

Dictionary of BIBLICAL IMAGERY

An encyclopedic exploration of the images, symbols, motifs, metaphors, figures of speech and literary patterns of the Bible

General Editors:

Leland Ryken
James C. Wilhoit
Tremper Longman III

Consulting Editors

Colin Duriez
Douglas Penney
Daniel G. Reid

InterVarsity Press, USA
P.O. Box 1400, Downers Grove, IL 60515, USA
World Wide Web: www.ivpress.com
Email: mail@ivpress.com

InterVarsity Press, England
38 De Montfort Street, Leicester LE1 7GP, England

©1998 by InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA®

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of InterVarsity Press.

InterVarsity Press®, U.S.A., is the bookpublishing division of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA®, a student movement active on campus at hundreds of universities, colleges and schools of nursing in the United States of America, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. For information about local and regional activities, write Public Relations Dept., InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA, 6400 Schroeder Rd., P.O. Box 7895, Madison, WI 537077895.

InterVarsity Press, England, is the bookpublishing division of the Universities and Colleges Christian Fellowship (formerly the InterVarsity Fellowship), a student movement linking Christian Unions in universities and colleges throughout the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. For information about local and national activities write to UCCF, 38 De Montfort Street, Leicester LE1 7GP.

Scripture identified as NIV taken from the Holy Bible, New International Version®. NIV®. Copyright© 1973, 1978, 1984 by International Bible Society. Used by permission of Zondervan Publishing House. Distributed in the U.K. by permission of Hodder and Stoughton Ltd. All rights reserved. Those identified RSV are from the Revised Standard Version of the Bible. Copyright© 1946, 1952, 1971 by the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., and used by permission. Those identified NRSV are from the New Revised Standard Version Bible. Copyright© 1989 by the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., and used by permission. Those identified NASB are from the New American Standard Bible. Copyright© 1960, 1962, 1963, 1968, 1971, 1972 by the Lockman Foundation, and used by permission. Those identified NKJV are from the New King James Version of the Bible. Copyright© 1979, 1980, 1982 by Thomas Nelson, Inc., and used by permission.

Interior Illustrations: Roberta Polfus

USA ISBN 0830814515

UK ISBN 0851117538

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

Dictionary of biblical imagery/general editors: Leland Ryken, James

C. Wilhoit, Tremper Longman III; consulting editors: Colin Duriez, Douglas Penney, Daniel G. Reid.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 0830814515 (cloth: alk. paper)

1. Bible—Language, style—Dictionaries. 2. Symbolism in the Bible—Dictionaries. I. Ryken, Leland. II. Wilhoit, Jim.

III. Longman, Tremper. IV. Duriez, Colin. V. Penney, Douglas, 1956— . VI. Reid, Daniel G., 1949— .

BS537.D48 1998

220.3—dc21 9816945

CIP

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Contents

Preface

How to Use This Dictionary

Abbreviations

Transliterations

Contributors

Introduction

Dictionary Articles

InterVarsity Press

Executive Director

Robert Fryling

Editorial Staff

Editorial Director

Andrew T. Le Peau

Managing Editor

James Hoover

Reference Book Editor

Daniel G. Reid

Copyeditors

Ruth Goring
Elizabeth G. Yoder

Proofreader

Drew Blankman

Editorial Assistants

Eric Romero
David Zimmerman

Editorial Interns

Anita Genzink
Kay Kleinjan

Production Staff

Production Manager

Nancy Fox

Production Coordinator

James Erhart

Design

Kathy Lay Burrows

Design Assistant

Andrew Craft

Interior Illustrations

Roberta Polfus

Typesetters

Gail Munroe
Audrey I. Smith

Programming Consultant
Andy Shermer

Preface

This Dictionary of Biblical Imagery was conceived as a reference book that would assist readers, students and communicators of the Bible in exploring the fascinating and varied world of the imagery, metaphors and archetypes of the Bible. It appeared that conventional Bible dictionaries and encyclopedias provided little help in this area. For those whose Bible's were pencilmarked with crossreferences to images, motifs and other literary features, the lack of such a reference work seemed like a crime—or a publisher's opportunity!

From there the vision of the Dictionary grew to include articles on character types, plot motifs, type scenes, rhetorical devices, literary genres and the individual books of the Bible. In the end, some articles have sprawled across broad subject areas (such as “Animals” or “Legal Images”) and others are tightly focused (such as “Harp” or “Mustard Seed”). Many articles are innovative and clearly distinguish this work from other Bible dictionaries (such as “Well, Meeting at the” or “Cheat the Oracle”). And even where articles entitled “Wall” or “Tower” arouse a rightbrained reader's distaste for archaeological description and detail, the emphasis is decidedly on the evocative dimensions of these subjects.

Despite approximately 850 articles, this Dictionary is not comprehensive. This acknowledgment is a testimony to the vast and varied sea of biblical imagery, and to the limited time and energy of both editors and publisher. It is always a challenge to create a reference work in a field where no predecessor has established a “canon” of entries. It can also be a delightful adventure as the editors repeatedly encounter new vistas and angles of vision along the way—and try to help others see them too. But after seven years of planning and labor—and a work much longer than originally projected—the time has come to cease and desist and publish. We console ourselves in the generous thought that future revisers can learn from our efforts and build on this foundation. We also believe that our readers, as they work with this Dictionary, will see that they can launch out on their own and explore other facets of biblical imagery.

From the first, the editors sought to bring together the talents and perspectives of both literary and biblical scholars in a complementary marriage of expertise. But it quickly became apparent that in order to produce a satisfying volume, the claims of individual authorship would need to be subsumed under the editorial vision. So the decision was made in favor of a policy that would allow a free editorial hand in shaping, rewriting and augmenting the articles. Experience in creating reference works of this type has shown that as the work progresses, the editors themselves gain an ever deeper and broader view of the subject. Lateral connections and new insights flourish as articles and pages compound. A policy was created to allow this editorial vision to be fed back into the work. Thus the articles are unsigned (a list of contributors may be found at the beginning of the book). Although some articles appear much as they were originally authored, the vast majority of them have been worked over by several editorial hands, and they are frequently lengthier than the originals. As a result, this Dictionary has become a highly collaborative effort in which individual claims to authorship (not least those of the individual editors) have been set aside in the interest of what we trust will be a valuable contribution to understanding and enjoying the Bible. We offer our sincere thanks and appreciation to the approximately 150 contributors who have labored to make this work a reality. But we also accept full responsibility for any deficiencies in the final product.

The primary audience for this Dictionary is not scholars but laypeople. We have tried to create a readable and interesting work, one that will not only serve as an indispensable reference tool that augments conventional Bible dictionaries but will also open up new avenues of reading and appreciating the Bible. This book, we hope, will unfold new perspectives for all students of the Bible, new approaches for communicators of the Bible—including those in the fine arts—and heartwarming insights for devotional readers of the Bible. If readers capture some measure of the joy we have experienced even in the midst of our reading the proofs of this emerging book, we will have achieved our goal.

The Editors

How to Use this Dictionary

Abbreviations

Comprehensive tables of abbreviations for general matters as well as for scholarly and biblical literature may be found on pages ixx.

Authorship of Articles

The articles are unsigned (see preface), but a full list of contributors may be found on pages xixii, in alphabetical order of their last name.

Bibliographies

A bibliography has been appended to some articles. The bibliographies include works cited in the articles and other significant related works. Bibliographical entries are listed in alphabetical order by the author's last name, and where an author has more than one work cited, they are listed alphabetically by title. Abbreviations used in the bibliographies appear in the tables of abbreviations.

Cross-references

The Dictionary has been extensively crossreferenced in order to aid readers in making the most of material appearing throughout the volume. Five types of crossreferencing will be found:

1. Online entries appearing in alphabetical order throughout the Dictionary direct readers to articles where a topic is discussed:

Enameled Imagery. See Hard, Harden, Hardness; Jewels and Precious Stones; Permanence.

2. In the printed version of this dictionary, an asterisk adjacent to a single word in the body of an article indicates that an article by that title appears in the dictionary. However, in this electronic version the asterisk has been replaced by a hypertext link (i.e., the word is underlined and highlighted in red)

3. A crossreference appearing within parentheses in the body of an article also directs the reader to an article by that title. For example, (see Lightning) directs the reader to an article entitled Lightning. Such crossreferences are most frequently used either to direct the readers attention to an article of related interest.

4. Crossreferences have been appended to the end of articles, immediately preceding the bibliography, to direct readers to articles significantly related to the subject:

See also Banquet; Blessing, Blessedness; Fill, Fullness; Harvest; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Paradise; Storehouse.

Indexes

A Scripture Index is provided to assist readers in gaining access to information related to various biblical texts.

The Subject Index is intended to assist readers in finding relevant information on topics that have not been assigned a separate article or are taken up in more than one place.

Transliteration

Hebrew and Greek words have been transliterated according to a system set out in the front matter. Greek verbs appear in their lexical form (rather than infinitive) in order to assist those with little or no knowledge of the language in using other reference works.

Abbreviations

General Abbreviations

cf.

compare

v. or vv.

verse or verses

chap(s).

chapter(s)

vol.

volume

DSS

Dead Sea Scrolls

e.g.

for example

Translations of the Bible

ed.

edition; editor(s); edited by

JB

Jerusalem Bible

esp.

especially

KJV

King James Version (Authorized Version)

Gk

Greek

Heb

Hebrew

NASB

New American Standard Bible

i.e.

that is

NEB

New English Bible

LXX

Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)

NIV

New International Version

NLB

New Living Bible

mg.

margin

NRSV

New Revised Standard Version

n.d.

no date

RSV

Revised Standard Version

n.s.

new series

NT

New Testament

Apocrypha and Septuagint

OT

Old Testament

4 Ezra

4 Ezra

par.

parallel passage in another/other

1—4 Macc

1—4 Maccabees

Gospel(s)

Sir

Sirach (or Ecclesiasticus)

repr.

reprint

Wis

Wisdom of Solomon

rev.

revis

Books of the Bible

Old Testament

Ezra

Dan

Mal

Phil

Gen

Neh

Hos

Col

Ex

Esther

Joel

New Testament

1–2 Thess

Lev

Job

Amos

Mt

1–2 Tim

Num

Ps

Obad

Mk

Tit

Deut

Prov

Jon

Lk

Philem

Josh

Eccles

Mic

Jn

Heb

Judg

Song

Nahum

Acts

Jas

Ruth

Is

Hab

Rom

1—2 Pet

1—2 Sam

Jer

Zeph

1—2 Cor

1, 2, 3 Jn

1—2 Kings

Lam

Hag

Gal

Jude

1—2 Chron

Ezek

Zech

Periodicals, Reference Works and Serials

AB

Anchor Bible

DJG

Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels

ABD

Anchor Bible Dictionary

DLNTD

Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Developments

ANEP

Ancient Near East in Pictures

ANET

Ancient Near Eastern Texts

DPL

Dictionary of Paul and His Letters

BASOR

Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research

ExpT

Expository Times

IDB

Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible

BibSac

Bibliotheca Sacra

IntC

Interpretation Commentary

CBQ

Catholic Biblical Quarterly

ISBE

The International Standard Bible Encyclopedia (revised)

DBTEL

Dictionary of Biblical Tradition in English Literature

JBL

Journal of Biblical Literature

JETS

Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society

NTT

New Testament Theology (Cambridge University Press series)

JJS

Journal of Jewish Studies

NovT

Novum Testamentum

JSSJ

Journal of Semitic Studies

NTS

New Testament Studies

NCIB

New Clarendon Bible

OCD³

The Oxford Classical Dictionary (3d ed.)

NICNT

New International Commentary on the New Testament

SJT

Scottish Journal of Theology

NICOT

New International Commentary on the Old Testament

TOTC

Tyndale Old Testament Commentary

NIDNTT

New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology

WBC

Word Biblica

Contributors

Alexander, T. Desmond. The Queen's University of Belfast, Belfast, Northern Ireland.

Allen, Erick, Kintnersville, Pennsylvania, USA.

Allison, Dale C., Jr. Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, USA.

Apkera, Jacob. Nigeria.

Arnold, Clinton E. Talbot School of Theology, La Mirada, California, USA.

Balchin, John F. Purley, Surrey, England.

Baldwin, Joyce. (Deceased) Formerly, Eastwood, Nottinghamshire, England.

Bancroft, RoseLee. Alice Lloyd College, Pippa Passes, Kentucky, USA.

Banks, Robert. Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California, USA.

Barker, David G. Heritage Theological Seminary, London, Ontario, Canada.

Barratt, David J. Chester, England.

Bauckham, Richard J. University of St. Andrews, St. Andrews, Fife, Scotland.

Bell, Richard H. University of Nottingham, Nottingham, England.

Bennett, David. Mountain Park Church, Lake Oswego, Oregon, USA.

Bible, Jesse J. Willow Grove, Pennsylvania, USA.

Birdsall, Brent. Huntington, Indiana, USA.

Boda, Mark J. Canadian Bible College/Canadian Theological Seminary, Regina, Saskatchewan, Canada.

Braddock, Matthew. Quincy, Massachusetts, USA.

Brown, Ann. Cardiff, Wales.

Burke, Donald E. Catherine Booth Bible College, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada.

Burns, Lanier. Dallas Theological Seminary, Dallas, Texas, USA.

Carroll R., M. Daniel. Denver Seminary, Denver, Colorado, USA.

Chan, Frank. Glenside, Pennsylvania, USA.

Chisholm, Robert B., Jr. Dallas Theological Seminary, Dallas, Texas, USA.

Claass, Stefan. Mainz, Germany.

Colwell, Jerry D. Heritage Baptist College, London, Ontario, Canada.

Dawn, Marva J. Christians Equipped for Ministry, Vancouver, Washington, USA.

Duguid, Iain. Westminster Theological Seminary in California, Escondido, California, USA.

Du Mont Brown, Sarah. Trinity Christian Academy, Addison, Texas, USA.

Duriez, Colin. Inter-Varsity Press, Leicester, England.

Eckman, James. Grace College of the Bible, Omaha, Nebraska, USA.

Elrod, Eileen Razzari. Santa Clara University, Santa Clara, California, USA.

Enns, Peter. Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA.

Esler, Philip F. University of St. Andrews, St. Andrews, Fife, Scotland.

Etchells, Ruth. University of Durham, Durham, England.

Evans, Craig A. Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada.

Evans, Mary J. London Bible College, Northwood, Middlesex, England.

Felch, Douglas A. Grand Rapids, Michigan, USA.

Felch, Susan M. Calvin College, Grand Rapids, Michigan, USA.

Fink, Larry E. Hardin Simmons University, Abilene, Texas, USA.

Gentrup, William F. Arizona State University, Tempe, Arizona, USA.

Gledhill, Thomas D. Evangelical Theological College of Wales, Mid-Glamorgan, Wales.

Glodo, Michael J. Reformed Theological Seminary, Orlando, Florida, USA.

Graham, Lowell B. Providence Christian Academy, St. Louis, Missouri, USA.

Green, Douglas. Westminster Theological Seminary,
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA.

Green, Joel B. Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore,
Kentucky, USA.

Groves, Alan J. Westminster Theological Seminary,
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA.

Habermas, Ronald T. John Brown University, Siloam Springs, Arkansas, USA.

Hallett, David. Ardsley, Pennsylvania, USA.

Harmon, William B. Vancouver, Washington, USA.

Harvey, Jo Ann. Immanuel Presbyterian Church,
Warrenville, Illinois, USA.

Harvey, Robert W. Immanuel Presbyterian Church,
Warrenville, Illinois, USA.

Hasenclever, Frauke. Taunusstein, Germany.

Hatina, Thomas R. London, England.

Heller, Jack. Kenner, Louisiana, USA.

Hepper, Nigel. Richmond, Surrey, England.

Hess, Richard S. Denver Seminary, Denver, Colorado, USA.

Hill, Andrew E. Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA.

Hong, In-Gyu. Reformed Theological Seminary, Seoul, South Korea.

Horine, Steven C. Harleysville, Pennsylvania, USA.

Howard, David M., Jr. New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary, New Orleans, Louisiana, USA.

Howe, Bonnie G. T. Berkeley, California, USA.

Klem, John F. Central Baptist Theological Seminary, Virginia Beach, Virginia, USA.

Kojecky, Roger F. Northwood, Middlesex, England.

Konkel, August H. Providence Theological Seminary, Otterburne, Manitoba, Canada.

Lamport, Mark A. Gordon College, Wenham, Massachusetts,
USA.

Lindsey, Victor. East Central University, Ada, Oklahoma, USA.

Littledale, Richard J. Purley Baptist Church, Purley, Surrey, England.

Longman, Tremper, III. Westmont College, Santa Barbara, California, USA.

Lucas, Ernest C. Bristol Baptist College, Bristol, England.

Ludwick, Robert D., II. Ballwin, Missouri, USA.

Lyall, Francis. University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, Scotland.

Lynn, Robyn D. Westmont College, Santa Barbara, California, USA.

Lyons, Michael A. Glenview, Illinois, USA.

McCartney, Dan G. Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA.

McClarty, Wilma. Southern College, Collegedale, Tennessee, USA.

McKeever, Michael C. Fresno, California, USA.

Makujina, John. Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA.

Mawhinney, Allen. Reformed Theological Seminary, Orlando, Florida, USA.

Meier, Samuel A. Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio, USA.

Miller, Daniel R. Deerfield, Illinois, USA.

Miller, David G. Mississippi College, Clinton, Mississippi, USA.

Mills, Don. Central Baptist Theological Seminary, Virginia Beach, Virginia, USA.

Moore, Erika. Worthington, Pennsylvania, USA.

Moore, James J. Worthington, Pennsylvania, USA.

Motyer, Stephen. London Bible College, Northwood, Middlesex, England.

Neale, David A. Canadian Nazarene College, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada.

Newman, Carey C. Louisville, Kentucky, USA.

Nielson, Kathleen Buswell. Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA.

Olson, Dennis T. Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, New Jersey, USA.

Parker, Margaret. (Deceased) Formerly Walnut Creek, California, USA.

Patterson, Richard D. Forest, Virginia, USA.

Penney, Douglas. Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA.

Perrin, Nicholas. Aurora, Illinois, USA.

Pocock, Michael. Dallas Theological Seminary, Dallas, Texas, USA.

Porter, Stanley E. Roehampton Institute, London, England.

Pratt, Richard L., Jr. Reformed Theological Seminary, Orlando, Florida, USA.

Provan, Iain. Regent College, Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada.

Ragen, Brian Abel. Southern Illinois University at Edwardsville, Edwardsville, Illinois, USA.

Read, Peter. Monmouth, Gwent, South Wales.

Reid, Daniel G. InterVarsity Press, Westmont, Illinois, USA.

Reid, Debra K. Spurgeon's College, London, England.

Riso, Mary T. South Hamilton, Massachusetts, USA.

Ritchie, Daniel E. Bethel College, St. Paul, Minnesota, USA.

Roberts, D. Phillip. Temple Terrace, Florida, USA.

Robertson, George W. St. Louis, Missouri, USA.

Ryken, Leland. Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois, USA.

Ryken, Lisa. Tenth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA.

Ryken, Philip G. Tenth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA.

Sandy, Brent. Salem, Virginia, USA.

Schumann, Anne. Mainz, Germany.

Schuurman, John F. Wheaton Christian Reformed Church, Wheaton, Illinois, USA.

Schwab, George M., Sr. Fort Washington, Pennsylvania, USA.

Sider, J. Philip W. Carlsbad, California, USA.

Siebold, Manfred. Johannes Gutenberg-Universität Mainz, Mainz, Germany.

Sims, James H. The University of Southern Mississippi, Hattiesburg, Mississippi, USA.

Sohn, Seock-Tae. Reformed

Theological Seminary, Seoul, South Korea.

Spencer, Aida Besançon. Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary, South Hamilton, Massachusetts, USA.

Stabnow, David. Melrose Park, Pennsylvania, USA.

Stallman, Robert C. Central Bible College, Springfield, Missouri, USA.

Stone, David A. London, England.

Stroup, William L., Jr. Collingdale, Pennsylvania, USA.

Thatcher, Thomas W. Cincinnati Bible Seminary, Cincinnati, Ohio, USA.

Thiselton, Anthony C. The University of Nottingham, Nottingham, England.

Tidball, Derek J. London Bible College, Northwood, Middlesex, England.

Tischler, Nancy M. The Pennsylvania State University, University Park, Pennsylvania, USA.

Travers, Michael E. Mississippi College, Clinton, Mississippi, USA.

Vanhoozer, Kevin J. Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois, USA.

Walley, Christopher D. Leamington, England.

Introduction

“Light dawns for the righteous.”

“The Lord raised up for them a deliverer, a lefthanded man.”

“Lot was sitting in the gate of Sodom.”

The Bible is more than a book of ideas: it is also a book of images and motifs. Everywhere we turn we find concrete pictures and recurrent patterns. Some of these, like the image of *light, are universal. Others, like the motif of lefthandedness, are unexpressive until we have been alerted to their significance. The meaning of others, such as the image of sitting in the *gate, is lost on modern readers until they are initiated into what the motif meant in other places at other times.

In all three instances, we will understand the Bible better with the aid of a dictionary that helps us to see what is literally in the biblical text and to understand its significance and meaning. Stated another way, we will miss a lot of what the Bible contains if we do not see and understand the literal and symbolic meanings of the Bible's images.

How Does the Bible Communicate Truth?

Because of the predominantly theological and devotional purposes to which Christians put the Bible, it is almost impossible not to slip into the error of looking upon the Bible as a theological outline with proof texts attached. Yet the Bible is much more a book of images and motifs than of abstractions and propositions. This is obscured by the way in which preachers and theologians gravitate so naturally to the epistles. A biblical scholar has correctly said that the Bible speaks largely in images.... The stories, the parables, the sermons of the prophets, the reflections of the wise men, the pictures of the age to come, the interpretations of past events all tend to be expressed in images which arise out of experience. They do not often arise out of abstract technical language.¹ [James A. Fischer, How to Read the Bible (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: PrenticeHall, 1981), p. 39.]

This dictionary accepts this as a working premise.

The Bible is a book that images the truth as well as stating it in abstract propositions. Correspondingly, the truth that the Bible expresses is often a matter of truthfulness to human experience as distinct from ideas that are true rather than false. The Bible here follows a common pattern. A noted theologian has stated it thus:

We are far more imagemaking and imageusing creatures than we usually think ourselves to be and ... are guided and formed by images in our minds... Man ... is a being who grasps and shapes reality ... with the aid of great images, metaphors, and analogies.² [H. Richard Niebuhr, The Responsible Self (New York: Harper & Row, 1963), pp. 15152, 161.]

These images, in turn, are important to a person's worldview, which consists of images and stories as well as ideas.

Recent brain research has given us a new slant on this.³ [For summaries of research, see these sources: Michael C. Corballis and Ivan L. Beale, The Ambivalent Mind: The Neuropsychology of Left and Right (Chicago: NelsonHall, 1983); Sid J. Segalowitz, Two Sides of the Brain (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: PrenticeHall, 1983); Sally P. Springer and Georg Deutsch, Left Brain, Right Brain, rev. ed. (New York: W. H. Freeman, 1985).] That research has found that the two sides of the human brain respond differently to different types of stimuli. The left hemisphere's forte is analysis, reason, and logic. The right hemisphere is dominant in visual and other sensory processes, as well as in the exercise of emotion and the recognition of humor and metaphor. Conceptual and emotionally neutral words activate the left hemisphere, while words that name images and are emotionally laden activate the right hemisphere. The focus of this dictionary is on the aspects of the Bible that make it rightbrain discourse.

Defining Terms: Image, Symbol, Metaphor, Simile

The key terms that underlie this dictionary carry their common meanings. The most foundational term is image. An image is any word that names a concrete thing (such as *tree or *house) or action (such as *running or *threshing). Any object or action that we can picture is an image.

Images require two activities from us as readers of the Bible. The first is to experience the image as literally and in as fully a sensory way as possible. The second is to be sensitive to the connotations or overtones of the image. When we stop to reflect on the image of *water, for example, we find that it connotes such qualities as refreshment, sustenance and life. The most elementary form of connotation is simply whether an image is positive or negative in association in the context in which it appears.

When we encounter an image in the Bible, therefore, we need to learn to ask two questions: (1) What is the literal picture? (2) What does this image evoke? Answering the first question will insure that we have allowed the Bible to speak to our "right brain"—that part of us that responds to the concrete realities that the Bible records. Answering the second question will lead to an awareness of connotations, associations and significance. If either of these levels of response is missing, our experience of the Bible is impoverished.

A symbol is an image that stands for something in addition to its literal meaning. It is more laden with meaning than simply the connotations of the straight image. In the overwhelming majority of cases, symbolism emerges as a shared language in a culture. In other words, it will be extremely rare that a biblical writer will create a symbol for a single occasion.

The image of water will illuminate how image and symbol work and how they differ from each other. In the narrative of the Exodus, water functions as a fullfledged image when we read that “there was no water for the people to drink,” followed by the account of how Moses struck the rock to make water flow “that the people may drink” (Ex 17:6 RSV). The connotations of water spring from its literal properties and include refreshment and retrieving life from the threat of death. Water moves beyond image and assumes the status of a symbol when Jesus tells the woman at the well, “Whoever drinks of the water that I shall give him will never thirst; the water that I shall give him will become in him a spring of water welling up to eternal life” (Jn 4:14 RSV). Whereas with the image the literal properties of water are of primary importance, in Jesus’ symbol it is the second level of meaning—salvation—that is primary. Of course water would never have become a symbol of salvation if it did not possess the physical properties that it does, so even with a biblical symbol we will impoverish the impact of an utterance if we do not pause to experience the literal side of the symbol.

Metaphor and simile function much like symbol, and nothing much is lost if these terms are used interchangeably. A metaphor is an implied comparison. For example, when Paul writes that “I planted, Apollos watered” (1 Cor 3:6 RSV), he is not speaking of a literal plant. He refers to a figurative planting and watering in the form of proclaiming the Gospel to produce conversion and the teaching of the truth to produce Christian nurture. A simile also compares one thing to another, but it makes the comparison explicit by using the formula like or as. An example is the proverb, “Like cold water to a thirsty soul, / so is good news from a far country” (Prov 25:25 RSV).

Metaphor and simile are bifocal utterances that require us to look at both the literal and figurative levels. The literal meaning of the word metaphor speaks volumes in this regard. It is based on two Greek words that mean “to carry over.” First we need to relive the literal experience of water; then we need to carry over that meaning to such realities as Christian nurture and good news from a far country. The connection between the halves of the comparison is not arbitrary but logical. To perceive the logic of the connections that a metaphor or simile makes, we need to do justice to the literal qualities of the image, remembering that metaphors and similes are images first and comparisons secondly.

Bible dictionaries and commentaries commonly err in one of two directions, and it is the aim of this dictionary to achieve a balance. On the one hand, some resources channel all their energies into uncovering the original context of an image, making sure that we get the literal picture but never asking what feelings or meanings are elicited by the image. Images call for interpretation, and to leave biblical imagery uninterpreted is a great waste. The images of the Bible exist to tell us something about the ways of God and the godly life, something they will not do if they are allowed to remain as physical phenomena only. In short, a common failing of commentaries and dictionaries is that they do not adequately speak to the issue of significance (what an image signifies by way of meaning).

But the opposite failing of ignoring the literal level of imagery in a scramble to tell us what an image means is even more common. Here, for example, is what some standard sources do with an image that occurs at least seven times in the Psalms—the *horn that God raises up: (1) “the power and the stability of the kingship”; (2) “the [term] scarcely needs comment, with the evident implications of strength”; (3) “horn here symbolizes strong one, that is, king”; (4) “figurative for granting victory or bestowing prosperity.” All of these pieces of commentary lavish their attention on what the image of the horn means, without ever telling us what kind of literal horn we should picture. Some back issues of The National Geographic will give us more help than the commentaries, with their pictures of rams butting each other with their horns or a deer warding off an attacking cougar with its antlers. The time is ripe for some bold new commentaries and dictionaries with pictorial accompaniment to make the literal images come alive.

Motifs and Conventions

A motif is a pattern that appears in a written text. At its most rudimentary, such a pattern is something that we notice in an individual biblical text. For example, as we read the story of Jacob’s meeting Rebekah at a well (Gen 29:4–12; see Well, Meeting at the), we can identify a pattern unfolding: the arrival of the man from a foreign land, the appearance of the woman at the well to fetch water, a dialogue between the man and woman, the drawing of water from the well by either the man or the woman as a gesture of thoughtfulness toward the other, the girl’s running home to tell her family, and inviting the stranger into the home of the future betrothed in an act of hospitality and welcome.

Even though a single instance of such a pattern warrants the application of the term motif, it is more customary to apply the term to repeated instances of the same pattern. In the Bible, for example, the motif of meeting one's future betrothed at the well appears several times—not only with Jacob and Rebekah, but also with the servant of Abraham who is sent to bring back a bride for Isaac (Gen 24:10–33) and with Moses upon his arrival in Midian (Ex 2:16–21). The literary term currently in vogue to designate the recurrence of common ingredients in a story is “type scene.” Robert Alter, who popularized the concept, defines a type scene as “an elaborate set of tacit agreements between artist and audience about the ordering of the art work,” and a “grid of conventions” that readers come to recognize and expect.⁴ [Robert Alter, The Art of Biblical Narrative (New York: Basic Books, 1981), p. 47.]

A motif is thus made up of a set of conventions—ingredients that recur so often in similar situations that they become expectations in the minds of writers and readers alike. The idea of conventions seems most natural when we are dealing with narratives. To put the protagonist of the story in a situation that tests him or her, for example, is a convention that most stories follow. Equally pervasive is the tendency of stories to be structured as a conflict that reaches resolution, often accompanied by a moment of epiphany (insight, revelation) near the end of the story. Again, it is a rare story that does not end with the convention of *poetic justice (virtue rewarded, vice punished).

But conventions are not limited to the stories of the Bible. It is a convention of lament psalms, for example, to include a *reversal or recantation: after crying to God, defining a crisis that seems hopeless, and asking God to deliver, the poet reverses himself by expressing his confidence in God and vowing to praise God for deliverance. The motif of reversal is equally common in biblical *prophecy, where the prophet often pictures a future era when the present situation is reversed—where the wicked now in power will be put down, for example, or when the misery of human history will give way to a *millennium of perfection.

While this dictionary is not intended as a comprehensive guide to literary conventions in the Bible, its entries dealing with motifs will in effect be an exploration of the conventions upon which both writer and reader have implicitly agreed. The practical benefit of having these conventions brought to our awareness is that as we read and teach the Bible we will see a great deal more than we would otherwise see. Instead of experiencing every text as a new event that needs to be puzzled over, we will begin to experience various types of biblical texts as a journey through a familiar landscape. Conventions like those that operate in the story of meeting one's future betrothed at a well will also enable us to apply to one story what we have learned from other texts. Furthermore, because some of the motifs and conventions of the Bible have dropped out of circulation since ancient times, having them identified will enable us to see patterns and meanings in the Bible that would otherwise remain obscure.

Although motifs are more likely to revolve around *plot or action than around images, we should pause to note that motifs often incorporate images. Earlier we noted instances of water as an image, symbol, metaphor and simile. Water figures as a motif in an ancient practice known as *ordeal by water. In this motif, ability to survive being submerged in water is regarded as a sign of *innocence, while drowning signals that a person is evil. In the Old Testament, for example, the *flood and the Red Sea crossing are trials by water in which God's judgment against evil people is manifested in their drowning while the righteous are preserved. Several Psalms (e.g., Ps 69:12–15 and 124:1–5) likewise picture ordeal as a flood from which the speaker must be *rescued.

Do Literary Conventions Mean that the Bible Is Fictional?

It is fair to ask at this point how all this talk about literary conventions relates to the question of the historicity or fictionality of the Bible. The answer, in brief, is that the presence of conventions and literary artifice in the Bible does not by itself say anything at all about historicity or fictionality.

It is true that scholars like Robert Alter believe that the presence of conventions and type scenes are a sign of fictionality. But this assumption is unwarranted. Underlying the assumption that the presence of literary artifice in the Bible signals fictionality is the unstated belief that events like this do not happen in real life. But real life is full of type scenes. Real life stories of meeting one's future spouse at college would be as filled with repeated ingredients as Old Testament stories of meeting one's spouse at a well.

In real life, and not just in literature, we constantly impose patterns on the flow of events. It is not a matter of making things up but of "packaging" them—in other words, of selectivity and arrangement. Consider the conventions of the television sports report or interview. The reporter is filmed with a sports arena in the background. During the course of the report the reporter either interviews an athlete or is momentarily replaced by a film clip of sports action. It is a rule of the sports interview that the conversation consist only of clichés and that it be devoid of anything approaching intellectual substance. The syntax of the athlete being interviewed is expected to be rudimentary or even nonexistent in the usual sense. It is a rule that at some point the athlete mumbles something to the effect of “just trying to go out there and do my job.” A look of false modesty is expected to accompany this worldchanging announcement. At the end of the report, the reporter stares into the camera and utters a catchy, impressivesounding one liner.

The artifice of such conventions is obvious. Yet the artifice and high degree of conventionality do not make the interview anything other than a factual event that really happened. What such conventions do signal is the degree to which communication, whether on television or in the Bible, is based on shared assumptions or expectations between writer and audience about how certain things are communicated or composed.

To take an instance that relates to the Bible, we can consider the conventions of a *love story, whether in literature or real life. It is easy to produce a list of conventions that make up a love story: an eligible hero and heroine who are worthy of each other, initial unawareness on the part of the lovers that they are meant for each other, obstacles to the romance that must be overcome, asking friends about the eligible “other,” a memorable first meeting or a first date, report of the first date to Mom or a roommate, courtship (including wooing of both the bride-to-be and her mother), goodbye moments, a *matchmaker, meetings in a country or natural setting, bestowing of favors, secret meetings, a rival, background observers, betrothal and *marriage. Now it so happens the Old Testament story of Ruth contains all of these ingredients. Does that make the story fictional? How could it necessarily make it fictional when the ingredients are equally present in real life romances?

Underlying this dictionary is an editorial bias that runs counter to the tendency of some to find fiction in the Bible, namely, a conviction that the very presence of such universal elements in the Bible makes it more lifelike, not less lifelike. There can be no doubt that the writers of the Bible carefully selected and arranged their material. The result is that the accounts that we find in the Bible are more highly structured than real life is ordinarily felt to be, with the result that we see things more clearly in the Bible than we usually do in real life. A comment by the poet T. S. Eliot will clarify the matter. "It is the function of all art," wrote Eliot, "to give us some perception of an order in life, by imposing an order upon it."⁵ [T. S. Eliot, On Poetry and Poets (New York: Farrar, Strauss & Cudahy, 1957), p. 93.]

This dictionary explores the patterns that the biblical writers have imposed on life, with a view toward understanding what those patterns clarify about life.

Archetypes

A final term that requires definition for purposes of this dictionary is the word archetype. An archetype is an image or pattern that recurs throughout literature and life.

Archetypes are the universal elements of human experience. More specifically, an archetype falls into one of three categories: it is either an image or symbol (such as the *mountaintop or evil *city), or a plot motif (such as *crime and punishment or the *quest), or a character type (such as the *trickster or jealous *sibling).

Many of the images and motifs discussed in this dictionary are archetypes. They recur not only throughout the Bible, but in literature generally and in life. Being aware of them will help us draw connections—between parts of the Bible, between the Bible and other things we have read, between the Bible and life.

Archetypes are a universal language. We know what they mean simply by virtue of being humans in this world. We all know the experiences of *hunger and *thirst, *garden and *wilderness. Ideas and customs vary widely from one time and place to another, but archetypes are the elemental stuff of life. In the words of literary scholar Northrop Frye (noted archetypal critic), “Some symbols are images of things common to all men, and therefore have a communicable power which is potentially unlimited.”⁶ [

Northrop Frye, Anatomy of Criticism (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1957), p. 99.]

Another literary scholar defines the master images of the imagination as “any of the immemorial patterns of response to the human situation in its permanent aspects.”⁷ [Leslie Fiedler, “Archetype and

Signature,” reprinted in Myths and Motifs in Literature, ed. David J.

Burrows et al. (New York: Free Press, 1973), p. 28.]

A study of the images and motifs of the Bible will confirm one scholar’s comment that “the Biblical vocabulary is compact of the primal stuff of our common humanity—of its universal emotional, sensory experiences.”⁸ [John Livingston Lowes,

“The Noblest Monument of English Prose,” in Literary Style of the Old Bible and the New, ed. D. G. Kehl (Indianapolis: BobbsMerrill, 1970), p. 9.]

Such elemental images are primal in the sense of being rooted in essential humanity, independent of civilized trappings and complexity. One effect of reading this dictionary will be to uncover the primal roots of the Bible. Someone has said that the themes of the Bible are simple and primary. Life is reduced to a few basic activities... We confront basic virtues and primitive vices... The world these persons inhabit is stripped and elemental—sea, desert, the stars, the wind, storm, sun, clouds, and moon, seedtime and harvest... Occupation has this elementary quality also.⁹ [9

Howard Mumford Jones, “The Bible from a Literary Point of View,” in Five Essays on the Bible (New York: American Council of Learned Societies, 1960), pp. 5253.]

The entries in this dictionary will confirm this view of the Bible as a primal and elemental book.

There are also psychological overtones to an exploration of these elemental images of human life. The modern study of archetypes began with psychologists (though archetypes have long since been separated from that source). Part of the psychological dimension is that there is wisdom and strength to be found in being put in touch with bedrock humanity in this way. Carl Jung wrote that archetypes “make up the groundwork of the human psyche. It is only possible to live the fullest life when we are in harmony with these symbols; wisdom is a return to them.”¹⁰ [10
Psychological Reflections, ed. Jolande Jacobi (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1953), p. 47.]

One of the benefits of exploring the territory charted in this dictionary is to see anew that while the Bible is more than a human book, it is also a book rich in recognizable human experience.

A further useful thing to know about images and archetypes is that when we begin to categorize them, we find good and bad, desirable and undesirable, ideal and unideal versions of the various categories. *Kings can be benevolent or tyrannical, for example. *Lions are usually a negative archetype, but they can also symbolize power and rulership in the hands of the good. A beginning list of the archetypes of the Bible, arranged by categories, is set out in the accompanying chart. This chart of archetypes is one of the chief patterns that the human imagination imposes on reality. We might say that archetypes are among the chief building blocks for writers of the Bible. Of course they impose these patterns on life as a way of clarifying life.

Category of Experience

The Archetypes of Ideal Experience

The Archetypes of Unideal Experience

Supernatural Agents and Settings

God; angels; the heavenly society; heaven; Abraham's bosom

Satan; demons, evil spirits; evil beasts and monsters such as those in the book of Revelation; pagan idols; the witch; hell

Human Characters

The Hero or heroine; virtuous wife/husband/mother/father; bride or bridegroom; godly and benevolent king or ruler; innocent or obedient child; loyal friend, servant or disciple; wiseman; true shepherd; pilgrim; godly priest; teacher of truth; heroic and innocent martyr; guide, protector or watchman; chaste virgin; helpful matchmaker; temperate person; triumphant warrior; masters of a vocation (good farmer, craftsman, etc.); saint; penitent; convert; just judge; deliverer

The Villain; tempter/temptress; prostitute or adulterer; taskmaster, tyrant or oppressor (usually foreign oppressor); wanderer, outcast or exile; traitor; sluggard or lazy person; hypocrite; false religious teacher or priest; hireling or unreliable shepherd; fool; drunkard; thief or robber; domineering spouse or parent; deceiver; dupe; meddling eavesdropper; seducer or seductress; glutton; unjust judge; wayward child or vicious sibling; beggar; sinner; rebel; prodigal; murderer; persecutor

Human Relationships

The Community, city, tribe or nation; images of communion, order, unity, hospitality, friendship, love; wedding or marriage; feast, meal

Tyranny or anarchy; isolation among people; images of torture (the cross, stake scaffold, gallows, stocks, prison, etc.)

Clothing

Any stately garment that shows legitimate position or success; festal garments such as wedding clothes; fine clothing given as a gift of hospitality; white or lightcolored clothing; clothing of adornment (e.g., jewels); protective clothing (e.g., warrior's armor, shoes)

Ill-fitting garments (often symbolic of a position that is usurped or not held legitimately); garments of mourning (e.g., sackcloth, rent garments); dark clothes; tattered, dirty or coarse clothing; any clothing that suggests poverty or bondage; conspicuous excess of clothing or lack of clothing (including barefootedness and nakedness)

The Human Body

Images of health, strength, vitality, potency, sexual fertility (including the womb and seed); feats of strength, dexterity or conquest; images of sleep and rest; happy dreams; rituals of festivity such as an anointed head; birth; cleansing and cleanliness; hand, right arm, eye and head; healing

Images of disease, deformity, barrenness, injury or mutilation; physical ineptness (e.g., stumbling or falling); acts leading to defeat; sleeplessness or nightmare, perhaps related to guilt of conscience; death; blindness and deafness; filthiness; physical effects of guilt

Food

Staples such as bread, milk, meat, manna, oil; abundance of a harvest of grain; luxuries such as wine and honey; olive; grapes

Hunger, drought, famine, starvation, cannibalism; poison; drunkenness

Animals

A community of domesticated animals, usually a flock of sheep or herd of cattle; lamb; gentle bird (e.g., dove); any animal friendly to people; singing birds; animals or birds noted for their strength, such as the lion, horse or eagle; fish

Monsters or beasts of prey; wolf (enemy of sheep), tiger, dragon, vulture, owl or hawk; cold and earthbound snake; any wild animal harmful to people; goat; unclean animals of OT purity law; wild dog; ignorant mule

Landscape

A garden, grove or park; mountaintop or hill; fertile plain or valley; pastoral settings or farms; safe pathway or easily traveled road; places of natural refuge or defense, such as rock, hill or hiding place

The Dark forest; wilderness or wasteland (which is either too hot or too cold); dark and dangerous valley; tomb; labyrinth; dangerous or evil pathway; cave (associated with barbarism) or pit (confinement, imprisonment)

Plants

Green grass; rose; vineyard; tree of life; productive tree, vine or plant; lily; evergreen plants (symbolic of immortality); herbs or plants or healing; engrafting; grain, especially wheat and barley

The Thorn or thistle; weeds; dead or dying plants; unproductive plants; willow tree (symbolic of death or mourning); chaff; pruning of dead branches

Buildings

The city; palace or court; military stronghold; tabernacle, temple or church; altar; house or home; tower of contemplation or watchfulness; capital city, center of the nation; storehouse; wellbuilt foundations and pillars; inn; door or gate of entry and protection; city wall; boat or ark of safety or rescue; marketplace; threshing floor

The Prison or dungeon; wicked city of violence, sexual perversion or crime; tower of imprisonment or wicked aspiration (such as the Tower of Babel); pagan temples and altars; buildings without solid foundations; wastehouse (empty, vacuous and decaying building)

The Inorganic World

Jewels and precious stones, often glowing and fiery; fire and brilliant light; burning that purifies and refines; rocks of refuge; gold, silver and pearl; durable metals like iron and bronze

The uncivilized world in its unworked form of deserts, rocks and wilderness; dry dust or ashes; fire that destroys and tortures instead of purifying; rust and decay; ashes

Water

A Tranquil, lifegiving river, stream or pool; spring or fountain; showers of rain; flowing water as opposed to stagnant water; water used for cleansing

The overflowing river or stream; the sea and its monsters; stagnant pools or cisterns

Forces of Nature

The breeze or wind; spring and summer seasons; calm after storm; sun or the lesser light of the moon and stars; light, sunrise, day; rainbow

The storm or tempest; autumn and winter seasons; sunset, darkness, night; earthquakes, flood or hail; images of mutability (faded rose, dried grass, vapor); lightning and thunder; whirlwind

Sounds

Musical harmony; singing; laughter

Discordant sounds; cacophony; weeping, wailing, sighing

Direction and Motion

Images of ascent, rising, height (especially the mountaintop), motion (as opposed to stagnation); straight; right (as opposed to left)

Images of descent, lowness, stagnation or immobility, suffocation, confinement, crooked (as opposed to straight); left

Actions

The quest or journey; positive transformations, such as deathrebirth movement, conversion, or the rite of baptism; acts of worship (sacrifice, offering, burning of incense, festal processions); fullness; overcoming of obstacles enroute to a happy ending; virtue rewarded; escape or liberation; rescue; reform; reunion, reconciliation, forgiveness; homecoming; reward; pilgrimage; being found

The antiquest (such as Jonah's attempt to flee from God); capture; decline of fortune or degradation of character; crime and punishment; fall from innocence; emptiness; murder; temptation; punishment of vice; suffering; terror or danger; exile or banishment; cataclysmic destructio

What Is the Practical Usefulness of This Dictionary?

This is a practical book, in a number of ways. One of its uses is to provide a biblical reader with an improved grasp of the literal level of the Bible. In the thirteenth century, Roger Bacon argued that the church had done a good job of communicating the theological content of the Bible but had failed to make the literal level of the biblical text come alive in people's imagination. We are in a similar situation today. One of the goals of this dictionary is to provide a corrective. This dictionary will show that concrete images lie behind many of the abstractions in modern English translations of the Bible.

In addition to enhancing our awareness of the Bible as a work of imagination (our imagemaking and imageperceiving capacity), this dictionary is designed to enrich a reader's affective response to the Bible. Pictures affect us emotionally in ways that abstractions do not (which is not to say, of course, that abstractions necessarily leave us unmoved).

If this book improves our awareness of the literal level of meaning of the Bible, paradoxically it also improves our ability to interpret the figurative level of meaning. Many entries in this dictionary are divided into an analysis of the concrete, literal properties of a biblical image or motif (such as *animals or *birds), and of the symbolic meanings that gather around the literal level. In these instances, our understanding of the figurative meanings is enriched by the context provided by the concrete or literal level of meaning.

A systematic treatment of images and motifs in the Bible also allows us to see the unity and progression of the Bible. Unity emerges when we see that many of the master images of the Bible pervade it from beginning to end. Some of these motifs, moreover, show a discernible progression, especially (but not only) in the New Testament fulfillment of Old Testament foreshadowings. The motif of the annunciation of the *birth of a *son to a *barren mother, for example, can be traced from Sarah through the story of Gideon's mother and Hannah, and thence to the nativity stories of John the Baptist and Jesus.

This dictionary also suggests a strategy for preaching and teaching the Bible. One area of application is theological. Tracing a master image or motif through the Bible from beginning to end sooner or later touches upon most major areas of biblical theology and is therefore a fresh way to view the theological content of the Bible. Furthermore, a study of biblical images and motifs shows that the Bible is both a timeless book and a timebound book (in the sense of being rooted in cultural contexts that change as history unfolds). Such a study therefore provides a way of achieving a major task of preaching and teaching—that of bridging the gap between the biblical world and our own world by first journeying to the ancient world and then making a return trip to our own place and time. An important part of the return trip consists of seeing how much universal human experience is present in the Bible

To sum up, this is a book with many uses. It is a book to be browsed, packed as it is with new information and insights about the content of the Bible. It is equally a reference book—for exegetes, interpreters, preachers, teachers and lay readers of the Bible.

Who Wrote This Dictionary?

The study of images and motifs is an interdisciplinary enterprise, and this dictionary is accordingly the product of both biblical and literary scholars. Individual entries were written and/or edited by both groups of scholars. Biblical scholars are adept at placing biblical images and motifs in their ancient setting, and in recognizing ancient patterns that a modern reader is unlikely to have encountered. Literary critics can bring to bear on the Bible their knowledge of literary motifs that literature has exhibited through the centuries. Both disciplines can help to interpret the meanings and nuances of biblical images and motifs.

A

AARON'S ROD

Aaron's rod appears almost exclusively in the story of the exodus, where it emerges as a master image and where it may merge with references to the rod of Moses and even the rod of God (Ex 4:20; 17:9). The significance of the rod was kept alive in the Hebrew consciousness by virtue of its being stored as a memorial in the Holy of Holies after it had miraculously blossomed (Num 17:10; Heb 9:4).

The Bible itself does not tell us exactly what kind of rod or staff it was. It might have been a shepherd's rod used for protecting and rescuing sheep or a traveler's walking stick or a weapon. The prosaic, commonplace nature of this unspecified staff may itself be part of its significance, making it a foil to the supernatural power that the rod displays in the story of the exodus.

The rod linked specifically with Aaron appears first when Moses and Aaron have their first meeting with Pharaoh. On this occasion the rod assumes miraculous powers by being transformed into a serpent when Aaron throws it on the ground, and then swallowing the serpents that had been called forth by the Egyptian magicians' rods (Ex 7:8–12). Later the rod effected three of the ten plagues—turning the water of the Nile into blood (Ex 7:14–23), calling forth frogs (Ex 8:1–5) and bringing gnats (Ex 8:16–19).

Even more impressive is the subsequent blossoming of Aaron's rod. Following the rebellion of Korah, Dathan and Abiram against the authority of Moses and Aaron, Moses collected a rod from the leaders of each of the twelve tribes, plus Aaron's rod for the tribe of Levi. In the evocative account of the biblical narrative, "On the morrow Moses went into the tent of the testimony; and, behold, the rod of Aaron for the house of Levi was budded and brought forth buds, and bloomed blossoms, and yielded almonds" (Num 17:8 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). In a tragic let-down, the final reference to the rod occurs when Moses doomed himself by striking the rock instead of speaking to it. Here we read that "Moses took the rod from before the Lord," apparently linking it with Aaron's rod kept as a memorial in the Holy of Holies (Num 20:9).

What does Aaron's rod signify in the Bible? Throughout its history it has associations of miraculous power, especially the power to transform physical reality. As a symbol of supernatural power working through human agencies, the rod also evokes a sense of authority, both political (it helped the nation's leaders win its conflicts) and priestly (its blossoming coincided with the establishment of the house of Aaron and tribe of Levi in a priestly role). Although this ordinary rod was far from being a royal scepter, it nonetheless seems scepter-like in our imaginations as we read of its miraculous powers.

By being linked specifically with Aaron (and perhaps with Moses as well), this particular rod is also an index to the exalted status of Aaron and Moses. It reminds us of magical talismans that signal the uniqueness and heroic status of such heroes of ancient literature as Odysseus and Aeneas. Furthermore, the association of Aaron's rod with the Holy of Holies gives it a sacral significance, making it a visible memorial to God's sacred presence and power. Finally, the springing of life from an inanimate object is an archetypal rebirth image, connoting passage from death to life.

See also Rod, Staff; Scepter.

ABANDON, ABANDONED.

See Forsake, Forsaken.

ABEL

Cain and Abel, the most famous brothers in biblical literature, were perhaps even twins, since the Bible never mentions that Eve conceived twice before their birth. But no matter. They might as well have been Siamese twins, so closely are the two associated. Allusions to either feed off the other in symbiotic style.

The story unfolds in Genesis 4, where Abel, the model child, obedient and righteous, becomes a brother slain. Seven times in eleven verses (Gen 4:2—11 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]) the fact is stressed that the two are brothers, thus indelibly emphasizing the depravity of Cain-jealous enough to commit even fratricide. Within the story itself, Abel is a decidedly secondary character, providing the occasion for the main action.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Abel gets brief but significant mention, first by Christ himself. In parallel passages from Matthew 23:35 and Luke 11:51, Jesus draws on the Abel story to strengthen his diatribe against the scribes and Pharisees: “You serpents, you brood of vipers, how shall you escape the sentence of hell? ... [U]pon you may fall the guilt of all the righteous blood shed on earth, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zechariah” (Mt 23:33–35 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Abel thus becomes forever Exhibit A, an eternal symbol of the martyred righteous, slain by someone who hated him because his deeds were righteous and the murderer’s were evil (1 Jn 3:12).

The author of Hebrews contrasts the faith-oriented Abel with his works-oriented brother: “By faith Abel offered to God a better sacrifice than Cain” (Heb 11:4 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). In Hebrews 12 the author uses another allusion to Abel, this time contrasting him not with Cain but with Jesus himself: “And to Jesus, the mediator of a new covenant, and to the sprinkled blood, which speaks better than the blood of Abel” (Heb 12:24 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The writer is obviously alluding to the Genesis account of the Lord’s asking, “What have you done? The voice of your brother’s blood is crying to Me from the ground” (Gen 4:10). Abel’s blood called for vengeance, but Jesus’ blood spoke for forgiveness.

Close analysis of the Abel narrative emphasizes how prophetic are the words of Hebrews 11, with their assurance that “through faith, though he [Abel] is dead, he still speaks” (Heb 11:4 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Abel endures through the centuries as a symbol of obedience coupled with a righteousness-by-faith religion. Likewise, he represents those killed simply because they performed a righteous deed, innocent martyrs for God’s cause. Abel’s blood still cries from the ground, a cry of warning for those who oppose God’s people, a cry of hope for the slain righteous seeking vindication.

See also Cain.

ABHOR, LOATHE

The English words abhor and loathe translate biblical terms that connote the image of turning away from something because of extreme dislike or intolerance. These words are used in reference to both people and God. The primary actor where such language is involved is God, who loathes things of which fallen humans tend to be tolerant.

From the divine vantage point God is nauseated by any human activity that is not in accordance with his law (Lev 26:11; Prov 11:1; Ezek 23:18). Sin and idolatry are common targets of God’s abhorrence (Deut 7:25; 12:3). His disgust with them grows to the point where he cannot bear them any longer. God warns fledgling Israel to avoid adopting the customs of the Canaanites, whom he is about to drive out because he “abhorred them” (Lev 20:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 18:9, 12). He later warns his people that if they ignore his warnings and follow the surrounding nations in their idolatry, they too will be the recipients of his disgust (Lev 26:30).

Specific practices that God finds abhorrent include eating unclean animals (Deut 14:3), sacrificing flawed animals (Deut 17:1), cross-dressing (Deut 22:5), using a prostitute's fee as a religious offering (Deut 23:18), a husband's resuming relations with a wife whom he has divorced (Deut 24:4), dishonesty (Deut 25:16), lying (Ps 5:6), the religious ceremonies of unrepentant people (Amos 5:21) and nationalistic pride (Amos 6:8). In the book of Revelation Christ's spewing the lukewarm Laodiceans out his mouth is a gesture of disgust (3:16). While people apart from God often fail to perceive his judgments, redeemed humanity can learn to abhor—and thereby turn away from—those things God loathes (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 31:6; 97:10; 119:104; Amos 5:15; Rom 12:9).

People too loathe things in the Bible. After raping his sister Tamar, Amnon abhors her (2 Sam 13:15). The sores of Job are loathsome (Job 2:7), and the suffering Job finds both food (6:7) and life (7:16; 9:21; 10:1) loathsome. His family and friends, in turn, find Job loathsome (Job 19:17, 19). People under stress loathe food (Ps 107:18). In Amos's picture of a society that has lost its moral bearings, people actually "abhor the one who speaks the truth" (Amos 5:10), and in a similar picture Micah pictures a nation of people "who abhor justice and pervert all equity" (Mic 3:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In contrast, Ezekiel paints pictures of penitents who loathe themselves for their evil deeds (Ezek 20:43; 36:31).

See also Disgust, Revulsion; Holiness; Idol, Idolatry.

ABOMINATION

From the broadest perspective an abomination is something loathsome and repulsive according to one's cultural and religious values. For the Egyptians the Israelites were an abomination because they were shepherds, an occupation they despised (Gen 46:33–34). For the Israelites an abomination was ritually unclean food (Deut 14:3). For the fool it is turning away from evil (Prov 13:19); and for the wicked and righteous it is each other (Prov 29:27).

From the biblical perspective an abomination callously disregards and actively disdains the values God has established. It affronts God's holiness, sovereignty as Creator and purposes expressed in the Law. There is an irony in the image of abomination. It is not chosen in brazen rebellion against God, but is perceived within the values of the offender as the good and right thing to do. Thus the sacrifice of the wicked (Prov 15:8), the prayer of the lawbreaker (Prov 28:9) and blemished sacrifice (Deut 17:1) are abominations, although their practitioners do not perceive themselves as committing an abomination. Idolatry and its related immorality (Deut 27:15; Jer 13:27; Rev 17:4–5) and witchcraft and sorcery (Deut 18:10–12) characterize dismissal of God's sovereignty. Failures of God's people to separate from pagan practices that are in conflict with the Law (Ezra 9:1) are abominable, as are such practices as lying, arrogance, evil plans, murder (Prov 6:16–19; Rev 21:27) and sexual aberrations (Lev 18:6–23). Images of peril accompany abomination, for those committing abominations are subject to the wrath and judgment of God (Ezek 7:1–4).

The ultimate image of abomination is the Abomination of Desolation, an image of horror from 167 b.c. when Antiochus IV Epiphanes placed an altar to Zeus on the altar of God in the Jerusalem temple (Dan 9:27; 11:31; 12:11; 1 Macc 1:54, 59; 2 Macc 6:1–2). For Judaism and Christianity this abomination was paradigmatic and prophetic of an evil, pagan individual or force arrayed against God and his people and usurping God's rightful worship by desecrating the temple. In the Gospels, Rome's destruction of Jerusalem and the temple (Mt 24:15; Mk 13:14; Lk 21:20) was just such an abomination. This abomination underlies the eschatological images of the man of lawlessness (2 Thess 2:3–4), the antichrist (1 Jn 2:18; 4:3), the great whore (Rev 17:4) and the beast (Rev 13).

See also Abhor, Loathe; Antichrist; Disgust, Revulsion; Holiness; Idol, Idolatry; Temple.

Bibliography D. Ford, The Abomination of Desolation in Biblical Eschatology (Washington, DC: University Press of America, 1979).

ABRAHAM

To biblical writers Abraham has more than historical status. He captures their imagination as an image of various spiritual themes in both Old and New Testaments. The character of Abraham has multiple dimensions that can be plotted in terms of the rhetorical or persuasive purposes of the biblical writers.

The Portrait in Genesis. In Genesis, Abraham is presented as the important forefather to whom God gives promises and with whom God makes a covenant. At times the content of this promise or covenant is not specified. On most occasions it is linked to a specific element: either the promise of land (Gen 12:7; 13:14–15, 17; 15:7, 18; 17:8); the promise of seed (Gen 12:2; 13:16; 15:5, 18–21; 17:2, 4–7, 16, 19; 22:17); or the promise of covenant (Gen 17:7, 19, 21). Abraham is also promised blessing for all the nations (Gen 12:3; 18:18; 22:18; 26:4; 28:14).

The second most frequent image for Abraham in the book of Genesis is as an example of obedience (Gen 12:1–4; 17:1, 23; 18:19; 22:16–18; 26:4–5). Abraham is portrayed as one whose obedience was essential to his relationship with Yahweh and to the relationship of his descendants to Yahweh. This does not mean that Abraham is presented as perfect, for on two occasions his deceit is highlighted (Gen 12:10–20; 20:1–18). Although the faith of Abraham is assumed in his obedient response to Yahweh's call to Palestine, this is emphasized only in Genesis 15:6. However, later in the Bible it becomes a major part of the imagery surrounding Abraham.

The blessing of all nations through Abraham is highlighted not only in general statements in the book of Genesis but also in his role as intercessor for his nephew Lot. This intercession is first seen in Genesis 14, where he saves Lot from the hands of foreign kings. It reaches a height in Genesis 18 as he pleads with Yahweh on behalf of Lot, leading to Lot's rescue from the city of Sodom. This role of intercession for the nations is founded on the fact that Yahweh considers Abraham his confidante (Gen 18:17).

Complementing the more spiritual side of Abraham-as the recipient of divine promise, as example of obedience and faith, as intercessor-is the social dimension of this patriarch. Abraham is a domestic hero in Genesis. As in Homer, "home" means possessions as well as family. Abraham is consistently shown in his domestic roles-as husband, uncle, father, clan leader and possessor of flocks and herds. As clan leader Abraham is diplomat to a series of august figures, including kings and the priest Melchizedek. As owner of goods Abraham is linked with the images of sheep and goats, flocks and herds.

There are, finally, the literal images that dominate the story of Abraham in Genesis. The backbone of the plot is the journey motif, which in turn produces the specific images of desert, water/wells, camels and donkeys, physical movement, tents and a proliferation of specific place names (either geographic locales or towns, both of which give the story an international flavor). The story is also a quest story, as the hero from start to finish is in quest for a son, descendants and a land. The progressive revelation of the covenant is likewise a major plot motif, and this quest generates a conflict within Abraham between faith in God's promises and a tendency toward expediency.

The extravagance of God's covenant promises is linked to images of the stars of the sky, the sand of the seashore and the dust of the earth. Abraham's religious devotion to God is most consistently linked with images of altar and sacrifice and, in the climactic episode (Abraham's offering of Isaac to God), with a mountaintop. The contractual language of obligation and reward permeates the passages in which God renews his covenant with Abraham. Related to the covenant motif is the importance of characters' names (and changes in those names) in the story. Finally, the divine-human encounter is a central motif in the story, and close scrutiny of the text shows how much of the action is embodied in conversations between God and Abraham instead of through direct narration of events.

Other Old Testament Images. Elsewhere in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , Abraham retains the motifs of Genesis, but the imagery surrounding him expands. As in Genesis, the rest of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] portrays Abraham most often in association with the promises of the covenant. This connection is rarely to the promises in unspecified terms (Ex 2:24; 2 Kings 13:23) or linked to the covenant (Deut 29:13). The majority of references are linked to the promise of land (Ex 3:16; 6:3, 8; 32:13; 33:1; Lev 26:42; Num 32:11; Deut 1:8; 6:10; 9:5; 30:20; 34:4; 1 Chron 16:15–18; 2 Chron 20:7; Neh 9:7–8; Ps 105:8–11, 42–44; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 51:2; Ezek 33:24) and a few to the promise of seed (Ex 32:13; Lev 26:42; Josh 24:2–3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Neh 9:23; Is 51:2; Ezek 33:24). As can be seen in both Isaiah 51:2 and Ezekiel 33:24, the Abrahamic covenant of seed was very comforting to those who had experienced the pain of exile. The blessing of all nations through Abraham receives little notice (Ps 47:9).

Abraham as obedient forefather is rarely highlighted in the rest of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . An exception is the prayer in Nehemiah 9:7–8, which claims that God found Abraham's heart faithful, a term for a good covenant partner (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 7:9; Is 49:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 78:8, 37). This faithfulness of Abraham becomes the basis on which the promise of the land is secured.

Alone and in series with the other patriarchs, Abraham's name is used to identify the God of Israel: God of Abraham (Ps 47:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 29:22); God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Ex 3:6, 15; 4:5; 6:3); God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel (1 Kings 18:36; 1 Chron 29:18; 2 Chron 30:6). This connection of Abraham with the name of God accentuates the foundational role that Abraham plays in the establishment of the covenant between God and Israel.

Abraham is presented at times as progenitor of the Israelites (1 Chron 1:27, 28, 34; Ps 105:6; Is 41:8; 51:2; Jer 33:26). This connection is not merely biological but also has spiritual implications and connects the Israelites with the promises and covenant established between God and Abraham.

Because of his role in the establishment of covenant and promise for Israel, Abraham's name appears on many occasions as the foundation for mercy to Israel. When requests for deliverance are made, the appeal is grounded in Abraham (Ex 32:13; Deut 9:27; 2 Chron 20:7; 30:6; Neh 9:7; Ps 105:42). When prophecies or promises are given announcing salvation, Abraham is mentioned (Lev 26:42; Is 29:22; 41:8; 51:2; Jer 33:26; Ezek 33:24; Mic 7:20). When historical events are recounted where God brought salvation, Abraham is highlighted (Ex 2:24; 3:16; 6:3; 2 Kings 13:23). Abraham thus serves an important role in the ongoing relevance of the promises and covenant in the life of the nation. He becomes an indispensable image for deliverance for Israel. Only once is Abraham mentioned in the context of judgment: in Numbers 32:11, where those who disobeyed at Kadesh Barnea are banned from seeing the promised land. Even in this context, Caleb and Joshua are mentioned as receiving the promise.

Abraham played a role as intercessor for the nations, and this was traced in Genesis 18 to his status as confidante of God. This status, afforded to only one other individual in the history of Israel (Moses, in Ex 33:11), may be reflected in two instances outside of Genesis in which Abraham is called “the friend of God” (2 Chron 20:7; Is 41:8).

Abraham in the Writings of Paul. Hansen (158—60) has surveyed the use of the image of Abraham in Paul by highlighting three purposes: soteriological, ecclesiological and missiological. Paul uses Abraham at the service of his soteriology by citing him as a scriptural argument for justification by faith. At the same time, Paul also uses Abraham to defend the inclusion of the Gentiles among the people of God (ecclesiological) and for his own mission to the Gentiles (missiological). The second two are so interrelated that they can be covered together. The keynotes of Paul’s references to Abraham are the motifs of faith and promise.

Faith, which is largely implicit in Genesis and absent in the rest of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , forms the cornerstone of Paul’s use of Abraham as an image of faith in contrast to the law and circumcision, with special focus on Genesis 15:6 (Rom 4:2—5; Rom 6—12). Circumcision serves merely as a “seal” of the righteousness of faith (Rom 4:11).

In Paul the promise of land, so important in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passages, is left to the side, while the promise of seed is focused not only on the nation of Israel but expanded to include the Gentiles. Although Abraham is considered the physical progenitor of the Hebrew people (Rom 4:1; 9:7; 11:1; 2 Cor 11:22), this aspect is set aside by Paul in favor of a focus on Abraham as spiritual progenitor of a spiritual race. The seed of Abraham (Gal 3:29) consists of those who are of the faith mediated through the one seed, Christ (Gal 3:15–18). This seed is not the children of the slave girl but rather of the free woman (Gal 4:21–31), a contrast between biological and spiritual seed (Rom 9:6–9). The promised blessing of all nations is seen as fulfilled in the Christian church as the Spirit received by the Gentiles by faith (Gal 4:13). Thus the Abrahamic promises and covenant are used by Paul to include the Gentiles among the people of God.

Other New Testament References. The rest of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] shares some of the emphasis of Paul. Though lacking the Pauline focus on the Gentiles, several passages share with Paul the thought that the physical seed of Abraham does not equal spiritual seed (Mt 3:8–9; Lk 3:8; Jn 8:33–58). Similarly, Hebrews 11:8–19 gives us a picture of Abraham as a hero of faith in a manner similar to passages in Romans and Galatians.

Elsewhere the NT [NT NT. New Testament] expands the image of Abraham beyond Pauline limits. While Hebrews 11 expresses Abraham's faith similar to Pauline passages, James 2:18–26 is distinct. As with Hebrews 11, the focus is on the sacrifice of Isaac on Moriah, and as with Paul there is a particular interest in Gen 15:6; but the faithful obedience of Abraham is inseparable from his faith and is seen as the expression of it. In fact, as James relentlessly pursues his theme that faith without works is dead, he actually reaches the conclusion that Abraham was justified by works as well as faith.

As in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the NT [NT NT. New Testament] uses Abraham in epithets that identify God (Mt 22:32; Mk 12:26; Lk 20:37; Acts 3:13; 7:32), and Abraham is pictured as the progenitor of the Hebrew race (Mt 1:1, 2, 17; Lk 3:34; Acts 7:2–8, 16, 17; 13:26; 19:9; Heb 2:16).

Additionally, Abraham is viewed in Luke 1:54–55, 67–79 as the foundation for benefits on his descendants.

In the Gospels the promise of seed is defined as spiritual seed. This promise is important to the picture of Abraham as the father of faith in Hebrews (Heb 6:13–15; 11:11–12, 17–19), as is the promise of land (Heb 11:8–10, 13–16), which is also seen as spiritual in fulfillment. Christ as the ultimate seed of Abraham is legitimized by his connection to the patriarch (Mt 1:1, 17; Lk 3:34) although Christ is seen as transcending Abraham (Jn 8:39–58).

The blessing of the Gentiles is highlighted in Acts 3:25. But in contrast to Paul, Peter is citing Genesis 22:18 rather than Genesis 12:3, and his speech is focused more on the privileged position of the Jews in Jerusalem on that day than the result on the Gentiles.

Finally, some minor uses of Abraham include Peter's mention of Sarah's obedience to Abraham (1 Pet 3:6), Jesus' reference to Abraham as an eschatological figure in whose bosom the righteous dead rest (Mt 8:11; Lk 13:28; 16:22–25, 29–30) and the connection with Melchizedek in Hebrews 7:1–9 to argue for the superiority of Christ to Aaron.

See also Covenant; Genesis; Seed.

Bibliography. G. W. Hansen, Abraham in Galatians: Epistolary and Rhetorical Contexts (Sheffield: JSOT, 1989); R. A. Harrisville, The Figure of Abraham in the Epistles of St. Paul: In the Footsteps of Abraham (San Francisco: Mellen Research University Press, 1992); G. E. Mendenhall, "The Nature and Purpose of the Abraham Narrative," in Ancient Israelite Religion: Essays in Honor of Frank Moore Cross, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] P. D. Miller, P. D. Hanson and S. D. McBride (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1987) 337–56; A. T. Lincoln, "Abraham Goes to Rome: Paul's Treatment of Abraham in Romans 4," in Worship, Theology and Ministry in the Early Church, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] M. J. Wilkins and T. Paige (Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); S. Sandmel, Philo's Place in Judaism: A Study of Conceptions of Abraham in Jewish Literature (augmented edition) (New York: KTAV, 1971); J. Van Seters, Abraham in History and Tradition (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1975).

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM

The term bosom (sometimes also rendered “lap” or “side”) translates several Hebrew words and one Greek word. In most cases in both languages the image connoted is of a warm, secure place in which one lies or is carried (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Num 11:12; Ruth 4:16; Is 40:11; 49:22; Mic 7:5; Jn 1:18; 13:23). Occasionally it represents the seat of internal thought or emotion (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Job 19:27; Eccles 7:9; Ps 79:12; Prov 21:14).

The more specific phrase “Abraham’s bosom” occurs only twice in the Bible, both in Jesus’ parable about the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19–31). Abraham’s bosom is the warm, secure place of high honor—since Abraham was the father of the Jews—where the poor beggar Lazarus is taken by the angels at his death, in contrast to the rich man who had ignored Lazarus in life, who ended up in “Hades” (Lk 16:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The two places are distinguished from each other, and there is a great gulf that cannot be crossed between the two (Lk 16:23, 26).

The origin of the imagery is much discussed, but it probably combines the idea of John 13:23 of a guest’s place of honor at a banquet, where the guest would recline next to the table with his head near or touching the host (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 21:20) with the idea of a child lying in a parent’s bosom or lap (see Jn 1:18, where Jesus is in his Father’s bosom).

Because of the distinction in Jesus’ parable between Abraham's bosom and Hades (or hell), the term has been understood as a synonym for paradise or heaven, and it has been used as such in Western literature (Jeffrey, 11). The image also found its way into a well-known spiritual, "Rocka My Soul in the Bosom of Abraham," with essentially the same meaning.

See also Afterlife; Heaven.

Bibliography. "Abraham's Bosom," DBTEL [DBTEL DBTEL. Dictionary of Biblical Tradition in English Literature] 11.

ABSALOM

Although we may not remember his name or deeds, most of us will never forget the astonishing picture of Absalom: arms flailing, mule slipping out from under him, long hair held fast in the unrelenting clutches of a great oak. Absalom has his hair cut annually, each haircut yielding 200 shekels (about 5 pounds) of hair (2 Sam 14:26).

Absalom was King David's third son. Scripture records two main incidents from his life. In the first his half-brother Amnon (David's first-born) rapes his sister Tamar and then throws her out of his chamber in utter humiliation and shame. This double offense leads to Absalom's killing Amnon before all their brothers two years later. The second event is Absalom's conspiracy and unsuccessful attempt to usurp David's throne. When this conflict culminates in battle, Absalom meets his end "hanging between heaven and earth." Technically, he is caught by his head, not his hair (2 Sam 18:9), and is killed by Joab's spears, not the tree (2 Sam 18:14).

From these accounts Absalom emerges as a ruthless and calculating individual. His essences are vengeance, greed and power fixation. (Ironically, his name means "the father of peace"). His crimes of murder and conspiracy were long premeditated—years in each case. Yet David’s affection for Absalom was so great that in his grief he wailed, “If only I had died instead of you—O Absalom, my son, my son!” (2 Sam 18:33).

ABUNDANCE

Abundance in the Bible is of two types—physical, or earthly, and spiritual. The two are interrelated, for earthly abundance is consistently portrayed as a blessing from God, who gives it as a reward for covenant keeping or simply out of grace. On a spiritual level the vocabulary of abundance is related to such large and overriding issues as salvation, miracles, reward, evil and honor to God. References are found in both Testaments, and some images recur as themes in both. Overall, images of abundance are used in the Bible primarily as a means of inspiring worship or of encouraging obedience to God.

Physical Abundance. We could predict that images of abundance in an agrarian society would lean heavily in the direction of nature, crops, weather, livestock, produce and food. The Bible confirms this. At a physical level, abundance is associated with grain (Gen 41:49), water (Num 24:7; Deut 28:47), cattle and sheep (1 Kings 1:19), produce (1 Chron 12:40; Neh 9:25), food (Job 36:31; Ps 78:25), rain (Pss 65:10; 104:16) and crops (Prov 14:4). At a more commercial level, abundance is associated with building materials (2 Chron 11:23), money (2 Chron 24:11), riches (Ps 49:6; 52:7), jewels (Prov 20:15) and mercantile goods (Ezek 27:16). In the martial world of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , the spoils of war (2 Chron 20:25) and a supply of weapons (2 Chron 32:5) can be abundant. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] counterpart of the American dream of a car in every garage and a chicken in every pot is inviting a neighbor to sit under one’s own vine and fig tree (Zech 3:10).

In keeping with the whole orientation of the Bible to place human and earthly life against a backdrop of spiritual reality, images of physical abundance are often linked to God's blessing on righteousness. In Deuteronomy God promises abundant blessings to the children of Israel if they obey, but punishment if they disobey. He brings the nation to the "good and spacious land" of Canaan, "a land flowing with milk and honey" (Ex 3:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) where if they please God, "the Lord will open ... his rich storehouse, the heavens" to give blessings to them (Deut 28:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). However, if they do not return thanks by serving "the Lord [their] God joyfully and with gladness of heart for the abundance of everything," God will give this abundant blessing to be enjoyed by other peoples (Deut 28:47–68).

Such a thing happened when both the Babylonians and the Persians took over Israel after Israel's disobedience. To King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon, Israel's conqueror, God gave great power, providing him with "the kingdom, the power, the strength, and the glory," so that "wherever the sons of men dwell, or the beasts of the field, or the birds of the sky, he has given them into your hand and has caused you to rule over them all" (Dan 2:37–38 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Similar power and luxury were given to King Xerxes of Persia, who threw a lavish party to display "the riches of his royal glory and the splendor of his great majesty." The banquet is described as being held on "couches of gold and silver on a mosaic pavement of porphyry, marble, mother-of-pearl, and colored stones," where drinks in golden vessels served vast amounts of wine (Esther 1:4–7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

However, before the children of Israel disobeyed, God did bless them abundantly, especially through Solomon, the son of David who had pleased God so much with his heart for God. It pleased God greatly that Solomon asked for wisdom instead of riches, so God promised to bless him. He “gave Solomon wisdom, discernment, and breadth of mind as vast as the sand that is on the seashore” (1 Kings 4:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In addition, however, God promised to also give him what he did not ask for, namely, “both riches and honor all your life; no other king shall compare with you” (1 Kings 3:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The country itself also had a share in that blessing, becoming “as numerous as the sand by the sea; they ate and drank and were happy” (1 Kings 4:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In response to God’s great blessings, Solomon responded properly by giving back to God as abundantly as he had received. Following his father’s covenant with God that his son would build a house for God, Solomon constructed an elaborate temple in which nearly every article was overlaid with gold (1 Kings 6:21–22). The riches with which the temple was decorated were so elaborate that “Solomon left all the utensils unweighed, because there were so many of them; the weight of the bronze was not determined” (1 Kings 7:47 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Then the temple was dedicated with an elaborate ceremony in which many people gathered to witness the sacrificing of so many sheep and oxen that “they could not be counted or numbered” (1 Kings 8:5). God responded faithfully, expressing his pleasure by filling the house of the Lord with such an intense cloud of his presence that the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud, “for the glory of the Lord filled the house of the Lord” (1 Kings 8:10–11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thus, God demonstrated that he rewarded obedience with abundant blessing.

God's Abundant Kingdom. One of the chief uses of images of abundance occurs in God's references to his chosen people and all that he promises them. Although images of abundance occur in reference to how God's people will be blessed if they obey, they also occur in reference to the numbers of God's chosen people. When God promises Abraham that he will make him the father of many nations, he explains the number of his descendants in terms of plenty. God declares, "Count the stars, if you are able to count them.... So shall your descendants be" (Gen 15:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The beginning of this proliferation of Israelite people happens in Egypt, when the seventy people who followed Joseph into Egypt became a large number because they were "fruitful, and increased greatly, and multiplied, and became exceedingly mighty, so that the land was filled with them" (Ex 1:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Thus, God begins to fulfill his promise to make Abraham's descendants abundant in number.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , God promises similarly that many are waiting to be saved. Looking out at the multitudes of people who were longingly seeking truth, Jesus commented to his disciples, "The harvest is plentiful, but the workers are few. Therefore beseech the Lord of the harvest to send out workers into His harvest" (Mt 9:37—8 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). In John, Jesus observes similarly that the fields "are white for harvest" (Jn 4:35). Therefore, God promises the believer hoping to evangelize that there are an abundance of people waiting to become children of God.

Spiritual Meanings. The imagery of an abundant harvest also appears in the Bible as a metaphor for spiritual realities. On the negative side the great wickedness of the earth is sometimes portrayed with the imagery of abundance. In the time of Noah “the wickedness of humankind was great in the earth” (Gen 6:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Joel speaks of wickedness as ripening the human race for the last judgment: “Put in the sickle for the harvest is ripe. Go in, tread, for the wine press is full. The vats overflow, for their wickedness is great” (Joel 3:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The picture of Babylon in Revelation 18:11–13 is couched in the imagery of abundance symbolic of the fullness of evil on the earth, and the sins of Babylon are “heaped high as heaven” (Rev 18:5).

More often, though, the imagery of abundance is reserved for spiritual goodness. God’s steadfast love (Ps 5:7; 69:13) and goodness (Ps 31:19; 145:7) are both abundant. So is his mercy (Ps 51:1; 69:16) and power (Ps 147:5). Isaiah speaks rapturously of the abundance of God’s “salvation, wisdom, and knowledge” (Is 33:6). In the spiritualized world of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we are not surprised to read about “abundance of grace” (Rom 5:17), abundant consolation through Christ (2 Cor 1:5), an apostle’s “abundant love” for one of his churches (1 Cor 2:4), “abundant joy” (2 Cor 8:2), faith that “is growing abundantly” (2 Thess 1:3), and such Christian virtues as grace, peace, mercy and love that exist “in abundance” (2 Pet 1:2; Jude 2).

Jesus and the Abundant Life. The imagery of abundance is also a special feature of the earthly life and ministry and teaching of Jesus, who says, “I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly” (Jn 10:10 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). We find the imagery of abundance in the miracles Jesus performed, symbolic of the magnitude of the promised blessings that Jesus was able to provide. When confronted with a hungry multitude of people, Jesus transformed five loaves and two fishes into enough food to feed five thousand men along with additional women and children (Mt 14:15–21). In fact, there was such abundance that afterward twelve baskets of leftovers were collected. Similarly, when the disciples could catch no fish on their own, Jesus commanded them to put their nets down into deep water, where they surprisingly caught so many fish that their nets began to break, and they filled two boats “so that they began to sink” (Lk 5:4–7).

In his parables, too, Jesus was fond of images of abundance—a hundredfold harvest, a mustard seed that becomes a tree reaching into heaven and providing habitation for birds, a messianic banquet, stewards who double their master’s investment.

Heavenly Abundance. The crowning example of abundance appears in Revelation 21:9–27, where John describes the city of New Jerusalem that God has prepared for those who know him. The great glory of God gives her a brilliance “like a very costly stone, as a stone of crystal-clear jasper” (Rev 21:11; see Jewels and Precious Stones). It is 1500 miles long and appears like “pure gold, like clear glass” (Rev 21:16, 18). The foundation of the city wall is equally beautiful, being “adorned with every kind of precious stone”: jasper, sapphire, chalcedony, emerald, sardonyx, sardius, chrysolite, beryl, topaz, chrysoprase, jacinth, amethyst (Rev 21:19–20). Thus this passage predicts the consummation of the many promises of the Bible: abundant blessings await those who have faithfully obeyed God.

See also Banquet; Blessing, Blessedness; Fill, Fullness; Harvest; Land Flowing With Milk And Honey; Paradise; Storehouse.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES

The book of the Acts of the Apostles is a tale of two cities—

Jerusalem and Rome (and we can note in passing that the world of the book of Acts is a largely urban world, in contrast to the prevailing agrarian world of the Bible up to this point). The narrative begins with Peter and the disciples in an upper room in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost and ends with Paul under house arrest in Rome. Of course these cities are symbolic as well as literal: Jerusalem symbolizes the Jewish context for the genesis of Christianity; Rome, the Gentile world to which the gospel would be taken. The geographical transfer is also a theological transfer from Hebraism to Christianity. As the narrative moves from Jerusalem to Rome, simultaneous antithetical impulses are at work. The story begins with a group of people (Peter and the disciples) but ends with one individual (Paul), while at the same time the number of converts increases from few to many. The effect is one of simultaneous contraction (in the number of protagonists) and expansion (in the number of converts).

In this narrative that connects Jerusalem and Rome, Luke characteristically patterns his story with care and artistry. Like its antecedent the Gospel of Luke, the book of Acts is structured as a quest. In the prologue Luke characterizes the ensuing story as a teleological journey that will make the disciples “witnesses in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria and to the end of the earth” (Acts 1:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Within the framework of the book of Acts itself, “the end of the earth” is Rome; from there, the gospel is taken to the far reaches of the Roman Empire and eventually beyond. In fact, the story of the early church is the logical sequel to the story of Christ’s earthly life and ministry in the Gospels (Acts 1:1–2). In keeping with the conventions of a quest story, the book of Acts is permeated with the image of the journey. Once the missionary journeys of Paul take center stage in chapter 13, the conventions of the travel story take over, including the familiar emphasis on geography and specific places.

Yet this archetypal quest narrative appears unusual to modern eyes in at least two ways. There is first the overwhelming multiplicity of self-contained incidents and protagonists between the beginning and the end. There is also an apparent lack of resolution and closure in Paul's lingering imprisonment at the story's end. The narrative lacks the obvious unity of a single protagonist and the classical sense of "beginning, middle and end" that characterize most traditional narratives. Still, the story is purposeful and unified.

The outward movement of the church is structured as a succession of waves. The broadest scheme is a threefold one: events in Jerusalem (Acts 1–5), the church's mission in Palestine and Syria (Acts 6–12), and the mission and imprisonment of Paul (Acts 13–28). The outward expansion of the church is also structured as an ever-widening spiral built around the following pattern: Christian leaders arise and preach the gospel; God performs mighty acts through them; listeners are converted and added to the church; opponents (usually Jewish) begin to persecute the Christian leaders; God intervenes to rescue the leaders or otherwise protect the church.

Another source of unity and purpose in Acts is the foils that Luke employs so effectively. One pair of foils is Stephen and Saul (Acts 7:1–8:1). After Stephen recounts the history of the Jews' rejection of God's messengers culminating in their crucifixion of Jesus, the text records that "the witnesses laid down their garments at the feet of a young man named Saul," who "was consenting to his death" (Acts 7:58; 8:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). With consummate artistry Luke focuses on Stephen and Saul, the believer and the persecutor. The foil is made even more poignant in retrospect when, on his way to Damascus, Saul, like Stephen before him, has a vision of the resurrected Christ (Acts 9:1–6). The characters of Stephen, the Jewish convert, and Saul, the later apostle to the Gentiles, parallel the larger structure of Acts, looking back to Jerusalem and forward to Rome.

Peter and Paul are also foils. Peter is the protagonist in the first twelve chapters; Paul, in the remaining chapters. Peter is the inspired but “uneducated” (Acts 4:13) preacher at Pentecost and speaker at the Jerusalem Council; Paul, the masterful orator of many sermons delivered across the Mediterranean world and finally in Rome. Peter is a bridge to Paul, whose conversion is reported well before Peter’s departure from the narrative. In addition, Peter comes to understand that the gospel is for Gentiles too (Acts 10:11–35), while Paul is the Apostle to the Gentiles. Luke thus transfers the mantle of protagonist from Peter to Paul, who will take the gospel from Jerusalem to Rome.

Within the larger bimodal framework of Jerusalem/Rome and Peter/Paul, Luke unifies Acts with a series of images. The most obvious image in the early portions of the narrative is light and its variant fire (about ten references). The church is initiated by the “tongues of fire that separated and came to rest on each of [the disciples]” (Acts 2:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Presumably this phenomenon was one flame that subsequently divided into separate flames to rest on each disciple’s head. The fire symbolized the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:4). The image of light reappears at the martyrdom of Stephen when he gazes into heaven and sees “the glory of God, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God” (Acts 7:55 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is likely that, as elsewhere in the Scriptures, the glory of God is represented in part by radiant light, and that Stephen has a beatific vision dominated by light.

Even more dramatic than the light at Stephen's death is the blinding light that struck Saul to the ground when he was on his way to Damascus (Acts 9:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 22:6). Paul later described it as "a light from heaven, brighter than the sun, shining round me" (Acts 26:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As at Pentecost this use of light is a beginning—at Pentecost, of the church, and here, of Paul's conversion and subsequent apostolic ministry. Other instances of light, such as that on the night of Peter's escape from prison (Acts 12:7), further unify the narrative in Acts.

A second image pattern is prisons and jails, so frequent as to become one of the prominent visual images in Acts. In fact, the last eight chapters, apart from the travel interlude, are set entirely in prisons and courthouses; even on board ship Paul is a prisoner. There are approximately twenty references to prisons and ten each to gates, doors and guards. In several prison incidents Luke gives us dramatic, even ironic images of open and closed doors. In one incident the Sadducees arrest the apostles and put them in jail in Jerusalem; but overnight an angel opens the prison doors and takes them out, giving them an "open door" to preach the next morning at the temple courts (Acts 5:18—23).

An even more dramatic incident is Peter's miraculous rescue from prison, where despite being guarded by four squads of soldiers, Peter is led past an iron gate that opens of its own accord (Acts 12:1—11). In the sequel to the rescue from prison—Peter's difficulty in joining a home prayer meeting—Rhoda, in her surprise, ironically leaves Peter standing at a closed door (Acts 12:12—16). In one of Paul's imprisonments a violent earthquake shakes the prisons and opens the doors, leading the Philippian jailer to think that suicide is his only recourse (Acts 16:20—39). But the open door of the gospel proves to be more important to the jailer than the open doors of the prison. While prison scenes recur with some frequency in Acts, it is the irony of the open doors that the reader remembers—open prison doors and opportunities for Peter and Paul to preach the gospel. The only prison door that does not open is Paul's in Rome; however, Paul's witness while under house arrest in Rome spreads the gospel throughout the Roman Empire—another “open door,” this one at the end of the book of Acts.

Some of the motifs that unify the book of Acts are the conventional ones in an adventure story. These include danger, narrow escapes, voyages, shipwrecks, rescues, riots, imprisonments, escapes, martyrdoms. Adventure stories stress variety, and Acts runs true to form with its variety of urban settings (a virtual roll call of the major cities of the ancient Mediterranean world) and physical places (temples, prisons, courts, deserts, ships, seas, barracks, theaters).

The forensic imagery of trial and defense, as well as oratorical situations, are master images in the book of Acts. They are accompanied by elaborate attention to dramatic effects—descriptions of settings, direct quotation of speeches, and stationing and gesturing of characters. Nearly 75 percent of the book is devoted to dramatized speeches, most of them having the character of a defense. The metaphoric overtone of the trials and defenses that pervade the book is that the gospel itself is being tried and defended.

While a first reading of the book of Acts may give the impression of a loose narrative that lacks the control of Luke's Gospel, a more careful reading suggests that Luke is very much in control of his material. Acts does not come to a complete conclusion with all of the loose ends neatly tied; rather we are left with the “inconclusive conclusion” of Paul's imprisonment and the knowledge that the gospel will go forth from that place despite Paul's incarceration. In a sense the book of Acts never ends. It has much in common with the serial story that ends with the formula "To be continued." In another sense, however, Luke writes a very tight narrative. He provides structure and order for the narrative in the unifying motifs of light and prisons, journeys and defenses. He patterns events in the form of a quest with a specific goal. Perhaps most dramatically, he sets the world of Acts between two cities. Peter begins the narrative in Jerusalem, and Paul carries it to Rome. This tight, bimodal pattern may well suggest God's providential oversight, with the inconclusive ending suggesting the ongoing responsibility of God's witnesses to carry on the task others have started.

See also Door; Luke, Gospel of; Pentecost; Quest; Travel Story.

ADAM

Adam is a leading figure in the Western literary and theological imagination, and he is a paradox, being both the original innocent and the archetypal sinner. In the Bible's story of creation, fall and redemption, he is the prototypical human figure. His biblical stature far exceeds the dimensions suggested by the relatively few times his name appears as a proper name in the Bible (between one and two dozen, depending on the English translation), for his presence is frequently evoked in imagery, motifs and allusions.

The principal features of Adam the archetype are shaped from the rich textual soil of Genesis 1–5. The common Hebrew word 'ādām, which becomes the proper name Adam, is used within these chapters in its generic sense of "human," or with the definite article as "the human," prior to its emergence in the text as a proper name for the first male human. The point at which 'ādām should be treated as a proper name is not agreed upon by translators, and English translations will vary in where they shift from “man”/“human” to “Adam.” But the fact that the final Hebrew text of these chapters identifies Adam as a specific person allows some justification for our grouping all of these references under the imagery of Adam.

Adam as Divine Image. Adam is first and foremost related to God. In the spare and schematized language of Genesis 1, Adam is the fleshly distillation of the creative and divine word, stamped with the divine image. In the concrete portrayal of Genesis 2, Adam’s form is shaped by the Divine Potter’s hands, animated by the divine breath blown into his nostrils. Against the canopy of space and the topography of earth-beating, swarming and lumbering with fertile and fantastic life—Adam stands in unique relationship with God. The divine image in man and woman (Gen 1:27) simultaneously evokes and deconstructs the role of an idol in the ancient world. No stone or wood chiseled into a godling’s image, “the Adam” in two-male and female—is an animated, walking, talking and relating mediation of the essence, will and work of the sovereign creator God. As living image of the living God, Adam bears a relationship to God like that of child to parent. He is made for intimate, reciprocal relationship with God, designed for relationship with his created others and born to the divine and creative vocation of earth-care and earth-filling (Gen 1:28).

With Adam’s privilege comes responsibility. The image of Adam as one who receives divine commandments is a significant feature of the Genesis account. The divine command “not to eat” has as its corollary the universal human responsibility before God in the specific commandments given to Israel at Sinai.

Earthy Adam. Adam is shaped from the dust of the ground. This relation to the earth is subtly reinforced for the Hebrew ear in the assonance of 'ādām “human” and 'ādāmâ “ground” (Gen 2:7). It is then sealed in the tragic epitaph, “dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return” (Gen 3:19 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The narrative offers no overt physical description of this man (we are left to assume he bears the features of everyman), but again the Hebrew 'ādām/'ādāmâ word play resonates with 'dm, “to be red,” suggesting a rusty shade of soil. This relation of Adam to earth, soil and field is one aspect of Adam’s relation to the entire created order.

While Genesis clearly speaks of Adam’s “rule” over the creation, it is a theme set in the context of dependence. Adam is a dependent consumer, an aspect brought out in two images: seeing and eating. God provides him with trees pleasant to the sight and good for food. Adam partakes of creation through eye and mouth and shares in the pleasure of God by seeing the creation and calling it good. Clearly he is dependent on the creation for his own physical sustenance, but there is also a sense that Adam without a creation that is a “delight to the eye” is an Adam somehow diminished.

In the Genesis 1 creation account, Adam emerges as “the human” (hā'ādām, Gen 1:26–27), differentiated as male and female in gender and sexual identity (Gen 1:27). As the apex of the unfolding creative activity of God, both man and woman are commanded to “fill the earth,” “subdue it” and “rule” over every living thing. For these image bearers of the sovereign Creator, a principal expression of that image is an active rule that represents the loving dominion and care of God over the wonders of creation. Adam, true archetype of humankind, is appointed vice-regent in the territorial dominion of God. Male and female are regal figures, empowered, anointed and charged with exercising the benevolent rule of their cosmic Creator Lord. With a mere handful of deftly ordered words, the lofty bearing, stature and commission of ancient oriental kingship is breathtakingly disassembled and the royal crown placed on the sturdy heads of everyman and everywoman.

In the narrative of Genesis 2 the Adamic rule is expressed in three concrete activities: (1) cultivating or “serving” ('ābad) the garden; (2) keeping, or “guarding” (šāmar) the garden; and (3) naming (qārā' ... šēm) his fellows in the community of animate life. We enter the world of a splendid royal garden of grand proportions, stunning in design and irresistible in appeal, over which a king has set his vice-regent to till, to protect and to explore by naming.

In his “tilling” or “serving” (the Hebrew word 'ābad can mean either), we see Adam entering into the ongoing divine work of maintaining the fertility and productivity of the garden. It is an agricultural image in which Adam's relation with the land is portrayed from a farmer's or game warden's standpoint, a complement to the divine “planting” (Gen 2:8) and “shaping” of beast and bird (Gen 2:19). But Adam is not just a laborer; he is an “eater,” a consumer of the fruitful trees. Nor is Adam simply a consumer; he is one whose eye delights in the beauty of the trees as living signatures of the benevolent and creative artistry of God (Gen 2:9). A priestly overtone to this work also emerges—a double meaning of 'ābad is probably intended, as we will see—with Adam mediating God's care for the creation. Adam is also a protector of the garden, one who “keeps” or “guards” (šāmar) by watching over its welfare and integrity and defending it from any harmful and destructive forces, whether lurking within or intruding from without.

Adam's commission to “name” engages him in what we have come to call science but what the ancients knew as wisdom. To know is to name; to name is to know and express the essential nature of someone or something. The divine Creator falls silent and observes as the creatures parade past Adam and as Adam perceives and orders this world of wonders into a relational taxonomy radiating from his personal point of reference. Adam is the true prototype of the royal wisdom of Solomon, who “would speak of trees, ... of animals, and birds, and reptiles, and fish” (1 Kings 4:33 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But in all of Adam’s naming of birds and cattle and creatures, which too are formed “out of the ground” (Gen 2:19), he does not find a true other, “a helper as his partner” (Gen 2:18, 20) in life and royal mission.

Adam as Husband. Of Adam’s actual naming the creatures, the text is silent. But when he finds his “help meet” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), “one like unto him,” Adam turns from namer and taxonomist to poet, shaping simple words of delightful discovery into parallel verse:

This at last is bone of my bones
and flesh of my flesh;

this one shall be called Woman,
for from Man this one was taken.

(Gen 2:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

This exclamation is affirmed and universalized in the narrator’s voice: “Therefore a man leaves his father and his mother and clings to his wife, and they become one flesh” (Gen 2:24 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). From the one human is formed another, their differentiation and deep relationship reflected in two new names set side by side: iš “man” and iššâ “woman.” As two genders they reunite as “one flesh.” In some deep and mysterious sense Adam truly finds himself in relationship with Eve. Together, same bone and flesh, they form and generate community in their fruitfulness and multiplication (Gen 1:28). This archetypal image of union—man and woman as one flesh—is the cell structure out of which the organism of human society and culture is built.

Father Adam. Adam is imaged as the father of us all, the progenitor of all humanity. From the union of Adam and Eve, “the mother of all living” (Gen 3:20), comes Cain, then Abel, then Seth and then other sons and daughters. This proliferation of “seed” is in keeping with the divine commandment for Adam to “be fruitful and multiply and fill the earth” (Gen 1:28). Throughout the early chapters of Genesis we find the seed of Adam multiplying, then nearly exterminated in the Flood, and then multiplying again to fill out the roll call of nations in Genesis 11. But Adam’s fatherhood is a blessing dulled by pain as Cain murders Abel and becomes a “wanderer on the earth” (Gen 4:14). Fresh hope is found in the birth of Adam’s son Seth (Gen 4:25–26), who is happily dubbed “a son in his likeness, according to his image” (Gen 5:3). Here, perhaps, is the first aspirant to that “offspring of the woman” who will crush the head of the serpent (Gen 3:15).

The fatherhood of Adam, a relationship of the one to the many, is a hallmark of his biblical stature. At key points the biblical story will depict a “one” related to the “many,” whether Abraham to his seed, corporate Israel to the nations, or Christ to Jews and Gentiles; and it is the archetype of Adam that foreshadows the relationship and stamps its imprint on the text of the story.

Tragic Adam. Adam defines the nature of tragedy for the biblical story. He is the model of a man blessed with peace and intimacy with God. Fertile land bursting with life, water flowing fresh from its springs, trees laden with good fruit and pleasant to the eye, animal life fantastic in form and coexisting in neighborly peace, and a woman created for fulfilling union as “one flesh”—all of these gifts image the goodness of God and his love for Adam and the rest of creation. But Adam’s reaching for the forbidden fruit epitomizes the irrationality and recklessness of the alien power of sin, as well as its seeming irreversibility. By taking and eating, an avalanche of consequences is set in motion. Adam’s relationships with God, Eve, himself, earth and creatures are all fractured.

The image is not so much of “fall” as of exile and alienation. Eden is not abolished, but Adam is banished. He is exiled from the divine presence, the tree of life, and the garden of paradise. A shadow of alienation hovers over his relationship with God, with Eve and with his son Cain. The three principal relationships of Eden that compose the core of the imagery of blessing—his relationship with God, with other humans and with the creation—each come to bear the sign of an indelible curse. What Adam thinks or feels can only be teased from his minimal speech and actions. But there are no more words of delight, only words that distill fear (“I was afraid, ... I was naked, ... I hid myself,” Gen 3:10) and evasion (“the woman whom you gave ... she gave,” Gen 3:12). However the resolution of this story is to be worked out, it must pass through the pain of suffering and of death.

Adam and Israel. Adam is Scripture’s archetypal human through whom we are to see and measure the human predicament. But the human predicament and hope is more finely delineated in the figure and story of Israel, and the archetype of Adam is implied in a variety of images and aspects of Israel’s story. The story of Adam provides a lens through which to view Israel.

The image of Adam is passed on to his son Seth (Gen 5:3), but Adam as the archetypal man of the biblical story also projects his image on subsequent figures and narratives that unfold in the generations of Scripture. The Adamic motifs in the story of Noah have frequently been noted. Noah is memorably set in relationship with God, the creation and his surviving community. Stepping forth from the ark, Noah, a new progenitor of humanity after the great judgment, is commanded, as was Adam, to “be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth.” Even his sovereign relationship with the animals is reminiscent of Adam’s, though now marked by “fear and dread” (Gen 9:1–4).

But the scriptural imprint of Adam’s image does not stop with Noah. Emerging from the primeval history (Gen 1–11), the text’s eye scans the multitude of nations and singles out one individual with a peculiarly Adamic stature. From the east, the direction of Adam’s exile (Gen 3:24), Abraham moves west toward a land of promise, a land for the moment ironically desolated by severe famine (Gen 12:10) and somewhat less than Eden. Abraham hears the word of God and obeys. He lives in memorable relationship with a woman, Sarah, and together they struggle to “be fruitful and multiply,” to produce descendants as numerous as the sand of the shore and the stars of the sky. The promise that Abraham and his seed will be fruitful, multiply and inherit the land is repeated at strategic moments in the Genesis ancestral narrative (Gen 12:2–3; 17:2, 6, 8; 22:16–18; 26:3–4, 24; 28:3; 35:11–12; 47:27; 48:3–4). In Abraham’s response to God’s word rests the future blessing of the nations. These Adamic motifs subtly adorning the story of Abraham set up overtones of recapitulation in this overture of redemption.

As Abraham’s progeny generates Israel, so Israel’s story and symbols also evoke Adamic motifs. Most notable are the concentrated correlations between Eden and Israel’s sanctuary. The gold and onyx of Eden reappear in the tabernacle, where gold is found in abundance and onyx stones are now engraved with the names of the sons of Israel (Ex 28:9–12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 25:7). The tree of life is symbolized in the branched and flowering lampstand (Ex 25:31–40). Plants are carved into the wooden walls and doors of Solomon’s temple—palms, flowers and gourds (1 Kings 6:29–35)—their profusion evoking a garden setting in which the priests serve (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 52:8; 92:12–14). And in the outer court the pillars and “sea” are decorated with lilies, pomegranates and gourds (1 Kings 7:18–22, 24, 26).

There are no animals on the carvings of the inner chambers, but in the outer court real animals are abundant as sacrifices, and the archetypal figures of bulls and lions are represented in art (1 Kings 7:25, 29, 36). Cherubim are found amid the palms and flowers in the inner chambers, on the curtains and veil of the tabernacle (Ex 26:1, 31; 36:8, 35), and on top and outstretched above the ark of the covenant (Ex 25:18–22; 1 Kings 6:23–28). Their presence evokes the guardians stationed at Eden’s east entrance (Gen 3:24; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 28:14), and their features, suggested by other texts (Ezek 10) and ancient Near Eastern art, are a composite of beast (lion, sometimes the bull), bird (eagle) and human images.

The fount of water that arises in Eden and feeds four major rivers is thought by some to be symbolized in Solomon’s massive “sea” of water (1 Kings 7:23–26). Though this bronze basin clearly served a practical purpose in temple service, there is good reason to believe that against the backdrop of ancient Near Eastern mythology it symbolizes the waters of chaos that Yahweh has subdued and now channels to nourish the earth (see Keel, 136–138, 142–43).

This, together with the ritual significance of the spring of Gihon at the foot of Mount Zion (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 2:13; 1 Kings 1:33, 38, 45; 2 Chron 32:30; 33:14), inspires the river imagery of the Psalms (Ps 46:4; 74:13–15) that is associated with Zion and temple. It is this river imagery that once again erupts in Ezekiel's vision of the eschatological temple, where a mighty tree-lined river now originates from beneath the temple threshold (Ezek 47:1–12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Zech 14:8; Rev 22:1–2), nourishing trees and aquatic life along its eastward flow. Finally, the entrance to the Jerusalem temple and its inner courts and chambers are oriented toward the east, recalling the situation of Eden's gate.

The commission of Adam to till, or serve ('ābad), and to protect, or guard (šāmar), the garden are functions also associated with levitical and priestly duty (for guarding the sanctuary, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 1:53); and Adam's ordering of the animal world by naming corresponds with the priestly assignment of distinguishing clean from unclean animals and judging what is appropriate for sacrifice. The cultic representation of Israel that culminates in the actions of one purified and holy man, the high priest, who enters the Holy of Holies once a year, is replete with Adamic symbolism. The adornment of the high priest symbolizes the regal glory of Adam (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 28:13), whom later Judaism could describe as clothed in light. The sanctuary of the Lord, God's symbolic dwelling place within Israel, among whom he will “walk” (Lev 26:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 3:8), images the hope and promise that Israel as a new Adam will return to Eden. This biblical correlation between priest and Adam has an afterlife of imagery in the pseudepigraphal Jewish text (c. 250 b.c.), the Testament of Levi 18:10, where the “new priest” will “open the gates of paradise,” “remove the sword that has threatened since Adam” and “grant to the saints to eat of the tree of life.” The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sanctuary symbolism of the high priest as Adam, serving in the presence of plants and animals, suggests a poignant backdrop to Paul's declaration that "the creation waits in eager expectation for the sons of God to be revealed" (Rom 8:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The imagery of Adam in Eden, focused and articulated in the sanctuary symbolism, may be observed in the broader patterns of Israel's life as a corporate Adam before God. Israel is given in trust a fertile land, its edenic fruitfulness (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Joel 2:3) imaged in pomegranates, grapes and figs, and "flowing with milk and honey" (Num 13:23, 27). As he did for Adam, God offers to Israel blessings, but he also commands "thou shalt not" (Gen 2:17; Ex 20:1–17) in the memorable form of law. The theme of divine commandment finds its corollary in the edenic commandment not to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. As in Eden, so in Israel: obedience to God's commandments, including a right and wholesome relationship with the land, will bring blessings epitomized as life in a peaceful community, a prosperous land and the presence of God (Lev 26:3–13; Deut 28:1–14). Disobedience will lead to a curse, summed up as death and precipitating in broken community, exile (to the east) from the good land and loss of the glorious presence of God from Israel's midst (Lev 26:14–33; Deut 28:15–68).

Adam Restored. Israel's understanding of Adam as the progenitor of all humanity is clearly explicated in the Genesis text, and it forms the background of Psalm 8's reflective wonder at humanity's place in the created universe:

When I consider your heavens,
the work of your fingers,

the moon and the stars,
which you have set in place,

what is man that you are mindful of him,
the son of man that you care for him?

(Ps 8:3–4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

But the “man”/“son of man” of this psalm is not simply universal and abstract humanity. A particularism is implied as the psalmist speaks on behalf of a specific community that confesses allegiance to “our Lord” in contrast to its Lord’s “enemies,” “foe” and “avenger” (Ps 8:1–2). For the psalmist the most prominent embodiment of “man”/“son of man” is Israel, the chosen people from amidst the nations, whose preeminence is represented and symbolized in the Davidic king of the psalm’s superscription. The Adamic imagery of glory, honor and creational rule is cut to fit the figure of Israel before it is released to any other nation, people or community.

A similar understanding informs Daniel’s vision of four composite and horrible beasts, representing Israel’s enemy empires who arise from the primordial sea. They are vanquished by “one like a son of man,” a heavenly human figure who represents or embodies Israel, God’s true humanity (Dan 7). The corollary of Adam ruling over the beasts is Israel subduing and ruling over the nations. This understanding of Israel’s elect Adamic role is amply testified in the literature of Second-Temple Judaism (see Wright, 23–26) and is well illustrated by texts from the Dead Sea Scrolls, where the sectarian Jewish community, regarding itself as the true Israel within Israel, expects to receive the blessed restoration of Adam’s glory (1QS 4:23; CD 3:20; 1QH 17:15; 4Q171 3:1).

The prophets, in speaking of the eschatological renewal of Israel's land and of the entire creation, unfurl lavish imagery of a renewed paradise with Israel as God's redeemed Adam, the true humanity, exalted over the nations. Isaiah presents us with striking images of this renewal:

The wolf will live with the lamb, ... The cow will feed with the bear, ... and the young child put his hand into the viper's nest. They will neither harm nor destroy on all my holy mountain. (Is 11:6—9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 65:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

I will open rivers on the bare heights, and fountains in the midst of the valleys....

I will put in the wilderness the cedar,
the acacia, the myrtle, and the olive;

I will set in the desert the cypress, the plane and the pine together.

(Is 41:18—19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

The Lord will surely comfort Zion ...

he will make her desert like Eden, her wastelands like the garden of the Lord.

(Is 51:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Like Adam, redeemed Israel is not truly and fully itself apart from paradise.

Adam and Christ. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the comparison of Adam and Christ and the imagery of Christ as a new Adam play a prominent role, particularly in Paul's letters. But it is not limited to Paul. Luke, for example, traces the genealogy of Jesus back to Adam, “son of God” (3:38) and draws us to consider the correlation between Adam and Christ. Adam as son of God is the father of the human race, and Jesus, whose divine sonship has just been declared at his baptism (Lk 3:22), is the progenitor of a new people that grows to include members from all nations (Lk 24:46–47). Mark also suggests Adamic imagery in his brief and teasing snapshot of Jesus in the wilderness “with the wild beasts” (Mk 1:13). Other Adamic allusions in the Gospels have been suggested, but it is Paul who rightly occupies our focus, for he most clearly develops the image in his christological typology of salvation.

Paul’s use of Adamic imagery is well developed in Romans. When Paul says that “all have sinned and fallen short of the glory of God” (Rom 3:23), he echoes Psalm 8:5, where the human figure is crowned with glory and honor, as well as Genesis 1:28. And when Paul speaks of people who have “exchanged the glory of the immortal God” for images of mortal humans and beasts (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 106:20), he is again informed by the figure of Adam. Humans are created to worship God, in whose image they are created and should ever grow in likeness. The entire creation has lost its original radiant glory and has been subjected to futility and decay (Rom 8:20–21).

In Romans 5:12–21 Paul develops a run of Adamic typology. The reign of sin and death is contrasted with the reign of grace, righteousness and eternal life. “Sin entered the world through one man, and death through sin, and in this way death came to all men because all sinned” (Rom 5:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Adam is portrayed as a figure whose actions, as the father of all humanity, have an ongoing effect through subsequent generations. It is as if his disobedience allowed the entrance of an alien and hostile force into God’s world, which all his descendants serve by their misdeeds. But if Adam's disobedience is the pattern and undoing of the many, Adam is also "a pattern of the one to come" (Rom 5:14), "the one man, Jesus Christ" (Rom 5:15) who will redeem the many.

If the story of the first Adam was a human one in relationship with God, the story of the second Adam is infused with divine grace and regenerative power as God uniquely embodies himself in the human story and transforms it. The legacy of sin, judgment and condemnation unleashed by the transgression of the first Adam is counteracted by the one act of righteousness, the obedience of Christ, the second Adam. Whereas death reigned through the first Adam, through the second Adam the many will themselves reign in life (Rom 5:17). Through the disobedience of the first Adam, many were made sinners; through the obedience of the second, many will be made righteous (5:19). The dark and degenerative rule of death is overthrown by the radiant and generative rule of life.

Adam, and Israel likewise, appears more covertly beneath the argument of Romans 7:7–12. Here the picture is of sinful passions aroused by the law and bearing fruit for death. The law said, "You shall not covet." But sin seized its opportunity in the commandment and "produced in me all kinds of covetousness" (Rom 7:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). An echo of Eden captured in this voice of Israel (for it is possible that Israel is individualized and speaking as "I" in Rom 7), whose experience with the law followed precisely this pattern. Rabbinic interpretation, in fact, understood the law to have existed prior to creation; thus the commandment to Adam not to eat of the tree (Gen 2:17) was viewed as an expression of Torah. When Adam ate, the consequence was death and exclusion from the tree of life, the same pattern of action and consequence laid out by the law and enacted by Israel in its tragic history.

In a redemptive vein Paul speaks of the emergence of a new humanity through the work of Christ: “our old man [Adam] is crucified together with Christ” (Rom 6:6). The corporate nature of this image is probably what informs the metaphor of the community as one body consisting of many members with complementary gifts and functions (Rom 12:4–8).

In 1 Corinthians 15 Paul uses Adamic imagery to speak of the resurrected Christ. The point of comparison begins with death and life: “For as in Adam all die, so in Christ all will be made alive” (1 Cor 15:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But it does not end there. Christ is resurrected and exalted, and through him the spiritual dominions, authorities and powers will be destroyed: “For he must reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet. The last enemy to be destroyed is death. For he ‘has put everything under his feet’ ” (1 Cor 15:25–27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). With the imagery “under his feet,” Paul first alludes to Psalm 8:5 and then cites the text. Christ as the last Adam is enthroned as cosmic Lord of the new creation. Thus not only are beasts and other creatures in submission under his feet but also the very cosmic powers and the “last enemy,” death.

The figure of Adam reappears several verses later as Paul is explaining the concept of a resurrection body. Quoting Genesis 2:7 he reminds readers that “the first man Adam became a living being,” but the “last Adam,” became “a life-giving spirit” (1 Cor 15:45 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Again, the first man was “natural,” “of the dust of the earth” and “earthly,” as are his descendants “who are of the earth” (vv. 46–48). The last Adam, however, is “spiritual” and “from heaven.” Those who share the life of the last Adam will be “of heaven,” for “just as we have borne the likeness of the earthly man, so shall we bear the likeness of the man from heaven” (v. 49). The human life of the old and the new creation shares in the qualities of its respective “Adamic” progenitors.

Paul frequently employs Adamic imagery in conjunction with glory imagery and the motif of transformation. In 2 Corinthians 3, he speaks of the fading glory of the old covenant under Moses in contrast with the surpassing glory of the new. Here the contrast is between Moses and Christ, but it seems evident that Adamic imagery lies behind the comparison, with Moses as the singular representative of Israel’s stature as a “new” Adamic people. In contrast with the radiance that faded from Moses’ face after his encounters with God, those who now reflect the Lord’s glory “are being transformed into his likeness with ever-increasing glory, which comes from the Lord, who is the Spirit” (2 Cor 3:18). They are on the true trajectory toward redemptive Adamic glory that radiantly reflects the image of God.

That image of God is first and foremost found in “the glory of Christ, who is the image of God” (2 Cor 4:4). The typology of old and new creation clearly surfaces in 2 Corinthians 4:6: “For God, who said, ‘Let light shine out of darkness,’ made his light shine in our hearts to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Christ, the last Adam, is the human image of the glory of God, the prototype of the new humanity that will inhabit the new creation. In view of this, the afflictions borne by the believing community are only “light” and “momentary,” the divine process of building a renewed and “eternal weight of glory” (2 Cor 4:17). While the “outer man” (anthrōpos) is “wasting away,” the emergent “inner man” is “being renewed day by day” (2 Cor 4:16). Thus Paul can say: “if anyone is in Christ—behold, a new creation! The old has gone, the new has come!” (2 Cor 5:17).

The theme of a new humanity shaped for a new creation emerges in Paul’s bold statements of unity. In Colossians 3:9–11 Paul speaks of believers having “stripped off the old man [palaion anthrōpon]” and “put on the new [man]” “which is being renewed in knowledge according to the image of its creator.” The two Adams clearly inform this language. The image is a corporate one, and in this new Adamic humanity, the divisions of the old Adamic family are overcome: “there is no longer Greek and Jew, circumcised and uncircumcised, barbarian, Scythian, slave and free” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gal 3:28, “neither male nor female”). A variation on this theme is found in Ephesians 2:14–15, where the division between Jew and Gentile is in view. Christ (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the last Adam) has created “in himself one new man [kainon anthrōpon] out of the two” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Paul’s portrayals of the preincarnate and “cosmic” Christ also employ Adamic imagery. In Colossians 1:15 Christ is “the image of the invisible God, the firstborn over all creation.” He is the heavenly, preexistent Adam, the prototypical image of God that finds its reflection in the human Adam. Likewise, in his redemptive work, Christ is “the head of the body, the church,” the community of the new creation, and “he is the beginning and the firstborn from among the dead” (Col 1:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). While the old Adam failed to fulfill his God-given dominion over the creation, Christ brings cosmic reconciliation and peace (Col 1:20). In a similar vein Philippians Paul 2:6 speaks of Christ being in the “form” (morphē) of God, a term probably intended as synonymous with the Adamic “image” (eikōn). Some interpreters of Philippians 2:6–11 have seen further allusions to Adam informing this versified story of Christ. Whereas Christ was in the form/image of God, he did not regard “equality” with God (“you will be like God,” Gen 3:5) as something to be grasped or exploited. In counterpoint to the Adam of Genesis 2–3, the preexistent Christ took the path of obedience. This entailed death on a cross, a death that reversed the consequences of the tragic death of Adam. Therefore Christ was “highly exalted” to a position of cosmic rule, with every power “in heaven and on earth and under the earth” in submission to him.

For Paul the biblical imagery of the first Adam and the creation finds a correspondence in the last Adam and a new creation. Christ as Adam is leading his people back to a renewed Eden. Nowhere is this biblical relationship more poignantly evoked than in Romans 8:19–23. The creation, subjected to futility and decay, “waits with eager longing for the revealing of the children of God” (v. 19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The children of the last Adam are the harbinger and hope of the new creation. The “groanings” and birth pangs of an emergent new humanity find their echo in the groanings of the whole creation, and the Spirit himself utters “groans” that words cannot express. This new creative work of God progresses through pain and affliction as God’s chosen ones are “conformed to the likeness” of the Son and eventually “glorified” (Rom 8:29–30).

See also Creation; Eve; Garden; Genesis; Temple; Tree of Life.

Bibliography. O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997); J. Levison, Portraits of Adam in Early Judaism (JSPSup 1; Sheffield: Academic Press, 1988); G. Wenham, Genesis 1–15 (WBC [WBC WBC. Word Biblical Commentary] : Waco, TX: Word, 1987); N. T. Wright, “Adam, Israel and the Messiah” in The Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 18–55.

ADOPTION

The Greek word hyiothesia (“adoption”) occurs only five times in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , all in the Pauline corpus (Rom 8:15, 23; 9:4; Gal 4:5; Eph 1:5), but its significance is great because of its conceptual and emotive power and its relationship to many other familial ideas. It never refers to a literal adoption but always to the blessing of God’s people by their heavenly Father. Adoption carries many associations in modern Western culture—both negative and positive—that may or may not have analogies in ancient cultures. Thus it is particularly important that we grasp the cultural and social context of adoption in the ancient world.

The background of the metaphor has been much debated. There are no instances of hyiothesia in the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] , and neither the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] nor later Judaism reports adoption legislation. In part this was because other customs such as polygamy, legitimate heirs by female slaves (Gen 16:1–5), “levirate marriage” (Deut 25:5–10) and apothrōpos (“guardianship”) in later Judaism met some of the same social needs. There seem to be a few instances of adoption in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , but these are always based on the laws of foreign peoples with whom the Israelites had contact (Gen 15:2–3; Gen 30:3; 50:23; Ex 2:10; Esther 2:7). The issue of adopting orphaned or unwanted children, particularly those unrelated by blood kinship, is not addressed.

Despite the lack of a formal adoption law, there was a clear sense of God adopting the king. Psalm 2 conveys the adoption of Israel’s king: “I [the Lord] have installed my king on Zion.... He said to me, ‘You are my Son; today I have become your Father’ ” (vv. 6–7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The adoption of the king as a representative of Israel may very well lie behind Paul’s use of the adoption language. This motif is made even more universal in the covenant language of 2 Samuel 7:14: "I will be his [the king of the Davidic line] father, and he will be my son." J. M. Scott shows that this adoption was later applied by Judaism not only to the Davidic Messiah but to the eschatological people of God.

Another influence on the development of the metaphor is the well-defined and frequently used adoption legislation of Greece and Rome. It is clear, however, that the sociolegal practice does not fully explain the Pauline usage. An equally powerful shaper of the image was the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and later Jewish belief that God was a Father who had called and redeemed, and who would bless, his children (Deut 32:6; 2 Sam 7:14; Ps 68:5; 89:26; 103:13; Is 63:16, 64:8; Mal 2:10). For Christians, Jesus' experience of (Lk 2:49; 3:22; 22:42; 23:46) and teaching about (Mt 5:45; 6:4–5, 8–9, 14–15, 18) his Father in heaven is pivotal. Those who are "in Christ" have been "adopted" as God's people in much the same sense as God redeemed Israel and made this people his "Son" (Hos 11:1).

In the ancient world family membership was the primary context of social, religious, economic and political security and fulfillment. To move from one family system to another was an event of life-changing importance. In this social context adoption is used in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] to communicate a whole set of nuances of God's blessing on his people. Adoption is listed among the greatest blessings of God upon Israel (Rom 9:4, "to them belong the adoption," NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and in the triumphant doxology of Ephesians 1:5, "adoption as his children" is named as a chief blessing of the gospel.

The sociolegal customs and the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] notion of the authority of God as Father combine to stress the authority of God as the adopter. Adoption is an expression of the electing love of God (Eph 1:5; Rom 8:29), which transfers the adopted child from the family of disobedience (Eph 2:2–3, where the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] translation unfortunately obscures the metaphor) to the family of God. Adoption is an image of redemption, not of creation. The adopted one has been graciously and marvelously freed from bondage and made God's child (Hos 11:1; Gal 4:5).

A major focus of the adoption texts is that the believer is adopted by virtue of union with Christ, the Son of God (Eph 1:5). This notion has no antecedent in the sociolegal practices of Rome or the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] world, though this has frequently been maintained. Rather, it derives from the central themes of Jesus' life and message (Jn 1:12, 18; 8:42–44). Life-changing Christian adoption is through Christ, the Son of God, the Messiah of Israel, who makes the last days' familial promises of God (Jer 3:19; Hos 1:10; 2 Cor 6:18) a present reality.

The presence of these blessings is witnessed to by the eschatological spirit of adoption, who assures God's children of their adoption. The child of God, confident of Father's care, cries out with the same words Jesus used, "Abba, father" (Lk 22:42; Rom 8:15). The use of the Aramaic abba is probably due to liturgical influences and indicates its centrality in the piety and worship of the earliest congregations. Family membership in the ancient world included not only the benefits of security but also the derivative benefit of liberty within the family. Using this powerful image, Paul proclaimed that God's child was free from the pursuit of righteousness through the law (Gal 3:16–24).

Ancient as well as modern adoption brings benefits as well as responsibilities of family membership. Similarly, Paul stressed the ethical obligations of the adopted child of God (Rom 8:11–15; Eph 1:4–5). The adopted child has inherited a new family narrative, Israel’s story, and is expected to live and act in accordance with that story and its ancestral exemplars like Abraham. This responsibility involves God’s child in a life of faith and a struggle with sin. It is not, however, a battle fought in fear. It is fought in the liberated confidence (Rom 8:15–16) of the coming victory in the consummation of adoption (Rom 8:23). This same assurance also carries God’s children through the agonies of suffering toward their glorious future when adoption blessing will reach its fullness (Rom 8:18–23, 28–30).

See also Daughter; Father; Mother, Motherhood; Orphan; Son.

Bibliography. J. M. Scott, “Adoption, Sonship,” DPL [DPL DPL. Dictionary of Paul and His Letters] 15–18.

ADULTERY

Both Old and New Testaments agree that adultery is sin. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] any married woman who has intercourse with a man other than her husband is guilty of adultery, as is any man who has sex with another man’s wife. But it is sometimes acceptable for a man to have multiple wives or concubines. Jesus holds up a more consistent standard in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , with both men and women called to be faithful to their one spouse (see Mt 19:3–9), and the Epistles set a high standard for sexual purity (1 Cor 6:18–20 and Heb 13:4).

The Bible’s most graphic teachings against adultery come in Proverbs 5:1–23 and 6:20–7:27, where images of injury, entrapment and death are used to underline the dangers and the sheer folly of adultery: “Can a man walk on hot coals without his feet being scorched? So is he who sleeps with another man’s wife” (Prov 6:28–29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “He followed her like an ox going to the slaughter, like a deer stepping into a noose... Her house is a highway to the grave” (7:22, 27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Adultery in the wisdom literature comes to picture hidden deeds, which are done in secret because the perpetrator senses they are wrong, and which inevitably are found out: “The eye of the adulterer watches for dusk; he thinks, ‘No eye will see me,’ and he keeps his face concealed” (Job 24:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The most striking example of adultery in the Bible is the story of David and Bathsheba (2 Sam 11:1–5), which has reverberated throughout literature and art and which remains the archetype for the respected religious or civil leader falling from favor through sexual sin. For all its brevity, the story is richly imaged, with pictures of a springtime setting, an afternoon stroll on the roof, the viewing of a beautiful woman bathing, the secret visit and the subsequent message that the woman is pregnant.

Equally evocative is Jesus’ internalizing of the principle of adultery with his comment in the Sermon on the Mount that “anyone who looks at a woman lustfully has already committed adultery with her in his heart” (Mt 5:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus’ teaching develops the concern clearly expressed in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] over one’s internal disposition. The words of Proverbs 6:25, “Do not lust in your heart after her beauty or let her captivate you with her eyes” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), make this concern clear.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] continues the figurative use of adultery when those who reject Jesus (Mt 16:1–4), those who choose friendship with the world (Jas 4:4) and those who follow false teaching (Rev 2:20–22) are called adulterous. A major image for apostasy in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is adultery. Finally, the book of Revelation symbolizes the ultimate end of all opposition to God when angels announce the fall of Babylon, “the great prostitute who corrupted the earth by her adulteries” (Rev 19:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Apostasy; Marriage; Prostitute, Prostitution; Sex.

Bibliography. R. C. Ortlund Jr., Whoredom: God’s Unfaithful Wife in Biblical Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997).

ADVENTURE STORY

The designation “adventure story” is a loose one that denotes a story having stock ingredients that evoke a certain atmosphere. The distinguishing feature of an adventure story is that it strikes a reader as extraordinary—beyond the commonplace routine. Adventure is synonymous with excitement. Variety of action and remoteness of setting are staples, as is the marvelous or miraculous. Conflict and danger are heightened, and spectacular feats are a regular feature. Surprise is a common element. Storms, disguises, shipwrecks, battles, journeys through dangerous landscapes, chases, hiding, arrests and escapes are frequent story material.

Elements of the adventure story are continuously present in the Bible. The quality of the marvelous and supernatural is present from start to finish by virtue of the fact that God is a continuous actor in the stories of the Bible. Miracles and larger-than-life events are the norm. The resulting world is one in which streams stop their flow, food miraculously appears, the earth opens up to swallow evil people and the dead are raised to life. Action is heightened in such a world. We are continuously surprised by events. Diverse types of story material are juxtaposed—for example, home versus battlefield, or a conversation with a spouse versus an encounter with God. Things keep changing as we turn the pages of the Bible. Life often seems like a continuous narrow escape in books such as the epic of Exodus, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] historical chronicles, the Gospels and the book of Acts. Settings familiar to the original audience are remote from the experience of a modern reader, making the action seem all the more adventurous.

Cataloging specific adventure stories in the Bible is superfluous. The elements noted above are common in biblical narrative, and the general quality of adventure is present as well. Most stories in the Bible have an affinity to the adventure story.

See also Quest; Travel Story.

ADVOCATE.

See Holy Spirit; Legal Images.

AFFLICTION

Affliction is understood in modern parlance as persistent suffering or anguish. So defined, it provides helpful insight into the varied biblical images of affliction. In the most fundamental sense, affliction is the mirror of fallenness within the creation. Although God created the world good (Gen 1–2), sin intruded after the Fall (Gen 3; Rom 8:20). Through Adam and Eve's rebellion (Rom 5:12, 19) humanity inherited a permanent state of affliction-sin-which is the cause of recurring suffering and sorrow. The general human condition is thus one of affliction. In addition the Bible contains more pointed images of affliction, specific manifestations of a fallen condition.

Scriptural images of affliction fall into three categories-physical, emotional and spiritual. While the Bible abounds in stories and pictures of affliction, we can get to the heart of the idea by examining the experience of two familiar characters': David in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and Paul in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

While many of the psalms (9; 36; 72; 107) speak of affliction, David's laments in Psalms 25 and 51 graphically portray his struggles with these difficulties. On the physical level the psalmist faces affliction as illness and distress (25:16—18, 20). He also fears the physical threat of his enemies (25:2). Emotionally, affliction is seen in David's contrite sinner's prayer in Psalm 51. His existential wrestling with sin captures the emotional component of affliction. Again the threat of enemies' unkind words or deeds have an impact and remain on David's mind (25:19). Spiritually, the psalmist seeks forgiveness of his sins (Ps 25:7, 11, 18) as relief for his afflicted condition (25:16—18; 51:1—4).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] six Pauline "catalogs of affliction" (Rom 8:35; 1 Co 4:9—13; 2 Co 4:8—9; 6:4—5; 11:23—29; 12:10) give a comprehensive overview of the difficulties the apostle faced. Each of these catalogs portrays a wide variety of physical dangers, emotional barriers and spiritual handicaps, ranging from "trouble" (Rom 8:35) to *"hunger" (1 Cor 4:11), *"persecution" (2 Cor 4:8) to "imprisonment" (2 Cor 6:5) and *"shipwrecks" (2 Cor 11:25) to "hardships" (2 Cor 12:10). These catalogs of affliction give images of the range of human affliction in the Bible.

The Bible relates three purposes for affliction. One is discipline. Since God is a Father, he disciplines his children when they rebel (Prov 3; Heb 12). Such discipline may be preventive, as in the case of Paul who was given a "thorn in the flesh" to prevent him from pride (2 Cor 12). However, the Bible clarifies that this discipline is not punitive. David was assured that though his son would die, David's adultery was forgiven (2 Sam 12:13—14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Cor 12:9–10). Therefore, disciplinary affliction reveals God’s love for his people.

Another purpose for affliction is sanctification. David’s affliction restored him to obedience (Ps 119:67), taught him God’s decrees (Ps 119:71), proved the power of Scripture (Ps 119:50, 92) and demonstrated God’s faithfulness (Ps 119:75). The Christian’s sufferings follow the pattern of Christ’s and thus confirm that one is united with him (Mk 10:39; Rom 8:17; 2 Cor 1:5; Phil 1:29; 3:10; 1 Pet 1:6–7; 4:1–2, 13). Paul indicates that suffering is necessary in the life of the Christian (Col 1:24). Affliction also increases a Christian’s capacity to know and enjoy Christ (Phil 4:12–13; Jas 1:2–5).

Some affliction is simply for God’s glory. Job’s affliction is the classic illustration. When Satan accused Job of only serving God because of his creature comforts, God allowed Satan to destroy them (Job 1:6–12). In the end Job got only questions from God, no explanation for why he allowed Satan to afflict him (Job 38–41). It was purely for God’s glory.

Affliction is not a one way street, for the Bible also presents a God who suffers. God is in anguish when his people sin (Gen 6:6–7; Jer 9:1–2). He is distressed when his people are oppressed (Judg 10:16; Is 63:9; Acts 9:4–5). In Christ he saved his people through suffering, identifying with their brokenness by himself taking on affliction (Is 53:1–4; Heb 4:14–16) and intercepting God’s wrath against their sin (Is 53:5–12).

To summarize, the Bible speaks of humans suffering affliction because of their iniquities (Ps 107:17). However, God “does not ignore the cry of the afflicted” (Ps 9:12); “he will defend the afflicted” (Ps 72:4). Ultimately, it is a privilege to suffer affliction (Phil 1:29) because the afflicted can take confidence in God’s promise that his “power is made perfect in [our] weakness” (2 Cor 12:9).

See also Oppression; Persecution; Suffering.

AFTERLIFE

The afterlife is a central image of the Christian faith. All human beings are destined to partake in the afterlife: heaven (paradise) for those who are in Christ, hell (punishment, absence from God) for the unregenerate. The final goal and reward for all Christians is eternity in the Lord's presence. Moreover, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (especially Paul) envisions the Christian life as one that already participates in the heavenly realities that are to be experienced fully only with the return of Christ and the resurrection of the body.

Old Testament Premonitions. OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images of the afterlife are impoverished compared to those of the NT [NT NT. New Testament]. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] picture of an afterlife is only modestly developed. Instead, the focus in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is more on God's care for his people in terms of earthly blessing, particularly land and offspring, and God's punishment of both unfaithful Israelites and pagan nations by exile or death.

Land and offspring are the content of God's promised blessings to his people as far back as Abraham (Gen 12:1–3). This two-fold promise to Abraham is reiterated throughout the patriarchal narratives and is a regular refrain throughout the history of the monarchy, including the prophetic literature: Israel's obedience insures her presence in the land, whereas her disobedience brings outside attack and eventual exile. Some have considered the land/offspring promise to Abraham as an implicit reference to an afterlife blessing for Abraham, since these promises were not fully realized until many generations after his death, but this is really quite removed from the more developed sense of the afterlife we find in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

Whatever scant reference to the afterlife there might be in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , one must at least conclude that it does not play the primary role that it does in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Furthermore, what little there is of the afterlife in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is of a varied and ambiguous nature. There are passages that suggest that death is the end, a few that seem to imply that consciousness continues after death and many others that are simply difficult to pin down precisely.

A common understanding of death in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is that it signifies final separation from the land of the living and even from God as well. We see this quite clearly in such passages as Psalms 6:5; 30:9; 31:18; Isaiah 14:11; 38:18—19 and Job 3:13—19. The key word used here is the Hebrew š e'ôl which, at least in these passages, refers to the unconscious, decaying (or sleeping, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 3:13) state of the body in the grave. The psalmist wishes not to go there, since no one remembers or praises God from the grave (Ps 6:5). For Job, as for Homer, the afterlife is a shadowy oblivion—a place where “the wicked cease from turmoil” and “the weary are at rest” (Job 3:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), “a land of gloom and deep shadow,” of “deepest night, of deep shadow and disorder” (Job 10:21—22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The best that can be said in this vision of the afterlife is that the troubles of life have ceased: “Captives ... no longer hear the slave driver’s shout.... [A]nd the slave is freed from his master” (Job 3:18—19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Other passages reinforce the relative paleness of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images of the afterlife, which picture the afterlife as something one would wish to avoid rather than look forward to (Ps 16:10; 86:13; 102:26). There is a sense in which the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery of afterlife is gripping precisely by virtue of its absence. Since there is no afterlife, these texts enjoin the readers to focus on their relationship to God in the here-and-now.

It would be wrong, though, to suppress the images of a positive afterlife that emerge occasionally in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament]. The writer of Ecclesiastes, in describing the moment of human death, differentiates between the dust returning to the ground and the spirit returning to God who gave it (Eccles 12:7). The accounts of how Enoch (Gen 5:24; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 11:5) and Elijah (2 Kings 2:1—18) are taken to heaven after their earthly lives seem to suggest some notion of conscious existence in a transcendent world. Some commentators argue on the basis of the imagery of the Psalms for a clearer belief in an afterlife than is sometimes granted. Psalm 1:3 compares the godly person to a tree whose leaves never wither, an archetypal symbol of immortality. Psalm 49:15 claims that “God will redeem my life from the grave; he will surely take me to himself” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); while in Psalm 73:24 the poet predicts, “Afterward you will take me into glory” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Psalm 16:10—11 claims that God “will not abandon me to the grave” but will instead “fill me with joy in your presence, with eternal pleasures at your right hand” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); Psalm 139:24 speaks of being led “in the way everlasting” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 12:28, which claims that “in the way of righteousness there is life; along that path is immortality”). The closest OT [OT OT. Old Testament] approximation to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] confidence and ecstasy about the afterlife is Job’s eschatological confidence that his Redeemer lives and that, after his skin has been destroyed, in his flesh he will yet see God (Job 19:24—27).

Several other OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passages hint at consciousness in the afterlife. In 1 Samuel 28:1–24 the witch of Endor calls up Samuel’s spirit at Saul’s request. (The condemnation of “a medium or spiritist who calls up the dead” in Deut 18:11 also seems to assume, but by no means clearly, the existence of an afterlife of some sort.) Saul requests Samuel to be called up so that he can ask him how he might defeat the Philistines, since God has turned his back on him (1 Sam 28:15). Samuel’s reply is one of judgment: Saul and his army will be defeated because he previously disobeyed God (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 13:1–15; 15:1–35). Here we see the imagery of the afterlife closely associated with judgment. A similar notion is found in Daniel 12:1–4, perhaps the clearest statement of the afterlife in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , especially verse 2: “Multitudes who sleep in the dust of the earth will awake: some to everlasting life, others to shame and everlasting contempt” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This imagery ties in somewhat with the passages cited above that speak of death as the end: death represents in some sense separation from God, either by nonexistence or “shame and everlasting contempt,” the latter clearly implying an afterlife.

Daniel 12:1–4 does not simply speak of judgment, however. Some of the dead will “awake” to “everlasting life.” The context of these verses is God’s end-time deliverance of his people, whether dead or alive. It is difficult to be precise about what it means for the dead to “awake” (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , a spiritual or physical existence), but it does seem clear that this afterlife deliverance is a “resurrection” of some sort. This imagery is equally prominent in Isaiah 26:19: “But your dead will live; their bodies will rise. You who dwell in the dust, wake up and shout for joy. Your dew is like the dew of the morning; the earth will give birth to her dead” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This may, however, refer to Israel's restoration as a nation rather than to a personal bodily resurrection. The passage parallels Ezekiel 37:12: "O my people, I am going to open your graves and bring you up from them; I will bring you back from the land of Israel" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The language of death and resurrection is employed to speak of Israel's return to the land after exile. Hence, afterlife describes the actual state of deliverance, in this case possession of the land. In Ezekiel and Isaiah we therefore have the juxtaposition of the here-and-now reward of land, so prominent throughout much of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , and the hereafter reward of the afterlife.

New Testament Certainties. The imagery of afterlife as deliverance is developed more fully in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , so much so that it forms one of the central foci of NT [NT NT. New Testament] soteriology. Imagery of the afterlife in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is both a future certainty and, for the believer, a present reality.

The future certainty of the afterlife for believer and unbeliever alike is a central NT [NT NT. New Testament] fixture. This afterlife is presented in two stages. The first stage concerns the state of the individual after death, what is sometimes referred to as the "intermediate" state. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] does not seem to present us with any sort of a complete image of the unbeliever during this stage, but it does point us in certain directions with respect to the believer's state upon death. Luke 16:17–31, for example, presents the enigmatic picture of Lazarus after death at Abraham's side (Lk 16:22), while the rich man is tormented in hell (Lk 16:23). Although the NT [NT NT. New Testament] does not fill in the gaps for us, "Abraham's side" is presented in rabbinic literature as the temporary abode of the righteous preceding their final vindication. It also seems from this parable that the unbeliever's intermediate state is in hell, but the details simply are not given to round out the picture fully (see Abraham's Bosom).

Paul gives a clearer picture of the state of the believer after death (Phil 1:21–24). Apparently, once Paul “departs” he is “with Christ” (v. 23). The context of this passage, however, is not really to expound on the precise nature of the afterlife but on Paul's firm conviction that he will remain in this life for the sake of the Philippian church. Hence it is difficult to make many firm pronouncements on the nature of the afterlife on the basis of this text. On the other hand it does seem clear that, at least for the believer, the intermediate state is one of blessing in Christ's presence.

Whatever ambiguity there might be surrounding the intermediate state is more than made up for when the topic turns to the final state of believer and unbeliever after Christ's return. The Second Coming of Christ is a regular refrain in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 24:1–35 and parallel passages; Jn 14:1–4; 2 Thess 2:1; 2 Tim 4:8; Tit 2:13), and with his coming is ushered in the full flowering of his kingdom, or in the language of Revelation 21:21 “a new heaven and a new earth.”

Nowhere does the Bible encourage the common picture of the afterlife as one of robed creatures, listlessly playing harps while seated on clouds. Rather, the afterlife is pictured as the final and complete return of God's people to the land, which was such a prominent mark of blessing in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . It is, according to Revelation 22:1–6, a return of sorts to the Garden of Eden, the original land of blessing. We see here the redemptive story of the Bible come full circle: deliverance in Christ is for the ultimate purpose of returning to God's people the original Edenic blessedness. The promise of land in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] was merely prelude to the heightened realization of the fulfillment of this promise of the afterlife in Revelation 21 and 22.

The actual pictures of the afterlife for believers stress six motifs. One is that the future blessed state of the redeemed is a state of triumph, usually pictured by the image of the crown (1 Cor 9:25; 2 Tim 2:5; 4:8; Jas 1:12; 1 Pet 5:4; Rev 3:11; 6:2) but also drawing on the imagery of reigning (Rev 2:26–27; 3:21) and judging (1 Cor 6:2–3). A second image is of the afterlife as a reward for endurance in the faith in the present life—a state that Jesus calls “the joy of your master” (Mt 25:21, 23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and that is elsewhere called simply a “reward”* (1 Cor 3:14; Rev 22:12) or “prize” (Col 2:18). Third, the glory that believers receive in the afterlife is permanent or unfading (1 Cor 9:25; 15:42–57; 1 Pet 1:4; 5:4). Fourth, the glory of the afterlife already exists in heaven—it is a mansion that Jesus has gone to prepare (Jn 14:1–3) and a state that is “reserved” for believers (1 Pet 1:4 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Fifth, a person is transformed into a higher state of being while retaining his or her personal and even bodily identity (1 Cor 15; Rev 2:17, which states that each saint in heaven is given “a new name” known only to that person and Christ). Finally, the future life of the saints in heaven is a condition of ongoing activity in a definite place, with emphasis on the experience of worship of God (Rev 4; 19:1–9).

There is still one more sense in which the NT [NT NT. New Testament] authors, particularly Paul, present a picture of the afterlife not simply as a future hope but as a present reality for those who are in Christ. Since Christ’s first coming the realities of the kingdom of God have begun to be realized in a heightened manner not known to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] saints (1 Pet 1:10–12; Heb 1:1–4). The coming of the kingdom, not merely in the future sense but as a present reality, is central to the gospel. To put the matter more concretely, the present reality of the kingdom is nothing less than the realities of the future kingdom breaking into the present world order. The manner in which the future afterlife is present in the lives of believers is made explicit in several Pauline passages. For example, the reality of our resurrection to a new life is so certain that Paul speaks of that resurrection in the past tense (Col 3:1–4). Paul's point seems to be that when one becomes united with Christ (Rom 6:5) that union has immediate implications. Since Christ has been raised from the dead, so also have those who are united to him. It is not that the believer's resurrection is solely a past event, but believers, by virtue of their union with Christ, participate now in that future reality. Likewise, Paul can assert in Ephesians 2:6 that believers are so united to Christ that "God has raised us up with Christ and seated us with him in the heavenly realms" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The believer's union with Christ is so intimate that he or she is, in some mysterious sense, already raised from the dead and sitting with Christ in heaven.

In keeping with the more detailed pictures of the afterlife in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , a definite understanding of hell as the afterlife of unbelievers also emerges. Mainly hell gives us reversed versions of the motifs already noted for the blessed in the afterlife. If heaven is a place "reserved" for believers (1 Pet 1:4 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]), blackest darkness is reserved for the reprobate (1 Pet 2:17; Jude 13). If bliss awaits the faithful, punishment awaits the faithless (Mt 10:28; Rom 2:8–9; 2:13; Rev 14:10). Light dominates heaven, but fire (Mt 5:22; 13:42; 18:9; Rev 20:14–15) and darkness (Mt 8:12; 2 Pet 2:17; Jude 13) prevail in hell. While the blessedness of heaven is unending, in hell it is torment that continues without respite (Mt 3:12; 25:41; 2 Thess 1:9; Jude 7; Rev 14:11).

Summary. Like many other motifs in the Bible, images of the afterlife show a distinct progression from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . In regard to the afterlife that awaits the redeemed of the Lord, this progression is a glorious illumination, as the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] preoccupation of the finality of the grave (with only occasional flashes of an immortal hope) gives way to rapturous pictures of a heavenly destination that itself becomes the goal of human exertion in this life. Added to this is the way the NT [NT NT. New Testament] views the afterlife as not only a future certainty but also a present reality. It is the vital, concrete presence of the afterlife in this life that shapes the very heart of Christian life and conduct for those who labor to enter the life to come.

The inverse of this is that the progression of the shadowy gloom of the grave in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] develops into an even darker NT [NT NT. New Testament] picture of hell as the place of punishment for unbelievers. On balance, then, biblical images of the afterlife partake of both hope and warning, and in both cases the pictures carry the force of a promise of what is to come.

See also Abraham's Bosom; Apocalyptic Visions of the Future; Blessing; End Times; Heaven; Hell; Judgment; Paradise; Resurrection.

AGE.

See World.

AGRICULTURE.

See Farming.

ALIEN.

See Foreigner; Legal Images; Pilgrim, Pilgrimage; Wandered, Wandering.

ALPHA AND OMEGA.

See Jesus, Images of.

ALTAR

Nothing is more prominent as a biblical image for worship and religious allegiance than the altar. It is no exaggeration to say that the most visible sign of one's devotion to the true God in the worship of the old covenant is the building of altars or traveling to them for acts of sacrifice or offering.

Altars in the Old Testament. An altar in the Bible is always "built" or "made," whether of earthen brick, undressed rock, or wood perhaps overlaid with precious metal. It is a raised platform (three cubits, or about five feet high, in the tabernacle design of Ex 27:1; ten cubits, or about seventeen feet high in Solomon's temple, 2 Chron 4:1) on which fire is kindled. The very form suggests a table or brazier (Is 29:2). The top four corners of many Israelite and Canaanite altars rose to points called *"horns." They were set beneath the open sky, whether in a field, a high place or a temple court, where their smoke could ascend unhindered to heaven. Their deliberate construction is indicated by verbs associated with them: they are "established," "set up," "placed" and "arranged"; and in their repair they are "healed," "renewed" and "purified." In fact, from Sinai on, their design is specific (Ex 27:1–8). Thus Ahaz goes afoul of divine holy order in commanding that an altar be built according to his sketch of one he saw in Damascus (2 Kings 16:10), and Solomon's brazen altar has outgrown the Sinai specifications.

The story of altars in Israel's worship inclines toward one altar in one place of worship: the central sanctuary of the Jerusalem temple (2 Sam 24:18–25; 2 Chron 18:21–30). An altar built at Bethel (1 Kings 12:33) or another holy place is, in the run of the biblical narrative, bound for destruction (1 Kings 13:1–3; 2 Kings 23:15). Thus it is no surprise to find in the biblical text that the plural altars is nearly synonymous with pagan influence and is frequently accompanied by verbs of destruction. Although an altar may be built by Abraham or Joshua or David or Solomon, it is always the “altar of the Lord,” dedicated to his worship alone. We get the sense of the altar as a focal point of life lived in covenant allegiance. Although Abraham erects a series of altars where he “called on the name of the Lord” and marked out the land of promise, the establishment of a central sanctuary defines a center in Israel’s map of holy space. Other sanctuaries and their altars, sacred places and ancient traditions competing for the title of “center” are implicitly or explicitly destined for destruction and ultimately cannot stand.

Biblical altars convey a number of meanings, but the central one is always the place of slaughter, the place of blood sacrifice. The Hebrew word for altar (mizbēah) comes from the word for slaughter (zābah). Yet, there are biblical altars on which other sorts of offerings are made. Besides the central altar of sacrifice in the courtyard, the temple also contained two altars in the sanctuary: a gold altar for the offerings of incense, which represented the prayers of the people ascending to the Lord, and a table for the perpetual offering of the “bread of the presence.” But those altars and the sacrifices presented on them were secondary in significance and location.

The chief officiants at the altar are the priests, who are assisted by the Levites. As holy representatives of Israel, they maintain the altar and its appliances, protecting its purity and the holy order of sacrifices. What is offered on this altar moves from Israelite family to male head to priest and to God. It is a place of holy interchange.

Israelite males present themselves, their offerings and their sacrifices by “going up” or “before” the altar, but the psalmist can speak of a joyous thanksgiving that takes them “around” the altar (Ps 26:6). “Going up” is particularly evocative of the ideal attitude for approaching an altar. In the spatial orientation of Scripture we can no more imagine “going down” to sacrifice (as if to a chthonic deity) than “going down” to Jerusalem. Biblical altars clearly lift our eyes upward. They follow the model of temples in the ancient Near East, which were constructed on high places, whether Mount Zion of Yahweh or the mythical Mount Zaphon of Baal. Whether constructed at five-foot height or on a raised platform, the altar thrusts the acts of worship upward toward the threshold of heaven. So in Ezekiel’s visionary temple (Ezek 43:17) the altar reaches by gradations to the height of eleven cubits, or about nineteen feet. It is mounted by steps facing east, and the offerer moves from east to west, as if to reenter the gates of Eden (see Adam; Garden).

The central purpose of the altar is the blood sacrifice. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the required sacrifice consisted of the blood of animals, which was either sprinkled against the altar or smeared on its horns, and the daily offering of lambs and doves at the altar continued into NT [NT NT. New Testament] times.

The first altar mentioned in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is the one Noah builds after the waters of the flood have receded (although the first offering to God is made by Cain and Abel, Gen 4:3–4). On it Noah offers a burnt offering, and the Lord, pleased with the sacrifice, makes his covenant with Noah, giving him and his descendants the right to eat the flesh of animals (Gen 8:20). From that point on, the eating of meat and the forming of covenants are nearly always associated with altars. The covenant between the Lord and the children of Israel is ratified when Moses sprinkles blood against the altar and the people (Gen 24:4–6), and the continuing covenant between the Lord and Israel is marked by the ongoing sacrifices at his altar.

An altar found at Megiddo with “horns” at its four corners.

Before the centralization of worship at the Jerusalem temple, there were many local altars. These were made either of earth or of unhewn stone in deliberate contrast to the golden idols of other nations (Ex 20:24–25). It is likely that every slaughtered animal was presented at some kind of altar. Later, when sacrifice was restricted to the single altar in the Jerusalem temple, that altar for burnt offering became the focus of Israelite worship. The bronze-covered acacia altar described in Exodus and the larger altars erected later were the scenes of the great moments in Israelite worship: the burnt offering every morning and evening, and the sin offerings and guilt offerings that removed impurity or made reparation for misdeeds. With the destruction of the temple and the loss of the altar of sacrifice, a great part of Israelite worship was made impossible.

Altars have several meanings beyond their association with blood sacrifice:

Monuments. In Genesis monuments are often made in the presence of God. Abraham and Isaac mark their encounters with the Lord by building altars (Gen 12:8; 26:25). In Joshua the Reubenites erect an altar on which no sacrifice will be offered as a sign of the unity of Israel (22:21–29).

Places of refuge. By clinging to the “horns of the altar,” a fugitive might gain asylum unless his crime was willful murder (Ex 21:14). Joab, for example, seeks sanctuary at the altar, although Solomon does not respect it. The horns of the altar were symbols of both power and protection.

Table for a deity. The altar as a table for a deity is clearly evoked in only a few contexts, but these might simply reveal a significance that was broadly assumed. Ezekiel 41:22 speaks of the altar as “the table that is before the Lord,” and the association is repeated in Malachi 1:7: “You place defiled food on my altar. But you ask, ‘How have we defiled you?’ By saying that the Lord’s table is contemptible.” In this vein we can understand the effect of Noah’s sacrifice to the Lord on his newly built altar: the smell of burnt offerings was pleasing to the Lord (Gen 8:21).

New Testament Usage. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the altar remains the place of sacrifice, but the sacrifice presented at the altar changes radically. “A pair of turtledoves or two young pigeons” are offered when Jesus is presented as an infant at the temple (Lk 2:24), but after that point the NT [NT NT. New Testament] sees the altar as the scene of a very different sort of sacrifice.

Jesus invokes the altar and the Holy of Holies in the sanctuary as the two principal features of the holy place—a place that has been profaned. His focus is not on the animals offered according to the law but on the blood of those martyrs whose sacrifices prefigure his own, “from the blood of Abel to the blood of Zechariah, who perished between the altar and the sanctuary” (Lk 11:51; Mt 23:35). In Revelation the slaughter offered before the altar is again that of the suffering witnesses, not of the sacrificial beast. The souls of the martyrs “who had been slaughtered for the word of God” speak from under the altar (6:9). There seems, however, to be no altar in the New Jerusalem, just as there is no temple, for the Lamb is enthroned, and there is no need for a place of sacrifice.

In Hebrews, Jesus himself is identified with the altar, and his single sacrifice is contrasted with the repeated offerings at earlier altars: "We have an altar from which those who officiate in the tabernacle have no right to eat" (13:10). This passage is the culmination of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] tendency to merge all the images of sacrifice into one in Jesus, who is the great high priest, the lamb of sacrifice, and here the altar as well. As altar, priest and sacrifice, Jesus unites all the images associated with biblical altars. He becomes the memorial of the new covenant, the place of sacrifice, and the place of asylum.

See also Sacrifice; Table; Worship.

AMBASSADOR.

See Authority, Human.

AMOS, BOOK OF

The dominant theme threading through the variegated fabric of Amos is that of impending judgment, balanced by a vision of restoration at the end. The reader is immediately introduced to Amos's several oracles of judgment with a striking metaphor: the God who served as Israel's shepherd has now become a roaring lion (Amos 1:2; 3:8). He is pictured as a God of judgment who threatens to do bad things to his disobedient people, while also exhorting them to corrective action. Throughout his satiric book Amos shows a dramatic flare for parody (echoing familiar formulas while inverting their effect). Accordingly, Amos proves to be a master of informal satire, a strategy that allows this untrained prophet from Tekoa to be the spokesman for social and spiritual protest.

Amos's prophecies are structured into four groups of collected oracles. The announced theme is followed by a series of eight oracles of judgment against the nations of Syro-Palestine (Amos 1:3–2:16). Using the common prophetic pattern of geographical orientation, Amos announces judgment on the nations surrounding Israel (including Judah), tracing a circle on the map before zeroing in on the northern kingdom, the main target of his prophetic ministry. A second group of three collections of oracles denouncing the many sins of Israel (Amos 3:1–6:14) follows, each composed with standard opening (Amos 3:1; 4:1; 5:1) and closing (Amos 3:11; 4:12; 6:7) formulas, and the whole unit terminated with a judgment oracle underscoring the certainty of Israel's invasion. A third group of oracles is cast in the form of five visions of coming judgment (Amos 7:1–9:10), each of which contains standard opening formulas (Amos 7:1, 4, 7; 8:1; 9:1). An interesting literary device within this group of visions is the insertion of a biographical notice (Amos 7:10–17) that serves as a hinge between the first three visions, detailing Israel's hopeless spiritual condition, and the last two visions, which predict Israel's imminent and certain judgment. A final section is a salvation oracle promising a future hope of restoration and everlasting blessings through the establishment of the kingdom in accordance with the promises in the Davidic covenant (Amos 9:11–15). The last two oracles of judgment from the preceding section are stitched to the closing salvation oracle via the repetition of such phrases as "in that day" (Amos 8:3, 9, 13; 9:11) and "the days are coming" (Amos 8:11; 9:13).

Additional examples of structural sophistication can be discerned within the individual collections. The opening series of oracles against the nations follow a common pattern: (1) an opening formula ("thus says the Lord" RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); (2) a balanced pair of clauses (“for three transgressions ... and for four”); (3) a set formula for judgment (“I will not revoke the punishment”); (4) a statement of indictment (in each case Amos lists only one of the announced four sins); (5) a list of judgments (beginning with the statement, “So I will send fire upon ...”). Again the judgment oracle of Amos 5:1–17 is given in chiasmic format: announcements of judgment (Amos 5:1–3, 16–17), call to repentance (Amos 5:4–6, 14–15), accusation and announcement of judgment (Amos 5:7–13) and two woe oracles containing the usual elements of invective, criticism and threat (Amos 5:18–26; 6:1–14).

In keeping with his posture as the plain-spoken prophet of informal satire, Amos (like Micah) uses the language and imagery of common speech. His judgment oracles are permeated with a pastoral tone filled with the sights and sounds of everyday life drawn from the natural and agrarian worlds, as we would expect from someone who was “among the shepherds of Tekoa” (Amos 1:1) and who identifies himself as “a herdsman, and a dresser of sycamore trees,” whom God took “from following the flock” (Amos 7:14–15). Accordingly we find references to threshing (Amos 1:3), lions (Amos 1:2; 3:4–5, 8, 12), a cart loaded with grain (Amos 2:13), a bird in the trap (Amos 3:5–6), the shepherd and his pasture (Amos 1:2; 3:12; 7:14–15), threshing (Amos 1:3), a shepherd’s rescue of a sheep (Amos 3:12), rain and harvest (Amos 4:7; 7:1), gardens and vineyards (Amos 4:9; 5:11, 17; 9:13, 14), the sycamore tree (Amos 7:14), blight and mildew (Amos 4:9), locusts (Amos 4:9; 7:1), ripe fruit (Amos 8:1–2), and horses and plowing (Amos 6:12).

His observations on life are far-ranging. In the social sphere he warns the idle rich concerning their greed and ill-gotten luxuries (Amos 3:10, 12, 15; 5:11; 6:4–6; 8:5), their drunkenness (Amos 2:8, 12; 4:1) and immorality (Amos 2:7), and above all, their injustice toward the oppressed poor (Amos 2:7, 8; 3:9; 4:1; 5:7, 10–12; 6:12; 8:4–6; see Poverty). Spiritually, Israel is guilty of false religion (Amos 5:5, 21–27; 8:10) and outright idolatry (Amos 3:14; 4:4–5) by which it has forsaken God, the Creator of all (Amos 4:13; 5:8–9, 26–27; 9:2–6).

In the political arena Amos often tells of war and its attendant ills: besieged cities with their battered gates (Amos 1:5), walls (Amos 1:7, 10, 14) and fortresses (Amos 1:7, 10, 12; 2:2, 5), swinging swords (Amos 1:11; 7:17; 9:4), and ravished women (Amos 1:13). He warns the populace of the impending sounding of the trumpet (Amos 3:6), announcing the coming of the horrors of war to Israel (Amos 2:14–16; 4:2–3, 10; 5:1–2, 5; 7:16–17; 9:1, 4). The time is near when famine (Amos 4:6) and thirst (Amos 4:8; 8:13) and then the silence of death (Amos 6:9; 8:3) will overtake them. Those who are fortunate enough to survive will be led away with hooks into captivity (Amos 4:2), and even there they will face the threat of death (Amos 9:4). The sins for which the surrounding nations are indicted in the oracles against the nations (Amos 1:3–2:3) are all atrocities in warfare.

Although Amos is the prophet of informal satire, his messages are presented in a variety of genres and literary devices. In addition to the repeated oracles of judgment and the concluding salvation oracle, one encounters poetic ladder parallelism (Amos 1:3, 6, 9, 11, 13; 2:1, 4, 6), a pure narrative episode (Amos 7:10–17), vision reports (Amos 7:1–9:10), occasional wisdom sayings (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Amos 5:19; 6:12; 9:2–4, 13) and a proverb cluster (Amos 3:3–6).

Amos's artistry may be seen in his use of colorful literary features such as metaphor (Amos 2:7; 3:8–10; 4:1; 5:2, 18, 20; 8:11) and simile (Amos 2:9, 13; 3:12; 4:2, 11; 5:24; 8:10; 9:9). Also to be noted are synecdoche (Amos 2:14–16; 8:13), irony (Amos 4:4) and anthropomorphism (Amos 9:8).

Amos makes use of a number of themes and motifs in presenting his oracles. God's judgment is portrayed as wind (Amos 1:14) and fire (Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:4, 5; 4:11; 5:6, 9). Especially to be noted is the Day of the Lord (Amos 3:14; 5:18; 8:3, 9, 11, 13; 9:11, 13) and the resultant feature of a mourning populace (Amos 5:16; 8:3, 8, 10). Accordingly Amos often holds the threat of exile before his hearers (Amos 5:27; 6:7; 7:17; 9:4, 14). In keeping with his basic denunciation of Israel, the prophet proclaims the need of justice so as to correct the prevailing social injustice (Amos 3:10; 4:1; 5:10—11, 13, 15, 24; 6:12; 8:4—6). Israel's Redeemer, who delivered Israel out of Egypt (Amos 2:10; 3:1—2; 9:7), advises Israel to "seek me and live" (Amos 5:4—6:14).

Noticeable throughout the book of Amos is an underlying theme of reversal. Israelites are warned that false (Amos 4:4) and purely ritualistic religion (Amos 5:21—22) will only serve to turn the anticipated day of the Lord's deliverance into one of disaster (Amos 5:18—20). The rich who are at ease (Amos 6:1) and who mercilessly oppress the poor (Amos 8:4—6) will find their situation reversed as they are led away with hooks into exile (Amos 4:1—3). In that sad hour songs of mirth (Amos 6:5) and worship (Amos 5:23) will be turned into wailing (Amos 8:3), and festival will be replaced by mourning (Amos 8:10). Not even the strongest, swiftest or bravest can hope for escape (Amos 2:14—16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 5:19).

Yet there is hope that this too can be reversed. As a shepherd saves but a few items of a dismembered sheep from the ravages of a lion, so there is veiled hope that a mutilated Israel will be rescued by its shepherd (Amos 3:12). For although the present kingdom will be destroyed, a remnant will be saved (Amos 9:8). Israel's humbled people will be restored to their land, the demolished cities will be rebuilt, and the devastated lands will once again flourish (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Amos 4:6—11; with 9:11—15).

A final point of unity is the prevailing tone of angry denunciation. Amos is unapologetic and relentless. As we read his book, we are consistently assaulted with evidence of human misconduct, predictions of destruction and commands to reform.

Despite its brevity the book of Amos is a rich repository of memorable images. The images fall into three main categories. One is the imagery of evil practices currently occurring: selling the needy for a pair of shoes and trampling the head of the poor into the dust (Amos 2:6–7), making Nazirites drink wine (Amos 2:12), houses of ivory financed through exploitation (Amos 3:15), empty religious observance (Amos 5:21–22). The second is the imagery of divine judgment and disaster: a person's being pressed down as a cart full of sheaves presses down (Amos 2:13), women being led into slavery with fishhooks through their flesh (Amos 4:2), drought that destroys crops (Amos 4:6–9), houses being smitten into fragments (Amos 6:11), feasts turned into mourning (Amos 8:10). Third is an image pattern of ideal godliness and its blessing that reaches its climax in the final oracle of redemption: justice rolling down like waters and righteousness like an everflowing stream (Amos 5:24), the mountains dripping sweet wine (Amos 9:13), people planting gardens and eating their fruit (Amos 9:14).

See also Prophecy, Genre of.

ANCESTORS.

See Generation(s)

ANCESTRESS.

See Endangered Ancestress.

ANGEL

From the Garden of Eden to the renewed heaven and earth, angels are found repeatedly throughout the Bible. These beings are also spoken of as spirits, cherubim, seraphim, sons of God, the heavenly host, or in a few instances, even referred to by their proper names, such as Michael and Gabriel.

In the biblical text, angels are real living beings. They are supernatural and nonphysical, but may assume a corporeal appearance for a period of time. Angels are therefore not symbols of another reality. In one sense, however, an angel is an image—an image of the invisible God. Even their names, ending in “-’el’ (the Hebrew expression for God), as in Gabriel, suggests their close connection to the deity. On many occasions God chose to mediate his presence to his people through angels. When he revealed himself to Moses on Mount Sinai, the Lord said, “no one may see me and live” (Ex 33:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Thus, in reality, it was the “angel of the Lord” that appeared to Moses in the form of a burning bush when God disclosed himself as the “I am,” or YHWH (Ex 3:2).

The ultimate revelation of God was not through an angelic mediator figure, but through his “Word” (the logos), the Son of God (Jn 1:1–18). The author of Hebrews makes an eloquent case for the superiority of Jesus to angels by pointing to his sonship, his position at the right hand of the Father, his more excellent name and the fact that he is worthy of the worship and adoration of the angels (Heb 1:1–13). Throughout the history of the church, however, many have interpreted the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] appearances of the “angel of the Lord” as preincarnate manifestations of the second person of the Trinity, the Lord Jesus Christ.

One of the primary activities of the angels is their continual offering of praise and worship to the one seated on the throne. This may have been the only role of the class of angels known as seraphim, the six-winged beings Isaiah saw in his visionary experience. As they flew around the Lord seated on his throne, they proclaimed: “Holy, holy, holy is the Lord Almighty; the whole earth is full of his glory” (Is 6:3). In John’s heavenly vision he saw innumerable angels (“thousands upon thousands” and “ten thousand times ten thousand”) encircling the throne worshipping not only the Father, but also Jesus, here represented by the figure of the lamb. He is said to be worthy of this angelic worship because he was slain as a sacrificial lamb (Rev 5:12), which has made it possible for his people to be freed from their sins and to become “a kingdom and priests to serve his God and Father” (Rev 1:6).

Not all angels are benevolent and constantly ascribing glory and praise to the Father. There are a large number of who have engaged in grievous rebellion against God. They struggle with the good angels and work to bring about the demise of the people of God. Some of these original transgressors are imprisoned in a place called Tartarus and await their divine judgment (2 Pet 2:4; Jude 6). The rest act out their hostile intentions under the leadership of Satan, whose fall may be figuratively narrated in Ezekiel 28 and Isaiah 14. Ultimately they will not succeed in their evil plots. The angelic war in heaven depicted in Revelation 12:7–12 portrays the dragon as “not strong enough.” They are consequently defeated by Michael and his angels. Their final doom is certain when God works to utterly eradicate every form of evil from his new creation (Rev 20:7–10).

The angels of the Lord were frequently involved in announcing and raising up deliverers for the people of God when they were trapped in various forms of bondage. The angel of the Lord thus appears to Moses, calling on him to free the Israelites from their plight in Egypt (Ex 3).

Manifesting himself in human-like form, the angel of the Lord “came and sat down under the oak in Ophrah” where he met Gideon and commissioned him to deliver Israel from Midian (Judg 6:11–17). In the case of Samson the angel of the Lord appeared to both of his parents, announcing his impending miraculous birth to the barren woman (see Birth Story). He then instructed the couple on how to raise him under a Nazirite vow and revealed that he would deliver Israel from the hands of the Philistines (Judg 13).

Angels were also deeply involved in proclaiming the birth of God’s end-time deliver, the Lord Jesus Christ. An angel of the Lord announced his miraculous birth to Joseph (Mt 1:20); Gabriel explained the wonderful news to Mary (Lk 1:26–38); and an angel of the Lord, accompanied by a multitude of the heavenly host, proclaimed the event to a group of shepherds near Bethlehem (Lk 2:8–20).

Throughout biblical history, angels provided guidance, help and encouragement to God’s people. This is perhaps why they can be referred to as “ministering spirits sent to serve those who will inherit salvation” (Heb 1:14). It was the angel of the Lord who intervened to prevent Abraham from sacrificing his only son Isaac in obedience to God and provided the patriarch with a suitable substitute for the offering (Gen 22:9–14). Subsequently an angel even guided Abraham’s servant to find a wife for Isaac (Gen 24:7, 40). After their deliverance from slavery, and as they began their wilderness wanderings, God assured Israel by saying, “I am sending an angel ahead of you to guard you along the way and to bring you to the place I have prepared” (Ex 23:20). The psalmist exclaims God’s benevolent protective power toward his people at all times: “The angel of the Lord encamps around those who fear him, and he delivers them” (Ps 34:7) and “He will command his angels concerning you to guard you in all your ways” (Ps 91:11). Certainly

Daniel and his companions were aware of this protection after their experience of angelic protection through the intense heat and flames of a furnace (Dan 3:28) and then later when “God sent his angel, and he shut the mouths of the lions” (Dan 6:22).

Angelic watchfulness and protection even extends to little children. Jesus said that “their angels in heaven always see the face of my Father in heaven” (Mt 18:10), thus giving rise to the Christian concept of “guardian angels.” In the early days of the church, angels twice intervened and miraculously released apostles from prison (Acts 5:19–20; 12:7–11). They also provided guidance at many crucial junctures, such as for Philip when an angel of the Lord directed him to the Ethiopian official (Acts 8:26) and for the Gentile Cornelius, who was directed by “a holy angel” to visit the apostle Peter (Acts 10:22).

Angels have served, and will continue to serve, as God’s agents for dispensing his judgment. This is one of the primary functions of the angels as they are revealed in the Apocalypse (see Revelation, Book of). Seven angels sound the seven trumpet judgments of God (Rev 8–9); seven angels carry the seven last plagues (Rev 15); and four angels bound at the Euphrates are released and kill a third of humanity (Rev 9:14–15). This terrifying and destructive work of angels in meting out God’s wrath was also characteristic of certain OT [OT OT. Old Testament] events. In the time of Abraham two angels carried out God’s retribution against the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19:1–29). When the Assyrian king Sennacherib threatened Israel, “an angel of the Lord went out and put to death a hundred and eighty-five thousand men in the Assyrian camp” (2 Kings 19:35; 2 Chron 32:21; Is 37:36).

Angels will accompany Jesus when he returns (Mt 16:27; Mk 8:38; Lk 9:26; 2 Thess 1:7). They will be Christ’s special envoys to “gather his elect from the four winds, from one end of the heavens to the other” (Mt 24:31). They will also assist the Son in separating evil ones from the righteous and executing the divine judgment (Mt 13:37–43).

Primarily, then, angels are supernatural beings closely linked with the work of God himself. They are surrounded by an aura of the numinous. A human encounter with an angel is in some sense an encounter with the divine. Angels are known to us not as individualized characters but as agents. Their primary activities are praise and worship of God in his heavenly court, making announcements and carrying messages on behalf of God to humans, intervening with guidance and protection in the lives of people, and dispensing the judgments of God.

See also Annunciation; Assembly, Divine; Heavenly Armies/Host.

Bibliography. S. Noll, Angels of Light, Powers of Darkness (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1998).

ANGER

In the Bible, anger is attributed both to people and to God. Anger or wrath is an emotion, a response growing out of an interpretation of certain stimuli. It may produce a desire to respond, but agents (people or God) determine if, how and when they will respond. The idiom of anger is the imagery of fire. Both humans and God are said to “burn with anger” (Gen 39:19; Ex 4:14). Anger might flare up like a flame (2 Sam 11:20), be stirred up like a fire (1 Kings 14:22) or smolder (Ps 80:4). Anger’s similarity to fire may be observed in its spontaneity, in the difficulty with which it is contained and in its destructive power.

Old Testament. The pages of the Scriptures present numerous examples of both human and divine anger and the responses to it. Human anger is usually depicted as a loss of self-control that results in evil behavior. The sage expresses his assessment of such anger: “Anger resides in the lap of fools” (Eccles 7:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jacob rebuked his sons Simeon and Levi for their murderous anger; he cursed their fierce and cruel anger (Gen 49:6–7). David warns his readers to avoid anger (Ps 37:8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 36:13). Several proverbs speak of the wisdom of not provoking others to anger (Prov 15:1; 19:11; 20:2) or how restraining anger keeps one out of worse trouble (Prov 15:18; 16:32).

There are examples of seemingly appropriate ways to express anger. When Jacob’s wife Rachel was jealous of her sister and blamed him for her inability to have children, Jacob was angry, but he responded with wise words (Gen 30:1–2). Pharaoh’s adamant refusal to allow the Israelites to leave Egypt caused Moses to be very angry, but the text says he simply left Pharaoh’s presence taking no immediate action (Ex 11:8). The Psalms present numerous examples of anger directed toward the injustice of cruel people (Ps 59:11; 69:28) as well as toward God himself (Ps 77:6–9; 90:7–12). The key seems to be keeping anger in control—adopting a measured response (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 9:30; 2 Sam 12:5; Neh 5:6).

The overwhelming majority of instances of anger in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] speak of God’s anger both against his chosen people and against pagan nations. God’s anger differs, however, from most examples of human anger. Expressions of God’s anger exhibit no loss of control. Rather, as an act of God’s will, his anger results in deliberate judgments against sin—actions appropriate to the situation and in keeping with his own character as holy and just. When Moses protested at the prospect of being God’s spokesman before Pharaoh, the Lord’s anger burned against Moses, but he allowed Aaron to be the replacement speaker (Ex 4:13–15). Yet in other places God's anger does not appear to have such favorable outcomes. When the wandering Israelites complained about their hardships, God's anger was aroused, and his fire consumed some of the outskirts of the camp (Num 11:1). When the people wailed at their limited diet of manna, in his anger God threatened to force them to eat quail until they detested it (Num 11:10, 18–20). In his anger God instructed Moses to put to death all those who worshipped the Baal of Peor (Num 25:3–4). In anger God prevented the entire generation of unbelieving adults from entering the Promised Land, forcing them to experience forty more years of wandering in the desert (Num 32:10–13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 3:11; 4:3). Moses warned the Israelites to fear God alone, “for the Lord your God, who is among you, is a jealous God and his anger will burn against you, and he will destroy you from the face of the land” (Deut 6:15).

When a king or the nation rejected God in favor of other deities, his anger burned hot (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 7:4; 9:19; 29:20, 23–24, 27–28; 1 Kings 14:9–11, 15). The book of Judges details Israel's “on again-off again” trust in God. When they abandoned God and provoked him to anger, God allowed their enemies to overwhelm them (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 2:11–15). His anger often resulted in Israel's domination by foreign powers (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Kings 13:3), in plagues or in other devastation. Perhaps worst of all, he removed his presence from the nation (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Num 12:9; 31:17; Deut 32:16, 21–22; Josh 23:16; 2 Kings 17:18). Eventually God repudiated the entire nation, saying, “I will remove Judah also from my presence as I removed Israel, and I will reject Jerusalem, the city I chose, and this temple, about which I said, “There shall my Name be” (2 Kings 23:26–27).

The prophets from Isaiah to Malachi multiply examples of expressions of God's anger against his people. When God's people fail to trust him—they literally serve other gods, disobey his commands or fail to walk in his ways—his consistent response is anger, and that anger often leads in the most serious way to judgment.

Despite this catalog of awful displays of God's anger, the other side of the picture is equally striking. When God's people repent from sin and place their trust in him, God turns aside his anger and brings mercy, compassion and blessing (Deut 13:17–18). David expresses confidence that God's anger against his people is only a momentary experience in contrast to a lifetime of God's favor (Ps 30:5). The psalmists believe that God often restrained his anger and did not give full vent to the judgment Israel deserved (Ps 78:38; 103:8–9). He characteristically terminates his wrath and forgives people's sins (Ps 85:3–5). The prophets concur, convinced that God will turn aside his anger when his people return to him (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 12:1; 48:9; Jer 3:12–13; Hos 14:4; Joel 2:13; Jon 4:2; Mic 7:18). Perhaps the prophet Nahum best puts both truths together: “The Lord is a jealous and avenging God; the Lord takes vengeance and is filled with wrath... The Lord is slow to anger and great in power” (Nahum 1:2–3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1:6–7).

It appears that God's anger is not automatic or predictable, nor is God ever “out of control.” The Psalmists expect that God may exercise or withhold his anger in response to prayer. They implore God not to rebuke or discipline in anger (Ps 6:1; 27:9). Yet they also implore God to rise up in anger against his enemies (Ps 7:6). Common in the psalms is the theme of imprecation against God's enemies, sometimes termed “the nations”: “In his wrath the Lord will swallow them up” (Ps 21:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 56:7; 69:24).

New Testament. When Jesus confronted people's hardness of heart and failure to acknowledge his message, he sometimes responded in anger (Mk 3:5). The classic instance of Jesus' expression of anger occurred when he confronted the abuses he found within the temple precincts (Mt 21:12–13; Jn 2:14–16). Instead of the temple being a place for true worship and service of God, the Sadducees had turned it into a place of business where money was exchanged and animals were sold. In Jesus' parable of the wedding feast, the king's anger is certainly justified (Mt 22:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 14:21).

On the other hand, when Jesus attacked the hard-heartedness of many of his hearers, they responded to him with anger (Lk 4:28). Paul experienced similar reactions to his preaching at Ephesus (Acts 19:28). Paul saw anger as a basic element of the sinful nature. So he explained that displays of anger characterize unbelievers and not Christians (Gal 5:20). Yet the NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers acknowledge the presence of anger in a Christian's life. Paul's counsel is to avoid sin when angry (Eph 4:26). Yet he shortly urges the readers to avoid anger, among other vices (Eph 4:31; Col 3:8). Jesus instructs his followers to avoid anger against a fellow disciple (Mt 5:22). Parents ought not provoke anger in their children (Eph 6:4; Col 3:21). Proper prayers by the men at Ephesus implied their avoidance of anger (1 Tim 2:8). Believers should be slow to anger (Jas 1:19) since it does not accomplish righteousness in a person's life (Jas 1:20). They are not to avenge themselves but leave vengeance to the wrath of God (Rom 12:19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 19:18).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] speaks of God's anger in both present and future terms. As in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament], God's anger is represented as his actions or responses to human sinfulness. Several texts explain God's anger in the present. John affirmed that God's wrath now rests on those who fail to believe in Jesus (Jn 3:36). Paul asserted that God presently reveals his anger against those who suppress the truth of the gospel (Rom 1:18; 1 Thess 2:16). He taught that governmental authorities serve as agents of God's anger to punish criminals (Rom 13:4). God's anger comes on the disobedient, though it is not easy to say whether the author intended this to refer to present or future expressions of God's anger (Eph 5:6).

As to future anger, John the Baptist affirmed that there was "the wrath to come" (Mt 3:7; Lk 3:7). Jesus predicted a time of God's judgment on Israel (Lk 21:23). Paul spoke of a coming day of God's anger when his righteous judgment will be revealed against unrepentant sinners (Rom 2:5, 8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 9:22; Col 3:6; 1 Thess 1:10). Left to their own attempts to keep God's law, people will face God's anger (Rom 4:15). Only through justification on the basis of Jesus' atonement can people find salvation and escape from God's coming wrath (Rom 5:9; 1 Thess 5:9). Thus Christians were formerly "children of wrath"—that is, their only prospect was to encounter God's angry judgment against their sin—but this is no longer their state (Eph 2:3). The Apocalypse speaks several times of God's anger. Those who experience the great day of the wrath of the Lamb would rather be dead, so awesome is its destructive force (Rev 6:16—17). The plagues of the Apocalypse display God's anger against his enemies (Rev 14:10, 19; 15:1, 7; 16:1, 19; 19:15). Wrath describes the day of judgment when the wicked are destroyed and the saints rewarded (Rev 11:8).

See also Day of the Lord; Hell; Judgment.

ANIMALS

The Hebrew and Aramaic of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] uses about 180 words, the Greek NT [NT NT. New Testament]

about 50 words, to name a total of about 70 types (not species) of animals. The many distinctions as to class, gender and age of domesticated animals account for the seeming discrepancy: eleven Hebrew and Aramaic words for sheep; eight Hebrew words for goat; eight Hebrew words for cow or ox, along with seven Greek words; eight Hebrew words translated "lion"; ten kinds of locust or grasshopper in Hebrew; ten Hebrew and four Greek varieties of snake; five words for horse and so forth. All this duplication contrasts with the many animal names whose exact meaning is still uncertain (see Birds).

The Hebrews' need to identify animals stemmed not from a desire for thorough scientific understanding but from a pragmatic need to answer basic questions about them: Can they be eaten? Do they pose a danger to people? Do they harm crops? Animals that were undomesticated but nevertheless tolerant of human presence were more likely to be noted and named consistently. If an animal had a low tolerance for human presence or was nocturnal, it stood a good chance of carrying a large mythical burden. While these cultural differences produced an outlook on animals understandably quite distinct from ours, the incongruities are exaggerated by the view that animals are players, both agents and pawns, in the cosmic struggle delineated in the Bible. This view lends additional significance to the imagery of various animals. In addition, the biblical imagination participates in a universal tendency to equate certain animals with specific traits, as when horses and mules are equated with ignorance (Ps 32:9) or doves with being easily deceived and senseless (Hos 7:11).

Animals as Unclean. A large portion of the animals mentioned in Scripture occurs in lists of unclean animals (Lev 11; Deut 14) that make little use of imagery themselves and contribute little information helpful to the identification of the animals listed. While some have sought health reasons for prohibitions about food (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , diseases transmitted through pork), the majority if not all the taboos about which animals may be eaten probably arise from several causes. The Israelites' long past as agricultural nomads would naturally give rise to customs expressing their dependence on domesticated stock.

Mythological associations of certain animals or superstitions about them make eating them unthinkable (see Mythical Animals).

A disdain for protein in some forms may arise from common sense (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , vultures eat carrion, so don't eat vultures) or from a rudimentary natural philosophy (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , juicy caterpillars do not breathe and so do not share the breath of God; therefore they belong to the same category as worms and are allied with the evil forces of decay. Do not eat them.) There is some evidence that the Israelites had correlated disease agents, unclean animals such as flies and rodents (1 Sam 6), with the plagues they carried. They could not, however, articulate the cause or mechanism. The Israelite outlook was similar to that of their neighbors, who sought healing through the symbolic methods of sympathetic magic, offering golden figures of the affected body part and the unclean visitant in an attempt to propitiate the responsible deity, be it their own or a foreign one (see Magic; Disease and Healing).

Animals as Signs of Desolation. As is true in some cultures today, the appearance of certain animals is regarded as an omen. Frequently these animals are ones whose nighttime calls seem to be messages from the spirit world (owls, hyenas, frogs) or who themselves seem to be acting as messengers (crows, ravens, bats) or animals that by habit already possess negative associations with death (snakes, vultures). Such passages as Isaiah 34:11–15 and Habakkuk 2:14, in describing the desolation of once inhabited cities, sometimes include among “real” animals reference to mythological creatures that frolic and cry in the ruins (satyrs, night hags or liliths [Is 34:14]). Our post-Enlightenment cultural outlook requires us to distinguish between real and mythical animals; however the ancient poets were under no such constraint. To them some animals held evil or even demonic associations. Some demons appeared as animals, as when frogs represent unclean spirits (Rev 16:13). The variation in translation of some animal names reflects the difficulty of identifying these creatures—consider the various translations of lilith as “night hag” or “screech owl” in Isaiah 34:14—but generally their symbolic import is clear enough from the context, and parallelism provides additional hints as well.

Animals as Servants. The Genesis account lays out the moral implications of humanity’s relationship to animals by establishing parallels to humanity’s relationship to God. God delegates the dominion of animals to people (Gen 1:28) just as God is their dominus (Lord). The man works for God tending garden, and the beasts work for man. Although all kinds of animals can be “tamed” (Jas 3:7), domestication is practical only with animals that are willing to live in high densities (herds or packs), provide some harvestable resource and can be easily maintained (herbivores, since carnivores are hard to feed). Also, it would be pointless to domesticate unclean animals. By these criteria most beasts worth domesticating had been domesticated by biblical times. As reliable, ungrudging workers, livestock provided metaphors for loyalty and trainability, but also occasions for moral generalizations. The idea of pets probably arose through the interaction of children with young animals, but it is almost absent from ancient literature. The parable of the one ewe lamb of the poor man hints that (as on some farms today) not all animals were treated as mere produce (2 Sam 12:3, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Tobit's dog, Tobit 5:16; 11:4).

Cattle. Cattle are mentioned primarily as an indicator of wealth (Gen 13:2; Ezek 38:12; 1 Chron 5:9). In dreams or in poetry, well-fed cows serve as metaphors of wealthy people or nations (Amos 4:1; Jer 46:20); starving cows, of lean years (Gen 41:26). Cattle produced many of the good things in life: butter or cheese (Deut 32:14; Prov 30:33; 1 Sam 17:17; 2 Sam 17:29), dung for fuel (Ezek 4:12) or fertilizer (Lk 13:8). Some cattle were raised specifically to be eaten, "calves of the stall" (1 Kings 4:23; Mal 4:2), and were a luxury that marked special occasions (Lk 15:30). They also contributed as beasts of burden, either laden (Gen 45:17, 1 Chron 12:40) or pulling (1 Sam 6, 2 Sam 6).

As an important link in the economy, animals deserved to be well treated. A number of ethical laws regarding their treatment seem to arise as extensions of the Golden Rule. The ox and donkey are personified: they know their owner (Is 1:3). The rights of animals are discussed along with those of other property (slaves and wives) in Exodus 21 and 22. Like people, animals deserve rest (Ex 23:12; Deut 5:14) and water (Lk 13:15). It is too cruel to make an ox work with grain while withholding it (Deut 25:4), and similar courtesy applies to people (1 Cor 9:9; 1 Tim 5:18). You must help an ox in trouble (Deut 22:4), even if it is your enemy's (Ex 23:4). Likewise, Jesus heals a woman on the Sabbath because any decent person would help an animal on that day (Lk 14:5).

Sheep. As with cattle, the long history of Israelite nomadic dependence on sheep surfaces in the imagery associated with them. The horn of the sheep finds ritual use as a ceremonial instrument (Josh 6:4) or oil container (1 Sam 16:1). Whole economies were based on wool (2 Kings 3:4). Both the wool and the animals themselves (Ezek 27:18) stood for wealth and could serve as tribute (2 Chron 17:11). The purity of wool (probably its cleanness close to the skin when parted or sheared) served as a symbol of sinlessness (Is 1:18).

Prohibitions against weaving wool with linen also stemmed from extensions about the purity of wool (or perhaps a reluctance to become dependent on sedentary farming methods and produce, i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , flax production [Lev 19:19]). The care of sheep also taught responsibility (Lk 15:4) and accountability (Gen 31:39).

Most of all, however, sheep served as simple models of people. People are sociable, lost without a herd to belong to. A “vagabond” cannot survive (Gen 4:12). People are creatures of habit, easily led astray (Is 53:6), defenseless against marauding wolves (Zeph 3:3; Jn 10:12) or lions (Jer 50:17) and desperately in need of a shepherd (Zech 10:2). If we follow in God’s paths, we become his sheep (Ps 23; 95:7; 100:3). Jesus is our Good Shepherd (Jn 10:11–14) or Great Shepherd (Heb 13:20). The shepherd knows his sheep by name, and they know his voice (Jn 10:3–4). He calls them “my sheep” (Ezek 34; Jn 21:16–17).

The obvious similarities between humans and sheep, as well as the parallel hierarchy of God to mortal and mortal to sheep, commended the mystical substitution of a lamb as redemptive offering for the firstborn male (Ex 13:2, 13) for the yearly atonement (Ex 12) and the eternally efficacious Passover (Rev 5:6) that rescues us from ourselves (Jn 1:29, 36). Christ is a lamb because he is “obedient unto death” (Phil 2:8), “silent before his shearers” (Is 53:7), innocent (Heb 4:15) and acceptable as “without blemish” (Num 28:3).

Goat. In contrast to sheep, goats are savvy, self-reliant, an image of the worldly-wise. Goats are those who don’t need God. He will have no need for them, but will separate them from his sheep (Mt 25:32). The head-butting typical of goats serves as prophetic metaphor for political clashes (Dan 8:6). The wilder associations of goats, especially with unspecified evils of the wilderness, fed the image of goat-like spirits or satyrs (Is 13:21, 34:14; Lev 17:7, 2 Chron 11:15). The “scapegoat” was sent away to Azazel, perhaps a demon of the wilderness (Lev 16:9).

Camel. The legendary abilities of the camel to survive in the desert made possible transdesert commerce and nomadism. Genesis 24 records their necessary care. Other passages allude to their large numbers as a sign of wealth or might (Judg 6:5, 8:26; 1 Chron 5:21; 1 Kings 10:2). David kept camels (1 Chron 27:30).

Ass or Donkey. The donkey was a low-maintenance, multipurpose agricultural asset. Its strong ties to agriculture can be seen in the phrase “ox and ass” used as a term for domestic animals in general (Lk 13:15). The donkey demanded lower quality and less forage than the horse, which only the wealthy could afford. Donkeys, consequently, far outnumbered horses or camels (Ezra 2:66; Neh 7:68). The counterpart to modern tractors, donkeys were required for serious farming. Those who drove away “the ass of the fatherless” were cruelly sending them into sure bankruptcy (Job 24:3). In addition to being laden, donkeys were often ridden, either saddled (2 Sam 16:1) or with a garment as cushion (Ezek 27:20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 21:7). A donkey could be stubborn (Num 22:29), but even so it “knows its master’s crib,” which is more than Isaiah could say for Israel (Is 1:3). A donkey was the traditional mount of nobility (Judg 12:14) and later of kings (Zech 9:9).

Mule. The mule (usually the offspring from a donkey stallion and horse mare) is a practical and literal compromise between the efficiency of the donkey and the strength of the horse. Mules functioned as mounts for David’s sons (2 Sam 13:29). Absalom was killed when he failed to stay on his mule (2 Sam 18:9). As a sign of Solomon’s impending ascension, David mounted him on his own mule (1 Kings

1:33).

Jesus orchestrates his triumphal entry around a mule, still regarded as a mark of kingship in Palestine. (A war horse would not have symbolized the arrival of the Prince of Peace.) Matthew explicitly mentions both the mare and the colt as fulfillment of prophecy (Mt 21:2; Zech 9:9). The mule was illegal to breed because it was a hybrid (Lev 19:19) and also infertile. Mules therefore had to be replenished by importing (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 27:14). Mules faithfully performed the agricultural side of their dual role. As a beast of burden a mule load became a unit of measure (2 Kings 5:17), and a millstone was literally a “donkey mill” (Mt 18:6; Mk 9:42). The mule’s reputation for stubbornness invited the inevitable comparison to human behavior (Ps 32:9).

Horse. Unlike the donkey and the mule, the horse was impractical for peaceful uses. For 3,500 years people constantly adapted the horse and improved their use of it to serve as the ultimate military weapon (until the tank). Historically, peoples who mastered the horse (Trojans, Mitannians, Hurrians, Mongols, etc.) rose to dominate their neighbors. The neighing of horses and the tramping of hooves sounded the prelude to war (Jer 8:16; 47:3). The prohibition against amassing horses is directed against self-sufficient political power (Deut 17:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 8:11).

Mounted cavalry and chariots gave overwhelming superiority in battle, especially on the plains (1 Kings 20:23). But it was central to Israelite history that this advantage did not apply to hill country, and even on the plains it could be neutralized or rendered a disadvantage by unexpected events such as rain and mud (Ex 14:25; Judg 5:4; Josh 11:5). When it rained, Elijah outran Ahab’s chariot (1 Kings 18:45–46). David kept enough horses and chariots to be safe (2 Sam 8:4); however his sons later relied on them in their political coups (Absalom, 2 Sam 15:1; Adonijah, 1 Kings 1:15). Solomon's power rested on unprecedented numbers of horses (four thousand in 2 Chron 9:25 or forty thousand in 1 Kings 4:26; 10:26—29). Such confidence in animal might was as impious as relying on foreign political alliances (Ps 33:17; Hos 1:7; Is 31:1).

The difficulty of controlling such a large, powerful animal when driven by its hormones made the horse a potent symbol of raw desire, meanings still attached to English words like stud or stallion. The prophet invoked such similes to characterize the people's wanton idolatry (Jer 5:8; 50:11). The prophet resorts to barnyard images, probably being intentionally crude to emphasize God's disdain when he compares the people's lust for foreign countries to a harlot desiring a stud with a donkey-sized penis or with emissions as copious as a horse's (Ezek 23:20). That an animal as large as a horse could be controlled at all was astonishing (Jas 3:3). Since the horse epitomized power, both military and reproductive, it is not surprising that some occupants of Palestine buried their horses with honor or that images of horses were worshipped even in Jerusalem (2 Kings 23:11).

Pig. The pig, domestic (Lk 15; Mt 8:30) or wild, was forbidden to Jews. This made it not only useless, but a nuisance as a threat to agriculture. "The boar from the forest" ravages the neglected vineyard (Ps 80:13). The taboo against pork was shared by the ancient Egyptians and probably derived from the pig's omnivorous habits that occasionally led it to feed on carrion. Dogs (see below) and pigs have much in common. Their behavior exposes their true natures. They are paired as wild, street animals, tolerated, but belonging to no one (Is 66:3; Mt 7:6). The dog will eat its vomit and the pig must have its wallow (2 Pet 2:22). Like a harlot, the pig cannot be cleaned up; it returns to its old ways (Prov 11:22). The ring in a pig's snout is not for decoration (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 3:21). It has no values and but acts unreasonably (Mt 7:6). Swine (and dogs) are symbols of filth and paganism (Is 65:4; 66:3, 17). The prodigal was no doubt horrified to be reduced to feeding pigs, but it was worse to covet their food, the very source of their uncleanness (Lk 15:15–16).

Dog. The Bible invokes the image of the dog often, but rarely in a positive light. The Israelites were familiar with dogs, not as a cherished pets, but as members of packs that fed at the town dump and roamed the streets at night howling (Ps 59:6). Because of their scavenging function, dogs became synonymous with garbage. “Do not give what is holy to the dogs” (Mt 7:6) means do not throw it out. Cattle killed by wild animals shall be “thrown out for the dogs” (Ex 22:31). The practice of dishonoring foes by denying burial made dogs, among other animals (1 Sam 17:44; Jer 8:2; 16:4), the de facto undertakers who “licked the blood” of many (Naboth, 1 Kings 21:19; Ahab, 1 Kings 21:24; 22:38; Jeroboam, 1 Kings 14:11; Baasha, 1 Kings 16:4). To fulfill the prophecy, Jezebel’s body does become dung on the face of the field, but only after the dogs have digested it (2 Kings 9:10, 36). The dogs may lick Lazarus’ wounds as a foreshadowing of his death and interment in them (Lk 16:21). The dog’s regurgitation reflex, useful for transporting food to their pups in their former wild state, served to cement their label as unclean (Prov 26:11). The logical connection between a dog’s diet of refuse and its unclean habits further supported the belief that what enters in through the mouth does defile one.

The struggle for survival at the town dump and a semi-wild existence did not produce friendly dogs. Dogs seemed to know nothing of obedience and were dangerous to pet (Prov 26:17). The fear of being eaten by such dogs is real (Ps 22:16–17). In return for a begrudging toleration they provided watchmen services, and they were even believed to sense spiritual dangers. The absence of a dog bark during Israel's exodus indicates that God miraculously silenced either the departure of the Israelites or the dogs so that they did not alert the Egyptians (Ex 11:7). The prophet likens his defenseless nation to a pack of lazy watchdogs that could not bark anyway (Is 56:10).

Dogs were the object as well as the source of routine insults. Goliath believes facing David in single combat is beneath his dignity: "Am I a dog?" (1 Sam 17:43, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 3:8). Evidence suggests that the transparently subservient behaviors of dogs-groveling, fawning, bowing-were actually practiced before superiors. Haza'el reacts to Elisha's prediction of his ascension to the throne of Syria saying, "What is your servant, who is but a dog, that he should do this great thing?" (2 Kings 8:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The marginal existence of a dog was a given. Its death was not mourned, but expected. Groveling subordinates repeatedly identify themselves to superiors as "dead dogs": "What is your servant that you should look on such a dead dog as I?" (2 Sam 9:8). A dead dog is a cheap life: "Why should this dead dog curse my lord the king?" (2 Sam 16:9). David's comparison of Saul's pursuit to hunting "after a dead dog" (1 Sam 24:14) craftily combines two meanings. David is not worth hunting, and doing so is an act of cowardice.

As bad as a dog's life was, "a living dog is better than a dead lion" (Eccles 9:4). A few passages hint that not all dogs led a dog's life. Job laments that he is scorned by young upstarts whose fathers were not good enough to work alongside the dogs guarding his flock (Job 30:1). The dog that accompanies Tobias on his long, dangerous journey is probably more than a mere pet (Tobit 5:16; 11:4). Jesus chides the Syrophoenician woman by saying that it would be unkind to toss out to scavenging dogs food that the children were still eating. She salvages his metaphor, reminding him that some doggies (probably young or small ones brought into the house by children) actually do receive table scraps (Mk 7:28).

In spite of these few hints of the positive image the dog would later have, the term is overwhelmingly negative and serves as a label for anyone beneath contempt. Paul warns Gentile Christians to watch out for dogs, the Judaizers (Phil 3:2). Hebrew law uses the term dog for male prostitute (Deut 23:18), perhaps referring to the position assumed in male-male intercourse, and it reappears in a list of apocalyptic evildoers: dogs, sorcerers, prostitutes, murderers, idolaters, lovers of the false (Rev 22:15).

Animals as Dangerous. The Bible names many animals simply because the mere mention of them evokes fear. Their fierce behavior is likened to the dealings of God, enemies or wicked individuals. The predatory armies of Babylon resemble frightful animals. They are swifter than cheetahs, fiercer than wolves. Their horsemen fly from afar like vultures and are as swift as eagles (Hab 1:7–8). The imagery implies that the victims of war are as prey.

Lion. The twelve Hebrew words for lion testify to deep concern about it. As top predator, raider of livestock (1 Sam 17; Amos 3:12) and foe with legendary strength, the lion has always been surrounded by myth. The many references to its roar suggest that it was heard more often than seen, but even its voice was cause for concern (Amos 3:8). Because when the lion is on the hunt something is going to die, it symbolizes the absolute power of kings and even of God. There is no way to prepare for its attack. It lurks secretly (Ps 10:9), bursts from hiding, emerging from thicket (Jer 49:19; 50:44; 25:38; Job 38:40) or forest (Jer 5:6, 12:8). When someone turns the tables on the lion, it is newsworthy (2 Sam 23:20). But even the strength and self-sufficiency of the lion does not exempt it from providential care (Ps 34:10).

Malicious in action, premeditated in harm, ruthlessly efficient in killing, the lion metaphorically embodies evil. The wicked are like lions “eager to tear ... lurking in ambush” (Ps 17:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 7:2; 22:13, 21). The devil behaves like a lion (1 Pet 5:8). The righteous can only emulate the boldness of the lion (Prov 28:1). Even God is a lion who metes out punishment: “I will be to them like a lion” (Hos 13:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Balaam’s oracle employs the lion as an image of the inexorable rise of Israel (Num 23:24), echoing Jacob’s deathbed metaphor, “Judah is a lion’s whelp” (Gen 49:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Eventually recognized as a messianic prophecy, the idea is recast in the apocalyptic title “Lion of the tribe of Judah” (Rev 5:5).

Leopard. This solitary cat was known for its habit of surveying its territory from high lookouts (Song 4:8). Unlike the lion it seldom betrayed its location by calling and so seemed all the more sinister (Hos 13:7). As a lurking danger “a leopard will lie in wait near their towns” (Jer 5:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In visions it symbolizes yet another rapacious predator (Dan 7:6; Rev 13:2). As with the lion the leopard’s quintessentially carnivorous nature will be recreated as a vegetarian (Is 11:6). Although Habakkuk envisions horses “swifter than leopards,” the emphasis on speed suggests that the Hebrew word for leopard may also designate the cheetah (Hab 1:8). Egyptian royalty were already keeping cheetahs by this period.

Bear. To judge from the dozen references to the bear, the Israelites knew it as a dangerous animal. It points to violence and power, usually in conjunction with the lion (1 Sam 17:34, 36—37; 2 Sam 17:8, 10; Amos 5:19; Is 11:7; Hos 13:8; Prov 28:15; Lam 3:10). Amos characterizes the people’s predicament with the Hebrew proverb “as if a man fled from a lion, and a bear met him” (Amos 5:19)—equivalent of our “out the frying pan, into the fire.” They also recognized that “a bear robbed of its cubs” was violent because of human provocation (Prov 17:11; Hos 13:8). The she-bears that attacked Elisha’s mockers may well have been aggravated by a perceived threat to their cubs (2 Kings 2:24). Unlike the lion’s growl, which intimidates, the bear’s growl sounded plaintive to the Hebrews (Is 59:11). The bear inflicts most of its damage with its paws and claws. With its reputation for heavy-handedness, the bear personifies a “wicked ruler over a poor people” (Rev 13:2).

Wolf. The wolf is bold, opportunistic and ruthless in contrast to its victim, the sheep, which is naive, trusting and vulnerable (Mt 10:16). The name wolf identifies an inner nature that, even if covered in sheep’s clothing, shows itself in behavior (Mt 7:15). The tribe of Benjamin was characterized as a wolf because of its opportunistic misadventures within the pack of twelve tribes. The wolf figures consistently as a metaphor for the wicked who prey on God’s flock, whether spiritually (Jn 10:12) or politically and morally (princes, Ezek 22:27; judges, Zeph 3:3). The Messianic kingdom will be as different from this world as a noncarnivorous wolf is from the familiar wolf of legend (Is 65:25).

Fox or Jackal. Experts debate whether the fox and jackal are strictly separated in the mind of the inhabitants of Palestine in antiquity or now; however their imagery is quite separate. The words rendered “jackal” are consistently used to conjure images of ruin and desolation, of crying in the night. When a city becomes abandoned, the harbingers of doom that have lurked on the outskirts move in. It becomes the haunt of the jackal along with ominous birds, evil spirits, satyrs and liliths (Hazor, Jer 49:33; Jerusalem, Jer 9:11; Nineveh, Zeph 2:13–15; Babylon, Is 13:22; Rev 18:2).

The fox (as traditionally rendered, but which may also be a jackal) is not an omen of desolation, but a very small and light carnivore. It has the temerity to associate with lions at the kill, take what it can and dodge the consequences. Herod plays the crafty fox to Caesar's lion (Lk 13:32). He is a political nuisance, but not worth bothering with. In early Jewish literature the fox portrays a lesser person as opposed to the truly powerful, who are lions. Sanballat mocks that even the light-footed fox couldn't step on Nehemiah's wall without toppling its stones (Neh 4:3). Given the common metaphor of vineyard to refer to sexual pleasures, the foxes in Song of Songs 2:15 seem to point to some unidentified, yet regrettable negative-opportunists that are difficult to catch and punish.

Animals as Wild. Wildness points to an independence from human interference or even knowledge. The Bible frequently evokes wild animals as a prodding reminder of human ignorance or of the breadth of divine knowledge. The poet deliberately chooses the hippopotamus (Behemoth) and the crocodile (Leviathan) because they are exotic and unfamiliar to his audience. They summoned awe and reverence the way stories of man-eating plants do for children. They help us imagine a fiercely unpredictable Creator. Who else could conceive a grass-eating monster (Job 40:15)?

The wildness and variety of nature, like the pageant of creatures that portrays it, praise the Creator. The wild ox is untamable (Job 39:9–12). Leviathan is gloriously wild and uncapturable (Job 41:1–8). The ways and habits of wild creatures are inscrutable (Job 39), as mysterious and unfathomable as the cosmos (Job 38). Mythological animals and genuine brutes evoke the splendor and majesty of creation, pointing directly to the exuberant creativity of their maker. Job thinks God made sea monsters just for the fun of it. Animals and seasons obediently follow God's laws, but humanity does not (Jer 8:7). One cannot tame oneself or even as small a part as one's own tongue (Jas 3:7—8). Who, after all, is the real brute, the “irrational creature” (2 Pet 2:12)? The real dragon, the serpent, the primordial enemy lives within.

Novelty is a luxury the wealthy can afford, so Solomon imports exotic creatures from eastern and southern kingdoms. Apes, peacocks and perhaps elephants appeared as curiosities (1 Kings 10:22 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] 2 Chron 9:21). Elephants, recently extinct in western Asia, were still known by their tusks (ivory tusks are mentioned in Ezek 27:15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Macc 6:30).

Animals as a Source of Wisdom. Some animals just seem proud: the strutting cock, the he-goat, the lion (Prov 30:29). The term “sons of pride” seems to refer to lions (Job 28:8) or perhaps underground snakes, but elsewhere to unspecified animals (Job 41:34).

Some tiny animals have notable accomplishments. Lazy people could learn and improve themselves by watching ants (Prov 6:6—8), which are organized without a bureaucracy and which plan ahead admirably (Prov 30:24—25). Badgers are small and few, but wisely live in impenetrable rock fortresses (Prov 30:26). Locusts swarm inexorably forward without visible leadership (Prov 30:27). Lizards are easily caught and frail, but live like kings in palaces (Prov 30:28). Nor does small necessarily mean insignificant. David discounts his potential to succeed Saul by calling himself a flea (1 Sam 24:14). A small political state pestering large, grain-fed Egypt is like gadfly tormenting a fat cow (Jer 46:20). Even the worm (see below) accomplishes God's ends.

Nature also harbors some nasty creatures and some negative lessons. Those who ignore God are placing confidence in a spider's web (Prov 8:14). The wicked build a house as insubstantial as a spider's web (Prov 27:18). The unjust weave a web of mischief. It appears overnight like a spider's web. Their plots are viper's eggs, much worse after they hatch (Is 59:5).

Animals as Divine Agents. Since all events are under God's control, animals function as divine agents. Some fulfill God's mission. Others are co-opted by evil and permitted to harm. Behavior considered abnormal for an animal suggests that it is filling such a role. A normal lion would have eaten the donkey or the prophet in 1 Kings 13:25–26. Its unexpected behavior betrays its divine mission (1 Kings 13:28). Other lions punish a disobedient prophet (1 Kings 20:35–36) or idolatrous Samaritans (2 Kings 17:25–26). The bears Elisha summons to punish the disrespectful lads tear them open, but no mention is made of eating (2 Kings 2:24). At the advice of diviners the Philistines load the ark on a cart pulled by two milk cows, which unnaturally walk away from their bawling calves to return the cart to Israel, a sign that the God of Israel “has done us this great harm” (1 Sam 6:7–9). Ravens would not naturally feed humans, but they fed Elijah at God's command (1 Kings 17:4). The bite of a snake, coming as a surprise (Gen 49:17; Amos 5:19), must have seemed unprovoked and unnatural, giving the serpent a permanent role in the spirit world.

Locusts, though individually insignificant and crushable (Ps 109:23; Num 13:33), in swarms are like armies on the march (Prov 30:27), and armies are compared to locusts (Judg 6:5; 7:12). They pounce like despoilers (Is 33:4). A bewildering array of kinds of locusts (Joel 1:4) with numberless mouths “consume the years” (Joel 2:25; Deut 28:38). The masses of locusts quickly exhaust the standing crops and move on. They signify a brief existence (Jer 46:23; 51:14; Nahum

3:15—17; &4 Ezra; 4:24). People, like gnats, will die in huge numbers (Is 51:6). Real enemies swarm like bees (Deut 1:44; Ps 108:12), but real hornets act as God's allies and shock troops (Ex 23:28; Deut 7:20; Josh 24:12).

The worm, as an agent of destruction, belonged in God's arsenal too. Like its overgrown relative the serpent, the worm is part of the forces of decay. Before people had an understanding of worms as the larva of insects, nature seemed to spontaneously decay into worms, as did the old manna (Ex 16:20). Worms (including maggots and moth larva) were agents of ruin and corruption (Deut 28:39; Is 14:11; 51:8), offering the living a foretaste of hell, a personal preview of death. Luke vividly narrates that Herod became a worm-feast (Acts 12:23) as punishment for his hubris (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Mac 9:9; 1 Mac 2:62—63). Less severely, a God-appointed worm makes a didactic dinner of Jonah's beloved shade vine (Jonah 4:7).

In a fallen world locked in cosmic conflict, harm is a two-way street. Animals may administer suffering to help punish the behavior of humanity, but as part of creation they suffer in turn as a consequence of human sin (Jer 12:4; Joel 1:18, 20). In fact all creation groans under the burden of the Fall (Rom 8:22). The coming Messianic kingdom, with the absence of "natural" evils like decay, will be unrecognizable by biological criteria of this age (Is 65:25).

Fish. Although not traditionally a sea-faring people, the Israelites did enjoy many varieties of fish as food (Deut 14:9). The abundance of fish in Egypt was one of the pleasant memories (Num 11:5). The desire for fresh fish caused some to ignore Sabbath regulations and buy from the men of Tyre (Neh 13:16).

The relative ease with which unsuspecting game is taken by fishing allows an efficient and ruthless enemy to be characterized as fishers and hunters (Jer 16:16). People were hooked and dragged like fish (Hab 1:15; Amos 4:2). The oppressed or victims of the wicked are like fish or game trapped in nets (Mic 7:2; Ezek 32:3; Ps 66:11). (In addition to fishing, nets were used widely for hunting and war.) The same image has a positive twist in Jesus' expression "fishers of men" (Mt 4:18). Like the winnowing after harvest or the separation of the flock, the sorting of the catch serves as a metaphor for the final judgment (Mt 13:47).

Paul argues by analogy from the difference in flesh of beast, fowl and fish (1 Cor 15:39), a distinction that allowed centuries of believers to eat protein on Fridays even when "meat" was banned. The fish became a special symbol for early Christians because the letters of the Greek word IXTHUS formed an acrostic for the initials of several common names for Jesus: Iēsous, Xristos, Theou Hyios, Sōtēr (Jesus, Christ, Son of God, Savior). In an age where words were regarded not as merely arbitrary symbols, but as repositories of deeper, secret sense, discernible by the learned, acrostics held special significance and revealed deeper meanings. In this case it also pointed to other symbolic links: loaves and fishes, the trade of many apostles, the breakfast by the sea and so forth.

See also Birds; Cattle; Dog; Donkey, Ass; Dove; Eagle; Fish, Fisherman; Flock; Goat; Horse; Hunting; Lamb; Lion; Mythical Animals; Ox, Oxen; Plants; Scapegoat; Sheep, Shepherd; Swine; Trap, Trapping; Wolf.

Bibliography. G. S. Cansdale, All the Animals of the Bible Lands (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970); E. Firmage, "Zoology," ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 6:1109—67; B. L. Goddard, Animals and Birds of the Bible (Grand Rapids: Associated Publishers and Authors [n. d.]); Fauna and Flora of the Bible (New York: United Bible Societies, 1972).

ANNUNCIATION

Although technically a general term referring to the announcement of some impending event, in modern English annunciation has come to be associated almost exclusively with the angel Gabriel's announcement to Mary that she is to be the mother of Jesus. The image of the young girl receiving such an unexpected and disturbing message has caught the imagination of artists through the centuries so completely that it comes as a surprise to many to realize that the story is told only once, in Luke's Gospel, and is not referred to, either directly or indirectly, anywhere else in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . However, there are many associated stories and ideas, and the simple, brief record in Luke 1:26—38 is packed with images and concepts that are picked up elsewhere in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] and given great significance.

The angel Gabriel, Daniel's instructor (Dan 8:16; 9:21) and well known in intertestamental literature as a senior spiritual messenger, is sent by God, who is clearly portrayed as the prime director in this situation. The angel is acting solely and entirely on his behalf. The recipient of his message is Mary, an engaged virgin, signifying both purity and preparedness. The picture is not one of mere objective transfer of information. Mary is spoken to by name and recognized as a person. She herself, noted as already being aware of God and his presence, has been specifically chosen not simply to receive the message of the impending arrival of "the Son of the Most High" (Lk 1:32 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) but actually to be his mother. Her natural fear and perplexity are noted and dealt with. She and her reactions are taken seriously.

Thus the story has more than christological significance. It reinforces the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] teaching that God relates to individuals and is personally involved with human beings. It confirms that women are significant to him in their own right. It recognizes the importance of response, in Mary's case, dependence and freely accepted obedience: "Here I am, the servant of the Lord; let it be with me according to your word" (Lk 1:38). It majors on purpose and on hope. God's involvement with individual human beings comes in a context of concern for humankind as a whole. This story clearly conveys the fact that God has purposes for the world and will take action to ensure that these purposes are carried out. This in itself brings a strong sense of hope, reinforced by the picture of impending new birth—there is something to which Mary, and humankind as a whole, can look forward.

But clearly the christological significance is there and is important. The baby to be born will be a human being with a human name, Jesus, which indicates a task of redemption (Mt 1:21). But this particular human baby will also be "the Son of the Most High." The Holy Spirit himself will provide the power that will make his birth possible. His greatness, his rule and the eternal nature of his task are all indicated: "The child to be born will be holy; he will be called Son of God" (Lk 1:35). The specialness of Mary, favored by God, pales into insignificance when compared with the specialness of her son.

John Macquarrie regards the annunciation to Mary as a helpful illustration in the understanding of the church. He sees a parallel between the original bringing to birth of Christ and the responsibility of the church to, as it were, bring Christ to birth in the world. "Just as she was the bearer of the Christ, so the Church his body, brings christhood into the world. But this takes place through the action of the Spirit in the Church which again is the community of the Spirit" (Macquarrie, 354). Thus the annunciation reminds us of the involvement of God in providing his power and his grace, of the way in which he comes to human beings, conveying to them his purposes and allowing or calling them to have a part in carrying out those purposes.

Other Annunciation Stories. There are related annunciations to Joseph (Mt 1:18–25) and to Zechariah (Lk 1:5–20). Both of these also capture the sense of God’s involvement with human history, the reality of communication and relationship, the care for human feelings and human reactions, and the awareness of both purpose and hope. But there are a number of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stories that are brought to mind by the annunciation to Mary in Luke 1:26–38 and the following verses where Mary and Elizabeth reflect together on what has happened to them and how it affects the history of God’s people.

The narratives in Genesis 15:4–5, 17:15–21 and 18:9–15 describe Sarah and Abraham receiving the specific announcement that within the year they will have their own child. That the connection with Luke 1 is more than just incidental is shown by Gabriel, as he tells Mary of the pregnancy of the older Elizabeth, picking up as a statement the question that faced Sarah and Abraham, “Is anything too hard for the Lord?” Where God is involved, the concept of impossibility has to be completely reconsidered.

The predicted birth in Isaiah 7:14, which comes to initial fulfillment in Isaiah 8:3, is directly related in Matthew 1:22–23 to the announcement to Joseph of Jesus’ birth. Perhaps it is the elements of hope and a transformed future that provide the greatest link at that point. The announcement of the impending birth of Samson to Manoah’s wife in Judges 13 and the story of Samuel’s birth in 1 Samuel 1–2 (not strictly an annunciation but with many connection to the accounts in Luke 1) both bring out the way in which God relates directly to women as actors in, not just observers of, the ongoing program that God has set before his people. The cooperation between God and his servants seems to be a key concept in the annunciation image.

In summary, the annunciation is one of the incremental motifs in the Bible that keeps amplifying until it reaches its culmination in the example of Christ. The stories that make up the “canon” of this genre are those involving Abraham and Sarah; Samson’s mother, Hannah; Zechariah; and finally, Mary.

See also Angel; Barrenness; Birth; Birth Story; Mary the Mother of Jesus.

Bibliography. R. Alter, “How Convention Helps us Read: The Case of the Bible’s Annunciation Type-Scene,” Proof 3 (1983) 115–30; R. E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah (2d ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] ; New York: Doubleday, 1993); J. Macquarrie, Principles of Christian Theology, (London: SCM, 1966).

ANOINTING

To anoint literally means to pour or rub oil on a person or thing. Rooted in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] culture the practice of anointing in the Bible symbolizes various kinds of special recognition shown to places (Gen 28:18); temple and its furnishings (Ex 40:9–10); garments (Lev 8:30); kings (1 Kings 1:39; 2 Kings 9:6); religious leaders (Ex 28:41; Lev 8:12, priests; 1 Kings 19:16, prophets); heavenly beings (Ezek 28:14); or simply honored guests (Ps 23:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 7:46; Jn 11:2). Anointing usually means two things: it sets a person or thing apart as holy and consecrated, and it confers authority on a person who is anointed. In the Bible the holiness and authority that reside in ritual anointing are considered to be conferred by God, though mediated through a person acting on God's behalf.

In the ancient Near East, anointing with oil was used to ratify and solemnize commitment in diplomatic relations, business contracts, nuptial rites and the liberation of slaves. It did not necessarily have religious significance. Some of these aspects are reflected in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passages such as Genesis 28:18–22, where the anointing rite is a symbol of contractual relations between Jacob and God, or Hosea 12:1 and 1 Kings 5:11, where oil is used as an expression of friendship. In addition, Mesopotamian anointing rites included the idea of people being permeated by divine activity and supernatural power.

In OT [OT OT. Old Testament] religious rituals, anointing signifies consecration for priestly (Ex 30:30; Lev 4:3, 5) and royal service (1 Sam 2:10). It symbolizes God's choice and appointment and therefore involves divine action in preparation for service (1 Sam 10:1). The powerful symbolism of this rite accounts for the preservation of Saul's life in 1 Samuel 26:9–23—to kill Saul would show disregard for the king's special status as God's anointed (see 2 Sam 1:16; 2 Sam 19:21). In this respect, anointing involves God's blessing and preservation (Ps 18:50; Hab 3:13). After Solomon's anointing, words of blessing are declared on him (1 Kings 1:39), and warnings come to kings themselves not to harm God's anointed prophets (1 Chron 16:22; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 105:15).

The theme of blessing is further associated with the anointing rite in Psalm 133:2, where precious oil is used as a metaphor for God's bountiful provision for priestly leaders. A similar emphasis occurs in Psalm 45:7, where the anointing of a royal figure is described as an anointing of joy. In 1 Samuel 10:6–9 God's role in anointing is associated with the receiving of God's Spirit, the change of heart and the promise of God's presence. The same emphasis occurs in 1

Samuel 16:13, where David's anointing immediately precedes his receipt of "the Spirit of the Lord ... in power." Thus the anointing of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] kings is a special symbol of God's provision through the gift of his Spirit.

It is appropriate, therefore, that in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the title "anointed one" becomes a synonym for individuals chosen, appointed, consecrated and equipped for office. The title is restricted to royal figures (Ps 2:2; 89:38; 132:10) except for Daniel 9:25–26, where it refers to a future ruler. Hence, in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] it is appropriate that the title, in its Greek form "Christ" (Christos), is applied to Jesus (Jn 1:41; 4:25; Acts 4:24–27).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the rite of anointing is not used for consecration or worship. Instead, anointing is often thought of in figurative terms to describe the spiritual basis of Jesus' ministry (Lk 4:18; Acts 10:38; Heb 1:9) and the spiritual work God performs in believers' lives (2 Cor 1:21–22; 1 Jn 2:20, 27). The emphasis is not on the act of anointing but on the Holy Spirit with whom one is anointed.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] also refers to the social use of anointing for embalming and cosmetic purposes (Mt 6:17; Mk 16:1; Lk 7:38, 46; Jn 11:2; 12:3). These instances also suggest that anointing symbolizes the giving of recognition, a concept with its basis in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (see above). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] draws on the cultural use of olive oil for medicinal/healing (see Disease and Healing) purposes in NT [NT NT. New Testament] times (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 6:13; Lk 10:34; Jas 5:14).

See also Holy Spirit; Oil.

ANTICHRIST

Surprisingly, given the highly developed portraits attending the figure of the antichrist throughout Christian history, the term itself appears a mere four times in the Bible—only in 1 and 2 John, never in Revelation. We find comparable figures, however, in Mark 13:22 and parallels (“false christs”), 2 Thessalonians 2:3 (“the lawless one”), and Revelation 13, 17 (the sea beast). These are all related to false prophets: deceivers who steer people from the ways of the Lord (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 13). 2 John 7–11 warns of the coming of deceivers/antichrists, while 1 John 2:18–22; 4:1–6 advises that they are already active. Such people go beyond the teaching of Christ. Their behavior is unloving and immoral. They disavow Jesus’ incarnation and messiahship. The presence of these “enemies of Christ” intimates the advent of “the last days.”

Revelation 13 paints a similar, if more startling, picture. Empowered by the dragon (Satan, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 12:9), the sea beast (see Monster) is Christ’s negative image: he mimics Jesus’ crowns (Rev 13:1; 19:12), his honorable titles (Rev 13:1; 19:11–16), his exercise of divine power (Rev 13:2; 12:5, 10), his promotion of divine worship (Rev 13:4; 1:6) and his death and resurrection (Rev 13:3; 1:18; 5:6). The beast is a counterfeit christ, who through his flashy signs competes with Christ for allegiance and worship (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 13:22; 2 Thess 2:3–4; Rev 13:13–14). Importantly, his power is limited and will be overcome by Christ (2 Thess 2:3; 1 Jn 4:4; Rev 19:20).

John, who wrote to warn Christians against the blasphemous power wielded by the empire, identifies this beast as Rome (“the city on seven hills,” cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 17:9). But his images reveal that the power of antichrist residing in the beast is far bigger than Rome. It lives on beyond the first century, to the present and to the eschaton, wherever the nature and message of Christ are refuted in the service of fraudulent demands for absolute loyalty.

See also Christ; Enemy; Monster, Monsters; Satan.

Bibliography. W. Bousset, The Antichrist Legend (London: Hutchinson, 1896); B. McGinn, Antichrist: Two Thousand Years of the Human Fascination with Evil (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1994).

ANTIHERO

The antihero is a familiar archetype in modern literature—the protagonist characterized by an absence of the traits or roles that conventionally qualify a person to be considered heroic. It is no surprise that we find antiheroes in a book that subverts worldly standards of success as often as the Bible does. The key text is 1 Corinthians 1:26–31, where Paul asserts regarding those who came to faith in Christ that “not many of you were wise according to worldly standards, not many were powerful, not many were of noble birth” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Biblical narrative gives us numerous examples of the pattern.

The younger child who supplants the elder is so frequent in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] that it can be called a biblical archetype, and in it we can see an inversion of an important conventional heroic norm that was especially important in the ancient world. Joseph and David were both youngest sons chosen by God for a heroic destiny rather than other family members. Moses lacked the eloquence that ordinarily accompanied heroism in the ancient world (Ex 3–4); Jeremiah felt similarly inadequate (Jer 1:4–10). Several OT [OT OT. Old Testament] characters rose to heroic prominence in foreign cultures when their status as exiles might have seemed to disqualify them—Joseph, Ruth, Daniel, Esther. Even a prostitute (Rahab) makes it into the roll call of faith (Heb 11:31). The antihero motif also finds its way in latent form into the hero stories of the Bible, where the list of wholly idealized characters is exceedingly brief and where even the most heroic characters are usually portrayed as having flaws.

Gideon is perhaps the most fully drawn antihero in biblical narrative (Judg 6–8). He begins as a classic case of low self-esteem. Instead of being of royal blood, he comes from the weakest clan in his tribe and describes himself as being the least in his family (Judg 6:15). Whereas the conventional hero story celebrates deliverance brought about by great and strong warriors, the story of Gideon shows the small part that human effort plays in the conquest of the enemy. Instead of accepting the conventional reward for military victory—kingship—Gideon declines on the ground that God is the real deliverer (Judg 8:22–23). As in many of the OT [OT. Old Testament] narratives, God is given the honor that is usually accorded a human hero. Gideon, in short, is an antihero in his lack of self-reliance and of any achievement that he can call his own, and in his unwillingness to aggrandize himself by assuming political rulership.

The NT [NT. New Testament] counterpart is Paul, whose heroic status is built largely on an absence of the traits and achievements that would ordinarily be considered heroic. Paul's heroism stemmed from God-given authority rather than from his natural abilities. The Corinthian congregation found Paul's letters "weighty and strong, but his bodily presence ... weak, and his speech of no account" (2 Cor 10:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). He was afflicted by "a thorn in the flesh" (2 Cor 12:7), and it was only by God's grace that his weakness did not hinder his effectiveness (v. 9). Externally, Paul's career is a litany of failures—"beatings, imprisonments, tumults, labors, watching, hunger" (2 Cor 6:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The motif of the antihero enters nonnarrative passages as well. Psalm 18:31—42 follows a conventional motif of martial literature—the arming of the hero and the warrior’s boast—but here the arming of the hero is ascribed to God, who is also the subject of the warrior’s boast. The songs of Hannah (1 Sam 2:1—10) and Mary (Lk 1:46—55) celebrate God’s “deheroizing” of the exalted figures in society and elevation of those without heroic claim. The beatitudes of Christ’s Sermon on the Mount paint a portrait of a person whose salient traits reverse what the human race has usually regarded as heroic behavior. A prophet like Amos is heroic only in the strength of God’s call; he himself is “no prophet, nor a prophet’s son; but ... a herdsman, and a dresser of sycamore trees” (Amos 7:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The apotheosis of the antihero comes in the song of the suffering servant in Isaiah 52:13—53:12. We might say that if we use conventional heroic norms as a standard, this servant is praised for all the wrong reasons. He is without distinguished ancestry or impressive appearance. In fact, he is mutilated and executed instead of winning a battle against enemies. He is silent instead of assertive, he wins rewards for others instead of himself, and he dies condemned as an ordinary criminal, making “his grave with the wicked” (Is 53:9). Even the conventional picture of dividing “the spoil with the strong” (Is 43:10) is atypical, inasmuch as the “spoil” is spiritual rather than physical, achieved for others rather than himself. This portrait of the Messiah is elaborated in the Gospels, where we read about Jesus’ humble origins and the failure of his career when judged by conventional standards of success.

See also Hero, Heroine; Younger Child.

ANTLER.

See Horn.

APOCALYPSE, GENRE OF

Apocalypse was a literary genre that flourished in the period between the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] (though apocalyptic visions of the future can be found in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as well as the NT [NT NT. New Testament]). When read aloud an apocalypse held ancient listeners spellbound with special effects and promise of better days ahead. Visions of heaven and the future, featuring extraordinary creatures and events, focused attention on a whole new world. Natural catastrophes ravaging the earth portrayed God's final judgment on the evil in the world. Cosmic fireworks ushering in the new age suggested how revolutionary God's decisive triumph would be. These previews of God's will being "done on earth as it is in heaven" drew the attention of hearers away from the crises of everyday life. They caught glimpses of another time and another world where, devoid of the vice of the present global order, the virtue of God's universal order prevailed.

But today's readers are often puzzled and frustrated by this genre. The unexpected imagery and out-of-this-world experiences seem bizarre and out of sync with most of Scripture. Taking this literature at face value leaves many readers scrambling to determine "what will happen when," thus missing the intent of the apocalyptic message. Yet apocalypticism, the perspective that informs apocalyptic literature, is in some ways very modern: current science fiction and space fantasy in both literature and movies use graphic and disturbing images similar to those in the genre of apocalypse.

Characteristics. Apocalypse as a genre is exceptional for its underlying feeling of hopelessness: evil seems to have the upper hand. The conclusion is that things will definitely get worse before they get better. Yet glimpses of heaven and the future make it clear that God is on the throne and in control. And those glimpses reveal how totally opposite are our world and God's. Fortunately, God will soon start the processes to make our world like his world. But the predicament is so critical that God himself must visit this earth again. The only solution is catastrophic judgment against all forms of evil and the establishment of a completely new order that will last forever.

Taking its name from the Greek word for "revelation" (apokalypsis), apocalypse is the genre primarily identified with the book of Daniel in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and the book of Revelation in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . But it is difficult to set clear boundaries around the genre of apocalypse, because apocalypticism is a way of thinking that emerges in various contexts. Several passages in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] employ apocalyptic content and technique (Is 24–27, 56–66, Ezek 38–39, Joel 2:28–3:21, Zech 1–6 and 12–14), suggesting that a shift from prophecy to apocalyptic was underway toward the close of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

The majority of extant apocalypses were written after the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] period. They are included in the group of writings now known as the Jewish pseudepigrapha. 1 and 2 Enoch, Jubilees, 2 and 3 BARUCH is Pseudepigraphal. Don't tag it!—>3 Baruch, & 4 Ezra; and the Apocalypse of Abraham—all apparently written between the third century b.c. and the second century A.D.—are representative of Jewish apocalyptic. Among the Dead Sea Scrolls, fragments of 1 Enoch have survived; and in some of the literature of the Qumran sect, apocalyptic influence is prominent. During the first few centuries of the church apocalyptic fervor continued, resulting in a variety of Christian apocalypses.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , in addition to the book of Revelation, apocalypticism is especially evident in Jesus' Olivet discourse (Mk 13), in some portions of Paul's letters (1 Thess 4:13—5:11; 2 Thess 2:1—12), and in 2 Pet 3:1—13. Early Christianity had numerous similarities with the apocalyptic movement in Judaism.

Though apocalypse may be considered a subgenre of prophecy, the two literary styles are sufficiently different to merit calling them separate genres. Prophecy speaks to those who have backslidden and begs them to repent; apocalyptic speaks to the faithful and urges them to persevere. Prophecy announces God's judgment of sin on a local scale using natural means; apocalyptic announces a coming cataclysm when the whole earth will be destroyed. Prophecy records its message in poetry; apocalyptic in narrative accounts of visions and heavenly journeys full of mystery. Prophecy promises restoration and future blessing; apocalyptic an unexpected divine visitation that will result in a new heaven and new earth.

Themes and Motifs. Apocalyptic literature has a number of common themes and motifs:

Hopelessness. Evil is intensifying and conditions are deteriorating (Is 57:3—13). The earth is being trampled and crushed by wickedness (Dan 7:23). Famines, earthquakes and wars are increasing (Mk 13:7—8). Persecution is escalating (Mt 24:9—12, 15—22).

God's sovereignty. The Lord can be trusted no matter how bad the situation (Is 26:1—4). Heaven and earth may be destroyed, but God's words will never pass away (Mt 24:35). God is on his throne and takes care of those whose robes have been washed in the blood of the Lamb (Rev 7:14—16).

Catastrophic judgment. Earthquakes will cause walls to fall down, cliffs to crumble and mountains to be turned upside down; hailstones and burning sulfur will fall from the sky (Ezek 38:19–22). The sun will turn black, the moon will turn red, stars will fall on the earth, the elements will be destroyed by fire, and the earth will become bare (Mt 24:29; 2 Pet 3:10; Rev 6:12). Birds will eat the flesh of the rulers of this world (Rev 19:17–18, 21). The perpetrators of evil will be thrown into a lake of burning sulfur (Rev 19:20; see Hell).

Celestial visions. In God's presence, purity is required (Zech 3:3–7). Heavenly creatures are so bright that they appear to be on fire (Dan 10:5–6; Rev 1:12–16). The splendor of heaven is so stunning that it is like a room of precious stones and crystal (Rev 4:2–6; see Jewels and Precious Stones). The new Jerusalem descending from heaven will have twelve gates, each fashioned from a single pearl. It will have transparent gold streets, and it will shine with God's glory (Rev 21:10–27).

Ethical teaching. “Show mercy and compassion to one another ... do not think evil of each other” (Zech 7:9–10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “He who stands firm to the end will be saved” (Mt 24:13). Since the master is returning, faithfulness is required of servants (Mt 24:45–51; 25:14–30). “Since everything will be destroyed in this way, what kind of people ought you to be?” (2 Pet 3:11). “This calls for patient endurance and faithfulness on the part of the saints” (Rev 13:10; 14:12).

Divine visitation. The Lord will appear on the Mount of Olives (Zech 14:4). “Then suddenly the Lord you are seeking will come to his temple” (Mal 3:1). “For as lightning that comes from the east is visible even in the west, so will be the coming of the Son of Man” (Mt 24:27, 30, 36–44; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 25:1–13). “For the Lord himself will come down from heaven” (1 Thess 4:16). “Look, he is coming with the clouds, and every eye will see him” (Rev 1:7). “But if you do not wake up, I will come like a thief, and you will not know at what time I will come to you” (Rev 3:3; 16:15). “I saw heaven standing open and there before me was a white horse, whose rider is called Faithful and True” (Rev 19:11).

The new age. Peace will be restored (Zech 8:3–8). People will enjoy what God intended from the beginning (Mt 25:34). The new heaven and new earth will be a home of righteousness (2 Pet 3:13). A resurrection will bring back to life all those who died unjustly (Rev 20:4–6) as well as all those who have ever lived (Rev 20:12–15). Pain, death, tears and impurity will be removed forever (Rev 21:4, 27). Healing will be provided for everyone (Rev 21:2–3).

The themes of apocalyptic are most often expressed in bold and graphic imagery. This imagery may be allusions to earlier biblical phrases, though the phrases may be reinterpreted in the present context. For example, the “Son of Man”* motif in Mark 13:26 draws on Daniel 7, but the meaning is not the same in both places. The imagery in the book of Revelation has many parallels with the books of Ezekiel and Daniel, but individual images cannot be assumed to mean the same in both contexts. The imagery of apocalyptic is very fluid and is dependent on the immediate context.

Understanding Apocalyptic. The imagery of the genre of apocalypse has probably been subjected to more incorrect interpretation than any other aspect of Scripture. The problem is primarily a matter of distance between the ancient audience and modern interpreters. To bridge that distance the following guidelines are necessary: (1) Read with the ear of an ancient listener. Apocalyptic forms of expression were very common outside the Bible, and contemporary readers need to become familiar with that mindset to understand biblical apocalyptic literature and symbolism. (2) Be sensitive to the setting of crisis.

Apocalyptic authors wrote with a flair for the spectacular in an attempt to lift the sights of despairing listeners from their current problems to God's striking solutions. (3)

Expect symbolic language. The events described in apocalyptic literature are often presented with literary techniques found more commonly in poetry: metaphor, hyperbole, personification, irony, numerical patterns and so forth. These special effects allowed apocalyptic to describe heaven and the future with captivating imagery. (4)

Consider the oral nature of ancient society. Literature was written to be read aloud or quoted from memory. Listeners came away with an overall impression more like an impressionistic painting than like a photograph in high resolution. Individual details remained a puzzle, but the big picture was clear. (5) Recognize the function of apocalypse. It was a message of hope for the oppressed, a warning to the oppressors and a call to commitment for those unsure of their loyalties.

See also Daniel; End, Images of the; Ezekiel; Prophecy, Genre of; Revelation, Book of.

Bibliography. G. B. Caird, The Language and Imagery of the Bible (2d ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] ; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); J. J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Imagination (New York: Crossroads, 1989); D. Hellholm, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] , Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1983); C. C. Rowland, The Open Heaven (London: SPCK, 1982); D. S. Russell, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1964).

APOCALYPTIC VISIONS OF THE FUTURE

More perhaps than any other parts of the Bible, the apocalyptic visions of the end of history and life in the eternal realm are a language of images. Many of these images are fantastic, transcending anything known in empirical reality.

It is possible to get a preliminary view of the territory by dividing the Bible's images of the future into three broad categories. First, there is a neutral category of images that simply portray future events as neither good nor bad in themselves, with their status depending on one's state of soul. Included in this group are the Day of the Lord, the Last Judgment, the appearing of Christ and the resurrection of the dead. Second, there is a category of decidedly negative images, including cosmic collapse, moral degeneration (including the spirit of antichrist and "the lawless one"), a great tribulation and signs preceding the return of Christ. A third category is images of bliss: the millennium, new heavens and a new earth, new Jerusalem, and the wedding feast of the Lamb. Overall, we can generalize about the Bible's images of the future that they combine mingled hope and pessimism.

General Traits. The imagery of these visions is dialectical, dividing the cosmos and the human race into categories of good and evil, light and darkness, redemption and judgment, reward and punishment. The world of the Bible's apocalyptic visions is claimed by God and counterclaimed by forces of evil. There is no neutral ground. Although the good is ultimately victorious, the imagery of terror probably dominates most people's experience of apocalyptic writing.

Apocalyptic imagery is otherworldly or fantastic. Its aim is to suggest a world that transcends ordinary reality. In these visions we move in a world of such fantastic images as "living creatures" with "six wings and ... covered with eyes all around" (Rev 4:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), two flying women with wings like those of a stork (Zech 5:9) and a beast that "was like a lion, and it had the wings of an eagle” and that had its wings plucked off and then stood “on two feet like a man” (Dan 7:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Mythical Animals). The imagery of strangeness is a staple in apocalyptic visions, which are often surrealistic in effect. The characters in this apocalyptic realm are part of its strangeness. Animal characters are common, as are angels and demons.

The imagery of apocalypse is cosmic, extending to the whole universe. The elemental forces of nature—sun, moon, stars, sea, mountain—are part of the cosmic sweep. Often these elemental cosmic forces become actors in the story—falling from the sky, refusing to give their light, being removed from their familiar places, suddenly protecting or attacking human characters.

Symbolic colors and numbers form image patterns in apocalyptic visions. White is the color of purity; red, of either evil or warfare; black, of death. The numbers three, seven, ten and twelve (and their multiples) signify perfection, completeness, fulfillment, victory. Six is a sinister number—approaching seven but falling fatally short.

The imagery of suffering and terror is prominent in apocalyptic visions. We enter a world of heightened terror—of earthquakes and famines, of persecution and war, of people fleeing to the mountains, of fearsome locusts that hurt people with their scorpion-like tails, of plagues. A feeling of helplessness accompanies these visions, inasmuch as the terror is visited upon humanity by forces of superior power, usually supernatural in nature.

For all its apparent concreteness and vividness, the imagery of apocalyptic writing is essentially nonvisual and nonpictorial. While this literature seems to paint specific pictures, the images are almost impossible to put into composite pictorial form. Ezekiel’s vision of the divine chariot and its attendants (Ezek 1) can stand as a test case. Corresponding to the prevailing nonvisual nature of these visions, oral/aural imagery naming sounds is prominent.

Apocalyptic imagery is inherently symbolic. It uses specific images to stand for something or someone else. In the book of Revelation the dragon is Satan, the Lamb, Christ. When Isaiah pictures a river overflowing a nation (8:5–8), it is actually a prediction of invasion by Assyria. Daniel's vision of a statue composed of various minerals is a symbolic picture of successive empires (Dan 2:31–45). We can call this mode "symbolic reality," meaning that it portrays events that really happen in history and at its consummation, but that it does so by means of symbolism. Much of this imagery is like that of our familiar political cartoons in which caricatures and symbolic figures or objects represent people and events on the current scene.

The element of strangeness in apocalyptic imagery can easily lead to the misconception that such writing is esoteric. Yet the word apocalypse means "to unveil." In significant ways apocalyptic writing is folk literature. Its images are those of our waking and sleeping dreams—blood, lamb, dragon, monster, water, sea, sun, war, harvest, bride, throne, jewels. The second half of the book of Revelation is a spiritualized version of familiar folktale motifs: a woman in distress who is marvelously rescued, a hero on a white horse who kills a dragon, a wicked prostitute who is finally exposed, the marriage of the triumphant hero to his bride, the celebration of the wedding with a feast, and a palace glittering with jewels in which the hero and his bride live happily ever after. What apocalyptic imagery most requires of us is a keen eye for the obvious and a childlike receptivity to folktale patterns.

Leading Motifs. Apocalyptic images of the future congregate around five main motifs: (1) the immediacy of the end, (2)

the cataclysmic character of the end, (3) spiritual conflict, (4) the transformation of the cosmos and (5) divine provision in the new epoch of salvation. Apocalyptic visions of the future typically emphasize the coming of God to crush evil, destroy the enemies of God's people and vindicate the faithful.

Immediacy of the end. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the immediacy of the end is conveyed by a variety of images, including the thief who comes in the night (Mt 24:43; Lk 12:39; 1 Thess 5:2, 4; 2 Pet 3:10; Rev 3:3; 16:15), the master who returns after a long journey (Mk 13:34–36; Lk 12:35–38, 42–48) and the bridegroom who arrives in the middle of the night (Mt 25:1–13). In Isaiah 43:19 the “new thing” that God is doing “springs forth” so quickly that God asks, “Do you not perceive it?” The visions of Revelation are an account of “what must soon take place” (Rev 1:1), and the final testimony from Christ in the book is, “Surely I am coming soon” (Rev 22:20).

Cataclysmic end. Apocalyptic visions typically include a stereotyped list of catastrophes that will precede final judgment. These include famine, earthquakes, wars, betrayal, plagues and signs in the heavens (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Joel 2; Mk 13; Rev). Some writings also speak of the coming of a time of great tribulation (Dan 12:1; Mk 13:24; Rev 7:14), an unprecedented time of affliction numbered among the many woes that accompany the end. 2 Peter 3:10 summarizes this direction of thought with its statement that “the heavens will pass away with a loud noise, and the elements will be dissolved with fire, and the earth and the works that are upon it will be burned up” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). While in this picture sudden cataclysm is the dominant motif, we should note in passing that the visions of Revelation present a complementary pattern of slow deterioration of the elements—gradual pollution of streams and the ocean, loss of vegetation, and intensifying heat.

The imagery of cataclysm tells us at least two things. First, it underscores the power of evil. Human agency will never be enough to overcome the forces of evil. Only God can do so, and he will do it decisively at the end of time. Second, this imagery emphasizes the need for faithful and holy living in the midst of affliction and in anticipation of the age of salvation.

Spiritual battle. Good and evil are engaged in a final combat to the death. Battle imagery is prominent—for example, Michael and his angels are fighting against the dragon (Rev 12:7). In apocalyptic realms, beasts arise from the sea to make war on the saints (Rev 13:1–10), the kings of the earth gather to make war against Christ (Rev 19:19) and Satan’s hosts surround the camp of the saints (Rev 20:9). All of this battle imagery is unsettling, of course, but our anxiety as we read is kept in check by the consistency with which the forces of evil are finally punished for the havoc they have either threatened or achieved. The battle motif is resolved by the imagery of punishment for evil—the winepress of the wrath of God (Rev 14:19–20), plagues visited on the followers of the beast (Rev 16:1–11), the burning of the harlot of Babylon (Rev 18:9–10), the throwing of Satan into the lake of fire (Rev 20:10).

Transformation of the cosmos. At the end, things will be reversed from what has prevailed in fallen history. There are two aspects to this reversal—the defeat of evil, and the triumph of the good. Jeremiah 4:23–28 portrays the “un-creation” of the world that reverses the creation story of Genesis 1. 2 Peter gives us a vision of complete dissolution followed by the assertion, “But according to his promise we wait for new heavens and a new earth in which righteousness dwells” (2 Pet 3:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Revelation 21 uses similarly imagery, drawing explicit attention to the absence of death, mourning, crying and pain, “for the former things have passed away” (Rev 21:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 33:24; 65:20). In the new universe there will be no more sea (Rev 21:1), a reference to the final triumph over evil and chaos, which is often pictured in the Bible as a sea monster: the dragon (Job 7:12; Ps 74:13), Leviathan (Job 40:15—24; Ps 74:13—14; 104:26; Is 27:1), Rahab (Job 9:13; Ps 89:10; Is 51:9—11) and the serpent (Job 26:13; Is 27:1).

Divine provision in the new epoch of salvation. The apocalyptic vision is not all one of gloom and doom. Though apocalyptic visions may appear to be pessimistic, they actually move toward a vision of good triumphant. It is true that these visions offer little hope of recovery in the present age; but even in the tumultuous history of the world, God is working a redemptive purpose. Even more importantly, though, apocalyptic visions are emphatic that good will ultimately and completely defeat evil. Hence, they picture a new order in which all human needs are satisfied, including the longing for evil to be eradicated from human life. The “golden age” prophecies of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 60—66; Jer 30—33; Amos 9:11—15), as well as the interspersed visions of heavenly bliss in the book of Revelation, offer assurances at the level of imagery that all will be well and all manner of things will be well.

See also Afterlife; Antichrist; Apocalypse, Genre of; Day, Day of the Lord; End Times; Millennium; Prophecy, Genre of; Revelation, Book of; Second Coming.

Bibliography. D. E. Aune, “Apocalypticism,” DPL [DPL DPL. Dictionary of Paul and His Letters] 25—35; G. B. Caird, The Language and Imagery of the Bible (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997 [1980]); L. J. Kreitzer, “Apocalyptic, Apocalypticism,” DLNTD [DLNTD DLNTD. Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Developments] 55–68.

APOSTASY

The images used to portray apostasy generally show a gradual and self-willed movement away from God. Such apostasy is pictured as a seed planted on thorny ground and choked by thorns (cares of the world, Lk 8:14), the heart hardened by the deceit of sin (Heb 3:12–15), “crucifying again the Son of God and holding him up to contempt” (Heb 6:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and having “spurned the Son of God, profaned the blood of the covenant ... and outraged the Spirit of grace” (Heb 10:29). There are at least four distinct images in Scripture of the concept of apostasy. All connote an intentional defection from the faith. The four images are rebellion, backsliding or turning away, falling away, and adultery.

Rebellion. In classical literature apostasias was used to denote a coup or defection. By extension the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] always uses it to portray a rebellion against God (Josh 22:22; 2 Chron 29:19). The defining image is the rebellion of Satan (“adversary”) against God. The picture is one of seemingly loyal followers turning against their leader. The thorny theological issues are not addressed by this image, which is content to portray seemingly loyal followers who, generally through a crisis, become rebels against God’s reign. Paul predicted that a serious apostasy (“day of rebellion”) would occur before the end of the age as a result of the antichrist’s work (2 Thess 2:3).

Turning away. Apostasy is also pictured as the heart turning away from God (Jer 17:5–6) and righteousness (Ezek 3:20). In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] it centers on Israel’s breaking covenant relationship with God through disobedience to the law (Jer 2:19), especially following other gods (Judg 2:19) and practicing their immorality (Dan 9:9–11). Through the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] the term backsliding (Jer 2:19, 5:6) has become a common phrase for certain forms of apostasy.

The image of backsliding should be powerful because following the Lord or journeying with him is one of the chief images of faithfulness in the Scriptures. Leaders are the ones that troops and disciples literally follow. Abigail referred to David's troops as "the men who follow you" (1 Sam 25:27). In the image system of Scripture, what one follows reflects one's values. On the mundane level, when David was a shepherd, his routine was set by the sheep so much that it can be said, "Now then, tell my servant David, 'This is what the Lord Almighty says: I took you from the pasture and from following the flock to be ruler over my people Israel'" (2 Sam 7:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In another context, Peter can allude to a path not taken. He declares, "We did not follow cleverly invented stories when we told you about the power and coming of our Lord Jesus" (2 Pet 1:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The same Hebrew root (swr) is used to picture those who have turned away and ceased to follow God ("I am grieved that I have made Saul king, because he has turned away from me," 1 Sam 15:11) as well as those who repent ("But in their distress they turned to the Lord, the God of Israel, and sought him, and he was found by them," 2 Chron 15:4). The image of turning away from the Lord, who is the rightful leader, and following behind false gods is the dominant image for apostasy in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

Falling. The image of falling, with the sense of going to eternal destruction, is particularly evident in the New Testament. Underlying this image is the association of falling with physical injury and disability (Prov 24:16; Jer 8:4) and with destruction when structures collapse as did the walls of Jericho (Josh 6:20) or the tent in the Midianite soldier's vision (Judg 7:13).

While slipping and falling are part of our universal human experience, their use in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] was undoubtedly furthered by Jesus' effective use of this image. In his parable of the wise and foolish builders, in which the house built on sand falls with a crash in the midst of a storm (Mt 7:24–27), and of the blind leading the blind, in which both fall into a pit (Lk 6:39), he painted a highly memorable image of the dangers of falling spiritually. The image of falling takes a different shape when Jesus is spoken of as “destined for the falling and the rising of many in Israel” (Lk 2:34 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jesus speaks of himself as a stone rejected by the builders that causes some to fall and break in pieces (Lk 20:18). The author to the Hebrews graphically describes the effects of falling away for those “who have once been enlightened, who have tasted the heavenly gift, who have shared in the Holy Spirit, who have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the coming age.” They cannot be restored because they are “crucifying the Son of God all over again and subjecting him to public disgrace” (Heb 6:4–6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Adultery. Adultery is the most common concrete image for apostasy in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Apostasy is symbolized as Israel the faithless spouse turning away from Yahweh her marriage partner to pursue the advances of other gods (Jer 2:1–3; Ezek 16; see Prostitute). These images from Jeremiah and Ezekiel suggest how intensely God loves his people and how hurt he is by their betrayal: “Your children have forsaken me and sworn by gods that are not gods. I supplied all their needs, yet they committed adultery and thronged to the houses of prostitutes” (Jer 5:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Adultery is used most often to graphically name the horror of the betrayal and covenant breaking involved in idolatry. Like literal adultery it does include the idea of someone blinded by infatuation, in this case for an idol: “How I have been grieved by their adulterous hearts ... which have lusted after their idols” (Ezek 6:9).

The association of idolatry and adultery is a powerful and multifaceted metaphor for the biblical writers, perhaps reflecting the ritual practices of Canaanite fertility religion. Idolatry, like an illicit love affair, could cause one to forget about important relationships: “[they] did not remember the Lord their God, who had rescued them from the hands of all their enemies on every side” (Judg 8:34). Israel’s engagement with idolatry, particularly with Baal, elicits descriptions such as, “No sooner had Gideon died than the Israelites again prostituted themselves to the Baals” (Judg 8:33). The erotic appeal of Baal is conveyed in the Lord’s word to Elijah: “Yet I reserve seven thousand in Israel—all whose knees have not bowed down to Baal and all whose mouths have not kissed him” (1 Kings 19:18). The idea of secrecy, which is a prominent aspect of sexual adultery, is alluded to in Job 31:27: “My heart was secretly enticed and my hand offered them [the sun and moon as deities] a kiss of homage.” In general, idol worship was so brazen that this secretive element is not an explicit part of the imagery of adultery as apostasy.

Other images. Israel the apostate is pictured in a variety of other colorful images: a rebellious ox, a prostitute, a wild vine, a stain that will not wash off, a camel in heat and a thief caught in thievery (Jer 2:19–28). Images of peril accompany apostasy, for to have forsaken God is to be subject to his judgment (Ex 22:20; Deut 6:14—15; 17:2—7). The prophetic proclamation of Israel is basically a call to repent of apostasy or be destroyed by foreign powers.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] contains a host of images of apostasy, including a plant taking root among the rocks but withering under the hot sun of testing (Mk 4:5—6, 17 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]), or those who fall prey to the wiles of false teachers (Mt 24:11), heretical beliefs (1 Tim 4:1; 2 Tim 4:3—4), worldliness and its defilement (2 Pet 2:20—22), and persecution (Mt 24:9—10; Rev 3:8). The Christian apostate is pictured as a branch that does not abide in the vine of Christ and thus withers and is cast into the fire (Jn 15:6). Animal behavior is evoked in a dog returning to its vomit or a clean pig (see Swine) returning to the mire (2 Pet 2:22).

Jewish apocalyptic contains the image of the great apostasy that precedes the coming of the Messiah (1 Enoch 93:9), which in Christian thought accompanies the antichrist or “man of lawlessness” and precedes the second coming of Christ (2 Thess 2:3). It depicts the final and all-out attempt of rebellious evil to usurp the claims of God and gain the allegiance of humankind.

See also Adultery; Prostitute, Prostitution; Rebellion; Sin.

Bibliography. I. H. Marshall, Kept by the Power of God: A Study of Perseverance and Falling Away (London: Epworth, 1969; repr. [repr. repr.. reprint] , Minneapolis: Bethany Fellowship, 1975); M. Gundry-Volf, Paul and Perseverance: Staying In and Falling Away (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1990).

APOSTLE.

See Authority, Human.

APPETITE

Spiritual hunger and thirst are recurring concepts in both the Old and New Testaments. Physical sensations associated with hunger and thirst are linked repeatedly with the felt need for spiritual resources, goodness or communion with God himself. The physical sensation of hunger is a natural figure for man's spiritual longing. As Alexander Schmemmann writes, "In the biblical story of creation man is presented, first of all, as a hungry being, and the whole world as his food" (Schmemmann, 11). And again, "Behind all the hunger of our life is God. All desire is finally for Him" (Schmemmann, 14). Food and eating images constitute a major motif of the Bible and help deliver one of its major themes: humanity lives in daily, hourly, dependence—both physical and spiritual—on God the providential Creator. So it is not surprising that appetite is an important figure as well.

From the beginning, people have failed to seek satisfaction in the right place; they have sought to satisfy spiritual hunger and thirst with literal food, sex, knowledge, wealth or political power of one kind or another. Spiritual appetite has one ultimate and proper object, God himself. The psalmist affirms God as the appetite's proper object in a fine, food-related image: "Taste and see that the Lord is good; blessed is the man that takes refuge in him" (Ps 34:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Another familiar passage implicitly points to God as the proper object of spiritual appetite: "As the deer pants for streams of water, so my soul pants for you, O God. My soul thirsts for God, for the living God" (Ps 42:1—3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Two more examples will suffice to illustrate this image pattern: "For he satisfies the thirsty and fills the hungry with good things" (Ps 107:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); "I spread out my hands to you; my soul thirsts for you like a parched land” (Ps 143:6).

The most obvious improper object of spiritual appetite, not surprisingly, is literal food and drink in excess. When these objects are consumed intemperately, the behavior is called gluttony. While Adam and Eve’s eating of the fruit of the knowledge of good and evil was an act of disobedience and pride, it was also an act of misdirected appetite. (The poet Milton saw the embodiment of all sins in Adam and Eve’s act, including gluttony.) In the wilderness God provided manna; however, “some of them paid no attention to Moses; they kept part of it until morning, but it was full of maggots and began to smell” (Ex 16:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Interestingly, Jesus notes that the manna eaten in the wilderness was not the true bread from heaven, but that rather he is the true bread, the proper object of spiritual appetite. Gluttony and drunkenness are often linked as essentially the same sin (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 21:20; Prov 23:21).

Jesus explicitly warns against the displacement of the spiritual appetite by literal food, drink and worldly cares: “Be careful, or your hearts will be weighed down with dissipation, drunkenness and the anxieties of life, and that day will close on you unexpectedly like a trap” (Lk 21:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; emphasis added). With Jesus also comes the promise of living water, an expression associated with both the indwelling Spirit and with general spiritual fulfillment. In the Sermon on the Mount we find the best-known hunger-and-thirst passage: “Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they will be filled” (Mt 5:6; see also Lk 6:21). Jesus’ use of water imagery related to thirst appears in John 4, 6, and 7. When the Samaritan woman marvels that he, a Jew, would ask her for water, he answers: “If you knew the gift of God and who it is that asks you for a drink, you would have asked him and he would have given you living water.” And, “whoever drinks the water I give him will never thirst. Indeed, the water I give him will become in him a spring of water welling up to eternal life” (Jn 4:10, 14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But she, mistaking his meaning, expresses her hope that she will not have to come to the well anymore to draw.

In Capernaum, Jesus used similar images, declaring himself to be the bread of life to the crowd he miraculously fed the day before: “I am the bread of life. He who comes to me will never go hungry, and he who believes in me will never be thirsty” (Jn 6:35). And in Jerusalem, at the Feast of Tabernacles, “Jesus stood and said in a loud voice, ‘If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me and drink. Whoever believes in me, as the Scripture has said, streams of living water will flow from within him.’ By this he meant the Spirit, whom those who believed in him were later to receive. Up to that time the Spirit had not been given, since Jesus had not yet been glorified” (Jn 7:37–9). Clearly the image of living water is associated with the indwelling Spirit’s work in the life of the God-hungry, God-sustained individual—the spiritual, as opposed to the carnal, being. Jesus’ imagery echoes several OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passages and anticipates the images of his revelation to John: “The words of man’s mouth are as deep waters, and the wellspring of wisdom as a flowing brook” (Prov 18:4 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; see also Ps 36:9; Is 12:3; Jer 2:13). In Revelation 7:16–17 we are reminded of the shepherd of Psalm 23, leading his flock beside the still waters: Never again will they hunger; never again will they thirst. The sun will not beat upon them, nor any scorching heat. For the Lamb at the center of the throne will be their shepherd; he will lead them to springs of living water. And God will wipe away every tear from their eyes (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In this neat reversal the Lamb leads the saved to “living fountains of waters.” Finally, at the close of Revelation, we read: “The Spirit and the bride say, ‘Come!’ And let him who hears say, ‘Come!’ Whoever is thirsty, let him come; and whoever wishes, let him take the free gift of the water of life” (Rev 22:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In addition to directing the heart’s appetite toward its true object, Jesus clearly states that the mind and body’s uncontrolled appetites are enemies to spiritual growth: “The worries of this life, the deceitfulness of wealth and the desires for other things come in and choke the word, making it unfruitful” (Mk 4:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul and Peter each insist on personal discipline regarding the appetites: “Let us behave decently, as in the daytime, not in orgies and drunkenness, not in sexual immorality and debauchery, not in dissension and jealousy. Rather, clothe yourselves with the Lord Jesus Christ, and do not think about how to gratify the desires of the sinful nature” (Rom 13:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “For you have spent enough time in the past doing what pagans choose to do- living in debauchery, lust, drunkenness, orgies, carousing and detestable idolatry” (1 Pet 4:3).

In summary, as portrayed in the Bible, people are creatures of appetite. They were created as such by God. On a physical level, appetite itself is good, and one of the things that makes the Song of Songs so refreshing is that the voice of satisfied appetite is strong (Song 2:3; 4:16; 5:1). But the attempt to find satisfaction on a purely earthly and physical level is futile, as the book of Ecclesiastes shows with its repeated pictures of unsatisfied appetite (see especially Eccl 6:7, with its assertion that “all the labor of man is for his mouth, and yet the appetite is not filled” KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Human appetite is ultimately filled by God—by tasting and seeing that the Lord is good—and the person who trusts in God is blessed (Ps 34:8).

See also Drink; Drunkenness; Eating; Food.

Bibliography. A. Schmemmann, For the Life of the World: Sacraments and Orthodoxy (Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's University Press, 1973).

APSU.

See Cosmology.

ARCHANGEL.

See Angel.

ARCHERY

The use of the bow and arrow, for which there is evidence from 1900 b.c., is referred to from Genesis (21:20, 27:3) to Revelation (6:2). Although occasionally mentioned in reference to hunting or in harmless activities, it is primarily viewed as an effective weapon of war and instrument of execution (Gen 48:22; 1 Sam 31:3; 2 Sam 11:24; 2 Kings 9:24; 2 Chron 35:23). Archers were foremost in the heat of the battle. It is the sense of its penetrating and deadly accuracy that lies behind its imagery. Archers were part of the warfare of ancient Israel, but most of the archers mentioned in the Bible are from foreign armies. Archers killed Uriah the Hitite (2 Sam 11:24); a Syrian archer killed Ahab (1 Kings 22:34); Egyptian archers killed Josiah (2 Chron 24:23).

Job complained that his suffering made him feel that God was using him for target practice. He felt cornered by God's archers and vividly describes being stalked and pitilessly attacked: "His archers surround me. Without pity, he pierces my kidneys and spills my gall on the ground” (Job 16:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 7:20; 16:12). This complaint was echoed by Jeremiah in Lamentations (2:4; 3:12–13). Habakkuk (3:9) similarly resorted to the image of archery as a symbol of God’s anger. The unleashing of skilled archers to attack Babylon without restraint is also said to be the means by which God would mete out his judgment on her for her wickedness (Jer 50:9, 14, 29; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 51:3). The ability of an arrow to find a chink in one’s armor and thereby deliver the judgment of God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ahab in 1 Kings 22) makes the arrow and archer a symbol for the vulnerability of all humans, no matter how powerful or protected, and the inevitability of God’s judgment.

The piercing destructiveness of the arrow becomes a fitting picture of other destructive elements, from the conspiratorial or deceptive tongue on the personal level (Ps 64:3; Jer 9:8) to the onset of famine on a national level (Ezek 5:16). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Paul adopts the imagery of arrows with heads set on fire to warn believers of the attacks of the devil and to encourage them to seek protection by taking up the shield of faith (Eph 6:16).

Consistent with its military usage, peace is symbolized by broken bows and the removal of bows and arrows (Ps 46:9; Hos 2:18; Zech 9:10). On one occasion, Hosea 1:5, the broken bow is used less happily to signal Israel’s defeat. Bows can fail, and God’s people are encouraged not to substitute their trust in him for trust in the bow (Ps 44:6–7; Hos 1:7). The image of the faulty bow is also developed differently as a picture of unreliable people in whom God cannot place his trust (Ps 78:57; Hos 7:16).

Archery is also used as the basis for more positive images. Psalm 18, a song of victory that celebrates a warrior’s victory on the battlefield, paints a vivid picture of the skill and muscular strength required in an archer's hands and arms to wield a bow (v. 34), attributing the training in that skill to God. The psalms also compare the blessing of many sons to the happiness of an archer having a quiver full of arrows (127:3—5). This passage may also indicate that the archer had become a symbol not only for skill and terror but for of virility and manliness.

Isaiah speaks of the servant of the Lord as made into a “polished arrow” and concealed in God's quiver (49:2). As such the servant, free from unevenness or roughness that might deflect the flight, will accurately penetrate the distant target by being a light to the Gentiles. But the servant would be protected until the time was right for advance (Is 49:1—7).

One point popularly made by preachers does not work on closer examination. “Falling short of the glory of God” (Rom 3:23) is often spoken of as missing the mark, that is, failing to hit the target, let alone the bull's-eye, or the arrow dropping short. But hystereo, the word Paul uses here, simply means “absent” or “lacking.”

See also Armor; Arrow, Arrow of God; Divine Warrior; Hunting; Shield; Weapons, Human And Divine.

ARK

The Bible tells about two arks—the ark of Noah and the ark of Moses. While the building of Noah's ark was no doubt a prophetic sign and warning to neighbors who saw its gradual erection, the primary meaning of both of these arks in the Bible is preservation and rescue.

The ark that Noah builds (Gen 6—8) is a huge construction, symbolic of the magnitude of the task God entrusted to the one person of virtue in this day, “a righteous man, blameless in his generation” (Gen 6:9, RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The ark was approximately 450 feet long and 75 feet wide and was divided into three stories of about 15 feet each. An image not only of magnitude but also of sturdiness and careful planning, the ark was made of gopher wood covered inside with waterproof pitch and was divided into separate rooms. By the time we add a roof and a window to the structure, it emerges in our imagination as a floating home, a place of safety for the remnant of the human race and the animal kingdom that survived the flood. The ark singles out its inhabitants as special, the lone survivors of their respective species.

Above all, this ark represents the preservation and rebirth of human life. It preserves life from death as God sends a flood that undoes his creative work in an act of judgment against sinful humanity (Gen 6:5–7). In contrast to the destruction of the world outside the ark, “God remembered Noah and all the beasts and all the cattle that were with him in the ark” (Gen 8:1). Here the ark is the object of God’s mercy toward his creation. Associations of rebirth are indelibly part of our experience of ark through the image of the olive leaf that the dove finally brings back to the ark as the waters subside. Noah steps out of the ark as a second Adam, witnessing a new beginning, as Genesis 9:1 repeats the language of the original creation story: “Be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Gen 9:2–3).

There is also a second, lesser-known ark in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] in the story of the preservation of the infant Moses as he is entrusted to the Nile River (Ex 2:1–3). The word usually translated as “basket” is actually the same word as is translated as “ark” in the story of Noah. The word for ark, tēbâ, appears in the Hebrew Bible only in these two places; and in both, the person the ark is to serve is similarly indicated (l'kâ, “for yourself”; lô, “for him”). As the rabbis recognized (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Exod. Rab. 1:20), Moses is a second Noah, who stands at another beginning (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 1:7 and Gen 1:28, and note that according to Ex 2:2, when Moses was born, his mother “saw that he was a goodly child,” words that recall the refrain of Gen 1). As Noah, the savior of all living things, is preserved upon the waters in an ark, so it is with Moses, the savior of Israel.

The discussion of Jesus’ death in 1 Peter 3:18–22 refers to Noah’s ark as the author discerns a parallel with baptism: the church borne to safety by baptism recalls Noah’s family on the ark, snatching life from certain death through God’s rescue of them. The comparison is especially apt, for as in both Genesis and Exodus the ark is associated with creation imagery, Christians have always thought of baptism as being a new creation.

See also Ark of the Covenant; Flood; Moses.

ARK OF THE COVENANT

The ark of the covenant was a wooden box, covered with gold and fitted with rings through which carrying rods could be placed. The wood was expensive acacia wood, and the gold, of course, was precious. But the physical size of the ark was not impressive, being only about three and three-quarters feet long and two and one-quarter feet wide and high (see Ex 25:10–22).

The functional purpose of the ark was as a simple container for holy objects. The various names of the ark, “ark of the covenant” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Josh 3:11) and “ark of the testimony” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 25:16), are references to the fact that the tablets containing the Ten Commandments were placed inside it (Deut 10:1–5). Other notable items included in the ark were a sample of the manna of the wilderness and Aaron's budding staff (see Heb 9:4—5; see Aaron's Rod).

Though small, this box-like container was one of the most potent images of God's presence during the early OT [OT OT. Old Testament] period. The materials used (acacia wood and pure gold) were also used in the construction of the tabernacle, God's symbolic home on earth. Indeed, the ark was an integral part of the tabernacle structure and was normally kept in the most holy place (Ex 40:3).

In the tabernacle the ark was understood to be the throne or the footstool to the throne of God (2 Kings 19:15). Above the ark were placed two cherubim with outstretched wings and downcast eyes. God was envisioned as enthroned on the wings. The ark was the symbol of God's very presence on earth.

Being small and provided with carrying poles, the ark was mobile. Thus the ark served two important purposes during the history of early Israel. During the wilderness wanderings, when the people of God were on the march, the tabernacle was packed away and the ark led the way, representing God's leadership of the tribes as they made their way toward the land of promise (Num 10:35—36). This use of the ark is closely tied with the second purpose. The ark was often taken by the army as it engaged in battle with foreign foes. It represented the presence of the divine warrior with the army. The famous battle of Jericho is one of the more notable examples of the ark symbolizing God's presence and power with the army of Israel (Josh 6).

The ark is rarely mentioned in the literature of later Israel, leading to speculation that the original ark was captured or destroyed sometime soon after Solomon's reign (possibly during Shishak's invasion, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 14:25—29). However, the ark appears twice in the NT [NT NT.

New Testament] . In Hebrews 9:4–5 the ark is mentioned in a description of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] cult, which is marvelously replaced by Jesus Christ who fulfills it. We no longer need a tabernacle or ark because Jesus Christ “tabernacles” among us (Jn 1:14) and is the very presence of God. In Revelation 11:15–19 the events surrounding the blowing of the seventh trumpet are given. This is the time for the “judging of the dead” (v. 18). At the climactic moment God’s heavenly temple appears, and within it is seen the ark of the covenant, God’s mobile battle standard. This vision is accompanied by convulsions of nature associated with the appearance of the divine warrior.

See also Divine Warrior; Tabernacle.

Bibliography. C. L. Seow, “Ark of the Covenant,” ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 1:386–93; M. H. Woudstra, The Ark of the Covenant from Conquest to Kingship (Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1965).

ARM

Both the arm and the hand are biblical images of power. Typically such images suggest power toward a purpose, although the agent may be either divine or human. For example, the psalmist praises the Lord, whose “arm is endued with power” (Ps 89:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); but elsewhere he pleads with God to “break the arm of the wicked and evil man” (Ps 10:15) who preys upon the weak. Depending on context the images of the arm or hand can represent power in action, either good or evil.

Dominating all else is the epithet “outstretched arm” (nearly twenty references, e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 6:6 and 15:16; Deut 4:34). Whenever this formulaic phrase appears, it is always in reference to the power of God. This image can apply to God’s power in creation, in the deliverance of his people or in his judgment.

In Jeremiah such imagery carries the theme of God as Creator. It is “by great power and outstretched arm” (Jer 32:17) that the Lord creates the heavens and the earth; when God speaks to the nations surrounding Israel, he uses the same image to describe his creation of the earth and its creatures (Jer 27:5).

In Deuteronomy the outstretched arm of God appears repeatedly as an image of God’s power to redeem Israel from slavery in Egypt. Here the image is especially vivid: God stretches forth his arm, reaching his people where they are and saving them from their distress. Such an event is a unique attestation of God’s power; nothing like it has ever been seen before (Deut 4:34). In reference to God’s deliverance of Israel, Moses describes God’s “mighty hand and outstretched arm” in a synonymous parallel “with great terror and with miraculous signs and wonders” (Deut 26:8). Israel’s deliverance and all the miraculous events accompanying it are contained in the image of God’s outstretched arm.

But God’s outstretched arm also functions as a picture of divine judgment. In response to Israel’s idolatry, God allows the Babylonians to take Jerusalem, proclaiming, “I myself will fight against you with an outstretched hand and a mighty arm in anger and fury and great wrath” (Jer 21:5). The image is powerfully ironic: the very power of God that brought Israel into being is now allied with Babylon toward her defeat.

Isaiah is the most creative with the image of God’s arm. Although never using the expression outstretched arm, Isaiah speaks of God’s arm in fourteen different contexts. Clearly reflecting on the arm of the Lord as God’s power to deliver in the exodus, Isaiah looks ahead to show that the same arm will bring God's people out a second time, in a new exodus, from the exile they have experienced among the nations.

One of the more comforting images in the Bible is that communicated by the symbolic use of the plural arms: God carrying his people. The divine warrior, whose arm so threatens his enemy, joins his arms together to carry his people: "The eternal God is your refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms" (Deut 33:27). Isaiah 40:11 pictures God as a shepherd, leading his flock and carrying the lambs in his arms.

The arm image is used only twice in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Both occurrences are in the Gospels (Lk 1:51 and Jn 12:38 [Is 53:1]), and both quote or allude directly to an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passage. John 12:38 links the miracles of Jesus to the arm of the Lord precisely in the way the book of Deuteronomy linked God's miracles to the action of his arm. Though the NT [NT NT. New Testament] never explicitly links them, it was the same arm that stretched out to deliver Israel from bondage in Egypt that was outstretched on the cross to deliver believers from bondage to death.

See also Hand; Finger; Strength, Strong.

ARMIES OF HEAVEN.

See Heavenly Armies/Host.

ARMOR

In ancient warfare a soldier's body was vulnerable at many points to fatal or disabling wounds, whether by piercing arrow, thrusting sword or swinging battle ax. Field warfare and hand-to-hand combat required a maximum of protection without compromising mobility and agility. For the period of roughly two thousand years, stretching from Abraham to Paul, two pieces of armor were well known in the biblical world: the helmet and the shield. The breastplate was common in the Greco-Roman period, though a type of scaled armor was in use by the middle of the second millennium b.c. Greaves, or shin guards, were used by some armies and warriors. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we find many references to armor in narrative accounts of Israel's history as well as an abundance of armor imagery. Most notably armor serves as a metaphor for God's protection of the righteous. 2 Chronicles 26:14 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 46:4) indicates that a helmet, along with a shield and coat of armor, was a regular part of a soldier's outfit during the period of Israel's kings.

A warrior with helmet, shield, breastplate and greaves.

Armor as Image. Putting on armor symbolizes preparation for war and its hazards (Jer 46:4), against which even armor is no sure protection. Thus in 1 Kings 20:11 the king of Israel sends a message to his confident enemy, "One who puts on his armor should not boast like one who takes it off." The proof of a warrior's prowess is in his successful return from battle. In 1 Kings 22 Ahab, the king of Israel, attempts to cheat the prophet who has prophesied his death in battle. As he battled in disguise, "someone drew his bow at random and hit the king of Israel between the sections of his armor" (1 Kings 22:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God's judgment is sure and finds gaps in human armor as surely as it exposes gaps in a theology of defiance.

The most striking biblical picture of an armored warrior is Goliath, the monstrously intimidating Philistine champion of war: "He was over nine feet tall. He had a bronze helmet on his head and wore a coat of scale armor of bronze weighing five thousand shekels; on his legs he wore bronze greaves, and a bronze javelin was slung on his back” (1 Sam 17:5–6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Goliath’s challenger, the young David, stands before him, vulnerably clad in the thin clothing of a shepherd and carrying a slingshot. David has tried on king Saul’s armor (Israel’s champion of war who has fearfully retired to his camp) but found it ill fitting, clumsy and not suited for the task at hand. The story of David’s unarmored victory over Goliath forms a vivid image of the biblical theme of power in weakness, of faith exercised in the face of insurmountable odds, of divine protection and victory given to one who, in contrast with Saul, utterly trusts in God’s deliverance (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 17:37).

The armor of a defeated warrior symbolizes shame for the vanquished and honor for the victor. David takes Goliath’s weapons into his own tent, and his sword will be held as a treasure in the sanctuary at Nob (1 Sam 21:9). When the Philistines found the body of Saul on the battlefield, they “put his armor in the temple of the Ashtoreths and fastened his body to the wall of Beth Shan” (1 Sam 31:10). The public display of Saul’s unarmored body reinforces the shame of defeat, and the armor placed in the temple is a trophy of the gods, a symbol of their victory over Israel and, so they think, over Israel’s God. The “anointed” instrument of God, Cyrus, will “subdue nations before him” and “strip kings of their armor” (Is 45:1). And in Luke’s version of Jesus’ parable of binding the strong man, a stronger one attacks, overpowers him, and “takes away the armor in which the man trusted and divides up the spoils” (Lk 11:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus is the “stronger one,” who is defeating Satan and stripping Satan’s armor (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 49:24–26). The imagery of stripping a spiritual enemy of weapons and armor may lie behind Colossians 2:15, where some interpreters see Christ disarming the powers and authorities in his death on the cross (see commentaries for the disputed sense of apekdysamenos in Col 2:15). Jesus, the naked, shamed, unarmed and unarmored warrior on the cross is the real victor over the vaunted powers of this age.

Christians are to follow their victorious Christ by putting on spiritual armor and engaging in the battle where power is found in weakness, victory in Christian virtues and the armaments of faith. Christ's death and resurrection has placed his followers at the turning point of the ages: "The night is nearly over; the day is almost here. So let us put aside the deeds of darkness and put on the armor of light" (Rom 13:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The crucial battle in the warfare against Satan has been won and his fate determined, but the war continues. Paul urges the church, the army of Christ, to "put on the full armor of God so that you can take your stand against the devil's schemes" (Eph 6:11, 13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Thess 5:8). The helmet, shield and breastplate, or scaled armor, form a panoply of spiritual armor calling for individual attention.

Helmet. The head is the first point of bodily protection in battle. A blow that would be merely painful or partially disabling to another portion of the body, when taken in the head can leave a soldier unconscious, permanently disabled or dead. The helmet was usually, and ideally, made of metal, though it could also be constructed of leather. We read that Goliath and King Saul had helmets of bronze (1 Sam 17:5; 17:38). Paul speaks of the Christian helmet as the "hope of salvation" (1 Thess 5:8) or simply *"salvation" (Eph 6:17). Here he borrows the image of Isaiah 59:17, where God, the divine warrior, dresses himself for battle and puts the "helmet of salvation on his head" (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] "Impartial justice as a helmet" in Wis 5:18). From Paul's standpoint the climactic divine victory of salvation has been won and its reality, or sure “hope” of its final outcome, are the primary protection for the church as it carries out its life in the midst of the conflicts of this age.

Shield. The shield is a portable and maneuverable protection device capable of absorbing the impact of an enemy’s weapons, whether they are wielded by hand or launched through the air. Behind a shield, a person is protected from the aimed assault of an enemy. The deadliest arrow is absorbed, the fiercest blow deflected, and the shielded soldier is enabled to advance against the enemy or quickly return a fatal wound.

Shields were a framework of wood, wicker or metal covered with thick leather. They were generally two types (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 46:3): the smaller shield (variously shaped) used to defend against the sword, spear and battle ax, and the large shield (which reached from the ground to a man’s chin) used to protect a soldier while besieging a city (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 37:33; Ezek 26:8). In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we read of shield bearers, trusted soldiers who would carry and position the shield for a king or mighty warrior (Goliath, 1 Sam 17:7, 41), defending him, for example, while he fired arrows at the enemy.

The shield was so basic to a soldier’s outfit that “shield and spear” or “shield and sword” symbolized a warrior trained and ready for battle (Judg 5:8; 1 Chron 5:18; 12:8, 24), and the image of uncovering the shield signified preparation for battle (Is 22:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 51:11). Nahum portrays the fearsome armor of the army of the Lord marshaled against Nineveh: “The shields of his soldiers are red; the warriors are clad in scarlet” (Nahum 2:3).

The image of a shield is frequently used in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] to speak of God’s protection from an enemy.

In some cases the image is used in parallel with the image of God as a “rock”: “my God is my rock, in whom I take refuge, my shield and the horn of my salvation.” (2 Sam 22:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Ps 18:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 22:31; Ps 18:30). The circumstances of life often lend themselves to battlefield imagery. In the face of his enemies the psalmist confesses, “you are a shield around me, O Lord” (Ps 3:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) or “The Lord is my strength and my shield; my heart trusts in him, and I am helped.” (Ps 28:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 7:10; 91:4). This sense of protection is joined with God’s favor, blessing and help in time of need (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 5:12; 7:10; 33:20). The image of the Lord as a “help and shield,” a symbol of Israel’s trust, is thrice repeated in Psalm 115:9–11, and “refuge” and “shield” are aligned in Psalm 119:114. In Proverbs the seemingly abstract notion that “every word of God is flawless” is set side by side with the militaristic image of God as “a shield to those who take refuge in him” (Prov 30:5), thus leading us to consider the ways in which God’s words offer protection amidst the assaults of life.

Jerusalem, a city laden with symbolic value in the Bible, is the focus of images of divine destruction and of protection. Isaiah presents an image of divine protection of the city: “Like birds hovering overhead, the Lord Almighty will shield Jerusalem; he will shield it and deliver it, he will ‘pass over’ it and will rescue it” (Is 31:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And Zechariah molds the shield into an eschatological image in speaking of the day when the Lord will “shield those who live in Jerusalem” (Zech 12:8), and under his protection “the feeblest among them will be like David, and the house of David will be like God” (Zech 12:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Closely associated with the idea of protection is the biblical motif of God as a divine warrior. In some instances the shield or a weapon can evoke the broader motif of the divine warrior: “Blessed are you, O Israel! Who is like you, a people saved by the Lord? He is your shield and helper and your glorious sword.” (Deut 33:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Contend, O Lord, with those who contend with me; fight against those who fight against me.

Take up shield and buckler;
arise and come to my aid.

Brandish spear and javelin against those who pursue me.

(Ps 35:1—2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Ps 140:7; Zech 9:15)

In Psalm 144:2 the imagery of divine warrior and shield are placed in parallel with fortress/stronghold imagery:

He is my loving God and my fortress,
my stronghold and my deliverer, my shield, in whom I take refuge, who subdues peoples under me. (Ps 144:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

It is as if the biblical motif of the divine warrior follows a trajectory leading to the universal establishment of the kingdom of God and of peace. The psalmist glimpses this goal and speaks of God making wars to cease, breaking the bow, shattering the spear and burning shields with fire (Ps 46:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 76:3).

Although the shield can speak plainly of protection, in some instances it evokes divine favor. When God speaks to Abram after his routing a coalition of kings, we hear reassuring words:

Do not be afraid, Abram.

I am your shield, your very great reward (Gen 15:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

God is Abram's defender, and Abram, who took no spoils from battle, is assured that God's special favor is his reward.

We sometimes find the shield symbolizing the glory of a warrior. In the case of Saul's tragic death in battle, "the shield of the mighty was defiled, the shield of Saul-no longer rubbed with oil" (2 Sam 1:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The oil may refer to the warrior's preparing his shield for battle (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 21:5), both to enhance its beauty and its deflective power. But this is an instance of metonymy, where the shield is an image of Saul: Saul was defiled by death in battle and no longer the anointed one of Israel. The metonymy of shield and king appears also in the psalms. When the psalmist asks God to "Look upon our shield, ... look with favor on your anointed one" (Ps 84:9), he has in mind the king of Israel. This meaning is more transparent in Psalm 89:18: "Indeed, our shield belongs to the Lord, our king to the Holy One of Israel" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The metonymy of shield and royalty was a natural one, evoking not only the king's responsibility to protect his people but also the theme of the king as warrior, "commander in chief" of Israel's army.

The parallel images of "sun and shield" attributed to God in Psalm 84:11 might be a biblical echo of the solar disk imagery found in some ancient Near Eastern religions, with the circular shape of the sun, an image of power and protection, joined with an image of warfare, a circular shield.

The description of the woman in Song of Songs 4:4 provides a striking instance of shield imagery:

Your neck is like the tower of David,
built with elegance;

on it hang a thousand shields, all of them shields of warriors. (Song 4:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The familiar joining of fortress and shield imagery in this case suggests the woman's regal beauty and inaccessibility to all but her lover. Behind the image of "a thousand shields" may lie a "literal" picture of layers of beaded necklace worn around the woman's neck. The image of shields hung on fortress walls is also found in Ezekiel 27:10–11, where the shields and helmets of Tyre's mercenary soldiers are depicted as hanging on the city's walls and are said to bring Tyre's "beauty to perfection" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The potent symbolism of the shield is evident when we read of the two hundred large shields of hammered gold and three hundred small shields of hammered gold that were created for Solomon (1 Kings 10:16–17; 2 Chron 9:15–16). These were ceremonial shields, used perhaps on ceremonial occasions, but otherwise hung within Solomon's Palace of the Forest of Lebanon. Though we may not understand their full significance, they surely evoke the impregnable splendor and strength of the Solomonic empire. The fate of these shields provides commentary on national decline: the gold shields of Solomon were looted by King Shishak of Egypt, and then replaced by Rehoboam with bronze shields (1 Kings 14:26–27).

Perhaps the best known instance of shield imagery is in Ephesians 6:16: “take up the shield of faith, with which you can extinguish all the flaming arrows of the evil one.” Here we find various strands of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] shield imagery converging (as well as Wis 5:19, where God is depicted as taking “holiness as an invincible shield” [NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]]). Faith in God, now focused in his saving work in Christ, protects believers from the chief of all enemies, “the evil one,” or “Satan.”* In the field of spiritual warfare, faith in the Divine Warrior who has defeated Satan in a climactic victory at the cross and resurrection will offer protection from Satan’s flaming missiles. Like soldiers, the church must prepare for battle by “taking up” the thyron, the word for a large shield covered with thick leather and extensive enough to protect the entire body. Its spiritual ability to extinguish flaming arrows may be based on the properties and preparation of actual shields or simply refer to the supernatural quality of the shield of faith. A living faith in the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is a sure protection from the assaults of the Evil One in the most vital warfare of all.

Breastplate or Scaled Armor. Armor covering the warrior’s thorax, abdomen and back would protect his vital organs from deadly wounds. Scaled armor, consisting of small, interlocking rings of metal or metal “scales” bound together by thongs appears to have been in use in the ancient Near East from the middle of the second millennium b.c. Another type of protection was a thick leather jacket. We do not find many instances where this category of armor is mentioned in the Bible, though its use by “professional” warriors seems to be broadly assumed. Goliath and Saul, both notable warriors, have coats of armor (1 Sam 17:5, 38). King Uzziah provides his entire army with coats of armor along with shields, spears, helmets, bows and slingstones (2 Chron 26:14). We have already seen that this armor was not invincible, for the random Aramean arrow found the gap in Ahab's no doubt carefully constructed armor (1 Kings 22:34; 2 Chron 18:33), apparently piercing between his breastplate and scaled armor.

The prophet Isaiah fashions the breastplate into an image as he envisions God as a warrior who puts on "righteousness as his breastplate" (Is 59:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Wis 5:18). Ephesians 6:14 carries forward this image, crafting the breastplate of righteousness into a piece of armor for the church. The Isaiah passage is clearly in view, and so the armor of righteousness is received from God ("the full armor of God") but "put on" by the church for conflict in "the evil day," both in the present moment and in the final assault of the Evil One. In 1 Thessalonians 5:8, however, the Christian virtues of faith, hope and love are in view, with "faith and love" put on as a breastplate, along with the "hope of salvation" as a helmet (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 59:17). Faith and love in the lives of the "sons of light" not only serve to build up the community but form a vital protective armor in a world of darkness. The early history of loving and faith-filled Christian communities in the midst of pagan society was to demonstrate the truth of this imagery.

See also Divine Warrior; Enemy; Shield; Weapons, Human and Divine.

ARMY, ARMIES

The vast majority of the nearly three hundred uses of the word army in the Bible refer to a literal, physical army, either of Israel or of Israel's enemies. But a network of powerful images gathers around these literal references.

The starting point is Exodus 15:3, where the Lord is described as a warrior (literally, “man of war”). As a warrior the Lord has just defeated the armies of Pharaoh by drowning them in the Red Sea, while Israel stood and watched. This conception of God as a God who fights is something that Israel had in common with her neighbors, who all had lively traditions of “holy war.” The essence of holy war ideology was the close association between earthly and heavenly forces—an association often made clear literally by taking the gods into battle. When the ark of the covenant arrived in the camp of Israel’s army, the Philistines were terrified: “Who will deliver us from the hand of these mighty gods? They are the gods who struck the Egyptians with all kinds of plagues in the desert. Be strong, Philistines!” (1 Sam 4:8–9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

This story reveals that the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] does not adopt holy war ideology uncritically. The presence of the ark did not protect Israel, and it was captured amid wholesale slaughter. On the other hand, the Israelites learned to expect that the Lord would fight their battles for them, so three times in the Psalms we meet the lament, “the Lord no longer goes out with our armies” (Ps 44:9; 60:10; 108:11). Such experiences produced heart searching: For what sin was God punishing the people by his absence from the battlefield (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Josh 7; 1 Sam 3:11–14)? But even these psalms express the confident expectation that “through you we push back our enemies; through your name we trample our foes” (Ps 44:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 60:12; 108:13).

The armies of Israel, therefore, were literally “the armies of the living God” (1 Sam 17:36); so that when Goliath taunted the Israelite army, he actually “defied the armies of the living God” (1 Sam 17:45; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 1:12). This is why the armies of Israel could be the direct agents of God’s punishment (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Sam 15:3).

Further dimensions of this identification are revealed by the title “Lord of Hosts.” This title is used some 267 times in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , and its military connotations are well revealed by David’s words to Goliath: “I come against you in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel”(1 Sam 17:45). The word hosts (š bā’ôt) is the plural form of a common word for “army” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 8:6; 9:29; Ps 44:9; 60:10; 108:11), so “God of armies” would not be an inappropriate translation. In the exchange between David and Goliath, these hosts are clearly the armies of Israel. But this is not so clear in Joshua 5:13–15, when the angelic “commander of the Lord’s host” appears to Joshua. Since Joshua himself is the commander of the literal army, which host does this angel command?

The answer is not hard to find. When Deborah and Barak celebrate their famous victory over Sisera, they sing that “from heaven the stars fought, from their courses they fought against Sisera” (Judg 5:20). They believed that another army had fought alongside theirs—an army that caused a massive downpour (5:21) so that Sisera lost his strategic military advantage, the use of his chariots (4:15). In calling this hidden army “the stars,” they are employing one of the conventional ancient identifications of this hidden angelic host (see Heavenly Armies/Host). We encounter this host also in 1 Kings 22:19 (notice that military strategy is being discussed) in Deuteronomy 32:8 (where they are called “sons of God”), in Psalm 82 (where they are called “gods” and “sons of the Most High”), in Job 38:7 (where they are “sons of God” and “morning stars”) and of course in Luke 2:13 (where they are “a great company of the heavenly host”). In Isaiah 37:36 it is the singular “angel of the Lord” who fights. This army of God encamps around Elisha in 2 Kings 6:17 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 34:7) and marches audibly into battle ahead of David in 1 Chronicles 14:15 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 1:24).

The reason it was so wrong for David to take a census of Israel’s fighting capacity (2 Sam 24, 1 Chron 21) was probably that it faithlessly ignored the vital presence of this heavenly force, which could not be counted. The ideal battles are those where the human forces are minimal so that it is obvious that “the battle is the Lord’s!” (1 Sam 17:47; 2 Chron 20:15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Judg 7; 1 Sam 14:1–14), for it is the Lord alone who is “mighty in battle” (Ps 24:8). The prophets were charged with the awful responsibility of announcing to Israel that the Lord had changed sides and was using the armies of other nations as his own army against Israel (Is 10:5–19; Jer 1:14–16; Hab 1:5–11; Joel 2:1–11).

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] therefore leaves us with a clear perspective on the ontology of armed force in human society: it only exercises destructive or dominating power insofar as that power is given to it and is actually exerted by the Lord and his hosts. It is God who overthrows or establishes kingdoms (Amos 9:7; Jer 1:10; Is 13:4, 19; Dan 4:25), using human armies if he wills, but not dependent on them. This interaction between divine and human power is especially clear in Daniel and forms the essential background to Jesus’ proclamation of the kingdom of God.

Fed by this OT [OT OT. Old Testament] perspective, Jesus’ hearers would inevitably have ascribed direct political significance to his message. In Daniel the kingdom of God means the violent overthrow of earthly kingdoms (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Dan 2:44; 7:23–27). So it is highly significant that the “heavenly host” in Luke 2:14 announces peace on earth, that Jesus consistently resists the use of force as a sign of the kingdom (e.g., Mt 10:7–10, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 22:49–51) and that military imagery is not used extensively of the church in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Victorian hymn writers and missionaries loved to picture the church marching into battle with banners waving, but this is unlike Paul. Only once does he pictures discipleship as warfare, and there he explicitly safeguards the metaphor from misunderstanding: “we do not wage war as the world does” (2 Cor 10:3–5).

But this does not mean that the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] understanding of human and heavenly armies and their relationship is rejected in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . As in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] holy war thinking, the advance of the kingdom signals a spiritual battle played out in the heavenly arena. But it is exorcisms and healings that mean the fall of Satan from heaven (Lk 10:9–20); and it is at the end of the age that the heavenly forces will be sent out to purge the world of evil (Mt 13:40–43). If the Christian must be armed with “the strength of God’s power,” then it is in order to be defended against “the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms” (Eph 6:10). The offensive weapon is simply the gospel, spoken for instance by a defeated (imprisoned) apostle (Eph 6:17–20).

In Revelation the church is pictured as an army, but it is an army that is numbered in order to be protected, not to fight (Rev 7:3–8), which follows a Lamb singing and playing harps (Rev 14:1–4) and which goes into battle like a bride wearing wedding garments rather than armor (Rev 19:7–8, 14). The heavenly armies appear, throwing Satan out of heaven (Rev 12:7–9) and supplying the various angels who play key roles in judgment and victory, following the crucial victory won by the Lamb. Holy war takes place, but at no point does it become part of the political ideology of the followers of Christ.

See also Archery; Armor; Arrow, Arrow of God; Divine Warrior; Heavenly Armies/Host; Shield; Sword; Weapons, Human and Divine.

Bibliography. T. Longman III and D. G. Reid, God Is a Warrior (SOTB; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); G. von Rad, Holy War in Ancient Israel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991); Y. Yadin, The Art of Warfare in Biblical Lands (London: Weidenfield and Nicolson, 1963).

ARROW, ARROW OF GOD

In ancient Near Eastern literature, nearly every weapon available for human use had a divine counterpart. From Mesopotamia to Greece the arrow figures prominently in this arsenal. The Bible, with its many references to the arrow of God, is no exception.

The prescientific worldview understood otherwise inexplicable phenomena in terms of an unseen reality that paralleled the visible one. The just person participated in a spiritual warfare fought by greater powers with unseen weapons whose results spilled over into the visible universe. In such a framework, separating literary metaphor from authentic belief proves difficult, if not fruitless. We may more profitably ask why the arrow functioned as such a fitting image of divine intervention in the physical world.

In contrast to most other weapons, the arrow strikes from afar (Gen 21:16). While one may defend against many other weapons, the arrow strikes suddenly (Ps 64:7), so swiftly that time stands still (Hab 3:11). The Bowman may let his arrow fly from ambush (Jer 9:8). The arrow may wound randomly (1 Kings 22:34). These qualities—long range, lightning quick, unseen, perhaps even random—made the bow and arrow not only a weapon to be feared in the visible world but also the prime symbol of divine justice meted out. Homer regularly attributes a man's premature, nonviolent death from unknown cause to "the gentle shafts of Apollo," a woman's to the arrows of the goddess Artemis.

Arrow of God. God's arrow deals death in many forms. Perhaps due to the natural pairing of thunder and lightning, the image of God's arrows is commonly preceded by mention of thundering wrath. While arrow frequently refers to lightning, either implicitly or explicitly (2 Sam 22:15; Ps 18:4, 144:6, Zech 9:14; Hab 3:11), the bow of God may also smite with arrows of war (Deut 32:42); flood (Ps 77:17, but note also Gen 9:13, 14, 16 where "bow" becomes *"rainbow" in some translations, masking the concrete imagery of God's promise to "hang up his bow"); famine (Ezek 5:16); calamity and pestilence (2 Esdras 16:16–19, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Chron 21:12, 27); plague (Deut 32:23–24; Hab 3:5) or individual sickness brought on by "spiritual" poisoning (Job 6:4, 16:13; Ps 38:2–3); and perhaps other natural disasters, such as earthquake (Hab 3:9). Almost any act of God could be accomplished by his arrows with many other weapons in reserve. Scripture labels the recipients of God's punishment as his "targets" (Lam 3:12).

Arrow of Evil. The devil and his minions and human accomplices also employ the arrow. The devil's fiery darts (Eph 6:16) find their inspiration in the flaming arrows of Psalm 7:13 (note that the Hebrew is difficult; NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] interprets these as "God's arrows"). In Ps 91:5 arrow parallels terror, pestilence and plague, read by some as demonic afflictions.

Arrows as Speech. Among many negative images, one isolated positive figure likens a prophet (or perhaps his words) to a polished (purified) arrow (Is 49:2, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 51:11). In keeping with the devil's title of slanderer, "arrows of the wicked" typically refers to false speech (Ps 57:4; 64:3; 120:2—4; Prov 25:18; 26:18; Jer 9:8; Sir 19:12). The ancients imagined that words flew toward their mark with the speed of arrows. Neither words nor arrows left any trace of their flight path (Wis 5:12). Awe at the swift, untraceable flight of speech lies behind Homer's recurrent metaphor, "winged words."

Arrows as Oracles. The magic of arrows further allowed the ancients to divine with them. Ezekiel 21:21 records that Nebuchadnezzar consulted his oracle by casting lots with (lit. "shaking") arrows. (Akkadian literature and early Arabic sources attest similar practices, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Hos 4:12.) In a parallel with a twist, when Jehoash seeks advice from the ailing Elisha, the prophet commands the king to beat the ground with the arrows and then interprets the future for the king based on the action of the arrows (2 Kings 13:18). In yet another message drawn from arrows, Jonathan's warning to David hinges on the interpretation of the actions of arrows (1 Sam 20:21).

See also Archery; Armor; Divine Warrior; Hunting; Shield; Weapons, Human and Divine.

ARTEMIS.

See God, Goddesses.

ASCENSION

The ascension of Jesus into heaven is narrated only by Luke—in brief form in Luke 24:51 ("While he blessed them, he parted from them, and was carried up into heaven" RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and in an extended version in Acts 1:6—11. The main image pattern associated with the event is the imagery of transcendence: Jesus ascended from earth to heaven, indicating a movement from one sphere of reality to another. Ephesians 4:8 describes Jesus' ascending "on high," while Colossians 3:1—2 surrounds the ascended Christ with references to “things that are above” as contrasted to “things that are on earth.” Luke tells us that “a cloud took him out of their sight” (Acts 1:9), and the disciples responded by “gazing into heaven” and “looking into heaven” (Acts 1:10–11). The event is also accompanied by images of supernatural mystery—a disappearing person, a cloud that veils and two angelic messengers who instruct the baffled disciples.

Much is connoted by the ascension in addition to the physical images that surround it. First, the event is a boundary and a transition: it brings Jesus’ earthly existence to a close (hence its positioning at the end of Luke’s Gospel) and marks the beginning of the Holy Spirit’s replacement of Jesus on earth (hence its positioning at the opening of the book of Acts). The ascension also completes the cyclic U-shaped life of the incarnate Christ—a descent followed by an ascent, with an obvious sense of completeness and closure. In John 6:62 Jesus speaks of “the Son of man ascending where he was before,” while Ephesians 4:10 states that “he who descended is he who also ascended far above all the heavens, that he might fill all things” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Secondly, the ascension is the ultimate example of the generally positive meanings of the archetype of ascending (see Ascent). Its main meaning is exaltation. Along with the resurrection the ascension of Jesus vindicated his divine identity and the efficacy of his redemptive work. In the brief catalog of Christ-exalting events in the hymn printed in 1 Timothy 3:14, the climactic event is that Christ “was taken up in glory.” Other imagery associated with Christ’s ascension into heaven reinforces the sense of exaltation. When Jesus ascended, for example, he took a position of honor at the right hand of God the Father (Eph 1:20; Col 3:1; Heb 1:3; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2). The ascended Christ is “far above all rule and authority and power and dominion, and above every name that is named” (Eph 1:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Closely linked to the exaltation of Christ in the ascension is the motif of kingly triumph over the forces of evil and enemies of God. This is anticipated in Psalm 68:18, with its picture of a victorious king ascending “the high mount, leading captives in thy train.” Ephesians 4:8 applies the motif to Christ. In the cosmic conflict between good and evil, the ascension of Christ “has put all things under his feet and has made him head over all things for the church” (Eph 1:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Finally, the ascension of Jesus into heaven, while marking the end to his earthly life, is also associated with the motif of preparation for a brief return visit to earth. Jesus ascended into heaven in order to prepare a place to which his disciples can follow him (Jn 14:1–4). The ascended Christ will reappear “in glory” (Col 3:4; see Second Coming).

The Bible also draws an application for believers. By virtue of their faith in Christ, believers have actually been “raised up” to sit with Christ “in the heavenly places” (Eph 2:6), and they are exhorted to “seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated at the right hand of God” (Col 3:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Ascent; Exaltation, Enthronement; Heaven; High, Height, High Place; Pentecost.

ASCENT

In directional symbolism to be high is good, and to be low is bad. Heaven is high; hell is low. Emotional ecstasy is portrayed as being on a height; depression is a valley. The imagery of ascent names the movement from a lower place to a higher place, and it accordingly partakes of the generally positive associations of being high.

Some of the imagery of ascent takes its place within the two-tiered picture of the universe that the Bible everywhere assumes. Heaven is above earth, and creatures who move from earth to heaven do so by ascending. Thus angels ascend back to heaven after completing an earthly assignment (Judg 13:20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 28:12; Jn 1:51), and Elijah ascends to heaven in a whirlwind when he is translated (2 Kings 2:11). The psalmist makes vivid his claim that he cannot escape from God's presence by picturing an antiques (see Quest) in which he tries to evade God. One of the possibilities that he pictures is ascending to heaven, only to find that God is there (Ps 139:8). Isaiah's taunt against the proud king of Babylon pictures the king as aspiring to ascend to heaven (Is 14:13–14).

Another cluster of references uses the imagery of ascent metaphorically to denote a person's rise in status or position. Thus a king might ascend the throne of his predecessor (2 Chron 21:4). Sometimes this ascent is ascribed to God in his role as conqueror. Psalm 68:18 pictures a Divine Warrior ascending "the high mount" in a triumphal procession (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Christ too is pictured in John's Gospel as ascending to heaven (Jn 3:13; 6:62; 10:17), as he is in later NT [NT NT. New Testament] references as well (Acts 2:34; Eph 4:8–10).

A third family of references occurs in contexts of worship and is rooted in the physical position of the temple on a high place in Jerusalem. To worship God at the temple is accordingly described as ascending "the hill of the Lord" (Ps 24:3). A group of fifteen pilgrim psalms (Ps 120–134) bears the repeated heading "a song of ascents," implying that the psalms were sung en route as the pilgrims "went up" to the temple in Jerusalem.

See also Ascension; Exaltation, Enthronement; High, Height, High Place.

ASHES

The Bible makes use of ashes in both narrative and prophetic descriptions of cities and peoples under God's wrath. In the background lies the ancient military practice of burning enemy cities, so that the association of ashes with death is common, as in Jeremiah's picture of a "whole valley of the dead bodies and the ashes" (Jer 31:40 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In keeping with the biblical motif of God as warrior, the prophetic visions sometimes picture God's fire as consuming a wicked person or nation. Examples include the prophecy against Tyre, where God's fire turned it "to ashes upon the earth" (Ezek 28:18), and the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, which God "condemned to extinction" by turning them "to ashes" (2 Pet 2:6). In an apocalyptic passage those who fear God "shall tread down the wicked, for they will be ashes under the soles of your feet, on the day when I act, says the Lord of hosts" (Mal 4:3).

Since the word ashes is literally an image of complete waste, it also lends itself to use as a metaphor for weakness, ephemerality and emptiness: "your maxims are proverbs of ashes" (Job 13:12; also Ps 142:6; Is 44:20). This same connotation underlies the use of ashes in expressions of intense grief and loss. The often repeated phrase "in sackcloth and ashes" paints a vivid picture of mourning women and men in torn clothing, lying or kneeling on the ground as they heap ashes and dust upon themselves (2 Sam 13:19; Esther 4:1, 3; Is 58:5, 61:3; Jer 6:26, 25:34; Ezek 27:30). In addition to this visible, physical ritual, the psalmist speaks figuratively of eating "ashes like bread" to symbolize his suffering (Ps 102:9; compare Ps 80:2). The theme of reversal in Lamentations 4:5 effectively contrasts the royal purple with ashes: “Those nurtured in purple now lie on ash heaps.”

Perhaps the most familiar biblical use of ashes imagery is in expressions of repentance. The association of ashes with images of destruction and grief makes it an appropriate symbol of human mortality and consequently of the humility required of human beings before their Creator and Judge. Job’s initial cry of mourning, “I have become like dust and ashes,” later becomes a prayer of confession, “I repent in dust and ashes” (Job 30:19; 42:6). In other biblical prayers of both confession in “sackcloth and ashes” (Dan 9:3–5; Jn 3:6; Mt 11:21; Lk 10:13) and petition (Gen 18:27), the image of ashes is a moving reminder of the human position before God. It is no coincidence that the marking of foreheads with ashes in Ash Wednesday services is accompanied by the words “Remember, man, that thou art dust and to dust thou shalt return.”

In this context the ceremonial use of ashes in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] has great significance. Having been swept from the altar and taken to “a clean place” (Ex 27:3; Lev 1:16, 4:12, 6:10–11; Num 4:13; 2 Kings 23:3), the ashes from the burned sacrifices are later used under certain circumstances in purification rituals to wash those who are unclean (Num 19:9–10, 17; Heb 9:13). “How much more,” explains the author of Hebrews, “shall the blood of Christ ... purify your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?” (Heb 9:14). Though the biblical use of ashes imagery centers primarily on the fragility of life, this aspect of sacrificial cleansing transforms that emphasis from one of potential pessimism into one of humble hope.

See also Altar; Fire; Mourn, Mourning.

ASHTORETH.

See Gods, Goddesses.

ASS.

See Donkey, Ass.

ASSEMBLY, DIVINE

The Bible presents us with an earthly world and a heavenly world, two interconnected—and sometimes indistinguishable—stages on which the biblical drama takes place. The view of the heavenly world focuses primarily on the divine throne room and related elements of divine royalty. This is the imagery of transcendence adapted by the Bible from its cultural environment. The gods of the ancient Near East were not spoken of in abstract terms—as theologians today might speak of divine sovereignty, omnipotence, omnipresence or aseity—they were vividly imaged in the language of kingship and warfare, love and fertility, house building and banqueting. And so also for Israel, to “do” theology was to tell God’s story and to fashion images and metaphors that both rightly described their subject and engaged the imagination. The theologians of the Bible—its poets and prophets, chroniclers and sages—borrowed, refashioned and subverted the images and symbols of the gods of their neighboring cultures. Their audiences expected to be offered glimpses of the heavenly court as a means of understanding the ways of God.

The Divine Assembly in its Cultural Setting. In Mesopotamian and Canaanite religion it was customary to speak of the high gods as kingly figures. Such a god was imagined to be enthroned in a heavenly palace (on which his earthly temple was modeled). The god had a heavenly assembly, or council, a deliberative body invested with the task of guiding the fate of the cosmos (see Cosmology). In the Mesopotamian myth of Enuma Elish, the gods are presided over by the high god Anu. In a Canaanite texts from Ugarit, we find the high god El presiding over the major and minor gods and addressing them as “gods” or “my sons.” Israel speaks of Yahweh as a heavenly king who presides over his council. But in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we find the status of the “gods” subverted, for they are demoted to subservient figures, frequently called angels or spirits.

The dwelling place of God is imaged as a cosmic mountain, which in Canaanite mythology is Mount Zaphon in north Syria, the dwelling place of the gods. Isaiah condemns the hubris of the king of Babylon as he deigns to set his throne “on the mount of assembly in the far north” and make himself “like the Most High” (Is 14:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , God has chosen Zion as the site for his temple-palace. As the earthly counterpart to his heavenly dwelling place, Zion is called the “holy mountain of God” (Ezek 28:14, 16). It is “beautiful in elevation, ... the joy of all the earth, Mount Zion, in the far north, the city of the great King” (Ps 48:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 46:4). Thus in the biblical imagination the Canaanite mountain of the gods is displaced and the status of “holy mountain” and “mount of the assembly” is transferred to Zion. If Zion’s present elevation is admittedly not as grand as Mount Hermon and other mountains to the north, in the last days “the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established as the highest of the mountains” (Is 2:2–4; Mic 4:1–3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Since it is the seat of the divine assembly, “out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem” and from there God “shall judge between the nations” (Is 2:3–4; Mic 4:2–3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The divine assembly is the celestial counterpart to the social institution of the “elders in the gate” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 21:19; Ruth 4:1—11; Ps 107:32; Prov 31:23). It is a board of advisors or counselors with whom the supreme deity consults, an “assembly of the holy ones” (Ps 98:5). In context of war, its members can be called the “hosts,” or “army” of heaven, who engage in divine warfare under the “Lord of Hosts” (see Divine Warrior). Psalm 82 evokes the scene of the divine assembly: “God has taken his place in the divine council; in the midst of the gods he holds judgment” (Ps 82:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). But in this case God is displeased with the members of the divine assembly. The assembly cowers as God hauls them onto the royal carpet: “How long will you judge unjustly and show partiality to the wicked?” (Ps 82:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). For their heedlessness toward the weak and needy as well as their other shortcomings, God pronounces judgment on them: “I said, ‘You are “gods“; you are all sons of the Most High.’ But you will die like mere men; you will fall like every other ruler” (Ps 82:6—7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Divine Assembly and Prophetic Messengers. The story of the prophet Micaiah ben Imlah in 1 Kings 22 offers a fascinating glimpse of deliberation within the heavenly council. On the earthly plane, Ahab, the king of Israel, is deliberating with Jehoshaphat, the king of Judah, over whether they should attack Ramoth Gilead. They inquire of the fawning court prophets, who heartily agree that they should attack. But then they inquire of Micaiah, who is always heedless of the party line, Micaiah speaks of his vision of the divine council:

“I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing beside him on his right hand and on his left; and the Lord said, ‘Who will entice Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-Gilead?’ And one said one thing, and another said another. Then a spirit came forward and stood before the Lord, saying, 'I will entice him.' And the Lord said to him, 'By what means?' And he said, 'I will go forth, and will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets.' And he said, 'You are to entice him, and you shall succeed; go forth and do so.' "

(1 Kings 22:19—22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

This imagery of the prophet having access to the divine council—and being a messenger for the council—clarifies the “call” scene of the prophet Isaiah. In Isaiah 6 the prophet has a vision of “the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up; and his train filled the temple” (Is 6:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here the earthly temple provides entrance to the heavenly temple (complete with marvelous creatures attending the throne), and the heavenly kingship of Yahweh is juxtaposed with the earthly kingship of Uzziah (Is 6:1). Struck by the wondrous sight of Yahweh the king and overcome with a sense of personal and corporate sin, Isaiah receives forgiveness. He then hears the Lord deliberating before his council: “Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?” The response comes not from a “god” within the divine assembly but from Isaiah himself, “Here I am! Send me.” And the Lord responds, “Go, and say to this people ...” (Is 6:8—9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Likewise we should perhaps understand Isaiah 40:1—2—“Comfort, comfort my people, says your God. Speak tenderly to Jerusalem” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])—as words uttered by Yahweh to the heralds assembled in divine council. The voice of the heavenly herald then cries out, “In the wilderness prepare the way of the Lord” (Is 40:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Assembly of Gods and Angels. It is clear that the Bible does not regard the “gods” of the divine assembly as peers of God: “There is none like thee among the gods, O Lord” (Ps 86:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 135:5). “For who in the skies can be compared to the Lord? Who among the heavenly beings is like the Lord, a God feared in the council of the holy ones, great and terrible above all that are round about him?” (Ps 89:6—7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 29:1; 97:7; 138:1). Although among Israel’s neighbors these gods were clearly regarded as deities, later Judaism came to speak of them as high-ranking angels. In keeping with this view, the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] often translates these “sons of God” or even “gods” as angels (Deut 32:8; Ps 8:5; 138:1 [LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] 137:1]). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] often follows the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] , so that “thou hast made him a little less than God” (or “gods,” Ps 8:5) appears as “a little lower than the angels” in Hebrews 2:7.

In the book of Job the divine assembly plays a role near the outset. It provides the background for understanding “the Satan” who enters on “a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord” (Job 1:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Job, Satan is not presented as the evil spiritual being we come to know in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] but as one who plays a legal role in the heavenly court as “the accuser.” Even though he is not loyal to God, Satan, by virtue of his rank as a divine being, is permitted to appear at meetings of the council on a day when “the sons of God” come to present themselves before the Lord (Job 1:6; 2:1). Satan’s role as “accuser” requires this (Zech 3:1; Rev 12:10).

Another picture of the divine council is offered in Daniel 7. Here the scene is more highly developed. The council assembles for judgment of the great empires of the earth, depicted as dreadful monsters. As Daniel “looks” in his vision, he sees “thrones” placed and the “ancient of days,” with raiment “white as snow” and hair “like pure wool” taking his seat on a throne of “fiery flames, its wheels ... burning with fire” and issuing forth “a stream of fire” (Dan 7:9–10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The council is attended by a stunning myriad of heavenly beings: “a thousand thousands served him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him” (Dan 7:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Their business is to render judgment, and the books are opened. The result is that the dominion of the beasts is taken away, with the final beast causing a great commotion and then being executed (Dan 7:11). Then, on a cloud chariot, “one like a son of man” arrives at the assembly. This being, representing the “saints of the Most High” (Dan 7:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), is honored by the council with universal and eternal sovereignty (Dan 7:14). When the scene concludes, Daniel, his head spinning from the spectacle, approaches one of those standing in the assembly and inquires about the meaning of this event. A full explanation ensues (Dan 7:15–28). This fully elaborated vision of the divine assembly is a prototype for many later scenes of divine assembly and throne room in Jewish apocalyptic literature.

The Divine Assembly in the New Testament. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the inner circle of the divine assembly consists of angels who surround the heavenly throne. The primary theme is worship, and there is an implied understanding that the worship of the church mirrors the worship of heaven. In Colossians 2:18 Paul exhorts the Colossian believers not to be influenced by those who place heavy demands on their access to the “worship of angels,” that is, the heavenly worship conducted by angels within the heavenly assembly (this meaning is more likely than “worship directed toward angels”). Paul warns against those who advocate a rigorous asceticism that purports to offer access to this heavenly worship (Col 2:20–23). Instead, Paul uses the imagery of believers being “raised with Christ” and setting their hearts on “things above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God” (Col 3:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul reminds the Philippians of their heavenly citizenship (Phil 3:20) and the Ephesians are blessed “in the heavenly realms” (Eph 1:3), for “God raised us up with Christ and seated us with him in the heavenly realms in Christ Jesus” (Eph 2:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

But the divine assembly is most fully developed in the book of Revelation. In Revelation 4–5 the seer enters the heavenly throne room where he first observes God the Father seated on a throne and attended by four living creatures who ceaselessly sing his praise (Rev 4:6–8). In a further circle around the throne are twenty-four thrones (Rev 4:4) on which are seated twenty-four elders, angelic figures who fall down in reverence and cast their crowns before the throne, singing of the glory and majesty of God. In the hand of the one seated on the throne is a scroll that no one is worthy to open except for a Lamb “as though it had been slain” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), standing between the throne and the circle of four living creatures (Rev 5:5–7).

The Lamb receives the same worship from the heavenly assembly as does the one on the throne, and the assembly enlarges to include angels “numbering myriads of myriads and thousands of thousands” and then to encompass the entire cosmos as “every creature in heaven and on earth and under the earth and in the sea, and all therein” join in the heavenly praise (Rev 5:11, 13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In a further scene we find 144,000 martyrs “who have come through the great tribulation” (Rev 7:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) joining the heavenly praise as they stand before the throne and the Lamb, praising God and the Lamb (Rev 7:9–12). In Revelation 14:1–5 the 144,000 appear again as a great army of saints accompanying the Lamb on Mount Zion.

The divine assembly in Revelation 4–5 is highly developed and transformed in comparison with the scenes we find in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , with its closest point of contact being Daniel 7. The emphasis on heavenly worship, is recapitulated in Revelation 19:1–8, though the motif of deliberation is present with the question of who will open the scroll (Rev 5:2–5) and takes more prominence in the judgment scene of Revelation 20. There we learn of “thrones on which were seated those who had been given authority to judge” (Rev 20:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and of a judgment that takes place before a “great white throne” (Rev 20:11–15). These heavenly assemblies are intimately linked to the destiny of the earth, its inhabitants and the spiritual world. Here, as in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , what transpires in the heavenly council has great consequences for the course of cosmic events.

See also Angel; Assembly, Human; Divine Warrior; Gods, Goddesses; Judgment; Prophet, Prophetess; Royal Court; Worship.

Bibliography. E. T. Mullen Jr., “Divine Assembly,” ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 2:214–17; idem, The Divine Council in Canaanite and Early Hebrew Literature (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1980).

ASSEMBLY, HUMAN

Because stories (including those in the Bible) are typically structured around a single protagonist, most readers tend to think of the Bible as presenting stories about individuals.

Yet only a relatively small minority of biblical stories are devoid of what we might call assemblies of people.

Assemblies range on a continuum from the formal assembly on one end to informal, ad hoc and even extemporaneous collections of people who happen to be on the scene.

While the focus of this article will be on the more formal assembly as a biblical image, we should not overlook categories of informal assemblies that greatly expand the importance of the image in the Bible. Informal assemblages of people occur in such categories as travel stories, street scenes, courtroom scenes (see Legal Images), battle scenes, harvest scenes, communal work projects, crowd scenes, judgment scenes of public exposure and punishment (including stoning), and such like. Once we are alerted to these categories, the Bible emerges in our imaginations as typically involving not isolated individuals but individuals performing actions in a social environment that includes groups of people.

The image of the assembly reaches far beyond occurrences where the word assembly appears, but some preliminary generalizations are possible if we pause to note the usages of the word. The word assembly appears 164 times in the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , and all but ten of these occur in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The overwhelming majority of these occurrences, moreover, refer to a religious assembly, as we might deduce from the sections where they cluster (sixty-eight references in Exodus through Deuteronomy, thirty-six in 1 Kings through 2 Chronicles, thirteen in Psalms).

The major spiritual events of the Bible are public events and consequently human assemblies are part of the biblical story from start to finish. Generally these assemblies are quite nonformal gatherings without clearly defined legal, political or religious authority. The image of the crowd is very important for the Gospel writers, not only to give the sense of the public nature of Jesus ministry but also to show his willingness to share his message with the unwashed masses who at times are more receptive than the religious establishment (Mt 7:29) and can be quite positive so that the leaders fear arresting Jesus in public (Mk 12:12). But the crowd is also (as is the crowd in Shakespeare's plays) fickle and cries out, "Crucify him, Crucify him" (Jn 19:15).

One of the chief roles for assemblies in the Bible is to supply witnesses to an event. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers use numerous witnesses to show that the events of the Gospels were not just private revelations. The crowd sees the raising of Lazarus (Jn 12:17) and the disciples will "bear witness of [Jesus]" because they have seen Jesus' entire ministry (Jn 15:26—27). Paul uses the idea of the assembly as a witness at several points. He tells Timothy, "the things which you heard from me in the presence of many witnesses, these entrust to faithful men, who will be able to teach others also" (2 Tim 2:2 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]), Paul also cites as evidence for the reality of Christ's resurrection that Jesus "was seen by more than five hundred of his followers" (1 Cor 15:6 NLB [NLB NLB. New Living Bible]).

To the biblical writers, human assemblies are brought forth as premiere evidence in their arguments. Because so many major events in salvation history occurred in the public eye, writers call their audience to act as witnesses to well-known events: " 'I have revealed and saved and proclaimed-I, and not some foreign God among you. You are my witnesses', declares the Lord, 'that I am God' " (Is. 43:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 44:8, 55:4). Here the thought is that Israel bears automatic testimony to the power and reality of the Lord.

In a similar way, the "great assembly" becomes an important place for worship. The psalmist declares, “I will give you thanks in the great assembly; among throngs of people I will praise you” (Ps 35:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here the image is of staking oneself in front of others by clearly declaring faith in God both in front of witnesses and as a ministry and encouragement to others (Ps 26:12; 40:9; 68:26). The image in Psalm 1 of sinners unable to stand “in the assembly of the righteous” (Ps 1:5, NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]) points to the status of the religious assembly as a community of believers who share a common faith.

Groups of people often take on a quasi-legal status in the Bible. An example is stoning as a form of ritual execution that was to be carried out by the congregation (Lev 24:14; Num 15:32). According to the law, stoning was only to be carried out for a delineated set of offenses and with proper witnesses. Uncovering Achan’s theft was a public event, and when the verdict was reached, “all the Israelites stoned Achan” (Josh 7:25 NLB [NLB NLB. New Living Bible]). Such an execution carried out by a public assembly is not to be construed as an act of mob violence. Its alternative of mob violence does indeed occur in the Bible. The Israelites were so distraught that they wanted to stone Moses (Num 14:10). Rehoboam’s emissary to the Northern Kingdom, Adoram, was stoned (1 Kings 12:18). In Luke the religious leaders are portrayed as fearing that the people would stone them if they denied that John the Baptist was a prophet (Lk 20:6). The release of Barabbas rather than Jesus illustrates how assemblies can be swayed to make incorrect decisions (Mk 15:6–14).

Whereas OT [OT OT. Old Testament] judicial assemblies seem rather occasional and ad hoc, with people called together whenever an offense seems to require action, in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we move in a more familiar world of regularly constituted courts of justice. Often these are Jewish assemblies (chiefly the Sanhedrin) that wield civil power (alarming so in the Gospels and Acts) on the basis of religious authority. One thinks of the sequence of assemblies before which Jesus is hauled in the circumstances leading to his execution, and the numerous times that the apostles and Paul were tried by Jewish authorities in the book of Acts.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] milieu a common form of assembly was the marketplace. Authority of a democratic sort was exercised in the marketplace, where assemblies sometimes have the character of a mob scene. Mobs form quickly in any people-filled area. When Paul and Silas cast a demon from a slave girl, they are dragged to the market “to face the authorities” (Acts 16:19). The market was a barometer of spiritual as well as political affairs. Observance of the sabbath in the marketplace indicated renewed commitment to God (Neh 10:31) and frustrated wicked men (Amos 8:5). In the same way, disregard for God’s provision was signaled by busy sabbath commerce and continually troubled the righteous (Neh 13:15–19). Also, oppression and fraud in the marketplace were metaphors for public iniquity (Ps 55:11). We should note in passing that if the marketplace was sometimes the scene for mob action in the Bible, most mob scenes are street scenes.

In addition to the marketplace as a place where groups naturally assemble in the social world of the Bible, there is the well and the city gate. Numerous important meetings occur at the well because it is the place where townspeople regularly assemble and where travelers make an entry into a village. The connotations of “sitting in the gate” (or its variant “sitting in the seat”) are more legal, inasmuch as the place where the elders of the town (an early-day version of the town council) met, and where civil actions transpired.

Human assemblies are prominent in the book of Revelation.

Here the church is pictured as an army and as a group of battle-weary martyrs waiting for justice to be established. It is an army which is numbered in order to be protected, not to fight (Rev 7:3–8), which follows a Lamb singing and playing harps (Rev 14:1–4), and which goes into battle like a bride wearing wedding garments rather than armor (Rev 19:7–8, 14). The heavenly armies appear, throwing Satan out of heaven (Rev 12:7–9), and supplying the various angels who play key roles in judgment and victory, following the crucial victory won by the Lamb. Whereas the Bible begins with a couple in a garden, it ends with the grandest assembly of all—the complete company of the redeemed, forever secure in heaven, which is portrayed as an endless worship assembly.

See also Assembly, Divine; Gate; Legal Images; Marketplace; Royal Court; Street; Worship.

ASTROLOGY.

See Oracle.

ATHLETICS

Although some type of athletic activity seems to be implied in a few OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passages (Gen 32:24–26; 2 Sam 2:12–17; Ps 3:7; 19:5), most of the references to athletics occur in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , particularly in the writings of Paul. Paul demonstrates thorough acquaintance with the sporting events of his day as seen in his references to running (Gal 2:2), boxing (1 Cor 9:26), wrestling (Eph 6:12), gladiatorial contests (1 Cor 4:9; 15:32) and (possibly) chariot races (Phil 3:13–14).

Athletic images conjure up a number of stimulating associations, including rigorous training or exercise (1 Cor 9:25; 1 Tim 4:7–8), singleness of purpose (1 Cor 9:26), delayed gratification (1 Cor 9:25), streamlining for maximum performance (Heb 12:1), self-control (1 Cor 9:27), perseverance (Heb 12:2) and endurance (1 Tim 4:8). Athletic endeavor also involves intense competition with lofty objectives (1 Cor 9:24) and high stakes (Eph 6:12), and it requires faithful adherence to a prescribed set of rules to avoid disqualification (2 Tim 2:5; 1 Cor 9:27). In spite of all the hard work, the end result is transitory fame. But for the Christian the crown to be won is imperishable (1 Tim 4:8; 1 Cor 9:25).

See also Race; Running; Wrestling.

ATONEMENT

The English word atonement is derived from the two words “at onement” and denotes a state of togetherness and agreement between two people. Atonement presupposes two parties that are estranged, with the act of atonement being the reconciliation of them into a state of harmony. The theological meaning is the reconciliation between God and his fallen creation, especially between God and sinful human beings. Atonement is thus a solution to the main problem of the human race—its estrangement from God stemming from the fall of Adam and Eve. A range of biblical images portrays this central event of the religious faith of the Bible.

The Sacrificial Imagery of the Old Testament. The imagery of animal sacrifice, especially blood sacrifice, is the dominant OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image for atonement, based on the principle that “under the [OT [OT OT. Old Testament]] law almost everything is purified with blood, and without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness of sins” (Heb 9:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrificial laws are a series of variations on that theme. The imagery of atoning sacrifice may be summed up in this manner: the sins of humanity violated the holiness of the Creator and brought the sentence of death, a sentence that can be averted only by the substitution of a sacrifice of death. Through the blood of sacrifice, sinful people are able to receive the blessing of God instead of his judgment.

From the earliest times of human history, animal sacrifices were designed to establish atonement between God and his sinful image bearer. Some interpreters have even understood the animal-skin clothing given to Adam and Eve as symbolic of blood sacrifice (Gen 3:21). The importance of animal sacrifices is clearly displayed in the practices of Abel (Gen 4:2—4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 11:4), Noah (Gen 8:20) and the Patriarchs (Gen 13:18; 26:25; 33:20; 35:7), though little meaning is assigned to these animal sacrifices prior to Moses. One clue, however, appears outside the Pentateuch in the retrospective account of Job 1:5. Here Job sacrifices on behalf of his children to protect them from divine judgment against their sins. Animal sacrifices are thus portrayed as a way of atonement, a means of securing divine favor for sinful people.

The law of Moses brings extensive development to the imagery of sacrificial atonement. At the first Passover (Ex 12:1—30) the blood of the sacrificed lamb on the doorways of Israelite homes protects the faithful from the judgment of death. When the Lord sees the blood he does not harm those within the home. Leviticus 1—7 describes a variety of sacrifice rituals to be practiced at the tabernacle. The detailed ritual instructions regarding whole burnt offerings (Lev 1:1—17), guilt offerings (Lev 5:14—6:7) and sin offerings (Lev 4:1—5:13) indicate that the problem of sin before the holy God of Israel is a chief concern. The people are unable to approach God enthroned in his holy place without following the prescribed arrangements and offering the appropriate sacrifices.

The clearest expression of the imagery of atoning sacrifice appears in the legislation for the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:1–34; 23:27–32; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 9:7–12). An intricate series of rituals is assigned to the tenth day of the seventh month of Tishri to atone for the sins of the entire nation. The sacrificial ritual itself involves three main steps (Lev 16:11–22). First, Aaron sacrifices for himself and his house so he can continue the ceremony without fear of judgment (Lev 16:11–14). Second, he offers the sin-offering of a goat for the congregation of Israel (Lev 16:15–19). Third, Aaron lays his hands on a second goat (a scapegoat) and sends it outside the camp to die (Lev 16:20–22).

All of these actions and the rituals surrounding them have important symbolic value that expresses various aspects of the imagery of atonement. The use of two goats in the ritual of atonement clearly reveals the two sides of atonement. The first goat is sacrificed, and its blood sprinkled on top of the ark of the covenant (“atonement cover” [NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]], “mercy seat” [KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]], “mercy seat” [RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]], Lev 16:15, 27). This act symbolizes the divine side of atonement: God’s holy justice is satisfied by the sprinkling of blood before him. The second goat represents the human side of atonement. The sins of the people are transferred to the goat by Aaron’s hands. The goat is then escorted outside the camp to “carry on itself all their sins” (Lev 16:21–22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). By means of this transfer the people are cleansed of the defilement sin has brought on them.

This twofold imagery helps to resolve a longstanding theological controversy over the imagery of atonement. Two viewpoints on atonement have come to expression in the terms expiation and propitiation. Expiatory views of atonement focus on sacrifices as the way to free people of sin and its defilement. Propitiatory understandings of atonement present sacrifices as the appeasement of divine wrath. The symbolism of two goats on the Day of Atonement indicates that both concepts are essential in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery of atonement. The sacrificial system of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is presented as God's design for satisfying the just judgment of God but also for removing the guilt of sin from those for whom sacrifices are made.

It is important to note that the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery of atonement through sacrifice is not a matter of mere ritual. Unfortunately, as the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] relates, Israel from time to time reduces the symbols of atonement to outward practice, as if merely performing the rites of sacrifice will bring them atonement. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets, however, make it clear that sacrifices are ineffectual without sincere repentance and faith. In fact the practice of sacrifice apart from appropriate inward commitments stirs the judgment of God. For instance Isaiah reports God's rebuke: "I have had enough of burnt offerings; ... I do not delight in the blood of bulls... Bring no more vain offerings" (Is 1:11, 13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Other prophets respond to Israel's hypocrisy in much the same way (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Amos 4:4, 5; Jer 7:21). Put simply, sacrificial rituals atone for those who have genuinely turned from sin and humbled themselves before God. Nothing less than such inward sincerity accompanying sacrifice will bring about reconciliation between God and sinful humanity.

Through the course of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] story, it becomes clear that the system of animal sacrifice is inadequate. While the prophets announce that Israel will suffer the judgment of exile, they also proclaim that a greater way of atonement is on the horizon. The restoration of God's people from exile will be accomplished not by animal sacrifice but by human sacrifice. The clearest expression of this expectation appears in Isaiah 52:13–53:12. Isaiah speaks of God's "servant" (Is 52:13), the son of David who will be "wounded for our transgressions" and "bruised for our iniquities" (Is 53:5). "The Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all" (Is 53:6). In fact, this servant will become "a guilt offering" for the people of God (Is 53:10).

The New Testament Imagery of Christ's Sacrifice. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] rests its doctrine of atonement on this prophetic concept of the suffering servant. Thirty-four times we find various NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers referring to Isaiah's proclamation as fulfilled in Jesus (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Acts 8:32–35; 1 Pet 2:22–25). Jesus' death is the substitutionary suffering of the Son of David that brings appeasement of divine wrath and sets God's people free from the guilt of sin.

The Gospels elaborate on the atoning nature of Christ's death in a number of ways. Matthew explains that Jesus is the promised child who saves his people from their sins (Mt 1:21). Matthew 8:17 links Jesus to the suffering servant of Isaiah 53 and offers the image of substitution. John the Baptist calls Jesus "the lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world" (Jn 1:29). Mark claims that Christ's death is the payment of a ransom (Mk 10:45). Luke depicts the atonement of Christ as the escape from God's wrath (Lk 3:7). In John's Gospel, Jesus uses a number of images to explain the atoning significance of his death. He will be lifted up as Moses lifted the serpent (Jn 3:14). He is the bread of heaven and eternal life can be found by eating his flesh and blood (Jn 6:33). He is the good shepherd who will die for his sheep (Jn 10:11).

The Pauline epistles also offer a number of images to capture the various facets of the richness of Christ's atoning work. One of Paul's favorite images for describing humankind's plight under sin is slavery. Paul writes that Christ's atonement has set us free from our enslavement (Gal 5:1). Paul also describes our "natural" death as the "wages"* earned from our sin. But the justice due us is absorbed by Christ and replaced by the "gift" of eternal life (Rom 6:23; 5:17). Reiterating prominent OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images, Paul describes Christ's atoning work in terms of the offering of a sacrifice (Eph 5:2). At least two images of atonement having to do with obligation to the law emerge in Paul's writings. First, though sinners are held captive to the law of sin (Rom 7:23), they are released from the law of death and bondage and are justified by the righteousness of Christ alone (Rom 3:20—26). Second, because of people's inability to keep the law, they bear the "curse"* of the law, but Christ has borne the curse in their place (Gal 3:12).

Paul also portrays atonement in legal terms (see Legal Images). With courtroom imagery the sinner is pronounced as the object of divine judgment both now and at the end of the age (Rom 1:24, 26, 28; 2:16). Yet because of Christ's atoning work there is no condemnation (Rom 8:1). In similar terms, fallen humanity is described as the object of God's holy wrath, but in Christ's sacrifice there is escape from the coming wrath (1 Thess 1:10; 5:9). Another important Pauline image of atonement is that of reconciliation. Though we were once enemies, we now have become reconciled through the blood of Christ (Rom 5:10—11). The hostility between God and his creation is abolished for those who benefit from the atoning work of Christ. The scope of this reconciliation reaches cosmological proportions: through Christ, God will "reconcile to himself all things, whether on earth or in heaven, making peace by the blood of his cross" (Col 1:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

No NT [NT NT. New Testament] book is richer in the imagery of atonement than the epistle to the Hebrews. Unfolding the ultimate meaning of the priestly activity in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] tabernacle, the author explains that Jesus is not only the great high priest but the sacrifice as well (Heb 9:6–13). The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ceremonial sacrifices and practices were only “external regulations, applying until the time of the new order” (Heb 9:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The imagery of animal blood is emphasized in Hebrews as a “shadow” of the effectual cleansing of the blood of Christ (Heb 9:13–14). Hebrews also highlights the finality of Christ’s sacrifice, thereby making the work of Christ the climactic image of atonement. Though the priest “stands daily at his service, offering repeatedly the same sacrifices,” Christ has “[offered] for all time a single sacrifice for sins” (Heb 10:11–14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). What the blood of animals could have never accomplished, Jesus accomplished once and for all. But this redemption included great suffering. The author of Hebrews frequently employs images of suffering surrounding the atoning work of Christ to impress upon the imaginations of Christians the great cost of salvation (Heb 2:10; 5:7; 13:12).

Images of the atonement fill the Revelation of John. Christ is often designated as the lamb who was slain but triumphed (Rev 5:6, 12; 17:14). The redeemed “have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb” (Rev 7:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The atonement is celebrated by the living creatures and elders surrounding the throne of heaven (Rev 5:11–12). This great song of redemption becomes the chorus of every believer. In Revelation 19:9 the imagery of the sacrificial lamb is joined with the imagery of the final wedding feast. This great celebration of salvation symbolizes that atonement will be fully accomplished when the redeemed in Christ enter their final destiny of eternal life in the new heaven and new earth.

Summary. The imagery surrounding the Bible's teaching on atonement threatens to overwhelm us by its very abundance and multiplicity. Much of the biblical data can be summed up under five master images or controlling motifs. One is the bearing away of sins so that sinners can be freed from a penalty they have incurred (the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] scapegoat escorted into the wilderness, 1 Pet 2:24; Heb 9:28). Second is the financial image of a ransom that is paid in exchange for sinners (Mt 20:28; Mk 10:45; 1 Tim 2:6; Rev 5:9). A third motif is the substitute who takes the place of sinners, suffering the punishment that stems from God's justice in their place (Is 53:4–6; Rom 5:12–21, with its emphasis on Christ as the second Adam, the representative of the human race who effects redemption for it; 2 Cor 5:14; Gal 3:12). Fourth, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrifices and Christ as the fulfillment of those sacrifices are a satisfaction (not simply a waiving) of the offense that the human race has committed against God by virtue of its sinfulness, and an appeasement of the just anger of God against the human race for its offense (Rom 3:24–26; Heb 2:17; 1 Jn 2:1–2). And fifth, atonement is a legal and juridical meeting of the requirements of the law so that sinful people can stand acquitted before God the judge (Rom 3:7; 5:18–19; 8:1; 2 Cor 5:19). The result of all these transactions, finally, is reconciliation between an offended, holy God and a sinful, rebellious humanity (Rom 5:7–11; 2 Cor 5:18–20; Col 1:20).

See also Blood; Cleansing; Cross; Curse; Guilt; Jesus, Images of; Lamb; Legal Images; Offering; Passover; Priest; Sacrifice; Sin; Suffering Servant; Triumph.

Bibliography. L. Morris, The Atonement: Its Meaning and Significance (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1983).

ATROCITY.

See Torture.

AUTHORITY, DIVINE AND ANGELIC

It is helpful to distinguish between biblical images of authority that speak of the heavenly, or spiritual, realm and those that speak of the human realm. In the biblical scheme of the cosmos, all authority is derived from God. And within the heavenly, or spiritual, realm there is a delegated authority that is granted to the angels. But a malignancy of rebellion has infected even the spiritual order of things, and so a distinction must be drawn between the authority of “good” and “bad” (or demonic) angelic powers.

Divine Authority. Biblical images of authority prove Israel’s God revealed in Jesus to be the only true God. False gods like Baal or Mammon exert great power but are usurpers without legitimacy. The true value of Mammon, for example, is symbolized by figures of nakedness and poverty for the Laodiceans’ supposed riches in contrast to white garments and fire-refined gold given by God (Rev 3:17–18).

The image of four horsemen (Rev 6:1–8) illustrates the difference between power and authority. Forces of war, economic disorder and death, symbolized by red, black and pale horses, influence history but have no ultimate sovereignty. Only Christ, rider of the white horse, returns later and wears the name “King of kings and Lord of lords” (Rev 19:11–16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 17:14; Dan 2:47; 1 Tim 6:15).

Sovereign kingship. The most prevalent figure of divine authority in both testaments is the kingship of God. The Israelites are warned that human kings will lead them into the world’s economic, political and warring practices and away from serving the heavenly King who rightly claims their obedience because he brought them out of Egypt (1 Sam 8:7–18). Symbols of kingship, such as a throne or scepter, also image God's authority to judge and rule (Ps 9:7; 45:6; 47:8; Is 6; Ezek 1; Heb 1:8; Rev 4–5, 7).

Daniel's vision of God is particularly vivid in its depiction of divine authority. God's authority is evoked in his title Ancient of Days, and his great age, a symbol of authority in the ancient world, is imaged in his hair which is "white like wool" (Dan 7:9). The awesome picture of his wheeled throne, ablaze and sending forth a river of fire, is fittingly framed by the myriad throngs that attend him. He has authority over the empires of the earth, and displaces the monstrous fourth beast (Dan 7:10). Then to the "one like a son of man" he grants "authority, glory and sovereign power," the worship of all peoples and nations, and "an everlasting dominion that will not pass away" (Dan 7:13–14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This is a picture of sovereign and heavenly authority that will not be surpassed until the John the Seer unfurls his vision of the heavenly throne room in Revelation 4 and 5. These images are the ancient textual equivalents of a modern day epic film, complete with spectacular effects and a cast of thousands. They press the borders of the audience's imagination and compel them to join in the heavenly worship of the One who reigns in cosmic authority.

The symbols of sovereignty are also invoked to image the authority of the Son. Following his incarnation and obedience to the point of death on a cross, Christ is "highly exalted" and given the throne name of Lord. This is "the name that is above every name, so that at the name of Jesus every knee should bend, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord" (Phil 2:9–11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This universal authority is similarly imaged in 1 Corinthians 15:24–28, where Christ’s authority extends over the spiritual powers whom he will subdue: “God has put all things in subjection under his feet” (1 Cor 15:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see Under the Feet). But Christ’s eschatological authority is rooted in his protological authority: “in him all things in heaven and on earth were created, things visible and invisible, whether thrones or dominions or rulers or powers—all things have been created through him and for him” (Col 1:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

He is the image of the heavenly Father, whose authority derives from the fact that he is the one Creator God who is also actively engaged in the redemption of his creation. The God of the Bible is no remote deity of deism; he is actively engaged in sustaining his creation. Images derived from his creative and redemptive work rightly speak of his sovereignty. The Lord declares, “Woe to him who quarrels with his Maker.” To enter into dispute with God is like clay arguing with the potter or like a child asking her parents why they have begotten her (Is 45:9–13). Similarly, the image of Jesus as “author and perfecter” portrays his mastery over faith because he is its source (Heb 12:2).

Authoritative word. Perhaps the most comprehensive image for God’s authority is the “word of God.” Control over creation is pictured by God’s speaking and the creation coming into being (Gen 1); sovereignty over history is figured by God’s declaring new things before they spring into being (Is 42:9). The word from God always is effective (Is 55).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] images the authoritative word of God by repeatedly announcing that events in Jesus’ life are fulfillments of prophecy. The prophets themselves are images for God’s authority in their legitimizing phrase, “Thus saith the Lord.” And that word, having gone out from the mouth of God, has run its effective course in history and brought it fulfillment to birth. Jesus claims his own divine authority by building on this prophetic image. Repeatedly the Gospels record his saying, “Truly I say to you,” thus going beyond the prophets’ phrase to picture his own authority as the living Word. His teaching is imbued with an authority that is “not as the scribes” (Mk 1:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Healing and exorcism is also an image displaying Jesus’ authority. When religious leaders protest that he blasphemes by forgiving sins, Jesus effectively commands the paralytic to get up (Mk 2:1–12). The crowds recognize the image of his authority when he successfully commands unclean spirits to come out (Lk 4:36; Mk 1:27). And when he commands the raging sea to “be still,” his authoritative word echoes the divine word that subdues the forces of chaos (Mk 4:39; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 26:12; Ps 65:7; 89:9). In his memorable action in the temple (Mk 11:15–17), he enacts the coming destruction of the temple and later suggests that he is the cornerstone of a new temple (Mk 12:10–11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 14:58). Jesus’ posture toward the temple, the center of Israel’s sacred space and the touchpoint of heaven and earth, signifies an implied authority over all that is sacred to Israel.

The name lord and the authority of the master’s word is used as an image by the centurion at Capernaum who seeks Jesus’ healing for his servant (Mt 8:5–13). The title and idea of lordship always represent Christ’s authority (especially as multiplied through the phrase, “Lord of lords,” noted above). In the Hebrew Scriptures the term adonai (“lord”) is not often used alone for God, but is usually coupled with the personal name of God (Yahweh) when it is intended to convey his authority. When coupled with the phrase “of hosts,” the name Yahweh, generally translated “Lord,” delineates God’s authority over various entities, such as the stars (Is 40:26, 45:12). It is part of the field of imagery associated with Yahweh the divine warrior. At his command the hosts of heaven fight from their heavenly courses (Judg 5:20). Similarly, when the Lord refers to locust hordes invading Israel as his “army,” the figure represents his commanding control (Joel 1:4–7; 2:1–11, 25). The people of Israel are called “the hosts of the Lord,” and the picture of their departing Egypt in Exodus 12:41 suggests God’s authority also over Egypt, Pharaoh and the gods of this great superpower. Jeremiah underscores this sovereignty over Israel by using the image of “the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel” more than thirty times.

Often the meaning of “hosts” is ambiguous. Zechariah uses the term frequently in association with an angelic visit concerning God’s plan for Jerusalem, so the image might represent God’s authority over the heavenly hosts as well as over Israel’s history. Psalm 103 places the phrase “his hosts” between the angels “obeying the voice of his word,” and all his works in all places of his dominion (Ps 103:20–22); likewise, Psalm 148 offers the image of “hosts” between angels and the sun, moon and stars (Ps 148:2–3). All these figures are important because the title “Lord of hosts” occurs hundreds of times to picture God’s authority over everything imaginable (see especially Isaiah, Jeremiah, Haggai and Zechariah). In Malachi, the phrase “says the Lord of hosts,” combines more than twenty times the images of God’s authoritative word with all the hosts he commands.

Many of God’s names serve as images of his authority. Isaiah 44:6 mingles “Lord of hosts” with “King of Israel,” “Redeemer” and “first and last” to confirm that there is no other true God. Isaiah 48:12 connects the idea of “first and last” with the authority God wields over creation, whereas in Revelation that image expresses more his sovereignty over history (Rev 1:8, 11; 21:6; 22:13). Though the figure of Father connotes many meanings, it symbolizes God's authority, especially in connection with disciplining children, as Hebrews 12:7–12 makes clear.

Psalm 29 brings together many images to ascribe to the Lord the “glory due his name.” That phrase, the coupling of “glory”* with “strength,”* and the Psalm's contents combine to imply that the word glory is itself an image for divine authority. Seven times “the voice of the Lord” is described to portray God's sovereign creation and rescue of Israel. The poem culminates in the image of God as king over all, sitting enthroned over the primordial flood—a picture representing authority over both nature and history.

Angelic Authority. The authority of good angels is a derived legitimacy, pictured by “the glory of the Lord” that accompanies angelic visitation (Lk 2:9). Hebrews 9:5 underscores angels' representation of God's authority by declaring that above the ark of the covenant were “the cherubim of the Glory” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 6:2). Similarly, the seraphim of Isaiah 6:2 proclaim antiphonally the authority of “the Lord of hosts” portrayed in the glory which fills the earth. Though angels serve primarily as images for God's authority, they also wield it with various objects also symbolizing it, such as the cherubim's flaming swords at the Garden of Eden (Gen 3:24), the seraphim's burning coal (Is 6:6–7) and the trumpets, seals and bowls of Revelation.

Demonic Authority. That the powers of evil exercise only a usurped authority is portrayed by the image of the dragon (whose seven heads symbolize “perfect” authority; see Monster) being thrown down from heaven in the war with archangel Michael and his angels (Rev 12:3, 7–9). Just as God the Father passed on his authority to the Son and the Son to the Holy Spirit (Jn 5:26–27; 16:7–15), so Satan's imitation of God and of his authority is represented by the figures of the dragon giving authority to the first beast and of the second beast exercising the authority of the first (Rev 13:2—12). The images of the “prince of devils” (Mt 9:34; 12:24), of this world (Jn 12:31; 14:30; 16:11) and “of the power of the air” (Eph 2:2) all show Satan’s authority to be falsely derivative and less than the divine authority of the King.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] somewhat ambiguously uses several terms as images for Satan’s minions. Under the general title of “methods of the devil,” Ephesians 6:11—12 names four agents—principalities (archē), authorities (exousiai), world rulers of this darkness and spiritual forces of wickedness in the heavenlies. When the first two terms are used in connection with human entities, their meaning is clearly that of governments and public officials (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Tit 3:1), but how the supernatural powers employing Satan’s authority should be conceived is left unexplained (1 Cor 15:24; Rom 8:38; Col 1:16; 2:10; 15; Eph 1:21; 3:10; 6:12). Other images include stoicheia (“elements,” Gal 4:3, 9; Col 2:8, 20) and angeloi (“angels,” Rom 8:38; 2 Thess 1:7; 1 Cor 4:9; 6:3; 11:10; 13:1; Gal 3:19; Col 2:18). Though the exact meaning of these terms is widely debated, their significance as images is that evil supernatural forces exploit authority in many forms. Certain is the assurance that at the end of time all evil angels and authorities will be subjected to Jesus (Mt 28:18), who sits at God’s right hand (also a figure for authority, Mk 14:62; 1 Pet 3:22; 1 Cor 15:24). The triumph of God’s ultimate authority is vividly portrayed by the image of the devil and his minions being thrown into the lake of fire and brimstone (Rev 20:10).

See also Angel; Assembly, Divine; Authority, Human; Demons; Divine Warrior; God; King, Kingship; Royal Court.

AUTHORITY, HUMAN

Authority is legitimate power. It implies freedom as well as permission to decide and to act. In the human community people in authority provide leadership, direction and discipline. Within the various social structures of the biblical world, we observe many different positions of authority, including parents with children, masters with slaves, elders with tribes and cities, priests within the temple, and judges, prophets and kings whose sphere of authority extended to an entire nation and even beyond the borders of Israel. The Greco-Roman world provided additional examples of authority drawn from the extended household, the workplace, the city-state and the imperial government. Some of these authority roles supply images and illustrations for spiritual leadership within the nation of Israel and later the community of followers of Jesus.

Images From The Extended Family. Father/Mother. In the ancient world the father held absolute authority as ruler of the household, but was also expected to guard, support and help the family members. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we find the term father used of Naaman by his servant (2 Kings 5:13), of the prophet Elisha by two kings of Israel (2 Kings 5:21; 13:14) and of a young Levite invited by different Israelites to be their priest (Judg 17:10; 18:19). In each case it is a title of honor given to one who has a role of spiritual leadership.

Although Jesus teaches his disciples to see God as their Father, and warns them not to call any human leader their “father” (Mt 23:9), senior leaders in the apostolic community often refer to younger believers as their children (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Peter with Mark, 1 Pet 5:13; Paul with Timothy, 1 Cor 4:17; the apostle John with his readers, 1 Jn 2:28). In 2 Corinthians 12:14 Paul speaks of his readiness to sacrifice with joy for the Corinthian believers, as a parent saves up for the children. In a beautifully tender passage in 1 Thessalonians, Paul describes himself and his ministry team as a nursing mother (1 Thess 2:7) as well as an encouraging father providing individualized care (1 Thess 2:1–12). As a spiritual mother, Paul agonizes in giving birth to new believers (Gal 4:19), but as a father, he is also prepared to discipline his children (1 Cor 4:15, 21).

Elder. The term elder is used most frequently for leaders of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] congregations. Its basic meaning is “someone who is older.” In the Jewish community the elders were part of the patriarchal clan system. As heads of families they held basically unchallenged authority and were responsible for judicial, political and military decisions. The elders in the Jerusalem church receive the gift for famine relief from the church at Antioch (Acts 11:30) and help decide the basis on which Gentiles should be received into the church (Acts 15). Paul and Barnabas appoint elders for each of the churches they establish on their first missionary journey (Acts 14:23). Peter refers to himself as a “fellow-elder” (1 Pet 5:1–3), and John the apostle calls himself “the elder” in his second and third letters (2 Jn 1; 3 Jn 1).

Guardian/Pedagogue. In Greco-Roman households of means, the guardian, or pedagogue (paidagogos), acted as the guardian, disciplinarian or guide for children, conducting them to and from school and overseeing their education until they reached maturity. Sometimes regarded fondly, more often the pedagogue was remembered as a harsh figure, ready to punish with the rod any infraction of his discipline (“heirs, as long as they are minors, are no better than slaves,” Gal 4:1). The guardian was to be given respect, as was the father. In Galatians 3:24–25 and 4:1–2 Paul describes the Sinai covenant as a pedagogue that leads Israel to Christ. The law pointed out and punished sin and brought its charges to their age of majority (“the date set by the Father,” Gal 4:2), the epoch of Christ. In 1 Corinthians 4:15– 16 Paul says that even though the Corinthians have many who assist them and watch over them in their Christian life like guardians, he alone is their spiritual father.

Steward/Manager. Two of the favorite images used by Jesus and the apostles are *‘‘servant’’ (diakonos) and *‘‘slave’’ (doulos). Although the emphasis is usually on the authority of the Lord as master, there is one kind of household servant who has authority over the property and over the other servants, that is the ‘‘steward’’ or ‘‘manager’’ (oikonomos). In Matthew 24:45–51 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 12:42–48) Jesus tells a parable contrasting the faithful and wise servant, who provides food at the proper time for the household, with the wicked servant who mistreats his fellow-servants. Paul describes the church leader as a steward entrusted with God’s work, who must be blameless (Tit 1:7) and faithful (1 Cor 4:2–4). Peter exhorts all Christians to use their spiritual gifts as good stewards of God’s grace (1 Pet 4:10).

Images from the Workplace. Expert builder. In 1 Corinthians 3:10 Paul compares himself to an expert builder (architekton) who lays the foundation at Corinth upon which others are building. In secular Greek a tekton was a craftsman in wood, stone or metal, and the architekton was the head builder, or contractor or director of works, who oversaw the entire project (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 3:3, where the master craftsmen is among those who will be removed through God’s judgment on the nation).

Pilot. A very colorful leadership word, used only once in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (1 Cor 12:28), is kybernēsis (administration), based on the word kybernētēs, which means the captain, pilot or steersman of a ship. In the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] kybernēsis is given as the function of rulers (Prov 1:5; 11:14). The term kybernētēs is used literally of sailors in Ezekiel 27:8, 27–28 (LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)]) and of the pilot of a ship in Acts 27:11 and Revelation 18:17. Acts 27:11 makes clear that the owner of the ship and the pilot are two different people. The owner of the ship determines where it is to go, but the pilot determines the best route and method to get there. In the same way the overall goal of the church is defined by the Lord, the “owner,” but the role of the administrator is to establish the specific direction and to coordinate the activities of the other members toward that end.

Shepherd. One of the most familiar and best-loved images of spiritual leadership is the shepherd (see Sheep, Shepherd), familiar from passages like Psalm 23 and Ezekiel 34. Although Jesus clearly describes himself in shepherd terminology in John 10, he applies this term only indirectly to his disciples (sending the Twelve to the “lost sheep of Israel” in Mt 10:6 and telling Peter to feed and care for his sheep in Jn 21:15–17). However, after the ascension, when Jesus is no longer present to give personal leadership to his flock, the shepherd metaphor becomes more prominent. Paul exhorts the leaders of the Ephesian church in Acts 20:28: “Take heed to yourselves and to all the flock” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Also speaking to elders, Peter says, “Tend the flock of God that is your charge” (1 Pet 5:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Notice that in both cases the flock belongs to God, not to the shepherd; the shepherd is a servant, assigned the task of caring for God’s people (see Flock).

The shepherd image conveys ideas of tenderness, nurture and devotion; but it also implies discipline (the rod and the staff), the setting of limits (protection against wolves) and the right to establish direction (leading to pasture). In fact, the verb poimanō is sometimes translated as “rule” (Rev 2:27; 12:5; 9; 15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 2:9).

Images from the Larger Community. Ambassador. The ambassador was an authorized representative who represented the people who sent him and negotiated for them. More than simply the deliverer of a message, the ambassador was authorized to act on behalf of the sender. The status of the ambassador was generally related to the status of the ruler that he represented. In 2 Corinthians 5:20 Paul, speaking of his apostolic role, says, “We are therefore Christ’s ambassadors, as though God were making his appeal through us” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Ephesians 6:20 he invites the Christians to pray that he will be able to proclaim boldly the gospel, “for which I am an ambassador in chains” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Apostle. The apostle is one who is sent by another. The verb apostellō appears frequently in the Gospels, in reference to the sending of Jesus by the Father (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 15:24) and the sending of the apostles by Jesus (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jn 17:18). Jesus uses the word often in his parables to describe servants sent on assignments by their masters (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 20:2; Mk 12:1–6). In Mark 3:13–19 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 6:12–16) Jesus calls his disciples together and designates twelve of them to be his apostles. The “sent ones” will have two basic responsibilities. First, they are called together to be with Jesus, that is to share a common life. In the second place, they are called to share in a task, to announce a message and to exercise authority over the powers of darkness. They will share in Jesus’ own authority, speaking and taking action as representatives of the Messiah. Others who are called apostles in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] include Paul (Rom 1:1), Barnabas (Acts 14:4, 14), Silas and Timothy (1 Thess 1:1; 2:6–7), and possibly Andronicus and Junias (Rom 16:7).

Herald. In classical Greek the “herald” (keryx) was commissioned by a ruler or by the state to call out some item of news or to announce a judicial verdict. The word implies a binding and commanding proclamation. Paul calls himself a herald in 1 Timothy 2:7 and 2 Timothy 1:11.

Leader. Two different Greek words are translated as “leader.”* The word hēgoumenos, which means leader in the sense of a guide, is used of kings of Israel (Ezek 43:7), military commanders (1 Macc 9:30; 2 Macc 14:6), rulers of Judah (Mt 2:6) and Joseph’s position as ruler of Egypt (Acts 7:10). Thus it is used for broad and authoritative leadership roles. In Acts 15:22 Judas and Silas are called “leaders among the brothers.” The author of Hebrews exhorts his readers to remember their leaders, to imitate them, to obey them and to submit to them (Heb 13:7, 17).

Another word for leader, prohistamenos, was used in secular Greek for leadership in an army, a state or a party. The basic meaning is “to set before or over someone or something.” It implied guarding, protecting and taking responsibility, combining presiding with personal care. Paul uses this word for church leaders in 1 Thessalonians 5:12, 13 and 1 Timothy 5:17 and cites leadership as a spiritual gift in Romans 12:8.

Overseer. In secular Greek the word overseer (episkopos) was used of men with responsible positions with the state and of officials in religious communities. It implied overall supervising, ordering, evaluating and setting direction. This term is used interchangeably with “elder” for leaders in the local congregations (Phil 1:1; 1 Tim 3:1; Tit 1:5, 7; Acts 20:17; 1 Pet 5:1, 2).

Royal priest. At the foot of Mount Sinai, before the giving of the Ten Commandments, God says to his people, “You will be for me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (Ex 19:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The same idea of the corporate priesthood of the entire nation of Israel is contained in the promise of Isaiah for Israel regathered by the Messiah in the year of Jubilee: “You will be called priests of the Lord” (Is 61:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The image of priest is not used in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] for individual believers, but for the community as whole. Peter calls believers a “holy priesthood” (1 Pet 2:5) and a “royal priesthood” (1 Pet 2:9). The privileges of leading in worship and of offering sacrifice, formerly reserved for the priests, now belong to all God’s people.

The book of Revelation employs the image of priest several times to describe the privileged position made available to Christians. In Revelation 1:6 John describes Jesus Christ as the one who has made believers to be “a kingdom and priests to serve his God and Father” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Revelation 5:9–10 the four living creatures and the twenty-four elders sing praise to the Lamb, who made believers from every nation to be “a kingdom and priests” who will “reign on the earth.” Revelation 20:6 says that believer-priests will reign with Christ for a thousand years. These verses highlight another aspect of the priestly function: to share in God’s rule, just as the priests taught the law to God’s people and helped them to order the life of the community accordingly.

Prophet. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophet was one who proclaimed the word of God and was called by God to warn, to encourage, to comfort and to teach. The prophet was responsible directly to God and did not receive authority from any human appointment. Jesus was popularly acclaimed as a prophet by his contemporaries (Lk 24:19; Jn 4:19; 6:17; 7:40; 9:17) and seemed to regard himself as a prophet (Lk 4:24; Mk 6:4; Mt 13:57), though he was, like John, “more than a prophet” (Mt 12:38–41; Lk 11:29–32).

Very early in the history of the church, people known as prophets are recognized and given leadership in the believing community. We find some prophets having an itinerant ministry (Acts 11:27–28; 21:10) while others function as part of the ongoing leadership of the congregation (Acts 13:1; 15:22, 32). The functions of prophets specifically detailed in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] include warning the Christian community of impending difficulties (Acts 11:28; 21:10–11); speaking to encourage, strengthen, comfort and instruct believers (Acts 15:32; 1 Cor 14:24–25); and preparing God’s people for works of service (Eph 4:11–12). Prophets are often mentioned together with apostles as playing the foundational leadership roles in the church (1 Cor 12:28; Eph 2:20; 4:11), Teacher. In secular Greek the word teacher (didaskalos) was widely used and covered all those who were engaged in the formal transfer of knowledge and skills. The word occurs only twice in the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] , probably because the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] emphasis is more on obedience than on imparting information. Yet in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we see that within the Christian community as well, the task of the teacher is not only to communicate the facts of the Christian faith but also to be concerned for changes in attitude and behavior.

In Acts the leadership of the Antioch church consists of prophets and teachers (Acts 13:1). In the list of spiritual gifts in 1 Corinthians 12:28, teachers are cited third, grouped with apostles and prophets. In Ephesians 4:11 “teachers” appear after apostles, prophets and evangelists, in a sort of hyphenated form with “pastors,” thus “pastor-teachers,” who share in the work of equipping other believers for ministry.

Another word used for teaching in the Christian community is katecheō, which means to pass on information about something. In Galatians 6:6 Paul says that the community should provide support for its teachers.

Missing Images. It is significant to note that in their images for life and leadership within the believing community, Jesus and the apostles avoided the numerous words compounded from the root arch-, which have to do with rule, and which carry a strong tone of authority. At least sixteen of these words occur in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , but none of them are ever applied to the disciple of Jesus, with the exception of Paul's reference to himself in 1 Corinthians 3:10 as an "expert builder" (architekton) who laid the foundation for others to build upon. Jesus often refers to his followers as "servants" and as "brothers," encouraging them to think of themselves as those who were "under" and "among" rather than "over." Jesus places far more emphasis in the development of his disciples on their following than on their leading. He warns his disciples against the rulers of the Gentiles, who lord it over their followers and exercise authority over them. Instead, Jesus tells them: "Whoever wants to be great among you must be your servant, and whoever wants to be first must be your slave" (Lk 20:25–27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The image of the servant remains a central motif in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] letters. Even the apostles, who exercise the highest human authority within the church, describe themselves as servants of Christ (1 Cor 3:5). Their ministry is called diakonia, the service of a table waiter. Whatever authority each one has, he or she possesses it by the call of God and by the grace of God. The authority is not to be used to domineer but to serve and to build.

Portraits of Authority and Attitudes Toward Authority. Attitudes toward civil authority. The young David, even though he is recently anointed (1 Sam 16:13), enters the service of King Saul, giving him the proper devotion and honor due a king (1 Sam 16:21–23) and remaining in his service despite Saul's occasional attempts to kill him (1 Sam 18:11). Here we have an odd picture of a subject who knows that he will be king but still renders honor to the incumbent Saul—despite the necessity of dodging Saul's spears. This regard for the king's authority is continued in a later incident when David has an opportunity to kill Saul, but out of honor for the Lord's anointed, he does not (1 Sam 24:10).

A sorry example of a subject in relationship to his king is the case of King David and Joab, his army commander. David instructs Joab to make sure that Uriah the Hittite will die in battle (2 Sam 11:14–15). Joab automatically obeys, and in giving blind obedience to his lord, Joab disobeys a higher, superseding relational authority: his own obedience to God and the laws of God.

An incident of pure and simple respect for kings, perhaps a healthy fear, comes from the time of Zechariah and the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem. King Darius issues an edict concerning the Jews and the temple construction. He decrees that the local authorities, namely, Tattenai, the governor of Trans-Euphrates, should give all necessary support to the project. Darius concludes his edict by explaining that those who do not obey will be impaled on a piece of wood pulled from their own house. Needless to say, the Jews are given enthusiastic support by Tattenai and his peers (Ezra 6:6–13).

In the Gospels we find the Pharisees raising for Jesus the subject of taxes (Mt 22:17). Is it right to pay taxes to Caesar? The answer given by Jesus is suitably ambiguous—give to Caesar what is Caesar's (Mt 22:21)—and suitably damning, for the Pharisees produce from their own pockets the coin bearing the blasphemous image of Caesar.

In Paul's instructions that believers should pay taxes to Caesar and submit to his authority (Rom 13:1—6; Tit 3:1; 1 Pet 2:13), we find a godly respect for the authority structures that God has ordained (Rom 13:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Dan 2:21). The righteous should not fear the government. Only those citizens who do wrong should. (Rom 13:4; 1 Pet 2:14). On the other hand, a fear not unlike the fear that is proper toward God—attitudes such as awe, devotion, respect, etc.—is to be rendered to the king (Prov 24:21). These principles inform the narrative portrait in Acts when Paul appeals to Caesar, throwing himself on the mercy of Rome (Acts 25:10—11). We see a display of a Christian's attitude toward civil authority, in this case a Roman citizen toward Caesar, with the expectation that justice will be done. Paul manifests the attitude that he had articulated in Romans 13:3—4: a citizen who has done only good should have nothing to fear from his government.

Attitudes toward people by civil authorities. Various degrees of incompetence are displayed by the kings of Israel. Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, shows an affinity for incompetence in that he declares to his people that his rule will be characterized by scourging people with scorpions (1 Kings 12:14). Here is an example of a ruler refusing to listen to his own people (1 Kings 12:15).

Cyrus, king of Persia, deals with the people of Israel with great mercy. This is, no doubt, due to God moving his heart. However, the fact is that Cyrus chose to obey the dictate of God, resulting in his attitude of encouragement, charity and generosity; he provides for the people of Israel to return and rebuild the temple in Jerusalem (Ezra 1:2—11).

A quisling, toady attitude toward the people is displayed by Pontius Pilate in the matter of Jesus' sentencing. Though Pilate is fully aware of Jesus' innocence, he is more interested in the people's favor. Pilate is willing to murder an innocent man and release a murderer simply to enjoy the good will of the people (Lk 23:23—25).

Attitudes toward priests. The relationship between the first high priest, Aaron, and the people of Israel is indicative of the long and tumultuous affair of priest and people that runs jaggedly through biblical history. Though the people have every reason to fear and reverence Aaron as the channel of God's power—from the days of the plagues and his serpentine rod (Ex 7:8—13)—they demonstrate a recurring tendency to forget the potency of his office. Thus we have such incidents as the golden calf, where the people approach Aaron the high priest and, in effect, demand that he participate with them—no, lead them into sin (Ex 32). In contrast, we later find the people of Israel eagerly standing before Aaron, waiting for his blessing and for the completion of the sin offering, ready to fall on the ground in joy with no memory of the golden calf (Lev 9:22—24).

Paul's trial before the Sanhedrin demonstrates the automatic honor and respect that a priest engenders in the people. Before Paul knows who Ananias is, he speaks rudely to him; but after he is told that Ananias is the high priest, Paul immediately backs down, saying that one should not speak evil of a ruler (Acts 23:3—5).

A fine disregard is shown by the apostles for priests in Jerusalem. Even though the priests repeatedly command them not to preach the gospel, throw them into jail and have them flogged, the apostles do not pay attention to them (Acts 5:40—42). Such incidents as these illustrate the dynamic that earthly authorities can be righteously superseded if those authorities overstep their God-given boundaries, in this case the proclamation of the gospel.

Attitudes by priests toward the people. Hophni and Phineas, the two sons of Eli, are two examples of priests who misuse and abuse their positions of trust as priests (1 Sam 2:12–17). They are contemptuous of their fellow Israelites as they steal from the people's offerings and sleep with the women who serve at the Tent of Meeting (1 Sam 2:22).

The grief and sorrow of Ezra the priest when he hears that the people of Israel have been intermarrying with neighboring people portrays a man who feels the weight of responsibility for his people, regarding them as if they are his children. When he hears the news, Ezra tears his clothes and rips hair from his head and beard (Ezra 9:3). Then he fell on his knees before God and prays—a priest confessing before God on behalf of the people.

Annas, Caiaphas and the rest of their priestly entourage do not punish Peter and John for fear of displeasing the people (Acts 4:21). We recognize that they are doing the right thing, even though it is for the wrong reason. However, the more fundamental dynamic of priests ordering their behavior according to the whim of the people harks back to the relationship of Aaron with the people of Israel and Aaron's tendency to conform to the desires of the people (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the golden calf).

Attitudes of children toward parents. In the biblical perspective, the beginning of a child's regard for his or her parents begins with honor. The commandment concerning the parent-child relationship, "Honor your father and your mother" (Deut 5:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), is the first commandment given that speaks directly to a horizontal, human-to-human relationship. It sets the biblical standard of all children's behavior toward their parents. According to Mosaic law, if a child curses his father and mother, he will receive the punishment of death (Ex 21:17). Such apparent severity serves to underscore the honor given to the child-parent relationship.

The God-based authority and value of the position of the father is highlighted in the idea of the paternal blessing, a blessing sought after and coveted by any son. The story of Jacob and Esau illustrates the worth placed upon a father's spoken words of blessing. Jacob is willing to go to extraordinary lengths to obtain the blessing, even if it means incurring the wrath of his brother (Gen 27).

The three sons of Noah display two different attitudes toward their father, resulting in markedly disparate effects. Ham, the youngest son, does not honor Noah in his drunken and naked state. Shem and Japheth, however, demonstrate decorous filial respect by covering their father's nakedness while, at the same time, being careful not to look upon him (Gen 9:20–23). The practical outcome of all of this is that Ham is cursed and his two older brothers are blessed (Gen 9:25–27).

The honor that Isaac accords Abraham in allowing his father to choose a wife for him is emblematic of the time and culture. The idea is perhaps surprising for a modern society (Gen 24), a surprise that only serves to delineate the immense chasm between images of child-parent relations of modern times and those of the Bible.

A stark, though perhaps macabre, example of a daughter honoring her father is found in the story of Jephthah's daughter. She respects the oath that her father has taken, even though his impetuous words have condemned her to death (Judg 11:30–39).

The story of Esther affords another curious picture of a child honoring her father—in this case, a father figure. Though Mordecai is only the cousin of Esther, he raises the young orphan as if she were his daughter (Esther 2:7). Esther is obedient to Mordecai before and after she becomes queen (Esther 2:10, 20). Even though in all practicality she is in social authority over Mordecai, the bonds of fatherhood compel her to give honor and obedience to him.

An interesting event in Jesus' own childhood underscores the biblical ideal of the obedience and honor a child should give to his parents. When Joseph and Mary reproach him for staying behind in Jerusalem, Jesus protests mildly that he has to be in his Father's house. However, he then returns home and is obedient to them (Lk 2:49–51). Later, Jesus exemplifies child-parent honor toward his mother at the wedding at Cana (Jn 2:1–11).

Attitudes toward children by parents. Genesis portrays Abraham loving his son Isaac greatly, perhaps more than he loved his own life. However, such fatherly affection does not cause him to waver before the request of God: “Take your son, your only son, Isaac, whom you love ... sacrifice him there as a burnt offering” (Gen 22:1–3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The love that Jacob has for his son Joseph comes at the expense of his other sons, for Jacob loves Joseph more than the others, resulting in enmity among the brothers (Gen 37:3–4).

King David's love for his son Absalom is maintained despite Absalom's rebellion and attempt to wrest the kingdom from David. When Absalom is finally killed, David weeps and bemoans the fact that he himself had not died in his son's place (2 Sam 18:33).

Even though Jesus seems to be separating himself from his earthly parents, intent on beginning his ministry, he still demonstrates a filial responsibility and obedience toward his mother when she requests a miracle of him at Cana (Jn 2:1–8).

See also Authority, Divine and Angelic; Child, Children; CIVIL Disobedience; Father, Fatherhood; King, Kingship; Leadership; Mother, Motherhood; Priest; Prophet.

AVENGER

The word avenger evokes the notion of revenge or of setting matters right. It appears in the Bible in both a legal or civil sense as a code that governs human behavior, and in a theological sense as a picture of God's judgment and salvation. To a guilty person being pursued, the avenger is a figure of terror; to the person who has been wronged, the avenger is a figure of justice and therefore consolation—a silencer of the human protest against unpunished wrong. In both cases there is something awe-inspiring and fearful about the avenger.

On a human and civil plane the institution of the avenger existed within an ancient or primitive society that had not yet evolved our system of courtroom trial. In such a milieu exacting justice was a family duty, with the primary responsibility resting on the male who was next of kin to the aggrieved party. The avenger was the designated and impartial agent of justice—the one who exacted satisfaction for a wrong by punishing the wrongdoer in kind (hence the “eye for an eye” law that reverberates throughout the Mosaic code). Of course the possibility always existed that an avenger might exceed a just retribution, as in the sinister figure of Lamech, who boasted to his wives that he had exacted vengeance sevenfold (Gen 4:23–24).

The concept of the avenger finds its most concrete expression with respect to blood revenge. This reflects an ancient Near Eastern practice by which the avenger of blood avenged the death of a blood relative. Limits were placed on this practice in Israel: murderers were executed, but persons guilty of unintentional manslaughter could seek refuge at the altar (Ex 21:13) or in certain designated cities (Num 35:11–28; Deut 4:41–43; Josh 20:1–9), where they were exempt from blood vengeance.

There may be a reference to the desert code of vengeance in Psalm 23:5, with its picture of a table prepared in the presence of enemies. According to this code, which is intertwined with the desert law of hospitality, someone fleeing from avengers was exempt from vengeance for a span of two days and the intervening night (“so long as the food is in this bowels”) if he or she could touch the ropes of a tent or throw himself within the entrance. When the period of immunity ended the guilty person had to go forth and face the bloody assize.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] various leaders fill the role of avenger in a range of situations. Samson avenged the burning of his wife and her father (Judg 15:6–7) and the loss of his eyesight at the hands of the Philistines (Judg 16:28). Saul spoke of avenging himself on his enemies (1 Sam 14:24; 18:25). Joab was judged blameworthy by David for having avenged the death of his brother during a time of truce (1 Kings 2:5). Elsewhere the nation of Israel assumed the role of avenger, as in their defeat of the Midianites (Num 31:2) and of those who plotted their murder during the time of Esther (Esther 8:13).

In the Bible the avenger (gō'el haddām) is actually a “redeemer” or “restorer” of the blood (= life) that was taken. The killing of a relative was understood by the remaining family members as stealing blood that belonged to the entire clan and therefore must be returned. This concept is associated with the Passover celebration in which the destroyer exacts the blood (lives) of the Egyptians, who had subjected the lives (blood) of the Lord’s people to bondage. Here the avenger is satisfied only after he sees the lamb’s blood on the doorposts.

The image of the avenger finds its fullest expression with respect to God, since it is to God that vengeance ('ekdikēsis) ultimately belongs (Rom 12:19; Heb 10:30). The earliest appearance of the image of the avenger occurs in Genesis 3, where the flaming swords of God's cherubim protect God's holy garden from intrusion by fallen mortals.

God acts as avenger in a range of situations. Sometimes he acts as avenger on behalf of individuals against their enemies (Judg 11:36; 1 Sam 24:12; 25:39; 2 Sam 4:8; 16:8). He protects the nation of Israel against its enemies (Joel 3:21; Nahum 1:2; Is 1:24; Jer 46:10). But God also acts as avenger against Israel: he promises to avenge the blood of his servants and prophets against those who slay or oppress them (Deut 32:43; 2 Kings 9:7; Ps 9:10), and he avenges himself against his people when they break his covenant (Lev 26:25; Ps 99:8). Also important is the motif of God's "day of vengeance" (Is 34:8; 61:2; 63:4).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] too God functions as avenger (ekdikos) in all matters among his people (1 Thess 4:6). Jesus asked rhetorically, "And shall not God avenge his own elect, which cry day and night unto him?" (Luke 18:7 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Christ is portrayed as avenger in the ultimate sense. As the slain Lamb he avenges his own blood (Rev 5:6—9) as he wages holy warfare on his enemies (Rev 19:11—15). During this time of unrestrained violence (Rev 19:15), the uniquely qualified avenger completely vanquishes himself of his archenemy Satan and his followers (Rev 20:10—14; see also the parable of the landowner, Mt 21:33—45).

With God's role as avenger so prominent in the Bible, it is not surprising that a subordinate motif is the prayers that his persecuted followers pray to him as avenger. We find such prayers in the individual and corporate lament psalms (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 7:6; 79:10; 94:1—2). In the apocalyptic vision of the martyrs under the altar, the martyrs cry out, "O Sovereign Lord, holy and true, how long before thou wilt judge and avenge our blood on those who dwell upon the earth?" (Rev 6:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). These passages form the biblical subtext for John Milton's moving sonnet occasioned by the massacre of the Waldensians, which begins with the line, "Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints."

See also Blood; Guilt; Murder Stories; Legal Images; Violence.

AWAKENING

The general concept of "awakening" captures the notion of either rousing oneself or being aroused in order to take action, as in the call to Deborah to "wake up" in song (Judg 5:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Such calls to action are usually accompanied by urgency and intensity, as seen in the emphatic repetition "wake up, wake up!" (Judg 5:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 52:1). It suggests an arousal from the passivity and vulnerability of sleep in order to seize the initiative, to take aggressive action (Judg 16:14, 20). Although the Scriptures frequently employ the motif in its usual sense of awaking from physical sleep (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 41:4; Acts 16:27), this meaning is enriched in a number of significant ways.

Among its most fascinating usages are instances where the biblical poet issues urgent appeals to God to "wake up," to respond to pleas for justice (Ps 7:6), vindication (Ps 35:23), triumph (Ps 44:23), salvation (Ps 80:2) and deliverance (Is 51:9). Jesus' awakening from his peaceful slumber in the stern of the boat by his fearful disciples is an enactment of this biblical motif of "divine sleep" (Mk 4:38—40). The language of the petitioner is such that his prayer forms an expression of acute anguish and impatience over God's apparent unresponsiveness to great need, as in the case of oppression (Ps 7:6) or defeat (Ps 44:23). It is the psalmist's prayer that the silence of God be broken by swift intervention. But God's silence must never be mistaken for sleep (121:3—4)! God is ever to be contrasted with “sleeping Baal” and lifeless idols (1 Kings 18:27; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hab 2:19). God's swift judgment is likened to a person who “wakes from the stupor of wine” (Ps 78:65; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Joel 1:5). In a most vivid way it captures the idea of a sudden and dramatic turn of events.

In the human arena moral slumber is likened to wickedness and debauchery (1 Thess 5:6—7). Believers are exhorted to wake up from this sleep and remain alert, given the lateness of the eschatological hour (Rom 13:11—14; 1 Thess 4:6) and the approaching dawn of deliverance (Ps 57:8), the early rays of which are already beginning to appear. God's people are to “come to their senses” (1 Cor 15:34) or “wake to righteousness” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Such a spirit of wakefulness is extolled as a virtue (Prov 20:13) in part because it signifies an attentive ear to God's word (Is 50:4)—an indispensable element of spiritual wakefulness. Failure to wake up leads to discipline for believers (Rev 3:2) or (in the case of unbelievers) judgment (1 Thess 5:4ff) and shame (Rev 16:15).

“Wakefulness” is used in the Scriptures in a number of other ways: (1) to depict bodily (Jn 11:11; Dan 12:2) and spiritual (Eph 5:14) resurrection in contrast to the sleep of physical and spiritual death; (2) to signify a troubled spirit (Ps 102:7); or (3) to serve as evidence of trust in the Lord's protection (Ps 3:5). Finally, the Scriptures use awakening in poetic ways, as when the wind is exhorted to blow (Song 4:15) or a musical instrument to “awake the dawn” (Ps 108:2), when a sword strikes (Zech 13:1—7), or when latent passions are ignited (Song 2:7).

Ultimately the believer can rejoice in the truth that “he died for us so that, whether we are awake or asleep, we may live together with him” (1 Thess 5:10).

See also Sleep.

B

BAAL.

See Gods, Goddesses.

BABEL, TOWER OF

The image of the Tower of Babel has a hold on the Western imagination that is out of proportion to its actual importance in the Bible. The story is told in just nine short verses (Gen 11:1—9) and is not mentioned again. Yet it is one of the most evocative images in the entire Bible—a spectacle of creaturely aspiration toward deity that finds its counterpart in the mythological story of the Titans who tried to supplant Zeus and were punished by being hurled into Tartarus.

Artists have imagined the tower as a physical and architectural phenomenon reaching massively into the sky. More recent biblical commentary entertains the possibility that the tower was a ziggurat—an astronomical observatory for use in divination and occult mastery of the universe. The meaning of the image remains the same in either case. Although in the popular mind Babel denotes confusion and discord, the image encompasses much more than this.

In the biblical text the Tower of Babel begins as a venture in human autonomy: “Come, let us build ourselves a city; ... let us make a name for ourselves” (Gen 11:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As we overhear the excited talk, we catch the hints of the timeless human urge for fame and permanent achievement, as well as for independence and self-sufficiency. The tower is thus an image of human aspiration and pride, accompanied by a spirit of boasting in human achievement. Lurking in the background is the classical notion of hubris-overweening human pride that leads people to think themselves godlike, as hinted by the desire of the builders to include within their city “a tower with its top in the heavens” (Gen 11:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Since heaven is the abode of God, we can interpret the venture as an attempt to storm God’s dwelling place. We should note also that in the ancient Near East temples to the gods were built on high places, with the human city surrounding the dwelling place of a deity.

The fact that the builders conceive of their enterprise as a city awakens a whole further set of associations. The city is par excellence an image of human community—an image of the universal human dream of unity with other people (in the story the people speak “to one another,” Gen 11:2), combined with a desire for sedentary permanence (“lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth,” Gen 11:4). We should note that this collective pride is mingled with fear, so that the city becomes a quest for safety as well as achievement. The dream of unity is enhanced by Babel’s being a unilingual city: “Now the whole earth had one language and few words” (Gen 11:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Babel, of course, is also a symbol of human inventiveness and ingenuity—a triumph of both reason (as the people calculate their needs and consider the means of meeting those needs) and imagination (as the people create a brand new vision of how things might be). It is a place of language and communication: “they said to one another” (Gen 11:3).

The city, moreover, is a picture of human ability to control and master the world. The Genesis narrative hints at this by emphasizing the specific building materials: “ ‘Come, let us make bricks, and burn them thoroughly.’ And they had brick for stone, and bitumen for mortar” (Gen 11:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This is a picture of technology (note that the people make bricks instead of mining stone), of material power, of monumental architectural ability, of culture and civilization, of forethought and planning. Fire is a universal symbol of civilization, art and craft; while bricks are the symbol of permanence and stability. But bitumen or asphalt is hardly an adequate mortar, so already we sense a flaw in the blueprint.

A Babylonian ziggurat, or step temple, perhaps like the tower of Babel.

Babel symbolizes the dream of human civilization. It is an attempt to meet human means by the peaceful means of invention, language, utopian planning, social cooperation, creativity, culture and technology. Yet God declares the dream a nightmare in a story that to this day represents a primal act of divine judgment.

Halfway through the story the focus shifts from the human perspective to God’s perspective: “And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower, which the sons of men had built” (Gen 11:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). We can see in this reaching down a counterpoint to the human aspiration upward, with an implicit irony in the fact that whereas the human builders envisioned their architectural feat as a skyscraper, from a more transcendent viewpoint it is so small that God must come down to catch a glimpse of the tower. The story is thus “a remarkable satire on man’s doing” (von Rad). God disapproves of the dream of limitless human achievement: “Behold, they are one people, and they have all one language; and this is only the beginning of what they will do; and nothing that they propose to do will now be impossible for them” (Gen 10:6). God therefore thwarts the attempt at unity by diversifying human language, with the result that “the Lord scattered them abroad over the face of all the earth” (Gen 10:9).

Behind this statement by God we can infer retrospectively that the dream pursued with so much zeal and with such apparently innocent motives was really a picture of idolatry—an attempt to make people and civilization the basis of security and the object of ultimate allegiance. The Tower of Babel as envisioned was implicitly a substitute deity, and it carries the same divine scorn that idolatry carries everywhere in the Bible. In God’s view, division of the human race is preferable to collective apostasy, and the experiment in human initiative apart from God ends in judgment. What began as a stunning example of unity (one language) ends in dispersal, a motif inverted on Pentecost (Acts 2) when a multiplicity of spoken languages in the city of Jerusalem produces the new unity of the Christian community.

What a wealth of human meanings converge in the single image of Babel! It is an ambivalent image, evoking powerful feelings of a wide range. On one side we can see the human longings for community, achievement, civilization, culture, technology, safety, security, permanence and fame. But countering these aspirations we sense the moral judgment against idolatry, pride, self-reliance, the urge of material power and the human illusion of infinite achievement. It is a picture of misguided human aspirations ending in confusion—in literary terms an episode of epic proportions that follows the downward arc of tragedy. Acting as a single entity the human race reached for everything and ended only with division. The concluding picture of a half-built tower and city is a monument to human aspiration gone awry and to divine judgment against human illusions of infinity. The very etymology of the word Babel suggests the two aspects of the story: the Akkadian word Bab-ili means ‘gate of God,’ while the Hebrew balal means ‘to stir up, to confound.’

See also Babylon; Bricks; City; High, Height, High Place; Idolatry; Judgment; Pride.

Bibliography. G. von Rad, Genesis: A Commentary (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1972) 148–152; L. R. Kass, “What’s Wrong with Babel?” The American Scholar 58 (1989–90) 41–60.

BABY

“It’s a boy!” “It’s a girl!” This is (almost) always good news in the Bible, especially when the baby fulfills a divine promise. Babies in the Bible are an image of (a) the mystery of life created (in some sense a miracle from God), (b) God’s provision for parents (especially mothers), (c) the removal of the stigma of barrenness, (d) the potential for either good or evil, and (e) inconsolable grief when an infant dies or is executed.

Isaac (Gen 21:1–7), Jacob (Gen 25:21–26), Joseph (Gen 29:22–24), Samson (Judg 13) and Samuel (1 Sam 1) are all special babies because their births confirm the promise of salvation. Their births also come as something of a surprise, since they were delivered by women stigmatized by barren wombs. The element of surprise highlights the divine origin of life and heightens the joy of birth. Sarah laughed to see her baby boy (Gen 21:6); Hannah sang for joy (1 Sam 2:1–10). Naomi was barren too, but the grandson she cradled in her lap was her kinsman-redeemer: Obed, grandfather of King David (Ruth 4:13–17). Although not in the patriarchal line, the story surrounding the birth of a promised son as a reward for godliness to the barren Shunammite woman also fits the biblical archetype (2 Kings 4:11–17).

The context within which we can understand the value and joy that OT [OT OT. Old Testament] people placed on babies is the stigma that attached to women who bore no children. The barren wife is an object of pity, an archetype of the outcast in Hebrew society (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Sarah [Gen 16:1–6], Rachel [Gen 29:31–30:24] and Hannah [1 Sam 1:1–11]). In such a cultural milieu “the fruit of the womb” is regarded as a “heritage” and “reward”* from God (Ps 127:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The general biblical pattern is thus that babies are very nearly the highest earthly joy that a person can expect to experience. The stories of Cain (Gen 4:1), Ishmael (16:1–6) and Esau (25:24–5) are the exceptions that prove the rule: babies are bad news when they grow up to be enemies of the people of God.

The best-known birth stories in the Bible focus on miracle babies. Isaac and Samson at once come to mind, both of them offspring whose birth was announced to a barren wife. Moses was another miracle baby, not because his mother was barren but because his life was forfeit to the Egyptians (Ex 2:1–10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 7:19). His mother put him in a papyrus basket (see Ark), along the banks of the Nile, where his cries evoked pity even from Pharoah’s daughter. The birth of John the Baptist followed the patriarchal pattern. Elizabeth was as old as Sarah and as barren as Rachel (Lk 1:5–25), but she gave birth to a baby boy. When her baby leaped in her womb, he proved that a fetus is a person (Lk 1:41; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 1:5, Ps 51:5).

The nativity of Jesus is the climax of the Bible’s attention to babies. The infant Jesus shared a common humanity with the other babies of promise, but the difference made all the difference in the world. The reason for Mary's inability to bear a son—virginity—proved that her baby was God as well as human (Mt 1:18–25). Mary gave birth to a baby for every human to celebrate: the Savior of the world, Jesus Christ.

Having a baby brings joy to a house, but infant mortality brings inconsolable grief. Pharaoh killed all the Hebrew baby boys (Ex 1:15–22), and David grieved over the mortal illness of Bathsheba's son (2 Sam 12:15–25). When Solomon judged between two women who were fighting over the life and death of a child, the mere prospect of having her son divided led the real mother to prefer giving the baby to the rival claimant (1 Kings 3:16–28). The Shunammite woman is “in bitter distress” when her son dies after heatstroke in the harvest field (2 Kings 4:27). Jeremiah's sad prophecy captures a mother's grief: “A voice is heard in Ramah, weeping and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children and refusing to be comforted because they are no more” (Jer 31:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 6:26). Rachel's sorrow without succor found its fulfillment when Herod slaughtered the baby boys of Judea (Mt 2:16–18).

Rachel and her sisters will not grieve in the eternal kingdom of God. According to Isaiah, “never again will there be in [that kingdom] an infant who lives but a few days” (Is 65:20). Nor will parents worry about the safety of their precious babies, for “the infant will play near the hole of the cobra, and the young child will put his hand in the viper's nest” (Is 11:8–9). Jesus says, “The kingdom of God belongs to such as these” (Lk 18:16).

Biblical writers are often keen observers of the intimate relationship between a baby and her mother. God can no more forget to care for his people than a mother can “forget the baby at her breast” (Is 49:15). The psalmist compares his rest in God to a weaned child with his mother (131:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 1:22–24, Is 28:9), no longer squirming in agitation for his mother's milk. The theme of the maturing infant is echoed in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , where believers are taught to be like hungry newborns who “crave pure spiritual milk” (1 Pet 2:2). But like all babies, they are also supposed to grow up. “Anyone who lives on milk, being still an infant, is not acquainted with the teaching about righteousness” (Heb 5:13).

See also Barrenness; Birth; Birth Story; Daughter; Father, Fatherhood; Favored Child, Slighted Child; Milk; Mother, Motherhood; Son; Womb.

BABYLON

Babylon is one of the dread images of the Bible, stretching from OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history to the apocalyptic vision of Revelation. Like its equally famous counterpart Nineveh, the origins of Babylon (=Babel) lie with Nimrod, “the first on earth to be a mighty man” (Gen 10:8–10). Certainly Babylon herself is portrayed throughout the Bible as the mightiest of cities, often used by God to bring crushing judgment on other nations (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 21:2–10; 25:8–11). She is his tenant farmer, driving the nations as oxen under her yoke (Is 47:6; Jer 27:1–12; 28:1–17); his war club, used in their destruction (Jer. 51:20–23); a golden cup of wrath in his hand, making all the earth drunk and mad (Jer 51:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 25:15–38); a zoo keeper, keeping custody of dangerous Judean lions (Ezek 19:9); Judah, the prostitute's spurned lover, taking his terrible retribution (Ezek 23:11–35); a fire set under the cooking pot of Jerusalem, “cooking” her inhabitants in siege and simultaneously burning off the pot's impurities (Ezek 24:1–14); Israel's captor, tormentor, devastator and the location of her exile (Ps 137:1, 8).

Used by God in his providence, Babylon herself is not immune from judgment at his hands for her impiety, idolatry and pride—things for which the inhabitants of the region early gained a reputation (Gen 11:1–9). Her king is pictured as the god of a non-Israelite myth who aspired to ascend the mountain of the gods and make himself equal to God (Is 14:12–14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 51:53 and especially Dan 3–5 for a narrative exploration of the theme); as a gentle and refined virgin, unravished and unconquered by any nation (Is 47:1); as mistress of all the kingdoms (Is 47:5), proud and secure as she sits enthroned like a goddess (Is 47:7–11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 45:5, 18, 21 for her language as the language of God). Yet the king who sought to ascend to heaven is brought down to the pit (Is 14:13–15); an axman relieved of his duties (Is 14:4–6); a corpse slain in battle, yet shamefully unburied (Is 14:18–20).

Queen Babylon, the glory of the Chaldeans, becomes Sodom and Gomorrah (13:19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 51:39–40). She exchanges her throne for the dust, her pampered existence for the drudgery of grinding grain; she is deprived of veil and garments that guard her noble dignity (Is 47:1–3). She knows the pain of a woman in travail, the insecurity of the hunted gazelle or the defenseless flock from which lambs can easily be taken (Is 13:8, 14; Jer 50:44–45). She is both widow and bereaved mother (Is 47:8–9), disgraced by the behavior of her children and rendered infertile (Jer 50:11–13); a wasted ruin inhabited by wild beasts and flooded with water (Is 13:20–22; 14:23; Jer 51:37). She is the proud opponent of God now hunted down by his archers (Jer 50:13–14, 29–30); a field about to be harvested in judgment, a threshing floor awaiting the winnowers to separate the wheat from the chaff (Jer 51:1–5, 33); lions made drunk with wine and slaughtered while asleep, as if they were sheep and goats (51:38–40). God's war club now lies broken and shattered (Jer 50:23); the destroying mountain is now destroyed by God (Jer 51:25–26); the monster who has swallowed up God's people is now forced to regurgitate them (Jer 51:34, 44).

Already in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 13:1—22, esp. [esp. esp.. especially] the ultimacy of the language in Is 13:9—13; 14:3—23) and certainly in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Pet 5:13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1:1; 2:11), Babylon stands not for a specific power but more generally for world power in opposition to God—the empire where God's people live in exile. This is particularly clear in Revelation, which draws heavily on OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery in portraying the end times. Here stands Babylon the great, the mother of prostitutes. She is the harlot, drunk on the blood of the martyrs, making others drunk with the wine of fornication (Rev 17:1—6), forced by God to drink a double draught of judgment in her own cup (18:3—6). She is the arrogant and secure queen of the whole earth, now smitten suddenly and decisively with pestilence, mourning and famine (17:15—18, 18:7—8); desolate, naked and destroyed (17:16); deprived of all her previous luxuries (18:11—19). She is the ruin inhabited by demons and birds (18:2). The force of the imagery is the more strongly felt in Revelation because of the deliberate contrast drawn toward the end of the book between Babylon and the new Jerusalem, which is presented as the Bride of Christ (19:6—9; 21:1—27).

See also Babel, Tower of; City; Exile; Ezekiel; Isaiah; Jeremiah; Pride; Revelation.

BACK SIDE

The “back side” is a spatial or positioning image of being behind or in back of a person. It ranges from an evocative image of divine glory to an equally evocative image of rejection.

The image of God's "back side" ('āôr) is employed in the passage in which Moses, on Mount Sinai, requests to see God's glory (Ex 33:18—34:8). But God tells the lawgiver that no one can see his face (or "front") and live (Ex 33:20). Moses is nevertheless permitted to see God's back side (Ex 33:23), at which time the Lord declares that he is "full of grace and truth" (Ex 34:6). God's "back side" is here a veiling image, distancing the full glory of God from human view, but paradoxically revealing a very full sense of God's glory even as it is partly concealed.

The prologue to John's Gospel (Jn 1:1—18) alludes to this OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image of glory. According to the last verse, "No one has ever seen God; the only Son, who was in the bosom of the Father, he has made him known" (Jn 1:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The fourth evangelist contrasts Moses, through whom the law was given, with Jesus, through whom came grace and truth (Jn 1:17). Whereas Moses could not see God's face (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , look fully upon his grace), the incarnation permits humankind to view God's grace (Jn 1:14), as revealed by the one who had existed from eternity in a face-to-face relationship with God (Jn 1:18, and 1:1: "and the Word was with [lit. facing] God").

An understanding of the biblical imagery of being "cast behind" depends on our awareness that the face is the source of personal contact with another. Hence to face someone implies attention or awareness and often connotes a loving gaze or empowerment. To be cast "behind" ('ahar), therefore, is to be removed from someone's sight or presence. Sometimes in the Bible this is a negative image of rejection of a person or of God. Thus Ahijah pronounces God's judgment against Jeroboam because he had cast God behind his back (1 Kings 14:9). Elsewhere, Israel faces judgment because the nation has forgotten God and has cast him behind its back (Ezek 23:35). Equally ignominious is the way the Israelites “cast thy law behind their back and slew thy prophets” (Neh 9:26 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

The most famous instance of such rejection occurs in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Following Jesus’ first passion prediction, Peter rebukes Jesus (Mk 8:32). Jesus rebukes Peter in turn: “Get behind [opisō] me, Satan! For you are not on the side of God, but of men” (Mk 8:33 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Getting “behind” Jesus conjures up this image of rejection. Peter’s opposition to Jesus’ passion is to be banished from the thinking of the disciples.

As an image of removal, being cast behind can also have a positive connotation when it signifies God’s forgiveness of sin. The repentant Hezekiah prays, “You have cast all my sins behind Your back” (Is 38:17 NKJV). The image here is not just of something placed behind someone where it could be seen by turning around but instead placed where it can never be seen. The same image appears in Paul’s statement, “forgetting what lies behind and straining forward to what lies ahead, I press on toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus” (Phil 3:13–14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Behind; Face, Facial Expressions; Glory.

Bibliography. E. Dinkler, “Peter’s Confession and the ‘Satan’ Saying: The Problem of Jesus’ Messiahship,” in The Future of Our Religious Past, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] , J. M. Robinson (London: SCM Press; New York: Harper & Row, 1971) 169–202; A. T. Hanson, “John 1:14–18 and Exodus 34, ” in The New Testament Interpretation of Scripture (London: SPCK, 1980) 97–109.

BAKING

Baking is one of the commonplace household routines in the Bible that keeps us rooted in the everyday world. It assumes symbolic meanings when it is part of hospitality and worship practices, and it also becomes a full-fledged metaphor.

Good baking is an indispensable element of biblical hospitality. “Quick!” said Abraham to Sarah, “get three seahs of fine flour and knead it and bake some bread” (Gen 18:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The provision of baked goods is a sign of welcome to the servants of the Lord. Abigail brought two hundred loaves of bread to David (1 Sam 25:18). Both Elijah and Elisha were fed by women, whether they had few resources or many with which to bake (1 Kings 17:13–14; 2 Kings 4:8). Through their willingness to serve others by the work of their hands, these women demonstrated that common household tasks are not merely secular but sacred. The Lord himself provides the ingredients for such service, for the widow of Zarephath found that “the jar of flour was not used up and the jug of oil did not run dry” until the Lord sent rain again (1 Kings 17:16). By contrast, one of the curses for disobeying the covenant is the withholding of the supplies needed to make bread, so that “ten women will be able to bake your bread in one oven” (Lev 26:26).

If baking is an image of ideal hospitality to others, it can also be perverted to a selfish use. Two biblical deceptions are made all the more reprehensible by their use of baking. Jacob used baked bread and lentil stew to entice his brother Esau to despise his birthright (Gen 25:34). Tamar baked bread to cheer an ailing brother, but Amnon violated her charity and raped her (2 Sam 13:1–22).

The details of baking take on religious significance in the context of worship. In their haste to leave Egypt, “the people took their dough before the yeast was added” (Ex 12:34). In remembrance of this act, the Israelites were instructed to make bread for the Passover meal without yeast (Ex 12:8; see Leaven). Similarly, the instructions for making offerings to the Lord in the temple often describe cakes and breads made without yeast (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lev 2:4: “If you bring a grain offering baked in an oven, it is to consist of fine flour: cakes made without yeast and mixed with oil”). Here the prohibition against yeast hints at the freedom from the taint of sin that God demands of his people.

Yet the offering for the Feast of Weeks was to include two loaves baked with yeast “as a wave offering of firstfruits to the Lord,” (Lev 23:17). The fullness of the yeast breads perhaps symbolized the fullness of the harvest. Indeed, the baking of bread used for temple worship was considered so important that a particular Levite “was entrusted with the responsibility for baking the offering bread” (1 Chron 9:31).

While the NT [NT NT. New Testament] has less to say about baking, it has nearly as much to say about yeast. Jesus occasionally puts yeast in a positive light, teaching that “the kingdom of heaven is like yeast that a woman mixed into a large amount of flour until it worked all through the dough” (Mt 13:33). This parable turns on the gradual, abundant expansion of yeast-filled dough; in the same way, the kingdom of God grows slowly and surely.

On other occasions the connotation of yeast is entirely negative: “Be on your guard against the yeast of the Pharisees and Sadducees” (Mt 16:5–12). The property of yeast in view here is its ability to work its way throughout the dough. Unsound teaching is like yeast in its ability to infect the community of faith. There is at least an echo here of the demand for holiness that the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] injunctions against yeast were intended to convey. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Paul calls us to “keep the Festival, not with the old yeast, the yeast of malice and wickedness, but with bread without yeast, the bread of sincerity and truth” (1 Cor 5:8).

See also Bread; Food; Grain; Hospitality; Leaven, Leavening.

BALDNESS

“In all Israel there was not a man so highly praised for his handsome appearance as Absalom” (2 Sam 14:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The next verse shows that one of the chief reasons he was so admired was his luxuriant head of hair. Similarly, white hair is a significant characteristic shared by the Ancient of Days (Dan 7:9) and the risen Christ (Rev 1:14).

By contrast, the absence of hair was a cause for shame. For the prophet Elisha to be jeered at and described as “you baldhead” (2 Kings 2:23) was obviously an insult, though whether his baldness was due to natural hair loss or a shaved tonsure is not clear. Apart from this the Bible views the shaving of the head as a mark of mourning (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 16:6) and as evidence of God’s judgment, both on his own people (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 3:17, 24; 7:20; 22:12; Ezek 7:18; Amos 8:10; Mic 1:16) and on their enemies (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 15:2; Jer 47:5; 48:37; Ezek 27:31; 29:18). The reference in Micah evokes the image of the vulture, whose pale, down-covered head contrasts with the well-feathered heads of other birds.

To shave the head as a sign of mourning is forbidden for priests on the grounds that it would compromise their holy calling and “profane the name of their God” (Lev 21:5; Ezek 44:20). The same reason lies behind the prohibition in Deuteronomy 14:1 against any of God’s holy people shaving the front of their heads “for the dead.”

Letting the hair grow was one of the conditions attached to the vow made by a Nazirite (Num 6:5). Such hair was seen as dedicated to the Lord (Num 6:9) and was to be shaved off when the period of the vow came to an end (Num 6:18) or if accidentally defiled (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , if someone suddenly died in the Nazirite's presence). The phenomenal strength of Samson, the most famous Nazirite in the Bible, is linked with the length of his hair (Judg 16:17–22). The apostle Paul and his companions are recorded as having shaved their heads for ritual purposes (Acts 18:18; 21:24).

See also Hair.

BANISHMENT.

See Exile.

BANNER

Banners are identifying flags or streamers attached to the end of a standard. Throughout history they have served three main purposes: to identify a group, to claim possession of a space or territory and to lend festivity to a celebration. Banners are rallying points, physically and/or emotionally.

The Bible contains fewer than a dozen direct references to banners, and the context is almost entirely military. More often than not the banner of victory is ascribed to God. The earliest example is Exodus 17:15, where Moses celebrates the victory of the Amalekites by building an altar, calling the name of it “the Lord is my banner” and saying, “a hand upon the banner of the Lord” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the Psalms too it is God who sets up a banner for his people (Ps 60:4), who for their part ascribe their triumph to God by setting up banners “in the name of our God” (Ps 20:5). Jeremiah's prediction of Babylon's destruction is prefaced by the statement, “Declare among the nations and proclaim, set up a banner and proclaim, conceal it not” (Jer 50:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), along the lines of a warrior boldly planting a banner as a sign of taking possession.

The remaining instances of the word banner are in the Song of Songs. In the Shulamite woman's picture of Solomon's taking her into the court harem, the climactic note of triumph is that "he brought me to the banqueting house, and his banner over me was love" (Song 2:4). Here the banner is an image of both festivity or celebration and claiming possession. In a courtly and military world, one of the supreme images of exhilaration is the sight of an army advancing with its banners unfurled. This supplies the emotional context for the lover's declaration that his beloved's beauty is as "terrible as an army with banners" (Song 6:4, 10).

BANQUET

Banquets are special meals celebrating important events. Unlike Jewish cultic feasts, they are not official worship events, but neither should banquets held among God's people be regarded as "secular" events, since such banquets can mark God's intervention and display his abundant provision.

Banquets are never mere mealtimes or only celebrations of the occasion that give rise to the banquet. They are loaded with messages about who is up and who is down in status; who is in and who is out of the social or political circle. Invitations signify being "in." Proximity to the host and the amount and quality of the food and drink offered indicate status (Gen 43:31–34; Lk 14:7–12; Jn 2:10). Refusal to attend a banquet is a powerful negative social message defying the authority and honor of the host (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Esther 1:12, 16–20; Mt 22:1–14).

Occasional Banquets. Many biblical banquets are held in royal courts. They display royal honor and power (Esther 1:3–12; 5:4–6, 8, 12, 14, 6:14; 7:8; Dan 5:1, 10; and the coronation banquets of David, 1 Chron 12:38–40, and Solomon, 1 Kings 1:39–41). Banquets are venues for political and social discourse and dealing. An invitation to attend is a distinct honor implying power, trust and insider status. Military or political treaties and victories are also celebrated with banquets (Gen 26:30; 31:54). When the victor is a king, the banquet is also “royal” (2 Sam 3:20).

Communities hold banquets to celebrate and give thanks for God’s provision (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , sheep shearing, 1 Sam 25:11; 2 Sam 13:23–27; harvest, Judg 9:27). Other banquets mark long-awaited events like the completion of Solomon’s temple (2 Chron 7:8) or unexpected blessings (1 Kings 3:15; Lk 15).

Rites of passage–birthdays and weanings, weddings and funerals–are also celebrated with banquets, though all the birthday banquets recorded in the Bible are royal ones (Pharaoh, Gen 40:20; Herod, Mk 6:21). Abraham “made a great feast” on the occasion of Isaac’s weaning (Gen 21:8). Several wedding banquets are recorded (Gen 29:22; Judg 14:10, 17; Jn 2:8–9). There is inferential evidence of rites of mourning including banquets held in honor of the deceased and for the comfort of the family (2 Sam 3:35; 2 Sam 12:16–17; Jer 16:5–9; Ezek 24:16–17, 22–3; Hos 9:4).

Finally, hospitality sometimes takes the form of a banquet. Guests may be entertained and welcomed with lavish banquets.

Banquet imagery draws from the varieties of literal banquets; the significance of the allusion varies according to the sort of banquet the writer has in mind. Matthew combines different types when he records Jesus’ parable of a king who holds a wedding banquet for his son (Mt 22:2–9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 25:10). Often a literal banquet bears figurative significance, as when the royal banquet to which the nations come bearing gifts in tribute to King David becomes messianic (1 Chron 12:38–40).

Victory Banquets. Ancient Near Eastern mythology of the gods follows a general pattern of warfare, victory, kingship, house (temple/palace) building and celebration/banqueting. The order of events follows a logical progression and is heavenly mirror of a human pattern. Celebration following victory on the battlefield is an archetypal image, and banqueting is its centerpiece. We first capture a glimpse of it in a tiny vignette following the first battle in the Bible: After Abraham's defeat of Kedorlaomer and his allies, "King Melchizedek of Salem brought out bread and wine" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and blessed Abraham and God (Gen 14:18–19). Elsewhere the psalmist alludes to a victory banquet: "You prepare a table before me in the presence of my enemies; you anoint my head with oil; my cup overflows" (Ps 23:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This banquet displays God's "goodness and mercy" (Ps 23:6). Jeremiah pictures the plight of Israel in an image of Babylon banqueting on Zion's delicacies, a devouring that will be disgorged when God defeats Babylon (Jer 51:34–44). Isaiah's picture of the eschatological banquet of God is especially memorable (Is 25:6, see below). The ultimate victory and final defeat of evil are marked with a victory-wedding banquet in John's eschatological vision (Rev 19:9, 17–18).

Messianic Banquet. Closely related to the victory banquet motif is the vision of an eschatological banquet. Isaiah 25:6 provides the benchmark image of this banquet: "On this mountain the Lord Almighty will prepare a feast of rich food for all peoples, a banquet of aged wine—the best of meats and the finest of wines" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The stories of Jesus' table fellowship with a variety of people and his reputation as "a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and sinners" (Mt 11:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) point out the extraordinary place of eating and banqueting in his ministry. Jesus is one who "welcomes sinners and eats with them" (Lk 15:1–2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and thereby enacts God's welcome to sinners to enter the kingdom of God. Dining with him, however, is no guarantee of entrance into the kingdom (Lk 13:26–27), for to some he will say "I do not know where you come from" (Lk 13:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But in the future "people will come from east and west, from north and south, and will eat in the kingdom of God" (Lk 13:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 8:11–12). At the Last Supper, Jesus alludes to the coming eschatological banquet when he says, "I will never again drink of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom" (Mt 26:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; Mk 14:25; Lk 22:18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 22:28–30).

Symposium Banquet. The motif of banqueting is particularly prominent in Luke's Gospel. Here the banquet scenes are imaged as a Greco-Roman symposium, a formal banquet followed by a drinking and engaging conversation where serious topics of mutual interest are addressed. Diners recline on couches arranged in a U-shape around a central table, and a guest's position at the table is an indication of relative honor. Luke 14:1–24 is a formal banquet scene at the home of a Pharisee, and Jesus tells several parables about banqueting, including one about seeking honor at a dinner (Lk 14:7–11). Jesus sows the seed of transformation within these dinners. Rather than displays of relative honor and exclusiveness, the dining of the kingdom is to be open and inclusive (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 7:36—50).

Wedding Banquets. Figurative uses of the wedding banquet occur in the Gospels (Lk 12:36; Mt 22:4; 25:10; and see Song 2:4) and the Apocalypse (Rev 19:9). These banquets have the flavor of a wedding's hopeful, joyful celebration of love and harmonious relationship. In answer to the question of why the Pharisees' and John the Baptist's disciples fast and Jesus' disciples do not, Jesus responds, "How can the guests of the bridegroom mourn while he is with them? The time will come when the bridegroom will be taken from them; then they will fast" (Mt 9:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In other words, now is a time for celebration, for banqueting and not fasting.

Bad Banquets. Banquets sometimes become signs of decadence and defeat, markers of judgment for idolatry and injustice, and foretastes of final judgment, doom and woe. Those who answer to the seductive call of the "foolish woman" will be "her guests ... in the depths of Sheol" (Prov 9:13—18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A proverb well sums up wisdom in dining: "Better is a dinner of vegetables where love is than a fatted ox and hatred with it" (Prov 15:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Job's sons and daughters engage in ceaseless rounds of banqueting, and Job the righteous father offers burnt offerings on their behalf, lest during their festivities his children "have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts" (Job 1:4—5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The churlish Nabal, oblivious to the judgment about to come upon him, holds a feast in his house, "like the feast of a king," and his "heart was merry within him, for he was very drunk" (1 Sam 25:36 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Isaiah captures the apostasy of Israel as a people who "rise early in the morning in pursuit of strong drink, ... whose feasts consist of lyre and harp, tambourine and flute and wine, but who do not regard the deeds of the Lord” (Is 5:11–12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 51:39; Amos 6:4–6). Finally, in Revelation 19:17–18 the judgment of God is gruesomely depicted as a “great supper of God” in which carrion birds are invited to feast on the flesh of the kings of the earth and their armies.

But on the whole, banquets in the Bible imply and display blessing, prosperity, abundance, wealth, victory and joy. As signs of God’s faithfulness and human righteousness, as markers of God-anointed and ordained power, they become a foretaste of heavenly blessing and honor.

See also Feast, Feasting; Guest; Hospitality; Meal; Supper.

Bibliography. S. S. Bartchy, “Table Fellowship,” DJG [DJG DJG. Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels] 796–800.

BAPTISM

Because water rituals were more common in antiquity than they are today, ancient people would have understood the symbolism of baptism more readily than most modern readers do. The Egyptians, Mesopotamians, Hittites and Hebrews used water in purification rituals (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lev 13:8–9). In NT [NT NT. New Testament] times, when Greek cultural influences on Christianity were more direct than ancient Near Eastern cultures, most temples had rules concerning ritual purity. Many Greek philosophers (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Stoics and Pythagoreans, but not Cynics) valued ritual purification, and some mystery cults employed ritual washings before their initiation rites.

Jewish Background. Jewish people in Jesus’ day were generally meticulous about the ritual washings commanded in the Hebrew Bible and had added other ritual washings as well. Well-to-do people in the wealthy neighborhoods of Jerusalem even had their own ritual immersion pools. The Essenes of the Qumran community (the people who wrote the Dead Sea Scrolls) were among the most meticulous; besides the initial washing required to join the sect, they were always washing themselves subsequently to insure ritual purity. Ceremonial washing became part of Jewish piety in the Hellenistic period, and in the two centuries before the time of Jesus, Jewish people were immersing themselves at appropriate times. Pharisees began to apply the priestly practice of hand washing.

Jewish people practiced one particular kind of once-for-all ritual washing, however. This was the baptism administered to Gentiles when they wished to convert to Judaism and wash away their former impurity. Baptism was so characteristic of Jewish conversion rituals, next to the more painful accompanying practice of male circumcision, that even pagan writers like Epictetus mention it. According to later Jewish regulations concerning private baptisms, the immersion must be so complete that even if a person were otherwise naked, the immersion would be invalidated if so much as the string of a bean covered the space between two teeth. But full immersion, coupled with circumcision (for males) and a sincere heart, meant conversion. Some later Jewish teachers insisted that a Gentile converted in this manner became “like a newborn child,” completely separated from his or her Gentile past.

John the Baptist. John the Baptist obviously did not have Jewish people strip naked for public baptisms in the Jordan, but he probably did insist that they bend forward and submerge completely under the water, according to standard Jewish practice. The term baptism could indicate dipping, sprinkling or immersion, but the Jewish custom was immersion. John proclaimed this as a “baptism of repentance,” a once-for-all sort of act, purifying a person from their former ways in view of the coming kingdom. Quite in contrast to the sort of once-for-all baptism of Gentiles mentioned above, however, John demanded that Jewish people also undergo this rite. He regarded Jewish people as in need of conversion to God's way as much as Gentiles (Mt 3:9; Lk 3:8).

Jordan River and Wilderness. For the Gospel writers, John's baptizing in the Jordan and his ministry in the wilderness evoke the exodus-conquest tradition of Israel's beginnings as it is seen through the subsequent Elijah tradition. John calls Israel back to the wilderness and the Jordan. Israel is being prepared for a restoration or reconstitution, their repentance being signified by a renewed encounter with the waters crossed by their ancestors. (The problem for this perspective is that Israel originally crossed on dry ground; however, note in Josh 3:15 and 4:18 that the Jordan was at flood stage at the time). But Josephus tells us that at least one other Jewish prophetic figure, Theudas, thought that the way to signify a moment of deliverance was to take his followers out to the wilderness for a reenactment of the Jordan crossing and the conquest of the land. John is much like Elijah and Elisha, who are associated with the Jordan River. Elijah parts the waters, and Elisha has the Gentile Naaman wash in the Jordan for his healing. The question put to the Baptist in John 1:24–25, "Why then do you baptize if you are not the Christ, nor Elijah, nor the Prophet?" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), implies that the religious leaders of the day took seriously the symbolism of the Jordan/wilderness, which hearkened back to Elijah and symbolized cataclysmic change.

Images Associated with Christian Baptism. An initiation event. When Jesus commanded disciples to baptize subsequent disciples, he was not just alluding to regular washings from frequent impurities. Jesus, like John, was using baptism to signify what once-for-all baptisms normally signified to his Jewish hearers: an act of conversion, a public way of breaking with one's past life and beginning a new one. Baptism was to conversion something like what the engagement ring is to many engaged couples in modern Western society: the official, public declaration of the commitment. Because this was a specific kind of conversion-not conversion to any form of Jewish faith but specifically to faith in Christ-Christians designated baptism "in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit" (Mt 28:19) or "in the name of Jesus" (Acts 2:38, referring to the baptized person's confession of faith in Christ-2:21; 22:16).

Symbolism of death, burial and resurrection. The image of being covered by water is linked almost intuitively by Christians to the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus and hence to our own experience of redemption. The baptism with which Jesus will be baptized (Mk 10:38), referring to his coming death (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 12:50), forms a link with Paul's references to being baptized into the death of Jesus (Rom 6:4; Col 2:12).

Inner transformation and empowerment. In the case of Spirit baptism the image of an act symbolizing conversion has been taken one step further as a declaration of inner transformation and empowerment by the Holy Spirit. Because baptism was such a powerful image among John's and Jesus' first followers, John the Baptist and Jesus could use this image when they recalled earlier prophets' promises of the Spirit's coming (Mk 1:8; Acts 1:5; 11:16). The prophets had already described the Spirit in terms of water in their promises concerning the last days, and Jesus takes up this image-in this case not one of immersion by stepping into water but rather of water being poured out upon people (Is 44:3; Ezek 39:29; Joel 2:28).

The Hebrew Bible, contemporary Judaism and various NT

[NT NT. New Testament] writers associate the Spirit with both spiritual purification (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jn 3:5, where the phrase may be a hendiadys meaning “water of the Spirit,” cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 7:37–39) and prophetic empowerment (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Acts 1:8; 2:4, 17–18). Different NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers thus apply the image with different emphases. Thus, for example, John the Baptist, who contrasts Spirit baptism with a fire baptism that contextually means judgment (Mt 3:10–12; Lk 3:9, 16–17), emphasizes the eschatological salvation aspect of the Spirit’s coming. John 3:5 likewise may be using Jewish proselyte baptism as a symbol for the true conversion of Spirit baptism.

Overwhelmed. Part of the image of baptism is being overwhelmed by water, the Holy Spirit or difficulties. When James and John ask to sit at Jesus’ right hand in paradise, he asks, “Can you drink the cup I drink or be baptized with the baptism I am baptized with?” (Mk 10:38). Here Jesus uses baptism as a picture of being overwhelmed with the pain and anguish of his last days (see Lk 12:50). The picture of baptism as being immersed and overwhelmed comes through clearly in 1 Peter 3. There is an easy movement between baptism that saves and the salvation of Noah and his family from/through deluge. By contrast Luke, who generally emphasizes the prophetic empowerment dimension of the Spirit (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 1:67; 2:26; Acts 2:17–18; 4:8; 10:45–46; 13:9; 19:6), focuses on that aspect of the Spirit’s work. His narratives thus present more postconversion in believers’ lives (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Acts 4:8; 8:16–17) than one might guess from most NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers’ theological statements, including his own (Acts 2:38–39).

See also Flood; Purity; Wash, Washing; Water.

Bibliography. G. R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1962); J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit: A Re-examination of the New Testament Teaching on the Gift of the Spirit in Relation to Pentecostalism Today (London: SCM Press, 1970).

BAREFOOT

In the Bible being barefoot means more than simply having no shoes on one's feet. Thus in different biblical contexts being barefoot can symbolize humility, high status or reverence for God.

Humiliation. Bare feet symbolize one's inner state, serving as an image of spiritual poverty. This association stems from the custom of humiliating and despoiling the vanquished (2 Chron 28:15). Making the prisoners go barefoot served the practical purpose of preventing escape and of providing loot for the victors. This routine practice allows the word "stripped" to imply being stripped of both clothes and shoes (Job 12:17, 19; Mic 1:8). The prophets wandered about barefooted, vividly acting out the inevitable fate of those destined for captivity (Is 20:2–4; Mic 1:8).

The self-imposed "captivity" of mourning also required the removal of shoes (Ezek 24:23). On the other hand, restoration of shoes (and clothing) clearly signified reinstatement of social standing (Ezek 16:10; 2 Chron 28:15; Lk 15:22). That David flees barefooted alludes to the temporary captivity of his kingdom at the hands of Absalom (2 Sam 15:30) as well as the haste of his departure (2 Sam 15:14). By contrast, however, being shod emphasizes preparation and readiness to perform the Lord's bidding (Is 5:27; Mk 6:9; Eph 6:15).

Status. In the context of foot washing, the baring of feet signifies the status of an honored guest. The ancient Near Eastern code of hospitality required washing the feet of one's guests (Gen 18:4; 19:2; Judg 19:21), implicitly acknowledging the elevated status of the barefoot one (1 Sam 25:41). John the Baptist extends this image further by confessing that he was unworthy even to remove Jesus' sandals (Mt 3:11). In turn, Jesus dramatically subverts this symbolism when he washes the bare feet of his disciples, using the occasion to teach that service, rather than social standing, determines greatness in the kingdom of heaven (Jn 13:1–20).

Shoes serve as a mark of civility for animals as well as humans. Jeremiah describes Israel's idolatrous ways using an image of an unshod (undomesticated) donkey out of control, likening the nation's fickle religious behavior to that of a brute in heat, driven by hormones rather than reason (Jer. 2:25).

Reverence. In two instances God explicitly requires barefootedness of his servants: Moses at the burning bush (Ex 3:5), and the confirmation of Joshua as the new Moses (Josh 5:15). In both cases the text gives as the reason, "The ground where you stand is holy." It is true that only the priests with ceremonially washed bare feet could enter God's presence (Ex 30:19). However, because the ground is cursed since the Fall (Gen 3:17), these instances may signify that this curse no longer obtains where God's glory is present. Furthermore, some ancient societies regard nakedness as the natural and acceptable condition of a pure worshipper. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] hints at such a view (Gen 2:25). In addition, shoes were almost certainly made of the skin of dead animals and difficult to cleanse of accumulated filth. The connection between nakedness and cleanliness surfaces frequently in many cultures and probably finds support in the widespread belief that the deity is best approached au naturel (1 Sam 19:24), in the condition of one's birth (Job 1:21; Eccles 5:15). There is no shame in sinless nakedness (Gen 2:25).

See also Feet; Holiness; Wash, Washing.

BARN

Barns dot the landscape of our countryside and are the focal point of most farms. Today barns come in various sizes and designs but essentially have the function of providing shelter for livestock, equipment and crops. In Scripture barns refer primarily to granaries and typically would have been lined underground pits or silos, or rooms or storage houses. Barn is an image of abundance. It suggests storage and safety for one's food. When the king of an agrarian nation prays for national prosperity, his prayer includes the image of "our barns ... filled with every kind of provision" (Ps 144:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and the wise man believes that the reward that will come from honoring God with one's wealth is that "then your barns will be filled to overflowing" (Prov 3:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Barns symbolize an accumulation of wealth. It is the best attempt humans make to survive, control or master their world. Although this hoarding mentality may be instinctual, it smacks of self-sufficiency and misplaced confidence. Yet even barns can burn or be sacked. Jeremiah reports that in the tumultuous days surrounding the Babylonian invasion, people had "wheat and barley, oil and honey, hidden in a field" (Jer 41:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). They had most likely placed these staples in buried pots for fear that barns or granaries would be sacked.

Jesus commonly used agrarian examples in his teaching. What did he mean when he spoke of barns? Primarily barns contrast human security with divine provision. Barns are the focal point of a satiric parable in which an enterprising farmer's building project becomes an index of his worldly-mindedness and misplaced values (Lk 12:13–21).

Perhaps the most familiar reference is Luke 12:24: “Consider the ravens: They do not sow or reap, they have no storeroom or barn; yet God feeds them. And how much more valuable you are than birds!” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This is an ancient religious tension: preparing for the future may suggest lack of trust in God (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the exemplary storehousing of the ant, Prov 6:6—8; 30:25).

In addition, barns connote divine rescue from judgment. “His winnowing fork is in his hand, and he will clear his threshing floor, gathering his wheat into the barn and burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire” (Mt 3:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; 13:30; Lk 3:17). Judgment is inevitable. The barn embodies safety in the face of ultimate danger. The wheat left on the threshing floor will be consumed; the grain in the barn will not. “Barn” represents the sovereign protection of God.

See also Abundance; Farming; Grain; Storehouse; Wheat.

BARRENNESS

Barrenness in the Bible is an image of lifelessness, where God’s redemptive blessing is absent. In the beginning the verdant fecundity of the Garden of Eden and the splendor of male and female sexuality promised a fertility that glorified all life as originally created by God.

When Adam and Eve sinned, God cursed the blessed fertility of his creation. The soil of the garden thereafter produced thorns and thistles, requiring laborious toil to yield food. Human fertility was cursed as childbearing became a painful and life-threatening event. In the Bible fruitful land and fertile women are images of the blessedness of life as God had originally intended it. The opposite of these, desolate land and barren women, are biblical images of the consequences of sin.

The image of the barren wife is one of the Bible's strongest images of desolation and rejection. We find this first in Genesis, where the examples include Sarah (11:30), Rebekah (25:21) and Rachel (29:31). The classic case of barrenness is Hannah (1 Sam 1). A NT [NT NT. New Testament] example is Elizabeth. In wisdom literature one of four things that are never satisfied is "the barren womb" (Prov 30:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Conversely, few images of joy can match that of the barren wife who becomes pregnant. To the psalmist a supreme blessing of God is his settling "the barren woman in her home as a happy mother of children. Praise the Lord" (Ps 113:9). In Isaiah's oracle of redemption the barren woman is enjoined to "burst into song, shout for joy" at the prospect of bearing children (54:1). Both Hannah and Elizabeth are examples of barren women who are made to rejoice when they finally bear a child.

In the covenant with ancient Israel, God pronounced blessing for covenant obedience in terms of fertility, and curse for covenant disobedience in terms of barrenness:

If you fully obey the Lord your God and carefully follow all his commands I give you today, ... The fruit of your womb will be blessed, and the crops of your land and the young of your livestock... However, if you do not obey the Lord your God ... The fruit of your womb will be cursed, and the crops of your land, and the calves of your herds and the lambs of your flocks.

(Deut 28:1—4, 15—18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The prophets later use the imagery of barrenness to indict God's people for their sin of disobeying the covenant.

Prophetic images of unfruitful and desolate land predict the judgment God would send through drought, insect infestations and the ravages of war (Is 5:1–10; Joel 1:1–12; Hab 3:17). The unfaithfulness of God's people is personified by images of Zion as a barren woman who prostitutes her sexuality, thus frustrating her fertility (Jer 3:1–3; Ezek 23; Hos 9:11, 12).

In Isaiah's prophecy the promise that God will restore the blessedness of life is expressed through transforming the imagery of the barren land and the barren woman. In the day of restoration the desolate land will burst into bloom (Is 35:1–7) and the barren woman will sing and rejoice because of an unexpected and abundant fertility (Is 54:1).

Jesus Christ is the consummation of God's plan to resurrect humanity from the lifelessness of sin. His lineage is traced through unexpected births to barren women, starting with Sarah; through a wanton woman, Rahab; through the adulterous relationship of Bathsheba and David; and finally from the innocent barrenness of his virgin mother, Mary (Mt 1:1–16). Throughout redemptive history God transforms barrenness and frustrated fertility into the fruit of eternal life.

The book of Revelation ends the story of earthly history with images of a garden perpetually bearing fruit in the New Jerusalem (Rev 22:1–6) and of a pure bride coming to meet her bridegroom (Rev 21:1–5). Scripture ends as it begins with images of verdant fecundity and of male and female sexuality signifying the blessing of eternal life with God that, because of Jesus Christ, could not be miscarried by sin.

See also Abundance; Birth; Child, Children; Curse; Fruit, Fruitfulness; Woman, Biblical Images of; Womb.

BASIN.

See Bowl.

BATHSHEBA

Of all of David's wives, Bathsheba is the most remembered. This is surprising because her character seems to be defined mainly by passive behavior and relationships with her husbands, son and stepson rather than by outstanding individual qualities or actions. Her beauty was apparently her primary asset. It was also David's downfall, for when he saw her from his palace roof, he desired her, summoned her and exercised his droit du seigneur. (It's possible that she seduced him; the text is unclear about why she was bathing where he might see her.) Bathsheba became pregnant. Her husband, Uriah the Hittite, an honorable and distinguished soldier, paid with his life for David's moment of weakness, as did the baby. Later Bathsheba bore Solomon, heir to David's throne.

Two later incidents involving Bathsheba appear in 1 Kings. When David's son Adonijah seeks to take the aging David's throne, Bathsheba secures it for Solomon. Later, in a curious irony, she agrees to use her motherly influence on Solomon and carries to him Adonijah's request to have David's private nurse, Abishag, for himself. It's unclear from the account why Bathsheba decides to help Adonijah. Perhaps she has been deceived, or she wants to test her power over Solomon. (Or perhaps she knows the request is so irregular that Adonijah, Solomon's nemesis, is sure to be executed because of it.) The venture ends in Adonijah's death, and the reader finds no further mention of Bathsheba.

For the Bible overall, Bathsheba is probably most significant as object rather than subject. She is the "forbidden fruit" that David can't resist: a beautiful woman, another man's wife, a symbol of David's own laziness and self-indulgence during the season "when kings go out to battle" (2 Sam 11:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Like the forbidden fruit in Eden, Bathsheba is also a figure of judgment, for David's union with her results in repeated death, violence and humiliation within his own family (prophesied in 2 Sam 12:10–12). Because her inner motivations are never given, readers of the Bible must accept her character ambiguity and can only guess whether she was vamp or victim or something in between.

See also Adultery; David; Woman, Biblical Images of.

BATTLE STORIES

The Bible is a book of human and divine battles (see Warrior, Divine). In regard to both it is impossible to overstate the degree to which the world of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] was (like other ancient societies) a warrior culture. Warfare was a way of life in the sense that it occurred more or less continuously.

The main repository of battle stories in the Bible are the books of Numbers, Joshua, Judges, Kings and Chronicles, though the psalms and prophetic books often allude to the rituals of warfare as well. The discussion that follows is a roadmap to the motifs and conventions that make up the composite battle story in the Bible.

Prelude to Battle. The initial action of battle stories in the Bible varies. In the case of holy warfare, which we encounter in the narratives of Israel's conquest of the promised land, Israel is directed by God to move forward and take the land (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Num 13:1–2; 14:1–9; Josh 1; 5:13–6:5). Because God is giving the land to Israel, God is the one who initiates the action, directs Israel into battle and brings the victory. If Israel transgresses the commands of God, the result is tragic defeat (Num 14:41—45) or subsequent judgment (Josh 7). Before attacking a city that is located outside of the land God is giving Israel, an offer of peace is to be extended. If the offer is accepted by the city, Israel is to subject the enemy to forced labor (Deut 20:10—11). If the offer is rejected, they are to be engaged in battle, the men subjected to the sword but the women, children, livestock and everything else taken as plunder (Deut 20:12—15).

In numerous other stories of warfare the initial action is provocation by one nation against another. Such provocation might consist of ongoing antagonism toward a neighboring nation or a raid designed to yield spoils of war, but the main pattern in the period of Israel's kings is an invasion from a super-power like Assyria or Babylon designed to conquer and assimilate a nation.

Sometimes the invasion comes swiftly and terribly. On other occasions a preliminary protocol is followed. The king of an army intent on invasion might send emissaries who threaten an enemy nation and attempt to coerce subjection without fighting. In Israel it is expected that the leader will inquire of the Lord, perhaps by consulting a prophet or priest, and so receive the word to proceed or not to proceed into battle (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 23:1—6; 30:7—8; 1 Kings 22:1—28).

Once battle becomes inevitable, the mustering of an army is the next step. In the wilderness Israel moves and camps according to tribes, and a militarism pervades this organization. The census of tribes in Numbers 1 is clearly a military census, and the pattern of Israel's encampment in the wilderness is styled as a military encampment with God, the divine commander-in-chief, dwelling at the center of the encampment (Num 2). Israel, while not a professional army, is a people divinely prepared to enter and conquer the land of Canaan.

During the period of the judges, professional armies are still unknown in Israel. Armies consist of volunteers. The law for Israel's warfare even calls for officers to announce that those who have built a new house, planted a new vineyard or pledged themselves to marriage to return home (Deut 20:5–7). In addition, those who are afraid or fainthearted should return home (Deut 20:8). This volunteerism in early Israel is evident as Deborah and Barak lead the battle against Sisera: “not a shield or spear was seen among forty thousand in Israel” and “willing volunteers” follow the princes of Israel into battle (Judg 5:8–9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Gideon summons soldiers with a sounding trumpet and messengers (Judg 6:34–35), and then releases most of them. Once the battle is joined against the Midianites, he experiences difficulty in enlisting the support of towns on the path of flight and pursuit (Judg 8:1–7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Judg 5:15–17). We find an unusual and grisly summons to battle in the story of the Levite whose concubine is ravaged and killed by the Benjaminites; the Levite summons Israel to vengeance against the Benjaminites by cutting his concubine into twelve pieces and sending them throughout Israel (Judg 19–20). And even king Saul leaves his farming behind for the moment and sends a summons to battle, producing what must have been a somewhat rag-tag army.

In a battle against the Midianites, one thousand gather from each of the twelve tribes (Num 31:5); the ambush at Ai is carried out by thirty thousand fighting men (Josh 8:3). Battle lines are drawn, and men are divided into “units of hundreds and of thousands” (2 Sam 18:4). In several battles Israel's army is much smaller and weaker than their enemies, but God grants victory. Against the Arameans the Israelites were “like two small flocks of goats while the Arameans covered the countryside” (1 Kings 20:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); nonetheless, because of God’s help the Israelites “inflicted a hundred thousand casualties on Aramean foot soldiers in one day” (1 Kings 20:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Warfare in Israel is ideally a sacred event. Nowhere is this more clear than in the holy warfare in which Israel conquers the land of promise. It is warfare undertaken at God’s command and in his presence. For this reason Israel approaches battles much like it approaches worship in the sanctuary. Sacrifices are made to God (1 Sam 13), soldiers “consecrate” themselves (Josh 3:5) and abstain from sexual intercourse (1 Sam 21:5; and Uriah’s refusal to have relations with his wife in 2 Sam 11:11), and the war camp is maintained in a state of ritual cleanliness (Deut 23:9–14). When Israel marches against Jericho, the procession of priests and the ark of the covenant (the footstool or portable throne of God) preceding the army symbolize God’s presence and leadership in the battle. This is symbolized as Israel marches through the wilderness. When the ark sets out in front of Israel, Moses says,

Rise up, O Lord!
 May your enemies be scattered;
 may your foes flee before you.

(Num 10:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Another preliminary to battle is planning the strategy. In the case of holy warfare in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , the leader of the Israelite army will expect to be instructed by God regarding how to conduct the impending battle (Judg 20:28). If God has answered positively to the inquiry of the leader, a cry will go out, “Shout! For the Lord has given you the city” (Josh 6:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Josh

8:1, 18; 10:8, 19; Judg 3:28; 4:7, 14; etc.). The reports of spies, memorialized in spy stories, might enter prominently into the strategy for battle (Num 13; Josh 2; Judg 18:9–10). A favorable report from a scouting expedition might send an army into battle confident of victory (Josh 2), while a prediction of defeat might actually lead an army not to engage in battle at all (Num 13).

Once the armies are arrayed for battle, the final rituals unfold with a grim march toward inexorable conflict. Foremost among these rituals is the taunting of the enemy (see Taunt), which might be accompanied by a challenge to single combat by a champion warrior, such as Goliath, in a prebattle attempt to establish dominance. Psychological warfare in the days or hours before battle is important. Another prebattle ritual is that of the leader encouraging his troops on the night before battle and rallying them with a battle cry (Josh 10:19; Judg 7:20; 1 Sam 17:20, 52) on the day of the battle. Finally, in ancient epic literature the arming of the warrior for battle is a major ritual (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 17:38–39), and armor itself is considered an extension of the character and prowess of the warrior. We catch hints of the convention in the Bible (Judg 3:16; Ps 18:31–35; 84:9; 89:18).

Battle. While the Bible contains few extended narratives of how a battle unfolds, it is possible to discern common motifs. The essential action is attack and defense, offense and defense. Attacks were normally conducted at dawn (see Ps 46:5 for an implied reference). The imagery of flight and pursuit is an inevitable part of battlefield action. On other occasions the capture of prisoners of war resolves the conflict (Num 21:1). Of course the best scenario of all is when no opponents survive (Num 21:3, 35; 1 Sam 15:3).

Surprise attacks are always a possibility in warfare, and they are favorites of those who tell the stories of battle, especially when they result in the unexpected victory of an underdog. On one occasion an all-night march results in Israelite victory over five cities who had joined against Israel (Josh 10:9–10). Another surprise attack leads to victory against troops, horses and chariots, an army “as numerous as the sand on the seashore” (Josh 11:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Gideon surprises the Midianites with the sound of trumpets and three hundred breaking jars (Judg 7:16–22). In another battle, men hide in fields overnight and then creep toward the city in such number that an unsuspecting guard said to those who warned him of the approaching army: “You mistake the shadows of the mountains for men” (Judg 9:36).

A variation on the motif of surprise is ambush. The noise of pursuit and of victory is described in the conquest of Jericho (Josh 6:16), when an ambush is suddenly created by the walls collapsing. Joshua lures the people of Ai out of their city after directing 30,000 men to hide on the other side of the city and flood it when the warriors of Ai left the city to pursue the the Israelites; the plan works perfectly (Josh 8). Jeroboam attempts to ambush Judah by sneaking soldiers behind them as he gives a long speech; but the hand of God is against him, so he fails and Israel is routed (2 Chron 13:1–20). When Jeroboam obeys God’s command to praise him, “the Lord set ambushes against the men of Amnon” (2 Chron 20:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Hand-to-hand combat is a staple of ancient battle stories. David confronts Goliath in the name of the Lord with a slingshot and defeats the nine-foot man (1 Sam 17:1–51); a second generation of Philistine giants is likewise defeated by courageous individuals (2 Sam 21:15–22). Jonathan says “Nothing can hinder the Lord from saving, whether by many or by few” just before he had his armor-bearer climb up a cliff bare-handed to meet waiting Philistines at the top and kill twenty between the two of them in “an area of about half an acre” (1 Sam 14:1–15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Fighting between Judah and Israel includes a poolside scene where each group presents twelve young men who fight in hand-to-hand combat. All twenty-four die when each unceremoniously “grabbed his opponent by the head and thrust his dagger into his opponent’s side” (2 Sam 2:13–17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Another important convention of battle stories is the siege. Mighty armies might conduct combat by laying siege, camping around the city, preventing trade and forcing famine on its inhabitants until a battle was engaged or the city yielded. Nebuchadnezzar besieges Jerusalem during Zedekiah’s reign (2 King 25:1–12). Jeremiah prophetically describes the siege’s end (Jer 37:1–10; 39:1–10; 46–51:64; 52:12–23). Sennacherib attempts the same, but Hezekiah develops a strategy against it: he stops the water flow out of the city, repairs the wall and builds additional reinforcements from the inside, stockpiles additional weapons, organizes military officers, and encourages the people that God is with them. The siege fails, and Sennacherib is killed by his own people (2 Chron 32:1–22).

Accounts of direct attack but only partial victory are also common (1 Sam 4:1–2; 1 Sam 31:1–10; 2 Sam 10:6–19; 2 Chron 14:9–15; 2 Chron 18:29–34-chariot battle). David’s mighty battle feats are catalogued by chronology and by the magnitude of the victory (1 Chron 18). Routing the enemy was the goal—an image of complete, overwhelming defeat.

In holy warfare Israel was not to fear the enemy but believe that God would deliver the enemy into their hand. “Fear not” is the watchword (Exod 14:13–14; Josh 8:1; 10:8, 25; 11:6; Judg 7:3; 1 Sam 23:16–17) and courage is a virtue of faith. By contrast, the enemy loses courage and is overwhelmed by a divine terror, dread and panic (Exod 23:27–28; Deut 2:25; 7:23; Josh 10:10; Judg 4:15; 7:22; 1 Sam 5:11).

After the Battle. The rituals enacted by the victorious army after the battle are even more elaborate than those that precede and accompany the battle. The keynote is exultation, and it takes multiple forms. One is the formal recording of the number of casualties, especially on the side of the vanquished. Here, one senses, is proof of the superiority of the conquering army. A recurring motif in ancient battle stories is that the leader of the victorious army is offered kingship as a reward (Judg 8:22).

Also important is the verbalizing of the victory in an act of celebration and thanksgiving. We read, for example, about shouts of victory (Ex 32:17–18). A conventional lyric form of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is the song of victory—a poem exulting in the success in battle and rehearsing the details, perhaps as a way of prolonging the ecstasy (Ex 15:1–18; Judg 5; Ps 18). The song of victory is sometimes called a “new song” to designate that it is an occasional poem celebrating the latest victory (Ps 98). Elsewhere we catch hints of a formal announcement and recognition of victory (Ps 98:2; Is 52:7–10) and of songs sung in triumph in public settings (Judg 5:10–11).

The victorious army might also perform religious rites of thanksgiving and sacrifice to their deity. In the days or hours following the battle, the conquering army and its leader might undertake a triumphal procession (Ps 68:24–27). Feasting and celebration might ensue (Is 25:6).

Dominating everything else is the ritual of plundering and taking of spoils (Is 53:12; Ps 68:12; Judg 5:30). The taking of a trophy from the enemy has a ceremonial significance. It might consist of armor or a head or even the living leader of the rival army brought back for public display. Thus Saul spares Agag as part of his general orientation of bolstering his public image with his people instead of relying on God. Plunder is a primary benefit of successful combat, but nobility of purpose and dedication to God might be exhibited in not taking any spoils of battle (Gen 14:22–23). In Israel's holy warfare the taking of spoils is expressly forbidden. It is God's battle and all of the spoils belong to him. Thus we find instances where everything is "devoted" to the Lord in a sacrificial slaughter and burning (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Josh 6:24). Even when the war booty is distributed evenly, such as in 1 Samuel 30:23–25, it is done so on the basis that the plunder belongs to the Lord.

In 1 Samuel 30 David and his men fight to regain their town that was plundered by an Amalekite raiding party. Because the Amalekites are drunk on the wine they have plundered, David easily defeats them (1 Sam 30:15–19). Scenes of plunder are often detailed (2 Kings 14:11–14; 2 Chron 14:13). Plunder can include land, and king Uzziah develops such lands to the enhancement of his power (2 Chron 26:6).

In the days of Israel's volunteer militias, soldiers were finally dismissed to return home, probably with the cry, "To your tents, O Israel!" (2 Sam 20:1; 1 Kings 12:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Judg 20:8; 1 Sam 4:10; 2 Sam 18:17; 19:8; 20:22).

The defeated army also experiences postbattle rituals. If defeated soldiers survive, they cower in fear and trembling (Ps 2:10–11). Judgment and vengeance might be exacted from them, either in such a brutal form as having their eyes gouged out or cutting off thumbs and big toes (Judg 1:6, 7) or in the milder form of their having tribute exacted from them (Ps 72:9–10) or gifts expected from them (Gen 14:18). Shame and humiliation of the defeated is symbolized in such motifs as the victor's foot on the vanquished's neck (Josh 10:24), treading on the enemy (Ps 60:12; 108:13) and the defeated as the footstool of the victorious (Ps 110:1; 1 Kings 5:3; 2 Sam 22:39; Ps 18:38).

Because men fought the battles, ancient battle stories are largely a man's world—but not entirely. In the background of every battle story is the specter of the women—wives and mothers—back at the city, awaiting their fate in terrible anxiety. Their moments of waiting are an all-or-nothing prospect: either they will be carried off into slavery or worse, or they will enjoy a nice addition to their domicile and wardrobe in the form of plunder from the vanquished enemy. The moment of waiting is captured by a familiar motif of the woman at the window, looking out for the return of her man (Judg 5:28; 2 Kings 9:30; 2 Sam 6:12). The ecstasy of knowing that one's husband or army has won the battle is captured by the ritual of women's going out to meet the triumphant warriors as they return, either with music and dancing (Ex 15:20—21; 1 Sam 18:6) or with chants, as in the famous (and ominous) refrain that arouses Saul's paranoia, "Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands" (1 Sam 18:7).

Character Types. In addition to the plot motifs noted above, battle stories also contribute a gallery of recurring character types. Stock characters who usually play no more than functional roles in battle stories include watchmen (see Watch, Watchman), spies (see Spy Stories) and eavesdroppers, all of whom contribute to an atmosphere of mystery, intrigue, danger and suspense. Sometimes a king's preparation for battle includes consulting a prophet to ascertain the oracles from God. Couriers carry diplomatic messages between the rival sides or announcements of the outcome of a battle (Jer 51:31).

The primary character type in battle stories, though, is the warrior. In warrior cultures, warriors are the dominant heroes. The archetypal warrior is more than a soldier, surpassing the latter in stature, physical prowess and skill, qualities equally useful and sometimes exemplified in dangerous encounters with wild beasts (Samson, Judg 14:5—6; David, 1 Sam 17:34—37; Benaiah, 2 Sam 23:20/1 Chron 11:22; see Hunting). Above all, the archetypal warrior is a paragon of physical strength, agility and courage. In a culture that determined status by military prowess, warriors are the heroes of Israel. Fighting for kings and for God himself, the warrior is esteemed for leadership, skill and personalized weapons. They are few in number and great in might, fame, responsibility and reward. With their fierce courage and skill, warriors make an army successful; but like all human feats or features, they must humbly bow before God or be judged.

God calls some of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] warriors to their posts. David explains (Ps 89:19) and exemplifies the pattern. With confidence in God born of previous successes with wild animals, he offers to fight Goliath and becomes a warrior who surpasses all others (1 Sam 16:18; 2 Sam 17:8, 10). Because of his lifestyle of bloodshed leading a band of men in flight from Saul, David is told by God that Solomon, rather than he, will build the temple (1 Chron 28:3).

Other warriors are also called by God. While farming, Gideon is addressed by the angel who says, “The Lord is with you, mighty warrior” (Judg 6:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and so his career begins. Jephthah, the illegitimate son of a Gilead and a prostitute, is driven away from the family in adulthood by his legitimate half-brothers; later, his warrior prowess prompts them to request that he return to lead them against the Ammonites (Judges 11:1—11). Some warriors were men whom God decreed should carry out his wrath (Judg 5:11, Is 13:3). Jehu, commander of Ahab’s army, is anointed king and told to destroy the entire house of Ahab (2 King 9). He fulfills the word of the Lord, killing even his close friends and his priests with whom he had served (2 King 10:11).

As evidenced by the humble beginnings of Joshua, Jehu and David, the difference between warriors called by God and others is that they are called to serve from a position of weakness. God clearly enables those not accustomed to war to fight for him, commanding, “Beat your plowshares into swords and your pruning hooks into spears. Let the weakling say, I am strong!” (Joel 3:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In promises of vengeance, he likens Judah to a bow, Ephraim to an arrow and Zion to a warrior’s sword (Zech 9:13).

Other warriors are simply skilled. Most of these are grouped following explanations of their collective exploits, but a few are specifically named. Those with the general epithet of mighty warrior include Nimrod (Gen 10:8–9; 1 Chron 1:10); Zadok and his officers (1 Chron 12:28); Zicri, an Ephraimite warrior who killed Maaseiah, the king’s son (2 Chron 28:7); Eliada, “a valiant soldier” (2 Chron 17:17); Samson (Judg 15–17) and Naaman (2 Kings 5:1). Special exploits, such as Elisha’s stint as military strategist (1 Kings 18), are highlighted. The Gadites are mentioned twenty-nine times. Defecting from Saul’s army to David’s, they “were army commanders; the least was a match for a hundred, and the greatest for a thousand” (1 Chron 12:14). Another famous group were David’s Thirty (2 Sam 23:24–39) with whom Uriah the Hittite served.

Though a king’s overdependence on warriors often signaled his demise (Ps 33:16; Hos 10:13), many kings retained their posts because of the mighty warriors who supported them. David’s success in Israel was due in part to the massive band of warriors that defected to his side from Saul’s (1 Chron 12–13, esp. [esp. esp.. especially] 12:1, 8, 21). We know most of the many warriors in Scripture from the lists of those who were under one of David's commanders like Joab (2 Sam 20:7).

Warriors for kings were in the noble class, included among the officials of Israel: army officers, powerful palace administrators (1 Chron 28:1), judges and prophets (Is 3:2). Comparable to the top military officers in our day, they were considered "famous men" (1 Chron 5:24), "outstanding leaders" (1 Chron 7:40); and they often represented their respective clans (Judg 18:2; 1 Chron 5:24; 1 Chron 7:40, 12:30). They also escorted the king's travel (Song 3:7).

Warriors were talented with special skills in battle. Some could handle a bow (1 Chron 8:40; 12:2), others a shield and spear (1 Chron 12:25). One group could "sling a stone at a hair and never miss" (Judg 20:16); another group was able to shoot arrows or sling stones right-handed or left-handed (1 Chron 12:2). David's Gadites had "the faces of lions, and they were as swift as gazelles in the mountains" (1 Chron 12:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Their fame stemmed from their military and physical prowess. Likewise, the armies of God are pictured with complete power, organization and ability. Joel's depiction of an "army" of locusts destroying the land is particularly evocative: "They charge like warriors; they scale walls like soldiers. They all march in line, not swerving from their course. They do not jostle each other; each marches straight ahead. They plunge through defenses without breaking ranks. They rush upon the city; they run along the wall. They climb into the houses; like thieves they enter through the windows" (Joel 2:7-9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Warriors were among the best-dressed of Israel. To heighten the threat of their image, unusual detail is devoted to describing their battle gear. They have special belts (2 Sam 18:11), some with dagger sheaths (2 Sam 20:8), specific boots and garments (Is 9:5). Some are even clad in scarlet (Nahum 2:3). They are armed with unusually sharp arrows (Ps 120:4), with quivers “like an open grave” (Jer 5:16) and with spears of pine (Nahum 2:3). The “shields of warriors” are above the rest (Song 4:4), and “the warrior’s sword” like no other (Zech 9:13).

Like other supreme images in Scriptures, warriors pale in comparison to God. In both imagery and event, God is the divine warrior (Ex 15:3; Judg 6:12; Job 16:14; Is 42:13; Jer 14:9; 20:11; Zeph 1:14). The demise of warriors signals God’s judgment for their pride. His disabling of their strength is depicted in images of broken bows, not only arrows (1 Sam 2:4; Jer 51:56), of limp arms (Ps 76:5) and bodies exhausted of strength, unable to move (Jer 51:30). He makes them stumble over each other (Jer 46:12), uses their own weapons to kill them (Hab 3:14) and sends “a wasting disease” to infect their sturdy physical frame (Is 10:16). In instances of prideful rebellion, groups of warriors are specifically judged (1 Chron 5:24–25; Is 21:16–17).

In God’s presence warriors are terrorized, with hearts like women in labor (Jer 48:41; 49:22; 50:36; 51:30). Images of brave warriors fleeing naked punctuate the utter terror before God of those who usually terrorize (Amos 2:16; Jer 46:5; Hab 3:13). The psalmist accurately states: “No king is saved by the size of his army; no warrior escapes by his great strength” (Ps 33:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Amos 2:14).

Summary: David and Goliath. The story of David and Goliath (1 Sam 17) is not the only full-fledged battle story in the Bible, but it is the prototypical one that best sums up the genre itself. The story opens with the rival armies stationed within view of each other. Geography is important to the battle, with mountains the preferred site for stationing an army prior to battle and a valley the place where the fighting would actually occur. Goliath is the archetypal champion whose armor is detailed and who utters taunts and challenges to his enemy. In keeping with the holy war context of much OT [OT OT. Old Testament] warfare, the homespun boy hero David also utters a taunt; but his taunt is charged with religious significance, as opposed to the self-reliant boast of Goliath (1 Sam 17:45–47).

In order to get a hearing with the king, David must boast of his past prowess (1 Sam 17:34–37). David is armed for battle with the king's armor, which proves unwieldy for him (1 Sam 17:38–39). David's preparations for battle are unconventional, but they fit the convention of the warrior's equipping for battle by choosing his preferred weapons. Most full-fledged battle stories begin and end with group scenes, but their tendency is to focus central attention on single combat and on the main feat of the victor's defeat of his rival. The story of David and Goliath runs true to form.

Postbattle rituals also appear. The Philistines flee when they see that their champion is dead, showing how single combat before battle is viewed as important in ancient warfare. The Israelite army shouts (1 Sam 17:52) and pursues the Philistine army. The ritual of claiming a trophy consists of David's beheading the giant and carrying the head into camp and of putting Goliath's armor in his tent (1 Sam 17:54). Although David has to wait to claim the usual reward of kingship, he does marry the king's daughter (1 Sam 18:17–27). Overall, this specimen battle story from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] does not so much praise David as a great warrior, as it declares God as a great deliverer.

See also Archery; Armor; Army, Armies; Arrow, Arrow of God; Divine Warrior; Hunting; Shield; Sword; Weapons, Human and Divine.

Bibliography. T. Longman III and D. G. Reid, God Is a

Warrior (SOTB; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); G. von Rad, Holy War in Ancient Israel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991); Y. Yadin, The Art of Warfare in Biblical Lands (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1963).

BEAR.

See Animals.

BEARD

The full, rounded beard was a sign of manhood and a source of pride to Hebrew men. It was considered an ornament, and much care was given to its maintenance. In fact, the wealthy and important made a ceremony of caring for their beards. Custom did not allow the beard to be shaved, only trimmed (Lev 19:27; 21:5), except in special circumstances. For example, shaving the beard was a requirement for the man cleansed of an infectious skin disease (Lev 14:9), and people in mourning would often shave or pull out their beards (Ezra 9:3; Is 15:2; Jer 41:5; 48:37). Ezekiel was told by God to shave off his beard as a symbol of coming destruction (Ezek 5:1).

The beard was also an object of salutation (2 Sam 20:9), the focus of oaths (Mt 5:36) or blessings (Ps 133:2) and even the focus of shame or curses. An attack on the beard is an attack on the person. Because the beard was a symbol of manhood, it was a great insult to degrade someone's beard. Thus David's men suffer grave humiliation when they return from a diplomatic mission with half of each man's beard shaven by the Ammonites. In fact, they did not return to Jerusalem until their beards had grown back (2 Sam 10:4–5). Similarly, Isaiah warns Israel that they will suffer a figurative emasculation at the hand of the king of Assyria who will “shave your head and the hair of your legs, and ... take off your beards also” (Is 7:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The messianic figure in Isaiah 50 is not only abused as his beard is pulled out, but suffers great humiliation and shame (Is 50:6).

See also Baldness; Hair.

BEASTS.

See Animals; Monsters; Mythical Animals.

BEAT, BEATING

The nearly eighty references to beating fall into distinct clusters. Harvesting accounts for several of these. One is the process of separating the useful nutritional parts of a harvested crop from its waste. Thus olives are beaten for oil (Ex 29:40; Lev 24:2; Deut 24:20) and wheat is beaten for its grain kernels (Judg 6:11; Ruth 2:17). Olive trees are also beaten to shake loose the olives (Is 17:6; 24:13). The Israelites beat manna in mortars before boiling or baking it (Num 11:8). Turning this to metaphoric use, military songs of victory in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] use the image of beating enemies “fine like the dust of the earth” (2 Sam 22:43 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and “fine, like dust before the wind” (Ps 18:42 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

A similarly positive cluster deals with the processes of metallurgy. Gold was beaten to form shields (1 Kings 10:16–17; 2 Chron 9:15–16). In the millennial age, swords will be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks (Is 2:4; Joel 3:10; Mic 4:3). Silver is likewise said to be beaten (Jer 10:9).

Negatively, the forces of nature can beat down upon vulnerable people. Thus the sun “beat down upon the head of Jonah so that he was faint” (Jon 4:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), rain and wind beat upon the houses in Jesus’ parable of the two houses (Mt 7:25, 27) and the waves “beat into the boat” of Jesus and the disciples, threatening to swamp it (Mk 4:37)). According to Proverbs 28:3, “A ruler who oppresses the poor is a beating rain that leaves no food” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Beating the breast was a familiar image of sorrow, dismay and contrition in the ancient world. Biblical people are portrayed as engaging in the practice (Is 32:12; Nahum 2:7; Lk 18:13; 23:27, 48).

Beating an object to pieces sometimes figures as an image of destroying something offensive, especially pagan idols. Josiah beat a pagan idol to dust (2 Kings 23:6), as well as altars and sacred poles (2 Chron 34:7). The prophet Micah envisions Samaria’s images “beaten to pieces” (Mic 1:7).

By far the largest category is inflicting bodily pain or punishment on a subjected person or group. Several distinct subcategories emerge. At its most positive, beating with the rod is an image for the discipline of children (Prov 23:13—14) and metaphoric blows and “beatings” are said to cleanse a person from evil (Prov 20:30).

We also find beating as an image of legitimate and legal punishment for misbehavior. Thus it is legitimate to beat a thief who is found breaking in (Ex 22:2), and the Mosaic law allowed for a judge to oversee the beating of a guilty party with lashes (Deut 25:2). Nehemiah beat some of the people who have intermarried with pagans (Neh 13:25).

Some of the images of beating are military in nature. The Amorites “beat down” the Israelites (Deut 1:44), and the people of Israel were beaten by the servants of David (2 Sam 2:17). Jeremiah envisions warriors beaten down and fleeing in haste (Jer 46:5).

The biggest single category is beating as part of the motif of martyrdom-godly people subjected and oppressed by godless bullies. The motif begins with the Egyptians' oppression of the Hebrews (Ex 2:11; 5:14, 16). Jeremiah was beaten and imprisoned by enraged officials (Jer 37:15). Jesus predicted that in the future his disciples would be persecuted with beatings (Mk 13:9). The motif reaches its climax in the beatings endured by Jesus during his passion (Mk 14:65; Lk 22:63) and the missionary career of Paul (Acts 16:22, 37; 18:17; 21:32; 1 Cor 4:11; 2 Cor 6:5; 11:25).

See also Threshing, Threshing Floor.

BEATITUDE

A beatitude is a pronouncement of blessing, phrased in a formula that begins with the phrase "blessed is" or "blessed are." The word blessed has connotations of happiness, felicity, satisfaction and well-being. To pronounce a blessing in the formal rhetoric of a beatitude is to do more than express a wish—it is in some sense to confer the quality of blessedness on a person or group, or to declare the reality of something that is perceived in the person or group.

Beatitudes in the Bible usually confer happiness on a general character type, but sometimes they appear in a narrative context and are directed to a specific person. While a beatitude usually expresses a wish for future well-being, it is sometimes a statement of response for something that a person has already done. Naomi responds to Ruth's account of Boaz's generosity with the statement, "Blessed be he by the Lord" (Ruth 2:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Although we customarily think of a beatitude as expressing blessing on humans, an important OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motif is the pronouncement of blessing on God. Taking all of these types into account, the number of beatitudes expressed in the Bible is well over a hundred. Wherever they appear, they are evocative-high points of positive sentiment toward someone and expressive of an ideal toward which others should aspire.

One avenue toward understanding the beatitudes of the Bible is to note the qualities of character that lead to a pronouncement of blessing or happiness in the formulaic rhetoric of the beatitude. When we do so, we find a distinction between the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] beatitude. Who is pronounced blessed in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ? The person who by discretion prevents an impulsive person from vengeance (1 Sam 25:33 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); the wives and servants of a wise king (1 Kings 10:8; 2 Chron 9:7); people who take refuge in God (Ps 2:12; 34:8) and whose sins are forgiven (Ps 32:1–2); the nation whose God is the Lord (Ps 33:12; 144:15); people who consider the poor (Ps 41:1; Prov 14:21), who worship God in the temple (Ps 65:4; 84:4), who keep God's commands (Ps 119:1–2) and who have many children (Ps 127:3–5). If we are looking for an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] counterpart to the beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount, with their composite portrait of the blessed person, Psalm 1 will suffice: it is an extended picture of the blessedness of the godly person, beginning with the evocative beatitude, "Blessed is the man," and including the summary that "in all that he does, he prospers" (Ps 1:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

What all these OT [OT OT. Old Testament] beatitudes express is the blessedness of the godly and moral person in this life. They arise from a religious community that values God supremely and views everyday life as a quest to secure God's covenant blessing, including, but not limited to, its material benefits. OT [OT OT. Old Testament] beatitudes extol the results of trusting in God and praise the prudent person who lives in conformity to God's rules for living. They confirm rather than challenge conventional wisdom.

By contrast, the overwhelming preponderance of NT [NT NT. New Testament] beatitudes are revolutionary in their rhetoric and sentiment, and apocalyptic in their vision. They pronounce blessing on the person who will share the coming kingdom, and they reverse conventional values by calling people to a radical lifestyle. The blessed person is now not the person living the moral life and prospering as a result of it, but rather the person whom Christ will find awake when he comes (Lk 12:37–38, 43) and who will eat bread in the kingdom of God (Lk 14:15). The blessed person is the one “who endures trial, for when he has stood the test he will receive the crown of life which God has promised to those who love him” (James 1:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). These beatitudes of the kingdom are also christocentric, pronouncing blessing on “the King who comes in the name of the Lord” (Lk 19:38) and on the disciples whose eyes have seen Christ (Lk 10:23).

The beatitudes of Matthew 5:1–11 can be taken as normative of NT [NT NT. New Testament] beatitudes. Together they give us a portrait of the ideal follower of Christ, and they consistently conceive of blessing in unconventional ways. The person who is declared blessed is not the earthly success story but those who are poor in spirit, who mourn and are meek, who are merciful and pure in heart, and so forth. Furthermore, the rewards that are promised to these people are spiritual and apocalyptic—receiving the kingdom of heaven, inheriting the earth, seeing God, obtaining a great reward in heaven. Climaxing the NT [NT NT. New Testament] apocalyptic beatitudes are seven beatitudes scattered throughout the book of Revelation (Rev 1:3; 14:13; 16:15; 19:9; 20:6; 22:7, 14).

While always retaining its immensely positive effect, the biblical beatitude reflects in microcosm the progression from OT [OT OT. Old Testament] to NT [NT NT. New Testament] , with the goal of godly well-being in the covenant present giving way to a christocentric and apocalyptic focus on the arrival and future consummation of a radical spiritual kingdom that reverses conventional ways of thinking, even among the godly.

See also Blessing, Blessedness; Curse.

Bibliography. R. A. Guelich, The Sermon on the Mount (Waco, TX: Word, 1982) 62—118.

BEAUTY

Beauty is first of all an aesthetic quality that names what we find attractive, satisfying and excellent in an object or person. With visual art and music, this beauty is perceived through the senses. With a work of literature, beauty is perceived by the mind and imagination. While it is possible to define the specific ingredients of artistic beauty—such as unity, balance, symmetry and harmony of parts—the references to beauty in the Bible do not take us in this analytic direction. Instead the biblical writers are content with beauty as a general artistic quality denoting the positive response of a person to nature, a person or an artifact.

Although beauty begins as a specifically artistic response, by extension we use it to indicate a generalized positive response to something. Thus when Jesus commends Mary's anointing of his feet, he does so with the statement that "she has done a beautiful thing to me" (Mt 26:10; Mk 14:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Isaiah does not have physical appearance in mind when he asserts, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him who brings good tidings" (Is 52:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In a similar way, some of the references to the beauty of men, women and children noted below suggest not only external physical beauty but also an inner beauty of character and personality. We move even further from an artistic use of the term to a more metaphoric use when beauty is attributed to character of God. Here the positive qualities of artistic beauty provide a language for identifying the perfection of God and the pleasure that a believer finds in the perfection.

Modern English translations give us approximately a hundred biblical references to beauty and beautiful, and the overwhelming majority of these references are positive. Beyond the appearance of the word itself are pictures of things or persons that biblical characters and writers find beautiful. The impression that these references leave is that beauty is something of great value in human and spiritual experience.

Biblical Images of Beauty. What then do biblical writers find beautiful? The answer is an ever-expanding list. Houses can be beautiful (Is 5:9), crowns can be beautiful (Is 28:5; 62:3; Ezek 16:12; 23:42), garments can be beautiful (Josh 7:21; Is 52:1) and flocks can be beautiful (Jer 13:20). So can ornaments (Ezek 7:20), a person's voice (Ezek 33:32), a city (Lam 2:15), whitewashed tombs (Mt 23:27) and a clay vessel (Rom 9:21). The elevation of a mountain can be beautiful (Ps 48:2). As we consider the very range of things that appear beautiful to the biblical writers' imaginations, we find evidence for the claim that God "has made everything beautiful in its time" (Eccles 3:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

If artifacts can be beautiful, so can people. Within the Bible, women are said to be beautiful no fewer than twenty times (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Men also possess beauty (1 Sam 25:3; 2 Sam 14:25; Is 44:13), as did the child Moses (Acts 7:20; Heb 11:23). The ultimate objectifying of the beauty of the human form is found in Isaiah 44:13, where the prophet speaks of the fashioning of an idol that has “the figure of a man, with the beauty of a man” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Outer and inner beauty combine in the proverb: “The glory of young men is their strength, but the beauty of old men is their gray hair” (Prov 20:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), where gray hair is both physically attractive and a sign of mature wisdom.

Romantic love has always been closely aligned with the experience of beauty, and the Bible gives us examples. In the Song of Songs when the lovers meet, they are delighted with what they see: “Behold, you are beautiful my love; behold, you are beautiful; your eyes are doves. Behold, you are beautiful, my beloved, truly lovely” (Song 1:15–16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The pastoral setting for this idealized love, a royal bower, is an extension of the beauty of the couple (Song 1:17); and this same setting provides images to express the beauty of the lovers, who are (for example) a rose of Sharon, a lily of the valley and an apple tree (Song 2:1, 3). In fact virtually every object that the poet names in the Song of Songs is an image of beauty. In love poetry like this, the lovers’ perception of beauty is inspired by love. The same may be said of Abraham’s perception of his wife Sarah: “I know that you are a woman beautiful to behold” (Gen 12:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Yet Sarah’s beauty is clearly attested as fact in the story that follows. In Psalm 45 (like the Song of Songs a royal epithalamium or wedding poem), the poet predicts regarding the bride that “the king will desire your beauty” (v. 11); and in the picture of the wedding festivities that follows, we read that “the princess is decked in her chamber with gold-woven robes; in many-colored robes she is led to the king” (vv. 13–14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Although the biblical view of nature tends to value nature first of all for its utilitarianism (Ps 104), occasionally we see nature praised for its beauty. Sunrise has the qualities of a “bridegroom leaving his chamber” (Ps 19:1). The flower is a biblical touchstone of beauty (Is 28:1, 4; 40:6; Jas 1:11), a motif climaxed in Jesus’ picture of “the lilies of the field” that are so resplendent that “even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these” (Mt 6:28–29). Elsewhere the olive tree is said to be beautiful (Hos 14:6), and when God planted his paradisaal garden, he “made to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight” (Gen 2:9). The Song of Songs is a small anthology of the beauties of nature, with images of flowers appearing on the earth (Song 2:12), vines blossoming (Song 2:13) and mandrakes giving forth fragrance (Song 7:13).

Balancing nature as a locus of beauty for OT [OT OT. Old Testament] believers was the temple, next to nature their most vivid experience of aesthetic beauty. We catch a glimpse of how beautiful the temple appeared to Hebrew eyes when one of the disciples, coming out of the temple with Jesus, exclaims, “Look, Teacher, what wonderful stones and what wonderful buildings!” (Mk 13:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This accords with the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] worshiper’s claim regarding God that “strength and beauty are in his sanctuary” (Ps 96:6). When the temple was rebuilt, God himself put “into the heart of the king, to beautify the house of the Lord” (Ezra 7:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The holy garments of Aaron and his sons were “for glory and for beauty” (Ex 28:2, 40). It was when worshipers were surrounded by such artistic and architectural beauty that they could “behold the beauty of the Lord” (Ps 27:4) and could enjoin others to “worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness” (1 Chron 16:29 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 29:2; 96:9). Aesthetic pleasure is part of the meaning of the pilgrim’s exclamation upon catching sight of the temple, “How lovely is thy dwelling place, O Lord of hosts!” (Ps 84:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The beauty of the tabernacle and temple are known to us mainly in the biblical accounts of the materials and fashioning that went into them (Ex 25–30, 35–39; 1 Kings 6–7; 1 Chron 22–27; 2 Chron 2–4). This seemingly endless catalog of materials and plans pulsates with an artist’s delight in the physical materials and artistic design used in the process of artistic creation. Together these chapters are a heightened image of artistic beauty—a celebration of human artistry. The divine sanction for this artistry is not only that God gave the plans for the construction; he also inspired the artists who did the work (Ex 31:2–6; 35:30–36:1). The arts in general are a biblical image of beauty. References to music in the psalms confirm one of the psalmists’ claims that the sound of the harp is “sweet” (82:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; “pleasant” KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The prevailing literary nature of the Bible is yet another biblical image of beauty. One of the authors explicitly states that beauty of style was important to his enterprise: “the Preacher sought to find pleasing words” (Eccles 12:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Beauty of God. The move from beauty as an aesthetic quality to a spiritual response that we can see in the references to the beauty associated with worship in the temple reaches its culmination in biblical references to the beauty of God. These can hardly be an aesthetic response, though we should not dismiss the way the language of aesthetics becomes the best way for the believer to express the delight and satisfaction that he or she finds in God. When David asserts that the “one thing” that he will seek after is “to behold the beauty of the Lord” in the temple (Ps 27:4), the experience of beauty expresses his longing to see God face to face. It is really God that he seeks, not a beautiful image. This beauty of the Lord represents one of the many paradoxes of Christianity, for it is clear from the Scriptures that the beauty of God refers at one and the same time to literal appearance and to that invisible quality that makes God the definition of beauty. Somehow in God beauty of spirit and beauty of appearance are perfected, as captured in the evocative picture of “the perfection of beauty” that “shines forth” from Zion (Ps 50:2).

The explicit references to beauty in relation to God seem to be an attempt to express the inexpressible, to describe the “immortal, invisible, the only God” (1 Tim 1:17). Hence the following verses: “Honor and majesty are before him; strength and beauty in his sanctuary” (Ps 96:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “In that day the Lord of hosts will be a crown of glory, and a diadem of beauty to the remnant of his people” (Is 28:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Here beauty is related to the majesty and glory, the kingship and sovereignty of God—words full of mystery that will only take on their full meaning when, as David longed to do, we “behold the beauty of the Lord” (Ps 27:4). Yet the beauty of God is linked with solid and tangible objects and real places—a crown, a diadem and the sanctuary of the Lord. Isaiah promises that “your eyes will see the king in his beauty, they will behold a land that stretches afar” (Is 33:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), a verse that exquisitely combines the visual image and the unsearchable depth of the beauty of the Lord. When Moses descended from Mount Sinai, his face was shining simply from being in the presence of the Lord.

Although the word beauty is not used, it is overwhelmingly implied by those few persons in the Bible who look upon God. It is as though beauty does not define God, but God defines beauty. The descriptions of the Lord tell us what beauty is. For example:

In the year that King Uzziah died I saw the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up; and his train filled the temple. Above him stood the seraphim; each had six wings: with two he covered his face, and with two he covered his feet, and with two he flew. And one called to another and said: "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory." And the foundations of the thresholds shook at the voice of him who called, and the house was filled with smoke. (Is 6:1—4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

Similarly, John's vision of the risen and ascended Son of God:

In the midst of the lampstands one like a son of man, clothed with a long robe and with a golden girdle round his breast; his head and his hair were white as white wool, white as snow; his eyes were like a flame of fire, his feet were like burnished bronze, refined as in a furnace, and his voice was like the sound of many waters; in his right hand he held seven stars, from his mouth issued a sharp two-edged sword, and his face was like the sun shining in full strength. When I saw him, I fell at his feet as though dead. But he laid his right hand upon me, saying, "Fear not, I am the first and the last, and the living one; I died, and behold I am alive forevermore, and I have the keys of Death and Hades." (Rev 1:13—18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])

Here, surely, are images of transcendent beauty.

An extension of the beauty of God is the beauty of heaven, which the book of Revelation portrays as a place of transcending and transcendent beauty. This is especially evident in the detailed picture of the New Jerusalem in Revelation 21–22:5, where the imagery of adornment, jewels, light, glory and paradise creates a dazzling impression of a beauty that far surpasses anything earthly.

The Limits of Beauty. For all its endorsement of earthly and heavenly beauty, the Bible also cautions its readers about beauty. First, earthly beauty (in contrast to heavenly beauty) is temporary, as is made clear in references to the “glorious beauty” of “the fading flower” (Is 28:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 40:6–8). Second, beauty is powerless to protect itself from physical destruction (Is 64:11; Jer 4:30). Third, beauty can seduce a person into morally harmful actions like adultery (Prov 6:25). Fourth, physical beauty is only skin deep and is no guarantee of godly character: “Charm is deceitful, and beauty is vain, but a woman who fears the Lord is to be praised” (Prov 31:30 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 11:22, with its picture of a “a beautiful woman without discretion”). Fifth, even when beauty does not conceal a defective inner character, it is of lesser value than inner spiritual character. This critique of external beauty is present in the apparently undistinguished physical appearance of Jesus. In Isaiah’s prophecy about the coming of God’s suffering servant, we read that he will have “no beauty or majesty to attract us to him, nothing in his appearance that we should desire him” (Is 53:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In fact this suffering servant “was despised and rejected by men” and “as one from whom men hide their faces he was despised, and we esteemed him not” (Is 53:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The most extended critique of human and earthly beauty occurs in Ezekiel 16, an oracle of judgment against Jerusalem (see also the parallel indictment of Tyre in Ezek 27–28). The case against beauty is idolatry—a worship of and trust in one’s own beauty. God pictures himself as having decked his chosen nation (a personified Jerusalem) with jewelry, so that she “grew exceedingly beautiful” (Ezek 16:13), with her renown going “forth among the nations because of [her] beauty, for it was perfect through the splendor which I had bestowed upon [her]” (Ezek 16:14). What could go wrong with such a positive picture of beauty? The answer: “You trusted in your beauty” (Ezek 16:15) and “prostituted your beauty” (Ezek 16:25). It is not beauty that is indicted in this vision; beauty itself is a gift conferred by God. What is condemned is the perversion of beauty in pride, self-absorption and self-worship.

Summary. The imagery of beauty is extensive in the Bible, ranging from the paradise in which God planted every tree that is pleasant, to the sight of the resplendent heavenly Jerusalem that dazzles our sight in the closing pages of the Bible. We can infer from the biblical images of beauty that the longing for beauty, along with an ability to recognize and experience it, exists within every human being. Although the Bible does not state it explicitly, it is a fair inference that experiences of earthly beauty awaken a longing for a beauty that is more permanent and transcendent than anything this life can give—a longing for the beauty of God. Certainly the beauty of the holy city (and its forerunner, the Zion of the temple) is inseparable from the glory of God, who is himself its source, its temple and its light. In heaven all God’s servants will see his face as David longed to do: “There shall no more be anything accursed, but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it, and his servants shall worship him; they shall see his face, and his name shall be on their foreheads” (Rev 22:3—4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And in seeing God they will see beauty in its pure form for the first time.

See also Adam; Flowers; Garden; Glory; Jerusalem; Jewels and Precious Stones; Light; Love Story; Man; Song of Solomon; Temple; Tree, Trees; Woman; Zion.

Bibliography. W. A. Dyrness, “Aesthetics in the Old Testament: Beauty in Context,” JETS [JETS JETS. Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society] 28 (1985) 421–32; P. Sherry, Spirit and Beauty: An Introduction to Theological Aesthetics (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992).

BED, BEDROOM

Beds are mentioned throughout Scripture, the most famous bed probably being that of Og of Bashan, the last of the giant Rephaites, whose iron bed was “more than thirteen feet long and six feet wide” (Deut 3:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the Bible, beds also serve to picture various aspects and conditions of the people who lie in them. Specifically, beds portray comfortable rest, sloth, pain, permanent residence (even death), the privacy of the soul and purity or impurity, especially relating to sexual activity.

The state of comfortable rest associated with beds seems almost a part of the literal meaning. When the psalmist recalls David’s oath not to enter his house, go to his bed or allow sleep to his eyes until he has found “a place for the Lord,” we clearly understand that David means not to rest or take his ease until he has seen to the job of building the temple (Ps 132:1–5). Job, in his torment, looks to his bed for “comfort” and “ease,” but even there, he says, God disturbs him with frightening dreams and visions, so that he can find no rest (Job 7:13–14). Isaiah gives Israel a vivid picture of coming punishment: God’s people think they are secure and comfortable, but because of their disobedience soon they will find “the bed is too short to stretch out on, the blanket too narrow to wrap around you” (Is 28:20).

Sometimes the comfortable rest of a bed appears not as desirable, but as slothful or even evil, as when Ahab, unable to procure Naboth's vineyard for himself, "lay on his bed sulking" (1 Kings 21:4). Proverbs 26:14 pictures a sluggard as one who "turns on his bed" like "a door turns on its hinges." Amos condemns the comfortable, corrupt Israelites who "sit in Samaria / on the edge of their beds" and who "lie on beds inlaid with ivory / and lounge on your couches" (Amos 3:12; 6:4). In such passages beds picture slothful and decadent ease.

In some cases the inactivity of a bed connects not with rest or sloth but with pain, as in Job 33:19, in which we read of one "chastened on a bed of pain." The "sickbed" and "bed of illness" (Ps 41:3) become at times symbols of pain and even punishment: pagan Jezebel, as the representative of sexual immorality and pagan idolatry, is "cast on a bed of suffering" (Rev 2:22).

Beds can themselves represent one's home. When David speaks of making his bed in the depths, he means making the depths his dwelling place—taking up residence there (Ps 139:8). Making one's bed sometimes offers an image of that most permanent dwelling, death. Ezekiel calls the grave of Elam "a bed ... among the slain" (Ezek 32:25). In his despair Job asks whether the grave is the only home for which he can hope, and in the following parallel line he pictures himself in that grave, spreading out his bed in darkness (Job 17:13).

Although beds can picture external and even eternal dwelling places, they more commonly offer a picture of that private, internal place where a person ponders, meditates or plots. The bedroom is the place of the most personal, secret thoughts. So when Solomon advises his hearers not to curse the rich in their bedrooms, he is urging them to take care for their most private thoughts and words (Eccles 10:20). The psalms contain multiple pictures of people on their beds, opening their hearts before God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 4:4; 63:6). In the Song of Songs, the beloved tells how “all night long on my bed / I looked for the one my heart loves,” meaning that both in her literal bed and in her most private thoughts and dreams she has been focusing her desires on her lover (Song 3:1).

In Hosea 7:14, God’s disobedient people “do not cry out to me from their hearts / but wail upon their beds.” The picture of them on their beds shows their slothful inactivity, but it also exposes their hearts, which are hopelessly turned in on themselves rather than crying out to God, as the verse’s first line mentions by contrast. Periodic mentions of evildoers plotting evil on their beds reveal the sinful interiors of people’s houses and hearts (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 36:4; Mic 2:1).

In general, beds tell the story of the purity or impurity of a person’s life, especially in relation to sexual activity. The bed often functions as a direct symbol of sexual activity. When Potiphar’s wife back in ancient Egypt says, “Come to bed with me,” we understand the nature of this invitation (Gen 39:7, 12). Throughout Scripture, for a son to defile a father’s bed means for that son to have sexual relations with his mother or with his father’s wife, and any such activity is condemned as vile and sinful (Gen 49:4; 1 Chron 5:1; Deut 22:30; 27:20).

Two kinds of women make their appearance in the book of Proverbs: the pure and the impure. The impure is a prostitute who lures the innocent youth, enticing him with descriptions of her bed, which is covered with colored linens from Egypt and perfumed with exotic spices (Prov 7:16–17). The pure woman is a wise wife who herself makes the coverings for her bed, keeping her eyes and her hands busy in her own home rather than setting them on foreign goods—whether fabric or flesh (Prov 31:22). Their different beds offer pictures of their contrasting pure and impure sexual activity as well as their pure and impure hearts.

The bed as a picture of sexual impurity becomes a symbol, on another level, of spiritual impurity and adultery. For example Isaiah, condemning God's people for idolatry, accuses them of making their beds in the high places where they go to offer their pagan sacrifices. God himself accuses his people of uncovering their beds, opening them wide, making pacts and experiencing intimacy with those idolaters "whose beds you love" (Is 57:7–8). Similarly Ezekiel pictures the wrongful military alliances of Judah and Israel with surrounding pagan nations in terms of prostitution: Israel becomes the prostitute who defiles herself and invites the Babylonians, among others, to her "bed of love" (Ezek 23:17).

One of the most delightful contrasts to the beds of impure sexual activity appears in Song of Songs, as the pure-hearted lovers in that book celebrate their "verdant bed," using all the richness and fertility of nature to picture the rich pleasure of their sexual intimacy (Song 1:16). From the woman's perspective, her lover's cheeks "are like beds of spice." Such images, ripe with sensuous enjoyment, cluster throughout the book and communicate the delight of pure hearts and bodies joining together.

Throughout Scripture beds reveal in various ways the intimate conditions and relationships of those to whom they belong. From the biblical perspective, what human beings do in their beds offers a telling picture of what they are doing with their lives: beds can gauge rest, sloth, pain, true residence and the privacy and purity of the human heart.

See also Adultery; Home, House; Marriage; Rest; Sex; Sluggard; Song of Songs.

BEGGAR, BEGGING

In the Bible begging is seen as an extreme condition. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] spells out careful rules for how the children of Israel are to deal with those who are reduced to begging for their livelihood. While the rules are often designed to protect the poverty stricken from oppression and harm (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Prov 22:22), the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] also sees the need to beg as an image of the curse on the wicked (Ps 109:10). The psalmist notes that he has never seen the children of the righteous “begging bread” (Ps 37:25 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Proverbs notes that the sluggard “does not plow after the autumn, so he begs during the harvest and has nothing” (Prov 20:4). Those that beg are stigmatized by the extent of their need and the causes for that need; the need to beg is a sign of disfavor on beggars even while they are being cared for under the laws of charity and hospitality.

Charity for the poor may be behind some of Jesus’ own actions on behalf of beggars. But the image of begging is also transformed in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] record. In the Gospels beggars become an important image of how the grace of God extends beyond human ability. Both Mark and Luke record the story of Blind Bartimaeus, reduced to begging because of his physical handicap. When he stops Jesus, requesting mercy, Jesus not only extends the required courtesy to the blind beggar but also heals him physically and restores him spiritually (Mk 10:46—52; Lk 18:35—43).

In at least two parables Jesus uses people who beg as examples of the righteous. In Luke, Jesus tells the story of a judge “who did not fear God, and did not respect man” (Lk 18:2). But the judge is finally moved by a woman whose appeals for justice resemble the intensity and endurance of a beggar. In the parable the intensity and repetition of the woman are set up as an example of how prayer, even without that effort, moves God, who unlike this judge is just.

The most significant transformation of a beggar, however, occurs in Jesus' parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19–31), based on the motif of the reversal of fortune in the afterlife. In this parable the beggar becomes the honored one, showing that the grace of God is no respecter of persons. In fact the story suggests that those who lack here on earth will be rewarded spiritually.

The image does not suggest, however, that God needs to be begged in order to open the supplies of the kingdom. Instead it reassures those who are reduced to begging that their cries will be heard, their dignity will be restored and their desires will be answered. The stories of Bartimaeus, the persistent widow, and Lazarus remind hearers of the gospel that, far from being a reason for rejection, poverty symbolically becomes an opportunity for miracle and grace. Begging, as a symbol of need acknowledged, becomes the means by which God can meet need.

These concrete examples help to illustrate Christ's metaphorical use of poverty in the beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount, where he informed his followers that the "poor in spirit" were blessed, for they would receive "the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 5:3).

See also Abundance; Beatitudes; Poverty; Reward; Weak, Weakness.

BEHIND.

See Back Side.

BELLY

In addition to its straightforward meaning, the Bible uses the belly to summon images of beauty, greed, the inner self and the life-giving womb.

Belly as Anatomy. Part of the curse meted out to the serpent who deceived Eve was that it would have to crawl on its belly and, as a consequence, be forced to eat dust (Gen 3:14). The psalmist echoes this image to emphasize the fallenness of God's people as they complain of misery and oppression bringing them down to the dust so that their bodies "cling to the ground" (Ps 44:25).

The lover draws admiring attention to the 'belly' (translated "waist" in NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] and NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), among other well shaped features of his beloved (Song 7:2). The wealthy and opulent, unaccustomed to want, have large bellies (Judg 3:17; Jer 5:27) in contrast to the lean belly of the poor (Is 17:4). The term "cows of Bashan" to refer to rich women implies corpulence (Amos 4:1). The large belly of Behemoth is a sign of his strength (Job 40:16). The belly with its direct connection to the necessities of physical life occasionally stands in contrast to the spiritual, so that the psalmist by the phrase "soul and belly" means "body and soul" (Ps 31:10; 44:26).

Belly as Greed. The wants and appetites of the belly serve as both metaphor and motivation for the wicked and make it the seat of avarice and passion (Job 20:20). The cravings of the belly are a picture of the life of the flesh (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the self) which is in opposition to the life of the Spirit. The parables of the Rich Fool (Lk 12:13—21) and the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19—31) pivot around the imagery of the satisfied appetite and underline the foolishness of thinking that the good life is a full belly (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 32:15; Job 20; Rom 16:18). Paul contrasts those "whose god is their belly" and "whose mind is on earthly things” with those “whose citizenship is in heaven” (Phil 3:19–20). The link between sin and the stomach is obvious and strong, but Jesus explicitly denies that Jewish food laws, that regulate the categories of food that go into the body, play any role in corrupting the desires and action of people (Mt 15:17; Mk 7:19).

Belly as Mind or Soul. The Bible records fatal injuries to the belly for several characters (Eglon, Judg 3:21; Amasa, 2 Sam 20:10; Judas, Acts 1:18). Since the belly is a vulnerable area of the body, it shelters one’s essence. The Hebrew and Greek terms for “belly,” variously translated, occur repeatedly to designate the “inmost being” (Prov 18:8 = 26:22; 20:27, 30; 22:18; Job 15:2, 35; 32:18; Jn 7:38). The belly also senses emotions, gut feelings, such as anguish (Jer 4:19) compassion (Lk 10:33; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] “bowels and mercies” AV Phil 2:1) and affection (2 Cor 6:12).

Belly as Womb. The belly appears poetically parallel to “womb” (Job 10:18; Is 48:8; 49:1, 5). Swelling of the abdomen is, of course, associated with pregnancy, though it was also diagnostic of an adulteress (Num 5:11–31). Belly by itself can signify birth (Hos 9:11), but also occurs frequently in idioms meaning womb: “son of my belly” (Job 19:17); “fruit of the belly” (Micah 6:7); “from the belly,” i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , “since birth” (Judg 13:5). The womb, if life fails to emerge from it, is a grave. Jonah, despairing of escape from the great fish, says, “out of the belly of Sheol I cried” (Jon 2:2).

See also Abraham’s Bosom; Appetite; Breast; Stomach.

BEND THE KNEE.

See Bow, Bowing; Knee, Kneel.

BENEATH.

See Under.

BENEDICTION

Whereas a beatitude is a blessing pronounced by a person on either another person or on God, a benediction is God's blessing conferred on a person or group by God's designated human agent. Although benedictions are not limited to worship settings (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 9:26–27; 14:19–20; 27:27–29), they are especially associated with them. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the formal benediction was pronounced by the Aaronic priests (Num 6:24–26; 2 Chron 30:27), while NT [NT NT. New Testament] benedictions are pronounced by the apostles in their epistles. The Aaronic blessing is perhaps the most memorable biblical benediction:

“The Lord bless you and keep you;

the Lord make his face shine upon you and be gracious to you;

the Lord turn his face toward you and give you peace.” (Num 6:24–26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

If we look at the Aaronic and apostolic benedictions most commonly associated with worship occasions (Num 6:24–26; Rom 15:13; 2 Cor 13:14; Heb 13:20–21), we note the following motifs: (1) God-centeredness, in the sense that God is the one whose blessing is invoked and who is understood to be the source of the blessings of grace and peace; (2) a solemn tone and exalted imagery embedded in language polished by liturgical use; (3) an aura of authority, so that the pronouncing of them by God's qualified and special agents not only expresses a wish but actually confers God's blessing on the recipient.

The benedictions have a distinctive rhetorical flavor, sonorous in their tone and formally embellished. The Aaronic benediction, for example, consists of three pairs of verbs, each having “the Lord” as the subject of the action. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] benedictions feature similar parallelism of phrases and syntax, owing to their roots in the Jewish liturgical heritage.

See also Beatitude; Blessing.

BENJAMIN

The name Benjamin means “son of my right hand.” This itself points to Benjamin’s role in biblical narrative: he is a favored son of Jacob, the latest to be born to a prolific patriarch, born of the favored wife Rachel (who died in Benjamin’s childbirth).

In the Joseph narratives, Benjamin becomes a substitute when Joseph, Jacob’s very favorite son, is sold into slavery and presumed to be dead. Jacob says that Benjamin’s death will bring down his gray hair to Sheol, exactly as he had said of Joseph (Gen 42:38). Benjamin goes to Egypt by caravan as had Joseph (Gen 43:15); he receives the same favored treatment as Joseph (Gen 43:34); and eventually the attitude of the brothers toward Joseph is revealed in their attitude toward Benjamin. Appropriately to this substitute role, Benjamin is entirely passive, never speaking a word.

As the last to be born, Benjamin also represents the completion of the family of Israel in Genesis. Yet no sooner is he born and the family completed than the family starts to break apart with the death of his mother (Gen 35:16–20), followed by further family disruptions culminating in the sale of Joseph. But here as well, Benjamin represents the reconciliation of the complete family by his role in reuniting Joseph and his brothers.

In Judges the role of the tribe of Benjamin is reversed from the passive and positive role of the individual in Genesis. Now active, this “son of the right hand” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 35:18) has become an aggressive left-handed warrior. No longer a stand-in for Joseph, Benjamin now stands in contrast to Judah. The first judge, Othniel, is from the tribe of Judah (Judg 3:9–10). But the second, the left-handed and deceptive Ehud, for whom there is no mention of the Spirit, is from Benjamin (Judg 3:12–30). Later the hospitality of the Judahite father of the Levite’s concubine contrasts with the lack of hospitality shown in Gibeah of the region of Benjamin (Judg 19:4–9, 15–21). The subsequent rape of the concubine marks that Benjaminite city as another Sodom (Judg 19:22–24), while the cutting of her body into twelve pieces to summon the tribes to avenge this atrocity is itself a grotesque and ambiguous act (Judg 19:29). On the surface the nation is being called together; in deep structure it is being cut apart. The contrast is further apparent when Benjamin sides with Gibeah, while Judah leads the assault against the town (Judg 20:12–13, 18). When Gibeah is finally taken by ambush, the reader is reminded of the use of the same deception in the original conquest of that territory, so that Benjamin symbolizes a reversal in the direction of the nation (Judg 20:29–47, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Josh 8:4–25). By the end of Judges the brother who once was the reconciliation of his family has become the beginning of its dissolution.

In Samuel the choice of Saul of Gibeah as the first king is an ominous sign. An initial emphasis on the “least of the tribes” theme suggests connections with the positive “younger brother” theme in Genesis (1 Sam 9:21). But when Saul cuts a yoke of oxen into pieces to summon the nation to war (1 Sam 11:7), the reader knows that he is not the favored brother of Genesis, but the divisive and warlike Benjamin of Judges. Benjamin continues to represent divisive forces in the nation, especially in persons such as Sheba and Shemei (2 Sam 16:5—7; 20:1). Yet the ambiguity of Benjamin is aptly portrayed in the fact that David, while hiding from Saul at Ziklag, was joined by six hundred Benjaminites who, interestingly, could sling a stone with either their right hand or their left (1 Chron 12:1—2). It may be this legacy of zeal that Paul proudly claims when he reminds the Philippians that he is “of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of Hebrews” (Phil 3:5).

During the divided monarchy Benjamin was often reckoned with Judah (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Kings 12:21). But Benjamin, now a divided tribe and the very ground on which Judah and Israel fought (1 Kings 15:16—22), was flanked on its southern border (its right hand) by Jerusalem (which originally belonged to Benjamin, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Judg 1:21) with its temple of Yahweh, and on its northern border (its left hand) by Bethel (which also originally belonged to Benjamin, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Josh 18:22) with its sanctuary for one of the golden calves. Is the tribe right-handed or left-handed? In either case, this youngest brother again reveals the heart of the rest of the brothers, and it is now a divided heart, in accordance with the seemingly contradictory blessings of Jacob and Moses (Gen 49:27; Deut 32:12).

See also Right, Right Hand.

Bibliography. J. Ackerman, “Joseph, Judah, and Jacob,” in Literary Interpretations of Biblical Narratives (Nashville: Abingdon, 1982) 2:85—113; L. Klein, The Triumph of Irony in the Book of Judges (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1988) 161—92; D. Steinmetz, From Father to Son (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1991) 120—27; B. Webb, The Book of Judges (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987) 188—97.

BET, DARE

The most obvious example of the archetypal bet or dare is the story of Elijah on Mt. Carmel (1 Kings 18), where the prophet summons the prophets of Baal to a showdown in which both he and the prophets prepare a sacrifice and call down fire from heaven. The silence of Baal and the display of God's power in burning up both the altar and the water around it make up one of the most rousing stories in the Bible.

The bet or dare motif is present in obvious ways in other stories. The trial of Job begins with a pair of "double dares." God in effect dares Satan to find fault with his "blameless and upright" servant (Job 1:8; 2:3). Satan in turn bets that Job will turn on God if he is afflicted (Job 1:9–11; 2:4–5), and God accepts the terms of the dare (Job 1:12; 2:6). In Job's subsequent career of finding fault with God, Satan initially seems to win the dare; but in the end he is defeated, not even appearing in the final chapter of the book as he is banished from the scene.

Daniel and his three friends take a chance on God's vindicating them when they propose to refuse the king's food and drink for ten days on the supposition that they will outperform the students who accept the king's fare (Dan 1:5–16). Samson bets thirty sets of garments that the Philistine young men attending his wedding feast cannot guess his riddle (Judg 14:12–19), and his losing of the bet through his inability to resist the pleas of a pagan wife foreshadows the tragic shape of his life to come. More positively, Gideon challenges the angel of God in the celebrated fleece tests (Judg 6:36–40).

Goliath dares the Israelite army to send forth a soldier to engage in single combat and loses the challenge when God strengthens the boy David for the task (1 Sam 17; see Battle Stories). When Abraham undertakes a delicate negotiation with God over the fate of Sodom, he subjects himself to a latent dare, inasmuch as he does not know how many “righteous” there are in Sodom (Gen 18:22–33). As Jesus hangs on the cross, his tormentors dare him to come down from the cross (Mt 27:42; Lk 23:37).

God is sometimes the one to present the challenge. In Malachi 3:10 God issues a challenge regarding the tithe: “Bring the full tithes into the storehouse; ... and thereby put me to the test, says the Lord of hosts, if I will not open the windows of heaven for you and pour down for you an overflowing blessing” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] incident of the woman caught in adultery accused by the scribes and Pharisees, Jesus dares anyone who is without sin to cast the first stone (Jn 8:1–11).

See also Vow, Oath.

BETHLEHEM

The Bethlehem in Zebulun (Josh 19:15), the home of the judge Ibzan (Judg 12:8, 10), is not an important place in the Bible; but the Bethlehem in Judah (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Judg 17:7), just a few miles south-southwest of Jerusalem, is remembered for several reasons. According to Genesis 35:16–20 and 48:7, Rachel was buried near there. Thus Matthew 2:17–18 can associate Jeremiah 31:15 (“A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation and bitter weeping, Rachel weeping for her children; she refused to be consoled, because they were no more” [RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]) with Herod’s slaughter of the infants even though Jeremiah 31:15 names not Bethlehem but Ramah (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 10:2).

Tragedy is linked to the small village in Judges 19, where a concubine from Bethlehem is ravished by Benjaminites until dead—a deed that leads Israel to war with Benjamin. Much later, Ezra 2:21 and Nehemiah 7:26 refer to Bethlehemites returning from the Babylonian captivity, and Jeremiah 41:17 mentions Israelites who stay near Bethlehem when they flee from the Babylonian king to Egypt.

If Bethlehem is regularly a setting for tragedy and sadness, it is equally the city of David the king, “the village where David was” (Jn 7:42; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 17:12, 58). David herds sheep outside Bethlehem (1 Sam 17:15). There he has dealings with a Philistine garrison (1 Chron 11:15–19). And there Samuel anoints him king (1 Sam 16:1–13). Because of David’s descent from Ruth and Boaz, the setting in Bethlehem of the story of Ruth is emphasized (Ruth 1:1–2). Bethlehem literally means “house of bread,” and the grain fields so prominent in Ruth reinforce the aptness of this title. Furthermore, David’s association with Bethlehem illumines the prophecy of Micah 5:2, which looks forward to a Davidic ruler from Bethlehem (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 7:42).

In Matthew and Luke the tragic and royal associations of Bethlehem meet as the messianic Son of David, in accordance with Micah 5:2, is born in Bethlehem (Mt 2:1–6; Lk 2:4). His birth, however, is met by hostility: Herod orders the slaughter of all the male children in Bethlehem two years and under. Again Bethlehem witnesses death.

If Micah 5:2 makes Bethlehem “little among the clans of Judah,” in Matthew 2:6 this text is quoted as affirming that Bethlehem is “by no means least among the rulers of Judah.” Whether or not Matthew’s line attests a textual variant, the change can only mean that by coming into the world at Bethlehem, the Messiah has brought the city greatness. Here as elsewhere, the last becomes first.

See also Benjamin; David.

BETRAY, BETRAYAL

Betrayal is the stuff of which dramas are made. The Bible has its share of such stories, including Delilah's betrayal of Samson's secret (Judg 16) and Judas's betrayal of Jesus (Mt 26:48–50). Such actions are not given simple pejorative labels, however, as they might have been in modern media. Rather, the writers use expressive words, which can have a variety of positive and negative meanings, to evoke the true nature of the dark deeds.

The chief OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image of betrayal is wrongful exposure of what should remain hidden (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] gālâ). Thus the gossip who “betrays a confidence” (Prov 20:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) is literally “revealing” the information wrongly. However, God rightly reveals (gālâ) his secrets to the prophets (Amos 3:7). The same word also describes unlawful sexual relations (Lev 18:6, literally “to uncover” nakedness), suggesting that any wrongful exposure of private matters strikes at the very root of a person's identity. Thus tabloid journalism exposés of private lives would qualify as betrayal in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] terms. So too would character assassination by gossips, whom wise people avoid (Prov 20:19). By contrast, when David's adultery was exposed, it was by private challenge from a prophet, not by public headlining (1 Sam 12).

A secondary OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image of betrayal is that of deceit, especially “breaking faith” with God or another person (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] bāgād); that is, disloyalty. This is a powerful image in a culture that prized close solidarity and trust. Jeremiah's bitterness stems partly from the fact that his own family has betrayed him (Jer 12:6) in just the same way as the nation has been unfaithful to God by acting like an adulterous spouse (Hos 5:7). Betrayal in this sense rips relationships apart and cuts the threads that hold a community together.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] image of betrayal, mostly restricted to the actions of Judas, is quite different. It is that of “handing over” one person to another (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] paradidōmi), as in Pilate’s quasilegal handing over of Jesus to the executioners (Mt 27:26). Judas Iscariot, dubbed “the betrayer” in most versions, in the Greek is literally “the one who handed [Jesus] over.”

This puts his action firmly in the realm of human power play, whatever his motives were. For one awesome moment in history, Judas the mortal had Christ the eternal in his power. Judas could force Jesus to conform to his own confused plans. He played God and became the archetype of all who exert their wills over others.

By extension, Judas was therefore betraying much more than Jesus’ whereabouts (Lk 22:3–6) or even his friendship and trust (Jn 13:26–30). He was also betraying the basic principles of Christian conduct: denial of self-will, trust in God’s providence, and love for others that refuses to manipulate them. Far from enabling Christians to explain away Judas’s act as pure greed or satanic inspiration, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] forces them to regard as betrayal any self-willed use of power against another, whether it be physical, litigious, emotional or spiritual. Like the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] “uncovering,” such acts betray a person’s essential humanity, identity and freedom. And yet Judas’s betrayal is itself caught up into God’s transcendent plan, so that the words of Joseph to his brothers are strangely recalled: “You meant evil against me; but God meant it for good” (Gen 50:20).

See also Deception, Stories of.

BIBLE

In considering the Bible as a whole, two aspects are relevant: images about the Bible, including how the Bible pictures itself, and unifying motifs in the Bible as a whole.

Images of the Bible. The most prevalent image by which biblical writers refer to the collection of words that became our Bible is word. The Bible is “the word,” specifically the Word of God. The implication is that the Bible exists through the medium of language, whether oral or written. It is further implied that this word is a communication, inasmuch as the purpose of words is to convey meaning to the understanding of the listener or reader. Finally, to speak of the Bible as the Word of God (as the Bible itself does repeatedly) is to imply that the Bible carries authority for a person’s life because of the authority of its human authors as spokespersons of God and because of the authority of the ultimate author, God himself.

Another common term for the Bible is Scripture or scriptures, used in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] only (and there fifty times). The word scripture is a generic term referring to something that is written. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] counterparts to this NT [NT NT. New Testament] designation are the words book and scroll, used several dozen times to call attention to the physical form in which the biblical writings were preserved and handed on.

A common OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image for the Bible is law, on the premise that the first parts of the Bible that were recorded were the Pentateuch, much of which is devoted to delineating the Mosaic law. Thus when the psalmist says that the godly person meditates day and night on God’s law (Ps 1:2), he speaks of the equivalent of our Bible. So too in Psalm 119, where the assertions made about God’s law (and its synonyms) are equally true of the entire Bible. To speak of the Bible as the law also points to the Bible as containing God’s guidelines for living, which people are under obligation to obey.

Additional terms that we commonly use for the Bible, even though they do not appear within the Bible, are nonetheless helpful images for naming features that the Bible possesses and claims for itself. The word Bible, based on the Latin biblia, means “little books,” calling attention to the fact that the Bible is an anthology of collected writings, written by numerous authors over many centuries and encompassing the usual range of genres and styles that we expect in an anthology. The word canon means “standard” or “rule” (literally “reed” or “measuring rod”) and denotes the status of the Bible as an authoritative and inspired book, unlike other books. When Peter refers to “the other scriptures” (2 Pet 3:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), we can infer the existence in his day of a canonical standard for some parts of the Bible. In a secondary way too, these canonical writings are a standard for belief and conduct—God’s expectations for what people should believe and his moral prescriptions for life.

The designations Old Testament and New Testament are postbiblical, but they too are true to the spirit of the Bible. Literally, a testament is a will, but when applied to the two parts of the Bible, the term is synonymous with covenant. Inherent in the terms old and new is the idea of both change and continuity. The old covenant points forward to something beyond itself; the new covenant is the fulfillment of the old. Together these two comprise an organic whole; neither can be fully understood by itself. Many formulas have been suggested as further ways of understanding the relationship between the two Testaments. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] reveals what is concealed in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] tells us what Christ is; the NT [NT NT. New Testament] shows us who he is.

Two additional images for the Bible may be noted. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] refers to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (or parts of it) as “oracles” from God (Acts 7:38; Rom 3:2), thereby designating the Bible as a direct pronouncement from God and a message to be heeded as divinely inspired. Parts of the Bible are also designated as a “revelation” from God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rom 16:26; Eph 3:5), implying that the Bible is something that had to be revealed from God, as being something beyond human origin or attainment.

How the Bible Pictures Itself. With the foregoing terms as a backdrop, it is obvious that the Bible’s comment on itself is a major biblical motif. Even when such self-designations refer to only a part of the Bible, their meaning can be extended to the Bible as a whole when they accurately apply.

Some of the Bible’s self-designations refer to its special status as God’s revelation. Here we find references to “the sacred writings” (2 Tim 3:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), to the Bible as a “prophecy” that did not come “by the impulse of man” but as a result of authors being carried along by the Holy Spirit as they “spoke from God” (2 Pet 1:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and to the fact that the Bible is “not ... the word of men but ... the word of God” (1 Thess 2:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Other passages paint a picture of the qualities of the Bible, which is variously a lamp to illuminate a person’s pathway (Ps 119:105), “a lamp shining in a dark place” (2 Pet 1:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), something so durable that it “abides for ever” (1 Pet 1:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), something that “is living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword” (Heb 4:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), something that warns a person (Ps 19:11), something essential to life (Mt 4:4), a mirror in which a person can see himself or herself (Jas 1:22—25). One of the rare biblical writers to state his method of composition calls attention to the selfconscious artistry evident in the Bible: “Besides being wise, the Preacher also taught the people knowledge, weighing and studying and arranging proverbs with great care. The Preacher sought to find pleasing words, and uprightly he wrote words of truth” (Eccles 12:9—10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 1:1—4).

Other passages give a many-sided picture of how people should use this Word from God: they should meditate on it (Ps 1:2 and numerous passages), be instructed by it for salvation (1 Tim 3:15), obey it (Lk 11:28), continue in it (Jn 8:31), keep it (2 Chron 34:21; Ps 119:67; Jn 14:23), hear it (Jer 31:10; Eph 1:13), receive it (1 Thess 2:13), read it (Mt 21:42; 2 Cor 3:15), dwell in it (Eph 3:17), believe it (Jn 2:22), search it (Jn 5:39), praise it (Acts 13:48) and hide it within their hearts (Ps 119:11 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). The Word is also something that abides in believers (Jn 5:38; 1 Jn 2:14), that goes forth (Is 2:3; 55:11) and that is implanted in those who believe it (Jas 1:21). We read dozens of times that the word of the Lord came to someone (especially prophets). As so often with biblical images and motifs, the image of the Word comes to focus on Christ, who is the eternal Word of God (Jn 1:1) that “became flesh” (Jn 1:14).

Unifying Themes in the Bible. The main subjects covered in the Bible are the nature of God and the nature of people. Dominating everything else is the character of God, a topic that underlies more passages of the Bible than any other concern. The Bible mainly answers the question of what God is like by narrating what he has done, but not to the exclusion of direct statements about God’s character. The theme of God’s self-revelation is so pervasive that nearly every page of the Bible will provide an answer to the question of what God is like.

Balancing this preoccupation is the nature of people. Repeated themes under that rubric include the significance of the individual, the importance of the individual's relationship to God and society, the dual nature of people (who are both physical and moral/spiritual beings), moral responsibility, and the human capacity to make moral and spiritual choices.

Usually the twin topics of God and people appear together, resulting in the motif of the divine-human relationship. The Bible explores people's inescapable connections with God and God's unrelenting interest in what people do. The most customary biblical way of portraying this relationship is the covenant motif. Throughout the Bible it is clear that people cannot be considered apart from their relationship to God and further that this relationship has been disrupted by sin and is in need of repair.

The problem of evil and the suffering that it causes are likewise major themes of the Bible. The authentic note of human suffering is pervasive. Some of this suffering is simply the result of the fall of the human race and the cosmos from original innocence. Some of it is the result of self-destructive evil that individuals bring on themselves; some of it is inflicted by other people and even by groups or nations.

The acts of God are another major motif of the Bible. The acts of God fall mainly into the categories of creation and providence, redemption or salvation, and judgment. The actions of people accompany this history of God's acts. Human actions fall into a dual pattern of good and evil, virtue and vice, as the Bible presents models of virtue for the reader to emulate and examples of vice to avoid. If we combine the divine and human stories that make up the Bible, we find an overarching narrative consisting of the following sequence: creation, fall, covenant (the promises of God to the patriarchs and the nation of Israel), exodus (including the revelation at Mt. Sinai and the conquest of Canaan), Israelite monarchy, exile and return, the life and teaching of Jesus, salvation, the beginnings of the Christian church and the consummation of history.

A unity of faith emerges from the foregoing content of the Bible. The Bible is an organic whole, based partly on the premise that the NT [NT NT. New Testament] fulfills what is foreshadowed in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

Throughout the Bible the same God is portrayed. The view of people is constant. The big ideas of the Bible are present throughout—God, human nature, creation, providence, good and evil, salvation, eschatology.

Narrative Unity in the Bible. In addition to being unified by a system of ideas, the Bible is unified by its overarching narrative. The Bible as a whole tells a story. It is a series of events having a beginning, a middle and an end (Aristotle's definition of plot). The shape of the Bible as a whole confirms this: it begins with the creation of all things, it takes a plunge into evil (Gen 3), it meanders through fallen human history, and it winds its way slowly and painfully back to the consummation of history, with the final defeat of evil and triumph of good. This is obviously the archetypal U-shaped comic plot (see Comedy as Plot Motif).

A central plot conflict between good and evil organizes the story. A host of details makes up the system of conflicts: God versus Satan, God versus sinful humanity, good people versus evil people, inner human impulses toward good and evil within the same person. Almost every story, poem and proverb in the Bible fits into this ongoing plot conflict between good and evil. Every human act or attitude shows people engaged in some movement, whether slight or momentous, toward or away from God in this story of the soul's choice.

Related to the plot conflict is the necessity of choice on the part of people. Every area of life is claimed by God and counterclaimed by forces of evil. There is no neutral ground. Every human event shows an allegiance to God or rebellion against him. People are always at the crossroads in this momentous story. The Bible is a series of great moral and spiritual dilemmas and choices made by people who are morally responsible. The crucial action, moreover, consists of an individual's or nation's response to external situations. Outside circumstances do not coerce people to choose as they do; these circumstances only provide the occasion for human choice.

In the master story that unifies the Bible as a whole, God is the chief actor, the protagonist. Not even the most seemingly insignificant human actions can be understood apart from the characterization of God. God's unfolding purposes in history are the "meta-narrative" of the Bible, which is often called "salvation history." This history focuses on God's great plan to save people from their sin and its eternal consequences. Human history in the Bible unfolds within the providential framework of God's acts of redemption and judgment, as God deals with evil in the universe.

Summary. For all its diversity the Bible is a unified book. The terms by which we call it, as well as the Bible's comments on itself, call attention to the Bible as a single book and as a sacred book that makes a claim on our beliefs and lives in a way that no other book does. A unified system of beliefs lends further unity to this book, as does the overriding story that it tells.

BINARY PATTERNS.

See Rhetorical Patterns.

BIND, BOUND

With well over a hundred occurrences the imagery of binding pervades the Bible. Many of the images of literal, physical binding keep us rooted in the real world of Bible times. Sheaves of grain are bound (Gen 37:7; Ps 129:7), donkeys are bound to stationary points like a vine (Gen 49:11), a waistcloth is bound (Job 12:18), and carpets are bound with cords (Ezek 27:24). Here we are simply in touch with the physical realities of the ancient world.

The imagery of binding can also have a legal or contractual force of obligation. Thus a servant is “bound or hired” (Ex 12:45; Lev 22:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), laborers are bound (Lev 25:6, 40), a person who makes a vow is bound to keep it (Num 30:4–13), a person who gives a pledge to a neighbor is bound to another (Prov 6:1), and spouses are bound to each other (1 Cor 7:27, 39). The essential idea is that of being joined to a person by contractual means. By metaphoric extension, binding becomes an image for other types of joining, as when love binds other virtues together in perfect harmony (Col 3:14) or Jerusalem is declared to be “a city that is bound firmly together” (Ps 122:3) or folly is said to be “bound up in the heart of a child” (Prov 22:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The most graphic cluster of images concerns the physical subduing of someone by force, usually (though not always) in military contexts. Abraham bound Isaac before placing him on the altar (Gen 22:9). Not surprisingly the vocabulary of binding appears a dozen times in the story of Samson. Kings carried into exile are bound (2 Chron 25:7; 33:11; 36:6; Nahum 3:10). The three friends of Daniel are bound before being thrown into the furnace (Dan 3:23). The imagery of binding permeates the story of the passion of Christ, as well as the missionary career of Paul.

A further cluster focuses on the binding of wounds, where a majority of the references describe what God does metaphorically in his compassion for the human race (Ps 147:3; Is 30:26; 61:1; Ezek 34:4, 16).

The most mysterious and overtly theological references are Jesus' use of the imagery of binding to show the efficacy of earthly decisions in spiritual matters in the heavenly realm. In giving the metaphoric "keys of the kingdom" to Peter, Jesus claimed that "whatever you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven" (Mt 16:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus used the same formula in his discourse outlining the process to be followed in disputes among believers (Mt 18:18).

Binding also appears in eschatological contexts. In one of Jesus' parables, the wedding guest without a suitable garment is bound hand and foot and thrown into outer darkness (Mt 22:13). At the advent of the millennium the dragon (Satan) is bound in chains and cast into a pit (Rev 20:1–3).

See also Loose, Loosing.

BIRDS

A cursory comparison of almost any mention of specific birds in English translations of the Scriptures, especially of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , will convince the reader that identifying individual species with Hebrew names is not an exact science (see Holmgren's tabulation of various English equivalents for Hebrew bird names). This problem stems from several causes: (1) Hebrew bird names are often onomatopoetic (see Driver), frustrating classification. Who could identify accurately which bird is labeled “chirper” or “twitterer” by such a generic description? (2) Names often describe some habit of the animal. Unfortunately some rather different animals may exhibit similar habits. For example, the tinšemet (which may mean “hisser”) is both an unclean bird (Lev 11:18) and a lizard (Lev 11:30). (3) Some names occur seldom and/or in lists with few contextual clues as guides (Lev 11; Deut 14). (4) At times names that appear in corrupted portions of the text and the versions (LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament) , Vulgate, etc.) provide nebulous or conflicting testimony, suggesting confusion even in antiquity.

Taxonomy and Myth. Fortunately taxonomy is not the goal, nor is it essential to the imagery evoked by the mention of birds. The context often provides hints regarding (or even direct mention of) the mythology associated with a bird, although its specific identity may remain open to debate. These clues usually narrow the type of bird sufficiently for translation and interpretation even without a secure identification of the species.

The author’s reference to the habits or mythology surrounding a creature is a shortcut, a parabolic and oversimplified but useful means of conjuring in the hearers’ minds the qualities associated with a particular animal. The scientific accuracy of the caricature is in no way germane. For example, the cruelty of the ostrich (Lam 4:3) or its greedy witlessness (Job 39:13–18), perhaps motivated by misunderstood habits, derive their meaning from the Hebrew cultural mythology of the ostrich and so serve the author’s illustrative purpose regardless of the actual natural history of the bird. The Hebrew name for the ostrich, literally “violent one,” reflected and perpetuated negative opinions about the bird. In short, ancient views of animals and birds differ fundamentally from our own. It is unquestionably their view that must inform the text and interpret its imagery.

By and large the similes constructed around birds refer to their characteristic habits. The habits of birds group them into types, which naturally serve as metaphors.

Unclean Birds. Myth, folklore and superstition dominated peoples' thinking about animals in a world lit only by fire. Nocturnal creatures were spirits on errands of evil in a dark realm where human perception failed. Animals or birds that cried out at night were in collusion with sinister forces. Night or day, creatures that hissed or spit proved that they contained evil spirits or were poisonous and were to be avoided. Birds that frequented ruins (which marked places obviously cursed) betrayed their association with dark supernatural forces (Is 13:20—22; 34:11—14; Zeph 2:13—15; Rev 18:2).

Objectionable habits also contribute. Eating corpses not only made buzzards, vultures and such birds unclean but also linked them symbolically (and perhaps even in belief) with the realm of the dead, identifying them as agents of the supernatural. To make one's grave in a vulture's gut indicated abandonment by one's fellows and one's deity (2 Sam 21:10; Jer 7:33). With this in mind, Goliath incorporated in his taunt the threat to give David's flesh to the birds of the air (1 Sam 17:44). As the expected aftermath of war, vultures pick over the stripped corpses of the fallen (Job 39:30; Mt 24:28; Lk 17:37; Rev 19:17, 21). The plainly ruthless ways of the eagle resemble those of invading armies (Jer 49:22). The "eagle that hastens to eat" symbolizes swift carnage of war (Deut 28:49; Jer 4:12; Hab 1:8). Just as armies, famines, plagues and beasts were agents of divine punishment, so too were birds of prey (Jer 12:9). They even served as ominous signs of impending judgment (Hos 8:1).

Proverbs links an ignominious death with sins in life by vivid description of bird behavior: “The eye that mocks a father and scorns to obey a mother will be picked out by the ravens of the valley and eaten by the vultures” (Prov 30:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Birds as Food. Birds represented food, easily kept alive and fresh. Both Solomon and Nehemiah list birds among the provisions of their tables (1 Kings 4:23; Neh 5:18). That the lists in Leviticus 11 and Deuteronomy 14 contain forbidden birds implies the existence of many more edible birds. The enumeration of young birds among sacrifices testifies to their edibility, for what is acceptable to God is licit for his people (Gen 15:9; 9 times in Leviticus). If birds were a poor person’s sacrifice (Lev 12:8; Lk 2:24), they were also a poor person’s meat, selling at “two sparrows for a farthing” (Mt 10:29–31) or “five for two farthings” (Lk 12:6–7). The depletion of bird populations from egg and nest robbing required limitations as part of the mandated stewardship of creation (Deut 22:6).

Birds as Quarry. Everyday encounters with birds, torn from their natural place and used for trade and food, familiarized the image of birds as victims. David laments that Saul pursues him “like one who hunts partridge in the mountains,” deliberately comparing himself to a common quarry, but especially to the kind of bird that prefers to escape by running rather than by flying (1 Sam 26:20). The ancients seem to have invested much time, energy and ingenuity in capturing birds (see Hunting). The great medley of Hebrew words for net, snare, gin, trap, toils, terrors and so forth exhausts the range of English synonyms (Job 18:8–9) and points to an elaborate industry with a wide variety of methods. Some methods of capture employed stealth, for “in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird” (Prov 1:17). Others used hostage birds to lure their own kind (Sirach 11:30).

The sinister overtones of the “snare of the fowler” resonate even in the modern imagination (Ps 91:4). Some birds must have been easily duped, hence the simple person rushes headlong as a bird into a snare (Prov 7:23). Even so, the devices sometimes failed, allowing the psalmist to say, “Our soul has escaped like a bird out of the snare” (Ps 124:7 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). In stark contrast to human frustrations at controlling birds, when Daniel suggests that God has given the birds of the air into Nebuchadnezzar’s hand, he engages in hyperbole or hints that the king has usurped divine prerogatives (Dan 2:38).

Birds as Symbols of Escape and Safety. Familiarity with the ability of birds to escape shows itself in the many references to their flight as well as in religious symbolism. The impurity of a “leprous” house is cleansed by the death of one bird and carried away (symbolically or magically) by a second bird released alive (Lev 14:52–53, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 16:22). The psalmist asserts that God is inescapable even “if I take the wings of the morning” (Ps 139:9). He wishes that he had “wings like a dove, for then I would fly away and be at rest.” (Ps 55:6). The poet also wonders if his soul should “flee like a bird” (Ps 11:1). The metaphor of soul or spirit as a bird, common in ancient literature and art, finds its culmination in the Holy Spirit descending as a dove (Mt 3:16; Mk 1:10; Lk 3:22; Jn 1:32).

The enviable flying ability of birds and the constancy of their day-to-day foraging, “neither sowing nor reaping,” have long suggested an idyllic, worry-free existence (Lk 12:24). With minds unencumbered by the modern mechanistic view of nature, the biblical authors repeatedly invoke the trust of birds in the daily bread supplied by Providence as an example of piety (Ps 147:9; Job 38:41). God, who regularly provides birds with food, can, in an ironic twist, use birds to provision humans (1 Kings 17:4).

The obvious parallels between bird nests and human houses resulted in still more analogies to God's provision. Sparrows and swallows, with exemplary wisdom, built their nests in the Lord's house and sought the protection of his altar (Ps 84:3). Other birds, such as the stork, find safety high in the fir trees (Ps 104:17). God's reward for this trust and simple faith appears in the fact that all birds have nests, but not all humans have homes (Lk 9:58). Conspicuous, yet inaccessible, nests stand as symbols of heaven-ordained security (Song 2:14; Jer 48:28). Nations trust in their mountain strongholds just as nesting eagles do, but their aerie is not inaccessible to the Lord (Jer 49:16; Obad 1:4).

Wings as Shelter. While wings suggest swiftness (2 Sam 1:23) or soaring strength (Is 40:31; Obad 1:4), they also recall the protective parenting habits of birds (Ex 19:4; Deut 32:11). Jesus mixes the image of tender care under sheltering wings with the implied rebuke at those "dumb clucks" who would shun safety, repeating the prophetic theme of people as the least obedient of God's creatures (Mt 23:37; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 8:7). The wings of God offer divine protection (Ps 17:8; 36:7; 57:1; 61:4; 63:7; 91:4; Ruth 2:12), even healing (Mal 4:2). In contrast to the comfort provided by God's wings, malevolent spirits (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] rûah, rendered "wind" in many translations) were often pictured with wings and could use them to oppress those seduced into idol worship (Hos 4:19).

Rhythms of Bird Life as Faithfulness and Trust. Birds served as an obvious indicator of the seasonal cycles, rhythms to which the ancients tuned their lives. The geography of the Middle East funnels all migratory birds from Europe and Asia, raptors and song birds alike, through Palestine on their way to winter in Africa. This twice yearly event, impressive even now, was undoubtedly more so in antiquity. Any witness to such a spectacle saw the hand of Providence orchestrating the relocation of a vast portion of creation to “dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea” (Ps 139:9). In response to the wonder of migration, William Cullen Bryant penned the words “There is a Power whose care teaches thy way along that pathless coast” (“To a Waterfowl”). The Lord asks Job, “Does the hawk fly by thy wisdom?” (Job 39:26). For Jeremiah the obedience of nature served as a reprimand to recalcitrant humanity. “Even the stork in the heavens knows her times; and the turtledove, swallow, and crane keep the time of their coming; but my people know not the ordinance of the Lord” (Jer 8:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In addition to seasonal activity, the daily habits of birds governed those of people. Jesus’ allusion to the “cock’s crow” may refer to a watch of the night so named (esp. [esp. esp.. especially] Mk 13:35, but also Mt 26:34; Mk 14:30; Lk 22:34; Jn 13:38; Pliny, Nat. Hist., IX.46). The preacher observes that the elderly wake early, accompanied by the predawn twittering of birds: “And the doors shall be shut in the streets, when the sound of the grinding is low, and he shall rise up at the voice of the bird” (Eccles 12:4 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

Birds as Moral Examples for Humans. The universal tendency toward anthropomorphic interpretations of bird behavior generates many images. The dove earns its amorous reputation from its soft voice and its habit of continually renewing its pair bond. No wonder it is mentioned six times in Song of Songs (1:15; 2:14; 4:1; 5:2, 12; 6:9). The sparrow, known for its gregarious habits, is unnatural and out of place when alone, a symbol of isolation and loneliness (Ps 102:7). Other solitary birds, like the pelican (qe’ât) and the owl, also evoke barren, desolate and forsaken pictures. The cries of several birds (probably owls [benôt ya^anâ], Mic 1:8; swift [šûs], crane [âgûr] or dove [yônâ], Is 38:14) strike the human ear as mournful. The Hebrew word for dove, the same as the name of the prophet Jonah, may mean “mourner” as an integral part of his story.

Some bird behaviors lend themselves directly to moral lessons. The ceaseless unresting flight of the swallow is likened to a curse that cannot alight on its undeserving target (Pr 26:2). Ephraim is likened to a dove, “easily deceived and senseless” (Hos 7:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The supposed exemplary family life of the stork earned it the designation “pious” (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] h^asidâh, Jer 8:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the Latin pietaticultrix). (In Aesop’s fable The Stork and the Farmer, the stork argues that he should be set free because he cares for his parents in their old age. Cf. Pliny, Nat. Hist., X.63.)

Still other behaviors were deemed so strange as to be unnatural, and yet the proper simile restores the right perspective. The seeming indifference of the ostrich to its young, although ordained by God and compensated with speed (Job 39:13–18) is not an acceptable model for human parenting (Lam 4:3). One who unlawfully collects possessions and wealth is like the partridge who raises chicks she did not hatch; in the end they will be gone (Jer 17:11). (The opinion that partridges raise the chicks of others probably stems from the occasional practice of some pairs which lay a second clutch before the first has hatched and combine them after hatching. The older chicks which became independent sooner were not believed to be the pair’s own.)

Birds as Beautiful. The beauty of birds has been a universal source of their attraction. Solomon undoubtedly collected peacocks for their exotic beauty (1 Kings 10:22; 2 Chron 9:21). The psalmist evokes the delicate, shimmering beauty of a bird’s wing in Psalm 68:13, and a woman admires her lover’s raven-black hair in Song of Songs 5:11.

See also Animals; Dove; Eagle; Hunting; Wing.

Bibliography. G. S. Cansdale, All the Animals of the Bible Land (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970); G. R. Driver, "Birds in the Old Testament," Palestine Exploration Quarterly (1955) 5—20; 129—140; P. Farb, The Land, Wildlife and Peoples of the Bible (New York: Harper & Row, 1976); V. C. Holmgren, Bird Walk Through the Bible (New York: Seabury, 1972); A. Parmelee, All the Birds of the Bible (London: Lutterworth, 1960).

BIRTH

A number of images are woven around the natural and supernatural events of birth in the Bible. In narrative, birth stories often emphasize the fact that the great saviors of Israel are gifts from God. The births of Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Samson, and Samuel involve either the opening of a closed womb or the overcoming of a threat, showing that these individuals, who continue the promised line or provide rescue for the people of God, are not the result of human efforts, but of divine initiative. Of course Jesus' birth from a virgin womb is the ultimate supernatural gift, showing that this Savior of saviors is from God, not the result of natural procreation.

Birth imagery is also employed in both the Old and New Testaments to interpret the relationship between God and his people. Moses, in his song to the assembly of Israel, declares that the nation has behaved unnaturally: "You deserted the Rock, who fathered you; you forgot the God who gave you birth" (Deut 32:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The psalmist celebrates that "glorious things are said of you, O city of God: I will record Rahab and Babylon among those who acknowledge me—Philistia too, and Tyre, along with Cush—and will say, 'This one was born in Zion'" (Ps 87:3). In other words those who acknowledge God are considered to have been born in Zion, the city of God.

Salvation. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] birth is used more explicitly as a salvation image. For example, John wrote in the prologue to his Gospel, “Yet to all who received him [Jesus], to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God—children born not of natural descent, nor of human decision or a husband’s will, but born of God” (Jn 1:12–13). Jesus explained to Nicodemus, “Flesh gives birth to flesh, but the Spirit gives birth to spirit. You should not be surprised at my saying, ‘You must be born again’ [or ‘born from above’]” (Jn 3:6–7). Jesus continued with the analogy that “the wind blows where ever it pleases. You hear its sound, but you cannot tell where it comes from or where it is going. So, it is with everyone born of the Spirit” (Jn 3:8). Spiritual birth, like the wind, cannot be controlled by human action; but the effects of radical inner renewal can be clearly seen in an individual. James extends the new birth imagery by picturing those who have been born again as “a kind of firstfruits of all he created” (Jas 1:18). Believers are the firstfruits, and in the future the regeneration or renewal will extend to all things (Mt 19:28).

The antithesis of being born of God is portrayed very graphically. Isaiah remonstrates with those who “conceive trouble and give birth to evil. They hatch the eggs of vipers” (Is 59:4–5). The psalmist grieves that “he who is pregnant with evil and conceives trouble gives birth to disillusionment” (Ps 7:14). “Sin,” wrote James, “gives birth to death” (Jas 1:15).

Suffering and Deliverance. In sentencing Adam and Eve after their act of rebellion, God said to the woman, “I will greatly increase your pains in childbearing; with pain you will give birth to children” (Gen 3:16). From this time on, pain in childbirth is inevitable and inescapable. The powerful image of the anguished woman giving birth recurs in the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah (Is 21:2—3; 26:16—21; 66:7—14; Jer 13:21; 22:23; 30:6; 49:24; 50:43). Both prophets liken the pangs of the nations, confronted with God's judgment, to the terror and pain that grips a woman in childbirth. Isaiah's prophecy against Babylon predicts, "Terror will seize them, pain and anguish will grip them; they will writhe like a woman in labor" (Is 13:8). Jeremiah, announcing the disaster that is to fall on Israel records, "I hear a cry as of a woman in labor, a groan as of one bearing her first child—the cry of the Daughter of Zion gasping for breath, stretching out her hands and saying, 'Alas! I am fainting; my life is given over to murderers'" (Jer 4:31).

Sometimes the image of the woman suffering intensely in childbirth is juxtaposed with the promise of deliverance. Isaiah combines the figure of the woman Israel, in great distress before the Lord, with the promise of resurrection and Israel's deliverance: "But your dead will live; their bodies will rise ... the earth will give birth to her dead" (Is 26:16—19). God's impatience to deliver his people is likened to the impatience of a woman to be delivered of a child (Is 42:14).

The image of travail is also applied to the whole creation, which "has been groaning as in the pains of childbirth" as it waits to be "liberated from its bondage to decay" (Rom 8:21—22). The sudden, unexpected and unavoidable onset of labor is a vivid eschatological image: "Destruction will come on them suddenly, as labor pains on a pregnant woman, and they will not escape" (1 Thess 5:2—3). Prior to his ascension, as he is about to leave the disciples, Jesus uses the image of the woman giving birth to teach them about his final return. He illustrates the way anguish and suffering may be dramatically forgotten and turned to joy: "A woman giving birth to a child has pain because her time has come; but when her baby is born she forgets the anguish because of her joy that a child is born into the world. So with you. Now is your time of grief, but I will see you again and you will rejoice, and no one will take away your joy” (Jn 16:21–22).

See also Baby; Barrenness; Birth Story; Birthright; Child, Children; Woman, Images of; Womb.

BIRTH STORY

Birth is the earliest miracle of human life. At the creation, Adam and Eve were commanded to be fruitful and multiply (Gen 1:28). Throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the birth of babies is an important element in the story of God’s work in history. Such passages as the lists of “begats” in Genesis and Chronicles and the promise to Abraham of the blessing on his “seed”* point to the importance of human fertility. In early history, before the physical facts of birth such as fertilization and gestation were fully understood, birth was seen as a miracle, a blessing from God. This spirit is heightened in the birth stories of the Bible.

Given the importance of birth in the Bible, it is not surprising that the birth story is an identifiable narrative genre in the Bible. In general, birth stories are reserved for extraordinary rather than routine births, which are briefly chronicled instead of receiving a full-fledged birth story. The more extended biblical birth narratives tend loosely to follow a general pattern:

1. A barren wife or couple desire a child.
2. An angel appears to announce the promise of a son.
3. The birth occurs, accompanied by miracles or extraordinary events.

4. Hostile forces threaten the newborn baby.
5. God protects the child so that he or she may grow to maturity.
6. The grown person becomes a hero, saint or savior.

Of course not every ingredient is present in every birth story.

The first full-fledged birth story in the Bible is that of Abraham's child of promise, Isaac (Gen 12–21:7). Its most salient features are the repeated promise of God that he would give Abraham and Sarah a son after their childbearing years were over and the status of Isaac as part of the fulfillment of a covenant promise. The birth of Moses, future deliverer of a nation, appropriately focuses on the rescue of the infant from what appears to be certain death (Ex 2:1–10; see Ark). Samson's birth (Judg 13) occurs to a barren mother, is accompanied by a double annunciation from an angel and produces a Nazirite from birth. Samuel is born to a barren mother in answer to her prayer (2 Sam 1–2), and the special features of his birth include his dedication to God's service from childhood and the song of Hannah praising God for his blessing to an outcast. The genre of the birth story continues in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] with the birth of John the Baptist (Lk 1), whose birth is foretold to the husband of a barren wife and is accompanied by the song of his father, Zechariah.

Underlying these birth stories of the Bible is an incremental principle, with the whole series moving toward its ultimate example in the birth of Jesus. The nativity of the Messiah is the most elaborate birth story in the Bible (Mt 1–2 and Lk 1–2). Highlights include the annunciation, the song of Mary (known as the Magnificat and closely resembling the song of Hannah), conception by the Holy Spirit, a virgin birth and the nativity itself, which is accompanied by such miracles as the angelic chorus, the songs of Anna and Simeon, providential guidance of the adoring wisemen, and the warning vision resulting in the flight into Egypt. A visionary account of this birth story can be found in Revelation 12:1–6, where a woman in travail (Israel) gives birth to a son who is to rule all nations (Christ), who thwarts the dragon's (Satan's) attempt to destroy him by ascending into heaven as mother and child are miraculously protected by God.

We can also find a metaphoric birth story in the Bible. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , Israel as a spiritual entity is portrayed as the child of a woman in travail (Is 26:17–18; 66:5–14). God had from the beginning predicted that he would father such a child, starting as early as God's promise to Eve in the Garden (Gen 3:16) and continuing in the patriarchal promises to establish a "seed" that would become a nation. Israel's coming into being was accompanied by miracles at every turn, most notably during the exodus from Egypt.

The biblical use of birth narratives moves from the physical need for continuity to the spiritual need for renewal. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , with its host of genealogies, emphasizes the physical lineage, combined with the sense of Israel's being a covenant people. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] focuses on the new covenant, an expansion of the concepts of family and birth. The family is transformed into a spiritual community of those who follow Christ. Birth is now the new birth of the true believer, as in Jesus' comment about being "born anew" by the Spirit (Jn 3:6–7). When a woman cried out to Christ, "Blessed is the womb that bore you," Jesus responded, "Blessed rather are those who hear the word of God and keep it" (Lk 11:27–28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), implying that the greatest of all birth images is the image of being born again as a child of God.

See also Barrenness; Birth; Birthright; Mary the Mother of Jesus; Virgin; Woman, Images of; Womb.

Bibliography. R. E. Brown, The Birth of the Mes-siah (Updated Ed.; New York: Doubleday, 1993).

BIRTHRIGHT

The concept of birthright is expressed in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] by the noun b^ekôr/b^ekôrâ. It is inseparably linked to the notion of “firstborn” through their common Hebrew root skr. Of the 158 occurrences of this root, only four are in a verbal form, which indicates that the nominal form is foundational for other nuances. The concept of birthright alludes to the privileges and expectations of primogeniture. The noun always occurs in the singular with the special meaning of the legal claims of the eldest son to a double portion of the inheritance and the right to bear the family’s name and other privileges.

Literal Usages. Jacob’s appropriation of Esau’s birthright is the most important illustrative use of the term (Gen 25:29–34). Jacob is thereby entitled to covenantal blessings and mediation of Abraham’s lineage under God. The blessings in context are prosperity and dominion (Gen 27:27–8, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 39–40 for Esau’s corresponding curse). Covenantal mediation entitles the firstborn to a double share of the family’s inheritance (Deut 21:15–17). Although the concept and attendant customs were common in the ancient Near East, the rank and favor of primogeniture in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is seen as more than customary and is regarded as being graciously bestowed by God. Thus in spite of Rebecca and Jacob’s respective deceptions and Esau’s godlessness (Gen 25:34), the elder son is to serve his younger brother (Gen 25:23, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 44:12—20) according to the sovereign will of the Lord (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mal 1:2—3 with Rom 9:3).

The choicest of sacrifices, firstborn and firstfruits (see First), are to be dedicated to God (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 4:4 and legal contexts such as Lev 27:26). Within a long line of sons, birthright privileges are further divided according to age and moral qualifications. Because of his incest, Reuben as eldest son is deprived of his usual rights (Gen 49:3—4). The blessings of birthright are given to his nephews, the sons of Joseph (1 Chron 5:1) as firstborn of Jacob's beloved Rachel.

Although the figure of the firstborn and his birthright is used commonly in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Chron 21:3; Jer 31:9, in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] prōtotokeia (“birthright”) appears only once in an allusion to the “godlessness” of Esau (Heb 12:16). Esau's faithlessness valued temporary relief over lasting blessings (Heb 12:17); therefore, readers should not compromise their faith to get relief from persecution, lest they forfeit blessings as joint heirs with Christ (Heb 12:1—3).

Figurative Meanings. An important use of the word firstborn in a figurative sense is Exodus 4:21—23, where the Lord calls Moses to deliver Israel, “my firstborn son,” with a warning of plague on Pharaoh's firstborn son (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 31:9 for the Lord's commitment to his collective firstborn, Ephraim). The parallel of firstborns leaves no doubt about its meaning; the “house of Jacob” is Yahweh's honored heir who has been called to be a kingdom of priests and a holy nation, establishing worship and dominion in the chosen land (Ex 19:3—6; Deut 4:5—8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Pet 2:10 for similar language regarding the church).

Israel's birthright as a young nation is contingent on the favor of the sovereign Creator, the Most High, rather than on any power of conquest, as proven by the Passover and passage through the sea. By the same token, the Lord's curse on Egypt's firstborn is celebrated as a consummate vindication of his firstborn people (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 78:51; 105:36).

The figure of nation as firstborn emerges when Israel becomes its representative son under the Father, the Davidic king, who is promised perpetual divine favor and dominion (2 Sam 7:14–17). The Davidic son, in turn, previews the ideal king in messianic prophecy who will establish the Father's rightful dominion over the earth and its kings (Ex 19:5; Ps 2; 89:20–29; 110; etc.). There is also a shift in emphasis from primogeniture to adoption of the “anointed one” (Ps 2:2; 89:20, 27), so that God's rightful claim to the earth is expressed as the inheritance of David's sons (Mt 1:1, 20; Lk 1:32–33). The supreme dominion, as noted above, is traced to his position as the anointed of the Most High Father to the exclusion of all other kings.

In the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] and the NT [NT NT. New Testament] prōtōtokos (“first-born”) is used rather than the classical prōtotókos (“bearing for the first time”). Thus preeminence and privilege are emphasized rather than birth. The singular prōtōtokos in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] always refers to Christ, whether literal (Mt 1:25; Lk. 2:7, Heb 1:6) or figurative.

NT [NT NT. New Testament] authors develop the term's imagery with reference to Christ's rule and salvific deliverance or eschatological inheritance. Christ is the “firstborn over all creation” (Col 1:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), which in context means ultimate supremacy or preeminence in everything. Inheritance is also in view in the phrase “firstborn from the dead” (Col 1:18; Rev 1:5), for in an imperial metaphor, the Lamb alone is worthy to break the seals of the scroll of creation. That is, he alone can rightfully claim the estate of creation as his inheritance (Col 1:20; Rev 5:6—7; 6:1). The breaking of the seals marks the structural progression of the Revelation from the fallen world to the new creation. In receiving creation, Christ as Lamb will also receive “his brethren” as coheirs of glorious dominion (Col 1:18; Rom 8:29—30; Heb 12:23). Nevertheless, as firstborn his “birthright” is absolute supremacy in rank.

See also Birth; Birth Story; First; Son.

BITTER.

See Gall.

BLACK

The number of actual references to black are far less than one might expect (16 times in the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Generally black is used as a descriptive color with some overtones of foreboding. However darkness, which is the absence of light, is far more associated with judgment and punishment.

The metaphoric contrast of white and black, so common in Western culture, is not prevalent in the Bible. It is only found in Matthew 5:36 where our inability to order the details of our lives is pictured by not being able to change our hair color (“you cannot make even one hair white or black”). Likewise the modern association of black = sin is not part of biblical imagery. Most frequently black simply describes an object’s color.

As a color, black describes birds (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , “the red kite, any kind of black kite” [Lev 11:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), hair color in examinations of leprosy (“it does not seem to be more than skin deep and there is no black hair in it” [Lev 13:31]) and the hair of the lover in Song of Songs (“wavy and black as a raven” [Song 5:11]). In two passages people suffering various diseases and deprivation are described as having their skin turn black. Job declared: “My skin grows black and peels” (Job 30:30). Similarly, Jeremiah describes those who remain after the destruction of Jerusalem as being “blacker than soot” (Lam 4:8). Here the connotation is the dramatic change that illness and famine brought more than a symbol of judgment.

Black is used to describe the horses pulling the northbound chariots the prophet Zechariah sees in his vision (Zech 6:2, 6). The specific colors of the horses seem to have no obvious symbolism, but are used to distinguish each of the four from the others. A black horse also appears in Revelation when the third seal of judgment is opened (Rev 6:5). In both scenes the horses are going out from the presence of the Lord into the world, symbolizing the intervention of God’s judgment in the events of history.

The horses and chariots seen in the visions of Zechariah and Revelation are implements of ancient warfare. Coming from the presence of God, they are images that form part of the biblical theme of God as the divine warrior who righteously fights and ultimately destroys sin and evil. The dominant hue of this warfare imagery throughout the Bible is blackness or darkness. In these scenes God is portrayed as a threatening presence who descends in darkness to destroy his enemies, and his judgment is symbolized by blackness.

The Bible describes God both as living in unapproachable light (1 Tim 6:16) and as dwelling in thick darkness (Ps 97:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 104:2). While the people of ancient Israel remained at a distance, Moses approached the thick darkness of Mount Sinai where God was (Ex 20:21).

Throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the coming of God in judgment is painted in shades of black. In anger God parts the heavens and comes down with dark clouds under his feet; he makes darkness his covering when he shoots his arrows and rebukes his enemies (Ps 18:9, 11). The prophets described a coming judgment on sin as “a day of darkness and gloom, a day of clouds and blackness” (Zeph 1:15; Joel 2:2).

Blackness or darkness appears less frequently in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Jude describes false teachers, who license immorality and deny Jesus Christ, as “wandering stars, for whom blackest darkness has been reserved forever” (Jude 13).

The contrast of light and darkness is a major motif of John’s Gospel, where Jesus is portrayed as the light of the world who disperses the darkness of divine judgment. All three Synoptic Gospels poignantly report that as Jesus died on the cross, darkness fell over the whole land (Mt 27:45; Mk 15:33; Lk 23:44). At the crucifixion God descended in judgment, the divine warrior fighting the final and ultimate battle that destroyed sin and evil.

See also Colors; Darkness; Light.

BLEMISH.

See Spot.

BLESSING, BLESSEDNESS

The Bible abounds in pictures of blessing—blessing sought, blessing promised, blessing conferred, blessing received. Blessing presupposes a benefactor and a recipient, and not infrequently there is a mediator who pronounces or confers the prospect of blessing from God to a human recipient. In the Bible, blessing is ultimately from God, though people often pronounce a wish for blessing on fellow humans. The quest to attain a state of blessedness is a universal human longing, and the Bible differentiates the way that will lead to blessedness from things that lead away from it. In the Bible the things that make for blessedness range from the physical to the spiritual, from the earthly to the heavenly.

The first sphere of blessing that we read about in the Bible is the creation. When God created the earth's animals, "he blessed them" and commanded them to multiply (Gen 1:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). After the flood, God's blessing on Noah and his sons included their dominion over the creation and its provision for human life (Gen 9:1—7). Thereafter in the biblical account, nature is a continuous arena of God's blessing; his blessing rests on creation and he blesses various aspects of creation through or by means of the creation.

God's blessing is continuously seen both on creation and through creation to the human race (Ps 104). Natural abundance is thus one of the leading images of divine blessing in the Bible. It is a universal blessing, not limited to believers in God; as Jesus noted, God "makes his sun rise on the evil and on the good, and sends rain on the just and on the unjust" (Mt 5:45 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A second picture of blessing is the blessing of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] fathers on their sons as they approached their time of death. The best known examples occur in Genesis, especially Isaac's blessing on Jacob and Esau (Gen 27) and Jacob's blessing on his sons (Gen 48—49). Such blessings were more than good wishes; in some sense they were efficacious in bringing about what the patriarch conferred. As an extension of family blessings, Moses blessed his nation on the eve of his death (Deut 33).

A third image of blessing is the blessing tied to the covenant. Such blessing is already introduced when God calls Abraham: “I will bless those who bless you, and ... by you all the families of the earth shall bless themselves” (Gen 12:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Thereafter the very idea of the covenant is connected to blessing. Five motifs permeate these references. One is promise, as God promises to bless those who keep his covenant. A second is the conditional nature of the blessing, or blessing as part of a test of the obedience of people. Whether the context is an inauguration of a future era (as when Moses prepares the Israelites for settlement in Canaan in Deut 28–30 or when Samuel institutes Saul as king in 1 Sam 12) or a prophetic oracle of judgment for a nation’s failure to obey God’s covenant obligations, the premise is that the covenant blessing is conditional. Third, therefore, blessing is conceived as being in some sense a reward for obedience. Balancing this, fourth, is the theme of grace: although God rewards obedience, it is his grace that leads him to do so. Human merit is never assumed: as Moses delineates the special status of Israel, he makes it clear that God’s blessing is solely a result of his love (Deut 7:6–16). Finally, the opposite of blessing resulting from obedience to God is always assumed to be a curse resulting from disobedience. Blessing and curse are opposite sides of a coin in the divine economy (see esp. [esp. esp.. especially] Deut 28).

Building upon OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motifs of blessing, blessing in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is the spiritual state of those who belong to Christ’s kingdom. A chosen nation is no longer the locus of God’s blessing, but individual believers are. Whereas blessing in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] always retains a heavy (though not exclusive) emphasis on physical prosperity, blessing in the NT [NT NT.

New Testament] era finds very little place for material prosperity. Blessing is overwhelmingly conceived as a spiritual inheritance reserved in heaven for the believer. In fact, in the Beatitudes Jesus pronounces blessing on those who suffer deprivation in this life. Paul likewise sounds the keynote when he writes, “To the weak I became weak ... I do it all for the sake of the gospel, that I may share in its blessings” (1 Cor 9:22–23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Abundance; Beatitude; Benediction; Curse.

BLIND, BLINDNESS

Some of the most vivid pictures of the Bible center on blindness, including the Sodomites’ groping about Lot’s house, the dim-eyed Isaac tricked by his son, Samson’s eyes gouged out, a troupe of blinded Syrian warriors being led from their intended destination to Samaria, the drama of the man born blind healed by Jesus to the consternation of the Pharisees, the blind beggars who cried out pathetically to Jesus as he passed by and the temporary blindness of Paul at his conversion. The characters in the Bible who are physically blind are a moving spectacle of human misfortune. However, in a spiritual sense, blindness is congenital for all humans, who inherit the tendency simply by virtue of belonging to the human race. In both physical and spiritual instances, blindness is an image of terror, helplessness and despair unless reversed by God’s miraculous intervention.

The physical blindness referred to in the Bible is either congenital (Jn 9:1) or acquired. In a region of dust and bright sunlight, ophthalmic diseases were common, as attested by the frequency with which blindness is referred to in Scripture (Lev 19:14; Job 29:15; Mt 9:27; Lk 14:13). Blindness is one of the several disabilities that prevented someone born into a priestly family from exercising his ministry (Lev 21:18); and although blind people deserve special consideration according to the law (Lev 19:14), blindness could be a synonym for weakness and helplessness (2 Sam 5:6; Is 59:10; Lam 4:14).

Blinding is a punishment for wrongdoing in neighboring nations (2 Kings 25:7), but never in Israel. On occasion, in order to promote his own purposes, God temporarily blinds individuals or groups of people, either totally or in regard to something they attempt to see (Gen 19:11; 2 Kings 6:18; Acts 9:9; 13:11). Physical blindness is regarded by some of Jesus' contemporaries as evidence of divine punishment, something Jesus strongly denies (Jn 9:1–3).

Figuratively, blindness refers to an inability to recognize the truth, usually a culpable condition. As such, it describes judges whose judgment is perverted because of bribes (Ex 23:8; Deut 16:19; Job 9:24), idolaters whose worship is illogical as well as wrong (Is 44:9–10) and people who simply do not want to know (Is 43:8). Such blindness to the truth and mental confusion could actually be the result of God's judgment on those who did not want to admit the truth and who therefore forfeit the ability to perceive it at their cost (Deut 28:28–29; Is 6:9–10; 29:9–10). This is true of the Israelites, both leaders (Is 56:10) and followers (Is 42:18–19). Only God in his mercy can reverse this condition (Is 29:18; 35:5; 42:16). Paul describes gradual blindness when he writes of those whose “foolish hearts were darkened” (Rom 1:21). In another vein he talks of seeing poorly now in contrast to seeing perfectly in the life to come (1 Cor 13:12).

The imagery of sight and blindness is especially prominent in the account of Jesus' earthly ministry. The high incidence of physical blindness in the world of the Gospels is attested by the frequency with which Jesus performed miracles of giving sight to the blind. It is, in fact, one of the most vivid signs of Jesus' supernatural power. Spiritual blindness is no less prominent in the Gospels. Jesus described the religious leaders and teachers of his own generation in terms of blindness (Mt 15:14; 23:16—17, 19, 24, 26). The irony of their situation is that in their spiritual ignorance they assumed that they understand perfectly. Jesus remedied spiritual as well as physical blindness (Mt 13:17; Jn 9:39). Those who rejected Jesus' words came under a judgment similar to that of Israel—a state of permanent blindness (Jn 12:40; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 11:7—10).

Although metaphorically blindness may describe mere ignorance (Rom 2:19), it usually carries the overtones of an unwillingness to face up to the truth (Jas 1:23—24); and in the case of those who do not believe in Christ, this is the work of Satan (2 Cor 4:4). As such it requires a miracle in order to become aware of the significance of Christ. Similarly, Christian believers who revert to their pre-Christian ways are described as blind, not perceiving the contradiction expressed in their behavior (2 Pet 1:9; 1 Jn 2:11). Blindness describes the fact that they are unaware of the gravity of their condition (Rev 3:17).

See also Deaf, Deafness; Disease and Healing; Maimed, Halt and Blind.

BLIND GUIDES.

See Pharisee.

BLOOD

The appearance of blood is never a good sign. While blood is natural, the sight of it is not. To the ancients its red color, along with its mystical connection with life and death, made it a powerful and ominous symbol of violence and wrong, guilt and coming punishment. Only in the framework of sacrifice could blood portend good news.

Blood as Human Life. Blood, often in the pair “flesh and blood,” stands for humanity (Jn 1:13; Gal 1:16; 1 Cor 15:50). Without blood humans return to dust. The dust of a decaying corpse and the absence of blood are signs of our perishable, corruptible nature (1 Cor 15:49). The pair “blood and water” carries similar symbolism (Jn 19:34; 1 Jn 5:6). Blood is so much a sign of human mortality that the disciples (and we with them) struggle to fathom that the resurrected Christ still has flesh and bones (Lk 24:39).

Blood as Death. Because the life is in the blood (Lev 17:11, see below), the mention of blood connotes life imperiled (2 Sam 23:17; 1 Chron 11:19), life passing out of the body. Since the blood contains the life-breath (neeš) of God, the spirit returns to God who gave it (Eccles 12:7) and reports to the Creator each case of bloodshed (Gen 4:10). Job pleads, “O earth, cover not my blood and let my cry find no resting place” (Job 16:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The mere mention of blood points to the stark fact of death without drawing attention to the manner. Blood marks death by unnamed violence (Ezek 5:17; Hab 2:17), child sacrifice (Ezek 23:37, 45), envy and jealousy (Ezek 16:38), covetous murder (1 Kings 21:19; 2 Kings 9:26), even suicide (Mt 27:8; Acts 1:18–19). As if it were the firstfruits of death, the blood ebbs away into the ground before the body decays into dust (Is 63:6).

Blood as Guilt. Blood as guilt stems from blood as a sign of death due to violence. In many passages the mere mention of blood assigns guilt. Biblical authors use phrases such as “the blood of Jezreel” (Hos 1:4), “city tracked with blood” (Hos 6:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), “hands full of blood” (Is 1:15). The psalmist fears “men of blood” (Ps 139:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Furthermore, the blood of the slain not only cries out to God but pursues the murderer (Ezek 35:6). Shed blood weighed like a burden to be carried until death (Prov 28:17). Cain objects that his punishment (or guilt) is too great to bear (Gen 4:13). The blood and the attendant guilt are pictured as resting on the hands and head (Mt 27:24–25, see Hands, Washing of). Deeds of blood awaited repayment (2 Sam 16:8).

Blood as Impurity. While blood inside the body could be ignored, outside the body it could not. Just as blood flowed from torn bodies, it likewise symbolized a rupture in the fabric of life. Blood, whether due to violence or other ills, destroyed the cleanness of creation. Animal blood was handled according to strict ritual. It was not to be left on the ground uncovered by dust (Lev 17:13). Human blood had even more power to defile (Ps 106:38; Is 59:3; Lam 4:14). Even the predictable bleeding of women required strict purity laws (Lev 12). Chronic conditions left sufferers virtually ostracized (Lk 8:43). Wanting to contrast God's righteousness with human attempts at purity, Isaiah can find no image more abhorrent than comparing all our righteous deeds to menstrual rags (Is 64:6).

Blood as Omen. The vivid red color of fresh blood still strikes the viewer with almost unnatural force. Other elements whose color change unnaturally to red were said to have become blood. Just as human blood is proof of torn flesh, so the appearance of cosmic blood points to a hemorrhaging universe and causes wide spread fear. As an omen for Egypt the Nile river changed to blood (Ex 4:9; 7:17). A sunrise turns the water blood-red against Moab (2 Kings 3:22). The Apocalypse borrows the image of water turning to blood (Rev 9:8; 16:4). Joel warns of portents—blood in the sky and the moon turned to blood (Joel 2:30–31). Peter cites these signs of the Day of the Lord (Acts 2:19), and they figure again in John's vision (Rev 6:12).

Blood as Sacrifice and Propitiation. The shedding of human blood in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is treated as a capital offense: “Whoever sheds the blood of a human, by a human shall that person’s blood be shed” (Gen 9:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The shedding of animal blood is allowed in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] law, but only through ritual slaughter. This blood is treated with great respect. It may not be consumed (Lev 17:10), and it plays an essential element in the sacrificial cult. The blood of the animal is not only shed, but it is also brought into contact with the holy that is symbolized, for example, by the altar or the mercy seat in the Holy of Holies (see Temple).

The ritual release of blood is seen as the release of the individual’s life, his nepeš (Ex 12:23; Heb 11:28). Leviticus summarizes the crucial idea: “For the life [nepeš] of the flesh is in the blood; and I [God] have given it to you for making atonement for your lives [plural of nepeš] on the altar; for the blood atones through the life [nepeš]” (Lev 17:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The nepeš of the one making the offering is identified with the nepeš of the sacrificial animal. The shedding of blood symbolizes the surrender of life. Furthermore, it is a surrender of life to the holy as seen, for example, in the sprinkling of blood on the mercy seat on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:15).

This OT [OT OT. Old Testament] backdrop is the proper setting for understanding certain verses in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] about the blood of Christ. In Romans 3:25 the blood of Christ is not the blood of a martyr but blood of his sacrifice for sins. God publicly set forth Christ as a mercy seat. The presence of God and the place of the atonement are to be found in Golgotha, not behind the veil in the Holy of Holies. Christ’s blood atones for our sins and achieves our justification (Rom 5:9; see Legal Images). The letter to the Hebrews further develops the significance of sacrificial blood. The blood of bulls and goats effects a purification of the flesh, but the blood of Jesus does much more: it purifies our consciences from dead works to worship the living God (Heb 9:13–14; 10:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 4 Macc 6:29).

At the Last Supper, Jesus equated his blood with the new covenant. Taking a cup of wine, Jesus said: “This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many” (Mk 14:24 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This may be compared to Exodus 24:3–8, where Moses, taking the blood of oxen, threw half of it against the altar and half over the people of Israel. In both cases, blood seals a covenant (Heb 9:18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Zech 9:11 and Gen 15:9–18, where animals were killed to seal Abraham’s covenant with God).

John expresses Christ’s divinity in blood imagery. Christ’s blood contained life from God in a way that normal human blood did not. To experience eternal life, the believer must drink his blood (Jn 6:53–54). When his disciples struggled to understand, he explained that “the spirit gives life, the flesh is of no avail” (Jn 6:63 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

As the early Christians came to grasp that atonement is reached through the blood of Christ and not through the blood of bulls and goats (Heb 10:4), some saw, probably on the basis of Leviticus 17:10–11, that the law forbidding the consumption of animal blood was no longer binding.

Blood as Wine. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] wine is the “blood of grapes” treaded out (Gen 49:11). The prophet envisions God’s triumphant army treading down their foes and drinking their blood like wine (Zech 9:15). Violent oppressors will be drunk with their own blood as with wine. By using this familiar imagery equating blood with wine, Christ empowers the symbolism of the old covenant to serve also the new covenant. The history of redemption comes full circle in the Eucharist. When the NT [NT NT. New Testament] replaces the blood of sacrifice with wine, the offering of the fruit of the ground, which had been ineffective and unacceptable (Gen 4:3—4), now becomes a remembrance (Lk 22:19) that the sacrifice has been made once for all (Heb 10:10).

See also Death; Guilt; Purity; Sacrifice; Wine.

BLOOM.

See Flowers.

BLOSSOM.

See Flowers.

BLUE.

See Colors.

BOAST

As creator, redeemer and provider for a chosen people, God is the only appropriate source for boasting. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] boasting in God and God's provision symbolizes humanity's proper posture before the Almighty, whether boasting of protection (Ps 5:11), deliverance from enemies (Ps 44:4—8) or righteousness and favor (Ps 89:15—17). Such boasting consists of confession, thanksgiving and worship (Ps 34:3; 44:8), and stills all false boasting based on pride and self-righteousness (1 Sam 2:2—3).

Boasting was an important motif in martial literature (including ancient epic), and a formal boast was a standard ritual of warfare (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 15:9; 1 Kings 20:11). We catch a hint of this convention in Psalm 18:31—42, a psalm of thanksgiving that celebrates victory on the battlefield. But here the overall tone is parody as David attributes his strength in battle to God.

Boasting in anything other than God affronts God with arrogant self-sufficiency. Such boasting symbolizes fallen humanity's natural inclination to trust in human wisdom, might and wealth rather than understanding and knowing God (Jer 9:23—24). Scripture depicts the rich and powerful who assume they are more clever and powerful than God and who boast in their affliction of the righteous and poor (Ps 52:1; 94:1—7). Their arrogant claims will dissolve in shame and judgment. There is an ironic twist in the interface of boasting and judgment: the nations God employs to destroy Israel because of her boasting (Is 9:8—12) are in turn destroyed by God for their boasting of being the sole authority in the world (Is 10:12—19; Zeph 2:8—15). The Bible shows the foolishness of boasting about tomorrow when as finite beings we do not know what it will bring (Prov 27:1). Uses such as these and Paul's use of kauchaomai suggest an underlying meaning of failure to acknowledge God or his divine role in history.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] boasting in God's work of redemption through Christ symbolizes the proper stance of redeemed humanity toward God (Rom 5:11; 1 Cor 1:31; 2 Cor 10:17). Such boasting indicates a lack of confidence in the flesh (Phil 3:3), a trust in the cross (Gal 6:14) and participation in Christian hope (Rom 5:2; Heb 3:6). Boasting in what God has given to or is doing in the Christian is also commended. Paul can boast of his authority (2 Cor 10:8), churches he founded (Phil 2:16; 1 Thess 2:19), his suffering (Rom 5:3), a good conscience (2 Cor 1:12), work for God (Rom 15:17) and even his weakness in which God's strength is demonstrated (2 Cor 12:5—10).

Since justification is a gift of God through faith in Christ, no one—not even Abraham (Rom 4:1—3)—can boast in works in the hope of justification (Rom 3:27; Eph 2:8—9). Boasting in the flesh is excluded (2 Cor 11:18), whether in the law (Rom 2:23), circumcision (Gal 6:13), wisdom (1 Cor 1:26—31), comparison with others (2 Cor 10:12, 18) or outward appearance (2 Cor 5:12). No benefits of the flesh can provide the grounds for boasting, because they are ultimately gifts of God (1 Cor 4:7). Such boasting symbolizes the shameful and foolish inclinations of sinful humanity to trust in its own accomplishments (2 Cor 11:16—21).

See also Honor; Pride.

Bibliography. C. Forbes, “Comparison, Self-Praise and Irony: Paul’s Boasting and the Conventions of Hellenistic Rhetoric,” NTS [NTS NTS. New Testament Studies] 32 (1986) 1—30.

BOAT

The boats of the Bible are tossed about on dark and stormy seas. In them God provides shelter from life-threatening danger. A boat is first found in Genesis 8 when God kept Noah, his family and the animals safe from the flood that destroyed all life in a boat called an ark. The safety Noah’s ark provided is highlighted in the three references to it in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (Mt 24:38; Lk 17:27; 1 Pet 3:20). In Exodus 2:5 the little basket that kept baby Moses safe from drowning in the Nile is called by the same Hebrew word used for Noah’s ark.

The boat is a life-saving shelter throughout Scripture. In the Gospels, Jesus keeps his disciples safe in a boat, though they fear for their lives in a storm on the Sea of Galilee (Mt 8:23—27; Mk 4:35—41; Lk 8:22—25). On his sea-voyage to Rome, Paul commands the sailors to stay aboard the ship when caught in a storm of hurricane force. Although the ship was destroyed, everyone aboard safely reached land (Acts 27:31, 44).

In the Gospels, Jesus frequently enters a boat on the Sea of Galilee in order to escape the crowds (Mk 3:9, 4:1) or be conveyed from one place to another. Sailing is labor intensive, and only once is Jesus possibly in a boat alone (Mk 4:1). Generally he is accompanied by multiple followers when he was in a boat.

Because the Bible uses the sea as an image of danger, chaos and death, the boat portrays the safety God provides for his people from life's most threatening evils. Consequently the ship has been seen as a fitting image of the church, especially when it is the setting for Jesus' miracles. Two miracles stories set in boats convey this picture: the stilling of the storm (Mk 4:35–41 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Mt 8:23–27; Lk 8:22–25) and walking on water (Mk 6:45–52 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Mt 14:22–33; Jn 6:16–21). In addition, the miraculous catch of fish (Lk 5:4–11; Jn 21:4–8) may picture the spiritual sustenance provided for the church. The parallel is never directly made in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , but the image of Jesus' power over the demonic powers, symbolized by the wind and waves, the boat providing a means to gather in the harvest of fish, the boat as a symbol of safety and the sense of it carrying people to a destination have been sufficient for many to virtually equate church and boat/ship.

Israel was never the seafaring equal to some of its neighbors. So the sailors and captains who benefited from Rome's commercial success and lament her fall (Rev 18:17–19) are assumed to be pagans. Jehoshaphat tried to revive sea trade on the Red Sea (1 Kings 22:48–49), but his fleet foundered. The chronicler viewed this as a divine judgment on the unholy alliance that lay behind the venture (2 Chron 20:35–37). Commercial shipping was owned by foreign powers, and Isaiah uses this to paint a vivid picture for an eschatological gathering of faithful Israel in Jerusalem: “Surely the islands look to me; in the lead are the ships of Tarshish, bringing your sons from afar, with their silver and gold, to the honor of the Lord your God, the Holy One of Israel, for he has endowed you with splendor” (Is 60:9).

See also Fishing; Sea; Ship, Shipwreck.

Bibliography. S. Wachsmann, The Sea of Galilee Boat (New York: Plenum, 1995).

BODILY ANGUISH.

See Trembling, Shaking, Bodily Anguish.

BODY

The body is a highly significant and complex image in the Bible. Human images and experiences of the body, though undergirded by important continuities, are also socially constructed. Ideals of beauty, for example, vary from culture to culture. And the image of the body is deeply tied to particular worldviews, in which the body is viewed as a microcosm of the cosmos. The manner in which a culture regards boundaries of the body, defined first by skin and then, by extension, by garments and hair, reflect the way in which that culture views the boundaries of its social body. The gateway orifices of the body—the eyes, ears, mouth and genitals—may be guarded against pollution in a manner analogous to the way that a nation’s ports of entry must be guarded and maintained by checkpoints. Jesus subverts the Pharisaic view of the body, with its purity laws that carefully guard what enters the body through the mouth. He maintains that “nothing outside a man can make him ‘unclean’ by going into him. Rather, it is what comes out of a man that makes him ‘unclean.’” For food “doesn’t go into his heart but into his stomach, and then out of his body” (Mk 7:15, 19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Or Jesus can speak of the eye as “the lamp of your body. When your eyes are good, your whole body also is full of light. But when they are bad, your body also is full of darkness” (Lk 11:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Bible, particularly the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] with its laws and stories regarding ritual purity, has provided a casebook for anthropological investigation. These factors are well kept in mind when reflecting on biblical imagery of the body, but they will not be considered in any detail here. This article deals primarily with the image of the body as a whole or as an organic unity of parts. Separate articles focus on the limbs and other parts of the body.

The Body Created and Recreative. The first human body in the Bible is a creation of God. Adam’s body is shaped by the divine potter’s hands, animated by the divine breath breathed into his nostrils. Against the backdrop of the created order, Adam is a bodily image of the living God. But this first body also bears a relationship to the earth, and this is subtly reinforced in the Hebrew assonance of ’ādām “human” and ’ādāmâ “ground” (Gen 2:7). The earthly nature of the body is then sealed in the tragic epitaph, “dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return” (Gen 3:19 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Though the Genesis narrative offers no overt physical description of this first human body, the Hebrew word-play resonates with the Hebrew word ’dm, “to be red,” and suggests a body of the rusty shade of soil. The distinction between the human body and the beasts, and the fact that the man can find none “like unto him” among the beasts, differentiates the human body from other living beings (but cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Dan 4:33; 5:20–21). The creation of the woman from the side of man, using his rib, is an image of bodily differentiation based in equality. The relation between the male and female body is set out in balanced poetry:

This at last is bone of my bones
and flesh of my flesh;

this one shall be called Woman
for from Man this one was taken.

(Gen 2:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

From the one human body is formed another, and their differentiation and deep relationship is reflected in two new names set side by side: 'iš “man” and 'iššā “woman.” As two genders they reunite as “one flesh.” In marriage union, Adam’s body finds its perfect counterpart in the body of the woman. Together, as same bone and flesh, they form and generate community in their fruitfulness and multiplication (Gen 1:28). This archetypal image of union—man and woman as one flesh—holds an allusion to the generative power from which the body of human society will unfold. From these two bodies, fitly joined, new bodies emerge (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 15:4; 35:11; 2 Sam 7:12), “the fruit” of the body (Mic 6:7). The author of Hebrews uses the image of descendants coming from the bodies of their progenitors when arguing for the priority of the priesthood of Melchizedek over the priesthood of Levi, “because when Melchizedek met Abraham, Levi was still in the body of his ancestor” (Heb 7:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Bible’s insistence that the human body is created by God, not evolved by chance from lower forms of life or a byproduct of the romances or wars of the gods, places a high value on the body. It is the work of a divine artisan, an intricate and fleshly distillation of divine wisdom, a creation

“a little lower than the heavenly beings” but capable of bearing the crown of honor and glory (Ps 8:5). This high regard for the human body is summed up in the psalmist’s wonder at the work of the Creator. The one who created the cosmos has done a work no less wonderful and mysterious in shaping the human frame:

For you created my inmost being;
you knit me together in my mother’s womb.

I praise you because I am fearfully and wonderfully made;
your works are wonderful,
I know that full well.

My frame was not hidden from you when I was made in the secret place.

When I was woven together in the depths of the earth, your eyes saw my unformed body.

(Ps 139:13–16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf.
[cf. cf.. compare] Eccles 11:5)

Job in his suffering forms a series of three metaphors of God creating the body human. He is a potter, or one who makes clay figurines, he is cheese maker and he is a tailor, or a leatherworker:

Your hands shaped me and made me.
Will you now turn and destroy me?

Remember that you molded me like clay.
Will you now turn me to dust again?

Did you not pour me out like milk and curdle me like cheese, clothe me with skin and flesh and knit me together with bones and sinews?

(Job 10:8—11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

God has created the body, and the body is created to be in relationship with God. Those who earnestly seek God can say, “my soul thirsts for you, my body longs for you” (Ps 63:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). A right relationship with the Creator, the “fear of the Lord,” “will bring health to your body and nourishment to your bones” (Prov 3:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 4:22). And those who rely on their good Creator are instructed not to worry “about your life, what you will eat; or about your body, what you will wear. Life is more than food, and the body more than clothes” (Lk 12:22—23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The goodness of the body as a creation of God is powerfully confirmed by the incarnation. This is memorably imaged by John as he writes, “The Word became flesh and dwelt among us” (Jn 1:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), or when the author of Hebrews has Jesus declare when he comes into the world, “Sacrifice and offering you did not desire, but a body you prepared for me” (Heb 10:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 40:6 LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)]).

The Body Covered and Uncovered. The Bible disapproves of the public nakedness of man and woman outside the original state of the first man and woman in the Garden (Gen 2:25). The human need to cover the body is associated with the first couple’s eating of the fruit of the knowledge of good and evil: “Then the eyes of both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together and made loincloths for themselves” (Gen 3:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A publicly naked body is shameful and is associated with a certain self-consciousness that disrupts the original perfect state (Gen 3:9–11).

The human body also needs protection from the elements (Ex 22:27), and clothing offers this. Paul asks Timothy to bring his cloak from Troas (2 Tim 4:13) as he anticipates the coming winter (2 Tim 4:21). He has experienced being “cold and naked” (2 Cor 11:27). A body unclothed is not only cold, a body stripped of clothing and jewelry (Ezek 16:39) is a body bereft of the insignia of social standing and identity. A naked body is not a sign of freedom from society’s constraints but of incalculable loss of place and honor. When the naked Gerasene demoniac is delivered by Jesus and restored to his community, he is found “clothed and in his right mind” (Mk 8:27, 35 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). For these reasons, nakedness can be a fitting image of judgment, as when Jeremiah says of Israel, “it is because of your many sins that your skirts have been torn off and your body mistreated” (Jer 13:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The central biblical image of public shame and judgment is the naked Jesus hanging on the cross.

The Body of Stature. Humans in general are impressed with bodies of grand stature. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] has an expression for sizing up the full stature of a human: “from the sole of his foot to the crown of his head” (2 Sam 14:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Deut 28:35; Job 2:7; Is 1:6). Bodies of gigantic stature can strike fear, such as that of Goliath, who was “over nine feet tall” (1 Sam 17:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). (Most Israelite men probably did not exceed five and a half feet in height.) The Israelite spies report that the Canaanites are “stronger and taller than we are” (Deut 1:28 NIV [NIV NIV.

New International Version]). “All the people we saw there are of great size... We seemed like grasshoppers in our own eyes, and we looked the same to them” (Num 13:32–33 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Amos speaks of the Amorites as being as “tall as the cedars and strong as the oaks” (Amos 2:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Enemies of great bodily stature and strength are challenges to faith.

Bodily stature, when it does not reach grotesque proportions, may be attractive. Saul’s stature is an important ingredient in his attractiveness. He is described as “a handsome young man. There was not a man among the people of Israel more handsome than he; from his shoulders upward he was taller than any of the people” (1 Sam 9:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; 10:23). And Samuel says that “there is none like him among all the people” (1 Sam 10:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). But when Samuel goes “head hunting” for a new king to fill Israel’s executive office, the Lord’s warning about David’s brother Eliab will echo throughout the Bible as a caution against outward measures of a person: “Do not look on his appearance or on the height of his stature, because I have rejected him; for the Lord does not see as mortals see; they look on the outward appearance, but the Lord looks on the heart” (1 Sam 16:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The Body Beautiful and Odd. The beautiful body is not overlooked by the Bible, though we find it noted more frequently in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] than in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . The ancestresses Sarah (Gen 12:11, 14), Rebekah (Gen 24:16) and Rachel (“lovely in form” Gen 29:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) are all described as beautiful. Joseph, David and Absalom are singled out as examples of male beauty. Joseph is “well built and handsome” (Gen 39:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The description of David evokes a picture of a strong lad who combines genetic fortune with the natural beauty endowed by life in the outdoors: “he was ruddy, with a fine appearance and handsome features ... a fine-looking man ... ruddy and handsome” (1 Sam 16:12, 18; 17:42 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Absalom is given closer description: “In all Israel there was not a man so highly praised for his handsome appearance as Absalom. From the top of his head to the sole of his foot there was no blemish in him. Whenever he cut the hair of his head, ... its weight was two hundred shekels” (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , over 5 lbs.; 2 Sam 14:25—26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Absalom’s freedom from blemish or defect is shared by the noble young Israelite men who are selected for service to the king of Babylon. They are described as being “without any physical defect, handsome” and possessing equally admirable intellects (Dan 1:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Occasionally the Bible gives us a glimpse of the distinctive characteristics of a man’s body, but these details are rare. Esau, for example, is said to be “a hairy man” in contrast with Jacob who is “a smooth man” (Gen 27:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In fact, when Esau is born it is said that he was “red, and his whole body was like a hairy garment” (Gen 25:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This physical characteristic plays into the profile of Esau within the larger narrative of the brothers, for he is a rustic character, a man of the open country and a hunter. Another distinct figure of a man is the enemy defeated by David’s men at Gath: “a huge man with six fingers on each hand and six toes on each foot—twenty-four in all” (2 Sam 22:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The richest descriptions of male and female bodies are given in the Song of Songs. Here we see the male body described through the eyes of the woman (or, more likely, a male writer taking on the perspective of a woman). The poetic description in Song of Songs 5:10–16 focuses on the head, hair, eyes, cheeks, lips, mouth, arms, legs and torso. The description is sensuous and luxuriant, rich in nature imagery, from animal to plant life, and abundant in imagery of wealth, from jewels to precious metals and ivory. Movement and solidity, taste and smell, softness and hardness are all evoked. Set within the larger context of the Song, the beauty of this male body refracts moral virtue. Likewise the description of the woman in Song of Songs 6:5–7 and 7:1–5 wanders over her anatomy—the feet and thighs, the belly, navel and breasts, the neck, eyes, nose, head and hair. Whereas the male torso and appendages are celebrated for their solidity verging on angularity, the female parts evoke curvaceousness and roundness complemented by images of fertility. But above the shoulders she is statuesque and well defended, with a neck like an ivory tower, a nose like the tower of Lebanon and a head crowning her like Mount Carmel.

Ideals of bodily beauty may vary from time to time and from culture to culture, but the Song of Songs leaves no doubt that the human body can be beautiful and is a thing to be enjoyed and celebrated in the presence of God its Creator. But the voice of wisdom abruptly draws us back to the practical and spiritual realities of beauty:

“Like a gold ring in a pig’s snout is a beautiful woman who shows no discretion” (Prov 11:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “Charm is deceptive, and beauty is fleeting; but a woman who fears the Lord is to be praised” (Prov 31:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And the prophet Isaiah places the beauty of the human body in proper perspective: “All flesh is grass, and all its beauty is like the flower of the field... The grass withers, the flower fades; but the word of our God will stand for ever” (Is 40:6—8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 78:39).

The body-male or female-is ultimately regarded in the Bible as a physical form with the mysterious capability of emanating virtue and godliness. 1 Peter contrasts outward adornment and beauty with the cultivation of the “inner self, the unfading beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit, which is of great worth in God’s sight” (1 Pet 3:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Although the focus here is on women, the same principle certainly applies to men.

The Body of the Wealthy, the Poor and the Wicked. Wealth and poverty, godliness and wickedness, are frequently imaged in the condition of the body. The bodies of the wealthy are stylized as fat, sleek and radiant in skin. Fatness can be an image of rich abundance, and so Job speaks of the wicked whose “face is covered with fat and his waist bulges with flesh” (Job 15:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). On the other hand, to say that “the fat of his body will waste away” (Is 17:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) is to portray a person who has enjoyed God’s blessings but is undergoing divine judgment.

The bodies of the wicked may be viewed from two perspectives. One psalmist considers that they often seem to be “healthy and strong, ... free from the burdens common to man; they are not plagued by human ills” (Ps 73:4—5). But then the psalmist realizes that this is all a fantasy; their final destiny is nothing but ruin and destruction (Ps 73:17—19). In reality, the wicked, who love to pronounce their curses and take no pleasure in blessing, are treading on the verge of death, for their curses return to them and invade the body: “He wore cursing as his garment; it entered into his body like water, into his bones like oil". (Ps 109:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The godly are reminded of the ill effects of a life divorced from wisdom: "A heart at peace gives life to the body, but envy rots the bones" (Prov 14:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Perhaps the most grotesque imagery of bodies under divine judgment comes from Zechariah's prophecy against the nations that have fought against Jerusalem: "Their flesh will rot while they are still standing on their feet, their eyes will rot in their sockets, and their tongues will rot in their mouths" (Zech 14:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Body of Bone, Flesh and Blood. The Bible sometimes images the body in its hard, soft and fluid parts, its bone, flesh and blood. A frequent expression of kinship in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is "bone and flesh" (translated "flesh and blood" by the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The expression first occurs in an emphatic form in Adam's exclamation that Eve is "bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh" (Gen 2:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When all Israel gathers before David at Hebron, they declare in one voice, "we are your own bone and flesh" (2 Sam 5:1; 1 Chron 11:1). This expression, in which two opposite parts of the human body-hard structure and soft substance-stand for the whole, evokes a rudimentary picture of the body and a recognition of what we would call a "genetic" relationship between kin.

The image of "flesh and blood" evokes something quite different. An enemy's body, slain on a battlefield, is "flesh and blood." The divine warrior will make his arrows "drunk with blood" while his "sword devours flesh" (Deut 32:42). Or in the words of Ezekiel's prophecy against Egypt, the land will flow with their blood and the ravines will be filled with their bodies (Ezek 32:6). Human flesh and blood are the food of scavenging birds and animals after battle (Ezek 39:17–18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 19:18, 21). Perhaps this sheds a harsh but interpretive light on Jesus's words to his disciples when he tells them that they will gain eternal life by eating his flesh and drinking his blood (Jn 6:53–56). His death is both judgment and sacrifice, and his body, rendered into the two parts associated with brutal death and slaughter, will paradoxically give life to those who consume it as a sacrificial meal. But in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , “flesh and blood” is also an image of human bodily existence in this age, incompatible by its nature with the age to come: “flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God” (1 Cor 15:50 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The image can also be used to distinguish between human enemies and spiritual ones, for Ephesians reminds us that we do not struggle “against flesh and blood” but against spiritual powers (Eph 6:12)

The incarnation is variously expressed in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , but the image of “flesh” is one means of underscoring its bodily reality. In the Gospel of John we read that “the Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us” (Jn 1:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and in Hebrews we find that Jesus shares “flesh and blood” with humanity (Heb 2:14). John, distinguishing between those of true faith and those who are false teachers, declares that “every spirit that acknowledges that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is from God” (1 Jn 4:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Jn 7). After the resurrection, Jesus demonstrates that his body is real: “Touch me and see; a ghost does not have flesh and bones, as you see I have” (Lk 24:39 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Nevertheless, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] acknowledges that the resurrection body is different from the body of our present human existence, and Paul explains this by falling back on an analogous distinction between different types of flesh: “Not all flesh is alike, but there is one flesh for human beings, another for animals, another for birds, and another for fish” (1 Cor 15:39 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Flesh is sometimes an image of the soft body parts. As the most perishable part of the body, it “rots” (Zech 14:12), “wastes away” (Job 33:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), is “eaten away” (Num 12:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), devoured by dogs and enemies (2 Kings 9:36; Ps 27:2) or torn by thorns and briars (Judg 8:7). The flesh can also serve as an image of human weakness and impermanence, as when the flesh and heart fail (Ps 73:26) or God remembers that Israel is “but flesh, a passing breeze that does not return” (Ps 78:39 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) or an enemy’s mere “arm of flesh” is contrasted with the power of Israel’s divine warrior (2 Chron 32:8). Job hurls a protest of faith against the apparent transience of human flesh and bodily existence: “After my skin has been destroyed, yet in my flesh I will see God” (Job 19:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The softness of flesh is a positive image in the context of spiritual renewal. Ezekiel speaks of God creating in his people a “new heart,” of replacing their “heart of stone” with a “heart of flesh” (Ezek 36:26). Here the heart as the center of thought and consciousness, deadened and congealed by sin and rebellion, is brought back to vital spiritual life. But within this context of spiritual life, the flesh can also be an image of the outward and superficial as opposed to the inner and real. Jeremiah declaims God’s coming judgment against those who are “circumcised only in the flesh” (Jer 9:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and for Ezekiel, those who are not circumcised in “heart and flesh” must not enter the Lord’s sanctuary (Ezek 44:7, 9).

Most, if not all, occurrences of the word flesh in English translations of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] represent the Greek word sarx. In certain contexts the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] has translated sarx as “sinful nature” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rom 7:5, 18, 25; 8:3—9, 12—13). Although Paul can speak of sarx as the physical matter of living bodies (1 Cor 15:39), as a part of the human body that represents the whole (synecdoche, 1 Cor 6:16), as a human person or even the human race (Gal 2:16; Rom 3:20), or simply as the sphere of human relationships and kinship based on natural birth (Rom 9:3, 5, 8), it is the morally negative image that dominates the horizon for many readers of Paul.

Sarx, “flesh,” is Paul’s common metaphor for inherent human sinfulness. But as one among several Pauline uses of the term, it should not cloud our understanding of the body as the good creation of God that will be redeemed. The image of sarx as rebellious human nature occurs most frequently in Romans and Galatians. Particularly in Galatians the image seems to be gauged to subvert the ideology of those who are promoting the circumcision of the “flesh.” Against these Judaizers, who wish to boast in the Galatians’ circumcised flesh, Paul produces this counter-image of flesh as opposed to the “Spirit” (Gal 3:3) and its fruits (Gal 5:16—17). In this dualistic imagery, gauged for particular effect, the age of the new creation (Gal 6:15) is contrasted with this “present evil age” (Gal 1:3) which exercises its control over the “flesh” and even over religious rites (circumcision) associated with the flesh (see Galatians). The picture is further refined in Romans, where “flesh” is a member of a trilateral alliance of spiritual powers: sin, flesh and death (Rom 6—8; see Romans).

The Body Strong and Weak. The Bible presents numerous images of bodily strength, particularly that of warriors.

Samson is the most memorable. Samson's bodily strength is a special God-given strength, to be sure, but one can hardly read the stories of Samson and imagine him to be slight in physique. His legendary feats include slaying a lion with his bare hands (Judg 14:5–7), killing great numbers of Philistines (Judg 14:19–20; 15:8, 14–17), carrying off the city gates of Gaza (Judg 16:3), breaking his bonds as if they were charred flax or string (Judg 15:14; 16:7–9, 11–12, 13–14) and finally bringing down the temple of Dagon on the Philistine worshipers as well as on himself (Judg 16:23–20). Goliath is a warrior champion of hideous size and strength (1 Sam 17:4–7), and though his young opponent David is no physical match, David too is strong enough to slay a lion and a bear (1 Sam 17:34–37). To slay a lion, the strongest of Palestine's predatory animals, is a high mark of bodily strength. David's mighty warrior Benaiah counted among his memorable feats the slaying of a lion in a pit on a snowy day (2 Sam 23:20). Even the prophet Elijah proves to be a strong runner when the power of the Lord comes upon him and he outruns Ahab's chariot all the way from Carmel to Jezreel (1 Kings 18:46). On the opposite side of the coin is the Gerasene demoniac, possessed by a militaristic "legion" of demons, whose spirit-driven strength breaks the chains that bind him (Mk 5:29).

It is assumed that warriors will have strong bodies, but the Preacher injects a note of counter-wisdom drawn from long observation: "The race is not to the swift or the battle to the strong" (Eccles 9:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Under judgment, even "the lovely young women and strong young men will faint because of thirst" (Amos 8:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The strength of the human body, however, is more often assumed than noted in the Bible. In a culture where much of daily life consisted of bodily exertion-hauling water, grinding meal, weaving cloth, planting and harvesting crops, managing domestic animals, traveling on foot—the fleeting picture of the virtuous wife who has arms that are “strong for her tasks” (Prov 31:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) surely notes the rule rather than the exception. When the Bible does praise the strength of the male body, it is presented in images of hardness: “His arms are rods of gold set with chrysolite... His legs are pillars of marble” (Song 5:14–15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The prevailing tone of the Bible is that bodily strength is a gift from God, and in its most exceptional instances—such as Samson and Elijah—it is an empowerment of the Spirit of God. Those who boast in their strength (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Sam 17:42–44) are setting themselves up for a fall. The only one who is truly strong is the Lord, and in contrast human bodily strength is puny: “the Egyptians are men and not God; their horses are flesh and not spirit” (Is 31:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Those who directly encounter the power of God find their bodies trembling, melting and dissolving in anguish. The recognition that the strength of the body is a fragile thing, even when compared with the human will, is summed up in the well-known words of Jesus in Gethsemane: “the spirit is willing, but the body is weak” (Mk 14:38 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Body Impaired, Diminished and Restored. Frequently in the Bible we find mention of bodies that are not whole, whose faculties are impaired from birth or by accident or by age. Leviticus presents us with a catalogue of bodily conditions that call for purification or exclude one from full engagement in the life of Israel. Various infectious skin diseases afflict the body and call for cleansing measures (Lev 13–14). A woman’s body after childbirth is judged ceremonially unclean (Lev 12), and so is a woman in menstruation or a man or woman with any bodily discharge (Lev 15). These are conditions that break the boundaries of bodily wholeness.

Bodily wholeness is one of the prerequisites for the sons of Aaron to offer sacrifices in the house of God, and the list of disqualifying defects is a brief catalog of unacceptable bodily deformity or impairment of the male body: “no man who is blind or lame, disfigured or deformed; no man with a crippled foot or hand, or who is hunchbacked or dwarfed, or who has any eye defect, or who has festering or running sores or damaged testicles” (Lev 21:18–20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

These restrictions on bodies deviating from the norm are due to the holiness of God, who may only be approached by representatives of Israel who are whole in body and who offer animal sacrifices that are likewise whole in body (Lev 22:19–22). As undesirable as bodily impairment may be, Jesus suggests that the loss of an offending body part—an eye or a hand—is better than having the whole body thrown into hell (Mt 5:29–30).

The skin is the protective boundary of the body as well as an outward indicator of the inner condition of the body. Consequently skin diseases or conditions that affect the integrity of the skin instill a particular horror. Job gives voice to his despair as his body suffers decay at its outer limits: “My body is clothed with worms and scabs, my skin is broken and festering... I prefer strangling and death, rather than this body of mine” (Job 7:5, 15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “My skin grows black and peels; my body burns with fever (Job 30:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But even this condition of the body is not without hope: “Yet if there is an angel on his side as a mediator, one out of a thousand, ... then his flesh is renewed like a child’s; it is restored as in the days of his youth” (Job 33:23–25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Suffering, sin, guilt and divine wrath manifest themselves in bodily anguish. It can be as if the body is on the threshold of death. The psalmist says,

Because of your wrath there is no health in my body;
my bones have no soundness because of my sin.

My guilt has overwhelmed me like a burden too heavy to bear...

My wounds fester and are loathsome because of my sinful folly.

I am bowed down and brought very low;
all day long I go about mourning.

My back is filled with searing pain;
there is no health in my body.

I am feeble and utterly crushed;
I groan in anguish of heart. (Ps 38:3, 5–8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Even an oracle of judgment may affect the body of the prophet: “At this my body is racked with pain, pangs seize me, like those of a woman in labor” (Is 21:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The psalmist confesses before God that “my flesh trembles in fear of you” (Ps 119:120 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And intellectual exercise is no escape from the toll that work takes on the body: “Of making many books there is no end, and much study wearies the body” (Eccles 12:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Within the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we find a notable member of the royal family who has a bodily impairment. Mephibosheth, son of Jonathan, is lame in both feet, a condition inflicted when he was dropped by his nurse as she was running in flight (2 Sam 4:4). He receives special consideration from David and is given a place at the king's table "like one of the king's sons" (2 Sam 9:1–13; 19:26–30). It is notable that Jesus, the Son of David, heals those who are lame or have other bodily infirmities or defects and associates with them in table fellowship (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 26:6; Mk 14:3). In his miracles of healing, Jesus restores bodies to wholeness and so brings estranged Israelites into the full privileges of being the people of God. In this he inaugurates the messianic age:

Then will the eyes of the blind be opened and the ears of the deaf unstopped.

Then will the lame leap like a deer, and the mute tongue shout for joy.

(Is 35:5–6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

This text from Isaiah is brightly illustrated in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] story of the man crippled since birth who begs outside the temple gate. When he is healed through the ministry of Peter, his feet and ankles become strong, and he enters the temple courts, walking and leaping and praising God (Acts 3:1–10).

The Body Inhabited by Spiritual Powers. The Bible sometimes speaks of human bodies inhabited by nonhuman spiritual powers. These powers are either good or evil, the Spirit of God or the malevolent spirits of darkness. Although this imagery comes into its own in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , it is foreshadowed in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] where the Spirit or "power" of God comes upon various prophetic figures such as Saul (1 Sam 19:23–24), Elijah (1 Kings 18:46), Elisha (2 Kings 3:15) and Micah (Mic 3:8). More specifically, Bezalel son of Uri is “filled ... with the Spirit of God” and with the assorted skills of craftsmanship necessary for building the tabernacle (Ex 31:3; 35:31 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and Joshua is “filled with the spirit of wisdom” (Deut 34:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is to Luke that we owe the most vivid images of individuals being filled with the Spirit. John the Baptist is “filled with the Holy Spirit even from birth” (Lk 1:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); his mother is filled with the Spirit as she utters her blessing on Mary (Lk 1:41); and his father, Zechariah, is filled with the Spirit and prophecies (Lk 1:67). At Pentecost all of the gathered believers are filled with the Spirit and speak in tongues (Acts 2:4), and later Peter (Acts 4:8) and Paul (Acts 9:17; 13:9) and other disciples (Acts 4:31; 13:52) will be filled with the Spirit. And in Ephesians the metaphor of “filling” is set in contrast with being filled, or drunk, with wine (Eph 5:18).

Elsewhere the metaphor of “dwelling” can be used to speak of life guided by the Spirit of God: “You, however, are controlled not by the sinful nature but by the Spirit, if the Spirit of God lives in you... But if the Spirit of him who raised Jesus from the dead is living in you, he who raised Christ from the dead will also give life to your mortal bodies through his Spirit, who lives in you” (Rom 8:9–11). Finally, and most dramatically, Paul reminds the Corinthians that “your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit within you” (1 Cor 6:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

But the fearsome counterpart to a body being “filled” with the Holy Spirit is a body inhabited by demons, or “unclean spirits.” The Gerasene demoniac has a “legion” of spirits who come out of him and enter a herd of swine (Mk 5:9—13; Lk 8:30—32). Mary Magdalene is identified as one from whom “seven demons had come out” (Lk 8:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Mk 16:9). And in many other instances we read of demons “coming out” of individuals, with the implication that these spirits somehow inhabit these human bodies. Jesus even speaks of an evil spirit going out of a man and seeking but not finding rest. The spirit will then return to his former “house,” now “swept clean and put in order,” and bring “seven other spirits more wicked than itself” (Lk 11:24—26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is as if to say that a body vacated but not inhabited by the Spirit of God is a body with its “vacancy” sign turned on.

The Body in Decline. Job speaks of the wealthy person who dies in “full vigor” with the “body well nourished” and “bones rich with marrow” (Job 21:23—24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And Lamentations intones the lament of Jerusalem under the hand of God’s judgment: “He has made my skin and my flesh grow old and has broken my bones” (Lam 3:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But the prevailing view in the Bible is the straightforward reality of death as the terminal point of a gradual decline. The physical body achieves its fullest potential in youth and then seems to slide toward the grave. The imagery of bodily decline presented in Ecclesiastes 12:1—7 is unsurpassed: The body’s posture and carriage decline “when the keepers of the house tremble, and the strong men stoop”; eating grows difficult as “the grinders cease because they are few”; eyesight is impaired as “those looking through the windows grow dim”; sleep is fragile and yet hearing fails as “men rise up at the sound of birds, but all their songs grow faint”; and finally, the body fails as “man goes to his eternal home and mourners go about the streets. ... [A]nd the dust returns to the ground it came from, and the spirit returns to God who gave it” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Old age brings a decline in the body’s vitality and warmth in sharp contrast with the body of one’s youth. Thus David in his old age “could not keep warm even when they put covers over him,” and he required the services of a “young virgin” to attend to him and lie beside him “that our lord the king may keep warm” (1 Kings 1:1–4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Kings 4:34).

The aging of the body is also an opportunity for faith. Abraham’s strikes a remarkable image of faith when he believes God’s promise of a son from his body and Sarah’s womb, even when they are both old. As Paul puts it, “Without weakening in his faith, he faced the fact that his body was as good as dead—since he was about a hundred years old—and that Sarah’s womb was also dead” (Rom 4:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Body of Death. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] when life leaves a body, the body immediately becomes ceremonially unclean (Lev 21:11; Num 9:6–7). Death is a powerful contaminant. A living body that comes in contact with a dead body must go through rituals of cleansing prior to being reinstated into full membership among the “clean” (Num 5:2; Hag 2:13). In the book of Numbers the uncleanness of dead bodies is a notable motif, for this book relates the death of an entire generation of Israelites in the wilderness. How are those who come in contact with dead bodies to be restored fully to life within Israel’s camp? A cleansing agent of water combined with the ashes of a red heifer plays an important role in purifying the body of a person made unclean by contact with death (Num 19). The image of an unclean dead body is not simply explainable on the grounds of a modern understanding of sanitation, though the analogy is apt. It is an image that draws our attention to the boundary between the realm of the living and the realm of the dead. In the schema of Israel's holy camp within the wilderness, where God dwells in its midst (Num 5:2—4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 9:13), death is associated with the wilderness, the world outside the camp. Dead bodies are transported outside the camp, and those who come in contact with dead bodies remain unclean for a period of seven days while they undergo purification. If they fail to do so, they will be “cut off from Israel” (Num 19:13). The “body” of Israel (represented by the camp with its boundaries) is to be pure, living and undefiled by death in much the same manner that individual Israelite bodies are to be undefiled by death.

Dead bodies are to be buried. They are to be returned to the earth from which they came: “for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return” (Gen 3:19 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). It is easy to understand why the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] portrays the realm of the dead, sheol, as the “underworld” (Is 14:9—11). One goes “down” to death, or the grave (Job 21:13; Ps 55:15; Is 14:15; Ezek 31:15—17). And there the body is consumed by worms, maggots and decay (Job 21:26; Is 14:11). In contrast, a body left exposed is a shameful thing (Jer 36:30). And a body treated like refuse and eaten by wild beasts is the ultimate shame (2 Kings 9:34—37). Even the dead body of a criminal or an enemy that is hung on a tree is to be buried by nightfall (Deut 21:22—23; Josh 8:29; 10:26—27). Failing to keep this law brings desecration on the land the Lord gives Israel, for a body subjected to hanging is a body cursed, and a cursed thing has the power to defile (Deut 21:23; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 31:10).

Some dead bodies are brought back to life. Elisha brings to life the dead body of the Shunnamite woman's son (2 Kings 4:32—35). A dead body thrown into Elisha's tomb springs to life as it touches Elisha's bones (2 Kings 13:21). But these are only resuscitated bodies. Job speaks with confidence of a true resurrection (Job 19:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and Christ's body is the first to be raised from among the dead in the resurrection of the last days. Peter speaks eloquently of the resurrection of Christ, summoning up the reversal of bodily decline: "he was not abandoned to the grave, nor did his body see decay" (Acts 2:31 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 13:36).

The Body of Christ. The primary use of the word body as an image in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is the Pauline "body [Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] sōma] of Christ" as an image of the church. This understanding of "body" as an image for the Christian community of faith is rooted in the Hebraic rejection we see also in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] of any distinction between the body and the spirit. "Body" in both OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] refers to the whole human being, with corporeal substance being the very expression of the person. Hence, such an image as we find addressed to the church in Corinth, "Now you are the body of Christ and each one of you is a part of it" (1 Cor 12:27), rests on the idea of the body as the essential expression of the whole person: in this case the crucified and risen Christ. This is the key to a right understanding of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] image of the church as "the body."

The primary use of "body" (of Christ) as an image for the church can never be separated from the words with which Christ institutes the Last Supper and the sacrifice they describe: "This is my body[-whole person-broken] for you" (Mk 14:22; 1 Cor 11:24). So the liturgical, eucharistic image of "this is my body" lies behind Paul's use of "Christ's body, the church." Just as it was both a metaphor-as Jesus held and broke the bread, saying “this is my body”—and also an actuality, in that his body was literally to be given, so the church as the body of Christ is both a metaphor and an actuality (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rom 12:4). The church, being the present corporeal, earthly manifestation of the saving act of Christ, is not just “like” a body, it “is” a body. But the special nature of this body is that the “being a body” is effected by Christ.

In Colossians we see this double meaning strongly emphasized. In Colossians 1:22 the body is the crucified body of the Lord Jesus. Yet in Colossians 1:18 and 1:24, Paul is clearly using the same term for the Christian community (“He is the head of the body, the church... For the sake of his body, that is, the church”). Likewise when Paul has his vision on the Damascus Road, Jesus confronts him with the question “Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?” (Acts 9:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It is clear in the narrative that Paul had not directly persecuted Jesus but rather has attacked the church. Christ is so closely identifies with the church that to persecute the church is to persecute Christ.

The crucified body of Jesus and the ecclesial body, the church, therefore cannot be separated. Several consequences for the meaning of the image flow from this. First, though, we must note that in the earlier epistles, particularly Corinthians and Romans, the emphasis is on the local church as expressing in its unity the crucified and living Christ. But in the later epistles, Colossians and Ephesians, the image has moved outward to embrace the universal church (Col 1:18; 2:19; Eph 1:22—23; 4:16). Christ is the “head” of a body which is more than the local community of faith, and this change in the image is of the greatest importance, because it marks through its shift a vision of a church “producing fruit and growing ... all over the world” (Col 1:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), a calling to mission which is at least as imperative as the call to build up the life of the local faith community.

This missionary dimension of the “growing body” image is in part a response by Paul, particularly in Colossians, to a preoccupation of the Greek world to which the gospel was preached. That is, Paul is addressing the so-called cosmic anxiety of the Hellenic culture: the fear that the cosmos was separated from God and so subject to powers and demons. (Though we would express our fears differently, the issue of the cosmos and the sovereignty of God over it has a peculiarly contemporary note.) In Colossians, Paul asserts in the context of the image of the church as the body of Christ that the universe is subject to the lordship of Christ (Col 1:15–17). He is head-in the sense of having dominion over-the defeated powers of the cosmos as he is head ecclesiologically over the reconciled (Col 1:22) community, the church. The form of this dominion is in the preaching and spread of the gospel through all the world, permeating the cosmos.

The saving power of this preaching to all creatures is emphasized in the nature of the reconciled community as it is presented as the “body of Christ” in Ephesians. In Ephesians 2:13–16 those reconciled to God “in one body through the cross” are the once irreconcilable Jews and Gentiles. The “one body” is both the crucified body of Christ but also, indivisibly, the “one new man” of Ephesians 2:15, which Christ, “abolishing in his flesh the law with its commandments” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), has created “in himself” out of the two, Jew and Gentile. The mission to all non-Jews is furthering the growth in unity of “the body” in a way which is a paradigm for all divided humanity (Eph 2:12–16). It has been well said that this too has a cosmic dimension, since all growth of the body, the church, through the preaching of the gospel, is but bringing to light what already is. So the “demons,” who may seem to control the separation of the world from God, are powerless against “the fullness of him that fills everything in every way” (Eph 1:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) in the subjection of all things to Christ “not only in the present age but also in the one to come” (Eph 1:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The force of the body as image of the church thus becomes very challenging. For the body of Christ, crucified and risen, creating unity and service in his followers is a given fact, not a dream of potential. It is the believers’ unity with Christ which creates the fellowship, not the fellowship which creates the unity with Christ. Both in the local church and in the church universal, unity and service are properly the spontaneous expression of being the “body of Christ.” It is a service which therefore all Christians offer not only to each other but, like their Lord, beyond, for Christ is (so they must be) “the body for the world.”

The Body Redeemed. The holistic view of “body” as the whole person, which permeates the Bible, makes for certain other implications for “body” as image. For it means that body becomes the place where we meet God and live out our service to him. It is the expression of our divinely given creatureliness, where obedience is practiced. And it is seen always therefore in relationship, with God and the fellow creatures with whom we share our corporeality, our “bodiness.”

It follows that redemption must be understood not as “from” the body but “of” it (Rom 8:23). Therefore even the future life is a bodily one. “In the body” in Paul’s writing usually means “earthly,” but there will be a God-given “heavenly” body (1 Cor 15:35–44; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 8:11). Nonbodily resurrection is inconceivable to Paul.

Equally, nonresurrection is inconceivable, since it is a participation in the resurrection body of the Lord Jesus. In 2 Corinthians 5:1–10 Paul makes a distinction not between “soul” and “body” but between our future resurrection bodies and the present mortal ones. In these present mortal bodies we will be questioned in the judgment, for it is where we do our living, believing, serving. Life after death is dependent on the gracious will and act of God through Christ Jesus, and our human appropriating of it. The reality of that appropriation is expressed by our life in the body (Rom 8:11; 1 Cor 6:14).

Hence the body image attracts the theme of sovereignty over the body, the sovereignty of God versus the sovereignty of sin. In Romans 6:12 Paul writes, “Therefore do not let sin reign in your mortal body” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God has broken the sovereignty of sin in our bodies because he has bought them back as his own possession, for they are now, through his sacrifice, Christ’s. Because Christ has given his own “body,” his total person, for them, they belong to him and he to them (1 Cor 6:13).

Hence, too, these same bodies will be made like Jesus’ “body of glory” (Phil 3:21), so the body, the total person, will itself be transformed. (This neither assumes nor denies the regrouping of the material substance of our bodies). The form of this body of “glory”* cannot be surmised. What is certain is that it is in some way “like,” empowered by, the resurrection body of Christ.

There are implications here for the church as the “body of Christ.” In its earthly body it is called to identify itself with the incarnate and crucified Christ, offering itself (both in its individual members and corporately) as a sacrifice to God, so that it is no longer its own: “present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God” (Rom 12:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It can do this only through Christ’s body, given for us. But the promise that this lowly body will be made like his exalted body is a promise also that the church itself shall be transformed into a body of glory. For the church as the body of Christ participates not only in the crucified but also the resurrected body of the Lord.

The Body Disciplined. A further aspect of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] body image grows from the original Hebraic understanding. If, for Christians, the body is where one is redeemed and lives out the redeemed earthly life, it follows that an over-spiritualized piety is inappropriate (2 Cor 7:1). Hence in his Corinthian letters Paul insists that it is in his body that he brings the life of Christ into effect for the community. What we do with our bodies (whether corporately as a community or as individual members) is a part of the totality of both obedience to Christ and proclamation of him. So the suffering which is visible in Paul’s body lends conviction to his preaching (2 Cor 1:3–7), for the wounds he bears in his body are also the wounds of Jesus (Gal. 6:17), and he bears about in his body constantly the dying of Jesus: “so that his life may be revealed in our mortal body” (2 Cor 4:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). For the life of Jesus can only be shown forth in the body. So, while rejecting asceticism as a way of salvation (Col 2:3), Paul finds it necessary to take steps to discipline and control his body (1 Cor 9:27).

All this lies behind his specific words on the sexual activity of the body (1 Cor 6:18). It is not possible for the Christian, who is united in the body with Christ, to enact in that same body sexual immorality (1 Cor 6:13, 15). Behind this lies the view that in the sexual act the body—the whole person—belongs wholly to the “other” (it is a holistic view of sexual activity) so it cannot belong to both Christ and a prostitute

(1 Cor 6:16–18). All of this is implicit in one of Paul’s most mysterious and powerful images involving both body and flesh: in Ephesians 5:23–32 Paul likens the relationship of Christ and his church to that between husband and wife. Christ loves the church as his own body, and “in this same way, husbands ought to love their wives as their own bodies ... for we are members of his body” (Eph 5:28, 30). And so we are a part of the same “profound mystery” in relationship with Christ as that within which husband and wife “become one flesh” (Eph 5:31, 32). There are implications here for both the corporate life of the church—which in its earthly “body” must never be “joined with” that which dishonors the body of Christ—and for the personal lives of its individual members.

The obverse of this sexual image is that the body, while being a morally neutral context in which we make our choices (one can be “in the body” and also “in the Lord,” 2 Cor 12:1–3), is yet also vulnerable: physically, to hurt and mortality; spiritually, to limitations of spiritual discernment (Mat 16:17); and morally, to sin (Rom 6:12). Hence the reiterated insistence on the body’s purchase by Christ, that it may be under his sovereignty. Hence, too, the use of the term flesh, on occasion, to indicate a state of sin. Romans 8:13 warns against living “according to the flesh” (translated in NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] as “sinful nature,” but the word is sarx), for that means certain death. Therefore one must “by the Spirit” put to death “the misdeeds of the body.” And the whole argument culminating in Romans 6:12 suggests that “the body” once belonged to sin and by nature, but for the grace of Christ, would easily revert to sin (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 6:20).

The Body Discerned. This vulnerability to sin is focused in the Last Supper references within the image of the church as body. Paul issues a sharp warning about anyone who participates in the Eucharist “without discerning the body” and thus eats and drinks “judgment against themselves” (1 Cor 11:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The lack of discernment has two aspects. First, it refers to the failure to recognize the power of Christ’s act of self-giving in the incarnation and supremely on the cross. It is not the actuality of flesh within the sacrament that is in view but the actuality of Christ’s effective act of redemption. This is the “true body,” the “real presence” of the holy table.

The second aspect of sinning in “not recognizing the body” flows from this, for it is the failure to recognize the unity within which the partaker actually stands. Since the bread we break is “a sharing in the body of Christ, ... we who are many are one body, for we all partake of the one bread” (1 Cor 10:16–17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Hence it is not a potential unity which goes unrecognized but an actual one, made so by the actuality of Christ’s gracious action. “Discerning” this involves living out in the church, bodily, this unity, what it already is, in and through Christ.

The sin of not discerning is in the end only to be overcome through Christ’s grace operating in our life. Then our own will and longing is offered wholly to him. Hence the last word on the image of the body and its concomitant, flesh, for both the local and the universal church and for its individual “members,” is perhaps that of Paul in Galatians 2:20: “I no longer live, but Christ lives in me. The life I live in the body, I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me”.

See also Arm; Belly; Breast; Ear, Hearing; Eye, Sight; Fat, Fatness; Feet; Finger; Hair; Hand; Head; Heart; Inner Parts, Bowels; Leg; Lips; Mouth; Naked, Nakedness; Neck; Nose, Nostrils; Sex; Stomach; Thigh; Toe.

Bibliography. J. H. Neyrey, Paul, In Other Words (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1990); H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974).

BODY OF CHRIST.

See Body.

BOLDNESS

Boldness is a biblical motif associated with those whose courage is born out of their trust in God; it is a trait of the righteous, who are “as bold as a lion” (Prov 28:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Many heroes of the biblical narratives convey this image of boldness; often it is a single bold act that reveals a character’s trust in God. One example is Abraham’s bargaining with God on behalf of Sodom. Although he admits to being no more than “dust and ashes,” Abraham engages the Lord like a vendor in the marketplace, convincing him to spare Sodom for the sake of at first fifty, then forty-five, forty, thirty, twenty, and finally only ten righteous people within the city (Gen 18:23–32). God keeps to his bargain but destroys Sodom and Gomorrah anyway, because there is no one righteous left to be found there (Gen 18:25). While his boldness in haggling with God seems perilous, it reveals that Abraham knows God and trusts him to act justly.

In a similar episode, when God resolves to destroy Israel for their idolatry with the golden calf, Moses entreats him to relent so that the Egyptians should not speak ill of the Lord because of Israel’s fate (Ex 32:12). Moses then appeals to the promise that God swore to Abraham to produce a nation from his descendants, and at this the Lord agrees to spare Israel (Ex 32:13, 14). Here it is Moses’s boldness that secures a future for Israel. Moreover, Moses has grounds to speak boldly before God, because he knows that God is faithful and will keep his promises.

The motif of boldness also serves a pivotal and declarative purpose. Often a character's bold act is key to the further unfolding of the story, which culminates in the indisputable victory of God and a declaration of his power. For example, it is the boldness of Daniel, who insists on praying to God despite the danger, that makes possible God's subsequent delivery of him from the lions. This proves to be such a compelling testimony to the power of Daniel's God that king Darius proclaims, "He is the living God and he endures forever" (Dan 6:26). It is likewise with Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, who are bold enough to face the furnace and accept death rather than worship idols. Consequently God has the opportunity to save them from the flames, thus demonstrating the degree of his might to Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 3:16–28). In both cases it is the boldness of the characters that moves the story forward and makes known the power of God to preserve those who trust him.

The same is true of those who exhibit boldness in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] : God's purposes and the revelation of his power depend on the bold acts of those who put their trust in him. Thus John the Baptist preaches the coming of Jesus the Messiah (Jn 1:29–31); and at the risk of being stoned, Jesus declares to the Jews, "before Abraham was born, I am" (Jn 8:58). Peter preaches that Jesus is the Christ before the Jews at Pentecost (Acts 3:12–26), and Paul proclaims the gospel before Festus and Agrippa (Acts 26:4–23). In each case it is a boldness founded on trust in God that carries forward and reveals God's purposes.

An important characteristic of these bold biblical figures is that they act with the knowledge that whatever they do is subject to God's authority. They may act boldly, sometimes to the point of appearing to challenge God, but always with the understanding that it is God who is in control of the events they are helping to unfold. It is this submissive feature of biblical boldness that distinguishes it from brashness, which does not acknowledge God. One example of brashness is King Ahab, who is heedless of God and utterly brazen in his idolatry (1 Kings 16:30–33). Because Ahab does not acknowledge God even after repeated warnings, his actions are not bold but rather display the brashness of a fool, as God's eventual judgment of him confirms (1 Kings 22:37, 38). In contrast the biblical motif of boldness finds expression in those who acknowledge God and whose courage is tempered and instructed by their complete trust in him.

See also Brashness; Courage; Hero, Heroine.

BONDAGE AND FREEDOM

The connected images of bondage and freedom are employed with great power and significance in the Bible. A word study alone will not reveal the full extent of the imagery, which underlies some of the greatest biblical themes, including sin, redemption, flesh and spirit, law, and truth. Two literal images of bondage prevail in the Bible—the political state of a nation and the condition of slavery. The image of the prison is also important. Freedom is defined simply as the release from these types of bondage. Metaphoric uses turn these into spiritual conditions.

Political Bondage and Freedom: Egypt. The leading image of political bondage in the Bible is the four hundred years of slavery the nation of Israel endured in Egypt, which was rendered famous to readers of the English Bible by the evocative epithet “house of bondage” in the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]. Behind this expression lie the Exodus stories of the enslavement of Israel in Egypt, in which Israel “groaned under their bondage, and cried out for help, and their cry under bondage came up to God” (Ex 2:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

If the slavery of the nation in Egypt is the master image of political bondage, the exodus from Egypt is correspondingly the major image of political freedom. The whole exodus story is told as a liberation from political bondage, described by the great language of redemption in Deuteronomy: “The Lord has brought you out with a mighty hand, and redeemed you from the house of bondage” (Deut 7:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 9:26, 13:5). The description of this deliverance as a redemption introduces the idea of new ownership. Israel has been bought by its deliverer and now belongs to him: “I bore you on eagles’ wings and brought you to myself” (Ex 19:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This freedom does not mean autonomy. Israel no longer belongs to Pharaoh and to Pharaoh’s gods, but to God. Thus the story of the exodus introduces a spiritual dimension into both the bondage and the deliverance: leaving bondage to the anti-God powers of Egypt, Israel is brought into a new relationship with the Lord.

The tragedy of Jewish history in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is that the freedom secured by God at the exodus was only temporary. Moses in Deuteronomy already envisions a sad future when the process of deliverance will be reversed because Israel will fail to maintain the covenantal relationship with its Deliverer. When Moses lists the curses that will befall the nation if it fails to obey God’s commands (Deut 28), he paints an ever-expanding picture of bondage, including political bondage (Deut 28:64–68). Moses himself predicts that the nation will rebel against God and “do what is evil in the sight of the Lord, provoking him to anger through the work of your hands” (Deut 31:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Bondage and Freedom in Later Old Testament History. This fall back into bondage is a leading motif in the history that follows. We see the cycle in Judges, where in response to Israel's sin, the Lord repeatedly "sold them into the power of their enemies round about" (Judg 2:14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 3:7, 12; 4:2; 6:1; 10:7; 13:1). The process reaches a climax in 2 Kings 17, when Israel is finally deported to political bondage in Assyria. The prophets comment on the spiritual causes underlying this renewed enslavement, which was a political reality for many of them. Thus Jeremiah warns Judah in the Lord's name: "Through your own fault you will lose the inheritance I gave you. I will enslave you to your enemies in a land you do not know" (Jer 17:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] political bondage is tied to the spiritual state of the nation, having disobedience to covenant obligations as its clearly announced cause.

If the exile is the later counterpart to bondage in Egypt, the liberation counterpart to the earlier exodus is the restoration of Israel after exile. Some of the prophetic pictures of freedom refer to the literal return of a remnant to the Promised Land, but in the visions of the millennium the vision seems to broaden in scope beyond that. In both cases the return to the land is a return to God, and freedom is the result. In the coming golden age, captive Jerusalem will "loose the bonds from her neck" (Is 52:2). God himself will "break the yoke from off their neck, and ... burst their bonds" (Jer 30:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Nahum 1:13). God will "bring out the prisoners from the dungeon" (Is 42:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Is 49:9; 61:1).

Slaves and Prisoners. The political bondage of nations is supplemented by two other main categories—slavery (see Slave, Slavery) and imprisonment (see Prison). The more than 250 references to slaves and slavery picture the social world of Bible times—a world in which household slaves or servants were an accepted part of the socioeconomic structure. No matter how accepted the practice was, it was nonetheless a form of bondage in which slaves were under the complete control of their masters. Freedom was the condition toward which slaves aspired; a stipulation in the Mosaic law prescribed that Hebrew slaves must be freed after six years of labor for a master (Ex 21:2). One of the reasons God sent Judah into exile was its failure to keep its promises to free slaves (Jer 34). A stock antithesis (especially in the NT [NT NT. New Testament]) is “slave and free.”

Over a hundred biblical references to prisons and prisoners show it to be a major image of bondage as well. The Bible gives us instances of both just imprisonment (2 Kings 17:4; Ezra 7:26) and unjust incarceration (Gen 39:20; Jer 37:18), but in either case imprisonment is a uniformly negative experience that takes away a person’s freedom. Accordingly, release from prison is one of the most evocative images of freedom in the Bible—one that focuses on the moment of transition from bondage to freedom. One of four mini-rescue stories in Psalm 107 is of the prisoners who had “sat in darkness and in gloom, ... in affliction and in irons,” whose hearts “were bowed down with hard labor.” When they cried to the Lord, “he delivered them from their distress; he brought them out of darkness and gloom, and broke their bonds asunder” (Ps 107:10—14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Jesus and Paul. While the literal versions of bondage and freedom in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] often shade off into metaphoric and spiritual meanings, with Jesus the primary frame of reference is spiritual. Since Jesus started no liberation movement to free slaves, his famous statement in this vein must be metaphorically intended when he claims that God “has sent me to proclaim release to the captives and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty those who are oppressed” (Lk 4:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). So too in John 8:31–32: “If you continue in my word, you are truly my disciples, and you will know the truth, and the truth will make you free” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And again, “Every one who commits sin is a slave to sin... So if the Son makes you free, you will be free indeed” (Jn 8:34, 36 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The motif of bondage and freedom is central to the teaching of Paul, and it takes two forms: bondage to law and bondage to sin and death.

The first Pauline motif sees the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ceremonial law—and indeed also the moral law if it is viewed as the means for attaining salvation by purely human merit—as a bondage from which the Christian gospel of grace as God’s gift frees a person through faith. The classic text is the epistle to the Galatians, written to dissuade Christian converts from succumbing to the attempts of Judaizers to get them to adhere again to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ceremonial law as a necessary part of salvation. “For freedom Christ has set us free,” writes Paul; “stand fast therefore, and do not submit again to a yoke of slavery” (Gal 5:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Christ was “born under the law, to redeem those who were under the law” (Gal 4:4–5). To “rely on works of the law” for salvation is to be “under a curse” (3:10). Similarly, to place oneself under the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] law is “slavery,” while choosing “the Jerusalem above is free” (Gal 4:24–25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The customary motif of bondage to sin and death is also present in Paul. This is implied, for example, when Paul writes, “You were called to freedom, brethren; only do not use your freedom as an opportunity for the flesh,” which is an implied bondage (Gal 5:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also 1 Pet 2:16). So too in Romans, Paul equates sin and bondage: “You are slaves of the one whom you obey,” and to obey sin “leads to death” (Rom 6:16; see also Rom 6:20 and 2 Pet 2:19, which asserts that “you are a slave to whatever has mastered you” NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Correspondingly, a Christian can give “thanks ... to God, that you who were once slaves of sin have ... been set free from sin” (Rom 6:17–18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). There is an eschatological side to this as well: a day is coming when “the creation itself will be set free from its bondage to decay and obtain the glorious liberty of the children of God” (Rom 8:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Paul’s love of paradox and metaphor leads to a further motif—that of believers in bondage or imprisonment to Christ. People “who were once slaves of sin ... have become slaves of righteousness” (Rom 6:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, “you have been set free from sin and have become slaves of God” (Rom 6:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Elsewhere Paul pictures himself as a willing “prisoner for Christ Jesus” (Eph 3:1) and “prisoner for the Lord” (Eph 4:1). This equals the boldness of an evocative OT [OT OT. Old Testament] reference to the people of the coming restoration as “prisoners of hope” (Zech 9:12).

See also Babylon; Curse; Death; Egypt; Exile; Exodus, Second Exodus; Pharaoh; Prison; Redeem, Redeemer; Sin; Slave, Slavery.

BONE

The Hebrews knew that the bones supported the body and that great bones meant great strength (Job 40:18). The articulations of the skeleton also provided natural divisions for sacrificial animals, whose bones should not be broken, so bone occasionally designated the severed limbs (Judg 19:29) or a “cut” of meat (Ezek 24:4). The bulk of the more than one hundred mentions of bone, however, refers not to actual bones, but to the bones as the essence of the individual, the repository of physical (Job 20:11; 30:17, 30, psychological (Ezek 37:11) and spiritual health (Prov 3:8), even of life itself. It is beyond human understanding “how the spirit comes to the bones in the womb of a woman with child” (Eccl 11:5).

Other uses of the Hebrew word for bone, ‘esem, offer a wider insight into its range of meaning. Occasionally it means “essence” or “self” as in the expressions (literally rendered) “the bone of the heavens” meaning “the sky itself” (Ex 24:10) or the common idiom “in the bone of this day” meaning “on the very same day” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 7:13). In keeping with this figure of speech, individuals refer to their bones when describing the deepest aspects of their lives, the core of their being, their very selves. The sensation of pain in the bones is used to express the depth of anguish (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] Job 30:17; Ps 6:2) and is linked with unforgiven sin and divine judgment (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] Ps 32:3; 38:3; 51:8; Lam 1:13; 3:4).

Adam’s description of Eve as “bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh” (Gen 2:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) conveys his sense of the fact that, unlike the animals he has named, this new individual is profoundly and essentially him. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] uses “bone and blood” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 9:2; 2 Sam 5:1 AV; Job 2:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] “flesh and bone,” Lk 24:39) in the same sense that we refer to relatives as “our flesh and blood.”

That a lifeless body, upon touching Elisha’s bones, should receive its spirit again and stand upright underscores the importance and power associated with the bones (2 Kings 13:21; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 13:31). As the last part of the human body to decay, the bones enshrined and preserved the essence of an individual. The bones are the remains (Amos 6:10; Gen 50:25; Ex 13:19) and symbolize the fate of the individual. The bones of the wicked lie “strewn at the mouth of Sheol” (Ps 141:7). The poets often use bones to picture what remains of God’s people (Ps 22:15; 31:11; 102:4; Lam 1:13; Hab 3:16). Ezekiel’s Valley of Dry Bones, like the nation (Jer 50:17; Micah 3:2–3), lacks only the Spirit of God to come to life (Ezek 37). To destroy the bones is to remove all hope of return (Ezek 37:11). Crushed bones signify utter destruction (Num 24:8; Is 38:13; Dan 6:24). The Passover regulations prohibited breaking any of the bones of the sacrificial lamb to preserve the integrity of its essence (Ex 12:46; Num 9:12). John, presenting Christ as the complete Lamb of God (John 19:33–36), records that his bones were not broken at the crucifixion, in fulfillment of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy (Ps 34:20).

As the last surviving part of an individual, bones were to be treated with respect (Sir 49:15; 1 Macc 13:25). Burning the bones had serious consequences (Ezek 24:10; Amos 2:1). Joseph took care to ensure that his bones would be brought back to the Promised Land (Gen 50:25; Ex 13:19; Heb 11:22). Not to be buried but to have one’s bones exposed was a sign of particular disgrace (2 Sam 21:1–15), the ignominy of which served as a common battlefield taunt (1 Sam 17:44; 1 Kings 14:11; 16:4; 21:24) and evidence of divine judgment (Ps 53:5; Jer 8:1–3).

To touch human bones or the graves in which they were buried resulted in ceremonial uncleanness (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] Num 19:16) and so tombs would be whitewashed as a warning to keep away (Mt 23:27). Bones which remained unburied led to the defilement of the land (Ezek 39:15).

Contact with human bones rendered an altar deconsecrated (1 Kings 13:2; 2 Kings 23:14—20; Ezek 6:5).

See also Body; Burial, Funeral; Death.

BOOK

The Hebrew term translated “book” actually refers to anything that is written, whether it is a letter, certificate of divorce, indictment, genealogical record or volume. Several types of materials were used in ancient writing. Clay tablets were the first writing material. Animal skins were used early as well. The skins were sewn together to form a roll, which was then wound around either one or two rods to form a scroll. Papyrus rolls were used in Egypt by about 3000 b.c. and were used by the Jews to record the law of Moses. Eventually the codex, or book form, replaced the scrolls, but this was not until at least the second century A.D.

References to “book” or “books” in English translations number well over a hundred (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] 128, NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] 140). The majority of these references are to either the Book of the Law (also called the Book of the Covenant) or to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] court chronicles. Beyond these references the two most important and evocative “books” in the Bible are metaphoric books. One is the heavenly record of the deeds of every living person. Another is the list of names of those who will dwell in the eternal city. In Revelation this book is called the book of life (Rev 20:15). In the background is the practice in biblical times of keeping an official register of the names of citizens of a given town or kingdom. If citizenship was forfeited, the name would be blotted from the register.

The books of God’s record of a person’s deeds and his register of heavenly citizenship are intertwined, since a person's actions are the basis of judgment. This combination can be traced all the way back to Exodus 32:32, where Moses asks that his name be blotted out of God's book if God will not forgive Israel's sin. On the day of final judgment the book of deeds will be opened, and each person will be judged according to what he or she has done. But another book, the book of life written from the foundation of the world, will also be opened at that time (Rev 17:8; 20:12). Jesus will acknowledge before the Father and the angels those whose names are written there (Rev 3:5). Everyone will be judged from the books of deeds, but those whose names appear in the book of life will enter the eternal city (Rev 21:27). Those whose names are not written in the Lamb's book of life will be cast into the lake of fire (Rev 20:15).

A variation of the book of a person's life occurs in Psalm 139:16, where the events that are preordained to happen in a person's life are said to be written in God's book "before one of them came to be" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Scroll imagery is sometimes used in prophecy as a symbol of God's revelation to the prophet. In Ezekiel 2:9—3:3 Ezekiel receives a scroll from God, written on both sides. He is told to eat the scroll, a symbol of his acceptance of God's call and revelation to him. "So I ate it, and it tasted as sweet as honey in my mouth" (3:3). Similarly John receives a scroll in Revelation (10:8—11). "Take it and eat it," he is told. "It will turn your stomach sour, but in your mouth it will be as sweet as honey" (Rev 10:9). Here the prophecy is good news to the saints, but with it comes distress, hence John's stomach turns sour. Another scroll appears in Revelation, also with writing on both sides. Here, only the Lamb that was slain is worthy to break its seven seals. Each seal brings wrath, and the scroll is opened, revealing God's judgment.

Certainly for the Jew the most important book was Scripture, even though it is rarely called that in the Bible itself. Jealously guarded by the scribes (transcribers of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament]), the meticulous and accurate preservation of the holy writings are amazing when compared to other human writings of the time that have been lost.

See also Bible; Scroll.

BORN AGAIN.

See Rebirth.

BORROW, BORROWING.

See Lend, Lending.

BOSOM.

See Abraham's Bosom; Breast.

BOUND.

See Bind, Bound.

BOW, BOWING

Bowing is one of the most basic acts of showing deference in the Scripture. The image of bowing or prostrating oneself is contained in several of the key biblical words for worship (see Lying Prostrate).

An Egyptian woman bows down with one leg drawn up beneath her to allow her to rise easily.

The most common use of bowing is to portray appropriate respect and deference. This use is found throughout the biblical narratives. Examples include Abraham bowing low before the three visitors (Gen 19:2), Abraham bowing as part of the land transaction (Gen 23:7), Ruth bowing to Boaz (Rev 2:10) and Mephibosheth bowing before his benefactor, David (2 Sam 9:8). By and large ordinary bowing is simply a detail that helps carry along the story being told. Not so for the other categories of bowing.

The first is bowing to an illegitimate object. In the Decalogue bowing to idols is used in the prescription against idolatry: “You shall not bow down to them or worship them” (Ex 20:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). A typical assessment of Israel during the monarchy was that “they forsook all the commands of the Lord their God and made for themselves two idols cast in the shape of calves, and an Asherah pole. They bowed down to all the starry hosts, and they worshipped Baal” (2 Kings 17:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The habitual nature of this false worship is described thus: “He walked in all the ways of his father; he worshipped the idols his father had worshipped, and bowed down to them” (2 Kings 21:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). With biting irony Isaiah describes how a person fashions an idol with his own hands and then bows down to it: “From the rest he makes a god, his idol; he bows down to it and worships. He prays to it and says, Save me; you are my god” (Is 44:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Another sense is bowing against or apart from one’s will. In Psalm 72 one of the results of the king ordering his ways after those stipulated by God is that “the desert tribes will bow before him and his enemies will lick the dust” and that “all kings will bow down to him and all nations will serve him” (Ps 72:9, 11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Examples of this include when Israel is going to have to bow before its enemies: “Kings will see you and rise up, princes will see and bow down, because of the Lord, who is faithful, the Holy One of Israel, who has chosen you” (Is 49:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “They will bow down before you with their faces to the ground; they will lick the dust at your feet. Then you will know that I am the Lord; those who hope in me will not be disappointed” (Is 49:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Lying Prostrate.

BOW.

See Archery; Arrow, Arrow Of God.

BOWELS.

See Inner Parts, Bowels.

BOWL

A bowl is a container, usually rounded in shape, that contains either liquids or solids. Often the word is found in a culinary context, though not exclusively. It is related to other types of containers like jars, cups and basins. Although there is overlap between these containers, the bowl might be differentiated from the jar by shape and the basin by size.

The Bible often mentions the bowl in its literal sense, but frequently the word will have symbolic overtones. For instance, as a container a bowl can symbolize fullness and completion. In Zechariah 9:14–17 the prophet describes an appearance of the divine warrior with the result that they will be saved from their enemies. Metaphorically the people of God are described here as “full like a bowl used for sprinkling the corners of the altar” (Zech 9:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Num 7:13, 19, etc., for reference to the bowls used in temple service).

The bowl has symbolic value not only in the light of its essential nature as a container but also by virtue of what it contains. A notable example of this occurs in Revelation 16 where seven angels carrying “the seven bowls of God’s wrath” (Rev 16:1) pour out their contents on the earth, resulting in punishments on its inhabitants.

The bowl can also have symbolic value in the light of its use. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , for instance, bowls play a major role in the worship of Israel and are closely connected to the sanctuary (Ex 24:6; 25:29; 27:3 37:16; 38:3). As such, the bowls, which surely had a literal function, also come, by virtue of their association with the holy place, to connote the presence of God and his holiness.

Furthermore in Matthew 5:15 (Mk 4:21; Lk 11:33), Jesus teaches his followers that they must be the light of the world and that they should not obscure their responsibility by putting their light under a bowl. Such an unnatural use of a bowl over a lamp illustrates how strange it would be to hide one’s “good deeds and praise” (v. 16). In another Gospel context (Mt 26:23) Judas and Jesus have used a common bowl in their meal together. This then becomes a pointer to the one who will betray him. The irony is that a bowl shared at mealtime is a symbol of intimacy and trust. The one who betrays Jesus is one who is close to him.

The image of the bowl also appears in the famous portrait at the end of Ecclesiastes of the physiological symptoms of old age, followed by death. At the end of his speech the teacher concludes his comments on death with the image of household objects that are destroyed and rendered useless. Among other objects, we read of a “golden bowl” (Eccles 12:6). Life is like a precious and useful object that is ultimately rendered useless.

See also Cup.

BRANCH

Branches in the Bible refer either to trees or vines. While the overwhelming preponderance of references is symbolic, the symbol, as always, is rooted in the physical properties of the thing itself. At a literal, physical level, branches are a picture of a healthy and productive tree or vine. The branch is linked to either the solid trunk or main stock that nurtures and anchors it or the leafy outgrowth that springs from it. In the butler's dream that Joseph interpreted, a vine's three branches leaf out miraculously into clusters of ripened grapes, an image of fertility and abundance (Gen 40:10). In the exuberant picture of nature's provision in Psalm 104, the birds are pictured as living and singing in the branches of the trees that grow by streams (Ps 104:12). The evocativeness of the branches of a healthy tree is captured by the reference in Ezekiel 19:10 to a vineyard "fruitful and full of branches by reason of abundant water" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Mainly, though, branches provide a rich array of symbols in the Bible. In a land with regions where trees were a relative rarity, a healthy tree with strong branches readily became a symbol of strength and prosperity. If leafy, fruit-bearing branches indicate a prospering olive, vine or fig tree, they readily become a symbol for a human family: "Joseph is a fruitful bough, a fruitful bough by a spring; his branches run over the wall" (Gen 49:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Nations too, and especially their rulers, are referred to as trees. Pharaoh, king of Egypt, is told to consider Assyria like "a cedar in Lebanon, with fair branches and forest shade... All the birds of the air made their nests in its boughs; under its branches all the beasts of the field brought forth their young" (Ezek 31:3, 6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). But because the tree became proud of its towering height, "its branches will fall, and its boughs will lie broken” (Ezek 31:12). Psalm 80 pictures Israel as a vine brought by God out of Egypt, whose mighty branches covered mountains (Ps 80:10). Tragically the vine had been cut down and burned.

Just as the branch full of leaves and fruit is an archetype of abundance and blessing, so the broken or fruitless branch is an emblem of ruin and God’s disfavor. When one of Job’s counselors paints a portrait of the fate of an evil person, one of the details is that “his branch will not be green” (Job 15:32), while another counselor asserts regarding the wicked that “his branches wither above” (Job 18:16).

Nebuchadnezzar’s downfall is pictured as a tree that is hewn down, with its branches cut off and with birds fleeing from its branches (Dan 4:14). Extended to a national level, the image yields a picture of the Lord cutting off “palm branch and reed in one day” (Is 9:14) and hewing away “the spreading branches” of trees (Is 18:5; see also Jer 11:16 and Ezek 15), while a nation in decline is compared to four or five pieces of fruit on the branches of a fruit tree (Is 17:6). Again the day is coming when God will burn up evildoers and “leave them neither root nor branch” (Mal 4:1).

But if branches figure prominently in the oracles of judgment, they are also present in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] visions of coming restoration. The day will come when “the branch of the Lord shall be beautiful and glorious, and the fruit of the land shall be the pride and glory of the survivors of Israel” (Is 4:2). Israel restored will be like a transplanted cedar that brings forth boughs and bears fruit (Ezek 14:22—23). Within the visions of a coming golden age, the image of the branch receives special focus as a symbol of the Messiah. Thus “there shall come forth a shoot from the stump of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots” (Is 11:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, “the days are coming, says the Lord, when

I will raise up for David a righteous Branch” (Jer 23:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also Jer 33:15). Zechariah has prophecies about “my servant the Branch” (Zech 3:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and “the man whose name is the Branch” (Zech 6:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In these messianic prophecies the image of the branch becomes a title for God’s coming leader, who will be both king and priest.

A cluster of branch images might be termed ceremonial. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Feast of Booths included the ritual of residing for seven days in makeshift booths made from the branches of leafy trees (Lev 23:40; Neh 8:15). The mysterious “two anointed who stand by the Lord of the whole earth” are pictured as the “two branches of the olive trees” on the right and left of a lampstand (Zech 4:12–14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Palm branches were cut down and spread on the road in front of Jesus during the triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21:8; Mk 11:8; Jn 12:13) as part of a victory ritual.

The ability of a branch to sprout from the stumps of some types of tree makes it a symbol of rebirth. In Job 14:7–9 the case is put that “there is hope for a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again” and “put forth branches like a young plant” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As noted above, this rhythm underlies the references to the branch in the prophetic visions, where the tearing down of branches is regularly balanced with visions of branches restored or planted in the oracles that predict a coming messianic age.

When we come to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] images of the branch, we move in quite a different world. Here the focus is on the functional side of branches and what that can tell us about salvation. Most famous of all is Jesus’ discourse about his being the true vine (Jn 15:1–6). Drawing on familiar practices of husbandry, Jesus pictures himself as the true vine and his followers as branches dependent on the main vine. Bearing fruit depends on remaining united to the main vine. Any branch that does not bear fruit is pruned so that it may bear fruit. Anyone who does not abide in the true vine withers and is cast onto a pile of branches destined for burning.

Romans 11:16–24 elaborates the image in a similarly extended way, this time to picture the relationship of the salvation of Gentiles to the Jewish religion. The unbelief of the Jews is likened to branches that are broken from an olive tree. Gentile belief is portrayed as branches grafted onto the existing tree. Jews who come to belief will likewise be grafted onto the tree.

We may note, finally, Jesus' parable in which he pictures a mustard plant that becomes a tree, "so that the birds of the air come and make nests in its branches" (Mt 13:32; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 4:32; Lk 13:19). The fantastic size of the mustard "tree" is offered as a picture of the expansive promise of the kingdom of heaven.

As we survey the image of the branch in Scripture, it is obvious that it appears most often in the prophetic visions, as an oracle either of judgment or of coming salvation. In the Bible the image inherently tends toward symbolism, and its treatment is often imaginative and fantastic, with branches being given qualities and a magnitude that literal branches do not possess.

See also Fig, Fig Tree; Grafting; Leaf; Palm Tree; Pruning; Tree, Trees; Vine, Vineyard.

BRASHNESS

Brashness (or rashness) is characteristic of those who speak or act hastily or impulsively. Although things said or done brashly are not always sinful, they generally show a lack of wisdom and need a reasoned correction. In Psalm 31:22 David confesses, “For I said in my haste, ‘I am cut off from before Your eyes’; Nevertheless You heard the voice of my supplications when I cried out to You” (NKJV). In Psalm 116:11 he notes, “I said in my haste, ‘All men are liars’” (NKJV).

Impulsive brashness is a preoccupation in the wisdom literature of the Bible, which offers repeated warnings against it. It shows a lack of knowledge (Prov 19:2) and is common to fools (Prov 14:29; 29:20; Eccles 7:9; see Folly). Impulsive haste is linked with foolish quickness to anger (Prov 14:29; Eccles 7:9). It is an open invitation to end up being shamed (Prov 25:8) and can lead to poverty (Prov 21:5). It is even possible to be brash in one’s zeal before God: “Do not be rash with your mouth, and let not your heart utter anything hastily before God. For God is in heaven, and you on earth; therefore let your words be few” (Eccles 5:2 NKJV). In the epistle of James, perhaps the clearest NT [NT NT. New Testament] example of wisdom literature, we find the famous injunction, “Be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath” (Jas 1:19 NKJV).

The narratives of the Bible give us actual examples of the self-destructiveness of brashness. Thoughtless and impulsive zeal seized Jephthah when he made his vow to sacrifice the first thing he saw coming out of his house to meet him (Judg 11:31–39) and Uzzah when he reached out to steady the ark of the covenant (2 Sam 6:6–7). Personal anger motivated Moses to strike the rock (Num 20:10–12), James and John to call for fire against the Samaritans (Lk 9:54–56) and Peter to cut off Malchus’s ear (Mt 26:51–53; Jn 18:10).

Impulsive brashness may seem like a minor vice, but Psalm 106:33 links Moses’ brash words with rebellion against the Spirit of God, and 2 Timothy 3:4 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) puts it in a list of truly ignominious vices. Isaiah prophesies that in the future kingdom, “The heart of the rash will understand knowledge” (Is 32:4 NKJV).

See also Anger; Folly.

BREAD

Bread, made of either wheat or barley, was a staple of the biblical diet. Its importance—Sirach 29:21 calls it “essential”—appears from the phrase “staff of bread” (Lev 26:26; Ezek 5:16; 14:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), implying that bread enables one to walk. This is so much the case that bread often just means “food”* and is so translated in English versions. The phrase “by bread alone” (Deut 8:3), means “by food alone” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 3:19; Num 21:5; Lk 15:17).

In addition to being food for human beings, bread belongs to religious ritual. It is one of the things to be sacrificed to the Lord (Ex 29:2; Lev 2:4—16). Legislation also directs that twelve fresh loaves (the so-called “showbread” or “bread of the presence”) be always arranged on a table before the Holy of Holies (Ex 25:30; 1 Chron 9:32; Heb 9:1—5); and OT [OT OT. Old Testament] law commands that unleavened bread be part of the Passover ritual (Ex 12:1—28).

Bread as Gift. Bread is often a gift of hospitality (Gen 14:18). This is so much so that Jesus, when he sends his missionaries out, can tell them to take no bread for the journey (Mk 6:8). The presumption is that bread will be happily supplied to them by those who accept their message.

But bread is even more a divine gift. For it is God who fills the hungry with good things (Lk 1:53). This is why one gives thanks for bread (Lk 9:16). Although bread is a human product—dough is made with human hands (Mt 13:33) and baked (Is 44:19)—there is no dough without grain, and there is no grain without the rain, which God sends (Mt 5:45). Biblical thought is appropriately captured by the traditional Jewish prayer, “Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, king of the universe, who creates the fruit of the earth.”

That God is quite literally the giver of bread appears in several remarkable miracle stories. When the Israelites wander in the desert and become hungry, they find on the ground manna, which is “the bread which the Lord has given you to eat” (Ex 16:15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 78:25). When Elisha is faced with a hundred hungry men and not enough bread to feed them, the Lord nonetheless says, “They shall eat and have some left.” In the event all are fed and some food is left (2 Kings 4:42–44). Twice when Jesus is with exceedingly large crowds, he takes only a few loaves of bread and some fish and miraculously distributes them to everyone (Mk 6:30–44; 8:1–10)—acts of divine provision and hospitality on a grand scale.

The bread of the Eucharist is also conceived as a divine gift. At the Last Supper, Jesus takes bread, says a blessing, breaks the bread and shares it with his disciples (Mk 14:22). Here the act of giving bread means that Jesus gives himself up on behalf of others; that is, under the figure of the bread, the Son of God is revealed as a sacrificial offering.

Eschatological Bread. If bread is a divine gift in the present, it will also be a divine gift when God’s kingdom comes in its fullness. The occasion for Jesus recounting the parable of the banquet (Lk 14:16–24) is a man’s declaration “Blessed is he who shall eat bread in the kingdom of heaven” (Lk 14:15). This is a reference to the eschatological banquet (Is 25:6–8; Rev 19:9), as are Jesus’ words at the end of the Last Supper: “I shall not drink again of the fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God” (Mk 14:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Related to this is the intriguing promise in Revelation 2:17: “To the one who conquers I [Jesus] will give some of the hidden manna.” Whether the image is of manna again descending from on high (as in 2 Apoc. Bar. 29:8) or of the recovery of the golden urn of manna that was kept in the temple (Heb 9:4)—in Jewish legend the vessels of the temple were not carried off but miraculously hidden (2 Apoc. Bar. 6:1–10)—we cannot be sure. In either case, the eschatological promise is that the saints will be given “bread from heaven” (Neh 9:15). God will meet the needs of his people.

The Lord’s Prayer. Jesus teaches his followers to pray for their “daily (epiousios) bread.” The expression is pregnant with meaning. The (presumably) Aramaic original no doubt alluded to Exodus 16:4, where it is said regarding the manna that “each day the people shall go out and gather enough for that day.” If so, then the prayer asks God to feed his people now (epiousios means “for the coming day” in the sense of “today”) just as in the past. But given that (a) “the coming day” can be given eschatological sense (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] “the day of the Lord”), (b) manna was thought of as bread, and (c) there was an expectation that God would send manna in the end as at the beginning, many have taken Jesus’ words to refer to the bread of the eschaton (so already the Gospel of the Hebrews, according to Jerome).

There is no need to set the two interpretations against one another. Jesus and his first followers undoubtedly thought of the bread of his table fellowship as being both the present gift of God and a token of God’s eschatological provision for the saints. The same may be said of the bread of the Last Supper, and it is wholly appropriate that exegetical history has regularly connected the fourth line of the Lord’s Prayer with the Eucharist. So “give us this days our daily bread” can call to mind four things at once—the manna in the wilderness, God’s beneficent sovereignty in the present, the Eucharist, and the eschatological future.

Bread as Metaphor. Bread is sometimes used metaphorically. In Numbers 14:9 Joshua exhorts Israel not to “fear the people of the land, for they are no more than bread for us; their protection is removed from them, and the Lord is with us; do not fear them.” In other words, it will be as easy to defeat the Canaanites as it is to eat bread. In Isaiah 55:2 listening to the word of the Lord is likened to eating bread. The same image lies behind Proverbs 9:5, where Wisdom invites the wise to “come, eat of my bread.” It is understandable that in later Jewish tradition bread and manna become symbols of Torah (Mek. on Ex 13:17).

The Bible’s most striking metaphorical use of bread appears in John 6. Here Jesus declares that he is “the bread of life” (v. 35; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] vv. 33, 41, 48, 51). The image is appropriate because John 6 brings together all the major biblical themes associated with bread. The bread from heaven is said to be a gift from above—“my Father gives you the true bread from heaven” (v. 32). Jesus’ multiplication of loaves and fish recalls Elisha’s similar miracle (2 Kings 4:42–44) and is explicitly compared with the provision of manna in the wilderness (vv. 31–34, 49–51). The bread that is Jesus gives life in the present (vv. 35, 47) but also means eternal life (vv. 27, 40). Finally, Jesus associates himself as the true bread with the Eucharist: “Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, you have no life in you” (v. 53).

Mention should be made, finally, of the name Bethlehem, which literally means “house of bread, city of bread.” There is obvious symbolism here: God, who provided bread in the wilderness and sent his Son as the salvific bread from heaven, ordained that Christ would be born in the city of bread.

Summary. Bread is one of many biblical images that, if traced through the canon, yields a picture of salvation history and biblical doctrine in microcosm. Salient points on the chart include bread as a staple of life that comes to all people from God's providence, miraculous sustenance of life for God's chosen people in their wilderness wanderings at the time of the Exodus, the spiritual reality of faith in Christ and his atoning death, and the participation in the coming eschatological messianic banquet.

See also Abundance; Eating; Food; Grain; Hospitality; Manna; Supper; Table; Wheat.

Bibliography. E. M. Yamauchi, "The 'Daily Bread' Motif in Antiquity," WTJ 27 (1964–65) 145–56.

BREADTH.

See Wide, Wideness.

BREAST

Like many other body parts, the breast has strong symbolic significance in Scripture. The breast is used as an image of female sexuality. The picture of the mother feeding her child at the breast is widely used as a symbol of both comfort and security. The concept of security is also picked up in the protection afforded to the exposed and vulnerable breast by the use of the breastplate as body armor. Almost all uses of the term in Scripture relate directly or indirectly to one of these three concepts.

Solomon extols the qualities of the breasts of the beloved woman (Song 4:5; 7:3; 8:10). Proverbs encourages the young man to restrict his sexual activities to his own wife: "May her breasts satisfy you at all times" (Prov 5:19). On the one hand, the images convey a very positive attitude toward the pleasures and comforts of sex as God-given; and on the other hand, a clear condemnation of promiscuous behavior as a misuse of sex. Hosea longs for his wife to “put away ... her adultery from between her breasts” (Hos 2:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The picture of a little baby comforted and nourished at the mother’s breast is evocative for all people and particularly significant for both the mother and the child. For the mother, having children at the breast provides both fulfillment and status: “Who would ever have said ... that Sarah would nurse children?” (Gen 21:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); “Blessed [are] ... the breasts that nursed you” (Lk 11:27). But two images present the extremes: dry breasts are synonymous with childlessness (Hos 9:13; see Barrenness) and the proverb “The leech has two daughters; ‘Give, give,’ they cry” may allude to the frustration of nursing twins (Prov 30:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

For the child there is safety (“safe on my mother’s breast” [Ps 22:9]), security (“Can a woman forget her nursing child?” [Is 49:15]) and consolation at the mother’s breast. It may be that for the adult, the hug provides a similar comfort. Perhaps it is not stretching the imagination too much to see John’s reclining on the breast of Jesus at the Last Supper in those terms (Jn 13:25, 21:20).

Jerusalem, like all large cities, was viewed as a mother to her inhabitants, who were encouraged to “rejoice with Jerusalem ... that you may nurse and be satisfied from her consoling breast; that you may drink deeply from her glorious bosom” (Is 66:10–11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Even the comfort of God is appropriately pictured as that of a nursing mother (Is 49:15; 66:13). The same picture is occasionally used positively to emphasize success: “You shall suck the milk of nations, you shall suck the breasts of kings” (Is 60:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 49:23) and negatively to represent danger or lack of security: “Blessed are ... the breasts that never nursed” (Lk 23:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 3:12; 24:9; Mt 24:19). Beating the breast graphically symbolizes loss of security, or lack of peace of (Nahum 2:7; Is 32:12; Lk 18:13; 23:48).

The breast shelters the emotions and the breath of life. For the soldier a breastplate offered some security (see Armor). Metaphorically, the believer is encouraged to find spiritual security by wearing the breastplate of righteousness (Is 59:17; Eph 6:14), or of “faith and love” (1 Thess 5:8).

See also Milk; Mother, Motherhood; Nurse; Sex.

BREASTPLATE.

See Armor.

BREATH

Breath is part of a group of words, including wind* and spirit*, that evoke a wide range of dynamic relationships between God, humanity and creation. The two main Hebrew words for this group (rûah and nešāmâ) are often used in parallel form, which enriches the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images for breath immeasurably. Hebrew rûah can mean “breath,” “wind” or “spirit,” allowing more than one interpretation of many OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passages and obscuring the outlook of the original language. For example, does an idol have no breath in it or no spirit in it? Does the absence of breath prove that no spirit lives there (Jer 10:14)? Or the poetic observation translated as “who makes winds his messengers” (Ps 104:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) can also be translated as “who makes his angels spirits” (Heb 1:7 NKJV). Does a spirit or a breeze brush the poet’s face in Job 4:15? English forces a choice between the two meanings, impoverishing the original imagery.

Like Hebrew rûah, Greek pneuma can mean either “wind” or “spirit.” Jesus explains the spiritual nature of God’s activity by recourse to the wind (Jn 3:8). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] usually employs separate words for “breath” and “spirit,” although the ideas occasionally merge. The risen Christ breathes on the disciples and says, “Receive the Holy Spirit” (Jn 20:22).

Breath is an image that links God with humanity in creation, salvation, prophecy, faith and judgment. At the creation of Adam, “the Lord God formed man of dust from the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living being” (Gen 2:7 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Human breath, equated with the divine breath, is an allotment of life, a portion of the divine spark and a gift (Job 27:3). The necessity of breathing becomes an image for total dependence upon God. Referring to all creation, the psalmist writes, “When you take away their breath, they die and return to the dust” (Ps 104:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 34:14–15). At the flood, human rejection of God is punished by the destruction of everything “in whose nostrils was the breath of the spirit of life” (Gen 7:22 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

While the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] affirms that the breath of life is given by God to all humans (Dan 5:23), his breath also has a particular role in the salvation of his people. At the exodus a “strong east wind” drives back the Red Sea, after which a blast of God’s breath unleashes the sea again and covers Pharaoh’s army (Ex 14:21; 15:10). In describing his escape from Saul, David broadens the image of God’s driving back the waters with a “blast of the breath of thy nostrils” (Ps 18:15). In the psalm as a whole, the image connects David's personal escape with both the exodus and God's original creation, when "a wind from God swept over the face of the waters" (Gen 1:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The psalmist also connects God's breath with creation: "By the word of the Lord the heavens were made, and all their host by the breath of his mouth" (Ps 33:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In contrast to God, idols are breathless and uninspired. The human attraction to idol worship, stemming from a trust in one's self-sufficiency, conflicts with the biblical insistence on dependence upon God for our very breath: " 'Woe to him who says to a piece of wood, "Awake!" ... There is no breath at all inside it.' " (Hab 2:19 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 135:17; Is 44:9—20; Jer 10:14). Appropriately, faithless and wicked human acts are judged by the breath of God: "With the breath of his lips he will slay the wicked" (Is 11:4 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] this breath of judgment is, in turn, transformed into the "sharp sword" that comes out of Christ's mouth in Revelation 19:15.

Ezekiel's famous prophecy derives much of its power from the evocative image of breath: "Again He said to me, 'Prophecy over these bones, and say to them, "O dry bones, hear the word of the Lord." Thus says the Lord God to these bones, "Behold, I will cause breath to enter you that you may come to life." ' ' " (Ezek 37:4—5 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). Ezekiel's prophecy of reinspiration parallels creation. God recreates life by giving breath to creatures whose reliance on the flesh has failed them. Just as God revivifies the remains of his people, the resurrected Jesus imparts the Holy Spirit to his disciples by breathing on them (Jn 20:22).

Breath is life; its absence is death. Life is as hard to hold as your breath. Life fades as quickly as a mist or your breath on a cold morning (Jas 4:14). Some of the most profound biblical meditations on human limitations draw on the image of breath: “Surely every man at his best is a mere breath” (Ps 39:5 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). The word translated as “vanity” over two dozen times in Ecclesiastes and signifying purposelessness, emptiness and evanescence is yet another Hebrew word for breath (hebel). In these cases the constraints of human life are not due to disobedience or to ignorance of God: the image of breath conveys the mere fact of the limits of human life.

Breath evokes God’s original connection to all creation; corporate and individual salvation, judgment, and the restoration of the faithful; and the ambivalence about worldly success and failure that marks the life of God’s faithful people.

See also Holy Spirit; Mouth; Wind.

Bibliography. H. W. Wolf, Anthropology of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974).

BRICKS

The most commonly used building material of ancient biblical times, bricks were usually made of mud or clay mixed with sand and chopped straw. This mixture was baked either in the sun or (especially for more decorative or important buildings) in pottery kilns. Kiln-burnt bricks were durable but much less abundant and were virtually unknown in Palestine until the Roman period. The cheaper and easier sun-dried bricks abounded throughout the ancient world.

Sun-dried bricks appear hard and permanent but crumble easily with rain or temperature change. Isaiah sends a warning from God to the Israelites who arrogantly boast that although “the bricks have fallen down,” they will rebuild with stone (Is 9:10; NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Stone is long-lasting; the bricks here picture quickly crumbling construction, possibly even of the heathen altars that God’s disobedient people set up throughout their land to imitate the altars of the nations surrounding them. According to Isaiah such idol worshipers provoke God to his very face, “offering sacrifices in gardens/ and burning incense on altars of bricks” (Is 65:3). Such altars were made according to human rather than divine plans. They would not last, not only because the bricks would crumble but ultimately because the Lord pronounced judgment on Israel for her sinful idolatry (see, for example, the entire passage of Is 9:8–21.)

Bricks often appear in contexts where people are constructing their own proud, temporal plans rather than obeying the eternal God. Therefore in Scripture bricks often carry negative connotations and associations: they show the limited, temporal creations of human beings, especially when those human beings have set themselves against the eternal God. The builders of the tower of Babel begin by saying to each other, “Come, let’s make bricks and bake them thoroughly” (Gen 11:3). Verse 4 even comments on their use of bricks rather than stone, which became less abundant as the people moved eastward. The bricks in this story are the concrete building blocks of the people’s prideful plans. The bricks rising up toward the heavens help picture the people’s hardened hearts as they yearn for the heights and the power that belong only to God.

The most extensive mention of bricks comes in the story of the Israelites in Egypt (Ex 1). Again, the people in control are asserting their own prideful will in rebellion against the Almighty God: the Egyptians cruelly force on God's chosen people "hard labor in brick and mortar," and their leader Pharaoh refuses to heed God's command to let the people go (1:14; 5:2).

In each story God's supreme power prevails: he stops the building of the city and tower of Babel; he delivers his people from the hand of Pharaoh; later he punishes his people for their idolatry. Again and again bricks tell the story not only of hard, rebellious hearts but also of the fleeting, transitory rise to power such hearts enjoy.

See also Babel, Tower of; Clay; Stone.

BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM

Ideally both the bride and bridegroom are symbols of the joyful anticipation of becoming one, the final physical act of union. This God-ordained delight in creativity is reflected in the participants, blessed by this opportunity that brings immediate joy and future bliss. These are the young man and woman preparing for the journey of life, founding a home and starting a family, the building blocks of the Hebrew culture. For the young man, the choice of the bride was the key to the future of his line. For the bride the betrothal was the key to her whole life.

In most cultures the bride is the great transitional symbol for the young woman. Marriage marks the end of virginity, youth and dependence on parents. In earlier cultures it was close to the time of her physical maturation. It came at the moment when she appeared most physically desirable. Though marriage was usually negotiated between two families, based on cultural factors rather than on the personal preferences of the adolescents involved, it would determine almost every element of the remainder of a woman's life. Not only did she leave her home and cleave to her husband, but she also became a functional part of the new family. She now assumed the role of wife, and potentially of mother, the part for which she was considered destined. It would be largely as a result of the manner in which she functioned in the marriage that she would find her role in society and her fulfillment as a woman. Under the law of coverture she was also now “covered” by her husband’s status and actions. To remain unmarried was practically unthinkable for women in ancient times. Yet though marriage was rarely a matter of choice for young women, the Scripture presents the bride as a willing and happy young woman, filled with the joys of anticipation.

For the bridegroom, marriage marks the end of adolescent independence and the beginning of family responsibility. Hebrew law shows that it was somewhat less important that he be a virgin, though purity was encouraged. He also might take more than one wife or concubine, as did some of the patriarchs and numerous of the kings. (The culmination of this was in the vast numbers of Solomon’s wives and concubines, some of whom were probably political acquisitions.) If his brother died before producing male heirs, a man was expected to marry his brother’s widow. Apparently this custom was still alive in Jesus’ day (Mk 12:19ff). Also, there are examples in which young men were offered sisters—Laban gives Jacob both Leah and Rachel, Samson’s Philistine in-laws offer him his wife’s sister as well.

The bridegroom was portrayed as a victor: he had wooed and won the beautiful and virtuous maiden, thereby winning greater respect in the community, greater financial resources and the potential of heirs. A man’s sons were counted as part of his wealth, as we see in the book of Job. We later discover that the end of a civilization is signaled by the fact that “the voice of the bridegroom and bride shall be heard ... no more” (Rev 18:23). This is John’s solemn warning to the doomed Babylon.

The Wedding Customs of the Hebrews. The union of the man and the woman in marriage is the mark of the new family. The family unit was particularly essential for those peoples committed to the covenant of Abraham. The choice of a bride and the establishment of a new family ensured that the tradition would continue. The wife was expected to pass on customs and family lore to children. Among the patriarchs this meant a particular search for the woman who would be the right wife and mother. The quests for Rachel and Rebekah are important indications that the family of Abraham thought alliances within the tribe and faith essential. This is also the reason that Samson’s parents worry about his marrying outside of his tribe, following his physical desires rather than his familial obligations (Judg 14:2). Later, when God selects Mary to be the mother of Jesus, we again see the importance of the selection of the right mother, the model of obedience and faith.

The choice of the bride, establishing the bride price and the betrothal period all culminated in the central activity. Weddings apparently bore little relationship to the royal ceremonies that we have seen in the last two centuries. Rather, in a ceremony symbolizing the bringing of the bride into the groom’s house, the elaborately dressed and richly bedecked bride (Is 61:10) was escorted to meet the groom. It is this procession, full of music and laughter, that we see in the biblical symbolism surrounding marriage.

Because the ritual of marriage also celebrates the sexual life of men and women, the day is usually filled with erotic references. The Hebrew groom and his friends would come out of his house to wait for the bride and her parade of family and friends, accompanied by musicians and the sound of tambourines. The expectant groom, outfitted in his finest apparel, wore a garland or a special crown, signifying his authority. We know that the bride wore a veil, perhaps a symbol of her virginity, which shielded her identity until the ceremony was completed (Gen 29:23–25). In Matthew 25:1–13 we see the practice of the maidens waiting for the bridegroom, lighting their lamps and joining the nocturnal procession. Jesus admonishes them to be prepared, lest they miss the feast.

The actual ceremony may not have been any more elaborate than modern Jewish exchanges of vows. The main event was the entrance into the bedchamber, where the newlyweds would consummate their union. The celebration might last for a week or two, with much merrymaking and singing. Samson's wedding was apparently a drunken brawl—and the source of later problems. His taunts and prolonged entertainment of his Philistine in-laws led him to violence and to abandonment of his new bride. At the wedding at Cana (Jn 2:9) we see that even in more sedate circumstances, lavish indulgence in wine was expected. It was apparently the bridegroom's obligation to furnish the refreshments for the occasion.

If the Song of Songs is any indication, Israelites found genuine pleasure in both male and female beauty and sexuality. Westerners are sometimes astonished at the delight in the beauty of the male that we see here and in Psalm 45, which celebrates David's splendor. In the Song of Songs we have what appears to be an epithalamium, a marriage song, that celebrates the attributes of the bride and groom. Their physical beauty and explicit appeal is powerful in Near Eastern imagery, which uses all the senses, particularly the senses of sight and smell. The bride is pictured as pure, natural, and welcoming; the bridegroom as handsome and strong, eager for the consummation of the marriage.

The marriage ceremony itself is not pictured, probably because it is taken for granted that the audience knows exactly what is involved. But we do know from anthropologists that the Near Eastern ceremonies are less religious than social. The ceremonies lead up to the consummation, celebrating the hopes for a new life growing out of these two lovers. The mystery of the joining of the male and female is central to the story of the Jewish people. The selection of the mate is portrayed as a key decision for the man, worth traveling miles for or waiting as long as seven-or even fourteen years-for the right woman (see Jacob). She becomes the custodian of his seed, the key to his future. It is essential that she be a pure and worthy vessel.

Scripture chronicles a number of weddings. The most cursory accounts of the joining of lives in marriage occur in Genesis: Adam and Eve (Gen 2:22–24), Isaac and Rebekah (Gen 24:61–67), Jacob and Leah/Rachel (Gen 29:21–30). Psalm 45 is thought to be a song for a royal wedding procession. The poem portrays David as a victor—the very image of male beauty—and the processions of both bride and groom full of splendidly dressed folk wend their way to the entrance to the palace. In the Song of Songs the celebration of the wedding occurs in the very middle, surrounded by courtship lyrics. The book of Revelation gives us a spiritualized wedding of the Lamb and those who believe in him. These all are moments of great joy and hope—the beginning of a new life for the bride and the bridegroom, a time for the family and the community to celebrate a new union.

Symbolic Brides and Grooms. The imagery of bride, groom and wedding is also a rich source of figurative discourse in the Bible. Many scholars have interpreted the rich language of the Song of Songs symbolically, assuming that although the primary meaning of the book concerns human sexual intimacy, the writer was ultimately describing the relationship between God and his people, between Christ and the church.

The figurative meaning of the wedding experience appears most extensively and clearly in Hosea, who sees the relationship as a parallel to that between God and Israel. God instructs the prophet to take to himself “a wife of harlotry ... for the land commits great harlotry by forsaking the Lord.” (Hos 1:2) Like Yahweh and his chosen people, the married couple should be bound together by mutual love and respect. When the bride proves neither pure nor faithful, she betrays the bridegroom and becomes a symbol of Israel’s perfidious flirtation with other religions. The wife’s infidelity is the symbol of the people’s infidelity; the husband’s pain in betrayal mirrors God’s anguish at his wanton creatures. This extended imagery in Hosea, which was to prove the basis of much biblical imagery of the bride and bridegroom, was based on his own painful experience. Modern scholars suspect that his unfaithful wife Gomer was, in fact, a priestess of a fertility cult worshipping her pagan god with cult prostitution. She thus becomes a symbol of both physical and metaphysical unfaithfulness.

Symbolic uses of wedding imagery are common in the Gospels. Jesus’ first miracle was the changing of water into wine at the wedding in Cana—a ceremony that prefigures both the experience of love and the transformed significance of the bread and wine at the Lord’s Supper. Jesus also uses the image of the bridegroom and the ceremony of the attendant maidens in his parable of the foolish virgins. The preparations for the wedding and the loving attention to the coming of the bride become a parable for the coming of God’s kingdom on earth. When Jesus says, “I go to prepare a place for you,” he reminds us of the diligent and loving bridegroom making his preparations for the shared home during the time of happy anticipation, that delicious time before the connubial bliss.

Paul was the first to make a clear use of the bride metaphor for the church. Christ is the “head,” and the church eagerly accepts his headship, just as the bride places herself under the guidance and protection of her husband (2 Cor 11:2). The imagery of the prophet Hosea is now transformed and expanded; the image of his whoring wife has been purified and has now become the great symbol of the church, to be presented to God as a spotless bride.

In the magnificent culmination of this symbolic development, the book of Revelation, the splendid imagery is expanded to symbolize the eschatological community of the New Jerusalem uniting with Christ—the eschatological Bridegroom. The great controlling image of the last section of Revelation (Rev 19:7—9) is the marriage of the Lamb:

The bride makes herself ready, clothed in fine linen, bright and pure;

The invitation is issued for the marriage supper;

The magnificent procession with the triumphant hosts tramples everything in its path;

The gathering for the marriage supper involves elaborate preparations;

The new home is to be the new Jerusalem in which the glory of God furnishes light, making lamps and oil unnecessary;

The guests arrive, none admitted except those whose names are written in the Lamb’s book of life;

The refreshments will be the water of life without price, and twelve kinds of fruit.

The wedding ceremony is now the moment when Christ's church joins with him in the sacred mystery. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] ends with the words the invitation to this sacred experience—the Spirit and the Bride say, “Come!”

See also Feast, Feasting; Husband; Man, Images of; Marriage; Wedding; Wife; Woman, Images of.

Bibliography. R. Batey, New Testament Nuptial Imagery (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1971).

BRIDLE

The image of the bridle is used in the Bible primarily as an image of restraint and control. Job complains that the afflictions he has received from God have led to his enemies' throwing off restraint (literally, “letting loose the bridle”) and attacking him (Job 30:11). One of the indicators of the strength of Leviathan is that he cannot be subjected to such restraint, for “Who would approach him with a bridle?” (Job 41:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Exercising self-restraint, especially over the tongue, is associated with this image in a number of places (Ps 39:1; Jas 1:26; 3:2–3). Without such self-control, a person “deceives himself and his religion is worthless” (Jas 1:26). The contrast between those able to exercise such restraint over themselves and the “horse and mule, which have no understanding but must be controlled by bit and bridle” is drawn out in Psalm 32:9.

An ancient horse and bridle.

The judgment of God on his enemies is pictured as a bridle “that leads them astray” (Is 30:28), an image applied specifically to Sennacherib being made to return to Assyria after threatening to invade Jerusalem (2 Kings 19:28; Is 37:29). Titus is instructed to “silence” (literally, “stop the mouths of”) false teachers who are leading others astray (Tit 1:11).

See also Horse; Self-Control; Tongue.

BRIER

Briers surely would evoke negative memories for persons living close to the land. Everybody hates briars; they are an infuriating ground cover that trips, scratches and generally makes walking through them miserable. Briars don't just cause pain—they make you suffer. The scratches can make one's bare legs and ankles feel like they are on fire. In fact, briars and suffering are practically inseparable in the Bible. Even the thought of being beaten with briars (Judg 8:7, 16) or having them shoved down on one's head (Jn 19:2) is painful.

Briars are used metaphorically to depict the devastating result of God's judgment—turning pleasant and productive land into wasteland (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 5:6; 7:25; 32:13; Heb 6:8). The lasting image of briars as a nuance is seen in the familiar representation of an unpleasant person or circumstance as “a thorn in one's flesh” (Ezek 28:24; 2 Cor 12:7).

Being extremely hardy, briars are especially hard on the weak things. Small, delicate plants are no match for the voracious appetite of the briar. Jesus had this in mind when he told the parable of the sower (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 13:7; Mk 4:7; Lk 8:7). Finally, there is that ironic picture of the crown of thorns fashioned for Jesus as a way to mock him. The shameful tearing of his flesh is the outward display of inner suffering. Whether physical or metaphorical, briars and misery go hand in hand.

See also Thorn.

BRIMSTONE

Brimstone is an archaic word for sulfur, which occurs naturally as a yellow mineral. In Palestine it is found at the surface around the Dead Sea where it has probably been formed from the breakdown of the sulfates in the sedimentary rocks. One of the few minerals to burn, sulfur produces an acrid and poisonous smoke made up of the oxides of sulfur. Because of this property, burning sulfur has been used as a fumigant and disinfectant for millennia, although it is unclear whether the Jews used it for this purpose.

Burning sulfur was the main element in the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19:24). References to this event, which is something of a pattern for divine judgment, occur subsequently in Scripture (Deut 29:23; Lk 17:29). Elsewhere burning sulfur is a frequent element in judgment (Job 18:15; Ps 11:6; Is 30:33; 34:9; Ezek 38:22). In Revelation the image of burning sulfur occurs at a number of points (9:17—18; 14:10; 19:20; 20:10; 21:8), everywhere in the context of judgment. Although burning sulfur is plainly a tool of retribution on the enemies of God, there is the possibility that there is also a reference to the fumigation of the wicked and their works. If so, it reminds us that evil is so contagious and serious that ultimately this world will need disinfecting.

See also Fire; Minerals; Sodom and Gomorrah.

BROAD.

See Wide, Wideness.

BROKENNESS

Brokenness is most commonly employed in the Bible as an image for people overwhelmed by troubles. In the OT [OT. Old Testament] this is commonly expressed by saying that the heart or spirit is “broken.” The image represents feelings of anguish and despair, and a loss of hope or a sense of well-being. A broken heart or spirit can result from suffering, persecution and sorrow (Job 17:1; Ps 34:18; 69:20; 109:16; 147:3; Prov 15:18; Is 61:1; 65:14). It can also result from a recognition of the devastation of God’s judgment on the sins of others (Jer 23:9; Ezek 21:6) or one’s own sin (Ps 51:17).

Many times these broken people turn to God for help. Several confessions of brokenness occur in the immediate context of petitions for, or confessions of, faith in God’s rescue (Ps 34:17–18; 69:16–20; 109:16–21). This openness awakens God’s compassion and moves him to bind up the brokenhearted (Is 61:1). In Psalm 147:2–3 the psalmist employs the language of healing the brokenhearted to celebrate God’s saving actions toward the postexilic community in their struggle against political opposition and economic adversity.

In some contexts a broken person is one who responds to the prompting of the Holy Spirit in repentance (Ps 51:17; Is 57:15). A brokenhearted person is the opposite of the self-made, hardhearted person. The fundamental difference between these two types of individuals is most evident in their reactions to being confronted with their own sins. The key element is that the brokenhearted person repents.

The accounts of the lives of Israel’s first two kings, Saul and David, as presented in 1 and 2 Samuel are telling in this regard. Both fail to carry out God’s will. Saul violates Samuel’s instructions to wait for him to sacrifice (1 Sam 13:8–10) and fails to completely destroy the Amalekite king and livestock (1 Sam 15:7–9). David commits adultery with Bathsheba and has her honorable husband intentionally murdered in battle to cover up the adultery (2 Sam 11:1–27). Both must be confronted by God’s prophets in order to bring them to an acknowledgment of sin (1 Sam 13:11; 15:17–19; 2 Sam 12:1–12). Most modern readers, who consider David’s offenses much graver than Saul’s, are shocked to discover that Saul has the kingdom taken away from him (1 Sam 13:13–14; 15:26–29) while David is forgiven (2 Sam 12:13).

The explanation for this seeming injustice lies in the differing responses of the two men when confronted with their sin. In response to Samuel’s accusations Saul first argues, then confesses, “I have sinned” (1 Sam 15:24, 30). This minimizing confession (the Hebrew could be translated, “I have violated a cultic regulation”) and his further responses—self-excuse, blame-shifting and greater concern for avoiding the consequences of one’s actions than for the wrong itself (1 Sam 15:15, 20–30)—reveal a heart that is still resistant to God’s verdict.

David’s response to Nathan’s parable exposing his sin is a remarkable contrast. He says simply, without qualification, protest or defense, “I have sinned against the Lord” (2 Sam 12:13). Unlike Saul, David is truly broken by God’s verdict against him, vindicating the biblical assessment of David’s character that he was a man after God’s own heart (1 Sam 13:14; Acts 13:22).

At the outset of his public ministry Jesus quotes Isaiah 61:1 to explain his own mission (Lk 4:18–19). Subsequently, he displays great concern for binding up the brokenhearted in his focus on the spiritually “sick” (Mt 9:12; Mk 2:17; Lk 5:31), his frequent calls for repentance (Mt 4:17; Mk 1:15; Lk 13:3), his gentle dealings with sinful people (Lk 7:36–50; 19:1–10) and his parables of acceptance for the repentant (Lk 15:11–32; 18:9–14).

See also Contrite, Contrition; Heart; Melt, Melting; Sin; Suffering; Weak, Weakness.

BRONZE

The patriarchal period of ancient Israel occurs in what modern historians have called the Bronze Age, and the time of the settlement of Canaan marks the change from the Bronze Age to the Iron Age. Bronze, a combination of copper and lead, was one of the earliest alloys to be widely used during the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] period. It was later replaced by brass (an alloy of copper and tin); therefore, most of the references to bronze (154 of the 160 occurrences) are in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

Use of bronze as a figure of speech is concentrated in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] poetry and prophets (two-thirds of the uses in these books are figurative) and the book of Revelation. When used figuratively, bronze often connotes strength, as seen in Job's questions "Do I have strength of stone? Is my flesh bronze?" (Job 6:12), or when describing Leviathan, who cannot be fettered, it is said that "iron he treats like straw and bronze like rotten wood" (Job 41:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see Animals; Mythical Animals). In Jeremiah's call to service he is told that God has "made you a fortified city, an iron pillar and a bronze wall to stand against the whole land" (Jer 1:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Hard and smooth, in judgment the ground will be made infertile: "I will break down your stubborn pride and make the sky above you like iron and the ground beneath you like bronze" (Lev 26:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] . Deut 28:23; Job 37:18). Polished and shiny, bronze was used for mirrors in the ancient world and is associated with shining and radiance. Bronze as associated with radiance is found in Revelation 1:15: "His feet were like bronze glowing in a furnace, and his voice was like the sound of rushing waters” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Ezekiel’s heavenly creatures had legs that “gleamed liked burnished bronze” (Ezek 1:7), and later Ezekiel encountered a man whose “face shone liked polished bronze” (Ezek 40:3).

A very evocative use of bronze is its association with bondage and captivity. Bronze shackles symbolize the treatment of fallen leaders by victorious adversaries. Two famous examples are Samson: “Then the Philistines seized him, gouged out his eyes and took him down to Gaza. Binding him with bronze shackles, they set him to grinding in the prison” (Judg 16:21), and Zedekiah: “Then he put out Zedekiah’s eyes, bound him with bronze shackles and took him to Babylon, where he put him in prison till the day of his death” (Jer 52:11).

Nearly half of all the references to bronze refer to its use in the temple or tabernacle. From altars to bowls, cups, columns and frying pans, bronze was the metal of choice for implements and structures. This sturdy and easily worked metal was used throughout the Israelites’ worship space.

Another sizable group of bronze references are to bronze in warfare. Here bronze is used to describe booty (Josh 6:24; 22:8) and the implements of war. Goliath goes forth to fight with “a bronze helmet on his head” and wears “a coat of scale armor of bronze weighing five thousand shekels.” On his legs he wears “bronze greaves,” and he carries a bronze javelin on his back (1 Sam 17:5—6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Helmets, swords, spear tips and shields all could be made of bronze or covered with it (see Armor).

See also Iron; Metals; Minerals; Stone; Wood.

BROOK

English-speaking readers unfamiliar with the rugged terrain and arid climate of Palestine are likely to miss the significance of brook imagery in the Scriptures. The two principal Hebrew words for brook (nahal, used 140 times, and 'āpîq used 15 times) have been variously translated “brook,” “stream,” “ravine,” “torrents,” and “valley.” In many cases these words fail to bring to the minds of English readers the phenomena crucial to the images employed by the biblical writers.

The nahal was a stream bed (commonly known as a wadi) in which water flows only after periods of rainfall. Otherwise it is dry. Job employs the intermittence of the brook as an image of the unreliability of his friends when he complains, “My brothers have dealt deceitfully like a brook... When it is hot they vanish from their place” (Job 6:15–17 NKJV). When the rains did come, there were often dangerous flash-floods in the stream beds. It is to one of these that the psalmist refers when he writes, “The cords of death entangled me; the torrents of destruction overwhelmed me” (Ps 18:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Amos, wanting to evoke the power of a rain-swollen brook without the implication that it will soon run dry, calls for righteousness to advance “like a never-failing stream” (Amos 5:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The 'āpîq was the deepest water channel in a valley, gorge or ravine. In the drier parts of Palestine these brooks were not easy to find, nor did they always contain water. In Psalm 42:1 a deer’s agonizing search for these brooks is used to picture an unsatisfied longing for God. Likewise in Psalm 126:4 the restoration of the exilic community is compared to the replenishment of water in the brooks of the Negev by the rains.

Another image evoked by brooks is that of refreshment. Many have found puzzling the reference to drinking from a brook in Psalm 110:7 at the end of a series of statements about the exalted and favored status of the messianic king. Perhaps the point of this statement is that the king is favored by God in finding a brook with water in it to refresh himself from the weariness of battle.

See also Drink; River; Rain; Valley; Water.

BROTHER, BROTHERHOOD

The two great commandments, to love God and to love one another, address the divine and human categories of biblical relationship. Human loves such as marriage and friendship assume exclusive, intimate, volitional relationships; even love of neighbor implies a face-to-face act of kindness rather than a general feeling of goodwill. But brotherhood is a larger, more inclusive category that sometimes denotes a connection of blood, sometimes a personal affection and sometimes a bond of allegiance such as that represented by a tribe, nation or spiritual community. Most importantly, the terms brother and brotherhood imply an egalitarian relationship rather than an image of hierarchy, such as parent/child, father/son or patriarch/clan.

Many, if not most, of the characteristics of brother/brotherhood could also be extended to the biblical references to sister(s). Although there is no specific use of the term sisterhood in the Bible, yet it is clear from the context of many passages where spiritual brotherhood is understood that the language is meant to be gender inclusive. The NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] translates “brothers and sisters” in instances when it feels a mixed-gender group is being addressed.

A strong line should be drawn between literal and figurative references to brother or brothers. Ironically, in the biblical record the dominant image associated with literal brothers is frequently one of discord, strife, deceit, even hatred and murder. The first crime was fratricide. But when the word brother or brothers is used metaphorically, it takes on the characteristics of similarity and unity of purpose associated with the term brotherhood.

Literal Brother(s). Human experience shows that relationships within the family are often the most difficult. This is especially true between siblings: envy, jealousy, competitiveness and rejection seem to occur with an almost “natural” frequency. Genesis sets the pattern for the rest of the Bible in its narratives of antipathy between brothers. Cain’s hatred for Abel is the archetypal example. His “am I my brother’s keeper?” stands as the epitome of heartless indifference. The first epistle of John glosses the story of Cain in particular and brotherly love in general by citing them as evidence, respectively, of inherent wickedness or of true faith: “For this is the message that you heard from the beginning, that we should love one another, and not be like Cain who was of the evil one and murdered his brother. And why did he murder him? Because his works were evil and his brother’s righteous” (1 Jn 3:11–13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2:9; 4:20). The love of brothers, then, is a concrete image of the most fundamental message of the Bible, “that we should love one another.”

Not only Cain and Abel, but Isaac and Ishmael, Jacob and Esau, and Joseph and his brothers all demonstrated the pattern of fraternal strife, treachery, rejection, revenge, even attempted murder. There is strife between brothers even in the womb: Rebekah was told that two nations strove within her (Gen 25:22–23); and Perez and Zerah, sons of Judah by Tamar, also struggled for primacy of birth (Gen 38:29–30). Rachel was fiercely jealous of her sister Leah’s childbearing (Gen 30:1–8). In the Gospels, Jesus’ half- or step-brothers and sisters also exhibited contention with or indifference to his following God's plan of salvation and did not believe on him (Jn 7:3–10; Mt 13:56; Mk 6:3). The prodigal son's brother objects to the mercy shown his brother (Lk 15), and Martha complains against Mary (Lk 10:39–40).

The rest of the Bible builds on these portraits of fraternal hatred and treachery in Genesis. Like a Renaissance revenge tragedy or Machiavellian intrigue, some of its most chilling scenes document betrayal and violence between brothers, or brothers and sisters. For example, Abimelech kills his seventy brothers for power over Shechem (Judges 9), Amnon rapes his sister Tamar (2 Sam 13), Adonijah tries to steal the throne from Solomon (1 Kings 1) and Jehoram kills all his brothers when he becomes king (2 Chron 21:4; see also 2 Chron 22:8, 10). These typical narratives expand into horrifying images of civil war or last-days treachery. Judges portrays the civil war between “the children of my brother Benjamin” and the rest of Israel. Isaiah 19:2 and Ezekiel 38:21 record the horror that “every man's sword will be against his brother.” In the apocalyptic “day of wrath” fraternal treachery will achieve such a level that brother will betray brother to death in order to escape persecution (Is 9:19; Mt 10:21; Lk 21:16).

In contrast, harmony between literal brothers is a distinctively minor theme in biblical narrative. Jacob and Esau, and Joseph and his brothers are ultimately reconciled but at great emotional cost. “A brother offended is harder to win than a strong city” (Prov 18:18 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

While the narratives tell the ugly reality, biblical laws and Proverbs evoke the ideal: a poor brother should be extended generosity (Deut 15:7–11) and never be humiliated (Deut 25:7); the sower of discord among brothers is an abomination (Prov 6:19); and a brother is “born for adversity,” that is, as a support, a helper (Prov 17:17). Strife between brothers is not the norm but is unnatural and perverse. The divine plan was for intimacy between God and man and among the human family.

Figurative Brothers and Brotherhood in the Old Testament. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] also recognizes the concept of a brotherhood based outside of blood kinship. On the simplest metaphorical level, brother (or sometimes, sister) connotes similarity: Job in his distress cries, “I am a brother of jackals and a companion of ostriches” (30:29) and “I have said ... to the worm ‘my mother and my sister’” (17:14), meaning that he identifies his condition with the cursed nature of these unclean creatures. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] supplies several other metaphorical uses and images for brothers: equals in status or calling, a synonym for friend or beloved, and a community of believers.

Equality is an inherent feature of the language of brotherhood and sisterhood. It is not in hierarchical terms that the people of God address each other but in the assumed egalitarian relation of brothers and sisters. Thus the Bible uses fraternal language to describe a group that has the same calling or rank. “Brother” kings (1 Kings 9:13; 20:33), “brother” prophets (1 Kings 13:30), “brother” Levites and priests (2 Chron 29:34; 35:5–6), even false priests who eat bread together (2 Kings 23:9) are types of fraternities. (In Ezekiel, Jerusalem’s unholy alliances with her “sister Samaria” and “sister Sodom” are viewed as a vile kind of sorority, Ezek 16:45–61; 23:11–33.) This sense of brotherly equality can be used to rhetorical advantage. David goes as far as calling his outlaw soldiers brothers (1 Sam 30:23) and addresses the elders of his people as “my brethren, my bone and my flesh” when trying to persuade them to restore him to the throne (2 Sam 19:12).

In several cases brother is used as a synonym for beloved or friend. David calls Jonathan “brother” in his lament over his death (2 Sam 1). And the beloved in the Song of Songs wishes at one point that her lover was also her brother (8:1). Even more frequently the lover refers to his beloved as his sister (Song 4:9–12; 5:1–2; 8:8). The usage is clearly to make the emotional attachment stronger through the figurative sense of brother or sister, meaning similarity. Both speakers imply that the relationship consists of, or desires to be, one of identicalness.

Whether singular or plural, brother/brethren is a synonym for members of a spiritual community. Hosea 2:1 succinctly states the point: “Say to your brethren, ‘My people’ ” and Malachi 2:10 rhetorically asks, “Have we not all one Father? Has not one God created us?” The condition that makes all men brothers is the fact that there is one God who is the father and creator of all. Without a transcendent Father there can be no universal brotherhood. This idea is more pronounced in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] where Gentiles as well as Jews are included in the family of God.

Psalm 133 contains the most extended praise of brotherhood in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . “Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity” (Ps 133:1). The psalmist uses two striking images of anointing or baptism to describe this cenobitic lifestyle. The first compares true brotherhood to the drenching of holy oil, from head to toe, upon the high priest Aaron (Ps 133:2). Traditionally used to sanctify people and things for special roles or functions (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , to anoint kings, priests and prophets), oil is also a symbol of the richness of life as well as of the Holy Spirit. The psalmist also pictures brotherly unity like the dew of Mount Herman, the highest peak in the land of Israel. The dew flows out to, and one might say anoints the other mountains of Zion, where “the Lord commanded the blessing—eternal life” (Ps 133:3). The psalm’s baptism-like imagery parallels and foreshadows the baptism of tongues of fire that were manifested by another dwelling together in unity when the disciples were all with one accord in one place on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2). The psalm’s similes suggest that brotherly unity is an epiphanic experience, combining calling, holiness, life and power.

Brother(s) and Brotherhood in the New Testament. Jesus draws the best distinction between the biblical senses of literal and spiritual brothers: when a crowd tells him his mother and brothers desire his attention he asks, “Who are my brothers? Whoever does the will of my Father in heaven is my brother and sister and mother” (Mt 12:46—50; Mk 3:35; Lk 8:19—20). Here he authorizes fellow believers—or better, fellow doers—as the truest form of family, as persons with whom we have the most in common. In this context Jesus himself becomes the “firstborn of many brethren” (Rom 8:29) within the spiritually born family of God that takes precedence over one’s natural family.

The community of believers in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is alluded to more by the plural word brethren (which clearly includes women) than by any other figurative language, certainly more than by the “called-out ones” (ekklēsia), or church. Brotherhood is based on similarity of belief and on the equality of believers. Christ underscores both points when he tells his disciples they should not desire to be called master or teacher, “for One is your Teacher, and you are all brothers” (Mt 23:8).

In the Gospels, Jesus emphasizes two relational issues critical to brotherhood: forgiveness and factionalism. Right relationship is based on the ability to forgive, and Jesus sets the standard high: first be reconciled with your brother even before worship (Mt 5); a brother can sin against you seventy times seven and you must forgive him from the heart (Mt 18:21, 35). Yet the gospel message of love extends beyond the family of faith. Jesus warns against brotherhood becoming cliquish: Don't greet only your brothers, for what reward is there in that? Love even your enemies (Mt 5). When you throw a banquet, extend the invitation to strangers (Luke 14:12). The family of God should always be open to new adoptions. Jesus emphasizes the high standard of love and the evangelical purpose of brotherhood.

In the Epistles, Paul and the other writers continue and expand the composition of NT [NT NT. New Testament] brethren and brotherhood. First, "brethren" frequently prefaces Paul's teaching and exhortations. A common phrase is "I urge you, brethren" (Rom 11:25; 12:1; 15:30; 16:17) or, "I do not want you to be ignorant, brethren" (2 Cor 1:8). He uses the epithet rhetorically to call attention to key points (Gal 5:11, 13), especially when there is some allegorical or nonliteral meaning (1 Cor 10:1; Gal 3:15; 4:28).

Second, his concern about order versus division in the church is strengthened by the images of unity and equality that brotherhood evokes. Paul stresses the word brethren when correcting the division and sectarianism in the Corinthian church. Having the "same mind and same judgment, perfectly joined together" describes the desired quality of similitude in brotherhood (1 Cor 1:10, 11). In other words, "be of one mind ... love as brothers" (1 Pet 3:8). Even believing slaves and masters are viewed as "brethren" (1 Tim 6:2; also see Philemon). Yet brotherly equality is never used as an excuse not to serve one another.

Yet another defining aspect of brotherhood, its privilege and evidence, is service. The Thessalonians know all about brotherly love because they ministered to the needs not only of Paul but of all the brethren in Macedonia (1 Thess

4:9, 10). “Know this, beloved brethren, that if someone wanders from the truth and a brother turns him back, he has saved a soul from death and covered a multitude of sins” (Jas 5:20; see also Heb 3:12). The brethren keep each other in the truth and support the weak (Gal 6:1; 1 Cor 8:12). Romans 14 is all about not causing a brother to stumble. We even ought to lay down our lives for the brethren (1 Jn 3:16). James calls attention to the needs of brothers and sisters (2:15).

Finally, Paul’s language of brotherly love is passionate, intimate and affectionate. There is or should be an intensity about the brotherly bond. The Philippian brethren are “beloved and longed-for” (Phil 4:1); he tells the Thessalonians he is “endeavoring eagerly to see your face with great desire” (1 Thess 2:17), and he encourages the church members to “greet one another with a holy kiss” (1 Cor 16:20). It is a language of presence. In contrast, the church is instructed to honor secular authority, but to love the brotherhood (1 Pet 2:17).

In sum, the language of brotherhood means something more than simply believers. It is the most common and familiar appellation within the analogy of the family of God. For that reason, perhaps, it has become a buried metaphor that we no longer regard. But it is indeed an image for the ideal of closeness, like-mindedness and unity that should exist among fellow believers. Its implied egalitarianism is important; and most of all, it is “good” and “pleasant.”*

See also Abel; Cain; Family; Forgiveness; Joseph the Patriarch; Sister; Stumble, Stumbling Block.

BRUISE

In English, the term bruise usually refers to a contusion with no break in the skin surface, identifiable by discoloration. Sometimes the term is used metaphorically to speak of hurt feelings or spirit. Whereas in modern parlance a bruise is viewed as a minor injury and is almost a positive image (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , “he escaped with only a few bruises”), in the Bible the image is stark and powerful, with connotations of serious and repeated injury that is virtually a death blow. No single biblical term names the image; instead a number of words encompass the semantic idea of bruise, all of them denoting injury, pain and wound.

Recent translations correctly tend to use graphic language that is more in keeping with the biblical sense. For example, the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] translates “Blows [bruises] and wounds cleanse away evil, and beatings purge the inmost being” (Prov 20:30). The psalmist cries, “My wounds [bruises] fester and are loathsome because of my sinful folly” (Ps 38:5). Through Isaiah, the Lord declares to his disobedient people that over their entire body there are “wounds [bruises] and welts and open sores” (Is 1:6). The term translated “bruise” in Song of Songs 5:7 is rendered “emasulation” in Deuteronomy 23:1 and has crushing and cutting associated with it. An interesting usage is Jeremiah 13:23, where one of the most frequent terms used for bruise (h^abûrâ) refers to the stripes/spots on a tiger/leopard. Another term is variously translated “bruised” (Lev 22:24), “stuck” (1 Sam 26:7) and “fondled” (Ezek 23:3).

The most pregnant of usages is found in several pivotal redemptive texts. In Genesis 3:15 the serpent receives the promise that the offspring of the woman will bruise (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] “crush”) his head, and he will bruise his heel. The action of bruising/crushing spells defeat for the kingdom of evil and death, and redemption and victory for the kingdom of righteousness and life (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 16:20) at the cost of the sacrificial death of Jesus Christ.

In Isaiah 53:5 we hear that the suffering servant, ultimately fulfilled in Jesus Christ, was pierced, crushed and bruised (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] “wounded”) for our forgiveness, redemption and peace. Further, the Lord is pleased to bruise (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] “crush”) him as a guilt offering, and as a result the redemptive purposes of God will be accomplished (Is 53:10).

Finally, the servant of the Lord will take “bruised reeds,” an image of broken and fragile people (the term encompasses the notions of splintered, crushed and oppressed, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Sam 12:3—4; Is 36:6; Amos 4:1) and heal and restore them to strength and fullness (Is 42:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 12:20). In these bruised and oppressed people, and the action of bruising and crushing in the accomplishment of their redemption, we sense the power and pain that this image invokes.

See also Heel; Wound.

BUILD, BUILDING

To build is to exercise a primal urge to impose human order and control on the materials with which the world presents us. It is an implied resistance to both inertia and decay, and it answers to a deep-seated human need to produce something tangible and permanent. Something built is an achievement.

Most of the four hundred biblical references to building describe the literal process or product of building a physical phenomenon. In the Bible we read about the building of cities, towers, sheepfolds, houses, roads, fortresses, walls and tombs. Altars get built most frequently, with nearly fifty references. Sometimes we read about the materials used, such as stone, brick or wood (Neh 8:4; Am 5:11; 1 Kings 15:22) or occasionally—in more expensive buildings—silver, bronze and iron (1 Kings 7:9–12). References to building cluster in the books that describe the building and rebuilding of the temple—Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah—and in the prophets (where building is either a positive image of blessing or figures somehow in oracles of judgment). The main picture that emerges from this world of busy building is simply one of human industry and purpose along the lines of the assertion of Ecclesiastes 3:3 that there is “a time to build.” This picture of industriousness is tinged with a strong religious identity and a sense of reliance on God’s providence, as expressed in the psalmist’s declaration that “unless the Lord builds the house, those who build it labor in vain” (Ps 127:1 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In addition to images of human building, the Bible posits a God who builds. He builds material things, first of all. In a day when the work of an architect and builder were not differentiated, God is portrayed as a master builder in his work of creation. God is a hands-on builder: “My hand laid the foundation of the earth” (Is 48:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The work of God in creation is described in terms of foundations and beams being laid (Ps 102:25; 104:3); of measurements being determined, a line being stretched, bases sunk and a cornerstone laid (Job 38:4–6); of upper chambers being built in the heavens (Amos 9:6). We also find concrete references to God’s employing such devices or instruments as calipers and tape-measures, buckets and scales (Is 40:12; Jer 31:27; Job 26:10; 38:4–7).

What is celebrated in all this imagery is God’s careful planning in creation and the intricacy and permanence of what he created. In the wisdom writings and psalms, God’s work of building creation is related specifically to his superior knowledge or understanding (Job 38:4; Ps 136:5) and wisdom (Prov 3:19–20). This comes to fullest expression in the vivid poetic portrait of a personalized Wisdom operating as an master craftsman alongside God in an expert and playful way (Prov 8:27—31), a passage that presages NT [NT NT. New Testament] pictures of the Word and Christ as active in the work of creation (Jn 1:1—5; Col 1:15—17; 2:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 8:6).

In addition to being the builder of the visible creation, God is variously pictured as building Jerusalem (Ps 147:2) and the remnant of Judah (Jer 31:4, 28). Furthermore, God gives such explicit instructions about the building of the tabernacle and the temple that he emerges as the ultimate builder of these sacred places as well.

As we move toward more figurative images of God as builder, we find pictures of God as the one who builds the communal life of his people. Thus in prophetic visions of redemption God builds a secure environment for his people (Ps 69:35; Is 44:26; 65:21—11; Ezek 28:26). Salvation itself is God's building project (Is 26:1—2).

This becomes even more spiritualized in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , where frequently we hear overtones of temple building. Christians are portrayed as “God's building” (1 Cor 3:9), “rooted and built up” in Christ (Col 2:7). The church is the house of God (1 Tim 3:15) that stands on God's firm foundation (2 Tim 2:19). It is a house “built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the cornerstone, in whom the whole structure is joined together and grows into a holy temple in the Lord; in whom you also are built into it for a dwelling place of God in the Spirit” (Eph 2:20—22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Christians individually (1 Cor 3:16—17; 6:19) and corporately (2 Cor 6:16) are the temple of God. Jesus promised to “build” his church on the rock of Peter's confession that Jesus is “the Christ, the Son of the living God” (Mt 16:16—18).

The image of building is used to picture the life choices that individuals make in following or refusing God's way. Jesus paints a memorable portrait of wise and foolish house builders (Mt 7:24–27; Lk 6:47–49; 18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jesus' parables of builders in Lk 12:13–21; 14:28–30).

Individual Christians build on the foundation of Jesus Christ, and the adequacy of the material with which they build will be tested at the Last Judgment (1 Cor 3:10–15).

A further cluster of passages can be added if we are aware that the root word for edify and edification names the act of building (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rom 15:2; 1 Cor 14:5, 26; Eph 4:29). As a variant, we find passages that refer to “building up” the body (Rom 14:19; 1 Cor 8:1; 10:23; 14:3, 12; 2 Cor 10:8; 12:19; 13:10; Eph 4:12; 1 Thess 5:11).

Underlying these references to the church as a building is the understanding that “the builder of all things is God” (Heb 3:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). His ultimate feat of building is a heavenly “city which has foundations, whose builder and maker is God” (Heb 11:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), whose glory outshines everything imaginable (Rev 21:11), an inviting house with many rooms that Christ himself has prepared (Jn 14:2–3).

See also Altar; Babel, Tower of; Brick; City; Cornerstone; Fortress, Stronghold; Home, House; Stone; Stronghold; Temple; Tower; Wall; Wood.

BULL.

See Calf; Cattle.

BURDEN, LOAD.

See Heavy.

BURIAL, FUNERAL

In the biblical narrative it is customary for successive generations to be buried in the family tomb, either a natural cave or one cut from rock. Thus in the patriarchal narratives we find Sarah (Gen 23:19), Abraham (Gen 25:9), Isaac and Rebekah, Leah (Gen 49:31) and Jacob (Gen 50:13) all buried in the cave of Machpelah east of Hebron. Individual burial is sometimes necessitated by death at a distance from the family tomb, so Deborah is buried near Bethel (Gen 35:8) and Rachel on the road to Ephrath (Gen 35:19–20; see Bethlehem), their tombs being marked by an oak and a pillar respectively.

Besides weeping, mourning includes rending one's garments and donning sackcloth (Gen 37:34–35), scattering dust on the head, wallowing in ashes, weeping and lamentation (2 Sam 1:11–12; 13:31; 14:20; Is 3:24; 22:12; Jer 7:29; Ezek 7:18; Joel 1:8; Amos 8:10; Mic 1:16; for Tyrian seafarers, Philistia and Moab, see Ezek 27:30, 32; Jer 47:5; Is 15:2–3; Jer 48:37) and the period of mourning might last for as long as seven days (Gen 50:10).

In the exceptional circumstance of Jacob and Joseph in Egypt, the bodies are prepared by embalming, and Joseph is placed in an Egyptian coffin (Gen 50:2–3, 26). The process of Egyptian mummification required removal of the viscera for separate preservation and packing the body in salt in order to remove moisture. The body was then packed with an impregnated linen and entirely wrapped in linen. In Genesis 50:3 we read of the embalming of Jacob taking forty days, and the Egyptians mourning seventy days.

Prompt burial, including that of the bodies of criminals who had been hung, is required by Mosaic law (Deut 21:22–23). Contact with the dead and also formal mourning bring ceremonial defilement. In addition to weeping, mourning includes actions such as tearing garments and unbinding the hair. But in Israel both priests (Lev 21:5) and people (Lev 19:27–28; Deut 14:1) are forbidden to cut their flesh, the corners of the beard and other such mutilations and changes of appearance. These and other practices, such as eating tithes in mourning or offering them to the dead (Deut 26:14) are Canaanite practices and are expressly forbidden. In Deuteronomy we find express limits for mourning, where women captured in war might mourn their parents for one month before marrying their captors (Deut 21:11–13) and Israel’s leaders Aaron (Num 20:28–29; Deut 10:6) and Moses (Deut 34:5–8) are each honored with thirty days of mourning.

The account of Abner’s burial in 2 Samuel 3:31–39 gives us a glimpse of practices in Israel. The bearing of the body on a bier to its place of interment was probably typical (2 Sam 3:31). Once Israel enters the land we find a preference for people to be buried in their ancestral inheritance in a family tomb (Gideon, Judg 8:32; Samson, Judg 16:31; Asahel, 2 Sam 2:32; Ahithophel, 2 Sam 17:23; Saul, 2 Sam 21:12–14). Samuel (1 Sam 25:1, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 28:3) and Joab (1 Kings 2:34) are each buried in their “house,” but this may simply mean the family tomb. This general custom agrees with the notion that the dead rest with their ancestors (lit. “fathers”; e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Kings 1:21; 2:10; 11:43).

In the cultural setting of the Bible it is a great misfortune not to be properly buried (1 Kings 13:22; Jer 16:6).

Archeological evidence shows that tombs were usually located outside a town or city. There is some archaeological evidence for family tombs consisting of irregular rock-cut chamber (or chambers) with benches, reached by a short, sloping shaft blocked by a stone cut to fit over the entrance. But Isaiah has harsh words of condemnation for the palace treasurer Shebna, who is hewing his “grave on the height” and chiseling his “resting place in the rock” (Is 22:16). Pottery and other objects have been found in Israelite tombs, but they are not as elaborate as Canaanite provisions for the dead. However, Canaanite religion and burial practices were a threat to true worship of Yahweh in Israel. Isaiah 57:7–13 alludes to the wicked who make their tombs on the mountainsides, engage in idolatrous practices. Memorial pillars were sometimes erected in Israel as elsewhere in antiquity, honoring the names of the deceased (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 35:20; 2 Sam 18:18; 2 Kings 23:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 56:5). Common people were laid to rest more simply in a tract of land outside Jerusalem (2 Kings 23:6; Jer 26:23), a practice that was no doubt paralleled at other towns.

In keeping with the ceremonious tone of Hebrew history, funerals are recorded with great detail. But unlike our modern ceremonies, they consist primarily of burying the body. The burials of kings and other rulers of Israel are recorded in Scripture, suggesting again the importance of the emerging story of the Israelite nation as the family of God. Those whose burials are described include Jacob (Gen 50); Nadab and Abihu (Lev 10:4–7); Aaron (Num 20:22–29); Moses (Deut 34); Joshua and Joseph (Josh 24); King of Ai (Josh 8:29); Gideon (Judg 8:32); Samson (Judg 16:31); Eli (1 Sam 4:14–18); Samuel (1 Sam 25:1); Saul (1 Sam 31:10–13); Asahel (2 Sam 2:32); Abner (2 Sam 3:31–39); David (1 Kings 2:10–12; 1 Chron 29:26–28); Solomon (1 Kings 11:41–43); Jeroboam and Rehoboam (1 Kings 14:19–20, 31); Asa (1 Kings 15:23–24); Ahab (1 Kings 22:37–40); Ahaziah (2 Kings 9:27–28); Jehu (2 Kings 10:34–36); Joash (2 Kings 12:19–21); Josiah (2 Kings 23:30) and Jesus (Mt 27:57–60; Mk 15:42–46; Lk 23:50–56; Jn 19:38–42).

The grave of an executed criminal, rebel or enemy was not honored with a proper burial, and in some instances (Achan, Josh 7:26; Absalom, 2 Sam 18:17; the king of Ai and the five Canaanite kings, Josh 8:29; 10:27) was only marked by a pile of stones. Cremation was not a Hebrew practice, but in extreme circumstances, such as when the bodies of Saul and his sons' are shamefully hung from the wall of Beth Shan, a corpse might be burned and the remains later buried in the ancestral tomb (1 Sam 31:12–13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Amos 6:10).

Notable deaths sometimes occasioned poetic laments. So David laments over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam 1:17–27) and Jeremiah and others over Josiah (2 Chron 35:25). Professional mourners sometimes appear (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 9:17–18; Amos 5:16). In Jeremiah we find the mourners' fast broken after the funeral by a meal (Jer 16:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hos 9:4). The funeral of Judean kings is sometimes occasioned by a great bonfire in their honor (2 Chron 16:14; 21:19–20; Jer 34:5).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we find some mourning and burial scenes. A throng of mourners at Jairus's house weep and lament the death of his daughter (Mk 5:38; Mt 9:23), making a great disturbance and presumably beating their breasts in grief (as Lk 18:13; 23:48). Similarly Stephen's burial is accompanied by deep mourning (Acts 8:2). Jairus even hires pipers for the mourning of his daughter (Mt 9:23), presumably to accompany a formal dirge.

Some accounts give us glimpses of the preparation of a corpse for burial. Tabitha (Dorcas), whom Peter raised, was washed and displayed in an upstairs room (Acts 9:37). The arms and legs of Lazarus and Jesus are bound in linen bands impregnated with aromatic perfumes, and a piece of linen is wrapped around their heads (Jn 11:44; 20:6–7). Normal Jewish burial customs are reflected in the anointing of Jesus' feet or head at Bethany (Mt 14:3–9; Jn 11:2; 12:7); but when the women visit the tomb to anoint Jesus, their plans are averted (Mk 16:1; Lk 23:56).

The practice of burial in an earthen or rock tomb coincides with the imagery of going “down” to the grave (Ps 22:29; 28:1; 30:3, 9; 88:4; 115:17; 143:7) and into an abyss (Ps 88:11), a depth (Ps 63:9; 88:6) or even a prison or place of confinement (Ps 88:8). It is a realm of gloom and darkness where the light of the sun cannot penetrate (Ps 88:6; 143:3), a realm of silence (Ps 94:17; 115:17). Imagery of decay is also associated with burial, for the dead return to the dust from which they came (Ps 90:3; 104:29; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 3:19).

See also Death; Grave; Mourn, Mourning.

Bibliography. E. Bloch-Smith and R. Hachlili, “Burials,” ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 1:785—94.

BURNING.

See Fire.

BURNING BUSH

The burning bush is a theophany. While in one sense Exodus 3:1—4:23 is about Moses’s encounter with the divine, it is primarily concerned with God’s revelation of himself (see Deut 33:16; Mk 12:26; Lk 20:37; Acts 7:30—34). Accordingly we find God sharing his personal name with Moses in Exodus 3:14. The bush itself was most likely some kind of bramble, and the fire burning the bush was in the form of the angel of the Lord, since the phrase in verse 2, “appeared to him in a flame of fire” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), probably conveys the idea of “as a flame of fire.”

That God reveals himself as a fire is an image of his holiness. Fire is often pictured biblically as a purifying and refining instrument of God’s holiness. Furthermore, Exodus 3:5 contains the command for Moses to remove his sandals

(see Barefoot), “for the place on which you are standing is holy ground.” (See also the parallel in the calling of Joshua in Josh 5:15.)

That God reveals himself as a fire is also an image of his glory. This particular self-revelation of God should not be seen primarily as something designed to produce fear—though understandably it does so (Ex 3:6)—for the fire is not consuming (though it certainly could be, see Deut 4:24, 9:3, Heb 12:29). Rather the burning bush is meant to convince Moses of the majesty of God and to stand as a visible reminder in the many dark times ahead. Thus it is no accident that this act of God’s self-revelation takes place at Sinai, where God would soon reveal his holiness and glory to the entire nation of Israel.

See also Barefoot; Fire; Glory; Moses; Sinai.

BUSH, BURNING.

See Burning Bush.

BUTTER

The image of butter in the Bible is rendered problematic by uncertainty over exactly what milk product is in view in various passages. Butter, curds and cream are all made by churning milk, and translators do not always agree as to which is in view. Recent translations reduce the ten instances of butter in the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] to just one—Psalm 55:21, where it is texture not nutrition that is in view: “His speech was smoother than butter, yet war was in his heart; his words were softer than oil, yet they were drawn swords” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The process of making butter yields the proverb “Surely the churning of milk bringeth forth butter, and the wringing of the nose bringeth forth blood: so the forcing of wrath bringeth forth strife” (Prov 30:33 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

See also Milk.

BUZZARD.

See Birds.

C

CAIN

To readers of the Bible, Cain’s impact may seem disproportionate to the space his story occupies, though his appearance as the first son of Adam and Eve, born outside Eden, is strategically located in the biblical narrative (Gen 4:1–17). Cain reappears in at least three brief allusions in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , where features of his archetypal profile are evoked, and he plays a prominent role in Jewish thought (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 4 Macc. 18:11; Josephus Ant. 1.52–66).

Cain in the Old Testament. The name Cain (qayin), while etymologically associated with words for “smith” or “song,” stands in narrative juxtaposition with Eve’s exclamation at his birth: “I have acquired (qānîti) a man from Yahweh [or by Yahweh’s help]” (Gen 4:1). What sort of son is this first of the firstborn of humankind that Eve has acquired? Whereas his younger brother Abel is a migratory keeper of flocks, Cain is a settled tiller of the soil. Although the two brothers are characterized by this fundamental rivalry of the ancient world (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jacob and Esau, Gen 25:23–28), their more significant rivalry is revealed in the offerings they bring to the Lord. Cain offers “some of the fruit of the soil” (Gen 4:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), but Abel offers “fat portions from some of the firstborn of his flock” (Gen 4:4). From a Levitical perspective both are acceptable gift offerings to God, but the more copious description of “fat portions” and “firstborn” of Abel’s sacrifice hints at a richer offering than Cain’s.

God’s favoring Abel’s offering and his refusal to favor Cain’s entices our sympathy for Cain. But then the downcast face slips like a mask to reveal Cain’s inner anger. The Lord probes the source of Cain’s anger and instructs him in the two ways: “Do what is right and you will be accepted; do not do what is right, and sin, like a beast, is crouching at your door, ready to have you. Master it!” (Gen 4:7).

Cain is speechless, but his actions typify those who have chosen the second path and are consumed by anger. Divine instruction exacerbates sin, and brother farmer invites brother shepherd into a field, assaults and kills him. Anger begets murder, and the promising bond of brotherhood is ruptured as sibling rivalry degrades to fratricide. The one who sacrificed his firstborn of the flock and offered them to the Lord is now slaughtered by a firstborn and given to the earth. When God inquires, “Where is your brother Abel?” Cain responds in shocking but memorable callousness: “I don’t know. Am I my brother’s keeper?”

For the first time, Abel is not silent. His blood cries out to the Lord from the ground. The ground Cain’s hands tilled to yield his offering to the Lord has now opened its mouth to drink in Abel’s blood from Cain’s hand, and now it yields a voice of lament and condemnation. Cain’s judgment is just. Now when he works the ground, it will no longer yield its crops for him. He will be “a restless wanderer on the earth.” The once settled farmer now enacts a self-accusing mockery of his slain brother’s nomadic life.

Cain is most eloquent when pleading his case in self-pity: “My punishment is more than I can bear! Today you are driving me from the land, and I will be hidden from your presence” (Gen 4:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The echo of Adam’s recent expulsion from the good land of Eden (Gen 3:24) is too close to be missed, but the larger narrative pattern of Israel’s history is also forecast. Israel, when she has sealed her choice of the path of disobedience to Yahweh’s way, will be exiled from the land of promise, scattered as a people and separated from the temple presence of the Lord. Cain’s punishment bears these same features in his restless alienation from the land and from the presence of God, and his laboring under the threat of death. His punishment is mitigated when a “mark” and a divine edict protects him from the threat of vengeance.

Cain, the archetypal exile, lives in the land of Nod, “wandering” east of Eden. He becomes a metaphor for all those whose misdeeds have brought them under the curse of heaven. Yet the narrative betrays complexity behind these images of arid, isolated and rootless judgment. Cain fathers a son and goes about building a city to stay his wandering and a lineage to perpetuate his life, issuing in vengeful Lamech. But Cain’s lineage is only a spur on the main line of the narrative, for Adam and Eve have a new son, Seth, who is born to replace Abel and establish a righteous line of descendants.

Cain in the New Testament. Abel heads the list of worthies in Hebrews 11. This allusion to the Cain and Abel story throws the brothers into bold contrast with Abel coming to the fore. “By faith Abel offered to God a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain’s” (Heb 11:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and God approved him as righteous. Abel’s inner faith and consequent divine approval are in focus, not the type of offering he brought to the Lord.

In 1 John 3:11–15 the author expands the Cain-killed-Abel motif to illustrate the consequences of hating rather than loving one's brother. Cain, we read, “belonged to the evil one” (1 Jn 3:12; an estimate in tune with the Jewish Apocalypse of Abraham 24:5, which finds Cain “led by the adversary to break the law”). He murdered his brother simply because his own actions were evil and Abel's were righteous. Likewise, the world hates believers simply because they are righteous and love one another. Anyone who hates his brother is a murderer like Cain.

In Jude 11 false teachers, who are characterized as speaking abusively and ignorantly and living by instinct like unreasoning animals, are said to have “taken the way of Cain.” The story and image of Cain appear barely beneath the surface in Romans 7:11–25. Sin that lurked at Cain's door and desired to have him, now seizes the opportunity in the commandment and “killed me” (Rom 7:11). Like Cain, the “I” has been instructed in the good and knows it but does evil nonetheless, a captive slave of sin. And like Cain, who finds the sentence of wandering and the specter of death more than he can bear, the cry is uttered: “Who will rescue me from this body of death?” (Rom 7:24).

A cluster of negative images ripple out from the Cain narrative. His name remains indelibly associated with images of anger, murder and a waywardness unchecked by wisdom, a cursed wanderer whose sage informs all who might be tempted to leave the fertile fields of faith to scavenge for existence in the barren land east of Eden.

See also Abel; Brother, Brotherhood; Crime and Punishment; Vengeance; Wanderer, Wandering.

Bibliography. N. T. Wright, “Echoes of Cain in Romans 7, ” in The Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992) 226—30.

CALF

Cattle in general were of great importance economically in both nomadic and agricultural conditions. They were raised as a source of milk (Is 7:21—22) as well as meat. Calves, like the adult bovids they would become, were a symbol of wealth and prosperity. Successful calvings were a mark of blessing (Job 21:10), and large herds of cattle made one rich. When Saul defeats the armies of Agag, he disobeys God and does not destroy the fat calves and lambs (1 Sam 15:9). Instead Saul tries to keep them for himself as spoils from the victory God gave him. His attempt to boost his wealth only succeeds in having the kingdom wrested from him and given to David (1 Sam 15:27—29).

In addition to suggesting prosperity the youthfulness of the calf suggested playful strength and boundless energy (Ps 29:6; Mal 4:2). Like other animals that required training, calves served metaphorically for unbridled human behavior that required chastening (Jer 31:18; Ps 68:30). As agricultural peoples the Israelites and their neighbors were familiar with the devotion of a cow to her calf (1 Sam 6:7) and what stresses could loose such bonds (Jer 14:5).

A calf is also a picture of substitution, although it is not as common a sacrificial animal as is the bull. A year-old calf serves as a burnt offering (Lev 9:3), and a calf of no specified age as a sin offering for Aaron (Lev 9:2, 8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 9:12, 19). In a covenant-making rite similar to those attested among their neighbors, the Israelites passed between the parts of a slaughtered calf to ratify a covenant (Jer 34:18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 15:9—10). The implication here is that whoever breaks the covenant will be butchered and torn apart like the slaughtered calf.

A fattened (grain-fed, stall-kept) calf also symbolized hospitality and celebration. When guests arrived, proper etiquette dictated a meal with meat (Gen 18:7; 1 Sam 28:24). This show of proper respect for the guest also provided an opportunity to display the prosperity of the host. The indolence of the calf tied in its stall for fattening typifies those who do no work (Jer 46:21). A diet of fattened calves marks an opulent, indulgent life style (Amos 6:4). The fattened calf appears as a symbol of exuberant celebration in the parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:23). In the days prior to refrigeration, meat was used quickly; hence the amount of food butchered indicates the size of the celebration. A feast built around the slaughter of a “fattened calf” might well include as many as two hundred guests (see Hospitality).

Calves and bulls played a prominent role in the art and religious texts of Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, Phoenicia and Syria. In the biblical narrative, golden calves were worshiped under Aaron at Sinai (Ex 32) and later under Jeroboam I (1 Kings 12). In both cases the calves were identified as representations of Yahweh and linked to his power in bringing the people out of Egypt.

The calf, as the issue of the powerful bull (see Ox, Oxen), functions as a symbol of potential power and perhaps even symbolizes the relationship of the king to deity with overtones of divine kingship. A calf's head decorated the back of Solomon's throne (1 Kings 10:19). Calflike feet contribute to the wonder of the composite creatures in Ezekiel's (Ezek 1:7). The second of the four living creatures surrounding the heavenly throne in the Apocalypse has the features of a calf (Rev 4:7 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]).

In the future age the calf, as representative of defenseless domesticated creatures, will peacefully coexist with wild animals (Is 11:6). This juxtaposition of wild and tame animals living in harmony stresses the placidness of calves and their vulnerability and uses the calf as a symbol of tranquillity and peace.

See also Animals; Cattle; Ox, Oxen.

CALLING, VOCATION

Calling or vocation is the action of God in summoning people to specific tasks or roles. A sense of sanction or apologia attaches to a calling from God: if a person is called by God to a task or position, this is regarded within the Bible as constituting a sufficient defense of a person's committing himself or herself to it. In addition to such sanction, we can note the element of compulsion: if God calls a person, it is never in doubt that a person is under obligation to obey the summons. The Puritan division of callings into the two categories of general and particular remains a valid distinction for categorizing the Bible's images of calling. The general calling is the call of God to believe in him as Lord and Savior and to follow his prescriptions for living. Particular callings are God's leading into specific tasks and roles in life.

General Calling. The first person to receive a direct call from God to live the godly life of faith and obedience was Abraham (Gen 12:1–9). The content of the calling was specifically to “go from your country and your kindred and your father's house to the land that I will show you” (Gen 12:1), but Abraham's response was really a response of faith and obedience to all that God designed for Abraham's life of relationship to him. W. R. Forrester correctly claims that “Abraham was the first man with a definite, explicit sense of vocation. ‘Faith’ ever afterwards was a response to a ‘call’ from God” (Forrester, 23). The imagery surrounding this original vocation story in the Bible is primarily threefold. One motif is the aura of divine authority as God's transcendent voice comes from beyond the earthly sphere to lay a claim upon his creature. A second is the sense of creaturely obligation to obey, pictured as Abraham's breathtakingly prompt and decisive response: "So Abram went, as the Lord had told him" (Gen 12:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). A third motif is the element of faith and trust that such response requires, as Abraham commits himself to a life of following God's leading to an unidentified "land that I will show you" (Gen 12:1).

Subsequently in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the general call of God is extended to nation of Israel, and again it is primarily a spiritual call to faith and obedience. In fact the spiritual vocation of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Israel was virtually synonymous with the idea of the covenant. The specific word calling is not a relevant consideration here, but instead the general pattern of covenant relationship between God and Israel, based on a premise of obedience/blessing and disobedience/curse. The passages that highlight the national calling of Israel are the giving of the law at Mt. Sinai, Moses' farewell discourse in the book of Deuteronomy, where he accentuates the obligations of a people that have been called by God to live in a distinctive way, and the lament of the prophets that the nation has not lived as God has called it to live.

By the time we reach the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , the specific word calling is used in passages that speak of God's summons of people to a life of faith in Christ and his regeneration of their hearts that enables them to follow that summons. We read variously about being "called into the fellowship of [God's] Son, Jesus Christ our Lord" (1 Cor 1:9), "called ... out of darkness into [God's] marvelous light" (1 Pet 2:9), "called in the one body" of believers (Col 3:15) and "called to be saints" (1 Cor 1:2). Paul wrote to Timothy about "the eternal life to which you were called when you made the good confession” (1 Tim 6:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and to the Thessalonians about being called “through our gospel” to be saved (2 Thess 2:13–14). Here the calling of God is the general call to salvation and sanctification that comes in the same form to all people.

Calling or vocation stories are a genre within the Gospels. Usually the designation is applied to the stories in which Jesus called the twelve disciples to follow him in a life of religious instruction and service. Although the disciples are in some sense a special case, in another sense they are representatives of the human race generally, called to follow Christ as their leader and savior. But the Gospels actually contain many “calling” stories in which Jesus confronts people with his claims as the Savior of the world and summons them to commit their lives to him.

Particular Callings. The call to religious service. In addition to the general calling to the life of faith and obedience to God, the Bible gives numerous pictures of God’s calling of people to specific roles and tasks. Sometimes these are specifically religious ones. Thus in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we find some memorable “calling” scenes. One is the calling of Moses on the occasion of the burning bush (Ex 3–4), where God summons Moses and promises to equip him for the task of leading his people out of bondage in Egypt. The role to which Moses is here called is partly spiritual—to be a spiritual leader—and partly political—to guide a fledgling nation in the position of an authority who makes the crucial decisions for the entire group. God also commissioned Aaron and his sons to the duties of Israelite worship (Num 18:1–7). Gideon too is called by God to a position of national leadership (Judg 6).

Equally dramatic are the calling scenes of some OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets. Chief among them is Isaiah, whose call is accompanied by a majestic scene of God's sitting on his heavenly throne and the prophet's sense of unworthiness to be God's messenger, followed by God's equipping him when a seraphim places a burning coal from God's altar on Isaiah's lips (Is 6:1–8). Similar calls are recorded for Jeremiah (Jer 1), Ezekiel (Ezek 1–3), and Amos (Amos 7:15). The three dominant motifs in these calling stories are (1) an overpowering vision of God's authority, (2) a sense of human unworthiness to accept the call, (3) God's overcoming any resistance and equipping the person to fulfill the demands of the calling and sometimes (4) God gives a confirming sign that will equip the person to accomplish the call.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] counterpart to the vivid OT [OT OT. Old Testament] calling scenes is the story of Paul's conversion on the way to Damascus (Acts 9:1–19), where the dominant image pattern is the dazzling light of God, the resultant temporary blindness and helplessness of Paul and his recognition that he is encountering the heavenly Lord. While on one level this is the general call to salvation for Paul, it is more than that: God is also calling Paul to be “a chosen instrument of mine to carry my name before the Gentiles and kings and the sons of Israel” (Acts 9:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])—in other words, to be an apostle and missionary. Paul accordingly begins most of his epistles by asserting in one form or another that he was “appointed a preacher and apostle and teacher” (2 Tim 1:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In addition we may note the calling or vocation story as a subgenre in the Gospels. All of these stories narrate Jesus' calling of one or more of his twelve disciples. The call itself is static (to follow Jesus as a disciple), as is the response (immediate leaving of everyday duties to follow Jesus), though the circumstances in which Jesus finds various disciples is diverse. The images that dominate the scenes are the authority of the one who calls over a person's life and the instantaneous and lifechanging outcome of the call in the life of the disciples.

Beyond specific calling scenes, the dominant image of calling to religious office in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] occurs in lists of church offices (Eph 4:11; 1 Cor 12:28), where the emphasis is on God's equipping people with the requisite "gifts" (endowments and aptitudes) to perform designated religious services within the church. Here we get an impression of the democratization of the calling to religious service, in the sense that the possibility of spiritual vocation is extended to ordinary people, not simply the giant figures whose callings were dramatic and extraordinary. What is retained, though, is the tremendous dignity that attaches to a religious calling and the sense of obligation that believers feel to respond to any call that comes from God.

Ordinary vocations. We come, finally, to ordinary vocations—ordinary tasks and roles that people fill in the world. Quite apart from specific images or pictures of God's calling people to these offices, we should note first that it is simply in accord with the Bible's picture of God's sovereign providence for the human race that the roles and tasks in which people find themselves are part of God's design for their lives. The picture that emerges from the Bible is that God has arranged society in such a way that there are farmers, housewives, hunters, soldiers, kings, chariot drivers and dye makers. Within the framework of overriding divine providence, it is a fair inference that no one else but God could have called people to their places in the world.

Specific passages confirm the general pattern. God "chose" David and "took him from the sheepfolds" to be the king of Israel (Ps 78:70—71). Political leadership as a vocation also emerges from Samuel's comment to King Saul that "the Lord anointed you king over Israel” (1 Sam 15:17).

The most extended picture of ordinary skills as a calling from God occurs in two passages that describe God’s calling and equipping of the artists who worked on the tabernacle (Ex 31:1–6; 35:30–36:2). The specific imagery of calling pervades the passages, with such terms as “called,” “filled with the Spirit of God,” “appointed,” “inspired,” “filled with ability.” And the tasks to which the people were thus called and for which they were equipped are the abilities required by the specific tasks facing the artists: “craftsmanship,” “cutting stones,” “carving wood,” “embroidery,” and “ability and intelligence to know how to do any work in the construction of the sanctuary.”

Two NT [NT NT. New Testament] passages confirm that the ordinary roles and tasks of life are, indeed, callings from God. Paul answered the question of how conversion affects one’s vocations in life by saying, “Let every one lead the life which the Lord has assigned to him, and in which God has called him... Every one should remain in the state [KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] , calling] in which he was called” (1 Cor 7:17, 20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In other words, conversion to Christ does not require a change in one’s vocation in the world. In a parallel passage John the Baptist answered the question raised by those whom he had baptized regarding what they should do about their vocations by advising them to remain in their existing vocations, with care to pursue them in a moral way (Lk 3:12–14).

Summary. God’s calling of people extends to both the spiritual life of faith and sanctification—a call to enter God’s kingdom and live as upright citizens of that kingdom—and to human life in the fabric of earthly society. The imagery centers around the fact that two people are involved in the transaction—an authority figure (God) who issues the call and a subordinate figure who responds to the call. In the Bible, vocation never exists in freestanding isolation; it always presupposes a relationship between God and the creature. In keeping with the different levels on which the two stand, God's call is something that a person is obligated to obey. In fact, calling stories can also be called "response stories." It is no exaggeration that in the Bible's picture of calling we can find the Christian life in microcosm.

See also Abraham; Authority, Divine and Angelic; Israel; Moses; Prophet, Prophetess; Work, Worker.

Bibliography. W. R. Forrester, Christian Vocation (New York: Scribner's, 1953); P. S. Minear, "Work and Vocation in Scripture," in Work and Vocation, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor (s); edited by] J. O. Nelson (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954), 32–81; L. Ryken, Redeeming the Time: A Christian Approach to Work and Leisure (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995).

CAMEL.

See Animals.

CAPTIVE, PRISONER.

See Bondage/Freedom; Prison.

CATALOGS.

See Rhetorical Patterns.

CATTLE

Cattle played a central role in the economic life of biblical peoples. They served a variety of functions, including plowing (Deut 22:10; 1 Sam 11:5), threshing (Deut 24:4), pulling carts (1 Sam 6:7), providing milk (Deut 32:14; Is 7:22) and meat (1 Sam 28:24), and serving as sacrifices (Lev 1:2). Cattle were considered property, and their well-being was regulated in the Mosaic law (Ex 20:10; Lev 19:19; Deut 22:10; 25:4). Ultimately God is the owner of “the cattle on a thousand hills” (Ps 50:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Owning large herds of cattle was a mark of wealth (Gen 13:2; Job 1:3; Eccles 2:7). The seven sleek and lean cows of Pharaoh’s dream (Gen. 41:1–4) made an apt figure for the prosperity and prostration of all Egypt. Livestock is frequently mentioned as a blessing of God for obedience (Deut 7:14; 28:4; 30:9; Zech 2:4). In the same way, seizing the livestock of the enemy was often one of the benefits of victory in war (Deut 2:35; 3:7; 20:14; Josh 8:2; 1 Sam 23:5). Conversely, one sign of God’s displeasure was the diminishment and destruction of cattle (Lev. 26:22; Deut 28:51; Jer 5:17). In one of Job’s speeches he attacks the traditional view that successful herding depended on one’s righteousness. He comments regarding wicked people: “Their bulls never fail to breed. Their cows calve and do not miscarry” (Job 21:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Closely connected with the image of cattle as signifying God’s blessing is that of God’s protection of the cattle. Isaiah prophesies of God’s provision for cattle in the future messianic kingdom (Is 65:10). The book of Jonah ends with God rebuking Jonah for his lack of compassion for the Ninevites, in sharp contrast to God’s own concern even for the cattle dwelling there (Jon 4:11).

Biblical authors also employ various types of cattle as symbols or metaphors. In the Song of Moses the majesty of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh is compared to that of a firstborn bull (Deut 33:17). In Psalm 68:30 the psalmist emphasizes the power of Egypt by calling it “a herd of bulls among the calves of the nations.” Perhaps the calf and cow of Isaiah 11:6–7 should be taken as metaphors for the weaker and more harmless nations of the earth, who will dwell peacefully with aggressive peoples in the messianic kingdom.

The cattle of Bashan were renowned for their quality. Hence the psalmist compares his opponents to bulls of Bashan in strength (Ps. 22:12). Ezekiel, summoning the carrion-eating animals to a feast on the corpses of the hordes of Gog, tells them the banquet will be like feasting on the livestock of Bashan (Ezek 39:18). Amos felicitously dubs the Samaritan gentlewomen “cows of Bashan” when rebuking their wretched excess and indolence (Amos 4:1).

The rambunctiousness of calves made an apt figure for God’s people freed from oppression in the day of the Lord: “You will go out and leap like calves released from the stall” (Mal 4:2; see also Ps 29:6). Calves were also used as sacrifices (Lev 22:26; Num 23:1). Jeremiah 34:18 reflects the use of a calf for a formal covenant-making ceremony, in which the contracting parties walked between the halves of a slaughtered calf while swearing an oath. The notorious use of calves as idols in the wilderness (Ex 32) and by Jeroboam in the northern kingdom of Israel (1 Kings 18:28–33) may reflect the use of the bull to represent the Egyptian god Apis or the Canaanite practice of representing gods riding on bulls or calves.

Since every head of cattle was precious, eating a calf was reserved for only the most special occasions. Thus Amos points to banqueting on fattened calves as evidence of excess (6:4). In the parable of the prodigal son, the father’s decision to kill a fattened calf shows that he regarded his son’s return as a matter for high celebration (Lk 15:23).

See also Animals; Calf; Milk; Ox, Oxen.

CAVE

Caves are natural openings and hollows in the rocks of mountains and hills. They are especially prone to form in limestone, and since limestone is plentiful in Palestine, so are caves. Three main motifs of caves appear in the Bible: caves as burial sites, as dwellings and as hiding places.

The most prominent burial cave is the celebrated one at Machpelah (Gen 23; 25:9; 49:29—32; 50:13). NT [NT NT. New Testament] examples are the tomb of Lazarus (Jn 11:38) and of Jesus (Mt 27:59—61).

References to dwelling in caves are similarly sparse but evocative. One of the most tragic verses in the Bible is Genesis 19:30, which tells us that Lot “dwelt in a cave with his two daughters” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Dwelling in a cave is here an image of primitivism and perhaps even barbarism, of life reduced from the civilized state and the material prosperity that Lot had known heretofore, and of fearful exile (Lot “was afraid to dwell in Zoar”).

The purported security of caves is challenged by Jeremiah in his oracle of judgment against Edom when he asserts that God will bring it down even though its people “live in the clefts of the rock, who hold the height of the hill” (Jer 49:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). And in the awe-inspiring catalog of people persecuted for their faith in Hebrews 11, we read about believers “wandering over deserts and mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth” (Heb 11:38 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Most caves mentioned in the Bible are those used as hiding places. Usually they are places of safety and rescue, as when David hid from Saul in caves (1 Sam 22:1—2; 23; Ps 57:1). Obadiah hid a hundred prophets in two caves to escape death at the hands of Jezebel (1 Kings 18:4, 13), and Elijah likewise hid from Jezebel in a cave (1 Kings 19:9) at which God appeared to him (v. 13). In a time of oppression by the Midianites, the Israelites “made for themselves the dens which are in the mountains, and the caves and the strongholds” (Judg 6:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A whole tradition of desert spirituality arose, which recognized that the solitude of a cave can provide a place to hear the “gentle whisper” of God (1 Kings 19:12). But if caves can be secret hiding places, they can also become prisons, as when Joshua traps five enemy kings in a cave at Makkedah, and then makes it their tomb (Josh 10:16–27).

See also Burial, Funeral; Hide, Hiding; Rock; Stronghold.

CEDAR.

See Lebanon; Tree, Trees; Wood.

CENTER.

See Middle, Center.

CHAFF

Chaff evokes an image of lightness, instability and worthlessness. Scripture uses many harvest or agricultural images as figures of judgment: pruning, pulling weeds, threshing, picking, sorting sheep and goats, and winnowing (Mt 13:30; Lk 22:31). In winnowing, grain is threshed in order to separate the kernel of grain from the husk and straw. The mixture is thrown into the air with a winnowing fork or shovel. The wind blows the light husks away, the heavier straw falls near the edge of the threshing floor, and the grain falls back to the floor to be collected. Both the light husks and the heavier straw are referred to in the words translated “chaff” in the Bible.

In Scripture chaff illustrates something that is trivial, harmless and light: “slingstones are like chaff” to leviathan (Job 41:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 13:25). Furthermore, chaff is something that is ephemeral, dead and worthless in contrast to something that is stable, flourishing and alive. The wicked are like chaff compared to the righteous, who are like a living, fruitful tree (Ps 1:3–4). Chaff is something that is easily driven away and discarded by the wind. Again, such are the wicked (Ps 35:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 21:18; Is 40:24; 41:15; Jer 13:24; Dan 2:25). In Scripture the image of chaff parallels images of blown tumbleweeds (Ps 83:18; Is 7:13), fine dust (Is 29:5; 41:2), the morning mist, the early dew and smoke escaping through a window (Hos 13:3).

One of the terms used for chaff, qaš, also includes the meaning “straw” or “stubble” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 5:12). Metaphorically, chaff pictures something not worth keeping, to be burned up by fire—whether God’s enemies (Ex 15:7; Num 1:10) or apostate Israel (Is 5:24) or the faithful being sifted by Satan. This is the category of imagery John the Baptist uses when he speaks of Jesus with a winnowing fork in his hand to gather the wheat into the barn and to burn up the chaff (achyron) with fire (Mt 3:12; Lk 3:17).

See also Fire; Grain; Harvest; Straw; Threshing, Threshing Floor; Wheat.

CHAOS

When Paul rebukes the Corinthians for their unseemly style of worship, he founds his argument on God’s character: “God is not a God of disorder but of peace” (1 Cor 14:33 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul may have easily drawn such an understanding of God from the Scriptures. Wherever the images of chaos (confusion, disorder, meaninglessness and formlessness) are present in Scripture, they are uniformly understood as standing in opposition to God and his creation purposes. Thus even an archetypal image like the sea, which represents chaos in ancient Near Eastern mythology and world literature in general, takes on an added significance in the Bible precisely because of its tie to creation. Whereas in the Near Eastern myths there is a static, unresolvable, dualistic tension between chaos and order, in the Bible there is a dynamic, historical tension between chaos and personal Creator.

In the beginning God finds the earth to be “formless (tohu) and empty” (Gen 1:2); but through a series of creative acts, God imposes order upon the cosmos. The order is declared to be “good.” Adam, who is made to share God’s image as well as the divine impulse toward order is to “rule ... over all the earth and over all the creatures” (Gen 1:26). This contrast in Genesis between the formlessness of the primordial cosmos (Gen 1:2) and the harmony developed within the creation order (Gen 1:3—2:25) will eventually become the starting point for nearly all subsequent images of chaos.

In several instances God is depicted as actively bringing chaos to bear on man’s rebellion. Such is the case with the Tower of Babel when its builders were confounded in their ability to communicate with one other (Gen 11:7). In his prophecy against Edom, Isaiah reveals God as the “builder”* of chaos: paradoxically, the Creator God will “stretch out the measuring line of chaos and the plumb line of destruction” (Is 34:11). Like many images of judgment, chaos is seen as a temporary reversal of the creation order, a reversal ultimately calculated to secure redemption.

Generally speaking, however, chaos seems not to be the direct result of divine intervention; rather it is intrinsically characteristic of any society, culture or institution that divorces itself from the one “who holds all things together” (Col 1:17). The connection between spiritual bankruptcy and the decay of the moral/societal order is a recurring prophetic theme, especially with Isaiah (Is 9:15; 19:12; 24:10), and is also expanded on in the first chapter of Romans. Paul is also one of several NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers who, building on biblical and mythological tradition, employ the sea as a metaphor for chaos in the individual's psychological processes (Eph 4:14; Jas 1:8). Yet ultimately the biblical tradition decisively departs from the mythological dualism of order and chaos in that the former anticipates a new earth where "there is no longer any sea" (Rev 21:1) nor any chaos, but only a perfected, ordered realm under God.

See also Creation; Order; Sea.

Bibliography. B. W. Anderson, Creation Versus Chaos: The Reinterpretation of Mythical Symbolism in the Bible (New York: Association Press, 1967); S. Niditch, Chaos to Cosmos: Studies in Biblical Patterns of Creation (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985); B. Waltke, Creation and Chaos (Portland, OR: Western Baptist Theological Seminary, 1974).

CHARACTER TYPES

Most character types receive extended treatment in individual articles in this dictionary, and the discussion that follows is therefore mainly a taxonomy of character types arranged in a master plan. The idea of character types is rooted in the theory of archetypes—recurrent phenomena that keep coming up as we read literature, including the Bible. Of course archetypes occur in literature and the Bible because they are present in life itself.

The two most enduring elements in narrative works are undoubtedly plot and character. As we read, we pay attention not to only the action as it develops but to the people who play out that action. We evaluate the reality of the characterization, noting the individuality of the portraits created by the author, but also recognizing ourselves, our friends and our enemies. This element of recognition is sometimes so pronounced that we realize we are reading the portrayal of a character type; that is, a person who for all his or her individuality also displays certain traits that are repeated again and again throughout literature.

The usefulness of being aware of character types as we read is that they help the material to assume a more familiar shape to us. Archetypes are the basic components of literature, including the Bible. Being aware of them makes the text we are reading at a given moment fall into place. Furthermore, because archetypes appear throughout the Bible, they become a leading means by which the Bible as a whole becomes a unified book to us.

An important thing to note about character types is that many of them exist in a dialectical form, meaning that we find good and bad versions of them. Thus we find the ideal husband and the tyrannical husband, the ideal wife and the shrewish wife, the model child and the problem or wayward child (see Favored Child, Slighted Child). The benevolent king finds a counterpart in the tyrant, and the virtuous grandmother like Timothy's grandmother is balanced by the wicked queen Athaliah, who sets out to kill off the entire royal family (2 Kings 11:1). The saint is defined partly in antithesis to the sinner.

As an extension of the importance of the dialectical principle, the general headings of hero and villain also pervade the world of character types. Regardless of the specific moral or social role that a character fills in the clusters that appear below, the deep-structure reality underlying the whole scheme is the impulse of a character type toward goodness or evil. The reason for not including a separate section on heroes and heroines (though see Hero, Heroine) is that except for character types who fall into the category of villain, the Bible holds out the possibility of virtually any type becoming heroic. We can speak of the king as hero, the mother or father as hero, the priest as hero. Nor is the list limited to people of high social standing, as often prevails in extrabiblical literature. With moral and spiritual integrity as the determining qualification for heroism, the servant or singer or farmer can emerge within a given story or proverb as an exemplary and representative person.

Placing a character into his or her archetypal category does not cancel the individuality and uniqueness of the character. It only identifies the character at a general level in addition to an individual level. As members of the genus *‘‘sibling rival,’’ such species as Cain and Abel, Jacob and Esau, and Joseph and his brothers all possess their own unique ways of pursuing their rivalry with a sibling. Placing individuals into the right character type can even be a way of highlighting the individuality of a character by leading us to note the specific ways a character fleshes out the type. Characters are more than types, but they are not less. While the type should not be allowed to become a substitute for the individual, we will see biblical characters more accurately if we place them into their archetypal category.

As with plot motifs, there is no single scheme by which to arrange the whole lexicon of character types. If there is a single principle underlying the following clusters of character types, it is the importance of role or function in determining categories. A secondary principle is moral experience (producing types like the proud person or the liar) and spiritual experience (resulting in types like the penitent and the sinner).

Family Roles. If we doubt that the Bible is a book about and for families, the large number of character types based on family roles should prove the point. The basic family unit consists of the wife and husband. The addition of children (see Daughter; Son) introduces the roles of mother and father, as well as brother and sister. More specific types fall under these categories, such as the barren wife, the fruitful wife and the widow. Children spawn a cluster of antithetical character types, including the favored child and slighted child, the elder child and younger child, the model child and the wayward or problem child. Sibling rivals also loom large in the Bible.

Vocational Types. In literature as in life, people's vocations determine types into which they fall. Usually these types are determined by functions that a character habitually fills based on his or her vocation. In the Bible the servant and steward loom large, not only as a reflection of ancient social practices but also because the Bible elevates the image of servanthood to define the creature's/believer's relationship and duties toward God. Even the slave can become a positive image in such a worldview, though more often slaves appear in the familiar role of an oppressed person. The Bible has been called a book by workers about workers for workers (see Work, Worker), for in it we find a host of specific vocations represented, including shepherd, nurse, farmer, hunter, fisherman, craftsman and merchant. The scribe can be either a court or a religious figure in the Bible, and the poet similarly can be either a court poet writing as a professional or a private composer (usually of devotional poetry). The military world generates its own cluster of character types, including the warrior (see Battle Stories), spy (see Spy Stories), watchman and messenger or courier. The royal court also contributes a range of vocational types.

Authority Figures. A small but important category of character types consists of human authority figures (see Authority, Human). The most important of these is the king and more infrequently the queen. We also catch glimpses of the actual political importance of the courtier—an adviser to the king or ruler, such as Joseph, Mordecai and various advisers named in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] historical chronicles. In a book where divine and human judgment looms large, it is not surprising that the judge is an evocative, awe-inspiring figure. And corresponding to the archetypal servant and steward is the master. Beginning with the book of Exodus, moreover, we find references to various leaders, including generic leaders like Moses, the elders among the traveling Israelites during the exodus and the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] judges. The reformer can also be an ad hoc authority figure if the reform is successful.

Religious Figures. The Bible is a religious book, and the prominence of religious character types attests this. One cluster is vocational or professional in nature. Here we find prophet/prophetess, priest, church elder and deacon/deaconess, singer in the temple, disciple, missionary, sage or wise man, pilgrim, and teacher or rabbi. Another grouping of religious types is defined more by spiritual standing than by vocational role. Here we find the martyr, suffering servant, convert (see Conversion), penitent (see Repentance) and saint.

Social Types. Social roles also account for a large cluster of character types. The lover and the beloved, for example, are recognizable types, as are the bride and bridegroom. The matchmaker or go-between and the virgin are related figures. Age generates character types, chiefly at the two ends of the age spectrum: the young person and old person. Other character types defined in terms of social role include the neighbor, host (see Hospitality), guest, property owner (see Own, Owner) and witness.

An additional set of social types consists of the unfortunates of society. The list includes the beggar, runaway, outcast, prisoner (see Prison; Bondage; Slave) and wanderer. In a more ambivalent status we find the foreigner or sojourner (see Wanderer) or exile, and the traveler (see Travel Story).

Functional Character Types. Another set of character types is defined by the narrative function they fill in the dynamics of a story or situation. The trickster and eavesdropper are examples. So are the underdog and the avenger. The substitute plays a specific role in a story, as do the deliverer (see Rescue), the quester and the sufferer. Unidealized types include the dupe (the easily deceived person), the giant, the churl or refuser of festivities and the tempter. A stock character is the attendant or confidant (e) of the hero or heroine. Spouses, of course, often fill this role; but other examples include Aaron in relation to Moses, Jonathan to David, Mordecai to Esther, Elisha to Elijah, the disciples to Jesus.

Villains. Various types of villains make up the final category. While some characters in the stories of the Bible exist in our imaginations as villains simply because they are antagonists to good characters, most villains are defined in terms of a specific character trait or vice, social role, or function in a situation or action. The archetypal villains of the Bible include the prostitute, seducer/seductress, adulterer, traitor, rebel, murderer, oppressor or persecutor, tyrant, tyrannical father/husband, domineering mother/wife, thief, trickster, robber, hypocrite or deceiver, liar, flatterer, coward, fool (see Folly), drunkard, wayward child and false religious leader. Whatever specific vice a villain displays, he or she belongs ultimately to the archetype of the sinner.

See also Plot Motifs.

CHARIOT

In the nearly 150 references to chariots in the Bible, three categories of references dominate: chariots as royal vehicles, chariots as battle vehicles and the divine chariot. Chariots were used for warfare, hunting, parade and travel. In warfare they were a mobile platform from which to shoot volleys of arrows to soften up enemy infantry. If the chariot came to a standstill, javelins could be used for throwing or thrusting. Chariots served as arms for flanking or pursuing. In hunting, game would be driven across the path of the chariot on suitable terrain. In Egypt the Pharaoh and royal family were conveyed in chariots in a procession to the temple on a feast day. Travel in chariots is implied in various texts (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Kings 5:9), but this would have been impractical and very fatiguing since there was insufficient space for a seat.

References to chariots in battle present a varied picture. “Chariots of iron” carries a technical force denoting military superiority—an insurmountable force on the plains (Josh 17:16, 18; Judg 1:19; 4:3, 13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). We also read about the noise produced by chariots in battle (Judg 5:28). Overall, the references to battle chariots paint a picture of great military strength—a swarming and frightening power on the battlefield.

Yet chariots do not assure success in battle, and several famous stories of defeat are associated with chariots. Chariots become ineffective when they become mired in water or mud (Ex 14:25; Judg 4–5). Ahab’s chariot becomes the site of his death when he disguises himself in a futile attempt to cheat the divine oracle (see Cheat the Oracle) and is struck by a stray arrow shot by an enemy soldier at random (1 Kings 22). The war chariots of Joram and Ahaziah become their funeral cars (2 Kings 9:24–26; 28). We read about the hamstringing of horses and burning of chariots as a decisive disarmament of a defeated enemy (Josh 11:6; cf.

[cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 8:4). When the poet wishes to paint a picture of God's final defeat of human striving, he describes God's burning the chariots with fire (Ps 46:10).

Even in battle references, chariots are usually understood to be a royal image. Large numbers of chariot horses can be a measure of the might of a king (2 Sam 8:4; 1 Kings 4:26; 10:26—29). This same quality of being an index to a king's wealth and power can make chariots an image of royal exploitation of a nation's people, as the king takes their sons to serve his military machine (1 Sam 8:11—12). The chariot as a status symbol is implied in the aspiring Absalom's getting himself "a chariot and horses, and fifty men to run before him" (2 Sam 15:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Elsewhere the chariot is an image of swift movement. Jehu was legendary for his speed in the chariot; in fact, he is said to drive it "furiously" or "like a maniac" (2 Kings 9:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), as he uses it to deliver divine justice to Joram (2 Kings 9). Sometimes the chariot is a means of quick flight (1 Kings 12:18; 18:44).

An Egyptian war chariot.

The chariot is important in biblical imagery about God the Divine Warrior. God makes the clouds his chariot, a metaphor based on the swift horizontal movement of both chariots and clouds (Ps 104:3). In the vision of Ezekiel the throne of God is supported by the winged living creatures and the wheels of a chariot aligned in their movement, creating a vehicle that not only flies through the sky but moves along the ground (Ezek 1:5—15). The vision of Ezekiel draws on several images: a storm, a cherubim throne and a cloud chariot (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Nahum 1:3; Ps 18:7—15). This would not have been foreign to the ancients: an Assyrian relief at Maltaya depicts a goddess on a throne supported by composite winged creatures that ride on the back of a walking lion (ANEP [ANEP ANEP. Ancient Near East in Pictures] § 537). Ezekiel develops such a portable divine throne with biblical imagery about God. His living creatures have faces of a man, a lion, an ox and an eagle, reflecting the power and sovereignty of God over each of the great spheres of creation. The nails in the rims of the chariot wheels have become eyes, reinforcing the expression of divine omnipresence depicted in the four faces. The eyes, growing out of the image of the chariot wheel, come to serve as an independent metaphor of the divine omnipresence as “the eyes of Yahweh that range throughout the earth” in Zechariah 4:10 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 5:6).

The motif of the divine chariot appears elsewhere as well. Elijah is taken into heaven in “a chariot of fire” drawn by “horses of fire” (2 Kings 2:11–12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When God opens the eyes of Elisha’s servant, he sees that the mountain around Dothan is “full of horses and chariots of fire” (2 Kings 6:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Covering the ark of the covenant in the temple is a “golden chariot of the cherubim that spread their wings and covered the ark” (1 Chron 28:18 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Zechariah 6 four chariots, drawn by horses of varied colors, come from the presence of God to execute judgment.

The image of the chariot appears three times in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Philip witnesses to an Ethiopian eunuch riding in a royal chariot (Acts 8:28–38). By implication at least three people can get into this chariot: the driver (Acts 8:38), the Ethiopian eunuch (8:28) and Philip (8:31). As a court official of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, the chariot is again associated with royalty and its retinue. In the visions of Revelation the noise of the wings of the terrifying locusts is “like the noise of many chariots with horses rushing into battle” (Rev 9:9), and chariots appear in the catalog of evidences of the commercial might of Babylon (Rev 18:13).

See also Divine Warrior; Warfare.

Bibliography. Y. Yadin, The Art of Warfare in Biblical Lands (London: Weidenfield and Nicolson, 1963).

CHARMS.

See Magic.

CHEAT THE ORACLE

Stories in which a human character tries unsuccessfully to escape the fulfillment of an oracle or prophecy are familiar to ancient literature. The most famous example in Greek literature is the Oedipus story, where human characters' attempts to evade a horrible prophecy of fratricide and incest lead to its tragic fulfillment. The Bible contains more than a dozen examples of the archetype. In none of these stories does anyone successfully cheat God's oracle.

Sometimes the results are tragic, but there are also comic variations in which people's inability to thwart an oracle produces a happy ending. As we might expect, plot reversal is common in these stories when characters who think they can cheat the oracle find that they cannot. The ingredients that make up a cheat-the-oracle story are four: (1) God prophesies what will happen in a person's life; (2) the person is deluded into thinking that he or she can outwit the prophecy; (3) the person either ignores the prophecy or implements a series of actions designed to refute it; (4) God's prophecy is fulfilled.

The Tragic Thread. The tragic thread begins with the story of the Fall (Gen 3), where Satan instills in Eve the vain belief that she can eat the forbidden fruit with impunity (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eve's admission that "the serpent beguiled me, and I ate" [Gen 3:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]). Other tragedies fit the pattern as well. Samson becomes so overly confident in his ability to conquer all situations with his superior strength (despite his repeated violations of his Nazirite vow) that even after his hair has been cut, "he awoke from his sleep, and said, 'I will go out as at other times, and shake myself free.' And he did not know that the Lord had left him" (Judg 16:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). No biblical character undertakes more elaborate means to circumvent God's prophetic word than King Saul, who first thinks that he can trick the prophet Samuel into thinking that he has obeyed God's command (1 Sam 15) and then thinks he can prevent David from becoming his successor as God promises (1 Sam 15:15–18) and as Saul himself senses at a relatively early point (1 Sam 18:7–9).

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history provides further examples. Although the oracle that Rebekah consulted predicted that "the elder shall serve the younger" (Gen 25:22), Isaac attempts to trick the oracle when he makes plans to confer his blessing on Esau rather than Jacob (Gen 27). When God announces that the Israelites who believed the majority report of the spies will inhabit the Promised Land, a remnant tries unsuccessfully to conduct a foray into Canaan (Num 14). Ahab chooses to disregard Micaiah's prophecy that he will be killed in battle, only to die from a stray arrow drawn "at a venture" (1 Kings 22:1–40). Jonah tries to evade God's oracle of judgment against Nineveh by refusing to pronounce it.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , when Jesus predicts that Peter will deny him three times before the rooster crows, Peter presumptuously denies it and aggressively follows Jesus into the courtyard precincts, where his very attempt to refute Jesus' prediction of denial puts him into the position in which he fulfills the prophecy.

The Comic Thread. Stories in which human characters try unsuccessfully to trick an oracle are not uniformly tragic. In Virgil's Aeneid the Harpy's prediction that the Trojans would be reduced to eating their tables is fulfilled when the travelers arrive in Italy and eat the barley cakes on which their meat and fruit had been served. In one of Ovid's stories, Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha, sole survivors of a universal flood, are initially horrified at the command to throw the bones of their great mother behind them; but when they decide that their mother is the earth and her bones the stones, they obey the oracle and the earth is repopulated. The Bible too has its comic versions of the cheat-the-oracle motif.

Dorothy Sayers called the Joseph story the happiest and "most charming of all the cheat-the-oracle stories." As in the Oedipus myth the very steps Joseph's brothers take to thwart the prophetic dream of their eventually bowing down to him lead directly to its fulfillment. But whereas the brothers had envisioned Joseph's elevation to be bondage to them, it turns out to be redemptive, as Joseph himself observes to his brothers at the end of the story: "As for you, you meant evil against me; but God meant it for good, to bring it about that many people should be kept alive" (Gen 50:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 45:7–8).

With the covenant promises that God pronounces on the patriarchs in Genesis serving as a backdrop, Pharaoh's futile attempts to oppress the Hebrew nation emerge as attempts to defeat the oracles of God. God had promised repeatedly to "multiply" the patriarchs' descendants, and this language is deliberately echoed in Exodus 1:7–20. The narrator tells us laconically, “But the more [the Hebrews] were oppressed, the more they multiplied and the more they spread abroad” (Ex 1:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In other words Pharaoh becomes yet another victim of the ironically doomed attempt to cheat a divine oracle that had predicted numerous descendants for the patriarchs.

The earthly life of Jesus provides examples at both the nativity and the crucifixion and resurrection of how a futile attempt to thwart God’s oracle can lead to a happy conclusion. At the nativity Herod’s attempt to defeat the prophecy that from Bethlehem “shall come a ruler who will govern ... Israel” (Mt 2:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) is thwarted by the wisemen’s returning by another route and the escape of the holy family into Egypt. Jesus’ subsequent life, moreover, unfolds against a background of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] messianic prophecies (reaching as far back as Gen 3:15) about a coming savior who would defeat evil and establish an eternal kingdom of peace and righteousness. Satan’s attempt to thwart this prophecy of Christ’s victory is frustrated in the wilderness temptation. Furthermore, the crucifixion, which Satan and Jesus’ enemies no doubt expected to put an end to their troubles with Jesus, leads directly to the fulfillment of God’s plan for salvation history, inasmuch as it is through Christ’s atoning sacrifice that Satan’s defeat is secured. In the words of one of Paul’s sermons, the very people who crucified Christ “because they did not ... understand the utterances of the prophets ... fulfilled these by condemning him” (Acts 13:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] v. 29, which states that “they had fulfilled all that was written of him”). Moreover, thinking to kill Christ, his enemies actually made possible the resurrection that sealed Christ’s conquest of sin and death.

A final category of stories with happy endings are those in which a prophecy of death or calamity is overcome by God's retracting the oracle. Thus God sent Isaiah to Hezekiah with the oracle that "you shall die, you shall not recover" (Is 38:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). But when Hezekiah repented, God added fifteen years to his life. God similarly relented in his prophecies to destroy a nation in response to the intercession of Moses (Ex 32:9–14) and the repentance of Ninevah (Jon 3:10).

Summary. Stories of futile attempts to circumvent an oracle from God are built on a dichotomy between God and people. Above all, they tell us something about the divine-human relationship, in which God is sovereign and people are finite, rebellious, arrogant and presumptuous toward God's sovereignty. Human characters in these stories face an option and exercise a choice: to accept the divine purpose or to rebel against it. To adopt the second plan of action leads to inevitable defeat for the people who undertake it. The most obvious virtue these stories enjoin is submission to the divine will. The cheat-the-oracle stories in the Bible demonstrate the truthfulness and reliability of God's word and the folly of trying to thwart it. They celebrate God's superiority over people.

See also Comedy; Oracle; Prophet, Prophetess; Tragedy.

Bibliography. D. L. Sayers, "Oedipus Simplex: Freedom and Fate in Folk-Lore and Fiction," in The Poetry Search and the Poetry of Statement (London: Victor Gollancz, 1963) 243–61.

CHEMOSH.

See Gods, Goddesses.

CHERUBIM.

See Mythical Animals.

CHILD, CHILDREN

Of the more than five hundred biblical references to child and children, about half are literal. Allusions to children in the poetic and prophetic books of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as well as in the Gospels are mostly figurative.

The age span implied in the term child is imprecise. It includes the preborn (Job 3:16), infants (yet uncircumcised), weaned children (Ps 131:2) or persons of any age who are thought of as heirs or progeny, such as the children of widows, who are called to care for their parents (1 Tim 5:4). Childhood contrasts the present time with the past (Gen 8:21; Is 47:12, 15; Ps 37:25; Mk 9:21). The phrase “When I was a child” suggests a considerable time gap (Hos 11:1; 1 Cor 13:11; Gal 4:3). Youthful days are recalled as a time of vigor that is lost in later life: Job recalls a man whose “flesh is renewed like a child’s; it is restored as in the days of his youth” (Job 33:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Symbolism of Childhood. The symbolic meaning of the child image is best understood by dissimilarity from adulthood. Paul says, “When I was a child, I talked like a child, I thought like a child, I reasoned like a child. When I became a man, I put childish ways behind me” (1 Cor 13:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Though the speaker suggests relief from childhood, childish ways are a blend of powerful innocence and frustrating immaturity.

In a positive light, childhood represents simplicity and innocence. An innocent child is cherished by his or her parents (Ps 103:13; Lk 9:48). Humble in heart (Mt 18:4), a child understands things “hidden from the wise” (Lk 10:21) and offers praise to God that silences avengers (Ps 8:2). It is in these respects that Jesus deems childlikeness as the essential quality for entering the kingdom of heaven (Mt 18:3; 19:14; Mk 10:15; Lk 18:16). Jesus evokes an aura of innocence and ignorance when he calls his disciples “children!” (Mk 10:24). Paul’s phrase “dear children” suggests both his affectionate care and their naiveté (1 Cor 4:14; Gal 4:19; 1 Jn 3:18, 4:4)

The two sides of childishness as opposed to adult ways are clearly stated by Paul: “Brothers and sisters, do not be children in your thinking; rather, be infants in evil, but in thinking be adults.” (1 Cor 14:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Of differences between children and adults, he names the positive—an innocence toward evil—and the negative—a thoughtlessness toward life.

In one sense childish immaturity is relished as a revelation of the learning process. Children can perform simple tasks like writing (Is 10:19). They perceive basic truths like “knowing” when to leave the womb (Hos 13:13), being known by one’s actions (Prov 20:11) and seeing idolatry as wrong (Jer 17:2). But they need defense from complexity. We recall the psalmist, who measures his words so as not to “betray your children” (Ps 73:15), or Paul, who speaks to new believers “as to my children” (2 Cor 6:13).

Yet in their immaturity children are prone to evil (Jer 4:22), learn slowly (Is 28:9; 1 Cor 13:11) and resist work (Mt 11:16) or pain (Hos 13:13). They are also quick to rebel. For example, Job prays each day for his children in case they have cursed God in their hearts (Job 1:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 1:2, 4; Is 30:1). The negative signs of childhood are most frustrating when they endure into adulthood.

Children as Learners. Children are in need of knowledge. Ignorant of good and evil, among other things, they need to learn (Deut 1:39). After God delivers Israel it is said, “Remember today that your children were not the ones who saw and experienced the discipline of the Lord your God ... who saw what he did for you in the desert until you arrived at this place” (Deut 11:2, 5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Parents are responsible to teach their children of God’s justice, both his judgment and his mercy. Admonitions to “train up a child in the way he should go” are many (Deut 4:9–10; 6:7; 29:29; 30:2; 31:13; 32:46; Josh 4:6; Ps 34:11; 78:4–5; Is 38:19; 54:13; Joel 1:3; Eph 6:4).

The common teachability of children is celebrated throughout Scripture, whereas their occasional rebellion is deplored. Jesus called a child to stand among them to illustrate teachability (Mt 18:2–4). This teachable spirit was among the qualities for which Jesus praised children, welcomed them and likened the kingdom to them (Lk 9:48; 10:21; 18:16). A child’s teachable attitude is a model for the Christian’s life.

Learning entails discipline (Prov 22:15; 23:13; Heb 12:8). Unteachable children rebel against it (Is 30:9; Jer 5:7; Ezek 20:18, 21; Mt 10:21; Tit 1:6). By contrast, obedient action signals learning (1 Pet 1:14; 1 Jn 3:18). John sums up the attitude of a teacher/parent: “I have no greater joy than to hear that my children are walking in the truth” (3 Jn 4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Adults who are intimidated by a task liken themselves to a child. Solomon prayed: “I am only a little child and do not know how to carry out my duties” (1 Kings 3:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). At Jeremiah’s similar confession the Lord promises knowledge: “Do not say, ‘I am only a child.’ You must go to everyone I send you to and say whatever I command you” (Jer 1:6–7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Children as Dependent. Children represent dependence in two ways: parents are dependent upon their children as a guarantee of future generations; hence, their moral and physical well-being in old age makes them dependent on their infants. Children, however, are dependent on their parents for nurture in their youth. The protection of children is a major theme.

Parental pride stemmed from dependence upon their children for a name in the future (Gen 31:43; 42:36; 48:6, 11). Children carry the parents' reputation (Ex 2:2—3; 21:4; Job 5:25; 21:8; Lk 7:35). The psalmist echoed the opinion of all when he said, "Sons are a heritage from the Lord, children a reward from him" (Ps 127:3).

The childless are pitied in the Bible (Gen 15:2—3; 18; 42:36; 1 Chron 2:32; Mt 22:24—25; Mk 12:19—22; Lk 20:28—31). The result of childlessness is grim: "[Shimei's] brothers did not have many children; so their entire clan did not become as numerous as the children of Judah" (1 Chron 4:27).

Childlessness is a sign of judgment (Lev 20:20, 21; 26:22). Fertility signals blessing both on and off the battlefield (Deut 7:14; 1 Chron 7:4; Job 5:25). Couples without children earnestly pray for them (Gen 20:17; Rachel, Hannah, Lk 1:7).

Children likewise depend on their parents: for protection from military conflict or other danger (Gen 21:23; 32:11; 33:14; Ex 2:2—3; 22:24; Num 32:16—17, 24, 26), for proper provision (Gen 31:16; 47:24; Mt 15:26) and for nurture (Ruth 4:16; Ps 131:2; Is 66:13; Joel 2:16; Mt 23:37; 1 Thess 2:11; 1 Tim 5:10). Ideally, parents also provide a homeland (Josh 14:9; Jer 30:20; Acts 7:5). It is their great sense of responsibility that prompts their continued quest for the Promised Land.

Without parents or in evil times, children are vulnerable to hunger (1 Sam 2:5; Lam 2:19); one prophet describes "the infant's tongue sticks to the roof of its mouth; the children beg for bread but no one gives it to them" (Lam 4:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Defenseless on their own, children also face danger (1 Kings 8:12; 10:1; Job 5:4; 24:9; Is 13:18; Jer 40:7; Lam 2:11, 19; Rev 12:4—5).

Harm comes when parents are rendered helpless (Jer 47:3; 49:10; Lam 1:5, 16) or are the cause of the child's suffering by personal sin (Hos 1:2, 5:7, 9:12). Worst are scenes of intentional harm from their parent in cases of cannibalism (Deut 28:55, 57), of jealousy (2 Chron 22:11) or of idol worship that demands child sacrifice (2 Kings 17:31; Is 57:5; Jer 6:11; 9:21; 18:21; Ezek 16:36; 23:37; 29). Specific stories of dependent children are especially potent. Moses, in the ark amidst the reeds, while in danger of death as a male baby in Egypt, is also in danger from the river. Jesus as a baby is endangered in the same way (Mt 2:8).

The children of Abraham were privileged to have a dependable father: as his seed, they reap the benefits of the gospel (Acts 13:26, 33; Rom 9:7; Gal 3:7; 4:1). Likewise children of believing parents are blessed (1 Cor 7:14). Fathers were responsible for demonstrating and instilling proper moral direction (Gen 18:19; Deut 30:19)

The most enduring image of peace entails the safety of a child among natural danger, an image of God's care for the entire earth:

The wolf will live with the lamb, the leopard will lie down with the goat, the calf and the lion and the yearling together; and a little child will lead them. The cow will feed with the bear, their young will lie down together, and the lion will eat straw like the ox. The infant will play near the hole of the cobra, and the young child put his hand into the viper's nest. (Is 11:6—8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Both parent and child are cared for by God's promise that sin will not be punished to further generations: "In those days people will no longer say, 'The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge" (Jer 31:29). God promises to be dependable for future children: "All your sons will be taught by the Lord, and great will be your children's peace" (Is 54:13).

Children as Reflections of Parents. The parents' dependence upon the child stems from the fact that the child reflects their care for him or her, and indeed, their own character. Images of children reflect a parent's present situation as well as future potential.

When children are included in an assembly of the whole, they represent the totality of the man as a member of his clan. Just as childlessness resulted in smaller clans among Israel, so the image of children gathered around their father suggests present status. There are twenty-four references to this sort of blessing. Similar consequences are meted out for sin: God regrets Israel's sin before she is exiled to Babylon, saying, "Your descendants would have been like the sand, your children like its numberless grains" (Is 48:19).

Future danger for the children results from parental sin. A past generation's sin is remembered by saying: "To this day, their children and grandchildren continue to do as their fathers did" (2 Kings 17:41). Nehemiah referred to a generation of children who spoke only the language of the idols, not "the language of Judah" (Neh 13:24). These comments indicate that children are an unchangeable reflection of past actions.

Connections between parents and children in the present tense are made as well: "If a man denounces his friends for reward, the eyes of his children will fail" (Job 17:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Passages promising even more forceful destruction for one's children because of sin are many (Ex 20:5; 34:7; Num 14:18, 33; Deut 5:9; Ps 103:17; 109:9—10, 12; Is 47:8—9; Jer 2:9; 32:18; 36:3; 38:23; Ezra 5:17; Rev 2:23). These examples are summarized by God's statement: "Because you have ignored the law of your God, I also will ignore your children" (Hos 4:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This pattern makes the cry of the crowd at Jesus' trial all the more stark: "Let his blood be on us and on our children!" (Mt 27:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

At the same time, benefits toward children are also a reward (Deut 23:8; Is 29:23; 59:21; 65:23; Jer 30:20; Ezek 37:25; Zech 10:7). They are a sort of leverage toward obedience: "that it may go well with you and your children after you" (Deut 4:40; 4:29; 6:2; 12:25, 28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Proverbs are clear: the righteous are repeatedly promised blessing for their children (Prov 13:22; 14:26; 20:7; Ps 37:26). Repentance also brings blessing: "So there is hope for your future," declares the Lord. "Your children will return to their own land" (Jer 31:17; Zech 10:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Likewise, the gospel is "for you and for your children" (Acts 2:39).

Children as Cherished. Though subject to normal human perversions, in general, the overwhelming image of children in the Bible is that they are cherished by their parents, by their nation and by God. Parents dote on their children with devotion unparalleled in other relationships. Their ardent prayers to bear children (Gen 15:2—3; 16:1—2; 20:17; 1 Sam 1:27; 2:20; Is 54:1) and their celebrations at the birth of a child (Jer 20:15; Lk 1:66) demonstrate this. Parents store up wealth for their children (Ps 17:14) and want to give them good gifts (Mt 7:11; Lk 11:13; 2 Cor 12:14). Parents become desperate if their child is near death (1 Kings 17:23; 2 Kings 4:18—30; Mk 5:39—40; Mk 7:30; Jn 4:49).

Specifically named children of the Bible are always cherished. As a baby, Jesus is adored by all who meet him: the wise men (Mt 2:8, 11), the shepherds, Anna and Simeon.

Those who are the “only child” are noted with special care (Prov 4:3; Zech 12:10; Lk 9:38). Jephthah agonizes over his vow to sacrifice the thing he first sees because it is his precious only daughter whom he sees first (Judg 11:34). In Nathan’s story to David the poor man cares for his sheep as for an only daughter (2 Sam 12:3). Two women fight before Solomon over one living child after another child dies (1 Kings 3:18). Joash, the child king, is guarded in secret by his mother’s sister (2 Chron 22:11).

Except in times of idol sacrifice, Israelites as a nation cherish children (Judg 18:21; Ps 127:3; Is 7:14; 9:6; Hos 9:16; Mic 1:16; Mt 2:18; Mt 19:29). God’s laws and edicts cherish children (Lev 18:21; 20:3–4; Deut 33:9; Josh 1:14; Mal 4:6). God himself defends them (Ps 72:4; Hos 11:10). Jesus stopped for children, took time with them (Mt 18:5; 19:13; Mk 10:16; Lk 9:48; 13:34) and healed them (Mk 7:30). Love for children is one evidence of “a people prepared for the Lord” (Lk 1:17; Mal 4:6).

Hebrews claim to be Abraham’s children and thereby privileged (Jn 8:39, 41). They are addressed as such occasionally (Acts 13:26). But children of Abraham are redefined after Christ’s resurrection as anyone who accepts his promise (Gal 3:7). Abraham’s children are God’s children.

God’s children are especially cherished and privileged (Jn 1:13; 11:52). John, “the disciple whom Jesus loved,” captures this tone when he addresses “dear children” seven times in his first epistle (1 Jn 2:1, 12, 13, 18, 28; 3:1, 7). God has compassion on his children (Jer 31:20) and never forgets them (Is 49:15). They have eternal contentment, eternal life (Lk 20:36; Gal 4:31; 1 Jn 3:2; 1 Jn 4:4; 1 Jn 5:19). The right to be God’s child is extended to all (Jn 1:12; Rom 8:16, 21; 9:8; 1 Jn 5:1), to Gentile and Jew alike (Gal 4:28). Just as one’s behavior signals one’s family background (1 Jn 3:10), so God’s children are called to behave as children of the King (Deut 14:1; Eph 5:1, 8; Phil 2:14—15; 1 Jn 3:18; 1 Jn 5:2).

These images of children add warmth and depth to the promises that God looks on us as a father looks on his children. Younger and different from adults in maturity and innocence, a child is dependent on others, in a position to learn, and reflects the present situation and future hope of his or her parents; above all, a child is cherished. As children of God we yearn for the contentment that comes naturally to children; we adjust our position to assume the stance of a child because we understand that Jesus said, “Anyone who will not receive the kingdom of God like a little child will never enter it” (Mk 10:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Most of all, we rest like a child, content that he deals with us “as a father deals with his own children” (1 Thess 2:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Baby; Barrenness; Birth Story; Birthright; Elder Child, Elder Sibling; Family; Father; Favored Child, Slighted Child; Mother; Orphan; Younger Child, Younger Sibling.

CHILDBIRTH.

See Birth.

CHILDLESSNESS.

See Barrenness.

CHOICE, STORIES OF

The element of choice is almost synonymous with storytelling, and it is hard to imagine a good story without the element of choice in it. After all, the most common narrative strategy is to put the protagonist into a situation that tests him or her and requires a choice. In the Bible this quality of stories and of life itself is given a moral and spiritual depth, for the universe is understood to be a battleground in which good and evil vie for mastery of people's souls.

The quality of choice as a condition of human life is inherent in the story of paradise (Gen 2), where the very presence of a forbidden tree places Adam and Eve in a position of having to choose whether to obey or disobey the prohibition. The first recorded human choice is a tragic one—eating the forbidden tree and thereby causing the fall of the human race and the universe. Pursuant to the Fall, God does not change the ground rules for human life. People still have the capacity to choose for or against God and between good and evil. Cain chooses evil; Noah, good. Lot chooses selfishness and worldly-mindedness; Abraham generally lives by faith and chooses to believe the promises of God. Jacob's checkered life gradually moves from a series of poor choices to better ones. Joseph chooses the moral life and the life of faith. From the very start of its portrayal of human life, then, the Bible concentrates on the person at the crossroads; and as we read, the godly life emerges in our imaginations as above all, a life of choice.

Some of the choices that remain in our memories from reading the Bible are tragic ones. The nation of Israel generally chooses poorly, beginning with the exodus and continuing through every successive era, including that of the judges and kings, until it is finally carried off into exile. In many cases the nation's tragic cycles are tied to leaders who choose idolatry. Some of the characters who choose poorly are full-fledged tragic heroes, most notably Samson and King Saul. Even in the stories of biblical characters who are mainly virtuous, we often see the contrary impulse toward a bad choice, as in Gideon's making of an idol (Judg 8:22–27) or Moses' striking the rock in anger in a manner that leads God to judge him (Num 20:10—12). David's domestic and political decline begins with an immoral choice to commit adultery and to murder.

On the other side we remember the heroes and heroines of the Bible chiefly for their courage at crucial moments of choice. We think of Abraham obeying God's command to leave his native land and later to offer his son; of Joseph refusing the solicitation to sexual sin; of Moses repeatedly taking his stand on God's instructions instead of giving in to popular opinion; of Ruth heroically choosing to commit herself to a new life as a foreigner, out of loyalty to her mother-in-law; of Esther agreeing to enter the king's presence with her petition; and of the prophets pronouncing God's word even at the cost of persecution. There is no more moving gallery of characters who made the great choice than the roll call of the heroes of faith in Hebrews 11, where the formula "by faith" is an equivalent for "by choice."

In the Bible the spiritual life is essentially one of choosing for God. We see this most forcefully in a famous moment when the departing leader Moses sets "life and death, blessing and curse" before the nation of Israel, accompanied by the command "therefore choose life" (Deut 30:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the same vein are Joshua's charge to the nation, "Choose this day whom you will serve" (Josh 24:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and Elijah's chastising his nation on Mt. Carmel for limping between two opinions instead of following God (1 Kings 18:21).

Some genres of the Bible presuppose an element of choice. One of these is the commandments that are constantly set before followers of God. To command something is to say, "Do this, not that," thereby implying that people must make a choice in the matter. Similarly in wisdom literature the observations and commands that make up the proverbs presuppose choice as a condition of the listener's life. This is accentuated when (as in Prov 1—9) the imagery of the two paths is present. Of similar import are some of the psalms, such as Psalm 1, which present the reader with a choice simply by painting a heightened contrast between good and evil.

In the Gospels Jesus himself, as well as his claims, become the focus of implied choice. Repeatedly the stories that comprise the Gospels portray characters either accepting or rejecting what Jesus says about himself and the spiritual life. Some people turn away from Jesus sorrowful; others eagerly embrace his message. In both instances we witness the momentous drama of the soul's choice, which is a main theme of the Bible. This is a drama in which the reader of the Bible participates, inasmuch as reading the Bible presupposes choice on the part of the reader as a condition of reading.

See also Bible; Blessing; Curse; Idolatry; Reward; Sin; Tragedy.

CHRIST.

See Jesus, Images of.

CHRIST HYMN

The genre known as Christ hymn is a NT [NT NT. New Testament] form. Its dominant motif is to praise the person and work of the incarnate Christ. As such, the genre is an outgrowth of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] praise psalm, its hallmark being that the object of praise has now become specifically Christ. The Christ hymn also has strong affinities with the encomium (a poem in praise of either a quality or character type), with such motifs as the praiseworthy acts and qualities of the subject, the subject's distinguished ancestry, the superiority motif and the command to the reader to emulate. The canon of Christ hymns includes the prologue to John's Gospel (Jn 1:1–18), the hymn of the servant Christ in Philippians 2:5–11, the creed embedded in 1 Timothy 3:16 and the poem in praise of the supremacy of Christ in Colossians 1:15–20. In addition, passages in Hebrews and Revelation have the general qualities and motifs of the Christ hymn.

While the individual hymns have their distinctive themes, they also share common image patterns and motifs. Because Christ came from heaven to earth, the imagery of heaven and earth, high and low, figures prominently. The deity of Christ results in cosmic imagery, including the motif of Christ's being eternal (see Cosmology). Because Christ is the incarnate deity, some of the hymns play on the antithesis of human (including the vocabulary of "flesh") and divine. The theme of distinguished ancestry takes the form of a divine ancestry in the prologue to John's Gospel. The redemptive mission of Christ produces the imagery of light coming to darkness. Allusions to the redemptive life, death and resurrection of Christ naturally appear, and also to his work in creating the world. Other motifs include fullness, glory, arrival or "coming" and the motifs of "beginning" and first. The overall direction toward which all these motifs press is the supremacy of Christ.

See also Encomium; Sing, Singing.

Bibliography. R. P. Martin, A Hymn of Christ (3d ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] ; Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity Press, 1997); idem, "Hymns, Hymn Fragments, Songs, Spiritual Songs," DPL [DPL DPL. Dictionary of Paul and His Letters] 419–23.

CHRISTUS VICTOR.

See Jesus, Images of.

CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF

The books of Chronicles offer many opportunities for appreciating literary imagery. In their own right the books display a variety of artistic qualities, but comparisons with its main sources (1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings) offer a great advantage for those pursuing the imagery of Chronicles.

The precise date of the chronicler's writing is unknown. In general terms we may say with confidence that he wrote to the those who had returned from exile in Babylon sometime between 520 and 400 b.c. His readers had come back to the land of promise, but they failed to see the rich blessings for which they had hoped. The chronicler creatively composed his own version of Israel's past to encourage these postexilic Israelites to pursue the attitudes and actions that would lead to further blessings from God.

As with all biblical books that are largely composed of narrative, the message of Chronicles does not appear explicitly on the surface of the text. Instead, it is communicated through a number of subtle artistic devices. Two examples of the chronicler's literary techniques are his use of structural and thematic imagery.

Structural Imagery. The chronicler does not order his history with purely chronological interests. Instead he orders his materials so that their very structure convey his message. The most dominant use of this technique appears in the large-scale structure of Chronicles. The chronicler organizes his record in a way that speak to the needs of his readers. Consider the following outline of his books:

The Privileges and Responsibilities of God's People (1 Chron 1:1—9:34)

The Ideal United Monarchy (1 Chron 9:35–2 Chron 9:31)

The Divided Monarchy of Judgment and Blessing (2 Chron 10:1—28:27)

The Reunited Monarchy of Hope (2 Chron 29:1—36:23)

To grasp the significance of this structure we must remember that the history of Israel could have been recorded in countless other ways. The books of Samuel and Kings, for instance, illustrate two ways it could have been done. Why did the chronicler choose to convey his history of Israel as he did? His four stages of Israel's history convey much more than data about the past. On the contrary, each segment of the history has symbolic significance for the chronicler and his original readers.

First, the opening genealogies and lists (1 Chron 1:1—9:34), which do not appear in Samuel or Kings, provide the chronicler's unique perspective on the identity of his readers. He traces the origins of the tribes of Israel from Adam (1:1—9:1) and closes with lists of those who have returned from Babylon (9:1—34). By this means the chronicler establishes that the postexilic Israelites are the rightful heirs of Israel's history. Without explicitly declaring his view, he symbolically establishes the relevance of his entire historical record for the readers of his day. This history is their heritage.

Second, having established the contemporary value of his history, the chronicler arranges his record of David and Solomon with symbolic value as well. He presents the reigns of David and Solomon as ideals to which postexilic Israel should aspire (1 Chron 9:35—2 Chron 9:31). The record of Samuel and Kings report both the good and bad in the lives of these kings; however, the chronicler omits most of their shortcomings and adds tremendous accomplishments. In this way his history of Israel's monarchy begins with models for his readers. Once again, he does not explicitly state this point of view, but his arrangement of the material communicates this outlook.

Third, the chronicler's version of the divided monarchy (2 Chron 10:1–28:27) differs from parallels in Kings in a number of ways. To begin with, the chronicler ignores the history of the northern kingdom; from his vantage point only events in Judah are important because his readers live in Judah. Moreover he frequently arranges the reigns of Judah's kings into periods of blessing and judgment. Each of these periods offers his readers the opportunity to see the consequences of fidelity and infidelity in the past. These examples both encourage and warn the postexilic readers about their own lives.

Fourth, after a reunion of north and south at Hezekiah's Passover celebration, the chronicler traces events in the reunited monarchy (2 Chron 29:1–36:23). These last reigns form a series of failures followed by hopeful acts of divine grace. The final demonstration of divine mercy is the release from exile that the postexilic readers have recently experienced (2 Chron 36:20–23). The records are arranged in this way to give the readers of Chronicles hope for their own future.

The large-scale arrangement of the chronicler's history illustrates one way in which structural imagery works in the books of Chronicles. Each portion of the history reflects more than information about their past; each section holds symbolic value for its first readers.

The chronicler also uses structural imagery on a smaller scale. This artistic technique appears so often that we must limit ourselves to just two examples. The first appears in the middle portion of the genealogies (1 Chron 2:2–9:1). While these chapters focus on the breadth of the tribes to be counted among the people of God, the tribes appear in an order that is unique in biblical records. Moreover, uneven amounts of material are given to various tribes. Figure 1 illustrates the resulting pattern.

Judah (1 Chron 2:3—4:23; 110 verses)

Simeon (4:24—43; 20 verses)

Transjordanian Tribes (5:1—26; 26 verses)

Reuben (5:1—10; 10 verses)

Gad (5:11—17; 7 verses)

[Brief Narrative (5:18—22; 5 verses)]

Half-Tribe of Manasseh (5:23; 1 verse)

[Brief Narrative (5:24—26; 3 verses)]

Levi (1 Chron 6:1—81; 81 verses)

Issachar (7:1—5; 5 verses)

Benjamin (7:6—12; 7 verses)

Naphtali (7:13; 1 verse)

Manasseh (7:14—19; 6 verses)

Ephraim (7:20—29; 10 verses)

Asher (7:30—40; 11 verses)

Benjamin (1 Chron 8:1—40; 40 verses)

Fig. 1. Structural pattern in genealogies of 1 Chronicles 2:2—9:1

This structural pattern hardly seems accidental; the symbolic value is manifold. For instance, Judah is privileged with the first place (1 Chron 2:3—4:23). As the tribe from which David's royal line came, this first place is appropriate. The Benjamites are last, but privileged with much attention (1 Chron 8:1—40). This tribe remained faithful to the Davidic line, and much of its territory is included in the postexilic province of Judah. The importance of the Benjamites in the postexilic community is reflected in their prominence in the genealogies. At the center of the order is the tribe of Levi (1 Chron 6:1—81). Just as Moses ordered that the Levites should be central in the camp of Israel (Num 2:17), the Levites are central in these genealogies. This central position also points to the importance of the temple and its personnel in the postexilic community. In this way the chronicler's structuring of this material conveys a symbolic message to his readers. It gives them a picture of the priorities that they must follow in their own day.

Another example of structural imagery appears in the account of David's widespread support (1 Chron 11:1—12:40). The chronicler omits all the material from Samuel related to David's struggle with Saul (2 Sam 1:1—4:12). He gathers several texts together (2 Sam 5:1—3; 5:6—10; 23:8—39) and adds his own material (1 Chron 12:1—40) to create a temporal and geographical image of the support for David's kingship. The following chart illustrates the resulting A B C D Ć Ĕ Á pattern:

A) Anointing at Hebron (Establishment in Jerusalem) (1 Chron 11:1—9)

B) Military Support at Hebron (1 Chron 11:10—47)

C) Military Support at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:1—7)

D) Military Support at the Desert Stronghold (1 Chron 12:8—19)

Ć) More Military Support at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:20–22)

Ĕ) More Military Support at Hebron (1 Chron 12:23–37)

Á) More on the Anointing at Hebron (1 Chron 12:38–40)

As this outline suggests, the chronicler arranges this material geographically. With the exception of 1 Chronicles 11:4–9, each location is mentioned twice. This repetitive structure has the effect of echoing the theme of widespread support for David time and again. David's kingship is presented as being without significant opposition.

Beyond this, comparisons with the chronology of 2 Samuel demonstrate that the chronicler's outline also has a pattern of chronological mirroring. David's time at the strongholds (1 Sam 22:1–5; 23:14, 29) precedes his stay at Ziklag (1 Sam 27:6). His time at Ziklag precedes the anointing at Hebron (2 Sam 5:1–4). In this light we can see that the chronicler presents his account with a temporal regression followed by a temporal progression. The effect of this structural arrangement is to present David's anointing as an immediate fait accompli. The readers are then led through the events that precede it and back to the anointing itself. In this manner the chronicler conveys symbolically that David's anointing was unopposed then, just as his throne should be unopposed in the postexilic period.

Thematic Imagery. Another way the chronicler communicates his message is by thematic imagery. Often these themes appear in the reiteration of certain terms; sometimes they emerge in the repetition of similar scenes. Several motifs deserve special mention.

All Israel. One of the chronicler's favorite terms is "all Israel" (kol yisrā'ēl). This and similar expressions appear throughout his history (1 Chron 11:10; 12:38; 14:8; 15:3, 28; 18:14; 19:17; 21:5; 28:4, 8; 2 Chron 1:2; 7:8; 9:30; 10:16; 11:3, 13; 12:1; 13:4, 15; 18:16; 24:5; 28:23; 30:1; 31:1; 35:3). They reflect his keen interest in the unity of God's people.

The chronicler's image of "all Israel" is both narrow and broad. On the one hand, he considers those who have returned from exile to be the remnant of all Israel. The representatives of Judah, Benjamin, Ephraim, Manasseh and Levi who have returned to the land (1 Chron 9:2–34) represent the people of God (2 Chron 36:23). As such, they play a key role in the restoration of the kingdom of Israel.

On the other hand, the chronicler also broadly identifies God's people with all twelve tribes of Israel. In his view the restoration of Israel is incomplete so long as some of the tribes remain separated from the Davidic king and the Jerusalem temple. To demonstrate his view, the chronicler includes both northern and southern tribes in his genealogies (1 Chron 2:3; 4:24; 5:1, 11, 23; 6:1; 7:1, 6, 13, 14, 20). He presents the ideal of a united kingdom under David and Solomon. He depicts the reunification of the northern and southern kingdoms in the days of Hezekiah (2 Chron 30:1–31:1).

The chronicler's imagery of "all Israel" may be summarized in this way: the returnees are the remnant of all Israel, but they have to pray and work for the restoration of the full extent of all Israel.

King and temple. The chronicler's history also reveals that he is deeply concerned with the centrality of Israel's king and temple. In his history, king and temple are frequently repeated images that are fundamental to the life of Israel.

For example, the genealogies give special attention to David's royal family (1 Chron 2:10–17; 3:1–24) along with long lists of priests and Levites (1 Chron 6:1–81). Moreover, his record of David and Solomon's ideal kingdoms depict the kings as enthusiastically devoted to the service of the temple (1 Chron 17–29; 2 Chron 2–7).

One of the most striking ways in which the chronicler brings this theme to the foreground is by repeating scenes of joy and celebration in worship. Time and again he describes the music and enthusiastic participation of Israel when the kings give proper attention to the temple (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Chron 16:1–42; 23:5; 25:1–31; 2 Chron 5:12–13; 7:6; 23:13, 18; 29:25–30; 34:12). These repeated scenes of joy in worship offer the chronicler's readers guidance for their lives. They can expect the joy of blessings from God as they give proper attention to the temple.

Divine blessing and judgment. The chronicler's history also repeats the imagery of blessing and judgment through divine intervention. Unlike the books of Kings, Chronicles seldom speaks of divine judgment being delayed or mollified. Instead it repeatedly connects fidelity with immediate blessing, and infidelity with immediate judgment (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Chron 28:9; 2 Chron 6:14; 7:11–22; 15:2; 16:7–9; 21:12–15; 24:20; 25:14–24; 28:9; 34:24–28).

The standards for divine judgment and blessing vary. At times the chronicler emphasizes obedience to the Mosaic law (1 Chron 6:49; 15:13, 15; 16:40; 22:12–13; 28:7; 29:19; 2 Chron 6:16; 7:17–18; 12:1–2; 14:4, 6; 15:12–15; 17:3–9; 19:8–10; 24:6, 9; 25:4; 30:15–16; 31:3–21; 33:8; 34:19–33; 35:6–26). At other times he repeats scenes of response to prophetic/priestly instruction (2 Chron 11:2–4; 12:5–8; 20:14–20; 21:12–19; 24:19–25; 25:7–10, 15–20; 26:17–20). Blessings come to those who upheld the purity of temple worship (2 Chron 15:1–19; 17:1–6; 24:1–16; 29:1–31:21; 34:1–35:19). Humble reliance on God instead of human strength brings good (1 Chron 5:20; 2 Chron 13:18; 14:7; 16:7–9; 20:1–30; 32:20–22). When the people of God and their kings turn to sin, immediate retribution often follows in the form of illness or military defeat (1 Chron 10:1–14; 2 Chron 13:1–16; 16:12; 18:33–34; 21:15–19; 25:14–24; 26:19–20; 28:1–5; 33:1–11). Even so, when the people come under God’s judgment, they can be restored to blessing by humbly seeking God through repentance and prayer (1 Chron 21:1–22:1; 2 Chron 7:13–15; 12:1–12; 33:10–13). By repeating these images of judgment and blessing, the chronicler shows his postexilic readers the ways to secure divine blessing in their day. The full restoration of Israel will come only as they live in fidelity to the Lord.

Summary. We remember historical writing such as we find in the two books of the Chronicles partly as a series of memorable characters and moments. These images include Uzzah’s dying “on the spot” when he touches the ark of the covenant, David’s dancing in abandon as the ark is carried into Jerusalem, David’s gathering materials for the building of the temple, the extended descriptions of the temple as built by Solomon, Solomon’s prayer of dedication and God’s glory filling the temple at the dedication, the visit of the Queen of Sheba to see Solomon’s court, the defeat of Sennacherib’s army by an angel of God, Josiah’s rending his clothes when the newly discovered copy of the law is read, and the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple at the time of the exile.

See also Kings, Books of; Samuel, Books of.

Bibliography. M. J. Selman, 1 & 2 Chronicles (TOTC [TOTC TOTC. Tyndale Old Testament Commentary] ; Leicester, U.K. and Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1994).

CHURCH

The Bible provides a rich kaleidoscope of imagery about the church composed of around one hundred metaphors and statements. The thread on which all other jewels are hung is the idea of the church as an ekklēsia (“assembly,” “gathering”). This word, taken from common usage where it applied to the “calling out” of citizens for a civic meeting or of soldiers for battle, is used extensively throughout the Old and New Testaments to refer to the people of God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 4:10; 9:10; 31:30; Mt 16:18; 18:17; Acts 5:11; Rom 16:5; 1 Cor 1:2; Eph 1:22; 3:10; Heb 12:23).

A second background factor is the idea of the kingdom of God. Its relation to the church has been much debated, but the two cannot be identical even though there are areas of overlap. The church is the partial fulfillment of the kingdom of God in the here and now and serves as a primary agent of the kingdom; hence it is appropriate to apply some kingdom imagery to the church itself (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Col 1:13). But the thrust of the post-Pentecost portrayal of the church lies elsewhere. Some of the most important images cluster around the focal points of past continuity, present identity and future fulfillment.

Continuity with the Past. Those images which draw on the past roots of the people of God stress that the followers of Jesus Christ stand both in continuity with the people of the older covenant and as the fulfillment of that covenant. They are now, in Christ, all that the older covenant longed to see. So Christians are a new Israel, the spiritual seed of Abraham (Gal 3:29, 6:16), ruled over by and belonging to God himself (1 Pet 2:9–10) and composed of all those who have faith in Christ, whatever their racial or cultural background.

Central to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] religion was the temple. The church of Jesus Christ does not worship at a temple but has become the temple. God now lives both among and within his people, not in buildings but in a living community (1 Cor 3:16–17; 2 Cor 6:16–18; Eph 2:20–21). This metaphor is implicit in the frequent references to building (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 16:18; 1 Cor 3:9; 2 Cor 10:8; 13:10; Jude 20). Given that the church is the place where God dwells by his Spirit, people must live in unity with each other and in holiness of life. Integral to the temple was the priesthood. Under the new covenant, all believers have become priests (1 Pet 2:9; Rev 1:6; 5:10; 20:6), once more bringing into actuality the unfulfilled design of the old covenant (Ex 19:6).

The picture in John 15:1–17 of Jesus as a vine and his disciples as branches who need to remain in him and derive their life from him is equally an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image. Israel was spoken of in Isaiah 5:1–7 as a much-loved vineyard, which had only produced bad fruit and was thus destined for destruction.

Identity in the Present. The bulk of images focus on the character of the church in the present age. The primary one is that of the church as a body. This image is initially used to stress the dependence of members on one another in the face of tendencies, such as their differing gifts or their different cultural and social backgrounds, which might cause them to pull apart from one another. The key issue is the quality of relationships and mutual responsiveness that believers have with each other (Rom 12:3–8; 1 Cor 12:12–31). Commitment to one another was essential because they “were all baptized by one Spirit into one body” (1 Cor 12:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The nature of their fellowship life is far more profound than when people gather because they merely have a common interest or wish to pursue a common goal.

The concept of the body is also developed in other ways. It indicates that the church is a living organism, not a religious organization. As such it not only has coherence, but it should expect to grow and develop (Eph 4:1–16; Col 2:19). Bodies also have heads from which commands are received and which enable them to function. So it is with the church.

Ephesians 1:22 and 4:15 and Colossians 1:18—19 make clear that Christ is the head of the church.

A second image that is developed in a number of ways is that of the church as a household. A more inclusive social unit than our contemporary family, it nonetheless picks up the idea of the church as a family brought in to being by the faithfulness of God's son, Jesus (Heb 3:1—6). As in any family, relationships are maintained by members behaving appropriately to one another. So the focus here is on the correct behavior of members in the household of God (1 Tim 3:15; Gal 6:10, see also the household codes of behavior, e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Eph 5:22—6:9; Col 3:18—4:1; 1 Tim 3:1—13 and 5:1—20).

Further images arise naturally from the everyday world in which Jesus and his followers lived. These include the image of a flock being cared for and guided by a shepherd (Jn 10:1—21; see also Lk 12:32; Acts 8—28; 1 Pet 5:2—4) and of "God's field" in which the word of the gospel is planted and watered by persons but is germinated by God himself (1 Cor 3:6—9; see Farming).

Images that Point to the Future. The people of God look forward to the complete realization of their salvation in the future. This theme is particularly captured by the image of the church as the bride of Christ (Jn 3:29; Mt 9:15; 25:1—13; Mk 2:19; Lk 5:34—35). Paul exploits this metaphor in two ways. He speaks both of the love Christ had for the church (Eph 5:25) and of the consequent need for the betrothed to keep herself pure for the coming of the bridegroom on their wedding day (2 Cor 11:2). Revelation 19:7 brings the picture to a climax by foreseeing the wedding banquet when at last, after all the suffering and necessary preparation, the bride and groom are finally united and the festivities begin.

See also Body; Branch; Bride, Bridegroom; Build, Building; Family; Flock; Head; Household; Israel; Kingdom of God; Seed; Temple; Vine, Vineyard; Wedding.

Bibliography. P. S. Minear, Images of the Church in the New Testament (London: Lutterworths, 1961).

CHURL.

See Refuser of Festivities.

CIRCUMCISION

Circumcision is a symbolic act that functions as a powerful image throughout the Bible. It was the sign of the covenant between God and Israel (Gen 17:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 7:8; Rom. 4:11) whereby he had chosen them and given them the promise “[I will] be God to you and to your descendants after you” (Gen 17:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 7:7–9).

Circumcision as Ancient Rite. During OT [OT OT. Old Testament] times circumcision was practiced by most of the other nations near Israel, including the Egyptians, so in and of itself it was not a distinguishing mark. But the significance attached to it by Israel was unique. Among the other Semitic peoples and in Egypt, it was not generally applied to infants, and its significance is unclear. It was perhaps an initiation rite associated with puberty, a symbolic sacrificing of the reproductive powers to the gods, or even a token human sacrifice. Only in Israel did it have a clearly defined theological significance that extended beyond the individual who received it to his family and the wider community. The requirement of a ceremonial flint rather than a bronze or iron knife suggests the great antiquity of the rite itself (Josh 5:2).

Circumcision as Membership or Covenant. Before the establishment of a central sanctuary, circumcision served as the main symbol of God's covenant with Israel and as a symbol, in turn, of Israel's commitment to keep his covenant. Dire consequences attended those who failed to comply (Ex 4:24–26). It was the sine qua non of membership in the covenant community (Gen 17:14), perhaps even a test of loyalty (Gen 34). It could express a powerful recommitment (Josh 5:2–8). The Philistines alone among Israel's immediate neighbors did not practice circumcision. The automatic equation of foreskins and Philistines lies behind Saul's stipulation that David pay a bride price of one hundred foreskins (1 Sam 18:25). Because of the traditional hostility between them, "uncircumcised" came to be summary term for wicked and godless (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 15:18; 1 Sam 17:26; 2 Sam 1:20). Ezekiel extends the label to most of Israel's enemies in describing them as the dead nations who formerly terrorized the land (Ezek 32:17–32) but who will now be relegated to the recesses of Sheol without honor (Ezek 32:27) among the "uncircumcised."

Circumcision as Genuine Belief. Against this background it is remarkable to find the charge of "uncircumcision" leveled at Israel. "Their ears are uncircumcised so that they cannot hear!" says Jeremiah of the inhabitants of Jerusalem (Jer 6:10). He charges the whole of Israel with being "uncircumcised in heart," so that whether they practice physical circumcision or not, there is no difference between Israel and all the other nations who really are uncircumcised (Jer 9:26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 4:4). They are equally wicked and godless. This awareness that outward obedience through the act of circumcision did not necessarily imply the obedience of the heart, and that "uncircumcision" of heart will lead to loss of the covenant blessings appears already in the Pentateuch (Deut 10:16; Lev 26:41). Stephen levels the same charge against his fellow Jews (Acts 7:51). In spite of these hints about the obsolescence of circumcision, some early believers had difficulty abandoning the outward sign.

Circumcision as Old Law. Picking up where he had interrupted Stephen, Paul develops the theme further, not only making the basic point about the redundancy of circumcision and law-keeping (Rom 2:25–29) but also warning (with caustic humor), “Watch out for the mutilation [katatomē]. We are the [true] circumcision [peritomē], we who worship by the Spirit of God, who glory in Christ Jesus” (Phil 3:3). Elsewhere he dared wish that agitators for circumcision would amputate or castrate themselves (Gal 5:12). Christians, Paul believed, have been circumcised in Christ (Col 2:11), because they have been given a new heart by the Spirit; and chiefly for this reason, Paul strongly opposed those who wanted to make Gentile converts accept the literal sign of circumcision (Acts 15:1–29). “Neither circumcision nor uncircumcision means anything; what counts is a new creation!” (Gal 6:15, 5:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Thus time and the establishment of successive covenants radically change the symbolism of circumcision. An ancient ritual becomes the primary mark of a keeper of the covenant. And after Christ, it serves as an emblem of the unkeepable law that cannot save.

See also Covenant; Galatians, Letter to the.

Bibliography. R. G. Hall, “Circumcision,” ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 1:1025–31; J. M. Sasson, “Circumcision in the Ancient Near East,” JBL [JBL JBL. Journal of Biblical Literature] 85 (1966) 473–76.

CISTERN

Cisterns are water reservoirs, which can include both large public water works and small home cisterns. Modern urbanites, particularly in the West, tend to overlook the importance of water conservation for the life and well-being of a community. In an era when water pours from faucets hot and cold, the significance of a cistern is easily lost. The limited rainfall of Israel made cisterns an absolute necessity, and it is likely that in dry settled areas most homes had a cistern fed by rainwater gathered on the roof during the rainy season. Most of the cisterns that have survived were cut into the limestone in a bottle shape, plastered to help retain the water and sealed with a stone to prevent contamination and evaporation. Freestanding containers of various materials were also employed in a manner much like the “water barrel” of the more recent past.

A cross-section of cisterns dug from limestone.

It is not always possible to distinguish cisterns from pits in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 21:33–34). The word bôr is used for both cistern and pit (the related b'r refers only to cisterns), though never for a well, despite some English versions. These water storage structures were usually cut into rock and were common in both the city and the countryside (2 Chron 26:10). They could also serve as hiding places (1 Sam 13:6), prominent landmarks (1 Sam 19:22), temporary prisons (Jer 38:6) and dumping places for corpses (Jer 41:7).

Along with house and vineyard, having your own cistern completes the image of the secure and good life in a peaceful society (Deut 6:11 [NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] “well”]; Neh 9:25). Drinking from a cistern may even connote ownership and thus epitomize retaining possession of one’s land (2 Kings 18:31; Is 36:16) or taking possession of someone else’s land (Deut 6:11). Thus David requests water from the cistern at Bethlehem during his conquest of that city (2 Sam 23:15–16).

But bôr (cistern) can also mean “dungeon,” so that Joseph identifies the bôr (dungeon) into which Potiphar threw him (Gen 40:15) with the bôr (cistern) into which his brothers threw him (Gen 37:24), thus signaling the parallel descents from prestige, first in his father’s house, and then in Potiphar’s. This association of cisterns with temporary prisons (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] especially Jer 38:6) or “holding tanks” explains the image of the Babylonian captivity in Zechariah 9:11, where the empty cistern suggests the “lifelessness” of the captivity.

The sanctity of water rights becomes a metaphor for the sanctity of marriage. One’s wife is a cistern of life (Prov 5:15), and the admonition to “drink water from your own cistern” (Prov 5:15) extends the imagery of “possession” noted above, so that one does not dispossess another of his “waters” nor cause his own to be “scattered abroad.”

In Jeremiah 2:13 a cistern is contrasted with a well so as to create a negative image. Yahweh is the fountain of living water who has been abandoned for broken cisterns that hold no water at all. In this colorful passage there seems to be an implicit assumption that cistern water is inferior: cisterns are difficult to maintain, and the water was subject to becoming stale and harboring parasites.

See also Rain; Water; Well.

Bibliography. O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World (New York: Crossroad, 1978) 69–73; P. Williams, “The Fatal and Foolish Exchange; Living Waters for ‘Nothing’: A Study of Jeremiah 2:4–13, ” Austin Seminary Bulletin, Faculty Edition 81 (1965) 3–59.

CITIZEN.

See Legal Images.

CITY

The biblical image of the city is cast against the ancient Near Eastern background of the metropolis as a fortified habitation. Just as today, the city represented a profound technological and social accomplishment. Its basic identity has always been that of humanity en masse, and it is therefore not surprising that in the human imagination the city becomes humanity “writ large”—a representative that pictures in heightened form what is good and bad in human behavior. Another archetypal pattern to which the biblical city adheres is that it presupposes as its opposite the rural countryside, with the city participating in a grand antithesis of civilization versus nature, the communal versus the individual, culture versus the uncivilized or barbaric (see Country, Countryside).

The city’s development required strong social ties to supplant traditional tribal identity. These ties were a combination of political and religious interests. The temple and palace were bound up together, constituting the social adhesive necessary for large-scale community life. This intertwining of religion and culture is reflected in such features as the king claiming divine sonship and approval, and the temple being the center of record keeping for commerce and the depository of tributes. In light of this it is not surprising to find the Bible using the image of the city for moral and spiritual lessons.

Lest these lessons be misapplied, it needs to be clearly stated that the city itself is not inherently evil or good, for the biblical image displays both dimensions. If cities like Sodom, Tyre and Babylon represent people in community against God, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Jerusalem and the New Jerusalem of the Apocalypse picture the ideal of people in unity with each other and God. If the city is a place of sexual perversion and violence, it is also a safe refuge for congregated humanity against the dangers of nature. One of the terrors in Psalm 107 is the spectacle of people wandering “in desert wastes, finding no way to a city to dwell in,” and its God-sent remedy is that God “led them by a straight way, till they reached a city to dwell in” (Ps 107:4, 7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Primeval City. The first explicit mention of a city is found in Genesis 4:17, where it is reported that Cain named a city Enoch after his firstborn son (whose name may mean “to dedicate”). To this common source the author connects all civilization (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 4:18–22). The naming of a city after oneself or one’s progeny can easily be seen as an act of self-aggrandizement; however, the very act of constituting this city is the fruition of Cain’s own search for security in the world. When Cain murders his brother Abel, God pronounces a curse on him by declaring, “You shall be a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth” (Gen 4:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Cain’s desperate plea for mercy proceeds from his fear that “whoever finds me will slay me” (Gen 4:14). Thus he prevails upon God to provide him special protection (Gen 4:15). Cain’s fear, seen in light of his subsequent building of a city, reflects his love for the city and the security it offers. But the city is cast under the shadow of Cain and is thus identified with the seed of the serpent rather than the seed of the woman (Gen 3:15).

The negative characterization of Cain and his association with urban life is the beginning of a wholly negative characterization of the city in the Bible’s primeval history (Gen 1–11), which begins with the picture of a perfect garden and then degenerates into life in a city. The early shadow cast over the city in the story of Cain combines with its wholesale condemnation in the Babel episode to form a parenthesis around the early history of humankind. Lest this negative theme seem disrupted by the flood, we should note that accursed Ham is connected with the continuation of city life in Genesis's next explicit mention of a city (Gen 10:12).

The intention of the builders of Babel (both the city and the tower, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 11:4) is twofold: to reach heaven with their temple/tower and to make a name for themselves. Cain's desire for renown, repeated in the taunt of his murderous descendant Lamech (Gen 4:23–24), reaches its climactic expression at Babel. Humankind, under the guise of religious pursuit, expresses its autonomy in technological achievement. This account is rife with divine irony. God has to descend (Gen 11:5) in order to investigate the height of human accomplishment. The solidarity of language that made this attempt plausible becomes the first casualty of divine displeasure (Gen 11:7–9, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 11:1). The ensuing confusion of language becomes a guard against similar future efforts. In the Babel episode we see the consummate marks of humankind's idolatrous rebellion against God. Humanity subverts God's blessed order—in this case the solidarity of human language and human skill in technological achievement—and turns it toward self-glorification. Whereas before the fall all of culture was to be given over to the glory of God, now humans turn culture into a tool of rebellion.

Early Genesis thus establishes a general worldview in which the image of the city is an anti-God state of affairs that attempts to thwart God's rule over the world. It is a place where culture subverts religion for its own purposes rather than advancing the glory of God. Genesis provides this background to an Israel living in the midst of a futile creation, a theme developed in the Exodus account of Israel's oppressive servitude to an Egyptian city-building program (Ex 1:8—14; 5:5—21). God's original intent for his image bearers was to build society for the glory of God. They were to multiply and spread out over the earth, extending the rule of God over creation as God's vice-regents (Gen 1:26—28). Because they exercised autonomy, the first man and woman were cursed and driven out of God's presence to await the fulfillment of God's promise to deliver them from that curse (Gen 3, esp. [esp. esp.. especially] vv. 15 and 24). All efforts at city building from this point on are reassertions of that original autonomy.

In contrast to the anti-God city dwellers, those who fear God are described as wanderers and shepherds. Abel's case is obvious enough, but Enoch (not Cain's son) is equally an example. We read that he "walked with God" (Gen 5:22, 24). The verb form (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] hlq in the hithpael) indicates a manner of life which in other contexts describes the life of a shepherd wanderer (Gen 13:17; 48:15). Enoch followed God from place to place.

Abraham and the City. Immediately following the failed urban venture of Babel comes the account of Abraham's call and obedience (Gen 12). In response to God's call Abraham resolves to leave the security of the great city of Ur (highly developed, according to archaeological testimony) to take up the life of a wandering shepherd. As with Enoch, his security will be found in the assurance of God's presence rather than in the company of other people (Gen 15:1). This contrast between God's people and the rest of human society is further reflected in Abraham's relationship with his nephew Lot. When they prosper to the point of needing to separate, Abraham gives Lot his choice of which portion of the land he will occupy (Gen 13:8—9). Lot chooses the well-settled Jordan valley, which includes the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, synonyms for wickedness. Although Lot is judged by God to be the only righteous man there, his misguided desire for the security of the city is again reflected in his appeal to the angels as they lead him away. He pleads that they not take him to the mountains but let him turn aside to Zoar (which means “small,” Gen 19:18–22). Within the context of the story and as evidence of the ironic attachment of Lot to a wicked and civilized lifestyle in which he lives with a bad conscience (2 Pet 2:7–8), Lot whimpers that he cannot conceive of life without at least a little “sin city” as his residence, and his subsequent experience with his daughters shows that although one can take one’s children out of Sodom, one cannot take Sodom out of one’s children.

Abraham, on the other hand, is content to be a wanderer in the very land that God has promised to give him as an inheritance. He refuses to pay tribute to the king of Sodom (Gen 14:17, 21–24), reserving his tithe for Melchizedek (whose name means “king of righteousness”), the king of Salem (vv. 18–20), anticipating the future of that city to become known as “Jerusalem.” So resolute is Abraham to wait on God that he refuses from Ephron the Hittite the gift of a burial site for Sarah, insisting on paying for land promised to him by God (Gen 23). The basis of this refusal is his confessed identity as “a stranger and a sojourner” among them (Gen 23:4). Lest we begin to think that the city is inimical to the life of faith, though, we need to take into the account that although Abraham wandered about “living in tents” (Heb 11:9), he nonetheless “looked forward to the city which has foundations, whose builder and maker is God” (Heb 11:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Thus early Israel is presented with a worldview that divides the world into two kinds of people, based on their relationship to the human city. This worldview is rightly discerned in Augustine’s City of God, where Augustine writes, “I classify the human race into two branches: the one consists of those who live by human standard, the other of those who live according to God’s will. I also call these two classes the two cities, speaking allegorically. By two cities I mean two societies of human beings, one of which is predestined to reign with God for all eternity, the other doomed to undergo eternal punishment with the Devil” (City of God XV.I).

For the Israelites the cities of Egypt are to be abandoned as they set out following Yahweh as sojourners toward the Promised Land. They are to understand Egyptian antipathy toward them as the classic hostility between city builders and shepherd wanderers and to see God’s providential preservation of the nation through separation (Gen 46:33–34). Furthermore, because Moses describes the settlements of Canaan in terms similar to Babel (Deut 1:28; 9:1), they should look toward the conquest of those great cities as joining in this classic conflict, though even there is a vestige of approval of cities when inhabited by God’s people (see Deut 6:10–13, which lends sanction to the Israelites’ fearing God in “great and goodly cities” that they did not build but are allowed to possess).

Jerusalem. This worldview persists throughout the Bible, with the city of humankind consistently identified as the human-made city, with one exception. In Deuteronomy 12 Moses anticipates a point in the future when God will choose a city where his presence will be uniquely manifested. This city will not glorify the name of a human but will be the place where God’s name will dwell. Of course, this is fulfilled in David’s capture of Jebus, its dedication as Jerusalem (2 Sam 5) and its establishment as the religious center—first in the bringing of the ark (2 Sam 6) and eventually in the building of the temple (1 Kings 5). Up to that point God’s people are to live the life of sojourners, waiting for God's city. Jerusalem will constitute the city for which they have waited. However, they are to maintain an ongoing confession of what G. von Rad called "Israel's credo": "My father was a wandering Aramean" (Deut 26:5). This perpetual outlook, even in the settled, stable Jerusalem of the monarchy, indicates that Jerusalem per se is not the higher reality toward which God's people are ultimately to look. However Jerusalem serves as a pattern for that ultimate city of God.

The most extensive picture of Jerusalem as the idealized city of God is set forth in the Psalms. It is a city that God builds (Ps 48:8) and protects (Ps 46:4—5). As a metonym for God it is an object of praise (Ps 87:3). Its defender is the Lord's anointed king (Ps 101:8). God's people sing a song for its peace and security (Ps 122; 51:18), knowing that it will only prosper through the Lord's favor and not through human effort (Ps 127:1). The tribute of nations will come to this city because of God's presence there (Ps 68:29). When nations come up against it, they are attacking God and will be subject to divine retribution (Ps 79:1; 137:7). In Jerusalem God's people will worship him (Ps 102:21; 116:19). Its placement in the hills signifies God's protection over the city (Ps 125:2). For those in exile, especially as they dwell in the quintessential city of the humanity, Babylon, Jerusalem's memory is a source of simultaneous sorrow and comfort (Ps 137:5). Even then it is to remain a source of confidence and hope for the future (Ps 137:6).

The City in Old Testament Prophecy. At the height of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] idealization of Jerusalem, we find the greatest contrast between God's city and the human city. But the idealistic description of Jerusalem exceeds the attendant realities. Failure to recognize this causes Israel to presume upon God's favor toward his city, not repenting of the injustice that prevents her from reflecting her heavenly antitype (Mic 3:11–12). Jeremiah corrects these misconceptions in two ways. In declaring the inevitability of the exile, he speaks of a future city that will surpass the present. Whereas Jerusalem has been known as the place where God's ark-throne dwells, this future Jerusalem in its entirety will be the throne of God (Jer 3:16–17). God's wrath is to be poured out against the once holy city because in its pridefulness it has become like the city of humans (Jer 13:9–14).

Secondly, as Jerusalem's residents are cast into exile, they are to maintain their perspective that the city of God has not failed, only Israel's faithful depiction of it in theocratic Jerusalem. God commands them to "seek the welfare of the city where I have sent you into exile, and pray to the Lord on its behalf; for in its welfare you will find your welfare" (Jer 29:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). They are once again relegated to the status of aliens, waiting on the eschatological hope of the New Jerusalem of which the prophets spoke. In the future, Jerusalem will once again be a glorious city, so expansive that stone walls cannot encircle it (Zech 2:4). However this city will not be without protection, for the glory of God will be its wall (Zech 2:5). The glory cloud associated with the name of God, which departed from Jerusalem in Ezekiel's vision of exile (Ezek 10:18–19), will return in a more expansive way, signifying God's renewed favor toward Jerusalem (Zech 1:17). But the rebuilt city of Nehemiah's day falls far short of these descriptions. This eschatological city is a pilgrim destination not only for Israelites but for the nations (Mic 4:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 2). It will be called "Sought Out" (Is 62:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It will be the worship center of the world (Is 2:3).

The city is a major image of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic literature, where it is finally an ambivalent image.

On one side, the city is a major image of evil (Is 14:21), climaxed in the awesome entities called Babylon (Is 47; Jer 50) and Tyre (Ezek 27—28), which are literal geographic and political phenomena but go beyond that to be a spiritual force of evil as well. The “exultant city that dwelt secure,” thinking itself supreme, is transformed under God’s judgment into “a desolation,” a “lair for wild beasts,” so that “every one who passes by her hisses and shakes his fist” (Zeph 2:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The city of the prophetic imagination is so godless that when one runs through the streets of Jerusalem in quest to find just one good person, the quest is futile (Jer 5:1—5). Yet even in God’s rejection of the wicked city we are led to see the city’s inherent value in its good manifestation, as pictured by Jeremiah’s weeping over the fall of Jerusalem.

But the prophetic city is also an image of divine blessing and of the good life. The picture of future bliss that Zechariah envisions is a street scene, not a country scene: “Old men and old women shall again sit in the streets of Jerusalem... And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing” (Zech 8:4—5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The apostate city “shall be rebuilt upon its mound” (Jer 30:18). Isaiah’s most extended picture of restoration is that of a rebuilt city (Is 60—62) that is “a praise in the earth” (Is 62:7). The restored city of the apocalyptic imagination is also a world center of worship (Is 2:3; Jer 3:17).

Summary. Standing on the threshold of NT [NT NT. New Testament] literature, the image of the city in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] can be seen as two-fold. In the creation that God established there is one city to be built. That city will extend the glory of God throughout the earth. Humanity exercises autonomy, wresting the city from divine service and to self-glorification. From that point on the city is a symbol of that rebellion. Those who ally themselves with it align themselves against God. Those who look to God are patient wanderers, waiting in faith for him to establish his city. In the theocracy the city of Jerusalem takes on the character of the city of God. But in its failure to reflect its heavenly counterpart, it is swept away for the coming of that counterpart in its consummate form. The city itself is neither good nor bad; its identity depends on the spiritual state of its inhabitants: “By the blessing of the upright a city is exalted, but it is overthrown by the mouth of the wicked” (Prov 11:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also v. 10).

Jesus and the Apostles. The city assumes literal and symbolic importance in the Gospels. As an itinerant teacher and miracle worker, Jesus frequents the cities of Palestine, most notably Jerusalem and Samaria. Although Jesus sometimes achieves success in these cities—witnessed in the large-scale conversion of Samaritans (Jn 4:39) or the triumphal entry of Jesus into Jerusalem—the general pattern in the Gospels is to link belief with the common people of the countryside and villages and unbelief and hostility with the cities. Two common pictures that emerge from the Gospels are Jesus preaching to appreciative crowds and working miracles in the countryside, and Jesus engaging in conflict with antagonists in the city, especially Jerusalem, site of the religious establishment. Nor should we overlook that Jesus is arrested, tried and sentenced to execution in a city that he had characterized as “killing the prophets and stoning those who are sent to you.” Yet even in uttering that accusation, Jesus is pictured as weeping over this wicked city, desiring to gather its “children together as a hen gathers her brood under her wings” (Mt 23:37 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 19:41).

The world that we enter in the book of Acts is the most modern in all the Bible by virtue of its urban identity. Most of the action occurs in the famous cities of the Greco-Roman world, not in local villages or the countryside. This prevaillingly metropolitan world is, moreover, international and cosmopolitan. There is a sense in which the city is vindicated in the history of the early church—not in the sense that the city is mainly good or cordial to the gospel but in the sense that the city is where most people now live and where the influential power structures exist. Even though the cities Paul visits are mainly hostile to him and his message, it is in these very cities that small churches are planted. It is easy to see that the mission strategy of the early church was to evangelize the city. It is no exaggeration to say that in Acts the church is almost exclusively associated with the city, within which (to be sure) it is a tiny and persecuted minority. The picture of the city as church site is reinforced by the letters to the seven churches in Revelation 2–3.

New Jerusalem. The ultimate vindication of the city comes in the apocalyptic vision of New Jerusalem, which descends from heaven (Rev 21:2), symbolic of its divine origin and its transcendence of human and earthly reality. With the appearance of this heavenly city, “the kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ” (Rev 11:15). Its ancient rival, Babylon, which attempts to subvert it, will ultimately be destroyed and cast down (Rev 18). This New Jerusalem will have no temple, “for its temple is the Lord God the Almighty and the Lamb” (Rev 21:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and it will need no sun, since God’s glory will be its eternal light (v. 23). Furthermore, “The kings of the earth shall bring their glory into it” (v. 24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The curse of the Fall will be removed and, along with it, the injustice and futility that characterized life in the city of man.

The Life of Faith. In summary, the image of the city in the Bible is dual, not uniform. Whether we use Augustine's designations of city of God and city of man, or M. Kline's corresponding terms of metapolis and megapolis, the distinction is one of future destiny and life in the present. Metapolis was offered to man at the beginning in the prophetic sanctions of the Covenant of Creation, [and] is again offered as the final goal of the process of cosmic redemption. It is promised as the crowning achievement of Christ, the redeemer-king. Towards it the people of the covenant wind their historical way as pilgrims in a wilderness... [But] over against the heavenly city stands the other city, mundanely present and visible to all. Although the term "city of man" used for this other city marks, in the first place, the contrast between human political government as an interim product of common grace and the city of God as a holy eschatological kingdom produced by redemptive grace, "city of man" also carries a negative religious charge insofar as it connotes the apostate character borne by this city in its development under the hand of fallen mankind. (Kline, 112)

In light of the complex that makes up the image of the city, the Christian life is to display certain characteristics. First, the Christian is a citizen of God's city through righteousness based on faith, not on the works of the law. By analogy, Paul compares these two outlooks to the "Jerusalem above" and the "present Jerusalem" (Gal 4:22–26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Phil 3:20). People who attempt on their own to justify themselves before God are citizens of the latter, while those who look to Christ in faith are citizens of the former.

Second, the Christian life is marked by respect for human government as God's provisional source of order since the Fall and prior to the consummation (Mt 22:21; Rom 13:1–7; 1 Pet 2:13–17); therefore, the believer is to live like a Joseph or a Daniel in relating to the surrounding world. The ancient Epistle of Diognetus, a defense of Christianity, describes Christians as those who “dwell in their own countries, but only as sojourners; they bear their share of all responsibilities as citizens, and they endure all hardships as strangers. Every foreign country is a homeland to them, and every homeland is foreign.... Their existence is on earth, but their citizenship is in heaven” (Epistle to Diognetus 5.1–9)

Third, the life of faith is to be a life of confidence in God’s promise to establish his city. Hebrews speaks of the faith by which Abraham “sojourned in the land of promise, as in a foreign land, living in tents.... For he looked forward to the city which has foundations, whose builder and maker is God” (Heb 11:9–10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Heavenly citizenship is to be the ground of confidence in life’s trials, the goal toward which life is directed.

But a significant difference distinguishes the NT [NT NT. New Testament] believers from their OT [OT OT. Old Testament] counterparts. Of the latter we are told, “All these people were still living by faith when they died. They did not receive the things promised; they only saw them and welcomed them from a distance” (Heb 11:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). While the Christian is to continue in this alien mode until the consummation (1 Pet 1:1; 2:11), in a very profound and real sense the pilgrimage has ended because of Christ’s atoning work (Eph 2:19). Through the persevering, substitutionary faithfulness of Jesus (Heb 12:2), Christians “have come to Mount Zion and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem” (Heb 12:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). So while the geopolitical manifestation of God’s city is yet future, it has been eternally established in the heavens through Jesus' work, and believers in Jesus have already taken up residence there (Jn 14:1–3) through union with him (Eph 2:6).

Therefore the church of Jesus lives in the world now as God's holy "city set on a hill" (Mt 5:14). Augustine described it thus: "The humble City is the society of holy men and good angels; the proud city is the society of wicked men and evil angels. The one City began with the love of God; the other had its beginnings in the love of self" (City of God 14.13).

See also Babylon; Country, Countryside; Jerusalem, New Jerusalem; Sodom and Gomorrah.

Bibliography. J. M. Boice, Two Cities, Two Loves (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1996); J. Ellul, The Meaning of the City (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1970); M. G. Kline, Kingdom Prologue (S. Hamilton, MA: M. G. Kline, 1991) 100–117, 165–70; J. Timmer, "The Bible and City," Reformed Journal (October 1973): 21–25.

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE

Civil disobedience is not the invention of the modern age. The Bible records approximately a dozen examples of legitimate civil disobedience. Most examples occur when a government specifically commands individuals to disobey God, so that civil disobedience is at the same time religious obedience. In such cases, God commends those who suffer consequences at the hands of the government for the sake of righteousness, and he usually rescues them.

One cluster of examples occurs when a ruler either prohibits the worship of God or commands the worship of some other god. The story of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego (see Daniel) illustrates three godly men's response to the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar's decree that the "peoples, nations, and languages ... fall down and worship the golden image” that Nebuchadnezzar had erected (Dan 3:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Because such a command contradicts the first commandment forbidding idolatry, these men refuse to bow down. When confronted by the king with their disobedience, they claim to be obeying a higher authority that overrides that of the king (Dan 3:16). Although God saves them from their punishment, they acknowledge that whatever the outcome of their punishment, they fear God more than they fear men (vv. 17–18). God’s rescue of these men fully commends their action as a legitimate case of civil disobedience.

A similar case occurs when Darius, the Persian ruler, forbids prayer to any god but the king for thirty days (Dan 6). The issue behind this case is faithfulness to God, and Daniel refuses to be unfaithful despite the government’s decree (Dan 6:5). He not only continues to pray three times a day as he has done before, but he makes no attempt to disguise his actions. Accordingly he is thrown into the lions’ den as punishment. Once again, however, God demonstrates to Daniel’s persecutors that God’s law is higher by delivering him from death in the den.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the most significant challenge to God’s commandments occurs when the Jewish leaders command the disciples “not to speak or teach at all in the name of Jesus” (Acts 4:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). However, having the command from Christ to proclaim the gospel to all nations (Mt 28:19–20), the apostles refuse. Peter replies to their command, “We must obey God rather than men” (Acts 5:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). From then on the church is persecuted with flogging, imprisonment and death for their refusal to comply with the government’s decree.

Other cases involve people who disobey government injunctions that do not directly demand that they disobey God but that do involve their tacit compliance in unrighteous practices. In the events leading up to the exodus, the Hebrew midwives help the Hebrew women to deliver their children and hide them despite Pharaoh's decree to put all the newborn males to death (Ex 1:15–22). God commends these midwives for their fear of him, blessing them with households of their own. In similar manner Moses' mother disobeys the king's edict to destroy Hebrew males (Ex 2:1–10).

Soon after this, Moses himself participates in civil disobedience, leading the children of Israel out of Egypt against Pharaoh's will. He begins his career of civil resistance when he kills an Egyptian taskmaster who has beaten a Hebrew slave (Ex 2:11–12), his first recorded act of choosing to share ill-treatment with the people of God (Heb 11:24–25). Because God commanded him to lead the people out of Egypt, by God's direction he assaults Pharaoh and his people with a series of plagues that persuade the king to finally release the people (Ex 6–12). However, soon after he has let them go, Pharaoh pursues them with the intent to reenslave them. Moses is God's agent in the miraculous defeat of the Egyptian army by the sea (Ex 14). Although he had ostensibly negotiated with Pharaoh for his people's release, Moses is in fact instrumental in forcing Pharaoh to release the people, an act he performs at God's command.

In another act of civil disobedience, Rahab the Canaanite hides the Hebrew spies from her city leaders (Josh 2). Rahab fears the God who has given her land to these people, and she desires to fight on the side of Yahweh (Josh 2:9–13). Thus she hides the spies who come to her and lies to the king of Jericho, saying that they have already left the city (Josh 2:5). God commends her act, claiming that her faith and obedience saved her from death at the Israelites' hands

(Heb 11:31).

Some of the prophets also disobey their kings at God's command or in response to God's condemnation of their rule. King Ahab attempts several times to kill Elijah because of his message. Elijah announces a great drought on the land and is then forced to hide from Ahab's wrath (1 Kings 17). In addition, Elijah humiliates and slays the prophets of Baal, who the king supports, and then flees to Sinai (1 Kings 18). Obadiah similarly disobeys the king to obey God. When Jezebel attempts to kill all of God's prophets, Obadiah hides a hundred of them in caves and provides them with food (1 Kings 18:4). God praises him for this act, declaring that "Obadiah feared the Lord greatly" (1 Kings 18:3).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] also endorses stories of people protecting those who are persecuted by the government. The three wisemen worship the infant Jesus and disobey Herod's command to inform him about the newborn king (Mt 2:7–12). When the Jews and King Aretas attempt to capture and put the newly converted Paul to death, several of his disciples hide him and then helped him escape by letting him down in a basket through one of the city wall's openings (Acts 9:20–31; 2 Cor 11:32–33).

Finally, even Jesus refuses to submit to the religious authorities of his time. Although he has no complaint against the Roman civil authority, he consistently challenges the authority of the Jewish leaders. He heals a man on the Sabbath and overturns the tables of the moneychangers and vendors in the temple (Mt 12: 21). Although he commands submission to the governing authorities, Jesus demonstrates that his own authority is greater than that of the ruling priests because his authority comes from God. Thus he shows that in some cases in which God's authority conflicts with that of a government, civil disobedience is necessary.

See also Babylon; Bondage/Freedom; Egypt; Exodus, Second Exodus; Pharaoh; Rescue.

CLAY

Although clay played a much more central role in ancient Near Eastern life than it does today, it is still familiar enough that Jeremiah's description of a local craftsman could easily apply to a modern studio artist (Jer 18:3—4 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). In addition to the many daily uses of clay vessels, artisans used clay to make molds in which to cast metal objects (1 Kings 7:46; 2 Chron 4:17). Its physical properties—pliable in one form, brittle in another—as well as its practical uses make clay a powerful biblical metaphor.

Beginning as a pliable and impressionable substance (Job 38:14; Ps 40:2), clay provides an excellent image for human beings as the work of God's creative hand (Is 64:8; Jer 18:6; Job 10:9; 33:6). The potter collecting clay (or mortar) worked it into the proper consistency by treading it, perhaps in the pit where he dug it (Nahum 3:14). The psalmist contrasts the treader's foot stuck in the clay with the secure foothold God provides after drawing him up out of the slippery pit (Ps 40:2). The prophet warns of impending judgment, a trampling on rulers as a potter treads his clay, suggesting a treading in preparation for God's reforming and refashioning (Is 41:25). As the master potter, God has the unquestionably sovereign right to give each of his creations a specific shape and purpose according to his will (Is 29:16; 45:9; Rom 9:21).

An Egyptian potter shapes clay on a potter's wheel.

The fragility of dried, unfired clay offers a vivid depiction of weakness in words (Job 13:12), spirit (Ps 31:12), kingdoms (Is 30:14; Dan 2:41—42; Lam 4:2) and earthly existence in general (Job 4:19). Just as defiled vessels are to be shattered according to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ritual laws (Lev 6:28; 11:33; 15:12), so those who dishonor God will be judged (Ps 2:9; Is 41:25; Jer 19:1—11; 22:28; 48:38; Rev 2:27). Those who serve God, however, are like earthen vessels containing valuables; they are both precious and useful to him (2 Cor 4:7; Tim 2:20; Acts 9:15). The hand of God that forms and transforms humans (Is 64:8) is echoed in the story of Jesus' applying healing clay to blind eyes (John 9:6—15).

See also Bricks.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

See Animals; Cleansing; Food; Purity.

CLEANSING

The biblical imagery of cleansing extends well beyond the approximately seventy-five appearances of the word in English translations. The context for this important biblical image is a complex portrayal of what is clean and unclean. To appreciate the image we must rid ourselves of many of our ideas of what is unclean and therefore requires cleansing, since these tend to be only hygienic. Though this is an important element of cleansing in the Bible, it is only part of the picture. In the Bible what is unclean can include disease, dry rot in buildings, discharge from the sexual organs, corpses, certain animals, sin and wickedness, Gentiles, demons or demonic possession of human beings, and even the common in contrast to the holy. Part of the picture is ethical, but the ritualistic and physical also have their part.

At the heart of cleansing, especially in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , is the motif of ritual purity and impurity. As stipulated by religious law (much of which is encapsulated in Lev 14–16 and Num 8; 19), a person or an object might be judged to be in a state of uncleanness that would prevent having any contact with the temple or holy place. This state of impurity could be transferred, as when an unclean object (such as a corpse or menstruating woman) was touched. Ritual cleansing was the means by which the condition of impurity could be righted. While the spiritual principles underlying the need for cleansing in the Mosaic law are universal, the specific rituals that governed so much of Jewish religion were abrogated by the NT [NT NT. New Testament] teaching concerning what it means to follow Christ. This was dramatically evidenced in Peter's vision (Acts 10) of clean and unclean animals (in symbolic reference to the current distinction of Jew and Gentile), and in Christ's teaching about defilement coming from within a person, not from outside (Mk 7:19).

Throughout the Bible the cleansing of the body is highly regarded and practiced. No doubt this had important consequences in the prevention of disease. The attitude behind this high standard of hygiene is the biblical valuing of the bodily and physical. God is understood to be ruler over every part of human life and the created world. The human being is a psychosomatic unity, bearing God's image in this unity.

In the earliest times the distinction between clean and unclean food did not obtain (Gen 9:3), though there is already a distinction between acceptable and unacceptable animal sacrifices. Later, in the period of the establishment of the law, a distinction between clean and unclean animals for food is established, having the effect of making the law permeate every part of Hebrew life through ritual.

What was regarded as unclean grew even more complex as the requirements were added to in later centuries. Leviticus 11:1—17:16 portrays what is unclean and therefore requires cleansing. It is a set of instructions to the Hebrew priests in dealing with uncleanness, and it presents detailed distinctions between the clean and unclean. Its climax is the institution of the Day of Atonement, the point of which was the cleansing of the sanctuary and the nation in God's eyes.

There were two dynamically related pairs of contrasts in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] : between the holy and the common, and between the clean and the unclean. Both the clean and the unclean are subdivisions of the common. The common, in other words, is itself not in principle unclean, even in a fallen creation. But it can be defiled, thus requiring cleansing. There were some realities that could not be undefiled or cleansed, such as certain animals and death. Some things, however, could be rendered holy by prescribed ritual, a process that could pertain to either persons or things. Even the high priest was not exempt from sin, and provision was made for his cleansing (Lev 4:3—12).

The prophets in their teaching reinforced the necessity of cleansing from uncleanness, with a strong ethical emphasis, though presupposing the Levitical status quo. In later postexilic times, including the world of Jesus' life and ministry, the religious leaders extended the distinctions between clean and unclean laid down in the Mosaic law, thereby earning Jesus' condemnation for the false burden they imposed.

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] picture of uncleanness vividly serves to convey the reality of the need for cleansing and atonement before God, with his requirement of sacrifice as the remedy. In his teaching, Jesus emphasizes moral rather than ceremonial purity, focusing on the heart of the separation between humankind and God. His teaching seizes the essence of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] teaching. His doctrine is expressed in his actions. Jesus reaches across the social divide to those who are outcasts and marginalized, touching the untouchable. The leper, the woman with a discharge of blood and even a dead body receive the touch of cleansing and of life.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] is triumphantly rich in its portrayal of the cleansing of human sin. Its picture of what cleanses includes the water of life (Jn 3:5; Eph 5:26; Heb 10:22; with the literal necessity symbolizing the deeper cleansing); the blood of Jesus (1 Jn 1:7); the word spoken by Jesus (Jn 15:3); the sacrifice of the Lamb of God (1 Cor 5:7); faith in Jesus (Acts 15:9; Heb 10:22) and forgiveness that comes after confessing sin (1 Jn 1:9). The image of water is particularly vibrant, for the water of life offered by Jesus is clean and life-giving to drink (Jn 4:13–15; 7:37–39).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] baptism becomes a master image of cleansing. The spiritual significance of washing with water in baptism, as practiced by John the Baptist, was in fact rooted in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] rituals of purification. Bathing was prescribed by the ceremonial law for people considered unclean (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lev 14:8, 9; Lev 15). Bathing and ceremonial washing were also associated with ordination to the priesthood (Lev 8:5, 6) and preparation to enter the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:3–4). Ritual purification through washing was linked symbolically with prayer for spiritual cleansing (see Ps 51:1–2, 7–10).

The Bible concludes with a proclamation that the clean (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the cleansed; see Ezek 36:25–29) will enter the new creation, heaven itself. For the clean-Jew and Gentile alike, men, women and children-disease, death, the torment caused by evil spirits, the distress of broken relationships and the opposition of the natural world to humanity are gone forever. The holy, the clean and the common world are at last one, thanks to the cleansing brought about for the entire creation by the sacrifice of Christ (Rev 21:26, 27; 22:14, 15).

See also Blood; Disease and Healing; Forgiveness; Holiness; Purity; Sacred Space; Sacrifice; Wash, Washing.

Bibliography. J. Neyrey, Paul in Other Words: A Cultural Reading of His Letters (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1990).

CLOSE.

See Shut, Close.

CLOTHING.

See Garments.

CLOUD

Rarely do clouds appear in the Bible in a simple meteorological context, but the limited references to clouds and weather reveal that the Hebrews were careful observers of nature. Elijah's servant knew that a cloud rising from the sea meant rain (1 Kings 18:44) and that in contrast the high cirrus clouds from the desert were known to be rainless (Jude 12). The very first mention of clouds comes after the flood where God establishes a new relationship with humankind through Noah, symbolized by a rainbow in the clouds (Gen 9:12–17).

After the exodus from Egypt, when the Israelites wander in the wilderness for forty years, their journey is marked by a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night (Ex 13:21, 22; 14:19, 20, 24, see later reflections in Neh 9:12, 19; Ps 78:14; 99:7; 105:39; and 1 Cor 10:1–2). Exodus 16:10 associates the cloud in the wilderness with the “glory of the Lord.” The cloud and the fire represents God's presence with them during their sojourn.

The cloud represents God's presence but also his hiddenness (see Lam 2:2). No one can see God and live, so the cloud shields people from actually seeing the form of God. It reveals God but also preserves the mystery that surrounds him.

During their wilderness wanderings, the Israelites camp for a long time at the foot of Mount Sinai. While there, God reveals himself and his law to Moses and the people on top of the mountain. As the people look at the mountain, they hear and see "thunder and lightning, with a thick cloud over the mountain" (Ex 19:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also 24:16, 18; 34:5). Once again God's appearance is marked by cloud.

Also in the wilderness, God instructs the Israelites to build a place where they might worship him. We know this mobile sanctuary as the tabernacle or tent of meeting. God makes his presence known there by means of a cloud that fills the most holy part of the building (Ex 33:9, 10; 40:34—38; Lev 16:2; Num 9:15—23). When the temple later replaces the tabernacle as the place where God makes his presence known to Israel, that building too is filled with the cloud of God's glory (1 Kings 8:10—11; 2 Chron 5:13—14). Centuries later, when God turns against Israel because of its sin, he abandons his temple. Ezekiel sees this as the departure of the cloud from the Holy of Holies (Ezek 10:3—4).

A number of passages associate God's appearance as a warrior with the cloud. Isaiah looks into the future and sees God moving in judgment against Egypt:

See, the Lord rides on a swift cloud and is coming to Egypt.

The idols of Egypt tremble before him, and the hearts of the Egyptians melt within them.

(Is 19:1—2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Clouds serve as God's war chariot in the imagination of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] poets and prophets (Ps 18:9; 68:4; 104:4; Dan 7:13; Nahum 1:3). This image of the warrior god riding a chariot into battle is an ancient one, antedating the Bible in Canaanite mythology, where Baal is given the frequent epithet "rider on the clouds."

While biblical writers associate clouds primarily with the appearance of God, they occasionally exploit other aspects of clouds to render vivid their ideas. Clouds are ephemeral, illustrating the transience of life (Job 7:9), of safety (Job 30:15) and, in the light of God's grace, of human sin (Is 44:22). In Isaiah 18:4 God pronounces that he will quietly sneak up on Cush in judgment; he will be quiet like a "cloud of dew in the heat of harvest." Proverbs 16:5, on the other hand, likens a king's favor to "a rain cloud in spring."

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] use of the cloud theme, however, returns to the theophanic, or more specifically Christophanic, function. At the transfiguration God spoke out of a cloud to identify Jesus as "my Son, whom I have chosen" (Lk 9:35). Jesus, like God in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , rides on a cloud (Acts 1:9). One of the most pervasive images of Christ's return is as one who rides his cloud chariot into battle (Mt 24:30; Mk 13:26; 14:62; Lk 21:27; Rev 1:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Dan 7:13).

See also Divine Warrior; Glory; Rain; Weather.

COLD.

See Temperature.

COLORS

The ancient Hebrews experienced color primarily through nature; colors suggested to them elements of the physical world. Blue was the color of the sky, green the color of grass and plants, red the color of blood, white the color of wool and snow. These natural associations remain to some extent universal but have been weakened in modern society, which primarily experiences color through manufactured items of synthetic hues. The Hebrew vocabulary for color was quite limited, with only three distinct color words and essentially no words for painting, the visual arts or the concept of color and hue.

Colors are symbolic in the Bible because of their repeated use in certain contexts in ancient culture. Consider a modern example. Red and green have become associated with Christmas by repeated use in American culture. Neither color has any necessary or inherent connection with the significance or celebration of Christmas; however, for an American the holiday can be suggested by the use of these colors. Similarly the colors of the Bible are not symbols in the sense that “blue means this” or “red means that.” The colors found in the Bible are symbolic because of their primary association with elements of nature and their use within the cultures of the biblical times.

The spectrum of colors is first implied in the Bible by the rainbow God set in the sky as a sign of the covenant he made to preserve life after the great flood (Gen 9:12–17). Colors are first named in the Bible when the Lord describes the tabernacle and its contents to Moses. Blue, purple, and scarlet color the linen curtains that form the tabernacle, the garments of the high priest and the coverings for the holy altars and articles (Ex 25–28). The ephod of the high priest was woven of gold, blue, purple and scarlet yarn. Twelve colorful, precious gems, each representing a tribe of ancient Israel, were inset in the ephod (Ex 28:15—21). Colors make the place where God meets with his people visually appealing, but because of repeated use in ancient culture, they are suggestive as well.

In ancient culture the blue, purple and scarlet suggested wealth and royalty. Colored textiles were produced from natural dyes that were rare and expensive. Only wealthy and powerful kings could afford to decorate their palaces with colored textiles (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Esther 1:6; and frequent mention of royal robes as booty, e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 5:30; Josh 7:21). In NT [NT NT. New Testament] times Lydia could sustain an entire business dealing in purple cloth (Acts 16:14). Blue, purple and scarlet colored the tabernacle of ancient Israel, suggesting that Yahweh was the wealthy and powerful God-king, who brought an impoverished people out of slavery in Egypt to make them a mighty nation. Because of their associations with deity and power, blue and purple were apparently also used to decorate idols in biblical times (Jer 10:9).

Blue. In ancient thought the sky was believed to separate the place of the gods from the human realm. Therefore blue, the color of the sky, could appropriately suggest the boundary between God and his people and symbolize his majesty. Like purple, blue was an expensive dye and thus connoted wealth and prestige. Blue was the dominant color of the vestments of ancient Israel's high priest (Ex 28). The high priest wore an outer garment of solid blue over the white robe of the priesthood. He was the boundary between the human and divine realms, moving in both as he ministered in the Holy of Holies.

Blue also separated the holy articles of the tabernacle from the people. When the tabernacle was dismantled and moved, solid blue cloths covered the ark of the covenant, the table of the presence, the golden lampstand and altar, and all of the tools used in the tabernacle (Num 4). Israel was a nation set apart for God, but the high priest and the most holy things were specially designated for the Lord's service. In this context blue suggests the boundary of holy separation unto the Lord. The blue coverings protected the sanctity of the holy things from the Israelites during times when the tabernacle was being dismantled and moved.

Purple. In biblical times purple dye was expensive. Therefore purple was worn only by those of high rank in royal courts (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Dan 7:5, 16, 28). Because of this association the color suggests the power and wealth of royalty. A purple robe was placed on Jesus while soldiers mocked him (Jn 19:2, 5). In the tabernacle of ancient Israel the bronze altar on which the sacrificial animals were burned was covered in a solid purple cloth for travel (Num 4:13). In John's apocalyptic vision Babylon, the great harlot, is dressed in purple, the color of political wealth and power, and in scarlet, the color of sin (Rev 17:4, 18:16). She is an image of the horror of the world's wealth and power corrupted by sin.

Scarlet. Scarlet (red), the color of blood, also colored the linen curtains of the tabernacle. One layer of the roof covering of the tabernacle was made of ram's skin dyed red (Ex 26:14). While it might be pressing the symbolism too far to say that the tabernacle, the place where God met his people, was symbolically covered with blood, the ritual slaughter of sacrificial animals in that place would only have reinforced the association of the color red with the blood of sacrifice (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 14:4, 6, 49—52). In the book of Hebrews the cleansing efficacy of this sacrificial blood is explained as foreshadowing the blood of the ultimate and final sacrifice—Jesus Christ (Heb 9:11—28). The writer of Hebrews recalls that Moses used scarlet wool and animal blood to cleanse both the people and the tabernacle itself (Heb 9:19).

A visual contrast between scarlet and white is found in Isaiah 1:18: “Though your sins are like scarlet, they shall be as white as snow” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The contrast between scarlet and white expresses the transition from guilt to purity worked by God’s forgiveness. The biblical association of the color scarlet with sin continues in the imagery of modern literature, for instance in Nathaniel Hawthorne’s The Scarlet Letter.

The two associations of the color scarlet—with blood and with images of sin—converge in John’s Apocalypse, where Babylon, the great harlot, appears dressed in scarlet sitting on a scarlet beast covered with blasphemous names. In this scene of horror the harlot is drunk with the blood of those who bore testimony to Jesus (Rev 17:3–6).

Black. Black is seldom used as a color in the Bible (Lev 13:31, 37; Song 1:5; 5:11; Zech 6:2, 6; Rev 6:5). It is often associated with the threatening presence of God in dark times of divine judgment upon sin and evil. Throughout the OT [OT. Old Testament] , images of the coming of God in judgment are painted in hues of black. In anger God parts the heavens and comes down with dark clouds under his feet; he is covered in darkness when he shoots his arrows (Ps 18:9, 11). The day of the Lord, a day of judgment for sin, is described by the prophets as “a day of darkness and gloom, a day of clouds and blackness” (Zeph 1:15; Joel 2:2). The Gospels report that when Jesus died on the cross, bearing God’s judgment on sin, darkness fell over the whole land (Mt 27:45; Mk 15:33; Lk 23:44). Generally, black simply describes an object’s colors; but in about a quarter of its uses, it clearly accompanies God’s judgment. In the Bible it is not used as an image of sin.

White. White is used in biblical imagery as the contrasting opposite to black and darkness. It colors scenes of redemption from God's wrath and suggests the absence of darkness. It is the color of heaven's garments and symbolizes a dazzling purity that dispels the darkness of divine wrath (Is 1:18; Dan 7:9; Mk 16:5; Rev 3:4). It is often used to describe the radiance of light in contrast to the darkness of divine wrath on evil and sin. For instance, in contrast to the image of God wrapped in darkness and descending to earth in judgment (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 18:7–11), Jesus is clothed in robes "as white as light" (Mt 17:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) when he is transfigured on the mount. In the book of Revelation the redeemed wear white garments (Rev 3:4; 6:11; 7:14; initiates were dressed in white linen in ancient religions), ride white horses (Rev 6:2) and have a white stone upon which is written a new name (Rev 2:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] angels in white, Jn 20:12). Images of the new heaven and earth in Revelation are all white and light. There is no black or darkness in them, for the dark shadow of divine judgment will never again fall upon God's new creation, which has been made eternally pure by the blood of the Lamb.

Colors are not mentioned frequently in the Bible. However, in two instances a brilliant spectrum of color is found. One instance is of the colorful gemstones set in the ephod of the high priest (Ex 28:15–21). The other is in the visions of the heavenly city made of jewels (Is 54:11–12; Rev 21:10, 18–21). In these images the visual beauty of color is combined with the splendor of jewels to express the opulence found in God's presence.

It is difficult to know with certainty which jewels the ancient words refer to and hence to know their colors. Nevertheless, imagine the visual delight of ruby reds, sapphire blues, emerald greens, amethyst purples, and pearly whites. The sparkling colors on the ephod of the high priest foreshadow the beauty of the heavenly city, suggesting that to be where God is, is to be in a place of unimaginable beauty, power and wealth. The heavenly city of eternal life is colored with every hue of the rainbow, the sign God first gave of his promise to preserve and not to destroy the life he had created (Gen 9:12–17).

See also Black; Jewels and Precious Stones; White.

COLOSSIANS, LETTER TO THE

The purpose of Paul's letter to the Colossians is to refute the so-called Colossian heresy, a gnostic type of philosophy that taught that though Christ provided a good spiritual beginning, there was a deeper fullness available to those followers who would avail themselves of an ancient gnōsis, or knowledge. The gnōsis, said to have been corroborated by fresh revelations, instituted a system of arcane rites and legalistic asceticism. Paul answers this heresy with the brilliant assertion of the complete supremacy and adequacy of Christ.

Central to Paul's answer is the image of the cosmic Christ as given in the great Colossian Christ hymn (Col 1:15–20). The hymn sings successively of Christ as creator, goal and sustainer of the universe, and reconciler of all things by his cross. The vision unabashedly asserts Christ's supremacy—"so that in everything he might have supremacy" (Col 1:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The key motif in Colossians is knowledge. Paul fights the fire of gnostic thinking with a fiery Christian gnōsis. Indeed, the initial mention of knowledge comes in his introductory prayer as he asks God to fill the Colossians with "the knowledge of his will through all spiritual wisdom and understanding" (Col 1:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Significantly, the word he uses for knowledge is epignōsis, “full knowledge.” His prayer was for a full decisive knowledge that would instill a spiritual wisdom. The closely following Colossian hymn flames with the essential cosmic gnōsis. Also as Paul goes on to define the purpose of his ministry in Colossians 1:24–2:4, he describes it in terms of gnōsis: “to make known ... the mystery” (Col 1:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “My purpose is that they may be encouraged in heart and united in love, so that they may have the full riches of complete understanding, in order that they may know the mystery of God, namely, Christ, in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge” (Col 2:2, 3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The reader should note that though the knowledge motif is not explicit after Colossians 2:3, it informs the remainder of the letter, because the practical wisdom for holy living (Col 3:1–4:6) rests on the epignōsis. In fact Paul alludes to it in the charge with which he opens this practical section, a call to focus on such knowledge: “Set your hearts on things above... Set your minds on things above” (Col 3:1–2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

A parallel motif, mentioned just twice but of immense importance, is plērōma, “fullness” (see Fill, Fullness). Its first use is at the end of the Colossian hymn: “For God was pleased to have all his fullness dwell in him [Christ]” (Col 1:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The reference to fullness here is an intentional slap at the false teachers, who apparently used the same word, plērōma, to denote the totality of all the thousands of divine emanations of lesser gods. The sense is that Jesus is not one of the lesser gods of the fullness. He is the Fullness. Colossians 2:9 puts it even more explicitly: “For in Christ all the fullness of the Deity lives in bodily form” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Fullness denotes the totality of divine power and attributes in Christ. Knowledge of this fullness is part of the gnōsis for which Paul prayed for the Colossians. Divine fullness establishes Christ's superiority beyond doubt. And with this, his adequacy to meet every believer's need fills his followers: "and you have been given fullness in Christ" (Col 2:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Christ can hold all the fullness of deity, believers cannot. But believers are full of his fullness. This grand motif then informs the section on practical living.

Crucial to the understanding of Colossians is the metaphorical use of circumcision. Normally circumcision does not refer to death but only to the cutting away of a small portion of flesh. Here in Colossians 2:11–15, however, it provides a gruesome metaphor for crucifixion. Jesus' "circumcision" on the cross involved not the stripping away of a piece of flesh but the violent removal of his entire body in death. The Colossians who have been "given fullness in Christ" (Col 2:10) and are "in him" (Col 2:11), share spiritually in this circumcision, this death. Their sinful nature has been cut away; they have died to their former way of life.

The book of Colossians has remarkable spiritual symmetry. Its purpose is to refute gnostic thought by demonstrating the complete supremacy and adequacy of Christ. In doing this Paul fights fire with fire—the opponents' knowledge is countered by the full knowledge of Christ. The luminous Colossian hymn explodes with a brilliant revelation of the cosmic Christ (Col 1:15–20). Paul applies this understanding to the Colossians: they share in Christ's fullness (Col 2:9–10); they died in Christ's circumcision (Col 2:11–15); they must not be subject to legalism (Col 2:16–17), mysticism (Col 2:18–19) and asceticism (Col 2:20–23). They must fix their hearts and minds on the grand gnōsis above (Col 3:1–3). Then they will be able to put off the earthly nature (Col 3:5–11) and put on the qualities of the new nature (Col 3:12–17). They will live as they ought—as wives, husbands, children, slaves and masters (Col 3:18—4:1).

Colossians also contains conventional epistolary imagery and motifs. The gospel is something that bears fruit and grows (Col 1:6, 10). Christ's work of redemption is a rescue story and a story of transfer from the kingdom of darkness to the kingdom of God's Son (Col 1:13). God's wisdom and knowledge are treasures (Col 2:3). Believers are both rooted and built up in Christ (Col 2:6). The lost state is a condition of being dead (Col 2:13). In the act of redemption the condemnation that comes from the law is both canceled and nailed to the cross (Col 2:14). Sanctification consists of putting vices to death (Col 3:5). Spiritual virtues are clothes that one puts on (Col 3:9). Colossians is also memorable for its paraenesis, or section of exhortations, which includes lists of vices and virtues (Col 3:1—4:6). The latter includes one of two "household lists" in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , outlining the proper duties of spouses, parents and children, masters and servants.

See also Christ Hymn; Ephesians; Fill, Fullness.

Bibliography. A. T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1991 [1981]); C. F. D. Moule, " 'Fullness' and 'Fill' in the New Testament," SJT [SJT SJT. Scottish Journal of Theology] 4 (1951) 79—86

COMBAT.

See Battle Stories; Divine Warrior.

COMEDY AS PLOT MOTIF

Comedy means two distinct things in literary criticism. One category is the humorous or laughable (see Humor). But comedy also denotes a type of story pattern. In fact it is one of four phases of the monomyth (see Plot Motifs). A full-fledged comic plot is a U-shaped story that descends into potential tragedy and then rises to a happy ending as obstacles to fulfillment are gradually overcome. Some comic plots record only the upward movement from bondage to freedom.

The progression of a comic plot is from problem to solution, from less than ideal experience to prosperity and wish fulfillment. The comic plot is the story of the happy ending par excellence. The plot consists of a series of obstacles that must be overcome en route to the happy ending. These obstacles may be blocking characters who thwart the desires of the protagonist(s), or they might be external circumstances or inner personality traits. The general movement is toward the establishment of some type of ideal society at the end, and an important feature of comic plots is the gradual assimilation of the hero or heroine into society (in contrast to tragic plots, where the protagonist gradually becomes isolated). The typical ending of a comic plot is a marriage, feast, reconciliation or triumph over enemies. As for the blocking characters, they are either converted and assimilated into the ideal society, or they are banished from the scene of festivity.

The overall comic movement is accompanied by a host of familiar story elements and stock characters, including disguise, mistaken identity, intrigue, character transformation from bad to good, surprise, miracle, providential assistance, reversal (sometimes sudden) of misfortune, rescue from disaster, poetic justice, the motif of lost and found, reversal of conventional expectations (so that, for example, the younger child is preferred over the older or the humble over the aristocratic) and sudden release. Whereas tragedy stresses what is inevitable, comedy is built around the unforeseen.

Several biblical stories are virtual case studies in comic plots. The story of Ruth, for example, begins in tragic loss and then traces the gradual conquest of obstacles to a happy ending. The story of Esther is similar, as a whole nation is exposed to threat before a counterplot suddenly reverses the fortunes of both the nation and the protagonists, Esther and Mordecai. The stories of Abraham and Sarah's quest for a son, of Joseph's eventual attainment of his prophesied destiny and of the prodigal son of Jesus' parable also illustrate the form. The stories of Job and of Jesus in the Gospels are also U-shaped stories with happy endings, despite the preponderance of tragedy and suffering that occupy the center of the stories.

The truth is that comedy is the dominant narrative form in the Bible. There are relatively few full-fledged tragedies in the Bible. The materials for tragedy are everywhere in the stories of sin and disobedience, but the Bible is almost completely an anthology of tragedies averted through characters' repentance and God's forgiveness. The comic plot is the deep structure of biblical narrative. It is the implied story of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books, which predict dire judgment but almost invariably end with scenes of restoration and festivity. It is the story of the individual's redemption from evil and punishment to salvation.

The overall plot of the Bible is a U-shaped comic plot. The action begins with a perfect world inhabited by perfect people. It descends into the misery of fallen history and ends with a new world of total happiness and the conquest of evil. The book of Revelation is the story of the happy ending par excellence, as a conquering hero defeats evil, marries a bride and lives happily ever after in a palace glittering with jewels. Within this master plot of comedy, numerous individual U-shaped stories populate the Bible—stories of heroes like Gideon, Deborah and David who conquer military foes, of protagonists in Jesus' parables who find a pearl of great price or a lost sheep, of the nation of Israel marching through the wilderness to a promised land, of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] church facing persecution and yet conquering the world.

See also Bible; Character Types; Plot Motifs; Tragedy as Plot Motif.

COMFORT

The Bible is as confident about the possibility of real and lasting comfort in Christ as it is realistic about the sorrows of life: “Blessed are those who mourn, for they will be comforted” (Mt 5:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The essence of comfort is that it is reciprocal: someone extends the comfort, and someone else receives it.

Although images of comfort are relatively scarce in the Bible, touching examples of comfort are numerous. Comfort is usually tendered in the context of mourning for the dead, most often by family members. So Rebekah comforts Isaac after the death of his mother (Gen 24:67), and David comforts Bathsheba after the death of their first son (2 Sam 12:24). Ruth’s loyalty to Naomi in her grief is a powerful expression of kinship, and the comfort that Ruth in turn receives from Boaz (Ruth 2:13) is a reward for her faithfulness. Part of the power of the parable of the good Samaritan (Lk 10:25–37) lies in the fact that relief comes from outside the normal bonds of family and community.

No comfort is also a recurrent biblical motif. Rachel in Ramah symbolizes the futility of comfort for the grief-stricken, “weeping for her children and refusing to be comforted, because her children are no more” (Jer 31:15; Mt 2:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). False comfort is a telltale sign of false prophecy (Zech 10:2). The sufferings of exiles (Lam 1) and victims of oppression are exacerbated by the fact that “they have no comforter” (Eccles 4:1). In the day of earthly judgment the social order collapses, and not even family members are able to give condolence (Jer 16:7). Worse still, the “good things” provided by earthly comforts will prove to have been no comfort at all when compared with the comfort that only the righteous receive hereafter (Lk 16:19–31).

Misguided attempts to comfort are perhaps even worse than a lack of comfort. Job’s “comforters” are the classic example. When Job’s acquaintances “heard about all the troubles that had come upon him, they set out from their homes and met together by agreement to go and sympathize with him and comfort him” (Job 2:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Eliphaz, Bildad and Zophar begin well, sitting in commiserative silence with him for seven days and seven nights. But these would-be comforters eventually give Job more discomfort than comfort, becoming a case study in how not to minister to the grieving. For their false accusations, trite moralisms and doctrinal misapplications, they deserve the rebuke Job later gives them: “Miserable comforters are you all!” (Job 16:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The failure of earthly comforts and comforters to provide lasting succor points to a need for comfort that only God can satisfy. He is “the Father of compassion and the God of all comfort” (2 Cor 1:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Phil 2:1). Like a good shepherd, God comforts his sheep with rod and staff (Ps 23:4), providing guidance, protection, rescue and even correction. Divine comfort is more frequently expressed anthropomorphically. According to the psalmist the contented believer is “like a weaned child with its mother” (Ps 131:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 66:13), able to rest in the Lord’s arms without agitation. Full atonement for sin and full restoration of the exiles to Zion prove Isaiah's claim that "the Lord comforts his people and will have compassion on his afflicted ones" (Is 49:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The very cadence of the words that introduce the comfort motif in Isaiah has a soothing effect: "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God" (Is 40:1 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Zech 1:13)

The comfort that the incarnate Christ offers is exemplified in his weeping with Mary over the death of Lazarus (Jn 11:33–36) and most of all in his raising him back to life (vv. 38–44). The pathos of Christ spills over into the lives of believers, "so that we can comfort those in any trouble with the comfort we ourselves have received from God" (2 Cor 1:4–5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Recent translations tend to render the Greek paraklētos as "Counselor," but the nuance of the more traditional "Comforter" should not be abandoned. By guiding Christ's disciples into all truth (Jn 15:26) and remaining with them always (Jn 14:16), the Holy Spirit sets their troubled hearts at rest (Jn 14:1, 27).

See also Mourning; Suffering; Weeping.

COMMANDMENT.

See Law.

CONCEAL.

See Cover, Covering.

CONFIDENCE

Confidence denotes trust in something or someone. It involves a high degree of certainty and faith, often in a person, to act in accordance with our expectations or hopes. We can have confidence in God and in our standing with him. We can also have confidence in others to trust them with intimate details of our lives.

Scripture shows that confidence in God will never lead to disappointment. Out of the fifty-three references in Scripture to confidence, approximately half refer to the ability to have confidence in the Lord or one's standing before him. Time and time again those who trust in the Lord see victory; believers can know that there is certainty and security in Christ. As Proverbs 3:25–26 states, “Have no fear of sudden disaster or of the ruin that overtakes the wicked, for the Lord will be your confidence and will keep your foot from being snared” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Those who trust in God will not be disappointed, but those whose confidence lies elsewhere will come to ruin (see also 2 Chron 32:7–8; Ps 71:5; Jer 17:7–8; 2 Cor 3:4–5; Eph 3:12; Phil 3:3; Heb 3:14). Likewise, confidence of our standing with God allows us to declare that we “will see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living” (Ps 27:13). We can approach God with confidence, knowing that we will not be destroyed by his wrath because of our sin, but rather will be loved and heard because of our redemption (Heb 4:16; 10:19; 13:6; 1 Jn 3:21).

Placing confidence in the righteous is also a safe bet. Paul has confidence in the Corinthians (2 Cor 2:3; 7:4, 16), who bring him pride, encouragement and joy. Likewise, the godly wife has her husband's full and loving confidence (Prov 31:11).

However, Scripture condemns those who place their confidence in themselves or in unrighteous persons. Jesus speaks harshly against such arrogance and tells the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector to warn against confidence in oneself (Lk 18:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job

6:19—20; Jer 49:31). Confidence in another person places him or her in front of God (Ezek 29:16) and in some situations may even result in misery: “Do not trust a neighbor; put no confidence in a friend. Even with her who lies in your embrace be careful of your words. For a son dishonors his father, a daughter rises up against her mother” (Mic 7:5—6). Confidence in oneself or another not only takes the place of God, but it also results in disappointment and ruin. Finite beings cannot bring fulfillment, according to Micah 7:5—6, and only God has control over life circumstances. Idols are mute and senseless, and “those who make them will be like them, and so will all who trust in them” (Ps 115:8).

The Bible also warns about whom we place in our confidence; human beings, being sinful creatures, will betray a confidence (Prov 11:13; 20:19; 25:9). Samson’s faith in Delilah led to his eventual capture by the Philistines, humiliation and death (Judg 16:15—30). Yet the Bible tells us that the upright are placed in God’s confidence (Ps 25:14; Prov 3:32). The wise discern whom they may trust and are careful to be worthy of the confidence of God and others.

See also Faith; Fortress; Foundation; Rock.

CONSTELLATIONS.

See Cosmology.

CONSTRUCTION.

See Build, Building.

CONTRITE, CONTRITION

In English Bibles the words contrite or broken* (in reference to the heart/spirit) occur a relatively few number of times, but the concept of humility and acceptance of divine providence born out of trials is quite prominent.

Throughout Scripture the theme is repeated that the contrite enjoy a special place in God's care. They may carry wounds from the tragic events of their lives, but God delights in the humility born of this brokenness. "For this is what the high and lofty One says: ... 'I live in a high and holy place, but also with him who is contrite and lowly in spirit, to revive the spirit of the lowly and to revive the heart of the contrite'" (Is 57:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see High; Low).

The English Bible terminology for contrition is not clear, in part because the same Hebrew word (dākâ) (literally, "crush") is used to describe those who are devastated by an action, as in Job 5:4 when Eliphaz describes the plight of the fool's offspring: "His children are far from safety, crushed in court without a defender," (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and an action which humbles one without disabling the person. The crushing here refers to exploitation and being rendered powerless. Such events may have happened to the contrite, but the nuance is different. The contrite have been bruised and injured, but it is their pride that has been irretrievably crushed. The crushing events of life do not automatically make one contrite. They may result either in bitterness (Ex 1:14; Ruth 1:20) or genuine contrition as with Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 4:37).

Broken/contrite must therefore be distinguished from actions that leave one devastated, immobilized, crushed, hardened or embittered. The contrite, the person broken in the right place, has been bruised or crushed in a way that results in true humility. This person does not carry the anger, fear of punishment or lowered self-esteem that characterize the bitter person.

Adversity or a heightened awareness of sin can result in a stripping away of the natural pride, leaving a tender and contrite heart. One passage that deeply shapes the image of contrition is Psalm 51, in which David, humbled by the prophetic denouncement of his sin with Bathsheba, declares that “The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and contrite heart, O God, you will not despise” (Ps 51:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In this psalm David also uses the related image of being brokenhearted.

Repentance: A Defining Characteristic. In some contexts a broken person is one who responds to the prompting of the Holy Spirit in repentance (Ps 51:17; Is 57:15). A brokenhearted person is the opposite of the self-made, hardhearted person. The fundamental difference between these two types of individuals is most evident in their reactions to being confronted with their own sins (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , David and Saul). The contrite person repents and is humbled.

Hearing and Responding to God’s Word. The humble and contrite are able to hear God and tremble at, rather than mock, his word: “This is the one I esteem: he who is humble and contrite in spirit, and trembles at my word” (Is 66:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The contrite and humble can be trusted with the word they hear not to distort it to their own personal ends. Paul clearly links humility and hearing God when he writes about his thorn in the flesh: “To keep me from becoming conceited because of these surpassingly great revelations, there was given me a thorn in my flesh, a messenger of Satan, to torment me” (2 Cor 12:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

A Unique Access to God. God delights in the prayers of the humble. Those who come without dark ulterior motives or in violation of his explicit commands, but as children to a loving parent, receive his hearing. The contrition may be the result of an affliction sent against them; nonetheless, if they are humble, God inclines his ear toward them. “When I shut up the heavens so that there is no rain, or command locusts to devour the land or send a plague among my people, if my people, who are called by my name, will humble themselves and pray and seek my face and turn from their wicked ways, then will I hear from heaven and will forgive their sin and will heal their land” (2 Chron 7:13–14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). By contrast the worship of the proud wearies God: “Never again will you be haughty on my holy hill. But I will leave within you the meek and humble, who trust in the name of the Lord” (Zeph 3:11, 12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

There is no clear image for the contrite, but contrition or humility is often shown through bowing. Ahaziah’s messenger to Elijah “went up and fell on his knees before Elijah. ‘Man of God,’ he begged, ‘please have respect for my life and the lives of these fifty men, your servants!’ ” (2 Kings 1:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Similarly, the man with leprosy in Mark 1:40–45 comes to Jesus on his knees, begging for healing (Cf. Mk 5:6; 10:17).

True contrition can come in variety of ways. One is an awareness of weakness, failure or sin. Clearly David stands as an example here (Ps 51) of someone broken by sin, but so do Manasseh (2 Chron 33) and Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 4). Secondly, an encounter with God can produce contriteness. Isaiah writes that he saw the Lord “high and lifted up” (6:1), and through this he came to know his own uncleanness and the uncleanness of the people of God. “Woe is me,” he exclaimed. Receiving the cleansing of God, he was able to hear and respond to the call of God upon his life: “Here I am; send me.” His ministry follows his heightened awareness of the holiness of God and his own sin. Saul reported that on the Damascus Road: “We all fell to the ground, and I heard a voice saying to me in Aramaic, ‘Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? It is hard for you to kick against the goads’

” (Acts 26:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The proud Pharisee is led blind and defenseless into the city he was prepared to enter with power and authority. A third avenue to contrition is providential events beyond our control that defeat our myths of being in control of our lives. We sense no alternatives and feel boxed in, cornered, with nowhere to go, nowhere to turn. Job senses this as he lost all and sits in despair, but recovers after an encounter with God teaches him that “I spoke of things I did not understand, things too wonderful for me to know” (Job 42:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and “My ears had heard of you but now my eyes have seen you” (Job 42:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Finally, the dark night of the soul can produce contrition. At times God withdraws from his people. Contrition is birthed by the sense that one cannot control God. The psalms include a number of cases of crying out to God and experiencing his silence (Ps 22; 88; 102). Paul relates how he sought God about a problem he terms his “thorn” and found that God would not remove it because “My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness” (2 Cor 12:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Brokenness; Heart; Humility; Low; Pride.

CONVERSION

To be converted is to undergo a change of direction. This is the essential core of the imagery surrounding conversion in the Bible. While the term itself is rarely used in the Bible, stories of conversion are prominent, chiefly in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . OT [OT OT. Old Testament] counterparts are heathens who reject their own traditions in order to embrace the Jewish faith and God. The common denominator in all of the biblical references to conversion is that the individual recognizes his or her need for the one true God and rejects all other alternatives. Typically this action is referred to as “having faith.” Biblical synonyms for conversion include repentance, receiving salvation and believing. The biblical imagery accompanying conversion is consistently one of dramatic change; thus those who always believed or always knew of God are not referred to as converts. The children of Israel and Jesus’ disciples in his lifetime never had clear moments of conversion recorded in the Bible, although clearly the same faith was necessary.

We read about godly men and women in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , but we catch few glimpses of conversions. Jacob’s life was so changed by his encounter with God in his wrestling match at the brook Jabbok (Gen 32:22–32) that it can be regarded as a conversion story. The call and obedience of Abraham to leave his father’s house and religion constituted a change of life so radical as to be a conversion—a change of direction, with a drastic new ritual of circumcision as the accompanying sign (Gen 17). Thereafter, those who wished to become Jewish proselytes and accept the God of Abraham were also circumcised. Circumcision was thus the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] symbol for conversion to a belief in God, signifying the accompanying dramatic change in the individual’s life.

Other OT [OT OT. Old Testament] examples of conversion involved not only a change in the individual’s religion but a change in culture and lifestyle as well. Rahab is the first recorded proselyte. According to Hebrews, the necessary factor was that she had faith, which she demonstrated by calling the Hebrew God “God in heaven above and on earth below” (Josh 2:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 11:31). Because she acted on her confession by hiding the spies, she and her family were saved and became a part of the nation of Israel. Another OT [OT OT. Old Testament] convert was Ruth, who abandoned her own people and gods to follow her mother-in-law from her native Moab to Israel. In her statement of faith she declared, “Your people shall be my people, and your God, my God” (Ruth 1:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thus Ruth too believed God and converted to the Hebrew religion.

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] also contains stories of foreign rulers or peoples who believed God or who repented from their sins for his sake, but who are not cited as converting to Judaism. In this category are the people of Nineveh, who repented from their wickedness at Jonah’s warning, and King Darius of Persia, who, convinced by Daniel’s miraculous survival of the lions’ den, made a law demanding that his kingdom worship “the living God,” whose “dominion will be forever” (Dan 6:26). Similarly, God humbled King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon to a confession of faith by sending a period of madness upon him for seven years (Dan 6). At the end of this time Nebuchadnezzar praised God as “the Most High ... who lives forever” (Dan 4:34). These people repented of unbelief and sin and confessed a faith in God. If they indeed held onto that faith, then they could be considered among those believers who “hear the word of God and do it” (Luke 8:21). More ambiguous is the case of Naaman. After he was healed of leprosy under Elisha’s direction, he took earth from Israel back home with him, in keeping with ancient belief that linked deities with specific regions, but he also asked pardon for bowing with his master in the house of Rimmon (2 Kings 5:17–19).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] contains a far more vivid picture of conversion. The chief symbol of conversion is baptism. Such a symbol is two-fold, for it is at once the literal baptism in water that Jesus called for in the Great Commission and also the baptism in the Holy Spirit, which is the seal of the new believer’s faith and salvation (Mt 28:19; Eph 1:3). In addition to this symbol Jesus refers to conversion in symbolic illustrative language. He calls it being born again of water and the Holy Spirit (Jn 3:5), moving from darkness to light (Jn 3:21), drinking from the living water that is himself and having rivers of living water flowing from the believer's own heart (Jn 7:38), and moving from death into life (Jn 11:25). In addition he illustrates conversion with the parable of the sower, claiming that those who believe are like the good soil in which the seeds grow successfully (Lk 8:5–15). This bearing of fruit is illustrative of those who “when they hear the word, hold it fast in an honest and good heart, and bear fruit with patient endurance” (Lk 8:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version])

The most paradigmatic conversion story in the Bible is that of Paul (Acts 9:1–22; 22:1–16)—a story so famous that to this day we speak of a “Damascus road experience” as a metaphor for sudden conversion. At its core it is a story of a person's life totally reversed—from a zeal to persecute Christians to a zeal to preach the gospel. The imagery of the conversion itself highlights its dramatic nature, with a flashing light that blinded Paul, a falling to the ground in submission, a miraculous accusing voice from heaven, temporary blindness, a speechless group of onlookers and the subsequent falling of scales from the eyes of the convert. The immediate result is boldness in proclaiming Jesus. The essential motifs stand silhouetted: a personal and overpowering encounter with Christ, submission to God, a casting off of something (picturing as losing a weight or impediment), senses heightened, vision restored, the washing of baptism to symbolize cleansing from sin, and a new lifestyle and values.

Although the most radical conversion story is that of Paul, many other examples of conversion appear in the NT [NT

NT. New Testament] . Among them are Cornelius, the first Gentile convert (Acts 10); the jailer converted by Paul and Silas (Acts 16:13); Zacchaeus, the tax-collector (Lk 19:1—10); the thief on the cross next to Jesus (Lk 23:39—43); and the many people, both Jews and Gentiles, converted at Pentecost and subsequently (Acts 2:38—41). Some of these converts believed directly because of Jesus' words and miracles, and others believed because of the apostles' words. Yet one of their common bonds was that they were often the most unlikely to have been saved. Often they were Gentiles who had never heard of the God of Israel or sinners whose actions were obvious and repulsive to those around them. As John comments, very few of the righteous Pharisees believed in Christ (Jn 7:48). Thus the essential element in each of these converts appears to have been a willingness to recognize sinfulness, to abandon all past beliefs and to believe the gospel in its entirety. Jesus reminds the Pharisees of that, commenting that clearly the chief priests did not believe all that Moses had said or else they would have believed him (Jn 5:46).

Mention must be made, finally, of NT [NT NT. New Testament] characters who refuse conversion when it is offered to them. This is the implied state of those who reject Christ's claims in the Gospels, focused most clearly in the case of the rich young man who "went away sorrowful" (Mt 19:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Mk 10:22) because he could not meet the demand of conversion, namely, to give up his riches. Equally memorable is the great refusal-King Agrippa, who dismisses Paul's presentation of the gospel with a statement in Acts 26:28 that is variously translated as "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian" (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) and "In a short time you think to make me a Christian!" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Conversion is above all an initiation—an entry into something new. It also involves reversal—a casting off of the old and embracing of the new. It is a cataclysmic event in the life of the convert. Conversion focuses on the moment (even if long in preparation), and it portrays the person at a crossroads. It involves a turn of direction in a person's life and is the supreme example of the biblical motif of newness (see New), best expressed in the classic passage: “If anyone is in Christ, there is a new creation: everything old has passed away; see, everything has become new!” (2 Cor 5:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Baptism; Cleansing; Faith; New; Repentance; Reversal.

COPPER.

See Minerals.

CORINTHIANS, LETTERS TO THE

Paul's concern in 1 and 2 Corinthians is the reconciliation of division, a topic given theological expression at 2 Corinthians 5:16—21. In 1 Corinthians the fracture lines run between members of the congregations in areas such as the status of groups and individuals, litigation, marriage, food, idolatry, the Lord's Supper, and spiritual gifts. In 2 Corinthians the divisions lie between Paul himself and the members. The burden of the imagery in both letters is to counter the divisiveness endemic to this context by asserting unity and order against fragmentation.

Since in both Roman and Jewish tradition the human body could symbolically replicate the social group, it is perhaps not surprising that Paul's most explicit unifying imagery should involve the human body (1 Cor 12:12—31). This extended analogy of the community with the body (directly expressed at 1 Cor 12:28) is introduced to substantiate his claim that the many spiritual gifts come from one and the same Spirit (1 Cor 12:11). Yet since ancient Mediterranean peoples regarded some parts of the body (the head, the eyes, etc.) as more honorable than others (see Julius Pollux, Onomastikon 2.36), to use body imagery to express unity carried the risk of confirming existing status divisions in the community based on the possession of charismatic gifts. Paul's awareness of this danger emerges when he somewhat artificially seeks to overturn the accepted low status of some bodily organs (1 Cor 12:24–25).

The most persistent image that runs through both letters, however, is of building, specifically, of house construction. The literal basis for such imagery encompasses the household as the original conversion group (1 Cor 1:16; 16:15) and the organization of the community into house churches (1 Cor 16:19). This image thus evokes the sense of integration derived from a single architectural unit and also the cohesion and exclusiveness that characterized the family as the strongest social unit in the Mediterranean world of this period, bound together by group honor. Although the main Greek noun and verb that combine these words (oikodomō and oikodomeō) are translated in the Vulgate as aedificatio and aedificare, leading to the English “edification,” we should not too readily allow such a semantic shift to obscure their original sense for Paul.

Paul launches upon this theme to strengthen his criticism of the factions that look to him or Apollos: “for we are God's fellow-workers, you are God's farm, God's building [oikodomē]” (1 Cor 3:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Apollos has built upon a foundation laid by Paul, and each will receive a reward depending on the foundation used and the manner of building (epoikodomeō; 1 Cor 3:10, 12, 14).

Later, Paul inserts into his two discussions of idol meat statements of the importance of the community being built up (oikodomeō), as opposed to being inflated with knowledge (1 Cor 8:1), or subject to everything being permitted (1 Cor 10:23). The necessity of community construction is again prominent in his desire to regulate potentially divisive charismatic phenomena so as to build up the Corinthian church, to which end Paul employs the nominal (oikodomē; 1 Cor 14:3, 5, 12, 26) and the verbal forms (oikodomeō; 1 Cor 14:4, 17). He emphasizes the priority of the spiritual gifts that involve rational discourse as opposed to glossolalia, which is nonrational; for the first builds up the community (ekklēsia) and the second only the individual involved (1 Cor 14:4–5). Paul summarizes his position: “Let all things be done for building up [the community]” (1 Cor 14:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Paul reiterates this imagery in 2 Corinthians and explicitly connects it with the main issue in this letter by stating in two key places—at the beginning and end of the extended defense of his ministry (2 Cor 10:8; 13:10)—that he received his authority from the Lord for the purpose of building them up (oikodomē), not tearing them down, and furthermore that this was his whole aim (2 Cor 12:19).

A different deployment of house imagery comes in 2 Corinthians 5:1–10, for here Paul integrates it with imagery of the body in an important statement of his views on resurrection and final judgment. He contrasts our body, or earthly home (oikia), with God’s building (oikodomē), the eternal dwelling (oikia) not made by human hands that awaits us in heaven. Although the emphasis here is individual rather than social, the close connection Paul sees between these two visual fields suggests why he has employed both of them as the main images to promote unity in the congregation.

Paul further develops this imagery to remind his readers that they are actually the place where God’s Spirit lives (oikei), his temple (naus; 1 Cor 3:16, 17; 2 Cor 6:16). In the example from 2 Corinthians, this image is used to emphasize the exclusive nature of the community in relation to the world of unbelievers, although at a more exalted theological level than the simpler intimacy of the domestic household (oikos).

Related to house imagery is Paul's use of the words “brother”* (adelphos) or “sister”* (adelphē) to refer his fellow believers some forty times in 1 Corinthians and some twelve times in 2 Corinthians. Paul regarded the imagery of fictive kinship as vital to underline the cohesiveness and distinctive identity of the congregations.

In 2 Corinthians a pivotal image for expressing his position is that of the diakonos, the “humble servant” (2 Cor 3:3, 6, 8, 9; 4:1; 5:18; 6:3—4; 8:4, 19, 20; 9:1, 12, 13; 11:8, 15, 23), which here conveys the meaning of a broker acting between heavenly patrons and human clients, but is also related to the household theme, since the original meaning of diakonos is someone who waits at table.

Yet Paul did not see himself merely as a brother or a servant, for he also asserted his authority as a father, akin to a pater familias in the Roman social system that obtained at Corinth (Joubert). Thus he addresses his readers as those he has begotten in Christ Jesus (1 Cor 4:15), as his “beloved children” (1 Cor 4:14; so also Timothy at 1 Cor 4:17), or simply as “children” (2 Cor 6:13) for whom he lays up an inheritance (2 Cor 12:14). A vital aspect of this metaphorical patria potestasi is that they must be obedient to him (2 Cor 2:9; 10:6), even to the extent of adhering to his direction to excommunicate a sinful member (1 Cor 5:1—5).

The most striking use of imagery in healing the breach between himself and his readers in 2 Corinthians occurs at 3:3—4:6, where the Mediterranean social reality of group honor is again evident. To demonstrate the proof of his claim not to peddle the Word of God as others do (1 Cor 2:1–7), Paul proposes that the presence of God flows like light from Christ (the image [eikōn] of God), to his gospel and then, as a result of his humble service (diakonia), onto believers, who reflect that unveiled light more brightly than Moses on Sinai.

Finally, Paul reinforces his authority by the use of imagery from warfare (2 Cor 6:7; 10:3–5) and from athletics (1 Cor 9:24–27). On the other hand, he also uses images that emphasize his lowliness, such as a captive dragged along in disgrace at the end of Christ's triumphal procession (2 Cor 2:14) or an earthenware vessel (2 Cor 4:7). While visual images of this type no doubt assisted an ancient audience that was listening (rather than reading) to get the point, the apostle himself warrants the importance of one image in particular by noting that he resolved "to hold before his mind's eye [eidenai] nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified" (1 Cor 2:1).

See also Build, Building; Home, House; Family; Servant.

Bibliography. S. J. Joubert, "Managing the Household: Paul as Paterfamilias of the Christian Household Group in Corinth," in Modelling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor (s); edited by] P. F. Esler (London and New York: Routledge, 1995) 213–223; B. J. Malina, The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology (Rev. ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] , Louisville, KY.: Westminster John Knox, 1993); S. Pogoloff, Logos and Sophia: The Rhetorical Situation of 1 Corinthians (SBLDS 134; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992); B. Witherington III, Conflict and Community in Corinth: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary on 1 and 2 Corinthians (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995).

CORN.

See Grain; Wheat.

CORNERSTONE

The cornerstone is the principal stone around which construction in antiquity was achieved. In the lexicon of biblical images of architecture, no image is more evocative than the cornerstone, the focal point of a building, the thing on which it most depends for structural integrity. Thus early in the catalog of God's acts of creation in Job 38:6, the divine voice from the whirlwind asks regarding the world, "Who laid its cornerstone?"

Overshadowing all biblical references is the messianic use of the image. Its first appearance describes the vindication of Israel's king: "The stone which the builders rejected has become the head of the corner" (Ps 118:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Although the original meaning of the text is uncertain, the Aramaic paraphrase of the Targum clearly understands the passage in a royal sense: "The young man which the builders abandoned is among the sons of Jesse and is worthy to be appointed to kingship and rule." The passage is taken to refer to David (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Tg. Ps 118:23–26).

The explicit Davidic interpretation of the Targum may help explain why Jesus used this passage in reference to the parable of the vineyard tenants (Mk 12:1–12). Just as the wicked vineyard tenants (= the ruling priests) rejected the vineyard owner's (= God) son (= Jesus), so the "stone" (= Jesus, Israel's true king) rejected by the "builders" (= the ruling priests) would become the cornerstone (= foundation of God's restored people), which would in turn be the foundation of a new community of faith (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 4:10–11; 1 Pet 2:4–5). The climax of all these references speaks of “Christ Jesus himself as the chief cornerstone” (Eph 2:20) of the metaphoric temple consisting of believers.

The cornerstone image is further amplified by allusions to the “stone of stumbling” and “rock of offense” images found in Isaiah (8:14; 28:16). The combination of these Isaiah passages, along with the one cited above from Psalm 118:22 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Pet 2:4–10), links the early church’s understanding of faith with its emerging Christology: to the one who has faith, Jesus Christ is the chosen, precious foundation stone; but to the one who does not have faith, he is a stone of stumbling.

See also Foundation; Stone; Stumble, Stumbling; Temple.

Bibliography. F. F. Bruce, “New Wine in Old Wine Skins: III. The Corner Stone,” ExpT [ExpT ExpT. Expository Times] 84 (1972–1973) 231–35; J. D. M. Derrett, “‘The Stone That the Builders Rejected,’ ” in Studia Evangelica IV, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] F. L. Cross (TU 102; Berlin: Akademie, 1968) 180–86.

CORROSION.

See Rust.

CORRUPTION

Corruption is a decay into a state of rottenness. Although the Bible supplies images of physical corruption—the stench in Egypt after some of the plagues; the worm-infested manna that some people left until the sabbath (Ex 16:20); the whitewashed tombs to which Jesus compares the Pharisees, “full of the bones of the dead and of all kinds of filth” (Mt 23:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); the diseased Herod “eaten by worms” in his entrails (Acts 12:23)—corruption is mainly a moral and spiritual quality.

The theme of corruption by sin is a major one in the Bible. Synonyms for the word corruption include pollution, decay, uncleanness, defilement and profaning. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] especially, corruption appears numerous times as a description of those who have departed from God's commandments and turned to their own sinful ways. It therefore implies a deterioration of something or someone that was once righteous or whole into something sinful or dirty. But the word is not merely limited to sin; it is also used to describe the state of decay that results from physical death or the physical destruction, dismantling or damaging of an object. Thus the biblical authors see the corruption of physical things and the corruption of moral beings as analogous.

From the very first sin, corruption tainted all human beings. Just before the flood, God looked down and saw that "the earth was corrupt in God's sight, and the earth was filled with violence" (Gen 6:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In fact the evil was so pervasive that only Noah was righteous before God, and among the rest "every inclination of the thoughts of their hearts was only evil continually" (Gen 6:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Unfortunately, as the psalmist observes, the flood did not change the condition of human hearts. God still "looks down on humankind to see if there are any who are wise, who seek after God," and he still sees that "they have all gone astray, they are all alike perverse; there is no one who does good, no, not one" (Ps 14:2–3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 3:10–12). The key to such sin is rebellion, for people believe that there is no God, no one to hold them accountable for their deeds (Ps 14:1). Throughout the Bible the source of corruption is a desire to follow one's own inclinations in the belief that God will never punish sinners.

The chief appearance of corruption in the Bible relates to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] depiction of Israel's continual disobedience of God's statutes. In setting up the nation of Israel, God had attempted to create a people who were his own possession, set apart from the other nations by their holiness and obedience to him. He told them, "Do not defile yourself in any of these ways, for by all of these practices the nations I am casting out before you have defiled themselves. Thus the land became defiled; and I punished it for its iniquity, and the land vomited out its inhabitants" (Lev 18:24–25 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Accordingly he gave them the law, which set out clear guidelines for what this holiness looked like. God laid out elaborate directions for the immoral acts he forbade and for the animals and diseases he considered unclean and desired the Israelites to purify from their congregation. Thus God's instructions were, "You are to distinguish between the holy and the common, and between the unclean and the clean" (Lev 10:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). He forbade a large spectrum of acts, from touching a dead carcass or eating animals with split hooves that did not chew the cud, to not "making yourselves detestable" by having sexual relations with animals or with anyone who was not a nonrelative, of the opposite sex and married to the individual.

In addition to these laws, God gave the Israelites several laws demanding that they not be corrupt in their attitudes toward God. They were not to swear falsely by God's name, thus "profaning the name of your God" (Lev 19:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). God thus declared that his name was vulnerable to slander and derision if his people misused it. Part of the reason for the Babylonian captivity was God's displeasure at King Zedekiah, who falsely swore allegiance to King Nebuchadnezzar in God's name before rebelling against him (2 Chron. 36:13). In addition to this injunction, God also condemned idolatry, calling it corrupt and evil in the sight of the Lord and worthy of provoking him to anger (Deut 4:25). However, even before Moses came down the mountain after receiving this command from God, the Israelites demonstrated their propensity to disobey it by constructing for themselves a golden calf for worship. Since they did not even obey Moses while he was alive, he predicted before his death that the Israelites would fall into corruption: "For I know that after my death you will surely act corruptly, turning aside from the way that I have commanded you. In time to come trouble will befall you, because you will do what is evil in the sight of the Lord, provoking him to anger through the work of your hands" (Deut 31:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Moses' prediction is the story of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , for all of its books retell this repeated cycle of sin, God's punishment, repentance and God's gracious forgiveness.

God found his covenant people to be corrupt in numerous ways, ranging from the degraded practices of idolatry, human sacrifice and temple prostitution to an inability to keep the law that ought to have been the easiest to keep, the sabbath. No nation has ever been more disinclined to give themselves a rest from their labors than the Israelite people. Among other violations they were found guilty of selling merchandise on the sabbath and of not giving the land its sabbath rest (Neh 13:17; 2 Chron 36). The extent of their sin demonstrates the utter depravity sin causes in people's hearts and the alienation from God it causes. God could not describe Israel's sin adequately enough. Isaiah elaborately depicts it in his address to them, although the enumeration is incapable of covering the extent of it: "Ah, sinful nation, people laden with iniquity, offspring who do evil, children who deal corruptly, who have forsaken the Lord, who have despised the Holy One of Israel, who are utterly estranged” (Is 1:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Israel’s sin was in fact so complete that it followed the nations’ ways “and acted according to their abominations, within a very little time you were more corrupt than they in all your ways” (Ezek 16:47 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thus the story of Israel is a story of a fall from righteousness into utter corruption.

In addition to enumerating Israel’s specific sins, the Bible offers a metaphorical portrayal of her sins. Isaiah describes Israel as a rebellious child who is more headstrong than the animals. Although “the ox knows its owner, and the donkey its master’s crib,” Israel is more foolish than the animals, and despite God’s constant entreaties, she refuses to know or understand her master’s call (Is 1:3). Jeremiah has several less than flattering comparisons for the Israelites’ disobedience. He calls Israel “a restive young camel interlacing her tracks,” an animal in heat with unrestrained lust, desperately and nondiscriminatingly searching for a lover (Jer 2:23–24). He also describes her as a “whore with many lovers” who “took her whoredom so lightly” that “she polluted the land, committing adultery with stone and tree” (Jer 3:1–2, 9). The prophets’ graphic metaphors of Israel’s corruption were startling and unappealing, unsuccessfully attempting to shock Israel into repentance.

God does not merely consider corruption as affecting the individuals involved in the acts; he also describes corruption as defiling his physical creation. Repeatedly God warns the people not to defile the land they have been given by sinning. In God’s description of the Canaanites’ sins and punishment, he states that the land itself was defiled by their sins, being “filled from end to end with their uncleanness”; therefore, God “punished it for its iniquity, and the land vomited out its inhabitants” (Lev 18:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Indeed all of “the earth lies polluted under its inhabitants,” who have “transgressed laws, violated the statutes, broken the everlasting covenant” (Is 24:5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Such a statement on sin’s defilement of the land parallels Paul’s account of creation’s “bondage to decay,” from which it will not be freed until Christ comes again.

Like the rest of creation, humankind’s subjection to physical death and decay is a consequence of moral corruption, and the Bible even describes it as “corruption” that God saved Christ’s body from experiencing (Acts 2:27). Indeed the Bible declares that the only escape from the effects of physical death is the Christlike pursuit of righteousness. Paul warns, “If you sow to your own flesh, you will reap corruption from the flesh; but if you sow to the Spirit, you will reap eternal life from the Spirit” (Gal 6:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thus the direct result of moral corruption is physical corruption through death, and only redemption by Christ’s blood and pursuit of righteousness by the power of the Spirit can overcome the inevitable effects of corruption.

Although the NT [NT NT. New Testament] in many ways echoes the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] description of corruption, it adds several new twists to God’s perspective on corruption. The most obvious difference is Jesus’ statement on the law. God himself had set up the elaborate system of rules that the Israelites were to follow in order to be set apart as holy to God. However Jesus told the Pharisees that they had missed the whole point of the law. In his indictment of their hypocrisy, he declared that they preferred to follow the outward form of the law, to be clean according to the law, without recognizing that the law was meant to encourage them to look at the cleanness or uncleanness of their hearts. He rebuked them, saying, “It is not what goes into the mouth that defiles a person, but it is what comes out of the mouth that defiles,” for “what comes out of the mouth proceeds from the heart” (Mt 15:11, 18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thus Jesus made clear to the Pharisees that although the law had been from God and he had desired them to obey it, the law was meant to point them not to their need for external, physical cleanliness, but to their need for internal freedom from corruption.

Paul seconded Jesus’ command, saying “I know and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus that nothing is unclean in itself; but it is unclean for anyone who thinks it is unclean” (Rom 14:14 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Titus 1:15 he echoes this: “To the pure all things are pure, but to the corrupt and unbelieving nothing is pure. Their very minds and consciences are corrupted” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] proposed in these statements that the external regulations the law imposed were intended to point the believer inward to his heart.

In addition to pointing the believer inward, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers also provide a laundry list of corruptions to be avoided. When Jesus describes the truly unclean deeds, he mentions “fornication, theft, murder, adultery, avarice, wickedness, deceit, licentiousness, envy, slander, pride, folly” (Mk 7:21–22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Paul adds to this vice list, describing people “of corrupt mind and counterfeit faith” who “also oppose the truth” (2 Tim 3:8). Among the list of sins included in the passage, he mentions those who are “lovers of themselves, lovers of money, boasters, arrogant, abusive, disobedient to their parents, ungrateful, unholy, inhuman, implacable, slanderers, profligates, brutes, haters of good, treacherous, reckless, swollen with conceit, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God, holding to the outward form of godliness but denying its power” (2 Tim 3:2–5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Such a list offers one of the most complete and succinct pictures of corruption in the whole Bible, for it includes many miscellaneous sins not often considered as wrong. In essence, however, Paul is condemning the things that he encourages the Ephesians to leave behind: “put away your former way of life, your old self, corrupt and deluded by its lusts, and ... be renewed in the spirit of your minds” by embracing a “new self,” like God in “true righteousness and holiness” (Eph 4:22–24 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Here Paul offers the only way to avoid corruption: by renewing our minds in the word of Jesus Christ.

In addition to providing many images of corruption, the Bible also offers an inkling of what the fate of the corrupt will someday be. Once Christ has established his kingdom, he will abolish all corruption and create a country for his people where no corruption will exist. Isaiah describes this kingdom as containing a highway “called the Holy Way,” prophesying that “the unclean shall not travel on it, but it shall be for God’s people” and “no traveler, not even fools, shall go astray” (Is 35:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Revelation, John describes Christ’s kingdom as New Jerusalem, which will likewise remain unpolluted, for “nothing unclean will ever enter it, nor anyone who practices abomination or falsehood” (Rev 21:27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). As for the corruption of the nations, God promises to judge it as he does the symbol of their system of sin, “the great whore who corrupted the earth with her fornication” (Rev 19:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Likewise God promises judgment for the corrupt themselves.

He promises judgment, saying, “their place will be in the lake that burns with fire and sulfur, which is the second death” (Rev 21:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thus God not only offers portraits of corruption in the Bible but also foretells the imminent demise of all who act corruptly.

See also Death; Decay; Purity; Rust; Sin; Whole, Wholeness; Worm.

COSMOGONY.

See Cosmology.

COSMOLOGY

The common theme and goal of creation narratives and cosmological speculation in any era, ancient or modern, is a coherent articulation of the forces (divine or natural) that will account for the observable universe. In any culture this usually entails a positing of the unseen (forces or personified forces usually understood as deities) acting upon the seen (natural world) and an elaboration of the role they play from the beginning of time until the end. The goal of any creation story is to explain the events by which the gods (or God, in the case of the Hebrews) brought order out of chaos and to elaborate the ongoing struggle against the forces of chaos and evil that continually attempt to subvert order and uncreate the universe.

The task of identifying and communicating the attributes and roles of such forces taxes the human vocabulary to the limit and invokes the fullest use of the imagination through appeals to symbols, metaphors and analogies based inevitably on experience of the observable world. In assessing older cosmologies the inescapable conundrum of metaphor resurfaces. Did the ancients intend their metaphors as analogies, or did they really believe them? (Modern cosmologists usually make clear that their analogies are not to be taken literally, but are merely concessions to the uninitiated and ignorant lay person.) The simplicity, beauty and supreme literary art of the descriptions (usually couched in poetry) of the ancient authors suggest a consummate skill in the manipulation of verbal images on a par with any modern author or composition.

This mastery urges us to view these authors as peers, which they are; but in so doing we risk assuming that their view of the cosmos is, like ours, informed by empirical and quantifiable study. It is not. (A twentieth-century cosmology violates the innocence of the ancient text.) Subsequent interpreters of the ancient texts understood the metaphors in an extremely literal way, suggesting that the authors themselves may also have conceived of their images in a very concrete way. If this is so, then the images of ancient poetry, including those preserved in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , reflect an actual view of the cosmos—a view so different from our own that to understand it we must set aside our own assumptions about the universe.

The images of the cosmos in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] do not attempt to present an exhaustive explication of a complete cosmology. They are instead snippets, passing allusions to a common literary background of the ancient Semitic people. Only the literature of neighboring cultures presents a more coherent and complete presentation of this shared cosmological outlook.

Order vs. Chaos. The Babylonian creation story, the Enuma elish, along with other accounts, tells that a primordial goddess, Tiamat, and her consort, Apsu, gave birth to monstrous gods. (The procreative activity of the gods and subsequent feuding of offspring are common themes in Mediterranean cosmologies.) After several generations Ea, the god of wisdom, killed Apsu. In response Tiamat bred monsters by her son Kingu to avenge Apsu's death. Of all the gods only Marduk, the son of Ea, dared challenge Tiamat. By the aid of magic, Marduk overcame Tiamat with his bow and arrows. (His victory offers an etiology for the rise of Babylon, the city whose patron god he is, to political power.) Marduk built the heavens and the earth by recycling the remains of Tiamat. He split her body like a clam, making the firmament from the top half to hold back the upper waters from flooding the earth. From the bottom half he made the mountainous foundations of the sea (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 26:10). He imprisoned the monster allies of Tiamat in the watery caverns of the underworld. He created stations in the sky for the great gods (constellations) and established the calendar by orchestrating their rising and setting—the year, the months and the days. He built gates for the sun to enter in the east and exit in the west and gave the moon elaborate orders about how to shine. (The sun shines under the firmament by day and through the starry windows by night.)

This mythological background common to all Semitic peoples forms the background tapestry upon and against which the author of Genesis weaves a monotheistic account. The many parallels in outlook between Genesis and the Enuma elish stem from a similar understanding of the physical shape of the universe and should present no surprise, but the salient differences are significant.

Genesis as Systematic Cosmology. Whereas the prophets delight in the verbal artistry and familiar poetic images of older mythical accounts of creation, the author of Genesis studiously avoids any such allusions to polytheistic ideas. The outlook of the Genesis narrative with regard to the physical geometry of the universe still holds much in common with the stories of neighboring cultures, but the differences cry out for attention. The Genesis account does not attempt an exhaustive treatment but simply asserts a monotheistic Creator. Instead it goes out of its way to avoid certain terms that are essential to the telling but hazardous to its meaning. For example, the sun, most easily referred to by the common noun šemeš, is instead called “a greater light to rule the day,” and the moon, yārēah, by “the lesser light to rule the night” (Gen 1:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The author appears to have deliberately avoided šemeš and yārēah because, in addition to designating the astronomical objects, the words also commonly name the deities Sun and Moon (Deut 4:19; 17:3; 2 Kings 23:5; Job 31:26; Jer 8:2). A desire to avoid any suggestion of condoning idolatrous worship may be posited to account for the circumlocutory wording. The story does not deny that the sun and moon are God’s agents to regulate the agricultural activities of humanity and the attendant feasts (Ps 104:19). It denies that sun and moon should be worshipped for this service.

The Babylonian Tiamat is present as Hebrew tehôm, the Deep, but she is not personified in the Genesis account as a deity to challenge the Creator. (Other occurrences of tehôm in Scripture do clearly allude to the Deep as a mythological enemy of the Creator.)

The Babylonian Apsu corresponds conceptually to the waters above the firmament. Firmamentum is the Latin translation for Hebrew rāqîa’, a pounded brass dome over the earth, “hard as a molten mirror” (Job 37:18), which separates the waters above from the waters below and keeps them from flooding the world (Gen 1:7). The sweet rain waters are allowed to enter through the windows of heaven (Gen 7:11). The stars, windows in the firmament, could be sealed up to prevent rain or light from coming through (Job 9:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Judg 5:20, where stars fight Sisera by raining and flooding Kishon). By collusion with the “springs of the Deep” (tehôm), the chaos waters struggle against God’s imposed order and attempt to once again flood what God has ordained as dry land. God’s thundering rebuke is necessary to keep the rebellious sea in its place. The waters of the Deep flee at the Lord’s rebuke. They return to their appointed boundaries, which they should not trespass, and they never again cover the earth (Ps 104:6–9).

Some elements of the story are pressed into theological service. The seven-day cycle of creation foreordains the observance of the sabbath (Gen 2:2; Ex 20:10). Zechariah imagines that the seven lights of the menorah are the seven eyes of the Lord, symbolism that etymologizes the seven visible heavenly bodies that form the basis for the seven-day week (Zech 4:10). (The Hebrews borrowed the seven-day week from the Babylonians, who based it on the sun, the moon and five planetary gods.) Zechariah has kept the historic connection intact but demythologized the pagan gods into agents (or spirits, Rev 5:6) that do God’s bidding, God’s allies maintaining the order of creation. The symbolism of these seven moves fluidly among various categories: eyes of God, spirits, stars, angels (Rev 5:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1:20; 3:1; in antiquity “the eyes of the king” were his spies).

The Genesis account stands distinct from other creation stories in that it has no use for an original goddess in a procreative role. The fierce monotheism of the author sanitizes the imagery with which his audience is familiar, retaining the primitive/simple view of the world (the solid firmament of the heavens and the pillars supporting the earth in a primal sea) but extirpating any traces of competition or threat from vanquished deities. There are no other deities, no lesser gods participating in the creative act either as allies or foes and certainly not as cosmic sex partners to fructify the earth. Genesis is cosmology stripped of its mythology, sterilized of its polytheistic infection.

Mythical Poetic Allusions as Cosmology. By contrast the wisdom and prophetic portions of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] are largely poetry. And poetic imagery and characterization easily give rise to (and paradoxically, perhaps also stem from) a view that natural phenomena are actors and agents participating in a divine plan. The words and images employed in poetry boldly allude to the mythological background of the Semitic peoples. The poets persist in dealing with the conflict between good and evil in the ancient and familiar terms of the cosmic conflict between chaos and order at the beginning of time. Here too the Creator accomplishes his purpose by his word and wisdom, but he is opposed by a primeval cast of enemies. John's cosmology develops this theme of Creator as Word (Jn 1:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 8:22; Wis 9:1).

The poets do struggle to imagine the cosmic birth, and they do resort to creative analogies. The original sea burst from its womb (Job 38:8). The morning gives birth to dew (Ps 11:3). But this does not suggest dalliance by weather gods. On the contrary the rhetorical "has the rain a father or who has begotten the drops of dew?" underscores the profundity of human ignorance and hints at the inadequacy of older cosmologies based on sexual imagery (Job 38:28).

The key members of this cast from the Semitic creation drama remain as players on the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stage, sometimes with the same names (Hebrew cognates of Akkadian words). The Sea, the Serpent, the Apsu waters (the waters above the firmament), the zodiac constellations (host of heaven) and the council of the gods all appear in tantalizing references to these older beliefs, reshaped by the poets and prophets in their attempt to communicate God's role in the cosmos and the eternal significance of religious and political occurrences.

The Sea. Genesis does not attempt to explain the origins of the Deep (tehôm). It is simply there (Gen 1:2). Just as obviously, it is the enemy. The restless sea constantly attempts to escape its prescribed boundaries. It wears away the land. Not content to buffet the shore with its breakers, it sends storms (Rahab) as invasions (Jer 51:42), trespassing beyond its domain, flooding the good earth, destroying life and undoing the order of the world: “Thou dost rule the raging of the sea; when its waves rise, thou stillest them” (Ps 89:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The rebuke of the Lord chastens the sea; it flees to its place (Ps 104:7–9). The Lord tramples the waves of the sea (Job 9:8) and sets limit for the “proud waves” (Job 38:11).

Habakkuk characterizes the rebellion of the earth in echoes of the Semitic creation story. The Lord readies his bow and puts arrow to the string. He cleaves the earth with rivers. The mountains writhe at his appearance, while the waters rage and the Deep roars in defiance (Hab 3:9–10). The creation is defined in terms of controlling the waters: “God called the dry land Earth, and the waters that were gathered together he called Seas” (Gen 1:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “He binds up the streams so that they do not trickle” (Job 28:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “The earth is the Lord’s ... for he has founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the rivers.” (Ps 24:1–2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). If water is God’s enemy, then it also symbolizes his people’s foes: “He drew me out of many waters. He delivered me from my strong enemy” (Ps 18:16–17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Before creation, the Deep had no shape, but was “without form and void” (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] . tôhû wābôhû). Where this phrase recurs in Scripture, it clearly alludes to primeval chaos (Is 40:17; Jer 4:23). But Isaiah also uses the pair in parallel with spirit evils as a mythic personification of “uncreation,” as spirits called Confusion and Chaos, or Destruction and Atrophy (Is 34:11). This mythic background to the image of the sea permits great latitude in interpreting even seemingly common contexts. For example, the sea in Deuteronomy 30:13, “Who will cross over the sea?” becomes “Who will descend into the abyss?” (abysson, Rom 10:7, with no precedent from the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] , which translates with the Greek word thalassa, “sea”). Against such a mythic background as this, Mark’s rhetorical question “Who then is this that even the wind and the sea obey him?” becomes an argument for Christ’s deity (Mk 4:41).

The Sea has several aliases: the Deep, the Abyss. It does not rage alone in its rebellion against God; it also has allies: Storm (Rahab) and Sea-serpent (Dragon, Leviathan). The sea is almost inseparable from the storms it brews. The poetic personifications of God’s enemies blur the identities of Sea, Storm and Serpent, which are frequently paired or even substituted for each other.

Rahab (“Storm,” “Arrogance,” “Bluster”). In a hymn of praise to the Creator, the psalmist says, “Thou dost rule the raging of the sea; when its waves rise, thou stillest them. Thou didst crush Rahab like a carcass, thou didst scatter thy enemies with thy mighty arm” (Ps 89:9–10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “By his power he stilled the sea; by his understanding he smote Rahab” (Job 26:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “Was it not thou that didst cut Rahab in pieces?” (Is 51:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “God will not turn back his anger; beneath him bowed the helpers of Rahab” (Job 9:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Who are these helpers of Rahab? The Sea as Abyss is the prison of rebellious spirits and the keeper of the dead (Job 26:5). It parallels Abaddon as keeper of shades and evil powers (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 88:11; Rev 9:11).

Sea Serpent. The waters rage not only because of the storm, but because of the sea monster who roils the sea and stirs up the tempest (Job 41:25) and the waves (Ps 93:4; 88:7; 42:7). The sea, like the serpent, undulates and hisses, rising up to strike the land. Leviathan “makes the deep boil like a pot” (Job 41:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). His tail thrashes the Deep (Job 41:32), creating cosmic destruction (Rev 12:4, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 9:10, 19). The primordial sea serpent goes by several names (Dragon, Leviathan, Tannin) and is sometimes difficult to distinguish from Rahab, with whom it appears in parallel. The defeat of the Deep and the monster in it are linked. “Was it not thou that didst cut Rahab in pieces, that didst pierce the dragon? Was it not thou that didst dry up the sea, the waters of the great deep; that didst make the depths of the sea a way for the redeemed to pass over?” (Is 51:9–10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “By his power [the Lord] stilled the sea; by his understanding he smote Rahab. By his wind [spirit] the heavens were made fair; his hand pierced the fleeing serpent” (Job 26:12–13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Much of the biblical imagery closely resembles descriptions of the sea serpent familiar from Ugaritic myth as the seven-headed serpent (ANET [ANET ANET. Ancient Near Eastern Texts] 138b). “Thou didst divide the sea by thy might; thou didst break the heads of the dragons on the waters. Thou didst crush the heads of Leviathan, thou didst give him as food for the creatures of the wilderness. Thou didst cleave open springs and brooks; thou didst dry up ever-flowing streams” (Ps 74:13–15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This battle took place “in the midst of the earth” (Ps 74:12).

The battle that witnessed the subduing of the serpent is in the distant past, but the war is not over. Its aftermath overflows into the present age. Occasionally the imagery applies to present enemies. Among various other mythical animals, Egypt is a subdued sea-monster, a “Rahab who sits still” in contrast to the trashing, twisting serpent (Is 30:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 87:4). “In that day ... the Lord will punish Leviathan, the fleeing serpent, Leviathan the twisting serpent, and he will slay the dragon that is in the sea” (Is 27:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Leviathan here may refer to Israel’s, and therefore God’s, enemies; the dragon is Egypt, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 29:3).

The Lord’s allies still struggle against the spiritual evils (Eph 6:12). The forces of order and chaos still skirmish, and a final battle looms at the end of time. For this reason Scripture sometimes refers to the dragon in future battles (Gen 3:15; Rev 12:9; 20:2). These ancient images of the sea serpent as primordial enemy and personification of evil informed the ancient listeners’ understanding of the imagery and the literary uses of the serpent in both Genesis 3:1 and Revelation 12:3–4. The magical powers of serpents reflected in these views also motivated the practice of serpent worship (2 Kings 18:4). Even the methods of snake charmers could also apply on a cosmic scale (Ps 58:5), so that those “who are skilled to rouse up Leviathan” tried to manipulate celestial events (Job 3:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Apsu. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] refers to the Apsu waters of Semitic mythology as the “waters above the firmament” (Gen 1:6–7). “Praise him, you waters above the heavens” (Ps 148:4). Just as there are rivers in the deep, there are also streams above the firmament (4 Ezra 4:7). In addition to storehouses for the water above the firmament (Ps 33:7), there are also storehouses for the wind (Ps 135:7), the snow and the hail (Job 38:22). Angels control these elements at God's command (Ps 148:2, 8; Rev 7:1). Later interpreters understood quite literally that when God made the winds his messengers and fire and flame his ministers, these were angels (Ps 104:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 1:7; 1 Enoch 70ff.).

Since the heavens were solid, everything that passed beneath the firmament (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the sun, the clouds) must enter and exit at the eastern and western gates of heaven (Ps 19:4—6; 65:8). These are the same doors that shut out the waters above the firmament (Job 38:8). The clouds rise at the ends of the earth; the sun enters at its gate. The mountains are the doorposts, the pillars of heaven, which support the firmament like a tent (Job 26:10). Like the sun, God enters the world below the firmament at the mountainous gateway. His named habitations are all lofty peaks: Paran in Teman, Horeb, Sinai, Seir, Zion (Hab 3:3). The Lord goes forth in the whirlwinds of Teman (Zech 9:14). The mountains smoke at his tread (Ps 104:32; 144:5). The pagans also believed that their gods inhabited the mountains and hills (Ezek 6:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 121:1; Jer 17:2).

God's voice thunders upon the many celestial waters where he sits enthroned above the flood (Ps 29:3, 10). He has built for himself an upper room that rests on the firmament. The light and the clouds are God's garments. When he leaves his chamber above the firmament and passes under the vault of heaven, riding his chariot and the wings of the wind, he carries the rain waters in his cloud garments (1 Kings 8:12; Ps 104:2—3; 18:10; 68:4; 97:2; Prov 30:4). The wicked imagine that God cannot see them when he is above the firmament (Job 22:13).

The mythological Apsu waters do occur in Hebrew poetry, but standard translations disguise them. English versions generally render the Hebrew 'ep̄ es, or occasionally the dual form 'op̄sāyim, as “end,” “extremity,” “nothingness.” In several poetic passages, however, “ends of the earth” ('ep̄es) occurs in parallel correspondence to “waters of heaven” (Prov 30:4) or “the farthest seas” (Ps 65:5). Traces of the watery Apsu as God’s enemy remain: “The adversaries of the Lord shall be broken to pieces ... The Lord will judge the ends of the earth” (1 Sam 2:10).

Divine Council. The celestial counterpart to the social institution of the “elders in the gate” (Deut 21:19; Ruth 4:1—11; Ps 107:32; Prov 31:23) who serve as judges (see Ex 21:6 and 22:8, where 'elōhîm means “judge”; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 82:1), the divine council appears frequently in Near Eastern mythology. It is a board of advisors or counselors with whom the supreme deity consults, an “assembly of the holy ones” (Ps 98:5). “God has taken his place in the divine council; in the midst of the gods he holds judgment” (Ps 82:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). These divine beings are not the peers of God: “There is none like thee among the gods, O Lord” (Ps 86:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 135:5). “For who in the skies can be compared to the Lord? Who among the heavenly beings is like the Lord, a God feared in the council of the holy ones, great and terrible above all that are round about him?” (Ps 89:6—7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 138:1). Although among Israel’s neighbors these were clearly lesser deities, the Jews understood them as high-ranking angels. In keeping with this view the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] often translates these “sons of God” or even “gods” as angels (Deut 32:8; Ps 8:5; 138:1 [LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] 137:1]). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] often follows the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] , so that “thou hast made him little less than God” (or gods, Ps 8:5) appears as “a little lower than the angels” in Hebrews 2:7.

Even though he is not loyal to God, Satan, by virtue of his rank as a (fallen) divine being, is permitted to appear at meetings of the council on a day when “the sons of God” (b^enê ’elōhîm) come to present themselves before the Lord (Job 1:6; 2:1). Satan’s role as “accuser” requires this (Zech 3:1; Rev 12:10). The prophet Micaiah pictures another such meeting: “I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing beside him” (1 Kings 22:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This council recommended, and the Lord approved, the dispatch of an angelic emissary with a lying spirit to “inspire” Ahab’s prophets to give misleading advice/oracles (v. 22). The ancient tradition of worshipping these lesser deities was no longer a legitimate option for Jews. They merited no worship (Ps 73:25). Nor are Christians to worship angels (Col 2:18).

The Hosts of Heaven. The celestial conflict visible in the cosmos is waged by two opposing armies, “God’s army” against “the devil and his angels” (Gen 32:1–2; Mt 25:41). Both of these can be termed hosts in the archaic sense of “army.” Most often the host of heaven designates the troops of Satan and evil spirits associated with astral worship (Acts 7:42). Occasionally “heavenly host”* may name God’s angels (Lk 2:13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] legions of demons, Mk 5:9; but legions of angels, Mt 26:53). These alternative gods held genuine attraction, but were also a source of fear (Jer 44:17–25; see Idolatry). As the Israelites and Judeans struggled with their loyalty to monotheism, the worship of these lesser deities plagued their cosmic outlook. Prophetic denunciations measure how astral worship had run rampant (Amos 5:26; Zeph 1:5; Jer 19:13). Since the Hebrew poets also present these cosmic players as God’s enemies, their personification is a necessary part of their character.

The Fall of Angels and the Rebel Constellations. In the Semitic creation stories the various lesser deities are tethered in position as the zodiac. Mesopotamian star-gazers thought the constellations were tethered to the earth by halters or lead-ropes (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] “Can you bind the chains of the Pleiades, or loose the cords of Orion? Can you lead forth the Mazzaroth in their season, or can you guide the Bear with its children?” Job 38:31—32 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The monsters aiding Tiamat were imprisoned in the watery caverns of the underworld. The image of these allies of evil appears in several biblical passages: “The shades below tremble, the waters and their inhabitants” (Job 26:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Not all primeval creatures were evil. The gryphon-like cherubim and seraphim, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] analogues to composite beings, do God’s bidding (see illustrations 231—36 in Keel).

Second Temple readers of Scripture understood Isaiah’s taunt against the king of Babylon to describe the fall of Lucifer as well: “How you are fallen from heaven, O Day Star, son of Dawn! ... You said in your heart, ‘I will ascend to heaven; above the stars of God ... I will make myself like the Most High.’ But you are brought down to Sheol, to the depths of the Pit” (Is 14:12—15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “The Lord will punish the host of heaven ... they will be shut up in a prison ... the moon will be confounded and the sun ashamed” (Is 24:21—23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); that is, the sun and moon will be exposed as not being real deities (Jer 8:2 and Deut 17:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 20:1—3; 12:9).

NT [NT NT. New Testament] authors share this interpretation of Isaiah’s taunt. Jude admonishes believers that even angels can fall, rebellious angels who “did not keep their own position” (Jude 6). With deliberate cosmic imagery, he characterizes those who oppose godliness as “wild waves of the sea” (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , allies of rebellious Sea) and “wandering stars for whom the nether gloom of darkness has been reserved for ever” (Jude 13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). 2 Peter recounts that God did not spare the angels when they sinned, but cast them into hell and committed them to pits of nether gloom to be kept until the judgment (2 Pet 2:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 4:18). Paul refers to these rebel angels as “things under the earth” when he predicts that everything that has rebelled against God will eventually bow to Jesus (Phil 2:10).

Angels. Although the Genesis account is curiously silent on the role of angels at creation, other passages speak out. God created all the host of heaven by the breath of his mouth (Ps 33:6). At the founding of the world, the morning stars burst for joy and all the sons of God sang together (Job 38:7; Ps 148:3). After God determined the number of the stars and called them all by name (Ps 147:4), he fixed the number of nations according to the number of the sons of God (angels, Deut 32:8). The spirits or angels that God created first helped with the work of creation.

He appointed angels over various realms: fire (Rev 14:18), water (Rev 16:5), winds (Rev 7:1), individuals (Mt 18:10; Acts 12:15), churches (Rev 1:20), countries (Dan 10:13, 20—21; 12:1) and weather phenomena such as hail and snow (Job 38:22). Angels take care of transporting the dead (Lk 16:22) and watch over the living (Ps 91:11). They are present at cosmic events like the Parousia (Mt 24:31).

To the degree that the NT [NT NT. New Testament] depends on Judaism, it also participates in the elaborate Jewish naming system for angels. The various terms used to refer to these elemental spirits are sometimes positive, sometimes negative but always notoriously difficult to define. They are usually rendered according to etymology, the meaning and interpretation to be supplied by the reader from the context. They include thrones, dominions, principalities, authorities, rulers, powers, elemental spirits, princes (Dan 10:13; Lk 22:53; Rom 8:38; 1 Cor 15:24; Eph 1:21; 3:10; 6:12; Col 1:16; 2:15).

Several passages suggested angelic intermediaries to Second Temple exegetes. To these early interpreters of Scripture, when the Lord addressed elements of creation, he appeared to be speaking to his messengers. “Fire and hail, snow and frost, stormy wind fulfilling his command” (Ps 148:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) seemed to be angels, part of his host (Ps 148:2). Angels controlled the storehouses of snow (Rev 7:1; Job 38:22). Fire and lightning attended him as heralds (Ps 97:3—4; 144:6; 135:7). Angels surfaced in the interpretations of some texts where they did not appear obvious at all. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] angels give the law (Acts 7:53; Gal 3:19; Heb 2:2); although the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] account does not specifically mention angels, perhaps the fire or the voice was so understood (Deut 4:12). Alternatively, the finger of God (Deut 9:10) may have been understood as a spirit of God (compare Lk 11:20 and Mt 12:28).

Heavens as Billboard. The mythological identification of stars with angels and with the host of heaven suggested to the people of the Bible that God by his word orchestrated the celestial drama, even the motions of the heavenly bodies, and that they mirrored a divine script for events of cosmic significance on earth. Bright and noticeable stars of the heavens represent noteworthy persons on earth (kings). The machinations above portend events below. Joseph’s dream casts celestial bodies as surrogates for important figures in his clan (Gen 37:9). The parents are sun and moon; the twelve brothers match the twelve signs of the zodiac. Balaam, the enigmatic pagan prophet unexpectedly inspired by the spirit of Yahweh to utter oracles, reluctantly says, “A star shall come forth out of Jacob” (Num 24:17). The same logic leads the Magi to the new king (Mt 2:2), and much later the same astral symbolism illuminates Christ as the Morning Star heralding the dawning of a new age (Rev 22:16).

New Testament Cosmology. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] often assumes the cosmological imagery of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Thunder, the voice of God in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (Ps 18:13; 29), is too powerful to understand (Job 26:14). For John the thunderous voice from heaven is from God and can be interpreted, although he dutifully records that some deemed it the voice of an angel and others thought it was merely thunder (Jn 12:29). The true identity of Christ gains greater import because the spirits who reveal it in their confessions are the very beings who have secret knowledge of cosmic events (Mk 1:34; 3:11–12). They are the ones he will disarm (Col 2:15) and the powers in heaven, on earth and under the earth that will ultimately bow (Phil 2:10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 8:29).

Cosmic disturbances call for disruptions in the created order. The signs accompanying the crucifixion are clear indications of the cosmic conflict. The fabric of the universe threatens to unravel as God does battle with evil: the sun grows dark (Lk 23:44–45); a torn curtain exposes the sanctity of God’s former house as an unmistakable token of a new order; the pillars of the earth shake (Job 9:6; Ps 75:3); even rocks cannot hold themselves together. Tombs open and release their prisoners as the enemy in the Deep admits defeat (Mt 27:51).

In Paul’s doctrine of salvation the fallenness of the cosmos is symptomatic. No creature is exempt: “For the creation waits with eager longing for the revealing of the sons of God; for the creation was subjected to futility, not of its own will but by the will of him who subjected it in hope; because the creation itself will be set free from its bondage to decay and obtain the glorious liberty of the children of God. We know that the whole creation has been groaning in travail together until now” (Rom 8:19–22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hosea 4:3).

The return of the Son of Man calls for similar disturbances: “And there will be signs in sun and moon and stars, and upon the earth distress of nations in perplexity at the roaring of the sea and the waves, men fainting with fear and with foreboding of what is coming on the world; for the powers of the heavens will be shaken” (Lk 21:25–26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The language borrows the themes of the prophets (Joel 2:10, 31; Hab 3:10–15).

As the original enemy of God at creation, the old sea, parallel to Death and Hades (Rev 20:13), must pass away (Rev 21:1). At the end of days God still sits enthroned above the waters; but the crystal sea is calm, smooth as glass, subdued by the master’s voice (Rev 4:6; 22:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 104:7; 106:9; Mk 4:39). The cosmos will be remade without the rebellious elements.

See also Angels; Chaos; Creation; Deep; Divine Warrior; Earth; Enemy; Heaven; Moon; Mythical Animals; Sea; Serpent; Sun; Sun, Moon, Stars.

Bibliography. R. Graves and R. Patai, Hebrew Myths: The Book of Genesis (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1963). O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms. Warsaw, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997 repr. [repr. repr.. reprint]).

COSMOS.

See Cosmology; World.

COUNCIL, DIVINE.

See Assembly, Divine.

COUNTRY, COUNTRYSIDE

The Bible does not decisively distinguish country from nation or land. The image accordingly encompasses two distinct meanings. Country denotes “homeland”—the place where one lives—while countryside is the “landscape outside of towns”—the natural realm beyond the reach of the city.

Country as Homeland. The implied norm in the Bible is that people have a base, a place with which they identify and to which they belong. Moving from that place in anything other than a temporary way is seen as atypical, something worth commenting on, as when Abraham was told to “go from your country and your kindred and your father’s house to the land that I will show you” (Gen 12:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). As late as Genesis 24 Abraham still talks of the home of his relatives as “my country” (Gen 12:4).

References such as these are rooted in a universal human impulse, especially pronounced in primitive cultures, to regard one’s identity as rooted in the country of one’s origin. Despite Jacob’s twenty years of residence in Haran, his country remained the land of Israel, the land of his “kindred” (Gen 32:9). In the Bible, one’s country is in some sense one’s identity. Thus when Jonah’s terrified fellow sailors want to know who the stranger is with whom they are dealing, they ask Jonah, “What is your country?” (Jon 1:8).

The story of Naaman (2 Kings 5:1–19) is a good index to what the motif of one’s country means in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The leading characters in the story are all associated with specific locales—Naaman with Syria, the maid with Israel, Elisha with Samaria. When Naaman is told to wash in the Jordan, he is offended, regarding the supposed superiority of the rivers of Syria with a sense of pride. After his healing, Naaman returns home with two mule loads of earth from Israel, showing how the ancient mind even linked deities with specific countries.

The dominant image of the country as a homeland that determines identity is doubtless the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motif of the Promised Land, built around such motifs as possession, blessing, goodness and abundance. Beginning with the covenant promises to Abraham, the motif of a land that will eventually become a homeland for individuals like the patriarchs and the corporate nation of Israel reverberates through the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The image of the Promised Land is the goal toward which the entire Pentateuch points, as captured especially in the evocative archetype of a land flowing with milk and honey and the anticipatory codification of laws to be implemented when the nation enters its homeland. The Promised Land is partly possessed in the books that recount the conquest of Canaan, and it remains the reference point for those who lived through the exile and return. In keeping with the idea that land or country determines identity, the motif of the Promised Land defines Israel in terms of a covenant relationship with God, with the gaining of the land a sign of God's covenant blessing and its loss as a symbol of Israel's apostasy.

Following the pattern of many of the Bible's master images, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image of country becomes spiritualized in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . The writer of Hebrews takes up the image of "belonging place" and concludes that the true homeland of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] believers was heaven: "For people who speak thus make it clear that they are seeking a homeland. If they had been thinking of that land from which they had gone out, they would have had opportunity to return. But as it is, they desire a better country, that is, a heavenly one” (Heb 11:14–16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the same vein Philippians 3:20 asserts that “our commonwealth is in heaven.”

The Countryside as Natural Landscape. The basic identity of the countryside is that it is the implied antithesis or complement to the town or city. The countryside is the area outside the city or village. Several traits dominate our experience of countryside in the Bible.

One is the sheer range of specific images that comprise the composite image. Other articles in this dictionary explore variations on the theme: forest, garden, grove, mountain, pasture, plain, river, wilderness. It is also apparent that the great preponderance of action in the Bible occurs in the countryside rather than the city. The countryside is where the patriarchs and Israelites wandered, where battles were often fought, where farming in the predominantly agrarian society of the Hebrew nation took place and where Jesus spent much of his time as an itinerant teacher and miracle worker. As this list suggests, the countryside in the Bible rarely possesses the familiar pastoral associations of an aesthetic escape from the city to natural beauty. Instead it is simply the arena for human activity, and most towns simply merged into the countryside without people feeling a sharp cleavage between them. The countryside could be either hospitable or hostile, but it was rarely an aesthetic retreat. To the biblical imagination, for example, mountains conveyed size and power, but their beauty is not mentioned.

As with many biblical images the countryside is an ambivalent image in the Bible. On one side, it is a place of fertility, abundance and sustenance. The master image of abundance is harvest, as in the story of Ruth and the parables of Jesus. The same spirit of the provision of the countryside breathes through the farmer's viewpoint of the provisions of the earth in Psalm 104:10–18. When Jesus' disciples are hungry on the sabbath day, they get food by wandering through the grain fields (Mk 2:23). One of the few occurrences of the conventional pastoral evocativeness of the lush countryside is Psalm 23:2, with its matchless picture of green pastures and still waters. Similar images of abundant country life greet us in the pastoral interlude of Abraham and Sarah's ideal hospitality to angelic visitors (Gen 18:1–8); in the picture of Job's prosperity (Job 1:3; 42:12) and in such agricultural parables of Jesus as those of the sower (Mt 13:1–9), the workers in the vineyard (Mt 20:1–16) and the prosperous farmer (Lk 12:16–21).

Elsewhere, the countryside is the place of privacy or escape from the more populous town or city. It was a place of physical escape for David when fleeing from Saul (1 Sam 22–24) and for Elijah (1 Kings 17:1–7). It is also a place of psychological and spiritual retreat—the place, for example, where Isaac walks “to meditate in the field in the evening” (Gen 24:63) and where he first meets Rebekah; the place where Elijah meets God in the form of a still, small voice (1 Kings 19:9–13); the place to which Jesus retreated to pray (Mt 14:23; Mk 6:46; Lk 6:12).

An idealized country landscape has always been prominent in love stories and love poetry. The classic examples in the Bible are the idealized farm locale in which the love of Ruth and Boaz springs up and progresses and the rustic pastoral landscape that lights up the Song of Songs. The countryside in the Song of Songs is, in fact, the one notable exception to remarks made above about the scarcity of the idealized pastoral landscape of aesthetic retreat that is so prominent in literature generally. The Song of Songs portrays ideally ardent lovers in an ideally flowery and fruitful landscape, portrayed partly as an escape from the ordinary world. In particular, the two pastoral invitations to love (Song 2:10–15; 7:11–13) use the conventional motif of inviting the beloved to a walk in the countryside, offering the aesthetic delights of the countryside itself as the reason to accept the invitation.

But if the countryside can be a place of natural abundance, escape, spiritual retreat and romance, it is also the place of danger and death. In the story of Joseph and his brothers (Gen 37), for example, the countryside itself conspires against the boy hero. A stranger finds the lost boy Joseph wandering in a field far from home. The landscape itself aids the brothers in their conspiracy, being replete with open pits and wild animals in whose blood a garment can be soaked. The countryside poses a continuous threat to the Israelites in their wilderness wanderings. Elsewhere we read about the countryside—the noncity—as the place where an enemy army waits in ambush (2 Kings 7:12), where the desert is so laden with the threat of wild animals and thirst that only God can save his people there (Is 43:19–20), where a forest can be so dangerous that it “devoured more people that day than the sword” (2 Sam 18:8), where people wander in heart-wrenching destitution until “they reached a city to dwell in” (Ps 107:4–9). Throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the open country is associated with the threat of predators, treacherous pathways and either flood or drought.

In sum, in contrast to the pastoral idealizing that sees the countryside as automatically superior to the city, the Bible gives no reason to believe that people in either locale are in a better or worse position before God or that one cannot live the godly life in either place. Deuteronomy 28:3 declares regarding those who obey God, “Blessed shall you be in the city, and blessed shall you be in the field” (RSV [RSV RSV.

Revised Standard Version]). Correspondingly for those who disobey, “Cursed shall you be in the city, and cursed shall you be in the field” (Deut 28:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 7:15 and 6:5–6).

See also Animals; City; Farming; Forest; Garden; Grove; Land; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Mountain; Pasture; Plain; River; Valley; Wilderness.

COURAGE

The Bible supplies us with a rich store of images for courage. This is no surprise, since the Bible is about small people accomplishing great deeds with God’s help. The images of courage are as various as the mighty deeds celebrated in the biblical canon.

The vocabulary of courage is especially rich in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Biblical Hebrew employs a number of idioms for courage, only some of which can be translated into English term-for-term understandably. One common expression for courage was the word heart. This usage corresponds roughly to our own; the English word courage comes to us from the Latin word cor (“heart”). The “bravest warriors” (Amos 2:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) of Israel were literally “strong of heart.” Loss of heart meant a loss of courage. This could be expressed in a number of ways: the heart “goes out” (Gen 42:28, author’s translation), “falls” (1 Sam 17:32, author’s translation), “faints” (Job 23:16), “fails” (Jer 4:9, author’s translation) or “melts” (Ezek 21:7). Hebrew idioms also linked courage with the hands and knees. Gaining and losing courage were expressed with the phrases “strengthening/loosening the hands/knees.” (2 Sam 16:21; Job 4:4; Is 13:7; Ezek 7:17).

One striking feature of biblical depictions of courage is the close link between courage and the expectation of success. With the possible exception of David's lament for Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam 1:19–27), the biblical writers never picture courage as a grim stoicism in the face of defeat. On the contrary the frequent exhortations to “be strong and courageous” are grounded on God's promise of success (Deut 31:6; Josh 1:6–9; Judg 7:9–15; 2 Chron 32:7; Hag 2:4; Acts 27:22).

Many dramatic biblical narratives recount how individuals acted on God's promises to gain victory in battle in the face of overwhelming human odds. In such stories as that of Jael (Judg 4:17–21), Gideon (Judg 7:1–25), Jonathan and his armor bearer (1 Sam 14:1–14), David against Goliath (1 Sam 17:1–54), Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 20:1–30), and Hezekiah (2 Chron 32:1–23), the people of God, despite being outnumbered, take on the enemy with the belief that God's power is sufficient in their weakness. These narratives of bravery in battle helped to form the self-understanding of the early church. Paul especially employed the language of courage in warfare as a metaphor for his own ministry (2 Cor 10:1–6) and for the ministry of the church as a whole (Eph 6:10–20).

Since weakness and brokenness are a large part of the human condition, obedience to God can require courage in all kinds of situations. Women like Ruth (Ruth 3:1–7), Abigail (1 Sam 25:14–31) and Esther (Esther 4:10–5:2) took huge personal risks to intercede for others. The magnitude of the task involved made the building of the temple an occasion for courage (1 Chron 22:13; 28:10); and in the building of the second temple, this was compounded by opposition and the harsh conditions of life for the returnees (Zech 8:9, 13).

The early church, taking its cue from the courage of prophets who confronted kings (2 Sam 12:1–14; 1 Kings 18:16–46; 22:1–28; Is 7:1–25; Jer 36:1–32), sought and received the help of the Holy Spirit to proclaim the good news with boldness in all situations (Acts 4:29; 13:46; 18:26; Eph 6:19; Phil 1:14; 1 Thess 2:2).

Jesus himself went beyond the outer limits of human courage by daring to die, not for good people but for sinners (Rom 5:6–8). The author of Hebrews saw in Christ's display of courage the inner dynamic that drives all people who possess biblical faith. He characterizes the Christian life as one of “boldness,”* “confidence”* or “courage.” (Heb 3:6; 4:16; 10:19; 10:35) Chapter 11 recounts the great heroes of faith as examples of those who did not “throw away” their “confidence” (Heb 10:35) because they were looking to the eventual reward of their faith (Heb 11:6, 13–16). The crowning example—the “author” of believing courage—is Jesus. His endurance of the cross (Heb 12:2–3) is the model to which those who are “losing heart” should look. After encouraging the readers to consider their sufferings a sign that they have become, like Jesus, sons of God (Heb 12:5–11), he closes with an exhortation to strengthen feeble arms and weak knees (Heb 12:12). This language, clearly borrowed from Isaiah 35:3–4, is a call to regain courage.

See also Battle Stories; Boldness; Confidence; Faith; Heart; Hero, Heroine; Hunting; Trembling, Shaking, Bodily Anguish.

COURT.

See Royal Court.

COURTROOM.

See Legal Images; Judgment; Romans, Letter To The.

COVENANT

The image of covenant or agreement is the primary way in which the Bible portrays the relationship between God and his people and (to a lesser extent) to the human race in general. While many horizontal relationships are described as covenantal (including marriage and various pacts between friends or among enemies), the Bible's imagery of covenant focuses primarily on the covenant between God and humankind.

The Covenants of Genesis. We catch the first hints of the covenant motif in Genesis 2, where God establishes what is sometimes called a "covenant of works" with Adam and Eve. It is a covenant that establishes the obligations of the creature toward God, as well as an outline of the consequences for disobeying. God's part of the covenant is to establish Adam and Eve in a perfect world where all their needs are met by divine provision. Adam and Eve's debt of gratitude can be paid by obeying God's injunction not to eat from the forbidden tree upon penalty of death (Gen 2:16—17). This language of command will be an important part of the imagery of the covenant throughout the Bible.

The second covenant that we read about is the one God makes with Noah immediately after the flood. Here the language is much more explicitly covenantal: "Behold, I establish my covenant with you and your descendants after you, and with every living creature that is with you ... that never again ... shall there be a flood to destroy the earth" (Gen 9:8—11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This is a covenant with the entire creation, including nature as well as people—"a covenant between me and all flesh that is upon the earth" (Gen 9:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The sign of this covenant is the rainbow, "a sign of the covenant between me and the earth" (Gen 9:13).

While these are true covenants, the covenant of redemption and grace that governs the Bible begins with Abraham, and it is here that the main image patterns of the covenant become firmly established. Right at the outset, in the story of the call of Abraham, the most obvious rhetorical pattern is the language of command and promise: “Go from your country and your kindred and your father’s house to the land that I will show you. And I will make of you a great nation, and I will bless you, and make your name great, so that you will be a blessing” (Gen 12:1–2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The command implies an obligation of obedience on the human party in the covenant. The promise is essentially one of blessing, which extends to a range of things, including land, descendants and the presence and protection of God. As Abraham obeys, a third motif is added to command and promise in the form of reward. This motif begins with Genesis 12:7, where God rewards Abraham for his obedience by renewing and extending the covenant. Thereafter in the book of Genesis the renewal of the covenant in the form of command, promise and reward punctuates the action.

An important aspect of the covenant in Genesis and later is that it is an agreement between unequals. God is the sovereign being who initiates the covenant, who announces its conditions to people and who rewards the human recipients of the covenant with promise and blessing. Every time we hear the contractual language of the covenant as it enters the action, we sense at once that the speaking voice is a transcendent one, coming to earth from above, and that the covenant is something conferred upon the human recipient. In that sense it is a covenant of grace, as seen especially in the case of Jacob, who receives the covenant promise at Bethel before he has done anything meritorious that might deserve his receipt of it (Gen 28:13–15). Similarly in the ritual “cutting of the covenant” between God and Abraham, Abraham sleeps; and God alone, in the form of a smoking pot and flaming torch, passes between the animal carcasses, symbolic of the fact that the covenant belongs to God alone (Gen 15:7–21). There is a sense too in which God himself is the chief blessing conferred by the covenant, as hinted at when God tells Abraham “I am your shield, your very great reward” (Gen 15:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The imagery of promise and reward is noteworthy for its extravagant magnitude or abundance. The descendants promised to Abraham are variously compared to the dust of the earth (Gen 13:16), the stars in the heavens (Gen 15:5) and the sand on the seashore (Gen 22:17). God promises to make of Abraham “a great nation” (Gen 12:2), and from the covenant line “all the nations of the earth” shall be blessed (Gen 22:18). The same magnitude is present when the covenant promise is extended to Isaac (Gen 26:4) and Jacob (Gen 28:14).

The Exodus. Important developments occur as we see the covenant extended in the remaining four books of the Pentateuch. The primary change is that the covenant is no longer established with a series of patriarchs and their families but with an entire nation. The imagery that arises in renewals of the covenant is no longer individualistic but national, as the nation of Israel becomes “a people holy to the Lord your God,” a people the Lord has chosen to be a people for his own possession, out of all the peoples that are on the face of the earth (Deut 14:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A new image enters when God couches his covenant in terms of the suzerainty treaties of the ancient Near East. Hittite rulers (or suzerains) laid claim to the loyalty of their vassals in formal contracts whose ingredients included (1) identification of the suzerain in terms evoking awe and fear, (2) a historical prologue in which vassals were reminded of the king's acts of benefit to them and (3) obligations of vassals to their lord, including commands, a claim to absolute loyalty (along with a renunciation of all other political loyalties) and a statement of blessings and curses that will result from obedience or disobedience to the treaty. Both the Decalogue and the book of Deuteronomy bear resemblance to this contractual treaty motif, with the implication that they are not so much law as they are covenant. God's covenant with individuals and with the human race is essentially a treaty. God the great king enters into a relationship with his servant people. It is thus a political—legal metaphor of God's relationship with his people. This covenant is not an agreement between two equal parties. Quite the contrary, it is a relationship initiated by a lord or suzerain with his vassal. The covenant makes certain requirements and stipulates both blessings and curses for the covenant parties, depending on their faithfulness to the terms of the covenant. Thus in the Siniatic covenant of Exodus 19–20, we find God in the place of the suzerain and Israel as his vassal. Much of Exodus and Deuteronomy is commentary and exposition of the covenant initiated at Sinai.

Another new development in the imagery of the covenant is that it is linked even more explicitly with a choice between obedience and disobedience, blessing and curse. The rhetoric is now one of a great either-or that requires a nation to choose or reject God. The classic text is Deuteronomy 11:26–32, where Moses sets before the people “a blessing and a curse: the blessing, if you obey the commandments of the Lord your God ... and the curse, if you do not obey” (RSV [RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Near the end of his farewell discourse Moses uses the same rhetoric, putting “life and good, death and evil” before the nation (Deut 30:15–20). Deuteronomy 28–30 is an extended elaboration of the theme.

The extravagance of the imagery of blessing is still present, but it is given a larger scope that can appropriately be called national, in contrast to the more familial promises to the patriarchs. Thus Moses paints a picture of national prosperity in the Promised Land when he outlines the results of obedience to the commands of God: God “will give the rain for your land in its season and grass in your fields for your cattle, and you shall eat and be full” (Deut 11:14–15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The Prophets. The state of the covenant is a dominant theme in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy, where a major image pattern revolves around the faithlessness of the chosen nation and its failure to live up to its covenant obligations. Isaiah 24:5 contains this list of parallel actions: “they have transgressed the laws, violated the statutes, broken the everlasting covenant.” The covenant is variously portrayed as having been “broken” (Jer 11:10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 17:15–19), “abandoned” (Jer 22:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), “transgressed” (Jer 34:18), not remembered (Amos 1:9), “corrupted” (Mal 2:8) and profaned (Mal 2:10).

Yet among the five dozen direct references to the covenant in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books are numerous references to God’s faithfulness to his covenant. Six times God promises to establish an “everlasting covenant” with his people (Is 55:3; 61:8; Jer 32:40; 50:5; Ezek 16:20; 37:26). God holds fast to his covenant (Is 56:4) and keeps it (Dan 9:4). One could say that in many ways the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is the story of God’s continuing fidelity to his covenant in the face of his people’s infidelity. One of the most powerful images of this is found in the Hosea 1–3, where the prophet takes the prostitute Gomer for a wife as a parabolic representation of God’s faithfulness to his people. In this passage we find a picture of God’s fidelity to a people who have broken faith and therefore have no claim on him.

The Davidic Covenant. The covenant that God establishes with David (2 Sam 7:9–16) is carried over from the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] to the NT [NT NT. New Testament]. In this covenant God promises a kingdom to David's line that "shall be established for ever." This is ultimately a messianic prophecy of what God will do for the human race in the redemptive work of Christ. Subsequently, in the prophets we are introduced to God's plan to make a "new" covenant with his people (see esp. [esp. esp.. especially] Jer 31:31–34 and Ezek 34:25–31). This new covenant will be written directly upon the heart, since the hearts of stone of God's people will be replaced by hearts of flesh (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 8). Thus a living and beating heart is an essential image to the concept of new covenant.

The New Covenant. The covenant is not as pervasive and explicit in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] as it is in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament], though it remains an implied theological framework in which the person and work of Christ are understood as completing and fulfilling the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] covenant. Two-thirds of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] uses of the word covenant appear in the epistle to the Hebrews. The dominant image patterns there identify the NT [NT NT. New Testament] covenant as *"new" (Heb 8:8, 13; 12:24; 9:15) and "better" (Heb 7:22; 8:6). In terms of the theological argument of Hebrews, the new covenant is better because it is final, permanent and once-for-all, as well as being secured and mediated by Christ instead of by human priests and the sacrifices they performed. The imagery surrounding the covenant in Hebrews is thus strongly tied to sacrifice.

Other NT [NT NT. New Testament] passages reinforce the motifs that reach their definitive expression in Hebrews.

Elsewhere too, the covenant is declared to be “new” (Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25; 2 Cor 3:6). As in Hebrews, the covenant is associated with blood (Mt 26:28; Mk 14:24; Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25). By implication the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sign of the covenant, circumcision, gives way to communion as the sign of the new covenant (1 Cor 11:25).

See also Abraham; Circumcision; David; Israel; Law; Moses; Sinai.

Bibliography. D. Hillers, Covenant: The History of Biblical Idea (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1969); M. G. Kline, Treaty of the Great King (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1963).

COVER, COVERING

The fundamental idea of covering is that of concealment, either physically or metaphorically. What is covered is separated from and rendered unknown or unacceptable to potential viewers.

The biblical account offers a detailed description of the coverings made for various items and compartments associated with the tabernacle and the temple (Ex 37:9; 40:3, 19–21, 28, 33; Lev 16:13). The hiding of these items signified the people’s inability to manipulate God. Viewing an object or person gives one the opportunity to study, evaluate, judge or control. The covering of the place of God’s presence and the holy objects associated with it discouraged the people from thinking of God as easily comprehended and managed.

The image of concealment also relates to the removal of grounds for offense. In some passages God’s outrage over an unjust killing is pictured as the blood of the slain lying exposed on the ground (Gen 4:10; Ezek 24:7). Job implores the earth not to cover his blood so that God will see and attend to the unjustness of his lot (Job 16:18). The parallelism of Psalm 32:1 (Rom 4:7) suggests that the idea of sins being forgiven can be pictured as hiding sins from view, so as not to take offense at them (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 10:12; 1 Pet 4:8).

Throughout the Bible, people and objects are concealed to protect them. The psalmist likens God's protective power to the covering of a bird's wings (Ps 91:4). In a context recounting God's displays of power over creation and in history, God's word of comfort to Israel through the prophet Isaiah portrays God's protective concern for his people as his covering them with the shadow of his hand (Is 51:16). Job's contention that "Death is naked before God; Destruction lies uncovered" (Job 26:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) indicates that both lie within the purview of God's awesome power.

The protective nature of coverings extends to situations in which people are in danger of violating social or cultic boundaries. Genesis 9:23 describes Shem and Japheth as walking in backwards and covering their father's nakedness. Similarly the coverings on the furnishings of the tabernacle and temple protected the people from approaching God in an unworthy manner. So also in the throne room scene in Isaiah 6:2, the cherubim are depicted as covering their faces and feet with their wings as a protection from the majestic holiness of God. God covers Moses with his hand while he passes by to shield Moses from observing his face because "no one may see me and live" (Ex 33:20). Moses' face is radiant from the encounter, so radiant that he must cover his face with a veil to alleviate the fear of the Israelites (Ex 34:29–35). For Paul, Moses covered his face not only because the Israelites could not gaze upon his glory but because that glory was fading (2 Cor 3:17–13).

Covering also occurs to prevent shame. In Genesis 3:7 once the pre-Fall union between Adam and Eve has been disrupted, they make coverings for themselves because they are conscious of being exposed. In Hosea's portrayal of God's judgment against Israel, the Lord is depicted as a husband reclaiming his wife's garments so that she and her unfaithfulness will be publicly exposed (Hos 2:9–10). The Mosaic law required those with infectious diseases to cover part of their faces and cry "unclean!" to prevent exposure of their disfigurement to the community. In cases of mourning, the practice of covering one's face or head (2 Sam 15:30; Esther 6:12; Jer 14:3–4) concealed temporary lapses in personal hygiene.

In many of the examples given above, covering also indicates alienation. Lamentations 3:43, 44 provides a sobering example of this connection where it portrays God as covering himself in righteous indignation and cutting off all access to himself by his people in prayer.

See also Garments; Hide, Hiding; Veil.

CRAWL

Crawling is generally a negative image, associated with uncleanness. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament], things that crawl along the ground are to be detested and are often associated with idolatry (Ezek 8:10). Under OT [OT OT. Old Testament] law all crawling animals are unclean to touch or eat (Lev 22:5) and things destined to crawl are considered cursed. This detestation can be seen in the original curse God gives to the serpent in the Garden of Eden: "Cursed are you above all the livestock and all the wild animals! You will crawl on your belly and you will eat dust all the days of your life" (Gen 3:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Similarly, Israel's enemies are given a curse reminiscent of the serpent's fate (Mic 7:17).

Crawling is also associated with humiliation and shame.

When Jonathan and his armor bearer go out to meet the Philistine army, the Philistines say to themselves, “Look, the Hebrews are crawling out of the holes they were hiding in” (1 Sam 14:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). They humiliate the Israelites in the use of the image, placing shame on their actions.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , crawling creatures is a catch-all term for reptiles and associated animals. In Deuteronomy 32:24 the reference is to poisonous snakes; in Micah 7:17 it refers to all snakes; in Habakkuk 1:14 it refers to all water animals except fish. In Leviticus the reference is to those small animals that can render one unclean: “If he touches any crawling thing that makes him unclean, or any person who makes him unclean, whatever the uncleanness may be” (Lev 22:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The connection of crawling things and ritual pollution is exploited by Ezekiel when he records, “So I went in and looked, and I saw portrayed all over the walls all kinds of crawling things and detestable animals and all the idols of the house of Israel” (Ezek 8:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Animals; Humility; Purity; Serpent; Shame.

CREAM.

See Butter; Milk.

CREATION

In the Bible, creation refers both to the act by which God created the universe and to the product of that process. The prime text is the creation story in Genesis 1, but that account is richly embellished with a host of later references to creation. Underlying the individual image patterns is the premise that the telos of creation is to serve and glorify God. The Christ hymn of Colossians 1 asserts regarding Christ that “all things were created through him and for him” (Col 1:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), while the song of the elders in Revelation 4 ascribes glory to God because he has “created all things, and for [his] pleasure they are and were created” (Rev 4:11 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

Rule vs. Energy. One of the first patterns that draws our attention in the creation narrative is the contrast (perhaps tension) between rule and energy, order and exuberance, instantaneous creation and biological generation. On the one hand, God’s act of creation is a great ordering process. The earth begins “without form and void” (Gen 1:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); God proceeds to organize this primal chaos. This motif takes its place in an ancient context of rival creation myths that centered around the ordering of chaos. Mesopotamian, Egyptian and even Vedic Indian mythologies all talk about a chaos that is hostile to the creator god. In each case, the creator god beats back the chaos to provide order, though chaos always remains a threat. The Bible’s creation story is partly similar, inasmuch as God brings order out of chaos, but the biblical account is totally free of any sense of threat or hostility in the chaos that God molds. The emphasis throughout the Bible is that God controls the forces that seek to lead to dissolution rather than wholeness in the world.

As God orders the elements, he utters commands that instantaneously produce objects. Some of his specific acts are acts of ordering, with verbs such as “made,” “separated” and “placed” dominant in the process. The story itself follows a fixed pattern for each day of creation, consisting of five formulaic parts: announcement (“and God said”), command (“let there be”), report (“and it was so” or “and God made”), evaluation (“it was very good”) and placement in a temporal framework. Even the division into days lends an orderly quality to the creation.

But balancing these images of order are images of fertility and energy. Here the language of God's miraculous creative word gives way to the language of biological generation as we read about "plants yielding seed," "fruit trees bearing fruit in which is their seed," waters that "bring forth swarms of living creatures" and a command to the creation to "be fruitful and multiply and fill the waters in the seas, and let birds multiply on the earth." Here is the imagery of overflowing energy and abundance. Against the set formula for each day of creation is the sheer variety of things created and verbs used to name what God did ("created," "said," "saw," "called"). Balancing the sameness of each day of creation is the progression underlying the days of creation.

This same balance between creation as rule and energy persists throughout the Bible. On the one side we have pictures of God drawing "a circle upon the face of the waters at the boundary between light and darkness" (Job 26:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), of building the earth like a building (Job 38:4–6) and prescribing bounds, bars and doors for the ocean, saying, "Thus far shall you come, and no farther" (Job 38:10–11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 8:26–29). But in the other vein we find references to the sea teeming "with things innumerable" (Ps 104:25), and to a world "full of thy creatures" (Ps 104:24).

Images of Goodness and Delight. Another dominant image is the image of "the good earth." The fact that God personally brings the material world into being and labels it "good" and "very good" stands in marked contrast to later Greek and other philosophical and theological perspectives, which view the material realm as intrinsically evil and morally suspect. But that simple observation hardly does justice to the enthusiasm with which God views the work he has done. God's declaration is both a benediction and an expression of joy. Good means "It's wonderful!" Very good is equivalent to saying, "It's perfect!"

The joy with which God creates is a theme in the book of Job and several of the Psalms. In Job 38—41 God responds to Job's complaint against him by reminding Job of the greatness of his power and the wonder of his works, thus bringing Job back to an appropriate sense of awe. In the process, God recounts to Job the majesty of the stars and other cosmic structures, the variety of the weather and the delightful assortment of living creatures that inhabit the earth. One cannot read these chapters without being struck by the delight God takes in the multifaceted world that he has made and the exotic creatures he has brought into being (including the ostrich, the hippopotamus and the crocodile).

In the Psalms the emphasis is more on the joy that the creation takes in its Creator than the delight of the Creator toward his works. But in fact the former is simply an appropriate response to the latter. Thus Psalm 104 speaks of God's wonderful provision for all of his creatures and concludes with the hope that God will rejoice in his works, even as his works rejoice in him (Ps 104:31). Leviathan frolics in the ocean (Ps 104:26), while a personified Wisdom "rejoiced in his inhabited world" as God created that world (Prov 8:30—31). Similarly, Psalm 148 summons all of creation to praise the Lord who has made it. Through such images we see how much pleasure is involved in creation. God takes pleasure in the wide variety of physical forms and behavior patterns found in creation, while the creation rejoices in the God who has made it.

Artistry and Craftsmanship. One result of believing that God created the universe is that the visible world is regarded not simply as a set of data but as someone's achievement. This accounts for the images of artistry and craftsmanship with which biblical writers portray creation. One can scarcely talk about Genesis 1, with its elaborate symmetry and ritualistic patterning, without thinking in artistic terms. God first creates three settings (light, sky and sea, dry land and vegetation) and then, in the same order, fills them with appropriate agents (light bearers, birds and sea creatures, land animals and people). The overall effect is that of an artist filling in a canvas. In Genesis 2 an anthropomorphic God plants and waters a garden, forms Adam and animals from the ground and removes a rib from Adam's side to fashion Eve. He creates a world that is both functional ("good for food") and aesthetically beautiful ("pleasant to the sight," Gen 2:9). It is no wonder that the psalmist views the creation as the work of God's fingers (Ps 8:3) or that the wise man pictures the mountains as being "shaped" by God (Prov 8:25).

But the favorite image of biblical writers in this regard is that of building and architecture. The sheer solidity and permanence of the earth leads to the metaphor of God's laying foundations for the earth (Job 38:4; Ps 102:25; 104:5; Prov 8:29; Is 48:13). Creation is a building with a cornerstone (Job 38:6). An atmosphere of careful planning, functional soundness and aesthetic harmony surrounds images of God's determining measurements, stretching a line, sinking bases, marking out and weighing (Job 38:5—6; Prov 8:27—29; Is 40:12).

Domestic Imagery. By an extension of such anthropomorphism, God's creation of the world is compared to ordinary domestic routines. The result is the domestication of wonder, as God is portrayed as controlling the forces of nature as effortlessly as a person performs the household routine.

For example, in his picture of God covering the earth with the ocean “as with a garment” and the waters fleeing at his rebuke (Ps 104:6—7), the psalmist pictures God as a divine parent tucking in children and scolding them. God “stretched out the heavens like a tent” (Ps 104:2), and he scatters frost as easily as a person tosses out the accumulated ashes of the day (Ps 147:16). He “shut in the sea with doors” and made “clouds its garment, and thick darkness its swaddling band” (Job 38:8—9). He also “wrapped up the waters in a garment” (Prov 30:4).

Creation ex Nihilo. Although the Bible does not make quite as much of the fact that God created the universe out of nothing as Christian theology has, it is nonetheless an important biblical motif. Hebrews 11:3 is the most explicit text: “By faith we understand that the world was created by the word of God, so that what is seen was made out of things which do not appear” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This picture of creation has implications for our understanding of God (he is distinguished from what he created) and the creation itself (it totally depends on God but does not emanate from him). Biblical images of creation distinguish with great care between the Creator and the creation (Rom 1:25). Indeed, the second commandment against graven images (Ex 20:4—6) reflects the language of Genesis 1 and makes it clear that God is extremely jealous that he not be confused or identified with anything within the realm of creation.

The highest scorn and most severe judgments fall on those who blur this distinction. Thus Israel is severely chastened for worshipping the Lord through the image of the golden calf (Ex 32:1—29). The northern kingdom is eventually destroyed for repeating the same error by perpetuating the sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat (1 Kings 12:25—33; 2 Kings 17:21—23). The woodsman who creates an idol out of a piece of wood in the form of a man and bows down to worship it, after having first used other portions of the log to cook his lunch and warm himself, is mercilessly satirized (Is 44:13–20). Finally, the apostle Paul declares how the wrath of God is revealed against all ungodly idolaters who have suppressed the knowledge of the truth “and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images resembling mortal man or birds or animals or reptiles” (Rom 1:23). The biblical image of creation as the product of a divine Creator in one sense empties nature of divinity, in contrast to the tendency of polytheism (which populates the landscape with local deities) and pantheism (which equates the visible creation with deity).

Creation as Revelation. But the same view of creation that empties nature of divinity also makes it a revelation of God and leaves it filled with pointers to God. The fact that all things find their origin in the creative work of God means that everything, in some way, bears witness to the creation and is revelatory of the Creator. According to the Bible every rock and tree and creature can be said to testify of God, declare his glory and show forth his handiwork (Ps 8:1; 19:1; 104; 148). We might accurately speak of the creation as divine messenger (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 104:3–4).

The book of Proverbs strikingly develops this motif with its personification of Dame Wisdom, who describes how she was with the Lord while the earth was created and its foundations established in wisdom (Prov 8:22–31). The point is that God created the world in a way that reflects the divine wisdom, the pattern of which is discernible for those who vigorously seek after it (Prov 8:1–21). But since the source of that wisdom is God himself, wisdom must begin with an appropriate acknowledgment of and reverence for the Lord (Prov 1:7). This divine wisdom is so thoroughly imprinted on the creation that Paul declares that all those who refuse to acknowledge this testimony of God’s existence and power are without excuse in the face of prospective judgment (Rom 1:18–21).

The Bible thus surrounds the creation with images of knowledge and wisdom. The voice from the whirlwind at the end of the book of Job adduces the order and power of the creation as evidence of God's superior knowledge (Job 38:2) and power (only God can control the creatures that are enumerated). In the Psalms we find references to how God "by strength ... established the mountains" (Ps 65:6), "in wisdom" made all creatures (Ps 104:24) and "by understanding made the heavens" (Ps 136:5). Not surprisingly, the creation itself "declares knowledge" (Ps 19:2).

Redemption as Creation. A final motif is the biblical writers' treatment of redemption as a crowning work of God's creation. This is not surprising, since much of what is important in creation has been damaged or destroyed by the Fall. As we might expect, therefore, redemption and creation are intertwined in the Bible.

Christ's work of redemption is described as restoring those aspects of the creation that were lost or damaged as a consequence of the Fall. The person who is regenerated in Christ is "a new creation" (2 Cor 5:17). While the Fall subjected the whole creation to futility, it waits eagerly for the time when it will be set free from its present bondage to decay into the freedom of the glory of the children of God (Rom 8:19–21). Creation is a spectator of human redemption, inasmuch as its own liberation is vested in the liberation of the sons of God. It is also a chorus that celebrates human redemption; for when God begins his final reign, the trees of the forest sing for joy, the sea resounds and the fields are jubilant (Ps 96:12; 98:7–8). While the original creation was marred by sin, Christ's work of redemption and restoration will bring about a new heaven and a new earth in which righteousness dwells (Rev 21:1).

See also Adam; Animals; Cosmology; Earth; Eve; Garden; Genesis; Paradise; Plants; Sun, Moon, Stars.

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT

The crime-and-punishment motif makes up a small library of the world's literature, and we could predict that it would loom large in a book as concerned with evil and its consequences as the Bible. Crime-and-punishment stories follow a simple format: the antecedents, the occurrence and the consequence of a crime—what led up to it, how it was done and what followed as a result of it. The logic underlying the motif is firm and impeccable: what people sow, they reap. The literary version of this principle is called poetic justice. It should be noted that the crime need not be a civil crime; more often it is simply a violation of God's moral law.

The Bible's first and prototypical story of crime and punishment is the story of the Fall (Gen 3). The crime consists of eating the fruit that God had forbidden. Its antecedent is the subtle temptation of Eve by the serpent (identified elsewhere in the Bible as Satan). Most of the story is devoted to the punishment of this crime, as God arrives in the Garden as a judge and pronounces a curse on all three principals in the drama of sin, ending with the expulsion of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden.

The story of Cain and Abel (Gen 4:1–16) provides the fullest manifestation of the motif. The entire story is built around the premise of a career in crime. In sequence we read about the criminal's family, vocational and religious background (Gen 4:1–4); the motive for the crime (Gen 4:4–5); the criminal's counseling history (Gen 4:6–7); the circumstances of the crime (Gen 4:8); the arrest, trial and sentencing of the criminal (Gen 4:9–12); the criminal's appeal of his sentence (Gen 4:13–14); the judge's modification of the sentence (Gen 4:15); and the serving of the sentence, as Cain becomes the first guilt-haunted wanderer in the world (Gen 4:16).

After these first two stories of crime and punishment, we are rarely allowed to forget the motif as we read the Bible. When the wickedness of the human race becomes "great in the earth," with people's thoughts being "only evil continually" (Gen 6:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), God punishes the world with a "clean sweep" flood. Thereafter the book of Genesis becomes a small anthology of crime-and-punishment stories—Lot and his family punished for an ill-advised move to Sodom (whose wickedness is punished by God in cataclysmic fire and brimstone), Abraham and Sarah punished for their expedient act of having a child by Hagar, Jacob punished for his self-seeking behavior toward Esau, Esau punished for his insensitivity to the spiritual benefits represented by his birthright, Joseph's brothers made to pay the consequences for their crime against their brother.

The epic of the Exodus too contains its share of stories in which people's offense is punished, usually by God's supernatural intervention into earthly affairs. Pharaoh's hardness of heart is punished by the ten plagues, eventuating in his own death. The Egyptian army's pursuit of the Israelites ends in their perishing in the Red Sea. Interspersed throughout the Mosaic laws of the Pentateuch is the prescription of God's laws that must be obeyed and punishments for their violation. The people's craving for meat, accompanied by a murmuring spirit, is punished by a plague (Num 11); and Miriam's rejection of Moses' authority, by temporary leprosy (Num 12). Similarly Moses' anger, self-importance and pride in striking the rock (Num 20:1—13) are punished by his exclusion from the Promised Land; the people's impatience is punished by an attack from fiery serpents (Num 21:4–9); and the rebellion of Korah, Dathan and Abiram meets a swift end in death (Num 16). On a national scale the ignominious murmuring of the Israelites, and especially their tenfold testing of God (Num 14:22), result in a forty-year wandering in the wilderness until the generation of the rebellious has died.

The pattern of crime and punishment in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] historical books, beginning with Judges, is too pervasive to permit documentation here. The general pattern, among both leaders and the nation, is to follow a cycle of apostasy, calamity (sent as a punishment from God), repentance and deliverance. While this pattern shows God's design to be ultimately redemptive, the tragic dimension of the equation is expressed particularly in the motif of crime and punishment. Within this general sweep of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history, some individual stories of crime and punishment stand out in our memories: Achan's greed; Samson's foolish arrogance, sensuality and weak will; Saul's disobedience; David's committing of adultery and murder; Jezebel's sordid life and sordid death; the rash greed of Elisha's servant Gehazi, who is punished with leprosy; and the downfall at God's initiative of such pagan rulers as the king of Tyre, Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar. Overriding all is the national exile of Israel and Judah after a heartrending history of disobeying God's covenant.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] is less replete with examples and images of crime and punishment than the OT [OT OT. Old Testament], though the doctrine of eternal punishment in hell for all who reject Christ becomes fully articulated. Jesus' discourses and parables yield the most vivid images: it is better to enter into eternal life blind and without one's limbs than to have one's "whole body be thrown into hell” (Mt 5:27–30); the foolish mistake of building a house (= a life) on sand results in a great fall (Mt 7:24–27); the five unprepared virgins are permanently barred from the wedding feast (Mt 25:1–13); the wicked and slothful servant is cast “into the outer darkness” (Mt 25:15–30); the goats will be separated from the sheep to “go away into eternal punishment” at the final judgment (Mt 25:31–46); those who place everyday concerns above the messianic banquet will be permanently excluded from salvation (Lk 14:15–24); the rich man is punished in the afterlife for his lack of compassion in the present life (Lk 16:19–31).

NT [NT NT. New Testament] narrative provides a few additional examples. Judas reaches a terrible end after his betrayal of Jesus (Mt 27:9–10; Acts 1:18–20). Ananias and Sapphira’s experiment in hypocritical fraud yields them a speedy death (Acts 5:1–11). When Herod Agrippa 1 aspires to godhead, “immediately an angel of the Lord smote him; ... and he was eaten by worms and died” (Acts 12:21–23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The book of Revelation too can be read in a new light if we keep the pattern of crime and punishment in the background. The crime consists of the demonic and human worlds’ rejection of Christ and pursuit of evil. The main images of the crimes of the human race fall into four categories-taking the side of evil rather than Christ, battling against Christ, persecuting the followers of Christ and pursuing commercial and materialistic interests with no concern for spiritual matters (Rev 18). The punishment unfolds in interim stages-progress reports on God’s punishment of an evil world-and reaches its finale in the confinement of Satan and evildoers in the lake of fire. The dominant images of punishment in Revelation are images of physical torment on either a cosmic scale (earthquakes, hail, fire, water turned to blood, darkness, locusts), an international scale (warfare and famine, Rev 6:1—8) and a personal scale (sores on people, scorching from the sun, people gnawing their tongues in anguish, Rev 16:10).

See also Adultery; Curse; Evil; Exile; Fall from Innocence; Murder; Plot Motifs; Thief; Tragedy.

CROOKED

The comparison between crooked and straight probably stems from the image offered by the paths of Palestine. The topography of Bible lands required that main highways follow ridges and valleys or run either along the coastal plain or desert plateau. Corvée labor over the centuries made them level and straight for use by armies and the chariots of royal messengers and processions (Is 40:3; 45:2; 49:11). In stark contrast to the highways, the byways connecting villages twisted and wandered (Judg 5:6). These little paths were intended to be traveled on foot or by donkey and negotiated the hilly terrain by means of hairpins and switchbacks, never as the crow flies. The crooked, twisting path required a much longer walk than the straight line between the journey's beginning and end. Every inhabitant of Palestine held a mental picture of such circuitous paths, making "crooked ways" and the "way of the crooked" a vivid and common image applied to one who avoids the difficult, acts unpredictably and fails to do what is right (Ps 125:5). "The highway of the upright turns aside from evil" (Prov 16:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Whatever is crooked bends away from what is straight. Thus whenever the Bible speaks about crooked things, it presupposes a straight standard, a standard grounded in the character of God himself: "Good and upright is the Lord" (Ps 25:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Since the Lord is upright, his people must be upright. God himself commends Job for being "blameless and upright, a man who fears God and shuns evil” (Job 2:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The uprightness of the righteous is an important theme to the psalmist, who observes that God Most High “saves the upright in heart” (Ps 7:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and concludes that “it is fitting for the upright to praise him” (Ps 33:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul insists that elders in the church be upright (Tit 1:8).

The wicked are crooked rather than upright: “God made mankind upright, but men have gone in search of many schemes” (Eccles 7:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). They make their own roads crooked. Their highways lead to desolation and destruction (Is 59:7–8). Peter identifies Balaam son of Beor as the spiritual ancestor of all those who “have left the straight way and wandered off” (2 Pet 2:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Num 22:32). The difference between two moral paths is a dominant motif in the book of Proverbs. In the words that Wisdom speaks, “there is nothing twisted or crooked” (Prov 8:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “Wisdom will save you from the ways of wicked men, from men whose words are perverse, who leave the straight paths to walk in dark ways, who delight in doing wrong and rejoice in the perverseness of evil, whose paths are crooked” (Prov 2:12–15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). A “crooked mind” and a “perverse tongue” go together (Prov 17:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is better to follow the Lord, for “he will make your paths straight” (Prov 3:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 26:7).

In a time of spiritual lethargy an entire generation may decline from God’s upright standard. Moses laments that the children of Israel are a “warped and crooked generation” (Deut 32:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), arguing that such corruption is poor repayment to the God who is himself “upright and just” (Deut 32:4). Peter summarizes his Pentecost message: “Save yourselves from this crooked generation” (Acts 2:40 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Paul too pleads with the early church not to repeat the error of their forebears but to live instead as “children of God without fault in a crooked and depraved generation” (Phil 2:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The label “crooked generation” recalls Jesus’ name for his enemies, “generation of vipers” (Mt 3:7; 12:34; 23:33; Lk 3:7), itself linked to the mythological descriptions of God’s enemy, the twisting serpent (Is 27:1).

Since God is upright, he sets himself against those who are crooked. David praises the Lord for the shrewdness of his dealings with the crooked (2 Sam 22:27; Ps 18:26). Even the person who steals away from the right path cannot escape divine judgment, for “he who takes crooked paths will be found out” (Prov 10:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and all “those who turn to crooked ways the Lord will banish with the evildoers” (Ps 125:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The preacher of Ecclesiastes uses the idea of crookedness to display his sober view of life under the sun and his healthy respect for divine providence: “Consider what God has done: Who can straighten what he has made crooked?” (Eccles 7:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God intends some things, at least, to be crooked. It is better to bend one’s own will to such things than to try to unbend them.

God has appointed his own Son as king in order to straighten out whatever is crooked. The king makes his approach on a smooth, straight highway, not a crooked one: “Prepare the way for the Lord, make straight paths for him. Every valley shall be filled in, every mountain and hill made low. The crooked roads shall become straight” (Lk 3:4—5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 40:3—4).

See also Straight.

CROSS

In the ancient world the word cross was often synonymous with crucifixion. It sometimes only consisted of an upright stake, but usually a cross beam was attached either on the top or in the middle of the stake. Crucifixion as a form of execution probably originated with the Persians. It was later appropriated by Alexander the Great, adopted by the Romans and finally abolished by Constantine. It should be noted that the reference to the condemned person hanging on a tree in Deuteronomy 21:22—23 is not a reference to execution but is a public display of God’s curse subsequent to stoning.

In the first century a.d. crucifixion was one of the strongest forms of deterrence against insurrection or political agitation in Roman provinces. Crucifixion was preceded by scourging. When the victim was affixed to the cross, he was stripped and mocked. The pain was extreme. After the victim died, the body was often left on the cross to decay and become food for scavengers.

The imagery of cross in the Synoptic Gospels expresses radical discipleship that leads to suffering and sometimes to martyrdom. Jesus demands that his followers be willing to deny themselves and “take up the cross” (Mt 16:24; Mk 8:34). Luke’s version (9:23) emphasizes a daily commitment to this task. The expression “take up the cross” recalls the common practice of the condemned person carrying the cross beam to the place of execution. Such a demand entails that all who follow Jesus must be prepared to suffer and be crucified.

Jesus' road to suffering and eventual death by means of the cross became an example of obedience and commitment to God for all who would become disciples. In this respect the call to discipleship is a call to both self-denial and suffering. In John the notion of being "lifted up," which is understood as being part of the glorification process, is associated with Jesus' crucifixion (Jn 3:14; 12:32–34). Here the cross signifies victory.

The image of cross in Paul is theological in import. Paul's interest is in the saving significance of the cross as atonement and not in the historical reconstruction of the event. Paul interpreted Jesus' agonizing and humiliating experience on the cross as an expression of obedience (Phil 2:8), which accomplished the required redemption. Paul's preaching of the cross, namely the crucifixion of the Messiah, does not correspond to established ideas of salvation in the Greco-Roman and Jewish religions (1 Cor 1:17–18). Rather it is seen as divine wisdom. Not only does cross become associated with the death of Jesus, but more importantly it becomes inseparably bound to all components of Christian salvation. For Paul the cross is the revelation of God's power and wisdom. It dramatically signifies an all-encompassing reconciliation: it bridges the gap between humanity and God (Col 2:14); it breaks the barrier between Jew and Gentile (Eph 2:16); and it restores the entire cosmos (Col 1:20). Similar emphases on the effects of the cross are also described in Hebrews 12:2 and 1 Peter 2:24.

See also Atonement; Crime and Punishment; Curse; Suffering; Suffering Servant; Wisdom.

Bibliography. M. Hengel, Crucifixion in the Ancient World and the Folly of the Message of the Cross (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977).

CROSS BEFORE CROWN

Christianity is the religion of the agony and the ecstasy, with the former preceding the latter. Romans 8:17 sounds the keynote: Christians are “heirs of God and fellow heirs with Christ, provided we suffer with him in order that we may also be glorified with him” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Other NT [NT NT. New Testament] passages give us variations on the theme. 2 Timothy 2:12 sets up this causal connection: “If we suffer, we shall also reign with him” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). In the verses preceding this, Paul elaborates a similar theme with the pictures of a soldier who remains single-minded in the service of his superior, an athlete “who is not crowned unless he competes according to the rules,” the “hard-working farmer who ought to have the first share of the crops” and himself as someone who is “suffering and wearing fetters like a criminal” in order to “obtain the salvation which in Christ Jesus goes with eternal glory” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Philippians 1:29 has similar import: “For it has been granted to you that for the sake of Christ you should not only believe in him but also suffer for his sake” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Elsewhere Paul pictures himself as “on the point of being sacrificed,” having “fought the good fight” and “finished the race,” so that “henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness” (2 Tim 4:6—8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). James writes, “Blessed is the man who endures trial, for when he has stood the test he will receive the crown of life which God has promised to those who love him” (Jas 1:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Romans 5:2 asserts that “we rejoice in our hope of sharing the glory of God” and then immediately follows with a list of virtues that suffering produces in Christian character (Rom 5:3—5).

The first epistle of Peter is a small classic on the subject of suffering for the sake of Christ. Here too we find an implied sequence of suffering as a prerequisite or prelude to glory. “Do not be surprised at the fiery ordeal which comes upon you to prove you,” writes Peter, “but rejoice in so far as you share Christ’s sufferings, that you may also rejoice and be glad when his glory is revealed” (1 Pet 4:12–13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, elders who fulfill their calling sacrificially will receive “the unfading crown of glory” at the appearing of Christ (1 Pet 5:1–4). Again, “After you have suffered a little while, the God of all grace, who has called you to his eternal glory in Christ, will himself restore, establish, and strengthen you” (1 Pet 5:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A more generalized version of the same rhythm appears in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . Job’s sufferings are the prelude to his seeing God. Psalm 34:19 asserts, “Many are the afflictions of the righteous; but the Lord delivers him out of them all.” Psalm 30:5 states a rhythm that the Psalms reenact many times: “Weeping may tarry for the night, but joy comes with the morning” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Cross; Crown; Glory; Suffering.

CROSSING.

See Joshua, Book Of.

CROWN

Crowns typically depict some state of honor or blessing for those who wear them, although occasionally the opposite image is ironically presented. Perhaps the most straightforward use of this imagery concerns the crowning of an Israelite ruler (Judg 9:6; 2 Kings 11:12; 1 Chron 20:2; 2 Chron 23:11; Esther 2:17; 8:15).

Possession of a king's crown by another connotes the usurpation of that king's power. In 2 Samuel 1:10 an Amalekite reports to David that he killed Saul. As proof he brings to David Saul's crown and armband. David responds by mourning for Saul, since he considered it unlawful to kill the Lord's anointed. Such restraint against his Israelite rival may be contrasted to 2 Samuel 12:30, where David accepts the crown of the defeated king of Rabbah, thus symbolizing the transference of power to David.

Crowns also represent God's relationship to the king. It is ultimately God who places the crown on the king's head (Ps 21:3). As such, the king's crown may be thought of as a sign of his representative rule of what is in reality God's kingdom. God's displeasure with his anointed king results in the dissolution of the God/king relationship: "You have renounced the covenant with your servant and have defiled his crown in the dust" (Ps 89:39 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In a similar vein, the sage reminds us that "riches do not endure forever, and a crown is not secure for all generations" (Prov 27:24). The crown that Yahweh places on the king's head is conditional on the king's covenant loyalty.

Quite often in both the NT [NT NT. New Testament] and OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , crowns are symbols of God's blessings on his people. At times the specific nature of that blessing is not made explicit (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Prov 10:6, "Blessings crown the head of the righteous"). However in this example the blessing may involve safety from some threat, since the second half of verse 6 promises "violence" for the wicked. Other passages speak of "gray hair" (Prov 16:31) and "grandchildren" (Prov 17:6) as crowns and signs of God's favor. A "crown of splendor" is promised for those who get wisdom (Prov 4:9).

Three passages in Isaiah take this crown imagery a bit further. In Isaiah 35:10 “everlasting joy” is said to crown the head of the redeemed (see also Is 51:11). The context of this passage is the return of the exiles to Zion from Babylon. Although there is some question whether or not the immediate, historical context of this passage is eschatological and heavenly, the notion of “everlasting joy” certainly signifies a perpetual, ongoing state of blessedness for God’s people in light of his redemption of his people. Hence this imagery would seem to have a clear biblical-theological connection to the eternal blessedness of the Christian, in light of the more developed NT [NT NT. New Testament] teaching of the eternal afterlife.

Isaiah 28:5 employs crown imagery in another sense. There it is Yahweh himself who will be “a glorious crown, a beautiful wreath for the remnant of his people” after he punishes prideful Ephraim. The point of this larger pericope (Is 28) is Judah’s righteous rule of its people as opposed to the northern kingdom’s injustice. Yahweh himself is the crown, the kingly presence, the symbol of Judah’s just rule.

An alternate image is expressed in Isaiah 62:3. Here it is Zion/Jerusalem who will be “a crown of splendor in the Lord’s hand.” The exiles will return from Babylon, and Jerusalem will no longer be deserted. Rather, she will be a blazing touch, a beacon of righteousness for the nations. Jerusalem is Yahweh’s royal adornment. This royal city will now be the seat from which Yahweh’s rule of the nations will go forth. A similar imagery is employed in Zechariah 9:16. Yahweh will appear, Israel will be delivered: “The Lord their God will save them on that day as the flock of his people. They will sparkle in his land like jewels in a crown” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Crown imagery in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is used in three distinct senses. First, Paul refers to the churches at Philippi (Phil 4:1) and Thessalonica (1 Thess 2:19) as his crown.

His labors in building up these communities of believers are Paul's source of hope and joy. They are, to pick up on the imagery of Isaiah 62:3, Paul's royal adornment for his work as Christ's ambassador of the gospel. Second, crowns are rewards for those who remain faithful to the gospel. Paul awaits the "crown of righteousness" that Christ, the Judge, will award him "on that day" (2 Tim 4:8). Those who love God and persevere under trial will receive the "crown of life" (Jas 1:12; Rev 2:10; 3:11 [?]). Elders who are faithful to the flock will receive "the crown of glory" when the Chief Shepherd appears (1 Pet 5:4). Christians who are conformed to the image of Christ will one day share in his royal status as coheirs with him. The benefits of Christ are imputed to the believer, but in order for the believer to benefit from Christ's work, Christ, the sinless one, became sin for us; he laid aside his crown of honor and put on a crown of thorns (Mt 27:29; Mk 15:17; Jn 19:2, 5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Phil 2:6—8; Lam 5:16). As the exalted Christ, however, he is adorned with a new crown fitting his authority and universal dominion (Rev 6:2; 14:14).

See also Blessing; Glory; Honor; King, Kingship; Reward.

CRUCIFIXION.

See Cross.

CRYING.

See Tears; Weeping.

CRYSTAL.

See Heaven; Jewels And Precious Stones; Permanence; Sea.

CUP

For the biblical writers, what gives a cup significance is not its appearance but its contents. A cup may hold a blessing-liquid that sustains life, quenches thirst, engenders fellowship—or it may hold a curse—liquid that induces drunkenness or even death.

Literal uses of the word cup often carry positive associations. In Nathan's parable in 2 Samuel 11:1–4, the poor man loves his lamb so much that he lets it drink from his own cup. Jesus commends the kindness of any who will give his disciples a cup of cold water (Mt 10:42).

Since a cup can convey love, comfort, strength and fellowship, biblical writers sometimes use cup as a symbol for all the benefits God provides, as in Psalm 23 where the psalmist proclaims, “my cup overflows” (v. 5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; also Ps 16:5; Ps 116:3; 1 Cor 10:16). But in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , cup is most often used figuratively as a symbol of God's judgment against sin. God is pictured punishing wicked, rebellious people by making them drunk (Is 51:17, 22; Jer 25:15–16; Ezek 23:31–34; Mk 14:36). Drunkenness may seem a mild picture for divine wrath compared to the horrors of war, natural disaster and disease that God is shown visiting on sinners. But in a way, the cup of wrath is a particularly dark symbol of judgment. It plays against our expectations of a generous host who offers pleasure and fellowship. Instead God is seen personally handing sinners their destruction and forcing them to drink. In Jeremiah 25:27 God tells the nations, “Drink, get drunk and vomit, and fall to rise no more.”

The image of the cup of wrath carries special horror because drinking (unlike being overtaken by battle, earthquake or plague) is something a person does deliberately. Drunkenness implies a humiliating progression: people begin confident of their power to handle the wine, but it eventually masters them. In several passages that feature the cup of God's wrath, we see that sinners start out arrogant (see Ps 75:4–5; Jer 49:12–16; Rev 18:6–8) but lose any vestige of human dignity as they drink the cup God hands them “down to its very dregs” (Ps 75:8). They stagger and fall unconscious in the streets (Is 51:17–20); they are exposed and disgraced (Hab 2:16); they go mad (Jer 51:7); they are scorned and “walked over” by their enemies (Is 51:23). Yet clearly their own choices, not God’s capricious anger, have precipitated their destruction.

When we remember the predominant use of cup imagery in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , Jesus’ repeated use of the word cup to signify his impending death takes on great significance. When he pleads, “Abba, Father... Take this cup from me” (Mk 14:36), we realize that his anguish grows principally from the prospect of feeling the full weight of his Father’s anger against sin fall on himself. Jesus’ ordeal is especially poignant because he, alone among humankind, does not deserve God’s wrath, yet he chooses to surrender to crucifixion so that sinners can receive forgiveness. As the soldiers come to arrest him, humility and heroism mingle in his words: “Shall I not drink the cup the Father has given me?” (Jn 18:11).

Because Jesus drinks the cup of death, he can offer his followers the cup of the new covenant. “Drink from it, all of you,” Jesus tells the disciples at the Last Supper. “This is my blood of the covenant which is poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins. I tell you, I will not drink of this fruit of the vine from now on until that day when I drink it anew with you in my Father’s kingdom” (Mt 26:27–29). All who accept Jesus’ sacrifice for themselves can appropriate the blessings of forgiveness, fellowship with God and other believers, and certainty of eternal life that this cup of the new covenant holds (see 1 Cor 11:25–26). But any who take Jesus’ sacrifice lightly or reject it completely will find themselves drinking the cup of God’s judgment (see 1 Cor 11:27—30; Rev 17:3—6; 18:6—8).

See also Drink; Drunkenness; Hospitality; Judgment; Water; Wine.

CURSE

The term curse has a considerable range of reference in the Bible. English versions translate as “curse” the Hebrew synonyms ’ārar, qālal and ’alâ, which correspond to the Greek kataraoimai, katara and epikataratos, and the Hebrew hāram and hērem, which correspond to the Greek anathematizō and anathema. The imagery of curse relates to three contexts in Scripture: the created order, interpersonal relations and God’s covenant relationship with Israel.

Creation Curse. Often the effect of a curse is to be cut off from one’s natural community and environment. The first biblical occurrence of curse falls on the serpent, who is not so much “cursed above all the livestock” as the NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] renders it, but more properly, “from all livestock,” that is, from among the community of animals. The ground too is cursed and is alienated from Adam, who no longer can enjoy easy access to its produce (Gen 3:17). Only later, in the case of Cain, does God issue a curse against a person, whereby he is then driven from the land and presumably his people as well (Gen 4:11). This curse that alienates Adam and then Cain from the land prefigures the curse of exile that will be experienced by Israel.

Interpersonal Curses. When curses against land and persons occur in the literature of the surrounding Near Eastern societies, the initiative is entirely human. Curses in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] may also be invoked by human agents, sometimes as a retaliatory speech-act, as in the case of Joshua, who consigns the Gibeonites to slavery (Josh 9:23; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 9:25; 27:29), or as an invocation (Judg 21:18; 1 Sam 26:19) or as an expression of self-malediction (Jer 20:14–5). Yet the biblical idea of curse is distinct from contemporary nonbiblical parallels in that the latter was essentially theurgical, or magical, while the former was theological in focus and so arose out of broad ethical considerations. Thus the biblical writers replace the original magical background of curse with a covenantal context.

This is not to say that all cursing in the Bible is done with reference to God. There are numerous instances where curse is merely a synonym for “taunt”* or “slander” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 21:17; 1 Kings 2:8; Ps 37:22; 62:4; Prov 26:2; 27:14), and in this regard to curse is in effect to “turn my glory into shame” (Ps 7:2). From the wicked this cursing-as-slander provokes indignation, a common theme in the poetic books.

Covenant Curses. In Deuteronomy, Israel swears to their willingness to keep Yahweh’s covenant with a series of solemn “Amens” (Deut 26:15–19). In Deuteronomy 27–28 Yahweh recites Israel’s prospects of blessings and curses, a recitation that bears on every sphere of existence. Should Israel depart from him in going after other gods: “The Lord will send on you curses, confusion and rebuke in everything you put your hand to, until you are destroyed” (Deut 28:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). At stake is Israel’s national identity, whether it will be as “head” (Deut 28:13) or as “tail” (Deut 28:44), whether Israel will be a recipient of the blessings of God or a recipient of his wrath. The ultimate curse of exile would mean nothing less than the removal of that which makes Israel glorious: the divine presence.

It is arguable that the force of Deuteronomy 28–29 lies in its images of curse as constraint. As God’s appropriate response to disobedience, the curse threatens to deprive covenant violators of security, freedom, health and blessings. Israel under the curse will be partially or entirely constrained from enjoying certain blessings, resulting in a debasement of their God-given identity. Within the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we find the sense of curse as constraint and debasement in the imagery of spiritual slavery (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jn 8:34—47; Rom 6:20; Gal 4:8; Jude 6).

The motif of God's covenant curse expressed as the "wrath of God" is experienced by Israel most prominently in its conquest by Babylon and the ensuing exile. The exile is the reflex of the exodus. The covenant-making God who battles for Israel at the exodus becomes "like an enemy" (Lam 2:5) when Jerusalem is destroyed for its covenant unfaithfulness. Even though Israel returns to the land, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] finds a situation in which Israel remains in spiritual exile within the land, with the pious still yearning for the "consolation of Israel" (Lk 2:25), the "redemption of Jerusalem" (Lk 2:38). Broadly speaking, the story of Jesus is of the messiah offering to Israel the promised return from exile and the blessings of a new covenant (Mt 5:1—12). But Israel is largely unreceptive, and Jesus pronounces curses upon the nation (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 11:20—24; Mk 11:12—14, 20—21; 12:1—11) and warns of a coming great national disaster (Mk 13:14—23; Lk 13:34—35; 19:42—44; 21:20—24). Jesus takes upon himself the "curse of the law" (Gal 3:13), the penalty for Israel's (and the world's) unfaithfulness, and thus provides a pathway of salvation through the coming judgment for all those who will follow him. In this way, "the blessing of Abraham" comes upon the Gentiles (Gal 3:14). Israel and the Gentiles are redeemed from the "present evil age" (Gal 1:4; 4:3—9). Ultimately, however, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] speaks of an eschatological curse, a final judgment, in which those who reject God's salvation perish in their separation from God.

See also Adam; Blessing, Blessedness; Covenant, Treaty; Exile.

CURTAIN.

See Veil.

D

DAGON.

See Gods, Goddesses.

DANCING

Dancing, in its essence, is always symbolic. It is laughter; being pleasant; turning in a circle; whirling, running and leaping—an agile leaping that becomes an artistic rhythmic body movement expressing feeling and thought.

In the Bible the same Hebrew words can also signify a mother's pain in labor (Mic 4:9; Is 21:3; see Birth), a warrior's fall when slain (Ezek 30:4), an animal's leap of terror or delight (Ps 29:6; Is 13:21) or a scoffer's disdain (Job 30:1).

A bronze figure of an Etruscan girl dancing.

Symbol of Praise. Dancing is primarily a physical and visual means of praising, honoring and thanking God. In the Bible it is often combined with song and instrumentation.

Movement joins human and inanimate sound to praise God. Dance is one way of thanking and confessing God before others. The psalmist tells us to praise God “with tambourine and dance; ... Let everything that breathes praise the Lord!” (Ps 150:4, 6; 149:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Dancing and instrumentation are related to prophecy. Miriam the prophetess commanded the women of her time to thank God for making them victorious over their Egyptian enemies (Ex 15:20–21). The context here is a postbattle victory celebration, usually led by women meeting returning warriors. This is also the proper understanding of Isaiah 52:7, which should be translated “How beautiful are the dancing feet of the women [a feminine participle in Hebrew] who spread the good news of peace”). Dancing was used to celebrate God’s victory in battle and the human “weapons”* who were used by God (Judg 11:34; 1 Sam 18:6–7; 21:11; 29:5; see Divine Warrior). The prophets who met Saul also danced and played instruments (1 Sam 10:5).

In the Bible dancing always symbolizes joy, the opposite of mourning: “You have turned my mourning into dancing; you have taken off my sackcloth and clothed me with joy” (Ps 30:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lam 5:15; Eccles 3:4).

When David and the Israelites dance, sing and play instruments as the ark of the covenant comes into Jerusalem, David’s uninhibited dance to God is described as a whirling, sporting, agile leaping. On the one hand, praise of God is more important than class, status and propriety (2 Sam 6:14–21). On the other hand, this ecstatic worship of God is not more important than obedience (2 Sam 6:5–7; 1 Chron 15:2).

As with all the arts, dancing is not limited to the pious. It was an integral part of everyday events in antiquity. The young women danced at the vineyards while playing their hand drums (Judg 21:21; Jer 31:4, 13). The Shulammite’s dance was as beautiful as two dance troops (Song 6:13). When the prodigal son repented, the father ordered a feast and a company of dancers (Lk 15:23–25).

Since dance was part of everyday life in the ancient world, it was part of evil activities as well. Herod's daughter danced so effectively before the guests that she won the head of John the Baptist from the reluctant Herod (Mt 14:6, 7; Mk 6:22). The Amalekites ate, drank and danced when they defeated the Philistines (1 Sam 30:16). The misled Israelites danced when they gave credit to their handmade calf for all their success instead of giving it to the living God (Ex 32:4, 19; 1 Kings 18:26).

Symbol of Freedom and Equality. A brief but profound metaphoric use of dance occurs in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Jesus describes his ministry of eating and drinking as a call to dance: "We played the flute for you, and you did not dance" (Mt 11:17; Lk 7:32 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Dance here symbolizes joy in living, a freedom to enjoy God's material gifts and to enjoy the company of all people, sinners included (Lk 7:34). Even as Jesus was accused by the pious of being "a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and sinners," so too Queen Michal "despised" David in her heart for leaping and dancing "as any vulgar fellow might" (2 Sam 6:16, 20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Dance in the Bible symbolizes praise, freedom and equality. An apt summary of its significance is found in the personification of wisdom, a crucial quality needed by artists (Ex 28:3; 31:3, 6; 35:10). Wisdom itself dances, makes sport, laughs. As God created the world, wisdom was God's architect, daily dancing before God's face (Prov 8:30). God created the world with a dance-like joy, and we humans are to respond with a joyful dance.

See also Music.

Bibliography. J. Eaton, The Psalms Come Alive: Capturing the Voice and Art of Israel's Songs (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1986) 102–15; W. O. E. Oesterly, The Sacred Dance: A Study in Comparative Folklore (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1923).

DANGER, STORIES OF

Stories of danger have high appeal because they grip the reader's attention and emotions. The Bible appeals to this deep-seated human interest. Hero stories especially trade in danger, in keeping with their impulse to show courageous people who encounter and overcome extraordinary circumstances. To rank as a story of danger, a story must portray a threat to the protagonist in sufficient detail to elicit the reader's experience of the danger involved. In keeping with the Bible's premise of the primacy of the spiritual realm, the danger is often moral and spiritual rather than physical.

The stories of Genesis, the Bible's "book of beginnings," provide repeated examples of danger. When Abraham and later Isaac find themselves in a foreign nation in the company of a wife who might appeal to the king of that region, they respond to the dangerous situation with fear and expediency (Gen 12:10–20; 20; 26:6–11). Hagar confronts danger in the wilderness in the form of possible death (Gen 16:7–14), and Lot has reason to be fearful of what might happen to him while living in a wicked city under God's judgment (Gen 19; see Sodom and Gomorrah). Sometimes the danger is more imagined than actual, as when the guilt-laden Jacob, preparing to meet Esau, fears retaliation from his brother, who is lavishly forgiving (Gen 32–33:14). The patriarch who undergoes the most dangers is Joseph—sold into slavery in a foreign country, subjected to sexual temptation and imprisoned on a false accusation.

The epic of the Exodus is built from start to finish around the danger motif. The nation itself is endangered when “there arose a new king over Egypt, who did not know Joseph” (Ex 1:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Pharaoh). Moses, the future deliverer of Israel, faces danger of extinction at his very birth (Ex 2:1–10). Once the march through the wilderness begins, the story is a veritable catalog of dangers—of starvation and lack of water, from hostile surrounding nations, from snakes and predators, from tensions within the traveling community, from God’s dramatic acts of judgment against sinners, of dying in the wilderness. The story of the conquest narrated in Joshua replaces the dangers of traveling with those of battle.

The book of Judges, being a collection of rescue stories, naturally gives us heightened images of danger. One thinks of Ehud carrying out a daring assassination in the enemy king’s own chamber, Deborah leading an army against a superior enemy, the timid Gideon pulling down an altar and later carrying out a nighttime raid against the feared Midianites, Samson entering battle as a solitary strong man instead of leading a supportive army against the Philistines. In subsequent OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history, David’s life during his years as a fugitive is a series of narrow escapes. His most troublesome danger, though, proves to be moral danger when he succumbs to the temptation of adultery and engages in a cover-up by murdering.

As one pages through the books of Kings and Chronicles, the primary impression is not the danger posed by foreign invasion but the dangers of idolatry and other forms of sin, which elicit striking displays of divine judgment. We observe Solomon’s decline into sinful idolatry and indulgence in his later years. We read haunting verdicts of a king who “did not turn from his evil way” (1 Kings 13:33), of another who “did what was evil in the sight of the Lord, and ... provoked him to jealousy” (1 Kings 14:22), and of a king who “sold himself to do what was evil in the sight of the Lord” (1 Kings 21:20). In these historical chronicles we move in a world where a lion kills a prophet who disobeys a command from God (1 Kings 13), the fire of God repeatedly destroys groups of fifty men in one fell swoop (2 Kings 1), a greedy prophet and proud king are struck instantaneously with leprosy (2 Kings 5:20—27; 2 Chron 26:16—21), and an evil king is smitten in his bowels with an incurable disease (2 Chron 21:18). The prophets who bear God’s unpopular word to wicked kings live a life of continuous danger, and characters of exemplary virtue, like Naboth, are likewise people at risk in an evil society (1 Kings 21). In the world of political power struggles that we read about here, the danger of beheading is always lurking in the background (2 Kings 10).

People living in exile are also in danger. In the literature of the exile we have stories about the Jews threatened with annihilation by Haman’s plot against them (Esther), Daniel’s three friends thrown into a fiery furnace and Daniel cast into a lions’ den (Daniel).

The same atmosphere pervades the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Jesus’ life as portrayed in the Gospels is one of intermittent threats to his life, beginning with his birth and culminating in the religious establishment’s successful plot against him in the events surrounding the crucifixion. The story of Paul and other disciples in the book of Acts is similarly one of continuous narrow escapes, punctuated by imprisonments and martyrdoms.

The stories of danger in the Bible underscore several things about this book. One is the reminder of the dangerousness of life that is the common human lot—yet another dimension of the Bible’s realism. A second is the heightened sense of watchfulness by which the Bible encourages us to live, realizing that there is danger to the soul as well as to the body. Third, although the writers of the Bible did not compose fictional accounts of danger to make their stories more gripping and entertaining, the presence of danger as a motif in biblical narrative does link the stories of the Bible with popular narrative through the centuries, and as such it provides an additional avenue toward experiencing the Bible as literature.

See also Adventure Stories; Battle Stories; Death; Enemy; Hero, Heroine; Judgment; Lion; Murder Stories; Rescue; Serpent; Warfare; Wilderness.

DANIEL, BOOK OF

Although the first half of Daniel (Dan 1–6) consists of narratives arranged in chronological order and its second half (Dan 7–12) of chronological visions, the book is unified by theme (the sovereign Lord's control over, and ultimate disposition of, human power); by its central character, Daniel himself; by structure (see Sims); and by imagery. While much of the imagery in Daniel is peculiar to the book—e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example], terrifyingly ferocious hybrid beasts (Dan 7–8; see Monster), mysterious fingers writing a king's fate on his palace wall (Dan 5), the dead apotheosized from the dust to shine as stars in the sky (Dan 12)—much of the imagery is conventional. Even images common to the Hebrew Scriptures, however, are stamped with Daniel's unique signature: “balances” represent not only evenhanded justice but also God's active determiner of judgment (Dan 5:25–30; see Scales), as in the Iliad and the Aeneid; and while the “horn”* (qeren) is still a general symbol of power and means of domination, here it takes on an independent demonic life (Dan 7–8).

Images of divine, human and animal forms pervade the whole, binding together the seemingly disparate genres, languages, characterizations and historical perspectives of the book. One of these categories is at times transfigured to another (Dan 4:19–27; 10:4–12), at times they are conflated (Dan 7:1–15; 8:19–26), and yet again the forms are discretely maintained (Dan 2:36–45; 6:18–23). Other image clusters appear—vegetation, heavenly bodies, metals, physical geography, forces of nature, garments, artifacts, food and drink—but observation shows all such imagery to be closely associated with one or more of the primary image groups: divine, human, animal. For instance, while “mountain”* and “stone”* stand separately as metaphors for divine presence and power (Dan 2:35, 45; 9:16, 20; 11:45), in Nebuchadnezzar’s dream a stone cut miraculously (“without hands”) from a mountain destroys the statue in human form that represents human kingdoms; and the stone is then transformed into a mountain, representing God’s kingdom superseding human-ruled kingdoms (Dan 2:35, 44). Later when Daniel’s dream reveals the ruler of this kingdom of God to be “one like the Son of man” (Dan 7:13–14), the transmutation has come full circle: a divine form (the stone) destroys a human form (the statue, an image parallel in its feet to the “fourth beast,” Dan 7:7–12) and then instead of a stone, a human form is divinely empowered to rule by the “Ancient of days” (Dan 7:13–14). Significantly, the human form representing earthly kingdoms in the narratives (Dan 2) is metamorphosed into animal forms in the apocalyptic visions (Dan 7–8, a bestialization foreshadowed by the humiliation of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan 4:30–33). Then in angelic narrative earthly rulers once more are represented in human forms (Dan 11).

Although Nebuchadnezzar’s kingdom is represented in his dream as a great tree cut down to a stump (Dan 4:10–12, 20–23), in life his pride leads to the humiliation of sinking from human to animal form (Dan 4:33), and his restoration to sanity and erect posture (symbolized in the dream by the sprouting of the stump, Dan 4:26) results from his penitent recognition of his insignificance compared with the sovereignty of the Most High (Dan 4:34–36).

Another illustration of this interconnectedness involves imagery describing how the destruction of human kingdoms is hastened and accomplished. Once the “great image” representing the human kingdoms of history is crushed by the stone, the * “wind” drives into oblivion its debris “like the chaff of the summer threshingfloors” (Dan 2:35 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The same image of natural force (representing divine power) brings forth from the “great sea” (human populations) four beasts (Dan 7:2–3), the fourth of which was “exceeding terrible” and “seemed greater than his fellows” (Dan 7:19, 20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is metamorphosed in the next vision into a “he-goat” whose “notable horn” is broken and multiplies into four horns “toward the four winds of heaven.” The strongest “little horn” (Dan 8:9–11, 23–25), an angel explains to Daniel, after his kingdom is “divided toward the four winds of heaven” (Dan 11:4), will “magnify himself above every god” (Dan 11:36) and finally “come to his end with none to help him” (Dan 11:45 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). While the imagery of winds dividing and ultimately destroying the forces of evil clearly represents God’s providential control, that imagery primarily supports the impression that human rulers who ignore or oppose God’s rule move ineluctably toward bestiality and defeat. Such examples as these indicate that image clusters other than those involving divine, human or bestial form are secondary and supplementary.

The pattern described runs consistently through the twelve chapters of Daniel. Divine, human and animal figures predominate, if not in number then in thematic importance, from the triumph of healthier, handsomer and wiser men resulting from a refusal to eat a diet of meat and drink not divinely prescribed (Dan 1), through the contrast between men who survive the fiery furnace and men who perish in the flames in spite of their bowing down to the idol (Dan 3), through a representation of the divine in the form of “fingers of a man’s hand” writing while Daniel reminds the idolatrous Belshazzar of Nebuchadnezzar’s humiliation in animal form for not recognizing the rule of God (Dan 5), through depiction of human kings as anomalous beasts and the “most High” God as a human figure on the throne of heaven giving universal lordship to “the Son of Man” and communicating with the human prophet by a humanely considerate angel (Dan 7–8), through Daniel’s vision of the divine in the form of a “man clothed in linen” who compassionately strengthens the prophet overwhelmed by visions of bestial, blasphemous kings (Dan 10), and finally to the solemn oath of the divine “man clothed in linen” that the time for judgment on the wicked who arrange temple sacrifices of abominable animals and the time for vindication of, and everlasting life for, God’s people is already determined, though not revealed (Dan 12).

The thematic importance of this dynamic interplay among three major categories of imagery is exemplified at the center of the book (Dan 6). The enemies of God and of his “holy people” are destroyed by the very beasts they had planned to employ in Daniel’s destruction (Dan 6:12–13). The human figure of Daniel kneeling in prayer before an open window facing Jerusalem and later raised upright and unhurt from the pit “because he believed in his God” stands out sharply against the image of the men who hated and plotted against him being thrown alive (with their families) into the den and torn apart by the very beasts they placed there to devour Daniel (Dan 6:24). The invisible deity’s presence has been made evident by his angel who “shut the lions’ mouths” (Dan 6:22), thus showing his dominion as complete “in heaven and in earth” (Dan 6:27). Here the nondiscursive truth of the imagery is expressed discursively in the words of a pagan monarch: Yahweh rules over the divine, the human and the bestial “enduring for ever ... even unto the end” (Dan 6:26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2:47; 3:28–29; 4:3, 17, 34–35). In addition, this message of the imagery is made explicit by the narrator (Dan 1:2), by Daniel himself (Dan 2:20–22, 37–38; 4:24–25; 5:18–21; 7:14, 18–21, 27), by the “watchers” in Nebuchadnezzar’s dream (Dan 4:17) and by angels (Dan 8:25; 11:45; 12:1–3, 7, 12–13).

Finally, for all the intricacy of the image patterns and their interrelationships, we remember the book of Daniel partly as a gallery of memorable narrative moments: four homespun young men, who excel the courtly sophisticates in their wisdom; a symbolic figure made of various metals and minerals; a furnace heated seven times hotter than usual, with Daniel’s three friends and a divine companion walking in it unsinged; Nebuchadnezzar’s sudden insanity as he reveled in his proud achievements, followed by his eating grass like the ox and having his nails grow like birds’ claws; a supernatural hand writing on the wall at a royal feast; Daniel’s surviving a night in a lions’ den.

See also Apocalypse, Genre of; Apocalyptic Visions of the Future.

Bibliography. D. N. Fewell, Circle of Sovereignty: A Story of Stories in Daniel 1–6 (Sheffield: Almond, 1988); P. A. Porter, Metaphors and Monsters: A Literary-Critical Study of Daniel 7 and 8 (Coneictanea Biblica, OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Series 20; Uppsala: CWK Gleerup, 1983); J. H. Sims, A Comparative Literary Study of Daniel and Revelation: Shaping the End (Lewiston, NY: Mellen, 1995).

DARE.

See Bet, Dare.

DARKNESS

Darkness has no existence by itself, being definable simply as an absence of light. It is a physical and spiritual reality as well as an apt symbol for some of the profoundest human experiences. With approximately two hundred references, darkness is a major actor in the biblical drama. The book of Job, a vision of calamity and despair, is a small anthology of descriptions of darkness, with three dozen instances.

Darkness stands out from virtually all other literary images, which are finally ambivalent (having both good and bad manifestations), because it is uniformly negative in its import. The best way to organize the biblical imagery of darkness is first to note what it represents in itself and then to observe what God does in regard to it.

The Cosmic Conflict. The primeval mind envisions life and even the cosmos as a conflict between light and darkness, viewed as combatants struggling for control of the world (see Cosmology). The first biblical references to darkness hint at such a picture. We read that “the earth was a formless void and darkness covered the face of the deep” (Gen 1:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). God’s first creative act is to produce light and separate it from darkness, with overtones of light’s conquering darkness (Gen 1:4–5). It took God to set a “boundary between light and darkness” (Job 26:10). The cosmos is kept intact only by the governing power of God, and one way in which the prophets envision a coming apocalyptic judgment is to picture it as a return to the primeval chaos in which the earth is “waste and void” and the heavens have “no light” (Jer 4:23; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 5:30).

Throughout the Bible, darkness is an implied contrast to light, regardless of whether the darkness is physical or symbolic. In fact, sixty verses present light and darkness as a contrasting pair, and being brought out of darkness into light is a major biblical image of redemption.

Physical Darkness. Darkness as a physical feature of daily living accounts for a large cluster of biblical passages. At the neutral end of the spectrum, nightly darkness simply signals the end of the working day for humans and the active time for nocturnal animals (Ps 104:20). The palpable quality of darkness in a pre-electrical era is suggested by the way in which the writer to Hebrews lists darkness in a catalog of things “that can be touched” (Heb 12:18). The connotations of this palpable nightly darkness are usually sinister. Darkness is variously associated with groping to find one’s way (Job 5:14; 15:25), inability to progress down a pathway (Job 19:8), a house being broken into (Job 24:16), undesigned *“terrors” (Job 24:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 15:12), a place “where evildoers may hide themselves” (Job 34:22), the wicked shooting at the innocent from ambush (Ps 11:2), “the haunts of violence” (Ps 74:20), stumbling (Prov 4:19) and gloom (Is 58:10; Joel 2:22). The cloak of darkness makes it the natural time for adulterous adventure: it is “in the twilight, in the evening, at the time of night and darkness” that the “young man without sense” commits adultery with the wily seductress (Prov 7:7, 9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In short, darkness keeps some very bad company, made all the more devious by virtue of the concealment of evil activity from ordinary view. Paul provides an apt summary of this side of darkness when he commands Christians to “take no part in the unfruitful works of darkness, but instead expose them. For it is shameful even to mention what such people do secretly” (Eph 5:11–12).

Figurative Meanings. Based on its physical properties, darkness becomes a rich source of metaphor for spiritual realities. If light symbolizes understanding, darkness represents ignorance (Ps 82:5), folly (Eccles 2:13–14), a silencing of prophetic revelation (Mic 3:6), the state of the human mind unilluminated by God’s revelation (2 Pet 1:19), falsehood (1 Jn 1:6) and the loss of walking in God’s truth “because the darkness has brought on blindness” (1 Jn 2:11 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). If light symbolizes good, darkness is the corresponding image for evil people “who forsake the paths of uprightness to walk in the ways of darkness” (Prov 2:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 4:19). In Jesus’ mysterious picture of the eye as “the lamp of the body,” physical blindness becomes a metaphor for the lost state (Mt 6:22–23; Lk 11:34–36).

On the logic of night bringing the day’s activity to its cessation, darkness becomes an image for death or the grave (Job 10:21–22; Ps 88:12). Darkness is the leading image in Job’s poem cursing the day of his birth and expressing his wish for death (Job 3). The cessation that darkness brings to human activity makes it the natural associate of the prison and dungeon (Ps 107:10, 14; Is 42:7; 49:9). Even if a literal prison is not in view, the paralysis that darkness brings to human activity makes it seem prisonlike, and eight biblical verses give us a picture of “sitting” in darkness.

Light is the generic biblical image for divine favor and human prosperity, and darkness is accordingly the absence of these (Ps 88:6). Thus Job pictures his erstwhile prosperity as a time when God’s lamp shone over his head and “by his light I walked through darkness,” this being the time “when I was in my prime, when the friendship of God was upon my tent” (Job 29:3–4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Correspondingly, the fall of the wicked from prosperity is pictured as a time when “the light is dark in their tent” and when the wicked “are thrust from light into darkness” (Job 18:6, 18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Similarly when the psalmist prays for misfortune to befall his enemies, he asks that “their way be dark and slippery” (Ps 35:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Amos declares the sobering message that the complacent people who speak glibly of the coming day of the Lord will find that “it is darkness, not light” (Amos 5:18, 20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Darkness as a Spiritual Force. The power of darkness in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is so vivid that it is more than a symbol, becoming nothing less than a spiritual reality. Jesus himself spoke of “the power of darkness” (Lk 22:53), and Paul spoke of how Christians do not battle against physical enemies but against “the cosmic powers of this present darkness, against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly places” (Eph 6:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The context into which darkness is here placed is the cosmic spiritual battle between good and evil, God and Satan. “What partnership is there between righteousness and lawlessness?” Paul asks. “Or what fellowship is there between light and darkness? What agreement does Christ have with Beliar?” (2 Cor 6:14–15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The world itself is divided into “children of light” and children “of the night or of darkness” (1 Thess 5:5). The ultimate power of darkness was manifested with the temporary triumph of evil as Christ hung dying on the cross—a triumph of evil that took the form of a three-hour darkness that left people awestruck (Mt 27:45; Mk 15:33; Lk 23:44).

Summary. Considered in itself darkness it thus a strongly negative image in human experience. It is physically oppressive; it is the natural environment for a host of evil happenings; and it is associated with death, imprisonment and ultimate evil. Darkness is in principle associated with evil, opposed to God's purposes of order and goodness in the universe and in human society. The question then becomes what God does with regard to darkness, and whether, in fact, he is lord over it.

God's Power Over Darkness. It is important to dissociate the biblical imagery of darkness and light from any conception of dualism, as in the religion of Zoroaster. Darkness in the Bible is not equal in power to light. The occasional impression that it is equal is a result of the realism of the Bible about the power of evil in the world. However darkness exists only within God's control. God knows "the place of darkness," even though people do not (Job 38:19). He also "knows what is in the darkness" (Dan 2:22). People who think that the Lord does not see what they do in the dark are mistaken (Ezek 8:12); indeed, "there is no gloom or deep darkness where evildoers may hide themselves" (Job 34:22). The speaker in Psalm 139 admits defeat in his imaginary escape from God into darkness with the acknowledgement that "even the darkness is not dark to you [i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , God]; the night is as bright as the day, for darkness is as light to you" (Ps 139:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In fact God is even pictured as the creator of darkness: "I form light and create darkness" (Is 45:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

God's power over darkness is evident in the fact that he uses it to achieve his purposes. He uses darkness to cover himself from human view, for example. In OT [OT OT. Old Testament] theophanies the concealing or covering quality of darkness makes it part of the means of God's appearance. When God performs the ritual of "cutting the covenant" with Abraham, for example, "when the sun had gone down and it was dark, a smoking fire pot and a flaming torch” (images of God’s appearance) passes between the divided carcasses (Gen 15:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In other words God himself is cloaked from human view by the veil of darkness. When God appears on Mt. Sinai, he is shrouded in awe-inspiring darkness (Ex 20:21; Deut 4:11; 5:22–23). When he appears as a storm God, darkness is prominent in the appearance (2 Sam 22:10, 12; Ps 18:9, 11; 97:2). God is even said to “dwell in thick darkness” (1 Kings 8:12; 2 Chron 6:1), a transcendent spiritual being veiled from human view. On the premise that a mortal cannot see God and live (Ex 33:20), God’s veiling of himself in darkness is an act of mercy toward the human race.

God also uses darkness to bring judgment upon evildoers. At the time of the exodus, the ninth plague was a three-day darkness so intense that the darkness could be “felt” (Ex 10:21–23). When the Egyptians pursued the fleeing Israelites, God not only drowned the Egyptians but also used darkness to barricade them from the Israelites (Josh 24:7). In the apocalyptic vision of coming judgment, God is portrayed as sending darkness on the earth as a form of punishment (Is 13:10; 60:2; Ezek 32:7–8; Joel 2:2, 31; Amos 8:9; Zeph 1:15; Rev 16:10). When God predicts that he will “execute acts of judgment,” the imagery is that of the day being dark (Ezek 30:18–19) and of his pursuing “his enemies into darkness” (Nahum 1:8). Darkness even becomes a designation for hell itself (Mt 8:12; 22:13; 25:30; 2 Pet 2:4, 17; Jude 6, 13). In each of these passages, God is emphatically the one who sends disobedient creatures into the darkness of hell.

Deliverance From Darkness. The greatest of God’s acts in regard to darkness, though, is his spiritual rescue of people from darkness through the work of Christ. God himself “is light and in him there is no darkness at all” (1 Jn 1:5). Christ is a light that “shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not overcome it” (Jn 1:5). Whoever follows Jesus “will never walk in darkness but will have the light of life” (Jn 8:12). Jesus came “as light into the world,” so that everyone who believes in him “should not remain in the darkness” (Jn 12:46). In a similar vein Paul writes that believers in Christ once “were darkness, but now in the Lord you are light” (Eph 5:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Whether as a symbol or as a spiritual principle, darkness is the thing from which God in Christ delivers people. It thus figures in some of the great images of redemption that we find in the Bible. With the coming of Jesus “the people who sat in darkness have seen a great light, and for those who sat in the region and shadow of death light has dawned” (Mt 4:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 1:70). To escape the lost state requires nothing less than a divine rescue mission: Christ “has rescued us from the power of darkness and transferred us into the kingdom of his beloved Son” (Col 1:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Those who believe in Christ as savior are “a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God’s own people, ... called out of darkness into his marvelous light” (1 Pet 2:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). For people who are God’s children, “the darkness is passing away and the true light is already shining” (1 Jn 2:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Black; Blindness; Chaos; Lamp; Light; Night.

Bibliography. E. R. Achtemeier, “Jesus Christ, the Light of the World: The Biblical Understanding of Light and Darkness,” Interpretation 17 (1962) 439–49.

DAUGHTER

Women in Scripture are nearly always identified as the daughter of their father. Many significant daughters are only named as such: consider the daughters of Lot (Gen 19), Pharaoh (Ex 2:5; Heb 11:24), Jephthah (Judg 11:34ff), Job (Job 42:15), Herodias (Mt 14:6), Jairus (Mk 5:23) and the Syrophenician woman (Mt 15:22). Others are named but only known for the deeds to which they had access through their father: Rebekah, whose parents' relation to Abraham brought his servant to her in search of a wife for Isaac (Gen 24); Michal, daughter of Saul, who married David (1 Sam 18:17); Rachel and Leah, daughters of the crafty Laban, who became Jacob's wives (Gen 29). We recall also those who acted as daughters: Ruth to Naomi (Ruth 4:15), Esther to Mordecai (Esther 2:7). Like a son, a daughter is a reflection of the parents; in turn, her individual character casts a positive or negative shade on the future of their name.

A daughter depends on a parent's provision, and with few exceptions a daughter is treasured by her parents. Jephthah mourns the vow that dooms his daughter (Judg 11:35); Job's beautiful daughters are each given an inheritance (Job 42:15); Jairus and the Syrophenician woman frantically beseech Jesus on behalf of their daughters (Mt 15:22; Mk 5:23). Jesus suggests the treasured, privileged status of a crippled woman by calling her the "daughter of Abraham" (Lk 13:16).

Commonly parents prize and prioritize a daughter's safety. The prophets typify a daughter as "tender and delicate" (Is 47:1), "a lady of the kingdom" (Lam 2:15) and as "jealously possessed" (Jer 14:17). A virgin daughter is considered vulnerable, and any violation of her is a calamity (Lam 2:13). Along with sons, daughters are often expected to reap the benefits of their parents' righteousness (Ezek 14:20). At times a daughter's future hinges on a parent's desires or needs: Lot and the Benjamite offer their daughters to strange men; Michal becomes David's wife as a battle reward from Saul; Herodias's daughter is made to dance before Herod; Leah and Rachel wait on Laban's plans. A daughter receives an inheritance, good or bad, from her parents.

A daughter determines the honor of her parents by her action. Parents value daughters in part because their provision is reciprocated in future dependence that they have upon her. Though not responsible to carry on the family name, daughters participate in the advancement of their father's name by behaving with dignity, preserving their purity until a suitable or even advantageous marriage can be arranged. The prominent negative example is Lot's daughters, who behave shamefully in an effort to preserve the family name after they are cut off from their culture, alone with their father on the mountain (Gen 19:31). By contrast both Esther and Ruth behave as daughters to their guardians in a crisis situation, and by their prudent actions they preserve their family name. By virtue of the fact that they are not actually daughters of their guardians, they are included in the list of great heroes of a nation as her daughters. Thus the link with the idiomatic usage of daughter begins. Esther represents the nation of Israel in her courageous appearance before Xerxes, and Ruth is grafted into the family of Israel and is the great-grandmother of David, the great king.

These aspects of the image of a daughter help inform our understanding of the idiomatic use of the image in the prophetic writings. Often the word daughter is found in expressions such as "daughter of Zion" (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 1:8; Jer 4:31; Mic 4:10; Mt 21:5), "daughter of Sidon" (Is 23:12) and "daughter of Babylon" (Jer 50:42). This Hebrew idiom reflects a double metaphor common in the culture of the ancient Near East: a capital city was personified as a woman, and the inhabitants of that city collectively as her "daughter." A pagan city was personified by a female goddess whose husband was the local patron deity; Zion or Jerusalem remained distinct as she whose husband was the one true God, Yahweh. During times of war when a city was overrun and its population exiled, the city was considered to be a barren woman, rejected by her husband-deity (Is 54:1). Thus her daughters, the collective inhabitants, depended on her for identity but also shaped her future by their actions. For instance, Isaiah proclaims to “barren” Jerusalem, “Rejoice, O barren woman!” (Is 54:1) and prophesies a return of the inhabitants to that city and an unprecedented future glory for it. Because of Isaiah’s use of these idioms, Jesus fulfills prophecy by addressing Jerusalem as “daughter of Zion” (Mt 21:5), and the apostle Paul quotes Isaiah 54:1 and announces in Galatians 4:26 that Jerusalem above is “free” and that she is the “mother” of Christians.

In the historical situation of conquest and exile, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets judge or bless given cities from the view of the daughter image. Isaiah announces doom on the population of Sidon: “You will exult no more, O crushed virgin daughter of Sidon; rise, cross over to Cyprus—even there you will find no rest” (Is 23:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jeremiah proclaims woes on the Egyptians: “Go up to Gilead and get balm, O Virgin Daughter of Egypt! But you multiplied remedies in vain; there is no healing for you” (Jer 46:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Lord says to his people through the prophet Zechariah, “Shout and be glad, O daughter of Zion. For I am coming, and I will live among you” (Zech 2:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This follows his prophecy of the end of the exile, “Come, O Zion! Escape, you who live in the daughter of Babylon” (Zech 2:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God’s people living in exile in Babylon with the inhabitants of that city remain distinct as the citizens of Zion, she who belongs to Yahweh. These few examples demonstrate the idiomatic link between a daughter-people and a mother-city.

Perhaps the “daughters of Jerusalem” from Solomon’s Song summarize the daughter image best. Heirs to the glorious promised inheritance of that city, the friends of the bride are repeatedly admonished to let their actions preserve the great blessing bestowed upon them: “I adjure you, O Daughters of Jerusalem, do not arouse or awaken love until it is ready” (Song 8:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The practical parental nature of this advice brings the image of a daughter to life. Whether literal or allegorical in its interpretation, this passage demonstrates the image of a daughter as one who receives great blessing and is responsible to let her actions preserve the honor of that blessing.

See also Son; Virgin; Woman, Images of.

DAVID

Mentioned a thousand times in the Bible, David is the biblical man for all seasons, the most complex and many-sided human character in Scripture. Simply to name the roles that David fills suggests why he has inspired so many images of him, both within the Bible itself and in subsequent traditions. David was variously shepherd, fugitive, politician, king, poet, musician, prophet, warrior, friend (the Jonathan story), lover, father, sinner (adulterer and murderer), penitent and “type” of Christ. David is unique among biblical characters by virtue of being fully known to us both from the outside (as subject of narrative writing) and from the inside (as writer of lyric poems). While many postbiblical exegetical and literary traditions take extravagant liberties with biblical data, the traditions stemming from David can all find a biblical basis. This includes the Puritan image of David the reformer—the true child of God resisting the assaults of a tyrannical king (Saul), beset by slanderers and enemies; the champion who fought against God's enemies; the king who reformed the nation and established worship on a holy foundation.

The role in which David is best known to the Western imagination is that of boy hero and giant killer. When David kills Goliath he becomes an instant public hero, a civic liberator providing possible inspiration for fictional heroes following in his wake from Beowulf to Jack (of the beanstalk). To this day we read in the newspapers about someone's pulling off a "little David" act in sports or politics, or about a "David and Goliath" contest. The image of David the warrior, of course, expands into his adult career, as epitomized by the women's chant that "Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands" (1 Sam 18:7; 21:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). David's success in expanding the territory of Israel was unequalled in the annals of Israelite history.

David's career as a national hero was preceded by his career as an underdog. The youngest son, belittled by his older siblings (1 Sam 17:28–29), David was considered so unlikely a candidate among Jesse's sons to be anointed as the future king that he had to be summoned from tending the sheep after the other brothers had been passed over (1 Sam 16:6–11). Subsequently he had a career as fugitive, fleeing from the wrathful Saul, living continuously on the edge. There is even a touch of David as rebel and desperado. Jesus cited David as a precedent for disobeying the levitical laws on the basis of the time David ate consecrated bread to feed his hungry men (Mt 12:3–4; Lk 6:3–4). Then there is David the political strategist. Even after he was anointed king of Judah, David had to undertake a long process of consolidating his power until he eventually became king of the entire nation (2 Sam 2–5).

The facets of David's character that render him most lifelike, however, appear less in his heroic moments than in his times of error and failure. These are the stories that are for the most part edited out of childhood Sunday school curricula, such as the affair with Bathsheba and the taking of the national census (2 Sam 11; 24). One of the most noteworthy features of the David story is that it begins with heroic promise but becomes a story of crime and punishment. In his career as a sinner, moreover, David becomes a classic case of one sin leading to another, as he degenerates from adulterer to murderer. Although David responds to his sin by being the ideal penitent, his subsequent life is dominated by family discord and political troubles. David the failure is the common person's David—a flawed figure in whom readers can see themselves.

In the later phases of his life David emerges as a tortured parent. He suffers greatly because of his sons, yet curiously we never see him warning them about the evils of excessive ambition and sexual indulgence. Possibly he was too concerned about losing face before them to instruct them as effectively as he could have, using his own experiences as object lessons. For anyone familiar with Shakespeare's King Lear, it is impossible not to read the story of David's later life without being aware of the parallels. In both stories personal failings produce tragic results: the collapse of nations and the disintegration of families in the form of children rebelling against a father and siblings preying on each other.

NT [NT NT. New Testament] references to David present him both as an ancestor and as a type of Christ. David freed Israel from the terror of literal bondage to Goliath and the Philistines; Christ freed all people from spiritual bondage to Satan and death. David was a prophet and king; so was Christ. God established a covenant with David promising him an eternal kingdom (2 Sam 7:12–16) which was ultimately Christ's kingdom. All of the Gospels identify Christ as the son of David; Matthew and Luke do so formally with complete genealogies. If it seems difficult to consider a man with David's large-scale failures as a type of Christ, one may return to the Lord's words to Samuel as he prepared to anoint Saul's successor: "For the Lord sees not as man sees; man looks on the outward appearance, but the Lord looks on the heart" (1 Sam 16:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The complexity of David evident in postbiblical traditions is present within the Bible itself, where various writers give complementary (but decidedly divergent) images of David. In the two books of Samuel the life of David is interpreted as a literary tragedy. Until the Bathsheba and Uriah debacle, David's career is one of heroic success. The providential theme is evident in God's anointing of David as king and in repeated references to God's giving David success; furthermore, the chronicler selects material for inclusion that idealizes David. After the Bathsheba incident, a pattern of judgment for sin dominates the action. By contrast the writers of Kings and Chronicles omit references to Bathsheba and Uriah, select for inclusion material that highlights David's religious and military achievements, and repeatedly regard David as the norm of a godly king by which to judge evil kings (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Kings 9:4; 11:4, 6; 15:3).

Putting these two traditions together gives us the right slant for interpreting David's life, which was indeed both heroic and tragic. While the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] histories record David's many achievements and his occasional failures, the Psalms reveal David's deep understanding of God's forgiveness and the joy of reconciliation with him (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 32).

Paradoxically, therefore, the figure of David is a figure of hope for humanity: no matter how deep a person descends and regardless of how tragic the circumstances of life become, something can be made of life. The David of the Psalms, beset by trouble and guilt, is the very touchstone of spiritual trust in God. As a respected leader who gave in to sexual sin and who mismanaged child rearing, David is someone whose story is reenacted in every generation. Yet he stands as a tribute to divine grace, so that even such a person can be declared “a man after God’s own heart” (1 Sam 13:14; Acts 13:22).

See also Bathsheba; Christ; Chronicles, Books of; Hero, Heroine; Jerusalem; King; Samuel, Books of.

Bibliography. W. Breueggemann, David’s Truth in Israel’s History and Imagination (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); R-J. Frontain and J. Wojcik, eds., The David Myth in Western Literature (West Lafayette, IN: Purdue University Press, 1980); D. M. Gunn, The Story of King David (JSOTSup 6; Sheffield: JSOT, 1978).

DAVIDIC COVENANT.

See Covenant.

DAY, DAY OF THE LORD

The Day of the Lord and related ideas occur most frequently in the prophets, the parables and sayings of Jesus, the book of Revelation, and other portions of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] dealing with the end times. Images and ideas associated with the Day of the Lord can also be found in the historical books of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and in the Psalms.

The term Day of the Lord is sometimes used by the prophets to refer to any specific period of time in which the God of Israel intervenes in human affairs to save and judge (Is 13:6; Ezek 13:5; Amos 5:18). In many cases the day was named after the group of human beings that was the target of God's intervention. We find references, for example, to "the day of Midian," (Is 9:4) and "the day of Egypt" (Ezek 30:9). Many times the day is named for what God was to do or what was to happen: "day of trouble" (Ezek 7:7), "day of rebuke" (Hos 1:9), "day of punishment" (Is 10:3), "day of vengeance" (Is 63:4), "day of doom," (Jer 51:2), "day of darkness" (Joel 2:2) or "day of the Lord's anger" (Zeph 2:2). Often when a prophet has already begun to describe a specific series of God's acts, he will continue his description with a reference to "that day" (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 11:10; 10:20; 24:21; 30:23; Jer 25:33; 29:16; 30:7; 48:41; Mic 3:4; 4:7; Zech 2:11; 9:16; 14:13).

In some prophetic texts "the day of the Lord" refers to an event so cataclysmic that it ends an age of the world (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Joel 2:28—3:21; Zech 14:1—21). This usage passed over into the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , where the Day of the Lord refers to God's judging action when Christ returns at the end of the age (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Thess 5:2; 2 Thess 2:2; 2 Pet 3:10).

It is most commonly believed that the Day of the Lord has its roots in Israel's holy war experiences. Certainly images of warfare predominate in those passages dealing with the Day of the Lord. Frequently there are descriptions of armies marching to the decisive battle, including their gathering (Is 5:26; Zeph 3:8; Zech 14:2; Rev 16:14; 19:19); their equipment and weaponry (Is 22:5—7; Jer 46:3—4; Ezek 38:4—6; Joel 3:10; Rev 19:1—14); the sights, sounds and smells of the armies on the march and rushing to the attack (Is 5:28; Jer 47:3; Joel 2:4—5); and the visceral fear and anguish of those facing battle (Is 13:7—8; 21:3; Jer 30:5—6; 49:24; Ezek 7:17; 30:4, 9). Graphic images of suffering, death, destruction and dislocation usually follow (Is 3:25—4:1; 10:4; Jer 25:33; 49; 26; 51:3—4; Lam 1:3, 5; Ezek 24:20; 30:4; 39:3—4; Obad 11—12, 14; Zech 14:2).

These climactic events were given the name Day of the Lord because God's personal action was believed to be the decisive factor in the course of events. His personal involvement was signified by such phrases as "the day of [the Lord's] vengeance" (Is 34:8), "the day of [the Lord's] anger" (Is 13:13; Lam 1:12, 21—22; 2:1; Zeph 2:2—3), "the day of the Lord's sacrifice" (Zeph 1:8), "the day of the wrath of the Lord" (Ezek 7:19), "the day I punish Israel" (Amos 3:14), "the day when I take from them their stronghold" (Ezek 24:25), "the day that I cleanse you" (Ezek 33:33), "the day I visit them" (Jer 27:22), "the day that I make them my jewels" (Mal 3:17) and "the day I rise up for plunder" (Zeph 3:8).

In both Testaments a variety of images for God's appearance among people is employed to express God's personal involvement in the events of the Day of the Lord. Most frequently God's appearance and action are described in terms of cosmic catastrophes, including raging fires (Is 10:16; 38:22; Joel 2:30; Amos 1:14; Zeph 3:8; 2 Pet 3:7, 10; Rev 16:8), whirlwinds and storms (Is 28:2; 30:30; Jer 25:32; Ezek 38:22; Zech 9:14; Rev 16:21), shaking of the heavens and the earth (Is 2:10, 19; 13:13; 23:11; 24:18—20; Ezek 38:19; Hag 2:21—22; Joel 3:16; Rev 6:12—14; 16:17—20), floods (Is 28:2; Jer 47:1—7) and the darkening of the heavenly bodies, either by clouds or eclipses or by some unexplained phenomenon (Is 5:30; 13:10; 24:23; Ezek 32:7—8; Joel 2:15; 3:15; Amos 8:9; Zeph 1:15; Mk 13:24 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Mt 24:29 and Lk 21:25; Acts 2:20; Rev 6:12). The poetic description of God's personal intervention on behalf of Israel in Psalm 18 is heavily indebted to this tradition of theophanic imagery.

The blowing of a trumpet is often mentioned either as a signal of God's appearing or as a signal/alarm that God's work in judgment or salvation is about to begin (Is 27:13; Ezek 7:14; Hos 5:8; Zeph 1:16; Zech 9:14; Mt 24:31; 1 Cor 15:52; 1 Thess 4:16). The blowing of trumpets during the siege of Jericho (Josh 6:6—27) probably gives us an idea of the historical background for the trumpet image. It is probably also appropriate to read the description of God's appearing on Mt. Sinai (Ex 19:16—20) in light of its associations with the images employed to describe the Day of the Lord.

Since God's actions are irresistible, there is no escape for those against whom he acts. Several passages describe a divine process of elimination in which God employs several methods against his enemies, and every one of them is eventually destroyed by one method or other. The combinations include fear, pit and snare (Is 24:18; Jer 48:43—44); lion, bear and snake (Amos 5:19); and sword, pestilence and famine (Ezek 7:15). The significance of the triad of seven-fold judgments (seals, trumpets and bowls) in Revelation 6—12 and 16 may be at least partly the inescapability of God's judgment.

The inescapability of God's actions may also be indicated by describing their overwhelming power and scope. Isaiah 2:12—21 pictures a destruction so universal that people will hide in caves. Revelation 6:14—16 adds the scene of people vainly calling the mountains to cover them in order to escape from God's wrath. Other passages describe an enemy attack so swift and so far-reaching that the victims have no time or place for flight (Is 10:3—4; 20:6; Jer 25:35; 46:6; 50:24; Amos 2:14—16; Mk 13:14—20 [Mt 24:15—22, Lk 21:20—24 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]]). Several NT [NT NT. New Testament] authors compare the coming of the Day of the Lord to the coming of a thief in the night, indicating that God's actions will be inescapable because they will catch the unprepared by surprise (Mt 24:43—44 [Lk 12:39—40 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]]; 1 Thess 5:2; 2 Pet 3:10; Rev 16:14—15). Similarly, other parables compare the return of Jesus to a master returning to his home unexpectedly after a long journey (Mt 24:45—51 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Lk 12:42—46).

Invariably the Day of the Lord is associated with acts of violent judgment. It is not surprising, then, to find the biblical authors using images of great slaughter and desolation to describe the aftermath of God's action. Among the images commonly employed are those of large numbers of bodies falling on the battlefield or in the streets (Is 34:2—3; Jer 25:33; 49:26; 51:3—4; Lam 2:21; Ezek 24:21; 30:7; 39:11—16; Amos 8:3), large quantities of blood being shed (Is 34:5—7; Jer 46:10; Ezek 32:6; Zeph 1:17), the pouring out of human blood as a winepress squeezes juice out of pressed grapes (Is 63:1—3; Lam 1:15; Joel 3:13; Rev 14:19; 19:15), the feeding of carrion animals on masses of corpses (Ezek 32:6; 39:4; Rev 19:17—18, 21) and the desolation of buildings and lands or their occupation by wild animals (Is 23:1; 24:3—12; 34:8—17; Jer 18:16; 46:19; 50:26; Ezek 30:7; Joel 2:3; Rev 18:2).

Biblical authors also attempt to impress on their audiences the emotional impact of the Day of the Lord by describing the reactions of those who experience God's activity. For those who suffer under God's judgment, the reaction is usually described in terms of traditional ancient Near Eastern mourning practices, such as wearing sackcloth, sitting on the ground, wailing loudly and throwing dust or ashes on oneself (Is 3:18—24; 22:12; 24:7—9; Jer 25:34; 47:2; Lam 1:2; 2:10—11; Ezek 7:18; Amos 8:10; Zeph 1:8—9; Mt 8:12; 22:13; Rev 18:9—18).

Finally, the Day of the Lord will be a day in which the oppressed people of God will experience deliverance. This is often described in terms roughly opposite to those describing God's judgment, including victory in battle (Obad 17–18; Zech 9:15; Mal 4:4; 2 Thess 2:8; Rev 19:19–21); reoccupation of territory (Is 35:8–10; Obad 19–21; Zeph 3:18–20; Zech 14:10–11; Rev 21:22–27); replenishment of waterways, fields, crops and domestic animals (Is 25:6; 29:17; Hos 2:21–22; Joel 2:18–24; 3:18; Zech 9:17; 14:8; Rev 22:1–2); rebuilding of dwellings (Amos 9:14; Rev 21:2, 9–21) and rejoicing (Is 29:19; Zeph 3:14; Rev 21:4).

One of the most vexing problems for a student of the Bible is how to understand the varied images associated with the Day of the Lord. This puzzlement is at least partly due to the great flexibility and variety of uses to which the biblical authors put these images. For example, scholars still debate whether the description of a locust plague in the book of Joel is figurative language for invasion by a human army or whether the battle imagery in the book is figurative language for the devastation caused by locusts. What are we to understand by the locusts from the bottomless pit in Revelation 9:1–11? The description of the battle of Aijalon in Joshua 10:1–15 seems to employ images associated with the Day of the Lord in a straightforward historical sense. Yet some of the same language is used in a highly figurative way in Psalm 18.

As the disproportionately fewer number of NT [NT NT. New Testament] references in this article indicates, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] writers tend to use less of the traditional imagery associated with the Day of the Lord and speak more straightforwardly about a coming universal judgment. Perhaps this is a clue that at least the images most frequently used by the prophets had become stock metaphors for God's action in judging and saving.

See also Apocalyptic Visions of the Future; Divine Warrior; End Times; Judgment.

Bibliography. G. B. Caird, The Language and Imagery of the Bible (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997 [1980]); G. von Rad, "The Origin of the Concept of the Day of Yahweh," JSS 4 (1959) 97–108; D. Stuart, "The Sovereign's Day of Conquest," BASOR [BASOR BASOR. Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research] 221 (1976) 159–64.

DAY OF YAHWEH.

See Day, Day Of The Lord.

DEAF, DEAFNESS

Literal physical deafness is not mentioned often in the Scriptures. Most of the references to deafness are figurative. Deafness symbolizes spiritual stubbornness or willful refusal to hear and obey the word of God (Jer 5:21; Ezek 12:2) and is caused by sin (Ps 38:13, 18). Israel is portrayed as a servant with ears, but not hearing and obeying her Lord (Is 42:18–20; see Obedience). The prophetic role is pictured as calling the Israelites to hear the word of God because their sins have deafened their ears (Is 43:8). The Israelites in turn are pictured standing with their hands over their ears, refusing to hear the prophets even while judgment falls on them (Zech 7:11–14). They are deaf like the idols they serve (Deut 4:28; Ps 115:4–8; Rev 9:20).

Sometimes spiritual deafness is pictured as being imposed by God (Deut 29:4; Is 6:9–10), which is a figurative way of saying that those who continually stop their ears to God's word are confirmed in that state. The restoration of Israel from exile is partly symbolized by the spiritually deaf hearing and obeying the word of God (Is 29:18; 35:5).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , deafness and other infirmities are at times attributed to demon possession (Mk 9:14–29) or judgments from God for sin (Jn 9:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 4:11). As Jesus proclaimed the word of salvation, his healing of the deaf and people with other infirmities symbolized the defeat of sin and disease (Mk 7:31–37), fulfilled prophecy (Is 35:5) and proof that he was the Messiah (Mt 11:5; Lk 7:22).

Deafness also symbolizes the refusal of the Jews to accept Jesus as their Messiah (Acts 28:26–27; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 6:9–10), especially the crowds who hear the parables of Jesus amidst their struggle for food and power or their misdirected messianic fervor, but without spiritual desire to know and obey God (Mt 13:14–16; Mk 4:10–12; Lk 8:10).

See also Blind, Blindness; Ear, Hearing; Disease and Healing; Idolatry; Obedience.

Bibliography. C. D. C. Howard, “Blindness and Deafness,” DJG [DJG DJG. Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels] 81–82.

DEATH

Death is the greatest of humankind’s enemies, a relentless Grim Reaper that shows no respect for age or wealth. It robs parents of a precious child, leaving them to mourn their loss for the rest of their lives. It deprives wives and children of their breadwinner and protector, leaving them vulnerable in a hostile world. It takes away an aging spouse, leaving a gray-haired senior citizen without a lifelong companion and closest friend. Sometimes it arrives suddenly and unannounced; at other times it approaches slowly, as if stalking or taunting its helpless victim. Sometimes it hauls away its victims en masse; on other occasions it targets individuals. It uses a variety of methods and weapons, but only rarely does it capture its prey without inflicting pain and terror. Power, beauty and wealth can usually overcome any obstacle, but in death they meet their match. As the eighteenth-century poet Thomas Gray wrote, “The boast of heraldry, the pomp of pow’r, And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave, Awaits alike the inevitable hour; The paths of glory lead but to the grave" (Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard, stanza 9).

In the ancient Near Eastern world in which the Bible originated, death was called "the land of no return" and was viewed as an inescapable underworld prison. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] pictures the realm of death (or Sheol) as being under the earth, comparing its entrance to a deep pit (Ps 88:4–6). Those who descend into this subterranean region are cut off from God's mighty deeds and from the worshipping community of faith (Ps 6:5; 30:9; 88:10–12; Is 38:18). With rare and only temporary exceptions (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Sam 28:12–15), a trip to the underworld is a one-way journey (2 Sam 12:23).

The Canaanite myths picture death as a god who greedily and continually demands human flesh to devour. One text depicts death as having "a lip to the earth, a lip to the heavens ... and a tongue to the stars" (Gibson, 69). Death compares his appetite to that of lions and then boasts, "If it is in very truth my desire to consume 'clay' [human flesh], then in truth by the handfuls I must eat it, whether my seven portions [a full, complete amount] are already in the bowl or whether Nahar [the river god who transports victims from the land of the living to the underworld] has to mix the cup" (Gibson, 68–69).

The Bible does not deify death, but it does personify it as a hungry (Is 5:14; Hab 2:5) and crafty enemy that uses snares to trap victims (Ps 18:4–5) and sneaks through windows to grab children (Jer 9:21). Death is "the last enemy" (1 Cor 15:28), whose fatal sting is sin (1 Cor 15:55–56; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Hos 13:14), an inescapable (Ps 89:48; Eccles 8:8), terrifying (Heb 2:15) and relentless (Song 8:6) foe with which no one can strike a lasting bargain (Is 28:15, 18).

Perhaps the most striking images of death are to be found in the concluding chapter of Ecclesiastes. Qoheleth, the main speaker of the book, has treated death as a major theme. Death renders everything in life meaningless. In Ecclesiastes 12:1–5 he likens the aging process to an encroaching storm. The deteriorating body is represented by a house that, along with its inhabitants, slowly falls apart. Although this is debated, it is hard not to recognize some nearly allegorical connections between the inhabitants of the house and body parts. For instance, when the text says that the grinders cease because they are few, it is hard not to recognize an allusion to teeth. In verses 6 and 7 death is likened to the destruction of precious items. A silver cord is snapped; a golden bowl is smashed.

Despite death's great power and hostility, it is ultimately subject to God's sovereignty. Ironically, death finds its origin in God, who decreed that death would be the ultimate penalty for disobedience to his revealed command (Gen 2:17; 3:19; see also Ps 90:3–11). When the first couple ate the forbidden fruit and rebelled against God, death accompanied sin into the world and has reigned over humankind ever since (Rom 5:12–21; 6:23; Jas 1:15). Nevertheless, death remains under God's authority. God can use it as an ally against the objects of his wrath (Ex 15:12 [where the "earth" is best understood as the underworld]; Hos 13:14 [best translated as an invitation to death to serve as God's instrument of judgment against his sinful people]) or God can deliver the objects of his favor from its powerful grasp before they descend into its depths (Ps 18:4–19; 116:3–8). In the story of Israel's covenantal relationship with God, death epitomizes the destructive consequences of a broken covenant (Deut 28:45, 48, 61) which can only be reversed by God's life-giving power (Ezek 37).

In the end God will eliminate death from his world, swallowing up the great swallower once and for all (Is 25:6—8). This conquest of death is not strictly a future event however. It began with Jesus, who conquered sin when he satisfied God's righteous requirements and died a sacrificial death for sinners (Rom 5:12—21). He then conquered death when he rose from the grave on the third day (Rom 6:9—10), destroying in the process the power of Satan, who uses the fear of death as a weapon against humankind (Heb 2:14—15). Jesus' resurrection guarantees the future resurrection of his people (1 Cor 15:12—28) and the fulfillment of Isaiah's vision (1 Cor 15:50—54). Death, the final enemy whose "reign" of futility and decay extends over the cosmos (Rom 8:20—21), will be destroyed. Never again will God's people experience death's sorrow and pain, for it will have no place in the new world order (Rev 21:4). With the hope of the resurrection to sustain him, the apostle Paul viewed death as a defeated foe (1 Cor 15:55—57; 2 Tim 1:10) that cannot separate God's people from his love (Rom 8:38—39) or his presence (Phil 1:21—23). Through saving faith in Jesus they have already passed from death to life (Jn 5:24—27).

Jesus' victory over death only benefits God's people (Rev 20:6). Those who have not been the objects of his saving work will someday rise from the grave, but only so they may stand before his holy throne of judgment for final sentencing. They will then be thrown into the lake of fire, which the apostle John calls the "second death" (Rev 20:14; 21:8).

See also Burial, Funeral; Corruption; Cosmology; Decay; Grave; Judgment; Mourn, Mourning; Murder Stories; Pit; Resurrection; Sin.

Bibliography. L. R. Bailey, Biblical Perspectives on Death (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); M. C. de Boer, The Defeat of Death: Apocalyptic Eschatology in 1 Corinthians 15 and Romans 5 (Sheffield: JSOT, 1988); O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World (New York: Seabury, 1978); L. I. J. Stadelmann, The Hebrew Conception of the World (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1970) 165—76; N. J. Tromp, Primitive Conceptions of Death and the Nether World in the Old Testament (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1969); H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974) 99—118.

DEATH AND REBIRTH.

See Rebirth.

DEBT, DEBTOR.

See Lend, Lending.

DECAY

The biblical image of decay is usually a dark one, carrying connotations of death, judgment, and the horror of gradually turning into nothing. Appearing by itself, the image carries little joy or hope. Only when it appears in stark contrast to images of life triumphant over death does decay no longer suggest an inevitable end.

At its most benign the image of decay conveys the notion of mortality. This is the import of God's words to Adam, "Dust you are and to dust you will return" (Gen 3:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Job acknowledges this as well in his question to God, "Remember that you molded me like clay. Will you now turn me to dust again?" (Job 10:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In these instances the image of turning back into dust provides a vivid reminder of the fleeting and fragile nature of human life. The prophet Habakkuk also recognizes the fragility of life: at the very sight of God's wrath and power, the decay of his trembling body begins within the very marrow of his bones (Hab 3:16).

The most haunting portrait of human decay in the Bible is the detailed metaphoric account of the physiological symptoms of old age that comes near the end of the book of Ecclesiastes. Introduced to give urgency to the command to “remember your Creator in the days of your youth,” the portrait comes to dominate the passage with its picture of failing sight, hearing and sprightliness in walking, as well as a loss of appetite, speech and ability to sleep (Eccles 12:1–5). After this depressing picture of physical decay, death itself is described as the final cessation (Eccles 12:6–7).

Although mortality is a universal human condition, the decay that comes with death carries a special connotation of judgment for those who defy God. The psalmist declares, “You, O God, will bring down the wicked into the pit of corruption” (Ps 55:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here the image is that of a grave in which the bodies of the wicked decay. Likewise the writer of Proverbs declares, “The memory of the righteous will be a blessing, but the name of the wicked will rot” (Prov 10:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The power and essence of this image is annihilation. Death is only the beginning of God’s judgment; the decay that follows ensures that every trace of the wicked will eventually come to nothing. As an image of judgment, decay renders a wicked life inconsequential; it becomes as though it had never existed.

Thus decay is an image that points toward nothingness. Speaking through the prophet Hosea, God condemns Judah for abandoning the Lord and turning to idolatry. With striking effect, God turns this same image upon himself: “I am ... like rot to the people of Judah” (Hos 5:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God employs an image of decay to present the most powerful illustration possible of how little regard Judah has for him.

It is the terrible prospect of coming to nothing that leads Job to lament that “man wastes away like something rotten” (Job 13:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Death’s permanence is inescapable, and Job knows it; nevertheless, he wishes out loud before God: “If only you would hide me in the grave and conceal me till your anger has passed ... if a man dies, will he live again?” (Job 14:13, 14). Job leaves his own question unanswered, but in spite of the imminence of death and decay, he appears to entertain a fleeting hope that the answer will be yes.

It would seem that death and decay are inevitable: “No man can redeem the life of another ... no payment is ever enough—that he should live on forever and not see decay” (Ps 49:7, 9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Nevertheless, Job’s hope is not utterly vain. Taking refuge in the power of the Lord, the psalmist declares, “You will not abandon me to the grave, nor will you let your Holy One see decay” (Ps 16:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In this passage decay is no longer the prominent theme because the image has been robbed of its finality; instead, the focus is on the power of the Lord to grant and sustain eternal life.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] both Peter (Acts 2:29—33) and Paul (Acts 13:35—39) interpret this psalm messianically: the psalmist is speaking of Jesus, who did not decay upon his death but was instead resurrected by God. Paul declares that “the one whom God raised from the dead did not see decay. Therefore ... through Jesus the forgiveness of sins is proclaimed to you” (Acts 13:37, 38 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here the image of decay is that of a vanquished enemy; the element of judgment has been removed. Death and decay are no longer threats, since the power of God in Christ’s resurrection has taken away their finality, which Job had found so dreadful. Decay returns to being simply an image of mortality—albeit a changed mortality, since it rests in the larger context of God's power to raise the dead through Christ.

See also Corruption; Death; New; Resurrection.

DECEPTION, STORIES OF

Stories of deception, which are usually built around a character's disguise, incorporate several plot motifs that make for good stories, including intrigue, dramatic irony, suspense, reversal and discovery. Deception appears in the Bible in both comic and tragic modes.

The story of the Fall (Gen 3) contains a latent deception motif. Satan enters a serpent to conduct his temptation of Eve, and his destructive intent is masked as benevolent concern for humankind. Fearful for Abraham's life as they travel to foreign realms, Abraham and Sarah resolve to tell a half-lie about their relationship wherever it seems expedient (Gen 12:10–20; 20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 26:6–11). The most full-fledged deception story in Genesis is Jacob's deception of his father by means of disguise when he steals the birthright from his older brother Esau (Gen 27). Tamar plays the role of a prostitute to trick Judah into raising offspring for her (Gen 38), and Laban tricks Jacob with a substitute bride (Gen 29:21–25). When Jacob's daughter Dinah is raped by Shechem, her brothers trick the men of Shechem's tribe by getting them to be circumcised and then killing them while they are suffering the results of their operation (Gen 34).

Later OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stories also sometimes hinge on deception and disguise. The Gibeonites dress as travelers from a distant land in order to gain a peace treaty with Israel (Josh 9). King Saul disguises himself when he consults the witch of Endor (1 Sam 28:8). Both Ahab (2 Chron 18:28–33) and Josiah (2 Chron 35:20–27) undertake futile disguises as they go into their final battles. David's son Amnon pretends to be ill as an aid to his raping his sister Tamar (2 Sam 13:1–14). On the positive side, the crafty lefthanded Ehud carries his homemade sword on the unexpected right side where it avoids detection, in effect providing Ehud with a disguise during his daring assassination of the Moabite king Eglon (Judg 3:15–30). Jael is equally adept at deception when she lulls Sisera into a false sense of security with acts of hospitality (Judg 4–5).

But stories of deception can also be happy stories of divine deliverance. One thinks of Joseph's concealing his identity from his visiting brothers until the opportune time for disclosure (Gen 42–45), the Hebrew midwives' lying to Pharaoh (Ex 1:15–21), Moses' family hiding him in a basket in the Nile and even getting paid for caring for him (Ex 2:1–10), Rahab's hiding of the spies (Josh 2:1–14), Michal's arranging a household idol with goat's hair to aid David in his escape from Saul's executioners (1 Sam 19:11–17) and the wisemen's tricking Herod by returning home by a different route (Mt 2:12).

In the Bible, then, deception can be either good or bad. It can be God's means of deliverance and retribution on evil kings or nations. But it can with equal ease be the doomed stratagem used by an evil person in a bad cause.

See also Crooked; Esau; Jacob; Plot Motifs; Reversal; Satan.

DEEP

The imagery surrounding the word deep in the Bible falls into five distinct categories. The simplest use is “the literal, physical quality of being far below the surface of the ground.” Thus mire can be deep (Ps 69:2), as can the root of a plant (Ps 80:9), water (Ps 69:2; Prov 20:5; Lk 5:4), a pit (Prov 22:14; 23:27), a hiding place (Jer 49:30) or a well (Jn 4:11).

As is almost always the case with the imagination, metaphoric meanings are rooted in the physical properties of a thing. Based on the physical quality that something deep extends for a long distance and is hidden from view, the term becomes a metaphor to denote intensity-of darkness (fifteen occurrences in NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] , nine of them in the book of Job) and of sleep (eight instances). If darkness and sleep can be deep, so can guilt (Ezra 9:7), evil in the human heart (Ps 36:1; 64:6) and secret plans (Is 29:15). Based on the archetypal associations of height with emotional well-being and lowness with distress or depression, the psalmist cries to God “out of the depths” (Ps 130:1), which in its original context also suggested a metaphoric sea of troubles. Again, if the quality of being deep denotes going far below the surface, it can readily become a metaphor for that which is profound, as distinct from shallow. Here we have references to “the deep things of God” (Job 11:7; Dan 2:22; 1 Cor 2:10) and the thoughts of God (Ps 92:5; Rom 11:33), as well as “sighs too deep for words” with which the Holy Spirit intercedes for believers (Rom 8:26).

The most numerous references are to “the deep” or its variants “the deeps” and “the depths.” There are approximately forty of these references to the ocean or sea. The Hebrews were not a seafaring people-the psalmist’s statement in Psalm 104:25 that “yonder is the sea, great and wide” is laughably vague compared with the minutely detailed pictures of life on the land that have preceded it. The sea for the Hebrews was accordingly a fearsome and alien abode of monsters and the site of storms. One of the most salient features of the sea for the Hebrews was simply that it was deep (in contrast to our customary phrase about “the high seas”), with connotations of fearsome and uncontrollable power, as well as its being a mysterious realm where forces were hidden from human understanding. Some notable instances include the statement in the creation account that “darkness covered the face of the deep” (Gen 1:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 8:28), the Red Sea through which God led the Israelites and in which the Egyptians perished (Ex 15:5, 8; Ps 77:16; 106:9) and the sea into which Jonah was cast (Jon 2:3, 5)

Such references to the sea as “the deep” imply something about the cosmology of the earliest biblical writers, though it is hard to disentangle cosmological from merely metaphoric statements. It seems clear, for example, that the ancient Hebrews viewed the ocean as being fed by fountains or springs (Gen 7:11; 8:2; Job 38:16; Prov 8:28). Also present in the Hebrew imagination is the picture of a three-tiered universe in which the earth is situated between the heaven above and “the deep” beneath (Gen 1:9; Deut 33:13; Ps 135:6). These same “deeps” are the abode of sea monsters and forces of chaos as in Psalm 74:13–14 (see Monster).

Beyond this subtext of ancient cosmology may lie overtones of other ancient myths, though this is speculative. One of the primary Hebrew words for deep, tehôm (a flood of water), comes from the same root as Tiamat, the name of a Babylonian goddess who represents chaos. When the god Marduk sends a mighty wind down her mouth, she is destroyed, enabling Marduk to create the heavenly firmament from one half of her body, the earth from the other. Some commentators see traces of this myth in Genesis 1:1–10, which culminates in the separation of the dry land from the waters under the sky: “The earth was a formless void and darkness covered the face of the deep, while a wind from God swept over the face of the waters.” (Gen 1:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery of God’s conflict with the deep and its dragons may derive from Canaanite sources.

In addition to the depths of the sea, biblical writers refer to the depths of the earth. The image of “depths” is variously associated with Sheol, the grave, the Pit, the abyss and the bottomless pit, in each case having overtones of death (the cessation of life) and/or hell (a postmortem existence of punishment). Sometimes the depths of the earth are simply the grave (Ps 63:9; 86:13; Rom 10:7). Such references can, of course, become metaphoric for calamity, distress or depression (Ps 71:20; 88:6). Other references push the image from a neutral death to a hell-like place where demons reside and evildoers are punished (Prov 9:18; Lk 8:31). Sometimes, indeed, it is impossible to know whether a reference crosses the boundary from death to hell (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 14:15). In a category by itself is the reference in Psalm 139:15 that the speaker’s fetus was “intricately woven in the depths of the earth,” an allusion to an ancient myth that all living things were produced from a cosmic womb at the center of the earth.

The appearance of “the deep” as a combined reference to sea and earth in apocalyptic visions deserves comment as a separate category. In the book of Revelation all of the dread figures of evil are pictured as arising from either the ocean or the earth (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rev 9:1–2; 13:1, 11), reminding us of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motif of the deep and its allies as God’s enemies. The beasts and the antichrist who emerge from the deep in the end times (Dan 7:3; Rev 11:7) fight against those who hold fast to God’s word. While God maintains control of the abyss in Revelation, he allows the beast and Satan to come forth from it, and their blasphemies deceive many (Rev 20:1–10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 13:1–8). After the ultimate defeat of Satan and the beast, heaven and earth are recreated, but “there is no longer any sea” (Rev 21:1). At this point the only thing resembling the deep is the “lake of fire,” a place of eternal torment for the beast and the damned.

From the beginning of Scripture to the end, references to “the deep” and “the depths” are images of terror with associations of danger, chaos, malevolent evil and death. “The deep” is a major negative archetype in the biblical imagination—a place or state of mind or soul that one would wish to avoid but that no one can completely avoid.

See also Chaos; Cosmology; Darkness; Death; Monster, Monsters; Pit; Sea.

Bibliography. O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms (Warsaw, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997 repr. [repr. repr.. reprint]).

DEFORMITY

The essential meaning of deformity is a lack of wholeness, a flaw, a deviation from the norm. Deformity is unnatural and as such is a misfortune. Deformity is also viewed in the Bible in symbolic terms, shifting from a dominant OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image of unholiness to a NT [NT NT. New Testament] pointer to the saving power of God in redemption.

Early in the biblical narrative God mandated that physically deformed or defective persons and animals be excluded from the most important acts of Jewish life. The physically imperfect were not allowed in the holy places as priests or as sacrifices. Leviticus 21 and 22 give a thorough catalog of the various imperfections that excluded a priest or a sacrificial animal from the presence of the Lord. In case the catalog of defects overlooked anything, it says that “no man who has any defect may come near” (Lev 21:18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] , emphasis added). Only the physically perfect could come, lest the sanctuary be desecrated (Lev 21:23).

With respect to people this prohibition of the flawed coming before God was most specifically for the priestly offices. However it is likely that this exclusion was extended beyond those offices into the greater society, for in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the lame and blind were brought to the temple gates and steps to beg from those permitted to enter (Acts 3:2). This intolerance for the physically flawed must be seen in terms of training in holiness in the history of redemption. Deformity in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is strongly associated with and treated similarly to ceremonial uncleanness (see Purity). This provided a powerful image that the requirements of God are moral perfection and holiness of character.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , then, deformity serves as an image of the absence of holiness, accentuating by contrast the holiness of God. By thus divorcing deformity from any possible link to human responsibility for the flaw, the Bible suggests that holiness is not just a moral quality. The lame, the mentally disabled, the maimed and the blind are self-evidently less than whole. God, who is holy (perfect), demands that those who come before him be holy too. To be less than whole is to be unholy.

When Jesus the Messiah came preaching and healing, he inaugurated a reversal in treatment of the flawed and deformed. We see this transition strikingly displayed in Matthew 21:12–15, where Jesus comes into the temple area, drives out all the merchants and their customers, and calls those buying and selling “robbers.” Then immediately we read, “The blind and the lame came to him at the temple, and he healed them” (Mt 21:14, emphasis added). Here we see the morally imperfect shunned, but the physically flawed welcomed, a boldly revolutionary outlook. Jesus’ miracles of healing give eloquent testimony to just what sort of Messiah he was. What mattered to God was no longer physical wholeness or perfection. Instead, wholeness and deformity were a matter of the heart, of spirit and of truth (Jn 4:19–24).

The healings Jesus performed were potent eschatological signs of the final day when all physical deformity will be eliminated (Is 35:5–6; 61:1–2; Zeph 3:19: “I will rescue the lame and gather those who have been scattered”). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , however, until the day of cosmic healing and restoration arrives, there is acceptance of physical flaws. When Philip baptized the Ethiopian eunuch, a person who was shunned and unclean for his physical deformity in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] times was now welcomed and made a full brother. Paul prayed for his thorn in the flesh to be removed, but it became clear to him that it was God’s will for him to live with the difficulty.

The goal of life is wholeness. In a physically and spiritually fallen world, deformity is an inevitable part of life. The goal of redemption is to correct deformity—to present the church of Christ as “a radiant church, without stain or wrinkle or any other blemish, but holy and blameless” (Eph 5:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Blindness; Deaf, Deafness; Disease and Healing; Holiness; Leper, Leprosy; Purity; Whole, Wholeness.

DEMONS

The word translated “demon” in the literature preceding and contemporary with Scripture is not always negative. An example of the neutral use remains in the Greek philosophers’ label for Paul, “a proclaimer of strange divinities” (Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] xenōn daimoniōn, Acts 17:18), revealing a broader conception of demon in antiquity (“divine being” analogous to the “sons of God” in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament]) than that understood in today’s English.

Demons as Fallen Angels. The origins of demons, like those of Satan and the angels, are obscured in the mythological language of texts that allude to a cosmic struggle before the creation of the world. The titles used for them are equally vague: “first causes” (archai, Col 1:16), “rulers” (archōn), “authorities” (exousiai), “principalities” (kyriotētes), “things above, things on earth, things below” (Phil 2:10) and many others. These ancient spirits, fallen angels allied with Satan against God, remain the devil’s henchmen and do his bidding just as obedient angels carry out God’s orders. The cosmos (God’s ordered world assailed by chaos) and its creatures, including humanity, serve as a battleground, disputed territory in the larger struggle between the mostly unseen forces of light and darkness.

The language and imagery of angels and demons exhibits many parallels. Angels come in “legions” (Mt 26:53) and so do demons (Mk 5:9). Angels have “rulers” or “princes” (Dan 12:1) as do demons (Eph 2:2). The “host of heaven” may be angels (Lk 2:13) or demonic idols of the zodiac (Acts 7:42). Angels or other heavenly beings were pictured with wings (Is 6:2), so were demons (“An [evil, idolatrous] spirit oppresses you with its wings,” Hos 4:19). While the wings of demons oppress, those of the Almighty serve as an image of comfort (Ps 91:4) and healing (Mal 4:2). Angels bring messages by dreams (Mt 1:20; 2:12, 13, 19, 22; 27:19), so do evil spirits (Job 4:16; 27:20). Demons deceive through mimicry by exploiting these parallels. The devil appears as an angel of light (2 Cor 11:14). Demons promulgate seductive doctrines, too creative for the human mind (1 Tim 4:1) and fortify their deceptions with miracles (Rev 16:14, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 10:21).

Nature as Demons in the Cosmic Struggle. The ancients in Palestine and neighboring countries found in the violence of nature tangible evidence of this cosmic battle. The winds (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] rûhôt, Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] pneumata, both meaning ‘spirits’) that brought yearly destruction and seasonal pestilence were caused by evil spirits (Thompson, 1:33). That God himself traveled in the company of storms was further proof of their divine nature (Job 38:1; 40:6; Ezek 1:4; Zech 9:14). The thunder accompanying nature’s violence is the voice of God or his angel (Jn 12:28–29), and the stars of heaven fight in God’s earthly battles (Judg 5:20). The symbolism of Revelation reinforces the equation of angels and stars (Rev 1:20). The meteors, because of their association with seasonal plagues and fevers, were understood from Greece to Mesopotamia as disease-bearing demons descending to earth (especially during the dog days of summer, see Homer, Iliad 22.30; Pliny, Nat. Hist. 2.107; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev. 8:10). Jesus also evokes this imagery, asserting that he has seen Satan “fall from heaven like lightning” (Lk 10:18).

The primordial waters, rebelliously surging and struggling to escape their divinely ordained boundaries (Job 38:8, 11), required the rebuke of the Lord (Ps 104:7; Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] gā’ar and Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] epitimaō, “to rebuke,” are exorcistic terminology). The Gospels revisit this motif when Jesus “rebukes” the wind and the sea (Mt 8:26; Mk 4:39; Lk 8:24). The disciples’ astonished response, paraphrased as “what sort of person commands the elemental spirits?” is consistent with their literary background. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] pictures storms from the sea as mythological monsters, enemies of the Lord to be slain by him (Job 9:13; 26:12–13; Ps 89:11; Is 51:9).

Demons as Disease. For the peoples of the Bible the prevailing understanding was that diseases were the consequence of sin (Jn 9:1; Acts 28:4; Rev 18:4). The cure could require turning the flesh over to Satan for destruction so that the spirit might be saved (1 Cor 5:5) or at least instructed (1 Tim 1:20). When the righteous suffered, they were being harassed by Satan or his angels (Lk 13:16; 2 Cor 12:7). By contrast the diseases of the wicked were inflicted by God's angels (1 Chron 21:16; 2 Chron 32:21; Acts 12:23). Many diseases were dealt with through exorcism, not only the familiar epilepsy but also fever (Lk 4:39), posture problems (Lk 13:16), deafness (Lk 11:14), muteness (Mk 9:25) and blindness (Mt 12:22). Outside of Scripture we find even more spirits of disease: demons of tetanus, hemiplegia, tuberculosis, headache, nightmares, crib death, spontaneous abortion, homosexuality, livestock plagues, crop blight, sour milk and more.

Demons as Animals. Not only storms and illnesses were in league with the devil, but so too were particularly sinister elements of the animal kingdom. These could be identified by their habits. Any creatures that could see at night (and so must be in league with darkness), hissed (giving off evil spirits), were poisonous (and hence allied with the anti-Creation forces) or inhabited desolate regions (where demons were known to cavort) were linked to the Prince of Darkness. Such a list includes many familiar "unclean" animals (see Animals of the Bible)—snake (Ps 91:13), owl, raven (Zeph 2:14), bat, frog (Rev 16:13–14), jackal (Is 24:13), hyena, lion (Ps 91:13), scorpion (Lk 10:19; Rev 9:2–11); also many mythological creatures such as basilisk, leviathan, tannin, behemoth, the Repha'im (goat-like spirits of the dead, Is 14:9; 2 Chron 11:15; Lev 17:7; Is 8:19); and the many awe-inspiring denizens of visions and mythology (see Mythical Animals of the Bible).

These animals lived in the desolate, uninhabited lands far from the cities as did the demons they represented. Demons, perhaps even in the form of animals, haunted the waterless wastelands (Is 34:11–15; Mt 12:43; Rev 18:2). Evil spirits drove the humans they plagued toward their own abode in the wilderness (Lk 8:29). To confront the devil God's Spirit drives Jesus into the wilderness where he is “with the wild beasts” (Mk 1:12). Mark’s audience, knowing the beasts of the wilderness as the Devil’s allies, needed no help seeing the ominous connotations in this phrase. Ancient ruins were also haunted by their former inhabitants as ominous animals (Job 3:14; Ezek 26:20; Rev 18:2). Passersby such ruins habitually warded off the spirits by waving the hand and whistling (Zeph 2:14; Jer 18:16; Lam 2:15; Job 27:23). Such locales where demons held sway were truly “Godforsaken.”

Demons as Pagan Gods or Idols. When God established the nations, “he fixed the bounds of the peoples according to the number of the sons of God” (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the divine beings, Deut 32:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), suggesting that each nation has a spirit assigned to it. The angel sent to explain Daniel’s vision was opposed and detained three weeks by the prince of Persia (Dan 10:13) until Michael, the prince of Israel (Dan 12:1), came to help. These princes would seem to be the “divine beings” appointed over each nation. While Israel is ruled by God’s angels, pagan nations are ruled by fallen angels that inspire and empower their idolatry and serve as national gods. Thus the gods of the nations and their idols are demons (Rev 9:20).

Similar to viewing pagan gods as demons is viewing idols as demons. To the ancients, idols, images or even uncarved sticks and rocks were home to spirits (Jer 2:27; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 28:18; Homer Iliad 22.126). They believed that a demon inspired (lived in) the idol, so they sometimes used the word idol in parallel or interchangeably with demon (Deut 32:16; Zech 13:2). “For all the gods of the people are idols, but the Lord made the heavens” (Ps 96:5). “They sacrificed their children to demons [Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] šēdîm, a word for demon borrowed from Akkadian], the blood of their children to the idols of Canaan” (Ps 106:37–38 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). “They sacrificed to demons who were not God, to gods whom they have not known,” (Deut 32:17). (The LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] twice translates Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] 'elôhîm “god[s]” with patachra, the Persian word for “idol,” Is 8:21; 37:38). Paul asserts that meat offered to idols is really offered to the demons behind the idol (1 Cor 10:19–20). Idolatry was inspired by a spirit of harlotry (Hos 4:12, 19; 5:4).

Demons as Political, Emotional and Psychological Problems. Just as demons lay behind physical problems, evil spirits were also viewed as agents of emotional problems. Demons interfered in the international politics of Persia, Israel and Greece (Dan 10:13; 10:20; 12:1). Local political intrigue, such as the enmity between Abimelech and the rulers of Shechem, also indicated the work of an evil spirit from God (Judg 9:23). Behind the paranoid behavior of King Saul lurks “an evil spirit from the Lord” (1 Sam 16:14–23; 18:10; 19:9). The errant oracle by the king’s prophet is explained as the work of “a lying spirit” from among the host of heaven which stands before the Lord (1 Kings 22:22). Matthew’s Gospel identifies jealousy with the description “evil eye,” familiar to all Mediterranean peoples as a demonic designation (Mt 20:15, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 6:23). The terminology applied to these evils shows that behind them the ancients saw demons, the personified agents of evil in a fallen world.

See also Angels; Cosmology; Disease and Healing; Evil; Mythical Animals; Plague; Satan; Sea.

Bibliography. R. C. Thompson, The Devils and Evil Spirits of Babylonia (2 vols.; London: Luzac and Company, 1904).

DEN

The two dozen biblical references to dens evoke an image different from that of the cave, which is usually a dwelling or hiding place for people. Dens are primarily lairs (homes) or hiding places of animals. They are chiefly linked in the Bible with lions (approximately a dozen references) but sometimes with undifferentiated “animals”* (Job 37:8), adders (Is 11:8) or jackals (Jer 51:37). The most famous of these animal dens is without doubt the lions' den (probably a large cistern) into which Daniel was cast and in which his life was miraculously spared (Dan 6).

The status of the den as the abode of wild animals determines its meaning when it is associated with people. When Jesus says that the commercial interests in the temple precincts have made it “a den of robbers” (Mt 21:13; Mk 11:17; Lk 19:46 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 7:11), he intensifies his indictment of the sellers by implicitly portraying them as a pack of predatory animals as well as by reflecting the practice of robbers to make their hideouts in mountains caves. When the usual association of a predatory animal's den with violence to people is neutralized, the image is part of God's redemptive or providential salvation of people, whether in history (Dan 6) or the coming millennium (Is 11:8). Reversing this pattern, God's judgment against evil nations is portrayed as transforming cities—the very epitome of human civilization—into the dens of wild animals (Is 32:14; Jer 51:37; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Nahum 2:11–12).

The den is thus chiefly portrayed in the Bible as a dwelling place of destruction, terror or assembled evil. It is associated with predatory animals, night, darkness and robbers, with overtones of fear, deception, impending doom and secrecy. Sometimes God uses such mass evil for purposes of his judgment against evil nations, but God is also capable of overriding the terrifying aspects of dens for his redemptive purposes.

See also Cave; Rob, Robber.

DESCENT

The imagery of physical descent-of going down-is part of the directional imagery of the Bible that is often close to the surface as we read. But the human imagination has nearly always used directional imagery for symbolic meanings as well. In the Bible, as in classic Christian texts like Dante's Divine Comedy and Milton's Paradise Lost, much of the vertical imagery is predicated on the premise of a three-tiered universe consisting of heaven, earth and hell. Descent from one of these levels to the next is always a possibility.

A leading cluster of biblical images is based on the general premise of the human imagination that up is good and down bad, that high is desirable and low undesirable, that to ascend is positive and to descend negative. Such imagery underlies Jesus' parable of the wedding guest, accompanied by his advice, "When you are invited, go and sit in the lowest place, so that when your host comes he may say to you, 'Friend, go up higher' " (Lk 14:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Descent is sometimes associated with danger and deprivation, as when Joseph and Jeremiah are lowered into a pit as a place of imprisonment (Gen 37:24; Jer 38:1-13). Rescue consists of being drawn up out of a pit (Ps 40:2). Jonah's ignominious attempt to flee from God and his prophetic mission is a successive descent-down into the depths of a ship and then down into the sea. His song from the watery depths (Jon 2) is built on images of descent, followed by ascent when he calls on God. Almost as ignominious as Jonah's descent is that of the willful Samson in Judges 14, where we read five times (Judg 14:1, 5, 7, 10, 19) that he or his father "went down" to Timnah to secure Samson's marriage to a pagan woman. Other figurative descents describe a change of fortune from blessing to deprivation, with more than two dozen references to people or nations being “brought low” or “laid low.”

The ultimate human descent is the descent into Sheol, the Pit, or the grave, with fifty biblical references. Descent thus used refers to the thoroughly tangible picture of going down into a grave and returning to the dust (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Job 7:9; Ps 22:29; Ezek 31:17). Yet the image of physical descent to the dust is never far removed from the image of descent to the underworld, however vaguely conceived. Thus following Ezekiel’s prediction of the razing of Tyre, the metaphysical comes into view: “Then I will thrust you down with those who descend into the Pit, to the people of primeval ruins, with those who go down to the Pit... I will bring you to a dreadful end, and you shall be no more” (Ezek 26:20—21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Another category of images of descent in the Bible is more positive, based on the premise of a two-level universe in which God and his heavenly abode are above the earth. God’s coming down to earth is thus an image of the intervention of a transcendent God into the flow of human activity on earth. Descent accompanies God’s appearances to his people, whether directly or through the mediation of angels, as in Jacob’s dream (Gen 28:12; see also Dan 4:13, 23; Mt 28:2; Rev 10:1; 18:1; 20:1). In the anthropomorphic world of the OT [OT. Old Testament] , God’s interest in what is happening on earth results in a succession of occasions when God “comes down”—to investigate rebellion (Gen 11:5; 18:21), to display his power (1 Kings 18:38; 2 Kings 1:10; 2 Chron 7:1), to rescue his own (Ex 3:8; Ps 18:9; Is 64:1) and to execute judgment against those who deserve it (Mic 1:12).

God also descends to earth for purposes of revelation. He descends to Sinai in terrifying natural phenomena to give the Ten Commandments to Moses (Ex 19:18, 20). Here the image of descent combines the ideas of divine self-disclosure (theophany) and divine condescension. Both of these converge in the incarnation of Christ. In his discourse on himself as the bread of heaven, Jesus speaks of having come “down from heaven” seven times in just twenty-five verses. Here the imagery of descent is positive, part of a divine rescue mission to the human race that cannot save itself and that is dependent on the intrusion of the supernatural into the earthly sphere. In the eschaton God himself “will descend from heaven” and believers will rise with him (1 Thess 4:16–17), and in the ultimate climax of human history “The holy city, the new Jerusalem” will come “down out of heaven from God” (Rev 21:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The theme of ascent and descent is a favorite in John’s christology. As the full realization of God’s coming down into earthly affairs, Jesus relates his own person and ministry to OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images of descent, such as the stairway, or ladder, in Jacob’s dream (Gen 28:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Jn 1:51) and the bread from heaven (Ex 16; Jn 6:31ff.). Such images attest to Jesus’ identity as both revelatory agent and redeeming life-source. Yet Jesus was not only revealer and redeemer but victor as well. In his descent to the underworld (1 Pet 3:19; Eph 4:9–10), being made like sinful man in his death, he vanquishes sin and death (1 Cor 15:55). The descent of Christ is thus the definitive descent for both God and humanity.

Special note can also be made of the imagery of descent in connection with the appearance of the Holy Spirit. At Jesus’ baptism “the Holy Spirit descended upon him in bodily form like a dove” (Lk 3:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 1:32–33). The image of descent is also found in the account of the coming of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, especially in the repeated emphasis on the pouring out of the Spirit (Acts 2:17, 18, 33). Descent is thus an image particularly associated with the empowering ministry of the Holy Spirit.

If the descent of a transcendent God can represent divine self-disclosure and spiritual empowering, in other contexts it is an image of divine judgment against sinful humanity. Thus God “came down to see the city and the tower, which the sons of men had built” at Babel (Gen 11:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), later saying, “Come, let us go down, and there confuse their language” (Gen 11:7). Using the same word as is used in Exodus 19:20 to describe God’s theophany on Sinai, Micah asserts that “disaster has come down from the Lord to the gate of Jerusalem” (Mic 1:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Even when God is not said to descend, the imagery of descent is associated with punishment on those who have done evil. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Jesus sees Satan fall from heaven like lightning (Lk 10:18), echoing the vision of Isaiah 14:12–20, in which Lucifer’s grand ambition of ascending into heaven results only in his falling to destruction and previewing Satan’s being cast into a bottomless pit (Rev 20:1).

See also Ascent; Cosmology; Deep; Grave; Hell; High, Height, High Place; Low; Pit.

Bibliography. G. C. Nicholson, Death as Departure: The Johannine Descent-Ascent Schema (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1983); J. W. Pryor, “The Johannine Son of Man and the Descent-Ascent Motif,” JETS [JETS JETS. Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society] 34 (1991) 341–51.

DESOLATION.

See Wasteland.

DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF

The image that dominates the book of Deuteronomy is the concluding scene of the death and burial of Israel's great leader Moses on top of Mount Nebo (Deut 34). From that high vantage point on the eastern boundary of Canaan, Moses could see the Promised Land, but he could not enter it. Moses' death outside the land of promise is a key metaphor for the inevitable limits of human life and the ultimate dependence of God's people on the judging and saving power of God. This climactic scene casts a long shadow over the rest of the book of Deuteronomy and shapes the form, structure and images of this fifth book of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

Deuteronomy contains a large middle core of laws (Deut 12—28). But the rest of the book contains several other literary forms, including narratives (Deut 1—4), exhortations (Deut 6—11), liturgical material (Deut 29—31), a poetic song (Deut 32) and blessings (Deut 33). Deuteronomy describes itself as “this book of the torah” (often translated as “this book of the law,” e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 29:21; 30:10; 31:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Deuteronomy's self-description as torah refers not so much to a legal code as to a program of catechesis, a process of education in faith from one generation to another based on a distillation of essential tradition and cast as the concluding words of Israel's leader, Moses. It is this catechetical image of an old teacher sharing his last and most important teaching with a new generation shortly before his death that defines the form of Deuteronomy. A dying Moses in effect replaces himself with a written book of instruction to guide and shape the lives of this and all new generations of God's people far beyond his lifetime (Deut 31:24—29).

The structure of Deuteronomy is defined by a series of five superscriptions or subtitles that mark the major divisions of Moses' address to this new generation:

- (1) “These are the words” (Deut 1:1)
- (2) “This is the law [torah]” (Deut 4:44)
- (3) “This is the commandment—the statutes and ordinances” (Deut 6:1)
- (4) “These are the words of the covenant” (Deut 29:1)
- (5) “This is the blessing” (Deut 33:1)

These five superscriptions join with the key chapter of Deuteronomy 5 and the account of Moses receiving the Ten Commandments to form a road map of the structure of the book. Deuteronomy 5 is a miniature version of the book as a whole. It begins with the overall theme: “Not with our ancestors did the Lord make this covenant, but with us, who are all of us here alive today” (Deut 5:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The reader is invited to join in a transformative journey that moves in four stages: (1) from the past story that anchors the community’s identity (“I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of Egypt” [Deut 5:6]) to (2) the commandments and laws that shape and guide the present (Ten Commandments [Deut 5:7–21]) to (3) provisions for future covenant making that lead the community onward through adversity (Deut 5:22–31) to (4) God’s ultimate assurance of blessing (“that you may live, and that it may go well with you” [Deut 5:32–33]). The movement of Deuteronomy 5 from past to present to future provides a map to the overall structure of the book of Deuteronomy, which moves through a similar series of stages: from the community-forming story of the past (Deut 1–4) to the community-shaping law for the present (Deut 6–28) to the community-sustaining provisions for a new covenant with future generations (Deut 29–32) to God’s ultimate blessing of the community as it moves through death to life (Deut 33–34).

Apart from the Ten Commandments in Deuteronomy 5, one of the most significant texts is Deuteronomy 6:4–5: “Hear, O Israel: The Lord is our God, the Lord alone. You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). These words are a positive restatement of the first and most important commandment for Deuteronomy, “You shall have no other gods before me” (Deut 5:7 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Israel’s love of God was to begin from the inner will and mind (*“heart”) and flow out to animate the whole being or self (“soul”) and thereby extend to every outward action of the hands and body (“might”). The command to love God was to be continually discussed, bound on the hand, fixed on the forehead and nailed to every doorpost. The love of God alone was to guide each person’s every action, thought and movement (Deut 6:7–9). The varied laws that follow in the covenant of Horeb in Deuteronomy 6 to 28 flow out of this key imperative to “love the Lord your God.”

Another notable image is the simultaneous affirmation of two covenants that enrich and give nuance to Deuteronomy’s theology. The covenant of Horeb (Deut 6–18) emphasizes God’s gracious election of Israel and the expected human responsibility for obedience to the laws and will of God. But this covenant of Horeb ends ultimately in curse and exile (Deut 28:45–68). Deuteronomy 29:1 presents a second covenant of Moab made “in addition to the covenant that [the Lord] made with them at Horeb.” The Moab covenant emphasizes much more the judging and saving activity, not of humans but of God, in the face of the failure and limitations of human power and obedience (Deut 29–32, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 32:39). The two emphases—on human obedience (the Horeb covenant) and divine promise and power (the Moab covenant)—remain side by side in Deuteronomy, even as God's promise and blessing predominate and overcome the limitations of human failure and rebellion (Deut 33—34).

Research in this century has shown a formal correspondence between the covenant forms of the book of Deuteronomy and ancient Near Eastern treaties. This discovery throws light on the basic imagery of the book of Deuteronomy. It is the treaty between a great king (God) and his servant people (Israel). Thus the book as a whole presents God in his relationship to his people with political overtones.

One text in Deuteronomy that stands out from all the others in terms of density of imagery and poetic power is the Song of Moses in Deuteronomy 32. The song is a catechetical capsule of God's history and relationship with Israel. God is portrayed in a wide array of metaphors: as the Rock (Deut 32:4, 15, 18, 30, 31); as an eagle caring for its young (Deut 32:11); as a father disciplining and nurturing his children (Deut 32:6, 10, 13—14); as a mother who gave birth to Israel (Deut 32:18); as a divine warrior who fights against the arrogant and powerful and on behalf of the powerless (Deut 32:35—36, 40—42).

Images of nature also play a major role in the Song of Moses as they shift dramatically from soothing images of a gentle, nourishing rain and soft dew on the grass (Deut 32:2) to violent images of chaotic and destructive forces unleashed by nature on a rebellious people of Israel. The land "flowing with milk and honey" (Deut 31:20) turns into "a desert land ... a howling wilderness waste" (Deut 32:10). The divine eagle who gently cares for its young (Deut 32:11) becomes "the teeth of beasts" and "venom of things crawling in the dust" (Deut 32:24). God's gift of the sumptuous "fat of lambs and rams" (Deut 32:14) is turned by the people into fat sacrificed to other gods (Deut 32:37–38). A people “fat, bloated, and gorged” on the produce of the land (Deut 32:15) become people suffering “wasting hunger” and “burning consumption” (Deut 32:24). Canaan’s “fine wine from the blood of grapes” (Deut 32:14) turns into “grapes of poison” and “the poison of serpents, the cruel venom of asps” (Deut 32:32–33). The cool and refreshing rain and dew that begin the poem (Deut 32:2) give way to the fiery anger of God that “burns to the depths of Sheol,” that “devours the earth and its increase and sets on fire the foundations of the mountains” (Deut 32:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In each case the forces of nature turn into instruments of God’s judgment against a sinful Israel.

But the Song of Moses makes one last, crucial turn in its use of nature imagery. In the end God will again turn and fight for Israel, defeating its enemies and restoring God’s people to its land. The heavens that were once witnesses against Israel (Deut 31:28) will sound the voice of praise for Israel, and God will “cleanse the land for his people” (Deut 32:43).

See also Blessing, Blessedness; Covenant; Curse; Exile; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Law; Moses.

DEW

Dew is moisture condensed from the warm air by the cold ground. It is important in Palestine and Syria for the prosperity of cultivated crops and natural vegetation. From April to October there is little rain, so dew is essential for the continued flourishing of vegetation. In some of the wilderness areas the heavy dews are the primary source of water for the natural vegetation, crops, vineyards and even for small animals. OT [OT OT. Old Testament] references to dew include the night and morning mists as well as the ground dew (Ex 16:13; Num 11:9; 2 Sam 17:12). To be exposed to the night air is to become covered in dew (Judg 6:37–40, Song 5:2; Dan 4:15).

At the literal level dew is part of God's creative work in nature. Along with rain, ice, frost and the sea, the creation of dew points to the glory of the God's creative power (Job 38:28–30; Prov 3:20). It is linked with rain as something on which nature depends and whose existence in turn depends on the word of God (1 Kings 17:1).

The symbolic meanings of dew flow from its physical properties. Because dew is a source of the very water on which life depends, it symbolizes blessing, favor or prosperity. When Isaac blesses Jacob, he asks that God give him “the dew of heaven” along with “the fatness of the earth” and “plenty of grain and wine” (Gen 27:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In a promise of blessing, God describes himself as “dew to Israel” (Hos 14:5). Dew is associated with the of provision of manna in the wilderness (Ex 16:13–14; Num 11:9). The promise of blessing, whether to Esau (Gen 27:28), covenant Israel (Deut 33:13) or restored Israel at a point in the future (Zech 8:12), is pictured as dew from heaven, along with the earth's abundance of crops and new wine (Deut 33:28). In the eschaton the blessing and prosperity of restoration of the remnant of Jacob will be “like dew from the Lord” among the peoples (Mic 5:7). The favor of a king is like dew on the grass in contrast to his rage, which is like the roar of a lion (Prov 19:12). By contrast, lack of dew was considered an evidence of curse, the reversal of blessing (2 Sam. 1:21; 1 Kings 17:1; Hag 1:10).

Because of the association of dew with morning, the image of dew points to life, youthfulness and resurrection. Job laments that he thought he would live a long and full life, like dew lying on a branch all night (Job 29:19). In Psalm 110:3 the poet puts dew alongside the imagery of womb and morning as an image of how “youth will come to you” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the day of salvation the dead in the dust of the ground will live as dew brings back life to the earth (Is 26:19).

The physical properties of dew also yield a kaleidoscope of individual symbols. The covering and refreshing quality of the dew on Mt. Hermon pictures the kindred unity of those who believe in God and join together in pilgrimage to the temple (Ps 133:3). Elsewhere the ability of dew to enclose every exposed surface is used to describe how an army will trap those it is pursuing (2 Sam 17:12). The fact that dew evaporates quickly in sunlight makes it a symbol of something that is transient and ephemeral, similar to chaff or smoke escaping through a window (Hos 6:4; 13:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 16:13–14; Is 18:4).

Dew is a multifaceted image and symbol whose usage in the Bible is firmly rooted in the climatic conditions of a region where dew serves a vital function relatively foreign to the experiences of the Western world.

See also Blessing; Morning; Rain; Transience; Water.

DISCERNMENT

Discernment is an act of wisdom or detection marked by an insight into a person's character or by an event that comes through insight that goes beyond the facts given. In Scripture people can discern matters in an explicitly spiritual manner (1 Cor 2:14) or through their own cultivated powers (Job 34:4).

Discernment is always to be desired. Those without discernment are looked down upon (Deut 32:28), whereas the discerning are considered wise and knowledgeable (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Prov 8:9; 14:6; 15:14; 16:21; 17:24).

Discernment is often sought in political matters (Gen 41:33, 39; 2 Sam 14:17; 1 Kings 3:9) as well as in spiritual matters to guide us in holy living (Prov 28:7; Hos 14:9; 1 Cor 2:14; Phil

1:10). Even God uses discernment in examining our actions and state of heart (Ps 139:3).

The thirst for guidance or discernment is universal; the righteous and unrighteous alike have a perceived need for insight, but it is only truly available through God. Paganism uses magic and divination to gain insight (1 Sam 28); kings and rulers have their advisers (Gen 41:33); and moderns turn to friends, therapists and consultants. But God's children are advised to look to him (1 Kings 3:9; Ps 119:125). For example, God gives Joseph, the wisest and most discerning man in Egypt in his time, the ability to discern the meanings of dreams (Gen 41:1—40).

One of the clearest examples of discernment is Solomon. Rather than grabbing for riches or fame or power, Solomon asks the Lord for a discerning heart (1 Kings 3). His request is granted, and he quickly becomes renowned throughout many countries for his great wisdom. As the epitome of a wise, discerning person, the bulk of the book of Proverbs is assigned to him, dedicated to his son “for attaining wisdom and discipline; for understanding words of insight” (Prov 1:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). His voice echoes in the book of Ecclesiastes as the one who searches “to study and to explore by wisdom all that is done under heaven” (Eccles 1:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), looking for meaning to life. The conclusion is this: the whole duty of man is to “fear God and keep his commandments” (Eccles 12:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In fact Solomon's wisdom was so great, he kept peace between Israel the surrounding nations, making him the only OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ruler whose reign was filled with peace and prosperity.

In contrast, Lot displayed a real lack of discernment a number of times. When he and Abram parted company to settle their flocks, Lot chose the fertile land near Sodom and Gomorrah, even though it was filled with wickedness (Gen 13). Later, when the three messengers of the Lord came to take Lot out of Sodom, he offered his daughters to the men of the town who want to rape the messengers (Gen 19:7–8); and he hesitated before leaving his home to flee (Gen 19:16). Because of these unwise actions, his wife was killed (Gen 19:26), he was forced to hide in a cave (Gen 19:30), and his daughters turned to sleeping with him in order to continue the family line (Gen 19:31–38). None of this would have occurred had he used discernment in leading his family.

See also Ecclesiastes, Book of; Guide, Guidance; Proverbs, Book of; Solomon; Wisdom.

DISCIPLE, DISCIPLESHIP

Like the master-apprentice relationship, though in a religious context, the teacher—disciple relation is a socially recognized quasi-contractual institution primarily for the purpose of learning. Although the term scarcely appears in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , the concept is implicit in the companies, or schools, of the prophets. Examples include the apprenticeship from early childhood of Samuel to Eli and the service given to Elisha by Gehazi, who on occasion acted for him with delegated powers (1 Sam 2:11; 2 Kings 2:3; 2 Kings 4:29). Isaiah looked to certain assistants to take care of his writings and their transmission, and Jeremiah's secretary Baruch received a word from the Lord in the manner of his principal (Is 8:16; Jer 45). Earlier, Joshua succeeded Moses after serving a term of apprenticeship “since youth” (Num 11:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Discipleship in the New Testament. The Gospels refer to John the Baptist as having disciples, some of whom transferred to Jesus when he began his ministry (Jn 1:35ff). Discipleship becomes a prominent theme in the life and teaching of Jesus. In Acts, Luke routinely uses the term mathētēs for believers, but it is nowhere used in the Epistles, where words like brothers, church, believers and saints are preferred.

Although the Twelve are named collectively and individually in the Gospels, the designation “disciple” was applied more widely. Luke mentions that the audience for the Sermon on the Plain was “a great crowd of his disciples” and large numbers of others (6:17). He gives 120 as the number of the believers in Jerusalem prior to Pentecost (Acts 1:15), and in Luke 8:2 he also mentions the women within the company of traveling disciples.

To be a disciple was not merely to be a frequent listener to the teaching of Jesus, but to be “with him” as he moved about in itinerant ministry (Mk 3:14). An imperative invitation from Jesus to join his disciples seems to have been typical (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the peremptory “follow me” to Levi [Mk 2:14]), but there are also instances of volunteering (Lk 9:57). John reports Jesus’ assurance that he will not reject those who come to him (6:37). John, who has a distinctive emphasis on belief as the mark of the disciple, seems to allow that it was possible, at least temporarily, to be a “secret” disciple (12:42; 19:38). Jesus called his disciples from a range of social and occupational backgrounds.

Commonly, the disciples would have been a highly visible group behind Jesus, not unlike sheep following a shepherd. The disciples controlled access to the master and had responsibility for logistics (Mk 10:13; 6:37). They provided some of the money the group needed for themselves and to give to the poor (Lk 8:3). Submitted to Jesus’ discipline, they aimed through obedience to resemble him, as indeed he invited them to do: “Everyone who is fully trained will be like his teacher,” Jesus once said (Lk 6:40 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Jesus' mobility seems to have been greater than that of John the Baptist and the contemporary Jewish rabbis, and with the numerous healings and other miracles that he did; to follow Jesus was to follow more than a teacher of the law. When he sent the Twelve (called "apostles") and later seventy-two disciples in pairs to communities he had not yet visited, they were his representatives and endowed with his power to heal, exorcise demons and bring signs of the kingdom. After Jesus' ascension, "making disciples" in the power of the Holy Spirit among all the peoples of the earth was the "Great Commission" entrusted to the disciples (Mt 28:19–20).

Disciples play a functional part in many of the incidents narrated in the Gospels, and they provide the occasion for much of the teaching. Integral to the gospel plot is the betrayal by Judas, one of the Twelve. In the metaplot of salvation-history, the disciples are to the church and the kingdom of God what the patriarchs were to Israel (Mt 19:28). A common motif is the disciples' slowness to understand that Jesus would have to suffer and rise from death in order to complete the pattern of his obedience to the Father.

The Meaning of Discipleship. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] concept of discipleship begins with the literal pictures of the Twelve as presented in the Gospels. The main meanings of the image include following Christ, loyalty to Christ and his work on earth, self-denial, aptness both to learn from Christ and to teach what has been learned, authority as Christ's spokespersons, and power to perform signs and wonders. An important image of the disciple is given in John 9. A man blind since birth is healed by Jesus (Jn 9:1–12), and the Pharisees investigate the miracle. The man who was healed becomes exasperated at the persistent questioning and asks, "Why do you want to hear it again? Do you want to become his disciples?” (Jn 9:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Pharisees become angry and describe themselves by declaring, “We are disciples of Moses!” (v. 28). Here a disciple is one who aligns with a particular teacher who acts as a spokesperson for God: “We know that God spoke to Moses”(v. 29).

From literal beginnings discipleship acquires metaphorical authority for all believers in Christ. The connotations of relatedness, trust and obligation endure through successive generations. The image is radical, for a changed life is fundamentally assumed; and it is dynamic, for progress and development are of the essence. According to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , whether or not one becomes a disciple of Jesus will be of huge importance for every individual at the judgment.

Although the call to discipleship is for “all peoples,” relatively few respond because Jesus demands priority above all social bonds, including those of kin. Discipleship is expressed in an obedience that is righteous and loving, even of enemies, to the point of one’s own death. It thus supplies a new paradigm for the old one of legal righteousness. The term is polysemic and generative, and it takes the serving disciple into the Way that crosses from here and now to the glory of the kingdom: “Whoever serves me must follow me; and where I am, my servant also will be” (Jn 12:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Jesus; Teacher, Teaching; Twelve.

Bibliography. J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus’ Call to Discipleship (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1992); R. P. Meye, Jesus and the Twelve: Discipleship and Revelation in Mark’s Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1968); M. J. Wilkins, Following the Master: Discipleship in the Steps of Jesus (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1991).

DISEASE AND HEALING

The Bible writers present a largely prescientific view of illness and see external forces as playing a significant part in the causation of disease. Sometimes the agent of disease is explicitly said to be evil in origin, though permitted by God. The sufferings of Job are explained in this way (Job 2:1–8). Another example is the apostle Paul, who describes his “thorn in the flesh” as “a messenger of Satan” (2 Cor 12:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Although the Lord’s response in this case is to encourage Paul in his weakness to rely on God’s power, such enemy activity is elsewhere opposed, and healing is seen as one of the means of demonstrating the arrival of the kingdom of God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Lk 13:10–16, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 11:20).

Illness is one of the key enemies over which Jesus takes authority in the first few chapters of Mark’s Gospel (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mk 1:32–34, 40–42; 2:1–12). Good health and healing are seen as marks of the blessing of God, and illness as an indication of his disfavor (Deut 7:15; 1 Sam 5:9; Ps 38:3; 41:1–4). God should therefore be consulted when someone becomes ill. King Asa, who sought help “only from the physicians” (2 Chron 16:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), is implicitly criticized for this. In several of the Psalms (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 32; 38; 41; 107) a number of symptoms are set out and then clearly related to the guilt of the suffering individual. God is actively involved in sending illness as a means of discipline or judgment (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Sam 12:15, Job 5:17–18; Ps 32:3–5; 38; Hab 3:3–5; Acts 12:21–23). This theme is picked up by Paul in his teaching on the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor 11:27–32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), where he says that the sin of eating and drinking “without recognizing the body of the Lord” leads to judgment and explains “why many among you are weak and sick.”

Another example of this is the case of Miriam in Numbers 12. When she and Aaron speak out against their brother Moses, God’s response is to afflict her with leprosy. Then following Moses’ intercession on her behalf, her punishment is commuted to a seven-day period of isolation outside the camp. The link between suffering illness and becoming an outcast is made explicit in Jeremiah 30:17. Related to this are the instructions for the recognition of infectious skin diseases set out in Leviticus 13. On making such a diagnosis the priest is to declare the sufferer “ceremonially unclean” (Lev 13:3) and place him in isolation. The terrible consequences of disobeying God are spelled out in Deuteronomy 28 and include a number of curses associated with illness. On the other hand, God’s promise to those of his people who obey his law is that “I will not bring on you any of the diseases I brought on the Egyptians, for I am the Lord who heals you” (Ex 15:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The link between sin/forgiveness and illness/healing is further implied by the psalmist’s description of the Lord as the one “who forgives all your sins and heals all your diseases” (Ps 103:3). This theme is reiterated by Isaiah: “No one living in Zion will say, ‘I am ill’; and the sins of those who dwell there will be forgiven” (Is 33:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In the Gospels the link between sin and illness is suggested by the account of the healing of the paralytic in Mark 2:1–12 (par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] Mt 9:1–8 and Lk 5:17–26). Rather than attend immediately to the physical problem of the man brought to him, Jesus begins by assuring him that his sins are forgiven. This link is made explicit by Jesus in John 5:14 and by James in his epistle: “Is any one of you sick? He should call the elders of the church to pray over him and anoint him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer offered in faith will make the sick person well; the Lord will raise him up. If he has sinned he will be forgiven. Therefore confess your sins to each other and pray for each other so that you may be healed. The prayer of a righteous man is powerful and effective” (Jas 5:14–16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). On the other hand, as John 9:2–3 shows, it is a mistake to assume that there is always a connection between disease and a specific sin in the life of the individual sufferer.

A crippled man (probably from polio) sacrifices to Ishtar, a goddess of healing.

The book of Isaiah begins with an oracle that uses the imagery of “wounds and bruises and open sores” (Is 1:6) to describe the effect of God’s judgment on the nation of Israel. Other prophets use similar language. Jeremiah often uses pictures of disease and healing to describe the destruction and subsequent restoration of Jerusalem (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 10:19; 14:17; 15:18; 30:12–17; 33:1–9; see also Mic 1:9). False prophets who proclaim an optimistic future are said to “dress the wound of my people as though it were not serious” (Jer 6:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also Lam 2:13–14). The prophet Nahum uses similar terms to describe the fate of the Assyrian capital, Nineveh (Nahum 3:18–19). Along the same lines the prophet Hosea uses pictures of sickness and sores to illustrate the effects of invading forces on the territories of Ephraim and Judah (Hos 5:8–15). Here again restoration is seen in terms of healing: “Come, let us return to the Lord. He has torn us to pieces but he will heal us; he has injured us but he will bind up our wounds” (Hos 6:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Miracles of healing are seen particularly in the ministry of Jesus. Even when the apostle Peter himself seems to be the agent of healing, he makes it very clear to Aeneas that “Jesus Christ heals you” (Acts 9:34). Matthew makes a point of stressing that Jesus healed “every disease and sickness among the people. News about him spread all over Syria, and people brought to him all who were ill with various diseases, those suffering severe pain, the demon-possessed, those having seizures, and the paralyzed, and he healed them” (Mt 4:23–24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This stress on Jesus healing “every” disease comes again in Matthew 9:35 and is part of the commission given to the twelve (Mt 10:1). The Gospels record Jesus quoting what must have been two well-known proverbs in connection with medicine: “Physician, heal yourself!” (Lk 4:23) and “It is not the healthy who need a doctor, but the sick” (Mt 9:12 and parallels). Isaiah’s prophecy claims that the wounds of the Suffering Servant result in healing for his people (Is 53:5). Peter picks this up in his first epistle: “He himself bore our sins in his body on the tree, so that we might die to sins and live for righteousness; by his wounds you have been healed” (1 Pet 2:24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Although many have taken this to mean physical healing, the context suggests that the spiritual healing of a restored relationship with God is what Peter has in mind here.

In describing the healing miracles of Jesus, Luke, a doctor, emphasized the power of God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , “the power of the Lord was present for him to heal the sick” [Lk 5:17] and “the people all tried to touch him, because power was coming from him and healing them all” [Lk 6:19]). Similarly in Acts Peter describes “how God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Spirit and power, and how he went around doing good and healing all who were under the power of the devil, because God was with him” (Acts 10:38 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). For Luke also the healings Jesus brings about are enacted parables of what it means to be under the rule of the kingdom of God (Lk 10:9).

The healing properties of the balm of Gilead (Gen 37:25; Jer 43:11) were well known. In Jeremiah its unavailability symbolizes the dire situation facing the nation of Israel: “Why then is there no healing for the wound of my people?” (Jer 8:11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 51:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Ezekiel’s vision of the new temple includes the picture of a mighty river along whose banks grow fruit trees. “Their leaves will not wither, nor will their fruit fail. Every month they will bear, because the water from the sanctuary flows to them. The fruit will serve for food and their leaves for healing” (Ezek 47:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This imagery is picked up in Revelation where “on each side of the river stood the tree of life, bearing twelve crops of fruit, yielding its fruit every month. And the leaves of the tree are for the healing of the nations” (Rev 22:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The healing effects of the sun are underlined by the promise of Malachi’s prophecy: “But for you who revere my name, the sun of righteousness will rise with healing in its wings” (Mal 4:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Pastoral Epistles apply the concept of health and wholeness to the teaching that takes place within the Christian community. False teaching within the body of Christ has the effects of gangrene, something which both spreads easily and is immensely destructive. Against this, Paul wants church members to be “sound in the faith” (Tit

1:13; 2:2), which will happen as they are taught and encouraged to hold onto “sound doctrine” (1 Tim 1:10; 6:3; 2 Tim 1:13; 4:3; Tit 1:9; 2:2, 8).

See also Affliction; Bruise, Bruising; Deformity; Demons; Evil; Jesus; Kingdom of God; Suffering; Weak, Weakness; Wound.

DISGUISE.

See Deception, Stories of.

DISOBEDIENCE.

See CIVIL Disobedience; Law; Rebel, Rebellion; Sin.

DIVIDING WALL.

See Ephesians, Letter To the; Wall.

DIVINATION.

See Magic; Oracle.

DIVINE COUNCIL.

See Assembly, Divine.

DIVINE COURT.

See Assembly, Divine.

DIVINE SHEPHERD.

See Sheep, Shepherd.

DIVINE WARRIOR

As the Israelites celebrated their deliverance from the Egyptian army on the far side of the sea, they envisioned God as a great warrior who fought on their behalf: “The Lord is a warrior; the Lord is his name” (Ex 15:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). At the other end of the canon, the church expectantly awaits the return of Jesus also in martial imagery: “Out of his mouth comes a sharp sword with which to strike down the nations” (Rev 19:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Indeed, throughout the Bible God appears as a powerful soldier who asserts his power against the evil of the world.

Israel and the entire ancient Near East knew almost constant warfare. Armies were always on the move, either in the interest of expanding imperial territories or defending against foreign encroachment. A warrior was a powerful person, either dangerous or comforting depending on whether he was attacking or defending. The biblical writers recognized God’s sovereignty over their history, and as they witnessed victory or defeat in warfare, they envisioned God’s presence in martial categories.

God as Israel’s Commander-in-Chief. God promised to protect Israel against their enemies as long as Israel remained loyal to him (Deut 28:7). When the need arose he revealed himself in the guise of a warrior. One of the most dramatic appearances of the divine warrior took place on the eve of the battle of Jericho. Near the city, Joshua encountered a figure with a drawn sword (Josh 5:13–15). Upon inquiry, the soldier identified himself as “commander of the army of the Lord.” Joshua’s response, similar to Moses’ response to the burning bush, leaves no doubt that the soldier is none other than God himself. God gives instructions to Joshua concerning the siege of Jericho (6:2–5), prefaced by the statement “I have given Jericho into your hands” (v. 2). The strategy results in the destruction of the imposing walls of the city without the army touching them, clearly demonstrating the divine origin of this victory.

A mesopotamian warrior god shoots his lightning arrow.

Throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , God repeatedly fought against Israel's flesh-and-blood enemies. Sometimes he used no apparent means to accomplish the victory, as in the case of Jericho; at other times he used nature itself (Josh 10:9–15). Still another method included the armies of Israel (2 Sam 5:22–25).

Throughout the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , Yahweh is invoked by his epithet š'ḇā'ôṭ. This epithet, though debated, is most naturally translated “armies,” or more traditionally, “hosts.” We are not surprised to find its occurrence in passages associated with the divine warrior theme. For instance, when David confronts Goliath in battle, he exclaims, “I come against you in the name of the Lord Almighty, the God of the armies of Israel” (1 Sam 17:45 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Lord's armies are both human and angelic.

The primary symbol of God's presence with the army was the ark of the covenant. Normally located in the most holy place of the sanctuary, the ark was removed in order to accompany the army during times of war. The account of the defeat of Jericho focuses on the ark of the covenant. The parade that circles the city walls centers on the ark, which symbolizes God's presence and power, the ultimate cause of the collapse of the city. The ark also led the Israelites as they marched in the wilderness toward the Promised Land. The battle call that began each day of march indicates quite clearly that the procession of Israel toward Canaan was the march of an army:

Rise up, O Lord!
May your enemies be scattered;

may your foes flee before you.

(Num 10:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The story of the defeat of the Israelite army at the hands of the Philistines, with the consequent capture of the ark demonstrates that the ark is not a magical talisman but a powerful symbol of God's power that cannot be manipulated apart from the will of God (1 Sam 4:1–11). The following episode makes it clear that God is able to win the battle if he so chooses: the Philistines cart the ark back to their home country and God responds by afflicting the Israelites with disease and trouble (1 Sam 5:1–7:1).

The Divine Warrior For and Against Israel. When God appears as the divine warrior in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , he most often comes to save his people from their enemies. This happens from the time of the crossing of the Red Sea until late in the history of Israel.

The divine warrior theme is closely connected to the idea of covenant in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . God reveals himself as king through covenant-treaty and then promises to protect his subject people from danger threatened by their enemies. We can see this in the blessings that flow if the law of the covenant is obeyed. In Deuteronomy 28:7 God the king promises that if Israel obeys him, “The Lord will grant that the enemies who rise up against you will be defeated before you. They will come at you from one direction but flee from you in seven” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). He does this many times in the history of Israel, appearing in a variety of forms and using different means to win the battle.

God often uses forces of nature, his own creation, as his weapons. At the crossing of the Red Sea when Israel is saved and Egypt judged, God uses the winds to push back the waters of the Sea to allow Israel safe access to the other side and then collapses the waters to kill the Egyptians (Ex 14 and 15). Later when Joshua fights against a coalition of southern Canaanite kings, God uses large hailstones to kill the enemy and causes the sun to stop in the sky so there would be more daylight in which to finish the battle (Josh 10:1–15).

On other occasions God uses his heavenly army to fight Israel's enemies. Perhaps there is a hint of this during David's wars with the Philistines when God instructs David to wait until he hears the sound of marching in the balsam trees before he attacks. The sound of marching indicates that "the Lord has gone in front of you" (2 Sam 5:22–25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). A vivid picture of God's heavenly army is presented in 2 Kings 6:6–23, when the Arameans move against the city of Dothan where the prophet Elisha and his followers are located. The defenseless city and its inhabitants are easy prey to the foreign army, and one of Elisha's servants trembles with fear. To calm him, Elisha prays that God would show him the reality of the situation. In response the servant sees the Aramean army surrounded by the "horses and chariots of fire" (2 Kings 6:17) of the divine army.

But perhaps most frequently, God uses his people to win the battle, though the people he has chosen are hardly experienced soldiers or large armies. The two most notable instances of this are Gideon and David. God chooses Gideon to rid the land of the foreign intruder (Judges 6–8). As he sets out to gather his army, God warns Gideon that he has too many soldiers in his army. He then instructs his human war leader to pare the army down from an original thirty-two thousand to a small force of three hundred, which he then uses to defeat Midian's superior force.

On an individual level we observe the same principle at work in the hand-to-hand combat of David and Goliath. Goliath is a mercenary, an experienced soldier fully armed with formidable weapons. David, on the other hand, is visiting from tending his father's flock, without armor and armed with a simple slingshot (1 Sam 17). In this story we observe not only the principle that large numbers are unnecessary in the battles of the divine warrior, but also that superior weaponry is unneeded. David expresses his trust in the ability of God the divine warrior to win the battle in his challenge to Goliath:

You come against me with sword and spear and javelin, but I come against you in the name of the Lord Almighty, the God of the armies of Israel, whom you have defied. This day the Lord will hand you over to me, and I'll strike you down and cut off your head. Today I will give the carcasses of the Philistine army to the birds of the air and the beasts of the earth, and the whole world will know that there is a God in Israel. All those gathered here will know that it is not by sword or spear that the Lord saves; for the battle is the Lord's, and he will give all of you into our hands. (1 Sam 17:45—47 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The significance of the divine warrior motif in these stories is that God is the one who wins victories for Israel. They defeat the enemy, not because of their own strength or superior intelligence but because God has fought for them. As God himself expressed to Gideon, "You have too many men for me to deliver Midian into their hands." Why are there too many men? The Lord feared that Israel "may boast against me that her own strength has delivered her" (Judg 7:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Since it is God who delivers as divine warrior, the only proper response to victory is a psalm of praise. For instance, Psalm 98 was sung immediately following victory. Other striking examples of songs sung after victory may be found in Exodus 15, Judges 5 and Psalm 24.

But God also fights against Israel. The divine warrior theme plays an important role in Israel's defeats as well as its victories. In his covenant with Israel, God not only promises his military help when his people trust and obey him but also indicates that he will abandon them and even fight against them if they are rebellious. As the blessing of divine military victory flows from obedience to the law, so defeat will follow disobedience:

The Lord will cause you to be defeated before your enemies. You will come at them from one direction but flee from them in seven, and you will become a thing of horror to all the kingdoms on earth. Your carcasses will be food for all the birds of the air and the beasts of the earth, and there will be no one to frighten them away. (Deut 28:25–26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Immediately following the great victory over the powerful city of Jericho, Israel under Joshua experiences a devastating defeat from the tiny city of Ai, whose name means “ruin” (Josh 7). The defeat is attributable to the disobedience of one member of the covenant community, Achan, with the result that God does not appear as divine warrior on their behalf. Israel “violated the covenant” (Josh 7:11), so God “would not be with [them] anymore” (Josh 7:12).

Most striking, though, is the destruction of Jerusalem at the time of the Babylonian attack that led to the exile. The book of Lamentations records the lament that follows the devastation of that city and its temple. The faithful demonstrate the proper perspective on the matter. It was not the Babylonians who caused the horrible destruction, but rather:

The Lord is like an enemy;
he has swallowed up Israel.

He has swallowed up all her palaces and destroyed her strongholds.

He has multiplied mourning and lamentation for the Daughter of Judah. (Lam 2:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

Throughout Lamentations, God is pictured as a warrior who fights against and not for his chosen people.

The Divine Warrior As Future Deliverer of Israel. Though to many the exile seemed like the end to Israel's relationship to God, in reality it was just a new beginning. In 539 b.c., through an edict from the Persian overlord Cyrus, a small remnant returned to the land and eventually rebuilt the temple. Nonetheless, Israel was just a shadow of its previous greatness and continued to live under foreign domination.

God gave the prophets of the time a vision of a changed future. It would be a future in which God's people would no longer be dragged underfoot. This vision was inaugurated by the divine warrior theme. God would appear and fight on behalf of his people in order to free them from their enemies. Examples may be found in the late exilic and postexilic prophets Daniel and Zechariah:

In my vision at night I looked, and there before me was one like a son of man, coming with the clouds of heaven. He approached the Ancient of Days and was led into his presence. He was given authority, glory and sovereign power; all peoples, nations and men of every language worshipped him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion that will not pass away, and his kingdom is one that will never be destroyed. (Dan 7:13—14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

A day of the Lord is coming when your plunder will be divided among you... Then the Lord will go out and fight against those nations, as he fights in the day of battle ... Then the Lord my God will come, and all the holy ones with him. (Zech 14:1, 3, 5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

It is on this note that the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ends, looking forward to a reappearance of the divine warrior.

Jesus the Divine Warrior. Jesus' ministry opens in the Judean wilderness. John the Baptist announces his coming with words reminiscent of the late prophets of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] :

But after me will come one who is more powerful than I, whose sandals I am not fit to carry. He will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire. His winnowing fork is in his hand, and he will clear his threshing floor, gathering his wheat into the barn and burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire. (Mt 3:11–12)

Though not using specifically martial imagery, John's words anticipate a combative Messiah. Thus when Jesus begins his ministry by healing, performing exorcisms and preaching the good news, John is confused to the point of even questioning Jesus' identity (Mt 11:1–19).

Jesus responds to John's questions, brought by John's disciples, by his actions of healing, exorcisms and preaching. As subsequent events and the book of Revelation demonstrate, Jesus intended thereby to show his continuity with the divine warrior theme, though the object of his warfare has shifted from the flesh-and-blood enemies of God's people to the spiritual powers that empower evil in the world.

Thus Paul could later look back on the death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus Christ in the light of divine warrior imagery. For instance, in Colossians 2:13–15 he culminates his argument with divine warrior language: “And having disarmed the powers and authorities, he made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross” (Col 2:15 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Ephesians 4:8 he cites an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] divine warrior hymn (Ps 68) and so casts the ascension as a triumphal parade: “When he ascended on high, he led captives in his train and gave gifts to men.” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) Thus the divine warrior theme is pressed into service in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] to describe Jesus’ victory over Satan on the cross.

Though Satan was defeated, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] also understands that for a time he is still able to cause great distress. The period of time between the cross and Christ’s return is the time between the battle that secured the ultimate victory and the final defeat and cessation of hostility. In the meantime the battle continues, and the church is called upon to wage war against God’s enemies just as Israel was God’s army in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The difference is that the church’s weapons are spiritual, not physical:

Finally, be strong in the Lord and in his mighty power. Put on the full armor of God so that you can take your stand against the devil’s schemes. For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms. (Eph 6:10–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 6:10–20)

The Divine Warrior’s Final Battle. Though Jesus defeated Satan on the cross, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] informs us that the Jesus, the divine warrior, will appear again in the future to finalize the victory and to rid the cosmos of Satan and all evil. According to the apocalyptic writings of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , the church is in the same situation as the Israelites at the end of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] period: waiting for a decisive intervention of the divine warrior.

Jesus himself taught that he would return as a warrior. In the so-called Little Apocalypse of Mark 13, he warns of the future violent end to history when he will return on the “clouds.” This reference to the vehicular cloud evokes memories of Yahweh as the one who rode clouds into battle on behalf of his people (Ps 68:4; Dan 7:13; Nahum 1:3).

However it is the book of Revelation that is replete with references to the coming battles of Jesus the divine warrior. Revelation 19:11–17 is made up of a pastiche of passages from Deuteronomy, Psalms and Isaiah that describe Yahweh as the divine warrior. In this passage Jesus appears on a war horse with drawn sword. He is dressed “in a robe dipped in blood” (Rev 19:13). The armies of heaven march behind him. He then engages in victorious warfare against “the beast and the kings of the earth and their armies” (Rev. 19:19).

Thus from Genesis to Revelation we encounter the image of God as a warrior. The object of his warfare changes throughout redemptive history. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , God fights against flesh and blood enemies. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Jesus directs the church in a battle against the spiritual forces of evil while it also anticipates the climactic war that takes place at the end of history.

See also Armor; Arrow, Arrow of God; Battle Stories; Enemies; Weapons, Human and Divine.

Bibliography. V. Eller, War and Peace from Genesis to Revelation (Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1981); M. C. Lind, Yahweh is a Warrior (Scottsdale, PA: Herald, 1980); T. Longman III and D. G. Reid, God is a Warrior (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); G. von Rad, Holy War in Ancient Israel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991 [1958]).

DOGS

Although the phrase “a dog’s life” epitomizes a life of ease devoid of anxiety in contemporary Western society, a “dog’s life” in a biblical context shocks the reader with visions of squalor, dismal poverty and the life of a pariah at the bottom of the social scale.

A pair of prized Egyptian hunting dogs.

Dogs are repeatedly depicted in terms of their disgusting and inadequate diet. Typically they devour what is left over after humans are finished eating, and that is usually described as mere crumbs (Mt 15:26, 27; Mk 7:27, 28). One certainly does not give them quality fare (Mt 7:6).

Consequently dogs are never satisfied and are constantly on the lookout for nourishment. Since what they manage to scavenge is inadequate, they may consume what is repulsive (Prov 26:11; 2 Pet 2:22) or what is not fit for human consumption (Ex 22:31).

Of all the domesticated animals there is a particular revulsion for the dog, who alone is willing to eat humans corpses, a fact that is reprehensible to every human and exploited uniquely by the book of Kings as a curse that comes upon wicked dynasts (1 Kings 14:11; 16:4; 21:23, 24; 2 Kings 9:10, 36). A threatened psalmist mingles all these elements when he describes his enemies as those “howling like dogs and prowling about the city. They roam about for food, and growl if they do not get their fill” (Ps 59:14–15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The metaphor applies appropriately to Israel’s greedy leaders: “They are dogs with mighty appetites; they never have enough” (Is 56:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

It is not surprising that dogs are more than once juxtaposed with swine in the Bible (Is 66:3; Mt 7:6; 2 Pet 2:22) for both are ritually unclean animals whose repulsive behavior even for animals strikes humans as foolish or even bizarre.

After making the point that human existence is “full of evil” (Eccles 9:3), Qoheleth, the main speaker in the book, does state that it is better to be alive than dead, though only barely: “even a live dog is better off than a dead lion!” (Eccles 9:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

To identify oneself as a dog is therefore to draw attention to one’s miserable condition as an inconsequential creature (“a dead dog” 1 Sam 24:14; 2 Sam 9:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) or to the miserable treatment that one is receiving (1 Sam 17:43; 2 Sam 3:8; 2 Kings 8:13). To refer to another human as a dog is to insult the other as among the lowest in the social scale (2 Sam 16:9). Jesus seems to intentionally echo Jewish sentiments toward Gentiles when he rebuffs the entreaty of the Syro-Phoenecian woman with the words, “it is not right to take the children’s bread and toss it to their dogs” (Mk 7:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But accepting the designation—and the priority of Jews and then Gentiles—she responds in faith, “Yes, Lord, ... but even the dogs under the table eat the children’s crumbs” (Mk 7:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul, on the other hand, spares no imagery when he warns the Philippians against the Judaizers who are attempting to rob them of full membership in the people of God: “Watch out for the dogs!” (Phil 3:2).

See also Animals.

DOMINEERING MOTHER, WIFE

Shrewish wives have been a staple of comic literature through the centuries. The Bible has its version of the same archetype in the form of mothers and wives who dominate either their children or husbands, though in the Bible it is cause for tragedy rather than laughter.

The book of Genesis provides the earliest examples (as it does for most patterns of family relationships). The motif emerges in latent form when Abraham, for the first time in the narrative, “hearkened to the voice of Sarai” (Gen 16:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) rather than God when Sarah proposed having a child by her maid. Sarah’s domination in the situation proceeds when, in response to Hagar’s taunting, Sarah not only “dealt harshly” with Hagar but also pressured her husband to the point that he responded, “Behold, your maid is in your power; do to her as you please” (Gen 16:6). A generation later Rebekah tries to outwit her decrepit husband and pushes her compliant son Jacob into a plot to deceive his father in the celebrated case of the stolen blessing (Gen 27). Later still Potiphar’s wife, skillful in perpetrating treachery against the virtuous young servant Joseph, uses racial rhetoric to inflame her husband to imprison Joseph, contrary to anything he would have done if left to his own designs (Gen 39:6–20).

Later OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history provides further examples. Delilah, though never technically identified as a wife, plays the role of the domineering female by contriving to rob Samson of his strength and deliver him into the power of her compatriots (Judg 16). Solomon provides the most extravagant example of all: his one thousand wives and concubines “turned away his heart after other gods” (1 Kings 11:4). The wicked Jezebel dominates her husband Ahab by inclining him toward pagan religious practices (1 Kings 16:29–33) and by grabbing the initiative in seizing Naboth's vineyard for her pouting husband (1 Kings 21). The narrator, in fact, describes Ahab as someone who “sold himself to do what was evil in the sight of the Lord” and as someone “whom Jezebel his wife incited” (1 Kings 21:25; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 2:20–23, which apparently seizes upon Jezebel as an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] epitome of apostasy).

The shrewish wife makes an appearance in the book of Proverbs. “A wife's quarreling,” claims one of the proverbs, “is a continual dripping of rain” (Prov 19:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Again, “It is better to live in a corner of the housetop than in a house shared with a contentious woman” (Prov 21:9; 25:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Finally, “A continual dripping on a rainy day and a contentious woman are alike; to restrain her is to restrain the wind or to grasp oil in his right hand” (Prov 27:15–16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). While the picture of Job's wife is not completely clear, there may be a touch of the shrew in her: she gives her husband some very bad advice in encouraging him to “curse God, and die,” to which Job replies, “You speak as one of the foolish women would speak” (Job 2:9–10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The only NT [NT NT. New Testament] example of the archetype is Herodias. She hoodwinks her husband into granting her whatever she wishes when her daughter dances before him, an intrigue that eventuates in the beheading of John the Baptist (Mk 6:14–29).

See also Man, Images of; Mother; Tyrannical Husband, Father; Wife; Woman, Images of.

DONKEY, ASS

We must take care not to read our own attitudes toward the donkey into the biblical materials. In Christian tradition the ass is a symbol of absurdity (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the motif of the ass musician) and obstinacy, as well as the mount of the demon of sloth; and the red donkey becomes a figure of Satan. But respected rabbis rode asses. Furthermore, Ugaritic sources depict deities on the backs of donkeys, Islamic tradition calls several heroes “donkey-riders” and the early Christian tale Vita Sanctae Pelagiae Meretricis presents as the apex of beauty and sensuality a woman riding on a donkey. Clearly attitudes have differed from place to place and time to time. Not all have consistently thought the donkey “perverse” (Plato) or “the meanest of animals” (Minucius Felix).

In the Bible the donkey is a beast of burden (Gen 42:26) and a plow of fields (Is 30:24). But its main function is as a vehicle for rich and poor alike (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the popular story of Balaam’s ass in Numbers 22). Despite its widespread use by all, the donkey and the mule were also evidently a staple of ancient Near Eastern royal ceremony. In 1 Kings 1:33–44 Solomon rides David’s mule to Gihon to be anointed king (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 13:19; 19:26). Riding on a donkey for ceremonial entry into a city is already an act of kingship in the royal archives of Mari; and in the old Sumerian text “Gilgamesh and Agga,” the sons of kings ride donkeys. It has been urged that because Genesis predicts kingly descendants for Abraham’s offspring, the frequent reference to the donkeys of the patriarchs may be a royal motif.

The royal associations of the donkey are behind Zechariah 9:9, a prophecy of Jerusalem’s king riding on an ass. Matthew 21:5 and John 12:15 cite this prophecy as having been fulfilled in Jesus’ entry into Jerusalem. That Jesus rides not a war horse but the donkey of Zechariah 9:9 makes him (like Moses, who also rode an ass [Ex 4:20]) “meek.” His chosen beast does not show him to be a poor or common man but a king, albeit one who does not conquer. Clearly he is innocent of the charge of rebelling against Caesar. A man on a donkey is not looking for war. One is reminded of the Eastern iconographic tradition in which Christ rides his donkey sidesaddle—the traditional posture of a woman, not a warrior.

Zechariah 9:9 is not the only OT [OT OT. Old Testament] text about donkeys connected with Jesus’ triumphal entry. Not only does the prophecy that the disciples will find a colt (Mk 11:2 and parallels) remind one of 1 Samuel 10:1—9 (Samuel’s prophecy of the finding of lost asses), but the seemingly superfluous mention that this colt will be “tied” probably alludes to Genesis 49:11 (“binding his foal to the vine and his ass’s colt to the choice vine” RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This line was given a messianic interpretation in Judaism (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 49:10 LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] ; rabbinic sources naturally associate Gen 49:11 and Zech 9:9).

See also Animals; Horse.

DOOR

Doors and doorways are places of transition. We move through them to the outside or into another room to greet new people; we close doors and find quiet and solitude. The door is an important symbol for the biblical writers. The doorway, gate, portal or entryway is often associated with entrance into areas of great spiritual significance. The various courts in the temple area were marked by walls and portals, and the Holy of Holies in the temple was sealed off for all but one day of the year (see Sacred Space). Then the high priest, after appropriate ceremonies, would enter to represent the people before God.

The biblical writers use this almost primal association of doors and religious boundaries, but more often the imagery of door is connected quite closely to its literal work of opening and closing (see Shut, Close) and of hiding and revealing. The door is one of the most significant parts of a house, and at times biblical writers use it as a synecdoche for an entire house (see Home, House). In the well-ordered, God-fearing Hebrew home, doors were to bear words testifying to God's truth (Deut 6:9). This figurative language speaks of a house oriented around God's law.

The Closed Door Hides. The closed door literally keeps those outside from seeing and hearing what is going on inside (1 King 14:6). The closed door hides the activities of the prostitute, but the open door where she sits seeking to entice men is mysteriously inviting (Prov 9:14). Job implies that to violate a shut door by eavesdropping or loitering would be an action worthy of divine punishment. In his own defense he claims that he has not "lurked at my neighbor's door" (Job 31:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus uses this image, with a hyperbolic edge, when he calls for people not to pray like the hypocrites who make showy public prayers, "But when you pray, go into your room, close the door and pray to your Father, who is unseen. Then your Father, who sees what is done in secret, will reward you" (Mt 6:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Privacy would be a scarce commodity in first-century Palestine. Many of the houses would only have had one interior door, and that was for a storage closet.

The Closed Door Excludes. Just as the drawn curtain and closed door of the temple excluded unauthorized persons from the sacred spaces, so doors in everyday life exclude one. After the brutal rape of Tamar by Amnon, he ordered her put out and the door bolted behind her (2 Sam 13:17, 18).

The brutality of the rape is reprehensible, but for Tamar this act of exclusion is utterly devastating.

The image of the closed door that will not yield to knocking is used by Jesus. A time will come when those who have rejected him will be excluded from the festivities by a closed door that will not be opened (Mt 25:10; Lk 13:25; Rev. 3:7).

The Door as Spiritual Entryway. Jesus refers to himself as “the door” (Jn 10:9). In the context this certainly refers to being a door for the sheep and hence the gate or entryway to salvation. When the risen Christ stands at the door and knocks—“Here I am! I stand at the door and knock. If anyone hears my voice and opens the door, I will come in and eat with him, and he with me” (Rev 3:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])—the door symbolizes the need for a decision and the potential exclusion of Christ.

The door imagery is also used to give a word of comfort to beleaguered Christians when Christ declares, “I know your deeds. See, I have placed before you an open door that no one can shut. I know that you have little strength, yet you have kept my word and have not denied my name” (Rev 3:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul used the metaphor of God’s opening the “door of faith” (Acts 14:27) as showing the exclusive way of faith as the portal through which people enter the kingdom of God.

The Door as Opportunities for the Gospel. Paul uses door imagery three times to figuratively describe opportunities provided for the spread of the gospel. This imagery contains the idea that the open door makes possible that which a closed door would not. These references harken back to Hosea 2:15, which speaks in salvific terms of a “door of hope” that the Lord will provide. Paul writes that “a great door for effective work has opened to me” (1 Cor 16:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When he visited Troas, Paul found that “the Lord had opened a door for me”; later he prayed that “God may open a door for our message” (Col 4:3). In all of these references door speaks figuratively about an opportunity to spread the gospel.

Key Events at Doors. We can note, finally, some famous moments in the Bible in which the crucial event happens at a door. The list includes the monster sin either couching (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) or crouching (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) or lurking (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) at the door of Cain’s heart (Gen 4:7), the closed door of the ark that signals safety for Noah and his family (Gen 6:16; 7:16), the door of Lot’s house that foils the would-be rapists (Gen 19:10), the blood-signed doorposts of the Israelites on the evening of the Passover (Ex 12:22–23), the locked doors of Eglon’s chamber that enable Ehud to make his get-away after the assassination (Judg 3:23–25), the “ancient doors” that are commanded to be lifted up so the King of glory may come in (Ps 24:7, 9) and the door of every individual’s soul at which Jesus stands and knocks, ready to enter and sup (Rev 3:20).

See also Gate; Open, Opening; Shut, Close.

DOVE

The dove is above all a bird for sacrifice, as was true already in the time of Abraham (Gen 15:9). According to Leviticus 1:14, if one’s offering is a burnt offering of birds, then they will be turtledoves or young pigeons. The unpleasant ritual, which involves the priest wringing the neck, draining the blood and tearing off the wings, is recounted in Leviticus 1:15–17. Elsewhere we read that doves and pigeons are the offerings of the poor, those who cannot afford a sacrifice from a flock (Lev 5:7; 14:21–22). But these are perhaps not the poorest of the poor, for there are those who cannot even afford to offer birds (Lev 5:11). In addition to being burnt offerings, pigeons and doves can be sin offerings (Lev 5:7–10; 12:6 [for purification after childbirth; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 2:22–24]; 14:22, 30 [for the cleansing of leprosy]; 15:14 [for cleansing from a bodily emission]). When Jesus overturns the seats of those who sell pigeons in the temple, he is disrupting the activities of suppliers of sacrifices for the temple (Mt 21:12 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]).

When the rains that have flooded the earth cease, Noah, after an unsuccessful experiment with a raven (black and unclean, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 14:11–20), three times sends forth a dove (yônâ). The first time it returns to a waiting Noah (Nōah) because it finds no “resting place” (mānôah). So he puts forth his hand and, seemingly with affection, takes the bird into the ark. The second time it returns with a freshly plucked olive leaf—a sign of renewed fertility and so of dry ground—and consoles Noah. The third time the dove does not return, for it has found another place to nest. Although Noah’s dove is seemingly nowhere mentioned or even alluded to in the Bible outside of Genesis 8, the image of a dove with an olive branch in its beak has appropriately become a sign of peace: the storm is over.

The voice of the dove is mentioned in Isaiah 38:14: “I moan like a dove” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 9:11, “we moan and moan like doves”; Ezek 7:16; Nahum 2:7). Because that voice can sound sad to us, human lamentation is likened to it (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the “mourning dove”).

The dove appears in a number of metaphors and similes. Ephraim “is like a dove, silly and without sense, calling to Egypt, going to Assyria” (Hos 7:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This is an unusual comparison in that here no good quality is in view. But the same notion may lie behind Matthew 10:16, where the disciples are to be wise as serpents (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 3:1) and “innocent” as doves. Because doves are harmless and not particularly bright animals, this may mean that the disciples should emulate the dove’s ignorance, at least when it comes to evil (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 16:19).

In Hosea 11:11 Israel’s speedy return from exile is likened to the swift flight of doves (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 60:8, implying the domestication of pigeons). Israel may also be implicitly likened to a dove in Psalm 68:13, but the meaning of the Hebrew is disputed. The thought of swift flight further appears in Psalm 55:6: “O that I had wings like a dove!” In Psalm 74:19 the righteous psalmist prays that “the soul of thy dove” not be delivered “to the wild beasts.” Here the dove is a victim (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] its sacrificial role).

The dove’s ability to hide and nest in hidden, out-of-the-way places is the basis for comparisons in Song of Songs 2:14 (a plea for a lover to leave home); Jeremiah 48:28 (mocking advice to Moab to find a refuge from God’s wrath); and Ezekiel 7:16 (of Jerusalemites fleeing judgment). Because of the dove’s softness, beauty of feathers and eyes, and affection for and faithfulness to its mate, Song of Songs several times likens the lover to a dove (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Song 1:15; 2:14; 4:1; 5:2, 12; 6:9).

Because of our tendency to think of the other world as above our heads, winged animals generally symbolize spiritual things throughout world mythology. So it is not surprising that the most striking appearance of dove imagery in the Bible belongs to the baptismal narratives, where the Spirit of God descends from heaven “like a dove” (Mt 3:16 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)]). Whether the expression qualifies Spirit, so that we are to envisage the Spirit as having the form of a dove, or whether the words are adverbial and refer instead to the manner of the Spirit's descent is unclear. But one should probably think of Genesis 1:2, where the Spirit of God, water and the image of a bird recur (merahepet = 'move' or 'hover' is avian imagery, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 32:11). The Talmud (b. Hag. 15a) likens the brooding of the Spirit over the waters at creation to the fluttering of a dove, and 4Q521, a Dead Sea Scroll fragment, gives Genesis 1:2 an eschatological reapplication: the Spirit will hover over the saints in the latter days. So the dove at the baptism seemingly means that Jesus brings a new creation.

See also Birds; Eagle; Holy Spirit.

DOWNPAYMENT, EARNEST.

See Legal Images.

DRAGON.

See Monsters.

DRAMA.

See Theater.

DRAWING NEAR.

See Near, Drawing Near.

DREAMS, VISIONS

Dreams and their uses and images are an integral part of the oldest stories both within the Bible and without. The ancients recognized both dreams and visions but frequently used the terms interchangeably. Scripture mentions night visions (Dan 2:19; 7:2, 7, 13; Micah 3:6; Acts 18:9) and visions of the night (Gen 46:2; Job 4:13; 20:8; 33:15; Is 29:7). Just as with visions, so also the text often specifies that dreams happen at night (Gen 20:3; 31:24; 40:5; 41:11; 1 Kings 3:5). In poetic passages especially, dreams occur parallel to visions (Job 33:15; Is 29:7; Dan 7:1–2). Given this usage it would be unwise to attempt any distinction, other than the obvious, that visions are usually daytime events while dreams seem confined to the night. God breaks into the human experience through both dreams and visions.

Dreams as the Voice of God in the Night. The frequency and significance of dreams mentioned in Scripture stems from their import as divine revelation to a particular individual. All dreams in antiquity were not necessarily considered divine, but with few exceptions (see below) ordinary dreams and nightmares play little or no part in the plot of most biblical narratives. The text repeatedly mentions dreams as one of the common means of “inquiring of the Lord” (a technical term for seeking an oracle), raising the possibility that dream seeking is the method of inquiry when no method is specified, especially when the word of the Lord comes by night (1 Sam 3, esp. [esp. esp.. especially] v. 15; 2 Sam 7:4, 17).

At times divine messages receive indirect mention (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , cryptic to us as foreigners) when the context or situation imply the medium of a dream. The “word of the Lord” need not be overtly labeled a dream to be one. The text sometimes mentions such revelatory encounters without using the word dream. Perhaps many more “inquirings of God” actually refer to dreams even without directly mentioning them. The word of the Lord comes at night to Nathan (2 Sam 7:4, 17 par. [par. par.. parallel passage in another/other Gospel(s)] 1 Chron 17:3, 15) and to Gideon (Judges 6:25; 7:9). Isaiah says, “My soul yearns for you in the night, my spirit within me earnestly seeks you” (Is 26:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Hosea observes that prophets in particular stumble by night (Hos 4:4). Micah describes the absence of revelation as a night without a vision (Micah 3:6). When the word of the Lord came to Zechariah, he relates, “In the night I saw ...” (Zech 1:8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Night is the expected time to hear the voice of God or witness his revelation. Even so the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] also sets the precedent for even daytime visions accompanied by deep sleep (Gen 15:12), and the NT [NT NT. New Testament] follows (Acts 10:10; 22:17).

Dreams as Transparent or Obscure. In some dreams the narrative is streamlined or God speaks directly (Gen 31:24); others are symbolic, yet still obvious. Joseph’s brothers need no interpreter to understand the standard symbolism in his dreams (Gen 37:8). Even his doting father wearies of their transparent meanings. The dream of Gideon’s enemy needs no explanation (Judg 7:13). Other dreams couch their truth in metaphor so obscure that a skilled wise man (such as Joseph or Daniel) is required to render them intelligible. Pharaoh’s cows do require explanation (Gen 41), and so do the baker’s and the butler’s dreams (Gen 40:5–19). (Pharaoh’s dream is given twice to mark it as sure; Peter’s vision [Acts 10:16] occurs three times to mark its significance, but he doesn’t understand it until later [v. 17].) Nebuchadnezzar’s dream ups the ante, requiring not only interpretation but recall as well (Dan 2). Some dream revelations are so difficult for humanity to understand that to do so is like trying to read a sealed scroll (Is 29:11). In his allusion to Isaiah’s metaphor, John observes that humanity is unworthy to open the scroll (Rev 5:1–2), implying that if revelatory dreams are obscure, it is because God has no people worth talking to.

Dreams as Oracles (Answers Sought from God). The very common OT [OT OT. Old Testament] phrase “inquired of the Lord” indicates consultation of the divine oracle, often by dreams. In most ancient societies, people sought out divine oracles by sleeping in sacred precincts that would inspire a dream, so called incubation dreams. The pharaohs record that they slept in temples seeking dreams, as did the royalty at Ugarit. The Assyrian monarch, as chief of the oracle priests, received dreams at night in the temple. Greek suppliants learned how to be cured through dreams given in the temple of Asclepius.

The Bible mentions that pagan deities communicated in this way (Is 65:4), but some of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] heroes seem to have contacted God in a similar fashion. Jacob, because of a dream, anoints his stone pillow and gives it the name Beth-El, “sanctuary” or “god-house” (Gen 28). Samuel, when the word of the Lord and visions had become infrequent, slept not in his own quarters as did his mentor Eli, but in the sanctuary instead (1 Sam 3:1–3), probably seeking his initial oracular dream (1 Sam 3:7). The vividness of the voice in his dream vision (1 Sam 3:15) seems to have awakened Samuel, disrupted the oracle and astonished him; but it did not astonish the experienced Eli. (The career of Samuel as God’s mouthpiece is bracketed by the voice incident of 1 Sam 3:1, which establishes him as prophet [1 Sam 3:20], and the Endor incident of 1 Sam 28:14, marking his final oracular insight into the future. In each case once for his predecessor and once for his replacement, the oracle forebodes ominous consequences.) Solomon slept at the great high place in Gibeon for his dream from God (1 Kings 3:4, 5). When this expected channel is shut down, Saul complains that God no longer answers him by dreams (1 Sam 28:15).

Like the technique of incubation dreams in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament], in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] visions come to those who pray: Zechariah (Lk 1:10–11), Jesus at the Transfiguration (Lk 9:29), Cornelius (Acts 10:2–3), Peter (Acts 10:9–10; 11:5), Paul (Acts 9:11–12; 22:17; 23:11).

God uses dreams to reveal his message; however, some forms of oracular inquiry are off limits. Necromancy (consulting the spirits of the departed) is strictly prohibited as an abomination (Lev 19:31; 20:6; Deut 18:11), yet the lure of predictions from the dead kept the practice alive. Passages in Isaiah refer to incubation dreams in tombs to obtain revelations from nether-world deities and spirits (Is 8:19–20; 28:15–22; 65:4). In the ancient world the belief was prevalent that spirits of the departed could impart their dim understanding of the future to those in this world through dreams. As in other cases (see Oracles) it is not the oracular technique that is unacceptable, but service to any spirit other than God (Ex 20:5).

Dreams as Oracles. Dreams, then, are clearly a large subset of oracles. Just as oracles from God can come through pagan prophets (Balaam), so too the dreams of the enemy can be omens from God (Judg 7:13–15). God does not hesitate to send dreams to non-Israelites (Gen 20:3; Mt 27:19). In response to Jacob's financial concerns, God sends a dream to Jacob in order to inform him that his attempts at animal husbandry had nothing to do with the amazing increase of the flocks for which he had contracted with Laban as his wages (Gen 31:10–12). This God-given insight to Jacob, the supplanter (his Hebrew name means "Heel" or "Crook"), parallels the figure of wily Odysseus and his divine gift of craftiness.

Dreams as Spirits or Angels: Angels as Dreams. Underlying the use of dreams as revelation is the tacit belief that spirits bring the dream. Such a view is nearly universal in cultures which value dreams. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] states both that the Lord and the angel of the Lord appears or speaks in dreams: "God said in a dream" (Gen 20:6), "God came in a dream by night and said” (Gen 31:24), but also “the angel of God said in a dream” (Gen 31:11). Angels debate and explain Daniel’s vision (Dan 8:13–16). The Hebrew and Greek words translated “angel” mean “messenger.” Angels naturally accompany the dream messages they carry. Based on such OT [OT OT. Old Testament] precedents all the angel appearances that Matthew narrates occur “during a dream” (Mt 1:20, 24; 2:12, 13, 19, 22). In fact, visions and angels coincided so often that the appearance of an angel suggests to Peter an “unreal” state of mind (Acts 12:9). An angel brings John’s apocalyptic vision (Rev 1:1).

As a dark parallel to God’s use of dreams, God’s enemies also manipulate humanity’s thoughts. The people of antiquity reasoned that if angels were the messengers that brought God’s message in dream form, bad angels, messengers of Satan, could bring bad dreams. For Job, as for his contemporaries in Mesopotamia and Greece, the dream “amid visions of the night” is carried by a “spirit,” an “indiscernible form” and a “voice” that “glides past the face,” producing “chills,” uttering “a stealthy word” that “the ear receives as a whisper” (Job 4:12–16). Outside of Scripture the phrase “terrors of the night” designates nightmares, and it appears in a list of spiritual evils in Psalm 91:5. The amulets and incantations (see Magic) written by contemporary exorcists focused on preventing nightmares by adjuring demons not to return. Sexual dreams were viewed as demonic rape (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Tobit 6:14). Texts such as Psalm 91 and 121 provide comfort and allay such very real fears by assuring God’s sleepless protection.

Dreams as Deception from Evil Sources. Some dreams are not merely benign. Some scare and terrify (Job 7:14). When a prophet misinterpreted his vision, it came from a lying spirit (1 Kings 22:22–23) or was faked (Jer 23:16, 27, 32).

“The teraphim utter nonsense, the diviners see lies, the dreamers tell false dreams” (Zech 10:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Against this background, dreaming indicates self-delusion (Jude 8).

Dreams as Unreal, Nothing or Ephemeral. While God may speak through dreams, not all dreams are from God. Many are simply an annoying distraction. The people of the Bible did not insist on shoehorning all dreams into a supernatural category. Their metaphors equating dreams with phantoms and nothing betray such an understanding. Joseph’s brothers mock “the dreamer” and attempt to short circuit his dreams, suspecting they are the product of Joseph’s ego (Gen 37:19–20). Israel’s enemies are not to be feared; they are like dreams (Is 29:7). The restoration of Zion made the people feel like “those who dream” (Ps 126:1). After envying the prosperity of the wicked, the psalmist comes to see that their transitory success ending in sudden ruin makes them as insubstantial “as a dream when one awakes” and “as fantasies” (Ps 73:20). Sirach disparages dreams: Divinations and omens and dreams are folly; and like a woman in travail, the mind has fancies (Sir 24:5).

Dreams as the Human Condition. There are hints in the Bible of dreams much more like those of today. Isaiah’s metaphor, “As when the hungry dream of eating and awake unsatisfied” alludes to recurrent nightmares or Sisyphean dreams (Is 29:8). In the apocrypha, Sirach mentions one “troubled by the visions of his mind like one who has escaped from the battle front” (posttraumatic stress disorder, Sir 40:6). In his pragmatism the Preacher expresses his frustration with dreams as unreliable and difficult to interpret: “A dream comes with much business” (Eccles 5:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). His observation that “when dreams increase, empty words grow many” (Eccles 5:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) also suggests a surfeit of dream interpretations. For Job, who has become the Almighty's target, even sleep provides no comfort because "then thou dost scare me with dreams and terrify me with visions" (Job 7:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Yet even these most human of dreams could provide counsel (Ps 16:7).

Dreams as Spiritual Health. The observation that "the word of the Lord was rare in those days; there was no frequent vision" comments on the moral decay of Israel (1 Sam 3:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Sin in the camp prevents the dream oracle from functioning (1 Sam 14:37–38). The loss of oracles and dreams signifies abandonment by God (Mic 3:6–7). The country's spiritual ruin becomes real ruin as "her prophets obtain no vision from the Lord" (Lam 2:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The Lord promises to replace Ezekiel's proverb, "Every vision comes to nought," with the "fulfillment of every vision" (Ezek 12:22, 23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The prophecy that dreams and visions will return assumes as a prerequisite the purifying of the nation and a pouring out of God's spirit (Joel 2:28; Acts 2:17).

See also Angel; Apocalypse, Genre of; Cheat the Oracle; Daniel, Book of; Joseph the Patriarch; Oracle; Prophecy, Genre of; Prophet, Prophetess.

DRINK, DRINKING

Drinking is employed figuratively in a variety of ways in Scripture to indicate partaking in or even experiencing something. In this sense the oppressed spirit may be said to drink poison (Job 6:4), the brokenhearted may drink tears (Ps 80:5), lovers may drink of love (Prov 7:18; Song 5:1) or the land may drink rain (Deut 11:11; Heb 6:7).

The symbolism of drinking the wine in the Lord's Supper is that of partaking in the benefits of his death for us (Mt 26:27; Jn 6:53—56; 1 Cor 10:16; 11:25—29). Similarly, drinking together, like eating together, demonstrates a common bond, in that all share in the same activity. The fact that at the Last Supper all drink from the same cup indicates a fellowship both with the Lord and with other Christians. This, Paul tells us, is naturally incompatible with idolatry of any kind (1 Cor 10:21). Similarly, because all Christians are indwelt by the same Holy Spirit, they share a common spiritual experience and can be said to all drink of the one Spirit (1 Cor 12:13).

On occasion drinking describes an appetite for what is wrong. Individuals are said to drink evil (Job 15:16), or scorn (Job 34:7) or violence (Prov 4:17; 26:6). Having metaphorically drunk the blood of the saints, the wicked are condemned to drink water turned to blood in the last days, an echo of the plague suffered by the Egyptians (Rev 16:6).

To drink from a cup handed to you by the Lord means accepting your lot, a metaphor frequently used in prophetic writings to describe the bitter end of the wicked. The cup, described as containing divine judgment and wrath, is one from which they have no choice but to drink (Job 21:20; Ps 75:8; Is 51:22; Jer 25:15—26; 49:12; Ezek 23:32—34; Obad 1:16; Hab 2:15—16; Rev 14:8, 10). Jesus used a similar image to indicate his willingness to accept his Father's purpose for him, which included the suffering of the cross (Mt 26:42; Jn 18:11). It is apparent that his disciples did not really understand what he meant when they told him that they too could drink of the same cup, although in so doing they unwittingly predicted their own martyrdom (Mt 20:22—23; Mk 10:38—39).

Drinking can equally be a satisfying and refreshing exercise (Ps 110:7). God's people are pictured as being suckled by a nursing mother (Is 60:16; 66:11). Experiencing the blessings of the kingdom is like drinking new wine, for which the Jews were reluctant to abandon the old ways (Lk 5:39). It was in this respect that Jesus appealed to the spiritually thirsty to come to him and drink (Jn 4:9—14; 7:37—39; Rev 21:6).

Isolated references to drinking include David's refusal to drink the water for which his men had risked their lives, in that it would be like drinking their blood (1 Chron 11:17—19). The pagan seer Balaam likened the unstoppable progress of the Israelites to a lion or lioness, taking its prey and drinking the blood of its victims (Num 23:24). Unhelpful alliances between God's people and either Egypt or Assyria are described as drinking from either the Nile or the Euphrates rivers (Jer 2:18). The would-be adulterer is cryptically advised to drink water from his own cistern (Prov 5:15)!

See also Cup; Drunkenness; Eating; Milk; Nurse; Thirst; Water; Wine.

DROUGHT.

See Dry.

DRUNKARD

Judging from the vividness of the Bible's pictures of the drunkard, this character type elicited special moral disgust from the writers of the Bible. The denunciations of the drunkard in the Bible (Prov 23:20, 31) already establish the moral essence of the drunkard as a type to be avoided. Drunkenness is a distinguishing sign of a wayward son (Deut 21:20; Lk 15:11—13).

The classic portrait of the drunkard occurs in Proverbs 23:29—35. Here the drunkard suffers from a range of psychological aberrations, including woe, sorrow, strife, complaining and hallucinations. Physical signs include unexplained wounds, red eyes, unbalanced walking and incoherent conversation. Other biblical portraits fill out the picture: drunkards reel and stagger (Ps 107:27; Is 24:20; 29:9; Hab 2:15), tread in their vomit (Is 19:14), exhibit signs of madness (Jer 51:7), lose their clothing and appear naked to public view (Hab 2:15), and are so devoid of judgment as to sell a girl for wine to drink (Joel 3:3).

The portrait assumes more specific form when we turn to narrative examples of the drunkard. The drunken Noah lies naked in his tent (Gen 9:20). The drunken Lot commits incest with his daughters (Gen 19:30–38). Nabal and Ahasuerus lose their judgment while drunk (1 Sam 25:36; Esther 1:10–12). Several kings are recorded in the OT [OT. Old Testament] as being assassinated while drunk (1 Kings 16:9; 1 Kings 20:16). It is no surprise that kings are warned to steer clear of intoxicating drink because of its bad effects on a person's judgment (Prov 31:4–5).

Because drunkenness produces such vivid physical results, the drunkard emerges as one of the most repulsive character types in the Bible. The experience of the drunkard is epitomized by the statement that although wine “sparkles in the cup and goes down smoothly,” at last “it bites like a serpent, and stings like an adder” (Prov 23:31–32 NIV [NIV. New International Version]).

See also Drunkenness; Wine.

DRUNKENNESS

The OT [OT. Old Testament] is full of references to drunkenness, both as a literal physical phenomenon and as a graphic metaphorical symbol portraying a wide variety of emotional, spiritual and moral states. The stark images evoked by the biblical authors are often so dramatic that to comment on them would seem superfluous, even detrimental. However, to gain an overall view we will consider drunkenness first from a literal, then from a figurative perspective.

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets inveigh vehemently against the moral decadence of the judges who pervert the course of justice in eighth-century b.c. Judah: “Woe to those who are heroes at drinking wine and champions at mixing drinks, who acquit the guilty for a bribe, but deny justice to the innocent” (Is 5:22, 23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Similarly, Amos castigates the rulers of Israel who “drink wine by the bowlful” (Amos 6:6). Qoheleth praises those rulers who drink “for strength and not for drunkenness” in contrast to those who “feast in the morning” (Eccles 10:16–17). The absolute disgust and moral repugnance of Yahweh’s prophets rings through Isaiah’s condemnation of the dissolute temple personnel: “Priests and prophets stagger from beer, and they are befuddled with wine; they stagger when seeing visions, they stumble when rendering decisions. All the tables are covered with vomit” (Is 28:7, 8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Nevertheless, in spite of the prophetic abhorrence of this sordid squalor, there is something inherently very humorous about the marvelous description of the drunkard by the writer of Proverbs. Wine, in the end, “bites like a snake, and poisons like a viper.” The drunkard’s eyes “will see strange sights,” and his mind will “imagine confusing things” (Prov 23:29–35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Human wickedness is not slow in exploiting the lowered guard induced by drunkenness. Lot’s daughters got themselves pregnant by their father under the strong influence of alcohol (Gen 19:33, 35). Both Amnon (2 Sam 13:28) and King Elah of Israel (1 Kings 16:9) were assassinated while in a drunken stupor. David tried to cover up his adultery with Bathsheba by getting Uriah drunk (2 Sam 11:13). Noah exposed himself while drunk (Gen 9:21), leading to the cursing of Canaan. Habakkuk pronounced woes on those who deliberately get their neighbors drunk “so that they can gaze on their naked bodies” (Hab 2:15).

The metaphorical usages of the image of drunkenness are varied. The storm-tossed sailors, mounting up to the heavens and crashing down to the depths, reel and stagger like drunken men (Ps 107:27). The apostle Paul uses the picture of nighttime drunkenness as a foil for the alert self-controlled behavior of the Christian who walks in the light of day (1 Thess 5:7, 8).

Those under the influence of strong emotional or spiritual experiences are likened to those who are intoxicated: Hannah, in deep emotional trauma, was mistaken for a drunken woman (1 Sam 1:13); Jeremiah was “like a drunken man, like a man overcome by wine, because of the Lord and his holy words” (Jer 23:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); and the disciples at Pentecost, speaking in tongues under the influence of the baptism of the Spirit, invited the mocking response “they have had too much wine” (Acts 2:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

But by far the largest number of references to drunkenness occur in the Prophets as a metaphor of God’s judgment. Babylon, Edom, Moab and Egypt are all caused to drink of the cup of Yahweh’s judgment and to reel and stagger under the wine of God’s wrath (Jer 25:15). Sometimes they are God’s historical judgments against these political nation-states for their acts of cruelty and defiance; other times the nations stand as types of the world as a whole, about to suffer God’s eschatological fury at the end of the age. There are images of eternal drunken stupor (Jer 51:57), madness (Jer 51:7), defiant laughter (Jer 51:39), dizziness (Is 19:14), staggering (Jer 25:15)—an awesome picture of human confusion and helplessness brought upon themselves by their God-defying arrogance.

See also Drunkard; Wine.

DRY, DROUGHT

Drought is an image of suffering in the Bible, but even more dominant than that is the constant motif of the threat of drought. Drought was a dangerous reality of the ancient Near East, one that could precipitate famine. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were all forced to relocate because of drought-related famine (Gen 12; 26; 41). In Egypt, Joseph rose to prominence because of his able management of the country's food supply under drought conditions (Gen 41). Elijah ministered to a widow in Zarephath who expected to die from a drought-induced famine (1 Kings 17:7–24). Jonah experienced a micro-drought as he grew faint under a blazing sun and hot east wind (Jon 4:8). Nearly all of the major biblical images of drought occur in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] .

The background against which biblical references must be understood is the aridity of the land of the Bible, with the image of a “dry and thirsty land” epitomizing the situation (Ezek 19:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] rendering of Ps 63:1). In particular it was the drying up that came from the heat of summer that constituted an annual worry, as “heat and drought snatch away the melted snow” (Job 24:19). In such a world, drought is always the implied opposite of water and rain. Only a tree “planted by water, that sends out its roots by the stream,” does “not fear when heat comes” and is not anxious “in the year of drought” (Jer 17:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Drought is above all an image of natural terror. Jeremiah equates “a land of drought” with such parallel terrors as wilderness, pit, darkness and “a land where no one travels and no one lives” (Jer 2:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When the prophetic imagination pictures a coming judgment, it produces images of a river that becomes “parched and dry” (Is 19:5), the drying up of pools (Is 42:18) and the transformation of a fertile nation into “a wilderness, a dry land, a desert” (Je 50:12). Conversely, restoration and blessing are pictured in terms of parched ground being turned into pools of water (Is 41:18) and the pouring out of “water on the thirsty land, and streams on the dry ground” (Is 44:3).

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] drought is linked to the motif of covenant blessing and curse. God brought Israel out of Egypt into a land flowing with milk and honey. This was his covenant gift to his people; however, their continual enjoyment of this paradise was partially contingent on the nation’s covenant loyalty. Deuteronomy 28:22 warns the covenant breakers of Moses’ day that among other things, “the Lord will strike you ... with scorching heat and drought.” If Israel rebelled against Yahweh, he would discipline them by drying up the milk and honey. The experience of a drought, then, was meant to be more than physical and financial. For the reflective Israelite it was evidence of God’s displeasure and a call to repentance (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Joel 1–2). Drought was not just a curse; it was a sign of Yahweh’s grace in that it drove the sensitive Israelite back to God.

The covenant curse of a literal drought was transformed by the psalmists and prophets into an image to describe the emotional pangs suffered under God’s wrath or discipline. They described their emotional turmoil in terms of the physical strains of hunger and thirst experienced in a drought. Drought reduces the visual floral evidence of God's favor to the tiresome emptiness of a barren wasteland. Likewise, God's discipline removes the spiritual and emotional signals of his favor (peace, fulfillment, happiness) from one's spiritual landscape. David says, "O God, you are my God, earnestly I seek you; my soul thirsts for you, my body longs for you, in a dry and weary land where there is no water" (Ps 63:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Joel observes, "Even the wild animals pant for you; the streams of water have dried up and fire has devoured the open pastures" (Joel 1:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the same way the reversal of drought is an image depicting God's blessing: "For I will pour water on the thirsty land, and streams on the dry ground; I will pour out my Spirit on your offspring, and my blessing on your descendants" (Is 44:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The imagery of drought is scarce in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . The parable of the seeds briefly picks up on the image in Luke 8:6: "Some fell on rock, and when it came up, the plants withered because they had no moisture" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). James employs the image when he describes the transience of a wealthy life: "For the sun rises with scorching heat and withers the plant; its blossom falls and its beauty is destroyed. In the same way, the rich man will fade away even while he goes about his business" (Jas 1:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Curse; Famine; Hunger; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Rain; Thirst; Wasteland; Water.

DUNG

Surprisingly, references to dung can be found many times in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] but only once in a key NT

[NT NT. New Testament] passage (Phil 3:8). “Dung” is the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] preferred translation for several Hebrew and Greek terms. Other translations prefer to use “refuse,” “rubbish,” “waste,” “filth,” “offal,” “dirt,” “rubble” or “garbage.” More explicit words for accurately rendering the biblical terms, such as “excrement,” “feces” or “manure,” have rarely been chosen by translators. Yet the strength of the image in the dung metaphor is preserved by not watering down its meaning from biblical times.

Dung is first associated with the sacrificial rites of Israel. Since dung was an unclean substance, God mandated that it needed to be burned outside the encampment and later, outside the gates of Jerusalem (Ex 29:14; Lev 16:27; Neh 3:13, 14). Dung was also used as fertilizer (Lk 13:8). However the metaphorical power of dung’s coarse connotations is found in the various contexts of judgment pronouncements in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic and historical books.

For example, in 1 Kings 14:10 dung is a metaphor applied to the ruling family of Jeroboam, where God says he “will utterly consume the house of Jeroboam, as a man burns up dung until it is all gone” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The corpse of Jezebel is to be scattered like excrement in a field, “so that no one can say, ‘This is Jezebel’ ” (2 Kings 9:37 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Ezra 6:11 King Darius warns that anyone who interferes with the restoration of Israel’s temple is to have his home turned into an outhouse—destroyed—“made a dunghill” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Besides the judgment of dung being pronounced on Israel’s enemies (Ps 83:10; Is 25:10), the majority of dung judgments are assessed against Israel, the very people of God. Graphic examples of these judgments are found in the Prophets (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Jer 9:22; 16:4), but the most extreme metaphor for God's displeasure with his people relates prophetic judgment to spreading excrement across the faces of apostate Israel (Mal 2:3): "Behold, I will corrupt your seed, and spread dung upon your faces, [even] the dung of your solemn feasts" (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). Such strong language expresses God's right as Creator of all things—even dung—to use any creature or created substance as a means of expressing his divine will.

NT [NT NT. New Testament] metaphorical use of dung is limited to Philippians 3:8, where Paul is comparing the glory of his past natural life as a prominent Hebrew to his present servant role as Christ's apostle. "I count all things but loss ... and do count them but dung [Gk [Gk Gk. Greek] skybalon], that I might win Christ" (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]) forcefully expresses Paul's extreme attitude toward his past human attainments. The glories of gaining and serving Christ make Paul's religious prestige seem like mere excrement!

Several other coarse English colloquialisms would more closely suggest the negative inflections of skybalon. The coarseness and repulsiveness of the dung metaphor vividly expresses many spiritually unsavory judgments on human sin and wrong priorities.

See also Disgust, Revulsion.

DUNGEON.

See Cistern; Pits.

DUPE

The archetypal character type of the dupe is a person easily tricked and taken advantage of. The dupe is usually a comic type—the butt of a well-deserved joke—but occasionally in the Bible there is a tragic undertow. Eve is the original dupe in the Bible, too easily swayed by the temptation of the serpent when she should have remained obedient to the command from God (Gen 3:1–6). Her's is a sin of gullibility (Gen 3:13; 2 Cor 11:3; 1 Tim 2:14), the root trait of the dupe. Perhaps the innocent Abel is naively trusting of his murderous brother when he agrees to “go out to the field” as though it were an invitation to a pleasurable stroll (Gen 4:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Also in Genesis, Egyptian kings are readily deceived by Abraham and Isaac about the identity of their wives (Gen 12:10–20; 20; 26:6–11). Esau is the proverbial “sitting duck” when Jacob bargains for the birthright with the smell of stew in the air (Gen 25:29–34), and Isaac appears in the same role in the story of the stolen blessing, even though Isaac makes an attempt to penetrate Jacob's disguise (Gen 27). Other dupes in Genesis include Jacob in the incident of the substitute bride (Gen 29:21–25) and in his sons' deception of him regarding the fate of Joseph, Judah as he is tricked by Tamar (Gen 38) and the men of Shechem when they allow themselves to be circumcised as a prelude to their own slaughter (Gen 34).

Subsequent OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history also produces its gallery of dupes. Pharaoh believes women to pose no threat to him, yet he is repeatedly outwitted by women. Even his own daughter plays a role in his being tricked into paying Moses' mother for taking care of her own son (Ex 1–2). Joshua is taken in by the neighboring Gibeonites, who pose as travelers from a distant land in order to gain a peace treaty (Josh 9). The hapless Eglon is so thoroughly tricked by Ehud's promise of a “secret message from God” for him that he rises ceremoniously to receive a dagger thrust into his fat belly (Judg 3:15–23). Sisera is beguiled into taking a nap in Jael's tent, only to find himself impaled through his temples (Judg 4:17–22; 5:24–27). Samson has a fatal weakness for succumbing to the tears of a devious Philistine woman (Judg 14:16–18; 16:18–21). David is tricked by Nathan's parable into pronouncing a verdict against himself (2 Sam 12:1–15). Herod is duped by the wisemen when they return home by an alternate route (Mt 2:12).

Stories of hiding (see Hide) often turn on an authority figure who is tricked. Thus Rahab deceives the king's squadron by hiding the spies on the roof of her house (Josh 2:1–7), and Rachel fools Laban by concealing the household gods in the camel's saddle (Gen 31:33–35). In a similar incident Michal arranges a household idol with goat's hair to deceive Saul's executioners as David escapes (1 Sam 19:11–17).

If there is a lesson to be learned from the relative prominence of the dupe in the Bible, in addition to constituting material, it is the need for watchfulness. The price of allowing oneself to be deceived or tricked can be the thwarting of one's plans and even the loss of one's life. Furthermore, God reduces evil characters to the status of dupe as part of his judgment against them.

See also Character Types; Deception, Stories of; Trickster.

DUSK.

See Twilight.

DUST.

See Mortality.

E

EAGLE

The eagle, a large, solitary bird of prey, is known for its keen eyesight, power and sharp beak and talons. With a wingspan up to seven and a half feet, it hunts high in the air and swoops down on its prey at great speed. Eagles mate for life and care for their young in nests, called aeries, high in trees or rocky ledges. This provides protection for the eaglets, which remain helpless for a long period, up to 100 days. Palestine is home to four varieties of eagles, of which the most common is the short-toed eagle.

Israelites were forbidden from eating birds of prey such as vultures, hawks and eagles “because they are detestable” (Lev 11:13). Yet many of the some thirty references in Scripture depict the eagle, not as detestable, but as an image of strength and deliverance.

The eagle portrays speed and power in biblical images (2 Sam 1:23; Is 40:31; Jer 4:13). Along with three other creatures of strength—the lion, the ox and humans—it appears as one face of the four mighty cherubim who attend the throne of God (Ezek 1:10—14; Rev 4:7).

The eagle symbolizes the speed and power of both God’s deliverance and God’s destruction. Speaking of how he delivered Israel from Egypt, the Lord says, “You yourselves have seen what I did to Egypt, and how I carried you on eagles’ wings and brought you to myself” (Ex 19:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Similar images of God’s protection as an eagle, swift and powerful, are found in Deuteronomy 32:11 and Revelation 12:14. Isaiah 40:31 is the famous passage relating the renewing strength God gives to his followers: “But those who hope in the Lord will renew their strength. They will soar on wings like eagles; they will run and not grow weary, they will walk and not be faint” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The eagles’ hunting skill and sudden attack on their prey lend themselves to images of sure and sudden disaster in depictions of God’s judgment. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophets the mighty nations of Assyria and Babylon are portrayed as eagles bringing disaster on God's people because they have broken covenant with him (Lam 4:19; Ezek 17:3, 7; Hos 8:1). Jeremiah depicts divine judgment against Moab and Edom as an eagle swooping down with wings outspread (Jer 48:40; 49:22). In a scene of final judgment in Revelation, the gliding eagle appears in midair to announce the woes of the imminent disaster that the Lord is sending on the inhabitants of earth (Rev 8:13).

See also Birds.

EAR, HEARING

In the Bible the ear is synonymous with the heart and mind as an organ of cognition (Prov 2:2; Is 6:9–10), and true hearing involves listening and understanding (Job 34:16). The ear is personified as hearing and understanding (Job 13:1), seeking knowledge (Prov 18:15) and testing words (Job 12:11). To “incline” the ear is to be favorably disposed to what is heard (Jer 34:14; Ps 31:2). To have “deaf,”* “heavy”* or “uncircumcised” (see Circumcision) ears is to reject what is heard (Jer 6:10; Acts 7:51). “Itching” ears are only favorably disposed to what is already found agreeable (2 Tim 4:3). Idols are deaf (Deut 4:28; Rev 9:20), but God is personified as having ears (1 Sam 8:21) and hearing his people (2 Sam 22:7). Prayers and petitions to God begin with a request to God to “incline your ear” (Ps 17:6). God hears his people groaning in bondage (Ex 3:7), facing their enemies in battle (Is 37:17), crying out in barrenness (Gen 30:6) and complaining when unjustly treated (Jas 5:4). God hears the prayers of the righteous (Ps 17:1; 1 Pet 3:12) and those asking according to his will (1 Jn 5:14). Thus God always heard the prayers of Jesus (Jn 11:41–42; Heb 5:7). God also hears the arrogance of humanity (2 Kings 19:28) and its plotting (Num 12:2). His ears are hard of hearing or deaf to the prayers of sinners and those refusing to hear him (Is 59:1—2; Jn 9:31).

Unlike ancient religions that sought revelation through the eye and through visions, biblical people primarily sought revelation through the ear and hearing. Hearing symbolizes the proper response to God in the Bible. God opens the ears to hear his word (Job 36:10; Is 50:4—5), gives the ears of the prophets his revelation (Is 22:14; 50:4—5) and exhorts his people either directly or through prophets to “hear” his revelation (Deut 5:1; Jer 2:4; Rev 2:7). To faithfully hear God’s voice requires personal apprehension, acceptance and obedience (Mt 7:24, 26; Lk 11:28; Jas 1:22—25). Lack of hearing is the decisive spiritual failure and rebellion against God (Is 48:8; Heb 3:7—8).

Jesus is God’s incarnate Word, and thus God commands us to listen to Jesus in faith and obedience (Mt 17:5). The parable of the sower demonstrates that the efficacy of Jesus’ proclamation of the kingdom depends on faithful hearing. Thus Jesus’ stress upon “Let anyone with ears listen!” (Mt 13:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). To hear the words of God is to be a child of God (Jn 8:47) and a sheep hearing the voice of the Shepherd (Jn 10:3, 16, 27). Not to do so is to be spiritually hard of hearing (Mt 13:14—16) and to remain unforgiven (Jn 12:47—49). Hearing is blessing and life, and not hearing is judgment (Job 36:10—12; John 5:24).

See also Blind, Blindness; Deaf, Deafness; Eye, Sight.

EARNEST MONEY.

See Legal Images.

EARTH

“Who has held the dust of the earth in a basket, or weighed the mountains on the scales and the hills in a balance? ... He sits enthroned above the circle of the earth, and its people are like grasshoppers” (Is 40:12, 22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “ ‘Heaven is my throne and the earth is my footstool. Where is the house you will build for me? Where will my resting place be? Has not my hand made all these things, and so they came into being?’ declares the Lord” (Is 66:1–2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Isaiah’s imagery of earth as God’s footstool and of God’s weighing the dust of the earth conveys the greatness of God, who transcends his creation. Unlike the fertility gods of the pagan religions and manmade idols, he is beyond everything that he has made.

The Psalms use imagery to praise God not only as Creator but also as Sustainer of the earth. This is the theme of Psalm 104. He created the heavens and “set the earth on its foundations; it can never be moved” (Ps 104:5). He provides water, food and shelter for the great variety of the earth’s creatures and marks off the seasons (Ps 104:10–23). God is active in sustaining and regulating his creation: “When you send your Spirit, they are created [i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the creatures], and you renew the face of the earth” (Ps 104:30). However, when he judges, “He looks at the earth, and it trembles” (Ps 104:32; see also Ps 147).

Humanity’s relationship to the earth is crucial to understanding the earth imagery in the Bible. “The Lord God formed man [’ādām] from the dust of the ground [’ādāmâ]” (Gen 2:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The future of humankind and the earth are profoundly bound together. After Adam and Eve’s act of rebellion in Eden, God passed judgment: “Cursed is the ground because of you: through painful toil you will eat of it all the days of your life. It will produce thorns and thistles for you, and you will eat the plants of the field. By the sweat of your brow you will eat your food until you return to the ground” (Gen 3:17–19).

Human actions defile and corrupt the earth: “The earth is defiled by its people; they have disobeyed the laws, violated the statutes and broken the everlasting covenant. Therefore a curse consumes the earth; its people must bear their guilt” (Is 24:5, 6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Hosea, Jeremiah and Amos employ the image of the earth mourning as a result of people’s evil deeds (Hos 4:1–3; Jer 12:4; 23:10; Amos 1:2). Hosea laments that there is “no faithfulness, no love, no acknowledgment of God in the land” (Hos 4:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). As a consequence the “land mourns [dries up], and all who live in it waste away: the beasts of the field and the birds of the air and the fish of the sea are dying” (Hos 4:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The earth as we know it is spoiled and awaits renewal. Several biblical writers use the image of garments as an image of transience in their prophecies about the earth’s future (Ps 102:25–26; Is 51:6). The writer of Hebrews quotes Psalm 102,

In the beginning, O Lord, you laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the works of your hands.

They will perish, but you remain;
they will all wear out like a garment.

You will roll them up like a robe;
like a garment they will be changed.

But you remain the same,
and your years will never end.

(Heb 1:10–12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

There will be “new heavens and a new earth” (Is 65:17, 2; 2 Pet 3:13; Rev 21:1). Isaiah gives us a wonderful picture of the renewed earth “full of the knowledge of God as the waters cover the sea” (Is 11:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “Instead of the thornbush will grow the pine tree, and instead of briars the myrtle will grow” (Is 55:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Symbols of death and the curse are replaced by those of life.

Psalm 96 describes the earth rejoicing before God who comes to judge and renew it. Fields and forests are personified as singing in the presence of God. “Sing to the Lord a new song; sing to the Lord, all the earth... Let the heavens rejoice, let the earth be glad; let the sea resound, and all that is in it; let the fields be jubilant, and everything in them. Then all the trees of the forest will sing for joy; they will sing before the Lord, for he comes, he comes to judge the earth” (Ps 96:1, 11–13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; see also 98:7–9).

See also Corruption; Cosmology; Creation; Death; Decay; Heaven; Land; Transience.

EARTHQUAKE

The eastern Mediterranean area is prone to earthquakes. These events, which have caused devastation and loss of life throughout history, are caused by episodic movement of the earth's crust along a complex network of faults as the African and Arabian tectonic plates progressively collide with the Eurasian plate. In the Palestine area the main earthquake zones are along the line of the Jordan valley where the Arabian tectonic plate is sliding northwards against the African plate on which Palestine occurs. This is a simpler form of the situation in coastal California. Other earthquake zones are along the Jezreel Valley and southern Turkey. A significant feature of Scripture is its refusal to invoke a mythological explanation of earthquakes.

Some references to earthquakes appear to be bald statements of historic fact and seem to have little, if any, symbolic value (Amos 1:1, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Zech 14:5; Acts 16:26). Most references, however, particularly in the poetic parts of the Bible, accord a high degree of symbolism to earthquakes. Earthquakes in Scripture are often seen as manifestations of the direct action of God's power. The example that is probably alluded to most is the earthquake at the giving of the law at Sinai (Ex 19:18). In their poetic reviews of the Exodus, later writers seem to have emphasized this element (Ps 68:8; 77:18; 114:4—7) and broadened its scope to cover the whole exodus event. Matthew's linkage of the earthquake at Jesus' crucifixion with the rending of the temple veil (Mt 27:54) is thus far more than a statement of physical cause and effect: it is profoundly symbolic. The covenant inaugurated at Sinai is now ended. In Revelation at least some of the earthquake imagery relates back to Sinai (Bauckham).

Although earthquake imagery is everywhere associated with God acting, the precise emphasis varies. A number of references invoke the imagery of God marching out to do battle (Judg 5:4; Ps 68:7—8; Joel 2:10—11; Mic 1:4; see Divine Warrior). Other references associate earthquakes with a theophany, a manifestation of God to the world (Ps 97:4—5; 99:1; Is 64:2—3). If there is any symbolism to do with the earthquake at Christ's resurrection associated with the rolling back of the stone (Mt 28:2) it may lie in this area. Many other references refer to the shaking of the earth (often accompanied by wind and fire) when God judges the nations or the wicked (Is 13:13; 24:18—20; 29:6; Jer 10:10, Ezek 26:18; 38:19—20; Joel 3:16; Nahum 1:5—6). In this context the reference in 1 Kings 19:11 may be a symbolic way of suggesting that this was not a time of God's judgment.

From this association of earthquakes with God's revealing himself comes the substantial presence of this imagery in apocalyptic literature. Thus Hebrews, drawing on Haggai 2:6, looks forward to the final shaking of the heavens and the earth (Heb 12:26–27). Revelation, also drawing on the many references in Scripture, includes a number of references to earthquakes (Rev 8:5; 11:13, 19; 16:18–20). The fact that the area of the seven churches in western Turkey is prone to earthquakes (Laodicea, Sardis and Philadelphia suffered in the great earthquake in a.d. 17 and Laodicea was badly damaged in a.d. 60) must have heightened the imagery to the original hearers.

Earthquakes reminded men and women then as well as now that the only fixed ground is God himself. Not even the earth is ultimately stable. They also point to the fact that one day God will shake down all human kingdoms with the appearing of Christ in Glory (Zech 14:4–5).

See also Cosmology; Theophany.

Bibliography. R. J. Bauckham, "The Eschatological Earthquake in the Apocalypse of John," NovT [NovT NovT. Novum Testamentum] 19 (1977) 224–33.

EAST

The Semitic cultures of the ancient Near East tended literally to orient themselves (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , to face) east (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] qedem "forward," "east"). Ancient maps, even through the Middle Ages, typically placed the east, not the north, at the top. The Israelite tabernacle and Solomon's temple are both expressly erected to face east. This orientation pervades much biblical literature to affirm the east as the source from which blessing and respite come (Gen 2:8; Rev 7:2–3), perhaps echoing the westward movement of the sun from the east.

The direction one faces points to origin and not destination, a fact confirmed by the words for past and future, cognate with the terms for east and west. The past is “the days in front/before” (qedem; 2 Kings 19:25; Ps 44:2) and the future is “the after-part ('aharîit) of days” (Gen 49:1; Num 24:14). The imagery is of one heading into the unknown future backwards (west) by facing the past (east). In the same way spatial orientation toward the east, such as the east gate of the temple, has come to imply and endorse in certain narratives movement away from the east.

Movement toward the east in Genesis, consequently, consistently appears in the context of rebellion and sin. Adam and Eve are expelled in an eastward direction from Eden (Gen 3:24), a direction in which the murderer Cain also moves (Gen 4:16) as well as a humanity that refuses to obey God and erects the tower of Babel (Gen 11:2–4). The momentum of catastrophe is finally reversed by Abraham’s movement away from the east toward the west, even as he forbids his family to return east (Gen 24:5–8). Catastrophe continues to strike those who, like Lot, prefer to move eastward (Gen 13:11–13). Years of swindling, deception and strife accompany Jacob’s return to the east (Gen 29:1); it is Abraham’s offspring who receive a lesser inheritance who move eastward (Gen 25:6).

The same pattern emerges outside Genesis. The first of the twelve tribes to disappear in history are precisely those (Reuben, Gad and half of Manasseh) who provoke Moses’ anger in preferring to stay east of the Jordan and not inherit the promised land on the western side (Num 32:19; Judg 18:7). When God’s glory eventually departs from Israel, boding calamity for Jerusalem, it is toward the east that he moves (Ezek 10:18–19 11:22–23); restoration means God reverses this movement in Ezekiel 43:2–5. The Babylonian exile is a tragic return to the east, essentially starting over and undoing all that had been achieved from the time when Abraham first left the territory of Babylonia long before.

Apart from this cosmic significance, a geographical dimension applicable only to Israel and her immediate neighbors emerges from the presence of the desert to the east. The arid eastern wastes produced a scorching sirocco wind (from Arabic šarqī “east wind”) that destroyed human endeavors (Ezek 27:26; Ps 48:7), blighted vegetation (Ezek 17:10; 19:12) and dried up water sources (Ex 14:21; Hos 13:15; see Dry, Drought). This hot east wind became a metaphor for anything that was totally worthless (Job 15:2–3 NASB [NASB NASB. New American Standard Bible]). If pursuing the wind is pointless (Eccles 6:9), the pursuit of the east wind in particular is the height of absurdity (Hos 12:1). Those who live in the east, characteristically portrayed as nomads with tents and camels (Jer 49:28–29; Ezek 25:4), behave like the east wind when they invade and destroy the settled area of Israel (Judg 6:3, 33; 7:12).

See also North; South; Sun; West.

EATING

With seven hundred references to the act of eating (not counting references to drinking and food), we can say with confidence that eating is a master image of the Bible. No biblical image combines the literal and the figurative, the physical and spiritual, more inextricably than does the imagery of eating. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ceremonial laws, rules governing eating are at once physical reality (a health measure) and covenant sign. The references to eating serve as a reminder of the physical identity of people in the world, but they are equally a reminder of the spiritual realities of biblical faith. Both literally and figuratively, eating communicates the paradigm of a providential creator and a dependent humanity. It also demonstrates the news of God's most gracious acts.

Literal Eating. Eating in the Bible is a continual reminder of elemental human existence in the world. Ancient literature generally was preoccupied with eating (in Homer approximately one line in thirty concerns the preparation or consumption of food). We read that "Esau ate and drank, and rose and went his way" (Gen 25:34 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This is simply the way it is for humans living in the world. King Saul, having "eaten nothing all day and all night," reluctantly ate meat and bread before leaving the house of the witch at Endor (1 Sam 1:20–25). "Our fathers ate the manna in the wilderness," Jesus said in his discourse on the bread of heaven (Jn 6:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This, then, is one image of eating in the Bible—an image of the sustenance of physical life. At this level eating is variously an image of human durability (to eat is to perpetuate life) and of vulnerability (it is an act that people need to perform continuously and that is not assured), and it is an index to God's provision for his creatures.

Eating in the Bible is a prime evidence of God's providence, sometimes the result of miraculous provision. God reminds the Israelites that during their wilderness wanderings they have been totally dependent upon him and "have not eaten bread" so that they "may know that I am the Lord your God" (Deut 29:6). God commands the ravens to feed Elijah in the morning and evening at the brook Cherith (1 Kings 17:4–6), and the widow at Zarephath, after passing a test by providing her last food for a meal for Elijah, is rewarded with an inexhaustible food supply until the drought ends (1 Kings 17:8–16). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] several of Jesus' most famous miracles involve supplying food for hungry masses.

As an image of elemental human sustenance, eating can have negative overtones as well. In a fallen world, finding food to eat can be a burden. Part of the original curse of the Fall was that “in the sweat of your face you shall eat bread” (Gen 3:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The sheer repetitiveness and monotony of having to eat has a burdensome side to it: “All the toil of man is for his mouth, yet his appetite is not satisfied” (Eccles 6:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Literal eating, however, can be more lavish than simply eating food to sustain life. The banquet is the supreme example—not just eating, but luxurious eating, with overtones of festivity and sociability. It is also part of the high value placed on hospitality in the Bible and in ancient cultures more generally. The picture of Abraham nonchalantly standing by his angelic visitors as they eat his hastily prepared but lavish meal epitomizes this dimension of eating in the Bible (Gen 18:1–8). Even when a meal was relatively modest, the social meaning of shared eating is that of mutual fellowship and trust. And even modest eating can be an occasion of enjoyment as the writer of Ecclesiastes repeatedly suggests (Eccles 2:24–25; 5:18; 9:7).

Physical eating, even while retaining its literal qualities, takes on a symbolic or moral meaning as well. It is sometimes an implicit moral test in the Bible. The primal sin was an act of eating from the forbidden tree in the middle of the Garden. Jesus reversed the pattern by abstaining when Satan tempted him with food. Abstinence is sometimes a moral virtue, as in not eating the forbidden foods of the Mosaic code (where refraining from eating is sometimes nothing less than a sign of covenant obedience) or in Nazirites’ abstaining from certain foods. We think also of Daniel and his young friends, who refuse to eat the rich food of the Babylonian king, and of NT [NT NT. New Testament] commands to abstain from food offered to idols.

Fasting, so important in the Bible, is likewise a form of abstinence. Even when eating is not forbidden, its abuse in the form of excess or gluttony is viewed as a moral issue: the wise man warns his son against it (Prov 23:1—3, 20—21; 28:7), and Paul denounces those whose “god is the belly” (Phil 3:19) and who are “lazy gluttons” (Tit 1:12).

Excessive eating can thus be a sin, but even what we might consider to be ordinary eating can be an index to a sinful attitude. Eating is one of the pictures Jesus used to portray how indifference to the call of God in the ordinary circumstances of life can lead one to miss the kingdom of God: of people in any era of history it can be said that, as in the days of Noah and Lot, “they ate, they drank” and went about the business of life to the exclusion of God (Lk 17:27—28). In the time of Amos, eating “lambs from the flock and calves from the midst of the stall” became a picture of the indifference of the wealthy to the “ruin of Joseph” (Amos 6:4—6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Eating, in short, signals larger issues. Above all it points to a lifestyle. How and what one eats in the Bible identifies one as godly or ungodly, moral or immoral. Jesus’ propensity to eat with a broad range of people, including “sinners” (Lk 15:2), signaled such things as an affirmation of earthly life as good in principle, the wide scope of his salvation and the joyousness of that salvation. The book of Ecclesiastes repeatedly offers eating and drinking in contented enjoyment as a feature of the God-centered life (Eccles 2:24—25; 3:13; 5:18; 8:15; 9:7). The other general lesson that emerges from the Bible’s references to physical eating is simply its importance. Life depends on it, and one’s moral and spiritual standing is revealed by it.

Eating as Metaphor. When we turn to metaphoric uses of eating, we find a wide range of life’s activities pictured as eating. Judgment and destruction are a leading cluster. A conquering army is a metaphoric sword that devours flesh (Deut 32:42; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 18:8). Eating becomes symbolic of divine judgment when the fire of God “devoured” offending persons (Lev 10:2) and when God is said to have “swallowed up” his enemies in anger (Ps 21:9). James warns wealthy and self-indulgent people that the rust of gold and silver “will eat your flesh like fire” (Jas 5:3). From time immemorial death or the grave has been a personified eater that devours its prey (Prov 1:12).

Assimilating religious knowledge and growing spiritually from it are likewise compared to a process of eating and digestion. Paul fed immature Christians with “milk”* because they were not ready to digest solid food (1 Cor 3:1–2), and Hebrews 5:11–14 repeats the image. Similarly Peter enjoins his audience to “long for the pure spiritual milk, that by it you may grow up to salvation” (1 Pet 2:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God’s true shepherds feed the people with knowledge and understanding (Jer 3:15). Conversely, the absence of hearing the words of the Lord is a famine on the land (Amos 8:11). Assimilating folly or falsehood is likewise pictured as assimilating food into the body (Prov 15:14).

Elsewhere indulgence of the sexual appetite is pictured in terms of eating. The loose woman seduces her naive victim with the invitation to “take our fill of love till morning” (Prov 7:18). The adulteress “eats, and wipes her mouth” (Prov 30:20). The positive counterpart occurs in the Song of Songs, where the delights of mutual love are pictured as eating and being satisfied (Song 2:3–5; 4:11–16).

In its ultimate metaphoric reaches, to eat is to participate in God’s salvation in Christ. The parables in which Jesus pictures a messianic banquet illustrate this, as does the picture in Revelation 19:9 of the marriage supper of the Lamb. Christ himself stands as a self-invited guest knocking at the door of the human soul, waiting to be asked to “come in to him and eat with him, and he with me” (Rev 3:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jesus is the bread of life that people must eat to gain eternal life (Jn 6:25–40). Most graphic of all is the Lord’s Supper, in which believers eat the bread as symbolic of sharing in Christ’s bodily death (1 Cor 11:23–29).

Summary. Eating is at once a physical and spiritual reality in the Bible. At a physical level it is a continuous evidence of God’s daily provision for people and animals as well as an image of creaturely dependence on the Creator (Ps 104:27–30). The same two meanings—divine provision and human neediness—apply at a spiritual level. In view of this we might well conclude that the imagery of eating in the Bible evokes a picture of the world as a cosmic table of provision, and eating as the prerequisite for physical and spiritual life. The goal of human life is eating—to be numbered among those whom Christ allows to “eat and drink at my table in my kingdom” (Lk 22:30).

See also Appetite; Banquet; Bread; Drinking; Famine; Food; Fruit; Hospitality; Manna; Meal; Milk; Purity; Supper.

EAVESDROPPER

Eavesdropping in the form of people overhearing a conversation is both a fact of life and an archetypal motif in literature. Whereas the dominant image is the negative one of a meddling eavesdropper, the Bible at least partly redeems the image.

The negative image is present, to be sure. Sarah overhears God promise Abraham that she will bear a son in the spring and laughs in unbelief and bitterness. She is rebuked by God and lies about having laughed (Gen 18:9–15). Rebekah overhears her husband Isaac dispatch Esau to hunt for game as a preview to his conferring the father's parting blessing on Esau as the firstborn son (Gen 27). She uses her knowledge to mastermind an elaborate intrigue in which Jacob deceives his elderly father and steals the blessing. All four principals end up losers in this drama of intrigue that started with eavesdropping. Also in the tragic mode is Peter's denial of Jesus, in which Jesus is forced to overhear the betrayal.

But beyond these negative instances, overhearing a conversation can be redemptive for someone. Gideon's confidence is bolstered when he enters the Midianite camp by night and overhears a Midianite recount his dream in which a cake of barley bread rolls into camp and smashes a tent, confirming the certainty of Gideon's success in battle (Judg 7:9–14). Mordecai is able to save the king's life when he catches wind of a plot to kill the king (Esther 2:21–23). In similar fashion Paul's nephew hears about an intended plot against Paul's life, thereby setting in motion a counterplot to protect Paul (Acts 23:12–35). Moses' sister Miriam in effect eavesdrops on Pharaoh's daughter as she discovers the infant Moses floating on the Nile River (Ex 2:4–8). People who overhear David's confident words regarding Goliath pass them on to Saul, opening the way for David's exploit (1 Sam 17:31). Naaman apparently overhears the wish of his wife's maid that he visit Elijah in Israel (2 Kings 5:1–4), thus preparing the way for his miraculous healing.

See also Ear, Hearing.

ECCLESIASTES, BOOK OF

The dominant organizing motif in the book of Ecclesiastes is the quest, as the protagonist of the work searches to find meaning and satisfaction in life. Transitions between units of the book keep the quest motif constantly in our consciousness as we read: “again I saw,” “then I saw,” “so I turned to consider,” “I turned my mind to know and to search out and to seek.” At the end of the book the writer tells us that he has reached the goal of his quest: “The end of the matter; all has been heard” (Eccles 12:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

While pursuing his quest the narrator retrospectively recalls a series of dead ends that he pursued. The informing metaphor of the book, though never mentioned explicitly, is the labyrinth or maze, with its series of pathways that entice the quester to follow one dead end after another. Corresponding to the quest motif is the imagery of seeing, searching and finding. In a single specimen passage (Eccles 7:26—29) we read, “I found” (four times), “to find the sum,” “have sought repeatedly,” “have not found,” “I have not found.”

The key phrase in the book, occurring more than thirty times in twelve chapters, is “under the sun” (or its variant “under heaven”). Central to any interpretation of the book, this phrase implies life lived by purely earthly and human values without recourse to a supernatural level of reality. There is an implied alternative to life under the sun, expressed most explicitly in the assertion that “God is in heaven, and you upon earth” (Eccles 5:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The upper level in this metaphoric two-level universe (see Cosmology) keeps revealing itself in passages where God is conspicuously mentioned (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Eccles 2:24—26 and 5:18—20). In contrast to the ceaseless striving evident in the human world, “whatever God does endures for ever” (Eccles 3:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), so that we are enjoined to “consider the work of God” (Eccles 7:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Equally recurrent (31 times) is the image translated “vanity” in some English versions but meaning “vapor” or “breath” in the original. As a quality of life under the sun, this image connotes emptiness, insubstantiality, elusiveness and brevity. A related image is the spectacle of “striving after wind” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Eccles 2:17).

To make the picture of life under the sun palpable to our imaginations, the writer repeatedly roots us in the world of elemental nature. We move rather continuously in a world of sun and wind, sheep and vineyards, sowing and harvesting, cloud and water. Human activity has this same elemental quality, as we hear about being born and dying, toil and sleep, war and peace, worshipping and looking after one’s possessions. Within this cycle of elemental human activity, special attention is given to the triad of eating, drinking and toiling. This imagery appears in both the despairing “under the sun” passages and in the positive, God-centered passages (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Eccles 2:24–25). The anti-escapist implication is important: the God-centered life does not substitute another world for this one, but it brings a transcendent system of values into the earthly sphere.

The image of appetite, though mentioned only a few times, is another informing metaphor for the book. In particular it is the voice of unsatisfied desire: “The eye is not satisfied with seeing” (1:8), “his eyes are never satisfied” (4:8), “yet his appetite is not satisfied” (6:7).

Part of the modernity of this book lies in the space it gives to acquisitiveness, conceived chiefly in urban terms, as we find repeated references to acquiring, building, commerce, money, goods, possessions and even investment (Eccles 11:1–2). Contributing equally to the modern spirit of Ecclesiastes is the motif of pleasure and enjoyment. Sometimes this motif takes the form of searching for an elusive enjoyment. But enjoyment is also commended in the positive passages (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Eccles 9:8) and is even declared the gift of God (Eccles 12:1). The ultimate tragedy for the preacher is not being able to enjoy life's good things (Eccles 6:2, 3, 6). The mere light of the sun is said to be "pleasant for the eyes" (Eccles 11:7), and a major message of Ecclesiastes is that one does not have to look far to find enjoyment.

Overall, we should note the dynamic nature of the imagery of Ecclesiastes. Things are constantly in flux as we move through the book. The cycles of life are prominent. People are very busy ordering their affairs and searching for satisfaction. The survey of social classes and activities is very thorough despite the brevity of the book. One of the great appeals of Ecclesiastes is the way it touches all the bases of life. Perhaps the breathtaking energy that prevails in the world of the book partly explains the power of the passage near the end that describes the physiological symptoms of old age, ending in death (Eccles 12:1–7).

See also Find, Found; Good Life, The; Quest; Solomon; Transience; Wisdom.

EDEN.

See Garden.

EGYPT

From the very beginning of the biblical narrative, Egypt is presented as an imposing place of abundance and power. Although the relationship between the people of God and Egypt is sometimes ambiguous, more often than not, contact with that ancient empire and imitation of its ways are evaluated as negative and self-destructive.

Soon after his call, Abram travels to Egypt to escape famine. Although he is blessed materially during his sojourn there, nevertheless Abram deceives Pharaoh out of fear for his life and is forced to leave Egypt in disgrace (Gen 12:10–20). Because of its rich fertility the land of Egypt is associated with Eden, yet at the same time it is connected with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 13:10). Here again, it symbolizes a tempting place in which there might be both material gain and personal demise.

The story of Joseph reflects this ambiguity in a more subtle manner. Joseph is sold by his brothers into servitude in Egypt, and he begins his stay there in charge of Potiphar's house. Temptation appears in the form of attempted sexual seduction, but Joseph maintains loyalty to his master and to his God. He is unjustly thrown into prison, yet with divine help he interprets Pharaoh's dreams, is released from prison and is elevated to the position of vizier (Gen 39–41). Egypt is once more a place of refuge from famine, and Jacob's sons and their families are sovereignly placed in a bountiful region for sustenance and self-preservation (Gen 42–47). Ironically, however, Joseph's economic policies help create the absolute authority (Gen 47:20–26) that another Pharaoh, who does not remember him, will utilize to so cruelly mistreat the people of God (Ex 1–5).

After the Exodus, Egypt becomes a negative symbol in two ways. On the one hand, Egypt represents bondage and oppression. Israel's servitude is mentioned on a number of occasions in the legal corpus as a reminder not to forget that experience of abuse. God's people are not to treat the alien and the unfortunate in their midst as their taskmasters in Egypt had treated them. Israel is to be a different kind of place: one of refuge, grace and social concern (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 23:9; Lev 19:34; Deut 5:12–15; 15:12–15; 16:9–12; 24:17–22). Years later, in a biting social critique, Amos will rhetorically call to Egypt to bear witness to the oppression within Israel: the injustice of the people of God has led them to become like their ancient victimizers (Amos 3:1–2, 9–10; 8:8). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Jerusalem is figuratively equated with Egypt (and Sodom; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gen 13:10) because of its violence toward the Messiah and the two witnesses (Rev 11:8).

With the foundation of the monarchy, Egypt becomes a symbol in another sense as well. Egypt embodies the political and military temptation to turn to idolatrous superpowers instead of to Yahweh in times of acute national crisis. Several prophetic texts denounce this lack of faith. For Isaiah, Egypt's shade cannot provide protection, but only shame and defeat (Is 30:1–5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 20:1–6; 31:1–7); Ezekiel likens Israel and Judah to two promiscuous sisters, who go whoring after various empires, one of which is Egypt (Ezek 23); Hosea mocks Israel as a senseless bird that flits from one nation to another in search of aid (Hos 7:11–12). The envoy of Assyria ridicules the ineffective help of the Egyptians as a splintered reed that pierces and wounds the hand that grabs it (2 Kings 18:19–25; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 36:4–10). Jeremiah decries the flight to Egypt after the destruction of Jerusalem by those who do not trust in Yahweh's protection and provision, and he decrees judgment on those who move there (Jer 42–43).

Lastly, the defeat of Rahab the sea-monster (an echo of the Near Eastern tale of the struggle between Baal and Yam) is occasionally a metaphor for Yahweh's victory over Egypt (Is 30:7; Ezek 29:3–5; Ps 74:13–14, 86:10 [Heb 11]; see Divine Warrior). Yet in the future this very same Rahab will one day recognize Yahweh as Lord (Ps 87:4 [Heb 5]). This eschatological hope finds an echo in Isaiah 19:18–25.

See also Bondage and Freedom; Exodus, Second Exodus; Joseph the Patriarch; Moses; Pharaoh.

Bibliography. N. Frye, The Great Code: The Bible and Literature (Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1983).

ELDER CHILD, ELDER SIBLING

The position of the eldest child conjures up images of blessing, favoritism and a double inheritance—all the benefits of primogeniture (Deut 21:17). Indeed, the firstborn child in biblical times is given a privileged status in the family. Isaac intends to give Esau the birthright blessing despite God's words to the contrary (Gen 27:1–4). Leah, not Rachel, is given first in marriage (Gen 29:26). The greatest disaster that God can work upon Egypt is the destruction of the eldest child in each household (Ex 12:29–30). God claims the firstborn for himself but accepts the tribe of Levi in exchange (Ex 13:11–16; Num 3:12–13; Num 8:16–18).

Yet not unexpectedly in the economy of God's work, these expectations for the eldest child are frequently reversed (see Younger Child). The first genealogy in Genesis 5 recounts the lineage, not from father to eldest son, but from father to chosen son (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Seth, not Cain). The birthright is given to Isaac, not Ishmael (Gen 17:18–19); to Jacob, not Esau (Gen 27:28–29); to Judah, not Reuben (Gen 49:3–4). Joseph is displeased when Jacob crosses his hands and gives the greater blessing to Ephraim, the younger son, rather than to Manasseh, the older (Gen 49:17–18). Quite apart from considerations of birthright, the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] rings the changes on the motif of the younger who achieves precedence over an older sibling: Rachel is preferred before her older sister Leah; Joseph is the son of destiny rather than his older brothers; David is chosen king even though he is the youngest son in the family; Abel receives God's favor rather than Cain; Saul's daughter Michal is preferred to her older sister Merab; Moses overshadows his older brother Aaron. The heroic deliverer Gideon too is youngest in his family (Judg 6:15).

In the parable of the prodigal son, Jesus switches attention at the end to the peevish elder brother who refuses to rejoice at his younger sibling's return. In a pointed rejoinder to the Pharisees, who instigated the spate of parables in Luke 15 with their criticisms of Jesus' sinful dinner partners, Jesus casts his critics in the role of the carping elder brother.

On the other hand, eldest children are not unmitigated disasters. Although one line of characters represent the disappointment of failed expectations, another group consistently points to the true elder son, Christ, the firstborn among many children (Rom 8:29; Col 1:15; Heb 1:6). God names the entire nation of Israel as his firstborn (Ex 4:22). Similarly, Samson and Samuel bring redemption to their people, albeit imperfectly, foreshadowing Jesus, who not only rejoices with the Father when the prodigal son returns but goes himself into the pigpen to rescue his younger siblings.

See also Brother; First; Sister; Younger Child, Younger Sibling.

Bibliography. F. E. Greenspahn, When Brothers Dwell Together: The Preeminence of Younger Siblings in the Hebrew Bible (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994).

ENAMELED IMAGERY.

See Hard, Harden, Hardness; Heaven; Jewels And Precious Stones; Permanence

ENCOMIUM

The encomium is a lyric piece, whether in poetry or prose, that is written in praise of either an abstract quality or a general character type. Originating in ancient cultures and practiced with zest during the English Renaissance, the form is actually universal. Its practitioners have followed a set of five main formulas with almost technical precision. The motifs are these: (1) introduction to the subject of praise, sometimes including a definition of the subject; (2) the distinguished ancestry of the subject, or “praise by what kind he came of”; (3) a catalog of the praiseworthy acts and qualities of the subject; (4) the indispensable or superior nature of the subject, sometimes accompanied by comparison to lesser subjects and/or a listing of the rewards that accompany the object of praise; (5) a conclusion urging the reader to emulate the subject.

The canon of biblical encomia includes several psalms that praise the godly person (Ps 1; 15; 112; 128) and Psalm 119 praising God’s law. Two passages in Proverbs employ the standard motifs to praise wisdom (Prov 3:13–20; 8), and the book as a whole ends with a famous acrostic encomium that celebrates the ideal wife (Prov 31:10–31). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the Christ hymn belongs to the genre of the encomium. The Beatitudes paint a composite portrait of the ideal follower of Christ, accompanied by a catalog of the rewards that such a person will receive. In addition, two famous prose encomia take moral or spiritual qualities for their subject—love in 1 Corinthians 13 and faith in Hebrews 11. The song of the suffering servant in Isaiah 52:13–53:12 is a parody of the conventional encomium, inasmuch as it partly reverses the usual motifs and in effect praises the subject for qualities that the world at large would consider ignominious—grounds not for praise but for rejection.

See also Christ Hymn; Praise Psalms.

ENCOUNTER, DIVINE-HUMAN

The divine-human encounter, familiar to ancient epic and mythological literature, is one of the most recurrent “type scenes” in the Bible, whose central message revolves around the meeting of God and people in either reconciliation or judgment. While occasionally these encounters are initiated by the human party (on the premise, “Draw near to God and he will draw near to you” [Jas 4:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]), the customary pattern is that God initiates the encounter. An aura of the holy or numinous permeates the resulting encounter. The key ingredient in these encounters is the intrusion of a word or appearance from a supernatural realm into the earthly sphere.

Sometimes an angel is God’s agent in the encounter; on other occasions the divine appearance is apparently direct. In either case a tremendous sense of authority accompanies the one who appears from the transcendent realm. Permeated with a sense of momentousness that is overpowering, the human thus encountered responds with either conversation or action or both.

The most direct and vivid encounters appear in the earliest books of the Bible, where face-to-face dialogues are common. The pattern begins in Genesis 3, where God appears as a parent and judge, ferreting out the truth from his reluctant children, pronouncing judgment and promising redemption (Gen 3:8–23). Subsequently God appears to Cain to reason with him and pronounce judgment on him (Gen 4:6–15) and to Noah in the events surrounding the flood (Gen 6–9). Beginning with the call of Abraham (Gen 12:1–9), God’s encounters with the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (but not Joseph) punctuate the action of Genesis (Gen 13:14–17; 15:1–16; 17:1–22; 18; 22; 26:24–25; 28:10–22; 32; 35). These encounters are mainly restatements of the covenant, and although usually cast as conversations, they actually carry the force of a divine oracle.

A similar pattern pervades the epic of the Exodus. Here too the series begins with the call of the hero (Moses) in the story of the burning bush (Ex 3:1–4:17). When Moses plays the role of reluctant prophet of God's messages of judgment, God appears to him as instructor and coach (Ex 6:1–13; 7:8, 14, 19; 8:1–5). After the march of the nation has begun, God repeatedly speaks to Moses (usually in crisis situations) to instruct him in the next move, and sometimes in either vindication of Moses (Num 12: 16) or in judgment of him (Num 20:10–13). The most dramatic divine-human encounters of the exodus occur with the giving of the law at Mt. Sinai (Ex 19:9–25; 33:1–34:35). The motif of the divine-human encounter receives its most explicit form when we read that “the Lord used to speak to Moses face to face, as a man speaks to his friend” (Ex 33:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Equally important as a summary of the essence of such encounters is the detail that Moses' face shone after his encounters with God, requiring Moses to wear a veil, which he took off when he “went in before the Lord to speak with him” (Ex 34:29–35). Moses' life ends with an encounter with God on Mt. Pisgah (Deut 34).

The life of Moses' successor, Joshua, is likewise permeated with divine-human encounters with the formula “the Lord said to Joshua” appearing a dozen times. In these encounters, God appears chiefly as instructor in how to conduct the affairs of the nation in their conquest of the Promised Land. The pattern continues into the book of Judges, where highlights include God's call and equipping of Gideon (Judg 6:11–7:14) and the appearance of angel to announce the birth of Samson (Judg 13). The books of Samuel contain similar encounters, beginning with God's calling the youthful Samuel (1 Sam 3) and continuing with the life of David, where Nathan serves as the agent of God's encounter (2 Sam 7; 12:1–15). God's encounters with the kings of Israel and Judah come through his spokesmen, the prophets.

God's encounters with his prophets are a staple of prophetic literature. The formula that “the word of Lord came” to a prophet (or variants such as, “Thus says the Lord”) is so numerous as to make specific reference superfluous. Of special note, though, are scenes of prophets’ calling (Is 6:1–8; Jer 1; Ezek 1–3; Amos 7:15; Jon 1:1–2; 3:1–4). The story of Elijah is not only punctuated by the motif of God’s commanding his prophet to undertake specific tasks, but also enlivened by the wilderness scene in which God appears to Elijah as he sits under a broom tree and provides him with food and water. This is followed by a full-fledged encounter scene in which God appears to Elijah in a cave in the form of a still small voice (1 Kings 19:4–18). The latter episode underscores a common motif in which God strengthens his prophets by his encounters with them.

No divine-human encounter is more dramatic and vivid than the voice from the whirlwind that provides the climax to the book of Job (38–41:6). In a barrage of rhetorical questions, God turns the tables on Job (who has tried to bring God to trial) and asks Job a series of questions that demonstrate God’s superior knowledge and power. While seeming to focus on God’s transcendence, the two speeches also paradoxically show God’s immanence—his closeness to his creation and the wonder of his providential management of nature. In keeping with the two-person nature of divine-human encounters, Job responds with humility, contrition, repentance and worship (Job 40:3–5; 42:1–6).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the incarnation of Jesus is itself a prolonged divine encounter with the human race, as John intimates in the christological hymn with which he begins his Gospel (Jn 1:1–18). Beyond this general pattern we can note that the encounter story is a prominent subgenre of the Gospels. The stories in which Jesus confronts Zacchaeus (Lk 19:1–10) and the Samaritan woman at the well (Jn 4:1–42) can perhaps be taken as prototypes of a numerous class of encounter stories in the Gospels. Of special note also is the story of the conversion of Paul (Acts 9:1–9).

What is the meaning of the biblical motif of the divine-human encounter? Above all, it is the paradigm of the Bible's view of reality, the heart of which is that God communicates to people and enters their lives providentially and redemptively as well as in judgment. People are not left as orphans in the universe. They are instead the recipients of a divine word and of divine provision for their earthly and eternal needs. In addition to the specific narrative archetype of the divine-human encounter, the Bible itself possesses the quality of an encounter. Its claim upon its readers to respond is coercive in a way that ordinary literature is not. The Bible presupposes response as a condition of reading it.

See also Burning Bush; Moses; Prophet, Prophetess; Whirlwind.

END TIMES

The imagery of end times refers to a specific category of apocalyptic images of the future. For purposes of this article the designation “end times” excludes other related topics, including afterlife, heaven, hell, millennium (whose position relative to the end of history is never completely clarified in the Bible) and second coming. While “end” here refers primarily to the end of human history, we need to note that NT [NT NT. New Testament] eschatology makes this timeline more explicit than does OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy, which contains visions of something terminal that may be closer to the writer's time than the end of human history.

The Bible's images of the end are built around a cluster of time images. One of these is the image of “latter days” (Jer 23:20; 30:24; Ezek 38:16; Jas 3:5) or “last day(s)” (Jn 6:39—40, 44, 54; 11:24; 12:48; 2 Tim 3:1; Jas 5:3; 2 Pet 3:3). Another motif is “the end” (Dan 8:17; 9:26; 10:14; 11:35, 40; 12:4, 9, 13; Mt 10:22; 13:39—40, 49; 24:3, 6, 13—14; 28:20; etc.). Yet another image is a coming Day of the Lord (two dozen references). While the details of sequence are not always clear in these references, they establish an important aspect of the Bible’s view of history, namely, that it is moving in linear fashion to an appointed consummation.

Jesus’ Imagery of the End. Jesus’ Olivet Discourse in Matthew 24—25 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 13; Lk 21) can serve as a blueprint to the Bible’s images of the end. Underlying the images and events is a discernible timeline, indicated by the word pattern of “then” and “immediately after” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The discourse itself is occasioned by the disciples’ question, “What will be the sign of your coming and of the close of the age?” (Mt 24:3). Jesus proceeds to outline a discernible sequence in which some of the phases may overlap. It begins with the appearance of false christs and an era of warfare, earthquakes and famines, all of which are “but the beginning” of the sequence (Mt 24:5—8). “Then” will come a time of tribulation for Christians, accompanied by false prophets who will mislead many and by the worldwide proclamation of the gospel, “and then the end will come” (Mt 24:9—14). “Then” will come a time of “great tribulation” and the appearance of false christs and false prophets who work signs and wonders (Mt. 24:21—28). “Immediately after” the tribulation there will be cataclysmic destruction of natural forces as the sun is darkened, the moon fails to give its light and the stars fall from heaven (Mt 24:29). “Then” the sign of the Son of Man will appear in heaven, and Christ will send his angels to gather the elect from the earth (Mt 24:30—31). This is followed in Jesus’ discourse by a series of parables that have as their common point a final judgment of all people (Mt 24:32—25:30), climaxed by the judgment scene that is prefaced by the statement, “When the Son of man comes in his glory ... then he will sit on his glorious throne” (Mt 25:31—46 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Here, then, is an important repository of biblical images of the end. It is a nightmare vision of cosmic collapse, an equally violent disruption among people and nations, persecution for believers and spiritual deceitfulness and power by evil forces. The only positive note for Christians is the possibility of heroic endurance (“he who endures to the end will be saved” [Mt 24:13; Mk 13:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]) and the certainty that at the very end Christ will appear as divine rescuer.

The Book of Revelation. The book of Revelation follows the same events as Jesus’ outlines in the Olivet Discourse, elaborated in fuller detail and presented in a cyclic manner in which we retread the same territory, though with increasing intensification as we move through the book. Even if we interpret the book of Revelation as portraying recurrent patterns of fallen history, it seems incontrovertible that the book also portrays in symbolic manner what will happen at the end of human history.

One prominent image pattern is cataclysmic natural upheaval and decay. Two complementary motifs drive the point home—sudden cataclysm and what we might informally call “the slow burn.” On the cataclysmic side we encounter a continuous pattern of earthquakes, the sun becoming black and the moon like blood, the stars falling from the sky, mountains and islands being removed from their place, hail falling, and the earth and sky fleeing away. Balancing this are pictures of a gradual process of environmental distress: famine, pestilence, a third of the earth and trees burnt up, all green grass burnt up, a third of sea creatures dying, a third of the rivers made bitter and people scorched by fire and heat.

Disaster in nature has as its counterpart disaster among people and nations. Warfare is one image of social disintegration, as in the increasingly sinister sequence of four horse visions (Rev 6:1–8) or the destructive forces that are unloosed at the river Euphrates (Rev 9:13–19). More prevalent than war is the image of persecution of believers by forces of evil (Rev 6:11; 11:7–10; 12:17; 13:5–18) and images of torture (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rev 9:1–11). A related image pattern is the human toll that all this natural disaster takes on people in the form of pain and suffering (Rev 16:8–11, 21).

While such events as cataclysmic upheaval in nature and violence among people might be a picture of the earthly and human sphere left to its own disintegration, the book of Revelation views these developments on earth as part of a process of divine judgment against a wicked human race. At this point the imagery of the two spheres—the heavenly and the earthly—becomes important. The book of Revelation presupposes a two-tiered universe (or three-tiered, if we add hell) in which reality is divided between an unseen heavenly realm and the earth. The general pattern of Revelation is to shuttle back and forth between these and for events to be visited upon earth from a heavenly source, as though they are being stage-managed by a higher power (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rev 7:3; 8:7–12; 9:13–15; 16:1–21). Indeed, the tumultuous events at the end of history are explicitly presented as the outworking of the wrath of God (Rev 14:9–11; 15:1), and the events can therefore be interpreted as images of divine punishment against sinners.

This, in turn, ties into the motif of angelic and demonic actors in the final events of history. On one side we find an abundance of references in Revelation to angelic agents who are very busy carrying out God's revelation and judgment and protecting the followers of the Lamb. On the other side are demonic figures—a dragon who is identified with Satan, beasts from the sea and from the earth, and “demonic spirits” (Rev 16:14). The main image pattern associated with both types of supernatural creatures is supernatural power over people. There is a major contrast between the revelation or unveiling in which the angels consistently engage and the elaborate powers of deception associated with the forces of demonic evil.

According to the visions of Revelation, the end times will be characterized by a great spiritual struggle between good and evil. This battle will involve masses of both people and supernatural creatures. Thus we read variously about a war in heaven (Rev 12:7–12); the dragon's war against the offspring of the woman, the church (Rev 12:17); the beast from the sea making war on the saints (Rev 13:7); the assembling of the kings of the earth at Armageddon (Rev 16:16); the armies of earth arrayed against Christ (Rev 19:19); and a final gathering of the nations as they “marched up over the broad earth and surrounded the camp of the saints and the beloved city” (Rev 20:7–9).

While all of these motifs characterize the end times generally, at the very end of history stands a final judgment, a time of transition in which evildoers descend to hell and believers enter an eternity of bliss in heaven. In Jesus' Olivet Discourse this judgment is pictured in a series of parables and in the awe-inspiring judgment scene in which God divides the sheep from the goats. Other images of final judgment occur at memorable junctures in the book of Revelation—in the vision of the winepress of God's wrath (Rev 14:17–20), in the doom of Babylon (Rev 14:18), in the casting of the two demonic beasts into the lake of fire (Rev 19:20), in the scene of the great white throne (Rev 20:11—14).

Other New Testament Images. Other NT [NT NT. New Testament] images fill out the general picture provided by the Olivet Discourse and the book of Revelation. While some eschatological passages depict a gradual process of disintegration, a complementary motif stresses the unexpected suddenness with which events at the very end will happen. Thus Jesus speaks of the Son's coming suddenly (Mk 13:36) and of the final day coming "upon you suddenly like a snare" (Lk 21:34 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), while Paul speaks of "sudden destruction" (1 Thess 5:3). The most frequent NT [NT NT. New Testament] image is that of a thief that comes unexpectedly in the night (Mt 24:43; Lk 12:39; 1 Thess 5:2, 4; 2 Pet 3:10; Rev 3:3; 16:15).

Scattered NT [NT NT. New Testament] passages also fill out the picture of the spread of evil in the final days of human history. One of the most haunting images is that of "the mystery of lawlessness" and "the lawless one" that will appear (2 Thess 2:7—9). Earlier in that same passage Paul speaks of "the man of lawlessness" as "the son of perdition, who opposes and exalts himself against every so-called god or object of worship" (2 Thess 2:3—4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The picture that emerges is of a total collapse of moral standards as society preys upon itself and creates a totally secular entity. John gives us a similar image in the figure of the antichrist(s) (1 Jn 2:18, 22; 2 Jn 1:7), associated like the lawless one with spiritual deception of people.

Life in the end times receives composite treatment in two epistolary passages. One is 1 Thessalonians 5, where believers are commanded to live differently from their surrounding culture, which is characterized by the imagery of darkness and debauchery. The other is 2 Peter 3, a small classic on how to live in the last days. Here the degenerate cultural situation is described as a time of scoffing about the return of Christ and of people “following their own passions” (2 Pet 3:3).

A final striking image of the end is the picture Peter paints of the final conflagration. Nothing in Revelation is quite as decisive as this picture of the very end of earthly existence: “The heavens will pass away with a loud noise, and the elements will be dissolved with fire, and the earth and the works that are upon it will be burned up... The heavens will be kindled and dissolved, and the elements will melt with fire!” (2 Pet 3:10, 12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Old Testament Premonitions. With the NT [NT NT. New Testament] imagery to guide us, it is obvious that OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic visions use the same image patterns. What is not always clear is whether the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] visions predict the end or simply an end to an empire or historical era. Two prophetic books may be taken as exemplary of visions of the final end.

The second half of Daniel is an apocalyptic vision of the future in which images of the end figure prominently. Couched in the strange imagery of beasts and horns, the general pattern resembles NT [NT NT. New Testament] images of the end. One motif is that of empires vying for power, conquering and succeeding each other, exerting themselves against God. Images of calamity, divine wrath and military destruction are pervasive: “they shall fall by sword and flame, by captivity and plunder” (Dan 11:33 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “there shall be a time of trouble, such as never has been since there was a nation till that time” (Dan 12:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The prophecy of Zephaniah covers similar territory. It is a nightmarish vision of God's sweeping away everything from the earth (Zeph 1:2). The slaughter of judgment that God has prepared is ironically pictured as a grand "sacrifice" to which God has "consecrated his guests" (Zeph 1:7). We read further that "a day of wrath is that day, a day of distress and anguish, a day of ruin and devastation, a day of darkness and gloom, a day of clouds and thick darkness" (Zeph 1:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Imagery of torture and mutilation is present in the picture of people's blood "poured out like dust, and their flesh like dung" (Zeph 1:17). God will make "sudden end" of all the inhabitants of the earth (Zeph 1:18). Productive land will be transformed into a desert (Zeph 2:13–15); battlements will be "in ruins" and streets "laid waste" (Zeph 3:6).

Summary. While the Bible's apocalyptic images of the future mingle pessimism and hope, the hope belongs to events that either transcend or follow the end of earthly history. The end times themselves portray the proverbial doomsday. For unbelievers there is no hope at all. For believers the only hope is that of heroic endurance to the end and intervening rescue by Christ to a heavenly reward.

Two main principles underlie the Bible's images of the end. One is their cosmic scope. Prophecies of the end times are not stories of individuals but of natural forces and nations, both political and spiritual. Events at the end are happening on a huge scale, creating an impression of a stampede of masses toward a terrible destruction. The second pattern is that the images of the end are predominantly images of terror—a terror made all the more forceful by their power or hugeness (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , earthquakes, floods, invading armies, demonic forces) and the suddenness with which they inflict destruction on the earth. The major lessons that these visions of the end teach are the predictable spread of evil, the certainty of God's wrath and judgment against evil, the need for endurance (Rev 13:10) and a stance of preparedness for what is coming (Mt 24:25).

See also Afterlife; Antichrist; Apocalyptic Visions of the Future; Cosmology; Day, Day of the Lord; Divine Warrior; Judgment; Kingdom of God; Millennium; Revelation, Book of.

Bibliography. R. J. Bauckham, The Theology of the Book of Revelation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); K. E. Brower and M. W. Elliott, eds., 'The Reader Must Understand': Eschatology in Bible and Theology (Leicester: Apollos, 1997); G. B. Caird, The Language and Imagery of the Bible (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997 [1980]); J. B. Green, How to Read Prophecy (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1984).

ENDANGERED ANCESTRESS

The close proximity in Genesis of three episodes that center on the abduction or possible abduction of a Hebrew patriarch's wife has given rise to the image of the "endangered ancestress." These incidents, recorded in Genesis 12:10–20; 20:1–18 and 26:1–11, follow a very distinctive plot. The patriarch and his wife move to a new location. Fearful that the men of this region will kill him in order to have his wife, the patriarch persuades her to pretend that she is his sister. On the first two occasions, involving Abraham and Sarah, the plan backfires. The patriarch's wife is taken first by the Pharaoh of Egypt and then by Abimelech, the king of Gerar. Both times God intervenes, restoring Sarah to Abraham. On the third occasion, concerning Isaac and Rebekah, the ruse is uncovered by the foreign ruler before any abduction occurs.

Although these incidents are frequently viewed as placing the ancestress in jeopardy, it is the continuation of the line or “seed” through whom God’s blessing will be mediated to the nations of the earth that is really endangered.

Significantly, in the second episode, which comes immediately prior to the birth of Isaac, the narrator emphasizes that Abimelech did not touch Sarah (Gen 20:4–7). The reader is left in no doubt that Abraham is the father of Isaac.

Some commentators have viewed the wife/sister incidents as praising the sagacity of the patriarchs. On the contrary, these incidents reveal a failure to trust God for protection. In spite of the ingenuity of Abraham’s plan, he fails to protect his wife Sarah. Only God’s intervention resolves the complication created by the ruse. Although Pharaoh and Abimelech are not exonerated for taking the patriarch’s wife in the first two incidents, it is noteworthy that on the third occasion, Abimelech highlights the potential danger of the patriarch’s deception: “What is this you have done to us? One of the people might well have slept with your wife, and you would have brought guilt upon us” (Gen 26:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In light of these factors the incidents were clearly never intended to applaud the deceptive behavior of the patriarchs.

See also Woman, Images of.

ENEMY

The world of the Bible is populated with a wide variety of enemies. If a first-time reader of the Bible were to begin with the thought that a “religious” book would be filled with sublime spirituality, remote from the realities of human existence, they would surely be surprised. If we were to extract the “enemies” from all of the Bible’s narratives, prophecies, psalms, proverbs, Gospels and letters, the text would be riddled with gaps and the story would be reduced to nonsense. Enemies are a problem for which God provides the solution.

Because much of the Bible is the story of Israel, most of the enemies we encounter are enemies of Israel. Israel's enemies are primarily the "nations," ethnic and national groupings who appear under various names but in general blend into one category of those who are not Israel, the Gentiles. They are idolatrous and opposed to Israel and Israel's God. Even where the enemies are personal, such as the ones we often encounter in the book of Psalms, they are reminiscent of Israel's national enemies. In sketching the profile of enemies in the Bible, we can effectively speak of both national and personal enemies together. The more dramatic distinction lies between human enemies and spiritual enemies, and the latter being more fully developed in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] .

Enemy Behavior. How does Israel view its enemy? The enemy is hateful (Deut 30:7), full of insults (Ps 55:12), curses (Num 23:11; 24:10), taunts (Deut 32:27) and slanders (Satan, 1 Tim 5:14). He gloats when he triumphs (Lam 2:17; Mic 7:8) and is full of braggadocio (Ex 15:9; Ps 13:4).

The enemy inflicts suffering and distress on Israel (Deut 28:53, 55, 57). He encircles Jerusalem and lays siege (1 Kings 8:37; Lk 19:43), destroys and tramples down the Lord's sanctuary (Ps 74:3; Is 63:18), plunders Jerusalem's treasure (Lam 1:10) and penetrates the most holy place of the temple to create the "abomination of desolation" (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Dan 9:27). Then, having overcome Jerusalem, he boldly cries out, "Aha! The ancient heights have become our possession" (Ezek 36:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The approach of a great enemy is a fearsome thing, even when viewed from the ramparts of a walled city. In Isaiah 10:28—34 the approach of an enemy (probably Assyrian) army is measured by an itinerary that draws ever closer to Jerusalem—day by day, encampment by encampment, fear upon terror, they finally arrive at Jerusalem’s gates. Enemies overrun the land (Amos 3:11), disturbing the normal course of daily life, business and travel, so that even the main roadways are abandoned (Judg 5:6—7; Zech 8:10). An enemy can be in an uproar (Ps 74:23) and seem like “waves” that “rage like great waters” (Jer 51:55 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The enemy pursues (Ps 143:3; Hos 8:3) and overtakes (Ps 7:5). He has the power to crush (Ps 143:3), defeat (1 Kings 8:33), oppress (Num 10:9; Ps 42:9) and persecute (Deut 30:7). Daniel has a vision depicting enemy empires as fearsome hybrid monsters arising from the sea and bringing awful suffering upon the people of God (Dan 7:1—8, 19—25). A victorious enemy extracts a price by demanding tribute (Ps 89:22) or enslaving Israel and taking her into exile.

Enemies abound in the psalms. Frequently they are personal rather than national enemies, but the imagery is not greatly different. The enemy is full of hate (Ps 25:19; 69:4), hurls insults (Ps 55:12), persecutes (Ps 9:13), conspires and imagines evil (Ps 41:5, 7), seeks revenge (Ps 44:16), pursues and overtakes (Ps 7:5), surrounds (Ps 17:9) and attacks (Ps 27:2), threatens to take one’s life (Ps 64:1), and brings on social shame (Ps 31:11; 69:19) or the darkness of despair (Ps 143:3). In the case of the psalms of David, the line between national and personal enemies can be thin indeed, for Israel’s enemies are easily imaged as David’s own enemies (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 18). It is as if there is a common stock of “enemy” imagery that is rooted in the world of tribal, ethnic and national hostility but is equally applicable to enemies “within the walls.”

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] places its emphasis on spiritual enemies, though these have their precedent in the monsters of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . These are the “cosmic” enemies that are imaged in the mythological symbolism of Israel’s neighbors. The names are varied: Leviathan, Rahab and the dragon, or sea monster (see Cosmology; Monsters). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the chief spiritual enemy is Satan, or the devil, who prowls like a roaring lion, “looking for someone to devour” (1 Pet 5:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In Jesus’ parable of the wheat and the weeds (Mt 13:24–30), it is the enemy (the devil, Mt 13:39) who sows weeds among the wheat of the kingdom of God. Ephesians speaks of the “evil one” who shoots fiery darts at believers, and the nefarious “rulers,” “authorities,” and “cosmic powers of this present darkness” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) mount a formidable opposition that must be resisted by the armor and weaponry of God (Eph 6:10–17). In Romans 6–8 we encounter a trilateral alliance of spiritual powers: sin, flesh and death, with an unwilling accomplice—the law (see Romans). And in 1 Corinthians, death is the “final enemy”: “the sting of death is sin and the power of sin is the law” (1 Cor 15:56 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). But in Revelation we see the cosmic enemies of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] resurfacing in the “great dragon” (Rev 12) and the “beast coming out of the sea” (Rev 13). These evoke potent and satanic forces of evil that oppose God’s purposes in history.

The Divine Enemy. Since he is the deliverer and defender of Israel, we expect to find Yahweh described as an enemy to Israel’s enemies (Ex 23:22). But he can also be an enemy to Israel’s disobedient king Saul (1 Sam 28:16). Even more striking is the turnabout image of Yahweh as Israel’s enemy (Is 63:10). This is the consequence of Israel’s breaking covenant with Yahweh. Blessing is exchanged for curse; deliverance is exchanged for wrath; triumph is exchanged for defeat. Israel, despite its status as the people God has chosen to dwell amongst, is not inviolable (Jer 7:4–15). God arms himself, strings his bow (Lam 2:4) and strikes Jerusalem “as an enemy would” (Jer 30:14). Jerusalem laments in anguish, “The Lord is like an enemy; he has swallowed up Israel” (Lam 2:4–5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

In these moments Israel’s enemies become the armies and weapons of God, who allows Israel’s enemies to defeat, rule over or take disobedient Israel into exile (Lev 26:16–44). God “delivers over” or “abandons” Israel to her enemies (1 Kings 8:46; Neh 9:27, 28). Deuteronomy 28:25 evokes a memorable scene of Israel’s defeat at the hand of enemies: “You will come at them from one direction but flee from them in seven” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

On the personal level, Job thinks God considers him an enemy (Job 13:24; 33:10) and is assailing him as an army would: “His anger burns against me; he counts me among his enemies. His troops advance in force; they build a siege ramp against me and encamp around my tent” (Job 19:12).

Paul develops this motif by speaking of humans apart from Christ as indeed enemies of God. But here the emphasis is on the enmity of the human heart as contrasted with the love that God extends toward his human enemies. The Colossian believers are reminded that they were formerly alienated from God and enemies in their minds because of their evil behavior (Col 1:21). And the wonder of the gospel is that while we were still God’s enemies, he reconciled us to himself through the death of his Son (Rom 5:10).

God’s Defeat of Enemies. The main plot line of the biblical story is God’s defeat of evil and the establishment of a new creation. The final enemy and embodiment of evil is Satan, a rebel against the divine order, and one who must be defeated. With him no peaceful reconciliation is possible. The historical enemies of Israel are those who align themselves against God's purposes and against God's design in choosing Israel as his own people. Wittingly or unwittingly, they are accomplices with the ultimate enemy, and this spiritual reality is expressed in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] by speaking of the nations' gods. Israel's warfare against the nations is a serious matter in the course of redemptive history, and the conquest of the nations of Canaan has its basis not only in the divine promise of a land to Abraham and his descendants, but also in the spiritual reality that the sin of these nations eventually will have "reached its full measure" (Gen 15:16). The nations that inhabit the Promised Land do not simply happen to be in the wrong place at the wrong time as Israel enters. The biblical story assumes that the day of judgment has arrived for these nations. In this sense they are Yahweh's enemies first and Israel's enemies second. But their immediate role is always determined by the sovereign will of God. The nations of Canaan, as well as the great empires of the biblical world (Assyria, Babylon, Egypt), may readily be used by God as a means of disciplining and bringing judgment upon Israel.

The imagery employed to speak of God's defeat of these enemies is varied, though much of it is stock imagery. The emphasis alternates between God the divine warrior defeating the enemy and Israel defeating the enemy, with the underlying premise being that no true victory on the battlefield comes without God's help. God promises to go with Israel and fight for Israel in order to give them victory (Deut 20:4). God puts the enemy to flight, making them turn their backs and run (Ex 23:27), scattering them (Num 10:35) and sending Israel in pursuit. With God as their commander, five Israelite warriors will chase a hundred, and a hundred will chase ten thousand (Lev 26:7–8). When Israel is in a desperate plight, God saves or redeems her from the hand of the enemy (Ps 106:10) and rescues her from powerful enemies (Num 10:9; Judg 8:34; 2 Sam 22:18; Ps 18:17). God promises to drive out the Canaanites before Israel (Deut 32:21; 33:27), to thrust them out of the land (Deut 6:19). Israel will in turn be given the plunder of the nations (Deut 30:7), the land of her enemies will be hers. A recurring image associated with the acquired inheritance of the land is God's giving Israel “rest”* from her enemies (Deut 12:10; 25:19; Josh 23:1).

Frequently we read of God delivering enemies into Israel's hand (Deut 23:14), of his handing them over for execution (Josh 21:44; Judg 3:28; 1 Sam 26:8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Judg 16:23–24). God is imaged as crushing the head of his enemies (Ps 68:21) or trampling them (Ps 60:12; 108:13). Solomon's enemies will “lick the dust” (Ps 72:9) and God reduces enemies to fine dust. They are as ephemeral as blown chaff (Is 29:5), and like the beauty of the field that passes with the season, Israel's enemies will vanish like smoke (Ps 37:20). The boastful mouth of the enemy will be silenced (Ps 143:12). Even more colorfully, Yahweh's sword devours the flesh of his enemies and his arrows are drunk on their blood (Deut 32:42). In the exodus, God causes the sea to engulf Israel's enemies (Ps 78:53). Endless ruin overtakes God's enemies, and their cities are uprooted (Ps 9:6).

Some images speak of judgment, of avenging the blood of God's servants or taking vengeance on his enemies (Deut 32:43), of repaying the enemy all they deserve (Is 66:6). Enemies cast shame upon God's people, and God in turn shames them by exalting his own people (Mic 7:10) and causing enemies to cower before Israel (Deut 33:29). God blesses and honors his people, exalting them in public view, by preparing a table for them in the presence of their enemies (Ps 23:5).

The crowning point of these OT [OT OT. Old Testament]

cameos of divine triumph is God's subduing David's enemies (1 Chron 17:10): he places enemies under the feet of the Davidic king as his royal footstool (Ps 110:1) and extends the king's scepter so that he rules in the midst of his enemies (Ps 110:2). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] we repeatedly find the image of Psalm 110:1 used to speak of Christ's victory over his enemies. Christ's enemies are a footstool for his feet, or placed "under his feet" (Ps 8:7). These are spiritual enemies (Acts 2:35; Eph 1:19–22; Heb 1:3, 13; 1 Pet 3:22), though when Jesus recites the psalm in the Gospels, he seems to have in mind his earthly accusers (Mt 22:44; Mk 12:36; Lk 20:43). In 1 Corinthians we see that Christ must reign until he has put all enemies under his feet (1 Cor 15:25), the "last enemy" being death (1 Cor 15:26; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 15:54–57). And Hebrews speaks of the ascended Christ waiting for his enemies to be made his footstool (Heb 10:13).

Other NT [NT NT. New Testament] images of triumphing over the enemy include Jesus giving the Seventy disciples his authority to overcome all the power of the enemy (Lk 10:19). The author of Hebrews recalls the language of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as he speaks of a raging fire that will consume the enemies of God (Heb 10:27). In Revelation, fire comes from the mouths of the two witnesses and consumes their enemies (Rev 11:5), and later they ascend to heaven with their enemies looking on (Rev 11:12).

Shamed By the Enemy. In a cultural milieu where social standing is measured on a scale of honor and shame, a person's or a nation's enemies are an ever potential source of shame. When Moses descends from Sinai, he sees that Aaron has lost control of the people and Israel has become a laughingstock to their enemies because Israel is running wild (Ex 32:25). The psalmist speaks of being scorned, disgraced and shamed by enemies (Ps 69:19). And when Jerusalem falls, enemies laugh at her destruction (Lam 1:7). Of Jerusalem it is said:

All your enemies open their mouths wide against you;

they scoff and gnash their teeth and say, “We have swallowed her up.

This is the day we have waited for; we have lived to see it.” (Lam 2:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The depth of defeat is imaged in shame as God allows Israel’s enemies to gloat over her (Lam 2:17), makes Israel serve her enemies under an iron yoke (Deut 28:48; Jer 15:14; 17:4) and delivers Israel’s grain as food for her enemies (Is 62:8).

The ultimate shaming of a righteous Israelite comes to focus on Jesus crucified on a Roman cross. He is executed by Israel’s ruling enemy, Rome. Stripped naked, suffering the most humiliating of public executions, he is shamed by the taunts of his passing enemies, most of whom are his fellow Israelites (Mt 27:37–44; Mk 14:27–32; Lk 23:35–39; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 22:6–8).

Entreaties to God Regarding Enemies. The biblical text echoes with entreaties to God to do something about the enemy. The psalms in particular provide many examples where an individual or the community beseeches God: “Give us aid against the enemy” (Ps 60:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Ps 108:12); “Protect my life from the threat of the enemy” (Ps 64:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And in Lamentations, Jerusalem cries out, “Look, O Lord, on my affliction, for the enemy has triumphed” (Lam 1:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Sometimes an appeal is made to God’s own honor:

“How long will the enemy mock you, O God?” (Ps 74:10, 18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The afflicted do not hesitate to suggest how God might deal with the enemy: “Let death take my enemies by surprise” (Ps 55:15); “Strike all my enemies on the jaw; break the teeth of the wicked” (Ps 3:7); and “May [God’s] enemies be scattered” (Ps 68:1).

These cries of lament are the hinge on which numerous biblical stories turn from oppression to freedom, from conflict to victory. The Israelites in Egypt “groaned in their slavery and cried out” to God, and God “heard their groaning and remembered his covenant” with their ancestors (Ex 2:23–24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the psalms this “cry” and “groaning” is frequently focused on the enemy, such as the anguished rhetorical lament, “How long will my enemy triumph over me?” (Ps 13:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This cry finds its echo in Paul’s anguished lament, perhaps expressing the plight of Israel under the law: “Who will rescue me from this body of death?” (Rom 7:24 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The resolution of this cry is expressed in the psalms of thanksgiving, where we find expressions like, “you lifted me out of the depths and did not let my enemies gloat over me” (Ps 30:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] , e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 18). This basic pattern of movement from lament in the face of enemies to praise for divine victory over enemies offers a way of viewing the biblical story in its entirety. Israel, beset and oppressed by enemies, cries out for a deliverer; God triumphs over the enemies and delivers Israel, bringing vindication and abundant blessings. This pattern comes to full expression in the plight of Israel’s exile and the hope of a return and restoration of Israel.

The pattern may be observed in Jesus, who recapitulates the story of Israel. Jesus is beset by his enemies, who nail him to a cross. There he cries out with the voice of Israel, “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?” These words come from Psalm 22 (Ps 22:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Mt 27:46; Mk 15:34), where the righteous one is encircled by enemies who are imaged as strong bulls, roaring lions and dogs. God triumphantly raises Jesus—the representative and true Israelite—from the dead and places his enemies under his feet.

Unlikely or Turnabout Enemies. Sometimes family and friends turn out to be enemies. The Lord says of Israel, “Lately my people have risen up like an enemy” (Mic 2:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus startlingly declares that he has come “not ... to bring peace, but a sword,” to turn family members against each other so that “a man’s enemies will be the members of his own household” (Mt 10:36 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mic 7:6). Paul says to the Galatians, “Have I now become your enemy by telling you the truth?” (Gal 4:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), and he warns the Philippians of the “many” who now live as enemies of the cross of Christ (Phil 3:18). The ultimate irony is that Israel, in its response to the gospel and the ingathering of the Gentiles, is “an enemy on your [Gentiles’] account; but loved on account of the patriarchs” (Rom 11:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). And James reminds his readers of the dividing line between a friend and an enemy of God: “Anyone who chooses to become a friend of the world becomes an enemy of God” (Jas 4:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

A Transformed Response to Enemies. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the response to the enemy overwhelmingly takes on the imagery of hate, conflict and warfare. There are exceptions, of course, such as the peaceable Abraham who seeks to resolve conflicts and only goes to war in order to rescue Lot's family and others who have been taken captive by marauding armies. But the exodus, conquest and establishment of the Davidic kingdom exercise a formative power on our overall perception of enemies in the OT [OT Old Testament] . Enemies evoke fear or valor, defense or flight, curses and dire oracles. A counterpoint to this prevailing flow of imagery is found in Proverbs 25:21–22 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]): “If your enemy is hungry, give him food to eat; if he is thirsty, give him water to drink. In doing this, you will heap burning coals on his head, and the Lord will reward you.” Jesus, speaking in a social climate where hatred of the enemy (Rome) is aligned with righteousness and zeal for Israel's God, makes a hallmark of his teaching—love of the enemy—all the more striking: “You have heard that it was said, ‘Love your neighbor and hate your enemy.’ But I tell you: Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you” (Mt 5:43–44 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), or as Luke has it, “Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you” (Lk 6:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 6:35). Nowhere is this more brilliantly enacted than in the scene of Jesus' crucifixion, when he prays, “Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing” (Lk 23:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Paul echoes Jesus' teaching of love for the enemy by quoting from Proverbs 25:21–22 (see above) and rounding it off with the instruction, “Do not be overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good” (Rom 12:20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul himself is not without enemies, and he carries out an ongoing struggle with those who oppose his gospel and mission. Some of his words regarding his enemies—his wish that the Judaizers would “emasculate themselves” (Gal 5:12) or his warning to the Philippians to “watch out for those dogs” (Phil 3:2)—would seem to betray his instruction to love the enemy. But those who would judge Paul must first take into account his burning love for Israel and the Gentiles, his use of rhetorical conventions that allowed for this vivid language, and his passion and zeal for God’s truth. Paul’s enemies are “enemies of the cross” (Phil 3:18), and as such they evoke some of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery of divine enemies. But within Paul’s scheme of enemies, the ultimate enemy is Satan, and with him are aligned the various principalities and powers, and the alliance of sin, flesh and death. These are the enemies that will be trampled (Rom 16:20) and placed under the feet of Christ (1 Cor 15:24–28). So confident is Paul of the triumph of Christ, that he engages the ancient rhetoric of taunting the final enemy, death: “Death has been swallowed up in victory. Where, O Death is your victory? Where, O Death, is your sting?” (1 Cor 15:54–55; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 25:8; Hos 13:14).

See also Babylon; Battle Stories; Cosmology; Divine Warrior; Egypt; Exile; Gentile; Monsters; Persecution; Satan; Triumph; Under The Feet; Vengeance, Revenge.

ENLIGHTENMENT, STORIES OF.

See Ehiphany, Stories of.

ENTHRONEMENT.

See King, Kingship; Triumph.

ENTRYWAY.

See Door.

EPHESIANS, LETTER TO THE

The opening chapter of Ephesians unfolds the rich dimensions of God’s grace in Christ in sonorous tones that evoke a liturgical setting. This characteristic and the probability that Ephesians was written as a circular letter to be read by several churches may account for the lack of personal address so characteristic of Pauline letters.

Ephesians employs a wealth of imagery, and much of it belonging to either the cosmic, heavenly dimension or the horizontal, earthly dimension. But overarching the entire letter is a prevailing theme of unity, the reconciliation of all things in Christ.

The Cosmic Dimension. Ephesians takes the big view of God's redeeming action in Jesus Christ. The letter enlists imagery that reaches for the broadest categories of time and space. The humble, struggling Christian communities of Asia Minor are revealed as engaged in a redemptive drama that is both staggering in its cosmic dimensions and compelling in its call for participation.

The majesty of Christ is chiefly portrayed in imagery of heavenly kingship. God has raised Christ from the dead and seated him at his right hand "in the heavenlies" (Eph 1:20). The image of Christ's being seated at the "right hand," the place of kingly power and privilege, echoes Psalm 110:1, which speaks of a royal figure who will be seated at God's right hand and whose enemies God will make into the king's royal footstool. It is an image of royal exaltation that assumes a sovereign's triumph over hostile powers. Ephesians carries forward this kingly and militaristic image by speaking of God's placing "all things under his feet" (Eph 1:22), and though the image of a footstool and "things under his feet" are nearly synonymous, a different OT [OT OT. Old Testament] text is now being employed. It is Psalm 8:6, where humankind is regaled as crowned with "glory and honor," its dominion over God's creation symbolized by "all things" placed *"under their feet." Christ is the fulfillment of Israel's national kingship and Adam's creational rule, he is the sovereign over a new creation that has been secured by God's mighty redemptive power. But the "things" placed in submission under Christ's feet are not earthly animals but wayward spiritual beings enumerated as "rule and authority and power and dominion and every name named" (Eph 1:21). Christ is imaged as the triumphant, cosmic warrior-king and heavenly "Adam." As the climax of the biblical drama in which Israel has failed in its role of a new Adam amidst the errant nations, with Israel's king bearing the crown of the Adamic ideal, Christ now fulfills Israel's redemptive role and is given universal reign. He is the one Lord over all things, the cosmic reconciler.

The stature of Christ as Lord of the cosmos is staggering in its immensity. "All things" in heaven and earth are "headed up," or "summed up" in him (anakephalaioō, Eph 1:10). More pointedly, God has given Christ as "head over all things for the church" (Eph 1:22), God's new redemptive society—a bold claim for the Christian communities precariously planted in a few urban seedbeds of the northeastern Mediterranean world. The Greek grammar of Ephesians 1:22 is ambiguous in itself, but probably complements the preceding image of headship: The church is the *"fullness" of Christ, the concentrated expression of Christ's sovereign rule, who in turn is the one "who fills all in all," or, to paraphrase, he "fills the cosmos with his sovereign rule." These images of heavenly enthronement and cosmic "filling" strike a fine balance between Christ's immanence and transcendence. The cosmic Lord and reconciler of all things is also Lord over the church.

The picture of the enthroned Christ "in the heavenlies" is a clue that we have stepped into a drama in which the height of conflict and triumph are in the past. The vanquished opponents, the cosmic powers and dominions, are now "under his feet." The events of Christ's cross, death (Eph

1:20; 2:16) and resurrection (Eph 1:20; 2:6) have faded into the background, and the focus has shifted to the drama of exaltation and enthronement. Ephesians 4:8–10 pans the preceding scenes of the drama through imagery borrowed from Psalm 68:18: Christ is depicted as a mighty warrior who “ascended on high,” took “captivity captive” and gave gifts to people (with the image of “receiving gifts from people” in Ps 68:18 now turned on its head). In Psalm 68 the warrior is God, who drives his armed chariotry from Sinai and gallantly ascends the temple mount of Zion, his royal palace. That picture is now tipped on end, transposed onto a vertical plane of earth and heaven, with Christ triumphantly ascending to the heavenly temple “mount.” The picture is further interpreted: “When it says, ‘He ascended,’ what does it mean but that he had also descended into the lower parts of the earth? He who descended is the same one who ascended far above all the heavens, so that he might fill all things” (Eph 4:9–10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Here the “lower parts of the earth” is not an allusion to “hell” (as in 1 Pet 3:19); the phrase “of the earth” simply unpacks what is meant by “lower parts” (“lower parts, that is, the earth”). A two-storied universe is envisioned, with Christ descending to earth in his incarnation and then ascending “far above the heavens” to take his heavenly throne. The point of this brief sketch is that the ascended Christ has given gifts to outfit and enable the church, “the body of Christ” (Eph 4:12), to be built up and prosper. He has distributed his booty; in his triumph he divides “the spoil with the strong” (Is 53:12).

The “heavenly realms,” or “heavenlies,” is a distinctive image of Ephesians, though it is consistent with Jewish cosmology of the period. It represents both the upper reaches of the cosmos as well as the realm of spiritual beings and divine transcendence. As part of the cosmos the “heavenlies” share in both the present evil age and in the age to come. Thus we read of “principalities and powers” in the heavenlies (Eph 3:10; 6:12) controlled by “the ruler of the power of the air” (Eph 2:2), as well as believers who were once “dead” and followers of the ruler of this world (Eph 2:1–2) but are now “seated in the heavenlies” with Christ (Eph 2:6). The throne of God and Christ should probably be envisioned as situated in the highest reaches of heaven. The Ephesian believers, though their feet are firmly planted on the soil of western Asia Minor, are already “raised up” and occupying a transcendent position with Christ who is “over” all things and “far above the heavens” (Eph 4:10). It is a powerful image, perhaps shaped on the anvil of liturgical vision and imagination, in which worshipers share in the heavenly voices of praise and partake of the heavenly blessings (Eph 1:3). It is a parallel and spiritual world. We are invited to imagine a heavenly realm that is hierarchical and bears its own mysteries, including “families” of created beings (probably angels both good and evil) somehow analogous to those on earth (Eph 3:15). But it is also a fearsome realm, still inhabited by malignant pockets of the defeated forces of evil, cosmic powers “of this present darkness,” “spiritual forces of evil” who assail the church (Eph 6:12).

The Earthly Dimension. Ephesians 2:11–22 views this great story along more horizontal lines, speaking of the human condition before and after Christ’s work, with an emphasis on the reconciling work of Christ as it culminates in a new human community made up of formerly disparate peoples. The entire passage may be viewed as a narrative that utilizes vivid images drawn from the story of Israel.

The recipients of this letter are seen from the perspective of one who stands within historic Israel and speaks to people who realize that they have been overwhelmingly blessed by their inclusion in the newly constituted people of God. Viewed through Israelite eyes, the human family is divided in two: Israel and the Gentiles, the chosen people of God and the wayward nations, the true humanity and the beastly empires of Daniel's vision (Dan 7). The status of "Israelite," determined by birth, was sealed by circumcision, a ritual cutting off of male genital flesh.

There follows a series of exclusionary images. The Gentile audience was formerly scorned as "uncircumcision" (akrobystia) by those who proudly called themselves "the circumcision" (peritomē, Eph 2:11). They were "without Christ;" that is, they were outside of the chosen people in whom the Messiah, the true king and deliverer of Israel, was rooted. They were "separated from the commonwealth of Israel," like impoverished outsiders who gazed longingly across the border at the privileged people in their fair land. They were "aliens to the covenants of promise" (see Foreigner), having no access to the series of historic divine transactions that promised the blessings of a true humanity, a justly ordered society, a restored creation and the abiding and glorious presence of the one God. They were "without hope and without God (atheioi) in the world," a people separated from the Creator and covenant God, listless vagabonds upon the earth with no future worth living for. Viewed from the ramparts of Zion, they were "far off" (Eph 2:13), over the horizon. These images form a picture of irrevocable exclusion, of particularized privilege, of clearly marked insiders and outsiders.

This division climaxes in the central image of a "dividing wall" (mesotoichon) that symbolizes the "hostility" between these two partitions of humanity (Eph 2:14), an enmity sharpened by "the law with its commandments and ordinances" (Eph 2:15). We may visualize the Herodian temple and the wall that divided the Court of the Gentiles from the inner courts of Israel. In the microcosm of the temple, this wall represented the Jewish vision of the world and its nations, where the law served as an “impenetrable fence and iron wall” separating Israel from the nations (Letter of Aristeas 139).

But the unexpected has taken place. As if in a military assault, Christ, the Messiah of Israel, has “broken down” (see Tear Down) the dividing wall, he has “put to death” the hostility, by abolishing the “law with its commandments and ordinances” (Eph 2:14–16). The goal of “making peace” and “reconciling” the two groups has been achieved through Christ’s death. This event is briefly alluded to by images of “the blood of Christ” (Eph 2:13) and “his flesh” (Eph 2:14); the divisive “circumcision in flesh by human hands” (Eph 2:11) has been overcome by Christ’s own fleshly mutilation (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the “circumcision of Christ,” Col 2:11). With this victory achieved, Christ “came” and “proclaimed peace” to those “far off” (Gentiles, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 20:10) and to those “near” (Israel, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 57:19). As in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , images of divine triumph merge into images of creation: the triumph of Christ over “hostility” leads to the creation of “one new man” (Eph 2:15), “one body” (Eph 2:16), “one new humanity in place of the two” (Eph 2:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Jew and Gentile are joined in the body of Christ, the New Adam, to become, as it were, a “third race” fitted for life in the new creation. The cosmic reconciliation has its counterpart in the reconciliation of Jew and Gentile into one.

But then the metaphor shifts: The Gentiles are “no longer strangers and aliens” but “fellow citizens with the saints and members of the household of God” (Eph 2:19). And the household of God is a temple. The mythic stories of the ancient Near-Eastern gods, who struggled and triumphed over the forces of chaos, followed a progressive pattern of conflict, victory, exaltation, housebuilding and celebration.

This archetypal story pattern may be broadly observed in Ephesians, with significant elements appearing in this passage. Christ has triumphed over the barrier of hostility between Jew and Gentile (in addition to the hostility between God and humanity) and now proceeds to build his house, his temple. The foundation consists of “apostles and prophets” of the early church, with Christ himself as the “cornerstone”* (Eph 2:20). This structure grows organically into a “holy temple” (Eph 2:21) built of redeemed humanity, “a dwelling place for God” (Eph 2:22, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] the “fullness” indwelling the “body” in Eph 1:23). The central symbol of God’s dwelling within the “body” of Israel, the Jerusalem temple, is figuratively assaulted, torn down and replaced by this new temple built of sanctified “building blocks” of Jews and Gentiles. The image of “access” (prosagōgē, Eph 2:18; 3:12) to God also fits within this temple imagery, for the term is used in the Greek translation of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] for approaching God in the sanctuary with sacrifices (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] Lev 1:3; 3:3; 4:14), and in Greek literature it is used of the right of an audience with a king. Paul speaks of “bending his knees” as he approaches the divine throne with his petitions (Eph 3:14).

Images of the Church. A good deal of the imagery of Ephesians may be categorized as images of the church. We have observed the images of “one new man” (Eph 2:15–16) and the related images of “household” and “holy temple” (Eph 2:19–22). And the image of the church as Christ’s “body” has been introduced (Eph 1:23). The relationship between this body imagery, which is further developed in Ephesians 4–5, and the Adamic imagery is frequently overlooked. The archetypal pattern of “old Adam” and “new Adam,” old humanity and new humanity, is ever shaping this language. Thus when the readers are instructed to “put off” (apothesthai) the “old man” (palaion anthrōpon), corrupt and deluded by its lusts (Eph 4:22 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and to “put on” the “new man” (kainon anthrōpon), distinguished by righteousness and holiness (Eph 4:24), a corporate image of an old and new humanity is being invoked. Believers are part of a new Adamic community that is “created in the likeness of God” (Eph 4:24). By contrast, the character of the old humanity is itemized in a list of degrading vices that are to be given up-or risk loss of the inheritance of the kingdom of God (Eph 4:25–32; 5:3–5).

The image of a corporate “body of Christ” (Eph 1:23; 2:16; 3:6; 4:4, 12, 16, [25]; 5:23, 30) is closely related to this Adamic imagery, for in the Pauline thought-world Christ is the new Adam, the true imprint of the divine image. The body of Christ is an organic, growing entity, whose head is Christ (Eph 4:15). Paul even speaks as a personal trainer who leads the body of Christ in a body-building program (Eph 4:16, 29; 5:29). From the “head” the whole body is “joined and knit together by every ligament with which it is equipped, as each part is working properly,” and Christ “promotes the body’s growth in building itself up in love” (Eph 4:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The image of Christ as “head”* (Eph 1:22; 4:15; 5:23) in Ephesians poses a problem of interpretation. If we are to understand it as a “head” attached to a “body,” this “body” metaphor should certainly be distinguished from 1 Corinthians 12, where members constitute various parts of the body of Christ, including the head (1 Cor 12:21) and parts of the head (ear, eye, nose; 1 Cor 12:16–17). The image of Christ as “head” in Ephesians should not be understood as part of the image of the “body of Christ” but as a separate christological (rather than ecclesiological) image indicating the sovereignty of Christ. Otherwise we would have to imagine a headless body, since Christ serves as “head of all things” in Ephesians 1:22–23.

The relationship between Christ and the church is developed in a metaphor of the church as the bride of Christ (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Cor 11:2). Christ’s love for the church transcends human examples of a husband’s love for his wife: Christ “gave himself up for her”—an allusion to the cross (Eph 5:25). This was to sanctify the church for himself as a bride. The imagery of cleansing her through “the washing of water by the word” evokes the Christian rite of baptism, and secondarily the prenuptial bath of Jewish marital custom. The washing, and indeed the entire metaphor of a bride, undoubtedly owes something to Ezekiel 16:8–12, where Jerusalem is depicted as an abandoned newborn girl who is saved and nurtured by God, and in her nubility bathed in water and taken by God as his wife. In the marriage ceremony of Ephesians 5:17, the church is presented to Christ in splendor as a clear-skinned maiden, “without a spot or wrinkle or anything of the kind—yes, so she may be holy and without blemish” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

The church as the “household” of God (Eph 2:20) is an image rooted in the social reality of the early Christian communities, which commonly met in household settings. In Ephesians 5:21–6:9 the conventional form of a “household code,” well known in the ancient world, is adapted to Christian use as instructions are given for the proper behavior of husbands and wives, parents and children, slaves and masters in family households newly constituted under the Lordship of Christ.

In a memorable display of imagery, the people of God are exhorted as the army of Christ to be prepared for spiritual warfare. The enemy is not palpable “flesh and blood” but a formidable array of elusive but hostile spiritual powers: the “devil,” or the “evil one,” the “rulers” and “authorities,” the “cosmic powers of this present darkness” and the “spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms.” Against such enemies conventional weaponry is useless; they must take up the “whole armor of God” (Is 59:17–18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Wis 5:17–20): the belt of truth, the breastplate of righteousness, shoes for proclaiming the gospel of peace, the shield of faith to extinguish flaming arrows, the helmet of salvation and, finally, the defensive weapon of the “sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God” (Eph 6:14–17). The church, like Israel when it entered the land, still has its battles to fight. Its spiritual enemies—though decisively defeated at the battle of the cross—continue to attack and resist the people of God.

Mystery. Ephesians lets its readers in on a cosmic secret, a “mystery” (mystērion, Eph 1:9; 3:3, 4, 9; 5:32; 6:19), a chapter of God’s eschatological plan that was laid “before the foundation of the world” (Eph 1:4), that was formerly concealed and now has been revealed in Christ. This mystery has been made known to Paul by a revelation (Eph 3:3)—though it has also been revealed to other apostles and prophets by the Spirit (Eph 3:5)—and the opening two chapters of Ephesians have unfolded Paul’s understanding of the mystery (Eph 3:4). The essential outline of the mystery is that Gentiles are now fellow heirs, members of the same body, sharers in the promise with believing Israelites who have followed Jesus Christ (Eph 3:6). But the mystery includes a “vertical” dimension, the union of Christ with his church, a “great mystery” (Eph 5:32). The mystery has not been revealed to the cosmic powers (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 2:6–8), but the curtain is now being lifted and the mystery disclosed to them. The “rulers and authorities” are spectators as the wisdom of the Creator God’s cosmic drama is now being acted out in the story of the church (Eph 3:9–10).

Power. Imagery of power is abundant in Ephesians, perhaps as an explicit response to the religious environment of Ephesus and other cities of Asia Minor where sorcery and evil spirits were a common and ominous feature of popular religion. This spiritual climate may have elicited the multiple names of the dark forces enumerated in Ephesians: “powers” (Eph 1:21), “rulers” (Eph 1:21; 6:12), “authorities” (Eph 1:21; 3:10; 6:12), “dominions” (Eph 1:21), “cosmic powers” (Eph 6:12) and the “ruler of the power of the air” (Eph 2:2). These names evoke a cosmos inhabited by a multitiered and malignant hierarchy of evil power. Formerly these names would have struck terror in the hearts of many recipients of this letter. But Ephesians begins with a joyous affirmation of the power of God in Christ to perform his will, work redemption and secure his blessings for his people in the face of any and every opposition that can be named. In Ephesians 1:19 the theme of power is explicitly emphasized: “the immeasurable greatness of his power ... the working of his great power.”

The greatest display of God’s power was when he raised Christ from the dead and exalted him to his right hand in the heavenly realms, leading captivity captive (Eph 4:8), subjecting all powers to his sovereign control (Eph 1:20–22). Later we read that God’s power is displayed in God’s grace working in Paul (Eph 3:7), and that God’s power can strengthen believers by the Spirit (Eph 3:16) and accomplish “far more than all we can ask or imagine” (Eph 3:20 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Finally, in facing their spiritual enemies, believers are to “be strong in the Lord and in the strength of his power” (Eph 6:10). The same divine power that enabled Christ to triumph over his enemies is active within the church, and that power will allow it to “stand” firm in the face of spiritual assault. Images of divine power emerge in God’s “raising up” those who were “dead” in their sins and seating them in the heavenlies with Christ (Eph 2:5–6), in Christ’s breaking down the dividing wall, abolishing the law, putting to death the hostility between Jew and Gentile (Eph 2:14–16) and in his building a new temple (Eph 2:20–21). And it is the “armor of God,” the weaponry of the powerful divine warrior, that is employed by the church in its battle against the spiritual powers (Eph 6:10–17).

Other Imagery. A variety of other images may be briefly reviewed. Believers must no longer be immature “children,” who are “tossed to and fro by waves and blown about by every wind of doctrine” or trickery or craftiness (Eph 4:14). The picture is of a boat at sea in the hands of inexperienced sailors. Incapable of holding their course, they are subject to whatever forces of wind and wave beat upon them or carry them along (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 13:9; Jas 1:6; Jude 12, 13). An opposite, positive image, one of stability, is that of being “rooted and grounded in love” (Eph 3:17).

In Ephesians, Paul is memorably imaged as a prisoner “in the Lord” (Eph 4:1), or a prisoner “for Jesus Christ” (Eph 3:1; see Prison). Even more strikingly, he is an “ambassador in chains” (Eph 6:20). As an official representative of his heavenly Lord, Paul has not been granted diplomatic immunity. The calling card of his diplomatic mission is inscribed with a logo of suffering. So even now Caesar’s instruments of power are the means by which this ambassador of the heavenly Lord boldly delivers the good news of the mystery of reconciliation.

The imagery of family is a constant in Paul’s letters. In the first half of Ephesians we repeatedly find imagery that evokes a picture of a father with extravagant and immeasurable “riches” (Eph 1:7, 18; 2:7; 3:8, 16) who lavishes them on his adopted children (Eph 1:5), his heirs (Eph 3:6) who will one day receive his inheritance (Eph 1:14, 18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 5:5).

The vivid image of a sleeper awakened, rising from the dead, and greeted by the morning light of Christ, the dawn of a new creation, is memorably set out in verse structure (Eph 5:14), perhaps as a line from an early Christian baptismal hymn. The brilliant light of Christ is an image that finds company in the repeated theme of “glory”* in the doxological language of chapter one (Eph 1:6, 12, 14, 17, 18) and in the prayer language of chapter three (Eph 3:13, 16, 21). The prayer that the “eyes of your heart be enlightened” (Eph 1:18), while odd to modern Western ears, speaks of the illumination of the heart as the perceptive seat of practical reason and wisdom, not of the emotions. And it is fitting that the people of God are “children of light” and not “darkness”* (Eph 5:8), their works the “fruit of light” (Eph 5:9) rather than the “unfruitful works of darkness” (Eph 5:11), which are performed in the shadows but will be exposed by the light (Eph 5:12–13).

In Ephesians it is as if a narrative world of triumph and reconciliation embracing heaven and earth is constructed and then filled in with various images that furnish, populate and dramatize the action within this new world. A new creation is emerging, and its outline may be seen in the church, whose unity is celebrated in a litany of oneness in Ephesians 4:4–6: “one body ... one Spirit ... one hope ... one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all and through all and in all” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Armor; Cosmology; Enemy; Exaltation, Enthronement; Heaven; Triumph.

Bibliography. G. B. Caird, Paul's Letters from Prison (NC1B; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1976); A. T. Lincoln, Ephesians (WBC [WBC WBC. Word Biblical Commentary] ; Dallas: Word, 1990); idem, Paradise Now and Not Yet (SNTSMS 43; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981).

EPHOD.

See Oracle.

EPIPHANY, STORIES OF

One of the most common narrative patterns is the archetypal movement from ignorance to insight. The literary term for this climactic moment of insight or revelation, epiphany, was popularized by twentieth-century fiction writer James Joyce. The stories of the Bible are replete with moments of epiphany in which characters have a sudden experience of realization. While it is a rare story in which characters do not discover something significant, the term epiphany is best reserved for stories in which the whole action moves toward a climactic moment of insight into the nature of people or reality or (more often) the nature of God.

Such, for example, is the experience of Abraham and Isaac on Mt. Moriah, where suddenly (as in a dream) the two catch sight of a ram caught in a thicket (Gen 22:14), thus making good Abraham's earlier claim that "God will provide himself the lamb for a burnt offering" (Gen 22:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and leading Abraham to name the place "The Lord will provide" (Gen 22:15). The moment of epiphany is tragic when the deceived Isaac and then the duped Esau discover the trickery that has been visited on them by Jacob in the story of the stolen blessing (Gen 27:32–35). When Jacob receives the covenant blessing in his dream at Bethel, he awakens from sleep and says, "Surely the Lord is in this place; and I did not know it... How awesome is this place! This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven" (Gen 28:16–17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the same way, as Jacob wrestles with the angel of God, he gradually comes to perceive the supernatural identity of his opponent, finally concluding, “I have seen God face to face” (Gen 32:26–30). On the eve of Jacob’s escape from Laban, God appears to him in a dream and reveals that it was divine providence, not Jacob’s ridiculous attempts at animal husbandry, that produced so many striped and spotted sheep and goats (Gen 31:11–13).

The list of characters who recognize God’s presence in the midst of extraordinary experiences keeps expanding. Hagar sees God’s omniscience and calls God “a God of seeing” (Gen 16:7–14). The Egyptians are made to understand the truthfulness of God’s oracles when the tenth plague kills their first-born (Ex 12:29–36). Rahab claims that her compatriots understood God’s omnipotence when they heard of the Red Sea deliverance (Josh 2:11). Elisha’s servant is dismayed by the siege of Dothan until God opens his eyes to see that “the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha” (2 Kings 6:15–17). Divine handwriting on a wall brings Belshazzar to awareness of his own impending fall (Dan 5). As the psalmist contemplates the possibility of escaping from God’s presence, he is led to realize that God will be present even if he escapes through space (Ps 139:7–10) or into darkness (vv. 11–12).

Quest stories often move toward moments of epiphany in which the quester’s goal is realized at last. The whole book of Job, in which the protagonist is in quest for an explanation of the nature of his suffering, moves toward the climactic revelation of God’s superior knowledge and power in the voice from the whirlwind (Job 38–41). After searching for meaning and satisfaction in all the wrong places, the narrator in Ecclesiastes reaches “the end of the matter” in which “all has been heard,” and the insight is summarized in the command, “Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man” (Eccles 12:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Elijah’s quest to bring his nation to repentance reaches a temporary climax on Mt. Carmel, where the whole nation is witness to the fact that Jehovah is the only true God (1 Kings 18). The psalmist's quest to find a solution to his problem of envying the prosperous wicked is realized in a sudden moment of epiphany that comes to him as he worships God (Ps 73:16–17).

While most stories of epiphany center on insights that characters realize about the character or work of God, the dynamics of recognition can also occur on a more human level. Thus Joseph's brothers experience a moment of recognition when Joseph reveals his identity to them in Egypt (Gen 45:1–15), and recognition is forced on a heretofore unsuspecting Boaz in a vivid midnight encounter with a woman (Ruth 3:8–12). An obtuse Eli is led to see how thoroughly he had misjudged the behavior of Hannah (1 Sam 1:12–17). The trickster Jacob, who had deviously exploited family members' appetites (Gen 25:29–34; 27), receives his comeuppance in similar manner when he awakes the morning after his wedding to find Leah rather than Rebekah beside him (Gen 29:25).

Characters can also come to insight about their own sinfulness; examples include Elijah on the occasion of his call to be a prophet (Is 6:5), Peter during his denial of Jesus (Mt 26:74–75; Mk 14:72; Lk 22:60–62) and Judas Iscariot when he realizes what he has done in betraying Jesus (Mt 27:3–5).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] is a veritable anthology of epiphany stories, as characters repeatedly reach insight into the divine identity of Jesus and the way in which he is the agent of salvation in their lives. In a sense the epiphany story is the natural medium for narrating the life of the incarnate Christ. The first characters to recognize him as the Messiah are Zechariah (Lk 1:67–80), Simeon (Lk 2:25–35) and Anna (Lk 2:36–38). At the other end of Jesus' life stands the centurion who exclaims on the death of Jesus, "Truly this was the Son of God!” (Mt 27:54 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 23:47). Between are a host of people who recognize that Jesus is their Savior, including the Samaritan woman and her fellow townspeople (Jn 4:1–42), Peter when he is rescued from drowning (Mt 14:33), the three disciples who witness the transfiguration (Mt 17:1–13; Mk 9:2–13; Lk 9:28–36), Zacchaeus (Lk 19:1–10), the disciples who witness Jesus’ first miracle (Jn 3:11), John the Baptist on the occasion of Jesus’ baptism (Jn 1:29–34), the man born blind who received sight (Jn 9:35–38) and the penitent thief who requests salvation from Jesus on the cross (Mt 26:74–75; Mk 7:2; Lk 23:39–43). The miracles of Jesus are usually accompanied by the insights the onlookers achieve into the divine power of Jesus. The postresurrection appearances by Jesus to his followers are also stories of revelation and recognition.

Similar stories of recognition occur in the book of Acts as a series of people come to believe in Christ as their Savior. Such are the stories of those who are converted on Pentecost (Acts 2:37–42); the lame man who was healed (Acts 3:8–10); Simon the sorcerer (Acts 8:12–13); the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:34–38); Paul, from whose eyes scales fell off (Acts 9:1–19) and many other converts.

The purpose of the Bible is to move its readers to epiphany—insight into their own condition, into the nature of reality, and above all, into the possibility of redemption through God’s provision. Stories of epiphany enhance this general orientation of the Bible.

See also Quest; Revelation/Recognition Stories.

EPISTLE

The structure and imagery of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistles are governed by the conventions of letter writing. They are innovations constructed on Greek and Roman models, which had three main parts: introduction (sender, addressee, greeting); text or body; and conclusion (final wishes or greetings). With this structure as the core, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistles show important additions. The cursory “Greetings!” (chairein) of the Graeco-Roman letter becomes the theologically charged “Grace [charis] to you and peace from God” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) in NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistles. Their conclusions include not only final good wishes but also solemn benedictions. More important are two totally new units—a thanksgiving (a liturgically formulated statement of thanks and/or prayer for the spiritual welfare of the recipients and/or a commendation of their spiritual virtues and blessings) and a paraenesis (a list of moral exhortations, including both positive and negative commands, as well as such motifs as proverbial wisdom, lists of virtues and vices, and extended exhortations on a single moral topic). The paraenesis typically comes after the doctrinal middle section of an epistle. More generally, we know that letters are consciously composed with paragraphs as the basic unit of composition, so that the ability to “think paragraph” is one of our greatest assets when reading an epistle. Epistolary conventions and stereotyped language and formulas are thus one image pattern found in all of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistles.

Another set of images follows from the implied relationship between sender and recipient. An epistle presupposes two parties, an author and an intended audience; and the picture of both is important as we read the NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistles. Paul, especially, places himself into his letters as a real-life person. He talks about his authority as an apostle, about his spiritual autobiography, about his travels, about his doctrinal convictions. Similarly, we pick up a picture of the audience as we wind our way through an epistle. The audience is usually corporate (a church or body of Christians in a given locale) but is sometimes a private person. In both cases we pick up clues about the audience's identity and situation. Context, in other words, supplies imagery and motifs for an epistle. The Corinthian church, for example, was an unruly, immature and divided church. The recipients of the letter to the Hebrews were dispersed Jews, possibly in Rome, who were in danger of relapsing into Judaism. The relationship between author and recipient is not that between two equals; the apostolic author writes as an authority figure, the source not only of advice that the recipient is expected to follow but also of rebuke.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistles are occasional letters (called forth by specific occasions or situations), and this too supplies imagery, motifs and content for the epistles. Only rarely (most notably in the epistle to the Romans) do we find systematic treatises on a theological topic. The general format is to take up questions or points of controversy that are known to exist in the life of the church or individual who is addressed. It is a fair inference that the recipient(s) of a letter already knew the author's views on the central issues of the Christian faith. The author takes these for granted and directs his remarks instead to more specific questions, doubts, errors or problems. What emerges, therefore, is an ever-expanding picture of the early church in various regions of the Graeco-Roman world.

In this regard we can note that the city is a major image in the epistles. Most of the epistles are addressed to churches or individuals living in metropolitan areas (in contrast to the more agrarian atmosphere of the Gospels). The church is another major image; in fact, we rarely lose sight of the local church as we read the epistles. While the city in which a church or group of Christians resides is large, by comparison the church emerges as a small, beleaguered entity, almost overwhelmed by the broader social and cultural context. A strong sense of antithesis is assumed to exist between the two, or where it is absent, the audience is admonished not to live by the standards of the surrounding culture. Other social units, such as the family/household, men and women as separate genders, and masters and servants are also important in the epistles. Images of worship and church offices (including the minister or pastor) are a major cluster, and references to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] law are numerous. We can note also that the epistles contain many specific place names and individual persons' names, reinforcing the point that individuals in their real-life situations matter in the Christian life—that God's kingdom on earth, in fact, consists of specifics and that the Christian faith does not whisk people away to an etherealized "spiritual" world.

Another real-life aspect of the epistles is the impression they give of being written in relative haste and in response to an occasion instead of being composed like an essay in someone's study. One result is the degree to which they depend on oral effects. The author's voice is a speaking voice. Paul's style is frequently oratorical and even homiletic (sermonic) in its effect and rhetorical strategies, and we infer that he dictated his letters. Virtually all of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistles were "open letters" read orally and publicly in churches, hence direct addresses to the audience are common.

Stylistically, despite all the informality noted above, the epistles display a full range of poetic and rhetorical effects. For all their theological and moral content, they appeal to the imagination with concrete images and metaphors. The language is frequently vivid. Embedded in the prose we find proverbs and aphoristic sayings, liturgical formulas, creedal affirmations and hymns (see Christ Hymn). The rhetorical techniques are numerous: antithesis, parallelism, apostrophe (addresses to someone absent as though present), rhetorical question, paradox, question-and-answer construction, exclamation, repetition (including word patterns) and satire.

See also Apocalypse, Genre of; Gospel Genre.

Bibliography. D. E. Aune, The New Testament in Its Literary Environment (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987) 158–225; W. G. Doty, Letters in Primitive Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); S. K. Stowers, Letter Writing in Greco-Roman Antiquity (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986).

EPITHALAMIA.

See Song Of Songs; Wedding.

ESAU

The most obvious thing that we might associate with Esau is that he belongs, along with his brother Jacob, to a group of pairs of biblical siblings whom we naturally remember together—Cain and Abel, Rachel and Leah, Mary and Martha, the prodigal son and elder brother. The characters in each pair are foils to each other and sibling rivals.

Esau is mentioned by name more than eighty times in the Bible, and he is a more major actor in Genesis than we tend to realize, being named sixty times in the book. A number of important archetypes converge in Esau: he is the wild man, the dupe (dimwitted victim), the villain (a would-be murderer), the problem child, the elder child supplanted by the younger, the progenitor of a nation and the profane person who is insensitive to spiritual values. The images linked with him include his hairy skin and ruddy complexion, a proverbial “mess of pottage,” the field, the hunting of game, a cry of protest when he discovers a lifechanging deception and an embrace of a guilty brother in a famous reconciliation scene.

The image of Esau as wild man begins with his birth story, which stresses the laughable aspects of the two brothers' births. Esau, the firstborn, "came forth red, all his body like a hairy mantle" (Gen 25:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), earning him the name equivalent to "hairy" and the nickname "red" (Gen 25:29). In contrast to the "homebody" Jacob, Esau "was a skillful hunter, a man of the field," whom his father preferred "because he ate of his game" (Gen 25:27–28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The story of the exchanged birthright (Gen 25:29–34) stresses Esau's uncouth manners, and a literal translation of his statement to Jacob is "let me gulp some of that red stuff" (Gen 25:30). The staccato succession of five verbs at the end of the story (Gen 25:34) likewise draws attention to Esau's unpolished callousness. This uncomplimentary portrayal of Esau, progenitor of Israel's rival nation Edom, prompted Gunkel to comment wryly, "These are neighborly kindnesses." In keeping with his identity as a hunter rather than a shepherd or farmer, Esau "dwelt in the hill country" (Gen 36:8).

Corresponding to Esau's unrefined callousness is his moral and spiritual insensitivity. In the story of the exchanged birthright, Esau is a slave to his appetite, unable to delay immediate gratification for the sake of future benefit. The narrator highlights this with his parting shot: "Thus Esau despised his birthright" (Gen 25:34 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Esau is a classic case of someone who misprizes something valuable. The writer of Hebrews cites Esau as an example of someone who was "immoral or irreligious ["profane" KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] , "godless" NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]] ... who sold his birthright for a single meal” (Heb 12:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). To add to the picture of Esau as villain, he plots the murder of his brother when Jacob cheats him out of their father’s blessing (Gen 27:41–42). Moreover, as a problem child Esau’s marriages to pagan women make life “bitter” and “weary” for his parents (Gen 26:34–35; 27:46). There is no indication in the biblical text that Esau is responsive to God, as the flawed Jacob certainly is. Romans 9:10–13 links Esau’s forfeiture of the covenant promise to God’s election of Jacob, in the process quoting Malachi 1:3 to say that God hated Esau.

Most of the references to Esau in the Bible are to his role as progenitor of the nation of Edom, for whom his name is often used as a personification. Esau is associated with Edom by wordplay, with the word for “red” sounding in Hebrew somewhat like Edom and the word for “hairy” sounding something like Seir, land of the Edomites. The oracle that Rebekah received during her troublesome pregnancy predicted that “two nations are in your womb” (Gen 25:23), confirming Esau’s role as the father of a nation. The genealogy in Genesis 36 states baldly, “Esau is Edom” (Gen 25:8). The after-history of Esau’s antagonism against Jacob includes the fact that although David subjugated Edom (2 Sam 8:11–14; 1 Chron 18:13), it later revolted and actually defeated Judah during the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron 28:17).

If the images associated with Esau are mainly negative, they are not wholly so. Esau elicits our feelings of pity by default when he is the victim of deceit. While the tone of the story of the exchanged birthright is disparaging throughout, the same cannot be said of the story of the stolen blessing. Any reader’s heart aches for Esau when, upon his discovery of what Jacob has done to him, he cries out “with an exceedingly great and bitter cry” and pleads with his father, “Have you but one blessing, my father?” (Gen 27:34—38 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). We are also moved by the pathos of Esau’s regret over his self-failing when we read that “when he desired to inherit the blessing, he was rejected, for he found no chance to repent, though he sought it with tears” (Heb 12:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

More positively, Esau wins our admiration by being lavishly forgiving when he and Jacob meet after Jacob’s twenty-year exile (Gen 33:1—11). Whereas the guilt-haunted Jacob goes to meet his brother extravagantly over-prepared and formal, “bowing himself to the ground seven times,” Esau is spontaneously good-willed, running to meet Jacob, embracing him, falling on his neck and kissing him (Gen 33:3—4).

This, then, is Esau—a character almost as many-sided as his brother Jacob. Whatever human sympathy might flow to Esau as the victim of deceit and as an example of a forgiving spirit on one occasion is overwhelmed by the negative side of his character. On a human plane Esau is the dimwitted outdoorsman, a slave to his stomach, a dupe ready to be exploited, unable to dispense with instant gratification for the sake of eventual reward. On a spiritual plane he is the archetypal “profane” person (Heb 12:16 KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)])—the person of misplaced values with an inadequate regard for spiritual realities. To this day we have a proverb about selling one’s birthright for a mess of pottage.

See also Birthright; Brother; Dupe; Elder Child, Elder Sibling; Jacob; Misprizing; Sibling Rivalry.

ESCAPE, STORIES OF

With well over a hundred references to escaping and a similar number of references to “fleeing,”* the Bible portrays a world in which people live in an awareness of the need to escape from a range of dangerous situations, both physical and spiritual. The motifs of escape and rescue are closely related and sometimes overlap, but while rescue is deliverance with the aid of an outside agent, escape simply refers to the release experienced by the person or nation who escapes. Noah and his family stage the first escape in the Bible when they circumvent the death-bringing power of the flood.

Sometimes the people who escape are guilt-haunted people who are forced to flee the consequences of their own unwise choices. Lot escapes natural cataclysm when the angels lead him from Sodom after he has made a worldly minded choice to move there (Gen 19). Jacob escapes from his brother, Esau, after cheating him, thereby bringing a death threat on himself. Moses is in a similar situation when he has to escape from Egypt after killing a taskmaster. Jonah escapes death at sea when God sends a huge fish to rescue him after his rebellious behavior.

More often, though, people who escape do so in acts of heroism—the two spies escaping from Jericho after being hidden by Rahab, Ehud escaping from the palace of Eglon after a clever assassination, David escaping from the paranoid Saul. It is often either the clever or the strong who escape. Samson is in the latter category when he carries off the gates of Gaza by night (Judg 16:1–3). On other occasions it is the lone survivor from disaster who escapes to bring the message of calamity (Job 1:13–19).

Individual escapes, though, seem small and isolated compared with the great escape of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] —the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt. Here is a story with all the suspense and danger of escape stories at their best—a build-up of tension and hostility, nighttime preparations for the escape (accompanied by awe-inspiring religious ceremony), waiting for the word that will commence the escape, a quick getaway when the Egyptians discover the death-bringing plague, and miraculous rescue as the nation makes its decisive break with Egypt on the far side of the sea.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] stories of escape are just as dramatic, and they typically involve the escape of either Christ or his followers from their persecutors. Joseph and Mary escape Herod's plot to kill Jesus. Jesus escapes from his enemies as they stand ready to stone him (Jn 10:31–39), Peter escapes from prison (Acts 12:6–11), Paul escapes from a conspiracy to kill him (Acts 23:12–35) and from death by drowning (Acts 27:27–44). In the apocalyptic vision of terror narrated in Revelation 12:1–6, Christ escapes Satan's plot by ascending into heaven, and the church similarly escapes the designs of Satan by fleeing into the wilderness.

While the escape motif is the special domain of narrative, it is not absent from the lyric poetry and wisdom literature of the Bible. The psalmist praises a God to whom “belongs escape from death” (Ps 68:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and pictures his own believing community as having “escaped like a bird from the snare of the fowlers” (Ps 124:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The proverbs of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] are an implied strategy for escaping from the traps that ensnare the human race when it is morally and spiritually careless. For example, “an evil man is ensnared by the transgression of his lips, but the righteous escapes from trouble” (Prov 12:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); and “he who pleases God escapes” the ensnaring woman, “but the sinner is taken by her” (Eccles 7:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The individual escape stories of the Bible seem to gesture toward the Great Escape-redemption from sin. Thus we read in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] about how to “escape from the snare of the devil” (2 Tim 2:26), and about the impossibility of escaping if we neglect “such a great salvation” (Heb 2:3; see also Heb 12:25). The writer of 2 Peter also talks about how to “escape from the corruption that is in the world” (2 Pet 1:4) and about those who have “escaped the defilements of the world through the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ” (2 Pet 2:20).

See also Bondage and Freedom; Exodus, Second Exodus; Flight, Chase and Flight; Prison; Rescue.

ESTHER, BOOK OF

The book of Esther is one of the most carefully crafted stories in the Bible. It is replete with the ingredients that audiences through the centuries have most valued in stories: heightened conflict between good and evil, a beautiful and courageous heroine, lurid scenes of banqueting and carousing, a palace with a harem, romantic love in the specific form of the Cinderella motif (an orphan girl from an enslaved nation who marries the king), a villain who makes the reader's blood boil, helpless victims who are rescued just in time, intrigue, suspense, reversal, decisive moral choice, climax, battle, and poetic justice. By means of all this richness of story material, the book tells a story of the providence of God, who (though not named in the story) controls events for his purposes of judgment and salvation.

Structure and Unity. The plot of the book is the usual U-shaped plot of comedy in which events descend into potential tragedy but rise suddenly to a happy ending. A series of obstacles are overcome, including the extreme villainy of the nation's enemy, Haman, and the obtuseness of a despotic king, Ahasuerus. The resulting rescue story consists of three phases. The first two chapters, narrating the king's rejection of Vashti and marrying of Esther, are the background to the conflict between Haman and the Jews. Chapters 3 to 7 narrate, step by step, how Haman plots against Mordecai and the Jews and how the Jews develop a counterplot. The final three chapters narrate the aftermath of the struggle—the deliverance of the Jews. The basic rhythm of the story is thus a build-up of tension, followed by its release. In the words of the story itself, the action is a movement “from sorrow into gladness and from mourning into a holiday” (Esther 9:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The cast of characters also supplies unity to the story. At the center is the titular heroine, whose Babylonian name (“Star”) hints at her resplendence and courage. Esther’s characterization is unified by two motifs—an identity crisis (as she tries initially to live in two worlds) and transformation through ordeal. Mordecai, a courtier by profession, is the conventional attendant on the protagonist—a character necessary for the action but subordinate to the heroine in the design of the story. The portrait of Ahasuerus is a satiric one in which the king is held up to ridicule every time he enters the action. Queen Vashti is mainly a foil to the king, a moral norm that heightens the king’s status as a playboy and dunce. And Haman is the demonic villain, the person of uncontrollable pride and thirst for revenge (see Vengeance, Revenge). It is no wonder that it became a convention for Jewish audiences to boo and hiss and rattle noisemakers whenever Haman’s name was mentioned during oral readings of the story.

Image Patterns. The court provides a leading cluster of images in the story, in contrast to the pastoral world of the book of Ruth (the other major heroine story in the OT [OT. Old Testament]). The story opens with an extended scene of courtly splendor, banqueting and carousing, as though the action had been scripted for a modern movie.

Courtly protocol is a constant presence in the story, especially as it relates to people interacting with the king. We also catch a glimpse of protocol as it prevails in the harem of an Oriental court. The language of royal decrees figures prominently as well, with implications of despotic power reinforced by numerous images of monarchy (throne, scepter, crown, palace garden, signet ring, etc.).

As an extension of the courtly motif, the imagery of feasting pervades the story. The action begins with an extended scene of lavish banqueting and entertainment, though of a somewhat coarse moral tone. As a foil to this scene we have the fasting of Esther and her compatriots at their moment of greatest crisis (Esther 4:16). But this quickly gives way to the ostensibly festive banquets that Esther puts on for the king and Haman. Finally, when the Jews are allowed to defend themselves, they respond throughout the realm with “gladness and joy” and “a feast and a holiday” (Esther 8:17). And after the victory is secured, we also have heightened pictures of feasting (Esther 9:19, 22).

Nation and politics are another key ingredient. Ahasuerus is portrayed as head of an entire nation, with an efficient national postal system at his disposal (Esther 1:22). On the other side it is not simply a family but the entire Jewish nation that is threatened by the king’s decree plotted by Haman. The hostility between Mordecai and Haman seems to have a national origin as well. The rescue is likewise national in scope, as is the celebration. In fact, the whole story serves as an explanation of the Jewish festival of Purim.

Clothing (see Garments) is important in the story. Mordecai dons the conventional garb of mourning by rending his clothes and putting on sackcloth and ashes (Esther 4:1). Esther puts on royal robes before entering the king’s presence (Esther 5:1). Mordecai is clothed in royal robes when he is honored for having uncovered a plot against the king's life (Esther 6), and when Esther's case is approved by the king, Mordecai goes out from the king's presence "in royal robes of blue and white, with ... a mantle of fine linen and purple" (Esther 8:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Haman's face is covered as he is led away disgraced after the king misconstrues Haman's desperate plea to Esther upon her couch in a farcical reenactment of the jealous husband motif (Esther 7:8).

Feminine perspective is important in the story as well. From start to finish we are aware that this is the story of a heroine. The moral virtue of Vashti functions as a rebuke to the sensual and drunken behavior of her husband at his stag party. Virtually the entire second chapter is devoted to feminine experiences in a harem, with an emphasis on physical beauty as the leading criterion by which the king's consort will be chosen. In her interactions with her uncle Mordecai and her husband the king, Esther behaves with the modesty and submissiveness that would have characterized women in the ancient world in their interactions with men. The essence of femininity is heightened, moreover, through the foil of the coarseness and obtuseness of most male behavior in the story. By the end of the story Esther, not the king, is the character who calls the shots for a nation, reinforcing the status of the book as a story about a heroine.

Finally, running counter to the imagery of feasting and feminine refinement and courtly splendor, we find an undertow of images of battle, cruelty and torture. People who enter the king's presence without his holding out the golden scepter are killed (Esther 4:11, 16). The edict against the Jews stipulates that the Persians "destroy," "slay" and "annihilate all Jews, young and old, women and children, in one day" (Esther 3:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). But the most vivid image by far is the seventy-five-foot-high gallows that Haman constructs for Mordecai and on which he himself is hanged. Subsequently we are led to picture the bodies of Haman and his sons dangling from gallows and the Jews smiting “all their enemies with the sword, slaughtering, and destroying them” (Esther 9:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The book of Esther presents us with a kaleidoscope of vivid and contradictory images. For heightened action the story is perhaps unsurpassed within the pages of the Bible.

See also Beauty; Queen; Ruth, Book of; Woman, Images of.

EVE

Mentioned by name only four times, Eve is nonetheless a major biblical character and archetype. She is a person of multiple roles, and her characterization is ambivalent—both good and bad—as is true of all but a handful of characters whose stories are narrated in the Bible. She is the prototypical woman of the human race, matching Adam’s status as the prototypical man. The images most strongly associated with her are wife and husband, rib, serpent, forbidden fruit, eating, and the curse of pain in childbearing.

Made from Adam’s rib, Eve is flesh of Adam’s flesh (Gen 2:23). Eve shares equally with Adam the quality of being made in God’s image (Gen 1:27), just as the two together receive the command to have dominion over the earth (Gen 1:26—28).

Eve is also the first mother, leading Adam to give her the name Eve with the explanation that she is “the mother of all living” (Gen 3:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The second time she is named in Scripture confirms this prophetic name given to her by Adam: “Now Adam knew Eve his wife, and she conceived and bore Cain, saying, ‘I have gotten a man with the help of the Lord’ ” (Gen 4:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Adam’s comment about Eve’s status as the mother of all living looks backward as well as forward by echoing God’s command to Adam and Eve jointly to “be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth” (Gen 1:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Again, Eve is the first wife. She and Adam are the first couple, the prototypical husband and wife. When God first brought Eve to Adam, the writer of the account describes it in terms of the original institution of marriage (Gen 2:24), in words that Jesus quoted in his teaching on marriage (Mt 19:4–6; Mk 10:7–9). As Adam’s wife, Eve is the archetypal companion and helper. In the quaint archaism from the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] , she is Adam’s “helpmeet,” that is, “a helper fit for him” (Gen 2:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Even in the judgment scene immediately after the Fall, Eve’s characterization is positive. Whereas Adam tries to evade responsibility by blaming both God and Eve (Gen 3:12), Eve courageously and straightforwardly admits what has happened (Gen 3:13). And while pronouncing a curse on Eve in the form of pain in childbearing and being ruled by her husband (Gen 3:16), God at the same time declares Eve as the one through whose seed the Savior will arise to crush the serpent (Gen 3:15).

So much for the positive side of Eve. The negative side centers in Eve’s status as the first human to fall. Having said that, we must insist that the tradition of Eve as a temptress, and the broader tradition of misogyny that sees her as a troublesome helpmeet and crooked rib, is wholly a product of postbiblical traditions. In the Genesis account of the Fall, Eve does not tempt Adam; she eats first and “she also gave some to her husband, and he ate” (Gen 3:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). There is no story of temptation here, although God says to Adam in the judgment scene, “you have listened to the voice of your wife” (Gen 3:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

This is not to say that Eve escapes stigma for her role in the Fall. Paul draws attention to Eve as someone deceived by the serpent’s cunning (2 Cor 11:3), but the focus is on the power of Satan to deceive, not on Eve’s inherent sinfulness. Still, Eve does here fit the conventional role of a warning against sin—not as the one who seduces Adam into sin but as the one seduced into sin by Satan. In 1 Timothy 2:14 Eve’s being deceived and sinning first is offered as a reason (buttressed by the fact that she was created second) for her subordinate role in marriage, but here too there is no trace of the archetype that has been so powerful in the postbiblical tradition of Eve as a seducer to sin. We also need to note that the fall of the human race is traced back to Adam, not to Eve (Rom 5:12–14).

A final picture of Eve that stays in the imagination is the pathos of her actions in the Fall and its aftermath. As we read the story of Satan’s temptation of Eve in the Garden, we wince at her false reasoning about why it would be desirable to eat the forbidden fruit (Gen 3:1–6). Eve is here the victim of temptation, not the tempter. We relive the disillusionment that comes with the first couple’s self-consciousness and shame and their awareness of their alienation from God (Gen 3:7–8). Once Eve has admitted her guilt in the judgment scene (Gen 3:13), she is silent and chastened, bearing the harsh prophecies of God that she will follow her husband, serve him and bear her children in pain. She wordlessly follows Adam out of the Garden. The fallen Eve then joins Adam in their harsh life outside of Eden, disillusioned as she sees her firstborn become a murderer of his brother and an exile from human society (Gen 4:1–16).

See also Adam; Deception, Stories of; Fruit, Fruitfulness; Garden; Guilt; Innocence, Fall from; Serpent; Temptation, Tempter; Wife; Woman, Images of.

EVENING.

See Night; Twilight.

EVIL

The Bible tells the story of evil-its origin, its battle against good and its ultimate defeat at the hands of an eternally good God. Being so integral to the story from start to finish, evil emerges consistently in a large pattern of biblical images. In general, Scripture communicates the nature and activity of evil through images of (1) light and dark, (2) direction, (3) the hunt, (4) agriculture, (5) the body and (6) ordinary domestic life. Diverse as they are, these images all picture evil as the undesirable perversion of good.

Evil and Good: Darkness and Light. Evil in Scripture consistently appears next to and opposed to good. In Genesis 2:9 the first mention of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil exposes that great divide. On the one hand is the source of all goodness, an eternally good God who created all things “very good” (Gen 1:31 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); on the other hand is anybody or anything opposed to God’s perfect nature and activity.

Adam and Eve internalized that great divide for the human race when they disobeyed God and then came to know good and evil (Gen 3:22). The whole story of human beings in relation to their Creator continues to develop in the context of this opposition between good and evil, with people loving evil rather than good, for example (Ps 52:3), or calling good evil and evil good (Is 5:20). The prophets call God’s people to hate evil and love good (Amos 5:15), and Hebrews 5:14 describes the “mature” as those who have “trained themselves to distinguish good from evil” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Clearly then the Bible most often distinguishes evil, not in isolation but rather in relation to good—that is, to God. God sets his face against evil and evildoers (Ps 34:16; Jer 23:30). God’s goodness is primary; evil opposes his goodness: that opposition best expresses the nature of evil.

The Bible portrays this opposition of evil to good through images of darkness and light. From the very beginning when God spoke the light into being, saw that the light was good and separated the light from the darkness, the light became associated with good, with God himself. Darkness, by contrast, works as the opposite of light and goodness, most often picturing a world of evil, alienated from God. Job 34:22 speaks of evildoers futilely attempting to hide from God in dark places and deep shadows. Into the darkness of this world came the light of Jesus Christ, but people “loved darkness instead of light because their deeds were evil” (Jn 1:4–5; 3:19–20). “The people walking in darkness” are the sinful people who will see the “great light” of the promised Christ (Is 9:2).

The shining of light in the darkness gives a picture not just of original creation, not just of Christ’s coming, but also of each individual’s redemption from the evil of sin and death: “You were once darkness,” Paul writes to the Ephesians, “but now you are light in the Lord” (Eph 5:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Images of Direction. Scripture also portrays this opposition of evil to good through images of direction. Good is the divinely intended pathway or direction toward God and light and life; evil leads off in the opposite direction toward darkness and death. David, in his final song, rejoices that he has “kept the ways of the Lord” and “not done evil by turning from my God” (2 Sam 22:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

This directional, even geographical, picture of evil builds steadily throughout the Old Testament. The prophets, as well as David and Solomon, often speak of “turning from” evil (Ps 18:21; 34:14; 37:27; Prov 13:19; Jer 18:11; 25:5; Ezra 3:11). Human beings are pictured as on a journey, choosing a direction in which to travel: either an “evil path” (Job 22:15; Ps 119:101; Prov 28:10), or the “highway of the upright,” which “avoids evil” (Prov 16:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] develops this pattern of directional imagery less consistently, partly perhaps because Jesus Christ arrives and says of himself, “I am the way” (Jn 14:6). In the perfectly righteous Son of God, the picture of the path toward God and away from evil comes to life. Through his shed blood he made “a new and living way” to draw near to God (Heb 10:19–22). When Paul speaks of those who “reject the truth and follow evil,” we understand that he means those who reject Jesus Christ and turn away from him who is the only way to God (Rom 2:8). When Paul tells Timothy to “flee the evil desires of youth, and pursue righteousness,” we understand that he is directing this young man to turn his heart away from the world and toward Christ (2 Tim 2:22).

Images of the Hunt. Paul’s advice to Timothy both continues the directional imagery and introduces another pattern of images: evil imaged as a hunt. Both actions and agents of evil appear as aggressive pursuers of human souls to “ensnare” them (Prov 5:22). Evil desires * “trap” the unfaithful, and sinful talk “traps” an evil man (Prov 11:6; 12:13). Often we see an evil person’s trap springing backward and capturing the very one who set it: the one who “leads the upright along an evil path will fall into his own trap,” according to Proverbs 28:10 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the subsequent chapter, “an evil man is snared by his own sin” (29:6). When David prays for evil to “recoil” on his enemies, we see a similar ironic picture of this evil turning back from the hunted to attack the hunter (Ps 54:5). When God warns Cain about his need to master the evil in his heart, he metaphorically pictures evil as a monster “crouching” at Cain’s door, ready to destroy him (Gen 4:7).

The hunt most often ends with death: it seems appropriate that in the end evil (personified) “will slay the wicked” (Ps 34:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The whole context of pursuit (see Flight), capture and death suggests not only a hunt but a broader battle as well—a war, even. Scripture’s imagery establishes evil as the great adversary that threatens death and that must itself be “swallowed up” by God in the end (Is 25:8). The Bible often shows this adversary focused in the person of Satan, the “evil one,” the ultimate enemy of God (Mt 6:13; 13:19; 1 Jn 2:13–14). Often, however, evil is itself spoken of as the great adversary, simply that which in any form opposes, hunts down and tries to kill the good.

Agricultural Images. Not only on the larger scale of chase and battle but also in the smaller world of agriculture (see Farming), Scripture paints pictures of evil and the destruction and death it brings. The many and various layers of biblical pictures effectively communicate the pervasive influence of evil in all the layers of this fallen world. In the world of agriculture, evil most often shows itself in the form of ugly, unwanted or hurtful growth, such as thorns (2 Sam 23:6–7), grass (Ps 92:7), stubble (Mal 4:1) and weeds (Mt 13:37–43). Each of these four references speaks specifically of the people who have given themselves to evil. The pictures not only expose the evil of these “evildoers” but also show the ends to which such people will finally come: the thorns (evil people) will be “cast aside” and “burned up.” Evildoers, though they spring up and flourish like grass, will be “forever destroyed”; the stubble, representing the arrogant and evil, will be set on fire in the day of judgment with not a root or branch left. Finally, in Matthew’s account, Jesus even explains the imagery himself, calling the weeds “sons of the evil one”—sown by the devil, destined to be pulled up and thrown into the fire by God’s angels. Again the good is present by contrast: Matthew’s “good seed,” for example, represents the “sons of the kingdom,” planted by Jesus Christ, the “son of Man,”* and destined to “shine like the sun” with God forever.

Agricultural images also use the rules of nature to reveal moral laws regarding good and evil. Job’s friend Eliphaz, although he does not correctly apply the principle to Job, rightly understands that those who plow evil will reap it in the end (Job 4:8): evil will bring destruction and death. The prophet Hosea accuses God’s people of having planted wickedness; therefore, they are reaping evil and eating the fruit of deception (Hos 10:13). By contrast he exhorts them to “sow for yourselves righteousness” and “reap the fruit of unfailing love” (Hos 10:12). Scripture presents evil not as random acts, disconnected from causes or consequences; rather, evil grows from opposition to God and brings about evil results: “A man reaps what he sows” (Gal 6:7–8). The well-known teaching concerning the love of money as “a root of all kinds of evil” adds to this agricultural pattern, which shows the inevitable progression of evil: from seed to root to plant to fruit.

Images of the Body. In a few instances Scripture refers to evil as an entity independent of any doer. Job laments that “when he hoped for good, evil came” (Job 30:26). Modern usages and discussions of evil tend to treat it much more as a separate, abstract entity, however. Job might be said to speak in this way because he does not understand the heavenly actors he cannot hear or see (see Blind; Deaf). In the overwhelming majority of biblical references, evil is connected to an agent, human or other. Since in most cases the agent is human, it is not surprising to find a whole series of images that portray evil in connection with various parts of the human body.

The mouth, for example, often finds its place in pictures of evil: the wicked man has trouble and evil “under his tongue” (Ps 10:7); his mouth both “gushes evil” and “gulps down evil” (Prov 15:28; 19:28); his pursed lips show him “bent on evil” (Prov 16:30). The lips especially are pictured as either feeding, spitting out or concealing the contents of an evil heart.

The heart is central in Proverbs and in all of Scripture, evil ultimately takes over that symbolic innermost part of the human body and from there gushes forth either blatant evil or deceptively words and deeds. What of “fervent lips with an evil heart”? They are “like a coating of glaze over earthenware,” Proverbs 26:23 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) claims, with a characteristically homey and unmistakably clear simile. Consistently, throughout both the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] and NT [NT NT. New Testament] , the heart is pictured as the place where good or evil resides and rules a person. Jesus explained that no food going into a person’s stomach could corrupt a person; rather, all the evils coming out of the heart make a person unclean (Mt 15:16—20; Mk 7:17—23).

Eyes picture the presence or absence of evil in a person as well. Isaiah refers to evil people as those with “an eye for evil” (Is 29:20). The righteous one, by contrast, “shuts his eyes against contemplating evil” (Is 33:15). Most of the images of eyes in relation to evil, however, ask us to imagine the eyes of God, who in his holiness and omniscience sees all good and evil utterly clearly. The historical books of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] in particular include over forty references to those who “did evil in the eyes of the Lord.” According to Habakkuk, God’s eyes are “too pure to look on evil” (Hab 1:13). The eye imagery offers one of the best imaginative understandings of evil: that which offends the eyes of our holy God. God does look on evil, as he teaches Habakkuk, but with the ultimate purpose of redemption for the repentant and wrath for the unrepentant. Like the wise king in Proverbs 20:8, God will “winnow out all evil with his eyes.” Without the eyes of God looking on, evil would not be evil. When God declares that he will fix his eyes on the unrepentant “for evil and not for good,” he clearly means not that any evil will emanate from himself but that because of his own holy self, evildoers must end in wrath and judgment: total separation from God will be the inevitable final stage of their evil (Amos 9:4).

Hands provide pictures of evil in action as well (Job 8:20; Ps 71:4; 125:3; Is 56:2; Jer 23:14; Mic 7:3). The hand of God is never associated with evil, but all these pictures of evil hands take on their full significance in contrast to the hand of God, which throughout Scripture pictures his righteous and loving connection to his creation. From the mouth to the heart to the eyes to the hands to the feet (Prov 4:27; 6:18), the Bible offers a fleshed-out portrait of evil, a vivid series of pictures that human readers cannot fail to understand.

Images of Ordinary Domestic Life. The final category of images might be titled “All the Rest”; however, the concrete, everyday quality they all share might well entitle them to a unique grouping, one dealing with issues of ordinary domestic life. These images seem especially close to home; they effectively communicate the ways in which evil winds itself into all the ordinary threads of life.

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] passages at times picture evil as a guest who comes to stay, or “dwell in your tent” (Job 11:14). David condemns his enemies, “for evil finds lodging among them.” In fact, according to Proverbs 17:13, evil will never leave the house of one who returns evil for good: evil is a guest who wants to settle down forever. This picture points not only to the undesirable nature of the guest but also to the wrong and the responsibility of the one who would entertain such a guest.

Evil shows itself through a number of other biblical pictures from daily life: dirtiness and cleanliness (Prov 20:30; Jer 4:14; see Purity); birth (Job 15:35; Ps 7:14; Is 59:4); purging, drinking, and eating (Deut 13; 17; 22; Job 15:16; 20:12; Prov 19:28). Finally, numerous references to repaying evil for good use the common example of paying back a loan to picture the contrariness of evil: good comes first, and then evil perverts it and tries to replace it, “paying back evil for good” (Ps 35:12; 38:20; 109:15; Prov 17:13; Rom 12:17; 1 Pet 3:9).

All the scriptural images of evil in one way or another point us back to the good. For in the darkness the light shines; a direction is wrong because it turns from the right way; the hunted one runs from the hunter who traps to kill, into the arms of one who frees and gives life; weeds and thorns are defined in terms of the desirable plants from which they differ and which they can harm; the human body acting out evil in all its different parts is the perversion of Eden and readies us to see the Savior who came to us in the flesh. In all these images the Bible tells the whole story of evil and good, pointing continually toward the one good God who is the story's beginning and end.

See also Antichrist; Body; Crime and Punishment; Darkness;

Demons; Ear, Hearing; Eye, Sight; Farming; Hands; Harvest; Heart; Hunting; Lips; Mouth; Satan; Sin; Sow, Sowing, Sower; Temptation, Tempter; Trap, Trapping.

EXALTATION, ENTHRONEMENT.

See Ascension; High, Height, High Place; Ephesians.

EXCREMENT.

See Dung.

EXECUTION.

See Crime and Punishment; Cross; Stoning.

EXILE

Exile is both a plot motif and a character type. The essential ingredient in both cases is a person who has been banished from a native place and is now living or wandering in foreign parts. While we ordinarily link the state of exile with judgment against someone for wrongdoing, in the Bible this is by no means always the case. In fact all true believers are pictured as being exiles from their true homeland.

An exile story is preceded by a scene of banishment and a subsequent journey, and the Bible contains some memorable examples. The prototype is the expulsion from the Garden (Gen 3:24), which in a single moment made the entire human race an exile from its original home. It is impossible to overstate the importance of this banishment, which not only awakens the wellsprings of human regret and nostalgia but is also the starting point of every subsequent human story—the backdrop to all that is recorded in the Bible.

Other scenes of banishment follow the original one. Cain is banished “from the presence of the Lord” (Gen 4:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) as the sentence for having murdered his brother, Jacob is forced to flee for his life after having cheated his brother (Gen 27:41—28:5), and Joseph is sold into slavery in a foreign land (Gen 37:25—28). Moses flees to Midian to avoid Pharaoh's death threat (Ex 2:15). Similarly, David repeatedly flees from Saul, and later in life he is temporarily banished from the throne by Absalom's rebellion. In the story of Jesus' nativity, the flight into Egypt is a banishment (Mt 2:13—15). In virtually all of the older literature, life at court was a precarious existence, dependent on the whims of the ruler. The Bible accordingly records instances of people banished from court, including Adonijah (1 Kings 2:26—27), Shimei (1 Kings 2:36—38) and Haman (Esther 7:5—10). To see banishment "writ large," we can turn to the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophetic books with their vivid pictures of what it will be like for the nation to be conquered and carried away into captivity.

While banishment is the moment in which a person becomes an exile, being an exile is the condition of life that follows. Exile encompasses a social role involving fringe status and a psychological state that includes as its salient features a sense of loss or deprivation and a longing to return to (or arrive at) a homeland. Whenever an exile is experiencing punishment for a crime, moreover, the state of exile is accompanied by feelings of guilt and perhaps remorse (as in the book of Lamentations). Even more important for Israelite culture would be the sense of shame that attaches to such an exile. Above all, the exile is a displaced person. Moses sounds the authentic note when he calls his first son Gershom, "for he said, 'I have been a sojourner in a foreign land'" (Ex 2:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Exile in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is mainly national. The nation that arises from the patriarchs and their sons in Egypt is the first victim of national exile in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The journeying of the nation in the wilderness during the exodus is very much the story of exiles passing through alien territory, always longing for a promised land. On an even larger scale are the exiles of Israel and Judah later in Jewish history. The imagery of exile is mainly contained in the prophets' visions of coming exile, but we catch the flavor of what it was like for a nation to live in exile in the narratives of Daniel and Esther. What emerges is the picture of a minority group with few rights, always threatened with the imposition of pagan practices from the surrounding culture, always vulnerable to the superior power of the surrounding political structure, always longing to get back to the homeland.

Individuals as well as nations go into exile. Such is the idyllic story of Ruth. Although the English poet John Keats pictured her as "sick for home ... amid the alien corn," the focus of the biblical story is instead on the way in which Ruth found acceptance in a foreign culture and religion. It is the happiest story of exile on record.

For the emotions that accompany exile we can turn to several psalms. Psalms that recall the banishment of the nation by conquering forces include Psalms 74 and 137. The spiritual longing that accompanied exile for a person whose religion centered around pilgrimages to worship God in the temple in Jerusalem is captured in Psalms 42—43, the song of the disquieted soul.

The imagery of exile reaches its metaphoric climax in Hebrews 11, which portrays people of faith as "strangers and exiles on the earth" seeking "a better country, that is, a heavenly one" (Heb 11:13, 16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). At the physical level, the state of being an exile retains its negative qualities in this passage, as we read about people living in tents rather than houses, sharing ill-treatment with the people of God, suffering for Christ, being tortured and wandering over the desolate parts of the earth. Yet the chapter implies that the state of exile is the inevitable lot of all who follow Christ, who was himself an archetypal exile—a person who in his life had nowhere to lay his head (Mt 8:20) and who in his death “suffered outside the gate in order to sanctify the people through his own blood” (Heb 13:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Bondage and Freedom; Exodus, Second Exodus; Garden; Land; Return; Wanderer, Wandering; Wilderness.

EXODUS, BOOK OF

The book of Exodus is the story of Israel’s birth. It tells of her lengthy period of enslavement in Egypt and of the Lord’s deliverance for the purpose of making her a “kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (Ex 19:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). More specifically, the narrative moves from slavery in Egypt to deliverance under Moses (Ex 1–15); describes the journey to Mt. Sinai, also called Horeb (Ex 16–19), where the law is given (Ex 20–24); and gives detailed instructions for building the tabernacle (Ex 25–40). These final chapters also include the famous story of the “golden calf” and its consequences (Ex 32–34).

Unifying Motifs. The book of Exodus tells the story of Israel’s birth by means of various intertwining motifs. What may perhaps give some unity to this variety is the theme of God’s presence with his people. This overarching theme can be broken down into smaller themes. One is continuity with past promises. Israel’s presence in Egypt is not an accident. God is with his people as they enter Egypt (Gen 46:3). The fact that Exodus 1:1 is virtually a verbatim repetition of Genesis 46:8 (see also Gen 46:26) highlights the intention of the author to set Israel’s stay in Egypt in the context of God’s promises to the patriarchs (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] also Gen 15:13–16). In delivering the Israelites, particularly in light of their pattern of rebellion (see below), God demonstrates his faithfulness to the past. Israel's birth is an inexorable product of God's design, reaching back beyond the book of Exodus.

A second motif is deliverance from slavery. While the Israelites are in Egypt, God hears their cry and is determined to deliver them (Ex 3:7–10). He is ready to bring them across the sea despite apparent failure (Ex 14:10–14). The dominant motif used to describe God's role in this deliverance is that of divine warrior. Despite the fact that Israel was "armed for battle" (Ex 13:18), the battle to deliver the Israelites is God's battle: "The Lord will fight for you" (Ex 14:14). The angel of God leads the Israelites to the sea and stands as a buffer between them and the Egyptian army at night (Ex 14:15–20). After crossing the sea, the Israelites recount in song the glorious deeds of their warrior God: "The Lord is a warrior; the Lord is his name" (Ex 15:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

A third theme centers on the tabernacle. Exodus 25–40 (excluding Ex 32–34) present in detail instructions for the erection of the tabernacle. It is here that the Lord's abiding presence with his people is seen: "So the cloud of the Lord was over the tabernacle by day, and fire was in the cloud by night, in the sight of all the house of Israel during all their travels" (Ex 40:38 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The simple fact of the mobility of the tabernacle further highlights its function as God's abiding dwelling place with his people. Moreover, it is God's holy presence with his people that is the issue. The specificity of the instructions for its construction demonstrates the holiness of this dwelling for Israel's holy God.

Fourth, the law is a master image in the book of Exodus. The giving of the law (19–24) is a written record of God's provision for his people. The reception of the law on Mt. Sinai is the central focus of the Israelite emigration from Egypt. The law is not a burden; rather, it is God's declaration of the people's proper response to his presence to insure that it would remain. It is because the Israelites were to become God's "kingdom of priests" and "holy nation" that they received special instructions indicating their responsibility in this relationship (Ex 19:5–6).

Another prominent theme that appears in Exodus is Israel's grumbling and disobedience. Throughout the book there is an undercurrent of Israel's disbelief in God's deliverance despite the wonder of what they had seen. A hint of this is seen even in Moses' reluctance to receive God's call to deliver the Israelites (Ex 3–4; especially 4:13). The first reaction of the Israelites to God's deliverance is complaint (Ex 5:1–21), which is followed once again by Moses' reluctance concerning the task before him (Ex 6:12). When the time comes to cross the sea, Israel doubts God at the first sign of trouble, which results in Moses' strong rebuke of their lack of faith (Ex 14:10–14). No sooner have they crossed the sea than they begin grumbling in earnest. First the water is bitter, but the Lord makes it sweet (Ex 15:22–27). Then they have no food, so God gives them bread and meat (Ex 16). However, having received the miraculous provision of food, they immediately begin to complain again about lack of adequate water, which the Lord again provides (Ex 17:1–7). The grumbling of the Israelites surfaces in outright rebellion in Exodus 32, when in Moses' prolonged absence on the mountain, the Israelites erect an idol, thus breaking the first two commandments. The theme of grumbling and disobedience serves to contrast the behavior of the Israelites with God's patient and persistent presence with his people multiplied greatly and became exceedingly numerous, so that the land was filled with them”) reminds one of Genesis 1:28 (“be fruitful and increase in number; fill the earth”). While in Egypt the Israelites fulfill the mandate of creation to increase. It is precisely this numerical expansion that alarms the “new king” (Ex 1:8) and motivates him to attempt various ways to curtail their growth. Pharaoh’s sin is not so much in enslaving the Israelites as in attempting to reverse the creation mandate.

Creation is another theme throughout the book. The language of Exodus 1:7 ("The Israelites were fruitful and

In this respect the significance of both the plagues and the crossing of the sea comes into sharper focus. The plagues are in effect a reversal of God’s created order. They are the punishment and eventual destruction of the enemies of God by unleashing the chaotic forces of creation: water is affected (first plague); darkness returns where there had once been light (ninth plague; esp. [esp. esp.. especially] 10:21); animals and other creatures suffer (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , fifth plague); even humans die (tenth plague). In the end the Egyptians are destroyed by water as the waters that God had once tamed at creation are unleashed. The Israelites, however, are immune from this creation reversal. They are, in fact, “created” by being brought through the parted waters (as were the waters in Gen 1:6–10) and are formed into a holy nation.

To carry the creation imagery further, some have argued that the tabernacle itself is an earthly representation of Edenic glory, where God’s presence dwells in its fullness as it once had in the Garden. In this sense the tabernacle is another act of creation where once again God and his people dwell together.

The anti-epic or antiheroic motif is also important. Traditional epics praise the writer’s nation; this epic reserves its praise for God. Epic leaders are normally figures overflowing with confidence; Moses is a reluctant leader.

Instead of telling a story in which a human warrior leads his nation to victory through superhuman feats on the battlefield, this epic attributes the mighty acts of deliverance to God. The traditional motif of armed conflict is replaced by moral and spiritual warfare. The disparity between divine virtue and human weakness is accentuated by the way the Israelites put God to an ignominious test ten times (God's verdict in Num 14:22, confirmed by ten events in which the nation murmurs or rebels against God's providence). The anti-epic theme of Exodus reaches its climax in the Moses' song shortly before his death (Deut 32).

Master Images. Along with the motifs noted above, the book of Exodus is unified partly around master images, some of them recurrent archetypes and type scenes. Overarching everything else is the image of the journey (which is even named in the book's title) as this travel story traces the physical movement of the fledgling nation from Egypt across the wilderness. Traveling communities naturally experience conflict-with their environment, with deprivation, with neighboring nations, with God, with leaders-as well as tension among the travelers themselves. Other archetypes cluster around the journey that is at the heart of this book: initiation, ordeal, testing, quest for a promised land, rescue.

The story qualities of the book are also important. The epic of the exodus is an adventure story par excellence. The nation's life is a continuous narrow escape. Human nature is heightened (as it always is in stories of travel and war). Miraculous events happen regularly. Danger and suspense prevail. Variety of adventure takes the form of juxtaposed differences in type of threat, length with which an event is narrated, scene of action, harshness or mildness of the action and type of story material (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , external action interspersed with speeches or lawgiving).

The action also possesses its own type scene—a combination of ingredients that keeps recurring. The sequence—crisis (an implied test of the people), complaint, call to God, divine rescue, revelation/rebuke by God—is repeated many times (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 14:10—18, 30—31; 15:22—26; 16:1—7, 31—35; 17:1—7). In the later stages (including examples in the book of Numbers), the revelation increasingly involves judgment or punishment as there is a progressive falling out between the nation and God.

Specific images also recur, including fire, water, earth, rock, mountain, eating, manna, desert, meat, craving and arm (especially the arm of God). Elemental nature is important in the story, both in the ten plagues and in the story of wilderness survival. We also remember evocative individual pictures, such as the individual plagues, the parted sea, the land flowing with milk and honey that is the goal of the quest, the dancing around the golden calf, Moses dashing the tablets of the law to the ground in a moment of horror, the shining face of Moses after he meets with God, sudden death as God's punishment, water flowing from a rock.

See also Arm; Bondage and Freedom; Creation; Deuteronomy, Book of; Divine Warrior; Egypt; Exile; Law; Manna; Moses; Mountain; Numbers, Book of; Pharaoh; Plagues; Sea; Sinai; Slavery; Tabernacle; Theophany; Warfare; Wilderness.

Bibliography. R. B. Dillard and T. Longman III, An Introduction to the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1994); J. I. Durham, Exodus (WBC [WBC WBC. Word Biblical Commentary] 3; Waco, TX.: Word, 1987); D. A. Gowan, Theology in Exodus (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1994); M. G. Kline, Images of the Spirit (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1980).

EXODUS, SECOND EXODUS

The motif of the exodus (as distinct from the book of Exodus) is one of the unifying images of the Bible. The literal exodus of Israel from Egypt is narrated in the last four books of the Pentateuch and thereafter becomes the single richest source of allusion for OT [OT OT. Old Testament] writers. It sums up the story of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] redemption. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] this literal deliverance is metaphorically and spiritually fulfilled in the atonement of Christ. The main meaning of the image is enshrined in the common metaphoric use that the term has attained in Western society: the exodus was a journey of deliverance from bondage to freedom and fulfillment (a promised land).

Moses sounds the keynote for the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] importance of the exodus in his farewell discourse to Israel:

Ask now about the former days, long before your time, from the day God created man on the earth; ask from one end of the heavens to the other. Has anything so great as this ever happened, or has anything like it ever been heard of? Has any other people heard the voice of God speaking out of fire, as you have, and lived? Has any god ever tried to take for himself one nation out of another nation, by testings, by miraculous signs and wonders, by war, by a mighty hand and an outstretched arm, or by great and awesome deeds, like all the things the Lord your God did for you in Egypt before your very eyes? You were shown these things so that you might know that the Lord is God; besides him there is no other. (Deut 4:32–35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

In Moses' own words, the Exodus is an amazing series of events that provide a key for interpreting the Pentateuch. More pointedly, God's deliverance in the exodus occasioned the beginning of writing Scripture. Though Genesis deals with history prior to the exodus, the first five books of the Bible find their origin in the events surrounding the exodus.

No other OT [OT OT. Old Testament] motif is as crucial to understand. No other event is so basic to the fabric of both Testaments. Our concepts of deliverance and atonement, of God dwelling with his people, of God taking a people for himself and so forth have their roots in this complex of events. And precisely because it so permeates the Bible, the interpretation of the exodus and its motific usage are a challenge.

What Constitutes the Exodus? In order to consider its symbolic usage, three related questions must be answered: (1) What is the historical endpoint to the complex of events?—in crossing the Red Sea? in coming to Sinai? in completing the tabernacle? at the time of the first failure to go up into Canaan? at the end of the forty years of wandering? in crossing the Jordan into the promised land? in the essential success of the conquest during the generation of Joshua? in the final completion of the conquest generations later? (2) Once the boundaries of the exodus event are settled, what are the prominent subplots within the larger story that will be used symbolically? (3) What do the various motifs signify?

On the basis of Joshua 4:19—24, Psalm 114 and the Pentateuch's conclusion, which ends at the point that Israel is ready to enter the Promised Land, the bounds of the exodus event can fairly be seen as encompassing everything from the bondage in Egypt up to the preparations to cross the Jordan after forty years of wilderness wandering. It is, of course, still legitimate to distinguish a desert (wilderness) motif as a subplot within the larger complex; but the deliverance and wandering are so tied together that they can best be treated together. The conquest motif can be seen as something different, though obviously it is a continuation of the exodus.

Motific Language. Having settled what will be used as the limits of the exodus event, identifying which subplots are prominent and used as motifs is still a challenge. The following subplots and images seem to be used as motifs in the Bible with reference to the exodus: tabernacle, altar, desert, wilderness, wandering, forty years, mountain of God, dark cloud, pillar of fire/cloud, divine warrior, arm/hand of the Lord, leading, shepherding, carrying, highway in the wilderness, oppression, deliverance from oppression, dividing waters, plagues, judgments, miracles, mighty deeds, Passover, firstborn spared, banquet (Ex 24), the rock in the wilderness, water from the rock, manna, riding on eagles' wings, theophany, mediator, voice of God, covenant, and images related to law and lawgiving.

Moreover the language in the historical sections of the Pentateuch describing the exodus, and the motific language used by later writers to reflect on the exodus events, may also vary widely. For example, Isaiah often speaks of a highway in the wilderness, but the historical accounts do not use the language of "highway." Certain other motifs are so connected to the exodus that one wonders whether every occurrence of such motifs is an exodus reflection. For example, do all uses of the divine warrior motif indicate the exodus motif?

One of the signal images that points to the exodus is the hand and arm of the Lord. In fact, the tandem phrase "his mighty hand and outstretched arm" becomes almost a formulaic shorthand in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] for the power of God displayed in the exodus. While this phrase usually makes literal reference to the exodus itself, various prophetic and poetic books use the image of hand and arm to evoke a sense of the power of the exodus in new situations requiring deliverance (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 52:10).

Metaphoric Meanings. The central meaning of the exodus is deliverance or salvation. For this reason the exodus became the ground or rationale for Israel's obedience, identity and belief. Concerning obedience, the exodus is the basis on which God calls Israel to enter into covenant relationship with him (Ex 20:2; Deut 5:6); and it is also the basis on which Israel is to treat aliens, slaves and others with deference (Deut 15:12–18). Concerning identity, the exodus is that moment in which God forged Israel as his people (Ex 19:5), a kingdom of priests (Ex 19:6) and a nation independent of the dominion and rule of other nations. Concerning belief, the exodus is the evidence for trusting in the power, lordship, righteousness and love of God. He is able to deliver by means of great power (Deut 4:32–35), he acts for the oppressed (Deut 10:12–22), and he acts out of love (Deut 7:7–8). The exodus motif was used by prophets and poetic writers to transfer the significance of the original exodus to new situations requiring deliverance, obedience, identity or belief. For example, Isaiah uses exodus imagery to evoke in his listeners faith and hope that God will lead a second exodus and bring the Israelites out from exile with the same wondrous deeds and power he displayed in the exodus from Egypt (Is 40:1–11).

The Exodus Motif. The first motific use of the exodus is found in Joshua 4:19–24, where the parting of the Red Sea is explicitly likened to the parting of the Jordan. This passage provides a clear biblical example for motific and typological work.

The broad strokes of the use and development of the exodus motif in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] might go something like this: The entry into and conquest of the Promised Land in Joshua is the exodus experience of the next generation.

The book of Judges is structured around cycles of oppression and deliverance for Israel by the hand of the Lord as they cried out for help. The books of Samuel-Kings can be seen as a movement from the impermanence of the exodus wanderings to a stable situation with king and temple and then the ultimate reversion back to an oppressive situation. The prophets transform the original exodus into a new exodus. In the same way that God delivered Israel from Egypt in the past, he will deliver Israel in the future from bondage in the exile.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] borrows the exodus motif in a number of instances: John the Baptist's ministry is summarized in the words of Isaiah 40:3–4 as the one “preparing the way in the wilderness.” Jesus is the new Moses, who spent forty days in the wilderness without eating and who gives a sermon on the mountain to bring new light to the law. Indeed, when Jesus speaks of his resurrection, he speaks of leading an exodus (Lk 9:31). 1 Corinthians 10:1–5 says that Christ is the rock that was there in the wilderness of the exodus. Hebrews links Moses and Jesus (Heb 3:1–18), the Israelite and the Christian (Heb 4:1–3), the tabernacle and the heavenly temple (Heb 9:1–10), and the high priest and Jesus (Heb 6:20). Moreover, Hebrews 12:18–24 suggests a move from Mt. Sinai to Mt. Zion (similar to what the prophet Isaiah is doing with his transformation of the exodus motif and his focus on Zion). Finally, the book of Revelation has numerous examples of the use of the exodus motif (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , the plagues, a woman delivered on eagle's wings to the desert [Rev 12:14]).

A specific example, Psalm 144, will clarify how biblical writers use the exodus symbolism. At first blush there seems to be nothing referring explicitly to the exodus. However, in the psalm, God is called Rock, and the divine warrior is clearly invoked (Ps 144:5—7); there is oppression from foreigners against which the psalmist cries out; and there are mighty waters from which he must be rescued. The final outcome is peace in the land for family and livestock.

Development in the Motif. With the progress of the history of redemption, there is also development in the meaning of the exodus motif. The exodus story is repeated several times—in the crossing of the Jordan, in the repeated deliverance from oppression during the period of the judges, in the restoration from exile, in the first coming of Christ and in his final coming.

Hope is imparted through the transferal of the power and emotion associated with the exodus to other similar situations in the history of Israel from which God's people needed deliverance. As great as the deliverance of Israel in the exodus was, Christ's salvation is greater (Heb 2:1—4). One can hear echoes of Deuteronomy 4:32—35 (quoted at the beginning of this article) in the following description of the salvation of which the exodus is the forerunner:

For if the message spoken by angels was binding, and every violation and disobedience received its just punishment, how shall we escape if we ignore such a great salvation? This salvation, which was first announced by the Lord, was confirmed to us by those who heard him. God also testified to it by signs, wonders and various miracles, and gifts of the Holy Spirit distributed according to his will. (Heb 2:2—4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

See also Arm; Bondage and Freedom; Creation; Divine Warrior; Egypt; Exile; Exodus, Book of; Manna; Moses; Mountain; Pharaoh; Plagues; Sea; Sinai; Slavery; Tabernacle; Warfare; Wilderness.

Bibliography. D. Daube, The Exodus Pattern in the Bible (London: Faber & Faber, 1963); T. Longman III and D. G. Reid, God Is a Warrior (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); R. E. Nixon, Exodus in the New Testament (London: Tyndale, 1963); S. Talmon, "The Desert Motif in the Bible and in Qumran Literature," in Literary Studies in the Hebrew Bible, ed. [ed. ed.. edition; editor(s); edited by] S. Talmon (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1993) 216—54.

EXORCISM.

See Demons; Magic.

EXPIATION.

See Atonement.

EXPRESSIONS, FACIAL.

See Face, Facial Expressions.

EXPULSION.

See Exile; Fall From Innocence.

EYE, SIGHT

The Bible makes frequent references to the literal organ of sight (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 3:6; 30:41). The eyes were regarded as a source of beauty (1 Sam 16:12; Song 1:15; 4:1, 9; 5:12; 6:5; 7:4), and the cruel punishment of putting out an enemy's eyes bears witness to the disabling effects of blindness (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 16:21; 2 Kings 25:7; Jer 39:7). However sight belongs to the common stock of spiritual imagery, perhaps because of its obvious connection to light. Spiritual sight or insight is a widespread metaphor throughout the Bible. Seeing is sometimes connected with hearing as a metaphor for spiritual perception or knowledge (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Prov 20:12; 22:12; Is 6:10). In the Bible, however, sight is accorded less theological significance than hearing.

The notion of the “evil eye” that is common throughout most religious traditions is notably absent from the Bible (though Gal 3:1 may be a veiled reference). Belief in the “evil eye” was criticized by preachers in the early church.

A God Who Sees. One cluster of images revolves around the anthropomorphic portrayal of God, to whom human body parts are figuratively attributed. God is frequently described as one who sees (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 33:18). In the creation narratives God is described frequently as looking at his creation (Gen 1:4, 10). His seeing is followed by moral appreciation—“it was good.” By extension God sees all that takes place on earth. He is omniscient (Job 28:10; Ps 139:16; Prov 15:13; Heb 4:13). Ezekiel expands this sense of God’s capacity for seeing in his description of visions of God with living creatures around him, all covered with eyes (Ezek 1:18; 10:12).

Sometimes God is petitioned to see (Ps 17:2; 2 Chron 6:20). He sees the evil perpetrated by people (Jer 16:17), though we are sometimes told that he cannot look upon evil (Hab 1:13). Indeed, God can refuse to see—with the connotation that help will not be forthcoming (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 1:15–16). Inevitably God’s seeing sometimes results in acts of judgment (Job 34:21; Ps 66:7; 94:9; Prov 15:3; 2 Kings 4:34–35; Amos 9:4, 8).

God’s seeing leads to protection of those whom he loves. “The eye of the Lord is on those who fear him” (Ps 33:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 11:12; 1 Kings 8:29, 52; 9:3; 2 Chron 6:20, 40; 16:9; Ps 34:15; Ezra 5:5; Neh 1:6; 1 Pet 3:12). What God looks for is truth (Jer 5:3) and the opportunity to benefit people (Jer 24:6). By contrast, idols are frequently described as being blind (Ps 115:5; 135:16).

Human Insight and Knowledge. Sight is frequently used as a symbol of human understanding (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 3:5; Jer 5:21). Usually there is an element of opinion or exercise of judgment (Prov 3:7; Jer 7:11). Sight is often applied to spiritual insight (Ps 119:18, 37), which may occur through the study of the law (Ps 19:8) or be the direct gift of God through his Spirit (Eph 1:17–18). Such understanding may become darkened or be blinded (Mt 13:13; Lk 24:16; 2 Cor 4:4). The immediate result of the Fall, as described in Genesis, is that Adam and Eve receive a measure of spiritual and moral insight—their eyes are opened and innocence is lost (Gen 3:5–7). In Ecclesiastes 2:12–14 the wise person is contrasted to the fool using the image of eyesight.

People can become blind due to their refusal to respond to God's word. This was to be the outcome of Isaiah's ministry (Is 6:10). God permits the people to persist in their insensitivity (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 29:4; Jer 5:21). Jesus quotes this passage from Isaiah in the parable of the sower to explain the case of those who fail to respond to his message (Mk 4:12). Likewise Acts 28:26–27 quotes the same passage to comment upon the lack of response to the Christian message on the part of the Jews. Paul does likewise in Romans 11:8.

The desire to see God is vouchsafed only to the “pure in heart” (Mt 5:8). People look to God for guidance (Ps 25:15; 32:8; 123:1; 145:15). Indeed, they need God to give them sight (Gen 21:19). Care needs to be taken over what is seen (Job 31:1; Ps 101:3, 6; Prov 4:25), for the eye can be damaged or obscured (Mt 7:3–5) and can become the channel of spiritual evil (Eccles 4:8; Mt 5:29; 6:22–23). On these occasions radical treatment is called for, and Jesus advocates tearing the eye out (Mt 5:29; 18:9).

Prophets are sometimes described as “seers” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Sam 24:11; Is 29:10). They are especially gifted with spiritual insight from God. The story of Elisha and the armies of Yahweh is instructive. In the first instance, Elisha is unable to perceive that God’s angelic forces are to be engaged in the forthcoming conflict. In due course, however, his eyes are opened (2 Kings 6:17, 20). In apocalyptic writings such as Daniel, Ezekiel and Revelation, “the heavens were opened” to disclose visions of deity (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Zech 1:18; see Dreams, Visions). It is principally in apocalyptic visions that God is “seen.” Usually this occurs in the form of messianic incarnations (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Dan 10:5–6), and the context is generally eschatological (Is 33:17; Ezek 38:23; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 1:7).

One of the most prominent expectations of the Messiah is that he should bring “recovery of sight to the blind” (Lk 4:18), a function amply fulfilled in the ministry of Jesus in various miracles. Mark relates the healing of the blind man at Bethsaida where there is gradual recovery of sight (Mk 8:22–26), and Matthew recounts the healing of two blind men (Mt 9:27–31), a healing clearly related to the exercise of faith (v. 29). One of the most famous healings of a blind man is that of Bartimaeus, a story common to all of the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 20:29–34; Mk 10:46–52; Lk 18:35–43). Once again the exercise of faith is connected with the healing (Mk 10:52). Matthew adds other instances (Mt 15:30; 21:14). Jesus discusses the effect of his own public ministry in terms of Isaiah 6:10 in Mark 4:10–12. The relationship between faith and sight is more explicitly explored in John (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 4:48; 14:8, 11; 20:8, 29). The centerpiece of this theme is the healing of the man born blind (9:1–41), where physical sight and spiritual illumination are both concerned. John sums up the results of Jesus’ public ministry by quoting once again from Isaiah

6:10 (Jn 12:40).

Idioms. The principle of lex talionis, intended to limit excessive revenge, was expressed in terms of “an eye for an eye” (Ex 21:23–25; Lev 24:20; Deut 19:21). Direct confrontation was “face to face,” literally “eye to eye” (Num 14:14), and actions done “before their eyes” (Gen 42:24; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 32:12). When a person’s judgment is described, especially in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , it is “in the eyes of” that person (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Kings 10:5; 1 Chron 13:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 21:42; Mk 12:11). Stubbornness is “doing what is right in one’s own eyes” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Judg 17:6; 21:25; Ps 36:2; Prov 3:7; 10:10; 12:15; 16:2; 21:2; 30:12f; Is 5:21). Instead it is best to do what is right “in the eyes of the Lord” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Kings 15:5, 11; 2 Kings 14:3). To look around is to “lift up the eyes” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 13:10, 14; 18:2; 22:4, 13; 24:63–64), and “to fix one’s eyes upon” is to turn one’s attention to someone or something (Gen 44:21; Ps 119:6, 15; Ezek 20:24; Lk 4:20). Things can happen “in the twinkling of an eye” (1 Cor 15:52).

The pupil or “apple” of the eye is very precious, and this expression is used to describe a person who is very dear to God (Ps 17:8; Zech 2:8). It can imply the quality of God’s protective care (Deut 32:10). A teacher’s instruction may be similarly described (Prov 7:2).

The Eyes as Expressing Feelings. The eyes are held to express a wide range of emotions, both positive and negative. They can express physical and emotional well-being (1 Sam 14:27; Ps 38:10), enlightenment (Ps 19:8), delight (Ezek 24:16), humility (Ps 123:2), sympathy or pity (Deut 7:16; 19:13, 21; 25:12; Ezek 16:5) or generosity (Prov 22:9; Mt 6:22). They can also express a lack of physical and emotional well-being (Deut 28:65; Job 17:7; Ps 69:3; Lam 5:17), a loss of understanding (Job 17:7), grief (Ps 6:7; 31:9; 88:9; 119:136; Jer 9:1; Lam 1:6;

2:11; 3:48—49), arrogance (2 Kings 9:22; Ps 18:27; Prov 6:17; 21:4; 30:13; Is 5:15; 37:23), a lack of sympathy (Prov 28:27; Mt 13:15), greed (1 Sam 2:29, 32), stinginess (Prov 23:6; Mt 7:22), envy (Mt 20:15), mockery (Ps 35:19; Prov 30:17), cunning and deceit (Ps 35:19; Prov 6:13; 10:10; 16:13, 30), hatred (Job 16:9), lust (Ps 73:7; Prov 17:24; 27:20; Eccles 2:10; 4:8; Ezek 6:9; Mt 5:29; 2 Pet 2:14; 1 Jn 2:16) and flirtation (Is 3:16).

See also Blind, Blindness; Disease, Healing; Ear, Hearing; Heart; Light; Sin.

EYE OF THE NEEDLE

In Matthew 19:24 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 10:25; Lk 18:25) we find the statement of Jesus: “it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). There is no historical evidence to suggest that “eye of the needle” refers to a narrow gateway for pedestrians. It is an example of hyperbole, familiar in rabbinic teachings, and signifying something both very unusual and very difficult. The Talmud speaks of an elephant passing through the eye of a needle to evoke an impossible situation, and a camel is portrayed as dancing in a very small measure.

EZEKIEL, BOOK OF

The opening vision of the book of Ezekiel sets the tone for all that follows with its busy, bustling activity. The vision of the glory of God is not static and temple-bound, as in Isaiah 6, but is filled with motion, and even more remarkably, it is located in Babylonia by the Kebar river (Ezek 1:3). The vision begins by describing the approach of a windstorm (rûah se'ârâ, Ezek 1:4), an “immense cloud with flashing lightning and surrounded by brilliant light” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This mighty wind recalls not only creation, where the spirit (rûah) of God was hovering over the waters (Gen 1:2), but also the flood, where God sent a wind (rûah) to dry up the floodwaters (Gen 8:1). The connection with these two pivotal events of protohistory is underlined as the chapter unfolds by reference to an awesome “expanse” (râqîaʿ, Ezek 1:25) over the cherubim, like that of Genesis 1:6–8. God’s radiance is compared to a rainbow in the clouds on a rainy day (Ezek 1:28), which evokes Genesis 9:13–16. These references set the tone of the book as an account of creation-uncreation-recreation, similar to that of the early chapters of Genesis.

The message of judgment that predominates in the early chapters of Ezekiel culminates in the departure of God’s glory from the temple. This leads to the exile, a situation of chaos analogous to the flood. Yet from the outset the rainbow’s assurance of hope strikes an optimistic note in the midst of the gathering gloom. Ultimately that hope finds expression in the vision of restoration that centers around the return of God’s glory to fill the restored temple.

Images of movement predominate in the description of God’s glory. The windstorm itself is in motion, while the living creatures it contains not only have legs but wings as well (Ezek 1:6–7). Torches are moving back and forth between the creatures (Ezek 1:13), while alongside the creatures are “wheels within wheels” (Ezek 1:16). All of these move together and stop together under the control of the spirit (rûah, Ezek 1:20). This mobility prepares the reader for the departure of God’s glory from the temple in Ezekiel 10, in response to the abominations described in chapter 8—a slow, halting departure in an easterly direction, toward the exiles in Babylon. At the same time, however, God’s mobility also permits the hope that his glory will return in the same way that it went. The certainty of that hope is communicated in the vision of God’s glory returning to the new temple from the east, the direction in which it had earlier departed (Ezek 43:2). Prior to that return the people themselves will be prepared by the coming of God's spirit (rûah), bringing life to the dry bones (Ezek 37:1–14), just as in creation God breathed life into the first man. That life is immediately expressed in movement as the resurrected army comes to life and stands upon its feet (Ezek 37:10).

The conversion of static imagery to an active picture can also be seen within the restored temple, where the “sea”* of the old temple—a vast pool meeting the requirements for cleansing purposes—has been transformed into a river flowing outward from the temple, expanding as it goes and bringing life to everything it touches (Ezek 47:2–12). Likewise, at the pilgrim festivals the worshippers are not simply to present themselves before the Lord but to pass in front of him in a great two-way stream, from north to south and from south to north (Ezek 46:9).

In expressing his message of judgment, Ezekiel uses a wide variety of vivid imagery. He employs the language of unfaithfulness: Jerusalem is like an adopted daughter that has rebelled (Ezek 16); Jerusalem and Samaria are like two sisters united in their addiction to prostitution (Ezek 23). He speaks of uselessness: Jerusalem is like a charred vine (Ezek 15); her prophets are like a whitewashed wall that is on the point of collapse (Ezek 13:10–16); her rulers are impotent in the face of impending disaster (Ezek 7:27); her princes are like trapped lions (Ezek 19). He addresses the inevitability of judgment: Jerusalem is the meat in a cooking pot, to be cooked until burned to a crisp (Ezek 24); the time has now come for disaster to fall (Ezek 7:2), a judgment that begins in symbolic manner with the temple (Ezek 9:1–11). He acts out in graphic form the siege of Jerusalem and the fate of her inhabitants, besieging a clay model (Ezek 4:2), eating defiled food (Ezek 4:9–13), cutting off his hair and dividing it into thirds: one-third to be burned in the city, one-third to be struck with the sword outside the city and one-third scattered to the wind, with only a few hairs preserved (Ezek 5:1–4). Judgment will fall not only upon Israel and Judah but also upon the surrounding nations: the great ship Tyre will sink without trace along with its proud king (Ezek 27–28); the mighty river monster (crocodile?) Egypt, will be hooked like a fish (Ezek 29:3–4).

Alongside the images of judgment are equally vivid words of hope. God will replace the former bad shepherds with a new good shepherd, a new David (Ezek 34:23). God will protect the weak sheep from the strong (Ezek 34:17–22). God will perform heart surgery on his people, removing their old heart of stone and replacing it with a new heart of flesh (Ezek 11:19). The renewed people will be restored to a renewed land, a new garden of Eden (Ezek 36:35), where they can once more be fruitful and multiply (Ezek 36:11).

The central thrust of all of these images is the sovereign activity of God. The message to the unfaithful people of Judah and Jerusalem is this: the great King of all the earth is coming for judgment—who then will escape? But the message to the faithful remnant is also a message of God's sovereignty: God himself will act to restore his people and recreate his land—who then can prevent it? God will act, and will act decisively, in judgment and blessing for the sake of the glory due his name (Ezek 36:32, 38).

See also Creation; Exile; Garden; Glory; Jerusalem; Judgment; Land; Temple.

EZRA, BOOK OF

A primary image pattern in the book of Ezra stems from the situation that it describes: return from exile and rebuilding the temple provide the basic framework of the book. From start to finish, the book of Ezra breathes the spirit of a new beginning, after exile, in the original promised land. This imagery of rebirth extends to two primary areas—the rebuilt temple (in contrast to Nehemiah, where the city dominates) and the reinstatement of worship practices. These images are supplemented in chapters 9 and 10 by the imagery of repentance and reform.

Within the framework of a return to something previously lost, the main image pattern of the book centers around a binary opposition between clean and unclean (see Purity). According to Leviticus 10:10, a primary duty of Israel's priests was "to distinguish [literally, 'separate'] between the holy and the common, and between the unclean and the clean" (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see also Ezek 44:23). "Holy"* refers to anything set apart and specially devoted to God. The "common" in the life of Israel is what is ordinary, normal and not specially consecrated to God. "Clean" conveys the idea of purity; it is the proper state of both the holy and the common in Israelite life. "Unclean" refers to what is impure or contaminated, contrary to holiness. By definition, what was holy also had to be clean, whereas the common could be either clean or unclean. This way of looking at the world provides important background for understanding the book of Ezra and in particular its use of the motif of "separation from the unclean."

Whereas the prophet Ezekiel had condemned the preexilic priests for failing to follow Leviticus 10:10 (Ezek 22:26), Ezra is presented as the faithful priest—note his descent from the "chief priest Aaron" (Ezra 7:1–5)—who does instruct the people on how to keep the clean and unclean separate. This interest in priestly concerns is not surprising. Not only does the book of Ezra narrate the reconstruction of the temple, but it is also interested in other aspects of temple life: the accessories (Ezra 1:6—11; 5:14—15; 6:5; 7:19; 8:25—30, 33—34), the personnel (Ezra 2:36—63, 70; 3:8—12; 6:18, 20; 7:7, 12—13, 24; 8:15—20, 24; 9:1; 10:18—24), the feasts and sacrifices (Ezra 3:1—6; 6:3, 9—10, 17, 22; 7:17; 8:35; 10:19). The story is not only about the temple, but it is also written from a temple-centered perspective. The world of the temple, with its emphasis on holiness and ritual purity, is the ideological point of reference from which the narrative world is interpreted.

In Ezra, holy people and holy things are distinguished from the ordinary. On the spatial level, the site of the temple is especially sacred (see Sacred Space). It is the place where sacrifices were made to God (Ezra 3:1—6). It is the “house of the Lord” (Ezra 1:3), set apart by a special dedication festival (Ezra 5:13—17). Furthermore, people and things that belonged in the temple were deemed to be holy. Thus, the priests and Levites were set apart as a special subset of the nation. In their capacity as celebrants of the Passover festival, the priests and Levites were “clean” because they “had purified themselves” (Ezra 6:19; literally, “made themselves clean”). At another time Ezra tells a group of priests who are charged with guarding temples vessels: “You are holy to the Lord, and the vessels are holy” (Ezra 8:28). Put simply, the temple is the realm devoted exclusively to the Lord.

Even more important is the separation of the clean from the unclean. If the priests and Levites were “holy,” especially set apart to God, the whole of the nation was to be “clean” and separated from people who were deemed unclean.

Throughout the narrative, the group referred to as “the neighboring people” (literally, “the peoples of the lands,” Ezra 3:3; 6:1, 2, 11), “the people of the land” (Ezra 4:4; 10:2, 11) or “the nations of the land” (Ezra 6:21) are defined as unclean. “Pollution” (tum’âh, literally, “uncleanness”) attaches to them (Ezra 6:21) primarily because they practice “abominations”* like the Canaanites who inhabited the land before them in pre-exilic times (Ezra 9:1, 11).

In the theology of the book, clean and unclean cannot be mixed but must be kept separate (Ezra 6:21). If the two are mixed, the clean is corrupted and becomes unclean. This explains the great interest in the issue of intermarriage. Ezra is appalled to learn that many Jews, including priests and Levites, had not separated themselves from the surrounding nations but had taken foreign women for their wives. Clean and unclean were no longer separate: “the holy seed has mixed itself with the peoples of the land” (Ezra 9:1–3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] , emphasis added). The boundary between clean and unclean had been violated; the holiness, the separateness, of the Jews was being destroyed.

The appropriate response to the threat of mixture or contamination of the clean by the unclean is active separation. Ezra demands that the community end the practice of mixed marriages. He also requires that Jewish husbands dissolve existing marriages by “separating themselves” from their foreign wives (Ezra 10:11) and “sending them away with their children” (Ezra 10:19). Anyone who refused to comply was “banned [literally, “separated”] from the congregation of the exiles” (Ezra 10:8).

The concern for the purity of the “holy seed” also explains the strong interest in genealogies (Ezra 2:1–63; 8:1–14). Lines of descent play a crucial role in defining the holy people. Any Jew who could not prove his lineage was defined as “not belonging to Israel” (Ezra 2:59). Particularly problematical was the case of those who claimed to be priests but could not find their names in the appropriate genealogical lists. Until they could prove their lineage by an alternate method, they were deemed to be “unclean” and prohibited from eating from “the most holy food” (Ezra 2:62–63). This is another form of separation of clean (or holy) from the unclean. The boundary between the holy and the unclean was to be maintained at all costs. The obviously unclean (foreign wives and their children) had to be excluded from the community, but also those who were not unambiguously “clean” (that is, of Israelite descent) were separated in some way from the realm of the holy.

This binary opposition between the clean and the unclean explains why even non-Jews who claimed to worship the Lord were excluded from the reconstruction of the temple. The leaders of the surrounding people saw no boundary between themselves and the Jews. They focused on what united them to the Jews: “Let us build with you, for we worship your God as you do” (Ezra 4:2). But the response of the Jewish leaders was based on a radical sense of unbridgeable separateness between the two peoples. Even an apparently mutual devotion to the Lord cannot overcome this division. The Jewish leaders responded, “You shall have no part with us [literally, “it is not to you and to us”] in building a house to our God; but we alone will build to the Lord” (Ezra 4:3 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In the ideology of the book, the concept of “you and us,” the togetherness of Jew and Gentile, is inconceivable. From the Jewish vantage point, it can only be “we alone” building a temple for “our God.”

See also Cleansing; Exile; Holiness; Jerusalem; Priest; Purity; Repentance; Return; Sacred Space; Temple.

F

FACE, FACIAL EXPRESSIONS

The face is an ever-changing billboard signaling our own attitudes and reactions. In turn, we read the faces of others. The face contains most of the clues we seek as to the mental state of another person. Much of what we know about others we learn from their faces before they even speak. It offers no surprise then, that in the Bible the face is often described as indicating emotions and attitudes.

Face as Self. One's face is one's true self. To honor the face is to honor the person (Lev 19:32). The king's question "Why is your face sad?" means "Why are you sad?" (Neh 2:2). The face is so much one's self that the word for face functions almost as a reflexive pronoun; for example, Job's leanness testifies to his face (Job 16:8). With childlike simplicity we instinctively attempt to hide our wholeselves by covering only our face (Ex 3:6). Since the face is the essence of the person, abuse is directed at the face (Mk 14:65; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 25:9).

Literature employs the symbolism of the face to expose nature and character. Just as the face of Moses showed that he had been with God (Ex 34:29), so also the company of the divine transfigures the appearance of Jesus (Mt 17:2). The true character of the martyr Stephen flashes on his visage—a combination of innocence, power and grace that Luke describes as the "face of an angel" (Acts 6:15). A "face like lightning" along with other attributes suggests that the man in Daniel's vision is no mortal (Dan 10:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 24:4). John's vision of one like the son of man describes him with a "face like the sun" (Rev 1:16). The creatures that surround the throne of God and worship him portray elements of creation. The third animal represents humanity and so has the "face of a man" (Rev 4:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 25:20; Is 6:2; Ezek 1:10; 10:14).

Face as Presence. The Hebrew expression "to (his) face" means simply "before," or "in front of," and appears in many NT [NT NT. New Testament] citations of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mt 11:10; Mk 1:2). To “see the face” is to gain acceptance to one’s presence (Gen 32:20; Esther 1:14; Acts 20:25). The face of Moses, because he had been in the presence (before the face) of God, shone (Ex 34:29; 2 Cor 3:7). The devout live as if in the presence of God, obeying his command “Seek my face” (Ps 27:8). The believer’s current understanding of God is as “in a mirror dimly, but then face to face” (1 Cor 13:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Cor 10:1; 1 Thess 2:17; 3:10; 2 Jn 12; 3 Jn 14).

Face as Intent. Simply because the front is not the back, a face implies direction and intent. Intent extends to resolve and purpose (Num 24:1; Prov 17:24). To set one’s face toward or against evokes resolve and determination (Lev 17:10; 20:3; 2 Kings 12:17; Lk 9:51, 53). “I have set my face against this city for evil and not for good” (Jer 21:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 44:11). Even inanimate objects may be said to face one direction or another. Paul’s ship “could not face the wind” (Acts 27:15).

Face as False or Deceitful. The face so transparently manifests one’s attitude and mood that the best way to disguise feelings is to alter one’s visage, to be a hypocrite (Grk hypokritēs, “a play-actor,” Mt 6:16). The difficulty of maintaining such a ruse prompts the accused to request an audience with their accusers “face to face” (Acts 25:16). Disguising the face is an attempt to hide the truth from others or to hide from the truth oneself (Job 24:15).

A changed visage, however, need not reflect dishonesty. A washed face, like washed hands, represents a fresh start (Gen 43:31; Mt 6:17) and a wiping away or hiding of a former state.

Face as Light and Dark. The metaphor of light emerging on the face is common. Faces beam. Faces glow. Understanding dawns on the face. Faces break out in a grin. Smiles flash across the face. The bloom of youth appears there too. A shining human face stems from healthy skin, cared for with oil (Ps 104:15), in contrast to the starving whose “visage is blacker than soot” (Lam 4:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The ultimate blessing is to have the Lord’s face shine upon you (Num 6:25; Pss 31:16; 67:1). “Restore us, O God; let thy face shine that we may be saved” (Ps 80:3, 7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This shining face of God is linked to teaching his statutes and keeping the law (Ps 119:135). Outside the canon we find in 4 Ezra a statement of sharp contrasts: “The faces of those who practiced self-control shall shine more than the stars, but our faces shall be blacker than darkness” (4 Ezra 7:55).

Face as Hidden or Covered. A hidden face not only denies what it refuses to see but refuses to admit that it is present: “You shall cover your face, that you may not see the land; for I have made you a sign for the house of Israel” (Ezek 12:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

“Hide thy face from my sins, and blot out all my iniquities” (Ps 51:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the psalmist prays. The second of the two parallel units raises the ante by asking that God not only deny the sins’ existence but actually wipe them out. While God may anthropomorphically hide his face, humans do so literally. To our own detriment we have found God’s chosen one repulsive and deplorable and so have hidden our faces from him (Is 53:3). To see the face of God is linked to worship (Rev 22:3–4), hinting that when God hides his face, he not only withdraws his presence and benevolent guardianship but also shuns the human offerings of worship and prayer. To hide the face is to break off communication (Deut 31:17—18; 32:20), often implying revulsion and abhorrence. A hidden face ignores requests for help (Ps 13:1; 69:17) and refuses to answer (Ps 102:2). The poets equate this lack of divine oversight with the absence of God's spirit (Ezek 39:29), even comparing it to death and the pit (Ps 143:7).

Among humans, to look another in the face is to ask for equal standing, recognition between peers (2 Chron 25:17). As a gesture of humility, to bow the face is to hide it in symbolic self-denial and deference or respect (Josh 5:14; 1 Chron 21:21). At the sound of the "still small voice" of God, Elijah wrapped his face in his mantle (1 Kings 19:13). In the new covenant, worshipers will be able to stand before God with unveiled face (2 Cor 3:18), and in the remade world they will see the face of God (Rev 22:4). In the great day of wrath, people will scramble to hide from the face of the one seated on the throne (Rev 6:16).

Mouth. The constituent elements of the face each communicates on its own. The mouth can both disarm with a smile and antagonize with a threat. Job's smile encouraged his associates when they had no confidence of their own, and they appreciated the light of his countenance (Job 29:24). The psalmist laments that his enemies gape at him or make mouths at him (Ps 22:7).

Nose. Perhaps because the spirit of the body (the breath) comes and goes through the nose, it is an indicator of one's spirit, especially anger. The nose is heated in anger, reminiscent of the snorting of a horse. The imagery of human anger in turn expresses divine anger and "hot displeasure" (Deut 9:19). "Turn thy fierce wrath" (Ex 32:12) is literally "the burning anger of thy nostrils." In contrast, patience and being "slow to anger" is literally to be "long of nose" (Ex 34:6), perhaps meaning slow to heat up, as in Priscilla's metaphor of the captain in The Courtship of Miles Standish: "He's a little chimney and heated hot in a moment.” Haughtiness shows clearly in the image of a raised nose (Ps 10:4).

Eyes. As perhaps the most expressive single element of the face, contact with the eyes is essential to nonverbal communication. The eye, as a window to the soul, serves as an gauge of the wholeness, the spiritual and physical well-being of the individual. Even today, but more so in the past, the windy and dusty environment of the Middle East afflicts the eye with many diseases. The eye also serves as an indicator for various other systemic diseases, reflecting one’s health and spiritual condition all in one, for “the light of the body is the eye” (Mt 6:22; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 30:13; Lam 5:17).

Unaware that the eye only sensed reflected light, the ancients held that the eyes emitted a power that illumined objects. Thus darkness was not merely the absence of light, but the forces of darkness overpowering and swallowing up the human ability to see. In such a worldview the eyes actively emitted messages, expressing an attitude with every observation.

Nowhere is this view of the magical power inherent in the observer’s eye more evident than in the almost universal ancient belief in the power of the evil eye. Some people, it was thought, could bring about calamity by casting a spell with an “evil eye.” The expression of jealous sentiments or even compliments were viewed as harboring vengeful spirits that would subsequently destroy what had been admired. In accordance with this outlook, the phrase “evil eye” in Scripture is usually rendered conceptually as “jealousy.” The literal phrase “Is thine eye evil because I am good?” (Mt 20:15 AV) becomes “Do you begrudge my generosity?” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

But the eye betrays the inner spirit and may be selfish and hoarding (Prov 22:6) or bountiful and generous (Prov 22:9). Eyes can be sharpened like weapons (Job 16:9) and narrowed to a threatening squint (Ps 35:19; Prov 6:13; 10:10; Job 15:12). The eyes communicate the whole range of human emotions: suspicion (1 Sam 18:9), haughtiness (Ps 101:5; Prov 6:17), arrogance (Is 2:11; 5:15; Ps 101:5; 18:28), humility (Job 22:29), pity (Deut 7:16).

The power of the eye is not exercised only for evil. The poet testifies to the power of a look: “You have ravished my heart with a glance of your eyes” (Song 4:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The eyes attract attention for their beauty (Song 1:5; 4:1; 5:12) or occasionally for their lack of beauty (Leah, Gen 29:17). Artificial enhancements such as eye makeup attempt to take advantage of the beauty and power of the eyes (2 Kings 9:30; Jer 4:30; Ezek 23:40). The eyes are deep pools into which we stare to fathomed the depth of the other’s character by long contemplation (Song 7:4). Yet even a lover’s stare can be uncomfortable (Song 6:5).

Face as Emotions. The face displays the whole range of human feelings. It grows pale in crisis: “Jacob shall no more be ashamed, nor more shall his face grow pale” (Is 29:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “Why has every face turned pale?” (Jer 30:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Joel 2:6; Nahum 2:11). Faces flushed with pain and agony are “faces aflame” (Is 13:8). The fire of the Lord, like a flame, will produce scorched faces (Ezek 21:3). Faces also grow “red with weeping” (Job 16:16). Tears are an unmistakable sign of sorrow that the Lord will wipe away from all faces (Is 25:8).

“A glad heart makes a cheerful countenance” (Prov 15:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), but in the counterintuitive logic of Ecclesiastes, “by sadness of countenance the heart is made glad” (Eccles 7:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Life is bittersweet and sadness makes the laughter more poignant. A fallen countenance indicates displeasure (Gen 4:5–6), but Eli can see on Hannah’s face that she is no longer sad (1 Sam 1:18). Ezekiel reproaches those who because of their abominations have faces covered with horror and shame (Ezek 7:18). Other prophets describe the face similarly: “Dishonor has covered our face, for aliens have come into the holy places of the Lord’s house” (Jer 51:51 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “Shame has covered my face” (Ps 69:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); “Fill their [unbeliever’s] faces with shame” (Ps 83:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Anger; Forehead; Gestures; Eyes, Sight; Fear; Glory; Happiness; Lips; Mouth; Nose; Shame; Tongue.

FACIAL EXPRESSIONS.

See Face, Facial Expressions.

FADE, FADING

The Bible uses the word fade primarily to denote the transience of human life and the futility of sin. Nearly always the imagery of grass or plants and their short lives is used to remind people of their short stay on earth. The word fade thus has a two-pronged focus: it emphasizes that all humans will die and that only God is eternal, and it also emphasizes that the wicked will be judged and destroyed by God, but the righteous will ultimately be rewarded.

At a literal level, fading is a specific image within the more general category of transience and mutability. It denotes a gradual diminishment of either light, sight or vitality in plant life, usually as a way of emphasizing the transience and sorrow of life. Job, for example, comments that “as the cloud fades and vanishes, so those who go down to Sheol do not come up” (Job 7:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and the psalmist compares people to grass: “In the morning it flourishes and is renewed; in the evening it fades and withers” (Ps 90:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This transience brings pain and suffering to human beings. Job mourns, “My eye has grown dim from grief, and all my members are like a shadow” (Job 17:7). Likewise the psalmist laments how his eyes “grow dim with waiting” for his God and through the sorrow that inevitably accompanies life (Ps 69:3; 88:9). For Paul the enduring splendor of the new covenant is far superior to that of the old covenant; the glory of the old is illustrated by the fading glory of Moses’ face, which he hid behind a veil after being in the presence of God (2 Cor 3:7–11). In contrast to such human and earthly fading, God is eternal and never changes: “The grass withers, the flower fades, when the breath of the Lord blows on it; surely the people are grass.... But the word of our God will stand forever” (Is 40:7–8 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

More specifically, the image of fading is used to denote the punishment that will come to the wicked (see Crime and Punishment). Job declares of them, “They are exalted a little while, and then they are gone; they wither and fade like the mallow; they are cut off like the heads of grain” (Job 24:24). The psalmist echoes this, declaring that the wicked “will soon fade like the grass, and wither like the green herb” (Ps 37:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Isaiah’s picture of people dwindling as punishment for their guilt [Is 24:6]). In keeping with the Bible’s view of humankind as universally sinful, such fading is ascribed to the entire human race: “We all fade like a leaf, and our iniquities, like the wind, take us away” (Is 64:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

However, the Bible speaks of a method of escaping this inevitable process. The key lies in redemption by the imperishable and precious blood of Christ, which enables people to be “born anew, not of perishable but of imperishable seed, through the living and enduring word of God” (1 Pet 1:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). If this happens, resurrection also becomes possible, so that “what is sown is perishable, what is raised is imperishable” (1 Cor 15:42 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

In addition to eternal life, God also promises eternal reward to those who are faithful in life. Jesus commanded his disciples, “Do not store up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust consume and where thieves break in and steal, but store up for yourselves treasures in heaven” (Mt 6:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), for this treasure will be “an inheritance that is imperishable, undefiled, and unfading” (1 Pet 1:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Even the trials that made the eyes of Job and the psalmist dim can bring forth benefit in heaven, for such trials are meant to test “the genuineness of your faith—being more precious than gold that, though perishable, is tested by fire—may result in praise and glory and honor when Jesus Christ is revealed” and in a “crown of glory that never fades away” (1 Pet 1:7; 5:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Thus the Christian has hope in Christ that he or she may escape the fading caused by death and sin.

See also Corruption; Decay; Glory; Rust; Veil.

FAITH

Images of faith are rare in the Bible. This is partly because faith is an instrument. Although it is nothing in itself, saving faith appropriates Jesus Christ and everything he has to offer (Jn 11:25–26; 14:1; Acts 16:31; 1 Jn 3:23). Faith is the means by which a person is justified (Rom 3:28; Gal 2:16; 3:8, 24) and the action through which a person receives the righteousness of Christ (Rom 3:22; Phil 3:9). Believers are also sanctified (Acts 15:9; 26:18) and adopted by faith (Gal 3:26). A second reason that biblical images of faith are rare is that faith is a uniquely human possibility. Nothing in the natural world, where most biblical imagery originates, can serve as a suitable analogy for faith.

The Bible may be short on images of faith, but it is long on examples of trusting and believing. Faith is a way of life for the righteous, who “live by faith” (Hab 2:4; Rom 1:17; 2 Cor 5:7; Gal 2:20; 3:11). Abraham is the quintessential person of faith (Gal 3:9). Because he trusted in God’s word, which entailed (from the broadest perspective) the covenant (Gen 17), the gospel (Gal 3:8), heaven (Heb 11:10), the child of promise (Heb 11:11) and the resurrection (Heb 11:19), “it was credited to him as righteousness” (Gen 15:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 4:3—12). Again and again the psalmist asserts that he trusts “in the Lord” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 31:6; 55:23) rather than in his horse and chariot (Ps 20:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 31:1), his bow (Ps 44:6), his bank account (Ps 49:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 48:7), himself (Ps 49:13) or his political leaders (Ps 118:9).

The writer of Hebrews 11 offers a complete catalogue of the heroes and heroines of faith, but even he runs out of time to list them all (Heb 11:32). The lives of these men and women show that faith is an unshakable belief that God will do everything he has promised to do even before there is visible evidence to that effect. In short, “faith is being sure of what we hope for and certain of what we do not see” (Heb 11:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 11:13; 1 Pet 1:8). For John and Thomas, seeing was believing (Jn 20:8, 27—28), but for every believer since the ascension of Jesus Christ, not seeing is believing (Jn 20:29): “We live by faith, not by sight” (2 Cor 5:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The lives of the faithful show what faith can do. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] faith enables the believer to offer better sacrifices as Abel did (Heb 11:4), to build an ark as Noah did (Heb 11:7), to follow God on life’s journey as Abraham did (Heb 11:8), to endure suffering for the sake of Christ as Moses did (Heb 11:26), to cross through the deep waters as the children of Israel did (Heb 11:29) and so on. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] faith can even enable a disciple to walk on water (Mt 14:22–36). Indeed “everything is possible for him who believes” (Mk 9:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). More than anything else, faith produces good works (Phil 2:17; 1 Thess 1:3; Jas 2:14–26).

Are any of the heroes and heroines of the Bible without faith? No, because faith in God is the defining virtue of the Christian (Jn 6:29). The epistle to the Hebrews asserts that “without faith it is impossible to please God, because anyone who comes to him must believe that he exists and that he rewards those who earnestly seek him” (Heb 11:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Even a forgotten figure like Ebed-melech is saved on the basis of his trust in the Lord (Jer 38:7–13; 39:15–18).

Faith is frequently measured in quantitative terms. Jesus commends the centurion for his “great faith” (Lk 7:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 15:28). He chides his disciples, by contrast, for having little (Mt 6:30; 8:26; 14:31) or none (Mk 4:40). Jesus wonders if he will find any faith at all when he returns (Luke 18:8). Though the faith of some may be weak (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Rom 14:1), there is always room for it to grow (Lk 17:5; 2 Cor 10:15; 2 Thess 1:3).

Even in small doses, genuine faith is potent stuff. This is not due to the power of the faith itself but to the power of the God in whom faith is placed. Jesus tells his disciples that if they have faith the size of a mustard seed they will be able to move mountains-or at least mulberry trees (Lk 17:6). Indeed “nothing will be impossible” for a disciple with mustard-seed-sized faith (Mt 17:20), though the mustard is the smallest of all seeds (Mk 4:31).

What is faith like? It is like an open door into a relationship with God (Acts 14:27). It is like a shield that protects God’s soldiers when they are under spiritual attack (Eph 6:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Thess 5:8; 1 Pet 1:5). Faith can be defended (1 Tim 6:12), grasped firmly (1 Tim 1:19; Heb 4:14), held in trust (Jude 3) and-best of all-shared (Philem 1:6). Perhaps faith is even like a sailing vessel, since it is susceptible to shipwreck (1 Tim 1:19). But the true believer keeps the faith (2 Tim 4:7).

“And what more shall I say? I do not have time to tell about Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephthah, David, Samuel and the prophets ...” (Heb 11:32 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Abraham; Mustard Seed.

FALL FROM INNOCENCE

The motif of a “fall” in the sense of sudden decline from an ideal state is a major archetype of literature. The genre is tragedy, with its change of fortune from prosperity to calamity. Strictly defined, falling from innocence is a decline from moral innocence to a state of sinfulness. But in more general terms the motif of innocence can be construed as ignorance or lack of knowledge (Joseph’s initiation into the adult world of sibling hatred, sexual temptation and injustice), youthful naiveté (the succumbing to sexual temptation by the “simple young man without sense” in Prov 7:6—27) or a state of prosperity not yet informed by suffering or loss (the story of Job's loss).

The phrase fall from innocence does not occur as such in Scripture, but the idea helps to shape the contours of the total biblical narrative. Human history begins in innocence and then descends into tragedy, eventually to rise to a happy ending for those who accept God's offer of salvation. Within this overall U-shaped plot, a series of "falls" constitute a powerful witness to the awful depths of moral failure compared to the purity of God manifested in created beings, both angelic and human. Within the Bible we find two decisive falls, both key moments of creaturely history, and a myriad of recurrent falls to which the human race is subject as a result of the two primal falls.

The Fall of Satan. One of the two is the prehistoric fall of Satan and the disobedient angels. The Bible gives only hints of this fall (with most people's more detailed picture probably coming from Milton's elaboration of it in Paradise Lost). The imagery of Isaiah's taunt against the king of Babylon (Is 14:12—21) gestures toward a more-than-earthly act of rebellion against God. The oracle of judgment against the king of Tyre in Ezekiel 28:11—19 is even more readily interpreted as a veiled narrative of Satan's fall in heaven. In both visions the fall is a punishment for Satan's titanic ambition and pride that prompt him to aspire beyond his creaturely limitations.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] contains cursory passages that hint at a fall (or a series of falls) for Satan and his legions. Christ speaks of Satan's falling from heaven (Lk 10:18) and being "cast out" (Jn 12:31); Romans 16:20 speaks of Satan's being crushed. Jude 6 describes the angels who "did not keep their own position" and were punished by being kept "in eternal chains in the nether gloom until the judgment of the great day" (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). 2 Peter 2:4 has a similar account of God's not sparing "the angels when they sinned" but casting them "into nether gloom" until the judgment (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Revelation 12:7–12 narrates an epic war in heaven, ending with the dragon and his angels being "thrown down to the earth." Unlike the fall of Adam and Eve, where the act of disobedience itself constitutes a fall, the fall of the demons is the punishment meted out by a wrathful God subsequent to the sinful action.

The Fall of Adam and Eve. The second decisive, once-for-all Fall is that of Adam and Eve in Paradise (see Garden). The picture of innocence that was lost is painted in Genesis 2. Several motifs converge in the actual story of the Fall (Gen 3). One is the temptation of the woman by Satan, who entices Eve to eat of the forbidden tree. The actual Fall consists of disobedience—doing what God has forbidden the human pair to do upon penalty of death. Like the fall of Satan, this human Fall includes an aspiration to exceed the bounds God has established for his creatures (Gen 3:5). The Fall is immediate upon eating the forbidden tree, as Adam and Eve at once know that they are naked (Gen 3:7) and fear the sound of God walking in the garden (Gen 3:8). The impulse to cover themselves and to hide from God embodies the essential change that has occurred, encompassing shame, self-consciousness, the experience of loss and the awareness of separation from God. As in the story of Satan's fall, the loss of innocence is accompanied by divine judgment as God pronounces a curse on Adam and Eve and expels them from the garden of innocence.

NT [NT NT. New Testament] commentary on Genesis 3 elaborates its essential features. It is viewed as the original and prototypical Fall, the cause of all subsequent falls (Rom 5:12–21; 1 Cor 15:21–22). Although Genesis 3 puts the emphasis on the willful disobedience of Adam and Eve, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] commentary evokes a complementary picture of the pathos of Eve as a victim of Satan's seduction (1 Cor 11:3; 1 Tim 2:14).

Subsequent Human Falls. Because the human race fell with Adam and Eve, no subsequent human fall is a fall from absolute innocence but is instead only relative, a regression from an already corrupted state. Pursuant to the Fall of Adam and Eve, the rest of primeval history (Gen 4–11) is a series of consequent falls. Key events include Cain's murder of Abel (followed by banishment), the degeneration of the human race to the point that God destroys the world with a flood and the wicked ambition represented by the Tower of Babel (ending in banishment in the form of dispersal). This downward spiral of the human race is traced in hammer-like progression and vivid imagery in Romans 1 as well.

In subsequent history the most prominent category of falls is that of leaders and kings, and within that category most of the examples illustrate the motif that "pride goes before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall" (Prov 16:18). One thinks of Moses, Samson, Saul, David, Solomon (whose besetting sins were sensuality, luxury and paganism as well as pride), Nebuchadnezzar, Haman and Belshazzar. To these can be added the ignominious prophet Jonah, who falls from being God's respected prophet, and the arrogant wealthy people of Psalm 73, who despite their invulnerability are set "in slippery places" so that they will "fall to ruin" and be "destroyed in a moment" (Ps 73:18–19). All of these make notable errors of judgment and commit acts of disobedience, for which God judges them. In a word they fall from a state of favor and/or prosperity.

But if the literary imagination has gravitated toward rulers as the most prone to great falls, it has certainly not limited itself to the grand and mighty. Within the Bible any lapse into sin by a nation or individual is viewed as a fall. Even predominantly good characters undergo falls in the Bible, including such heroes as Abraham, Jacob, Gideon, Elijah and the disciples of Jesus. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history of the nation of Israel is a continuous cycle of fall, repentance and restoration. NT [NT NT. New Testament] churches too undergo falls. The church at Ephesus is warned that it has “fallen” from its first love (Rev 2:4–5), and Paul marvels that the Galatian Christians are so quickly “turning to a different gospel” (Gal 1:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The possibility of falling is a continuous danger for all who live in a fallen world, where anyone, at any time, can fall into “the snare of the devil” (1 Tim 3:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) or “fall into temptation, into a snare, into many senseless and hurtful desires that plunge men into ruin and destruction” (1 Tim 6:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In a precarious world such as this, the constant injunction is, “Let any one who thinks that he stands take heed lest he fall” (1 Cor 10:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

This sense of the precariousness of life in a fallen world—the readiness with which people can make a wrong choice and slide into misfortune—is reinforced by the parables of Jesus. Here we find a veritable gallery of ordinary people who fall from actual or potential grace either in this life or in the life to come: a slothful servant who receives some of his master’s property but loses his master’s favor through timidity; invitees to a banquet who are rejected by the giver of the banquet when they refuse the invitation; a self-righteous Pharisee who leaves a prayer session condemned; a rich man who ignored the plight of a beggar at his gate and whose fortune is reversed in the afterlife; an enterprising farmer whose complacent plans for retirement are dashed on the eve of the completion of his building project. These are not falls from innocence, but they are falls from prosperity and favor through wrong choices.

Although the fall from innocence is a narrative pattern, it lurks in the background of some nonnarrative genres as well. The lament psalms typically hint at a fall that the person in crisis has undergone. One of them recalls, “I said in my prosperity, ‘I shall never be moved,’” only to find that God hid his face and he “was dismayed” (Ps 30:6–7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The speaker in Psalm 73 recalls a narrowly averted fall with the memory of how “my feet had almost stumbled, my steps had well nigh slipped” (Ps 73:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the Proverbs too, giving in to folly is repeatedly portrayed as eventuating in a fall. The steps of the loose woman, for example, “follow the path to Sheol” (Prov 5:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and calamity comes upon the wicked suddenly (Prov 6:15). Similarly, “the wicked are overthrown” (Prov 12:7) and “cast down to ruin” (Prov 21:12), “poverty and disgrace come to him who ignores instruction” (Prov 13:18), and “a fool’s mouth is his ruin” (Prov 18:7). Again, “a man’s folly brings his way to ruin” (Prov 19:3), and “the wicked are overthrown by calamity”; whereas “a righteous man falls seven times, and rises again” (Prov 24:16). The general outlook that emerges from wisdom literature is that life is a series of traps and pitfalls just waiting to bring a person down, with the path of wisdom the only sure antidote.

Biblical history reflects the moral tension between God and sinful human beings, the universal conflict that generates a drama of opportunity, choice and consequence. Time and again, moreover, the wrong choice is made. Loss follows loss, creating a downward spiral that, apart from divine intervention, leaves all people without peace and without hope.

See also Adam; Apostasy; Corruption; Eve; Garden; Rebellion; Sin; Temptation, Tempter; Tragedy.

FALL OF ADAM AND EVE.

See Fall From Innocence.

FALL OF ANGELS.

See Cosmology; Fall from Innocence.

FALLING AWAY.

See Apostasy.

FAMILY

The Bible begins with the biological family as the central social context of human life and as a chief means of God's communication with human beings. This social view of the family becomes extended into a spiritual and heavenly reality, with the community of God's people as a metaphoric family.

Stories About Families. Before exploring specific images of the family in the Bible, we would do well to note the genre or plot motif of family stories. This genre dominates the domestic epic of Genesis, where the sphere of action is not the nation but the family, and where the crucial events do not occur in the court and on the battlefield (as other ancient epics would have it) but around the home. Beginning with the birth of Cain (Gen 4:1), the history narrated in Genesis is a succession of family narratives, as we read about the families of Adam and Eve, Noah, Abraham, Lot, Isaac, and Jacob. The idyll of Ruth is cut from the same cloth: it is a domestic history, focused on the family and family relationships.

With the exodus and the monarchy the focus becomes more public, but even here the stories about national leaders seldom lose sight of the domestic lives of people. Moses is not only leader but also brother, husband and father in the epic of the exodus. The judges are not known to us as domestic figures; but David, filling roles of son, brother, husband and father, is a family man. Job's family history envelopes the story of his personal suffering; and the book of Proverbs is, from one point of view, a book of parental instruction for children.

By comparison, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] gives us fewer stories about families. But it does give us glimpses of families in miracles involving children, as well as in the domestic scene of Jesus' visits in the home of Mary, Martha and Lazarus. Family scenes are more plentiful in the book of Acts, where scenes of preaching, conversion and baptism sometimes include the family unit.

The Family as the Primal Human Unit. The physical family first appears in Scripture as God's provision for human companionship and generation. The first family, Adam and Eve, are the prototypical husband and wife, joined in marriage into "one flesh" (Gen 2:24). The perfection of that abbreviated family becomes contrasted to the predominantly negative story of a family at odds with itself when Adam and Eve begin to produce children (Gen 4).

More than any other book of the Bible, Genesis is the book of families, and several key motifs can be noted, each of which is woven into the rest of the Bible. Already in Genesis 5 we encounter the genre of the genealogy. Implicit in this ancient preoccupation is an important biblical and human image of the family—that of the generation or procreation of the human race. The family perpetuates the human race and provides continuity. The fact that genealogies are based on names suggests a further dimension of this generation: the way in which the family extends a person's physical life beyond his or her individual life span. The family is also an image of fertility as imaged by the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] (especially the patriarchal) motif of children and lineage as “seed.”

A second family motif in Genesis is the repeated picture of the family as the main social context within which people live their daily lives. Although individuals and families have dealings with the outside world, they are largely self-contained entities in the ancient world. We most naturally think of characters like Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Esau, and Joseph and his brothers in a family context. The family is thus an image of life at its primal social level, appropriate to the book of beginnings. The patriarchal families, moreover, represent the origin of the nation of Israel.

Thirdly, one cannot read the book of Genesis without a depressing awareness of what a deeply flawed institution the family is in a fallen world. The family stories of Genesis are stories of squabbling spouses, sibling rivals and deceitful children who have a tendency to thwart their parents' dreams for them. The book of Genesis is a virtual casebook of dysfunctional families.

Yet a final image of the family in Genesis provides a message of hope. The family is the unit through which God perpetuates his covenant. The first example is the story of Noah's family, as God calls Noah and his whole family into the ark to be preserved from the flood. Here, as often in Scripture, family means a whole clan or household, rather than the nuclear families common in many parts of the twentieth-century world. In OT [OT OT. Old Testament] times people lived primarily in patriarchal groups that grew as sons brought wives and children into the clan. Noah's family included his wife and his sons and their wives (Gen 6:18). God poured his saving grace on the whole family unit and established with them “a covenant for all generations to come” (Gen 9:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

From the beginning, then, Scripture establishes the family as the social unit into which God put human beings and the channel through which he deals with them. The family is an inherently ambivalent image of disappointment and struggle on the one hand, and of hope and blessing on the other. The family in Genesis is at once an image of security and protection, and of conflict and victimization.

The Family as Covenant Unit. The covenants of God with the patriarchs are stories of blessings to families and descendants, generation after generation. The channel is long. God promises Abraham that his offspring will be as numerous as the dust of the earth and that from the generations of his offspring will come great nations and kings (Gen 13:16; 17:5–6). Choosing to work in this large way, through generations of families, God carries out this work through the smallest details of conception and birth (Gen 17:21). Each divinely-ordered detail joins the larger flow of events that God shapes into human history, which moves along from one generation to the next. In the second of the Ten Commandments, God explains his dealings with people in these same generational terms, “punishing the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me, but showing love to a thousand generations of those who love me and keep my commandments” (Ex 20:5–6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

God worked through Abraham’s family as he promised: through the generations to King David and through more generations to Jesus Christ. In Jesus the channel narrowed to one brilliant point and then burst forward into a wide stream. Psalm 22 pictures the huge throng of people “from all the ends of the earth” who will finally worship God: “All the families of the nations will bow down before him” (Ps 22:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This picture of all the families of the nations worshiping the Christ is the glorious end toward which all the generations are moving.

In the meantime, in any particular generation somewhere between the beginning and the end, God consistently channels his grace and justice through family units, however large or small. For the first Passover in Egypt, for example, God told the Israelites to sacrifice one lamb for each family (Ex 12:3). Each household in Egypt was judged or passed over, according to the presence or absence of sacrificial blood on the door frame of the house. God sent his grace or judgment, family by family, as he visited Egypt that night.

When Rahab, the prostitute from Jericho, put her trust in Israel's God and hid the other spies, she saved not only her own life but also "her father and mother and brothers and all who belonged to her" (Josh 6:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Israelites later destroyed the city of Jericho but spared Rahab with her family. By contrast, we read in the very next chapter of Achan, who stole plunder for himself from Jericho. In a frightening example of God's response to unconfessed sin, the other Israelites stoned him and all his family. Thus justice came to Achan's whole family, whereas grace came to Rahab's whole family.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] as well we see God reaching into whole family units. Cornelius received a heavenly command to send for Peter, who would bring a message through which Cornelius and all his household would be saved (Acts 11:14). When Lydia opened her heart to Paul's preaching in Philippi, she "and the members of her household" were baptized (Acts 16:15). In Philippi as well, the jailer of Paul and Silas came to believe in God, "he and his whole family" (Acts 16:33), whereupon the whole household was immediately baptized.

Here then is a second biblical image of the family—not just a biological and social unit but the one through which God perpetuates his blessings and judgments. God does not limit himself to this channel, however. In fact, the biblical meaning of family comes to exceed its physical and social identity. Next to the physical family emerges a spiritual one.

The Human Family Redeemed. The Bible also gives us pictures of the family as a combined physical and spiritual institution in its ideal form. One dominant image is that of reconciliation and harmony. Malachi 4:6 provides the most evocative image: the Messiah “will turn the hearts of the fathers to their children, and the hearts of the children to their fathers” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Here is the antithesis of the images of family discord and fragmentation that seem to be the norm in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] narratives.

A second image is that of order. The family structure is not random but ordered. The “household codes” of duties in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] (Eph 5:22—6:4; Col 3:18—21) delineate the interdependent and complementary roles and obligations, with the husband/father as the head who loves his wife and children, the wife who submits to the headship of the husband/father and respects him, children who obey parental authority, and parents who train their children in the fear of God without exasperating them. To this can be added the detail from the requirements for eldership that an elder must be someone “whose children believe and are not open to the charge of being wild and disobedient” (Tit 1:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

A third image of the redeemed family is that of care and compassion for family members. Jesus castigated the Pharisees for not contributing to the support of their parents (Mt 15:4–6). Paul prescribed that children or grandchildren “put their religion into practice by caring for their own family and so repaying their parents and grandparents, for this is pleasing to God,” adding that “if anyone does not provide for his relatives, and especially for his immediate family, he has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever” (1 Tim 5:4, 8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Family as Metaphor for Spiritual Reality. The Jewish people took to heart God’s covenant with Abraham. They knew that they were in his family as it was continuing through the generations and that through this family all peoples of the earth would be blessed. When the blessing came in the form of Jesus, one of his first messages to God’s people was that they must look through the earthly family to see the heavenly one. “If you were Abraham’s children,” Jesus told the Jews, “then you would do the things Abraham did” (Jn 8:39 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In this passage Jesus points the Jews to the God who must be their Father, and to himself, the one who can show the way to that Father (Jn 8:42). He points to the one everlasting family—a spiritual family, the family of God.

To those who won’t “see through” the physical to the spiritual, Jesus’ message seems jolting. When his mother and brothers waited to see him, he asked, “Who is my mother, and who are my brothers?” His question implied the existence of a family far more lasting than the physical one. Pointing out his disciples as his family, Jesus explained: “Whoever does the will of my Father in heaven is my brother and sister and mother” (Mt 12:48–49 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The heavenly family is eternal, whereas the earthly one is temporary, a distinction that Jesus made clear. In fact, he predicted that he himself would turn “a man against his father, a daughter against her mother” (Mt 10:35) in households where conflict arises between those who belong to the eternal Father and those who do not. Primary commitment must go to the heavenly Father. Jesus continued, “Anyone who loves his father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; anyone who loves his son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me” (Mt 10:37 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The coming of Jesus makes the call much more concrete, but in effect this call to love God and be part of his family is the same call that came to Abraham, the father who loved God more than he loved his son Isaac. God made Abraham to be the physical father of many nations and at the same time the spiritual father of those who have faith like his in the heavenly father (Gal 3:7). The spiritual family of Abraham emerges more distinctly with the coming of Christ, who came from Abraham’s line, but who came to extend that line into all the world.

The writer of Hebrews develops Christ’s picture of his brotherhood with all believers, who belong to “the same family” with the one who “had to be made like his brothers in every way” in order to make perfect atonement for their sin (Heb 2:11, 17). The “family of believers” (Gal 6:10), or the “family of God” (1 Pet 4:17), becomes a familiar picture in NT [NT NT. New Testament] teaching. As Christ’s followers developed into the early Christian church, they saw themselves, Jew and Gentile, as “members of God’s household”—the extended family of God—through Christ’s reconciling death on the cross (Eph 2:19).

The Church as Metaphoric Family. Once we are alerted to the analogy between the family and the church, it becomes evident that the metaphor is worked out in detail. First, a family has a father. Each extended family or household had a patriarch, the oldest living male. Abraham, for example, was the father of Israel. A father was called the “head” of a family or a clan (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Chron 8 and 9). This head of the clan was the biological source for the family, and the one who took responsibility for the family and had authority over it. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] as well, the man is called the “head” (1 Cor 11:3; Eph 5:23). In each of these NT [NT NT. New Testament] passages, however, the social phenomenon of a family head is linked to a spiritual reality—the headship of Christ over the church.

Again, although the church is sometimes pictured as a bride (Rev 21:2), the more common image is that of children of a heavenly father. God is first called “Father” in Deuteronomy 1:31, as Moses recalls for the Israelites how God carried them in the desert “as a father carries his son.” Isaiah develops the image: “But you are our Father,” he tells God, even though his physical fathers among the Israelites have repudiated him (Is 63:16). When the child foretold in Isaiah 9 is called “Everlasting Father,” the way is clear for Christ to come and show God the Father to us in his own flesh. God appears as Father on almost every page of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . Jesus taught his disciples to pray first, “Our Father” (Mt 6:9). God is pictured in Scripture as both father and mother. “As a mother comforts her child,” he tells his people, “so will I comfort you” (Is 66:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The concept of God as parent communicates not only headship but loving care and comfort as well, as seen in Deuteronomy 1 and Isaiah 63, where the father carries and stays by his child. God says of his chosen people, “When Israel was a child, I loved him” (Hos 11:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

To be a child of God is to know this kind of support, not just from above but from fellow believers as well. Paul tells the Galatians to “do good to all people, especially to those who belong to the family of believers” (Gal 6:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). “God sets the lonely in families” (Ps 68:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])—not just in the care and comfort of human families but ultimately in the fellowship of the people of God. God’s family will be known, Jesus taught, by his followers’ love for one another (Jn 3:35).

Being part of God’s family means also to originate from him and to take his name. The tribes of Israel were named according to the fathers who began each biological line. Abraham’s physical offspring came from his physical seed and are called his children. But Paul explains in Galatians that the true seed to which Abraham’s family leads us is Jesus Christ (Gal 3:15–19): “If you belong to Christ, then you are Abraham’s seed” (Gal 3:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Believers receive Abraham’s family name and enter his line on their own through faith in Christ.

Paul speaks in Ephesians 3:14–15 of the Father God, “from whom his whole family in heaven and on earth derives its name” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The Greek word for family here is patria, implying clearly the father or patriarch as the originator of the family. For God’s family, the one and only originator is the heavenly Father who takes as his children all who accept his Son and who thereby take his name, his identity, his reputation. Ephesians 3:15 may also be translated “from whom every family in heaven and on earth derives its name.” God is the eternal Father, the ultimate origin of any family of any kind that could ever exist.

In view of the foregoing, when the writers of the epistles refer to their fellow believers as “brothers” and “sisters” in the Lord more than a hundred times, they are not simply using a decorative or emotionally compelling image. The physical family is not a concrete picture of an abstract idea; rather, it is one step toward an even greater reality. These writers are addressing fellow members of an eternally real spiritual family, whose origin is the ultimate reality, God. The family members are unified by the seed and blood of Christ. When the writer of Hebrews says, “Keep on loving each other as brothers” (Heb 13:1), he does not mean that Christians resemble brothers; he means that they participate in the true family of God and so must act accordingly.

To see Christians as members of God’s family is to see many other related pictures in Scripture. For example, Jesus told Nicodemus that he must be “born again” (Jn 3:3), and the NT [NT NT. New Testament] continues this way of describing our entrance into a new spiritual family (1 Pet 1:23; 1 Jn 3:9). Images of food relate as well, for people ordinarily take their sustenance within the household unit. So when Paul tells the Corinthians that they are ready only for milk, not solid food, he is speaking as a parent to infants of matters pertaining to the family (1 Cor 3:1–2). As “infants in Christ” the Corinthians are not spiritually mature and ready to take more complex instruction.

Adoption appears as another strand wound in with pictures of the family of God. Paul tells the Ephesian believers that God has “adopted” them “as sons through Jesus Christ” (Eph 1:5). Before this adoption a person is like an alien or slave, but an adopted child has been taken into the family of God (Gal 4:1–7). The family as an economic unit emerges in the picture of God’s children as “heirs of God and co-heirs with Christ” (Rom 8:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). As Scripture progresses, questions of the Israelites’ inheriting the Promised Land become less important than questions of the true children of Abraham inheriting eternal life and the kingdom of God (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mk 10:17; Lk 10:25; Col 1:12; Heb 9:15).

Summary. The Bible is a story about God's family from beginning to end. God made families in the first place partly as a biological and social basis for the human race and partly as the channel of his grace and judgment. God is also making for himself a family of sons and daughters who will serve him and praise him and reign with him in his kingdom forever (Rev 22:3–5).

See also Brother, Brotherhood; Child, Children; Daughter; Elder Child, Elder Sibling; Father, Fatherhood; Favored Child, Slighted Child; Home, House; Homecoming, Stories of; Husband; Mother, Motherhood; Sibling Rivalry; Sister; Son; Wife; Younger Child, Younger Sibling.

FAMINE

Most biblical references to famine are to literal famine. Periodically, throughout the Middle East, agricultural communities were victims of climatic variations that resulted in poor harvests and therefore in severe shortages of food for both people and animals (Gen 41:29–31; 2 Kings 4:38; Acts 11:28). Because of the unpredictability of these famines, the risk was a continuing reason for trusting God for his provision (Ps 33:18–19; 37:19). Part of God's ultimate blessing for Israel would be a land untroubled by famine (Ezek 34:29; 36:29–30).

Frequently famine conditions were local and contributed to the movement of those afflicted from country to country in their search for food (Gen 12:10; 41:57; Ruth 1:1; 2 Kings 8:1). This was the immediate reason for Israel's stay in Egypt, which culminated in their enslavement and the subsequent exodus (Gen 47:1–6). Famine could also prevail as the result of foreign invasion, or more particularly, siege (2 Kings 25:1—3; Jer 32:24; 52:6; Ezek 5:12, 16—17); and the severe shortages of food could lead to people taking desperate measures (2 Kings 6:24—29; Neh 5:1—3). Famines are also predicted as part of the chaotic conditions relating to the end-time tribulation (Mk 13:8; Rev 6:8; 18:8).

Although some biblical periods of famine carry no moral or spiritual implications, it was regarded as one of a number of divinely ordained scourges that God uses to punish both his people and others for their sins (Deut 32:24; 2 Sam 21:1; 1 Kings 17:1; Ps 105:16; Is 14:30; 51:19; Jer 11:22; 14:11—18; 24:10; 42:13—17). For Israel it is a curse particularly associated with breaking God's covenant (Deut 28). The conditions for relief are consequently tied in with the willingness of the people to repent and to seek the Lord (1 Kings 8:32—40; 2 Chron 20:8—9). In Job's case, Eliphaz argued this principle in reverse, implying that Job's sufferings were the result of his unconfessed sins. Job had only to put matters right and he would enjoy God's blessing once again (Job 5:20, 22). In certain circumstances, however, God's judgment was irreversible (Ezek 14:12—14).

Figurative references to famine are few, although there are many relating to hunger and to thirst. Amos predicted "a famine of hearing the words of the Lord" (Amos 8:11—14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) when part of God's judgment on his people would be the withdrawal of his word through his prophets. People would be eager to hear the message, but it would be too late. Those particularly affected would be young people, possibly because while their elders had heard God's word and had rejected it, the next generation had never had that opportunity.

Famine also plays its part in the background to Jesus' parable of the prodigal son. It was when he had foolishly spent his inheritance that famine struck the land where he was living, reducing him to the meanest conditions. At this point he came to his senses and began on the long road back to his father (Lk 15:14—20). While it would be wrong to invest every detail of the parable with spiritual significance, Jesus is certainly implying here that it is only as we come to an awareness of our spiritual need that we will be prepared to consider repentance.

Because of its extreme nature, famine, along with trouble, hardship, persecution, nakedness, danger and sword, is regarded as one of the worst troubles that this world can throw at us. As such it stands in sharp relief to the constant love of Christ from which nothing can separate Christian believers (Rom 8:35).

See also Abundance; Curse; Dry, Drought; Farming; Food; Harvest; Land of Milk and Honey.

FAR

At its most basic, the term far is a spatial image denoting relative distance. Something far is remote or distant. The hundred or so biblical usages that fall into this category are largely neutral in association, simply identifying the location of something. The image becomes symbolic when a person's remaining at a distance from something is a sign of fear (Mt 26:58; Lk 23:49) or awe, either before God himself (Ex 20:18), before an act of judgment (Rev 18:10, 15) or before mystery (Eccles 7:24, Jer 23:23). In addition to being a spatial image, the motif can refer to time, either past (Is 45:21) or future (Dan 8:26).

It is when we move from the spatial level to metaphoric and spiritual uses that the biblical imagery of being "far" assumes its true profundity. At a metaphoric level, being far from something is used in the Bible to symbolize a sense of separation or loss, as when the psalmist appeals to God not to be far away (Ps 10:1; 22:19) or complains that his friends are far off (Ps 38:11). Isaiah complains that righteousness and truth are “far from us” (Is 59:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 59:14). In contrast, God assures Israel that “I bring near my deliverance, it is not far off” (Is 46:13, cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 30:11–14).

In the context of God’s covenant with Israel, distance takes on a spiritual significance. Israel, Jerusalem and specifically the temple, are “the place ... which the Lord your God chooses, to set his name there” (Deut 14:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The Gentile nations live “at a distance” or “far off” (Deut 29:22; Jer 9:26; Acts 2:39; 22:21), in contrast to Israel who has been brought near (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 19:4).

This notion of physical/spiritual distance from God is then developed in several ways. Being far from God is a symbol of rebellion: “This people draw near with their mouth and honor me with their lips, while their hearts are far from me” (Is 29:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] , cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 7:6). They are physically located in the place of worship, but their hearts are still far off. We meet the same sense that rebellion means going “far away” in Isaiah 57:9 and Ezekiel 23:40, and of course in the evocative “far country” to which the rebellious younger son travels in the parable of the lost son (Lk 15:13). To be far off can also signal being removed from God’s blessing (Lk 16:23).

But the reversal of being far from God becomes one of the Bible’s most endearing images of redemption, as God promises to “save you from afar” (Jer 30:10). Here the image of return comes into play, as in the picture of the prodigal who resolves to return to his father, who sees him “while he is yet a distance” and runs to him (Lk 15:20). God promises to address those who are far off (Is 33:13) and show his glory “to the coastlands afar off” (Is 66:19) and to draw the distant Gentiles to himself (1 Kings 8:41; Zech 6:15). This is what excited Paul as he wrote to the Gentile Ephesians: “But now in Christ Jesus you who once were far off have been brought near in the blood of Christ” (Eph 2:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Near, Drawing Near; Sacred Space.

FAREWELL DISCOURSE

A farewell discourse in the Bible is an address given by a prophetic leader to his followers at or close to the occasion of his death, exhorting them regarding their conduct in the future and prophesying what that future will involve. The genre was described by E. Stauffer in an appendix to his New Testament Theology (1955 [1941]), who identified the most noteworthy characteristics as (1) a summoning of followers, (2) an announcement of the approaching departure of the patriarch or prophet, (3) a theological review of history, (4) exhortations to remain faithful, (5) revelations about the future, (6) warnings against false teachers, (7) predictions of woes and controversies, (8) words of comfort and promise, (9) prayers and blessings for those left behind, (10) appointment of a successor or successors, and (11) worship or prayer. In addition to these we could note that in many farewell discourses the speaker asserts his own integrity and puts himself forward as an example to his followers. Nowhere do all these elements appear, but many texts have several of them.

The initial paradigmatic farewell discourse in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is Jacob’s farewell in Genesis 48–49. Jacob summons Joseph and makes him promise to bury him with his fathers. He worships, reviews the history of God’s dealing with his family, blesses his progeny, prophesies regarding his descendants, predicts conflicts and gives instructions about their future.

Much of Jacob's discourse is echoed in Moses' farewell blessing in Deuteronomy 31—33, especially the blessing of the tribes in chapter 33. But there is also a summoning of Israel, Moses' prediction of his imminent death, the commissioning of Joshua, a historical review of the covenant faithfulness of God (esp. [esp. esp.. especially] in the song in chap. 32), exhortations to remain faithful and predictions of failure and disaster.

Joshua's farewell in Joshua 23—24 also begins with a summoning of Israel and a statement of his approaching death, but it develops more the hortatory aspect, with historical review as a means of reinforcing the exhortation. Here too are some implied predictions, particularly about how the survivors of the previous occupants of the land will become "snares and traps for you" (Josh 23:13).¹ Samuel 12 is Samuel's farewell address, in which he asserts his integrity, reviews history, exhorts the people to remain faithful and predicts punishment if they do not. However, Samuel does not predict his death, which does not occur until some time later. Other OT [OT OT. Old Testament] examples are Joshua's farewell to Israel (Josh 22—24) and David's last words to his people (1 Chron 28—29).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the pattern is preserved, though somewhat modified. In particular, the principal danger is no longer from pagans and their false gods living in the same land but from heretics living in the same church and their false teachings. So the warnings are now directed specifically against false doctrine. Such warnings are the most consistent feature of NT [NT NT. New Testament] farewell addresses.

Perhaps the best example is Paul's farewell to the Ephesian elders (Acts 20:17—38). Paul summons the elders to Miletus, declares his integrity, predicts his and their future ordeals and the fact that he will not see them again, exhorts them to keep watch over themselves and the flock, warns them against false teachers who will come, and prays with them.

Other farewell discourses are evident in some of the epistles. 2 Timothy clearly bears the marks of a farewell discourse. We can note the expectation of an imminent departure (2 Tim 4:6), assertions of integrity (2 Tim 1:3–12), exhortations to remain faithful (2 Tim 1:13–14; 3:14–17), warnings against false teachers (2 Tim 2:16–18; 3:6–9), predictions of tribulations and testing for the church (2 Tim 3:1–9), and even some historical review (2 Tim 1:5; 2:8–13; 3:10–11). 2 Peter also has these characteristics.

Of course the central figure of the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is Jesus, and some discourses of Jesus have the character of a farewell address. In John 13–17 Jesus predicts his departure and prepares his disciples for the future. In addition to the usual elements, such as the awareness of imminent death (Jn 13:1), revelations about the future (Jn 14:29), warnings about future testing (Jn 15:20–21), exhortations to keep the master's words (Jn 14:21–23), promises of comfort (Jn 14:1) and prayer and blessing (Jn 17), there is a foot washing (Jn 13) and a command to love one another (Jn 13:34).

In the Synoptics, Jesus' comments immediately prior to his ascension bear a few of these characteristics but probably ought not to be regarded as farewell discourses. However, the Olivet Discourse (Mt 24–25; Mk 13; Lk 19) appears to be a farewell address. The focus on the predictions of disaster, warnings against false teachers, exhortations not to be deceived but to be alert and predictions of the future of God's people show it to be of this genre.

Note can be made, finally, of a genre of farewell stories that may omit the formal farewell discourse but have the same flavor and emotional effect. Moments of parting fill our memories from the pages of the Bible: Rebekah's parting from her family amid their wishes for her (Gen 24:59–61), Jacob and his mother weeping at his parting (Gen 28:2–5), Moses' father-in-law leaving him after a visit in the wilderness (Ex 18:27), Elijah's departure from Elisha (2 Kings 2:1–12). Even the benedictions in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Epistles have the quality of a farewell.

See also Blessing; Homecoming, Stories of; Journey.

Bibliography. E. Stauffer, New Testament Theology (London: SCM Press, 1955).

FARMING

From the beginning of the Bible nearly to its end, we move in a predominantly rural and agrarian world of field and vineyard, cattle and herds, sowing and reaping. Although cities existed in the world of the Bible, the majority of the people were directly dependent on the land for their livelihood.

Even a king like Saul and a prophet like Elisha are summoned to their calling while plowing in the field, the latter with a whopping twelve yoke of oxen (1 Sam 11:5; 1 Kings 19:19). When a king covets something, it turns out to be a neighbor's vineyard (1 Kings 21:1–16). When drought strikes, the king responds by going in search of water and grass for his horses and mules (1 Kings 18:5). When Samuel tries to dissuade the Israelites from taking a king, his warning is slanted toward a nation of farmers: "He will take the best of your fields and vineyards and olive orchards and give them to his servants. He will take the tenth of your grain and of your vineyards and give it to his officers and to his servants. He will take ... the best of your cattle and ... the tenth of your flocks" (1 Sam 8:14–17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When a foreign invader wants to entice a farming culture to surrender, his threat is posed in agrarian terms: “Make your peace with me and come out to me; then every one of you will eat of his own vine, and every one of his own fig tree ... until I come and take you away to a land like your own land, a land of grain and wine, a land of bread and vineyards, a land of olive trees and honey” (2 Kings 18:31–32 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The romance of farming is evident in the story of Ruth and the pastoral love lyrics of the Song of Songs. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Jesus’ parables are saturated with references to farming-workers in a vineyard, lost sheep, a rich farmer who rebuilds his barns, seeds growing secretly, sowing and reaping, wheat and weeds.

While it might be true that people living in ancient Palestine would inevitably turn to farming for their livelihood, we can also link the prominence of farming in the Bible to broader theological themes of land and promise. God’s covenant with Abraham and his descendants included the promise of a land, and as the nation of Israel headed toward settlement in Canaan, a “land of milk and honey,”* the blessings God promised took on a strongly agrarian content. It seems plausible to conclude that the prominent OT [OT OT. Old Testament] interest in farming occurs against a backdrop of the covenant promises of God.

The prominence of farming in the ancient world is also attested by military practices. To deliver a death blow to an enemy, a conqueror would sometimes raze a city and then sow salt on it (Judg 9:45; Jer 48:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). This was an action designed to bring agricultural death to a region, inasmuch as saline soil is lifeless and unproductive (Ps 107:34).

On a broad definition of farming as livelihood from plants and animals, the biblical references encompass both nomadic and settled types of farming, with shepherding the dominant activity of the former and cultivation of crops of the latter. Four main types of farming can be discerned in the Bible: grain farming, growing vineyards, cultivating olive orchards and raising livestock. Habakkuk 3:17 hints at the range of farming activities with its mention of fig tree, vines, olives, fields, flocks and herds. The prophet Amos, who identifies himself as a herdsman and dresser of sycamore trees, likewise covers the territory, with references to sheep, cows, summer fruit, vineyard, grapes, gardens and sowing seed.

A few facts about agriculture in ancient Palestine will help to explain references in the Bible. Farmers did not live on the plots of land that they tended; instead they resided by night in villages and towns, going out to their fields as the season required. A degree of tension existed between nomadic shepherding and more sedentary agriculture (see especially the story of Cain and Abel, Gen 4:2–5). Cultivated fields and orchards were often located near sources of water, and even summer dew was helpful to plants in the arid climate of Palestine. Crops fell into two main categories—grains (with barley and wheat the most common) and food crops (including vegetables, fruits, grapes and olives). The main obstacles with which farmers contended were drought, weeds, invasions of locusts and other pests, inhospitable terrain or rocky soil, and invading armies during harvest time (Judg 6:2–4). In a climate where summer is a six-month drought, crops depended on “early rains” during late November and December, and “latter rains” that brought crops to fruition in March and April.

A good index to the feelings awakened by farming in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] is the alluring pictures of the Promised Land and the poets’ pictures of the good life in the psalms. The most evocative picture of the land to which the descendants of Jacob were headed when they left Egypt was its designation as “a good and broad land, a land flowing with milk and honey” (Ex 3:8, 17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Whereas in literature generally, farming is viewed as the antithesis of the city, in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] it is contrasted with the wilderness. Thus Moses follows up his reminder of the wilderness wanderings with the comment that “God is bringing you into a good land, ... a land of wheat and barley, of vines and fig trees and pomegranates, a land of olive trees and honey” (Deut 8:1—9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, the proof of the land’s desirability that the twelve spies brought back was agricultural proof—a gigantic cluster of grapes, along with pomegranates and figs (Num 13:23). The psalms are obviously the product of a nation of farmers and are replete with pictures of weather, land and livestock that only a farmer knows (Ps 65:9—13; 104:13—16; 107:37—38; 144:12—14). So are some of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] proverbs, which take their place in the ancient literature of farming known as the “eclogue” (Prov 24:30—31; 27:23—27; 28:19).

The Mosaic laws confirm the agrarian status of Hebrew society. The system of religious festivals was largely built around harvest times—the Passover at the beginning of barley harvest in early spring, the Feast of Weeks at the end of the wheat harvest in late spring and the Feast of Tabernacles at the end of the fall harvest of grain and fruits. Moses’ list of blessings for obedience to God and curses for disobedience is a largely agricultural vision (Deut 28—29). Incidental laws likewise presuppose a farming milieu, with stipulations about returning a neighbor’s stray ox or sheep (Deut 11:1—2, 4), about the sowing of grain (Deut 11:9—10) and its reaping (Deut 24:19—21; 25:4), about not coveting a neighbor’s ox or donkey (Ex 20:17). The requirement that land lie fallow during the year of Jubilee was an early system for land conservation as well as a sacrifice (Lev 25:8–12). It would not be misleading to say that in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] farming is a chief arena within which people make their moral and spiritual choices.

The cycle of life for farmers is set by the vegetative seasons. The key points are sowing or planting, cultivation (including watering and pruning) and harvest or reaping, and the Bible is filled with references to all three. Although we rightly think of the early Hebrews as partly nomadic, it is significant that from the beginning the calendar was based on a farming cycle (with emphasis on harvest). A helpful way to grasp biblical images of farming is to relate them to the natural cycle of the farmer's year, and it should be noted in advance that figurative uses of the phases of farming are closely linked with the physical cycle.

Egyptian farmers plowing and sowing seed.

Plowing and Planting. It is crucial in farming to prepare the soil properly. Anyone who fails to do this cannot expect a harvest (Prov 20:4). The chief means of soil preparation is plowing (also called “tilling” in the English Bible). Plowing or tilling is so central to the agricultural process that sometimes a biblical farmer is called simply a tiller (“worker” in the original Hebrew) of the soil; examples include Adam (Gen 2:15), Cain (Gen 4:2) and Noah (Gen 9:20). Plowing and harvest are paired as together constituting the essentials of farming (Gen 45:6) and as a time of visible industry when one might be tempted to work on the sabbath but is forbidden to do so (Ex 34:21).

Plowing is a rich source of metaphor in the Bible. We read about plowing iniquity (Job 4:8; Hos 10:13) and about oppressors who plow upon the back of a victim and make long furrows (Ps 129:3). When Samson's bride divulges his secret to her compatriots, Samson speaks of them as having "plowed with my heifer" (Judg 14:18). Other usages include references to breaking up of fallow ground for overcoming hardness of heart (Jer 4:3) and, in Jesus' well-known parable, fixing one's gaze on the plowing to be done for single-minded dedication to the work of the kingdom (Lk 9:62).

The imagery of plowing is important in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] eschatological visions. The time will come when Israel will no longer have to go out to war in defense of her land but will be able to turn "swords into plowshares" (Is 2:4; Joel 3:10; Mic 4:3). Elsewhere the future is pictured as a time when there will be no need to work the fields, either because others will look after this (Is 61:5—7) or because such will be the richness of God's blessing that the harvest will overtake and precede the planting (Amos 9:13)! The connotations become negative in the oracles of judgment. God's judgment against Judah is pictured as the doom of perpetual plowing without harvest (Hos 10:11). There are also references to Zion being "plowed as a field," equated in parallelism with Jerusalem becoming "a heap of ruins" (Mic 3:12; Jer 26:18).

Planting and sowing belong with plowing as the activities that initiate the agricultural process. Along with plowing, they are an image of hope and industry. A survey of the well over a hundred biblical references is a virtual catalog of farming practices, as we hear about the sowing of grain fields and the planting of gardens, trees, vineyards, and olive groves. This is part of the Bible's picture of the good life. The psalmist pictures God's blessing in terms of people's sowing fields, planting vineyards and getting a fruitful yield (Ps 107:37). In Isaiah's golden-age vision of Israel restored, the people "shall plant vineyards and eat their fruit” (Is 65:21; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 29:5; Amos 9:14).

Figurative uses abound (see Sow, Sowing, Sower). Emotional experience is in view in the comment about sowing in tears and reaping in joy (Ps 126:5), and moral experience in references to sowing iniquity (Prov 22:8; Job 4:8; Gal 6:7–9). The righteous are said to be planted in the house of God (Ps 92:12–13; Jer 17:8). Children are like olive shoots around the table (Ps 128:3). Israel is repeatedly pictured as a vineyard planted by God (Ps 80:8–11; Is 5:1–4; Jer 2:21).

Tending the Crops. Not much could be done in ancient Palestine to nurture the crops that had been planted. The grain fields, vineyards and orchards awaited the rains that would enable them to grow. James gives us the picture of the farmer who “waits for the precious fruit of the earth, being patient over it until it receives the early and the late rain” as an example of patience (Jas 5:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The biblical writers spring a surprise on us by treating God as a cosmic gardener who tends the trees and crops and who waters and nurtures the plants and animals of the earth (Ps 104:10–18; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 26:3–4; Is 27:3). The water that God sends is drenching or light as soil conditions require (Ps 65:9–10). In the eschaton the showers will be abundant, as will be the harvest that comes from them (Joel 2:23–26; Mal 3:10). In some passages Israel herself is pictured as God’s flourishing grain and blossoming vine (Hos 14:7; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 37:30–31).

Pruning is the other main task of cultivation, and again the most evocative examples are ascribed to God. Sometimes God’s pruning is a picture of judgment against evil (Is 18:5–6). But in Jesus’ parable of the vine and vine dresser, pruning is a picture of good farming practices—an image of nurturing for the benefit of the vineyard and the increase of its harvest (Jn 15:1–6). Addressing the urban dwellers at Rome, Paul uses some of the finer points of olive tree cultivation in developing an analogy of how God saves the Jews and Gentiles (Rom 11:17–24).

Harvest. The rhythm of farming is the cycle of “seedtime and harvest” (Gen 8:22). Plowing and planting represent hope; harvest represents fruition and reward. The one is a picture of risk, the other of security. The main biblical images of harvest are the ingathering of grain or fruit, threshing, the winepress and the storehouse. References to harvesting are virtually all positive (but see Hos 6:11, for an exception), and reaping is a uniformly positive image. But such specific images of harvesting as threshing, winnowing and treading are images of judgment.

As is true of other phases of the farming process, the literal images of harvest provide a rich repository of symbolism for biblical writers. The most important of these are the use of harvest to picture God’s final judgment against evil (Joel 3:13; Mt 13:30; Rev 14:17–20) and the ingathering of persons in salvation (Mt 9:37–38; Mk 4:29; Lk 10:2; Jn 4:35; Rev 14:14–16).

See also Animals; Barn; Calf; Cattle; Donkey, Ass; Dry, Drought; Famine; Flock; Fruit, Fruitfulness; Garden; Glean; Goat; Grafting; Grain; Grapes; Harvest; herds; Land; Land Flowing with Milk and Honey; Nature; Ox, Oxen; Pasture; Plants; Pruning; Seed; Sheep, Shepherd; Storehouse; Threshing, Threshing Floor; Vine, Vineyard; Wheat; Winepress.

Bibliography. O. Borowski, “Agriculture,” ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 1:95–98; J. A. Thompson, Handbook of Life in Bible Times (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1986).

FASTING

In modern society fasting is seen primarily as a means of protest or threat of self-destruction to put the pressure on higher authorities in order to attain the benefits or claims of the people involved. In other words, it is political in its character. Mahatma Gandhi of India during his fight against British rule, Young Sam Kim of Korea in his protest against the military dictatorship and the comedian Dick Gregory in his struggle against the violation of the civil rights of Native Americans exemplify this.

In the biblical context, however, fasting carries a different meaning. It is not a way of asserting one's will but a means of opening oneself to the work of God, expressing profound grief over sin and pointing to one's ultimate dependence on God for all forms of sustenance. Fasting is the act of abstaining from food for spiritual reasons and primarily connotes an openness to divinity and a posture of humility. It involves prayer, grief, penance, seeking guidance and piety. But fasting was widely abused, so it can also carry the imagery of hypocrisy and religious display (Is 58; Mt 6).

One of the most familiar examples of fasting in the Bible is Jesus' fasting for forty days in the wilderness in order to prepare for his ministry (Mt 4:2). This is obviously the antitype of Moses' fasting for forty days on Mount Sinai in order to receive the law and guidance in the wilderness (Ex 34:28; Deut 9:9). Jehoshaphat proclaims a fast throughout all Judah to seek the Lord when the sons of Moab and Ammon come to make war against him (2 Chron 20:3). While the church of Antioch fasts and prays (Acts 13:3—4), they are commanded by the Holy Spirit to send Paul and Barnabas as missionaries. Fasting and prayer are frequently associated with people seeking and preparing themselves for divine communications. Through fasting, they can devote themselves to communion with God.

Fasting bears the imagery of grief. When Saul and Jonathan are killed on the battlefield, the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead bury their bones and fast seven days (1 Sam 31:13). David mourns and weeps and fasts when he hears of the deaths of Saul, Jonathan and Abner (2 Sam 1:12; 3:36). Nehemiah fasts at the news of the fall of Jerusalem (Neh 1:4). When Haman issues the edict to kill the people of Mordecai, the Jews fast, weep and wail for their destiny (Esther 4:3). Fasting is associated with sincere grief and mourning, particularly with the death of the beloved, a sudden calamity and threat of death. It is an expression of deep sorrow and anger.

Fasting carries the imagery of penitence (see Repentance). For example, Ahab, the king of Israel, fasts at Elijah's threat to destroy his household for having taken Naboth's vineyard (1 Kings 21:27). He tears his clothes, puts on sackcloth and goes about despondently. Ahab humbles himself before the Lord and seeks his mercy. The Lord sees this and withdraws the evil he had proclaimed against him (v. 29). Israel as a corporate group fasts on the occasion of repentance. Particularly on the Day of Atonement, the people of Israel are commanded to fast in repentance (Lev 16:29, 31; 23:27, 29, 32). At the time of Nehemiah the people of Israel assemble in sackcloth with dirt on them and fast. They confess their sins and the iniquities of their fathers (Neh 9:1-3; 1 Sam 7:6; 2 Sam 12:16). Fasting is practiced during the course of repentance of sins as a symbol of humility and as a means of seeking the mercy of the Lord.

Fasting is used as a means of piety. The psalmist confesses that he humbled his soul with fasting (Ps 35:13) and that when he wept in his soul with fasting, he was publicly insulted (Ps 69:10). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Anna, a prophetess and a widow to the age of eighty-four, never leaves the temple, serving night and day with fasting and prayer (Lk 2:37). The disciples of John the Baptist and the Pharisees fast regularly. Particularly, the Pharisees are reported to fast twice a week (Lk 18:12; see extrabiblical sources Didache; 8:1; Psalms of Solomon 3:8). Fasting is conducted for the sake of personal piety and spiritual discipline.

The imagery of piety goes together with fasting; however, fasting also bears the opposite imagery, that of hypocrisy. Isaiah 58:3–6 shows that the fasting of the Israelites as a religious devotion does not match their behavior toward their neighbors. They do evil in the sight of the Lord even during the period of fasting. They only fast to display their godliness to men and gain their admiration. They do not do it for the glory of God. Therefore the Lord proclaims that he will not accept them (Jer 14:2). The same phenomenon can be observed in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . The Pharisees disfigure their faces in order that their fasting may be seen by men and are exposed for their hypocrisy by Jesus, who advises them to anoint their heads and wash their faces so that their piety and devotion might be directed only to God (Mt 6:16–17). Fasting itself is not condemned, but if it is conducted as a means of seeking self-glory, it is an image of hypocrisy.

Generally, fasting does not carry positive and bright imagery. The Hebrew expression for fasting, “afflicting the soul,” fits well with the imagery of disfiguring the face, weeping, lying on the ground, putting ashes on the head and putting on sackcloth.

See also Ashes; Food; Grief; Mourning; Prayer; Weeping.

Bibliography. S. Lowy, “The motivation of Fasting in Talmudic Literature” JJS [JJS JJS. Journal of Jewish Studies] 9 (1958) 19–38; E. Wetermarck, “The Principle of Fasting,” Folklore 18 (1907) 391–422.

FAT, FATNESS

In a fat-phobic society it is hard to imagine fat and fatness as conveying anything other than sloth, laziness, disgust and even loathing. Yet when we turn to Scripture, we find fat and fatness used repeatedly to represent prosperity, blessing, abundance and bounty.

Fat and fatness appear almost exclusively in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , with the exceptions of the fatted calf of Luke 15 (where it is clearly a symbol of lavish generosity) and Romans 11:17 (where in the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] Paul speaks of our grafting into the olive tree to partake of “the root and fatness”). Within the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , images of fat and fatness can be carefully nuanced in several different ways. For our purposes, however, it will do to break these down into two general categories: as images of God-given or of ill-gotten prosperity.

First, fat and fatness are repeatedly used as a straightforward image of God’s blessing. In Genesis 27:28 Isaac blesses Jacob, saying, “May God give you of the dew of heaven, and of the fatness of the earth, and plenty of grain and wine” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In verse 39 Esau is told that his home will be “away from the fatness of the earth.” We find this use of fat and fatness in several passages (Job 36:16; Ps 36:8; 63:5; 65:11; 92:15; Is 30:23; Jer 31:14; and others). In some of these passages, modern translations avoid the literal use of fat and fatness, substituting other images of prosperity, but the KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] reads “fat” or “fatness” in them all.

We should be aware that often fat and fatness denote the best part of a gift or sacrifice. In Genesis 4:4 Abel’s sacrifice is described as the “fat portions” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In Genesis 45:18 Pharaoh gives Israel Goshen, where they can live off of “the fat of the land.” In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] cult, described thoroughly in Leviticus, “All fat is the Lord’s” (Lev 3:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) precisely because it represents the best part of the sacrifice.

Another way to understand how fat and fatness are images of blessing is to examine how they are contrasted to leanness, especially in Psalm 106:15 where the psalmist, speaking of Israel’s sin in the wilderness, says, “And he gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)] ; see also Num 13:20; Is 10:16; 17:4; 24:16). Two other places where fat is used to indicate blessing are Genesis 41, where Pharaoh describes his dream of the lean and fat cows (see Joseph’s interpretation, vv. 25–32), and the occurrences of fat and fatness in Proverbs (Prov 11:25; 13:4; 15:30; 28:25).

However, fat and fatness do not get only favorable press. Both Deuteronomy 31:20 and 32:15 seem to link Israel’s growing fat on the Lord’s blessings to their turning away. Nehemiah 9:25, part of Ezra’s confession, also gives this impression. This prepares us for the second general usage of fat and fatness, that of ill-gotten prosperity.

The supreme image of this kind of fatness is Eglon, who is introduced to us in Judges 3:17. No doubt his fatness has been gained by exploiting the Israelites (among others). Eglon’s name is based on the root word for “calf,” and the incipient symbolism of the story includes the image of Eglon as the fat calf being readied for slaughter. The Bible’s condemnation of abusive fatness is not limited to foreign powers preying on Israel, however. In fact, the great majority of negative uses of the image involve the leaders and people of Israel (1 Sam 15:22; Job 15:27; Ps 17:10; 73:7; 119:70; Is 1:11; 6:10; 34:6; Jer 5:28; Eze 34:3ff; 39:19; 44:15).

Fat and fatness, then, can be used either to show God's blessings showered in abundance upon the earth, or the misuse of these same blessings by the complacent, greedy and wicked.

See also Abundance; Blessing; Eating; Famine; Prosperity.

FATHER, FATHERHOOD

To trace the image of the father through the Bible is to see the general outlines of biblical theology in microcosm. The major chapters in the story are (1) fatherhood as an ideal created for good by God himself, (2) the failure of reality in a fallen world to match the ideal and (3) God as the perfect father who alone can redeem the failure. With nearly a thousand uses of the explicit vocabulary of fatherhood in English translations, the image of the father is a major biblical archetype. Yet we should note at the outset that we find no extended teaching about being a human father or well-developed pictures of a father's relationship to his children. Furthermore, we do not find many good fathers in the Bible; in fact, it is difficult to think of a human father who functions well over the course of his lifetime.

The absence of fully developed pictures of fatherhood does not mean that the Bible fails to give us a memorable gallery of fathers. Men we remember at least partly as fathers include Adam, Noah, Abraham, Lot, Jacob, Isaac, Manoah, Eli, David, Solomon, Job and Joseph the father of Jesus. In addition, unnamed fathers are important in the Psalms and Proverbs.

The Ideal Father. For the ideal father we are largely left with the commands that the Bible gives to fathers. We do not actually have pictures of fathers who live up to those commands very thoroughly. To begin, we can infer from the emphasis in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] on the fathers as clan leaders through whom genealogies are traced and about whom most biographies are written that fathers are the heads of their families. We find dozens of references to “father’s house” as a way of designating the parental home or place of origin. While religious instruction is a joint responsibility of both parents, in the Bible it is more the domain of fathers than of mothers (Prov 1:8; 4:1; 6:20; 13:1; 15:5; 27:10). The psalmist writes of how “our fathers have told us” of God’s past deeds (Ps 44:1; 78:3) in fulfillment of Moses’ command in his farewell discourse to “remember the days of old ... ask your father, and he will show you” (Deut 32:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Fathers simply held a position of authority in ancient cultures that is quite foreign to most modern ones.

We are also given a sense of the dignity and worth that biblical cultures attach to a father’s role. Psalm 127:4–5 is the key passage, with its comparison of a father’s children to arrows and its declaration that “happy is the man who has his quiver full of them,” and its picture of the strength and honor that come to a father of sons “when he speaks with his enemies in the gate” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The ideal for a father is to have a wife “like a fruitful vine” within his house, to have children “like olive shoots” around the table and to see one’s “children’s children” (Ps 128:3–4, 6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A good father takes responsibility for the spiritual welfare of his family. Job offers sacrifices on behalf of his children (Job 1:5); Joshua and his household serve the Lord (Josh 24:15). Both Deuteronomy 6:4–9 and Proverbs (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1:8: “Listen, my son, to your father’s instruction”) portray fathers as teachers. Nor does a good father neglect the physical welfare of his children. The good fathers we encounter in the Gospels look to Jesus for their children's needs, especially physical ones (Mt 17:14—18; Lk 8:40—56; Jn 4:43—54). It would be unthinkable for such a father to give his children stones or snakes (Mt 7:9—11).

The apostle Paul may have been a bachelor, but he seems to have understood what sonship and fatherhood are all about. He invariably opens his letters with a blessing “from God our Father” (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Cor 1:3; Eph 1:2). He also serves as a father to Timothy (1 Tim 1:2) and Titus (Titus 1:4), his *“sons” in the Christian faith (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Thess 2:11).

Fatherly Failures. Adam was the father of the human race. The legacy he left his children is original sin (Rom 5:12—14). One result of that unhappy inheritance is that most biblical fathers are failures. David is a premier illustration of an inattentive father who refuses to protect his daughter Tamar, to discipline his son Amnon or to be completely reconciled to his other son, Absalom (2 Sam 13). David is preceded by Eli (1 Sam 3:10—14), whose sons scandalize both the Israelites and God himself.

Some fathers love not wisely, but too well. Abraham favors Isaac over Ishmael (Gen 21). Isaac in turn dotes on Esau rather than Jacob (Gen 25:28). When Isaac becomes the stooge in Jacob's gambit to steal the birthright (Gen 27:1—40), he gets as much as he deserved. Jacob repeats the sin of his father by loving Joseph more than all his other sons (Gen 37:3—4). His favoritism brings envy, hatred, treachery and bereavement to the family. Eli loves his sons more than he loves God (1 Sam 2:29), and their deaths are a reproach to him for his sin (v. 34; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 4:11). David rules over a family broken by incest and fratricide (2 Sam 13). If only he had disciplined Absalom as strenuously as he later grieved for him!

Other fathers fail to protect their children from secular influences. Although Lot takes his daughters out of Sodom, he does so too late to keep the impulse toward sexual perversion from them (Gen 19:31–36). Achan traffics in stolen foreign merchandise, and his sins are visited upon his children (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 20:5), with the whole family dying because of his spiritual neglect (Josh 7).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] exhortation to fathers not to “provoke your children to anger, but bring them up in the discipline and instruction of the Lord” (Eph 6:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Col 3:21) hints at the spectacle of the tyrannical father (see Tyrannical Husband, Father). Perhaps the clearest biblical example of the exasperating father is King Saul, whose volatile temper frightens both his children and their best friends (1 Sam 19–20).

We also find the inept, bumbling father of popular literature in the Bible. Sometimes we find moments in which fathers seem to be incapable of any better response than passive anger while events transpire that are contrary to their will. Examples include Abraham’s dismay at sending Hagar away with Ishmael, whom he had sired in a bad decision (Gen 21:8–11), Jacob’s disapproval of events surrounding the rape of Dinah and the revenge that his sons exact for it (Gen 34:5–7, 30) and David’s anger regarding his son’s rape of his daughter Tamar (2 Sam 13:21). Other bumbling fathers are easily deceived by their children: Lot (Gen 19:30–38), Isaac (Gen 27) and Jacob (Gen 37:31–35). David mismanages his grief over the death of his son Absalom (2 Sam 18:33–19:8); Noah becomes a shameful spectacle to his sons as he lies naked in his tent in a drunken stupor (Gen 9:20–25); Jephthah makes a rash vow that dooms his daughter to perpetual virginity (Judg 11); Samson’s father allows Samson to order him around as though he were the child rather than the parent (Judg 14).

Against this backdrop of the failure of fathers stands the image of God the Father, who exemplifies all those characteristics that the flesh-and-blood fathers lack: patience, kindness, firmness, attention. In fact, our very disgust with the failures of fathers stems from our intuitive understanding of what a true father should be, so that the negative character type inevitably brings with it, as a shadow entity, the positive.

God as the Perfect Father. The litany of paternal failure serves as a reminder that only one father is good: God the Father. However the patriarchs may have felt about their fathers, they each came to understand that the God of their fathers could be trusted. He is the “one Father” over all his children (Mal 2:10; Mt 23:9; 1 Cor 8:6; Eph 4:6). God is a loving Father who has compassion on all his children (Ps 103:13). He created them (Deut 32:6); he carries them in his arms (Deut 1:31); he provides what they need (Mt 6:25–34); he gives them good gifts (Mt 7:7–11; Lk 11:11–13); he offers them true bread (Jn 6:32); he “disciplines those he loves, as a father the son he delights in” (Prov 3:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God has a father’s love for orphans (Deut 10:18; Ps 68:5; Jas 1:27) and little ones (Mt 18:10–14).

Jesus calls God “Father,” especially in the Gospel of John. Because he is the only begotten Son of God (Jn 3:16), some aspects of his divine sonship are unique. Jesus is the only Son who is one with the Father (Jn 10:30, 38; 14:10–11), has inner knowledge of the Father (Mt 11:27; Jn 5:20, 10:15; Lk 10:21–22), has seen the Father (Jn 6:46), shares the Father’s glory (Jn 17:1ff.) and so forth. Yet Jesus also shows us what kind of a heavenly Father we have. He teaches us to go to our Father for everything we need (Mt 6:9–13; Lk 11:2–4). There is no need to be reticent, for we are to call him Abba (Mk 14:36; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rom 8:15, Gal 4:6). There is no need to be timid, for he has a big house with plenty of rooms to spare (Jn 14:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 3:19). There is no need to be fearful, for God will run to us, throw his arms around us and kiss us when we return from our prodigal wanderings (Lk 15:20). “How great is the love the Father has lavished on us, that we should be called children of God!” (1 Jn 3:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The relationship between God the Father and God the Son is the perfect pattern for father-son relationships. The Father takes justifiable pride in the Son's activities (Ps 2:7). He loves the Son and is well-pleased with him (Mt. 4:17). For his part the Son submits to the will of the Father in all things (Mk 14:36; Lk 22:42; Jn 14:31). One of their favorite father and son activities is planning and accomplishing redemption (Jn 6:44; 12:50; 14:6, 21). To be a good father is to be like God the Father: “You, therefore, must be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect” (Mt 5:48; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 6:36). Successful fathering is obedient sonship. Like Isaiah (Is 63:16; 64:8), good fathers call God “Father.”

Summary. The images of fathers that emerge from the biographies of the patriarchs in Genesis can serve as a summary of how the Bible portrays fathers. The patriarchs are obviously progenitors of a line of descendants. As such they are agents of blessing, not only in the blessing they pronounce on their sons but as fathers of the faithful in salvation history. These fathers are heads of their clans and overseers of the economic fortunes of their families. When negotiations with outside parties are required, the proverbial “buck” stops with the father. At their best these fathers are spiritual paragons—building altars, obeying messages from God, insuring that their sons marry well, even showing a willingness to sacrifice a promised son in an act of supreme obedience to God.

But Genesis also gives us an anatomy of how fathers fail. The practice of dishonesty and expediency in a father (Gen 12:10–20; 20) is imitated by his son (Gen 26:6–11). Fathers stand ineffectually wringing their hands or boiling with anger as they watch the wreckage of their children's lives or the wrangling of their wives. Fathers display favoritism toward children with tragic results. Overshadowing everything is the image of a heavenly Father who deals with his human children as human fathers were created to do.

In short, fathers in the Bible are a paradigm of the human condition. Their behavior ranges from the very good to the very bad. Yet God does not give up on them, and by divine grace they even manage to make a mark for good in the world and in their families.

See also Child, Children; Daughter; God; Mother, Motherhood; Son; Tyrannical Father, Husband.

FAVORED CHILD, SLIGHTED CHILD

Among the archetypes of the family are the familiar favored child and slighted child, both of them evidence of a dysfunctional family. Although it produces the syndrome of sibling rivalry, favoritism is really a failure of parenting, inasmuch as the favor and slight are defined in terms of how children are viewed and treated by parents.

The younger child who is preferred over the elder child is so common in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as to be an archetype. Nor is it necessarily a sign of a dysfunctional family: when God favors a child, divine sovereignty and moral justice lie behind the favoring and slighting. Thus God favors Abel over Cain, Isaac over Ishmael, Jacob over Esau (Mal 1:2–3; Rom 9:13), Joseph over his brothers, Moses over Aaron, David over his brothers.

The archetypal slighted child, though, is a pathetic figure, whether or not the child is morally deserving of the slight. Cain, disfavored by a heavenly Father, is a figure of tragic rebellion, tapping our wellsprings of regret. Esau, crying out when he discovers that Jacob has supplanted him in the story of the stolen blessing, is equally heart-rending. Pathos surrounds the understated story of Leah, the substitute bride who wins a husband before her sister Rachel but loses the contest for Jacob's favor.

See also Child, Children; Elder Child, Elder Sibling; Sibling Rivalry; Younger Child, Younger Sibling.

FEAR

Fear in the sense of terror is a formidable part of the Bible's picture of life in a fallen world. While the Bible offers no psychology of fear, we can categorize the images of fear by the things that cause fear, the physical results of fear and biblical characters caught in moments of terror.

The origin of fear in the Bible can be traced to Adam after the Fall, when he responds to God by saying, "I heard the sound of you in the garden, and I was afraid" (Gen 3:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). It is no exaggeration to say that after that terrifying moment in the Garden, the human race has lived with the constant possibility and even threat of being afraid.

Causes of Fear. Although there is a desirable reverential fear of God, the Bible also portrays God's actions as being causes of terror, especially-but not only-for those who do not trust in God. At the burning bush Moses "hid his face, for he was afraid to look at God" (Ex 3:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Job confesses regarding God that "I am terrified at his presence; when I consider, I am in dread of him" (Job 23:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God accosts Judah with the questions "Do you not fear me?"

and “Do you not tremble before me?” (Jer 5:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Isaiah pictures evil people fleeing from “the terror of the Lord” three times in a single chapter (Is 2:10, 19, 21).

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] Jesus tells people to fear him who “has power to cast into hell” (Lk 12:4). Fear falls on those who hear about God’s judgment against Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:5), and the writer to Hebrews assures us that “it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God” (Heb 10:31 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the Gospels people were afraid of Jesus because of his miracles (Mk 5:33; 10:32; 11:8; Lk 5:26), as were the disciples at the transfiguration by the presence of Moses and Elijah (Mk 9:6) and upon hearing the voice of God (Mt 17:6). At the empty tomb the women were afraid when Jesus’ body was gone (Mt 28:8; Mk 16:8).

A second cluster of images centers on the threatening forces of nature. In a prayer of imprecation the psalmist asks God to “terrify them with thy hurricane!” (Ps 83:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Psalm 46, even though it asserts the believer’s freedom from fear, is nonetheless a catalog of natural disasters that would ordinarily instill fear, including earthquake and perhaps tidal waves (Ps 46:2—3). Psalm 91, a catalog of dangers, contains vivid pictures of “the terror of the night,” “the arrow that flies by day,” “pestilence that stalks in darkness” and “the destruction that wastes at noonday” (possibly sunstroke or heat exhaustion; Ps 91:5—6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Job interprets his illness as “the terrors of God” arrayed against him (Job 6:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 7:14). Predators were equally a cause for fear (Job 39:19—20; 41:14; see Animals), and Israel’s wanderings in the wilderness were a continuous narrow escape because of the presence of poisonous snakes and scorpions, as well as the absence of food and water, so that Moses speaks of “that great and terrible wilderness” (Deut 1:19; 8:15; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 21:1).

A third cause of fear in the Bible is death and calamity. Saul is “terrified” by the witch’s prediction of his death (1 Sam 28:21). The psalmist describes “the terrors of death” that come upon him and the accompanying “horror” that “overwhelms” him (Ps 55:4–5). Another psalmist attests, “Afflicted and close to death from my youth up, I suffer thy terrors” (Ps 88:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Job speaks of being “in terror of calamity from God” (Job 31:23). When Jeremiah is released from imprisonment at the hands of Pashhur the priest, he says, “The Lord does not call your name Pashhur, but Terror on every side. For thus says the Lord: Behold, I will make you a terror to yourself and to all your friends. They shall fall by the sword of their enemies while you look on” (Jer 20:3–4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 20:10).

People also fear the actions of other people. Haman is “in terror before the king and the queen” when his plot against the Jews is divulged (Esther 7:6). The slander and intrigue of David’s enemies against him constitute for him “terror on every side” (Ps 31:13). Paul’s timidity to preach in Corinth is portrayed by him as coming “in weakness and in much fear and trembling” (1 Cor 2:3), and Paul recalls his entry into Macedonia in terms of “fighting without and fear within” (2 Cor 7:5). On a similarly psychological note, the psalmist dreads his own “reproach” or “disgrace” (Ps 119:39 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Numerous references to fear center on the experience of warfare or the fear of a rival nation. Part of the explanation is the ancient practice of invading armies terrorizing their enemies in an attempt to demoralize them (2 Chron 32:18; Is 7:6; Hab 1:9). In a variation on that theme, God’s deliverance of Israel becomes an occasion for fear to strike the nations who hear of the deliverance (Ex 15:11, 16; 23:27; 34:10; Deut 4:34; 26:8; 34:12). Beyond terror as a weapon, it is simply something that accompanies war: Isaiah describes the impending invasion by Assyria as “sheer terror” (Is 28:19); Jeremiah describes people’s looking for peace and finding terror (Jer 8:15; 14:19).

A final category of images of fear is to be found in the eschatological images of the end. The book of Revelation is an ever-expanding vision of horror, but other visions of the end are also a repository of terror. In a moment of wry humor, Amos pictures the Day of the Lord as being like a man who “fled from a lion, and a bear met him” (Amos 5:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In his Olivet Discourse Jesus gave us memorable images of wars and rumors of wars, famines and earthquakes (Mt 24:5–7; Mk 13:6–8). Elsewhere Jesus predicted a time of coming catastrophe so terrible that people will ask the mountains to fall on them and the hills to cover them (Lk 23:30; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 6:12–17). Equally memorable are the images of cataclysmic upheaval in nature and persecution that pervade the book of Revelation.

To sum up, biblical images of fear cluster around the character and works of God, the forces of nature, death and calamity, people and their actions, warfare, and the end of history. It is important to note that in regard to all of these causes of fear, the Bible repeatedly holds out the possibility (sometimes phrased as a command) that those who trust in God are exempt from being afraid.

Physical Results of Fear. The human manifestations of fear include melting, trembling, paralysis and fainting. The human faculty with which fear is linked is the heart (Deut 20:3; 28:67; 2 Sam 17:10; Ps 27:3; Is 7:4; 35:4).

Fear experienced metaphorically as a process of melting is applied to the nations who hear of Israel's deliverance at the Red Sea (Ex 15:15), Israelites who are fearful of serving in the army (Deut 20:8), the inhabitants of Jericho who hear of Israel's success (Josh 2:9, 11, 24), the fearful spies (Josh 14:8), the hypothetical warriors in Hushai's counsel not to attack David (2 Sam 17:10), the Babylonians in Isaiah's vision of their doom (13:7), Israel on the eve of invasion (Ezek 21:7) and the Egyptians (Is 19:1).

Trembling is a physical manifestation of fear (Ex 15:15; 19:16; Deut 2:25; 1 Sam 28:5; Job 4:14; Ps 55:5; Is 64:2; Ezek 26:16; 32:10; Dan 5:19; Hab 3:7; Mk 5:33; 16:8; 1 Cor 2:3; Jas 2:19). To this can be added Ezekiel's vivid metaphor of national leaders being "palsied by terror" (Ezek 7:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The trembling of the fearful is metaphorically compared to the pangs of a woman in labor (Is 13:8; 21:3; Jer 30:6; 48:41).

At the opposite end of the spectrum from trembling are paralysis, immobility and fainting. When the leaders of neighboring nations hear of the Red Sea deliverance, Moses predicts, "terror and dread" will cause them to be "as still as a stone" (Ex 15:16). When the drunken Nabal sobers up and learns that he has been rude to David the previous day, "his heart died within him, and he became as a stone" (1 Sam 25:37). Fainting also occurs as an expression of fear (Deut 20:3; Job 23:16; Jer 51:46; Ezek 21:7; Lk 21:27).

Biblical Characters Who Fear. Finally, biblical images of fear include a gallery of characters caught in memorable moments of fear. Indeed, we encounter more than two hundred occasions when a biblical character is said to "fear" or be "afraid" (or in a variant told not to fear or be afraid, usually with the implication that the person thus addressed is afraid). The most memorable examples include Adam immediately after the Fall (Gen 3:10); Sarah when the divine visitor catches her eavesdropping (Gen 18:15); Lot and his daughters, fearful of staying in Zoar (Gen 19:30); Jacob after the dream of the ladder (Gen 28:17); Moses after killing an Egyptian (Ex 2:14) and at the burning bush (Ex 3:6); Aaron and the Israelites when Moses' face shone (Ex 34:30); Gideon destroying an altar to Baal by night (Judg 6:27); the youthful Samuel after receiving the vision regarding Eli's sons (1 Sam 3:15); David when captured by Achish (1 Sam 21:12) and when the ark of God was moved (2 Sam 6:9); Elijah when Jezebel vowed to kill him (1 Kings 19:3); the sailors when God punished Jonah's flight with a storm (Jon 1:5); the disciples when caught in a storm on the lake (Mt 8:26; Mk 4:40) and when Jesus walks on the water (Mt 14:27; Mk 6:50); the women at the open tomb (Mt 28:10; Mk 16:8); the shepherds at the nativity when the angel appeared (Lk 2:9–10), and the disciples at the transfiguration (Lk 9:34).

See also Fear Of God; Melt, Melting; Terror, Stories Of; Trembling, Shaking, Bodily Anguish.

Bibliography. E. W. Conrad, Fear Not Warrior: A Study of 'al-âra' Pericopes in the Hebrew Scriptures (Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985).

FEAR OF GOD

The fear of God is distinct from the terror of him that is also a biblical motif (see Fear). Encompassing and building on attitudes of awe and reverence, it is the proper and elemental response of a person to God. This religious fear of God is a major biblical image for the believer's faith. In fact, there are well over a hundred references to the fear of God in the positive sense of faith and obedience. To "fear" God or be "God-fearing" is a stock biblical image for being a follower of God, sometimes in implied contrast to those who do not fear him. The very frequency of the references signals that the fear of God is central to biblical faith, and the relative absence of this ancient way of thinking in our culture should give us pause. It is important to note, however, that the preponderance of references occur in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , perhaps implying that a permanent change (though not an abrogation) occurred with the incarnation of Christ, who calls his disciples friends rather than servants (Jn 15:15).

What images should we associate with this mysterious “fear of God”? The actions most frequently associated with fear of God are serving God (Deut 6:13; 10:20; 1 Sam 12:24) and obedience to his commandments (Deut 31:13; 1 Sam 12:14). The fear of God is linked to wisdom (Ps 111:10; Prov 9:10; 15:33) and is part of the covenant between God and his people (Ps 25:14; 103:17–18). To fear God is to be in awe and reverence of him (Ps 33:8; Mal 2:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and to trust him (Ps 40:3; 115:11). Fearing God means hating and avoiding evil (Prov 8:13; 16:6). It is not too much to say that fearing God is virtually synonymous with having saving faith in him. Deuteronomy 10:12–13 is an apt summary of what is encompassed in the fear of God: “And now, O Israel, what does the Lord your God ask of you but to fear the Lord your God, to walk in all his ways, to love him, to serve the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul, and to observe the Lord’s commands and decrees” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The fear of God is a fundamental quality of those who have an experiential knowledge of who he is. The experience of the sailors in the book of Jonah provides a good illustration of this and of the difference between terror of God and saving fear of him. When Jonah tells the sailors that it is the Lord “who made the sea and land” who has sent the storm upon them, they are terrified (Jon 1:9–10). But once the storm has abated, they “greatly feared the Lord” (Jon 1:16) in the sense of being filled with awe and reverence, making sacrifices and vows to him. The significance of the latter response is that it is born out of some knowledge, however small, of who God is (see Prov 2:5, which equates “the fear of the Lord” with “the knowledge of God”). It also hints at something that the biblical passages imply—that the fear of God stems especially from an experience of his transcendence and divine power.

The fear of God produces practical results, as it does with the awe-filled sailors who offer sacrifices. When God gives the law to Israel through Moses, the command to fear the Lord occurs repeatedly, often coupled with the command to obey God’s decrees (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 5:29; 6:24; 10:20). Thus the fear of the Lord appears as a contrast to sinful deeds (Lev 19:14; 25:17, 36, 43) and has the force of a moral imperative.

Several biblical characters are explicitly said to exemplify the fear of God, sometimes confirming its relationship to obedience. After Abraham has obeyed God’s command by showing his willingness to sacrifice his son Isaac, an angel of the Lord declares to him, “Now I know that you fear God, because you have not withheld from me your son” (Gen 22:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Joseph, a man of integrity, attempts to allay his brothers’ fears with the comment, “I fear God” (Gen 42:18). God himself twice describes Job as “blameless and upright, a man who fears God and shuns evil” (Job 1:8; 2—3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Lest we begin to think that the fear of God is an OT [OT OT. Old Testament] image only, Paul makes the evocative statement that “we know what it is to fear the Lord” (2 Cor 5:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The Bible also gives us pictures of people who do not fear God. By the time Moses has brought seven different plagues upon Egypt, Pharaoh knows God well enough to fear him properly, but he does not do so. Though Pharaoh appears to repent, Moses replies, “I know that you ... still do not fear the Lord God” (Ex 9:30). Even after Pharaoh allows Israel to flee Egypt, his disobedience in giving pursuit indicates that he does not fear God. As a consequence, God destroys Pharaoh’s army, just as he promises to bring judgment upon all those who do not fear him (Mal 3:5), while preserving those who do (Mal 3:16–17). The horrifying picture of sinful humanity painted in Romans 3:10–18 winds its way to the climactic statement, “There is no fear of God before their eyes” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

For those who do fear God the resulting benefits are many: God will bring blessing upon them (Ps 115:13) and will confide in them (Ps 25:14). They will avoid evil (Prov 16:6), and God will have mercy upon them (Lk 1:50). Moreover, those who fear God will gain life (Prov 19:23), knowledge (Prov 1:7) and wisdom (Prov 9:10). The wisdom that begins with the fear of God is closely related to knowledge and obedience (Ps 111:10). The fear of God is a fundamental quality of people who know and obey God.

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the fear of God is a significant component of the gospel. In the face of worldly threats, Jesus instructs his disciples to fear God (Lk 12:5). For the Gentiles who are outside of God’s covenant with Israel, the fear of God marks the beginning of the way to salvation through Christ, as we learn when Peter visits Cornelius’ house and declares that God “accepts men from every nation who fear him and do what is right” (Acts 10:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Regarding the early church we read, “Encouraged by the Holy Spirit, it grew in numbers, living in the fear of the Lord” (Acts 9:31 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Fear; God; Holiness; Reverence; Terror, Stories of.

FEAST, FEASTING

Feasts in the Bible are images of joyful voices, festive music and dancing, and abundant food. They are not simply parties, but celebrations of God's goodness toward his people. Feasts provide occasions of fellowship with one another and with the Lord to remember and to celebrate what wonderful things God has done. The Hebrews had numerous harvest periods spread throughout the year. This resulted in many feasts, all celebrations of the faithfulness of God's provision and the land's fertility (hence the appeal of the fertility god Baal and other Canaanite religions).

What Feasts Celebrate. The beginning of certain relationships in the Bible was formally marked with a festive meal. For instance, when Isaac made a peace treaty with Abimelech, king of the Philistines, he prepared a feast, after which the men swore their oath to each other (Gen 26:26—30). Weddings in biblical times were celebrated with a feast that often lasted several days (Gen 29:22; Judg 14:10—17; Jn 2:1—11). It is therefore especially fitting that when God formally established his relationship with his people in the covenant given to Moses on Mount Sinai, he established feasts to commemorate and to celebrate this blessed relationship.

Six feasts and one fast (Yom Kippur) commanded by the Mosaic covenant were celebrated annually to commemorate God's continual goodness toward his people (Ex 23:14—17; Lev 23; Num 9:1—14; Deut 16:1—17). In the springtime the Feast of Passover occurs one day before the seven-day Feast of Unleavened Bread. Together these two feasts commemorate the night in Egypt when the angel of death passed over those who had marked their homes with lamb's blood. The Feast of Unleavened Bread begins the very next day to commemorate the resulting hasty departure from Egypt that began the exodus.

The Feasts of Firstfruits and of Weeks are celebrations of the harvest, reminding God's people of the goodness of the land into which he had finally brought them. The autumn feasts begin with the Feast of Trumpets, also called Rosh Hashanah, which marks the beginning of the civil new year. The Feast of Tabernacles (or Booths), also called Succoth, commemorated God's sustenance during the difficult and threatening journey from Egypt to the *"land flowing with milk and honey."

After the exile, the celebration of another feast was added to the Jewish calendar, the Feast of Purim. This feast commemorates the deliverance of God's people from genocide in fifth-century Persia, demonstrating that his covenant promise to protect his people extended even outside the ancient borders of the Promised Land. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] book of Esther describes the story of this deliverance and establishes the annual celebration of this feast.

A final feast was added to the Jewish calendar in the second century b.c. after Judas Maccabees reclaimed the temple in Jerusalem from the defilement of the Seleucid king Antiochus Epiphanes. Hanukkah, or the Feast of (re-) Dedication (Jn 10:22) celebrates this improbable victory and the rededication of the temple to the Lord.

The feasts of the Bible celebrate God's faithfulness to his people in preserving and protecting them and in bringing them into close fellowship with himself and with each other. However, God was also faithful to his promise of judgment when his people disobeyed the covenant. In those times when God's people turned away from him to idolatry, the feasts became painful remembrances of the broken covenant. From its beginning the northern kingdom of Israel was prone to idolatry after building substitute temples to keep the people from celebrating the feasts in Jerusalem in the southern kingdom. But the feasts celebrated at these idolatrous shrines were not acceptable to God. The prophet Amos brought God's indictment against them: "I hate, I despise your religious feasts; I cannot stand your assemblies" (Amos 5:21 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In the wake of Jerusalem's later destruction, the author of Lamentations expresses the desolation of the once-blessed land: "The roads to Zion mourn, for no one comes to her appointed feasts" (Lam 1:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When the people's fellowship with God is broken by their disobedience to his word, there can be no joyful feast. A fast of repentance for sin is the only remedy.

How Feasts Were Celebrated. Each of these feasts was celebrated by refraining from the usual work of the day, by assembling together in fellowship and by eating a festive meal of meat, grain (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , bread) and wine that had been ritually offered to God. These special sacrificial offerings renewed fellowship between a holy God and his sinful people, expressing the covenant relationship between them. Because of God's goodness, these days were to be celebrated with great joy by everyone living in the land, including men and women, boys and girls, servants, widows, orphans, and even foreigners.

When David made Jerusalem the capital city of God's nation and his son Solomon constructed the temple there, Jerusalem became "the city of our festivals" (Is 33:20) because God's presence was there in a special way (Deut 12). This central location for the feasts highlighted God's desire to dwell with his people in joyful assembly. Three times a year the men of God's people were to come to Jerusalem with offerings for the Lord in celebration of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the Feast of Weeks and the Feast of Tabernacles (Deut 16:16).

Solomon dedicated the temple in Jerusalem, appropriately on the Feast of Tabernacles, with a magnificent fourteen-day feast, offering tens of thousands of animals in festal sacrifice for a vast assembly of people (1 Kings 8:62–66; 2 Chron 7:1–10). The Feast of Tabernacles annually had reminded the people how God had dwelt with them in the desert in a lowly tent. Now he would dwell among them in a splendid temple in the capital city of their nation. Solomon's festive crescendo looked back on how God had indeed been with his wayward people through their exodus journey, how he had brought them into the land, established them as a nation and given them a king, and how he now would dwell among them in a magnificent temple. The descendants of Abraham had become a sovereign nation, just as the Lord had promised so long ago! The people left the feast with hearts overflowing with praise for all that God had done.

New Testament. The apostle John tells that Jesus went up to Jerusalem to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles at the temple. In Jesus, God came in the flesh to celebrate with his people. On the last and greatest day of the Feast of Tabernacles, God incarnate stood in his temple calling out to his thirsty people to come to him and drink (Jn 7:37). How ironic that his unrecognized voice was a disturbing presence in the festivities that had for so long been celebrated to welcome his presence!

The Lord's Supper focuses the elements of the Feast of Unleavened Bread in the person and work of Jesus Christ. The bread and wine first offered by Jesus to his disciples at Passover is the sign of the beginning of a new covenant established in his death (Mt 26:17–30; Mk 14:12–26; Lk 22:1–23). This solemn but festive meal instituted by Jesus is to be repeated by the assembly of the Christian church in remembrance of him (1 Cor 11:23–26). The significance of Passover, the greatest of the Jewish feasts, is redefined in the death of Jesus, who is himself the final and ultimate Passover lamb, whose body and blood provide the bread and wine for the sacramental meal that unites God to his people in Christ (1 Cor 5:8). Therefore, the Christian sacrament of Holy Communion is a symbolic feast that commemorates and celebrates God's love for his people in establishing a new covenant with them in Christ who saves them from sin and death.

The kingdom of God proclaimed by Jesus is described in the parables as a great feast to which people from around the world and throughout the epochs of history will come (Mt 8:11; 22:1–14; Lk 14:15–24). It is a joyful celebration of God's faithfulness to his promises that extends from the first to the last moment of history. Moreover, the image of the kingdom of God as a great feast is portrayed as a marriage banquet, expressing the joy of the most intimate fellowship between the Son of God and his bride, believers from all ages of time (Mt 22:1–14; Rev 19:9).

Feast as a Sign of Future Blessing. When God's people returned from the judgment of exile and began rebuilding the temple in Jerusalem, the feasts were renewed as a sign that the Lord was still in covenant relationship with his chastised people (Ezra 3:1–6). About this same time the prophet Zechariah foresaw a day when people of all nations would perpetually celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles, signifying God's dwelling with them, and would come to Jerusalem to worship the King of the earth, the Lord Almighty (Zech 14:16–19).

The imagery of the biblical feast is an image of the joyful celebration of the love of God for his people, which came to ultimate fruition in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. On Mount Zion of Jerusalem, the central location of all biblical feasts, the Lord Almighty has prepared, as Isaiah predicted:

a feast of rich food for all peoples,

a banquet of aged wine—
the best of meats and the finest of wines.

On this mountain he will destroy the shroud that enfolds all peoples, the sheet that covers all nations;

he will swallow up death forever.

The Sovereign Lord will wipe away the tears from all faces;

he will remove the disgrace of his people from all the earth.

The Lord has spoken.

(Is 25:6—8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version])

The imagery of biblical feasting still points to the future, when the Lord God will resurrect all his people from every age to live with him in eternal joy. Every feast celebrated to the Lord is but a foretaste of that glorious day.

See also Banquet; Bread; Dancing; Drinking; Eating; Festival; Food; Joy; Music; Refuser of Festivities; Salvation; Wedding; Wine.

FEET

Though feet are sometimes associated with objects such as chests and tables (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 25:12), the Bible refers mainly to the feet of human beings and animals. “From head to foot” is a way to describe the whole of a person (2 Sam 14:25; Is 1:6). There are also occasional anthropomorphic references to the feet of God, such as his promise to glorify the place of his feet (Is 60:13; Ezek 43:7; Zech 14:4).

One of the basic aspects of hospitality in Bible times was the washing of a guest’s feet (Gen 18:4; 19:2; 24:32; Judg 19:21; 1 Sam 25:41). A reference in Moses’ blessing to Asher of the extravagance of bathing the feet in oil (Deut 33:24) indicates the prospect of considerable wealth. To wash the feet is associated with going home and being unlikely to go out again that day (2 Sam 11:8). Thus the beloved complains that she cannot come to the door since she has washed her feet (Song 5:3). Jesus serves his disciples by washing their feet, the act of a menial servant (Jn 13:2–11). This service, which has on previous occasions been performed for him (Lk 7:44; Jn 11:2; 12:3) establishes a pattern for his disciples (Jn 13:14–16; 1 Tim 5:10).

Ritual washing of the hands and feet occurs frequently (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 30:19). Although it sounds rather gruesome, God’s people can look forward to bathing their feet in the blood of wicked (Ps 58:10; 68:23).

Feet also figure in situations in which someone has authority over a person or place. People have rights over land touched by their feet (Deut 2:5; 11:24; Josh 1:3; Ps 122:2) and lose rights over land their feet no longer walk on (2 Chron 33:8). Related to this is the idea that vanquished enemies are under the feet of their conquerors (Josh 10:24, 1 Kings 5:3; Ps 8:6; 45:5; 110:1; Is 49:23; 60:14; Mal 4:3). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] stresses the authority of Christ over all things in this way (Mt 22:44; 1 Cor 15:25ff.; Eph 1:22; Heb 2:8) and the eventual victory of Christian believers over Satan and his followers (Rom 16:20; Rev 3:9).

To fall at someone's feet voluntarily is a mark of reverence (1 Sam 25:24; 2 Sam 22:39f.; Esther 8:3; Acts 10:25), and many of those who meet Jesus fall at his feet (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mk 5:22; Rev 1:17). In Revelation the angel guiding John refuses to allow him to fall at his feet and directs him to worship God instead (Rev 19:10; 22:8). Sitting at someone's feet is an act of submission and teachability (Lk 8:35; 10:39). Seizing the feet of another is an act of supplication (2 Kings 4:27; Mt 28:9); a particular example may be the uncovering of Boaz's feet by Ruth in order to indicate her desire that he become her kinsman-redeemer (Ruth 3:4–8).

To be able to negotiate rough terrain like a nimble-footed deer is an image applied to the life a righteous person (2 Sam 22:34; Hab 3:19). Obedience to God guarantees that one's feet will not slip (Ps 17:5), for God is said to guard the feet of his saints (1 Sam 2:9). This is related to the desire for feet to be on level ground (Ps 26:12; Prov 4:26; Heb 12:13) in a spacious place (Ps 31:8) on firm ground (Ps 40:2) and guided by the lamp of God's Word (Ps 119:105). The Bible records several prayers that feet will not stray (Ps 44:18; 119:101; Prov 6:18) or rush to sin (Prov 1:16; Is 59:7; Jer 14:10). A feature of the Messiah's ministry is that he will guide feet into the way of peace (Lk 1:79).

On the other hand, sin is characterized by feet that slip or stumble (Job 12:5; Ps 37:31; 56:13; 66:9; 73:2; 116:8; 121:3). Along similar lines, feet may be caught in a snare or a net, or put in shackles (Ps 25:15; 57:6; 105:18; Jer 18:22; Lam 1:13). One such trap is flattery (Prov 29:5), and the psalmist prays to be delivered from those who would trip him up (Ps 140:4).

Going barefoot is interpreted in a number of ways: either reverence at the presence of God (Ex 3:5), a result of judgment (Is 20:2) or a sign of mourning (Ezek 24:27, 23).

Feet are not normally considered particularly attractive and may be thought of as inferior (1 Cor 12:15, 21). But they become beautiful when they belong to someone who uses them to carry the good news of God's salvation (Is 52:7; Nahum 1:15; Eph 6:15; see Dancing). Should the message be rejected in any particular place, the bearers of the gospel are to shake the dust off their feet (Mt 10:14) as a sign of protest (Acts 13:51) and refuse to have anything at all to do with the place.

See also Barefoot; Heel; Shoe, Sandle; Stumble, Stumbling Block; Toe; Under The Feet.

FENCE, FENCED PLACE

The idea of a fence or fenced place is translated various ways in English versions of the Bible, including "fence," "fortified city," "fortifications," "wall" and "hedge." Virtually all of the references to the imagery of fence in English translations are to "fenced cities," that is, fortified cities (see Wall). In distinction from walls of fortification, fences and hedges were less elaborate partitions used in domestic areas like homes or farms. Fences usually consisted of a stone wall, while hedges were composed of shrubbery, often thorny plants (Mic 7:4). Jesus' famous aphorism about going "out to the highways and hedges" (Lk 14:23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) evokes the picture of hedges as out-of-the-way places where one would have to actively search for people.

Because fences were usually rather slight constructions, the psalmist's imagination gravitates toward the fence as an image of something easily destroyed. In protesting people who oppress him in a time of weakness, he asks how long his tormentors will shatter him "like a leaning wall, a tottering fence" (Ps 62:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In a similarly negative usage, the prophet Nahum scornfully compares Nineveh's princes to "clouds of locusts settling on the fences in a day of cold-when the sun rises, they fly away; no one knows where they are" (Nahum 3:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Mainly, though, the fence or hedge is an image of protection and safety against thieves or predators. Satan pictures God's protection of Job with the image of God's having put a hedge around him (Job 1:10). Judah's predicted exile is pictured as a vineyard whose hedge God will remove (Is 5:5; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 80:12). In one of his parables Jesus pictures the preparations that a good owner would undertake when planting a vineyard, including setting a hedge around it, digging a pit for a wine press and building a tower to protect it (Mt 21:33; Mk 12:1). Hedges might also become places of hiding (Jer 49:3).

In metaphoric uses, the image of God's fencing a person in can have negative connotations of confinement. Thus Job pictures God as fencing him with oppression (Job 3:23) and as walling up his way so that he cannot pass (Job 19:8), and in Hosea 2:6 God predicts that he will fence in the path of Gomer.

See also Protection; Wall.

FESTIVAL

In the Bible a festival is a periodic religious celebration, sometimes at a special place and therefore involving a journey. Festivals call for a cessation to ordinary workaday activities and replacing them with communal activities that are special to the religious occasion.

Israelite festivals were crucial to a sense of national unity. There were frequent public festivals, including the weekly sabbath, the monthly new moon festival and three main annual festivals—Passover and Unleavened Bread (celebrating the exodus), Pentecost or Weeks (celebrating the end of the barley harvest) and Tabernacles or Booths (celebrating the final harvest ingathering). By NT [NT NT. New Testament] times two others had been added: Purim (celebrating the victory of Esther and Mordecai over Haman's genocide plot, Esther 9) and Lights or Hanukkah (commemorating Judas Maccabaeus's cleansing of the Temple in 164 b.c., referred to in Jn 10:22). It is evident from these examples that festivals celebrated two types of occasions—faith events in salvation history (such as Passover) and nature events in the yearly cycle (such as Pentecost). The Feast of Booths combined the two, celebrating both harvest and the memory of Israel's wilderness wanderings.

The images associated with festivals in the Bible cluster around six motifs: breaking the routine, lavish abundance (especially of food), ceremony or ritual, sacrifice, community, holiday spirit and a religious focus on God. A good summary of what the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] festivals were like appears in Leviticus 23 and Numbers 28—29, and the generalizations that follow are amply illustrated from these chapters alone.

Hebrew Festivals as God Intended Them. That the festivals would be a break from the routine was assured by the stipulation that on a festival day “you shall have a holy convocation; you shall do no laborious work” (repeatedly in Lev 23 and Num 28—29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Some of the festivals required the Israelites to change their locale in order to participate in the festival. The pilgrimage to Jerusalem became an established part of Hebrew religious life and was a complete break from ordinary life at home. At the Feast of Booths the people camped out for seven days in booths made from tree branches and leaves.

Feasting—at once a break from the routine and an example of abundance—dominates our impression of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] festivals. Although meat was relatively scarce in Hebrew society, it was conspicuously present at several of the festivals, where the requirement of animal sacrifices insured a large-scale banquet of meat. Wine, an image connoting both richness or abundance and celebration, was likewise in full evidence at the festivals. So prominent is the image of feasting that most of the festivals are actually called feasts in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament]. The sheer quantity of ingredients for the sacrifices of the festivals itself constitutes an image of fullness.

Hebrew festivals were also filled with ceremony or ritual. All of the festivals involved doing prescribed activities. At Pentecost, for example, a sheaf of grain and two loaves of bread were waved before the Lord (Lev 23:15–17). At the Feast of Trumpets a memorial would be proclaimed with blasts of trumpets (Lev 23:24). At the Feast of Booths people would “hold a holy convocation and present an offering by fire to the Lord” (Lev 23:36). Everywhere we turn in the accounts of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] festivals, we find ceremonies. No doubt this was a large part of the appeal of the festivals, as it is with our holiday rituals.

Sacrifice or offering was another constant motif in Hebrew festivals. Most of the festivals were accompanied by either animal sacrifice or a harvest offering. Every sacrifice or offering was specifically prescribed, such as “two lambs a year old without blemish, and one young bull, and two rams” (Lev 23:18), or “three tenths of an ephah of fine flour for a cereal offering, mixed with oil” (Num 28:12). The meaning behind such sacrifices was that of giving up something to God; the benefit was in the element of sacrifice, not in something that God himself needed (as was the case with pagan gods).

Images of community pervade the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] festivals, which were the opposite from solitary events. For one thing, every member of the religious community would have celebrated the same festival at the same time. It seems plausible to believe that the festivals with their sacrifices resembled potluck meals, with some of the food reserved for the priests and the remainder available for others. In some of the prescriptions we specifically find the injunction to include the entire community, as when Moses told the people that “you shall rejoice in your feast, you and your son and your daughter, your manservant and your maidservant, the Levite, the sojourner, the fatherless, and the widow who are within your towns” (Deut 16:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). We can infer that the pilgrimages to Jerusalem involved group caravans and the mingling of children from friends’ families, resulting in the type of situation where Jesus’ parents naturally assumed that their son was with “kinsfolk and acquaintances” (Lk 2:44).

A holiday spirit also pervaded OT [OT OT. Old Testament] festivals. Along with all the solemnity, the Israelites were commanded to “rejoice before the Lord your God,” to “rejoice in your feast” (Deut 16:11, 13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and to “rejoice, you and your households, in all that you undertake” relating to the sacrifices (Deut 12:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the book of Esther we read regarding the Feast of Purim that “the Jews of the villages, who live in the open towns,” commemorate the day “as a day for gladness and feasting and holiday-making, and a day on which they send choice portions to one another” (Esther 9:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Isaiah describes “the night when a holy feast is kept” in terms of “gladness of heart, as when one sets out to the sound of the flute to go to the mountain of the Lord” (Is 30:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The Psalms give us pictures of shouting at the worship that transpired at the temple. In short, festivals were accompanied by high-spiritedness and a letting go of usual inhibitions.

Finally, for all their social functions, OT [OT OT. Old Testament] festivals were also religious festivals, kept first of all to God. The phrase “to the Lord” runs like a refrain through the prescriptions for the feasts. The gatherings were “a holy convocation.” In a word, the festivals were worship experiences in which the believer encountered God and received a blessing from him. We need not, of course, drive a wedge between the social and spiritual dimensions of the festivals. If the smell of roasting meat was “a pleasing odor to the Lord” (Num 28:8), it also promised a barbecue meal. If animals and grain were sacrifices to God, they also provided the materials for a community meal.

Perversions and Warnings. From the prophetic books come pictures of the perversion of festivals. One is neglect. Malachi, for example, pictures people as offering blind, lame or sick animals in sacrifice instead of unblemished ones (Mal 1:8–14). Isaiah describes Israel’s sin of not calling upon God, of being weary of him and of not bringing offerings and sacrifices (Is 43:22–24).

The more customary abuse was apparently nominal observance—going through the motions like a tiresome requirement, instead of making the festivals an expression of the grateful heart. Malachi pictures people performing sacrifices while saying to themselves, “What a weariness this is” (Mal 1:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In a similar vein Amos portrays merchants as waiting impatiently for the end of the new moon and sabbath so they can begin their sale of grain (Amos 8:5).

In light of these perversions God is pictured by the prophets as despising people’s offerings and festivals (Is 1:13–15; Amos 5:21–23). Elsewhere, God promises to bring an end to sham sacrifices and observance of festivals (Hos 2:11; Amos 8:10).

Festival Imagery in the New Testament. The NT [NT NT. New Testament] presents both continuity and innovation in regard to religious festivals. On the one hand, Jesus and his disciples are described as participating in statutory Jewish festivals. But there is an element of fulfillment and abrogation as well as observance of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] festivals. Jesus turns the ceremonial water into wine at the wedding at Cana to symbolize his transformation of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] rituals (Jn 2:1–11). While attending the Feast of Tabernacles, Jesus proclaims himself as the fulfillment of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] prophecy (Jn 7:37–39). The atoning events of Passion Week are set against a background of the Passover, again suggesting Christ's fulfillment of what the sacrificial system foreshadowed.

From Pentecost onward the apostolic writers lose interest in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] festivals because they have lost their significance. The death and resurrection of Christ have achieved what the rituals could not. At a stroke, the need for such symbolism has been erased, as the book of Hebrews elaborates at length. Joining in public festivals is now a matter of personal choice, and Christians are not to judge each other's decisions since the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] festivals were "only a shadow of what is to come," with the substance belonging to Christ (Col 2:16–17). Festal imagery remains a source of metaphor for spiritual reality, of course: Christians "have come to Mount Zion and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to innumerable angels in festal gathering" (Heb 12:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The other new development in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is the institution of the Lord's Supper, which was at first a shared meal, but which did not have the extravagance of a feast. When Paul, writing about the Lord's Supper, enjoins the Corinthians to "celebrate the festival" (1 Cor 5:8), the terminology brings to mind the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] Passover. But the accompanying statement that "Christ, our paschal lamb, has been sacrificed" (v. 7) also signals that the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] sacrifices have been replaced by something new.

See also Farming; Feast; Harvest; Offering; Passover; Pentecost; Refuser of Festivities; Sacrifice; Seasons; Temple; Time.

FESTIVITIES, REFUSING.

See Refuser Of Festivities.

FIFTY

The figure fifty carries with it a number of connotations. When applied to age, fifty conveys the sense of a full measure of years. It does not mark the end of life, but rather the age at which a person takes a rest from labor. For example, it is only men ranging from thirty to fifty years old who are to serve in Israel's tent of meeting (Num 4:3, 23, 30). When the Lord instructs Moses to set apart the tribe of Levi specifically for priestly duties, he stipulates that fifty years will be the retirement age for Levites, though they may continue to assist with their former duties (Num 8:25, 26). This association of fifty years with the fullness of age may shed some light on the meaning of the Jews' retort to Jesus, "You are not yet fifty years old, ... and you have seen Abraham!" (Jn 8:57 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). If fifty is the age at which one gains the maturity and respect due an elder, then the Jews' comment attacks the reliability of Jesus' claim based on his relative youth. Thus, the age of fifty conveys a sense of completion and the wisdom of long experience.

But fifty is more than just a landmark in an individual's life; the number fifty also carries great significance in Israel's calendar. God instructs Moses that the timing of the Feast of Weeks is to be fifty days after the sabbath on which the firstfruits of the harvest is first given as a wave offering—that is, the day after seven sabbaths (or forty-nine days) have elapsed (Lev 23:15, 16). On that fiftieth day Israelites must make another wave offering of firstfruits, a sin offering, and they must observe the day as a sabbath (Lev 23:17—21). Since the forty-ninth day is also a sabbath, the fiftieth day stands out as a special second sabbath. (Later this day is called Pentecost, the Greek term for fifty.) The imagery of fifty, consequently, contains a sense of special sabbath rest.

The association of fifty with liberty as well as rest emerges in God's establishment of the Year of Jubilee. Every seventh year is to be a sabbath year, in which the land lies fallow (Lev 25:4); but after seven sabbath years have passed, Israel is to observe the fiftieth year as a second sabbath year—a Year of Jubilee (Lev 25:11—12). In this year, on the Day of Atonement, a trumpet blast signals the return to its original owner of any land sold and the freedom of any Israelites in the land who have been sold as servants (Lev 25:28, 40). Ideally, a Jubilee year would occur at least once in the lifetime of every Israelite. Thus the greatest significance of fifty as a recurring image is its associations with sabbath rest and liberty.

The theme of liberation also appears in the context of Israel's exile in Babylon. In Ezekiel, Israel's return from exile is to happen in accordance with the year of Jubilee. Although God has given Israel to his servant Babylon as a gift, it is only a temporary one that must be returned in the “year of freedom” (Ezek 46:16, 17). Israel can look forward with hope to the approaching fiftieth year of exile as the end of domination by Babylon. Just as the land and individual Israelites are God’s possessions, so also the entire nation belongs solely to God, who will take it back at the Jubilee. Here fifty as an image of liberation finds powerful new meaning to an exiled Israel, remembering past glory and hoping for restoration by God.

See also First; Five; Forty; Four; Hundred; One; Pentecost; Seven; Seventy; Three, Third; Twelve; Two.

FIG, FIG TREE

Well known in antiquity for its sweet taste and protective shade, the fig tree appears in the biblical record first in the prototypical tragedy of the Fall of humanity (Gen 3). In this archetypal fall from innocence, one consequence of the original pair’s succumbing to temptation is their attempt to cover their nakedness before God with fig leaves.

The fig tree was one of the most important domesticated plants in the biblical era and was widely cultivated throughout Palestine. It grows best in moderately dry areas that have little or no rain during the period of fruit maturation. The tree was cultivated for its delicious fruit and appreciated for its dark green and deeply lobed leaves, which produced a welcome shade (Mic 4:4; Zech 3:10; Jn 1:48).

These features of fruitfulness and shade make the fig tree a ready symbol for God in covenant relation to his people, as is the vine, with which it is often linked. Thus God is portrayed as having seen in Israel prospects of productivity as one “seeing the early fruit on the fig tree” (Hos 9:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), which, appearing in late spring, gives promise of later fruitfulness. As covenant beneficiary, Israel could enjoy the God-given prosperity and security experienced in the Solomonic ideal: “each man under his own vine and fig tree” (1 Kings 4:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Failure to keep covenantal standards to be fruitful could mean the loss of safety and God’s judgment, a theme often repeated in prophetic pronouncements. Jesus utilized the motif of the fig tree in similar fashion, warning of the danger of spiritual fruitlessness (Lk 13:6–9), a condition which if uncorrected would spell disaster (Mt 21:19–21). Jesus uses a barren but leafy fig tree to illustrate how Israel, typified in its leadership, had a showy religion that was of no value and was worthy of judgment because it bore no fruit in their lives (Mk 11:12–21).

At its most basic level the fig tree is viewed as a wonderful part of settled life. It symbolized the good life, and to live under one’s fig tree stood for a life of settledness (fig trees took several years of difficult labor to establish), joy, peace and prosperity. In his taunt, the king of Assyria uses the fig tree as part of his picture of the life he claimed that he wanted to extend to Israel: “Do not listen to Hezekiah. This is what the king of Assyria says: Make peace with me and come out to me. Then every one of you will eat from his own vine and fig tree and drink water from his own cistern” (Is 36:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The fig tree is part of the eschaton because it is a good thing worthy of the new order and represents the pleasures of food and settled domestic life. Fig trees are portrayed as part of this new age by Micah and Zechariah, since they symbolize how the best of the present age will continue when God’s reign is fully established: “ ‘In that day each of you will invite his neighbor to sit under his vine and fig tree,’ declares the Lord Almighty” (Zech 3:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; also Mic 4:4).

See also Fruit; Leaf; Tree, Trees; Vine, Vineyard.

FILL, FULLNESS

At its most positive, the biblical image of fullness is a supreme image of abundance—the maximum satiety that we can imagine for something. In this positive sense, fullness connotes an ideal or a goal toward which the human spirit aspires and for which it longs. It implies not lacking and not falling short of a standard. But negative qualities can also be full, turning the ideal into a vision of terror and divine judgment.

Fullness as Abundance. At the level of human life cycle, the ideal is to die “old and full of years” (Gen 25:8; Gen 35:29; Job 42:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), with one’s life expectancy having been completed. The same quality appears in nature, where for example in Pharaoh’s dream, the years of plenty are pictured as seven heads of grain that are healthy and “full” (Gen 41:7). On a family level the parent is happy whose “quiver is full” of arrows, that is, children (Ps 127:5). In an agrarian society abundance is having barns “filled with every kind of provision” (Ps 144:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In a drought-prone land the ideal is to have “streams ... filled with water to provide the people with grain” (Ps 65:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). All of these positive meanings of fullness converge in the book of Ruth, where the image of fullness counteracts the motif of emptiness at the levels of the individual, the family, society and nature (Rauber).

The physical quality of being full or complete can also have an ethical dimension, expressing the virtue of honesty. God required that people should use “a full and just weight” and “a full and just measure” (Deut 25:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). God wants “the full tithes” brought “into the storehouse” (Mal 3:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). People who have stolen must make restitution in full (Lev 6:5).

Spiritual Fullness. Fullness also assumes a spiritual quality in Scripture. It characterizes the actions and character of God. Thus God’s glory fills the earth (Ps 72:19; Jer 23:24; Is 6:3; Ezek 43:5). So does his love (Ps 119:64). God is “full of compassion” (Ps 116:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and “full of ... mercy” (Jas 5:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Divine fullness is repeatedly associated with Jesus, where the added motif of fulfillment is a frequent part of the picture. Christ “came from the Father, full of grace and truth” (Jn 1:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Through Jesus, the Father showed the human race “the full extent of his love” (Jn 13:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus came that people “may have life ... to the full” (Jn. 10:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Paul draws on the theme of God’s glory that fills the earth (Ps 72:19; Is 6:3; Jer 23:24; Ezek 43:5) and is particularly pleased to dwell in Zion (Ps 132:13, 14) when he speaks of Christ as the locus where “God was pleased to have all his fullness dwell” (Col 1:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and “the whole fullness of Deity dwells bodily” (Col 2:9 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In the scheme of salvation history, moreover, Christ came “when the fullness of time was come” (Gal 4:4, KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]).

Fullness is also a prominent motif in the work of the Holy Spirit, as reported in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] . In the events surrounding the nativity, John the Baptist, Elizabeth and Zechariah were “filled” with the Holy Spirit (Luke 1:15, 41, 67). In the book of Acts, individuals or groups are said to be either “filled” or “full” of the Holy Spirit no fewer than eight times. Ephesians 5:18–20 exhorts believers to “be filled with the Spirit.” In all these passages the image implies being empowered by the Holy Spirit to an extraordinary degree and receiving that power from a source beyond oneself.

The ideal of being spiritually complete applies also to believers both individually and corporately. At a corporate level the kingdom of God will be complete when “the full number of the Gentiles has come in” (Rom 11:25 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In a similar vein, Jesus could claim, “I have not lost one of those you gave me” (Jn 18:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), again expressing an ideal of the body of the redeemed being full, lacking nothing. As Christ’s body, the church is “the fullness of him who fills everything in every way” (Eph 1:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

To be spiritually full and complete is also an individual goal. To be “filled to the measure of all the fullness of God” (Eph 3:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), to “have been given fullness in Christ” (Col 2:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), to have God “fill you with the knowledge of his will through all spiritual wisdom and understanding” (Col 1:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), to “put on the full armor of God” (Eph 6:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), to “be complete, equipped for every good work” (2 Tim 3:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version])—this is the NT [NT NT. New Testament] ideal for the Christian.

The motif of fullness in the double sense of abundance and completeness is prominent in millennial visions of the coming kingdom. In that day “the earth will be full of the knowledge of the Lord” (Is 11:9; Hab 2:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). It will be a time when “the threshing floors will be filled with grain” and when “you will have plenty to eat, until you are full” (Joel 2:24, 26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Furthermore, “The city streets will be filled with boys and girls playing” (Zech 8:5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

At its most positive, then, the biblical image of fullness is an ever-expanding vision of what the human spirit most longs for. A survey of passages listed in a concordance will reveal that fullness is variously associated with health, satiety, maturity, blessing, wealth, justice, light, wisdom, silver and gold, time, value, and restitution.

Fullness as a Negative Image. If good things can be full, so can evil and judgment. By the time we reach Genesis 6:11, the earth is said to have been “corrupt in God’s sight and full of violence,” so that God’s “heart was filled with pain” (Gen 6:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Subsequently, the sin of the Amorites of Canaan will become so evil that it will reach a point of “full measure” (Gen 15:16) where God’s judgment will be executed upon them by Israel’s conquest. But in an ironic twist, Paul can speak of the Jews who are “filling up the measure of their sins” so that God’s wrath is overtaking them (1 Thess 2:16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A violent society is “full of blood” (Is 2:16), “full of bloodshed and ... full of violence” (Ezek 7:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). A morally corrupt society is pictured as being “unclean with the pollutions of the peoples of the lands, with their abominations which have filled it from end to end with their uncleanness” (Ezra 9:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In this vein, prophetic visions of the future sometimes become a surrealistic vision of terror in which houses are “full of howling creatures” (Is 13:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Animals), waters “are full of blood” (Is 15:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and “all tables are full of vomit” (Is 28:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

A society filled with evil becomes the object of God’s complete judgment. Here we find a cluster of passages that speak of God’s “full wrath” (Ps 78:38 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), of a prophet’s being “full of the wrath of the Lord” (Jer 6:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and of the “full strength” of the cup of God’s wrath (Rev 14:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

As with the positive images of fullness, a survey of passages listed in a concordance will reveal an ever-expanding vision of how terrible evil can be when it is full. In the Bible we can find the quality of fullness ascribed to shame, misery, deceit, bribes, boasting, evil, guilt, vengeance, hypocrisy, darkness, bloody hands, poisonous tongues and adulterous eyes. Fullness is likewise ascribed to a city with idols and a land full of adulterers, bloodshed, violence and injustice.

See also Abundance.

Bibliography. D. H. Rauber, “Literary Values in the Book of Ruth,” JBL [JBL JBL. Journal of Biblical Literature] 89 (1970) 27–37.

FILLING.

See Fill, Fullness; Holy Spirit.

FILTH.

See Dung.

FIND, FOUND

With well over five hundred occurrences of the vocabulary of finding, it is no exaggeration to say that the Bible is a book in which people are continuously finding something or being found. Many of the references are to everyday circumstances of finding something that has been hidden or lost (see Lost and Found), but symbolic meanings also converge in the imagery of finding.

Finding often relates to righteousness and sin, for example. In all parts of the Bible, God speaks of looking for righteousness and instead finding sin in his people. Such a theme begins with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 18) and ends in Revelation. In Exodus and Numbers, God leaves specific instructions for what must be done to those “found” in a crime. In 1 Kings 21:21 Ahab expresses such a meaning when he is caught in a sin by Elijah, and he asks mockingly, “Have you found me, O my enemy?” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Throughout the psalms the psalmist hopes for such justice, begging God to find out the sin of the wicked and to punish it. In Jeremiah, Micah and the other prophets, God finds sin in his nation of Israel; and in Daniel 5:27 God finds similar unrighteousness in Babylon, declaring that Babylon has been “weighed on the scales and found wanting.”

In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , God’s measuring of his people shifts slightly from finding sin to not finding righteous deeds. Jesus warns the people of the necessity of being found bearing fruit, representing his message in a parable in which the master returns to find what his slave has performed while he was absent (Mt 21:19; 24:46). The apostles warn their churches that they must be found pursuing God and without unrighteousness (2 Cor 5:3; 2 Pet 3:14; Rev 2:2; 3:4). The climax of God’s searching of people’s souls occurs in Revelation, where God judges the nations, rejecting any whose names are not found in the book of life (Rev 20:15). To the very end of the Bible, therefore, God emphasizes the sin that he finds in humanity.

As a contrast to the unrighteousness found in humanity,

God emphasizes the righteousness that can be found in himself and in those who are following him. The Philistines found no fault in David (1 Sam 29:3, 6), and in contrast to the evil of Babylon, the Babylonian and Persian kings typically can find no wrong in Daniel (1:19; 5:11). When the Israelites disobey God, he ironically demands of his people, “What wrong did your ancestors find in me?” (Jer 2:5). The biblical statements about Jesus’ righteousness are the strongest statements of a comprehensive search being made of him and no sin being discovered (Mal 2:6). In the Gospels, Pilate and the Pharisees could find no guilt in Jesus (Lk 23:4; Jn 19:4). Finally, in Revelation, when no one was righteous enough was found to open the scroll, only Jesus was holy enough to perform the job (Rev 5:4–5).

The imagery of finding is also used in contexts that discuss human quests to find meaning and satisfaction in life. Here seeking connotes a strenuous search in which something is long sought. When such a thing is found, it is often rare or precious. In many passages God repeats his invitation that those who seek him will find him (Deut 4:29; Mt 7:7–8; Lk 11:9). However, God also expresses his grace, maintaining that he was found by those who did not seek him (Is 65:1; Rom 10:20). Yet due to the disobedience of his people, God also expresses that such grace can be rescinded, declaring that Israel would be unable to find him due to her great disobedience (Amos and Hosea). In fact, few find the narrow road that leads to righteousness and knowing God (Mt 7:14).

To those who desire to find God, he promises many blessings. He promises that his people will “find rest for [their] souls” in him (Jer 6:16; Mt 11:29). God also provides refuge for his people, and what is found in God is so precious that it cannot be found anywhere else (Ps 61:4; 69:20). The wisdom found in God is equally precious: such wisdom, “who can find?” (Prov 20:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 31:6, on the rarity and value of a virtuous wife). In his parables comparing the kingdom of heaven to finding treasure in a field or a pearl of great value (Mt 13:34, 36), Jesus demonstrates that knowing God is precious. But Jesus also emphasizes that God must be sought directly, for a mere seeking of the benefits of knowing him will never be fruitful. Paradoxically, he who finds his life will lose it, but he who loses his life for Christ's sake will find it (Mt 16:25).

See also Guilt; Lost and Found; Quest; Search, Searching; Sin.

FINGER

Finger(s) appears thirty-one times in the Bible. A finger can often be an image that brings with it mercy/grace or judgment. The nuances associated with this word are remarkable. A partial list of its various uses follows: denoting power or authority (Gen 41:42; Ex 8:19; 1 Kings 12:10; 2 Chron 10:10; Esther 3:10; Mk 7:33; Lk 11:20; 15:22); assigning blame (Is 58:9; 59:3); communicating or writing (Ex 31:18; Deut 9:10; Prov 6:13; Dan 5:5); work [of] (Ex 8:19; Ps 8:3; 144:1; Prov 31:19; Is 2:8; Mt 23:4; Lk 11:20, 46); bringing mercy/aid (Mt 23:4; Mk 7:33; Lk 11:46; 16:24); associated with sexuality (Song 5:5); unit of measure (Jer 52:21); touching as source of belief (Jn 20:25, 27).

The biblical image of the finger carries with it the general notion of power and influence. More specifically, fingers often represent the source of deliberate action; as such, the activity of the fingers reflects the character of their owner. The phrase "the finger of God" is often used in Scripture to indicate God's authority (Ex 31:18; Deut 9:10), his signature or trademark (Ex 8:19), his work (Ps 8:3) or his power (Ex 8:19).

Both the arm and hand are more common biblical images of power; however, because of its relative size, the image of a single finger can represent the smallest increment of power or influence. One example is the young men's advice to Rehoboam that he should boast, "My little finger is thicker than my father's waist" (1 Kings 12:10; 1 Chron 10:10) when comparing the power he would wield over Israel with that of Solomon. Likewise, when God commands Satan concerning Job, he forbids him to lay even a finger upon Job himself (Job 1:12). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Jesus condemns the Pharisees for burdening people with their interpretations of the law, and then refusing to lift a finger toward helping them with that burden (Mt 23:4).

More frequently, fingers function as an image of activity, whether human or divine. When fingers portray human activity, they can be the source of either good or evil: the one who seeks wisdom is instructed to take wise teachings and "bind them on your fingers" (Prov 7:3). It is the Lord himself who prepares the psalmist's fingers for battle (Ps 144:1). In these instances the fingers receive direction toward righteous action. But human fingers can also produce evil. The motif of fingers working evil is most prevalent in Isaiah. Here it is fingers that produce idols (Is 2:8; 17:8); the pointed finger, connoting accusation and malice, yields a "yoke of oppression" (Is 58:9). Consequently, the fingers as agents of wickedness become stained with guilt (Is 59:3).

Nevertheless, the image of fingers can also convey divine power in action, whether the activity be for creation, revelation or judgment. In the work of creation the Lord makes the heavens and fashions the moon and stars with his fingers (Ps 8:3). Here the picture is that of God the artisan, forming his work with dexterity and precision, or as H. W. Wolff expresses it, "the artistic filigree-work in the delicate web of the constellations" (Wolff, 68). As a revelatory image it is the "finger of God" that writes the Ten Commandments on tablets of stone for Moses (Ex 29:12; Deut

9:10). Moreover, in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] it is the “finger of God” by which Jesus drives out demons, thus proclaiming the arrival of the kingdom of God (Lk 11:20). When God sends the plague of gnats upon Egypt, it is his finger that Pharaoh’s magicians understand to be the agent of judgment (Ex 8:19). In Daniel bodiless fingers actually appear before Belshazzar and record God’s judgment of him on the wall (Dan 5:5). In each case, finger imagery conveys the power and immediacy of God’s action.

The image of the finger also turns up in the joint activity of the sacrifice, where God meets his people. In God’s instructions to Moses regarding sin offerings, finger imagery plays a key role. For regular sin offerings as well as on the Day of Atonement, God’s instructions for the priest include dipping a finger into the blood of the sacrifice and sprinkling it either on the altar (Lev 4:6ff) or, on the Day of Atonement, on the cover of the ark of testimony (Lev 16:14, 19). Here there is a double image: human fingers do as God commands—a picture of obedience; but at the same time the priest, acting on behalf of the sinner(s), appears before God with blood-stained fingers—a picture of guilty sinners cast before the judgment and mercy of God.

See also Arm; Foot; Hand; Toe.

Bibliography. H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974).

FIRE

Fire, which (the apocryphal) Ecclesiasticus 39:26 groups with water, iron, salt, flour, milk, honey, wine, oil and clothing as a basic necessity, is the servant of human beings. It cooks their food (Ex 12:8; Is 44:15–16; Jn 21:9), makes them warm (Is 44:15; Jn 18:18) and gives them light to see (Is 50:11; Mt 25:1–13). It can be part of a manufacturing process (Gen 11:3) and can refine metals (Is 1:25; Mal 3:2–3). It also burns refuse (Lev 8:17). Because starting a fire is work (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Macc 10:3), it is prohibited on the sabbath (Ex 35:3).

But fire, which can terrify as well as benefit, is also an instrument of warfare. Throughout the Bible many battles end with the victors (sometimes at God's command) burning down the city of the losers (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Josh 6:24; 8:8; 11:11; Judg 1:8; 1 Kings 9:16; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mt 22:7). This is why war itself or its fury can be likened to, or spoken of, as fire (Num 21:28; Is 10:16; Zech 12:6).

Fire can be the instrument of execution for criminals (Gen 38:24; Lev 20:14; 21:9; Josh 7:15; cremation is otherwise not practiced in the Bible; see Crime and Punishment). So it is in Daniel 3, where rescue from fire is a miracle (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 11:34). Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, although thrown into Nebuchadnezzar's fiery furnace, survive the ordeal without harm. The event causes the pagan king to bless the Hebrews' God and to promote the three youths.

Unlike Greek mythology, the Bible has nothing to say about the origin of fire. But this very silence compels readers to presume fire to be one of the gifts of creation. Already Abel brings fat portions of his firstlings to sacrifice (Gen 4:4), implying a burnt offering. (Incidentally, although Genesis 4:4–5 does not inform us how Cain and Abel recognize that God has regard for the sacrifice of Able but not of Cain, commentators have long speculated that, as in other OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stories, divine fire burns up one offering but not the other.)

Religious Uses. Beyond the common secular uses, people also used fire for religious purposes. In Numbers 31:22–23, for instance, fire is an instrument of ceremonial purification. More importantly, sacrifices—not just “burnt offerings”—are typically burned (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lev 2:2, etc.). Perhaps we should find here a symbol: the fire represents God’s desire to destroy sin and to purify his people (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 6:6–7). Moreover, the smoke from fire rises, which is an appropriate indication of the symbolic movement of sacrifice: the offerer on earth is seeking to communicate with God in heaven (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] incense and prayer ascending to heaven, Rev 8:4; Phil 4:18).

The practice of burning offerings is not confined to Israel. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] refers, for example, to the sacrificial burning of children by pagans and apostate Jews (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] Lev 18:21; Deut 18:10; 2 Kings 16:3; 17:17; 21:6; 23:10; Jer 7:31; 32:35). Several of these refer to the cult of Molech and use the phrase “make their sons and daughters pass through the fire” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Reference is also made to “strange” or “unholy” fire, which seems to involve fire taken from elsewhere than the official altar. According to Leviticus 6:8–13 the fire on the altar of burnt offering should be ever-burning: the priests must not allow it to go out. It is a sign of God’s continual presence.

Theophany of Fire. In Genesis 15:17 the presence of God appears as a smoking fire pot and a flaming torch, and in Exodus 3:2 God makes himself known to Moses “in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Burning Bush). This association of God with fire runs throughout the Bible. God descends upon Mount Sinai “in fire” in Exodus 19:18. (That there is thunder encourages one to think of the lightning; but that there is smoke and a mountain moves one to envisage a volcano; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 22:8–9.) When Ezekiel tries to describe the indescribable—that is, the form on the divine throne—he says, “Upward from what had the appearance of his loins I saw as it were gleaming bronze, like the appearance of fire enclosed round about; and downward from what had the appearance of his loins I saw as it were the appearance of fire, and there was brightness round about him” (Ezek 1:27 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Revelation 4:5 lightning flashes from God’s throne.

Often the imagery of God’s appearance is clearly that of a thunderstorm, and the fire that is mentioned must be akin to lightning. In Psalm 18:14 (a battle theophany), lightning flashes are God’s arrows (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 144:6). Psalm 29:7 says that “the voice of the Lord flashes forth flames of fire. The voice of the Lord shakes the wilderness” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Ezekiel 1:4 the prophet sees “a storm wind” come “out of the north, and a great cloud, with brightness round about it, and fire flashing forth continually” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

That God should appear as fire is appropriate for many reasons. Just as all physical life depends on the fire that is the sun (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Rev 16:8), so does all spiritual life depend on God. Just as fire both purifies and destroys, so does God purify the righteous and destroy the wicked (“for our God is a consuming fire,” Heb 12:29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Just as fire lights up the blackness of night, so does God overcome the dark powers of evil. Just as fire is mysterious and immaterial, so too is God enigmatic and incorporeal. And just as fire is always flickering and changing its shape and cannot be held for examination, so is God always the indefinable who is beyond our grasp. (It is striking that in 1 Kings 19:12, in the revelation on Horeb [= Sinai] to Elijah, God is not in the fire as he is for Moses on Sinai, but in the silence. Here God, against expectation, dissociates himself from a traditional constituent of the theophany. He need bind himself to no natural element.)

If God himself appears as fire, so do the things around him. His throne is “fiery flames,” its wheels “burning fire” (Dan 7:9). His angelic servants are “flames of fire” (Heb 1:7, quoting LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] Ps 104:4; and Lk 10:18, the devil as lightning or a meteor). Between the cherubim are fire and coals of fire (Ezek 10:2, 6–7). Before God’s throne is a “sea of glass mingled with fire” (Rev 15:2; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 7:23; 2 Chron 4:2), and from before God issues a “stream of fire” (Dan 7:10). The “seven spirits of God” are “torches of fire” (Rev 4:5). Heavenly chariots are made of fire (2 Kings 2:11; 6:17). Even the eyes of the glorified Jesus and other heavenly creatures are like flames of fire (Dan 10:6; Rev 1:14; 2:18). In Acts 2:3–4 the Holy Spirit too is associated with fire (“tongues as of fire”; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 5:24).

Fire from God. During the exodus God makes a pillar of fire to lead his people in the wilderness. The pillar is the outward sign of God’s guiding presence (Ex 12:21; Num 14:14); the same presence covers the tabernacle (Num 9:15–16).

But it is much more typical for supernatural fires to be destructive. Fire falls from heaven and consumes Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19:24), Nadah and Abihu (who conduct improper ritual, Lev 10:1–2), murmuring Israelites (Num 11:1), soldiers of Ahaziah (2 Kings 1:10; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 9:54), Job’s flocks (Job 1:16), and Gog and Magog (Rev 20:9; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 38:22; 39:6). Sometimes the image is of something like lightning (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 9:24; Num 11:1); other times one thinks rather of a volcanic eruption (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Sodom and Gomorrah).

Fire also occasionally falls not to consume the wicked but to consume a sacrifice, a circumstance that shows God's reality and approval (Lev 9:24; Judg 6:21; 1 Kings 18:24: "the God who answers by fire, he is God" [RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]]; 1 Chron 21:26; 2 Chron 7:1; Lk 9:54: "do you want us to bid fire to come down from heaven?" RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Revelation 13:13 making fire fall from heaven is a "great sign," yet something that the eschatological false prophet can nevertheless do.

God's Wrath and Eschatological Fire. In what seems to us to be bold anthropomorphism, God's anger burns like a fire (Hos 8:5). It is hot, and he pours it out like fire (Nahum 1:6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lam 2:4). Isaiah 66:15 (God comes in fire to "render his anger in fury") and Jeremiah 15:14 (God says, "in my anger a fire is kindled which shall burn for ever"; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 17:4) are typical. Prophecies of destruction by fire are often simply figurative ways of saying that God's judgment is sure or thorough (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 97:3; Is 33:12; Joel 2:3; Mic 1:4). For Ezekiel "the fire of my wrath" is a fixed expression (Ezek 21:31; 22:21, 31; 38:19).

The images of God's fiery wrath vary from text to text. In several texts the image is of God as a mythical, fire-breathing monster (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 41:19–21; Rev 9:17; 11:5). Thus in Psalm 18:8 smoke comes from his nostrils, devouring fire from his mouth (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Sam 22:9); and Isaiah 30:33 likens the Lord's breath to a stream of brimstone (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 65:5). But in Jeremiah 21:14 one sees a forest fire; in Lamentations 1:13, lightning ("from on high he sent fire"); in Malachi 3:2, a furnace ("a refiner's fire"); and in Isaiah 30:33, a carefully stacked pile of wood.

The association of fire with wrath and the fact that God sometimes destroys the wicked by raining fire make it natural that eschatological judgment be depicted as fire. 2 Thessalonians 1:7 says that the Lord Jesus will be revealed “from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Revelation’s accounts of the latter days are filled with fire-falling from heaven (8:7, 8; 13:13; 16:8), coming from the mouths of humans and beasts (9:17–18; 11:5), punishing the wicked (14:10; 17:16; 18:8). Furthermore, although the prophecy in Zephaniah 3:8 (“in the fire of my jealous wrath all the earth shall be consumed” RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) is probably figurative (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 32:22; Amos 7:4), the one in 2 Peter 3:7, according to which the world is now “stored up for fire,” [RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]] should be taken literally.

Most commonly the object of eschatological fire is not the world as such but the people in it, especially the wicked (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 10:27). There are a variety of pictures. Fire will burn up dross to refine metal (Mal 3:2); it will burn like an oven (Mal 4:1); it will burn up unfruitful trees (Mt 3:10), unfruitful branches (Jn 15:6, though this may be only parabolic, since the Fourth Gospel and the Johannine epistles do not mention eschatological fire otherwise), tares (Mt 13:40) and chaff (Mt 3:12). It will even burn up flesh (Jas 5:3).

Fire belongs not only to the moment of the final judgment but also to the world of eternity; it is the fearful antithesis of the kingdom of God. Already Isaiah 66:24 speaks of a fire that will not be quenched. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] this is assumed to be the everlasting and tormenting fire of hell (Mt 5:22; 13:42; 18:8–9). Revelation 20:10, 14–15 envisages a frightful “lake of fire” into which the devil and his false prophet, death and hades, and all evildoers are cast at the end. Hell is nonetheless also said to be, paradoxically, dark (Mt 8:12; 2 Pet 2:17; Jude 13).

The expectation of eschatological fire may provide the background for some NT [NT NT. New Testament] texts that are otherwise obscure. When John the Baptist, in a prophecy of the last judgment, warns of a baptism of fire, the image is of a river or stream of fire (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Dan 7:10); so we should perhaps imagine an eschatological stream of fire by which the wicked are consumed and the righteous refined (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Zech 13:9). The obscure Mark 9:49, according to which “everyone will be salted with fire” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), could presuppose the same idea. (Salt preserves, while fire destroys; eschatological fire does both.) In 1 Corinthians 3:10–15 the judgment day is a fire that tests all: it burns up the dross and refines that which is truly valuable.

In Isaiah 4:5, however, eschatological fire is not destructive. In the latter days there will be over Mount Zion a cloud by day “and smoke and the shining of a flaming fire by night” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). This prophecy recalls the pillar of fire of the exodus (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 13:21). As in 2 Kings 6:17 (the fiery hosts that protect Elisha) and Zechariah 2:5 (“I will be to her [Jerusalem] a wall of fire round about” RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), here God protects his people with fire.

Fire Metaphors. The Bible is full of metaphorical uses of fire. The tongue is a fire insofar as it is a small thing that can have large and destructive consequences (Jas 3:5–6; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Prov 16:27). God’s word is fire in that it destroys (Jer 5:14; 23:39). To melt as wax before fire is to suffer swift and total eradication (Ps 68:2; 97:5). Being tested by God is like being purified by fire (Is 43:2; Jer 6:29; 1 Pet 4:12). Jealousy is like fire in that it devours (Deut 4:24 [of God]). So too are sexual lust (Prov 6:27; Hos 7:6–7; 1 Cor 7:9) and anger (Eccles 8:10–11). To be plucked like a brand out of the fire (Amos 4:11; Zech 3:2) is to be rescued from great danger.

See also Altar; Brimstone; Burning Bush; Hell; Judgment; Lamp; Light; Lightning; Sacrifice; Wood.

FIREWOOD.

See Wood.

FIRMAMENT.

See Cosmology.

FIRST

First indicates the one coming or ranking at the beginning of a series; the first precedes all others in time (the earliest), order (in contrast to second) or importance.

Fundamentally, it corresponds to the ordinal number one, as in the first river (Gen 2:11) or the first month (Gen 8:5).

Harvests had “firstfruits”—the initial evidence of the bounty at hand—and then the remainder of the crop. As to children, the Bible often designates the firstborn (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 35:23; 36:15; 38:6). Literally, of course, that refers to the first child born to parents—whether the child is male (Gen 27:19) or female (Gen 19:31). In this biological sense Jesus was Mary’s first son (Lk 2:7).

Being first connotes the beginning of something—hence the significant references to the first month or day (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Gen 8:13; Ex 40:2), or the first year of a reign (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Chron 20:3; 36:22; Dan 1:21; 7:1). As a condition of uncorrupted beginning, this first state is sometimes presented as a norm of superior spirituality (Jer 7:12). Returning to it is either a restoration of God’s favor and blessing (Is 1:26; Jer 33:7, 11) or a spiritual revival (Rev 2:4–5).

Firstfruits. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] the Hebrew words translated “firstfruits” refer either to the portion of the crop that is the first to be ripe (Neh 10:35; Num 13:20; Ezek 44:30) or to the part that is best (Num 15:20; 2 Chron 31:5). God institutes a principle (and a festival) in which the firstfruits of the crop (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 23:16, 19; Lev 23:10, 17, 20) and the first shearing of the fleece of sheep (Deut 18:4) are offered in sacrifice to him. When Nehemiah’s contemporaries determine to return to the Lord’s ways, they reinstitute the practice of bringing firstfruits to the Lord to support the priests who serve in his house (Neh 10:35–37; 12:44). The sage believes it is a part of wisdom for all God’s people to honor him with the firstfruits of their substance (Prov 3:9). First and best might both account for God’s considering Israel to be the firstfruits of his harvest (Jer 2:3).

Paul utilizes the metaphor of firstfruit (aparchē) to speak of the relationship between the resurrection of Christ to the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor 15:20, 23). Christ’s resurrection is the “firstfruit of those who have fallen asleep” (1 Cor 15:20), and like the firstfruits of the harvest, it is a taste and a guarantee of the full harvest of resurrection yet to come. Likewise the Holy Spirit is called “firstfruit” in Romans 8:23 (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Holy Spirit as “downpayment” in 2 Cor 1:22; 5:5; Eph 1:14), a foretaste of the heavenly divinely bestowed life of the age to come. And when Paul speaks of his first converts in a region, he calls them the “firstfruits” (Rom 16:5; 1 Cor 16:15), in that they are the firstfruits of God’s eschatological harvest from among the nations.

Firstborn. Firstborn sons have special importance since they insure the existence of the family into the next generation. Just as the firstfruits of the harvest belong to the Lord, so he insists that the firstborn of every womb—animal and human—also belong to him (Ex 13:2, 12; 22:29; 34:19; Num 3:13). In so doing God claims the future of the nation for himself. He institutes a procedure of redemption so the Israelites can regain possession of their firstborn (Ex 13:13, 15) though the sacrifice of firstborn of clean animals (viz., cows, sheep, or goats) to the Lord (Num 18:15, 17). Later God selects the Levites for himself instead of the firstborn among Israel (Num 3:41, 45; 8:18).

Being born first establishes a child in a special place of prominence. The firstborn receives a double portion of the father's inheritance (Deut 21:17). The importance of identifying the firstborn emerges in the incident recorded in Genesis 38:28, where to avert mistake, the midwife ties a scarlet thread around the hand of the twin that emerged first from the womb.

Firstborn assumes a symbolic value due to the pervasive emphasis and importance given to the first one. One of Job's friends, Bildad, opines about Job's condition, "death's firstborn devours his limbs" (Job 18:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); that is, Job has encountered the strongest that death could throw up against him. Here we see that firstborn moves beyond the literal "one who was born first in time" to the concept of first in importance. Thus in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] we read about nations and rulers who are "first" (Num 24:20; Esther 1:14; Dan 6:2). Of special importance is the case of David, of whom God says, "I will also appoint him my firstborn, the most exalted of the kings of the earth" (Ps 89:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Literally, David was neither the first king of Israel nor the first son born to his parents. Firstborn here speaks of preeminence; God appointed David to the position of firstborn.

This idea best explains the title firstborn applied to Jesus in Colossians 1:15, 18. Jesus occupies the position of preeminence in creation and in resurrection, the restoration of God's created order (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Cor 15:20, 23; Heb 1:6; Rev 1:5). Christ is the first and the last (Rev 1:17; 2:8; 22:13). Likewise, though Christians are conformed to the image of Christ, he occupies the exalted position of firstborn among all his siblings (Rom 8:29). At the same time, just as Israel was God's special nation, so the NT [NT NT. New Testament] authors identify Christians as the firstborn (Heb 12:23) and God's firstfruits (Jas 1:18; Rev 14:4).

Although the associations of being first are thus overwhelmingly positive signposts of preeminence or precedence, the Bible characteristically throws in a surprising reversal of assumptions about first being best. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] story of the younger sibling supplanting the firstborn is so common as to become an archetype. Thus Isaac is given precedence over Ishmael, Jacob over Esau, Joseph over his ten older brothers, Ephraim over Manasseh (Gen 48:13–14), David over his brothers, Rachel over Leah. To this motif we can add Jesus' paradoxical rhetoric in which the first are said to be last and the last, first (Mk 9:35; Lk 13:30; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 22:26).

See also Adoption; Fruit, Fruitfulness; Harvest; Resurrection; Son.

Bibliography. G. M. Burge, "First Fruits, Down Payment," DPL [DPL DPL. Dictionary of Paul and His Letters] 300–301; P. T. O'Brien, "Firstborn," DPL [DPL DPL. Dictionary of Paul and His Letters] 301–3.

FIRSTBORN.

See Birthright; First; Son.

FIRSTFRUITS.

See First; Fruit, Fruitfulness.

FISH, FISHER, FISHING

Fish are a distinct branch of the created order, created on the fifth day by God along with winged creatures with which they are frequently associated (Gen 1:20—23). Paul regarded them as a different type of flesh (1 Cor 15:39). Since they are part of creation, humans are expected to exercise dominion over them (Gen 1:26, 28; Ps 8:8). There is little classification of fish other than the division into clean and unclean (Lev 11:9—12). Human beings are warned not to worship them (Deut 4:18 cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 20:4).

Like all of creation, fish suffer at the exercise of divine judgment (Is 19:8; 50:2; Hos 4:3; Zeph 1:3). They were destroyed in the pollution of the Nile and in the first plague of Egypt (Ex 7:17, 21; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 105:29), and they can equally expect to suffer on the Day of the Lord (Ezek 38:20). By contrast, they feature in great abundance even in the Dead Sea in Ezekiel's ideal future (Ezek 47:10).

Fishers work their nets from a boat.

Fishing and Sea Images. The image of fishing is occasionally used to describe the judgment of God on individuals and peoples (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Eccles 9:12; Amos 4:2; Hab 1:15—17; Ezek 26:5, 14; 29:3—7). Jeremiah 16:16 likens the gathering of the nation for blessing and judgment to the activity of a fisherman (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 32:3).

The Galilean setting of Jesus' ministry creates rich metaphorical connotations. Jesus calls at least seven fishermen (notorious for their roughness) to be amongst his disciples (Mt 4:18—22; Mk 1:16—20; Lk 5:1—11). From the outset their calling is linked to their commissioning to be “fishers for people” (Mt 4:19). The imagery appears to have less of the connotation of possible judgment, which it has in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . The disciples are engaged in the messianic harvest begun by Jesus. Indeed, Luke’s account suggests a messianic abundance of fish to be caught (Lk 5:6–10). This is captured once more in the feedings of the five thousand (Mt 14:13–21; Mk 6:30–44; Lk 9:10–17; Jn 6:1–14) and the four thousand (Mt 15:32–39; Mk 8:1–10). Consciously reflecting the miraculous provision of food for Israel in the wilderness, Jesus is also depicted as feeding his people. Such provision is observable in Matthew 17:24–27, where a fish becomes the provider of temple tax for Jesus and his disciples.

In Matthew 13:47–50 the kingdom of God is likened figuratively to a dragnet in which all kinds of fish are swept up together. In John 21:9–13 when the risen Lord eats fish with his disciples (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Lk 24:42), the symbolic link with the messianic feeding of the multitudes and the recommissioning of, in this case, Peter is reestablished. No symbolic significance for the number of 153 fish in John 21:11 has achieved widespread support.

Images of Judgment. An important aspect of biblical attitudes toward fish is the deep-seated fear of the sea, doubtless occasioned by its inaccessibility throughout much of Israel’s history. At the beginning of time the earth was a formless and chaotic void to which God brought order in his act of creation (Gen 1:1). The sea harbored fearful monsters such as Leviathan (Job 41), an image that reappears in the picture of the Beast from the Sea in Revelation 13:1–10 (see Monsters). In this sense there must be some relationship to the fearsome reality of the dragon in Revelation 12.

The image of the great fish in Jonah must not be confused with images of dragons of the deep. In his desire to escape the call of God, the prophet set out to sea, the very symbol of chaos and danger. In his case the big fish became a source of salvation, preserving him from the inevitable death by drowning (Jon 2:1–10; 4:9–11). However historical this incident may be, the fish must be understood symbolically as representing God's grace of deliverance and salvation. More allegorical readings, which identify the fish as representing the Babylonian exile, are rather fanciful.

Early Church. Despite the fact that neither Paul nor any other NT [NT NT. New Testament] writer uses this imagery, the early church in the first centuries was not slow to make full use of fish and fishing in its art and literature. Generally this is linked to the image of the church as a boat, the place of safety and salvation (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Noah). The fish is one of the symbols of Peter and is sometimes used also as a symbol of baptism. The Greek capitals ICHTHUS ("fish"), it is frequently pointed out, can be made to represent in Greek "Jesus Christ, God's Son, Savior."

See also Animals; Birds; Boat; Hunting; Monsters; Sea.

FISHING.

See Fish, Fisher, Fishing.

FIVE

The number five is a small round number used throughout the Bible. It is the number of fingers on one hand and therefore can stand for a handful, possessing a completeness within itself. One thinks at once of the five books of the Pentateuch and the five-discourse arrangement of material in the Gospel of Matthew.

At times five is used to represent a small sum, numerically insignificant within a larger scheme but paradoxically possessing high value nonetheless. When Abraham pleads with God for the city of Sodom (Gen 18:22–33), he begins by asking God to spare Sodom if fifty righteous people are found there. When God accepts, he pleads for five fewer, suggesting that the loss of five is insignificant in its consequence. He does this twice before boldly asking for ten fewer. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Paul stresses the superior value of a mere “five intelligible words” over “ten thousand words in a tongue” (1 Cor 14:19 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

At other times the number five indicates just recompense or bounteous reward. Thieves must repay five times the value of oxen they steal (Ex 22:1). The Israelites are to reclaim their firstborn with a payment of five shekels each (Num 3:47). Benjamin was honored by Joseph with five times more food than his brothers (Gen 43:34) and five sets of clothes (Gen 45:22).

Most commonly five is represented as half of the basic number ten. Throughout the measurements for the tabernacle and the temple, parallel units of five are used. Ten curtains covered the tabernacle in two groups of five (Ex 26:3). Each wing of the cherubim in the temple was five cubits long, totaling ten cubits (1 Kings 6:24). In the parable of the ten virgins, Jesus divides them in half between five wise and five foolish (Mt 25:2).

The number five thus variously represents a small but significant number within a larger mass, abundance on a small scale or (when used in pairs) a pointer to the completeness and totality of ten.

See also First; Forty; Four; Hundred; One; Pentecost; Seven; Seventy; Three, Third; Twelve; Two.

FLAG.

See Banner.

FLAME.

See Fire.

FLEE, FLIGHT

While the Bible paints many pictures of routine actions in a daily setting, it also captures people in moments of crisis, as the motif of flight attests. Well over two hundred references to people's fleeing from something convey a sense of the vulnerability of people living in the world of the Bible and of the dangers that frequently beset them.

Not surprisingly, approximately half of the references to flight occur in the battle stories of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] historical books. In fact, the motif of flight and chase is endemic to battle itself, inasmuch as the whole point of joining battle is to dislodge an opponent from the territory it is occupying. A related (though small) category of references is apocalyptic, with people portrayed as fleeing to the mountains (for example) to escape the judgment of God. On a positive side, the besieged woman of Revelation 12 (representing Israel and the church) flees from the dragon into the wilderness and is spared. Of a similar nature is the flight of Lot and his family from Sodom just before its conflagration.

Beyond the military and eschatological references, the Bible's memorable stories of flight portray characters fleeing for their lives from powerful figures who wish to destroy them. Thus Jacob flees for his life from Esau and later from Laban, David flees from a paranoid Saul and later from a usurping son Absalom, and Elijah flees from Jezebel after she declares war on the prophets of God. The fledgling nation of Israel flees from Egypt, and centuries later the holy family flees to Egypt to escape Herod's plans for genocide. Moses flees for his life after slaying an Egyptian taskmaster. In an ignominious and futile venture, Jonah attempts to flee from the presence of God, a feat that Psalm 139:7–12 had long since declared to be an ironic impossibility.

See also Battle Stories; Fear; Flight, Chase and Flight; Hide, Hiding; Runaway; Trembling, Shaking, Bodily Anguish; Wanderer, Wandering.

FLESH.

See Body.

FLIGHT, CHASE AND FLIGHT

The flight (or chase and flight) motif predominates both divisions of the biblical canon and is expressed in a variety of terms. Essentially, the motif portrays the nature and character of relationships individuals have with the Lord God, with each other and to the realities of sin, righteousness and judgment. Additionally, this motif functions to structure the sequence of action in a number of biblical narratives.

The presence of the flight motif in narrative sections often structures the story, moving the action from conflict toward resolution. The structural components of this motif are not static in order or in appearance; rather, the fluid nature of the pattern enriches a close reading of the text. The first element of the pattern includes a situation of conflict between individuals or the Lord beginning the action. The inflaming situation could be jealousy (Gen 27), barrenness (Gen 16:1–5) or a change of attitude (Gen 31:2). Second, a departure or a chase results. The intensity of an interpersonal conflict will put one to flight, driving an individual away (Gen 16:6), or it may result in a chase (Gen 31:23). Third, a divine or a human intervention occurs. The purpose of intervention varies and its location in the story line is fluid. It appears after the chase begins to protect the pursued (Gen 31:24), and it emerges before the chase begins to encourage the pursuer in the pursuit (Judg 20:18, 23). Ultimately, the intervention serves God's intention to rescue or to discipline (Judg 9:56—57).

Finally, the outcome is detailed. A conflict, a chase and an intervention create a tension in need of resolution. In some accounts the outcome includes an escape (Judg 9:5), the capture of the hunted individual (Judg 8:28) or a reunion between parties in conflict (Gen 33:1—20). Other narratives, such as those of Saul and David, move from a temporary solution or lull in the action to a continuation of the conflict and the chase. The structure of this motif creates a number of tensions regarding the chase and facilitates characterization and the exposure of the motive.

The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] gives us stories of individuals who flee from the Lord (Adam and Eve, Gen 3:8—9; Cain, Gen 4:12—16; Jonah, Jon 1:3) and of those who flee to him as a refuge in order to enjoy the security of a divine haven (David, 2 Sam 22:3; Jer 16:19; Ps 59:17; 142:5).

Relationships between biblical characters often degenerate into a conflict resulting in a flight or a chase. A historical investigation of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] canon reveals the flight, chase and flight motif structures and develops these relationships (Sarai and Hagar; Esau and Jacob; Jacob and Laban; Joseph and Potiphar's wife; Joseph and his brothers; Moses and Pharaoh; Abimelech and Jephthah; Israel and the tribe of Benjamin; Saul and David; Absalom and David). Sadly, the motif reveals the heartache of dysfunctional relationships between members of the covenant community.

We also see the motif developed in the stories of the relationship between God, Israel and the nations. The Joshua conquest narratives illustrate the structure and the theology of the flight motif. The conquest of the Promised Land is undertaken on the basis of covenant blessings and curses related to chase and flight (Lev 26:7, 17, 36; Deut 28:7, 25). Each conquest episode in Joshua 2—11 pictures Israel either chasing or being chased on the basis of their covenant loyalty. The hymns of Hannah (1 Sam 2) and David (2 Sam 22—23), and the prayer of Solomon (1 Kings 8) celebrate God's covenant loyalty in matters of flight and chase. The divine warrior will chase his enemies and bring them to judgment. Although some may attempt to elude the pursuit of the Lord, the prophets predict the Lord's inescapable chase in eschatological contexts (Rev 9:6). The joy of this eschatological setting is the flight of sorrow and sighing (Is 35:10), and the related gladness of security (Is 51:11).

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] exhorts God's people to flee unrighteousness (1 Cor 6:18; 10:14; 1 Tim 6:11) and to pursue righteousness and all its attendants (Rom 12:13; 14:19; 1 Cor 14:1; 1 Thess 5:15; 1 Pet 3:11). The nature of this flight and chase reveals one's character and motives.

See also Battle Stories; Enemies; Fear; Flee, Flight; Hide, Hiding; Running.

FLIGHT.

See Flee, Flight; Flight, Chase and Flight.

FLINT.

See Minerals.

FLOCK

In the biblical world, a flock is almost always a group of sheep, though occasionally a group of goats is involved. When the specific image of flock is used (as distinct from sheep), the image incorporates what might be called the group dynamics of the sheep as a community of animals. The exception is the use of the term flock to indicate abundant numbers (Ps 107:41; Ezek 36:37–38) or to refer generically to livestock as a possession, as in the nearly fifty references to “flocks and herds,” a stock epithet for sheep and cattle, respectively.

The importance of the image of the flock (almost two hundred biblical references) should not be surprising in view of the pastoral setting of Israel’s history. At its most general, flocks are an image of abundance, prosperity and the blessing of God. The growth of the flocks and herds of Abraham and Lot that required them to separate is an index to the fact that “Abram was very rich” (Gen 13:2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Jacob’s “large flocks” (Gen 30:43) are an evidence of his economic success as well as the favor of God (Gen 31:12). In fact, the size of a family’s flocks was a quick way to assess its financial rating (Gen 24:35; 29:2). In Deuteronomy, with its characteristic blessing/curse motif, a flock’s size is explicitly related to Israel’s obedience or disobedience to God (Deut 28:4, 18). At the most elementary level, then, flocks of sheep represent earthly abundance and security, often viewed as the covenant blessing of God as a reward for obedience (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Deut 8:13; 15:14; 2 Chron 32:29).

As a visible picture of abundance and the good life, a flock of sheep produces strong connotations of well-being and even aesthetic beauty to a farmer’s eyes. These feelings lie behind the references to flocks in the collection of pastoral love lyrics known as the Song of Songs. Here flocks refer to the wealth or value that the lover possesses in his beloved or to the beauty that he sees in her. Thus we find references to the woman’s hair as “a flock of goats, moving down the slopes of Gilead,” an image of value, and her teeth as “a flock of short ewes that have come up from the washing,” a reference to wetness and whiteness (Song 4:1—2; 6:5—6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The group qualities of a flock of sheep emerge, not in the literal pictures of shepherding that we find in the Bible, but in the metaphoric passages describing the care of God for his people. These metaphors are rooted in the characteristics of actual flocks. Most of the references are positive. The “oneness” of the flock, belonging to one shepherd, is an image of security and community (Jn 10:16). Similarly, God as shepherd gathers his flock together (Is 60:7; Jer 23:3), keeps it as a possession (Jer 31:10), seeks it out (Ezek 34:12), protects it (Ezek 34:22), encloses it in a sheepfold (Mic 2:12) and feeds it (Ps 79:13; Is 40:11; Mic 5:4). Perhaps the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] visions of the covenant people as God’s flock can be regarded as finding their fulfillment in NT [NT NT. New Testament] references to the church as a flock (Acts 20:28; 1 Pet 5:2).

On the negative side, in bad times God’s people, like sheep, are scattered (Jer 10:21; 23:2) and doomed to slaughter (Zech 11:4, 7). If there is the proverbial “strength in numbers” as sheep are congregated into a flock, the flock can also be an image of vulnerability. Thus we find references to the disciples as a “little flock” that needs to be commanded to “fear not” (Lk 12:32) and to attacks from a wolf as the hireling abandons the flock (Jn 10:12; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 20:29).

In summary, the image of the flock is both a physical reality and spiritual symbol. In the agrarian world of the Bible, flocks of sheep are part of the daily routine for a nation of farmers. This picture of the good life is given spiritual significance by being linked to God’s blessing for obedience and to the sacrificial system in which people were commanded to give from their flocks to God (e.g. [e.g. e.g..

for example] , Lev 1:2; 5:6; 27:32). As a fully developed metaphor, the flock is an apt picture of the combined people of God under his care.

See also Abundance; Farming; Goat; herd; Hireling; Lamb; Pasture; Sheep, Shepherd.

FLOOD

Nothing captures the destructive, death—dealing potential of water like the image of a flood—whether it be a flood that rises slowly and inexorably to drown the land, or a flood that thunders unexpectedly down a mountain gully, sweeping away everything in its path. Scripture uses both kinds of imagery, sometimes describing flooding like that of the Nile in Egypt (see Jer 46:7—9), at other times suggesting the kind of flash floods experienced in Palestine when storms in the mountains sent water gushing down the dry wadis (see Job 27:19—20). Although we know flooding can be beneficial, the Bible almost never uses flooding as a positive image. Isaiah 66:12, where God promises that wealth will come to his people “like a flooding stream” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), is a rare exception.

Noah’s flood (Gen 6—8) with its cataclysmic, universal impact gives dramatic expression to the major themes that will be carried by flood imagery throughout the Bible. This first and most far-reaching of floods demonstrates God’s sheer power: as he had created a world teeming with life, he could as easily destroy it. God declares, “I am going to bring floodwaters on the earth to destroy all life under the heavens, every creature that has the breath of life in it. Everything on earth will perish” (Gen 6:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The first flood also expresses God’s hatred of sin. God’s heart is filled with pain (Gen 6:6) when he sees how humans have corrupted the good world he has created. In his righteousness God determines to wipe out evil. So he says to Noah, “I am going to put an end to all people, for the earth is filled with violence because of them” (Gen 6:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Beyond demonstrating God’s power and his hatred of evil, Noah’s flood also embodies God’s determination to bring new life out of the chaos wrought by human sin. God will find a way to rescue those who trust in him, carrying them through disaster and giving them a fresh start. Thus God shuts Noah and his family and the animals in the ark, and they float on the flood until the waters recede. Then God tells them, “Come out of the ark.... Bring out every living creature that is with you ... so they can multiply on the earth and be fruitful” (Gen 8:16–17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

After the description of the great flood in Genesis 6–8, flood imagery is concentrated in the poetic books of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] -especially Job, Psalms and several of the prophets. Sometimes flood imagery is used principally to testify to God’s awesome power, as when the book of Joshua describes how God stopped the flow of the Jordan “at flood stage” (Josh 3:15) to allow his chosen people to enter the Promised Land. Joshua explains to the people, “The Lord your God ... did this so that all the peoples of the earth might know that the hand of the Lord is powerful and so that you might always fear the Lord your God” (Josh 4:23–24 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

More commonly flood imagery is used to picture God’s determination to punish sin. Whereas judgment came in the form of a literal flood in Noah’s time, later references often use flood figuratively to represent any retribution God brings either on his own people (for example, Jerusalem, referred to poetically as Ephraim, in Isaiah 28:1–2) or on their enemies (for example, Assyria in Isaiah 30:27–31). Like the worldwide deluge of Genesis, flood images often suggest that God works on a large scale, bringing nation against nation to accomplish his purposes. Jeremiah pictures God's use of Pharaoh's armies this way: "See how the waters are rising ... they will overflow the land and everything in it, the towns and those who live in them. The people will cry out ... at the noise of enemy chariots ... The Lord is about to destroy the Philistines" (Jer 47:2—4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Sometimes flood images are used figuratively to represent deep, seemingly overwhelming troubles, which are not necessarily punishment from God but which provide an opportunity for God to rescue his people. The kinds of troubles represented by flood imagery include death ("the cords of death entangled me; the torrents of destruction overwhelmed me" [Ps 18:4 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]]); loneliness ("Your terrors ... surround me like a flood... You have taken my companions and loved ones from me" [Ps 88:16—18 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]]); public derision ("Those who sit at the gate mock me ... deliver me from those who hate me, from the deep waters" [Ps 69:12—14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]]); and war ("when men attacked us ... the torrent would have swept over us, the raging waters would have swept us away" [Ps 124:2—5 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]]). In every kind of trouble, God can be counted on to save those who put their trust in him. Thus David exults in Psalm 18: "He reached down from on high and took hold of me; he drew me out of deep waters" (Ps 18:16).

The dual themes of God's punishing and saving power are expressed by Isaiah when he prophesies that God will "come like a pent-up flood" to "repay wrath to his enemies," but the Redeemer will come to save those who repent of their sins (Is 59:18—20 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). These dual themes continue to be embodied in NT [NT NT.

New Testament] uses of flood imagery. Writers look back on Noah's flood as foreshadowing the judgment that will come on people who persist in their sinfulness, but the picture of Noah also reinforces God's promise to save and protect those who put their trust in Christ as Savior (see Mt 24:37—41; 1 Pet 3:18—2; 2 Pet 2:4—10).

The parable of the wise and foolish builders in Luke 6:46—49 uses flood imagery as a forceful reminder that a spiritual house cannot stand unless it is built on Jesus and his words. Those who do will be like the wise man who built his house on the rock: "When a flood came, the torrent struck that house but could not shake it" (Lk 6:48 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). However, those who fail to listen to Jesus and obey will be like the foolish builder with no foundation: "The moment the torrent struck that house, it collapsed and its destruction was complete" (Lk 6:49 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). As in Noah's day, so in Jesus' day and ours: the disastrous consequences of sin can utterly destroy, but God's saving power will provide refuge.

See also Ark; Chaos; Cosmology; Death; Judgment; Rescue; River; Sin; Water.

FLOWERS

The flowers, blooms and blossoms referred to in Scripture, as well as their equivalent actions—to flourish, to bloom, to blossom—illustrate several prominent biblical themes such as pride, beauty, love, restoration and transience. Flower imagery in descriptions of the tabernacle and of Solomon's temple and in the Song of Songs largely develop the themes of beauty and love, whereas those referring to pride, transience and restoration are typically found in the Psalms and the Prophets.

Two Hebrew words comprise most of the references usually translated generically as “flower,” “bloom,” “blossom” and their verb formations. Their root or extended meanings convey a sense of the vivid character and emotional associations that biblical writers attached to them. Perah suggests an image of breaking forth, budding, sprouting, even bursting. Šîš has evokes a shining, sparkling or gleaming. The first associates flowers with a spectacular, spontaneous growth and the second with a glorious, radiant, shimmering beauty.

The most frequently mentioned specific flowers are traditionally translated “lily” and “rose” (Heb [Heb Heb. Hebrew] šušan and h^abāselet respectively). Students of Palestinian botany tell us that neither of these is probably the correct translation, however. The lily familiar to most readers, the white or “Easter” lily (Lilium candidum), grows in remote regions of Israel but does not fit the description attributed to it in the biblical text as growing in valleys, among brambles or in pasture land. The common rose is not native to this region either. Many commentators now assume, for example, that the phrase “lilies of the field” means any of the showy, attractive flowers that burst forth in glorious profusion in the springtime on the plains, pastures and hills of the Carmel and Sharon regions, which are proverbial for their fertility and beauty. These flowers include ranunculus, anemone, cyclamen, tulip, hyacinth, narcissus, crocus, iris and orchid. Any reference to lilies or roses in the following discussion could therefore just as easily be substituted with one of these species or could be understood to be making a generic reference to flowers.

In the accounts of the furnishing of the Mosaic tabernacle (Ex 25:31–34; 37:17–20; Num 8:4) and the Solomonic temple (1 Kings 6:18, 29, 32, 35; 7:19, 22, 24, 26, 49; also 2 Chron 4:5, 21), flowers, particularly almond blossoms and lilies, figure prominently, justifying the later psalmic reference to the “beauty of holiness.” The lampstands of the tabernacle, and later of the temple, were designed as almond trees and their “bowls” (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , cups holding the oil and wick) as almond blossoms. Additional almond blossoms decorated the “stems” of the lampstand, suggesting a graceful art-deco-like style. (For another view of the lampstands as representing an edenic “tree of life,”* see Myers). We should also recall Aaron’s rod that sprouted almond blossoms and even ripe almonds. It was placed in the ark of the covenant under the mercy seat. On the gold and cedar walls of Solomon’s temple were engraved cherubim, palm trees and both open flowers and closed buds; and on the doors of olive and cypress were more open flowers. More spectacular, the bronze pillars were adorned with lilies and pomegranates four cubits (approximately six feet!) in size; and the sea of bronze, whose brim was shaped like a lily blossom, was further ornamented with two rows of lily buds around it. Some temple music also evoked floral settings; several psalms are labeled to be sung to the tune “Lilies” (see headings to Psalms 45, 69 and 80 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Given that, as Hebrews 8:5 tells us, these things were built after a pattern in heaven, we are justified in viewing their function as more than superficial or merely ornamental. Without attaching any particular symbolic or allegorical meaning to the use of flowers in the tabernacle/temple design, we may affirm an organic principle that the flower ornament contributes to the sanctity of the whole and that beauty, rightly appreciated, is a reflection of the divine and a prompt to godliness. Jesus takes just such an interpretation of flowers in the only NT [NT NT. New Testament] reference to their beauty, the famous “Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they neither toil nor spin; yet ... Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these” (Mt 6:28—29 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Lk 12:27). The beauty of one single flower in a meadow is more gorgeous than all the riches of Solomon, Jesus declares, and the flower did not have to worry about getting riches to clothe itself. The flower's beauty teaches much about the glory that God gives (grace) and much about the vanity of human effort to duplicate it.

Flowers are also the language of love, as florists tell us; and the Song of Songs, a love poem set in a garden, supports this truism. The sensuous quality of flowers—their colors, shapes and scents, their delicacy of touch—are analogous to the delightful sexuality of physical love and provide the famous similes in the poem: “I am a rose of Sharon, a lily of the valleys” (Song 2:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Because the female speaker is the pursuer and the male the pursued, the poem has lent itself to an allegorical interpretation of the church seeking its bridegroom, Christ. Lilies and pomegranate blooms are the dominant flowers, and the spring setting assures that the flowers are at their zenith of brilliance: the flowers appear, spring has come; winter is past, the vine blossoms are fragrant (Song 2:12, 13).

Flower imagery describes or is associated with both the male and female lovers: she “is a lily among thorns” (Song 2:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); “his lips are like lilies, dripping with myrrh” (Song 5:13 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]); her breasts are like two fawns feeding among the lilies (Song 4:5); he is in a garden, feeding among the lilies, gathering lilies (Song 6:2, 3); her waist is a heap of wheat surrounded by lilies (Song 7:2). This garden is a locus of lovemaking, for “there,” says the Shulamite girl, “I will give you my love” (Song 7:12 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). If Alter is right, that the poem's references to flowers, spices, fruits and fauna have erotic associations, then the Song of Songs is surely one of the tenderest of such poems. It does not stoop to crude analogies of mechanics or animalism or the language of domination, but provides instead parallels to an idyllic, pastoral garden; a cultivated, sensuous, beautiful place; by definition not wild, but tended to with love and care.

While flowers inherently convey images of beauty and love, they also by their nature suggest fragility, transience and sudden decay after a brief moment of splendor. Individual blossoms or flowers last but a few days on the stem. Dislodged by a puff of wind or the shaking of an insect, their papery petals litter the ground and soon fester. Such is the metaphor used in the Psalms, the Prophets, and the NT [NT NT. New Testament] for the life of a person who “flourishes” like the flower or like the grass one day, but the next day is gone. The tone is not elegiac or regretful, as one might expect to find in pagan literature on the brevity of human life, however. The usual contexts are judgment on the proud and wicked, whose deeds will not survive for a very long time, and God’s power in comparison to the paltry deeds of the wicked. Conversely, since the flowering of a plant is in some sense at its prime or its most glorious moment, when all the juice and sap are rising in the springtime, the righteous are also compared to a flowering or flourishing of a plant.

The typical image of human transience occurs in Psalm 103: “As for man, his days are like grass; as a flower of the field, so he flourishes. For the wind passes over it, and it is gone” (Ps 103:15 NKJV; see also Ps 90:6; Hos 13:15). He is here today and gone tomorrow, as in Job’s account of human life: “He comes forth like a flower and fades away; He flees like a shadow” (Job 14:2 NKJV). Human frailty naturally contrasts with God’s permanence, and human weakness with the eternal Word: “All flesh is as grass, And its loveliness is like the flower of the field.... The grass withers, the flower fades, ... But the word of our God stands forever” (Is 40:6, 8 NKJV; see also 1 Pet 1:24, 25).

In the Prophets, particularly Isaiah, flower imagery is used not merely to point out human mortality but also to illustrate the judgment of the proud or ungodly. Flowers do not simply fade or wither, but are trampled under foot, turned to dust or cut off with pruning hooks: “Woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim, Whose glorious beauty is a fading flower Which is at the head of the verdant valleys, ... Behold, the Lord, ... like a tempest of hail, ... Like a mighty flood of waters, ... will bring them down to the earth ... [and they] will be trampled under foot” (Is 28:1—4 NKJV; see also Is 5:24; 18:5). Nahum sees God’s power to rebuke his enemies in his ability to dry up seas and rivers and to make the many flowers of Carmel and Lebanon wilt (Nahum 1:4). So too the proud Nebuchadnezzar is pictured as “flourishing” in his palace prior to his dream of a tree whose “height was great” and whose magnificence was evident “to the ends of the earth” until the command was given to chop it down (Dan 4:4, 11, 14). And James 1:10—11 also views the rich man passing away like the flower of the field under the burning heat of the sun, its beauty perishing.

Yet the prophets not only pronounce judgment but also promise restoration, and flower imagery figures in this as well. Isaiah’s famous “The desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose; It shall blossom abundantly and rejoice” (Is 35:1, 2 NKJV; see also Is 27:6) is one example of God’s restoring ability to turn a wasteland into a garden. Hosea also illustrates the theme: “I will be like the dew to Israel; He shall grow like the lily, And lengthen his roots like Lebanon” (Hos 14:5). The Psalms also sing of the righteous, not the wicked, flourishing like grass or the flower (Ps 72:7, 17; 92:12—14). Proverbs too reminds us that the righteous will “flourish,” that is, break forth and sprout like foliage (Prov 13:2—8; 14:11). Thus the flower is not always a symbol of pride, but it can also represent a blessing of favor. In this positive vein, the bud or sprout observed growing from the stump of a dead tree is an image of hope: “For there is hope for a tree, If it is cut down, that it will sprout again, And that its tender shoots will not cease. Though its root may grow old in the earth, And its stump may die in the ground, Yet at the scent of water it will bud” (Job 14:7—9 NKJV).

As it does in most cultures, the language of flowers in the Bible serves a number of proverbial or traditional functions: as symbols for love, the brevity of life and the glory of the holy and eternal. Although our knowledge of specific biblical flowers or blossoms and their meanings is somewhat limited, yet we sense that the biblical writers shared this Wordsworthian sentiment: “The meanest flower that blows can give / Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.”

See also Beauty; Colors; Garden; Glory; Grass; Love; Plants; Seasons; Sex; Temple; Transience; Tree of Life; Trees; Wasteland.

Bibliography. R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (New York: Basic Books, 1985) chap. 8; C. Meyers, “Lampstand,” ABD [ABD ABD. Anchor Bible Dictionary] 4:141—43; M. Zohary, Plants of the Bible (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1982).

FLYING.

See Birds; Wing.

FOLLOWER.

See Leadership.

FOLLY

Folly is the opposite of wisdom in the Bible, and the fool is the opposite of the wise person. While the culture of our own day gives no vivid conception of what constitutes folly, to the ancient mindset folly was a living reality, not only having a definite meaning but also conveying palpable images. The classic text is the book of Proverbs, buttressed by several verses in Ecclesiastes. More than anything else, folly is half of a binary image in which its great opposite is wisdom.

Fools and Folly as Negative Images. The book of Proverbs gives us a composite portrait of the archetypal fool. Fools are angry, arrogant and self-centered. Their tempers are quick to flare up (Prov 14:17, 29; 29:11). They seem to enjoy quarrels and fights (Prov 20:3). They trust their own fund of knowledge and refuse to take advice from anyone else (Prov 12:15; 28:26). Fools are “wise in their own eyes” (Prov 26:5); they even reject the guidance of their parents as beneath them (Prov 15:5). Fools also find it impossible to control their emotions and their actions (Prov 12:23); they lack control in many areas of their lives, but especially in their ability to control their tongues (Prov 10:14; 17:28; 18:13).

Other images accrue to the fool and his folly. Proverbs 14:24 tells us that “folly is the garland of the fools” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The fool is also blind. The wise person “has eyes in his head”—that is, is clear thinking and can easily navigate the obstacles of life. In contrast, the fool lives blindly, walking into all kinds of problems and difficulties (Eccles 2:12–17; Jer 5:21). The most persistent image pattern associated with folly is that it is inevitably self-destructive: it “misleads” the fool (Prov 14:8), it is itself “the punishment of fools” (Prov 16:22), it “tears down” a house (Prov 14:1), it “leads to ruin” (Prov 19:3), and it is so powerful that even “a little folly outweighs wisdom and honor” (Eccles 10:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

But perhaps the most developed image of folly and the fool in the Bible is found in Proverbs 9, where folly is likened to a loose woman who is calling for men to join her for a meal. She tempts them with “stolen water” and “bread eaten in secret” (with probable sexual overtones), but once she gets these “simple men” in her house, she kills them (Prov 9:13–18; see Seductress). This picture of Dame Folly is contrasted in the chapter with Lady Wisdom (Prov 9:1–6).

The Bible uses a number of telling and at times humorous images to portray the actions of the fool. The talk of fools is like whips on their own backs (Prov 14:3). One might as well cut off one’s foot as send a message via a fool (Prov 26:6). Fools naturally revert to their folly like a dog returns and consumes his own vomit (Prov 26:11). Indeed, the fool is so closely tied to his folly that you could put him in a mortar and pound him with a pestle but still not get the folly out of him (Prov 27:22).

Another cluster of images shows the tendency of folly to make itself obvious. Thus “the mind of a fool broadcasts folly” (Prov 12:23 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), “the fool displays folly” (Prov 13:16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), “the simple are adorned with folly” (Prov 14:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), and “the foolish woman is loud” (Prov 9:13 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Other images show how thoroughly folly permeates a fool’s life: a fool is “immersed in folly” (Prov 17:12 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and “folly is bound up in the heart of a boy” until “discipline drives it far away” (Prov 22:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Folly can actually become an insatiable appetite on which “the mouths of fools feed” (Prov 15:14) or something that fools uncontrollably “pour out” (Prov 15:2).

Jesus likens the fool, who is the one who does not listen to his wise teachings, to a person who builds a house, not on the rock but on the sand (Mt 7:24–27). In a later parable Jesus describes those who do not live in the light of his return as foolish virgin bridesmaids who do not bring enough oil for their lamps to await the coming of the bridegroom (Mt 25:1–13). Similarly, in Jesus’ parable about the smug farmer who trusts in his own wealth (Lk 12:13–21), God pronounces the worldly minded farmer a “fool.”

This ever-expanding vision of folly has its deep structure of causes. The theological root cause is that “the fool says in his heart, ‘There is no God’ ” (Ps 14:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), confirming by negative example that “the fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge” (Prov 1:7 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see Fear of God). Secondary causes of the fool’s self-destructive behavior are lack of discipline (Prov 5:23) and an unwarranted confidence in his or her own wisdom (Prov 3:7; 16:2; 30:12).

Wise Fools. While the Bible does not highlight the archetypal wise fool of literary tradition, the NT [NT NT. New Testament] does include the motif. The key passage is 1 Corinthians 1:18–31, where Paul introduces the theme that God “chose what is foolish in the world to shame the wise,” with the gospel itself representing “God’s foolishness” that is “wiser than human wisdom” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Dupe; Ecclesiastes, Book of; Fear of God; Proverbs, Book of; Teacher, Teaching; Wisdom.

FOOD

Food fills the Bible from beginning to end, just as it fills a human life day after day. In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] food offers pictures of God's providence, the pleasurable of his creation and the proper ordering of life. Food in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] offers all these pictures but takes them to more complex levels of symbolism, which come together most fully in the person of Jesus Christ, the food from heaven.

Food as Provision. Food shows the abundant providence of God. People in Scripture do not find food as a random good but receive it as a gift from God's hand. In the Garden of Eden Adam and Eve first receive from God "every seed-bearing plant on the face of the whole earth and every tree that has fruit with seed in it" and were told, "They will be yours for food" (Gen 1:29 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God's provision extends further than just to human beings: "And to all the beasts of the earth and all the birds of the air and all the creatures that move on the ground—everything that has the breath of life in it—I give every green plant for food" (Gen 1:30 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The bounty and extent of God's provision shows clearly in the recurring "all" and "every" of this Genesis narrative: no living creature anywhere, anytime, is overlooked in God's plan to meet one of life's most fundamental needs.

The psalms many times praise God for such full provision for the needs of all living things. Psalm 104, for example, celebrates the God who "makes grass grow for the cattle, and plants for man to cultivate—bringing forth food from the earth" (Ps 104:14 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The psalmist looks out over this earth full of creatures, from coney to lions to humans, claiming: "These all look to you to give them their food at the proper time.... When you open your hand, they are satisfied with good things” (Ps 104:27–28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The original giving of food in Eden grows into a continuing picture of God’s hand outstretched to provide food.

Moses, addressing the Israelites about to enter the Promised Land, reminds them of how God has provided manna as food in the wilderness: “He humbled you, causing you to hunger and then feeding you with manna ... to teach you that man does not live on bread alone but on every word that comes from the mouth of the Lord” (Deut 8:3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God’s physical providence is to turn them in humble submission and attentiveness to the all-provident God.

When the prophet Elijah tells King Ahab that God will stop the rain for several years thus bringing about severe famine in Israel, he is showing an idolatrous people, this time through the withdrawal of food, that they need the one God who controls and provides all things (1 Kings 17:1). Elijah himself is given provision: water from a brook and bread and meat brought by ravens morning and evening. Through the food, God reveals himself to his obedient servant who indeed lives according to every word that comes to him from the mouth of the Lord. And when the brook dries up, God in his providence takes Elijah to a starving widow who first receives unending stores of flour and oil, who later receives the gift of restored life for her son, and who finally believes in “the word of the Lord” from Elijah’s mouth (1 Kings 17:7–24). God’s provision of food for this widow of Zarephath is the first step in turning her to himself.

Food as Pleasurable. God not only provides, and provides abundantly for his creatures, but he also provides an immense variety of pleasurable flavors, textures, colors, shapes and smells, all of which indicate the joy and delight of the Creator with his creation. From the abundance of seed-bearing plants and fruit-bearing trees in Eden, to the broader diet including all living things allowed by God after the flood (Gen 9:3), the foodstuffs mentioned in the biblical texts grow in number and variety. Not just fruit, but figs (Deut 8:8), apples (Prov 25:11), pomegranates (Joel 1:12), grapes (Mt 7:16) and melons (Num 11:5) appear. Grapes provided fresh fruit (Num 6:3), dried raisins (1 Sam 25:18), sweet juice (Is 49:26), wine (Prov 3:10) and vinegar (Ruth 2:14). For his first miracle Jesus chooses to change water to wine at a wedding celebration in Cana of Galilee, facilitating the enjoyment and indeed showing the source of the pleasurable fruit of the earth (Jn 2:1–11).

The land promised to God's people is described over and over again in Scripture as a land flowing with milk and honey (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ex 3:8). God desires to give his people not just basic food but much pleasurable food—even honey, a highly-valued delicacy. Herbs and spices, such as salt, are given by God to increase the flavor of foods. “Is tasteless food eaten without salt,” Job asks, “or is there flavor in the white of an egg?” (Job 6:6 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). As Job compares the unhelpful advice of his friends to bland, unseasoned food, his comparison assumes the basic good of taste and flavor, gifts from a delightfully creative God, small signs of his pleasure in his creation.

Food as a Symbol of Order. Through food God signals not random provision or pleasure but rather a certain intended order to life. In Eden he chooses to use a fruit tree as a symbol of the knowledge of good and evil; and the act of eating that fruit constitutes Adam and Eve's disobedience (Gen 2:17). Food marks the proper limits. The most basic, concrete stuff of life pictures the most basic level of obedience or disobedience. And the fact that God designed humans to take that stuff into their bodies so that it becomes part of them offers a perfect picture of opening themselves up to good or evil, taking in either one or the other so that it becomes part of them.

After Adam and Eve eat the fruit, part of God's resulting curse involves the whole process of cultivating and eating food. The original, perfect order of that process is disrupted along with everything else in the Fall. Now the ground is cursed, producing thorns and thistles. It yields food, not freely as before but only through painful human toil and sweat (Gen 3:17–19). After the flood, God looks with pleasure and mercy on righteous Noah, promising never again to curse the ground in response to human sin, but promising rather to continue the process of seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, all in their proper order, "as long as the earth endures" (Gen 8:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The seasonal cycles that produce food today, even with the thorns and thistles and toil remaining from the original curse, continue as signs of God's ordered providence for his people. Clearly the order is not perfect or identical to that of Eden: after the flood God declares a "fear and dread" on the part of animals and birds and fish toward humans, who can now eat "everything that lives and moves," not just vegetation (Gen 9:2–3 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). God's providence allows this change in the boundaries of his provision, which continue, but without the original harmony of Eden. Signs of both grace and sin evidence themselves in all of life, even in the ordering of the food we eat.

When sin entered the human race through the eating of that fruit in Eden, sacrifices of food to God became part of the necessary order. In a sense the sacrificial food in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] stands between human beings and God, whereas before the Fall they were in direct communion. The food on the altar represents not only separation but also restored communion, through the humility and repentance of the sacrificer, and ultimately through the perfect atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ. Leviticus records a series of complex laws regarding which foods were clean or unclean to sacrifice or eat. In the first five chapters of Leviticus, five different kinds of sacrifices (burnt, grain, fellowship, sin and guilt offerings) involve bulls, rams, birds, grain, oil, salt, goats, lambs—all with carefully prescribed procedures and orders; for example, only an animal that has a split hoof and chews the cud is “clean” and can be eaten. Through this intricately ordered system of food, God shows his people the life-and-death significance of purity and defilement—not just physically but more important, spiritually—in relation to their God. So Daniel, when he refuses to disobey God’s laws concerning the food he should and should not eat, is staking his life not just on physical purity but on the purity of his obedient heart (Dan 1).

Scripture’s notice of amounts of food distributed also gives a sense of a divinely intended order. The Israelites in the wilderness are given manna daily, and they are to gather only enough for each day, no more. When they greedily try to gather extra, it rots overnight and develops maggots. Only on the sixth day can they gather double, and the extra does not rot, but stays fresh for the day of rest (Ex 16:16–26). God intends the daily provision of just enough food to depict his sufficient daily care for his people. He means the special distribution before the sabbath to indicate the special holiness of that day.

In the Bible God creates a well-ordered earth, able to produce enough food for the creatures living on it. His providence is sufficient for all, and he clearly grieves over and cares for those who receive too little when the balance and order of food distribution is disturbed. Scripture often pictures God's hand as reaching specifically to the poor and the hungry. "He upholds the cause of the oppressed," the psalmist writes, "and gives food to the hungry" (Ps 146:7 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). "He has filled the hungry with good things but has sent the rich away empty," Mary sings in Luke 1:53 (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Hoarding or consuming excess is consistently condemned. The wise Solomon advises eating "just enough" honey; "too much of it, and you will vomit" (Prov 25:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Spiritual Food. Especially in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] , physical food clearly pictures providence, pleasure and God's intended order. But another level of imagery exists in relation to food: a metaphorical level. For example, Isaiah calls, "Come, all you who are thirsty, come to the waters; and you who have no money, come, buy and eat" (55:1 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Isaiah goes on to develop his food metaphor until he declares at the end of verse 2: "Your soul will delight in the richest of fare." We understand that Isaiah refers to food for the soul, spiritual food.

Jesus begins to explain the distinction between physical food and spiritual food when he tells his disciples not to worry about what they would eat or what they would wear. "Life is more than food, and the body more than clothes," he told them (Lk 12:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In this passage Jesus does not denigrate the value of physical food, but he affirms God's providence over that area of life and challenges his followers to seek a whole different realm, his kingdom (12:31).

With his own words and actions, Jesus illustrates how to go about seeking the kingdom (Lk 12:22—34). Once, when his disciples urge him to eat something, Jesus tells them he has food to eat that they know nothing about (Jn 4:32). He uses Isaiah's metaphor, referring to that "richest of fare" in which the soul delights. When his disciples do not catch on, Jesus explains, "My food is to do the will of him who sent me and to finish his work" (Jn 4:34 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Seeking God and his kingdom becomes his food in that it draws him, fills him and nourishes him.

Jesus not only talks about spiritual food, he becomes spiritual food for his followers, a living metaphor to take in and live. After miraculously feeding a crowd of five thousand from one little boy's lunch, Jesus cautions his disciples: "Do not work for food that spoils, but for food that endures to eternal life, which the Son of Man will give you" (Jn 6:27 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). His disciples are impressed by the miracle of the physical food, which they connect with the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] miracle of manna in the wilderness. But as they converse, Jesus turns their eyes from the actual bread to the God who sends that bread from heaven and who has sent that bread most fully in the form of his son.

The passage climaxes in that great declaration, "I am the bread of life. He who comes to me will never go hungry, and he who believes in me will never be thirsty" (6:35 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Jesus is manna from heaven, bread, the food that will satisfy the souls and give eternal life. He is the word proceeding from the mouth of God by which men and women live (see Deut 8:3; Is 55). Jeremiah writes, "When your words came, I ate them; they were my joy and my heart's delight, for I bear your name, O Lord Almighty" (Jer 15:16 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When Christ, who in the beginning was the Word, comes to his followers, he comes as the food that gives life (Jn 1:1).

John 6 continues in a long discourse on Jesus as food. Jesus makes the metaphor utterly graphic, insisting that unless believers eat his flesh and drink his blood, they have no life in us: “For my flesh is real food and my blood is real drink” (Jn 6:55 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). What shall we do with such a living metaphor? Those who hear it call it a “hard teaching” (Jn 6:60 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). For one thing, apart from the shocking prospect of eating another person, any Jew would know the divinely established ceremonial laws forbidding the eating of the blood of any animal. Each animal had to be completely drained, because “the blood is the life, and you must not eat the life with the meat” (Deut 12:23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). When Jesus reverses this law in himself, he means that through his blood shed for his own, they can take his life, the life of God, into themselves.

The blood smeared on the doorframes of the Israelites in Egypt saved them from death. In memory of that exodus, God’s people celebrate the Passover every year, with the sacrifice of lambs and the feast of unleavened bread (Ex 12). When the Israelites receive God’s law at Mt. Sinai, the blood of the sacrificed animals is sprinkled on the people, to represent “the blood of the covenant” of God with his people (Ex 24:8). From the biblical perspective all that bread and all that blood are signs of the flesh and blood of Jesus Christ, who comes and delivers his people from eternal wrath, by offering himself as the perfect sacrificial lamb for sins.

At the first Lord’s Supper Jesus celebrates the traditional Passover meal with his disciples and reveals to them the full meaning of that feast. Offering the bread, he says, “This is my body” (Mt 26:26). He then offers the cup and tells them, “This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins” (Mt 26:28 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In truly eating that feast—that is, in personally accepting the sacrifice of Jesus—a person takes into himself the death and life of God’s Son. When a person eats food, that food goes into him and becomes a part of his own living body. So Paul writes to the believers in Corinth: “We always carry around in our body the death of Jesus, so that the life of Jesus may also be revealed in our body” (2 Cor 4:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Jesus as the believer’s food offers the perfect culmination of all the references of food in the Bible. For from the beginning, the only living food was Christ. Paul writes of Moses and the Israelites: “They all ate the same spiritual food and drank the same spiritual drink; for they drank from the spiritual rock that accompanied them, and that rock was Christ” (1 Cor 10:3—4). In his providence God planned from before the foundations of the earth to send the bread of life, to give abundant life, to offer a way to restore the order of Eden, where human beings know full communion with God.

The NT [NT NT. New Testament] develops other food imagery to show spiritual truth metaphorically. Jesus is not only our bread but living water, welling up like a spring inside his disciples, to eternal life (Jn 4:14). Individual foods emerge as metaphors: milk, for example, pictures the first basic instruction for “infants in Christ” and “solid food” becomes the more advanced teaching for the more mature believers (1 Cor 3:1—2; Heb 5:12—13). Jesus used salt to give a picture of his followers and their effect on this earth (Mt 5:13).

But Jesus himself is the center to which one must come when looking at the food imagery in Scripture. Those who have eaten his flesh and drunk his blood will find themselves at that final feast, the wedding supper of the Lamb (Rev 19:7—9). That celebration will be the last supper on the other side of Jesus' death. There he will not be the Lamb ready to shed his blood, but the Lamb risen and glorified and ready to embrace his bride, the church he purified through his own death. "Blessed are those who are invited to the wedding supper of the Lamb!" (Rev 19:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Abundance; Animals; Appetite; Banquet; Bread; Drinking; Eating; Fat, Fatness; Fig, Fig Tree; Fish, Fisher, Fishing; Fruit, Fruitfulness; Garden; Grain; Honey; Hunting; Land Flowing with Milk And Honey; Manna; Meal; Milk; Stew; Stomach; Supper; Table; Thirst; Tree, Trees; Wheat; Wine.

FOOL.

See Folly; Sluggard.

FOOTSTOOL.

See Under the Feet.

FOREHEAD

The two dozen references to foreheads in the Bible fall into three main clusters. The most numerous are references to the forehead as a place where one wears an identifying mark, either literal or figurative. At the institution of the Passover, Moses told the people that the perpetual remembrance of God's deliverance of them would be as a reminder and emblem "on your forehead" (Ex 13:9 16 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In his farewell discourse, Moses commanded that his words should be fixed "as an emblem on your forehead" (Deut 6:8; 11:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The engraved gold signet bearing the motto "holy to the Lord" was worn by Aaron on his forehead as God's designated high priest (Ex 28:36—38). In apocalyptic visions, people's foreheads receive marks of identity, either good (sometimes for purposes of protection) or bad (Ezek 9:4; Rev 7:3; 9:4; 13:16; 14:1, 9; 17:5; 20:4; 22:4). Jeremiah 3:3 uses the image of "the forehead of a whore" to picture someone who refuses to be ashamed.

Second, the hardness of a forehead made it a symbol of stubbornness and rebelliousness (Is 48:4; Ezek 3:7). The positive side of the image is that it can also picture the courage and persistence of a good person in standing up to evil (Ezek 3:8—9).

Third, the condition of a person's forehead was crucial to a priest's determination of whether or not a person had leprosy (Lev 13:41—43; see also 2 Chron 26:19—20).

The most famous forehead in the Bible is Goliath's. As David ran toward the heavily armored giant, the stone from his sling sank into Goliath's forehead, "and he fell face down on the ground" (1 Sam 17:49 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

See also Face, Facial Expressions; Head.

FOREIGNER

The image of the foreigner, stranger, sojourner or alien is a major biblical archetype. Its meaning is fluid, shifting from the literal status of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] patriarchs and the nation of Israel to the NT [NT NT. New Testament] emphasis on Christians as people whose citizenship is in heaven rather than on earth. The idea of a foreigner is definable partly by its opposite—the citizen or native-born. The foreigner lives in a double awareness: a sense of an identity that has been lost or forfeited, and an awareness of being homeless or strange in his or her current environment.

In the Bible the image of the foreigner is always that of the alien who lives in a country not of his or her own origin, either as a guest or as a permanent resident. It is not used of other nations, for whom the most common term is Gentiles. The foreigner is thus in the peculiar position of having divided customs, loyalties and laws, and of being uprooted from his or her homeland. The sense of estrangement is central to the concept of the foreigner as the image develops throughout the Bible.

The Old Testament: Literal Foreigners. According to the biblical history, being an exile in the world is first of all a universal human condition. Adam and Eve's eviction from the garden of Eden begins the displacement for the entire race, a displacement highlighted by Cain's banishment from society to be a wanderer (Gen 3:23; 4:12). This displacement is further universalized at the Tower of Babel when the division into separate languages begins the process of differentiating nations and ethnic groups (Gen 11:1—9). The condition of exile is first of all a curse.

But it becomes more than that in patriarchal history, where it plays a central role. From the moment that Abraham obeyed God's call to "go from your country and your kindred and your father's house to the land that I will show you" (Gen 12:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the father of the faithful became an alien. His descendants, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph, followed the same path. Here the state of being a sojourner is not a curse but a condition of the covenant, an act of obedience to a God who promises great things to those who follow him. On a human level, though, being a foreigner implies a sense of rootlessness and longing for rest. We catch the tones of this weariness in the account of the birth of Joseph's first son: "He called his name Gershom; for he said, 'I have been a sojourner in a foreign land' ” (Ex 2:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

As we move from Genesis to Exodus, the scope broadens from the stories of individual aliens in the covenant line to the whole nation of Israel. It begins innocently enough with the shift of Jacob's residence from a famine-ridden land to the fertile region of Goshen in Egypt. Initially it appears to be a benevolent exile; in fact, when Jacob arrives in Egypt he speaks of the “evil” of his life of “sojourning” and “the life of my fathers in the days of their sojourning” (Gen 47:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When we read further that Joseph “settled his father and his brothers, and gave them a possession in the land of Egypt, in the best of the land” (Gen 47:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), it almost seems that Jacob has attained a homeland. But when “there arose a new king over Egypt, who did not know Joseph” (Ex 1:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), the curse of being a stranger in a strange land reasserts itself, and Egypt becomes an evocative “house of bondage” (Ex 20:2) for the entire nation of Israel.

In patriarchal and early Israelite history, the image of the foreigner is ambivalent. On the one hand, it is an image of vulnerability. The history of the patriarchs and Israelites is a continuous narrow escape. Typical events include having one's wife taken into a foreign king's harem, fearing for one's life, experiencing run-ins with locals over the use of a well, paying an exorbitant price for a burial plot, having to send off to the homeland for a wife for one's son, being an easy victim of treachery and injustice when the boss's wife uses racist language to make a false charge of rape stick, being subject to slavery and genocide. Foreigners expect little, and often their expectations are realized. We catch the hint of the foreigner's low status in Ruth's surprised question after Boaz has expressed compassion for her: “Why have I found favor in your eyes ... when I am a foreigner?" (Ruth 2:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Both Joseph and Jacob express a desire that their bones be carried back to their homeland (Gen 50:12–13, 24).

Vulnerability and lack of secure status are only half of the equation, however. The other half is that the sojourner is repeatedly pictured in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] as the special recipient of God's favor, protection and benevolent concern. We find this in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] civil laws. Specimen entries in the Mosaic law include these: "You shall not wrong a stranger or oppress him, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Ex 22:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 23:9); "You shall not strip your vineyard bare, neither shall you gather the fallen grapes of your vineyard; you shall leave them for the poor and for the sojourner" (Lev 19:9–10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); "The stranger who sojourns with you shall be to you as the native among you, and you shall love him as yourself; for you were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Lev 19:34 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The same motif appears in the Psalms (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Ps 39:12; 146:9) and in the prophets (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Zech 7:9–10; Mal 3:5). On some occasions God enables an Israelite foreigner to contribute significantly to the welfare of another country; the list includes Joseph, Daniel, Nehemiah and Esther. Thus if the life of the exile is a continuous narrow escape in the Pentateuch, it is also a continuous drama of God's providential grace and provision.

Once the Israelites are given the land of Canaan after the conquest led by Joshua, the image of foreigners shifts from the Jews to those Gentiles who live with them. Although in some cases these arrangements were made by trickery, as with the Gibeonites in Joshua 9, in other instances foreigners chose to be associated with, or even integrated into, the life of Israel. Notable examples include Rahab and Ruth, both of whom become ancestresses of Christ (Mt 1:5). God commands that his people extend the same care to foreigners that he does. Having their own homeland requires now a generosity toward those who find themselves displaced and alienated. The foreigner, along with the widow and the orphan, is both particularly vulnerable and particularly blessed as he or she comes under the special care of God. The two-sided nature of foreignness is thus maintained.

Being a foreigner receives another twist during the time of the prophets. As these spokespersons increasingly denounce the sins of Israel and Judah, the concept of (although not the term for) foreigner moves from the alien who lives in the land to the Gentile nations that surround the land. While acknowledging the evil of both Jews and Gentiles, the prophets also announce a time when all nations will share in God's blessings (Ezek 47:22). This inclusion of the Gentiles is already foreshadowed in the repentance of Ninevah (Jon 3:10), the worship of God by Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 4:34—35) and the generosity of Cyrus, who is called "my shepherd" (Is 44:28 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

The image of the foreigner or exile assumes a totally new meaning with the exile. Here the exile is an image of God's judgment and assumes strongly negative overtones. The heart longing of the exiled Jews was to return to the homeland, an event that a remnant finally achieved.

The New Testament: Spiritual Pilgrims. In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] the image of the sojourner comes to focus on the people of God as pilgrims and strangers in the world. On the one hand, the notion of foreigners as defined by national, ethnic or racial origins is dismissed. Jesus includes among his followers a Syro-Phoenician woman (Mk 7:24—30), a Roman centurion (Mt 8:5–13) and a promiscuous Samaritan (Jn 4:1–42). Following Jesus' resurrection and ascension, Paul announces that the mystery that has been hidden from all the ages is that the church of God will be composed of both Jews and Gentiles without distinction (Eph 3:1–6).

With the old notion of foreigner eradicated, however, the image continues, though in a metaphoric rather than national sense. Now all believers in Christ are considered pilgrims and aliens, people who live their lives as strangers on this earth while they journey toward their true home in heaven. This image of Christians as foreigners retains some of the ambivalence that it has in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] . To be a foreigner is to feel the effects of sin; without sin there would be no displacement, no vulnerability, no homesickness. On the other hand, to be a foreigner also means to experience the exquisite protection of God, and so to understand just how much one needs that protection.

The example of Jesus exemplifies the sojourner's life in the new dispensation. Jesus himself encapsulated his wanderer status with the aphoristic observation that “foxes have holes, and birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man has nowhere to lay his head” (Mt 8:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The broader spiritual context of Jesus' incarnate life is that Jesus “comes” (Jn 3:19; 12:46–47; 18:37) or is “sent” (Jn 3:17; 10:36; 17:18, 21, 25) as the unrecognized (Jn 1:10) stranger into this world for a time (Jn 9:5, 39; 11:27; 13:1; 16:28; 17:11, 13). He claims that his “kingdom is not of this world” (Jn 18:36; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 8:23; 17:13–16). As followers of Jesus and strangers in the world, his disciples will have “trouble” (Jn 16:33; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 16:20) and be hated (Jn 15:18, 19).

The apostle Paul epitomizes the NT [NT NT. New Testament] foreigner. Outcast from his prestigious position among the Pharisees and wandering from city to city as itinerant tent maker and preacher, he poignantly states, “To the present hour we hunger and thirst, we are ill-clad and buffeted and homeless” (1 Cor 4:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Other believers, such as Priscilla and Aquila, likewise experienced the disconcerting effects of being evicted and living as foreigners (Acts 18:2). The apostle Peter generalizes the notion of being a foreigner to all believers when he beseeches believers “as aliens and exiles to abstain from the passions of the flesh that wage war against your soul” (1 Pet 2:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). He also enjoins “the exiles of the Dispersion” (1 Pet 1:1, RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) to “live your lives as strangers here in reverent fear” (1 Pet 1:17 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

The climactic NT [NT NT. New Testament] transformation of the foreigner into a spiritual symbol of the Christian life is the book of Hebrews, especially the encomium in praise of faith (Heb 11). Here we read that “by faith [Abraham] sojourned in the land of promise, as in a foreign land” (Heb 11:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). His heirs of faith “acknowledged that they were strangers and exiles on the earth” (Heb 11:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). All of them “make it clear that they are seeking a homeland. If they had been thinking of that land from which they had gone out, they would have had opportunity to return. But as it is, they desire a better country, that is, a heavenly one” (Heb 11:14–16 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). It is small wonder that this image of the pilgrim stranger, the believing foreigner in a hostile world protected by the constant care of God, has remained one of the most powerful images of the Christian life, because it is true to the facts of the Christian life on earth and hope of heaven. We can, of course, find OT [OT OT. Old Testament] premonitions of the pilgrim spirit, as in the psalmist's comment, "I am a sojourner [NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] stranger] on earth; hide not thy commandments from me!" (Ps 119:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

See also Exile; Far; Gentile; Guest; Hospitality; Home, House; Homecoming, Stories of; Land; Wanderer, Wandering.

FOREST

At its simplest level, the forest is that which is other than towns and cultivated fields. As such, it represents uncultivated nature that needs to be cleared for use (Josh 17:15, 18). On the other hand, the planting and nurturing of forests can itself be a form of cultivation (Is 29:17; 32:15; 44:14; Eccles 2:6). In fact, Psalm 104:16 pictures God as cosmic planter and waterer of forests.

As a wooded area separate from towns and cultivated fields, the forest is the abode of wild animals, especially nocturnal predators. We thus find references to "every wild animal of the forest" (Ps 50:10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), the "boar from the forest" that ravages a cultivated field without walls (Ps 80:13), "animals of the forest" that "come creeping out" while people sleep at night (Ps 104:20), "wild animals in the forest" (Is 56:9), "a lion in the forest" (Jer 12:8; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Amos 3:4; Mic 5:8) and a forest in which wild animals devour people (Hos 14:5). Here the forest is an image of terror. The forest fire is another image of terror (Ps 83:14; Is 9:18; Jer 21:14; Ezek 20:46; Jas 3:5). In the same category is the forest damaged by a thunder storm (Ps 29:9; Is 7:2).

On the positive side, the forest is a source of lumber, hence the references to the felling of trees in a forest (Deut 19:5; 2 Kings 19:23; Is 10:34; Jer 10:3; Zech 11:2). Nehemiah successfully requested timber from "the king's forest" (Neh

2:8), suggesting the value that forests held in the ancient Near East. As a source of lumber, the forests of Lebanon are in a class by themselves—a recognized standard of excellence (Ezek 31:3), the source of choice lumber when Solomon pursued his lavish building projects (1 Kings 7:2; 10:17, 21; 2 Chron 9:16, 20). The cedars of Lebanon are legendary in the Bible, with nearly two dozen references.

As an image of nature and of growing things, the forest is also a symbol of prosperity, and it retains that meaning even in prophecies of impending destruction of a nation. We read, for example, about how God will destroy “the glory of his forest and his fruitful land” (Is 10:18 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) and about how “the forest will disappear completely, and the city will be utterly laid low” (Is 32:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Although these references to the forest appear in oracles of judgment, the forest itself retains its identity as a standard of value and prosperity. The forest also appears in oracles predicting restoration, and in particular forests are enjoined to break into celebration at God’s acts of redemption (1 Chron 16:33; Ps 96:12; Is 44:23), technically an example of “pathetic [sympathetic] fallacy” (picturing facets of nature as identifying with human emotions).

Forest imagery in the Bible participates in the incipient symbolism that characterizes the Bible at every turn. Many of the literal references noted above carry religious and moral meanings beyond the literal. The growth of the forest or its being buffeted in a windstorm are the direct result of divine activity. The forest readily becomes a picture of God’s judgment (Is 10:17–19; Hos 2:12) or restoration (Is 29:17; 32:15; Mic 7:14).

See also Animals; Lebanon; Plants; Tree, Trees; Wasteland; Wilderness; Wood.

FORGIVENESS

The approximately 125 direct references to forgiveness in the Bible are mainly straightforward in nature and do not themselves point to the imagery surrounding forgiveness. The key to understanding the imagery of forgiveness is that it views sin as something that needs to be eradicated or removed. Complementing this motif is one that focuses on disrupted relationships between people that need to be restored. In both cases the imagery of forgiveness revolves around solving a problem through either the removal of something or reconciliation with someone.

Almost all of the biblical pictures of forgiveness are pictures of divine forgiveness. But on the human plane, we have Joseph's forgiveness of his villainous brothers, Esau's forgiveness of Jacob and Jesus' command that people forgive their fellow humans "seventy times seven" times (Mt 18:22; Lk 17:4), buttressed by a parable involving the canceling of debts (Mt 18:23–35). The imagery of an equation appears in Jesus' statements about God's forgiving people as they forgive others (Mt 6:12, 14–15). The parable of the prodigal son and the forgiving father is a picture of human forgiveness but also a metaphor of God's forgiveness (Lk 15:11–32).

Forgiveness as Removing Sin. Most of the biblical images of forgiveness involve getting rid of sin in one form or another. Some of the imagery is spatial, as sin is removed (Ps 103:12; Zech 3:9), cast into the depths of the sea (Mic 7:19), "swept away ... like a cloud and ... like mist" (Is 44:22 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), cast behind God's back (Is 38:17), "set aside" (Col 2:14) or "put away" (Heb 9:26). In a variation, sin is covered (Ps 32:1; Rom 4:7), so as to be put out of sight, or blotted out (Ps 51:9; Jer 18:23). If we begin with the premise that sin is an inner defilement, forgiveness can be pictured as a process of washing (Ps 51:7;

Is 4:4; Acts 22:16), cleansing (Lev 16:30; Num 8:21; Ps 51:2; Is 4:4; Jer 33:8; Ezek 36:33; Zech 13:1; 1 Jn 1:7, 9), receiving “a clean heart” (Ps 51:10) or being “purified with blood” (Heb 9:22). Color symbolism seizes upon red as the color of sin, and forgiveness is accordingly the purging of the scarlet substance so as to leave behind an object as white as snow and wool (Is 1:18).

Sin is also viewed as a debt or penalty, with the result that forgiveness becomes a paying or pardoning of the debt (Mt 6:12; Is 40:2) and a canceling of “the bond which stood against us with its legal demands” (Col 2:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In a similar vein are various examples of God’s not doing something in regard to sin—not counting it (2 Cor 5:19), not remembering it (Jer 31:34; Heb 8:12), not reckoning it (Rom 4:8). Forgiveness is also a matter of God’s hiding his face from someone’s sin (Ps 51:9; see Jer 16:17 for the opposite picture).

A similar cluster of images focuses on freeing from bondage and healing from disease. If sin is a burden that a person carries, forgiveness is Christ’s bearing “our sins in his body on the tree” (1 Pet 2:24), or God’s “nailing it to the cross” (Col 2:14). Forgiveness is also a setting free from bondage (Acts 13:38–39; Rom 6:7, 18; Gal 1:4; Rev 1:5). A strong connection was made by people in biblical times between human sinfulness and physical ailment.

Accordingly, we find passages that view forgiveness as a process that simultaneously rids the body of disease (Ps 32:1–5; 103:3; Is 53:5; Mt 9:2, 5; Mk 2:5, 9; Lk 5:20, 23; 1 Pet 2:24).

Forgiveness as Reconciled Relationship. The second major motif focuses on the restored relationship between God and the sinner that occurs with forgiveness. The classic picture is the father’s welcome of the returning prodigal (Lk 15:11–32). Romans 5:10–11 paints a similar picture of reconciliation accompanied by joy (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Cor 5:19; Col 1:22), while other passages use the image of “making peace by the blood of his cross” (Col 1:20 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 2:15). Forgiveness is the reconciliation of people “who once were estranged and hostile in mind” with God (Col 1:21 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). From the Gospels we have pictures of Jesus having table fellowship with tax collectors and sinners.

The specific attributes of God that are most often pictured with declarations of his forgiveness are mercy, grace and steadfast love. In fact, a stock formula that appears verbatim seven times in the Bible is that God is “merciful and gracious, slow to anger and abounding in steadfast love” (Ex 34:6; Neh 9:17; Ps 86:15; 103:8; 145:8; Joel 2:13; Jon 4:2; modified in 2 Chron 30:9; Neh 9:31; Ps 111:4; 112:4). The imagery surrounding God’s forgiveness is characterized by magnitude and lavishness. It is “abounding,” not half hearted. God does not simply remove human sin—he removes it “as far as the east is from the west” (Ps 103:12), thereby evidencing love as large “as the heavens are high above the earth” (Ps 103:11). In Jesus’ picture of the father who forgives his prodigal son, the father does not simply accept the son—he runs to embrace him and throws an elaborate party (see Banquet). Balancing the imagery of magnitude is that of tenderness: the song of Zechariah speaks of the forgiveness of sins “through the tender mercy of our God” (Lk 1:77–78), and Psalm 103 balances the imagery of vast space with a picture of God pitying people “as a father pities his children” (Ps 103:13).

On the human side of this transaction, forgiveness is pictured as based on a person’s taking the initiative in asking for it. The person who eventually experiences forgiveness begins as a penitent—a person sorry for sin who asks God to forgive. Penitential psalms, like Psalms 32 and 51, picture the range of human feelings and attitudes that make up the penitent. To receive God's forgiveness, one must ask for it (2 Chron 33:12–13). The psalmist declares that God is “good and forgiving” to all who call on him (Ps 86:5). The imagery of forgiveness as a process that the penitent undertakes is also evident in the path to forgiveness that Leviticus 6:1–7 outlines and that the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] system of sacrifices pictures in more general terms.

An important additional motif is the “before and after” nature of the experience of forgiveness. Forgiveness is a change of status from guilt to declared innocence (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ex 34:7, with its image of God's clearing the guilty; Ps 32:5; Jer 33:8). There is a psychological dimension to this “before and after” experience, with anxiety and psychosomatic symptoms preceding the act of being forgiven, and relief and joy following it. Psalm 32:1–2 sounds the keynote when it pronounces the forgiven person as “blessed.” The human response to God's forgiveness is also love of God—a love that Jesus claimed was proportionate to the magnitude of the forgiveness that the penitent has received (Lk 7:36–50).

Summary. The overriding aura that surrounds the Bible's imagery of forgiveness is threefold, revolving around the driving need that the human heart feels for forgiveness, the decisiveness of the act by which God discards sin and the lavishness of God's mercy in forgiveness.

See also Altar; Atonement; Bondage and Freedom; Cleansing; Cover, Covering; Guilty; Mercy; Offering; Peace; Prodigal Son; Repentance; Sacrifice; Sin; Sinner; Snow; White; Wool.

FORSAKE, FORSAKEN

Images of forsaken people, especially women, appear throughout the Bible. While God has always been a God of mercy who never forsakes those in need, abandoned people nevertheless existed and were abused in biblical times.

In the Bible the word forsake and its synonym abandon were used in two ways: in one meaning, forsake was a verb that meant to forget or discontinue performing a specific action; in the other meaning, forsake conveyed the abandonment of individuals who had no one else to care for their distresses. Both uses are important in the Bible, and when God speaks of Israel, he links the two uses. Because women were far more helpless than men, requiring legal, financial and physical protection from men, the individuals most often abandoned or forsaken in the Bible are women. Such abandonment was a disgrace as well as an inconvenience, and it typified such outcast individuals as widows, orphans and foreigners.

In the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] history of Israel, the imagery of forsaking and being forsaken revolves around the covenant that God establishes with his people. On the one hand, God establishes his own character as a faithful God who would never forsake his people. Moses gives Israel numerous promises from God that “because the Lord your God is a merciful God, he will neither abandon you nor destroy you”; therefore, they could face their adversaries fearlessly, backed by a God who “will not fail you or forsake you” (Deut 4:31; 31:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). However, God also warns Israel that if his people forget him, he will forsake them to their enemies as punishment for their sin (Deut 28:20). Unfortunately, this is exactly what they do: God himself predicts that Israel will abandon the God who made them; and beginning in Judges, the Bible recounts how the people “abandoned [God] and worshiped other gods” (Deut 31:17; 1 Sam 12:10; 1 Kings 8:57; 19:10). God abandons Israel to one enemy nation after another; yet despite their punishment, they can never fully repent from their sin.

In Isaiah God addresses the captive nation of Israel as though she were a distressed woman, his cast-off wife. Promising her an end to her abandonment and an apocalyptic future of security and provision, he calls Israel to “forget the shame of your youth, and the disgrace of your widowhood” (Is 54:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Instead, he reassures her with the security of a permanent home and husband, proclaiming, “Your Maker is your husband, the Lord of hosts is his name ... For the Lord has called you like a wife forsaken and grieved in spirit, like a wife of youth when she is cast off, says your God. For a brief moment I forsook you, but with great compassion I will gather you ... O afflicted one, storm-tossed and not comforted, behold I will set your stones in antimony, and lay your foundations with sapphires” (Is 54:5–7, 11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Such a declaration encompasses all that the forsaken woman most lacks: a husband who loves her, cares for her physical needs, protects her from harm and showers her with wealth and assurances of permanency. God explicitly pledges his upcoming faithfulness to her, saying, “You shall no longer be termed Forsaken, and your land shall no more be termed Desolate; but you shall be called My delight is in her, and your land Married” (Is 62:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Israel is indeed God’s redeemed bride, a colorful picture of God’s swift erasure of the lonely woman’s abandonment and disgrace.

Throughout the Bible, God expresses a special compassion and care for individuals who are abandoned and in need. The psalmist expresses God’s enduring faithfulness to those who love him: “I have been young, and now I am old; yet I have not seen the righteous forsaken” (Ps 37:25 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). He expresses that God is more faithful than any other on earth, for even “if my father and mother forsake me, the Lord will take me up” (Ps 27:10). He calls himself the “father of orphans and protector of widows,” and with his own hand he “executes justice for the orphan and the widow” and “loves the strangers, providing them with food and clothing” (Ps 68:5; Deut 10:18). God demanded that Israel to do the same, commanding, “You shall not abuse any widow or orphan,” and reminding his people to care for the strangers in their land (Ex 22:22; Deut 10:19). Furthermore, God set up a specific system for their provision in Israel by allowing them to glean any leftover food from the grain fields, olive trees and grapevines (Deut 14:29; 24:19–21). When Israel disobeys him, their treatment of orphans and widows is one of the charges God brings against them (Is 1:23; Ezek 22:7). Thus, God understood the plight of the most forsaken in society and compassionately endeavored to care for them.

Forsaken women are an archetype in the Bible. Some of them are rescued from their plight by God: Hagar (Gen 16:7–14; 21:8–19), Leah (Gen 29:30), Tamar (Gen 38), Ruth and Naomi, and the widows in dire straits miraculously rescued by Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings 17:8–15; 2 Kings 4). In keeping with the realism of the Bible, not all forsaken women fare as well. One thinks of Jephthah’s daughter (Judg 11:29–40), of the Levite’s concubine left outside the door to be abused (Judg 19) and of Tamar, abandoned after her rape by Amnon (2 Sam 13:1–19).

The imagery of forsaking also clusters around God’s commands, some of which warn against forgetting or forsaking a duty. Above all, God’s people are repeatedly enjoined not to forsake or neglect obeying him. The book of Proverbs is a repository of warnings not to forsake good behavior. The teacher commands his pupils not to forsake his teaching or their parents’ teaching (Prov 4:2; 6:20). He commends the attainment of wisdom, promising, “Do not forsake her, and she will keep you; love her, and she will guard you” (Prov 4:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). One of the virtues praised in Proverbs is never to forsake a friend (27:10). Not forsaking virtue thus supplements the larger biblical motif of not forsaking the needy.

While the motif of forsaking is predominantly a negative image, naming a state that should be avoided, there are a few instances where it assumes the positive meaning of abandoning something bad. Thus we read about forsaking wrath (Ps 37:8), transgressions (Prov 28:13) and idols (Ezek 20:8). The classic passage is Isaiah 55:7: “Let the wicked forsake their way, and the unrighteous their thoughts; let them return to the Lord, that he may have mercy on them, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon” (NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

We might say that in the Bible the ultimate consolation is to know that one is not forsaken by God (approximately ten references). The ultimate ignominy is to forsake God or his ways (nearly twenty references). The ultimate horror is to be forsaken by God (2 Chron 29:6; Ps 22:1; Mt 27:46).

See also Foreigner; Orphan; Wanderer, Wandering; Widow.

FORTRESS, STRONGHOLD

OT [OT OT. Old Testament] battle stories have as one of their staples fortresses-thick-walled cities, often on high mountains, meant to be impenetrable and intimidating to enemies. Yet of the approximately thirty-five references to fortresses in English Bibles, most are metaphoric pictures of God and his acts of salvation.

The first mention of a fortress comes in the story of David’s capturing Zion, or Jerusalem, from the Jebusites (2 Sam 5:6—7). David made this city his capital: a great, prosperous, central fortress in Israel. David knew many fortresses first-hand, so when he calls the Lord his fortress, he is clearly picturing strong walls and high defenses—a secure place where no evil can enter (2 Sam 22:2; Ps 18:2).

Artist's rendering of a fortresslike temple discovered at Sichem. Its walls were fifteen feet thick.

God often protected David physically, but when David and other OT [OT OT. Old Testament] writers call God their fortress, they primarily picture God as the unshakable strength of their souls, the source of hope and salvation that no enemy—physical or spiritual—can ever threaten. David calls God “the strength of his people, a fortress of salvation” (Ps 28:8 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Psalm 62 is a song about finding rest for the soul: “He alone is my rock and my salvation; he is my fortress, I will never be shaken” (Ps 62:2 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). In this psalm David uses the metaphor of a besieged fortress to picture himself, with “leaning walls and tottering fence”; his enemies “fully intend to topple him” (Ps 62:3—4). He may be referring to assaults on his kingship in his later years. And yet he looks to the God of his salvation as a refuge and a fortress in which he can place all his trust.

Often rock and fortress are used together to refer to God (2 Sam 22:2; Ps 18:2; 31:3; 71:3). Fortified cities were built, if possible, high on a cliff or mountain, with the rock providing an unshakable foundation and impenetrable defense. Isaiah accuses the Israelites of forgetting God their Savior: “You have not remembered the Rock, your fortress” (Is 17:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). Without their Rock, he tells them, they will fall to the enemy, both physically and spiritually, and the fortress of Jerusalem will be abandoned (Is 32:14). In a similar vein Nahum compares the fortress of godless Ninevah to fig trees that will spill their ripe fruit into the hands of the enemies who shake them; its gates will be wide open to its enemies (Nahum 3:12–13). By contrast, “he who fears the Lord has a secure fortress” (Prov 14:26 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Images of fortresses in Scripture turn our eyes from earthly cities, which fall and decay, to a heavenly city, Mount Zion, the New Jerusalem described in Revelation 21. That city has a “great, high wall,” thick and shining with gold and precious stones. Its gates will never be shut, and “nothing impure will ever enter it” (Rev 21:12, 17–21, 25–27). The enemy will finally be conquered, and God will rule there forever. Scripture pictures this God as the only fortress in which we can surely rest our souls as we look for the eternal city.

See also City; Jerusalem; Mountain; Refuge; Rock; Wall; Zion.

FORTY

The period of forty days or years is an important one in Scripture and in Jewish tradition. As the church fathers observed, it is most often associated with hardship, affliction and punishment (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Augustine, De Con. Ev. 2.4.8–9; see Crime and Punishment). The flood of judgment in Noah’s day lasts forty days (Gen 7:4). So does the fasting of Moses (Ex 24:18; Deut 9:9) and Elijah (1 Kings 19:8). The generation in the wilderness wanders for forty years (Ex 16:35; Ps 95:10). Israel is in the hand of the Philistines for forty years (Judg 13:1). Forty days is the length of time Ezekiel lies on his side to symbolize the punishment of Judah (Ezek 4:6). Jonah prophesies that Nineveh will be destroyed in forty days—a prophecy which proves to be contingent because the forty days become a period of repentance that nullifies the forecast (Jon 3:4).

Forty is usually just a round number or estimation, not a precise reckoning. The ancients, who had neither wristwatches nor appointment books and did not live with technology's demand for exact numbers, did not in general share our preoccupation with numerical or chronological precision. There is only one absolute date in the entire rabbinic corpus—the Messiah will come 4231 years after creation (b. 'Aboda Zara 9b). The NT [NT NT. New Testament] , like Plato, supplies only relative dates: things are placed successively, not on a time line. To judge from ancient Jewish epitaphs, people often did not even accurately know their own age: the excessive number of tombstones with ages ending in zero or five show that often just a round estimate was made. The lack of numerical exactness explains why in the Bible three, seven, and forty appear with inordinate frequency: three is a few, seven a few more, and forty a lot more. These numbers are approximations. Matthew can even use “three days and three nights” for the time Jesus is in the tomb, from Friday evening until Sunday morning (12:40). In accord with this sort of imprecision, forty days means a relatively long time (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Sam 17:16; Acts 1:3); as does forty years (Judg 3:11; Acts 4:22; 7:23). There are, however, occasional instances in which forty seems to be a precise reckoning (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , forty stripes, Deut 25:3; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2 Cor 11:24).

In Matthew 4:2 Jesus' experience of “forty days and forty nights” recapitulates Israel's forty years in the wilderness. Like Israel he is tempted by hunger (Ex 16:1–8), tempted to put God to the test (Ex 17:1–3) and tempted to idolatry (Ex 32). Furthermore, in his answers to Satan, Jesus quotes from Deuteronomy 6:13, 16 and 8:3—texts about Israel's wilderness experience. Most commentators, beginning with Irenaeus, also find a deliberate allusion to the lengthy fasts of Moses and Elijah: these too last “forty days and forty nights.”

See also Fasting; First; Five; Four; Hundred; One; Seven; Seventy; Three, Third; Twelve; Two; Wilderness.

FOUND.

See Find, Found.

FOUNDATION

The Hebrew verb yāsad (“establish,” “found,” “fix”), with its various derivatives and NT [NT NT. New Testament] equivalents, refers to the founding or establishing of cities and buildings, especially temples, according to prescribed plans. The plans, known by revelation and tradition, included consequences that made them apt illustrations for the security of godliness or the perils of wickedness. As one might expect, the bases of structures such as altars and the foundation stones of buildings or city walls are primarily in view (Acts 16:26; Rev 21:14; Is 54:11–12). Similarly, the author of Hebrews alludes to foundational doctrines as the basis of spiritual maturity (Heb 6:1, themelios) and the male seed as the basis of a covenantal household (Heb 11:11, katabolē); and Paul speaks of an initial group of converts as a foundation of ministry (Rom 15:20; 1 Cor 3:10–16). Biblical buildings and cities were only as substantial as their foundations, which were symbolically related to the behavior of the people. Thus houses and walls might be impressively painted, yet without deep foundations they were flimsy and insecure. In catastrophic judgments the “exposure of foundations” meant complete destruction (Deut 32:22; Ps 18:15; Ezek 13:14; Lk 6:49).

Literal usage in the Bible focused on the construction of temples and cities (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 1 Kings 16:24). Solomon's temple was built on large blocks of high quality stone (1 Kings 5:17; 6:37; 7:10). The foundation of the postexilic temple was celebrated as an assurance of the enduring love of the Lord for Israel (Ezra 3:6–12; 1 Chron 16:34; Zech 4:9; 8:9) as well as a prophetic exhortation to consider the ethical implications of the occasion (Hag 2:15–19). The sacral significance of the founding of a temple or city was mentioned negatively with Jericho, where because of child sacrifice a curse was pronounced by Joshua that was fulfilled in Ahab's reign (1 Kings 16:34).

The figurative meaning is an architectural metaphor that pictures God as the Creator of the earth (see Cosmology) and the builder of his promised city and family/nation. The literal and figurative nuances are mediated by passages that refer to the Lord as the ultimate builder of Zion and its temple in which his people are to find refuge (Is 14:32; 44:28). Metaphorically, the primary builder is divine rather than human; the blueprint is God's plan or decree; and the "structure" is personalized as creation, the household of God or individuals. The heavens and the earth belong to the Lord because he founded them and sovereignly governs everything in them according to his eternal plan (Ps 24:2; 78:69; 89:11[12]; 102:26; 104:5; Prov 3:19; Is 48:13; 51:13, 16). History unfolded the divine purposes of creation so that truths were progressively revealed that have been hidden since the foundation (creation) of the world (Ps 78:2; Mt 13:35).

In the ancient Near East, temples of the sovereign deities were thought of as microcosms of the world. The deity mediated life through the temple in the "center" (see Middle, Center) of the city, which was in turn the "center" of the earth. The image was of the temple and city as the navel (omphalos) of the world. In truth, this was Yahweh's right by creation through his temple in Zion (Ps 48; Ezek

5:5). Life and security were to be found in his word and city; thus the people of God had a secure hope based on his trustworthy promises. Though they may have had to live in tents like Abraham, by faith they were to look “forward to the city with foundations [in antithesis to ungodly alternatives], whose architect and builder is God” (Heb 11:10 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version] ; Rev 21:14, 19). This kind of faith in God’s word was as secure as founding one’s house (life) on bedrock (Lk 6:46–49), and it evidenced the Father’s election of believers in Christ from the foundation (creation) of the world (Mt 25:34; Eph 1:4; 2 Tim 2:19; Heb 4:3). The notions of plans, policies or resolutions as the basis of events and relationships applied as well to human rulers who formed enclaves against the Lord and his anointed ruler (Ps 2:2; 31:13) and who determined policies for their people (1 Chron 9:22; Esther 1:8; 8–9).

Peter and Paul give the architectural metaphor its most complete expression. 1 Peter 2:6 quotes Isaiah 28:16, which was a message of judgment to the proud drunkards of Ephraim (Is 28:1) and the scoffers of Jerusalem (Is 28:14), who boasted about their respective covenants with false gods as refuges from the Assyrian scourge. God laid a precious, tested cornerstone in Zion, the place of his presence, as a sure foundation for faithful believers (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ps 48:8). That stone, said Peter, was now Christ (NT [NT NT. New Testament] references agree with the LXX [LXX LXX. Septuagint (Greek translation of the Old Testament)] ’s messianic addition “in him”), the unique son of the only living God (Mt 16:18), who was crucified by men but chosen by the Father and precious to him and believers (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jn 17:5, 24; 1 Pet 1:19–20; Rev 13:8). Believers, Peter adds, are living stones that are building a spiritual house (the new temple), offering acceptable sacrifices based on historically validated faith and hope. The corner/foundation stone (themelios) functionally determined the basis and orientation of the building, so that God's blueprint for creation and redemption rested on the accomplishments of Christ. Peter added a quotation from Psalm 118:22 to affirm that God's foundation stone that unbelievers had rejected had become the capstone of completion that vindicated believers and condemned unbelievers according to the decree of God (also quoting Is 8:14). In short, Jesus is both foundation of God's holy city and fulfiller of its blueprint by securing believers according to the divine plan.

In Romans 9:32—33 Paul conflated Isaiah 8:14 and 28:16 to underscore Israel's lack of faith. Ephesians 2:20—21 welcomed all believers to God's household that is being built on Christ as cornerstone and the apostles and prophets as foundation stones (also Mt 16:18). The personalized temple is being built on and in Christ to become indwelt by the Holy Spirit.

In summary, God's plan for creation is the basis or foundation of the heavens and the earth, the nation, Zion and its temple, which are fulfilled in Christ, who is completing the plan through chosen believers. The new creation and holy city in Revelation 21 confirm the security of faith, hope and love in the household of God (1 Tim 6:17—19). All alternatives to these truths are "houses built of clay on foundations of dust" (Job 4:19).

See also Build, Building; City; Cornerstone; Cosmology; Rock; Stone; Temple; Zion.

FOUNTAIN

A fountain is a stream of water; it is specifically a source of water. As such it is very similar to two other English words, well and spring, both treated separately in the dictionary. Indeed, most English translations are somewhat arbitrary in their translation of a number of Hebrew and Greek words into one of these three English equivalents.

The word fountain, like well and especially spring, is associated with the general biblical image of water as life. Since the fountain more precisely indicates the source or origin of water, its figurative use often means source of life. As such, it is not at all surprising that Psalm 36:9 refers to God as the “fountain of life” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). The context of the psalm is God’s sustaining his creatures through food and drink and also through his protection. Zion’s reputation as the location of the temple, the symbol of God’s presence with his people, surely explains the reference in Psalm 87:7 where the psalmist happily exclaims, “All my fountains are in Zion.” That is, Zion, the place where the faithful meet their God, is the source of their life.

In the book of Proverbs wisdom and its derivatives are associated with the “fountain of life.” Proverbs 13:14 specifies the “teaching of the wise” as a fountain of life, and Proverbs 18:4 has an interesting twist on this theme when it describes not the fountain of life but the “fountain of wisdom” as a “bubbling book.” Elsewhere phenomena associated with wisdom, for instance the “mouth of the righteous” (Prov 10:11 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]) and “understanding” (Prov 16:22 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), are called a “fountain of life.” That wisdom is connected with the source of life is not at all surprising in light of the close connection between God and wisdom in that book. Indeed, Proverbs 14:27 makes this clear when it brings together the “fear of the Lord” (called the “beginning of knowledge” in Prov 1:7) with the “fountain of life” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Though the most frequent use of the fountain image is found in its connection with God, other associations are also made. It is, for instance, an important image for a woman.

Here again the fountain image is similar and is often used hand in hand with well and spring imagery. In Proverbs 5:18, the reader is encouraged to allow his wife to be a fountain of blessing. The context is obviously sexual, and the allusion is to the woman's vagina, a well-watered place, which also is the source of human life (see also Song 4:12, where a different Hebrew word is used).

Sometimes the image simply implies an abundance of water and fits in with that general image's function as a metaphor for life or cleansing. For instance, see Joel 3:18 in the context of an eschatological salvation oracle that envisions God's people as the recipients of fertility and blessing, whereas in the next verse God's enemies live in desolation. Zechariah 13:1 also begins an eschatological salvation oracle describing a fountain that will be opened and that will cleanse David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

Jeremiah uses the dual image of spring and fountain when he describes the depth of his grief at the sight of the suffering of his people. In Jeremiah 9:1 he rhetorically expresses his wish that his head become a "spring of water" and his eyes "a fountain of tears" (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

See also Brook; River; Spring of Water; Water; Well.

FOUR

Grouping objects or phrases in fours is a Hebrew literary technique used to picture universality. Just as naming the extreme points of east, west, north and south suggests everything else between, so biblical sets of four elements or poetic lines serve as an image indicating universal participation or including aspects not specifically mentioned.

Isaiah 58 offers an elaborate example. Verses 6 to 8 give four generalized aspects of justice (as God's fast), four specific acts of compassion and (borrowing Exodus imagery) four consequent blessings. Verses 9 and 10 together cite four blessings and four actions chiastically (i.e. [i.e. i.e.. that is] , the first two and last two lines promise, and the middle four lines command). Because they occur in fours, the specific examples imply all others.

Some of the completeness associated with four has a spatial or geographic basis. The four directions, for example, yield four winds (ten references) and four corners of the earth (Rev 7:1). Rectangular courts or buildings have four sides (Ezek 42:20) and four corners (Ezek 46:21).

The number four occurs so often in apocalyptic visions like Daniel, Ezekiel and Revelation that they constitute a category by themselves. We read variously about four beasts, four heads, four kings, four living creatures, four angels, four horns. In some passages the main meaning seems to be completeness or supremacy. Ezekiel's visions begin with four living beings, whose four faces reveal creation's superiorities—humankind, lion (wild beasts), ox (domestic animals) and eagle (birds of the air). Representing universal worship, they support the crystal expanse under God's throne. Four somewhat similar living creatures appear in Revelation to portray universal observation (full all around with eyes) and adoration (not ceasing to praise) (Rev 4:6—8). Beyond the meaning of completeness, the prevalence of four in apocalyptic visions may convey a mystic aura for supernatural events and settings.

Another concentration of the imagery of four occurs in the descriptions of the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] tabernacle (Ex 25—39), where again the associations may combine completeness and mystical aura. We thus read about four rings of gold, four cups, four pillars, four horns, four bronze rings and four rows of precious stones (see Jewels and Precious Stones).

The number four appears in what has come to be called a “number parallelism” in Amos 1–2 and Proverbs 30. Amos gives the reader a series of judgment speeches against various nations and begins by noting “for three sins ... even for four.” He then goes on and explicitly describes only one or two offenses. However, the intended effect of the parallelism is to impress the reader that there are many other unspecified sins at issue here. The nations have “gone over the top” and thus deserve their judgment.

Another prominent four is the refrain in Revelation of every “tribe, tongue, people and nation” gathered as God’s people. A foursome is named with various patterns in Revelation 5:9; 7:9; 10:11; 11:9; 13:7; 14:6 and 17:15—each time to underscore acceptance or rebellion, the universal possibility of God’s salvation or judgment upon those resisting God’s comprehensive grace.

See also Fasting; First; Five; Forty; Hundred; One; Seven; Seventy; Three, Third; Twelve; Two.

FOX.

See Animals.

FREEDOM.

See Bondage And Freedom.

FRIENDSHIP

A number of features of biblical friendship are conventional if compared to ancient cultures in general. In the classical tradition, for example, conventions prescribed that friends (1) are equals and are similar in class, interests and character, (2) share meals and spend time together and (3) follow virtue. While not explicitly stated, these motifs are present in biblical pictures of friendship as well. One of the psalmists, for example, speaks of “my bosom friend in whom I trusted, who ate of my bread” (Ps 41:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), and another psalmist addresses his friend as “you, my equal, my companion, my familiar friend. We used to hold sweet converse together; within God’s house we walked in fellowship” (Ps 55:13–14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In both classical and biblical traditions, a friend was a support and a counselor. For example, “a friend loves at all times” (Prov 17:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); that is, even in bad times. Again, “faithful are the wounds [criticisms] of a friend” (Prov 27:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]); and “the pleasantness of one’s friend springs from his earnest counsel” (Prov 27:9 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]). But as in classical culture, biblical writers also think in terms of the category of false friends who give bad counsel or betray, such as Job’s “comforters” or Judas, whom Jesus calls “friend” (Mt 26:50; see also 2 Sam 13:3; Ps 41:9; 55:12–14; Jer 38:22; Lam 1:2; Mic 7:5). The disciples in their abandonment of Jesus and Peter in his denial likewise enact the familiar category of friends who prove faithless in the time of crisis.

The classical tradition held a special place for friendship between males, and we catch hints of this exaltation of male friendship in the Bible too. In his elegy for Jonathan, David asserts that his friendship with Jonathan meant more to him than his relations with any of the women in his life: “Your love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women” (2 Sam 1:26 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Similarly, the most famous NT [NT NT. New Testament] example of friendship, that between Jesus and his disciples, involves a masculine group. Even so supreme a precept as one’s willingness to die for a friend, extolled in various classical sources referring to Damon and Pythias or Pylades and Orestes, is paralleled by Christ's teaching, "Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (Jn 15:13 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; see also 2 Sam 16:16—17 and 1 Chron 27:33).

Friendship with God. What, then, is distinctive about the biblical image of friendship? Aristotle thought there could be no friendship between a god and a man, any more than a man could be a friend to his slave or his tools, because they were too dissimilar in nature. But the Bible radically rejects secular thought on this point. Few things could be more unnatural and incomprehensible to the pagan imagination than the willingness of the God who created the universe out of nothing to become a friend of mortals whose lives are a mere breath. The whole plan of salvation is an act of friendship whereby God took on human likeness so that people might take on his likeness, transforming enemies into friends (Phil 2:5—8; Heb 2:17; 1 Jn 3:2). The high point of this motif is Jesus' statement to his disciples, "No longer do I call you servants ... but I have called you friends" (Jn 15:15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Friendship with God goes beyond simply the personal loyalty implied by any friendship; it includes faith and obedience as well. The psalmist states forthrightly that "the friendship of the Lord is for those who fear him" (Ps 25:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In three scripture references Abraham is identified as the friend of God (2 Chron 20:7; Is 41:8; Jas 2:23). The last of these links God's friendship toward Abraham with Abraham's faith and actions of obedience; indeed, Abraham is a byword for obedient faith. In the very conversation in which Jesus announced to his disciples that he considered them his friends, he added, "You are my friends if you do what I command you” (Jn 15:14). Friendship with God is thus not a friendship between equals, and the loyalty God expects has an exclusive quality that does not characterize human friendships. On the issue of allegiance, James wrote, “Do you not know that friendship with the world is enmity with God? Therefore whoever wishes to be a friend of the world makes himself an enemy of God” (Jas 4:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

In other ways the friendship of God has the qualities of human friendship. Friendship implies favor toward one’s friend, and the friendship of God entails just such favor, as witnessed by Job’s statement late in his time of suffering that God’s earlier favor toward him was the era when “the friendship of God was upon my tent” (Job 29:4 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Friendship implies the sharing of information about oneself. Psalm 25:14 links the friendship of God with the fact that God makes his covenant known to his friends.

The Imagery of Friendship. The Bible uses two consistent images in its representation of friendship. The first is the knitting of souls. Deuteronomy provides the earliest mention of this category of a “friend who is as your own soul” (Deut 13:6 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), a companion of one’s inmost thoughts and feelings, resulting in an intense emotional attachment. It is well illustrated by Jonathan and David’s friendship: “The soul of Jonathan was knit to the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul” (1 Sam 18:1 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 20:17). Characteristic expressions of this union of hearts are an affectionate embrace or kiss, weeping, gift-giving and vows of loyalty. After the slaying of Goliath, Jonathan made a covenant with David, and the gestures of friendship were Jonathan’s giving David the gifts of his robe, armor and weapons (1 Sam 18:3–4). David and Jonathan also pledged to protect each other's families after either one's death (1 Sam 20:11–16), a promise David subsequently kept by giving sanctuary to Jonathan's son Mephibosheth (2 Sam 9). Later, when Saul's wrath required David to flee, there was a moving departure scene between the soul-mates: "They kissed one another, and wept with one another," departing in peace because they had sworn in the name of the Lord that God would bind them and their descendants forever (1 Sam 20:41–42).

Examples of this kind of friendship in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] are chiefly identified by use of the word philia, the Greek term for friendship, and its cognates.

Characteristics similar to the friendship of Jonathan and David's are evident in such friendship. Jesus wept for the death of Lazarus, whom he called "our friend Lazarus" (Jn 11:11). In the same account, the Greek word for friend is used to describe Jesus' love for his friend Lazarus (Jn 11:3, 35–36). Jesus and John "the disciple whom Jesus loved" (Jn 20:2) embraced freely (Jn 13:23), and Jesus made a covenant with him to look after his mother after his death (Jn 19:26–27). One sign of the "soul-knit" relationship between believers in the NT [NT NT. New Testament] is the greeting with a "holy kiss" (Rom 16:16; 1 Cor 16:20; 2 Cor 13:12; 1 Thess 5:26; 1 Pet 5:14). Given such familiarity, "friend" naturally became another name for believers or brothers in the Lord: "The friends greet you. Greet the friends, every one of them" (3 Jn 15 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The privileges and roles of a biblical soul mate, then, involve intimacy, loyalty and a strong emotional attachment.

The second image that the Bible uses to represent friendship is the face-to-face encounter, an "interface." This is literally the image used for Moses' relationship to God: in the tabernacle God spoke to Moses "face to face, as a man speaks to his friend” (Ex. 33:11; see also Num. 12:8). The face-to-face image implies a conversation, a sharing of confidences and consequently a meeting of minds, goals and direction. In three scripture verses Abraham is identified as “the friend of God” (2 Chron 20:7; Is 41:8; Jas 2:23). Behind the epithet may lie the event of Abraham’s hosting of three angelic visitors, one of whom was God (Gen 18). Following the meal, after the two angels had proceeded to Sodom to warn Lot, God takes Abraham into his confidence, asking himself, “Shall I hide from Abraham what I am about to do?” (Gen 18:20). God and Abraham then engage in a dialogue based on the intimacy of friends, with the imagery of Abraham’s drawing near to God (Gen 18:23; see Near, Drawing Near) and the give-and-take dialogue in which Abraham and God deliberate over the fate of Sodom. A form of friendship is implied, surely, by the NT [NT NT. New Testament] image of the believer’s one day seeing God “face to face” (1 Cor 13:12).

One of the benefits of face-to-face encounters between friends is the heightened insight and stimulation that such encounters produce. A proverb that highlights this mutual sense of well-being is the famous one in Proverbs 27:17: “Iron sharpens iron, and one friend sharpens another” (KJV [KJV KJV. King James Version (Authorized Version)]). This is similar to the statement of English Renaissance essayist Francis Bacon that conversation makes a “ready” person-ready for the world, ready for practical action.

Summary. Friendship entails responsibilities and benefits. The proverb that “a friend loves at all times” (Prov 17:17) expresses both an obligation and a benefit. In a similar vein is the proverb that “there are friends who pretend to be friends, but there is a friend who sticks closer than a brother” (Prov 18:24 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In the Bible friendship is a mutual improvement activity, honing one for godly use. Biblical friendship is a face-to-face encounter, signifying proximity, intimate revelation and honesty. It is also a bonding of affections and trust, knitting one's very soul to another. In its ultimate reaches, it is union with God.

See also Enemy; Family; Loyalty; Near, Drawing Near.

FRUIT, FRUITFULNESS

Not counting three dozen occurrences of fruitful, the word fruit appears more than two hundred times in English translations. Three main meanings are discernible: (1) fruit in the modern sense of a specific food group, linked especially with fruit trees (Gen 1:11; Neh 9:25; Ps 148:9; Eccles 2:5; Is 17:6); (2) the edible product of any tree or plant (Gen 3:2–6; Ex 10:15); (3) by metaphoric extension, the result of an action, including offspring as the result of sexual relations.

References to fruit in the Bible portray it as either good or bad. According to a famous statement made by Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount, “Every sound tree bears good fruit, but the bad tree bears evil fruit” (Mt 7:17–19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; Lk 6:43; see also Mt 3:10; Lk 3:9). This dualism is present already in the Garden of Eden. While satisfying the human appetite through eating of the fruit of the garden is good in itself, the fruit of the forbidden tree is invested with the potential to bring death into the universe. The primal sin consists of Eve's eating the fruit of the forbidden tree and giving some to her husband, who also eats (Gen 3:6). However we understand this fruit, the outcome of tasting it is shame (Gen 3:7 cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 2:25), pain, suffering and ultimately death (Gen 3:16–19). Here, surely, is the archetypal bad fruit of human experience.

If the forbidden fruit has overtones of the supernatural, so does the fruit that appears in the celestial paradise at the end of the Bible. Flowing through the middle of the new Jerusalem is “the river of the water of life,” and on either side of the river is “the tree of life with its twelve kinds of fruit, yielding its fruit each month” (Rev 22:1–2 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 47:12; see Tree of Life). Its fruits serve for the healing of the nations, symbolic of abundant life and a reversal of the Fall of Genesis 3. Here, surely, is the archetypal good fruit of human experience.

Fruit as an Image of Abundance. Abundant fruit is symbolic of the richness and creativity of God. The world as created by God was prolific in its fruitfulness: “fruit trees bearing fruit in which is their seed” (Gen 1:11–12) and “every tree with seed in its fruit” (Gen 1:29). Jeremiah links three of the most evocative OT [OT OT. Old Testament] images of richness when he lists “wine and summer fruits and oil” (Jer 40:10, 12).

As an image of abundance and divine blessing, fruit is conspicuously present in descriptions of the superiority of the Promised Land, which is repeatedly portrayed as abundantly fruitful (Ex 3:8; Num 12:2–7; Deut 8:8). When the twelve spies return, the proof of the land’s desirability is “fruit of the land” (Num 13:26). The fruitfulness of the land is linked to covenant obedience. An obedient Israel could expect God to preserve the fruitfulness of the land: “the land will yield its fruit, and you will eat your fill” (Lev 25:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). Prosperity was expected (1 Kings 4:25). Even in time of war, fruit trees were not to be destroyed (Deut 20:19–20). When Nehemiah recalls the superiority of the Promised Land, the picture includes “vineyards, olive orchards and fruit trees in abundance” (Neh 9:25). Disobedience, however, leads to God’s judgment upon the land of Israel (Jer 4:26), as upon the land of other nations (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 10:18; Jer 48:33).

By extension, both children (Gen 30:2; Deut 7:13; Mic 6:7; Ps 21:11; Is 13:18; Lk 1:42) and offspring of animals (Deut 28:4, 11; 30:9) are described as fruit. Human fertility is both the promise (Gen 17:6; 28:3; 48:4) and the command of God (Gen 1:22, 28; 8:17; 9:1, 7). In this sense a wife can be described as a “fruitful vine” (Ps 128:3). Children are “the fruit of the womb” and as such “a heritage from the Lord” (Ps 127:3).

A summary of fruit as a supreme image of earthly abundance is found in Moses’ picture of how “the Lord your God will make you abundantly prosperous in all the work of your hand, in the fruit of your body, and in the fruit of your cattle, and in the fruit of your ground” (Deut 30:9 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 28:11).

First Fruits. Fruit also figures prominently in the OT [OT OT. Old Testament] ceremonial laws. Fruit trees were regarded as unclean for the first three years. The crop of the fourth year was described as the first fruits and belonged to the Lord (see First). From the fifth year on the fruit could be eaten.

Because everything belongs ultimately to God, the first ripening of the harvest was ritually offered to him (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Is 28:4; Jer 24:2; Mic 7:1). This extended to children (Ex 13:2–16) and animals (Num 3:12–16). The metaphor is used to describe Israel (Jer 2:3). To consume the first fruits as any other crop would be to profane it, for it was regarded as sacred (Lev 19:23–25; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 20:6; 28:30; Jer 31:5; Neh 10:35–36).

The resurrection of Jesus is described by Paul as “the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep” (1 Cor 15:20, 23 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]), clearly with an eye both to his chronological priority and to the expected messianic abundance. By extension, the Holy Spirit is described as the first fruits (Rom 8:23). We might compare this with Paul’s description of the Spirit as a “guarantee” (2 Cor 1:22; Eph 1:13–14) of a greater amount to follow.

Metaphoric Extensions. The consequences of an action are frequently described as its fruit (Jer 17:10). Creation is the fruit of God’s work (Ps 104:13). In later Judaism, especially, the righteous person was described as bearing good fruit (Prov 31:31; Is 3:10), while the unrighteous person would bear bad fruit (Prov 1:31; Jer 6:19; 21:14; Hos 10:13; Mic 7:13). The tongue is capable of bearing both good and evil fruit (Prov 12:14; 18:20). Heresy leads to unfruitfulness (Jude 12). Conversely, prayer and worship are described metaphorically as the fruit of the lips (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Prov 12:14; 13:2; 18:20; Is 57:18; Heb 13:15).

Bearing fruit is an archetype for righteous living in OT [OT OT. Old Testament] wisdom literature. Psalm 1:3 sounds the keynote, describing the godly person as “a tree planted by streams of water, that yields its fruit in its season” (RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Jer 17:7–8). In the NT [NT NT. New Testament] , Matthew, especially, draws upon such imagery from the wisdom tradition. John the Baptist urges the fruit of repentance and warns that unfruitful trees will be cut down and burnt (Mt 3:8–10). Jesus himself confirms this judgment and points out that false prophets can be identified in the same way as trees are identified, by their fruit (Mt 7:15–20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 12:33). Seed that has been sown on good ground is extremely fruitful (Mt 13:23). Ultimately the kingdom belongs to those who produce its fruit (Mt 21:43). James draws upon the same wisdom tradition (Jas 3:17).

Paul uses the metaphor of a fruitful harvest to describe the outcome of his own ministry (Rom 1:13). For Paul continuance in life promises further fruitful labor (Phil 1:22). The gospel, like righteousness, bears fruit (Col 1:6, 10). In terms of behavior Paul echoes the language of the wisdom writings, writing of the “fruit of the light” and the “unfruitful works of darkness” (Eph 5:8ff). In Hebrews discipline “yields the peaceful fruit of righteousness to those who have been trained by it” (Heb 12:11 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]).

Literal fruitfulness is, of course, dependent on an adequate sources of water. Thus water becomes a potent metaphor for the Spirit (Ezek 47:1–12; Jn 7:37–39).

In Galatians 5:22–23 Paul employs the image of the “fruit of the Spirit” to describe the workings of God’s Spirit in contrast to the “works of the flesh” (Gal 5:17–21). Here Paul draws an intended contrast between the naturally growing fruit of God’s Spirit and the sin that is the outcome of humanity’s actions independent of God. Thorns and thistles enter the scene following the spoiling of the Garden of Eden through sin (Gen 3:17–19). They represent the encroachment of untamed nature. They can be the result of idleness (Prov 24:30–31) or the judgment on a city (Is 34:13). In either case, creation is out of control. The nature miracles of Jesus give some idea of what might have been had sin not intervened (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , Mk 4:35–41; 6:30–44; Jn 2:1–11; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Heb 2:8–9). Metaphorically speaking, unfruitfulness strangles spiritual life and vigor (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] Mk 4:7, 18–19). Isaiah describes Israel as unable to bear the fruit expected of her (Is 5:2, 4). The unfruitful fig tree, representing Israel, is cursed by Jesus (Mk 11:12–14, 20–25; Mt 21:18–22). The unwholesome consequences of idolatry and injustice are referred to a “wormwood,” a notoriously bitter and poisonous fruit (Deut 29:18; Amos 5:7; 6:12), which can spread throughout the whole community of Israel.

See also Abundance; Fig, Fig Tree; First; Food; Garden; Grapes; Harvest; Tree, Trees; Tree of Life; Vine, Vineyard.

FUGITIVE.

See Runaway.

FULLNESS.

See Fill, Fullness.

FUNERAL.

See Burial, Funeral.

FURNACE.

See Refining.

G

GABRIEL.

See Annunciation.

GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE

Galatians is a lively letter of rebuke and correction in which the readers are addressed in direct and arresting language. In its sustained interaction with the ideas and motives of his opponents, who threaten to lead the Galatians astray from the true gospel, Paul's letter burns with the heat of conflict and sparks an array of colorful imagery.

Bondage and Rescue. Galatians begins with the remembrance that Christ in his death has "set us free from the present evil age” (Gal 1:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The motif of bondage, imprisonment or enslavement to a power or situation beyond human deliverance is one that recurs throughout the letter. It describes the human plight of bondage outside of Christ, a condition to which the Galatians risk returning. As for the Jews, who are under the law, “the Scripture” has “consigned,” “hemmed in,” or “imprisoned” (synkleiō) all things under the power of sin (Gal 3:22). Before faith arrived, Israel was “held in custody” (ephrourometha) and “locked up,” or “consigned” (synkleiō), under the law (Gal 3:23; 4:4–5). This situation is also pictured as “enslavement” (dedoulōmenoi) to taskmasters known as the “elements,” or preferably, “elemental spirits of the world” (stoicheia tou kosmou, Gal 4:3, 8–9). These spirits are otherwise depicted in an image reflecting the Galatians’ pagan past when they were subject to “beings by nature not gods,” which Paul can also call “weak and beggarly elements” (Gal 4:8–9). The picture of enslavement is completed with the image of “works” associated with life under the law, the keeping of laws and regulations regarding circumcision, food, days, months and years (Gal 2:16; 3:2, 5, 10; 6:4; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 4:10).

Into this bleak world of enslavement a mighty deliverer was subversively and quietly “sent,” “born of a woman, born under the law, in order to redeem those who were under the law” (Gal 4:4–5 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). The image of redemption recalls Israel’s release from slavery in Egypt. Christ, like a new Moses (and born like Moses, within Israel under bondage), has brought about a new exodus. Why, asks Paul, would these Gentiles, “formerly enslaved” (edoulousate) and now “set free from the present evil age,” submit again to this “yoke of slavery” (Gal 5:1)? It is as if Israel were to return to Egypt, a band of slaves return to their cruel master.

Family and Household. Paul's letters consistently evoke the picture of believers as a family, and this aspect is well developed in Galatians. We must first envision a large, prosperous household in the ancient Mediterranean world, with numerous family members of extended relationships, household slaves and even ancestors whose memories can be evoked. The household Paul addresses is the "household of faith" (Gal 6:10) whose members are his "brothers and sisters" (adelphoi, literally, "brothers," carries this inclusive sense: Gal 1:11; 3:15; 4:12, 28, 31; et al.), whom Paul, as elder brother, can address as "little children" (Gal 4:19). They have all been adopted (Gal 4:5) into this household as "children" (hyioi, literally "sons," Gal 4:5–7) of God, and by his Spirit they are enabled to call God their "Abba, Father" (Gal 4:6). As children they are now heirs. This family status is new-found and a quantum leap forward, for formerly they were slaves—both Jews and Greeks—in bondage to the present age. Now within their new family the old human distinctions are broken down; there is neither "Jew nor Greek," "slave nor free," "male and female," but all are one in Christ (Gal 3:28). This image of a household merges into the ideal of a new humanity, for it is "a new creation" that erases and supplants a human community fractured along the line drawn between "circumcision" and "uncircumcision" (Gal 6:15). Christ is Lord (Gal 1:3) of this household, and Paul regards himself as a "servant of Christ." The Galatians can observe and judge for themselves whether Paul has lately turned his back on his master to please someone else (Gal 1:10).

Paul again employs the picture of a household as he gives the Galatians a lesson in genealogy and traces the ancestry of this new family not through the lineage of the "slave woman" Hagar but through the "free woman" Sarah (Gal 4:22–26), for "she is our mother" (Gal 4:26). Those who preach a "different gospel" are of a different lineage of Abraham—through Hagar and not through Sarah. As descendants of Abraham (Gal 3:7), “Abraham’s offspring, heirs according to the promise” (Gal 3:29 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), the Galatians are descendants of the “free woman,” a household characterized by freedom. The same “false brothers” (pseudadelphoi) who in Jerusalem “slipped in to spy on the freedom we have in Christ Jesus, so that they might enslave us” (Gal 2:4 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]) are now active in Galatia. Paul did not submit to them in Jerusalem, and the Galatians should now look out for the same sinister infiltration of their household. Like their free ancestor, the Galatians are to “drive out the slave and her child” from their household, “for the child of the slave will not share the inheritance with the child of the free woman” (Gal 4:30 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). This inheritance is nothing less than the kingdom of God (Gal 5:21).

The “right hand of fellowship” (Gal 2:9) is a sign of familial bonds that run deeper than differences within the family. But there are also images of estrangement from the family: “deserting” the one who called them (Gal 1:6), “alienating” themselves from Christ (Gal 5:4), or “falling away” from the grace of their divine patron (Gal 5:4). True family members will restore with a spirit of gentleness those who are caught in sin (Gal 6:1).

Again we find household imagery in the story of Israel under the law. Israel was like an heir who was still a minor. Though “lord of all the property” (Gal 4:1), Israel was no different than a slave. Until the “the appointed end of guardianship [prothesmia] set by the father” is reached, an heir is “under guardians and trustees” (Gal 4:2). The law was a “disciplinarian” (paidagōgos, Gal 3:24–25), a household servant entrusted with the supervision of the child’s education and discipline. In the heat of Paul's conflict with the judaizers, this metaphor of minority status is more virulently portrayed as slavery under the "elemental spirits," or "basic principles [stoicheia]" that are "of this world" (Gal 4:3, see above; for the range of interpretations, see DPL [DPL DPL. Dictionary of Paul and His Letters], 229–33).

Covenant. The OT [OT OT. Old Testament] imagery associated with the divine covenant plays an important role in Galatians. The covenant that God made with Abraham and his offspring (Gen 15) was ratified by God and was not annulled by the law that came four hundred thirty years later (Gal 3:17). The inheritance of the original covenant was based on promises, not on law (Gal 3:18). Paul reinforces the security of the original covenant by taking an illustration from daily life (Gal 3:15), that of a human covenant (or possibly a "last will and testament," though the same term, diathēkē, is used in both Gal 3:15 and 17): once ratified, it cannot be altered or annulled. Paul calculates that this image will subvert the Judaizers' arguments and deployment of imagery, which probably presented Abraham as the first proselyte, who was given the commandment of circumcision (Gen 17:10) and in fact was obedient to the commands, decrees and laws of God (Gen 26:5). Paul demonstrates that the law was "added" later because of Israel's "transgressions" (Gal 3:19), but it did not override the previous covenant established on divine promises (Gal 3:21). In fact, Paul argues, the law was inferior in that it involved a mediator, Moses, who stood in for the twelve tribes of Israel. But God is one (Gal 3:20), and he originally made a covenant directly with Abraham, the single progenitor of the one people of God constituted by faith (and not law) and the one "seed," Jesus Christ (see Wright).

If the law was added on account of transgressions, the result was that transgressions did in fact amass in Israel, as the national history recounts in detail. When Paul speaks of the curse that falls on “everyone who does not observe and obey all the things written in the book of the law,” he is recalling the covenant curses that would fall upon Israel if they were to break the covenant (Deut 27:26; 28:58–68). These curses did indeed fall upon Israel and culminated in the nation’s exile from the land of promise and blessing. The shadow of this curse still hung over Israel. Even though Israel had physically returned to the land, the time of renewal had not arrived. Paul finds the solution to this covenant dilemma in Jesus Christ, who as representative of Israel has taken upon himself the “curse of the law” and exhausted it in his death on the Roman cross, the accursed hanging “on a tree” (Gal 3:13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Deut 21:23). With this obstacle of the law removed once and for all, the blessings promised to Abraham’s true descendants flow freely, overpouring the banks of believing Israel and spilling out upon the Gentiles (Gal 3:14). The central image of Christ’s death in Galatians is set firmly within the imagery field of the covenant.

Jerusalem and Sinai. Geographical images are overlaid with allegory in Galatians. Paul begins with Jerusalem as the symbolic center of Israel’s history and now the widely regarded hub of the early Christian movement with its acknowledged leaders, James, Cephas and John (Gal 2:9). Paul retains the traditional Jewish imagery of “going up” (Gal 1:17, 18; 2:1) to Jerusalem, but he also subverts the favored symbol of Jerusalem as the exalted center of the world (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 2:2–3). His apostleship and gospel did not originate with Jerusalem’s commission, authority or instruction but was received directly from God through Jesus Christ (Gal 1:1). It is a revelation (Gal 1:11–12, 16) from heaven. Paul is at pains to show that Jerusalem and its leaders exercise no centripetal force on him (Gal 1:18; 2:1–2), and he will not grant its leaders absolute authority or status as “pillars” (styloi, Gal 2:9) of the new temple, the church.

This subversion of Jerusalem’s place on the new map of the world is deepened by Paul’s opposition to the work of the judaizers at Galatia. Set against the glossary of Scripture’s imagery of Jerusalem, we see Paul invoking images reminiscent of prophetic denunciation. These judaizers are missionaries of a “different gospel” who claim to derive their warrant from Jerusalem. The sacred mount of Jerusalem finds its correspondence with “Mount Sinai in Arabia” (cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gal 1:17). This mountain, revered in holy memory for its awesome revelation of God, the giving of the law and the disclosure of the sacred sanctuary with its functions, has now fallen under the shadow of a new and grander revelation.

Jerusalem, the fair-skinned “daughter Zion” (Is 1:8), has taken on the tragic and weathered likeness of “Hagar, from Mount Sinai, bearing children for slavery” (Gal 4:24). This image is akin to Isaiah’s likening Zion, its walls evacuated by the exile, to an abandoned wife (Is 49:14) or a bereaved and barren mother (Is 49:20–21). The present Jerusalem, representing Torah-based religion, is still in exile with her children, born “according to the flesh.”

Cutting and Crucifying the Flesh. Were Christian readers not so familiar with the text of Galatians, they might be repulsed by Paul’s use of imagery associated with bodily markings and mutilation. Circumcision is the central image, and as a verb or noun it appears thirteen times. Circumcision was the bodily marking that indicated membership in the covenant community for every male Israelite, and it was a practice that set Israel off from most of its Gentile neighbors. The Greek term for circumcision is peritomē, literally a “cutting around,” in this case a ritual cutting off of the foreskin of the penis. It was a bloody and painful operation, and this dimension of the image should not be lost as we consider how it would have registered on the minds of the Gentile adult males who would have read or heard this letter. Circumcision was not practiced in the Hellenistic Gentile world, where it was regarded as barbaric and perverse. But for Israel it was a holy rite filled with special meaning.

The judaizers had persuasively overridden Gentile revulsion and aversion to pain by promising eternal gain. But Paul subverts their arguments by exploiting the physical reality of the symbol and invoking some counter-imagery. The strength of his imagery is a testimony to the force of his rejection of this “fleshly” rite, an attitude that would have been unthinkable for the pre-Christian Paul. With earthy forthrightness he wishes that those who pressure the Galatians to be circumcised would go the whole way and castrate themselves (Gal 5:12). If the judaizers wish to promote fleshly mutilation, Paul can play their game: he has “the marks [stigmata] of Jesus branded” on his body (Gal 6:17 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]), the true bodily markings of a disciple of Christ. This image may carry reference to the actual physical scars left by his apostolic hardships and persecutions (e.g. [e.g. e.g.. for example] , 2 Cor 11:23–29), authentic signs of his allegiance to his crucified Lord. For Paul sees the bloody cross and fleshly mutilation of Christ as the bloody post on which the gate to the new creation pivots. By union with Christ, “the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world. For neither circumcision nor uncircumcision is anything; but a new creation is everything” (Gal 6:14–15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Those who preach circumcision are ashamed of the cross, the central symbol of fleshly mutilation, and wish to escape Jewish persecution for proclaiming the cross of Christ as the exclusive ground for entry into the people of God (see Col 2:11–12, where identification with Christ’s death is partaking in the “circumcision of Christ”; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Eph 2:11, 13). The echo of a story of David (1 Sam 18:25–27) may be faintly overheard in the judaizers’ boast in the Galatians’ “flesh,” their collection of Gentile foreskins (Gal 6:12–13). Paul remembers with fondness the Galatians’ former and honorable willingness to tear out their own eyes and give them to Paul for the sake of the gospel (Gal 4:13–15). Now, like beasts, they are shamefully reduced to “biting and devouring” one another (Gal 5:15).

Other Images. Paul’s letters frequently evoke the routine tasks of life in field and town. The Galatians are a community that must bear one another’s burdens, the troubles and hardships of others (Gal 6:2). But this is not to the exclusion of carrying their own load, bearing their own portion of work and minding their own business when it comes to testing the quality of labor (Gal 6:4–5). Paul is concerned that his own work not be wasted (Gal 4:11); as one who has labored hard, he does not want to rebuild what he formerly tore down (Gal 2:18). Field and hearth are evoked in images of sowing (to the flesh or Spirit) and reaping a harvest (of corruption or eternal life; Gal 6:8–9), the fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22) and the little leaven that leavens the whole batch of dough (Gal 5:9).

God can be described as “the one who calls you” (Gal 5:8). When he called the Galatians (Gal 1:6), it was a call to freedom (Gal 5:13), and although the Galatians responded in faith to what they heard (Gal 3:2, 5), they seem now to be deserting the one who called them and reverting to bondage. God has also called Paul (Gal 1:15), a calling modeled after the call of the prophets (Is 49:1, 5). Believers respond by calling back to God through the Spirit, who from their hearts trains their tongues to call out “Abba, Father” (Gal 4:6). This theme of speech, both human and divine, is extended as Paul “speaks,” yet wishes to be present and change his “tone” (Gal 4:20), as Scripture speaks (Gal 4:30) and the promises of God are spoken (Gal 3:16).

Viewing his ministry among the Gentiles as a foot race, Paul sought assurance from the Jerusalem church that he “was not running or had not run in vain” (Gal 2:2). The Galatians too are running a race: “You were running well,” says Paul. But suddenly there has been an interference in their progress: Who “cut in on you?” (NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]), or “cut you off?” (Gal 5:7). Alternatively the whole course of the Christian life may be viewed as a walk, a Jewish image commonly used for living in accordance with the law. For Paul it is no longer law that guides but the Spirit. Thus he instructs the Galatians to “walk in the Spirit” (Gal 5:16), to be “guided” by the Spirit (Gal 5:18) and to “keep in step with” (stoicheō) the Spirit (Gal 5:25).

Paul is aware of a divine timetable that transcends human reckoning. There is the date “set by the father” (Gal 4:2), the arrival of “the fullness of time” (Gal 4:4) and the arrival of the “proper time” in which he will “reap a harvest” (Gal 6:9). But the observance of holy times prescribed by the law—days, months, seasons, years (Gal 4:10)—are part of the old calendar ruled by the “basic elements.” They are to be abandoned in light of the arrival of the fullness of time.

Paul quite naturally invokes images of conception, birth and lineage. He speaks of the concrete Hebrew image of “seed” (vs. the “seeds,” Gal 3:16 etc.) in speaking of the offspring of Abraham to whom the promise was given. This imagery evokes a world in which the bearing of offspring is not a matter of personal pleasure and indulgence but a means by which humans join in the process of divine promise and fulfillment. Conception and birth are opportunities for human participation in God's grace as the barren woman who has known no birth pangs rejoices to find herself pregnant and the mother of more children than one who has a husband (Gal 4:27; citing Is 54:1). Or Paul can liken his relationship to the Galatians to a mother undergoing the pangs of childbirth again, "until Christ is formed in you" (4:19). It is as if the Galatians have reverted to a prenatal condition.

Paul's reference to his former zeal for the traditions of his ancestors (Gal 1:15) summons scenes of violence against the early Christian communities (Gal 1:13, 23). But zeal is also a positive impulse, and for pious Jews it called forth a distinguished cast of characters in Israel's story, including Phineas (Num 25:6–13), Elijah (1 Kings 17:1–2 Kings 2:15) and the more recent Maccabean heroes. Paul may be evoking memories of the prophet Elijah when he speaks of his having gone away into Arabia (Sinai?; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Gal 4:25) and afterwards returning to Damascus (Gal 1:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Kings 19:8, 15). Zeal is valued by the judaizers, but it is misplaced zeal (Gal 4:17–18). In contrast, the whole of Paul's letter exudes a dynamic zeal for the gospel and for the Galatians' participation in the true gospel.

See also Abraham; Bondage and Freedom; Circumcision; Covenant; Jerusalem; Law; Romans, Letter to the; Sinai; Zion.

Bibliography N. T. Wright, "The Seed and the Mediator: Galatians 3:15–20" in The Climax of the Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992) 157–74.

GALL

"That is a bitter pill to swallow" is a near equivalent to the metaphorical usage of the word gall in the Bible. It denotes a bitter, hard experience of life. Proverbs 3:4 warns that the adulteress may entice with charms as sweet as honey and yet will lead her victim to a bitter end (see Seductress). The psalmist uses gall as a way of describing how it feels when there is no one around to comfort you in times of trouble (Ps 69:20–21). The author of Lamentations uses the word to describe the intense shame, despair and bitterness the destruction of Jerusalem and the collapse of Judah has brought about (Lam 3). Yet it must be pointed out that one of the Bible's most beautiful descriptions of hope in the midst of despair was penned in this very context: "Because of the Lord's great love we are not consumed, for his compassions never fail. They are new every morning; great is your faithfulness" (Lam 3:22–23 NIV [NIV NIV. New International Version]).

Gall is also used to denote in a very graphic way the yellowish-brown secretion of the liver (Job 16:13). It is the label given the stupefying concoction offered our Lord as he was being crucified to help him deal with the pain (Mt 27:34). It is significant that Jesus refused and chose instead to experience the full bitterness of the situation, which included not only physical pain and shame, but unfathomable mental and spiritual anguish.

See also Sweet.

GARDEN

Throughout the Bible, the garden as a well-watered space set apart for the intense cultivation of plants is an image of both nature and sacred space. At a literal, physical level the garden is a place of life richly nourished, well attended to and appointed for the enjoyment of its human owners or residents. As such, it is a touchstone of such motifs as provision, beauty, abundance and the satisfaction of human need. Next to heaven, it is the preeminent image of human longing.

Associated as it is with life at its fullest, one should not be surprised to find that the garden is one of the framing images of the total Bible story. In Genesis 2 Adam is provided the Garden of Eden as a perfect abode and workplace. In Revelation 21 the New Jerusalem is described as the ideal joining of garden and city. The city of God descended from heaven has a river of life issuing from beneath God's throne, much as a fountain arose in the midst of Eden's garden. The river is lined with trees whose fruit is for food and whose leaves are for the healing of the nations.

It is useful to notice at the outset the categories of gardens in the Bible. A basic distinction exists between the garden—the garden of God in Eden—and gardens—places that share the qualities of the original Paradise but lack its unique status. The garden in the Song of Songs is almost as distinctly a world of its own as the Garden of Eden and is obviously the archetypal garden of love that has reverberated throughout human history, especially in literature. At a more otherworldly level, we find the image of the heavenly paradise. Finally, there are the two gardens of Jesus' passion and resurrection—the Garden of Gethsemane and the garden of Jesus' tomb.

The Garden of God. The human race has always pictured perfection as an enclosed garden, lush with vegetation and suffused with tranquillity. As we unpack the meanings of the paradisaical image, it is important to be aware that this is the Bible's picture of how God intended human life to be lived. The Garden of Eden is more than a place; it is also a way of life and a state of soul. Because God himself planted the Garden of Eden (Gen 2:8), there is something prescriptive as well as descriptive in the image of the original garden of perfection and its successors.

The term paradise derives from the Persian word for a walled garden. Although the word is not used for the garden of Genesis 2 (which is instead called “the Garden of Eden” and “the garden of God”), it is nonetheless the Bible’s version of Paradise. While Genesis 2 does not ascribe a wall to this perfect place, the impression is clearly one of secluded protection, an impression reinforced after the expulsion when a flaming sword bars reentry, implying a gate of entry into the garden. The terms used for plants and animals in Genesis 2 are different those used in Genesis 1; they refer to plants and animals cultivated and controlled by people in contrast to the cosmic scope of the preceding chapter. The enclosed nature of the perfect garden itself captures an essential quality of it—its difference from ordinary life. The very simplicity of life in the garden is part of its difference from the complexities of civilization, as signaled partly by the unashamed nakedness of Adam and Eve in the garden. The enclosure is a fixed barrier between original perfection—an ideal past—and fallen experience. It may also imply the limits and finitude of human life even in its original perfection.

Other motifs may also be discerned in the paradisaical garden of Genesis 2. One is provision. The image is perennial and universal, but it no doubt had added resonance for an agrarian society living in an arid region. Because gardens are watered, they are places of abundant vegetation. Such a garden is, moreover, a picture of the perpetual abundance and nourishment of nature, along the lines of the tree of Psalm 1 that never withers. It goes without saying that this green world is also a place of natural beauty. Paradise combines the utilitarian need of being “good for food” with the aesthetic ideal of being “pleasant to the sight” (Gen 2:9). The ideal is timeless, making Paradise (in the words of C. S. Lewis) a region in the mind that does exist and should be visited often.

If the Garden of Eden is an image of divine provision, it is paradoxically also a place of human labor. Gardens, after all, require cultivation. Genesis 2 tells us that God took the newly created Adam and “put him in the garden of Eden to till it and keep it” (Gen 2:15 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). In addition to its status as an image of nature and relaxation, therefore, the garden is also an image of human industry, work and striving. The garden is a place prepared for humankind, but also a place requiring ongoing human upkeep. The presence of the tree of life suggests that the garden comprehends the very principles of abundant life and growth, and in this setting the natural corollary of idealized growth is idealized work. Adam’s labor is fulfilling of both himself and his environment. Implied here is the norm of perfect activity in time. So are introduced two pervasive themes of the biblical record: God is ever providing a place as well as promising new and more perfect places, even as humankind is enjoined to collaborate in obedience to the unfolding divine purpose. Eden, Canaan, Heaven: the sequence lists the gifts of a loving providence, contingent, as the Deuteronomic tradition puts it so well, on acceptance and obedience.

Harmony is a major meaning of the image of Paradise. Adam and Eve are pictured as living in harmony with nature, including both plants and animals. They also live in harmony with each other. But overshadowing this harmony on the natural and human planes is the open communion of Adam and Eve with God. The garden may be enclosed, but it also opens upward to God, who visits the garden that he has planted, “walking in the garden in the cool of the day” (Gen 3:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). When Adam and Eve are expelled (see Exile) from the garden, they lose more than a place—they also lose a spiritual status based on unfettered communion with God.

Two further motifs can be noted in connection with the Garden of Eden. In contrast to the earthly paradises of the classical tradition, this garden is not a place of inviolable retirement, but a place of continuous moral testing, as indicated by the presence of a forbidden tree in the middle of the garden. Related to this is the motif of the garden as a place of radical choice. In fact, we associate the original garden with the most decisive choice in the history of the world. Dominating our impression as we read Genesis 2 is our awareness that Paradise has been lost.

Ordinary Gardens. The motifs of Paradise are retained in subsequent gardens mentioned in the Bible. These lesser gardens are still ideals, though they lack the uniqueness of the original garden. The garden of God remains the touchstone of abundant natural growth and therefore of human prosperity. When Lot lifted up his eyes toward the plain of the Jordan, he saw it was “well watered everywhere like the garden of the Lord” (Gen 13:10 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In a vision of Zion restored, Isaiah envisions a desert transformed “like the garden of the Lord” (Is 51:3 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version] ; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 31:9; 36:35).

But even when no explicit reference is made to the Garden of Eden, biblical references to gardens retain its essential physical identity of being well-watered, green and fruitful. These gardens are not only images of nature but also implied pictures of farming. Along with their being watered, the thing that is most often noted about the gardens mentioned in the Bible is that they are planted. They do not happen naturally. A stock picture of industry and reward for labor in the prophetic visions of future restoration is that of planting gardens and eating what they produce (Jer 29:5, 28; Amos 9:14). The garden’s status as a blessing from God is underscored by the motif of the destroyed garden in oracles of judgment (Joel 2:3; Amos 4:9).

Whereas the Garden of Eden was planted by God, the gardens of the ordinary world are images of human status and achievement as well as images of nature. They are associated especially with the courtly life. When the kingly narrator of Ecclesiastes catalogs his material accomplishments, the list includes the statement “I made myself gardens and parks, and planted in them all kinds of fruit trees” (Eccles 2:5 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). We might note in passing that the Bible makes no sharp distinction among the terms garden, orchard, grove and park. In the ancient world kings and other people of rank had the prerogative of the finest gardens, a practice evident in the royal bower and garden of the Song of Songs.

The Garden of Love. A leading branch of the literature of paradise is the garden of love, and the Bible does not disappoint us in the matter. The Garden of Eden already hints at the motif, inasmuch as Adam and Eve are the prototypical husband and wife, with God instituting marriage and sexual union as part of their garden existence (Gen 2:24–25).

The Song of Songs is the world’s most famous garden of love. Here the paradisaic motifs become transformed into romantic realities. The beauty of the surroundings is an extension of the beauty of the beloved, and the sensory pleasures of the place mirror the pleasure the couple finds in their mutual love. The abundance and provision of the garden are metaphoric of the richness and value the two lovers find in each other. The enclosed nature of the garden of love captures the seclusion, privacy, intimacy and security that the lovers feel in their love, as well as hinting at the way in which the lovers are a world complete to themselves. The walled garden also becomes a symbol of the bride’s chastity (Song 4:12). The harmony that the couple finds with their environment reflects the harmony of their relationship with each other.

The Celestial Paradise. The Bible also makes paradise a heavenly reality. Three NT [NT NT. New Testament] passages associate the term paradise with a heavenly experience (Lk 23:43; 2 Cor 12:4; Rev 2:7), though without giving details of the place. The primary text is the vision of the New Jerusalem, which is a walled city to be sure, but one that possess paradisaic features of a river with a tree of life on either side, yielding fruit for the nations (Rev 22:1–2). Although the original paradise had been largely a secluded world, inhabited by just two people, the heavenly paradise is more populated and more open. The walls are graced by twelve resplendent jewel-gates that are perpetually open (Rev 21:25). Apparently a redeemed earth will be in perpetual commerce with the garden-city, for the traffic through the gates will involve “the glory and the honor of the nations” (Rev 21:26). In these pictures of the open enclosure, we see affirmed the sacred space that is whole and integral yet in eternal transaction. The celestial paradise, and to a lesser degree the original paradise, are built around a paradox: they are closed and yet open.

The Gardens of Jesus’ Life. The two gardens most strongly associated with Jesus are so different in physical properties and connotation that we scarcely think of them as gardens in the sense of the paradisaic garden, yet the Gospels treat them as gardens. The Garden of Gethsemane is a place of ultimate anguish, of suffering and betrayal, of arrest and violence. Given the conventions of a garden, it is almost an antigarden—a surrealistic inversion of expected qualities of a garden. Yet it also shares something important with the original Paradise: it is a sacred space within which a radical decision is made that reverses the course of human history.

The garden of the resurrection is even more of a synthesis, and the resurrection story itself takes on added meanings if we allow some of the garden motifs to flow into the experiences that transpired on resurrection morning. There can be no doubt that the site of the resurrection was a garden: John 19:41 tells us that the place of the tomb (near the site of the crucifixion) was a garden, and Mary Magdalene mistakes the risen Jesus for the gardener (Jn 20:15). It is fitting that a garden provide the context for the Easter miracle, inasmuch as gardens have been identified throughout history with the heightening of life and growth. The first garden accommodated the first Adam; the Easter garden accommodated the second Adam. As Paul exclaims, "If, because of the one man's trespass, death reigned through that one, much more surely will those who receive the abundance of grace . . . reign in life through the one man, Jesus Christ" (Rom 5:17 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). The resurrection offers a new horizon for humankind, with a world defined not by death but by life, with the prospect of growth into the fullness of the stature of Christ. All of this is enhanced if we allow the conventional meanings of the garden-abundant provision, human longing satisfied, harmony achieved, love triumphant-to flow into this one.

Summary. What then does the image of the garden mean in the Bible? It is an image of the ideal that heightens whatever activity occurs within it. It signals nature at its best, romantic love at its best, human well-being at its best, spiritual reality at its best. The garden of bliss is a moral and spiritual norm against which fallen experience is judged and toward which the human spirit aspires.

See also Abundance; Adam; Animals; Beauty; Eve; Fountain; Fruit; Grove; Heaven; Jerusalem; Love Story; Nature; Plants; Sacred Space; Sex; Song of Solomon; Spring of Water; Tree, Trees; Tree of Life; Water; Zion.

Bibliography. P. Morris and D. Sawyer, A Walk in the Garden: Biblical, Iconographical and Literary Images of Eden (Sheffield: JSOT, 1992).

GARMENTS

The imagery of garments and clothing is of the major importance in the Bible. Its significance can be physical, economic, social, moral or spiritual. The imagery of investing and divesting a person of clothing is usually symbolic of larger issues. The function of clothing, moreover, is multiple: clothing can protect, conceal, display or represent a person's current state and can be symbolic of moral and spiritual qualities. The fact that garments wear out is also important.

God, as well as people, is portrayed as wearing garments. Garments can occur in everyday settings or religious settings. Clothing ranges from the endearing reference to how Samuel's mother "used to make for him a little robe and take it to him each year" as he was growing up (1 Sam 2:19 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) to the resplendent wedding garments of a royal wedding (Ps 45:13—14), and from the coarse sackcloth worn in mourning to the otherworldly dazzling clothes of angels and the transfigured Christ. Literal and figurative meanings are intertwined in virtually every category of usages. It is no exaggeration to say that one can trace the whole outline of biblical theology and salvation history through the motif of clothing.

Economic Importance. References to clothing should resolve any doubt that the biblical world was largely a subsistence economy. Garments are obviously scarce and therefore valuable. A man who takes a second wife shall not diminish the clothing of the first wife (Ex 21:10). If an Israelite takes a neighbor's garment in pledge, he is to return it before sundown because "it may be your neighbor's only clothing to use as cover" (Ex 22:26—27 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; 24:13). In his vow Jacob links “bread to eat and clothing to wear” as the staples of life (Gen 28:20; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] 1 Tim 6:8, which enjoins Christians to be content if they have food and clothing). An ultimate image of destitution is to “lie all night naked, without clothing, and have no covering in the cold” or to “go about naked, without clothing”(Job 24:7, 10 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Because garments are so valuable in a subsistence economy, their wearing out (Ps 102:26; Is 51:6 8; Heb 1:11) or being eaten by moths (Job 13:28; Prov 25:20; Is 50:9; 51:8) becomes an image of terror.

In keeping with clothing as a valued item, we note also its prominence in the taking of plunder by a conqueror (Ex 3:22; 12:35; Josh 22:8; Judg 8:26; 1 Sam 27:9; 2 Kings 7:8; 2 Chron 20:25). When Samson needs thirty garments to pay off a wager that he has lost, he undertakes a plundering expedition to exact the agreements from victims (Judg 14:19). With the wealthy, clothing becomes an image of abundance (1 Kings 10:5; 2 Chron 9:4; Zech 14:14). Of similar import is the prevalence of clothing as a formal gift (Gen 24:53; Judg 17:10; 1 Kings 10:25; 2 Kings 5:5, 23, 26; 2 Chron 9:24). Rich clothing is both a sign and source of commercial power for the nation producing it (Ezek 27:24).

As an image of basic human need, clothing can, by a logical extension, become an image of God’s provision. Clothing (along with food) is one of two areas of human life regarding which Jesus prohibits worry in his discourse against anxiety (Mt 6:25—30; Lk12:23—28). During the forty years of wilderness wanderings, God’s provision for the Israelites is seen partly in the fact that their clothes do not wear out (Deut 8:4; 29:5; Neh 9:21). One of God’s first acts of provision for humankind after the fall is to make “garments of skins for the man and for his wife” and clothe them (Gen 3:21). By a further extension, lavish adornment of clothes can become a sign of God's special blessing on a nation (Ezek 16:13; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 23:18, where fine clothing is an image of abundant provision "for those who live in the presence of the Lord").

The Clothing of God and Nature. Nature is part of the clothing of God in the Bible, as God is "wrapped in light as with a garment" (Ps 104:2 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). Clothing is also combined with conceptual imagery (words naming qualities) to render the attributes of God vivid. Thus God is "clothed with honor and majesty" (Ps 104:1). He also puts on "garments of vengeance for clothing" (Is 59:17; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Is 63:2—3), and he is "splendidly robed, marching in his great might" (Is 63:1).

To the poetic imagination, various forces of nature are like clothing. Thus the clouds are the garment for the sea (Job 38:9); the sea, in turn, covers the deep "as with a garment" (Ps 104:6 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]); and God clothes the heavens with blackness (Is 50:3). God is said to clothe the grass of the field (Mt 6:30; Lk 12:28). God's omnipotence over the forces of nature is pictured as his wrapping up the waters in a garment (Prov 30:4). The transience of nature is also pictured by garment imagery: the forces of nature "will all wear out like a garment," and God will "change them like clothing" (Ps 102:26 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version] ; see also Is 50:9; 51:6, 8; Heb 1:12). The impenetrable skin of Leviathan is like an outer garment that no human can strip off (Job 41:13).

Garments of Festivity. A notable garment motif is that of festal garments. Here fine and white clothing symbolizes celebration. Employing ancient images of festivity, the writer of Ecclesiastes commands that life be lived with zest: "Let your garments always be white; do not let oil be lacking on your head” (Eccles 9:8 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In one of Isaiah’s oracles of coming salvation, he commands Zion to “put on your beautiful garments” (Is 52:1).

Every society has its rituals of “dressing up” for special occasions, and we catch glimpses of it in the Bible as well. On the momentous night of Ruth’s betrothal, she washes, anoints herself and puts on her best clothes as her preparation for springing a surprise on Boaz on the threshing floor (Ruth 3:3). The attractive clothing of the beloved is an archetypal image of romantic love (Song 4:11), where the adornment of jewelry is an extension of clothing (Song 1:10–11; 4:9). The supreme occasion of dressing up is the wedding (Ps 45:13–14; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] reference in Jesus’ parable to the importance of appropriate wedding garments [Mt 22:11–12]).

Images of Mourning and Desolation. Whereas festive garments are a comic motif, linked with celebration and a happy ending, their tragic counterpart is garments associated with mourning or desolation. We thus read about prison clothes (2 Kings 25:29; Jer 52:33), widow’s garments (Gen 38:14, 19), “captive’s garb” (Deut 21:13) and “mourning garments” (2 Sam 14:2). Clothing oneself in sackcloth is a ritual of repentance or dismay (Gen 37:34; Esther 4:1; Ps 69:11; Is 37:1). Lepers wore torn clothing to advertise their diseased state to the public (Lev 13:45).

Another major motif is the tearing of clothes as a ritual gesture of grief or as an act of uncontrollable rage. Indeed, one of the best indices to the emotionalism of the ancient Hebrews is the frequency with which we read about people tearing their garments in a display of strong feeling. To cite just three specimens, Reuben tears his clothes when he returns to the pit and finds Joseph missing (Gen 37:29), Ezra rends his garments when he learns about the Israelites’ intermarriage (Ezra 9:3), and King Hezekiah tears his clothes when he receives the threatening letter from the Assyrian king (Is 37:1). If we trace the three dozen explicit references to people's tearing their clothing, we find four main categories of crisis-grief or mourning over the loss of something or someone, sorrow for sin in an act of repentance, fear or alarm and anger or frustration.

Putting On and Taking Off Clothes. The actions of putting clothing on and putting it off constitute another major motif. The specific meaning of investing a person with a garment depends on what kind of clothing is in view. When a priest puts off his ordinary garments and puts on linen garments to perform his religious functions, the action signifies consecration of the priest for spiritual duties (Ex 29:1–9; 40:12–15; Lev 6:11; 16:1–4). To remove the priestly garment means a cessation of sacred duties and a return to the ordinary routine (Lev 16:23–23; Ezek 44:19). In a prophetic oracle of judgment, the putting off of garments carries the meaning of exposure and shaming (Is 47:2). When Esther puts on her royal robes before standing in the court of the king's palace, it betokens her assertion of the rights of the queen (Esther 5:1; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Acts 12:21). Repeated references to putting on sackcloth picture a person's assuming the rituals of either mourning or repentance.

The most extreme form of divesting clothing is expressed by the strongly negative action of stripping, implying subjection to a being or army with superior power. The act of humbling is implied in the picture of counselors and priests being led away stripped (Job 12:17, 19; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Job 19:9). When kings are stripped of their robes, it is a way of saying that they have been conquered (Is 45:1). Stripping corpses on a battlefield is a part of taking booty (1 Sam 31:8; 2 Sam 23:10; 1 Chron 10:8). Aaron's garments are stripped from him and put on his son at his death (Num 20:26—28).

By an easy progression the literal investing and divesting of garments becomes overtly metaphoric of spiritual states. Thus we read about the need to “cast off the works of darkness” (Rom 13:12 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]) and “put off the old nature” (Col 3:9; see also Eph 4:22). Contrariwise, when Job sums up his life he claims, “I put on righteousness, and it clothed me; my justice was like a robe and a turban” (Job 29:14 RSV [RSV RSV. Revised Standard Version]). In Isaiah’s apocalyptic vision Jerusalem is enjoined to “put on your beautiful garments” (Is 52:1), and God is said to “put on righteousness” (Is 59:17). Paul instructs believers to “put on the new nature” (Col 3:10). And in the future life believers will “put on imperishability” (1 Cor 15:53).

The Morality of Clothing. Several different moral themes converge in the Bible’s references to clothing. As an antidote to the feminine tendency toward extravagant clothing, two NT [NT NT. New Testament] epistles warn against placing unwarranted value on external apparel and commend modesty in clothing (1 Tim 2:9; 1 Pet 3:3). James warns against preferential treatment of people who can afford “fine clothing” as contrasted with the economically disadvantaged who dress poorly (Jas 2:2—3). Paul counts it as one of his moral virtues that he “coveted no one’s silver or gold or clothing” (Acts 20:33 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]).

Elsewhere the clothing of the destitute becomes a touchstone of moral compassion—an image of mercy. In Jesus’ account of the final judgment, clothing the naked is placed in the same category as caring for the sick, visiting the prisoner and welcoming the stranger as acts that provide entry into heaven (Mt 25:36—43; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Ezek 18:7, 16). In Job's great oath of innocence, one of the acts that he implicitly ascribes to himself is that he did not allow anyone in his purview to "perish for lack of clothing, or a poor person without covering" (Job 31:19 NRSV [NRSV NRSV. New Revised Standard Version]). When Dorcas dies, the tribute to her acts of mercy is the clothing that widows had received from her hand (Acts 9:39). Similar concern that the poor be clothed is evidenced in the Mosaic law (Deut 24:12, 17), reflecting God's identical concern (Deut 10:18). Conversely, to divest the poor of their clothing is portrayed as a heinous sin (Job 22:6; Amos 2:8).

Clothing of Deceit. Garment imagery is not uniformly positive in the Bible. If its covering quality makes it an image of warmth and protection, that same quality can make it an image of deceitful concealment. Here we have images of false prophets who come in sheep's clothing but inwardly are ravenous wolves (Mt 7:15) or of Jacob donning the clothing of Esau to trick his blind father and steal the blessing (Gen 27:15, 27). The crafty left-hander Ehud hides his homemade spear under his clothing on the unexpected right side, thereby escaping detection (Judg 3:16). David's wife Michal tricks her father's soldiers by covering goats' hair with David's clothes (1 Sam 19:13), while Saul puts on clothing of disguise in an effort to escape detection when he visits the witch of Endor (1 Sam 28:8). Most deceitful of all are the men of Gibeon, who secure a treaty with the Israelites under false pretenses when they assumed worn-out clothes and pretend to come from a distant country (Judg 9:5, 13).

The Old Testament Ceremonial Law. Clothing is prominent in the Mosaic laws as well, where it assumes ritual significance. The priest's investing and divesting himself of his special garment has already been noted. The largest cluster of references (30) is to the washing of clothes as a hygienic precaution or a symbol of purification. A prohibition of wearing garments made of more than one type of cloth signifies sanctification or purity (Lev 19:19; Deut 22:11). Cross dressing between men and women is disallowed (Deut 22:3, 5).

Transcendent Clothing. Dazzling garments are a leading feature of the portrayal of transcendent or heavenly beings. Here we find a mingling of the familiar and the unfamiliar, or the raising of something commonplace to a realm beyond the earthly. The most famous instance is Jesus' transfiguration, when "his clothes became dazzling white" (Mt 17:2; Mk 9:3; Lk 9:29). In similar manner, the "Ancient One" on the throne in Daniel's apocalyptic vision wears clothing that was "white as snow" (Dan 7:9). Angels too are portrayed as wearing "dazzling clothes" (Lk 24:4; Acts 10:30) or "clothing white as snow" (Mt 28:3). The priestly garments of OT [OT OT. Old Testament] worship are only slightly less otherworldly than those of supernatural beings (Ex 28). And the redeemed saints in heaven are garbed in resplendent white robes (Rev 3:4—5; 4:4; 7:9, 13; 15:6; 19:14).

Christ and Clothing. Many of the foregoing motifs converge in the life of Christ. His birth as a naked infant, followed by his being wrapped in the swaddling cloths that were used in that time, signifies his humanity. The compassion and miraculous power of Jesus are encapsulated (as with the click of a camera) in the moment when a woman stricken with a blood ailment for years is immediately healed when she touches the hem of Jesus' garment (Mt 9:18—2; Mk 5:25—34; Lk 8:42—48; cf. [cf. cf.. compare] Mk 6:56). Clothing imagery pervades the passion of Christ, as Jesus is stripped of his clothing and invested with a royal robe in a public mocking (Mt 27:28—31; Mk 15:17—20; Jn 19:2—3), has his clothing divided among the soldiers (Mt 27:35; Mk 15:24; Lk 23:34; Jn 19:24) and is wrapped in a burial cloth. In his glorification in heaven Jesus appears again in transcendent clothing (Rev 1:13).

Salvation History. It is also possible to trace the main outlines of salvation history by means of garment imagery. Clothing is first present in the Bible by its absence, as the nakedness of Adam and Eve is an index to their pristine innocence and freedom (Gen 2:25). After the Fall, clothing becomes a symbol of the need for human shame to be covered. The fig leaves with which Adam and Eve attempt to conceal their shame are a pathetically ineffectual effort to deal with human guilt (Gen 3:7). Only God can provide adequate clothing for the human race after the Fall (Gen 3:21).

