INTRODUCTION

The idea for Dictionary of Women Worldwide (DWW) began while we were editing the 17-volume set of reference books entitled Women in World History (WIWH). While frequently turning to dictionaries for help, we were startled by the paucity of women included. In one oft-used biographical dictionary under 5% were women. Other biographical dictionaries had the same or less. It soon became clear that as long as women's entries had to compete with each other for the small percentage of pages set aside for them in traditional dictionaries, these sources were nearly useless to readers looking for a more balanced view of history.

And did those women included in conventional biographical dictionaries get short shrift? Let us approximate the ways. In one recent edition, Abigail Adams was allotted around 25 words, Rosa Bonheur, Empress Theodora, Hypatia, Charlotte Corday, Aspasia, Berthe Morisot, Anna Comnena, between 30 and 40, Mary Cassatt, Dorothea Dix and Anne Boleyn, around 50, Teresa of Avila, 75, and Rosa Luxemburg, 80. As for the men: Halsford Mackinder was allotted around 80 words, Charles Parry, Vincas Kreve and August Kotzebue, over 100, Gebhard Blucher, over 200, Charles I, over 400, Oliver Cromwell, over 600, and Napoleon, over 900. Richard Milhous Nixon, well over 400, was a great deal longer than Indira Gandhi, around 100, Empress Maria Theresa, around 125, Catherine II the Great, around 150, Queen Victoria, around 250, and Elizabeth I, 350.

Dictionary of Women Worldwide is a single source for researching women of any time period and any field of endeavor. It can answer a question quickly, saving users an afternoon slog on the Internet. Since the advent of the Web, conventional wisdom would have us believe that the women in DWW can be found quickly and easily in cyberspace. Would that were true; it would certainly have made our job easier. To make the most of the Internet, name variations, correct spellings, dates and personal information are vital. Being multilingual also helps. As well, the Internet has a kind of now-you-see-it-now-you-don't quality. Sites that were there yesterday, loaded with information, vanish like vapor. (Remember those in-depth personal accounts of athletes for the Sydney Olympics? Gone now.) "The average lifespan of a Web page today is 100 days," noted Brewster Kahle of the Internet Archive in San Francisco in 2003. Our goal was to produce a work that would allow the user to verify facts, answer ready reference questions, and begin to research a woman in less time than it takes to log on.

Because of the subject matter, the entries for DWW had to be longer than those found in a standard dictionary. For women, the personal is indeed the political. Who the king married is not traditionally required; who the queen married is. In an entry for Eleanor Dulles, listing her brother is essential. In an entry for John Foster Dulles, listing his sister is annoyingly optional. Names of husbands are also important; these are names that the women often went by in public and private life (e.g., Mrs. John Drew). More often than not, after time-consuming sleuthing, we only found a death date for an entrant after uncovering one or all of her married names. We also came across numerous duplicate entries in other biographical dictionaries, women who were listed under two different names, because without personal information it was impossible to see the duplication.

Realizing the influence that such name variations have had in fracturing women's historical identities was one of the greatest lessons we learned while editing Women in World History. The genealogical charts we produced for that work are also included in this volume for reasons best explained in the following excerpt from the introduction of WIWH. The excerpt addresses two of the most difficult challenges involved in an undertaking like Dictionary of Women Worldwide: sorting out and cross-referencing the myriad names given to historical women and naming the nameless.

Throughout the ages, fathers and sons have been scrupulously documented in historical records; for mothers and daughters, birth and death dates are often unknown and approximated. Many cultures do not even count daughters as children. The king's daughter was often treated with the same indifference as the daughter of a tavern owner. But, like certain Soviet leaders who made an art form of airbrushing discredited colleagues from the photographic record, history has occasionally left in a hand or an elbow by mistake. We encountered one historic tome that solemnly noted: "Ariadne was a 5th-century Byzantine empress and daughter of the childless Leo I." Leo had no sons. Records of Eliza Lynch, a major figure in the cultural and political development of Paraguay, scrupulously list her children with dictator Francisco Solano López: "Jan (b. 1855); Enrique (b. 1858); Federico (b. 1860); Carlos (b. 1861); Leopoldo (b. 1862); Miguel (b. 1866); and three daughters, names unknown."

For expediency, historians have eliminated what they perceive to be the secondary storyline. When a woman is known to exist historically, she has often been the casualty of streamlining. The secret to good writing is brevity. "The Holy Roman emperor Otto I arranged a marriage for his son Otto II to a Byzantine empress" is much more readable than "Empress Adelaide of Burgundy and Holy Roman emperor Otto I arranged a marriage for their son Otto II to Theophano, a Byzantine empress."

In the world's text, women have been relegated to common nouns (the queen, the princess, the sister of Charles IV, the duchess of Carlisle) and possessive pronouns ("and his daughter," "and his mother," "and his wife"). In many accounts that chronicle the early years of the 20th century, this phrase appears: "The 1914 assassination of Archduke Franz Ferdinand and his wife led directly to World War I." (Worse, in most reports Archduchess Sophie Chotek's death goes unmentioned; Franz Ferdinand dies alone.) Michael Collins storms the barricade during the Easter rising, and Michael Collins is named; Constance Markievicz and Winifred Carney storm the same barricade, and they are referred to as "two women activists." The often-used phrase "Einstein and his wife" (he had two) evokes an image of a disheveled genius and a drab, faceless woman when, in fact, Mileva Einstein-Maric did the computations for his theory of relativity.

We were determined not to leave a mother, wife, duchess or daughter unturned. Take Ingeborg. Our morning would start simply enough; then we would read: "After his marriage at Amiens, on August 14, 1193, Philip II Augustus, king of France, took a sudden aversion to his 18-year-old Danish bride and sought a divorce." Well, there it was. Obviously, by her marriage to Philip II Augustus, the Danish bride was a queen of France, but who was she? From one source, we learned that she was on good terms with the ensuing French kings; from another, that she lived peacefully, gaining a reputation for kindness. From a third, that she died highly esteemed but, as in the previous sources, nameless, either in 1237 or 1238. Within an hour, we had her name: Ingeborg. By mid-morning, we learned that Ingeborg was the daughter of Waldemar I the Great, king of Denmark. No mother mentioned. Now we had a nameless Danish queen, and a barely named French one.

To give complete and accurate information on Ingeborg, we needed her mother, but while pouring through Palle Lauring's A History of Denmark, we read in passing that Philip Augustus "had threatened to cast off his first wife." Another ball in the air. Now we had a nameless Danish queen, one barely named daughter, and an unnamed first wife. By noon, we had uncovered Isabella, first wife of Philip and daughter of Baldwin V, count of Hainault. No mother mentioned. Unfortunately, we had also uncovered a third wife, known only as the mother of Philip Hurepel. Now we had the aforementioned twosome, a newly named first wife, and an unknown third. By mid-afternoon, we gleaned that the mother of Philip Hurepel was named Agnes; she was also the mother of the nonessential Marie. By late afternoon, we had a headache. The results of our day's exploration can be found under the names Agnes of Meran (d. 1201), Ingeborg (c. 1176-1237/38), Isabella of Hainault (1170-1190), and Marie of France (1198-c. 1223). As far as we were able to ascertain, Ingeborg's mother was either Sophie of Russia or Richezza of Poland. No one knows for sure. These were not idle chases. Often the woman off-handedly referred to as the "queen-regent" or "queen mother" turned out to be someone of major import, like Catherine de Medici or Eleanor of Aquitaine. A towering stack of books would eventually straighten out these problems, but the quantity needed will not be found in a small library collection.

The majority of the time, when we did find the woman for whom we were looking, she didn't have one name; she had five or six. Unlike most men whose various names have been sifted down over time to one or two, Holy Roman Empress Agnes of Poitou strolls through the history books as Agnes of Aquitaine, Agnes of Guienne, Agnes of Bavaria, or Agnes of Germany. The dowager empress of China, in her various transliterations, is known as Cixi or Tz'u-hsi, Tse-Hi, Tsu-Hsi, Tze Hsi, Tzu Hsi, Tsze Hsi An, Yehonala, Xiaoqin Xian Huanghou, Xi Taihou, Nala Taihou, Lao Fuoye, or Imperial Concubine Yi. Running down these names easily added years to the project, but we had no choice. Otherwise, the same woman would be scattered throughout our series as Yolande of Brienne on page 29, Jolanta on page 403, and Isabella II of Jerusalem on page 1602.

Name changes that accompany marriage added to the difficulty. Women from outside Russia took on Russian names when they married tsars; one minute they're Sophia Augusta Frederika, princess of Anhalt-Zerbst, the next minute they're Catherine II the Great. East Germany's Christa Rothenburger won the Olympic gold medal in speedskating in 1984. In 1992, she won the silver medal as Christa Luding. In some books, Alice Guy Blache can be found under B; in others, Alice Guy-Blache is found under G. Then there's the longtime bugbear: Mrs. John D. Rockefeller. Which one? Mrs. John D. the 1st, the 3rd, or junior? So often, the dreaded, "the philanthropist, Mrs. Reid," stopped us cold. Is that Mrs. Ogden Mills Reid or Mrs. Whitelaw Reid?

We were not alone in our exasperation. "How are you listing Etta Palm?," queried one of our French historians about an assignment: "As Palm, Etta Aelders? Palm Aelders, Etta? or Palm d'Aelders, Etta? My best sources call her Etta Palm d'Aelders, but I'll put her under Palm because she's more widely known to English audiences as Etta Palm. Whew! You'd think there would be more uniformity in these matters."

Researching the lives of Roman women in Republican times was also daunting. Free Roman men had three or four names: the praenomen or given name, the nomen or family name, and sometimes the cognomen or distinguishing name: thus, Gaius Julius Caesar. The women, however, were given only one name, the feminine form of the family name. That is why the daughters of Julius Caesar and his sister are all named Julia. Only Julia. Historians have taken to qualifiers like Julia Minor and Julia Major, but it has not solved the problem. Five of the Julias can be found in Women in World History [and Dictionary of Women Worldwide], as well as all eight Cleopatras (Cleopatra VII is the famous one), five Arsinoes, seven sisters Bonaparte, seven Beatrice d'Estes, numerous Euphrosynes, Eurydices, Eudocias, Theopanos, Theodoras, Zoes, Faustinas, and Flavia, many Sforzas and Viscontis, and all 35 women named Medici.

Eventually, we picked up speed. With the material we had accumulated, we could begin to answer our own questions more readily and find the women more quickly. Out of necessity, we were using Women in World History as a primary reference source, long before it was completed.

We were also using our charts. Women are rarely included on existing genealogies. A Chinese journalist recalled being handed a copy of her family tree which stretched back 3,000 years. "Not one woman was included on the tree," she noted, "not a mother, a sister, a daughter, a wife." For expediency, women have been left off charts which, while following the male line, are difficult enough to read without adding a cadre of women. When women do appear because of their regal status, usually only their sons are noted on the ancestral line below. In one case, a son was included who had died at age six, while his surviving sister, who had become queen of a neighboring country, was missing.

Determined to come up with an easy-to-use cast list, we set about giving one name to each woman on the world stage as she made her entrances and exits throughout the series. In order to do this, we needed to make our own charts, settle on a name for the subject, and add dates if known. Without identifying dates, five Margarets of Austria all look alike. Thought was given to imposing a rational system on the names, but problems outweighed the advantages. One commonly used data base made a stab at it by changing all Catherine to Katherine. Thus, they had Katherine the Great. Whenever possible, we have tried to use the name by which the subject has been most clearly identified in historical contexts. In so doing, the inconsistencies arise. A Spanish historian might call a queen Isabella; an English historian might call the same queen Elizabeth; a French and German historian, Elisabeth; a Russian historian, Elizaveta.

If the women were difficult for us to locate without knowing the exact name used, we knew the task would be even more difficult for our readers. For this reason, we offer many avenues to find the women sought: by the charts, by indexing, by cross-referencing of collective name variants (Rejcka. Variant of Ryksa.), by cross-referencing of name variations within the entries (Gonzaga, Eleanor [1534-1594]). See Eleanor of Austria.), and by cross-referencing of titles (Pembroke, countess of. See Clifford Anne [1590-1676].).

We began to rely so heavily on our genealogical charts—all 85 of them—that we decided to put them in the front of Volume I [in both WTWH and DWW], alphabetized by country. If a woman is bolded on the chart, she appears in her own entry under the name given. Sometimes her sketch will just be personal data, but as Rutger's Kay Vandergrift notes: "The first step for those who are the 'others' in traditional history is to prove their very existence."

We envisioned a series heavily focused on international women, many of whom were enormously important, even revered in their own countries, though seldom known in the United States. Most books in the U.S. cover only American women; by so doing, they isolate women's accomplishments to the last 200 years and neglect about 3,000 years of women's history. An international emphasis, however, did not prove easy. Since much of the information and many of the primary sources we needed for our research were not available in English, we asked professors to undertake translations. More than 300 contributors, from over 20 nations, participated in the WTWH project [and their contributions are reflected in DWW].

Readers will inevitably find omissions and inequities in length. We invite suggestions for inclusion in every area from our readers. We have also spent years checking our facts. Nonetheless, because women have been ignored historically, the record is replete with inaccuracies which have been given widespread circulation. Thus, there will be errors in these volumes. We welcome suggestions and corrections.

GENEALOGICAL CHARTS

Designed to show the relation of ancestors to descendants, the following genealogical charts are family trees that begin with the original rulers on the highest branch. From this extends a lower branch that shows their children and those whom their children married (when known). The next branch shows their children's children and corresponding spouses (when known), and so on.

Charts are grouped alphabetically by country, and headings for each country are located at the top of every chart. Each chart displays a House Title, which identifies the name of the ruling house.

The following symbols and abbreviations are used:

- | indicates the descent of children
- ══ indicates marriage, liaison, or other intimate relationship
- ∴ indicates illegitimate descent of children
- m. indicates marriage
- (1) indicates first wife or husband
- (2) indicates second wife or husband
- (3) indicates third wife or husband (etc.)
- (illeg.) illegitimate

Women whose names appear in bold on the charts have entries in the Dictionary of Women Worldwide as well as Women in World History series.

In April 1204, when Crusaders and Venetians attacked the imperial palace in Constantinople, thousands were killed and the emperor, Alexius V, fled. The conquerors crowned a Latin emperor, Baldwin of Flanders. Shortly after, a young Byzantine noble, Theodore Lascaris, organized a government-in-exile 40 miles away across the Straits of Nicaea. These Nicaean emperors—Theodore and his successors—are considered by some to have continued the Byzantine line.

Empresses & Emperors of the Imperial House of Japan

According to Japanese tradition, the imperial house of Japan has ruled without interruption from Jimmu to Akibito. Legend depicts Jimmu as a descendant of the sun goddess Amaterasu, and each succeeding empress or emperor has been given the title of tenno (heavenly ruler). Modern historians generally agree that the forced abdication of Empress Kogyoku in 645 is a trustworthy starting point for more reliable sources of Japanese history.

ARNAULD, Angélique (1624–1684). French abbess. Name variations: Angélique de Saint-Jean Arnauld D'Andilly, Mère Angélique de Saint-Jean. Born Angélique Arnauld in 1624; died Jan 29, 1684; niece of Jacqueline Marie Arnauld (Mère Angélique) and Jeanne Catherine Arnauld (Mère Agnès); one of ten children of their eldest brother Robert Arnauld (successful lawyer who later became a hermit at Port Royal) and Catherine de la Boderie (who died when Angélique was only 13). ❖ Known as Mère Angélique de Saint-Jean, spent her life as a nun during a period which saw the height of Port Royal's power and influence and lasted into the days of its persecution and decline, keeping a faithful record of all that she experienced, including the period of her imprisonment for resisting royal authority; was present at the deaths of both her abbess aunts and recorded both in moving descriptions, together with insightful summaries of their characters; is known as the historian of Port Royal for composing the 3-volume account Memoires pour Servir a l'Histoire de Port Royal as well as the Portrait de la Mère Catherine Agnès; more intellectually gifted than either of her abbess aunts, worked with Agnès to compose the order's Constitutions and, in Port Royal's time of greatest trial, worked with Agnès to produce the Advice given to the nuns of Port Royal on their conduct (la conduit qu'elles devraient garder) in case of a change in the government of the house; twice elected abbess of Port Royal. ❖ See also Women in World History.

ARNAULD, Jacqueline Marie (1591–1661). French abbess. Name variations: Angélique-Marie de Sainte-Magdeleine Arnauld, Mère Angélique, Mère Marie Angélique. Born Jacqueline Marie Arnauld, Sept 8, 1591; died Aug 6, 1661; 2nd of 6 daughters of Antoine Arnauld (lawyer) and Catherine Marion Arnauld (d. 1641; dau. of Simon Marion, avocat general at Parlement of Paris). ❖ Abbess of Port Royal des Champs, known as Mère Angélique, who believed she was attempting nothing more than to follow the original monastic rule as strictly as possible, when her convent provoked the suspicions of the king and was subject to intense persecution; appointed abbess of Port Royal des Champs at age 8 (1599) and ordained a nun the following year (1600); intent upon returning the convent to the strict rule of St. Benedict, imposed sharing of all property, frequent prayer, and long periods of complete silence upon the community; her mother and all her sisters, as well as many male relatives, would eventually seek the religious life at Port Royal, which became an influential center of spirituality and education; her convent began to incur the suspicion of royal authorities because of its apparent sympathies with the reformist ideas of Cornelius Jansen (1638). An important place of refuge during the civil wars (1648–49, 1652), Port Royal came under increasing scrutiny, its schools were closed, and many of its supporters were in hiding when she died (1661). ❖ See also Women in World History.

ARNAULD, Jeanne Catherine (1593–1671). French abbess. Name variations: Jeanne Catherine de Sainte Agnès Arnauld, Agnès de Saint-Paul Arnauld, Mère Agnès, Mère Catherine Agnès de Saint Paul. Born in Macedonia c. 345 BCE; died c. 275 BCE; probably dau. of Lagus (Macedonian aristocrat) and Antigone (niece of Antipater, who was well-connected in Macedonian circles); m. a Macedonian named Philip (widowed); m. half-brother Ptolemy I Soter (d. 283); children: (1st m.) Magas (eventually king of Cyrene) and several daughters, including Antigone (who m. Pyrrhus, king of Epirus) and Theoxena (who m. Agathocles, tyrant of Syracuse); (2nd m.) Arsinoe II Philadelphus (c. 316–270 BCE); Ptolemy II Philadelphus (r. 285–247 BCE). ❖ Widowed after 1st marriage, attached herself to entourage of 2nd cousin, Eurydice (fl. 321 BCE) when that heiress married Ptolemy I (c. 322); not long after, was favored by Ptolemy, so much so that he took her as a 2nd wife and began to favor her children over those he fathered with Eurydice; her children from both marriages would rule as kings, queens and the consorts of tyrants for various lengths of time in Cyrene, Epirus, Macedonia, Thrace, Anatolia, Sicily and Egypt; her son Ptolemy II eventually succeeded his father to the throne of Egypt over the claims of the older Ptolemy Ceraunus, Ptolemy I's son by Eurydice; loved and greatly honored by her husband in life, her stature was in no way diminished in death, for Ptolemy II instituted a cult which worshipped both her and Ptolemy I as "savior gods"; associated with the persona of the goddess Aphrodite, her divine status thereafter religiously helped to legitimize the Ptolemaic dynasty in the eyes its subjects. ❖ See also Women in World History.

BERENICE II OF CYRENE (c. 273–221 BCE). Queen of Egypt. Name variations: Berenice of Cyrene. Pronunciation: Ber-e-NEE-kay. Born c. 273 BCE; died c. 221 BCE; dau. of Magas, ruler of Cyrene (and stepson of Ptolemy I of Egypt) and Apama (dau. of the Seleucid king Antiochus I); betrothed to Ptolemy III, Euergetes, of Egypt; m. Demetrius (half-brother of Macedonian king Antigonus I); m. Ptolemy III (died 222 BCE); children: (2nd m.) 5, including Ptolemy IV, Magas, Alexander, an unnamed son, and a daughter, Arsinoe III (who m. her brother Ptolemy IV and shared his throne). ❖ Betrothed to Ptolemy III of Egypt as part of a compromise which allowed her father to claim royal status while remaining under umbrella of Egyptian power; in actuality, was married at mother's insistence to a Demetrius, the half-brother of the Macedonian king, who himself was an ally of the Seleucids; caught mother in bed with Demetrius and had him executed; arranged her own marriage to Ptolemy III and thus aligned Cyrene with Egypt; had a happy marriage and was co-ruler of Egypt, providing with Ptolemy more or less competent leadership for both Egypt and Cyrene until he died (222); shared the throne briefly with oldest son Ptolemy IV; when Ptolemy IV started exhibiting hedonistic tendencies, began to favor another son, Magas, as Egypt's king; was executed by command of Ptolemy IV. ❖ See also Women in World History.

BERENICE III (c. 115–80 BCE). See Cleopatra Berenice III.

BERENICE IV (fl. 79–55 BCE). Egyptian queen. Born after 79 BCE; died in 55 BCE; reigned between 58 and 55; eldest child of Ptolemy XII Theos (or Auletes) and Cleopatra V Tryphaena; older sister of the famous Cleopatra VII; briefly m. to a man nicknamed Cybiosactes (fishmonger) by the Alexandrians; briefly m. to Archelaus; no children. ❖ Grew up at a dissolute court, which decreased in popularity among its subjects as time went on; when father Ptolemy XII angered his subjects who expelled him in favor of her (58), was thrust into a dynastic struggle which only ended after Ptolemy's bribery spurred Rome to restore him to his throne; was quickly put to death at her father's command. ❖ See also Women in World History.

BERENICE SYRA (c. 280–246 BCE). Queen of the Seleucid Empire. Born c. 280 BCE; murdered in 246 BCE; dau. of Ptolemy II Philadelphus and Arsinoë I of Egypt (fl. 280 BCE); m. Antiochus II, king of the Seleucid Empire, 252 BCE; children: 1 son. ❖ Grew up at a court dominated by father and his 2nd wife Arsinoë II Philadelphus; doted on by a loving father, was married to Antiochus II, king of the Seleucid Empire, after Egypt had fought the Seleucids twice for control of the harbors of the eastern Mediterranean (Antiochus had to reject his 1st wife Laodice and two sons, whom he loved, so as to establish Berenice as his one and only legitimate queen); after giving birth to a son, was left by Antiochus who returned to his 1st wife; when diplomatic pressure was applied for Antiochus to return to Berenice and Laodice had Antiochus poisoned and Berenice's child kidnapped, sought to protect her son in vain; was executed under Laodice's orders; her murder sparked an aggressive reaction in Ptolemy III (her brother), who for vengeance, began to ravage Seleucid possessions, thus beginning a 3rd war between Egypt and Syria. ❖ See also Women in World History.
