CORDAY, Charlotte (1768–1793). French assassin. Name variations: Marie-Anne-Charlotte de Corday d'Armont. Born Marie-Anne-Charlotte de Corday d'Armont at Champeaux in the Calvados of Normandy, France, July 27, 1768; executed in Paris, July 17, 1793; dau. of Jacques-François de Corday (minor aristocrat) and a mother who died in childbirth when Charlotte was quite young; never married; no children. ❖ Norman whose passion for justice so far exceeded the capacity or will of the Revolution to separate justice from politics that she individually indicted, judged, and executed the radical journalist Jean Paul Marat, by murdering him in his bath; inspired by the eruption of French Revolution (1789), came to sympathize with the faction known as the Girondins, the moderate republicans of her time; upon the fall of that faction from power in Paris (spring 1793) and the arrival of several Girondin leaders in Caen, sensed a major part for herself in the Revolution; traveled to Paris (July 1793) and murdered Jean Paul

Marat, radical editor of Ami du Peuple, whom she blamed for the Girondins' fate. She also sought the inevitable martyrdom that must follow upon her act. In her death, she would do for France what she could not do, as a woman, in the political assemblies in Paris. She would, by her sacrifice and by her example, turn her nation away from the murderous, divisive, and populist policies of the Jacobin regime and lead it back to moderate, rational, constitutional government by those of talent and position. Ironically, her violent act only intensified the terroristic policies of the Parisian regime and precluded any peaceful, legislative resolution of the political crisis of the time. ❖ See also Marie Cher, Charlotte Corday and Certain Men of the Revolutionary Torment (Appleton, 1929); and Women in World History.

DIOTIMA OF MANTINEA (fl. 400s BCE). Greek priestess, philosopher, and teacher of Socrates. Fl. 400s BCE ❖ In the Symposium, written some time after 389 BCE, Plato puts forth his views of his contemporaries, then uses the character of Socrates (whose own views may have differed) to present a philosophy of love. Plato's Socrates credits Diotima, a priestess of Mantinea, for inspiring his theory. She is said to have argued that the goal of love is immortality, “to give birth in beauty,” either through the creation of children or beautiful things. From this, western culture has derived the concept of “Platonic love,” an affection that is not based in bodily pleasure. ❖ See also Women in World History.
