several very plain mistakes which they find in this part of the paper.

In the first Observation it is asserted, that the parliament has not in this reign given one farthing of money for the building of ships; and that in the last war there was about four millions given for that and other extraordinary services, and yet the royal navy was less in strength at the end thereof than at the beginning, by twenty ships of the line of battle.— This is so far from being a right state of the case, that in this observation there appears, at first sight, a mistake of no less than three millions in four, the whole sum given for building of ships in the last war not amounting to one million. This, in effect, was afterwards confessed in a second paper sent from the Admiralty-office, of the 28th of January, 1707, by way of explanation of a former Paper delivered to the Lords Committees from that office.

In this second Paper, notice is taken of the Numbers and Rates of ships provided for by parliament, and the days are set down when the money was voted for them, but the sums are omitted, which would have too plainly contradicted the assertion, that four millions were granted.

The true state of that matter will appear by the forementioned second paper, if the sums be added, as the same are set down in the first of those papers from the Admiralty-office, and is as follows. There was given for building ships, Memorandum, That the one-third Excise which was given for 570,000*l.* did produce but 842,617*l.* 11*s.* 2½*d.* of which there has been paid for building the 27 ships 458,591*l.* 19*s.* and to other uses 29,025*l.* 12*s.* 2½*d.*

These were all the sums granted by parliament for building ships during that whole war: the other sums set down in the first paper, which makes the whole amount to 4,579,571*l.* 4*s.* 2½*d.* were either for the ordinary and current service of the Navy, as seamen's wages, victualling, &c. or for such particular uses as had no relation to the building of ships, such as the payment of marine officers, register of seamen, &c.

The second Mistake in this Observation is, that the Royal Navy, instead of being less at the end of the late war by twenty ships, than it was at the beginning, was increased by 113 ships and vessels, of which 39 were of the line of battle, besides 21 ships which were building on the 30th of December, 1697, whereof 13 were of the line of battle.

And though in the same Observation it be alleged, that nothing has been given in this reign for building of ships, yet the provision for the navy in general, has been much larger in this war than in the last; for in this reign there has been granted for the use of the navy (including the ordnance for sea-service, and the sums voted for the service of the year 1708) the sum of 15,366,867*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.*

Whereas all the sums received by the treasurers of the navy, between the 5th of November, 1688, and the 30th of September, 1697, (including the money given for building ships) only amounted to the sum of 15,136,898*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.*

It may be also observed, that in the year 1698, there were 105 ships of the line of battle in thorough repair; whereas it appears that on the 6th of December, 1707, three first rates, eight second rates, six third rates, and two fourth rates wanted rebuilding or great repairs, which, considering the nature of the ships, makes a great part of the strength of the line of battle.

The second Observation takes notice, that the number of the ships of the navy of France, taken or destroyed by her majesty's ships this war, does much exceed our losses, as appears by the Papers marked L and M, where there is no mention of the French ships destroyed by the ships of the States-general.

The Lords Committees take notice, that by the paper L, it appears the greatest number of the enemies ships, and those of the greatest consequence, were taken or destroyed in the harbours of Vigo, Gibraltar, and Ostend; at the two first of which places the ships of the States-General assisted. And that during the war, only 25 ships of all sorts have been taken or destroyed by cruising ships at sea, and of that number only five ships from 30 to 60 guns. By the paper marked M, it appears that the number of her majesty's ships and vessels taken and destroyed by the enemies, during the present war, are 35, 13 whereof are ships of the line of battle, from 50 to 80 guns.—The sixth Observation is, that, in the last war, the trade of the nation had the misfortune to lose near 4,000 ships.—This appeared so very strange to the Lords Committees, that they sent to the Admiralty-office to be informed, if there were any lists of those ships, or what grounds they had for making that assertion.—The Answer sent in return to this message, was a printed paper, without any name of the author or printer, in which are these words: 'It is generally allowed, that the number of ships and vessels miscarried since the war, does not fall short of 4,000.—Upon consideration of this Paper, it appeared to be a libel, written as a pretended answer to an account published by authority in the year 1695, of what men of war and privateers had been taken from the French, from the beginning of that war; and, it contains in it not only scandalous reflections upon the parliaments of that reign, but notoriously false representations of matters of fact, which might have easily been known to be so at the Admiralty-office; and therefore it seems very strange, that such a libel should be offered as a proof to the Lords, in an answer which is supposed to come from that office.—But as an evidence that there can be no foundation of truth for this assertion, the Lords Committees offer to your lordships consideration, that the number of English prisoners, who have been returned from France, from the beginning of this war to December last, amounted to 18,011, and there then remained in France 2,000 more; whereas the number of English prisoners returned from France, from the beginning of the late war, until the 24th day of June, 1698, did amount to no more than 15,250. And it is not probable, that the ships taken in former wars should be so many more than those taken in the present (as is pretended) when the prisoners are so remarkably fewer.—To the latter part of this sixth Observation, That during the last war, we had the ports of Spain, as well as those in the Spanish West Indies, open to secure our ships, not only from the enemy, but from bad weather.—The Lords Committees say two things: 1. That till now, they never heard that the ports in the Spanish West Indies were at any time open to secure English men of war or merchant ships. 2. That the many great losses complained of by the merchants, appear to have been in the Channel and Soundings, and consequently the Spanish ports, though open, would have been no very essential countenance and protection to them.

“May it please your Majesty;

“We having thus performed what we take ourselves to be indispensibly obliged to, cannot doubt but it will be graciously accepted by your majesty, as coming from most dutiful subjects, who sincerely wish they may never have occasion hereafter of making Addresses to your majesty, but to congratulate your success, or to return our humble acknowledgements for the blessings of your reign. We beseech your majesty to believe, that none of your subjects do exceed us in true respect to his royal highness the Lord High Admiral: his great personal virtues require, and his near relation to your majesty makes it our duty: and as we do not mean that any thing in this Address should in the least reflect upon him, so we are very well assured, his Royal Highness will never suffer other persons to protect themselves under his name, from a just pursuit of such faults or neglects, as immediately tend to the ruin of trade, and the destruction of Britain. There cannot be a plainer proof, that some persons employed by the Lord High Admiral have made the worst use imaginable of the trust he honours them with, than in their presuming to lay such an Answer before the House of Lords in his name. For (not to take notice of the many things which in the Second Report have been already laid before your majesty) throughout the whole Paper, there is no hopes given, that for the future, any better care shall be taken of the trade; on the contrary, the whole turn of the Answer seems to be intended for exposing the complaints of the merchants, rather than pitying their losses. We are sure nothing can be more remote from the goodness and compassion of the Lord High Admiral's temper, and the tender regard he has always shewn for your majesty's subjects.

“May it please your majesty: It is a most undoubted maxim, that the honour, security and wealth of this kingdom does depend upon the protection and encouragement of trade, and the improving and right managing the naval strength. Other nations, who were formerly great and powerful at sea, have by negligence and misconduct lost their trade, and seen their maritime strength entirely ruined. Therefore we do in the most earnest manner beseech your majesty, that the sea affairs may always be your first and most peculiar care. We humbly hope that it shall be your majesty's chief and constant instruction to all, who shall have the honour to be employed in your councils, and in the administration of affairs, that they be continually intent and watchful in what concerns the trade and fleet; and that every one of them may be made to know it is his particular charge to take care that the seamen be encouraged, the trade protected, discipline restored, and a new spirit and vigour put into the whole administration of the navy.”

The Queen's Answer to the Lords' Address.]

Her majesty gave this Answer:

“My Lords; I will take care to make the most useful observations on the several particulars contained and referred to in your Address.—It was always my opinion, that the encouragement of trade and seamen, and the good management of the navy, are of the greatest importance to the prosperity of this kingdom.—And therefore you may be assured, I will use my utmost endeavours to encourage all those whose duty it is, effectually to perform those services.”*

* “On the 11th of February there happened an important change in the administration in England, for Mr. Henry Boyle, uncle to the earl of Burlington, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, was made secretary of state, in the room of Mr. Harley. Probably the affair of Gregg, Valiere, and Bara, which in some measure affected Mr. Harley's credit, made him more earnest to bring about a change in the conduct of affairs, in which he relied on the credit of the new favourite, Mrs. Masham. The duke of Marlborough, and the Lord-Treasurer, having discovered many of his practices, laid them before the queen, who would believe nothing, that was suggested to his prejudice. Her majesty denied, that she had given any authority for carrying messages to the Tories; but would not believe, that he or his friends had done it, nor would she enter into any examination of his ill-conduct, and was uneasy, when she heard it spoke of. These Lords wrote therefore to the queen, that they could serve her no longer, if he was continued in that post; and, on the Sunday following, when they were summoned to a cabinet council, they both went to the queen and told her, that they must quit her service, since they saw, she was resolved not to part with Mr. Harley. Her majesty seemed not much concerned at lord Godolphin's offering to lay down; and it was believed to be a part of Mr. Harley's new scheme to remove him; but she was much touched with the duke of Marlborough's offering to quit, and studied, with some soft expressions, to divert him from that resolution: But he was firm, and did not yield to them. Upon this they both went away, to the wonder of the whole court. Immediately after, the queen went to the cabinet council; and Mr. Harley opened some matters relating to foreign affairs. The whole board was very uneasy; the duke of Somerset said, That he did not see how they could deliberate on such matters, since the general was not with them. He repeated this with some vehemence, while all the rest looked on so cold and sullen, that the cabinet council was soon at an end; and the queen saw, that the rest of her ministers, and the chief officers, were resolved to withdraw from her service, if she did not recal the two, who had left it. It was said, that she would have put all to the hazard, if Mr. Harley himself had not apprehended his danger, and resolved to lay down. The queen sent the next day for the duke of Marlborough, and, after some expostulations, she told him, that Mr. Harley should immediately leave his post, which he did within two days. But the queen seemed to carry a deep resentment of his and the lord Godolphin's behaviour on this occasion; and, though they went on with her business, they found they had not her confidence. The duchess of Marlborough, for some weeks, abstained from going to court; but afterwards, that breach was made up in appearance, though it was little more than an appearance. Both Houses of parliament expressed a great concern at this rupture in the court, and apprehended the ill effects, which it might have. The Commons let the bill of Supply lie on the table, though it was ordered for that day. Upon Mr. Harley's removal, sir Simon Harcourt the attorney-general, sir Thomas Mansell comptroller of the household, and Mr. St. John secretary at war, laid down likewise their posts." Tindal from Burnet.

The duchess of Marlborough, in the Account of her Conduct, p. 252, &c. speaks of this affair in the following terms: "The duke of Marlborough and lord Godolphin had often told the queen in the most respectful manner, that it was impossible for them to do her any service, while Mr. Harley was in her confidence. Her majesty nevertheless seemed determined not to part with him, till at length those two lords, being urged by necessity to it, declared their resolution to serve no longer with him; and they absented themselves from the council. Mr. Harley would have proceeded to business without them, when the council met, but the duke of Somerset said, he did not see how it could be to any purpose, when neither the general nor the treasurer was present; whereupon the council immediately broke up. This had such an effect upon the queen, that, very soon after, Mr. Harley was dismissed from his post. Such a compliance with the ministers seemed to the eye of the world a very great concession, but was in truth nothing. For it was evident by what followed, that this appearance of giving up Mr. Harley was with his own consent, and by his own advice, who, as long as Mrs. Masham continued in favour, would, under pretence of visiting her, who was his cousin, have all the opportunities he could wish for, of practising upon the passions and credulity of the queen; and the method of corresponding with him had been settled some time before.—I was fully apprized of all this, continues the duchess; yet I resolved to try, if by being easy and quiet I could regain any influence with her majesty. She had given me some encouragement to hope it. For when, a little before Mr. Harley's dismissal, lord Marlborough resolved to quit the service; and when, on that occasion, I had with tears (which a tender concern at the thought of parting from her majesty made me shed) represented to her, that, if the duke retired, it would be improper and even impossible for me to stay at court after him; she declared, that she could not bear the thought of my leaving her; and that it must never be. And at that time she made me a promise, that if ever I should leave her (which, she again said, must never be) she would bestow my offices among my children. Nay, the Whigs had some reason to flatter themselves about this time, that her majesty would become better disposed to them, than she had hitherto been. The pretender's attempt to land in Scotland, which happened about this time, gave her an alarm, that seemed to bring a conjunction along with it, that the Whigs were the most to be depended upon for the support of her government; at least what she said, in answer to the Lords' Address upon the occasion, had this appearance. But as the danger presently blew over, and as her fears ceased with the cause of them, so all the hope, which the Whigs had raised in themselves from those fears, presently vanished."

mons took into consideration the queen's Answer to their Address of the 5th of February *

* "During the session of parliament, on the 18th of February, died a very eminent member of it, Sir Edward Seymour, at his seat at Maiden Bradley in Wiltshire. Nobility of descent, eminency of parts, great popularity, and a leading influence in the House of Commons, were the distinguishing circumstances of his life. Whether they were attended with real virtue and merit, cannot be deemed an improper inquiry; since without these outward appearances are insignificant and offensive. In the reign of king Charles 2, he laboured with uncommon diligence to promote the measures of the court, for the destruction of civil and religious liberty; and was neither afraid nor ashamed of any sort of management. His contemptuous and brutal behaviour towards the House of Commons, while he was in the chair, was astonishing and scarce credible. He acted there as the marshal of the court, and, agreeably to his instructions from thence, allowed the House a long or short day for business. He seemed to affect to be remembered by a series of words and actions, full of indignity and insolence; nor did he escape the public reproaches of many members for the licentiousness of his morals, which they declared to be a disgrace to the station, which he bore in their House. In order to bring him under proper discipline and correction, the next House of Commons chose him their Speaker: but his royal master, to preserve him from disgrace and vexation, refused his approbation in an unusual manner. His concurrence in the Revolution, and directing the Association, are to be ascribed to a resentment of what he esteemed ill usage under king James. To the establishment, ease, and success of king William's government, no one ever gave stronger proofs of an utter aversion. When that king had full evidence of his treasonable practices, such was his majesty's generous regard to his first appearances, that he gave him his choice of taking a place or his trial. Though he had often professed a contempt for the master and the service, prudence and guilt disposed him to a place. His conduct in this situation was a very ungrateful return for the favour, which he had received. In pursuance of his counsels early and seasonable remedies were neglected; every thing was to wait the attention of parliament. Thus the coin was reduced to a ruinous state, which proved the occasion of infinite mischief to affairs both at home and abroad. Whilst he declaimed against and prosecuted real or imaginary corruptions in others, he was a constant and notable practitioner this way. Rival companies and rival projectors successfully employed the sure method of procuring his protection. Foreign powers were very sensible of the certain way of assuring to themselves so significant and daring an advocate. Much of this kind was suspected, and many things well known; yet with an amazing sufficiency he continued to support his authority and influence. The regards of his

and the question being put, "That the deficiency of the British troops in Spain and Portugal, at the time of the battle of Almazra, had been chiefly occasioned by the want of timely and effectual recruits being sent thither;" It passed in the negative; and, on the contrary, an Address was voted, and presented to the queen by the whole House, "returning her the thanks of the House, for her taking measures to restore the affairs in Spain, and for providing foreign troops for that service." To which the queen replied, "That she had always looked upon the war of Spain to be of so great importance to us, that she could never fail of continuing her utmost application to support it in the most effectual manner; and that the satisfaction they had expressed, in their Address, for her endeavours in this matter was extremely acceptable to her." The service in Spain was much decried, and there was good reason for it: Things there could not be furnished but at expensive rates, and the soldiers were generally ill used in their quarters, and were treated very unkindly, not by king Charles, but by those about him, and by the bigotted Spaniards.

Proceedings in relation to Scotland.] Feb. 27. This day there was a great debate in the grand committee of the House of Lords, occasioned by a bill passed by the Commons, for rendering the Union of the two kingdoms more entire, and compleat; whereby, in the first party were secured by his unwearied sincere hatred of king William. In this reign, he, who in a former had betrayed and trampled on the privileges of a House of Commons, commenced the patron and enlarger of its rights.

"His highest pretensions to public spirit and public virtue were owing to opposite motives: His zeal in the impeachment of the earl of Clarendon, was not the effect of offences suggested in the Articles, but flowed from a desire of recommending himself to a corrupt court. Malevolence had been long working there on the account of that Earl's having joined with the earl of Southampton, in preventing profuse and destructive settlements of parliament. The prosecution of lord Somers arose from that lord's ability and fidelity in the service of his prince and the public; for neither sir Edward's obligation nor inclination would have urged him to pursue a real enemy of France. After he had been the terror of his enemies, and lived amongst his friends with a haughty superiority, a mean wretch hurried him out of the world, its most imperious disturber. When infirmities had confined him to his chair, his house was deserted by the servants on the account of some new diversions; and, in the mean time, an old female beggar of the maddish tribe happened to wander into the apartments, Finding the great man thus alone, she reproached him for all his cruelty and oppressions, threatened, terrified, and handled him in a manner, the effects of which soon put an end to a life, through the whole course of which he seemed equally insensible of crimes and punishments." Tindal.

place, it was enacted, "That, from the 1st of May, 1708, there should be but one privy-council in the kingdom of Great Britain." All the Court was against this bill. Those, who governed Scotland, desired to keep up their authority there, with the advantage they made by it; and they gave the ministers of England great assurances, that by their influence elections might be so managed, as to serve all the ends of the court; but they said, that without due care, these might be carried so, as to run all the contrary way. This was the secret motive; yet this could not be owned in a public assembly; and therefore that, which was pretended, was, that many great families in Scotland, with the greatest part of the Highlanders, were so ill-affected, that, without a watchful eye, ever intent upon them, they could not be kept quiet. It lay at too great a distance from London, to be governed by orders sent from thence. To this it was answered, that by the circuits of the justiciary courts, and by justices of peace, that country might be well governed, notwithstanding its distance, as Wales and Cornwall were. The bill had been carried in the House of Commons by a great majority, that there should be only one privy council for the whole island. But, in the House of Lords, it met with a considerable opposition. The court stood alone; all the Tories, and the much greater part of the Whigs, were for the bill. The court, seeing the party for the bill so strong, were willing to compound the matter; and whereas, by the bill, the council of Scotland was not to sit after the 1st of May, the Court moved to have it continued to the 1st of Oct. It was visible, that this was proposed only in order to the managing elections for the next parliament; for which reason the Lords adhered to the day prefixed in the bill. But a new debate arose about the power given by the bill to justices of peace, which seemed to be an encroachment on the jurisdiction of the Lords regalties, and of the hereditary Sheriffs and Stewards, who had the right of trying criminals, in the first instance, for fourteen days time; yet it was ordinary, in the cases of great crimes and riots, for the privy council to take immediate cognizance of them, without any regard to the fourteen days: So that by this act the justices of peace were only impowered to do that, which the privy council usually did; and, except the occasion was so great, as to demand a quick dispatch, it was not to be doubted, but that the justices of peace would have great regard to all private rights. Yet, since this had the appearance of breaking in upon private rights, this was much insisted on by those, who hoped, by laying aside these powers given to the justices of peace, to have gained the main point of keeping up a privy council in Scotland. For all the Scots ministers said, that the country would be in great danger, if there were not a supreme government still kept up in it. But it seemed an absurd thing, that there should be a different administration, where there was but one legislature. While Scotland had an entire legislature within itself, the nation assembled in parliament could procure the correction of errors in the administration; whereas now, that it was not a tenth part of the legislative body, if it was still to be kept under a different administration, that nation could not have strength enough to procure a redress of its grievances in parliament; by which means they might come to be subdued and governed as a province. And the arbitrary way, in which the council of Scotland had proceeded ever since king James the first's time, but more particularly since the Restoration, was fresh in memory, and had been no small motive to induce the best men of that nation to promote the Union, that they might be delivered from the tyranny of the council; and their hopes would be still disappointed, if they were still kept under that yoke. This point was in conclusion yielded, and the bill passed by a majority of 50 Lords against 45, though to the great discontent of the Court. There was a new court of Exchequer created in Scotland, according to the frame of that Court in England. Special acts were made for the elections and returns of the representatives in both Houses of parliament; and such was the disposition of the English to oblige them, and the behaviour of the Scots was so discreet, that every thing, that was proposed for the good of their country, was agreed to: Both Whigs and Tories vied with one another, who should shew most care and concern for the welfare of that part of Great Britain.*

Discoveries of a Correspondence with France. About this time two discoveries were made, very unlucky for Mr. Harley. Marshal Tallard wrote often to Mons. Chamillard, but he sent his letters open to the secretary's office, to be perused and sealed up, and so to be conveyed by the way of Holland. These were opened upon some suspicion in Holland; and it appeared, that one, in the secretary's office, put letters in them, in which, as he offered his service to the courts of France and St. Germain, so he gave an account of all transactions here. In one of these he sent a copy of the letter, which the queen was to write, in her own hand, to the emperor; and he marked what parts of the letter were drawn by the Secretary, and what additions were made to it by the lord Treasurer. This was the letter, by which the queen pressed the sending prince Eugene into Spain; and this, if not intercepted, would have been at Versailles many days before it could reach Vienna. He, who sent this, wrote, that by this they might see what service he could do them, if well encouraged. All this was sent over to the Duke of Marlborough; and upon search it was found to be writ by Mr. William Gregg, whom Mr. Harley had not only entertained as a clerk in his office, but likewise taken into a particular confidence, without inquiry into the former parts of his life; for he was a vicious and necessitous person.

He had been secretary to Mr. Gregg, when resident from king William to the court of Denmark, and afterwards to Mr. Vernon, envoy to the same court, by whom he was dismissed, for his ill conduct. Mr. Harley had made use of him to get intelligence in Scotland in 1705, and came to trust him with the perusal and sealing up of the letters, which the French prisoners, here in England, sent over to France, and by that means he got into the method of sending intelligence. He, when seized on, either upon remorse, or the hopes of pardon, confessed all, and signed his confession, upon which he was tried at the sessions in the Old-Bailey, where an indictment of high-treason was read against him, importing, "That he had sent letters to Mous. Chamillard, one of the French king's prime ministers, particularly one, dated the 28th of November last; and others, wherein were inclosed the proceedings of both Houses of parliament, in relation to the augmentation of our forces; a copy of a letter from the queen to the emperor; private business sent the duke of Savoy, &c." To which indictment, Gregg having pleaded guilty, the Lord Chief Justice Holt, and most of the judges being present, the recorder pronounced sentence of death against him, as in cases of high-treason.

At the same time John Bara and Alexander Valiere, alias John Clarke, were also committed to Newgate for corresponding with the enemy; and Mr. Claude Baud, a native of Piedmont, and secretary to count Briançon, envoy extraordinary from the duke of Savoy, was apprehended, at the request of that minister, by warrant from the earl of Sunderland, for traitorous practices against her majesty and government; but the same night, as the two messengers, who had him in custody, were carrying him to Newgate, he made his escape from them. But being followed by the queen's proclamation, wherein a reward of 200*l.* was promised for discovering and securing him, he was, within two hours after, betrayed by a French taylor, in whose house he had taken sanctuary, and put under the custody of a messenger. Valiere and Bara, who had been both employed by Mr. Harley as his spies, to go often over to Calais, under pretence of bringing him intelligence, were informed against as spies employed by France to get intelligence from England. They carried over many letters to Calais and Boulogne; and, as was believed, gave such information of our trade and convoys, that by their means, the nation sustained such great losses at sea. They were often complained of upon suspicion, but were always protected by Mr. Harley; yet the presumptions against them were so violent, that they were at last seized on, and brought up prisoners.

A Committee of seven Lords were appointed to examine Mr. Gregg, and the aforesaid persons.

These Examinations lasted for some weeks; and, when they were ended, a full Report was made of them to the House of Lords, who ordered the whole Report, with all the Examinations, to be laid before the queen in an Address: which was accordingly done.

The Lords' Address relating to Gregg, and Clerk, alias Valiere.] March 18. The duke of Bolton reported from the Lords Committees, appointed to draw an Address, to be presented to her majesty, upon the Reports relating to William Gregg and Alexander Clerk, alias Valiere, and the Resolutions thereupon, and debate of the House, "That they had accordingly drawn an Address." Which, being read by the clerk, was agreed to by the House, and is as follows:

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and obedient subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, having been informed, that William Gregg, a Clerk in the office of the late Secretary Mr. Harley, had been indicted for High Treason, in holding correspondence with your majesty's enemies, and betraying to them secrets of the highest importance; and that, upon his trial, he had confessed the indictment, and by that means had prevented the Examination, whereby the public might have been truly informed of the particular nature and circumstances of his crime: We thought ourselves indispensibly obliged, in duty to your majesty, and for the future safety of the kingdom, to do all that was in our power, to find out the rise and progress of this dangerous Correspondence.— In order thereto, we made our humble Address to your majesty, for all papers relating to the charge against William Gregg. And your majesty having been graciously pleased to give orders, that the papers should be laid before us; we referred those papers to a Committee, and directed them to examine Gregg, and report the said Examination to the House; as also what they observed upon the papers, together with such other matters as they should think proper, upon their inquiry into the said affair. And the Report having been made, and taken into consideration by the House; we humbly conceive it to be very highly for your service, to lay the same before your majesty:"

REPORT CONCERNING GREGG'S EXAMINATION.

The House having appointed a Committee, to examine William Gregg, who is a prisoner in Newgate, convicted for high-treason; and having also been pleased to refer to the same Committee several Papers, which, upon the humble Address of the House, had been laid before your lordships by her Majesty's command; do humbly take leave to inform the House, that the effect of the several Papers, referred to the Committee, is as follows:

1st. "A copy of Gregg's Letter, which was intercepted, dated the 28th of Nov. 1707, O. S. sent to M. Chamillard, enclosed in a packet from marshal Tallard, directed to Mr. Robineau, his steward, at Paris.—In this Gregg sends to M. Chamillard a copy of the queen's Letter, written with her own hand, to the Emperor.—In the same letter, Gregg takes notice of two letters sent by him to M. Chamillard, the one dated the 24th, the other the 28th Oct. last, which he understood Robineau had put into his hands.—That, perceiving by Robineau's letter to his master, that M. Chamillard desired to know the Mareschal's sentiments of Gregg, Gregg had himself written to him.—In expectation of his answer, Gregg flattered himself, that the paper then sent was of that importance, that there could be no longer doubt of the devotedness of a Scottishman for France, not to speak of his zeal for the service of his prince, who had found refuge there.—That the lines under which he had drawn a stroke, were the thoughts of the Lord Treasurer, which he had added with his own hand to the first draught of the letter.—The same letter contained some other news.

2. "There was a copy of a Letter, dated the 25th Nov., O. S. in the same packet, subscribed William Gregg, in which notice is taken of what Robineau writes to Mr. Tallard concerning him; and that he himself had written to the Mareschal, and desired Robineau to deliver the enclosed according to the address, as being of great consequence.

3. "That the copy of a Letter from Mareschal Tallard, to Robineau, dated the 10th Dec. N. S. in which Mr. Tallard says, 'That as to the letters of which Robineau made mention in his of the 25th and 28th of November,' That he had delivered them according to the address; M. Tallard knew nothing of their contents, but by the same post which brought his letters.—That he was obliged for the offers, but could make no use of them while he was a prisoner; when the peace was made, he would give proof of his acknowledgment to him who made the offers, and would endeavour to engage the person, to whom the letters were addressed, to do the same. In the interim, Robineau was to tell the person, to whom he delivered the letters, for whom the Mareschal had the utmost consideration, "That he was much obliged to him for desiring to know his thoughts before he would determine what to do; that the offers made did not suit with the present time, at least as to him, &c."

4. "An original letter, of the 2d Dec. 1707, to Mr. Robineau from Gregg, to felicitate him for being delivered from an importunate man, as would appear by Mareschal Tallard's letter, unless his last to M. Chamillard had not made him determine otherwise.

5. "Copy of another letter of Gregg to M. Chamillard, dated the 23d Dec. O. S. which was also taken in Mareschal Tallard's packet, in which he pretends to give M. Chamillard an account of what passed in parliament, with the queen's Answer to the Address of the two Houses, and his excuse for not sending the Address itself.

6. "A letter of Robineau to Tallard, 26th Dec., N. S. from Paris (transcribed by Gregg in his own hand,) in which he says, 'He was going to Versailles, to deliver the answer with which he was charged. That he received, every post, Letters from the same person; and that he took care to deliver them according to the Address.'

7. "Another of the 30th Dec. 1707, N. S. 'That he had been to deliver, as M. Tallard had charged him, the answer which was desired of M. Tallard.'

8. "Another in Gregg's hand, dated the 30th Dec. 1706, found in Gregg's closet, written to Chamillard, giving an account of the intention to send Mr. Palmes to Savoy, and to take several other German courts in his way.'

9. "A confession of Gregg, delivered to the Lords of the Committee, and signed by him.

"On Thursday the 12th of this instant Feb. the Committee, appointed by your lordships, went to Newgate, in order to examine William Gregg.

"They acquainted him with your lordships order; and told him, 'That as the crime, of which he stood attainted, was of the most heinous nature; so there were some circumstances so extraordinary, which attended his case, that the House of Lords thought it might be of service to her majesty and the kingdom, to have all the beginning and progress of his treasonable Correspondence fully laid open; that her majesty, upon the application of the House, had ordered all former examinations and papers concerning him to be laid before them.—They told him further, 'That, if he, by a true, ingenuous, and full confession, would deserve it, he might have ground to hope the House of Lords would intercede in his behalf, for mercy from her majesty; which otherwise he had no reason to look for.—He was also told, 'That, being a man of understanding, he was not to expect to be asked questions; but was to give an account of himself, when and how he became first employed; when, and by what instigation, he was drawn in to correspond with the queen's enemies; and how far it proceeded.'

"He said, 'That one Mr. Gregg, the late king's resident at Copenhagen, was his kinsman, and sent for him thither; and he continued with him about three years, till his death, which happened about two months before the late king died. That Mr. Vernon was sent envoy to Denmark; and took him, whom he found there, into his service, in which he continued about two years and a half, and then he was discharged from his service by Mr. Vernon. Mr. Vernon coming for England about his private affairs, while Gregg was in his service, and staying here some time; in that interval Gregg received some letters from Mr. Secretary Harley, which gave him occasion after to apply to him.—The 9th of Dec. 1704, Gregg came to England, and soon made application to Mr. Secretary Harley for employment; but was not recommended to him by any body. The 3d of Jan. he saw him first at his office, where he attended often. The 5th of Feb. 1704-5, Mr. Jones, the Secretary's first clerk, came to him, and told him, 'The Secretary would speak with him.' He attended on the Secretary the same day, who asked him, 'If he would be willing to be employed in his own country?' Gregg said, 'He was willing to be sent upon any good errand.' Mr. Secretary told him, 'It was to give an account of the proceedings of the ensuing parliament, which was to be held under the duke of Argyle.' The 6th of Feb. he went to the office; and Mr. Secretary told him, 'He should be dispatched in a few days.' To make some trial of him (as he supposed), Mr. Secretary asked him, 'If he could give an account of the court of Denmark.' Gregg said, 'He was willing to do it as well as he could;' and accordingly, in some time, he drew up a state of that court; and it was not disapproved. He attended daily; and on the 20th of April Mr. Secretary Harley gave him a note of 20*l.* to be paid by his steward in Scotland yard. On the 23d of May, 1705, he was ordered to go for Scotland, and about a week after set forward on his journey; when he was dispatched, a note of 30*l.* was given to him. Mr. Secretary always amused him, with telling him he should have instructions for his directions in Scotland; but at last ordered him to draw up some queries himself, about the state of affairs in Scotland; which he did, and they were approved. Some of the queries were, 'What were the designs of the several parties? What correspondence between the Highlands and St. Germans? How affected to the house of Hanover? &c.' He was also ordered to form a cypher of letters, whereby to design the great men there. The 2d of June, 1705, he arrived at Edinburgh; and wrote to Mr. Secretary the Thursday following, being ordered to direct all his letters, 'To Thomas Bateman, in Scotland Yard.' Mr. Secretary promised, the receipt of his letters should be acknowledged; and he pressed often for it, to know they came to hand, fearing his letters were intercepted, because he was suspected as a spy in that country. But, though he wrote thrice a week, he never heard one word from Mr. Secretary, or by his order during his whole stay in that country.

"Being asked by the Lords, 'If he was recommended to any body in Scotland?' He answered, No. The 15th of Oct. he arrived at London, and the next day waited on Mr. Secretary; who thanked him for his letters, and told him, 'He had named him to the queen, upon occasion of a paper he had sent.' But Gregg said, 'He believed the queen had never heard of his name, till this last unhappy accident.' On the 29th of Oct. Mr. Secretary ordered him 25*l.* He attended daily, and pressed much to be sent abroad, particularly to go with Mr. Methuen when he was sent to Savoy; but it was declined. On the new year's day, Mr. Secretary dropt a word, which startled him much; he told him, 'he would fix him;' which Gregg understood was bringing him into his office. Upon this, he presented a petition, 'That he might not be in the office, because the salary was small; and, being in debt, he could not live on it.' He attended every day. The Secretary inquired of him, 'What he knew of languages?' he said, 'He knew some French and German, but knew Latin better than either.'

"The 16th of April, 1706, he was admitted into the office; and a note was given upon Mr. Jones, as for one of the clerks; and Mr. Secretary told him, 'It was only to keep his hand in use, and that he would provide better for him.' The 16th of May, copying a letter sent to Mr. Vernon, 'That he was to consider of somebody fit to be left behind;' Gregg thought it to be intended in his favour; and wrote to Mr. Vernon on that occasion, desiring his countenance. But, the 23th of May, Mr. Secretary writing word to Mr. Vernon, 'That he had leave to come at his own time, but must leave somebody behind;' and this being wrote before any answer could come from thence, Gregg saw nothing was meant for him in the former letter.

"Gregg made offers of service to Mr. Pulteney; when he was to go; but he said, 'he was provided.' Then he told Mr. Secretary, 'His mind was depressed by his debts, and desired to be thrown abroad, and to go with sir Philip Meadows;' but that was refused, and Strahan was sent. Then Mr. Secretary asked, 'What would make him easy?' And he gave in a list of his debts, amounting to about 35*l.* Since that, Mr. Secretary has ordered him, at several times, about 20 or 25*l.* in the whole; the last sum was 7*l.* in October last, part of a bill of 14*l.* for which debt he was pressed at that time.

"Being asked by the Lords, 'If his debts only made him so desirous to be gone?' He said, 'At the rate the business was managed in the office, it was a perfect drudgery. Their business seldom began till about 11 or 12 at night; and they stayed till 2 or 3, or later, though sometimes not above two letters to dispatch; and he thought himself happiest, who could get away soonest. The method was, first, the letters were taken in short-hand, afterwards wrote fair, then sent to Mr. Secretary's house to be signed, and after returned to the office to be entered; so that they were obliged sometimes to stay till 4 o'clock in the morning.' He said, 'That in April last, when Hill the messenger was sent to Turin, the packet was left to him, though the youngest clerk, to be made up and delivered to the messenger. In that packet there was a letter to sir John Norris, and another to Mr. Chetwind; most of the last letter was, in cypher; Gregg entered both those letters. There was also another letter to sir Cloudesly Shoveff, and letters from the Lord Treasurer. He put them all up in the packet, and after gave them to Hill.'

"Being asked, 'If he knew by the letters what the design was?' Gregg said, 'He understood Toulon was to be besieged; he could not read the whole, but knew enough to find out that.' He said 'It was wrote in the cypher of the other office by Mr. Harley, the earl of Sunderland being sick at that time. The queen's letters de cachet are made up before they are brought to the office; but the clerks are trusted to make up other letters.'

"The Lords Committees required him to give the whole relation of his Correspondence, when it began, and how long it had been carried on.

"Gregg said, 'The first motive of his writing to France was, in order to get money, by obtaining a pass; and that his first letter was the 24th of October last. From his first entering into the office, he had always a great hand in perusing the French prisoners letters; that convenient opportunity and his poverty gave him the temptation. The French prisoners letters came under a general cover, directed to Mr. Lewis; Mareschal Tallard's letters are under a flying seal, the rest of them came always sealed, but are opened at the office. Generally Mr. Lewis threw them down on the table, and left the perusing them to the clerks, to Mr. Mann and Gregg; and since Mr. Mann left the office, they have been trusted wholly to Gregg. If Gregg observed any thing that he thought material, he made an extract of it, and shewed it to the Secretary, or Under Secretary; he mentioned a particular extract he had made out of a letter of M. Chamillard's to Mareschal Tallard.—Letters came from Nottingham every post; sometimes 20 letters came to them in a day from France, those came always sealed. From the time he came into office, these letters were never perused either by the Secretary or Under Secretary, which he is sure of, because they were sealed when he looked on them; he cannot for that reason say but Mr. Lewis might sometimes look in Mareschal Tallard's letter, because that had a flying seal; but the rest were left sealed as they came by Mr. Lewis to the clerk's perusal.' Gregg said, 'He had a dispute with Mr. Lewis upon the account of these letters: Gregg declaring he thought it not to be a business fit for the under clerks to be trusted with.'
